THE GREAT BRITAIN STEAM-SHIP.

(From the Liverpool Mercury Sep 25.)

Yesterday an intense excitemement was caused in Liverpool by the arrival, in the Belfast steamer, of some of the gent curion who had sailed as passengers; on board the Great Britain, which left our river on Tuesday; and noon. On Change, and various parts of the the two may say that no similar accident, unathened with loss of life, ever caused a greater serisation.

The following are as many of the particular and by the Great Britain began to move down the lars as we could gather from authenic sources.

The Great Britain began to move down the Mersey at a quartier past twelve o'clock, at noon on Tuesday, baying on how down the suppose of supplies for the remainder of the year.

Mersey at a quarter past twelve o'clock, at of supplies for the remainder of the year, noon, on Tuesday, having on board about 150. There was nothing menacing in the language week but the first twelve o'clock. There was nothing menacing in the language week, by the disinterment of a corpse; which or demenator of the men who avowed their had been buried in the Roman Catholic Com-Cox, and a number of other clergymen, who attended the Evangeli at Alianne meeting in London; upwards of thirty of the celebrated dancing children, the Viennoises, &cc., &c. She proceeded at a rapid rate, as the result proves; she passed the Bill buoy in an hour and five minutes; and at hali-past mine, a strong gale blowing at the time, she went a shore in Dandrum Bay—a distance from Laverpool, taking her track, of about 126 miles shore in Dundrum Bay—a distance from Liverpool, taking her track, of about 126 miles — a passage of thirteen miles an Bourt. The spot where she grounded is about twenty miles from Belfast.

Captain Hosken, it is known, prefers the north-about trip, on account of some advantages of importance in his estimation. The Ualf of Man had been perceived between four and five o'clock, previous to the cabin passengers sitting down to dinner; and yet, four hours later, some lights on the Irish coast, of similar characteristics, we understood, were hours later, some lights on the Irish coast, of similar-characteristics, we understood, were supposed to be mistaken, by the officer on duty, for the Calf lights; but another supposition is, that the compass had not been tested and hence, the Great Britain being an iron vessel, some error in the course had been caused. We conversed with two of the passengers on 'Chaige on this subject, but no clearly defined cause of the error could be the alarm, and have apprehended several Carlist to lament their bereavement.

Stanley, by shewing him that we could restrain ourselves. We have succeeded in the strain of the public of Glasgow, and the profit of Glasgow, and the profit of Glasgow, and the profit of Glasgow, and the Executive Government, and we have left a clear course and a fair prospect for those whe may be chosen as our successors.

Within the last four years several very impair of the strain ourselves.
