sub-section 3, under which the Japanese may carry on business on the same footing as other people. Therefore I think I am in order in showing that this Government has in a way interfered with the provincial jurisdiction over that very same matter.

Mr. EMMERSON: Is the petition from some body?

Mr. KNOWLES: They are Japanese names. The petition states:

Your petitioners are composed of one hundred men, more than half of whom are British subjects, and the balance of whom intend to become British subjects.

The Canadian Japanese, it is called.

Mr. EMMERSON: An association or a society?

Mr. KNOWLES: Manifestly an order. I presume it is an organization. My hon. friend from Vancouver will know all about it.

Mr. STEVENS: It is just derived from the Japanese colony in Vancouver. There is no doubt of that. The hon. member has it clearly before him.

Mr. KNOWLES: The Government took up this petition, passed it from department to department, and it got to the Old Country. An opinion was expressed by the Old Country authorities to which I want to call the attention of the Government The dispatch is sent from Mr. Harcourt, in which he says that he discussed this matter personally with Mr. Borden. He says:

I communicated with Mr. Borden, with whom I discussed this question.

We should know what was communicated to our Prime Minister at that interview. There is attached to this dispatch a memorandum which, I say in all fairness, should have gone to the Saskatchewan Government. On the contrary, the present Conservative Government in the city of Ottawa sent to the Lieutenant Governor of Saskatchewan a peremptory request that he undertake that his legislature would repeal this Act without any arrangement whatever or any terms of any kind being made. Let me read to you one part of what Mr. Harcourt says in his memorandum, which is very important. It suggests a way in which we, in the province of Saskatchewan, might attain the same purpose that our Act strove for, even if the Act itself were repealed. The clause reads as follows:

It would be possible simply to alter the law so as to provide that no person without a license, to be obtained from some executive authority, shall employ in any capacity any white woman or girl or permit any white woman or girl to reside or lodge in or to work in or, save as a bona fide customer in a public department thereof only, to frequent any restaurant, laundry, or other place of business or amusement. Thus, by differential treatment in the matter of the grant of licenses, the Japanese and other Orientals could be refused licenses. The grant of such licenses might be in the absolute discretion of the authority selected.

Mr. Harcourt, when he asked that steps be taken to repeal the Saskatchewan legislation on this point, went out of his way to devise means whereby the wishes of the people of Saskatchewan might be met, and this Government, in transmitting that communication to the authorities in Saskatchewan, went out of its way to suppress that very suggestion by which we might ultimately have obtained what we had in mind. I charge this Government and the Conservative party, who for years have been endeavouring to make the people of this country believe that they are the friends of those who advocate a white Canada, with suppressing this statement, which should have been submitted to the Saskatchewan Government. Mr. Harcourt says that the fact that there is a piece of legislation on the statute-books of Saskatchewan in which the Japanese are differentiated against in a most offensive way—the Japanese people being specially mentioned in that legislation —may lead us into complications with Japan, and he says, if you cannot have the people of Saskatchewan repeal that enactment, you might suggest that they could accomplish the necessary purpose by requiring that every person carrying on this business should obtain a license, thus making your authority absolute in its discretion as to who should receive these licenses, and they might be refused to the Japanese if it were so desired. This statement is on the file which was brought down by the Prime Minister; it has been suppressed, and in the province of Saskatchewan this Government have gone out of their way to interfere with our provincial legislation without extending the ordinary courtesy of mentioning that which the Secretary of State for the Colonies suggested to the Governor General in his despatch of August 17, last. I say this Government should explain why they have not made this suggestion, especially in the light of all their preachings and professions of a love for a white Canada. Hon. gentlemen opposite are holding out that they are the friends of the labour people. I well remember that in the election of 1908, in the city of Moosejaw, where there are a great many labour organizations and railway employees, the Liberal party was abused before these brotherhoods and unions because of its attitude on the question of Japanese immigration into this country, and the Conservatives stated that if they were returned to power they would remedy this condition and would keep every Japanese foot from trampling on Canadian soil. But, having attained power, they, in this as in every other instance, have absolutely forgotten their promise and turned their backs on the people of that province.

At six o'clock, House resumed, and then took recess.

After Recess.

House resumed at eight o'clock, and again went into Committee. (Mr. Deputy Speaker in the Chair.)

Mr. KNOWLES: At six o'clock I was calling the attention of the committee to the manner in which this Government had acted when they effected the repeal of chapter 17 of the Statutes of 1912 of the legislature of Saskatchewan, which was an Act to prevent the employement of white women and white girls in restaurants, laundries or places of amusement kept by Orientals, and I had called attention to the fact that Mr. Harcourt had communicated to this Government certain suggestions with a view to the provincial government finding a solution of the problem without the formality of an Act, but still as effective in its results. That suggestion made by Mr. Harcourt, Secretary of State for the Colonies, had been suppressed by this Government and had not been communicated to the Lieutenant Governor in Council. This Government simply wrote the Lieutenant Governor of Saskatchewan on September 10 last enclosing him a copy of an Order in Council of their own as taken from the Canada Gazette and requesting that the Lieutenant Governor would ascertain if his ministers would effect the repeal of that Act. I will read the communication:

Ottawa, 10th September, 1912.

Sir,—I have the honour to transmit to you, herewith, a Minute of the Privy Council, dated the 6th instant, approving the report of the Minister of Justice with reference to an Act passed at the last session of the legislature of Saskatchewan intituled: 'An Act to prevent the employment of female labour in certain capacities" and to request that you will be good enough to ask your ministers to consider the same, and to inform His Royal Highness' Government as to whether your Government will promote the suggested legislation at the next ensuing session of the legislature.

I have the honour to be, Sir,
Your obedient servant,
P. Pelletier,
Acting Under-Secretary of State.

The next document on the file following that is a telegram without date; I do not know when it was sent but I shall read it. It is addressed also to His Honour the Lieutenant Governor of Saskatchewan, Regina, Saskatchewan.

I have been requested to direct you——

You will notice the term, it is not at all a matter of suggestion now, the tone is getting peremptory.

I have been requested to direct you to reply by wire and confirmatory despatch to despatch 10th September last respecting intention of your Government as to legislation at next session of legislature affecting employment of female labour.

Thomas Mulvey,
Under-Secretary of State.

You will notice the commanding tone which this Government takes: 'I am requested to direct you to reply by wire,' language that shows that there was an utter absence of sympathy between this Government and the government of Saskatchewan which was endeavouring to do away with this eastern peril or whatever it might be called, as much as possible. To that the Lieutenant Governor of Saskatchewan replied:

Regina, Sask., December 16, 1912.

Thos. Mulvey,
Under-Secretary of State,
Ottawa, Can.

It is the intention of my Government to amend legislation respecting female labour by making it applicable to Chinese only.

Lieutenant Governor of Saskatchewan.

On receipt of that, although the Legislature was then just convening and although there was, I think until the 4th of April certainly in the month of April next for the legislature of Saskatchewan to pass the legislation and still leave time for this Government to annul or veto it, the Government of my right hon. friend were not satisfied with that, they were not satisfied with the mere statement that it was the intention of the government of Saskatchewan to amend the Act, so they communicated with him again and asked him that his government should undertake to have this repealed. I shall read the communication to you:

Ottawa, 7th January, 1913.

Lieutenant Governor of Saskatchewan.

Sir,—With reference to your Honour's telegram of the 16th December last, stating that it is the intention of your Government to amend legislation respecting female labour by making it applicable to Chinese only, I have the honour to say that the Minister of Justice considers that such an amendment would not be unsatisfactory to the Colonial Office, and might be accepted as a sufficient compliance with the requirement of the Order in Council of 6th September last. He observed, however, that the time for disallowance will expire on the 4th April next, and in the meantime a mere statement of the intention of your Government is not perhaps quite equivalent to an undertaking. The Secretary of State will be pleased, therefore, as this is a matter of considerable importance if you would communicate again with your ministers and obtain a positive assurance that amending legislation exempting Japanese and British Indian subjects from the operation of the Act will be enacted within the time limited for disallowance.

I am further to request that you will be good enough to give directions to insure the immediate transmission to this department of a copy of the amending statute upon its enactment.

I have the honour to be, Sir,
Your obedient servant,

Thos. Mulvey,
Under-Secretary of State.

You will see running through this the imperative stamp, the stamp almost of the man who holds a gun at the head of another and orders him to do a certain thing. I think it portrays an utter lack of sympathy on the part of this Government with the Government of Saskatchewan which was seeking to bring in a remedy as far as it was in their power to do so. The next communication is from the Deputy Attorney General enclosing a certified copy of the Act of 1913 which repealed the legislation which had been objected to. In the suppression of that suggestion from Mr. Harcourt, in the exacting by this Government of an undertaking, a promise, an assurance, in the whole conduct of the case we see the attitude of the Conservative Government on the Japanese problem, we see that it is at entire discord and out of harmony with their professions while in opposition.

The Prime Minister, when he spoke last, referred to the protocol which was adopted by Queensland. I shall refer to it again. I wish the Prime Minister were here but perhaps the Minister of Finance can tell me why we have not this treaty on the same principle the Prime Minister advocated in 1908. The protocol as it was adopted in the case of Queensland was as follows:

The undersigned.....duly authorized, &c., have agreed that the stipulations contained in the first and third articles of the Treaty of Commerce and Navigation between Great Britain and Japan, signed in London on the 16th July, 1894, shall not in any way affect the laws, ordinances and regulations with regard to trade, the immigration of labourers and artisans, police and public security which are in force or may hereafter be enacted in either of the colonies and foreign possessions of Her Britannic Majesty enumerated in article XIX. of the said treaty, with the exception of Newfoundland and Natal, or in Japan.

In witness thereof.

Done at Tokio.

Why was that not adopted here as it is much more comprehensive and as it also clearly sets forth that the legislation which any of the self-governing colonies may hereafter enact shall be incorporated into the treaty? It is also specifically set forth that not only the existing laws in these different self-governing colonies of the British Empire but those which may hereafter be enacted shall be incorporated. If the Prime Minister had sincerely desired to protect the Dominion of Canada against abuses on the part of Japan and had really desired to keep us from being at the mercy of Japan in the matter, why did he not adopt this plan which he advocated in 1908?

Speaking in 1907-08 the right hon. gentleman said:

Now I repeat, Mr. Speaker, that by the action of the Government in this regard Canada has handed over to Japan the control of immigration which Canada herself ought to exercise and the regulations of immigration in future are to be the Japanese regulations.

I wish hon. gentlemen opposite would tell us in what way we are supported or protected against that now.

That the control and policy are to be Japanese, and that in case of difficulty our remedy and our only remedy, outside of the abrogation of this treaty, is by appeal to the Japanese Government from time to time. The Government of Japan can change its policy to-morrow. A new government might come into power within three months in Japan and that government might repeal every law on the statute-book in Japan with respect to the restriction of immigration, it might abolish every limitation which has been enacted by the present Administration and we could, in three or four months, be exactly back to the same position as we were before the hon. Postmaster General went to Japan.

I say that these words of the present Prime Minister are very significant. Although there existed then for the protection of Canada the arrangement which the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) had made with Japan, the right hon. the Prime Minister said that between us and the removal of that arrangement there was only a question of the stability of the Japanese Government. Any morning, he said, we might wake up and read that the Japanese Government had repealed the laws, that they had changed their minds, that they had opened their own gates and allowed emigrants to flow out of their own country. If that argument had any force in 1908, it has just as much, if not more force in the year 1913. In the same speech, which is to be found on page 2043 of 'Hansard,' 1907-8, the Prime Minister said:

The situation at the present time is that Japan, in so far as immigration from that country to Canada is concerned, may exercise control and that Canada may not exercise any control.

I think these words are applicable to-day when we have no more control than when the Prime Minister spoke in 1908. May I read the motion with which the right hon. gentleman closed his speech? Here is the motion, which was moved as an amendment to the motion to go into Supply:

That this House, while expressing its profound appreciation of the friendly intentions and courteous assurances of the Japanese Government, and while declaring its sincere desire for the most cordial relations with the Japanese people, desires nevertheless to record its strong protest against a policy under which our wage-earning population cannot be protected from destructive invading competition except by entreating the forbearance and aid of a foreign government.

These words, I say, are just as applicable to-day as they were then, and I wish the Prime Minister were here, that I might ask him if it is possible to show in what respect the legislation that he is now proposing removes the peril which he said then existed. He said yesterday, as in 1908, that in the influx of immigrants from Japan, under the arrangement of the member for Rouville, there was a peril so great that it was a sufficient justification for him to move an amendment to the motion to go into Supply, to try to put the Government out of power. He thought that the peril was so great that he moved a vote of want of confidence, and the business of this House was stayed, in order that that peril might be discussed. To-day, with his eyes open, he not only deliberately continues, but increases that peril which he saw in the treaty in 1908. Is there any consistency, having regard to his conduct in 1908, in presenting to us a Bill to-day which does not even give us the safeguards which were provided in the legislation of 1908? The then right hon. Prime Minister, it appears, had expressed doubt as to whether Japan would agree to the terms which had been given to Queensland. The present Prime Minister quoted the following words as having been uttered by the present leader of the Opposition:

It is doubtful whether Japan would now agree to a treaty on any other basis than the proposals contained in the original treaty.

And then he went on:

What was the ground for that doubt? Japan had consented to a protocol in October, 1896, and this Government had it open to them at all times between October, 1896, and September 25, 1907, to accede to that treaty with a stipulation ensuring to Canada the control over immigration. For what reason is it to be said that there was any doubt? At all events, assuming that there was doubt, would it not have been worth while before plunging into a treaty of that kind which deprives us of the control of immigration, to at least make an attempt and, after making an attempt and ascertaining what the conditions were, to come to Parliament and have a discussion and find out whether or not the true voice and spirit of this country was in favour of giving up control of immigration from Japan in order to secure any commercial advantage which would accrue to us by adhesion to that treaty?

Even, said the present Prime Minister in 1908, if you will not go so far as to drop your legislation in 1908, at least call a halt, and let us negotiate with Japan; let us see if we cannot get the terms of the protocol, and if you cannot get them, then come back to the House of Commons and let us discuss the matter. So I say to-night in all seriousness, especially to the hon. gentlemen who come from British Columbia, that as there is at least a very serious doubt as to whether this legislation ties our hands or not, in regard to our future immigration policy—and I submit that there is no doubt that it does tie our hands—but if there is a question as to whether it ties our hands, should we not negotiate with Japan, and see if we cannot get more permanent terms at least? Hon. gentlemen opposite are strong on the permanent policy that they are going to bring forward in regard to a certain matter; here is an opportunity to ascertain what their permanent policy might be in regard to immigration. We do not know where this immigration policy is going to lead us. Should we not therefore at least halt and try to ascertain whether or not we can get with the great Empire of Japan an arrangement under which we would have undoubted freedom in the control of our own immigration laws and regulations. Some pretense has been made to argue that this treaty still leaves it open to us to change our immigration laws, but the more I think of it, the more I am convinced that that argument is idle. Will anybody say that we will have full freedom in our immigration laws if this treaty passes? If we are to have any freedom we must have full freedom. We cannot have immigration laws and not have full freedom to control them; that would be ridiculous. We might as well make an arrangement that the Japanese can come in as freely as the breeze blows, that there will be no impeding legislation placed over them. If we restrict our immigration in any way, we absolutely restrict it. If we are to have any freedom, we must have absolute freedom. If we had full freedom, we could pass an amendment to our laws providing that nobody coming from Asia could land on our shores, but we would not take such power. This treaty ties our hands, so that we cannot change our immigration laws. If there was any doubt on this point, I would be willing to leave it to the Minister of Justice. I would be willing to have him interpret the words in clause 2 of the Bill, as to what the Immigration Act of Canada means. I would be willing to get the opinion of his deputy as to whether that still leaves us free. I am bound to say that there is no question in my mind that either the minister or his deputy would say that our hands are tied, and that the present immigration legislation of Canada is incorporated in this treaty, just the same as if it were written there line by line above the signatures of the consenting parties. Therefore, I say let us go slowly. We want to look into the future in regard to this matter. There is nothing so urgent in it, and we might as well leave it in abeyance until some more permanent and suitable arrangement can be made to protect the interests of the Dominion of Canada.

Mr. F. B. CARVELL (Carleton, N.B.): Listening to the right hon. the Prime Minister when he discussed this matter, it seemed to me that he tried to impress upon the House and upon the country the principle that in ratifying that treaty he was in some way protecting the Dominion of Canada against an influx of Oriental immigrants in a way that has never been done before. The cardinal principle of his argument was that by this Bill the Government of Canada reserves to itself the entire control of immigration. These were his words: I took them down exactly as they were uttered by the right hon. gentleman this afternoon. Again he blamed the former Government because the old treaty prevented them from controlling immigration and said that this Bill gives us that control. That was the underlying principle of the argument and contention put forward by the right hon. gentleman yesterday and to-day in discussing the terms of this Bill. I believe the Japanese Government will loyally carry out the gentleman's agreement, which has been referred to here, and that, therefore, the white labourers of British Columbia and western Canada will not suffer, but it will only be by reason of the loyalty with which the Japanese Government carry out the agreement, not the treaty, and not by reason of anything proposed in this Bill. I may be drawing, perhaps, what my hon. friends opposite may consider an unwarranted conclusion from the reading of this Bill, but I am forced to the conclusion that, instead of taking control of our immigration, we are absolutely throwing it away. We are in a much worse position than we were under the old treaty and in a worse position than we were at any time down to the time of the arrangement which was made by my hon. friend from Rouville, when, acting as plenipotentiary to Japan. Let us examine this matter and see where we land. My right hon. friend takes great credit to himself for this measure and he seems to be backed up by his followers from British Columbia, but I hope these hon. gentlemen from British Columbia will give this matter a little more than passing notice. I observed that the hon. member for Vancouver (Mr. Stevens) seemed willing to swallow the whole thing in one gulp last night and thanked the Government for so effectually coming to the rescue of the white people of British Columbia. I see in his seat now the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Shepherd), a gentleman who, I know, is very closely associated with the labour interests of British Columbia, a gentleman who wants to do all he can to protect the interests of his constituents and the white people of British Columbia especially, a gentleman who was not a member of this House in the old days when considerable heated argument took place regarding Japanese immigration and who, therefore, would not be bound by what his predecessors may have done and a gentleman who will have an open mind on this subject, who will be convinced, if it is possible to convince him, that the position which I am now taking is sound, and who, I hope, if there is anything wrong about this thing, will try and stay the hand of his Premier and have the matter made right. The provision of the Bill to which I first wish to draw the attention of the committee is clause (a) of section 2, which is as follows:

> Nothing in the said treaty or in this Act shall be deemed to repeal or affect any of the provisions of the Immigration Act.

When I read that clause (a) in conjunction with the correspondence that has taken place between the Prime Minister and the Japanese Consul General, I am forced to the conclusion that we have absolutely tied our hands, that we have absolutely put it beyond our power to control Asiatic or Japanese immigration unless we absolutely rely upon the good faith of the Japanese Government in carrying out, not the treaty, but a private agreement, as my right hon. friend has been pleased to call the arrangement made between the Japanese Government and my hon. friend from Rouville. I thought my right hon. friend this afternoon tried to argue that, when we say that nothing in this treaty or in this Act shall be deemed to repeal or affect any provisions of the Immigration Act, that the reference is to an amendment of the Immigration Act. But I do not think that my right hon. friend would seriously argue that. I am satisfied that when he comes to look it over, he will not argue that, and I am satisfied that my hon. friends from British Columbia will not argue that. When my hon. friends from British Columbia are giving their assent to this Bill and this treaty, they are practically saying that they are satisfied to make a treaty with Japan and to provide that there shall be no change in the Immigration Act, but if the Immigration Act has any faults or defects, if it even allows privileges to the Japanese race which it ought not to allow, their hands are tied and they are precluded from making any changes because the only right they would possess would be the right to ask the Imperial Government to give notice to denounce the treaty. The Imperial Government has the right to denounce the treaty on giving one year's notice. If it be of any advantage, my hon. friends should remember that we had an advantage over them in the old treaty, because we could denounce the old treaty on giving six months' notice; now, we have to give a year's notice. But perhaps that is not a matter of any serious importance and therefore I shall not spend any more time in discussing it.

I want to discuss the Immigration Act because that is the basis of the whole contract. It is said in the Bill that we shall not repeal this Immigration Act. In the correspondence the right hon. the Prime Minister states that he sent to the Imperial Government of Japan, through the Consul General, a copy of the Bill and that copy of the Bill expressly refers to the Immigration Act. There is only one Immigration Act in force in Canada to-day and that is the Immigration Act of 1910. I do not know whether the right hon. gentleman included with the Bill a copy of the Act or not, but it does not make any difference because you can depend upon it that the Japanese Consul and the Japanese Government have that Immigration Act and know what it means. Therefore, the right hon. gentleman says: I am sending to you a copy of the Bill which I propose to introduce in Parliament and ask Parliament to ratify and in this copy of the Bill it is stated that they will be governed practically by the Immigration Act which means, of course, that you cannot amend the Immigration Act because you have entered into a solemn compact not to do so. I do not say that you would not have the power to do so by some breach of faith with the Japanese Government, but we do not assume that our Government is going to enter into a solemn agreement and break it. We assume that our Government is going to stand by what it undertakes to do. Therefore, you have the solemn promise on the part of the Prime Minister that this Bill will go through and that it will recognize the principles of the Immigration Act of 1910 and no other. Let us see what the Immigration Act of 1910 provides. I have neither the time nor the ambition to read the whole Immigration Act, but I want to go over it very generally. Clause 3 of the Immigration Act provides that there are certain classes of persons who are prohibited from coming into Canada and this prohibition applies, not to Japanese alone, but to every nationality under the sun. It applies to Englishmen, Scotchmen, Irishmen, French, Hindus, Japanese, Chinese and everybody else in the world. By the Act then, certain prohibited classes have not the right to enter Canada. Section 3 says:

Mr. CARVELL.

No immigrant, passenger, or other person, unless he is a Canadian citizen, or has Canadian domicile, shall be permitted to land in Canada, or in case of having landed in or entered Canada shall be permitted to remain therein, who belongs to any of the following classes, hereinafter called 'prohibited classes'—

(a) Idiots, imbeciles, feeble-minded persons, epileptics, insane persons, and persons who have been insane within five years previous;

(b) persons afflicted with any loathsome disease, or with a disease which is contagious or infections, or which may become dangerous to the public health, whether such persons intend to settle in Canada or only to pass through Canada in transit to some other country, provided that if such disease is one which is curable within a reasonably short time, such persons may, subject to the regulations in that behalf, if any, be permitted to remain on board ship if hospital facilities do not exist on shore, or to leave ship for medical treatment;

(c) immigrants who are dumb, blind, or otherwise physically defective, unless in the opinion of a board of inquiry or officer acting as such they have sufficient money, or have such profession, occupation, trade, employment or other legitimate mode of earning a living that they are not liable to become a public charge or unless they belong to a family accompanying them or already in Canada and which gives security satisfactory to the minister against such immigrants becoming a public charge;

(d) persons who have been convicted of any crime involving moral turpitude;

(e) prostitutes and women and girls coming to Canada for any immoral purpose and pimps or persons living on the avails of prostitution;

(f) persons who procure or attempt to bring into Canada prostitutes or women or girls for the purpose of prostitution or other immoral purpose;

(g) professional beggars or vagrants, or persons likely to become a public charge;

(h) immigrants to whom money has been given or loaned by any charitable organization for the purpose of enabling them to qualify for landing in Canada under this Act.

(i) Persons who do not comply with the conditions and requirements of any regulations which are for the time being in force and applicable to such persons under sections 37 and 38.

Those are the persons excluded from coming into Canada under the Immigration Act and I make the statement here, and it cannot be denied, that any Japanese, Chinese, Englishman, Scotchman, Frenchman, who does not come under one of those prohibited heads has an absolute right to come into Canada, unless of course we have some other provision which precludes him. Let us take article I of the treaty to see what class of Japanese can come into Canada:

The subjects of each of the high contracting parties shall have full liberty to enter, travel and reside in the territories of the other, and, conforming themselves to the laws of the country:

1. Shall, in all that relates to travel and residence, be placed in all respects on the same footing as native subjects.

2. They shall have the right, equally with native subjects, to carry on their commerce and manufacture, and to trade in all kinds of merchandise of lawful commerce, either in person or by agents singly or in partnerships with foreigners or native subjects.

3. They shall in all that relates to the pursuit of their industries, callings, professions and educational studies be placed in all respects on the same footing as the subjects or citizens of the most favoured nation.

4. They shall be permitted to own or hire and occupy houses, manufactories, warehouses, shops and premises which may be necessary for them, and to lease land for residential, commercial, industrial and other lawful purposes in the same manner as native subjects.

5. They shall, on condition of reciprocity, be at full liberty to acquire and possess every description of property, movable or immovable, which the laws of the country permit or shall permit the subjects or citizens of any other foreign country to acquire and possess, subject always to the conditions and limitations prescribed in such laws. They may dispose of the same by sale, exchange, gift, marriage, testament, or in any other manner, under the same conditions which are or shall be established with regard to native subjects. They shall also be permitted, on compliance with the laws of the country, freely to export the proceeds of the sale of their property and their goods in general without being subjected as foreigners to other or higher duties than those to which subjects of the country would be liable under similar circumstances.

6. They shall enjoy constant and complete protection and security for their persons and property; shall have free and easy access to the courts of justice and other tribunals in pursuit and defence of their claims and rights; and shall have full liberty, equally with native subjects, to choose and employ lawyers and advocates to represent them before such courts and tribunals; and generally shall have the same rights and privileges as native subjects in all that concerns the administration of justice.

7. They shall not be compelled to pay taxes, fees, charges or contributions of any kind whatever, other or higher than those which are or may be paid by native subjects or the subjects or citizens of the most favoured nation.

8. And they shall enjoy a perfect equality of treatment with native subjects in all that relates to facilities for warehousing under bond, bounties and drawbacks.

When you come to consider the enormous rights given to the subjects of the Emperor of Japan, you have to come to the conclusion that unless they come under the prohibited clauses of the Immigration Act, not only have they the common law right but they have the treaty right to come here in any numbers imaginable, and to enjoy all the rights and privileges of British subjects. And yet, the representatives from British Columbia in this House tell us that this is the very thing they have been fighting for in all these years; I wonder if they can be serious. As I have said, we are worse off by reason of article III than if it did not exist, and I will give the reason why. In the correspondence, the Prime Minister when entering into negotiations with the Consul General of Japan uses this language:

Ottawa, Ont., 7th February, 1913.

Sir,—I have the honour to inform you that the Government are willing to submit to the Parliament of Canada a Bill by which Canada shall adhere to the Treaty of Commerce and Navigation between the United Kingdom and Japan signed at London on the 3rd April, 1911.

2. The adherence of Canada would be upon the conditions and with the proviso set forth in the inclosed draft Bill which is submitted for the consideration of the Imperial Japanese Government.

3. The proviso that the treaty shall not be deemed to repeal or affect any of the provisions of the Emigration Act follows the language which was approved by the Imperial Japanese Government in relation to the recent treaty negotiated with the United States of America.

4. The Imperial Japanese Government are doubtless aware, as the fact is, that the Immigration Act applies to the immigration of aliens into Canada from all countries, including the British Empire itself, and makes no discrimination in favour of any country. It is not perceived, therefore, that your Government will have any objection to the embodiment to the inclosed draft Act of Parliament of the proviso which has already been agreed to in the case of the United States.

I have the honour to be, Sir,
Your obedient servant,
R. L. Borden.

Hon. T. Nakamura,
Consul General for Japan,
385 Laurier Avenue E.,
Ottawa, Ont.

This is followed by another letter from the Prime Minister:

Ottawa, Ont., 5th March, 1913.

Sir,—I have the honour to acknowledge the receipt of your note dated the 1st instant, in relation to the Treaty of Commerce and Navigation between Great Britain and Japan, signed at London on the 3rd April, 1911, in which you communicated to me the reply of the Imperial Japanese Government stating that they have no objection to the proposed Bill and that they feel assured that the Immigration Act of Canada of 1910 being applicable to the immigration of aliens into the Dominion of Canada from all countries, including the British Empire itself, no discrimination will be made against Japanese subjects in this respect.

I have the honour to inform you that the Government of Canada has received this reply with the greatest satisfaction, and that the proposed Bill will be introduced as soon as the pending business now engaging the attention of Parliament will permit.

I have the honour to be, Sir,
Your obedient servant,
(Sgd). R. L. Borden.

Hon. T. Nakamura,
Consul General for Japan,

Ottawa, Ont.

What is the contract made with Japan? It is this: we have submitted to you our proposed Bill and in that Bill we tell you we will stand by the Immigration Act of 1910. That is in the correspondence, and although in the Bill it does not specially say the Act of 1910, it refers to the Immigration Act, and the Act of 1910 is the only one now in force. Then, on the other hand, the Japanese authorities are given the opportunity of saying: we accept the treaty only on the condition that we will not be discriminated against under the Immigration Act. I find that under sections 37 and 38 of the Immigration Act, this Government has the right to make regulations. Section 37 is as follows:

Regulations made by the Governor in Council under this Act may provide as a condition to permission to land in Canada that immigrants and tourists shall possess in their own right money to a prescribed minimum amount, which amount may vary according to the race, occupation or destination of such immigrant or tourist, and otherwise according to the circumstances; and may also provide that all persons coming to Canada directly or indirectly from countries which issue passports or penal certificates to persons leaving such countries shall produce such passports or penal certificates on demand of the immigration officer in charge before being allowed to land in Canada.

Section 38 is as follows:

The Governor in Council may, by proclamation or order whenever he deems it necessary or expedient,—

(a) prohibit the landing in Canada or at any specified port of entry in Canada of any immigrant who has come to Canada otherwise than by continuous journey from the country of which he is a native or naturalized citizen, and upon a through ticket purchased in that country, or prepaid in Canada;

(b) prohibit the landing in Canada of passengers brought to Canada by any transportation company which refuses or neglects to comply with the provisions of this Act;

(c) prohibit for a stated period, or permanently, the landing in Canada, or the landing at any specified port of entry in Canada, of immigrants belonging to any race deemed unsuited to the climate or requirements of Canada, or of immigrants of any specified class, occupation or character.

Under those two sections the Government of Canada has the right to pass regulations for the prohibition or prevention of certain classes of immigrants. A regulation was passed on the 9th day of May, 1910 as follows:

Mr. CARVELL.

His Excellency in Council is pleased, under the authority of section 37 of the Immigration Act of 9 and 10 Edward VII., to make and doth hereby make the following regulation:—

No immigrant of Asiatic origin shall be permitted to enter Canada unless in actual possession in his or her own right of two hundred dollars, unless such person is a native or subject of an Asiatic country in regard to which special statutory regulations are in force or with which the Government of Canada has made a special treaty, agreement or convention.

We are making a special treaty, agreement or convention with the Japanese Government. While we have the right under this treaty to say that a Malay, a Chinaman, a Hindu, an Arabian, or any other Asiatic must pay $200, a Japanese does not have to do so because we have made a contract with him. If I am wrong in that assumption, let us see where the other construction leads. We have agreed that we will not discriminate against Japanese. Suppose for some reason or other we want to prohibit certain classes of people from coming into Canada and to pass regulations in that regard. We are prohibited from passing a regulation preventing a Japanese from coming in here, which would be different from that in regard to any other race of people. We have tied our hands.

Mr. BELAND: Unless it applies to everybody.

Mr. CARVELL: Unless it applies to everybody, because if it did not, we would be discriminating. Let me point out to my hon. friends a condition of affairs which might arise, although I do not believe it will. We know that in 1907 something like 9,000 Japanese came into this country. They all had passports; they came through Honolulu and the Japanese Government claimed, I believe honestly, that they had no knowledge that these people were coming to Canada. The Japanese Government gave them the right to go to Honolulu, and they transhipped and came to Canada. It was owing to that state of affairs that section 38 of the Immigration Act was passed. The hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) went to Japan and made this 'gentleman' agreement, by which the Japanese Government were to restrain and restrict Japanese immigration into Canada to a specified number, six or seven hundred a year. The Japanese Government were not to give passports to more than that number of people, so that they could not leave the country and consequently could not come to Canada. I ask my hon. friends what would happen provided that the Japanese Government should not carry out that contract? I am not stating that they will not carry it out. Suppose they gave passports to one thousand, two thousand or three thousand a year instead of to six hundred. What could you do? Where would my friends from British Columbia find themselves placed under this agreement, which they have signed, by which they are not to discriminate against Japanese subjects? They cannot pass a regulation under a certain section unless it applies to everybody in the world. Their hands are tied. My poor friends from British Columbia might be absolutely overrun with Asiatics, and they have not a word to say about it. My friends from British Columbia ought to call a halt in this matter and ask this Government to strike clause (a) from the Bill and get back to where we were under the old treaty, under which we agreed to the provisions of the treaty but did not bind ourselves down to any immigration Act. What is the result? The best evidence that we are free is that, after this treaty was signed and while it was in existence, we passed the Immigration Act of 1910. As we stood then, we had a right to make any regulations we desired. If this Bill goes through, we have given away our right; we have gagged ourselves and we are absolutely at the mercy of the Japanese Government in carrying out an agreement, the purport of which we do not know because it is considered private and confidential. I hope my friends from British Columbia appreciate the position; I hope it satisfies them; I hope they will go home to their constituents and tell them, well, we followed the Government; we had to do that; but when they do, they must confess to their friends, we have very, very grave misgivings as to the position in which we placed ourselves. This has been a political football in the politics of Canada, especially in the western provinces, for some eight or ten years—no it was not so far back as that; it was in 1906, I think.

Mr. STEVENS: In 1896.

Mr. CARVELL: My hon. friend does not need to go back that far. I have pointed out to my hon. friend the condition in which he would be placed were it not for the agreement made by the hon. member for Rouville which, according to my hon. friend, is not a law or even a treaty—it is only a gentleman's agreement. I have pointed out that, with the exception of the undesirables, the people of the whole Japanese Empire can come into the Dominion of Canada, and there is no way of stopping them. The people of British Columbia under this proposed legislation, and in the absence of the gentleman's agreement made by the hon. member for Rouville, are absolutely powerless. There is only one recourse, and that is to renounce the treaty, but if this treaty is enforced there will be no recourse whatever, and this country may be over-run by people of the Japanese nation. That is what the hon. member for Vancouver said last night. The hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff), with his usual ability to see through a difficulty, realized at once the position of the hon. member for Vancouver, and asked him the following question, which is to be found on page 7185 of the unrevised 'Hansard':

> Would the hon. member and the people of British Columbia be perfectly satisfied with that arrangement under the treaty, without the understanding which was made with the Japanese Government by Mr. Lemieux?

This is the answer made by the hon. member for Vancouver:

> The statements contained in this correspondence, read impartially in the light of the situation as it then existed, would be sufficient for any reasonable man.

That is, if you take away the arrangement made by the hon. member for Rouville, you extend to the people of the Japanese country the right, if they are not on the prohibited list, to come into this country, and the hon. member for Vancouver says that this is perfectly satisfactory to any reasonable man. He says further:

> In addition to that, we have the assurance of the leader of the Government this afternoon that the representatives of the Imperial Government of Japan have assured him that the arrangements which have been made—the gentleman's agreement if you wish to call it so—will be continued.

Mr. STEVENS: Read the rest of that clause.

Mr. CARVELL: If my hon. friend is anxious that I should read some more of his remarks, I am only too willing to oblige him. He says further:

> I wish to state that on the whole, the immigration relations existing between Canada and Japan and China to-day are satisfactory to the people of British Columbia.

Worse and worse! You can depend upon it that my hon. friend talked Japanese immigration during his last election campaign; I venture to say it was the lock, stock and barrel of his argument. He said further:

> The only thing that has been wrong in connection with the Japanese arrangement is, that the public have had no official assurance in regard to it. The hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) knows perfectly well that his arrangement is a private state document, and the people of Canada and the people of British Columbia know nothing about what is in that state document.

Why does not the Prime Minister produce this document? He finds it a matter not at all difficult to wire Winston Churchill and obtain permission to read private documents; why does he not take this matter up with the Emperor of Japan? It seems to me that the hon. member for Vancouver is getting into deeper water all the time. He says that the work of preventing Oriental immigration is being accomplished, but that the people do not know what is in this document. Well, why does he not apply to the Emperor of Japan, obtain the original, and make it public? I know my hon. friend used this argument in his last campaign; as a matter of fact, I believe he did not use anything else.

Mr. STEVENS: I do not think the hon. member has any idea what I used or did not use.

Mr. CARVELL: I challenge my hon. friend to deny it.

Mr. STEVENS: I will give the hon. member all the information he wants in a very few moments.

Mr. CARVELL: I thought my hon. friend would not deny it. Newspapers are a great nuisance sometimes, especially when one is obliged to indulge in the pastime of swallowing his own bitter pill. At any rate, I know that was the entire argument in Nanaimo, and I do not ask the hon. member for that constituency whether or not that was the case, as he would readily admit it. With regard to the Minister of Agriculture, I dislike imputing motives to him, but I would go so far as to accuse him also of having made use of the subject of Oriental immigration during his last election campaign. The hon. gentleman told us last evening that he was in the happy position of not being compelled to swallow his own convictions, and he read a few choice selections from a speech he made in this House in 1909. I want to point out to my hon. friend the change which has taken place in their attitude with regard to this Oriental question. When my hon. friend was in a position to make political capital out of this matter, nothing which the late Government could do in respect of the Oriental question would satisfy them. From 1907 up to 1911 Japanese immigration was controlled to such an extent as should have been satisfactory to hon. gentlemen opposite, but still they were not satisfied. There was a discussion in the House on this matter in 1908, and when we came back in January, 1909, after the general elections which took place in October of the previous year, on the very first day of the debate on the Address, the members from British Columbia, five in number, who had been elected in opposition to the then Government, made speeches on this question, and practically the only thing they discussed was Japanese immigration. I now wish to read some well-chosen remarks made by the hon. Minister of Agriculture as appearing on pages 76 and 77 of the 'Hansard' of 1909. My hon friend the Minister of Agriculture always speaks well. He is a very moderate man and I think a model parliamentarian. He then was fresh from an election which had been won on the Oriental question. He was a thoroughly anti-Japanese advocate at that time. These gentlemen, including the Minister of Agriculture, were voicing their real sentiments and telling the people of Canada the grounds on which they had won the election. My hon. friend says:

I treated the case on its merits and the contest resulted, as I knew it would, against the former member for Yale Cariboo because he, in common with other members who represented—or rather misrepresented—British Columbian constituencies had ratified that treaty without a word of protest in regard to it.

To what treaty did he refer? He referred to the treaty with Japan which was ratified by this Parliament in the session of 1906. The hon. member for North Toronto had asked the Government, I think a dozen of times, when they were going to bring down the Japanese treaty for ratification. When it was brought down the hon. member for North Toronto sat in his seat, so did the Prime Minister, so did all the other leading gentlemen of the Opposition at that time and the only member of the House who raised one objection or asked one question on the matter was the gentleman who then represented New Westminster, Mr. Kennedy. Mr. Kennedy pointed out to the House that there might be complications over the question of immigration and he was a Liberal. The Minister of Trade and Commerce rose to ask a question and the information he wanted was what was the value of a yen.

Mr. McKENZIE: That was the Prime Minister.

Mr. CARVELL: Either the Prime Minister or the Minister of Trade and Commerce wanted to know the value of a yen and with this information granted allowed the matter to go through. The Minister of Agriculture says that these gentlemen misrepresented the people of British Columbia because they did not oppose the ratification of this treaty. He said:

I recognize that. It is perfectly true, and it may possibly be that there are two reasons for it. I am not imputing bad motives or casting slurs when I say that it is certain that the Conservative party were misled by hon. gentlemen opposed as to assurances from Japan with regard to this matter, and also by the exaggerated ideas of the importance of the trade with Japan, which, I believe, is not going to be as large as some people seem to think. Then, again, with regard to the leader of the Opposition (Mr. R. L. Borden) and Conservative members generally, I can quite understand that no man who has lived altogether in the East and has not come into daily contact with the conditions that face the people of the West, can possibly grasp the true significance of this Oriental question to the people of the Pacific coast. I am sorry to add also that hon. gentlemen opposite, and eastern members, generally do not avail themselves of their privileges, as they ought to do, to gain a more intimate acquaintance at first hand with the great western country, which, after all, is going to be the backbone of Canada. There is this to be said, however, that the leader of the Opposition and the Conservative party, when they did begin to realize what the sentiment and feeling in British Columbia was on this great question, adjusted their position to meet the sentiments of British Columbia, which, after all, gentlemen on the opposite side did not do. It is all very well to say that this was done for party purposes, but we have no right to judge people in that way. We have a right to assume, and we may assume, that the leader of the Opposition felt from the bottom of his heart that he ought to do as he has done, that he recognized the importance of this question, and, when he understood the sentiment of the people of the West he adjusted his position and took a different stand, possibly, from that which he took a year or two ago.

Let us see what stand my hon. friends took on this question. The Minister of Agriculture in 1909 excused his leader because, as he says, when he voted for the Japanese treaty he had not the light he had now but as soon as he got the light and knew the conditions into which he was leading the country, he changed his position and opposed the Japanese treaty. What were the conditions which my hon. friend opposed, according to the Minister of Agriculture? They were in a treaty with Japan which gave us the right to pass any legislation we had a mind to with regard to immigration, and an agreement made by the hon. member for Rouville with the Japanese Government by which the Japanese Government agreed to restrict the immigration into Canada to four or five hundred souls a year. That is the position the Minister of Agriculture was denouncing at that time. That is the ground on which he won his election in 1908, he admits it. That is the position which he said his leader had receded from and while he was willing to excuse his leader on account of lack of knowledge three years before, now that his leader had seen the light and found out the sentiments of British Columbia, he had come out like an honest gentleman and was opposing that which he had agreed to when he did not know the whole circumstances. But my right hon. friend now has all the information which he can get and a little more. What is he doing? I want to tell my hon. friends from British Columbia, and I know it does not suit them, that my right hon. friend (Mr. Borden) is taking the exact position which the late Government took, only he is going a little worse because he has bound his hand and cannot pass any more legislation with regard to Japanese immigration and he is bound by the terms of the Immigration Act of 1910. The only recourse he has, if the Japanese Government do not stand by the agreement, is to ask the British Government to abrogate the treaty. The Minister of Agriculture, by his conduct to-day, says that is all right and he adds: fortunately I have not been compelled to swallow myself. Many of us would not like to swallow such an undigested mass as I have given here to-night, but if my hon. friend can do it, and enjoy the operation, I leave it to him and I have no objection.

Mr. BURRELL: We quite agree that we would not want to swallow the undigested mass that my hon. friend is dishing up.

Mr. CARVELL: That is a matter of opinion. Perhaps there may be some peopel in British Columbia who will not think it is as badly digested as the Minister of Agriculture would want to make it out. I have an opinion that when this debate is read in British Columbia there will be people there who will think it is pretty well digested and I think the minister will find that he has some explaining to do in order to justify his course in this matter. They all came back very much elated over their victory on the immigration question. I come now to the former member for Vancouver who came in in 1908 with a great flourish of trumpets and who, I am satisfied, told the truth in everything he stated, a man who proved himself to be an honourable gentleman and a valuable member, a gentleman whom I always looked upon as an actual acquisition to the debating ability of this House. On page 58 of 'Hansard' in the same debate, in referring to the then Prime Minister, he said:

I say, Sir, that Sir Wilfrid Laurier, the First Minister of Canada in declaring that we in British Columbia fought the battle in the recent campagn on principle, has paid, unconsciously no doubt, a compliment to British Columbia. I can see that he is perturbed and cannot understand why when we conducted the campaign on principle the result has been to give me a larger turnover than he dared hope to have in his own constituency. I can tell him the reason to-night It was because without reason and without request from Japan he abandoned the sacred duty and transferred to Japan the power to keep Canadian citizenship unattained by Japanese immigration.

What in the world could he be referring to, if not to the agreement made by the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux). His whole complaint against the present leader of the Opposition at that time was that he has handed over the protection of Canada's immigration to the Japanese Government, and that was the principle upon which he was elected, and on which, as he states in his speech, a majority of 800 was converted into a minority of 1,500. And yet my hon. friend from Vancouver (Mr. Stevens) says now that with the agreement made by the hon. member for Rouville, which he says he is told the Japanese Government will renew, we are absolutely safe, that we have got everything we want, and that therefore this Bill should go through.

Mr. STEVENS: I said the clause in the Bill.

Mr. CARVELL: I would like to ask my hon. friend again where he would be without the agreement by the hon. member for Rouville, with the Bill as it stands now?

Mr. STEVENS: I say that without the understanding with Japan, the Bill would not have been presented to the House in its present form.

Mr. CARVELL: I thought he would say that; I thought he would go back on what he said last night. I knew my hon. friend would not stand by his statement, and I hope this one will be found in the revised version of 'Hansard.' My hon. friend sees the hole into which he got last night, and he now goes back on his statement. He knows that without the agreement made by the hon. member for Rouville, 100,000 Japanese could come into Canada in one year, and we could not help ourselves. My hon. friend now sees the force of that agreement. It is no wonder that he could tell me the column in which I could find his remarks this afternoon. He has been looking them up pretty carefully. That was the whole trouble with Mr. Cowan in 1909. He objected to the immigration interests of Canada being handed over to a foreign government.

Then some other gentlemen had some ideas on this subject. I come next to the former member for Kootenay, a gentleman who was also, in my judgment, a decided acquisition to the House, who was always courteous and stated what he believed, a gentleman who now occupies a high position in the officialdom of Canada. Here is what that hon. gentleman said, as it is reported on page 113 of 'Hansard' of that year:

I venture to say that even the hon. Postmaster General would hesitate to hand over this vast Dominion to these people, as he is advocating at this time. The answer of the hon. Postmaster General is that we have the assurance of the Japanese Government, both by word of mouth and in writing, from the year 1900, and that assurance has been repeated in ten or twenty communications from that Government since that time, that there would be no immigration from that country to Canada exceeding 600 a year, and yet I find in 'Hansard' in a speech of the Minister of Agriculture delivered in this House seven years afterwards, the statement that in ten months 8,125 Japanese had come into Canada. What explanation does the Minister of Agriculture make of that fact? He said: It is true, 8,125 Japanese came into Canada from January to September, but of that number some 4,000 came from the islands of Hawaii and some 900 came in under contract for certain immigration agencies or bureaus, and a certain number passed through to the United States, leaving something like 3,000 remaining in Canada according to the minister's own figures. But when we go behind the statement of the Minister of Agriculture, we find that everyone of these immigrants had a passport direct from the Japanese Government, as was brought out at the investigation in Victoria. This shows that there is nothing in the spoken or written promise of the Japanese Government.

The member for Kootenay said there was nothing in this spoken or written promise of the Japanese Government, and that in spite of the spoken or written promise of the Japanese Government in the agreement made by the hon. member for Rouville, 100,000 Japanese might come into Canada, and that was admitted by my hon. friend to-night. What position are we in if the Japanese Government do not keep their word? Those gentlemen discussed this matter from every possible standpoint, and they won their elections upon it, and now they come back here and in the first flush of victory tell the truth. They think they have accomplished wonders, and they have for they fooled the people of British Columbia very effectually in 1908 and they succeeded in doing it again in 1911. I wonder how long they will keep up the deception, or what the people of British Columbia will say when the true facts are brought to their attention?

Mr. STEVENS: They will send everyone back, thirteen the next time.

Mr. CARVELL: My hon. friend is very sanguine. Other members have been just as sanguine as he is and have had to change their minds. When you want to get the real gist of what the members from British Columbia say when elections are on, you have to go to the hon. member for Westminster (Mr. Taylor), for he has the faculty of stating in very concise terms what he means.

Mr. MACDONALD: Is that Bill Miner?

Mr. CARVELL: No, it is the man who talked about Bill Miner. You will find his remarks on page 122 of 'Hansard' of that year, and they were as follows:

While we can well understand the caution which would move the leader of the Opposition in sending a telegram,——

He was referring to the somewhat remarkable telegram which has been discussed a good many times, the telegram sent by the present Prime Minister, then leader of the Opposition, stating:

Your message received. The Conservative party stands for a white Canada and the absolute protection of white labour.

When it got into the Conservative newspapers, and when it was read in Conservative meetings, held on the Saturday night before the election, it read as follows:

The Conservative party stands for a white Canada, the protection of white labour, and the absolute exclusion of Asiatics.

I can imagine I hear my hon. friend from Vancouver at one of those meetings on the Saturday night, when that telegram from his leader was read stating that the Conservative party stands for the absolute exclusion of Asiatics.

Mr. LEMIEUX: That was the forged telegram, was it?

Mr. CARVELL: Yes, now these gentlemen say that the Japanese are good citizens. They say they have absolute faith in the Japanese Government, that they believe the Japanese Government will loyally stand by their agreement, and therefore they are willing to pass this legislation because their leader wants them to. But to go back to my hon. friend the member for New Westminster, he is not here to-night, but he will have a chance to discuss this question some other time. I do not know that my hon. friends opposite have applied the gag on a motion to go into Supply, or create an opportunity for him.

Mr. MACDONALD: He will have to tell us how this Bill is going to absolutely exclude Asiatics.

Mr. CARVELL: He will switch round like the others, and say it is all right now; that we can depend upon the Japanese Government carrying out their agreement.

Mr. MACDONALD: Is it going to absolutely exclude Asiatics?

Mr. CARVELL: Oh, no, but they won their elections, and got into power. We are now told that the Japanese are very good workmen. Asiatics as a rule are good workmen. The Minister of Agriculture thinks they are such good workmen that he employs them on his farm, and makes money out of them. In fact I might venture the assertion that there is not a Conservative member from British Columbia who has not employed Asiatics within the last eight or ten years. The Japanese are all right, when those gentlemen want labour; it is only when they want to make political capital that the Japanese are all wrong. The hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Taylor) went on to say:

While we can well understand the caution which would move the leader of the Opposition in sending the telegram, I say, as a member of the Conservative party in British Columbia and in this House, that whether or not our leader sent the telegram, our policy was one of absolute exclusion of Asiatics from British Columbia. I do believe that that is the policy of the Conservative party of Canada, and I do maintain that, so far as the members from British Columbia can be influential in shaping the policy of the Conservative party, they will stand to a man in favour of the exclusion of Asiatics from our magnificent province.

Mr. Chairman, it is no wonder that the hon. member for New Westminster is out in British Columbia making speeches on the Naval Bill which he cannot make in Parliament rather than being here to face the music to-night. The hon. member for New Westminster has more political acumen than they give him credit for and the hon. member for Vancouver (Mr. Stevens) need not apologize for him. Bill Miner—I beg his pardon—the hon. member for New Westminster takes good care to keep out of the House when the Asiatic question is being discussed. He did not want to come here and have these speeches read to him and possibly have to stand up and vote for this treaty in the face of the statements that he made in this House in 1909. But, I have no doubt at all that the hon. member for New Westminster made no stronger statements in his campaign in 1908 than did every other member from British Columbia and I do not believe that he made any stronger statements than he made in 1911. It has been their whole stock in trade since 1907. Now that they are in power, as they are to-day, of course, they say: Our principles were only made to get in by; our principles were all right when we were in opposition, but now that we are in power what good are they?—Let us be expedient; we have got into power; let us adopt those principles and policies which are going to keep us in! My hon. friends from British Columbia must see the position in which they are placed.

I am not opposing this treaty, or this Bill to ratify the treaty, but I would vote for it with a great deal more confidence and willingness if clause (a) of section 2 were eliminated from the Bill, or, if hon. gentlemen will not eliminate it, if they will go so far as to put at the end of it the words 'or any amendments thereof to be hereinafter enacted,' or words to that effect. I do not care which they do, but I think it is better to eliminate it entirely because, if they eliminate it entirely, if they make no reference to it whatever, they leave the Parliament of Canada with its laws as they exist to-day and they leave it the right, untrammelled by any agreement, convention or correspondence, to pass any laws regarding immigration in the fu ure that it may desire to pass. Therefore, for that reason, I prefer to eliminate it. But, if hon. gentlemen are afraid that they cannot eliminate it on account of the blundering way in which they have gone about this thing, and the correspondence they have had with the Japanese Government, then, for the sake of Canada, amend it by adding the words which I have suggested and put it forward in such a way as to make it clear that they are governed, not only by the Immigration Act of to-day, but by any amendments which may be passed by this or any other parliament in future. In doing that we are protecting our rights. We put ourselves in the position that we can control our own affairs and we are not handing over beforehand to the Japanese Government a cudgel by which they might say: You agreed that you would stand by the present Immigration Act. The very moment you pass an amendment of this very Immigration Act or do anything by which you discriminate against the Japanese, they may say: You have not kept faith, you have broken your solemn engagement, something which is as abhorrent in the eyes of the world as for two gentlemen to make an agreement and break it.

The day will never come when Canada can afford to break that agreement, Canada will never break the agreement and the only protection which there is comes from the convention which my hon. friend from Rouville made with the Japanese. If we divest ourselves of the right to pass any amendments to our Act, we are compelled to go to the British Government and ask them to abrogate the treaty and to put ourselves in a position to protect our interests. I think that this cursory discussion of the matter must have convinced even my hon. friend from Vancouver that he has been sacrificed in the house of his friends, although, in his blind loyalty to party, he has been willing to say 'hear, hear' to any proposition that his leader might bring up. He had not given the matter any consideration until he made his speech last evening. He is now so thoroughly imbued with the ability of my hon. friend from Rouville to make international agreements, he is so thoroughly convinced of the importance of the agreement which my hon. friend made with the Japanese Government, he is so thoroughly imbued with the fact that that is the only protection we possess, that he wants the Government to apply this to China. He wants the Government to send

—he did not say so but I think by inference—the hon. member for Rouville over to China and see if he cannot make another agreement that will be as good as the agreement he made with Japan. My hon. friend admits the importance of it. My hon. friend by his proposition to make an arrangement with China, admits that the only governor, the only protection, that we possess is the contract made by my hon. friend from Rouville with the Japanese Government. I hope that when all these matters are put before him, he will at least advise his Premier to strike out this clause or so amend it that it will not be the real menace which he has been preaching to his British Columbia patriots existed in regard to the whole Asiatic question.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have discussed this question somewhat from a legal standpoint, as well as a political, and in view of the very serious question that has been raised here as to the real meaning and consequence which may be attached to and applied to clause (a) of section 2 of this Bill, I think it would be well for the hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty) to give his opinion in order that the committee may have an unbiased judgment from the highest legal authority in Canada on such an important question as this.

Mr. H. H. STEVENS (Vancouver): Mr. Chairman, I have listened again to-day to a discussion of this Bill which, I think, is well calculated to create a certain amount of political capital for the friends of hon. gentlemen opposite in the province of British Columbia. In discussing this Bill briefly last evening, by the ruling of the Speaker, I was not permitted the latitude that had been indulged in by other members who had spoken on the opposite side and I had to leave a great many things unsaid that I would like to have given to the House at that time until this stage of the Bill, and which I purpose dealing with as briefly as the importance of the subject will permit. The hon. member who has just sat down (Mr. Carvell) has stated that if you eliminate clause (a) from the Bill he will be in hearty accord with the whole measure. I would like to say, in order to place myself and my attitude on this Bill very clearly before the House and the people of Canada, that, if that clause were not in the Bill, I would not vote for it. It has never been my habit to mince matters, or to beat about the bush, or to say in the House that which I would not say on the hustings and before the people of my province.

Mr. CARVELL: Would the hon. member say that the converse of that proposition is true?

Mr. STEVENS: I say most emphatically that, if the clause were eliminated from this Bill, I would not vote for or support the Bill. I would say further, that the presence of that clause in this Bill is exactly what the people of British Columbia have demanded. The hon. member (Mr. Carvell) and others of his friends have twitted the members from British Columbia with using the Asiatic question on the stump, and they pretend there was some sort of a political crime committed when the members from British Columbia discussed the Asiatic question. Permit me to say, in the first place, that the Asiatic question, as it affects the people of British Columbia, has reference to Hindus, Chinese and Japanese, and by far the most important feature of that question is the immigration of Hindus and Chinese. At some time in the near future I shall have the opportunity of placing before the House certain facts in regard to Chinese and Hindu immigration, but let me say now that the real problem before British Columbia to-day is the Asiatics who are living in the country as the direct result of the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite during the fifteen years they were in power. As everyone knows, in recent years, Oriental immigration has been restricted, and practically not more than fifty or one hundred Hindus have entered British Columbia in the last couple of years. It is also true that during the last few years there have been very few immigrants from Japan. It is further true that the head tax placed on Chinese by the Liberal Government has proved ineffective, and I frankly say that it is the duty of the Government of to-day to take into consideration, at an early period, some further measure of dealing with Chinese immigration. If that can be done in a manner similar to this arrangement with Japan, I would be quite pleased but at all events some steps must be taken at no distant date. The hon. member from St. John (Mr. Pugsley) said last night that the Prime Minister should have taken into consultation the members from British Columbia, particularly as they were all Government supporters, and in reply to him I wish to say that while possibly we were not taken into direct consultation, the opinion of every member from British Columbia was asked in regard to this Bill and the one point we insisted upon was that the rights of the Dominion of Canada to control our own immigration should be properly safeguarded.

Mr. MACDONALD: Would the hon. gentleman state what he expects this Government will do in virtue of this clause which he considers an essential one in the Bill? Does he expect the Government will pass any legislation amending the Immigration Act in order to meet the policy of the Conservative party in British Columbia, which means the absolute exclusion of Asiatics?

Mr. STEVENS: I shall make that point quite clear before I conclude. The hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) is very glib at butting in, but I notice that when hon. members on this side of the House ask him a question he has not the courtesy to give them a civil answer. The hon. member (Mr. Macdonald) stands in this House always as the champion of democracy, but yet he draws a distinction between hon. members on this side of the House, who sit on the ministerial benches and those who do not. When, the other day, an hon. member on this side asked the hon. member for Pictou a question, and put his question in a most courteous and parliamentary manner, the reply of the hon. member was: 'I have not time to answer the small fry on the back benches.' Let me tell the hon. member for Pictou that he had better go back to his constituents and learn what democracy is, and learn also that so far as the members of this House are concerned there is but one class; they are all representatives of the people of Canada. I will answer the hon. gentleman's question in my own way, and at my own convenience, and I trust he will not interfere again.

Mr. MACDONALD: You need not get mad because you were asked.

Mr. STEVENS: I was referring to the suggestion from members on the other side that the members from British Columbia have used this as a political question in British Columbia. Let me tell them that it has been and is a question of absolutely vital import to the people of that province as a whole, and I think I shall be able to show hon. gentlemen opposite why the Liberal party of Canada absolutely lost every supporter they had in this House from British Columbia. In 1898 the first representations were made by this Parliament regarding the Japanese treaty which preceded this one, and in this connection I shall be able to demonstrate, even to hon. gentlemen opposite, the reason why they are not to-day supported by a representative from British Columbia in this House. In connection with that representation from the Parliament of Canada, Mr. Chamberlain wrote in a despatch to His Excellency the Governor-General, speaking of certain Acts which were passed by the British Columbia Government, which it was asked should be disallowed:

In the meantime I have to request that you will impress upon your ministers that restrictive legislation of the type of which the legislation in question appears to be, is extremely repugnant to the sentiment of the people and Government of Japan. You should not fail to impress upon them the importance, if there is any real prospect of a large influx of Japanese labourers into Canada, to deal with it by legislation of the Dominion Parliament on the lines of the Natal Act.

That is exactly what the people of British Columbia asked, and in order to make the point especially clear, Mr. Chamberlain enclosed a copy of the Natal Act, the crux of which is the educational test; advising the Government that they should pass in Canada an Act similar to that. That was in 1898 when it was a great deal easier to pass such legislation than it is to-day. And yet, in face of this advice and of other advice subsequently given, we had the Liberal Government and we had the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux), as a member of that Government, sitting in power for fifteen years and never making an effort to put on the statutes of Canada any legislation regarding the restriction of Asiatic immigration with the exception of the arrangement in 1907, eleven years after they had come to power. In 1897, 3,473 Japanese and 8,345 Chinese came to Canada, and had this been continued, there would have been in British Columbia to-day 26,000 Japanese and 62,000 Chinese, or a total of 88,000 Asiatics. And, what caused the restriction on Asiatic immigration? The restriction was brought about by the acts of the British Columbia Government and the resolutions that were passed, and the agitation carried on in British Columbia during that period. The British Columbia Government alone passed forty-four Acts, and there were presented to the Federal Government one hundred and twenty-three resolutions and Acts of the legislature of British Columbia, including other resolutions and petitions. A hundred and twenty of these were presented to this Government. I repeat that during all those years, the late Government did absolutely nothing to protect the rights of British Columbia in regard to Asiatic immigration until 1907. Mr. Chamberlain, referring to certain bills which were again being disallowed, writes in March, 1899, to the Dominion Government, as follows:

Her Majesty's Government must regret to find the Government and Legislature of British Columbia adopting a course which is justly regarded as offensive by a friendly power, and they hope that your ministers will be able to arrange for the cancellation of the objectionable provisions and the substitution of a measure which, while it will secure the desired exclusion of undesirable immigrants, will obtain that result by means of some such general tests as that already suggested in my despatch No. 214, of the 20th July, 1898.

In any case, Her Majesty's Government strongly deprecated the passing of this Act by British Columbia, which was directed against the employment of Japanese and Chinese in certain classes of work, saying that that class of legislation was unconstitutional and was disallowed by the Government of the day in Ottawa. He repeated again the suggestion that the Dominion Government should take upon itself the responsibility of dealing with the question and of discharging a duty that it owed to the country. Further on, Mr. Chamberlain again gives advice. This part which I am going to read now, shows that the Imperial Government was quite in sympathy with the people of British Columbia. A little later on, I shall explain the situation in regard to Asiatic immigration into British Columbia at some greater length. In this particular dispatch, Mr. Chamberlain says:

Her Majesty's Government fully appreciate the motives which have induced the Government and Legislature of British Columbia to pass the legislation under consideration, and recognize the importance of guarding against the possibility of the white labour in the province being swamped by the wholesale immigration of persons of Asiatic origin.

Hon. members opposite have been dealing with this matter as if it referred exclusively to Japanese. It refers to the whole Asiatic question; it refers to Hindus, Japanese and Chinese. It is clearly evident to the people of Canada that the people of Japan, through their Government, which to-day is one of the most up-to-date and modern governments in existence, are endeavouring in a sensible and reasonable way to meet the wishes of the people of this country. Consequently if this matter applies to all, it applies more to the Chinese and the Hindus. At the same time, at the period of which I am speaking, all the Asiatic races were included. Mr. Chamberlain says further:

They desire also to acknowledge the friendly spirit in which the representations they have felt compelled to make have been received by the Government of British Columbia, and regret that after carefully considering the minute of the Executive Council they feel unable to withdraw the objections they have urged to the legislation in question.

There is no difference between Her Majesty's Government and the Government of British Columbia as regards the object aimed at by these laws, namely, to ensure that the Pacific province of the Dominion shall be occupied by a large and thoroughly British population rather than by one in which the number of aliens largely predominates.

Showing conclusively that, so far as imperial politics is concerned, the attitude of British Columbia has not interfered, but the fault has lain rather in the Dominion Government in not shouldering its responsibility in this regard. Further on, Sir Wilfrid Laurier writes to the Hon. C. A. Semlin, Premier, Victoria, British Columbia:

The federal Government has only four days in which to disallow your Acts relating to Japanese, as urged by Imperial Government, which fears prejudice to Imperial relations with Japan if Act referring to Japanese is allowed to go into effect.

Have you any suggestion to make as to this legislation so far as it relates to the Japanese?

Mr. Semlin replies:

Regret that in justice to the interests of labour in British Columbia can only refer you to minute of council of February last, copy of which you have no doubt received.

This is the minute of council from the British Government. It is exactly along the line of the recommendation of the Hon. Joseph Chamberlain, Secretary of Foreign Affairs. The minute of council of British Columbia, which was forwarded to this Government on the 20th February, 1899, is as follows:

Mr. Chamberlain states that restrictive legislation of the type which the legislation in question appears to be is extremely repugnant to the sentiments of the people and Government of Japan, and asks His Excellency to impress on his ministers the importance, if there is any real prospect of a large influx of Japanese labourers into Canada, of dealing with it by legislation of the Dominion Parliament on the lines of the Natal Act.

This matter was brought to the attention of the Dominion authorities of the day in many ways and by different parties. I shall have to pass over some of these. The British Columbia Government forwarded minutes of council, and the Legislative Assembly, while in session passed a resolution along the same lines. There was received also a petition from 2,167 residents of British Columbia, which is printed in the records of the House. In 1900, the Dominion Government increased the Chinese head tax from $50 to $100 for the purpose of restricting the immigration of Chinese. This was pointed out to be absolutely ineffective so far as British Columbia is concerned. In the same year, 1900, the Japanese Government voluntarily restricted immigration into British Columbia. We have heard a great deal, during yesterday and to-day's debate, as to the value of the arrangement made by the hon. member for Rouville on his famous trip to Japan. I believe that the hon. member had the time of his life on that trip. He was able to go over to Japan, one of the most picturesque countries in the world, which I have had the privilege of visiting twice; and no doubt he was taken around that very entrancing country. He never fails, when he has an opportunity, to refer to his trip to Japan and to tell the people of Canada: I put in my thumb and pulled out a plum and said what a bright boy am I. I wish to point out that in 1900, seven or eight years before the hon. member went to Japan, the Japanese Government recognized the necessity of restricting its immigration to British Columbia. Why? Was it because any action on the part of the Government of the day at Ottawa? No, it was in spite of the sentiment of the Government of the day at Ottawa, and as a direct result of the repeated efforts of the people of British Columbia to get some restriction along this line. It redounds to the credit of the Government of Japan that it took that action voluntarily and without any pressure from Ottawa. There came to Ottawa, in the year 1900, a very significant document, which was written by Mr. James Dunsmuir, the Premier of British Columbia of the day, and later Lieutenant Governor of that province. Mr. Dunsmuir sent a personal letter to Sir Wilfrid Laurier. I shall only read one portion of it. The whole document is an argument in regard to Asiatic immigration into British Columbia, and pleads with Sir Wilfrid Laurier to give some recognition in regard to the matter. Mr. Dunsmuir says:

We look to the Dominion to afford us relief, and while I am absolutely opposed to an unconstitutional exercise of remedies by the province, by the very nature of things, if they are denied to us by the proper authorities, we shall have a continuance of undesirable agitation and hasty and ill-advised legislation.

Twenty or thirty Acts of the British Columbia legislature had been disallowed up to that time, and he refers to it in this manner, saying that if we cannot get the relief desired the only thing British Columbia can do is to continue to agitate and pass this kind of legislation.

It will, furthermore, create an irritation prejudicial to the harmony which hitherto has always characterized our relations with the Dominion, and which is so necessary in giving full effect to the objects of Confederation.

I am sending as an appendix to this letter copies of the resolutions which have been passed during the recent session of the legislature, together with copies of the Acts relating to immigration and the regulation of labour. I also append a list of the resolutions and references which appear in our journals and sessional papers since Confederation, and which you will see that it has always been a live question in the minds of the people, and that as time has gone on the expressions of public sentiment have become more profound and frequent. This Government desires to see the question finally and satisfactorily disposed of, and I can see no reason why it should not be taken hold of now as well as at some future time.

He goes on to deal with the matter at great length, but I will quote only certain portions of his remarks:

While on this subject I wish to call your attention to the frauds that have been perpetrated in connection with the naturalization of Japanese.

I wish to pause here for a moment for the purpose of pointing out that, in the administration of the late Government, not only were there gigantic frauds in regard to the naturalization of Japanese, but in regard to the administration of the Immigration Department in Vancouver and Victoria. In respect of Asiatic and Chinese immigration in particular, upwards of a million dollars were filched from the treasury of this country. If hon. gentlemen want any proof of that, they have only to refer to the records of the country in order to find that, with the corresponding number of Chinese coming into the country, the amount of the head tax receipts increased somewhere in the neighbourhood of 40 per cent. In other words, there were practically between twenty per cent and thirty per cent of the Chinese admitted as exempts who had no right to be admitted by the officials of the late Government. This was revealed in the investigation of Justice Murphy. In reply to that communication, the leader of the Government wrote the following letter:

I beg to acknowledge the receipt of your very important letter. The character of the questions submitted for the consideration of the Dominion Government is such, that it would be far preferable to have them discussed verbally, rather than in writing.

I am most happy indeed to have the expression of your intention to visit Ottawa at an early day. I would especially ask you to come as soon as possible after the elections are over. It would take fully a week, if not more, to go over the ground covered by your letter.

Then, in another place, he says:

The character of the question submitted for the consideration of the Dominion Government is such that it would be far preferable to have them discussed verbally rather than in writing.

It will be observed from this correspondence that the right hon. leader of the Opposition, then the Prime Minister of Canada, was very careful to avoid placing himself on record in regard to this question. Except in a very few cases, no instance can be found of the right hon. gentleman committing himself one way or the other. All we have to go by is the record of his Government and the official statement of his ministers and of the Governor General of the day. The Right Hon. Joseph Chamberlain again drew the attention of the Government to this matter, and suggested that some action be taken. Matters drifted until 1905, and on July 14 of that year, Mr. Lyttelton asked the Dominion Government if they desired to protect their right to control their own immigration in regard to the Japanese treaty. I will read the despatch:

My Lord,—Referring to your confidential despatch of June 7, should Japanese Government be informed that your Government wishes to adhere to treaty, 1894, and supplementary convention of 1895, under same terms and conditions as Queensland in 1897, which Japanese Government then agreed to extend to any other colonies adhering, within prescribed period, namely, (1) that stipulations contained in first and third articles of treaty shall not in any way affect laws, ordinances and regulations with regard to trade, immigration of labourers, artisans, police and public security which are in force or may hereafter be enacted in Japan or in colony. (2) That treaty shall cease to be binding as between Japan and colony at expiration of twelve months after notice has been given on either side to desire to terminate same. Or are your Government prepared to adhere absolutely and without reserve, as would appear to be the case from speech of Minister of Agriculture in Canadian Parliament, June 22? Please telegraph reply.

Lyttelton.

I want hon. members opposite who have been charging the present Government with neglecting their duty in regard to this treaty to observe and study the terms of that telegram from the Government in London to the Government in Canada in connection with adherence to the treaty which immediately preceded the arrangement we are at present considering, in which it is most clearly and emphatically stated that the Japanese Government of that day were agreeable to Canada's entering into that treaty under the same conditions as Queensland, whereby they were assured:

That the first and third articles of the treaty shall not in any way affect the laws, ordinances and regulations with regard to trade, immigration of labourers, artisans, police and public security which are in force or may hereafter be enacted in Japan or in colony.

The Government of that day absolutely neglected to take advantage of that opportunity. The answer to that telegram, from Lord Grey to Mr. Lyttelton, was as follows:

Sir: My Prime Minister earnestly hopes that you will press immediate entry of Canada into Anglo-Japanese treaty.

Grey.

In replying to which Mr. Lyttelton, in a telegram to Lord Grey on September 6, 1905, said:

My Lord,—In reply to your telegram received to-day, please inform your Prime Minister that before taking steps as regards adhesion of your Government to commercial treaty with Japan, His Majasty's Government awaiting reply to telegram of July 14.

In other words, the Imperial authorities refused to go further at that time before reminding the Dominion Government of the opportunity presented to them to protect the immigration rights of the Dominion of Canada in regard to this former treaty. The reply was:

Sir,—The Governor General had the honour to send you to-day a telegraphic message in code, of which the following is a translation:

Referring to your telegram of July 14,—

That is the telegram relating to the right of Canada to protect its immigration.

Responsible ministers prepared to adhere to the Japanese treaty, 1894, and supplementary convention of 1895 absolutely and without reserve. Minute of Council and despatch following by mail.

The minute of Council is exactly in the same terms. Now, what is the significance of this? In spite of the continuous advice of the Right Hon. Joseph Chamberlain some years prior to this that Canada should protect its right to control its own immigration, and in spite of the fact that two telegrams were sent urging Canada to take advantage of the privilege afforded to and accepted by Queensland in the treaty, the Prime Minister of Canada and the responsible ministers of the Crown through the Governor General stated that, so far as they were concerned, they would adhere to the treaty without any reservation whatsoever. And yet hon. members opposite have the temerity—that is the mildest word parliamentary usage will permit—to stand in their places in this House and tell hon. members on the Government side that the right hon. leader of the Government is neglecting to protect the rights and privileges of the people of Canada in this regard. It has been said that Conservative members from British Columbia opposed the treaty prior to this one and opposed the intention of the late Government to become a party to that treaty. What they did and it was clearly pointed out in the speeches quoted here to-day, was to object to Canada becoming a party to that treaty unless Canada protected the right to control its own immigration, and that is exactly the stand we take to-day and, further, that is the point the right hon. gentleman had protected in regard to this treaty by inserting clause 2 in the Bill now before the House. The hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Carvell) quoted my speech of last night and tried to turn that speech around in such a way as to infer that I was making some serious mistake in the statements I made. I said, speaking on the correspondence which I shall refer to later:

Mr. Stevens: The statements contained in this correspondence, read impartially in the light of the situation as it then existed, would be sufficient for any reasonable man, but in addition to that we have the assurance of the leader of the Government this afternoon that the representatives of the Imperial Government of Japan have assured him that the arrangements which have been made—the gentleman's agreement if you wish to call it so—will be continued. I wish to state that on the whole, the immigration relations existing between Canada and Japan to-lay are satisfactory to the people of British Columbia. The only thing that has been wrong in connection with the Japanese arrangement is, that the public have had no official assurance in regard to it.

There is a point I wish to emphasize and make clear to my hon. friend who seems to think that was the point that I would have a great deal of difficulty in explaining to my constituency. It is a point on which we base our adherence to this treaty, the fact that while an agreement was entered into between the Dominion Government and the Government of Japan, a private arrangement, I said last night and I venture to repeat now, that not one hundred or two hundred men in the Dominion of Canada or in the British Empire know exactly those terms and, further, hon. gentlemen opposite know very well that these private arrangements, state documents, cannot be made public. There are scores of such state documents in governmental work. No one knows better than the hon. member for Rouville that that state document cannot be made public and from 1908 to 1911 that document was in existence and no one attempted to make it public. Hon gentlemen opposite know well that it would not be right or proper, that it would be a distinct breach of national etiquette, to make it public. But the fact was that we had vague assurances as to the effect that that document would have and by placing this clause in this Act the public of Canada now have a double assurance in regard to the matter. This is an evidence of good faith on the part of the Dominion Government, it shows that while this agreement existed and while it had certain effects, as the Prime Minister said this evening, it virtually left the control of immigration in the hands of the people of Japan.

Mr. CARVELL: Supposing the gentleman's agreement were repudiated by Japan and the Bill went through as it is, would the hon. member then say that we had any way of preventing Japanese immigration from coming in here except by abrogating the treaty?

Mr. STEVENS: I intend to deal with that later. The point I was making was that this was in existence and had virtually left in the hands of Japan the right to determine whether or not immigration should continue or cease, as the case might be, or be restricted in regard to British Columbia or Canada. I do not wish for a moment to suggest that the Government of Japan will disregard that arrangement. I have every confidence that they will regard it as they have done in the past. But supposing, for some reason which may hereafter arise, a matter of oversight, a change of government or some change of sentiment, the Japanese Government neglected to observe the terms of that arrangement, I ask hon. gentlemen to set aside party prejudice and say what protection Canada would have under those conditions? They will immediately say we will go on with the Act. They are too astute politicians to consider for one minute that that was sufficient. They know perfectly well that as long as that treaty was in existence specific terms of that treaty, as a matter of international etiquette, would take precedence over the Immigration Act of Canada. Hon. gentlemen opposite have repeated over and over again that the only thing to do was to cancel the treaty according to the clause providing for one year's notice. Supposing such a contingency arises what have we got now? Without in any sense violating the terms of the treaty we have the right to invoke the terms of our Immigration Act. What are the terms of the Immigration Act? What are the terms of the immigration law? I do not think it is the finest kind of diplomacy for us to rake this question up continually before the public, but I might say that so far as the immigration law of 1910 is concerned, it gives to the Government the widest possible power in dealing with immigration. It provides for the very contingency suggested by the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Carvell). He said a while ago: Supposing one thousand Japanese were to suddenly come into Canada, we would have that influx of Japanese. There is no man who will read the Immigration Act impartially but will at once admit that it is particularly designed to meet the very contingency he has suggested. It deals specifically, in clause 3, with certain kinds of people who are not to be admitted. In clause 37 and 38 it gives other powers and I want you to mark the phraseology of these two clauses.

Clause 37 reads:

Regulations made by the Governor in Council under this Act may provide as a condition to permission to land in Canada that immigrants and tourists shall possess in their own right money to a prescribed minimum amount, which amount may vary according to the race,——

My hon. friends opposite would have us stop at that word 'race,' and say that the terms of this treaty prevent us from dealing with this matter. I quite agree with them that it would not be a very wise thing for us to single out the Japanese or any other people with whom we have treaty arrangements and discriminate against them simply for the reason that they were of a particular race. But listen to this:

—according to the race, occupation, or destination of such immigrant or tourist.

In other words, if there was a sudden influx of Japanese or of any other race of people which materially disturbed the industrial market, I do not care in what line, the Government of Canada have not only the privilege but the duty to harmonize conditions by exercising this power, by restricting immigration because of disturbances in certain lines of occupation. I think that is clear.

And otherwise according to the circumstances.

And as if that were not wide enough it goes on to say: and otherwise according to the circumstances. Could you imagine any powers that were wider than these? They leave it entirely to the Government or to the Parliament of Canada to say what shall be the extraordinary circumstances or conditions to warrant the introduction of regulations. If that is all, I contend that we would have sufficient powers, but let us come to the next section:

The Governor in Council may, by proclamation or order, whenever he deems it necessary or expedient,——

That is, when any conditions arise which warrant him in taking cognizance of those conditions and dealing with them.

—may prohibit the landing in Canada——

I shall not follow that clause, but there are certain regulations which can be made in regard to transportation and which can be applied. But I pass on to the next clause:

Prohibit for a stated period, or permanently, the landing in Canada, or the landing at any specified port of entry in Canada, of immigrants belonging to any race deemed unsuited to the climate or the requirements of Canada, or of immigrants of any specified class,—— —of immigrants of any specified class, occupation or character.

Not of race, not of a country, but

Can you imagine any wider powers than these which are given to the Dominion for the purpose of dealing with emergencies that may arise in connection with industrial affairs as affected by immigration. I contend that that clause coupled with this article in the treaty.

Nothing in the said treaty or in this Act shall be deemed to repeal or affect any of the provisions of the Immigration Act.

—is sufficient. Now, Mr. Chairman, I think that when non. members opposite have got rid of a little political talk, which is always more or less in order, because we have to build up some reasons to give our constituents in regard to various matters, and no doubt the wires to Vancouver and the coast papers have been hot all day with messages showing up this treaty, according to the lights of my hon. friends opposite;

after the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Carvell), the hon. .member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley), the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux), the hon. member for Moosejaw (Mr. Knowles) and others have spoken, have got rid of the political capital which they desire to make, and to which I have no objection, because we will deal with it very effectually on the coast, and view this matter impartially, they will admit that the present Government have done wisely to exercise their right to control immigration into Canada. I stated last night and I repeat it, that it is a privilege for the people of other countries, I care not whether they come from the British Isles, or from any other country, to enter Canada, and the sooner the people of Canada recognize the fact, and jealously guard that privilege the better. I am convinced that we have been altogether too reckless in regard to the class of people allowed to come, not only to the Pacific coast but to eastern ports. We have had coming to eastern ports hordes of people from southern Europe and southern Asia who are to-day creating a problem in the prairie provinces. There is not a member from the prairie provinces who will deny that I am absolutely right in that, and there is not a member representing any of the cities in eastern Canada who will not agree with me that the rather lax manner in which we have treated this immigration question, has created a problem in those cities. You have only to examine the criminal statistics of the large cities of Canada to find that the large majority of the most serious crimes committed are by persons who have come from southern Europe. Consequently I say we have been altogether too lax in our immigration regulations, and the time has arrived when we should recognize the necessity of some more definite control. Recognizing that necessity, the present Government have placed that clause in the agreement.

Now, I wish to deal with some statements made by the hon. member for Moosejaw (Mr. Knowles). I am not going to refer to them in an antagonistic spirit, because I think that some of his statements merit the attention of this House. He called attention to a certain Act which was passed by the Saskatchewan legislature prohibiting or restricting the employment of white girls in connection with Asiatic places of business, such as restaurants and laundries. I understand that a similar Bill was introduced in the Ontario legislature and I am glad to note that the people of the East are learning to recognize the situation. In the city of Vancouver, our police authorities continually find young girls of respectable families and ranging from fifteen to twenty-two or twenty-three years of age, and some older, in what are commonly known as dope joints in the Asiatic quarter. Many of those girls are absolutely ruined by the practice of indulging in drugs. It was stated that this was one of the most fruitful sources of the white slave traffic, and that is quite correct. There seems to have been a business, especially on the part of Chinese, of enticing young white girls into those dope joints. I have been through some of the worst joints in the city of Vancouver. I have not time to describe them, but the loathsomeness of their surroundings is such as no one can conceive who has not been brought into contact with them. There have been instances in connection with the Chinese mission schools. I have never known cases in connection with the Japanese mission schools, but I have known cases in connection with the Chinese mission schools in which young girls have gone from churches in a truly philanthropic and Christian spirit to teach Chinese scholars their religion and language, and frequently the result has been the ruination of those girls by the Chinese attending the schools. I say it is something that merits the attention of the Government and that the motive which induced the Saskatchewan Government and the Ontario Government to introduce legislation dealing with the subject, was right and proper. I understand that the legislation was not constitutional, or that it was framed in a way that might be objectionable to those who were not in any sense guilty of such offences, but the motive was sound, and I absolutely agree with the hon. member for Moosejaw (Mr. Knowles) in regard to the matter. But because that legislation was disallowed on constitutional grounds, I do not think that the present Government should be condemned as being in sympathy with those practices, because that does not necessarily follow. I have already given a list of some forty-four Acts of the legislature of British Columbia which were disallowed and which were properly disallowed upon constitutional grounds. We simply insisted on passing these Acts to demand the attention of the Dominion Government. I am quite prepared to support any representations that may be made to the Dominion authorities and to give them the advantage of my own knowledge and experience in this regard. If there is any legislation that we can devise that will meet the situation, I will be very glad to give it my hearty support

Reference was made by the hon. member for Rouville last night to the ill-treatment of Japanese in Vancouver on the 19th September, 1907, during the riots which took place there. There has been a great deal said in connection with the Japanese, as relating to the Asiatic question, which is more or less exaggerated. These riots were directed against the Asiatics generally, but they originated in Chinatown. The actual cause of the outbreak was the sudden influx of Hindus into Vancouver. Seven thousand Hindus came in the course of a few months and this large influx alarmed the people of Vancouver. The public mind became agitated, a crowd happened to be down the street on one occasion and riot broke out in Chinatown. the figures as regards the claims that were paid will show to what extent the Japanese were affected. The claims paid were as follows: Chinese, $26,994; Japanese, $9,000. That shows conclusively that the brunt of the riot was borne by Chinatown. I do not say that the Japanese were not molested, but the Japanese were molested very little on the streets and the reason why their places were molested was largely because they were contiguous to Chinatown. I might add in regard to the losses of the Japanese, that there was only one thousand, five hundred dollars of actual loss and that the balance was what is known as resultant loss. I mention this to remove the impression that the antagonism of the people of British Columbia has been directed against the Japanese. It is not so.

The statement that this question has been made a political football was made by the hon. member for Carleton, New Brunswick (Mr. Carvell) and the hon. member for Moosejaw (Mr. Knowles). I stated, and I stated correctly, that the first time that this question was really introduced actively into the politics of British Columbia was when the right hon. leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) telegraphed to British Columbia in 1895:

The views of the Liberals of the West will prevail with me.

That telegram was the main cry of the Liberal party in 1896 and it secured for the right hon. gentleman a solid contingent of Liberals in this House. There is no doubt in the world that the question has been a live political issue in British Columbia but I want to tell hon. gentlemen opposite that no party is clear of the charge of making this a political question. It had to be made a political question. The only way in which we could get the ear of the Government at all was by making it a political question that, while I am pleased to say that our efforts at last have been successful. I think that, while we have not got the full measure of relief that we expect to get ultimately, we have in this measure an earnest of the intention of the present Government in dealing with this question. They have carried out their pledges in that sense.

Mr. LEMIEUX: My hon. friend says that we have not had the full relief that we expect to have ultimately; will he explain what he means by that?

Mr. STEVENS: Certainly. What I say is this and I may as well deal with the Asiatic problem in a general way—

Mr. LEMIEUX: If my hon. friend did not refer to the treaty, I have no question to put. If he deals with the general problem of Asiatic immigration, that is another question. I thought that my hon. friend was referring to the treaty.

Mr. STEVENS: I referred to the general problem.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Then that is a different thing.

Mr. STEVENS: I am pleased to know that the present Government have given to us in this Act confirming this treaty an earnest of the relief we may expect generally in connection with the Asiatic question. The Asiatic question was referred to by the hon. member for Rouville and I feel it my bounden duty to take it up, and to state the reasons for the attitude which we adopt in regard to that question. This question has two phases; first, there is the national or social side of the question, and then there is the industrial side. I do not place one before the other at all as regards the merits because I feel that both are equally important. Let me deal first with the national side of the question. We have in Canada a population of less than 8,000,000 people. It is recognized that climatic conditions in the prairie provinces and eastern Canada offer a fairly good protection against a large influx of Asiatics. While this is not a complete protection, it is fairly good protection. But on the Pacific coast, we have a climate that is particularly attractive to the majority of Asiatics. There, we have less than 325,000 of a white population. In the Orient facing us daily, there are over 800,000,000 Asiatics. A large number of these Asiatics have a very jealous eye upon the Pacific coast of America. I know from actual personal information that from India over 100,000 Hindus were prepared to come to Canada when the move started in 1907, and which we were fortunate enough to have stopped. To-day three Hindus are on their way to the Colonial Office in London for the purpose of endeavouring to have the British Government over-ride the Canadian authorities and insist that the Hindu shall be allowed to come into British Columbia and Canada. There are 100,000 ready to come. I could give to this House some of the reasons why we do not want them, and I shall go into these reasons at greater length upon another occasion, but I can say briefly, that the traditions, the education, the caste system in vogue in India, the moral principles of the people, are such that we dare not admit the Hindus into Canada in very large numbers or else the national standard of our country will be so lowered that Canada, in a few years, will not be the recognized country that we expect it to be.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Are they not British citizens?

Mr. STEVENS: They are not British citizens. I answer with a little warmth, not because of the question, but because of the earnestness that I feel in regard to the matter. A Hindu is a British subject entitled to the protection of British laws and of the British Crown in every country, but he is not a British citizen and he has never exercized that right in his own country or in any civilized country in the world. Before Canada admits Hindus into this country and to the rights of British citizens it must consider the question carefully and see if they are worthy to exercise that right. I will give you one of the reasons, and I could give many, why they are not worthy to exercise that right.

Mr. LEMIEUX: They serve in the army.

Mr. STEVENS: That is all very well—Lord Kitchener has had something to say on that. It is not very wise for me to mention these things, but I have seen some Hindu soldiers in action. I will not enumerate the things to which I refer because I do not wish to stir up any international or Imperial complications. It is a delicate question. But I will give one reason why the Hindu has not been admitted to British citizenship in his own country or here. There are castes in India numbering up to the thousands. Any person who wishes to go into that very complicated question can go into the library here and engage in a few years' study in worming out the subject. But there are a dozen very prominent castes in India. The British Government, in its endeavour to extend self-government to that country, have given to certain Hindus such judicial positions as justices of the peace. But they are very limited in number and it has been found in the actual working out of the experiment that it is almost impossible for a Hindu to get justice from a Hindu justice of the peace. Why? If the justice happens to be a Brahmin the parties who have committed the offence, or who have a civil case to place before him, are removed by ten or twelve castes, they are not allowed to come before this Brahmin justice of the peace and pollute him and his caste by laying their case before him. They must approach him through the intervening castes. I ask any hon. gentleman in this House, if any one of us undertook to question another man and had to do it through twelve individual voices, would the twelfth man get as clear an idea of the question which he desired to ask as the first man would? We all know that he would not. When you add to that the bitter prejudices of the caste of India, it simply goes to show the impossibility, as long as that exists, of introducing or allowing the Hindus to exercise the right of citizenship in Canada, or in their own country for that matter. I shall not deal with that question at any greater length.

The racial and social side of the question is a very serious one. In Canada we cannot afford to permit three hundred thousand people to be placed at the mercy of some eight hundred million people. A mere tremor of immigration from Asiatic countries into Canada would very soon swallow up the character and traits of the people of British Columbia, and sooner or later of the whole of Canada.

Another side of this question, which is very important, is the industrial side. I wish to point out these facts in order to prove my statement that we must be careful of Asiatic immigration from an industrial standpoint. When I first went to British Columbia twenty years ago, our sawmills were manned almost entirely by white men. About fifteen years ago the mill owners commenced to engage Chinese in connection with that work. They used the Chinese in the common work, such as piling lumber in the yards and so on. With what result? Very soon they found that the supply of labour for more skilled classes of work was becoming less. Why? Because the young fellows, who originally had been drafted from the families of the white men who piled the lumber, and who usually went in to attend some machine in the sawmill, were not there. They had been replaced by the single Chinese outside. This went on until they found they had to put the Chinese onto the planers, the stickers and the finer machines, with the result that very soon they found the supply of white labour for these machines becoming depleted. They then had to train the Chinese to do the skilled work, until in the last few years our mills in British Columbia are manned almost entirely by Chinese, and later on by Japanese as well. What I want to emphasize is this, that by cutting off this man with his family who was doing the common work, you cut off the supply of labour for the finer jobs, because these men in the mills are trained from one position to the other. It is not very high class labour, but it is labour which requires a certain amount of training. Some people say that you cannot do without Chinese, as you must have domestic servants. The supply of white domestic servants has been cut off. I know the domestic servant problem has become actue here as well as in British Columbia. This is one thing that contributes to the scarcity. The daughters of these white men were the girls who supplied our homes with domestic servants. You have not got them now, simply because the lowest class of work in one particular industry has been supplied by Chinese, and later on by Japanese. A few years ago, we had nine or ten thousand white fishermen on our coasts. To-day we have only about 500. The rest are Chinese or Japanese, who work in our canneries. The canneries will tell you that they cannot get white men to work for them. On the eastern coast, those who go to cure the fish are largely the members of the families of the fishermen. If you have single men, Chinese or Japanese, many of whom come to British Columbia for the fishing season, doing the fishing, you have cut off the white fishermen with their families, and you have also cut off the supply of labour for the cannery to cure the fish, with the natural result that they have to secure Chinese for the canneries. By the policy of admitting in years gone by a large number of Asiatics, we have cut off the the lower class of labour, the common labourer, with the result that the supply of white labour has been cut off in many other lines, forcing employers to hire Chinese and Japanese and now the Hindu for those various lines of work. I contend that the problem that has been given to this Government by the policy of the late Government is one which it will take many years to solve. It is impossible to get a white man to go in and work with a lot of Chinese. He will not do it, because the sentiment, style of living and every other element that go to make up the common everyday life are so entirely different that no white man will engage in competition with a Chinaman. The result is that you have this friction in British Columbia, particularly accentuated in that province in the industrial line, against the Asiatics.

By this treaty, we have made certain arrangements. I wish to close with a reference again to this correspondence and to the facts. I trust my hon. friends opposite will simply be fair with us now and face this question as it is. It is not right or proper for the Government to place on the table the private arrangement made by the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) with the Imperial Government of Japan. Hon. gentlemen opposite know that that argument should not be used against the Government in dealing with this question. It is an unfair argument and is not constitutional. Therefore I eliminate it. We have the assurance of the Prime Minister, on his responsibility as leader of the Government of Canada, that such an arrangement, which is satisfactory, exists. We have proved, through the experience of the last few years, that this arrangement has restricted Japanese immigration to this country. With those two facts, the fact of the restriction and the fact of the assurance of the Prime Minister that it will be continued, I think that no argument should be used on account of the absence of the actual document. What have we proved? We have letters from the Prime Minister and from the representatives of the Imperial Japanese Government. I feel it incumbent upon me to refer to them, because they have been persistently misrepresented by hon. gentlemen opposite. In their anxiety to make a strong argument against the treaty, they have misconstrued the plain and simple reading of these letters. In the face of the 'gentleman's' agreement, as we are pleased to call it, there could not have been any underlying motive in this correspondence. Therefore, we are justified in taking this correspondence at its face value. The Prime Minister prepared this Bill as the decision of himself and his Cabinet. He sends this Bill to the representative of the Imperial Government of Japan, and he says:

> The Imperial Japanese Government are doubtless aware, as the fact is, that the Immigration Act applies to the immigration of aliens into Canada from all countries, including the British Empire itself and makes no discrimination in favour of any country.

Let me pause for a moment. The Prime Minister has inserted in this Bill a clause regarding the Immigration Act. It was therefore incumbent upon him to make reference to that Act when he submitted the agreement to the Japanese authorities. He says that the Immigration Act of Canada, which I have under my hand at the present time, is a general Act which applies to every country in the world alike. And we pride ourselves on that fact. It is true that this Act has within it a clause which gives power to the Government in case of emergency to do certain things, but, under normal conditions the Act is one which applies to every person alike. He goes on to say:

> It is not perceived therefore, that your Government will have any objection to the embodiment in the enclosed draft Act of Parliament of the proviso——
> Sub-section (a) of clause 2—
> —which has already been agreed to in the case of the United States.

And he enclosed a draft of the Bill. The reply to that states:

> I am now in receipt of a reply stating that the Imperial Government have no objection to the proposed Bill, and that they feel assured that the Immigration Act of Canada of 1910 being applicable, as stated in your note, to the immigration of aliens into the Dominion of Canada from all countries including the British Empire itself, no discrimination will be made against Japanese subjects in this respect.

That was a correct and proper thing to do. It was incumbent upon the Government to have a clear understanding of what was intended by this Act, and it was incumbent upon the representatives of the Imperial Government of Japan to state clearly what they understood its meaning to be. The reply to that letter, which has been quoted many times in the course of this discussion, and has been referred to as something in respect of which the Government should be condemned, is as follows:

Ottawa, 5th March, 1913.

Sir,—I have the honour to acknowledge the receipt of your note dated the 1st instant, in relation to the Treaty of Commerce and Navigation between Great Britain and Japan signed at London on the 3rd April, 1911, in which you communicated to me the reply of the Imperial Japanese Government stating that they have no objection to the proposed Bill and that they feel assured that the Immigration Act of Canada of 1910 being applicable to the immigration of aliens into the Dominion of Canada from all countries including the British Empire itself, no discrimination will be made against Japanese subjects in this respect.

I have the honour to inform you that the Government of Canada has received this reply with the greatest satisfaction, and that the proposed Bill will be introduced so soon as the pending business now engaging the attention of Parliament will permit.

I have the honour to be, Sir,
Your obedient servant,
(Sgd.) R. L. Borden.

Honourable T. Nakamura,
Consul General for Japan,
385 Laurier Avenue E.,
Ottawa, Ont.

This letter means that the Government of Canada, having submitted this Bill, with this particular clause contained therein, to the Imperial authorities of Japan, express their pleasure upon its return without any suggested amendments, and in other words, that an amicable conclusion had finally been arrived at in connection therewith. Let me direct the attention of the House to the following remarks of the right hon. leader of the Opposition during the course of his address yesterday:

Mr. Speaker, we have no intention on this side of the House of offering any opposition to the ratification of the treaty which is now sought by the Government, if certain information which we hope to have as the discussion proceeds is on the line we expect.

He says further on:

The method——

And he refers to the arrangement which has been made—

—is certainly the best solution of that problem, and now that we have these explanations on the part of my right hon. friend, I think there is no reason why we should refuse our assent to the treaty.

These are the words of the leader of the Opposition, and apparently the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley), who, as we understand, has some aspirations with regard to the leadership of the party, desires to defy the authority of the right hon. leader of the Opposition, because he said most emphatically that the Bill should not pass in its present form, and that it possessed many objectionable features, especially with regard to immigration. The leader of the Opposition, whose statements we are prepared to accept in preference to those of the hon. member for St. John, states that it is quite satisfactory, and that there is no reason why the assent of Parliament should not be given to the Bill. The hon. member for Rouville, who is an authority on this question, having given it a good deal of attention, congratulated the right hon. leader of the Government upon the happy conclusion of the negotiations, and so I submit that the Government of Canada have protected the country in this regard, retaining the control of immigration within itself instead of allowing such control to remain in the vague state in which it previously existed —I say 'vague' advisedly, vague not to the Government, but to the public. That private state document was not known to the public, but the facts in connection with the matter give to the people of the country an earnest of the principles upon which the Government have assented to this treaty.

Mr. E. M. MACDONALD (Pictou): The hon. member who has just taken his seat, in a very long and interesting address, has evidently found it necessary to make a good deal of explanation in regard to this matter. His address to the House yesterday when the Speaker was in the Chair, evidently did not meet his views, and, having had occasion to reflect on the situation, he decided that in the interests of his constituents, he should make another speech. I trust that no hon. member of this House thinks as the hon. member for Vancouver does in his imputation that I have evidenced a lack of courtesy in my utterances in this House. In making any remarks upon any matter that comes before the House, I am always willing to yield to any hon. gentleman who desires to ask a question, but, in view of the nature of the debate which took place on the Naval Bill, during the course of which hon. gentlemen opposite declined to give to the House and to the country their views on the most important question we have had before us for twenty-five years, while desiring at the same time to exercise the right of interrupting hon. gentlemen on this side of the House, I took the ground that if hon. gentlemen opposite desire to express their opinions they should stand up like the rest of us and discuss them without confining their efforts to frequent interruptions of hon. gentlemen on this side of the House, who are endeavouring to fulfil their duties as members of parliament.

The greater part of my hon. friend's remarks were directed to a consideration of the evils attendant upon Asiatic immigration into this country. The problem which he indicates as being before the Canadian people in this respect seems to me to be a very serious and extremely vital one. The picture which my hon. friend presented of 800,000,000 people living on the other side of the Pacific ocean, being a menace to our future prosperity and our identity as a nation, is one which might well lead hon. gentlemen of this House and the people of the country to pause and reflect on the possible results of such a condition. But when my hon. friend discusses naval protection in this country, the presence of 800,000,000 Asiatics is a matter of no consequence. He is perfectly willing to have the ships which are built with the money of the Canadian people floating around Gibraltar or any place other than in the waters of the northern Pacific. The circumstances surrounding these Asiatics shrink into insignificance, however, when my hon. friend is considering the question of how we can best provide for the naval protection of this country. My hon. friend has been frank enough to tell us that this has been a political question in British Columbia. Unquestionably it has. He made a curious admission that all the Acts passed by Premier McBride in British Columbia during the last fifteen years, excluding Asiatics and taking away their rights were not intended as serious legislation and had no meaning save that they were introduced for the purpose of affecting public opinion. But at an earlier date he complained that the ruthless Grit Government in Ottawa had destroyed forty pieces of legislation by disallowance. Had the Minister of Justice remained in the House—and he is never in the House except when is he called in to do some special pleading for scandals; he is never here as a Minister of Justice ought to be when important legal questions are bing discussed——

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. MACDONALD: I repeat the statement that the Minister of Justice is not in the House when important legal questions are being considered; he is more conspicuous by his absence than any other minister of this Government, and he ought to be here when we are considering such questions as this. I do not know what we have a minister of justice for; he has less to do than all the other ministers who honour this House by their presence. If the member for Vancouver (Mr. Stevens) had not wiped out all Dick McBride's fake legislation with the statement that it was not intended to mean anything, I would have asked the Minister of Justice whether he agreed with Sir Charles Fitzpatrick and other ministers of justice who had recommended the disallowance of that legislation. The Conservative party in British Columbia have made this Asiatic immigration question a political football and they have taken the position deliberately that the Conservative party stands for a white Canada, the protection of white labour, and absolute exclusion of Asiatics. That has been the policy of the Conservative party in British Columbia for ten years, and that is the policy they endeavoured to commit the Prime Minister to in 1908 by the forged telegram they read. And yet to-day when this Government now in power hands out this gold brick on the question of Asiatic exclusion, we have academic dissertations by the member for Vancouver on the menace of the Japanese and the peril of the Asiatics and all these platitudes that he has been dealing out on the lecture platforms throughout the country. And the people of British Columbia are asked to believe that the Government have fulfilled the promises they made when in opposition, that if they got into power they would provide for Asiatic exclusion. We were promised by the hon. member (Mr. Stevens), who has made his exit speedily from the House, that he was going to tell us whether this Government would venture to pass any regulation or amendment to the Immigration Act which would exclude a single Japanese who is not excluded to-day. His exit was no doubt due to the fact that he did not want to answer the question I put to him. We are told by the supporters of the Government that we have a treaty with Japan, and that that treaty is going to do wonderful things, and in section 1 of that treaty we have it provided that any person who belongs to Japan shall in all that relates to travel and residence be placed in all respects on the same level as native subjects; that they shall have rights equally with native subjects of Canada to carry on commerce, manufacture, trade in all kinds of securities, and so on, and there are other sections which give the Japanese coming to Canada the widest powers. We are told by these gentlemen opposite that although this is in the treaty it is curtailed in some way, and that the pledge as to absolute exclusion of Asiatics is being fulfilled by this wonderful treaty and this great statute. We are told there has been an agreement entered into by the Prime Minister and the Consul-General of Japan at Ottawa, but it is not pretended that that agreement is to have any greater or wider effect than the arrangement made by the hon. member for Rouville in 1907. The Prime Minister is reported at page 7128 of 'Hansard' as saying:

Notwithstanding the control of immigration which is maintained by both Canada and the United States, the Government of Japan themselves propose not only with regard to the United States but with regard to Canada, to continue the control of the immigration which has been practiced by that Government in respect to both countries during the past six or seven years.

And so, what we are going to have under this Bill, is a continuation of the arrangement made by the hon. member for Rouville with the Government of Japan in 1907. And we all know in 1907 how that arrangement was abused. Every Conservative member of this House from British Columbia went through the province declaring that the arrangement made by the hon. member (Mr. Lemieux) was of no value whatever. In 1910 I visited every part of that magnificent province and the one and only question in which the people were interested was this Asiatic immigration question, and the position taken by the Conservatives on the platform was that the Government of Sir Wilfrid Laurier was doing nothing for the people of British Columbia that the much-abused arrangement made by the hon. member for Rouville was of no value whatever, and that the rights of labour in British Columbia and all over Canada had been disregarded by the Liberal Government at Ottawa. And then we had Premier McBride, from 1902 to 1910, passing these fake Acts of Parliament, acording to my hon. friend from Vancouver, Acts which were never intended to have any effect. I see in the British Columbia statutes that my hon. friend from Kootenay (Mr. Green) was the father of an Act which provided that no Japanese should be employed in any responsible capacity in any of the mines of British Columbia. He was one of those who presented one of these fake Acts which the people of British Columbia thought were serious legislation intended to provide for the exclusion of Asiatics from their province, and which we know to-night never were passed with any such intention.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Shams, shams.

Mr. MACDONALD: Shams, intended to be sent to Ottawa with a view of having them disallowed. The same Government was then in power in British Columbia that is in power to-day, but since the present Government came to power in Ottawa, we have not heard a word from Sir Richard McBride or Mr. Attorney General Bowser about the vindication of the rights of the people of British Columbia in regard to the exclusion of Asiatics. Why did not they send the same legislation down here since the Conservatives came to power as they sent before, and let the present Minister of Justice say whether he would recommend to the Government that it should be disallowed? If the Minister of Justice were here I would like to ask him whether he would not be bound to do the same thing as Sir Charles Fitzpatrick and Sir Allen Aylesworth had done, and recommend that such Acts should not be allowed. If Sir Richard McBride passed any legislative reproduction of the legislation which he had passed in previous years and came down here, I venture to say that the present Minister of Justice would at once recommend the disallowance of such legislation, he would be bound to do so if he had any regard for his position as a lawyer.

The Conservative party said in 1908 that this much abused arrangement of the hon. member for Rouville was not worth the paper it was written on. Immediately after that, in 1909, the present Prime Minister in this House moved a resolution upon this question. The conclusion of it will show what he thought of the treaty he is now making:

That this House, while expressing its profound appreciation of the friendly intentions and courteous assurance of the Japanese Government, and while declaring its sincere desire for the most cordial relations with Japan, desires, nevertheless, to record its strong protest against a policy under which our wage-earning population cannot be protected from destructive and unfair competition except by entreating the forbearance of a foreign government.

That is what the Prime Minister said as to the arrangement made by the hon. member for Rouville which he is now continuing practically ipsissima verba. If there is to be any exclusion of Asiatics from this country it can only come about as the result of the continuation of the arrangement made by the hon. member for Rouville. Where else are they going to get it? We have a curious little clause in this Bill, one of those jokers that are sometimes inserted in legislation by astute draftsmen to amuse some people who think they are going to get something, and it is well to look at it critically. The treaty, which gives absolute right to the Japanese people to come into this country and do as they please, the same as natives of the British Empire, is first declared to have the force of law in Canada provided that nothing in the said treaty or in this Act shall be deemed to repeal or affect any provisions of the Immigration Act. That is, although we have the absolute undertaking in the treaty that the Japanese people can come into this country ad libitum, that provision is put in that it is not to be held to repeal or affect the provision of the Immigration Act. Is there anything in the Immigration Act under which our Government to-day could exclude the Japanese and exercise rights in regard to the Japanese which are different from what they could exercise in regard to British subjects for instance? I say, as a humble member of the legal profession, having studied the regulations and the Act, that there is nothing in the Immigration Act at this time which empowers the Government of this country to exclude any man who comes from Japan unless he falls under the prohibited classes of people who are idiots or who are shut out upon some such ground any more than there is to exclude the man who comes here from the British Isles. If it is so, and it is conceded and the argument of my hon. friend from Carleton on that head cannot be answered, what is there in this Act that creates any right or power in this Government to deal with citizens of Japan in any way differently from what they have been dealt with in the past? It is suggested that possibly they may extend that Act and may pass new regulations. My hon friend read the correspondence which took place between the right hon. the Prime Minister and the Consul General of Japan. I shall not read it, any one who understands the English language and who will construe the effect of these documents, because they must be read with this treaty, will come to the conclusion beyond all doubt that the status of a man from Japan, so far as the Immigration Act is concerned, is to be the same status as that of a man who comes here from England. Those letters preclude the idea for one moment that a single regulation can be passed that is not now to be found on the statute-book or the regulations of this Government. The idea will be suggested in British Columbia that the Dominion Government has control of this immigration. I say that this Dominion Government would not dare to pass any amending immigration law or to amend the regulations that have been made under it because they have no power to do so under this statute, so far as the Japanese are concerned. The Prime Minister to-day spoke about the principle of law that when a statute referred to another statute the general meaning of that reference was that it was that statute as amended from time to time. The Prime Minister did not tell the House that that legal application is one that is only made by virtue of a special clause in an interpretation Act which says it can be done and there is no clause in any Act or in this treaty which in any way can provide for the adding to the words 'the Immigration Act,' such words as are suggested by the hon. member for Edmonton. 'And such amendments as may be passed from time to time.' You will find in the Interpretation Act in the revised Statutes a clause by which you are able usually in interpreting a statute to read in those words. You cannot adapt that Act to this treaty. Go to any provincial statute and you will find a similar clause but at common law the words of the document itself which contains the agreement between the parties must be held to strictly as there is no interpretation Act which can be resorted to for the purpose of adding to them in any way.

Wolsley on International law deals with the construction of treaties. Let us take one rule that he lays down. Supposing it is urged by hon. gentlemen opposite that one of the meanings that can be attached to sub-section (a) is that it really means 'the Immigration Act and such amendments as thereto may be made from time to time' and supposing that the other construction suggested is that it means what it says on the face of it, the Immigration Act, namely the Act in force at the date of the passing of the treaty. Wolseley says:

> If two meanings are applicable, that meaning is to be preferred which is least for the advantage for the party for whose benefit that clause is inserted.

This clause is inserted in this statute confirming this treaty at the request of this Government and substantially for their benefit. 'That construction is to be preferred which is least for the advantage of the parties who made the request.' That is the absolute rule in the construction of international law for construing a benefit, says Wolsley.

> In securing a benefit he ought to express himself clearly. The sense which the accepter of conditions attaches to them ought rather to be followed than that of the offerer.

Now, the party that offered was the Government of Canada, and the sense in which that offer is to be understood is very easily to be gathered from the letters of the Consul General of Japan who does not say anything about immigration being amended from time to time. He speaks of the Immigration Act of 1910; he specifically refers to the year in which it was passed. Woolsey says: 'that the sense which the accepter of conditions attaches to them ought rather to be followed than that of the offerer.' There you have a sound writer on international law giving his interpretation. Then there is another statement by the same writer:

> Odious clauses, such as involve cruelty or hard conditions for one party, are to be understood strictly, so that their operation shall be brought within the narrowest limits.

If the view that some hon. gentlemen will no doubt endeavour to take out to the province of British Columbia is that this condition was inserted in this statute and also in this treaty, it was a condition which they had accepted because it implied that there was some condition attached to the Japanese that they were of a different order of people from the subjects of their nations. But you go to Wolsley on international law and he tells us that when you are dealing with a condition of that kind, you are to be understood strictly —so that their operation shall be brought within the narrowest limits.

Now, if to-day there is not within the four corners of that statute or of those regulations, any right by which this Government can exclude a man who comes from Japan any more than they exclude a man who comes from Britain, and that is what the correspondence between the Prime Minister and the Japanese representative shows clearly, then so far as the effect of this Act is concerned, it is absolutely nil. When hon. gentlemen talk about the absolute exclusion of Asiatics, I have no hesitation in saying that subsection (a), construing it in the light of the principles of international law, is an absolutely dead letter. There is not a man who comes from Japan unless he comes within the prohibitive clauses which apply to all countries, who can be stopped under that legislation, so long as this treaty remains in effect. Instead of wild dissertations about events and occurrences of fourteen years ago I would like to hear from some hon. gentlemen opposite upon this particular piece of legislation. The position to-day is that the Government are fooling the people of British Columbia as they have been fooling them on this exclusion question for ten years. They have had to put this fake on the statute-book so that they can go on fooling them for some years more. Now I would like to ask my hon. friend if he could tell me when this Government intends to pass any statute or to make any regulation by which anybody who came from Japan to this country could be excluded. We have not got an answer to that question. I would like hon. gentlemen on the other side to tell us whether they intend to pass any amendment of the law. I could quote authority in regard to the construction of statutes to show that this could not be done because it would interfere with this treaty, once adopted, and would interfere with the rights of His Majesty, whose assent to this treaty with the Empire of Japan has been given subject to Canada's consent, and once Canada's consent is given, Canada cannot go on amending this treaty. It cannot go on putting in new clauses or making restrictions from time to time for political reasons. That door is closed once this treaty is settled, and anything which interferes with it, which in any way expressly affects the Act is a matter which would have to be dealt with by the Imperial Government. I hope the people of this country understand just where we are upon this question. There is not a single advantage given with respect to the rights of this country so far as the exclusion of Asiatics is concerned. On the contrary we have expressly intimated that we would not do anything in the future. My hon. friend quoted from sections 37 and 38 of the regulations, as if there existed some provisions under which this Government could deal with the people from Japan. Unfortunately he did not explain the letter which was written by the Prime Minister in regard to these particular regulations and sent to the representative of Japan which was to the following effect:

4. The Imperial Japanese Government are doubtless aware, as the fact is, that the Immigration Act applies to the immigration of aliens into Canada from all countries, including the British Empire itself, and makes no discrimination in favour of any country. It is not perceived, therefore, that your Government will have any objection to the embodiment to the inclosed draft Act of Parliament of the proviso which has already been agreed to in the case of the United States.

I have the honour to be, Sir,
Your obedient servant,
R. L. Borden.

What does that mean? Simply this, that the Prime Minister of Canada wrote to the Consul General of Japan saying: You are aware of this clause in our Immigration Act; we put you entirely in the same position as British subjects; hitherto we have had the idea that you were citizens of a nation which was to some extent of a second class order, but now we are putting you on the same plane as the British Empire; consequently you cannot have any ground of complaint. Then the answer made by the Consul General of Japan was:

Having reported the matter at once to my Government, I am now in receipt of a reply stating that the Imperial Government has no objection to the proposed Bill and that they feel assured that the Immigration Act of Canada of 1910, being applicable, as stated in your note to the immigration of aliens into the Dominion of Canada from all countries, including the British Empire itself, no discrimination will be made against Japanese subjects in this respect.

On the faith of that statement, upon the assurance of the Prime Minister that no discrimination would be made against Japan in the future, or against the subjects of Japan, the treaty was signed. So terests of Canada alone. This treaty dero- that, we have this joker in the Bill, which is intended to fool the people of British Columbia and which does not mean anything except that they can keep out idiots, people of unsound mind and imbeciles who come from that country. But it was necessary for my hon. friend from Vancouver to have something to take home with him, so that he could talk learnedly about the provisions of the Immigration Act.

That little joker was put in for him. It does not mean anything. But in addition to that joker and, inane as the clause is, the Prime Minister has pledged the faith of Canada to the great Japanese nation that there shall be no discrimination hereafter against men from Japan, no legislation shall be passed to say that a man from Japan shall be treated in any different way from a man who comes from the British Isles. The pledged faith of Canada has been given to that statement and instead of the gentlemen from British Columbia being able to go back to their province and tell the people there that they have made a step forward in the fulfilment of their promises that there would be absolute exclusion of Asiatics, they will be obliged to admit that there has been a retrograde step made by the Government and they and their chief men who have been so busily engaged in passing their fake legislation in that province are in the humiliating position that they have to admit that they are now attempting to fool the people of Canada as a whole whereas they formerly only fooled the people of one province. That is where matters are in regard to this Bill.

This Bill provides for a renewal of the treaty with Japan, and it puts the impress of the Conservative party upon the arrangement made by my hon. friend from Rouville—this much-abused arrangement which occasioned a vote of want of confidence in this House in 1908 and which was attacked all over the province of British Columbia as being an absolutely inadequate and impossible solution. The result is to-day that, as a matter of law—and I submit that no reasonable answer can be made to the argument which we have presented—the Government stand in this position: We are affirming and continuing the arrangement which was made by the Laurier Government; that is all that can be done in regard to this question of Asiatic exclusion; we are saying to the world that Sir Wilfrid Laurier was right and that the Liberal party took the only course that could be taken in order to deal with this question in a satisfactory way.

Mr. LEMIEUX: It is our vindication.

Mr. MACDONALD: It is a vindication of the position which the Liberal party took in regard to this question, it is a slamming of the door in the faces of the men who have talked about the absolute exclusion of Asiatics in British Columbia for the last ten years.

Hon. FRANK OLIVER (Edmonton): Mr. Chairman, as I understand the matter there is not to-day a treaty between Canada and Japan. We are undertaking to deal with this matter on an absolutely clean sheet and, unless there is benefit to accrue to Canada as the result of the treaty, it is better that it should not be entered into. From all I have been able to gather in the course of the debate, the material advantages are, to say the least, limited. The presumed benefit that is to result by reason of a better condition regarding immigration matters seem to be very much in doubt. As I understand the case it is this: We have a clean sheet to start with, we provide that we shall not, so far as Japan is concerned, be enabled to amend or improve, in the matter of restriction at any rate, the Immigration Act as it stands to-day. The Immigration Act as it stands to-day is to be the only Immigration Act we can have so far as Japanese immigration is concerned so long as this treaty continues. That is the position as it was stated by the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Borden). We must therefore accept it.

Under a provision of the Act, as it stands at present, the subjects of Japan may be discriminated against, but we have the declaration of the Prime Minister made to the representative of Japan that, no matter what the interests of Canada may call for, that power shall not be exercised. We have tied ourselves in two particulars; the one is that we shall not be able to change the Act, and the other is that we shall not be able to enforce the Act that we have. That is the position in regard to the immigration features of this Act.

I say to the Government that, this being admitted, and it is admitted, there should be some serious reason given to justify the passing of the Act. It may be said that it is not conceivable that the interests of Canada would require that special discrimination should be made against the subjects of Japan. I had the honour of saying to the right hon. the Prime Minister last night that my experience is that in immigration matters provisions which may be absolutely adequate and satisfactory to-day by changed conditions, may be entirely inadequate and unsatisfactory to-morrow and that we are never safe in binding ourselves against the amending of our Act to suit our own interests. The provisions of the Act as they are to-day are a declaration of the right of Canada to make selection of those who seek her citizenship in the in-gates from that principle and is an injury to Canada to that extent.

The question that is brought before the committee by my hon. friend from Moosejaw (Mr. Knowles) relating to legislation of the province of Saskatchewan, and the disallowance of that legislation, goes beyond the question of immigration. It is more important than the question of immigration. It trenches upon the most elementary right of the provinces of the Dominion. Circumstances have arisen which demonstrate the necessity of protecting the provinces in the exercise of their rights in caring for their citizens. My hon. friend from Vancouver agrees with my hon. friend from Moosejaw that the conditions are such as to render this an absolute requirement in the interests of Canada, and we are proposing now to agree to a treaty that will absolutely prevent the protection of these rights. This feature of the case has not been discussed to my mind, as fully as it should have been, and it is in the last degree important. I wish to draw attention to that part of the treaty that is affected. Section 3 of article 1, says:

3. They shall in all that relates to the pursuit of their industries, callings, professions, and educational studies be placed in all respects on the same footing as the subjects or citizens of the most favoured nation.

In other words, if this treaty is passed the legislature of Saskatchewan, or of any other province, would have no standing in attempting to protect that part of their population that it was intended to protect by the legislation that this Government intended to disallow. The position to-day is that the legislature of any province has the right to pass such legislation for the protection of its citizens, and this Government has to exercise its right of disallowing in order to prevent that protection. If this Act is passed, then this Government is relieved from the responsibility of exercising such right of disallowance and this Parliament has deliberately cut away from the provinces of Canada that right to protect those who need their protection according to the circumstances that have been related. I do not wish to delay the committee, but I wish to emphasize strongly this point. I understand it is the desire of the Government that the Bill should pass out of committee to-night on account of its anxiety to secure the passage of the Bill as soon as possible. There are other members of the committee who desire to speak on this Bill who are not present at the present moment therefore I give notice that on the third reading of the Bill I desire to move as an amendment to section 2 the following:

That subsection (a) of section 2 be amended by adding after the word 'Act' in the third line thereof the words 'or any amendment or amendments thereto which may hereafter be enacted.'

I desire further to give notice that on the third reading of the Bill I will move as a proviso to article I:

Provided always that nothing in this article I. contained shall be deemed to interfere with or in any way restrict the legislative powers or authorities of local legislatures in the different provinces of Canada.

I consider that these points are of sufficient importance that they should be placed on record and that there should be full opportunity of discussing them in the light of their great importance before this Bill receives its third reading.

Bill reported.

On motion of Mr. Rogers the House adjourned at 11.45 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

FRIDAY, April 4, 1913.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at three o'clock.

BRITISH-JAPANESE TREATY.

Rt. Hon. R. L. BORDEN (Prime Minister) moved third reading of Bill No. 156, respecting a certain Treaty of Commerce and Navigation between His Majesty the King and His Majesty the Emperor of Japan.

Hon. FRANK OLIVER (Edmonton) moved:

That the Bill be not now read a third time, but that it be referred back to the Committee of the Whole, with instructions to amend the same by inserting in paragraph (a) of section 2, after the words 'the Immigration Act,' 'or of any amendment or amendments thereto which may hereafter be enacted; or the provisions of any existing Act of a provincial legislature or any subsequent act thereof, which but for such treaty would be within the authority of such legislature.'

He said: Mr. Speaker, in moving this amendment, I do not wish to delay the House at any serious length, but the subject dealt with in the amendment is of such importance and is so affected by the terms of the treaty, that I do not feel free to permit the Bill to become law without entering a formal protest and placing my views in concrete form. I have nothing to object to in all that has been said in behalf of the people of the Empire of Japan, or of the amicable character of the relations which have subsisted between this country and Japan. This does not bring into question the merits of the people of Japan, or of their government, or of their good faith in any way. It is a matter which is of immediate and urgent concern to the people of Canada and it is from that point of view, and that point of view alone, that I desire to bring it to the attention of the House.

The essential principle of our Immigration Act is that Canada shall be mistress in her own house and shall have the absolute right, under all circumstances, to make selection and restriction with regard to immigrants as may seem to be most in the interest of the people of Canada. It is because, as I have followed the debate on this question, that that principle is departed from in the Bill now before the House that I desire to move this amendment, the adoption of which would, to a very considerable extent, better the position under the treaty, if it is adhered to. I do not wish, as I have said, to exaggerate the situation or to attach an undue importance to the immediate material result, either of the treaty, or of the amendment that I propose. Admitting that the material question is not seriously important, either in the treaty or the amendment, in so far as it relates to the proposed agreement between Japan and Canada, or in so far as it concerns the relations between Japan and Canada, the importance, to my mind, is in Canada maintaining absolutely the principle which she has established, because, if it is departed from in the case of Japan, it forms a precedent for further departure in other cases as they arise which cases might very well be of stupendously greater importance. The principle is very simple, and it is very right. We are dealing with this matter entirely in the new; that is to say we are not tied at the moment in any way. Then, it seems to be the plain duty of Parliament, in the discharge of its responsibilities to the people of Canada, to see that the fundamental principle of the Immigration Act is not in any degree interfered with and it is with that object in view that I move the amendment.

I am speaking now only of the first part of the amendment. The second part of the amendment relates, not to immigration, but to the jurisdiction of the provinces of Canada in the discharge of their responsibilities to their people. A condition has arisen which was brought to the attention of this House yesterday, which condition calls and, it is admitted properly calls, for interference by the provincial legislatures. As we stand to-day, the provincial legislatures have an absolute right to pass the legislation that the circumstances seem to call for. But, as I understand it if we pass this Bill, if we agree to this treaty, our provincial legislatures are deprived of that right and are debarred to that extent. I maintain that it is essentially the business of this Parliament to see that no international agreement is made which will prevent our local legislatures from properly safeguarding the rights, privileges and interests of the people of those several provinces.

I have nothing to say of the difficulties that may be in the way of successfully negotiating this treaty if this amendment is agreed to. That is a matter for the Government of the day to consider, but it would be unfair to the Government, as it would be unfair to the country, to allow this measure to pass and not bring to the attention of the House and, as far as possible, to the attention of the country, that condition which is very seriously affected by the terms of this treaty. I would be glad to have other words that would meet the requirement I have in view, and perhaps better conform to the purpose of the treaty, substituted for the amendment I propose, but I am moving the amendment having in view a certain purpose which is necessary to my mind and in the interest of the people of our country and I am calling the attention of Parliament and of the Government to the necessity of meeting the case and not allowing this treaty to pass without such an amendment as would adequately and reasonably meet that condition.

It is not to the point to say that the treaty that we propose to negotiate to-day is the same as the treaty which was in force some years ago. I do not know whether the terms are the same or whether they are not the same. The point is that, within our knowledge, a certain condition has arisen in our country that called for action by our provincial legislatures and, in my humble judgment, it is for this Parliament to see that, under any international arrangement that we may enter into, the legislatures are not unduly hampered in the discharge of their responsibility to their citizens.

Mr. HUGH GUTHRIE (South Wellington): Mr. Speaker, I just wish to say a word or two in regard to the amendment to clause 2 which has been proposed by my hon. friend from Edmonton (Mr. Oliver), and more particularly with regard to the first sub-section of his proposed amendment, which is to add the words, 'or of any amendment or amendments thereto which may hereafter be enacted.' In one view of the case, in my judgment, it is most important that definite language of this nature should be inserted in this clause of the Bill. The Bill as drafted and as it has passed the committee specially provides in subsection (a):

That nothing in the said treaty or in this Act shall be taken to repeal or affect any of the provisions of the Immigration Act.

And, anyone reading that enactment, without giving it more or less careful consideration, would be impressed with the binding force of the terms of the Canadian Immigration Act upon that treaty with Japan. The Immigration Act of 1910, as it stands on our statute-books to-day, is the only Act which will come within the purview of the treaty under the Bill as we have it before the House at the present moment on amendment. It has been argued by the Prime Minister that as a matter of law or of interpretation, any amendment which may hereafter be made to the Immigration Act would of necessity form part of sub-section (a). I take issue with my right hon. friend on that proposition of law and interpretation of statutes, and particularly of the interpretation of a treaty. I submit that if the Bill is passed as at present before us we cannot make a single amendment to the Immigration Act of 1910 which will have the slightest force or effect on the treaty with Japan now before us. I think I am on firm ground in making that statement. By the ordinary rules of common law, as recognized in this and every English speaking country, nothing outside the four corners of the document itself would have any application, and the only manner in which subsequent legislation of this House in regard to the Immigration Act could be made applicable to the Japanese treaty would be by force of an Act of this Parliament known as the Interpretation Act. The Interpretation Act forms no part of the Japanese treaty or of the Act by which we propose to ratify it now. If it is the intention of this House that the Immigration Act of 1910 and any amendment which may hereafter be passed shall apply to the Japanese treaty, then we must state it in clear language, or we must incorporate our Interpretation Act with the language of sub-section (a). That is the only way in which future legislation with respect to immigration would be binding upon Japan, or have any effect in regard to this treaty. If my argument in that respect is not a sound legal argument, I would like the objection to it to be pointed out now. It is beyond challenge that the only Act that will apply to the present treaty is the Immigration Act of 1910 as it stands on our statute-books to-day. If that be so, is there not serious objection to this legislation? I cannot imagine why subsection (a) was incorporated in this Bill at all. In my humble judgment it is absolutely without meaning. If it has any meaning, that meaning has been circumscribed by the correspondence which has taken place between the head of this Government and the Consul General of Japan. This clause has only been inserted in this Bill, in my opinion, as a sort of trick, as an artifice; it resembles what one might describe as something in the nature of flim-flam legislation; it is a sort of a gold brick handed out to the people of British Columbia to lead them to believe that this Conservative Administration, after the declarations it made while in opposition throughout a long course of years, now, when it has come to power, has carried out the pledge which it undoubtedly made to the people of British Columbia, whereas, when the proposal comes to be analyzed, it does nothing of the kind and it has not advanced the position one iota over what the position was before.

It is rather odd that we have not had more comment on this Bill from hon. gentlemen representing constituencies in British Columbia. It is true that the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Burrell) and the hon. member for Vancouver (Mr. Stevens) did give the House the benefit of their knowledge on the subject, but what of other hon. gentlemen representing British Columbia constituencies in this House—the member for Kootenay (Mr. Green), the member for Nanaimo (Mr. Shepherd) are both in their places, and neither has had an opinion or a suggestion to make; whilst two hon. members who should have been here, the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Taylor) and the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. Barnard), are not in their places and have not been in their places since the discussion began. We have only to go back to the year 1907 to see in what position hon. members from British Columbia are placed. We know that in 1907 there was a disturbance, more or less aggravated, in our Pacific coast cities, said to have resulted from the influx of large numbers of Japanese. We know that at that time there was considerable turmoil in British Columbia, and the question became a live issue indeed. We know absolutely that in the general elections of October, 1908, the strong delegation of five Conservative members from British Columbia to this House was a direct result of the agitation which had gone on during the preceding years, and also a direct result of the promises which had been made in this House by the present Prime Minister. In 1909, the right hon. gentleman made it perfectly clear what the attitude of himself and of the Conservative party was in regard to this question. He condemned the Liberal Government in this resolution which he offered as a vote of want of confidence:

That this House, while expressing its profound appreciation of the friendly intentions and courteous assurances of the Japanese Government, and while declaring its sincere desire for the most cordial relations with Japan, desires nevertheless to record its strong protest against a policy in which our wage-earning population cannot be protected from destruction and unfair competition except by entreating the forbearance of a foreign government.

That was the policy of my right hon. friend in 1909. Has he carried that out? I submit that he has entirely failed to do so. He rests this matter precisely where it rested before his Government took power in September, 1911. Has the position been changed? Can anyone fairly say that there has been any change? Can any hon. member for British Columbia go back to his constituents and say: The Conservative party has taken control of the question of Japanese immigration and has placed it on a different basis from that upon which it rested during Liberal rule in this country? Why, Sir, that cannot be said for a moment. I believe that the only function of sub-clause (a) will be to mislead the people of British Columbia. If that clause in this Bill passes unamended, it may have that effect. I submit that the people of British Columbia should know that, notwithstanding the language of sub-clause (a), the restriction of Japanese immigration into Canada to-day rests upon the good faith and the bona fides of the Japanese Government in carrying out the agreement made with them in 1907 by the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux). The matter rested there then and it rests there now, notwithstanding that the Government has in this instance sought to mislead the people of British Columbia by including sub-clause (a).

That is the effect of sub-clause (a) in this matter, if it has any. By the Immigration Act of 1910, we can exclude certain undesirable people and also certain classes of people, no matter from what quarter of the world they may come. To-day, under the Immigration Act of 1910, the Governor in Council might pass regulations which would entirely prohibit Japanese immigration into this country. If I am not right in that, let me be put right. The Governor in Council might pass regulations imposing a head tax on Japanese immigration, which would practically operate as a prohibition. That is the position to-day. Had my right hon. friend left the matter at that and had he not involved the matter by writing the assurances which he has given to the Government of Japan, something might have been said in favour of the contention that the Immigration law of Canada would be the binding law in regard to immigration into this country. Had he allowed the correspondence, which took place in the first instance between him and the Japanese Consul, to stand, there might have remained power for this Government to prohibit Japanese immigration, but the Japanese Government would never have consented to that arrangement. I think that is obviously the reason for the assurance My right hon. friend, having seen the difficulty, boldly takes the course that he will assure the Government of Japan that in no case will there be discriminatory legislation against the Japanese under the Immigration Act or under any other act, which will prevent them from migrating to Canada. He has given that assurance in solemn form, and he has received its acknowledgement in solemn form by the Government of Japan. Can it be argued for a moment that the Government of this country would disregard the binding obligations which the Prime Minister has seen fit to throw around this treaty, to the effect that no discriminatory legislation shall be passed against Japan?

Suppose, however, that this Bill, as drafted, goes through and that this treaty is affirmed, and suppose also that we receive some declaration, as was suggested by my right hon. friend, from the Government of Japan that they will still carry out the agreement made with my hon. friend from Rouville, and that while this treaty is still in force, immigration does come from Japan. Suppose that the Japanese Government should in the future disregard the agreement which they have made and that Japanese should land in British Columbia in large numbers. Can we restrain them ? I submit that we cannot, because we are bound by the contract which we have made with them directly through the Prime Minister. We may have a disagreement. We may amend our immigration law or we may pass an Order in Council under the Immigration Act imposing a penalty or a head tax which would practically exclude Japanese immigration. Suppose we did so, and that a difference arose between Japan and this country as to our rights to do so. I presume that matters of this kind would be settled amicably by a tribunal of arbitration. What would a board of arbitration say ? They would say: 'There is your treaty, which you affirmed; there is your Act of Parliament in precise language; there are your explanatory letters and your conditions subscribed to by the head of your Government, passed by your Parliament with full knowledge of the contents; how are you going to get away from that position ?' Would not that treaty be binding upon this country ? I submit that it would, and anyone who has studied the interpretation of treaties either in a concrete case or merely for the purpose of investigation, can only come to the conclusion, which I have indicated to the House, that any arbitration tribunal would hold in such a case that Canada was bound under this Act by the precise language in the Immigration Act to-day, and that the application of the Immigration Act is limited by the express stipulations which have been made between Canada and Japan through the correspondence carried on between the Prime Minister of Canada and the Consul General of Japan.

In the interpretation of treaties, there are general rules which are recognized. Words must be given their plain and ordinary meaning.

In cases of difficulty or dispute, the intention of the parties is to be gathered from the surrounding conditions. That is laid down at great length in Oppenheim's International Law, volume I, page 559. There is also very precise language on the same subject in the authority quoted last night by my hon. friend from Pictou (Mr. Macdonald), Wolseley on International Law. I submit that in the interpretation of this treaty, if it goes through in its present form, any tribunal would say that where there is a conflict as to the correct interpretation to be put upon any phrase, it would be construed most strongly against the granting authority in this case against Canada. The same rule which applies in all our courts, which is the law of the land, in regard to the interpretation of private contracts holds in this case,—the conditions are to be taken most strongly against the grantor; they would be taken most strongly against us in the present instance. I submit with confidence that any tribunal that came to deal with the case would hold, in the light of the Prime Minister's letter promising that there should be no discrimination against Japanese immigration coming into Canada, that this correspondence rendered nugatory any amendment to our immigration laws which might hereafter be passed for the purpose of depriving the Japanese of the right to land in Canada under the treaty. It would be the judgment of any tribunal that Canada was bound, bound hand and foot, by her strict contract. The contract rests to-day upon no higher basis on no firmer ground than did the agreement entered into between the Government of Japan and the Government of Canada through the good offices of the hon. member for Rouville. I have such confidence in my opinion on this matter, that I would like to hear it challenged.

My right hon. friend the Prime Minister is in his place, and at the conclusion of my remarks, I would like to have my opinion challenged by him. My hon. friend the Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty) is in his place also, and he might enlighten the House upon this question. If the Prime Minister, who, I know, is a gentleman of the widest legal knowledge as well as parliamentary experience can demonstrate to me that sub-section (a) of section 2 of the proposed Act will carry with it amendments which may be made in the future to the Immigration Act, I will withdraw all I have said on the subject. If he can convince me by any sound authority that he can offer to the House, that his own letters and the letters from the Government of Japan through the Consul General of Japan in Canada, have not binding effect and force as documents of interpretation which induced Japan to enter into this treaty, I am prepared to withdraw all I have said. So sound do I believe my opinion to be that I challenge contradiction upon this point. Then, why has the clause been inserted? The reason is plain, obvious. It is merely, as I said at the outset, to permit the people of British Columbia to think that the new Administration has kept within its own hands the power over immigration from Japan into this country which the former Government allowed to be exercised solely by the Government of Japan. The case of the United States is very different from that of Canada in this respect. In 1894, when the United States was arranging a treaty with Japan similar to this treaty, the United States particularly provided that the laws then in force or thereafter to be in force in regard to immigration should be applicable to the treaty. They recognized the difficulty that the law in force in the United States in 1894 might be changed, and they provided that the law then in force or thereafter to be in force should apply. We find that in 1907 the United States did change its immigration law—changed it very radically, by inserting a clause which gives the President of the United States power by proclamation to exclude such classes of immigration as he deemed advisable in certain given circumstances. In the following month, March, 1907, President Roosevelt issued a proclamation under the new Immigration Act of the United States excluding Japanese and Korean immigration from the continental United States. He had the power, and he exercised the power; and that same power is on the United States statute book to-day. It is a power that Japan knows as it has been exercised against Japan, and would be binding upon Japan in any sound interpretation of that treaty.

But our immigration law is not on the same footing as the United States Immigration Act. Our immigration laws to-day provide expressly for the exclusion of certain insane, criminal, idle, worthless classes of the community whom we do not want in Canada, no matter from what country they may come. These, I agree, could be excluded to-day under the Immigration Act of 1910. Further than that, the only other power of exclusion I know of is a discriminatory power. Under sections 37 and 38, in order to exclude the classes from coming, we should have to discriminate, but we cannot discriminate against Japanese any more than against British subjects—I think we agree upon that; we could not pass an Act to say that any resident of Great Britain or any class of residents in Great Britain shall not come to Canada.

Now, the Prime Minister has placed the question of Japanese immigration just upon the same plane as he has the case of British subjects. He says there will be no discrimination against Japan—practically that the Japanese shall be to all intents and purposes on the same plane as British subjects. That is the actual meaning of the words he used. If that be so, and if the Japanese can come to Canada, how are you going to stop them? Let any hon. member opposite, any of these hon. members who were so loud in their declamations against the Liberal Government in regard to Japanese immigration, rise in his place to-day or at any time and show how they propose to stop the immigration coming to Canada from Japan should it come. There is only one way of doing it, and that is under the agreement, the private agreement, the 'gentleman's agreement,' as it has been called, which I have referred to and which was negotiated by my hon. friend from Rouville (Mr. Lemieux). Is there anything more to it? Then, as I have said, why place that sub-section (a) of section 2 in this Act? It is only a gold brick; this is only flimflam legislation; it can only have one effect, and that is to cheat the people of British Columbia. You cannot prohibit the immigration of a single Japanese who can comply with the other requirements of our Act—who is sound of mind and body and otherwise not undesirable—you cannot prohibit a single man of them under the Immigration Act of 1910, and you cannot add to that Act by amendment or otherwise and still have a binding treaty arrangement. True, you can give a year's notice and denounce the treaty—the old treaty, I believe could be denounced within six months. But we do not enter into treaties to denounce them; we enter into treaties to maintain and hold them. This Government, in entering into this agreement with Japan, does it, I suppose, to have a binding arrangement for a long term of years, and I commend it in that regard.

I have no great objection to offer to the treaty itself or to the arrangement which has been made under it. I think that the arrangement made by the hon. member for Rouville was an excellent arrangement, and one that the Government not only will do well to continue, but which, under the circumstances, they must continue if they are going to exclude Japanese from this country. I agree with the hon. members for British Columbia that the immigration from Japan is not an immigration of which Canada has any great need. I look upon it as more or less undesirable. I do not share with these members to the full their view that there is a great peril on the coast of Canada, the yellow peril as it is called. I do not look upon it as a menace to Canada; but I would prefer that Japanese immigration be not only limited but stopped. I believe in a white British Columbia and a white Canada, but I realize the conditions under which we live. I realize the international relationships under which not only Canada but the Empire exists, and, having regard to existing national and international relationships, I believe that the Bill, in principle, is not objectionable and that the treaty ought to be affirmed. But I believe that the pernicious clause in the Bill, the flimflam clause as I called it before, is sub-section (a) of clause 2 and that clause should not appear there as its only effect will be to mislead in the first instance and to involve us in trouble in the second instance.

Mr. BURRELL: Would my hon. friend like to move that the clause be deleted from the Bill?

Mr. GUTHRIE: I believe it should be withdrawn, particularly in view of the correspondence, because if that correspondence means anything the Immigration Act, in relation to this treaty means nothing. I have not moved an amendment to that effect, but I think, myself, it should be withdrawn

Right Hon. R. L. BORDEN (Prime Minister): My hon. friend (Mr. Guthrie) has made some very strong statements about the effect of this resolution and he will pardon me if I do not go over them in detail, because I have answered nearly all of them before. He seems to take a rather curious position, however, as he considers that proviso (a) ought to be deleted, while at the same time he is prepared to support a motion that it should be extended.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I did not say it ought to be extended.

Mr. BORDEN: He is not in harmony with the hon. member for Edmonton in that regard?

Mr. GUTHRIE: I think the treaty should be affirmed.

Mr. BORDEN: It would be a little more satisfactory if we could understand exactly what the position of hon. gentlemen is or whether they have any common position in regard to this Bill. I thought my hon. friend rose to support the motion of the hon. member for Edmonton; now it appears that he did not rise to support that motion but to oppose it. The hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) is very particular about this proviso now. He was a member of a government which accepted the treaty of 1894 without any proviso, absolutely and without reserve, and now he considers that the policy which he then adopted and carried into effect was so absolutely wrong that we, in reserving effective control to the Government and Parliament of Canada, are not going far enough. My hon.

friend has come to a new condition of mind with a great deal of rapidity, but he has not made very clear to this House the reasons which induced him to take one view of the situation in 1905 and 1907 and a precisely opposite view to-day, when this treaty is under consideration. It would have been more satisfactory to have indicated the reasons, if there are any, for this remarkable change of front.

My right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition and my hon. friend from Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) attach all importance to a declaration which is to be anticipated from the Government of Japan as to the understanding consummated by the hon. member for Rouville and they attach much less importance to this proviso. In my previous remarks I conceded the value of the arrangement that has been made, but I also attach prime importance to the fact that the proviso in this treaty does give us, in the final analysis, control of the situation. The member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) takes an absolutely contrary view. He seems to attach no importance to the understanding and because he thinks that understanding is not of value, therefore he desires that the clause which we propose shall not only remain in the Bill but shall be extended along the lines he suggests.

There does not seem to be much common ground between the hon. member for Edmonton and the hon. member for Rouville or between the hon. member for Edmonton and the right hon. the leader of the Opposition. The member for Edmonton and the member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) have alluded to the importance of inserting a proviso that this treaty shall be subject to future amendments to the Immigration Act. In the first place, I would point out that nothing of that kind has been done in the United States. I do not say for a moment that that ought to be an absolute guide for us.

Mr. OLIVER: If I am not mistaken the hon. member read from some legislation of the United States the very provision which the hon. member for South Wellington quoted a moment ago.

Mr. BURRELL: Not in the last treaty. It was the treaty of 1894.

Mr. OLIVER: In some treaty.

Mr. BORDEN: In 1894. I had explained that the proviso in the treaty of 1894 had been eliminated in the treaty of 1911 between the United States and Japan, and that instead of that proviso there was a formal statement in the proclamation of the President of the United States, which was formally assented to by His Excellency the Japanese ambassador at Washington, and in which it was declared that the provisions of the treaty should be subject to the Immigration Act of 1907, I was calling the attention of the House to the fact that the published declaration so accepted by the Government of the United States made no reference to future legislation.

Mr. GUTHRIE: The United States Act of 1907 gives the President power to make a proclamation to exclude them.

Mr. BORDEN: The Act of 1907 gives the President of the United States power to make a proclamation in respect of certain persons having passports and the Act of 1910 of the Dominion of Canada, the perfect integrity and force of which is reserved by this Bill, gives to the Government of Canada powers at least as large as, and in my opinion, larger than those contained in the Immigration Act of the United States. Therefore, my hon. friends have no support for their arguments in the comparison of the declaration made by the United States with the proviso which we have inserted in this Bill.

Mr. CARVELL: Would my right hon. friend consider then that the statements contained in the correspondence between himself and the Japanese Consul would in any way restrict the powers given to the Government by the Immigration Act?

Mr. BORDEN: Certainly not. I consider that the correspondence does exactly what I have stated over and over again. It directs the attention of the Government of Japan to the Immigration Act of 1910, passed by this Parliament, and it points out to the Government of Japan, through the Consul General of Japan residing at Ottawa, that that legislation does not discriminate in favour of any country in the world, and that it is necessary to provide in connection with this treaty that it shall be subject to the Immigration Act of 1907, inasmush as Canada desires to maintain control over immigration, not only from Japan, but from every other country in the world.

Mr. CARVELL: Would my right hon. friend consider, in the face of that, that if the Parliament of Canada should pass discriminatory legislation, it would be a breach of contract with Japan?

Mr. BORDEN: I say to my hon. friend from Carleton, so far as that is concerned, that the correspondence leaves absolutely untouched the Immigration Act of Canada as applicable to Japan, and to every other country in the world.

Mr. CARVELL: What about the future?

Mr. BORDEN: I do not know that I can make it any plainer. Does my hon. friend think that the Immigration Act of 1910 does not contain sufficient safeguards?

I am not going over that argument again; I have read the clauses on which I rely, and which in my opinion contain as valuable and perfect safeguards for this purpose as can be found in any legislation of a similar nature throughout the world. But my hon. friends on the other side of the House have argued this question from first to last as if there was likely to be in the future a question of restricting the immigration of some particular nationality. My right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition disclaimed any such idea as that in the speech which he delivered upon the second reading of this Bill, wherein he pointed out, as I had pointed out before him, that the question is not a question of race or of nationality, but a question of economics, a question of industrial competition. I say that every difficulty that has ever been faced in the province of British Columbia in regard to this matter could be met and solved by the exercise of the powers contained in the Immigration Act, not in respect to persons of a particular race or of a particular nationality, but by the exercise of those provisions with regard to persons of a certain class or occupation. The treaty between the United States and Japan in 1894, reserved power to the Government of the United States to deal not with Japanese subjects as a body, or as a race or as a nationality, but with labourers from Japan. The same purpose was afterwards set out in the Order in Council passed in 1895 by the Government of Canada, which provided for restricting the immigration of labourers and artisans from Japan into Canada. That is the whole question, the question of industrial competition. I would like to read what the leader of the Opposition said in regard to that, and if I remember his language correctly, I concur entirely in the views he then expressed:

> I am well aware of the nature of the prevailing opinion in British Columbia in this regard, and I do not find fault with it. In British Columbia, in California, in Australia, in South Africa, wherever Asiatic labourers come in contact with labourers of European descent—there has always been friction, and this friction will be unavoidable so long as the standard of living as between European and Asiatic labourers is not brought to an approximately common level. The conditions of living to which the Asiatic labourer has been accustomed for centuries are such that he can afford to live upon a wage altogether out of proportion to that which is necessary to the European labourer, and that is the reason why there has always been friction as between them.

Every hon. gentleman in this House who has made any study of the question will concur in the view that the estimate of the right hon. gentleman as to the causes of the difficulties which have prevailed in the past, particularly in the province of British Columbia, is a just and true estimate.

Now, my hon. friend the member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) desires to have this statute amended by a proviso that it shall be subject to any future Acts of provincial legislatures. I think my hon. friend upon reflection will come to the conclusion that it would be absolutely impossible for us to negotiate any such treaty as this with a proviso of that character attached to it. We are to obtain certain rights for our citizens entering Japan; we are to obtain certain rights of commerce, we are to obtain certain rights for our ships entering the ports of Japan, and in return for that we agree that the citizens of Japan may acquire corresponding rights in this country. It would be quite impossible for us to expect the Government of Japan, or the government of any country, to enter into a stipulation, that the provisions of the treaty might be modified from time to time in the future by Acts of provincial legislatures. After very careful examination, I do not see anything in this treaty which could operate to the detriment of the citizens of this country if it should go into effect. Some hon. gentlemen on the other side have brought it as a matter of reproach against us that a certain communication from the Secretary of State for the Colonies was not communicated to the Government of Saskatchewan. I would like to say that hon. gentlemen are entirely mistaken in that regard. That communication was transmitted ipsissimis verbis to the Prime Minister of the province of Saskatchewan, and he had full knowledge and communication of its subject matter, and of the suggestions of the Secretary of State for the Colonies as to a possible remedy without any discrimination against persons of any race or of any nationality.

Under these circumstances, Mr. Speaker, there seems no reason whatever for the amendment which my hon. friend from Edmonton has proposed, and I cannot accept it. It would be out of keeping, particularly the latter portion of it, with what we might expect to receive the assent of the Government of Japan. Further than that it must be borne in mind that the citizens of Japan coming to Canada under the terms of this treaty must carry on any business or enterprise in which they desire to engage in Canada, conformably to the laws of this country, and not otherwise. In these circumstances I venture to think that the House would not be justified in accepting the amendment, and that it should be rejected.

Mr. F. B. CARVELL (Carleton, N.B.): It is not my intention to address the House at any length, because I discussed the question very thoroughly in the committee stage last evening. I merely want to direct the attention of the House very briefly to the important question put to the right hon. the Prime Minister, by the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) a question which in my judgment he has failed to answer. As he has failed to answer it, I wish to repropound the question to the hon. the Minister of Justice, and I am satisfied he will not skate round it, but will give a real answer not only to the members of the Opposition, but to the members from British Columbia in respect to the proposition we are putting up on this side of the House. I may be guilty of tedious repetition in restating our contention, but I will take a chance of being called to order for transgressing the rules, and my reason for doing so is that this is a matter of supreme importance to the people of Canada and to the people of British Columbia. The proposition is that, under the terms of clause (a), section 2, we are binding ourselves to the provisions of the present Immigration Act and, by the correspondence which has taken place between the Prime Minister and the Japanese Government, we are in honour, if not legally, precluded from going any farther than the terms of the present Immigration Act. The terms of the present Immigration Act only provide that you can restrict a certain number of prohibitive classes from any country whatever—they may be idiots, criminals or lewd characters—but if you can prevent a Japanese coming in here on these conditions you can prevent an Englishman. With these exceptions under the Immigration Act, you are bound to treat all classes of persons alike, unless you can change your regulations under the provisions of sections 37 and 38. The Prime Minister seemed to believe that under the provisions of sections 37 and 38 you will not discriminate against the Japanese. That is the point that my right hon. friend was skating around. My right hon. friend has skated around the real question at issue. He has not answered the question. He has not stated whether, in his judgment, he would have the right to pass an amendment to the Immigration Act and make it apply to Japan. There is no doubt that he would have the right to make it apply to China, to France and to any other country in the world except Britain. I except Britain because, under the law, we would not be able to discriminate against that country. But, we tie our hands; under this agreement and the corespondence we are precluded from passing any discriminatory legislation or adopting any discriminatory regulation in so far as Japan is concerned. On this side of the House we say that is not proper legislation. We say that you had better leave it out entirely, leave our hands free and unfettered, and leave us in a position to deal with this matter de novo. You tie our hands so that should we propose to make an amendment to the Immigration Act, in order to deal with every person on a parity, we cannot apply it to Japan. To my mind that is the real sting in the whole legislation and that is the sting that we are trying to bring to the attention of hon. members from British Columbia. That is the sting that hon. members from British Columbia will not answer and it is the sting that the hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Burrell) and those around him, absolutely refuse to answer.

Mr. BURRELL: I would ask my hon. friend to state what the point is.

Mr. CARVELL: The point is that we are binding ourselves hand and foot to the provisions of the present Immigration Act which prevents us from adopting discriminatory legislation against Japan for all time, or as long as this treaty lasts, because we cannot go any farther than we have the right to go under the present Immigration Act. Under the provisions of the Immigration Act, and the correspondence between the Prime Minister and the Japanese authorities, we are precluded from passing any amendment or regulation stronger than we have at the present time. That brings us back again to what has been stated before. If I am right, and if my hon. friend from South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie), who is a good lawyer and who has put this matter in such plain language as to call for an answer, is right, then we are thrown back entirely on the gentleman's agreement made by my hon. friend from Rouville (Mr. Lemieux), the gentleman's agreement which was condemned in such unmeasured terms by the right hon. Prime Minister himself in 1908. He went so far as to move an amendment and to insist upon a vote upon it. He is on record in 1908 and I have the terms of his amendment here. Perhaps it would not do any harm to read the amendment again. Here are the concluding words of the amendment proposed by the right hon. gentleman in 1908:

> That this House, while expressing its profound appreciation of the friendly intentions and courteous assurances of the Japanese Government, and while declaring its sincere desire for the most cordial relations with the Japanese people, desires nevertheless to record its strong protest against a policy under which our wage-earning population cannot be protected from destructive invading competition except by entreating the forbearance and aid of a foreign government.

That was the attitude of my right hon. friend in 1908, that was the attitude of his supporters from British Columbia in 1908 and that was the attitude of the whole of them down to the 21st September, 1911. Now they turn around and say: We were all wrong then; the gentleman's agreement is the only protection we have and it is all we want. They are admitting that we were right and that therefore the provision they are putting in this Bill is only a gold brick. They admit that there is no protection outside of this gentleman's agreement. That is the point, and before this House should be called upon to vote upon such an important international matter as this, a matter fraught with such important consequences to the white people of British Columbia, a matter, as the hon. member for Vancouver (Mr. Stevens), said, of 800,000,000 people as against 350,000, it is the duty of the hon. Minister of Justice to give us his legal opinion as to the effect of this legislation.

Mr. STEVENS: If this clause is so objectionable and so absolutely worthless, why does not the hon. gentleman move that it be deleted from the Bill?

Mr. CARVELL: I said yesterday afternoon that I did not see any difference whether it was deleted or not. I would just as soon see the clause deleted from the Bill as to see it pass in its present shape. I would prefer, for the sake of greater security, to have it left in, provided the amendment is adopted, but if the Bill goes through without this amendment, I would rather see the clause deleted entirely.

Hon. H. S. BELAND (Beauce): Mr Speaker, I fully realize that the interpretation of a treaty is very dangerous ground for a layman to venture upon, but I have been following this debate very closely for the last two days and I have, in particular, listened very attentively to the different explanations furnished by the right hon. Prime Minister himself. I am free to admit that I am not any farther advanced in the way of information. I understand that this treaty has two different aspects, the commercial and the immigration aspect. As to the commercial aspect, it appears that the unanimous consensus of the House is that it is not important. Hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House, particularly my hon. friend the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Burrell), have so stated. The important feature of this Bill, and of the treaty, is the immigration feature. I would like to have some more light upon it and I may be pardoned for asking to be further enlightened in that regard. Let us suppose for a moment that we do not ratify the treaty by this Bill, and what is the situation in Canada regarding the control of Japanese immigration? It is this: the Canadian Government is in a position to stop entirely Japanese immigration by resorting to clauses 37 and 38 of the Immigration Act. That is admitted by the Government. In spite of the agreement that has been consummated by my hon. friend from Rouville (Mr. Lemieux), that is admitted. Let us suppose that we ratify the treaty by adopting this Bill. We cannot read the Bill or the treaty except in the light of the correspondence that has been exchanged between the Prime Minister of Canada and the Consul General of Japan. I refer to a new feature of this discussion which was introduced by the Prime Minister yesterday and to-day, regarding the industrial side of the question. I read from the words of the right hon. gentleman:

Therefore it would not be a question of excluding a particular race.

Right here, my hon. friend from Vancouver (Mr. Stevens) called my attention and the attention of gentlemen on this side of the House to the word 'race' in clause 38. He undoubtedly thought he was making a very strong point, and his point has been discarded by the Prime Minister——

Mr. STEVENS: I did not make any argument on the word 'race.' I drew the attention of hon. gentlemen opposite to the words 'occupation and destination' which followed the word 'race,' as the hon. gentleman will see if he will read my remarks.

Mr. BELAND: I was present, and I remember that the hon. member paused at the word 'race' in clause 38. At all events the Prime Minister discussed this race question and he said:

Therefore it would not be a question of excluding a particular race but of excluding persons of a particular occupation.

Later on he said:

It was a question of the immigration of labourers and artisans; it was not a question of the immigration of Japanese subjects.

If this means anything, it means that the Prime Minister might adopt a regulation in virtue of the Immigration Act of 1910, by which Japanese labourers and artisans would be excluded from Canada. This is what the Prime Minister, writing to His Excellency the Consul General of Japan, says:

The Imperial Japanese Government are doubtless aware, as the fact is, that the Immigration Act applies to the immigration of aliens into Canada from all countries, including the British Empire itself, and makes no discrimination in favour of any country.

I call the attention of the House to the following words in the letter of the Prime Minister to the Japanese Consul General:

It is not perceived, therefore, that your Government will have any objection to the embodiment in the enclosed draft Act of Parliament of the proviso which has already been agreed to in the case of the United States.

If the right hon. the Prime Minister had said in his letter to the representative of Japan: you will not have any objection though we propose to exclude Japanese labourers and artisans, would any gentleman in this House believe that the representative of Japan would have answered as he did answer:

Having reported the matter at once to my Government, I am now in receipt of a reply stating that the Imperial Government has no objection to the proposed Bill and that they feel assured that the Immigration Act of Canada of 1910, being applicable as stated in your note to the immigration of aliens into the Dominion of Canada from all countries including the British Empire itself, no discrimination will be made against Japanese subjects in this respect.

If the Prime Minister had written to the Japanese consul asking if he would have objection to the proposal to exclude Japanese labourers and artisans, of course we all knew the Consul General of Japan would have answered: yes, we have the greatest objection in the world to a proviso being put in the treaty, by which you would exclude Japanese labourers and artisans. And so I say, Mr. Speaker, that the correspondence exchanged between the Prime Minister of Canada and the representative of Japan is binding upon us. Is the Government ready to say that they could exclude Japanese artisans and labourers in the future? Of course they will not and cannot say that. In my opinion, as a layman, this correspondence is as important as the treaty itself.

We all realize that there is a political side to this. Japanese immigration has been made a political football in British Columbia. It is not overstating it to say that the hon. gentlemen who represent the seven ridings in British Columbia in this House have been elected on that anti-Japanese ticket, and with the understanding that the Conservative Government, if it came to power, would entirely abolish Japanese immigration into Canada. That, without doubt, was the pledge made during the election. And what is the position taken by hon. gentlemen from British Columbia to-day? They have been undoubtedly pressing upon the Prime Minister to include in this treaty such a proviso as we have in clause 2, and of course when the treaty would be ratified these gentlemen would go back to British Columbia with a feather in their cap and they would say: the Liberal Government was no good; they never dared stop Japanese immigration; we have done it; we have said in our Bill ratifying the Japanese treaty that the Immigration Act will apply. How can the Immigration Act apply in face of this correspondence exchanged between the Prime Minister and the Japanese consul? It cannot apply at all and I say again: wipe out the state agreement; wipe out the Bill when it is ratified; and there is left to this country the Immigration Act to which you can resort and by which you can prevent Japanese immigration, because you are permitted under that Act to discriminate. After this treaty is ratified the Government is not permitted to discriminate, and the situation in regard to Japanese immigration will be worse than it is under the agreement of my hon. friend from Rouville What is the situation to-day? What has it been for the last six or seven years? In accordance with an agreement brought about by my hon. friend from Rouville, when he went to Japan, Japanese immigration is restricted to a very small number annum. I do not know what the number is, as the agreement is confidential, but I know that the number is small. That agreement has been strictly adhered to, has been praised by the right hon. the Prime Minister, by my hon. friend from Vancouver (Mr. Stevens), and, I understand, by every hon. member. If this agreement is satisfactory, why let it be understood or spread broadcast that this Government might adopt some very stringent measures regarding Japanese immigration? Is not Japan an ally of Great Britain? Is there a gentleman in this House or in Canada to-day who would think that any Canadian Government would go any further in order to improve upon the situation which we have to-day? No government would do so for obvious reasons.

This correspondence is binding upon a Canadian Government whether Conservative or Liberal. We cannot go back upon it. We cannot pass any regulations that would discriminate. Call it a race regulation, a labour regulation or an artizan regulation, you cannot pass it to exclude the Japanese, unless you refuse to adhere to the correspondence exhanged between the Prime Minister and the Consul General of Japan. If the treaty is not important from a commercial point of view, we should not bother very much about ratifying it. The immigration situation is not improved by it at all. I am not personally concerned in this question, as I am not a member from British Columbia; I am purely a Canadian. I shall not express any opinion regarding the desirability of having Japanese immigration. I believe that, when it is restricted as it is to-day, it cannot interfere with the national development of this country. I say, however, that the only policy, which you can adopt in connection with Japanese immigration is a policy of conciliation. That is the policy which has been resorted to in the past by the late Government. It is the policy which has been adopted to-day by the present Government; but, for political reasons, for the advancement of the Conservative cause in British Columbia, it has been deemed necessary to pass a treaty in which a clause is incorporated, which is a sham clause, a gold brick, a make believe in order to keep British Columbia in line.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, I want to participate in the danger to which my hon. friend from Beauce (Mr. Beland) felt himself exposed in venturing to interfere in a discussion which has been carried on entirely by learned gentlemen; but it is necessary to take some risks in this world, and I am prepared to risk offence in speaking on this subject, even although I am a layman in regard to the matter. My hon. friend appeared to me to express some surprise that hon. gentlemen opposite occupy a different position on this subject from that which they occupied three years ago. A transformation of that kind on the part of hon. gentlemen opposite does not now create any surprise in me. It is a transformation which has taken place too frequently any longer to excite surprise, at least amongst observant individuals. I do not know any question on which hon. gentlemen opposite occupy the same position that they did three years ago. I pointed out the other day that, even on the tariff question, they are taking up such positions that I have to take their side in an argument. It is true that, in regard to the tariff, I saw an endeavour to keep consistent in the debates on that subject on the part of my hon. friend the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Burrell) the other night. He was good enough to draw my attention to the fact that Japan is a protectionist country. I was not unaware of the fact. Some days before my hon. friend gave me that information, I had been reading a very carefully written article showing what a failure protection had been in Japan. I should be out of order if I went further into that subject at this time; but perhaps, on the agricultural Bill or on the budget, I may be able to draw swords with my hon. friend on the protectionist tendency of Japan. I hope, as a good Englishman, that my hon. friend will not go to Asia for a good many of his ideals. British ideals suit me very well; and I am not sure, with all my lack of Imperialistic sentiment, that I am not a better Englishman upon this point than my hon. friend the Minister of Agriculture. I can quite understand Japan being a protectionist country. The Japanese are a very alert people; numbers of them have been in the United States, and they have copied the United States as Canada did, on matters of tariff, but they have not observed so far that the United States is leaving tariff. I think Canadians are very much quicker on the matter, and that you will see a rapid change in Canada in a few years; and I have no doubt that in time to come the Japanese will learn what is going on in the younger nations of the world on this particular matter.

I support the amendment of my hon. friend from Edmonton. That amendment simply retains to Canada the power to deal with what may be a very exceptional state of affairs. I understand that is the import and intention of the amendment.

Mr. OLIVER: And emergency.

Mr. CLARK: I am afraid that, if I use that word, I shall be called to order. No one, who has regard to the events that happened on the Pacific coast a few years ago, would feel safe to get up in this House and say that an exceptional state of affairs might not arise. A good many years after I came to this country, a riot took place in the streets of Vancouver, and there was actual bloodshed between some Orientals and the Anglo-Saxons of that city. With that fact in mind, and with the situation in the Orient in mind, no thoughtful person would say that such a state of affairs might not arise in which it would be necessary for Canada to have the power to modify the immigration laws of this country; and, as I understand it, the amendment simply keeps for Canada the power to deal with such a state of affairs if it should arise. There is no one in this House more satisfied than I am to learn that the Japanese Government most loyally carried out the arrangement which was made by my hon. friend from Rouville. But the Japanese Government might not always have the power to restrain their own people. I do not know much about that side of the case, but it is conceivable to any one of us who reflects upon the subject that an exceptional state of affairs might arise. Therefore, the amendment to retain within the power of Canada the elementary power to deal with that state of affairs is one which meets with my approbation and which I shall support.

I think I shall have the consensus of opinion of hon. members of this House on both sides, when I say that in matters of foreign policy as a general principle, and so far as we can go without giving away vital principles, there ought to be no party divisions in this House. That is the general principle to which most of us will accede. And the reason is obvious. In our domestic affairs, we may differ and agree again without very dire results following. We can patch up our domestic difficulties. But in the case of a breakdown in foreign policy, war is the result; and General Sherman probably stated what was true—he most certainly stated what he knew—when he declared that 'War is hell.' Now, it is for this reason, I repeat we ought to be most careful how we allow questions of foreign policy to become questions that divide us in a partisan sense in this Chamber or in this Parliament. I have very strong reason for wishing that hon. gentlemen opposite had, within the last few years, given due importance to what I consider is this important principle. One of the respects is, that, if they had done so this session of Parliament would now have been over—and we should have done the work that was allotted to this session. If my hon. friends had stayed with their opinions upon the important question of defence, we should not have been four months in trying to persuade them that what they said three years ago was greater wisdom than what they are saying now. And, certainly, if they had said three years ago on this Japanese question what they are saying now, I do not think there would have been quite so long a debate upon this Japanese treaty. I do not think it can be successfully contradicted that in the province of British Columbia in the election of 1908, the Tory party ran their election upon the principle of the total exclusion of Asiatics. That cannot be contradicted by any man who has regard for the facts.

Mr. CARVELL: And the election of 1911 as well.

Mr. CLARK: In 1911, the question did not cut quite so large a figure, so far as my information goes. But in 1908, the Tory party of British Columbia ran upon the principle—and were understood by the people to run upon the principle—of the total exclusion of Asiatics. I do not hear anyone contradict that statement.

Mr. PUGSLEY: It is true.

Mr. CLARK: If they admit the truth of it, I think it would have been to the credit of the party opposite for more than one to get up in their places and say that when one is in office one has a greater sense of responsibility than when one is out of office; and that it had become so necessary to 'beat Laurier' that whatever stick they used at that time did not much matter to hon. gentlemen opposite. During the election of 1908, I passed through the town of Cranbrook, and saw there one of the most notable pieces of election paraphernalia that I ever remember—a white sheet with black letters, and on it I read, 'Vote for Borden, Goodeve and a white British Columbia'. That was laying down a pretty absolute line of policy. I do not give my right hon. friend the Prime Minister any blame for that. He had a very busy time, as he always has in a general election; he could not keep track of his British Columbia friends. I do not charge him with taking that course. The fact is that when his course was out of agreement with that of his followers in British Columbia, they simply altered his telegrams to suit their own ideas. So I do not say he knew anything about the streamer on the streets of Cranbrook. It was there, however, for I saw it and read it.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What is the matter with that principle?

Mr. CLARK: My hon. friend himself had better answer that, because he has departed from it now.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I cannot see that.

Mr. STEVENS: It is the same principle to-day.

Mr. CLARK: If a Tory principle is something you are never going to put in practice, if it is a mere pious opinion, as I have said, that is all right. But what I object to in my hon. friend from Portage la Prairie (Mr. Meighen) as I told the House the other day, is that he has too many pious opinions. This is another one. I explained to the House that a pious opinion is one that you work out with great difficulty in theory and never put in practice. The hon. member evidently has principles, but why does not he practise his principles? It is like a man preaching honesty, and stealing all the time. I have no objection to his principles, it is his practice that hurts me. Well, that was the streamer, that was the principle on which the election was fought. I do not wish to dwell too much at length upon the electioneering devices of my opponents. I quite recognize that a virile people, a strong people, will have the defects of their qualities, and whether they go into building a navy or winning an election, they will do it in vigorous style for the most part. They may forget their virility at certain times, but there is no fear but that in the long run they will come back to the practise of virile methods. In a domestic matter, I should have regarded such devices as I have described with less severity, but in a matter of foreign policy, though we may describe it as a defect of a virile people, the sooner we get rid of these defects the better. I do not think anything more reckless was ever done by a political party than was done in the election of 1908 by the Tory party of British Columbia. It was not only a reckless policy, it was a hypocritical policy; for, on a subsequent visit to British Columbia, not long after the election, I was riding through the streets of Victoria in an automobile which belonged to a friend of mine, and drew my friend's attention to the fact that there was a Chinaman sitting cross-legged upon a very nice hedge bordering a good looking dwelling. And I said: 'You have not got that white British Columbia.' 'No,' he said, 'that is the house of the hon. member for Victoria.' I understand he was one of those who at that time stood for a 'white British Columbia,' and the next time I saw where he was in regard to 'a white British Columbia' he had a full-grown Chinaman trimming the hedge around his house. It was not only a reckless but a hypocritical campaign. I should have been ashamed to be elected under a streamer the doctrine emblazoned upon which I departed from in the conduct of my private affairs. A more reckless and hypocritical campaign was never carried on.

The present attitude of the party opposite is probably the most complimentary attitude to a political opponent of which I have any recollection. On general principles, I think a government deserves credit when it follows the foreign policy of its predecessor, although that predecessor was of an opposite political colour. I remember very well a speech in which Sir Edward Grey claimed great credit because he was able to mention a number of foreign engagements entered into by Lord Lansdowne which he had been able to continue, and the first one, according to my recollection, was the Anglo-Japanese Alliance. I desire to give my right hon. friend and his party, so far as they support him, credit for following out the policy of his predecessors in office and recognizing that it was a wise policy, but the extent to which they deem it is a wise policy now is the extent of their condemnation of political and party tactics which I have already described as reckless and hypocritical, and I must say that the present attitude of the party opposite is paying a great compliment to my hon. friend from Rouville; it is the highest compliment they could possibly pay to him, because they admit that all the criticisms they passed on him in years that have gone were for political purposes, that the arrangement he made was a most statesmanlike arrangement and that the best thing that they could do when they came into office was to continue that arrangement exactly as he made it.

With regard to the amendment, I shall vote for it, because I quite realize that the conditions upon the coast are exceptional. They might at any moment prove more exceptional. Hon. gentlemen from British Columbia know that what I am saying is the truth and in accordance with the belief of the great majority of the inhabitants of their province; and, after all, the first duty of the Parliament of Canada is to interpret and carry out, so far as we can, the sentiments of our own people. On this ground, with a clear conscience I shall give a vote for the amendment, which, as I say, simply retains for Canada the power to deal with questions that may arise at any moment and give rise to very serious consequences, and which, I understand, we are giving away the right to deal with.

Mr. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Portage la Prairie): The course of the Opposition in the matter of the present Bill has been a very difficult one for me, at least, to follow. The right hon. the leader of the Opposition commenced his remarks on the 2nd of April with the following assurance:

> We have no intention on this side of the House of offering any opposition to the ratification of the treaty which is now sought by the Government, if certain information which we hope to have as the discussion proceeds is on the line we expect.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Hear, hear.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That was the official announcement of the right hon. the leader of the Opposition, and that he now affirms by his welcome 'hear, hear.' Then at the close of his remarks he gives expression to these words:

> The method which has been adopted of having with such a government as the Japanese Government an understanding on mutual good faith, which has been carried out for five years, is certainly the best solution of that problem and now that we have these explanations on the part of my right hon. friend I think there is no reason why we should refuse our assent to the treaty.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Hear, hear.

Mr. MEIGHEN (reading):

> The treaty does not go very far and I shall ask later on why the the commercial part of it has not been made applicable to Canada. So far as it goes we will be quite happy to give it our sanction.

Put the two statements together and I affirm and invite correction if I am wrong that the Opposition officially and in unqualified language has approved of the Bill so far as it goes. Then, as the debate proceeded, members from various constituencies began, from different directions, to make attacks on the Bill, they attacked it from various point of views. For the most part those attacks ran up against one another, the arrows shot by one struck another either in front or behind, with the result that I found it very difficult to know what had to be met in supporting the Bill. After tracing the Opposition along, catching up to it here and there and following it around two or three circles, I find that I am not yet very well able to know what the Opposition policy is. All criticism has been forsaken this afternoon except such as pertained to the efficacy of sub-clause (a) of section 2 of the Bill, as to whether or not we have strengthened or weakened our position by retaining our rights under the present immigration law of Canada in sub-clause (a), read in the light, as hon. gentlemen opposite insist, of the correspondence between the Prime Minister and the Consul General of Japan. Where the Opposition stand on that question is as much a mystery to me now as it ever was. It is contended in language of extreme ingenuity by the hon. member for Pictou and of equal vigour, at all events, by the hon. member for Carleton, that the whole effect of sub-clause (a) of section 2 is lost, that, were there no correspondence, sub-clause (a) might have some effect, we might be still clothed with the powers with which we were clothed under our Immigration Act; but by virtue of two letters, they say, we have no results at all and nothing can go from sub-clause (a) because it is repealed by the correspondence. But no sooner have they taken up that attitude than the hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) takes a different one. He says: I would like to preserve sub-clause (a) as it is. I do not think it is at all deleted by the correspondence, the correspondence is quite strong enough to hang to sub-clause (a) but I would add to sub-clause (a) a provision that not only shall we retain our protection under the Immigration Act but any further protection we choose to enforce by amendments to that Act. It is clear to any understanding, it must be abundantly clear to the hon. member for Red Deer, that if the correspondence has the effect of utterly severing us from any result we might obtain from sub-clause (a), it will be equally efficacious in surrendering the whole result of the clause as amended. Take the clause as it is and as amended the effect of the correspondence, good, bad or indifferent, is just the same. If the correspondence has the effect of obliterating sub-clause (a) as it is, it has just as clearly the effect of obliterating sub-clause (a) as amended. That must be the position of the hon. member for Edmonton and the hon. member for Red Deer, who alone of all the hon. gentlemen opposite has had the hardihood to support the amendment. The legal gentlemen on the opposition side must be all askew; they consider the correspondence quite powerless as to its effect on the sub-clause. So we have the three positions; one by the right hon the leader of the Opposition that the Bill, so far as it goes, is good and deserving of the affirmation of members on both sides of the House, unqualifiedly good so far as it goes. We have the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Carvell) and the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) asserting that the second clause, the main clause of the Bill, is now destroyed by the correspondence, is a flim-flam, a sham and a gold brick, not deserving of the affirmation of any member on either side of the House. Then we have the position taken by the hon. member for Edmonton and the hon. member for Red Deer who say that they quite separate themselves from both branches of their colleagues and would take the Bill as it is; only they would provide that hereafter we may, at any time we like, repeal the treaty by amending our Immigration Act.

Mr. OLIVER: Will the hon. gentleman just repeat that that is his understanding of the facts of the case—that an amendment of the Immigration Act would practically repeal the treaty?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The Immigration Act undoubtedly could be amended so as to repeal the treaty, so far as the immigration clauses go. That is my judgment. But the Immigration Act as it stands to-day is sufficient and ample to protect this country by virtue of the powers conferred on the Governor in Council to make regulations. The Immigration Act as it stands to-day needs no amendment whatever to protect this country in matters of immigration. At the moment this treaty was negotiated, the Immigration Act, as it stood, contained in clauses 37 and 38 ample safeguards for the security of this country in the event of any of the contingencies which seem to be feared by the hon. member for Edmonton and the hon. member for Red Deer. Those clauses are as clear as day, undiscriminatory in any sense against the subjects of any country. They were designed with the view of enabling the Parliament of Canada, as represented by the Governor in Council, to frame regulations based on the considerations of our national development, on internal considerations, and are such as will protect us against what we conceive to be injurious immigration.

Mr. KNOWLES: If, under clause 38 of the Immigration Act, the Government were to make regulations discriminating against the entrance of Japanese, would that be an infraction of the treaty?

Mr. MEIGHEN: What I say is that the Government can make regulations after the passing of this Act, and just as powerful regulations, as they could before the passing of the Act.

Mr. MACDONALD: Against the Japanese particularly?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Any regulations they choose to make in virtue of section 38, from considerations that arise out of the internal affairs of Canada.

Mr. KNOWLES: My hon. friend does not seem to understand my question.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I understand it thoroughly.

Mr. KNOWLES: I will repeat it. If the Government should see fit to make regulations under clause 38, which would discriminate against the entrance of Japanese into British Columbia, would such regulations be an infraction of the treaty?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Whatever regulations the Government choose to make, from the considerations and general principles laid down in the Immigration Act, they could still make. The hon. gentleman might interpret them as discriminatory, or he might not; I am not the judge of how he would interpret them. But certain principles are laid down in that clause, and so long as the Government has regard to those principles they can make any regulations they like, and they are just as well equipped with the power now, as they were before the passing of the Act. The correspondence does not say that notwithstanding anything in the Act there shall be no discrimination; the correspondence would read that way if hon. gentlemen opposite were right. The correspondence reads this way: That by virtue of the provisions of that Act, inasmuch as those provisions themselves are not discriminatory, we have no objection to that Act, and we have no objection to be bound by it.

Mr. OLIVER: Does my hon. friend assert that the only purpose and intent of that provision is that there shall be discrimination?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I certainly did not so assert. I have no difficulty in answering hon. gentlemen opposite; the real difficulty is that I cannot answer to suit the various sections of hon. gentlemen opposite.

Mr. KNOWLES: I think this is the first time I have asked the hon. gentleman a question in this Parliament. I do not think he has fully understood my question. Suppose that the Government were to pass a regulation by Order in Council under clause 38 of the Immigration Act, prohibiting the coming of Japanese into British Columbia, which they have undoubtedly the power to do, either temporarily or permanently, under the Immigration Act, would that be an infraction of this treaty?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The Government of Canada after the passing of this Act has just as much power to make any regulation provided by the Immigration Act as they have to-day.

Mr. KNOWLES: Can they exclude Japanese?

Mr. MEIGHEN: What we are discussing is this point, if there is any point: whether or not we are now disrobing ourselves of the protection we had before. I answer, no; and if we are not, why should I stand here and answer interminable questions that do not affect the matter in the least? So long as the Act is not affected, so long as the Act stands supreme, unabbreviated and unimpaired, we are not concerned. The powers of the Government under that Act stand as they stood before; the correspondence in no way abbreviates that power, and that ends discussion on that point. Hon. gentlemen opposite have abandoned everything else in respect to the treaty. It might be well for the hon. member for Moosejaw to ask the hon. member for Edmonton a few questions. The first question the hon. member for Edmonton would ask him would be: you who are my colleague and admirer from Moosejaw, argue that sub-clause (a) of clause 2:

> Nothing in the said treaty or in this Act shall be deemed to repeal or affect any of the provisions of the Immigration Act.

—means nothing, inasmuch as the correspondence has the effect of repealing it.

Mr. KNOWLES: No.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. member for Moosejaw does not say that. That doctrine is confined to the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald), and the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Carvell).

Mr. KNOWLES: I want to explain my position. My hon. friend says that I do not take that position. What I say is that in my speech of an hour and a half yesterday I never referred to the correspondence. He is confusing me with someone else.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Has my hon. friend read the correspondence?

Mr. KNOWLES: Several times; have you?

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is why you do not refer to it. The hon. members for Pictou, South Wellington, and Carleton, New Brunswick, hang their whole case on that argument. They say we might just as well wipe out sub-clause (a), because all the protection we had in the Immigration Act is repealed by the correspondence. Let the hon. member for Edmonton ask those gentlemen, and tell me what on earth can be the good of his amendment which contains sub-clause (a) as it is to-day. He says it shall not only be saved, but that certain corrections which we may make in the Immigration Act shall be saved as well.

Now, I am anxious to get other business before the House. Legislation almost ad lib stands still for consideration, and hon. gentlemen opposite would do a great service to the House, especially in the matter of expediency, if, before making attacks in their disorganized state on legislation, they would get together. In that way the supporters of the Government, or those who believe in the Government Bill, would be better able to meet their attacks. It is utterly impossible to ascertain the views of hon. gentlemen opposite as a whole. The hon. member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley), for a time, seemed to think that our coastwise trade regulations were surrendered by this Bill. The right hon. leader of the Opposition, for a time, was afraid that we were not getting a square deal in trade matters—that, under the Bill, we were going to be subjected to discrimination at the hands of Japan in matters of trade. Both of these ideas were clearly dispelled and now the three sections of objectors stand upon a different plane, on different horns of the dilemma, and take positions that are mutually antagonistic.

Mr. D. D. McKENZIE (North Cape Breton): The hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat (Mr. Meighen) seems to think that there is a great difference of opinion on this side of the House in respect to the question under discussion. He wanted to know where we stood, what our contentions were. I think that my hon. friend will find that, if any opinion is asked on this side of the House in the regular way of a vote, there will be no division at all in our ranks, but that, as usual, we will stand behind our leader on this question and support the amendment that is presented to us. No person on this side of the House has expressed the opinion that we should vote against the Bill in its entirety, or against the schedule attached to it in its entirety, but we have some proposals to make in respect to the Bill and to the schedule and, if the right hon. the leader of the Government will accept them, or any part of them, we think that both the Bill and the agreement will be all the better as a result. The great reason for discussion on this side of the House, if the hon. member for Portage la Prairie wants to know, is that we dislike to see the Government and their supporters, travelling under false colours, we dislike to see them trying to run with the hare and hunt with the hounds on this question. They are accepting this treaty in its entirety and practically without any reservation whatever from the Government of Japan, whereas, on the other hand, they are holding out to the people of British Columbia the idea that they are giving them certain reservations, certain protection, which, in fact, they are not giving them. That, as clearly as I can put it, is the position and that is the basis of the discussion that has taken place from this side of the House. It is peculiar to notice that, in the formation of this treaty and in its piloting through the House, hon. gentlemen on the other side, and particularly the right hon. the leader, is following the trail blazed by the United States in dealing with Japan. In 1894, the Government of the United States put in their treaty, practically word for word, the amendment which my hon. friend from Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) is pressing to-day. It was put in the treaty, not in the Act. The right hon. the leader of the Government to-day says: I will not put any terms of restriction in the treaty, but I will put them in the Bill. I submit to you, Mr. Speaker, and to hon. gentlemen opposite that it does not make any difference whatever to the general effect of the stipulations whether they are in the Bill or in the treaty; they have the same effect. What were the terms contained in the American treaty of 1894? They will be found on page 7117 of 'Hansard,' in a speech of the right hon. gentleman who leads the Government. They are:

> It is however understood that the stipulations contained in this and the preceding article shall in no way affect the laws, ordinances and regulations in regard to trade, immigration, or labourers, police and public securities which are in force or which may hereafter be enacted in either of the two countries.

That leaves a free hand for any enactment that may be made in the United States at any time after the passing of the Act. My hon. friend from Edmonton wants us to have the same power and authority as that which was reserved to itself by the Government of the United States. The Conservative Government, in 1895, wanted the same condition in the treaty of 1894 when they were called upon to ratify it. The terms which they wanted are set out in the speech delivered by the right hon. the Prime Minister on the 2nd of April, and which will be found at page 7118 of 'Hansard.' The terms which the Conservative Government at that time wanted were these:

> The Canadian Government, in adhering to this treaty, would desire a stipulation with respect to Japanese immigration similar to that inserted in the treaty between Japan and the United States and they desire a further definition of the word 'labourers,' by adding thereto the words 'including artisans.'

The Conservative party of that day were not willing to bind themselves to accede to the principle that they should not be allowed to pass any legislation or adopt any regulations which might be necessary should the occasion arise. If it was good law and good policy for the Government of the United States to have that proviso in their treaty in 1894, if it was a good sound proviso for the Conservative Government to insist upon it in 1895, and if they saw fit to have it incorporated in the treaty at that time, why would it not be a good thing to-day and why should not the amendment of my hon. friend from Edmonton be accepted?

The hon. member for Portage la Prairie (Mr. Meighen) has rather beaten around the points that are really at issue between the two sides of the House, and has not given any very definite opinion one way or the other. He has simply devoted himself to showing that there were divisions amongst us on this side of the House and he therefore concluded that it was not necessary for him to say anything at all about the real question that is up for discussion. He asked: Why, if the Bill is useless, do you ask for power to make amendments? It may be a special pleading to point out to my hon. friend that when the Government of Japan are accepting the Bill as it is to-day they can say nothing about any amendments which are hereafter passed. If they are willing to accept the Bill and the agreement, and if we do amend the law, they can neither find fault with the law or with the effect it may have on the treaty when so amended.

Hon. gentlemen opposite ask with a good deal of force: Why did you allow the treaty of 1907 to pass? You, the Liberal party, are forever to be condemned because you permitted that treaty to pass in 1907 without any stipulation protecting the coast of British Columbia. That is not a fair proposition. Hon. gentlemen know that it is quite easy to be wise after the fact. They know that when the treaty was passed in 1907 there was no condition requiring any safeguard for the ports of British Columbia, or any other part of Canada. If at that time the people of British Columbia were threatened with invasion from Japan or elsewhere, then the present Prime Minister and his political friends who sat with him in opposition were in duty bound to point that out, but they were perfectly satisfied with the treaty when it was presented to this House, and they accepted it without any protest. The confirmation of that treaty was not a political question; it was an international question in which both sides of politics were interested, and if a mistake was made it was made by all the representatives of the people in this Parliament. It is, therefore, not a fair criticism to tell the people of British Columbia to-day that the Liberal party was remiss in their duty in not safeguarding the interests of the people of British Columbia when they allowed that treaty to pass. However, no such excuse exists to-day. We have passed the crisis in British Columbia: but what occurred before may occur again, and now that we are passing a second treaty it behooves us to take precautions in the light of the experience we had a few years ago.

No one has greater regard for the legal ability of the Prime Minister than I, and I should be sorry to differ from him on a question of law, if the distinction was fine. But the case seems so absolutely clear that I have not the slightest hesitation in differing from the right hon. gentleman as to the effect of his correspondence, the provisions of the Act, and the treaty. What was the purpose of that correspondence? If it had no purpose at all it need not have taken place, and even if it did, it might have been regarded as private and not made part and parcel of the whole arrangement as it has been made. The first letter of the Prime Minister explained to the Japanese Consul that our Immigration Act was absolutely universal in its application; that it was the same against the man who came from Ireland, or Scotland, or England, as against the man who came from Japan. And naturally the Japanese representative in replying says, that if the Japanese are put on the same footing as Scotchmen, Irishmen, Welshmen or Englishmen, Japan could have no objection, because Japan could not expect better treatment for its citizens than the people of Canada were according to their own kith and kin across the sea. That is the meaning of the correspondence with the Prime Minister, if it has any meaning at all.

But, if the Prime Minister should be blamed for not putting the whole case to the representative of Japan, I would be prepared to say that he was at least not technically correct when he stated that our Act did not discriminate against anyone. It is true that on the face of the Act it does not discriminate, but sections 37 and 38 provide for absolute power of discrimination, and put the power of discrimination in the hands of the Government or of a minister, who can use it if it should be thought proper. I submit that an Act of Parliament which enables a minister of the Crown to discriminate against any set of immigrants is a discriminating Act, and it is simply a question of the will of the minister or of the Government whether that power shall be exercised or not. But, on that score, the representative of Japan replies that it does not concern him very much what the Immigration Act says, because he has the word of the Prime Minister of Canada in black and white, that there shall not be any discrimination against the subjects of Japan. I suppose the representative of Japan does not profess to be qualified to give opinions as to the international effect of legislation in this Parliament, and he was satisfied because he had the First Minister of Canada stating in writing that there was no discrimination. In his reply, he does not say: I have read your Act and I agree in that statement; but he tersely and shortly says: There will be no discrimination against any of the subjects of my country. In his last letter the Prime Minister clinches this by saying there will not be any discrimination, and so I would like to know where do the representatives of British Columbia find authority to discriminate? To enable any discrimination, they will have to wipe out altogether the correspondence of the Prime Minister, because the very minute that the first Japanese lands in British Columbia and is interfered with in any way, other than would a Frenchman, a German, an Englishman, or a Scotchman, that Japanese subject has the right to appeal to the written letters of the Prime Minister of Canada and to claim there shall be no discrimination against him. That certainly would be a violation of the terms as laid down by the letters of the Prime Minister and the acceptance of them by the representative of Japan. That being the case, I submit that, to say that we still have the terms of the Immigration Act in force in regard to Japanese immigration, is to state something that in my judgment is absolutely without foundation. It is simply putting the people of British Columbia in line with the old fable that is told about a lion going to ask a certain man to give him his daughter for his wife. The fable says that the lion went to the man with that request and the man said: 'No, I shall not give you my daughter. You have terrible teeth; you have awful claws. If you cut those claws and pull those teeth, you can have my daughter.' The lion was so enamoured of the daughter that he went and pulled his teeth and cut his claws and then presented himself for the prize of getting the gentleman's daughter for his wife. The man, however, said to him then: 'I have nothing to do with you. I care nothing about you. You have no power and I can treat you as an ordinary, good-for-nothing, old dog that might prowl around my premises.' I submit to the people of British Columbia that, when they are getting the Immigration Act in force, surrounded with this clause, they have it with its claws cut and its teeth pulled. If the people of British Columbia are willing to accept the Immigration Act rendered nugatory in that way, nothing but a mere name, of course they are entitled to any glory which they can get from it. I am sure, however, that they will see the matter in its true light. While I do not think that anybody on this side of the House proposes to vote against the Bill in its entirety or against the schedules thereto, in view of the campaign that has been conducted in the province of British Columbia for the last five or six years, and in view of the declarations of the Prime Minister and other hon. gentlemen opposite, we would not be doing justice to the people of British Columbia if we did not strip bare before them the policy that is being submitted to them now in order to make them believe that they are getting something when they are really getting nothing.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): Mr. Speaker, I have been listening with a good deal of interest to this debate, and I was hoping that my hon. friend from Portage la Prairie (Mr. Meighen) would take with some seriousness the point raised by my hon. friend from St. John (Mr. Pugsley) in regard to the rights of shipping on the coasts of this country as affected by this treaty. I understood that my hon. friend from St. John raised the point that the various clauses of this treaty dealing with shipping would enable Japanese vessels to engage in the coasting trade of Canada. The first article of the treaty that deals with the question is article VI, which reads as follows:

There shall be between the territories of the two high contracting parties reciprocal freedom of commerce and navigation. The subjects of each of the high contracting parties shall have liberty freely to come with their ships and cargoes to all places, ports and rivers in the territories of the other which are or may be opened to foreign commerce, and, conforming themselves to the laws of the country to which they thus come, shall enjoy the same rights, privileges, liberties, favours, immunities, and exemptions in matters of commerce and navigation as are or may be enjoyed by native subjects.

This would enable a Japanese vessel engaged in trade on the Pacific ocean to engage in trade between any two ports on the coasts of British Columbia.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman must confine himself to the amendment before the House, which refers to an entirely different clause from the one he is discussing.

Mr. SINCLAIR: I understood, Mr. Speaker, that the motion before the House was the third reading of the Bill; and under that motion, I supposed that I was at liberty to deal with the clauses of the treaty itself.

Mr. SPEAKER: The rule with regard to debate, when an amendment is before the House, is that it is the question which a member is permitted to speak to.

Mr. PUGSLEY: This is a very important matter. I have always understood that, when a motion is before the House, if an amendment is moved thereto, a member can speak both to the main motion and to the amendment; otherwise, if he spoke to the amendment, he would be debarred altogether from speaking to the main motion, as he would not be allowed to speak a second time.

Mr. SPEAKER: The rule in regard to an amendment, as I understand it, is this: If the amendment is, 'that all the words after 'that' be struck out, and an amendment be substituted in lieu thereof,' it would be proper to discuss the original motion and the amendment; but, if it is an amendment merely of a clause, and not of the whole question, then the rule provides that debate must be confined to the amendment or the question that is before the House for decision. The question before the House for decision is the introduction of this amendment.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The amendment is more than that. It is that the Bill be not read a third time, but that it be referred back to the Committee of the Whole. If the amendment prevailed, it would mean that the Bill be not adopted by the House unless amended accordingly.

Mr. SPEAKER: If the amendment prevailed, the Bill would go back to the Committee of the Whole with instructions to deal with only this one clause. The Committee of the Whole could not deal with or discuss any other portion of the Bill on such instructions. Therefore that is the only question for decision before the House. If my understanding of the rule is correct, and I think it is, though, of course, not infallible, then the rule requires the confinement of the discussion to the amendment; and it would not be permissible to discuss other portions of the Bill not connected with it.

Mr. EMMERSON: Would it not be in order for an hon. member, even though there were an amendment, to discuss the whole Bill on the motion for the third reading?

Mr. SPEAKER: Yes.

Mr. EMMERSON: Then, is a member excluded from so doing because another member has chosen to move an amendment? He wishes to speak to the amendment, but at the same time he wishes also to discuss the whole question of the third reading. It seems to me reasonable and in accordance with every principle upon which we base our rule that an hon. member should have the privilege of discussing not only the third reading, but the amendment, a notice of which is before the House. If he is obliged to confine himself to the amendment under discussion, he is precluded from in any way discussing the third reading.

Mr. SPEAKER: No, the hon. member is wrong in that respect. As soon as this amendment is disposed of, whether lost or carried, then he can discuss the third reading of the Bill. If the amendment is carried, the Bill will go to committee and come back again for third reading, but if it is lost, then the House takes up the question of the third reading, and that can be discussed.

Mr. SINCLAIR: I rose simply to mention some considerations which, it seems to me, support the position of the hon. member for St. John; and if I had been permitted to go on for a moment, you would have saved much time in connection with this point of order. I do not know whether I may be allowed to name the clauses to which I wish to refer. Let me point out that articles VI, XXI and XXIV relate to the question of shipping. It occurred to me that there is a good deal in the position taken by my hon. friend from St. John—that it will be contended that the Japanese vessels have the right to carry on coasting trade in Canada, under these various clauses. Article XXI says:

> The coasting trade of the high contracting parties is excepted from the provisions of the present treaty, and shall be regulated according to the laws of the United Kingdom and Japan respectively.

Now, as I understand the laws of the United Kingdom, there is no restriction in regard to the coasting trade, but any vessel is allowed to carry on coasting trade between the ports of the United Kingdom. This clause should be amended so as to read: 'the United Kingdom, Canada and Japan,' because we have special laws not found in the laws of the United Kingdom, and it should refer not only to the laws of the United Kingdom and Japan but to the Canadian laws regulating the coasting trade. The other clause to which I refer is article XXIV:

> The high contracting parties agree that, in all that concerns commerce, navigation, and industry, any favour, privilege, or immunity which either high contracting party has actually granted, or may hereafter grant, to the ships, subjects, or citizens of any foreign state shall be extended immediately and unconditionally to the ships or subjects of the other high contracting party, it being their intention that the commerce, navigation, and industry of each country shall be placed in all respects on the footing of the most favoured nation.

Under special orders in council there are a number of other nations allowed to carry on coasting trade in Canada in ships of certain tonnages. For instance, Norway can carry on coasting trade with any vessel or steamer over 1,500 tons. If you are giving to Japan under this treaty all the rights of the most favoured notion in connection with that trade it strikes me we will give them the right to carry on the coasting trade in Canada. I feel certain the Prime Minister does not intend that that should be done, especially as the shipping of Japan is expanding. I understand that they have a line running to the Pacific coast, and under the rights given them under this treaty, they could coast between Vancouver and Victoria or Prince Rupert, or even the eastern coast if they are enterprising enough to do so. I merely point out this to the Prime Minister in case the point may not have occurred to him.

PRIVATE BILLS.

SUPREME COURT OF THE INDEPENDENT ORDER OF FORESTERS.

House in Committee on Bill No. 30, to consolidate and amend the Acts relating to the Supreme Court of the Independent Order of Foresters, and to change its name to The Independent Order of Foresters.—Mr. Macdonell. (Mr. Deputy Speaker in the Chair.)

On section 1:

Mr. GUTHRIE: I have received a letter from one of the judges of the county courts of Ontario, a former member of this House, who seems to think that the Bill affects him very seriously.

Mr. MACDONELL: The object of the Bill, which is of considerable importance and affects a very large number of persons who are members of this fraternal society, and also indirectly affects similar societies and their members. This is one of the oldest of the fraternal societies. These societies are face to face with insurance and business conditions that compel them to rearrange their business and practically put it upon a reserve basis. This Bill is intended to have that effect with respect to the Foresters. I understand that other societies similarly situated will likely take advantage of this Bill. The Bill was fully considered in the Banking and Commerce Committee, where the High Chief Ranger and counsel for the society fully explained it, the Department of Finance concurred in it, and after a forenoon's consideration it was adopted without dissent. The society are coming here earlier than they expected to come because of the fact that in the United States, where they do a very large amount of business, some twenty states of the Union have passed an Act called the Mobile Act, an insurance law which requires all companies doing business in their territory to put their business upon a reserve basis while many other states propose to pass such a law. This organization has in the United States 133,000 policy holders out of a total membership of 243,000. The chief officers of the society therefore felt that it was very necessary to take immediate steps to put the society upon that reserve insurance basis and they expect that, if this Bill passes, they will have their business in those twenty states not upon a reserve basis by 1917, when the law to which I have referred takes effect. When the Bill was before the committee, the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Carvell) had a letter, perhaps somewhat similar to that which the hon. member for South Wellington has, but, on an explanation from the promoters, that hon. gentleman made no objection and concurred in what was done. The first five sections contain nothing that is not now in the Act of Incorporation and the amending Acts of the order, so that there is nothing new in the sections until we come to section 6.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Judge Jamieson, who writes me, says that he joined the Foresters about 1883 and, having attained the age of 70, under this certificate was entitled to payment of his policy in annual instalments of ten per cent, that is, $300 per annum. Four of these payments have been made to him, but now he thinks and I think that under this Bill there may be some rearrangement which will adversely affect his right to claim under this certificate. He claims that his right is a vested right and his contract is an executed contract and that no legislation should be passed to vary it. If my hon. friend can assure me that there is nothing in the Bill or the schedules which would affect rights of this kind, I would have no objection to the Bill passing.

Mr. MACDONELL: I can give no assurance of that kind; in fact, what transpired proved this, apparently, that all policies of members who joined since the year 1899 are upon a reserve basis and so far as they are concerned, I fancy that their contracts will remain as they are. This is a society or insurance company and as I understand the matter as it was explained in the Committee, the insurance of those who were members before 1899 is not upon a high enough basis to protect it and put it upon a reserve basis, and there will have to be some rearrangement with regard to their insurance. I cannot say what form that will take, but, belonging to that earlier group, the instance mentioned by the hon. gentleman will, according to the explanation given, be one of those policies that will have in some way to be rearranged upon a new basis in order to put the whole society upon a reserve basis. That, of course, is all worked out in the schedule and the various sections of the Act.

Mr. EMMERSON: I am a member of the Order and have been since some time in the '80's. I was present at the committee when the Bill was under discussion. It was clearly explained to the committee. The Bill simply gives certain rights to the order whereby, at the option of the members, they can elect to adopt one of three courses which the society is authorized to carry out upon two-thirds majority of the delegates at the Supreme Court which is held at stated periods. Every section of the area over which the Supreme Court has jurisdiction is represented. There are two hundred and ten delegates. They come from the United States and from the Dominion of Canada and by a two-thirds majority of those two hundred and ten delegates a course can be selected which will enable the society to adopt it. The position is this: A certain class of those who are insured at the rates increased under the Act of 1908 could have assumed a different class and could have paid dues which would have covered their risks. They did not do so. They elected to remain in a lower class in the hope that something would happen which would assure to them all the benefits which they had anticipated when they first joined the society in 1908. That class have a certain reserve which protects them, but there is a deficit which grew up from the early inception of the order to the time of the legislation in 1908 by reason of the assessment dues being inadequate. If they were to take their benefit now from that fund it would simply mean that, if they were insured for a thousand dollars, they would be entitled to $750. Those who have, however, since that period of 1908, paid the higher system are in a different class and their policies are worth their face value. Not so with this class. After all, this legislation is simply for the purpose of enabling the society to take one of three courses and the membership of the society have a voice in determining as to which course they will take. I think it is reasonable legislation and I think it is in the interests of all classes of the membership of the order.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I think that what my hon. friend from Westmorland (Mr. Emmerson) has said would apply with great force to current policies. But the policy to which I have referred is not a current policy. It is in the nature of a matured policy, a certificate issued under conditions which say that, when the insured arrives at the age of seventy, if he has paid all dues, he shall be entitled to receive annually ten per cent of the face value of his policy. That policy matured in 1907 before the re-arrangement of rates to which my hon. friend referred. It became in the nature of a vested right I would think that it would be wrong and bad in principle that after the insured had honestly made all these annual payments—and this is only one of a number of similar cases—legislation should now be introduced which might in a way affect this completed contract.

Mr. EMMERSON: When did it mature?

Mr. GUTHRIE: In 1907.

Mr. EMMERSON: Then it is a liability which they have to carry out.

Mr. GUTHRIE: If it is a liability which they must carry out, and if that is made clear in the Bill I would have no objection, but I am afraid that, in clause 4 and in the schedule, it is not very clear.

Mr. WHITE (Minister of Finance): If my hon. friend has any doubt about it—and, offhand, I do not pretend to pass upon it—I would suggest that the Bill be allowed to stand until the matter that he has drawn our attention to is looked into more carefully. This is a private Bill, but it received very careful consideration on the part of the Insurance Department and from myself. The position is substantially as it has been set out by my hon. friend from South Toronto (Mr. Macdonell) and my hon. friend from Westmorland (Mr. Emmerson). The actuaries in the Insurance Department believe that this legislation is very much in the interest of the order as a whole and I think there was no dissent from that view expressed at the committee. There are two main classes, as I understand, of policy-holders—those who entered prior to 1899 and those who entered subsequently to 1899. Those who entered subsequently to 1899 are paying a proper amount, having regard to actuarial calculations, so that no question of deficiency arises in connection with their policies. In regard to those who entered prior to 1899, a rather numerous class, I think about one-third of the entire order, for the reasons mentioned by my hon. friend from South Toronto and more particularly because of the American legislation to which he has referred, the society, in order to continue in a solvent condition, would be obliged to increase the rates. That increase would bear very heavily upon those who are over fifty years of age; in fact, it would appear to be prohibitive in so far as some are concerned. The assets of the Foresters now belong to the order as a whole and are held in that way really on account of all the policy-holders. This Bill proposes to divide the assets into three classes one portion to be set aside, after a proper actuarial calculation has been made, and allocated to those policy-holders who entered prior to 1899. That portion of the assets would represent the amount, actuarially speaking, which belongs to that class of policy-holders. A certain portion of the assets are allocated to those policy-holders who are on an actuarial basis according to the Foresters' experience.

Mr. EMMERSON: Is it not rather that the actual amount which all the individual members of that class have paid in, less the proportion of charges, is set aside for their benefit?

Mr. WHITE: I understand that is the position. I used the word 'actuarial' in the ordinary insurance sense.

Mr. EMMERSON: That might be misleading.

Mr. WHITE: Perhaps so. There is a third fund that represents the surplus of the order; a substantial body of assets which is to be set aside in aid of the class as to which there is a deficiency of assets, namely, the class who entered prior to 1899. So much for the division of the assets under the Act. As to the payment to be made, in this class who entered prior to 1899 section 4 of the schedule says:

> The society shall ascertain, as at the first day of October, 1913, the valuation deficiency in respect of all the outstanding mortuary benefit certificates or policies of the members who entered the society under the constitution and laws from time to time in force prior to the first day of January, 1899, and shall apportion such valuation deficiency among the said members in proportion to the amount of the mortuary benefit certificates or policies: Provided that the share of the valuation deficiency so apportioned to any member shall not exceed the reserve proper to such member's mortuary benefit certificate or policy according to the Foresters and four per cent annual interest.

It goes on to describe the course to be followed in respect to the polities of those members who entered prior to 1899:

If the supreme court of the society, at the session to be held pursuant to the provisions of section 12 of this Act, by resolution so decides, the society may charge against each such mortuary benefit certificate or policy as an assessment, a sum not exceeding its proportion of the valuation deficiency aforesaid. Such assessment shall thereupon be payable to the society by the member on the said first day of October, 1913, or if not so paid, shall be a lien or debt against such member's mortuary benefit certificate or policy bearing interest until paid at the rate of four per cent per annum compounded annually.

In another part of the schedule it is provided:

In the event of the said supreme court failing to adopt, at the said session, either of the methods of meeting the valuation deficiency hereinbefore set forth, the society shall ascertain and apportion to the mortuary benefit certificate or policy of each of the said members its share of the accumulated funds determined as provided in paragraph 3 of this schedule, and shall charge annually against such credit and interest at the rate earned by the accumulated funds of the society and the net mortuary assessments or premiums received from such member during the year, such member's share of the mortuary and disability claims accruing during such year, together with such additional annual sums as shall be necessary according to the Foresters experience and four per cent annual interest to provide the benefits other than the mortuary and disability benefits stipulated in such member's mortuary benefit certificate or policy, and when such credit is exhausted the society shall collect and is hereby empowered to collect from the said member such additional or increased assessments during each year as shall be necessary to answer such member's share of the mortuary and disability claims accruing during such year together with the Superintendent of Insurance.

Without being technical, I understand that if the order were to impose the additional amount of assessment that would be required to put upon a proper basis the policies held by members who entered prior to 1899, a very large percentage of that membership would be obliged to drop out. That would of course injure the prestige of the society and, would be a very considerable loss to those who were members prior to 1899, and who would be obliged to cease membership by reason of the increase in the rate.

When this matter was first brought to my attention, the Bill was in a very different form to what it is at present. There were three things I insisted upon: in the first place, I decided that the Bill should be very carefully checked by the Insurance Department; in the second place, in addition to the usual advertising in connection with a Bill of this kind I arranged that notice should be given in The Forester which is sent to every member both in Canada and the United States, that this application was to be made, in order that any parties who might desire could appear before the committee, and, the third thing I insisted upon was, in my opinion, important. If the committee will look at section 12, they will observe:

The supreme court of the society may meet in regular session within six months from the date of the passing of this Act, and if at such session a resolution to accept this Act is supported by two-thirds of the votes cast this Act shall come into force on the day on which such acceptance takes place, and notice and proof of such acceptance shall be filed with the superintendent of insurance.

At first it was suggested that that vote should be one-half although under the existing legislation of the Foresters the rates can only be changed by a two-thirds vote. I took the view that it should remain at two-thirds, and consequently in the amended Bill it appears in that form. The matter is technical and dry but I think I have given the House an idea of the reasons for the introduction of this Bill and the need of the legislation. A very substantial number of members of the order are affected by this Bill in this way: If upon the calculation being made that is provided for in the schedule, there was a deficiency, then a man having a policy of $2,000 with a deficiency of $250 might elect to have a lien upon his policy, instead of paying up the amount, so that his policy would be for $750 instead of $1,000. A very full explanation was given in the committee, and it was listened to very carefully, and I think intelligently considered. The question which my hon. friend from South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) has raised, was not especially dealt with in the committee. If he desires that this Bill should stand, it might stand over until the next occasion on which private Bills are taken, in order that the matter might receive attention from the department, and the true position as to this policy situation submitted to my hon. friend. There seems to be no doubt that the legislation is in the interests of the order as a whole, although in some cases the policies will be cut down and the assessment increased.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Perhaps, so far as the assessment of rates is concerned, this amendment would suffice:

That nothing in this Act contained shall affect or limit the right of any member who is a holder of a benefit certificate or policy which has heretofore become payable in instalments to him or has become a paid-up policy or certificate upon his attaining the age of 70 years.

There is a clause in all the older policies which says that a member upon attaining the age of seventy may cease altogether to make further payments. There is another clause which says that he may withdraw his money in annual instalments of ten per cent per annum. As most of these older certificates were taken out prior to 1899, it may be found that there was some deficiency in the old fund. It would be a pity, if a man, who has taken out a paid-up policy and locked it up in his desk for four or five years, or who has been receiving instalments, were now to be asked to pay to this fund. I think in all these policies, there is a vesting power in the policy. Clause 12, which was suggested by the Minister of Finance is a very excellent clause, but I fear it would not protect the older policy-holders. Those who are now seventy and over are few in comparison with the tremendous number of policy-holders in this order. If such a clause as I have suggested be acceptable, the Bill could go through; otherwise I should like to see it stand over until a suitable clause could be drafted.

Mr. WHITE (Minister of Finance): I understand the hon. member for South Toronto (Mr. Macdonell) is willing the Bill should stand. I would suggest that the hon. member (Mr. Guthrie) give to him and to myself a letter with respect to the particular policy which he has in mind, in order that we may have the matter looked into carefully. I appreciate what my hon. friend has said with regard to vested rights.

Progress reported.

PORT NELSON COMPANY, LIMITED.

House in Committee on Bill No. 114, to incorporate the Port Nelson Company, Limited.—Mr. Beattie. (Mr. Deputy Speaker in the Chair).

Mr. OLIVER: This is a somewhat unusual Bill. Would the promoter be good enough to explain it to the committee?

Mr. BEATTIE: It is a Bill for the general development of the country at Port Nelson.

Mr. OLIVER: Is it a commercial company or a development company, or what kind of a company is it?

Mr. BEATTIE: It is a commercial company for the development of that part of the country.

Mr. OLIVER: Is it a land company or a commercial company or both?

Mr. BEATTIE: A commercial company, not a land company.

Mr. OLIVER: Has the name Port Nelson any geographical significance?

Mr. BEATTIE: It is the name of the old company which is already incorporated.

Mr. OLIVER: Has it relation particularly to what we call Port Nelson on Hudson bay?

Mr. BEATTIE: The head office of the company is in Winnipeg, but the Bill refers to Port Nelson.

Bill reported.

Mr. BEATTIE moved the third reading of the Bill.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I think the third reading of this Bill should stand, because it strikes me that it is a most extraordinary Bill. It has gone through so quickly that I have not had time to look at it, and I should like the Minister of Justice to look at it.

Bill stands.

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE—THIRD READINGS.

Bill No. 153, respecting the Bank of Saskatchewan.—Mr. Knowles.

Bill No. 92, to incorporate The Metropolitan Mortgage and Loan Corporation.—Mr. Meighen.

PRUDENTIAL LIFE OF CANADA.

House in Committee on Bill No. 115, to incorporate the Prudential Life of Canada.—Mr. Meighen. (Mr. Deputy Speaker in the Chair.)

Mr. OLIVER: I presume that this Bill is in accordance with the usual form of Bills of this charcater; that there is nothing special or peculiar in it. I should like to have that stated, so that it can be on record.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I can give the assurance to the hon. member in this way: The purpose of this Bill, as he will have observed, is to erect a company which was incorporated under the statutes of the province of Manitoba into a company with a Dominion charter. That is, in a word, the sole purpose of the Bill. The hon. member asks if it is in accord with the form regarded as satisfactory by this House and the committee that has charge of the Bill. It is, with this exception: recently, the committee and the House have favoured a form which merely empowers a Dominion company so incorporated to take over a Manitoba company. The form in which this Bill stands is one that has frequently been used in similar cases. I could mention, for instance, the Canada National Fire Insurance Company, the Hudson's Bay Insurance Company, the Royal Guardian, and the Merchants' and Traders'. The reason we adopted this form instead of the other is that it enables the company now incorporated to commence business on obtaining the consent of the shareholders of the old company, without waiting for the Manitoba Legislature to pass an enactment enabling the old company to merge in this, which, under the other form, would have been necessary.

Bill reported, read the third time, and passed.

BRITISH-JAPANESE TREATY.

Consideration of the proposed motion of Mr. Borden for the third reading of Bill No. 156, respecting a certain Treaty of Commerce and Navigation between His Majesty the King and His Majesty the Emperor of Japan, resumed.

Hon. WILLIAM PUGSLEY (St. John): Mr. Speaker, I desire to move an amendment, and in doing so I shall make only a few remarks, as I understand that the Minister of Finance is desirous of proceeding with the third reading of the West Indies Treaty Bill. I therefore beg to move:

That this Bill be not now read a third time, but that it be referred back to the Committee of the Whole House with instructions to amend the same by adding at the end of paragraph (a) in section 2 the following words: 'or any regulation or regulations made or which may hereafter be made thereunder by the Governor in Council.'

If this amendment were adopted, paragraph (a) of section 2 would read:

Nothing in the said treaty or in this Act shall be deemed to repeal or affect any of the provisions of the Immigration Act, 1910, or any regulation or regulations made or which may hereafter be made thereunder by the Governor in Council.

I hope that the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Rogers) who is leading the House, will consent to this amendment. A very great deal of serious consideration has been given to the effect of the letters from His Excellency the Consul General of Japan to the Prime Minister, in which he states that in the opinion of the Imperial Government there will be no discrimination against Japanese subjects. We have also before us the reply of the Prime Minister acquiescing in that view. It seems to me that if there can be no discrimination against Japanese subjects in accordance with that correspondence then certain hon. members in this House are being misled, because they are supporting the Bill, particularly those from the province of British Columbia, on the distinct ground that it will be quite open to the Governor in Council to pass regulations under this clause 2 of the Bill which will discriminate, if the Governor in Council thinks proper to do so, against Japanese subjects. It is desirable to make that clear. I can imagine nothing more likely to produce unsatisfactory relations between Japan and Canada than any misunderstanding as to what will be the rights of Canada with respect to immigration from Japan after this treaty is ratified. The section is limited entirely to the Immigration Act of 1910. That Act, it is true, does not itself discriminate but it gives power to the Governor in Council to make regulations which will discriminate. As I said, in view of the correspondence which shows that the Imperial Government of Japan has been led either intentionally or otherwise to believe that there will be no discrimination it seems to me, that the position of Canada ought to be made absolutely clear and it ought to be provided in the section that nothing in the treaty shall be held to repeal or to affect either the Immigration Act of 1910, or any regulations made or which may be hereafter made by the Governor in Council under that Act. If the Government do not accept my amendment I quite appreciate that it will be useless for me to prolong the discussion or to press it to a vote but I would say that if it is the intention that Canada shall exercise the right to pass regulations which may discriminate against Japan, that should be clearly set forth now so that the Imperial Government of Japan may know the intention of Parliament to vest that power in the Governor General in Council and that the ratification of this treaty will be made on that understanding so that the Japanese will have no right to hold that it was intended to take away that power from the Governor in Council.

Mr. EMMERSON: In rising to second the amendment of the hon. member for St. John, I desire to make a few observations with respect to the subject matter of the Bill now under consideration. I have been for many years a member of this House and during the past seven years I have heard a great deal with respect to the relations of this country with the Empire of Japan. It is true that I have not taken very much part in the discussions on that subject and I would not do so on this occasion were it not that it seems to me that the occasion demands some reference from myself as a representative of eastern Canada. In past years, because of the position which was taken by a former government, issues have been raised not only in western Canada but in eastern Canada in relation to our attitude towards the people of the Orient and particularly towards the people of Japan. I can approach the consideration of the question free from any prejudice and with a desire that every phase of this question may be dealt with without regard to these prejudices. I look upon the Bill now under consideration as involving three features. There is first its international feature, then its commercial feature and last and by no means the least important, the immigration feature.

Mr. SPEAKER: I think the hon. member is getting beyond the rule of debate. The motion is that the Bill be referred back to amend a single clause, and the discussion, therefore, to be relevant, must be confined to the proposed amendment.

Mr. EMMERSON: I appreciate that, but I think that the remarks which I propose to address to Your Honour have relation to the second clause of this Bill. That clause, it seems to me, involves an International question, incidentally the commercial feature of it, and directly and especially the immigration feature it is proposed to amend. We recognize that in order to carry out faithfully and bona fide this treaty, there is involved the question of International relations between the Empire of Japan and the British Empire of which we form a part; and as one of the units of the British Empire, in relationship to the Government of the United Kingdom, it is necessary even in discussing this amendment to bear in mind the position in which we might be in that particular regard. I think that my hon. friends opposite have striven to prove during the discussion of this feature, that in this clause they are preserving to the people of Canada and to the Parliament of Canada the right to control immigration and are maintaining their powers with respect to immigration. In the exercise of these powers we must have due regard to the International phase, and of course as has been very well set forth by hon. members opposite, we are actuated by the desire to have some good accrue to the Dominion of Canada from the standpoint of the extension of our trade relations with the Empire of Japan. This question cannot be discussed apart from the past. My hon. friends opposite, as I have stated, have endeavoured to show that under the present arrangement, and under clause 2, the entire control of immigration from Japan is to be placed in a very much better position than it has been heretofore. I think my hon. friends must have realized some of the difficulties that are incident to the position which an opposition is constrained to take on occasion. I realized from the argument made by my hon. friend from Vancouver (Mr. Stevens), that he now claims he has the right, by reason of this second clause in the Bill, to exclude at any time the Japanese as immigrants. It was the contention of the same hon. gentlemen in years past that it was a very desirable thing to exclude them, and he now claims that in order to accomplish that exclusion it is necessary to have this second clause. On the part of my hon. friend from St. John (Mr. Pugsley) and others on this side of the House, it is held that if we leave the matter as it is in the Bill at the present moment, the proposed amendment would make it inoperative, and that it would not accomplish what my right hon. friend the Prime Minister hopes to accomplish in that respect.

I can appreciate the embarrassment of my right hon. friend in respect to this matter. Indeed, it seems to me that his attitude and his contention with regard to this Bill, and his correspondence give evidence of his playing strange pranks with the principles which his supporters held and advocated in 1907, and afterwards. It must cause some embarrassment. I have before me some literature which was in circulation in British Columbia in 1908 at the time of the general election. I see that the Conservative party issued during that election, not only in British Columbia, but elsewhere in Canada, some political tracts which contained startling announcements. I have one which was circulated during that election, and it says:

> Japanese Immigration—A Startling Record of Diplomatic Blunder—A National Surrender —Conservative Government Guarded the Right of Restriction—Laurier Administration admitted Japanese of All Classes Without Restrictions.

These are the headlines, and under them you have a full statement of the alleged recklessness of the Laurier Government with respect not only to Chinese Immigration, but to Asiatic immigration generally. I shall not read all the statements contained in this pamphlet which was so widely circulated, and which was the result of the agitation started in this House. That agitation spread beyond the walls of this Chamber into all the provinces, even into the provinces of the East. I heard of it even in my own constituency. The labour organizations were agitated and inflamed because of the attitude of the Laurier Administration in permitting Asiatic immigrants to come into this country to compete with our own labour. In this document there is a statement of the patriotic position assumed by my right hon. friend the Prime Minister, then the leader of the Opposition. It is from a speech delivered by my right hon. friend in Vancouver, in September, 1907, which speech was the basis of the policy initiated by him in this House in 1908. That policy took the form of a resolution which has already been quoted during this debate and which, therefore, I shall not read. (Reading):

> We are bound to respect that treaty with Japan as long as it remains in force. We are bound to accord just and honourable treatment to our fellow subjects throughout the Empire. But one central idea overshadows all others and it has been well expressed by Mr. Borden in a speech delivered at Vancouver, in September, 1907.

This is the introduction of those who were the authors of this campaign literature. Mr. Borden said on that occasion:

Let us have a due sense of Imperial as well as Canadian interests involved; let us appreciate the sanctity of treaty rights and the respect which must be paid to a great nation like Japan, the ally and friend of Great Britain; let us remember the importance of trade relations with both China and Japan. But above all let us never forget that there are considerations greater than those of trade or material progress.

The Conservative party, which brought this splendid province into our great Confederation, will maintain one supreme consideration to which all others must give way and it is this: British Columbia must remain a British and Canadian province, inhabited and dominated by men in whose veins runs the blood of the great pioneering races which built up and developed not only western but eastern Canada as well. And while recognizing our duty to the great Empire whose flag will always float above us, we respectfully maintain that Canada in such vital essentials must be accorded a freedom of judgment as perfect and unfettered as that already exercised not only by the other great dominions of the Empire, but by Great Britain herself.

There is a statement clearly enunciating a principle which is entirely antagonistic to the one on which this section is based. It is entirely foreign to the principle which my right hon. friend is now adopting. In September, 1907, my right hon. friend, then leader of the Opposition, was on the Pacific coast, and:

On the 24th he reviewed conditions at length, described the treaty arrangement of 1906-7 as 'permitting the entire population of Japan to migrate to Canada if they desired to do so'; stated that Parliament and the Opposition had accepted the treaty on Sir Wilfrid Laurier's assurance as to the limitation of emigrants from Japan; blamed Mr. W. T. R. Preston, Government commissioner in the East, for at least a part of the influx; and added these words: 'Let us respect the allies of Great Britain, but let us remember that there are other considerations beside trade relations and material advancement, and of much greater importance. We must not allow our shores to be over-run with Asiatics and become dominated by an alien race. British Columbia must remain a white man's country; the same blood must flow in the veins of those who build up eastern and western Canada as flowed in the veins of those who made Great Britain; and while we respect the grand old flag of Britain which floats over our heads, and are proud of her institutions and our loyalty, we must expect, and have a right to expect, the same measure of justice meted out to us as is meted out to any other part of the Empire.

There was a declaration of policy by my right hon. friend, made I assume for political purposes, because it was made to the electors of western Canada, and was designed to meet, as he thought, the wishes of the people. This agitation did a great deal of injury throughout Canada from a political standpoint to the Government of Sir Wilfrid Laurier. I am not going to repeat what has been stated as regards the results in British Columbia at the following election. But I am going to say that in eastern Canada, in all of the labour centres, there was an antagonistic feeling in the labour organizations to the Laurier Administration as a result of the inflammatory appeals that had been made against my right hon. friend's (Sir Wilfrid Laurier's) Government in regard to the Japanese treaty. My right hon. friend (Mr. Borden) put the blame upon the Government of that day. It was alleged that the terms of the treaty were governed by an understanding that had previously been entered into with Japan and which was ratified at the time of the visit of my hon. friend from Rouville to Japan in 1907. The attitude of my right hon. friend the Prime Minister of to-day is entirely different from the one that he took then. He has not justified his position in answer to the arguments made by my hon. friend from South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) this afternoon. At the time my right hon friend was making these appeals to the people of western Canada, the course of the then leader of the Government (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) was clear-cut and dignified. We all know that my right hon. friend, the then leader of the Government, was waited upon by representatives of the Labour Congress of Canada. Resolutions had been passed as a result of the agitation which had its origin on the floors of this House and on the Pacific coast, the Government of the day were presented with these resolutions and they were given to understand that, if they gave their adhesion to the treaty and did not take action whereby there should be an absolute restriction of immigration from Asiatic countries, they must surely suffer. They were menaced by a labour organization and by the whole population of British Columbia.

On September 21 Sir Wilfrid Laurier replied to the Labour Congress resolution which has been already quoted and, after a reference to Canada's full and free acceptance of the treaty with Japan, as being given for purposes of trade and in response to popular desires, he proceeded as follows:

The treaty has proved of great advantage and our trade with Japan under it has considerably increased. You base your appeal for the denunciation of the treaty on the allegation that a crisis has arisen in British Columbia by reason of the unprecedented influx of Japanese. Whilst it is true that most regrettable incidents have lately occurred in Vancouver, there seems reason to doubt that the cause was the influx of Japanese, as I am in possession of a telegram from the Mayor of Vancouver, which has been rendered public, which expressly avers that the disturbances were directed against Asiatics generally, rather than against Japanese

On the 26th of December the Prime Minister dealt with the isssue at the manufacturers' banquet in Toronto.

Mr. SPEAKER: In my judgment the hon. member is wandering from the question before the Chair; and, while I dislike very much to interrupt him, I think it would be well that the House should keep as closely as possible to the rules of procedure I have before me the authority from which I quoted this afternoon. At page 299 May says:

A member must direct his speech to the question under discussion; that is, the question that must be first decided by the House.

The question before the House now is that certain words be added to sub-section (a) of section 2 of this Bill. Cushing says:

The question to which a member is bound to speak is that which was last proposed from the Chair——

The amendment of the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley) was last proposed from the Chair:

—which is the question immediately pending, and which, according to the course of parliamentary procedure, is next to be taken.

The principle of this Bill has been endorsed on the second reading, and that principle is contained in the second clause. The Bill has gone through Committee of the Whole, and the committee has considered each clause and passed upon it. The Bill now stands for the third reading, and the motion is to send it back into Committee of the Whole for a certain purpose. Therefore, according to my understanding, and according to the authorities which I have cited, it is proper to confine the discussion to the proposed amendment, and in doing that an hon. member cannot go into the history of what has taken place in the country as a result of immigration from Japan. These are my views of the relevancy which ought to be observed in carrying on debate.

Mr. EMMERSON: I have every desire to observe strictly the rules of the House, but I thought I could not discuss the amendment except in conjunction with the section which involves a certain principle. I had intended this afternoon to make some observations on the point as to why the Government incorporated in this Bill subsection (a) of section 2.

Mr. SPEAKER: If the hon. member confined his remarks to that, he would be perfectly in order; and if the House were now considering the third reading of the Bill, his observations, to which exception has been taken, would be relevant. But on the question now before the House, I considered that the remarks of the hon. member were not relevant.

Mr. EMMERSON: The Government contend that sub-section 2 of their Bill accomplishes certain things which they promised the people of British Columbia they would accomplish, and in discussing the amendment I thought it necessary to dwell briefly on that point. My contention was that the position taken by the Prime Minister in 1907 is not being given effect to by this Bill as it stands, unless the amendment of the hon. member (Mr. Pugsley) is incorporated as part of sub-section (a). I presume I would have a right to speak of this on the third reading of the Bill, and really what I was doing was with the intention of saying all I have to say on this occasion, and therefore, to save the time of the House.

Mr. BORDEN: Under that threat, my hon. friend might be allowed to proceed.

Mr. EMMERSON: I was pointing out that on the 26th of September the Prime Minister dealt with the isssue at the manufacturers' banquet in Toronto, and I quote:

After pointing out that Canada had originally gone into the arrangement with a view to helping Canadian trade and industry in the Japanese markets, and that the Government had understood the policy of Japan to be one of restricting its emigration, he spoke of the difficulty which had arisen in British Columbia. What are we going to do under such circumstances? A section of the people in Winnipeg have called upon the British Government to annul the treaty. Well, the treaty has been in operation only two years. We are just commencing to reap the benefit and to denounce it would be simply panic; and for my part I am not disposed, whether in this or any other action, to act in a panic. To look about, to inquire, to reflect, before I make up my mind.

The then leader of the Government, now leader of the Opposition, took a statesmanlike view of the matter. After considerable reflection, he took certain action with respect to Japanese immigration. At that time and subsequently the right hon. the Prime Minister (Mr. Borden) condemned the attitude of the present leader of the Opposition, not only in this House, but in the province of British Columbia. To-day, however, my right hon. friend is taking the very course that was taken by the then leader of the Government and is adopting his policy. He has put in this Bill a clause which, he alleges, brings about certain results which, as has been amply demonstrated by other hon. members are not brought about. I contend that the position of hon. gentlemen opposite to-day is a stultification of the course that was taken in this House in 1908 and in British Columbia during the elections of 1908. My right hon. friend, in his correspondence with the Government of Japan has said that it is not a racial question and that the Immigration Act and the regulations which may be passed under it do not involve a matter of race; yet the argument is made by my right hon. friend, and certainly by those sitting behind him, that the Immigration Act, as it stands to-day, and the regulations which can be made operative thereunder, can exclude the Japanese race. My hon. friend the member for Vancouver (Mr. Stevens) has sought to impress his constituents with the idea that, regardless of this treaty, regardless of the correspondence that has passed between the representatives of the Government of Japan and the right hon. the Prime Minister, at any moment, under sub-section (a) of article II, not only the provisions of the Immigration Act but regulations passed under that Act can be made operative, if found necessary, in order to absolutely exclude Japanese immigration. Yet in a letter to the representative of the Government of Japan, my right hon. friend has stated, in words that are as clear and unequivocal as words can be, that that cannot be done under the provisions of the Immigration Act. The assurance is given that the Immigration Act is to be inoperative in that regard. Yet my hon. friend from Vancouver (Mr. Stevens) after my right hon. friend has taken the sting out of the head and rattle out of the tail of the rattlesnake, says that Japanese immigration can be excluded in the interests of his constituents. I am not imbued with any feelings of prejudice against the Japanese. I have a very great admiration for their achievements and for them as a people. The attitude of my hon. friend is a very strange one, indeed. He made an argument in favour of expansion of trade with Japan and stated that he could overlook a great deal in order to accomplish that; but so far as the Japanese themselves are concerned, he is an exclusionist. My hon. friend is reversible in that regard when it comes to a question of the people of the United States. He will exclude their trade, but he will permit all immigration of American men and money that he can possibly get.

Mr. STEVENS: I am afraid that my hon. friend has not followed very closely my remarks on this and other matters.

Mr. EMMERSON: My hon. friend took a very strong position against reciprocity, and I know he has taken a very strong position in favour of the exclusion of Japanese. I heard him speak in favour of trade with Japan. My hon. friend, in another regard, speaking on April 2, gave voice to some utterances that appealed to me, but the principle enunciated by him was one that I thought did not harmonize with his attitude on all occasions in this House. He said:

That, Mr. Speaker, absolutely protects the rights and privileges of the Dominion of Canada, so far as its treaty with Japan is concerned. I think that the basis upon which British shipping, which has been acknowledged for many years to be the most important of any nation in the world, has been built is the principle of freedom of navigation, and I think it behooves Canada rather to take a leaf out of the book of the history of this great industry in the Motherland, rather than to attempt by any means to restrict the commerce of other nations with ports on our coast.

Free trade in shipping is the principle followed by my hon. friend. He approaches, though he has not reached, the position that is taken by my hon. friend from Red Deer (Mr. Clark) with respect to the greater trade that we might have in Canada if we went beyond the mere matter of free trade in shipping. (Reading):

I have absolutely no fear as regards the coasts and ports of British Columbia in connection with the Japanese treaty. Permit me to point out that it will be more distinctly an advantage to Canada's shipping in Japan than it will be to Japanese shipping in Canada. Japan can only trade with the ports of British Columbia, whereas Japan is an island similar to Great Britain, and consequently physically and geographically lends itself to the advantageous development of Canadian shipping rather than to the development of Japanese shipping in Canada.

And the hon. gentleman gave utterance to a very generous sentiment:

I say that the reasonable interpretation, nay, Sir, the correct interpretation of this clause, demonstrates that it will be a distinct advantage to Canada. We are not seeking to have the whole plum; we recognize that in this treaty there must be give and take. It is the fundamental principle of a treaty and there must be a certain amount of give and take between the contracting nations.

Reciprocity is apparently what he has in mind, but he is not always so generous in that regard, and when it comes to dealing with nations other than Japan, he takes an entirely different principle. It seems to me that by this proposed amendment we conserve and maintain our rights as a Canadian people to hold and regulate our immigration, not only as regards every other country but as regards Japan as well. It seems to me that the fair interpretation of this whole treaty is that while we have the right to retain, and control, and legislate with respect to immigration with all other lands, we have not reserved to ourselves that right in relation to the Empire of Japan. In order to put it beyond question, even if there were a doubt, the amendment of my hon. friend from St. John should be accepted. I want to see this treaty put in force, but I want to see our rights as a Canadian people reserved. I believe it is of the highest importance that the good relations which exist between the British Empire and the Empire of Japan should be preserved, and that, in spite of anything that may have been done in the past to make this question a political football, we should not do anything that would interfere with that good relationship. And I believe in promoting trade not only with Japan but with all countries, and that this treaty, in so far as it will promote the trade of Canada with one of the great countries of the world is to be very strongly commended. In the matter of the renewal, practically of the arrangement, which was entered into by my hon. friend from Rouville in 1907, I think that the right hon. leader of the Government is to be commended for the course he has taken in that respect. I think his attitude, although not in harmony with the view he took in 1907-8, in this House, commends itself to the judgment of the House and of the country. And, while it may be somewhat embarrassing—and it is, no doubt, embarrassing—for my right hon. friend to take that position in consequence of the principles which he enunciated in 1907, I think he should be the more generously given credit because of that embarrassment.

Hon. ROBERT ROGERS (Minister of Public Works): I cannot feel that my hon. friend from St. John was really serious in moving the amendment which he has proposed to the House to-night. I fancy he has served the purpose which he had in mind in moving the amendment, which was to give his worthy colleague, the hon. member for Westmorland (Mr. Emmerson) an opportunity to make the speech he has made to the House, and to which we have listened, as we always listen to the hon. gentleman's utterances, with the greatest possible attention. I am sure my hon. friend from St. John is too good a lawyer, too learned in the law, to believe for one minute that the amendment which he has proposed in any way alters the Bill now before us. The amendment first of all provides that this Bill be not now read the third time but that it be referred back to Committee of the Whole House. I am sure hon. members will agree with me when I say that I think we have spent at least sufficient time on this Bill in Committee of the Whole. We have been sitting for two days and two or three evenings in Committee of the Whole upon this measure, which should be sufficient for full consideration of the measure. The amendment goes further:

—with instruction to amend the same by adding at the end of paragraph (a) of section 2 the words: "or any regulation or regulations or which may hereafter be made thereunder by the Governor in Council.

I contend that there is nothing in this amendment that would give the Governor General in Council any more power than we possess to-day. Under the Bill before the House it is distinctly set forth in clause 8 that nothing in the said treaty or in this Act shall be deemed to repeal or affect any of the provisions of the Immigration Act. The Immigration Act is quite clear and if you will turn to section 38 of that Act you will find that the Governor in Council may, by proclamation or order, whenever he deems it necessary or expedient, prohibit, &c. It provides all that anything in this amendment of the hon. member for St. John would give to this Parliament or to the Governor General in Council. Therefore I say that no good purpose can be served by occupying the time of the House in passing an amendment that will not in any particular add to the powers that are already vested in the Governor General in Council for the carrying out not alone of this Act, but of the provisions of the Immigration Act. Therefore, we will have to refuse to accept the amendment of the hon. member.

Hon. FRANK OLIVER (Edmonton): I think that the purpose of the amendment is perfectly clear. The Premier has placed before the House a statement of the policy of the Government in regard to Japanese immigration. It seems to be the least forcible construction that can be given to the correspondence. The Premier has said that there will be no discrimination against Japanese immigration. At the same time, he has given it to be understood that this declaration or policy on the part of the Government does not and will not affect the terms of the Immigration Act. The purpose of the amendment is to find out in so many words how far the declaration of policy by the Government affects the case. The hon. member for St. John wants to put into the Act the words that will declare specifically that regulations hereafter to be passed under that Act are to be effective. If those words are to be put in there can be no question that the statement of policy by the Government is ineffective. There is no question as to what the Immigration Act means, but as long as the Bill remains as it is, limited to the Immigration Act as the Immigration Act is at the present time, coupled with the declaration of policy by the Government that the discriminatory features of the Act will not be enforced against Japanese, so long as that condition remains, we do not know what the effect of the Act is to be in actual practice.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If by the treaty or the correspondence, the powers of the Governor in Council under the Act to pass regulations are circumscribed, has that any effect on the Act itself?

Mr. OLIVER: Yes.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Sub-clause (a) says that the Act must not be affected, so what can be the use of the amendment?

Mr. OLIVER: We want to put into the Act the words that will establish beyond question the purpose that is declared to be in view.

Mr. MEIGHEN: You have said already that it is established beyond question by sub-clause (a).

Mr. OLIVER: My hon. friend will have to give his own interpretation and allow me to give mine. I have not been able to follow his reasoning with respect to this Bill and I regret that he cannot follow mine. All we want is that if this Bill is to mean that there shall be no restriction on the right of the Government of Canada to discriminate in regard to immigration, it shall say so in plain words on its face. Then we can consider that the point is established and that no matter what declaration of policy may be made by the communication of the Prime Minister, the interests of the country which we desire to protect in this matter, are safeguarded. On the other hand, if the Government refuse to put those words into the Bill, to put in plain words in the Bill the declaration that is desired by this amendment, we are bound to conclude that it is the declaration of policy by the Government which will be effective and that the Immigration Act, to that extent, is deprived of the effect which it has aside altogether from this treaty. In other words, if there was no reference to the Immigration Act by the terms of this treaty, then that Act would stand exactly as it is; but when reference is made to the Immigration Act then that Act is limited by the terms of this Bill and we want the terms so amended that there shall not be that limitation.

Mr. BORDEN: We are impressed with the view that when we make the provisions of this treaty subject to the Immigration Act, we make them subject to everything that can be lawfully done under the provisions of the Immigration Act. To give a homely illustration, suppose a railway in Canada, not previously subject to the Board of Railway Commissioners or to the Railway Act of Canada were declared to be a work for the general advantage of Canada and became subject to Dominion jurisdiction and therefore subject to the Railway Act of Can- that it should also be subject to every regu- that it should olso be subject to every regulation that could be made by the Board of Railway Commisioner of Canada. The mere fact that it has become subject to the Railway Act renders it also subject to everything that can be lawfully done under the Act.

Mr. LEMIEUX: How would my right hon. friend extend that principle to international relations?

Mr. BORDEN: We are dealing with a statute of Canada or a Bill which, in the ordinary course, will become a statute of Canada. That Bill has been submitted to the Imperial Government of Japan, and they have declared themselves satisfied with it. When it passes it will have the force of law just as any other statute of Canada has the force of law.

Amendment (Mr. Emmerson) negatived on division.

Mr. BORDEN: In closing this debate, I should like to say a few words. There seems to have been a misapprehension in the minds of hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House. I am not quite sure whether they do not really understand the question as I think it ought to be understood, or whether there is merely an intentional misapprehension as to the purpose of the proviso in this Bill, and as to its effect. In the first place, a great deal of opposition has been manifested to this Bill during the past two days. It is rather surprising that that should have been the case when the right hon. the leader of the Opposition declared at the conclusion of his speech that, having received the information for which he had asked, he was perfectly satisfied with the Bill, and that it should pass without any suggestion of an amendment. Not only so, but the chief spokesman outside of the right hon. gentleman, the member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux), went even further, and congratulated the Government upon having brought in the Bill in this form.

Mr. LEMIEUX: On my right hon. friend's conversion.

Mr. BORDEN: I will give my hon. friend's own words if he is doubtful about it. Sometimes perhaps he does not recall what he has said:

> First of all I sincerely congratulate the right hon. the leader of the Government on this his first diplomatic venture since he has been called upon to fill the high office of Prime Minister of Canada.

And further on:

> I congratulate the right hon. the Prime Minister on the measure of success he has attained in these negotiations.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Will you read what I said later on?

Mr. BORDEN: Does my hon. friend mean that he changed his opinion between the beginning and the end of his speech?

Mr. LEMIEUX: I am quite sure my right hon. friend wishes to be fair.

Mr. BORDEN: I was reading from the beginning of his speech, but if he said anything at the end inconsistent with what I have read from the beginning, I will be delighted to read it as well, and perhaps we shall be able to strike an average from the two statements. The principal point that has been made by hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House, is this: although I would not like to commit them all to this, for as my hon. friend from Portage la Prairie (Mr. Meighen), noted this afternoon, there have been three distinct lines of thought put forward by hon. gentlemen on the other side, and we do not know at the present moment what is really the line of thought to which they wish to be committed. As my hon. friend (Mr. Meighen), remarked, there are those who say that the Bill is a proper Bill which ought to pass without opposition; there are those who say that this proviso is absolutely useless and nugatory, and there are those who think this proviso desirable and useful but that it ought to be extended. I think the Opposition are fairly divided upon those three lines of thought, and it would therefore be impossible for me to say which particular line of thought represents their real attitude.

But it was not for that purpose that I rose to address the House; it was for the purpose of endeavouring to make plain what, it seems to me, any hon. gentleman in this House ought to be able to understand without explanation. There are two questions in connection with this proviso, two questions connected with the Immigration Act of Canada, the force and effect of which are absolutely reserved by the Bill which now stands for its third reading. The first is as to the legal power, and the second is concerned with international considerations. Let me make that plain. We took the ground in 1907 that there should be reserved to the Parliament and Government of Canada the absolute control of immigration to our shores. I say that we have done that. because we have reserved our power of control under the Immigration Act of Canada. I defy any hon. gentleman on the other side of the House to point out to me any contingency, in respect of danger from immigration, against which this country cannot be absolutely safeguarded by those provisions of the Immigration Act which I have read, and which have been quoted over and over again in this House. Therefore, I say that so far as the legal power is concerned, we shall stand exactly where we now stand in case this Bill becomes law. We stand with the absolute legal power to control that immigration from Japan, as we can control it from any other country in the world.

Mr. OLIVER: My right hon. friend is so very strong on the perfect completeness of the exclusion provisions of the present Immigration Act, that I want to say to him that in immigration matters it is the unexpected that happens.

Mr. BORDEN: The unexpected does often happen. The unexpected has happened in the case of my hon. friend who, in 1907, was content to accept a treaty without any reservation whatever, and who today thinks that the very efficient proviso and reservation which we make does not go far enough. The unexpected has happened there, but I do not think there is the slightest danger of the unexpected happening so far as those provisions are concerned. My hon. friend does not take sufficient credit for the provisions of his own Immigration Act of 1910. The provisions of that Act are of the most comprehensive character. I have not heard any hon. gentleman on the other side of the House offer the slightest suggestion of any condition which might arise, and which would not be amply covered by the provisions of the sections to which I have alluded. There has been no suggestion of that kind from first to last in this very prolonged debate.

That is one question, the question of legal power. The other question which hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House desire to confuse with this, is the question of international relations. I venture to submit to them, if they do not understand it already, that the question of international relations would arise in applying the provisions of the Immigration Act to as great an extent if this Bill were not passed as if it were passed. What was the position that the right hon. the leader of the Opposition took in that regard? The position which he took in his speech from first to last was this: that because Japan was a great and powerful nation, ranking among the first nations of the world, because Japan is now, and has been for years past, the ally of Great Britain, and of this Empire, under a convention which has lately been extended so that it will continue for eight years in the future, very great consideration would have to be given to any proposal for excluding the citizens of Japan by name or for discriminating against them. I venture to submit to any hon. gentleman in this House who has given this subject one moment's study, that considerations of that kind would have arisen just as explicitly and just as strongly if this treaty had not been accepted, and if we stood purely upon the existing condition of international relations between Great Britain and Japan. In the one case you have to consider the legal power. We have preserved that legal power. In the other case you have to consider the question of international relations. If we are to give any force at all to the observations which the leader of thos hon. gentlemen has very cogently expressed, it must be apparent to any thinking man in this House who is disposed to be fair, that those considerations would come up in the one case as well as in the other.

Apart from that, I desire to add that the provisions of the Immigration Act, whether this treaty shall go into force or not, can be exercised, and may still be exercised, without any offence to the great and friendly nation with whom the treaty has been negotiated. As I have pointed out over and over again, although hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House have continued to ignore that consideration, the question is not, at the bottom, one of race or of discrimination against a nationality, but the question is one of economic concern. Therefore, it would be perfectly possible, whether this treaty did come into force or not, for the Government of Canada to pass regulations under the Immigration Act which would prevent the immigration of persons of a certain occupation whose competition would not be fair to the labouring men of Canada. The situation in that regard will be precisely in the future what it has been in the past since the treaty of 1894 ceased to have effect.

We stand to-day, therefore, in both respects, exactly where we would stand if this treaty did not come into force and the Conservative party to day, in the Bill which is presented for the consideration of this House, and which now stands for its third reading, are absolutely true to the policy that we enunciated in 1907, namely, the policy that the Government and Parliament of Canada should keep in their own hands, and within their own power the control of immigration from Japan or from any other country in the world. That is the policy which we laid out for ourselves in dealing with this question, that is the policy which is carried into effect by the Bill now before the House. It is absolutely consistent with that policy that we shall do what we propose to do, namely to give consideration to this question in the light of the cordial and friendly relations that exist between the great Empire of Japan and the Empire of which we form a part and to deal in a cordial, just and friendly spirit with any difficulties if they should arise in the future. I have not the slightest doubt that, if such difficulties should arise, we in Canada will be met in the same cordial and friendly spirit by the Government and representatives of the great Empire of Japan.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the third time and passed.

Mr. BORDEN.

LAFONTAINE PARK, MONTREAL.

On the motion of the Prime Minister for the adjournment of the House:

Mr. LEMIEUX: I would ask the Prime Minister to take up with the Minister of Militia and the Minister of Public Works a matter which has caused great excitement in Montreal. I refer to the alleged proposed construction of a drill hall in Lafontaine Park. The city of Montreal has maintained that park for the public, and it has been understood that it would be reserved for park purposes for all time. The statement is attributed to the Minister of Militia that a drill hall would be built in the park, and when I asked the Minister of Public Works about it yesterday, he said he did not know. Will the Prime Minister get me the information for Monday, so that the people of Montreal may be relieved from anxiety?

Mr. ROGERS: When my hon. friend asked the question yesterday, I made inquiry in the Department, and no person there seemed to have any knowledge about it.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 10.25 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

MONDAY, April 7, 1913

The SPEAKER took the Chair at three o'clock.

FIRST READING.

Bill No. 164, for the relief of Charles Albert Flower.—Mr. Meighen.

ATLANTIC MAIL SERVICE.

Hon. L. P. PELLETIER (Postmaster General): Before the Orders of the Day are called, I have an important contract which I desire to place before the House, together with the Order in Council approving of the same. Were it in order, I would like to give some explanation of it, but I understand I cannot do so without the unanimous consent of the House.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Is it with reference to the Atlantic mail service?

Mr. PELLETIER: Yes.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I am sure the House would like to hear it.

The unanimous consent of the House having been given:

Mr. PELLETIER: A contract for the carriage of the mails has been entered into on behalf of the Government, by the hon. Acting Minister of Trade and Commerce

(Mr. Perley) and myself as Postmaster General. The contract, as I have said, is for the ocean mail service, and I shall make a brief explanation. Up to the present time the Canadian Atlantic mail service has been done with practically only four steamships, and the service has been once a week. Some other lines receive small amounts in connection with the mail service, but, in the past, a great part of the ocean mail service for Canada has been carried on through the port of New York. We have now entered into a contract under which we expect we will be able to take care of our own Canadian mail service to the Mother Country. In virtue of the postal union regulations, Canada, like all other countries, takes care of whatever part of its mail transportation it can, and for that part which Canada, or any other country cannot take care of, it pays to the country whose port the mails leave for their destination, rates which are fixed by the postal union. For the last six years or so, Canada has been paying about $185,000 a year for the Canadian mails going to England via New York. I am not criticising that; there was a good deal of reason for it, because Canada was not ready to take care of its own mails to the full extent we expect it is now. However, to provide against that, we have entered into this new contract under which, instead of having four steamships leaving Canadian ports with Canadian mails, we shall have twelve steamers. Omitting any reference to the small subsidiary mail service, the Atlantic mail service for Canada was done by the four ships: Empress of Britain, Empress of Ireland, Victorian, and Virginian The former contract was with the Allan Company, but it was divided between them and the Canadian Pacific Railway Steamship Company, with their two Empresses. Under this new contract instead of a weekly service we are going to have a service three times a week in summer and twice a week in winter, and instead of having four ships performing that service, we shall have twelve. I saw in the newspapers this morning that the contract we have entered into was with one company, which would subcontract it out to other companies, but that is not correct. The contract we have entered into is a straight contract with four important companies: the Allan Line, the Canadian Pacific Railway Line, the Canadian Northern Line, and the White Star Dominion Line. For the summer service, the Allan Line is going to supply the Victorian, the Virginian, the Corsican, the Tunisian; and until such time as these fine new ships, the Alsatian and the Calgarian, are ready, the Allan Line will put at our disposal the Grampian and the Hesperian. It is expected that some time in July the splendid palatial ships, Alsatian and the Calgarian, will be ready, and will then take their places in this service in lieu of the Hesperian and the Grampian. The Canadian Northern line intends to put on for this service its two Royals, the Royal George and the Royal Edward. The White Star Dominion line is going to put on for the summer service the Laurentic and the Megantic. For the winter service, we shall have the two Empresses, the Empress of Britain and the Empress of Ireland, the Alsatian and the Calgarian, the Victorian and the Virginian, and the two Royals, the Royal George and the Royal Edward. We are also going to have the Teutonic, of the White Star (Dominion) line, as a spare boat to replace any of these ships which may be out of commission or which it is necessary to overhaul. Thus for the winter service we shall have eight ships, exclusive of the Teutonic, which will be a spare boat, in order to have a continuous service. The summer sailings will be on Tuesdays, Thursdays, and Saturdays.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Where from?

Mr. PELLETIER: The ships can start from whatever port the companies please, provided they do not start from any but a Canadian port, namely, Montreal or Quebec in summer, and St. John or Halifax in winter.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Not both?

Mr. PELLETIER: Halifax or St. John at the option of the contractors, which means that each of the ports will stand on its own merits. We understake to deliver the mails through whichever of the ports the companies will choose, for both the winter and the summer services. As a matter of fact, for the summer service, the boats will start either from Montreal or from Quebec, whichever is chosen; but the mails will be landed at Quebec, because, as everyone knows, we can handle the mails at Quebec, and accommodate the public of all Canada much better than if the mails were landed at Montreal. There is a clause in the contract by which the four companies undertake, jointly and severally, to get some other ship in order to replace any one which may for a time be disabled or unable to make the service, so that we have assured for Canada a continuous service. We intend to have our mails taken over to the Mother Country and mails brought from the Mother Country to this country by Canada and on ships navigating Canadian waters. I have no doubt we shall succeed in accomplishing this object. As was expected, the subsidy is to be increased. It will amount to a million dollars. This will include transportation of the mails from here to the Mother Country and from the Mother Country to Canada.

Mr. LEMIEUX: How is the subsidy apportioned?

Mr. PELLETIER: So much per voyage. In the first place, it is apportioned so much per week. Each ship, starting each week, will receive its apportioned share of the subsidy. This is all a matter of detail, which is given very fully in the contract which I intend to place before the House.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN (South York): What is the present amount of this subsidy?

Mr. PELLETIER: The present cost for the weekly service is $600,000, with, as some hon. members know, an additional amount given to this and that other boat in very small sums which aggregate about $50,000 or $56,000 a year, so that the amount which we were paying up to now from the two departments, Trade and Commerce and Post Office, was about $656,000 a year. We are now going to have a tri-weekly service for summer and a semi-weekly service for winter, for the sum of a million dollars.

Mr. CARVELL: Will this cover the amount which we are paying for the New York service ?

Mr. PELLETIER: According to the Postal Union Convention, the census of all mail matter sent by different countries is to be taken this year. When that is done, it will regulate the position of all countries for six years. For the last six years we have been paying about $186,000 a year to the United States. The census is to be taken in May of this year, and that is one of the reasons why we have tried to close this contract as soon as possible. We do not expect that for this year we shall save the whole $186,000 which we have been paying for the last six years to the United States Government, but we expect to save part of it, because the census as I understand from Berne, the headquarters of the postal union, will likely come into force on the 1st of January, 1914. If that is so, we expect to save quite a sum from the difference in the weight of mail matter heretofore sent through the port of New York and the amount of mail matter which in May of this year will be sent through Canadian ports. Of course we cannot accurately estimate it now, but we expect it will be fairly large. So far as the mail coming from the Mother Country is concerned, according to the same regulations which have been in force for the last six years, we only got from the Mother Country some $23,000 a year whilst we were taking care of the return mails. Perhaps this would have been $46,000 a year, but there was a difference of opinion between the Home Government and our Government as to whether the Canadian Pacific railway steamers were Canadian or British couriers. The British post office contended that they were couriers for the Government of Great Britain and refused to pay more than $23,000 a year. According to the census which is to be taken this year, we expect that this sum will be very largely increased. With the amounts which, under this census, we save from the United States, and with the increased amount which we will get from Great Britain, we shall be in a splendid position next year and during the other five years to come, and we even expect that for this current year we shall be able to get enough under those two heads to recoup ourselves to a certain extent—maybe to a pretty large extent—for the increased subsidy which we undertake to pay under this contract. We have been told by these steamship companies that the payment for the winter service, which is the amount I have mentioned, is absolutely inadequate. They pretend, rightly or wrongly—we will look into that more carefully this year, because this is only a one year contract—that they are entitled to more for the winter service, which they claim is carried on at a loss. We have told them that we might consider that question next year, but we would like to have their concurrence in order to have the contract put into effect this year, so that Canada might get the benefit of the census from the 1st of May when the contract is to begin.

Mr. MACDONALD: Would the hon. gentleman tell us whether any arrangements have been made providing for an increase of speed in the boats that perform this service?

Mr. PELLETIER: The hon. gentleman will see by the contract—I do not wish to go into details——

Mr. MACDONALD: That could be stated briefly.

Mr. PELLETIER: The speed of these ships, the number of knots that they can make is mentioned in the contract. Of course we expect them to give us this service.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Are they not bound to give a certain service?

Mr. PELLETIER: Yes, the service I have described. The speed is mentioned in the contract, and they are bound, except in cases of accident or force majeure, to give us this service. The number of knots for each ship is mentioned in the contract.

Mr. MACDONALD: Is it a better speed than last contract?

Mr. PELLETIER: We shall have two ships, the Alsatian and the Calgarian, which give a better speed than others we had in the service. But the point is, that according to the calculations made in our department, with the speed which these ships are going to give us, and on account of the relatively shorter distance between Canada and Great Britain, we expect to succeed in landing our mails in Great Britain with this service as quickly as they would be landed from the port of New York. As to the winter service, while it is well known that the biggest ships going from the port of New York in winter time are taken off for the purpose of special cruising in the Mediterranean and other places, we have succeeded in securing for Canada the best kind of ships which will give us a splendid winter service. And as a result, we expect that the Canadian mails will be handed over on the shores of Great Britain as quickly as they would be through the port of New York.

Mr. MACLEAN (South York): What are the landing ports in Great Britain?

Mr. PELLETIER: They are, at the option of the companies, either the port of Liverpool or the port of Bristol, with the exception that so far as the Hesperian and the Grampian are concerned, which are only in the service for a short time, they will continue to go to Glasgow until the Alsatian and the Calgarian are ready.

Mr. PUGSLEY: But if the different companies receive an equal amount——

Mr. PELLETIER: The amount is divided by fifty-two weeks.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The White Star line has no winter steamers. What are its summer steamers?

Mr. PELLETIER: The Laurentic and the Megantic in the summer time. The White Star Dominion Line will also have one ship in winter, the Teutonic.

Mr. PUGSLEY: But the ships of the White Star are subsidized in summer. What ports do they go to in the winter?

Mr. PELLETIER: We are not concerned with that; we do not pay them when they go elsewhere in winter.

Mr. MACDONALD: I understood the Postmaster General to say that in the summer time the mails were to be taken aboard and embarked at Quebec. Is there any arrangement for the maritime provinces mails to be taken off at Rimouski?

Mr. PELLETIER: Yes, we have continued the arangement in reference to that. The mails for the maritime provinces are landed at Rimouski, so that the maritime provinces people get their mails quicker than they otherwise would.

Mr. MACDONALD: Is there any new condition in regard to speed affecting the vessels other than the two new vessels which the Allans are building?

Mr. PELLETIER: Not any greater speed than the ships engaged. We have taken the ships that are available and which are the best ships to-day in the Canadian service. Except the Grampian and the Hesperian, which are only temporary and which will be replaced with the two new ships, the speed of these ships is the best we have on the St. Lawrence route.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Are the White Star ships not to be allowed to sail from Portland?

Mr. PELLETIER: None of these ships are under this contract to sail from a foreign port.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I understand that the White Star ships are allowed to go to an American port in winter.

Mr. PELLETIER. But they do not get any subsidy for ships which are not in the winter service.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Does the hon. minister give the same subsidy in winter?

Mr. PELLETIER: It is by the week.

Mr. MACLEAN (South York): An equal subsidy for each mail voyage?

Mr. PELLETIER: No, for each week. The sum of $1,000,000 is divided into fifty-two parts, and each week will earn its share of the $1,000,000.

Mr. TURRIFF: Do the two ships in the winter service get the same subsidy as the three ships of the summer service?

Mr. PELLETIER: There are——

Mr. TURRIFF: I mean two ships a week.

Mr. PELLETIER: Eight ships with a spare one in the winter service and twelve ships in the summer service.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Do I understand that the steamship companies say that the winter service is not a profitable service and that they ought to have a larger subsidy?

Mr. PELLETIER: Yes, they claim that.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Then, it is true, is it not, that the White Star line gets per week during the summer the same subsidy that the others do; that will have the winter service and that in the winter the White Star are allowed to go to American ports?

Mr. PELLETIER: That was a matter of arrangement between the companies. But the hon. gentleman will remember that the White Star line gives a ship which will be one of the fastest in the service, the Teutonic, and that that ship will be at our disposition for the whole winter.

In brief, from the 1st of May, we shall send our mails on these ships to the Motherland, and we are going to take care of our own Canadian mail service. I suppose the House will agree that this is another step towards nationhood. I beg to place before the House both the contract and the Order in Council authorizing the same.

Mr. SPEAKER. With reference to the practice of laying papers before the House, it seems to me that we have been departing from the proper practice of late. Therefore, I thought it best to suggest the method now adopted—that this action should be by unanimous consent of the House, so that it might not be regarded as a precedent. It is laid down by Bourinot and May that no papers can be laid before Parliament except by command of His Royal Highness under the authority of the statutes, by means of an address, or by an order of the House. The course this House has heretoforefore adopted is for the hon. member who designs to lay papers before the House to move for a return of these papers, and then lay them on the table of the House. In this case, however, these papers have been laid on the table by common consent, so that it may not be cited as a precedent.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: My hon. friend the Postmaster General mentioned a matter in regard to which I would like some explanation. He said, if I understood him aright, that there was a dispute between the Imperial Government and the Canadian Government as to the character of the services performed by the Canadian Pacific railway steamers, in regard to whether or not they were British or Canadian couriers. Does this mean they are subsidized also by the Imperial Government?

Mr. PELLETIER: The Canadian Pacific railway steamers are now performing what we call the Hong Kong service. Our contract for the carrying of the Canadian mails is with the Allan line, but the contract for the Hong Kong service is with the Canadian Pacific railway. The British Government claims, in view of the fact that the Canadian Pacific railway steamers are performing this Hong Kong service, for which we pay jointly with the British Government, that the contract is with them, and that the Canadian Pacific railway steamers are British couriers. As I have said, our contract is with the Allan line, but the British Government has consented to pay only what it should pay if its contention that the Canadian Pacific railway steamers in the Hong Kong service are British couriers were correct.

Mr. PELLETIER.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: The Hong Kong service is from Liverpool to Quebec, Quebec to Vancouver, and Vancouver to Hong Kong, and for that reason the British Government claim they are British couriers.

Mr. PELLETIER: Yes.

QUESTIONS.

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

ST. JOHN-SOUTH AFRICAN EXPORTS.

Mr. SINCLAIR:

1. What is the estimated value of the goods shipped by the subsidized South African steamers from the port of St. John, N.B., for the year ending December 31, 1912?

2. What is the number and estimated value of the automobiles exported by the said boats during the said period?

1. $1,070,792.

2. During the year 1912: from St. John, 104 automobiles, value $81,094; from Montreal, 606, value, $523,753; total, 710, value, $604,847.

CAMPBELLTON-GASPE STEAMSHIP SERVICE.

Mr. MARCIL:

1. Has the Department of Trade and Commerce entered into a contract with the proprietors of the SS. Canada for a service between Campbellton and Gaspé for the coming season of navigation?

2. If so, what is the amount of the subsidy to be paid, and have any special clauses been put in the contract for the control of rates for passengers and freight?

3. What is the term of duration of the contract, and have any former stopping places been cancelled? If so, which are they?

Mr. PERLEY:

1. Yes.

2. $20,000. Yes.

3. Until the close of navigation, 1915. No.

ONTARIO EQUIPMENT COMPANY.

Mr. CARVELL:

1. When was the Ontario Equipment Company of Ottawa incorporated by letters patent?

2. Was the company authorized by said letters patent to manufacture and sell locks and keys?

3. What are the names of the applicants for incorporation?

Mr. PELLETIER:

1. From the information obtainable, the Ontario Equipment Company is incorporated not by federal letters patent, but under the laws of the province of Ontario, and this information would have to come from Toronto.

MAIL BAG LOCKS.

Mr. CARVELL:

1. How many locks for mail bags were purchased by the Post Office Department during the last ten years, omitting the last order given to the Ontario Equiment Company?

2. What has been the average price paid for said locks?

3. Who supplied the department with locks during that time?

Mr. PELLETIER:

1. 79,162 locks. This does not comprise any new locks under the last contract.

2. From 1903 to 1907, 14,000 at 70 cents per lock, and 10 cents for the key. Since 1907, 65,162 at 80 cents per lock, and 20 cents for the key.

3. E. G. Shepherd up to October, 1911, and The Ontario Equipment Company since October, 1911.

Mr. MACDONALD:

What experts were consulted in connection with the new locks for mail bags recently purchased by the Post Office Department?

Mr. PELLETIER: The question assumes that new locks have been purchased under the last contract. This is inaccurate. No new locks have as yet been supplied, but the Ontario Equipment Company have agreed to supply those which may be required. Mr. Sidney Smith, controller of postal stores, who, on account of his long years of experience and his practical knowledge, is the best possible expert, has been consulted about the Ontario Equipment Company's contract, and his advice has been followed.

*Mr. MARTIN (Montreal):

1. What became of the old locks formerly used for the mail bags in the Post office Department?

2. Have the new locks recently purchased by the Post office Department been distributed?

3. If so, how many have been alloted to each province?

Mr. PELLETIER:

1. As fully explained in the memorandum of the controller of postal stores, which is to be found in the 'Hansard' of April 1 instant, the contractor has not so far been able to supply any of the new locks.

2. Answered by No. 1.

3. Answered by No. 1.

*Mr. BUREAU:

1. Has the opinion of an expert been obtained before deciding to buy new locks for mail bags?

2. If so, what is the name of the expert?

3. If not, why was it not done?

Mr. PELLETIER: This question assumes that new locks have been purchased under the last contract. This is inaccurate. No new locks have as yet been purchased, but the Ontario Equipment Company have agreed to supply those which may be required. Mr. Sidney Smith, controller of postal stores, who, on account of his long years of experience and practical knowledge, is the best expert, has been consulted about the Ontario Equipment Company's contract, and his advice has been followed.

Mr. BELAND:

1. How many steel clamp mail locks have been purchased by the Post Office Department during the last ten years respectively?

2. How many have been purchased in the years 1908, 1909, 1910 and 1911, respectively?

3. How many were purchased by the present Government from the 6th of October, 1911, to the 1st of April, 1913?

4. How many new mail locks can the Post Office Department store without renting new rooms?

5. Is the new patent lock supplied by the Ontario Equipment Company larger or smaller than the one in use heretofore?

6. Has the Government an expert supervising the manufacture of the 350,000 locks contracted for with that company?

Mr. PELLETIER:

1. 79,162, i.e., 1903-04, nil; 1904-05, nil; 1905-06, 5,000; 1906-07, 6,000; 1907-08, 9,000; 1908-09, 9,000; 1909-10, 6,000; 1910-11, 15,000; 1911-12, 17,162; 1912-13, 16,500

2. Answered by No. 1.

3. 28,500, as requisitioned for by postmasters.

4. The Post Office Department does not intend to store locks. They are asked for from the manufacturer as they are needed.

5. They have supplied no new locks so far.

6. No. The contract provides that when locks come in they are examined and the department has the right to refuse them if they are not satisfactory. Moreover, the question assumes that the Post Office Department has contracted for 350,000 locks and that is an erroneous statement.

*Mr. CARVELL:

1. How many locks for mail bags have been purchased by the Post Office Department for each of the years 1906, 1907, 1908, 1909, 1910, 1911, and 1912?

2. What was the price paid for said locks in each of said years?

3. What is the name or designation of the locks so purchased?

Mr. PELLETIER:

1. 1905-6, 5,000; 1906-7, 6,000; 1907-8, 9,000; 1908-9, 9,000; 1909-10, 6,000; 1910-11, 10,500; 1911-12, 17,162; 1912-13, 16,500.

2. From January, 1905, to October, 1907, 70 cents each for the lock and 10 cents for the key.

From October, 1907, to 1912, 80 cents each for the lock and 20 cents for the key.

3. Patent steel clamp lock with swivel, chain and snap attached.

*Mr. EMMERSON:

1. How many new locks for mail bags will be required for the various post offices of the province of New Brunswick?

2. Have any been distributed already?
3. Were there any requisitions made for same? If so, from whom?

Mr. PELLETIER:

1. It would be impossible to accurately guess that in advance even if the question referred to a stated number of years, which it does not.
2. No.
3. Reports suggesting new locks have been made for several years. It would be necessary to look at all the files to say from whom. In 1906, Mr. Armstrong, the Controller of Railway Mail Service, reported as follows:

The complaint is general that locks which are supposed to be securely fastened drop off when thrown on the platform. There has for a number of years been dissatisfaction with the present lock used by the department.

It is with that report before the department that the price of these same locks was increased by a previous Postmaster General from 80 cents (for the lock and key) to $1.

*Mr. BUCHANAN:

How many new locks and keys for mail bags will be required for the postal service in the province of Alberta?

Mr. PELLETIER: Even if this question mentioned some time limit which would render it more intelligible, the possibility of an answer would at all events also depend on the expansion of the service which is likely to be very considerable in western Canada, but which cannot be accurately guessed.

Mr. SINCLAIR:

1. Has any estimate been made of the number of new locks and keys for mail bags required in the province of Nova Scotia?
2. If so, how many will be required for the present fiscal year?

Mr. PELLETIER:

1. Not especially for Nova Scotia. A general estimate was made for the whole of Canada by the assistant deputy minister, and this was later corrected and fully explained in the House, as appears in 'Hansard' of the 1st April instant.
2. Answered by No. 1.

*Mr. MARCIL:

Has the Postmaster General made any test of the new locks for mail bags in the matter of exposure to conditions which would cause rust? If so, where and when?

Mr. PELLETIER: No new locks have as yet been delivered. When some are delivered, the efficient controller of postal stores will examine them as they come, and if all or any of the new locks are found unsatisfactory, they will be returned to the manufacturer. The two years' guarantee specified in the contract safeguards the department against the acceptance of any defective lock, every one of which must prove efficient under practial service conditions for that period before being formally accepted.

*Mr. TURRIFF:

How many new locks and keys for mail bags will be required for the postal service in the province of Saskatchewan?

Mr. PELLETIER: Even if this question mentioned some limited time which would help in rendering it more intelligible the possibility of an answer would at all events also depend on the expansion of the service, which is very considerable in western Canada, but which cannot be accurately guessed beforehand.

NICTAUX FISH HATCHERY.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax):

1. From whom were lands purchased for the fish hatchery at Nictaux, Annapolis county, N.S., and what price was paid in each case?
2. What progress has been made in the way of building dam, &c.?
3. Has any spawn yet been purchased for said hatchery? If so, what quantity and from whom?
4. Are any men at present employed in connection with the operation of said fish hatchery? If so, what are their names, the amount of salary paid to each of them, and the nature of the services in each case performed?
5. If any persons are now employed at said hatchery, what are their special qualifications for the positions they occupy, and by whom were they recommended for the appointments to the Minister of Marine and Fisheries?
6. What has been the total cost to date of said fish hatchery?

Mr. HAZEN:

1. Purchased from H. V. Gates, of Middleton, for five hundred dollars.
2. Hatchery and dam completed.
3. Hatchery contains 1,750,000 Atlantic salmon eggs, which have been transferred from the Margaree hatchery, Nova Scotia, and 50,000 speckled trout eggs from the St. Alexis hatchery, Quebec.
4. Yes. L. J. Burton, five hundred and fifty dollars a year, officer in charge; Geo. Heatley, five hundred dollars a year, assistant; H. V. Gates, five hundred dollars a year, assistant. Care of eggs and fry, and general hatchery work.
5. Mr. Burton has been assistant in the Margaree hatchery since 1907. He is a capable officer and has gained an intimate knowledge of hatchery work. His transfer was recommended by the responsible departmental officers. The employment of Messrs. Heatley and Gates was recommended by Mr. A. L. Davidson. They are represented as being active, energetic, healthy young men of strictly temperate habits and possessing a good education.

6. $9,236.46.

EMILE BOURASSA.

Mr. GAUTHIER (St. Hyacinthe):

1. Did the Department of Marine and Fisheries, at a date subsequent to the 14th of February last, send a letter bearing No. 10046 and addressed to Emile Bourassa, of Montreal, informing him that he would be appointed to a position in the Marine Agency of Montreal, as soon as he had passed the qualification examination?

2. Will the Minister of Marine and Fisheries produce a copy of said letter?

Mr. HAZEN:

1. As a result of the representations made by Mr. Coderre, M.P., and others, on behalf of the longshoremen of Montreal, to the effect that measures should be adopted to provide greater safeguards for those engaged in the handling of traffic to and from ships at the port of Montreal during the season of navigation, several conferences between representatives of the Montreal Harbour Commission, the Shipping Federation of Canada, and the Department of Marine and Fisheries, were held during the year 1911-12. Among the requests put forward by the longshoremen, was the appointment of an additional inspector of tackle at the port of Montreal. The department, after fully considering all the facts, resolved to appoint such an officer, whose services should be available for the season of navigation, 1913. On the 30th of May, 1912, Mr. Coderre recommended the appointment of Mr. A. E. Bourassa to the position. On the 20th February, 1913, the Deputy Minister of Marine and Fisheries forwarded a letter to Mr. A. E. Bourassa, advising him to present himself before the steamboat inspector at Montreal for the purpose of establishing his qualifications for the position of inspector of ships' tackle at that port. The letter further stated that, if in the judgment of the steamboat inspector, Mr. Bourassa's qualifications were sufficient for the position, steps would be taken to appoint him at a salary of $1,000 per annum. Mr. Bourassa did not present himself for examination; he has not been appointed to this or any other position in the employ of the Government of Canada; and if he presents himself to the steamboat inspector of Montreal, no examination will be granted him.

2. Copy of the letter is attached hereto.

20th February, 1913.

Re Appointment Inspector of Tackle.

My Dear Sir,—By direction of the hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, I am to advise you to present yourself before Mr. William Laurie, steamboat inspector of Montreal, for the purpose of establishing your qualifications for the position of inspector of ships' tackle at the port of Montreal.

If in the judgment of Mr. Laurie, your qualifications are sufficient for this position, immediate steps will be taken to appoint you at a salary of $1,000 per annum.

You will act from time to time in conjunction with the present inspector, Mr. Martin, under instructions from Mr. Laurie.

Your truly,

(Sgd.) A. Johnson.

Emile Bourassa, Esq.,

RURAL MAIL DELIVERY BOXES.

Mr. RAINVILLE:

1. How many rural mail boxes were ordered for the use of rural mail service for Canada previous to October, 1911?
2. Where were these mail boxes purchased?
3. Were tenders called for?
4. What prices were paid for each box?
5. How many boxes are in store at present?
6. Where are these boxes stored?
7. If these boxes are not kept in Government public buildings, what is the price paid for storage?
8. With the rural mail policy, as followed by the previous Government, how many years would have been needed to use all these boxes?

Mr. PELLETIER:

1. 110,000 boxes were purchased by the previous Government.
2. The purchase was made from the International Equipment Company, New York.
3. No.
4. The price to be paid accepted by the then Postmaster General, and agreed upon by him without inviting tenders, was $3 a box for each box, making a total of $330,000.
5. About 45,000.
6. In postal stations at Toronto and in the premises of the different post office inspectors.
7. No storage is paid.
8. No accurate answer can be given to that question. The first boxes were installed in August, 1908. Up to December, 1911, over three years after, only 18,844 had been installed.

Mr. LEMIEUX:

1. How many rural mail delivery boxes have been installed since the establishment of rural mail delivery in Canada?
2. How many routes have been opened in 1908, 1909, 1910, 1911, 1912, respectively?

Mr. PELLETIER:

1. 43,000—16,015 by the previous Government and 26,985 by the present Government. 20,000 more boxes will however be erected by the present Government on routes which have already been authorized and which will be inaugurated at an early date.

2. 1908, 40; number of boxes erected, 1,000; 1909, 192; number of boxes erected, 3,282; 1910, 156; number of boxes erected,

5,324; 1911, 216; number of boxes erected, 9,240; 1912, 307; number of boxes erected, 7,638. Since the 1st of January, 1913, 16,500 boxes have been reported as erected in addition to the above which brings the total number of boxes erected to 43,000.

FENIAN RAID INDEMNITY.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Kamouraska):

1. Has the Government paid to Madame Hortense Lévesque, widow of the late Firmin Thibault, of St. Denis de Kamouraska, the indemnity claimed by the said Firmin Thibault, for having served at the time of the Fenian invasion in 1870?
2. If so, when was the payment made?
3. If not, why has the payment not been and does the Government intend to do it?

Mr. WHITE (Minister of Finance): Cheque for the amount was mailed 11th December, 1912 and cheque was cashed prior to 19th December, 1912.

EXPENDITURE IN MARIA PARISH.

Mr. MARCIL:

1. Has the Minister of Public Works authorized lately the expenditure of any sum of money in the parish of Maria, Bonaventure county, Quebec, and for what purpose?
2. What was the amount authorized, how much has been expended, and at whose request was such authority given?
3. Who was placed in charge of such work?

Mr. ROGERS:

1. Yes, to repair a retaining wall.
2. (a) $800; (b) $799.94; (c) Mr. J. A. Mousseau.
3. Under the supervision of district engineer J. C. Taché, and conductor of work, Jean Vigneau.

M. M. MOWAT, FISHERY OFFICER.

Mr. MARCIL:

1. Has the Minister of Marine and Fisheries received a petition from the Restigouche Fishermen's Association against the appointment of Mr. Maxwell M. Mowat as a fishery officer, with powers throughout the Dominion, without salary?
2. If so, is the Mowat referred to in the employ and pay of the Restigouche Riparian Association as head guardian?
3. Is the Government aware as to whether or not membership of this association is largely recruited among aliens?
4. Is the minister aware as to whether or not the members and clubs forming the said association have acquired extensive salmon and trout fishing properties and rights in the Restigouche river and its branches?
5. Is the minister aware as to whether or not the said association have for years shown a desire and disposition to crowd out the net fishermen from the said river?
6. If so, is the minister of the opinion that the said Mowat will be, in his official capacity, qualified to deal fairly and justly as between the net fishermen, the Department of Marine and Fisheries and the said association?
7. Does the minister intend to maintain the said Mowat in his said office of fishery officer, with power throughout the Dominion as long as he remains in the service of the association?
8. What answer was given to the said petition, if one was received?

Mr. HAZEN:

1. Yes.
2. The department understands that he is.
3. The department has no definite information.
4. The department has no definite information.
5. No.
6. Mr. Mowat has not been given magisterial powers; but merely necessary authority to enable him to examine nets, &c., to see that they comply with the laws, without being liable for trespass.
7. Matter is under consideration.
8. The petitioners are being advised that the prayer of their petition will receive careful consideration.

PANAMA CALIFORNIA EXPOSITION.

Mr. SINCLAIR:

Is it the intention of the Government to have Canada represented at the Panama-California Exposition, proposed to be held at San Diego, California, about the date of the opening of the Panama canal?

Mr. BURRELL: No. It is not the intention of the Government to have Canada represented at the Panama-California Exposition, to be held at San Diego, California.

DISMISSALS.

Mr. OLIVER:

In reference to the answer of the Minister of the Interior, given on Monday, February 24, to an inquiry as to the reason for the dismissal of Howard Douglas, in what particular instance or instances did Howard Douglas use his position as superintendent of parks to advance his personal interests, as stated by the minister?

Mr. CROTHERS: In further reference to this question, timber berth No. 528, British Columbia.

Mr. McCRANEY:

Was any investigation held by the Post Office Department respecting charges of political partisanship against F. Hazell, lately postmaster at Hanley, Saskatchewan?

Mr. PELLETIER: No. It was not considered necessary to go to the expense of an investigation. The facts were sufficiently known.

Mr. McCRANEY:

1. Was any investigation held by the Department of the Interior respecting charges of political partisanship against F. Hazell, lately sub-agent Dominion Lands at Hanley, Saskatchewan?

2. If not, on what information did the department act, and on whose recommendation was his dismissal made?

Mr. CROTHERS:

1. No.

2. On indisputable evidence of active partisanship. Recommendation of Messrs. D. McLean, Laird, and Baldwin.

Mr. MARCIL:

1. Has Mr. Edmund Dea, overseer of the lobster hatchery at Port Daniel West, Quebec, been dismissed? If so, on what grounds, and who made the complaint?

2. Was an investigation held, or was the dismissed official given an opportunity of meeting the charges made against him?

3. Who has been appointed to replace Mr. Dea?

Mr. HAZEN:

1. Yes. Political partisanship. Mr. J. A. Mousseau, New Carlisle.

2. No investigation was held.

3. Jeremiah Jones, Port Daniel Centre, Quebec.

*Mr. LEMIEUX:

1. Has Albert Dunn, engineer employed in the eastern block, been dismissed?

2. If so, why and at whose request?

3. Has any investigation been held?

Mr. ROGERS:

1. Yes.

2. (a) Political partisanship; (b) at request of Mr. A. E. Fripp, M.P.

3. Yes.

Mr. ETHIER:

1. Who asked for the dismissal of Edmond Lacroix, postmaster of St. Joseph du Lac, county of Two Mountains?

2. Has an inquiry been held in order to justify the dismissal of the said Edmond Lacroix?

3. If so, who are the persons who gave evidence for the complainant against Mr. Lacroix, and what was the report of the inquiring commissioner?

4. Has the postmaster been appointed in the place of Mr. Edmond Lacroix?

5. If so, what is the name of the new occupant and on whose recommendation was he appointed?

Mr. PELLETIER:

1. He was removed by direction of the Postmaster General for political partisanship.

2. The charges were made the subject of judicial inquiry.

3. Messrs. Arthur Desjardins and Rodrigue Larocque. The commissioner found that the charges were proven.

4. Yes.

5. Rodrigue Larocque, appointed by direction of the Postmaster General.

*Mr. MURPHY:

1. On what date was M. T. Conway appointed to a position in the Government Printing Bureau?

2. Has the said M. T. Conway been given notice of his dismissal? If so, on what date will his employment cease?

3. Are the services of the said M. T. Conway to be dispensed with on the ground, as alleged, that he took 'an active and offensive part in the last general election for the House of Commons'?

4. Who has been appointed to succeed Mr. Conway, and what salary is to be paid to his successor?

Mr. CODERRE:

1. 7th October, 1911.

2. Yes. 14th April, 1913.

3. Yes.

4. Nobody.

NAVAL FORCES OF THE EMPIRE.

Consideration in Committee of Bill No. 21, to authorize measures for increasing the effective Naval Forces of the Empire—Mr. Borden resumed from March 10. (Mr. Deputy Speaker in the Chair.)

On section 2:

From and out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund of Canada there may be paid and applied a sum not exceeding thirty-five million dollars for the purpose of immediately increasing the effective naval forces of the Empire;

And the amendment thereto proposed by Mr. Guthrie:

That, after the word 'dollars,' in the third line of the section, the following words be inserted: 'to be expended in Canada in the construction and equipment of naval forces as hereinafter set out.

Right Hon. R. L. BORDEN (Prime Minister): Mr. Chairman, before we proceed with the actual discussion of the amendment of my hon. friend from South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie), I would like to suggest to my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) that the Bill now under consideration has occupied a large part of the attention of this House for a very long period; in fact, it has occupied nearly all of the attention of the House since the 5th day of December last, it has already been no fewer than thirteen days in committee, and I will not stop to enlarge upon the length of time that otherwise has been devoted to it.

While it is not desired on this side of the House unduly to restrict debate upon an important measure such as this, yet its consideration has occupied a longer period than ever in my experience has been devoted to a measure introduced by a Government. It is usual under similar conditions that some date should be suggested and agreed to, at which the Bill should pass out of committee and the vote on its third reading be taken. I desire to suggest to my right hon. friend that some date should be named when the Bill may be reported from committee, after all the discussion that is deemed advisable or necessary, and that a date should be fixed for the vote on the third reading. This, under the circumstances, is only a reasonable request, and it is one which in the past practice of the House has been complied with. I therefore respectfully suggest to my hon. friends on the other side of the House, and particularly the right hon. gentleman who leads the Opposition, that some date should now be fixed for the remaining stages of the Bill, and that then we should go on and discuss it with a view to bringing the debate to a conclusion within the time thus indicated.

Right Hon. Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Mr. Chairman, the request which has just been made by my right hon. friend who has the responsibility of leading the House is one that is entitled to a fair and unequivocal answer at our hands. I do not agree with my right hon. friend when he says that the measure now before us has occupied more time in discussion than any measure which has been at any time introduced by any government. I rather believe that if my right hon. friend will consult his own memory, he will agree that not later than two years ago, when we introduced the reciprocity measure, this House devoted more time to its discussion than has yet been occupied by the discussion on the Naval Aid Bill. The resolutions on reciprocity were introduced, I believe on the 26th of January, and, with some intermission, on the 29th of July following were still pending before Parliament. I did not find any fault with the attitude then taken by the Opposition. In parliamentary government as it exists in England, it has frequently happened that the usual harmony between the majority and the minority has not been found adequate by the minority of the proper discharge of the duty which it owed to itself and which it thought it owed to the country. Let us be frank about this: before I conclude I shall give to the House, I hope, proper reasons for the position we have taken on this measure. It has been charged that our attitude has been that of obstruction, and, though obstruction has been held to be unparliamentary, the thing itself, whether you call it obstruction or by any other name, is not at all unknown to parliamentary government. I cannot do better than quote the foot note which is found in Redlich, volume I, page 81, referring to remarks by Sir Erskine May, who undoubtedly is the standard authority on parliamentary procedure:

> Sir Erskine May also points to this cause in his pamphlet, 'Remarks with a view to facilitate the dispatch of public business in Parliament.' The development of freedom, he says, had enormously increased the desire to speak in the House. Delays and even obstructions must not always be regarded as illegitimate parliamentary weapons as they afforded the means of collecting the opinions of constituencies and the public.

In the course of my parliamentary experience, both in opposition and in the Government especially when I had the responsibility of leading the House, I never complained if obstruction was offered to measures proposed by us; and in the last instance which occurred and to which I have referred, I thought the best solution was to refer the matter to the people themselves, and that is the solution which in such cases must always give the best satisfaction.

Mr. SCHAFFNER: That is the whole thing.

Mr. TURRIFF: You are afraid of it.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: To the proposal which has been made by my right hon. friend, I will answer for this day and for this day only. The reason we have taken the attitude we have taken against this Bill is, in the words of May, to call the attention of the constituencies and the public to the most important measure perhaps which has ever engaged the attention of the Parliament of Canada during the forty years or more of its existence. Important it undoubtedly is, because it opens the way to a new departure altogether in our national life. This present hour and this present day are not without solemnity. If we pass this Bill, we shall turn our backs on what has been the traditional history of this country since Confederation; we shall certainly interrupt and perhaps put an end to the spirit of self-confidence and self-reliance which has made Canada what she is to-day; we shall open a new page in the long and fateful struggle which has characterized colonial government from its inception to this date—the struggle between concentration on the one side and expansion on the other; a struggle which we thought had been forever settled in favour of colonial expansion.

The problem of defence is upon us. The Bill which we have before us at the present time settles nothing. It is simply an incident in that long struggle between expansion and concentration. The problem of defence has been facing us since the earliest days of Confederation. During the debates which have taken place, the opinions have been quoted of Sir John Macdonald, of Sir George Cartier—of the most eminent and thoughtful of those whom the Canadian people honour with the name of Fathers of Confederation. Sir John Macdonald's idea of Confederation was that it would make of Canada an auxiliary kingdom to Great Britain. Mark the words. Although that was his idea, it never entered his mind that Canada should pay contribution to either the army or the navy of Great Britain. Sir John Macdonald regarded as the basis of our system of defence that we should develop our forces both on land and on sea. The matter has come before us more than once. However we may differ as to the method to be adopted, we have always agreed in the view that the problem has to be considered in the light of what we owe to ourselves as Canadians and also of what we owe to the Mother Country as British subjects.

Our institutions are based upon the party system. Whatever views we hold, we are all agreed that nothing better has yet been devised for the government of the country than the present British system which we have. As it is based, however, upon party, no one will contend that the desire to win will not very often carry us further than the goal which we should seek. Once, and once only, we approached this problem free from party bias, party prejudice, and party passion; and the solution, which we adopted, unanimously, without a dissenting voice, was that the best method by which we could discharge our duties as Canadian subjects was by the organization of a Canadian navy. When a resolution has been adopted under such circumstances, can it be supposed that any departure from it will be an improvement? On the contrary, is it not manifest that the policy which was then adopted was the voice of duty both Imperial and Canadian? What is the case to-day? The resolution, which was adopted solemnly and unanimously by this House, is set aside. I am told that it is not set aside. I am told that the present policy is an emergency contribution. Emergency! Who can talk about emergency? The very idea of emergency has been by the discussion dissipated, just as the mist of the morning is dissipated by the rays of the rising sun. The light has been thrown upon it, and who can talk of emergency when we have the word of the Prime Minister of England and the word of the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, that the relations of England with all the world have never been more cordial than they are at the present time? Who can talk of emergency when we have been told by the First Lord of the Admiralty, not once, but dozens of times, that England desires no support from anyone, that she can meet any force, that she is prepared and ready to meet her enemies wherever they may be? If I were not to be charged with tedious repitition I would repeat the words of the First Lord of the Admiralty. Those words are received to-day by the other side of the House with derisive laughter. Am I to suppose that there is one man on the other side who to-day believes that England is not the equal on the sea of any nation in the world? Since the commencement of this debate, there have come from Germany, which has been considered the chief source of danger, from no less an authority than the German Secretary of the Navy, words which lead us to believe that at no distant date a stop may be put to this mad folly of armaments which has been going on for some years past. This is our present condition.

We are told, however, that this policy of a Canadian navy has been rejected. If there is one thing which, in my opinion, is more certain than another, it is that all that we have heard during this debate from its first day to this, and all that we have heard from the Admiralty, goes to show that the policy of a Canadian navy is at the present time more the true solution of the problem than it has been at any other time. Let me take the words of the memorandum itself, which is the basis of the policy introduced by my right hon. friend himself (Mr. Borden). The memorandum of the Admiralty shows distinctly that the new scheme adopted by the British navy is that of concentration in European waters, and for that purpose the navy has been withdrawn from distant seas. If that be the case, as I said on a former occasion, is not the solution of our problem to be found in the organization of a Canadian navy in Canada, as the organization of an Australian navy is the solution in Australia? Let me quote in that respect the words of the preamble of the German Naval Law, which has been quoted very often in this debate, though not apropos of the matter which we now have in hand. The preamble is in these words:

In order to protect German trade and commerce under existing conditions, only one thing will suffice, namely, Germany must possess a battle fleet of such strength that even for the most powerful naval adversary a war would involve such risks as to make that power's own supremacy doubtful. For this purpose it is not absolutely necessary that the German fleet should be as strong as that of the greatest naval power, for, as a rule, a great naval power will not be in a position to concentrate all its forces against us.

Germany has no distant sections of Empire to protect as Great Britain has. Let the conditions be made equal between them. Let Great Britain be freed from the necessity of protecting the distant sections of the Empire, and then Germany and Great Britain will be alone in the waters of Europe, and there will be no doubt as to the issue. This preamble of the German Naval Law gives us the very reason why we should have autonomous naval organization in this country. At the last Imperial conference in 1911, we agreed with the Admiralty that the Canadian navy which was to be built, and which would have been built if we had remained in office, should be given a certain portion to protect. (Reading):

The Canadian Atlantic station will include the waters north of 30 degrees north latitude and west of the meridian of 40 degrees west longitude.

The Canadian Pacific station will include the waters north of 30 degrees north latitude, and east of the meridian of 180 degrees longitude.

This is a state paper, a memorandum which was agreed to between the Admiralty, Canada, and Australia. In regard to Australia, the memorandum reads as follows:

The Australian naval station will include—

On the north—from 95 degrees east longitude by the parallel of 13 degrees south latitude to 120 degrees east longitude, thence north to 11 degrees south latitude, thence to the Boundary with Dutch New Guinea on the south coast in about longitude 141 degrees east, thence along the coast of British New Guinea to the boundary with German New Guinea in latitude 8 degrees south, thence to 155 degrees east longitude.

That is the programme which was laid down. But, instead of that, under the new policy which has been introduced, our ships will not be in the waters of the North Atlantic or the North Pacific, but they will have Gibraltar as their base, and will move to all parts of the world. Does anyone believe that this is a better arrangement than the one we had made? Again I repeat, the policy of building a Canadian navy has been set aside. The avowal has not been made; the House has not been treated with absolute sincerity in this matter; but I challenge contradiction when I say that the policy of autonomous naval organization has been absolutely abandoned by this Government. They have not avowed it, for if they did avow it, they would undoubtedly arouse the spirit of the Canadian people, even among the Conservative party. The matter has been discussed from many points of view, and the many organs of public opinion which generally support the Government have declared against the abandonment of the policy of a Canadian navy. A newspaper in this city which supports the action of the Government upon emergency grounds—which in my opinion does not exist— has this to say:

The Journal is not a believer in a permanent policy of Canadian contribution of ships or money to the Imperial fleet. We think that eventually some plan must be developed whereby the ' dominions beyond the seas,' including Canada, must evolve naval establishments of their own—that nothing else will long be safe for Imperial unity.

But it is not sufficient to look at this as a matter for the future. If we are to have a naval establishment, it is not a matter for to-morrow or for the day after to-morrow. What is to prevent us from dealing with it now? I am afraid the Journal will have to get up early if it is to prevent the Canadian Government from carrying out what it has in mind: the abandonment of the Canadian navy. In support of my contention, I would refer to the pertinent words of the Prime Minister of the 5th of December, when he introduced the resolution upon which this Bill is based. I quote from page 710 of ' Hansard ':

There have been proposals, to which I shall no more than allude, that we should build up a great naval organization in Canada. In my humble opinion, nothing of an efficient character could be built up in this country within a quarter or perhaps half a century. Even then it would be but a poor and weak substitute for that splendid organization which the Empire already possesses, which has been evolved and built up through centuries of the most searching experience and of the highest endeavour. Is there really any need that we should undertake the costly and hazardous experiment of building up a naval organization especially restricted to this Dominion, when upon just and self-respecting terms we can take such part as we desire in naval defence through the existing naval organization of the Empire, and in that way fully and effectively avail ourselves of the men and the resources at the command of Canada. Look at the very gentle euphemisms in regard to the proposals made by Canada to build up a great naval organization—' proposals to which I shall no more than allude.'

This would indicate something transient. But these proposals were those of a solemn motion introduced into this House by the right hon. gentleman's first lieutenant, the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster), on the 29th of March, 1909, in these words:

That in the opinion of this House, in view of her great and varied resources, of her geographical position, and national environments, and of that spirit of self-help and self-respect which alone befits a strong and growing people, Canada should no longer delay in assuming her proper share of the responsibility and financial burden incident to the suitable protection of her exposed coast line and great seaports.

This was the first step of the proposals to which my right hon. friend would no more than allude. On the same day, the resolution was unanimously carried in this House which has been often referred to, but which, in view of what my right hon. friend has said, I feel bound to repeat:

This House fully recognizes the duty of the people of Canada, as they increase in numbers and wealth, to assume in larger measure the responsibilities of national defence.

The House is of opinion that under the present constitutional relations between the Mother Country and the self-governing dominions, the payment of regular and periodical contributions to the Imperial treasury for naval and military purposes would not, so far as Canada is concerned, be the most satisfactory solution of the question of defence.

The House will cordially approve of any necessary expenditure designed to promote the speedy organization of a Canadian naval service in co-operation with and in close relation to the Imperial navy, along the lines suggested by the Admiralty at the last Imperial conference, and in full sympathy with the view that the naval supremacy of Britain is essential to the security of commerce, the safety of the Empire and the peace of the world.

The House expresses its firm conviction that whenever the need arises the Canadian people will be found ready and willing to make any sacrifice that is required to give to the Imperial authorities the most loyal and hearty co-operation in every movement for the maintenance of the integrity and honour of the Empire.

At that time, in 1909, if my right hon. friend was of opinion that a Canadian navy could not be built up in less than twenty-five years or half a century, he was also of opinion that, if it would take so long, the sooner we commenced the better; for his resolution was that we should at once start the construction of a Canadian navy. If what he said on the 5th of December last means anything, it means that we should not have an organization of our own, but that we should take advantage of the long established British navy, and, if we do that, it means, of course, periodical contributions to the Imperial navy, and it means nothing else. When the way had been opened by my right hon. friend for the abandonment of the idea of a Canadian navy, there was evidenced among his followers a great desire to see who should be the first to cast upon the Canadian navy the most opprobrious insinuations. One after another brought his fagot, large or small, to place on the funeral pyre on which was burning the resolution which affirmed the once solemn and patriotic convictions of the Conservative party; and from that day they one and all pronounced against a Canadian navy, and in favour of Imperial contribution. I again affirm that the idea of a Canadian navy has been abandoned by the present Government. Hon. gentlemen opposite have not been fair with us; they have not told us their reasons for this attitude; but the course which they are adopting is not escaping the observation of the people. I desire to refer the House to the last number of that missionary of imperialism, the Round Table in which the attitude of my right hon. friend is commented upon. The reviewer quotes the words of my right hon. friend as follows:

There have been proposals, to which I shall no more than allude, that we should build up a great naval organization in Canada. In my opinion, nothing of an effective character could be built up in this country within a quarter, or, perhaps, half a century. Even then it would be but a poor and weak substitute for that splendid organization which the Empire already possesses.

And so on. The commentator goes on to say:

Only Mr. Borden himself has the right to interpret the deeper meaning of these sentences.

I would add that it is not only the right but the duty of Mr. Borden to interpret the deeper meaning of these sentences. He goes on to say:

But it would be rash to conclude that the Government has determined against the ultimate organization of a Canadian navy. Generally Conservative speakers in the debate have emphasized the declaration of Mr. Borden that the emergency proposals are not to be understood as the beginning of a system of regular and periodical contributions. It is manifest, however, that Mr. Borden is impressed by the advantages of concentration for sea defence and the necessity for common direction of the fleets of the Empire. Probably he contemplates a reorganization of the Empire, a closer co-operation between the Mother Country and the Dominion in foreign policy, and a greater fusion of the national feeling of the overseas portions of the Empire in the common Imperial sentiment. This, however, is to look into the future and to anticipate conditions which may or may not develop.

But, Sir, these conditions must and will develop; no force is strong enough to keep them back. It is impossible to suppose that this country will in that respect remain in its present condition: we must have a naval development of some kind, in the way either of autonomous organization or of Imperial contribution. There is no middle course; there must be either the one or the other. Is not the situation just as I have stated it? Will any hon. gentleman on the other side of the House contend that there is any middle course? What shall it be—autonomous organization, or Imperial contribution? This is the position which faces us to-day. The action taken in the future will be determined by our course at this time, and that is why we have offered such strenuous opposition to the present measure.

I stated, when I thought it my duty first to speak on this subject, that if there was an emergency, if it was true that the Empire was in real danger, there would be no hesitation on the part of hon. gentlemen on this side of the House to vote the money if it were twice the amount asked for. But there is no question of an emergency; the alleged emergency is simply a pretense and a make-believe. The question to-day is, what permanent policy is to be adopted? And that is the reason why we ask that the Canadian people should be given an opportunity to pronounce upon this important question before we launch ourselves further out upon the waves of this new departure which is now contemplated. We on this side of the House have nothing to conceal; we want to present our views to the people, and we want hon. gentlemen opposite to do the same, so that there may be brought clearly before the mind of every elector in this country the question: what shall it be—antonomous organization or Imperial contribution? I think our policy is the best; but if the people think otherwise it will be our duty to abide by their verdict. At all events, before we commit ourselves to such a course as that now proposed, the most ample discussion should be given to the question; and, after all, the people themselves should decide the issue.

I now come to a consideration of the fact, made manifest by one of the last speeches of Mr. Churchill, that the Admiralty favours contribution and not autonomous organization. This is not a new thing: the British Admiralty has always preferred a system of Imperial contribution to the idea of autonomous organization. At the Imperial Conference in 1902, Lord Selborne, the predecessor of Mr. Churchill, made a proposal that we should have Imperial contributions, and in 1907 Lord Tweedmouth, who was the First Lord of the Admiralty at that time, made another proposal in these terms:

I understand that, in Australia particularly, and in South Africa, it is desired to start some naval service of your own. Perhaps I might suggest that if the provision of the smaller craft which are necessarily incident to the work of a great fleet of modern battleships could be made locally, it would be a very great help to the general work of the navy. You cannot take the small craft such as torpedo boats and submarines across the ocean, and for warships to arrive in South Africa or in Australia or in New Zealand or in Canada, and find ready to their hand well-trained men in good vessels of this kind, would be an enormous advantage to them. It would be an enormous advantage to find men ready to their hand, men well-trained, ready to take a part in the work of the fleet.

There is, I think, a further advantage in these small flotillas, that they will be an admirable means of coast defence; that you will be able by the use of them to avoid practically all danger from any sudden raid which may be made by a cruising squadon. What I should like to point out is, that above all things in this work, the submarine is probably the most important and the most effective weapon. It is the weapon with which you can meet a fleet attacking during the day, or individual ships attacking by day. I am assured by my advisors at the Admiralty that it is a most important weapon, that it has already reached very considerable development, and it is one on which we may rely with great confidence.

He also said:

I would like to say a word on the further point of the provision of docks and coaling facilities in the colonies. The enormous development of the modern warship entails important consequences. These great modern warships require large docks to contain them. I think we are getting on well with the provision of docks. At this moment in our own country and abroad we have, I think, thirteen government docks which will take in the largest ship, the dreadnought. I think in the course of the next two years we shall have four more, which will make about seventeen altogether. But it is very desirable that we should have in all parts of the world docks which could take such ships, great ships, supposing they were to meet with an accident or were to receive damage in war.

This language was used in 1902. The Canadian ministers present at the conference took this attitude:

At present Canadian expenditure for defence services are confined to the military side. The Canadian Government are prepared to consider the naval side of defence as well. On the sea coast of Canada there is a large number of men admirably qualified to form a naval reserve, and it is hoped that at an early day a system may be devised which will lead to the training of these men and to the making of their services available for defence in time of need.

In conclusion, the ministers repeat that, while the Canadian Government are obliged to dissent from the measures proposed they fully appreciate the obligation of the Dominion to make expenditures for the purpose of defence in proportion to the increasing population and wealth of the country. They are willing that these expenditures shall be so directed as to relieve the taxpayer of the Mother Country from some of the burdens which he now bears; and they have the strongest desire to carry out their defence schemes in co-operation with the Imperial authorities, and under the advice of experienced Imperial officers, so far as this is consistent with the principle of local self-government, which has proved so great a factor in the promotion of Imperial unity.

This attitude of the Canadian Government was taken before 1909, when we discussed the matter in this House and decided in favour of an autonomous organization. We did that with our eyes open. Everybody recognizes that, if you looked only to professional naval strategy, it might be preferable to have only one navy, which the self-governing dominions would help to maintain by contributions. But beyond this professional strategy there is a larger strategy: the development of national sentiment, of pride of country, in Australia, in Canada, in all the autonomous dominions. The basis of the British Empire is autonomous organization, not only of the navy but of all other phases of national life. Unless you nurse the national pride of all these young communities, you do not promote the welfare of the Empire, but, in my humble judgment, you tend rather to destroy it.

The fostering of national pride has been the great object in Australia. They have organized a fleet there, and in so doing they have aimed to serve the Empire. Nay, more: while the Admiralty has given us their views, they have been careful to say that they would not presume to give any advice on the political side, but would leave that altogether to the judgment of each independent, autonomous government, and that they are satisfied that, whether we proceed by way of contribution or by way of autonomous organization, as we on this side of the House want to do, we all have at heart the welfare of the Empire and an equal desire to serve it. Australia has commenced to build a fleet of its own. The other day a banquet was given on the first vessel of the Australian navy built in Great Britain on its arrival in Australia. The report of the proceedings is most significant. I read this report from the London Daily Chronicle of March 26:

Australia comes of Age—Hearty Greeting to New Cruiser.

(From our Correspondent.)

Melbourne, March 26.—The cruiser Melbourne received an enthusiastic welcome from the citizens here to-day as typifying the consummation of national aspirations.

The speeches at the ministerial banquet to the officers to-night were significant as bearing on the struggle on the subject of naval policy in Canada. Without alluding, directly or indirectly, to the Canadian or New Zealand offers of ships or money, all the speakers, except Captain Silver, emphasized the contention that the Australian policy of separate navies co-operating instantaneously in an empire emergency with the Imperial fleet, was the sound policy for the overseas dominions.

Lord Denman, Mr. Fisher, and Defence Minister Pearce were most emphatic in this connection. Mr. Fisher's allusion to the value of associating a local subordinate patriotism with Empire defence was loudly applauded, as was also Lord Denman's declaration that in view of Australia's sacrifice of men and money, and her isolated position in the Southern Pacific, no one could question her right to control her own fleet unit.

Mr. Pearce predicted that the other dominions will eventually follow Australia's lead, remarking, 'To-day's event typifies Australia coming of age, Australia becoming a nation, Australia taking up her share of that burden that the Motherland so long has borne on her behalf.'

The English officers of the Melbourne were deeply impressed by the evidence of deep national feelings combined with intense Imperial loyalty.

In connection with this it is also important and quite appropriate that I should recall the words of Sir George Reid, Australia's High Commissioner, addressed some few days ago to the Royal Colonial Institute:

He thought that in the evolution of an Imperial system of defence there was to-day the most pressing need of it. Forty years ago Japan had no fleet and the horse-power of the German fleet was one-ninth of that of the battleship Queen Mary. With the interval had come a tremendous strain upon the defensive system of the British Empire, and it must be met. Canada had not made up her mind whether she would have a Canadian fleet or reinforce the British fleet. Australia was developing a fleet of her own. He could not help thinking, speaking only for himself, that the Australian example must eventually be followed. Canada must undertake the defence of the North Pacific and North Atlantic, South Africa must occupy the middle distance, and India must undertake a large share of naval defence in the East. At any rate, the task had gone altogether beyond the power of the British people except at sacrifices which it was impossible to suggest. What a tremendous relief it would be if the dominions beyond the seas undertook defence in those seas, leaving Great Britain free to concentrate her power upon the North sea and a large proportion of the trade routes.

This will be the effect of the policy of Australia, and this would have been the effect of the Canadian policy if our policy had been adopted. But in addition to all this we have now the opinion of Colonel Allen, Minister of Defence in New Zealand, showing that New Zealand also is taking a different course from that which she has hitherto followed. Colonel Allen, in a speech recently delivered in London, said:

It did not matter so much for the moment where dreadnoughts were built; that could be arranged as conditions developed in the future. What did matter was that it should be realized that the dominions would not be content with merely putting their hands in their pockets.

The Imperial navy must be a living reality to them to which they contributed, not merely money, but men. There was more value in the lives of their men than in the life of a ship. The dominions must have the opportunity of doing their duty towards the personnel of the fleet and manning the Empire's ships at sea. They must be prepared to help, not only the Imperial fleet with material, but they must have an interest in the operations of the fleet itself.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER.

This is the line of cleavage between my right hon. friend's policy and our policy. His is Imperial contribution, ours is national, autonomous development on the lines followed by Australia and now adopted by New Zealand.

My right hon. friend has seen the force of our objections. In presenting this policy of contribution, he says that he wants Canada to have a voice in all questions of war and peace. Well, Sir, this alone raises a question which requires the most adequate and ample dscussion. There is a great deal involved in it. How is that voice to be had and to what extent shall we have it? Does my right hon. friend want to have a voice in all the questions which agitate the continent of Europe? Does he want to have a voice in the question which is now agitating the diplomatic service of Europe? Does he want to have a voice as to whether the little kingdom of Montenegro, oppressed for centuries by the Turks, and now making an effort to shake off the Turkish yoke, shall be allowed to do so? We are given to understand that all the great powers are going to prevent Montenegro from reaping in the fruits of the victory which she has gained, a thing for which I would be very sorry. But that shows the extent to which we are driven by the proposal which my right hon. friend makes.

Now, the proposal that has been made is that there should be a council sitting in London in conference with the British Foreign Office. One of our ministers is to go there and to have access to the Prime Minister and the Seretary of State for Foreign Affairs. But we have been told at the same time by the Prime Minister and by the Secretary of State for the Colonies that a Canadian minister can dance attendance in London, but that the British Government will not share its responsibility with the young dominions. The proposal which has been made is to have a council sitting in London upon which all the young dominions and the British Government shall be represented according to their numbers. If that is done, what is the consequence? The consequence is that we must share in the enormous naval expenditure which has been maintained by Great Britain. If my memory does not fail me, the last Imperial budget for naval expenditure was $220,000,000. That is the amount of money contributed by 45,000,000 British subjects. Now, let us make a calculation. If Canada goes into that, our share must be not less than $25,000,000 or $30,000,000 a year. I do not say that some day or other there may not be a system of Imperial federation, but at the present time it is altogether premature. There is too great a discrepancy as yet between the population of Great Britain and our population; and what would be the value of a council which could only give advice, which could pass resolutions but could not enforce them? If there is to be Imperial federation, and far be it from me to speak disrespectfully of the idea—on the contrary, it is a very great idea—it can only come about when the Canadian people are prepared to surrender their fiscal independence and place in a body superior to their Parliament the framing of a tariff for them. No one of us would agree to this; and yet that is the only solution of the problem. In the place of this, what is better than the solution which the people of Australia have adopted? What is better than the position which was taken by Canada at one time and supported by my right hon. friend himself? My right hon. friend has gone back upon his own opinion, but I stick to the opinion expressed by my right hon. friend three years ago. I think he was right then, I think he is wrong now, and if I deplore anything it is that my right hon. friend has gone back upon a record which was so sound as the record which he made on that occasion.

This is the line of cleavage between us, and shall we be told that the discussion that we have had upon this question has not been for a good and proper object? It was not my privilege, for reasons to which I need not now allude, to be in the House during the time of the grand fight which was made by my hon. friends about me; but I have read the debate which took place on that occasion, and during those two weeks the standard of debate which was maintained has never been excelled in any British Parliament.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Yes, I say it with pride. Let any man read the speeches that were made upon that occasion and he will say that the standard of debate was kept up to a very high level. Nobody can gainsay that. In fact, the debate that took place was the wonder and surprise of those very hon. gentlemen opposite who have greeted that statement with derisive laughter.

My right hon. friend suggests that we should suspend this discussion. I have only this to say: He has always found me in the past to be a man of peace; he has always found me to be fair to all parties; but at the present time his suggestion is premature. Let us go on with this discussion until we know more of the subject than we do at the present time.

Right Hon. R. L. BORDEN (Prime Minister): Mr. Chairman, I have no fault to find with the argument of my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) from his own standpoint, but I would like to remind him that, if the prolonged discussion to which he has alluded deserves all the compliments which he and the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley) have passed upon it, one would be inclined to think that about all the light that hon. gentlemen opposite are able to shed upon the subject has already illuminated it. Certainly, a debate in committee for some thirteen days, if characterized by the qualities which have been ascribed to it by the right hon. gentleman, ought to be fairly satisfactory in giving to the people of this country the views and opinions which hon. gentlemen opposite entertain. My right hon. friend has not seen fit to give me any direct answer and I can only assume that his answer really means, although couched in diplomatic language, that we are to be subjected to the same indefinite delays in attempting to proceed with this Bill which have met us whenever we have attempted to make progress in the past.

I did not come here this afternoon for the purpose of discussing the matters which the right hon. gentleman has brought forward, but as he has alluded to them, it is no more than right that I should say one or two words in regard to certain points which he has made in the course of his speech. The right hon. gentleman has reiterated over and over again in the course of his remarks that this is a policy of permanent contribution. I desire, speaking upon my responsibility as a member of this Government, to take the strongest possible exception to the statement which the right hon. gentleman thus made. I say, in the first place, that it is not a policy of contribution at all, and I say in the second place, that it is not a permanent policy. That was stated on the 5th day of December last, I have stated it on more than one occasion since, and I state it again to-day in the strongest form of expression that parliamentary usage will permit. What is the proposal before the House to-day? The proposal is that $35,000,000 shall be expended for the purpose of building battleships, or armoured cruisers of the most modern and powerful type, that these ships shall be owned by the people of Canada but that they shall be placed at the disposal of His Majesty the King for the common defence of this Empire. That is the proposal and that is all the proposal we have made to the Parliament of Canada up to the present time. The right hon. gentleman declared that he is unalterably opposed to any policy of that nature. Why is he opposed to it? He already knows from my statement and from the correspondence that has been brought down, that if it should hereafter be the will of the Canadian people to establish upon a permanent basis a great naval organization, the ships can be recalled upon reasonable notice whenever the people of Canada shall so desire and so determine. Is there any question about that? There is absolutely none, and my right hon. friend knows there is no question about it. Then in what respect is our autonomy—a word that is always in the mouth of my right hon. friend for certain purposes— in what respect is our autonomy—which I am prepared to maintain as thoroughy as any man in this House—in the slightest degree interfered with? Are not the people and the Parliament of Canada masters of their own destinies in that and every other respect, even if this Bill is enacted by Parliament and receives the assent of the Crown? There is no question about that, and my right hon. friend knows in his own mind that there is absolutely no question about it.

The right hon. gentleman has proceeded somewhat further; he has told us that this proposal to build three great battleships and to place them as I have outlined at the disposal of His Majesty the King for the common defence of the Empire is a departure from the resolution passed by this House in 1909. I take issue with the right hon. gentleman on that.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh.

Mr. BORDEN: And, Mr. Chairman, I shall be able to prove, notwithstanding any derisive laughter on the other side, that the statement I have just made is absolutely correct in every respect. What is the proposal set forth in the resolution of 1909? It is only necessary to refer to the resolution as introduced by my right hon. friend, and to the resolution as it was amended at my own suggestion, to show what its purpose was. The resolution as introduced by the right hon. gentleman contained this clause:

The House reaffirms the opinion repeatedly expressed by representatives of Canada that under the present constitutional relations between the Mother Country and the self-governing dominions payment of any stated contribution to the Imperial treasury for naval and military purposes would not, so far as Canada is concerned, be a satisfactory solution of the question of defence.

I pointed out to the right hon. gentleman then, and my argument apparently prevailed with him, that conditions of urgency might so develop at any time that the very best course, and the wisest course, and the safest course for Canada to pursue would be to make a temporary contribution—although we are not even going that far today, because we are only proposing to expend $35,000,000 in the construction of ships which, although placed at the disposal of His Majesty for the common defence of the Empire, nevertheless will be the property and in the ownership of the Canadian people. Well, my right hon. friend modified that clause in the resolution, and he modified it so that it reads in this way:

The House is of opinion that under the present constitutional relations between the Mother Country and the self-governing dominions, the payment of regular and periodical contributions to the Imperial treasury for naval and military purposes would not, so far as Canada is concerned, be the most satisfactory solution of the question of defence.

That modification in the resolution proposed by the right hon. gentleman was designed precisely to meet the situation which, in the opinion of hon. gentlemen on this side of the House at least, has developed to-day, and therefore in making this proposal to Parliament we are carrying out absolutely the terms of the resolution of 1909, as modified by the right hon. gentleman at my instance. If time were at my disposal, or if it were worth while to do so, I could read from my speech on that resolution the language to which I have alluded, and the reading of which would bear out absolutely the statement I have made as to its import.

Mr. MACDONALD: Would the right hon. gentleman tell us about clause 2 of that resolution?

Mr. BORDEN: Yes. I will speak of clause 2 if my hon. friend desires to hear about it, and I will tell him about it in this way. Clause 2 of that resolution approved of:

Any necessary expenditure destined to promote the speedy organization of a Canadian naval service, in co-operation with and in close relation to the Imperial navy, along the lines suggested by the Admiralty at the last Imperial conference and in full sympathy with the view that the naval supremacy of Britain is essential to the security of commerce, the safety of the Empire, and the peace of the world.

And clause 3 might as well be read also:

The House expresses its firm conviction that whenever the need arises the Canadian people will be found ready and willing to make any sacrifice that is required to give to the Imperial authorities the most loyal and hearty co-operation in every movement for the maintenance of the integrity and the honour of the Empire.

And, we have it stated in the Admiralty memorandum; we have had it stated since out of the mouth of the leading statesmen of Great Britain, that the greatest value of all to the Empire from the proposal for which we desire to secure the assent of Parliament is, that this proposal if carried into effect will make it apparent to all the world that upon this question of defence the Empire is united and will maintain a united front against all who may intend to menace it with any peril. And, now, in pursuance of the request of the member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) I will state what were the lines suggested by the Admiralty in 1907. The lines were these:

> The only reservation that the Admiralty desire to make is that they claim to have the charge of the strategical questions which are necessarily involved in naval defence; to hold the command of the naval forces of the Empire, and to arrange the distribution of ships in the best possible manner to resist attack and to defend the Empire at large, whether it be our own islands or the dominions beyond the seas.

And that brings me to another consideration: the right hon. gentleman is concerned about the representation of Canada on the Imperial Defence Committee. As I understand it, the right hon. gentleman himself agreed that Canada ought to be represented on the Imperial Defence Committee, and further than that—although I did not know it until last summer, as the matter was kept entirely confidential at the time, for what reason I do not know—the right hon. gentleman agreed to establish a defence committee in Canada in close co-relation with the Imperial Defence Committee. No announcement of that kind was made to Parliament by the right hon. gentleman at the time when we might have expected the announcement to be made, and it remained for the Colonial Secretary a few weeks ago to make that belated announcement, as the right hon. gentleman had not seen fit to do so. What is the attitude of the right hon. gentleman? Apparently he says now that we should not be represented on the Imperial Defence Committee; that we should not have any voice or part in the councils of the Empire—for what reason? In order that Canada may remain neutral in time of war. If that is not the meaning of the right hon. gentleman's statement to-day, as it was the direct expression of his opinion in 1910, I do not know what meaning should be attributed to the language which he has seen fit to address to the House and to the country. He told us distinctly in 1910 that in certain wars, the character of which he described, Canada should stand neutral; that her ships should be neutral, and that her harbours and her coasts should be neutral. It does not seem to me that it is possible for this country to remain a part of the British Empire upon these terms, and yet to retain its self-respect. We must do either one thing or the other. If we are to remain part of this Empire, then we must take part in the defence of the Empire against all comers when any peril assails it. If we desire to be neutral in time of war, then it is not becoming to us to take advantage of the prestige and protection of the flag of this Empire in time of peace. That is my view, and it seems to me that it ought to be the view of all self-respecting Canadians.

My right hon. friend made two remarkable statements, the consistency of which I am not able to appreciate. In the first place, he said that our policy involves very serious considerations, that this is a very solemn moment for the Parliament and the people of this country. In the next breath, he said that our policy settles nothing. If our policy settles nothing, what about the solemnity which a moment before he was willing to attribute to it? I do not know what my right hon. friend has in mind when he makes these two inconsistent statements. He comes down eventually to the statement that this policy ought to be submitted to the people of Canada before it is carried into effect. As I understand him, that is his view. My right hon. friend has singular changes of opinion; his line of thought modifies itself very quickly, but never perhaps has there been so striking an example of that as in this particular case. As I understand it, he did not model his naval policy of 1910, in one respect at least, that to which I have alluded, upon the lines which had been laid down by the Admiralty in 1907, because the resolution of 1909 referred to the lines laid down by the Admiralty at the Conference of 1907. He did, however, undoubtedly bring down a permanent policy, or what he understood to be a permanent policy, in 1910. I have stated that our policy is not a policy of contribution at all; that this Bill does not embody a policy of a permanent character, that it is a measure based upon conditions of urgency which we adopt in view of the distinct and definite statement and advice of the Admiralty that the best aid that Canada can give at the moment is the provision of armoured battleships or cruisers of the strongest type possible. Whatever the Admiralty said in 1907, they said four years later in 1911, that this is the course which the people and Parliament of this country ought to carry out if they desire to give the Empire effective aid. But, Sir, the right hon. gentleman had a permanent policy, as I have stated, in 1910. What was his course then? It was put up to him, at least four times in the debate of 1910 and again at the opening of Parliament in November 1910, that as this was a permanent policy it ought to be submitted to the people of Canada before it was carried into effect. On four different occasions the right hon. gentleman adduced what were to him convincing reasons that, although it was a permanent policy and although in one respect at least it was not along the lines laid down by the Admiralty in 1907, it ought not to be submitted to the people of Canada. Although then maintaining his right to formulate and carry out a permanent naval policy without consulting the electorate, he has the courage now to stand before this Parliament and say that this temporary measure of aid, proposed in response to the direct—I will not say request—opinion of the Admiralty, is one that ought not to be carried into effect until there has been a general election and until the voice of the people has been taken upon it. I am not able to appreciate the cogency of the argument of the right hon. gentleman in that regard. Further, I would like to point out to him that in this very session he has already twice voted for this portion of the Bill:

> From and out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund of Canada there may be paid and applied a sum not exceeding thirty-five million dollars for the purpose of immediately increasing the effective naval forces of the Empire.

After all, that is the chief part of the Bill. That is the part of the Bill upon which everything is based, and that clause which I have just read forms a portion of the resolution of the right hon. gentleman, as it also forms a portion of the proposals which we have submitted to Parliament.

My right hon. friend has alluded to statements which have been made in the British House of Commons with regard to the cordial relations of this Empire with all other countries; I have no doubt that the relations of this Empire with all other countries are cordial; and I hope and pray that they will remain cordial at all times in the future; but every gentleman in this House, every gentleman in this country knows that it is not by war alone that the destinies of Empires may be controlled in respect of its influence or its power. The very fact that the British navy has been all powerful during the past hundred years is the reason why the British Empire has been enabled to develop along the lines and in the wonderful manner which we have witnessed looking over the history of the past. It is not a question of the result of war; it is a question of the power of the British Empire to control the seas. This Empire of ours, as we all know, stands in that respect in an absolutely unique position, scattered over every continent on earth. It is absolutely necessary to its continued integrity and existence that the path across the seas should always be kept secure. The path over the seas has always been kept secure in the past, and this proposal which we are submitting to Parliament to-day is designed to make it absolutely certain, for some years in the future at least, that the same path over the seas shall be equally secure for all portions of the Empire.

Mr. BORDEN.

Looking at every point, and I think I have touched on every point that the right hon. gentleman has mentioned, I venture to think that there is no reason, after the very important, able and illuminating discussion that we have already had, why some limit should not be fixed at which the discussion should come to a conclusion. No hon. gentleman on this side of the House has any desire unduly to restrict debate on this question, because it is undoubtedly a very important subject. But fair and reasonable debate for the purpose of enabling the people to understand the respective attitudes of the two parties is one thing, and indefinite delay for the purpose of either defeating the Bill altogether or bringing about a dissolution of Parliament is another thing. The right hon. gentleman has referred to a dissolution of Parliament. I would like to say to him that so far as I understand constitutional law, the time of dissolution of Parliament is set by the Crown, upon the advice of its responsible ministers. If it is constitutionally possible for an Opposition to take such an attitude that upon any particular Bill they may say that there shall be a dissolution, there would be a rather important departure from what has been constitutional practice in the past. If it were possible to do this in respect to one measure at one session, it would be equally possible to do the same thing with regard to other measures at other sessions. The result would be that we should have a dissolution of Parliament and an election every year; and the question of dissolution would not be settled as in the past, but would be settled by a minority of Parliament exercising an undue privilege under rules not framed with the idea that anything of the kind should be done. So, I submit the proposal, which I have made to him in absolute good faith, as a reasonable proposition, and I regret indeed that it has not found more favour in his eyes than that which seems to have attended my efforts in this regard. Further, so far as the question of Canadian naval organization is concerned, the proposals which we have submitted to Parliament are altogether separate and apart from that, inasmuch as the measure is for a temporary purpose, made in response to a specific statement in the Admiralty's memorandum. It must be apparent to any hon. gentleman in this House who knows the delays that attend naval construction, even with all the facilities which are afforded by the United Kingdom, that before these ships could be built and put in commission, a general election in this country must take place; and, if the aspirations and expectations of hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House, as frequently voiced not only during this session but during the last session, should be realized, then the ships could be made available, as the right hon. gentleman desires they shall be made available, for building up the organization of a Canadian navy along the lines proposed. So that, even upon that statement of the case, which is a moderate and reasonable one, I think, there is no possible reason whatever why indefinite delay of the proposals of the Government should be suggested or pressed by hon. gentlemen on the other side.

In conclusion, I would suggest to the right hon. gentleman that upon a fair view of all the considerations which have been urged, and particularly in view of the grave statements contained in the Admiralty memorandum, a reasonable limit should be placed upon the further continuance of this debate and we should come to a time as speedily as possible, as speedily as reasonable, at which the debate should be concluded and hon. members be allowed to voice their opinion by vote upon this measure.

Hon. WM. PUGSLEY: My right hon. friend (Mr. Borden) has, greatly to my gratification, spoken upon the question in a somewhat general way, and has afforded us, I think, some material to which we may properly reply. During the two weeks of day and night sittings to which my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition has referred, we were not favoured either by the members of the Government or by their supporters, to any considerable extent with argument on this subject. I desire to repeat the statement that I have made on a previous occasion, that the members of this side of the House, under very strenuous and disadvantageous circumstances endeavoured as best they could to present their views before this House and before the people of this country. At times when, owing to the long sessions, you, Mr. Chairman, were obliged to leave the House and take that rest which every man requires, the most of us on this side were compelled to sit here and fight through these long hours, as we believed we were fighting, in the best interests of the people of this country. To-day, my right hon. friend the leader of the Government says that, owing to the long discussion that took place, the time has arrived when the leader of the Opposition ought to state a day when this debate will be brought to a close. In my judgment it ill becomes the leader of the Government to make that request of us at the present time. What are the facts? On the very first night when we had entered upon the discussion of this most important clause—this clause which makes clear the issue as between the Liberal party and the Conservative party, which makes clear and well-defined the position as to whether we shall have a Canadian navy or shall send $35,000,000 to the Mother Country as a contribution for an Imperial navy—after we had had two or three hours for its discussion, we were told by the Government that unless we passed the clause to a vote, in effect, we should be kept here day and night, without sleep, without rest, until we did pass the measure. I have said for one, that that was not a proper demand to make upon the representatives of a free people. We declined to accede to it. And what was the result? Contrary to all precedent, we were kept in continual session for two long weeks, except for Sundays intervening, discussing the question, as I have said, under most disadvantegeous circumstances. After that discussion had been continued for a week there was brought down for the first time information which long before that should have been furnished to the House—the correspondence which had taken place between the Prime Minister and the Right Hon. Winston Churchill. This correspondence was of a most important character, and of such a nature as to demand the attention of every member of this House. Do you think that was fair? Do you think that was giving to the members of this House an opportunity for the full discussion of all the important subjects with which they have a right to be made acquainted? I say no. Therefore, the discussion during the last few weeks having been carrried on under the circumstances and in the manner to which I have referred, I think the members of this committee have a right to exercise their own good judgment as to what time they shall occupy in the discussion of this important question. Am I to understand, in view of what the Prime Minister has stated in an interview or official statement which has gone broadcast throughout the country, that, if we do not agree to this proposal, he intends to bring down a measure of closure in order to cut off discussion? This statement was not over the signature of the Prime Minister, but was given out as an official communication. Let me say to hon. gentlemen opposite that the members of this side of the House are not to be driven either one way or the other by any threats of that character. We intend as best we can to discuss this important matter with all the intelligence that we can bring to bear upon it; we intend to discharge the duty which we feel we owe to the people of this country, and, undeterred by threats, we shall continue to discharge that duty according to the best of our ability.

Let us now consider for a moment the position this matter has assumed as distinguished from that in which it was first presented by the Prime Minister. It was understood at first that these three ships were to be stationed at the very heart of the Empire, in the North sea. Their guns were to be pointed almost toward the enemy's shores; they were to be in the direct firing line. These great battleships, which were to bear historic Canadian names, were to be among the first to fire their guns upon the enemy. And what do we understand to-day? These ships are to form an Imperial squadron. It is true that the ships of the great overseas dominion of Australia are not to form a part of that squadron. It is true that one ship of New Zealand, temporarily at all events, is expected to form a part of that squadron—although, if one can draw any conclusions from the sentiments in New Zealand as cabled across the water, the time is not far distant when that country will follow the example of her great sister dominion, Australia, and engage upon the development of a naval service of her own. The Prime Minister is in the happy position that if he should go to Gibraltar and view these great ships bearing historic Canadian names, he would find, floating side by side with the battleships of Canada, a great warship of the Malay States—and I suppose this ship of the Malay States will also bear an historic Malay name. That changes the situation very materially. We are to be associated in this Imperial squadron with the British subjects of the Malay peninsula, and it is well that we should become acquainted with those with whom we are to be associated in this great Imperial service, and whose great battleship—I presume the greatest that science can build or money supply—is to float side by side with the battleships of Canada. One dislikes saying anything disparaging of the proposition which has been seriously put forward by the Right Hon. Winston Churchill as to Canada and the Malay States joining together in this Imperial squadron, but I am inclined to think that the people of the Malay States know very little about the proposed battleship that is to line up beside Canada's ships in the Imperial squadron. I have come to that conclusion by reason of a little study which I have made of these Malay States, and of the people within their bounds. I have thought it well to consider their resources, their capabilities of furnishing a great battleship, and, more than that, their ability to renew every three or four years their aid to the Imperial squadron by giving additional battleships, as Canada surely will, if we adopt the present policy, be called upon from time to time to do. An authority on the matter says:

> The four federated states in the Malay peninsula, known as the Federated Malay States, are; Perak, Selangor, Negri Sembilan, and Pahang.

I am told that each one of the states has a sultan, and I presume when these ships shall first take their station at Gibraltar my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works would very much like to be there, and to make himself acquainted with the sultans, as no doubt he will, of Perak, Selangor, Negri Sembilan, and Pahang. The information which I have at hand in respect of these Malay States says further:

> Perak is situated on the west coast, and has an area of 7,700 square miles. Selangor, south of Perak, has an area of 3,200 square miles, with a coast line of about 125 miles. Negri Sembilan comprises nine states with a total area of 2,600 square miles. Pahang occupies a large portion of the peninsula on the eastern side of the central mountain range. It is the largest of the states, having an area of 14,300 square miles.

The total area of these four federated Malay States, which will contribute this war vessel to float side by side with ours, is 27,800 square miles—about the size of the province of New Brunswick. The people are of the Mongolian type, very much like the Chinese; they have no literature; education is not at all advanced; they have no manufacturing industries, so far as I can learn, and their trade consists largely of agricultural products—chiefly of cocoanuts and rice. They have a very extensive mining industry, the chief minerals being gold and tin, and in Selangor the mining industry is carried on by some 62,000 Chinese, forming about one-fourteenth of the whole population of all these federated states. The great majority of the people, however, are of Mongolian origin, which, as hon. gentlemen know, is a race very closely associated with the Chinese.

As to the revenues, the evidence of ability of this country to furnish a great battleship, I find that the total revenue of all the Malay confederated states in 1910 was $14,000,000 and the expenditure $15,000,000. In other words they had a deficiency of $1,000,000 in carrying on the financial operations of the year. Would you not be surprised to learn that this country with which Canada is to line up in this great Imperial service, in order to raise that revenue, is obliged to levy not merely important duties but export duties even on agricultural products so that even the agriculturists, who produce coffee, and cocoanuts, pepper, sago, tapioca, gambier and rice have to pay an export duty upon all the products which they export. The federated states have no cities of any consequence and the chief industries are agriculture and tin mining.

In my judgment there has been a great deal of fireworks about this proposition of the Malay states to contribute a warship to the British navy and I believe that the Right hon. Winston Churchill would have done a better service to the Empire if he had said to the British residents who carry on the government of that country that he would not consent to the use of the small revenues of those states for the building of a battleship. He would have done better service to the Empire if he had said; We appreciate the loyalty of the British residents and, perhaps, of the sultans of those four little states, but we think it would be unduly burdening the people of that country, and England is far better able to supply a battleship than these poor people in the four small states of twenty-seven thousand square miles. The proposition was made public in England in a somewhat dramatic way, just as the proposal of the Canadian Government was announced to the Mother Country. Apparently as much attention was paid by the newspapers to the alleged proposition of the Malay states as was paid to the proposal of the Canadian Government.

If these proposals go through, we shall not have the good fortune to work along in harmony with Australia and to carry out in good faith the agreement reached in 1911 by the representatives of Australia, Canada, and the British Admiralty, but we will be able to link up with the Malay federated states. What is their position with relation to Great Britain? They are administered as a crown colony is administered, they are administered as, seventy years ago, the provinces of Canada were administered, from Downing Street; their rulers are appointed from Downing Street and the whole government of the country has to be conducted on the advice of the British Government.

At six o'clock House resumed, and then took recess.

After Recess.

House resumed at eight o'clock, and again went into Committee.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Mr. Chairman, I sincerely trust that we shall have the pleasure of hearing from the members of the Government who are favouring us with their presence to-night. I am glad to see the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Rogers), the hon. Postmaster General (Mr. Pelletier), the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Hazen) and the hon. Secretary of State (Mr. Coderre) present. I trust they will all do us the honour of enlightening us upon the very important question before the committee and in regard to which, speaking for myself, I desire to get information if possible. I am sorry to see such a thin attendance of ordinary members, that is to say, those not holding office on the other side of the House. It rather looks as if they are not seeking for information.

Mr. ROGERS: Look behind.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The gentlemen behind and around me seem to be well informed on the question and I regret to say that such does not seem to be the case with hon. gentlemen opposite. There is one matter in regard to which I desire information, and that is in reference to the communication from the First Lord of the Admiralty, Mr. Churchill, which is given upon pages 5340 and 5341 of 'Hansard.' That is the communication which was submitted to the House with such excellent stage setting upon a certain Monday night during the prolonged sitting. It was a communication that was expected to act as a bomb shell as against hon. gentlemen on this side of the House, but I am rather inclined to think that hon. gentlemen supporting the Government have found that it has been a boomerang of the most effective character. What I particularly desire information upon is this: The right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Borden) stated that the letter and the memorandum of Mr. Churchill were in reply to a letter from him under date the 18th December, which letter is also given on page 5339 of 'Hansard.' I think that, when I refer to that letter from the Prime Minister and refer to the memorandum, the members of the committee will agree with me that the letter and memorandum are not an answer and do not purport upon their face to be an answer, to the letter of the 18th December. I venture to say without fear of contradiction that there has been from somebody, whether from the hon. Minister of Marine or the Postmaster General, who were also in England with the Prime Minister, I do not know, a communication which has not been brought down and to which that letter of the 23rd of January from Mr. Churchill and the memorandum would appear to be an answer. Let me read to make that statement good, and, if I am wrong in that, I will ask the hon. Postmaster General to tell me so. This is the letter of the 18th December which the Prime Minister says he wrote to the First Lord of the Admiralty:

My Dear Mr. Churchill:

It has been suggested to me that the construction of large warships of the most modern type has been attended with great difficulties in its earlier stages and that the cost has been excessive. If I am not trespassing too much upon your good nature, I would be glad to receive any information along that line so that it would be available, if necessary.

Yours faithfully,
(Sgd.) R. L. Borden,

The Right Honourable
Winston S. Churchill, M.P.,
First Lord of the Admiralty,
London, England.

Mark well, Mr. Chairman, what the Prime Minister asked from Mr. Churchill in that letter. He tells him that it has been suggested that the construction of large warships has been attended with great difficulties in its earlier stages and that the cost has been excessive. It is upon that, and that alone, that the Prime Minister asks for information. What is the alleged reply? There is a letter from Mr. Churchill, dated London, January 23, 1913, as follows:

London, January 29, 1913

My Dear Mr. Borden:

I am very sorry for the delay in sending you the inclosed memorandum. It has been unavoidable, and I hope it has caused you no inconvience.

Your sincerely,
(Sgd.) Winston S. Churchill.

Mark you, no reference to the letter of the 18th December, but simply apologizing for the delay in sending the enclosed memorandum. How does the memorandum open?

The suggestion that the proposed battleships could be expeditiously built in Canada cannot be based on full knowledge of the question.

There is no reference to that in the letter of 18th December. It would seem that it must have been suggested to Mr. Churchill that there were people in Canada who thought that these battleships could be built as speedily in Canada as in Great Britain. Whoever thought that? Whoever made a suggestion that we had shipyards in Canada to-day where these superdreadnoughts could be built? Did the Minister of Marine and Fisheries tell the First Lord of the Admiralty that somebody in Canada was foolish enough to suggest such a thing? Who has conveyed the information to the First Lord of the Admiralty—information which was not only wrong but which was improperly given to him by somebody, because later on in his memorandum, he follows it up by the suggestion that the shipyards in Canada are probably not suitable for building battleships. Somebody must have suggested to Mr. Churchill that the Liberal party, or a portion of the Liberal party, were of the opinion that these big battleships could be built in the existing shipyards because Mr. Churchill combats that idea in the memorandum, and, as I have said, later on he speaks of the probability that the existing Canadian shipyards are not suitable for the purpose. It is in that same memorandum that he suggests that they would have to be very careful about the kind of soil which they would select because it required very firm soil to support one of these big battleships. If you look at the memorandum you will see that it was not an answer to the letter of the 18th December from the Prime Minister, but refers to the information which has been given to Mr. Churchill by some other party. If neither the Government nor any member of the Government had sought to convey the impression to the First Lord of the Admiralty that it was expected that these battleships should be built in existing shipyards, was it not the duty of the Prime Minister, when he received that absurd memorandum from Mr. Churchill, that memorandum which was based evidently upon erroneous information which was conveyed to him as to what presumably the Liberal party had stated, to return it to Mr. Churchill and call his attention to the wrong basis upon which he was proceeding and also to the erroneous statements which were contained in the memorandum?

Let us examine this memorandum a little farther and see what it says: Mr. Churchill shows in this statement that he has but little conception of the skill, the enterprise and intelligence of the Canadian people. The memorandum shows that the Hon. Winston Churchill could not do a better service to the Empire than to come out to Canada and pay a visit to the different sections of this great Dominion from the Atlantic to the Pacific. If he were writing a letter to the British residents of the four federated Malay States he could not write a more foolish or insulting letter as far as the people of Canada are concerned. What does he say?

The battleship of to-day has gradually been evolved from years of experiments and experience. She is a mass of intricate machines, and the armour, guns, gun mountings, and machinery, all require separate and extensive plant of a very costly nature, to cope with the constant changes in designs and composition. In addition to this the actual construction of a battleship, where high tensile and mild steel are largely used, requires the employment of special riveters and steel workers.

Does not the Minister of Public Works think it was the duty of the Prime Minister to write to Mr. Churchill and inform him that nobody in this country ever dreamed of having these battleships built by Canadian ship-builders; ought he not to have called the attention of Mr. Churchill to the fact that the policy of the Liberal party was to induce the most reliable and wealthy ship-builders in Britain to transfer their plant and workmen to Canada and build up here a great ship-building industry? And yet in this memorandum you find Mr. Churchill dealing with the question as if we were to start building dreadnoughts in Canada in yards where we have been building yachts, tugs, and scows. Mr. Churchill further says:

For the manufacture of armour plate, large steel furnaces, heavy rolling mills, planing machines, carburising plant, &c., capable of dealing with weights of 150 tons at a time, have to be provided—besides which the special treatment to obtain the correct quality of plate requires special experts who have been brought up to nothing else. Such men could not be obtained in Canada.

Just think of the Government allowing Mr. Churchill to get away with a statement of that kind, displaying such ignorance of Canadian conditions. Why, if the Government had sent one of its clerks down to the ship-building yards in the United States he would have told them that there were cranes there capable not only of carrying one hundred and fifty tons just as you would a paper weight, but capable of carrying one hundred and seventy tons. The Minister of Public Works could have told Mr. Churchill that in the Transcona shops at Winnipeg, they have movable cranes that will lift locomotives ninety tons in weight, and at the shops in Moncton I believe there are cranes that can easily carry ninety to one hundred tons from one part of the shops to another. And yet, this is put forward by Mr. Churchill as an insuperable obstacle to the building of ships in Canada. At the works of the General Electric Company and the Canada Foundry Company, in Toronto, they can, I have no doubt, turn out cranes that will lift one hundred and fifty tons or one hundred and seventy tons and turn them out quickly if you want to order them there. Later on Mr. Churchill says:

> For the building yard itself, the installation of heavy cranes and appliances for building a vessel of say 27,000 tons is a very heavy item; and the fitting of the blocks and slips to take this weight would require considerable care in selection of site, in regard to nature of soil for the blocks and launching facilities, so that the existing shipyards might not be adapted for this purpose.

Could not the Minister of Marine have written back to Mr. Churchill that down in the harbour of St. John on the shores of Courtenay bay, there is one of the most magnificent sites for a shipyard to be found anywhere in the world, and that there you can find a rocky foundation, capable of carrying not only ships of 27,000 tons, but of 270,000 tons, if need be.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: What would it be like in Halifax if it is that way in St. John?

Mr. PUGSLEY: I know the soil is pretty hard in Halifax, and I will do the people of Halifax the compliment of saying that I cannot say the same of them. In Halifax can be found just as good sites for a shipyard as can be found anywhere in the world. Certain great shipbuilding firms in England tendered in 1911 for the building of these war vessels in Canada, and were prepared to establish their shipyards here, and give to the Canadian people the benefit of their long experience; one firm tendered to build at Halifax, another at St. John, another at Sydney, and another at Montreal. Here is a letter—not an answer to the letter of the Prime Minister of the 18th December, as the Prime Minister intentionally or otherwise would have us understand—here is a letter containing gratuitous statements, insulting to the intelligence, enterprise, and skill of Canadians, and especially Canadian workmen, and the Government has allowed these statements to go unanswered without correcting Mr. Churchill.

Then, on the question of cost; if you go to Quincy, Massachussets, you will find a shipyard the equal of any in the world, thoroughly equipped, with movable cranes capable of carrying twenty tons more than Mr. Churchill speaks of, yards in which two battleships can be laid side by side, and the whole expenditure on their equipment including land and all, was only about $3,800,000. And yet Mr. Churchill speaks of the folly of Canada embarking in an enterprise that would cost that amount to start with. I am one of those who is opposed to sending this money out of our country; $35,000,000 is a vast sum of money. It practically equals the total revenues of this country when the Liberal party came into power under Sir Wilfrid Laurier in 1896. It would build fifteen hundred miles of railway; it would build two of the greatest dry-docks in the world, one upon the Atlantic and one on the Pacific coast; it would go a long way towards the establishment of a Canadian naval service. It is an enormous sum of money.

Mr. BURNHAM: It is only our surplus this year.

Mr. PUGSLEY: What an erroneous idea that is. It will be taken out of the taxes paid by the people of this country. Hon. gentlemen opposite talk about the surplus as if in some magical way it was rolled up by the Minister of Finance. Every dollar of this amount represents taxes paid by the hard working people of this country.

Mr. KNOWLES: Ontario and the West will pay it.

Mr. PUGSLEY: While there is very great prosperity in Canada, our people are the hardest working people to be found on the face of the globe. Every dollar which the great mass of the people of Canada earn, they earn by hard labour, by the sweat of their brow. We ought not to talk lightly of these taxes, particularly of such a vast sum of money as this. I maintain that, if it is reasonably possible to expend this money in Canada in giving employment to our own working people, in seeking to build up great shipbuilding industries upon the Atlantic and the Pacific coasts, it is the duty of this Parliament to apply itself very diligently to that end, and to see whether that cannot be done and whether in that way Canada will not be able to discharge her duty not only to this country but to the Empire at large.

In this connection, let me say that my right hon. friend the Prime Minister has to-night done what he has done on two or three previous occasions; he has said that the Liberal party has voted practically for section 2 of the Bill. If that had not been said by the Prime Minister of Canada I would characterize it as a childish remark. Surely my right hon. friend ought to tell the House and the people of this country that, when we voted for the part of the resolution containing those words, we voted for it with the amendment, moved by my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition, which declared that the money, although it should be devoted towards increasing the naval forces of the Empire, should be used for the building up of a Canadian naval service, for the providing of two fleet units, one to be placed on the Atlantic and the other on the Pacific. Thus we would be adding to the effective naval strength of the Empire. We hold that Canada is just as much a part of the British Empire as Great Britain and Ireland are; that, if we strengthen our own defences, if we relieve the Mother Country of the burden of protecting our coasts and of guarding our trade routes and if we have ships of war, which in time of stress so far as the whole Empire is concerned we could place at the disposal of the British Admiralty, we would be doing our part and doing it in the best possible way, not only for the defence of Canada but for the purpose of increasing the naval forces of the Empire. We have the authority not only of our own judgment and common sense, but of the British Admiralty for that view, because you will find in the Imperial Conference report of 1909, a memorandum from the First Lord of the Admiralty in which, approving as he does of the proposition for the overseas dominions to create local navies, he says that in that way they will be effectively adding to the naval strength of the Empire. Because we believed that in this way the naval strength of the Empire could be best aided, was the reason why we cheerfully voted for the $35,000,000; but we coupled with it the amendment moved by my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition. It was the whole amendment for which we voted, and not the one clause proposed by the leader of the Government. In view of that, is it not the height of absurdity for my right hon. friend, the leader of the Government, to seek to make the people of this country believe that the Opposition has voted for that clause and therefore has voted for the second section of his Bill? Under the amendment, which we proposed to the resolution and under the amendments which we proposed to the second clause of the Bill, two of which have been struck out and the third of which is now under consideration by the committee, the amendment moved by my hon. friend from South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) we raised, as clearly as it is possible to do, the issue between a Canadian navy to be built, manned and maintained by the people of Canada, available for the defence of our coasts and the protection of our trade routes and always available for the common defence of the Empire as well, and a policy of contribution such as is proposed by the Government. Let there be no mistake about that. My right hon. friend says that we ought not to discuss this Bill at any greater length but that we ought to pass it because it has been proposed at the request of the First Lord of the Admiralty. That is the first time that I have heard my right hon. friend go that far. In his first speech on the resolution he left it to my hon. friend the Postmaster General (Mr. Pelletier) to intimate that there had been some private communication with the Admiralty and that the Prime Minister knew things which he could not tell. To-night he says that the First Lord of the Admiralty has requested that this proposal should be made and that these dreadnoughts should be lent to the British Admiralty. My hon. friend from North Essex (Mr. Wilcox) shakes his head. I do not wonder, because he has always been priding himself upon the fact that this is to be the free gift of the Canadian people without any dictation or request from Downing Street. The speech of my right hon. friend rather knocks that idea into a cocked hat.

Mr. WILCOX: My hon. friend misconstrues my action.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I deny that in any of the documents presented to the House it appears that the Admiralty has requested a gift of the super-dreadnoughts. In the first place, I would like to know where hon. members opposite get the number, namely three dreadnoughts. As late as the 3rd of October, when the Prime Minister wrote to Mr. Churchill, he was not sure whether two or three, because in his letter he asks, if Parliament should vote the money to provide two or three dreadnoughts what would the British Admiralty do with regard to giving orders for smaller vessels in Canada. In the last paragraph of the first memorandum which was submitted by the Admiralty, you will find that all that they suggested was that, whatever temporary aid Canada gave should include some of the biggest and best vessels which science could devise or money procure. Two fleet units, if they were headed by super-dreadnoughts. would come entirely within the terms of that memorandum. There is no suggestion there, I repeat, that the Admiralty intended to depart from the policy which had been decided upon in 1909 and again in 1911, and under which Australia has gone ahead in good faith doing its part and carrying out the arrangement which our great overseas sister dominion had a right to expect would be loyally carried out by the people and the Government of Canada. But that memorandum said that they make this statement 'after the most prolonged consideration of the circumstances.' I wonder what these circumstances were that required such 'prolonged consideration.' I can well understand that the Admiralty, having agreed in 1909 and 1911 that these great overseas dominions of Australia and Canada should provide their own local navies, and Australia having gone ahead upon the faith of that arrangement being carried out both by the British Government and the Government of Canada—I can well understand that even Mr. Winston Churchill would hesitate before he would recognize the possibility of departing from that arrangement. I can imagine no other reason why it required this 'prolonged consideration.' Or was it, Sir, that my right hon. friend the Postmaster General and the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, in those quiet days and evenings, and at the elegant dinner tables where they would be seated together, would tell Mr. Churchill about the difficulties they were under about the pledges they had made to the former Minister of Public Works (Mr. Monk) and those who represented the Nationalist faction of the House. I can well understand that in the interconfidences which would be exchanged they would tell him of these difficulties. Perhaps that was one of the things which Mr. Churchill took into consideration, and that at least he left it open to this Government to adhere to the arrangement of 1909 and 1911 or to depart from it. But my hon. friend may rely upon the statement made by the First Lord of the Admiralty in the recent speech he delivered in Parliament, in which, referring to the question of aid by the establishment by the overseas dominions of their local navies or by contributions in money or ships, he says that contribution by money or ships would be the most effectual. But you will bear in mind that he is not then speaking of temporary aid or of a temporary offer, but is laying down a policy which looks, not to this year or next year or the next five years, but to the long future. But, as has been stated by my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition, that is nothing new. The British Admiralty had taken that view as long ago as 1907. They wanted Canada to agree upon a policy of contribution. They thought then, just as Mr. Churchill thinks now, that that would be the most effectual way of adding to the strength of the British navy. But Canada refused it through her Government at that time. The Government led by the present leader of the Opposition, thought that giving contributions would not meet the views of the Canadian people, and that it would be a step backward instead of a step forward, now that Australia was taking the right course in starting to build a local navy of her own and that that was the proper course for Canada to take as well. That was known to the present leader of the Government in 1909, when he was a party to the resolution passed by this House, because it had appeared in the public documents that the British Admiralty had stated that the most effectual way of aiding the navy was by giving contribution either in money or in ships. But, with that knowledge, he joined, and joined apparently heartily, in the resolution which was unanimously passed by this House in 1909. And there is no change to-day. The reasons against contribution are, I consider, just as they were in 1909. The same argument which induced my right hon. friend (Mr. Borden) to agree to the resolution in 1909, ought to appeal to him to-day and ought to induce him to devote his energies towards the building up of a good Canadian navy. But he said that those who take the ground that this proposal now before us is but the beginning of contributions either in money or in ships to the Imperial navy are not taking proper ground, and that they have no warrant for the statement they make. That can easily be settled. Let my right hon. friend, or let any member of the Government, rise in his place and say that the policy of this Government is to have a Canadian navy, and that whatever vessels are built in England will form part of the Canadian navy. Then they and their followers will be able to stand up and look the Canadian people squarely in the face. But what are they doing? In a manner which will not, I am sure, appeal to the people of this country, in a manner, I venture to say, no self-respecting Government ought to adopt, they are pretending to one class of the people of this country that when this contribution of $35,000,000 is paid that will be an end of it. The organs of the Postmaster General are saying to a certain class of the people of Quebec that when this $35,000,000 is given we shall hear no more about it, that this money will not come from Quebec, but from Ontario and the West, and there will be no Canadian navy, and the young men of Quebec will not be asked to go aboard the ships to be sacrificed in wars in foreign seas. They are allowing, deliberately allowing, the Postmaster General and his organs to tell this to the people of the province of Quebec in order to gain support there, and in order that they may in some counties gain the same success that they gained in the county of Drummond and Arthabaska. And they are enabling their friends in other sections of Canada to say that this is only a temporary contribution to meet an emergency, but that when the time comes, before the next general election, they will announce the policy of a Canadian navy, the ships to be built in Canada and these ships to be brought back as a part of the Canadian navy. This is hardly a bold course for a Government to take. I appeal to you, Mr. Chairman, if that commends itself to your judgment. I ask the members of this committee if it appeals to their judgment, or if they think it will appeal to the judgment of the people of this country. No, Sir, if this House passes this appropriation of $35,000,000 and the Government has these ships built in England and turns them over to the British Admiralty to form part of an Imperial squadron to take their place side by side with the great battleship the Malays will furnish, those ships will not be recalled; they cannot be recalled, because we will do nothing in the meantime. There is no recruiting going on, no training of our young men, no effort to build up a naval service, and at the end of four years, when these ships shall be built, we will be in no better position to start the building of a Canadian navy than we are to-day. After the lapse of four years we will be in the same position, and the time will come when, if Mr. Winston Churchill is at the head of the Admiralty, we will be asked for another contribution, and the government of the day will be open to the charge of not acting fairly by the Empire if they do not follow the example which the Government of this day has set, and make a further contribution of either money or ships to form a part of the Imperial navy. As my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition has said, now is the time to begin the building of a Canadian navy; indeed, the time was two years ago when the late Government called for tenders. These tenders should have been acted upon; if the contracts had been let we would have had these war vessels well under way at the present time, and, as the resources of the country increased and we became better able to build the larger vessels, they also could have been put under contract, and before a great length of time we would have been standing side by side with the great overseas dominion of Australia in the building up of a Canadian navy whose ships would fly the white ensign as the emblem of the authority of the Crown, and at the same time fly the distinctive flag of our own Dominion. We would thus establish the nucleus of a navy of which in the years to come the people of Canada would have reason to be justly proud.

My right hon. friend says it looks as if the Opposition were going to drive this Government to the country, if they can do so, and he says we are availing ourselves of the rules of the House for that purpose. He thinks this is wrong, but he does not tell us what he is going to do about it. He did tell us through the newspapers that he is going to ask the House to apply the closure, but I can say that if the Government is going to do this, let them go ahead —the sooner the better. If they think it is in the interests of the people of this country and in the interests of true parliamentary government that the right of freedom of speech shall be curtailed, then let them try to carry through a measure having that object in view. But if, by means of the exercise of those rights which the rules of Parliament give to us, of having a full and thorough discussion on this great question, the result is to make the Government so impatient that they will take the remedy of which they can so readily avail themselves—an appeal to the judgment of the country—what harm will be done? My hon. friend the Minister of Finance said in Toronto the other night that the Liberal party did not want an election, and my hon. friend from York (Mr. Crocket), said that if there was an election the Liberal party would be wiped out of existence. At all events, Sir, this great result would be attained: the people would have an opportunity of passing their judgment upon this new departure which the Government proposes to take. Everyone of us should bear in mind that this vast sum of money which it is proposed to send out of our country to hand over to the workingmen of Great Britain does not belong to the members of this Government or their supporters, or indeed, to the members of this House generally. This money belongs to the people of the whole Dominion; it belongs to the taxpayers of Canada, and they have a right to be consulted upon this important question.

Mr. EDWARDS: How much did you spend on the sawdust wharf?

Mr. PUGSLEY: My hon. friend seems to have an obsession of the brain, and, when my hon. friend departs this life, I have no doubt that if anyone would take the trouble to make an examination they would find printed across his heart the words 'sawdust wharf.' There is another reason, it seems to me, why the people of this country should be consulted on this question. I know hon. gentlemen opposite usually turn a deaf ear to what we say on this side of the House, but I would like to make a final appeal to them. The Act of Confederation is a solemn pact which was entered into between the provinces which now form this Dominion. When Confederation took place there were four separate provinces—Quebec, Ontario, New Brunswick and Nova Scotia. Each province had its revenues and its means of taxation, and the rights of each province to collect customs and excise dues were handed over to the federal authorities, but all the courts dealing with the constitution of Canada treat the Act of Confederation as a pact which was entered into between the different provinces. So far as the expenditure of money for naval and military defence is concerned, what is the provision for this under the British North America Act? This provision, which was referred to by the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk) in the letter in which he resigned his position in the Cabinet, is that the federal Government shall have the power to devote the moneys of Canada to provide for the military and naval defence of this country. That principle has been acted upon ever since Confederation, but to-day, without any amendment to the British North America Act; without the consent of the different provinces as expressed by their Governments or legislatures, this Government is asking Parliament to take a new departure and to send money out of the country for the purpose of building warships to be placed under the control of the British Admiralty, entirely outside of Canadian waters, to be used in the defence of the Empire. How does this matter stand so far as the representatives of the different provinces are concerned? The Canadian Confederation consists of a family of nine provinces, and the majority of the representatives of four of these provinces out of nine are against this proposition. The representatives of the two provinces of Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island are equally divided and if this proposition carries it will carry by the vote of a majority of the representatives of three provinces out of the nine provinces of Confederation. I hold that before this great departure is taken there should be an amendment to the British North America Act. If we are to build vessels, send them to England and place them under the control of the Admiralty, primarily for the defence of the whole Empire, there should be an amendment to the British North America Act giving to the Canadian Government and Parliament the power to make such a departure. Before this great departure is made, before this new and important step which will be fraught with enormous consequences in the future, is taken, there should at least be a reference of the question to the people of Canada. They should have an opportunity of expressing their opinion in regard to it. This is not unreasonable, it is a fair and reasonable proposition and it is something that ought to appeal to hon. gentlemen opposite and which surely will appeal to the people of this country. The hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk) took the view that there should be an appeal to the people. He occupied a most important place in the Government of this country. He has been the leader of the Conservative party in the province of Quebec, he is a great constitutional lawyer, he is a professor of constitutional law in Laval University; than he, there is no one in this country better qualified to speak as to our constitutional rights and powers and upon that question he left the Government, first because he said that to remain in office, in view of the proposal to vote this sum of money for the purpose for which it was intended to be voted, would be contrary to the pledges he, as leader of the Conservative party, had made in the province of Quebec, and further, because in his judgment such a course was not warranted by the terms of the British North America Act. Surely the opinion of an intellectual giant like the hon. member for Jacques Cartier, the late Minister of Public Works, ought to have some weight with the Conservative party in this House. But apparently the Government and their supporters ignore all these facts, they, in effect, say we are determined to put this through, we will not tell the House and the people of this country what our policy is to be, we will allow our friends to have one policy in one part of Canada and another policy in another part of Canada, and we hope that, by some means or other, we will succeed, when the time comes, in coming back here with a majority of the representatives to support us. In my judgment the position of those who hold that there should be an appeal to the people is a reasonable position. We are not afraid to test the views of the people. We challenge our friends opposite to submit this question to the people. If it were outside of this House we would say that we dared our hon. friends opposite to appeal to the people. We have been endeavouring, as best we could to present the facts to the people of Canada. The arguments which we made during those strenuous days and nights when the Bill was up for discussion were not made with any strong hope of influencing hon. gentlemen opposite, but our appeals have been made to the people of this country, and it is necessary to have a lengthy discussion in order that the arguments and facts may get before the people of Canada. Canada is a country of vast size, thousands of miles in extent, and the people are entitled to be thoroughly informed on all questions discussed in this Parliament. It seems to me that the Prime Minister is not recognizing to the full extent the importance of the question or the right of the members of this Parliament to enjoy the utmost freedom of discussion when he asks us to curtail this debate and to tell him at what time we are going to finish the discussion.

Hon. ROBERT ROGERS (Minister of Public Works) : Mr. Chairman, when my hon. friend the member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley) arose at eight o'clock, his first words were words of complaint because we had not a larger attendance within the Chamber, and he said that he hoped to be able to present some new light to the House and to this country in the discussion of this important measure. I must confess, much as I would like to be able to say otherwise, that the hon. member for St. John has utterly failed in this respect. I am free to acknowledge that, if it is possible that any new light could be shed upon this question by hon. gentlemen opposite, my hon. friend from St. John ranks as the noblest Roman of them all; he would be equal to the task if any would. But he too, like the right hon. leader of the Opposition, utterly failed to present to us to-day one single, solitary, new argument that would justify this committee in refusing to pass the measure which has been presented to it by the First Minister of Canada for the effective naval defence of our common Empire. In my humble judgment, the difference between the two parties in discussing this important measure is simply this: We on this side of the House believe in the Bill which the First Minister has presented because of the fact that we find in that Bill provisions that will be of assistance in carrying out the effective naval defence of the Empire to which we belong. The position of hon. gentlemen opposite indicates to me that the only respect in which they differ from us in respect to this Bill is that they want to continue as they have in the past, the ineffective naval defence of the Empire to which we belong. That, to my mind, is the true difference and the only difference between the two sides of the House; the one simple little word of two letters represents the whole difference between the two sides of the House; the one simple little word of two letters represents the whole difference between the two parties. We stand for effective naval defence and apparently hon. gentlemen opposite stand, as they have stood according to their public record in the past, for ineffective naval defence of our common country. Reference has been made to-day to the fact that hon. gentlemen opposite have not had ample time for the discussion of this important measure. I think the hon. member for St. John made that complaint before we rose at six o'clock. I would like to say here, with respect to the question to which he referred regarding the night sittings which we had some few weeks ago, that a misrepresentation of the Government's position has been made both in the press and in this House. The position which we assumed upon that evening was that, in view of the fact that hon. gentlemen opposite had already voted twice for clause 2 of this Bill, if we were going to make any progress, it was nothing more than reasonable that they should at least show some evidence of their desire to make progress.

Let me then repeat, and I do so in all sincerity and with no desire to be misunderstood or to misrepresent or attempt to misrepresent the position occupied by hon. gentlemen opposite, that the public record of the party opposite for the past fifteen years shows that upon every occasion and under all circumstances their policy has been that of refusal to do anything for the common defence of our Empire. My right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) this afternoon referred to the conference held in London in 1902. A conference was called at that time by reason of the fact that the Prime Minister of England felt that it was an opportune occasion in view of the fact that representatives from all the overseas dominions were then in England attending the coronation and advantage was taken of their presence to hold the conference to which my right hon. friend referred. Lord Selborne presented the views that the right hon. leader of the Opposition referred to this afternoon and my right hon. friend read a portion of the answer which was given by himself and his colleagues on that occasion but he did not read the whole of the statements as made by himself and his ministers. Let me justify the statement I have made by reading ing an additional line or two that my right hon. friend overlooked from the memorandum of the Canadian ministers concerning defence:

> The Canadian ministers regret that they have been unable to assent to the suggestions made by Lord Selborne respecting the navy and by Mr. St. John Broderick respecting the army.

My right hon. friend is on record on that occasion as opposing anything in any form in connection with the navy. The hon. member for St. John, just before he sat down, spoke of the conference of 1907 and said that the Government at that time, of which, I believe, he was a member, refused to do anything at that conference because they were particularly and especially asked for a contribution. The hon. gentleman is not very correct in that statement and I would like to refresh his memory in order that he may see that, if the right hon. gentleman who was his leader had been anxious upon that occasion to do anything for the common defence of the Empire, he was not held, or bound, or asked, to do anything in the way of a contribution any more than in any other form. Dr. Smartt on that occasion moved a resolution which has been read in this House but which, I think, will bear repeating. In moving the resolution Dr. Smartt said:

Would I be in order in moving this naval resolution after the discussion yesterday? I do not think it will take any time because it is a resolution which requires no remarks to make it acceptable to the conference:

That this conference, recognizing the vast importance of the services rendered by the navy to the defence of the Empire and the protection of its trade and the paramount importance of continuing to maintain the navy in the highest possible state of efficiency, considers it to be duty of the dominions beyond the seas to make such contribution towards the upkeep of the navy as may be determined by their local legislatures—the contribution to take the form of a grant of money, the establishment of local naval defence, or such other services, in such manner as may be decided upon after consultation with the Admiralty and as would best accord with their varying circumstances.

There was the widest possible latitude left to hon. gentlemen opposite, who were then in charge of the Government of this country, if they had desired to show by any official act that they were willing or disposed to do their share as loyal Canadians in the common defence of our Empire. Upon that occasion the Chairman remarked as follows:

I may say that I communicated with the First Lord of the Admiralty what occurred, and he desires me to say he leaves himself entirely in the hands of the conference with regard to any modification or omission of the words referring to the Admiralty. Otherwise he has no objection to it.

Then Dr. Smartt goes on and makes a statement in support of his resolution and my right hon. friend gives his answer just like the answer which he gave in 1902. He starts out with the very same answer:

Sir Wilfrid Laurier: I am sorry to say, so far as Canada is concerned, we cannot agree to the resolution. We took the ground many years ago that we had enough to do in our respect in that country before committing ourselves to a general claim. The Government of Canada has done a great deal in that respect. Our action was not understood, but I was glad to see that the First Lord of the Admiralty admitted we had done much more than he was aware of. It is impossible, in my humble opinion, to have a uniform policy on this matter; the disproportion is too great between the Mother Country and the colonies. We have too much to do otherwise; in the Mother Country, you must remember, they have no expenses to incur with regard to public works; whereas, in most of the colonies, certainly in Canada, we have to tax ourselves to the utmost of our resources in the development of our country, and we could not contribute, or undertake to do more than we are doing in that way. For my part, if the motion were pressed to a conclusion, I should have to vote against it.

Dr. Smartt: But the public works to which you refer are of a reproductive character which are vital to the interests of your Dominion.

Sir Wilfrid Laurier: Some of our railways have never paid a cent of interest or expenses.

Dr. Smartt: Still, it is developing and opening up the country to an enormous extent. All the colonies are building developing railways of a character which may not be revenue producing for years. I thought the wording of this resolution would have specially met your views because you will find to make such a contribution towards the upkeep of the navy it may take the form either of a grant of money, or the establishment of a local defence force or other service. I understand Canada suggested strongly the other day that some of their other services were in the nature of local defence.

Sir Wilfrid Laurier: I have said all I have to say on the subject.

The Chairman: I think it is a pity to pass the resolution if it is not unanimous.

Dr. Smartt: I should like very much to hear the opinions of the representatives of the other portions of the Empire.

Mr. Deakin: I have no hesitation in entering into the discussion if desired; but if we are not going to pass the resolution is it worth while?

Dr. Smartt: I think it is a great pity we do not pass something. We have done so much in the way of pious affirmation that I am anxious we should do something of a practical character.

Does not that remind us of our position this evening in discussing this Bill? (Reading):

Sir Wilfrid Laurier: It can be passed if there is a majority. For my part, I must vote against it.

Sir Joseph Ward: To do any good we would require to be unanimous about it.

Dr. Smartt: Yes, I suppose so.

Mr. Winston Churchill: It is not much good to have a resolution at all if we cannot be unanimous.

Chairman: I think we had better not proceed any further just now.

Sir Wilfrid Laurier: We, of the different dominions beyond the seas, have tried to be unanimous up to the present time. I am sorry to say this is a question upon which we could not be unanimous. Therefore, Dr. Smartt can move it if he chooses or withdraw it. But if he presses it I should have to vote against it.

Dr. Smartt: I am absolutely in the hands of the Conference. I do not want to pass a resolution that is not likely to meet with the general approval of practically everybody on the Conference, especially a resolution of this particular character. We might, perhaps, let it stand over until the next sitting. Between this and Tuesday I may be able to modify it in some way to meet Sir Wilfrid's view.

And, if you read to the end of the debate at that conference, you will find that it was not possible for Dr. Smartt to make any modification that would meet the views of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, and just so do we find ourselves in the same position to-day; we find it impossible, with honour to the Canadian people, to make any modification or to do anything that would meet the views of the right hon. the leader of the Opposition and those who sit with him in this House. True, hon. gentlemen opposite tell us that they did something in 1909; that they had another conference then; and that we had a unanimous resolution passed in this Parliament. That resolution was dealt with by the Prime Minister this afternoon, and it is not necessary to read it again; but I emphasize the point made by the Prime Minister that in the measure now before this committee we are not departing from the resolution which unanimously passed this House in 1909; but, on the contrary, we are carrying out the spirit of that resolution. After that resolution had been unanimously passed by the House, I think it was the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Foster) who placed upon the Order Paper a question, asking the Government of the day if they correctly understood the meaning of the resolution; and Sir Wilfrid Laurier answered that they understood the resolution to mean that at the close of that session two Ministers of the Government were to go to England and consult the Admiralty as to what was the best to be done in the matter. That was the course taken then, and hon. gentlemen opposite claim that in accordance with that, definite action was taken by Sir Wilfrid Laurier and the Liberal Government. True, they purchased the Niobe and the Rainbow, and these two vessels represented Canada's contribution to the naval defence of the Empire according to the light of the right hon. gentleman who leads the Opposition; but by that action he made himself in all parts of this Dominion the object of sidesplitting laughter on the part of his fellow countrymen. The people of Canada were serious and desirous of rendering a service and a duty to the Motherland; they felt that something definite should be done towards assisting in the common defence of the Empire, and Sir Wilfrid Laurier to meet that demand of the Canadian people gave them the Niobe and the Rainbow. My hon. friend from St. John (Mr. Pugsley) referred to the statement of the Prime Minister in relation to these ships as being childish, and I too might refer to the policy followed out by Sir Wilfrid Laurier and the Liberal Government for the defence of the Empire, as evidenced by the purchase of the Niobe and the Rainbow, as being absolutely childish. While I do not often venture, in this House or outside of it, to quote scripture, yet for the benefit of the right hon. the leader of the Opposition I will venture to cite a passage; and, although I must confess to my friends opposite that for the moment I cannot cite the chapter and verse, still my hon. friend from St. John (Mr. Pugsley) has such a very extensive knowledge of biblical lore, that he will no doubt be able to supply the deficiency. The citation is applicable not only to the position of the right hon. gentleman who leads the Opposition, but to Canada's position to-day. I refer to the words of St. Paul in his Epistle to the Corinthians, when he said of himself: 'When I was a child I spoke as a child, I understood as a child, I thought as a child, but now that I have become a man, I put away the things of a child.' The leader of the Opposition, who in 1909 gave evidence of childishness in purchasing the Niobe and the Rainbow as a contribution to the defence of the Empire, in view of the light we have had since, in view of the memorandum from the Admiralty, will surely acknowledge that when he made that unfortunate mistake in 1909 he understood only as a child and thought as a child; and that now in the light of his present knowledge, he should put away the things of his childhood and think as a man and act as a man, and assist in the common defence of our Empire. Let me read, Mr. Chairman, that portion of the meoran lum as presented by the Admiralty to the right hon. the Prime Minister, in which the following is stated:

Whatever may be the decision of Canada at the present juncture, Great Britain will not in the circumstances fail in her duty to the overseas dominions of the Crown.

She has before now successfully made head alone and unaided against the most formidable combinations and she has not lost her capacity by a wise policy and strenuous exertion to watch over and preserve the vital interests of the Empire.

The Admiralty are assured that His Majesty's Government will not hesitate to ask the House of Commons for whatever provision the circumstances of each year may require. But the aid which Canada could give at the present time is not to be measured only in ships or money. Any action on the part of Canada to increase the power and mobility of the Imperial navy, and thus widen the margin of our common safety, would be recognized everywhere as a most significant witness to the united strength of the Empire, and to the renewed resolve of the overseas dominions to take their part in maintaining its integrity.

In addition to that we have clause 10, which reads as follows:

The Prime Minister of the Dominion having inquired in what form any immediate aid that Canada might give would be most effective, we have no hesitation in answering after a prolonged consideration of all the circumstances that it is desirable that such aid should include the provision of a certain number of the largest and strongest ships of war which science can build or money supply.

In view of that statement from the Admiralty, will the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley) or the right hon. gentleman who sits beside him, claim that they know more about the common defence of the Empire than do the British Admiralty? With that condition of affairs before us, when we come forward and ask that a Bill of this nature be ratified and carried into effect, we are delayed in the business of this country by hon. gentlemen opposite. We owe a duty to the Motherland; we owe a duty to ourselves; we are endeavouring as good citizens of Canada to fulfil that duty. A responsibility rests upon us which must be shared by hon. gentlemen opposite. As a Canadian people, we have that responsibility and we must accept it notwithstanding the fact that it may to some extent fail to flatter the vanity of the right hon. gentleman who leads the Opposition. I do not use the term in any way desiring it to be offensive. Throughout this debate and throughout his public record, my right hon. friend has shown that he is opposed to any measure of this kind. He gave evidence to-day that his feelings apparently resemble those of Napoleon when he fled from Elba and plunged France into the agony of the hundred days. Napoleon, with his fourteen years of power and sway, was imbued with the idea that he was made of different clay from other mortals. So it is with my right hon. friend with his fourteen years of uninterrupted power. He shakes and scowls now in the cold shades of Opposition. Napoleon made the gambler's last appeal to France and her armies which ended at Waterloo! It was ever thus with gamblers and with fallen stars. They never know when their sun has become eclipsed or when their glory has set. So with the right hon. gentleman and those who sit around him. They think they are always entitled to one more chance, one more opportunity. That was the pleading of the right hon. gentleman and of the member for St. John in their speeches to-day. So far as I am concerned, there is nothing that I would like better than to give them one more chance.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Come on.

Mr. GAUVREAU: It will be the last one.

Mr. ROGERS: My right hon. friend and those who are associated with him will at least do me the tardy justice of acknowledging that, if I do not know much of anything else, perhaps I know a little about winning elections.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): How do you do it?

Mr. ROGERS: I would be satisfied and delighted to take the opportunity if there was any excuse or any reason under Heaven why an election should be brought about. I would be the foremost man to take in hand the task of forcing that condition of affairs in this country to-day. With my knowledge of elections, I am satisfied that the result would be that, after going forth to a loyal and faithful people and placing this Bill before them and making the issue which is the issue between us on the floor of the House, we would come back to this House with such an overwhelming majority that the right hon. gentleman would not have sufficient votes to call for a division. It is impossible to have an election for this reason. In tones louder than thunder comes the demand to this Government from all parts of Canada, irrespective of party, race or creed, that we must not allow the needs of Canada and of this Empire to be delayed or to be sacrificed to gratify the ambitions of hon. gentlemen opposite. To that appeal, the Government answers that the business of this country must, shall and will be continued and that the needs of Canada must, shall and will be met, protected and maintained by the Government of to-day.

Mr. MACDONALD: Mr. Chairman, I desire to congratulate the committee upon having had the opportunity of listening to the very able defence of the Government's position which at last the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Rogers) has vouchsafed. In doing so, he has shown a much better disposition than that which has characterized some of his colleagues who still sit dumb, without any pretense of affording any reason or justification for the strange somersault which the Conservative party has performed since 1909 and more particularly the acrobatic performance of the Prime Minister, if justification can be given for it. The address of my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works was refreshing in a great many ways. His reference to scripture, to say the least, was somewhat novel. There was a striking character in Dickens' works of the name of Silas Wegg who sometimes dropped into poetry. My hon. friend the Minister of Public Works has never shown before a disposition to drop into biblical quotations. I am bound to say that he did fairly well except that he rather broke at the last part; which shows that his knowledge of St. Paul's epistle to the Corinthians is somewhat crude and has been gathered from a rather hasty inspection of the Holy Writ. I am sure he is not as learned in that line as he is in the lore which enables him to win elections. But to say that he has added anything new to this debate, or has given additional reasons why anyone on this side or anyone in this country, should change his opinion as to the iniquity of this measure, would be paying him too high a compliment. Like his leader, he ran away from the resolution of 1909. And I should be glad if, sometime before we reach the end of the debate, be it sooner or later, some hon. gentleman on the other side would have the courage to state to the country how it is, and why it is, that though they unanimously declared in 1909, in clause two of the resolution adopted by this House, that the proper way to assist the Mother Country in regard to naval matters was by the speedy organization of a Canadian naval service, they now abandon that altogether and will not even explain why they abandon it. If they were right in abandoning it, they ought to be glad of the opportunity to point out where they made a mistake and to show how, now that they are in power, they are repairing their error. But, as I have said, they run away from it. One of the conspicuous features of the speech of the Prime Minister this afternoon was that, while he wobbled on almost everything else that had been uttered in defence of the measure by the men who were behind it, when I asked him point blank to tell the committee where they stood in regard to the declaration of 1909, while he professed that he was going to deal with that question, he sat down without saying a word about it. And every gentleman on this side, and every hon. gentleman who sits behind the Prime Minister, knows that the right hon. gentleman did not endeavour to explain his change of attitude. This is the crux of the question. The leader of the Opposition in giving reasons why we on this side of the House regard this proposition as one of the most serious that have ever been before the people of this country, pointed out the absolute unanimity of the men of all political shades on that resolution in 1909. He pointed out that the Admiralty's request of 1902 and 1907 was known, and being known the present leader of the Government joined in framing the resolution and himself asked for the insertion of the word 'speedy' with particular application to the Canadian naval service, and spoke manfully here and in the country, and in England, in justification of the theory that contributions were not the proper method of settling this naval question. Why should we not discuss this point in view of that situation? The Minister of Public Works tells us that the difference between the two parties is that their policy is one of effective naval aid and that the policy of the Opposition is a policy of ineffective naval aid. But our policy is the policy upon which everybody agreed in 1909; it is the policy for which the Prime Minister then stood, which he insisted upon putting upon our records, for which he spoke in Parliament, in Canada generally, and in England as well. If that is ineffective, will hon. gentlemen opposite have the courage to stand up and say wherein it is ineffective? They do not attempt to do anything of the kind, these gentlemen. On the contrary, the Prime Minister to-day declares that the policy of the present Government is not a policy of contribution. Hon. gentlemen sitting behind him know that the argument of the Prime Minister to-day was that the present policy was not one which he was justifying upon the ground that it was a contribution, and argued not that there was a matter of emergency—because he never used the word—but suggested that there was an urgency of some kind which enabled him to get it out of the category of contribution which he deliberately condemned in 1909. So that, as the result of the continued discussion, we have a new declaration from the Prime Minister in regard to this policy. And when the Minister of Public Works talks about our policy being ineffective, let me tell him what the Minister of Trade and Commerce thinks about it. He has journeyed out to the sister Dominion of Australia. He has journeyed out to a country where the atmosphere is impregnated with the sturdy Australian idea, a belief in themselves, a confidence in their own position as a great overseas dominion within the Empire. He sees out there what it is to have a condition under which men of both political parties, though they have their political differences, vie with each other, even in the midst of a general election, in applauding the idea that the Australian naval policy is the correct one for that country. And removed from the discord here and from the atmosphere created by the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite what do we find him saying in Australia in regard to this policy of the Liberal party which my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works says is so ineffective?

With regard to naval matters, the people of Australia must not come to the conclusion that because a difference of opinion existed in the House of Commons as to the present Canadian Government Bill, any party in Canada is opposed to aiding in the defence of the Empire by the sea.

This is in direct contradiction of the Minister of Public Works.

It is more a matter of method than of principle.

So, the Minister of Trade and Commerce is half converted back to the idea he had in 1909. To borrow the simile of the hon member for Calgary (Mr. Bennett), he is on his way to Damascus. And by the time he returns to this Dominion, we shall find him a sound believer in the policy of a Canadian navy as the means of dealing with the naval forces of the Empire.

I was surprised that my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works who is too astute a politician not to know the absolute worthlessness of such an argument, should state that hon. gentlemen on this side of the House voted twice for clause 2 of this Bill—voted for it in the amendment of the right hon. leader of the Opposition to the second reading. If we voted for that clause—to use, in a sense, that argument, as did my hon. friend—if we voted for clause 2 when we voted for the amendment of the right hon. leader of the Opposition containing that language, what were hon. gentemen opposite doing when they are voting against it? It is not worth while going into the minutiae of the matter, because all hon. gentlemen know that, with regard to the expenditure of $35,000,000, we propose to spend it one way while the Government proposes to spend it another. My hon. friend touches lightly upon our record in regard to this matter of naval defence. He did not have the advantage of being in the last Parliament, and I am free to confess that if those gentlemen who sit in the treasury benches and who were not in the last Parliament had been here and had followed the course of events in regard to naval discussion and the development of this problem from its earliest stages in 1909 until the present time, those hon. gentlemen, I say, who now affect surprise at our attitude upon this question, would not in the slightest degree be animated by any such idea. The only feeling any one of these hon. gentlemen would possess, would be one of wonderment if hon. gentlemen on this side of the House would not fight continuously for the principle which is the only true policy worthy of adoption by every decent Canadian. What is the record of our friends on the other side in regard to this matter? Every hon. gentlemen who was here during the last session of Parliament will remember the occasion upon which we unanimously decided in favour of a Canadian naval service. All hon. gentlemen are familiar with the incident that occurred in connection with the Drummond and Arthabaska election, when the Nationalist wing, which is represented in this combination Government of Nationalists and Conservatives, started to appeal to the people of the province of Quebec and inflame their passions against our leader because, as it was alleged, he proposed to embark them in the sea of militarism, and intended to drag the young French-Canadians from their homes and send them to fight the battles of the Empire. We well remember that these were the arguments of hon. members now sitting in this Government and of their associates in this House, throughout the length and breath of the province of Quebec during the years 1910 and 1911; it is a dark page in the history of the province of Quebec, and of the Conservative party and their associates in this country. If any hon. gentleman desires to obtain any information in regard to the record of the Conservative party in respect of naval defence, let him ask this pseudo-Conservative, the Postmaster, (Mr. Pelletier) or the Minister of Inland Revenue, (Mr. Nantel) who told us during the last Parliament that if Sir John A. Macdonald had been alive he would never have allowed the Canadian boys to go to South Africa and fight the battles of the Empire! Let him ask the Secretaty of State (Mr. Coderre) or the ex-Minister of Public Works (Mr. Monk) who was the first lieutenant of the leader of the Government and who led the political black cavalry in the province of Quebec in that violent onslaught against British institutions, against participation by this country with the Empire in naval or military matters, and against our great leader, who was the first and foremost in leading the people of this province along the proper lines in regard to this question. The Toronto News, which does not usually, upon public questions express views favourable to hon. gentlemen on this side of the House, did our leader the justice of saying that he had laid the foundation upon which there would be worked out in days to come, by one or both political parties in this country, the true solution of the problem of Canada's participation in the naval defence of the Empire, and that to him must at all times be given the credit of initiating and carrying through the early and difficult stages of that project. The Minister of Public Works referred to our great leader as a Napoleon. My hon. friend does not know the man who leads the Liberal party of this country. He is not a Napoleon, and never had the ambition or the instincts of that powerful man. Rather is he a man of the highest type of English public man, who along all peaceful lines, has, during the forty years of his public life, laid on deep and sound principles our Canadian nationhood and our connection with the Mother Country. Let me say, Sir, there is not a man on this side of the House who does not know that, long after hon. gentlemen on the other side and their leaders are forgotten, history will tell what Sir Wilfrid Laurier did for Canada and the Canadians.

It is well that the discussion of this matter should have been prolonged; we have heard some new things. My hon. friend the leader of the Government has run away from the contribution idea. Where is my hon. friend from Calgary (Mr. Bennett)? He it was who asked himself where the great battle is to be fought in which the future of the Empire is to be settled. He pictured in the North sea, the Armageddon that was to come, but he and his Armageddon and his North sea have all been transferred to Gibraltar or some other place a thousand miles away. If the hon. Minister of Public Works had not succeeded in coercing this committee some three weeks ago, we never would have known of Winston Churchill's change of plan; we never would have known that the Empire was not going to be saved in the North sea, but somewhere around the Cape of Good Hope, or wherever he sends his flying squadron. Has it not been a good thing for the people of Canada, in order that they may properly arrive at a logical conclusion on this question, that three weeks have elapsed since last we discussed this important matter? The Minister of Public Works, laughing up his sleeve when he said it, in his most dramatic tone talked about the business of the country being retarded. Mr. Chairman, we all know how the members of the Opposition have given the fullest co-operation to every reasonable proposition of the Government in regard to the ordinary legislation of this House. Without any question we gave hon. gentlemen opposite the necessary supply in order to carry on the affairs of the country; we have not in any way retarded the public measures which they have submitted for our consideration. If the budget has not been brought down, that is not our fault. If the West India agreement has not been discussed in the House it is not our fault. We are ready to discuss and consider them at any time or to discuss any other of the numerous Bills on the Order Paper. Why did not the Postmaster General go on with his parcel post measure? The country are anxious to hear what he has to propose in that matter. Or the minister might have gone on with his measure for providing assistance to farmers. All these questions might have been proceeded with at any moment. and the Minister of Public Works, I am sure. was laughing in his sleeve when he made that dramatic appeal, because he knew that the House was prepared to consider and deal with any legitimate proposition which the Government might submit for its consideration.

What else have we gained by discussion of this question? We have had the positive declaration that this Bill is not part of a contribution policy. If this Bill is not part of a contribution policy, of what policy is it a part? The Prime Minister at all times has had the faculty, in dealing with many public questions, of getting on both sides of the fence. There are only two possible ways of dealing wih the Mother Country in regard to naval defence, there is no third way, there is no fourth way and no fifth way. This Government may contemplate from now until Imperial federation or doomsday or the millenium, but they have to come back to the proposition whether they propose to have a policy of contribution or an integral Canadian naval policy. The Prime Minister said to-day that this was not part of a contribution policy. The hon. gentlemen who sat behind him and his press in the country, who, for the last four months, have been writing day in and day out that the proper method of solving this problem of our relations to the Mother Country in regard to naval defence was by a contribution policy, have got to take back everything they said or wrote as the result of to-day's discussion, a discussion and a result which have been attained in consequence of our giving this matter the full consideration which we have. If this is not part of a contribution policy well what is it?

An hon. MEMBER: A corpse.

Mr. MACDONALD: Oh, he says, we are going to get these ships built ourselves. That is a new theory, that is not the original theory when we had the stage set and the memorandum and the waving of the flag and all the excitement in which Canada was rushing to the defence of the Mother country, placing three ships in the fighting line in the North sea. The Prime Minister said to-day that was not the policy at all, no ships. no fighting line, we are going to build them ourselves in England and they are only going to be over there until we are ready to take them back. In answer to a question as to when he was going to take them back he said: If you gentlemen get into power of course they will be brought back—and I am quite sure they will. But he did not tell us what he proposed to do with them, whether he intended to bring them back and make them part of a Canadian naval service in which our rights as an integral part of the nation were to be recognized. He would not tell us——

An hon. MEMBER: Does he know?

Mr. MACDONALD: Does he know? If he does know he is afraid to say just yet. We cannot forget that the Postmaster General and the Prime Minister gave to the Nationalist wing of the Government a pledge, when they came into office in 1911, that they would repeal the Canadian Naval Service Act and, of course, if that Act should be repealed they would have no legislation on the statute book under which Canada could own and control these vessels over here. Consequently he is not prepared to make a statement. My own opinion is that he intends eventually to drop that particular view which obtained in Quebec, and he would like to get back, if he could, to the solid ground he was on in 1909 and he would like to have our policy, which he knows in his heart is the best policy. Why will he not tell us before this measure is passed? This House and this country have a right to know from this Government whether or not they intend ever to bring back those battleships which they tell us now are not being given to Great Britain but which they are providing are to be brought back. Is this Government going to bring them back and utilize them as part of a Canadian navy or not? Why should not the country know? Before we dispose of this question ultimately we ought to know what the policy of the Government on this question is. How are we to settle the problem of giving away $35,000,000? Is it by the childish method, to open your mouth and shut your eyes and the Government is going to give you something that will make you wise? That is the kind of policy we are asked to adopt. There are only two methods in the world, contribution and Canadian naval service. This is not Canadian naval service, this is not contribution, the Prime Minister said this afternoon. What is it? Has not the country the right to know from the Government before the measure finally passes? Are we on this side of the House bound, in justice to our constituents and in the interest of this country, to ascertain from these gentlemen, if we can, where they stand? The Prime Minister evaded that question this afternoon, he ran away from it and refused to face it. All he told the House was that if hon. gentlemen on this side of the House came into power as the result of the next election they could utilize these ships as part of the Canadian navy.

What else have we gained as a result of this discussion? We have the positive certainty, backed up by authorities in England, official and non-official, and by all the public press of the Mother Country, that there is no emergency. That is something that was pretty well settled long ago. Everybody in this House knew that hon. gentlemen who attempted to argue it did so very half heartedly. Hon. gentlemen who followed the matter dispassionately knew that there was nothing in it. The Prime Minister this afternoon would not use the word emergency, he talked about urgency. But we know that in the Mother Country it is very well settled, beyond the shadow of a doubt, that there is no urgency. They are talking about preparations for a naval holiday. The First Lord of the Admiralty has talked in that way, dispensing with any necessity of our ships going to the North sea, utilizing them as part of a flying squadron, a kind of holiday performance. A little over a year and a half ago the First Lord of the Admiralty in the House of Commons and the representative of the Government in the House of Lords assured the country and both of those great bodies that there was no necessity whatever for maintaining a fleet at Gibraltar or on the Mediterranean. They justified the Mother Country in taking away her fleet from the Mediterranean and declared that there was no necessity or reason for it being there. Our ships now are to be used, as I say, for junketting purposes, a flying squadron, they are not to be in the fighting line at all, not to be within a thousand miles of it, but are to have a base at Gibraltar and take an occasional run down to the Cape of Good Hope or over the Atlantic ocean wherever they may want to go for junketting purposes. That is what we have learned as a result of a two weeks' discussion on naval defence so far. Every argument that has been made by hon. gentlemen opposite in support of this measure has been swept away by the clearest possible evidence as to the condition of the forces in England.

An hon. MEMBER: Why do you need two fleet units?

Mr. MACDONALD: In order that the North Pacific may be policed and that the North Atlantic squadron may be replaced by our squadron. Let me give my hon. friend a statement which was made in Winnipeg by Premier Scaddon of Western Australia, who had been paying a visit to the Old Country and was on his way home. Premier Scaddan said:

> He said that when in the Old Country recently he had the pleasure of telling the people there that Australia was preparing to protect herself and to relieve the Mother Country of a part of her burden. He also declared that Australia was inaugurating a system of defence designed to play a part in what he hoped was a far-off day when trouble might be expected from Asiatic peoples to the north. But while Australia was perfecting this system of defence he believed that Australians were being made better citizens of the Empire. Premier Scaddan also said that he had told the people in the Old Land that Australia did not want to dictate to the Mother Country as to what she should do and on the other hand Australians did not want to be dictated to in regard to what were purely domestic concerns.

That is to say that the Premier of one of the great provinces of Australia, speaking in our country the other day, took absolutely the same position that the Liberal party take here. A separatist, is he? Hon. gentlemen opposite used to sneer at hon. gentlemen here because we declared that we stood for a virile Canadian policy. I suppose that Mr. Scaddan must be classed with the gentlemen whom hon. gentlemen opposite dignify with that name. Here is what he said on another occasion.

> Naval defence of Canada was a matter that Canada must decide for herself, with a proper regard to her peculiar necessities, but he stated that Australia had thought it best to build her own navy to police the Pacific. 'We have a very real Japanese and Chinese menace,' he said, Australians have now decided in favour of 'a white Australia.'

The policy of hon. gentlemen opposite, before they got into power, was a white British Columbia, but now that they have tied their hands and cut every possible chance of carrying out their theories, I suppose they will abandon that policy, just the same as their leader abandoned his policy on the naval question.

Before that decision was reached, the yellow men descended upon us in their thousands. The Premier added that there had not been, and it was not expected that there would be, any difficulty in recruiting for the Australian navy. Naval colleges were to be established, and by a system of scholarships, it would be possible for boys of superior intelligence, born of poor parents, to attain to the highest rank in the service.

He goes on to argue in support of the policy which Australia has adopted unanimously, and let me say that, out in that great Commonwealth where they are to-day on the verge of a general election, both parties are vieing with each other in vehemently claiming that they are standing for the support of the very policy which the Liberal party in Canada has adopted in regard to this question.

We had introduced into this discussion some weeks ago a perfectly unjustifiable letter from the First Lord of the Admiralty, a letter which did not convey the information which the Prime Minister had asked for but which was a gratuitous interference with our affairs and our opinions upon this question. Hon. gentlemen opposite, and some of the Conservative press in this country, affect to be shocked at the idea that anybody who was born out here in the colonies should by any possibility venture to question the omniscience of the gentleman who happens to be First Lord of the Admiralty. There is ample justification for the position which the Liberal party are taking in what the English press are saying as to Mr. Churchill's interference with Canadian affairs. The great Liberal dailies in London are the Daily Chronicle and the Daily News and Leader. The Daily Chronicle of March 16 says in regard to this question:

His memorandum starts by alluding, not to Mr. Borden's point but to 'the suggestion that the proposed battleships could be expeditiously built in Canada; and its whole purport is a frank and forcible argument against any idea of Canada's building them. Mr. Borden has never asked for this; the question of what Canada should or could do was one for Canadians to decide, not for the Admiralty, as the original Admiralty memorandum of October 25 has properly recognized.

It was, in fact, being hotly debated in the Canadian Parliament; and it must be difficult for any Canadian to escape the conclusion, that what Mr. Churchill had in mind and was really answering, was not Mr. Borden's letter but the parliamentary arguments of the Canadian Liberal party. His second letter shows this almost more clearly. Mr. Borden had sent him the figures of some estimated costs, asking to have them checked by technical advisers; Mr. Churchill replies by sending him some other figures calculated on the assumption that 'the idea of building the capital ships in Canada is impracticable,' and accompanied by a memorandum gratuitously rubbing in at half-a-dozen points the Admiralty's objections to that preference for a separate Canadian navy with which Sir Wilfrid Laurier's part is identified.

Now, assuming that from the naval point of view the superiority of the Borden policy to the Laurier were never so indubitable, it would still be inadvisable for a British minister to enter the lists between them. The true Bill that we find against Mr. Churchill is that he did so, although he was not even invited or inveigled into doing so. No doubt there were temptations. The Admiralty's preference for Dominion contributions over Dominion fleets could be surmised from the October memorandum, and is pretty well known. It may even be true that the real antithesis all along has not been between the Laurier policy and the Borden policy but between the Laurier policy and an Admiralty policy which Mr. Borden has been induced to espouse. Mr. Churchill's letters read like the kind of brief that is supplied to an advocate by his client. But if that were in any sense the actual relation between them, it only made it the more imperative that indiscretions like these should be avoided.

The alleged 'Impracticability' of building dreadnoughts in Canada, we may observe, almost entirely a matter of money. There is no reason to question the Admiralty's figure of cost. But Canada is a young country with a spirit of exceptional enterprise; her population exceeds that of any European state excepting the great powers and Spain, and is exceedingly rich per head; She has already accomplished engineering feats which are among the wonders of the world. Such a nation is much less likely to acquiesce in the idea that she cannot do something which all the great nations do, than an overtaxed European state or a South American republic with no engineering traditions; doubtless, whether she runs her own navy or not, she would gain financially by having the ships built in Great Britain. But she has other things to consider besides finance; there is the national pride of her people, and there is also the question of laying the foundation for a self-reliant and self-sufficient future. There is nothing un-Imperial or anti-Imperial in such ideas. If we recognize that within the Empire the dominions can and should be free nations——

It has been the idea of some hon. gentlemen opposite that when we, on this side of the House, say anything about Canada being a free nation in the Empire, we are saying something which indicates disloyalty. There is not a journal in England that studies Imperial problems which has not long ago recognized the soundness of the idea that, unless there are developed strong, self-governing nations with autonomous powers interested in the maintenance of the Empire as a whole, the Empire cannot be maintained. This is the expression that is used here:

If we recognize that within the Empire the dominions can and should be free nations, we must also recognize that their ambition to stand on their feet without crutches is in the Imperial interest a laudable ambition. . .

Mr. SCHAFFNER: Is there anything wrong about that ?

Mr. MACDONALD: What do you say about it ?

Mr. SCHAFFNER: I say there is nothing wrong in that, and that our policy does not interfere with it.

Mr. MACDONALD: What is your policy?

Mr. SCHAFFNER: You ought to know.

Mr. MACDONALD: That is the trouble; my hon. friend ought to take an afternoon off and tell us what his policy is.

Mr. SCHAFFNER: It is very clear.

Mr. MACDONALD: Hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House have been arguing that we are contributing to England in order that we might have three ships in the battle line of the Empire on the North sea. They have been arguing that this is a free gift from the Canadian people and it has been discussed in the English newspapers on the basis of being a free gift. But to-night the Prime Minister destroyed all these theories when he declared that this proposal was not part of a contribution policy, and was not a free gift. My hon. friend from Souris (Mr. Schaffner), has been taking a little too much for granted in regard to what his leader's policy is, but had he followed the debate as closely as we have, he would see that after four months of consideration of this question, the country is in the ridiculous position that the Government has stated three or four different things as to what their policy really is.

Mr. SCHAFFNER: That is your opinion.

Mr. MACDONALD: I can point to the records to prove it.

Mr. SCHAFFNER: No.

Mr. MACDONALD: My hon. friend from Souris belongs to that class who though convinced against their will are of the same opinion still. Will any of the ministers present to-night tell us whether or not the principle involved in this measure is a free gift from Canada to the Motherland? I pause for a reply. They will not answer.

Mr. WILCOX: The Bill is very clear on that point.

Mr. MACDONALD: We on this side are clear; we know what it is; but I venture to say the Minister of Inland Revenue at this very minute does not know whether or not this is a gift to the Mother Country. The Postmaster General may know, but he won't tell us, and neither will the Minister of Public Works.

Mr. ROGERS: Do you want me to send you over the Bill?

Mr. MACDONALD: Even so great an Imperialist as Richard Jebb, who has written books on the importance of preserving the Empire along true lines, speaks of it as being a free gift from the Canadian people, but no member of the Government present to-night will take the responsibility of saying whether or not this is a free gift from the Canadian people to the Mother land. The Chronicle says further:

The money spent by the dominions on ships is not something wrung from them by orders from above, or paid over by them mechanically without their caring what becomes of it. It represents on their part a considerable but voluntary sacrifice.

Here is an English newspaper discussing the matter as if we were paying the money over to England, and the Prime Minister told us to-day that we were doing nothing of the sort:

Their democracies pay it because they feel interested and they can scarcely be expected to take permanently a popular and powerful interest in fleets which operate in the North sea, or indeed in any fleets which do not belong to them and fly their flags.

Imagine such heresy; here is a great organ of public opinion in England, supporting the Government in power, declaring:

For this reason we think that the Admiralty will be very short sighted, if to gain a point or two in the momentary race of armaments, it turns the rising instinct of dominion nationalism against it instead of enlisting it on its side. We do not suggest that Mr. Churchill in the present instance, come out into the open as a supporter of the Laurier policy. He should have avoided any appearance of influencing Canada's decision between them. But since he has failed to do that, we regret that his line has been one which must array much Canadian national sentiment against him.

That is the sentiment of the Morning Chronicle, one of the great London dailies supporting Mr. Asquith. Take this utterance in the London Star:

It would have been enough for Mr. Churchill to state the facts and leave the Canadians to draw their own conclusions. If they choose to spend £15,000,000 on plant, they can do so. If they please to face the trouble and endure the delay and bear the cost, it is their affair and not ours.

There is no urgency in the matter, because even our jingoes refuse to count the Canadian ships as a relief for the British taxpayer. Therefore the Laurier policy is quite compatible with our naval security, and if Canadian pride demands a navy built, manned and maintained by Canada, we need not weep.

The plain truth is that the conflict between the Government and the Opposition in Canada over this question is so acute that it robs the gift of the three battleships of all grace and dignity.

Here again is a reference to it being a gift. How much eloquence has been expended by jingoes in Canada and in England as to the glorious nature of this gift they are giving to the Mother Country, but that argument has been thrown to the winds by the declaration of the Prime Minister to-day that it is no gift; that we are going to spend the money ourselves; that we are only going to lend the ships to the Mother Country, and that we will take them back when we want to:

In our opinion, it would be wise for the British Government to intimate that such a contribution would not be acceptable unless made by the Canadian Parliament with practical unanimity. The Canadian Liberals are too strong to be ignored in a crucial matter of this kind. When they come back to power, as they are bound to come back, they may reverse the Borden policy, and there will be more rancour, more strife, more making of bad blood.

To sum up, we hope the Government will have the courage to put an end to a dangerous and painful situation by saying that there is no immediate need for the three Canadian battleships, and that a united Canada is more valuable to the Empire than all the battleships in the world

That is what our right hon. leader said to-day.

Mr. FOSTER (Kings): Was the hon. member reading from an editorial in the paper or was he reading from someone else's article?

Mr. MACDONALD: I was reading an editorial from the London Star, an English paper. I have several more of them along the same line that show conclusively that, as a result of the discussion which has taken place in the Canadian Parliament, there has been a wonderful education of public opinion not only in this country, but all over the Empire. Messages from Australia indicate that our great sister commonwealth stands solidly for the principles for which we stand. South Africa is in the same position. Here and there an attempt has been made to make capital out of the stand taken by the Malay States, which is a Crown colony and have not the same rights of responsible government as we have. All over the Empire, wherever there has been a free expression of ouinion, those opinions have been along the lines that the strength and virility of the Empire, in the time that is to be, depend upon the development of the individual states and of the special interests within those states. I shall read from the Daily News and Leader, an English paper, which occupies the same position in regard to public matters on the other side, as does the Daily Chronicle. On March 18, 1913, on page 6 of this paper, it says in regard to this question:

In his reply to the second point Mr. Churchill seems less conclusive. He does not confine himself to an examination of the Canadian estimate of the cost of building and maintaining a Canadian fleet. He addresses himself rather to showing that in the circumstances of to-day it would not be possible for the British Admiralty to assist Canada in manning a fleet of its own. The new German Navy Law, he points out, has necessitated a large increase in the number of ships in commission here, and has strained our manning resources to their utmost limits. We confess that this argument does not seem quite water-tight. Whether Canada builds for herself or builds for us ,the ships will have to be manned.

Manifestly the argument of the Daily News and Leader is so natural and so conclusive that anyone who read the memorandum and the letter written by Mr. Churchill at once saw the answer; and the natural feeling, which must have arisen in the mind and heart of every decent Canadian when he read the letter, was this, that this gentleman, who happens to be First Lord of the Admiralty had an idea that the people who lived in the overseas dominions had so little intelligence that they could not argue from the most simple premises to the most ordinary conclusion. (Reading):

The only difference seems to be that, if the ships are included in the British navy, they will have to be manned by us while, if they are built for a Canadian navy, they will have a more direct claim on the Canadian Naval Service, and our help will be subsidiary and a diminishing quantity. If it is a question, therefore, of relieving the strain on our resources, the advantage would seem clearly to be with the Laurier rather than with the Borden policy. It is true, of course, that the establishment of a Canadian navy would mean its presence in Canadian rather than British waters; but even allowing for this fact we do not think the Admiralty have made out their objection on the score of manning.

Here is one important advantage of having had this discussion. Supposing that this debate had closed immediately after this memorandum came from Mr. Churchill, and that the harsh methods which hon. members opposite were adopting in regard to this discussion had been successful, the people of this country would never have had the opportunity of knowing, before this question was settled, what English opinion was on the action of the First Lord of the Admiralty in regard to these important questions. Papers, representing every shade of political view in the Motherland, but seeing the wisdom of building up strong self-governing communities within the Empire, condemn the statement made by Mr. Churchill and favour the views held by our great leader. (Reading):

In other respects, the advantage of the Laurier policy seems indisputable from our own as well as from the Canadian point of view. It avoids the grave constitutional problems which the Borden scheme involves. It relieves us of the heavy cost of maintenance. It will remove serious possibilities of friction over policy and control. It does not threaten us with such delicate problems as the question of the renewal in due course of the contributory ships. It simplifies our relations with the continental powers. So far as Canada is concerned, it is not conceivable that the contributory system could be permanently tolerable.

Mark that statement, when hon. gentlemen opposite lecture us on this side, because we take the position that Canada ought to provide for the defence of her transportation on sea just as she is doing on land, when hon. gentlemen opposite laugh at the Rainbow and Niobe, as if everything did not have to have a beginning.

Mr. CARVELL: What were they bought for—training ships?

Mr. MACDONALD: Of course. The Daily News and Leader is surely as good an authority on problems of Empire as the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Rogers), the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Hazen), or the Minister of Inland Revenue (Mr. Nantel). Its views upon these important problems are of the strongest character and it says that so far as Canada is concerned it is not conceivable that the contribution system could be permanently tolerable. (Reading):

It would be a constant source of irritation between the Dominion and the Admiralty, and a permanent subject of conflict in the Canadian Parliament. It would have no finalty. Ultimately Canada would insist on controlling the navy which it had built. Whatever its decision now, no one can doubt that in the end national pride as well as practical considerations will carry the day.

I think that the man who wrote this article must have read one of these stirring statements made by the leader of the Government in 1909, when he denounced contribution of any kind, when in language of the most unmistakable character he said that it would be a constant source of irritation and wound up his declaration by stating that it would eventually make for separation of Canada from the Empire. That statement of his in 1909 is just as true to-day as it was then. Here from another source altogether, a great organ of public opinion in England, we have the same opinion:

It is because he realizes the strength of his position in this matter that Sir Wilfrid Laurier is offering such a stout resistance to the Borden scheme. He knows that Canadian opinion is with him and he knows, too, that in this matter the enduring interests of the British connection are implicit in his policy.

Mr. FOSTER (Kings). Is that an editorial which the hon. gentleman is reading?

Mr. MACDONALD: That is an editorial on an article from the Daily News and Leader of Tuesday, March 18, 1913.

In England there are people who are not afraid to say what they think about Winston Churchill just as hon. members on this side said over a week ago.

Mr. LEMIEUX: What does Mr. Jebb say?

Mr. MACDONALD: Let ue see what Mr. Jebb does say. I have here the article to which I have referred. I am not going to read it all. But here is what he says in speaking of the aspirations of the Canadian people:

Is it not a fact that a limited proportion of the limited supply of skilled labour in the United Kingdom is engaged all the time in building battleships for foreign countries? Might not the security of the Empire be promoted rather impeded by the transfer of that proportion to Canada where it would be engaged in building ships for the Empire instead of for foreigners? Is it sound principle to veto the development of skilled industries in Canada so as to keep down the rate of wages in those industries at home?

He hints here at the influence that has been exercised in regard to these questions. He goes on:

How does that policy fit in with Mr. Bonar Law's dictum that a rise in the rate of wages would be the best measure of social reform?

Is such a veto calculated to inspire Imperial patriotism either in Canada or in the British democracy? The proposed present of three battleships to the British navy arose from the feeling of many Canadians that Canada should do something effective and do it quickly, but the inexorable truth is that naval aid is not a matter in which a Dominion, suddenly making up its mind, can do something effective and do it quickly. A simple grant of money is ineffective unless morally until the ships are built, which may be three years or more.

If money is required, Britain has more than any dominion and there is always the possibility, some of us think, of a tolerable certainty that in the end the Dominion's cheque would merely relieve the taxpayers of Britain instead of ultimately increasing the naval strength of the Empire.

And he goes on presenting the views that he has long maintained and urged by pen and by voice, that the British Empire can only be maintained by the preservation of the autonomous rights of great self-governing nations within the Empire, and holding that the proposition made by hon. gentlemen opposite is a violation of that principle and is one that cannot result in good to Canada or to the Empire. So, the result is that as hon. gentlemen opposite have not taken part in this discussion, they have a tremendous lot to explain at this stage of the question. One question I have referred to which the Prime Minister has not explained, and that is as to where he stands in regard to the disposition of these ships. We at an earlier stage heard about the 'state of obsolescence.' The Minister of Marine and Fisheries told us that the ships we should build in Canada would be obsolescent before they were finished. I want some minister of the Crown to tell me this: Are these ships which the Government is going to have built in Britain to be obsolescent before they are brought back to Canada to form part of the Canadian navy? The Minister of Public Works has told us what would happen if we came into power. But suppose that the aspirations of the Minister of Public Works were attained, suppose that Canada were afflicted again with this Administration, either through the machinations of the Minister of Public Works or otherwise, and these ships are built, will these hon. gentlemen bring them back and make them part of the Canadian navy? That is what we want to know; that is what the country has a right to know. The Prime Minister dodged that, as I have said, by telling us what would happen if we were in power. But will not somebody on that side have the courage to tell us what will happen if they should be returned to power. Another thing on which information is desired is this: We have heard a good deal in the naval discussions about this memorandum; we are told that this Government is proposing this policy because of the memorandum from the Admiralty. Will anyone tell us why the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk), then Minister of Public Works resigned his seat, as member of this Government before this memorandum came from England? If this Government had no policy on this question which could be embodied in a measure before this memorandum came, why did the ex-Minister of Public Works leave the Government? What can it mean but that the Government must have decided upon this policy of contribution before the memorandum came? And if they decided upon this policy before the memorandum came, what was the information before them, when they so decided? The Government's conclusion was arrived at before they received the measure which they have submitted to this House from the Imperial Government in regard to this matter. According to the traditions of this Parliament and of every English speaking parliament, when a decision is arrived at upon any great public question, much more upon a question of this kind, involving as it does, the settlement of the relations with the Mother Country for a long period of time, along lines which will be most disastrous to the Empire and to Canada, Parliament should be given the information upon which the Government has acted. Upon such a question for the Government not to afford us ample information is an injustice not only to the country but to themselves. If any hon. gentleman on the treasury benches deigns to discuss this question—and they must discuss it in view of the change of policy that has been announced by the Prime Minister—will he tell us, on what material they formed their policy previous to the receipt of this memorandum? Why have their press throughout the country attempted to mislead the people with the idea that they entered upon this policy because this memorandum came? The evidence before the House is that these gentlemen decided upon that policy without having regard to the memorandum. We have also some statements by the First Lord of the Admiralty indicating that he did not know what the policy of the Premier was to be when he left England. He has made in his speeches, notably in his speech of March 26, statements which it is the bounden duty of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, if not of the Premier, to discuss and let us know where we stand in this Parliament in regard to the latest utterances of Mr. Churchill. The speech of my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries was based entirely upon the assumption that the aid that was to be given to the Empire would result in concentrating the forces in the North sea. Some definite and positive statement is due to this committee and to the House and the country by some representative minister of the Government as to what the view of the Canadian Government is in regard to the changed policy of the Mother Country in this regard. If our ships are not to be placed in the North sea, is this idea of having a flying squadron, with Gibraltar as its base, a good one? If so, why is it a good one? What are the reasons which should influence the Canadian people in causing them to make this enormous contribution of $35,000,000 to the Mother Country when the journals expressive of public opinion in Great Britain assert that the Mother Country do not need the money? What justification is there for proposing this gift of $35,000,000 to be used in forming part of a squadron to be centered at Gibraltar? If there was an emergency; if there was any justification whatever for the proposition that the fate of the Empire was to hang on some decisive conflict to take place in the North sea, we on this side of the House would be as ready to give the money as any hon. member in this House, but hon. gentlemen who have attempted an argument along those lines are in such a position as to justify the conclusion that all the views we have urged in answer to them must be absolutely correct. As a result of the discussion which has been carried on in this Parliament by hon. gentlemen on this side of the House, when we said to the ministers on the other side: 'You are wrong in respect of this idea that the fate of the Empire is to be decided by conditions in the North sea'; when we said that the expenditure of that large amount in the manner proposed was unnecessary, unwarranted and unjustified, the people of the country will be bound to say that the views of the Opposition upon this question were correct, and the views of the Government were absolutely wrong. The Admiralty has said so—not in the memorandum, not in any letter or any expression of opinion for which they were asked—but they have asserted their view upon it by a decisive declaration—by action. They have declared that no further additions to the fleet are required in the North sea, and that these Canadian vessels, when we get them, are to be put in this flying squadron. What is the interest of Canadians in this flying squadron? That is the point, I submit, upon which this committee is entitled to the fullest information. We on this side of the House think that Australia takes the right view when she says: 'We are going to police the Southern Pacific,' and we think that Canada's duty is to police the Northern Pacific. Although the danger from Oriental countries is not at present immediate, yet in time of peace you must prepare for war, and unless we now prepare for the situation which Australia anticipates and fears, and which will be just as acute even on the North Pacific as it will be for Australia on the South Pacific; unless we begin to do now what Australia is doing in the way of preparation, we will be unprepared when the time of trial comes. Is it not, therefore, of more importance to Canada as a whole that we should have the North Pacific guarded by the vessels which are to be built by Canada's money than that these vessels should form part of a flying squadron whose basis shall be at Gibraltar? The giving of these ships to form part of this squadron is a contribution which is entirely superfluous, and which does not meet any immediate need. It does seem to me that my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries should frankly tell us what information hon. gentlemen opposite have in regard to this matter. We cannot assume that on this great question the Government obtained this memorandum from the Admiralty and stopped there. We cannot assume that these communications which came from Mr. Winston Churchill, and these gratuitous letters which it is now considered should never have been written, constitute all the information which hon. gentlemen opposite have. I assume that the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, as the Minister of Naval Affairs in this country, has in his possession, from the Imperial Government and from the First Lord of the Admiralty, some official letter telling him why they have changed their plans in regard to the disposition of these letters, and why they are to form a flying squadron. If there is such information, the Minister of Marine and Fisheries should give it to the country; if there is not, he should make a statement to the committee and tell us whether or not the English Government have given this naval proposal sufficient thought to warrant their saying anything to Canada on the subject. As a matter of fact, if the First Lord of the Admiralty undertook to provide for the disposition of these three vessels without consulting the Minister of Naval Affairs for the Dominion of Canada, he is guilty of another act for which he should be condemned by the English press quite as emphatically as he is being condemned on account of his expressions in the letter of January 24. Is it possible that the Admiralty, through its friends in this country and through its correspondence with the Canadian Government, led the Canadian people to believe that these vessels were to be placed in the firing line on the North sea, would change their policy and plans and never deign to communicate with this Government on the subject? I cannot believe it, Sir; it seems to me to be incredible. I submit that before this discussion proceeds, we should have a statement from the Minister of Naval Affairs in regard to the matter and if there is any correspondence it should be brought down.

We have had a lot of beautifully indefinite talk with regard to Imperial federation. Hon. gentlemen in this House and out of it quoted from Tennyson his lines about 'one flag, one fleet, one throne,' but what will the people of the country think of the statement of the Prime Minister this afternoon that these ships were not intended to form part of the British fleet? 'We have a string attached to these ships,' he says; 'they are not to remain over there; we can bring them back some day.' He carefully guarded himself against any admission that we were going to contribute permanently. Will the Prime Minister of this country stand up and make a statement to this committee or to the people of this country that he is in favour of a permanent policy of contribution as a settlement of this matter of naval defence? If he is not prepared to do so, where are all these poetic statements to which hon. gentlemen opposite have referred. They have gone as a summer dream! Imperial federation is a beautiful conception—

Mr. SHARPE (North Ontario): Hear, hear.

Mr. MACDONALD: My hon. friend says hear, hear. I would like my hon. friend to go to the manufacturers of his constituency and say to them: I am in favour of bringing about immediately a condition under which there shall be formed an Imperial council to whom shall be given the power of declaring what the tariff of the Dominion of Canada shall be. My hon. friend, with other hon. gentlemen of this House, delight to talk of these beautiful nothings, but when they come down to practical politics, in which there is involved the proposition of Imperial federation and the idea of some central authority which will have power to direct the fiscal policy of these nations making up the Empire, they will not dare to stand to that position, either in this House or out of it. I venture to say that no hon. gentleman in the course of this debate will talk about Imperial federation except in that delightful, fantastic, high-flown way in which they can keep it up in the clouds, because they do not want to face the stern reality; it would mean that nine-tenths of the men behind the Government would not dare to go into their constituencies and declare that they were in favour of a proposition that meant that the control of the fiscal policy of this country would be transferred to an Imperial council.

We have learned a lot in this discussion since the 5th of December. Many ethereal things have been swept away and we are getting down to stern realities. Hon. gentlemen are beginning to appreciate the path lain by the right hon, the leader of the Opposition who long ago laid down the doctrine, to which thinkers and publicists all over the Empire have given adherence, that the British Empire cannot be preserved on the theory that a man living in Canada, Australia or South Africa, be politically subservient to the man who happens to be born in the part of the Empire known as the British Isles. It is long since the people of the Empire grasped the idea of the collection of nations, each one preserving its autonomous rights, each one developing its internal protection on land and its protection on the sea, each one going on, having regard to the varying positions, providing for its own prosperity, its own development of resources and its own march along the way of prosperity.

In that way alone can we have a collection of free peoples within this Empire which will always keep the tie strong, which will always keep the heart warm, whether in the northern clime or in the tropics, which will mean that every man, no matter in what dominion, will always ring true to the Empire and its need. That is the path which our great leader blazed, which today every man who studies empire problems, free from prejudice, realizes is the only one through which the Empire will stand. Hon. gentlemen may fool and quibble on this policy, their leader may declare that this not part of a contribution policy which he is propounding because he is not willing to declare that he is in favour of permanent contributions. There is only one way, as the Daily News of London says, by which the question can ultimately be settled and that is the way proposed by the right hon. the leader of the Opposition, and for that policy every Liberal in this House and in Canada stands with loyalty and enthusiasm.

Mr. ROGERS: As we do not appear to have any chance of making any progress, I beg to move that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again.

Motion agreed to, and progress reported.

On motion of Mr. Rogers, the House adjourned at 11 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

TUESDAY, April 8, 1913.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at three o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS.

FIRST READINGS.

Bill No. 165, for the relief of Otto Clarence Peterson.—Mr. Nesbitt.

Bill No. 166, for the relief of Archie Blaustein.—Mr. Fripp.

Bill No. 167, for the relief of Harold Moss Hampson.—Mr. Kay.

Bill No. 168, for the relief of Pierre Zénon St. Aubin.—Mr. Schaffner.

Bill No. 169, for the relief of Alexander Zépherin Gonier.—Mr. Guthrie.

VANCOUVER HARBOUR COMMISSIONERS.

On motion of Mr. Hazen it was ordered that the House go into Committee of the Whole to-morrow to consider the following proposed resolution:

Resolved, that it is expedient to pass an Act to regulate the harbour of Vancouver and incorporate the Vancouver Harbour Commissioners, and to provide for vesting in the corporation so constituted all land and interest in lands within the limits of the harbour, heretofore vested in His Majesty, to be held for the purposes of such Act; and that the revenue derived from such water lots in the harbour as have been leased or otherwise disposed of to any persons by the Governor in Council, and all rates, fees and dues other than pilotage dues, sick mariners' dues and steamboat inspection fees, which are now payable to the Government of Canada in connection with the harbour, be paid to and retained by the corporation and form part of its general revenue under and for the purposes of said Act.

QUEBEC HARBOUR COMMISSIONERS.

On motion of Mr. Hazen it was ordered that the House go into Committee of the Whole to-morrow to consider the following proposed resolution:

1. Resolved, that it is expedient to provide that the Governor in Council may, from time to time, advance and pay to the corporation of the Quebec Harbour Commissioners, hereinafter called the Corporation, such sums of money, not exceeding in the whole the sum of three million five hundred thousand dollars, as are required to enable the corporation to construct such terminal facilities as are necessary to properly equip the port of Quebec.

2. Resolved, that during the period of construction of the terminal facilities mentioned in these resolutions the interest payable on the debentures receivable by the Minister of Finance in exchange for such advances shall be deemed to be money required to construct and to be part of the cost of construction of the said terminal facilities, and such interest may be paid out of the said sum of three milion five hundred thousand dollars.

3. Resolved, that the corporation shall upon any advances being made, deposit with the Minister of Finance debentures of the corporation equal in par value to the advance so made, repayable within twenty-five years from the date of issue, and bearing interest payable half yearly at the rate of three and one-half per centum per annum.

4. Resolved, that the principal and interest of any sums advanced under any Act founded on these resolutions, shall be payable by the corporation out of all its property, assets, tolls, rates, dues, penalties and other sources of revenue and income whatsoever, and shall be a charge thereon next after, and have precedence in regard to payment next after all debentures or bonds issued by the corporation amounting to the sum of one million one hundred and fifty thousand dollars, under chapter 48 of the statutes of 1898, chapter 34 of the statutes of 1899, and chapter 36 of the statutes of 1907.

NAVAL FORCES OF THE EMPIRE.

Consideration in Committee of Bill No. 21, to authorize measures for increasing the effective Naval Forces of the Empire—Mr. Borden—resumed from April 7. (Mr. Deputy Speaker in the Chair.)

On section 2:

From and out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund of Canada there may be paid and applied a sum not exceeding thirty-five million dollars for the purpose of immediately increasing the effective naval force of the Empire;

And the amendment thereto proposed by Mr. Guthrie:

That, after the word 'dollars' in the third line of the section, the following words be inserted: 'to be expended in Canada in the construction and equipment of naval forces as hereinafter set out.'

Hon. W. T. WHITE (Minister of Finance): Mr. Chairman, it is with some hesitation and reluctance that I rise to express my views upon this issue. Although this Naval Bill has been under consideration since December last, hon. gentlemen opposite have so frequently put forward the view that liberty of discussion is being curtailed, that, on this side of the House, out of a delicate consideration for that view, some of us have refrained from giving utterance to our sentiments upon the question. Hon. gentlemen opposite will admit that we have been very patient not only by day but by night.

Mr. BELAND: It was a regular treat for you.

Mr. WHITE: We have been sitting up with hon. gentlemen opposite listening to their entrancing eloquence upon this question; yet they complain that we have limited their freedom of discussion.

I may say frankly that it was not my intention to speak, because I do not believe in speech merely for its own sake. I think that everything that can be said upon this question has been said long ago either as to the proposals of the Government or as to the amendments proposed by my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition, which in December last were supposed to represent the naval policy of hon. gentlemen opposite, Shakespeare, however, says 'It is a wise child that knows its own father.' My right hon. friend will be a wise father if he knows the child, the naval policy of the Liberal party as propounded by some of his followers.

I desire to approach this question as far as possible from a non-controversial standpoint, and certainly not from a narrow or acrimonious standpoint. I could have wished, although I did not hope, that my right hon. friend would concur in the proposals brought down by this Government, representing the views of the Admiralty upon the question of giving aid to increase the effective naval forces of the Empire. He has chosen, however, to take the opposite course. I believe that we have reached a momentous period in the affairs of the Empire, and that the action of Parliament upon this occasion will be one of those great events which are dignified by the name of landmarks of history.

Since the Christmas recess, certain statements have been made by the First Lord of the Admiralty, the Right Hon. Winston Churchill, which have been called in question by hon. gentlemen opposite. For that reason and by reason of the speeches of my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition and of my hon. friend the member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley) yesterday, I desire to occupy for a brief period the attention of the House in discussing those utterances, and also, if I may be permitted, in expressing my views upon the general issue which divides the parties upon this important question.

At the outset—because I think there has been a certain amount of misrepresentation as to the views of the Admiralty and the true position of affairs so far as this addition of Canadian ships to the British navy is concerned—I propose to read two statements made by the First Lord of the Admiralty, which I think have escaped observation, or at all events have not yet been referred to. They are of supreme importance as meeting the argument brought forward by hon. gentlemen opposite that there is no longer any need for any so-called contribution by Canada. In the speech delivered by the Right Hon. Winston Churchill on the last day of March, with respect to the proposal of the Government to give three dreadnoughts for the purpose of immediately increasing the effective naval forces of the Empire, he said:

> The three ships were absolutely required for the whole world defences of the British Empire apart from England. They would play a real part in Imperial defence; and, if they were not forthcoming, steps would have to be taken to fill the gap and the strain of the burden would have to be placed upon others.

What becomes of the argument that Canada's contribution is no longer necessary to increase the effective naval forces of the Empire? The British programme has been carried out. The proposals of Canada are known to the public of Great Britain and to the Admiralty. On the authority of the Right Hon. Winston Churchill, we are told that these three dreadnoughts are absolutely required, and that, if they are not forthcoming in accordance with the proposals of the Government, steps will have to be taken to fill the gap and the burden will have to be placed upon others. Does Canada desire to be placed in that position? Does this Parliament desire to place Canada in the position of refusing these three dreadnoughts after all that has transpired in connection with this proposal? He went further, and I think this is even more important, than his reference to the gift of the three ships, or the placing of these ships at the disposal of the Admiralty. As I pointed out, these ships are to remain vested in the Dominion of Canada, subject to recall by Canada at such times as she may require them, and in the meantime, are placed at the disposal of His Majesty for the common defence of the Empire, including, of course, the defence of Canada, Mr. Churchill referred not only to the gift of the ships, but to what is more important than these ships:

> The effect, however, would exceed that of three ships. We could build three ships of necessary, but the fact that Canada, a new nation, has come forward to justify the enduring life of the British Empire, would produce an impression throughout the world more valuable than many dreadnoughts.

My hon. friend from St. John, referred with some derision to the gift of the Malay States. I thought it was rather unworthy of my hon. friend—I do not mean that in any offensive sense. If the Malay States give a dreadnought, one of the best fighting ships in the world, to take its place in the British battle line, manned by British seamen and commanded by British officers, that ship will count equally with any other ship in the fighting line whether it be contributed by the United Kingdom, by Canada or by any of the other colonies. I am sorry that my hon. friend from St. John is not in his place, but if he were here I would say to him, that if the Malay States give a dreadnought for the common protection of the British Empire, they prove themselves, in so far as what they do is a proof, more patriotic than did my hon. friend when he was a member of the Government, for he contributed nothing and did nothing towards the common defence of the Empire. I think it comes with ill grace from my hon. friend from St. John or any other hon. member to speak in derision of the gift made by the Malay States at this time of pressing need of the Empire. The hon. gentlemen referred to the slender resources of the Malay States. So much the more credit to the malay States, if, with slender resources, they contribute a dreadnought to the common defence of the Empire. I repeat that it comes with ill grace from any hon. member of this House, or any other British subject, to cast derision upon the gift of the Malay States, contributed from the most patriotic motives to assist the Empire in the time of its pressing need. It was further stated by the hon. member for St. John, that instead of the ships of Canada being in the North sea as at first intended, they are to constitute part of the fleet at Gibraltar. The hon. gentleman knows little of naval strategy if he does not know that Gibraltar is the pivotal point where these ships can be used either in the Mediterranean or in the North sea. Gibraltar is almost the point of honour of the whole world so far as naval strategy is concerned. Yet the hon. gentleman found reason to criticise the Admiralty, and by inference this Government, in the fact that these ships, instead of being placed in the North sea were to form part of a squadron with its station at Gibraltar. My right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition stated, from his standpoint, the issue between the two parties. I do not think he stated it correctly. I propose to state what I understood him to say and then try to define the issue which really exists between the parties on this great question. I understood the right hon. gentleman to say that the policy of this Government was one of periodical contributions or regular contributions to the naval strength of the Empire.

Mr. MACDONELL: That is what they all say.

Mr. WHITE: Yes, but that has been repudiated on many occasions by the Prime Minister himself. Why hon. gentlemen, in view of what has been said by the Prime Minister and by other members of the Government and their supporters on this side of the House, should persist in saying that this is a permanent policy and not a temporary policy passes my comprehension. It seems to me that it is most unfair to say it. The word of a member of this House, the word of the Prime Minister of this Government is entitled to credence. The Prime Minister has stated, not only once but on many occasions, that this is a temporary policy, that it has nothing to do with a question of a permanent policy; it is a policy undertaken in pursuance of the advice of the British Admiralty to meet the pressing need of the time. And what has the right hon. gentleman said as to the policy of the Opposition? In December last he laid it down that the policy of the Opposition was to create the two fleet units, one on the Atlantic and one on the Pacific, to be built, and operated by Canadians. Now I propose to show that the policy has undergone profound modification at the hands of his followers; and if you ask any member of this House to-day what is the Liberal policy with regard to the navy, he cannot tell you. Hon. gentlemen opposite can tell us what their policy is individually, but no man can tell us what their policy is as a party. What does that mean? In my judgment—and I mean no offence by it—it means that theirs is a policy in the first instance of political expediency.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. WHITE: I repeat, it is a policy of political expediency.

Mr. BUREAU: Oh, oh.

Mr. WHITE: Let me ask my hon. friend (Mr. Bureau), in passing, if he ever knew of anything so sudden in his life as the change from the Liberal policy of 1909, 1910 and 1911 to the policy of constructing two fleet units, one on the Atlantic and one on the Pacific. I know of nothing to compare with their policy in sacred or profane history, except possibly it be the image Belshazzar saw in his dream. I do not call my hon. friend Belshazzar—that would not be parliamentary; he is a much better man. But the image in Belshazzar's dream—does the hon. gentleman recall it? Its brightness, he will remember, was excellent, and the form thereof was terrible. And it was made of various metals—there were gold, silver, a great deal of brass—but its feet were of clay. I am no Daniel come to judgment, but I am trying to interpret the hon. gentleman's policy, and the only thing that I can compare it with is the image in Belshazzar's dream, with a great deal of brass in it and feet of clay.

My right hon. friend is a great historian, and he was inclined yesterday to go into historical matters. He was rehearsing the facts that led up to this naval policy, and was, of course, putting upon them his own construction. I propose also to be historical, and to test what my hon. friend claims to be his naval policy by referring to what he did—because I believe in actions rather than words. I propose to take the words of my right hon. friend, and to contrast his statement that the principle of the establishing of two fleet units, one on the Atlantic and one on the Pacific, is the Liberal policy of to-day, with what he actually did, in order to see if this policy is the real policy of the Liberal party, or whether it is but a make-believe for purposes of political expediency. The starting point was the unanimous resolution of 1909, of which we have heard so much, and the second paragraph of which embodied the following words:

> The House is of opinion that under the present constitutional relations between the Mother Country and the self-governing dominions the payment of regular and periodical contributions to the Imperial treasury for naval and military purposes would not, so far as Canada is concerned, be the most satisfactory solution of the question of defence.

Who ever said it would be the most satisfactory solution of that question? Is there, in the Bill brought down by my right hon. friend to provide for increasing the effective naval forces of the British Empire, a single word or syllable or letter indicating that we are about to make the payment of regular or periodical contributions to the Imperial treasury? There is not one word whatsoever.

Mr. NEELY: We have arguments to back up our claims.

Mr. WHITE: I have listened to my hon. friend at morn, at dewy eve, and through the still watches of the night, and I am sure all hon. gentlemen will agree that he might have taken advantage of a previous opportunity of demonstrating this without interrupting at the present time.

Some hon. MEMBERS: He did.

Mr. WHITE: I defy any hon. gentleman who can read and understand the English language to say there is one word in the Bill now before the House in contravention with the principle enunciated and laid down in the resolution of 1909. Further, I desire to say I am entirely against a policy of periodical or stated contributions—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. WHITE: —and that has been the policy of the right hon. Prime Minister from the beginning.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. WHITE: If in 1909 my right hon. friend had contributed two dreadnoughts, following the example of New Zealand at that time in contributing one battleship, he would have saved himself a great deal of the trouble which he has since experienced. The moral effect of two dreadnoughts, as would the moral effect of three dreadnoughts, would have gone a long way to put an end to the European armaments of which we have heard so much. My right hon. friend could then have taken his time to work out his permanent policy. What was the condition in 1909? Referring to the German expansion, Sir Edward Grey, a man who justly enjoys the confidence of both political parties in England, and who is recognized as being one of the best foreign secretaries Great Britain ever had, said in March, 1909:

> That imposes upon us the necessity of which we are now at the beginning—except in so far as we happen to have dreadnoughts already—or of rebuilding the whole of our fleet.

Referring to the increased armaments on the continent, he said:

> We are under the necessity of rebuilding the whole of our fleet. That is the situation. What we do not know is the time within which we shall have to do it. That is the element of uncertainty.

A great deal of attention at that time, in Great Britain and throughout the world, was focused on the increase of armaments in Europe. A resolution was brought forward in this House—and by the way I notice that that resolution in the House of Commons was moved by the then hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster). As I have said, a great deal of attention was at that time being directed to the question of European naval armaments, and there is no doubt that public opinion throughout the Empire was very considerably excited. What happened? New Zealand sprang forward and said: we will give you a dreadnought. As I listened to the statements of hon. gentlemen opposite with regard to the violation of the principle of autonomy and the right of self-government; when I heard of the humiliation involved in Canada's making a contribution for the purpose of increasing the effective naval forces of the Empire; when I recall how the action taken by New Zealand at that time was applauded throughout the whole Empire and favourably noted throughout the world, I often wonder if hon. gentlemen opposite are really sincere when they talk about the violation of the principles of autonomy and local self-government. New Zealand came forward and contributed a dreadnought; New South Wales said: We will give you a dreadnought, and if you want another we will give you that also. New Zealand has given her dreadnought, and yet no violation of autonomy is involved in that course; I have never heard that New Zealanders were humiliated because at the time of the Empire's need, when it was apparent that naval armaments in Europe were increasing, she came forward and said: we will give a dreadnought. It is one of the golden deeds in the history of the Empire, so far as New Zealand is concerned. Let me call the attention of hon. gentlemen to this clause of the resolution to which I have referred:

> The House will cordially approve of any necessary expenditure designed to promote the speedy organization of a Canadian naval service.

I desire to specially call attention to that word 'speedy' because it seems to have struck the fancy of the hon. member for Pictou. Hon. gentlemen opposite from the beginning have laid down the principle that they have been carrying out the terms of this resolution; in other words, they consider that their naval action since 1909 has been speedy. I propose to develop this idea just a little to see how speedy they were, and whether the organization, when it was accomplished, could be considered a speedy organization, or not. Now, my right hon. friend went ahead with his naval policy. He sent two members of his Cabinet to the Imperial Conference of 1909. I want to call the attention of my right hon. friend to this: I have stated that the increase of foreign naval armaments were giving a good deal of concern at that time, and my right hon. friend was aware of that. He had before him the resolution in which it was recommended that there should be a speedy organization of a Canadian naval service, and as I have stated, he sent two ministers to England. What was the recommendation of the Admiralty at that time? The Admiralty's recommendation in substance, was that there must be a fleet unit, that is to say, there must be a dreadnought and three cruisers, I think of the Bristol type, and an attendant flotilla. What did the members of my right hon. friend's Cabinet do when they went to England? It is all set out in this report. I am not going to read it, but I am going to tell what happened. The British Admiralty said to them: We cannot give you a plan unless you tell us how much you are prepared to spend. They said, oh, say $2,000,000 or $3,000,000 annually; let us have what you can give us for that. The Admiralty said we cannot give you a fleet unit; true, we recommend a fleet unit. My right hon. friend's ministers said, do you think you can give us something that we can distribute partly on the Atlantic and partly on the Pacific—of course they are nearly 3,700 miles apart—so that they could mobolize quickly? Now, in regard to the naval defence of the Empire, that was practically the position taken by the two members of my right hon. friend's Cabinet when they were in Great Britain at the time of the Imperial Conference in 1909. What did the Admiralty say? They said, if you are prepared to spend a couple of million dollars, or probably more a year, and if you want this fleet distributed on the Atlantic and Pacific coasts, the best we can do for you is to recommend that you take four cruisers, and put two on the Atlantic coast and two on the Pacific. The Admiralty did not say what they thought of it as a matter of naval strategy. They said, you want to spend so much money, and you can put a couple of cruisers on the Atlantic and a couple on the Pacific. That was the intention of my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) though not carried out, mark you; but it was his intention from what I have heard. Now, what else happened? They acquired the Niobe and the Rainbow. They were in power from the time the resolution was passed in March 1909, until September or October, 1911, a period of two years and six months, and I have called attention to the fact that the resolution called for the speedy organization of a Canadian naval service. What was the situation at the time when we took power? If war had broken out between Great Britain and any other first-class power in 1911, notwithstanding the resolution calling for the speedy organization of a Canadian navy, the solemn fact was that Canada would have had the little Rainbow with a captain and an English crew on the Pacific coast, and the Niobe in dry-dock in Halifax with $250,000 worth of damage to her hull.

It gives me no pleasure to refer to this matter. I have heard hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House taunt hon. members on this side. I think my hon. friend from Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) spoke sarcastically of the decent Canadianism of hon. members on this side of the House in proposing a policy that would be of real help to the Empire at this present juncture. I have heard my hon. friend from West Lambton (Mr. Pardee), a good Canadian, talk about a policy that would permit of Canadians holding up their heads. What have we to say of a policy which in two years and six months produced the situation I have described? Was it a better situation than the situation that we propose, so far as increasing the effective naval forces of the Empire and affording defence to Canada in common with other parts of the Empire, is concerned? Was theirs a policy in connection with which Canadians could hold up their heads in its results or was it not? There is a national pride, and there is a pride in the Empire, just as there is an individual pride. I desire to say to my right hon. friend that I realize the difficulties he had to contend with, and I am willing to give him credit for having made a start. I have no desire to deprive him of that credit. To a certain extent, I think he hesitated to take to the water, but when he was pushed in, he started to swim. He undoubtedly struck out. True, he did not make a very successful swim, as I have indicated, but I repeat, I do not want to deprive him of the credit of having made a start. I do say, that his policy did not commend itself to the imagination of the Canadian people, because in its results, it was, as I have indicated. Having regard to the fact that Australia had contributed £200,000 per year—there was no question there of violation of autonomy; no question violating the rights of self-government; no question of humiliation because Australia had done that—having regard also to the fact that Natal had contributed, that Cape Colony had contributed, and that even Newfoundland had contributed, while Canada had practically done nothing, it did cast a certain amount of humiliation upon the Canadian people, and therefore I say, the policy of the Liberal party did not commend itself to the imagination of the Canadian people. We might just as well face that fact.

Mr. TURRIFF: Why not face it?

Mr. WHITE: We are told that this policy is a humiliating policy; we have heard them say that over and over again. I desire to repeat that the policy of my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) in its results and effects, was not a policy of which the Canadian people ever felt proud.

Mr. Chairman, this debate had wandered very far afield indeed. We have heard a great deal about autonomy, and about the rights of self-government. We have heard a great deal about Nationalism, and about a permanent policy. I propose to return to the Bill itself, and to consider what it proposes to do, and whether the action proposed is justifiable in all the circumstances of the case, having regard to the memorandum of the Admiralty which was laid on the table by my right hon. friend the Prime Minister, and to the facts disclosed by him and by others in connection with this matter. What does the Bill propose? It proposes to devote $35,000,000 from the Consolidated Fund of Canada for the purpose of building three dreadnoughts, or three battle cruisers to be placed at the disposal of His Majesty for the common defence of the Empire. The question at once arises as to whether such aid is needed at the present time. That is question No. 1; and question No. 2 is, whether it is the most effective way of giving aid to the Empire; and, thirdly, whether Canada owes it as a duty to the Empire and to herself in the premises. We have to consider the question of the Empire and question of Canadian defence. What is the present position of the Empire, and what is Canada's duty with regard to it? I shall not repeat at too great length what has been said in this respect, but we know that while the British Empire, is the greatest Empire that the world has ever seen, either in extent of territory or in wealth or in influence, it differs from all other empires in this that its different parts are scattered over the continents and islands of the world. That being so, of course sea power is absolutely indispensable to the British Empire, not only sea power but control of the sea; invincibility is a quality that must attach to the British navy. The high seas are to Great Britain what the highways and railways are to the continental nations of Europe. Great Britain must always maintain control of the sea. There is no half way about it; it is life or death to Great Britain. Great Britain must either control the sea or the Empire must dissolve. The navies of other nations may be destroyed and these nations may still live, but if you destroy the British navy, the British Empire perishes and the various parts of the Empire are dissolved. We have heard a good deal of talk which would seem to indicate that the British Empire is an outside thing, a foreign thing, an exotic thing. Why, the British Empire is our Empire and I do not think that we should be backward at a time of need about coming forward with our offering. The British Empire is our Empire and, in contributing to the defence of the Empire, Canada is contributing not only to the defence of the Empire but to the defence of Canada and every other part of the Empire.

Practically, the alpha and omega of British naval strategy is the supremacy of the fleet, and that applies also when we consider the question of establishing a permanent navy in connection with any of the dominions. If Australia is considering the establishment of a navy of her own, she must depend upon the British fleet to keep control of the sea if her own fleet is to be effective at all, so that it comes down, not only to Canada but to every other part of the Empire being vitally interested in the supremacy of the British fleet.

What is the position of Great Britain to-day as to naval preponderance? My right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition has said that England is always England, and England, in a sense, is always England, but England will only be England if the other parts of this great Empire are willing to do their share,—it may be in such a way as they may decide. England is only England to-day because of what her valiant sons have done in the past. England will not continue to be England unless every part of the Empire will do its part. I will agree that the different dominions of the Empire may do their part in such ways as they see fit, but England will not remain England unless they do their part as manly Englishmen have always done. My right hon. friend has said that there has been no change in the position since 1909. But we find that the First Lord of the Admiralty says that there has been a very profound change in the situation since 1909. My right hon. friend shakes his head. The First Lord of the Admiralty calls attention in the memorandum to the effect of the fifth German naval law to which he referred in his speeches in 1912. He says:

> The main feature of that law is not the increase in the new construction of capital ships, though that is important, but rather the increase in the striking force of ships of all classes which will be immediately available at all seasons of the year.

The right hon. gentleman says: Why depart from the policy laid down in the resolution of 1909? I say that one reason why we adopt this policy at the present time is that the situation has profoundly changed since 1909. My right hon. friend the leader of the Government went to consult the British Admiralty as to the position, and, let me ask this House, whom should he go to consult if not the British Admiralty in regard to the position? Where else would you go to obtain information as to the condition of British Imperial naval defence if not to the Admiralty? All kinds of suspicion have been cast by hon. gentlemen opposite upon the trip of my right hon. friend to Great Britain in connection with this mission. It was said that my right hon. friend and his colleagues had made up the mind of the British Admiralty. My hon. friend from Halifax (Mr. Maclean) even said that they had employed duress as against the Admiralty and that means, as pointed out by my hon. friend from Calgary (Mr. Bennett), that they had actually threatened them with imprisonment. What does the First Lord of the Admiralty say in regard to that? When the Morell motion came up in the British House of Commons he said: I had no idea whatever as to the scheme of the Canadian Government or what they proposed, and when the leader of the Government left England he had no idea at all what proposals he would bring down to this Parliament. Then, what becomes of the discussion as to the methods employed by the members of this Government who went to England? Where else would they go but to the Admiralty? There was no other place to go but to headquarters and obtain the information as to the condition of the Empire's defences and act accordingly.

My right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) has stated that England is always England. Is England the England to-day that she was a generation ago, or when my right hon. friend was a boy, in regard to relative naval strength? During the whole of last century Great Britain maintained a two-power standard and ten per cent over and she was supreme at sea. But, on account of the vast increase in the armaments of the United States, Germany, Japan, Austria and Italy, Great Britain has had to diminish that naval supremacy to a sixty per cent standard over her next strongest competitor. What is the result? The memorandum says that the ships of Great Britain have had to be partially withdrawn from the great stations of the world and as a consequence these stations have been weakened. The naval force has been weakened on the China station, at the Cape, at Gibraltar and in the Mediterranean and it has been concentrated very largely in the North sea. That is the position, and the Admiralty taking cognizance of that, and being asked by my right hon. friend the leader of the Government as to what was the best policy, after giving the matter its very best consideration, says:

> The Admiralty set the greatest store by the important material, and still more important moral assistance which it is within the power of Canada to give to maintaining British naval supremacy on the high seas, but they think it necessary to disclaim any intention, however indirect, of putting pressure upon Canadian public opinion, or of seeking to influence the Dominion Parliament in a decision which clearly belongs solely to Canada.

Yet, we had the hon. member from South Renfrew (Mr. Graham) talking about autonomy and going back seventy years to the Family Compact and Government by Downing Street. They specifically disclaim any intention of putting pressure on Canada and they say that they are quite prepared, if necessary, to maintain the whole burden themselves as they have done for many years in the past. Then what is their recommendation? Having given the matter the most profound consideration, they say:

> The Prime Minister of the Dominion having inquired in what form any immediate aid that Canada might give would be most effective, we have no hesitation in answering after a prolonged consideration of all the circumstances that it is desirable that such aid should include the provision of a certain number of the largest and strongest ships of war which science can build or money supply.

I have shown the condition of British naval defence and I am not going over again the details of the increase in the armaments of the nations of Europe. I have shown the policy of my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition and I have shown the policy —the temporary policy—of my right hon. friend the leader of the Government, and it is a policy which is based on the memorandum and advice of the British Admiralty. I maintain that the policy, which we confidently submit to this House and the country, is a sound policy at this particular time. It provides for the invincibility of the British fleet, and it will help to the extent of these three battleships to make the British fleet invincible on the sea. It is a policy which gives time to the country to consider what policy it may best adopt in connection with the defence of its ports and the development of its local navies; it means real tangible help; it is not a makeshift policy; it is a real policy and it has appealed to the people of this country and to the people of this Empire.

Some say let us have no more war; and so say I; but we are confronted with a condition, and not with a theory. In the last fifteen years there have been some of the greatest wars in the world's history, and even at this very moment a great war is proceeding. In 1898 there was the Spanish-American war, and in 1899, the Boer war, to which my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition when Prime Minister sent Canadian soldiers. Let me ask him if there was any violation of Canada's autonomy in sending these brave boys abroad to fight the battle of the Empire and of Canada as a part of the Empire? Surely no one will say to-day that our autonomy was in any way affected by that. And what violation of our autonomy is there in our contributing three battleships to take their place in the battle line for the common defence of the Empire. As I have said, we have had the Boer war, the Russo-Japanese war, the war between Greece and Turkey, and at this very moment rages the Balkan war which all the nations of Europe have sought unsuccessfully to avert. We may deplore war, but war we will have with all its attendant horrors and all its heroism and patriotism as well. To-day as always, the saying is true: the best way to ensure peace is to prepare for war. I was surprised to hear my hon. friend from Red Deer (Mr. Clark) go back on the naval policy of his leader. His leader came out for two fleet units, one on the Atlantic and one on the Pacific, and the hon. member for Red Deer, for whose intellectuality I have the greatest respect, came out in favour of no naval policy at all. He told us that his four sons, all six-footers, would be available for the defence of the Empire, but he was unwilling to subscribe to the policy of his leader for a fleet unit on the Atlantic and on the Pacific. He told us that the motto: if you wish peace prepare for war was heathenish, and his version of it was: if you wish peace prepare for peace; do away with all your armament; no fleet unit on the Atlantic and no fleet unit on the Pacific for him. Then the member for Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff) is a most lukewarm supporter of the fleet unit policy of his leader; he seemed to have a sort of political hydrophobia, he was afraid of water; one would judge from his remarks that if there was anything like an amphibious navy that would be the navy for him. The hon. member for Moosejaw (Mr. Knowles) and other hon. gentlemen opposite indicated that they were opposed to the fleet unit policy either on the Atlantic or on the Pacific and they also disagreed from their leader. The hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Maclean) one of the leading men in the Liberal ranks, had another policy; he said there was no hurry about it; we could take our time; we did not have to establish a fleet unit at once; we could think it over for a number of years and then we could decide what to do. After all, is it not plain that the naval policy of hon. gentlemen opposite is a make-shift policy, a policy of expediency. Well, the country will judge as between the policy of gentlemen on the other side and the straightforward, manly, empire policy of the Conservative party.

Mr. WHITE (Leeds).

Mr. TURRIFF: Give them a chance to judge.

Mr. WHITE: The country has judged.

Mr. LALOR: The country judged all right.

Mr. TURRIFF: Did they elect Mr. Pelletier on that?

Mr. LALOR: They elected him all right.

Mr. WHITE: The strongest objection against our policy urged by the Opposition is that it invades the autonomy of Canada, and let us see as to that. Autonomy is the right of self-government, and what violation of the right of Canada's self-government is there in this legislation. Who votes this money? Parliament, the representatives of the Canadian people in the Canadian Parliament vote this money. Is there any compulsion, any coercion from outside? There is none. And yet the hon. member from Westmorland (Mr. Emmerson) talks about Boston tea parties and reads the Declaration of American Independence in this House.

Mr. LALOR: Shame !

Mr. WHITE: My right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition does not know what was going on in this House during the night sessions when he was absent; it is a serious thing for the right hon. gentleman to leave his place in this House, and he did a very indiscreet thing when he remained away. During these night sessions we had the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley) playing the role of Phaethon and trying to drive the chariot of the Sun, in the absence of the right hon. leader of the Opposition who is the real charioteer. And what happened to this pseudo Phaethon? The Phaethon of Mythology, by unskilful driving, drove his father's chariot too close to the earth, scorched the earth and left pestilence and plague in his train? In the absence of the real political Helios the hon. member (Mr. Pugsley) played the Phaethon of the party, and as the mythological Phaethon nearly destroyed the earth so this modern Phaethon nearly wrecked the Liberal party.

Mr. CARVELL: He came nearly wrecking the Government.

Mr. WHITE: It is a curious fact that we never see ourselves as others see us, and the hon. member of St. John (Mr. Pugsley) instead of looking upon himself as a Phaethon, no doubt considered himself as Horatius at the bridge. I wonder what Helios thinks of him? We have been very solicitous about my hon. friend from St. John (Mr. Pugsley) since a certain event took place in this House but the hon. gentleman seems to be coming back to his old self again and to have resumed his normal complacency. So much for all the delirious talk that was indulged in here, and what else but delirium would have driven the hon. member for Westmorland to read the Declaration of American Independence in this House? Was there any reason for this action in connection with this Bill; this Bill which proposes to take $35,000,000 voted by the representatives of the people of Canada, without coercion, without compulsion and without suggestion, and devote it to increasing the effective naval forces of the Empire?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Do you say without compulsion?

Mr. WHITE: Without compulsion, without coercion, and without even suggestion. Why, hon. gentlemen opposite are not treating seriously the intelligence of the Canadian people when they indulge in such talk.

Mr. TURRIFF: Consult them.

Mr. WHITE: They have been consulted.

Mr. TURRIFF: Never.

Mr. WHITE: The Canadian people have been consulted.

Mr. BELAND: Look at the Citizen.

Mr. WHITE: So much for autonomy, and let us come to another objection taken by gentlemen opposite. They say: Let us build the dreadnoughts but let us build them at once in Canada. Again I have to refer to my hon. friend from Red Deer. I like my hon. friend (Mr. Clark) but I must say he has exemplified to us the astonishing effect of party feeling and party prejudice upon a purely intellectual character. The intellectual man sees things as they are, without prejudice, or feeling, or bias, and my hon. friend from Red Deer is a free-trader; he is the apostle of Adam Smith he is a graduate of the Manchester School. I thought that free trade had entered to such an extent into his being and into the very fibres of his intellect that nothing but the dissolution of his being or the dethronement of his intellect would separate him from his free trade views. Why my hon. friend has enunciated time and again the principles of free trade, the great irresistible principle of buying in the cheapest market and selling in the dearest. Where do we find him on this occasion? I could almost see, when he was speaking, the shade of Adam Smith standing over him with dejected mien and folded arms weeping over his fallen son. Here is the apostle of free trade talking about building dreadnoughts expeditiously here, bringing all the materials here, bringing all the workmen here—the man who all his life has held the view that you should buy in the cheapest market and sell in the dearest. It only goes to show what an influence party feeling has upon an otherwise intellectual man. It shows that the locks of Samson have been literally shorn by the party Delilah. My hon. friend is now one of the most reactionary men possible in matters of trade policy. When he again enunciates the principle of free trade, all that we shall have to call his attention to are these serried hordes of workmen going into the Glasgow shipyards and his desire to have them shipped over here as soon as possible. His position is over here. He is a protectionist of protectionists.

Mr. TURRIFF: Your position is over here so far as the navy is concerned.

Mr. WHITE: We come now to the question of building the dreadnoughts in Canada. Nobody has a higher opinion of Canadians in any walk of life than I have. It is no disparagement of Canada to say that, having no shipyards here and Great Britain having had shipyards for hundreds of years, we cannot immediately go to work and, inside of two or two and a half years, build three great dreadnoughts, hull, armour plate and all the completed machinery, guns and gun mountings. What else did Winston Churchill say? Nothing else at all. In his letter he said that dreadnoughts cannot be expeditiously built in Canada. Why did my hon. friends opposite not build the Rainbow in Canada? Why did they not build the Niobe in Canada? Why did they not build in Canada all the ships they have bought from Germany and England in the past ten years? This is a very sudden conversion to Canadian ship-building. They have instanced a steel plant at Sydney. I ask hon. gentlemen opposite if they are serious in that? How did that steel plant begin? It began with manufacturing pig iron, then it manufactured steel billets, then steel rails and wire rods. It was years before that plant was in a position to turn out steel rails and wire rods. Does anybody suppose that, if you establish a ship-building plant in Canada, you will immediately be in a position to turn out dreadnoughts? Who is going to supply the capital to start the yards, $50,000,000 or $75,000,000? Who at this time is going to finance a company to build dreadnoughts, to construct gun mountings, guns nickel steel armour and so on. Does anybody suppose for a moment that we can do that? Of course we cannot. Suppose you go to a company to-day and ask them for a plant to construct dreadnoughts, they will say: how many dreadnoughts are you going to construct? Well, we are going to construct three. What about the future? Do you want ten, fifteen or twenty dreadnoughts? Is that in the minds of hon. gentlemen opposite? If you do not propose to do continuous dreadnought building, who in the world will establish a plant in Canada for building three dreadnoughts? The policy of my right hon. friend (Mr. Borden) is the true policy. In co-operation with the British Government, he proposes to build dry docks to make a start, and to build light cruisers and the smaller vessels first, with the idea of ultimately building up a great ship-building industry in this country. That is the way that every great industry is built up.

Mr. MACDONALD: Are those small cruisers which the Government is to build to form part of a Canadian navy?

Mr. WHITE: So far as I understand what my right hon. friend said, the British Admiralty would give orders for the building of small vessels in Canadian shipyards. Whether those yards will ultimately build for a Canadian navy, I am unable to say. I myself have never disparaged in the least degree a permanent policy if the people of this country desire it. Local navies may have their place; but a local navy is useless as a shield and buckler against an attack from a European or Asiatic power unless you have the British control of the sea.

Mr MACDONALD: Are you in favour of contribution?

Mr. WHITE: I cannot understand why hon. gentlemen opposite quibble about the matter at all. The first thing to do is to make supreme that British fleet which controls the sea. Then you can take your time and lay out your policy.

Mr. MACDONALD: When are you going to begin?

Mr. WHITE: What use will be the Australian naval organization against any great navy except for the fact that Great Britain controls the sea? If there is any danger, and we say there is danger to the British fleet, to its supremacy, then first, before we do anything else at all, we must help it to make that fleet invincible.

Mr. CARVELL: Does the minister say that?

Mr. WHITE: Certainly.

Mr. CARVELL: Does the hon. minister say that there is danger to the supremacy of the British fleet?

Mr. WHITE: I have shown that the policy of Great Britain during the last century was two to one and ten per cent over. I have pointed out that, on account of the increase in armaments, the rise of other great nations, and especially the construction of dreadnoughts which are so superior to the other vessels of the British fleet, Great Britain is maintaining a bare sixty per cent superiority, and I say that is not enough.

Mr. PARDEE: Come back to Churchill.

Mr. WHITE: It is very curious, but, until the Prime Minister read the letter, Winston Churchill was the favourite author of the Liberal party. They would say that the Hon. Mr. Asquith said this, and then they would read that the Hon. Mr. Winston Churchill said that. They asked us who wrote this letter? Who signed it? It must have been some shipbuilding firm. They did not seem to think we could get a statement in regard to the building of ships unless there was a campaign fund in connection with it. They said, who signed the letter? Why, it must have been a shipbuilding firm. Surely it cannot be authentic. When finally, the communication being absolutely confidential, the long suffering, long enduring, patient Prime Minister got permission to make the letter public—well, you know the effect upon the hon. gentlemen opposite.

Mr. TURRIFF: Did the hon. the Prime Minister have the authority when my right hon. friend asked him to place the letter on the table?

Mr. WHITE: No, he had not.

Mr. TURRIFF: He said afterwards that he had.

Mr. WHITE: No, he said that the message had not been translated. I can quite understand why my hon. friend feels so sensitive about it.

Mr. TURRIFF: I shall deal with that later.

Mr. WHITE: Here he was in full flow of eloquence, a full house—I must say that he was very courteous in taking his seat in order that the Prime Minister might read the letter. By reason of that courtesy he did not lose anything in the estimation of this House. He rose and did the best he could afterwards; I will say that for him. It was about the best that could have been done by any hon. gentleman opposite, but, of course, it could not be logical and sound. Here they had been crying, almost weeping, they had certainly been declaiming—that the Prime Minister was actually withholding a document. They wanted to know, was it an authentic document? Was it signed by anybody in authority? Was the British Government connected with it, or was it sent in by a ship-building firm? At last they got it; and the effect reminded me of nothing so much as the old Persian tale of the man who, beating a thicket for deer, stirred up a tiger.

Mr. hon. friend from South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) makes a strong speech upon occasions. His style has a good deal of virility; he is a man himself of strong mentality. If he only had a touch of imagination—he sometimes refers to a hesitation on my part when speaking in cathedra, not ex cathedra; but he may develop imagination in time, especially through the discussion of proposals of this kind which in themselves are a liberal education. The hon. gentleman moves an amendment to provide that the money must be spent in Canada. I am in favour of spending every dollar that can be spent in Canada advantageously, or even possibly, to get results. But I have shown that you cannot build dreadnoughts expeditiously in Canada, and the hon. gentleman knows it. It would come with bad grace from this House, if we could get dreadnoughts built expeditiously in Great Britain, that we should be overscrupulous about giving an order for these ships in Great Britain. From the financial standpoint alone, the matter is worthy of consideration. I wonder if the hon. gentleman has overlooked the fact that the great prosperity of this country is dependent on two things mainly in recent years: first, the flow of immigration from Great Britain, and, second, the flow of capital from Great Britain. We have received not less than $2,500,000,000 from Great Britain altogether, and fully $1,000,000,000 in the last five years.

Mr. CARVELL: Are we not paying for it?

Mr. WHITE: Another gentleman without imagination. If I could only see his face light up once in a while, he does not know how happy it would make me. Paying for it? Why, the hon. gentleman can learn something even from me. Let me tell him, not a little good-will goes with the investment of money—'kissing goes by favour.' Canadian investments on the part of British investors have been not by reason only of the fact that this country has been growing, but there has been in them a large element of British goodwill. If my hon. friend wants to chill that good-will, one of the best things he can do is to over-emphasize the fact that this country is unwilling to give an order for three dreadnoughts to Britain; and this is a pretty serious phase of this discussion at the present time. I would not like the people of Great Britain to get the idea that, after a memorandum from the Admiralty expressing the needs of the British people at this time, showing that forces of the Empire had been weakened in the manner I have indicated, this Canada of ours was going to be a shirker or a funker, or a sponger. I think that even from the lowest standpoint, the practical material standpoint, we must consider that. This policy of ours is inspired by profound views and opinions on this side of the House that we owe this to the Empire at this juncture. We are willing to do it, and the people of Canada are willing to do it. We have heard the challenge of a general election. I think I know the people of Canada fairly well, and I would not ask a better issue to go before the people with than the question of whether Canada shall respond to the memorandum of the Admiralty to assist to the extent of her ability in increasing the effective naval forces of the Empire, upon which the safety of the Empire and of Canada, always a part of the Empire, must depend.

The hon. member for West Lambton (Mr. Pardee) is a good Canadian with a Canadian face. I always listen to him with great interest, as a good type of Canadian. But I was struck with what I might call the sanguinary character of his address. One word ran through it till my hair almost lifted: 'blood.' He said we were not giving any blood. He wants to shed blood; nothing would do him but blood. I do not know whether he sees bloodshed in what is called the Laurier naval policy; for there was not bloodshed in it, nor likely to be, because if the principal vessel is in the dry-dock. I do not see how it could get into action. Besides there is the doctrine that Canada can withhold the navy from taking part in the war, and so blood-letting would be absolutely impossible. The hon. gentleman was in favour of the shedding of blood. I do not know whether he wanted to shed his own blood or that of others, but he was in a sanguinary frame of mind. Now, we do not want to lose good Canadians like him from this House.

Mr. TURRIFF: No danger.

Mr. WHITE: No danger under your policy, that is true. But the hon. gentleman wants to shed his blood in some naval expedition with other Canadians. His place is on this side. We give these three dreadnoughts to increase the effective naval forces of the Empire, and, as Mr. Churchill shows, the mere offer of these ships from a great country like Canada will have a profound effect—to prevent the necessity of blood being shed.

Then, there is my hon. friend from Edmonton (Mr. Oliver). He spoke before the holidays, and there was no man on this side who knew the whole gospel of naval defence or conditions in Great Britain as he did. He spoke as though from his youth up he had been trained in that gospel. He went the limit. He said:

For many years the British Islands were protected by the narrow seas and the British dominions were protected by the width of the ocean, but to-day we must recognize the fact that it is merely a matter of time when the millions of men who are or can be placed under arms in Europe at practically a moment's notice can be transported over sea as quickly and as certainly as may be necessary to carry out the will of the nation to which they belong. There is no purpose in Canada ignoring this condition of affairs. It does absolutely exist, and the question is what interest has Canada in it.

The hon. gentleman has the light, and, if he sins, he sins against the light. As he spoke I noticed a real look of apprehension on the face of his colleagues, and had he been content to continue his own course, we might have expected him to come over to this side. Years ago I knew the hon. gentleman only from caricatures. They used to picture him as a western broncho—I mean no disrespect. Here he saw the condition of the Empire in relation to naval affairs, and he was just about to take the fence and get out of the corral, when the party halter fell upon his shoulders and he was led back and came out for a little navy. There is no excuse for my hon. friend from Edmonton, because he sins against the light, although others do not see it as well as he does.

Mr. OLIVER: What was the sin ?

Mr. WHITE: My hon. friend is not so obtuse as to fail to realize that the situation is this. In view of the conditions which I have disclosed, does my hon. friend mean to say that as a Canadian he will sit in this House and say he will not act on the advice of the Admiralty and contribute to the effective naval forces of the Empire ? My hon. friend said this in his speech. He knew the danger; it is there; and yet he is so unmoved by it that he says: Let us put one fleet unit on the Atlantic and one on the Pacific—which, as a matter of fact would be absolutely useless against European powers.

Mr. OLIVER: Oh, oh.

Mr. WHITE: They would be of some use as raiding cruisers and for the protection of our trade routes, but, in case of conflict, the issue would be at the main theatre of war, and your fleet units would be as paper screens against an armada from Europe or Asia.

Mr. OLIVER: I am willing to take Lord Charles Beresford's word in that regard.

Mr. WHITE: I take your own word.

Mr. OLIVER: Does not Lord Charles Beresford know ?

Mr. WHITE: I am somewhat surprised at the attitude taken by the hon. member for Richmond (Mr. Kyte). He is a big, up-standing man, and, I have no doubt, has some fighting blood in him.

Mr. KYTE: You could not fight in an empty dreadnought.

Mr. WHITE: We will see whether the hon. gentleman wants to fight at all or not. What is he afraid of ? Oh, he says: If you make a contribution to the British fleet, when the Germans notice it we will be almost the first subject of attack, and, unless we have a fleet on the Atlantic coast, the Germans might come over and attack the county of Richmond ! I would have thought that my hon. friend, who is evidently a man of courage, would have said he would like to be attacked not last, but first, if the Empire is in danger. I do not think my hon. friend was stating his real views; I think he would be the first to fight, and I do not seek to cast any aspersion upon him in that regard. But he suggests that Canadians be very careful what they do for fear they might be the first to be attacked. I think there are some hon. gentlemen here who, if the Empire were in peril or danger, would desire to be the first in the fight, not the last. My hon. friend started out with two fleet units, one on the Atlantic and one on the Pacific. Look what he has come down to ! The hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff) wants none at all, and others of his party are not in favour of any naval policy. The hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Maclean) says we will take our time about it; and we therefore have this variety of opinion in regard to the matter. This naval policy which last November was based on two fleet units, one on the Atlantic and one on the Pacific, has come down, facilis decensus averni, until it is simply a sort of patchwork proposition. Witness the change of heart experienced by the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) in this matter! Hon. gentlemen will remember that his speech on this subject was presented in two sections, like a pullman train—one section before the Christmas vacation and the other after the House resumed in January. Indeed, I was reminded in this respect of the month of March; it came in like a lion, as did the hon. member for South Wellington, and pursuing the illustration, hon. gentlemen will know, from the second deliverance of the hon. member for South Wellington, how it went out. What was the hon. gentleman chiefly concerned about when he came back? I thought at that time that we were going to reach the highwater mark in respect of declamatory invective, but, instead of that, the hon. member was very deeply concerned about the style of the utterances of my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce. He thought his style was too rhetorical, and he proceeded to give us the English parliamentary or conversational style, which he said was very much more to be desired than the style of my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce. It is evident that my hon. friend could only acquire that style by using it, and I understand that during the recess he held some meetings in his constituency. In his riding he has a lot of sturdy people of English, Scotch and Irish extraction, who are very loyal subjects of the Empire—as, indeed, the hon. gentleman is himself. I should think they would be men not likely to boggle, if the Empire were in need, on the alleged violation of the principle of autonomy if Canada's help were required under certain conditions. My hon. friend came back, as I say, and held out to the House the rainbow of a compromise which the House has not yet accepted, and so far as I can see, is not likely to accept. My hon. friend is a sort of a political Martha; he is worried and troubled about many things, but let me say to him that, as a loyal Canadian and British subject, if he will consider the conditions of British naval defence and our interests in it, he will realize that he should not boggle over how that money is to be spent so long as it is expended expeditiously. The hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Carvell) asks if there is any European danger. I think he should use his imagination to some extent, and look ahead into the future. What will be the position in 1915 and 1916? I do not propose to enter into the details of the German naval policy. No man in this House has a greater respect for that great empire than I have; I say they have laid civilization under tribute to them by reason of their contributions to the advancement of art, science, literature and philosophy. I am not going to blame the German people for their programme of naval expansion; it is their right, and if they decline to accept the overtures of Great Britain or any other country as to the limitation of their naval programme, I still say it is their right. But Germany is not the only consideration. Great Britain has duties in Asia, in the North sea, in the Mediterranean. My hon. friends have their eyes fixed upon the naval situation in the North sea. That this is the important situation, so far as Great Britain is concerned, is shown by the concentration in those waters of her ships, but in addition to that you have to consider the situation at Gibraltar, and Malta, the trade routes to India and China, and important stations all over the world in respect of which Great Britain must protect her commerce and the interests of the Empire. Having regard to the whole situation, I say, without any fear of successful contradiction, that such conditions of naval strength have developed that any English statesman may well be apprehensive as to the relative strength of Great Britain among the naval forces of the world. That being the case, it is our duty to contribute our quota with a view to making Great Britain absolutely invincible upon the sea, and these other things of which we have been speaking—the fortification of ports, the establishment of flotillas and local navies—can be added as people may deem proper. My hon. friend was talking about national aspirations. I have heard these two words 'national aspirations' in this House; they are not new to me. I do not wish to attribute to the words of my right hon. friend a meaning which he did not intend to convey. I did not understand him to refer to national aspirations as separatist aspirations. He used the words, 'national aspirations,' as I understood him, in the sense of the aspirations of the Dominion, to develop along her own lines, but within the Empire. He spoke of Canadian national aspirations, and of a contribution of this kind, for the purposes designated, as being a violation or contradiction of those national aspirations. I deny that absolutely. I say that Canada has national aspirations as a dominion, but national aspirations always within the Empire. I would like to hear any hon. member get up in this House—I do not believe that any hon. member would get up, because I do not think that any hon. member believes it—and say that Canada should stand outside the Empire. She has no aspirations outside the Empire. She has for Canada, but within the Empire. We cannot think of it in any other terms than these. If we believe, as we do believe, and as the majority of the people of Canada believes, that this condition exists, is there anything in our proposal inconsistent with the national aspirations, to say nothing of autonomy, or of local self-government, or any other principle? Is there anything in what we propose doing in the slightest degree inconsistent with the national aspirations of Canada to remain as a dominion, to develop as a dominion, but always within the greater Empire to which we yield such willing allegiance?

One more point. It has been said that by doing what is proposed, Canada is not contributing in brawn or brain or blood, that we are simply giving dreadnoughts, and it is stated that this is a poor gift. But who will pay for those three dreadnoughts? Every man in Canada will pay for them. He will pay for them by his work, by the sweat of his brow. The fisherman on the sea will contribute his mite, the miner in the coal areas of Cape Breton under the sea will contribute his mite; farmers, mechanics, artisans, merchants, all the members of the community, will contribute of their brawn and brain towards this splendid gift that we propose to place at the disposal of the British Admiralty for the common defence of the Empire. There is nothing unworthy, or ignoble or ignominious about it. It will be a magnificent contribution to place at the disposal of the Empire. What is our duty at this juncture? I have shown that a certain naval condition exists that did not exist years ago, that Great Britain has been greatly weakened on the main stations of the world, that relatively she is not in the position she occupied twenty years ago. I have shown, I think conclusively, that no matter what the colonies or the dominions may do by way of building local fleets, you must have one supreme fleet controlling the seas, or all the other fleets woud be useless. What is the duty of Canada at this particuar juncture? How is Canada interested? In the first place, Canada is interested from a material standpoint. We have about $400,000,000 worth of traffic upon the seas per annum that requires protection. We have been getting that protection for years, and we have not been giving anything in return. For twenty-five years we have done nothing but talk about naval defence. Since 1887, when the first Imperial conference was held, we talked about what we were going to do, we have protested that we were the most loyal people in the Empire, and we have practically done nothing. I do not like to refer to it in opprobrious terms, but down to the time when this Government took power we had practically done nothing. For twenty-five years we have been looked upon as a nation of talkers. My hon. friend from Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) spoke about the humiliation of adding this gift to the effective naval forces of the Empire. He wears a King's uniform, and a fine-upstanding figure he would make in a uniform; yet actually, for twenty-five years, my hon. friend was content to have all this talk go on, and to sit as a follower of the late Government, satisfied with the situation that I have disclosed. And now, he says it is humiliating for us to bring down a Bill to increase the effective naval forces of the Empire, in the way proposed. I utterly fail to follow his mental processes with regard to the matter.

And now, just a word in conclusion, for I have taken up too much of the time of the House, as to what is the duty of Canada in these premises. Canada has always been noted for her loyalty to the British Empire. She has attested that loyalty on numerous occasions. Canada is greatly attached to the traditions of the British Empire, and she has a profound belief in the destiny of that Empire. I say that Canada is interested in the British Empire, not only from the material standpoint, but from the standpoint of what Great Britain stands for in this world. The flag of England stands for a great deal more than for possessions and wealth and power of a material kind, or for influence. The flag of England, wherever it flies, stands for justice and equality before the law, for equity and fair play, and for a higher civilization, and if from no other standpoint, I say that Canada is interested in the perpetuation of the British Empire, from the higher and nobler standpoint of the ideals of the Empire. This Parliament and this country would fail signally in their duty if, after the visit of the Prime Minister to Great Britain, after ascertaining the situation, as he did ascertain it, and after obtaining the deliberate opinion of the Admiralty without collusion, clearly the unbiased and fair opinion of the Admiralty, that this is the proper thing to do—under these circumstances I say, Canada would be signally wanting in her duty to herself and to the Empire if she refrained from making this contribution of three dreadnoughts to be placed at the disposal of the British Empire. I recall the words of the Attic orator Demosthenes in regard to Athens. Athens, he said, could not do otherwise if she had regard to her glory or to her past, or to the days that were to come. Having regard to what we have received from Great Britain in the past, having regard to the innumerable evidences of care and affection and attention that we have received, can Canada do otherwise than make her contribution to-day if she is to have any regard to her own glory, to her past, or to the days that are to come? Let us give this magnificent contribution, to be placed to the order of His Majesty for the common defence of the Empire, and by doing so, so far as this Parliament and the people of Canada are concerned, we will contribute to keep England always England, so that her flag shall ever fly over the Empire on which the sun never sets.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK (Red Deer): Mr. Chairman, I do not know that I ever listened to my hon. friend (Mr. White, Minister of Finance) with less real interest than I have on this occasion. He has given us very freely of his opinions about the various gentlemen on this side of the House. He has given those opinions with a freedom which is unusual in Parliament. We need not be surprised at his taking a course which is unusual in Parliament, because, of course, we must remember that his experience of Parliament has been a very brief one. But he gives his opinions of others with such freedom that one is tempted to return the compliment in kind.

Mr. WHITE (Leeds).

If I may not be too offensive, I should like to say that Carlyle once said: Pert snappishness is no manner for a great man. I leave him with that thought while I proceed. My hon. friend also had a great deal to say in criticism of the naval policy of my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) in the years which preceded 1911. My hon. friend had changed his intention. He said that he did not intend to speak in this debate and he told us once in another debate that he was going to speak. Now, he has gone back to his old intention. He has also changed since 1911 because, during all those years he did not differ from my right hon. friend except on the question of reciprocity. All that time he was a good Canadian, all that time he was defending Canadian autonomy and now he comes here and quotes the Latin saying, facilis descensus averni. How true it is and how applicable in the case of my hon. friend! I do not propose to follow my hon. friend through the irregular course of his remarks. I shall take occasion in the course of the argument to make reference to my hon. friend's speech. but there are two or three things which I must take up at once. My hon. friend says that Mr. Churchill said that these ships were absolutely needed. I do not think he did. It is rather a bad fault if he did so because I should say that, if Mr. Churchill had said that, my hon. friend would have produced a very strong argument for changing his opinion and asking the House to do so. Has my hon. friend the full text of Mr. Churchill's speech?

Mr. WHITE: The quotation I gave is from the press.

Mr. CLARK: Was it from the full text of his speech?

Mr. WHITE: It is given in the Montreal Star.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. WHITE: In quotation marks and in a special cablegram or correspondence.

Mr. CLARK: We all saw that and those of us with a little more experience than my hon. friend did not believe it. If Mr. Churchill had said that Britain absolutely needed ships from Canada he would have contradicted everything that every British statesmen of note has been saying for the last three years. On the face of it, it was absolute nonsense. Now, I will tell my hon. friend what Mr. Churchill did say. The nearest approach he made to saying anything like that was this.

Mr. WHITE: What date is that?

Mr. CLARK: This is the full text of his speech as reported in the London Daily News and Leader of March 27. It is not an inspired cablegram from an international ring of jingoes:

> If therefore, we were confronted, with this false dilemma of Colonial and Dominion ships we might answer directly by saying, 'they are additional to the requirements of the 60 per cent standard; they are not additional to the world-wide requirements of the British Empire.'

My hon. friend will see—he is a man of acute mind though his experience is short—that the whole question under consideration is how to meet the world-wide requirements of the British Empire. That is a perfectly different statement from what was sent across on the cables by men who, I repeat, are members of a ring of international jingoes. The whole question is what are the world-wide requirements and how to meet them. Well, having met that point in my hon. friend's speech, I have pretty largely answered the speech, because that is the only thing in it which would have any importance, if true. As it is untrue the only importance it has is as a lesson to inexperienced politicians as to the source from which they get their quotations upon which to base their arguments. When one sees the tyro blundering into a misquotation of that kind, one cannot but think of him who would have been Minister of Finance if it had not been for the Toronto Eighteen and one cannot but recall the old lines:

> Oh, for the touch of a vanished hand,
> And the sound of a voice that is still.

You do not catch old birds in that way. There are one or two other points in the speech of the hon. Minister of Finance to which I might refer. I resent as a Canadian an argument which he used towards the end of his remarks to the effect that we ought to support the policy of this Government in case we frighten British capital from the shores of Canada.

Mr. WHITE: No, I did not.

Mr. CLARK: I understood my hon. friend in that sense.

Mr. WHITE: I did not use that argument.

Mr. CLARK: I understood the hon. gentleman's argument in that sense, and there is no other interpretation that his language will bear.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Chill.

Mr. CLARK: Of course if you chill the investor you frighten the capital. Of all the arguments by which this hybrid policy has been supported, that is the one that I would be most ashamed to use as a Canadian because what does it amount to? It amounts to this, that our policy is a cheap confidence trick upon the investing British public. I do not believe that my hon. friend carries the Canadian people with him in that argument for one single moment. I have only heard or seen it once before and that was in a letter which the man who wrote it was afraid to sign his name to and which was given to me as I was about to go upon the platform to speak in the city of Toronto. I was interested to hear my hon. friend say that the two sources of prosperity in this country are immigrants and foreign capital. I have always thought that protection, on that side of the House, was the great cause of the prosperity of Canada. I have frequently argued in line with what my hon. friend said but I have never met with very much support from his side of the House. I think that for the present time that is all I care to say in answer to my hon. friend.

Let me say that when I was out in the sunshine I wished very much that the Government had paid more attention to my advice from time to time because I have been a careful student of these emergencies, menaces or scares, and I have been prepared to give them the best advice upon this one. In regard to this German scare I have noticed that it has shown a tendency to summer hibernation. It struck the continent of Europe in the winter of 1908-09 and it crossed the Atlantic and struck us here in the month of March. As the summer went on we noticed that it had subsided and gone into summer quarters. We have had more or less of it every winter since, but as spring comes around again the emergency goes into hibernation. We put it into a somewhat dazed condition three weeks ago on a famous Saturday night and, if the Government had only learned something from these events, they would have allowed it to stay in that sleepy condition in which it was left at that time. But, if they are determined to put us up to fight, we are bound to argue this question, and there is no option on our part but to continue the debate as long as the fight is put up to us. We are fighting for the elementary rights of minorities and the sovereignty of a people. We say that this is a new departure of such colossal proportions that it ought to be submitted to the people before we are committed to it. If it is submitted we are animated by the confidence that the people will assert their right to spend their own money, and control their own defences and their own public services.

My hon. friend (Mr. White) and his friends talk of submitting the permanent policy of defence to the people. That is just the thing that no one who has studied these matters in the light of our history would ever think of submitting. The permanent defence of this country is provided for in the basis of our constitution. It is in the British North America Act and it is in the speeches of all the Fathers of Confederation that one of our first duties is to provide for the defence of Canada upon sea and land. But when it is proposed to embark us in a policy which takes us back seventy years in our history, that is the policy that should be submitted to the people. Defence is the first duty of the state Adam Smith said a century and a quarter ago, and that duty is being shirked by a government torn by internal dissentions and hampered by an unworthy want of confidence in our own people. And at whose behest? The Minister of Finance has told us; he told us this afternoon that he went to the British Admiralty for his policy, and he said, where else could you go? Why, even Mr. Churchill, the First Lord of the Admiralty, does not accept responsibility for the expert opinions we are handed out by the Minister of Finance, from the permanent servants of the Department in Downing Street; that is the latest from Mr. Winston Churchill. And who constitute these departments—especially the fighting departments? The fighting departments are always manned by jingoes who always want more money to spend on armament. We do not need to go outside of Canada to know that. Suppose my hon. friend the Minister of Militia had the chance of any other portion of the Empire giving him even a small fraction of thirty-five million dollars to spend in his department, could anyone here conceive the happiness it would bring to that electric temperament and the capers he would cut in consequence? These fighting departments are always in need of money, and of course they will take our money and they will think they are the only people that would know how to spend it.

At whose behest are we called upon once more to debate this question? At the behest I suppose of the Montreal Star and of the Toronto News; but the Montreal Star does not any longer speak for a solid Conservative party because it was hauled over the coals the other morning by a leading article in the Citizen. What other object have the Government for proceeding with this policy at the present time? There is no request from the people of Canada; there is no mandate from the people of Canada, and yet they are going on with this policy and Parliament has been five months sitting without doing anything. The Government are going on with this policy to save their own faces; that is the reason, and the more this matter is debated the more the people of Canada will see that is the whole object of the Government, and the more certainly they will come to the conclusion that the faces of this Government are not worth being saved at $35,000,000. Where is the mandate for this policy? There is no mandate behind the Prime Minister even in this House. The Nationalists were elected to oppose this policy; my hon. friend from Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk) admitted that.

When he left the Cabinet he took from the other side of the House the moral sanction there should always be behind such a policy as this. What he did the others should have done, and, if you take the Nationalists supporters from the Government, where would they be? We would be almost equal in this House, and if you count the votes of the people we would be in a majority. This is a serious argument and this is a very serious and strong defence of everything we have done on this side of the House. My hon. friend from Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk) told us last session that he was locked, bolted, and barred to his portfolio. What changed his view? It was changed by this policy which was in direct violation of the principles which he and his followers had taught in the province of Quebec. That it is which burst the locks and the bars, and threw to one side the bolts.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Padlocks.

Mr. CLARK: My hon. friend the Postmaster General (Mr. Pelletier) probably recognized the insufficiency of the bolts and locks which secured the hon. member for Jacques-Cartier (Mr. Monk) and so he bought a few more padlocks; in fact, he secured more than enough for himself; he secured enough for his fellow ministers from Quebec and all the members of the Nationalist party to boot. But, that does not alter the fact that electorally the Government has no manhole; as they were elected to this House in opposition to this policy. I am sure everyone here has the feeling that is shared outside, that in resuming this debate yesterday we were assisting at a funeral. The fact is that this policy died on March 15; and while its interment may be postponed it is inevitable. The speeches of Government supporters yesterday were melancholy in matter and funereal in tone; they were the fitting accompaniment of the last obsequies of this ill-fated measure. The nature of the operation of burial is ill-concealed by holding out threats of closure over the heads of those who have given it its happy despatch. It will be time enough to discuss the closure when we come to it; there is an excellent proverb which says it is time enough to bid the devil good morning when you meet him. But the closure proposition which has been announced makes me think that like ministry like measures, would be a good way of describing the situation.

What is the ministry which proposes to closure debate in this House, and not only proposes it, but attempted it by the most extraordinary series of coincidences on the part of Chairmen who all took the same road without consulting themselves or anybody else? Who are these minstiers? They constitute a Cabinet who have exported their only experience and a large portion of their ability in the person of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Foster). He is the only minister who ever sat in a Cabinet of the Dominion before, so that we have a Cabinet of inexperienced ministers, and these are just the kind of ministers that I should expect so to manage their business that closure would be necessary. They are not the only bad workmen who complain of their tools; bad workmen always do.

A very candid description of the Cabinet was given a short time ago in the Morning Citizen. It was described as a Cabinet with limitations. The Citizen said, if Mr. Borden—referring to him by name—had had his own way, how much better a Cabinet he could have collected; but he was limited by considerations of geography, of race and of creed, so that he could only get a Cabinet like the present one. It would be very interesting to work out those limitations. It is a very personal line of research. You cannot say that the Minister of Inland Revenue (Mr. Nantel) has any topographical limitations, although he may be the minister referred to as having geographical limitations. As to race and creed, my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Rogers) evidently thinks that his religious opinions are becoming a little doubtful and that he is the one of the creed-limited men, because he was quoting scripture yesterday. A ministry with limitations threatens us with taking to itself, after fifty years of Confederation and after the business of this House has gone on during that time by mutual consent, unlimited power over debate. It threatens us with the closure. Let the people judge of this question too. Submit closure as well as the naval debate to the people, and find out what they say on the double issue. If the Government has no mandate from the people for its naval proposal, still less has it a mandate for the closure to rush those naval proposals through. A very easy method of finding out what the people think was pointed out in the Citizen this morning. Let us try the referendum. For the fifteen or twenty gentlemen elected in 1911, who forget all their principles in 1913 and vote on diametrically opposite lines to those upon which they were elected, there will be a tremendous agitation in this country not only for the referendum but for their recall as well.

So far from these rules, which we hear so much about, being antiquated, so far from what has happened demonstrating any need for new rules, recent events have shown the absolute efficiency and necessity of the rules for safeguarding the rights of the minority and also the public interest. Just consider for a moment. Suppose that events had gone differently in this country, what would have happened? Suppose that we had had shorter debates on the resolution and on the first and second readings of the Bill. Suppose that we had not had those two weeks of day and night fight. Why, Sir, the country would have been committed to a policy supported by contradictory statements on the other side of the House, and only dimly foreshadowed in the speeches of the Prime Minister himself. The Canadian people would have been committed to that policy and they would have been buying a pig in a poke. They would have been committed to a policy although they did not know what it was. The Opposition, by their course, have vindicated the right of free speech. They won that battle—won it out and out. They pierced the silence, the tomb-like silence that reigned upon those benches for weeks. We have speech for speech in this debate upon its resumption. They introduced a spirit of conciliation, on which I congratulate the Government and its supporters; but the final justification of our action and equally the condemnation of hon. gentlemen opposite lie in the fact that now for the first time we know, and we learn it from Downing Street, what is proposed to be done with Canada's warships.

Who ever heard of the flying squadron? Did anyone on that side of the House know anything about it, from the Prime Minister down? Did they know anything of the flying squadron, before Mr. Winston Churchill made his speech ten days ago? I do not see any minister rise to say that he knew of it. If he did know of it, why did he not tell this House? If hon. members opposite do not know of it, the Government did not know what its policy was until it learned it from Winston Churchill. My hon. friend the Minister of Finance says that there is no loss of autonomy; yet we go to Downing Street to have a policy stated. We did hear, of course, of the battle of Armageddon in the North sea. My hon. friend from Calgary (Mr. Bennett) drew a wonderful picture. He said, we are going to build a dyke in the North sea—he might have been thinking of children's bricks in a nursery—with these three dreadnoughts. This was his understanding of the Government policy. The dyke will be impregnable. Lacking the dreadnoughts, we shall lack the dyke. Now, you lack the dyke. The hon. member for Calgary, who was the last gentleman allowed to speak in the last stage of the proceedings on this measure, knew absolutely nothing of the destination of Canada's ships. Mr. Winston Churchill comes along and says: Who is this talking nonsense about Armageddon and North sea dykes? That is not what I am going to do with you. I am going to link you up with the Malays at Gibraltar rock. You will be controlled by the Admiralty; yet my hon. friend the Minister of Finance cannot see that we are losing any autonomy under his proposal. Mr. Winston Churchill says that you will be controlled by the Admiralty. If he takes my hon. friend from Calgary in hand, he will be doing something which is a little difficult. When they talk of controlling one another, there will be wigs on the green. The fact is that both my hon. friend from Calgary and Mr. Winston Churchill would be better off if they were both controlled, in considering this policy, by a little extra dose of common sense. What is the new policy as we have it declared from Downing Street? I do not want to go over the whole of the four column speech of Mr. Winston Churchill or even that part of the speech which refers to this proposition. I just want to say that there are three vital objections to this policy of the Government as it appears from its latest exponent. The first objection is that it is not an Imperial policy at all. My hon. friend from Toronto (Mr. White) has shown us once more that the people who come from that particular city think they are the only Imperialists on earth.

Mr. WHITE: You have overlooked Red Deer.

Mr. CLARK: They have the pure brand of the article there. This is not an Imperial policy at all. You may call it an Anglo-Canadian-Malay policy; but you cannot call it Imperial. I would call a policy Imperial which embraces the Empire, but Australia ostentatiously and nobly stands outside the arrangement. Australia with half our population takes the self reliant and wholly creditable course of self defence and Empire defence at the same time. New Zealand shows an inclination to go in the same direction. South Africa hesitates and is considering the subject and is going to interview the Admiralty this summer. The moment when South Africa is considering her policy, when Australia has gone definitely and finally for the policy of self reliance and the development of an Australian navy, and when New Zealand is going in the same direction. is the moment when Canadians allow themselves to be linked up at Gibraltar rock with the Malays of the Archipelago. You call that an Imperial policy. They are really not meeting Armageddon in the North sea; they are to 'show the flag.' Why, I thought that was settled by the Government of Manitoba by flying it on all the school houses. But we are going to 'show the flag at sea.' If a private individual went on in this way, what would you think about him? What do you think of a man in private life who goes about boasting of his power and his wealth? No right thinking person wants to have anything to do with him. I say, as a man who has some regard for British traditions, that under this policy we are going to link up, not with a well thought out Imperial policy but we are to link up with a vulgar and menacing display which would be resented in private life by any right thinking man. That is not the kind of Imperial policy I want. That is my first objection to it. My second objection is this—and if there were nothing else to condemn it, this, I think, would condemn it in the eyes of the majority of the Canadian people—the words 'directly controlled by the British Admiralty.' Now, direct control by any department on Downing Street of anything Canadian arrives just seventy years too late. I defy any minister in this House to go with those words on his lips and get the approval and sanction of any Canadian audience anywhere, if the case is properly represented.

Mr. WHITE: It could be done in Red Deer.

Mr. CLARK: The policy of the right hon. leader of the Opposition, says the Minister of Finance, does not appeal to the imagination of Canada. I do not know that imagination has much to do with it when fighting is to be done. There is too much imagination in the fighting that hon. gentlemen opposite propose to do. The whole thing would be left to the imagination so far as the ships are concerned—the only thing we should know without 'imagining' anything about it would be that the men aboard would not be Canadians. The hon. gentleman and Mr. Churchill got into a hard place in Imperial policy. Australia stands aloof from him, stands independent of his ideas. New Zealand is preparing to take the same place. And Mr. Churchill finding himself in a hard place, says: I can get these Malays; they will be all right; their chief man is the Sultan of Perak. And he says also: There is a sultan in Canada, the sultan of Manitoba. We cannot get Australia, are not sure of New Zealand, and I do not know about South Africa, but I will hitch the sultan of Perak and the sultan of Manitoba, and then we shall be able to recall the quotation made by the hon. member for South York (Mr. Maclean) about all abreast like the horses of the sun. That is the kind of policy finally evolved in connection with the giving away of your autonomy. The people of Canada will forbid these banns if you give them an opportunity. I do not know they will ever get an opportunity; I hope not. I can hardly conceive of any intelligent and self-respecting parliament, which is the only kind that should represent an intelligent and self-respecting people, allowing this to go through. But it will be voted upon some time, and some way, and then my hon. friend will know what the people of Canada think of it. And if Canadians are like other British subjects, there will be only one verdict and that will be the verdict of absolute utter condemnation, a verdict which has already been pronounced by my hon. friend from Jacques Cartier, and, in their hearts, by his followers.

The third and most vital objection to this policy is that it leaves the real and most pressing problem of defence of our own country absolutely neglected. Where is the real problem? The problem is on the Pacific coast. And what does Mr. Churchill tell us? What does he say about this flying squadron that we are going to constitute, forsooth, as to the time it will take to get to the Pacific coast? It takes the longest time of all the places he mentions—twenty-three days. Where the problem at present is greatest is where the flying squadron will arrive the latest. That is the policy of the Government. If there were a sudden breakdown of the friendly relations between this country and the Empire of Japan there would be an incursion upon our Pacific coast by Japanese, and for anything that our defence could do to keep them out, they would be through the Rocky Mountains to attack my farm in Alberta—and I leave the disembowelling to conjecture. They would meet with a sturdy resistance, for we have a few boys there who can handle a rifle, but I have no doubt but that these would have to surrender to overwhelming odds. All this could go on before the flying squadron would reach the Pacific coast at all.

An hon. MEMBER: The Japs might be wrecked.

Mr. CLARK: If they could be blown back with wind and would call at Calgary at the proper moment—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. CLARK: Those people who know anything about this practically know that what I say is absolutely true. I notice that a strong supporter of this Government on general principles, speaking a week ago in Vancouver—I refer to the Attorney General in Sir Richard McBride's Cabinet—said this:

> On the coast of British Columbia Canada would in the future find the crews to man her own navy.

That is the policy they believe in. Why, hon. gentlemen opposite cannot carry British Columbia on this policy; do not let them dream of it for a moment. And a friend of mine the other day, giving the opinion of an old sailor,—and this is a point well worthy thinking of as to where the real problem of defence lies—said:

The Admiralty plan absolutely loses sight of the fact that local knowledge of the coast is a great factor in the training of a sailor.

I would call the attention of the Minister of Finance to that point. The hon. Minister of Finance was rather ashamed of the laughter he provoked when he referred to the wreck of the Niobe. I do not wish to dwell upon that—

An hon. MEMBER: Go for him.

Mr. CLARK: No, for when a man says a thing and is ashamed of it, that is enough. The hon. gentleman produced laughter on this subject and saw that it was rather a mean thing to do. As a practical proposition, he referred to the wreck of the Niobe. Of course, his followers cheered, as they are always ready to cheer such a thing in the case of a British ship; the only thing that creates enthusiasm in their breasts is an empty ship. But when they laugh at a disaster to a British ship, they degrade their professions of loyalty past recognition and past regard. The practical point is that British officers were running the Niobe, and they ran her into a wreck. But when you train your sailors on your own coast and run your own vessels with your own sailors that will not happen. The Minister of Finance waxed eloquent on not losing autonomy. I have put the answer to that in the shape of a quotation from Mr. Churchill, and personally I cannot see how anything worthy of being called autonomy is kept if we give half our defence over to the control of the British Admiralty. The hon. gentleman asks: When Australia gave contributions who spoke of the loss of autonomy: when New Zealand gave contributions did any one speak of the loss of autonomy? Yes in both cases they did; and in each case the party that supported contributions was beaten at the polls. That is the answer to my hon. friend. And I am perfectly sure that in that matter coming events cast their shadows before, because number three will come along the next time of asking. Although hon. gentlemen opposite take the cold shivers when an election is mentioned, they cannot postpone it forever, and from the electors my hon. friend will get an answer to the question whether the Canadian people think there has been any proposal to give their autonomy away.

I now desire for a moment or two to deal with the speeches which were heard yesterday. Both the Prime Minister and the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Rogers) seemed to desire more light on this question, but they complained that it was not forthcoming. I am bound to say there was not much light forthcoming in the speech of the hon. Minister of Public Works. He says the difference between the policy of this Government and that of the Liberal party was that their policy is an effective one, whereas the policy of the Liberal party is not effective. By the way, my hon. friend the Minister of Finance asked what the Liberal policy is, and I will tell him. We are all united on this side of the House on one definite principle; let there be no doubt about it. He says our policy is established on feet of clay. Yes, but it is Canadian clay; The Liberal policy—the policy which was laid down by his leader, and which he himself supported up to the time of the elections of 1911—was that out of our own materials, with our own labour and in Canadian shipyards, we should do the whole business. If that was a bad policy, why did my hon. friends not say so? But they dare not disavow it. Hon. gentlemen have been all over the globe in matters of policy during the last few months; they have now arrived at least for the moment, at the rock of Gibraltar, but a very little argument speedily brings them back to their old policy, and they would arrive there if they had at this moment any moral courage. If it was not a matter of saving their faces, they would be there now. They know in their hearts what the people are thinking on this question. Did anybody ever see any effectiveness about empty ships? That is the hon. Minister of Public Works's idea in respect of an effective policy. If 'effective' spells 'empty,' I would say he made an effective speech. And ineffective, I presume, spells Canadian—from the remarks of the hon. gentleman one can come to no other conclusion. I have told hon. gentlemen what the Liberal policy is; it is that, whatever is done, we shall begin in Canada a Canadian naval service. I shall not depart from the statement of the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce that the first ships be built, and very likely manned, in England, but, as he said, the men will be the pattern for stokers produced in Canada, sailors produced in Canada, and, finally, an admiral produced in Canada. If this present policy is proceeded with, the Canadian ships are likely to land, as it were in the Malay States if the Sultan of Perak happens to be stronger than the sultan of Manitoba! The Minister of Public Works evidently expects us to believe that 'ineffective' spells 'Canadian,' and there is an issue that would kill this ministry if they went to the polls at the present moment, because you cannot go to the country with a policy of which that is a plank; you cannot say, you cannot do things and persuade the Canadian people to vote for you—they believe in themselves if you do not believe in them. My hon. friend the Minister of Public Works said that the Rainbow and the Niobe have produced side-splitting laughter throughout Canada; he mistakes the scurrilous cartoons of his pap fed press for the opinions of the people of Canada. The people do not laugh at British battleships, even when they are bought by Canada from the Admiralty, which my hon. friend the Minister of Finance so implicitly trusts. He says: where would we go in a matter of this kind but to the Admiralty? We went to the Admiralty for the very ships upon which my hon. friend and his colleagues delight in casting much ridicule, and in respect of which they seek to cause laughter by referring to the wreck of one of these ships. Of course we have very great sympathy with my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works; he was brought up, so far as politics are concerned, in the comparatively narrow sphere of Manitoba, and he possibly never heard of a training ship. I should like to tell him that training ships are quite numerous in Britain, and that they are the proper commencement of a navy; it is on your training ships you get your boys to grow into self-respecting citizens of the country to which you belong. That is the way in which we believe in building a navy. We are not ashamed of the Niobe and the Rainbow ,and the hon. minister only shows by a reference of that kind the narrowness of his own training. And then he actually referred to my hon. friend as having pursued a childish policy. I should be very slow to defend my right hon. friend against the attacks of the Minister of Public Works; he needs no defence against all the shafts that can possibly be shot from such a quarter. I think I may assure the hon. Minister of Public Works that so far as our leader is concerned, the majority of Canadians recognize him today not as a child, but as the greatest Canadian that Canada has ever produced. My hon. friend the Minister of Public Works says that if he cannot do much else —and with that part of his statement I do not desire to take issue—he can win elections.

Mr. SHARPE (North Ontario): Hear, hear.

Mr. CLARK: I should like to say, with regard to the 'hear, hear,' of my hon. friend from North Ontario, that my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works has not shone in that respect either in the federal or provincial fields. He did not shine after the last dissolution so far as fighting elections was concerned; what he did was to allow a party outside to fight the election, after which he stepped in and took a portfolio. He did not leave his berth in the province of Manitoba until he was sure that a better berth awaited him. As I say, he never took part in the elections except as a subsidiary assistant, and he took good care not to run as a candidate. Even with regard to the local field he has not always been an absolute success. He came out to Saskatchewan and he announced something that the Minister of Finance taught him—that reciprocity was dead. I was growing potatoes about that time, and was watching carefully the results of my experiments. I had sown some new seeds, among which was one variety known as the King George; they were splendid potatoes. I obtained the samples from England; they were nurtured on free trade soil, and they took hold at once in Alberta. I had another sample called the Wee McGregor, which was evidently of Scotch origin, and which shared the hardy characteristics of that race; I had splendid results with that variety. I planted fifty samples of a potato called the Manitoba Wonder and—Mr. Chairman, I am relating the absolute facts—there was not one Manitoba Wonder that sprang up! I came to the conclusion that the Manitoba Wonder was of very little use outside its own province, and so far as the results in Richelieu and some other parts of the country are concerned, I am not at all sure that the hon. gentleman can even boast that he can win elections. That is the whole effect of the speech that we had from the Minister of Public Works.

Now, I come to my right hon. friend the Prime Minister. Like my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works, he had something to say about dissolutions. There is one thing upon which hon. gentlemen opposite are agreed, and that is that a dissolution is a thing not to be thought of. As the Evening Journal said the other night, it is unthinkable. I think that is the view of members on the other side of the House; to them it is the most unthinkable thing possible. The right hon. the Prime Minister said that it is the constitutional privilege of the ministry to dissolve when it is convenient. He found it convenient to make no reference to the argument made by my own leader in his examination of the case of reciprocity. He left that severely alone. The Prime Minister now tells us that it is the right of ministers to dissolve. They did not always hold that view. As my hon. friend the Minister of Finance knows, people change their views very rapidly when they get into power. My hon. friend himself has made a very rapid change, and a similar change has come over my right hon. friend the Prime Minister with reference to procedure and to the right of an opposition to force a dissolution, or the withdrawal of a measure. When they talk of closure, they forget their own history. In the year 1908, my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works said that a certain place hotter than Florida would freeze over before he would allow a certain Bill dealing with the lists to pass. He used that language in Manitoba, but he came here and he mastered the opposition to the extent of forcing them to fight that Bill because he ordered it, and it was fought. Debates are always closed with some form of mutual consent, and my right hon. friend, the leader of the Opposition, as a great constitutionalist, as a man with a regard for the utmost liberty of speech, withdrew the Bill. Then later on, in the history of the last Parliament, a possible solution was found. My right hon. friend the Prime Minister and his followers to a man fought reciprocity by every resource in Parliament, and again my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition regarding, as a constitutionalist, parliamentary privileges and the privileges of minorities, knowing how sacred they are and how important it is to keep them inviolable, consented to a dissolution and went to the country; and now because we debate a thing which we believe is absolutely vital in relation to the rules of Parliament, these hon. gentlemen, not one of whom has ever sat in a Cabinet before, first meet us with absolute silence, and then with a threat of closure.

The right hon. the Prime Minister in his speech yesterday made a hard struggle to establish his own consistency. Mr. Chairman, it cannot be established, and that is another of the grounds upon which this debate has been so prolonged. It cannot be established. The right hon. the Prime Minister voted for a resolution which called for the speedy organization of a naval service in 1909, and that action cannot be reconciled with the language which he used on the 5th of December when he stated that no naval organization of an effective character could be built by this country within a quarter or half a century. No reconciliation is possible between those two statements. In one case you have a plea for the speedy organization of a naval service; in the other the statement that it cannot be done in half a century. The only way you can reconcile these two statements is by assuming that building a navy in fifty years is doing it speedily, and that is outside the consideration of those of us who sit on this side of the House anyway. Yesterday the Prime Minister said the ships would be the property of Canada. That is a new view. That was not the view before Christmas. My hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries said in the debate before Christmas that this was a free and loyal gift, a free offering. What did the Prime Minister himself say? In his original speech of 5th December he said the ships would bear Canadian names, and that was all he intended them to bear at that time, because he went on to say that every Canadian would realize in seeing or reading of those ships that they were a gift in which he had participated. Now, those statements cannot be reconciled. I put it to my hon. friend the Minister of Finance, how can those ships be the property of Canada, as my right hon. friend said yesterday they would be, and at the same time be a gift to Great Britain to which each one of us would contribute. Again, joining with my hon. friend the Minister of Finance, he scouts the idea of any interference with our autonomy. He says, are the people of Canada not masters of their own destinies. Mr. Churchill says no, not so far as our navy is concerned, because he says, your flying squadron will be controlled by the Admiralty. Who are the masters of the destiny of your ships? They are the British Admiralty. Mr. Winston Churchill and his experts, are your masters under this scheme, and that is why it will not become law if we can prevent it. It will condemn the Government that passes it, if it ever does become law, or if it is submitted to the people. No more humiliating spectacle was ever seen in Parliament than that of the Prime Minister of Canada stating as he did yesterday afternoon that this thing is not a contribution and not a permanent policy. We have been debating for months in this House the respective merits of contributions on the one hand and of a permanent policy on the other, and I repeat that nothing more humiliating was ever seen in this House than the Prime Minister coming out at the end of these prolonged debates and saying that this thing is not a contribution and not a permanent policy. If it is neither of these things, what in the name of wonder is it? He does not answer, and I question if any one of them can answer. It is our contribution, and it is to be a flying squadron it is true, but we are getting light now. We wanted more light, and we are getting it with a vengeance. We did not know until yesterday that this thing was neither flesh, fowl nor good red herring, for he said what is practically the equivalent of that when he stated that it was not a contribution and no part of a permanent policy. But he wants to make it part of the permanent policy, and he wants us to do it. He says, you can get the ships back. The Government are almost pleading with us to make a compromise. They have given up their own policy, for they know it is being ridiculed by every thoughtful man in Canada at the present time. He says, you can get them back if, hereafter, it is the will of the people to get them back. My answer is that heretofore, it has been the will of a united Parliament of Canada that this gift should not go.

At six o'clock, House resumed, and then took recess.

After Recess.

House resumed at eight o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS.

THIRD READING.

Bill No. 114, to incorporate the Port Nelson Company, and to change its name to the Port Nelson Corporation, Limited—Mr. Beattie.

INDEPENDENT ORDER OF FORESTERS.

Further consideration in Committee of the Whole of Bill No. 30 to consolidate and amend the acts relating to the Supreme Court of the Independent Order of Foresters, and to change its name to the Independent Order of Foresters.—Mr. Macdonell. (Mr. Deputy Speaker in the Chair).

On section 7—Investment Board of Society:

Mr. ROBB: Mr. Chairman, before this clause is adopted, having been absent when the Bill was considered in committee before, I desire, on behalf of some Foresters, to make a few observations. I am not now, nor have I ever been, a Forester, but I recognize the importance of this great fraternal organization in providing a fairly cheap and reasonable insurance to a class of people who otherwise might not have taken insurance. The Independent Order of Foresters was organized as a fraternal insurance association. Its laws were made in the supreme court where there were representatives from the provincial high courts and these representatives of the provincial high courts were elected by subordinate courts. The order has been most successful. It is said that it has over $20,500,000 of accumulated funds and it is proposed by this legislation to change this great fraternal organization or society to what may be termed a straight life insurance company. If I understand the legislation aright, it is proposed to put the society exactly on the same basis as the straight line companies and I am not sure but that it will come under legislation affecting the standard or straight line companies. I submit to the committee that the promoters have offered to Parliament no evidence that they have authority from the membership to ask for this legislation. The High Court of Quebec has not met for three years, nor has the Supreme Court, and at these meetings no question has been raised with regard to this proposed legislation. I have the last official journal of the fraternity wherein is a report of a recent meeting of the state High Court of Rhode Island and there is no statement to show that the question of this proposed legislation was submitted to the membership of that high court. I have here the January, February and March numbers of the official journal of the fraternity. There is no notice in the January or March numbers to the membership that this legislation is being asked for. In the February number there is, in small print in a corner of the journal, a notice intimating that at this session it was proposed to ask for some legislation defining the rights of members. I submit that, inasmuch as this fraternity originally received its charter from Parliament, we cannot escape the responsibility of this matter and the Government of the day, and more particularly the Finance Minister, are responsible to the members of the Independent Order of Foresters for this proposed legislation. We should say to the promoters: Go back to your subordinate courts and your high courts and explain to them this legislation and the effect that it will have upon the membership and then come to us and we will consider your legislation. I know it will be answered that the matter can, under the legislation, be referred to the supreme court and that the Act does not come into effect until the supreme court has met. But, as in most of these fraternities, the representatives of the courts are junior members who have passed the chair and who are, as a matter of courtesy sent to the Supreme Court, they have no knowledge of the proceedings of previous courts and it will be easy for the men at the head of affairs to railroad this legislation through. There are 135,000 members in Canada and we have no right to put this legislation through until the promoters have told the membership what effect it will have upon their rights which have accrued under the charter granted by this Parliament.

Mr. MACDONELL: Mr. Chairman, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Robb) mentioned to me a day or two ago the objection that he has made. I pointed out to him then that the best notice that could be given of the intended application had been by the publication of the fact in the February number of the official organ of the society. No doubt it would have been published in the March number had it not been for the fact that this Bill was before the committee but was being investigated very thoroughly by the Finance Department and its passage was delayed for some weeks. This legislation is purely tentative. It does not bind the society to accept it and it does not bind the members to adopt it unless and until they have themselves, by a two-thirds vote, decided that they will take advantage of it. I am not a member of the Foresters Order, and I am not as familiar with the technical details as to this class of insurance as I might be, and I have therefore taken the trouble to procure a written statement in regard to the point my hon. friend has made so that it can go on the records of the House as an answer to his objection that the members will not be sufficiently notified of this becoming law. The answer is as follows:

Note on suggestion by Mr. James A. Robb that before granting legislation asked for, the society should explain to its subordinate courts what effect this will have on their policies.

(1) The members have already through the notice in the official journal of February, 1913 (the official journal goes free of charge to said members) had notice of the purpose of the Bill.

(2) Section 12 of the Bill provides that the supreme court of the society shall in regular session accept the Bill or it does not become effective. The constitution provides that ninety days notice be given of the session of the supreme court. The call for the session together with an explanation of the business to be transacted is published in the official journal which is sent free or charge to every member.

(3) The steps that will be taken if the Bill is enacted by Parliament are as follows:—

(a) The Bill with explanations and the call for the session will be published in the official journal in the months of May and June.

(b) In June and July the subordinate courts (in which the members assemble) elect their delegates to the intermediate body—the high court.

(c) In July and August the high courts (composed of the delegates of the subordinate courts meet and elect representatives in the supreme court.

(d) In September the supreme court composed of these elected representatives meets, and after deliberation decide on acceptance or non-acceptance.

Thus the members will be fully informed at the time they select their delegates.

That seems to be as thorough a way as could be devised, by which the members can be consulted. This is a purely democratic organization; it is mutual, there are no profits except those that accrue from the members themselves, and they have to give and take among themselves. This method which I have read is the method prescribed by the constitution and by-laws of the society, and it is in strict accordance with these by-laws and this constitution that the proceedings are to be taken. If the supreme court of the order, who are a thoroughly representative body, do not approve of this Bill, they will not accept it. Doubtless when the different courts are elected as they will be before this vote is taken, they will be instructed whether to accept or decline this legislation, and in that democratic manner each member will have an opportunity of expressing his opinion as to this Bill. The other point mentioned by the hon. gentleman is as to the change of this society from a fraternal or benefit to an ordinary life insurance company. That is not quite so. This society in order to continue doing business in some twenty states of the American union at the present time, will have to be put upon a reserve basis in or before the year 1917, and unless it is on that reserve basis at that time, it will have to discontinue business in these states. A large number of other states in the union, which have not yet adopted what is called the Mobile law, are taking steps to pass it, and the result will be that by the year 1917, unless the society can qualify to do business on the reserve basis in the United States, it will practically have to withdraw from that country. Furthermore, even if they did not intend to do business in the United States, owing to their own business requirements, they find it absolutely necessary to be put on the reserve basis, if they are to continue to insure as they have been in the habit of doing. In order to go on the reserve basis they have to come within the jurisdiction of the Insurance Department and under the Insurance Act. Their chief reason for asking for this legislation is to become an insurance company under the Insurance Act and have their fraternal and benevolent features retained. Those who have administered the affairs of this society successfully for many years have recommended this and it is for the members to accept it or not as they please. In the committee the chief ranger and his counsel appeared and the matter was thoroughly discussed. I am informed the Insurance Department has gone closely into the matter and approved of this legislation.

Mr. BELAND: Has not this order been under the inspection of the Government Insurance Department for a number of years?

Mr. MACDONELL: As a fraternal society I should think so, but not as a straight insurance company.

Mr. BELAND: Is the head office still in Canada?

Mr. MACDONELL: In Toronto.

Mr. BELAND: What is the membership?

Mr. MACDONELL: Two hundred and forty-three thousand members, and each member is a policy-holder. Of that 243,000 members 133,000 are living in the United States and it becomes of very great importance to this society that it should not be excluded from operating in the United States.

Mr. BELAND: Is there anything in the Bill affecting the rates?

Mr. MACDONELL: No.

Mr. ROBB: What effect will clause 5 in the schedule have on clause 12 of the Bill? I refer to page 7, where it says:

In the event of the said supreme court failing to adopt——

Mr MACDONELL: That is part of section 4 of the schedule; that is not section 5. It is simply a technical definition of that class of insurance business.

Mr. BARKER: I was on the committee when this Bill was under consideration. Notice of it had been given in the usual way. The Minister of Finance informed us that the whole Bill had been before the officers of the Insurance Department and had been considered very carefully. The counsel of the society, Mr. Hunter, appeared before the committee and gave full explanations. One or two gentlemen there discussed the matter and seemed greatly interested in it. After hearing the discussion, the committee were satisfied that this was in the interest of everybody connected with the Forester's society; but it is all subject to a vote at a meeting to be called within six months. If a majority of the whole body cannot be satisfied that this is right, it will fall to the ground.

Mr. MACDONELL: Two-thirds.

Mr. BARKER: Why did this gentleman, whoever he is, not appear before the committee where everything was fully discussed and explained. If some single member of a society composed of three or four hundred thousand people could appear here through an hon. member at the last moment, and object after the Bill had gone through its first and second readings, through the Banking Committee and then come back here, no Bill whatever could be carried through this Parliament. If anything is wrong, as the hon. gentleman mentions, the Bill has still to go through the Senate and the Senate Committee. Let them go there and point out anything that is wrong. This Bill does not change the order at all.

Mr. MORPHY: With regard to section 12 of the Bill:

Notwithstanding anything in the existing constitution and laws of the society, the supreme court of the society may meet in regular session within six months from the date of the passing of this Act.

The point that occurs to me is that the supreme court may meet within two weeks or two months after the passing of the Act. The section is very broad. It may meet with or without notice to what is know as subordinate courts of the order. Where a sweeping measure of this kind is being put forward in this House, which will have the effect of altering to some extent the policies or the beneficiary certificates of a great many members of this large and widespread fraternal organization there should be in this Bill a clause which would compel the High Court or members of the supreme court of the order to send to every subordinate court throughout the length and breadth of its jurisdiction a notice saying when the supreme court meeting would be held and also that this Act would be taken up on the date mentioned, so as to give the individual, whose policy will be more or less affected, the right, free from the control of any person, in his own local court, to discuss all the bearings of this Act as it affects him. There may or there may not be a reason for this objection. I am a member of the order, holding office in it. I am not a member of the Private Bills Committee and have been only incidentally attracted to the Bill as it has come up in the House. I would suggest with all courtesy to the hon. member, who is promoting the Bill, either that he should consider the insertion of a clause that the usual rules for calling meetings to discuss questions of this kind in local courts shall be provided for in this Bill, or that the Bill itself should contain a clause that notice should be given to every subordinate court before it meets to elect delegates to the supreme court where this matter will be finally decided. In that way the local court can instruct its delegates how to act in regard to this Bill when it comes up for discussion in either the supreme court or the High Court.

Mr. AMES: Does not section 12 provide that this can only be dealt with by the society at a regular session and does not section 3 state that the constitution and by-laws of the society which were in force in 1909 shall still remain in force? Those by-laws of the society provide the manner in which the society shall be convened in regular session. Consequently all the formalities as to notice which already exist in the by-laws will be preserved in this particular case.

Mr. MORPHY: Does the Bill say so?

Mr. AMES: The Bill distinctly states that the constitution and by-laws of the society, as in force in January, 1909, shall remain in force; consequently, as this is to be a regular session of the society, it is to be convened in conformity with its by-laws.

Mr. BARKER: The hon. gentleman does not understand the point I make. The doubt I have is as to what the constitution and by-laws provide, not as to what the statute provides.

Mr. AMES: That is on record.

Mr. MORPHY: But I have not it before me.

Mr. MACDONELL: Perhaps the hon. gentleman will allow us to proceed with the Bill until we reach that clause.

On the schedule:

Mr. GUTHRIE: I do not see anything in the Bill to provide that the schedule is made part of the Act.

Mr. MACDONELL: I propose to move an amendment to the schedule. It was suggested when the matter was before the committee on the last occasion. The objection was that this Bill might interfere with contracts as it stood at the present time, and that vested rights that individuals hold in their certificates of membership might be interfered with to the detriment of the members. That was apparently not the intention of this Bill; but, in order to make it emphatic, I am prepared to ask the committee to add a clause to the schedule. This amendment has been submitted to the Insurance Department for the purpose of making sure that the amendment will cover these cases and will protect the present status of all policy holders or contract holders, and the Insurance Department passed upon this amendment, which is as follows:

Notwithstanding anything in this schedule contained, when the event insured against in any certificate or policy happened prior to the first day of July 1911, the rights of the members shall be as set forth in the constitution and by-laws of the society filed in the office of the superintendent of insurance on the 26th day of January 1909——

That is regarding the earlier group, and when the event insured against in any certificate or policy has happened or shall happen between the said first day of July, 1911,

And the first day of October, 1913, the rights of the members shall be as set forth in the existing constitution and laws of the society defined in section 3 of this Act.

That is the day intended when this Bill shall take effect.

The by-laws and constitution were changed in July, 1911, and the first part of this amendment will cover all those cases up to that time. And all cases since then will be covered by the subsequent part of this amendment, which provides that the existing contracts and laws of the society shall be applied to the subsequent contracts or the present group.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I am not familiar with the by-laws and constitution of the order, but I have received the assurance from the Supreme Chief Ranger of the order and from the solicitor, as well as the assurance given by my hon. friend from South Toronto, that the amendment does cover the cases referred to on Friday night last, namely, that those people who now hold matured or paid-up policies will be protected from any subsequent call or further assessment. Upon that understanding I am quite willing to consent to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN: It seems to me that the amendment is quite important, and falls under rule 112, which requires a day's notice. Perhaps it might stand as a notice.

Mr. MACDONELL: With the consent of the House, Mr. Chairman.

Amendment agreed to.

Bill reported.

CANADA NORTHWEST LOAN AND MORTGAGE COMPANY.

On motion for second reading of amendments made by the Senate to Bill No. 29, to incorporate the Canada Northwest Loan and Mortgage Company.—Mr. Meighen.

Mr. AMES: The amendments consist merely in striking out clause 21, which deprives the company of the right to do business through foreign agencies, and striking out from clause 22, the words ' or possessed of property suitable for the purposes of the company.'

Mr. MEIGHEN: A discussion took place in the committee as to whether or not clause 21 should be retained, and there were some who thought that the part reinserted should take the place of that clause. The Senate committee first of all passed it, it was afterwards passed by the Banking and Commerce Committee of the House, and I believe, without notifying those interested in the Bill, the Senate committee wiped out clause 21 and inserted the substitute. At this stage of the session I feel that it would be in the best interests of the Bill itself and of all concerned, if the Senate amendment were accepted and not referred back to the committee.

Mr. GRAHAM: I imagine that this could hardly be considered a minor amendment. Even if it be taking away powers, the amendment might be very important, just as much so as if it were adding powers. If the promoter of the Bill is satisfied to have it so, I presume the question as to whether or not the amendment is of major or minor importance could be waived, but it would not be a very good precedent to lay down that because we are merely depriving the company of powers conferred by the amendment is a minor one. It might be an amendment that would destroy the whole scope of the Bill.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The effect of the amendment is this: Section 21 enables the company to make sales of stock in other countries, to effect registrations of those sales, and to establish offices there for that purpose. There was another clause appended to section 16, which enables the company to open offices in other countries, but not to effect registrations. In any event, there must be a complete registration at the head office, so the hon. gentleman will see that there is nothing very vital at stake—it is merely a matter of the reduction of power.

Mr. EMMERSON: What is the meaning of the amendment to section 22—'or possessed of property suitable for the purposes of the company.'

Mr. MEIGHEN: The committee will see that as the clause did read, the company incorporated could take over the entire assets and undertake the whole of the business of any other company. The only restriction on the class of company which might be taken over is that is be possessed of property suitable for the purposes of the company. Evidently the Senate thought that almost any company at all might qualify under that, and, as a consequence, they struck out that provision. If the company were able to take over any other company merely possessed of properties suitable for the purposes of this company, it would practically wipe out restriction, as almost all companies would be so possessed.

Amendments read the second time, and agreed to.

NAVAL FORCES OF THE EMPIRE.

House again in Committee on Bill No. 21, to authorize measures for increasing the effective Naval Forces of the Empire.—Mr. Borden. (Mr. Deputy Speaker in the Chair).

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer): Mr. Chairman, in the few minutes that I require to finish what I have to say to the committee at this time, I should like to make one more appeal to the Government, though I am bound to say, Sir, that the Government have not given the attention to my appeals which I think it would have paid them to give. What a difference it would have made to us on a recent Saturday, if the Government had listened to the appeal which I tried to make to them on the afternoon of that day. I pointed out that the health of members was suffering to such an extent that no careful man could prophesy without fear of being wrong what would happen if we went into an evening sitting, and I argued that we ought to rise to prevent things from happening. Well, the Government would not listen to me, and the things happened. If that Saturday evening had not found us in Parliament, the history of Canada would have been different. The only statesmanlike thing that this Government can do is to withdraw this measure; that is the only statesmanlike course before them. I want to appeal to them once more along that line, and I do so, reinforced by the kind of defence that was put up this afternoon on behalf of the measure by my hon. friend the Minister of Finance. I have already dealt very largely with what he said, but there are one or two points that will bear repetition and I invite the special attention of the committee and of my friends opposite to this point. My hon. friend the Minister of Finance had not been on his feet for five minutes when he produced a profound impression upon the benches opposite, and how did he produce that impression? By reading a document. He read words and attributed them to Mr. Churchill, words which Mr. Churchill never uttered, which anyone who knew anything about English statesmen or anyone who knew anything about this question, knew he could not have uttered. I had read the cabled communication which misled my hon. friend the Minister of Finance, and the moment I read it, being comparatively an experienced parliamentarian, I knew at once that it was a garbled thing, and that Mr. Churchill could never have said what was attributed to him. But my hon. friend read it, and produced a profound impression upon the benches opposite by reading it. No applause so hearty was evoked by him in the course of his speech as was evoked by his quoting words of Mr. Winston Churchill which Mr. Churchill never uttered.

Mr. WHITE (Minister of Finance): I understand my hon. friend read from a newspaper, the London Daily News and Leader of March 27?

Mr. CLARK: I did.

Mr. WHITE: The speech of the Right Hon. Winston Churchill to which I referred was of date March 31. I have here in my hand a cabled despatch of the words of the Right Hon. Winston Churchill on that occasion, and they are what I read to the House this afternoon. I do not want to take up the time of the committee. My hon. friend is fair; he said this afternoon that if Mr. Churchill had said what I quoted, I would have produced a very strong argument for changing his opinion and for asking the House to change its opinion. Now I have this cabled report from the Colonial Office:

> Both these views seem to me to be equally wrong and equally harmful to our interests, and I must repeat that the Canadian ships are absolutely necessary for the whole world defence of the British Empire from the end of 1915 or from the beginning of 1916, onwards.

Mr. MURPHY: To whom is the cable addressed?

Mr. WHITE: To the Right Hon. R. L. Borden.

Mr. CLARK: The words which my hon. friend has just read are not the words he used this afternoon. I do not know what is the authenticity of this cablegram, any more than I know what was the authenticity of the previous cablegram, but I am bound to say that I shall be very much surprised if Mr. Churchill ever used those words, because they would be an impeachment of himself, and a contradiction of everything that has been said by every other British minister. If Mr. Winston Churchill contradicted everything that has been said by his own Cabinet and by himself for the last three years, then I shall put the speeches of the whole of the Cabinet against that statement, even supposing it was uttered. But I shall want further confirmation of those words before I believe that he ever said that those ships are absolutely necessary. The quotation this afternoon was, of course, from a cablegram which I believe, was garbled for the purpose, and which was sent if I am not mistaken, by 'Windermere.' However, I can make my appeal to the Government just as strongly by leaving that point in abeyance. My hon. friend did not know this afternoon that Mr. Churchill said these things and he did not trust his own cablegram. He based his case upon words the truth of which he did not know this afternoon; he only believes in their truth now, and no hon. member sitting behind him believed in the truth of the words, but they were all ready to applaud him, and they gave him the most vociferous applause he got in the course of his remarks. The point I wish to make is this, and this is where I make my appeal: are the Government, some of whose members I see sitting opposite me, and their followers in a position to come to this House and threaten hon. members on this side of the House with closure to put through a measure the supports of which they know as little as they have demonstrated this afternoon? The threat of closure for the purpose of putting through that measure in view of their absolute ignorance of the things that have been said by Winston Churchill is a reason why they should never mention closure any more, and why they should withdraw the measure from Parliament until they know more about it.

The second reason in my hon. friend's speech, upon which I base this appeal, is that a measure that needs to be supported by an argument such as my hon. friend the Minister of Finance presented to us in regard to the chilling of the British investor, is damned by that argument. Is this the strength of my hon. friend's case? It is an argument that is not true. The investor would not be chilled if we did not get our ships built in Britain. The proof is very easy of demonstration, and ought to be present to the mind of the minister who is responsible for the ordering of the finances of this country. It is true that Britain has two billion dollars invested in Canada, but she has three billion dollars invested in the United States. Will my hon. friend the Minister of Finance argue that these three billion dollars are invested in the United States because the United States get their ships built in Britain? Then what becomes of his argument as applied to Canada? He knows about investments; he does not believe in the strength of his own argument. Does he not know that men invest money in this country because of the interest they get on it? Of course he does. That is what leads British investors to put their money into Canada. It is a matter of business. They send it to the Argentine, to the United States, to Canada and all over the world, because these are the best places for investment. But I wonder what the people of Great Britain will say when they know that the Finance Minister of Canada has been so reduced in his attempt to defend this crude, ill-considered and impossible measure, as to present to this House the argument that we ought to pass it, forsooth, because we shall give a little order for shipbuilding to England and we shall induce Britishers to come and invest their money in Canada. I wonder what the British investor, the British citizen, will think of the party that claims that they are the sole representatives in Canada of loyalty and high imperialism when they want to argue that the Dominion of Canada would only be ordering these paltry ships, forsooth, to buy the larger investment of British capital. Never let them charge my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) with disloyalty, never let them find the words 'loyalty' and 'imperialism' upon their lips until they have purged themselves of, and disavowed any connection whatsoever with, this debasing argument.

If my hon. friend wants to induce British investments in this country in a proper manner I will tell him how to do it—extend the markets of the western farmer. That is how my right hon. leader induced prosperity, that is how my right hon. leader induced immigrants and investments to come upon which, according to my hon. friend the Minister of Finance, the prosperity of Canada depends at the present time. He introduced the British preference; he did not talk loyalty, he showed it. He gave the Britisher the advantage in this country. The British preference was like the grease on the wheels of a rusty and slowing-down machine; the Britishers came to sell here, we sold to Great Britain, and Canada was advertised by this wise, economic policy in Great Britain. The result was that the British immigrant came, then the British investor came, and then prosperity came.

I want to enforce this argument by a reference to another aspect of the case. I have been taken to task by certain western newspapers supporting, of course, my hon. friends opposite, because I had ventured to tell this committee at a previous stage in this discussion the truth about western conditions as a reason why we should be cautious about sending out of this country $35,000,000 which will not be of any use to the industries of Canada. I do not know that a man should be too heavily criticised for telling the truth. I have always thought that telling lies was a thing that a man should be criticised for. But I want to enforce my appeal to the Government to pause and rest a little upon this measure. The Calgary Eye Opener is a strong supporter of my hon. friends opposite, and the Calgary Eye Opener is a paper upon which the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Rogers) relies very heavily because it has been foremost amongst the journals which have produced the side-splitting laughter to which he referred last evening about the supposed insignificance of the Niobe and the Rainbow. The Calgary Eye Opener, in a recent issue, had something to say about the present economic conditions of western Canada and this is what it had to say:

The farmers of Alberta owe the machine companies $20,000,000 at the present time.

That is a pretty serious state of affairs, Mr. Chairman. I take that information to be authentic, even appearing in the Eye Opener, because it was written in favour of the machine men and against the legislation which had been passed in the Alberta legislature in favour of the farmer as against the machine men. The writer was defending the corporations upon whose support my hon. friends opposite depend. They are all in league, they are all Imperialists—the Manufacturers' Association, the Eye Opener and the Government. That is the combination we are up against, that is the combination that wants to run Canada into close association with the Malay Archipelago and the Gibraltar rock. That is what the Calgary Eye Opener says is the present condition of western Canada and I want my hon. friends to pay attention to that. I want my hon. friend the Minister of Finance to base his fiscal policy upon that. I want him to consider that corpse of reciprocity that he has been rejoicing over so much. I do not think it is nearly so much a corpse as these three dreadnoughts are. I have my own opinion about which is the deader, and I have an opinion that in a few weeks there will be more talk about reciprocity than there will be about the Malay Archipelago-Canadian affair. I had a letter a short time ago from a friend in Stettler who tells me that every working day for some weeks within a radius of twenty-five miles of that town there has been a sale. Men are selling out and leaving the country.

Mr. LALOR: Made their fortunes, I suppose.

Mr. CLARK: No, my hon. friend who is a manufacturer takes very good care that the farmers do not make their fortunes. He makes his fortune out of the farmers. They are selling out because they cannot market the stuff they raise and the conditions are not allowing them to stay in the country. This was an intelligent man who wrote that letter and he says that they are going back to the United States where they came from.

Mr. LALOR: Wilson is fixing that up for them.

Mr. CLARK: Yes, my hon. friend rejoices that they are to have a fraction of reciprocity apparently. He is one of the hon. gentlemen who objected strenuously to the whole thing, but he likes a fraction of it. I do not understand the mind of my hon. friend. My corespondent went on to say that he would go back next year unless the conditions improved. Incidentally he wrote strongly disapproving of the gift of this money, if it is a gift. I do not know what to call it; you cannot dignify it by that name. It is really like the state of the world before the Creator had gone very far with it; that is, it is without form and void. It is neither a contribution, nor a permanent policy, but whatever it is, the thing is without form and void that we are asked to invest $35,000,000 upon. This will be one of the most foolish investments made by a Canadian or anyone else. This is no time to send $35,000,000 out of Canada to be invested in a way that will not bring one cent of advantage to the people of Canada. While a handful of eastern manufacturers are becoming millionaires, the western farmers are faced with falling land values and the general symptoms of commercial depression. If the hon. Minister of Finance would look into the condition of business at home, instead of going to the ends of the world to seek this nautical marriage with the people of the Malay States, he would do more good to Canada and the British Empire. It is in that way that he will attract British capital. Increase the markets of the farmer and increase the production of wealth within the limits of your own country. Then you will attract capital, you will attract inhabitants and you will increase the prosperity of the country. These are two points in the speech of my hon. friend and his third point around which really the whole of his argument, in so far as we can dignify it by that name, revolves, was that the policy of the Government is more effective, that it is in an effective policy. On this point the Minister of Finance joined with the Minister of Public Works. That is the latest argument we have to deal with. I want to understand the policy of the Government; I want to understand the argument by which it is supported. They tell us we do not give them light; it is not for us to give them light, but we do punch holes in their argument until they get Mr. Winston Churchill to make a speech and explain their policy to them and to us. I think it is capable of almost exact proof that their policy is the most absolutely ineffective thing that ever the human intellect was called to examine. Is it the Government's idea of effectiveness to send empty ships to Britain or the money to build empty ships? Australia does not do that; why should Canada? Australia is building her own navy and manning it; why should Canada take the opposite plan? Will the British people form a high idea of Canadian ability or of Canadian courage; will they not make unfavourable comparisons between Canada and Australia as the result of this policy. It is a thousand to one that the British people will think more of Australia. I have seen the Australians in their flannels compete on the cricket field with their brethren of England, and were they not brethren and friends on the cricket field, and when the British people know that the Australians are building their own ships, however small the beginning, and that they are manning them, will they not say that these are true sons of Britain? It is, I say, a thousand to one they will think more of Australia than they will of Canada. Where does the effectiveness of which the Minister of Finance spoke, come in? He tells us Britain is weakening on the sea; he said in as many words that Britain is not as strong relatively as she used to be. If that be the case, every Canadian wants to take the road which will strengthen Britain. I am going to prove to the Minister of Finance, as clearly as a sum in arithmetic can be demonstrated, that he cannot strengthen Britain by the course he is taking. In the British naval estimates upon which our last understanding of the Government's policy is based, it is pointed out that at the present time the ship-building resources of Britain are so taxed that they do not permit of a larger constructional programme. I ask the Minister of Finance what is the meaning of that language? The meaning of that language, and it admits of no other interpretation, is, that in Britain at the present moment, under their own programme, they are constructing every ship that they possibly can cram into the shipyards of Great Britain? I want to ask the Minister of Finance, who is so sure of the effectiveness of his policy, where is he going to get his three ships built? He says in Britain, but the Admiralty says he cannot get them built there, and therefore his policy is to vote $35,000,000 to build ships in Great Britain which he cannot get built in Great Britain. That is the effective policy of hon. gentlemen opposite. I think I have demonstrated this to the satisfaction of the Minister of Finance; he is quite thoughtful, he does not interrupt me at this moment.

Mr. WHITE: I never do.

Mr. CLARK: Where will you get your ships built? Where is your effectiveness in the building of the ships. Let me read the words again:

> It is also pointed out that at the present moment the ship-building resources of England are so taxed they do not permit of a larger constructional programme.

What is the duty of Canada in these circumstances? Is it to laugh at the Niobe and the Rainbow; is it to laugh at the idea of beginning construction here; is it not to play the part of men?—are we sons of Britain—and begin, however humbly, just as Australia has begun and help the Mother Country out of her difficulty. The Minister of Finance says Britain is getting weaker, but the Admiralty says the British shipyards are doing all they can in the way of ship-building in their own programme and Canada wants to send this money over to England, for what purpose, I do not know, unless there is a rake-off in it.

There is another question which crops up, and that is, how are you going to man the ships. We are told they are not to be manned with Canadians; Canadians are ruled out, and, can we get the men in Britain? I quote from last month's National Review, and Imperialist organ; a jingo organ if you like:

> We have battleships enough to fulfil present requirements.

That does not seem a very good reason for Canada building three more.

> We have battleships enought to fulfil present requirements, but unfortunately these vessels happen to be empty.

So it would appear that Britain has plenty of empty ships already, because she cannot man them, and this effective policy of the Canadian Government is to send her more empty ships. If that is the Finance Minister's idea of effectiveness, I hope he will not construct any more policies, and I think I have given him good reason to call a serious council to-morrow morning before we get into all night sittings over closure or anything else, and to solve that little problem with the people of the country as to where he can get his ships constructed and how he will get them manned, after he has constructed them.

I stand absolutely on the policy of my right hon. leader to begin in Canada as soon as possible—and you cannot begin anywhere else, for you cannot begin in Britain —to construct a Canadian navy. The Minister of Finance told me this afternoon that I was following a policy of peace; that I stood alone; that I wanted to begin in a small way, but I think in what I have said I have furnished him reasonable ground for believing that I am one of the few sane men in the Parliament of Canada. I have given strong reasons why we should begin in a small way; if Britain has all the ships she wants and she cannot man the ships she has, in the name of common sense what becomes of the policy of the Government? As to where the Malays come in, that will be next century. The flying squadron that will never fly, under this policy of the Canadian Government.

I want to say a word or two on what is really a vital question before the country and this House, and I believe my right hon. leader summed that up absolutely when he said it was a question between centralization and expansion. That is what we have to decide. On what basis are we to build up the British Empire? Is it on the basis of a commonwealth of free nations such as we have regarded it for the last seventy years, or are we to go back to a policy of centralization? I want to call the attention of the Finance Minister to the fact that what Mr. Winston Churchill has always emphasized is the willingness of Canadians to help. That is the great thing the British Government wants and that is the great thing the British people want; they want an effective policy and they have said all along that what they want is our moral support. Mr. Churchill emphasizes the fact of Canadian willingness to help and he deprecates too much insistence on methods. He said in effect: the two parties are not very far apart, and he says something that makes one think that in the bottom of his mind he has a hankering for a Canadian naval service because he referred to my distinguished leader as 'that far-seeing Imperial statesman, Sir Wilfrid Laurier.' By the way this reference was in the early reports carefully kept out of the Tory newspapers, I do not know that cutting it out very much shortened the far-sightedness of my right hon. friend. I think the right hon. the leader of the Opposition has seen further in this matter than hon. gentlemen opposite have from the very beginning. It would look very much like it when we consider the condition of the British shipyards and the condition of the manning resources of the British Admiralty at the present time. He says: Do not put too much insistence upon method. From Mr. Churchill's point of view, that is all right. His is a British point of view. I want to point that out to my hon. friend the Minister of Finance. From the Canadian point of view, from the point of view of Canadian self-government, Canadian self-reliance and Canadian development, method is all-important; and the method that we have followed for the last seventy years has been the method of whatever we did having the distinctive Canadian marks upon it. When we go on to the sea, we should go there as Canadians. That is why we stand by our policy of a distinctive Canadian naval service as opposed to flying squadrons anywhere. Method is all-important from that point of view. I think my hon. friends of the Government are coming to hold this view, in spite of themselves. If they take their minds off closure, force, and all-night sittings and just study this question for a little, I think they will get the correct solution.

This was perhaps the most noticeable thing in the speech of my hon. friend the Prime Minister and also in the speech of my hon. friend the Minister of Finance. I want to call the attention of the committee and of hon. gentlemen opposite to it. The Prime Minister yesterday was very vehement in his repudiation of the idea of permanent contributions. Indeed, his vehemence carried him the length of saying that this was not a contribution. My hon. friend the Minister of Finance was almost equally vehement against the idea of permanent contributions althought he did not go the length of saying that this was not a contribution. The Prime Minister and my hon. friend the Minister of Finance were equally vehement in their disavowal of the statement that this was not a departure from a policy of a Canadian navy. I do not think I misrepresent my hon. friend; I am certain I do not misrepresent the Prime Minister. They will not be misrepresented as saying that they have in any way given up the idea of a Canadian navy. They did not want it to be stated that this is the first of a series of contributions. If that is so, this contribution stands in magnificent loneliness, in splendid isolation. Is this the policy that is to be effective, a solitary flying squadron, probably among Mongolians, with Canadian names on three of the ships. This is the idea which my hon. friend has of effectiveness. That, however, is not the point that I wish to make. They say in effect: You are going to have a Canadian navy. They see that Canada must develop. Now Imperial federation is very rapidly flying to the winds in the sense of concentrated defence under the contol of the British Admiralty. I have been trying to put a fair argument up to my hon. friends and to the Cabinet, because we have bought enough pigs in a poke. We want to know what this policy is. If we believe in a Canadian navy, what about concentration in matters of defence, and where does Imperial federation come in? Imperial federation has two ends, tariff reform and defence. Tariff reform is as dead as Julius Cæsar in England to-day. Everybody knows that, who knows anything. Colonel Weston in Westmorland the other day won an election by throwing over tariff reform and running as a Unionist free trader. He won the election in spite of the tariff reformers. The people are against it. The trade end is gone. The defence end is going. My hon. friend the Minister of Finance will not have it said that he is not for a Canadian navy. What is he for? As I say that, he gets an angry look on his face, as near as he can get to looking angry. If he will not have it said that he is not for a Canadian navy, will he allow me to say that he is for a Canadian navy? He stays by the flying squadron. Why, he does not know whether he is for a Canadian navy or not. This is the party that is going to put this Bill through by closure. I hope my hon. friend will instrust someone to tell us where the Government stands in this matter. The Prime Minister says that this is not the first of a series of contributions. My hon. friend follows that argument and says that this is not the first of a series of contributions. The Prime Minister says: I have never said that I was not in favour of a Canadian navy. Well, he said something awfully like it, in one of his speeches, but I am glad to have him where he is now. He asked us a question in one of his speeches this winter, saying: Are we to have five navies? Well, Australia immediately says, we shall have one anyhow; and one of these days Canada will say we shall have another. My point is this: when he asked that question, what was the House to infer from it? If the question had any meaning, it meant that at that time the mind of the Prime Minister was on concentration for purposes of Armageddon and other purposes. But now that Armageddon and the emergency have all gone into the skies, now that the North sea has been deserted, now that the flying squadron has been called to Gibraltar Rock, they know that this policy will not go; they know that the people are laughing. Hon. gentlemen opposite laughed at the Rainbow and the Niobe; the laughter that has taken place at the expense of the Rainbow and the Niobe will be a mere smile in comparison with the laughter which this flying squadron is going to create. They know that the flying squadron will not go with the Canadian people. Imperial federation seems to me to be more of a dream than ever it was. I heard my right hon. friend and leader (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) say yesterday: It is a magnificent idea. I hate to contradict my leader but I like an idea that can be put into practice. Edmund Burke said it was a magnificent idea a century and a quarter ago. You cannot do anything for defence or anything else with a magnificent idea. What you want is something which can be put into practice. Imperial federation never looked thinner than it does at the present moment. My right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) is all right. He is a Frenchman; his temperament is French; he likes an idea. He added, however, an 'if,' he said: 'If it can only be put into practice.' The moment you try to put it into practice, Australia sheers off and will not have anything to do with it. So does New Zealand. The only people who will have anything to do with Imperial federation are the Sultan of Perak and the Sultan of Manitoba. I have tried to bring the argument to this point with a view of emphasizing this further appeal to the Government that it should defer this matter and at the last moment follow statesmanlike lines and take this thing out of the way. I ventured last night, in an interjection, to call it a corpse. You cannot keep your corpses around too long. Take it away. Give it a decent burial. There is nothing in the idea. Let Canada get down to developing Canada. There are only two ways, as my hon. friend from Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) pointed out last night, of looking at the British Empire. I may be pardoned by this committee for a reference which may appear egotistical; but I had a letter from an old Northumbrian, who happens to be my father. He is eighty-three years of age, but still walks his four miles every day. He says, Churchill has been a little rash in this business. My father is a good supporter of the Asquith government too. He says, you must entirely and absolutely have a navy of your own in Canada, because one of these days Canada will become a greater country than England. There are some people in England who have a proper idea of Canada. I shall have to tell the man to go and see Churchill. You must absolutely have a navy of your own, but loyal to the British flag. And there are millions of Englishmen and Irishmen and Scotchmen who are saying the same thing, who want you to to this thing in the right way. Does any man in his senses suppose that this country can for a long time—I do not see why I should argue this point with the Government, because they have given it up—be kept in leading strings to Downing Street? It is unthinkable—absolutely unthinkable. Australia has cut loose from that, and we have to get away from it; and the time is now. My hon. friend will not say he is not in favour of a Canadian navy; I believe in his heart he knows that it has to come, for this is a great nation. And we are the people who have to build it. If these gentlemen on the other side will not do it, we will get over on that side, and we will do it. It is unthinkable that a country of the size and resources of Canada can be kept long, or can be put again into leading strings to Downing Street. And what is the other ideal? The other ideal is to have centres of defence in every portion of the world; it is to begin with your Canadian navy. And, if you are going to have a navy, if you are never going to repeat the contribution, why give the first one? Thirty-five millions of dollars would make a magnificent start on our proper line of development. Let us start now; let us go back to the united condition in which we were in 1909. Then we shall be able to get about the proper business of this Parliament in looking after Canada, and we shall be able to wind up this session very quickly. Our plea here is for a united Canada; and you can have a united Canada by going back to the resolution of 1909. Our plea is for a united and free Canada. And our plea is equally for a free and united Empire, an Empire united because it is free, for the yoke of freedom is both light and easy. There will be no more glorious story written in history than that of the island heart of this Empire. Occupying but half the area of my province of Alberta, the United Kingdom last year built sixty-two per cent of the shipping of the entire globe. Her eye is undimmed, her natural strength is unabated. Her ships sail every sea and bear everywhere the message of freedom. And it would be our glorious privilege in Canada if we could rise to the height of that privilege, and to the true thought of our destiny, to set the seal upon a policy which will lead the outlying portions of the Empire in endeavouring to give to the world the knowledge that in the coming years the pride and joy of the Old Land will be found, in fact that in every portion of the globe there are growing up daughter nations with her strength of character, with her quality of self-reliance, with her determination to share in the great work of the world's civilization.

> She sailed wherever ships could sail,
> She founded many a mighty state;
> Heaven grant her greatness may not fail
> Through craven fear of being great.

Mr. F. B. CARVELL (Carleton, N. B.): I am surprised, Mr. Chairman, that the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Hazen) can allow such an appeal to his patriotism to pass unnoticed as that to which he has listened for the last three-quarters of an hour from my hon. friend from Red Deer. It is a most remarkable thing that the hon. gentleman, who next to the Prime Minister, is responsible for this monstrous proposition which is being put forward, has not the nerve—if I may use no stronger term—after six weeks of silence, to stand up and defend that proposition even for five minutes. I had hoped that at least he would try to defend that coal barge business of his in St. John for a few minutes. I thought he was going to give us some reasons, after all the discussions we have had, as to why at least a portion of this $35,000,000 should not be spent in Canada. He seems to have abandoned the Canadian idea; and so obsessed are these hon. gentlemen with the idea of getting this money out of this country, that after the abortive attempts of the Minister of Public Works yesterday, and the Minister of Finance this afternoon, the matter is entirely abandoned. I thought I saw signs of half a dozen gentlemen on the other side this afternoon having an ambition to throw some light on the subject, but evidently the word has gone forth, the gag has been applied again, and we are back in the same position as on the 15th of March.

Mr. GRAHAM: They have had closure for months over there.

Mr. CARVELL: Yes. When this debate started four months ago they gave their followers the right to discuss the matter. But those followers got in such a sorry plight that they commenced to abuse the Germans and talk everything else to such an extent that the right hon. Prime Minister put the gag on them. And after the speeches of yesterday and this afternoon we have had the gag tried again,—and I do not wonder at it; the Prime Minister would not know where these hon. gentlemen would lead him if he allowed them to talk on this question. But the speeches of the Minister of Public Works and the Minister of Finance to-day show the necessity of further discussion on this important matter. We had hoped, at the end of a very stormy sitting which terminated, I think on the 15th of March, that possibly further discussion would not be necessary, that our friends opposite would see the error of their way and withdraw their iniquitous proposition. But instead of that, we find that we have to start in all over again and discuss it probably to as great an extent as in the past. Fortunately, members on this side are not only willing but they have the ability to discuss this matter. While we cannot all discuss it with the eloquence of the hon. member for Red Deer, yet every member on this side has given some consideration to the subject, and I am sorry we cannot say the same thing about hon. members on the other side. When the Bill was introduced on the 5th of December, who forgets the setting that my right hon. friend gave it—the galleries filled with the feminine portion of the community, the seats filled with members, every newspaper in Canada with an advance copy of his speech ready to release on a telegram, every jingo newspaper in Great Britain with a copy of that speech, and every man on the other side instructed to sing God save the King as though the whole Empire had been on the verge of perdition and had only been saved by the proposition of my right hon. friend. And what do we find now? Only about a dozen of these hon. gentlemen can be induced to come and even listen to a discussion of the proposition. You could not get 'God save the King' out of the whole Tory party on this question. You find the Minister of Militia (Mr. Hughes) will no more than come in and look on. He became disgusted weeks ago. I do not blame him. He is a man who knows something about warlike affairs. He has had some experience. In discussing this Malay proposition, we must remember that there is no Canadian sailor or officer who will be mixed up with the Malays, because Canadians will not be allowed to go on board these vessels. As a matter of fact, they may recruit the whole flying squadron from the Malay peninsula, so it makes but little difference to the Canadians there. We do not care very much what hon. gentlemen opposite do with the squadron after they get the money; it is our business to see that they do not get it, and I can promise my hon. friend the Minister of Militia that there is not very much prospects of their getting the money. Hon. gentlemen opposite will find that the members of the Opposition know what they are talking about. It is all very well for them to talk about bringing in closure, but closure will not give them the money. As I have said, it is necessary to argue this matter further, and to discuss it in such a manner as to throw more light upon the question—and I am glad that there are a few hon. members on the other side who are perhaps anxious to get some light on the matter. When this question was first discussed in the month of December, the whole question hinged upon the existence of an alleged emergency. Those who listened to the well-staged speech of the right hon. gentleman, the speeches of the hon. member for Brantford (Mr. Cockshutt); the hon. member for Calgary (Mr. Bennett); and the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Aikins) could not but realize that emergency was the chief argument of hon. gentlemen opposite. My hon. friends say they did not talk emergency; what did they talk? The right hon. Prime Minister made use of the following words, which may be found on page 710 of 'Hansard':

> No one is more eager than myself for the development of ship-building industries in Canada, but we cannot, upon any business or economic considerations, begin with the construction of dreadnoughts; and especially we could not do so when these ships are urgently required within two or three years at the outside, for rendering aid upon which may depend the Empire's future existence.

He says we have to have these dreadnoughts in two or three years at the very outside, because the very existence of this Empire will depend on having these vessels —where? Not at Gibraltar, but in the North sea, where Armageddon comes in two or three years! I wonder what he meant in the words of his famous peroration on the 5th of December? I will read these words to my hon. friend the Minister of Militia, and see what interpretation he will place upon them:

> But to-day, while the clouds are heavy and we hear the booming of the distant thunder, and see the lightning flashes above the horizon, we cannot and we will not wait and deliberate until any impending storm shall have burst upon us in fury and with disaster. Almost unaided, the Motherland, not for herself alone, but for us as well, is sustaining the burden of a vital Imperial duty, and confronting an overmastering necessity of national existence. Bringing the best assistance that we may in the urgency of the moment, we came thus to her aid, in token of our determination to protect and ensure the safety and integrity of the Empire, and of our resolve to defend on sea as well as on land our flag, our honour, and our heritage.

Was there not an emergency then? Is there any ground, aside from that of emergency, upon which this statement of the 5th of December is based? I wish to quote just a few words from the speech of the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce, which appears on page 1415 of 'Hansard,' as it is indeed very interesting. The hon. minister attempts to tell what the right hon. the Prime Minister could not tell. He said that the Prime Minister had stated that when he became Premier he would consult the Admiralty and, if he found that an emergent condition existed, he would come back and propose a contribution, and if the Parliament of Canada did not grant that contribution, he would dissolve Parliament and appeal to the people. Here is what he said:

> I propose to go to Great Britain and ascertain, as nearly as I can, the exact state of affairs. If I find that there is a need or necessity, I will come back and ask this House for a money vote to meet that necessity; I will take up the question and will thoroughly look into it.

The hon. gentleman did go to England; he lived in the atmosphere of jingoes of that country, he was wined and dined by the ship-building concerns, he came back and said to the people: I have a certain amount of information, the most important part of which is necessarily confidential and must not be revealed to the public. In his own manner—and he has a manner which no other man in the House possesses—he assured the members of this House and the people that the condition was something terrible; that it was the bounden duty of this House to pass this Bill at once, and that the whole fabric of the British Empire depended on whether or not it was passed. He came back to this Parliament and laid before it all the proofs he could, and gave to the House his own conviction as leader of the Government. He could not lay more before the House, because it is not permitted; but let no man run away with the idea that the statistical statements contained in the memorandum of the Lords of the Admiralty which has been prepared for publication, was all, or even the most important part, of the information obtained. But, Sir, from the memorandum of the British Government, and from that deeper and more intimate source, he says to this House and to this country: There is a need, and it is pressing. I believe in giving the most effective aid in the face of that need, and I say to the people of my country I know the trust that is committed to me. I hold a little more than Canada's welfare in that trust; I hold some parts of the welfare of the Empire. Whatever men may say or whatever men may do, the destinies of Canada are absolutely and irrevocably bound up with the destinies of the Empire. On my knowledge as given to you, on my knowledge as possessed but which cannot be disclosed, in pursuance of the sacred trust of a privy councillor and the leader of the Government in my country, I ask Parliament to pass this vote.

These are the words of the hon. the Mininster of Trade and Commerce as put into the mouth of the right hon. the Prime Minister. Who could listen to these words without coming to the conclusion that the whole argument of the right hon. the Prime Minister in December last was not only that there was an emergency, but that the very existence of the British Empire depended upon the granting of this vote and the construction of these dreadnoughts in England within the next two or three years? What is the situation at the present time? The Minister of Finance this afternoon went so far as to say that he was opposed to permanent contributions. He would not say he was opposed to a Canadian navy, but after his statement regarding contributions he was like Mahomet's coffin; he is suspended between Heaven and earth, and it is hard to say whether he will go up or down —I would say he will come down! They talk about emergency. In speaking on this matter on a former occasion I referred to what had taken place in Germany, to a declaration of the policy laid down by Von Tirpitz in the Reichstag, that Germany had agreed that her shipbuilding in the future should be limited to ten capital ships as compared with sixteen capital ships for Britain. I am not going over that again, because it is well known to every member in this House, and I presume to every newspaper reader in the country. But there are other cogent reasons which might be advanced to show the absolute nonsense of this emergency talk. In the first place the position of Britain in relation to the other nations of the world was probably never more favourable or more friendly than it is to-day. In the trouble which has taken place in Europe during the last six months, Britain and Germany, the two nations which have been talked about for the last two years as being bitter enemies, have proved the peacemakers of Europe. I have no hesitation in saying that but for the cordial co-operation of Britain and Germany, war would have burst all over Europe, and would not have been confined to the Balkan States and Turkey. Those two peoples, about whom so much has been talked, have proved to be the principal factors for peace in the European situation to-day, and those two peoples, who have no trouble in arranging matters between themselves, have practically agreed that it will be a satisfactory arrangement if Britain builds at the ratio of sixteen capital ships to Germany's ten. I wish to point out to the committee something which I think has not been brought to the attention of the House as to the absolute absurdity of this emergency talk. No man talks emergency except in relation to Germany. The only suggestion put forward as to any possible trouble is in regard to Germany, and for a few moments I wish to compare very briefly the condition of the British navy with the German navy. It has been said by the hon. Minister of Finance this afternoon, that for years it was the proud boast of the British Admiralty that they were able to maintain a two to one standard, but that they had now fallen far below that standard, and had got down to a sixteen-ten standard. I tell the hon. Minister of Finance that that is not so. You have only to go to the records to find that the British navy is in as predominant a position to-day as ever it was, so far as the two to one standard is concerned. I make the statement without fear of successful contradiction that the British navy stands to-day equal to any two navies on the face of the globe. I have not time to go into all the details, and it might not be interesting to the committee to give them, but I wish to give some facts from Burgoyne's Navy League Annual for the years 1912-13, as to the condition of the two navies, a text book which is recognized all over the English speaking world as an authority on naval matters, and one which I think will not be gainsaid by any hon. member of this House. If you refer to page 342 of this annual you will find a statement of the capital ships of the British navy to-day. I shall not go back further than 1895, that is seventeen years ago. I shall take no account of the ships that were launched and put into commission prior to 1895, and I shall take the same dates as regards the German navy. I find that in the British navy sixty-five capital ships have been completed since 1895, with a total tonnage of 1,309,650 tons, and during the same period the German navy has launched only thirty-one capital ships with a tonnage of 723,185 tons, showing that the tonnage of the British ships completed in that period is practically double that of the German vessels.

I come next to armaments, and I find that in the British navy to-day there are three hundred twelve-inch guns. So far as the British navy is concerned, I take no guns below the twelve-inch calibre. The total weight of projectiles fired from those twelve-inch guns is 255,000 pounds. In addition to these there are one hundred and forty-four 13.5-inch guns, and the total weight of projectiles fired from these guns is 180,000 pounds, or a total broadside of 435,000 pounds. Taking the same standard of comparison, the German navy, which has launched only thirty-one capital ships, with a tonnage of 723,185 tons, has only one hundred and forty-eight 12-inch guns, with a total weight of projectiles of 145,188 pounds, and it has not a single 13.5-inch gun. But it has one hundred and sixteen 11-inch guns with a total weight of projectiles of 65,192 pounds, or a total weight of projectiles of 210,000 pounds, or less than one-half of the total weight of projectiles in the British navy. If you take the guns, the comparison is still more unfavourable to Germany, because while in the British navy there are four hundred and forty-four big guns, the German navy has only two hundred and fifty-four, and of these one hundred and sixteen are only 11-inch guns. There are practically as many 13.5-inch guns in the British navy as there are 12-inch guns in the German navy, which as I have already said, has not a single 13.5-inch gun. I do not know what they have in the new ships; I have only taken into consideration the ships completed down to 1912, because I could not get accurate information regarding the later vessels. For instance I have not taken into consideration the Tiger, which is the latest type of dreadnought construction, with 30,000 tons displacement. But it is not completed yet, and I am not able to give the facts regarding the calibre and size of the guns.

Now, when you consider facts like these, not to mention the hundreds of cruisers, torpedo boats, torpedo boat destroyers and submarines, that go to make up a fighting force, and compare the British navy with other navies in the world, I have no hesitation in repeating the statement, often made here, that all these emergency scares and all this German war talk are manufactured absolutely and solely by parties in England for the purpose of selling guns, building ships, and making money out of naval contracts. It is just as easy for a few jingoes in Great Britain to create a war scare as it is for a few jingoes in Germany to do so. As my hon. friend from Red Deer has said, these scares usually start in the fall of the year, are kept going during the winter. That is the sort of thing that is made use of as an argument for launching out on this un-Canadian and un-British policy of the Government. My hon. friend the Minister of Finance asks how can we refuse the request of the British Admiralty and he started this afternoon to do what every loyal Tory does when he gets a chance, to wave the old flag. He did the very same thing only he did not go as far as an hon. gentleman who spoke about three months ago; he did not go so far as to abuse the Germans. He waved the flag. The hon. Minister of Public Works last night said that the business of this country and the Empire must go on. Why, Sir, you would think that we were holding up the business of the whole British Empire because we object to giving $35,000,000 for jingoes in England to spend on warships and for politicians in Canada to get a mighty good rake-off from the construction of these warships. That is at the bottom of the whole question and I have no hesitation in saying it. When my right hon. friend voted for that resolution in 1910 he was not going to build ships in Britain, but he was going to put the money in the hands of the Admiralty. The hon. Minister of Public Works was not running the show then. You would never get the hon. Minister of Public Works to hand over $35,000,000 if he could have the spending of it himself. The Minister of Finance asked how we could refuse the request of the Admiralty? He tried to create the impression that Canada would be taking a fearful risk if we refused to grant this $35,000,000 to build these ships because they are requested by the Admiralty. I have no doubt that was the request, not of the political end of the Admiralty, but of the jingo end, the men who want to control this money. The hon. Minister of Militia and Defence (Mr. Hughes) has gone out. I had something to say to him. I would like to make a comparison between the men of the Admiralty and the war lords of Canada. Suppose you went down to the Woods building in Ottawa and said to the war lords of Canada. We have $1,000,000 to spend in improving the militia force of Canada; how can we best do it? What kind of an answer would you get? Do you think that they would tell you to hand it over to somebody else to spend? I think I can see the scowl of derision that would come over the faces of the war lords of Canada if you asked them to subscribe to the idea that that $3,000,000 or $4,000,000 for military purposes should be spent by anybody but themselves. It is the same with the lords of the Admiralty in Great Britain. The lords of the Admiralty in Great Britain say: Give us this money and we will spend it, or give us three ships to control. We cannot very well exculpate the right hon. Prime Minister and the Postmaster General in placing all the responsibility upon the officials of the Admiralty. I think they are guilty themselves. My hon. friend the Postmaster General looks up which is an evidence that there is some little consciousness left in him, although after that lock transaction, it is pretty nearly all gone. But it shows that there is a chance to reform him and I want to direct my attention to him for a few moments. It is evidence that he is willing to be talked to and that he will not answer back. Does anybody in his senses mean to tell me that the Admiralty, whether you call them the officers of the Admiralty or the First Lord of the Admiralty, did not tell my right hon. friend the Prime Minister and his colleagues the very thing that they wanted to be told? Do you suppose that they told them the thing to do was to build three capital ships? Do you mean to tell me that the people of Great Britain do not know something about what is going on in Canada and that they did not know what were the cardinal differences between the principles of the two parties on this question? Everybody knew it; it was heralded before the country, it was in the newspapers, it was so widely circulated that even the Navy League Annual has it. This policy of the Conservative party that they would not build a Canadian navy, that they would have nothing to do with Canadian seamen or sailors, was so thoroughly engrafted upon the people's mind that even Mr. Burgoyne knew it. He copied it from the Quebec Chronicle. Away back last April the Quebec Chronicle came out with an inspired article and it was put in this Navy League Annual as the policy of the Conservative party before my right hon. friend the Prime Minister had announced his policy. It is wonderful how that statement put forward by the Quebec Chronicle last April coincides with the condition of affairs at the present day. It is almost prophetic. It is so prophetic that the article must have been inspired. Even the flying squadron was prophesied in this. Winston Churchill was not saying anything new in this respect; he was only repeating what the Prime Minister had told him.

One other charge that we have to bring against my right hon. friend is that he was trying to deceive the people when he was talking about the North sea proposal a little while ago. Let me read what the Quebec Chronicle said in its issue of the 2nd April last:

> The actual number of ships Canada intends to order is, it is understood, not definitely settled, but it is believed that, while the question is being considered, tenders will be called immediately for two super-dreadnoughts (first-class cruisers), surpassing anything yet built for speed, power, and efficiency.
>
> Canada's answer to the German menace and the latter's refusal to meet the most moderate but firm speech of the First Lord of the Admiralty for limitation or moderation of armaments, is noteworthy of a great people and a great country such as Canada is.
>
> The great drawback heretofore confronting the Canadian public, and particularly the people in the province of Quebec, was that they had never been consulted in the matter.

Then it goes on:

> While these ships are being built Canada will notify the British Government and the other overseas, dominions that autonomy in naval matters is essential; that representation is imperative; that these two important points can only be met by the creation of an Imperial squadron toward which the British and Dominion Governments will contribute, and which would be controlled by an executive or special Imperial Board of Admiralty, representing each contributor.
>
> This would, indeed, be the commencement of Imperial unity and co-operation for the defence of Imperial trade and commerce, which is synonymous with the interests of the Dominion of Canada. These ships, which would be under the control of the Dominion of Canada and the other dominions, would be the most modern and powerful of their kind. They would patrol the vast expanse of ocean over which the mercantile shipping of the Empire passes unceasingly to and fro.
>
> Canada's message to the world is: 'The Canadian people are determined that the supremacy of the Imperial navy is of vital importance, and she is determined that she will take upon her shoulders her full share of her responsibilities for its maintenance.'
> Her message to Great Britain is: 'We will co-operate, but representation is a sine qua non of contribution. We demand the immediate creation of a special Imperial squadron to be controlled by a board representative of our own and Imperial interests.'

That was before the right hon. gentleman and his friends went to Great Britain last summer and that was the policy which they announced in advance. When they got over there they said: We cannot build ships in Canada, and we will not have Canadian seamen to man a navy in Canada, because we promised our Nationalist friends that we would not do so. We have promised our Nationalist friends that we will not do anything in Canada, but we can contribute money and we will contribute money under certain specified conditions. We will build at least two of the greatest dreadnoughts that science can devise or money can buy—almost the very words that were used by the Admiralty in their memorandum. This coincidence is remarkable. It is, as the Minister of Finance says, another synchronism. It is a most remarkable thing that the Admiralty should coin words very much like the words used by the Quebec Chronicle some three or four months before. They said: While we give ships or money we must have a say in the control, and although the Chronicle was wrong then, it was right at the time the statement was made. I see the Minister of Inland Revenue has come into the House and I am delighted, for I have something to say to him and I know he will give it that judicial consideration to which such an important matter is entitled. The people of the country are crying for more light on this important subject, and I hope the Minister of Inland Revenue will honour the House with a few remarks on the subject, because I am sure he knows all about it if he would only tell. When the Prime Minister went to England he no doubt wanted to give dreadnoughts, but he wished in return to have a say in the foreign policy of Great Britain and in the control of the flying squadron, but the British Government told him that was useless, unless he was prepared to pay his share of the taxes and abide by the rule of the majority in Great Britain. Of course the Prime Minister could not do that and then he said: for God's sake give me something to take back to the people of Canada, and the British Government said: we will let you sit on the Imperial Defence Committee. True, Sir Frederick Borden sat on that committee ten years ago and Mr. Justice Brodeur sat on it in 1909 and 1911, but possibly the Prime Minister and his friends had forgotten that, or, if they had not, they tried to mislead the people of the country by telling them that this was something new which they had obtained. The truth is that we have no more representation on any British Committee than we had before. The Government could not build ships; they could not enlist men; they would not be allowed to do either of these things by the Quebec Nationalists; they could not have representation in the Imperial Council, and all they could do was to send money over to England and try to fool the people by making them believe they had something big in being allowed to sit on the Imperial Defence Comittee. Now, as my hon. friend Pardee would say, we got down to brass tacks, and the Minister of Inland Revenue and the Postmaster General and the Quebec Nationalists would not let the Government do anything else than contribute this sum of money. They tell us that in the distant future we may be able to bring these ships back to Canada, but what in the name of Heaven would they do with these ships if they did bring them back? They will not be built for three years; they will remain in the flying squadron for six or seven years more in all probability, and if the Government brings back these dreadnoughts at the end of ten years where are they going to put them? They have no docks, they cannot repair them in any way, they have no organization, they have no cruisers, torpedo boats, submarines and the rest of the flotilla that must go with battleships, and what are they going to do with them? Does the Government think the people of this country are so ignorant as to believe that these ships could be brought back under such conditions? Does the Minister of Inland Revenue believe it? Does the Postmaster General believe it? I know the Minister of Finance does not believe it because he knows better. And, driven to the last ditch, the Government now intimates that when they give three dreadnoughts to Great Britain they will stop there. But the Postmaster General knows better than that; he knows the Government cannot stop contributing once it begins, he knows that if you buy 350,000 locks, you will have to buy more; he knows that once he starts out to give some of his friends a slice out of a patent invention, he has to give the others some small slices to satisfy them; he knows that once you start out contributing three dreadnoughts to the British navy you cannot stop there, and that you will have to provide contribution upon contribution and the more contributions you make the more impossible it is to stop contributing. If the least doubt remained in the mind of any intelligent man in this country, that the Prime Minister had the faintest idea of bringing these vessels back to Canada or inaugurating a Canadian navy or doing anything but contributing that idea must have been dispelled by the following remarks of the right hon. gentleman, 'Hansard' page 4384:

> What are you to do? Are you to have one Empire, one foreign policy, one combined naval force, to resist every peril or are you to have five foreign policies and five scattered navies to go down against the attack which may come upon them at any time? It is idle to pretend that defence upon the sea of this Empire is in all respects the same as defence upon the land. The continents are separated, but the sea is one, and I speak not only from the absolute sincerity of my own convictions but from the well-considered opinions of men who know infinitely more about this than I can claim to do when I say that I do not believe that the security of this Empire can be maintained and preserved without a combination of the naval forces of the Empire under one control, at least in time of war.

What more proof do you want than that as to the policy of the right hon. gentleman? Can any man read those statements and believe that the Prime Minister thinks that we shall not have contribution after contribution? There is nothing left for him but that. As I said before, the more contributions you make, the greater the impossibility of getting back to a Canadian navy. You would have a lot of obsolete or obsolescent vessels after ten or fifteen years. Are the people of Canada going to bring those vessels back here and make them the nucleus of a Canadian navy? Never. Therefore I take it for granted that the settled policy of this Government is contribution. It cannot be anything else. Take the condition of affairs as it is to-day. My right hon. friend said when he introduced this Bill; he has repeated it a number of times; it has been repeated by his press that, before they go to the country at a general election, they will lay down a permanent policy. What policy could hon. gentlemen opposite lay down under present conditions and under their present professions but a policy of contribution? You cannot have a hybrid policy in naval defence. You must have one thing or the other. You must either have contribution or a Canadian naval service. My hon. friend the Minister of Finance this afternoon attempted to create the impression that this is only a temporary measure and that possibly later on we may do something else. Before he got through with this speech, he gave the lie to the proposition, because he said: Your two fleet units are absolutely useless. If two fleet units are no good, what will be the good of his three dreadnoughts? Does my hon. friend shake his head at that statement?

Mr. WHITE: My hon. friend did not take a correct note of what I said.

Mr CARVELL: Only because you talked an hour and a half. I took down the substance of it and you will find in 'Hansard' to-morrow that I am absolutely correct in what I say. I do not wonder that my hon. friend wants to get away from it.

Mr. WHITE: Not at all.

Mr. GRAHAM: It is another break.

Mr. CARVELL: No break at all, it is the truth. He is only telling what they all believe. I do not call the truth a break. I like to hear a man tell the truth. I give him credit for telling the truth.

When they come down with their permanent policy two years from now, before they hold a general election, they will enunciate their policy and then go to the people. With the Postmaster General (Mr. Pelletier) and the Minister of Inland Revenue (Mr. Nantel) directing the affairs of the Government, how on earth can they have anything but contribution? What was the policy of the Nationalists in Quebec during the last campaign? What was the declaration at the St. Eustache meeting which was the beginning of the campaign in Quebec?

Mr. BUREAU: Down with the navy.

Mr. CARVELL: We object to a Canadian navy because it leads to conscription. We owe nothing to Great Britain, and we will have no Canadian navy. We will not allow our sons to be drafted on board these vessels and to be disembowelled in the foreign wars of Great Britain. That is the ground upon which they fought the election of Drummond Arthabaska; that is the ground on which they fought the general elections in 1911; that is the ground upon which the Nationalists won the elections in 1911; that is the ground upon which they came into this Government. That was the solemn compact made between the Nationalists and the Premier of this country, when the Government was formed, and that is the solemn compact which the Premier cannot break. As long as the Premier has these gentlemen in his Cabinet, he is bound to contribution or nothing at all. When he comes down with his permanent policy two years hence, it cannot be anything else but contribution. That is as nearly the real policy of this Government as anything can be.

If my hon. friends will not be guided by the arguments and logic of the people of Canada, if they will not be guided by their own professions in 1909, I want to know if there is anything to which we can call their attention which will guide them. There is no doubt that when the Premier and the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Foster) discussed this matter in March 1909, they knew the historic conditions and the history of the naval defence of the Empire as well as we do. It is true that possibly many of the other gentlemen, who are now responsible for the political affairs of Canada, did not know and do not now know the conditions existing at that time as well as the Prime Minister and the Minister of Trade and Commerce did. I exculpate my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Rogers) from any blame in this, because possibly he did not know anything about it. I will also be lenient with the hon. Minister of Finance, because perhaps he did not know anything about it. I have some doubt from his speech this afternoon if he ever read it up. My friend the Minister of Inland Revenue (Mr. Nantel) has left the Chamber. I have some doubt whether he has ever read up the history of the question or not. With the exception of the right hon. the Premier and the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce, I am afraid that none of them know anything about the historical side of this affair. I have not the time at my disposal to-night to go into the whole history of the matter; but if these gentlemen will not be guided by common sense, logic reason and facts, surely they will be guided by history. Let me take them back, if I can, a little way and repeat some of the history which has led up to the present condition of affairs. Away back in 1897, the matter was discussed. It was discussed in 1894; it was even dicussed in 1887 at the Colonial Conferences. Finally, when we get down to 1902, we have the first occasion on which this matter became a real live issue in any of the colonies of Great Britain and became consolidated into an agreement and into a policy. I want to call the attention of my hon. friends to-night, who have not read this, something about the agreement and the policy which was agreed to in 1902 between Australia, New Zealand and, I think, Cape Colony as well. I do this because these dominions have had the experience. They know what contribution means and they know what it is to break away from it. The contribution on the part of Australia and New Zealand was not one-half as bad as a contribution on the part of Canada would be, because they were getting something in return for what they were giving, whereas we are getting nothing. All that we are getting, according to the Minister of Finance, is that we will prevent that chilly feeling from going out by the money lenders to the people of Canada if we do not give these people an order for three dreadnoughts. That has all been so thoroughly discussed by my hon. friend from Red Deer (Mr. Clark) that I would only be wasting time by referring to it at any length. For some years prior to 1902, a real live issue had arisen in the antipodes, in the way of an Oriental invasion. The Japanese and the Chinese had commenced to come into Australia and New Zealand to such an extent that the people became really alarmed. They felt that something must be done in order to maintain what they call a 'white Australasia.' They did not contribute money to the British Admiralty for the mere fun of contributing, or in order to be represented by ships in the North sea when Armageddon came, but in order that the British navy should be on their shores to protect them. Contribution under these conditions is very different from what Canada is asked to do in this case; for there the British Government were to give something for what they gave to the British Government. They were giving a contribution for protection which they believed they needed in order to prevent the flooding of their country by Mongolians from China and Japan. This matter came up first in concrete form in the conference of 1902, although prior to that there had been contributions in a very small way. In 1902 it was definitely agreed that for ten years New Zealand should contribute £20,000 a year or $100,000, and Australia £200,000 a year or $1,000,000, and in consideration of this the British Admiralty was to maintain a fleet of a certain power within Australasian waters. Yet, even though the contribution was made under these conditions, let me call attention to some very pertinent remarks made by Lord Selden, First Lord of the Admiralty under the then Conservative Administration of Great Britain. That right hon. gentleman showed that he had grave doubts of the effectiveness and advisability of a policy of contributions:

> The second point on which I want to lay stress is this. At present there is only one agreement between the Imperial Government and any group of colonial governments in respect to naval affairs, although we have received generous—and independently proferred—aid from the Cape and from Natal—I allude to the Australasian agreement. Now, gentlemen, I attach great importance to that agreement, because the statesmen who negotiated it and signed it have led the way in what I call the Imperial consideration of this question of naval policy. But, like every document that commences a policy, it has faults, and to my mind there is no fault in it greater than this, that the relations of the Australasian governments to the Imperial are simply that of the man who pays to the man who supplies. The Australasian governments pay us a certain contribution; for this contribution we supply them with a certain article. Now, this is good so far as it goes, but it does not, to my mind, go far enough. It does not give our New Zealand and Australian fellow-countrymen the sense of personal interest, of personal possession in the British navy which I most of all desiderate for the future, and I want, not only the colonial government to understand that on the naval protection of the Empire, exercised by a wise, naval strategy, depends our future existence as a united Empire, but I want them to regard the navy as their own, at least, as much as ours, and with that object I wish to see in the navy more colonial officers and a contribution of colonial seamen. I want, in fact, if I may use such a term, to increase the maritime spirit of the Empire.

Let hon. gentlemen opposite think of that. Away back in 1902, when Australia was agreeing to a contribution for ten years, this First Lord of the Admiralty declared that this lacked the very essential of naval force of the Empire—the man element; it did not give the people of Australia the real interest in the navy that they ought to have. I wonder what the Postmaster General thinks about that. I wonder what the Finance Minister has to say about it. I do not wonder the Finance Minister does not want to listen to it, but I think he is listening to it with one ear just the same. And, though it bothers the hon. gentlemen, I must go on, for these utterances justify our position to-day—because what was true in 1902, is doubly true in 1913:

After all we are not in this country all sailors, yet we are all imbued with the maritime spirit. Here you have the great colonies converging vast geographical tracts of country; is there not a danger that in the far interior, unless we take precautions, the maritime spirit may be lost? I want to bring Australasia, Canada and South Africa to understand in the sense that the average Englishman understands it, that the sea is the one material source of our greatness and our power; the main bond of union, the real source of our strength—if I may use such a mixed metaphor, that the sea is to the Empire as the breath of life; but it cannot be done, I opine, so long as we are only receivers of money. I want to see from all parts of the Empire a personal contribution to the navy, so that it may not only be an abstract Admiralty to govern the navy but an Admiralty that has won the confidence of the colonies because the colonies understand its policy, and because in each colony there are officers and men belonging to the navy—an integral portion of the navy.

If hon. members opposite would take the doctrine laid down in that speech of the head of the Admiralty in 1902, and apply it to the conditions of Canada it would be alone sufficient to cause them to pause in their un-Canadian and unpatriotic conduct of sending out $35,000,000 of the money of this country on the plea of assisting the effective naval forces of the Empire, while leaving out the real element, the man element. You talk of sending away three ships, with not a Canadian seaman or a Canadian sailor aboard; and then you say, you are going to be in the forefront when Armageddon comes in the North sea. This may be good enough for the Postmaster General, but it is not good enough for me nor for other loyal Canadians. Nor do I believe that even the Postmaster General will ultimately be satisfied with it, for as this discussion goes on, I am sure the hon. gentleman will see that he has not been playing the part of a big Canadian, but has been pandering to the lowest sentiments of the people whom he wishes to influence by this un-Canadian and unpatriotic policy. Now, I want to read a little of this agreement to show that this was no contribution by the Australasian colonies on the lines of what is here proposed, but was a real contract for real protection, something not one-quarter as bad as the proposition put forward by this Government. My hon. friend will find it on pages 24 and 25 of the report of the Colonial conference of 1902:

The commisioners for executing the office of Lord High Admiral of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, &c., and the Governments of the Commonwealth of Australia and of New Zealand, having recognized the importance of sea-power in the power it gives over sea communications, the necessity of a single navy under one authority, by which alone concerted action can be assured, and the advantages which will be derived by developing the sea power of Australia and New Zealand, have resolved to conclude for this purpose an agreement as follows:

(1). The naval force of the Australian station shall consist of not less than the undermentioned sea-going ships of war, all of which shall be from time to time throughout the terms of this agreement of modern type, except those used as drill ships; one armoured cruisers, first-class; two second-class cruisers; four third-class cruisers; four sloops; and of a Royal naval reserve consisting of twenty-five officers and seven hundred seamen and stokers.

(2). The base of this force shall be the ports of Australia and New Zealand, and their sphere of operations shall be the waters of the Australia, China and East Indies stations, as defined in the attached schedules, where the Admiralty believe they can most effectively act against hostile vessels which threaten the trade or interests of Australia and New Zealand. No change in this arrangement shall be made without the consent of the governments of the Commonwealth and of New Zealand; and nothing in the agreement shall be taken to mean that the naval force herein named shall be the only force used in Australasian waters should the necessity for a larger force.

(3). This force shall be under the control and orders of the naval commander in chief for the time being appointed to command His Majesty's ships and vessels on the Australasian station.

(4) Of the ships referred to in article 1, one shall be kept in reserve and three shall be only partly manned and shall be used for drill ships for training the Royal naval reserve; the remainder shall be kept in position fully manned.

(5) The three vessels used as drill ships and one other vessel shall be manned by Autralians and New Zealanders as far as procurable, paid at special rates, and enrolled in proportion to the relative population of the Commonwealth and New Zealand. If a sufficient proportion of men from either colony should not on the aforesaid basis be forthcoming, a sufficient number of men to complete the complements of the ships may be enrolled from the other colony. They shall be officered by officers of the Royal navy, supplemented by officers of the Royal naval reserve.

(6) In order to ensure that the naval service shall include officers born in Australia and New Zealand who will be able to rise to the highest posts in the Royal navy, the under-mentioned nominations for naval cadetships will be given annually: Commonwealth of Australia, eight; New Zealand, two.

(7) The branches of the Royal reserve established in Australia and New Zealand shall be called into actual service by His Majesty in Council acting on the advice of his governments of the Commonwealth of Australia and New Zealand respectively. The men forming the Royal naval reserve shall be divided into two classes: (a) those who have served for three years on board of one of His Majesty's ships; (b) those who have not so served. These men shall be trained on ships specially provided for the purpoe. The officers of this reserve force shall be included on the list of officers of the Royal naval reserve.

(8) In consideration of the service aforementioned, the Commonwealth of Australia and New Zealand shall pay the Imperial Government five-twelfths and one-twelfth respectively of the total annual cost of maintaing the naval force on the Australian station, provided that the total amount so paid shall in no case exceed £200,000 and £40,000 respectively in any one year. In recognizing the total amount cost, a sum equal to 5 per cent on the prime cost of the ships of which the naval force of the station is composed shall be included.

The other articles do not affect this contract, and I will not refer to them. Australia and New Zealand went into a policy of contribution upon a quid pro quo basis; they got something in return for it. They obtained the protection of a not inconsiderable squadron of the British navy, consisting of eleven ships of war. That contract was for a period of ten years, but, even considering the reasonableness of this agreement, they saw at once that it was not a proper policy. At the conference of 1907 this policy was objected to, and in 1909 notice was given that it would not be any longer carried out. The contract was accordingly rescinded, and at the end of the ten years it was discontinued. In exchange for this policy they said, we will adopt the principle of building and manning our own navy. They entered into an agreement, and, to my mind, this agreement is one of the most important things we have to consider in discussing this matter. An agreement was entered into with the British Government that Australia would build and maintain on the Pacific ocean one fleet unit, and Canada agreed with Australia that she would build and maintain on the Pacific a certain number of cruisers and destroyers. Australia has loyally carried out her part of the contract; Canada started to carry out her part of it, but the present Goverment have broken these bonds, and have failed to adhere to the agreement. It is of but little wonder that the Prime Minister of Australia finds very serious fault with Canada for failing to carry out the international agreement made with Australia and with the Empire. Coming to a consideration of the situation in New Zealand, that country was governed for a number of years by that great Imperialist, Sir Joseph Ward. As long as he held the office of Premier he maintained and carried out a policy of contribution, but the people of New Zealand held an election less than a year ago, and this man was driven from power because it was contended he was not a good New Zealander. His policy was one which embodied the giving away of the money of New Zealand and failing to create in that country that Imperial spirit which can only be developed by the existence of a local naval organization. They also decided to discontinue the payment of contributions, and notice has practically been served on the Imperial Government to that effect. The people of New Zealand are, therefore, adopting the same policy as that of Australia, and the same policy as that which was unanimously adopted by Canada in 1909; they intend to have their own navy, to own and man it themselves, and to create a national spirit throughout the country. And yet, in the face of the experience of those who have experimented with the policy the Government is now attempting to launch it upon this country. Hon. gentlemen opposite contend that we should adopt a policy of contribution which does not inculcate into the people a true national spirit, and which does not provide for the adequate defence of this country.

My hon. friend says that a fleet unit on the Pacific would be of no use. I wonder what the people of British Columbia will think when they read the statement of the Minister of Finance to-morrow morning that two fleet units would be absolutely useless. Do my hon. friends opposite mean to tell me that a fleet unit on the Pacific coast owned by Canada, another by Australia, and another by New Zealand, would not be of any use in case of trouble arising on the Pacific ocean? That was the contract made in 1909, that is the contract which Australia is carrying out, that is the contract which New Zealand is willing to carry out, and it is the contract which Canada made and broke. What will the people of British Columbia say to the statement that a naval organization composed as that would be of three capital ships with attendant cruisers, torpedo boats, destroyers and submarines, would not be of any use in time of trouble on the Pacific ocean. It would be of infinitely more value than any flying squadron composed of Canadian and Malay ships, because it would always be ready when required. It would not go scurrying around the world with the flag, but would be where business was to be done and where it was needed in time of trouble. The British Admiralty do not need those vessels now in the North sea. That is pretty well established. When my right hon. friend the Prime Minister introduced his proposals in December, his whole argument was that those ships would be placed in the North sea where a war was going to be fought within two or three years. Now Mr. Winston Churchill says that Britain is able to take care of any emergency that might arise in the North sea, and the facts contained in the Navy League Annual and the information which we had from every quarter during the last four or five months prove that Britain is well able to take care of herself in the North sea, and that she does not need our ships there. Mr. Winston Churchill sees that his friends in Canada are in a hole, and he is trying to help them out. He says there is going to be a flying squadron which can go to the Cape, to India, to the Fiji Islands, to Australia, and to British Columbia. Would it not be better protection for British Columbia, for Australia, for New Zealand, or for India, if there were permanently three fleet units such as I have described in the Pacific ocean, which could be augmented by the British navy if necessary? When they say that a fleet unit on the Atlantic coast would be no use, they do not know what they are talking about. Do they realize that it is only a matter of five days' sailing from Halifax to the North sea, and do they mean to tell me that the Armageddon is going to be fought without five days' notice? Do they not suppose that the British Admiralty would not know that trouble was going to happen in the North sea five days beforehand? Why, one has only to consider a few of those things to realize the absolute nonsense contained in the statement of the Minister of Finance when he says that fleet units on the Atlantic and Pacific coasts would not be of any use to Canada or to the Empire.

In conclusion, in my judgment, the great trouble in this matter has arisen from the Postmaster General; I get back to him every time. If you want any evidence of the part that my hon. friend the Postmaster General has played in the matter you have only to look at the statement made by Mr. Winston Churchill on January 24, which was read in this House on the 10th day of March. One of the principal reasons given by Mr. Winston Churchill why we could not maintain a fleet unit or a Canadian navy, was that we could not get the men. Let me read to my hon. friend the Postmaster General what Mr. Churchill said and see if he recognizes the language. I want the Postmaster General to remember whether he ever repeated this language before, or whether he ever heard it repeated. I believe he not only repeated it here, but in Britain last summer. I wish to ask the Postmaster General if he is responsible for what Mr. Winston Churchill said. This is what Mr. Churchill said:

> In 1909, the question turned upon the provision by Canada in the Pacific of a fleet corresponding to the Australian fleet unit, involving an initial expenditure estimated at £3,700,000, and maintenance at an estimated cost of £600,000 per annum. The Canadian Government did not think this compatible with their arrangements and suggested that they should provide a limited number of cruisers and destroyers which were to be stationed in the Pacific and Atlantic. The Admiralty agreed to help in the organization and manning so far as possible. Between that time and 1912 a commencement was made with the establishment of a Canadian naval force, but in those three years only small progress was made with the training of recruits and cadets and it would have been impossible for the Canadian Government to man a single cruiser.

Does my hon. friend the Postmaster General recognize the language? That was the argument which he and his friends put before the Admiralty last summer. Why, Sir, I would think that every Canadian would blush with shame when he reads such statements. How could the British Admiralty know that the Canadian Government had met with such indifferent success in recruiting men in Canada, if my hon. friends did not tell them so? Why did they not give to the British Admiralty last summer the reason why they had not been able to get any men to volunteer for the naval service? They did not tell the Admiralty that they had practically invited the men to desert. I make this statement and I challenge contradiction, that the present Government practically invited men to desert from the Canadian naval service. They dare not deny it. I made the statement in this House a month ago, and I challenged contradiction, that there was not a solitary instance of the Canadian Government following up a deserter to try to get him to return to the Canadian navy, and I repeat the statement to-night. The Canadian Government wanted these men to desert, because they had decided that there would not be any Canadian navy. They had promised their Nationalist followers that there would not be any Canadian navy, and they had hundreds of men they did not know what to do with. They simply told them to get out as they had no use for them and they would have been bigger fools than I give Canadians credit for being if they had not taken the advice given them. Then my hon. friends go over to Great Britain and say: We have not been able to get enough recruits to man one cruiser; you cannot get men in Canada and they want too high wages. The Postmaster General says: What is the use anyway when an Englishman will work for 28 cents a day? The British Admiralty sent back an insulting statement with regard to Canada which the Prime Minister and his colleagues had made to them when they were there during last summer. I ask the hon. Postmaster General again, Does he recognize the language; has he ever heard it before? He is dumb and I do not wonder at it. I do not wonder that the hon. gentleman does not want to confess that he went over there and traduced the good name of this country. I do not wonder that the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries is not here to-night in order to answer for himself. We will be here again and we will have another opportunity of taking up this question, no matter whether they get a chance during the summer of 1913, 1914 or 1915. They will not be able to get away from the people by sitting silent as they do here when we put these questions to them. They will have to answer for the insult to the Canadian people when they told the Admiralty last year that Canadians were such cowards, such sluggards and had so little patriotism that they could not get them to enlist in the navy in order to defend their country in case of need. I do not believe the statement. There is nothing that we need so much in Canada as a national sentiment. I wish we had something which would correspond with the Fourth of July in the United States of America. I think I have more respect for the Fourth of July celebration than for anything else in the United States and I wish we had something to correspond with it here.

An hon. MEMBER: We have the First of July.

Mr. CARVELL: The First of July!—a day that scarcely a boy or girl knows anything about excepting that it is a holiday. I repeat that there is nothing that we are suffering for the want of so much as a national sentiment. If we had one fleet unit on the Atlantic and another on the Pacific we would have something to which our young men could look with pride, we would have something which we could say belonged to Canada, which was manned by Canadians and which, if trouble came, would protect Canada and Canadian interests wherever they were threatenend. This would mean a thousand times more to the youth of Canada than three dreadnoughts floating somewhere around the ocean and named Pelletier No. 1, Pelletier No. 2, and Pelletier No. 3, because these are the names that they ought to give them.

I am amazed that my hon. friends will try to force this unpatriotic and un-Canadian policy through Parliament. The only thing that can make this navy a live issue, that can make it an Imperial matter and that can make it of any benefit to Canada, is the thing that these hon. gentlemen will not allow to be incorporated in it. Look at the hundred or more statues scattered all over the Dominion of Canada and remember the influence which they exert upon the patriotic impulses of our people. The statue in front of the City Hall at Ottawa is worth more than a hundred dreadnoughts sent over the sea. Statues are things that inspire the patriotic youth of the country. Some of these statues recall the scenes of 1902. They recall the fact that we had some thousands of our young men fighting for the defence of the Empire. They recall a time when people were flocking into the towns and villages and waiting until midnight in front of newspaper and telegraph offices for news. They recall a time when mothers, sisters, and brothers were reading the newspapers and scanning telegraphic despatches for the latest news about the war. This is something which appeals to the heart and the soul of every true Canadian, not because we sent $3,000,000 or $4,000,000 out of this country, not because we bought a lot of rifles, clothing and ammunition, but because our sons and brothers were there ready to shed their blood if necessary to defend the Empire. Construct Canadian war vessels, send them to the front, place them in the line of battle when it becomes necessary and you will do something which appeals to the patriotic sentiment of every true Canadian. You cannot say that we shall weld this Empire together, that we will create a patriotic sentiment in this country, that we will do the business of the Empire, as my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works said, by sending three empty ships to be manned, not by Canadians, but to be manned by somebody else, whom the British Empire will provide and pay for, and to whom will go all the honour and glory when the time comes to defend the Empire.

Mr. ROGERS: Mr. Chairman, we have had a very interesting and good-natured discussion throughout the day, and I would like now to make a suggestion to my hon. friend from South Renfrew (Mr. Graham) and those upon the other side of the House which I think should be agreeable to them, that, in order that we may show some sign of making progress, we should pass at least one clause before we adjourn.

Mr. GRAHAM: Mr. Chairman, the suggestion is a very mild mannered one, but as a great many hon. gentlemen, probably including myself, wish to express their views further on the clause, I would ask the hon. leader of the Government, protem, seeing that we have had a good-natured debate, as he says, and made some progress, that the debate be adjourned.

Mr. ROGERS: Well, if we cannot make any progress, I will move that the committee rise, report progress, and ask leave to sit again.

Progress reported.

Mr. Rogers moved the adjournment of the House.

Mr. GRAHAM: What business will be taken up to-morrow?

Mr. ROGERS: I think that to-morrow we will take up the resolutions that stand in the name of the Prime Minister on the Votes and Proceedings.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 11.15 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

WEDNESDAY, April 9, 1913.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at three o'clock.

QUESTIONS.

(Questions to be answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

QUEBEC DRY-DOCK.

Mr. LACHANCE:

Has the Government decided to build a dry-dock in the port or harbour of Quebec? If so, has it reached a decision as to the site where the said dry-dock shall be constructed, and will this dry-dock be a floating one or otherwise?

Mr. ROGERS: Yes, at Lauzon; a graving dock.

FLAG INCIDENT AT MATAPEDIA.

Mr. MARCIL:

Are the facts alleged in the following extracts from the Campbellton, N.-B., Graphic substantially correct:—

The incident of last July, when a detachment of the 19th Field Battery of Moncton returning from camp, pulled down and insulted the American flag at Matapedia, will be remembered by readers of the Graphic.

This journal spoke strongly at the time of the action and stated that the last was not heard of the incident.

The latter did go further for we are credibly informed that the matter was brought to the notice of the Secretary of State of the home Government by the United States Ambassador, Mr. Whitelaw Reid, and as a result of that the Minister of Militia, while insisting that no insult was intended, has apologized to the United States for the action of the Moncton frolickers on that day.

It would be interesting to have the letters and reports of this case made public.

Mr. HUGHES (Minister of Militia): The facts set forth in the extracts from the Campbellton, N. B., Graphic, referred to above, are not correct. The facts are: The flag was lowered, but no indignity in the sense complained of occurred. The Minister of Militia has not made an apology, but he has expressed regret that such an incident should have occurred as the unauthorized lowering of the flag by members of the field battery.

ST. CHARLES, MANITOBA, RIFLE RANGE.

*Mr. LEMIEUX:

Is it the intention of the Department of Militia to give up the present rifle range at St. Charles, Manitoba, lately acquired and now in use, and to move said rifle range to somewhere else? If so, where?

Mr. HUGHES (Minister of Militia): No change whatever has been made in regard to the rifle range at St. Charles, Manitoba. If the hon. member has any specified range in view and would make his question definite, I would be pleased to answer it.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Drop the question.

Question dropped.

L'ARDOISE AND BLACK POINT BREAKWATERS.

Mr. KYTE:

What quantity of cement was purchased by the Department of Public Works during the summer of 1912 for repairs to the L'Ardoise breakwater?

2. What quantity was purchased for repairs to the Black Point breakwater?

3. From whom was the cement purchased, and what was the price paid?

4. Where was delivery of said cement made to the department?

5. What freight was paid on said cement?

6. To whom was said freight paid?

Mr. ROGERS:

1. 116 barrels.

2. 66 barrels.

3. Thompson and Sutherland, Limited, at $2.38 a barrel, in bags with 40 cents refund when bags are returned.

4. St. Peter's, N.S.

5. L'Ardoise, $111.36; Black Point, $63.36.

6. D. Y. Stewart and Son, St. Peter's N.S., at the rate of 24 cents a bag.

Mr. MURPHY.

Mr. SPEAKER: With reference to questions which are answered by statements containing long lists of names and other information, it would be better to allow them to stand as notices of motion under the rule which provides that, as long as there is no objection, they need not remain on the paper to be asked, but may be taken as notices of motion, and the answers handed in. It would save considerable time to do so.

SALE OF QUARTER SECTION NEAR BRANDON.

*Mr. TURRIFF:

1. Has the N.W. quarter 29-10-18W. been sold?
2. If so, what is the name and address of the purchaser?
3. On what date was the land sold?
4. At what price was the land sold?
5. What was the upset price of said quarter section?
6. When was the valuation made?
7. Who made the valuation?
8. What is the name and address of the auctioneer who sold the land?
9. In what papers and for what length of time in each paper was the sale advertised?
10. Where was the sale held?
11. How far is the said land from the city of Brandon?

Mr. CROTHERS:

1. Yes.
2. Milne Dermot Evans.
3. October 28, 1912.
4. $12 per acre.
5. $12 per acre.
6. August 12, 1912.
7. R. D. Evans, valuator.
8. Daniel Shelmerdine, Winnipeg.
9. Winnipeg Telegram, three issues weekly and three issues daily.

The following weeklies, two issues in each: Winnipeg Der Norwestern, Winnipeg Heins Kringla; Winnipeg Western Canada Real Estate Journal; St. Boniface, Le Manitoba; Portage la Prairie, The Review; Souris, Plaindealer; Boissevain, Recorder; Brandon Times, Gladstone Mercury, Virden Empire Advance, Glenborough Gazette, Belmont News, Hartney Star, Baldur Gazette, Holland Observer, Cypress River, Western Prairie, Morden Times, Manitou, Western Canadian, Minnedosa Tribune, Elkhorn Advocate.

10. Portage la Prairie.
11. About two miles.

PICTOU MARINE HOSPITAL.

Mr. MACDONALD:

1. Has Duncan McKenzie, keeper of the Marine Hospital at Pictou, been dismissed?
2. If so, when and what was the cause of his dismissal?
3. Who was appointed in his place, on what conditions and at what salary?

Mr. HAZEN:

1. Mr. McKenzie was not dismissed. On the 3rd June, 1912, he tendered his resignation which was accepted by the department.
2. Answered by No. 1.
3. The hospital having been closed no one was appointed keeper, but Mr. Mark Talbot was appointed watchman to look after the building at a salary of $15 a month.

NEW CARLISLE EXPERIMENTAL STATION.

Mr. MARCIL:

1. Referring to the answer made by the Minister of Agriculture on January 27th last, what is the nature of the proposal made to the Government in connection with the establishment of an experimental farm or experimental station at New Carlisle, Quebec.
2. By whom was the proposal made?
3. What was the substance of the answers given?

Mr. CROTHERS:

1. The proposal represented the desirability of the establishment of an experimental station at New Carlisle, Quebec, for the benefit of the Gaspé peninsula, and pointed out the suitability of the Robitaille property for the purpose.
2. L. J. Riopel.
3. The reply stated in substance that the question of additional farms or stations is yet to be considered, and also that Mr. Riopel probably had in mind demonstration farms which were being selected by the Commission of Conservation, and it was suggested that he might communicate with their secretary.

EMPLOYMENT OF E. A. McGRATH.

Mr. GARLAND:

1. Is Mr. E. A. McGrath employed at the Printing Bureau as superintendent of lithographing and engraving?
2. If so, what is his salary?
3. Is he a British subject by birth or naturalization?
4. Has he subscribed to the oath of allegiance?
5. If a naturalized British subject, what is the date of such naturalization papers?

Mr. CODERRE:

1. Yes.
2. $2,500 per annum.
3. By naturalization.
4. Yes.
5. February, 1911.

DISMISSALS.

Mr. LEMIEUX:

1. Has Amédée Cléroux been dismissed from his duties as immigration agent?
2. If so, for what reason?
3. Who has been appointed his successor?
4. On whose recommendation was his successor appointed?

Mr. CROTHERS:

1. Yes.
2. Active partisanship.
3. Paul Ashby.
4. On recommendation of the minister.

Mr. MACDONALD:

1. Has John A. Gordon, watchman Intercolonial railway at Pictou, been dismissed?
2. If so, for what reasons and on whose recommendation?

Mr. COCHRANE:

1. Yes.
2. For political partisanship; an investigation was held and the charges were established.

Return showing in detail the expenditure incurred since October 11, 1911, in connection with investigations held in Bonaventure county by commissioners appointed by the departments of the Post Office, Customs, and Marine and Fisheries into charges made against employees of said departments of offensive political partisanship, together with the means and amounts paid to each of said commissioners in each investigation, as well as details of amounts paid to witnesses and others.—Mr. Marcil.

Copy of all documents, including petitions, memorials, letters and telegrams, addressed to the Government, or any of its members, urging it to take over and incorporate into the Canadian Government railway system of the Quebec and Oriental railway and the Atlantic, Quebec and Western railway, with a copy of all the answers thereto.—Mr. Marcil.

THE RULES OF THE HOUSE—LIMITATION OF DEBATE.

Right Hon. R. L. BORDEN (Prime Minister) moved:

That it be resolved, that rule 17 of this House be amended by adding thereto the following:—

(2) Every motion heretofore debatable made upon routine proceedings, except adjournment motions and every motion standing on the order of the proceedings for the day, or for the concurrence in a report of a standing or a special committee, or for the previous question, or the third reading of a Bill, or for the adjournment of the House when made for the purpose of discussing a definite matter of urgent public importance, or for the adoption, in Committee of the Whole, or of Supply, or of Ways and Means of the resolution clause, section, preamble or title under consideration shall be debatable; but all other motions shall be decided without debate or amendment.

(3) Immediately before the Order of the Day for resuming an adjourned debate is called, or if the House be in Committee of the Whole, or of Supply, or of Ways and Means, any minister of the Crown who, standing in his place, shall have given notice at a previous sitting of his intention so to do, may move that the debate shall not be further adjourned, or that the further consideration of any resolution or resolutions, clause or clauses, section or sections, preamble or preambles, title or titles, shall be the first business of the committee, and shall not further be postponed; and in either case such question shall be decided without debate or amendment; and if the same shall be resolved in the affirmative, no member shall thereafter speak more than once, or longer than twenty minutes, in any such adjourned debate; or, if in committee, on any such resolution, clause, section, preamble or title; and if such adjourned debate or postponed consideration shall not have been resumed or concluded before two of the clock in the morning, no member shall rise to speak after that hour, but all such questions as must be decided in order to conclude such adjourned debate or postponed consideration, shall be decided forthwith.

(4) On Thursday and Fridays when the Order of the Day is called for the House to go into Committee of Supply, or of Ways and Means, Mr. Speaker shall leave the Chair without putting any question, provided that, except by the consent of the House, the Estimates of each department shall be first taken up on a day other than Thursday or Friday.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the resolution which I have the honour to move this afternoon touches a very important subject, because it must be apparent to all hon. gentlemen in this House that unless we have such rules as permit the reasonable transaction of public business, and prescribe the ordinary and proper conduct of debate, Parliament must fail in its chief function, and the proceedings of this House are liable to be brought into disrepute and contempt. No one is more ready than I to acknowledge that liberty of speech and freedom of debate must be preserved, but I venture respectfully to suggest that these privileges must be observed and maintained under such conditions that they shall not be allowed to degenerate into license and obstruction. During the past sixteen or seventeen years, since I have been a member of this House, there has been a great deal of discussion with regard to the amendment of our rules. From time to time changes have been made in those rules, but they are still in a form which I think every hon. gentleman in this House, without distinction of party, will admit does, nevertheless, permit a much smaller number of hon. gentlemen than are usually comprised in the minority of the House actually to prevent the transaction of any public business. Let us look for a moment at the conditions under the present rules, and let us take the case of an ordinary Bill preceded by a resolution. I have asked the officers of the House to make up for me a statement as to the several stages at which debate and amendment would be permitted, and I find that, in the case of such a Bill as that to which I have alluded, there are no less than nineteen different stages including the committee stage, at which it would be possible for every hon. gentleman in the House to debate and discuss that particular measure, and I believe that at every one of those stages it would be possible for any hon. gentleman to move amendments to the measure. I shall leave out of consideration for the present the committee stage; to that I will allude in a moment, but if hon. gentlemen will take the eighteen stages exclusive of the committee stage, and add to these all the amendments that are possible, they will readily see that there may be, when the Speaker is sitting in the Chair, fifty or sixty or seventy different motions which every hon. gentleman in this House is at liberty to debate to the fullest possible extent, and at such length as shall seem to him desirable. It is perfectly obvious, it seems to me, that such conditions cannot possibly result in the efficient or satisfactory transaction of public business, particularly if a certain number of hon. gentlemen—even though they may comprise a very small proportion of the members of the House—are disposed to oppose the transaction of that business. If you add to these stages the period during which the Bill is in committee, when every hon. gentleman in the House is at liberty not only to speak, but to do so as many times as may please him, it will, I think, be apparent to every hon. gentleman in this House, and to every intelligent and reflecting man in the country, that the transaction of public business in those cases becomes impossible, unless you have a convention—what one might call closure by consent—between the parties, so that, at a particular stage, the debate, however lengthy it may have been, shall at last come to a close, and the majority of the House shall be permitted to express their opinion by a vote upon the measure under consideration. Under conditions as they are, I am very much reminded of the description which Thomas Carlyle gives, in the twenty-first volume of his Life of Frederick the Great, of the wonderful Polish Parliament, the proceedings of which he narrates. He says:

> In 1652, the incredible Law of Liberum Veto had been introduced, in spite of John and his endeavours. Liberum Veto; the power of one man to stop the proceedings of Polish parliament by pronouncing audibly 'Nie pozwalam, I don't permit!'—never before or since among mortals was so incredible a law. Law standing indisputable, nevertheless, on the Polish Statute-Book for above two hundred years; like an ever-flowing fountain of Anarchy, joyful to the Polish nation. How they got any business done at all, under such a law? Truly they did but little; and for the last thirty years as good as none. But if Polish parliament was universally in earnest to do some business, and Veto came upon it, hon. members, I observe, gathered passionately round the vetoing Brother; conjured, obtested, menaced, wept, prayed; and, if the case was too urgent and insoluble otherwise, the Nie Pozwalam gentleman still obstinate, they plunged their swords through him, and in that way brought consent. The commoner course was to dissolve and go home again, in a tempest of shrieks and curses.

When I bring to your attention the extraordinary number of stages through which every measure has to pass in running the gauntlet of this House, when you realize the opportunities for indefinite delay, I shall not use any stronger expression, which are afforded by rules so framed, I think you will come to the conclusion that this Parliament, in the face of determined and obstinate obstruction, is not in a position very much superior to that of the Polish parliament described by Thomas Carlyle in the passage which I have quoted.

I was alluding a moment ago to the transaction of business in the past. How has it been possible for Parliament since 1867, under the conditions which I have described, to transact public business? It has been possible, as I understand it, simply by means of what I might call closure by consent. That is to say, at a definite stage in a debate, when, in the judgment of the leading men of both sides of the House, it has proceeded far enough it has been the practice for a consultation to be held and a date to be fixed; and members who are not able to catch the Speaker's eye within the period so fixed are, by arrangements made on both sides of the House, practically excluded from taking part in the debate on that subject and the question is brought to an issue in that way. The difficulty has arisen in the past and arises to-day that conventions of that kind, which have in the past to a considerable extent obviated the necessity of any stronger form of rules, are not observed and therefore, not being observed, are not operative. I think the situation is very well expressed in an article which appeared in the Fortnightly Review in 1881, over the signature of Mr. Frederick Pollock, in which he made the following observations in regard to conditions in the British Parliament:

> The positive rules of debate are so framed as to leave an immense latitude to members and give immense opportunities for delay. They were framed and long acted upon, on the assumption that members of the House of Commons would behave themselves as reasonable men and gentlemen, and would not obstruct public business for obstruction's sake. But in the last two or three years certain ingenious members have invented the policy of obstruction for the set purpose of bringing the whole proceedings of Parliament to a dead-lock, and thus intimidating the House into compliance with their demands. What is the result of this? After all the House is master of its own rules, and will not allow them to be notoriously abused. A new rule has already been made; and if that is not found effectual, we cannot doubt that other and more stringent measures will be taken. The understanding founded on trust having broken down, positive regulation becomes needful.

I do not desire in the course of my remarks to call attention more than may be necessary to observations which have been made in this House during the present session as to the inadequacy of the rules, but it is certainly apparent to all of us that hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House have called our attention to this absurd condition in a very marked way indeed, and we have been told that the Government of this country is practically helpless, although it has a majority of forty-five in the House, who are ready to vote on measures after reasonable debate and to pronounce the verdict of the House upon them. Hon. gentlemen opposite have used very strong language in that respect. One notable utterance to which I have called attention I might be pardoned for mentioning again. That is a statement made by an hon. gentleman opposite which is only a sample of what has been been said by many hon. gentlemen opposite with the view, no doubt, of directing our attention to the fact that the rules as they exist at present are absolutely inadequate for the purpose of carrying on the business of the country:

> The spectacle presented by the Government of Canada to-day is a regrettable one, a Government fresh from the people with a normal majority in this House of forty-six or forty-eight, as helpless as children! The present Bill has now been under consideration for some time, and the Government are unable to pass it. What will the people say? They will say what they have already said—that it is time that they again went before the people, and if they do this the result will be known to no one better than to themselves. This is the first time in the history of Canada that a Government has been tied up in such a manner as this Government is to-day; they cannot move hand or foot, and will not be allowed to move until this Bill is either withdrawn or amended, and then go before the people and obtain their verdict as to what they should do.

I am sure that there could be no stronger admonition to hon. gentlemen on this side of the House as to the necessity of revising the rules than the advice contained in the quotation I have just read and it is entirely on the lines of what has been said by many hon. gentlemen opposite; but I shall not, at the present moment, stop to comment upon their advice. I think the last admonition came from the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) who, in a very smiling and somewhat cynical way, intimated to us the other day that it was absolutely impossible for the majority of this House to pass any measure without the censent of the minority. Considering the present rules, and in view of their effect and operation as I have already stated it, there is immense force in the point and the argument which the hon. member thus made in favour of some immediate change in the procedure.

I must advert at this stage to the view which has been taken by the press of the country as to the necessity for some change in the rules. Of course the voice of the press has varied from time to time, but I am taking certain observations made by journals which support hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House, as I imagine that these would be more effective by way of argument, or by way of appeal to them, than any observations which I might see fit to quote from any journals which usually support the party that is now in power. A leading journal in the West of Canada, the Winnipeg Free Press of 26th October, 1909, used this language:

The Dominion Government would have done well to introduce at the last session of Parliament, which was the first after the general elections, legislation for the revision of the rules of procedure so as to prevent the possibility of a minority of the House obstructing the public business, at great cost to the country. Such tactics were resorted to in the last Parliament, the result being that thousands of pages of 'Hansard' were filled with verbiage, the time of the House was unconscionably wasted, the heavy expense which Parliament is to the country every day it is in session was piled up senselessly, the health of the members of the House was subjected to severe strain and all absolutely to no purpose and with no result save the public disgust that was created by the spectacle of Parliament thus being reduced to impotence for weeks.

The first session of the new Parliament was the session at which the rules of procedure should have been revised; as it was not done, it should be attended to at the coming session. With each succeeding session, as the next general election campaign looms up nearer, the Government will find themselves more and more open to the accusation of using the majority power to choke off the Opposition. Revision of the rules is absolutely necessary, as was proved to a demonstration during the last Parliament; and when the next session begins, the Government should take as their motto in this connection, 'do it now.—

It will be useful also to quote an article from the leading organ of the Liberal party in the province of Ontario, the Toronto Globe, of 22nd April, 1911:

The application of the closure to debate at Ottawa seems inevitable. The one Parliament that retains the Great Britain tradition of free and unlimited debate has during the past few sessions proved that the system is no longer applicable to modern conditions. Parliament in Canada, with all the vast and complex problems arising out of the settlement of a half-continent to dispose of, cannot become a mere academic mutual improvement society. Debate must be a means, not an end. Liberty of speech in the Commons has degenerated into license, and a dozen inveterate talkers bore a weary House with talks that were old two thousand years ago, until the wonder is that enough members can be induced to remain in the Chamber to make a quorum.

Year by year the 'Hansard reports occupy a larger space on the library shelves and the length of the session stretches out. The tax on the time of the members will soon be so great that only men who have retired from business or who have no business at all will be able to serve in the Commons. It has become absolutely necessary to take steps towards the limitation of debate. Sir Wilfrid Laurier has been very much against limitation, but the proceedings during the past six months must have convinced him that there is no other way to prevent an utter breakdown of the Parliamentary machine. Mr. Borden also must be nauseated with the eloquence of some of the too wordy gentlemen in his immediate vicinity, and would no doubt welcome a change that might enable him to put a limit to it. A committee should be appointed for the thorough revision of the rules of debate, so that next session Parliament may be able to purge itself of the reproach that it is becoming a mere talking machine incapable of coping with the business laid before it.

Mr. GRAHAM: That is why he got some silent ones in the Government.

Mr. BORDEN: My hon. friend does not always seem sufficiently to realize the truth of the old proverb that speech is silvern, but silence is golden. Let me seriously call the attention of hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House to one phase of the argument put forward by the Toronto Globe for the limitation of the absolute license of debate which now exists in this Parliament. In Canada we are a very busy people, and I suppose that hon. gentlemen in this House who are not obliged to follow some avocation for the purpose of providing a livelihood for themselves and their families might be numbered on the fingers of one hand. We have no leisure class in this country to deal with affairs in Parliament, and it is better as it is. We want representatives of the people who are associated with the vital interests of the country of every kind to be here in Parliament, but, as the Toronto Globe very truly says, under existing conditions, and with sessions of Parliament drawn out to an absurd and unnecessary length as at present, and sometimes in the past, it is absolutely impossible to get the best representative elements to come into this Parliament to do the work of the country. That very consideration of itself will, I am sure, appeal to hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House as a strong reason why some fair limitation should be made immediately in the present rules.

I propose next to quote again from the Manitoba Free Press of Thursday 27th April, 1911:

If the challenge for a trial of strength is made the Government should meet it and fight it out to a finish, if it takes all summer and next winter too. The inevitable victory, when it comes, should carry with it the closure which will take our Parliament out of the freak class and make it an assembly that can act as well as talk. The Canadian is the only British Parliament of the first rank which has not the closure. It is high time that it lost this undesirable distinction.

Then, again, I quote from the Toronto Globe of 28th April, 1911:

The Government should make it plain that the penalty of deliberate obstruction would be a few weeks of continuous session. Before the steady pressure of that sort of logic obstruction will not long make headway. Already a number of the western and eastern Conservatives are very restive, and only the determined attitude of the Ontario holds them in line. The heat of the summer will do much to lessen the fighting spirit of the irreconcilables, and if they hold out through June and July, then August would be an excellent month for introducing that much needed measure, a bill for applying the principle of closure to Parliamentry debate in Canada.

Then, I observe in the Ottawa Free Press of 27th Auril, 1911, an article on the kangaroo closure, as it is known in the British Parliament. I need not read more than a short extract from that editorial:

The kangaroo closure which was enforced in the British House Tuesday, is the latest device known to Parliament of cutting the talk short and getting the business on remarks the Manchester Guardian. The need for some sort of closure has been evident of late in the Canadian Parliament and the Guardian's description is, therefore, of interest.

Then, I observe a reference to the same subject in the Edmonton Daily Bulletin of 11th May. 1911 I need not read the whole of it. but one or two sentences might be useful for reference:

A group of strong-headed tongue-waggers have it in their power to hold up the course of business as long as they please, and to block indefinitely the passage of any measure, however large the number of their fellows favourable to it, and however warmly the public approve of it. The performance is purely a physical one, and leather lungs are the only qualification necessary, save a callous indifference to the rights of the too tolerant majority in the House and out of it.

I am not at all attributing that language to the hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver), because I am sure that if he had expressed himself on the question, he would have used much stronger terms.

We are appealing to hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House as to the wisdom and the necessity of some amendment and for that reason I have made these quotations. But I wish also to cite the utterances of some hon. gentlemen who are more closely identified with the leadership of the Liberal party than are the editors of the journals from which I have taken these citations. On February 13, 1908, the Hon. W. S. Fielding, then Minister of Finance, used this language in the House of Commons, and I am quoting it also for the reason that my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition, when I alluded to it a few days ago, was inclined, as I understood him, to dispute my recollection as to what Mr. Fielding actually did say. Mr. Fielding used this language ('Hansard,' 1908, page 3110):

I said the other day, in answer to a question concerning a certain motion, that any hon. member could only have such rights in this House as the majority afford him. Surely the hon. gentleman does not dispute that. If the majority exercise that right unwisely, there is the remedy in publicity. I repeat the statement I then made, no hon. member in this House can have any rights in the procedure in the House except what the majority of the House see fit to give.

Mr. Foster: I do not care to discuss that question with my hon. friend. The majority might say, we have a greater number here than you people have, and we will pass a resolution that no member of the Opposition shall speak a word in this House. Have they the right to do that?

Mr. Fielding: Yes. No public deliberative assembly could be conducted upon any other principle than that the wish of the majority shall prevail. If that majority acts foolishly, harshly, then the remedy is in public opinion. I repeat the statement that in this or any other deliberative assembly no member can have a right in the deliberations of the House except what the majority gives him.

It is not at all necessary to go as far as Mr. Fielding did in that statement, for the purpose of arriving at the conclusion that some reasonable amendment to the rules of the House at the present time is not only desirable, but is absolutely necessary if public business is to be transacted. Mr. Fielding's remarks were alluded to again in the House on June 5, 1908 ('Hansard,' page 9897). I quote:

Mr. Owen: I have not forgotten that the Minister of Finance did say a few months ago that we have no rights in this House.

Mr. Fielding: That phrase for a time seemed to do my hon. friends opposite some good. I will be glad to repeat the same statement and give my hon. friends the benefit of it once more. Every member of this House and every group of members has just as much right as the majority accord to them, and no more. That is true to-day as it was true then. But the trouble is my hon. friends opposite have abused their rights. The trouble is that we have got into the habit of permitting an easy going method of procedure whereby hon. gentlemen opposite are permitted to delay the business of the House to an extent that would not be allowed in any civilized country outside of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Fielding: It was just such difficulty that compelled the mother of parliaments to adopt a procedure which allows the majority to rule. But it is difficult to bring some people to understand why the majority of this Parliament should not rule. Let it be understood that if men on both sides would realize their responsibility, if they would realize their obligations to the state as well as their party interests, they would admit that this Parliament has allowed a latitude and freedom of discussion which enables any half dozen men in this House to hold up any one measure the whole session. It was never supposed that any member would abuse that privilege the way the hon. gentlemen opposite are doing.

There was another very much respected member of the House and of the late Government, the Hon. William Paterson, who, in 1908 ('Hansard,' page 10137) used this language:

If there is anything in the minds of the people at present on which, when the Government ask for a verdict, they will get a favourable verdict by an overwhelming majority, it is this question of obstruction. I can tell you that the rules of this House must be revised in such a manner, that while the amplest time will be given for the discussion of every question and the investigation of every subject, there must be a means devised whereby the hon. member for North Toronto and the little clique around him will not be able to keep this House sitting indefinitely. This is the issue that will be pronounced upon, and the party which will favour a revision of the rules in order that something within the lines of decency may be maintained and the country's money saved, will be endorsed by the people, and the party which will be entrusted with the carrying out of that reform will be the party that has ever carried out all reforms.

After the dissolution of Parliament in 1907, a good deal was said upon this subject by several members of the then Government, some of whom are in the House to-day, and some of whom are not. If we are to take what these hon. gentlemen said, upon their responsibility as ministers of the Crown, we can come to no other than this conclusion: that the late Administration had arrived at a definite determination to revise the rules of Parliament by adopting the closure if they had been returned to power. In support of that I will quote three separate utterances of the then Minister of Agriculture, the Hon. Sydney Fisher. Speaking at Waterloo, Que., on August 1, 1911, he said:

Now, if we are returned to power, we will pass reciprocity and we will also pass a measure changing the rules so that the business of the country may go briskly forward, without obstruction. It is only right that it should be so. Full investigation we believe in, but empty obstruction is a drag on the country.

Speaking again, as reported in the Montreal Herald, on August 19, 1911, at Magog, Que., he said:

So long as a small minority or any group can take up the time of Parliament in order to hear themselves talk, it is impossible to avoid waste of time—

I would like hon. gentlemen, and especially my hon. friends on the other side of the House, to note the language of Mr. Fisher that follows:

—and I give my pledge that, if the Laurier Government is returned again, the rules of the House will be changed. I consider present conditions inimical to the proper conduct of public business.

Speaking again at Knowlton, Que., August 21, 1911, as reported in the Montreal Herald, the Hon. Sydney Fisher said:

The minister stated that it was the intention of the Government, should it be returned, to so change the rules of the House, that such obstruction would in future be impossible.

Another member of the late Government, the ex-Minister of Justice, Sir Allen Aylesworth, used very strong language indeed with regard to the same matter during the same campaign. Sir Allen Aylesworth on two occasions spoke of the necessity of some revision of the rules. At Newmarket, on the 2nd day of June, 1911, he is reported as having used this language:

Now, some attention has recently been paid to that (the prevention of obstruction) by reason of some remarks uttered by Hon. Sydney Fisher in the Eastern Township. He was expressing no more than I would express, no more than every Liberal in the House would express. Things have come to a pass which threatens the destruction of representative institutions. I make that statement with a full sense of the responsibility upon me for what I utter, with the full sense that I speak as a member of Parliament and a minister of the Crown. Under our existing rules of procedure there is no limit upon talk. When the House is in Committee of the Whole each member may speak as often as he pleases, and any half-dozen men can obstruct the business of the House and prevent the other two hundred and ten from doing any business. I think this is a perilous state of things. Every other representative House of Parliament in the British Empire, every other Parliament in any English-speaking country of this globe, has put an end to that condition of things. The Canadian House of Commons stands alone to-day among the representative bodies of the world were such a thing as I have described is possible. Some of our members think this is to the credit of Canada and the Canadian House of Commons. For myself I do not share that view. I must say that from what I have witnessed of what goes on session after session, I am prepared to vote closure, and to stay there to put closure through, no matter how long that may take. . . . When a member stands up in the House and reads for over an hour from school books simply to the others, for no other purpose than to prevent a vote; when a member of Parliament so far forgets his responsibilities, his duty to his country and the people who sent him there; when he deliberately descends to the level of obstructing public business, he deserves to be gagged, and I am ready to do it.

Sir Allen Aylesworth followed up that statement on the 12th day of August, 1911, by using this language:

The Minister of Justice dealt briefly with the situation prior to dissolution. It cost the country some $5,000 per day to keep Parliament in session. For two weeks the Opposition had deliberately thrown this public money away. Unless the rules were changed, Parliament was no place for any man whose time was worth something. The Minister advocated a change in the rules of the House of Commons, under which such senseless waste of time could not take place. The Liberal party in England had to adopt such a course, and it would be necessary for Canadian Liberals to deal with obstruction which sought to impede the onward march of progress in Canada.

I am not absolutely sure that I have secured everything said by gentlemen who were members of the late Administration. I might add to what I have just placed before the House, a statement in the Ottawa Free Press of August 16, 1911, which is attributed to my hon. friend, the member for Russell (Mr. Murphy), who was then Secretary of State for Canada:

Under the rules of the House, as they exist, the majority was at the mercy of the minority. If the Opposition chose to abuse their power the Government is powerless to prevent it. Under these circumstances there was nothing left for the Government but to ask that the issue should be submitted to the people and let the people decide. Hon. Mr. Lemieux said at St. Hyacinthe that some measure of closure would be necessary in order to make it impossible for the Opposition to obstruct the business of the country, and, he (Mr. Murphy) was perfectly in accord with that proposition. The closure existed in Great Britain, in France and in the United States and it must come to Canada.

My hon. friend the member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux), speaking at St. Hyacinthe on August 13, 1911, is reported as having used this language. It is doubtless his remarks on that occasion that were alluded to by the hon. member for Russell in the passage which I have just read:

In the regular order of things the present Parliament should not have been dissolved until 1913. The liberty of speech is one of our most prized conquests, but the abuse of this liberty, that is obstruction, is a vice and should be extirpated from our political life, and when returned to power Sir Wilfrid Laurier will introduce a law providing for the exercise of closure in Parliamentary debates.

I have not the slightest doubt that a further research into the speeches made by members of the late Administration during the campaign of 1911 would still further demonstrate that there was a determination on the part of that Administration to introduce closure rules in this House if they had been returned to power. If we are to realize that the gentlemen from whose speeches I have quoted were conscious of the responsibility which attached to their utterances, I venture to submit, that we have the plainest possible proof that such was the absolute and definite determination of the late Administration, and that they recognized, as we recognize to-day, that some reasonable limit must be placed upon debate in order that the public business may be transacted and that the will of the majority shall in the end prevail.

As all hon. gentlemen in this House know, the subject was dealt with in the United Kingdom many years ago. It was first effectively dealt with in 1882. It might not be amiss, in order that the view of so great a parliamentarian and statesman as Mr. Gladstone might be brought to the attention of the House, that I should make one or two brief extracts from speeches which he delivered in connection with this subject. As reported in the Parliamentary Debates, Volume 266, page 1138, he said:

You may tolerate excess from love of liberty of speech even when it descends into frivolity or into license, for fear of making some mistake dangerous to that liberty. But although on that account I do not grudge the enormous patience which the House has exhibited, the enormous suffering which it has been content to undergo—nay—the disparagement of its usefulness which it has witnessed without an effort to apply an effective remedy, yet I feel, on the other hand, that there is a point beyond which you cannot allow things to go, and I wish to urge upon the House that that limit has been reached.

Again, in the same volume, at page 1143, speaking of lengthened sittings, he said:

They are not merely most powerful means of obstruction; they are not merely most powerful means of inflicting suffering on the members of the House. They are totally incompatable with the dignity and credit of this House. Grievous as they are they are almost as ludicrous in the eyes of the community as they are grievous, the whole idea of the conversion of night into day, the disruption of the common order,—already hard pressed by our ordinary proceedings—in which time and business are distributed and the exhibition of a great and powerful assembly in such an attitude before the community, almost amounts to a degradation and depth of insult offered to the House such as I may say, we ought to endeavour to wipe out.

In the concluding part of his speech, on the 20th February, 1882, he said:

I trust that this House will always continue to appreciate—I would almost say worship—liberty of speech, and that it will continue to tolerate, for the sake of liberty of speech, the license of speech which mocks and counterfeits that liberty of speech. But, however large its fund of patience, and however wise that patience may be, I hope it will not carry that tolerance to such a point that it shall of itself become the grossest of all the vices of a legislative body, and that it shall reach a point where it will inflict upon the House of Commons an incapacity for the discharge of its duties.

And so, as we know, the closure was introduced in the Parliament of the United Kingdom, and it exists there to-day. The question of procedure in the British House of Commons has been lately under consideration in that body; and, after an experience of more than thirty years, we find the great statesman who is now Prime Minister of Great Britain expressing himself, on the 14th of March last, in this way with regard to the subject. I quote from the Parliamentary Debates, volume 50, No. 5, column 608, the remarks of Mr. Asquith:

We have adopted, as I have said, the closure and the guillotine. We have done so for reasons which are not peculiar to this House, but which have been found operative in almost every legislative assembly in the world. I believe I am right in saying that with the exception of the American Senate and the Canadian Parliament there is no legislative assembly in any free country that has not some machinery, not precisely identical or even similar, but some machinery of this kind for the purpose of preventing obstruction and facilitating the transaction of business. I am quite sure, though I say it not as any lover of these expedients, and as one who has denounced them in language as strong as anybody on those benches—I say with unaffected reluctance and regret that I am perfectly certain it would be perfectly impossible for any Government to conduct the affairs of the nation and carry through the legislation to which it is pledged without having recourse in the future as in the past to machinery of this kind.

So far as the testimony of the British Parliament goes, we have these facts before us. More than thirty years ago, in 1882, Mr. Gladstone, by reason of the absolute breakdown of the parliamentary machinery under the rules as they existed then—and they were precisely the rules under which we are working to-day—found it necessary to make important amendment in order that public business might be carried on, that parliamentary government might not be brought into discredit and disrepute and thta Parliament might not become incapable of exercising its true and natural functions. We find his great successor, the present Prime Minister of Great Britain, Mr. Asquith, stating, in language which I have quoted, and no further back than the 14th day of last month, that the Canadian Parliament and the Senate of the United States are the only two great legislative bodies in the world that are to-day attempting to carry on their business without some machinery of this kind; and that without such machinery, according to his judgment, founded upon an experience of thirty or forty years, it is absolutely impossible for Parliament to perform its duties, and more than that, it is absolutely impossible for any government to pass through Parliament the measures which it brings down and to the passage of which it is pledged. I have ventured to make these somewhat extensive quotations because it seems to me that it is a proper thing not only to touch upon our own experience in such a matter, but also to bring to the attention of the House and of the country the fact that the Parliament of Canada alone, with the exception of the Senate of the United States, is the one legislative body that is attempting to carry on public business under rules such as we have and which, in the experience of every hon. gentleman in this House, have proved absolutely ineffective for the purpose of enabling the Government or Parliament to make progress with public affairs. In Canada itself, in one legislature at least, that of the province of British Columbia, the English rules of closure, as they now exist, have been in force for many years. I am not sure about any other legislative body in Canada, but I do know, from having procured a copy of the rules of the legislature of British Columbia, that the English closure rules as they exist to-day, have been in full force in the province of British Columbia for some time.

Now, I come to the question of the amendments which we propose; and I would like to say, in the first place, that we have not thought it wise to make the proposed amendment as drastic as the rules which are in force in Great Britain.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. PUGSLEY: More drastic.

Mr. BORDEN: More drastic?

Mr. PUGSLEY: Yes.

Mr. BORDEN: I have read them, and not only read them but re-read them many times, and that is not my appreciation of their effect. However, I would like to say that if we put these rules in force and hon. gentlemen opposite think them more drastic than the English rules, I would be prepared to adopt the English rules. And, further, if these rules bear the construction my hon.

friend puts upon them, certainly that was not the intention of those who framed them. Let us for a moment see what the rules are. The first amendment is proposed as a subsection to rule 17, in the following words:

(2) Every motion heretofore debatable made upon routine proceedings, except adjournment motions and every motion standing on the order of the proceedings for the day, or, for the concurrence in a report of a standing or a special committee, or for the previous question, or for the third reading of a Bill, or for the adjournment of the House when made for the purpose of discussing a definite matter of urgent public importance, or for the adoption in Committee of the Whole, or for Supply, or of Ways and Means, or the resolution clause, section, preamble or title under consideration shall be debatable; but all other motions shall be decided without debate or amendment.

The object of that rule was to give full opportunity for debate upon what I would call every substantial motion. What is the meaning of the expression: the order of the proceedings of the day? That is the technical description, given in the rules, of the document which I hold in my hand. It is alluded to in rule 61:

The Clerk of the House shall place on the Speaker's table, every morning, previous to the meeting of the House, the order of the proceedings for the day.

That seems to be the technical name for this document. Well, there you have, in the first place an opportunity for debate of every motion which appears on this Order Paper. Take the Order Paper for to-day: Government Notices of Motion; Government Orders; Notices of Motion; Public Bills and Orders. Every one of the motions which stand under these different headings is debatable under the rule we propose. Then, every motion that is made upon routine proceedings, for example a motion to adopt the report of a committee, a motion with respect to any matter of privilege—every motion that is ordinarily made upon routine procedure will continue to be debatable in the future as it has been debatable in the past.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): What motions which it is now permissible to debate are to be excluded by this rule under the following words of the first part of the motion: Every motion heretofore debatable made upon routine proceedings?

Mr. BORDEN: Motions to adjourn a debate, motions to adjourn the House, or that the Chairman do leave the Chair, or that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again. Such motions which ought to be regarded as purely formal, are not under these rules to be debatable, and they are not debatable, so far as I know, under the rules of any important legislative body. But everything that raises a direct question with regard to any matter under the consideration of the House will be as fully debatable in the future as it has been in the past. We have been careful to preserve the rights of the members of the House in this respect, because we go on to use the words, 'for the concurrence in a report of a standing or a special committee,' in order that there may be no doubt about that matter. Motions for the previous question will continue to be debatable, although they are not debatable in Great Britain, Australia, the United States House of Representatives, or in most of the legislative bodies of the world. Then the words 'or for the third reading of a Bill' are inserted in the clause for the reason that, when a Bill comes out of committee without amendment, the third reading is sometimes called without its appearing on the Order Paper and, if we had not inserted those words, we might have cut out debate upon the third reading, which we certainly have no desire to do. We have, therefore, inserted these words as a safeguard to the minority in the House. It is also provided:

Or for the adoption, in Committee of the Whole, or of Supply, or of Ways and Means, of the resolution, clause, section, preamble or title under consideration, shall be debatable; but all other motions shall be decided without debate or amendment.

Mr. EMMERSON: In the event of an hon. member rising on a question of privilege with a view to making a motion, would debate be permissible?

Mr. BORDEN: Certainly.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Under what clause?

Mr. BORDEN: Under motions—routine proceedings.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Surely not under routine proceedings?

Mr. BORDEN: As I understand it, the proper place is upon motions. I remember that I had that matter under consideration very soon after I came into the House. I went to Sir John Bourinot, who was then the Clerk of the House, and who had had great experience, and he told me to make my motion as a question of privilege upon the calling of motions under routine proceedings, and that this was the proper course to take in such cases.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Take the motion made by the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe (Mr. Gauthier), who made a certain charge against a minister of the Crown, and moved that it be referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. I would ask my right hon. friend if, under clause one that motion would not be prevented from being debated?

Mr. BORDEN: Not at all. I remember the occasion very well indeed. The hon. member for West Lambton (Mr. Pardee) came to me that afternoon, and I said to him: 'Is not the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe going on this afternoon'? We had passed the motions stage of the proceedings, and I had supposed that he was going to make his statement and his motion then and there; but the hon. member told me that he intended to make it upon the Orders of the Day. I think that the proper place to have made it would have been under motions; so far as I am concerned I so understand the rules. No objection will ever be raised on this side of the House to any question of privilege being brought up on such an occasion when a motion is proposed to be made. I would be the last one in the world to attempt any revision of the rules which would tend to take away any such right, and I can assure my hon. friends on the other side of the House that there is absolutely no desire or intention of doing anything of the kind.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The second clause does it.

Mr. BORDEN: I do not so understand it, and if a question is ever put to this House by way of an appeal from the ruling of the Speaker, I venture to say it will not be so decided.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. CARVELL: He will not always be there.

Mr BORDEN: My hon. friends are very suspicious; I think they should be prepared to accept my word in the matter. If they can subsequently convince me that I have been wrong in that regard, I promise to amend the rules, although I have not received very much encouragement from my hon. friends on the other side of the House to deal with these matters by way of conciliation. I simply desire to say that these rules do not, in my opinion, bear the construction which hon. gentlemen have put upon them, and that, so long as I occupy the position which I do at the present time, the rules will not be construed in the sense attributed to them by the hon. member for St. John. There is no desire or intention to take away from any hon. gentleman on the other side of the House any legitimate right he now possesses to bring forward a matter of that kind, and it would be absolute folly on the part of this or any government to attempt to enforce rules designed to have such an effect. Nor do I propose to attempt to do this, and if an hon gentleman on the other side desires to bring to the attention of the House, with a view to making a motion upon it, a matter of privilege, I say to him now that if he will make this motion as I made it in 1898 or 1899--under motions—he will be regarded as being strictly in order.

Mr. OLIVER: Will debate on that motion, under the rule, be in order?

Mr. BORDEN: Certainly.

Mr. OLIVER: Why not say so in the rule?

Mr. BORDEN: We have said so in the rule. as I understand it. Motions are classed under routine proceedings, and it is upon motions that I understand any such statement might be made, or any motion founded upon it might be introduced.

Mr. BELAND: Are we to understand that only adjournment motions will not be debatable, or where does the exception stop?

Mr. MURPHY: Should there not be a comma after the words 'except adjournment motions'?

Mr. BORDEN: The exception stops there—'except adjournment motions.'

Mr. BELAND: All other motions are debatable?

Mr. BORDEN: All other motions.

Mr. PUGSLEY: What are the motions which are included in these words: 'all other motions shall be decided without debate or amendment'?

Mr. BORDEN: I have enumerated some of them to my hon. friend; if necessary, I can, before the debate closes, further enumerate them as they have been presented to me by the officers of the House. What we have sought to do is to provide that all substantial motions, which bring into question the propriety of passing any Bill, measure, or vote, shall be debatable in the future as they have been in the past, but that purely formal motions, which, under the existing rules, would be used only for dilatory purposes, shall not in future continue to be debatable. That has been our object, and we propose to carry it into effect in a reasonable way.

The second rule we propose is this:

Immediately before the Order of the Day for resuming an adjourned debate is called, or if the House be in Committee of the Whole, or of Supply, or of Ways and Means, any minister of the Crown who, standing in his place, shall have given notice at a previous sitting of his intention so to do, may move that the debate shall not be further adjourned, or that the further consideration of any resolution or resolutions, clause or clauses, section or sections, preamble or preambles, title or titles, shall be the first business of the committee, and shall not further be postponed; and in either case such question shall be decided without debate or amendment; and if the same shall be resolved in the affirmative, no member shall thereafter speak more than once, or longer than twenty minutes in any such adjourned debate; or, if in committee, on any such resolution, clause, section, preamble or title; and if such adjourned debate or postponed consideration shall not have been resumed or concluded before two of the clock in the morning, no member shall rise to speak after that hour, but all such questions as must be decided in order to conclude such adjourned debate or postponed consideration, shall be decided forthwith.

The advantage which I think that proposal gives to the minority over the English rule is this, at least this was the intention we had in framing it in that way. I may frankly say that in debating the necessity for a change of rules there was some opinion that the English rules, just as they exist. had better be adopted but it seemed to us, on account of certain differences in the constitution of this Parliament from that of the British Parliament. that it would be fairer to give at least twenty-four hours' notice of the date at which the debate would be brought to a conclusion.

Mr. PUGSLEY: At which the guillotine would fall.

Mr. BORDEN: My hon. friend may phrase it in any way he sees fit. If this be a guillotine——

Mr. PUGSLEY: A guillotine of the worst kind.

Mr. BORDEN: —it is a guillotine which is in use in a much more aggravated form in every other important legislative body in the world. I shall give my hon. friend in a moment a quotation as to how it operates in the United States under certain conditions that we have adopted in this rule. In the first place, it seems to me that this rule may operate in Canada—and I speak to my hon. friends on the other side of the House with perfect frankness—as it has operated in many countries in the world, that is to say that the mere existence of the rule will itself prevent the necessity of its being brought into practice, at least very frequently.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Holding a terror above our heads.

Mr. BORDEN: Not at all; that is not the way in which I would desire to exercise a power of this kind. I would think that if this rule passes, things might go on in future just as they have in the past. I would always ask my right hon. friend what length of time he desired to conclude any particular debate, and I would hope that in the future we would be able, as we have been in the past, to come to some conclusion without invoking these rules. I would hope that would be the case. I am not disposed, as I think even my hon. friends on the other side of the House will admit, to use unfairly any power that I might possess.

I would think that any reasonable doubt as to the time within which a debate should be concluded ought to be resolved in favour of the minority. I will go so far as to say that. The object of bringing these rules into force is not for the purpose of repressing the minority or taking away the right of liberty of speech, but purely for the one overmastering reason, namely, that the Parliament of Canada may not become a byword and a reproach, and that it may be able to transact public business.

Mr. TURRIFF: Are the present rules under which we are working not the same rules that enabled my right hon. friend the present Prime Minister to compel the late Government to withdraw an amendment to the Manitoba Election Act and to compel the late Government to appeal to the people on the proposition of reciprocity?

Mr. BORDEN: As far as the Manitoba Election Act is concerned, I would invite my hon. friend to seek some information from his leader. So far as other matters are concerned, I can only say to my hon. friend that the rules which we have to-day were in force in 1911, and if he alludes to that time, there has not been any change since; but the very statements which I have quoted in such abundance, not only from the Liberal press but from the Liberal leaders, ought to be convincing to my hon. friend that some amendment of those rules is necessary, unless he is disposed to throw to one side altogether the weighty opinions which I have quoted at considerable length.

It is proposed that the power which is to be exercised under this section shall be exercised upon the responsibility of a minister of the Crown who, standing in his place, shall give notice at any sitting that he will, at a subsequent sitting, move that the debate shall not be further adjourned or that the consideration of any measure in committee shall not be further postponed. When that takes place what happens? Under the rules, as I understand, this will happen, that whether the House be sitting with the Speaker in the Chair or in Committee, no member shall thereafter speak in such adjourned debate or upon such further consideration more than once or for a longer period than twenty minutes; and it seems to me that the practice of reducing speeches to that length of time, upon notice to the minority of the House, ought to enable them to concentrate their fire more effectively than they are apt to do under the present rule, upon the exact portion of a Bill or measure to which they are opposed.

Mr. LEMIEUX: In measuring the length of time under this clause (3), has the right hon. gentleman considered the case of a debate where the two languages might be used?

Mr. BORDEN: I do not quite appreciate the suggestion why that should either increase or diminish the length of time allowed. If the hon. member can bring any consideration of that kind to my attention, the rules might be amended at a subsequent date to guard against such difficulty but at present it is not comprehensible to me. The chief question, in my mind, is whether we have not made the period too long. In the House of Representatives in the United States the period is five minutes, and I will read what Mr. Bryce says as to the character of the five-minute speeches which are elicited by such a rule. In his work on 'The American Commonwealth' Mr. Bryce says:

> Most of the practical work is done in the standing committees, while much of the House's time is consumed in pointless discussions, where member after member delivers himself upon large questions not likely to be brought to a definite issue. Many of these speeches thus called forth have a value as repertoire of facts, but the debate as a whole is unprofitable and languid. On the other hand, the five minutes' debates which take place when the House imposes that limit of time, in committee of the whole on the consideration of a Bill reported from a standing committee are often lively, pointed and effective.

If hon. gentlemen will take the trouble to examine the debates in the House of Representatives in the United States when this five-minute rule is enforced, they will see that every member who speaks with only five minutes of time at his disposal, hits the question on the head at once without losing any time whatever in irrelevant remarks. My only doubt as to the period we have fixed in these rules is whether we have not made it too long.

The last rule which we propose is:

> On Thursdays and Fridays when the Order of the Day is called for the House to go into Committee of Supply, or of Ways and Means, Mr. Speaker shall leave the Chair without putting any question, provided that, except by the consent of the House, the estimates of each department shall be first taken up on a day other than Thursday or Friday.

The idea is to enable the House to consider in Committee of Supply on two days of the week, at least, the estimates of the Government which, as we all know take a very long time. There have been suggestions in this House during the past sixteen years that some better procedure with regard to the estimates should be adopted. In the first place, I think both sides of the House have suggested that the estimates should be referred to a very large committee of the House, that the proceedings of that committee should be reported, and that the committee should report to the House those items which they think ought to be discussed in Committee of the Whole House. That is too large a question for us to take up at the present time, but it may require to be taken up in the future. As Mr. Bryce says with regard to the practice in the United States House of Representatives, most of the work is done in large standing committees. It may be possible, at some future date, so to amend the rules that a good deal of the work, which now occupies the attention of the House sitting in Committee of the Whole, might be done in some other and more effective way, without depriving the minority of the full privilege of criticism to which they are entitled. It is to the advantage of the Government, as well as of the Opposition of the country that there should be the most thorough criticism upon the estimates, or upon any other measure of the Government and we do not desire in the least to avoid it. As hon. members will notice, it is provided that no estimates can be taken up on Thursday or Friday until they have been first considered on some other day of the week.

Mr. GRAHAM: Unless by consent.

Mr. BORDEN: I think my hon. friend has mis-read it. It says:

> Provided that, except by the consent of the House, the estimates of each department shall be first taken up on a day other than Thursday or Friday.

They must be taken up on some other day unless the House consents.

Mr. PUGSLEY: That means the majority.

Mr. BORDEN: I should think my hon. friends would want them taken up on some other day.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Hear, hear.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The majority could decline to do so.

Mr. BORDEN: Either I misunderstand it, or my hon. friend misunderstands it. You cannot take them up on Thursday or Friday in the first instance, you must take them first up on some other day of the week so that any motion can be moved in respect to the administration of the department.

Mr. GRAHAM: That would mean the unanimous consent.

Mr. BORDEN: I will change that to unanimous consent, if my hon. friends will agree.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: We want to debate it first.

Mr. BORDEN: Then my right hon. friend does not agree to change it?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I want to debate it first, for there is room for discussion on that.

Mr. BORDEN: I offer to change it if my hon. friends desire it.

Mr. BELAND: We might do that in committee.

Mr. BORDEN: Very good, if my right hon. friend wants to debate it——

Mr. OLIVER: If the Prime Minister's intention is good, his drafting is bad.

Mr. BORDEN: As a very long debate would be involved in any motion for such consent, I do not think it would be very likely that the Government would embark on that course, even if my hon. friends were right in this construction of the proposed rule, which I do not admit. However, my hon. friends are not willing to accept what I have offered.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: There are other objections. In my judgment, it is a very objectionable clause, the whole of it.

Mr. BORDEN: I think that, as it is, it means unanimous consent. However, I have already offered to phrase it in that way, and if my hon. friends on the other side of the House are not willing to accept that offer, we will let it stand as it is.

Now, I have gone over the rules as fully as I think is necessary at the present time. The rules that are to be put in force must of course be exercised prudently and fairly. It would not be to the interest of any government to exercise them unfairly, and I am sure that, so far as referring these rules to a committee is concerned, I would be very glad indeed to refer them to a committee of the House or to debate them in a committee of the whole House, if it were not for the very great loss of time and the indefinite delay which would apparently be involved in any such step. We think that the time has come when the rules of the House ought to be amended, and we are sincerely endeavouring to amend them in a way which will be fair to the minority of the House, and which at the same time will enable public business to be carried on in a reasonable and normal manner. I am willing, however, to say this, that if these rules pass, I shall be perfectly willing at the opening of another session to refer all the rules of the House to a committee of the House in order that in other respects, as well as in those to which I have alluded, there should be a thorough revision, which I think is very much needed.

In the meantime, I commend the rules to the consideration and approval of hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House in the full conviction that they have been drawn up in such a way, and with such provisos and safeguards, that hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House will be absolutely secured of their full rights of speech with regard to any public measure that may be presented for the consideration of this Parliament. But, consistently with that, it is eminently proper, as every one in this House and in this country will realize, that a parliament should not sit, as we have sat, for nearly five months since the 21st day of November last, and practically accomplish nothing at all in respect to the public business which is before it. If Parliament can be detained in that way for five months without making any substantial progress with the programme of the Government of the day, it can be detained for twelve months, or fifteen months, or eighteen months. Parliamentary institutions under such conditions would be practically useless; and all that we desire—and I speak in the most absolute sincerity to hon. gentlemen opposite—is to bring about such conditions as will permit to each and every one of them all reasonable freedom of debate, and at the same time permit the Government and the majority in this House to go on in a reasonable way with the public business of the country.

The Right Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier and the Hon. J. D. Hazen, Minister of Marine and Fisheries, having risen in their places:

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member for Quebec East (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) is accorded the floor.

Mr. W. B. NORTHRUP (Hastings East): I rise under rule 17, Mr. Speaker, which rule, if I may be allowed to read it to the House, is as follows:

When two or more members rise to speak, Mr. Speaker calls upon the member who first rose in his place; but a motion may be made that any member who has risen 'be now heard' or 'do now speak,' which motion shall be forthwith put without debate.

Under that rule of the House, I beg to move, seconded by Mr. Blain, member for Peel:

That the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, being the member for the City and County of St. John, be now heard.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Shame!

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: When you have a majority in this House, that is what we have to expect from you—shame!

Mr. BELAND: Withdraw that motion.

Mr. OLIVER: What does the Prime Minister say?

Mr. SPEAKER: It is moved by Mr. Northrup, seconded by Mr. Blain, that the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, being the member for the City and County of St. John, be now heard.

Some hon. MEMBERS: He will never be heard.

The question having been put:

Some hon. MEMBERS: Read it in French.

The motion was then read in French.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I rise to a point of order. The motion should read:

That the member for Quebec East and the member for the City and County of St. John having risen at the same time, the member for the City and County of St. John be now heard.

The motion as it stands is not correct.

Mr. BORDEN: The motion is precisely in the form provided by rule 17.

Mr. SPEAKER: I did not feel that I had the responsibility of going beyond the motion put in my hand.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I am rising to a point of order. The motion as it stands is not complete.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Will you allow me to speak?

Mr. SPEAKER: No. After the members are all in, a point of order cannot be raised, because I have put the question to the House and we are taking the vote.

Mr. LEMIEUX: What becomes of the first ruling?

Mr. HENDERSON: It is over-ruled.

Mr. SPEAKER: My intention was to state to the House the position in which the matter stood, namely, that the two members rose to speak, and I decided that the member for Quebec East had the floor, and then the motion which I have read was put.

House divided on the motion of Mr. Northrup:

Motion agreed to.

Mr. HAZEN: Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Other hon. MEMBERS: Sit down.

Mr. HAZEN: I move, seconded by Mr. Cochrane—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Sit down, sit down.

Mr. HAZEN:—that this question be now put.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Other hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr SPEAKER: I would like to call the attention of hon. members to rule 3, which says that when a member is speaking no member shall interrupt him except on a point of order. That is a plain and specific rule, which hon. members, I think, should observe fairly.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I rise to a point of order. The point is that the motion of the previous question—that the question be now put—is not in order when it is moved upon a motion relating to the transaction of public business. The resolution moved by the right hon. the Prime Minister relates to the transaction of public business, the business of this House, and it is laid down by May that on such a motion the previous question cannot be put. I refer Your Honour to May's Parliamentary Practice, Eleventh Edition, page 283:

Mr. SPEAKER

The previous question has been moved upon the various stages of a Bill, but it cannot be moved upon an amendment; though, after an amendment has been agreed to, the previous question can be put on the main question, as amended. Nor can the previous question be moved upon a motion relating to the transaction of public business or the meeting of the House, nor in any committee.

That is the statement made by Sir Erskine May, who was in his lifetime, for forty or fifty years, one of the greatest parliamentary authorities in the world, being practically the advisor of successive speakers during that long period of time.

I think your honour will agree that the resolution moved by my right hon. friend is one distinctly relating to the transaction of public business. It is now nearly six o'clock.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go on.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I do not know whether there are any more authorities bearing on the question; but the question is one of very great importance, and, as you will see, the object and effect of the resolution is to prevent any amendment of the resolution of the Prime Minister. If the question were resolved in the affirmative, even the Prime Minister himself could not ask this House to adopt the amendment, which he himself admits is absolutely essential to the——

Mr. BORDEN: I am sure the hon. gentleman does not wish to misquote me. What I said—and I have the most distinct authority—is that, as it stands, it means what my hon. friend said it should be; but I was willing, in order to leave no room for question, that the word 'unanimous' should be inserted. I said I thought it had that meaning already.

Mr. PUGSLEY: As the matter is one of such great importance and one which requires the consideration of the members of this House, I am sure there are many members on this side who would like to examine the authorities, and would like to address Your Honour on this question. As I have said, it is of great importance, because the previous question has been moved by my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, for the very purpose of preventing any amendment of this resolution. That is the reason why, although Your Honour first saw the leader of the Opposition and called upon him, the hon. member for East Hastings (Mr. Northrup) has moved, in the nature of an appeal from Your Honour's decision, that the hon. gentleman who rose second should be given precedence in this discussion in order that he might have the opportunity to move the previous question and shut off debate. As the question is important and hon. gentlemen on this side desire to look up the authorities on this question, I would suggest that Your Honour call it six o'clock.

Mr. SPEAKER: I have several times looked into this question since the commencement of the present session, and, according to my judgement, it is a point which is not well taken. I have gone into the matter very carefully many times, and I do not think that a review of it at this stage would change my mind in any way.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Mr. Speaker, I desire to move the adjournment of the House for the purpose of considering some matters which are of considerable importance, and with regard to which I am sure the House will desire to hear from me as well as from other hon. gentlemen. There can be no question as to my right to make this motion, Sir; it is a right which every member of the House, has at any stage of the discussion; it is a motion which is always in order.

Mr. SPEAKER: Am I to understand that this is challenging the ruling of the Chair, or that it is merely an independent motion?

Mr. PUGSLEY: It is an independent motion, and I desire to avail myself of the privilege of making it, because, under the present circumstances, and in view of the conditions which are now facing us in this House, I think it is desirable that the House should adjourn, especially in order that hon. gentlemen may pause to consider the situation in which we are placed to-day in regard to the attention of this House being devoted, not to the consideration of important public measures, but to the discussion of a resolution calculated to prevent the free expression of the views of members of this House. I think that an opportunity should be afforded to the hon. gentlemen opposite to consider these important questions, instead of allowing their attention to continue to be diverted by a resolution which simply seeks, as I have said, to interfere with free discussion, and which has no bearing upon the general interests of the country.

There is one thing to which, upon this motion, I desire especially to refer. There is a feeling among the people of this country—and, I am sure, on the part of hon. members of this House—that we ought to have some explanation, and the people of this country ought to have some explanation, of the present situation so far as the composition of the Government of this country is concerned. We want to obtain some information with regard to the resignation from this Government of the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk). In the year 1891, opportunity was taken, upon a motion such as this, to discuss the position of the Government and the claims of various sections of the country represented by certain gentlemen who were prominent in the public eye, and that motion, which led to a most important discussion, was participated in by the then Minister of Justice, the late Hon. Sir John Thompson, by Sir Hector Langevin and other prominent gentlemen, including the hon. gentleman who now occupies the position of Minster of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Hazen) and who was at that time a member of this House. We know that prior to the last general election the hon. member for Jacques Cartier was the leader of the Conservative party in the province of Quebec. He became the leader of the Nationalist party in that province; he enjoyed the confidence of my right hon. friend, who is now the Prime Minister, and he made certain statements to the people of the province of Quebec as to what was the policy of the party of which in that province he had become the trusted leader. If I can read aright the statements made in the public press, he pledged the faith of my right hon. friend, now the Prime Minister, that if the Conservative party were returned to power the Canadian Naval Law would be repealed; that there would be no Canadian navy, and that no contributions would be made by this country to Imperial armaments unless the people of Canada were first consulted. In my judgment, it is a matter of great importance that, before this discussion comes to an end, we should be informed by my right hon. friend the Prime Minister as to whether the hon. member for Jacques Cartier, the late Minister of Public Works, and the trusted leader of the Conservative party in the province of Quebec, had the authority of my right hon. friend to make that pledge to a certain portion of the people of the province of Quebec. After the lapse of the five months during which this Parliament has been sitting, we are confronted to-day with the fact that we have received in respect of this matter no ministerial explanations such as ministers have been in the habit in the past of giving to Parliament, and such as Parliament is entitled to receive. But, Sir, there has been placed before us a letter from the hon. member for Jacques Cartier, in which he makes the statement that he feels he should resign his seat because of the determination of the Government to ask Parliament to make an appropriation of $35,000,000 for the purpose of assisting the Imperial navy. The hon. member for Jacques Cartier says he was constrained to take that course by reason of the pledges which he gave to the people of his own province, and, in view of that most important statement, we have a right to know from the Prime Minister whether the hon. member for Jacques Cartier made that pledge to the people of Quebec with the authority and with his knowledge and approval. Let me tell my right hon. friend the Prime Minister that this question is of much more importance to the people of this country than the application of the guillotine in order to shut off this discussion. I desire to know whether my right hon. friend the Prime Minister has, through the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk) been guilty of a breach of faith with a portion of the people of Canada. Our people are more deeply interested in the keeping of faith by our public men than they are in the consideration of these small and comparatively unimportant questions with which we are called on to deal.

Another reason why this House should adjourn is that the Government may be enabled to give a little more thought than they have been able to give to the consideration of other important measures which are pressing for solution by this House. Take the case of the West. Not long ago I received a communication from one of the farmers of western Saskatchewan in which he stated that the people in his section of the country were in a deplorable situation, there was an embargo on a large portion of their crops so far as the railways were concerned and they were not able to get their crops to the market. He mentioned particularly his crop of flax, a large crop, worth a considerable sum of money from which, if he could send it to market, he could get good returns. He mentioned his case as one out of hundreds and thousands in the province of Saskatchewan. The condition of affairs in our great and fertile western land to-day is, I would venture to say, something deplorable and this is largely owing to the lack of attention to the affairs of this country on the part of the Government. So anxious are they to press through one measure that they seem prepared to neglect others in which the people of this country are more vitally interested, and proper attention to which would add greatly to the progress and prosperity and development of this country.

There are other questions: there is the completion of the reciprocal arrangement between the Dominion and the British West Indies, a question of very great importance. We see in the public press that some of the members of this House, the Opposition, are obstructing the completion of that arrangement and that we are obstructing other public business. The Government are under an entire misapprehension as to that. Those of us who are on this side of the House will be happy at all times to facilitate in every way possible the consideration not only of that measure but of all other public measures to which the Government may be pleased to invite our attention. The Opposition press make out that there is a great deal of important business which ought to be carried forward, business which is almost vital to the prosperity of this country; but the press do not seem to understand who is responsible for the delay in bringing forward such important measures.

As indicating our desire to facilitate public business, let me point out that we passed, after very short consideration, all the supplementary estimates of last year, although some of the members on this side thought that we were too kind to the Government and assisted them to too great an extent to carry forward public business. We felt that the business should be carried forward and we were willing to facilitate its transaction in every way. Of course, we did not expect when we did that that we would get such a return as we have now received. Perhaps we trusted too strongly to the spirit of fair play which ought to animate the governing party in this House, but at all events we did that. Then, in addition to that, we have consented, with perhaps less discussion than we ought to have given, to the passing of one-sixth of the total estimates, thus giving a vote of $25,000,000 in order to enable the Government to carry on the public business so that everything possible might be done to prevent any embarrassment among the people of the country, particularly among contractors and civil servants and others who have financial relations with the Government.

These are reasons why I think the Government ought to be informed as to what they can do. They talk about our obstructing public business. The Minister of Finance seems to have conjured up in his mind the fear that we would in some way obstruct the third reading of the West Indian Treaty Bill. I wish to disabuse his mind of that. The Government seem to think that we would obstruct the Highways Bill. Let me tell the Minister of Railways and Canals that if the Highways Bill is to be brought into force this year, now is the time to bring it into force. The roads of this country, in many provinces, in my own province, the province of New Brunswick especially, are in a deplorable condition, worse than at any time in the last quarter of a century. The spring of the year is the time when arrangements ought to be made for the building up of the roads and if this highway measure is going to be passed at all and to be of any benefit to the people of this country during the present year it ought to be taken up without any further delay. Let me tell the Minister of Railways and Canals that if he brings forward that measure, perhaps with some slight amendments to make the Bill more workable and what it ought to be, he will be assisted in every way to carry it to a conclusion. I do not want to anticipate what might be said by my hon. friend from Westmorland (Mr. Emmerson), if he should speak upon this motion; but surely he would be able to urge the Minister of Railways to bring forward the resolution which has been long standing on the Order Paper to enable the Government to take over the branch lines of railways which are feeders to the Intercolonial. Do not let the idea go forth to this country, as it has been circulated broadcast in the public press, that in some way or other the Opposition is keeping back the consideration of this important question. Let me tell my hon. friend that if he brings up that resolution, in which the people of Canada are even more deeply interested than in whether the guillotine is to be applied on 24 hours' notice—and we on this side of the House are committed to the principle of the Government taking over the branch lines railways—I am sure we will do everything possible to facilitate its speedy discussion and its speedy passage by the House of Commons.

But, Mr. Speaker, there are many other subjects. There is another question which I do think ought to set aside this motion of closure and set aside the consideration of this attempt which the Minister of Marine and Fisheries is making to prevent any amendment or betterment of this resolution, and that is the question of doing what is right by the women of this country by giving them the right of franchise. Has it come to this that, in this Parliament, representing 8,000,000 people, the whole time of the members is to be devoted simply to the consideration of one or two questions, such as the sending of $35,000,000 out of the country, or the application of the guillotine to members in this House, and that the members of the Administration will take no time to give consideration to such an important subject as that of giving to women the right of franchise to which they are entitled as well as men?

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess.

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I do not intend to take up very much of the time of the House, because, although the majority of the members of this House, exercising the power which a majority can exercise—and which if the incident had not taken place in this Parliament I would describe as the exercise of brute force—compelled the right hon. the leader of the Opposition, to whom Your Honour had given the right of speech, to give way to the Minister of Marine and Fisheries who moved to prevent any amendment to the resolution now before this House; although that was done I am sure that every hon. member of this House on both sides is waiting anxiously to hear what my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition has to say. I shall now present other reasons than those already given why this motion to adjourn the House should be adopted, and I trust that should I digress at any time from what may be deemed the rules of the House, Your Honour will call my attention to the transgression, so that I may keep within these rules. I am a little at a loss to learn from the authorities—and particularly in view of the rulings of one or more of the Chairmen in the last few weeks—whether or not a member on a motion to adjourn the House may discuss the main question before the House. One of the Chairmen of the Committee thought that on a motion that the Chairman do leave the Chair, that could not be done, although under the authorities I believe it can, and a motion to adjourn the House is similar in its results to a motion that the Chairman leave the Chair.

There is no necessity for this resolution proposed by the leader of the Government; it is not required in the public interest. There has been every effort to facilitate the carrying on of the public business during this session, consistent with fair and reasonable discussion. It is not necessary that I should recall that on a certain Monday night we were told, without opportunity for discussion, that we would have to pass clause 2 of that Bill.

The Prime Minister quoted an article having reference to the Polish legislature from which it would appear that away back in 1630 there was a rule under which a member of the legislature would have the right to prevent a motion from passing, and the right hon. gentleman read from the author which he was quoting, that in order to get rid of the tactics of the member who exercised that extraordinary right, it was frequently the cause that the dagger was applied to that member, and his obstruction ceased. Let me say, Sir, that in the interests of the people of this country and in the interests of the minority, it would be better to apply the dagger than to strangle free speech. If this resolution should pass and we have an attempt made to apply the guillotine, I do not know that the guillotine is any more agreeable than the dagger.

I have stated this afternoon and I repeat that this resolution is infinitely worse in its provisions than the British system of closure. To begin with, we have to bow to the majority as to the amount of discussion which shall take place, and as to when the guillotine shall drop; we have the minority placed absolutely under the control of the majority. The Prime Minister says that as long as he is leader of the House there will always be fair-play; but will he say, in view of the fact that this afternoon, after the Speaker had called upon the right hon. the leader of the Opposition as having first risen in his place and entitled to the floor, and when the hon. member for Hastings (Mr. Northrup) put that motion—a motion I venture to say prepared before hand and carrying out a programme which was all cut and dried;—will the Prime Minister say that the minority in this House can always rely upon fair play from him, when he rises in his place and votes for that resolution which gives precedence to another man who in the vision of the Speaker was not entitled to the floor? If the Prime Minister calls that fair-play, and if that is the kind of fair-play the minority are to have meeted out to them when these resolutions are adopted, then God help the minority, and God help the people of Canada.

This closure proposition is not new. It is new so far as its being agreed to by any parliament is concerned, but the gentlemen who drafted it got it from a proposition which was made forty or fifty years ago by Mr. May to the Speaker and a committee of the British Parliament, and which he suggested they should adopt. But no committee of the British House was ever found ready to adopt such a proposition. Is it right for this Government, upon this 9th day of April, in the year 1913, to adopt what no British Parliament has ever been willing to adopt. The first clause provides that:

> Every motion heretofore debatable made upon routine proceedings, except adjournment motions and every motion standing on the order of the proceedings for the day, or for the concurrence in a report of a standing or special committee, or for the previous question, or for the third reading of a Bill, for the adjournment of the House when made for the purpose of discussing a definite matter of urgent public importance, or for the adoption, in Committee of the Whole, or of Supply, or of Ways and Means of the resolution clause, section, preamble or title under consideration shall be debatable; but all other motions shall be decided without debate or amendment.

That is all. Motions to adjourn will not be debatable. Motions which are made upon routine proceedings will be debatable. There are, however, many other motions, motions of grave importance, motions in regard to which the people of this country would like to have an opportunity of learning what their representatives have to say, but they are not motions upon routine proceedings, and they do not come within the description given in clause 2 of the resolution. Therefore they are to be decided without debate or amendment.

Take the question of privilege, one which will readily appeal to hon. members. It is the right of any member of this House, not during routine proceedings at all, but at any time, to raise a question of privilege, relating either to this House or to any hon. member. Raising that question of privilege, he has the right to move that any charges which he may make or any matters which he may bring before the House shall be referred either to a special committee or to the Committee on Privileges. Under this clause, that motion would have to go without any debate. My right hon friend the Prime Minister says: Oh, I would never take advantage of the rules in that respect. After what we have seen this afternoon, can we trust him or the gentlemen who sit behind him?

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I think our experience shows that we cannot.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Will the hon. member tell us what is to prevent such a motion as he refers to from being made upon routine proceedings and consequently debated?

Some hon. MEMBERS: The gag.

Mr. PUGSLEY: To begin with, it is not a matter of routine proceedings. That is the clear answer.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is not the question.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Any member of this House, at any time, at any stage of the proceedings, has the right to raise a question of privilege. If he does it under those circumstances and exercises the right which every hon. member has, then he will be prevented from discussing the matter under this clause, if it should become a rule of the House.

Take the next clause which is the most unique presented to any parliament. Consider for a moment what its result would be to-day upon the discussion of any matter. No matter how long a matter is discussed, whether for five or ten minutes or for five hours, if it is in Committee of Supply, whether it is one resolution or fifty, whether it is one item of supply, or the whole of the items, a minister—not the Prime Minister—any minister, may rise and give notice that upon the next day, the day to which the debate is adjourned. the debate shall not be further adjourned. When that time arrives, every member, although he may have had no opportunity before of speaking upon the question, is limited to twenty minutes for discussion. The very fact that the minister has given that notice enables him to stop the discussion. If it happens that by reason of members of the Government or its supporters taking up a little time on other questions brought before the House or the committee, the question is not again reached before two o'clock in the morning, there is to be no discussion at all, but the question is to be put, no matter how great may be its importance and no matter how deeply interested the people of this country may be in it. I ask my right hon. friend if that is fair? Bear in mind, Mr. Speaker, that we are called upon to pass a proceeding by guillotine in reference even to supply, while it is a well known fact that during this session we have facilitated in every possible way the voting of supply.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I challenge anyone to contradict that statement. I repeat that, during this session, we have facilitated in every possible way the passage of supply. What are the facts? The Government did not ask this House for supply, except for a few items which were taken in detail. It asked us for supplementaries. We put them through as quickly as it was possible to do so. Then when my right hon. friend the leader of the Government came to the leader of the Opposition and asked him to consent to one-sixth of the total items, which amount to some $170,000,000, being granted, my right hon. friend, with a desire which has always animated him in no way to obstruct the business of the country, at once acceded to the Prime Minister's request. That was done, notwithstanding the fact that there are many matters, such as the Richelieu election proceedings, the proceedings down in Nova Scotia, the Antigonish election, the Macdonald election, which it is necessary in the public interest to discuss, and which according to ordinary parliamentary practice are discussed on motions to go into supply. In order to facilitate the Government in getting supply, we waived our rights to discuss these important questions. Notwithstanding that, my right hon. friend the Prime Minister comes before us to-day and asks us to support a proceeding by guillotine under which items of supply can be passed almost absolutely without any discussion. and indeed under which it is absolutely certain that the Government could pass many important items without hon. gentlemen on this side of the House or on the other having an opportunity of saying anything whatever with reference to them. Let me read it:

(3) Immediately before the Order of the Day for resuming an adjourned debate is called, or if the House be in Committee of the Whole, or of Supply, or of Ways and Means, any minister of the Crown who, standing in his place, shall have given notice at a previous sitting——

Even though it might be only yesterday.

—of his intention so to do, may move that the debate shall not be further adjourned, or that the further consideration of any resolution or resolutions, clause or clauses, section or sections, preamble or preambles, title or titles——

Not merely one, but, if you like, all the clauses of a Bill or all the items in Supply.

—shall be the first business of the committee, and shall not further be postponed; and in either case such question shall be decided without debate or amendment; and if the same shall be resolved in the affirmative, no member shall thereafter speak more than once, or longer than twenty minutes in any such adjourned debate; or, if in committee, on any such resolution, clause, section, preamble or title; and if such adjourned debate or postponed consideration shall not have been resumed or concluded before two of the clock in the morning, no member shall rise to speak after that hour, but all such questions as must be decided in order to conclude such adjourned debate or postponed consideration, shall be decided forthwith.

So, if for any reason, the members on the Government side of the House or the Government themselves, find it necessary to take up time until two o'clock, then at once the guillotine falls and their resolutions are carried, as I said, absolutely without opportunity for discussion on this side of the House. I cannot conceive how it would be possible to frame rules which would place the minority of this House more completely, more absolutely, in the hands of the ministers of the Crown than the resolution which is now before us. Then take the next:

(4) On Thursdays and Fridays when the Order of the Day is called for the House to go into Committee of Supply, or of Ways and Means, Mr. Speaker shall leave the Chair without putting any question, provided that, except by the consent of the House, the estimates of each department shall be first taken up on a day other than Thursday and Friday.

In other words, whenever Supply is to be taken up on either Thursday or Friday there shall be no opportunity afforded for discussion of public Bills. You know, Mr. Speaker, how according to the long-established rules of Parliament, it is the right of members, upon a motion to go into Committee of Supply, to discuss all matters of public interest, to ventilate the grievances of the people and endeavour to get redress, but, under this rule, if the estimates are taken up either on Thursday or Friday, you are to leave the Chair without motion, and there is to be no opportunity for discussion or ventilation of any grievance. On the motion to go into Supply on other days there would be an opportunity to ventilate grievances; but even that privilege can be denied to the minority by the vote of the House. My hon. friend the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Rogers) if he were bringing up his estimates, would only have to move that the House consent to go into Supply on either Thursday or Friday as the case might be, and if the majority of the House consented to the proposition, you would leave the Chair without motion and there would be no opportunity to ventilate either the Macdonald election or any other scandal. And yet my right hon. friend the leader of the Government says that these are not drastic changes in the rules—he says they are changes of a very moderate nature. I cannot imagine, as I have said how any proceedings of a guillotine character could be made more drastic or more subversive of the rights of the minority. What is the rule in England with regard to the guillotine? A member of the Government, usually the Prime Minister, before entering upon the discussion of a Bill, gives notice of how many days will be allowed for the introduction of the Bill, how many for the second reading, how many for the committee stage, how many for the third reading and that question is discussed before a conclusion is formally come to and suggestions are made by the Opposition as to the time which should be given. That is called the taking up of Bills by compartments, or, colloquially, 'the guillotine.' When the time arrives fixed under a motion of that character, the discussion comes to a close. But under the rule here proposed, as I have said, the minister gives notice, and if the majority of the House support him, then even at the next sitting after he has made the notice, and even though there has been no opportunity for discussion, the guillotine is to be applied and discussion limited to speeches of twenty minutes and when two o'clock is reached all further discussion is shut off and the question is put and carried and as I have said there is no opportunity for discussion.

Now, just a word and I am done. I want to call attention to the report of the committee of the British House of Commons of 1861 in which this question came up and was carefully considered. After carefully considering suggestions, the committee made a report, from which I take the following, quoting from page 441 of this volume of the report of the debates of 1861:

> Your committee, like preceding committees on the same subject, have passed in review many suggested alterations, but like them have come to the conclusion that the old rules and orders, when carefully considered and narrowly investigated, are found to be the safeguard of freedom of debate, and a sure defence against the oppression of overpowering majorities. Extreme caution, therefore, in recommending or introducing changes is dictated by prudence. These rules and orders are the fruit of long experience; a day may break down the prescription of centuries. It is easy to destroy, it is difficult to reconstruct. But if changes be thus dangerous, and if the excellence of the existing rules be thus constantly recognized it is the first duty of the House to maintain these rules inviolate, and to resist every attempt to encroach on them. The Speaker is their appointed guardian; he is entitled to the unanimous support of the House in his effort to enforce them. Common consent is the best security for their maintenance. Order is their sole object; and without order, freedom of debate and prompt despatch of business cannot long exist.

The suggestion was made to adopt a rule almost in the very words of the second clause of this resolution; and the committee refused to adopt it, because, as they said, it would be better to have business protracted and have even some considerable delay in carrying on the business than to destroy the freedom of debate. To quote their own words, 'It is easy to destroy, it is difficult to reconstruct.' The Government is to-day taking a course which I am sure will not meet with the approval of the people of this country. At the time of Confederation, in order that no member of any political party which might happen to be in the minority should have reason to entertain the fear that there would be an attempt to encroach on the rights of the minority, the fathers of Confederation were careful to provide that no powers should be given to any member of the House exceeding those then enjoyed in the British House of Commons and, in framing the rules of this House, it was provided:

> In all cases not provided for hereinafter or by sessional or other orders, the rules, usages and forms of proceedings of the House of Commons of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland in force on the first day of July 1867, shall be followed.

I wish it to be understood that, in making the remarks which I have made upon this resolution, I do not feel that I shall be precluded from later on taking the point that to pass this resolution would be contrary to the rules of the House. I do not feel that I shall be precluded from taking the point that the principle which governs this House as to the amendment of the rules is that a special committee of the House shall be appointed to assist Mr. Speaker in framing the rules to be adopted; that their report shall be presented to the House, that this report shall then be referred to a Committee of the Whole House for consideration, and, when that committee reports to you, Mr. Speaker, through its Chairman, the rules shall be adopted as the rules of the House. As I have said, by the first rule of this House, the rules, usages and forms of procedure of the British House of Commons as they existed on the first day of July, 1867, are to prevail. Under the English usage, no amendment to the rules, up to the year 1867, so far as I have been able to ascertain, was made except upon the report of a special committee of the House. It will be seen from the reports of the committees in 1848, 1854, and 1861—six years before Confederation—that was the established procedure of the British House of Commons, and, in the very first rule adopted by this House in 1867, it was declared that that usage, as well as all other usages of the British House of Commons, should prevail in and be the first and foremost rule of this House. The practice in the Canadian House of Commons since Confederation has been to carry out that procedure. It was done in 1867; it was done in 1878, it was done, I think, upon another occasion later on, and it was done again in 1910—the same principle was always followed. Therefore you have it as the usage of the British House of Commons down to 1867; you have it as the established usage of this House of Commons from the days of Confederation down to the present time, and yet, contrary to the rules, contrary to the usage of Parliament and to the established practice of this House, we are asked to-night to take a new departure and do what we have no right to do. I do not relinquish the right to take if I feel called upon to do so, this point of order, which I think can be well established. I regret that I have taken up so much of the time of the House, but I have felt the question to be one of great importance, because involved in it is the question of the right of the minority to participate in a fair and reasonable discussion of public questions in this House. I object to the resolution because the rules which have prevailed for centuries have been established for the purpose of protecting the rights of minorities and ensuring the priceless liberty of free speech in Parliament; I am opposed to it, Sir, because I believe this is an attempt to place the minority of this House absolutely under the control of the majority.

Motion (Mr. Pugsley), for adjournment of the House, negatived.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: The spectacle of which we were witnesses when the right hon. Prime Minister concluded his remarks and placed in your hands, Mr. Speaker, the motion now before the House, was a very apposite commentary upon the speech of my right hon. friend. All through that speech the right hon. gentleman stated and reiterated that the object of the Government in proposing this new resolution was not to impede in any way the freedom of debate or to prevent free discussion, but simply to avoid the abuse of it. My right hon. friend was profuse of declarations that the minority, when these rules have been adopted, can always rely upon fair play; but the words were scarcely out of his lips when we were brought to realize how much fair play we may expect at the hands of hon. gentlemen opposite. By the unwritten law of Parliament, not to speak of the courtesy which generally prevails between the two sides of the House, it is expected that when the Prime Minister brings an important measure to the consideration of the House, the Opposition, by its leader shall be allowed to present the views which are entertained on the other side. Firmly entertaining that impression, I rose to my feet; but great was my surprise when I saw that the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Hazen) had risen at the same time. You saw him, Mr. Speaker, and you saw me, and, in the exercise of that authority which belongs to your office, in the exercise of that fair play which had been promised us not five minutes before, you called on me, as leader of the Opposition to take the floor. And, I presume, still exercising that fair play which we were promised by the leader of the Government in introducing these rules, the hon. member for East Hastings (Mr. Northrup) asked the House to take from me the privilege which was mine by constitutional right, and to give it to a member of the Government. And, Sir, every member of the House on that side, including the right hon. gentleman who had only a few moments before promised fair play, rose to impose a gag upon me, and to prevent me from expressing the views of the Opposition with regard to this very important question. When I saw my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries rising and insisting upon his right to speak, I concluded that he had some great announcement or some important deliverance to make upon this question. But no; he had not a word to say, but to apply closure in anticipation by moving the previous question. What does this mean? What is the conclusion?

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Other hon. MEMBERS: Laugh, laugh.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Sir, it means this: closure in anticipation. I had a motion ready to move in amendment; I cannot move it now——

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: —and, by the cheers of the gentlemen who know that I am precluded from moving that motion, I see what measure of fair play we have henceforth to expect. Sir, my right hon. friend when he rose to speak, was tumultuously cheered by his friends. These plaudits I thought a tribute of the loyalty of his followers to their leader, and so I thought they were quite in order; but, I reflected that, considering the motion which he had to make and the mission which he had imposed upon himself, perhaps it would have been better taste if he had been allowed to proceed in silence. I understand these plaudits better now after beholding the spectacle which closed his speech. There is some reason to believe that my right hon. friend had no particular relish for the task which he has set upon himself, the task of gagging free speech. But my right hon. friend must proceed, whether he relishes it or not. He is like the person in the French novel who said: 'I must follow them, since I am their leader'? I understand now that the plaudits and cheers were meant to urge him upon a most uncongenial task. Because the task which my right hon. friend imposed upon himself this day was not to improve the rules of the Polish Diet. The task which he set himself to accomplish, and which the majority will accomplish, I have no doubt, was simply to put a gag upon the rules which we in this House have looked upon almost as sacred, and which have come to us from the Mother of Parliaments. These rules were not made in a day; they are the embodiment of the wisdom of many generations of statesmen and the result of the experience of men, whose whole life was devoted to the public welfare, and who brought British institutions to the degree of excellency which they had reached at the time Confederation was established.

We have heard it stated that these rules are antiquated. I do not admit that at all. These rules are not antiquated. They were not made for a day or for a period; they were made for the ages. It can be said of them, as has been said of the maxims of civil law which have come to us from the Roman jurists and which are the basis of the civil law of most of the nations of Europe, and they are reason crystallized into writing. The maxims of the civil law have been applied to the relations of the people in daily life, and the maxims of our parliamentary procedure have been accepted as the duties of the transaction of business in all deliberative assemblies.

Sir, these rules are to be swept away, they are to be ridden over rough shod; they are to be put aside, and we are to have the gag substituted for them. And what is the pretence? The pretence is that there has been obstruction in the House. Sir, if obstruction be a fault, if obstruction be an offence, I call upon the man on that side of the House who is without guilt to cast the first stone. I read in some Conservative newspapers that obstruction was the murderer of parliamentary government. I do not here now challenge the statement; but if obstruction be the murderer of parliamentary government, the murderers are on that sde of the House, and not on this. My right hon. friend has experience, and he will experience still more that as you sow so shall you reap; and, Sir, it does not lie in his mouth or in the mouth of his followers to say that there has been obstruction in this House by the parliamentary minority.

My right hon. friend, as usual, has attempted to justify his course by opinions of Liberal newspapers and Liberal members of Parliament. True it is that in the party to which I belong there are men who were in favour of closure, just as in the party of my right hon. friend there are men who were opposed to closure. My right hon. friend has quoted with great relish the opinions of the Toronto Globe and the Manitoba Free Press. I do not observe that he has quoted the opinion of the Ottawa Citizen. If he had prolonged his investigations and pursued them in the press of his own friends, he would have found something which perhaps would have induced him to act differently, because in the Citizen of to-day I find in the course of an article of one column in length directed against closure, these words:

> The closure will not better matters in the least, it will pass the Bill, but a Bill which will represent $35,000,000 plus bitterness, plus protest, plus division.

It is true that in these matters there may be divided opinions. My right hon. friend has quoted the opinions of some friends of myself, but Sir, I also have the honour to belong to the great Liberal party of Canada. I have occupied a position of some importance in it; nay, I may say that for twenty years and more I have been entrusted with its chief command. During the fifteen years I was in office it sometimes happened that friends came to me and told me that I was not doing justice to myself or to the party, but that I should impose closure, as had been done in many other parliaments. Sir, I am a Liberal of the old school; I have been brought up in the school of Fox and of the old leaders of the Liberal party; and I could not bring myself to the point of depriving a minority in Parliament of such a valuable weapon as it would be deprived of by the introduction of closure. Perhaps I was wrong; perhaps I was too generous. Nay, I was not; I would rather stand here to-day, having refused, after the fifteen years of my administration, to impose closure, and having decided to abide by the old rules. The rules of the House are intended to apply to the discharge of the duties which the House owes to the country, and to the Sovereign. The first business of the Government, the first business of Parliament, the first business of every member of this House, whether he sits on this side of the Speaker's Chair, or on the other side, is to carry on the King's Government.

It has been charged against us that we have delayed the business of the House, that we have prevented it from going on. Sir, I deny the charge altogether; there is not a word of foundation for it. If the business of the House is not more advanced than it is, the fault cannot be laid at our door, but at a door of the other side. It is quite true that when we came to the first of April, Supply had not been voted, and the financial year was at an end; but if Supply had not been voted before that, whose fault was it? Was it that Supply was demanded and was refused?

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Everybody knows that each time Supply was demanded, we granted it without hesitation. Everybody knows that when my right hon. friend came to me and asked for a vote on account, I agreed without any hesitation and with unstinted hand, perhaps too unstinted indeed. Everybody knows that whenever a measure of public importance was brought to our attention we gave it our best consideration, and it was passed. When the Bill for the renewal of the bank charters was brought to our attention, there was not a word said on our side to oppose it. We discussed it fairly; we discussed it completely, but we offered no obstruction to it. When the Bill to ratify the Japanese treaty was introduced, there was not a word on our side which went to oppose the passage of that Bill. And so it has been with every measure. It is true, Sir, that we opposed a certain measure. It is true that we opposed the Bill for naval aid. We did that with all the might at our command; we did it with all the means at our command under the rules of the House. Am I to be told that in the exercise of this power of strenuous opposition we did anything which is not in accordance with the best traditions of parliamentary government? Sir, at all times in this House, at all times in the mother of parliaments, there have been questions upon which the minority thought it owed it to itself to offer the most vigorous opposition possible. Under the rules of the House it is expected that the two sides of the House shall carry on the business, as was stated by my right hon. friend to-day, and so it is generally; but there are occasions, I repeat, when an opposition or a minority owes it to itself, on account of the strong views it holds upon some public measure, to oppose that measure with all the force at its command.

This is not a modern doctrine. This doctrine has been in force at all times in the British House of Commons. It goes back to the days of Charles I; the books are full of references to it. The leaders of the House in the time of Charles I, in the struggle against the King to uphold the constitutional rights of the people of England, presented to the King what they called the Grand Remonstrance, and the presentation of the Grand Remonstrance was opposed all night by some members until, it is stated in the books, the House looked like a starved jury. That was an occasion when obstruction failed of its purpose. On another occasion, in 1771, the majority of the House did not want to allow the publication of the debates. That strange position was opposed by a minority headed by no less a man than Edmund Burke, and Burke by whole days of obstruction succeeded in defeating the object of the majority, and, as he himself said afterwards, 'posterity will bless the pertinacity of that day.' On that occasion the obstruction was successful. Later on, in 1831, at the time of the passage of the first Reform Bill, the Tories of that day, the strong and unbending Tories of that day opposed the Bill with all the vigor that they could command, but they had to succumb; on that occasion obstruction did not succeed. Later on, in 1833, Daniel O'Connell availed himself

On the very day of the introduction of the Bill——

That was, Earl Grey's Irish Coercion Bill——

—of the antiquated expedient of a call of the House, with the intention of delaying the proceedings. The first reading of the Bill occupied seven sittings, the Irish members having threatened to take refuge in repeated formal motions for adjournment if any attempt was made to close the discussion prematurely.

This was repeated in 1843. Then, we come to the year 1881, when, as we know, the Irish members resorted to obstruction under the direction of Parnell, in order to obtain long-sought satisfaction for Ireland. Sir, there is no man in this House, I am sure—nay, the man who is most devoted to British interests, the greatest admirer of England, must admit that if there is a page in British history which he would like to have erased, it would be the dealing of England with Ireland. That has been the only black page in modern history. But it is to the credit of the Liberals of the present day and of the last generation that at last they have staked their political existence upon he task of giving some redress for the grievances of Ireland.

In 1881, as was stated by my right hon. friend, Mr. Gladstone, after the deliberate obstruction of the Irish members, introduced the closure. But, Sir, Mr. Gladstone was too great a man to be satisfied with such a method of dealing with the woes of Ireland. On the contrary, he was induced afterwards to study the case of Ireland; he did study it, and he came to the conclusion that the best and only manner of redressing the long-endured woes of Ireland was at least to try to give to Ireland self-government according to the will and constitutional character of the Irish people. There are two pages in the life of Mr. Gladstone. There is the page in which he introduced the closure, and there is the page in which he sought by conciliation to give justice to Ireland. Our friends opposite select the first page; we select the last.

As I have said, there are some occasions on which there is a cleavage between the majority and the minority, and then there is an easy remedy, an easy solution. The remedy is not closure; it is not the application of brute force. The remedy is an appeal to the people. The people, after all, are the judge and the jury. The people, after all, are the parties to pass judgment as between the Government and the Opposition, as between the majority and the minority; and, Sir, the most I would have expected on such an occasion as this was that the Government of the day would have adopted that remedy, and not have resorted to closure. I am sure it was not a pleasant task that my right hon. friend performed to-day; and, for my part, when I compare my conduct with his conduct, I am proud that I resisted all applications for closure, and that when the time came I appealed to the people, as I did on reciprocity. My right hon. friend stated, not to-day but the last time when he spoke upon that question, that the remedy which I suggested was absurd, because, he said, if upon every occasion on which there was obstruction the Government were obliged to go to the country, we might every year have a general election. Let me tell my right hon. friend that there is no sense in such an objection, because obstruction cannot be of any avail unless it is backed up by a strong expression of public opinion, and unless it be on some most important question. If there were at any time in this House a political party so oblivious to the respect it owes to itself and to the country as to obstruct upon a trivial question, that party would lose all the confidence it might have in the country and any chance of ever again creating an impression upon the people. But, Sir, there is a better reason than that. When we come to discuss these constitutional questions, these questions of public policy, the best authority after all is the authority of history. Confederation will have been in existence forty-six years next July, and how many times has there been obstruction during these forty-five years? Just four times before this year. Let me recall them. There was obstruction in 1885, in 1896, in 1908, and in 1911, and after I have mentioned the causes for the obstruction on these several occasions, I shall have furnished the most complete justification for the attitude we have taken upon the present occasion.

There was obstruction in 1885. In that year the Government of Sir John A. Macdonald introduced a uniform franchise Bill for the Dominion. Up to that date the franchise had been under the control of the several provinces, each province having its own franchise. While in two or three provinces there was manhood suffrage, in the others there was a diverse franchise, and we of the Liberal party thought this system was the best. After all, the franchise is a question of education; it is a question which interests the people themselves directly, and we thought it better to leave it directly in the hands of the people through their provincial legislatures. We fought the Dominion Franchise Bill night and day. True, we did not defeat the Bill; but our tactics resulted in the embodiment of important amendments which otherwise we could not have obtained. We compelled Sir John Macdonald to accept many of our proposals. While the list is too long to name them all, let me say that by our attitude we obtained the right to appeal from the decisions of the revising officers, and that alone was worth all the fight we made for it.

There was obstruction in 1896, and what was the occasion of that? The Government of that day undertook to deal with the Manitoba school question, which had been for six long years before them, and had been debated and debated again. The Government did not dare to give a decision on the question until at last in 1896, in the dying days of a moribund parliament, it introduced a measure for the purpose of giving satisfaction to the minority; in which there was not enough to give justice to the minority, but in which there was enough and more than enough to irritate the majority and to make them feel that a grievous wrong had been perpetrated on them. We fought that measure and we obtained what we were asking for. We were asking that that measure should be referred to the people. It was in the dying days of a moribund parliament, and justice demanded that the people should pronounce upon it. If the resolution which my right hon. friend the Prime Minister has to-day introduced had been in existence then, Parliament would have been gagged, and that great wrong would have been inflicted not only on the people of one province but upon the whole people of the Dominion, with consequences which it would be impossible to estimate. These are some of the reasons which make me say that the position taken by the Prime Minister to-day, and which he says he is taking on behalf of parliamentary government, is opposed to the very essence of a fair system of parliamentary government.

There was obstruction again in 1908, and what was the occasion? The Government of which I was the head had introduced an election measure providing for voters' lists for British Columbia. Manitoba, and the unorganized portions of Ontario; and the minority, the Conservative party, took issue with us. I am bound to say that the appeal they made to us impressed me. I thought there was fairness in some of the points taken by the Opposition of the day, and the consequence was that, having consulted my colleagues, we offered a compromise, which was accepted. The obstruction on that occasion, as we know, came from the Conservative party. I found no fault with it; I never whined. I thought it consistent with my dignity as a man and as the head of the Government, feeling we might be to some extent in the wrong, to hold out the olive branch to the other side and to end the difficulty by compromise. After all, is not that better than closure? The other occasion on which there was obstruction was in 1911.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I see that some hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House remember that; so do I. We introduced the reciprocity measure on the 26th of January, and on the 28th of July we had not yet been able to obtain even a preliminary vote upon it. We had been met at every step by obstruction from the Conservatives, then in opposition; dilatory motions of every kind were made, speech after speech was delivered day in and day out, even in the dog days of summer. I did not complain; I did not whine. Two courses were open to me. I could have done as is done to-day by the Prime Minister; I could have introduced the closure and have said that we must carry on the business of the Government and that, consistently with our dignity, we could not allow obstruction. But there was another course open to me, and that was an appeal to the people; and I advised my colleagues to give the hon. gentlemen of the Opposition the opportunity of appealing to the people. We appealed to the people and we were defeated. Heaven is my witness that I would rather stand here to-day, defeated and in opposition by that appeal to the people than stand over there in office by the power of the gag.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Here is the position——

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I would appeal to the House to keep some semblance of order, and to allow the business of the House to go on.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Here is the position of the two parties. For my part I desire nothing more than that the people shall pronounce once more. I do not envy the position which my right hon. friend takes to-day. This is the first introduction in Canada of machine politics. My hon. friend the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Rogers) told us recently that he knows how to win elections. He did not tell us the methods, however.

Some hon. MEMBERS: We know them.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: We know some of these methods. If an election takes place in British Columbia, or in Nova Scotia, lavish promises for public works are made. It may not be a federal election; it may be a provincial election. But my hon. friend has tried his hand in provincial elections also, not always with complete success. If there is an election in Antigonish a letter is sent by the Ministers with abundant promises of public works. If there is an election in Richelieu, it is not a letter which is sent there, but an emissary with his hands full of promises. If it is an election in Macdonald, there is a warning sent out that all those who stand for freedom shall be put in jail. We have not yet come to that in this House, I admit. We are not threatened with durance vile. It is not alleged that we shall be sent to jail. I do not know but that we may not be thankful for so much. After all, what is proposed is that we shall be treated just as men in Macdonald were treated, we shall be gagged and shall speak no more, or, if allowed to speak, we shall be allowed to speak twenty minutes. My right hon. friend did not know whether he had not been too generous in giving us twenty minutes. He thought we should do better in five minutes than in twenty. I do not know but we should be thankful to him for that much; but we know what we are to expect from these new rules. I had proposed to move this amendment, if the action of my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries had not cut the ground from under my feet:

That the House do not proceed with the consideration of the resolution, but that it be referred to a special committee to assist Mr. Speaker in the examination of the same, and to report upon it, according to the established and binding rules of this House.

In 1867, when Parliament was first organized after Confederation, the first thing it had to do was to establish rules for its guidance. How was that done? By resolution moved in the House? No. The rules were prepared by a special committee. After this committee had reported, they were referred to the Committee of the Whole, and again discussed. You will find the record in the Journals of the House of the 20th of December, 1867:

Resolved that this House will immediately, resolve itself into a committee on the report of the Select Committee appointed to assist Mr. Speaker in framing rules and regulations for the Government of this House. The House accordingly resolved itself into the said committee; and after some time spent therein, Mr. Speaker resumed the Chair; and Mr. Macdonald (Glengarry) reported, that the committee had gone through the rules and regulations, and made amendments thereunto.

This procedure has always been followed afterwards when the rules have been amended. This would have been the proper method to follow; but my right hon. friend to-day had resolved to gag the House and not to allow free discussion in Committee of the Whole or in a special committee. There are many reasons why the rules which we are now discussing should be discussed in the Committee of the Whole. Nobody can contend that they are complete. Indeed, it is not possible to pass them as they are, because in some points they do not convey the meaning of those who framed them. That point has been taken up by my hon. friend who sits by my side (Mr. Pugsley). For instance, what is the meaning of this rule:

Every motion heretofore debatable made upon routine proceedings, except adjournment motions and every motion standing on the order of the proceedings for the day, or for the concurrence in a report of a standing or a special committee, or for the previous question, or for the third reading of a Bill, or for the adjournment of the House when made for the purpose of discussing a definite matter of urgent public importance, or for the adoption, in Committee of the Whole, or of Supply, or of Ways and Means of the resolution clause, section, preamble or title under consideration shall be debatable; but all other motions shall be decided without debate or amendment.

My right hon. friend tells us that a motion for a committee of investigation upon the conduct of a member, such as was moved recently by my hon. friend from St. Hyacinthe (Mr. Gauthier), would come under routine proceedings. Is any man serious in telling me that a motion of that character, impeaching the conduct of a member of the House, is a routine motion? What an absurdity that is. Routine motions are motions which are made every day for the conduct of the business of the House. To tell us that a motion which is made perhaps once in twenty years, or once in five or ten years is a routine motion is too much for the intelligence or the common sense of any man. The only comment which we heard upon this point by my right hon. friend the Prime Minister was this, that so long as he is in the place which he now occupies we have nothing to fear—that such a motion will always be treated as a routine motion. My right hon. friend is not immortal, unfortunately. There is always a possibility of accidents. What would happen, for instance, if his place were to be taken by his neighbour (Mr. Rogers)? If we are to trust to the good will of my hon. friend, Heaven help us! We want the rules framed so as to convey the true meaning of the gentlemen who frame them. In this case the proposed rules should be referred to the Committee of the Whole, there to be thoroughly discussed and canvassed. Clause (4) of the resolution reads in this way:

On Thursdays and Fridays when the Order of the Day is called for the House to go into Committee of Supply, or of Ways and Means, Mr. Speaker shall leave the Chair without putting any question, provided that, except by the consent of the House, the estimates of each department shall be first taken up on a day other than Thursday or Friday.

My hon. friend beside me took the point that this rule will put it in the power of the majority to have the Committee of Supply sit only on Thursdays and Fridays. The Prime Minister took at once a different interpretation. He said it meant unanimous consent, and to make it sure he offered to put in the word 'unanimous.' I was a little surprised, I must say, at that; but it is not hard to understand what he was after. He knew that the Minister of Marine and Fisheries was to move immediately thereafter the previous question, and that therefore this could not be amended. But I am too old a bird to be caught in that trap. I thought something might be coming. I would not accept it because I had another amendment to move to that proposed rule. I wanted to move the excision of the whole of this clause 4. I asked it of the fair play of gentlemen on the other side, if their fair play is not all a mockery; why should this clause be here at all? It has been said that this motion of closure is necessary in order to pass the Naval Bill. But this clause has nothing to do with the naval question at all; it is simply intended to deprive the minority of the most valued weapon that a British subject has had from the days when parliamentary government began, that is to say, to demand the redress of grievances before Supply is voted. Here it is in plain words:

On Thursdays and Fridays when the Order of the Day is called for the House to go into Committee of Supply or Ways and Means, Mr. Speaker shall leave the Chair without putting any question.

Why should Mr. Speaker on Thursday and Friday leave the Chair without putting a question? To prevent the Opposition from moving motions concerning the conduct of the Government of the day. Parliamentary government in England goes back many ages. England, up to the time of the French revolution, was the only country in the world in which the people were taxed only with their own consent, and in which the people, when giving their consent to be taxed, presented their grievances to the King. In every other country of Europe, even the most civilized, the people were taxed by the Sovereign without reference to their means to pay taxes. They had not the power to declare that they would not be taxed but by their own consent. But in England the subject would not pay a penny of taxation except by his own free will; and when he was asked to tax himself, then he had his opportunity to present grievances to the King. That most valuable right of the British subject has been in existence for six hundred years; and it is proposed to-day to deprive us of it. This is applying the gag with a vengeance. Let me repeat to my right hon. friend: As you sow, so shall you reap; as you are fair so shall you meet with fairness; as you are unjust, so shall you meet with injustice. My right hon. friend two years ago took a certain attitude on the Reciprocity Bill; he has no right to complain if the same method that he made use of is applied to him in the present case. My right hon. friend has not forgotten the words of Shakespeare:

> —this even handed justice
> Commends th' ingredients of our poison'd chalice
> To our own lips.

The poison that he offers to us to-day will come to his own lips at some future day. We are in the minority; we can be gagged; we can be prevented from expressing our opinions; they can trample upon our rights. But, Sir, the day of reckoning will come, and it will come as soon as we have a dissolution of the present Parliament.

Hon. C. J. DOHERTY (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I have followed the speech of the right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) with the interest which any utterance of his always evokes in me. Will he pardon me if I begin by expressing the disappointment I feel when I consider the manner in which he has dealt with this important question? The right hon. gentleman throughout his speech was full of eloquent references to his 'never whining'—that is not an expression that I would have chosen, but he has chosen to boast that he never whines. And yet what was the opening of his speech, if it was not a complaint—as I would call it, whining as he would call it—because the rules of this House as they now stand were applied to him this afternoon? And yet, strange to say, almost in the same breath he lauded these very rules as the perfection of wisdom. He compared them with the old Civil law that somebody has described as 'reason reduced to writing'; and yet when this 'reason reduced to writing' which he considers our present existing rules to be so perfect that no one should lay a desecrating hand upon them—when these rules in their simplest and clearest meaning were applied to himself, he complained that he was gagged, he complained of a lack of fairness on the part of the right hon. leader of the House and on the part of members on this side. While I was disappointed in the manner in which the right hon. gentleman has handled this question as a whole, I was amazed when I heard him express surprise, heard him complain that any steps should have been taken by any hon. member on this side of the House to preclude to the making of amendment after amendment to the simple proposition to amend the rules of this House in a manner which, I venture to say, the common sense of this House, the common sense of hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House, if they could for even a few moments free themselves from the blindness induced by party feeling would recognize as having become an absolute necessity; an amendment which I am thoroughly satisfied the commonsense of the people will recognize as being absolutely called for at this moment, if we are to continue to enjoy in this country the blessings and privileges of British parliamentary government as it was handed down to us by our forefathers. I was amazed that, after what we have witnessed in this House, the right hon. gentleman would suppose that we upon this side of the House would not be alive to the fact that it is our bounden duty to take every legitimate step permitted and provided for under the rules of this House to ensure that the representatives of the majority of the people should govern this country.

The right hon. gentleman said that he had been deprived of his rights—that he had been gagged. Have we not heard the right hon. gentleman express, as freely and as fully as he could possibly desire, his opinions upon the proposition that is now before the House? What is his constitutional right—to propose an amendment to this motion? The rules of this House, in providing for the moving of the previous question as it has been moved to-day, have foreseen occasions upon which that rule may properly be applied and when that motion may properly be made, and, if when those rules were enacted there could be foreseen an occasion imperiously and imperatively calling for their application, surely this is one of them. Since the 5th of December last, we have been engaged in this House in the discussion of a measure, the importance of which I do not desire to minimize, but, at the same time, with a measure which intelligent men should have been able to seize and grasp and grapple with, and discuss from its different standpoints, without difficulty,—assuming there existed no desire but that of threshing it out with a view to arriving at a sound conclusion—in the period—let us put it at the outside—of one month. That measure stands to-day undisposed of, and we have sat in this House and witnessed the determination of the minority that the House should not have an opportunity of expressing its opinion by a vote upon that measure, and of disposing of it. I do not wish to deny that the freedom of speech of every individual member sitting in this House is a precious thing, but how much more precious, how much more to be valued, is the freedom of the majority of the people of this country to express their voice through their elected representatives, and, by that voice, to determine how this country shall be governed, what measures this country shall adopt, and what measures the executive government, under the direction of this House, composed of the elected representatives of the people, shall carry out and give effect to? Yes, it is important that each and every one of the hon. members sitting on the other side of the House should have freedom of speech, but surely they have had it amply and in a measure full and overflowing; and now has come the time when we must recognize the right of the great majority of the people, through their representatives, to express the voice of Parliament.

I venture to say that it is at least of as great moment to the people of this country that the voice of Parliament should obtain expression as it is that even the right hon. gentleman should have a chance to move an amendment.

The right hon. gentleman referred to the right hon. leader of this House, and was good enough to suggest that, in making the proposition that he made this afternoon, he was doing something that was distasteful to him, which was done only under the pressure of his followers. He said that the right hon. leader of this House no doubt felt that he must follow those behind him, because he was their leader. I could not help wondering whether it was out of the abundance of his own experience that he made that statement. I have no doubt that if the right hon. leader of this House had felt that he could do his duty to this country, and to the people who gave him a mandate to govern it, without bringing down this measure, he would have preferred not to have introduced it. There is no doubt that none of us desire to effect a curtailment of the most absolute freedom of expression in this House, so long as it is consistent with the maintenance and the carrying out of parliamentary government in a constitutional way. But are we so blind, are we so deaf, are we so obtuse and so incapable of perceiving the purposes and objects of what has been going on in this House for a time now all too long, that we would be justified in sitting back and seeing hon. gentlemen opposite carry out a system of obstruction? There can be no objection to my now calling it obstruction, for the right hon. gentleman has told us that there has been obstruction in this country four times before this time; so that, whatever else there may be any doubt about, there is absolutely no doubt that there has been obstruction in the present instance. As a matter of fact, hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House—one at least—not many hours ago told us that it was going to begin all over again.

The right hon. gentleman also said that somebody had described obstruction as the murder of parliamentary Government, and if I understood him rightly, he said that he did not quarrel with that description but that the murderers were on this side of the House. Parliamentary Government is not dead yet and the hon. gentleman does not pretend that the obstruction this time was on this side of the House; so the very worst charge that could possibly be suggested against any hon. members on this side was that they might have attempted that so-called murder, but they certainly did not succeed. But here we have had obstruction until to-day, and, were it not that the Government are taking the means which the people of this country have for some time been clamouring, we should take to make it evident that parliamentary Government is not dead in this country, that obstruction would be still going on, and we are reproached because we have used the existing rules of the House to prevent that. We have had reference, more or less relevant and more or less pertinent, by the right hon. gentleman, to cases when obstruction had taken place in other parliaments and in this. He referred more particularly at the outset to that obstruction which had taken place in the parliament of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland previous to and up to 1881, and which had been carried on by the representatives of the Irish people, the Nationalist Irish party in that Parliament. In that connection he found that he suddenly had to switch the subject because he ran right up against the fact that the man who was his hero of the other day, a great man of whom I wish to speak with the most profound respect, had introduced the first closure measure into the parliament of the United Kingdom. The right hon. gentleman used to boast that he was a Liberal of the Gladstone school. He finds now that he has got to go further back. The right hon. gentleman is a Liberal of a school dating further and further back into the past and so to find rules for his conduct to-night he goes back to the time of Fox. I suppose he did not find that quite satisfactory because he went all the way back to the time of Charles the First to find a justification for obstruction and a condemnation of any suggestion of a closure. Time was when the struggle in parliament was to assure and protect the rights of the people as against any encroachment on the part of the Crown in the exercise of its prerogative; but we all know, if the right hon. gentleman has not learned it, that those days have changed and that the business and the proper business of parliament is to assist in carrying on of the Government of the country by the representatives of the majority of the people of the country. No doubt it is the proper function of an opposition to criticize where they may think that those who for the time being have the charge and control of the Government are making mistakes but we are years, we are centuries away from the time when Parliament had to stand on guard as the asserter of the rights of the people as against encroachment on the part of the Crown, and what may have been needed in those days and may have been proper at that time is no longer called for to-day when, after all, the Government of this country is carried on by what is practically a Committee of this House chosen from the majority of the members of this House who themselves are the representatives of the majority of the people of Canada. The right hon. gentleman has to go very far back indeed in order to find in the old country Liberals who will agree with him in his view of what is desirable upon this question.

With regard to the first instance mentioned, I do not feel called upon to discuss the propriety or impropriety of the obstruction which gave rise to the first introduction of closure in the Parliament of the United Kingdom. The right hon. gentleman has said that obstruction was the murder of parliamentary government. I think, I might correctly describe it as the negation of the fundamental principle of parliamentary government. That fundamental principle is that the majority has the right to govern through those whom the constitution provides to perform that office on the selection, or by reason of their enjoyment of the confidence of the representatives of the majority of the people. I am not going to discuss whether or not the obstruction in that particular instance and Parliament was justified. There is perhaps this to be said upon the subject that the men who carried it on, I am not questioning whether they were right or wrong, were honest enough to say that they did not balk at the negation of the right of that particular Parliament, and of the principle that the majority of that Parliament should govern in the matters in which they were specially interested. I ask the right hon. gentleman is he prepared to say that he does not balk at the negation of the fundamental principle of parliamentary government as applied in this country. And yet that obstruction was met by closure, a closure that has gone on growing ever since—and that closure was introduced by a Liberal Government under the leadership of the man whom the right hon. gentleman but yesterday used to hold up to us as his model. That form of closure has been developed until to-day, notwithstanding what the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley) says, everybody knows that its provisions are vastly more drastic than anything suggested in this rule and if I were to follow the right hon. gentleman in all of the irrelevant things that he has said I might perhaps point out to him that that very closure has played no unimportant part in that legislation in the way of remedying the evil things complained of in Ireland for which he gives such great credit to the Liberal party. I am not saying it by way of criticism of the closure and I am not referring to this at all for the purpose of discussing the merits or demerits of the position of people upon the other side of the Atlantic. It is hardly necessary that I should do so upon this question, my views in that regard are known to all, but I do want to point out to him that these great measures which he looks upon with so much admiration, an admiration which I am free to say I share myself, that the successful passing of those measures has been largely attributable to the instrument of parliamentary government provided by the rules of closure.

The right hon. gentleman having given us this dissertation, having delved so far into the past, gave us some instances of obstruction in this House, and I understood him to conclude that in all the cases the obstruction was justified. He spoke of obstruction in 1885, on the Franchise Bill introduced by the then Conservative Government, and claimed that it had produced some modifications in that Bill. I am a little surprised that the right hon. gentleman, who took so active a part in the opposition to that Bill, should attribute such success as he had exclusively to his obstructive tactics. With my knowledge of his eloquence, his power, his force of reasoning and of argument, I should have been inclined to suppose that such improvement, from his point of view, as he might have brought about in that measure, was attributable to those distinguished qualities of himself and his followers. I am amazed that he should have attributed it to nothing but his obstructive tactics.

Then the right hon. gentleman referred to another instance of what he considered successful obstruction. I would have thought that the right hon. hon. gentleman would not have spoken with pride of that obstruction. We remember the obstruction in 1896 to which he referred, and we remember how, throughout it all, this right hon. gentleman, who to-night boasts that by means of that obstruction he saved the whole of the people of this country from a great wrong, did not dare himself, even in the days of that moribund parliament, to tell the people of Canada what his own position was upon the question in regard to which he practiced that obstruction of which he is so proud to-night. The expression has become historic in Canada, as previously it was historic in a very different connection with regard to a very much greater man on the other side of the Atlantic. When we want to describe the attitude of a statesman seeking to take both sides on a question and to benefit by creating the impression that he shares two diametrically opposite views, we say that he is behind the lines of Torres Vedras; and the right hon. gentleman is proud of his action on that occasion as one of the achievements of his new idol, obstruction. Then he tells us that there was another instance of obstruction in 1908, on which occasion the obstruction came from the Conservative party. He tells us that they obstructed a measure which he had introduced, the franchise measure with regard to Manitoba. He tells us that before they finished obstructing he thought they were right, and so he made concessions to them; and there again was a triumph for obstruction. Again, I would ask, are we to understand that the right hon. gentleman is not open to conviction by argument or by reasoning, but that he gave in on that occasion and found that his adversaries were right because they obstructed? Mr. Speaker, on this side of the House we have listened to or have read what has been said with painful reiteration, with tedious repetition throughout—what up to the present they have denied was obstruction, but what stands out to-night as completely confessed obstruction, and we have not been able to hear a whisper of anything that seemed like the faintest indication that the hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House were right. The obstruction of this year cannot look for justification to the obstruction of 1908.

Then the right hon. gentleman says: we had obstruction in 1911. We had obstruction, because the measure referred to was introduced on the 26th of January, and was not passed up to the 20th of July. It will not be disputed that that was a measure involving a many-sided question, a very important and grave measure as regards its effect upon this country's fiscal independence, and more than her fiscal independence. Above all, it was a measure that presented the whole question of the effect of a change of duties in respect to a very large number of items. Now, that measure was discussed, and speeches were made; but I venture to say that the right hon gentleman or those who sit behind him, cannot point out an instance of a member who at the same stage of that measure made two or three or four or five speeches in which he merely repeated himself. Many members spoke and many did not speak. That matter was closed by the dissolution of the House before many members on the Opposition side had opened their lips upon the subject; and during that period, from January until July, the House dealt with many other matters, and no one suggested that upon them members were obstructing. Then we had about two months of an adjournment, and properly so, while the right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) represented this country on the occasion of the coronation of the Sovereign. For my part, I am not prepared to admit that there was any obstruction on that occasion; but it has been pointed out that men who were not actually leading the party then in opposition, but men of great weight and influence—and I would say of some of them, certainly men not of the least wisdom among those who led the party—when they did believe that there was obstruction on that occasion, likewise believed that the proper remedy for obstruction was the remedy proposed to-night; only if they had applied the remedy suggested in many of their speeches, it would have been much more drastic than this.

Now, we are told that admitted obstruction is to be met and suppressed by the application of the gag, and the right hon. gentleman poses before the public as a hero because he did not resort to the gag but appealed to the people. Well, he may be proud he went to the people, but I hardly think he is glad.

What is this, which hon. gentlemen opposite call the 'gag,' and which we are blamed for proposing? Let us see. The great thing we value in the British constitution is the right to have parliamentary government, and not a new-fangled system of government by referendum, or government by running to the people every day to tell us what to do. The people who handed us down this British constitution were people who trusted themselves to choose their rulers, and the system they handed down to us is parliamentary government carried on by the men to whom that charge is entrusted. And now we are asked to sacrifice that and to substitute a course of running back to the people about it, every time the minority in this House may get together and exhaust its ingenuity—I will not say exhaust, because on the other side there seems to be an exhaustible fund of ingenuity when it is a question of making the rules work to prevent the government of the country being carried on—we are asked to abandon that system of government by the chosen representatives of the people in Parliament, and to substitute for it a system, under which, every time the minority in this House shall get together and say: By every means within our power we will prevent the voice of the majority being expressed, we must go back to the people. Mr. Speaker, I would ask the right hon. gentleman whether he seriously makes that proposition. Here is a House that is comparatively new. People may say what they like about it, but you have only to look at the manifesto which the right hon. the Prime Minister addressed to the people of Canada during the last election to see that here is a House that was elected on the announcement that if the right hon. gentleman were returned to power he would do precisely the thing that the measure that has given rise to obstruction proposes to do. And we are told, because we seek to provide the means whereby the mandate of the people so unmistakably given shall be put in effect, that we are to be held up, that we are to be pointed to with scorn and our conduct contrasted with the magnificent action of the right hon. gentleman who, with a Parliament three years old, and after he had introduced a measure which, if we are to believe his friends and representatives and his papers of that day was going to sweep him into power for another five years, went to the people. Mr. Speaker, we who happen for the time being to have our share in the responsibility of the Government of this country, by reason of the confidence reposed in us by the people—we have duties to perform, and we have a sense of our responsibility, and we are not going to be frightened away from discharging our duties by shouts of 'shame'; because we will not allow the minority to over-rule the will of the people confided to us to execute. I say 'shame'; a thousand times shame upon us if with the trust that has been confided to us we should prove ourselves unworthy of it, and incapable of rising to the exigencies created by this extraordinary system, that up to to-night we were told by gentlemen opposite was not obstruction, but that now we know is admitted to be obstruction. Are we to be prevented from carrying out the will of the people; are we to be prevented from administering the Government in accordance with the constitution of this country, simply because the right hon. gentleman and his followers are able to make long speeches, are able to wave their arms, are able to shout, and are able to stand out in the middle of the floor in this House, and create a situation, which I do not think parliamentary words can describe. I do not think, Sir, that I need endeavour to follow the right hon. gentleman further in the details of his speech. I perhaps have dwelt upon this subject at too great length already, but let me say just one or two words with regard to some other observations of his.

The right hon. gentleman boasted to us that he was opposed to closure. With all respect, it does seem to me that we have had evidence that upon that matter it might have been well had he been wise enough to realize that being the leader of some of the wise men whose opinions we heard to-night, it might have behooved him to follow them. And then, he referred to the citations made by the right hon. the leader of the House from the Toronto Globe, and reproached us because we did not quote the Ottawa Citizen. I wonder since when the Ottawa Citizen has become the source of inspiration to the right hon. gentleman; since when has the Globe ceased to speak to him as the inspired voice of the prophet; since when did the mantle of Macdonald fall on the shoulders of the Citizen? Might I say to the right hon. gentleman that on this side of the House we do not find it necessary to look for inspired prophets and oracles in the columns of any newspaper, and we are able to judge these questions for ourselves. Might I say, in parentheses, that perhaps all of us would hesitate to undertake the acrobatic feats that would be constantly required if we felt called upon to keep ourselves constantly in an attitude that would correspond with that of the Ottawa Citizen.

We have had as another justification for this obstruction, that the right hon. gentleman and the gentlemen behind him have strong convictions. I do not question at all that they have convictions in the plural number, but I must confess that I was surprised to hear them described as 'strong convictions,' seeing that they varied so readily.

When we started out on this debate, the right hon. gentleman and the gentlemen behind him had a strong conviction that it was absolutely necessary that right here and now and during this session we should take $35,000,000 and spend it in giving effect to the naval policy of 1910 and the building of two fleet units. We were to devote $35,000,000 to do work that would cost $100,000,000 or over, and we must proceed to do it right in this session. A very strong conviction—they pressed it on to the extreme of obstruction. They had not got to a vote on that strong conviction when they thought they had better wait and ask the people what they thought about it. The strength of that conviction seemed to go on dwindling because, whereas at the outset they only proposed to ask the people what they thought about it, when they gave another thought to the matter, they thought they had better have a redistribution and then ask the people. The hurry was getting less and less all the time. To-day, what is the strong conviction? Is it that we should build the fleet units and spend this hundred or hundred and fifty millions of dollars, or is it that we should do nothing at all? I appeal to hon. gentlemen who have sat through the weary days and the wearier nights of this discussion, and I ask them if they can tell us what the strong conviction is that impels them on to these heights and summits of obstruction. If ever there was an occasion when it seems to me there was little if any pretext which might seem to justify obstruction, it is in this particular case. I am not going to enter into a discussion of this question, to point out the nature of the objections made to the measure obstructed and to show how utterly flimsy they are. I leave that to the judgment of the members of this House who have heard the objections and can weigh them. As a justification for obstruction, their excuse or their defence seems to me a graver offence than the original obstruction. We were told of the strenuous obstruction of Edmund Burke as a justification for this performance. During a whole day, during one whole sitting—just imagine—Edmund Burke obstructed a certain measure. Therefore, the action of the right hon. gentleman and his followers for months is more than justified. During seven whole sittings—think of the length of seven entire sittings—Daniel O'Connell once obstructed a measure. Therefore the performance that has put this Parliament in a position of abject humiliation before the people of this country is justifiable.

As I said at the outset, I must confess that I felt a very serious disappointment at the manner in which the right hon. gentleman handled this very serious question. He was eloquent. He is always eloquent and he is sometimes convincing, but this time he was not convincing. I do not impute the blame to him, bnt this time he had not the case that would carry conviction and he certainly was not convincing I shall not follow the right hon. gentleman into his discussion as to how elections are carried on in this country. Might I just point out one thing to him? He says that the one remedy, when a minority in the House obstructs, is an appeal to the people. He has hardly told us of that one remedy when he turns around and conveys to us the idea that elections in this country are carried by corruption, lavish promises and all sorts of irregular and illegal methods. I do not believe the last statement; but surely, if I did believe it, as the right hon. gentleman does, I would not suggest that an appeal to the people was the proper remedy and cure.

The right hon. gentleman devoted a very short time to an attempt to a criticism of the rules suggested. He claimed, as has been claimed before, that these rules were vastly more drastic than the rules of the English House. I could not help wondering whether he had read the rules of the English House and whether particularly he had read rule 133 and the following rules, that provide, not as here for a notice of twenty-four hours and a motion by a minister of the Crown, and then a further period of debate during which members may make twenty minute speeches, but rules that permit any member to rise in his place—I am reading rule 133:

> After a question has been proposed, a member rising in his place may claim to move, 'that the question be now put, and unless it appears to the Chair that the motion is an abuse of the rules of the House, or an infringement of the rights of the minority, the question, 'that, the question be now put,' must be put forthwith.

No continuance of the debate! No twenty minute speeches! No notice of twenty-four hours! No restriction of the making of the motion to a minister of the Crown! Yet our rule is more drastic. Then it goes on:

> When the motion, 'that the question be now put,' has been carried, and the question consequent thereon has been decided, any further motion may be made (the assent of the Chair as aforesaid not having been withheld) which may be requisite to bring to a decision any question already proposed from the Chair.

You see how vastly more drastic our rule is. It is as clear as daylight! I shall not trouble the House by reading the other rules. Perhaps the right hon. the leader of the Opposition and hon. gentlemen, who think our rules more drastic, will take the pains to read these English rules. This is the Mother of Parliaments. The right hon. gentleman waxed eloquent on these rules of 1867 that had been handed down to us by the Mother of Parliaments. If we have profited by the wisdom of the Mother of Parliaments in the days of old, ask, in the name of everything that is liberal and progressive, if we are not to be allowed to learn of her increasing wisdom as she goes on in years. The right hon. gentleman found particular fault because our rule provided that:

> On Thursdays and Fridays when the Order of the Day is called for the House to go into Committee of Supply, or of Ways and Means, Mr. Speaker shall leave the Chair without putting any question, provided that, except by the consent of the House, the Estimates of each department shall be first taken up on a day other than Thursday or Friday.

I pass over what he said about requirement of the consent of the House. I think the right hon. the Premier has done admirable justice to that point. The complaint was that on Thursdays and Fridays the members of the House were going to be deprived of the immemorial right and privilege to discuss any grievance, real, imaginary or imaginable before going into Supply. This was held forth to us as a curtailment of our liberties in this country, as depriving us of a most valuable right which every British subject should insist on maintaining. And yet, what do we find? We find that in Great Britain what under our proposed rule may happen on Thursday or on Friday under rule 231 is to happen at any time:

Whenever the Committee of Supply stands as an Order of the Day, the Speaker, on the order being read, leaves the Chair without question put unless on first going into supply on the army, navy or civil service estimates respectively, or on any vote of credit, an amendment is moved or question raised relating to the estimates proposed to be taken in Committee of Supply.

So, while under our rule in this House for every day on which the House is to go into Committee of Supply other than Thursdays and Fridays, and for a certain one other day with regard to every class of estimates, the right to discuss grievances on going into Supply is to be protected, they have struggled along in England and have not discovered the condition of abject slavery into which they have been reduced for years under a rule by which, whenever Supply is proposed, the Speaker shall do what he is to do here on Thursdays and Fridays. When it comes to criticism of this suggested rule and an endeavour to present it as drastic and tyrannical and as going far beyond the rules of the Parliament of Britain, the attack is at least as weak as the defence of obstruction.

I am sure the House will be glad to hear me say that I have finished. I have spoken at greater length, I feel confident, than was necessary, and at greater length than I would have been disposed to do but that I have spoken under the influence of the amazement with which I was inspired by the nature of the attack that was made upon this rule. I feel that nothing was necessary on my part to bring home to the members of the House the absolutely unconvincing nature of the argument made in support of that attack; and I am sure that after the speech making that attack was over, without one word of mine the great majority of the members of this House sat in their places as convinced as they were at the close of the calm statement made by the right hon. leader of the House in proposing this motion, that in proposing it he was but doing the duty that devolves upon him in the high position he occupies, and that in carrying it as this House will carry it, the members of the House will be but fulfilling their clear, simple, manifest, absolutely indisputable duty to the people who have confided to them the mandate to preserve and maintain in this country intact and inviolate the right to be ruled under the British system of parliamentary government.

Mr. G. W. KYTE (Richmond, N.S.): Mr. Speaker, when the Minister of Justice rose to reply to the criticism which the right hon. the leader of the Opposition directed against the proposed resolution now before the House, I expected, as other hon. members must have expected, that the hon. minister would direct his efforts to a discussion of the constitutional principles involved in the proposal of the Prime Minister. The Minister of Justice is the member of the Government whose special duty it is to direct Parliament upon the consequences of great constitutional changes that are proposed on either side of the House. But the Minister of Justice was not as happy as he has been on former occasions. By the clock he spoke less than an hour; and that is a record for the hon. minister. I can recall instances when subjects very much less worthy of the deep consideration of Parliament took up the attention of the Minister of Justice for an hour and a half or two hours. To-night, the Minister of Justice skated around the constitutional changes involved in the resolution before the House. And I think I know the reason why. When hon. members on this side speak of coercion, of the guillotine, and of the gag, the Minister of Justice's Irish heart and Irish mind must turn to the condition of affairs in the Old Country against which he has railed time and again. There has not been an occasion during the last twenty years, when the Minister of Justice then occupying a foremost position in the judiciary of the city of Montreal, was called upon to address a gathering to consider the agitation of Home rule in the land of his ancestors, when he was not on hand either to move a resolution or support a resolution having in view the speedy accomplishment of home rule, for which his compatriots in the Old Land have striven for a hundred years. Why has not Home Rule been granted to the people of Ireland before now? Because they were prevented from discussing these questions dear to their hearts by means of the gag and the guillotine such as the Prime Minister is now proposing. The minister talks about a precedent being established in the mother of Parliaments. He does not tell the whole truth when he says that we ought to go there for our example and precedent on this occasion. If he had told the whole truth, he would have told the House that coercion, the gag, the guillotine, was never directed against the constitutional opposition in the British Parliament, never in the whole history of parliamentary Government in England was the gag attempted to be employed against the Conservative party when the Liberals were in power, or against the Liberal party when the Conservatives were in power. It was only in 1877, when Charles Stuart Parnell first won his seat in the British Parliament and surrounded himself, not with an army of opponents of the Government, not with the regular and constitutional opposition to the British Government, but by five Nationalists only, and when, by the support which he received from these Nationalists, he was able to tie up the proceedings of the British Parliament in order that the attention of the British people should be directed to the wrongs that had been worked against the Irish people for so long a period. I say this was intolerable; it was an intolerable condition, when one man backed by five followers only, in a House of six hundred and seventy members, was able to tie up the business of Parliament in such a manner as made the whole Government of Great Britain helpless. Thus it was that both of the great political parties joined for the purpose of devising some means whereby that intolerable condition of affairs could be brought to an end. The reason and justification for the attitude taken by the Irish Nationalists—and it found a response in many hearts including that of the Minister of Justice—was that whenever a Bill was proposed in the British Parliament for the purpose of ameliorating the condition of the Irish people, it was not brought up by reason of the Orders of the Day as disposed by the Government until a late hour, until three or four o'clock in the morning, and then it was proposed it was discussed for a short time by the Irish members, then the great majority of the House voted it down and that was the last that was heard of it. Mr. Parnell decided that he would draw the attention of the British people to the condition of affairs in Ireland, and he said: 'If we are not permitted to pass legislation to ameliorate the condition of the Irish people, I will so conduct myself as to prevent the British Parliament from legislating on matters pertaining to the welfare of the British people.' I shall not at the present moment dilate at further length upon that aspect of the question, but before I close my observations I will perhaps be able to convince hon. Minister of Justice that he undertook a rather difficult case when, with his record behind him, he undertook to justify the use of the gag and the guillotine in the Canadian Parliament.

The question of the amendment of the rules of the British Parliament is not a new one. Away back in 1837 it was deemed desirable to bring about such a condition in the rules of parliament as to facilitate the business of the country. The rules had not been amended for a great many years, and the consequence was that the procedure of parliament became obsolete, and from time to time efforts were made to improve these conditions. From 1837 up to 1906, fifteen different committees were appointed for the purpose of amending the rules of parliament. In the years 1837, 1848, 1854, 1861, 1869, 1871, 1878, 1886, 1888, 1890 and 1906, committees were appointed for the purpose of drawing up recommendations with a view to improving the conditions and facilitating the business of the Imperial Parliament. But the amendments proposed on each of these occasions, up to the year 1887, were recommended by a committee of the British Parliament, and not by the House of Commons itself. The hon. Minister of Justice dilated upon the fact that it was Mr. Gladstone, whom the right hon. leader of the Opposition is so proud to follow, who first instituted the gag and the guillotine in the British House of Commons. I pointed out a few moments ago that from 1877 to 1881 the methods of obstruction adopted by the Irish parliamentary party, which consisted only of a mere handful of members of the House of Commons, were so extreme that it was decided by both parties to put an end to such a condition of affairs. But the moment the Liberal party became convinced that the wrongs of Ireland ought to be righted, and that the injustice that had been done the Irish people for one hundred years ought to be removed, there was no longer any necessity for applying the gag and the guillotine to the Irish parliamentary party, so that in 1882, after the object which the Irish party had in view was accomplished, and Mr. Gladstone himself accepted the view that the Irish people were entitled to home rule, he abandoned the gag and the guillotine and was no longer a party to its enforcement. But, Sir, the gag and guillotine did not become a permanent institution in the British Parliament until the political friends of the hon. Minister of Justice—the Tory Unionist party in Ireland—obtained power in 1887, and then it became a permanent institution. Mr. W. H. Smith, who was the leader of the House of Comin the Salisbury Government, was the first premier to make it a permanent institution, so that, if there is any permanency about the method of procedure at the present time in the British House of Commons, the Tory and not the Liberal party is responsible for it, and I am astonished that the Minister of Justice should go to the Unionist Tory party in the British Parliament for the purpose of obtaining a precedent for his conduct in this House.

The Minister of Justice stated that he did not propose to get his inspiration from the newspapers of this country as to what his conduct ought to be in this regard. But the hon. Minister of Justice is not so destitute of inspiration as the right hon. Prime Minister, because the right hon. gentleman did not hesitate to go to the newspapers for that purpose, and if you eliminate from his speech this afternoon his quotations from the press, there would have been very little indeed for the reporters to have taken down. When the Prime Minister read these extracts from the press, referring to the condition of affairs that existed when the Conservative party sat in opposition, and when he read the uncomplimentary and unfriendly references to the tongue-flappers on the other side, and the freak Opposition, hon. gentlemen opposite were the loudest to vociferate and applaud. Was it not extraordinary that when the right hon. Prime Minister read from the newspapers these selections in which the Conservative party of that day were castigated for the nonsensical position, there was no one who seemed to see the fitness of the description better than hon. gentlemen opposite, and no one applauded it more than trey did? I have a few selections from the Ottawa Citizen which have not been read this evening, and which I propose to put on 'Hansard.' On the 5th day of this month, the Ottawa Citizen had the following article in regard to this question of closure.

Mr. SPEAKER: Might I remind the hon. member that it would be a violation of the rules of the House to quote from a paper any article dealing with questions before the House at the present time. What may have appeared in the newspapers in past years in reference to what has taken place would be in order, but any criticism of what is taking place in the House at the present session would not.

Mr. KYTE: What I propose to read is the comment of the Ottawa Citizen on the closure as it is applied in Great Britain.

Mr. SPEAKER: That would be quite in order.

Mr. KYTE: The Ottawa Citizen says:

> When the closure first insinuated itself into the British Parliament, it was supposed to be purely a temporary expedient to deal with Irish obstruction. But machine politicians soon perceived the power of the weapon to force through measures to suit their own purpose.

I read that for the purpose of supporting my contention that the closure was adopted by Mr. W. E. Gladstone only as a temporary expedient, and it was abandoned the moment its object had been accomplished. (Reading):

> Finally the government appointed a committee to revise the whole measure of closure, but the country had experienced enough of such so-called Liberal legislation; the government met defeat and the Conservatives were returned to power in 1887. The principle of government by the representatives of the people now passed from the frying pan into the fire with a vengeance. The Tories made closure a permanent institution, giving any member the liberty to propose the termination of a debate.

It is scarcely necessary for me to furnish any additional proof in support of the argument I used a few moments ago in reply to my hon. friend the Minister of Justice, that if closure exists in the British Parliament to-day it is not due to the Liberal party, but to the Tory party, who made it a permanent institution for their own purposes. Again, the Citizen says:

> But if the Liberals continue to obstruct, after a clause to refer is inserted in the Bill, closure is absolutely justified as the only possible expedient.
>
> There is no reasonable ground for a general election upon this question. There is no clamour of public demand for a change of government, except that which has been manufactured by the tom-toms of the Liberal party press. The only demand there is was born of Liberal desire, fathered by defeat. There is even reason to believe that it was still-born, and the only noise is that of the political doctors talking.
>
> Yet there is every reason to believe that the people's voice should be heard. If the Naval Bill is put through now by closure methods, it will have little Imperial value.

Mr. SPEAKER: I would remind the hon. member that he is now dealing distinctly and directly with a question that is before this Parliament at the present session.

Mr. KYTE: I am discussing the sentiments of the newspapers on this great and important question. They were dealing with the subject of closure in the abstract, and could have no reference to the question of closure now before the House.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member must not forget that this article deals directly with the naval question which is now before this House, if I understood aright the wording of the extract which he read.

Mr. KYTE: I think it is pretty well understood that up to a comparatively short time ago the Prime Minister had not made up his mind to take the plunge on the closure question and I assume that any criticism that may have been made in the last two or three days on that question would be only with a view to voicing the sentiments of people outside without reference to the views of members of this House. I desire to yield to your ruling and shall desist from reading any further extracts on that particular question. I stated some time ago that the question of change in procedure in the British House of Commons took a long time to develop. From 1837 until 1906 there had been frequent changes in the procedure regarding parliamentary matters. One particular means of delaying the business of Parliament before the rules were amended was the moving of motions to adjourn which were regular weapons of the Opposition. In this particular instance the right hon. the Prime Minister has endeavoured to level his closure against the conduct of the Opposition on the particular Bill before Parliament. No contention has been made that the Opposition met the efforts of the Government to put through their Bill by any obstructive methods further than those adopted in the regular course of discussion. The Opposition did not meet the Bill with any obstructive methods in the way of moving dilatory amendments or motions that you do now leave the Chair or in any other respect take advantage of any rights they had other than the right of discussion to which every member is entitled. But in the British Parliament there were occasions when the business was obstructed not by prolonging discussion on the second reading of Bills or in committee, but rather by the moving of dilatory motions. The rules were changed in that respect and on many occasions down to 1867. In 1867, after Confederation had become an accomplished fact in Canada, we were given the benefit of the experience which the British Parliament gave to all constitutional countries inasmuch as the rules then in force in the British Parliament were adopted by the Canadian federated Parliament. When hon. gentlemen opposite speak of antiquated proceedings of the House of Commons they do not use a very happy expression. It is quite true that in 1877 and in 1878, when it was proposed to amend the rules in the British Parliament they had reference to antiquated methods which had been applicable in Parliament for 500 years. We have had no such experience but, as I said, the rules adopted by this Parliament were comparatively new and hon. gentlemen in speaking of them as antiquated are not speaking according to the facts. We have had all the benefit of the improvements brought about by the frequent committees of the British House of Commons in respect to changing of rules up to 1867. In 1861 there was a report of a committee appointed for the purpose of changing the rules in the British House. That report reads in part as follows:

We have treated with respect the written and unwritten law of Parliament, which for ages has secured a good system of legislation, perfect freedom of debate and a due regard for the rights of minorities, this respect for tradition and this caution in making changes have proceeded in the principle that no change is justifiable which experience has not found necessary, and that the maintenance of the old rules is preferable to new but speculative amendments.

I submit that the Prime Minister has not made out such a case as would justify him in abandoning the old rules which have been in force in this Parliament and to resort to speculative amendments by way of experiment.

Another reason why it was necessary to amend the rules in the British Parliament was owing to uncertainty as to what particular business would be taken up by the Government from day to day. The Government might draw up its routine proceedings as we have them here but instead of the House proceeding the following day to discuss what was set on the Order Paper, other things would be interjected by reason of dilatory motions and motions for adjournment brought up from time to time. In the English Parliament at that time and until a short time ago members of Parliament were not paid any indemnity. There are 670 members in the British House, they live within comparatively short distances of the Houses of Parliament and as they were paid no remuneration it was necessary for them to frequently leave the precincts of Parliament in order to attend to their personal and private business. Railway trains would carry them from the House of Parliament to their homes in, at most, fifteen or twenty hours and therefore the attendance in the British House of Commons was not very regular or continuous. On that account it was necessary that members should know what business would come up so that they might be present for the discussion of any question in which they were interested. Owing to uncertainties as to the Government business to be transacted it was necessary to have some definite programme carried out and so it was decided to abolish the right of members to move dilatory amendments, such as to adjourn the House, when Government business should have attention. In this Parliament that condition of affairs does not exist. The indemnity to members has been increased from time to time for the purpose of enabling them, without too great sacrifice of their personal interests, to give their time to Parliament. Canada is a large country, members cannot so conveniently go from Ottawa to their homes to transact private business as in England and therefore we have a more regular attendance than it is possible to have in Great Britain. One argument in favour of increasing the indemnity was that the business of the country had become of larger volume and the sessions had become of longer duration and that it was necessary to compensate members with some reasonable indemnity for the sacrifice of their personal interests to public affairs. Therefore, assuming that the Prime Minister was putting the change of rules now proposed on this ground, the argument would not have any precedent in the condition of affairs at the time the rules there were first amended.

On the other hand, it must be remembered that the statement and consideration of grievances before Supply are among the most ancient and important privileges of the Commons, and this opportunity of obtaining full explanation from the ministers of the Crown is the surest and the best.

To this Bourinot adds:

The committee did not recommend a departure from the established rules.

The proposal made by the First Minister has reference not only to a protracted period of debate on Bills that may be submitted by the Government to Parliament but has a more far-reaching effect than that involved in the curtailment of the debate on any Bill, no matter how important. So far as the proposal of the right hon. the Prime Minister is concerned in the curtailment of debate on the introduction or second reading of Bills, I would not be disposed to offer so much criticism; but the Prime Minister has not stopped at that, he has introduced an amendment to the rules which involves the absolute denial to members of the Opposition of the right to discuss matters of serious moment and to discuss grievances before the granting of Supply. That is a right which has always been maintained to the British people and to members of the Opposition in the British House of Commons. From 1837 down to the present time when the agitation for an amendment to the rules was proposed, it was always conceded that the right of discussion of grievances on Supply must be adhered to. It was proposed on one occasion that, on two days in the week, the Government would have a right to put the House into Committee of Supply without a formal motion but that objected to on the ground of the curtailment of the privilege to which I have referred. For a time the rules held that on two days in the week the Government could have that right but subsequently the two days were reduced to one day and finally it is only upon conditions that on going into Supply on certain estimates, even on Mondays and Thursdays, the privilege of members to discuss matters on going into Committee of Supply was conceded. The Minister of Justice now endeavours to draw a favourable parallel for the resolution now before the House as compared with the present resolution in force in the British House of Commons. I submit that upon reading the rules and studying the debates that took place at the time the rule was so amended, it must inevitably be seen and it must irresistibly be driven home to every hon. member in the House, that the change made by the right hon. Prime Minister is far more drastic and far more comprehensive than the proposal made in the British House of Commons. It is conceivable that under certain circumstances which may be of the utmost importance to the public, members of the Opposition should have the right to discuss grievances before going into Supply on any day of the week and no restriction should be placed on that right. It is conceivable that a Minister of Public Works —and I have no reference to anything that has taken place up to the present time— but it is quite possible that a Minister of Public Works from say the province of Manitoba would so conduct himself in the discharge of his duties and the expenditure of public money as to make it absolutely necessary that the Opposition should have the right to discuss his conduct in regard to the administration of his department, and the only occasion that right could be exercised is upon the motion that the House resolve itself into Committee of Supply.

It is quite possible that a member of some future Administration might so conduct himself in the carrying on of elections, either provincial or federal, as to make it absolutely necessary that the Opposition in this Parliament and the people of this country, should find out to what extent violation of his duty and obligation to the Governor General had been involved in his conduct in such election.

It is possible that in the future a Secretary of State might so conduct himself in the matter of carrying on an election, in which his own seat in Parliament is involved, as to become guilty of a conspiracy with friends in his constituency, so as to reflect seriously upon his conduct as a member of Parliament and an adviser of the Crown, and that conduct could not be inquired into except under the right which the Opposition now have to discuss it on going into Supply. I could enumerate many instances where that right may be necessary. I need scarcely remind the House that from 1891 to 1896 a condition of affairs was disclosed in respect to the expenditure of public money such as shocked the whole civilized world. Great Britain, in which is situated the mother of parliaments, and whence we draw our inspirations and precedents, was shocked to its very centre by reason of the disclosures brought about by the investigation that took place in the House of Commons in respect to the administration of certain departments of the Government during the period from 1891 to 1896. I wonder if these disclosures would have been made if the closure, which is now proposed, were in force in the Canadian House of Commons at that period. Would this country have known to what extent the public treasury was filched by reason of the construction of the Curran bridge which cost hundreds of thousands of dollars more than it should have cost, and the difference between the actual cost of which and the money paid for it went into the pockets of some supporters of the Government then in power? Would the late Hon. J. I. Tarte have been able to make his motion in the House of Commons in 1891 which impeached the then Minister of Public Works and which brought about the disclosures that shocked not only the people of Canada but the people of Great Britain as well, if the right to move an amendment on going into Supply were denied to the Opposition. If you go through the history of Canada from 1867 to 1896 you will find instances where the rights of the minority would have been seriously trenched on and where the interests of the public generally would have been sacrificed if the closure now proposed by the Prime Minister had been enforced by the Government in power. It is unnecessary for me to dilate upon this aspect of the question, but I desire to register as emphatically as I can my protest against the acceptance of the resolution now before us.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Does the hon. gentleman say that the conduct of the Minister of Public Works in 1891 was brought before the attention of Parliament on a motion in amendment to Supply?

Mr. KYTE: I say that if the present closure resolution was in force, as one of the rules of order and procedure at that time, it would be impossible to have brought the matter before Parliament. I intend to continue my remarks for half an hour or an hour longer and I would ask the leader of the House to grant an adjournment. I move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

On the motion of Mr. Rogers, the House adjourned at 11.10 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

THURSDAY, April 10, 1913.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at three o'clock

Mr. KYTE.

THE ROYAL ASSENT.

Mr. SPEAKER read to the House a communication from the Assistant Governor General's Secretary announcing that His Excellency the Administrator would proceed to the Senate Chamber this afternoon at five o'clock for the purpose of giving the Royal Assent to certain Bills.

QUESTIONS.

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

AID TO AGRICULTURE.

*Mr. LEMIEUX:

1. Has the Minister of Agriculture received the following resolution, adopted on March 19, 1913, of the Council of Agriculture of the province of Quebec:

Extract of the official report of a sitting of the Council of Agriculture of the province of Quebec, held at the Legislative Buildings, Room No. 54, in the city of Quebec, at 10 a.m., Wednesday, the nineteenth day of March, 1913.

Proposed by Mr. J. B. Carbonneau, seconded by Mr. A. J. Dawes and the Hon. N. Garneau, and resolved: That, whereas the Council highly approves of the employment which has been made by the provincial Government of the federal subsidy voted for the year 1912-13, in the interest of agriculture;

And whereas the method of employment has given entire satisfaction to the agriculture class and contributed to the improvement of agriculture and the development of several important agricultural industries;

And whereas the subsidies granted out of this subsidy for drainage, fruit arboriculture, the dairy industry, the culture of birds, the growth of pulse, the breeding of cattle, the production of smoked meats, the culture and preparation of tobacco, the manufacture of preserves, and schools of agriculture, have given the best results, and will give still better ones if these grants are continued for several years;

And whereas the method of employment adopted this year in accordance with the contract entered into between the two governments, lends itself with advantage to the different needs of the provinces more than if the subsidy is destined to one sole object, determined by the federal legislature;

The Council prays the federal Government to pass a law to permit the division of the $10,000,000, which it is proposed to grant to the provinces in the interests of agriculture, so as to continue the agriculture policy adopted at the last federal session.

The secretary of the Council is asked to transmit a copy of this resolution to the Hon. Martin Burrell, Minister of Agriculture of the federal Government at Ottawa.

(Signed) Oscar Lessard,
Secretary of the Council of Agriculture.

2. What decision and action does the Government intend to take in this matter?

Mr. BURRELL:

1. Yes.

2. The Bill dealing with this matter is now before the House.

OYSTER PONDS PREVENTIVE OFFICER.

*Mr. SINCLAIR:

1. Has a preventive officer been appointed at Oyster Ponds, Guysborough county, N.S., to take the place of S. M. Ferguson, dismissed?

2. If so, what is the name, salary, and post office address of the appointee?

Mr. REID (Minister of Customs): No.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE—LAWYERS AT QUEBEC.

*Mr. LEMIEUX:

1. Who are the agents of the Department of Justice for the city of Quebec?

2. What are the names of the barristers who have been employed as such during the last fiscal year in Quebec?

Mr. DOHERTY:

1. The Minister of Justice has no standing agents at the city of Quebec. Lawyers are retained in the several cases as they occur.

2. The following were retained direct by the Department of Justice: Hon. E. J. Flynn, Messrs. Eusebe Belleau, Lucien Moraud, Gus. Stuart, H. Grenier, E. L. Fiset, Drouin, Drouin and Drouin.

By direction of the Department of Justice, the following advocates in Quebec were employed by the commissioners of the Transcontinental railway in the following expropriation cases:

Case.	Plaintiff's Solicitor.
The King vs. Louis Topping	Honoré Grenier.

PRESCOTT PROPERTY PURCHASE.

*Mr. KYTE:

Referring to the following item appearing in the Ottawa Citizen of April 7, 1913: 'The news published three weeks ago in the Citizen concerning the Government purchase of the abandoned starch works at Prescott, is repeated from an inspired source in the local party organ. It is stated 'the big deal' has been negotiated by the Hon. J. D. Reid, member for the constituency. Such an extension to the Government marine works affords Prescott the opportunity to go ahead and rival Sorel shipyards.'

1. Has the starch works referred to been purchased by the Government?

2. If so, what was the price paid?

3. Who were the directors of the company owning the said property at the date of the purchase?

4. Is Hon. J. D. Reid, Minister of Customs, a director or stockholder in the said company?

5. If not, when did he cease to be a director or stockholder?

Mr. HAZEN:

1 and 2. After having given the matter full consideration, the technical officers of the department reported in favour of enlarging the workshops and ship-repairing plant at Prescott, with a view to manufacturing there lighthouse apparatus, &c., now being imported in considerable quantities and at high prices. This policy was approved by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, and in order to carry it into effect it became necessary to secure additional land, wharf accommodation and buildings at Prescott. Accordingly an option was obtained from the Canada Starch Company, Limited, of Montreal, on property at Prescott immediately adjoining that owned and occupied by the department. The chief engineer of the department, after a careful examination of the property, reported it as admirably suited for the purpose in view. He also reported that the price named in the option, $47,500, was substantially below its actual value. On the strength of the report, a copy of which is hereto attached, it was decided to purchase the property, and the Department of Justice was instructed to complete the same by securing a proper title. The Department of Justice has completed the purchase, and the title to the property is now vested in His Majesty.

3, 4 and 5. The department has no information.

Mr. REID: As the hon. member appears to be anxious for information about my private business, I may further inform him that I am not now and never have been a director of this company, neither was I ever in any way connected with its management. Further, I may add that I am not a stockholder, having ceased to be a stockholder on January 31 last.

ALBERTA LAND SALE.

Mr. WARNOCK:

1. Does John T. Cooper hold the east half of section 28, 15, 28, 4, Alberta? If so, how did he obtain title thereto?
2. Does John T. Cooper hold a part of section 2, 15, 26, 4 in said province? If so, what part and by what right or title?
3. Does John T. Cooper hold three quarters of section 34, 14, 26, 4 in said province? If so, which quarter and by what right or title?

Mr. CROTHERS:

1. The department is not in a position to state who the present owner is. The land was purchased under the irrigation system by Sydney Cooper, to whom patent was issued on 12th February, 1910.

2. The department is not in a position to state who the present owner is. John Thomas Cooper purchased the west half under the irrigation system. The northwest quarter was patented to him on the 3rd September, 1909, and the south west half on the 19th April, 1909. His homestead, the southeast quarter was patented to him on the 3rd November, 1909.

3. The department is not in a position to state who the present owner is. The north half and southeast quarter of this section was purchased by John Thomas Cooper under the irrigation system, and patent therefor was issued to him on the 6th May, 1909.

CLOCKS FOR PUBLIC BUILDINGS.

*Mr. LEMIEUX:

1. How many clocks have been purchased for public buildings by the Public Works Department since 1st December, 1911, up to 31st March, 1913?
2. At what cost?

Mr. ROGERS:

1. Six purchased and paid for; a number ordered but not delivered.

2. Regina, Sask., $863.83; Oshawa, Ont., $747.03; Nanaimo, B.C., $727.57; Vernon, B.C., $705.67; Uxbridge, Ont., $727.57; Mitchell, Ont., $727.57; total, $4,499.24.

DREDGING AT TITTLE PASSAGE.

Mr. SINCLAIR:

1. How much was expended in dredging at the Tittle Passage, Canso, during the year 1912?
2. If the work was carried on by day work, who was foreman?
3. What are the names of the employees and the amount paid to each?
4. If by contract, what is the name of the contractor and amount of contract?
5. Is the work completed? If not, is it the intention of the Government to complete the work this year?

Mr. ROGERS:

1. $1,477.81.

2 and 4. Day's labour. John Kennedy, conductor.

3. John Kennedy, conductor, $171.84; John Parker, labourer, $54; Moses Cohoon, labourer, $82.50; William Carey, labourer, $70.50; John Ryan, labourer, $66; John Sampson, diver, $675; John Rogers, labourer, $64.50; Martin Kennedy, labourer, $16.50; total, $1,200.84.

5. Yes, completed.

THE RULES OF THE HOUSE—LIMITATION OF DEBATE.

Consideration of the proposed resolution of Mr. Borden, to amend rule 17 of the House of Commons, and the proposed motion of Mr. Hazen, that this question be now put, resumed from April 9.

Mr. G. W. KYTE (Richmond, N. S.): Before I moved the adjournment of the debate last night, I referred to the circumstances under which it was deemed necessary to change the rules of procedure in the British House of Commons, and I purpose to add some further observations on this matter before I proceed to discuss other features of the resolution. I pointed out that from 1837 to 1882 various efforts had been made to amend the procedure in the British House of Commons with a view to facilitating the transaction of Government business. From two to twelve notices of motion were set down on every supply night during the session of 1854, and the whole course of business as appointed by the Government had been disarranged. This would indicate the great necessity for a change in the rules. When the number of motions on going into supply amounted to the number reported in the records of the British Parliament, it would appear that there existed some necessity for putting an end to motions of that kind. But, nothwithstanding this, Sir Thomas Erskine

May, who at that time was clerk of the British House of Commons and who was an expert on all matters pertaining to Parliamentary procedure, expressed his unwillingness to make any change in the rules in this regard, and his desire to maintain intact the old constitutional maxim that the discussion of grievances should precede consideration of supply. The hon. Minister of Justice, who discussed this resolution last evening, did not point out any such justification for an amendment to the rules of this Parliament such as I have quoted in respect to the condition of affairs existing in the British Parliament. For ten years previous to 1871 the average number of amendments moved on going into supply was thirty-three per annum, in addition to an equal number of discussions not ending in obstruction. Upon this point, Sir Thomas Erskine May stated:

> This points to the fact that the House of Commons is altogether more active and vigilant than it formerly was, and takes part in examining and discussing every imaginable question not only with regard to the estimates but every Bill and subject of the session.

This reveals the attitude of that great parliamentary expert upon the question of curtailing the right of members of the Opposition to bring up important questions on motions to go into supply. Amendments were proposed in the year 1871, and a committee specially appointed for the purpose of drawing up changes in the rules of procedure, recommended, among other things, the following rule:

> Rule 1. Whenever notice has been given that estimates will be moved in Committee of Supply, and the committee stands as the first Order of the Day, upon any day, except Thursday and Friday on which government orders have precedence, the Speaker shall, when the order of the committee has been read, forthwith leave the Chair, without putting any question, and the House shall forthwith resolve itself into such committee. (This may be shortly described as the extension to Committee of Supply of the Rule of Progress which had long been adopted for Committees of the Whole House upon Bills).

This proposal was not accepted by the House of Commons, and the reasons were as follows:

> The only step in advance which an immediate result of the committee of 1871 was the acceptance, with certain modifications, of the important principle laid down in the first resolution. We have seen that in spite of the recommendations of the committees of 1848, 1854 and 1861 it had not hitherto been possible to induce the House to accept it. Beyond all question it was a serious limitation of the scope of private members' rights in favour of the Government and the daily programme framed by them.
>
> The House resolved, on the 26th of February 1872, that the rule of progress should be extended to Committee of Supply; that is to say, that amendments on the occasion of going into such committee should not be allowed on a day when a new division of the estimates was being taken, nor at subsequent sittings.
> The right of delaying committee of Supply on the introduction of Supplementary Estimates was not affected nor was the right to move amendments on going into Committee of Ways and Means or upon the report of Supply. In the last-mentioned case amendments had for years been confined to matters relevant to the resolutions reported.

Therefore the committee especially appointed in 1871 to suggest changes in the rules of the House of Commons for restricting the right of members to move amendments to the motion for the House to go into Supply, recommended that the restrictions which heretofore had existed should be reduced and the rights of the Opposition to full discussion of matters that should properly come up on a motion of that kind were restored to members sitting to the left of the Speaker. In 1878 the matter was again taken up by a special committee. The House then accepted a report that on one day in the week, that is on Monday, the House should go into Committee of Supply without question put and consequently without giving any opportunity to move an amendment. The suggestion that the rule should extend to the second Government day was not accepted.

We have here a proposal of the right hon. the First Minister that on Thursday and Friday, when going into Supply, the Speaker shall leave the Chair without any motion put and thus deprive members of the Opposition of the opportunity of moving any important or necessary resolution that might affect the public interest. As late as 1878, and notwithstanding the great necessity that existed for curtailing an abuse which prevailed in the British Parliament, that rule was not amended and in view of the circumstances in this House no such justification has been shown for amending the rules. Except in case of any unnecessary or dilatory motions being made by members sitting in Opposition, there certainly is no justification at this period in our history and at this date in the history of the Canadian Parliament, for restricting the rules of debate in the manner proposed by the resolution moved by the Prime Minister yesterday afternoon.

In 1879 a special committee appointed for that purpose proposed that whenever the Committee of Supply or Committee of Ways and Means stands on the first Order of the Day on Monday Mr. Speaker shall leave the Chair without putting any question. The House accepted this with an amendment providing that amendments could be moved on Army, Navy and Civil Service estimates, so that while a previous committee had recommended that on Monday the Speaker do leave the Chair without giving any member of the Opposition an opportunity to move an amendment in respect of any important matter, in 1879 that restriction was removed and even on Monday on the House going into Supply, members of the Opposition were given the right to move amendments relating to Army, Navy and Civil Service estimates. In 1882 the following standing rule was adopted as rule 17:

> Whenever the Committee of Supply stands as an order of the day, Mr. Speaker shall leave the Chair without putting any question unless when first going into Supply on the Army, Navy or Civil Service estimates respectively or on any vote of credit an amendment be moved or question raised relating to the estimates proposed to be taken in Supply.

That was as far as the House of Commons was prepared to go up to 1882. I pointed out last night the reasons that influenced both the great political parties in the British House of Commons to accept this amendment. I pointed out that the obstruction complained of by the Government of that time was not the obstruction of the regular Opposition party in the House of Commons, but was obstruction brought about and persisted in by a small coterie of Irish Nationalists who adopted that course for the purpose of bringing before the notice of the British Parliament and the British people those grievances which the people of Ireland had laboured under for so many years. It was, as I stated, a notable circumstance that seven or eight members of the House could persistently and successfully hold up Government business to the exclusion of every other important matter that could engage the attention of the British House of Commons. It is not necessary for me to point out to you that the scope of jurisdiction of the British House of Commons as respects legislation far exceeds that which obtains in this Parliament. In Canada every province has its legislature and its government and matters that are not appointed under the British North America Act to be legislated on by the federal Parliament are legislated on and disposed of by the provincial parliaments; nothing but important matters assigned to our jurisdiction ever can come up for discussion in this Parliament. In the British Parliament it is entirely different; they have there no local legislatures, there is no division of legislative or executive authority in Great Britain to reduce the labours that must necessarily fall upon that House. The members of the British Parliament must deal with every proposal from the building of a road, up to the large and important questions of the conduct of the Government in declaring peace or war, or the partition of Turkey or any other great question of world politics. Then too there are 670 members of Parliament in Great Britain, all of whom are more or less interested in the discussion of questions that necessarily come before that Parliament for their decision and the consequence must inevitably be that protracted discussion would prevent that speedy and proper disposal of the Government programme which is essential and necessary in the Government of such an important country. Here in Canada we have no such condition of affairs. The scope of our legislation is limited to a comparatively few subjects, the number of our members is only 220 and a comparatively small proportion of these members participate in debate. Therefore, as I said, the conditions which arose in the British Parliament and which resulted in both political parties agreeing to the adoption of rule 17, which I have just quoted to the House do not exist in this Parliament and no justification exists for following the precedent established in the British House of Commons under the circumstances to which I have referred. The amendment to the procedure was from beginning to end treated without party spirit and not as an issue between the two parties, but as a problem of the House of Commons as a whole.

That, Sir, completes the proof of the proposition which I have endeavoured to place before the House, that the amendment of the rules in England was not directed against either of the political parties, but against a very small coterie of representatives which was known as the Nationalist party at that time. Both political parties united for the purpose of coming to some agreement by which the unnecessary and intolerable obstruction that then prevailed could be put an end to. If my right hon. friend the First Minister desired to have the amendment to the rules which he now proposes to Parliament receive the support of both sides, the proper step for him to have taken was to have referred these resolutions for the amendment of the rules to a committee of members from both sides of this House in order that amendments such as would likely be considered reasonable and necessary under present conditions might be made. But the right hon. Prime Minister must have been satisfied in his own mind that the proposals which he made to Parliament were not reasonable and were not such as could reasonably be expected to receive the support of the Opposition. Therefore, he prefers to depend upon his majority to force through legislation amendments to the rules which would not be accepted under any other circumstances.

Protection of the minority is, therefore, in the British Parliament no mere privilege of the minority for the time being; it is a vitally important institution developed in the highest interests of a nation ruled by Parliament.

The majority for the time being has no true interest in weakening the principle; for it has always to expect the day when it will in turn be the minority and will need this palladium as a means of advocating its own party conception of the interests of the state.

That is the observation made by Mr. Redlich, the latest authority on parliamentary government in Great Britain, and that is a principle that I expect would appeal to the majority in this House, but that an appeal made in the language which I have quoted would receive a generous hearing on the part of hon. gentlemen who sit behind the Government, I have some doubt in view of the spectacle we saw yesterday afternoon when, with the words of the right hon. Prime Minister as to his disposition to be fair in the enforcement of these new rules still echoing through these halls, we had the most outrageous attempt that was ever made in any self-respecting parliament to apply the gag. And, to whom? Was it to some insignificant back-bencher who had not won the respect of hon. gentlemen opposite? Was it to a member who had no following in the House or in the country? No, Mr. Speaker, it was an attempt to apply the gag to the nestor of Imperial statesmen, the Right Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier. Mr. Speaker Brand, discussing the question of improving the rules and procedure in the British House of Commons, stated that·

The distinctive mark of obstruction lies in the indiscriminating and incessant resistance of an extremely small minority to proposals of the most diverse kinds.

There you have the justification for the amendment of the rules which was brought about in the British House of Commons in 1882. It was not the obstruction of one of the regularly constituted parties in the British House of Commons, but the obstruction of an extremely small minority to proposals of the most diverse kinds.

The alleged obstruction which the amendment of the right hon. Prime Minister is aimed at here is what he is pleased to call the obstruction of one of the two great political parties in this country. It is a party comprising eighty-seven members out of a total House of 220 and, Mr. Speaker, is it obstruction against proposals of the most diverse kind? No, according to the testimony given by the right hon. Prime Minister himself yesterday afternoon, the amendment of these rules is aimed at what he is pleased to call the obstruction of one specific piece of legislation which is now being considered by the House. There is no attempt made to argue that the conduct of the Liberal Opposition in the House has been of such a character as to bring about a paralysis of the regular business of the country that the Government ought to be devoting its attention to at the present time. It was pointed out yesterday by my right hon. leader as respects the West Indian Bill, the Japanese treaty and the estimates which it was proposed the House should vote to carry on the government of the country, there had been absolutely no obstruction and no delay. Every attention was given by the Opposition to every item on the Government programme for the purpose of expediting it and crystalizing it into legislation in so far as such was necessary to carry out the proposals of the Government.

There is no justification by precedent, or experience, for an amendment of the rules which is calculated to apply the gag, or the guillotine to all investigation into the public affairs of the country and to prevent all attempts at criticism of matters in which the public are vitally interested.

There was obstruction of the Irish Coercion Bill in 1881. It was of such a serious character that the business of the British House of Commons was completely paralyzed and, to show how seriously the business of the House was interfered with, I will mention to the House the suggestion made by Lord Redesdale on that occasion as the only means that he could conceive of that would relieve the situation. Lord Redesdale recommended the Cabinet to declare the state of Ireland to be one of revolution, to introduce a Bill for the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act in both houses at the same time and to act as if the Bill had passed as soon as the first reading was had. That sheds some light upon the extraordinary condition of affairs that existed in the British House of Commons in 1881. The Government felt that it would be impossible for them to pass their Coercion Bill whereby they desired to improve conditions, according to their ideas, as regards the observance of law in Ireland. When it was found that they could not succeed in getting that through, they were equally convinced that they could not succeed in getting a Bill to suspend the Habeas Corpus Act in Ireland through the House of Commons owing to obstruction, so that it was seriously proposed that a Bill to suspend the Habeas Corpus Act in Ireland should be introduced into the House of Commons and House of Lords and on the first reading of the Bill it was to be declared that the Bill should be in force in Ireland. As that suggestion could not receive the approval of the Government of the day, they had to resort to other measures. There was a Bill introduced for the protection of public property in Ireland. On a motion to suspend the standing orders and give the Bill precedence the sitting lasted twenty-two hours. For twenty-two hours the Irish Nationalists succeeded in obstructing the passage of the measure of the Government, and when the division was taken the vote stood 251 for the motion and 33 against it. Thirty-three was the full strength of the Nationalist party in the British House of Commons on that occasion out of a total membership of 670 and those thirty-three members were able to hold up the business of the country in such a manner as to suggest the radical step which was put forth by Lord Redesdale to which I have just made reference. On Monday, January 31, the sitting lasted forty-two and one-half hours, and the debate was closed by the coup d'etat of the Speaker. That coup d'etat is well known to every student of parliamentary government in Great Britain and I shall not further describe it. The Government and both parties united in self-defence to break the power of obstruction A motion was made to suspend Mr. Parnell, who was the leader of the Nationalist party and the vote stood 405 for to 7 against. Seven members only were able to tie up the business of the British House of Commons for forty-two and a half hours. We find in this fact some justification for the amending of the rules of the British House of Commons so that the business of the House could be carried on in an orderly manner and so that the voice of the majority could be heard in parliament. A motion to suspend twenty-eight members for refusing to vote was carried by 410 to 6. Is there any such disparity as that existing in this Parliament, assuming that the conduct of the Opposition might properly be described as obstruction? Is there any justification for saying that the regularly constituted Opposition in this House, representing one of the great political parties in Canada and which, I think I can successfully show, represents a majority of the electors, has not the right to criticize the legislation brought before Parliament even though that criticism should extend beyond the time when hon. gentlemen opposite think that it ought to be terminated? Practically the whole House with the exception of the Irish Nationalists supported the Government in their effort to put an end to this obstruction. It was not then a question between the Liberals and Conservatives in the British House of Commons, but both great political parties united to amend the rules of procedure, and they certainly had some justification for assuming that public opinion would support them in breaking the deadlock caused by such an insignificant minority. The Irish Coercion Bill was carried by a vote of 281 to 36.

When I speak of closure such as was introduced in the British House of Commons in 1882, I do not refer to a permanent condition that was intended for all time to be the guidance and regulation of parliamentary action there. After a couple of years when the voice of Ireland was recognized by the great Liberal party in England, they felt that their coercive measures were unjust and unjustifiable, and the rules which were amended in 1882 for the purpose of forcing business through Parliament were practically abandoned and were not revived under the then Liberal Government. Notwithstanding the extraordinary circumstances existing in the British Parliament both political parties felt they were not justified in depriving the small and insignificant minority which made up the Irish party of every right and every claim to fair play, and so it was specially provided in the closure resolutions that the enforcement of closure would be restricted to the regular Chairman of committees. We have in this House a Deputy Speaker who takes the place of Mr. Speaker in his absence, and who is presumed to be at all times the chairman of committees. We had instances in the last three or four weeks which would go to show how unfair it would be to place this large power of closure in the hands not only of the regular chairman of committees but in the hands of hon. members who may be called from time to time to discharge the duty in the absence of the regular Chairman.

I do not desire to utter any sentiment that may in the slightest degree be construed to reflect on the fairness and integrity of any hon. gentleman sitting on the other side of the House, but I do say that the First Minister should at least make some effort to preserve to the minority here some reasonable assurance that if this closure is adopted it shall not be applied without due cause and will not be enforced unless backed up by the responsibility which the regular chairman of committees in this House would lend to it. But, the First Minister is willing not only to place that power of closure in the hands of the regular chairman of committees but to put that power in the hands of any hon. member who may for the time being be suggested to preside over a committee of this House.

There is another thing I desire to point out which shows the very vast difference between the conditions existing in Great Britain, and those which exist in this country at present. The Speaker of the British House of Commons is not an appointee of any political party, and a Speaker is selected only upon the retirement or death of his predecessor. When a new Speaker is appointed he remains Speaker of the British House of Commons throughout successive governments and through all the vicissitudes of party success and party defeat. There is no such thing as electing a new Speaker when a new government comes into power; once a Speaker always a Speaker, is the maxim of the British House of Commons. That gives a further assurance that the application of closure in the hands of the Speaker so appointed would only be with a view of preserving the rights of minorities, because in England they do recognize that minorities have some rights. Far be it from me, Mr. Speaker to say a word that would reflect in any way upon the impartial manner in which you desire to carry on the affairs of Parliament, but I can imagine that some future Speaker, who would be imbued perhaps with more desire for the advancement of the party that selected him for the high position, than for maintaining the dignity of his office, might occupy your seat, and then what would happen if the power of closure which is being placed in your hands by the First Minister was to be exercised by such a Speaker without having that regard for the rights of minorities which the Speaker of the British House of Commons observes, no matter whether it is the Conservative party or the Liberal party that sits on his right.

In the session of the British House of Commons in 1882 an attempt was made to amend the rules by adopting closure, but the motion was not brought to a conclusion and the attempt was abandoned. The government of that day did not think that such an important matter as the amendment of the rules so as to apply closure upon minorities should be passed upon at a regular sitting of Parliament. Mr. Gladstone felt that matters which were to be considered at that time as part of the Government programme, ought not to be helped through Parliament by a closure which was adopted for the special purpose of forcing a particular species of legislation through Parliament. He therefore decided to deal with that important matter at a special session of Parliament and consequently on October 24, 1882, a special session of Parliament was called for that purpose. It does seem to me very extraordinary that hon. gentlemen opposite who profess to be good sports and to believe in fair play, should, when the battle has begun and they find they are getting the worst of it, ask to suspend the battle for the purpose of enabling them to amend the rules so as to take an unfair advantage of the other party to the conflict. What would we think of one of the great champions of the fistic arena, who having challenged an opponent, should, when the fight had progressed somewhat and he saw he was getting the worst of it, propose to the referee that the fight should be discontinued so as to enable him to amend the rules in order to get an advantage. What would the public say of such sportsmanship as that? What would public opinion be as to that? And, hon. gentlemen opposite must not forget that we on this side of the House are fighting a legislative battle in this Dominion according to the best traditions of the game and according to the best sentiments and instincts of sportsmanship. I say that by their conduct in suspending discussion on the Naval Bill for the purpose of forcing through rules which will give them an unfair advantage over their opponents, they have sacrificed every right to be thought honourable and straightforward by right-thinking people in the Dominion of Canada.

Mr. SPEAKER: I think it is a little extreme to speak of members as having acted so as to abandon any right to be called honourable; the language is hardly parliamentary.

Mr. KYTE: Many of the provisions that were passed in 1882 for the purpose of bringing about the closure in the British House of Commons were passed against a strong resistance and without any enthusiastic support from the Liberals. Consequently in the next sessions, the House tacitly abandoned many parts of the new procedure and it was never really put into force. That supports the statement which I made last night in reply to my hon. friend the Minister of Justice when he hurled across the floor of the House the insinuation that Mr. Gladstone, whom the right hon. the leader of the Opposition was so proud to follow, was responsible for the closure as it exists in the British Parliament to-day. That is not the fact. The closure, which was adopted for the purpose of meeting the exigencies of the situation which existed in 1882, was abandoned by the Liberal Government of that day, but it remained for the Unionist Government under the leadership of Hon. W. H. Smith in the British House of Commons to make the closure a permanent institution in British parliamentary practice.

Mr. BURNHAM: Does not the closure apply to Government members as well as to members of the Opposition?

Mr. BELAND: Oh, no! No doubt about that!

Mr. KYTE: In 1886 the closure was again discussed and the leaders of both parties joined in the discussion. It was referred to a committee, but the report of that committee was never adopted by the House and consequently its recommendations were never crystallized into rules of procedure. The Unionist Government, led by the Hon. W. H. Smith, proposed what is known as the guillotine in 1887, and that is the form of execution in vogue in the British House of Commons to-day. It was stated that the proposal to adopt the closure in the British House of Commons placed the business of Parliament entirely in the hands of the Government and that that was not consonant with the idea of parliamentary government in which the people of Great Britain believed and that was the reason why Mr. Gladstone did not carry into effect the recommendations made by the various committees.

What is the reason for this closure at the present time? I pointed out that no justification exists for it except in the weakness and the want of leadership of hon. gentlemen opposite. When it was proposed to amend the rules in the British House of Commons, an Irish member maintained that it was the government members who were wasting the time of the House on account of bad leadership and that their incompetence was the cause of their having continually to make fresh claims upon the patience of the House. I do not desire to be personal or to make reflections upon any hon. member; but it might be well for hon. members sitting behind the Government benches to take to heart the sentiment uttered by the Irish member and to consider well whether the crisis, if we have a crisis, is brought about by bad leadership on the other side of the House, or by obstruction my members of the Opposition? Minorities have rights and always must have rights in this country. We are situated somewhat peculiarly in this country. We have diversions of race and of religion? We have a diversity of interests scattered all over this great Dominion. From time to time questions may arise in which some sections of the people, who do not constitute a majority in the House of Commons, may be affected. If this closure, as proposed by the right hon. the Prime Minister goes through, who knows what interest, what race, what section of our population will be the first to feel the injustice of it. There are hon. gentlemen sitting behind the Government benches, who are probably giving an enthusiastic support to the proposal to amend the rules; but I would ask them to consider what position they might find themselves in if a question arose as between their rights and the rights of the majority, and if the rights of the majority were enforced by reason of the closure. No person knows to what extent this closure may be applied against any interest in the Dominion of Canada.

I regret to say that I am not carried away by the assurance given by the right hon. the Prime Minister yesterday afternoon, when he asserted that while he was leader of the Government the rules would be enforced fairly and that no hon. member sitting in opposition would have his rights as a member of the Opposition taken away from him. We have no assurance that the right hon. the Prime Minister will be in a position for any length of time to carry out that fair promise, should he be disposed so to do. In view of the incident which took place almost immediately after he uttered that fair sentiment yesterday afternoon, I think I will be pardoned if I refuse to accept his assurance. I believe that a minority will never have any more rights in this House than what it can wrest from a majority under the disadvantage of this closure. A number of hon. members were elected upon the distinct pledge that they would oppose the particular legislation in support of which this closure is being put through. That is well known. That statement has been made time and again in this House, and there is no necessity for me to quote proof or authority for it. If the hon. gentlemen, who were elected under a pledge to oppose the Navy Bill, had taken their proper places in the division on the second reading of this Bill, the Government that claims a majority would not have a majority either in this House or in the country. Therefore, inasmuch as closure is directed for the purpose of supporting the passage of the Naval Bill through Parliament, that closure is supported by a minority of this House and not by a majority. The extraordinary condition of affairs exists here that a minority proposes by closure and guillotine to destroy the rights of the majority.

What is this closure for? For the purpose of enforcing the passage of a Bill to give $35,000,000 as a free and loyal gift to Great Britain. The British people are not unaware of the situation that exists in Canada at the present moment. Yesterday, the London Times, that great organ of public opinion in Great Britain, asserted that the Canadian Naval Bill was in jeopardy. It is stated in the papers this morning that dreadnoughts are to be given to Great Britain by virtue of a closure. Assuming that the right hon. the Prime Minister succeeds in getting this Bill through Parliament, and that he takes his $35,000,000 over to England, to present it to the Mother Country; he will say:

'This is a gift from Canada to you for the purpose of assisting you in carrying on the naval defence of the Empire.'

Great Britain will reply to him:

'That is extremely interesting; tell me the circumstances under which you procured that gift.'

'The Prime Minister will answer: 'We gagged and bound Canada, the fairest of your daughter dominions; we hit her with a club, and while she lay insensible we rifled her pockets and found $35,000,000. This I present to you as her free and loyal gift.'

Do hon. gentlemen opposite realize the condition of affairs? Do they realize the position in which they are? It is contrary to the Criminal Code to be found with stolen goods in one's pocket; and goods extracted by robbery are stolen goods. So, when the right hon. gentleman goes across to the Mother Country with his thirty-five millions, he will be politely told: You had better take back that money and bring us nothing but what you have obtained by the free consent of the people; and unless you can get the money by the consent of the people of Canada, we prefer to receive no such contribution.

It is a matter of some regret to me as a Nova Scotian that the first attempt made in this Parliament to deprive the minority of their rights, to gag free speech, has been made by a Nova Scotian. The great question of free speech is not a new one in the province of Nova Scotia. The rights of the minority were fought for and secured to the people of that province by that great champion of free speech and of free parliaments, Hon. Joseph Howe, whom the right hon. Prime Minister, during the first years of his mature life, was proud and pleased to follow. There was a time in the life of the right hon. Prime Minister when he would have disavowed any attempt to impose upon Parliament the gag or any other agency which would deprive even the smallest minority of the right of free speech. But a change came over the right hon. gentleman when he entered into association with Toryism; and twenty years of that association has at last deprived him of every instinct of fair play. He has turned his back upon the ideals of his younger days, and now is as far removed from the ideals of Joseph Howe, that great Nova Scotian whose name is revered throughout the British Empire as the poles are asunder.

Mr J. A. M. AIKINS (Brandon): Mr. Speaker, during the last few days, and even now, hon. gentlemen opposite appear to be possessed by delusions. The hon. member for Richmond (Mr. Kyte) seems to have the idea that the floor of this House is a boxing ring, and that the members who come here are sluggers. In the speech he has just delivered he has shown that delusion and acted that part fairly well. Another delusion is that in the earlier months of the year 1911 obstruction was adopted by the then Opposition, and that under that delusion it is their duty to most sedulously practise perverse obstructive tactics. This they have been doing for the past few months. They have also the delusion that by virtue of that obstruction they will compel tre governmental party to go to the country and thus oblige us to leave unfulfilled the duties which we came here to perform, of looking after the business of the constituencies, the business of the Dominion, and also the business of the Empire. Let me assure hon. gentlemen opposite that every man belonging to the governmental party in this House has made up his mind to pass all necessary legislation, perform these duties faithfully and to continue to do so until dissolution happens in the regular way, notwithstanding the obstruction and the resistance of hon. gentlemen opposite. These hon. gentlemen also appear to be affected by the delusion that they can persuade the people of Canada that the reason they went to the country in 1911 was because of the obstruction which they allege had been adopted by the then Opposition, notwithstanding that they stated on public platforms, and in this House, that the reason was that they believed they had an attractive policy, a reciprocity agreement which would sweep the country. They had the delusion that they had got the better of the United States and had induced the United States to make a compact to the detriment of that country. The people of the United States have recently shown them that their idea that they got the better of the bargain was a mistake; and the people of Canada have shown them that the policy of reciprocity which they attempted to persuade the people of Canada to adopt was a hallucination. Consequently they are relegated to the Opposition side of this House. They have also this further idea—I do not think a delusion—that the longer this Government is in power the less chance the members of the Opposition will have of returning to the treasury benches. For these hon. gentlemen know that every day the business of the country is properly performed by the present Administration, and the policy that was announced by the supporters of that Administration on the platforms in the last election is carried out, as it will be, the less opportunity they will have of ever getting back to power.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Is the hon. gentleman trying to obstruct this measure? This is no reciprocity debate.

Mr. AIKINS: I have mentioned the fact that the reason why hon. gentlemen opposite went to the country was not that which they now declare, viz., obstruction, and that they would rather go to the country than introduce such resolutions as have been introduced to limit debate; but they went to the country for distinctly other reasons. For the grounds stated I am not at all surprised at the hostility which hon. gentlemen opposite have exhibited to this resolution; because, although it is comparatively mild in form, it will do away with the perverse obstruction, the improper blockade that these hon. gentlemen have introduced, in order if possible to send the Government to the country. Obstruction is the straw at which they have been clutching like drowning men ever since they were thrown into the dead sea of opposition by the electorate at the last election. Obstruction is the last ray of hope by whose feeble light they are attempting to grope their way out of the gloom and darkness back to the treasury benches. It is quite evident that, having tasted the sweets of office, the lust of office is still upon them, and as they wander in the wilderness they hunger for the fleshpots of Egypt. They intended, as was quite apparent from the statements read by the right hon. leader of the Government yesterday to introduce, if they were returned successfully, such restrictions in debate as have been introduced by the present Government, and the statements of the Hon. Sydney Fisher, Sir Allen Aylesworth, Hon. Mr. Paterson, editor of the Toronto Globe, and others, go to show that such a course was proposed. Consequently, as obstruction is their only hope, is it any wonder that they hug it closely, and that they hate the resolution now before the House which will destroy it? If they have, as they declare, a faith that their policy is the correct one, and are confident that it would be adopted by the people of Canada, they would be willing patiently to wait until the next election in order that, if returned to power, they would have and enjoy the benefit of the provisions which are now proposed to be adopted, and in the future, be enabled to prevent any obstruction. But, because they have not that faith, because they know that their chances are disappearing every day, they are opposed to this resolution, which is so necessary in the public interest and for the transaction of the business of Parliament in a proper and efficient manner.

The recent obstruction which has taken place in this House has been the occasion of the introduction of this resolution, but not its sole cause, as I will mention later. In order to show that the tactics pursued by the hon. gentlemen opposite have been those of obstruction, I would refer to the speech of the hon. member for Welland (Mr. German) as reported in 'Hansard' of March, 1913, column 5746, during the course of which he declared:

> If to do our duty is to be obstructionists, then we are willing to be classed among the obstructionists.

The hon. member for Bonaventure (Mr. Marcil), speaking on March 10, as reported in column 5510 of 'Hansard,' said:

> If we, on this side, are compelled—

Mr. SPEAKER: I think it is not permissible to refer to 'Hansard' of the present session except in connection with the question immediately before the House.

Mr. AIKINS: I am referring to these statements solely in connection with the matter before the House, to show that the reason for the introduction of these resolutions was admitted obstruction.

Mr. CARVELL: We will give you unanimous consent.

Mr. AIKINS: I shall not read them; they are numerous and may be found in 'Hansard'—statements proving that hon. gentlemen opposite were designedly pursuing a policy of obstruction. I have taken considerable trouble to obtain a statement of the time occupied by hon. gentlemen in their recent obstruction tactics in connection with the debate which has taken place on the naval policy. The right hon. leader of the Opposition, speaking on the resolution, occupied twenty-two columns of 'Hansard'; on the second reading, twenty columns; and in Committee of the Whole, twenty-three, making a total of sixty-five columns. The hon. member for the city of St. John (Mr. Pugsley) occupied twenty-five columns on the resolution and eighty-three in Committee of the Whole, a total of one hundred and eight columns. But the record is held by the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Clark). On the resolution he occupied twenty-six columns, on the second reading twenty-six, and in Committee of the Whole ninety-eight, a total of one hundered and fifty columns. The hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald), speaking on the resolution occupied fifty columns, and in committee, eighty-one, making a total of one hundred and thirty-one columns. The hon. member for Carleton, N.B. (Mr. Carvell), did not uphold his reputation, for on the second reading he occupied forty-eight columns, and in committee, ninety. The hon. member for Westmorland (Mr. Emmerson), on the second reading and in committee occupied eighty columns; the hon. member for Russell (Mr. Murphy), seventy-three; the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux), seventy-five; the hon. member for Bonaventure (Mr. Marcil), sixty-four; the hon. member for Montcalm (Mr. Lafortune), forty-three. Hon. gentlemen opposite should not be disappointed with their record in that regard, because it is well known that a full report in 'Hansard' was not made of all the speeches made in Committee of the Whole on that Bill. A summary of these facts shows that, on the resolution, hon. gentlemen speaking from the Government side occupied four hundred and two columns of 'Hansard,' and the Opposition, six hundred and ten. In committee members on this side of the House occupied ninety-four columns and the Opposition 1,743, and in that debate on resolution and Bill the speeches of hon. members of the Opposition have taken up 2,791 columns of 'Hansard.'

Mr. CARVELL: How many columns are credited to the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Aikins)?

Mr. AIKINS: If the hon. member will look at 'Hansard' he will find out. The record which I have just shown makes manifest the fact that there was deliberate obstruction to the business of Parliament and of the country by hon. gentlemen opposite. Such obstructive conduct was the occasion of the introduction of this resolution. Mr. Walpole, in his House of Commons procedure, on page 43, says:

When the minority has carried the protection afforded it by the rules beyond all legitimate use to an attempt to thwart the legislation of a responsible majority, the line is reached and crossed which separates legitimate opposition from obstruction.

The line which separated legitimate opposition from obstruction was long ago crossed by hon. gentlemen opposite in the recent debate. Mr. Gladstone, in introducing his procedure resolutions in 1881, said:

It is not a very easy matter to define obstruction; and I will not attempt to define it for anyone but myself. I will only give my description of it. To me it appears to be the disposition either of the minority of the House or of individuals, to resist the prevailing will of the House otherwise than by argument.

Again, he said:

Generally then I think obstruction, as it has been spoken so much of in late years, may be considered the disposition of the minority or of individuals to resist the will of the House otherwise than by argument.

Certainly the description of obstruction here given clearly applies to hon. gentlemen opposite. They attempted to resist the will of the majority, not by argument but by the length of their speeches. That they did not attempt to do it by argument is clearly shown in this that when the resolution on the naval question was introduced it had attached to it the very Bill which was submitted to the House and that resolution was passed by the House. These principles were then decided upon and therefore it did not require any further discussion or debate. Again the second reading of the Bill was passed and thereby the House reaffirmed the principle of the Bill, and again the debate was entirely unnecessary on the principle. But for several weeks the hon. gentlemen opposite kept this House engaged day and night while they were unnecessarily discussing the principle of the Bill. For what? In order to convince the hon. gentlemen of this House by argument? Certainly not. The principle had been decided. It was simply to take up and waste the time of the House, which they succeeded in doing. Then what, under the circumstances, is the only course that is to be adopted? The Hon. Mr. Gladstone in introducing his closure resolution in 1882, as will be seen in the Parliamentary debates, volume 264, page 1144, speaking of lengthy sittings, said:

They are not merely most powerful means of obstruction; they are not merely most powerful means of inflicting suffering on the members of the House. They are totally incompatible with the dignity and credit of this House. Grievous as they are they are almost as ludicrous in the eyes of the community as they are grievous. The whole idea of the conversion of might into day, the description of the common order—already hard pressed by our ordinary proceedings—in which time and business are distributed, and the exhibition of a great and powerful assembly in such an attitude before the community, almost amounts to a degradation and depth of insult offered to the House such as I may say, we ought to endeavour to wipe out.

The very same statement might be applied to what has occurred in this House, and it might be said that this House has been reduced to a depth of degradation and insult such as we ought to endeavour to wipe out. A little further on Mr. Gladstone says, at page 1150:

My life is in the past, and not in the future; but I should be sorry if at its close, at a moment when we see the House of Commons in great part paralyzed in the discharge of its noble duties, and almost in the condition of some noble animal upon whom artificial restraints are imposed, so that it is unable freely to move its limbs, I did not do my best to restore it to its free power of action.

He also said in the same debate:

But although on that account I do not grudge the enormous patience which the House has exhibited, the enormous suffering which it has been content to undergo may—the disparagement of its usefulness which it has witnesses without an effort to apply an effective remedy. Yet I feel on the other hand, that there is a point beyond which you cannot allow things to go, and I wish to urge upon the House that that limit has been reached.

He further says on the same subject:

However wise that patience may be, I hope it will not carry that tolerance to such a point that it shall of itself become the grossest of all the vices of a legislative body, and that it shall reach a point where it will inflict upon the House of Commons an incapacity for the discharge of its duties.

As I have said, the recent debate and the recent obstruction was the occasion for the introducing of this resolution. Perhaps the real cause of it is the need of such a limitation in modern deliberative bodies. Democratic assemblies or congregations or conventions have become so numerous that it is absolutely necessary in their procedure to have some rule limiting the length of debate and of speeches. This is believed to be the proper course to pursue in almost all countries which have deliberative assemblies and Parliaments. We have only to turn to the regulations of other countries to ascertain what they have done to prevent such a situation as we have had in this House. I shall quote to the House the provisions made in a number of European parliaments, as set forth in Dickinson's 'Summary of the Rules and Procedure of Foreign Parliaments.' They are as follows:

Austria-Hungary, page 404: Motions for the closing of the debate are to be at once put to the vote by the President without any question. If the majority decides for the closing of the debate, the members whose names are put down to speak for or against the motion may choose from amongst them one speaker on each side, and only the speaker so chosen, the reporter and (if there was no preliminary discussion) the mover will be allowed to speak.

Austria, page 409: A motion to close the debate may be put to the vote at any time in both Houses, and a simple majority suffices to carry it. This must be done, however, without interruption to any speech in actual course of delivery. When a vote to close the debate is passed, each party, for and against the proposition under discussion, chooses one member to make a final speech upon it.

Belgium, page 420: In the lower House the close of the debate is demanded in the following manner: when it is evident that the debate has been sufficiently protracted, and that the majority are getting tired, or that the minority are merely obstructing the course of business, the Prime Minister and the President of the Chamber are consulted by the whip of the majority as to the advisability of demanding the 'clôture.' If they are both of opinion that the proper moment has arrived for exercising this right, a hint is given to some of the members near to raise the cry of 'La clôture' after a member of the Opposition has concluded his speech. These first cries are merely intended as a warning that the clôture will be demanded immediately. When two more speeches have been delivered, one on each side, and a member of the Opposition always speaking last, it is by custom, not by written rule, that a member of the Opposition always has the last word. In no case does a member of the Government speak last. The President, on the cry of 'La clôture' being energetically renewed, inquires if the motion is supported by ten members, and on these rising in their places, puts the question to the vote, which is taken by rising and sitting.

Denmark, page 422: If the President considers that a debate is improperly prolonged, he can propose the clôture, which is decided by the Chamber without debate. In the same way, any fifteen (in the Landsthing twelve) members whose names must be read out, may demand that the clôture be put to the vote.

Germany, page 440: A motion, in writing, for an adjournment or close of the debate, may be handed in at any time during the debate, but requires the support of thirty members. The President then puts the question 'that the debate be closed,' and the House, without requiring the mover to defend his motion by argument, and without further discussion, proceeds to vote by show of hands.

Italy, page 451: On the close of the debate being demanded, if ten deputies support the motion, the President puts it to the vote; should there be any opposition, one member on each side is allowed to speak. In the Senate the clôture must be supported by eight senators.

The Netherlands, Second Chamber, page 461: Every motion of order for the closing of the debate must, before the President can put it to the vote, be supported by at least five members. The motion for the clôture must not be accompanied by reasons. In this and all other cases, the members show their support by standing up, and the names of those members are called over by the President. No debate can take place on the motion for the clôture, but the President asks, before putting it to the vote, whether the ministers or commissaries of the King, or the proposers, desire to speak further on the question under discussion.

Switzerland, page 484: The clôture of the debate can be decided upon if two-thirds of the members present demand it; but it cannot be pronounced so long as a member who has not yet spoken desires to make a motion and to explain it. When no other person demands permission to speak, the President declares the debate closed, and after its close no one has any right to request leave to address the Chair. Although no mention is made of the existence of the clôture in the Conseil des Etats, in point of fact it does exist there and on the same conditions as in the Conseil National.

In France the following is the way in which the clôture is moved in the Chamber of Deputies:

When the House is becoming tired of the debate, or it is desired to interrupt the member who is speaking, one or more members cry out 'la clôture!' la clôture!' The President immediately puts the question, and if a member of the minority wishes to speak, he is allowed to assign his reasons against the close of the debate; but no one can speak in support of the motion, and only one member against it. The question is then put by the President: 'Shall the debate be closed?' and if it is resolved in the affirmative, the debate is closed and the main question put to the vote.

There are similar provisions in Australia:

In speaking to a motion for the adjournmen of the House for the purpose of discussing a definite matter of urgent public importance, the mover shall not exceed thirty minutes, and any other member shall not exceed fifteen minutes, and at the expiry of two hours from the meeting of the House, the debate shall, if it has not previously ended, be closed and the next business proceeded with, unless the House shall then, on motion duly moved and seconded, without debate allow some specified further time before it be closed.

After any question has been proposed, either in the House or in any Committee of the Whole, a motion may be made by any member rising in his place, and without notice, and whether any other member is addressing the Chair or not, 'that the question be now put,' and the motion shall be put forthwith and decided without amendment or debate.

In New Zealand there is a provision that:

No member shall speak for more than half an hour at a time in any debate in the House, except in the debate on the address in reply, or on the financial statement, or in debate on a motion of 'no confidence,' or in moving the second reading of a Bill, or on the debate on the Appropriation Bill, when a member shall be at liberty to speak for one hour.

The United States Senate and the Canadian Parliament are the only two legislative bodies where there is no restriction on debate:

In the House of Representatives speeches are restricted in length and debates are severely closured. In the Senate there are practically no such rules. The rules formed for a body of twenty-six senators continue to govern the deliberations of eighty-eight, and contain no method of limiting debate. They are based on courtesy, and by courtesy of the Senate any senator can speak at any length and at any time.

Therefore, they are governed by a courtesy in the United States Senate that does not apply in this House. The only deliberative assembly in the world that I know of where there is no such restriction on debate or on the length of speeches is therefore the Parliament of Canada. There is a closure, as you are aware, Mr. Gladstone, in England, introduced in 1882 and modified in 1887. The Hon. John Bright, speaking in the British House of Commons, as reported in the British Hansard, vol. 268, page 317, said:

Hon. members opposite, when they are speaking to their constituents, taunt the Liberal Government with having done nothing, and the Liberal Government, when it is not a government, but is the party in Opposition, taunt the right hon. gentleman opposite and his friends with having done nothing. I do not say that either party does its duty as well as it might do it; but we are all conscious that no ministry in this House, with our present rules, with our present habits, and under recent circumstances with which we are all familiar, can do what the constituencies expect from the Administration which it has placed in office. The main question before us, therefore, is whether what has been proposed is likely to be effectual or not in relieving us from our difficulties—I refer to the resolution which has been brought before us by the First Minister with regard to what is called the clôture, and which in fact, proposes that we shall adopt something like it. For my own part, if I were not on this bench, I should say openly what I now say privately—that I think that the measure so proposed, if it has any failing at all, falls short in this, that it is not sufficiently comprehensive and sufficiently stringent. I think that I shall be able to convince some hon. members of the truth of what I say before I have done.

That great Liberal, the Right Hon. John Bright, than whom there has been no greater Liberal, not even excepting Mr. Gladstone, has declared that the rules which were introduced in the English House of Commons were not drastic enough for the purpose; and yet, if you compare them with the resolution now proposed in this House, it will be seen that the latter are very much more lenient, very much milder, than the closure adopted by the Imperial House. Yet hon. gentlemen opposite, when they were given their choice between the resolutions now introduced by my right hon. friend the leader of the Government and the resolutions as adopted by the English House of Commons, preferred to express no opinion concerning them. They wish neither.

Mr. DEVLIN: I would like to ask the hon. gentlemen if, when Mr. Gladstone introduced the new rules into the British House of Commons, he allowed any amendment to his motion.

Mr. AIKINS: I have not studied the whole question; but the right hon. leader of the Opposition stated that the way in which those resolutions should be dealt with, was by introducing them and submitting them to a special or general committee, that the committee should report, and that the House should then consider its report. But these resolutions were introduced into the English House of Commons by the very same method as that by which they are being introduced now by the Government.

Mr. DEVLIN: Is it not a fact that Mr. Gladstone, in 1882, adjourned the English House of Commons from March until the autumn in order to study the amended rules before proposing them?

Mr. AIKINS: The hon. gentleman does me too much credit, because he thinks that I am an encyclopedia of information. I cannot satisfy him, I am sorry to say, on that question. The right hon. leader of the Opposition has stated that:

The introduction of this measure means the first introduction in Canada of machine politics.

I wonder what the right hon. gentleman thinks of the resolution as it was adopted in the Imperial House of Commons. Does the right hon. gentleman mean to say that, because all these other nations that I have spoken of, have introduced similar resolutions, therefore, they are governed by machine politics? Does the right hon. gentleman mean to say that, because they have such a closure in England, Great Britain has machine politics? Practically that is his statement. I have never had any great confidence in the statements made by the leader of the Opposition, with respect to his real regard for British institutions or for the Imperial Government, and I assume that recent events and utterances have reduced still further that regard. It has always seemed to me that the right hon. gentleman worships British institutions and connection with his lips while his heart is far from them. Is it not a reflection on the Imperial House of Commons that the right hon. gentleman should declare that the introduction of the present resolution into this House is the introduction of machine politics into Canada, for there has been a still stronger form of closure in force for years in the British House of Commons.

Hon. gentlemen opposite think that the people should view with alarm the mischief that would be done by the regulation of debates in this House; but they did not appear to have such alarm when they were in power, for they proposed to introduce closure themselves, judging by the statements made by Sir Allen Aylesworth, Mr. Paterson, Mr. Fisher, and the editorials in some of the leading Liberal papers. Their effort now is to try and make the people believe that one result of this resolution would be to prevent freedom of speech. I would like to know what idea hon. gentlemen opposite have of the phrase 'freedom of speech.' I can understand that in the time of the Stuarts and the Tudors, members of the Imperial House of Commons did not have freedom of speech; if they spoke their minds they were in danger of trouble with the Crown, or of being indicted for libel or civilly sued for damages. The members of the British House of Commons in the course of time asserted their rights and obtained freedom from such consequences.

But the rules of the Imperial House of Commons and of this House all put limitations of some kind on debate. Freedom of speech does not consist of quantity of talking or of undue verbosity and loquacity. The proposal made in this House in no way interferes with freedom of speech, or opportunity of speaking; but it will prevent vain repetitions and unreasonable length of debate and will enable the business of the country to be transacted and work to be accomplished.

The right hon. the leader of the Opposition told us that he was a Liberal of the old school and had been brought up in the school of Fox; a statement which some of us would be prepared to accept; and the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley) told us that in changing the rules of the House it was easy to destroy but difficult to construct, and therefore he did not desire change. It is therefore apparent that one ground upon which hon. gentlemen opposite base their antagonism to this new proposal is reverence for the antiquity of the present rules without the limitation. I might remind hon. gentlemen that everything but truth is changing from day to day—that the old order is constantly changing, giving place to the new; that the procedure must change as progress is made. Bones and ashes feed the growing plants and grains, and, the dead past should bury is dead. That which is profitable will survive. The progress of modern ideas demands modern procedure. That we should have in this House. I can understand the leader of the Opposition standing in his place and saying mournfully: 'These rules are to be swept away; they are to be ridden over roughshod; they are to be put aside. He has veneration for antiquity. Other hon. gentlemen opposite do not wish anything of the new order of things they think it would not suit their purpose. The party opposite is like grey-bearded use leaning on his staff and wondering where all this is going to end. I believe, Sir, the people of Canada will yet realize that out of the difficulty, out of the turmoil, the obstruction, that has occurred in this House, benefits will arise to the country and compensating advantages. This obstruction will be forgotten with all its unpleasant tumult and disorder, and in its place will come efficient procedure owing to the proposed resolution.

> We look: aside the mist has rolled,
> The waster was the builder too.
> Upspringing from the ruined old
> Is but the new.
> 'Twas but the wasting of the bad,
> The ruin of the wrong and ill;
> Whate'er of good the old time had
> Is living still.

Let me conclude as the Right Hon. John Bright did when speaking on the English closure:

> For the high and noble purpose of legislating for a great and powerful country, I ask you whether you are not ready now to assist His Majesty's Government in altering to some small extent the rules and practice of this House, in order that the House of Commons, in spite of the mischief of a few, may find itself hereafter able to fulfill the great duties which the people of this great nation have committed to its charge.

Mr. F. B. CARVELL (Carleton, N.B.): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend from Brandon (Mr. Aikins) will allow me to congratulate him on the extremely moderate tone of the speech which he has delivered to the House during the last three-quarters of an hour, and, on the small amount of poetry he has inflicted on us. My regret is that as the hon. member from Laval (Mr. Wilson) remarked, the hon. gentleman has not given us the music to go with that one piece of poetry he quoted, because, had he done so, it would no doubt be a great acquisition to the members of this House. The pith of the hon. member's argument seems to be that Canada has lagged behind every other nation of the world in the management of its parliamentary business, and that the time has come when Canada must rehabilitate herself in the eyes of the world. I want to be perfectly fair with the hon. member, and if I am misrepresenting the general tone of his speech I would be glad if he would set me right. He has worked out our present condition by what might be called a process of elimination. He has come to the conclusion that next to the United States Senate we are the most obsolete and out of date country in the world in so far as the management of public affairs is concerned. He has given us a long description of what they do in Australia, in Germany, in Denmark and in the Netherlands. He has shown us how they go about to shut off free speech in those countries. He has shown us how the rights of the subjects there are curtailed. With the exception of France, I do not think it is very much of a compliment to the people of Canada to have their right of free speech and their conduct of business compared with what goes on in continental Europe. Nobody pretends to be a free man in continental Europe, with the exception of France, as we do in Canada. My hon. friend forgets that the doctrine of lèse majesté can be applied to people in pretty nearly every country in continental Europe. A man is not entitled to say what he thinks about the government of the day. If he does, he may be haled any day before the courts. My hon. friend ought to give us a comparison of our present system with that of the English Parliament. The only comparison which he gave was the bald statement that the restriction was introduced in the Imperial Parliament in 1882, modified in 1887, and that our proposed rules are much more limited in their scope than the English rules. I wish to discuss that branch of the case briefly to see whether my friend is justified or not in making such a bald statement. Before that can be discussed intelligently, it will be necessary for me to go back to the historical source of the different rules. For the sake of lucidity. I wish to discuss them from three different standpoints.

Section 2 of this proposed resolution is intended to restrict debate. I use that word advisedly. It is intended to take away from the present Parliament certain rights of debate which it now possesses. It is true my right hon. friend attempted yesterday to argue the other way and to show that practically everything which could be discussed at the present time could be discussed under the proposed rules. My friend is in error in that, very much in error indeed. We are being deprived of what is perhaps the most prized privilege of liberty of debate in the Canadian House of Commons. Under section 2, they are taking away the right to move the adjournment of the House, except under that rule of our Parliament which provides that we may move the adjournment of the House to discuss a matter of public business. The right to adjourn the House and the right to adjourn the debate are both practically taken away from us under the proposed rule.

I submit that the right to rise to a question of privilege is also taken away from us under the proposed rules. It is true my right hon. friend denies that and says that, as he understands it, you can rise to a question of privilege and you can move that the conduct of a member be referred to a special committee, as was done by the member for St. Hyacinthe (Mr. Gauthier) a few weeks ago. That may be a debatable point. When my hon. friend tells me that we have greater liberty under this than under the British system, I wish to call his attention for a few moments to some of the rules of the British Parliament. Standing Order No. 22 reads as follows:

> When a motion is made for the adjournment of a debate, or of the House during any debate, or that the chairman of a committee do report progress, or do leave the Chair, the debate thereupon shall be confined to the matter of such motion; and no member, having moved or seconded any such motion, shall be entitled to move or second any similar motion during the same debate.

Then follows standing order 23, which is practically the same as rule 158:

> If Mr. Speaker, or the Chairman of a Committee of the Whole House, shall be of opinion that a motion for the adjournment of a debate, or of the House, during any debate, or that the Chairman do report progress or do leave the Chair, is an abuse of the rules of the House, he may forthwith put the question thereupon from the Chair, or he may decline to propose the question thereupon to the House.

My friend will see that under the English rules, you always have the right to move the adjournment of the House or the adjournment of the debate. Of course it is left in the discretion of the Speaker. I shall perhaps have occasion to refer to the Speaker at a later portion of my short address. It is well recognized that the Speaker in the British House of Commons occupies a very different position from that which he occupies in the Canadian House of Commons. I am not speaking about the present Mr. Speaker or any other; I am speaking about the office of the Speaker. When a member wishes to move the adjournment of the House or the adjournment of the debate, it is in the discretion of the Speaker as to whether he will have the right to move it. Once he has the consent of the Speaker, who acts almost in a judicial capacity, he has the right to move it. That, however, is absolutely taken away from us under the present rules. One of the dearest liberties of the minority in the House of Commons is taken away from us at one fell swoop. Yet my hon. friend tells me that we have greater liberty under these rules than under the British rules. The great difference between the underlying principle of the proposed clause 2 and the underlying principle of the rule in the British Parliament is that in the British Parliament certain things are taken away from members, whereas in the Canadian Parliament certain things are given to members and all other things taken away from them.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Does the hon. gentleman argue that motions to adjourn the House or the debate cannot be made under the proposed rule?

Mr. CARVELL: I certainly do—cannot be made?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes.

Mr. CARVELL. Cannot be debated. What is the use of making them if they cannot be debated?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I understand they can be made in the British House of Commons as they have been heretofore, for the purpose of discussing certain matters.

Mr. CARVELL: In the British House of Commons a motion can be made to adjourn the House or the debate, exactly as in this House, except that the Speaker has the right to say whether the member shall have the right to do it or not. That is the point that I am making. It is quite different from the rule proposed by my right hon. friend. That is only a sample of the way our liberties are being abridged. As I was saying when I was interrupted, the underlying principle in the proposed Canadian legislation is that we are given the right to discuss a few matters while all others are absolutely taken away from us, whereas in the British House, a few things are taken away and all others left open for discussion subject to the discretion of the Speaker. And one has only to consider for a few minutes what I have pointed out to realize what cardinal right is being taken away from the minority in this House. Then, the second general heading of the proposed rule is what would ordinarily be called the closure rule, and that is the branch of the case which my hon. friend discussed, referring to what was done in other parliaments. But there is as much distinction between the underlying principle of the proposed closure rule in the Canadian House and the actual closure rule of the British House as there is between the rights of disussion of which I have just spoken. Clause 3 is as follows.

And, Mr. Speaker, I want to have this put on 'Hansard' again, in order that we may, if possible, get hon. members opposite to realize some of the iniquity of the proposed rule:

(3) Immediately before the Order of the Day for resuming an adjourned debate is called, or if the House be in Committee of the Whole, or of Supply, or of Ways and Means, any minister of the Crown who, standing in his place, shall have given notice at a previous sitting of his intention so to do, may move that the debate shall not be further adjourned, or that the further consideration of any resolution or resolutions, clause or clauses, section or sections, preamble or preambles, title or titles, shall be the first business of the committee, and shall not further be postponed.

Mr. EMMERSON: He can interrupt the proceedings of one matter to give notice with regard to another?

Mr. CARVELL: At any time, as I understand it, he can interrupt the proceedings to say that he proposes the next time the matter comes up that there shall be no adjournment. (Reading):

—and in either case such question shall be decided without debate or amendment; and if the same shall be resolved in the affirmative, no member shall thereafter speak more than once, or longer than twenty minutes in any adjourned debate; or, if in committee, on any such resolution, clause, section, preamble or title; and if such adjourned debate or postponed consideration shall not have been resumed or concluded before two of the clock in the morning, no member shall rise to speak after that hour, but all such questions as must be decided in order to conclude such adjourned debate or postponed consideration, shall be decided forthwith.

Now, Perhaps it might be well to give the House something of the history of Parliament to show what has led up to this proposed rule. Hon. gentlemen opposite, in trying to find out how they could best throttle the Opposition—and I use that word advisedly—how they could best succeed in absolutely shutting off debate when they wanted to, did not take the English rule, which it seems to me, should be severe enough to satisfy anybody, but went back fifty or sixty years to find something which would be more drastic and would serve their purpose better. They brought forth clause 3 as the result of their labours. The first time you find this mentioned was in 1848. I am referring now to Redlich's proceedings of the House of Commons, vol. 1, page 86-87. A committee had been appointed by the House of Commons to consult with the Speaker and see if they could do something towards reforming the rules of the House. This committee had made a report and certain unimportant matters which were recommended had been adopted. The committee also made a proposition to the House which was not adopted, and that proposition was as follows:

A final suggestion as to adjournment was that before resuming an adjourned debate on any subject, a motion might be made 'that this debate shall not be further adjourned,' and that if this were carried, the debate should not be prolonged beyond 2 a.m., when the Speaker should put the question.

Sir, that is the first record I can find of any person proposing closure in the British House of Commons. It was proposed, as I said, by a committee, but was not adopted by the House of Commons. It might be worth while to state here that, so far as we can find, down to the time when it was decided that closure was necessary by reason of the obstruction of the Irish members in the late seventies and early eighties, all these proposed amendments were made by committees that were guided very largely by the Speaker and the Clerk, and the clerk in this case, as is well known, was Sir Erskine May whose idea seemed to be to devise rules not for the benefit of the members, not for the benefit of the country, not for the benefit of the voters who elected the members, but with a view to getting rid of debate and make the procedure of the House of Commons as much like a machine as possible. If you will read the reports of these committees down to the time when closure was adopted, you will find these proposals were made by the Speakers and clerks almost constantly. But fortunately the British House of Commons was not guided in those days to any great extent by the views of these gentlemen, and so this proposal was not adopted. Another committee was appointed, I think in 1853, to consider the rules of the House; and this committee reported in 1854. It made the suggestion that what was called the 'progress rule' should be applied to debate on going into Supply. This is the first time, so far as I can find, when the proposal was made to restrict the rights of a member to discuss grievances on going into Supply. I need not state that this is one of the most ancient privileges of the subject—that of stating and demanding redress before Supply is granted. Before 1853, and since, many members have taken advantage of that rule in Britain, as we have taken advantage of it here ever since this House came into existence, and, I hope, shall continue to do so for all time. No man can tell me that it is necessary to restrict the right of a member to bring up the grievances of his constituents in order to have the best form of parliamentary government in this or any other country. But, as I have said, this proposal was made not by any member of the House of Commons, not by any responsible party, but by the Clerk of the House, Sir Erskine May, who has been praised here as the greatest authority on parliamentary law. No doubt he is an authority; but I cannot help saying, that, as I read the history of the development of this matter from 1848 down to 1890, it seems to me that the most pronounced reactionary of the British Parliament was Sir Erskine May. If hon. gentlemen will refer to Redlich, at page 92, they will find some of the suggestions made by this gentleman with a view to restricting debate. This authority says:

With reference to the daily course of business, the resourceful Clerk of the House suggested the dispensing with all formal and in his judgment, superfluous questions and divisions upon the formation and conclusion of a Committee of the Whole House: such questions only served to delay business and to give opportunities for crowding out the subjects set down, and for introducing extraneous subjects, brought forward by members for reasons of political strategy, or for the sake of material interests which they might have at heart.

This great authority on parliamentary law did not believe that a member had any rights whatever; he had no right to air any grievance of a political nature, or bring up any matter in which his constituents might be particularly interested. (Reading):

The Speaker should leave the Chair without putting any question to the House as soon as the Order of the Day for the committee was reached. Above all, he suggested an extension of the rule, adopted by the House in 1848, according to which formal amendments upon the question of taking up a particular order of the day were abolished; he proposed to apply, partially at least, to the accepted case of the Committee of Supply the same rules as were applicable to other committees of the Whole House, and to provide that when progress had been reported upon certain classes of the estimates, the Speaker should leave the Chair without question when these classes of estimates came up again.

There you have the introduction of the proposal, which is exemplified to an absurd extent in clause 3 of this resolution, that when the Order of the Day that the House do go into Committee of Supply is reached, the Speaker will leave the Chair without debate or amendment. If Sir Erskine May had had his own way, there would not have been many grievances aired in the British House of Commons during the last half century, and, if hon. gentlemen opposite have their way at the present time, there will not be very many grievances aired in the Canadian House of Commons during the next forty or fifty years, or, at least, throughout that period of time during which hon. gentlemen opposite may unfortunately remain in office. These rules, if carried into effect, will be repealed, no matter whether they become law in this present Parliament or not. A free people, animated by all those principles of liberty which they possess and enjoy, will never allow a Russian gag to disgrace the rules of Parliament or the statute-books of this country. I am aware that this matter was pressed by Sir Erskine May and by other gentlemen who had an interest in restricting the debate in the British House of Commons, and I am aware that, owing to the unfortunate circumstances which took place in connection with the Irish obstruction in later years, its advisability was to some extent considered, but, as I will try to show later, not to the extent of the resolution now under consideration. I quote from a report which appears on page 96 of this work:

With these proposals before them, the committee submitted a report far from radical in its suggested operations; while expressly acknowledging the improvement effected in 1848, they declared themselves convinced of the necessity for new regulations. Above all they referred to the practice of raising various subjects of debate before the Speaker left the Chair on the House going into Committee of Supply, and recognized the justification for the efforts made to prevent what had become an abuse of the forms of the House. But they confessed themselves unable to devise any new rule against it.

That was the decision of the committee of the British House of Commons in 1854. The matter so rested for some time, and nothing further transpired until 1861. Another committee was appointed, and this committee had before it the same stormy petrel, so far as constitutional liberty in the British House of Commons is concerned, Sir Erskine May, and, of course, other hon. gentlemen as well. Sir Erskine May again made the proposal that something should be done to prevent free speech and the discussion of grievances before the House went into Committee of Supply. A committee was appointed which, in its ability, knowledge, and real statesmanship, has never been exceeded by any committee in any British parliamentary institution, among the members of which were Lord Palmerston, Mr. Disraeli, John Bright, Lord Stanley, and Sir George Cornewall Lewis. They considered the evidence which had been adduced before them, and they discussed the matter from every possible standpoint. They finally made a report, which, to my mind is of very great importance, because we are particularly interested in the rules and regulations of the British House of Commons as they existed in 1867. This report, made in the year 1861, was the last word with reference to the rules of the House prior to Confederation, and I think we ought to give to it more than passing notice. The report says:

They have treated with respect the written and the unwritten law of parliament which for ages has secured a good system of legislation, perfect freedom of debate and a due regard for the rights of minorities. This respect for tradition and this caution in making changes have proceeded on the principle that no change is justifiable which experience has not proved to be necessary, and that the maintenance of the old rules is preferable to new but speculative amendments. . . It cannot be denied that these multiplied preliminary motions are a serious obstacle to certainty in the proceedings of the House, and are a cause of much delay. On the other hand, it must be remembered that the statement and consideration of grievances before Supply are among the most ancient and important privileges of the Commons, and this opportunity of obtaining full explanation from the ministers of the Crown is the surest and the best. Before going into a Committee of Supply the ministers have an interest both in making a House and in keeping a House. The debate proceeds with the Speaker in the Chair, with an appropriate motion under discussion, and the strictest rules of debate are necessarily observed.

It will be observed, therefore, that in 1861 the British House of Commons refused to restrict the right of the members to ask for the redress of grievances upon the motion to grant Supply to His Majesty. The conclusion of the report is perhaps its most significant part, and reads as follows:

Your committee, like preceding committees on the same subject, have passed in review many suggested alterations, but like them have come to the conclusion that the old rules and orders, when carefully considered and narrowly investigated, are found to be the safeguard of freedom of debate, and a sure defence against the oppression of overpowering majorities.

With those reports and the recommendations of the greatest parliamentary statesmen of the age fresh in the minds of every person who took part in its framing, we entered into this great Confederation; and one of the compacts, as I call it, of that Confederation was that which now forms rule 1 of the rules of the Canadian House of Commons:

In all cases not provided for hereinafter or by sessional or other orders, the rules, usages and forms of proceeding of the House of Commons of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland in force on the 1st day of July, 1867, shall be followed.

I contend that when these several provinces of the Dominion entered Confederation in 1867, almost a part of the compact was that the rules existing in England for the governing of the House of Commons should be the rules which would govern the Canadian House of Commons; and the rules which existed in 1867 and which have prevailed down to the present time have heretofore remained inviolate, with very few minor changes. The rules which we now enjoy are the rules which existed in 1861 and 1867, which the people of Canada supposed they would have the right to enjoy and under which they supposed their parliamentary institutions would be governed for all time. I go further and say that I have very grave doubt if you would ever have got some of the provinces of Canada to join the Confederation if they had had the faintest idea that the rights that came to them by these rules and this compact would be taken away from them ruthlessly by a Government in 1913 for the purpose of putting through a piece of legislation which they, in their hearts, must know is inimical to the interests of the country as a whole. Would the province of Quebec have entered into Confederation if with all the divergent sentiments in that province as compared with the rest of the provinces, they had felt that the rules under which they expected to have their parliamentary institutions carried on were to be ruthlessly swept away to-day at the instance of some gentlemen who want to get through a boodling piece of legislation or something of no good to this country. What would they have thought in Quebec if they had been told that this would happen forty years after Confederation? One of the greatest safeguards of the various provinces in entering the Dominion was formed by the rules and conditions under which Parliament was to be governed for all time to come and yet the Government sweep this away. I want to tell you, Mr. Speaker, and my friends opposite that they had better pause to consider carefully and long what the result of this legislation will be. As was said by the committee in 1861:

A day may break down the prescription of centuries. It is easy to destroy, it is difficult to reconstruct.

I can only say again that the Government ought to hesitate and consider very carefully before proceeding further in this direction.

On motion of Mr. Rogers, the debate was adjourned, to be resumed this day.

THE ROYAL ASSENT.

A message was delivered by Captain Ernest J. Chambers, Esquire, Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, as follows:

Mr. Speaker, His Excellency the Administrator, desires the immediate attendance of this honourable House in the Chamber of the honourable the Senate.

Accordingly the House went up to the Senate Chamber.

And the House being returned:

Mr. SPEAKER informed the House that His Excellency, the Administrator, had been pleased to give, in His Majesty's name, the Royal Assent to the following Bills:

An Act to incorporate the Canada Preferred Insurance Company.

An Act to incorporate the Manitoba-Ontario Railway Company.

An Act respecting the Canadian Northern Railway Company.

An Act respecting the Canadian Western Railway Company.

An Act respecting the Bank of Saskatchewan.

An Act to incorporate the Western Canada Mortgage Corporation.

An Act respecting a certain Treaty of Commerce and Navigation between His Majesty the King and His Majesty the Emperor of Japan.

An Act respecting the Superior Courts of the Province of Ontario.

An Act to incorporate Canada Northwest Loan and Mortgage Company.

An Act to incorporate the Intercolonial Trust Company.

An Act to incorporate the British North-Western Mortgage Company.

It being six o'clock, the House took recess.

After Recess.

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. CARVELL: When the House rose at six o'clock I was discussing what was my understanding of clause 3 of the proposed resolution and also the history of the subject matter of that clause; and I was about to deal with clause 4. Clause 4 is that proposal of the resolution by which the Government would be able to practically put through all the Supply of the session in a very few days, without any opportunity whatever for the discussion of grievances which the people of the country may have. Clause 4 reads:

(4) On Thursday and Friday when the Order of the Day is called for the House to go into Committee of Supply, or of Ways and Means, Mr. Speaker shall leave the Chair without putting any question, provided that, except by the consent of the House, the estimates of each department shall be first taken up on a day other than Thursday or Friday.

In this, there is a very great divergence from the English practice, as may be observed by an examination of the English rule. The effect of the proposed rule in the Canadian House of Commons will be that all the Government have to do is to obtain the consent of the House and Supply need not be considered on any day in the session other than a Thursday or a Friday. And if Supply be considered only on Thursday and Friday there is no opportunity given to discuss grievances or to call the attention of the House to matters of public importance which in the judgment of the minority ought to be discussed. Let me give a few illustrations of what would happen if the Government should carry out this rule, as it may be interpreted. There has already been intimation given to the Government that this session it is the intention of some members of the House to discuss on going into Supply the conduct of the Minister of Public Works in announcing certain proposed expenditure in view of a by-election to be held in Antigonish; a proceeding which, if it be as stated in the public press, is contrary to all British and Canadian parliamentary precedent and contrary to all ideas of justice and fair play between party and party. This action has been looked upon as a deliberate, outrageous, flagrant attempt to bribe a constituency, and yet if this rule goes through it is the privilege of the Government in power to prevent discussion of an important matter like that. All the Government has to do is to bring down Supply on Thursday and Friday and we are done. Then, if this rule should be adopted, the Opposition in this House is precluded from discussing the flagrant Macdonald election case, on going into Supply, and if we cannot discuss it then, I cannot find under the rules how we can get an opportunity of discussing it at all. I cannot impute motives, but if I were allowed to make a guess I would say that if these rules are adopted we will have no opportunity to discuss this session either the Macdonald election or the Antigonish election. Hon. gentlemen opposite will tell us that I am failing to state that the House must be moved into Committee of Supply on other days than Thursday and Friday. That is not true. It may be possible that the gentlemen who created these rules deceived the First Minister. I was almost inclined to give credit to the First Minister yesterday to the extent that he had been somewhat fooled in the transaction, and that he had not grasped the real significance of rule 4.

Mr. BELAND: Who made these rules?

Mr. CARVELL: I do not know, but whoever did create them followed the English precedent to some extent and then interjected enough venom to take away the safeguards in the English precedent and to create gag law pure and simple. Possibly, before the debate closes, we may find out who is the author of this monstrous rule.

Mr. LEMIEUX: You mean, who is the 'Arthur'?

Mr. CARVELL: That may prove to be correct. At all events, all the Government has to do is to get the consent of the House that the votes in Supply shall be brought up on Thursday and Friday alone and then there is gag law pure and simple. Let us go back to clause 3 and see where it will land us?

Mr. LEMIEUX: In jail.

Mr. CARVELL: We might as well be in jail so far as the Opposition is concerned; and, so far as the country is concerned and so far as the rights of the minority are concerned, the Opposition might as well be at home attending to their private business because they will be of no use here. When you read clause 4 in conjunction with clause 3, you will find you are absolutely shut out except for a day or half a day from discussing the whole of the estimates. I am arguing now what can be done under these rules. By clause 4, all the Government has to do is to get the consent of the House and bring down estimates only on Thursday and Friday and the Speaker leaves the Chair automatically and there is no opportunity to discuss grievances.

Mr. GRAHAM: What do you think these rules are for?

Mr. CARVELL: By clause 3 all that the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Rogers) would have to do would be to bring up estimates to-day and discuss them for perhaps ten or fifteen minutes, move that the committee rise and report progress, and then give notice before the House adjourns that when these items are reached the next day he will move that there be no further adjournment, and he may bring up these estimates at one minute to two o'clock in the morning and move the House into Committee of Supply, and then down comes the lid and the gag is on.

Mr. BELAND: Would that be the reason why the two days, Thursday and Friday, are placed in succession?

Mr. CARVELL: It may be; I never thought of that before. Perhaps the hon. member for Portage la Prairie (Mr. Meighen) will tell us what was the real reason.

Mr. BELAND: Why not Tuesday and Friday?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not think this House is responsible for putting Thursday and Friday together; they have been together a good many sessions.

Mr. BELAND: Why is it so arranged in the rules; that is not a joke.

Mr. CARVELL: If it were a subject for levity, I might suggest that it was another Manitoba wonder. It takes a most logical and acute mind to remember that Thursdays and Fridays have been following one another in the calendar of this country; but I do not think they have been following one another so closely, so far as Government business is concerned in the Parliament of Canada. There is something in the contention of my hon. friend that the two days on which Supply can be taken up for discussion should be Thursdays and Fridays.

Mr. BELAND: They could not do the trick with Tuesdays and Fridays.

Mr. CARVELL: No, it would not be so convenient to do the trick with those days. I admit that I have carried this argument to its extreme conclusion; but that is the only way in which you can argue these things. You can only argue what might be done under the rules which they are proposing. The business of the country is too important a matter to be trifled with by rules which might result in the condition of affairs to which I have directed the attention of the House. Take an ordinary case to show what might happen. Take the Naval Bill, which has been under discussion here for some time. Under that clause 3, the whole Naval Bill could be put through the second reading in two days. It could be put through the committee stage in another two days—put through in portions of two days, and through its third reading in portions of two days. Take the second reading. The Prime Minister moves the second reading of the Bill and speaks on it. You might say that he was replied to by the leader of the Opposition.

Mr. GRAHAM: No, no.

Mr. CARVELL: If they did not move the previous question.

Mr. GRAHAM: By the Minister of Marine and Fisheries.

Mr. BELAND: Previous Hazen.

Mr CARVELL: If they did not move the previous question, the leader of the Opposition might reply. The Minister of Public Works (Mr. Rogers) would then move the adjournment of the debate. Some other day when the Government decided to bring this matter up, or right before the House adjourned, the Minister of Public Works might give notice that when the matter came up the next time he would move that there be no further adjournment. On the day to which the debate is adjourned, the Government have the power to bring it up whenever it desires. The Government may bring up all sorts of things until twelve, one or two o'clock in the morning, and then bring up the second reading of the Bill and in a minute the lid is on; the gag is applied; we are absolutely strangled in the discussion, and the second reading of the Bill goes through. That is what can happen.

Mr. OLIVER: That is what is intended to happen.

Mr. CARVELL: Of course that is what is intended to happen. The same thing could happen in the committee stage. You can hand the Naval Bill over to the committee; it may be discussed there for ten minutes and then a minister moves that the committee rise and report progress. Before the close of the day, a minister gives notice that when it is reached again there will be no further adjournment. It might not be called up the next time until five minutes to two o'clock in the morning. In five minutes the lid goes on and the gag is applied. You have ten minutes discussion and the Navy Bill goes through the committee stage. The same performance can happen on the third reading, and the same is true of any other important measure which may be brought before the House. It is a matter of supreme importance to the people of this country that we should discuss it—that we should do more, that we should fight it. We ought to do everything that free men can do to show the iniquity of this rule being forced upon a free people. If I am wrong in my interpretation of the rule, I want hon. gentlemen opposite to point it out, but I want them to be logical and reasonable about it. I want them to show to the House and to the country that it is not so bad as I claim it is.

I must admit, so far as the Committee of Supply is concerned, that while the proposed rule is bad, it is not as bad as that portion which refers to ordinary legislation. In the case of Supply, under an ordinary reading of this clause, unless the Government were unfair enough to invoke the aid of the House and get the privilege of bringing down Supply on Thursdays and Fridays, one would say that the interpretation of the rule would mean that the estimates of every department must be brought up on a day other than Thursday and Friday. If so, then certain members would have the right to move amendments, to air their grievances and to get information from ministers. Even then, a big opportunity exists for discussion as to whether something is not hidden away which is intended to be used to the detriment of the Opposition in time to come. Let us examine this clause carefully:

> On Thursdays and Fridays when the Order of the Day is called for the House to go into Committee of Supply, or of Ways and Means, Mr. Speaker shall leave the Chair without putting any question, provided that, except by the consent of the House, the estimates of each department shall be first taken up on a day other than Thursday or Friday.

I know my friend from Portage la Prairie (Mr. Meighen) will argue that that clause means that thirteen or fourteen days other than Thursdays and Fridays must be devoted to estimates provided that the Government does not take it away from us by a vote of the House. That is not true. The gentleman who drafted this also had that in view. When I refer to the member for Portage la Prairie, I am only doing so because I understand that he is to follow me.

Mr. OLIVER: Not because he drafted the Bill.

Mr. CARVELL: Oh, no, not because he drafted the Bill. There is something here which requires very careful consideration. We shall assume that the Minister of Finance moves the House into Committee of Supply, that discussion takes place and, if you will, there has been an amendment. The amendment has been discussed and voted upon. Once it has been voted upon, the House resolves itself into Committee of Supply. The Minister of Public Works (Mr. Rogers) takes up a small item and discusses it for five minutes. It goes through or does not go through. The Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Hazen) follows him and discusses another item for five or ten minutes. It goes through or does not go through. We jump from one department to another. This is the common custom. I am not drawing upon my imagination. This takes place many times in each session of the Canadian Parliament. On that day, we will say we have discussed the estimates of ten departments.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Scratched them.

Mr. CARVELL: Scratched them; discussed them. The commmittee is adjourned, and the next time the House goes into Committee of Supply, on Thursday or Friday, those estimates can all be taken up. If they are not put through on Thursday or Friday, whichever it may be, the minister can give notice that, when these estimates come up the next time, he will move that there be no further adjournment. The lid goes on; the gag is applied, and at two o'clock the next morning the Supply goes through. It would be possible to put through all the estimates of this Government under this rule by giving one—not more than two opportunities to the Opposition to discuss their grievances; then take two days at the very outside when they are not able to discuss them on going into Supply, and then put on the gag and the whole thing goes through. Is that the kind of government which the people of this country are after? Is that the kind of rule that it is necessary to frame in order to carry out best the government of a free and enlightened country like Canada? My friends will say: That is not as bad as the English rules. Let us take the English rules. I am not apologizing for the English rules. In my judgment, the closure rules and the rule regarding Supply in the British Parliament are about as severe as it is necessary to have in any civilized country. I do not intend to go into history as to why these rules were passed. My hon. friend from Richmond (Mr. Kyte) this afternoon and yesterday evening discussed this matter pretty fully and gave such a complete history of it that it would be entirely unnecessary for me to repeat what he said. We all know that the English closure rules were adopted under very exceptional circumstances. The English Parliament consists of between six and seven hundred members. Five or six or seven members for two or three years made it practically impossible for the Government to carry on business in that parliament. Very important business had to be done, and very important business was blocked because of their action. Drastic measures had to be resorted to in order to get the machinery of legislation running. Even then the English rules are not one tenth as bad as the rules which my hon. friends opposite are proposing for the Canadian Parliament, even as regards Supply. I have given my version of the proper interpretation of this rule and I know I am right. I do not say that the Government will resort to that interpretation on every occasion. I only say that the Government can resort to it, if it so desires. If the Government does resort to it, I have pictured the results that will follow. In the British Parliament, two conditions must exist; two rights are given to the minority which cannot be taken from them. First, there must be at least three days open to the members to move their motions or amendments before going into Supply—there may be a dozen other days, but there must be at least three; second, there must also be twenty days during which they can discuss Supply in committee. Hon. gentlemen will find this principle laid down by rule 232, part of which I will read:

> As soon as the Committee of Supply has been appointed and estimates have been presented, the business of supply shall, until disposed of, be the first order of the day on Thursday, unless the House otherwise order a motion of a minister of the Crown, moved that the commencement of public business, to be decided without amendment or debate.

That means, of course, that if it is desired that Thursday be taken up with other business than supply, it can be done on a motion of a minister of the Crown, but, in the absence of that motion, every Thursday is an order day for discussion of supply, and the House goes into committee. I might point out that on these days no business other than supply can be taken up until 11 o'clock at night. The House meets at quarter to three in the afternoon, routine business occupies the first fifteen minutes, and, from three o'clock in the afternoon until eleven at night, nothing but supply can be taken up, unless the whole day be taken away by the Government, in which case another may be substituted for it. Further, twenty of these days must occur prior to the 5th of August, and if the Government brings down any supply other than that contained in the general estimates—that is, supplementary estimates for the existing or succeeding year, a vote of credit, or any extraordinary measure of supply—it must be brought down on a day other than that on which the Speaker automatically leaves the Chair; and that gives to any member the right to discuss other matters.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What is the rule?

Mr. CARVELL: The hon. gentleman will find it in rule 232, and in order of the House No. 17. If he wants to find the origin of the rule, I would refer him to page 114 of Redlich, volume 1, where he will see that in 1879 this rule was established, and has been embodied in the different amendments of the rules up to the present time. I will read what Redlich says on the matter:

The House of Commons on the 24th of February 1879, in adopting the committee's suggestion, appended a further concession to private members, as against the Government in the shape of a proviso that on Mondays amendments might be moved or questions raised on first going into supply on army, navy, and Civil Service estimates respectively, such amendments or questions being relevant to the estimates proposed to be taken. The prohibition of amendments, moreover, was only to affect the motion for going into supply on the ordinary estimates under the above heads, and would not exclude them if the Government were asking for a vote on account or if the committee was to consider supplementary estimates. This resolution was renewed in 1882 as the eleventh of Mr. Gladstone's proposals for amending the rules; but it was then extended to all days on which Committee of Supply stands as an Order of the Day, whatever day of the week it may be. In this shape it forms part of the present order of business, as standing order 17.

It will be observed that, at least three days during the session—when the House is moved into Committee of Supply for the first time on the army, navy, and civil service estimates respectively, an opportunity is given to the members to discuss any grievances or other matters which they may desire to bring up, and that right cannot be taken from them. When any extraordinary vote is proposed, such as supplementary estimates or a vote upon account, it has always been open to hon. members of the Opposition to discuss their grievances and move amendments, and there is no limitation of speech. As I have said, there must be at least twenty days during the session upon which amendments are to be under consideration from three o'clock in the afternoon until eleven o'clock at night. Compare that rule with the proposed amendment to the Canadian rule. There must be, I am sure, a few reasonable men on the other side, and I cannot believe there are half a dozen hon. gentlemen in this House, including the members of the Government, who had the faintest idea of the real iniquity of the proposed rules as submitted to the House in this resolution by the Prime Minister. I say that with all sincerity, and I doubt if even the Prime Minister knew it. I cannot conceive where he found a man in the Dominion of Canada with sufficient ingenuity to work up a scheme such as that which is now proposed to this House.

Mr. DEVLIN: What about Portage la Prairie?

Mr. CARVELL: I have too high an opinion of the integrity and the honour of the hon. member for Portage la Prairie (Mr. Meighen) to insinuate that he would be the author of such a proposition as that to which I have referred. I have always been optimistic; I would prefer to consider him to be open and fair, and I would indeed be sorry to learn that he is the author or father of this iniquitous proposition we are discussing to-night.

I am not in a position to speak at any great length on this matter to-night, and I will make my remarks as brief as possible; but I have felt it my duty to place before the House my real appreciation of the interpretation of these rules. I have done so, and I think I can challenge successful contradiction of any statement I have made as to the interpretation that should be placed upon them. If any hon. gentleman thinks that my statements can be contradicted or explained away, I will be very glad indeed to have him attempt to do so. I consider this resolution to be the most absolute attack upon the liberty of free speech and the rights of the minority that I have ever heard of in any civilized country. The hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Aikins) this afternoon and the Prime Minister yesterday said: If you would rather have the English rules, we will give them to you. I desire to point out wherein the English rules would not be adequate in a country such as this. My friends are perhaps not aware—I know some of them are not—that there is a vital, a genuine difference between the office of the Speaker in the British Parliament and that of Speaker in the Canadian House of Commons. In making the remarks I am about to make, I hope no hon. member will think for a moment that I am making them in any personal reference to the hon. gentleman who now occupies the Chair; I am speaking entirely in regard to the office itself, and not with reference to any hon. gentleman who occupies or has heretofore occupied the Chair in this House. With all respect, I say that the Speaker in the Canadian Parliament, from 1867 down to the present time, is what you might call a partisan, or a party man. I do not say it offensively, but I repeat that he is a party man; he is elected to the Chair, which he occupies for a period of four years, very largely as a reward for party services. I desire to say, however, I believe all our Speakers have attempted to exercise their duties in a fair and reasonable manner. He serves for four or five years, again goes into the party ranks, and continues to be a partisan, in no way to be treated or considered as a judge. He has practically no judicial functions to perform, he simply sits there as a sort of arbitrator to preserve order, to keep the peace between the two parties and to see that the rules are observed. These, as I understand, are the principal functions and duties of the Speaker of the Canadian House of Commons. In England you have an altogether different condition of affairs. There you have a gentleman who has been selected not by reason of any party services but by reason of his supposed ability as an officer to preside over a legislative assembly. Possibly he may be chosen from the party in power, that is not necessary, but probably in working it out when a Speaker is first chosen he is chosen by his political friends. But once he becomes Speaker of the British House of Commons he ceases to be a partisan or even a party man, he becomes as nearly a judge as it is possible for a man to be and occupy a seat in the House of Commons. He is generally elected by acclamation; I think there has been only one instance in the last fifty years when the re-election of a Speaker of the British House of Commons has been contested. I think in 1905 the present Speaker was opposed but he was elected by an enormous majority in a constituency which, under ordinary circumstances, would have gone the other way. But they feel in England that once a man is made Speaker he is made a judge of the House of Commons for life, and it is the duty of his constituents to re-elect him and of his former political opponents not to oppose him. The result is that he always returns to Parliament without a contest and no matter what the general result of the election may be, he, as Speaker, is returned. The present occupant of the Speaker's Chair in England has been elected for three or four different Parliaments. I believe he was first a Liberal but when the Conservatives came into power, without hesitation they elected him Speaker. When they went out and the Liberals came in again they too elected him Speaker and if he is alive when the turn of the wheel passes around and the Unionists are again in power as they will be at some time they again will elect him Speaker. For that reason a Speaker of the British House of Commons occupies a different position from the Speaker of the Canadian House of Commons. In the last fifty years I think that only four or five Speakers have been elected in the British House of Commons.

That brings me back to the conditions of closure in the British House of Commons. It is true that the Minister of Justice last night, with the great legal acumen which he possesses, read to us certain rules of the British House of Commons and made certain comments upon them. I want to refer to those rules and also to make a comment on them. Possibly in doing so I may have to make some comments on my friend the Minister of Justice, but I will try to be as fair and as gentle as possible. The Minister of Justice referred to rule 133 of the English House, which is as follows:

> After a question has been proposed, a member rising in his place may claim to move, 'that the question be now put' and unless it appear to the Chair that the motion is an abuse of the rules of the House or an infringement of the right of the minority, the question 'that the question be now put,' must be put forthwith.

The Minister of Justice said:

> No continuance of the debate! No twenty minute speeches! No notices of twenty-four hours, no restriction of the making of the motion to a minister of the Crown. Yet, our rule is more drastic.

The minister uses all the sarcasm of which he has command to show that we do not know what we are talking about. I venture to say that the hon. the Minister of Justice never read twenty-five lines from the British rules beyond what he has quoted. I venture to say he never read a text book on the evolution of the rules of the British House of Commons, he does not know the origin of the rules or the origin of closure. Irishman as he is, he has talked closure all his life but I do not imagine that he knows anything about closure, because if he did he would never have made the statement that he made last night. My friend ought to know that the Speaker of the British House of Commons is a judge and he ought to know that the application of the closure in England is entirely at the dictation and discretion of the Speaker, not of the ministers. Ministers of the Crown in England do not move that closure be applied as they can do under this proposed rule. It is true that a minister of the Crown may make a motion that a certain time, later on, the discussion be closed; but under the English rule it is the Speaker who decides whether or not the time has come to put the question, not the minister, and the Minister of Justice ought to know it before he attempts to lecture this House and talk to this country on the British rules. We expect more than that from the Minister of Justice. It is true that the Minister of Justice has favoured us on three or four different occasions during this session with his legal acumen. He has told us about the Landry case. He tried to defend his own department for letting a man out of jail in order that he might be a candidate for a Tory office and he has also made a speech showing why we should send a man to jail in order to satisfy the morbid curiosity of the hon. member for North Grey. He has also made a speech on the Coderre case, justifying the blackmailers as he called them and these different rascals whom he found in Montreal and he appeals to the sense of this House: Would any gentleman want to place the Secretary of State in a position to be compelled to defend himself against the evidence of men of that class? If there was any other occasion on which he has spoken I do not know of it. I do know that I wanted him to speak, to give his legal opinion on the Japanese treaty; but he was silent when it came to a question of any importance. When it comes to a question of defending something that we will not be able to discuss when these rules have been adopted, the Minister of Justice is always on deck. But when it comes to give a legal opinion on a matter of great national importance, my learned friend skips out of the Chamber every time. But last evening he got indignant because his privileges would be taken away from him. He said:

—I am thoroughly satisfied the common sense of the people will recognize as being absolutely called for at this moment, if we are to continue to enjoy in this country the blessings and privileges of British parliamentary government.

I wonder how many of his privileges have been taken away from him by this Opposition during this session of Parliament. I have a distinct recollection that he did not lose any of his privileges when we voted one-sixth of the salary as a member of this House. I have an equally distinct recollection that he did not lose any of his privileges when we voted one-sixth of his salary as Minister of Justice. And I am sure he did not lose any privileges when we voted nearly $5,000 a year for him as an invalid. The hon. gentleman is the last man to talk about privileges being taken away, especially when you consider the course of legislation during the present session. I repeat here a statement that has been made time and time again during this debate and in previous debates, that not once has this House been asked to consider a matter of public interest, from the time it opened up to the present day, when that consideration has not been cheerfully given. Every important matter has been discussed and passed save only the Naval Defence law. All the estimates have been given when asked for, all public business has been discussed reasonably and allowed to go through. If members on this side have objections to raise, they raise them in a gentlemanly manner and allow the majority to have their way. So, I repeat, the Minister of Justice is the last man to say that the privileges of members are taken away by the action of members of the Opposition.

But these hon. gentlemen tell us: While it may be true you have given the proper interpretation of these sections, we never intended to exercise the arbitrary right we are taking to ourselves. And we had a declaration yesterday afternoon by the Prime Min with his hand extended to high heaven in his most dramatic manner, when he wanted the people of this country to believe him that never, so long as he occupied the position he now occupies, should the rights of the minority be trampled upon or the interpretation of the rules made except in a spirit of justice and fair play as between man and man. And within half an hour afterwards we had a spectacle which takes away every profession of faith that he has ever made in this House. There have been several times in the last four or five weeks when my faith in the good faith of the right hon. gentleman has been sorely tried. I must confess, there was a time when I believed that it would be impossible for that right hon. gentleman in his treatment of his fellow members, and especially of members of the Opposition, to do anything except that which would be in accordance with the feelings of the highest gentleman in the land. But I have had three or four rude shocks of late. The first was a certain night, not long ago, I think it was the 10th of March. He had been pressed, and pressed very hard, by gentlemen in this House, including myself, to give the substance of certain correspondence he had with the Admiralty, and he refused to give it. He now admits that the cablegram authorizing him to bring down this correspondence had been in his hands since the day before. And not only did he tell us that he would not bring down the correspondence, but I am credibly informed that he had the right hon. leader of the Opposition as his guest that evening, and bade him good night at ten o'clock without telling him about this correspondence being brought down. Then, he hustled up to the House, where he had his whole body of supporters and sympathizers, male and female, assembled here, and so anxious was he to make a great stroke that he could not wait until the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff) who was speaking, had finished, but had to interrupt that hon. gentleman to make his statement. And the gentleman who yesterday was the mover of the first evidence of coercion in this House of Commons was the man who nearly went wild when that statement was read. And they thought that we were out of business. That was the first time I had a suspicion of the good faith of the right hon. leader of the House. The next was an even more flagrant case. This was on the night of the 14th of March. On that evening the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Rogers) strolled in and said that if the present rules were not enough to put through the business the Government wanted put through, they would have other rules. And I must say I rather admire the Minister of Public Works. He has the sand to tell you to your face what he is going to do to you. He did not hesitate a moment; he did it.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. CARVELL: Well, he tried to do it —I think I had better qualify that; he did his best. He brought in his henchman and put him in the Chair when he had no right to be there, driving out of the Chair the regular Chairman. Then the right hon. Prime Minister followed him like a mild little lamb and got up and raised a point of order as to the amendments that he and we had been discussing for ten or fifteen days. Now, the Minister of Public Works always does his work well.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. CARVELL: Yes, I give him credit for that. And the man he had put in the Chair, ruled the amendments out of order, of course. But the rest of the game did not work out exactly as they had figured. The events of that evening did not increase my admiration for the right hon. Prime Minister.

Mr. LALOR: Too bad.

Mr. CARVELL: Evidently the same feeling must be operating in the mind of my hon. friend, (Mr. Lalor) because it seems to bother him a good deal, and I think he will find it is operating in the minds of others in this country as well as himself. But if you want anything to crown the actions of the Prime Minister, you have only to consider what we witnessed here yesterday afternoon. We then saw the man who for courteous treatment of his opponents is not equalled in the British Empire——

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. CARVELL: Yes, we saw that man by the action of the Premier—I use that expression advisedly by the action of the Premier—prohibited from the right to speak in this House. When that was done, I say, my feeling of the sense of fair play of the Prime Minister was absolutely killed, and I am afraid it will never be revived. And this is the right hon. gentleman to whose tender mercies they want the Opposition of this House to be flung by adopting these rules. So far as I am concerned, I would rather be placed at the tender mercies of the Minister of Public Works than at those of a man who would stoop to such tricks as those to which the Prime Minister has descended within the last few weeks.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. CARVELL: Yes, I will say this for the Minister of Public Works, he does not make any pretence at fair play at all. Now, do hon. gentlemen opposite in their sober moments feel that a rule such as I have described should be made a rule of procedure of this House? If they were in our place would they want to be thrown on the tender mercies of gentlemen such as I have described and in regard to whom I have given facts in justification for every statement I have made? Would they wish, at some time in the future, to be placed with the guillotine over them and with an opportunity for about half an hour's discussion on an important Bill? I do not think they would and I do not think there are half a dozen members on the other side of the House who ever realized the enormity of this proposition. I hope, now that they have had a chance of thinking about the matter, that they will see the importance of inducing the right hon. leader of the Government to make some change in it.

My hon. friend from Richmond, N.S. (Mr. Kyte), this afternoon, stated that it was a matter of considerable shame and humiliation to him that a Nova Scotian should be the person charged with the introduction of a measure such as this to take away from half the people of Canada rights which they have had from Confederation down to the present time. I sympathize with my hon. friend from Richmond. I am also humiliated beyond degree that, from the province of New Brunswick, should be chosen two men who have been the instruments by which the gag has been applied in this House as it never has been since Confederation. It is a matter of humiliation that they should take a young gentleman from the county of Kent, N.B., and put him in the Chair where he ought not to have been put and ask him to do things which his common sense and his sense of justice told him he ought not to do, things which were abhorrent to the higher principles of his being. That hon. gentleman was forced to take a position which, I venture to say, he will regret to his dying day. The other gentleman to whom I refer was the hon Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Hazen), a gentleman who knew whereof he was speaking, a gentleman who ought to have known the consequences. This gentleman was picked out from among the 130 odd supporters of the Government to prevent my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition from exercising the right of free speech. New Brunswick is humiliated as she never was before. But there is, I am glad to say, one redeeming feature and that is that, when they tried to apply the gag, there was another gentleman from the province of New Brunswick in the House who had the mind, the knowledge and the sand to stand up and lead this House against the attempt. The time will come, not very long hence, when the hon. gentleman who tried to apply the gag and the hon. gentleman who successfully resisted it will have a chance of discussing this matter before the same electors and the day cannot come too soon.

What is the object of the introduction of a measure such as this? Hon. gentlemen say that our rules are antiquated, that they ought to be amended, that we have not sufficient and proper rules for the conduct of the business of the House. Do my hon. friends forget that only four years ago—it may have been only three years ago—a committee of this House was appointed, of which the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Borden) was one member and the right hon. leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) another, the hon. member for North Cape Breton (Mr. Mackenzie) another, of which I was the fourth and of which there were seven members altogether. We had ten or fifteen meetings, we considered carefully all the rules of debate in force in this House, we went over all the English rules, we discussed everything that could be discussed excepting closure and not one man of the seven ever dreamed of such a thing for the Canadian House of Commons. That was only three years ago. We made whatever amendments we thought were necessary, there was not the least difference of opinion among the members, there were no party politics interjected into the matter and after our consideration we were able, without difficulty, to submit to the House a report which was received and adopted unanimously. It was not thought that these rules were antiquated when such gentlemen as the right hon. leader of the Opposition and the right hon. Prime Minister, with the other members of the special committee, discussed them and made a report to them only three years ago. You have only to state the proposition to show its absurdity. The rules we laid down three or four years ago were supposed to embody all that was necessary to carry on the affairs of this country and I want to point out to hon. gentlemen opposite that these rules were revised, modified and changed, after the attempt was made at obstruction in this House in 1908. That attempt, as was stated by my right hon. friend, the leader of the Opposition yesterday, was made in 1908, it was in 1910 that we revised the rules and even then my right hon. friend, who was at that time the Prime Minister, would not listen to the suggestion for a moment and never even discussed the question of closure notwithstanding the fact that the then Opposition had forced him to withdraw a Bill that they contended was against the interests of certain people in this country. Then hon. gentlemen opposite tell us that, because we are opposing one measure, closure ought to be adopted, that we ought to go back on the compact made with the several provinces in 1867, that we are obstructionists, that we ought to be bound and gagged and that we ought to be treated as they treat representives in the Austrian, the Polish and the Russian Parliaments. I take issue with that statement, and if I am not very much mistaken the people of the country will take issue with me.

What is all this change in the rules about? It is not to carry on the ordinary business of the country, because that has been carried on. Every reasonable measure that has been brought to the attention of this House has been passed. We have invited hon. gentlemen opposite to come on with their supply and every time that they have come we have given them the supply that they have asked for. We have invited them to bring on the West Indian trade agreement, because it is of great importance, but they will not bring it down for what reason I do not know. We have invited them to bring down the budget, a subject which has been given double importance in view of the proposed action of the United States Congress as detailed in the papers of Monday last. There never was a time in the history of this country when it was more important that the budget should be brought down, or that the people should know what is going to be the policy of the Government with regard to the trade and fiscal affairs of the country. They will not bring the budget down but they will say: You cannot do any business because we will not give you a chance to do any business until you pass this—I was almost going to say nefarious Bill—a Bill conceived under conditions of the most iniquitous political jobbery that has ever taken place in Canada since Confederation, a Bill which was born with a flourish of trumpets under pretenses as false as anything could be, which has been nurtured by appealing to the baser instincts of the people of the country, which, by reason of its very vice, is becoming afflicted with anaemia of a serious character and which can only be kept alive by applying closure in the Canadian House of Commons, a question which has never before been mooted either in this House or out of it. My hon. friends want a better cause than the Navy Bill to justify them in applying the closure and they will have a better cause. If they would take the manly course, if they would take the course that my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition took when a great constitutional question came up, they would go to the country, take the verdict of the people and then they would know whether this infant which they have tried to bring to life is worth all the pains and trouble they are bestowing upon it.

Mr. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Portage la Prairie): Mr. Speaker, I do not remember that I have ever risen in this House with greater satisfaction than I do to-night; not that I feel in the slightest degree more competent than any other member of this House to discuss the issue now before the Chair, but because of the fact that we are now engaged in the discussion of a reform that has been continuously in my mind and with increasing force since the first month I entered this House. And, the necessity for it has been borne in upon me, not only since I have been a member of the Government party, but that necessity was apparent and becoming increasingly apparent even while I was a member of the Opposition. And, Sir, if anything I can say may contribute in any degree whatever towards the realization of a reform in this regard, I shall be well employed. The product of legislation must not only in its extent but more particularly in its kind and quality have a direct relation to the competence of the machinery by which that legislation is produced, and, therefore, when we engage in the consideration of improving the efficiency of that mechanism, we are engaging in a duty as important as the discussion of the most important legislation itself.

I have listened to-night to the remarks of the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Carvell); earlier to the remarks of the hon. member for Richmond (Mr. Kyte), and yesterday to the hon. gentlemen who spoke. I listened with great interest indeed and with very great pleasure to the remarks of the right hon. the leader of the Opposition. As to the hon. member for Richmond, my only favourable impression as to his utterances on the subject was, that he was to be congratulated upon at last deigning to speak on a topic worthy the consideration of this House. I wish I could say the same for the manner and for the method, and matter of his speech, but I am afraid I cannot. He showed himself a victim of the weakness which I think always distinguishes the non-effective debater, namely, that he found himself unable to keep within even the very ample rules of this House. The hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Carvell) to-night has played three roles in the delivery of his address. He first of all essayed for some considerable time, and in language of temper and of reason, to discuss, as I thought very fairly, the issue now before us; as to what he said pertinent to the question I shall have something to say later. From that, for some time on, he proceeded to introduce his capacity for invective of a certain kind and after getting through with that he essayed to play the roll of joint humorist and satirist. As for the latter I fear I will have to dismiss it as a failure. The first part of his speech was a presentation, at least of the case of the Opposition, which showed that the hon. member had given hours of thought and study to the real meaning of the rules as proposed to be amended. However, it was only in the middle role, when the hon. gentleman summoned to his aid his well-trained powers of personal abuse, that he really seemed most at home.

It was hinted, not by the hon. member (Mr. Carvell) but by others on his side, that I was the author of these proposed amendments to the rules. I am afraid, Mr. Speaker, that I am not entitled to the honour they would fain confer on me. I am, however in a position to say, that after as close a study as I have been able to give the matter, I would be very proud, indeed, to have been the author, and I say so especially after hearing such portions of the speeches of hon. gentlemen opposite as have related to the merits of this proposal, and after having seen from these observations how very slight and how very frail are the attacks upon these proposed rules. While not entitled in any degree to be considered the author, I am proud, and I say so now, to subscribe to these proposed rules as they now stand.

Very considerable complaint—were I to use language which was common yesterday across the floor—very considerable whining has taken place on the part of hon. gentlemen opposite with relation to certain proceedings prior to the taking up of the discussion after the close of the speech of the right hon. the First Minister. Be this said, however, for every hon. gentleman opposite who has spoken, that however they have stated their case—as I think mis-stated it—none of them descended; none of them has deigned to degrade the whole plane of free discussion as has a very prominent newspaper in this country in its issue today. I shall say no more than that. Hon. gentlemen opposite have complained because the right hon. the leader of the Opposition was not permitted immediately to follow the right hon. the Prime Minister. He was not permitted immediately to follow, and for a very plain reason. He was not howled down by this side of the House, and there is no hon. gentleman opposite who is so lost to the sense of truth as to say that the right hon. the leader of the Opposition was howled down by this side or by anyone on this side. The right hon. gentleman was delayed for a minute and a half by the hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, in order that the previous question might be moved and for no other purpose whatever, and a minute and a half was long enough to move it. Then it was within the power of the leader of the Opposition immediately to rise and discuss as freely and as long as he desired every issue that is before this House. He did not immediately rise; he was refused permission immediately to rise and by whom? By the master of many wiles, the hon. member for the city of St. John (Mr. Pugsley) who conceived that this House would not be properly conducted unless he appeared on the scene and moved the adjournment of the House.

Why was the previous question moved? As every member of this House knows the purpose of the previous question is to shut off amendments to the main motion.

Mr. DEVLIN: That was not done in the British House.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is the only purpose of the previous question. The hon. member for Wright (Mr. Devlin) states it was not done in the British House. No, and for the very reason that the conditions which made it imperative here, if we are going to proceed with the public business, did not exist in the British House. Unless the previous question is moved, the main question is subject to amendment so long as the Opposition or as any member of this House wishes to move an amendment, and when the avowed policy of the Opposition is obstruction, who can imagine a Government so foolish as to throw an amendment to the rules of the House into the camp of the Opposition to be blocked for evermore. I am told—perhaps not correctly as to the number—that the Opposition, in pursuance of their well-defined policy so manfully avowed by their right hon. leader, had framed and had ready to present to this House all in due time, extended over periods ad infinitum, not less than ninety-six amendments to these rules. Unless the previous question is moved, there is no member who will stand here and say that within the compass and the circumference of the rules of this House, in the face of an Opposition avowedly bent on obstruction, there is any possibility of passing these amendments. The previous question is within the rules as now devised. The previous question has been in the rules for many years in this House and in the British House. It has been exercised times without number in the British House, and it has been exercised in this House under the rules that contain the previous question and that place it within the power of the majority to move the previous question and to pass it. These rules are the rules proclaimed by the leader of the Opposition as the very consummation of justice, as reason reduced to writing. You, Mr. Speaker, when the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Hazen) rose at the same time as the leader of the Opposition, saw the leader of the Opposition. Certainly no complaint could be found. It is and has been the custom in this House that the right hon. the leader of the Opposition shall follow the right hon. the leader of the Government; and as a consequence, you, Mr. Speaker were amply justified in seeing first the right hon. the leader of the Opposition; but the Government, in a manly way, assuming the full responsibility, took the only step that was available to it and moved under rule 17 that the Minister of Marine and Fisheries be heard, only for the purpose of moving the previous question. Unless that had been done then, the previous question could not have been moved, and all these amendments, this whole reform would have been thrown by that act into the maelstrom of indefinite and irresistible obstruction. Oh, this was a vicious thing; this was the very guillotine itself, say hon. gentlemen opposite, to dare to rise under rule 17 of this House and move that anybody be heard in place of the right hon. the leader of the Opposition. Let me say first of all that it was not in order to move that anybody be heard instead of him. He had a perfect right to rise one minute after and to reply to the right hon. the leader of the Government. There was no intention, either manifest or concealed, to limit in any degree the liberty of speech of the right hon. the leader of the Opposition. We acted under rule 17. What is rule 17? It is a rule of this House placed there in its present form by the right hon. the leader of the Opposition. When Sir Wilfrid Laurier was Prime Minister of this country on the 9th of July, 1906, he, in pursuance of a long evolution leading to perfection of the rules of this House, placed rule 17 there just in the form in which it is to-day. Did he place it there that it might never be acted upon? Did he place it there that whenever it was acted upon for a definite and perfectly legitimate purpose hon. members opposite should howl themselves hoarse shouting shame?

Mr. LEMIEUX: Does my hon. friend mean to say that the inventor of the previous question was the right hon. the leader of the Opposition?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I say that rule 17, which this Government availed itself of in order to permit the previous question to be moved, was placed in the rule book by the right hon. the leader of the Opposition. I ask the hon. member for Rouville (Mr.

Lemieux) if it is a shame and a disgrace to this House to act within the power of rule 17?

Mr. LEMIEUX: It is half a century old.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If it is a shame and a disgrace to act within the power of rule 17, it is also a shame and a disgrace to pass rule 17. The only purpose, and it was a necessary purpose, if we are to move and not to be bound hand and foot as a Parliament of Canada, was to see to it that this discussion got before the House in a form in which there was some possibility of a termination.

We come now to a discussion of the rules as proposed to be amended. Rule 17, which in its present form is authored by the right hon. the leader of the Opposition, is to be amended by three sub-clauses. The first sub-clause which is viciousness personified according to the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Carvell), provides this, that certain motions which are merely formal motions shall no longer be debatable in this House, and that all motions that any hon. member wants to put on the Order Paper, as he may do at any time, even before the session opens, on any subject whatever within the purview of Parliament, may be put upon the Order Paper and discussed in the usual way. Furthermore, any motion that is a substantial motion which, in the ordinary course, does not appear on the Order Paper, is also made subject to debate by this amendment. Now, we are told by the hon. member for Carleton: Why, you shut off debate on adjournment, and in that way you are clipping the wings of discussion, you are gagging the Opposition, you are paralysing them more than the Opposition is paralysed in the British House. He says it has been the practice in this House for years to move adjournments and on that motion to discuss anything. I know it has been. I know also though that under clause 39, when an hon. member wants to move the adjournment for the purpose of discussing anything of public importance, he may do so. But he is still able to do this under the first clause as we propose it. But the hon. gentleman says that after this a member cannot get up and discuss anything at all on the adjournment motion. I know he cannot. But could you have closure at all if this were not changed? The hon. gentleman said this could be done in England. I could not believe my ears when he told us that in England a member might move the adjournment and discuss thereon any subject he wished to discuss. He proceeded to read the British rules. But did you notice where he stopped? did you notice the stone wall he ran up against? And he bounded back as quickly as the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley) bounded back from his motion to adjourn yesterday. Here is the English rule; it is Standing Order number 22:

> When a motion is made for the adjournment of a debate, or of the House during any debate, or that the chairman of a committee do report progress, or do leave the Chair, the debate thereupon shall be confined to the matter of such motion; and no member, having moved or seconded any such motion, shall be entitled to move, or second, any similar motion during the same debate.

That is to say, in England, by a fixed rule, any member moving the adjournment must confine his remarks to reasons why the adjournment should be taken. Why does the hon. member for Carleton, as a responsible member of this House, get up with the rule-book in his hand and tell hon. members that in England they can do as we have done—move the adjournment and discuss anything at all? In England you cannot discuss anything for one minute unless the majority of the House say you may, for no sooner is adjournment moved in England, either the adjournment of the debate or the adjournment of the House, but any member, whether in Opposition or on the Government side may rise and ask the House to apply the closure. Even before there is any discussion, the majority can at any time compel the stoppage of debate.

Mr. MARCIL: Will the hon. gentleman before he leaves that point tell us why the discretion was not left with the Speaker of the House?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not think that could be better answered than by reference to the remarks of the hon. member for Carleton. I was going to come to that later, but out of courtesy to the hon. member (Mr. Marcil) who himself for many years in this House, occupied with distinction your place, Mr. Speaker, I will say this much now of what is in my mind: Following the great legislative bodies of the world, we must place the responsibility for choosing the time when closure shall be applied either on the Speaker or on the Government; under any rational rule of constitutional government it cannot be placed anywhere else. In England, for several years, the responsibility for the application of closure was placed on the Speaker. The result was that between 1882 and 1887 the closure was very seldom acted upon, because the Speaker was diffident about taking the initiative himself. Closure was in effect a a failure. The hon. member for Richmond said that they abandoned it altogether—that they ran away from closure. But such is not the case. The remarks of the hon. member for Carleton on this point had very considerable truth—if you except three or four sentences that were utterly uncalled for—that, by reason of the method of electing the Speaker in the British House as compared with this House, the position of Speaker has a somewhat different status in that House from what it has in this. As a consequence, it would have been open to hon. gentlemen opposite to complain if the responsibility for bringing closure into effect had been lifted from the shoulders of the Government and placed upon those of the Speaker. They would have cried: The Speaker is elected by the majority, he is the creature of the majority, and consequently he is prone to follow the will of the majority. But, instead of that, under the rule introduced, the Government take the manly position of accepting responsibility and abiding by it. But the conditions are such that reasonable notice in all cases must be given; and as a consequence we put it out of our power to do what is the power of the British House—to introduce closure at any time. In England, it was found, as I have said, impracticable to have closure, the measure was found abortive so long as the initiative was left to the Speaker. Consequently, I think about 1888 or perhaps a little later, the closure was changed so that the responsibility was lifted from the Speaker and placed upon a member of the House, which, of course, in the working out, means the majority. While the responsibility for moving the closure was placed upon any member of the House, the Speaker was left the discretion to say when it should be exercised. If we were to do that, it would be open to the same objection as has been brought before the House by the hon. member for Carleton. They would have raised that objection and would have proclaimed it from every platform. The Government take the responsibility, but under such conditions that they must give twenty-four hours' notice. After the discussion has proceeded for the length of time that in the judgment of the Government is sufficient, if any obstruction develops, all they can do is to move adjournment of the discussion and then the Opposition have the following day and until two o'clock the next morning to organize their attack and discuss the matter to their hearts' content. And, of course, the closure need not be enforced the following day but may be some time afterwards.

Mr. DEVLIN: I would like to ask a question before the hon. gentleman leaves that point. Does he maintain that the Opposition may expect that a minister of the Crown will be more impartial than the Speaker of the House in exercising closure?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not think the hon. gentleman seriously thought that I was so maintaining. I have never challenged the impartiality of the Speaker of the House—

Mr. DEVLIN: I am not asking merely to interrupt, I am asking for information.

Mr MEIGHEN: I was saying that the responsibility is on the Government who are answerable to the people and not on the Speaker, who as such is not answerable to the people.

Mr. DEVLIN: Why did not the English Government of the day, Mr. Gladstone at its head, place upon a minister of the Crown or the Government of the day the duty of imposing closure, rather than leaving it to an individual member of the House?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. gentleman does not seem to appreciate the English rules. The duty of imposing closure is on the part of the majority of the members in the House of Commons, always.

Mr. DEVLIN: Exactly; that is what we want here.

Mr. MEIGHEN: But in Britain, any member of the House, however humble he may be, can at any time, on his own responsibility, demand that closure be applied, and put it to a vote; he cannot do it in this House.

Mr. DEVLIN: In this House it must of necessity be a minister of the Crown; a member has not that privilege. There is the distinction.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Does the hon. gentleman desire to widen the scope of the present resolution?

Mr. DEVLIN: What we want on this side of the House is that the power of the Crown be not extended to the degree to which it has been extended, having the result that the representatives of the people will have absolutely no rights in the matter.

Mr. MEIGHEN: In other words, the hon .gentleman says this: We have a closure whereby one, a minister of the Crown can, with notice, rise in his place and move that it be applied. That, he says, is tyranny; that is giving very great power to ministers of the Crown and to the Government. But, he says it would be freedom itself —and he would even agree to it—if any hon. member could rise in his place and move that closure be applied. I had said that this first amendment was objected to, so far as I could grasp the objection advanced, only on the ground that it did not provide the cherished liberty of debating, ad infinitum, a motion to adjourn. There was another objection which was advanced by the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley) seconded with very great eloquence by the right hon. leader of the Opposition, affirmed by the hon. member for Richmond (Mr. Kyte) and reaffirmed, but in faltering tones, by the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Carvell) who has looked into the subject; namely, that, if you pass these rules in their present form, it will be impossible for any hon. member of this House, as a matter of privilege, to rise in his place and make a charge against an hon. member of this House and ask for its reference to a committee and have it debated. The hon. member for Richmond, on his responsibility as a member of this House and in answer to a question of mine, stated that if these rules had been enforced the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe (Mr. Gauthier) would not have been able to have preferred his charge against and made his motion in respect of the hon. Secretary of State. That is what the hon. member said, is it not?

Mr. KYTE: What I had intended to say was that it could not be discussed. A motion is of no consequence if we are not permitted to discuss it.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. member has a very frail ability to say what he intended to say, if that is the case. What the hon. member said—and it will appear in 'Hansard' to-morrow—is that the motion of the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe, levelling a charge against the hon. the Secretary of State, could not have been made if these rules had been in force on the day he made them. That also was said in the first place by the hon. member for the city of St. John. There might possibly have been some excuse for him; he had only two days to study the matter, but the hon. member for Richmond had three. The hon. member for Carleton this afternoon—and I watched him carefully—in order to forever proclaim his loyalty to the leader of the Opposition, said the same thing, but a few moments afterwards I heard him say, in a lower tone, that it was at least a subject of debate. I affirm, Mr. Speaker, that it is away beyond the pale of even a subject for debate. I affirm, and I stand to prove by the records of every charge made in this House during 20 years gone by, that the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe will have just the same liberty to make his motion after these rules go through as he had before, and the motion will be subject to discussion in the same way; all discussion, of course, being subject to the general rule that there is power to terminate it—it cannot be endless. What will such a motion come under? It comes under routine proceedings. The first clause of the resolution says that every motion heretofore debatable made upon routine proceedings, except adjournment motions—shall be debatable. Leaving out what does not pertain to routine proceedings, this is what the first clause says. Every motion heretofore debatable, made upon routine proceedings, except adjournment motions, shall be debatable; so that, providing the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe could make his charge and motion under routine proceeding, it will be debatable in the future just as it has been in the past. The question is, can he or can he not make it under routine proceedings? The right hon. leader of the Opposition said no; it is true—he said—you have the privilege of making motions under routine proceedings, but that does not refer to motions of this kind—it refers only to such motions as appertain to the procedure in the House; it does not comprise or embrace such motions as that made by the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe. That is actually what the right hon. leader of the Opposition, once Prime Minister of this country, said, and that is what was first adduced by the ingenious and fertile brain of the hon. member for St. John. What are the facts? Back in 1891, Sir Richard Cartwright, who was for many years an associate of the right hon. the leader of the Opposition, and who now, unfortunately for the happiness of some hon. members of this House, is in some degree his biographer; Sir Richard Cartwright in March 1890, made a charge against and a motion in respect of the hon. member for Lincoln, Mr. Rykert. When did Sir Richard Cartwright make his motion? He made it under routine proceedings, right under the eye of his leader. At what stage of routine proceedings did he make it? He made it immediately after prayers—the first thing under routine proceedings.

The records of the 'Hansard' and of the Votes and Proceedings show that after he made it Senate Bills were reported and Senate Bills are always reported under routine proceedings, so that there is no possible way of arguing that that motion made by the late Sir Richard Cartwright was not made under routine proceedings.

Let us pass on. We come next to a motion made by Mr. M. C. Cameron on the 20th of August, 1891, levelling a charge against a Mr. Cochrane, then a member of this House, similar to the charge made by the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe. This motion was also made under routine proceedings in this House and was made by a follower of the right hon. the leader of the Opposition, under his very eye, for the leader of the Opposition spoke at the same time. Passing to the 23rd day of September, 1891, for these motions were very frequent about that time, under the leadership of the present leader of the Opposition, Mr. Lister laid a charge against the late lamented Hon. John Haggart. He also made that charge under routine proceedings just about half a page after prayers and before several reports of committees were adopted and those reports are always adopted under routine proceedings. Passing from that date to 1899 and that should not be very far out of the minds of hon. gentlemen, the present leader of the Government rose as a matter of privilege under routine proceedings and moved the reference to the Committee on Privileges and Elections of certain charges against officers of this House in the constituencies of Huron and Brockville. He made these charges in 1899, while the right hon. gentleman was leader of the Government, and he made them under routine proceedings. But beyond all this, only two years ago, the present Deputy Speaker, Mr. Blondin, rose in his place and in exactly the form used by the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe stated that upon his authority as a member of the House he was prepared to make and prove certain charges against another member of the House and he moved that those charges be referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. These charges were made only two years ago by the present Deputy Speaker and were made in the same way as the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe made his charge. They were made under the Premiership of the right hon. the leader of the Opposition and made under routine proceedings, immediately after prayers. And yet, so destitute are the Opposition of all grounds for their attack upon these amendments, that they have had the hardihood to say to this House that a charge could not be levelled and discussed against the Minister of Public Works, and they always like to bring in the name of my hon. friend, and what they say is his nefarious conduct, if we should adopt this amendment.

Mr. NESBITT: Were not all the quotations made questions of privilege?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Certainly they are. Any man at any time can rise to a question of privilege and consequently he can rise under routine proceedings.

Mr. NESBITT: At any time if he is allowed by the House.

Mr. MEIGHEN: No, a man has a right to rise to a question of privilege and if these amendments go through he still has that right. But if he wants to have the question debated and to make a motion he must come under routine proceedings and there is nothing in this amendment to change that.

Mr. NESBITT: When the charges or whatever you might call them, the questions to which reference has been made, were brought before the House were they not brought by permission of the House as questions of privilege?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Certainly, but a member does not have to ask permission of the House, he simply makes his charges under his right as a member and no man can say him nay.

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer): I think my hon. friend is wrong on that point, I rather think he will find a sentence in Bourinot to the effect that the consent of the House is needed in cases of privilege but as a rule the House is very generous in that matter.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I happen to have Bourinot. After a discussion of the necessity of the notice, he says:

> The precedents go to show that the Canadian House of Commons in its desire to deal promptly with all questions affecting its members, has generally waived the strict rules which govern matters of privilege, properly speaking, and given every possible facility for inquiry thereon.

Mr. CLARK: Precisely.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is to say they have abandoned notice, that is all. Does the hon. member suggest that the House has to consent before a charge can be made by one member against another?

Mr. CLARK: I think that language suggests it.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I shall read what goes before that in Bourinot:

> Sir Erskine May has this observation on the subject: It has been said that a question of privilege is properly one not admitting of notice; but where the circumstances have been such as to enable the member to give notice, and the matter was, neverthless, bona fide a question or privilege, precedence has still been given to it.

That is to say, May says it is not a question that requires notice; there may be some doubt as to whether it requires notice or not, but so far as the Canadian House of Commons is concerned they have not insisted on notice and have allowed these motions to be made without notice.

Mr. CLARK: If the House has no say in the matter and if it be the right of a private member, how can it be their custom to waive rights?

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is in reference to notice. For example the hon. member can at any time rise in his place and give notice that he will amend, say, a rule. Two day's notice is required but the hon. member may get up and, with consent of the House, move without that notice, but no man in this House, and no man in the country has a right to say to the hon. member that if he gives notice he cannot make a motion and it is the same with motions that affect the privileges of a member of Parliament. We come now to clause

2, that is to say the second amendment which will be clause 3 of rule 17 and this is the bulwark of the amendment. It is clause 3 which is to bring about the possibility of progress in this House. Without clause 3 the whole machinery of progress would be in no wise improved. You can pass clauses 2 and 4, but if you do not put in clause 3 there is no method at all for stopping discussion. It is clause 3 which provides the method, upon reasonable notice of doing that. Clauses 2 and 4 are for the purpose of putting it out of the power of purely loquacious and obstructionist members to defeat the purpose of clause 3 or to circumvent the whole effect of clause 3. What is clause 3? It provides that whether in committee or in the House, any subject that is before Parliament may be discussed as it has been before, but when it has been discussed for such a time as the Government take the responsibility for saying is sufficient, the Government may, through responsible parties, through a minister of the Crown, give notice after, of course, moving the adjournment of the discussion, that on some day following they will move that the discussion be no further adjourned. If it is in committee they must add that it be the first business of the committee. That is to say, the discussion has proceeded on any subject, the minister has given his explanations and, if it is an important subject, it is the plain duty of the Government to see that the debate proceeds to a length commensurate with its importance. But after it has proceeded to that length, even the Government are not empowered by clause 3 to put a stop to it the way they are in England. The majority in this House are not empowered sharply and without notice to say that the guillotine falls and you must stop this discussion. No, they are only empowered to say this: We bind ourselves to go on with this matter on some future day and we give you that day for a continuation of the discussion up to two o'clock of the following morning when it must cease. Surely that is fair.

Mr. GERMAN: Could not the Government keep off the discussion on that second day until, say, 1.30 in the morning, or twenty minutes before two o'clock, and practically shut off all discussion?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I see the point of the hon. gentleman and I am coming to it because it was belaboured by the hon. member for Carleton, N.B. The hon. gentleman means that they could continue the discussion on some other subject?

Mr. GERMAN: Yes.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The Government of this country could do that if they were willing to take the responsibility, but what would be the object? Let us consider the question and see how it would work out.

Mr. GERMAN: It could be done?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes, but what could be the object? In order that there might be a short discussion on something that has been already discussed, the Government are themselves going to obstruct some other business and prolong the discussion over it. What object have the Government to serve by that? If it were possible within reason to put it within the power of even an insane government to do such a thing it should be done. We ought to provide against everything that we reasonably can, but first of all I do not think that we should be asked to believe that there would be a government in this country that has both so little regard for public rights and so little regard for its own commonsense and common business instincts as to prolong one discussion in order that another might be shortened. It is only obstructing the one thing in order that there may be no obstruction on another. What advantage would there be in that? We should not be asked to assume that any government would be so foolish. But how could it be avoided and not utterly destroy the whole effect of the clause? Suppose we were to say on this second day, or on this tenth day on which the discussion is to be resumed for the last time, that we must get to the subject at half past five, or at eight o'clock; then it would be in the power of hon. gentlemen opposite, by moving one motion after another, and by dividing this House every five minutes, to push the business up past half past five or eight o'clock, and the Government, to save themselves, could not possibly keep to the time that had been fixed.

Mr. GERMAN: Could it not very fairly be put in the rules that the next day should be devoted to a particular question with an allowance of twenty minutes for each speaker? There would be only one day from three o'clock to two o'clock in the morning.

Mr. MEIGHEN: For example, a very small item in Supply is under discusssion. The hon. member for Carleton, N.B., was authority for the proposition not long ago that all the discussion which should take place in Committee of Supply on a $200,000 vote for salaries was fifteen minutes. That was the time limit the hon. gentleman was ready to allow, but we will suppose that on some small item of Supply discussion takes place for a long time, that it dawns upon the Government that obstructive methods have developed and the Government are forced to move a postponement of the item under consideration and pass on to something else. Then my hon. friend from Welland would say that, having started to obstruct any item of Supply, no matter how small, the result would be that they must have a whole day for that little thing from three o'clock in the afternoon until two o'clock the next morning although it might be a discussion about fifteen dollars paid to somebody down in the county of Richmond, a subject which engaged the attention of the hon. member for Richmond the other evening.

Mr. GERMAN: I did not say it should be done. I was asking the hon. gentleman if, under these rules, it could be done?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes, but it would be absurdity itself if it were done and I do not think that any hon. gentleman could suggest any method for guarding against what some hon. members may think is a terror but which I think could not be perpetrated except by a government which was at once insane and vicious. To provide against that, I do not think anybody could suggest a remedy that would not put it in the power of loquacious members of this House to destroy the whole purpose of the amendment.

Mr. NESBITT: Would the hon. gentleman explain the meaning of the words in clause 3 of the resolution 'shall not have been resumed.' The debate may not be resumed at all next day before two o'clock.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am very glad the point was raised or I would have omitted it. The hon. gentleman suggests that the effect of these words 'shall not have been resumed' would be that, even if the debate on the Naval Bill was not resumed by that time, the question would have to be voted on. I do not so interpret the intent. The matter must come up or it cannot be voted on. But the purpose is this: 'If, in Committee of the Whole, there are four or five clauses of the Bill that have been debated at some considerable length and the debate has been postponed, on the day following, or on some subsequent day, the motion comes on that these clauses be first considered and that their further consideration be not again postponed. Unless it were so stated, if some of these clauses were not resumed by two o'clock, it would be possible for obstructionists in the House to say: We will not discuss five of these clauses, we will only discuss the first, each of us can speak twenty minutes upon the discussion of the first clause and the Government could not get all the clauses through before two o'clock. The purpose of the amendment is to put it within the power of the Government to get the Bill passed by two o'clock. But, wait a minute, members of the Opposition who desire to criticise these clauses have the fullest opportunity of doing so. Every one of the clauses can be discussed on that particular day and they can centre their attack on such parts of the clauses as seem to them to deserve criticism. So, there is no danger whatever unless the Opposition wish to obstruct themselves; unless some of them wish to fall down in the road of the others there is no possibility whatever that all the clauses would not be discussed by two o'clock.

Mr. NESBITT: I hope the hon. gentleman will not think I am nagging if I ask him another question. The wording appears to be very plain:

And if such adjourned debate or postponed consideration shall not have been resumed or concluded before two of the clock in the morning, no member shall rise to speak at that hour.

Would it not be quite possible not to resume it at all before two o'clock the next day?

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is not my reading of the rule. I think the debate itself, would certainly be resumed by any government that had any regard at all for its duty. I do not think it possible to conceive of a government that would not. But suppose you said that it had to be resumed and had to be under discussion some time, then the point I made a moment ago comes in again; then those who desire to obstruct could do so to their hearts' content; they could bring in this, that and the other thing; they could continue to divide the House, and they could see to it themselves that it would not be reached until after two o'clock in the morning. But so long as the duty is on the Government of the country, there is where the responsibility should be, and there is no reasonable possibility, in the mind of the usually fair member for Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt), that any government would thus obstruct themselves up to reaching two o'clock in the morning, in order that there might be no more discussion on something else.

There is another objection dwelt upon, particularly by the hon. member for Carleton. Why, he says, this is worse than the British closure; this is something terrible; I am against closure of every kind; closure is Russianizing this country; nobody up to three years ago ever thought of closure; and he says: if we are going to pass this, then discussion in the Committee of Supply is tied hand and foot. I will tell him first of all, that in committee in the British House, just the same as in the House proper, closure may be applied under rule 133, and closure may be applied in Committee of the Whole and in Committee of Supply just as frequently as it may be applied in the House itself. That is to say, on any discussion in Committee of the Whole, or in Committee of Supply, or in Committee of Ways and Means, any member may rise and call on the committee to close the debate and close it, not to come up again, but close it once and for ever. They can close a debate in a minute there; they can close before they discuss the item at all. Oh, but, says the member for Carleton: even though they can do that they have twenty days for Supply; you cannot shut them out of twenty days because the rule says they must have twenty days in which to consider Supply. In the first place, it is utterly inconceivable that we could get through Supply in this House of Commons the way these rules provide, even in twenty days. But I answer the hon. member: in the British House of Commons there is no rule whatever that says there must be twenty days for Committee of Supply. What the rule says—and I asked the hon. gentleman to read it when he was on his feet but he did not—what the rule says is there shall not be more than twenty days for Supply. That is what the rule in the British House of Commons is; the maximum is fixed in the British House, the minimum is not.

Mr. GERMAN: As this resolution is not going into committee, some latitude might be allowed in asking questions, and I wish to put another question to the hon. member.

Mr. SPEAKER: It is quite in order for any hon. member to ask a question, so long as the hon. member who has the floor is willing to be interrupted.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I will be glad to hear the hon. gentleman's question.

Mr. GERMAN: The resolution says:

> Any minister of the Crown who, standing in his place, shall have given notice at a previous sitting of his intention so to do, may move that the debate shall not be further adjourned, or that the further consideration of any resolution, or resolutions, clause or clauses, section or sections, preamble or preambles, title or titles, shall be the first business of the committee, and shall not further be postponed.

Now, the second clause of the Naval Aid Act is under discussion. If a motion is made that the debate be not further continued, does the hon. gentleman understand that that simply adjourns the debate on that clause, or does he think that it terminates the debate on the whole Bill?

Mr. MEIGHEN: No, just on that clause——

Mr. GERMAN: That is what I understand.

Mr. MARCIL: But it says: clause or clauses.

Mr. GERMAN: Could they not give notice as to the whole Bill and stop the discussion on every clause.

Mr. MEIGHEN: This is what can be done: clause 2 is under discussion, say for two weeks or three weeks or five weeks, as would suit hon. gentlemen opposite; clause 2 is under discussion and the motion to postpone the consideration of that clause is made. Then it would be in order I would think, for the committee to pass to clause 3, and clause 3 would then have to be discussed and a separate motion would have to be made as to clause 3.

Mr. GERMAN: In the same way on the twenty-four hours' notice?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes.

Mr. GERMAN: As to each clause.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Exactly.

Mr. DEVLIN: That is not the rule.

Mr. MEIGHEN: But, of course, that is the notice. A motion is made that consideration be postponed on one clause; then, after the other clause has been discussed, another motion is made, of course all within the responsibility of the Government, that the consideration of that be postponed. Then notice is given that the clauses so postponed be on a certain day not further postponed. That is to say, notice is given that a motion will be made on some subsequent date stated, that the consideration of these clauses, so postponed, be not again postponed, and these clauses then must be taken up on that day.

Mr. DEVLIN: And vote on the whole Bill and all the clauses?

Mr. GERMAN: That means discussion on the whole Bill could be stopped on twenty-four hours' notice. I would like to get more information. Clause 2 of the Navy Bill is now under discussion; the discussion of clause 3 will not be taken up until clause 2 is disposed of, and until clause 2 is disposed of, discussion on clause 3 will not be begun. Surely it cannot be the intention of the Government, simply with one notice, to say that on such a day the discussion on clause 2 shall terminate and on such a day the discussion on clause 3 shall terminate and on such a day the discussion on clause 4 shall terminate, and consequently wipe out the whole thing on that day?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not know that I understand the question but I will repeat what I have said and I think the hon. gentleman will understand me. Clause 2 is under discussion and the Government have reason, by what they have observed to see that it is being obstructed, or on reasons that appear to them good, they move that the discussion be adjourned.

Mr. GERMAN: On clause 2?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes. Nothing more, however, is done at that time and they pass to clause 3. That is the next thing to do, without a doubt. Clause 3 then becomes the subject of discussion in the committee. Clause 3 is under consideration and the committee discusses it also for a time, and the Government takes the responsibility for the length of that time. Then, if the same conditions develop; if the Government deem it is their duty as the custodians of the rights of the people of this country, they can move that the consideration of that clause be postponed. Then the committee passes to clause 4 and it is in the same category, and nothing is done as yet except merely to move the postponement. A debate has taken place successively on each clause and then when we have got all through the Bill and all has been debated clause by clause, the Government, or a member of the Government, may give notice that he will move on a certain day that these clauses, all of them, be the first business of that committee and be not further postponed, and then all the clauses must be taken up on that last day and concluded by two o'clock. I think that is absolutely clear.

Mr. GERMAN: It is worse than I thought it was.

Mr. HENDERSON: You mean it is better than you thought it was.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am putting that as what would be within the power of the Government to do. Even that, the extreme exercise of its power, would be to give a day's discussion beyond what is permitted under the British rules. The Government does not need to do that. It can have one adjourned and then, if it is reached, it can take it up and finish it on a certain day, vote on it and then take up the other. Either way can be adopted. The extreme exercise of the rule would be to give to the Opposition of this House a day's discussion beyond what is given under the British rules. Within that day, the Opposition have it within their power to organize themselves and to discuss the Bill within that time to the best possible advantage. It is provided—because I presume it was anticipated that hon. gentlemen opposite would say, why, on the last day you have us right in your grip; you can put up some hon. member on the Government side and he can go on and discuss the Bill until two o'clock, so it is provided in this clause that no hon. member shall speak longer than twenty minutes, and that there will be no reasonable possibility, unless the Speaker becomes a conspirator with the Government, of refusing discussion on the last day.

Mr. GERMAN: You may not give us longer than twenty minutes to speak. You can quite easily do that.

Mr. MEIGHEN: He is satisfied with the last and he returns to the first objection that the Government might obstruct itself on one clause until one o'clock in order that it might not be obstructed on another until two o'clock. I do not think that the hon. gentleman seriously anticipates that any such thing could or would be done by a sane government. However you put it, even assuming the worst that you can assume against the Government, there is certainly a latitude allowed beyond what is allowed in the Old Land.

Mr. MARCIL: Does the same rule apply to a discussion of the estimates? As the rule now stands, the estimates are taken up one after the other. Would it be possible for a minister of the Crown to give notice that on a certain day the whole estimates of one department or of all the departments might be called automatically or put to the House.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Referring to the first part of the hon. gentleman's remarks, consideration of the estimates is analogous to consideration of clauses in a committee. In the estimates, resolutions are substituted for clauses. Consequently in clause 3, the term 'resolution' and the term 'clause' are both used. The Government could take the same course with regard to a resolution as with regard to a clause; that is, after it has been discussed for a length of time—and I earnestly hope the Government will allow more than fifteen minutes to a discussion of $200,000 of salary, which was the limit left by the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Carvell) when he was on the Government side—after a resolution for a vote of a certain amount, say a salary, has been discussed for a certain time, the Government can move the adjournment of the discussion and can pass to another item. After it has been discussed for a certain time the Government can take the responsibility again if conditions develop to warrant such action, and move the adjournment, and so on. The Government can move three, four or more, and then, having moved those, can give notice that on a subsequent day those that have already been discussed be discussed on that day but that the discussion stop before two o'clock.

Mr. MARCIL: What about the resolutions that have not been discussed?

Mr. MEIGHEN: They could not possibly come on again. They must be discussed and the discussion postponed before they can be brought up on this last day, although I am sure that the hon. member for Bonaventure will see that, consistently with making rules that will hold water, the Government has done everything in its power to be fair to the Opposition and to their privileges.

Coming to the last clause of the amendment, which is to the effect that on Thursdays and Fridays when the Order of the Day is called for the House to go into Committee of Supply or Ways and Means, if it is reached on those days, you, Mr. Speaker, shall leave the Chair without putting any question. If there is no question put, there can be no amendment and there can be no discussion. The House, on Thursdays and Fridays, if the Order of the Day is reached for Committee of Supply or Ways and Means, automatically goes into Committee of Supply or Ways and Means. Hon. gentlemen opposite are almost pale with terror at the effect of clause 4. Why, they say, it is a time honoured privilege of the representatives of the people, before they vote a dollar of Supply to the Crown, to see to it that all public grievances are redressed. It has also been not a time honoured, but I am afraid an ill-starred privilege of hon. gentlemen opposite for many years to take advantage of motions to go into Committee of Supply or Ways and Means to move any amendment of whatever frivolous character they may desire. Unless it were put within the power of the Government to get into Committee of Supply on certain days, hon. gentlemen would move any amendment they liked on a day when the Government wanted to go into Supply, and it would be impossible for the Government to get into Committee of Supply if hon. gentlemen saw fit to obstruct. I want to invite the ingenuity of hon. gentlemen opposite to revise the rule as to the privilege governing an amendment to the motion to go into Supply, and so do it that you could stop an obstructive opposition, unless you do it in some such way as that. If you fail to place any restriction on the latitude of hon. gentlemen to move amendments to Supply, then tell me how in the face of a determined obstructive opposition you can ever get into Supply. Consequently, that proves that it is necessary. You have to do it. You have to pass it, whatever the results may be. You have to pass it or you have to recede from the closure, and you have to proclaim to this country and to the world the impotence of this House. You must do one or the other.

Are the new rules as terrible as they have been painted? Worse than in the British House, says the member for Carleton (Mr. Carvell), worst thing I ever saw in my life is this clause 4, because in going into Supply on Thursdays and Fridays we cannot move amendments and we cannot discuss anything we like. The worst of it all is that Thursdays and Fridays are together. That is what seems to disturb his logical mind. I am only sorry that the hon. member for Beauce (Mr. Beland) is not in his place, because he was the originator of the discovery this afternoon that Thursday and Friday came one after the other. The objection, reduced to a semblance of reason is this, that inasmuch as the Government might go into Committee of Supply always on Thursdays and Fridays; there is no provision by which they could at any time discuss the administration of a department on a motion to go into Supply. This clause reads as follows:

> On Thursdays and Fridays when the Order of the Day is called for the House to go into Committee of Supply or Ways and Means——

The House goes into Committee of Supply or Ways and Means automatically, but a proviso is inserted that the estimates of no department can be taken up on Thursdays and Fridays for the first time unless by the consent of the House. Oh, but, say hon. gentlemen opposite, that means the consent of the majority. I invite the hon. member for Bonaventure (Mr. Marcil), I invite any hon. member opposite to get up and name me an instance in the whole history of this House or in the history of the British House where the term 'consent of the House' has been interpreted to mean 'consent of the majority.' These words have always been interpreted to mean 'unanimous consent of the House,' just as stated by the right hon. the leader of the Government. Hon. gentlemen opposite were offered the chance to put in the word 'unanimous,' but the right hon. the leader of the Opposition said, 'I am too old a bird for that.' Why, he says, it is not to get the rules perfect that I am here; but to debate them. Or, in other words: I want to pursue an avowed policy of obstruction. I say that the words 'consent of the House' mean, and have always been interpreted to mean, the unanimous consent of the House. Since the point was raised, I have taken the trouble to discuss the matter with officers of this House, and they give the same opinion I had arrived at myself and that the right hon. leader of the Government has expressed. Does any hon. gentleman think that, in the face of that declaration by the leader of the Government, it would be possible that it should be interpreted during the life of this Parliament otherwise than meaning unanimous consent, no matter what the precedents were? It would be quite impossible. But the leader of the Government says that if in the face of his own opinion and the advice of the officers of the House the Speaker should rule that this meant consent of the majority he would bind himself to move that the rules be amended by inserting the word 'unanimous.' Nothing could be fairer than that. It is quite clear that these hon. gentlemen do not want the rules perfected, they want to debate them and amend them ad infinitum. Such being the salutary protection afforded to members of this House, no minister could get the House into Committee of Supply on his estimates without the amplest opportunity being given to members of the House to discuss the administration of his department—or anything else for that matter. They could object to his going into Supply on Thursday or Friday by simply refusing to consent and insisting upon his moving for Supply on Monday, Tuesday or Wednesday.

Mr. MARCIL: Rule 25 provides that Government business has precedence for the first four weeks of the session only on Tuesday, Thursday and Friday. That would mean that for that time Monday and Wednesday would not count.

Mr. MEIGHEN: But, as the hon. member knows—probably no one knows better—the House is very little in Committee of Supply during the first four weeks of the session. But even during that time they have always Tuesday, even if the motion to go into Supply should be made; and, as I have said, they have the right to move an amendment and discuss anything they like—they can move that the moon is made of green cheese if they like—before they let the minister get the vote through the House. Surely that privilege is ample. But the hon. member for Carleton objects to being confined to any particular days; he wants this privilege at all times. But if he gets it, he has defeated the very purpose of the amendment. That is what these hon. gentlemen want—they want rules that can be over-ruled, or under-ruled, or by-ruled; they want amendments that do not amend, they want closure that does not close.

It was not always thus. Hon. gentlemen opposite are recent converts to these extraordinary views. I am sorry the hon. member for Carleton is not in his seat. He is the hon. member who to-night declared that there was no reason in this country for closure, and never had been; that we were introducing Russian methods, Polish methods; that we were worse than Russia and Poland in ever thinking of closure. He said: I was on the committee three years ago, and up to that time nobody ever thought of closure; we never discussed such an extraordinary and vicious principle. He declared that to think of such a thing appalled him in this free country; that European countries might stand for it, for in those countries they do not know what freedom means, but that you could never get a Canadian to put up with it.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Hon. members opposite say 'Hear, hear.' I suppose these hon. gentlemen never held to any other view than to that which they now express. But has the hon. member for Carleton always been of this view? Has he never thought of this principle of closure until now? Let me quote his words on this subject. Here is what he said—and do hon. members think it is only within three years that up to three years ago as he said the minds of members of this House were never polluted with the idea of a closure? Here is the way in which the hon. gentleman deals with this question on the 5th of June, 1908:

> The action of these hon. gentlemen——

That is, the Opposition of that day—

> —raises the question fair and square: Can the Government of this country, whether Liberal or Conservative, afford to be placed in such a position as that? Can any government afford to place itself at the mercy of an Opposition and virtually declare that, if the Opposition do not like any thing contained in legislation that is introduced, all the Opposition has to do is to withold Supply and the Government will back down? Carried out in practice and you have a country ruled not by the majority but by the minority.

And again:

> I ask again: Can any self-respecting Government afford to be placed in this position? I say there is only one solution to this question; if this Opposition, or any other Opposition, chose to pursue such a course, the inevitable consequence will be the closure. I am not the first one to advocate the closure.

He sure was not.

> I am going to quote to the hon. gentleman an authority coming from their own party, I am going to quote to them an article from the Montreal Gazette of June 1, in the form of an editorial, a portion of which reads as follows:—
>
> It is not the use, but the abuse of the right of discussion that creates public weariness and leads people to upset the natural order of things and to think of the government which acts as of more importance than the parliament that only talks. So, probably, the mass of the people, without knowing much about the situation, would approve of a plan which promised to shorten the session of parliament by checking the flow of unreported talk. Closure began in the French Parliament. It was adopted by that of Great Britain. It exists in the Congress of the United States. These are in their way the three leading parliamentary bodies in the world. What they have agreed to accept may be expected to come in other popularly ruled countries.

That is the quotation, and the hon. member for Carleton adds:

> To my mind that is the proper doctrine.

But he did not stop there.

> Therefore I say that this is a matter which ought to be discussed thoroughly; and I believe that if the Opposition determine to persist in this unpatriotic, unworthy course, the next move the Government will have to take is to adopt the closure. And I now say to the Government that in my opinion, while I think that is the only course they can pursue, it is one that will be sanctioned and approved by the people of this country. Let the Government start in at once to change the rules of this House, if it takes months to do it in order to adopt the closure.

These are the words of the hon. member for Carleton, who thinks his province was disgraced because a member from the province of New Brunswick had something to do with the introduction of this resolution!

While I say this I do not claim that the opposition have no rights; I admit they have rights in this House, they have rights in every parliament. They have a right to discuss any question, they have a right to ask questions when the Government are asking Supply and they are entitled to all possible information, but there is not a man of them, except the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Lancaster), who has intimated that the Government have withheld any information which would justify them in taking the course they have taken. They have a right to discuss all these questions and then they have a further right to demand a vote upon any item; but that is all they have a right to do, and the people of Canada are justified in asking that they shall be reasonable and when they have exhausted these rights allow the business of the country to proceed.

If the hon. member for Carleton would if possible, revert to the same sentiments to which he gave expression in 1908, two years before he got on that committee, it would be a good thing for the Opposition and it would be a good thing for the hon. gentleman himself. But he was not alone in the expression of these views. Who was the first in this House to ridicule the idea of closure? Who was the first in this House to defy the Government to bring in such an iniquitous measure? Who was the first in this House, after closure was introduced, to throw all his cards on the table, and to claim obstruction as the only means of meeting the iniquity of closure? It was the hon. member for St. John, was it not? The hon. member for St. John could not fight closure to his satisfaction by the use of the proper legitimate methods, but he had to get up and move the adjournment of the House in order to discuss the bad roads in the province of New Brunswick, and the question of woman suffrage, so that he might obstruct and defeat, if possible, the passage of closure. I was struck with the peculiar aptness of the fact that the hon. member for St. John made reference to the question of woman suffrage; I knew that his mind was travelling across the fields to those who are co-workers and co-labourers with him in a very similar cause in old England to-day. He conceived that to discuss in some way the wrongs of the women of England was a very adequate method of meeting the iniquity of the closure. Now, has the hon. member for St. John always though that? How is it his mind is so pure now that it cannot behold the iniquity of closure, when it was so very different a short time ago? I have a quotation from the hon. member for St. John, which I take from page 10070 of the 'Hansard of July 24, 1911—the hon. member for St. John can beat the hon. member for Carleton a thousand ways when it comes to turning upside down on any question. He said:

The threats which hon. gentlemen have made this afternoon tend towards almost, if not quite, revolutionizing the theory which has hitherto prevailed. That theory has been that gentlemen would recognize not only their rights but their duty and that is that the will of the majority shall prevail. That is recognized throughout this country as governing all assemblies, all meetings in which people are concerned, and at any meeting attended by the people of this country, whenever there has been fair and reasonable oportunity——

Recognize the words!

—fair and reasonable opportunity for the discussion of any question, the minority have always recognized that the view of the majority shall prevail, so far at all events as that body is concerned; and so in this Parliament. I ask hon. gentlemen opposite whether, after hon. gentlemen have had a full opportunity, as they have had during the time that this question has been under discussion, of expressing their views, it is not tending to destroy free parliamentary institutions for hon. gentlemen to rise as they have risen to-day and threaten that this question shall not be allowed to come to a vote.

Here we have the statement of the hon. member for the city of St. John that the avowed action of the Opposition, as expressed by their own leader yesterday, is nothing more or less than an attempt to upset the whole theory of British Parliamentary institutions! On the occasion to which I have referred an hon. member says to him: 'What about 1896?'—when the Liberal party obstructed—and he answers:

I do not care what took place in 1896; I was not here in 1896. I say it is not in harmony with the principles which ought to govern parliamentary institutions that gentlemen should rise in their places and threaten, simply because their views are not the views of the majority, that there shall be no opportunity to vote upon this question, and no opportunity, in a constitutional way, of giving expression to the views of the majority of this House. That is revolutionary; it is not in harmony with the principles of constitutional government.

Will the hon. member for St. John be good enough to tell the House whether or not he is prepared to see the legislative institutions of this country subverted and destroyed rather than accept a reasonable limit of debate?

The right hon. leader of the Opposition proclaimed yesterday that no matter how greaty others might have erred and strayed from the proper path, he had aways been true to the principle of freedom of speech. He at least had never renounced his allegiance to the principles of Charles James Fox; no matter how the Hon. William Paterson differed from him in 1909 and in 1911; it was just a case of fighting like cats and dogs. I was always, he says, on the other side, no matter what the Hon. William Paterson said: I stood true to no closure no matter what Mr. Sydney Fisher said—he who from his retreat at the present time closely resembles, in his attempt to lead and marshall the forces of hon. gentlemen opposite, another party across the water who has to do a similar work also from a position of retreat. Notwithstanding what the Hon. Sydney Fisher said, he stood true to the principles of closure, I would never introduce closure says Sir Wilfrid Laurier I would rather go into Opposition any day than introduce closure now, notwithstanding what Sir Allen Aylesworht said, he is all wrong, false to the principles of Liberalism; notwithstanding what the hon. member for Rouville may have said at St. Hyacinthe, notwithstanding what the Liberal organ reported him to have said—and the language in its picturesqueness and pithiness bears a marked resemblance to what I have heard from him—notwithstanding that all his remarks are re-echoed and reaffirmed by the hon. member for Russell (Mr. Murphy) who was my Secretary of State, notwithstanding these five Cabinet ministers piling on my back to pass the closure, I stood true, and now I have all of them and all their followers behind me and none of us have any use for closure. That is the position of the right hon. leader of the Opposition. It is true, he said, that Mr. Gladstone introduced the closure; it is true that I have up to now proclaimed myself a Liberal of the Gladstone school; but I have changed, I have found a higher model, I am a Liberal of the school of Fox. Gladstone introduced closure, why? In order to defeat the obstruction of forty Irishmen in the British House, and the leader of the Opposition said that was quite legitimate, because the Opposition then were not parties to the obstruction; the Opposition believed it was the duty of the Government, it was a duty which both parties owed the country, to see to it that the wheels of Parliament were not clogged, that the arteries of legislation were not stopped, that it was not possible for a small minority to thwart and throttle the whole principle of Parliamentary government. And the hon. member for Carleton, by some circuitous route got around to the same idea and he also says that is all right. Therefore, so long as it is forty Irishmen who are obstructing it is all wrong, but when eighty members of Parliament do it it is perfectly right to obstruct. It is all wrong for forty men or for thirty-six, I think he puts it, and entirely right for eighty members to subvert free institutions in this country; so long as you get the Opposition willing to join in the conspiracy, obstruction becomes a virtue instead of a vice. That is the position of the hon. member for Carleton. But, says the right hon. leader of the Opposition, even when Mr. Gladstone did introduce the closure, that was only the first page of his political career and to that stage I do not subscribe. I subscribe to the second page when he gave adhesion to the cause of the Irish members and endeavoured to bring it to fruition in Parliament. But will the leader of the Opposition not recall the fact affirmed by every member in the British House at that time, by every historian of any party, that it was impossible that Gladstone or any statesman could ever have succeeded in putting through the realization of his dream of Irish self-government except by the instrument of the closure? Gladstone in his own day never succeeded in bringing to actual legislation the principle of Home Rule in Ireland; whatever be the merits of the cause of Home Rule, Gladstone never succeeded in getting it through the House of Commons except by the application of the closure. After that, at the present time and under the present Liberal Government, a Home Rule Bill has again passed the British House of Commons and has been sent to the Lords and been defeated; it is not law but it never would have got where it is in the hands of the present Government except by the application of the very principles we are endeavouring to have made part of the procedure of this House. The leader of the Opposition cannot subscribe to the second page of the life of Gladstone, unless he also subscribes to the first page. In order to get authority, for he could not quote the Toronto Globe or the Edmonton Bulletin or the five closure members of his late Government, he goes where? His authorities to-day against the closure are Edmund Burke and the Ottawa Citizen. The names of Fox and Burke should not be mentioned in any British Parliament with emotion. Fox was a man of great talents, of great virtues and of great errors. Burke also was a man of great talents, of great virtues and of great errors. But you can search the whole catalogue of the talents of Fox and of Burke and you will never find in either of them a power to prolong the length of a speech away beyond the limits of the ideas of the speaker. It was a power not possessed by either Fox or Burke and that is the very element and essence of obstruction. You will search the errors of both of these men—and great were their errors as were their virtues—and you will find no attempt to perpetrate such an offence even if they had been capable of it. Burke would never be guilty of so much as a trace of such obstruction as has been practised in this House, the mask of which was thrown off by the leader of the Opposition, nor would it have been countenanced by either of them in the British House of Commons.

How is it that the right hon. gentleman had to go so far back? Are we to look for our authorities against closure, even if we could find them, back a century and a half when the business of the British Parliament bore no comparison to the extent of its business now, before the monster obstruction had ever reared its head in British politics, before that art was even known—because it never developed in the British House until sometime in the middle of the last century? How then can we find authority before that time? You cannot find an authority for the treatment of an evil before the evil exists. How is it that the authority of British Liberalism has so degenerated since the days of Fox and Burke. How is it that the virtue of the rules of the Parliament of Britain stopped in 1867 and that since that date we must stop taking any lessons from them? That is the proposition of the hon. member for Carleton. He says that in 1867 we passed a rule providing that where we had not rules in this little rule book of ours we would go back to the rules of the British House in 1867 and he argues that by reason of that it is unconstitutional to introduce closure now, it is unconstitutional to amend our rules because we said that if we did not have rules to suit any particular case we would go back to the rules of the British House of 1867. The hon. member said that Quebec would never have entered this Confederation, nor would a minority in any sense in this country, if they had thought that we would amend the rules of this House. He says you can go back to the eighteenth century, go back to the middle of the last century, even to 1867, but the minute you amend the rules of this House in the light of what they have learned in Great Britain since 1867 that minute there is an end to the constitution. We not only have liberty, but we are bound to gain all we can of light and of reason and of experience from what has taken place in the British House both before and since 1867. We have, since 1867, availed ourselves of what they have learned and practised more than once. No later than 1910 we introduced into our rules a rule of the British House, adopted since 1867. We have introduced more than one, but in 1910, we introduced this rule which provided that the Speaker might interrupt a member who was tediously repeating himself or repeating the arguments of another member, and call upon him to cease. That rule we took holus bolus from the rules of the English House enacted since 1867 and we took it under the motion of the right hon. the leader of the Opposition and with the approval of the hon. member for Carleton. Now, we are told by the hon. member for Richmond that Liberalism has turned with disgust from these things in Great Britain. It is true, he says, that Mr. Gladstone was driven to it in 1882, but he quit it for a long while and he did not get back to it again until 1887. In England the initiative during those years was vested in the Speaker and Mr. Gladstone was powerless to set closure going; if so, how could he be blamed for not setting it going? But when the rules were amended, from 1887 on, what was the result? I have here a list of the times that closure has been enacted since that time year by year in the British House. The hon. member for Richmond gave us to understand that this was a Tory device. He says that Mr. Gladstone enacted it but turned in disgust from it, that Liberalism became disgusted with it also, and that it has been the Tories who had put it into execution since. What do the returns brought down to the English House of Commons show? In 1888 closure was applied twenty-eight times and in 1889 forty-seven times. I pass that now because it was applied continuously during the following years and I come to 1900. It was applied from 1892 to 1895 repeatedly. I do not give the figures for the reason that there was no return ordered by the British House of Commons covering the matter and the only way to get these figures is to take them from the British 'Hansard.' But it was applied every year. As the House will remember, there was a Tory government in power in the Motherland, from 1900 to 1905 and the following statement shows how the closure was applied during the ten years starting with 1900.

Under Tory Government:

1900	17
1901	57
1902	70
1903	20
1904	69

Under Liberal Government:

1905	61
1906	112
1907	66
1908	63
1910	28

The record of the Liberal Government shows—and I make no criticism of them for it—that they applied the closure double the number of times that the Tory Government did. The Prime Minister of Great Britain, within two weeks of the present hour, introduced an amendment of the closure rules stiffening and hardening them so as to make them even more drastic than they are to-day. If that amendment has not yet reached its passage I have no doubt that it will be put through within a short time. In making that motion he affirmed that there is no member of either party who would say that the progress of legislation would to-day be possible in the British Isles were it not for the closure rule. He says that it would be impossible, not necessarily because of obstruction, but because of what might be called legitimate discussion, for the British Parliament to get through the business which they have to do were it not for the closure rule. We have framed our closure rules with the limited object in view, not of meeting legitimate discussion, because in this country we have time for all legitimate discussion, but we have framed our rules to meet obstruction and obstruction alone.

Now, I have delayed the House three quarters of an hour beyond the time that I intended to speak and I will close what I have to say. I recognize that a man cannot speak again on this motion. I urge this upon the Opposition, I urge this upon the House in all seriousness that we come, at this juncture of the history of this Parliament, to the solemn and adequate realization of our duties to the people of the country. There is no hon. gentleman in this House who will not agree that a very large proportion of the time of Parliament is not occupied as closely and with as much effect as we ought to occupy it. There is no hon. gentleman who will say that it is. There is no hon. gentleman, who desires to be reasonable, who will not agree that without an amendment of the rules that will have the effective purpose of limiting debate, there is no possibility of our utilizing our time to the best advantage of the country. Let us rise above the conception —we do not need to rise, we are all above it—let us for the minute realize that we are above the conception of our duties entertained by the hon. member for Richmond, namely, that we are here merely as two sets of gladiators on the political theatre, each seeing which can gain points on the other, or that we are two strutters in a prize ring each trying to win under certain rules. We are here in no such capacity. We are here the sworn servants of the people of this country and, if we carry out our obligations under our oaths of office to the full, we will see to it that to the best of our capacities we utilize the time of this House to the advantage of the people of this country and we will see to it that we amend the mechanism of Government so as to make it impossible for hon. members who may not have that conception of their duty to thwart the purposes of the majority who have.

Mr. McKENZIE: Mr. Speaker, we have now reached the time at which we adjourned last night and, if the leader will agree, I would like to move the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. ROGERS: It is rather early in the evening, but still we want to extend all possible courtesy to hon. gentlemen opposite and give them all possible time, without limiting debate, for the discussion of this question.

Mr. McKENZIE: Then, I move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agree to and debate adjourned.

Mr. ROGERS moved the adjournment of the House?

Mr. GRAHAM: What will be the business to-morrow?

Mr. ROGERS: The same thing.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 11.05 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

FRIDAY, April 11, 1913.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at three o'clock.

JAPANESE EMIGRATION.

Right Hon. R. L. BORDEN (Prime Minister): I desire to present to the House a declaration of the Imperial Japanese Government, which has been communicated to me by the Hon. T. Nakamura, Imperial Japanese Consul General at Ottawa, and which is as follows:

Imperial Consulate General of Japan for the Dominion of Canada.

The undersigned, His Imperial Japanese Majesty's Consul General at Ottawa, duly authorized by his Government, has the honour to declare that the Imperial Japanese Government are fully prepared to maintain and intend to maintain with equal effectiveness the limitation and control which they have since 1908 exercised in the regulation of emigration from Japan to Canada.

(Sgd.) T. Nakamura.

April 11, 1913.

REPORT PRESENTED.

Eleventh Report of the Geographic Board of Canada for the year ending 30th June, 1912.—Mr. Borden.

WATER SUPPLY FOR WESTERN CITIES

Mr. W. E. KNOWLES (Moosejaw): Before the Orders of the Day are called, I desire to ask a question which has reference to a very urgent matter connected with the city of Moosejaw. The Minister of Public Works may know something about the matter, as he will probably remember that, while he was in Moosejaw last summer, his attention was directed to the urgency of having a survey made over the Saskatchewan river with a view to obtaining from that source a water supply for Moosejaw and other cities. I would like to ask the minister and the Government what has been done, either in conjunction with the provincial government and the railways or otherwise; and what is proposed to be done with a view to following up this advantage?

Mr. ROGERS: I do not remember in detail the matters to which the hon. gentleman refers, but if he will put a notice on the Order Paper, or write me, I shall be glad to supply him with all the information available in the department.

Mr. KNOWLES: Has anything been done?

Mr. ROGERS: Not that I remember.

PARCEL POST.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I have received several inquiries as to when the Bill with respect to parcel post will be formally introduced to the House, and an explanation made as to the working of the system. Can the hon. Postmaster General give me any information to that effect?

Mr. PELLETIER: Mr. Ross is at Washington now, or was there lately, obtaining some more data in connection with the matter, and we shall probably be able to present the Bill as soon as the other business, which has been long before the House, is finished.

THE RULES OF THE HOUSE—LIMITATION OF DEBATE.

Consideration of the proposed resolution of Mr. Borden, to amend rule 17 of the House of Commons, and the proposed motion of Mr. Hazen, that this question be now put, resumed from April 10.

Mr. D. D. McKENZIE (Cape Breton North): Mr. Speaker, I rise to address the House upon a question which I conceive to be one of the most important and far-reaching which has engaged the attention of this House since Confederation. At the time this country was constituted into a confederation and this Parliament was established, freedom of discussion, liberty of speech, responsible government, and all the other institutions that we prize so highly and love so dearly, were handed down to us by our forefathers. They were fought for and won by our forefathers before the days of Confederation. They have been handed down to us as a great and glorious heritage which it is our duty to safeguard and preserve, and it is incumbent upon us to do whatever is in our power, and to put forth every effort we can constitutionally and properly make in this House, to preserve unsullied and unimpaired these liberties, and to hand them down to our sons and daughters, or whoever may come after us in this country or in this House. I have listened with a great deal of interest to the speech of the hon. member for Portage la Prairie (Mr. Meighen), who has preceded me in this discussion. Every hon. member of this House must do that hon. gentleman the credit of saying that he always brings a great deal of research, talent and ability to bear upon any matter that he chooses to discuss in this House, and, in dealing with this question, the hon. gentleman has upheld his reputation in that regard; but I contend that he did not bring anything new to bear upon it. He has disclosed to you, Sir, and to the House, that he has gone fully and extensively into the history of the closure in the Old Country, that he has inquired into the conditions which prevailed in the old land at the time of the adoption of the closure, and that he wished to make those conditions and facts apply to circumstances in this country. I submit that, if the conditions were the same in the Old Country as they are here to-day, expressions of opinion by such men as the late Right Hon. W. E. Gladstone should carry authority and should be regarded as binding upon the public opinion and common sense of this House and of the country. But I submit that the circumstances which confronted the Right Hon. W. E. Gladstone at the time he introduced closure in the old land were entirely different from the circumstances and conditions which to-day are in vogue and prevail in this country. I submit therefore with all confidence that the arguments which were addressed to us yesterday by the hon. gentleman who so ably addressed himself to this question will not apply to conditions in Canada.

The necessity of some law of Parliament such as the closure may be universal, but before we make such a law apply universally the conditions must be ascertained to be the same in all countries; and before applying it to our own Parliament we must find that the conditions prevailing in this country are the same as those which existed in the old land at the time the closure was introduced there. Of course the word closure has not any clear-cut dictionary definition because there may be degrees of closure, and when we use the word 'closure' it may be a slight impeding of the usual liberty of speech or it may be a measure of the most drastic kind. Between those extremes there are different conditions that prevail in different countries. It is a grave matter for this Parliament and for the people of this country that institutions which have prevailed for now well nigh two hundred years should be done away with. Our forefathers cherished them and handed them down to us as the most precious legacy which they possessed, and in the different parliaments of Canada to-day they are still in force as they were one hundred and fifty or nearly two hundred years ago, without any trammel or gagging or impediment of any kind on the liberty of speech. I submit that, under such conditions, when this country has grown up to the splendid and magnificent position which it occupies to-day, it is a grave matter indeed for us to make a backward step, a step into thraldom, a step which cuts down and limits the liberties of the people as this amendment proposes to do.

The members of this House are the representatives of the people of Canada; every member stands as a reduced representation of the great or small body of the people of this country whom he represents and it is the expectation of the Canadian people, it has been hitherto the right of the Canadian people to believe and insist that, through their representatives in this House, there should be free speech and full power to express in this House, in this great tribunal of the people, this final court of the land, where laws can be made and unmade, the only tribunal in the country where remedies can be granted or denied, the opinions which are held in the various constituencies. When we are in that tribunal, when we are in that place of power, when we are at the foot of the throne with the interests of the people, I submit it is of the highest importance that our hands be absolutely united and that we be absolutely free to present our case to you and to the powers that be without the slightest trammel of any kind. I submit therefore that the party and the Government and the Prime Minister who are undertaking this task of cutting down our powers and our liberties and depriving us of those rights, are taking a grave step and one that should be fought at every point.

One important distinction between the considerations that met Mr. Gladstone at the time of the introduction of closure in England, and the circumstances in this House to-day, is of the most striking character. Some time ago I took the position and challenged contradiction upon the constitutional point, and I make the same challenge to-day, that there is no constitutional authority for the legislation which caused all the trouble in the House and which we have been fighting for some time. I submit to you now on my responsibility as a member of this House, that in sending militia men beyond the bounds of Canada or in providing for doing so we had no constitutional authority, and I say that in the building of ships to be sent beyond the constitutional limits and bounds of Canada we have no authority either. I submit, therefore, that there is a dividing line of the most striking and the gravest character between the position confronting the Premier of England at the time the closure was introduced there and the position here to-day. There was no question there about the constitutional right of the business before Parliament. No particular mandate from the people of Great Britain was required for the enforcement of the business which was the ordinary every-day business of the Parliament as it had been going along in the current and rut of events for thousands of years. That business was being impeded and interfered with and for that reason there was no question about the necessity of applying such a remedy as would enable Parliament to look after the affairs of the country.

We have been told here by my hon. friend who has spoken before me on this question that addresses were presented to this House and opinions expressed by hon. members on this side of the House when we were supporting the Government, to the effect that we were in favour of the closure and that the business of the country and of the House should not be interfered with, that such an interference would not be tolerated. He called attention to these speeches, and their production in the House by the hon. member for Portage la Prairie was received with great applause by hon. gentlemen supporting the Government. If any person will take the trouble to inquire into the subject a little deeper, to read with a little care the important deliverances at that time of the hon. member for Carleton, N.B., he will find that that hon. member's references were altogether to the granting of Supply and not to any ordinary and indifferent legislation that might be before the House. What he directed his remarks to was what may be regarded as the life of the people of this country. We cannot get along without money. The services of the people who are dependent for their earnings and the sustenance of themselves and their families upon the Government and who are employed by the Government must be paid. The public works that are under way must be provided for, and the ordinary Supply for the country must be forthcoming from time to time. My hon. friend from Carleton, N.B., had reference entirely to such conditions as that when he made the statement in this House some years ago that, if hon. gentlemen then in opposition would persist in refusing Supply, there was nothing else left but to bring about such conditions as would enable Parliament to furnish the money that was required for the legitimate business of the country. That is entirely different from the situation which is confronting us here to-day. We are here dealing with a measure which is without constitutional authority and behind which there is no mandate from the people.

The hon. member for Portage la Prairie made some argument in regard to the rules, as he understood them, and to the necessity of them, which I could not very well follow. While for the present I might agree that it is possibly necessary to have some regulation or rule which the Government does not now possess in order to force through Parliament this Naval Bill, I will not for one moment concede that there is any necessity for such a drastic measure and I will ask the people who have sent me here and the country at large, as far as the country will take any stock in what I am saying, to believe that in so far as the granting of Supply is concerned there is not the slightest necessity for any change in the rules. It has been a well understood and proper principle that drastic laws should not be made in any free country until conditions should arise demanding such measures. Why should drastic laws and regulations be passed by this House for the pushing through of Supply in any way apart from the old and well-understood rule until some obstruction had been thrown in the way of granting supply that would justify the adoption of new rules? We are now well advanced in the second session of this Parliament since the present Government came into power. On no single occasion has there been any undue obstruction or criticism upon any vote which was asked for by the Government to carry on the legitimate business of the country or for any purpose whatsoever. I remember that last year we were dealing with the Estimates from day to day and time to time, and it is almost to our discredit that a large volume of these estimates were through within twenty-four hours with hardly any criticism whatever from hon. gentleman on this side of the House. On every occasion when Supply was asked for, it was cheerfully granted and granted without the criticism that the important subjects dealt with should ordinarily demand. Why, then, should we have a rule put before this House and why should we be asked to pass a rule by which we are gagging ourselves, shutting our mouths, so that we shall have hardly anything at all to say about the granting of supplies which are crawling up closely to the $200,000,000 mark? I venture to believe that by the time the supplementary estimates are brought down we will likely have reached the $200,000,000 limit, and we are to be told that we have nothing whatever to say about the purposes to which that money will be devoted. It would seem to me that is the purpose that the last rule has in view. In the Motherland for hundreds of years and in this country for many years we have enjoyed the privilege of presenting our grievances to His Majesty the King, through the Speaker in the Chair, before granting Supply. I need not relate the history of this great constitutional lever that has remained for hundreds of years in the hands of the British people and which is to-day in our possession. We would not grant money to the Government to be expended until such grievances as we might think we suffered under should be remedied and alleviated. That principle is as old as the constitution itself and we are told that, in this twentieth century, that bulwark of our liberties is to be sacrificed, that we are to have nothing to say about how the moneys of this country shall be expended and that it is to be no longer a condition precedent to the granting of money that the rights of the people shall be preserved and their grievances remedied in so far as such remedy may be available at the hands of the Government which is asking Parliament to grant this money. I submit that this is a grave question for the people and for the House and that we should hesitate before undertaking to subvert the rights and liberties of the people in that respect.

The hon. gentleman who addressed us last night gave us to understand that these rules were very mild indeed, that they amounted to practically nothing at all, that our liberties were not impaired in any way and that we would still retain the privileges of discussion that we now possess. If that be the case, what is the purpose of bringing them in at all? Are they brought in here for fun, and is the Government to receive all the odium that must attach to the inauguration of such a change in our procedure, for no purpose whatever? I cannot accept the assurance of the hon. gentleman in that respect. I am satisfied from the reading of these rules that they are intended to cut away the rights and remedies which we now have and that too without any justification whatever. The justification put forward for this measure no longer has application. The remedy which this resolution was supposed to bring about, the good results which it was supposed to produce, can never be brought about by this means.

On the 5th day of December last, we were told with great flourish of trumpets that this legislation was for the purpose of declaring to the world that seven or eight million British subjects in this great country of ours had come to the assistance of the Mother Country with a gift or a contribution or a loan of $35,000,000, and that it was a declaration to the rest of the world, Germany in particular, that there was no use any longer for that country or any other country to try to keep up the pace with Great Britain in the building of armaments. It was an unwise position to take. Whether it was wise or not, whether it was well intended or not, I submit that at this stage the effect was gone and that this legislation cannot any longer bring about any such result. It was intimated here yesterday, and properly so, that the conditions that prevail in this Parliament and in this country to-day have forever killed any effect of that character that could have been hoped for from this legislation. Is the Mother Country to accept from the artisans and labourers and all classes of people of this country, who contribute this $35.000,000, one half of them to-day opposed——

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member is discussing the Naval Bill, and not the resolution which is before the House.

Mr. McKENZIE: I am pointing out, although I am perhaps not making myself plain, that there is no justification for the forcing of this legislation through the House, and consequently there is no justification for asking us to pass these rules. That is the position which I am taking. I have thought it out carefully. I anticipated that there might be some objection to the way in which I am putting it; but that, as I understand it, is the way in which this question can be discussed, namely, by pointing out that the whole trouble in this Parliament in connection with this Naval Bill is brought about unnecessarily, improperly, and unconstitutionally. If I can show Your Honour and the people of this country that that statement is correct, I shall show a justification for opposing this Bill, and a justification for the course, even to obstruction taken by hon. gentlemen on this side of the House. That is the position which I am taking, although I have been speaking somewhat in the abstract, and I trust that Your Honour will see the line of connection between my language and the thought which I have in my mind.

I was pointing that out for the purpose of showing that this Bill should be withdrawn altogether, the moment when it was apparent to the Government and its supporters that it had lost its usefulness, that it could never produce the effect which it was intended to produce, and that the money should never be clubbed out of the Canadian people, and the gag and the closure forced upon them, and the right of free speech in this House interfered with and trampled upon. That is the reason why I am now urging that this measure of closure should not be forced upon the Canadian people by forcing it upon their representatives in this House. When there is no mandate for the passing of this legislation, as it has never been a question before the Canadian people, I submit that, before this drastic step should be taken in this House, this question of closure, together with the reasons for introducing it, should be submitted to and passed upon by the Canadian people. That is one of the reasons why this Bill should be withdrawn and the ordinary business of the country proceeded with in the regular and constitutional way. I think I can promise the Prime Minister and his supporters that, if it is only the ordinary business of Parliament, strictly and properly within our constitutional rights that is brought before the House, there will be no obstruction and no reason for the gag rule with which we are now confronted.

This legislation has no constitutional basis or authority in this country. Who say so besides myself? I am in excellent company; I am in the company of members of the Government when I say that there is no constitutional authority for the step which the Government has taken in connection with this Bill. Why is the first Minister of Public Works of this Government (Mr. Monk) not sitting in his seat? It is because he, as a constitutional lawyer of eminence, takes the ground that this legislation and this vote of money are without any constitutional authority or basis.

Mr. SPEAKER: I would again remind the hon. member that he is wandering away from the resolution which is before the House.

Mr. McKENZIE: I thought I made myself clear to Your Honour. I surely have a right to point out that, if this law that is being forced through Parliament now is without constitutional basis, it should be opposed, and that there cannot be any constitutional right to force closure upon this country in order to put it through. I shall try to keep as closely as I can to that position.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member ought to remember, that there is a resolution before the House, and it is quite in order to discuss the practicability or the need of it. To discuss the merits or demerits or constitutionality of any other measure seems to me to be out of order.

Mr. McKENZIE: I shall certainly have to submit to Your Honour's ruling. There must, however, be a reason for the enforcement of closure, a grave reason, before the Government would introduce it at all. I am endeavouring to show that there is no grave reason and that what is alleged as a reason is not a proper reason at all. I do not think that because others have transgressed that is a reason why I should, but as I understand the situation it is my duty to show that there is no reason at all for this closure resolution. If I can show that I think I am speaking to the point, which is that these rules should be adopted as the governing rules of the House. The legislation which is being forced through the House and which it is said the Opposition is obstructing, must be proper legislation before special machinery for the enforcement of it should be committed to us. There are different degrees of obstruction and different reasons for obstruction. If I am a householder and my servant, who has a right to come into my house, wants to get in and I obstruct him, that is undue and improper obstruction, but if a burglar tries to get through my window and if I strike him on the head, yea, if I kill him when he is attempting to get into my house, he has no business to find fault, and the law will not regard his fault-finding because he had no business to be there. That is the point I want to carry home to the House; that this Navy Bill is a highwayman or burglar that is coming in here without any constitutional right and if the Opposition strikes it on the head and keeps it out and kills it, the Opposition is within its legitimate rights.

Mr. SPEAKER: I again remind the hon. member that he is not speaking with relevancy to the question before the House. I have drawn his attention to it twice. He is too old a parliamentarian not to recognize that there is not that relevancy as it is understood in a parliamentary sense between his remarks and the resolution before the Chair. I would again ask the hon. member to confine himself to a discussion of the resolution.

Mr. McKENZIE: My purpose in speaking about lack of constitutionality, so far as the Naval Bill is concerned, was to point out to Your Honour just the reason why no special machinery should be called into requisition at all in order to carry that Bill through the House, because it has no constitutional support. I submit to Your Honour, and you will of course agree with me, that all the legislation we can enact in this Parliament must be found by direct expression or reasonable inference from the language of our constitution. There are certain subjects under our constitution that are absolutely within our power, and others that are absolutely within the power of the local legislatures. We are dealing with a subject which must be within the powers of this Parliament if it can be dealt with in Canada at all, because it is a matter which is clearly not within the power of a local legislature, and, when we deal with it, we must govern our course by the language which we find in the constitution. In section 91 of the British North America Act we find power to enact legislation in regard to naval matters:

> 91. It shall be lawful for the Queen, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate and House of Commons, to move laws for the peace, order and good government of Canada, in relation to all matters not coming within the classes of subjects by this Act assigned exclusively to the legislatures of the provinces; and for greater certainty, but not so as to restrict the generality of the foregoing terms of this section, it is hereby declared that (nothwithstanding anything in this Act) the exclusive legislative authority of the Parliament of Canada extends to all matters coming within the classes of subjects next hereinafter enumerated, that is to say:

And amongst the twenty-nine powers enumerated, is, under the seventh head:

> Militia, military and naval service and defence.

That of course means military and naval service within Canada and for Canadian purposes, and that being the case, and that idea being supported by the Minister of Justice and by Mr. Monk, I submit that there is no question whatever about the lack of jurisdiction or constitutional right in this Parliament to pass the Bill as proposed to us by the Government. If I understand my position at all, Mr. Speaker, I have the right to attack the constitutionality of the basis of the resolution that is now before the House.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member is entirely astray in his conclusion on that point. The resolution before the House is that rule 17 of this House be amended by adding thereto the clause set out in the motion. The question before the House is: shall this resolution be adopted, and all authorities agree that an hon. member must direct his attention to that; not to the constitutionality or unconstitutionality of any other Bill that has been passed by this House or that has been before this House.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: May I suggest to you, Sir, that the Prime Minister in moving this resolution gave his reason for it, and the reason was that he thought there was obstruction of a certain measure. Do I understand that the Prime Minister having given the reason why the closure was introduced, there is not on this side of the House the power to combat that?

Mr. SPEAKER: I think that incidental reference may be made to it; but I do not think it can be taken up and discussed from the point of view as to whether we have or have not constitutional power to deal with that Bill. The best authorities sustain me in that opinion. May, page 229, with reference to the relevancy of remarks says that a member must direct his speech to the question under discussion; the last question that is proposed to the House. The last question proposed to the House at present is for the adoption of this resolution. Debate therefore must not stray from the question before the House to matters which have been decided, or have been under discussion, during the present session. At page 275 May lays down that as to relevancy of debate on amendment and amendments to the amendment the same rule applies. I find in Cushing, page 628, the following:

> The question to which a member is bound to speak is that which was last proposed from the Chair which is thus immediately pending, and which, according to the course of parliamentary proceedings is next to be taken.

I think hon. members will agree that these are two of the best authorities we have on parliamentary practice and procedure. I quote them to draw attention to the fact that the hon. member in my judgment is not speaking relatively to the subject under consideration.

Mr. McKENZIE: I submit to you, Mr. Speaker, and to the House, that these rules should not be passed because they are about to be passed for the purpose of enforcing legislation which has no constitutional authority in this country; because these rules are intended to be passed to support legislation which is a new departure involving Downing Street dictation and money expenditure beyond the control of the Canadian people as represented in this Parliament. I submit to you, Mr. Speaker, that these rules should not be passed because they are sought to be passed for the purpose of enforcing legislation, as stated by the Prime Minister, involving Imperial unity of trade and defence which is beyond the proper conception of Canadian people of what their position in matters of that kind should be. I trust Your Honour will permit me to read a statement made by the Prime Minister of Great Britain a very short time ago upon the point, of the joint expenditure on the part of the two countries. And I submit that this rule should not be passed because it proposes to place beyond the Opposition in this House any control of legislation and expenditure and to drift into channels where the rights of the Canadian people will be no longer safeguarded by the Opposition in this House. It has been said that we, on this side of the House, are not as constitutional and as loyal as we should be, that we were separatists if we said that this Bill should not be passed and these rules should not be adopted to prevent us from speaking, if speaking is necessary in order to defend the people's rights. I trust Your Honour will pardon me if I read the quotation to which I have referred. I do not remember that it has been read before in this House, and I think it is something we ought to know. Even if it were not touching the exact point, it is the opinion of one high in authority in the Empire and one whose words ought to be known to the people of Canada. On the 25th of May, 1911, at the Imperial conference, Mr. Asquith, the president of the conference, said:

> The President: I should inform the Conference, for I promised to do so, that I received some weeks ago a memorial signed by a very large number of the members of the Imperial House of Commons—I think something like three hundred belonging to various parties in the state (it was not at all confined to one body), which was in these terms: We the undersigned members of Parliament, representing various political parties, are of the opinion that the time has arrived to take practical steps to associate the overseas dominions in a more practical manner with the conduct of Imperial affairs, if possible, by means of an established representative council of an advisory character in touch with public opinion throughtout the Empire. I promised to communicate that resolution to the conference, and at the same time I informed the gentlemen who were good enough, on behalf of the signatories, to present it to me, that while His Majesty's Government had the strongest sympathy with any practical step for bringing into closer communication the Imperial and overseas governments, yet when it came to anything in the nature of the setting up of new political or constitutional machinery, a condition precedent must be that the change had the unanimous consent of the dominions themselves, and the gentlemen who represented the memorialists concurred or appeared to me to concur in that view. At the same time I think it only right and proper that the conference should be aware that such a memorial was presented. Does it not also show how much easier a thing it is to express an abstract aspiration for something in the nature of closer political union than to translate that aspiration into practical terms?
> Sir Joseph Ward, in a speech the ability and interest of which we all acknowledge, which must and undoubtedly did represent the expenditure of a great deal of time and thought, has presented us with a concrete proposition, but is is a proposition which not a single representative of any of the other dominions, nor I as representing for the time being the Imperial Government, could possibly assent to. For what does Sir Joseph Ward's proposal come to? I might describe the effect of it without going into details in a couple of sentences. It would impair if not destroy the authority of the Government of the United Kingdom in such grave matters as the conduct of foreign policy, the conclusion of treaties, the declaration and maintenance of peace, or the declaration of war, and, indeed all those relations with foreign powers, necessarily of the most delicate character, which are now in the hands of the Imperial Government, subject to its responsibility to the Imperial Parliament. That authority cannot be shared, and the co-existence side by side with the Cabinet of the United Kingdom of this proposed body—it does not matter by what name you call it for the moment—clothed with the functions and the jurisdiction which Sir Joseph Ward proposed to invest it with, would, in our judgment, be absolutely fatal to our present system of responsible government.

That is from the Imperial point of view. Now from the point of view of the dominions, I cannot do better than repeat in my own words what was said by Sir Wilfrid Laurier. So far as the dominions are concerned, this new machine could impose upon the dominions by the voice of a body in which they would be in a standing minority (that is part of the case) in a small minority indeed, a policy of which they might all disapprove, of which some of them at any rate possibly and probably would disapprove, a policy which would in most cases involve expenditure and an expenditure which would have to be met by the imposition on a dissentient community of taxation by its own government.

We cannot, with the traditions and the history of the British Empire behind us, either from the point of view of the United Kingdom or from the point of view of our self-governing dominions, assent for a moment to proposals which are so fatal to the very fundamental conditions on which our Empire has been built up and carried on.

I submit that this Bill which we are asked to help in passing by the making of this rule is opposed to every principle of self-government and so to the very basis of our institutions. That being the case, I submit that these rules should not be passed, for the reason that they are helping along a condition in this country in respect to which the Canadian people, as has been stated by the Prime Minister of England, have had no opportunity of consultation or deliberation. According to every expression of opinion made by hon. gentlemen supporting the Government, and by the Prime Minister, himself, that is the sole and only reason why those rules are brought to this House, and that is the reason why we are asked to pass them. I submit, therefore, if that be the only reason why those rules are now submitted to the House, that they should not be passed. I think we have a right to criticise the manner in which they have been brought before the House, and I submit that more liberty should be given to the members of this House to deal with them than is now vouchsafed to hon. gentlemen on either side of the House. We were told a few evenings ago by the Minister of Justice that things have changed in this country; that Parliament has now really no functions to perform; that the business of this country is conducted entirely by a committee of the majority in this House—by which, of course, he meant the Government—and that Parliament had really nothing to do except to give its assent to the decrees that might be brought down from time to time by that committee of the majority. If that is the idea entertained by the hon. Minister of Justice in respect of the functions of Parliament, then a great deal of time and money would be saved to the people of this country if these decrees were sent around for signature in some simply way, enabling the representatives of the people to save the time occupied in sitting in this Parliament. This is one of the reasons given by the hon. Minister of Justice why short, sharp and decisive gagging rules should be applied, by which very little time would be lost. But I do not think the Prime Minister or my hon. friend the Postmaster General would consider these to be the functions of the Parliament of this or any other country. As a constitutional lawyer and a man of affairs, I think the right hon. gentleman has a higher conception of the powers, duties and privileges of the Parliament of this great country than to entertain the idea that we are simply brought to this House and placed in our seats, to remain here with our mouths open until a decree of a committee of the Government majority is brought down, when it is our function to jump up automatically, give our assent, and sit down again. That is not my conception of the functions of this Parliament, and that is why I am opposed to any restrictions being placed upon our rights and privileges as members of this House by the passing of these rules. These rules should not be introduced, and, if introduced at all, they should be kept within the closest and narrowest possible limits. The portion of those proposed rules dealing with the voting of money and the rights of the people of this country to deal with their own taxation, confining our rights of debate in this regard down to a few minutes is absolutely unfair, and for the provisions contained therein there is no justification or necessity. These regulations, however, are put before us, and we are given to understand that we have no right to change one letter, one jot or one tittle, of the provisions contained therein. The hon. gentleman has been good enough to say that I am an old parliamentarian. I have been some years in this House; hon. gentlemen sitting around me have been here as long as I have, and longer, but, during the time I have been in this House, I have never known of a measure of any kind being brought before this Parliament, or before any legislative body in Canada, under such conditions that hon. gentlemen had either to swallow it holus bolus, or reject it altogether. The Government knew well that this resolution would not be rejected, because the hon. Prime Minister boasted that he had forty-five of a majority at his back; that they would do anything he might want them to do, and that we on this side of the House were the only impediment and obstruction to his doing anything that might be his will or pleasure. According to his own statement, he knew he had that majority behind him, and what would be our right—if any right we have at all—if it were not to find out wherein these regulations and rules should be amended, should be changed, should be improved; where something might perhaps be well left out or something put in, so that, in the ordinary course of legislative procedure, they would be brought into the best condition into which the skill and good judgment of this House could bring them, and passed into law. But that is not the position we are in to-day. Not only are we in the minority, but rule 44 has been brought into play, and a motion has been passed—under circumstances which I think will not receive the approval of the people of this country—for the purpose of shutting us off altogether, and withholding from us an opportunity of saying one word in this regard. I desire to point out to hon. gentlemen on the other side that it is most extraordinary that, although this rule has been on our books for many years, it has not been invoked for many years. I understand that it was in 1885 that its use was invoked for the last time preceding its use on the 9th of April, 1913; and it is, therefore, twenty-eight years since this rule has been brought into play in the Parliament of Canada. I would like to point out also the circumstances under which it was invoked at that time, and the circumstances under which it has been invoked on the present occasion. There was in 1885 a trial under review in this House, which was regarded by many men as a political murder. This vote was passed to shut off certain discussion, and that is the last time this power was invoked in this Parliament. It is brought forward again under the present circumstances in connection with which a political murder has been committed in this House by the deprivation of the rights and liberties of hon. gentlemen on this side of the House, and the 9th of April, 1913, will go down in history as the day on which a double tragedy was enacted in this House. The Canadian people and their representatives were politically murdered by the introduction of this Bill, and the Premier of Canada has committed political suicide by cutting his own throat. I was reading in a paper not long ago an incident which was related of a gentleman who was travellng in Ireland, and who, it was said, entered a little cottage on a hillside. Among other things, he observed there, in a glass case, an ordinary brick, on the top of which was a faded rose. The stranger inquired: Why have you an ordinary red brick in a glass case. Oh, said the householder, do you see that dint in my skull, that cut on my head? Well, that dint on my skull was caused by that brick. And what is the history of the rose on top of the brick? Oh, that is a rose off of the grave of the man who threw the brick. There may be dints in political skulls on this side of the House by reason of this brick that the hon. gentlemen have thrown but there shall be faded roses, Sir, on numerous political graves as soon as the Canadian people have an opportunity of expressing their views. I have given my reasons for opposing this rule and I submit that they ought to be sufficient to induce the Government to leave us alone. Let them take away from legislation everything that is unconstitutional and has no business to be here and then, if we do not behave, enforce the closure or appeal to our masters, the people, and let them decide between us and the gentlemen who are enforcing a piece of legislation that we regard as unnecessary and unconstitutional and rules inconsistent with the spirit and temper of the Canadian people. The hon. member for Richmond (Mr. Kyte) told us yesterday that he would not submit to any circumvention of his rights in this way. I have nothing to say about the traditional fighting qualities of Irishmen, I have not followed their history as closely as I have followed the history of my own ancestors. But I am a Scotchman from away back. My forefathers lived in the glens and on the hills and rocks of Scotland when the Roman eagles were trying to displace them. They could not do it, my ancestors were never conquered, Scotland is still unconquered, and I assure you that the Scotch people who sent me here and the Irish and those of every other nationality in North Cape Breton and Victoria are not going to be bridled, conquered or gagged by this legislation which hon. gentlemen are trying to force on us. The cutting down of our liberties by these rules, this infringement of the liberties of the minority, is not congenial to the Canadian soil, it will not grow or prosper in this country, it will not take root in this country any more than the Manitoba Wonder potato would take root in the soil of Alberta, as we were told the other day. If this is a Manitoba Wonder the father and originator of it will wonder why it will not take root on Canadian soil. I submit that the attempt to enforce drastic rules of this character, with the consequent cutting down of our rights, will not be any more congenial to the soil of Canada than toads and snakes to the soil of Ireland or skunks or porcupines to Cape Breton. I trust that the hon. gentlemen who introduced this legislation will live long enough to realize that in dealing with members of this House and with the Canadian people their reason and good sense must be appealed to. When that is done we will, of course, have such legislation as is consistent with our rights and privileges in this House and in this country. But I think we are the wrong stock to be forced, gagged and manacled in this way and I submit that this legislation or this resolution should not be passed.

The other day, the Prime Minister, in introducing this legislation, gave a reason, as he said, why it should pass. He said that it would add vim and metal to the wheels of this Government. It would give them life and opportunity to do things if this rule were passed. That, of course, is a consummation devoutly to be wished. If changes of any kind will bring about the galvanizing into life of the flotsam and jetsam of his Government, he should certainly be given an opportunity and all manner of changes should be brought about; he should enter into some working arrangement with weather cocks, with the moon, with the tide in the bay of Fundy, with the wind and every other wild and radical symbol of change that can be found, if doing so will bring about the galvanizing into life and activity of this aggregation which he calls a Government. I fear that he is claiming too much for this resolution. Of course desperate remedies are necessary for desperate situations but I submit that he is claiming too much for this amendment. For the last forty-five years we have succeeded in this country in passing much important legislation under the rules as they are to-day. The existing rules were good enough for the right hon. Sir John MacDonald during eighteen or twenty years; they were good enough for his successor, Premier Abbott; they were good enough for Sir Mackenzie Bowell—why, Sir, he worked his way through a nest of traitors with them—and why should the Government not be able to pass this legislation with the same rules. The right hon. Sir Charles Tupper, an honoured veteran of the Conservative party, thought they were good enough for him. They were good enough for Sir John Thompson for the time he was Premier; they served the purpose of my good old namesake, Alexander MacKenzie, and they were good enough for the right hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier for the last fifteen years. He passed much important legislation under them. I think that the trouble is that the rules and the arrangements of the Government and of the House and of the country are to-day in the hands of novices, people who do not understand how to apply the rules or to apply themselves properly to the business of the country and if they have travelled beyond their rights, travelled beyond the constitutional limits and got into holes and quagmires from which they have not the ability and energy to extricate themselves, they have no business to come here looking for new rules in order to get out of those holes.

There are two propositions before the people in connection with this matter and the Prime Minister has to ask whether they will accept him under the conditions which are described by the Tory press, right under the eaves of this building and within a stone's throw of the seat of the Privy Council in very striking language. We are told by that press that free speech is imperilled, that despotism is enthroned and that gag law is established. That is what the Tory press of Ottawa says; free speech is imperilled, despotism enthroned and gag law established. The people of Canada have to accept the Prime Minister to-day with those conditions or go back to the good old days of the grand old man, who is not only the grand old man of Canada but the first grand old man of this great Empire to which he belongs and for which he has done so much. Give the Canadian people an opportunity and they will wipe away all these troubles, they will take back the grand old man and they will put the business of the country in his hands. Then there will be no gag rule; free speech will be maintained and despotism will not be enthroned in this country. For these reasons I say that these rules should not be established but that the Canadian people should have an opportunity of deciding between these two situations. Let us have free speech, a free Parliament, the right to manage our own affairs in our own way and no more gag law.

Mr. W. M. GERMAN (Welland): Mr. Speaker, I want to say a few words on this question and I do not intend to occupy the time of the House at any great length because I suppose we should begin to accommodate ourselves to what is about to happen and confine ourselves to twenty-minute speeches. I have felt for many years that there should be a change made in the rules of the House which would lessen the time taken up with speeches and expedite the public business. I have had the honour of representing the county of Welland now for twenty-two years in the Ontario legislature and in the Parliament of Canada. During the greater part of that time it has been my pleasure to support and sit behind the Liberal governments in the height of their political strength. During those years I have been somewhat nauseated with the long and unnecessary speeches of what the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Borden) the other day referred to as the tongue-flappers and wind-jammers of the Opposition. I believe those were the expressions that he made use of. During those years the Conservative oppositions in the local legislature and in this Parliament were occupying an enormous amount of time and retarding the enactment of proper legislation and the transaction of business generally. I thought that some means should be taken whereby these gentlemen who occupy so much of the time of Parliament should in some way be restrained. But there is such a thing as restraining the length of speeches and absolutely applying the guillotine as is now proposed. It was stated by my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) the other day that the justice that is meted out to us will be meted out to hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House in future days. This is a rule which will certainly cut both ways.

I might remind hon. gentlemen opposite that, if the late Government had enforced a rule of this kind two years ago, we would have had on the statute-book to-day the reciprocity agreement which that Government sought to put through this Parliament. Hon. gentlemen, I apprehend, will unanimously agree that it would not have been proper for that Bill to have been placed on the statute-book as the law of Canada. But, if the closure rule had been in existence, that Bill would have become law and in all probability hon. gentlemen opposite would not to-day be sitting on the treasury benches. The life of Parliament would not have naturally expired until 1913 and there would have been no general election until this year. If closure had been introduced prior to 1910, or during the long session of 1910-11, these hon. gentlemen to-day in all probability would not be sitting on the treasury benches and they owe their position there to-day to the fact that my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition would not introduce a closure measure. What would we have heard from these hon. gentlemen if a closure resolution had been introduced that session during the course of the debate? The welkin would have rung with howls of indignation from hon. gentlemen opposite that such an attempt should be made. They would have said that the Government was blocking free speech. No one would have shouted more indignantly against such a proposition than hon. gentlemen opposite. But, to-day, for their own good purposes, they undertake to force this measure through Parliament, not in the usual way, not in the way that such a measure has ever been enacted heretofore, not in the way in which the rules have from time immemorial been changed, but practically by the force of the gag, by refusing to permit an amendment and by refusing to submit these rules to a special committee or a committee of the House which has always been done in the past in forming new rules or in making amendments to existing rules.

It has been said that these rules are not so drastic as the rules which have been established in Great Britain and that similar rules are in existence in the United States Congress. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that the conditions in these countries are absolutely different from what they are here. What do we find in Great Britain? There they have a parliament composed of over six hundred members, a parliament which is sitting practically the whole year round, encumbered with all sorts of local business which is transacted and taken care of in this country by the local legislatures, and unless the Parliament of Great Britain had some sort of rules whereby they could restrict debate, it would be absolutely impossible for them to transact the business which is continually coming before them. The conditions are absolutely different in England and they are different in the United States. The United States Congress is called together at stated periods. It has a stated time within which to transact its business and it adjourns at a specified time so that it has certain specified duties, and there is a certain quantity of business that has to be done. They have a very much larger number of representatives in the United States Congress than we have in this country. They saw fit to change their rules to prevent speeches of long duration being made, but every member of Congress can write out a speech which would have taken him five hours to deliver, put that speech on the Congressional Record and have it circulated through the country in just the same manner as if he had delivered the speech standing in his own place in Congress. Nothing of that kind takes place here, and I hope it will never be brought into existence in this Parliament. But that shows the different conditions that exist in the United States Congress and in this Parliament. Here we have a young country with not a very large number of representatives. The business of this Parliament is business which appertains entirely and exclusively to the whole Dominion. We have nothing to look after with regard to the local affairs of the various provinces. We simply attend to the general affairs appertaining to the business of the whole country, and there is no reason in the world why that business should not be transacted within a reasonable length of time without applying this miserable rule which the Government are attempting to force on this Parliament. It is rather a black commentary on the capabilities of the Government to manage the affairs of this country that they find it necessary to force through Parliament at this time a drastic regulation or rule of this description. Sir John Macdonald, during thirteen years of office, did not find it necessary to enact closure; Sir Alexander Mackenzie did not find it necessary; none of the Conservative leaders during the eighteen years their party was in power found it necessary; for fifteen years Sir Wilfrid Laurier did not find it necessary to enact any stringent rule of this kind to carry on the public affairs of Canada. Although there may have been considerable difference in the debating ability of the Opposition of those days, yet it was numerically as strong as the Opposition of to-day, and still these successive governments did not choose to introduce closure. It remained for these tyros in statesmanship now in power for one year and a half to call into requisition club rule to assist them in carrying on public business. The occasion of an important measure like the Naval Aid Bill being before Parliament is not the time to change the rules in the drastic manner now proposed. Far better, if the rules are to be changed, that they should be changed when there is no heated discussion in Parliament on any question whatever. Even though the Government should force this rule through, it will do them no good. Will their contribution be any more acceptable to the British Government, forced through under such circumstances? Sir, I am very strongly of the opinion that if this Government forces the Naval Aid Bill through Parliament as they are proposing to do, with the help of closure, the British Government will say to them: under such circumstances we prefer not to accept the contribution or the gift or the loan which you are proposing. I believe, Sir, that is the feeling among the people of Great Britain at this present hour, and that they do not wish to accept a contribution from Canada which comes to them in such a manner. I would commend to the leader of the Government an editorial article in yesterday's Ottawa Citizen. Hon. gentlemen opposite smile at that, and I can easily understand the reason. From that article I would not care to take anything except a few lines at the end of it which speak of a plebiscite, and I can certainly add nothing to it to give it any strength. I simply commend it to the right hon. gentleman that he may read and learn and inwardly digest it, and if it happens to sit well on his stomach it will do him good.

Then, Sir, I complain of the manner in which this amendment to the rules has been presented in this House. The Prime Minister made his proposal in a very nicely-worded speech and in an apparent spirit of great frankness, but we know what happened afterwards. To prevent the right hon. the leader of the Opposition from moving an amendment a disgraceful scene took place in this House which never but once before occurred in the history of Canada. If these gentlemen opposite had the manliness of statesmen or the courage of brave men, they would have allowed the leader of the Opposition to move his amendment which would have sent this question to a committee of the House where the rules should be threshed out in amicable discussion and a conclusion arrived at which would be satisfactory to the Government and the Opposition as well. The rules of this Parliament have never before been changed except by reference to a committee to assist Mr. Speaker in amending the rules, and then they were submitted to the Committee of the Whole where errors could be rectified, obscurities brushed aside, and defects purged. In 1882, in England, Mr. Gladstone called a special session of Parliament exclusively for the purpose of amending the rules of the House. He took the question up in the first session in 1882, but only to a limited extent and for a special purpose agreed to by both sides of the House, but when he thought it was necessary to amend the rules generally, he called a special session of Parliament and made the amendment of the rules the first order of procedure. Both sides of the House took part in the discussion which filled pages of 'Hansard' of the British House of Commons, and after weeks of discussion and examination, rules were devised which were mutually satisfactory to both sides. Would not that have been a much better plan for this Government to adopt. But so anxious are they to force through this Naval Aid Act—an unrighteous and villainous Act which strikes at the fundamental principles of Liberalism at any rate, and the fundamental principles of the Liberal party, and which strikes a blow at the freedom of Canada to control her own expenditure,—that they launch this closure against free discussion.

What are these rules? Clause 2 is fairly plain, but let us see the villany embodied in clause 3. I say 'the villany' advisedly, because under that rule the Government, if they choose can absolutely put a Bill through the committee stage in one day; there is no doubt about it. They say: We will allow you twenty minutes to talk. That, if I may use the term in a parliamentary sense, appears to be absolutely hypocritical. They say: Oh, but we will give each man twenty minutes to talk. The right hon. Prime Minister said that he thought that was really too long. Do they give twenty minutes? They do not give twenty seconds; they do not give any time. What will happen? Let us take a concrete case. Let us take the present Naval Aid Bill and see how this rule will work out if applied to it. Suppose the House goes into committee next Monday on the Naval Aid Bill. A minister of the Crown, as soon as the House is in committee, may give notice under this clause that on the following day the debate shall be concluded. He can then move that the debate on clause 2 be deferred and that clause 3 be proceeded with. He can immediately give the same notice with regard to clause 3. He can do the same thing with regard to clause 4 without any discussion whatever, and he can then immediately move that the committee rise, report progress, and ask leave to sit again. He has given the notices requisite to move the closure on the following day. The next day, the Government can go on with the regular business of the House until 1.30 in the morning and then go into committee, and that same minister can shut off the whole discussion and have the Bill declared carried. It is the worst kind of steam roller that I have ever seen or heard of. I do not know what conditions may be in England and I care not; but I know that this thing does not suit the conditions in Canada, and the people of Canada will not stand for it when they have an opportunity of expressing their opinion. They will not allow any government such drastic, such enormous, such overwhelming powers as this. The hon. member for Portage la Prairie (Mr. Meighen) last night had to admit, when I asked him the question, that that was the strict interpretation of the proposed rule; but he said that no government except an insane government would do such a thing as that. Then I think this is just the Government that would do it, because it strikes me they are getting somewhat insane, if they were not so always. It is said: Whom the Gods wish to destroy, they first make mad. I think the Gods wish to destroy these gentlemen I know the people do. That is the condition of affairs in regard to that clause.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The voice of the people is the voice of God.

Mr. GERMAN: It seems to me that that in itself is sufficient to condemn this measure. If it had gone to committee and had been threshed out by the members, it would have been provided that at least one day should be given to the discussion of a clause, that a whole Bill could not be closured at one time, and in practically one minute; but under clause 3 of this resolution that condition of affairs will exist. I will leave it to the Government. The Prime Minister says: Oh, trust me; I will not do anything wrong. After what we saw yesterday, I have my doubt about trusting him to any great extent when he desires to force such a measure through Parliament.

There are other amendments which should have been made. I do not intend to discuss them. The one instance is an example of the whole. It is a most unjust, I might say diabolical thing, for a government, in the height of a debate on one of the most important questions that have ever come before the Parliament of Canada or interested the people of this country, to come down with a sledge hammer at this stage of the session and say: No more talk; no more discussion; no more contentions on this matter; hands off; this is our pet Bill; it must go through; it shall go through. I am free to say that I predicted early in the debate on the Naval Bill that this would happen. I was sure that they would do something in that direction. I thought they would use physical force, which they could have done and which they attempted to do. I think there was a yellow thread in the woof of their constitution, and they backed down; they got scared, as the boys say, at the cars, they gave up the physical force proposition and brought in this resolution. The right hon. the Prime Minister thought this a more diplomatic but equally effective way of forcing the guillotine on this Parliament, and thus putting the Bill through. They say: Stop obstruction; you should not obstruct this Bill. It has been pointed out already that there has been no obstruction to any other business of the House. There has been a large amount of discussion on this Bill, and properly so, I submit; there should be much more discussion, and there must be at least some more discussion on it. I defy this Government to closure this Bill through until there is some considerable discussion on the clauses. It is an important Bill.

We are fighting over a principle. We are fighting for what we believe to be the principle of parliamentary control over the expenditure of public money. The fundamental principle of Liberalism is public control over public expenditure. That is a principle which was fought for for years in this country by such men as Baldwin and Lafontaine, Brown and Dorion, Laurier and Mowat, six noble French and English Liberals who stand among the grandest statesmen that Canada has ever produced. They struggled for years for that principle. Their struggle was successful. It has been established for years that Parliament shall have full and exclusive control over the expenditure of public money. Yet these gentlemen, new men at the wheel, tyros in statesmanship, unable to control this House and to manage the affairs of the country for a year and a half without bringing in a closure resolution, strike a death blow in this resolution at that principle. They take that control out of the hands of Parliament and try to put it in the hands of the ministers of the Crown. They will force this through by the strength of their closure. We will take some opportunity of discussing to some extent at any rate, the further clauses of the Bill, and in some way we will get on 'Hansard' the amendments which we propose to that Bill embodying the principles which we stand for and which Liberals throughout all time have stood for.

What will the Government gain? It will force this Bill through the House of Commons. But, Sir, this House of Commons does not hold all the Liberals who occupy positions in the Parliament of Canada; and, I greatly misjudge the strength of Liberal principles which, at present at any rate, dominate the Upper House of this Parliament if the strength of those principles is not sufficient to destroy this Bill, as it should be. I say that my hon. friend will be up against that proposition. I hope he will; I believe he will; because Liberals in this country do not intend to lie down under this kind of gag rule and steamroller politics, but whatever legal means we have to defeat this Bill and the principles embodied in this Bill the Liberals in Canada propose to take, and to take the responsibility for. So, what will be the position of the right hon. gentleman? He made a speech in Montreal last winter in which he publicly and openly declared—and was loudly applauded:

> I will submit to Parliament this proposition for a contribution to Great Britain. If Parliament does not pass that contribution, I will appeal to the people of Canada for their approval.

Now, the Prime Minister will be up against that proposition, either to go to the people as he said, or be branded as the first public man in Canada who openly violated a public pledge.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. GERMAN: Hon. gentlemen opposite laugh; but what I say is absolutely true. The right hon. gentleman made that pledge, he stated that if this money was not voted by Parliament, he would immediately appeal to the people. If he can afford to lie down under that imputation, we can afford to let him lie under it. Let him take such cold comfort as he may in contemplation of a career which began in an unholy alliance with the Nationalists of Quebec and has ended by applying the guillotine to the Parliament of Canada.

Mr. E. W. NESBITT (North Oxford): In rising to speak on this very important question, I speak for myself only, as I have not discussed the matter with any of my colleagues. I would like to say in starting that I thoroughly endorse, and have always endorsed, the position taken by my right hon. leader (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), on this question of closure or limitation of debate. I absolutely agree with him that the House of Commons is for debate, that every question brought before this House should be debated until the sense of the House says that the debate has lasted long enough. Since Confederation there has been no practical difficulty under that method except on three or four occcasions, as pointed out by my right hon. leader the other evening. When you consider that in forty-six years there have only been four occasions when mutual consent for debate in this House to stop has not been sufficient, that is a very excellent record I think, and I believe the people of the country will say the same. With reference to the episode of the other evening, so far as I am concerned, I confess I was deeply hurt at the attitude of the Government with reference to my right hon. leader. I listened to the hon. member for Portage la Prairie (Mr. Meighen) quoting some newspaper that said that the Government had shouted down the leader of the Opposition, and, he resented that very much as not being true. I presumed that he meant the Toronto Globe, and I immediately turned up the reports in that paper of the proceedings of the other evening; and I noticed that it was there stated that when my hon. friend from East Hastings (Mr. Northrup) got on his feet the leader of the Opposition was also on his feet and that the members of the Government shouted to the leader of the Opposition to sit down. Now, my memory is that that is absolutely correct. So, I do not see that the Toronto Globe, if that is the paper mentioned, deserves censure at the hands of my hon. friend. Be that as it may, newspapers, I presume, have the privilege of exaggerating these things somewhat. As a rule, I do not read politics in the papers very much, as they are coloured more or less by the side they have taken. We do not blame them for that. What I want to protest against personally here is the action taken by the Government to shut off the debate by the leader of the Opposition when he rose, in accordance with the procedure ever since I have been in this House, immediately after the leader of the Government. My hon. friends of the Government say that it was a trick, a managerial trick to get possession of the debate and shut off amendments. I want to tell my right hon. friend the leader of the Government, from my experience since I first had the honour of a seat in this House, that I do not believe that, had the sides been reversed, a man could have been found on the Liberal side to make a motion to shut off a speech by that right hon. gentleman who leads the House. I know I have not been in this House a very long time—I recognize that I have not had a great experience; but during the time I sat on that side of the House, we supporters of the Government of that day showed as much respect to the then leader of the Opposition in all cases as did his own side.

Mr. LEMIEUX: More.

Mr. NESBITT: More, in fact, as I am reminded by my hon. friend. Always we showed the deepest respect to the right hon. gentleman when he was leader of the Opposition, and we do now, so far as that is concerned. Now, I really think that on account of the prominence of the position which the right hon. the leader of the Opposition has held in this country, and still holds, the Government went so far the other evening that I believe they lost the respect of the independent people of this country. I quite believe my hon. friends of the Government who are dyed-in-the-wool Tories will think it was clever. It was, perhaps, a clever ruse, in a way. But was it parliamentary, was it in accordance with the dignity of the House, with the courtesy we all owe to each other, especially to the leaders of the parties in this House?—because after all, this House manages its affairs under the party system.

I have always agreed with the right hon. leader of the Opposition in the position he has taken that in this House we must have absolute freedom of speech. On four occasions, which he enumerated the other night, exceptional conditions existed, and a recourse had to be adopted. What was that recourse? The recourse was to go to our masters, the people; and, for my part, I am quite willing to abide by their decision. I recognize that I am sent here purely and simply as a representative of the people of my constituency, and when I fail to represent a majority of their views, I do not want to sit here. If the occasion should arise, when the people I am supposed to represent should not be satisfied with my attitude in this House, I will consider it my duty to resign immediately, and let them send to this House someone who will represent their views. If the Government think they are right, they can appeal to the people; they have had that opportunity. They say that the people thoroughly endorse their policy in respect to naval matters; if they think so, there will be no harm done if they allow the people to express their opinion through a general election. It is apparent that it is not the matter of the expenditure which deters hon. gentlemen opposite from going to the country, for they show by their estimates no disposition to be afraid of a little expenditure. If, therefore, they consider that they voice the opinion of the people, why do they bring in a measure of coercion which will remain a part of the rules of this House until they are repealed? Why introduce coercion in regard to the debates of this House when all that hon. gentlemen opposite have to do, if they consider that the course they are taking is justified, is to appeal to their masters, the people? That would tell the tale, and tell it in two or three months. In introducing the Naval Bill, hon. gentlemen opposite claimed that it was an emergency contribution, but that claim has long since been abandoned. This being the case, two or three months longer would make but little difference with this proposed Naval Bill, and the time occupied by the Government in an appeal to the people be as nothing compared with the effect of the introduction of this closure measure upon the debates of this House.

My right hon. friend the leader of the Government the other evening, as the hon. member for Welland (Mr. German) has said, made a very able and conciliatory speech in introducing this resolution. In listening to my right hon. friend, one would have thought that the members of the Opposition would run no risks in accepting the application of this closure; but he had scarcely resumed his seat when, I am sorry to say, we witnessed a very apt illustration of the extent of the tender mercies we have reason to expect from hon. gentlemen on the Government side of the House.

In supporting his argument for the introduction of the resolution for closure or curtailment of speech, my right hon. friend referred to the practice in the United States. He may have succeeded in giving a fair representation of the curtailment of debate in the United States House of Representatives, but I desire to draw the attention of my right hon. friend and his supporters to the fact that not only are they demanding a greater freedom of speech in the United States, and, in fact, in all countries having democratic institutions, but they are demanding the referendum and the recall in the United States —very much more significant measures, so far as obtaining the voice of the people is concerned, than we have ever demanded in this Canada of ours. For this reason, I think that my right hon. friend, in referring to the procedure in the United States, gave but a poor illustration in support of his proposed limitation of free speech. The feeling is gradually extending throughout this country that vital questions of this kind should be submitted to the people. The referendum has not been adopted in British countries up to the present time, except, perhaps, in New Zealand, but our system has been to appeal to the people, not by a referendum, but by a general election, and that, as I have said, is the best way of settling this question.

The hon. member for Portage la Prairie (Mr. Meighen) last evening told us that, under clause 2, we could take advantage of routine proceedings to make any charge we desired to prefer, or in respect of which we might desire an investigation. He quoted from Bourinot as follows:

> The precedents go to show that the Canadian House of Commons, in its desire to deal promptly with all questions affecting its members, has generally waived the strict rules which govern matters of privilege, properly speaking, and given every possible facility for inquiry thereon.

In answer to an inquiry of mine, the hon. gentleman stated that motions for investigation could be brought up under motions and routine proceedings, and he cited a number of instances. I asked him if such motions were not really introduced as questions of privilege, and he answered by reading the quotation I have given from an authority on parliamentary procedure. We all recognize that when a member rises and requests the privilege of speaking on a certain matter that is not perhaps quite in order, it is entirely in the hands of the minister leading the House whether he gets that privilege or not. If he has no intimation from the minister that he will not hear him, he is allowed by the Speaker to proceed. We shall be absolutely at the mercy of the minister who may be leading the House, because his followers will back him up in anything he may do. That has been the practice ever since I have been a member of the House, and I have no doubt that will continue. I do not blame members opposite for being loyal to their leader, just as we are loyal to our leader; but to say that we could introduce a motion of that kind by our absolute right is absurd. It has not been done, at least since I have been here, and I question if it would be allowed to be done in the present temper of the Government. Their attitude in relation to any question that we might raise would depend on their tempers—whether they had had good or bad dinners or something of that kind. Members of this House are elected to represent the people. It does not matter a particle, which side of politics may be in power, the minority ought never to be at the mercy of the Government in power, because, after all, a great many people are moved entirely by selfish politics. I am glad to say that outside of this Chamber politics do not have much effect on the conduct of members; I have often wondered whether the House of Commons could not be conducted as the Committee on Banking and Commerce is conducted; but at the present time the House is conducted on party lines, and very bitterly sometimes. Referring again to the episode of the other evening, I must confess that it was very bitter politics that allowed the Government to prevent the leader of the Opposition, a man who should be honoured by everybody in this country, from making a speech at the time he should have been permitted to make it. I hope that I shall never have politics so instilled into my system as to be willing to endorse that sort of bitterness in politics.

Mr. LALOR: Stopped him for a minute and a half.

Mr. NESBITT: It does not matter; it is the principle. It does not matter any more than if I were a thief for only a minute, I would still be a thief. If I committed murder it would only be for a moment.

I wish to refer to the remarks of the hon. member for Portage la Prairie (Mr. Meighen) in reference to clause 2. Let me say that I believe that the hon. member for Portage la Prairie, if he had the putting into force of the rules would live up to what he said last evening. I have a great deal of respect for the word of the hon. member for Portage la Prairie, and also for his ideas on these things, and I believe that if he had the enforcement of the rules the probabilities are that he would live up to what he told us last evening, but that is not the condition. What I want to emphasize is that it leaves the Opposition members who have equal rights in this House with Government members, who are even paid as well, so far as I know, should not be subjected to anybody's whim or say so, we should have the absolute right to discuss these things so long as we think that discussion is beneficial to the people we are supposed to represent. I quite agree with my hon. friend from Portage la Prairie that we could discuss, under clause 39, questions of adjournment as we would want to discuss them. We could, of course, move for an adjournment under clause 39 and bring up any matters of importance in the interest of the country; I quite appreciate that; but it might be ruled that the matter was not important. Therefore, unless we created a scene and forced the question on the House—and I am one of those who think that these enforcements of our rights are bad for the dignity of our House and should not have to be resorted to any more than is necessary—this rule would be of no advantage to us.

Comparisons have been made between the application of the closure in the British House of Commons and the application of the new proposition here. I am like my hon. friend from Welland (Mr. German): I do not care what they do in the English House except in cases where we have no rule applicable, and the English practice is used as a precedent for the Government of this House. Mr. Speaker, may have to quote rules of other Houses to guide us on particular points; but, so far as our own rules are concerned, they were made for our guidance by our representatives, men with large parliamentary experience, and so long as the rules apply we should not go outside of those rules. But I do not care, as I said, what brought on the closure in England or what the closure means in England. I am only interested in what the closure means here and what the Government allege is a necessity of instituting closure rules here. The necessity, as has been pointed out by every speaker, arose out of the discussion on the Naval Bill, and the fact that the Government members thought we were taking too much time for the discussion of that measure. It arose from the fact that the Government made up their minds that they were going to pass the Naval Bill whether or no. They told us in so many words that they were going to pass it in some way, whether we wanted to or not. I do not think that that was a good disposition to start out with. I do not think myself that it was a good thing for members to stand up on the other side of the House and say: You have got to pass this measure.

Mr. BARNARD: Does the hon. member think that the Government ought to introduce Bills which they do not intend to pass?

Mr. NESBITT: I think the Government should introduce whatever legislation they think is to the benefit of the country but they should not take the position that simply because they introduce a Bill which they think is right everybody else should think it right.

Mr. LALOR: We do not object to your opposition.

Mr. NESBITT: You seem to be seriously objecting for now you are going to force us to pass it.

Mr. LALOR: Sure.

Mr. NESBITT: Sure, I will come to that in a minute or two, as I know what the hon. member for Portage la Prairie has said. That hon. gentleman told us that the reason why it should not be left in the hands of the Speaker was that the Speaker is appointed in a different way here from what he is in the Old Country, that he is a political partisan when he is appointed and, therefore, if he decided when the closure should be applied, either side of the House might find fault with his ruling. Although we may think that the Speaker was a political partisan before he was appointed, he is supposed to drop his partisanship when he gets into the Chair. Even when we become unruly in this House, to a certain extent, we still respect the Speaker. We do not respect the Speaker any more than we do any other hon. member of this House in so far as his ability is concerned, but we respect him because he is appointed to construe and enforce the rules and to uphold our authority. I have always had the greatest respect for the Speaker's rulings because I think he does give them as nearly as he humanly can in a fair manner. I make that remark with reference to any Speaker that I have had the honour to sit under. Clause 3 of the resolutions provides that:

> If such adjourned debate or postponed consideration shall not have been resumed or concluded before two of the clock in the morning, no member shall rise to speak after that hour.

I asked the hon. member for Portage la Prairie if he did not think the word 'resumed' should be changed, because if the debate did not happen to be resumed, the rule would apply. He replied that no ministry, except a crazy one, would dream of applying the rule unless the debate had been resumed. He went on to say that unless it were put in that way the Opposition could hold them up indefinitely. I have no objection to the spirit of the hon. gentleman's speech, but I do have an objection to the ground which he took that the Opposition are the people who held up everything, and who do everything wrong. He says that no ministry but a crazy ministry would do this or do that. But we have all the time in existence a ministry forcing our hands. The other evening, when this motion was introduced, we had a perfect sample of what the ministry would do. Supposing that the Naval Bill was being discussed this afternoon, as an illustration, and that the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Rogers) gave notice that there would be no adjournment after Monday night; the ordinary routine business would take up most of the day, in fact, it might take up all of the day, as very frequently happens in this House, and, with no intention on his part, we might be prevented from further discussing the measure. The edict has gone forth, it is like the laws of the Medes and Persians, and you have to stop the debate at two o'clock on Tuesday morning. It does not matter whether we have had a word of debate or not on the question; it has got to stop. I ask my hon. friends if that is a fair rule to apply to the debates in this House. Do they think they will forward their own interests, or the interests of the country, by that sort of closure? It is all right to tell us that it will not be applied, but we feel it in our bones that it will be. If we are discussing a question of expenditure, and that is what the House of Commons is primarily for, which the ministry are bound to put through, as they are determined to put through their Naval Bill, notwithstanding that the amount involved might be exorbitant or the purpose unnecessary, we are to be prevented from expressing our judgment upon the question although we are supposed to have just as good judgment on questions of this kind as hon. members on the other side of the House. We are, man for man, as capable as they are, at least we think we are and the people who elected us think we are, which is a great deal more important. There is no reason why we should not debate these questions because a question that cannot be debated is something that should not be passed by this Parliament. A question that cannot stand the utmost light of day should not be passed by this Parliament and the only way to shed the light of day upon it is by subjecting it to discussion. Hon. gentlemen opposite have compared conditions in England with those existing in this country. Such a comparison would be like comparing the Ontario Legislature with the Parliament of Canada. If anything takes place in the Legislature of Ontario, it is known next morning, or at the most two days afterwards, practically all over the province, except in the extreme northern part. We may have a discussion going on in this Parliament to-day but it will not reach the people in the remote parts of the country for a week and they will therefore not become acquainted with the subject that is under consideration. The Government say that the Opposition oppose this and that we, the majority of the members elected by the people, are not going to be prevented from the exercise of our free will by the Opposition. That is talking rather loudly, do you not think? Are you the great and only people and do you insist that you must absolutely have your free will on every question? This is a most important question for the people of the country and, if it is important, why not apply the remedy? The remedy is easy to apply and it is not very expensive, as I said in the first place. We can appeal to our masters and let them say whom they think is right and whom they think is wrong. Coming back to the question with regard to this word 'resumed,' I think it is a most dangerous principle to adopt. I venture to say that, when these rules go into force, there will be many times when members of the Opposition will have to complain that the discussion has not been resumed at the time of the application of the two o'clock rule and there will be no opportunity for further consideration of measures that may be very important. I know of no language which would fitly express my feeling in regard to this proposal; I do not know whether the French language is capable of conveying an idea of the enormity of trying to force a rule of this kind through the House. I believe that the people of this country will resent it. The Government will have to appeal to the people in the natural course of events before very long, and I do not believe that the memory of the people of this country will be so short as to forget that a Government that has been in power for less than two years forced on this House a measure for the purpose of stopping free discussion on a question that the people of this country are by no means a unit on. Hon. gentlemen opposite may think the people of Canada are a unit on this contribution of $35,000,000, but if they do they are hugely mistaken. I try to listen to what public opinion is outside of this House and I travel a good deal, and I can assure hon. gentlemen opposite that I believe that if an uninfluenced reference were made to the people there are more people in this country who would vote against the policy both of the Opposition and of the Government on the navy question than who would vote for either policy. I believe that as firmly as I am standing here to-day. Of course I do not believe that should be done, because I am just as strongly in favour of the Liberal naval policy to-day as I was in 1909. But, I do say that while there are many men in this country, and women too, who are willing to vote with the Government on this question, there are just as many men and women too, who think the Liberal policy is absolutely the right policy. On the other hand, I believe there are a great many people in Canada who believe both policies are absolutely wrong. I had two letters to-day, urging that this Parliament should pass a resolution endorsing the policy of the First Lord of the Admiralty that there should be no warship building done during the present year, and that we should appeal to the United States to join with us in stopping armament for the sake of the peace of the world. And, while that sentiment may not prevail to a great extent, it does prevail to a larger extent than you are willing to acknowledge; it prevails in a good many church organizations who pass resolutions and send them to the members of this House. The rule which is submitted to us apparently means that we might be moved into Supply on the estimates of the Minister of Customs—I am not saying anything against the Minister of Customs because he is a very genial gentleman who does the best he can I think—but we might be moved into Supply on the estimates of the Minister of Customs at twelve o'clock at night, as has often been done; we might pass a little item and the minister might immediately move that the committee rise and report progress, and if that should happen to be on Wednesday, then we could go into the Customs estimates again on Thursday and the closure rule would apply and there could be no discussion. But there is worse than that. The hon. member for Portage la Prairie (Mr. Meighen) told us that the consent of the House means the consent of the whole House, and I acknowledge that the Prime Minister told us he would be willing that we should insert that proviso in the resolution if we so desired. But in my experience in this House the consent of the House means the consent of the minister leading the House, who, when anyone asks for consent, nods his head and the thing is consented to.

Mr. SPEAKER: I have to correct the hon. gentleman in that regard; the question is put to the House, and if there is no objection, then the consent of the House is obtained.

Mr. NESBITT: Quite right, but when it comes down to the practice nobody interferes, and if the leader of the House does not object the thing goes and that is what it amounts to. An ordinary member like myself dare not get up and say anything on such an occasion; we would be supposed to drop dead immediately afterwards if we did. Even if it be so that you have to have the unanimous consent of the House, you can make it a farce by passing some small item the night before and then going into Supply the very next day on the same estimates and rush them through. I do not think it is for the good of the country, nor do I think it is even for the good of the Government that these estimates should be rushed through without discussion. The ministers may think they are the only ones who have the interest of the country at heart; they may think they are the only people capable of passing judgment on estimates, but I believe that if any hon. member is able to show that an estimate is not necessary, the minister who introduced it should be the first to withdraw it in the interests of the country. That is the idea I have of proper government. I believe that the Government have made a great mistake in imposing this closure measure on us. We have got along for forty-five years without the necessity for it, and why should we not continue? If the Government do not intend to present measures that are not for the welfare of the country, why should they want closure? Do they find any evidences of obstruction on the part of members of the Opposition in the committees where every question up is freely and fully discussed? If an hon. member on the Government side of the House introduces a Bill that is not in the interest of the country, and the members of the Opposition are able to show him that such is the case, I am ready to admit that nine times out of ten he is perfectly willing to withdraw the Bill or to have it so amended that it will be in the interest of the people. If that can be done in the committee, why can it not be done in this House?

Hon. gentlemen opposite, however, say to us: You must pass this Naval Bill. That is where the trouble is. We do not think this legislation is necessary, and we do not think it is right. What is more, the people have not been consulted. The Government will not tell us what their permanent policy is. They ask us to vote for a half measure. In the case of other Bills, they put all their cards on the table. No man introduces a Bill with something held back, with something behind the scenes; but the Bill tells exactly what is intended. This Bill does not say what is wanted. The Government say: We do not intend to delay it any more; we intend to pass it, and we are going to adopt this resolution for closure for the purpose of putting the Bill through. Someone has said that it would have been different if they had introduced this closure measure when they first came into power, and had introduced it in the regular course by referring it to a committee and having that committee adjust the rules if they were not satisfactory. They held us up for months when they were in opposition. We sat here day after day and night after night for four or five or six weary months away on into June and July, when it was so piping hot that you could hardly crawl up the walk. If the rules are not satisfactory, they should know. When we talk to hon. members opposite outside of the House in a good-humoured way, they will tell us that they practically forced us to the country. As a matter of fact, we were just as willing to go to the country as they were to force us. As the right hon. the leader of the Opposition says, we did not cry over it, we did not say: You have to pass this closure Bill. My hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) refused to listen to his newspaper advocates, or to his own supporters, and he has always advocated and stood for the right of free speech in this Parliament. I am sorry that the right hon. the leader of the Government, for whom I have great respect, should be forced into taking this position. The other evening, when I watched him very closely, he did not look as though he enjoyed it; and that other hon. gentleman, who was asked to stand up and stop my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) from speaking, also did not look as though he enjoyed it. I do not believe that any member of the Opposition could have been induced to stand up and make that motion in order to stop the speech of the leader of the Government, had the positions been reversed.

My hon. friends opposite, for all they know, may be making a scourge for their own backs. They cannot stay in power forever. I can picture in my mind what would happen if we should come back into power and apply these rules to them. You could not hold them in their seats with a chain; even with the door shut, you could hear them all the way to Woodstock, if that were to happen. I believe they really think that we Liberals do not deserve to be treated as they themselves expect to be treated. They are in power. My hon. friend from Portage la Prairie (Mr. Meighen) points out that we might do certain things in obstruction; but he fails to point out what the Government might do under the same circumstances. They are just as human as we are, and because they are in power, they are more likely than we are to encroach upon the rules, and they have done so throughout this session.

At six o'clock, House took recess.

After Recess.

House resumed at eight o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS.

SECOND READINGS.

Bill (No. 165), for the relief of Otto Clarence Peterson.—Mr. Nesbitt.

Bill (No. 166), for the relief of Archie Blaustein.—Mr. Fripp.

Bill (No. 167), for the relief of Harold Moss Hampson.—Mr. Kay.

Bill (No. 168), for the relief of Pierre St. Aubin.—Mr. Schaffner.

Bill (No. 169), for the relief of Alexander Zépherin Gonier.—Mr. Guthrie.

THE RULES OF THE HOUSE—LIMITATION OF DEBATE.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): Mr. Speaker, it is not very encouraging to hon. members on this side of the House who desire to express their views to the Government to address empty benches, as we too often have to do. When I look across the floor and see that the Prime Minister is not in his place, that his first lieutenant also is absent, and that with two exceptions there are no members of the ministry present, I cannot but feel that it is not creditable to the Administration that they are taking so little interest in what is being done in this House.

Mr. HAZEN: How about the Opposition?

Mr. SINCLAIR: I can excuse hon. gentlemen of the Opposition for not being present on such an occasion as this; but there can be no excuse for hon. gentlemen who are charged with the responsibility of the Administration being absent from their places at this time. You will recollect, Mr. Speaker, that during the last Parliament, or perhaps during the Parliament before that, when hon. gentlemen opposite occupied this side of the House, on one occasion at all events they refused to go on with the business of the House until a messenger was sent for the minister whose estimates were being considered and he was brouht to his place to listen to what was going on. It is a bad practice, allow me to say, on the part of the men who are in charge of the Government and in charge of the management of affairs in this House, that when they do give us the pleasure of listening to them on public questions, so often they immediately after disappear—we see their coat-tails going through the door behind you, without waiting to hear any reply to their speeches. It is our duty if we can to persuade them that the proposals they are bringing before Parliament are not to the advantage of the country. But how can we succeed if they do not do us the honour to listen? The danger is that this House will degenerate into a machine Parliament, and, Mr. Speaker, that may fairly be said to be the tendency of the rules that we are now asked to adopt. The Prime Minister, in the speech he made a few days ago told us that he had a majority of forty-five ready to vote at any time. 'Theirs not to reason why' they do not want any discussion; they are prepared to stand up and vote when the ministers want them to. You will notice how often it takes place that when an hon. gentleman on that side closes his address, those behind him disappear through the rear doors and leave the House. They are following the example of the front benchers. But they come back when the bell rings, and vote for their party, without listening to the arguments and many of them without taking any part in the discussion.

Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to allow this occasion to pass without expressing my views upon this important question. The constituency I have the honour to represent has always been interested in the great subject of free speech. The love of free speech was taught them by the public men who represented that constituency in former days. The value of free speech has been taught to the people of my constituency by such distinguished men as Hon. J. J. Marshall, Hon. Stewart Campbell, John A. Kirk, Otto S. Weekes, and last but not least the late brilliant and eloquent Lieutenant Governor of Nova Scotia, Hon D. C. Fraser. I do not want any better cry in my constituency than to go before my people and tell them—that this Government has introduced the closure to destroy free speech, and has endeavoured to force it through Parliament so that the majority can carry measures in this House with or without discussions just as it may seem best to themselves. That is the meaning, in my judgment, of the measure now before the House; it is an attempt to substitute the club for free discussion and intelligent argument. On behalf of my constituents, on my own behalf, and on behalf of the people of this country, I desire, before the vote is taken on this question, to enter my earnest protest. I spoke of my own constituency, but the same is true of the whole province from which I come. I suppose there is no part of Canada where the right of free speech is deemed to be of greater value than in the province of Nova Scotia. One of the most interesting and important incidents in the history of that province is directly connected with this question: I refer to the prosecution of the Hon. Joseph Howe. In those early days, back in the thirties, Nova Scotia was governed by what was known at that time as the Family Compact. We had no free government; the administration of the province was in the hands of a ring, something like, I suppose, from what I can learn, the province of Manitoba is to-day. It could scarcely be called a free country. The ring that governed Nova Scotia at that time, and especially the city of Halifax, was corrupt—rotten to the core—but everybody was afraid to attack it. Joseph Howe was a young journalist, writing for a newspaper in Halifax, and he ventured to expose these gentlemen in the press. He showed them up in their true light, and his letter created a great sensation in the city of Halifax and throughout the province of Nova Scotia. The first step that the jobbing Tory justices took was to prosecute Howe for criminal libel. Under the law as it stood at that time, there appeared to be no defence for him; he consulted some of the leading lawyers of the province and they assured him that he would certainly be convicted. They refused to take up the case for him, and the consequence was that he had to fight his own battle. He borrowed some books from the lawyers in the city of Halifax, read up the libel law, and appeared in court as his own attorney. He fought the case himself, and, after a very exciting trial, during which there was delivered one of the best addresses ever made to a jury in that province, Howe was acquitted. He was carried from the courthouse on the shoulders of the people, and there was great rejoicing throughout the province and in the city of Halifax. They gathered around his house that night and cheered him, and he made a speech from the steps in which he told the people to go home and keep the peace, and to teach their children the names of the twelve men who had preserved the right of free speech and the liberty of the press. By that gallant fight for free speech, Howe endeared himself to every Nova Scotian. It was the first blow struck in our province for the responsible government which followed, and in that struggle he played a very prominent part. The names of the twelve jurymen were in time forgotten, but the memory of Joseph Howe himself, Nova Scotia's champion of free speech, is known and cherished and honoured around every fireside in the province. We are proud that we produced a man of that kind, who is known all through his history in Nova Scotia as the tribune of the people. We were proud of him as a Nova Scotian; but the pride we felt that such a man was produced in our little province by the sea is tempered, to some extent, with humility when we realize that our province also produced the author of what will be know in our future history as the gag law.

There has been no call for this extreme measure; there has been no mandate for it from the people of this country. I was somewhat surprised the other day when the hon. the Minister of Justice, speaking from his place in this House, made the extraordinary statement that prior to the last election, in the manifesto that was issued by the Prime Minister to the people of this country, he had expressed himself as being in favour of the closure. In order that there may be no doubt about the exact words used by my hon. friend, I will read them to the House. They will be found on page 7624 of 'Hansard,' and are as follows:

> Here is a house that is comparatively new. People may say what they like about it, but you have only to look at the manifesto which the right hon. the Prime Minister addressed to the people of Canada during the last election, to see that here is a house that was elected on the announcement that if the right hon. gentleman were returned to power he would do precisely the thing that this measure proposes to do.

He must have been referring to this measure of closure, for that was the measure of which he was speaking when he made that statement. I have in my desk the four manifestos issued by the Prime Minister prior to the election, and, if any hon. gentleman in this House wishes to see them and examine them for himself, I will be very glad that he should do so. I have looked through these manifestos very carefully and I find that there is in them not one word in regard to a measure of this kind. The Prime Minister on that occasion dealt with a great many questions. He issued a manifesto regarding a programme of ship-building in the city of Halifax; he issued another regarding civil service reform. He advocated practically everything from the preservation of the Empire to free pills for the fishermen of the maritime provinces. But, among all the matters mentioned in the various manifestos issued by the Prime Minister on that occasion, there is not a single word relating to closure. I wish, therefore, to put my hon. friend the Minister of Justice right by stating that he was entirely mistaken if he entertained the idea that the Prime Minister had any mandate from the people of this country to bring in the measure which is now under consideration.

My hon. friend the Minister of Public Works also made a certain statement, not that this Government had a mandate to pass this measure, but he led this House to believe that there was a clamour in the country for closure, and that the people of Canada were asking for it. This is what he said:

> In tones louder than thunder comes a demand to this Government from all parts of Canada, irrespective of party, race or creed, that we must not allow the needs of Canada and of this Empire to be delayed or to be sacrificed to gratify the ambition of hon. gentlemen opposite.

This was practically the first indication we had from the Government benches that closure was to be introduced; my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works made the extraordinary statement that the demand for this drastic measure comes from somewhere, in tones of thunder. It is curious, if the call for this legislation is so loud as that, that nobody else has heard it but himself. Is it not extraordinary that no petitions have been brought to this House in regard to it? I have been informed that there is not a single petition on file in the department of the Minister of Public Works or any other department of the Government relating to this question, and nobody has asked for it. Have the farmers of Canada asked for it? They are an organized institution in the West and you would expect that if they wanted it they would send here and ask for it. When the farmers of the West want anything they know how to ask for it, that has been their history in the past. But is there any demand from that quarter for this drastic measure? Has any demand come from the workingmen of this country, from the labour unions, from the fishermen? Have they been heard from? Have the lumbermen of Canada been heard from or have the miners? I asked if the graingrowers had been heard from. Apparently nobody has been heard from, but still the Minister of Public Works tells us that in tones louder than thunder this demand has come from somewhere. It is a curious thing that nobody has been able to hear this thunder except the minister himself. What about the press of this country? Is there any great demand for this step in the press of Canada? I mean in the decent, independent press of Canada. I know that there are some party hacks in Canada, I do not like to mention names but I refer to such papers as will go the whole distances to support the Government whether they are right or wrong. I am sorry to say that there are a few journals of that kind in Canada who favour this measure, but they are very few. The independent newspapers of Canada are not in favour of this measure in fact they are speaking out in very strong language against it. The newspapers that people read, that people believe in, papers that the independent man reads and studies, they are the papers from which we ought to take our views on questions of this kind; and in that section of the press there has been no demand for this measure and there has been nothing but condemnation of it from day to day. Of course, these party papers to which I have referred like the organ of the Government in Halifax, the Halifax Herald, the Montreal Star, the Toronto News, would defend anything at all that was done by this Government; they would do anything right or wrong to keep the Conservative party in power. This question of closure has been discussed in the British papers and extracts have been published in the public press recently in regard to the operation of the closure in England and the bad effects that have come from it there. This ought to be a warning to the people of Canada when they are now asked to adopt this measure. Let me read an extract from the Ottawa Citizen:

> During the votes on estimates in Britain many millions of pounds are lumped together and passed en bloc by means of the closure affording the Opposition no opportunity of criticising particular items. And the system has rebounded upon the heads of those responsible for its introduction.

The closure was devised in Westminster by the Tories. This may be disputed; it was introduced as a temporary measure by Gladstone, but it was put on the standing orders and made effective later on by the Conservatives.

> The closure was devised at Westminster by the Tories to overcome Irish obstruction. It is now being used by the Liberals to force home rule for Ireland through Parliament. Imagine the chagrin of good protectionists in Canada to some day find a western group forcing free trade through Parliament by means of the closure. It will not do for Canada. There are too many racial and religious problems requiring wide-open debate. To employ the closure for a measure inspired in Toronto might cause a civil war.
>
> It is to be hoped that every progressive citizen will strengthen the hands of Premier

Borden, who, seeing the danger, certainly does not wish to introduce any closure.

This extract is from the Ottawa Citizen of the 3rd of April. Let me also give you a short extract which I find has been written by the editor of the Encyclopedia Britannica referring to this same matter:

The closure has much modified the character of the debates on such motions as used to be taken up when feelings were hot. In other aspects the most noticeable thing in the recent evolution of the House of Commons has been its steady loss of power as an assembly in face of the control of the government and party leaders.

That is what will happen in Canada; the House of Commons in Great Britain has been regarded by means of the closure and the House of Commons in Canada will become a pliant institution in the hands of machine politicians if this measure is allowed to be placed on the statute book. There is a hint in that article for some hon. gentlemen opposite. Think of the feelings of the hon. member for Brantford (Mr. Cockshutt) if on some future occasion a group of low tariff men should control this House and use this guillotine to put a measure through the House to place agricultural implements on the free list. Or think of the feelings of the hon. member for St. Antoine division of Montreal (Mr. Ames) if that same group at some future day should use this guillotine in order to put boots and shoes on the free list. That is what is in store for hon. gentlemen opposite if they insist on placing this measure among the rules of this House. I have stated that there is no demand in the country for this measure and there is no need for it as far as Parliament is concerned. It has been drawn to the attention of the House that during the whole forty-six years of Canada's history there have been only four occasions when closure was wanted even by the majority. Of course the minority never want it, but there have been just four occasions in forty-six years in which even the majority thought that it would be a good thing if they had closure so that they could compel the Opposition to accept their measures. If you look at those four occasions you will find that it was better that we did not have closure. It would not have been a good thing to coerce Manitoba with closure. It would not have been a good thing to put the Franchise Bill through in the shape in which it was first introduced to the House by a method of this kind. The Manitoba Election Lists was the third Bill. It was better that that should be compromised or accepted by both parties. Then we come to the question of reciprocity; if we had closure two years ago what would have happened? According to the theory of hon. gentlemen opposite it would have been a very serious matter. According to my view, it would have been a good thing, but reciprocity would have been forced through this House without any appeal to to the people if we had had a closure to force it through. The Parliament that was then in session would possibly be in session yet. The Parliament of 1908 would not have expired until the autumn of the present year. Hon. gentlemen would still have been sitting on this side of the House in place of being in power if we had had closure in 1911. But we did not have it and they were able to compel an appeal to the people. The late Government, on that occasion, lost the support of the people, not, I think, by a fair appeal, put by racial appeals and by a great many improper appeals. At all events, they lost the majority and we had to move over to this side of the House. These are the only occasions on which the side representing the majority wished to have a measure of this kind adopted in Canada.

But I wish to draw attention to another phase of this question and that is that every one of the four measures that I have referred to related to legislation. There has not been an occasion in this Parliament when it was necessary to have closure in order to put Supply through. I quite admit that under the old rules votes of Supply might be used in order to prevent legislation, but the four cases in which closure seems to have been required or asked for by the majority in this country, were cases of legislation. Therefore, the needs of Parliament, if you admit that there are needs, could be met by a rule that would enable you to put legislation through this House and thus our rights in regard to Supply, in regard to the criticism of corruption, in regard to censure and other matters the right to do which is so precious to the people would be maintained. Why is it that this has been made an excuse to include not only legislation, which is the only thing you really want, but to include everything that can be done in this Parliament? If you are able to put these legislative measures through, which is all you require, you will have no trouble in regard to Supply.

In this discussion the other day the right hon. Prime Minister made the statement that the rules that are being proposed on this occasion are more elastic and liberal than the rules that are at present in force in England. That statement has been met and contradicted by hon. gentlemen on this side of the House. I was surprised that such a statement should come from the Prime Minister. Any hon. gentleman who will read the proposal that we have here, and read the English rules, will be convinced that, there is a vast difference in favour of the English rules. I would not have the slightest hesitation in making my choice between the English rules and the rules that are proposed on this occasion. For example, under the English rules, it is necessary to give twenty days at least for the discussion of Supply. That is a fair proposal, but under these rules that we are now asked to adopt, is there any such provision? It may be that the Government will give us twenty days, but I am speaking now of what the Government can do under the rules and not of what they may or will do. I am quite well aware that a government may interpret these rules fairly and that they may not bring the closure down on every occasion that they could do it. It would be a very extraordinary government that would do that, but when I am asked to discuss the power that is given to the Government by these rules, I have not the slightest hesitation in preferring the English rules to the rules that are now proposed. There is nothing in these rules by which the Opposition can claim twenty days for the discussion of the estimates. As I understand these rules, resolutions may be bracketed together. They apply not only to a resolution but to resolutions. I am referring now to clause No. 3 which says:

(3) Immediately before the Order of the Day for resuming an adjourned debate is called, or if the House be in Committee of the Whole, or of Supply, or of Ways and Means, any minister of the Crown who, standing in his place, shall have given notice at a previous sitting of his intention so to do, may move that the debate shall not be further adjourned, or that the further consideration of any resolution or resolutions, clause or clauses, section or sections, preamble or preambles, title or titles, shall be the first business of the committee, and shall not further be postponed; and in either case such question shall be decided without debate or amendment; and if the same shall be resolved in the affirmative, no member shall thereafter speak more than once, or longer than twenty minutes, in any such adjourned debate; or, if in committee, on any such resolution, clause, section, preamble or title; and if such adjourned debate or postponed consideration shall not have been resumed or concluded before two of the clock in the morning, no member shall rise to speak after that hour, but all such questions as must be decided in order to conclude such adjourned debate or postponed consideration, shall be decided forthwith.

That is the clause to which I so strongly object. My hon. friend from Portage la Prairie made the statement last night that there must be a debate before closure can be applied. That is by inference, because the clause says that the minister may move that the debate be adjourned or that it cease. It does not say that there must be a debate, but it infers that there is a debate, and of course there must be some kind of a debate before it can cease. But that debate may be very short. Who is it that decides as to the length of the debate? That is in the discretion of the minister who is leading the House at the time. It may be just as short as he chooses to make it. I suppose that, if one man speaks on one side and another man speaks on the other side, that can be called, in law, a debate, and I am taking now the very worst case. In that case the minister who is leading the House appears to have the right to give notice that the debate shall not be further adjourned; the consequence is that the debate must adjourn at two o'clock on the following morning and that the speeches up to that time can only be of twenty minutes duration. Suppose that I am correct in my statement that resolutions can be grouped together and that, for example, the Minister of Public Works is putting through his resolutions; he has a large number of them, and if resolutions can be grouped together, without restrictions, not only the resolutions of the Department of Public Works, but all resolutions can be grouped. If you look at the main estimates for the present year you will find that there are 367 resolutions. Suppose you put them all together and a motion is made by the Minister of Public Works on Monday night that the debate ceases on the following day; the consequence is that the whole of the estimates are put through with only two days' discussion. That is an extreme case, but it appears to be permitted under this rule. It is a most extraordinary power to give to any Government.

Then if you take the twenty-minute speeches which are allowed the second day, and analyze the proposition, what does it amount to? The House meets at three o'clock in the afternoon and ends at two the next morning, which gives just nine hours, deducting the two hours for dinner, we have 540 minutes, which will give the right to make twenty-seven speeches of twenty minutes each; and twenty-seven speeches divided amongst 220 members is about one speech in ten, so that each member of the Opposition would have one chance in ten of getting the floor. I presume some of that time would be occupied by members on the Government side, and indeed if they were so disposed the members supporting the Government might make speeches for the greater part of the day and in this way take up the time. Is it a proper rule to make in this House that only one man in ten is to be heard in regard to an important measure, and when he is heard, that he shall have only twenty minutes to speak? And yet the Prime Minister tells us, and some other hon. gentlemen have had the temerity to tell us that this proposal is even more liberal than the rule in force in the British House of Commons.

During this debate quotations have been made from the speeches of eminent men who have given their views on this question. I do not purpose making citations, but a little incident happened in this House in the year 1908 when the junior member for Halifax (Mr. Maclean) made a proposal to amend the rules. Mr. Maclean's complaint was that it often happened that when a motion was made to go into Committee of Supply, some members brought forward without notice an important matter, and that as the members of the House were not aware that such a motion was to be made, misunderstanding often arose. The hon. member (Mr. Maclean) advocated that it would be a proper amendment to make to the rules that there should be two days' notice of such amendments on going into Supply. On that occasion speeches were made by some of the leading men in the House and amongst others you yourself (Mr. Speaker) spoke on the question. There is no man in Canada better posted in parliamentary usage than the hon. gentleman who occupies the Chair of this House. He is an old parliamentarian having the respect of everybody in this country, and he has had a very long experience as a member of this House, and his views on a matter of this kind are worth perhaps more than the views of any other man in Canada. I wish to give a short extract from what Mr. Speaker said on that occasion, so that the Minister of Public Works, who is now leading the House, will inform the Prime Minister that when this important question was dealt with some two or three years ago, some of his leading supporters placed themselves on record directly against closure in any shape or form. This is what Mr. Speaker said:

> It is one of the valuable rights——

You understand that Mr. Maclean was proposing a very slight amendment to the effect that two days notice should be given of an amendment to the motion to go into Supply; he was not taking away the right of any man to speak or to make a motion but he claimed it was a reasonable thing to give two days' notice. This was what was said on that occasion by the present Speaker of this House:

> It is one of the valuable rights of the House, and one that should not be given up, that any member may bring before the House any grievance before supplies are voted. This is one of the rights which no free parliament would ever desire to give up.

That is the language used by you, Mr. Speaker, on that occasion. The Prime Minister also spoke and he put himself on record as directly opposed to the method he is now adopting. When that simple proposal was made by Mr. Maclean, of Halifax, who then represented Lunenburg, the Prime Minister said it should not be brought forward in the manner in which the hon. gentleman brought it forward, but it should be brought forward in the regular way by referring it to a committee of the House, so that we might have the benefit of the deliberations of the committee before any change was made in the rule. These are the words of Mr. Borden spoken on the 12th of February, 1908, page 2984, 'Hansard':

> Mr. R. L. Borden (Carleton, Ont.): It rather takes the House by surprise to have a proposal of this kind made. The rules of the House are not lightly dealt with in this way. The universal practice is that so important a matter as an important amendment to the rules of the House should be submitted in the first place to a committee, considered by that committee and reported to the House, when the House would take it into consideration.

This was the method the Prime Minister thought ought to have been adopted when he sat in Opposition:

> We revised the rules of the House two years ago, and in the opinion of the House there was no occasion at that time for any such far-reaching amendment as is now proposed.

That was the simple amendment that two day's notice should be given of an amendment on the motion for Supply and Mr. Borden at that time was shocked at the far-reaching nature of it:

> It would prevent the discussion of any grievance to go into Committee of Supply unless two days' notice were previously put upon the Order Paper.

You may have to wait a very long time under this rule before you can bring up a question going into Supply if the ministry choose to enforce the proposed rules:

> That would be an abnegation of the practice that has prevailed for five hundred years in the British House of Commons and that has prevailed in this House of Commons ever since we have had parliamentary institutions in this country. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Maclean) speaks of members of the House being taken by surprise, but they need not be taken very much by surprise if they perform their duties and attend here.

At that time the Prime Minister was very insistent that the members ought to be in their places attending to their duties:

> Surely matters of public interest can be discussed in this House without two days' notice on the Order Paper. The proposal would cut down to a very serious extent the privileges of this House, and I venture to say that in the end it would not be found to shorten the length of the session. I understand the hon. gentleman (Mr. Maclean) to refer to some English rule, but so far as the English practice is concerned, they go indefinitely further than I hope we shall ever be obliged to go in this country. If we carried out the English practice to the full, we would adopt the English system of closure, under which the passage of the estimates would be reduced to very little more than a farce.

That was the opinion of the Prime Minister only a few years ago, when he was sitting on the Opposition benches. Then he goes on to say:

Often a sum of £10,000,000 is voted by the Commons of Great Britain after a discussion of not more than two hours' duration. We do not require any restriction of that kind in Canada, and it would be a most unfortunate thing to attempt to restrict discussion as the hon. member for Lunenburg proposes. There has been no very great evil attendant upon the practice of this House since Confederation. Hon. gentlemen who desire to bring a matter of public importance to the House usually give notice in advance, that is certainly done when there is intention to move an amendment to the motion that the House go into Committee of Supply. I have pressed upon hon. gentlemen on this side of the House the extreme importance of giving the Government notice in advance of any amendment to Supply; and apart from that hon. gentlemen have, from time to time given notice in advance of their intention to discuss important subject questions. I decidedly object to the passing of this motion; first, because according to the usual order of procedure such a proposal should be referred to a committee, and, in the second place because it does not seem to me that there is any abuse of the present practice which would justify us in making such a very important amendment to the rules.

These are the words of the Prime Minister, and this is the same gentleman who was the principal actor in the scene which took place in this House on Wednesday afternoon last. Other hon. gentlemen opposite at that time occupied seats on this side of the House and great fears were expressed by some of them as to what would happen if any amendments were made to the rules. At that time my hon. friend from South York (Mr. Maclean), spoke as follows:

I trust that this committee will in no way interfere with the liberties of Parliament, and especially with the liberties of individual members of this House. In the United States to-day we see that the popular Chamber has lost its liberties, and has passed under the domination of a Speaker who is now known as a Czar, and consequently that Chamber, which should have been the model Chamber throughout the world, has lost its prestige and its power, that power having passed to another body. I do not wish to see a repetition of that history in this country.

My hon. friend from South York was referring to the fact that the House of Representatives in Washington had been degraded by the introduction of the closure, and that since then in that Chamber they had not produced any eminent men like the Quinceys, the Everetts, the Adamses, the Websters, the Henry Clays, and the great men who graced that Chamber in the olden days. This change which has been brought about, by which the guillotine is brought down, has made Congress a sort of machine institution. It is pitiable to think that the same thing is going to happen in Canada. A certain reverence is growing up in this country for the House of Commons. The eyes of all Canada are directed towards this place. As a people we are proud of our history and have erected monuments on the Plains of Abraham, on the Field of Chateauguay and at the Fortress of Lunenburg, to commemorate the brave deeds of days past. After all, this Chamber is to the people of Canada a more sacred spot than any battlefield. It is the place where the destiny of this country is decided, where the character of the country is shaped and where the government of the country is conducted. Anything that is done to degrade it, to lessen its influence or to turn it into a place where machine politicians shall have full sway, anything that is done to take away the rights of the members and transfer them to a group of men called the Cabinet will bring about a very deplorable change in the House of Commons and totally destroy the respect held for it in the country.

My hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Foster) also spoke on that occasion and said:

I for one have no idea at all of submitting without protest to any of the well-defined liberties of this House as a parliamentary body being infringed upon.

Just imagine the feelings of my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce when he comes back from the Antipodes and finds that this closure, which he denounced so strongly two or three years ago has come to pass, and that his colleagues are responsible for it.

Another hon. gentleman, the gallant Minister of Militia (Mr. Hughes), also delivered himself on that occasion. I shall only quote a very short extract from his speech, but he came out also as one of the champions of free speech. This is what he said:

I trust that in amending these rules there will be no attempt to curtail the liberty of debate, or to hamper members from discussing in a proper manner the views they may wish to utter concerning the welfare of the country.

I do not know whether my hon friend the Minister of Militia will vote for this proposal or not. I am afraid he will. He generally votes with his party. He has not yet expressed himself in regard to it but, as he held such strong views as that two years ago, I hope that he will hesitate before giving his assent to the measure that is now before the House.

The fears of these hon. gentlemen at that time were soothed and quieted by the speech of my right hon. leader (Sir Wilfrid Laurier.) He assured them that there was no danger. After all those speeches had been delivered and after these gentlemen had expressed their fears that the committee, that was then to assemble to revise the rules of this House, might go too far, my right hon. friend told them very plainly that they need not be afraid; that he was in favour of free speech. He was referring to a speech made by His Honour, the Speaker. This is what he said:

> I can assure my hon. friend (Dr. Sproule) that the Government has no intention of using the majority now supporting it in Parliament to curtail any of the rights and privileges of members of this Parliament. We prize them as highly on this side as hon. gentlemen do on the other side.

I am proud to think that the present leader of the Opposition made the same statement then that he makes to-day. That is the proof that he is not a machine politician, that he is a real statesman of whom every man in Canada has a right to be proud. He gives forth the same lofty views when he sits on the treasury benches as he does when he sits on the Opposition side of the House. There is no difference. On that occasion, sitting on the treasury benches, with a strong majority behind him, he said that hon. gentlemen need have no fear, that he was in favour of free speech; that he would never stand for the introduction of the closure. He makes the same statement to-day; but how does his attitude on that occasion and this occasion compare with that of the right hon. gentleman who leads the House to-day? I have read to you what he said three years ago; you saw what he did on Wednesday afternoon, and you can draw your own conclusions. The country will draw its own conclusions too.

My hon. friend from Portage la Prairie (Mr. Meighen) made a very interesting speech last night, and in the course of that speech he referred to the remarks made by my hon. friend from Richmond (Mr. Kyte). He congratulated my hon. friend from Richmond that he had risen so high above his old methods that he had undertaken to discuss a matter of public importance in this House,—meaning, I suppose, that the questions that my hon. friend from Richmond had been discussing in this House were somewhat unworthy of him. Now, I desire to protest against the attitude of the hon. member for Portage la Prairie. I submit that my hon. friend from Richmond performed a very proper duty when he brought these questions to the notice of this House and the country. That is one of the functions of the Opposition. Are we to be told that if the Government so far forgets the dignity that ought to characterize it as to appoint a criminal to a position of public trust, and afterwards pardon him and release him from jail that he may occupy that position, an hon. member of this House is not at liberty to rise in his place and draw the attention of the House and the country to that fact without being told that it is unworthy of him to do it? I submit it was unworthy of the hon. member for Portage la Prairie to make such references to my hon. friend from Richmond. But the hon. member for Portage la Prairie is generally regarded as a very fair gentleman and he discussed the question before the House, so far as I could judge, in a very fair and reasonable manner. I do not know whether he satisfied hon. gentlemen opposite, because in my judgment he gave away the whole case. He told us very plainly that more than one vote could be put through at a time, and he told us that length of debate would depend on the goodwill of the Government. He told us that the club could be used after twenty-four hours, and while he said the Government would not do it, yet he admitted that under these rules, if the Government is tyrannical, they can shut off discussion. That is the meaning of the speech of my hon. friend if one reads it carefully. It was a very frank utterance, and I think it stated the case very fairly. But he made one statement which I desire to criticise. It is as follows:

> I affirm, and I stand approved by the records of every charge made in this House during years gone by, that the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe will have just the same liberty to make his motion after these rules go through as he had before, and the motion will be subject to discussion in the same way; all discussion, of course, being subject to the general rule that there is power to terminate it—it cannot be endless. What will such a motion come under? It comes under routine proceedings.

There is the whole question. The hon. gentleman can make his motion, certainly —we can make any kind of motion when the occasion comes; but it is the discussion that counts on questions of that kind and not the formal motion, and the hon. member for Portage la Prairie practically admits that discussion will last just as long as the Government chooses to allow it, but no longer. That is the very crux of the question. It is the right of free speech, the right to discuss these questions as long as they ought to be discussed that we are claiming in this House; and when the hon. member for Portage la Prairie tells us that we have the same right as before to make a motion, I agree with him; but that is not the question that is troubling me, it is the discussion of the question after the motion is made. If my hon. friend from St. Hyacinthe had simply risen and made his motion and had not been allowed to carry on a discussion, and other hon. gentlemen around him were not allowed to carry on a discussion, he would have made a very poor showing and a very poor case before the country. Consequently when my hon. friend admits that the discussion is only as long as the Government chooses to allow it to be, he gives away the whole case and completely justifies our objection to this proposal. Apart from that, when he says that we have the same rights as we had before, he forgot that on Thursdays and Fridays we have no rights at all. At the present time, if a motion to go into Supply is made on Thursday or Friday, every hon. gentleman knows he has the right to bring forward his grievances, and discuss them as long as he chooses. This right is taken away. It would be very easy for a Government that wishes to be tyrannical to devote Thursdays and Friday to Supply and to deal with legislation and other questions on other days, so that if that method were adopted—and it is a possibility that it might be adopted—there would be no chance of making a motion such as my hon. friend from St. Hyacinthe moved.

The Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty) is of course the legal authority of this House, and what he said on this question should go, with most of us who know so much less about these questions than he does. That hon. gentleman practically told us the other night that we had no right to complain when the rules were applied to us. He was surprised at the leader of the Opposition complaining because a certain rule was applied to him. It is an indication of what we may expect from hon. gentlemen opposite, when the legal guardian of the rights of the members of this House makes a statement of that kind. In case he does not remember what he said, permit me to read it to him. These are words of the Minister of Justice on that occasion, referring to the right hon. leader of the Opposition:

> The right hon. gentleman throughout his speech was full of eloquent references to his 'never whining'—that is not an expression that I would have chosen, but he has chosen to boast that he never whines. And yet what was the opening of his speech, if it was not a complaint—as I would call it, whining as he would call it—because the rules of this House as they now stand were applied to him this afternoon?

Let me give an example. Suppose that an important Bill were before the House, regarded as very bad legislation by the members sitting on this side. Notice is given after one day's discussion, and then twenty-minute speeches begin. Only nine hours is allowed for discussion—twenty-seven speeches of twenty minutes each—and then the guillotine falls. We should be told by the Minister of Justice that we have no right to complain if the rules of the House are strictly applied to us. That is the reason we object to making rules of the House to be placed in the hands of hon. gentlemen opposite who have given us every indication of what they would do if they had the power.

Now, I listened with a great deal of interest to the very able speech delivered the other day by the Minister of Finance (Mr. White), in which he informed us that these three dreadnoughts that are proposed to be given to Great Britain will have a profound moral effect on the other side of the water. It has already been brought to the attention of the House that the effect will be ruined by the application of the gag in order to secure the passage of the Bill. Imagine the feeling of a high-minded Englishman when he is told that these ships were obtained by binding the representatives of half the people hand and foot, and gagging them so that they could not take part in the discussion, and thus passing a measure over their prostrate bodies, and calling it a 'free gift' to the Old Country from the Dominion of Canada. Would that, Sir, have a profound moral effect in the Old Country, or would it not rather tend to result in an opposite condition?

Many hints have been thrown out as to who is the author of this measure, but no one seems to be able to supply the necessary information. I wonder if the statements that have been made in the newspapers, and the hints that have been thrown out in this House, that my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works is really the author of this measure, are true? If they are, I am not surprised that he is unwilling to tell. I think it had better be kept a secret. We have heard of the Manitoba Wonder, but the kind of potato that grows in Manitoba will not flourish in Ottawa; it is not adapted to this soil. I wish to remind the hon. minister—because I know he is a man who studies the Scriptures—of that other citation which he did not quote the other night: 'With what measure ye mete, it shall be measured to you again.'

There is in this country an important society known as the Loyal Orange Order. I wonder what they think of this measure? We have had no expression of opinion from hon. gentlemen of this House who belong to that order as to whether or not they approve of this measure. I have no doubt that you, Mr. Speaker, have often listened on the 12th of July to those eloquent discourses which are heard on such occasions in favour of free speech and an open Bible. These, I am told, are the watchwords of the Orange Order: 'Free speech and an open Bible.' I do not happen to belong to the order myself, but I referred to its organ the Orange Sentinal the other day, and I found on the corner, printed in prominent letters, the words: 'Our politics—special privileges to none; equal rights to all.' If the gentlemen who do belong to the Orange Order will live up to that doctrine, they will have to vote against the resolution now before the House, because a measure of this kind can never be described as extending equal rights to all.

I object to this measure, Mr. Speaker, for a great many reasons, and I shall mention a few as follows:

1. Because the proposed rules are tyrannical, and every free man hates tyranny.

2. Because no rules should be approved by this House that prevent fair discussion of grievances on going into Supply.

3. Because, under these rules in the hands of unscrupulous ministers, the whole estimates of a year could be voted through without explanation, and with only a few hours' discussion.

4. Because by the adoption of these rules the rights and privileges of the House of Commons will be transferred to the Government.

5. Because the House of Commons is the guardian of the liberties of the Canadian people, and should remain faithful to its trust.

6. Because these proposals place too much power in the hands of the ministry.

7. Because, under the proposed rules arbitrary and unscrupulous ministers can convert Parliament into an instrument for sanctioning and legislating corruption and wrong-doing.

8. Because closure should not be resorted to for the purpose of embarking on a new system of naval defence before the proposal has been submitted to the people at the polls.

9. Because the effect of these rules will be to place the treasury at the disposal of machine politicians, check exposure, and destroy the best safeguard the people now have against dishonest administration.

Mr. G. H. BOIVIN (Shefford): In rising to discuss the resolution submitted to the House by the right hon. leader of the Government, I wish to assure you, Mr. Speaker, that, although the twenty-minute rule is not yet in force, my remarks will be brief, because I do not consider myself to be an authority upon the use or the abuse of the rules of this House. I have been a member of this House for only a session and a half, and, to use a press gallery expression, I do not wish to take up the time of the House to measure the length, the breadth and the depth of these amendments, and explain exactly what they mean; neither do I wish to occupy two hours and forty-five minutes in an attempt to prove to this House that an hon. member can say all that he has to say on any given subject in twenty minutes, as the hon. member for Portage la Prairie (Mr. Meighen) did last night. I do, however, wish to be heard, perhaps for the last time in a free parliament, as the representative of 27,000 free subjects residing in the county of Shefford; I wish to be heard perhaps for the last time in a free parliament as the representative of the French Canadian minority in the Dominion of Canada, and that French Canadian minority in the province of Quebec, which is loyal to its King and its adopted Mother Country, that French Canadian minority ready to shed its blood in the maintenance of British supremacy in the country it calls its own, that French Canadian majority ready to give fair play and justice to the English-speaking minority in the province of Quebec, but jealous of the rights and privileges granted to our forefathers by the treaty of Paris and to our province of Quebec by the British North America Act of 1867.

I do not wish to compare the resolution introduced by the right hon. Prime Minister with the rules existing at the present time in the British House of Commons. I do not pretend to be in a position, Mr. Speaker, to decide whether these rules are more drastic or less drastic than those employed in the British House of Commons at the present time, but I can say that, when the closure was introduced in the British House, it did not meet with the approval of every Britisher in England—far from it. I read in the Citizen of Tuesday, April 8, an article entitled The Story of the Closure. I do not wish to read it in its entirety, but I do wish to cite this one sentence:

> Eminent Conservatives severely attacked the proposal to place an instrument like the closure in the hands of the Speaker, who would sooner or later inevitably be dragged down to the level of a partisan. An Irish member in an eloquent speech claimed that closure would rob the House of three historical pillars: the high impartiality of the Speaker, the readiness of the majority to allow the minority an influence on the despatch of business, and the readiness of the minority finally to acquiesce in the decision of the majority.

These words, which apply to closure in the British House of Commons, could very well be applied to the closure which is being imposed upon the Canadian House of Commons to-day—to the resolution introduced by the right hon. Prime Minister in such a high-handed manner that the hon. leader of the Opposition, the most courteous statesman that Canada has ever known, was precluded from moving an amendment to the said resolution.

Redlich, in his authoritative work upon Parliamentary Procedure, commenting upon closure introduced in the British Parliament, says:

> The 'parliamentary guillotine' was then set up for a second time in the House, a desperate expedient for carrying out the inflexible will of the majority. However serious the political circumstances were which drove the Salisbury Cabinet to adopt this plan, there can be no doubt that their procedure was completely out of harmony with the historic character of parliamentary government.

If these remarks are true as applied to parliamentary procedure in England, how much more true are they as applied to parliamentary procedure in Canada, because we must not forget that Canada is not England. The day will come, when owing to its greater area and greater natural resources, Canada will be greater than England in both wealth and population. When that day does come, the rules then or now in force in the mother of parliaments may better suit our needs than the rules we have to-day. But, Mr. Speaker, England attained her greatness and won her reputation with rules similar to those we now have and why should we not wait until we have attained her greatness and her glory, before amending those rules? I say that the rules in Canada should not be amended because Canada is a land of minorities. Take any religion, take any class of citizens, take the descendants of any nationality in Canada to-day, and you will find that they are in the minority. As a minority they are obliged to rely upon the majority in the House of Commons for their rights and privileges. As a representative of the French Canadian minority I am proud to say that until to-day we have had ample opportunity to put forward in this Parliament what we consider our rights and privileges, and these rights and privileges have always been respected. What will happen when that right of free speech is taken away from us, when we can no longer expose to you and to the majority what we consider our rights and privileges, I cannot foretell. What applies to the French Canadian minority in Canada applies to every other minority. Take the British born in Canada to-day and put the rest of Canada against them and you will find that they are in a minority. Take the labourers of Canada to-day, place the remainder of Canada against them, and you will find that the labourers, who are to-day represented in this House by one sole representative, are in a minority. Take the manufacturers, who, perhaps are at the back of this closure, they, if taken individually or taken as a group, compared with the rest of the population of Canada are in a minority. Take the Roman Catholics of Canada to-day; numerous as they are, they have what they consider to be their just rights which they wish to maintain, but they are in a minority. Take the great Orange Order of Canada, with all its strength, power and prestige, and place against them the mass of the people of Canada who do not agree with them in politics and religion, and you will find that the great Orange Order is in a minority. This is a country of minorities with the possible exception of the poor farmers. The farmers of Canada are in a majority, but are they exercising the rights and receiving the privileges of a majority? They are considered in this Parliament as a minority, and they have been treated as a minority. The railway, manufacturing and banking magnates are always seeking privileges from Parliament and urging compensation for the great sacrifices as they call them, which they have made in building up Canada. This Parliament should consider the real sacrifices that are being made daily, without murmur, by thousands and tens of thousands of men and women in log cabins on the western edge of civilization, many miles from railways, schools or churches, rearing families and developing the country in the face of physical and spiritual and social deprivation, of whose hardihood a grateful nation might well afford some recognition.

In introducing this resolution the other day the Prime Minister spoke as follows:

> Mr. Speaker, the resolution which I have the honour to move this afternoon touches a very important subject, because it must be apparent to all hon. gentlemen in this House that unless we have such rules as will permit the reasonable transaction of public business, and prescribe the ordinary and proper conduct of debate, Parliament must fail in its chief function, and the proceedings of this House are liable to be brought into disrepute and contempt. No one is more ready than I to acknowledge that liberty of speech and freedom of debate must be preserved, but I venture respectfully to suggest that these privileges must be observed and maintained under such conditions that they shall not be allowed to degenerate into license and obstruction.

What does that mean? It means that the Prime Minister in introducing this closure resolution did so because he considered himself face to face with obstruction on this side of the House. Was he really in the face of obstruction? I claim that he was not. I claim that the amendment is unnecessary because only four times since Confederation has there been anything like obstruction in this House of Commons. In 1896 and 1911 that obstruction was justified by the verdict given by the people of Canada in the general elections which immediately followed. In 1885 it was justified by Sir John Macdonald amending the legislation proposed. In 1908 it was justified by Sir Wilfrid Laurier withdrawing the measure opposed, and to-day the Prime Minister has two courses open to him; he can drop the Bill or he can appeal to the people. The better course would be to drop the Bill. We are not asking for power, we are not fighting merely for a chance to go before the electorate of Canada; we are fighting upon what we consider to be a vital principle, fighting for the autonomy of Canada. We are fighting to keep here in Canada $35,000,000 which the Prime Minister wishes to send to the mother country. That is all we are fighting for and we will be just as well pleased if we attain that end by the Prime Minister dropping the Bill as we would be if we attained that end by going to the country and receiving a favourable verdict from the people of Canada. His proper course would be to drop the Bill. I say that advisedly, I say that because, as I have already had occasion to remark in this House, he has not a majority of the people of Canada behind him when he presents this Bill. When he brought in this Naval Aid Bill he did not do it as the representative of the majority of the people of Canada.

An hon. MEMBER: Certainly he did.

Mr. BOIVIN: I was told that once before, 'certainly he did'—and I told the hon. gentleman who used that expression that the next time I spoke about that matter in the House of Commons I would demonstrate to him, figures in hand, that the Prime Minister had not a majority of the people of Canada behind him, and I propose to do it now. Let us take the Parliamentary Guide published by Major Ernest Chambers, Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod. In the edition of 1912, at page 276, you will find that the popular vote in the general election of 1911, counting the vote polled for Mr. Maclean in the Conservative column and that for Mr. Verville in the Liberal column was as follows:

Popular vote:
Conservative..	669,557
Liberal..	625,096
Majority	44,461

But you will agree with me that the names represented in the columns which total up to that Conservative majority of 44,461 include a great number of members and candidates who sought election pledged to oppose the Naval Aid Bill or the Laurier Naval Service Act, pledged to oppose any aid to Great Britain without first submitting the question to the people by plebiscite.

Let us first take the list of those hon. gentlemen who though counted as Conservatives, felt obliged in order to be re-elected to vote against the Naval Aid Bill both in the resolution and second reading stage. They received the following number of votes:

Achim, Labelle..	2,902
Barrette, Berthier..	1,638
Bellemare, Maskinongé..	1,507
Boulay, Rimouski..	4,179
Guilbault, Joliette	2,239
Lamarche, Nicolet..	2,805
Mondou, Yamaska..	1,870
Total..	17,140

Let us now take the names of those hon. members who were elected, pledged against all naval aid to Great Britain, at least without a plebiscite upon the question. The votes received by them were as follows:

Blondin, Champlain..	3,811
Coderre, Hochelaga..	7,178
Forget, Charlevoix..	2,020
Forget, Montmorency..	1,359
Gauthier, Gaspé..	2,470
Girard, Chicoutimi..	3,798
Lavallée, Bellechasse	1,742
Lespérance, Montmagny..	1,653
Nantel, Terrebonne..	2,727
Paquet, L'Islet	1,578

Mr. SPEAKER: I would like to understand how the hon. gentleman intends connecting this with the resolution before the House.

Mr. BOIVIN: The way I intend to connect this with the resolution before the House is that I consider hon. members on the Opposition side should be allowed the right and privilege of answering speeches made by hon. members on the Government side. The right hon. the Prime Minister, in introducing the resolution, said that he was introducing this resolution owing to the obstruction which was at the present time going on in the House against the Naval Aid Bill. My idea is to prove, what I advanced a few moments ago, that the Prime Minister was not justified in calling this obstruction and that, if it were obstruction, it was obstruction which was justified as much as the obstruction was in 1911, and even more so. He also said that the majority should rule. The majority should rule, as I understand it, by the popular vote of the people. That is what I wish to prove and I am almost through with my citation.

Mr. SPEAKER: If that is the hon. member's aim, as he says, of course, I recognize that he is not out of order.

Mr. BOIVIN: I wish to thank you, Mr Speaker, for your ruling in this matter. I certainly do not wish to transgress the rules of the House, and I was about to ask the indulgence of the House if I was infringing the rules. I continue the reading of the list of those who pledged against all naval aid to Great Britain without a plebiscite upon the question:

Pelletier, Quebec county	2,295
Rainville, Chambly-Verchères	2,712
Sévigny, Dorchester	2,506
Monk, Jacques Cartier	5,782
Total	41,631

Mr. SHARPE (North Ontario): Will the hon. gentleman tell the House how many Liberals were elected in Quebec on the policy of spending $35,000,000?

Mr. BOIVIN: Not one of the Liberals of Quebec was elected upon the jingo policy of spending $35,000,000. The Liberals were elected upon the policy of building a Canadian navy, equipped and manned in Canada, and that is the policy we stand by to-day.

Let us now take the number of votes counted by Major Chambers in the Conservative column, but given by the free electors of the different ridings in Canada to defeated candidates, pledged to support the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk) and oppose all naval aid to Great Britain until the people had been consulted by means of a plebiscite. The votes they received were as follows:

I will hand this list to 'Hansard' with the permission of the House.

Mr. SPEAKER: It would not be printed; it is not customary to print lists unless they are read.

Mr. BOIVIN: Then, I shall read the list, which is as follows:

T. Marcile, Bagot	1,750
Cloutier, Beauce	3,459
Mousseau, Bonaventure	1,395
Gilbert, Drummond-Arthabaska	3,533
Potvin, Kamouraska	1,754
Monette, Laprairie-Napierville	1,626
Morin, L'Assomption	1,209
Léonard, Laval	2,449
Bégin, Lévis	1,971
Laliberté, Lotbinière	1,520
Villeneuve, Maisonneuve	9,331
Huard, Mégantic	2,619
Pichel, Missisquoi	1,800
Marion, Montcalm	1,374
Asselin, St. James	3,154
Massé, St. Mary's	2,912
Grenier, Portneuf	2,105
Quesnel, Prescott	1,220
Hone, Quebec Centre	1,529
Vanasse, Richelieu	1,639
Dubreuil, Rouville	1,189
Guimont, St. Hyacinthe	2,155
Lareau, St. Jean, Iberville	729
Davidson, Shefford	2,245
Lortie, Soulanges	905
Labelle, Témiscouata	2,701
Normand, Three Rivers and St. Maurice	3,146
McDonald, Vaudreuil	1,130
Cousineau, Wright	2,819
Total	65,268

Mr. ROGERS: My hon. friend has overlooked the hon. member for Argenteuil (Mr. Perley).

Mr. BOIVIN.

Mr. BOIVIN: Yes, I have overlooked the hon. member for Argenteuil, and I have overlooked all honourable members and all candidates, Mr. Bergeron of Beauharnois included, who opposed honourable members on this side of the House, who ran as straight Conservative candidates in favour of the Borden policy at the last general election. Let us add these totals together:

Conservatives who voted against Naval Aid Act represent		17,140
Conservatives who in order to remain faithful to their pledges, should have voted against measure, represent		41,631
Conservative candidates defeated in last general elections who, if elected, were pledged to follow the policy of Monk and Bourassa		65,268
		124,039
Conservatives	669,557
Deduct	124,039
	545,518
Liberals	626,096
Add	124,039
	749,135
Against Bill: total votes		749,135
For Bill: total votes		545,518
Majority against Bill		203,617

The right hon. the Prime Minister looked for his authority to certain Liberal newspapers published in 1911. Why does he not read the Liberal press of to-day, and not only the Liberal press but some of the most faithful and best of the Conservative organs of the present time, and he will see that the people of Canada do not want to lose the privilege of free debate. The right hon. the Prime Minister referred also to statements made by certain ex-ministers of the Crown during and prior to the campaign of 1911. He cited extracts from the speeches of Hon. Mr. Fielding, Hon. Mr. Paterson and Hon. Mr. Aylesworth. He cited extracts from speeches delivered by the Hon. Mr. Fisher as follows:

I will quote three separate utterances of the then Minister of Agriculture, the Hon. Sydney Fisher. Speaking at Waterloo, Que., on August 1, 1911, he said:

'Now, if we are returned to power, we will pass reciprocity and we will also pass a measure changing the rules so that the business of the country may go briskly forward, without obstruction. It is only right that it should be so. Full investigation we believe in, but empty obstruction is a drag on the country.'

Speaking again, as reported in the Montreal Herald, on August 19, 1911, at Magog, Que., he said:

'So long as a small minority or any group can take up the time of Parliament in order to hear themselves talk, it is impossible to avoid waste of time——

I would like hon. gentlemen, and especially my hon. friends on the other side of the House, to note the language of Mr. Fisher that follows:

—'and I give my pledge that, if the Laurier Government is returned again, the rules of the House will be changed. I consider present conditions inimical to the proper conduct of public business.'

Speaking again at Knowlton, Que., August 21, 1911, as reported in the Montreal Herald, the Hon. Sydney Fisher said:

'The minister stated that it was the intention of the Government, should it be returned, to so change the rules of the House, that such obstruction would in future be impossible.'

The Prime Minister rejoices over these statements and uses them as proof that the people of Canada want closure. The right hon. gentleman should not forget that these speeches did not foreshadow such drastic amendments to the rules as he has now introduced without, as I said before, giving Canada's greatest statesman a chance to offer a single amendment. He should not forget that these speeches and these opinions were placed before the people justly and fairly during an election campaign; he should not forget that perhaps because of these speeches, the Laurier government was not returned to power; he should not forget that the Hon. Mr. Paterson, the Hon. Mr. Fisher, the Hon. Mr. Aylesworth, and the Hon. Mr. Fielding, are not in the House to-day, and he should interpret these speeches and the defeat of those who made them as a condemnation of closure as well as a condemnation of the reciprocity agreement which these same hon. gentlemen advocated at the same time. Why does he not look for inspiration to the utterances of hon. gentlemen who spoke in this House in 1910 and who since making those speeches, have been returned to this House and now occupy envied and honourable positions therein. The hon. member for Guysborough (Mr. Sinclair) read from 'Hansard' of 1909-10 the words pronounced in this House by Mr. W. F. Maclean, member for South York, Mr. Foster, member for North Toronto and Mr. Hughes, member for Victoria-Haliburton, against closure. Let it be remembered, the hon. member for North Toronto was returned to this House and became Minister of Trade and Commerce and that the hon. member for Victoria-Haliburton was returned and became Minister of Militia and Defence, while those who were in favour of closure were defeated. An opinion which will be, I am sure, received with much respect by gentlemen sitting on both sides of this House, and which was not quoted by my hon. friend from Guysborough, is the opinion of the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule) in 1909, when Sir Wilfrid Laurier moved that a committee be appointetd to revise the rules of this House. The hon. member for East Grey has gone through an election since then; he was elected a member of this House and he now occupies the honoured and enviable position of Speaker of the Canadian House of Commons. This is what the Hon. Mr. Sproule said in 1909:

Rumours have been prevalent for some time past in the government press that the Government intended to revise the rules of the House at an early date, and to introduce what is known as the closure. I would like to ask the First Minister if that is the intention in this revision of the rules. I would like to say that so far as I can judge the temper of parliamentarians generally, they regard the freedom of debate as one of the dearest rights of the representatives of the people, and if any attempt is made under the guise of amending the rules to prevent the freest discussion of all public questions, I can only say that in my judgment the Government will invite a good deal of trouble.

Mr. CARVELL: What did Sir Wilfrid Laurier answer to that?

Mr. BOIVIN: It might not be amiss to cite it again. Sir Wilfrid Laurier answered:

I can assure my hon. friend (Dr. Sproule) that the Government has no intention of using the majority now supporting it in Parliament to curtail any of the rights and privileges of members of this Parliament. We prize them as highly on this side as hon. members do on the other side.

That was the answer given by the right hon. the leader of the Government in 1909, (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), and that was the policy advocated by my right hon. leader in 1913. I might also add that the Right Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier was a candidate in two counties. He was returned in one county by acclamation, and the other county he took from the Conservatives with a handsome majority.

Mr. LEMIEUX: There was no previous question.

Mr. BOIVIN: I do not think the closure should be introduced in Canada at the present time, with or without the 'previous question,' because conditions here are not the same as in England. We are brought up in different spheres; we have attended different schools; we have inherited from our forefathers different qualities and different tendencies, but I believe that we are all, French Canadians and English Canadians, Tories, Grits and even Nationalists, imbued with love for our country and a desire to make that country great, grand and prosperous, which will enable us for many years to come to meet upon the floor of this House of Commons and to discuss without closure and without gag of any kind the best means to attain our common end and the object of our common desire.

Mr. Speaker, let me, in concluding, tell the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Rogers), who boasts of his ability to win elections, that it will take more than Manitoba methods to keep the people of Canada in general, and the electors of the county of Shefford in particular, from following and supporting Sir Wilfrid Laurier, that veteran statesman who takes Heaven as his witness that he would rather stand here to-day, defeated in opposition by an appeal to the people, than stand over there in office by the power of the gag.

On motion of Mr. Oliver, the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Rogers, the House adjourned at 10 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

MONDAY, April 14, 1913.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at three o'clock.

OFFICERS OF THE HOUSE—SALARY INCREASES.

Right Hon. R. L. BORDEN (Prime Minister), moved:

That the recommendation of the hon. the Speaker, laid on the table of the House on the 7th April instant, relative to the yearly increase in salary to certain officers and clerks and employees of the House, including the clerks in the Joint Distribution Office of the House of Commons and Senate, pursuant to section 37 of the Civil Service Amendment Act, 1908, be approved.

Motion agreed to.

FIRST READING.

Bill No. 170, respecting certain patents of The Standard Paint Company of Canada, Limited.—Mr. Sharpe (North Ontario).

QUESTIONS.

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

MAIL ROBBERIES.

*Mr. McRAE:

1. How many prosecutions for mail robberies have taken place in Canada during the years 1911 and 1912?
2. Were any of said mail robberies due to defective locks on mail bags?

Mr. PELLETIER:

1. During the years 1911 and 1912, there were twenty-two prosecutions for mail robberies. Many more robberies took place which could not be detected.
2. Many robberies took place in which the question as to the condition of the locks on the mail bags is not raised. It is easily understood that when a lock can be opened and replaced without the bag itself being damaged and without leaving any trace, it is difficult to locate the guilty party.

RURAL MAIL DELIVERY BOXES.

*Mr. LEMIEUX:

1. What is the price paid by the Post Office Department for each rural mail delivery box?
2. At what price is it sold to each patron?

Mr. PELLETIER: The price paid for each box is $3. It is sold to each patron for the same amount, but as many of these boxes were paid for by the previous Government before they were needed, the department has lost the difference.

*Mr. LEMIEUX:

Were the rural mail delivery boxes used by the Post Office Department manufactured in Canada or the United States?

Mr. PELLETIER: Partly in the United States and partly in Canada.

WICKHAM WEST POST OFFICE.

*Mr. LEMIEUX:

1. Has the Post Office Department received any complaints concerning the post office at Wickham West, Quebec?
2. If so, what is the nature of the complaints?
3. Has the assistant postmaster been sworn in?

Mr. PELLETIER:

1. Since the appointment of Mr. Evariste Roberge to the postmastership of Wickham West on the 26th October last, no complaints concerning the management of the office have been received.
2. Answered by No. 1.
3. Steps are being taken to swear in the postmaster's wife, who has succeded a Miss Robins as assistant.

ERINVILLE POSTMASTER.

Mr. SINCLAIR:

1. Has William McKinnon, postmaster at Erinville, Guysborough county, N.S., been dismissed?
2. If so, on whose recommendation?
3. Was there an investigation held? If so, what are the names of the witnesses examined?
4. If the said William McKinnon has been dismissed, who has been appointed in his place?

Mr. PELLETIER:

1 and 2. No. The postmaster of Erinville was not dismissed. The Erinville post office was closed and two post offices opened instead, one at East Erinville and one at West Erinville, to improve the service of the district.

3 and 4. See answers to Nos. 1 and 2.

MAIL BAG LOCKS.

*Mr. CRUISE:

How many locks and keys for mail bags are used by the Post Office Department of the United States?

Mr. PELLETIER: This department is not in possession of this information, which would have to be obtained through the regular official channels of communication from the post office authorities in Washington, D.C., U.S.A.

*Mr. WARNOCK:

How many locks and keys for mail bags are used by the Post Office Department of the United Kingdom?

Mr. PELLETIER: This department is not in possession of this information, which would have to be obtained through the regular official channels of communication from the post office authorities in London, England.

Mr. CARVELL:

Did Lorenzo Grenier, of Quebec, take out, in 1911, a patent or make application for a patent, for padlocks for mail bags? If so, on what date?

Mr. BURRELL: No. On the 30th of December, 1911, Lorenzo Grenier filed an application jointly with P. V. Faucher and Aimé Dion, each to hold a third interest. The patent issued on the 17th of September, 1912, under number 142,823. On the 29th of October, 1912, all interest in the patent was assigned to the Ontario Equipment Company, in whose name the patent now stands.

*Mr. CARVELL:

1. On or about the 23rd September, 1912, did the Post Office Department give an order for 99,000 springs to improve the padlocks in use for the mail bags?
2. If so, to whom was the order given?
3. What was the price of each of these springs?
4. How many have been delivered to the department?
5. Was this order cancelled on or about the 2nd April, 1913? If so, for what reasons?

Mr. PELLETIER: No order has been given for springs to improve the padlocks.

*Mr. MARTIN (St. Mary's, Montreal):

1. Is Dr. Faucher, whose name has been mentioned in the matter of the new padlock sold to the Post Office Department, one of the members of the medical profession of Quebec?
2. What experience has he had in the padlock trade?

Mr. PELLETIER: The Post Office Department has no contract with Dr. Faucher, and, consequently, does not pay him anything. The hon. member who puts the question should communicate with Dr. Faucher himself for such information as he may desire to get.

*Mr. LANCTOT:

1. Is Aime Dion, whose name has been mentioned in the matter of the new padlocks sold to the Post Office Department, one of the members of the Quebec Bar?
2. If so, what experience has he had in the padlock trade?

Mr. PELLETIER: The Post Office Department has no contract with Mr. Aimé Dion, and, consequently, does not pay him anything. The hon. member who puts the question should communicate with Mr. Dion himself for such information as he may desire to get.

*Mr. WHITE (Victoria, Alberta):

Have any of the new locks and keys for mail bags been sent to any of the Post Offices in the Yukon? If so, when and where?

Mr. PELLETIER: This House has been already informed that no new locks and keys have been as yet received from the contractor.

*Mr. GAUVREAU:

1. What is the Capital Stock of the Ontario Equipment Company?
2. How much is subscribed, and how much paid up?

Mr. PELLETIER: According to information received from the provincial secretary's department at Toronto, the capital stock of the Ontario Equipment Company, is one hundred thousand ($100,000) dollars, of which fifty-one thousand ($51,000) dollars have been subscribed and paid.

*Mr. CARVELL:

1. Have any bags for mail purposes been purchased since 21st October, 1911, from the Ontario Equipment Company? If so, how many?
2. Were any tenders asked?

Mr. PELLETIER: No.

*Mr. CARVELL:

Are the padlocks purchased by the Post Office Department since October, 1911, of the same model as those purchased before that date, or are they improved padlocks?

Mr. PELLETIER: No padlocks of the new pattern have been purchased since October, 1911.

*Mr. MACDONALD:

1. Is the padlock for mail bags, specified in the contract entered into with the Ontario Equipment Company the old padlock improved?
2. If so, in what does the improvement consist?

Mr. PELLETIER:

1. Yes.
2. A check is introduced, which is intended to prevent the forcing open of the lock by other means than the use of the key.

*Mr. KYTE:

Has any comparison been made by the Post Office Department between locks for mail bags used in Canada, the United Kingdom and the United States? If so, when?

Mr. PELLETIER: No.

PICTOU-WEST RIVER MAIL SERVICE.

Mr. MACDONALD:

1. Has any change been made in the carrying of the mail between Pictou and West River, county of Pictou?
2. If so, what was the change, and for what reasons was it made?
3. Who is the new contractor?
4. Were any tenders called for since January 1, 1913?
5. What amount is being paid for the service now?
6. On whose recommendation was the change made?

Mr. PELLETIER: On a report of the superintendent, rural mail delivery, the department is arranging for the establishing of rural mail service in the district served by the Pictou and West River mail route. Rural mail routes starting from West River station and Salt Springs will supersede a portion of the present route. Tenders have been invited for the new services and the contracts have been awarded, but they have not yet been executed. As soon as this is done, the department will give the information.

MILLVILLE-DALHOUSIE MOUNTAIN MAIL SERVICE.

Mr. MACDONALD:

1. When was the change made in the mail contract between Millville and Dalhousie Mountain, county of Pictou?
2. For what reason was it made?
3. Who is the new contractor?
4. How much is paid him?
5. What was paid the old contractor?
6. On whose recommendation was the change made?

Mr. PELLETIER: A clause in the contract of G. McIntosh provided for its termination on three months' notice being given. This has been done and the contract was terminated on the 30th September, 1912. A new contract was made with John R. Ross at the price paid to McIntosh, viz., $160 per annum.

MONTREAL MAIL DELIVERIES.

Mr. MARCIL:

1. Does the Postmaster General consider as being satisfactory the postal service by which a registered letter bearing a special delivery stamp and the frank of a member of this House, mailed in the post office of the House of Commons at noon on Saturday, the 5th of April last, and addressed to a residence on St. Denis street, in the heart of the city of Montreal, is only delivered the following morning at ten o'clock; and the case of another letter sent from the Commons post office on the previous Saturday, and also bearing a special delivery stamp, and which being addressed to a member of this House at his residence on Sherbrooke street, Notre Dame de Grace ward, Montreal, is only delivered the following Monday morning?
2. Will the Minister inquire into this special delivery system with Montreal and see what improvement can be made in it?

Mr. PELLETIER:

1. From such inquiry as could be made in the absence of definite particulars, it was ascertained that a letter, which was apparently the one posted at noon on Saturday, the 5th of April, was received at the Ottawa post office, under registration, No. 1762, in the mail which left the House of Commons post office at 4.20 p.m. Had this letter not been registered it would have been despatched on train leaving for Montreal at 5 p.m., but as a registered despatch is not made up for that train, it was due for despatch on Canadian Pacific railway train No. 6 which on that date did not reach Ottawa until midnight. Consequently the letter was made up in a direct despatch from Ottawa for Montreal and Toronto railway post office east and sent to destination by the next outgoing mail, via Brockville and Ottawa train leaving Ottawa at 6.45. This mail would not be due at Montreal until about 7 o'clock Sunday morning. It is not the duty of post offices to deliver mail matter on Sunday, but to accommodate the public, 'special delivery' letters are sent out when possible on Sunday and this appears to have been done in connection with this letter. As the House of Commons post office is not under the jurisdiction of the Post Office Department, it cannot be stated why the letter was not sent out from the House of Commons post office to the Ottawa post office in the despatch which was sent to the Ottawa post office at 2.35 p.m., on the date of mailing.

As regards the letter posted on the previous Saturday, also bearing a 'special delivery' stamp, it is understood that it was not registered and cannot, therefore, be traced, unless definite particulars are given.

2. The department is not in receipt of complaints showing that there is a defect in the 'special delivery' system at Montreal. To make suitable inquiry on this point, it would be necessary that definite particulars be given by furnishing the envelope in question.

DALHOUSIE STEAM SERVICE.

Mr. MARCIL:

1. Has a contract been entered into by the Department of Trade and Commerce and any party for a steam service between Dalhousie, N.B., and Niguasha, St. Omer and Carleton, Quebec, or any other point in Quebec, or is one in contemplation?
2. Has a contract been entered into for a steam service between Bathurst and Petit Rocher, N.B., and Bonaventure, Quebec, or any other point in Bonaventure county, or is one in contemplation?

Mr. PERLEY:

1. A contract has been entered into for a service between Gaspé Basin, Dalhousie and Campbellton, calling at Carleton and a number of other points in Quebec. This is the only subsidized service contemplated from Dalhousie at present.
2. No. No such service is contemplated at present.

NEW CARLISLE PUBLIC BUILDING.

Mr. MARCIL:

1. Has a site been acquired for a public building at New Carlisle, Quebec?
2. If so, where is it situated, what is its area, from whom was it purchased, and at what price?
3. If a site has not been acquired, does the Government intend obtaining one?
4. Did the municipal council of New Carlisle offer such a site, or was it suggested that one should be obtained from the Quebec Government?
5. Does the Government intend erecting a public building at New Carlisle, and what steps have been taken to that end?

Mr. ROGERS:

1 and 2. No.
3. Matter not finally disposed of.
4. (a) Yes; (b) No.
5. Matter not finally disposed of.

8. If not, what is the annual rent paid and for how many years has this rent been paid?
9. How much has been the cost for the repairs made to this latter post office?

Mr. PELLETIER:

1. Mr. H. M. Côté, postmaster at Candiac, not Montcalm, tendered his resignation on the 15th August, 1912, as he considered the salary of the office insufficient, and the post office was transferred, by direction of the Postmaster General, to his successor, on the 3rd September, 1912.
2. They amounted to $135.14 per annum.
3. The postmaster provided accommodation for the post office at his own expense.
4. The department does not know who his assistant was as the postmaster furnished and paid for such assistance as he required.
5. Mr. J. A. Delisle, on the 3rd September, 1912, salary $500 and the usual commission on money order and savings bank business.
6. The department has no specific information on this point. The postmaster is required to provide whatever clerical assistance is needed at his own cost.
7 and 8. The building is owned or rented by the postmaster, who is granted a rent allowance of $50 per annum in addition to his salary.
9. The postmaster paid for his own fittings.

MOOSEJAW POST OFFICE INVESTIGATIONS.

Mr. TURRIFF:

1. Is Maurice LeBlanc, of Bonaventure, Quebec, in the employ of the Department of Public Works, in what capacity, and at what salary?
2. When was the appointment made, and on whose recommendation?
3. Is it temporory or permanent?

Mr. ROGERS:

1. (a) Yes; (b) general foreman for the county of Bonaventure; (c) $100 per month.
2. (a) In May, 1912; (b) Mr. J. A. Mousseau.
3. Temporary.

WORKS OVERSEER IN BONAVENTURE.

Mr. MARCIL:

1. Has the Department of Public Works a general overseer, superintendent or foreman of works in Bonaventure county?
2. If so, what is his name, residence, salary and duties, and on whose recommendation was the appointment made and when?
3. If the department has not now such an official, did it have one within the last two years? If so, who was he and on whose recommendation was he appointed?
4. If the service of such an official has been dispensed with, what was the reason therefor, and on whose recommendation was the change made?

Mr. ROGERS:

1. Yes.
2. (a) Maurice LeBlanc; (b) Rivière Bonaventure; (c) 100 per month; (d) to superintend works under construction and to instruct other foremen; (e) Mr. J. A. Mousseau; (f) in May, 1912.

STE. VICTOIRE POST OFFICE.

Mr. CARDIN moved:

For a copy of all correspondence telegrams, complaints, affidavits, reports, recommendations, requests, certificates and other documents relating to the dismissal of Mademoiselle Paul Hus, as postmistress of the parish of Ste. Victoire, county of Richelieu and the appointment of Mr. Paul Bardier, of the same place, as postmaster.

Mr. PELLETIER: I have no objection to the motion, only this lady has not been dismissed, as I understand it. She never was postmistress.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Is she in office yet?

Mr. PELLETIER: She never was there; her father was.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: It is a mistake.

Mr. PELLETIER: I have no objection to my hon. friend amending his motion. I know what he means, but he will not achieve his object through this.

Motion stands.

THE IMPERIAL CONFERENCE OF 1911.

On the Orders of the Day being called:

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Mr. Speaker, I would like to call the attention of my right hon. friend the Prime Minister (Mr. Borden) to the speech delivered by him on the 7th of April. He made a statement which I did not notice at the time, or my attention was probably called elsewhere; but I could not help noticing it when I read it. It will be found at page 7414 of 'Hansard.' My right hon. friend said:

> And that brings me to another consideration—the right hon. gentleman is concerned about the representation of Canada on the Imperial Defence Committee. As I understand it, the right hon. gentleman himself agreed that Canada ought to be represented on the Imperial Defence Committee,—

Which, of course, is very true. (Reading):

> —and further than that—although I did not know it until last summer, the matter was kept entirely confidential at the time, for what reasons I do not know—the right hon. gentleman agreed to establish a defence committee in Canada in close co-relation with that Imperial Defence Committee.

That is perfectly true; we agreed to that at the last Imperial conference. (Reading):

> No announcement of that kind was made to Parliament by the right hon. gentleman at the time we might have expected the announcement to be made, and it remained for the Colonial Secretary a few weeks ago to make that belated announcement, as the right hon. gentleman had not seen fit to do so.

That is the point to which I desire to draw the attention of my right hon. friend. I do not know what he means when he says that I did not bring that matter to the attention of the House. May I ask him what he refers to?

Mr. BORDEN: I did not know that my right hon. friend had brought it to the attention of the House. If he can show that he did so, I shall be very glad to make the correction.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Yes, it was brought to the attention of the House on the 28th of July. On the 27th of July I laid on the table of the House the report of the conference, and it was shown in the report that, on the 20th of June, which was the last day of the conference, Mr. Harcourt made this declaration:

Then there is the report of the Committee of the Imperial conference convened to discuss defence, military matters, at the War Office. That is before the conference now in a paper. Assuming that that report is approved, it is proposed that the précis of today and the proceedings of the conference when published should contain the following statement on the matter: 'The conference received and approved the report of the Committee on Military Defence, which had held two sittings at the War Office, under the chairmanships of the Chief of the Imperial General Staff'—and the report will be included in the papers of the conference.

The committee had sat on the 17th of June. I was not a member of it, but I knew the tenor of the report. It was not ready for the conference on the 20th of June, but we approved of it, knowing the contents. Then, Mr. Pearce, Minister of Defence for Australia, made this statement:

Mr. Pearce here referred to the question of conferences which were taking place at the Admiralty with the representatives of the Dominion of Canada and of the Commonwealth of Australia with regard to the status of the dominions' naval forces and their co-operation with the Royal navy, and it was agreed, on the suggestion of Mr. Harcourt, that a memorandum embodying the conclusions reached should be incorporated among the papers published in connection with the Imperial conference.

On the 27th of July, I brought down the report of the conference. I was at that time in consultation with the War Office to obtain permission to bring down the other two papers regarding military and naval defence, which were not included in the report, and on the 28th of July I made this statement to the House:

In laying upon the table of the House yesterday the report of the Imperial conference, I stated that the rules or regulations adopted by the Committee of Defence, which were to be put in the volume, had not yet been printed, but had been received by His Excellency to be laid on the table of the House, and are upon the tables of the different parliaments interested. Yesterday we made a strong representation to the Home Office that these papers should be brought down at once to the attention of the Canadian Parliament and the Canadian people. His Excellency the Governor General received the following communication from the Colonial Office:

Mr. Harcourt to Lord Grey.

London 27th July, 1911.

My telegram of to-day—on further consideration, in view of your telegram of 26th July 'Confidential,' and of 27th July 'most urgent,'—I am prepared to acquiesce in immediate publication of both papers in Canada and I have informed Fisher that in deference to Sir Wilfrid Laurier's wishes I have felt it right to do so. Papers will be published here on Monday.

Harcourt.

Mr. BORDEN: At what page of 'Hansard' will that be found?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: At page 10468 of 'Hansard,' 1911. On that same day I laid on the table of the House the report of the Committee on Imperial Defence convened to discuss matters in the War Office and also the other papers in regard to naval defence. I moved that they be printed, and they have been in this blue-book ever since My right hon. friend was altogether misinformed when he made that statement. I saw it again and again in the Conservative papers, and did not pay any attention to it; but when it came from the Prime Minister, I thought it my duty to correct the false impression which had been created.

Mr. BORDEN: I was alluding to the statement in regard to the establishment of a defence committee in Canada. I will look at the documents to which my right hon. friend has directed my attention, and, if there is any correction to be made, I shall be most happy to make it.

MARTIN LANIGAN DISMISSAL.

Mr. EMMERSON: This being Monday, formerly private members' day, it would seem to me to be an opportune time to take up that oft-repeated question of the return of the papers relating to the dismissal of Martin Lanigan, postmaster at Rexton, in Kent county, New Brunswick. The order appears in public bills and orders, No. 29. I observe that the hon. member for Kent (Mr. Robidoux) is here. The hon. Postmaster General (Mr. Pelletier) is also here, and as these somewhat unusual circumstances now synchronise, perhaps my right hon. friend the Prime Minister (Mr. Borden) will permit the motion to go through. I simply want to get the return of the papers, and I would like to have this order resurrected. It has been impounded for some time in public bills and orders, and, perhaps if we had the papers, they might throw a little light on the subject.

Mr. ROBIDOUX: I have no objection whatever to the adoption of the motion, provided that I am afforded an opportunity of offering a few observations in reply to the statement made by my hon. friend (Mr. Emmerson) in reference to it.

Mr. BORDEN: I had intended to appropriate to this question some time that the hon. member for Westmorland (Mr. Emmerson) took up the other evening in discussing the Japanese treaty.

Mr. EMMERSON: I did not take up any time. I have nothing further to say.

Mr. BORDEN: I was speaking of another occasion. I had intended the other evening to bring this motion up; but my hon. friend took up a good deal of time, and we were not able to do so. I think, however, it can be arranged to take it up at an early date.

INQUIRIES FOR RETURNS.

Mr. KYTE: Before the Orders of the Day are called, I desire to call the attention of the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Hazen) to what appears to be an incomplete return brought down from his department. I moved some weeks ago for the papers relating to the dismissal of William A. Duann, lighthouse keeper at Green Island, Richmond county, including the evidence which Mr. Duchemin took at the inquiry. That evidence has not been brought down, and I should be glad if the hon. minister would supplement the return by bringing down the evidence as soon as possible.

Mr. HAZEN: If that return is incomplete, I will call the attention of the officers of the department to the matter, and at the earliest possible moment bring down the completed return.

Mr. KYTE: I would like to direct the attention of the hon. the Postmaster General (Mr. Pelletier) to several returns which were ordered by this House in the early part of the session, but which have not been brought down, namely: relating to the dismissals of Norman McAskell, postmaster at Framboise; Charles J. Lafford, postmaster at Grand Grave; John R. Morrison, postmaster at Oban; Abraham LeBlanc, postmaster at West Arichat; Frederick A. Martel, postmaster at L'Ardoise; J. Scott Nelson, postmaster at Louisdale; Leon N. Poirier, postmaster at Descouse, all in the county of Richmond; also relating to the dismissal of D. Boivard, employed in the marine shipyard at Prescott, Ontario.

Mr. PELLETIER: I am sure that the return relating to the dismissal of the Oban postmaster has been laid before the House to-day, and I think one or two others. I happened to see some of the returns in the office. They were being compared and will be brought down at an early date.

Mr. LAW: I would like to call the attention of the hon. the Postmaster General to three returns which I moved for nearly two months ago, namely, relating to the dismissals of Jesse L. Morton, postmaster at Lower Argyle; Mrs. M. Gaudet, postmistress at West Pubnico; and W. S. Porter, postmaster at Port Maitland. If the closure rule has not been applied to the Post Office Department, I should like to be favoured with the returns as soon as possible.

Mr. PELLETIER: I think that statement is not quite fair. I am doing my best to bring down these returns as soon as possible. I have brought some down to-day, and I hope to bring down some more in a day or so. I hope those of my hon. friend will be included in them.

Mr. JOSEPH DEMERS (St. Johns and Iberville: (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, before we proceed with the Orders of the Day, I wish to draw the attention of the hon. Minister of Inland Revenue (Mr. Nantel) to a return in connection with the dismissal of Mr. A. N. Deland, collector of inland revenue at St. Johns.

I understand that the above return does not include a letter from Mr. Deland addressed to the Minister, asking for an inquiry, and also a copy of the Minister's answer to such request. These papers are not included in the return, and I trust the hon. Minister will see that they are brought down.

An hon. MEMBER: The Minister of Inland Revenue has not answered.

Mr. SPEAKER: I understand the hon. member for St. John has asked a question, and awaits an answer.

Mr. PELLETIER: He has his answer.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I do not understand the Minister of Inland Revenue has answered—he did not rise from his seat.

Hon. Mr. NANTEL: (Translation.) I answered in a way to be understood by the hon. gentleman from St. Johns. I took note of what he said, and if the return is incomplete, I shall have it completed.

Mr. DEMERS: (Translation.) The hon. gentleman was content with nodding to me in answer to my inquiry.

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, I desire to refer, for the purpose of eliciting some information, to an incident which occurred in this House on Wednesday last in connection with and at the time of the introduction of the resolution respecting the closure. It will take me just a moment to explain the matter to the House.

Mr. SPEAKER: I think the hon. member is hardly in order in discussing that subject just now.

Mr. MACLEAN: It is a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker. A day or so after the occasion to which I refer I noticed that some of the London press and some of the Canadian press, notably the Montreal Herald, stated that on that Wednesday evening, at six o'clock, when the House rose, there appeared on the floor of the House several policemen for the purpose of maintaining order and preserving peace between the members. After observing these statements, I recollected quite clearly that at six o'clock and immediately after you, Sir, left the Chair, there did appear in this Chamber some policemen. Whatever be the indiscretions of hon. gentlemen in this House, on either side, during the business of Parliament, in my judgment, it is not and never will be necessary to invoke the intervention of any police. An incident of this kind tends to bring this House, its members, and its proceedings, into disrepute; and I say emphatically that there was no reason whatever why policemen should have been seen upon the floor of this House on that occasion. With all due deference to you, Sir, or to such persons as saw fit to order the presence of policemen upon the floor of this House, I would say that it was absolutely unnecessary, and I think that hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House are entitled to some explanation of this incident.

Mr. BORDEN: As far as I am concerned, I saw neither the paragraph to which the hon. member alludes nor the policemen.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MACLEAN: My right hon. friend need have no doubt as to the presence of policemen in this Chamber on that occasion. That statement of mine need occasion no laughter on the part of hon. gentlemen opposite.

Mr. BORDEN: So far as I am concerned, it is the first that I have heard of it; and no one on this side of the House, so far as I am aware, had anything at all to do with the presence of the policemen, if they did appear.

Mr. SPEAKER: No order was given for any policeman to be in the House or to come to this House; nor were there any other policemen than those two or three who are usually around the House. Occasionally one takes charge of the Chamber from six to eight o'clock. That was the only one who was in the House that evening. I do not know whether he was in the Chamber or not that evening at six o'clock; I did not see him.

Mr. HAZEN: While these matters are before the House, Mr. Speaker, I might rise to a question of privilege. A paragraph appeared in the Toronto Globe, and also in Le Canada published in the city of Montreal, stating that on Wednesday at six o'clock, when you left the Chair, I immediately rushed to the room of the chief whip and demanded protection. It is hardly necessary for me to say that the statement does not contain anything of the essential element of truth, but is entirely false in every respect. I am generally able to defend myself, and I was able on Wednesday night to defend myself had there been any necessity to do so.

NATURALIZATION—RUSSIAN-CANADIANS SENT TO SIBERIA.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Referring to what my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Hazen) has said, everybody will believe that he needs no protection against our side, seeing that they are about fifty stronger than we are. I rise to call the attention of the Prime Minister to a despatch from Calgary recently published, which is as follows:

Calgary, Alta., April 5.—Gersha Tarsus, a Russian, is raising a fund in the prairie provinces to bring about the pardon of three brothers, Alberta homesteaders, who have been exiled for life to Siberia for alleged evasion of war service during the Russo-Japanese struggle. The brothers took out homesteads here and prospered, and last year visited relatives in their native town in Russia. On their arrival they were arrested by the Russian authorities, tried by court martial for evasion of military duty, and, although citizens of Canada, were sent to Siberia for life. A peculiar phase of the case is that if the men had taken out naturalization papers in Great Britain, England could have prevented the exile, but as they are Canadian citizens and not British subjects, the British authorities declined to interfere.

This brings up in concrete form a matter which we debated in this House some time ago—the effect of naturalization in Canada. It was stated at the time, and quite correctly, that, under the law, although foreigners may be naturalized and become British subjects in Canada, one so naturalized ceases to be a British subject the moment he leaves Canada. As will be noticed, the despatch goes on to state that the British authorities declined to interfere on behalf of these men. I do not know whether the matter has been called to the attention of the Prime Minister; but, if not, I will place the paper in his hands. He may find some way to call the attention of the authorities to the matter for the benefit of these Canadian citizens.

Mr. BORDEN: The paragraph had not come to my attention. I will mention the matter to the Minister of Justice, to see if we can make any representations in the matter which will be useful.

THE PILOTAGE COMMISSION.

Mr. H. BOULAY (Rimouski): (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to draw the attention of the hon. Minister of Marine (Mr. Hazen) to an editorial appearing in Le Progrès du Golfé, issue of March 7 last, and which reads as follows:

At a sitting of a commission appointed to enquire into the pilotage of the St. Lawrence on Friday last, Captain Belanger, commander of the Eureka, on being called to give evidence in connection with the enquiry as to the conditions under which the work was being carried on at Rimouski, endeavoured, if newspaper reports are to be credited, to show that the men employed on the Eureka, in the course of the last season, were incompetent.

Just now, do we read in L'Action Sociales account of the captain's evidence, the boat is manned by Rimouski farmers, appointed for party considerations, on the recommendation of the member for the county and who have no knowledge whatever of navigation. These men are sent on board by Mr. Boulay, member for Rimouski.

Now, Captain, it will not be said that you were permitted to make such a false statement uncontradicted by any one. You insinuate, Sir, that only since Mr. Boulay is our representative is the pilotage service carried on by people from Pointe au Père and neighbouring places, people whom you brand as incompetent. However, that is false. You know as well as I do that the pilotage service here has always been performed by men of this locality and neighbouring points, barring one occasion. Once, while Mr. Ross was the representative of the county, you were allowed to choose your own men to man the ship, and you hired them in Quebec. Now, it is notorious that the pilotage service on that occasion was far from satisfactory, that several of your 'strangres' departed before their time was up and that you were under the necessity to replace them by men from Pointe au Père and the county. Which shows that then as to-day, we had in the district competent men, handy men, capable of handling the oars on the high sea.

And such are the men who were employed on the Eureka, on Mr. Boulay's recommendation.

But why, Captain, instead of making such absurd statements before the enquiry commission, did you not make reference to insufferable captains, surly, ill-tempered growling, cavilling and quarelsome captains.

There are some such, Captain, as you know, but you did not refer to them in any way. We will do that for you one of these days. You will not be the loser for waiting a while, Boss.

To set the matter right, I may say that at the time the crew was engaged in April 1912, out of nineteen men, there were twelve I had recommended, and among them some men who had been formerly employed, who had served during the year previous.

By the month of July, Captain Belanger had managed things so well that, of the men I had recommended, only six remained, he having recruited substitutes for them among his own friends.

That Mr. Belanger is still in the employ of the Government this year. He is a mischief-maker not only for the people of the locality, but for the whole of his crew, so much so that he dispenses with the services of thirty or forty men every year.

I wish to draw the attention of the Minister of Marine to that state of affairs, and to request that the Government should dispense as promptly as possible with the services of that troublesome man who is unwilling to tell the truth before a commission of enquiry.

Mr. HAZEN: While I did not follow my hon. friend (Mr. Boulay) very closely, I understand that he is making reference to certain evidence given before the Pilotage Commisson consisting of Mr. Robb, Captain Lindsay and Mr. Lachance, I expect, probably to-morrow, to be able to lay the report of these gentlemen upon the table, and perhaps it would be better to defer any discussion until the evidence is before hon. members of the House.

THE RULES OF THE HOUSE—LIMITATION OF DEBATE.

Consideration of the proposed resolution of Mr. Borden, to amend rule 17 of the House of Commons, and the proposed motion of Mr. Hazen, that this question be now put, resumed from April 11.

Hon. FRANK OLIVER (Edmonton): In discussing the proposed resolution, I do not wish to be considered as objecting to amendment of the rules of this House. As there is change of conditions, it is right and reasonable that there should be amendment of the rules. But, in objection to and emphatic protest against the resolution now before the House, I take the position that it is not a mere amendment of the rules; that it is a reversal or subversion of the principles upon which those rules are based; that it changes the constitution and purpose of this House of Commons in vital respects. I have followed the discussion in regard to the proposed rules, and, to my mind, the reasons which have been given are more objectionable than the rules themselves, if that were possible. It appears to me that this resolution is based upon an idea of the purpose of Parliament that is diametrically opposed to everything that we have been accustomed to believe in regard to that purpose. If I understand the purpose of Parliament correctly, it is to permit of discussion. Parliament represents the people of all parts and sections of Canada, and the purpose of the meeting of Parliament is that the views and opinions of the people may be freely put forward and discussed, and, from time to time, crystallized into legislation and given effect to. The purpose of these amendments is that discussion shall be restricted, and that members of this House, coming here from all parts of Canada and representing the interests of all the people of the country, are, in respect of debate, to be subject to such limitations and restrictions as may express the will of the Government of the day. It is a proposal to change a free Parliament into a dictatorship; to change free discussion into a mere assent to propositions laid down. Parliament has, up to the present time, been the clearing house for the thought of the people of Canada; hereafter it is to be a place where the will of the Government of the day is to be registered, with or without discussion, as may suit the head of the Administration. This is surely a radical change, which should not be made without good and sufficient reason, or without due and thoughtful consideration. What reason is there for projecting such a radical change, not only into the proceedings of this Parliament, but into the political relations of the people of this country? It would have been reasonable to suppose that such a radical proposition would have been made only after the fullest consideration, and after every opportunity for discussion, amendment and improvement; but we find that immediately after the resolution is proposed by the Premier, a motion is made by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, by which the House is compelled to accept or reject this proposal as first introduced, with the least possible amount of discussion or consideration. I ask you, Mr. Speaker, is that fair play to the people of Canada? Is it right that the expression of views in this free Parliament should be restricted by this resolution at the mandate of the right hon. Prime Minister, backed by his majority in this House?

What reason is there, in the occurrences during the life of this Parliament, to warrant such a course? Has there been delay of public business? I venture to say that in the Parliament of no other country has the public business been transacted with greater regard to the saving of time and to fair discussion and consideration than during the late and present sessions. This restriction of the liberty of debate, this limitation of the right of free speech in Parliament, is based upon the attitude of the Opposition to a single measure proposed by the Government. In regard to no other portion of the public business has there been anything but prompt consideration, and, in regard to the naval question itself, so long as that question was before the House, there was only that fair consideration and discussion which its importance and far-reaching consequences warranted. It was only when the naval question ceased to be the question before the House and the rights and privileges of the House were placed in issue that there was any action that could be construed as obstruction. There was no obstruction to legislation, but there was the defence of obstruction against coercion. Up to the passing of the resolution there was debate by both sides of the House. The votes on the resolution and the second reading of the Bill were reached by agreement between leaders of the two sides of the House. It was only when the Bill came into committee and when the Government, without bringing down information that was properly demanded undertook to say that this House must sit in continuous session until the second clause was passed, that any action was taken that could be construed as obstruction. I say that an Opposition of eighty-six members in a House of two hundred and twenty, representing within a small fraction as many people in this country as the Government majority, would certainly have been doing very much less than their duty to the people who sent them here of they had not met the attempted coercion by obstruction.

Let me call your attention to the occurrences in connection with this Naval Bill, a question that everyone will admit to be of far-reaching importance. It involves inter-Imperial relationships beyond any question and an amount of money sufficiently large to startle the taxpayers of Canada. Instead of the Government of the day coming forward with facts and arguments and reasons in support of the proposition to which they asked the assent of this House, their first move was to apply closure to their supporters. That act of theirs made it impossible for the country to learn what the position of the Government really was. I venture to say that in no other parliament was such a position ever taken by a government on such a question. No other government ever dared to defy parliamentary propriety and constitutional usage to such an extent as to gag their followers in debate instead of welcoming the opportunity to place before the people of Canada whatever reasons there may have been for the proposal that they were submitting. The fact that the Government refused to disclose its position or allow its followers to disclose their position necessarily laid upon the members of the Opposition, whose duty as members of this House it was to bring to the attention of the country whatever merits or demerits there might be in the proposal, an obligation to debate this measure fully. Notwithstanding that attitude of the Government of the day, which was, I will not say an insult to Parliament but an insult to Canada, an arrangement was arrived at so that the vote on the second reading was taken. Then came the committee stage of the Bill. It might have been expected that the attitude of the Government during the debate on the second reading would be amended when the Bill came into committee so that the information and explanations that they had refused on the second reading would be forthcoming in committee. That is the usual course with the most insignificant private Bill; it receives consideration and explanation in Committee of the Whole. But the Government of the day saw fit, instead of acceding to the custom of Parliament, instead of recognizing the purpose for which the House sits in Committee of the Whole, again refused, specifically and deliberately refused, either to bring forward the information that was wanted or to substantiate as correct the information that they had brought forward. Was it the duty of members who sit on this side of the House representing, within a fraction, one-half of the people of Canada, to ask for full information and full explanation? Would they have been right if they had not asked for full information and explanation? Would they not have been absolutely and palpably wrong if they had not done so? And to that demand, which was made in the name of the whole people of Canada by those who represent nearly one-half of the Dominion of Canada, the answer of the Government was the answer of physical force: You must sit continuously until you pass that clause. When the ultimatum was issued, I submit that there was only one course for the members of the Opposition to pursue. They were not prepared to abdicate their functions as the parliamentary representatives of a free people. I need not call your attention to the fact, Mr. Speaker, that the second clause of the Bill is not yet passed; and I say here and now that it should never be passed unless and until the Government gives to this House that information in regard to their policy and its details to which the country is absolutely and unquestionably entitled. But there was something more than merely compelling the House to sit in continuous session. There was something more than the application or the exercise of physical force. While we have, under the rules, a chairman of committee, duly elected and salaried by Parliament, responsible for the decisions which he gives, we had placed in the Chair from time to time members of Parliament without that responsibility. We had decisions by those members of Parliament on points of order upheld by the Government majority. May I be permitted to say, Mr. Speaker, that during twenty-four hours there was a deliberate attempt by the Government of the day, backed by their majority, with no greater authority than that of a fraction of the people of this country over those represented by the Opposition, to carry that project by means of the misapplication of the rules of this House, and without giving information?

Mr. SPEAKER: I think the hon. member is going too far. He seems to me to be imputing motives, which is not allowable, as well as questioning the action of the House, which can only be done by giving notice and by bringing it to the attention of the House. In both those respects I think the hon. member's remarks are out of order.

Mr. OLIVER: I did not imagine, Mr. Speaker, that I was trespassing. If I am, I wish to place myself in order. I was stating what I understood to be facts not subject to dispute. I wish to be understood as placing myself entirely under your ruling, and I will not discuss that point further. But I may be permitted to point out that as a last effort to pass this Bill in committee, the Chairman ignored the rules of the House, and undertook to give a ruling while a member had the floor. I make these allusions not for the purpose of casting reflections at all but to bring out a condition in rebuttal of the contention of the Government that the Opposition has unduly exercised its prerogative of discussion in the House. I want to establish beyond question the point that coercion was attempted by the Government, and that it was not until it was attempted and continued that it was met by obstruction on the part of the Opposition. May I point out that in regard to these very resolutions that are now under discussion, a rule of Parliament has been invoked that had not been invoked within the quarter of a century before, and that rule was brought into play by the application or use of a rule that had never been invoked before in the history of this Parliament. It is true that these rules are in the book; it is true that hon. members had the power to use these rules, for the purpose they had in view. But you know, Mr. Speaker, and this Parliament knows, that rules are placed there for certain purposes, and it is thoroughly realized that the rules of Parliament up to the present time have been for the purpose of regulating, and not of prohibiting discussion; that when these rules were applied, as they have been applied, their application was unprecedented, and to that extent was an infringement upon the rights and liberties of this House. And when, not only was the application of these rules made, but my hon. friends boasted of it, and declared that it was for the purpose of preventing that consideration of this measure to which its importance surely entitles it—I say that if the Government is justified in so applying these rules in order to gag discussion, in order to prevent the consideration of this question to which its importance entitles it, then the Opposition is entitled to resort to obstruction to prevent the success of the application of the gag.

In regard to this matter of closure, or the application of the gag to debate, is there any evidence that such rules will facilitate the business of Parliament? What is the evidence of that, Mr. Speaker? Assuming Parliament to be constituted, as the evidence is that this Parliament is constituted, and that there has been nothing but fair consideration and fair discussion, what is the result? It is true that by the application of the gag the Government can prevent the proper consideration of any matter. They can force through any provision that they wish, but they cannot prevent obstruction. Let me suggest that if a free Parliament is prevented from the free consideration and fair discussion of these questions that are of vital importance to the people of the country, they are driven to methods of obstruction in order that they may make their influence in Parliament felt. Has the closure in Great Britain prevented obstruction? Is it not a fact that ever since closure was introduced there have been amendments and amendments and amendments? If anyone will look at the 'Hansard' of the British House of Commons, he will reach a conclusion as to whether debate has been prevented by closure. Where we have two volumes of 'Hansard' they have five, six, seven or eight, or more. It is true that this closure measure can protect the Government in driving through a specific proposal, but it cannot facilitate the business of parliament and I would suggest to the Government side—I would suggest to the Government itself—that they consider that question carefully before they carry their resolutions through.

It would be begging the question, Mr. Speaker, to consider these resolutions as having relation to the ordinary business of the House. They are not necessary, they are not called for by reason of the ordinary business of the House. They are prepared for the purpose of protecting the Government from being driven to a dissolution on any important question of public policy. That is the only legitimate purpose that they have. In regard to the question of dissolution, the Government take the position that they have a majority in the House and that, having that majority, they are entitled to legislate as they please. That is not the proper expression of the terms of our constitution. It is notorious that the Government do not hold their control of legislation longer than they are able to hold the approval of the majority of the people of the country. It is an essential part of the constitution of our country that Parliament may be dissolved on the order or mandate of the Governor General, the representative of the King. Although the Government may have a majority in the House, it is still within the power of a Governor General to ask for their resignations and to require a dissolution of the House. Why is that? It is so that it shall be established beyond any question that the Government in Parliament represent a majority of the people of the country. There have been instances in the history of Canada in which this action has been taken and when the Government, which held a majority in the House, as this Government hold a majority in the House, were sent to the country. Parliament was dissolved and the country disapproved of the Government so sent. It is not so much a question as to who sends the Government to the country; the question is that it is a fundamental principle of our constitution that the Government of the day shall be representative of the majority of our people, and so, in pursuance of that idea and of that principle, occasions have occurred in times past when the Government has been forced to the country by an opposition exercising its right of discussion and debate on matters of sufficient importance. It is to defend the Government against that contingency and, in the first instance, I will say that it is only for that purpose, that this provision is introduced. It is to protect the Government of the day, representing what they know to be less than a majority of public opinion in this country, from having to face that public opinion and abide by its results. That is the great infraction of the constitution that is being perpetrated by these resolutions.

The attitude of the Government upon this naval aid question is such, and is so strongly persisted in, that the only way in which public opinion and Parliament can be brought into accord is by means of a general election. This naval Bill is not a policy. The Government has declared time and time again that it is not a policy. It is an emergency but the existence of the emergency has been disapproved and still we are unable to get any declaration as to policy. We are to be asked to vote $35,000,000 without an understanding, without reasons given and without knowledge as to obligations created or discharged. It has been advertised as a gift; it turns out to be a loan and surely the people of Canada are entitled to know upon what terms this loan is being made and upon what terms it will be repaid. The Government up to date have absolutely refused that information; their answer is that they and the Admiralty have decided and that the people of Canada have no concern in the matter. Our contention is that the people of Canada have every concern, that they are entitled to know from the Government; and we believe that we would be doing less than our duty if we did not insist to a last degree on that information being given. There never was an occasion before in the Parliament of Canada when a question of such financial importance and far-reaching consequence was treated as this question has been treated by this Government, ignoring the right of the people to information and, when asked for information, replying with the gag.

Of course, it is admitted that there is restriction of debate in the British House of Commons and also in other legislatures. If there is restriction of debate, it must or should be for good reasons, and should be based upon fair dealing. No one will suggest that the restriction of debate which prevails in the British House of Commons is based upon anything but fair dealing or that it is not for good reasons. No one who has followed the course of this discussion up to date will be hardy enough to say that the resolution submitted by the right hon. the Prime Minister, with the motion of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Hazen) is based on good reasons or on fair dealing. In the British House, as has already been said, the Speaker is the controlling factor in the application of the closure. There the Speaker is a judicial officer. Every care has been taken, at every stage of the amendments that have been made to the closure rules in the British House of Commons, to safeguard, so far as they could be safeguarded, the rights of the representatives and to keep to the front the idea of British fair play, British justice, and British liberty. I must say that our experience here in the debate on these resolutions does not lead us to the conclusion that they are good samples of British fair play, British justice, or British liberty. It is a question of the liberty and the rights of the people who are represented in this House. You cannot have a gagged parliament and a free people.

To what end has free speech been made a fundamental principle of Parliament? Why is it that we read so much of the securing of the right of free speech? Everybody knows that the right of free speech in Parliament was secured as a defence of the people against the tyranny of kings. Tyranny is tyranny, whether it is of a king, of a parliamentary majority, or of a political boss. I am not so sure, if I had to take my choice, that I would not choose the tyranny of a king who has some sense of dignity, some sense of responsibility and obligation, rather than the tyranny of a political boss. We have in this country enjoyed liberty so long and so fully that we have ceased to value it.

Mr. BUREAU: Except in Manitoba.

Mr. OLIVER: Most of us on this side of the House have not lived in Manitoba.

When I say the tyranny of a political boss, I am not using a figure of speech. We know that in the great cities of the United States, where the municipal politics of each city is admittedly under boss rule, there is a condition of tyranny that never was exceeded in the old days, in the palmiest days of the tyranny of kings. Men are murdered by the order of the political boss to-day in the city of New York, in Chicago, in San Francisco; and where is the justice that revenges the murder? We must understand that like conditions will produce like results; and that, if we see fit to change the political conditions of this country from government by means of a parliament to government by a parliamentary majority, constituting a political machine, controlled by a political boss, we must accept the same conditions as prevail in other countries where they have a like system. We have no immunity in Canada. If we forego our liberties, we must accept the consequences of tyranny.

The naval question is the stalking horse by which it is proposed to establish machine politics in the Parliament of Canada. We get, in this measure, and in the conditions that have led up to it, in the means that are being taken to pass it in this House, a taste of that side of politics which so long cursed this country, and which again being triumphant is giving us a taste of its quality. This Government has been in power for eighteen months. Eighteen months is not long in the life of a government, and still this Government has quite a record. In the very first few days of its advent to power, it signalized that advent by such wholesale dismissals of public servants as had never been seen before in Canada or in any other country except the United States, where is accepted, as a part of the politics of the country, the same sort of machine politics as is now being so successfully introduced into this House. The slogan of the 'Civil Service reform' which we heard so frequently from this side of the House before 1911, was changed to the slogan of ' to the victors belongs the spoils.' The party that attained power by demanding that Canada should adopt the ideals of Britain instead of the ideals of the United States, signalize their advent by enforcing the Yankee doctrine that public office is a private snap. Ably to assist them in this process they established a commission at high salaries, of which commission two members at any rate only waited long enough to have attention drawn to their records, and the commission dissolved in thin air. They attempted to defeat the government of the province of Saskatchewan by terrorizing the homesteaders of that province. And let me point out that the homestead entries in western Canada are decreasing, not increasing; and may I suggest that the preaching of the doctrine that a man shall hold his homestead only as he votes for the Government of the day must necessarily have an important influence in producing that effect. They undertook to coerce the electors of the constituency of Macdonald by the aid of the provincial government, prostituting the processes of law, arresting without warrant, holding without trial and publicly threatening wholesale arrest and detention. I ask you, what difference is it to the men in Macdonald whether they were arrested by order of the party boss or by order of the Czar?—the result was the same. They laid a tax on the lumber of the settlers in the name of the law which the courts have said was contrary to the law. They juggled with the customs duties on cement and steel rails at the proper time to affect elections, but not long enough to substantially relieve the people. It is admitted by the minister concerned that his department handed out to party friends without notice to the public of any kind property of this country to the amount of $100,000. They defied all precedents of constitutional government and all decency in public life to influence the federal election in Richelieu and the provincial election in Antigonish.

Mr. SPEAKER: I would remind the hon. member that the resolution before the House relating to the rules of the House, and would direct his attention to the rule with regard to relevancy of debate.

Mr. OLIVER: Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask you for some leniency, for this reason. The resolution is placed before the House in such a form that there is no possibility of introducing amendments to the resolution that would bring out the reasons that could be brought to bear against its passage. The supporters of the resolution on the Government side admit that this resolution is a restriction on debate, but they ask this side of the House to trust the Government not to exercise that authority unduly. I am pointing out to the House that the Government, by reason of its record, is not entitled to that trust, that their actions, so far as they have gone, do not warrant this House in reposing trust in them.

I wish to say that to the charge solemnly made in this House that a member of the Government was elected by flagrant conspiracy they refused consideration by their majority vote, on the ground that the question was one for the courts; yet to-day, by order of Parliament for which this Government and its majority is responsible, a citizen of Canada, a British subject, accused of no crime, lies in the common jail in this city of Ottawa, because he refused to disclose his private business that was then, and still is, under consideration by the courts. The Government has introduced a Bill to spend $35,000,000, and refuses to give information to the House as to the policy or as to the details of the proposal.

Closure is not a blow at the Opposition of this House, it is a blow at the rights of the people of Canada represented in this House. The possibility of bringing his wrongs to the attention of Parliament has been the great protection of the homesteader of the West. Establish closure as it is proposed to be established by the resolution before the House, and the reign of terror begun in the Saskatchewan election becomes the normal condition throughout the three prairie provinces. And what is the effect in regard to the homesteader is not less the effect in regard to every citizen who is unfortunate enough to have direct dealings with the Government of the day. No such conditions ever prevailed in Canada even in the palmiest days of Toryism as it used to be. Then there was regard for precedent, for personal reputation, for free discussion, there was power to force a dissolution; but to-day, precedent is ignored, personal reputation is disregarded, discussion is gagged and dissolution is defied. Machine politics on the American plan is established; we have Toryism triumphant at last.

I suggest that this proposal to gag Parliament for the purpose of enabling the Government to put through a measure that they are either unable or unwilling to justify or explain to the people of Canada must look strange to the people who have recently come to our country; they will wonder where they are to find the liberty, the justice and the fair play that they looked for under our constitution. I ask you, are we likely to inspire appreciation of and reverence for the ideals of British liberty, British justice and British fair play by preventing the representatives of our people from giving free expression to their views in a free parliament? I say this resolution is a crime against liberty, and an offence against Canada and against the Empire; and all the greater because it is committed under the pretence of British precedent. The conditions here and in Britain are not parallel, the terms of the closure resolution are not parallel, none of the reasons which require closure there exist here. The attempt to shelter the establishment of boss rule in Canada, according to the American practice in its lowest form, behind the need of expediting work in the parliament of the Empire—which transacts the business of forty-five millions of people directly, and indirectly the business of nearly half the world—and doing so in the name of loyalty to the Empire, is outrageous beyond expression. I say, Mr. Speaker, that political brigandage never went further in cowardice and treachery under any circumstances in any country.

Hon. RODOLPHE LEMIEUX (Rouville): I do not know what I can add to the eloquent, indeed the masterly, address to which it has just been the privilege of the House to listen; but, having been elected to this free Parliament seventeen years ago, and desiring to remain a member of it for many more years, if possible; having due regard to the constitutional liberties of the people, I consider it my duty to register my protest against the drastic resolution which was so tragically introduced into this House by the Prime Minister (Mr. Borden). This is a most important question, more important perhaps than the one which has preceded it. It affects the rights and privileges not only of the members of this House, but the rights and privileges of the people whom we represent. It is no less than a coup d'état which has been perpetrated by the right hon. gentleman, and, Sir, he might well have paused and considered his political past before consenting to go down to posterity as the perpetrator of this coup d'etat. Sir, England has seen tyranny personified by King Charles; as an antithesis the statue of Cromwell at St. Stephens is not far from that of King Charles near Whitehall. In France, Sir, Louis XIV personified absolutism itself; but at his zenith he began the ride which resulted in the fall of monarchy in that country. When I saw the right hon. gentleman the other day coolly proposing to this House a resolution which dashes to the ground the privileges and liberties which we enjoy, I was reminded of Louis XIV himself, who, entering one day his parliament where the peers of the realm were assembled, made the historic declaration: 'l'Etat, c'est moi'—'I am the state.' If the rules which are embodied in this resolution are passed by the Canadian Parliament, well might the Premier say: 'l'Etat, c'est moi.' Yes, henceforth the state is the Cabinet; we have no more government by the people; but government by the Cabinet—it is a revival of the Star Chamber.

Truly, this is a session of wonders; each day and each week a surprise is sprung on hon. gentlemen in this House and on the people of this country. First, with great éclat, preceded, it is true, with much mystery and secrecy, the right hon. gentleman on the 5th of December last, speaking as with words of weight and excessive wisdom —he did not deliver his speech as a member of this House should deliver it, but read it—declared that an emergency existed in regard to the defence of the Empire, and his emergency policy was produced. At first, it was a gift which this great Dominion was called upon to make to the Mother Country, but later on it developed into a loan. At first Canada was to be on the firing line—the danger was in the North sea; later on we learned that the firing line was to be located at Gibraltar; that we were not to fight side by side with the jack tars in the North sea, but were to effect an alliance with the Sultan of Perak, and that our base was to be at Gibraltar. As so tersely and vividly termed by an English newspaper published in London, the emergency policy has ended in an Imperial tragedy. And now we have suddenly had thrust upon us the introduction of closure, of the guillotine, and of that other process of killing amendments by compartment, so cleverly devised by hon. gentlemen opposite. All this has been sudden, all this has been unexpected, and, as the hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) said, it is typical of the new Tory regime. The new rulers, the new Czars, have played fast and loose with our Imperial relations; but, not satisfied with that, they must now stab the Canadian Parliament—nay, the Canadian people—by depriving us of one of our dearest privileges, that of freedom of speech. I repeat, Sir, this is a session of wonders. The whole legislative programme of the Government since the Royal summons which gathered us on the Hill, reminds me of the box of Pandora. The moment the lid was lifted, all the evils came out of the box. Mythology teaches us that the only thing which remained in the box was hope, but, from the attitude of the right hon. gentleman and his friends, I am led to believe that hope is no longer in the box but that despair is in it. Our hon. friends find comfort in the opinions which some years ago may have been expressed in favour of a revision of the rules of this House by some of their opponents. They forget, in finding that comfort in our opinions, their own former opinions, the opinion of their leader, the opinion of the front benchers of their party, who, two or three years ago, including yourself, Mr. Speaker, all pronounced against closure and guillotine. I am quoted as having stated at the famous meeting of St. Hyacinthe that a vice existed in our parliamentary procedure and that it ought to be eradicated, that I then advocated a revision of the rules of the House. Sir, I do not go back on the opinions I expressed two years ago. They are not binding, it is true, on the Liberal party; they are not binding, surely, on the Liberal leader; but they are binding on myself, and I have no hesitation in saying that I am ready to study and frame new rules if only the right hon. gentleman will accept the amendment of the right hon. leader of the Opposition; but such a revision must be made by a joint committee, by mutual consent, as has been done in the past in the Canadian Parliament and in the British House of Commons. I advocate a revision of the rules on which both sides of the House agree; but I strenuously object to gag and guillotine imposed on His Majestys' loyal Opposition by an arrogant majority. Sir, the Government is already ashamed of its action and in the country through its devoted press it is spreading, I shall not say lies, the word is not parliamentary, but mis-statements. I have seen headlines in the Tory press of Canada: Laurier caught in his own nets.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. LEMIEUX: The hon. gentlemen cheer that statement; they accept it. More than that, my hon. friend, one of the most distinguished members of this Parliament, the member for Portage la Prairie (Mr. Meighen), did not hesitate to state the other evening, in answer to a question which was put to him, that the right hon. the leader of the Opposition was himself the author of clause 17 of the rules of this House.

Mr. MEIGHEN: As it now stands, in its present form.

Mr. LEMIEUX: That is a quibble, and I shall explain my hon. friend's evasion in one moment. I interrupted the hon. member the other day. He was saying:

When Sir Wilfrid Laurier was Prime Minister of this country on the 9th of July, 1906, he, in pursuance of a long evolution leading to perfection of the rules of this House, placed rule 17 there just in the form in which it is to-day. Did he place it there that it might never be acted upon? Did he place it there that whenever it was acted upon for a definite and perfectly legitimate purpose hon. members opposite should howl themselves hoarse shouting shame?

Mr. Lemieux : Does my hon. friend mean to say that the inventor of the previous question was the right hon. the leader of the Opposition?

Mr. Meighen: I say that rule 17, which this Government availed itself of in order to permit the previous question to be moved, was placed in the rule book by the right. hon. the leader of the Opposition.

Worse still, in the press of my own province, the reptile press, it is stated that the leader of the Opposition is himself the inventor of the previous question. Let us settle this point. Rule 17 has been, word for word, the rule of this House since Confederation and it was in existence under the Union. On December 20, 1867, a motion was made by Sir John A. Macdonald, who was not a gagger, who never used guillotines to suppress his opponents:

M. LEMIEUX.

Sir John A. Macdonald moved, seconded by Hon. Mr. McDougall:

Resolved, that this House will immediately resolve itself in a committee on the report of the Select Committee appointed to assist Mr. Speaker in framing rules and regulations for the government of this House. The House accordingly resolved itself into the said committee and after some time spent therein, Mr. Speaker resumed the Chair, &c.

First, we have the regulations and then come the rules of debate:

(11) When two or more members rise to speak, Mr. Speaker calls upon the member who first rose in his place; but a motion may be made that any member who has risen ' be now heard ' or ' do now speak.'

Is the right hon. the leader of the Opposition the inventor of rule 17, which is the reproduction of rule 11? Is the right hon. gentleman the inventor of that procedure which is as old as Confederation, and was in the rules accepted by the legislative assemblies of the Union? My hon. friend, I know, quibbled by saying that this rule has been amended, and that the right hon. gentleman was a member of the committee who amended it.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. gentleman states that the rule in the form in which he read it was placed there by Sir John A. Macdonald who was not a gagger; is the inference that the right hon. the leader of the Opposition, who added to it the clause that it should not be debatable, a gagger?

Mr. LEMIEUX: My hon. friend should be worthy of himself and live up to his reputation. He made a fair defense the other evening of the tyrannical resolution proposed to this House, but he should not stretch too much on his ingenuity and his adroitness. I may say that rule 17 has been in force in Canada ever since Confederation, but this is the first time it has been applied. To my hon. friend from East Hastings (Mr. Northrup) and my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Hazen), belongs the credit of having first availed themselves of that obnoxious rule. Against whom, Mr. Speaker? Against the dean of the House of Commons, not in age, but in experience, in prestige and in statesmanship; against the nestor of the Imperial conferences, as he was declared to be by no less an authority than the Prime Minister of England. The previous question has been put in this House on four occasions only since Confederation, once by Mr. Holton in 1870; later on in 1879 at the time of the Letellier case, by one of your predecessors, Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Mr. Justice Ouimet, who was then member for Laval; by the late Minister of Public Works, Sir Hector Langevin, in the Riel case, and the other day when my hon. friend (Mr. Hazen) moved it for motives which we now know. The Letellier case was a most important constitutional case, and the Riel case was a most important criminal and political case. One can quite understand the Government of the day availing themselves of the use of the previous question in such cases, but Mr. Speaker, in the present instance, as I shall explain later on, there was no reason; indeed there were many reasons why such a drastic measure should not have been made use of at the present juncture. Rule 17 has never been applied in Canada, and my hon. friend the able and distinguished member for Portage la Prairie (Mr. Meighen), will look in vain in the journals of the House of Commons in England for many years back before he can find a record of its application there. As an old parliamentarian, Mr. Speaker, you know perfectly well that it is the unwritten law, the custom, the well-known usage, that after a great public measure has been placed before the House by the Prime Minister, your eye catches the eye of the leader of the Opposition. That is how the duel is engaged in; or rather that is how parliamentary battle is given. Therefore, it was a most unusual proceeding, and I regret for the reputation of fair play enjoyed so far by my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, that he should have availed himself of that drastic and unusual privilege against the leader of the Opposition.

But if I was surprised at the conduct of my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, I can in a sense understand the satisfaction that he could extract from it. I know he is a Tory of the Tories. I know that by education, by temperament, he intends to fight the Liberal party so long as there is a breath in him. But I was amazed at the sneers of my hon. friend the Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty) against the right hon. the leader of the Opposition. I might have expected sneers from other quarters, but not from the Minister of Justice, he a home ruler. He knows that home rule is in sight to-day because of the obstruction raised in the British House of Commons thirty years ago. I would have thought that as a home ruler who owes so much to obstruction he would have spared the right hon. the leader of the Opposition in the present instance. I declare that it is rank ingratitude on his part, when, as an Irishman he knows that Home Rule for Ireland never had a more convinced, a more powerful, and a more loyal friend in the Dominions overseas than the right hon. the leader of the Opposition. My hon. friend the Minister of Justice seems to be greatly exercised over the idea of obstruction. At first, I dare say there was no obstruction, but even if there was, he should be the last man to show resentment. Let me recall a little incident which took place in the good old city of Montreal in the nineties, when I was practising law. My hon. friend the Minister of Justice was then a judge of the Superior Court. He was also the president of the Land League. I remember that after the death of Mr. Parnell, when Mr. John Redmond was selected as the leader, not of the Irish party, because Mr. Justin McCarthy was made the leader of that party, but of the Parnellite party, he paid a visit to Montreal. A meeting was held at the Windsor Hall, and it was presided over by my hon. friend the Minister of Justice, then Mr. Justice Doherty. I admired his pluck at the time. The speaker of the evening was Mr. John Redmond, and I need not say that he delivered a most eloquent address. The subject of the lecture was 'Parnell and his Methods,' and how graphically he described the methods by which Mr. Parnell had organized and systematized obstruction in order to wreck the parliamentary machinery at Westminster. Mr. Justice Doherty, now the Minister of Justice, congratulated Mr. John Redmond. The next day I had a case to argue at the Superior Court, and to my astonishment I found John Redmond, who the day before had exalted Parnell and obstruction, sitting on the bench of the Superior Court with Mr. Justice Doherty. And yet to-day, my hon. friend the Minister of Justice sneers at the right hon. the leader of the Opposition and at the Liberal party. This new loyalist is shocked at the idea that the Liberal party should strenously resist the adoption of the Naval Bill! What a change of heart, what a right-about turn!

This brings me to a very short history of how closure was adopted in England. The events which have led to its introduction in Canada are not parallel at all with those which brought about the use of obstruction as a parliamentary weapon in England. To make a long story short, will you allow me to read just one page from Mr. Justin McCarthy's History of our Own Times from 1880 to the Diamond Jubilee. On pages 78 and 79 of that work, Mr. Justin McCarthy explains the tactics adopted by Parnell and his supporters:

> Parnell's appearance was much in his favour, and suited exactly with the position he occupied. He was tall, stately, with a clear-cut, handsome, pallid, statuesque face. Strangers coming into the House of Commons, not knowing who he was, were attracted by that pale, marble-like face, and asked, who is that?
> Parnell did not begin the policy of obstruction. The policy of obstruction had always been a more or less recognized weapon in the House of Commons. There was an organized obstruction to Lord John Russell's Reform Bill in 1831 and 1832. Mr. Gladstone obstructed the passing of the Divorce Act to the very best of his power. Sir Charles Dilke, Mr. Leonard Courtney, and Mr. Chamberlain kept, with Mr. Parnell's assistance, the House of Commons at work for more than one all-night sitting. But there was a very distinct difference between Mr. Parnell's policy and that of other men. Obstruction in other cases had to do with some particular measure, which its opponents were determined not to allow to pass into law if they could by any constitutional process forbid to go further; or, with regard to certain questions, it was an obstruction which said to the Government of the day: 'You shall not have this measure at all unless you allow into it certain amendments which we propose to make.' But Mr. Parnell's obstruction had a different and a wider object. It is not likely that he saw in the first instance the full use that might be made of the instrument he was employing. But the idea soon dawned upon him and overspread his strong mind. He was not a lover of England; he was not in feeling much of a Democrat. But he was thoroughly convinced that if the attention of the English people, and more especially of the English democracy, could be really aroused to the Irish national claim, the conscience of the majority of Englishmen would be compelled to recognize its justice and the cause of home rule would be gained. Now, that and nothing else was the meaning of Mr. Parnell's policy of obstruction—the policy which he carried on for example, after Mr. Gladstone had come into office in 1880, and when Parnell was made leader of the Irish party. Many people set him down merely as a man who, out of some sort of sinister purpose or malignity, wished to interfere with and harass, obstruct, and irritate every English Government and the whole House of Commons. Mr. Parnell had no feeling of the kind. His was a deliberate purpose, and it was even by the process of exasperation that he tried to fix the attention of the House and the country on the fact that there was an Irish national demand, which it would be necessary to listen to and to take into consideration. Parnell's creed was that the House of Commons was the one great public platform of the country. From that platform he was determined to appeal to and arouse the English people. Therefore he said in substance to the House of Commons: 'If you will not listen to our Irish national claim, then we will not allow you to discuss any other question whatever of which we can prevent the discussion.

You have there a description of the modus operandi adopted by Mr. Parnell and his gallant followers in 1880. They had one object in view—the disruption of the whole political machinery so as to call the attention of England and of the world to their Irish national claims. Mr. Justin McCarthy continues:

He acted on the inspiration of the woman in the Eastern story—of which woman he had probably never heard—who, having tried in vain to get a petition delivered to the Sultan, took her place with her little children in the public street, and waited until the Sultan rode that way, and then flung herself and her babes in front of his horse's hoofs, and declared that she would not move from that spot until he had listened to her appeal or had trampled her and hers to death. That was the real meaning of the later policy of obstruction.

Sir, our position is not parallel, is not analogous and, therefore, we should not find our precedents in the rules and regulations adopted during those stirring times, in the English House of Commons with a view to prevent freedom of speech in this Canadian Parliament. Closure and the guillotine were resorted to in England to meet special conditions. A desperate remedy was invented to meet a desperate condition. What do we read in the life of Gladstone? My right hon. friend the Prime Minister and my hon. friend from Portage la Prairie (Mr. Meighen) quoted Gladstone. He seemed to take pleasure in the fact that the great Gladstone had established closure in the British Parliament. What does Morley, the historian of Gladstone, say when he speaks of that subject? Morley, in his life of Gladstone, volume 3, page 124, says:

The remedies proposed from time to time in this Parliament by Mr. Gladstone were various, and were the occasion of many fierce and stubborn conflicts. But the subject is in the highest degree technical, and only intelligible to those who, as Mr. Gladstone said, 'pass their lives within the walls of parliament'—perhaps not by any means to all even of them. His papers contain nothing of interest or novelty upon the question either of devolution or of the compulsory stoppage of debate. We may as well, therefore, leave it alone, only observing that the necessity for the closure was probably the most unpalatable of all the changes forced on Mr. Gladstone by change in social and political circumstance.

Mark the expression: 'most unpalatable.' Sir, closure was a desperate remedy invented in order to meet a desperate condition; but Gladstone who applied it found it 'most unpalatable' to his ingrained liberalism and to his conscience. The first step towards closure was taken in 1880 when a member was named for having wilfully obstructed, having declared that he would oppose all business of whatever kind at all hours. In February, 1880, the House of Commons in England decided that a member named for wilfully obstructing could, on motion, without debate, be suspended and, if he was named three times, he would be suspended for a week. Then the general election of 1880 took place and Mr. Gladstone was returned by a large majority. He met again Mr. Parnell, whose gallant band of seven followers had been increased to more than eighty, and we know what took place then in the House of Commons. Obstruction was systematized and when, in January, 1881, a Bill for the protection of persons and property in Ireland was proposed, it was strenuously opposed by the Irish members. It was then that Mr. Speaker Brand intervened and put the question on his own motion. On February 2, Mr. Gladstone gave notice of the urgency rule, that, if the House so resolved by a majority of three to one, that the state of public business was urgent, the whole power of the House to make rules, would be, and would remain, with the Speaker until he should declare that the state of public business was no longer urgent. Grave scenes followed, all of the Irish members were ejected but the rule of urgency was passed. In 1882, closure was formally established. It was applied when called for by more than two hundred members, or, when less than forty members had voted against it, by more than one hundred members. In 1887, a Conservative Government came into office. The Crimes Act was introduced and the rule was further amended. Any member during the debate might move that the question be now put. Thus the initiative was transferred from the Speaker to the House, of course with the consent of the House; but Mr. Gladstone opposed this. In 1888, the closure was again strengthened by the reduction of the majority necessary for its enforcement from 200 to 100. In 1887 a time limit, in other words, the guillotine, was also invented and applied. It means that the House decides how much time shall be devoted to certain stages of a measure, definite dates being laid down at which the closure shall be enforced and division taken. Then later on, a Supply rule was adopted. The old rule, that the redress of grievances should precede the voting of money, was also altered. In fact, the House of Commons in Great Britain has lost steadily its power. That, Sir, has been the evolution of parliamentary government in Great Britain since 1875.

Mr. Speaker, all of a sudden, in this Parliament of Canada, where different conditions prevails, we are face to face at one fell swoop with closure, guillotine and Supply rules. Sir, I say that the conditions are radically different. First of all, the Irish members in the British House of Commons were opposed not to one measure, but to all measures. Consequently, the rules of the British House of Commons were amended so as to enable the King's Government to be carried on, but only after years of elaboration and years of discussion. The two great historical parties, the Conservative party and the Liberal party, met in joint committees and amended those ancient rules. There is this further point to consider. The House of Commons in England is composed of nearly 700 members. It has not even a seating capacity for its full membership; and on what the English people are pleased to call a field day in the House of Commons you can see members crowding the galleries. It is well known that there is and has been for a long time a congestion of business in the British Parliament. I do not wish to detain the House more than is necessary; but on this point let me quote the leading parliamentarians in England. Indeed, it is that very congestion of business in the British Parliament which will make it possible for Ireland eventually to obtain home rule, for Wales to obtain home rule, for Scotland to obtain home rule, and for England to obtain home rule. I would not be surprised if in England proper, in Northumbria for instance, there would be an English local legislature. The whole plan of devolution has been devised, has been accepted of late by Liberals and even by Tories on account of the congestion of public business in the British House of Commons. What did Mr. Gladstone say on this subject? Speaking so far back as 1879, in his second Midlothian speech, Mr. Gladstone said:

> The Parliament is over-weighted. The Parliament is almost overwhelmed. If we can take off its shoulders that superfluous weight by the constitution of secondary and subordinate authorities, I am not going to be frightened out of a wise measure of that kind by being told that I am condescending to the prejudices of the Home Rulers. I will condescend to no such prejudices. I will consent to give Ireland no principle, nothing that is not upon equal terms offered to Scotland and to the different parts of the United Kingdom. But I say that the man who shall devise a machinery by which some portion of the excessive and impossible task now laid upon the House of Commons shall be shifted to the more free, and therefore more efficient, hands of secondary and local authorities, will confer a blessing upon his country that will entitle him to be reckoned among the prominent benefactors of the land.

He made a similar speech at Edinburgh in 1890. Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman, speaking in 1895 at Stirling, used the following language:

> The excessive burden of work now imposed upon Parliament can only be relieved by a large system of devolution. It is for this reason, as well as from a sense of right and justice to the nationalities concerned, that I regard as urgently necessary the creation for the three kingdoms of subordinate legislative assemblies dealing with the distinctive features of each.

Mr. Asquith spoke along the same lines in 1901. Mr. John Redmond said at Dublin in the same year:

> When Home Rule was next proposed it would not be in answer to an abject appeal from Ireland, but it would be proposed by some English party for its own sake, for the sake of England, for the sake of the English Parliament, and for the sake of the British Empire. When that proposal was made it would be time enough to consider whether it could be accepted as an honest compromise or not. He, for his part, did not believe they would have very long to wait until some such proposal was made.

Sir Robert Reid, in 1902, speaking at the National Liberal Club, used the following language:

He had always been of opinion, and had publicly expressed it, that the Irish question was incapable of solution except by a system of general devolution. It was not Irish affairs merely that obstructed the business in the House of Commons. It was English and Scottish and Imperial business that stopped the way.

I could also quote Mr. Chamberlain, Lord Rosebery, Mr. Balfour, and several others; but this shows that, at all events, if since the obstruction of Parnell and his followers in the House of Commons, both great historical parties in England have limited debate, by establishment of closure, guillotine and supply rule, it is because of the extreme congestion of public business in that House. Sir, is that the case with us? Has it any analogy to the case of the Canadian Parliament? Here, who thinks, as in the case of Parnell and his friends, of opposing all the measures of a government—of discrediting the machinery of government? We oppose the bad measures. We oppose at present one measure because we believe that it is detrimental in its effects to the constitution of this country and to our relations with the Mother Country. We say that it is an attempt to do away with the autonomy of Canada. We oppose one measure, not all measures. Have we refused supply? Indeed we have helped and materially helped the Government in passing supply, and I only regret that we were too generous because there are many instances, in the Post Office Department for example, where I would like to have a sharp look.

Mr. BUREAU: Don't forget the locks.

Mr. LEMIEUX: The present resolution tends to put majority rule tyrannically over the minority in this House. It serves only party ends; moreover, it will incense public opinion, and we fairly represent a good half of the Canadian public. Sir, the revision of the rules of the Canadian House of Commons should be submitted to a joint committee, and it is not too late yet for the right hon. leader of the Government to accept that suggestion.

There is not in this Parliament any great congestion. Of course, Canada is increasing in population, and we have great national enterprises, which require large expenditure of money; but after all we can deal with the business of this country in a fair manner. There are no seven hundred members as I have said, and if it is found that the work of this House is somewhat congested, why not originate more of the legislation in the Upper House? The Senators themselves complain that there are in the Senate every year too many adjournments and that not enough legislation originates in their Chamber.

Besides, and I wish to speak with the greatest reserve in making this argument—this is not a uni-lingual parliament; this is a bi-lingual parliament where both the English and the French languages are on a footing of equality by the constitution of the country. I thank the Lord that since Confederation no encroachment has ever been made by the Conservative leaders on the right of the minority to use its own language in this Parliament. But fine words butter no parsnips, as the old adage says. We are told by the right hon. leader of the Government that under the closure all rights will be protected, all privileges will be respected. But what of that rule which at one moment will confine our legislative work to a very few hours of the day? It may happen under certain circumstances that those of us who generally speak the English language will consume all the time allowed before the guillotine falls; and then, if a member of the minority who uses the French language, should rise to address the Chair, he will be told: 'Time is up, the guillotine is applied, you have no right to speak.' I do not say that this will happen; I hope it never will. I have enough confidence in the sense of fair play, of justice, of generosity, of liberality, in the majority of this House to believe that it will never happen. But still it might happen, and you cannot juggle with the rights of the minority. It is my duty to speak thus as a representative of a constituency in the province of Quebec. My province at the time of Confederation accepted the compact of Cartier and Macdonald that the rules, usages, customs of the British House of Commons up to 1867 should be binding in the Parliament of Canada in future. Therefore you have no right to impose on the minority in this House rules which have been created since 1867, and which tend to abridge the rights of the minority.

Sir, I do not know that the measure introduced by the right hon. leader of the Government is constitutional. I do not argue the point, but I leave it to your judgment. Has anyone the right to alter a compact, to change the constitution? For the rules adopted in 1867 are embodied in that compact, in that constitution, and you cannot deface them. Sir, what does the resolution mean? As I stated a moment ago, Canada with such drastic rules is no longer governed by Parliament but by Cabinet; it is a revival of the Star Chamber. The Opposition is completely ignored. And yet, Heaven knows, an Opposition is necessary in Canada at the present time. The immemorial right of any member of the House to express his views as often as he sees fit on any phase of a question in committee goes by the board. We are compelled, being a new country, to make great expenditure every year in public works; that expenditure must be scrutinized by the representatives of the people, and it must be scrutinized freely and lengthily. Yet supply can be rushed through, railroaded, when a minister so notifies the House. The old rule of exposure of grievances before supply is curtailed to two days in the week. That resolution, when one reads it coolly, constitutes a violation of the fundamental principles of British parliamentary government. It is more than a resolution; it is a revolution. One has to return to the days of Runnymede, when the barons of England—and they were Norman barons—exacted from King John the famous article 12, of Magna Charta, that no taxation should be levied on the people of England without the free consent of the common council of the realm. Sir, the Government is doing away, partially at least, with that old time-honoured rule of British parliamentary government, that no taxation for any public expenditure shall be levied on British subjects without the free consent of the commons. And, after all, why this radical change—aye, why this coercion? Because of the jingo stampede organized by a coterie in England, by a few busy empire saviours, in Ottawa, in Montreal, in Toronto, in Winnipeg—which is not the public opinion of the country. Because the Government having no mandate for such a policy, will not seek that mandate at the hands of the people. Because the Tory-Nationalist alliance must be maintained at all costs in order to remain in office. Sir, the novel proposal involved in these constitutional changes, the question of representation in the Imperial Council, is above all one that should come before the people. We were all united in 1909 on a Canadian navy, built, manned, maintained by Canada, ready to hoist the flag, and, subject to the control of Parliament, to defend the Motherland against the King's enemies. You have gone back on that resolution, and we must ask the people to approve or disapprove of your treason. Besides, we desire to keep the control of public expenditure within our own hands. The Churchill letters have also created a new situation; they have complicated our present relations with Great Britain. We have just tasted of Downing Street rule; the people must know more about what that means. A policy of centralization is heralded and advocated by this Government as against the policy of local autonomy—a cherished policy up to the present time. You cannot trifle with such important principles, and you cannot impose such radical changes on the people's representatives without consulting your peers, the people. We on this side represent half the people of Canada; let us test public opinion and see whether it will be responsive to the new proposals of the Government. Do not silence the House of Commons; the Liberal party is too proud of its traditions to stand gag rule. Sir, I would commend to the Government the advice given by the ex-Minister of Public Works (Mr. Monk) in the parting shot fired by him at his former allies. In one of to-day's papers I find the following statement made by Mr. Monk:

> I expressed such an opinion before a special commission of the House that such a modification should be made at a period of calm, when everyone could study fully the question and not in the course of a crisis as exists now.
>
> I still believe that a referendum is the only logical solution of the navy crisis—the only one that would give a real value from an Imperial point of view to our contribution if such contribution is voted.
>
> I would have voted against both the Borden and Laurier naval proposals and I am sorry to see that a closure law is proposed at a time which prevents a serious study of it and appears like a way of forcing the adoption of a policy which I disapprove.
>
> I sincerely believe that those who oppose the naval policy of the Government cannot accept a proposal which under the circumstances is but a way to assure the adoption of a policy which they condemn.

All that we, the opponents of the Borden proposal and the friends of a Canadian navy, require, and ask for, is a fair chance and fair play. Let us go before the people, and we will fight one of the most glorious battles of Liberalism. We stand for free speech, and in favour of Canadian autonomy. The prayer of the Grecian combatant, when enveloped in unnatural clouds and darkness, is at present the appropriate political supplication of the Liberal party to the powers that be:

> Dispel this cloud, the light of heaven restore,
> Give me to see—and Ajax asks no more!

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess.

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. O. TURGEON (Gloucester, N.B.): It is not my intention to discuss the technicalities of the amendment under consideration. As you know, I have never been an obstructionist in this House. You, Sir, have been here during all the years I have been a member and you know that I have spoken only on occasions when I felt it to be my duty to my constituents and to the country, as a member of this House, to address you. Nor have I ever taken any part in the discussion of parliamentary rights or technicalities or questions of detail, leaving such discussions to others with more legal acumen and better training for such debating. I deem it to be my duty to this House to discuss the reason and purposes of the amendment to the rules now before the House and the consequences which will flow from the adoption of this amendment. I also feel it my duty to refer to the manner in which this resolution has been placed before the House. We had all known for some days past that we could expect some form of Closure Bill to be placed before the House; the Prime Minister had given notice of this resolution and therefore we were prepared to learn of something which perhaps we might not care to accept. But no member on this side of the House, from the right hon. leader of the Opposition down to the humblest member, expected to witness such a spectacle as we witnessed on Wednesday last when this resolution was introduced and forced upon this House. Coming from one of the smaller provinces of the Dominion, from the Maritime provinces, one of the smaller bodies in the Confederation, I was perhaps more struck by the proposed amendment than most members of this House. We in the Maritime provinces have always been solicitous of the rights of minorities, rights consecrated by the British North America Act. We in the Maritime provinces, no matter what our religion or position in life may be, are all in a minority and we have attached great weight to the guarantees given to us by the fathers of Confederation, those great principles which were fought for by Joseph Howe in Nova Scotia and Wilmot in New Brunswick. We have felt that however great the prosperity of the West might be, we in the East, we of the minority, could always depend on the good will and generosity of the majority. We never expected that a Prime Minister from the Maritime provinces—and we have had others from those provinces, like Sir Charles Tupper and Sir John Thompson—would bring before the House such a resolution as this, in such a manner as this has been presented to us. Some of the newspapers of this city, notably the Ottawa Journal, have referred to riots which have commenced in the House of Commons. I would like them to tell me, if riots have been commenced in this House, where they have commenced; I would ask the leader of the Government or any of his colleagues if they did not commence within the precincts of the council chamber last October when the Hon. Mr. Monk, the Minister of Public Works in the Prime Minister's Cabinet, finding that the Government were not keeping the pledges and promises which he had made to the people of his province forced open the door, broke his locks and chains and left the Government. During the last forty years we have never doubted the ultimate preponderance of the West, due to the great increase of population there. I have always maintained that we had nothing to fear from the West, and that whether a member came from the Yukon or from Alberta or from British Columbia, the moment he entered the sanctuary of the Canadian nation, he would at once become a champion of British liberty and freedom and authority and so we felt that the lower provinces had nothing to fear from the preponderance of the West. It may be that I am still justified in holding that opinion and that we in the East have more to fear from the forgetfulness of our old friends and neighbours, their faithlessness or the promises made to the people by their predecessors. I have taken pleasure on vaunting the good qualities of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, as a citizen and as a public man. Permit me to say that the action of the right hon. gentleman, the Prime Minister and the Minister of Marine and Fisheries on Wednesday last have affected my feelings perhaps more than anybody else, because they come from the smaller provinces to whom protection has been promised, and there can be no better protection than freedom of speech. We, the minority have had to contend for those rights and privileges which were guaranteed to us minutely and particularly by the actual terms of the Confederation Act, and we have had to secure them through the good will of the majority. We might have expected closure of some kind, like that perhaps in use in the British Parliament or in the United States Congress. But we are not to be compared in this Parliament to the British Parliament or to the Congress. We have rights in this House which must be respected, and I believe that the Maritime provinces would not have come into Confederation, which has been a blessing to the whole of Canada, if it had been known that the members of this Parliament would be subjected to closure which would interfere with the liberty of speech. My hon. friend the member for Portage la Prairie (Mr. Meighen), has endeavoured to explain away the position taken by the right hon. the Prime Minister. He is a young member for whom I have the greatest respect and consideration. He has shown a great deal of learning and legal acumen, and he has endeavoured to make an apology for the Prime Minister's introduction of this resolution and for the use of the previous question rule. But he has not been able to give a complete explanation or apology worthy of his abilities. If the right hon. the leader of the Government had resolved to use the previous question, which I am sure my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition did not expect he would do, why did he not inform the leader of the Opposition of his purpose? Why did he not say: I have decided to bring in this resolution in such and such a form? A week previously the Prime Minister asked my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition to grant one-sixth of the Supply necessary to carry on the business of the country, and he was granted that Supply in the most generous manner, and yet, almost immediately afterwards the Prime Minister brought in this resolution and availed himself of the previous question without notifying the leader of the Opposition. I cannot help expressing my regret that in his speech introducing the resolution, the right hon. leader of the Government did not say: Do not rise after me, because I have in my hands a dagger to strike you down lifeless. I would rather have trusted my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Rogers), for he boasts only of the one virtue, that of winning elections. In elections it is the unexpected and unlooked for that happens often, but the unexpected might not have happened if the Minister of Public Works had introduced this resolution, or made use of the previous question. At any rate, he would not have told us that he was going to do such and such a thing unless he intended to. When the Minister of Public Works wanted to send my boy to jail he did not tell me that he would not do so. He gave his instructions, and if my boy had not had the privilege of free speech and had not availed himself of the opportunity to obtain assistance, he would have been put in jail. But my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works did not say he was not going to do it. The manner in which this resolution was introduced occasions me keen regret. You, Mr. Speaker, in the proper exercise of your authority, called upon the hon. member for Quebec East and gave him the right to speak, and yet he was not allowed to do so. The country knows as well as we do, that when the hon. member for Quebec East and Soulanges rose to reply to the right hon. the leader of the Government, it was not as member for Quebec or as member for Soulanges, that he did so, but as leader of His Majesty's loyal Opposition, exercising the parliamentary right given by the constitution since 1867. He did not rise as a private member. If a private member had been prevented from speaking, we could have forgiven what was done on that occasion, but my right hon. friend rose as leader of the Opposition, than whom no man in the Dominion of Canada is entitled to more respect. He has been called the Nestor of the Imperial parliaments, and he is one of the most admired men not only in Canada but throughout the British Empire. But they did not want him to speak; they did not want to listen to him. Other men have listened to the right hon. leader of the Opposition with respect and attention. Men like Balfour and Joseph Chamberlain and Asquith have listened to him and have bowed to his word when he proclaimed that the unity of the Empire was based on the autonomy of the dominions. And yet the Government members in this House tried to gag him. But the shades of William Ewart Gladstone, Daniel O'Connell and Edmund Burke, awake to the name of Wilfrid Laurier and with a fraternal smile, invite him to share with them a common glory acquired in the work of a common cause, the harmony of races and creeds and to perpetuate the principles that have long governed the British Empire. My hon. friend the member for Portage la Prairie with his subtle legal acumen explained that it was only for one minute that the right hon. leader of the Opposition was prevented from speaking. But, Mr. Speaker, it is not the length of time that counts, it is the action itself. I observed with regret my compatriots from Quebec on the other side of the House, rise one after another to vote for taking away the freedom of speech from the right hon. the leader of Opposition who governed this country for fifteen years and showed great generosity towards the members of the Opposition who to-day are acting so unworthily. I have noticed that my young friend the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Lavallee) stood up and voted at that time against the leader of the Government. He has risen from the plane of patronage to the higher and loftier plane of true Canadian patriotism. He is young; long may be his public career, to whatever party or policy his honest convictions may attach him. With him blood is thicker than water and with every man who is worthy of his race blood is thicker than water. Our hon. friend from North Cape Breton (Mr. McKenzie) told us the Roman eagles never displaced the Scotchman from the glens, the hills and the rocks of Scotland and that Scotland is still unconquered. If the blood of the Scotchman had not been thicker than water they would have been conquered long ago. If the blood of the Irishman had not been thicker than water and if the Irishman had not retained the fighting qualities of his race, Ireland would not be getting home rule next month. If blood had not been thicker than water, the Papineaus, the Vigers, the Taschereau's the Lafontaines, the Cartiers, the Dorions, and all those other great men, would not have been able to give us the privileges which we enjoy to-day, and hon. members from the province of Quebec would not have been able to speak their own French language in this House a fact which nobody would have regretted more than my hon. friend from Peterborough (Mr. Burnham).

What are the general purposes of these resolutions which have been brought before the House. To stop freedom of speech? To stop freedom of speech and no doubt more particularly with reference to this very question which is now before the people, a question in regard to which every freedom and liberty of discussion should be given. This question is more important than that of Confederation, and its discussions in which our forefathers engaged, whether in Quebec or in the Maritime provinces, the Howes and those other great men, because it means striking at the precious right of free speech for which they fought and which may be lost forever to this country if this measure is carried. We are told that we have abused freedom of speech and that we have endeavoured to prevent this Naval Aid Bill from passing. We are told that we have stopped public business. When did we stop public business. As it has been stated and repeated in this House, every time Supply has been asked we have given Supply. My right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) offered one-sixth of the Estimates without discussion, or the necessary amount to carry on the business of the country for the next two months, and yet hon. gentlemen say we have interfered with public business. What has been our purpose? The purpose has been to prevent the passage of a law providing for a contribution of $35,000,000 to England and for what? We were told at first it was a gift to England in a moment of emergency five months ago. During that five months England has been waiting, attending to other business, and was not this Opposition perfectly within its rights in endeavouring, by all possible means at its command under the principle of freedom of speech, and by virtue of our parliamentary procedure, to prevent the passage of such a law, not in the mere spirit of obstruction as some hon. members, as well as some of the newspapers, on the Government side are trying to convey to the public mind, but with a loyal and patriotic purpose and from the sincere conviction that such an Act should not be recorded at this one session. We and particularly our leaders, are supposed to be gifted with sufficient intelligence, with sufficient knowledge, to know that with time developments will come that will justify the action of the Opposition who claim to represent the majority of the people on this question. At the moment their representatives happen to be in the minority in this House, but they would not be in the minority, as we know, if hon. members from the province of Quebec, elected chiefly to oppose the measure which is before the House to-day, and to secure the passage of which closure is now proposed, had been faithful to their mandate and promises, as the hon. ex-Minister of Public Works (Mr. Monk) has been, and voted with the Opposition. We believe that we represent the majority of the people of the country and it is the duty as well as the right of the majority to enforce as far as possible their opinions upon the members of the Opposition—the temporary opposition—and endeavour to bring about delay by every justifiable and constitutional means at their command pending further developments because, since we have undertaken to delay the coming into effect of this measure, we have had developments which have justified more and more the Opposition without a single justification on the Government side. We have had expressions from the country, we have had expressions from Australia commending the people of the Dominion of Canada for the stand which they have taken and urging Canada to carry out her agreement made with Australia in 1911 by which Canada was to have built her own Canadian navy and taken charge of the trade routes on the Pacific. Australia has proceeded with the construction of her own navy and to-day expects that the Parliament of Canada will, before the end of this session, come to the decision of putting into effect our part of that agreement. We have had expressions from the other side of the ocean to the effect that the Laurier policy in favour of a Canadian navy is the best one suited to the interests of the Empire as well as the interests of Canada. Convinced as we are to-day by the expression of opinion in London and England as well as in Australia and other places, was it not our right as well as our duty to postpone the passage of the Bill proposed by the Government? Notwithstanding the condition in which we are threatened to be placed by this last Act of the Government, we expect that within one or two months the people of Canada will have expressed their opinion strongly enough that the Parliament of Canada will not sanction the Bill which for the purpose of passing this new resolution is placed before the House.

As I said a short time ago, I would be surprised to see all my compatriots on the other side of the House rising in their seats to vote for this tyrannical resolution, after the appeal of their old chief, the ex-

Minister of Public Works (Mr. Monk), who appeals to those who have, apparently at least, remained faithful to him. This is what he said:

I sincerely believe that those who oppose the naval policy of the Government cannot accept a proposal which under the circumstances is but a way to assure the adoption of a policy which they condemn.

This is the position into which this Parliament and the country are brought by the firm determination of the right hon. the leader of the Opposition and his followers in their efforts to safeguard the liberty of speech and other rights of minorities. Hon. gentlemen opposite say it is a gift to Great Britain It was a gift at first. Later, we have been told that it was a loan. If I meet a man in the street who is a Conservative, more particularly one of the followers of my friends opposite from the province of Quebec ,and ask him what he thinks of this Bill, he is induced by newspapers like L'Evenement to believe that this contribution of $35,000,000 is the end of everything for naval purposes; that, after that sum of money is paid there will be nothing more done for the Empire and he glories in the fact. That is the education which is given him by the French members on the other side of the House. If I tell him that it is only a beginning, he says: No, I know this is going to be the end of it; L'Evenement has told me so. He goes further than that; he says that the province of Ontario and the provinces of the west are going to pay four-fifths of that amount, and that therefore he will get off very easily. If my friends on the other side of the House will not tell the people of this country and the members of this House what it means, I shall do so. It is $35,000,000 paid for the opening of the door to Imperial federation; the people of Canada are not prepared to pay $35,000,000 to open the door to Imperial federation until their voice is heard. The leader of the Government has told us many times that we cannot stay in the position in which we are—that we have to get representation for contribution. On this side of the House, and with the majority of the people of Canada behind us, we say that we are willing to contribute to the assistance of the Empire, as far as our means will allow us to do, without quid pro quo of representation which could only be to the great detriment not only of Canada but of the Empire. As I said some time ago, the disintegration of the Empire, if it were to be accomplished under such conditions, would not be done by Canada. Those taken first into Imperial federation would be the first to get out of it. It would come from some of the other sister nations who would not allow themselves to be interfered with by Downing Street rule. There are men in this country who are not prepared to say that Canada shall go blindly into Imperial federation, and that she should pay $35,000,000 for it without receiving any authority from the people. It is not the amount of money involved that I am concerned about. If $35,000,000 could do any good to Great Britain, it would very willingly be given by members on this side of the House. It is not the amount in cash that Great Britain wants. She wants the expression of the loyalty of the people of the sister nations and the devotion which will make them ready in the future to render any sacrifice for the maintenance of her principles and to spend, when emergency requires, not $35,000,000, but the last dollar and the last man to protect her against any flag under the sun.

Once introduced, this guillotine would not be used for this purpose alone. There are other purposes for which it could be exercised. I for one, as one of the minority, have reason to be doubtful—I will not say of the honesty of purpose, but of the intentions of the Government, by the experience which we had last session. It is a Government of centralization in this matter, centralizing every sister nation in the Government of Great Britain. We had enough experience of this last session, to put the people of every province on their guard. This Government is imbued with the spirit of centralization; and therefore by it provincial rights are in danger in this Dominion of Canada to-day. We had this experience last year when subsidies were given to certain provinces without due consideration and without respect to the constitution. When the question of giving the province of Manitoba a subsidy with extent of territory was before the House, the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley) introduced an amendement begging the Government of the day to wait for six months, not to pass that legislation but to leave it in abeyance, and to call a conference of the premiers of the different provinces in order to discuss the question of subsidies. It was not a question of the amount of money. The point involved was that the money should be distributed on the basis of justice and in accordance with the terms of Confederation, that is each province to receive an amount according to population. And I supported the amendment of my hon. friend from St. John to that effect. But that amendment was carved away, and no conference has taken place ever since. When the measure was introduced here by the leader of the Government, my hon. friend from St. John fought hard to have this money distributed according to the terms of Confederation. And had it not been for the Senate exercising its authority and performing its proper functions in the protection of the minority, the Government of the day would have had imposed upon Canada a law under which the Government of the Dominion could go to any one province at any time and say: I have $1,000,000 to expend in your province for highways. If you do not wish to accept that sum for your roads we will build the roads ourselves in view of the next election. And so that province would have been placed in the position of either refusing the amount of money or allowing its provincial rights to be subverted so that provincial rights would have been non-existent in the country in a few years. Of course, we had the promise of the right hon. the Prime Minister that everything should be done on the basis of equity. But, especially since the spectacle we had here last Wednesday, we cannot—I do not say personally—but politically—feel the same admiration for him that we formerly felt, nor in such a matter can we take his word. As I have said, had it not been for the Senate, provincial rights would have ceased already. And if the Senate does its duty this session the result will be equally beneficial. I know very little of the senators, and have no means of judging what they will do. I know very well what I would do if I were in the Senate. My right hon. leader (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), if he were in his seat, would do me the justice to say that I willingly gave my claim to a man of my own race in the province of Nova Scotia, who has since been called to a higher and happier chamber. I have every confidence in the members of the Senate, not as Liberals but as representatives of Canadian public opinion and as public men of high position and I hope they will, when the occasion rises, do their duty as members of the great body given to the people of Canada by the constitution for the protection of minorities and of provincial rights. I say I have every confidence in the Senate. You have heard me, Mr. Speaker, in reply to the motion for the abolition of the Senate moved by the hon. member for Lincoln—who has not brought in that motion since the change of Government—declare that I believed the people of the Maritime provinces especially would not consent to the abolition of the Senate, and also gave my own opinion which I have just repeated here that the Senate was placed by the founders of Confederation aside from the turmoil of politics to act as watchful guardians over the rights of minorities. It was known at Confederation that the Senate might not have to act in defence of the principles specially put in its charge more than once in twenty-five years, but it was felt that if the Senate rose to the right true limit of its duty when the interests of which it was the guardian were attacked, it would well repay the people of Canada for all the expense involved in maintaining that body.

I may be asked: What are we to do? I do not wish to see disturbances in this House or in the country; but I say, it is worth while, in the interests of the country, that the Opposition may be able to set forth intelligently as well as forcibly reasons why such a Bill as the Navy Bill should not pass without the consent of the people. If I were asked what I would suggest, I would say to my right hon. friend the leader of the Government: Withdraw your Closure Bill; then, withdraw your Naval Act; and then go on with the business of the country. To hon. gentlemen opposite I would say: Put into effect the naval law of 1910, which was based upon the unanimous resolution of this House in 1909; do this, and we will give you every cent of the money you want. Call for tenders, and have the ships built in Canada by Canadian workmen and with Canadian material, thus building up a Canadian navy for the protection of the trade routes of Canada, ever ready to go to the defence of the Empire at such time as the Government may deem necessary or advisable; then the business of the country will go on.

We have received suggestions of conciliation from other quarters. Yesterday or the day before, Sir Thomas Shaughnessy said in London that he hoped that Sir Wilfrid Laurier and the right hon. leader of the Government would come to some harmonious understanding as a result of which some unanimous conclusion in regard to the matter would be reached. But on March 29, 1909, the loyal and the unanimous sentiments of the House were expressed by the resolution brought forward by the greatest parliamentarian on the other side, the member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster), and, if hon. gentlemen opposite have gone back on that resolution, it is not our fault. Harmony would once again be established if hon. gentlemen opposite would, to-night or to-morrow, decide to withdraw——

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. TURGEON: Hon. gentlemen opposite laugh, but some time they will laugh on the other side. Public opinion in this country will always find a means to be heard, with respect, and, before another four or six weeks have passed, perhaps hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House will realize that their position is neither patriotic nor Imperialistic, and that the advice given at the present time by hon. gentlemen on this side of the House should have prevailed.

Hon. gentlemen opposite say that closure has been adopted in the Parliament of Great Britain. Great Britain, with her population of forty-five or fifty millions of people, has but one House, and all business of local or international concern is dealt with by that Parliament. Some amendments have been made to the rules with a view to bringing about, not what this resolution is intended to do—to stop the freedom of speech of the people of Canada by their representatives with respect to a certain question—but to provide for and facilitate the despatch of public business. In this country we have a population of seven or eight millions of people, and, in addition to the central Parliament, we have nine legislatures, whose function it is to attend to local and provincial business; to say nothing of the municipal councils, which take charge of a large portion of the local business of the country. And, apart from this fact, the conditions with respect to the rights and privileges of the minorities in this country are different from what they are in Great Britain. Hon. gentlemen opposite have said that the United States Congress has adopted closure. Can you compare the Congress of the United States with this Parliament? The President and the members of Congress are elected for a term of four years, during which they can do anything at all they wish, and the administration of the day cannot be forced to go to the country. What is the consequence? With every change of administration, the whole civil service is thrown out, and a new one put in, with all the unfortunate consequences attendant upon such a condition. The hon. Postmaster General has said that this Parliament is elected for five years, and that there will be no general election within that period of time. It is true that this Parliament is elected for a period of five years, but that is subject to any appeal which may be made to the people by the leaders of the administration, and subject to the will of the people as expressed either by themselves in public meetings or by their representatives in the House. Many parliaments have been dissolved within a very short time after their inception. The Government of Sir John A. Macdonald was elected in 1873 by a large majority, and four months afterwards another election was held, and Sir Alexander Mackenzie was placed in charge of the Administration. In the provinces of Quebec, from Confederation until ten years ago, the average existence of a Government was a year and a half or two years. And why? Because the people of the province of Quebec, after the elections had taken place, voiced their opinions to such an extent that the leaders of the Government realized the necessity of appealing to the people, and, if the circumstances warranted, coming back with a fresh mandate from the people. If the present Government think they can do it, let them go to the people and come back with a fresh mandate from them. Under such conditions, and after such expressions of sentiment on the part of hon. gentlemen opposite, I say the refusal of the present Government to go to the country is their own condemnation. If they think they can get a mandate from the people, why do they not go and get it? We on this side of the House are willing to run the risk.

There are many things in connection with this matter with which one might deal, and I have spoken at much greater length than I had intended, but I hope that before the end of the week a better and wiser counsel will prevail in the mind of my right hon. friend the Prime Minister. My hon. friend the Minister of Public Works seems to be very seriously considering the situation, and, as he claims to be able to win elections, let him advise the Government to allow this Parliament to retain the conditions which are essential to the liberty of speech of its members. After having promised to do what I have advised them to do, let the Government ask the balance of the Supply for the year and we will give it to them and let the Minister of Marine, if he has found the ships that were recommended by the Admiralty in 1911, obsolete before they were contracted for, ask the Admiralty to give him new plans and then open a shipyard in St. John, Halifax, Montreal or Quebec; and let him start right away to build ships and we will vote him $15,000,000 or $20,000,000 as he wants it for each years work until the $35,000,000 is expended. Let him be courageous and be Canadian and he will have our support.

Mr. E. B. DEVLIN (Wright): In view of the extraordinary action of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Hazen), in proposing the previous question to the resolution introduced in this House by the Prime Minister last week, it would be idle further to discuss the matter. If no amendments may be proposed to a resolution, a motion or a Bill before the House, words are altogether useless, and this is a case where we are in this position, that a Government majority sets down a rule for the House to follow, tell us we must adopt it, and then coolly asks the House what we think about it. While I do not feel disposed to discuss this at length, I wish to say a few words in order that the public may appreciate the circumstances surrounding this extraordinary procedure on the part of the Prime Minister, the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, the Government, and their supporters. The rules which govern us in this House regulate the conscience and the conduct of the members of this House, and we are in the extraordinary position of being asked to bind our conscience and our conduct as members of the House without being able to say whether the rules which are to bind us should govern or should not govern our procedure. It has been laid down by all constitutional authorities in this House that there is a procedure to be followed in amending the rules of the House. You, Mr. Speaker, are supposed to be one of the guiding spirits in the amendment of the rules of this House. A motion is generally placed in your hands that a select committee composed of a certain number of members be appointed in order to consider the rules, amend them if necessary, and after their report has been presented, a resolution has been brought into the House embodying their findings. Bourinot at page 305 says:

> Whenever it is necessary to appoint a committee in the Commons to revise the rules and standing orders of the House it is customary to place it under the direction of Mr. Speaker, the motion being:
>
> That a special committee of.....members be appointed to assist Mr. Speaker in revising the rules of the House, &c.
>
> When this committee has reported, its proceedings will be ordered to be printed with the amendments in brackets, generally in the Votes and Proceedings; and after some time has been given to members for the consideration of the proposed changes, the House will resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole on the report. When the rules or amendments to the rules are reported from the committee, they must be formally concurred in like any other resolutions; and when that has been done they regulate the procedure of the House.

The Prime Minister has not told us why he has disregarded all constitutional usage in this country and what principle or principles have guided him in following out the rules laid down by Bourinot in amending the rules of the procedure of the House.

Let me, for a moment or two, refer to the circumstances which brought about this extraordinary resolution. In 1909 a resolution was unanimously passed in this House respecting a naval policy for this country. In 1910 a Bill founded upon that unanimous resolution was presented to the House by the present leader of the Opposition, then the Prime Minister, and that Bill passed and became the law of the Parliament of Canada. The then Opposition, the present Government, contended that the policy which was then adopted, founded upon the resolution passed by the unanimous consent of the House, should be altered and they brought in what did not seem to meet with the approval of the electors of this country, a policy of contribution to the Imperial navy. The discussion, as you know, took some time. Members upon this side of the House, representing millions of the people of Canada, thought it necessary to exercise all the privileges of their mandate in contesting a policy which was altogether contrary to the policy unanimously adopted by the House in 1909 and in the course of that discussion, when simply exercising the privileges accorded to members of this House, the Government, finding that the discussion did not entirely suit them, awakened one day to the thought that the arguments of the Opposition were too strong, that they were appealing to the country and that the country would not have their policy. They therefore decided to bring in some measure that would stop the discussion. The Opposition, as I take it, are not opposed to the amendment of the rules of debate in the House. We are not contesting the right of the Government to have the rules amended; we are contesting the manner in which the rules are being amended, the time at which they are being amended and the procedure followed by the Government in making the amendment. I did not propose to speak at any length upon this question. I said that discussion was useless but I do wish to give more than my silent protest against the manner in which the Government has dealt with this question. I would like to point out that when hon. gentlemen opposite say they are basing their procedure upon the English procedure, they are acting in ignorance of what has been done in the English Parliament.

It has been asserted during the course of the debate that the Right Hon. William Ewart Gladstone introduced closure along similar lines. Mr. Speaker, you, who have devoted so much of your time to the study of the procedure which is followed in the English House; you who have made a special study of the debates which have taken place in the English House understand how fallacious such a statement made by hon. gentlemen opposite is. You remember, Mr. Speaker, that when Mr. Gladstone proposed the amendment of the rules in order to introduce closure, he allowed every possible latitude in the discussion of the question. You remember that Mr. Gladstone found that proper time could not be given to the reasoning out of these rules, and to the proper discussion of them, and he, of his own motion as Prime Minister, adjourned the English House of Commons from the month of August until the 24th of October, and called a session specially to consider the amended rules and the amending of the rules. You remember also what took place during the debates, and if any man in this House or in this country should remember why it was that Mr. Gladstone refused to allow closure to be placed in the hands of a minister of the Crown, or of a member of the House, to judge whether closure should be introduced or not, you should remember it, Mr. Speaker, because Mr. Gladstone wished to keep up the dignity of the position of Speaker of the House of Commons. And yet to-day the right hon. the Prime Minister forgets the impartial position which the Speaker of the House of Commons should occupy and does occupy. He is not satisfied that in your hands this motion of closure would be in impartial hands. What does he do? He places it in the hands of a minister of the Crown. Are we not right in objecting to the procedure followed by the Prime Minister in introducing his motion of closure? Mr. Gladstone has been wrongly quoted in this House. Mr. Gladstone would never have put up with the indignities that have been offered to the position of Speaker in this House. What did Mr. Gladstone say? I refer you, Mr. Speaker, to a memorable speech of his which is reported in English 'Hansard' No. 274, on page 492. Here are Mr. Gladstone's words:

We have said that the Speaker, the one great impartial authority of the House—I am now speaking of the full House and not of the House in Committee, though we think the Chairman follows in the train of the argument—shall exercise this function; but in the exercise of this function that he shall appear as what he is—the officer of the House, not of the majority of the House. We will carefully keep away every semblance of a connection between the Speaker and the majority in the formation of his judgment or in inciting him to move.

Again, further on, on page 493, Mr. Gladstone is reported as follows:

We fundamentally and practically object to such a scheme——

That was a scheme of allowing any latitude to the majority in influencing the Speaker of the House of Commons.

We fundamentally and practically object to such a scheme; we would rather at once throw over this proposal with regard to the closing power than contaminate it by bringing the action of a party and party influence into connection with the Chair.

Again, Mr. Gladstone said:

It would be as possible, Sir, for a despot or a tyrant under our constitutional laws to sit on the throne of this country as it would be for a Speaker to retain the Chair of this House when once he had visibly and appreciably and practically made himself the slave of party passions.

For that reason, Sir, Mr. Gladstone placed upon the Speaker of the English House of Commons the duty of saying when the previous question should be moved, and when closure should be applied. Had that procedure been followed in this Parliament, perhaps the Opposition would have felt more secure. But what happened? The right hon. the Prime Minister, discarding the rule, that has been usually followed in this House, of placing in the hands of a committee the amending of the rules of procedure proposed of his own motion a resolution to amend the rules in a most unintelligible manner. I defy any hon. member of this House to understand thoroughly the meaning of those amended rules. No hon. member is capable of doing so, or of applying them for practical purposes. The right hon. the Prime Minister presented that resolution to stop discussion upon a vital question in this House, that of naval aid to Great Britain. After that had been done, the right hon. the leader of the Opposition naturally got up, as you would have done, Mr. Speaker, if you had been a private member of this House, and, using the experience which you had acquired during long years, you would have offered certain suggestions in respect to the amending of those rules. But in order to prevent that, the right hon. Prime Minister put up a member of the House of Commons and his Minister of Marine and Fisheries to prevent the right hon. the leader of the Opposition from offering any amendment. Of course the procedure was irregular. In the English House of Commons, Mr. Gladstone allowed hundreds of amendments. He himself proposed any number of amendments. The procedure which has been followed in this House is without precedent in the history of any civilized country. Hon. gentlemen opposite say that closure operates in certain countries, and they have instanced Belgium, Spain, and Poland. They could have gone further away and they could have come nearer home. They could have said that such a rule had been introduced in Victoria, Australia, and that it had been discarded and they could have said that, although it was in existence in other countries, it was rarely applied. Do you know, Mr. Speaker—you must know—why the previous question was first introduced? In an old edition of Mr. Todd's Parliamentary Law, 1840, we read the following:

When a proposition is moved which it is useless or inexpedient to discuss at the time, the previous question has been introduced for suppressing temporarily, the motion and its discussion.

Note the words. Was the naval question a question which it was useless or inexpedient to discuss? I should rather judge that would be inexpedient for the Government to discuss it. Mr. Todd goes on to say:

The proper occasion for the previous question is, when a subject is brought forward of a delicate nature, as to high personages, &c., or the discussion of which may call forth observations which might be of injurious consequences. Then the previous question is proposed, and the discussion of the main question is suspended, and the debate confined to the previous question. The use of it has been abusively extended to other cases; but in these it is an embarrassing procedure, and the intention would be answered fully as well by more simple parliamentary forms, and therefore it should not be used, but restricted within as narrow limits as possible.

Neither Mr. Todd, nor any other historian, has ever been known to find a case wherein the previous question has been proposed to prevent the discussion of rules of procedure. Let me put it for the last time to hon. members seated opposite; they still have a recourse. The hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, who is the personification of everything that is dignified, has still a right. He may stand up in his place and beg leave to withdraw his motion. He must have seen, since the discussion has taken place, that the phraseology of the amended rules is all wrong. He must know that, as long as his motion stands before the House, the phraseology cannot be changed. Why does he not act in his own dignified manner, stand up and recognize that he has made a mistake, that it has been unknown ever to move the previous question on amended rules and withdraw his motion. Then, discussion may be useful. Until he does that I feel that we are perfectly helpless. A certain hon. member on the other side of the House, speaking to this question, said that the hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries proposed the previous question just to prevent the leader of the Opposition from speaking for a minute and a half. Did it appeal to you, Sir, that during that minute and a half, the leader of the Opposition might have said things that would not nave been to the advantage of the Government? Is that what they feared? What could he say in a minute and a half that would have been so detrimental to the interests of the Government? Was it not a childish action on the part of the men who are charged with the administration of affairs of this country. Was it acting in a manly way? Is that what the country expects of the Government? What is the position of the leader of the Opposition in this Parliament? What is the position of the Opposition? Have we no rights? Have we no privileges? Are we not to be left to the exercise of our rights and our privileges? Have the people sent us here for no purpose, but simply to sit and listen to what may be enacted by the Government? My hon. friend from Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) suggests to pay for the padlocks. Well, there is a great deal of sense in saying that. What can happen? My hon. friend the Postmaster General (Mr. Pelletier) orders 350,000 padlocks, makes a contract, says they are standard padlocks, that they cost more than ordinary padlocks, that Parliament may be burnt, that we may all die, that the Postmaster General may disappear from the country and that in order that there may be no mistake about it and that the business of the country may go on he wants to order enough padlocks to do for forty years to come. Now they introduce a rule which may prevent us from discussing that. I ask you, Sir, I ask the Government, is that a manly attitude for the Government to take? Why introduce this closure at the present time? Why prevent our discussion?

An hon. MEMBER: Why obstruct the Bill?

Mr. DEVLIN: What does the hon. gentleman say? I would like to hear his wise remark. Has some hon. gentleman opposite been getting leave to say a word? He is in exactly the same position as we are; he may talk till Doomsday but he cannot amend a single, solitary rule introduced by his Government. He must swallow it and he must swallow it without protest. But, if we are obliged to swallow this procedure, we will swallow it at least after having made a protest, after saying that we believe that never was such an iniquitous measure presented to this Parliament or to any parliament by any government. Having said that, we have said all that we are able to say upon the subject. There are several amendments that I might like to offer myself to the rules and I might wish to speak to these amendments. I ask the Government, will they withdraw their motion and allow me to propose some amendments? Not one. I resume my seat protesting as energetically as I am able, as a member of this House representing thousands of electors, against the attitude of the Government and I say that one of the darkest pages in the history of this Parliament was the day when the right hon. the Prime Minister introduced the closure and the other will be the day when the majority sitting behind the right hon. gentleman shall enact it into law.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, in rising to address the House upon this resolution, it is my intention to do so in the briefest manner possible. It is not my intention at all to discuss the scope and effect of the proposed amendment to the rules of the House of Commons, as contained in this resolution, but rather to discuss the propriety and necessity of any amendment to the rules. At the outset, I feel that I must concur in the protests which have been registered by my fellow-members on this side of the House against the method of procedure adopted on Wednesday of last week when the resolution which we are now discussing was moved by the Prime Minister. This House and the country generally will long regret that the distinguished leader of the Opposition, long a prominent and conspicuous figure in the affairs of this country, was not permitted to continue in the debate on the resolution after having been first assigned the right to speak by you, Mr. Speaker. I do not imagine that it was the intention of rule 17 that, after the Speaker of this House saw first the leader of the Opposition, that right could have been taken from him under any of the provisions of that rule.

Before I proceed to discuss the resolution, I wish to refer to another rule of this House. It is quite clear that the motion made by the Prime Minister the other day in introducing the resolution was not in order, upon the ground that he did not give to the House the necessary notice. Rule 40 is to the following effect:

Two days' notice shall be given of a motion for leave to present a Bill, resolution or address, for the appointment of any committee, or for the putting of a question.

The rule further says:

Such notice shall be laid on the table before five o'clock p.m., and be printed in the Votes and Proceedings of that day.

I contend that this rule was not observed by the Government, and accordingly, the resolution is improperly before the House. I am not going to argue what is two days' notice under this rule; but I think it is quite clear that the requisite notice was not given to the House. I remember very well on Monday night of last week, after the House had adjourned, the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Rogers), in my presence, gave notice to the leader of the Opposition that the Votes and Proceedings of the following day would contain notice of closure, which is the resolution before us. I think I am perfectly safe in saying that that notice was not filed with the clerk on or before five o'clock on Monday afternoon, and, that being the case, I think beyond peradventure the resolution is not properly before the House. When I conclude the very brief remarks which I am going to make, I shall ask for your ruling, Mr. Speaker, upon that point.

Before proceeding further, I wish to point out that rule 40 says further, that two days' notice is necessary for leave to present a motion for the putting of a question. In my judgment, without having had the opportunity of giving very much study to that particular part of the rule, I think it must refer to the putting of a motion such as moved by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Hazen) on Wednesday last, immediately after the resolution was moved by the Prime Minister. In any event, Mr. Speaker, I am submitting this rule to you for your consideration, feeling that the contention which I am putting forward is amply supported by the rule, that the resolution is out of order for want of notice; and, further, that for want of notice the motion of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries is out of order, and that, if the main resolution is in order, it would be subject to an amendment.

I do not propose to discuss the scope and effect of the amendment proposed to be made to the rules of this House by this resolution. I do not deny that it is possible that some of the rules of the House might with propriety be amended. I do not think that any hon. gentleman on this side of the House will contend that the amendment of any rule which circumscribes within proper bounds the debates on any matter is not perfectly proper. If hon. gentlemen opposite are moved sincerely with the desire of reforming the rules in the interest of the business of the House and the country, they will have the cordial support of hon. gentlemen on this side of the House.

I wish to present some objections to the resolution and to answer briefly some contentions which have been urged in support of the resolution by hon. members opposite.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Does the hon. member argue that, inasmuch as the notice was not given in time to be in the Votes and Proceedings of Monday, as a consequence its being taken up on Wednesday was premature and out of order?

Mr. MACLEAN: Yes.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Just because it was not in the Votes and Proceedings of Monday?

Mr. MACLEAN: I say that that notice was not laid on the table of the House before five o'clock on Monday afternoon, and consequently the appearance in the Votes and Proceedings on Tuesday would count for nothing.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I would inform the hon. gentleman that it was in the Votes and Proceedings of Monday.

Mr. MACLEAN: That is a matter which I shall leave to the Speaker for inquiry. As it is a question of fact, he will have to determine that and to announce to the House his grounds for his finding. In any event, provided the notice was placed on the table before five o'clock in the afternoon of Monday last, even then I do not think the rule was complied with so far as time is concerned, as there was not the full two days' notice.

I was saying that all hon. members would view with favour any effort on the part of the Government to amend our rules so as to expedite the business of the House. In this connection, I wish to say that the amendment of the rules of the House is a matter which falls within the purview and jurisdiction of Parliament alone, and not of the Government. Proposals to amend existing rules should not and cannot properly emanate from the Government, but they must proceed from the House. I doubt if there is another instance in the history of this country when proposals to amend the rules of Parliament have ever emanated from the Government. The reason for this is manifest and obvious. Parliament will respect its own rules, rules which it initiates, carries forward and concludes; but it is only natural to expect that hon. gentlemen sitting upon this side of the House, opposing the Administration of the day will hardly entertain the same respect for rules initiated and promulgated by the Government alone. It has been the traditional policy of this Parliament and of the British Parliament, and so far as I know of all parliaments, to place the amending of the rules of procedure in the hands of a committee representing Parliament and not a government or one political party. There has been given to the House no reason for this departure from a rule so long observed in this and other parliaments, a rule whose wisdom I think must be obvious to every hon. gentleman. Then, I think, we on this of the House may fairly object to the spirit manifested by the hon. gentlemen opposite in introducing this resolution and in considering the proposals to amend the rules of the House. I take it that everything would indicate that hon. gentlemen opposite have introduced this resolution for the purpose of securing the passage of the Naval Bill and not primarily for the purpose of amending the rules of the House. If they were animated solely by a desire to amend the rules of the House, they surely would not have moved, as they did, the previous question, which has prevented any amendment. And I am sure that public opinion in this country will dissent from the position taken by hon. gentlemen opposite, and will condemn the manner of their procedure to amend the rules of the House.

The friends of the Government also urge that because other countries have adopted parliamentary rules similar to the one we are now considering, that is a reason why the resolution before the House should be accepted. I submit, and in all fairness, that the fact that the British Parliament or the parliament of any other country has adopted the closure or anything approaching it is not conclusive upon the point so far as we are concerned. Conditions may be absolutely different in other countries. Therefore it is not of any great importance to us in the consideration of this resolution to know that in other parliaments rules somewhat similar have been adopted in the past. It is many years ago that closure was adopted in England, and it is only proper that we should inquire why closure was introduced there. It has been stated by several hon. gentlemen on this side already, and I need not repeat the argument, that closure was first adopted in England because obstruction was practised by a small group not allied with the great political parties of the country, a group not protesting against any paritcular legislation, but indiscriminately opposing and obstructing all business of every character brought forward by the Government of the day. That was obstruction, obstruction of a nature alogether unknown in this House and this country, and obstruction of a nature ctrtainly not practised in this Parliament during the present session. I say the adoption of closure under such circumstances was perfectly justifiable, but similar circumsances do no exist, and have not existed in this country, therefore no conclusion or deductions that are at all relevant may be made from the fact that closure was adopted years ago in the English Parliament. Further, closure never was adopted in the English Parliament or any other parliament, so far as I know, in order to secure the passage of a specific measure which had been the cause of protracted debate as is the case in this House. I presume that I may with propriety and within the rules of this House, say that the purpose for introducing this resolution is to secure the passage of the Naval Aid Act. I say there should be more and greater reasons for the introduction of closure than that a single important public measure has met with delay and with protracted debate. Further, closure was never adopted in England upon any great public measure and to secure the enactment of such a measure or any of its provisions until it had them passed upon by the people. I doubt that it has been done in any other country. I propose to show it is highly improper and is against the best traditions of British countries to ask for the enactment of closure to secure the passage of a measure which has not been submitted to the people. Further, as stated by many on this side, there are other reasons why closure or something in the nature of closure was adopted in the British House of Commons. That was a Parliament of over six hundred members, while we have just over two hundred; they legislate not only for the United Kingdom, but for a vast Empire; they deal with so many important subjects that it was only natural and inevitable that there should come a time that the parliamentary rules involving closure would be adopted. Hon. gentlemen opposite have said that all European countries have adopted rules equivalent to the English closure rules, and similar to those now sought to be adopted by this House. But in respect of European countries, there is at least one reason why such a rule is quite proper, and, in fact, inevitable. There may be other reasons which do not come to my mind; but in all European countries, without exception I believe, there are groups of parties—more in some countries than in others. In those countries there does not obtain, as in this country, a division of political bodies into two great forces; and, consequently, in the Parliaments of Europe it is impossible to obtain what the Prime Minister referred to the other day as closure by consent. In a sense, we have had closure in this Parliament for years, but it has been by consent, and I submit that closure by consent for the future would have been quite sufficient for the needs of this Parliament.

It has also been said that the United States House of Representatives years ago adopted rules for the restriction of debate, and that we should follow the example of our republican neighbours. I submit that no conclusion is deducible from the fact that the House of Representatives of the United States has adopted such rule. The House of Representatives is numerically a very much larger body than the Parliament of Canada; the period of its sitting is, at least for some sessions, fixed by the constitution of the country, and it was inevitable that rules should be adopted to circumscribe debate in some degree. During the past two or three years I have followed rather carefully the debates of the United States Congress and there is no lesson in the matter of procedure which the Parliament of Canada can gain from them. The curtailment of debate by congressional rules was the beginning of that other regulation which enabled members of the House of Representatives to obtain the leave of the House to have their remarks inserted in the Congressional Record without delivering them verbally upon the floor of the House. This has led to a state of affairs which, I think, is very much condemned in the United States, and it is a practice which I am sure we in this country should not care to follow.

Therefore, when hon. gentlemen opposite point to the fact that in Great Britain, in European countries, and in the United States parliaments and legislative bodies have adopted closure rules, it affords no argument for similar action on our part at this particular time. Debating this resolution from the standpoint of a Canadian. I do not admit that there has been any obstruction in this House during the present session which justifies the adoption of a closure rule. Any delay in the passage of particular legislation which hon. gentlemen designate as obstruction was entirely referable to one Bill, and hon. gentlemen cannot therefore properly or fairly urge that public business has been delayed or obstructed because the passage of one particular measure was impeded by a somewhat protracted debate. Judged from other viewpoints, I say there is no necessity for the adoption of closure in Canada. Our Parliament is numerically small; our membership is about two hundred and twenty, not nearly so large as the legislative bodies of many other countries of the world. Our experience in this Parliament from Confederation down to the present time does not prove that there is any necessity for the adoption of closure.

Hon. gentlemen opposite have urged, as a reason for the adoption of the proposed amendment to the rules, the fact that on previous occasions opinions have been expressed by members of the late government upon the desirability of the enactment of the closure rules. From no standpoint, whatever, am I impressed with this argument. Even if it be true that closure was urged as being desirable by the Hon. Mr. Fielding, Hon. Mr. Paterson, or by any other members of the late government, that is no argument which proves the necessity or desirability of the enactment of the amendments to the rules. Furthermore, I desire to say that when these opinions were expressed, they were merely obiter dicta, or opinions which did not relate to any concrete proposal to amend the rules of the House. I think hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House will recognize the force of the contention that when hon. gentlemen are expressing opinions on any matter, not having before them for discussion and for adjudication any particular concrete facts, the opinions expressed are apt in some cases, or to some degree at least, to be irrelevant. Therefore I say that the opinions expressed by hon. gentlemen who were members of the late government are not binding or conclusive upon hon. gentlemen on this side of the House on the present occasion. I do not know what amendments those hon. gentlemen had in their minds; they may have been quite proper and necessary, but, until it is stated to the House what particular amendments to the rules these hon. gentlemen had in mind, we cannot pass judgment as to their propriety or impropriety. But this should be borne in mind. The opinions expressed by the Hon. Mr. Fisher and Hon. Mr. Paterson were made, I think, in 1911, during the election of that year, when the question of reciprocity between Canada and the United States was the issue, and, from all I can gather from remarks made by hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House, the statements made by Mr. Fielding, Mr. Fisher, and Mr. Paterson were to the effect that if the Government of that day were returned to power they would so amend the rules as to secure the passage of that particular measure. That was a perfectly proper comment and remark to make. Parliament was dissolved and the Government of the day were obliged to appeal to the people upon a particular measure whose enactment was prevented by the action of the Opposition of that day; and the Government of that day, had they been returned to power with that particular issue ratified by the people, would have had, impliedly, ample justification for the establishment of rules of closure to secure the passage of that measure and to make sure that the will of the people could not be blocked by the obstruction of a minority.

In 1907 I placed upon the Order Paper of the House an amendment calling for a two-day's notice of any motion made for the adjournment of the House or on going into Supply in order to discuss any matter. I was moved to place that motion upon the Order Paper in that particular session because on one or two occasions it had happened that very important measures were brought up for consideration by members of the Opposition of that day without the House having due notice. I thought it was unfair, and for a time I did think it was a fit and proper amendment to be made to the rules of the House that two day's notice of such motion should be given. The ultimate effect of that rule was not to limit debate; it was only to give ample notice so that the debate could be ample and complete. No rights of hon. gentlemen were affected nor could debate have been curtailed by such an amendment to the rules of the House. In moving the motion, I intimated that I did not intend pressing for a vote, but nevertheless the right hon. gentleman who leads the House (Mr. Borden) on that occasion said:

> It rather takes the House by surprise to have a proposal of this kind made. The rules of the House are not lightly dealt with in this way. The universal practice is that so important a matter as an important amendment to the rules of the House should be submitted in the first place to a committee, considered by that committee and reported to the House, when the House would take it into consideration.

I quite agree with the position taken by the Prime Minister on that occasion, and it fortifies the position which I myself take this evening, that the amendment of the rules of procedure of this or any other parliament is a matter strictly and justly within the purview of Parliament, and that there is no authority, written or otherwise, to justify a government in assuming the right of initiating amendments to parliamentary rules. The Prime Minister proceeded:

> We revised the rules of the House two years ago, and in the opinion of the House there was no occasion at that time for any such far-reaching amendment as is now proposed.
> It would prevent the discussion of any grievance to go into Committee of Supply unless two days' notice were previously put upon the Order Paper.

The Prime Minister objected to what I do not think was a restriction upon debate or the presentation of grievances on going into Supply. But he seems perfectly contented with the rules which he has presented for our consideration, which will undoubtedly limit the opportunities of members to discuss grievances upon going into Supply. Nothing has happened in the history of this House since 1907 which would justify in the slightest degree the adoption of closure rules as proposed by the resolution.

As I have already said, it has been contended as a justification for this resolution that specific business, definite legislation, has been impeded by hon. gentlemen on this side of the House during the present session. In other words, the reason assigned for the passage of this resolution is that there has been a delay in the passage of the Naval Aid Act. I say that this does not afford sufficient justification for the enactment of this resolution. I say there has been no obstruction to the Naval Aid Act. The term obstruction, I believe, has been used on this side of the House. I perhaps might differ with some of my political confreres upon your left, but I say that at the most, admitting that there has been a very lengthy discussion on that particular Bill, all you can say is that the debate has been protracted. There was two weeks of continuous debate. But I hardly consider that as obstruction offered by hon. gentlemen upon this side of the House to the passage of the Bill. I look upon it as the answer to a challenge of the Government to all-night sittings, only that and nothing more. In a large sense, it was more a physical contest than a contest between the two parties of the House over the merits of the Naval Aid Act. Before an Opposition occupy more than the ordinary time of Parliament in opposing any parliamentary measure, there must be some reason for it. They must be in receipt of support from the public, otherwise they would not continue that protracted debate. They must feel that they have some manifestation from the electorate that public opinion is with them in their attitude.

It is true that gentlemen opposite did not debate the Bill as much as we did on this side. One hon. gentleman justified this resolution by the fact that we upon this side of the House spoke more columns in 'Hansard' than hon. gentlemen on that side of the House. Hon. gentlemen opposite could not debate the question. When the Bill was first introduced, it was upon the theory, and upon the basis that there was an emergency. That was the reason assigned by the Prime Minister. The debate had not continued very far when that reason was adandoned.

It followed quite logically that hon. gentlemen could not participate in the debate because the reasons which they gave originally for introducing the Bill had been abandoned. Now, if our Opposition was justified against the emergency reason, when that was abandoned by the Government itself, surely there was greater justification for continued opposition to the Bill. I say to the Government that when they introduced that Bill they gave only one reason, and according to their own statements, that reason has vanished, and therefore I say the Bill itself should vanish.

Hon. gentlemen opposite say that not only has a specific measure been impeded in its passage through this House, but that public business has been delayed by obstruction practised by hon. gentlemen on this side of the House. Now, Mr. Speaker, I think I can, with all truthfulness, deny that particular assertion. Let me repeat that opposition to one Bill is not obstructing the conduct of public affairs of this Parliament. There is no reason in the world why the Naval Aid Bill should have occupied the time of this Parliament since December 5 to the exclusion of every other piece of public business standing on the Order Paper. There is no reason whatever why a considerable number of the estimates should not have been passed, why we should not have been further advanced in our consideration of the Banking Act, or why the West Indies treaty should not have been long since passed by this House, and sent to the Senate for their consideration. There is no sound or logical reason why we should not have dealt months ago with the Highways Act, and with other important legislation presented by the Government. Therefore, when hon. gentlemen opposite say that we on this side of the House are responsible for impeding public business, they are not justified by the facts, and it is due altogether to themselves.

Now, Mr. Speaker, as I have already said, the Prime Minister and his followers, base this resolution on the delay of the passage of the Naval Aid Bill. I ask, can they complain? Is that a justification for the resolution? I repeat that it is elementary that closure was intended to apply only to measures that have been first submitted to the people, and that have been approved by them. The closure is, and always has been, intended to enable Parliament to carry out the popular will, when the popular will is expressed. The closure can have no other justification or basis. If it has any other basis, it is no other than a piece of tyranny. The Hon. Mr. Fisher was perfectly correct from his standpoint when he said that if the Government were returned after the elections of 1911, they would amend the rules so as to ensure the passage of the reciprocity Bill, because, had the Government been returned, the country would have expressed its will upon the measure, and closure in all countries has been invoked to make sure that the popular will shall not be set aside by obstructive methods on the part of a minority or of any group in any particular parliament. Closure is the people's remedy against obstruction when the people have spoken. I submit with all emphasis, that it never should be used by any government in the way it has been attempted in this case to secure the passage of a measure which has never been submitted to the people, and upon which the people have never expressed an opinion. In England, closure could not live a single day upon any other assumption than the one I have stated. There, it is the weapon used to enforce the will of the people. That has been evidenced in the past two years in that country. It has been used to secure the passage of very important legislation upon which the people had expressed their opinion. It would have been a very serious condition of affairs indeed had it been possible on the part of a minority of the British Parliament to impede the passage of important legislation upon which the people had expressed their will. In 1910 we had in England what is known as the Budget Election, and that election was really decisive as to the position of the House of Lords upon the Veto Bill. It is true that it was not directly the issue; the budget was the prime and direct issue, but it also involved the provisions of the Veto Bill which followed. But the Budget, or Finance Election, as I shall call it, came and passed, and then the Veto measure came up. Mr. Asquith the Prime Minister of Great Britain did not adopt the closure. The Veto Bill was in some sense decided by the election upon the budget of that year, and in a commanding sense the Veto Bill then being considered by the British Parliament had been before the people. But still there had to be another election, and there were two elections in the year 1910. The Unionist party challenged the Government to a dissolution. They said that the people had not expressed their opinion upon the provisions of that Bill and that therefore the closure should not be applied. The people thought, as did the Unionist party at that time, and the issue had to come directly before the people. There was no justification in the opinion of English statesmen and of the English people, for the adoption of closure. It was the people's innings, and closure was not invoked for the purpose of passing the Veto Bill. The position in that particular respect was absolutely sound. By no process of legitimate reasoning can the Government make it clear to this House or the country that it is fair and within the traditions of British parliaments to enact closure so as to secure the passage of a measure which was never considered by the people of the country. The position which I take is unanswerable. It is a reason why this resolution should not be adopted by the House.

Judged by the best British standards and parliamentary traditions, where do we stand upon this question? The Naval Aid Bill was not an issue in the last election. I have heard a statement to the contrary made by hon. gentleman opposite, but I deny absolutely the truth of such. I have never been able to make myself believe that they were sincere in making that statement. I will modify however to some extent, my statement and say that possibly in the province of Quebec it was an issue. But it was an issue to this extent only, that the people were led to believe by hon. gentlemen opposite that they would introduce no naval policy, that particularly and specifically, they would not introduce any contribution scheme, without first submitting the question to the people. It is true that such expressions by leaders of the Government party may have been indefinite and deliberately clouded in order to mystify the electorate of Quebec. But, nevertheless, I say that substantially every one of them, without equivocation, promised that there would be no naval policy or scheme adopted without first submitting the same to the country.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Ministers included.

Mr. MACLEAN: Ministers included.

Mr. BUREAU: And repealing the Naval Act.

Mr. MACLEAN: And, further, the repeal of the Naval Act. However, the repeal of the Naval Act is not directly relevant to the point I am making, although it is in a sense. The fact I am now stating was clearly proven by my hon. friend from Shefford (Mr. Bovin) in the very excellent and able speech which he delivered last Friday evening. It being the case that the question of naval aid was not before the electors in the last election, except in one province, and there in a sense which does not afford an assumption on the part of the Government that the people of that province even justified the proposed Bill. I ask hon. gentlemen opposite, I ask the hon. the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Rogers), the hon. the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Cochrane) and the hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Hazen), who are the only three members of the Government present in the House this evening, if they think that, in the light of such facts and under all the circumstances, they can justify to the House and to the country the course which they are seeking to pursue to-night.

Again, we were told by the right hon. the Prime Minister that the purport and effect of the Naval Aid Bill was not to contribute to the British Admiralty three ships but the loaning of them to the British Admiralty. Some day, they say, they will be returned to Canada and will become part of a Canadian navy. There is only one inference fairly deducible from that statement and it is that the Government themselves some day propose the establishment of a Canadian navy, they propose recalling these three vessels which we own and which for the time being are loaned to the British Admiralty. This in effect is the first instalment of their permanent policy of a Canadian navy. Now they will not deny that they promised the people of Quebec, and the people of Canada generally, that they would submit this question to the country before their policy was adopted. Still they are asking Parliament for a vote of $35,000,000 and for, according to their own statement, what is the first instalment of a Canadian permanent naval policy. If they wish to observe their own promises they should not forget that they are under obligation to submit their policy to the people before commencing even the first instalment of a policy.

Therefore, in conclusion, let me say that I think that the course which the Government should pursue is quite clear. The Government can withdraw this resolution, at least until the principles involved in the Naval Bill now before us have been submitted to the people. They are violating the best parliamentary practice known in British countries when they seek to secure the passage of that, or any other measure, by closure until the people have passed upon it. There is one other course, and that is to withdraw the present measure. Such, Mr. Speaker, are my reasons for opposing the resolution which we are now considering.

Let me revert to the objection which I took as to the insufficiency of notice of the resolution to the House. Rule 40 says that:

Two days' notice shall be given of a motion for leave to present a Bill, resolution or address,

There is a comma at this point and I may stop here because this is the portion of the rule which I invoke in this particular instance. I submit to you, Mr. Speaker, in the first instance, that this notice was not laid on the table of the House before five o'clock on the afternoon of Monday last. Even if it had, I do not think that the Government or the Prime Minister would have been justified in moving his motion on Wednesday as it would not have afforded the House the notice required by this particular rule.

Mr. ROGERS: I am sure that my hon. friend the junior member for Halifax (Mr. Maclean) is much too old a parliamentarian, much too experienced in the rules of this House, to be really serious in the suggestion which he makes in respect to the resolution not having appeared the necessary time upon the Order Paper before it was presented to the House. It is only necessary for me, Mr. Speaker, to draw your attention to the fact that this resolution has followed the same form that every other resolution of a similar character has followed in this Parliament for forty years or more. I am sure that this in itself is sufficient to satisfy even my hon. friend the junior member for Halifax and the members of this House that the Government in presenting this resolution, has followed the practice that has always been followed in presenting a measure of this kind. My hon. friend will agree with me that he is not at all serious in his contention.

Mr. MACLEAN: I rise first to assure my hon. friend that I am very serious indeed. He has not given to the House any reason whatever in answer to the point of order which I have taken. I do not know what has been the practice of this House for the last forty years; I know what has been the practice of the House for forty years in respect to amending the rules, that is, to appoint a committee. I read in the rules of the House that two days' notice is required for leave to introduce a resolution, and I simply say that as a matter of fact that rule nas not been observed.

Mr. GRAHAM: The excuse given by the leader of the House (Mr. Rogers) is not a very good one, inasmuch as in the present session many of the practices and usages of Parliament have been thrown to the winds. I could give a good many instances. This is simply a case of the letter of the law. An old rule was invoked here the other day of which most people did not know the existence; but hon. gentlemen opposite insisted, against all practice in this House, and against all usages, on refuting your judgment, Mr. Speaker, and pinned their faith to the pound of flesh named in a rule never used in this House before to my recollection. The question under discussion, moved by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Hazen) is something absolutely new in this House, and contrary to practice so far as revision of the rules is concerned. If that is the only argument against the point raised by my hon. friend from Halifax, it could not for a moment carry any weight. If under the strict interpretation of that rule the notice was not properly given, I submit, Mr. Speaker, that there is nothing for you to do, no matter what the usage or practice may be, but to rule in conformity with the point raised by the junior member for Halifax.

Mr. SPEAKER: I have only to say that my understanding has always been that the notice is intended to be given to the members of Parliament for a specific purpose, namely, that they may not be taken unawares, but may have an opportunity to prepare for the motion. The two days' notice, as I have always understood it—and I have discussed this question with the clerk previous to the present one, and with the one before him—means that the notice must appear on the official paper of the day twice, first on the day after it is given, in the Votes and Proceedings, and then, on the day following that, the day that it might be considered, on the Order Paper of the House. I am told that the usual practice has been followed in this case.

With regard to the exact time at which the notice should be laid on the table of the House, my information always has been that that is for the convenience of the officials who prepare the Votes and Proceedings for to-morrow, and the Order Paper for the following day, and for the convenience of the Printing Bureau. Therefore it was provided that the notice should be laid on the table of the House before five o'clock. I had occasion some years ago to make inquiry with regard to the time when these notices were laid on the table of the House, and I found that in many cases it was done as late as eleven or twelve o'clock, and sometimes after twelve o'clock at night. The first clerk whom I sat under, Mr. Patrick, when I applied to him gave me the explanation that the exact time at which they were laid on the table did not matter so much but the essence of the rule was that they should appear on the official papers twice—first in the Votes and Proceedings, so that the members might have full notice, and the second day upon the Order Paper for that day. Therefore my decision is that the point is not well taken.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): I might entertain privately a view different from yours, Mr. Speaker; but, of course, I accept your ruling. There is another part of this rule to which I would like to direct your attention, that is, that the rule proceeds to say that two days' notice shall be given of a motion for the putting of a question. I would take the rule to mean that before any person can move that the question be put, that is, the previous question, two days' notice must be given. As I have an amendment to move, I would like to do so and of course your ruling could come up then. I beg to move, seconded by Mr. Pardee:

That the House do not proceed with the consideration of the resolution, but that it be referred to a special committee to assist Mr. Speaker in the examination of the same, and to report upon it, according to the established and binding rules of this House.

I submit that that amendment is in order, because the motion for the previous question made by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries on Wednesday last is not an amendment, but a distinct motion; and, as it requires two days' notice, it is of course null and void.

Mr. BOYCE: With regard to what my hon. friend says respecting notice of moving the previous question, he as well as other members of the House will recognize the palpable absurdity of his contention as regards any motion that might be offered to the House, such as a motion for going into Supply, of which notice on the Order Paper would not be required. My hon. friend's contention would be that where a motion was made for going into Supply, and the previous question was desired to be moved to that, no motion could be made for two days. That of course would reduce the matter to an absurdity.

Mr. GERMAN: I rise to a point of order. Under the rules of the House no amendment can be made to the original motion after the motion has been made that the question be now put. If you rule that the present amendment is out of order, my hon. friend has no right to speak.

Mr. SPEAKER: I was about to say that in my judgment, with my present knowledge, it is out of order; but I would not say definitely until I took the time to look the matter up, so, I will look into it and give my opinion to-morrow.

Hon. GEORGE P. GRAHAM (South Renfrew): When, as a young man, I entered public life some few years ago, a personal friend of mine, then a very prominent man in the House, the late Hon. John F. Wood, suggested to me that I would find it very advantageous to study the rules of the House so as to be conversant with debate and be able at any time to give a reason why I thought I had a right to express my views. He further added that it might be possible that an occasion would arise when a young man would be asked to assume a position where he would need to enforce these rules. I took his advice to a certain extent and have had some little experience in parliamentary practice and procedure, having been in public life for a good many years, and having had the honour in the Ontario House of acting as Chairman of Committee of the Whole a good deal when the questions of rules of debate were raised. And let me say to you, Mr. Speaker, that even with that experience, I would not for a moment claim infallibility. Had I only been in this House eighteen months, I should have thought it the height of presumption for me to rise and lecture others on the rules. We have had an example of that in this House—a man of no experience whatever in parliamentary usage, practices, or rules, is given the task of lecturing us on this side of the House as to what rules should govern us. We have been told—men of some experience at least—that it was none of our business what the rules of this House should be, that that business belonged to the Government and the Government only, and even their followers are not allowed to make a speech on it. I submit that the only real speech made on the question from the Government side was the speech made by the hon. member from Portage la Prairie (Mr. Meighen). But he has only had the experience of a few years, and with all the ability he possesses, I submit to you with your mature experience, Mr. Speaker, that he was not in a position to deal with the matter as successfully as if he had been in public life for many years and become saturated not only with the rules we find in the book but with the parliamentary practice out of which these rules spring and the usages and customs and interpretations of the rules we have or have had. A few days ago every practice in this House was broken to pieces by the action first of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Hazen) followed by my hon. friend from East Hastings (Mr. Northrup). It did me good to see the hon. member for East Hastings bringing forth fruits meet for repentance to the Prime Minister. I do not know whether that will have the effect of side tracking the hon. member for West Algoma (Mr. Boyce) for the position still vacant or not, but certainly it was a strong appeal for recognition. I was not a little surprised at the Minister of Marine and Fisheries. I had always looked upon him as a man with a good deal of fairness in his make-up, a man who was willing to give his views, to give hard knocks and take them; and I was surprised, yes, shocked, to see a minister of the Crown rise in his place and in the face of the man who has through long years of experience practically become the practice and usage of this House, call upon his followers to tell that man, the leader of the Opposition, to sit down. And for what? Because he wanted to move that the leader of the House and not the members of the House should decide autocratically as to what rules are to govern us. This instance reminded me of a story—and I trust my hon. friend from Dundas (Mr. Broder) will not think I am infringing upon his patent if I introduce a story. A gentleman was approaching a gate in which stood a more or less aggravated dog. The gentleman hesitated a moment, not knowing what to do. A friend said, 'Go in, do you not see he is all right?—he is wagging his tail.' 'Yes,' said the other, 'he is also growling, and I do not know which end to trust.' For a few moments we trusted the wagging end, but we were not long under that delusion, for we found the growling end had possesion of the political dog, and in a moment or two it dominated the entire animal. Now, it may seem a trifle to hon. gentlemen opposite who are not allowed to express their views that that motion was made. For one thing it brought out very prominently the fact that this Parliament has witnessed many sudden conversions. It was amusing to hear my hon. friend from St. Antoine (Mr. Ames), my hon. friend from Peel (Mr. Blain), my hon. friend from Selkirk (Mr. Bradbury) and my hon. friend from Lincoln (Mr. Lancaster)——

Mr. LANCASTER: What is the matter with him?

Mr. GRAHAM: He is not allowed to talk, and that is crucifixion for him. It was amusing to hear these gentlemen pound their desks and cheer when the Prime Minister read articles condemning their own conduct in 1911. In 1911 they actually told us that they were serious, they told the country that they were fighting for a principle and were serious in their obstruction. But when articles are quoted showing that they were not serious, that they were obstructing the business of the country and ought to have been gagged, they actually pounded their desks and acknowledged that they should have been gagged. Well, they are more successfully gagged now behind the Government than they ever were in front of it.

A good deal has been said about fair play. What kind of fair play? Speaking metaphorically, the hon. Minister of Public Works goes around with a razor in his boot, the handle of which is plainly visible. I know the razor is there; I can see it, and I know why he has it. I am confident that if he thought I was attempting to get into his political melon patch, he would use the razor. But I would prefer that characteristic to the qualities of a man who puts his arms around my neck, whispers honeyed words into my ear, and holds my hand while his pal comes out from a dark alley and sandbags me. I would even prefer the militant spirit of the hon. Minister of Militia, who—not literally, but in an imaginary sense—fights upon the least provocation. What kind of fair play are we to expect, Mr. Speaker? The fair play that would be typified by the burglar who would enter my residence, knock me down, rob me of my goods and then say: I will be fair; I will not murder you this time! That is another way of typifying fair play, but that is just such fair play as we have been receiving during the course of the present discussion. The closure which is now proposed to be introduced, is to my mind, a monument to the late lamented emergency. True, it is not a very proud monument; it ought to be surmounted by the skull and cross-bones. I would not like to say that I would venture the proper inscription to be put on that monument, but the people of Canada would place an epitaph upon it, if they could but get an opportunity from this Government which is afraid to go to the country. The Naval Bill was introduced on the alleged existence of an emergency, and I could almost see the young member of Parliament, who had not been here very long, cower in his seat and shiver while the cold chills ran up his spine as he listened to the lurid description of the flashes of lightning and the roars of thunder about to break upon the great British Empire and demolish it, if Canada did not give a contribution to the Mother Country! In a moment of weakness, we were rather inclined to think that perhaps there was something in this emergency; but a few days passed and the emergency disappeared. That being the case, and the alleged emergency being as dead as Julius Cæsar—allow me to correct that it was still-born,defunct before it was—this closure measure, the purpose of which is to ensure the passage of the Naval Bill, should also disappear. There is no reason whatever for either the passage of the Naval Bill or the introduction of closure to compel its adoption.

A good deal of discussion has revolved around the statement of supporters of the Government that the majority must rule. That is right up to a certain point. A young member of Parliament possibly might not be seized with the whole import of the rules and usages of Parliament. We come to Parliament fresh from the activities of an election campaign, and some hon. gentlemen are inclined to think that Parliament is but a great political meeting, where the majority can do absolutely as it likes; where the majority can say who are to speak, how long they are to speak, what they are to talk about—and they are not to speak at all if the majority so desires. To my mind, the contention that the majority has a perfect right to do as it pleases in Parliament is not a true conception of the proper function of this great body, and this assumption has no connection whatever with the principle which underlies parliamentary usage and practice. We are here each with certain well-defined rights, and you, Mr. Speaker, can no more infringe on my rights as a private member than I can on yours; if you do so this House ceases to be a free Parliament. The chairman of a committee has certain rights; if he exceeds those rights he infringes on my liberties and privileges as a member of this House. I might incidentally mention the fact that that has been done several times during the present session. That is where the first real friction occurred in this House; the rules were flagrantly and openly violated by the very hon. gentlemen who should have been most diligent in looking to their observance. This occurred because young members were placed in the Chair who knew nothing about the rules of the House or the usages and practice of Parliament, only in so far as they could be found in the book placed before them. The Chairman and the Speaker have certain prescribed duties to perform and certain rights connected with their offices, and, when they go beyond those rights, they encroach on the rights of members of the House. I say, therefore, in all fairness, that a member has no right to obey either the Speaker or the Chairman when those officials go beyond the known rules of the House. Do hon. gentlemen opposite mean to tell me that the constituency that sends any hon. gentleman on this side as its representative is not as influential as the constituency that sends a member of the Government? That member of the Government is restricted by certain rules, and he cannot infringe on my rights any more than I can infringe on his. The rules, usages and practices of Parliament are designed to protect the members of the House, one and all. Let me say to hon. gentlemen behind this that the Government has infringed on their rights during the present session, and I am much mistaken if the people of Canada, who send these hon. gentlemen to this House, will hold them guiltless when they allow themselves to be prevented from speaking on two of the most important measures that have ever come before the Parliament of Canada. The Government has infringed on the rights of the members of this House sitting behind them and having had such success with them they proceed to endeavour to infringe on the rights of the men in front of them. Is it any wonder that men in front of them resent such an attempt at infringement? Rules have not sprung up in a day to govern this House or to govern any Parliament. They are the growth of centuries and, I admit at once, as conditions change rules should change. Usages and practices should be adhered to when it is not found necessary to make an absolute rule. I admit that at once but we ought to be very careful how we proceed to change usages and practices and make a concrete rule of such usages and practices. Canada is frequently compared to the Motherland. That comparison is worthy of a good deal of consideration, but, in making it, we do not always arrive at a proper result. We have to compare the conditions of the two countries. Great Britain has had her usages and practices and rules handed down through generation after generation, centuries of evolution and devolution, and what might be absolutely appropriate in the Mother Country under her conditions might be absolutely inappropriate in this country. Hon. gentlemen who say that we should follow the Motherland in introducing closure, forget that the Motherland was a great many years managing the affairs of a great empire, with a great deal larger population than we have, before she thought of introducing closure and some of the most beneficient legislation on the Statute Book of the British Empire was put through before there was any closure. A need for the introduction of closure ought to be shown. What need has been shown in this instance? I appeal to you, if in the past few years, this law had been invoked or these rules had been enforced if this country, in all its parts would have been as well governed as it is to-day? I ask you whether if, in 1896, the rules now sought to be pushed through this House without this side being allowed to make any practical suggestions, had been in force, the provincial rights under which the provinces of Canada managed their own educational affairs, would not have been disregarded? There is only one answer. At that time a Bill was before the House which would have become law had it not been for the all-night sittings forced by hon. gentlemen on this side of the House—and in this they were assisted by hon. gentlemen who were not all Liberals, but who were standing up for the principle of provincial rights. Under that Bill Manitoba would not have been allowed to manage her own educational affairs. Under these rules that Bill would have been put through this House, imposing on the province of Manitoba something which the Minister of Public Works does not believe Manitoba ought to have had.

I will come down to a later period and take hon. gentlemen on their own ground. I know they will cheer for this because they have cheered for their condemnation, surely they will also cheer for their aggrandizement. In 1911, had these rules been in force, what would have been the result? To my mind the result would have been better perhaps for the Dominion of Canada. But my mind did not happen to be the mind of the people of Canada and to-day, instead of our having Canada as she is in regard to her trade relations with the United States, we would have entered into an agreement which many of us thought right but which the people of Canada said they thought wrong. Under these rules that agreement would have been in force to-day. Hon. gentlemen opposite, if they believe what they said, will admit that the absence of these rules and the refusal of the then Prime Minister to put them in force saved Canada from what they thought was a wrong step. The adoption of these rules is something more serious than a mere temporary victory for one side ot the House or a defeat for the other. Some question may arise very shortly when these rules will become an absolute menace. The question will not arise in the future, the question is before us now and the passage of these rules precludes the people of Canada from having a voice in settling the greatest question that has been before them since Confederation. I will not refer to two other occasions before that on which what is called obstruction took place. Hon. gentlemen opposite will agree that the absence of these rules was a benefit to the Dominion of Canada and still, for the purpose of passing a Bill introduced under circumstances which outside of the House would be called false pretences, these rules, which are not needed in Canada, are to be crowded down the throats of the minority. I say crowded down advisedly because the motion of the Minister of Marine says to every man on this side of the House: You are to be governed by these rules but it is none of your business what these rules are to be. Is that in accordance with the principles of representative Government? The lowliest subject in Canada has the right, through his representative, to say what the laws that are to govern him are to be. The humblest citizen in the country, and it is our pride and our boast to say so, has that right. That boon was not obtained lightly, that boon should not be cast aside lightly. The method in which these rules are being put through the House is absolutely contrary to the foundation principle of representative Government. As I said, under the constitution with which we are blessed, under the British flag under which we have the greatest freedom in the world, as hon. gentlemen say and we agree with them, nobody wants to change our attitude or our loyalty to the grand old British flag, we have that liberty but hon. gentlemen, for a little paltry, party advantage are forsaking those liberties and trampling underfoot the foundation stone of representative Government. The lowliest citizen in this country has a right to be represented and is represented in this House and has a voice in the framing of every Statute that is passed under which he has to live. That is government by the people. We on this side of the House, representing these people, have not a word to say about the rules under which we are to be governed, not one word. My hon. friend will say: Oh you are saying something now. I admit that I am endeavouring to point out to the country, as well as I can, the atrocity of this proposal; but the Minister of Marine and his colleagues have seen to it that, no matter how much I may know about the rules, no matter how much the right hon. the leader of the Opposition, who has governed this country for fifteen years, may know about the rules, no matter how much an ex-Speaker may know about the rules, no matter how much you, Sir, may know about the rules, not one of us is to have any voice in the framing of rules under which we are to act. We are to be governed by rules, and we are not to have the voice of the lowliest citizen in the Dominion of Canada as to the framing of the legislation that is to govern us. You have to enforce the rules Mr. Speaker, and you are ruthlessly cast to one side and every usage of Parliament is contravened in order that we on this side of the House may be deprived of the opportunity of moving an amendment. Let me put it to my hon. friends opposite. Suppose that they are going to gain all that the Minister of Marine and Fisheries showed by his countenance he hoped to gain, is it worth it? As men, I ask you is it worth it? There is not a member of the Government who would perform that kind of trick on the meanest enemy he has outside of this House. The neighbour who had done the greatest harm to you would have more consideration at your hands than that. Do hon. gentlemen opposite think that in the country these small tricks go for very much with the people? They may rouse applause in this House, but when that trick is to deprive the representatives of the people of the least right to change one syllable of the rules under which they are to be governed, it is going much too far for all that can be gained, even if the Government does gain what it thinks it will. Supposing that that amendment had not been moved; supposing that the right hon. the leader of the Opposition had been treated with the courtesy which his position and long years of experience demanded, what would have happened? He would have moved an amendment, as he had a perfect right to do. Suppose there were fifty amendments, do hon. gentlemen think that my rights as a representative of the people, should be taken away for fear I should move an amendment? There is no answer to it. The members of the Government have made no answer, and the members behind it are not allowed to try to make an answer. I want to press that home, because there are on the other side of the House, able men, trustworthy men, honourable men, and if I were to have a private transaction with them, their word would be as good as their bond. I want to appeal to them as men. If the positions were reversed, and if, a member on this side of the House or the leader of the Opposition rose in his place to attempt to put rules through this House to govern you, and at the same time said, you must not move an amendment, no matter what the rules are, they cannot be changed, hon. gentlemen opposite would rightly protest. Sir, in some countries, that kind of conduct would cause a rebellion instead of a protest in Parliament. I want to press home this point, because I submit that it is perhaps the pith of the whole situation, that this Government is contravening the rights of the members of this House, and that in doing so, it is violating every principle of representative government, where the meanest subject has a right to have a say upon the legislation which is to govern him.

We have been compared to the old land, and let me revert to that for a moment. The conditions in the old land are altogether different from those in Canada, and there is reason for longer discussion in Canada than in the motherland. In the United Kingdom you have a small territory with the people crowded closely together. What happens in the British Parliament in the morning is known practically to every citizen or can be in the evening. For years upon years, centuries upon centuries the population there has been in close contact with public affairs, it is conversant with matters of government. I suppose there are no people in the world who take a more definite and persistent interest in public affairs than do the people of the British Isles. In Canada we have a small population scattered over an immense territory. There are men in Canada who live many many miles from a railway station, who never see a daily paper, and who are not at all conversant with the affairs of Parliament, and who will not be conversant unless discussion is carried on at some protracted length. Until the people of the country are roused in that respect we cannot hope for some years to confine our debates to the same period of time, which is taken in the mother of parliaments. Another important point is that in the motherland they have a thousand and one minor pieces of legislation to deal with that we in the Parliament of Canada have not to deal with. They have no local governments in the old land. I once sat in the gallery of the British House of Commons and heard a protracted discussion on the early closing of shops. That question would be decided in Canada under a provincial statute, probably giving the municipalities the right to pass early closing by-laws. It would not come to this House at all, but in the mother of parliaments those small questions are debated, and if they were to be debated at length the business would never be completed. As it is, even with the closure, the British Parliament may be said to be practically in constant and continuous session. Then we have another situation, Mr. Speaker, that they did not have in the old land. We entered into Confederation on certain well-defined principles. The working out of that confederation was not an easy task and I fear that sometimes some of us do not give the credit that is due to the men that worked it out. They saw ahead some of the difficulties that have since arisen, some of the problems which we have endeavoured to work out harmoniously, and certain things were provided. The idea which lay at the root of union between the different provinces and which was the basis of their aspirations was conciliation and the protection of minorities in every case. There is no man in this House who more thoroughly appreciates what that meant than you, Mr. Speaker. Men of maturer years know that in working out the basis of Confederation the chief principle kept in view was that the rights of minorities must be protected. The minorities were not all of the same kind. Minorities in Canada have changed, and what was the minority of yesterday is not the minority to-day, and might not be in the future. But that was the underlying principle, and I say that that principle is being evaded and departed from in this resolution before the House. It was thought out, not quickly—it took years of thought by men equal at least to any man in this House—and the Fathers of Confederation decided that majorities must rule, but their rule can only extend so far and they cannot infringe upon the rights of minorities. Minorities were so protected in the Act of Confederation. These are serious considerations to me. Hon. gentlemen opposite may be here to-day—the same as myself—and away in a few years, but what we are doing now is meant to bind legislation and legislators, in this young country for years to come. Let hon. gentlemen hesitate, let them think it over before they insist on taking the plunge.

Let me point to another aspect of the situation. The formation of the rules for the government of any body should take place in the calmest moments of the individuals thus engaged. They ought to be imbued with a judicial mind, and not have in view what may possibly be of assistance to them for the time being. They ought to have in mind two things—absolute justice, British fair play and the results in the future. I ask hon. gentlemen seriously if they were in that frame of mind when these rules were drawn up. If they were they got over it mighty quickly as we perceived when they came to introduce the rules. In the midst of a heated debate, in which more or less warm feeling was displayed, the Government introduced these rules as the judicial decision of that body. I say 'judicial' wisely because, certainly, they would not come to this House in any other frame of mind. There is not a man on the Government side who believes that these rules were framed with the calm consideration of an unprejudiced mind. They were framed to serve an object, that is to stop the Opposition discussing the Naval Bill—so they say I admit that, as time proceeds and conditions change, rules might be changed. Changed conditions need new methods. I do not dispute that for a moment, but there is a way to bring about new methods and practice in this Parliament and the usage and practice of this Parliament, the usage and practice of the British Parliament, at least before 1867, to which we are bound by our rules, was not to introduce a measure of this kind in the way in which this has been introduced. We have changed the rules. Leading members on both sides of the House, the Prime Minister, the leader of the Opposition, the supporters of each, consult with the Speaker and draw up rules that will govern both sides. That is how these rules should be changed. They should not certainly be changed in the midst of a heated debate, not when the members are on edge, as they have been in this House for some weeks, but at a time when the rights of the different parties can be carefully considered, when the representatives of both sides of the House are there to express their views and when the man who is to enforce these rules is present to give his valued advice as to the effect that certain rules will have. Instead of that we have what we have. The rules should be changed or revised, either at the beginning of a parliament, or at the beginning of a session, before hon. gentlemen become heated by controversy and debate, and before any great issue comes up which these rules will affect. There are hon. gentlemen in this House who are lawyers, such for instance, as the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries and the hon. Postmaster General. What would they think of legislation that, in the midst of a suit, was passed in order to help one of the litigants? That is done sometimes, but is seldom or ever approved of by any lawyer of standing. I ask them what they would think of legislation introduced into this House when a lawsuit was in course of being tried which would absolutely give the case to one side without any chance even to argue it. They would be horrified; yet, that is what the right hon. Prime Minister, assisted by the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries, did in this case. They said: We will introduce this legislation in the midst of the discussion in the case and we will not allow one side to the case to argue. What would any judge do in a case of that kind? In addition to that these hon. gentlemen said: We will not allow the judge to have anything to say about it; we will do it ourselves. Is there any other way in which I could appeal to hon. gentlemen opposite? I have appealed to their fairness, I have appealed to their sense of what is right between man and man, I have appealed to the usage, I have appealed to the practice and I have appealed to the rules of the House. There is nothing else that I can appeal to.

This measure has been introduced, as the Naval Bill was introduced, under—I do not know just what would be the parliamentary word to use, Mr. Speaker, but if we were outside, I would say false pretences. I will have to put it in that way. The country has been told through the press of hon. gentlemen opposite, and some hon. gentlemen over there think it too, that these rules are merely to put the Naval Bill through. That is not true. If you take clause 4 of these resolutions you will find that it has no reference to the Naval Bill and could not be applied to it. It merely suggests that, under certain conditions, the Government can get rid of the troublesome attitude of the Opposition in moving a vote of censure on some member of the Government on going into Supply. That does not touch the Naval Bill directly or indirectly. If hon. gentlemen opposite want to flatter themselves that the Government they are following is doing this with the laudable desire of enabling them to put the Naval Bill through, let me tell them that there is far more behind it than the Naval Bill and that before this session is through the House and the country will probably see that there is far more in front of it than the Naval Bill. It is being introduced ostensibly for the purpose of putting the Naval Bill through but there is no excuse why clause 4 should be moved for that purpose and were it not for the isolated generosity of the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries I would move an amendment that clause 4 be struck out. He has told me that it is none of my business about that clause being in there, and that I cannot touch it; it is sacred; I cannot lay hands on it; it is in the holy of holies once it got through his hands, and no sacriligious person on this side of the House can lay hands on it. I appeal to hon. gentlemen again. Here is a clause that has nothing to do with the Naval Bill. Why have it in this resolution? In a few weeks we will probably know why it is in this resolution if the resolution is passed.

I admit that if I knew I was guilty of something, I would hire the member for Portage la Prairie (Mr. Meighen) to convince me that I was not. If anybody in this House could do it, I think he could. He almost convinced himself about one or two of these things to which I may refer if time permits. The fact remains that the guillotine introduced into this resolution is not the guillotine of the British House of Commons and is not nearly so generous. In the British House of Commons, a motion is passed dividing estimates or bills into certain compartments. The motion has to pass the House first that they will be divided and that a time will be set when compartment No. 1 must go through or when discussion upon it must cease, which is the same thing. Another day will be set when compartment No. 2 must go through; but the motion dividing these into compartments and fixing the time, as I understand it, has to be passed by the House first. No such motion as that is necessary under this guillotine. Notwithstanding the argument that the Speaker of the House, being selected from the dominant party may have a responsibility thrust upon him that he may not like, I submit that the Government has taken away from the minority in this resolution the only atom of a safeguard which we might have under the British rules. Under their rules, they have the protection of a Speaker. Under this resolution, we have only the protection, a sample of which we were given on Wednesday last by the members of the Government. If you look back over the history of Speakers and their conduct in the House of Commons in Canada, you will find that they compare favorably in fairness and in justice with the Speakers of the great British House of Commons. It might be wise perhaps to have a change, but I am not going to discuss that at the present moment. I would far rather trust myself in the hands of any hon. gentleman on that side of the House, once he is vested with the responsibility of a Speaker, as an honourable man, than I would trust myself in the hands of any member of any party government that might be established in Canada. Hon. gentlemen opposite say: We will not impose that responsibility upon the Speaker, but a Minister will just come in about this time in the evening and will say: To-morrow at two o'clock it is over. To-morrow, he says: I told you yesterday it was to be over at two o'clock, and it is. That is the tender mercy. In my judgment, the quality of mercy will be considerably strained. Might I add the other safeguard which the members of the Government tell us we have, that is that the majority behind the Government is a safeguard. Heaven help the safeguard. The cattle guard that my hon. friend the Minister of Railways (Mr. Cochrane) worries so much about is an acme of safety in comparison with that. Let me see what safeguard we would have in the present Government. It is a fairly good sample. I take the Prime Minister. Until last Wednesday, I would have been inclined to trust to his fairness, because he has always used me in an absolutely fair manner in this House. Last Wednesday he was a party to what was to my mind absolute unfairness and inhuman treatment to the oldest member in this House, the right hon. the leader of the Opposition, beloved in Canada, and respected in every part of the British Empire. I shall not refer to the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Rogers) because I discussed my attitude towards him a few moments ago. Take the Postmaster General (Mr. Pelletier). I would not really like to trust myself to just what he would do to me if he got a good chance in the way of fairness. I would rather trust myself to the fairness of the Speaker ten times over. I would rather trust myself to the Postmaster General if he were Speaker than if he were a member of the Government, because if he were Speaker there would be a responsibility upon him that is not upon him as a member of the Government. I would not trust myself to the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Hazen) at all after Wednesday last. There was a time when I would have been inclined to trust the present Minister of Finance (Mr. White), but my faith has weakened.

Mr. WHITE: Little faith.

Mr GRAHAM: He is, in a way, singing the recessional now. Perhaps in anything else except this question of rules

I would be inclined to trust him; but if it came to a question of whether I was to suggest some important amendment to the rule or that I was not to have any chance at all of doing so, I know that he would vote that I could not make the suggestion. I am afraid the Minister of Labour (Mr. Crothers) might be partisan also. If it came to a question as between Tory and Grit, I am afraid I would have to go under. The Minister of Customs (Mr. Reid) of course would dismiss me with all the other officials if he got a chance. So far as the Minister of Railways (Mr. Cochrane) is concerned, I know what he and the Minister of Customs endeavoured to do in South Renfrew in violation of our fairness. I know too that he seconded the resolution to gag the Rt.-Hon. the leader of the Opposition. The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Burrell) might be all right in some things but do you think I would trust him as much as I would the Speaker of the House? If a member of the Government would go to the country and tell them what fine things would be done for agriculture if they only voted for his man, I am afraid he would be partisan in such a manner. I would have thought that the Minister of Inland Revenue (Mr. Nantel) possibly might be impartial; but he has not said whether he is or not. He takes refuge behind an eloquent silence, but he would vote for the gag every time.

I want to read something in regard to this guillotine. I pointed out—in my opinion, the safety or the fair play which we might expect from the Government; and perhaps this Government is not over one hundred degrees worse than any other government. The fair play which a minority might expect from a government or from the members behind it is not to be compared with the justice that would be handed out to the members by the Speaker, no matter what side of the House he came from. I said that the guillotine was not at all the same in Great Britain as it is proposed in this resolution. Let me read just a paragraph here from Anson, volume I, fourth edition:

> A far more drastic mode of limiting debate and accelerating business is what is known as 'closure by compartments,' or 'the guillotine.' By this process certain periods of time are allotted, by resolution of the House, to the various portions and stages of a Bill; at the expiration of each period of time, discussion, whether concluded or not, is closed, and the majority carry that portion of the Bill upon which the guillotine has fallen.
> The process can only take place by order of the House, embodied in a series of resolutions allocating the time to be given on the parts and stages of a Bill.

In this resolution we have no such protection. A minister can rise and say to-night that to-morrow at two o'clock discussion on a certain block of estimates shall close and it automatically closes if to-morrow he calls attention to the fact that he has given that notice. If that is not the guillotine intensified very much over the guillotine as practiced in compartments in the British House, then I am not a good judge of comparisons. As Anson puts it these compartments are only formed by a resolution of the House, so to begin with there is a chance for argument as to whether or not this step shall be taken. My hon. friend (Mr. Meighen) thinks there is no discussion.

Mr. MEIGHEN: There certainly is none whatever.

Mr. GRAHAM: Well, there certainly is a resolution.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes.

Mr. GRAHAM: But in the resolution before the House there is no such protection to the minority.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Oh, yes; the minister's motion must pass the same as the resolution in England.

Mr. GRAHAM: Nonsense. It is not the same at all—nothing to be compared with it. I ask hon. gentlemen opposite to read it for themselves. I want to point out another effect of this measure. I have said that the effect of this has been to inculcate more bitter feeling between the members on different sides of the House than anything that has occurred in Parliament here or in the provincial House since I became a member of either. Members are not human if they would allow themselves to be knocked down, kicked when they are down, and then told to lick the hand that smote them. And hon. gentlemen need not think that good nature is always a virtue. If a man refuses to show that he has backbone, what might be called good-nature in him and a virtue become a vice. When hon. gentlemen opposite tell me as a representative of the Canadian people that I must have no voice in the rules that govern me, and that the people I represent must not be heard on that subject, they are robbing me of my right just as much as if they sandbagged me and took away my purse. Here is Anson on The Law and Custom of the Constitution, page 265:

> Two effects are noticeable; the exercise by the majority of the power of bringing discussion to a close tends inevitably to accentuate party differences; and their use of the closure compels the House and the individual members to prononce decidedly on questions which many may regard as not yet ripe for discussion.

And that is another point brought out by Anson:

Formerly an abstract resolution moved, or a Bill introduced, by a private member was apt to be talked about, and the House by prolonging discussion to the limit of the time available escaped committing itself to a principle on which the minds of many were, as yet, in doubt. Now, after a discussion of several hours, the closure is moved and granted, and if carried the question must be put, and men must vote for or against it or deliberately evade a conclusion by abstaining from the division.

Anson points out another consequence of the closure to which I have not referred —that in many cases men are absolutely compelled by the application of this club to vote either for or against measures which in their opinion have not been fully discussed and on which they are not prepared to give an intelligent vote—they must or else stay outside when the vote is on which a member of Parliament hates most abominably to do. We are told about the rights of the majority. Majorities have rights, up to a certian point. The majority of the people must rule, it is true. But suppose the majority in any locality were to make an enactment that the men who were six feet tall and weighed two hundred pounds could go to their smaller neighbours and take away their property, do you suppose that would be endorsed for a moment? Yet that is what the majority in this House are doing. Their position is in effect: Our side is bigger than yours, there are more of us than there are of you, and we propose to take your rights away. Majorities are confined within certain limits in every legislature in the world. And I say again, in no legislative assembly in the world have rules been introduced in the manner in which these have been introduced restricting the rights of members as these rules propose to restrict them.

Hon. gentlemen opposite have been sitting uneasy under the gag silently but effectivly applied to them. Their constituents expected something of them more than silence. They are not silent on the concession lines. They go out there and make speeches and tell what horrible men these Grits are. They come here where the Grits' representatives are assembled and they do not say a word. Not that their courage is gone, but because they have had closure applied to them for weeks. Has not partyism come to a pretty pass, Mr. Speaker, in this Dominion when the sworn representatives of the people can be tied to their seats and prevented from saying a word on behalf of their constituents on great public questions? Put these rules in force and I can tell the hon. member for North Ontario (Mr. Sharpe) that the Finance Minister, if he wished to do so, could have prevented him from making that disturbing speech on the Bank Act.

And let me say for the independent member for South York (Mr. Maclean) that if these rules had been in force many of his speeches on railway questions would never have got on 'Hansard,' for he could be deprived of the opportunity of making them by a little manœuvering on the part of men who know how to manœuvre. Do not let hon. gentlemen think that by passing these rules they are going to gag us as they are gagged and that that is going to be an end of it. They are going to be as securely tied up to prevent them from saying anything that the Government does not want them to say as we on this side. This will rob the independent member of his right and will rob the supporter of the Government of his right to be independent. Imagine some hon. gentleman now wishing to make a speech —I do not mean the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Lancaster) for he seldom speaks this session—but some other hon. gentleman who is in the habit of speaking.

Mr. LANCASTER: Does the hon. gentleman think that the member for Lincoln is going to talk for the sake of talking, as he does?

Mr. GRAHAM: I have often thought so.

Mr. LANCASTER: Some live and learn, but others do not.

Mr. GRAHAM: And some have to live a long time in order to learn. But I was only referring to the hon. gentleman as a sample—

Mr. LANCASTER: I am not a fair sample.

Mr. GRAHAM: Let it go at that. The hon. gentleman is an unfair sample, and every member who votes to gag others on this side is an unfair sample of a representative in a British Parliament. Now, I wanted to point out the position in which hon. gentlemen opposite will be under these rules that some of them have not looked at. In parliaments where the majority is greatest the spirit of independence is more likely to break out. And in the future some question is likely to arise as one did in 1896, on which the leading men on the Government side prefer to ally themselves with the Opposition. These rules can prevent such members from placing their sentiments properly before the public even on so great and important a question as one that arouses such differences of opinion. Hon. gentlemen opposite are in the majority now, and everything looks fair to them. They have only been there for a year and a half. But friction and differences may arise. And the Government with a big majority will not hesitate to use the club on members of this House, even though its legislation may be of a character that some of its own supporters cannot approve. This is not for the present only, nor does it affect us alone. I may not be long in public life and I can stand it, and so can other hon. members of this House; but you are laying a foundation for future action; you are saying to the men you are bringing here from the four corners of the earth: We, in Canada, are afraid of free speech; we in Parliament feel bound to gag the minority, and are even afraid ourselves to make an amendment to a proposition we bring before the House. We are afraid to trust ourselves; we gag ourselves so that we cannot make an amendment! The Minister of Customs himself could not make an amendment to these rules, even if he thought it were necessary; the Prime Minister himself could not change one word of the proposed amendment of the rules. No member of the Government, no matter how seriously he may desire to do so, or how deeply he feels that these rules would operate against the freedom of the people, can possibly, under this generous and high-minded resolution, move an amendment. The only course open to hon. gentlemen is to withdraw the measure and introduce a new one; I would ask the right hon. Prime Minister to do this, and give his supporters an opportunity to move any amendments deemed by them to be desirable. I am sure the people are not satisfied with this procedure, and the time will come when hon. gentlemen opposite will rue the day that they tied this chain and ball to their own feet in respect of the discussion of public questions in the House of Commons of this Dominion. Free speech in the Dominion of Canada has never produced anything but what the majority of the people have considered to be a great benefit; it would produce nothing else in this case. It is open to the Government to act constitutionally in the matter, and to take a course which would be approved by the people. The Naval Bill has not been pronounced upon by the Canadian electorate. It was mentioned in two or three border constituencies in the province of Ontario, and the people here subscribed to the policy of the ex-Minister of Public Works (Mr. Monk) that there should be no contribution without a referendum. In Quebec, if there was any result; if this naval question were an issue—and it was—the people pronounced in favour of a Canadian navy; few constituencies, if any, expressed themselves as being in favour of a contribution or of Imperial federation. In the other provinces the naval question was not an issue. I have observed from a recent report that the ex-Minister of Public Works, the leader of the Nationalist party in the province of Quebec, has pronounced himself against closure, but, leaving that aside, the naval question was not an issue. Every member on the Government side who was in the House—nearly every member of the Government—voted at one time that either a contribution to Imperial armaments or the creation of a Canadian navy would cause a change in the relationships between the Mother Country and the overseas Dominion. That being the case, is any other argument needed to support the contention that this question should be submitted to the people of Canada? If such a matter were to come up in Great Britain, the people would surely be asked to pronounce upon it. In Canada we pretend to be following in the footsteps of Great Britain in the matter of closure, but the Government of the day are not doing so when they refuse to consult the people in respect of a question of such vast importance. I ask hon. gentlemen what they are afraid of? Will some hon. gentleman opposite not tell me why it would not be fair to all concerned that an appeal should be made to the people in regard to this matter? If the people then say they are in favour of this contribution, and if the Opposition, in the face of that mandate, would dare to obstruct, the Government would be entitled to pass a fair measure of closure to see that the will of the people was carried out. But, under the present circumstances, in the midst of a heated debate, it is highly improper to introduce these ill considered rules, to prevent the leader of the Opposition, who is probably better acquainted with the rules of the House than any other hon. gentleman in this House, from giving his opinion as to what these rules ought to be. By reason of their procedure in this regard, hon. gentlemen opposite have prevented the right hon. leader of the Opposition, who, by his long experience and active participation in the leading debates which have taken place in this Parliament during the last forty years, is an authority on all such matters, from offering any suggestions or amendments. What will the people of Great Britain think of a parliament which proceeds to change its rules, and to deprive one who has been recognized for years as the most prominent man in Canadian public life of the right to say one word as to the construction of these proposed rules? What will they say when they realize that an hon. gentleman sitting to your left, Mr. Speaker, who was for some years the honoured Speaker of this House, was also debarred from making any suggestions as to the form of the proposed amendment of the rules? What will the people of Great Britain think when they know that you, the Speaker of this House, have been set to one side, by amateurs who have been in office less than eighteen months, and who propose to lay down the rules without advice from anybody, no matter how immature their experience may be? What will the people of Great Britain think of proffered aid which has been obtained by means of the club and the gag? As I have said, there it but one constitutional course for the Government of the day to follow, and that is to appeal to the people of the country. Do not be afraid to trust them; if you think you are right, let the people say what they think of your views; let them pronounce judgment upon your course and confirm you in that belief. You do not know whether you are voicing the opinion of the people, and, if you are not right, you are unconstitutionally usurping a power which is not yours; you are acting against the usages and practices of Parliament and against all the sacred customs of this House, in attempting to force through this measure, which is unBritish, unfair, unworthy of Canada and unworthy every man who has taken any part in its framing and in the endeavour to secure its passage.

Mr. SPEAKER: It is unparliamentary for the hon. gentleman to speak of any particular act as being unworthy of members of this House; I think the statement is not permissible.

Mr. GRAHAM: If it is not permissible, I will be glad to bow to your ruling.

Mr. SPEAKER: I desire to say, with reference to the motion that was made by the hon. junior member for Halifax (Mr. Maclean), that, on looking over the authorities, it is quite clear to me, as my conviction was then, that it would be quite out of order. I take May, eleventh edition, page 270, where he says:

No amendments may be proposed to the motion for the previous question.

Cushing, who is perhaps one of the best authorities we have on the law and practice of legislative assemblies, at page 567, section 1455, says:

The previous question cannot be amended, the nature of it not admitting of any change. It is like the motion to adjourn the House.

Page 591:

The motion to adjourn, the motion to lie on the table and the previous question do not admit of any amendment.

Bourinot, page 450, says:

No amendment may be proposed to the motion for the previous question.

So that all these authorities agree upon the matter, and therefore I am quite justified in saying that the motion is out of order. If it had been in order, I should imagine it would have been accepted by the House when the leader of the Opposition read it at the time of his speech.

Mr. BUREAU: That is not the way I understood the point of order taken by the hon. member for Halifax. He said that the previous question was moved without sufficient notice under rule 40.

Mr. SPEAKER: The point of order was dealt with at the time, and my ruling was that it was not well taken—that the motion had had, in my judgment, full notice.

Mr. BUREAU: The first point of order taken by the hon. member for Halifax was that notice of the resolution of the Prime Minister was not sufficient because it had not been deposited on the table before five o'clock. That was the first point of order. Then he raised the point that the motion brought forward by the Minister of Marine was not in order because two days' notice had not been given. The hon. member for Algoma (Mr. Boyce), got up and made remarks on it. That was the second question raised.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member is not correct in his understanding of it, because the first point of order which was raised was with regard to the length of the notice given of the resolution by the First Minister. I ruled that that point was not well taken, and that the limit of time was ample. I certainly did not understand that any other point of order was raised.

Mr. GRAHAM: The hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Maclean), made the suggestion that the motion of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries was out of order because notice had not been given and he suggested that if that were true his own motion would be in order. But, he said, perhaps I had better discuss that when I make my motion. That was in order to see if his motion was in order but it would not be in order if his point of order was not well taken. The point was whether the motion of the Minister of Marine required notice. If it did not, his own motion was out of order. If it did, then the previous question motion was out of order.

Mr. SPEAKER: The junior member for Halifax never stated that point of order, as I understand it, but he did move a motion which I asked to have stand in order that I might consider it. I have now given my decision.

Mr. GRAHAM: I will now raise the point of order that I understand to be raised by the junior member for Halifax (Mr. Maclean) and you can give your decision in the morning if it is more convenient. The point of order was that proper notice of this motion had not been given, under the rule, by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries. I will raise that point of order. If that point should be sustained, amendments would be in order. If not, the amendment of the hon. member for Halifax would not be in order.

Mr. SPEAKER: I have gone over that subject many times, and I have never yet understood that such a motion required any notice, and I have been in this House at three different times when it was moved without any notice. Therefore I know it to be the practice, and I believe it to be strengthened by every authority we have on the subject of procedure.

Mr. GRAHAM: We cannot very well take practice and usage because members of the Government have thrown practice to the winds and they have not adhered to the rules.

Mr. THOMAS MacNUTT (Saltcoats): I understand that the House is about to adjourn and I have no desire to take up the time of the House. As I happen to be leaving in a short time for the West and will not have any opportunity of voting, I wish to record my protest briefly. I think it is generally admitted that some form of closure was necessary but not at the present time. My protest is against the time and the manner of this particular form of closure. I think many members are in favour of closure of some kind; many members of the late Administration were in favour of some form and the possibility is that if the Liberal party had been again returned to power, some form of closure might have been introduced, but in a different way. It would have been submitted to a special committee. That committee would have reported, possibly making a majority report and a minority report; the committee would have been composed of members of both sides of the House and we would all have had an opportunity of discussing the merits of the proposals and amending the proposals if we thought fit. But the present time is not, I think, a proper time at which to introduce closure, it looks like a back-down in the midst of a fight made in order that this side of the House shall have no opportunity of continuing an important debate. How was it done? After a conciliatory speech from the Prime Minister in introducing the resolution, the leader of the Opposition, as is customary, rose to reply, but at the same time the Minister of Marine and Fisheries took the floor. You, Sir, gave the decision in favour of the right hon. the leader of the Opposition. Immediately the member for East Hastings (Mr. Northrup) drew from his pocket a prepared motion that the hon. Minister of Marine should be heard. This motion, of course being put to the vote, carried. The Minister of Marine had the floor in spite of your previous decision. The only object the minister had was to move the previous question. We all know what that means; it means that the resolution would have to be put without amendment or debate, the only debate would be an indirect debate on the motion for the previous question. The matter of this closure resolution is one that will take away all the rights of this side of the House and it must be remembered that we on this side of the House represent nearly 49 per cent of the people of Canada, although in the House the Government are in a considerable majority. It means that any legislation that the Government wishes to put through can be put through in five minutes if they choose to do that. The $35,000,000 for the navy, subsidies for corporations, steel bounties, and all that sort of legislation could be put through in a few minutes, and if the Government so desired, members on this side of the House would not have an opportunity to say anything. The Liberal members might as well go home, for there will be no use of their presence here if the Government do what they propose, or what they will have the power to do under this resolution. I wish to say that I protest vigorously against this closure being put through in the present shape. The Government would be in a better position if they withdrew this resolution and submitted the question to a special committee.

On motion of Mr. Pardee the debate was adjourned.

On the motion of Mr. Rogers, House adjourned at 12.20 a.m. Tuesday.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

TUESDAY, April 15, 1913.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at three o'clock.

REPORT PRESENTED.

Canal Statistics for the season of navigation, 1912.—Mr. Cochrane.

REMOVAL OF RAILWAY TERMINALS.

Hon. GEO. P. GRAHAM moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 171, to amend the Railway Act. He said: The object of this Bill is well defined in its wording. I might read it, as it will explain exactly my object.

1. This Act may be cited as an amendment to the Railway Act.
2. Any railway company desiring to change the location of its terminals or divisional points, or of any of them, shall, before making such change, obtain an order from the Board of Railway Commissioners approving the same.

3. It shall be made a term of every such order that the railway company obtaining the same shall pay all losses sustained by its employees who may be obliged to change their place of residence from one municipality to another by reason of the change of any such terminal or divisional points.

4. In case the company and its employees do not agree upon the amount of such loss, the board will determine the amount thereof.

This question has been under discussion for some time, and has been brought about in this way: Railway companies construct their lines and form their divisional and terminal points for their own convenience, as they have a perfect right to do. Possibly, in a few years they may seek to change these terminals or divisional points, place them at some other point on the line, or on a new projection of the same line. In the meantime the employees of the railway company have purchased their homes, have beautified their little plots of ground and have become an important element of the community. In some instances the whole town is known as a railway town and but for the presence and industry of these people there would practically be no town at all. In all instances they have taken their share in the payment of taxes and in some cases they have contributed largely for waterworks, electric light, granolithic walks and the building of schools. This has gone on for years, and after they have paid a large amount of money in taxes for these purposes, they awake some morning to find that their employers are moving their works, or their terminal facilities, to some other municipality and if they are to retain their positions they must also move. No provision has ever been made for the loss that these employees sustain in thus being compelled to move. I submit that it is not unfair to railway companies that, in estimating the cost of the removal of a divisional or terminal point, with the necessary equipment, to some other place along the line, they should take into consideration the loss that would be entailed to their employees and that they should be asked to pay that loss. This has occurred in some cases not very far from where we are now. Take Carleton Place, for instance: quite a large number of men, I am told have been compelled to move from Carleton Place to Smith's Falls. It is well known that a large number of the employees of the Grand Trunk railway were compelled to move from York to a point west of Toronto. It is possible that quite a number of men, if what is said to be in the mind of the Grand Trunk railway be carried out, will be compelled to remove from Brockville to Prescott. Many of these men, I know personally, have put all their earnings in their little homes. These will have to be sacrificed to a great extent to say nothing of the inconvenience to which they will be put in being compelled to remove with their families to new homes and practically to begin life over again. It is possible that the people of Havelock, a village that the Canadian Pacific railway created, will be dealt with in the same way as the Canadian Pacific railway is branching off there to run along the front parallel with the Grand Trunk railway and Canadian Northern railway in order to better its grades and to be able to handle its traffic more economically. In these considerations I think it is time that we placed on the statute-book legislation which will protect employees, when they are thus compelled to move, from any pecuniary loss at least. I have placed in this Bill a clause which says that the terminals cannot be moved except by the consent of the Railway Commissioners. That may seem drastic at first sight but in the present Act the Board of Railway Commissioners are given power to say where a station shall be located and, if the public have any grievance as to the location of a station, they are authorized to appeal to the Board of Railway Commissioners and the board's decision is given in regard to the matter. If it be proper that stations and their location be placed in the hands of the Board of Railway Commissioners, and if it be proper that the location of the line itself, after the general location has been approved by the minister, should be placed in the hands of the Board of Railway Commissioners, then I submit that it is not unreasonable that the placing and changing of terminals should also come under the jurisdiction of the Board of Railway Commissioners. One clause provides for that aspect of the case. The next is that the Board of Railway Commissioners shall, in the terms of the order approving of the removal say that the loss to the employees shall be borne by the company. If the amount of the loss cannot be arrived at by agreement between the company and the employees, then the next clause provides that the Board of Railway Commissioners may settle the dispute and say what the loss is. I think there is nothing unfair in this proposition and if the companies think it over seriously and calmly, I believe that they will come to the conclusion that there is nothing unfair in it. Just one word more: I understand that the consolidation of the Railway Act is now nearly completed and I also understand that, without the consent of the Government, I could not press this Bill further than possibly the first reading, but I appeal to the Government either to allow this Bill to be proceeded with or to include it in their Railway Act which ought to shortly come before the House.

Hon. FRANK COCHRANE (Minister of Railways and Canals): I beg to say that we have included this in the consolidation of the Railway Act. We have also discussed it with the different railway companies, and I do not find that there is very much objection to it. The wording may not be just exactly as the hon. gentleman (Mr. Graham) has it, but that will be a matter for discussion when the Bill is brought down.

Mr. JOHN WEBSTER (Brockville): It is high time that the railway employees of this country received some consideration from those large corporations by which they are employed. As the hon. member for South Renfrew (Mr. Graham) has said, the railway men of Brockville are very much disturbed in their minds regarding the——

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order, order.

Mr. SPEAKER: It is quite in order, on the motion to introduce a Bill, to discuss it, but not on the motion for the first reading.

Mr. WEBSTER: The railway employees of Brockville are very much excited over the possibility that they may have to move to an adjoining town. We have in Brockville some one hundred employees who own thousands of dollars worth of property, representing their life savings, and I have no doubt that, if the change in the terminals takes place, that property will decrease very much in value. These employees have spent their lives in the town of Brockville; they have helped to build up the town; they have contributed to the construction of sidewalks, schools, churches, hospitals, and many other conveniences; they have paid their share of the cost of the sewage, light and water systems, and now, if they have to remove to a town which has not these advantages, it is a great injustice indeed. I hope that my hon. friend the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Cochrane) will recommend the adoption of such legislation as will enable the men to receive some compensation for being knocked around in such a way as this. I will have very great pleasure in giving my support to any measure that will afford relief to railway men under such circumstances as these.

Mr. JOHN A. SEXSMITH (East Peterborough): Mr. Speaker, I am very glad that my hon. friend from South Renfrew (Mr. Graham) has brought this question up. I have been approached by the railway men in my riding and requested to bring this subject to the attention of the House on account of some rumours that the Canadian Pacific railway may move the terminal located at Havelock. This would be very unjust to the men. The railway company have practically created that village, the railway men have put the savings of twenty-five years in their little homes and, should they be compelled to move, they will practically lose the savings of half a lifetime. This is a subject that is well worth the consideration of the hon. Minister of Railway and Canals (Mr. Cochrane). Something should be done to prevent railway companies from inflicting such an injustice as this upon their men. I understand that the minister has made arrangements in connection with his Bill to meet such conditions as these and I am very pleased indeed to hear that such is the case.

Hon. H. R. EMMERSON (Westmorland): The hon. member for South Renfrew (Mr. Graham) is entitled to the thanks of the railway employees for his action in bringing this matter to the attention of Parliament. While this Parliament would perhaps not go so far as to recompense others who may have vested interests, still it should be a matter which should weigh very materially with the Board of Railway Commissioners. When a railway divisional point is established the homes of the railway employees are created a small town arises, and people are induced to come in from other sections, make investments, purchase land, and establish business. All these suffer a material loss by reason of any change of a divisional point. When in the interests of the railway or in the public interest changes may become necessary the rights of those who have vested interests should be recognized, and that could be provided for by the Railway Commission taking that matter into consideration before giving their consent to such a change.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

IMPERIAL DEFENCE COMMITTEE.

On the Orders of the Day being called:

Right Hon. R. L. BORDEN (Prime Minister): My right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) referred yesterday to some remarks I made on the 7th of April, and called in question the statements contained in those remarks. If my right hon. friend will examine carefully what I said, he will observe that he has fallen into some confusion or error as to what was really intended, or else he is under a misapprehension as to the actual facts. The right hon. gentleman yesterday called attention to the fact that he had, on the 17th of July, 1911, laid on the table of the House the report of the Imperial conference convened to discuss military affairs at the War Office. That conference was held on the 14th and 17th days of June, 1911, and my right hon. friend is quite right in saying that he did lay the report of that conference on the table of the House on the day mentioned. But, if the right hon. gentleman will observe what I said on the 7th day of April, he will find that I was not alluding to that. I will read my remarks on that occasion, and I think I shall give the right hon. gentleman convincing proof that my statement was absolutely correct in every respect. I said on the 7th of April:

As I understand it, the right hon. gentleman himself agreed that Canada ought to be represented on the Imperial Defence Committee, and further than that—although I did not know it until last summer, the matter was kept entirely confidential at the time, for what reasons I do not know—the right hon. gentleman agreed to establish a defence committee in Canada in close co-relation with that Imperial Defence Committee. No announcement of that kind was made to Parliament by the right hon. gentleman at the time we might have expected the announcement to be made, and it remained for the Colonial Secretary a few weeks ago to make that belated announcement, as the right hon. gentleman had not seen fit to do so.

The despatch of the right hon. the Secretary of State for the Colonies was laid on the table of the House on Friday, the 17th of January last; it is under date of the 11th of December 1912. When it first came it was confidential, but afterwards the governments of all the dominions sought permission to make it public. In that despatch, which is set forth in 'Hansard' on the date mentioned, the following passage occurred:

The unanimous view of all those present on May 30, 1911, was that the representations of the dominions should be not by the high commissioners, but by ministers who would be responsible to their own colleagues and Parliament, and, at the same time it was decided that a defence committee should be established in each dominion which would be kept in close touch with the Committee of Imperial Defence at home. The resolutions ultimately put forward by His Majesty's Government and accepted unanimously by the members of the Imperial conference at the Committee of Imperial Defence, were as follows:—

(1) That one or more representatives appointed by the respective governments of the dominions, should be invited to attend meetings of the Committee of Imperial Defence when questions of naval and military defence affecting the overseas dominions are under consideration.

(2) The proposal that a defence committee should be established in each dominion is accepted in principle. The constitution of these defence committees is a matter for each dominion to decide.

Mr. BORDEN.

The right hon. gentleman did lay on the table of the House the report of the conference with respect to military affairs which was held on the fourteenth and seventeenth days of June, 1911, but so far as I am aware—I speak subject to correction—he has never laid upon the table of the House the proposals which I have just now referred to, and which were made, not at that conference, but at a meeting of the Imperial Defence Committee, and not on the fourteenth and seventeenth days of June, 1911, but on the 30th of May, 1911, an entirely different committee and an entirely different date.

I am supported in the view I take by what follows in the despatch of the right hon. the Secretary of State for the Colonies, who, immediately following the quotation I have given, uses this language:

The Canadian Government having changed in the autumn of 1911, it was necessary, when Mr. Borden and his colleagues visited England this summer to put these proposals before them as they were of course unaware of the previous proceedings.

When I reached London I heard for the first time of the proceedings of this conference of the 30th of May, 1911, and, as I have already explained, I am not aware that up to the seventeenth day of January last they had ever been placed before Parliament. So that my right hon. friend is entirely correct when he says that the report of the work of the committee and the decision of the Committee of the Imperial Conference in respect to military defence held on the fourteenth and seventeenth days of June, 1911, was placed before this House on the date mentioned; but I was not alluding to that; I was alluding to the proposals which are set forth in the despatch of the Colonial Secretary. I was not referring to those dates, but to the thirtieth day of May. If I am in error in my statement with regard to that, of course I shall be very glad to be corrected, but up to the present I believe I am entirely correct in the statement I made on the 7th of April.

Right Hon. Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I have to observe, first of all, that I was not a member of the Imperial Defence Committee; my hon. friend the former Minister of Militia, Sir Frederick Borden, was a member of that. The proceedings of this committee are highly technical, and I understood they were confidential. Whatever was not confidential was published. I made application at the time to have published the resolutions of the Committee of the Imperial Conference, and they were published at my request and as soon as possible. I have not yet myself seen the report of the Imperial Defence Committee to which my right hon. friend has alluded, but so far as I can see it does not differ at all from the resolution adopted afterwards on the fourteenth and seventeenth days of June.

Mr. BORDEN: I think that, if my right hon. friend will look carefully over the report that was placed on the table of the House and will also look over the report of the proceedings of the Imperial Defence Committee of the 30th of May, 1911, he will see that they deal with two different things entirely. I think my right hon. friend was present at the meeting on the 30th of May, 1911.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I do not recollect that.

Mr. BORDEN: However, I shall be very glad to give him access to the proceedings of that committee, if he was present, because, having been present, he would be entitled to see it.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: If I was present, and if it was not published, it was absolutely confidential, and could not be brought down.

Mr. BORDEN: It could not be brought down, I imagine, because it was held to be confidential at the time; but all that I have to say about it is that the Secretary of State for the Colonies made public that portion of it to which I have alluded.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Hear, hear—afterwards.

Mr. BORDEN: That was done properly and regularly. At all events, I had no part in making it public.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: And I had no part in keeping it secret.

Mr. BORDEN: We are both guiltless so far as that is concerned.

ALLEGED INFRACTION OF IMMIGRATION LAW—STRIKE OF PHOTO-ENGRAVERS.

Mr. W. F. CARROLL (South Cape Breton) asked for leave to move the adjournment of the House to call attention to a matter of public urgency, the matter being stated as follows: Breaches of the immigration law in connection with the strike of the photo-engravers at Toronto and other parts of Canada, and the attitude of the Government and Immigration Department thereto.

And leave having been given:

He said: I shall try to be as brief as possible in my observations on the subject. It appears from documents in my possession that on the 29th of January, 1913, the Photo-Engravers' Union in the city of Toronto, after negotiations with the employers in that city, and in the city of Montreal, came out on strike in order to better their condition. There are in this union about 150 or 160 employees. Of that number ninety-two came out on strike in the city of Toronto. Things got along fairly for a while, and it looked to the union as if their demands were going to be granted. But things took a change after the first of February. During February a firm who employed photo-engravers and such workers in the city of Toronto advertised in the United States and also in England for the purpose of getting photo-engravers into Canada and employing them to take the place of the strikers. On the 11th of March, 1913, the executive officers of this union, Messrs. C. W. Perry and Edward Nunn, representing the Toronto Photo-Engravers Union and the Montreal Photo-Engravers Union, brought to the attention of the Minister of Labour, who then as now was acting Minister of the Interior, the fact that they were out on strike and also the reason why they were out on strike—to better their condition. They made representation also that advertisements were being published in the United States and in England for the purpose of bringing photo-engravers from these countries to take the places of these strikers, and also the fact that these advertisements were very often founded on false representations as to the condition of affairs in that particular trade in Canada. They brought to the attention of the department also that there were at that time coming into this country from England photo-engravers who were coming in in violation of the immigration law, and therefore were prohibited immigrants. The immigration laws provide that immigrants coming into Canada during certain months—between October and March—must have $50 of money absolutely his own over and above his ticket to his destination, and for other months must have not less than $25. It was brought to the attention of the department by this petition of the date I have mentioned that drafts were sent out from the city of Toronto and the city of Montreal to people in England and these drafts were given to intending immigrants who were to take the places of strikers for the purpose of evading that particular section of the immigration law, and that when they arrived in Canada this money was not absolutely the property of these immigrants but the immigrants were to turn back these drafts or cheques to their employers. This was a clear and direct violation of the immigration law. The petitioners asked the department to investigate this matter. They asked that steps should be taken against the Grip Engraving Company of Toronto, one of the firms violating the immigration law. They asked also that regulations should be passed under which persons in this particular trade would be prohibited from entering Canada or any particular port in Canada for a specified period, that is for the period during which the strike is on. They say they were prepared to substantiate all the charges made in the petition, and they sent at the same time affidavits to the Immigration Department for the purpose of bringing to the attention of the department the breach and violation of this law, and also asking for the remedy I have mentioned. That petition was written to the department on the 11th of March, 1913. From that date until the 17th of March the Department of the Interior did absolutely nothing to remedy the grievances which these photo-engravers had to complain of. Between these dates the executive of the union apparently telegraphed to the Superintendent of Immigration or to the acting Minister of the Interior that matters were getting worse, and on the 17th of March, 1913, the following letters were written by the Superintendent of Immigration to Mr. E. Nunn, secretary of the Photo-Engravers' Union.

Ottawa 17th March, 1913.

Sir,—I am in receipt of your night telegram of the 15th instant and have discussed with the Hon. Mr. Crothers, acting Minister of the Interior, the contents of your similar message addressed to him, and have wired the Dominion immigration agents at Halifax and at St. John the following rush message:—

Reported here that photo-engravers are entering Canada giving other than their correct occupations. Question closely all immigrants destined Montreal and Toronto and if any found to be photo-engravers reject if that action can be legally taken.

I trust that these instructions will prevent the entry of further numbers by misrepresentation, and should any cases be brought to the department's attention where the party in question secured entry through misrepresentation, an investigation will be at once commenced, and if it is found that the party gained entry through misrepresentation, deportation proceedings will be commenced.

Your obedient servant,
(Sgd.) W. D. Scott,
Superintendent of Immigration.

I want to refer to the latter part of the telegram that was sent to the officers at Halifax and St. John.

Question closely all immigrants destined Montreal and Toronto and if found to be photo-engravers reject if that action can be legally taken.

It strikes me that that telegram on the face of it is rather peculiar and strange coming from a department which should be conversant with the laws and regulations governing the entry of immigrants into this country. Would it not be supposed that the acting Minister of the Interior (Mr. Crothers) and his officials at Ottawa would know whether or not such action could be legally taken? They should give the officers instructions as to whether or not these immigrants could be legally detained. In my humble opinion, they knew well that such action could not be taken.

That telegram was sent merely for the purpose of hoodwinking the Union of Photo-Engravers in the cities of Montreal and Toronto and of leading them to believe that the department was anxious to do something when as a matter of fact it was not. I wish to refer to section 38 of the Immigration Act, which reads as follows:

The Governor in Council may, by proclamation or order whenever he deems it necessary or expedient, prohibit for a stated period, or permanently, the landing in Canada, or the landing at any specified port of entry in Canada, of immigrants belonging to any race deemed unsuited to the climate or requirements of Canada, or of immigrants of any specified class, occupation or character.

That is the section which the union at Toronto had in view when they brought this matter to the attention of the acting Minister of the Interior. No one knew better than the gentleman who drafted that telegram to the officers at Halifax and St. John that no such proclamation, as is mentioned in section 38, had ever been issued by the Governor in Council. That is the reason why I say that in sending that telegram the Department of the Interior presided over by the present acting minister (Mr. Crothers) was not sincere in making the best efforts it could to help out this union which was on strike in the cities of Montreal and Toronto and to prohibit immigrants from entering this country to take the places of those strikers. On the following day, the 18th of March, this letter was sent by the Superintendent of Immigration to Messrs. Grip, Limited, of Toronto, one of the firms, who were instrumental in getting these people to come to Canada for the purpose of taking the places of strikers, and who were bringing them in indirect violation of the immigration laws:

It has been brought to the attention of the department that owing to a strike of photo-engravers in the cities of Toronto and Montreal firms employing this class of labour have been securing employees from the British Isles, and as the department does not look with favour upon an influx of any class of labour or skilled mechanics coming to the country when a strike is in progess——

If they did not look with favour on these people coming in, why did they not take the only precaution which they could take under the Act and proclaim by an Order in Council that that specified class of immigrants be debarred from coming into this country for a specified period of time or during the progress of that particular strike? (Reading):

—the ocean port officials have been notified that all photo-engravers applying for admission must be warned of the strike and rejected if that action can be legally taken.

Here they sent a letter to Messrs. Grip, Limited, saying that action will be taken if it can be legally taken, when they knew that no such action could be taken until proclamation had been issued by the Governor in Council. (Reading):

It has also been asserted that some have during the past few weeks secured entry either through misrepresentation as to their occupations, or by being furnished with money directly or indirectly by their prospective employers, the department has agreed that if any such cases are brought to its attention an investigation will be at once commenced, and if it is found that any party gained entry through misrepresentation, deportation proceedings will be commenced.

Having been informed that your firm is one affected by the strike, I bring the attitude of the department to your attention for your guidance.

Your obedient servant,

W. D. Scott,
Superintendent of Immigration.

You will notice, Mr. Speaker, that that letter was written on the 18th day of March. A sort of threat was made in that letter that, if the attention of the department was brought to the entrance into Canada of any prohibited immigrants who intended to take the place of those strikers, deportation proceedings would be commenced. The matter was brought to the attention of the department previous to the 18th of March and subsequent to the 18th of March, and it has been brought to the attention of the acting Minister of the Interior very many times since that date. Yet no definite action, no action which would remedy matters, has been taken by the Department of the Interior.

I wish to read a letter sent to one of these intended immigrants in England:

London, E.C., 18th February, 1913.

Mr. A. Venn,
6 Gardnor Road,
Well Walk,
Hampstead, N.W.

Dear Sir,—We are desired by Mr. Macnamara, of Toronto, to inform you that all arrangements have been made for you to sail from Liverpool on Friday next by SS. Hesperian, and in order to get there in time to catch the boat you will have to leave Euston by the 10.25 train on Friday morning. Will you please call in here to-morrow for your railway ticket to Liverpool?

As soon as you get on board you had better apply to the purser for your passage ticket, and when you arrive in Canada, you will, before leaving the boat be given your railway ticket to Toronto and a draft for $50 made out to you in order that you may have sufficient money to satisfy the requirements of the Canadian immigration authorities, who require everyone landing in the country to be in possession of at least $50. On arrival at Toronto you will present the draft to Mr. Watts, at the office of Grip, Limited, 48-52 Temperance street.

Your wages will start from the date of your presenting yourself at the office of your employer.

That is direct proof that $50 was given to each of those intending immigrants before they left the Old Country, for the very purpose of evading the immigration regulations made under section 37 of the Act, which reads as follows:

Section 37 says:

Regulations made by the Governor in Council under this Act may provide as a condition to permission to land in Canada that immigrants and tourists shall possess in their own right money to a prescribed minimum amount, which amount may vary according to the race, occupation or destination of such immigrant or tourist, and otherwise according to the circumstances.

By virtue of that section, an Order in Council was passed on May 9, 1910, prescribing the amount of money which immigrants must have, over and above tickets to their points of destination when they arrive in Canada. It reads:

Monday, the 9th day of May, 1910.

* * * *

No immigrant, male or female, other than a member of a family provided for under the following regulations shall be permitted to enter Canada between the first day of March and the thirty-first day of October both days inclusive, unless he or she have in actual and personal possession at the time of arrival, money, belonging absolutely to such immigrant, to the amount of at least $25 in addition to a ticket or such sum of money as will purchase a ticket or transport for such immigrant to his or her destination in Canada.

It is provided that during the remaining portion of the year the minimum amount must be $50.

Drafts were given to these people for the very purpose of evading this regulation which was made in 1910 and this matter was brought to the attention of the acting Minister of the Interior.

Mr. CROTHERS: Have you read the whole of the letter said to have been sent to individuals in England?

Mr. CARROLL: No, I have not, but I shall read the balance of it:

On arrival at the railway station at Toronto, you should telephone from the station to Mr. Watts at the office of Grip, Limited, saying that you have arrived, and they will send one of their representatives with a motor car to meet you and take you to some suitable lodgings which will be found for you until you can get settled down.

I am given to understand that although the reason of your being engaged is owing to a strike, the firm guarantee that they carry out the agreement whether the strike is settled or not, and they also undertake that the wages they are paying you will not be less than the minimum rate required by the Trade Union for a man of your grade.

I will also show by the affidavits of certain people who came out that this strike was misrepresented to these people. I have here a copy of a draft on the Dominion Bank for $50 as follows:

No. D0824 The Dominion Bank, $50.00
73, Cornhill,
London, E.C., Feb. 18, 1913.

On demand pay to the order of G. H. Fortt, Esq., the sum of fifty dollars as advised.

Robert G. Bruce,
Manager.
J. Wallace,
Accountant.

To the Dominion Bank,
Toronto.

As a matter of fact, members of the union in Toronto have at least two of the original drafts which were given to these people in England, which they cannot get cashed and which they hold as evidence that the money was given for the purpose and only for the purpose of evading the immigration laws of Canada. I have here, too, the agreement under which those people came out. It is not very long and for the purpose of showing that it is actually a uni-lateral agreement, that is that it was drafted and executed for the benefit of one party alone, I shall put it on record. It is as follows:

This agreement made in duplicate this..... ....day of.....A.D. 1913.

Between:

Grip, Limited, hereinafter called the 'Employer,' of the first part.

And

Venn, Colour Etcher,.....hereinafter called the 'Employee' of the second part.

The said Archibald Venn covenants and agrees that he will for one year from the date of entering our employ faithfully, honestly and diligently serve the employer in the capacity of colour etcher or in such other capacity as the officers of the said employer consider him most useful to them in their business of engravers in the city of Toronto, and that he will devote his entire time, labour, skill and attention to the said employment and obey the lawful and proper directions of the said employers, its officers, managers and foremen.

In consideration of such service the employer agrees to pay the sum of twenty-five dollars ($25) per week, for each and every week that the employee shall remain in the employer's service, but the agreement shall not be deemed to be completed until after the satisfactory fulfilment of three months' trial during which time the wages herein will be paid and shall be part of the year hereinbefore mentioned; we to have first consideration of renew contract on terms to be arranged.

Here is an agreement which purports, in the first clause, to be an agreement for one year when, as a matter of fact, those people, who were brought out here through evasion of the immigration law were given to understand that their periods of service were to be a year when actually the firms employing the men and entering into that agreement could cancel the agreement, discharge the people after three months, and make new agreement with them. The agreement proceeds:

The employee covenants to work during the regular working hours, forty-six and a half hours a week and also to work overtime if so required by the employer provided such overtime be paid at the rate of time and a half but no time shall be considered overtime until a full week of forty-six and a half hours shall have been made up.

The said Archibald Venn covenants not to absent himself from work during such working hours as above set out unless incapacitated by illness and not to work for any person, persons or company other than the said employer during the said term.

If the employer's plant shall be at any time so injured or destroyed so as to be unfit to operate them the employee may be laid off and wages shall cease until the plant shall be fit for operation and the employee be notified thereof.

It is also agreed that the said employee shall not go out on strike or join any trades union during the term of this agreement.

The employers agree to advance the necessary expense of passage to the employee and the employee agrees to re-pay the said monies advanced to the employer by weekly instalments.

In witness whereof the parties hereto have hereunto set their hands and seals.

(Sgd.) Archibald C. R. Venn.

Signed sealed and delivered in the presence of.

(Sgd.) W. Gamble,

I do not contend that it would be a violation of the prohibition in the Order in Council of 1910, that the employer should pay the passage out of the employee and then have it returned to him. I am not advancing the idea that that would be an infraction of the immigration law.

A great many of those people came out. As a matter of fact, the Immigration Department at Ottawa had wired to the officers in charge at Halifax and St. John but that wire is most indefinite and misleading. However, the officers at Halifax and St. John took some steps. Four men were landed in Halifax on the 7th day of March, 1913. They came out on the Victorian and the immigration officers there examined three of those men named George F. Collier, William Walsh and Charles M. Fillsell. The immigration officer at Halifax had some suspicion that these three men did not have the necessary money to comply with the immigration law and regulations. As a matter of fact they made an open confession to the officer there that the drafts which they had on their persons were given to them for the purpose of evading the immigration regulations and that they were to hand back the drafts to their employers when they got to Toronto. There is a section in the Immigration Act which provides that when there is any suspicion in the minds of the immigration authorities at a port of entry as to the status of any immigrant, a board of inquiry will inquire as to whether or not the suspicions are well founded. The Act stipulates that if there be no such board of inquiry at that port or a neighbouring port the officer in charge will himself be a board of inquiry for the purpose of investigating whether or not the suspicion that that particular person is trying to evade the immigration laws is well founded. In the city of Halifax there was no board of inquiry, but on March 7, the officer in charge undertook to constitute himself a board of inquiry for the purpose of investigating the cases of these three men. The investigation took place and they were detained. But a very marvellous thing happened. They were detained in the city of Halifax from the 7th of March, until the 25th of March without deportation proceedings being taken against them, that is without proceedings to have them sent back to the port from which they came. Practically a whole month passed without any action being taken, and then when action was taken, what happened? On the 26th of March, some lawyers in the city of Halifax, acting for Grip, Limited, and others, took habeas corpus proceedings to obtain the release of the three men who were detained. I wish to point out that in the Act there is a section which says that a judge of a superior or supreme court shall have no jurisdiction to release any such persons who are detained by immigration officials. That is all very well, but the order under which those men were detained, did not show the jurisdiction on its face, and I am censuring the Department of the Interior, which has to deal with immigrants, because when this thing was brought to their attention they did not proceed properly. They did not get a person qualified with an understanding of the law to see that those detaining orders or warrants were correctly drafted. As a matter of fact, the lack of jurisdiction on the face of the warrant gave Mr. Judge Graham the jurisdiction to try those men, notwithstanding the enactments to the contrary under the Immigration Act. On the face of the warrant it should have been stated that there was no board of inquiry in the city of Halifax, or any neighbouring port, and that the immigration officer there constituted himself a board of inquiry under the Act. That was left out of the warrant, and the omission gave the judge at Halifax jurisdiction. As a matter of fact the three men were released when, if the department had taken proper precautions and had carried out the orders properly, these men would have been sent back to the Old Country, and the photo-engravers in Montreal and Toronto would have had a chance to better their social and working conditions. As I have said the three men were released, and mark you, at this very time, the organization of the photo-engravers in Toronto were spending thousands of dollars in assisting the Immigration Department to indentify incoming engravers at the various ports, St. John or Halifax, or wherever they landed. The amount spent by them in assisting the Immigration Department was $2,000, and yet, the department took no precautions to have the matter dealt with properly and according to law. I wish to read declarations made by some of those people who came out to this country. Copies of some of these declarations were placed in the hands of the acting Minister of the Interior before the 17th of March, I think, but I do not think this one is in his hands.

In the Matter of the Dominion Immigration Act.

Dominion of Canada, Province of Ontario, County of York, to Wit:

I, George Henry Fortt, formerly of London, England, now of the city of Toronto in the county of York, photo-engraver, do solemnly declare that:

1. I am a photo-engraver and was living in London, England, and was engaged at my business there when about the month of February, 1913, a Mr. Gamble representing Grip, Limited, Toronto, approached me to go to work for the said Grip firm. I had heard a rumour as to trouble existing between the Grip Company and its employees and I made a special point of asking Mr. Gamble if there was any strike on at Grip's because if so I was no strike-breaker and had no desire to act as such. He told me there was a slight trouble but it would be all over before I reached Toronto. I was occupying a good position at the time, but on his representations I decided to accept the offer to work for Grip, Limited.

Apparently the purser of that particular boat was in the plot, and some attention should be paid to his case.

I had a letter from Mr. Gamble telling me to apply to the purser of the Hesperian, the boat on which I came out, and the purser would give me a draft for $50 to enable me to pass the immigration authorities and that my pay would begin in Toronto when I returned the draft to Mr. Watts, manager of Grip, Limited.

And I make this solemn declaration conscientiously believing it to be true and knowing that it is of the same force and effect as if made under oath and by virtue of the Canada Evidence Act.

George Henry Fortt.

Declared before me at the city of Toronto in the county of York this twelfth day of April, A.D., 1913.

H. T. Burke,
A commissioner, &c.

That is one affidavit which shows plainly that those men came to Canada after the month of February in direct evasion and violation of the immigration laws, and the acting Minister of the Interior at that time knew that such people were coming in to the country, and apparently no steps were taken to keep them out. I have another declaration here which I shall read:

I, Morris Goldstein, formerly of London, England, now of the city of Toronto, in the county of York, do solemnly declare, that:

1. I am a photo-engraver and was living in London, England, and was engaged at my business there when about the month of March last I saw an advertisement in the London Daily Telegraph for process workers to go to Toronto.

2. I made application and was referred to the British Empire Agency, South Hampton Street, Strand, London.

3. I had heard rumours of trouble existing between employers and employees in Toronto and made special point of asking the agency what the trouble consisted of. They minimized the seriousness of the situation, leading me to believe the trouble would be over before my arrival.

4. Acting under these representations, I accepted a position at Hood Sandham, Limited, Toronto, and the agency then handed me an express order for $25 saying this was a present from the firm.

Mark you, they were getting a little more careful all the time. When they started to get employees to take the places of the strikers, they did tell them there was a strike on, but afterwards when they found it more difficult to get them to come out to Canada they minimized the seriousness of the situation and told them that the strike would be over before they got to Canada, thus inducing them to come to this country under false representations.

5. When I arrived in Toronto I found the trouble was of a much more serious nature than had been represented to me in London, England, there being only one man at work at Hood Sandham, Limited. After working for ten days and seeing the conditions prevailing, I decided to leave their employment until such time as the matter should be adjusted.

6. If the conditions had been properly represented to me in the first instance I would not have left my position in London, England.

And I make this solemn declaration conscientiously believing it to be true and knowing that it is of the same force and effect as if made under oath and by virtue of the Canada Evidence Act.

Morris Goldstein.

Declared before me, at the city of Ottawa in the county of Carleton, this fourteenth day of April, in the year of our Lord, 1913.

J. Ogle Carss,
A commissioner, &c.

I do not think that the Minister of the Interior has that affidavit on his file, but here is one which he has:

In the Matter of the Dominion Immigration Act:

Dominion of Canada, Province of Ontario, County of York, to Wit:

I, Sydney Weinstein, formerly of London, England, but now of Toronto, Canada, photo-engraver do solemnly declare:

1. That I was employed in London, England, to work for Grip, Limited, Toronto.

2. That I visited the office of A. E. Penrose & Company, Limited, London, England, where Mr. Gamble, the company's representative told me that four men were wanted in Toronto, Canada. Mr. Gamble gave me a draft from Mr. McNamara, who he said was the representative of Grip, Limited. The purpose of the draft being to enable me to pass the Canadian immigration authorities. Mr. Gamble said that the draft came from Grip, Limited. He gave me a typewritten paper which said I was to give the draft back to Grip, Limited, when I got to Toronto. Upon arrival in Toronto I gave the draft to Mr. H. Watts, Manager of Grip Limited, the draft having served its purpose. I know that others were coming under the same conditions. The immigration authorities simply asked me if I had enough money, but took no pains to find out how much I had.

And I make this solemn declaration conscientiously believing it to be true and knowing that it is of the same force and effect as if made under oath and by virtue of the Canada Evidence Act.

Declared before me in the city of Toronto, in the county of York, this seventeenth day of March, A.D., 1913.

A commissioner, &c.

There is another declaration which was also placed in the hands of the acting Minister of the Interior some time ago:

I, Wm. John Ceely, of the city of Toronto, in the county of York, photo-engraver, do solemnly declare:

1. That on or about February the 26th, 1913,——

Long after the time that the attention of the acting Minister of the Interior had been brought to this matter.

—I got in touch at Montreal with four men who were on their way from England to Toronto to work for Grip, Ltd. They were known as Russell, West, Collis, and 'Gus.' Gunther. They told me that Mr. Gamble, of A. W. Penrose & Company, Ltd., London, Eng., had told them that there were a few incompetent workmen from Grip, Ltd., that were trying to encourage the good men to leave the employers; that Gamble gave them drafts to enable them to pass the Canadian immigration authorities. At Cornwall, Collis told me that a twenty-five cent piece and a few coppers was all they had, and he intimated to me that if I had not helped them to food, they would have fared pretty badly by the time they reached Toronto. They showed me a cable from Grip, Ltd. West is now working for Grip, Ltd.; another works with Alexander Engraving Company, Ltd., and the other two with the Photo-Engravers, Ltd., Toronto.

This strike is still on and I believe it to be the duty of the acting Minister of the Interior, under the provisions of the Immigration Act, to take steps to deport these four men who are at present working at the places indicated in this declaration. He certainly has the power to do it. Section 3 of the Immigration Act prescribes that:

No immigrant, passenger, or other person, unless he is a Canadian citizen, or has Canadian domicile, shall be permitted to land in Canada, or in case of having landed in or entered Canada shall be permitted to remain therein, who belongs to any of the following classes.

Among these are:

Persons who do not fulfill, meet or comply with the conditions and requirements of any regulations which for the time being are in force and applicable to such persons under sections 37 or 38 of this Act.

The regulation made by section 38 of the Act is that all persons who come to Canada, other than those excepted by section 3, who have not $25 or $50 according to the season of the year in which they come in their possession and absolutely their own, are prohibited from landing and they may be deported if the facts are brought to the attention of the department. I wish to give the names of those who came out under those conditions and places where they are employed at the present time:

T. West, H. Sard, A. C. Phillips, Grip, Ltd.; Collis, Gardener, Walsh, C. Chant, Alexander, Ltd.; J. Russell, A. Gunther, Cooglan, Fillsell, Photo-Engravers, Ltd.; B. Hornscroft, A. Edmonson, W. G. Perkins, Hood, Sandham, Ltd.

Then there is a list here also of people who came out, took positions and left when they saw the condition of affairs. These persons are:

S. Weinstein, M. Goldstein, A. Venn, G. Fortt, F. Fortt.

I understand that there were two persons actually deported. My instructions are not very definite on that point, but I am led to believe that there were two persons detained and deported on account of not having $25 or $50 in their possession and absolutely their own. There is a regulation, which is section 8 of the Act, that any person who knowingly or willingly assists persons to enter Canada who are prohibited from landing are guilty of an offence, and the section goes on to say how that offence shall be punishable. There are persons in the city of Toronto to-day who wilfully and knowingly assisted certain persons to enter Canada who are prohibited from entering this country. It is up to the Department of the Interior to see that in this particular case action is taken against them and if the proof be as I have read it the penalty should be imposed. They are Grip, Limited, and the other firms in the city of Toronto who sent these $50 drafts across to the Old Country for the purpose of assisting people to enter Canada who would otherwise be prohibited from entering. They gave them this money in order that these persons might show it to the officers at the port of entry and in doing so they were guilty of a violation of the law. The money shown by these persons was not absolutely their own and they turned it over to these firms on their arrival in Toronto. The department should also give its attention to the pursers of boats sailing between the Old Country and Canada who gave these immigrants on leaving England these $50 bogus drafts in order to enable them to land in this country. Section 40 of the Act provides for complaints being made before the Minister of the Interior. The provision is rather a peculiar one and we shall probably have the defence from the acting Minister of the Interior to-day that these complaints were not technically laid. The complaints, it seems, must come to the minister, first, from the officers at the port of entry, and secondly, from the superintendent of immigration. I wish to point out at this stage that the superintendent of immigration was fully cognizant of all these facts which have been transpiring since the 11th February up to the present time and certainly the minister must be cognizant of them. These are two classes of persons who may lay complaints before the minister with reference to immigration matters. Then, provision is made for receiving complaints from the secretary or clerk of the city or town in whicn these prohibited immigrants are located. Mr. O'Donoghue, who has something to do with labour unions in Canada, went to the city clerk of Toronto, as appears from his letter, filed affidavits with the city clerk and asking him to lay this complaint before the acting Minister of the Interior. He would not do so, and he said he did not think the Dominion Government could force him to take any action, and I do not know but what he is right in that. There is no doubt that Mr. O'Donoghue was told perhaps by the department that he would have to get a compaint from the city clerk of Toronto before action would be taken in this case, notwithstanding that all the facts were in possession of the Department of the Interior previous to the 17th of February. This letter was written March 19, 1913:

March 19, 1913.

The Hon. T. W. Crothers,
Minister of Labour,
Ottawa.

Re Photo-Engravers.

Dear Sir,—In reference to the application made to you on behalf of the striking photo-engravers of Toronto, I called upon Mr. Littlejohn, city clerk for Toronto, and after exhibiting to him the various documents, copies of which you already have, asked him to make a complaint to you under the provisions of the Immigration Act concerning the importation into and presence in Toronto of four men named Russell, West, Collis, and Gus Gunther contrary to the provisions of the Immigration Act. West is now working for Grip, Limited; Collis with the Alexander Engraving Company, Limited, and the remaining two with the Photo-Engravers, Limited, Toronto.

Mr. Littlejohn declined to make any such complaint in absence of instructions from the city council or board of control and questioned whether the Dominion had power to impose any such duty upon him.

I inclose statutory declaration by W. J. Ceely and Sidney Weinstein and ask you on behalf of the striking photo-engravers on these declarations and on the material and representations already made to you to take immediate steps for the deportation of the above referred to and for the prosecution of the men, those who connived or are responsible for the violation of the Imimgration Act in these and the other cases brought to your attention.

Yours truly,
J. G. O'Donohue.

Here was a specific complaint. It is true that technically it did not come under the provisions of the Act, but there is no doubt in the world that the Act means that if it comes indirectly throught the superintendent of immigration that then the minister is forced under the Act to take cognizance of it, and up to this date no cognizance has been taken of it, no prosecution started, and no investigation ordered which would lead to deportation of these men. It is true that this is perhaps not a very serious matter inasmuch as the number of men out on strike is very small, about 90, but it is not the number of men I am concerned in, and it is not the number of men that the persons who have asked me to bring this matter to the attention of the Department of the Interior and of the Government are concerned in; we are concerned with a principle, and that principle is that the immigration laws of this country should be strictly enforced, especially when there is a strike on, and when immigrants have amongst them persons who are calculated to break that strike and thus injure the fortunes, the rights, the source of business and home conditions of the men who are on strike. The grievance is that the Act was not enforced. I complain, and the persons whom I represent complain that the acting Minister of the Interior did not send a telegram to Halifax to have these people deported if they were going to take the place of strikers. I complain that the minister or his superintendent must have known when he sent the telegram, that there was no provision under section 38 of that Act which would enable the officers at ports of entry to keep these people out. It was a pretence made for the purpose of misleading the Photo-Engravers' Union of the cities of Toronto and Montreal, and it was intended to make them feel that the Department of the Interior was acting in this matter when as a matter of fact the department was taking no action at all. In this particular case these men should certainly have obtained some remedy from the acting Minister of the Interior, especially in view of the fact that that hon. gentleman was also at the time Minister of Labour. He is supposed to have under his control, guidance, and special care, the labour people of this country who should get justice from him rather than be misled by him or his department.

I am instructed that a man named W. G. Perkins—I have no declaration to this effect, but I am told that a declaration can be made if it is desirable—was detained in St. John; he had no draft and all the money he had was $14. He was detained for a time and without any apparent cause was allowed to leave St. John and come back to Toronto notwithstanding that he did not have sufficient money to land in this country under the provisions of the Act. I am instructed that a certain Mr. Murray of the city of Toronto, who I understand is secretary of the Manufacturers' Association—I am not sure about his position—came to the Department of the Interior some few weeks ago and asked the Department of the Interior to relax the immigration laws with reference to the coming into Canada of photo-engravers who were taking the place of the strikers in Montreal and Toronto. It seems that this Mr. Murray is well known by reputation, at least to a great many members of this House, and that eighteen or twenty months ago Mr. Murray was instrumental in bringing to this country a body of strike-breakers. My hon. friend from South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) tells me it is not the same man.

Mr. MACDONELL: There are two Murrays.

Mr. CARROLL: This Mr. Murray came to the department some three or four weeks ago—I think I will have to say that this is the same Mr. Murray, for I find a note here that he is the same man. He may not be secretary of the Manufacturers' Association but he is the same man who some eighteen or twenty months ago was instrumental in bringing to this country strike-breakers to break the strike of the carpet weavers of Toronto, and many of these carpet weavers are to-day walking the streets in a starving condition. I understand this Mr. Murray was prosecuted by the late Government in connection with that affair, and in some mysterious way after the present Administration came into power was discharged without any further consideration. If he has the same influence with the Department of the Interior on the present occasion as he had in getting clear of that charge, I would not be surprised if he had something to do with inducing the Department of the Interior; not to break the laws, for I will not say that, but not to enforce them.

Mr. LALOR: May I inform the hon. gentleman that they are entirely two different men; one is the secretary of the Manufacturers' Association and the other is interested in the Toronto Carpet Company.

Mr. CARROLL: My hon. friend from South Wellington explained that to me, but in justice to the gentleman from whom I get my instructions I will have to make that statement.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. CARROLL: I know nothing personally about them; and I am surprised to hear members from Toronto laugh at these men who wish to better their condition and are prevented from doing so by the action of the department—men who have a stake in this country, most of them citizens of Canada. Yet, when it is brought to the attention of hon. gentlemen opposite, men from Toronto itself will smile and laugh at the case.

Mr. MACDONELL: I suppose the hon. gentleman is directing his remarks toward me.

Mr. CARROLL: No.

Mr. MACDONELL: I think the hon. gentleman is; he was looking at me—

Mr. CARROLL: There is a gentleman behind you who——

Mr. MACDONELL: I am the only member from Toronto in the House at present, and I desire to correct the hon. gentleman. There are two Messrs. Murray, as the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Lalor) has stated. One is the secretary of the Manufacturers' Association, and he, apparently, is the one whom the hon. gentleman is speaking about. The other is connected with the Toronto Carpet Company and took part in the investigation in connection with the Carpet Company that the hon. gentleman has been speaking about. But they are entirely different persons.

Mr. CARROLL: It does not make much difference which one it is. I am acting under instructions of the gentleman who presented this case to me, and that is what brought forth the smiles of hon gentlemen opposite.

Now, I have laid the facts of this case before the House as briefly as I could. I think it is incumbent upon the acting Minister of the Interior to order an investigation in this matter, and to have these men deported thus giving the citizens of this country who have grown up with the country a chance to better their condition wherever they can.

Hon. T. W. CROTHERS (Minister of Labour): I regret that my hon. friend (Mr. Carroll) has not taken a little more pains to get at the facts, instead of drawing so largely upon his imagination. The last statement that he has made is a sample of a great many others that he made during his remarks, namely, that a man called Murray had come to the Department of the Interior and had interviewed me touching this matter.

Mr. CARROLL: I said the Department of the Interior; I did not say whom he saw.

Mr. CROTHERS: So far as I am concerned, no man of the name of Murray ever came to me, nor any man by any other name, to ask me not to take action in this matter. The facts of the case, as I am advised, are briefly these. Those connected with photo-engraving in Toronto, numbering somewhere about one hundred, went on strike some weeks ago, not by reason of any dispute between them and their employers touching wages or hours of labour, but by reason of a difference as to the recognition of the union. Soon after, a complaint was made to us or to the superintendent of immigration, and orders were at once given to our immigration officers at the ports of Halifax, St. John and Montreal, to be very particular that any photo-engraver attempting to enter should not be allowed to pass unless he complied with the requirements of the law. We were afterwards told that these men might attempt to enter as mechanics in some other craft. The officers were then especially instructed to be very careful in the matter, to see to it that those entering fully complied with the provisions of the Act. Still later we were advised that some of these men might possibly come through the United States. We at once telegraphed to our officers at the different ports there that they should be on their guard and to examine very carefully any one coming through these ports to Canada. And, as a matter of fact, a number of these men, some three or four, were held by the immigration officers, and after making an examination, held for deportation. Application was made to Judge Graham of the Supreme Court of Nova Scotia, for a writ of habeas corpus. The men were brought before the judge, and the judge held that they were entitled to their liberty, and he held also that according to the evidence the sum of money given to an immigrant coming into this country, to be repaid by the immigrant either by being taken from his wages or in any other way, was his own money within the meaning of the section of the Immigration Act. That was the ground upon which these men, were released. I do not know if my hon. friend who has brought this matter up was furnished with a copy of the judgment delivered by Judge Graham, but he did not read it for the benefit of the House. I want to call the attention of the House to some correspondence touching this matter which I know will satisfy the House that every effort was made by the Immigration Department for the protection of the men in Toronto who made complaint. We do not pretend to justify anything that was done by the employers in connection with this matter. We have had no communication or correspondence with them whatever, except to write them to say that complaints were made, and warning them against a breach of the Immigration Act in any respect. And on the 1st of March in reply to a letter from Mr. Nunn, who represented these men, the following letter was sent:

1st March, 1913.

Sir,—I beg to acknowledge receipt of your night letter of the 28th respecting strike among photo-engravers in Toronto.

All that we can do, as I said in my previous letter, is to notify our port agents of the existence of this strike. I am now doing so, that they may enforce the immigration regulations strictly, with regard to any immmigrants who are coming to take photographic work.

Your obedient servant,
W. D. Scott,
Superintendent of Immigration.

Edwin Nunn, Esq.,
Secretary, Toronto Photo-Engraver's Union,
91 Beatrice street,
Toronto, Ont.

A gentleman in Halifax, representing the men, asked permission to interview the photo-engravers arriving in Halifax on the 1st of March. That same day, Mr. Scott sent a message to the Dominion immigration agent at Halifax in these words:

W. L. Barnstead,
Dominion Immigration Agent,
Halifax, N.S.

Allow John T. Joy or other representative labour people to interview photo-engravers arriving your port or going Toronto. I have advised Joy.

That was in reply to a telegram received from Joy of the same date:

Am in Halifax representing striking photo-engravers, of Toronto, watching importations. Department officials here refuse to let me examine passenger lists. Joy advises me ask you to wait a Minister Interior. Try to have him wire permission to local officials at once.

Here is a message that was sent to our official at Portland, Maine, at the request of those representing the strikers in Toronto. It is dated March 7:

In further reference to the matter of photo-engravers' strike in Toronto, will you please note that in the application of P. C. 924, it is desired to make sure in the case of persons going to a place where a strike is in progress, that the money presented belongs absolutely to the immigrant presenting it and not loaned to him by some employer in Canada who may be interested in his admission.

(Sgd.) W. D. Scott.

Geo. W. Elliott,
Canadian Government Official,
116 Spring Street, Portland, Maine.

A message similar to that was sent to each of our officials at the other ports where it was suggested that these men might come in. Here is a message sent to our agent at St. John, N.B., on the same day:

Strike of photo-engravers now in progress at Toronto. Examine carefully all photo-engravers going that city, satisfying yourself that money shown belongs absolutely to immigrants instead of being loaned. Object to those who do not fully comply.

A message in the same terms was sent on the same day to our agent at Halifax, Mr. Barnstead. A message was sent to our agent at Ellis Island, New York, as follows:

There is photo-engravers' strike in progress, Toronto. Understand strike-breakers on Cymric arriving to-morrow. Question these carefully and see that money shown belongs to immigrants instead of being a loan. Reject all who do not comply fully.

On the same day, a message was sent by the superintendent of immigration to the secretary of the union of photo-engravers in Toronto:

Your wire received. Have telegraphed our official New York make careful examination, but cannot arrange for examination manifest, this being United States matter. Am writing fully.

When we were notified that there was a possibility of their attempting to get through under assumed names, we sent this message to our agents at the different ports:

Reported here that photo-engravers are entering Canada giving other than their correct occupation. Question closely all immigrants destined Montreal and Toronto, and if any found to be photo-engravers reject if that action can be legally taken.

My hon. friend has emphasized the few words at the end of that message, namely: 'if that action can be legally taken.' Certainly you would not advise an officer to reject a man where he could not legally take such action. You would advise him to reject a man who was attempting to come in in violation of the Immigration Act. There is no ground whatever in these few words for insinuating that there is any suggestion in them that the law should in any way be violated by the action. If that action can be legally taken, certainly reject him; reject him if he is an undesirable, if he has not the money qualifications; reject him if he is in any way attempting illegally to enter Canada. There is no ground whatever in that message for making any charge of collusion.

Here is a letter from the superintendent of immigration, dated March 17, 1913:

I understand from Mr. Watts and two representatives of the Photo-Engraver's Union that they are to have an interview with you this afternoon at five o'clock, and in order that you may know what action has already been taken I quote herewith a letter which was to-day addressed to Mr. Nunn, secretary of the Toronto Photo-Engraver's Union:—

I am in receipt of your night lettergram of the 15th instant and have discussed with the Hon. Mr. Crothers, acting Minister of the Interior, the contents of your similar message addressed to him, and have wired the Dominion immigration agents at Halifax and at St. John the following rush message:—

Reported here that photo-engravers are entering Canada giving other than their correct occupations. Question closely all immigrants destined Montreal and Toronto and if any found to be photo-engravers reject if that action can be legally taken.

I trust that these instructions will prevent the entry of further numbers by misrepresentation, and should any cases be brought to the department's attention where the party in question secured entry through misrepresentation, an investigation will be at once commenced, and if it is found that the party gained entry through misrepresentation, deportation proceedings will be commenced.

Your obedient servant,
W. D. Scott.
Superintendent of Immigration.

As a matter of fact, several were actually deported, I think three. My hon. friend called attention to the fact that no Order in Council had been passed under section 38 of the Act. I am advised that no Order in Council has been passed under section 38 at any time. It occurs to me that it is very doubtful whether that section of the Act is applicable to a case of this kind and it is the only section under which they could be excluded. My hon. friend complained that there was no board of inquiry. Although the Immigration Act has been in force for a good many years and was administered by the hon. member from Edmonton for a number of years, I am advised by the superintendent of immigration that no board of inquiry has ever been appointed anywhere in Canada to make such investigation, but that the immigration officer has acted under section 33. The Act provides that where there is no board of inquiry, and there was none at or near Halifax, the immigration agent himself, or the officer in charge, has the same power as a board of inquiry; so that the immigration officer in this case, acting instead of a board, was simply doing what has been practised ever since the Act was passed. Mr. Barnstead, immigration officer at Halifax, who had charge of this matter, was appointed by hon. gentlemen opposite. I have never heard a complaint against his capacity for the office or against his integrity in filling it. This whole matter has been dealt with by the regular officers of the department, every one of whom was appointed by our hon. friends opposite and they have been instructed to strictly obey the law. Would my hon. friend suggest that these officers or any of them should be dismissed because they did not discharge their duty in this respect?

Mr. CARROLL: I made no charge against the officer. I complained that the department did not give him legal advice, so that his forms would be drawn in such a manner as to comply with the Act and could not be set aside.

Mr. CROTHERS: I know that my hon. friend did not find fault with the officer; that was not his object, it was to find fault with somebody else. He is not so particular whether the officer did his duty or not if he can only find some ground of complaint against the minister. If there was any fault it was in the officers of the department who were appointed by hon. gentlemen opposite and if they are prepared to take the position that any officer of this department has been guilty of wrong doing and desire to have him dismissed, that would be a remedy worthy of consideration.

Mr. CARROLL: Does the minister think that all officers of the immigration service should be qualified to draft warrants as they would be prepared or orders for deportation as they would be drafted by a legal gentleman? It was this lack in the forms which gave the judge jurisdiction to try the case.

Mr. CROTHERS: I thought I was safe in assuming that an officer appointed by our hon. friends opposite to such an important port as Halifax knew sufficient to enable him to discharge the duties of his office, one of these duties being to prepare papers in a case of this kind. When the habeas corpus proceedings were started he had the services of a lawyer, I understand a good lawyer in the city of Halifax, to assist him in doing the proper thing under the circumstances.

I was saying that the only correspondence we had with any employers interested in this matter was a letter written on March 18, to Grip, Limited, 48 Temperance street, Toronto, and I have been advised by some of these men that this company were acting not only for themselves but for other companies interested. The letter is as follows:

Ottawa, 18th March, 1913.

Sirs,—It has been brought to the attention of the department that, owing to a strike of photo-engravers in the cities of Toronto and Montreal, firms employing this class of labour have been securing employees from the British Isles, and as the department does not look with favour upon an influx of any class of labour or skilled mechanics coming to the country when a strike is in progress, the ocean port officials have been notified that all photo-engravers applying for admission must be warned of the strike and rejected if that action can be legally taken.

It has also been asserted that some have during the past few weeks secured entry either through misrepresentation as to their occupations, or by being furnished with money directly or indirectly by their prospective employers, the department has agreed that if any such cases are brought to its attention an investigation will be at once commenced, and if it is found that any party gained entry through misrepresentation, deportation proceedings will be commenced.

Having been informed that your firm is one affected by the strike, I bring the attitude of the department to your attention for your guidance.

Your obedient servant,
W. D. Scott,
Superintendent of Immigration.

Messrs. Grip, Limited,
48 Temperance Street,
Toronto, Ont.

It has been contended that the department was lax in not taking proceedings for the deportation of the few men who did succeed in getting past the officials at Halifax. It is a very serious matter to arrest a man, to take his liberty away. One of the sections of this Act, section 42, provides:

Upon receiving a complaint from any officer, or from any clerk or secretary or other official of a municipality whether directly or through the superintendent of immigration, against any person alleged to belong to any prohibited or undesirable class, the minister may order such person to be taken into custody and detained at an immigration station for examination and an investigation of the facts alleged in the said complaint to be made by a board of inquiry or by an officer acting as such.

It was quite open to the gentlemen, and they appear to have availed themselves of their right, to go to an officer in the city of Toronto, right where the men were, and to satisfy that officer that the men were there in the city of Toronto under circumstances which would warrant the Immigration Department in taking deportation proceedings against them. They did go to the clerk of the city of Toronto—so I gathered from the evidence read by my hon. friend—and that official of the city of Toronto refused to make any complaint. He was on the ground, and it was quite convenient and quite possible for those men to advise him of the facts and circumstances. It does not appear to me to be the duty of the department at Ottawa, on second-hand evidence, or on statements that are not legal evidence, to take the serious position of arresting a man in the city of Toronto and depriving him of his liberty. It seems to me that the Immigration Act has very wisely placed that power in the hands of the officers of municipalities, and the late Government, in regulations passed in section 37, provided who should sign complaints of this character, made with the view of deporting men who had illegally entered this country. The provision is that:

The recommendation to deport should be signed by the mayor, reeve, or other public official having cognizance of the facts.

So that in a case of this kind the remedy seems to be to go to the official of the municipality where the man is who is said to have entered the country illegally, and satisfy him of that fact, and then he makes a complaint to the Minister of the Interior, and it becomes the duty of the Minister of the Interior to act upon that complaint. An attempt was made to satisfy the official of the city of Toronto. According to the evidence of my hon. friend, they did not succeed in satisfying that official that this was a case which would warrant the Minister of the Interior taking action for the deportation of the parties interested. Now, Mr. Speaker, it may be interesting to read a portion of the judgment delivered by Mr. Justice Graham on this application:

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Why not read the whole of it?

Mr. CROTHERS: It is pretty lengthy, but I shall read it.

In re Walsh, Collier and Filsell. This is an application to discharge upon habeas corpus from detention in Halifax previously to deportation three British subjects just arrived from the Mother Country. The order returned by the writ gives as a case of rejection and deportation 'lack of funds, P.C. 924.' The order is signed 'W. H. Barnstead, immigration officer in charge.' Referring to this Order in Council it proceeds: 'no immigrant. . . unless he or she have in actual and personal possession at the time of arrival money belonging absolutely to such immigrant to the amount of at least $25 in addition to a ticket or such sum of money as will purchase a ticket . . . to his destination in Canada.'

By section 37 of the Immigration Act it is provided that 'regulations made by the Governor in Council under this Act may provide as a condition to permission to land in Canada that immigrants . . . shall possess in their own right money to a prescribed minimum amount, which amount may vary according to the race, occupation or destination of such immigrant, &c.'

By section 3 'no immigrant shall be permitted to land in Canada . . . who belongs to any of the following classes . . . (1) Persons who do not fulfill, meet or comply with the conditions and requirements of any regulations which for the time being are in force applicable to such persons under sections 37 or 38 of this Act.

By section 22 it is provided: 'where there is no board of inquiry at a port of entry or at a neighbouring port to which a person detained under this Act could conveniently be conveyed, or to which a case for decision could conveniently be referred, then the officer in charge shall exercise the powers and discharge the duties of a board of inquiry and shall follow as near as may be the procedure of such board as regards hearing an appeal and all other matters over which it has jurisdiction.'

These men each had some cash, and in addition bank drafts (one had an express order) each for $25, readily convertible into cash and which were converted into cash subsequently to the date of examination by the officer in charge, Mr. Barnstead. The fact of their having the requisite amount of money is not disputed. No contention was made before me on this point. It was expressly conceded and correctly conceded. What is contended is this, that this money was not absolutely the immigrant's. It appears that these three men are experienced steel plate engravers or process workers, and that they have obtained steady employment with Grip, Limited, of Toronto, under written contract to pay them each $20 per week. They are on their way to Toronto to enter that employ. It also appears that the employer has supplied each with this sum of $25, no doubt as an advance or loan to be paid out of their wages when they reach Toronto. It is not to be returned to the employer but worked out. Mr. Barnstead thinks apparently that this fact prevents them from being considered the absolute owners of the $25. In this he is in my opinion wrong. The fact that it was advanced 'to enable them to comply with the requirements of the Order in Council' does not render this money any the less their own. I suppose many of these people who come to this country as immigrants have to borrow money to come, and among other things to enable them to comply with this provision. This was the money of the immigrant—not that of the employer at Toronto who advanced it. There is no pretence that this money was put in their possession and produced by them merely to evade the provision.

Then it may be construed by the statute under which the regulation is made. They 'possessed in their own right this money.' The regulation can go no higher than the statute. If it means more than that there is an excess of jurisdiction. Now, I am referred to the 23rd section of the Immigration Act restricting the power of the court to review, quash, revise, restrain or otherwise interfere with the order of the officer in charge. In my opinion the order of the officer in charge was not made or given under the authority and in accordance with the provisions of the Act relating to the detention or deportation of any rejected immigrants.'

Hon. members will remember that that provision of the Act sets forth that the courts shall not interfere where the proceedings have been taken according to the provisions of the Act. (Reading):

In the first place, he has not proceeded in accordance with the Act, but all provisions of that kind are subject to this condition, that the tribunal must have jurisdiction.

In a case in which I think the officer in charge was so obviously wrong I feel justified in being technical. This is the order of an inferior court.

On the face of this order——

He was speaking of the order of deportation——

—there is nothing to show that Mr. Barnstead had jurisdiction, namely, that there was not a board of inquiry here or at a neighbouring court of entry under section 22. And it is not until that appears that Mr. Barnstead has jurisdiction.

There is no presumption in favour of the inferior tribunal. Then section 17 requires the decision of the board rejecting the immigrant to be in writing and this section also required a record of the proceedings to be kept. How is the minister to dispose of the appeal unless he has these things. And by section 22 the officer in charge is to follow as nearly as may be the procedure which a board is required to follow. In my opinion the three persons detained should be discharged.

(Sgd.) Wallace Graham,
J. S. C.

Halifax, March 29, 1913.

So that these men were released by legal process. As hon. gentlemen will notice, the judge takes the position that all the requirements of the Act were not complied with by the officers; therefore the officer had no jurisdiction, and the procedure was not according to the provisions of the Act. He held that the officer had no jurisdiction, but that he, the judge, had power to release those who were imprisoned. He also held that the money belonged to each individual immigrant even under the circumstances.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: As I heard the opinion of Mr. Justice Graham, he held that it had not been shown that a board of inquiry had not been established, and consequently that the officer had no jurisdiction.

Mr. CROTHERS: There was no evidence that there had been any board. But he finds that, within the meaning of the Act, on the money loaned, an immigrant had a perfect right to come through. He points out the difference between lending a man money and giving it to him for a few minutes or an hour and then getting it back from him. If the judge is right that this money was simply a loan and that, while it was in the possession of the immigrants it was their own money within the meaning of the regulations and that therefore these men could not be deported, we could not deport the men that are in Toronto now. I do not know what evidence was adduced before the clerk of the city of Toronto, but it was not sufficient to satisfy him that it was his duty to make complaint to the Department of the Interior in order to have these men deported. I submit that the Department of Immigration has done everything reasonable in this case to carry out the wishes of the gentlemen who complained and to carry out those wishes in accordance with the law. It may be that the immigration agent at Halifax did not strictly and technically carry out the provisions of the Act. That is a matter for which, I suppose, the head of the department is theoretically responsible, but in reality not responsible. The attention of the officers will be called to the remarks made by the judge, and they will be required to see to it that in future no such mistake is made, if there was a mistake in this case. There are two points that hon. gentlemen will consider in the judgment of Mr. Justice Graham. One is that this money belonged to the men. They were simply given it to enable them to pass the immigration officers, the amount to be worked out at some future time. In other words, they were loaned this money for the purpose of enabling them to pass the immigration officers and it was not a case in which they could be deported. That is a very important decision if it is held to be good law. It may be necessary to amend the statute, because I think it is not desired by this House that the law should be as the judge seems to think it is.

Then there is the other question of jurisdiction. I submit that everything within reasonable limits has been done by the Immigration Department to carry out the provisions of this Act, which was passed by our hon. friends opposite and administered by officers appointed by them, notably the superintendent of immigration and the immigration officer at Halifax. I am not finding fault with these men at all. Whatever may be said of the action of the officer at Halifax, I am perfectly satisfied that the superintendent of immigration, because I have had personal contact with him in regard to this matter, did his full duty.

Mr. HUGH GUTHRIE (South Wellington): Mr. Speaker, I do not quite agree with the hon. Minister of Labour (Mr. Crothers) who is now, and has been for some time, filling the position of acting Minister of the Interior, in his statement that neither of these departments is at all to blame in connection with the matter that has been brought to the attention of the House this afternoon relating to the immigration into this country of photo-engravers at a time of labour difficulties in the photo-engraving trade in the city of Toronto. I think that the Department of the Interior, through its acting minister, and the Department of Labour, have both been very careless in the matter, to put my criticism in its mildest form. I believe I am justified in stating, Mr. Speaker, that this is another of those cases in which the rights of labour unions and organizations, when they come into conflict with the interests of manufacturers and employers, under this Administration, receive the very coldest kind of treatment and in many cases are treated with positive injustice. This case follows so closely the case, which was mentioned this afternoon, of Murray, of the Toronto Carpet Company, that one can hardly keep from adverting to the latter case. I brought it before the House myself on January 19 of last year. It was the case in which J. P. Murray—I think he is president—at all events general manager of the Toronto Carpet Company, a very large organization in Toronto, had deliberately broken the immigration laws of this country. It could not be denied. He had induced men to come from various parts of England during a strike in his own mills, had paid them money to enable them to comply with the regulations under our Immigration Act, had sent agents to Great Britain, had published advertisements and had made absolutely false representations to workmen in that country. In the month of June, 1911, two or three months before the general election, he was prosecuted. An information was laid against him by the labour people themselves in Toronto, and the matter came up for hearing before Mr. Denison, the police magistrate. There was some technical irregularity in the proceeding and the magistrate did not consider that he should deal with the case. But the labour unions were not satisfied to allow the matter to rest there as the case was so glaring. One of the declarations will be found in 'Hansard' of last year at page 1512 setting out the facts of the case. Communications were sent to the officers of the Department of the Interior, who had charge of immigration. An officer was sent to Toronto; he investigated the facts, and he instituted another prosecution, seeing that he this time proceeded under the proper section.

Mr. SPEAKER: I would remind the hon. member that not more than one matter can be discussed on this motion; and I would ask the hon. member to confine himself to the question before the House.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I will not deal with that matter further than to say that this case which is dealt with in the motion now before the House is practically on all-fours with the Murray case. In the Murray case the prosecution was deliberately stopped by this Government and when I called the attention of the Government to that condition of affairs I received the promise from a minister of the Crown that the matter would be further prosecuted, but so far as my information goes not a thing has been done from that day to this.

Now comes the case of the photo-engravers. The Government since the beginning of the strike in February has been aware of all the facts. Mr. Nunn on the 12th of February communicated the facts to the immigration branch of the Department of the Interior. The department seems to have taken no action at all except to send a telegram to the port of entry notifying their agents that a strike was in progress and to pay particular attention to immigrants who might be photo-engravers. That, as a preliminary step, was perhaps proper enough but the matter should not have rested there. What the minister should have done was to take action under section 38 of the Immigration Act. The labour unions complain that notwithstanding the minister had all the facts before him in detail, he took no action, confining himself merely to what investigation which might be held by officers at the various ports through questioning the immigrants. In section 38, there is a specific power granted to the minister if he sees fit to exercise it, to exclude men of any particular class or occupation, and the object of that is to prevent men coming into Canada during the time of strikes or lockouts, so as to protect our own workingmen. All the Minister of Labour would be required to do; all that the acting Minister of Interior would have had to do—and they were one and the same person at that time—was merely to pass an Order in Council under section 38 to prohibit immigration into Canada of photo-engravers during the continuance of that strike as the union labour men desire in order to protect themselves. What did the minister do? He seems to have done nothing; he does not seem to be aware of the situation at all; he left it entirely to his officials. The Minister of Labour has been so much taken up with emergencies and dreadnoughts and closures that he has had little time to attend to labour difficulties.

Mr. CROTHERS: My hon. friend (Mr. Guthrie) is misrepresenting me; I hope not intentionally. It is not five minutes since I stated to this House that I kept in close touch with the superintendent of immigration in this city in every step that was taken.

Mr. GUTHRIE: If the Minister of Labour kept in touch with the superintendent of immigration that is all he seems to have done, because he certainly authorized no action which gave these labour men the reasonable justice they demanded. They desired to have photo-engravers excluded, and photo-engravers were admitted to the country and the minister seems to have done nothing except in the case of the three men at Halifax. The men who went to Toronto have not been prosecuted in any way yet. Three men were detained in Halifax. They seem to have had the required amount of money in one form or other, but that money was supplied to them by employers in Canada who desired to bring them into the country to compete with Canadian labour and to break the strike then pending in Toronto. It is true that the matter was brought before Mr. Justice Graham and he, on grounds that appeared to be highly technical—he states in his judgment they are very technical—held that the immigration officer at that point had not the required jurisdiction to make the original investigation, and there being no board of inquiry, the proceedings were irregular and the further detention of the men would be illegal. Mr. Justice Graham has made a few observations with regard to the money in possession of these men, but he did not decide the case upon that point at all——

Mr. McKENZIE: My hon. friend (Mr. Guthrie) is now dealing with a nice point of law. Mr. Justice Graham did not decide that the officer had no jurisdiction; he simply decided that the fact of his jurisdiction did not appear on the face of the order.

Mr. GUTHRIE: That makes the point more technical still. But at all events the question as to the possession of the money was not the basis of the judgment. Leaving out entirely the consideration of the Halifax case, let us take the Toronto case. The men were in Toronto; it was established beyond peradventure that the money they had was supplied them by their employers expressly for the purpose of evading the sections of the Immigration Act, and the other sections framed thereunder, which say that these men should have a certain sum of money which should be their own money. The money was supplied, as I say, by the employers in breach of that Act. These facts have been brought to the attention of the Minister of Labour and the acting Minister of the Interior in the shape of declarations and correspondence. I have a copy of a letter written by Mr. O'Donoghue, who acts as solicitor for the various labour organizations in Toronto, dated March 19, setting out specifically the cases of four men: Russell, West, Collis and Gunther; stating that he had gone to the city clerk of Toronto under section 42 of the Act, and the city clerk had informed him he did not think he had any right to inquire into the matter. But, under that same clause the minister might, upon receiving a report from any of his officers, as defined in the Immigration Act, have taken action. He need not wait for the reeve or clerk of the municipality to send him a complaint. The complaint was before him, full particulars were before him, and he has calmly sat with that knowledge before him since the 19th of March last and has done nothing. And that is what the men complain of. Now, they ask for investigation into the case of these four men in Toronto, they ask for the deportation of these four men, if the affidavits read are true, it is beyond question that these men have been brought to Canada in violation of the Immigration Act; and unless some prosecution follows and these men are deported, it is just a case on all-fours with the Murray case. I do not believe the Government will permit prosecution of these employers who have been guilty of breaking the immigration law. Certainly, they stopped prosecution in the Murray case, and they have encouraged this kind of thing in the case of the photo-engravers whose case is under consideration. The charge is not against the officers of the department—mark that. I want the minister to understand that the charge is one of laxity on the part of the Minister of Labour—that is what these men complain of. I know the minister is a very busy man, I know that it is very difficult to manage two important departments such as he has charge of at the present time, If he has not proper assistance, let him get proper assistance; but let me impress upon him that so long as he is Minister of Labour his first duty and paramount is to look after the interests of labour. The hon. gentleman was in Guelph last September, addressing the labour congress, hearing all the resolutions which these labour representatives had to propose, hearing their speeches, consulting with them and knowing the requests they had to make; but up to the present moment, he has not moved a hand to comply with any of those requests, so far as I am aware. And let me tell the hon. gentleman, and tell him plainly, that there is a good deal of talk in connection with that matter; it is said that the only definite action he has taken was when in Montreal he stated that he had not much use for labour unions—a statement which he afterwards denied in this House. But he can easily see the importance of the matter under discussion. I do not care what may be the cause of a strike; granted there is difficulty between a union and an employer and a strike follows, what protection has the union if the employers are permitted to break the very clauses of the immigration laws which were put in for the protection of labour unions and to bring people in from other countries, men who take the places of Canadian union men out on strike? In such a case the protection of the men is gone. If we do not support the provisions of our immigration laws in regard to labour to the very letter, you might as well wipe them from the statute-book. The Toronto union in this case request that an investigation be held at once in regard to the men now resident in Toronto who they allege, have been brought into Canada in breach of the Immigration Act. If it be found that a breach of the law has taken place, a prosecution should follow in order that the Murray case may not be repeated. It may be that later on in the session, the Murray case will be brought up too. And, further than that, the men illegally or improperly in the city of Toronto working as photo-engravers should not be there, but should be deported. I hope that after this discussion the minister will see his way to taking immediate action in this matter.

Mr. ALPHONSE VERVILLE (Maisonneuve, Montreal): I have listened to the Minister of Labour (Mr. Crothers) who has said something with regard to assisted immigration. If I understand the immigration law, surely, when an immigrant is handed money before coming into the country in order that he may have an amount to qualify him for entry under terms of that law, that is assisted immigration. And surely if assisted immigration is not permitted in this country, this should not be permitted. This is not the first time that such immigration has been brought in. For the benefit of the Minister of Labour, I may tell him that in 1910, about twelve or fifteen bricklayers were imported into Montreal under similar circumstances to those which have been described here to-day. But these men were held at Quebec and two of them were deported because they had not the necessary $25 in their pockets. Of course, there was a strike at that time. I am not speaking so much of the misrepresentation as of the injury that is done to Canadian workmen by these immigrants being handed money to come into Canada at a time when a strike is on. The members of the Manufacturers' Association are great friends of the Minister of Labour and they will always see to it that men are brought at the time of a strike and also that those men have the necessary amount of money to fulfill the requirements of the law. After what has been brought before the Minister of Labour and the Government, the coming in of immigrants under these circumstances should be prevented and those who are in Toronto in violation of the immigration laws should be deported.

Motion (Mr. Carroll) for adjournment of the House, negatived.

At six o'clock, the House took recess.

PRIVATE BILLS.

CANADIAN NORTHERN BRANCH LINES COMPANY.

On consideration of an amendment made by the Senate to Bill No. 97, respecting the Canadian Northern Branch Lines Company.—Mr. Sharpe (Lisgar).

Mr. LANCASTER: Hon. gentlemen will find the amendments made by the Senate set forth on page 943 of the Votes and Proceedings. Apparently Their Honours thought that they were accomplishing what we had already accomplished with much less language; but, in my opinion, these amendments fail to accomplish the object of the legislation, and make a complication which I do not think is good legislation at all. I do not want personally to assume the responsibility of moving that the House do not concur in the amendments, but reject them peremptorily. I think a better motion would be that these amendments be referred to the Select Standing Committee on Railways, Canals and Telegraph Lines, for report, and I so move.

Motion agreed to.

Amendments made by the Senate to the following Bills were referred to the Committee on Private Bills:

Bill No. 100, respecting a patent of the Honourable Ambroise D. Richard and others.—Mr. Fowler.

Bill No. 101, respecting patents of Frederick Jacob Newman and others.—Mr. Macdonell.

THE RULES OF THE HOUSE—LIMITATION OF DEBATE.

Consideration of the proposed resolution of Mr. Borden, to amend rule 17 of the House of Commons, and the proposed motion of Mr. Hazen, that this question be now put, resumed from April 14.

Hon. CHARLES MARCIL (Bonaventure): Mr. Speaker, the question now before the House is without doubt one of the most important that has come to the attention of the present Parliament or any previous Parliament since Confederation. It may affect the carrying on of the business of the House for we know not how long. The Prime Minister proposes—and the Minister of Marine and Fisheries has moved the previous question—to amend Rule 17 of the House, which reads as follows:

> When two or more members rise to speak, Mr. Speaker calls upon the member who first rose in his place: but a motion may be made that any member who has risen 'be now heard,' or 'do now speak,' which motion shall be forthwith put without debate.

Before referring to the amendments which it is proposed to make to this rule, I would call the attention of the House to the reference made to it at page 457 of Bourinot, showing the origin of the rule:

> The Speaker of the Commons will always give precedence in debate to that member who first catches his eye. Rule 11 provides also for cases where several members rise at the same time.

Rule 11 has now become rule 17.

> When two or more members rise to speak, Mr. Speaker calls upon the member who first rose in his place; but a motion may be made that any member who has risen 'be now heard,' or 'do now speak.'

Since Bourinot published his work, the following words have been added to the rule:

> Which motion shall be forthwith put without debate.

Bourinot, continuing, says:

> It is usual, however, to allow priority to members of the administration who wish to speak and in all important debates it is customary for the Speaker to endeavour to give the preference alternately to the known supporters and opponents of a measure or question; and it is irregular to interfere with the Speaker's call in favour of any other member.

I wish to point out that in this instance the Government has taken the liberty of breaking down all previous precedents. Bourinot, continuing, says:

> In the House of Lords, when two rise at the same time, the Chancellor or Chairman of committees has no absolute right to determine the question as to which should address their Lordships. Unless one immediately gives way the House will call upon one of them to speak, and in case of variance of opinion the decision must rest with the House, which may forthwith proceed to vote who shall be heard. The Lord Chancellor is given, by courtesy, precedence over other peers, should he rise to speak at the same time with other members.

The House knows that the member for Quebec East, the right hon. the leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), was given the floor by Your Honour, and the Government assumed the responsibility of setting aside the precedent which we find in parliamentary history for the purpose of bringing to a head a project which should never have been brought before the House. It is to my mind the second great mistake that this Government has committed. The first mistake was to deal with a great Imperial question from a party standpoint, and the second was to try to do away with parliamentary procedure, and to have this great measure adopted by the setting aside of all parliamentary rules.

The leader of the Government proposes to add three clauses to rule 17. I need not read them, as they are familiar to members of the House. The object is to limit debate and to take away from present members and those who come after us precious liberties which have existed for a long time. The intention of the first clause is to take away the right that we have to debate motions for adjournment. At the end of this clause, these words have been added:

But all other motions shall be decided without debate or amendment.

It remains in actual practice to ascertain what this amendment really means. Several of the older members of this House, who are present, I am sure would not like to lay down in black and white how this rule would work out in practice, because parliamentary rules, which seem perfectly good in theory, when they come to be put into practice, are sometimes found to be very difficult of application. The intention of the Government is clear. It is to limit debate on motions for adjournment and on all other motions which shall be decided without debate or amendment, except those which are mentioned in the body of this amendment. The second clause is to the same effect. The most important part of the second amendment is the last part of it after the part referring to notice of a motion that debate shall not be postponed beyond the subsequent sitting, it is proposed to add the following:

If such adjourned debate or postponed consideration shall not have been resumed or concluded before two of the clock in the morning, no member shall rise to speak after that hour, but all such questions as must be decided in order to conclude such adjourned debate or postponed consideration, shall be decided forthwith.

This means that any member of the Ministry may at any time give notice that he will move at a subsequent sitting of the House, the application of this rule. He may do that; he may be animated by the best intentions; we give him the benefit of the doubt. Circumstances, however, may be such that he may move to apply this rule at two o'clock, or a few minutes before two, and we will witness the spectacle of perhaps some much debated question, important or unimportant, being passed through under this rule which has been styled, in England, the rule of the guillotine. This is one of the most serious changes that could be made in our Parliamentary procedure. It is one which should not have been made, according to my experience in this House, without having been given the fullest consideration possible by members on both sides of the House, because if the rules are to be properly observed, they should be accepted by both of the great political parties. The enforcement of the law is an easy matter when the law is made by the consent of the governed, but in this case the rule is proposed to be made by a fairly large majority in this House and I am afraid it would not be binding on the minority. If the minority have to submit they will not submit, not avec bonne grace, but because there is no other course open to them. It must not be forgotten than an Opposition under the British Parliamentary system are here to protect the public interest. The people confides the administration of public affairs to the Government, but they appoint, at the same time, the Opposition to watch over the proper discharge of those duties and if the Opposition has put up a proper fight in a session which on next Sunday will have reached a duration of five months, it must not be forgotten that this fight has been put up in the public interest and it would be a great misfortune for Canada or for any country governed by the British system, if at any time, it should be without an opposition because an opposition is the best guarantee the public has of a proper administration of affairs. The Government may be recruited from one party at one time and from another at another time, but the duties that it fulfils in the House are duties which have been imposed on it by the public and those duties the Opposition endeavour to fulfil to the best of their ability.

The third subsection which it is proposed to add to this rule is also intended to limit the freedom of speech in a sense, to limit the opportunity that the members of the Opposition or, in fact, any members of the House now have, of bringing up grievances when we go into Supply. It is the oldest maxim of the British Parliamentary law that no Supply is to be granted to the Crown till grievances have been aired and ventilated. It is proposed here that on Thursday and Friday, two days in the week, Mr. Speaker shall leave the Chair without putting the question. That means that two days will be lost in every week and in the commencement of the session, for the first four weeks when only three days are given up to Government business, the Opposition, or any member having any grievance to ventilate before voting Supply to the Crown will be reduced to one day a week in which to bring it before the House. That is contrary to the practice that has been followed in this House and is altogether contrary to the public interest. I have no right, under the rules of the House, to impute motives to the Administration or to question the motives of the Premier who has introduced this measure, but I may be allowed to look at the facts as they are. We have been seventy-three days in session since the 21st of November. Yesterday concluded the seventy-second day of our sitting. How has that time been taken up? The first seven days were given up to the discussion of the Address, rather a limited time if we consider that in the past the discussion on the Address has often lasted for two or three weeks. The naval debate has occupied thirty-five sittings of the House and Supply eight days; government Bills have occupied seven days and there have been fifteen private members days, a total of seventy-two days. We can see here at a glance that the Government decided from the very beginning of the session, at least since the introduction of the Naval Bill early in December, that this House must first of all pronounce upon this great question which nobody would deny is the most important of all that we have had to deal with since confederation, since upon its solution will depend, in a large measure, our future relations with the Empire. It is all very well to say that this is a question of emergency but it also forms a precedent and a precedent will be used whenever opportunity may arise. The Government, therefore, has decided that the time of the House must primarily be taken up with this naval debate and it has allotted the time of the House as I have pointed out. Eight days have been given to Supply. The House and the country know that the Government has had no difficulty in obtaining Supply. The supplementary estimates for the past year were voted in a day or two and one-sixth the Supply for the present year was also voted. Therefore, on that ground, there is not the faintest suspicion that there was anything like obstruction intended or practised in this House during the present session.

The Order Paper as we have it to-day is deserving of close attention. We find, first of all, that after routine proceedings there are six government Bills still on the Order Paper that have not been introduced. These are as follows:

February 11. Bill to amend the Fisheries Act.—Mr. Hazen.

March 3. Bill to amend the Dominion police Act.—Mr. Doherty.

March 27. Bill to amend the Supreme Court Act.—Mr. Doherty.

March 27. Bill to provide for further advances to the Quebec Harbour Commissioners. —Mr. Hazen.

March 31. Bill relating to Parcel Post.—Mr. Pelletier.

March 31. Bill to provide for more advantageous conditions for telegraphic communications between Canada, the United Kingdom and other parts of the British Empire.—Mr. Pelletier.

Under rule 31 the Government have the right to call any government business standing on the Order Paper in whatever order they choose. Exercising that discretion, they have decided that this naval debate shall occupy the attention of the House to the exclusion of all other items of government business on the Order Paper. On the second page we have a government order standing in the name of the Minister of Justice since the 4th of April which has not been proceeded with, with regard to the salary of the registrar of the Supreme Court of Canada. But on the Orders of the Day proper we have still a most extraordinary state of affairs. The first government order is: 'Third reading of Bill No. 28, respecting an agreement between Canada and certain of the West Indian Colonies.—Mr. Foster (Toronto.)'—which has been standing in the name of the Minister of Trade and Commerce since January 24 last. This Bill has not been called for third reading. No explanation has been given except a reference made by the Minister of Finance (Mr. White) to the effect that this agreement had something to do with the budget and that the budget could not very well be brought down until this Bill was disposed of or something to that effect. Then there has been on the Order Paper since February 14 last: 'Third reading of Bill No. 35, to amend the Customs and Fisheries Protection Act—Mr. Hazen.' The House has not been in Committee of Supply since the 1st of April, and no attempt has been made to obtain Supply of any kind since then. Item 4 refers to Ways and Means. No. 5 is an item which has been there since February 18: 'House in committee on Bill No. 26, an Act respecting Radio-Telegraphy,' standing in the name of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries. Item No. 6 has been there since April 8: 'House again in committee on Bill No. 21, an Act to authorize measures for increasing the effective naval forces of the Empire,' standing in the name of the Prime Minister. Item No. 7 has been there since March 3: 'Consideration of amendments made by the Senate to Bill 84, an Act to amend the Exchequer Court Act,' which stands in the name of the Minister of Justice. Item No. 8 has been there since December 6: 'Second reading of Bill No. 25, an Act to amend the Intercolonial and Prince Edward Island Railway Employees, Provident Fund Act,' standing in the name of the Minister of Railways. Since December 10 a most important question has stood on the Order Paper in the shape of a resolution:

That it is expedient to provide for two additional members of the Senate from each of the provinces of Manitoba, Alberta and Saskatchewan, and for three additional members of the Senate from the province of British Columbia.

That resolution stands in the name of the Prime Minister. Since December 11, there has stood on the Order Paper another important question: 'Second reading of Bill No. 32, an Act to encourage and assist the Improvement of Highways,' standing in the name of the Minister of Railways. Since January 24, there stood for a second reading, 'Bill No. 103, an Act for the granting of Aid for the Advancement of Agriculture Instruction in the Provinces,' standing in the name of the Minister of Agriculture. Under date February 13, we find standing in the name of the hon. member for Argenteuil (Mr. Perley): 'Second reading of Bill No. 108 (Letter E of the Senate), an Act respecting the Manufacture, Marking and Sale of Articles composed of Gold or Silver and of Gold-plated or Silver-plated Ware.' Since February 21, we have had standing for a second reading, 'Bill No. 120, an Act respecting the Conveyance of Letter Carriers on Electric Railways,' in the name of the Postmaster General. In the name of the Minister of the Interior we have had standing since February 21, the following resolution:

That it is expedient to amend the Volunteer Bounty Act, 1912, and to provide that any substitute of a grantee of a warrant issued under the provisions of the Volunteer Bounty Act, 1908, and who has been duly appointed such substitute, may locate and enter for lands, as provided for in the said Act of 1908; and to extend the time within which a grantee or his substitute may locate and enter for such lands.

Since February 27, the following resolution has stood on the Order Paper, in the name of the Minister of Railways:

That it is expedient to provide that the Minister of Railways and Canals may, subject to the authority of the Governor in Council, construct, purchase, lease or otherwise acquire, in whole or in part, any railway, railway bridge, railway station, railway terminal, railway ferry or other railway work; and that any such railway or other work shall become a part of the government railway system.

Since March 31, there has stood for a second reading, 'Bill No. 161, an Act to amend the Quebec Harbour Commissioners Act,' in the name of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries. Since April 3, there has stood for a second reading, 'Bill No. 163 (Letter Y 2 of the Senate), an Act to amend the Canadian Grain Act,' in the name of the member for Argenteuil, and there are two other resolutions standing in the name of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, which I will not read because they are too lengthy. One has been standing since April 7 and refers to the Vancouver Harbour Commissioners, and the other since the same date referring to the Quebec Harbour Commissioners.

I want to put a fair question to the majority of this House. If we omit item No. 6, 'an Act to authorize measures for increasing the effective Naval Forces of the Empire,' has there been on a single one of those items anything that could be construed into the faintest attempt at obstruction? The House has been deprived of the opportunity of discussing all these measures, every one of which is important, and which have been brought down because, I suppose, they were in the public interest. Some of them refer to our trade with other countries, others to our fisheries protection, others to the administration of justice in the highest courts of the land; others deal with the funds of railway employees, with the representation of the new prorvinces in the Senate; others have reference to the improvement of highways, to the purchase of branch lines, to the encouragement of agriculture, to the postal service, to the rewards to those who have served the country.

They cover in fact the whole line of administration by this Government and this Parliament, and they are all questions which affect the Canadian people. And yet they have all been brushed aside or allowed to stand, some of them since December 10, last, without any fair attempt being made to secure the approval of the majority of this House because of the idea that the most important question before the House was the naval question over which we consumed thirty-five sittings. It is not for me to criticise, but I was anxious to call your attention, Mr. Speaker, to these facts so that when those who come after us refer to 'Hansard' to ascertain the reasons which might have justified the Canadian Parliament in voting for closure they will know exactly the state of affairs which prevailed at that time.

With your permission, Mr. Speaker, I wish for a few moments to institute a comparison between the state of affairs that now exists here and the state of affairs which existed in the British Parliament when closure was introduced. I shall make no statement of my own; I shall quote from the statements of statesmen whose words cannot be impeached, because they stand high in the opinion of the governing majority of this House. Before this, referring again to the Order Paper, I cannot avoid the temptation to mention the first of the public Bills and orders, because I know that this is one that has been called to the attention of the Prime Minister on one or two occasions, and it is of the highest importance. It is a question in which the citizens of the capital city of the Dominion, which is, to a certain extent, under the paternal care of Parliament, are interested, and it deals with the pollution of navigable waters. I understood from the Prime Minister that an opportunity was to be given to the House to discuss this Bill, and I hope that before long it will be discussed and some change made if deemed advisable. There are other very important questions on the list of public

Bills and orders. I will not mention those brought in by Opposition members, but merely those introduced by members supporting the Administration, to show what they deem most important questions. And yet all of them have been set aside for the present because of the naval proposition of the Government. They deal with the use of flags, the Bank Act, the Criminal Code, the Companies Act, the hours of labour on public works, the Dominion Elections Act, the Railway Act, the Naturalization Act, and the Lord's Day Act. Another, which I suppose has its importance, refers to the abolition of titles of honour in Canada, and there are several adjourned debates. Then there is one dealing with the Dominion Lands Act, another with the Canadian Pacific railway, another with the pollution of navigable waters, and one to amend the Juvenile Delinquents Act. All these matters have been allowed to stand, and I mention them to show what important questions are before the House and to point out the great mistake which in my opinion the Government has made in insisting on the solution of one question to the exclusion of everything else. The last time that a revision of the rules of this House took place—and there are many members here who will remember the circumstances, since it happens that most of those who took part in the debate are still members of the House,—was on the 14th December, 1909, not very long ago. The right hon. leader of the Opposition, then Prime Minister, in keeping with the time-honoured custom in such matters, moved:

> That a special committee of nine members be appointed, with instructions to carefully examine the rules of the House, to report what changes in their opinion might be adopted with the view to simplify, accelerate and expedite business; and that the said committee be composed of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, Mr. Brodeur, Mr. Pugsley, Mr. McKenzie, Mr. Carvell, Mr. Borden (Halifax), Mr. Haggart (Lanark), Mr. Barker and Mr. Doherty.

With the exception of two of the gentlemen here named all are still members of this House; one has gone over to the great majority and the other has been elevated to a seat upon the bench of the highest court in the land.

It is unfortunate that this present moment, when we are going to make such an important change, the Prime Minister did not deem it advisable to at least follow what was the ordinary procedure of Parliament. When the previous question was moved by the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Hazen), my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) had in his hand an amendment proposing that the time-honoured custom of referring the rules to a select committee for the purpose of examining them should be followed. Had the Prime Minister moved the appointment of such a committee, the ministerial party would have been in the majority on this committee, the minority would have agreed or disagreed, the report would have come into the House, it would have been referred to the general committee of the House, as has always been done, and it would have been ratified and become binding on all parties. There is no member of this House who will pretend that although great care seems to have been given to the drafting of the proposed new rules, any law was ever drawn up that was not susceptible of being amended. These rules before long may be amended in a very important particular, in fact, we have the promise of the Prime Minister that, at the next session, he will, if he deems it necessary, appoint a committee to deal with the rules, which can be taken as an acknowledgment that they are not perfect. When this proposed amendment was offered to the House, he was willing, if the leader of the Opposition had agreed, to insert an amendment to the last paragraph of the third sub-section which deals with the consent which is to be obtained for your leaving the Chair, Mr. Speaker, on Thursdays and Fridays. I understood that the leader of the Opposition did not consent to this amendment because he had other amendments to make and wanted to discuss the whole question. I think it is rather unfortunate that this procedure of a Select Committee was not followed because it might have entailed a few more days of the time of Parliament, but it was important in the public interest that it should have been followed. To show the House how careful hon. gentlemen, who are now in office, were when, on the 14th December, 1909, my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition, then Prime Minister, moved the appointment of this committee and followed the procedure that has been laid down from time immemorial, let me quote a little further from the discussion which took place upon that occasion. When this proposal was made by the Prime Minister of that day, the leader of the Opposition, who is now the Prime Minister, made a few remarks which stand in striking contrast with the attitude which he now assumes with regard to these changes in the rules. He said:

> I see no objection whatever to the appointment of this committee and to some revision of our rules. I do not know that there is anything in present conditions that especially calls for amendment. I do think that some time might be saved in our proceedings, particularly in the answers to questions. Sometimes we take up an hour or even an hour and a half with answers to questions which are inaudible to about nine-tenths of the members of the House and are not really available to any member until next day. I think that our rules might be well amended in this respect. On the other hand, I do not believe that any amendment of the rules will avoid what is sometimes called waste of time. In a deliberative assembly composed of over 200 members, there will be a certain waste of time so long as human nature remains what it is; no revision of rules will prevent it. We must also remember that parliament is a place for debate and discussion, as its very name implies. It is proper that every member of the House should have reasonable opportunity to discuss any matter that he thinks is in the public interest. It would be very undesirable to bring about any condition of affairs in which that would not be practicable. So far as the working of the present rules is concerned, I would point out that last session, which occupied exactly four months and in which a considerable amount of work was done is proof that under the rules as they are at present, the House of Commons has done and can do its work within a reasonable time. However, for the reasons I have given, and especially in view of certain amendments which I think might properly be made, I concur in the motion of the Prime Minister.

So the House will admit that not later than the 14th December, 1909, the present Prime Minister admitted that the rules in existence were practically all that was required for the carrying on of the business. He had no objection to the appointment of a select committee to go over the matter for the purpose of dealing with the one particular rule in regard to questions, but generally speaking, they were all of a satisfactory character. We see the very great change that has taken place in his mind since that time. I will take the liberty, if I have the indulgence of the House, to give more quotations from the discussion which took place upon that occasion. There are several wings of the Conservative party, and we have one member of this House who represents what I might call the independent wing of the party. I am sorry that he has been away for the last few days. The hon. member for South York (Mr. Maclean) has been a member during the fourteen years that I have sat in this House and he has been one of the outspoken members of the Conservative party. He has been the pioneer in the advocacy of a great many measures. A great many reforms have been suggested by him in advance of their time. We of the fourth estate, of the newspaper fraternity, know that the hon. member for South York is a newspaper man, a constant reader of newspapers and that there is no better informed member of the House today. He is a man who is posted on all that is going on in the great republic to the south of us and when important reforms were brought about in the states of the American Union, in connection with railways, telephones, public utilities, Government or state ownership, we were sure to have something from the hon. member for South York and to have it in no uncertain way. Under the old rules a member was allowed, on the calling of the Orders of the Day, to read long extracts from newspapers and comment thereon. That was one of the privileges that was done away with by the revised rules and we now have a rule which permits an hon. member to move the adjournment of the House for the purpose of discussing a question of urgent public importance. After the present Prime Minister had spoken, the hon. member for South York was heard further and he gave the free and unbiased opinion of the Conservative party. With the permission of the House I shall read what he said:

> I hope that this committee will in no way attempt to interfere with the liberties of Parliament, and especially with the liberties of individual members of this House. In the United States to-day, we see that the popular chamber has lost its liberties, and has passed under the domination of a Speaker who is now known as a czar, and consequently that chamber, which should have been the model chamber throughout the world as a place of debate, has lost its prestige and its power, that power having passed to another body. I do not wish to see a repetition of that history in this country. We have revised our rules to a certain extent with the result that business has been facilitated. I am glad to see business facilitated, but I put in a protest now against any interference with the liberty of this House and the right of free discussion. It is a great right, and if we once part with it we may not get it back. The liberties of this House have always been upheld—at least, so I have read—by the Liberal party, and I hope that that party will be the last to in any way interfere with those liberties.

These are the remarks of the hon. member for South York, who boasted that he did not submit to the party whip and did not attend the party caucuses. His electors must have had a high opinion of the stand he took, because of the rural constituencies of Ontario the hon. member had the largest majority of any Conservative elected in the province. Another important member of the House spoke on this important question, I refer to the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Foster), who has gone to the Antipodes in the discharge of his public duties and we all wish him success and a happy return to this House. If we do not all agree with the Minister of Trade and Commerce, still we must all admit that he speaks forcibly and eloquently. The hon. gentleman spoke on this occasion briefly, but his words are pregnant; he said:

I would ask the Prime Minister if this has any wider range than simply taking up the present rules and revising them. Does it go so far as to inquire into the making of any improvements with reference to the work of the committees of the House, as to their number, and the like of that? An intimation made by the Prime Minister some time ago when another question was being debated here would lead me to think he had that in view. I wish at this stage to say, that whilst I have no objection to any elimination of what is useless in the House, any abbreviation of what now may be somewhat too lengthy, I for one have no idea at all of submitting without protest to any of the well defined liberties of this House as a parliamentary body being infringed upon.

It is a pleasure to be able to point out now that the stand then taken by Mr. Foster is the stand taken by the Opposition in this House to-day. The gallant Minister of Militia spoke on that occasion also. He has on many occasions addressed remarks to this House with no uncertain sound, and in the last Parliament when in opposition he did not always toe the line laid down by party whips, and sometimes he expressed independence. On this question he spoke with deliberation and in a manner which would lead us to hope that to-day he may retrace the step he has taken with his colleagues. The hon. member for Victoria and Haliburton (Mr. Hughes), speaking in that debate, said:

It is true that on going into Committee of Supply every member may raise any subject in order and discuss it. But going into Committee of Supply is a very irregular procedure. So far as I am concerned, I heartily concur in all that has been said as to the necessity of preserving liberty of debate in this House, and I would impress upon that committee the view I hold, at all events, and I think it is in the interest of parliamentary procedure and of the country at large, that there should be an opportunity on any occasion, even though the House be not going into Committee of Supply, to discuss freely matters relevant and important to the country. I trust that in revising the rules there will be no attempt to curtail the liberty of debate, or to hamper members from expressing in a proper manner the views they may wish to utter concerning the welfare of the country.

There is no ambiguity in that language. With your permission, Mr. Speaker, I may be allowed to cite the statement which you made on that occasion, and in my opinion it stands to your credit. You said, Sir, in speaking in that debate:

Mr. Sproule: Rumours have been prevalent for some time past in the Government press that the Government intended to revise the rules of the House at an early date, and to introduce what is known as the closure. I would like to ask the First Minister if that is the intention in this revision of the rules. I would like to say that so far as I can judge the temper of parliamentarians generally, they regard the freedom of debate as one of the dearest rights of the representatives of the people, and if any attempt is made under the guise of amending the rules to prevent the freest discussion of all public questions, I can only say that in my judgment the Government will invite a good deal of trouble.

To the questions put by the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sprule), the Right Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier, then Premier, used these words which are to the point:

Sir Wilfrid Laurier: I can assure my hon. friend (Mr. Sproule) that the Government has no intention of using the majority now supporting it in this House to curtail any of the rights and privileges of members of this Parliament. We prize them as highly on this side as hon. gentlemen do on the other side. I propose that the rules of the House be referred to this committee in order to have a discussion upon them, particularly by those minds in the House who I think are the most entitled by their long experience to give a practical opinion. If it had been the intention to introduce at once what my hon. friend calls curtailment of the privileges of parliament, we might have done it as it has been done in England, though I do not think it was a curtailment of the privileges of Parliement. There is such a thing as abusing the privilege of debate, as there is of abusing everything else. In asking for a committee of this kind, we want to have a discussion on the subject with a view to arriving at a unanimous conclusion on such matters as we can, though there may be some other matters as to which we may not agree. But when we come to the discussion of the report of the committee, it will be time enough for the House to make up its mind.

On the 25th of April the committee reported to the House, the proposals were discussed, and concurred in Committee of the Whole. On the 29th of April the present leader of the Opposition moved that the report of the Committee of the Whole be adopted and that the resolutions come into effect at the next following session. The reason for that was that it was near the end of a session and the Prime Minister had no intention of changing the rules for the balance of the session. That was the last occasion on which the House was called on to revise its rules.

To show the importance that must be attached to the rules of Parliament, Bourinot refers us to Hearn's Parliamentary Government of England, and I would once more impress on hon. gentlemen the importance of considering this question from a non-partisan standpoint as showing the great importance that hon. members must attach to the observance of the rules and to the framing of the rules which are the only safeguard the public and the minority have. Under the heading 'Checks upon Parliament,' Hearn says, at page 555:

The utility of Parliament depends upon the freedom of its action and the genuine expression of its will. But that freedom and expression depend upon the mode of proceeding by which its will is ascertained and its action determined.

The law and custom of Parliament, therefore, form an essential part of our political system. Unattractive and even trifling as it may at first seem to appear, the code of rules which, under this title, has been spontaneously evolved is, both in its origin and its immediate and remote results, one of the most striking phenomena in our policy. It is peculiar to the Anglican race. It has silently been developed to a degree of almost absolute perfection. It has become in other countries the model for the practice of legislative assemblies. It has proved at home an efficient instrument for the transaction of the business of public meetings. There is no slight advantage in securing that the public business shall be transacted decently and in due order. But this is the least of the services of parliamentary law. The minority is protected, and the violence or the improvidence of the majority is restrained. Every individual member and the public at large alike find in this system their appropriate security. Every member is enabled to express fully and freely his opinion on every subject with which the House has to deal. There is no room for stratagem; there is no stifling of debate. The utmost latitude of discussion is ensured; but, after free deliberation, the action of the majority is unimpeded. At the same time that the rights of the minority are thus protected, full consideration is secured for each measure. No important step can be taken heedlessly upon a sudden impulse. No House of Commons could, in a fit of enthusiasm, sacrifice upon the altar of their country in a single evening their own rights and those of their constituents. It could not, like the Constituent Assembly on the famous night of the fourth of August, abolish by acclamation the whole social structure of the country. Those rigid rules have often a very sober effect. They give time for the fits of excitement that are incident to large assemblies to subside or to pass away. They cannot, indeed, exclude errors, but they fix the limit of error. Our deliberate judgment may be wrong, but we can hardly be guilty of rashness or improvidence.

We are now so familiar with the exercises of the Lex et Consuetudo Parliamenti that we fail to recognize its real merits. In this instance, as in so many others, we neglect the marvels that are at our feet. But the unanimous testimony of the ablest writers, and the results that have attended the absence of any such system, prove the constitutional importance of this branch of our law. De Tocqueville has pointed out the growing tendency of democracy to disregard forms and to slight their importance; and earnestly enforces the importance which, in such a condition of society, forms, as the defenders of true liberty, possess. Lieber dwells upon parliamentary law as an essential guarantee of freedom, and as one of the especial glories of the Anglican race. Even the habitual wrath of Bentham himself is modified when he approaches this part of our policy. The great reformer, whose denunciations are so fierce and whose language is so unmeasured on all other parts of our law, recognizes in this bye-corner the original seed-plot of English liberty. In this department of our law, and in this alone, he confesses that 'although equally disposed to have hazarded invention,' he has had 'nothing to do but to copy.' There are few legislative assemblies in other countries that have not suffered from want of that elementary knowledge of the procedure of public meetings with which every Englishman and every American are unconsciously familiar. Such a want has been one main obstacle to the establishment of free constitutions on the continent of Europe and in South America. In the great French revolution the same difficulty, as I have already intimated, was keenly felt. Sir Samuel Romilly, whose liberal nature and hereditary sympathies led him to take a deep interest in that revolution, prepared for the use of the National Assembly a statement of the rules of the House of Commons, and Mirabeau translated that work into French. That assembly, however, neither adopted these rules nor observed any others. There was no order or regularity in their debates. A hundred members might be seen at the same time attempting to address the House. No rule was observed in making motions. The spectators were allowed to applaud and even to hiss. The authority of the President was altogether disregarded. 'Much of the violence,' says Sir Samuel Romilly, 'which prevailed in the assembly would have been allayed, and many rash measures unquestionably prevented, if their proceedings had been conducted with order and regularity.'

I shall quote no more from this author. I have given his words to call the attention of the House to the tremendous importance which at all times has been attached to the proper observance of the parliamentary rules and the parliamentary law of England. The greatest critic of English laws has declared that he has found in the rules of the English Parliament the seed-plot of English liberty. It is well that in this Canadian Parliament, this Parliament of the first of the sister nations of the Empire, we who have undertaken to carry out on the North American continent the traditions of the Mother Country, who intend, in the matter of the rights which we have inherited to stand by the traditions of the British people in parliamentary government—it is well for us to pause before doing away with the most cherished of the liberties of the members of this House no matter how important may be the question that is before us; for what we are doing to-day will stand against us as it will stand against those who come after us. In this Parliament, and later on we may be blamed for having committed a fatal error. By doing away with these rules we may plant on the North American continent the seeds that have grown to such rankness elsewhere. In the South American continent, for the want of sober English rules, and their restraining influence, anarchy has been rendered almost chronic, revolution has been almost of daily occurence, and parliamentary and responsible government has become almost a farce. Here on this North American continent, it has been, and it is, our duty to benefit by the experience of others. I know that I shall be told that we are face to face with an extraordinary conditions of affairs. The right hon. Prime Minister considers that an extraordinary condition of affairs exists. But I do not so regard it. Since this House came into existence in 1867, the great Prime Minister of its earliest period and many of the great men who have followed him in that high office have found sufficient patriotism, sufficient enlightenment in the members of the Canadian House of Commons, sufficient flexibility in its rules, sufficient adaptability in its parliamentary methods, to solve the greatest questions. There is no question however great, there is no question however important which cannot be properly solved under British customs, and the British parliamentary system. The way to bring out the right results is to go about the work in the right way, in the fair way, in the British way. If this had been done in this case, there would have been no present complaint. I do not wish to detain the House at greater length on this point, but having had the honour in the past of filling the position of Deputy Speaker during four years and that of Speaker during three years, an honour which I shall always value highly as long as I live, I thought it was my duty to call the attention of the House to the importance of what has taken place and what is is contemplated to do. The right hon. Prime Minister in bringing down his measure naturally turned towards England for a precedent. He quoted from Mr. Gladstone, from other great men, from the Canadian press,—from all that could possibly uphold his contention. The greatest men and the greatest minds have committed mistakes. Mr. Gladstone, I am sure, when he brought in the change in reference to the British Parliament, did so with great reluctance, but he did so in the face of a state of affairs which does not exist here at all. On merely reading the Order Paper of to-day, one will see that no attempt has been made by the Government to carry on the ordinary business of the Canadian people. No attempt has been made to have the ordinary questions which are brought up before the House solved by Parliament; but an attempt has been made to throw into the arena of this Parliament a great Imperial question for which we were not prepared for the reason that about three years ago we took a united stand on that question, a stand which seemed at the time to meet with the general approval of the Canadian people. Since then, the right hon the Prime Minister has gone to England and has sought advice from the First Lord of the Admiralty. We have heard letters read in this House from the First Lord of the Admiralty. We know that the right hon. Winston Churchill stands high in the estimation of the Government and of its supporters. I have in my hand the writings of that hon. gentleman. I have the biography of his illustrious father, Lord Randolph Churchill, which he wrote when he was free to express an opinion on the measure which is now brought into the House by the right hon. the Prime Minister. I am sure his opinion will be valuable to the House in forming a judgment on this question. I shall read the part that deals with closure before reading a chapter of the conditions which prevailed in Great Britain which brought about the closure in that country, because it has been recognized since then that if closure is an evil, obstruction is also an evil, but the greater of the two evils is closure. The British Parliament is not at all similar to our Parliament. We have nine provincial legislatures in Canada. If we were to do away with all of them, if all the business of these local legislatures were thrown into this House, if we had in addition to that to attend to the affairs of a vast Empire, if we had in this House of some two hundred members, ten or twelve members who would speak and vote against every motion that was made in this House, every move of every kind, day after day, week after week, and month after month, then we might realize the condition that existed in Great Britain. The two great political parties there got together for the purpose of adopting this important change in the rules, in order to carry on the business of the country against the opposition of a small minority. I shall have an opportunity later on to say a few words in regard to the motives which guided this minority. The minority may have been a nuisance at the time, but they were carrying on a great warfare, which has brought about in their lifetime and in our own lifetime one of the great changes for which the British people are noted. A change was brought about by the consent practically of the two great British parties, the Tories and the Liberals. Was not this change, which the Prime Minister intends to make in the rules of the House, sufficiently important to follow the ordinary procedure, the procedure that has been followed at all times, and to consult the Liberal party in the matter ? That is one of the reasons why I think I am right in saying that, if a great mistake was made in bringing an Imperial question into the arena of party politics, a second great mistake was made when it was sought by one side of the House to bring about a change in these rules.

The Right Hon. Winston Churchill, in his 'Life of Lord Randolph Churchill,' at page 220 of the first volume, dealing with the part that his father played in those momentous times under the heading 'Ireland Under Storm,' used the following language. There is no parallel between Ireland under the storm and Canada under the storm at the present time.

Ever since then, obstruction and closure have struggled against each other in a warfare which has respected no neutral boundaries and recognized no public law. Scarcely any parliamentary custom or privilege has escaped their joint depredations. Every device or formality designed in the careful wisdom of former ages to safeguard the rights of a minority has been recklessly exploited by the one fraction and ruthlessly demolished by the other. The historic procedure of the House of Commons has been reduced to the rigid framework which had hitherto served a purpose only in continental or colonial imitations. The whole theatre of war has been devastated. Almost everything within the range of the combatants that was destructible has perished—and has perished beyond repair. So long as the House of Commons contains no body of opinion which, because more or less independent of party organizations, is capable of being won or estranged by argument or conduct, the vicious conflict must ever run its appointed course. The end is, however, in sight. The majority must prevail. An elaborate and comprehensive time-table, fixed no doubt with some impartiality, may soon assign immovable limits to all debate. The victory of closure will be complete. Obstruction will disappear through being at once unnecessary and impossible. But the remedy may prove more painful than the disease and the strength and reality of representative institutions may very easily disappear as well. Certain it is that if the House of Commons is ever to regain its vanished freedom and is ever to regain its vanishing authority, it will be by new and original treatment and not by belated attempt to revive the systems of the past. A larger and more generous freedom in choosing the subjects to be discussed might compensate for the mechanical regulation of the time allotted to discussion. The delegation of financial and legislative detail to committees, and the devolution upon local, provincial or national bodies of much contentious business proper to their respective jurisdictions, would abundantly increase the total time available. And perhaps those more complicated but more scientific methods of parliamentary election, generally described as 'proportional representation,' will some day secure that detached, august, impartial element in British councils whose influence and favour all factions would strive to win.

Before reading the chapter in regard to the condition of affairs in England when this great change was brought about, I should like to read a few words from the Montreal Gazette of yesterday morning, taken from the lecture delivered by the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk) before the St. Paul Young Mens' Club in his own riding. The description that he gives of the closure as it exists now and the way in which it was introduced in England, is short and to the point, and is given in an impartial manner. I think it is important to give it so that comparison can be made between what is proposed to be done here now and what has been done in Great Britain. This is the portion of the lecture read by the hon. member for Jacques Cartier:

The first application of the closure under this new enactment, that is in virtue of a formal vote, took place on the 23rd February, 885. Mr. O'Brien had been named for want of respect to the Speaker, and the House had suspended him in consequence. The closure was immediately afterwards proposed, and was carried by 207 ayes to 46 nays—seven more than the required majority. The second instance was in 1887 when after a very stormy debate upon the Address, the Speaker intervened and obtained two repeated closures during the sitting of the 17th February.

'Recourse to closure in the beginning of the new regime seems to have been rare.'

This is well worthy of the full consideration of hon. members.

It has been intimated that it is the intention to apply the closure on one question; but it is hoped that it will not be necessary to apply it on other questions. The same promise was made in the British Parliament; and we shall see now how it has been carried out, how the temptation to bring it into effect was too great, and how both parties when in power, both Liberals and Conservatives, succumbed to the temptation until the closure has become a permanent institution.

The hon. member for Jacques Cartier said:

Recourse to the closure in the beginning of the new regime seems to have been rare and it is evident that the House was reluctant to employ the new procedure with which it had provided itself under somewhat special circumstances. But the machinery was still imperfect, and in 1887 it was found necessary to modify the resolution of 1882. The new rule proposed as a standing order was not adopted without strenuous opposition. The sitting of 18th March, 1887, at which it was finally carried, after a debate lasting 200 consecutive hours, was a particularly long and stormy one, and the result of the division was 262 to 41.

The new rule as to closure, which is in force in the British House of Commons today, may be briefly summed up as follows:

1. When a question has been proposed, a member may move 'that the question be now put,' and if the Speaker deems this motion not an abuse of rules of the House or an infringement of minority rights, then this motion is put forthwith, without amendment or debate.

You will admit that the British parliamentarian, be he to the right or to the left of the Speaker, has in the Chair a judge to whom he can appeal for the settlement of any difficulties in parliamentary law. You occupy an exalted position in this House. We are two parties discussing matters in the public interest. We differ in the interpretation of certain rules as to the conduct of debate. At a given moment we appeal to you and we abide by your decision, you are vested with full authority and every member who appreciates parliamentary government bows immediately to the decision of the Chair. We will be deprived of this great advantage by the rules now brought forward. The hon. member for Portage la Prairie (Mr. Meighen), who seems to have had a good deal to do with the framing of the proposed amendment, in answer to a question by myself the other night, said that the reason why the Government had not adopted the British rules of having the Speaker declare whether the motion for the adoption of the closure was an abuse of the rules of the House or of the rights of the minority, was that the Government had to take the responsibility anyway and that it was not fair to place upon the Speaker the responsibility of such a provision as they have in the British House. I differ from the hon. member for Portage la Prairie, and I think that in every decision you give under the rules of this House you assume the responsibility of first of all observing the law as we know it, and second, of seeing that fair play is given to every member. If there could be an occasion when an appeal should have been made to the Speaker of this House it would be when a motion was made for the adoption of closure. Supposing, when notice of this motion is first given, the guillotine falls on the second sitting, when there has been no debate and the guillotine comes in under the proposed amendment and all debate is shut off, is it to be imagined that any member in this Canadian Parliament, occupying the high and exalted position of Speaker of the House of Commons, could be found to say that that was not doing away with the rights of the minority in this House, to cut off debate in that way, even if the debate had not been resumed and there were fifty or one hundred members who had not been heard at all in the matter? I think, therefore, that doing away with the wise British position of allowing the Speaker to decide whether the motion that is being put is an abuse of the rights of the minority is one important safeguard which is being taken away from us. The member for Jacques Cartier continues:

II. The motion for closing the debate and putting the question being carried the procedure is then followed up; that is, the question consequent thereon is put forthwith and decided, as well as any further motion which may be requisite to bring to a decision any question already proposed from the Chair (the assent of the Speaker not having been withheld).

There again comes in the wise British position of allowing the umpire to rule the game, allowing the Speaker, who is there for that purpose and no other, to see that justice and fair-play are meted out to every member of the House. We are deprived of the basic principle of appealing to the Chair, under the rules put in by the Prime Minister. The case will strike the average man very forcibly if he is told that at any moment in a court of justice, if he be the defendant, the plaintiff may at a certain time make a motion in which the judge will have nothing to say and the defendant will be entirely at the mercy of the plaintiff. That will be the position not only of this Opposition, but of any other opposition in this House, if these rules stand. But I seem to feel that behind the words uttered by the Prime Minister that he would consent next session to the appointment of a committee for the revision of these rules, lay the fact that he still has a high opinion of British parliamentary procedure and that he himself has been reluctant to bring in these measures, and will take an opportunity at an early day to have them repealed. We do not know what took place in the Cabinet and shall never know, but we know that the majority rule, and I would not be surprised if some day we should learn that on this one occasion the Prime Minister was opposed to the amendment of this rule. Mr. Monk proceeds:

III. Also when a clause is under consideration, a motion may be made (the assent of the Chair not being witheld).

There is again the wise provision that the Chair must consent to the closure measure, that there must be no abuse of power, no taking away of the rights of the minority, the assent of the Chair must be had.

—that the question that certain words of the clause, defined in the motion, stand part of the clause, or that the clause stand part of or be added to the Bill, be now put.

IV. And all these motions like the first starting the closure are put and decided without amendment or debate.

The object of this rule is thus very clear. It is that at a certain stage of the discussion of a question and under carefully defined conditions, to close debate present, further, subsidiary, or auxiliary motions and bring to an immediate decision, not only the main question, but all the secondary questions tacked on to it so that the whole matter at issue may be finally voted upon and disposed of. But the standing order further provides that no resort can be had to this exceptional procedure unless the Speaker or, in his absence, the Deputy Speaker, is in the Chair and in Committee of the Whole House the Chairman of Ways and Means is in the Chair (or in his unavoidable absence) the Deputy Chairman, and moreover in the assembly the motion must be supported by not less than 100 members. The reduction of the majority from 200 to 100 dates from February 28, 1888.

The essential difference between the present rule and the standing order of 1882 is that formerly the initiation of closure lay with the presiding officer, and now any member of the assembly may propose the recourse, but the presiding officer exercises, as it were, a preventive veto upon its adoption. Resort to this extreme machinery was rather rare at first but it has become much more frequent in recent years. Even as late as 1903, closure was only applied 13 times; in 1904, 44 times; in 1905, 45 applications; in 1906, 61 times; then in 1907, 45 times; in 1908, closure was applied on 40 occasions and 124 applications are recorded in 1909.

The guillotine—the closure had been at first resorted to in order to meet the particular obstructive tactics of the Irish parliamentary group; it was reluctantly and rarely applied at first but its use gradually became more frequent. Important Bills and pressing measures having been unduly delayed by motions to amend each clause and almost every sentence, recourse was had to the guillotine, a method of forcing a Bill through with its clauses practically undiscussed. It means that under the standing orders of the House closure is applied when the time allotted for consideration of any measure has expired and the measure is disposed of then and there under the closure rules. The guillotine was first applied on the 17th June, 1887, to force through in committee the numerous clauses of the Crimes Act, when the 6th clause only had been reached after prolonged debates. The Home Rule Bill of 1893 was pushed through by the use of guillotine.

There we have in the words of the hon. member for Jacques Cartier an idea of the system as it exists in England to-day. Mr. Speaker, I question whether there is an hon. member in this House who would be prepared to say that apart from the long debate which we have had on the naval question, and which had to be long because of the importance of the question, there has been the faintest justification for the introduction of these amendments. A great mistake has been made in not sending them to a committee. Then at least we would have had the satisfaction of offering amendments. Some might have been accepted and others rejected. We would probably have stood before the country, as we always do in a vote, in a minority, but the country would have understood that we had been given an opportunity of being heard and that having been heard, we had to submit. That course has not been followed, and I think it is very unfortunate that it has not.

What brought about coercion in England? We have it in the words of the Right Hon. Winston Churchill in a short paragraph which I would like to read to the House so that we can weigh the reasons which compelled Gladstone and the Liberals of that day to consent to the doing away with the time honoured privileges of the British House. At that time England found a state of affairs which has never existed here, and which never can exist here. In the words of Winston Churchill, on page 186 of his father's biography, under the title 'Ireland Under Storm,' he explains why the British Parliament had to bring about closure to carry on its business. His words are well worth pondering over.

The two ministers who were responsible for Ireland united in a demand for the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act and eventually, after struggles which nearly broke up the Cabinet, they procured the assent of their colleagues. The remedy was desperate, unwarranted and ill-chosen. Shocking as were the outrages, they were the least part of the dangers that threatened the fabric of society. They were, moreover, much exaggerated by the official figures. Only seven persons were actually murdered during the winter. The statistics were swollen by 1,300 outrages which proved on examination to consist merely of threatening letters and notices. Many more were trivial annoyances. What rendered them formidable were the temper of the people and the constant apprehension of some fearful outburst. Boycotting was the weapon of the Land League, and indeed it may be said that its sinister efficiency was in great measure a preventive of worse crime. In one fashion or another evictions were greatly diminished. Landlords did not dare to assert their rights. The unwritten law of the Land League, supported by public opinion, superseded the law of the land, backed as it was only by physical force.

This was a most extraordinary state of affairs. The conditions of affairs in Ireland was such that the British Parliament had to deal with it, and the only way in which it was possible to deal with it, was to resort to coercion. But, Sir, as always happens, coercion failed. You may coerce a man, you may coerce men, you may coerce a nation. But a nation will always demand justice, and while the British Parliament sat through long winter months and long summer months, day and night discussing the situation, the British Parliament and the British people have solved the problem of Ireland by doing away with coercion and resorting to the policy which is now about to be accepted. Let me read another paragraph or two from this work about the conditions which prevailed in Great Britain when closure was brought about:

It was not easy in 1880, though the science of coercion has made some progress since to discover what remedies Mr. Forster should have chosen.

Mr. Forster was at that time Chief Secretary for Ireland. (Reading):

It is certain that the remedy he chose was wrong. He seems to have imagined that the agitation depended for its vitality upon certain local leaders; that a comparatively small number of 'village ruffins' against whom no legal proof existed, but the strongest moral suspicion, were the indispensible and irreplaceable agents of the whole movement. If they were removed, he believed the whole apparatus of terrorism would collapse. If he could obtain power to arrest these men, who were notorious, peace and order would ensue. No greater misreading of the situation was possible. In dealing with a movement which was formidable only because of its almost universal character, he struck at individuals of minor prominence. He encountered profound communistic stirrings, bitter racial hatred and intense national aspirations by methods which might have been effective against the rowdy larrikins of a slum. In face of widespread lawlessness, principally petty in its character, the head of the 'Irish Executive' fell back on that supreme abrogation of civil law, which authorizes arrest and imprisonment without trial. Staking his official existence upon a demand for the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act, he prevailed upon a shivering and reluctant Cabinet.

Then came the fight which the Irish representatives put up and which is known to history. It is needless for me to dwell upon it; the English-speaking world is familiar with the story of the fight which the Irish members put up until closure became inevitable. Closure had to be brought about, but it was brought about very reluctantly. I was anxious to call your attention Mr. Speaker, to this state of affairs, to show that there was and can be no possible comparison between the state of affairs that existed then and the state of affairs that exists in Canada to-day. The British Government were justified in bringing about closure, but the Canadian Government is by no means justified in introducing a measure of the same kind. After describing what took place during the three or four years during which the Irish question was discussed in the British Parliament, Mr. Winston Churchill goes on to give an extract from a speech, the first speech of Lord Randolph Churchill reported verbatim in a metropolitan newspaper. It was the first of his great speeches, and it attracted the attention of the whole country. In it he described the state of affairs then existing in Ireland which justified in their own opinion the action of the Irish parliamentary party. Here are the words used by Lord Randolph Churchill to describe the state of Ireland under coercion, showing that closure was the inevitable result of coercion. I am giving this merely to show that closure was the inevitable result of coercion. Coercion was resorted to in the hope of bringing about a change in Ireland, it was not successful and closure followed on its heels. Lord Randolph Churchill, in speaking on coercion, said this:

'People sometimes talk,' he said, 'too lightly of coercion; it means that hundreds of Irishmen who, if law had been maintained unaltered and had been fairly enforced, would now have been leading peaceful, industrious and honest lives, will soon be torn off to prison without trial; that others will have to fly the country into hopeless exile; that others, driven to desperation through such cruel alternatives, will perhaps shed their blood and sacrifice their lives in vain resistance to the forces of the Crown; that many Irish homes, which would have been happy if evil courses had been firmly checked at the outset, will soon be bereaved of their most promising ornaments and support, disgraced by a felon's cell and by a convict's garb; and if you look back over the brief period which has been necessary to bring about such terrible results, the mind recoils in horror from the ghastly spectacle of murdered landlords, tenant-farmers tortured, mutilated dumb animals, which everywhere disfigure the green and fertile pastures of Ireland. It is to me, and many others who, like myself, have had the good fortune to live amongst the people of that country, to discover their high qualities and their many virtues, and to know that, under a firm and statesmanlike government, immense prosperity must have been their lot, as it is their due—it is, I say, appalling to reflect that all this promise has been for a time blotted out, all progress arrested, and all industry thrown back by one reckless and wanton act on the part of a Government who, at the outset of their career and in the heyday of their youth and of their strength, knew no higher object and had no nobler aim than to obtain at any cost a momentary and apparent advantage over their opponents.'

I shall not further amplify the remarks which I have had the honour of submitting to the House to-night. I was anxious, in view of the experience I had gained in this House, to call the attention of members to the important step that is sought to be taken and especially to call the attention of hon. members to the fact that the conditions which are now prevailing are not comparable with the conditions which prevailed in England when closure was brought about. The ordinary parliamentary functions could have been carried out without any difficulty at all, all the Government measures that are on the Order Paper could have been discussed, sent to the Senate, amended or adopted as the Government pleased, or as suggested by the Opposition and we would have made considerable progress with the estimates; in fact, probably more than two-thirds or three-quarters of the estimates would have been voted by this time, the end of the fifth month of the session. The ordinary business of the country has been paralyzed and set aside, everything has been allowed to stand for this one question of the navy, on which we are not agreed and on which it is impossible for us to agree. We know the conditions under which the last election took place in the province of Quebec. We know that nearly all the French Conservative members in Quebec were elected on the most formal and definite promise that under no consideration would any vote be given for a Canadian navy, a contribution, or anything of that nature whatsoever, without first giving the people an opportunity to be heard either by plebiscite or referendum. We know the circumstances under which the Government have a majority in this House, we are aware of the divided opinion that exists in England as to the present state of affairs and the criticism of such important papers as the Manchester Guardian, and we know that the British people never will accept a gift extracted from the first of her colonies by means of the closure. This is another great Imperial tragedy, it is another great Imperial mistake. I repeat what I said when I first had the honour of addressing this House on this question, that I would have been glad if Canada could have assumed its share of the burden of Empire and if it could have done so by unanimous, or quasi unanimous consent.

What will be the value of this gift that has been extracted by closure, that has been extracted by setting aside all parliamentary rules by taking away the privileges of this Canadian Parliament and by putting us, in this free and happy land, on the same footing as were the people of Ireland and the British Isles in 1880, 1881 and 1882. Between the conditions existing then there and those existing in Canada to-day there is no comparison whatever. I am sorry that this great mistake has occurred.

This country is being populated rapidly by new peoples coming from all parts of the world. They are not like us descended from the original settlers and the United Empire Loyalists. They are not like us to the manner born, imbued with the grand principles upon which this Confederation was founded, they are not familiar with the conditions under which a handful of farmers comparatively in Quebec and Ontario, when these two provinces were scarcely more than wildernesses, stood side by side with the British soldier, the old British regular, and saved this country to the British Crown. They are not familiar with the triumphs and sacred privileges which have inured to us under the British system—they are not familiar with all these conditions. They come to us welcomed from all parts of the world, they come to this, the land of promise, they come under the sheltering folds of the British flag to assume the responsibilities of British subjects and to have the protection of British laws. It is unfortunate that a great Imperial question, a question of such tremendous national importance, should have been thrown into the party arena, that we should be asked to submit to the dictates of the majority in this House and to degrade all that is sacred in the parliamentary conditions of Great Britain and of Canada at a time such as this.

It is a great national misfortune that in this state of affairs we should be called upon to give our assistance to the Empire because after all we feel and we know that we are part and parcel of the Empire. England's duties are our duties, England's triumphs are our triumphs and her trials are our trials. We all know that if to-morrow a real crisis arose, if to-morrow there was a real danger, a motion by the Prime Minister would be acclaimed by the standing vote of this House and throughout the length and breadth of the land. But we do not agree upon the means by which this can be done. We stand by the resolution which this House adopted three years ago when Parliament unanimously expressed the belief that the best solution of this question was the establishment of a Canadian navy. The Australians have taken the same stand and the New Zealanders are going in for the same thing. The smaller Crown colonies, the Malays and all those people who have not the means of securing navies of their own, are contributing towards the maintenance of the British navy. Let us look at this matter in a kindly spirit, let patriotic motives guide our decision and let us deal with the question in such a way as that not only Canada, but the Empire will benefit. A discussion has already commenced in the British press with regard to this question. A false impression will be conveyed of the feeling of the Canadian people to those readers of the British press who are not familiar with the conditions that prevail here. The people of England will be led to believe that we are not loyal to the Empire, that we are shirkers, that we are spongers, to use the words uttered by the hon. the Minister of Finance (Mr. White) the other day, that we do not want to do our duty. No right thinking Canadian will refuse to do that which he conceives to be his duty. But we represent our people. We represent half at least, if not the majority, of the Canadian people. Previous to the election many of the Government supporters in the province of Quebec were content that this important question should be submitted to the people in order that they might have an opportunity of expresing their opinion upon it. Then if the Canadian people approve of a contribution or if they approve of a Canadian navy, no matter what their decision, the Liberal party of Canada will submit to it, and to Great Britain will go the offering of a united and grateful people. I do not know whether the Naval Bill will ever pass this Parliament, but if it does it will be shorn of a great deal of its value under present conditions. How can England accept a gift wrung from the minority in this country by closure? I hope, Mr. Speaker, it is not yet too late for the Prime Minister and his colleagues to reconsider their attitude. The naval question will be solved some time, but the change in our rules will remain. The membership of this House will be altered; questions of importance will arise from time to time in which minorities will be deeply concerned; questions as sacred even as that we are discussing; the right of minorities will be swept away under notice given by a minister of the Crown, and the opposition of to-day and the opposition in days to come will be denied the safeguard given in the English House of Commons of an appeal to the Chair. If we were boys playing a ball game and were deprived of an umpire it would be no game at all, and the minority deprived of the protection of the Chair may find its rights trampled upon. The proposal now before us is a great mistake. I have spoken from a non-partisan standpoint of the importance I attach to the rules of the House, and of the importance of this question of a navy, which after all is the greatest of all British issues because without a navy there would be no Great Britain, and without the co-operation of Canada and the sister nations over-seas dominions there would probably be no greater Britain. That talented Irish-Canadian, Sir Thomas Shaugnessy, landing in England the other day was not slow to size up the situation, and probably the first question put to him there was: how is it that the Canadian people have not been able to agree on this question? I hope it is not too late to accept the advice of Sir Thomas Shaugnessy; I hope the Government will suspend the consideration of this naval question and submit it to the people, so that Canada may give united aid to the motherland in one shape or another in this matter.

Mr. PIUS MICHAUD (Victoria, N.B.): I congratulate the hon. member for Bonaventure (Mr. Marcil) on his eloquent and forceful words, and I feel sure that in view of what the hon. gentleman has stated the Prime Minister will retrace his steps and withdraw the resolution now before the House. The hon. gentleman has described the closure and the gag so eloquently that supporters of the Government had to go out of the House and leave the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance almost alone. I desire to address a few words on this important question before closure comes into effect. I wish to be able to tell the minority in the province of New Brunswick; I wish to tell the electors of my constituency that in future their interests, their rights and their needs cannot be submitted to the Government of this country without having to wait probably the whole of the session with the risk of being ruled out of order by the Speaker or at the risk of having the Minister of Marine and Fisheries or the Minister of Public Works assuming the responsibility of applying the gag upon the members of the Opposition. I was surprised to see the Minister of Marine and Fisheries on the 9th of this month rising in his seat to refuse permission to the right hon. the leader of the Opposition to answer the Prime Minister. What a nice job the Minister of Marine had on that occasion? I can assure him that his conduct and the conduct of his party towards the right hon. the leader of the Opposition will not soon be forgotten by the people of Canada. The hon. minister (Mr. Hazen) was supposed to be until the introduction of this measure, a gentleman who would be the last to deny freedom of speech to my right hon. leader, but I am sure that very few of his colleagues would have done what he did on that occasion. The Minister of Marine then played a part which the greatest Tory in this country would hesitate to undertake. This closure is possibly the most important measure that has ever been presented by a Government of Canada. We saw in this House the great men of the Conservative party standing up one after the other to approve the conduct of the Prime Minister and the conduct of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries in denying freedom of speech to our leader, and that conduct the people of Canada will repudiate the first opportunity they have. Was the Government afraid of the Opposition having a fair chance to move an amendment to the resolution? I say that judging by the conduct of the Prime Minister and his followers on that occasion, the minority in this House may no longer expect British fair-play under the proposed rules. I want to ask you, Mr. Speaker, if you know any country in the whole world which has taken such unfair means to get closure through Parliament? The gag was put upon us on the introduction of this measure by unfair means and we cannot any longer believe in promises of fair play from the present Government. I hope the Minister of Public Works will not lead this House on the closure, with the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Aikins) in the Chair, with the Minister of Marine and Fisheries in his seat and with the hon. member for Portage la Prairie (Mr. Meighen) as his adviser.

Who prepared the new rules which we have now under consideration? I believe I am not far away now from one or two of the hon. gentlemen who had all to do with them. We listened for two long hours to the hon. member for Portage la Prairie (Mr. Meighen) who has always expressed astonishment at the length of our speeches on the navy. For the dignity of this House and the good of this country the speeches should be short and to the point, says the hon. gentleman. What an example the hon. member for Portage la Prairie has given us! If we on this side of the House have spoken long on the Navy Bill, the hon. member from Portage la Prairie has also spoken long on a measure which does not require long speeches. In effect the hon. member's position is: I want the members of the Opposition to practice what I preach; as for myself, it does not matter how long my speeches are on this measure. Does the Government expect to use the closure in reference to the Bill to increase the number of senators before the redistribution of the seats in this House is made? What a fine piece of legislation that Act will be, passed under the closure. We will have the Bank Act before us soon, and I consider that every member in this House should have an opportunity to express his opinion, at length if necessary, on this Bill. Some doubts have been expressed in connection with these rules as to whether or not members of the Opposition could bring before this House the grievances of their electors. Let me read section 4:

(4) On Thursdays and Fridays when the Order of the Day is called for the House to go into Committee of Supply, or of Ways and Means, Mr. Speaker shall leave the Chair without putting any question, provided that, except by the consent of the House, the estimates of each department shall be first taken up on a day other than Thursday or Friday.

If there is doubt as to the meaning of this section, it is the duty of the Government to make it clear and explicit.

My hon. friend from Portage la Prairie, the master of the proposed rules, was unfair to my hon. friend from Carleton, N.B. (Mr. Carvell), when he said that the mind of that hon. member was disturbed when he made the statement that Thursday and Friday are together when discussing section 4. Sir, the minds of hon. members opposite are disturbed on the rules to be applied to members in the future; and the minds of intelligent Canadians are disturbed, and every hon. member opposite knows it. My hon. friend from Portage la Prairie quoted the words of my hon. friend from Carleton, N.B., but he forgot to read the remarks on closure of the former member for South Simcoe, now Judge Lennox. Let me read what that hon. gentleman said:

Well, Sir, it will be a wretched Opposition when the Opposition shall consult the Government of the day as to what they shall do and how they shall criticise the expenses of the country and the policy of the Government. It is the duty of the Opposition to guard the public treasure, to watch closely the progress of public business, to scrutinize the acts of the Government and in the honest discharge of their duty there should be no hard fast rule laid down to bind them. The Opposition are to-day only too anxious to take the verdict of the people of the country on whether they have been faithfully discharging their duty.

In the same debate he says:

When an iniquitous measure is brought in, one that is far reaching in its consequences, one that is totally indefensible, one that should not be passed in the interests of the people as a whole, not some little side issue that affects a small number of people but a great measure that affects the dearest rights and privileges of all the people of Canada, the Opposition should use every legitimate means in their power to prevent such legislation being passed.

And further on, the hon. gentleman said:

There are times when it would be quite proper for an opposition absolutely to refuse to grant supply as a legitimate means of opposing the proposed legislation.

That is pretty strong language from a Conservative, an admirer of the conduct of his leader and of his friends on the other side not very long ago. If that gentleman were in the House at this moment, I venture to say, he would not be a supporter of this present measure. The Prime Minister, when he presented this resolution to the House said in a prophetic voice and almost with tears in his eyes: 'No one is more ready than I am to acknowledge that liberty of speech and freedom of debate must be preserved.' When these words were uttered, I could not imagine for a moment that an arrangement had been made between the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Hazen) and the member for East Hastings (Mr. Northrup), that a scheme headed by the right hon. the Prime Minister was to be carried out to prevent an opportunity being afforded my right hon. leader to offer to this House an amendment to the proposed rules. Have we now any doubt as to the position of hon. members to your right, Mr. Speaker? I sincerely believe that the Opposition will be of little value if the gag is forced upon the minority of the members of this House, and the need which always exists for a strong opposition will be more and more felt as time goes on. In Redlich's work on the procedure of the House of Commons, I find the following at page 131:

The minority ought to have all conceivable right for expressing its views and aims and ought to be allowed free use of all permissible weapons of speech and political tactics in its fight against the expression of the wishes of Parliament which is the consequence of possessing a majority.

Protection of the minority is therefore no mere privilege of the minority for the time being in the British Parliament; it is a vitally important institution developed in the highest interests of a nation ruled by Parliament.

In the name of the electors of my constituency. In the name of two hundred Irishmen, in the name of three hundred Danes, in the name of four hundred Scotch, in the name of the two thousand English-speaking, in the name of three thousand French Acadians and French Canadians, in the name of the minority of my province of New Brunswick and in the name of the Canadian people, I desire to enter my strongest protest against such rules and regulations as those now proposed by the Government of this country. In the near future our friends on the other side of the House will have to appear before their jury, before the Canadian people. I have no doubt what the verdict will be: In view of the fact that you have taken away from our representatives in His Majesty's loyal Opposition the freedom of free speech, you no longer have our confidence. You have abused your authority which we unofrtunately placed in your hands and consequently we condemn you. You have ruled this young country in a very unwise manner. You have not faithfully fulfilled your mandates. You have had rules passed during your short regime to stop proper discussion on everv important measure; you have applied the gag to your fellow members of the Opposition; and we, the great masters of the destiny of the British dominions beoynd the seas, no longer trust you with the power to administer the affairs of Canada.

Mr. J. DEMERS (St. Johns and Iberville) (Translation): Mr. Speaker. After hearing the admirable speech delivered by the hon. member for Bonaventure (Mr. Marcil) and the very pertinent remarks made by my hon. friend from Victoria, N.B. (Mr. Michaud), I felt like giving up the idea of addressing the House on this question; but considering that the people I have the honour to represent here, are made up mostly of the descendants of those who fought against oppression and tyranny, I deem it incumbent on me not to let this opportunity go by without entering my protest against the revolting deed which the government is about to perpetrate, and without giving vent in this House, briefly it is true, but as tersely as I am able to do, to the indignation aroused in that community by the arbitrary and tyrannical action of the Government, when introducing that famous closure rule.

While closure in itself does in no sense whatever appeal to me, in the first place because it is an infringement on freedom of speech, on liberty of discussion, and, on that sole account, is suspicious and repugnant to me, and then, because, in the case under consideration, it may be applied by any one, whether he be a most respectable man or a scoundrel; nevertheless if the methods followed to have it adopted had been such as good sense, decency, traditions and constitutional usage warranted, we might have discussed the question without acrimony and without bitterness. But when a government has recourse, I will not say to force, but to cynicism and cowardice, then the victim of such abuse can only hate and despise his tormentors, and the victim, it is not the House, the actual victim is the people.

I shall not recall in detail what occurred on April 9, 1913, the actual date on which closure was enacted; the whole reading public is acquainted with all the particulars, as some newspaper correspondents have given quite a vivid account of it.

However, it is especially important to note that the most drastic and retrograde measure which it is possible to introduce in any parliament has been submitted to the House with due notice to the members, the representatives of the people, that they are not to consider it or to submit any amendments.

It is important to note that the effect of this measure is to set aside liberty of speech, freedom of discussion, those sacred and beloved franchises which the people have secured through years and centuries of dogged strife and bloody warfare.

It is important to note that this measure changes, in the heat of the struggle, the rules laid down for the encounter and that the opponent is bound, so that he may be more easily struck.

It is important to note that never has such tyrannical action been resorted to by any civilized government, if I may use that expression. As a matter of fact the Canadian authority as regards constitutional law, Sir John Bourinot, condemns the action of the Government, and I shall quote here what I find at pages 258 and 262 of his work on Parliamentary procedure.

At page 258, I find the following:

> The great principles that lie at the basis of English parliamentay law have, however, been always kept steadily in view by the Canadian legislature; they are: to protect the minority and restrain the improvidence and tyranny of the majority. . .

And further on, at pages 262 and 263, the author quotes Hatsell:

> 'So far the maxim is certainly true, and founded on good sense,' says Hatsell, 'that as it is always in the power of the majority by their numbers to stop any improper measures proposed on the part of their opponents, the only weapons by which the minority can defend themselves from similar attempts from those in power, are the forms and rules and proceedings which have been found necessary from time to time and have become the standing orders of the House by a strict adherence to which the weaker party can alone be protected from those irregularities and abuses which these forms were intended to check and which the wantonness of power is but too often apt to suggest to large and successful majorities.'

Here all rights are taken away from the minority, which is handed over gagged to a servile majority.

Bourinot states besides that such a procedure should be thoroughly considered, that is in committee of the whole House. Here is what he says, at pages 260 and 261 of the same work:

Procedure in revising rules and orders:

Whenever it is necessary to appoint a committee in the Commons to revise the rules and Standing Orders of the House it is customary to place it under the direction of Mr. Speaker, the motion being:

'That a special committee of members be appointed to assist Mr. Speaker in revising the rules of the House, &c.'

'When this committee has reported, its proceedings will be ordered to be printed, generally in the Votes and Proceedings; and after some time has been given to members for the consideration of the proposed changes, the House will resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole on the report. When the rules or amendments to the rules are reported from the committee, they must be formally concurred like any other resolutions; and when that has been done they regulate the procedure of the House.'

Now, the by-word of this Government is: Down with the minorities; down with the rules, down with the law, down with decency, we want despotism, czar rule, brute force. But woe to those for whom the law, traditions and usage count for nothing; woe to those who infringe on popular franchises, for the people is at times unmerciful to those who have been guilty of ignoring the people's rights.

Hon. gentlemen on the other side have sought an excuse in precedents. The comparison which has been made between the closure rules now laid before this House and the rules adopted in Great Britain, holds good practically to the same extent as a comparison between a fire-cracker and a bomb as destroyers. By the way, I may state right here that I am satisfied the Government's bomb will not be of any use; the Government loaded it, but it will never explode, as the plot is discovered and the police, that is to say the people, will put them all out of business before it does any harm.

Now, reverting to the subject under consideration, the closure as introduced by Gladstone was a mitigated measure, if I rightly understand the summary of the lecture delivered yesterday by the former Minister of Public Works (Mr. Monk), who holds as we know, the chair of constitutional law at Laval university, Montreal. That measure was introduced with prudence, and in accordance with the rules of the House, following on a liberal discussion. Moreover both parties in Great Britain were at one in respect to this question. And I may say further that the Government may have had some excuse for introducing such an unusual procedure, owing to the fact that they were confronted with obstruction of a general and arbitrary character, carried on by an insignificant minority in the House of Commons.

Nevertheless, what occurred? The Government acted with the utmost caution, and it was decided that the closure rule would be dependent entirely for its application on the Speaker of the House of Commons, whose fairness cannot be questioned in Great Britain, owing to the permanent character of his office, and the Speaker of the House of Commons was empowered to take advantage of that privilege only on a vote of three to one, when at least three hundred members would be present. As is known, in Great Britain, the Speaker stands above party strife, above party passions, and his function is of a quasi judicial character.

Later on, the following year, it was decided that the presence of 200 members, instead of 300, would be sufficient, but it was resolved that, if forty members were opposed to closure, then it would not pass unless one hundred were in favour of it.

Such is the closure system which is referred to in justification of the arbitrary and tyrannical conduct of this Government, which has just proposed that a Minister should have the right, whenever he thinks fit, in furtherance of his own views, to deprive the representatives of the people of the right of speaking in this House on behalf of the people.

Then, on introducing this measure, it is forbidden to discuss it, in this sense that no amendment is allowed. The bill has to be swallowed as prepared, and that because, by means of an unfair, iniquitous and unprecedented procedure, so bold and reckless that an effort is being made to excuse it in every way, the leader of the opposition has been refused the right to speak, though the Speaker, that is the chairman of this House, had in person granted that privilege, recognized that right to him.

An hon. gentleman on the other side, the hon. member for Portage-la-Prairie (Mr. Meighen) by way of excuse—which I rather took as a piece of sarcasm—just stated that the right hon. leader of the Opposition was not prevented from speaking for more than a minute and a half. Is the hon. gentleman aware how long it takes to kill a man? The leader of the Opposition is gagged at the start, then he is told: Now, you may talk if you like.

Fortunately outside of Parliament there is the people which can be spoken to, and hon. gentlemen opposite will soon be in a position to ascertain, willy nilly, what the people think of them. They will find out at their expense that those narrow-minded men who rejoice because of the destruction of the rights of minorities are not numerous in this country, and that the people of Canada is made up largely of broad-minded, liberal and patriotic citizens, peace-loving citizens, who will see in this action of the Government a menace of disorganization and destruction, in a word, the threatened overthrow of our national structure, owing to the wresting from the minority of what constiuted its most effective weapon, freedom of discussion. Disgraced be the introducers of gag law, and may the penalty which is in store for them be not commensurate with the grievousness of their offence.

Mr. J. J. HUGHES (Queens, P.E.I.): Mr. Speaker, this is a question of such gravity that I think every section of the country should be heard in a protest against the present measure which the Government intends to impose on this House. If the Government had followed the course usually adopted, that is to appoint a committee of both sides under the presidency of the Speaker, to take into consideration the rules which it would be deemed advisable to change, and make a report accordingly, then the House would take the report into further consideration and finally adopt the amendments that would appear to them to be needed. Both sides of the House would be represented and the rules in that way would appeal to the common sense and good judgment of the House. But what rule of procedure did the Government follow on this occasion? They brought in a drastic measure of closure and said to this House that it must be accepted exactly in the way in which it was presented. They say to the Opposition: You can discuss it if you like, but we will not allow you to change a word, or a syllable or a letter in it, we will not allow you to dot an (i) or cross a (t), we will not allow even your leader to move an amendment or suggest any change. Is the Government really serious in supposing that a rule passed in that way will commend itself to the Opposition? It is not reasonable to think so. Just as all governments in civilized countries must, in the last analysis, rest on the consent of the governed in order to be stable and enduring, so must all rules in free parliaments rest on the consent and free will of those they are to govern, otherwise they cannot be accepted and cannot be properly enforced. The Government have sought to justify themselves in the course they are pursuing in this matter because of the adoption of closure in the Imperial Parliament. But surely everybody in this House knows that the conditions in the British Parliament and the conditions here are not at all similar. When Mr. Gladstone introduced closure in the Imperial Parliament, the Irish members, in pursuance of what they believed to be their duty, had blocked all legislation in that Parliament. In their estimation there was no other way of bringing the condition of their country before the British Parliament and the British people. There was such a vast mass of business to be transacted in that Parliament, there was such a multiplicity of matters to be considered, that the particular question to which the Irish members had addressed themselves, could not get a hearing and they felt justified in blocking all legislation until the particular question in which they were vitally interested and concerned, had been heard. The King's Government, under those circumstances, could not go on and therefore both political parties in the Imperial Parliament thought that they were justified in changing the rules, in bringing in the closure so that the business of the country could go on. Is that a condition of things that existed here? To begin with, we have not a tithe of the business that the Imperial Parliament considers, neither has the Opposition in this session of this Parliament blocked legislation. The Government cannot say that any measure that was brought forward during this session has received opposition from this side of the House except the one Bill, the Naval Bill. Therefore public business was not blocked, no attempt was made to prevent the King's business from proceeding and were not the Opposition amply justified in trying to prevent the passage of the Naval Bill? When the Prime Minister of this country on the 21st of September last, before a large meeting in Montreal, announced that he would ask Parliament to give immediate and effective aid to the British Naval Service and that if Parliament refused to give that immediate and effective aid he would appeal to the country, did he not then, expect opposition to this Bill? Why was he anticipating opposition? Was it because of the nature of the proposal he intended to make to Parliament? Was it because he had changed his policy entirely from what it had been a few years before? Was it because of any arrangement he had made with some of the members he had taken into his Cabinet? It was an unusual declaration for the Prime Minister of Canada to make because under ordinary circumstances he would not be justified in expecting opposition to a Bill he intended to submit to Parliament which was then about to meet. It was both a threat and a promise, a threat to Parliament and a promise to the people of the Dominion. Was he threatening the Opposition? If so the threat did not amount to anything. Was he threatening the members who supported him? Did he fear that he would not have the full support of his own side of the House and was he telling them if he had not their support he would send them to the country and many of them might not return? For some reason or other he anticipated the opposition he received. Therefore it is not unreasonable that there should be opposition and the introduction of closure under those circumstances, in my opinion, is not because of the opposition that has been given to the naval Bill. The naval Bill has been made the excuse but the closure is needed for other purposes and in my judgment the Government intended to force closure on this House because they intend to introduce legislation later on that they could not expect to have pass this House except by means of the closure. We do not know what kind of legislation will be introduced further on but we have good reason to fear it. We know at least that a redistribution Bill will have to be introduced into this Parliament and that before very long. We have reason to fear the kind of redistribution Bill that will be brought down when closure has passed this House and we are prevented from properly discussing it. We know some of the things that have been done during the past year and a half. If one-half of the things that are said to have happened in the by-election in Macdonald, Manitoba, are true, we have reason to dread what will take place in the future. We know that men were imprisoned under documents signed in blank by a magistrate, taken from one jail to another, and kept in prison until the election was over, and then discharged because there was nothing against them. We have seen what happened in the by-election in the county of Antigonish, when supplementary estimates which had not even been considered by Council were published in the newspapers in order to influence the electors. We have seen what took place when charges were made against an hon. minister of the Crown in regard to what had taken place in the election in Hochelaga, charges made by a member of this House on his responsibility as a member, and we have seen that an investigation was refused. Even the Montreal Star has said that the Government should not allow that matter to rest. These are only some of the things which we know have happened. Then it is said that a large block of land within the city limits of Prince Albert was given to a friend of the Government as a homestead, and in this instance hundreds of thousands of dollars have been given away for nothing. These, I say, are some of the things that have been done when they could be discussed under the rules of the House which permitted discussion and investigation. We have reason therefore to dread what will take place when the gag has been applied, and when legitimate discussion has been made impossible. These are the reasons why I dread this closure resolution, and why I raise my voice against it and wish to record my protest. That resolution has been introduced, not because of the opposition that has been offered to the Naval Bill. That is but the excuse. The Prime Minister gave his promise that if Parliament refused to pass the Naval Bill he would appeal to the country. There is not a man on the Government side now who says that that promise will be carried out, and yet that promise was given by the leader of the Government in his official capacity as the Prime Minister of this country. It was repeated on the 5th of December in this House when he introduced the Bill. Does a promise of the Prime Minister, made under such circumstances, amount to nothing? But the opposition of the Naval Bill is not the reason why closure is introduced at this stage and introduced in the way it has been, and the Opposition will be justified in fighting it with every means in their power. I do not believe that even you, Mr. Speaker, can reasonably expect the members of this side of the House to submit to rules passed in this way, rules in the framing of which they have had no voice or part whatever. It is unreasonable and unprecedented. Have the Opposition in this House no rights? Have the people of this country, probably more than one-half of whom are represented by the Opposition, no rights, and are they to be treated in this way? It appears to me to be the most unreasonable thing that was ever attempted in the Parliament of Canada, and it will have results. The Opposition may be prevented from discussing the legislation which the Government intend to introduce in this House, but the discussion will go on in the country. It is stated in some newspapers that certain applications of an extraordinary character will be made to this Government within the next year or two. It is said for instance that the Canadian Northern railway Company intend to make an application to the Government for a loan of $30,000,000 or $40,000,000. No doubt other applications of a peculiar character will be made, and the inference is fair and reasonable that it is to meet conditions of this kind, and not for the purpose of passing the Naval Bill that the Government have introduced this resolution. It is a serious matter indeed, and the Liberal members in this House and in the Senate, will be justified in endeavouring to compel the Government and the Prime Minister to carry out the promise that he made to the people of Canada in Montreal when he addressed a great assemblage there, and also when he introduced the Naval Bill on the 5th day of December last. These are some of the reasons why I object to the resolution now before the House. I repeat that it is unreasonable and unprecedented, and under the circumstances we will oppose it by every means in our power. We will be justified in refusing to be bound by the rules that are passed in this way.

Mr. W. E. KNOWLES (Moosejaw): Mr. Speaker, there are many reasons why hon. gentlemen on this side of the House are against the passing of this proposed amendment of the rules. Some of the reasons have to do with the compilation of the rules from the general viewpoint as standard rules of the House which we must abide by year in and year out. And other reasons why hon. gentlemen on this side of the House are opposed to it are the peculiar circumstances under which the Government have introduced this motion at the present time. I think I may say that on both grounds I am against the proposed amendment. I am against it as being most untimely, and I am against it believing that it is not justified at this juncture. In fact, I think the arguments which have been made by the right hon. leader of the Opposition to the effect that the resolution should not be thus forced through, that the question be not put without an opportunity of considering amendments, and that it should be referred to a committee is unanswerable. So far as I have had an opportunity of hearing the discussion, I have not heard any hon. gentlemen opposite seriously combat the argument of the right hon. the leader of the Opposition on that point. The question remains whether it would be better, more profitable, and more satisfactory, if some such rules are to be eventually adopted, to have them first submitted to a commitee acting in conjunction with yourself, Mr. Speaker, or whether they should be rammed through in this most tyrannical manner. I think there is no doubt upon the point. Leaving aside party strategy, it would be better that the system which has been adopted in past years and which is ordinarily adopted in the British House of Commons should be adopted on this occasion, and that if the rules are to be amended, they should first be sent to a committee where they could be deliberately and freely discussed and pruned of things that are not desirable, and where the collective wisdom of the Speaker, the representatives of the Government side, and the representatives of the Opposition could be brought to bear upon them. I am not aware of any occasion upon which the rules of this House have ever been amended without the House receiving the benefit of the Speaker's advice upon the matter. I look upon that as a very grave feature. It goes without further saying that you, Mr. Speaker, are well versed in the rules of the House. We have no statement, no evidence from the Government, that you have been consulted about these rules in any way. You know more about the rules of the House probably than any other person in this House from your long experience, from the lore that must come to a man who has been a member of this Chamber for so long a time and from the study which you, as Speaker, must have given to the subject. It is wrong on the part of the Government to seek to ram these rules through the House without giving us the benefit of the wisdom, the knowledge and learning of the Speaker upon the question. I repeat that I know of no occasion upon which the rules of the House, in Canada at any rate, and as far as I know, in Great Britain, have ever been amended without the assistance, advice and counsel of the Speaker, I think I would be quite in order —although I am not going to do it—to ask whether these rules were submitted to you, Mr. Speaker. I think I would be quite within my rights in rising in my place and asking you whether you have given us the benefit of your advice and knowledge in the compilation of these rules. But on the face of it, and in the absence of a statement to the contrary, we are to believe that you have not, and there is no reason why we should depart from the practice which has always been followed, namely, that a committee should be appointed, with yourself, to supervise and counsel them in their work, to revise the rules of the House. The point that was made by my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition is absolutely unanswered and unanswerable.

Of course, we have the new dictum of the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Rogers) who comes down here, and having in mind his own administration of the Department of the Interior, having in mind his administration of the Department of Public Works, and having in mind, no doubt, many other things he intends to do in the department, if a merciful Heaven spares him, says: For goodness sake, let us get the closure on so that we can stop investigation by those fellows at the left of the Speaker. It is all very transparent. The hon. Minister of Public Works does not propose to meet us in a fair field. He says: We would be glad of an election because if there was an election not more than five Liberals would come back. Imagine the hon. Minister of Public Works, the real master of the Government from every point of strategy, saying that he was convinced that out of two hundred and twenty-one members they would have two hundred and sixteen and the Liberals only five. Is there a man here who believes that the hon. Minister of Public Works was serious in making that boast? Did hon. gentlemen take him seriously, and if he did not address himself to this and other questions seriously, there is a reason and it is that he is not able to justify his case in the serious discussion of it. He does not expect that he should be taken seriously in that matter.

Not so many years ago we had a much greater freedom and breadth of discussion in the House than we have now even. I well remember that when I came to this House, and I think for some years after, there was an opportunity for any member, every day that the House sat, to rise and move the adjournment of the House for the purpose of discussing any question which might concern his own constituency or what he might feel it his duty, perhaps his whim sometimes, to bring to the notice of the legislative body. That has been removed to a large extent, but at the same time the very fact that, for decade after decade, it was desirable to have that great freedom of discussion in the House is evidence that full discussion is a thing of tremendous importance to this assembly. I do not need to dwell upon that point. This Parliament is here for the purpose of deliberation, not for the purpose of having the hon. Minister of Public Works put the gag upon us, not for the purpose of having little conclaves of millionaires, corporations, mergers, combines and trusts saying: We will ram this through, the consumer be hanged, the homesteader be blowed. Whenever anything is desired by the Government is brought in here, the hon. Minister of Public Works may say: Put the gag on them and bring on the vote as soon as you like. On the face of the matter, it requires no discussion, it requires only the statement of the condition of affairs which the hon. Minister of Public Works has brought about in this House to explain and prove the folly and unfairness of the whole thing from the viewpoint of British parliamentary traditions.

There are a great many things done by the Government which hon. gentlemen on this side of the House would like to discuss, a great many things that have been done and, I have no doubt, a great many things yet to be done. I myself had two or three things that I thought should be brought to the attention of the House. I am not going to do more than illustrate them to-night. We are not going to have the opportunity for discussion which we have had on going into Committee of Supply, as by the proposed change in the rules, that is very largely taken away from us. I have a few cases that I should like to have brought up if we had been given the old privilege of discussing these matters on going into Supply. I believe that the discussion of these matters will be largely prevented by all this jockeying in connection with this clause about Thursdays and Fridays so that we will have very little opportunity of calling the attention of the House to questions of great public importance. I have in my riding very many homesteaders whose wrongs I want to ventilate here, whose grievances I wish to declare in this House and have discussed and remedied if possible. I would wish that there might always be an opportunity of making known to this Parliament certain instances which to my mind indicate a very grave condition of affairs in the administration of our lands in the West. I wish that the hon. Minister of Public Works were oftener in his seat because he is out almost every time that I happen to be speaking. I wish to call his attention to a few outstanding and glaring frauds in the administration of the land laws while he was Minister of the Interior. I am prepared to state on my word as a member of this House, believing that my allegation is correct, that there have been taken away from men in western Canada valuable homesteads because they voted Liberal in the province of Saskatchewan in the last election and that to Tory heelers have been given patents to homesteads when they never performed the duties called for by the law. I have in my pocket an official communication from the Department of the Interior showing where a man got his homestead after having performed the duties upon it for only six months. During the election he had gone about the country boasting that by a six-months' residence upon the land and by a lot of work for the Tories, he was going to get his patent for his homestead and he got it. The Minister of the Department of the Interior at that time was the hon. Minister of Public Works. In another instance a young man held a homestead pre-emption. At one time the land was not considered valuable, but a railway came within a mile of the place, and the land became very valuable. A certain young man worked very hard in the last election for the Conservative party and during the winter the young man who had performed his duties and who was in residence upon the land received a cold-blooded notice from the department to get off because the homestead had been given to this Tory heeler. In instances like that where wrongs are committed and where our constituents are being cheated we would not be worthy the name of their representatives if we did not insist on freedom to ventilate their grievances. And that right is to be taken from us by the Minister of Public Works who has come to this Parliament, and within a year and a half seeks to revolutionize it. He knows so much about elections that he is supposed to be an authority on parliamentary procedure. Did it ever occur to you, Mr. Speaker, you who went into the fray of election after election like the rest of us, you, who like us ran with the crowd and fought in the army, that the Minister of Public Works would not stand for a seat behind the Prime Minister until he was first assurred Mr. Borden was in power and that he was sure of his portfolio. Did it ever occur to you that the Minister of Public Works would not go out in the cold tempest of a prairie campaign until his party was fixed in power and he had a portfolio in his pants' pocket and $7,000 or $8,000 a year. Is it any wonder that we do not take the Minister of Public Works very seriously? I see the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Bradbury) smile. Does not the hon. member for Selkirk feel, after having fought campaign after campaign, that it was a little selfish; I will not say a little cowardly, but certainly a little timid and a little effeminate in the Minister of Public Works not to risk himself until his party was in power. He was not such a brave gagger then; he did not face an election; he said: I will wait until I see how this reciprocity campaign turns out and if the Tories win I will take a seat in the federal House, and so the hon. member for Selkirk sits, not in the Cabinet, but four or five seats behind the hon. member for Winnipeg to-day. However we are told that there is to be a new portfolio, a portfolio of health, and that it is possible the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Roche) who we are all very sorry is sick, for although he is a dyed-in-the-wool Tory, I think he is a very nice and very honourable man; we are told the Minister of the Interior is to get the new portfolio, and then there will be hope in the eastern sky for my hon. friend from Selkirk—see how he smiles now. And when the hon. member (Mr. Bradbury) gets to be Minister of the Interior I hope he will see to it that the Grits who lost their homesteads because they voted Liberal last fall will get them back, and that the Tory heelers who were given homesteads on six months' residence against the laws of Canada will be compelled to disgorge.

Mr. BELAND: What about the hon. member for Portage la Prairie (Mr. Meighen)?

Mr. KNOWLES: Our friend from Portage la Prairie is quite the junior of the hon. member for Selkirk. I am sure my hon. friend from Selkirk will be the very first to agree with me that while the member for Portage la Prairie is a man of much importance in this House the hon. member for Selkirk is of a great deal more importance.

Let me say, Mr. Speaker, that the purpose which rule 17 was put to on this occasion was not the purpose which was in mind when it was created. It is not the purpose of that rule to be used in the drastic fashion in which it was used. There are many rules of this House more or less archaic which if you tried to apply them you would cause trouble. I understand, for example, Mr. Speaker, that if any member rises in his place in this House and surprises you by telling you there is somebody in the gallery, you are bound to clear the gallery and put them all out. That is ridiculous of course, but it is a rule of the House. Suppose that when there is a beautiful gathering of the gentler sex filling these galleries, when the word goes round that the Prime Minister is going to read a letter from dear Mr. Churchill; suppose when the gallery is crowded with those robed in backless and frontless garb, and the men are there with their starched shirts, some hon. member from away back in Saskatchewan or elsewhere were to get up and much to your surprise say that there were one or two persons in the gallery, you, Mr. Speaker, would have to order them all out. That, as I understood it, is the rule, but of course it is absurd. In the same way, rule 17 is a rule which has never been used in this House, and in any event it is not there for the purpose to which it was applied on this occasion. There are many rules under our old British system which are there for the protection of the commoners. I am informed, that rule 17 in its spirit dates back to the days when the Speaker might in some way be under the influence of the King and show favouritism and the House of Commons naturally anxious to keep within its own hands the right to appeal from the decision of the Speaker, whether it be on points of order or any other, and anxious to assert its own supremacy and omnipotence within its own chamber, established this rule. That is the purpose of rule 17 if it has any purpose at all, and it was manifestly never placed in the rules for the purpose of being used as it was the other day. when it was used to prevent Sir Wilfrid Laurier from speaking. This closure rule we are now considering is too drastic. I think the Prime Minister was joking when he told us in his speech that it was not as drastic as the English rule. The fact is it is much more drastic. Let us remember the circumstances under which the closure rule is administered in the British House of Commons. The Speaker there who is removed from party politics entirely, who does not have to go before the people and fight an election campaign on party lines, who occupies a judicial position, who not only is as Speaker specially trained and environed for his duties as our speakers are not, is placed there above all as the protector of the Opposition and of minorities. Even in the case of our Speakers with their different training and their different environment, it would be well for the minority to have their protection. You know, Mr. Speaker, that I am not in the slightest way making any comparisons between the Speaker here and the Speaker in Great Britain other than as to the conditions which prevail in both places, but I say that if we have the protection of the Speaker here, chosen as he is by the party in power, coming as he does into Parliament from the heat of political fray and getting ready for another election whenever the time comes; I say if we had even the protection of such a Speaker we would feel a great deal safer, because when the Speaker is in the Chair and occupies the position he feels the duty is upon him to protect all the commoners whether to his right or to his left. I would support very heartily an amendment which would give us the protection that first the Speaker should believe that it is reasonable and necessary that a motion for closure should be made.

Mr. WHITE (Renfrew): Why did you not accept the proposition of the Prime Minister and take the English rule?

Mr. KNOWLES: Because the English rule was never offered to us.

Mr. WHITE: The Prime Minister offered it.

Mr. KNOWLES: The hon. member for North Renfrew (Mr. White) although we went to school together is younger than I, but he knows that when the Prime Minister in the middle of a discussion threw out the statement: Would you rather have the English rules; it is not fair to say that the proposition ever was made to us that we had the choice to select the English rule instead of the rule now proposed. If it was right for the Prime Minister to offer the English rule the other day, then it is right for him to offer it to us yet.

Mr. WHITE (Renfrew): You would not accept it when it was offered.

Mr. KNOWLES: It never was offered. If the hon. gentleman wishes to stand before this House as one who says that that offer was made in a reasonable way as between party and party in the House, I am ready to let him have that opinion and leave the House to judge which is right.

Mr. WHITE: I certainly say it was offered.

Mr. KNOWLES: I say it was not, and the House will have to judge which of us takes the correct view. Well, to take seriously for a moment the proposition which the hon. member for North Renfrew has put forward, let us consider it. How was this offer made? In the middle of a speech by the Prime Minister, the hon. member for St. John interjected a statement that these proposed rules were very drastic. The Prime Minister said: 'Not so drastic as the rules in Great Britain.' To which the hon. member for St. John replied: 'They are more drastic.' And the Prime Minister replied: 'Would you like to have those rather than these proposed rules?' The matter was merely spoken in passing. And here hon. members have the audacity, the matchless, unspeakable audacity, to say that this offer was made and that we refused it. We do not want either set of rules, for that matter; we do not accept the English rules. When the hon. member diverted my attention—courteously and nicely—I was saying that there was a feature of these English rules that we wished was incorporated in these. The whole question is one that the people will have to settle. But the Government is more and more influenced by its fears. There is a great deal of talk from the Prime Minister and from our hon. friends opposite about the sacredness of the majority and the holy of holies in which they dwell. But it is not pride in British institutions or regard for British traditions that influence hon. gentlemen opposite; it is fear—f-e-a-r—that has taken hold of them. They ask why they do not go to the country; I will tell them,—they are afraid. They have fifteen or twenty Nationalists, one of them your deputy, Mr. Speaker. They have not this element cemented with the section of the party represented by the Minister of Militia and Defence,——

Mr. HUGHES (Minister of Militia and Defence): And others.

Mr. GRAHAM: Notwithstanding the change in the duty on cement.

Mr. KNOWLES: They will need to make cement more than free, they will need to make greater concessions than they have ever made to complete that union. But no matter what they do they will never be able to bring together these two sections that are diametrically opposed, that are as far apart in their policies for the government of this country as the poles asunder. And it is because of the unholy alliance existing for the time being that they are afraid to go to the country at this moment. Is there a man from Ontario who will not say that they are afraid to go to the country as long as the Postmaster General (Mr. Pelletier) is in the Cabinet? They do not want to go into the Orange settlements and explain how that hon. gentleman came to be a member of the Government. Of course, in some cases, there will be no difficulty. I am told, for instance, that the hon. member for East Hastings (Mr. Northrup) will not have much difficulty in explaining to the Orangemen who are so numerous there that what he did was done against a Catholic and Frenchman. But they cannot carry Quebec on that cry. And while, in the last election, they ran the double-faced game, they were compelled to depend on it to such an extent that the people have found them out. There has been a reaction in Ontario because of their falsity of position, and the same is true of Quebec also. Hon. gentlemen opposite realise that in these two provinces alone there will be such a change as will sweep them out of power.

On motion of Mr. McCraney, the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Mr. White (Minister of Finance) the House adjourned at 11.07 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

WEDNESDAY, April 16, 1913.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at three o'clock.

PRINCE ALBERT HOMESTEAD ENTRY —PROPOSED CENSURE.

Mr. OLIVER: Mr. Speaker, I desire to move, seconded by Mr. Murphy:

That the homestead entry for part of the southwest quarter of 8-49-26-2 was granted to Arthur Donaldson on April 16, 1912, in violating of the rules and practice of the Department of the Interior.

That the Hon. Robert Rogers was Minister of the Interior at the time the said entry was granted, and that therefore the Hon. Rogers is deserving of the censure of this House.

Mr. SPEAKER: I would like to say in reference to this motion that it would be out of order to move it now, as this is not a compliance with the rule requiring notice of such a motion. Rule 40 says:

Two days' notice shall be given of a motion for leave to present a Bill, resolution or address.

This is a resolution, and, of course, could not be introduced on this short notice.

Mr. OLIVER: Would it be out of order to ask exactly under what circumstances such a resolution might be introduced?

Mr. SPEAKER: It might be introduced when the House was moved into Committee of Supply.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Hear, hear.

Mr. SPEAKER: The new rules would prohibit a motion of this kind being introduced on Thursday or Friday, except by the consent of the House; but there would still be opportunities left to hon. members because there are about fourteen departments, and the head of each must move the House into Committee of Supply on at least one occasion, when a motion of this kind could be introduced.

Mr. PUGSLEY: By the consent of the majority of the House.

Mr. SPEAKER: It is a right, and not with the consent at all.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Would you object, Mr. Speaker, to allowing the matter to be discussed for a little, because it is a question of grave importance.

Mr. SPEAKER: There is no motion before the House.

Mr. PUGSLEY: There is this motion before the House.

Mr. SPEAKER: But I have ruled the motion out of order.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Would you not hear discussion before ruling it out of order?

Mr. SPEAKER: It is not a point of order; it is a resolution presented to me, and the Speaker is bound to rule according to his judgment. This motion which has been submitted to the House is not debatable in the same way as a point of order would be.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Would you not think that, where a member is desirous of presenting his views to Your Honour, it would be only reasonable to hear him?—because this is a matter of enormous importance in view of the resolution which is under the consideration of the House. If Your Honour's ruling is sustained, it is very clear that members will be absolutely debarred from presenting these motions for the consideration of the House.

Mr. SPEAKER: I am dealing with a rule of the House that I think I understand distinctly, and it does not require any information to be brought to my attention to change my mind. I think it important to abide by the rule which is laid down so plainly. This is a motion submitted to me to be presented to the House, and upon that I am bound to rule. I have ruled that it is out of order, and I have given the reason why; and therefore it is not debatable.

Mr. BORDEN: Immediately after this debate is closed, we will move the House into Commitee of Supply to give the hon. member (Mr. Oliver) an opportunity of making his motion.

Mr. OLIVER: With regard to the new rules, I understand Mr. Speaker to say that there will be as many opportunities of moving a motion like this as there are departments. Is that to be understood as meaning a number equal to the number of ministers or a number equal to the number of departments?

Mr. BORDEN: There will be an opportunity on three days of the week to move any vote of censure against the Government if we go into Supply on those days. I assure my hon. friend that if it is suggested that any hon. member on the other side of the House is desirous to make a motion censuring the Government or any member of the Government, we will take particular care to give him the earliest possible opportunity of doing it.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Can such a motion be made to-morrow?

Mr. BORDEN: I said, after this debate is concluded.

Mr. SPEAKER: So that my observations may not be misunderstood, I wish to say that I was not referring to the new rules for the purpose of giving any ruling upon them, because of course they are not now rules of the House. I was answering the question of the hon. member as to what opportunities would be given in future to move such a motion, and the new rules being referred to in that connection, I made the observation I did.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I understood you to say, Mr. Speaker, that we could move on Thursdays and Fridays on going into Supply, but we cannot under the new rule.

Mr. SPEAKER: I did not say that; I said that such a motion could be made except on Thursdays and Fridays, but it could be made on Thursdays and Fridays by the unanimous consent of the House. I made that observation in reply to the hon. member for St. John, when he referred to the consent of the House.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The consent of the House is very different from the unanimous consent of the House; the consent means the consent of the majority.

Mr. SPEAKER: The consent of the House, as decided by many former Speakers, and as I have decided since I have been Speaker, means the unanimous consent of the House.

Mr. OLIVER: I do not wish to press unduly, but I have asked the right hon. the leader of the Government a specific question in regard to the interpretation of the proposed rules; would he be good enough to answer?

Mr. BORDEN: I am afraid I did not quite catch the question.

Mr. OLIVER: I understand that there are to be as many opportunities for moving want of confidence motions as a matter of right, as there are departments of Government. When the word 'department' is used, does it mean the portions of the governmental machinery which are under the control of each minister; or, what would happen in the case of one minister presiding over two departments? Do the two departments count or only the minister?

Mr. BORDEN: My understanding would be that each department would count. I desire again to say that whenever any of my hon. friends on the other side of the House desire to move any vote of censure and we are acquainted with that fact in the ordinary manner by notice the day before, we will take means to have the House moved into Committee of Supply so as to give him an opportunity to do it. In the present instance I would like to finish the debate we are on.

QUESTIONS.

(Questions to be answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

STE. ANNE DE LA POCATIERE EXPERIMENTAL FARM.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Kamouraska):

1. Who recommeneded the appointment of Joseph Bégin as superintendent of the experimental farm at Ste. Anne de la Pocatière?
2. What were the claims or qualifications of the said Joseph Bégin to occupy this position?
3. Is he a graduate of an agricultural college? If so, of what college?
4. What was the occupation or employment of the said Joseph Bégin prior to his appointment?

Mr. BURRELL:

1 The Minister of Agriculture.
2 Knowledge of the theory and practice of agriculture.
3. No
4. Agriculturist.

PRINTING AND STATIONERY DEPARTMENT.

Mr. GARLAND:

1. Is it the intention of the Government to reorganize the Printing and Stationery Department along the lines recommended in the special report of the Public Service Commission?
2. If so, will all or any part of such reorganization be carried out during the present session of Parliament?

Mr. CODERRE:

1. The report of the Public Service Commission has not yet been considered.
2. Answered by No. 1.

PUBLIC SERVICE COMMISSION.

Mr. GARLAND:

1. Is the evidence taken by the Public Service Commission in connection with the Printing and Stationery Department being printed? If not, why not?

2. Is the evidence taken by the same commission in connection with the lake Temiscamingue dam, Sorel shipyard and Montreal Harbour Commissioners being printed?

Mr. CODERRE:

1. No copy of the evidence received save and except the evidence given in the Cook case, which will appear in Volume III.

2. Volumes II and III in press, and nearly completed, will contain the evidence in this connection.

WOMEN PROOFREADERS.

Mr. MURPHY:

1. When was the policy of employing women as proofreaders introduced at the Printing Bureau?

2. On whose recommendation was such a change made?

3. What are the names, home addresses and salaries, respectively, of the women so employed, and by whom was their employment recommended?

Mr. CODERRE:

1. There is no policy in respect to the employment of women as proofreaders at the Printing Bureau.

2. Answered by No. 1.

3. (a) Madame D. Z. Gaultier, 162 Chapel street, Ottawa; present salary, $14 per week. Appointed in May, 1891. No record to show by whom she was recommended.

(b) Madame Blanche Prieur, 2 Grosvenor Apartments, Sherbrooke street west, Montreal; salary, $15 per week. Appointed February 6, 1913, on the recommendation of the Secretary of State.

ST. MARY'S RIVER FISHERY GUARDIAN.

Mr. SINCLAIR:

On whose recommendation was Henry Casey, of Sinora, Nova Scotia, appointed fishery guardian of St. Mary's river, in place of George W. Joletta, the former guardian?

Mr. HAZEN: On the expiration of the period for which Mr. Joletta was employed, Mr. Henry Casey was, on the recommendation of Mr. G. A. R. Rowlings, appointed guardian.

NATIONAL TRANSCONTINENTAL RAILWAY—QUEBEC TERMINALS.

Mr. LEMIEUX:

1. Has the Minister of Railways and Canals received any offer for the site of the National Transcontinental terminals at Quebec? If so, from whom?

2. What is the price per foot in each case?

Mr. COCHRANE:

1. No.

2. Answered by No. 1.

RURAL MAIL BOXES.

Mr. LEMIEUX:

What is the total amount received up to date by the Post Office Department from the sale of rural mail delivery boxes to patrons?

Mr. PELLETIER: The total number of boxes bought was 110,000 at $3 a box, making the total purchase price $330,000. The payments for boxes sold to patrons up to date only amount to $139,033.25.

RURAL MAIL OFFICERS.

Mr. LEMIEUX:

1. How many officers have been appointed in connection with the rural mail delivery service since the 1st May, 1912?

2. In what constituencies were said officers appointed?

3. What is the salary paid in each case?

Mr. PELLETIER: None. A certain number of officers for years in the service connected with the city post offices and the railway mail service, and because of their special powers of organization, were transferred to the inspector's office for the purpose of organizing rural delivery.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT LEGAL ADVISER.

Mr. CARVELL:

1. Has a legal adviser to the Post Office Department been appointed in the city of Quebec?

2. If so, what is his name and salary?

3. In what cases has he represented the Post Office Department since his appointment?

Mr. PELLETIER: No.

QUEBEC PILOTAGE COMMISSION.

Mr. LEMIEUX:

Does the Minister of Marine and Fisheries intend to take action during this session on the recent report of the Quebec Pilotage Commission? If so what action?

Mr. HAZEN: The report submitted by the commission appointed to inquire into pilotage matters on the river St. Lawrence, is at present engaging the attention of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries. No decision respecting the same has been reached.

FENIAN RAID BOUNTY.

Mr. CHISHOLM (Antigonish):

1. Has anybody been appointed for the county of Antigonish or any district thereof, to receive claims under the Fenian Raid Volunteer Bounty Act?

2. If so, who, when was he appointed, and on whose recommendation?

Mr. HUGHES:

1. Not by the Department of Militia and Defence.

2. Answered by No. 1.

TORBAY LIGHTKEEPER.

Mr. SINCLAIR:

Mr. HAZEN: Mr. Duchemin was paid $69.55 for expenses including witness fees, &c., for investigations in the cases of James M. Webber, H. L. Torrey and J. W. Davis.

NEW HARBOUR POSTMASTER.

Mr. SINCLAIR:

How much was paid to Commissioner Duchemin in connection with the investigation of Archibald Barss, postmaster at New Harbour, N.S.?

Mr. PELLETIER: $23.05.

THE ROYAL MINT.

On motion of Hon. T. W. White (Minister of Finance) it was ordered that the House to-morrow go into Committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

Resolved, that it is expedient to provide for an increase, from a sum not exceeding $75,000 to a sum not exceeding $110,000, of the annual amount payable out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund for the maintenance of the Ottawa branch of the Royal Mint and the refinery forming part thereof.

UNOPPOSED AND UNDISCUSSED MOTION.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax):

For a copy of all papers, documents, evidence, reports, &c., relating to the dismissal of B. C. Kanock, late shipping master of Lunenburg, N.S.

AYLMER, QUE., POSTMASTER.

On the Orders of the Day being called:

Mr. E. B. DEVLIN (Wright): I wish to call the attention of the Postmaster General to an item which appeared in the Ottawa Evening Journal, on Friday, April 11, and to ask him a question in connection therewith. The article is headed:

Postmaster of Aylmer Resigned—Mr. Leon Chartier retires from position—Inspectors have been auditing books—Balance of $387 in revenue was owing to the Department—Resignation will likely be accepted in the near future.

The article itself relates to what is mentioned in the heading. I was somewhat dilatory in calling the attention of the Government to this matter, as I expected that the article would be contradicted. Since that date, no contradiction has appeared in the public press. Has the Postmaster General received the resignation of the postmaster at Aylmer? If so, when will it be acted upon?

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria)

Mr. PELLETIER: My hon. friend surely does not expect us to notice everything that appears in the press. If we were to do so, we would be doing nothing else. In regard to his question, I should be glad if he would give proper notice of it, so that I would be able to look into the matter.

Mr. DEVLIN: Do I understand the Postmaster General to tell me that he has no knowledge of the matter contained in the article?

Mr. PELLETIER: I did not say that at all. If the hon. member will put his question with the ordinary notice, I shall answer it.

RURAL MAIL DELIVERY SERVICE.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I should like to ask the Postmaster General a question. I have just put the following question:

How many officers have been appointed in connection with the rural mail delivery service since the 1st May, 1912?

My hon. friend answers, 'None.' He supplements that answer with the following remark:

A certain number of officers for years in the service connected with the city post offices and the railway mail service, and because of their special powers of organization, were transferred to the inspector's office for the purpose of organizing rural delivery.

That is exactly the answer to my question, except that the details are not given. Will my hon. friend kindly revise his answer, and give me the names of those who have been transferred to the office of the inspector? That is the object of my question.

Mr. PELLETIER: The deputy minister prepared that answer for me. He says that is the only way in which he can answer the question, which is: How many officers have been appointed? If my hon. friend wants to know the names of the gentlemen who have been transferred, he does not say so. As I understand it, no new appointments were made but old trained hands were taken from the other offices and put into the inspector's office under the superintendent of the rural mail branch.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I wish to get the names of those who are specially attached to the rural mail service.

Mr. PELLETIER: There are none. They are all in the inspector's office. The question does not ask that, in the first place, and, in the second place, all the organization of rural mail is done through the inspector's office. For that special part of the business, Mr. Bolduc, superintendent of the rural mail branch, gives instructions to the post office inspector, and it is the employees of the post office inspector who do the work.

NATURALIZATION—RUSSIAN CANADIANS SENT TO SIBERIA.

Hon. C. J. DOHERTY (Minister of Justice): Before the Orders of the Day are called, I would like to ask the indulgence of the House to make a statement with regard to a matter brought up on Monday last by the right hon. the leader of the Opposition. My attention has been called to it by the right hon. the Prime Minister. On Monday the right hon. the leader of the Opposition read the following despatch from a daily newspaper:

Calgary, Alta., April 5.—Gersha Tarsus, a Russian, is raising a fund in the prairie provinces to bring about the pardon of three brothers, Alberta homesteaders, who have been exiled for life to Siberia for alleged evasion of war service during the Russo-Japanese struggle. The brothers took out homesteads here and prospered, and last year visited relatives in their native town in Russia. On their arrival they were arrested by the Russian authorities, tried by court martial for evasion of military duty, and, although citizens of Canada, were sent to Siberia for life. A peculiar phase of the case is that if the men had taken out naturalization papers in Great Britain, England could have prevented the exile, but as they are Canadian citizens and not British subjects, the British authorities declined to interfere.

The right hon. gentleman went on to point out that this brought up in concrete form a matter which had been debated recently in connection with the effect of naturalization in Canada. He stated that it was pointed out at that time that, under the law, although foreigners may be naturalized and become British subjects in Canada, one so naturalized ceases to be a British subject the moment he leaves Canada. He also said:

As will be noticed, the despatch goes on to state that the British authorities decline to interfere on behalf of these men.

In the first place, I desire to say that instructions have been given to have the facts related in this item inquired into and their correctness or incorrectness ascertained. With regard to that, I am not in a position at the moment to say anything. Whatever may be the state of the facts, if these men, who have been naturalized under our laws, as is stated in the article, have on their return to Russia been convicted and sentenced, as is also stated, the rightfulness of that action upon the part of the Russian Government depends in no way upon any naturalization law that Canada could pass or upon any naturalization law that Great Britain has passed or might pass. If Russia has proceeded in the manner indicated, and if she has a right to do so, it is because her own laws, which are applicable to persons who are her own subjects, and which determine upon what condition persons who are her own subjects cease to be subjects, make the persons in question liable. Under the general rule of international law, while it is perfectly true that every nation may make laws to determine whom it will naturalize and upon what conditions it will make a person its subject, it is equally true that every nation has a right to make laws with regard to the expatriation of its own subjects and to determine upon what conditions and to what extent it will recognize any act on the part of the subject as giving him a right to be treated as having been so expatriated and by virtue of that expatriation to be relieved from the effect of the laws by which he was bound as a subject of the country from which he desires to be expatriated. I think that proposition cannot be controverted. I find it stated in perhaps the clearest form and in what, so far as my limited time has enabled me to look into the matter, is the most recent book on the subject, that is, Halleck's International Law, published in 1908, in the following language:

It must be remembered, that although international law recognizes the right of one state to naturalize or adopt the subjects of another, it is not in virtue of this public law that such citizen is naturalized or adopted, but by virtue of the positive or municipal laws of the country which naturalizes or adopts them. The newly made citizen is entirely the creature of municipal law, and is invested only with such rights, privileges, and immunities as that law is capable of conferring upon him. So, on the other hand, while international law recognizes the right of one state to retain the allegiance of its subjects, or to expatriate them, the tie which binds them is not formed, or its nature determined, by public law, but by the municipal code of such state. As the municipal law makes the citizen by naturalization, so, also, it retains or unmakes him, by retaining or dissolving his allegiance. Admitting, then, that the right of expatriation, in its broadest and most comprehensive sense, is recognized as a maxim of international law, this principle must be subordinate to the universally conceded doctrine of the same law, that every independent state possesses exclusive sovereignty within its own territory, that its laws bind all persons within its own jurisdiction, but cannot operate within the territory of another power. It results from this view of the question, that so long as the naturalized citizen remains within the territory and jurisdiction of his adopted country, or within the jurisdiction of any other state than that which claims his primitive allegiance, he retains the national character conferred upon him by naturalization. But if, having renounced his primitive allegiance without the consent of his government, and contrary to its laws, he returns to his native state, and places himself within its jurisdiction, he is subject to the obligations, charges, and penalties which the laws of that state have imposed upon him.

In this particular instance, these persons, who, it is claimed, have become naturalized Canadian citizens, have returned to Russia, the original state which claimed their allegiance; and, under the general rule of international law, they fall under the provisions of the municipal law of Russia with regard to the effect of any action taken by her subjects with the object of changing their nationality. Under the provisions of the British Naturalization Act, moreover, it is expressly recognized that the status of persons naturalized under that Act, while they are within the country of their original nationality, is governed by the law of that country, unless there be some treaty making other provision between the country in which they have been naturalized and the country of their original allegiance. The third paragraph of section 7 of the British Naturalization Act provides:

An alien to whom certificate of naturalization is granted shall in the United Kingdom be entitled to all political and other rights, powers, and privileges, and be subject to all obligations, to which a natural-born British subject is entitled or subject in the United Kingdom, with this qualification, that he shall not, when within the limits of the foreign state of which he was a subject previously to obtaining his certificate of naturalization, be deemed to be a British subject unless he has ceased to be a subject of that state in pursuance of the laws thereof, or in pursuance of a treaty to that effect.

I think the reading of this section makes it perfectly clear that, as well under this provision as under the general rule of international law of which I have spoken, in this particular instance, even if these persons had been naturalized under the law of the United Kingdom, they would cease to be deemed to be British subjects while within the limits of Russia, the foreign state of which they were subjects previous to their obtaining certificates of naturalization. I think, therefore, it is clear that the question involved is in reality what is the law of Russia applicable to persons who find themselves in the circumstances which are said to have existed in the present instance. It would be quite immaterial what our Naturalization Act stated, or even what we under our own constitution have power to state: those persons when they returned to Russia, would remain subject to be governed, as regards their status and the laws applicable to them, by the laws of Russia; in fact, that would be the case by virtue of the express words of the statute of the United Kingdom. So far as I have been able to ascertain what the condition in Russia is, it would appear that Russia adheres most unqualifiedly to the maxim, 'Once a citizen, always a citizen.' It does provide for the case in which a certain action on the part of a citizen or subject will deprive him of his quality as a citizen or subject, as far as the advantages resulting to him therefrom are concerned; but it claims that he cannot relieve himself of his obligations by merely leaving his country and becoming naturalized elsewhere, unless, at all events, he obtains the necessary authority and complies with any requirement of the law of Russia in this respect. I find in the same work, pages 436 and 437, the following:

In Russia the quality of a subject is lost by residence abroad, by voluntary expatriation, and by disappearance for the term of ten years from the place of his domicile. Nothwithstanding the Russian laws of March 6, 1864, a subject is not released from his allegiance by the acquisition of a foreign nationality.

In Webster, on the Law of Citizenship, published in 1891, I find, on page 959, this statement, which, I think, is borne out by all or many authors who have written on the subject:

The position taken by the Russian Government is in direct antagonism to the international or common law practice.

I should not care to be as positive as Mr. Webster seems to be as to the universality of the common law practice to which he refers; but, with regard to the Russian aspect of his statement, it is perfectly clear:

The municipal rules which governs such cases is found in the Penal Code, article 325, which is as follows: Whoever, leaving his country, enters without the authorization of the Government into a foreign service or becomes a citizen of a foreign power, incurs on account of this violation of his oath of allegiance and of his duties as a subject, the privation of all his civil rights and perpetual exile beyond the limits of the Empire, or in case of voluntary return to Russia, deportation to Siberia, to be colonized there.

So that, subject to the result of further investigation as to the actual condition of the law in Russia, it would appear that what is stated as having happened to these particular individuals is in accordance with the Russian law. I think it is for the Russian law to determine, as within the limits of Russia, what is the effect of any naturalization acquired under the laws of any other country by any Russian subject. I desire to make it clear, and I trust that what I have said does make it clear, that the fact that these persons now find themselves in their present unfortunate position is not attributable to any lack of effectiveness on the part of the Canadian naturalization law, but that they would find themselves in the same position on returning to Russia had they been naturalized in any country save one of the countries with which Russia has a treaty recognizing the effect of such naturalization. There is no such treaty between Great Britain and Russia; therefore persons naturalized under the laws of the United Kingdom would find themselves in precisely the same position on returning to Russia—assuming that they had previously been Russian subjects—as that in which these persons are now said to find themselves. Although it would seem highly improbable that there is any effective step that the Government can take in connection with the matter, we will make investigation of the facts and of the law, and if it is found that any useful steps can be taken, we shall be most anxious to take them, and most happy if we can succeed.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: By your leave, Mr. Speaker, I would like to say a word with reference to the observations of the Minister of Justice. I have no doubt he has correctly stated the law of the matter, which is this: that these men, who were homesteaders in Canada and had become British subjects according to the Canadian Naturalization Act, are now in Russia, and are accused of having violated the laws which pertain to their Russian citizenship. One thing is clear, that Canadian naturalization cannot be set up as a bar to this prosecution; I think the Minister of Justice is quite right as to that; and, if they had received full British naturalization, even that could not be set up as a bar to the action. But the point to which I would call the attention of my hon. friend is this—and to some extent he has anticipated it, and it shows conclusively the difference between the British naturalization and the Canadian—that the despatch says that because of the fact that these men have been naturalized British subjects in Canada, their naturalization is not recognized by the British Government under the circumstances, and so that Government will not interfere on their behalf. But my hon. friend has intimated that he will look into the case, and if he finds that these men have been naturalized in Canada, he will take all the steps possible to come to their rescue; and there is nothing more that we can ask of the Government.

Mr. DOHERTY: I should be very much surprised to find that the British Government had declined to interfere on behalf of these men on the ground that they were not naturalized in Great Britain. For while, as a matter of right the Canadian naturalization does not entitle the naturalized subject to claim the protection of Great Britain, I think I am quite within the truth in saying that in all cases of this kind the British Government has, as a matter of courtesy though not as a matter of right, extended to our subjects such protection as was in its power. It is much more probable that if they declined to interfere, it was by reason of the fact that they found themselves in a position in which they could not assume any right that would be recognized in the matter.

Mr. BORDEN: I should regard it as remarkable if the British Government would take such a position with respect to the reasons for non-interference as that mentioned in the despatch referred to. The British Naturalization Act expressly reserves the rights of foreign governments over their subjects within their jurisdiction after naturalization in Great Britain. The same effect would be given to our Naturalization Act by the principles of international law. But it would appear to be the right and duty of the British Government to take action in the case of a person naturalized in Canada to the same extent as in the case of one naturalized in Great Britain.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: But this case brings out the fact that there is a discrepancy between our naturalization and British naturalization which ought to be done away with as soon as possible.

LAW LORDS IN GREAT BRITAIN.

Hon. RODOLPHE LEMIEUX: I desire to draw the attention of the Minister of Justice to the despatch that appeared in the Ottawa Citizen this morning with regard to the appointment of law lords in Great Britain. Has the Canadian Government been consulted, and what is the purport of the arrangement proposed? It does not seem very clear from the despatch.

Mr. DOHERTY: I am not at the moment aware that the Government has any official information on the subject, and I share the hon. gentleman's difficulty in reaching a clear conclusion from the despatch as to the effect of the legislation mentioned. I will inquire, but I am under the impression that we have no communication on the subject.

Mr. MURPHY: Was the hon. minister consulted on the subject when he was in England last summer?

Mr. DOHERTY: There was some general conversation—I could not connect it really with what was stated in the despatch—as to the desirability of taking steps which might be considered to improve the constitution of the Judicial Committee in relation to appeals from Canada.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Would the hon. gentleman inquire if there is any official correspondence on the subject and make the matter clear to the House?—because it seems a very serious piece of legislation.

Mr. DOHERTY: Yes.

THE RULES OF THE HOUSE—LIMITATION OF DEBATE.

Consideration of the proposed resolution of Mr. Borden, to amend rule 17 of the House of Commons, and the proposed motion of Mr. Hazen, that this question be now put, resumed from April 15.

Mr. GEORGE E. McCRANEY (Saskatoon): I desire for a few moments to address myself to that portion of the resolution introduced by the Prime Minister which deals with motions to go into Supply. My understanding of the proposed rule is that there shall be one day given which shall not be a Thursday or Friday for the estimates for each of the departments of government, but that when motions to go into supply are made on Thursday or Friday there shall not be any motion to amend them. I understand that the Prime Minister has to-day assured the House that whenever the Opposition wishes to move a vote of censure on the Government, opportunity will be given by the Government to the Opposition so to do. I hope the Prime Minister will not think I speak offensively when I say that in view of the use of the rules of the House that has been made and the manner in which these closure resolutions have been introduced, I would very much prefer that the rights of members of Parliament shall be the result of declarations by this House, and not the result of sufferance on the part of the Government of the day. There is no doubt that an attempt is now being made to make the privileges of this House a matter of favour. We as members of Parliament have the right to have our rights declared, and our rights should be a matter of right and not a matter of sufferance. At the present time the rule is that whenever any member of Parliament desires to discuss anything which he deems to be a public or private grievance, he may do so when the House is moved into Committee of Supply, by moving an amendment to the motion to go into Supply, or without moving an amendment.

I find, in looking through the Journals of the House for the last twelve or thirteen years, that in those years which immediately preceded a general election amendments to the motion to go into Supply have been more numerous than in other years. The reason is obvious: the parties desire to present their views to the electors, and it is only natural that they should take occasion immediately before a general election, when public attention is concentrated upon Parliament, to bring these matters to the attention of the House. In 1900, I find that there were thirteen amendments to the motion to go into Supply; in 1904, nine amendments; in 1908, fourteen amendments; and in 1911, fourteen amendments. In giving you these figures, Mr. Speaker, I have taken notice only of those discussions on Supply which have resulted in an amendment and in a division of the House. There are many occasions when a motion is moved in amendment, and when after the discussion is considered sufficient for the purpose, it is withdrawn. There are perhaps more numerous instances in which there is no contentious matter before the House, but in which it is thought desirable by some member to take up something that is either a public or a private grievance with a view to having it ventilated, and when his purpose is achieved, the discussion ceases, and the House goes into Committee of Supply. When I have given you these figures, Mr. Speaker, it would be wrong to assume that the occasions on which there has been a division are by any means the only occasions on which this right of a member of Parliament is made use of.

In going through the Journals of the House I find that nearly all the amendments to the motion to go into Supply are moved very near the end of the session. The reason for that is that discussions on amendments are usually founded upon material supplied by the Government as the result of a return brought down. These returns do not come down until well on in the session. Then, the very fact that Parliament has been in session for some time is a reason why information comes to the attention of members. For instance, in the year 1900, between June 14, and July 10, there were nine amendments out of thirteen. In 1904, between July 13 and August 3, there were six amendments out of nine. In 1908, there were nine out of fourteen amendments, referring to the Department of the Interior alone. In 1909-10 between April 14 and 28, there were five amendments out of six. The result of the amendment to the rules proposed will be that those occasions for discussing matters of public grievance will come up in the early part of the session rather than in the latter part, which is the time that is usually made use of.

If my right hon friend the Prime Minister really means to give us all the opportunity for discussion that his words would lead me to believe, I ask him why he has clause 4. There is no reason for it at all. I think I may safely say that, so far as his experience as Prime Minister goes, there has been no abuse of the rule. There was no abuse of it last session, and so far as his experience goes this session there has been no abuse of it, and the work of the Government has been facilitated by the Opposition. The only experience which the Prime Minister has had, and which might induce him to favour such a rule, is his experience as a member of this House of Commons during the fifteen years when the Liberal Government was in power. I would be very much surprised if he informed this House that his experience as a member of Parliament under the leadership of Sir Charles Tupper or his own experience as leader of the Opposition, would induce him to take the view that the rules of the House should be amended to prevent obstruction when the House goes into Committee of Supply.

I want to bring to the attention of the Prime Minister a couple of instances of the character to which I specially referred, and which are connected with my own constituency. Towards the end of last session, I received a letter from Mr. Thomas Lawrence of Hanley, in which he spoke of the congested condition of the grain traffic at the town of Hanley, and the difficulty of getting cars. It was ten minutes to six o'clock when the House was moved into Committee of Supply. I took the matter up with the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce, and read an extract from the letter to him. He replied in a sympathetic view, the incident was over, and within a few days the Canadian Northern Railway Company had supplied not only Mr. Lawrence but all the people of Hanley with the cars which they wanted. There was a distinct instance in which the right of ventilating even a private grievance was wholly for the public good. The resolution which my right hon. friend has introduced is limiting that right. There was another instance. Within less than a week of the prorogation of Parliament last session, I brought to the attention of the House on the motion to go into Committee of Supply the fact that the Canadian Pacific railway had changed the name of a town in my riding from Brodrick to St. Aldwyn. There was some misunderstanding as to how it came about. The department of the Postmaster General was being blamed for some reason and I myself did not understand the facts until the discussion came up in the House. Officials of the Canadian Pacific railway were perhaps acting in good faith, but they were making it appear that it was all because of the Railway Commission when, as a matter of fact, the affair had never come before the commission. The hon. Postmaster General gave me a sympathetic reply and I did not suppose that he and his department were not acting in good faith. The incident was over in half an hour but the result was that within a very few days the Canadian Pacific railway announced to the people of Broderick that they were going to again change the name and give them their old name again. It is now the town of Broderick as a result of the public attention which was given to the incident at that time. I have given to my right hon. friend another reason why he should not press this resolution as an amendment to the rules of this House; in fact, he has said to-day that if we want to censure the Government we will have an opportunity to do so. I think he will agree with me that, as a private member of this House, my time has not been engaged very much in censuring the Government but that as a private member I have been of some service to my constituents, a service that these new rules would take away from my people.

The right hon. Prime Minister ought to withdraw clause 4 of these resolutions. The hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Hazen) has moved the previous question, and the closure has been put even upon the Prime Minister. These are the days of closure. The members supporting the Government have been under closure for a long time past. I think I may safely say that we have had in the history of this Parliament for the last time the spectacle of a Government supported by members on the other side sitting silent week after week being pounded by a vigorous Opposition and offering no reply. The Government are in a panic to-day, they are afraid to go to the electors and therefore we find them putting on the closure. Their case has not got to the people and I cannot say, on second thought, that their case will be very much helped by going to the people. We have had an example of closure on the Prime Minister and the rest of the Government by the use of the previous question and now they are going to deal with us. If there is any good faith in the Government they would only pass such an amendment to the rules of the House as would correct the grievance which their experience has shown to them. They believe that, because they have not got this Naval Bill through the House, they have a grievance. They have no other grievance, they have no other experience, and, assuming that their case is correct, which I do not admit, their remedies should be limited to that case. If they were acting in good faith, I think they would limit them and because of their action in the introduction of these resolutions, and the incident connected with the application of the rules to the House, we would have reason to believe that they are not acting in good faith and that it is their desire to make these rules the occasion for doing very much more than merely getting their Naval Bill through.

I do not wish to discuss the issues which are connected with the Naval Bill, but I would like to make some reference to that debate to show that we have been justified in the stand we have taken. It was upon the 5th day of December that the Prime Minister made what may be considered in some quarters a very clever presentation which was intended to appeal to three wings of his own party. He said to some: This is temporary and you have reason to expect that it is all. He said to others: This is a gift; we are giving something, we are wiping out an obligation and when we were wiping out the obligation by giving something he added that we were not to have four or five navies. He made an argument which had only one distinction in it and that was one navy or a contribution. Then, to others he said: Oh, we give that and at the same time we take it back. That appeals to perhaps the largest portion of the party supporting the right hon. gentleman. It was necessary, in view of that presentation, and in view of the speeches which were subsequently made in this House, to prolong this debate to see where the policy of the Government would go. There was only one supporter of the Government who was disposed to speak of a Canadian navy. It was the hon. member for North Ontario (Mr. Sharpe) and I want to give him full credit for it because I think he will be a great man some day. But all the other speeches, including those of the right hon. Prime Minister, the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries, the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Aikins), the hon. Postmaster General (Mr. Pelletier), and the hon. member for Montreal, St. Antoine (Mr. Ames), went in one direction. The Government may make whatever declaration they like to-day, but they will have to go a long way to satisfy the House and the country that they have any other intention than the maintenance of the one fleet. One can imagine that circumstances might have occurred between December 5 and the present day under which we would believe still more in the German scare. One might believe that a case might arise which would frighten people and cause them a great deal of alarm. But the fact is, Sir, that everything that has occurred, taking the daily newspapers from that day to this, has tended to dispose of the contention of hon. gentlemen who support their argument by the alleged existence of a German scare because the fact is that there is no German menace, no emergency and no need of these three dreadnoughts in the North sea. The whole base of operations has changed since the 5th of December. The North sea was to bristle with dreadnoughts. Now they are to be sent to Gibraltar. The trouble is that my right hon. friend the Prime Minister is trying to keep up with Mr. Winston Churchill. He cannot follow Mr. Churchill all the way.

Mr. SPEAKER: I think the hon. gentleman is rather drifting from the motion before the House.

Mr. McCRANEY: Very well, Mr. Speaker, I will abide by your ruling and go to another topic. The House went into Committee of the Whole, but closure was on so far as the Government was concerned, and with regard to the important proposal in clause 2 of the Bill to send $35,000,000 out of this country we were asked to put it through that same night, and we were told that debate would be limited. I need not go into the result of that two weeks' siege. It has been stated in some newspapers that there has been some arrangement between the Government and the Opposition that there should be no more all-night sittings. If there was any arrangement of that kind, I am unaware of it. I do not think that the Opposition asked any quarter; I think the Government called off all-night sittings because they thought they were through with it. I do not think that this Opposition will ever ask the Government not to put on all-night sittings; in fact, I think it was a good thing for the men on this side of the House that they were forced to sit all night, and if the Prime Minister ever wants to do us another good service I would commend to him the same tactics, and I would express the hope that next session and as long as the Liberal party is in opposition there will be a few all-night sittings.

When that discussion arose the leader of the Opposition moved an amendment and another amendment was moved by my hon. friend from North Cape Breton. The House was in Committee of the Whole debating the resolution before the House and these two amendments for two weeks and then we were told by the Prime Minister and his supporters that all our discussion had gone for naught and that we were out of order. What kind of leadership is there in this House and what are we to expect from it? Then on the memorable Saturday night the rules were applied strictly so it was said. Men were put into the Chair who had not sat more than one complete session in this House and gave decisions which were intended to make the Chair in Committee of the Whole look somewhat ridiculous. After that, this very strict interpretation of the rules was removed again and we have gone on discussing these questions in Committee of the Whole and the discussion is wide open, and the Minister of Finance and the Prime Minister have taken part in the debate, and there is no talk now of a strict interpretation of the rules. In view of the situation I would ask if it is at all unreasonable that this House should be kept here to find out where we are at with regard to the policy of the Government and the way in wrich this House is to be run? The reason given for the introduction of this amendment to the rules is that the majority must prevail. Any person who was in the House the other evening and heard the speech of the hon. member for Shefford (Mr. Boivin) in which he pointed out that taking the returns of the last election and having regard for the votes cast for those members of the House who were elected, on the distinct pledge that they would favour no naval policy, the majority against the present Navy Bill was 200,000, out of a total vote of 1,300,000, would come to the conclusion that the majority is on the Opposition benches, and that the Opposition is justified in members taking every means in their power to prevent this legislation going through this House. The Liberal party in this House would be doing less than its duty if it did not exert itself to prevent that legislation, in view of the fact that a majority of 200,000 stand behind us in resisting to our utmost this naval proposal of the Government.

I do not purpose comparing the mode of working out the closure in Canada with the system in the Old Country, but I am very much mistaken if our friends in the Old Country will not see the difference and will not appreciate the fact that this legislation which is about to be passed by this Government can be passed only on the most stringent party pressure that can be put upon members of Parliament.

On previous occasions in this House there have been long sittings and obstruction. In 1885 when Sir John Macdonald introduced a franchise Bill which the Liberal party then in opposition thought tyrannical, the efforts of the Opposition of that day were such that the Bill was modified by Sir John Macdonald and provision was made which was fairly acceptable to the Opposition. Sir John Macdonald had some sense about him, and he knew it was better to amend that Bill than to adopt a closure measure, although at the time he had a majority of between eighty and ninety supporting him in this House. The next occasion was in 1896 when Sir Charles Tupper was Prime Minister and when the Manitoba School Bill was under consideration. I am sure Mr. Speaker that there is no one in this House to-day who would say that the action of the Opposition, and those members of the House who then associated themselves with the Opposition of that day, was not justified because the result of the ensuing election justified it, and the Government which was in favour of putting through the Manitoba School Bill was turned out of power. The next occasion was in 1908 when the Bill with respect to the Manitoba Voters' List was before this House, and the Right Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier, then leader of the Government, showed good sense, as did Sir John Macdonald on a previous occasion, and gave up the legislation rather than force it through with closure. When he was not supported by public opinion, he bowed to public opinion. The last instance of that was only two years ago, in 1911, when reciprocity was before Parliament. I am sure the right hon. the Prime Minister would not say that any mistake was made by the Conservative party in resisting those proposals, and obstructing. The fact is that in two of the four instances which I have given the legislation was modified or withdrawn. In the other two, the Government of the day which was being obstructed was defeated. There has been no instance in which a government was obstructed and forced to the country and came back with a majority. Sir John Macdonald might have come back after the obstruction of 1885, because he came back in 1887 with a large majority; and the Liberal party after the obstruction of 1908, could have come back, even if that legislation had been put through, because they did come back with a large majority. I commend to this Government the good sense and the spirit of fair play which was exercised both by Sir John Macdonald and by the present leader of the Opposition in those cases. One cannot help feeling that this Government has challenged the obstruction which had the results of 1896 and 1911. It is all very well for members, one hundred and thirty strong, to say: Oh, you on the other side are all wrong; you do not understand public opinion; we are the Government; we can put this thing through. That is giving to members of the Opposition credit for less sense than they ought to have credit for. I have no doubt myself that if this Government were to go to the country it would realize the results that the experience of 1896 and 1911 showed, and would be turned out. If its obstinacy carries it so far, while it may delay the day, I have no doubt that a people which feels outraged by reversal of policy and breach of pledges solemnly given, will see that this Government gets its due reward, and is defeated.

Mr. OLIVER: Mr. Speaker, I desire to move the adjournment of the House. I wish to draw the attention of the House to the matter—

Mr. MEIGHEN: I rise to a point of order. I think the hon. member, having spoken on the main motion, is not now in a position to move the adjournment of the House.

Mr. SPEAKER: I do not think the hon. member could properly move the adjournment of the House, since he has spoken before on the main motion.

Mr. PARDEE: I beg leave to move the adjournment of the House.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member is in the same position. He has spoken already.

Hon. H. S. BELAND (Beauce): Mr. Speaker, I realize that I am not in the same position as my hon. friend from Edmonton (Mr. Oliver), and my hon. friend from Lambton (Mr. Pardee). As I have a few remarks to offer in connection with the resolution that we are now discussing, I intend first to submit my remarks, which will be very short, and then I may conclude by the motion which you have at present refused to accept.

The House of Commons was called upon a few days ago to consider and to pass judgment upon a resolution amending profoundly the rules heretofore in force in this House. In discussing this question, it is necessary that one should go back a little and examine the circumstances which have surrounded us during the last few weeks in order to form an opinion upon the subject. What is to-day the situation in Canada and in the British Empire at large? The present Government has made an attempt to force upon the Canadian Parliament a policy which, I submit, is entirely new, and which constitutes a radical and constitutional departure in the political history of Canada. It is not overstating the matter to say that this attempt on the part of the Government has aroused public opinion from one end of the country to the other. It has aroused public opinion also in Great Britain. One has only to look at the press of the United Kingdom to come to the conclusion that even there opinion is divided as to the advisability of this Government forcing through this naval proposition of theirs.

A clamour has made its way to this House from the four corners of Canada calling for an immediate appeal to the people. Supported by what we consider to be a majority of the Canadian people, the Liberal Opposition in this House have offered a most strenuous resistance to the proposals of the Government, which are not merely naval, but are, I contend, also political. In the history of Canada there are many examples of long and unabated opposition to certain legislative attempts on the part of governments, and in every case I submit that opposition has been productive of amendments or has brought about a dissolution of Parliament and has ultimately been ratified by the electorate.

Many instances have been quoted in this House, some by the right hon. leader of the Opposition, particularly those of 1885, 1896, and 1911. I may refer to another instance in 1903, when an important measure was introduced into this House by the then Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), for the construction of the Transcontinental railway. A long guerilla opposition developed at that time. A long resistance was offered, and we know that the suggestions made by the then Opposition brought the Government to the conclusion that certain amendments should be accepted. Take, again, the case of 1905, on the occasion of the debate in this House in connection with the proposed legislation concerning Alberta and Saskatchewan. A long opposition developed at that time, and important amendments were accepted by the Government.

To claim that the new rule of debate which is now submitted for our consideration should not be amended is to claim for it perfection, and who in this House would for one moment contend that any measure can be introduced which is not susceptible of amendment in any way? But that is the position created by the Prime Minister and his supporters in the present instance. The course which has been taken by the Government is, I contend, a desperate action. The guillotine, as it is called, is introduced to quell constitutional resistance and opposition. Is the constitutional course to be despised to such an extent as has been hinted by hon. members on the other side of the House? Let me quote some words that fell from the lips of an hon. gentleman who stands very high in the estimation of my hon. friends on the other side, those of the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster) during the elections of 1911—words that were uttered at a big mass meeting held in the city of Halifax on the 5th of September of that year. He said:

> On September 21st you will go to the polls to speak on this matter, not because Sir Wilfrid Laurier wished it, but because his Majesty's loyal Opposition forced him to it.

What does that mean? It means what it says: That the then Opposition forced the then Government to the country, and the member for North Toronto, now the Minister of Trade and Commerce, did not seem at that time to relish the contention that such a course should be held to be despicable.

I submit that three courses are open to the Government in respect of the Naval Bill: First, they could withdraw the Bill; second: they could amend it, and, third, they could appeal to the country. They could withdraw the Bill and introduce another on the lines of the policy unanimously agreed upon three or four years ago. They could amend the Bill, as has been very properly suggested by the hon. member for South Wellington

(Mr. Guthrie), to the effect that the heads of the Canadian units, consisting of two powerful ships, should be built in the Old Country, and be brought to Canada, whereupon the Government could proceed with the organization of a Canadian navy, divided into two fleet units. They refused to agree to that, and to-day, when they are face to face with a situation that must ultimately force them to the country, what do they do? They introduce closure in the very heart of a heated debate, and at a time when public opinion in this country is divided as it were, into two camps, one in favour of the proposal and the other against it—two camps which appear to be equal in number, although, if we consider the figures submitted to the House the other night by the hon. member for Shefford (Mr. Boivin), it would appear that the majority of the people of this country, regardless of creed or nationality, are against the naval proposals of the present Administration. What situation will be created if the resolution to amend the rules of debate introduced by the Prime Minister is adopted by the House? It will mean, in a word, that in a few hours the free discussion of any matter can be shut off. A minority—be it Protestant, as it is in the province of Quebec; be it Catholic, as it is in some other provinces of Canada; be it French or German or English or Scotch or Irish—a minority combating strenuously in this House for certain privileges it has enjoyed for a long time, might be shut off from all discussion and gagged by the motion of a single minister of the Crown. This, I say, is the most autocratic power that has ever been confided to any government of any civilized country, not excepting Great Britain herself, which has in that respect, some very stringent rules indeed. I realize that the Government has found itself in a very delicate position, and that is the reason why they made an appeal to the hon. member for Portage la Prairie (Mr. Meighen) to defend the proposal. Why did they select the hon. member for Portage la Prairie? For one and only one good reason—because of his adroitness and his legal attainments, and because of his power, almost without limit, to demonstrate that white is black. They have, through the hon. member for Portage la Prairie practically tried to force this demonstration upon the House, but, I would remind the hon. gentleman that that great English statesman, Edmund Burke, once said that a British subject is the least qualified person on earth to argue another British subject into slavery. In this case it would be parliamentary slavery. I submit, however, that my hon. friend from Portage la Prairie has failed to convince me that the proposed rules are proper or useful or necessary.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Or generous.

Mr. BELAND: They are far from being generous. Let us consider for a moment the manner in which this resolution has been introduced into the House, taking into consideration not only words, but action. But, before I proceed further, I should like to deal with a point which was debated a few minutes ago between my right hon. friend the Prime Minister and my hon. friend from Edmonton, regarding the number of opportunities that would be given to a member to criticise the estimates. In order to make myself clear, I desire to put a question: Will it be possible under this rule for the Minister of Finance, for instance, to move the House into Committee of Supply in order to consider the estimates of the Department of Justice, of the Department of Finance and of the Department of Public Works? Could such a motion for the three departments be made on any one day other than the Thursday and Friday which are specially provided for? If such a motion could be made, there would be only one day for the three departments. And if a motion could be made covering three departments, a motion could be made covering ten, or covering the whole fourteen; and so the time for debate might be reduced to one day —one sitting. May I be permitted to ask the Prime Minister whether that could be done under this rule?

Mr. BORDEN: I should think that the motion would be made in the ordinary course, but the estimates of each department must be taken up on some other day than Thursday or Friday.

Mr. BELAND: Perhaps it is my incomplete knowledge of the English language that has prevented me from making myself clear to the Prime Minister. Will fourteen days be allowed in case we require them for the discussion of the several departments, one day for each department?

Mr. BORDEN: I have already said this afternoon, before this debate began, that whenever any desire was expressed to attack the administration of the Government or to move a vote of censure, we should naturally and reasonably afford the opportunity of doing so. No Government could possibly take any other course.

Mr. BELAND: I might rely upon the generosity of my right hon. friend, though my faith in him has been shaken a little within the last few days; still, every Government in the future will be governed by this paragraph 4 of the rules and what I wish to find out is the exact meaning of this paragraph. If I am told that on any day besides Thursday or Friday the Government may move that the House resolve itself into Committee of Supply for the consideration of the estimates of one particular department, and that fourteen days will thus be allowed for the consideration of the several departments, I am satisfied this paragraph should be amended.

Mr. MARCIL: There may be fifteen departments next year.

Mr. BORDEN: I do understand the rule in the way in which the hon. gentleman has suggested.

Mr. BELAND: Thank you. Now, let me call attention to the manner in which the Prime Minister introduced these resolutions.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Would the right hon. gentleman explain the answer he made?

Mr. BORDEN: My hon. friend asked if each department would be taken up on a separate day, and I said yes.

Mr. LEMIEUX: So, fourteen opportunities will be given?

Mr. BORDEN: Yes, and more if necessary or desired.

Mr. TURRIFF: Might I ask the Prime Minister, if under the rule as it is proposed it would not be perfectly legal for the Finance Minister, or any other minister, to move the House into Committee of Supply to take up the estimates of any number of departments? Probably the Government might not want to do that; I think the right hon. gentleman would not want to do it; but I am trying to find out whether it would not be within the power of the Government to do that according to the necessary construction of this section.

Mr. BORDEN: I should not regard that as within the spirit of the rule, and if there were any fear of it I would amend the rule immediately.

Mr. BELAND: All that goes to show that a special committee should have been appointed to consider these proposals, and that is manifest to every impartial man in this House. The Prime Minister could not refrain from saying that on a future occasion he would like to submit these amendments to a committee, though he refused to do so in the present instance.

Let me quote to the House some words of the right hon. the Prime Minister. As reported on page 7587 he said:

> It would not be to the interest of any government to exercise them unfairly, and I am sure that, so far as referring these rules to a committee is concerned, I would be very glad indeed to refer them to a committee of the House or to debate them in a Committee of the Whole House, if it were not for the very great loss of time and the indefinite delay which would apparently be involved in any such step. We think that the time has come when the rules of the House ought to be amended, and we are sincerely endeavouring to amend them in a way which will be fair to the minority of the House, and which at the same time will enable public business to be carried on in a reasonable and normal manner. I am willing, however, to say this, that if these rules pass, I shall be perfectly willing at the opening of another session to refer all the rules of the Husoe to a committee of the House in order that in other respects, as well as in those to which I have alluded, there should be a thorough revision, which I think is very much needed.

Why postpone that until next session? Why not withdraw the Naval Bill, because this Bill is the cause of closure? The Naval Bill is the cause of the gag; there is no doubt about that. Then why not withdraw the Bill? Does the Government believe that they will create a revolution in this country if they withdraw their Bill? Why, they are overwhelmed to-day with correspondence from all corners of this country asking them to withdraw the Bill and wait until another session.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

An hon. MEMBER: It is just the opposite.

Mr. BELAND: We see that the Prime Minister is willing to consider at a later stage the proposition of referring these rules to a committee. We are guided here by British precedents and I do not know of any instance in the parliamentary history of Great Britain, perhaps with one exception, of important rules having been introduced in the House without a committee being appointed to consider them in conjunction with the Speaker of the House. The quotation I have read from the speech of the right hon. the Prime Minister would indicate, first, that amendments are possible and even desirable, and in order to make myself clearer on this point, I will quote a few more words from the same speech:

> Mr. Graham: That would mean the unanimous consent.
> Mr. Borden: I will change that to unanimous consent, if my hon. friends will consent.
> Sir Wilfrid Laurier: We want to debate it first.
> Mr. Borden: Then my right hon. friend does not agree to change it?
> Sir Wilfrid Laurier: I want to debate it first, for there is room for discussion on that.
> Mr. Borden: I offer to change it if my hon. friends desire it.
> Mr. Beland: We might do that in committee.
> Mr. Borden: Very good, if my right hon. friend wants to debate it——

What does that mean? It simply means that these rules are susceptible of amendment, and how can you add the word

'unanimous' without moving an amendment to a resolution, notice of which is on the Order Paper. There is no other way except by amendment. The Prime Minster was willing to put that word in, but how can we think him consistent when a few minutes later he voted to exclude all amendments.

Mr. BORDEN: Of course my hon. friend has not read that portion of my remarks in which I said I thought it had that meaning without the word 'unanimous' being added.

Mr. BELAND: The right hon. gentleman said he understood the words 'consent of the House' to mean unanimous consent, but we may expect anything in these days. In spite of the Speaker, the majority might rule that it does not mean unanimous. Why, Mr. Speaker, you decided the other day that the right hon. gentleman who leads the Opposition should have the floor and you gave him the floor; your decision was challenged immediately, and the majority voted that your eyes were wrong, and that the Minister of Marine and Fisheries should be allowed the floor. My right hon. friend the Prime Minister said that we might have a committee next session. That supports our contention. In the course of his remarks he also assured the House that these rules would be applied with prudence and fairness. That was the manner in which the resolution was introduced, but let us consider for a moment what took place a few minutes afterwards. When the right hon. gentleman sat down, the right hon. the leader of the Opposition rose to reply, and every member in this House will remember what took place. The Minister of Marine and Fisheries rose and called for the floor. You, Mr. Speaker, decided that the leader of the Opposition should speak, and then an hon. member challenged your decision and, availing himself of rule 17, moved that the Minister of Marine and Fisheries should be heard. I want to call your attention to a passage in Bourinot which undoubtedly escaped your attention on that occasion, Mr. Speaker. It is to be found under the title of 'Precedence in Debate' on pages 457-8:

> The Speaker of the Commons will always give precedence in debate to that member who first catches his eye.

In the present case the right hon. the leader of the Opposition caught your eye.

> When two or more members rise to speak, Mr. Speaker calls upon the member who first rose in his place;——

In this case it was the leader of the Opposition.

> —but a motion may be made that any member who has risen 'be now heard', or 'do now speak.'

That was the rule invoked by my hon. friend from East Hastings (Mr. Northrup) when he made his motion, and if he will do me the favour of following me further I will read the next passage:

> Is is usual, however, to allow priority to members of the Administration who wish to speak; and in all important debates it is customary for the Speaker to endeavour to give the preference, alternately to the known supporters and opponents of a measure or question——

Mark the following words:

> —and it is irregular to interfere with the Speaker's call in favour of any other member.

So in this case it was irregular for the hon. member for East Hastings to challenge your decision. The Prime Minister had finished, the right hon. leader of the Opposition rose, he first caught your eye, you decided he had the floor and the hon. member for East Hastings rose and moved that another gentleman be heard. It was irregular and I am surprised, knowing how well read you are in parliamentary procedure, that you did not avail yourself of this information and rule the hon. member for East Hastings out of order. I am quite sure that, if your attention had been called to it, you would have ruled against him. The rule is plain:

> It is irregular to interfere with the Speaker's call in favour of any other member.

This action has not helped the Government in this House, in this province, in the country at large, or even in the British Empire. It has raised a great deal of indignation not only in the Liberal press but among some of the most ardent supporters of the Administration. The Conservative newspaper of this city places blame upon the Government for their action in this instance. What was the declaration of the Government in introducing this resolution? No amendment is to be considered—everything or nothing. No member, from Your Honour down to my humble self, need expect to contribute in the least to the framing of the rules that will apply to us all. We are debarred from doing that, and for what purpose? No reason has been given by the Prime Minister except that it will take a very long time. Is it not worth while that we should spend a few hours, or a few days, in debate on rules that will apply for all time in the future, if they are not repealed or amended? It is almost a case of the Government against Parliament, and if party obligations were not carried to such an extent in this House, I venture to submit that a majority of the members supporting the Government would be against the action of the Government in introducing these new rules. What is it that the Government are asking us to adopt? We believe that the project of amending the rules in the way in which it is proposed to amend them emanated from the worst Manitoba instincts of the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Rogers), that it sprang up under the care of the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Aikins) and that it has been nursed to full life by the careful and attentive watering of the hon. member for Portage la Prairie (Mr. Meighen). The last named gentleman has offered the best defence that could be offered of this tawny and frowning resolution. What is it? Is it such a sacred thing, is it so perfect, that no man should think of amending it? Has it been so laboriously erected that if you strike out a single word it will cause the whole structure to tumble to pieces? No, it is an emergency measure. We have heard of an emergency for many months in this Parliament, but inasmuch as it is devised to relieve the Government of the necessity of launching into an admittedly dangerous venture—an appeal to the people—this is an emergency measure. Yes, the emergency is here at last. We have been closely looking for it from all parts of the country. It had been heralded by the Montreal Star for six months previous to the opening of this session and it had been advertised by other Tory nwspapers. The manufacturers of scares had been working overtime in the Old Country and on the 5th of December we were told that a new project was going to be presented to the members of this House, a new proposal, something imponderous and abstract called an emergency, and the right hon. Prime Minister came forward with a great deal of ceremony and pomp and introduced to us the emergency. He was surrounded by a corps of his supporters and he was like a pagan god sitting in the clouds dispensing thunder and lightning. He left it at that. Then suddenly, the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Hazen) rose and welcomed the emergency. It was a dear instrument that would enhance the chances of Imperial federation. It would help to revive the scheme. Then the hon. Postmaster General (Mr. Pelletier) came ahead and pathetically proclaimed the imminence of the emergency. He pictured it under the guise of the British lion staggering under the weight of heavy chains fastened together by numberless padlocks. He appealed for help from the Dominion of Canada. Then later the emergency weakened a little and it got to such a state that the party, before disbanding for the Christmas holidays, thought it would be proper to call upon the master-speaker of the Administration, the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Foster). The Minister of Trade and Commerce in eloquent strains, clothed the emergency in a different way. He garbed it as you would a poor and needy child for whom sympathy might be expected to well up in our bosoms. It was weakened to such an extent that everybody thought it was dead. The Government thought the moment had come when the emergency should be revived. After a long lethargy, they looked around among their supporters and they found a gentleman who came from that western country so fertile in tornadoes and cyclones. They invited the hon. member for Calgary (Mr. Bennett) to try and revive the dying emergency. A high wind passed through the House and I am sorry to say that the wind blew out of existence the emergency itself. So, it disappeared. This imponderous and abstract proposition, the emergency, has now disappeared from our view.

Mr. SPEAKER: I think that my hon. friend is hardly keeping very close to the question before the House.

Mr. BELAND: Mr. Speaker, I shall abide by your ruling. I am just coming to the point that I want to make. I was going on to show the attempts that have been made to resuscitate and resurrect this emergency but it is admitted on all sides that, in so far as naval defence is concerned, it does not exist. Wherein lies the living and real emergency? It is not in the North sea; it is not on the rock of Gibraltar; it is not in the sea of Marmora, it is here in this House. When this Government was on the verge of a general election, a caucus was held, and it was decided that an extreme measure should be resorted to and the closure introduced, and that is the emergency. There is no other emergency in Canada or in the British Empire to-day. The guillotine is not welcomed in this country; it is damned by almost every British subject. And why? Because the resistance of the Liberal party to the naval policy of the Government is popular, and why is it popular? Because it is directed against this naval proposal of the Government, which not only deals with naval defence of the British Empire, but also involves a profound change in the relations between Canada and the Mother Country. It is a political measure in the full sense of the word. The other day, listening to the Minister of Finance, I heard him ask this question: Will anyone stand up and claim that the Prime Minister has said that periodical and regular contributions is our policy? On the 5th December last, the Prime Minister said in this House—

Mr. SPEAKER: I would remind the hon. member that he is not speaking to the question before the House. It is not permissible to debate the Naval Aid Bill on a motion to amend the rules, which is the last motion put from the Chair, and is the question before the House. I would ask the hon. member to confine himself to that question.

Mr. BELAND: I bow to your ruling, Mr. Speaker, but I want to explain why I was referring to that debate. It is to limit the navy debate that the closure resolution has been introduced, and it has been introduced to quell and to reduce to naught what has been called by the Government 'obstruction,' but what I call resistance, and which resistance I want to justify by saying that proposal involved in the Naval Bill is such as would justify every possible resistance because it involves the political relations of Canada with the British Empire. If as you say, Mr. Speaker, I cannot refer to that debate, I shall bow to your decision and proceed.
