The copy filmed here has been reproduced thanks to the generosity of:

University of Guelph

The images appearing here are the best quality possible considering the condition and legibility of the original copy and in keeping with the filming contract specifications.

Original copies in printed paper covers are filmed beginning with the front cover and ending on the last page with a printed or illustrated impression, or the back cover when appropriate. All other original copies are filmed beginning on the first page with a printed or illustrated impression, and ending on the last page with a printed or illustrated impression.

The last recorded frame on each microfiche shall contain the symbol \rightarrow (meaning "CONTINUED"), or the symbol ∇ (meaning "END"), whichever applies.

Maps, plates, charts, etc., may be filmed at different reduction ratios. Those too large to be entirely included in one exposure are filmed beginning in the upper left hand corner, left to right and top to bottom, as many frames as required. The following diagrams illustrate the method:

L'exemplaire filmé fut reproduit grâce à la générosité de:

Les images suivantes ont été reproduites avec le plus grand soin, compte tenu de la condition et de la netteté de l'exemplaire filmé, et en conformité avec les conditions du contrat de filmage.

Les exemplaires originaux dont la couverture en papier est imprimée sont filmés en commençant par le premier plat et en terminant soit par la dernière page qui comporte une empreinte d'impression ou d'illustration, soit par le second plat, selon le cas. Tous les autres exemplaires originaux sont filmés en commençant par la première page qui comporte une empreinte d'impression ou d'illustration et en terminant par la dernière page qui comporte une telle empreinte.

Un des symboles suivants apparaît sur la dernière image de chaque microfiche, selon le cas: le symbole \rightarrow signifie "A SUIVRE", le symbole ∇ signifie "FIN".

Les cartes, planches, tableaux, etc., peuvent être filmés à des taux de réduction différents. Lorsque le document est trop grand pour être reproduit en un seul cliché, il est filmé à partir de l'angle supérieur gauche, de gauche à droite, et de haut en bas, en prenant le nombre d'images nécessaire. Les diagrammes suivants illustrent la méthode.

PREFACE.

This Work is intended to furnish, together with the 'Dictionary of Christian Biography, Literature, and Doctrines,' which will shortly follow, a complete account of the leading Personages, the Institutions, Art, Social Life, Writings and Controversies of the Christian Church from the time of the Apostles to the age of Charlemagne. It commences at the period at which the 'Dictionary of the Bible' leaves off, and forms a continuation of it: it ceases at the age of Charlemagne, because (as Gibbon has remarked) the reign of this monarch forms the important link of ancient and modern, of civil and ecclesiastical history. It thus stops short of what we commonly call the Middle Ages. The later development of Ritual and of the Monastic Orders, the rise and progress of the great Mendicant Orders, the Painting, Sculpture and Architecture, the Hagiology and Symbolism, the Canon Law, and the Institutions generally of the Middle Ages, furnish more than sufficient matter for a separate book.

The present Work, speaking generally, elucidates and explains in relation to the Christian Church the same class of subjects that the 'Dictionary of Greek and Roman Antiquities' does in reference to the public and private life of classical antiquity. It treats of the organization of the Church, its officers, legislation, discipline, and revenues; the social life of Christians; their worship and ceremonial, with the accompanying music, vestments, instruments, vessels, and insignia; their sacred places; their architecture and other forms of Art; their symbolism; their sacred days and seasons; the graves or Catacombs in which they were laid to rest.

We can scarcely hope that every portion of this wide and varied field has been treated with equal completeness; but we may venture to assert, that this Dictionary is at least more complete than any attempt hitherto made by English or Foreign scholars to treat in one work the whole archaeology of the early Church. The great work of Bingham, indeed, the foundation of most subsequent books on the subject, must always be spoken of with the utmost respect; but it is beyond the power of one man to treat with the requisite degree of fulness and accuracy the whole of so vast a subject; and there is probably no branch of Christian archaeology on which much light has not been thrown since Bingham's time by the numerous scholars and divines who have devoted their lives to special investigations. We trust that we have made accessible to all educated persons a great mass of information, hitherto only the privilege of students with the command of a large library.

In treating of subjects like Church Government and Ritual it is probably impossible to secure absolute impartiality; but we are confident that no intentional reticence, distortion or exaggeration has been practised by the writers in this work.

It has been thought advisable not to insert in the present work an account of the Literature, of the Sects and Heresies, and of the Doctrines of the Church, but to treat these subjects in the 'Dictionary of Christian Biography,' as they are intimately connected with the lives of the leading persons in Church History, and could not with advantage be separated from them.

It has not been possible to construct the vocabulary on an entirely consistent principle. Where a well-recognized English term exists for an institution or an object, that term has generally been preferred as the heading of an article. But in many cases obsolete customs, offices, or objects have no English name; and in many others the English term is not really co-extensive with the Latin or Greek term to which it seems at first sight to correspond. The word Decanus (for example) has several meanings which are not implied in the English Dean. In such cases it was necessary to adopt a term from the classic languages. Cross-references are given from the synonyms or quasi-synonyms to the word under which any subject is treated. The Councils are placed (so far as possible) under the modern names of the places at which they were held, a cross-reference being given from the ancient name. In the case of the Saints' Days, the names of the Western saints have been taken from the martyrology of Usuard, as containing probably the most complete list of the martyrs and confessors generally recognized in the West up to the ninth century; the occurrence of these names in earlier calendars or martyrologies is also noted. In the letters A and B, however, the names of Saints are taken principally from the 'Martyrologium Romanum Vetus,' and from the catalogues which bear the names of Jerome and of Bede, without special reference to Usuard. In the case of the Eastern Church, we have taken from the calendars of Byzantium, of Armenia, and of Ethiopia, those names which fall within our chronological period. This alphabetical arrangement will virtually constitute an index to the principal martyrologies, in addition to supplying the calendar-dates of events which are fixed—as is not uncommonly the case in ancient records—by reference to some festival. The names of persons are inserted in the vocabulary of this Work only with reference to their commemoration in martyrologies or their representations in art, their lives, when they are of any importance, being given in the Dictionary of Biography.

References are given throughout to the original authorities on which the several statements rest, as well as to modern writers of repute. In citations from the Fathers, where a page is given without reference to a particular edition, it refers for the most part to the standard pagination—generally that of the Benedictine editions—which is retained in Migne's Patrologia.

At the commencement of this work, the Editorship of that portion which includes the laws, government, discipline, and revenues of the Church and the Orders within it, was placed in the hands of Professor Stubbs; the education and social life of Christians in those of Professor Plumptre; while the treatment of their worship and ceremonial was entrusted to Professor Cheetham; all under the general superintendence of Dr. William Smith. As the work proceeded, however, a pressure of other engagements rendered it impossible for Professors Stubbs and Plumptre to continue their editorship of the parts which they had undertaken; and from the end of the letter C Professor Cheetham has acted as Editor of the whole work, always with the advice and assistance of Dr. William Smith.

In conclusion, we have to express our regret at the long time that has elapsed since the first announcement of the work. This delay has been owing partly to our anxious desire to make it as accurate as possible, and partly to the loss we have sustained by the death of two of our most valued contributors, the Rev. A. W. Haddan and the Rev. W. B. Marriott.

AMERICAN PUBLISHERS' PREFACE.

In offering this "Dictionary of Christian Antiquities" to the American public, with our imprint, several very important facts need to be stated. It is due to ourselves as Publishers, as well as to the people of this country, who require, in their religious reading and studies, this invaluable production of Dr. Smith, that they be enlightened in regard to the circumstances of its republication on this side of the Atlantic.

Early recognizing the remarkable excellence of this Dictionary, and its necessity to all students of the Bible and Church history, we contracted with the English publisher for a duplicate set of plates, that we might reproduce the work entire and unaltered.

An edition, however, largely abridged and seriously mutilated, has been issued, and extensively advertised as Dr. Smith's Dictionary. Ours, therefore, is the only COMPLETE, UNABRIDGED American edition of the work, as it came from the hands of Dr. Smith and his co-laborers. This merit of completeness and integrity will have great weight with all scholars and persons of discrimination. Had this Dictionary been thought susceptible of a wise and proper condensation, the eminent lexicographer would doubtless have done this service himself, as he did a similar service in respect to his "Dictionary of the Bible," in order to accommodate the slender means of many students of the Scriptures. But this work is so compact, its various articles have been so condensed by their respective authors, that any alteration of the text by any other hand, is not a matter of even doubtful expediency nor a question of cost, but a damaging mutilation and grievous mistake. Whoever therefore may be betrayed into the patronage of the abridgment, will lose very much that is contained in the original work.

Again, we are enabled by our contract with the English publisher to offer the UNABRIDGED DICTIONARY at less than one-half the price of the imported edition, and at a cost so low that no one will hesitate a moment to choose our large and unaltered reprint from the English plates, rather than the abridgment hastily prepared in this country.

Furthermore and finally, we have made such arrangements with Dr. Smith and Mr. Murray, his publisher, that the second volume (now nearly ready for publication) is to be in part of American authorship, and will therefore be copyrighted in this country. There can therefore be no legal reprint of it except by ourselves. Any infringement of our sole right to republish it and thus complete this most valuable contribution to Christian literature, will be subjected to legal resistance and redress. The distinguished lexicographer will therefore derive some remuneration for the vast service he has rendered to the Christian people of the United States.

It is proper therefore that we here emphasize our caution, lest any person be misled to the purchase of the first volume of the mutilated reprint, as its publishers will be stopped from the issue of the second volume. No wise man will buy any portion of a work that can not be completed. In the interests of literary integrity, and to save the Christian public from being imposed upon in the purchase of the abridgment, we have felt it incumbent upon us to freely and fully state the real facts of the case, and that we may leave no room for any possible doubt in the mind of any one in regard to the truth of our statements and the validity of our claim, we append the certificates of Dr. Smith of London, and Messrs. Little, Brown & Co., of Boston, the representatives of the English publisher in this country.

A thorough and exhaustive comparison of the two editions, will be sent to any one who desires it. The publishers of the abridgment caution their subscribers against purchasing any second volume but theirs. We caution the American public against purchasing any first volume but ours, because no second volume can ever be issued in this country except by us. They will thus avoid great annoyance and pecuniary loss.

The second volume will be of the same size and cost as the first, and together, they will constitute an Encyclopedia of priceless value, indispensable to every student of the Bible, to every professional and household library. We shall publish it simultaneously with its issue in England. If for any reason our agents should neglect to deliver it promptly to those who have the first volume, it can be secured without failure and at once, by addressing

THE J. B. BURR PUBLISHING CO.
HARTFORD, CONN.

50 ALBEMARLE ST., LONDON, May 22, 1876.

GENTLEMEN—

I have much pleasure in stating that you are the only firm authorized by me to publish the "Dictionary of Christian Antiquities" in America, and as you have made arrangements with me to secure an accurate reprint of the work, I trust that the American public will not patronize any edition but the one issued by your firm.

I am, gentlemen,

Yours faithfully,

Wm. Smith,
D. C. L., LL.D.

To the J. B. Burr Publishing Company, Hartford, Conn.

BOSTON, May 24th, 1876.

DEAR SIRS—

If the plan of Dr. Smith is carried out, as it probably will be, of having American contributions in Volume II, it will estop a reprint of that Volume, and the statement should be made public, with Dr. Smith's letter, that you will have the sole right to publish the American edition of Volume II.

Yours truly,

LITTLE, BROWN & Co.

CHRISTIAN ANTIQUITIES.

A AND Ω

A and ω. (See Rev. xxii. 13.) Of these symbolic letters the ω is always given in the minuscular form. The symbol is generally combined with the monogram of Christ. [MONOGRAM.] In Boldetti's Osservazioni sopra i cimiteri, &c. Rom. 1720, fol. tav. iii. p. 194, no. 4, it is found, with the more ancient decussated monogram, on a sepulchral cup or vessel. See also De Rossi (Inscriptions, No. 776), where the letters are suspended from the arms of the St. Andrew's Cross. They are combined more frequently with the upright or Egyptian monogram. Aringhi, Rom. Subt. vol. i. p. 381, gives an engraving of a jewelled cross, with the letters suspended by chains to its horizontal arm, as below. And the same form occurs in sepulchral inscriptions in De Rossi, Inscr. Chr. Rom. t. i. nos. 661, 666. See also Boldetti, p. 345, and Bottari, tav. xlv. vol. i.

The letters are found, with or without the monogram, in almost all works of Christian antiquity; for instance, right and left of a great cross, on the ceiling of the apse of St. Apollinare in Classe at Ravenna, circ. A.D. 675. They were worn in rings and sigils, either alone, as in Martigny, s. v. Ancaux, or with the monogram, as in Boldetti, ms. 21-31, 30-33. On coins they appear to be first used immediately after the death of Constantine. The earliest instances are an aureus nummus of Constantius (Banduri, v. ii. p. 227, Numismata Imp. Romanorum, &c.); and another golden coin bearing the effigy of Constantine the Great, with the words "Victoria Maxima." Constantine seems not to have made great use of Christian emblems on his coin till after the defeat of Licinius in 323, and especially after the building of Constantinople. (See Martigny, s. v. Numismatique.)

The use of these symbolic letters amounts to a quotation of Rev. xxii. 13, and a confession of faith in our Lord's own assertion of His infinity and divinity. There is one instance in Martial (Epig. v. 26) where A, Alpha, is used jocularly (as A 1, vulgarly, with ourselves) for "chief" or "first." But the whole expression in its solemn meaning is derived entirely from the words of Rev. xxii. 13. The import to a Christian is shewn by the well-known passage of Prudentius (Hymnus Omni Jara, 10, Cuthmerinon, ix. p. 35, ed. Tübingen, 45):—

"Corde natus ex parentis ante mundi exordium, Alpha et Ω e-gnominatus, Ipse fons et clausula, Omnium quae enut, fuerunt, quaeque post futura sunt."

The symbol was no doubt much more frequently used after the outbreak of Arianism. But it appears to have been used before that date, from its occurrence in the inscription on the tomb raised by Victorina to her martyred husband Heraclius in the cemetery of Priscilla (Aringhi, i. 605). It is here enclosed in a triangle, and united with the upright monogram. See also another inscription in Fabretti (Inscr. antiq. explicatio, Rom. 1699, fol.), and the cup given in Boldetti from the Callixtine catacomb, tav. iii. no. 4, at p. 194. From these it is argued with apparent truth that the symbol must have been in use before the Nicene Council.* No doubt, as a convenient symbolic form of asserting the Lord's divinity, it became far more prominent afterwards. The Ariens certainly avoided its use (Giorgi, De Monogram. Christi, p. 10). It is found on the crucifix attributed to Nicodemus (Angelo Rocca, Thesaurus Pontificiarum, vol. i. 153, woodcut), and on a wooden crucifix of great antiquity at Lucca (Borgia, De Cruce Veltirna, p. 33). For its general use as a part of the monogram of Christ, see MONOGRAM. It will be found (see Westwood's Palaeographia Sacra) in the Psalter of Athelstan, and in the Bible of Alcuin; both in the British Museum. [R. St. J. T.]

AARON, the High Priest, commemorated

* Boldetti: "Quanto alle lettere A and ω, non v'ha dubbio che quei primi Cristiani le presero dall' Apocalisse." He goes on to say that it is the sign of Christ, not Arian, burial; and that Ariens were driven from Rome, and excluded from the Catacombs. Aringhi also protests that those cemeteries were "haud unquam heretico schismaticoque commercio pollutae."

ABBA. [ABBAT.]

ABBAT. (Abbas or Abba [-itis], ἀββᾶς, ἄββα, in low Latin sometimes Abas, Ital. Abate, Germ. Abt., from the Chaldee and Syriac form of the common Semitic word for Father, probably adopted in that form either by Syriac monks, or through its N. T. use.) A name employed occasionally in the East, even so late as the 10th century, as a term of respect for any monks (Cassian, Collat. l. 1, A.D. 429; Reg. S. Columb. vii., A.D. 609; Jo. Mosch., Prat. Spir., A.D. 630; Epiphani. Hagiot., De Loc. SS., A.D. 956; Byzant. auth. ap. Du Cange, Lex. Inf. Graec.; Bulteau, Hist. Mon. d'Orient, A.D. 181; and, similarly, ἀββαῖον, ἀββαδίσκιον, ψευδάββας, κληττάββας, for an evil or false monk, Du Cange, ib.); and sometimes as a distinguishing term for a monk of singular piety (Hieron., in Epist. ad Gal. c. 4; in Matt. lib. iv. in c. 23); but ordinarily restricted to the superior of a monastery, Pater or Princeps Monasterii, elective, irremovable, single, absolute. Replaced commonly among the Greeks by Ἀρχιμανδρίτης [ARCHIMANDRITA], Ἡγούμενος, or more rarely Κοινοβιάρχης; the first of which terms however, apparently by a confusion respecting its derivation, came occasionally to stand for the superior of more monasteries than one (Helyet, Hist. des Ordre. Mon. i. 65);—extended upon their institution to the superior of a body of canons, more properly called Præpositus, Abbas Canoniarum as opposed to Abbas Monachorum (e. g. Conc. Paris. A.D. 829, c. 37; Conc. Aquis. II. A.D. 836, canon. c. ii. P. 2, § 1; Chron. Leod.); but varied by many of the later monastic orders, as e. g. by Carmelites, Augustinians, Dominicans, Servites, into Præpositus or Prior Conventualis, by Franciscans into Custos or Guardianus, by Camaldulensians into Major, by Jesuits into Rector—distinguished in the original Rule of Pachomius, as the superior of a combination of monasteries, from the Pater, Princeps, or Oeconomus of each and from the Præpositi of the several families of each. Enlarged into Abbas Abbatum for the Abbat of Monte Cassino (Pet. Dinc. Chron. Casin. iv. 60; Leo Ostiens., ib. ii. 54), who was vicar of the Pope over Benedictine monasteries (Privileg. Nicol. I. Papae, A.D. 1059, np. And. n. Nuce and Leon. Ostiens. ib. l. 12), and had precedence over all Benedictine abbats (Privileg. Paschal. II. Papae, A.D. 1113, in Bull. Casin. ii. 130; Chart. Lothar. Imp., A.D. 1137, ib. 157). Similarly a single Abbat of Anania, Benedict, was made by Ludov. Pius, A.D. 817, chief of the abbats in the empire (Chron. Rayf. p. 81; Ardo, in F. Bened. c. viii. 36); and the Hegumenos of St. Dalmatius in Constantinople was, from the time of St. Dalmatius himself (A.D. 430), ἀρχων or πατριμωναρχηριων, Abbas Universalis or Καθολικὸς, Exarchus omnium monasteriorum in urbe regia (Conc. Constant. iv., A.D. 536, Act i; Conc. Ephes. iii. A.D. 431; and see Tillem., Mém. Eccl. xiv. 322 and Euseb. in F. Eucych. n. 18, Jo.

Cantacuz. l. 50, Theocterictus in V. S. Nicæte, n. 43, quoted by Du Cange. Transferred improperly sometimes to the Præpositus or Prior, the lieutenant (so to say) of a monastery, Abbas Secundarius or Secundarius (Reg. S. Bened. 65; and see Sid. Apoll. vii. 17), the proper abbat being called by way of distinction Abbas Major (Conc. Aquisgr. A.D. 817 c. 31). Transferred also, in course of time, to non-monastic clerical offices, as e. g. to the principal of a body of parochial clergy (i. the Abbas, Custos, or Rector, as distinguished from ii. the Presbyter or Cypellanus, and iii. the Sacrista; Ughelli, Ital. Sac. vii. 506, ap. Du Cange); and to the chief chaplain of the king or emperor in camp under the Carolingians, Abbas Castrensis, and to the Abbas Curiae at Vienne (Du Cange); and in later times to a particular cathedral official at Toledo (Beyerlinck, Magn. Theatrum, s. v. Abbas), much as the term cardinal is used at our own St. Paul's; and to the chief of a deced of choristers at Anicia, Abbas Clericorum (Du Cange); and later still to the abbat of a religious confraternity, as of St. Yvo at Paris in 1350 and another in 1362 (Id.). Adopted also for purely secular and civil officers, Abbas Populi at Genoa, and again of the Genoese in Galta (Jo. Pachym. xiii. 27), of Guilds at Milan and Decurions at Brixia; and earlier still, Palatii, Clocherii, Campanis, Scholaris, Eschifardorum (Du Cange); and compare Dante (Purgat. xxvi.), Abate del Collegio. Usurped in course of time by lay holders of monasteries under the system of commendation [COMMENDA], Abbas Protector, Abbas Latus, Archibbas, Abba-[or Abbi]-Canon, denominated by a happy equivocation in some papal documents Abbas Irregularis; and giving rise in turn to the Abbas Legitimus or Monasticus (Scrm. de Tuncat. S. Quintin., np. Du Cange), as a name for the abbat proper (sometimes it was the Decani, Cottin. Aimon. c. 42; and in Culdee Scotland in the parallel case it was a Prior) who took charge of the spiritual duties. Lastly, perverted altogether in later days into a mock title, as Abbas Lavitine, Juvenum, Fatuorum, or again Abbas Beguorum (of freshmen, or "Yellow Benks," at the university of Paris), or Comardorum or Comardorum (an equally unruly club of older people elsewhere in France), until "in vitium libertas exidit et vim dignam lege regi," and the mock abbats accordingly "held their peace" perforce (Du Cange).

The abbat, properly so called, was elected in the beginning by the bishop of the diocese out of the monks themselves (with a vague right of assent on the part of the people also, according to Du Cange); a right confirmed at first by Justinian (Novell. v. c. 9, A.D. 534-565); who, however, by a subsequent enactment transferred it to the monks, the abbat elect to be confirmed and formally blessed by the bishop (Novell. exxiii. c. 34). And this became the common law of Western monasteries also (Reg. S. Bened. A.D. 530, c. 64; Conc. Carthag., A.D. 525, in die Ista; Greg. M., Epist. ii. 41, iii. 23, viii. 15; Theodor., Poenit. II. vi. 1 in Wassersch. p. 207; Pseudo-Egbert, Poenit. Add. in Thorpe, ii. 235, &c.);—"Fratres elegant sibi abbatem," Aldhelm ap. W. Malm., De G. P. v. p. 111), confirmed in time by express enactment (Capit. Car. M. et Lud. Pil. l. vi., A.D. 816),—"Quomodo (monachus) ex se ipsis sibi eligendi abbates licentiam dederimus;"—Urban. Pap. ap. Gratian, cap. Alien. caus. 12.

qu. 2; and so also cap. Quoniam Dist. lxx.—enforcing the episcopal benediction, from Conc. Nicæan. ii., A.D. 787, c. 14. So also Council of Cealchyth, A.D. 785, c. 5 (monks to elect from of their own monastery, or another, with consent of bishop), but Council of Beanceld, A.D. 694, and of Cealchyth, A.D. 816 (bishop to elect abbat or abbes with consent of the "family"). And forms occur accordingly, in both Eastern and Western Pontificals, for the Benedicito respectively of an Hegumenos, or of an Abbas, both Monachorum and Canonico-rum, and of an Abbatissa (see also Theodor., Poenit. II. iii. 5, in Wasserschl. p. 204, &c.; and a special form for the last named, wrongly attributed to Theodore, in Collier's Records from the Ordo Rom., and with variations, in Gerbert). An abbat of an exempt abbey (in later times) could not resign without leave of the Pope (c. Si Abbatem, Bonif. VIII. in Scet. Iner. I. vi. 36); and was to be confirmed and blessed by him (Matt. Par. in an. 1257). A qualification made in the Benedictine Rule, allowing the choice of a minority if theirs were the sanis consilium, necessarily became a dead letter from its impracticability. Bishops, however, retained their right of institution if not nominated in Spain in the 7th century (Conc. Châlons-sur-Marne so late as the time of St. Bernard (Epist. 58). See, however, Caus. xviii., Qu. 2. The nomination by an abbat of his successor, occurring sometimes in special cases (e.g. St. Bruno), and allowed under restrictions (Conc. Cabilon. ii., A.D. 650, c. 12; Theodor., Capit. Davier. c. 71, in Wasserschl. p. 151), was exceptional, and was to be so managed as not to interfere with the general right of the monks. So also the founder's like exceptional nominations, as e.g. those made by Aldhelm or Wilfrid. The interference of kings in such elections began as a practice with the system of commendation; but in royal foundations, and as suggested and promoted by feudal ideas, no doubt existed earlier. The consent of the bishop is made necessary to an abbat's election, "ubi jussio Regis fuerit," in A.D. 794 (Conc. Francof. c. 17). The bishop was also to quash an unfit election, under the Benedictine rule, and (with the neighbouring abbats) to appoint a proper person instead (Reg. Ben. 64).

Once elected, the abbat held office for life, unless canonically deprived by the bishop; but the consent of his fellow-presbyters and abbats is made necessary to such deprivation by the Council of Tours (Conc. Turon. ii., A.D. 567, c. 7; so also Excerpt. Pseudo-Epiberti, 65, Thorpe ii. 107). And this, even if incapacitated by sickness (Hincmar ad Corbiens., ap. Flodond. iii. 7). Triennial abbats (and abesses) were a desperate expedient of far later popes, Innocent VIII. (A.D. 1484-1492) and Clement VII. (A.D. 1523-1534).

Like all monks (Hieron., ad Rustic. 95; Cassinian., Collat. v. 26; Caus. xvi. qu. 1, c. 40; Dist. xciii. c. 5), the abbat was originally a layman ("Abbas potest esse, et non presbyter: laicus potest esse abbas;" Jo. de Turreerem., sup. Dist. lxx.). and accordingly ranked below all orders of clergy, even the Ostiaris (Dist. xciii. c. 5). In the East, Archimandrites appear to have become either deacons at least, or commonly priests, before the close of the 5th century

bishops, although unloosean (Baed., H. E., iii. 4, v. 24). And clerical abbats (episcopal indeed first, in Ireland, and afterwards presbyteral—see Todd's St. Patrick, pp. 88, 89) seem to have been always the rule in Wales, Ireland, and Scotland. In Ireland, indeed, abbats were so identified with not presbyters only but bishops, that the Pope is found designated as "Abbat of Rome" (Todd's St. Patrick, 156). Most continental abbats, however (and even their Præpositi and Decani) appear to have been presbyters by A.D. 817. These officers may bestow the benediction ("quoniam presbyteri non sint"; Conc. Agripp., A.D. 817, c. 62). All were ordered to be so, but as yet inefficiently, A.D. 820 (Conc. Rom., c. 27). And the order was still needed, but was being speedily enforced by custom, A.D. 1078 (Conc. Pict., c. 7: "Ut abbates et decani [aliter abbates diaconi] qui presbyteri non sunt, presbyteri fiant, ut prælationes amittant").

A bishop-abbat was forbidden in a particular instance by a Council of Toledo (xii., A.D. 681, c. 4), but permitted subsequently as (at first) an exceptional case at Lobes near Liège, about A.D. 700, (conjecturally) missionary purposes among the still heathen Flemish (D'Achery, Spicil., ii. 730); a different thing, it should be noted, from bishops resident in abbeys under the abbat's jurisdiction ("Episcopi monachi," according to a very questionable reading in Baed., H. E., iv. 5), as in Ireland and Albanian Scotland, and in several continental (mostly exempt) abbeys (St. Denis, St. Martin of Tours, &c.), and both at this and at later periods in exempt abbeys generally (Du Cange, voc. Episcopi Vagantes: Todd's St. Patrick, 51 sq.); although in some of these continental cases the two plans seem to have been interchanged from time to time, according as the abbat happened to be either himself a bishop, or merely to have a monk-bishop under him (Martene and Durand, Thes. Nov. Anecd., i. Præf. giving a list of Benedictine Abbatial bishops; Todd, ib.). In Wales, and in the Scottish sees in Anglo-Saxon England (e.g. Lindisfarne), and in a certain sense in the monastic sees of the Augustinian English Church, the bishop was also an abbat; but the latter office was here appended to the former, not (as in the other cases) the former to the latter. So, too, "Antistes et abbates," in Sidon. Apoll. (xvi. 114), speaking of two abbats of Lerins, who were also Bishops of Riez. Possibly there were unloosean bishop-abbats in Welsh abbeys of Celtic date (Rees, Welsh SS., 182, 266). Abbats sometimes acted as chorëpiscopi in the 9th century: v. Du Cange, voc. Chorëpiscopus. The abbats also of Catania and of Monreale in Sicily at a later period were always bishops (diocesan), and the latter shortly an archbishop, respectively by privilege of Urban II., A.D. 1086-1099, and from A.D. 1176 (Du Cange). So also at Fulda and Corvey in Germany.

We have lastly an abbat who was also ex officio a cardinal, in the case of the Abbat of Clugny, by privilege of Pope Calixtus II., A.D. 1119 (Hug. Mon. ad Fontium Abb. Clun., ap. Du Cange).

The natural rule, that the abbat should be chosen from the seniors, and from those of the monastery itself (Reg. S. Serap., 4, in Holsten, p. 15), became in time a formal law (Decret. Bonif. VIII. in 6 de Elect.—Abbat to be an already professed monk; Capit. Car. M. et Lud.

Pii, l. tit. 81, "ex seipsis," &c., as above quoted, Concil. Rotom., A.D. 1074, c. 10); although the limitation to one above twenty-five years old is no earlier than Pope Alexander III. (Conc. Lateran., A.D. 1179). In the West, however, the rule was, that "Fratres eligunt sibi abbates de ipsis si habent, sin autem, de extraneis" (Theodor., Capit. Duch., c. 72, in Wasserschlag, p. 151; and so also St. Greg., Epist., li. 41, viii. 15); while in the East it seems to be spoken of as a privilege, where an abbat, having no fit monk of its own, might choose a ξερικοποιτης—consecrated elsewhere (Leunclav. Jus Græco-Rom., p. 222).

Repeated enactments prove at once the rule of one abbat to one monastery, and (as time went on) its common violation (Hieron. ad Austic., 95; Reg. S. Serap., 4, and Regulæ passim; Conc. Venetic., A.D. 465, c. 8; Agath., A.D. 506, cc. 38, 57; Ejourn., A.D. 517, cc. 9, 10; and so, in the East, Justinian, l. l. tit. iii.; De Episc., l. 39; and Balsamon ad Novocan., tit. l. c. 20—"Si non permittitur alicui ut sit clericus in duabus ecclesiis, nec præfectus seu abbas duobus monasteriis præerit"). No doubt such a case as that of Wilfrid of York, at once founder and Abbat of Hexham and Ripon, or that of Allhelm, Abbat at once (for a like reason) of Malmesbury, Frome, and Bradford, was not so singular as it was in their case both intelligible and excusable. The spirit of the rule obviously does not apply, either to the early clusters of monasteries under the Rule of St. Pachomius, or to the tens of thousands of monks subject to the government of e.g. St. Macarius or St. Serapion, or to the later semi-hierarchical quasi-jurisdiction, possessed as already mentioned by the Abbats of St. Dalmatius, of Monte Cassino, or of Clugny, and by Benedict of Aniana, Generals of Orders, and more compact organization of the whole of an Order into a single body, belong to later times.

The abbat's power was in theory paternal, but absolute—"Timeas ut dominum, diligas ut patrem" (Reg. S. Alucar., 7, in Holsten, p. 25; and Regulæ passim). See also St. Jerome. Even to act without his order was culpable (Reg. S. Basil.). And to speak for another who hesitated to obey was itself disobedience (Reg. passim). The relation of monk to abbat is described as a libera servitus (Reg. S. Orsics., 19, in Holsten, p. 73); while no monk (not even if he was a bishop, Baed., H. E., iv. 5) could exchange monasteries without the abbat's leave (Reg. passim), not even (although in that case it was sometimes allowed) if he sought to quit a laxer for a stricter rule (Reg. P. P., 14, in Holsten, p. 23; Gild. ap. MS. S. Gall., 243, pp. 4, 155); unless indeed he fled from an excommunicated abbat (Gild. ib., p. 155, and in D'Ach., Spicil., i. 500). In later times, and less civilized regions, it was found necessary to prohibit an abbat from blinding or mutilating his monks (Conc. Francof., A.D. 794, c. 18). The rule, however, and the canons of the Church, limited this absolute power. And each Benedictine abbat, while bound exactly to keep St. Benedict's rule himself (e.g. Conc. Augustod., c. A.D. 670), was enjoined also to make his monks learn it word for word by heart (Conc. Aquisgr., A.D. 817, cc. 1, 2, 80). He was also limited practically in the exercise of his authority (1) by the system of Præpositi or Priors, elected usually by himself, but "consilio et voluntate fra-

A.D. 633, c. 51); one in a Benedictine abbey, but in the East sometimes two, one to be at home, the other superintending the monks abroad (Reg. Orient. 2, in Holsten, p. 89); and under the Rule of Pachomius one to each subordinate house; a system in some sense revived, though with a very different purpose, in the Priores non Conventuales of the dependent Obedientiae, Cellae, &c., of a later Western Abbey; and (2) by that of Decani and Centenarii, elected by the monks themselves (Hieron. ad Exet. ch. Epist. xviii.; Reg. Mon. ch. in Append. ad Hieron. Opp. V.; Reg. passim; see also Baed. II. E. ii. 2), through whom the discipline and the work of the monastery were administered. He was limited also from without by episcopal jurisdiction, more efficiently in the East (Conc. Chalced., A.D. 451, c. 4, 8, &c. &c.; and so Balsam, ad Nomocan. tit. xi., "Episcopis inquis subjecti monachi quam monasteriorum praefectis"), but in theory, and until the 11th century pretty fairly in fact, in the West likewise (Reg. S. Bened.; Conc. Agath., A.D. 506, c. 38; Arculfon. l. A.D. 511, c. 19; Epau., A.D. 517, c. 19; Hierol. A.D. 524, c. 3; Arculf. v., A.D. 554, cc. 2, 3, 5; and later still, Conc. Tull., A.D. 859, c. 9; Patonag., A.D. 878, c. 10; Augustin., A.D. 952, c. 6; and see also Greg. M. Epist., vii. 12; x. 14, 33; Hiacmar, as before quoted; and Conc. Paris. A.D. 615; Tolet. iv. A.D. 633; Chilidon. l. A.D. 650; Herulf., A.D. 673, c. 3, in Baed. II. E. iv. 3, among others, putting restrictions upon episcopal interference). The French Ebert in England (Excerpt. 63-65, Thorpe, ii. 106, 107). Cassian, however, in the West, from the beginning, bids monks beware above all of two sorts of folk, women and bishops (De Institut. Coenob. xi. 17). And although exemptions, at first merely defining or limiting episcopal power, but in time substituting immediate dependence upon the Pope for episcopal jurisdiction altogether, did not grow into an extensive and crying evil until the time of the Councils of Rheims and of Rome, respectively A.D. 1119 and 1122, and of the self-denying ordinances of the Cistercians (Chart. Christ. in Ann. Cisterc. i. 109) and Premonstratensians, in the years A.D. 1119, 1120, repudiating such privileges but with a sadly short-lived virtue, and of the contemporary remonstrances of St. Bernard (Lit. 3 De Consil., and Epist. 7, 42, 179, 180); yet they occur in exceptional cases much earlier. As e. g. the adjustment of rights between Faustus of Lerins and his diocesan bishop at the Council of Arles, c. A.D. 456 (which secured to the abbat the jurisdiction over his lay monks, and a veto against the ordination of any of them, leaving all else to the bishop, Mansi, vii. 907), a parallel privilege to Agaune (St. Maurice in the Valais), at the Council of Châlons A.D. 579, and privilegia of Popes, as of Honorius I. A.D. 628 to Bobbio, and of John IV. A.D. 641 to Luxeuil (see Marculf., Formul. lib. l. § 1; and Mabilly. Ann. Bened. xiii. no. 11, and Append. n. 18). Even exempt monasteries in the patriarchate, were subject to the visitatorial powers of regular officials called Exarchi Monasteriorum (Balsam. in Nomocan. i. 20; and a form in Greek Pontificals for the ordination of an exarch, V. bert., Archierat., Pontif. Græc. observ. i. ad Edi.

pro Archimandrit. pp. 570, 587), exercised sometimes through the Defensores Ecclesiarum; and even to visitations by the emperor himself (Justinian, Noveil. cxxxiii., cc. 2, 4, 5). The Rule of Pachomius also qualified the abbat's power by a council of the Majores Monasterii, and by a tribunal of assessors, viri sancti, 5, 10, or 20, to assist in administering discipline (Reg. S. Pach. 167, in Holsten, p. 49). And the Rule of St. Benedict, likewise, compelled the abbat, while reserved to him the ultimate decision, to take counsel with all the brethren (Juniors expressly included) in greater matters, and with the Seniores Monasterii in smaller ones (Reg. S. Bened. 2, 3). The Rule of Columbanus gave him an unqualified autocracy.

The abbat was likewise limited in his power over abbey property, and in secular things, by his inability to interfere in person with civil suits; which led to the appointment of an Advocatus, Vicelonus, Oeconomus, Procurator (Cod. Can. Afric. A.D. 418 (2), c. 97; Justinian, lib. i. Cod. tit. 3, leg. 33, 42; Cod. Theodos. lib. ix. tit. 45, leg. 3; St. Greg. Epist. iii. 22; Conc. Nicaen. ii. A.D. 787, c. 11), revived with greater powers under the title of Advocatus Ecclesiae, or Monasterii, by Charlemagne (Capit. A.D. 813, c. 14; and Lothar., Capit. tit. iii. cc. 5, 9, 18, &c.); who from a co-ordinate, frequently proceeded to usurp an exclusive interest in the monastic revenues. The abbat also was required to give account of the abbey property to both king and bishop, by the Council of Vern (near Paris) A.D. 755; while neither abbat nor bishop separately could even exchange abbey lands in Anglo-Saxon England, but only by joint consent (Theodor., Poen. II. viii. 6, in Wasserschil. p. 208).

Within the abbey and its precincts, the abbat was to order all work, vestments, services (Reg. S. Bened. 47, 57; Regule passim); to award all punishments, even to excommunication (Reg. S. Bened. 24; Leidrad., Lugdun. Arch., ad Car. M. ap. Galland., xiii. 390, restoring to the Abbat of Insula Barbara, "potestatem ligandi et solvendi, uti habuerunt praedecessores sui"; Honorius III. cap. Dilecta, tit. de Major. et Obedientia, desiring a neighbouring abbat to excommunicate refractory nuns, because their abess could not; and see Bingham), or to the use of the "ferrum abscessionis" (Reg. S. Bened. 38). He was also to be addressed as "Domnus et Abbas" (p. 63). And while in the East he was specially commanded to cut with the other monks (Reg. P. P. 11, in Holsten, p. 23), the Rule of Benedict (56) appoints him a separate table "cum hospitibus et peregrinis," to which he might, in case there was room, invite any monk he pleased. The Council of Aix A.D. 817 (c. 27) tried to qualify this practice by bidding abbats "be content" with the food of the other monks, unless "propter hospitium," and some monasteries kept up a like protest in the time of Peter Damian and Peter the Venerable; but it continued to be the Western rule. He was ordered also to sleep among his monks by the Council of Frankfurt A.D. 794 (c. 13). The abbat was specially not to wear mitre, ring, gloves, or sandals, and in the West in the 10th and 11th centuries, and (vainly) then protested against by the Council of Poitiers A.D. 1100, and by St. Bernard (Epist. 42) and Peter of Doleis (Epist. 90; and see also Thom. Cantiprat., De Apibus, l. 6; Chron. Casin., iv. 78). But a mitre is said to have been granted to the Abbat of Bobbio by Pope Theodorus I. A.D. 643 (Bull. Casin., l. ii. 2), the next alleged case being to the Abbat of St. Savianus by Sylvester II. A.D. 1000. A staff, however, but of a particular form, and some kind of stockings ("baculum et peludes"), were the special insignia of an abbat in Anglo-Saxon England in the time of Theodore A.D. 668-690, being formally given to him by the bishop at his benediction (Poenit. II. iii. 5, in Wassersch., p. 204). And the staff was so everywhere. He was also to shave his head, and of course to be tonsured (Conc. Bituric., A.D. 1031, c. 7). His place of precedence, if an ordinary abbat, appears to have been finally fixed as immediately after bishops, among prælati, and before archdeacons (see, however, Decret. Greg. IX., lib. ii. tit. i. cap. Decernimus); but the list of our English convocations from Archbishop Kemp's Register A.D. 1452 (Wilk. I. xl. sq.), though following no invariable rule, appears usually to postpone the abbat and prior to the archdeacon. In Saxon England, he shared in like manner with the king (as did an abbas also) in the "wite" of a murderer "foreigner" (Laws of Ine, 23; Thorpe, l. 117). The abbat also was not named in the canon of the mass (Gavant. in Riv. Miss., p. iii. tit. 8; Macr. F.F., Hierolex., in Can. Missæ), except in the case of the abbat of Monte Cassino (Ang. a Nuce, in notis ad Leo. Ostiens., ii. 4). But an anniversary was allowed to be appointed for him on his death (e.g. Conc. Aquigr., A.D. 817, c. 73). He was forbidden (as were all monks, at least in France) to stand sponsor for a child (Conc. Autissiod., A.D. 578, c. 25; Greg. M., Epist., iv. 42), with a notable exception, however, in England, in the case of Abbat Robert of Mont St. Michel, godfather to King Henry II.'s daughter Eleanor (Rob. de Monte ad au., 1161), or to go to a marriage (Conc. Autissiod., 15); or indeed to go far from his monastery at all without the bishop's leave (Conc. Arcl., v. A.D. 554); or to go about with a train of monks except to a general synod (Conc. Aquigr., A.D. 817, c. 59). He of course could not hold property (although it was needful sometimes to prohibit his lending money on usury, Pseude-Egbert. Poenit. iii. 7, in Thorpe, ii. 199); neither could he dispose of it by will, even if it accrued to him by gift or heirship after he became abbat (Reg. PP., 2, in Holsten., p. 22); but if the heirship was within the 4th degree, he was exceptionally enabled to will the property to whom he pleased (Iustinian., lib. i. Cod. tit. de Episc. et Cler., c. 33). Further, we find bishops and archdeacons prohibited from seizing the goods of deceased abbats (Conc. Paris., A.D. 615; Cabillon., l. A.D. 650). And later wills of abbats in the West are sometimes mentioned and confirmed, but principally in order to secure to their abbays property bequeathed to those abbays (see Thomassin). Privileges of coining money, of markets and tolls, or secular jurisdiction, began certainly as early as Laliof. Plus, or even Pipin (Gieseler, ii. p. 255, notes 5, 6, Eng. Tr.). Others, such as of the title of prince, of the four Abates Imperii in Germany (viz., of Fulda—also ex officio the empress's chancellor—of Weissenberg, Kempten, Murbach), of the English mitred baronial abbats, and the like, and sumptuary laws limiting the number of their horses and attendants, &c., belong to later times. An abbat, however, might hunt in England (Laws of Can., in Thorpe, l. 429). An abbat, or an abbes, presiding over a joint house of monks and nuns, is noted by Theodore as a peculiar Anglo-Saxon custom—"Apud Græcos non est consuetudo viris feminas habere monachas, neque feminas viros; tamen consuetudinem istius provincie" (England) "non destrumimus" (Poenit. II. vi. 8, in Wassersch., p. 208). The well-known cases of the Abbesses Hilda and Aelfeld of Whitby and of Aebba of Coldingham are instances of the latter arrangement (Bæd. II. E. iv. 23, 24, 25, 26); and the last of them also of its mischievousness (Id. ib., 25). Tynemouth and Wimbourne are other instances, but the practice was a Celtic one (e.g. St. Brigit; see Todd, St. Patrick, pp. 11, 12), not simply Anglo-Saxon; and with Celtic monastic missions, penetrated also into the Continent (e.g. at Remiremont and Poitiers), and even into Spain and into Rome itself (see Montalembert, Monks of West, vol. v. p. 297, Engl. Tr.). It is, however, remarkable, that while instances of abbesses ruling monks abounded, abbats ruling nuns rest for us upon the general assertion of Theodore. And the practice, while it died out on the Continent, was not restored in England after the Danish invasion. In the East there was a rigorous separation between monks and nuns. And where two such communities were in any way connected, a special enactment prohibited all but the two superiors from communication with one another, and placed all possible restrictions upon even their necessary interviews (Reg. S. Basil. in Holsten., p. 158). St. Pachomius established the double order, but put the Nile between his monks and his nuns (Pallad., Hist. Laus., cc. 30-42).

Interference by abbats with the ministrations of parochial clergy could scarcely exist until abbats were presbyters themselves, nor did it ever (as was naturally the case) reach the extent to which it was carried by the friars. We find, however, an enactment of Theodore (Poenit. II. vi. 16, in Wassersch., p. 209), prohibiting a monastery from imposing penances on the laity, "quia (hæc libertas) proprie clericorum est." And a much later and more detailed canon, of the 4th Lateran Council (A.D. 1123), forbids abbats to impose penance, visit the sick, or administerunction. They were authorized in the East, if presbyters, and with the bishop's leave, to confer the tonsure and the order of reader on their own monks (Conc. Nicaen. II. A.D. 787, c. 14). And they could everywhere admit their own monks ("ordinatio monachi")—Theodor., Poenit. II. iii. 3, in Wassersch., p. 204). Eat encroachments upon the episcopal office, as well as upon episcopal insignia, gradually arose. Even in A.D. 448 abbats were forbidden to give ἀποστολία (Conc. Constantin.,—corrected by Du Cange into ἐπιστολία—commendatory letters for poor, and see Conc. Aurelian. ii. c. 13, and Turon. ii. c. 6). But by A.D. 1123 it had become necessary to prohibit generally their thrusting themselves into episcopal offices (Conc. Lateran. iv. c. 17). And we find it actually asserted by Sever. Binius (in Canon. Apostol., ap. Labb., Conc., i. 54, on the authority of Bellarmino, De Eccles., iv. 8), that two or more "abbates infatati" might by Papal dispensation be substituted for bishops in consecrating a bishop, provided one bishop were there; while Innocent IV. in 1489 empowered an abbat by

The spiritual abbat was supplied in Wales (Giral. Camb., Itin. Camb., and repeatedly) and in Scotland (Robertson, Early Scotl. i. 329, 339), by the end of the 8th and so on to the 12th century, by the Advocatus Ecclesiae (confused sometimes with the Procurator, who in Welsh and Irish monasteries was a different officer, and managed the internal secular affairs, as the other did the external), called in Scotland Herenach, in Ireland Aicchinach, who was originally the lay, and gradually became also the hereditary, lessee of the Termon (or abbey) lands, being commonly the founder or his descendant, or one of the neighbouring lords; and who held those lands, receiving a third part of their value in the first instance, but who is found as an hereditary married lay abbat during the period named; e. g. Crinan, the Abbat of Dunkeld, who was grandfather of Shakspeare's Duncan, and one Duuchad, also Abbat of Dunkeld, who died in battle A.D. 961. The case was the same at Abernethy and at Applecross. The spiritual duties devolved upon the bishop and a prior. See also Du Cange (voc. Advocatus), for a similar process although to a less degree on the Continent. In Ireland, the Conarb, or similar hereditary abbat (or bishop), retained his spiritual character (Todd, St. Patrick, pp. 155 sq.). The lay abbats in Northumbria, denounced by Baeda (Epist. ad Ebert.), were simply fraudulent imitations of abbats in the proper sense of the word. An entirely like result, however, and to as wide an extent during Carolingian times as in Scotland, ensued abroad from a different cause, viz., from the system of commendation [COMMENDATA]; which began in the time of Charles Martel (A.D. 717-741, being approved by Conc. Lepiti. A.D. 743; Conc. Nussion., A.D. 744; and see Baron, in an. 889, n. 31), with the plausible object of temporarily employing monastic revenues for the pressing needs of warfare with Saracens, Saxons, or other heathens, care being taken to reserve enough to keep up the monastery proper. The nobleman, or the king himself, who led the troops thus raised, became titular abbat. And in Carolingian times, accordingly, most of the great Frank and Burgundian nobles and kings, and sometimes even bishops (e. g. Hatto of Mainz, A.D. 891-912, who enjoyed the reputation of holding twelve abbeys at once), were titular abbats of some great monastery, as of St. Denis or St. Martin, held for life or even by inheritance; the revenues of which were soon diverted to purposes less patriotic than that of supplying the king with soldiers (see a short list by way of specimen in Gieseler, ii. p. 411, note I, Eng. Tr.). In the East a like system appears to have grown up, although hardly from the same origin, some centuries later; John, Patriarch of Antioch, at the beginning of the 12th century, informing us that most monasteries in his time were handed over to laymen (χαρισματα = beneficiaria), for life or for two or three descents, by gift of the emperors; while Balsamon (ad Conc. Nicen. c. 13) actually condemns him for condemning the practice. Later abuses of the kind in the West, as in the time of Francis I. of France or of Louis XIV., need here be only alluded to.

In most points subject to the same laws as abbats, mulieris munitio—elective, and for life (triennial abbesses belonging to years so late as bishop—Benedictio Abbatissae (that for an abbess monasticum regulam profectum, capit. ex Canone Theodori Anflorum Episcopi, is in the Ordo Romanus, p. 164, Hiltorp); and in France restricted to one monastery apiece (Conc. Vern., A.D. 755); and with Præpositæ, and like subordinates, to assist them (Conc. Aquisgr., A.D. 816, lib. ii., cc. 24-26); and bound to obey the bishop in all things, whether abbesses of Monachæ or of Canonice (Conc. Cabillon. ii. A.D. 813, c. 65); and subject to be deprived for misconduct, but in this case upon report of the bishop to the king (Conc. Francof. A.D. 791); bound also to give account of monastic property to both king and bishop (Conc. Vern., A.D. 755); entitled to absolute obedience and possessed of ample powers of discipline, even to expulsion, subject however to the bishop (Conc. Aquisgr. A.D. 816, lib. ii.); and save only that while an abbat could, an abbess could not, excommunicate (Honorius III., cap. Plecta, tit. de Major. et Obedientia); neither could she give the veil or (as some in France appear to have tried to do) ordain (Capitul. Car. M. an. 789, c. 74, Auseg. 71); present even at Councils in England (see ABBAT, and compare Lingard, Antiq. i. 139; Kemble, Antiq. ii. 198; quoted by Montalembert, Monks of West, v. 230, Engl. Tr.). While, however, a bishop was necessary to admit and bless an abbat, Theodore ruled in England, although the rule did not become permanent, that a presbyter was sufficient in like case for an abbess (Poenit. II. iii. 4, in Wasserschll. c. 203). The limitation to forty years old at election is as late as the Council of Trent; Gregory abbess also was not to leave her monastery, in France, save once a year if summoned by the king with the bishop's consent to the king's presence upon monastic business (Conc. Vern. A.D. 755; Cabillon. ii. A.D. 813, c. 57). Neither was she even to speak to any man save upon necessary business, and then before witnesses and between the first hour of the day and evening (Conc. Cabillon. ii. A.D. 813, c. 55, 56). For the exceptional cases of Anglo-Saxon, Irish, or Continental Irish, abbesses ruling over mixed houses of monks and nuns, see ABBAT. It was noted also as a specially Western custom, that widows as well as virgins were made abbesses (Theod., Poenit. II. iii. 7, in Wasserschll. p. 204). [A. W. H.]

ABBAY. [MONASTERY.]

ABBUNA, the common appellation of the Bishop, Metran, or Metropolitan, of Axum, or Abyssinia, or Ethiopia, not a patriarch, but, on the contrary, appointed and consecrated always by the patriarch of Alexandria, and specially forbidden to have more than seven suffragan bishops under him, lest he should make himself, so, twelve bishops being held to be the lowest canonical number for the consecration of a patriarch. In a Council, if held in Greece, he occupied the seventh place, immediately after the prelate of Seleucia. (Ludolf, Hist. Ethiop. iii. 7.)

ABDON, ANDO or ANDUS, and SENNE, SENNE, or SENNIS, Persian princes, martyred at Rome under Decius, A.D. 250, are commemorated July 30 (Martyrologium Rom. Vet., Bedae, Adonis). Proper office in Gregorian Sacramentary, p. 116; and Antiphon in the Lib. Antiphon. p. 704.

It is related (Adonis Martyrol. iii. Kal. Aug.) that their relics were translated in the time of Constantine to the cemetery of Pontianus. There Bosio discovered a remarkable fresco, representing the Lord, seen from the waist upward emerging from a cloud, placing wreaths on the heads of SS. Abdon and Sennen (see woodcut). This is in front of the vault enclosing the supposed remains of the martyrs, which bears the inscription [DEPOSITIO]NIS DIE. The painting is, in Martigny's opinion, not earlier than the seventh century. It is remarkable that the painter has evidently made an attempt to represent the Persian dress. The saints wear pointed caps or hoods, similar to those in which the Magi are sometimes represented; cloaks fastened with a fibula on the breast; and tunics of skin entirely unlike the Roman tunic, and resembling that given to St. John Baptist in a fresco of the same cemetery in the same cemetery of Pontianus (Dottari, Sculture e Pitture, tav. xlv.). Similar figures may be found in Leibniz's treatise De Evangelio Apostolorum, pp. 121-126.

The gesture of the Lord, crowning the martyrs

for their constancy, is found also on the bottoms of early Christian cups (GLASS, CHRISTIAN), where He crowns SS. Peter and Paul, and other saints (Bionarroti, Vest. Antich. tav. xv. fig. 1, and elsewhere) and on coins of the Lower Empire the Lord is not unfrequently seen crowning two emperors. (Martigny, Dict. des Antich. chrétiennes.) [C.]

ABJURATION—denial, disavowal, or renunciation upon oath. Abjuration, in common ecclesiastical language, is restricted to the renunciation of heresy made by the penitent heretic on the occasion of his reconciliation to the Church. In some cases the abjuration was the only ceremony required; but in others it was followed up by the imposition of hands and byunction. The practice of the ancient Church is described by St. Gregory the Great in a letter to Quiricus and the bishops of Iberia on the reconciliation of the Nestorians. According to this, in cases in which the heretical baptism is imperfect, the rule was that the penitent should be baptized; but when it was complete, as in the case of the Arians, the custom of the Eastern Church was to reconcile by the Chrism; that of the Western, by the imposition of hands. As, however, the mystery of the Chrism was but the Oriental rite of Confirmation, the practice was substantially identical. (On the question of Re-baptism, see RE-BAPTISM, BAPTISM.) Converts from the Monophysites were received after simple confession, and the previous baptism was supposed to take effect "for the remission of sins," at the moment at which the Spirit was imparted by the imposition of hands; or the convert was reunited to the Church by his profession of faith (St. Greg. Ep. 9. 67). A similar rule is found down by the Quinisext Council, canon 95, which classes with the Arians, the Macedonians, Novatians and others, to be received with the Chrism. The Paulianists, Montanists, Encratians, and others, are to be re-baptized; to be received as Christians, on their profession, the first day, as Catechumens the second, and after they have been allowed a place in the Church as hearers for some time, to be baptized. In all cases, the profession of faith must be made by the presentation of a libellus, or form of abjuration, in which the convert renounced and anathematized his former tenets. After declaring his abjuration not to be made on compulsion, from fear or any other unworthy motive, he proceeded to anathematize the sect renounced, by all its names; the heresarchs, and their successors, past, present, and future; he then enumerated the trusts received by them, and, having repudiated them singly and generally, he ended with making profession of the true faith. ABLUTION. A term under which various kinds of ceremonial washing are included. The principal are the following: the washing of the head, as a preparation for unction in baptism, and the washing of the feet, which in some places formed part of the baptismal ceremony [BAPTISM]; the washing of the feet of the poor by exalted persons, which forms part of the ceremony of Maundy Thursday [FEET, WASHING OF]; the lustral ceremony which preceded entrance to a church [CANTHARUS; HOLY WATER]; and the washing of the priest's hands at certain points in the celebration of the liturgy [AQUAMANILE; HANDS, WASHING OF].

ABORTION.—The crime of procuring abortion is little, if at all, noticed in the earliest laws. It is a crime of civilization; the representative of the principle which in a barbarous state of society is infanticide. The oration of Lysias which was pronounced on occasion of a suit on this subject is lost, so that it cannot be decided whether the act was regarded by the Athenians as an offence against society, or merely as a private wrong. It is in the latter aspect that it is chiefly regarded in the civil law. The child unborn represents certain interests, and his life or death may be beneficial or injurious to individuals; thus, it may have been, that a father by his wife's crime, might lose the justitium liberorum. The case quoted from Cicero pro Cluentio (Dig. xlviii. 19, 39), in which a woman was condemned to death for having procured abortion, having been bribed by the second heir, is clearly exceptional. The only passage in the civil law in which the crime is mentioned without such connexion, is a sentence of Ulpian, in the Pandects (Dig. xlviii. 8, 8, ad legem Cornelianam de Sicariis), where the punishment is declared to be banishment. The horrible prevalence of the practice among the Romans of the Empire may be learned from Juvenal.

It was early made a ground of accusation by the Christians against the heathen. Tertullian denounces the practice as homicidal. "Prevention of birth is a precipitation of murder," Apol. ix. Minucius Felix declares it to be parricide.

The Council of Ancyra (A.D. 314) having mentioned that the ancient punishment was penance for life, proceeds to limit it to ten years; and the same space of time is given by St. Basil, who condemns the practice in two canons, ii. and viii., alleging the character of the crime as committed against both the mother and the offspring; and declining to accept the distinctions drawn by the lawyers between the degrees of criminality varying with the time of the gestation. The Council of Lerida (324) classes the crime with infanticide, but allows the mother to be received to Communion after seven years' penance even when her sin is complicated with adultery. The Council in Trullo condemns it to the penance of homicide. Pope Gregory III. in the next century reverts to the ten years' penance, although he differs from St. Basil in modifying the sentence to a single year in cases where the child has not been formed in the womb; this is based on Exod. xxi., and is countenanced by St. Augustine, in Questiones Exodi, in a passage incorporated by Gratian.

There is thus abundant evidence that the crime was held in extreme abhorrence, and punished with great severity, as pertaining to wilful murder, by the canons of the Church. By the Visigothic law (lib. VI. tit. iii. c. 1), the person who administered a draught for the purpose was punished with death. [D. B.]

ABRENTIATIO. [BAPTISM.]

ABSOLUTION (Lat. Absolutio). (For Sacramental Absolution, see EXOMOLOGESIS.)

1. A short deprecation which follows the Psalms of each Nocturn in the ordinary offices for the Hours. In this usage, the word "absolutio" perhaps denotes simply "ending" or "completion," because the monks, when the Nocturns were said at the proper hours of the night, broke off the chant at this point and went to rest (Macri Hierozelicon s. v.). In fact, of the "Absolutions" in the present Roman Breviary, only one (that "in Tertio Nocturno, et pro feria 1^a et Sabbato") contains a prayer for absolution, in the sense of a setting free from sin.

2. For the Absolution which follows the introductory Confession in most Liturgies and Offices, see CONFESSION.

3. The prayer for Absolution at the beginning of the office is, in Oriental Liturgies, addressed to the Son; but many of these liturgies contain a second "Oratio Absolutions," at some point between Consecration and Communion, which is addressed to the Father. For example, that in the Greek St. Basil (Rennuot, lit. Orient. i. 81), addressing God, the Father Almighty (ὁ Θεός, ὁ Πατήρ ὁ Παντοκράτωρ), and reciting the promise of the Keys, prays Him to dismiss, remit and pardon our sins (ἀνεῖ ἀφεῖ συγχώρησον ἡμῖν). Compare the Coptic St. Basil (ib. l. 22).

4. The word "Absolutio" is also applied to those prayers said over a corpse or a tomb in which remission of the sins of the departed is entreated from the Almighty. (Macri Hierozelicon, s. v.) [C.]

ABSTINENCE. Days of abstinence, as they are called, on which persons may take their meals at the ordinary hour, and eat and drink what they please, in any quantity so that they abstain from meat alone, belong to modern times. Anciently, fasting and abstinence went together, as a general rule, formed parts of the same idea, and could not be dis severed. There may have been some few, possibly, who ate and drank indiscriminately, when they broke their fast, as Socrates (v. 22, 10) seems to imply; but in general, beyond doubt, abstinence from certain kinds of food was observed on fasting days when the fast was over, "abstinentes ab iis, quae non rejicimus, sed differimus," as Tertullian says (De Jejun. 15). Thus it will be more properly considered under the head of fasting, to which it subserved.

ACATHISTUS (Gr. ἀκάθιστος). A hymn of the Greek Church, sung on the eve of the fifth Sunday in Lent, in honour of the Blessed Virgin, to whose intercession the deliverance of Constantinople from the barbarians on three several occasions was attributed. Meursius assigns its origin more especially to the deliverance of the city from Chosroes, king of the Persians, in the reign of the Emperor Heraclius (626). It is called ἀκάθιστος, because during the singing of it the whole congregation stood, while during the singing of other hymns of the same kind they occasionally sat. (Suicer's Thesaurus, s. v.; Neale's Eastern Ch. Intrad. 747; Daniel's Codex Liturg. iv. 223.)

Francis Junius wrongly supposed this use of the Acathistus to commemorate the journey of Mary and Joseph to Bethlehem. (Macri Hieroglyphicon, s. v.)

The word Acathistus is also used to designate the day on which the hymn was used. (Sabae Typicum, in Suicer, s. v.) [C.]

ACCENTUS ECCLESIASTICUS. One of the two principal kinds (accentus and concentus) of ecclesiastical music.

1. The consideration of this subject is encumbered by an especial difficulty—the popular, and now all but exclusive application of the word "accent" to emphasis, stress, or ictus. Accent, however, claims and admits of a much wider application. Ben Jonson* speaks of accent as being "with the ancients, a tuning of the voice, in lifting it up, or letting it down,"—a definition not only clear and concise, but thoroughly accordant with the derivation of the word "accent" from accino, i. e. ad cano, to sing to. We are all conscious of and affected by the varieties of accent^b (in this, its etymological and primitive acceptation) in foreign languages spoken by those to whom they are native, as well as in our native language spoken by foreigners, or (perhaps still more) by residents of parts of Great Britain other than our own. The Scottish, Irish, and various provincial accents, are not so much the result of different vocalization (i. e. utterance of vowel sounds) as of the different gradations in which the Scotch, Irish, and others, "tune their voices."

* English Grammar, 1640, chap. viii.

2. The Accentus Ecclesiasticus, called also modus choraliter legendi, is the result of successive attempts to ensure in Public Worship uniformity of delivery consistent with uniformity of matter delivered; so as, if not to obliterate, at least to hide individual peculiarities under the veil of a catholic "use." It presents a sort of mean between speech and song, continually inclining towards the latter, never altogether leaving its hold on the former; it is speech, though always attuned speech, in passages of average interest and importance; it is song, though always distinct and articulate song, in passages demanding more fervid utterance. Though actually musical only in concluding or culminating phrases, the Accentus Ecclesiasticus is always sufficiently isochronous: admit of its being expressed in musical characters, a process to which no attempt (and such attempts have been repeatedly made) has ever succeeded in subjecting pure speech.

3. Accentus is probably the oldest, as it is certainly the simplest, form of Cantus Ecclesiasticus. Like most art-forms and modes of operation which have subsequently commended themselves on their own account to our sense of beauty, it grew in all likelihood out of a physical difficulty. The limited capacity of the so-called "natural" or speaking voice must have been ascertained at a very early period; indeed its recognition is confirmed by the well-known practice whether of the ancient temple, theatre, or forum. The old rhetoricians, says Forkel, are, without exception, of the same way of thinking; and we may, from their extant works, confidently conclude, that neither among the Greeks nor the Romans was poetry ever recited but in a tone analogous to that since known as the accentus ecclesiasticus. The Abbe du Bos^c too has demonstrated that not only was the theatrical recitation of the ancients actually musical—"un veritable chant," susceptible of musical notation, and even of instrumental accompaniment—but that all their public discourses, and even their familiar language, though of course in a lesser degree, partook of this character.

4. The advantages resulting from the employment of isochronous sounds (sounds which are the result of equal-timed vibrations) would become apparent on the earliest occasion, when a single orator was called upon to fill a large auditorium, and to make himself intelligible, or even audible, to a large assembly. So, too, for simultaneous expression on the part of large numbers, these advantages would at once make themselves felt. In congregational worship a uniform (technically, a "unisonous") utterance might seem as essential, as conducive to the decency and order with which we are enjoined to do "all things," as is that still more essential uniformity expressed in the term Common Prayer, without which, indeed, congregational worship would seem to be impossible. "Accent," says Ornthoparcus, "hath great affinity with Convent, for they be Brothers: because Sonus, or Sound (the King of Ecclesiastical Harmony), is Father to them both, and begat one upon Grammar, the other upon Musik," &c. (He) "so divided his kingdom, that Conventus might be chief Ruler over all things that are to be sung, as Hymnes, Sequences, Antiphones, Responsories, Introitus, Tropes, and the like: and Accentus over all things which are read; as Gospels, Lectures, Epistles, Orations, Prophecies: For the functions of the Papale Kingdom are not duly performed without Convent," &c. "Hence it was that I, marking how many of those Priests (which by the leave of the learned I will say) doe reade those things they have to reade so wildly, so monstrously, so faultily (that they doe not only hinder the devotion of the faithful, but also even provoke them to laughter and scorning, with their ill reading), resolved after the doctrine of Convent to explico the rules of Accent; in as much as it belongs to a Justitian, that together with Convent, Accent might also as true heire in this Ecclesiastical Kingdom be established: Desiring that the praise of the highest King, to whom all honour and reverence is due, might duly be performed."*

5. The Accentus Ecclesiasticus, or modus charitater legendi, must have been perpetuated by tradition only, for many ages. That the rules for its application have been reduced to writing only in comparatively modern times does not in the least invalidate its claim to a high antiquity. On the contrary, it tends to confirm it. That which is extensively known and universally admitted has no need of verification. It is only when traditions are dying out that they begin to be put on record. So long as this kind of recitation was perfectly familiar to the Greeks and Romans there could be no necessity for "noting" it; not till it began to be less so were "accents" (the characters so called) invented for its preservation,—just as the "vowel-points" were introduced into Hebrew writing subsequently to the dispersion of the Jews. The force and accuracy of tradition, among those unaccustomed to the use of written characters, have been well ascertained and must be unhesitatingly admitted; their operation has certainly been as valuable in music as in poetry and history. Strains incomparably longer and more intricate than those now accepted as the ecclesiastical accents have been passed on from voice to voice, with probably but trifling alteration, for centuries, among peoples who had no other method of preserving and transmitting them.

6. The authorities for the application of the Cantus Ecclesiasticus are, as we have said, comparatively modern. Lucas Lossius,† a writer frequently quoted by Walthar, Kock, and other more recent musical theorists, gives six forms of cadence or close, i.e., notes of bringing to an end a phrase the earlier portion of which had been recited in monotone. According to Lossius, accent is (1) inmutabilis when a phrase is concluded without any change of pitch, i.e., when it is monotone throughout; (2) it is medius when on the last syllable the voice falls from the reciting note (technically the dominant) a third; (3) gravis, when on the last syllable it falls a fifth; (4) acutus, when the "dominant," after the interposition of a few notes at a lower pitch, is resumed; (5) moderatus, when the monotone is interrupted by an accent, on the penultimate, of a second; (6) interrogativus, when the voice, after a slight descent, rises scale-wise on the last syllable. To these six forms other writers add one more, probably of more recent adoption; (7) the finalis, when the voice, after rising a second above the dominant, falls scale-wise to the fourth below it, on which the last syllable is sounded. The choice of these accents or cadences is regulated by the punctuation (possible, if not always actual) of the passage recited; each particular stop had its particular cadence or cadences. Thus the comma (distinctio) was indicated and accompanied by the accentus inmutabilis, acutus, or moderatus; the colon (duo puncta) by the medius; and the full stop (unctum quadratum ante syllabam capitalem) by the gravis.

* Andreas Ornthoparcus, His Micrologus. Translated by John Dowland. 1608. p. 99.

ACCENTUS ECCLESIASTICUS 11

7. The following table, from Lossius, exhibits the several accents, in musical notation:—

(1) IMMUTABILIS.

LEE - ti - o E - pis - to - lae sanc - ti Pau - li.

(2) MEDIUS.

et o - pe - ra - tur vir - tu - tes in vo - bis.

(3) GRAVIS.

Be - ne - di - cen - tur in te - om - nes gen - tes.

(4) ACUTUS.

Cum sept - ri - tu coc - po - ri - tis nuc, Cum il - de - li.

(5) MODERATUS.

ex op - e - ri - bus legis an ex au - di - tu si - de - i?

(6) INTERROGATIVUS.

The examples given by Ornthoparcus are similar to the above, with two exceptions—(5) the Moderatus, which in 'His Micrologus' appears thus:

Il - lu - mi - na - re Je - ru - sa - lem.

And the Interrogativus, of which he says: "A speech with an interrogation, whether it have in the end a word of one syllable, or of two syllables, or more, the accent still falls upon the last syllable, and must be accented. Now the signs of such a speech are, who, which, what, and those which are thus derived, why, therefore, when, how, in what sort, whether, and such like."

Quantas ha-be-o in-i-qui-ta-tes et pec-ca-ta?

"To these are joyed verbes of asking; as, I aske, I seeke, I require, I searche, I haue, I see, and the like."

Some variations too from the above, in the present Roman use, are noticed by Mendelssohn: c. g. in the Gravis, where there the voice rises a tone above the dominant, on the penultimate, before falling:—

changing the cadence from a fifth (compare 5) to a sixth; and in the Interrogative, where the voice falls from the dominant (also on the penultimate) a third:—

To the accents belong the following forms, or portions of offices of the Latin Church: ^b (1) Tonus Collectarum seu Orationum. (2) Tonus Epistolarum et Evangelii, including the melodies to which the Possion is sung in Passion Week. (3) Tonus Lctionum solemnium et luperbis; Prophetiarum et Martyrologii. (4) Various forms of Intonation, Benediction, and Absolution used in the Liturgy. (5) Single verses. (6) The Exclamations and Admonitions of the assistants at the altar. (7) The Prefaces; the Pater Noster, with its Prefaces; the Benediction, Pax Domini sit semper vobis-um. [J. H.]

ACCESS. 1. The approach of the priest to the altar for the celebration of the Eucharist. Hence the expression "prayer of access" is used as equivalent to the Εὐχὴ τῆς παρασκευῆς, or prayer of the priest's presenting himself at the altar, in the Greek Liturgy of St. James (Neale's Eastern Church, Introduction, i. 360).

2. But the expression "prayer of access," or "prayer of humble access," is more commonly used by English liturgical writers to designate a confession of unworthiness in the sight of God, occurring at a later point of the service; generally between consecration and communion. So that the "prayer of humble access" corresponds to the "Prayer of Inclination" or "of bowing the neck" in the Greek Liturgies. Though words more expressive of "humble access" occur in other places; for instance, in the Greek St. James, where the priest declares: Ἰδοὺ προσ-ῆλθον τῷ θεῷ τούτῳ καὶ ἐπουρανίῳ μυστηρίῳ οὐχ ὡς ἄξιός ὑπάρχων (Daniel's Coder Lit., iv. 88); in the Mozarabic, "Accedam ad Te in humilitate spiritus mei" (Ib. i. 71); or in the "Domine et Deus noster, ne aspicias ad multitudinem peccatorum nostrorum" in the Liturgy of Adaeus and Maris (Ib. i. 176). wish or injunction; as, VIVAS IN DEO (Muratori, Thesaurus Vet. Inscr. 1954, no. 4). By far the greater part of these exclamations are sepulchral [EPITAPH], but similar sentences are also seen on AMULETS, on the bottoms of eggs [GLASS, CHRISTIAN] found in the Catacombs, and on GEMS. (See the Articles.)

2. The term acclamation is also sometimes applied to the responsive cry or chant of the congregation in antiphonal singing. Compare ACROSTIC (§ 5); ANTIPHON. [C.]

ACCUSERS, FALSE; HOW PUNISHED.—Those who made false accusations against any person were visited with severe punishments under the canons of several councils.

In Spain. The Council of Illiberis (A.D. 305 or 306) refused communion even at the hour of death ("in fine," al. "in finem") to any person who should falsely accuse any bishop, priest, or deacon (can. 75).

In France. By the 14th canon of the 1st Council of Arles (A.D. 314) those who falsely accuse their brethren were excommunicated for life ("usque ad exitum"). This canon was re-enacted at the 2nd Council held at the same city (A.D. 443), but permission was given for the restoration of those who should do penance and give satisfaction commensurate with their offence (can. 24). ACERRA or ACERNA. (The latter is possibly the original form, from Acer, maple.) Acerra designated, in classical times, either the incense-box used in sacrifices; or a small altar, or incense-burner, placed before the dead. (Smith's Dict. of Greek and Roman Antiquities, s. v.) And in ecclesiastical litinity also it designates either an incense-box or an incense-burner; "Arca thuris, vel thuribulum, vel thurarium." (Papias in Durange's Glossary s. v. 'Acerna').

It is used in the rubrics of the Gregorian sacramentary (Corbey MS.) in the office for the consecration of a church (p. 428); and in the office for the baptism of a bell (p. 438); in the latter in the form Acerna: "tunc ponens incensum in acerna." In both cases it designates an incense-burner or THURIBULUM (q. v.). [C.]

ACHAICUM CONCILIJUM.—Two synods of Achaia, in Greece, are recorded: one, A.D. 250, against the Valesians, who, like Origen, interpreted St. Matth. xix. 12, literally; the other, in 330, against the followers of Aetius. [A. W. H.]

ACOEMETAE, lit. the "sleepless" or "un-resting" (for the theological or moral import of the term v. Suicer, Thesaur. Ecol., s. v.), a so-called order of monks established in the East about the middle, rather than the commencement, of the 5th century, being altogether unnoticed by Soerates and Sozomen, the latter a zealous chronicler of monks and monasteries, who bring their histories down to A.D. 440; yet mentioned by Evagrius (ii. 19) as a regularly established order in 483. Later authorities make their founder to have been a certain officer of the imperial household at Constantinople named Alexander, who quitted his post to turn monk, and after having had to shift his quarters in Syria several times, at length returned to Constantinople, to give permanence to the system which he had already commenced on the Euphrates. The first monastery which he founded there was situated near the church of St. Mennas. It was composed of 300 monks of different nations, whom he divided into six choirs, and arranged so that one of them should be always employed in the work of prayer and praise day and night without intermission all the year round. This was their peculiar characteristic—and it has been copied in various ways elsewhere since then—that some part of "the house," as Wordsworth (Excurs., viii. 185) expresses it, "was evermore watching to God." Alexander having been calumniated for this practice as heretical, he was imprisoned, but regained his liberty, and died, say his biographers, about A.D. 430—it might be nearer the mark to say 450—in a new convent of his own founding on the Dardanelles. Marcellus, the next head of the order but one, brought all the zeal and energy to it of a second founder; and he doubtless found a powerful supporter in Gennadius, patriarch of Constantinople, A.D. 458-71, a great restorer of discipline and promoter of learning amongst the clergy. Then it was that Studius, a noble Roman, and in process of time consul, emigrated to Constantinople, and converted one of the churches there, dedicated to St. John the Baptist, into the celebrated monastery bearing his name, but which he peopled with the Acoemetae. There was another monastery founded by St. Dios, in the reign of Theodosius the Great, that also became theirs sooner or later, to which Valens (Ad. Evag., iii. 19 and 31) adds a third founded by St. Bassianus, it may have been owing to their connexion with Studius that they were led to correspond with the West. At all events, on the acceptance by Acaclus, the patriarch succeeding Gennadius, of the Henoticon of the emperor Zeno, and communion with the schis-matic patriarch of Alexandria, their "hegumen," or president, Cyril lost no time in despatching complaints of him to Rome; nor were their emissaries slow to accuse the legates of the Pope themselves of having, during their stay at Constantinople, held communion with heretics. The ultimate result was, that the two legates, Vitalis and Misenus, were deprived of their sees, and Acaclus himself excommunicated by the Popes Simplicius and Felix. Meanwhile one who had been expelled from their order, but had learnt his trade in their monasteries, Peter the Fuller, had become schismatic patriarch of Antioch, and he, of course, made common cause with their opponents. Nor was it long before they laid themselves open to retaliation. For, under Justinian, their ardour impelled them to deny the celebrated proposition, advocated so warmly by the Scythian monks, hesitated about so long at Rome, that one of the Trinity had suffered in the flesh. Their denial of this proposition threw them into the arms of the Nestorians, who were much interested in having it decided in this way. For if it could be denied that one of the Trinity had suffered, it could not be maintained, obviously, hence, on the Trinity had become incarnate. Cyrus and Eulogius, to Rome to defend their bishops thither, Hypatius and Demetrius, to denounce them to the Pope (Papal ad Baron., A.D. 533, n. 2). In short, in a letter, of which they were the bearers, to John II., afterwards inserted by him in Lib. I. Tit. "De summâ Trinitate" of his Code, he himself expressed his favouring Judaism and the Nestorian heresy. The Pope in his reply seems to admit their herodoxy, but he entreats the emperor to forgive them at his instance, should they be willing to abjure their errors and return to the unity of the Church. With what success he interceded for them we are not told. During the iconoclastic controversy they seem to have shared exile with the rest of the monks ejected from their monasteries by Constantine Copronymus (Papal ad Baron., A.D. 798, n. 2); but under the empress Irene of Stulium, at all events, was re-peopled with his former alumni by the most celebrated of them all, Theodore, in whose surname, "Studites," it has perhaps achieved a wider celebrity than it ever would otherwise have possessed.

In the West a branch of the order long held the abbey of St. Maurice of Agaune in Valais, where they were established by Sigismund, king of Burgundy, and had their institute confirmed by a Council held there A.D. 523. For fuller details see Bonanni's Hist. du Clerg. soc. et reg., vol. ii. p. 153 et seq. (Amsterdam, 1716); Bulteau's Hospin, De Orig. Monach., iii. 8; Du Fresnoy, *Gloss. ACOLYTES--ACOLYTHS--ACOLYTHISTS ("Ακόλυθοι). One of the minor orders peculiar to the Western Church, although the name is Greek. In the Apostolic age, the only order which existed, in addition to those of bishops, priests, and deacons, was that of deaconesses—widows usually at first, who were employed in such ministrations towards their own sex as were considered unsuitable for men, especially in the East. But about the end of the 2nd or early in the 3rd century, other new officers below the order of the deacons were introduced, and amongst them this of Acolytes, though only in the Latin Church as a distinct order. In the rituals of the Greek Church the word occurs only as another name for the order of sub-deacon.

The institution of the minor orders took its origin in the greater Churches, such as Rome and Carthage, and was owing partly to the supposed expediency of limiting the number of deacons to seven, as first appointed by the apostles, and partly to the need which was felt of assistance to the deacons in performing the lower portions of their office; of which functions, indeed, they appear in many cases to have been impatient, regarding them as unworthy of their important position in the Church. Tertullian is the earliest writer by whom any of the inferior orders is mentioned. He speaks of Readers, De Præscr. c. 41. It is in the epistles of Cyprian that the fuller organization of these orders comes before us (Epp. xxix., xxxviii., lxxv., &c.). It is also stated by his contemporary Cornelius, Bishop of Rome, that the Church of Rome at that time numbered forty-six presbyters, seven deacons, seven sub-deacons, forty-two acolytes, and fifty-two exorcists, readers, and doorkeepers (Ostiarii). None of these inferior orders, according to St. Basil, were ordained with imposition of hands, but they were simply appointed by the bishop with some appropriate ceremony, to certain subordinate functions of the ministry such as any Christian layman might be commissioned by episcopal authority to perform. The form of ordination employed in the case of Acolytes is thus prescribed by a canon of the 4th Council of Carthage. "When any Acolythist is ordained, the bishop shall inform him how he is to behave himself in his office; and he shall receive a candlestick with a taper in it, from the archdeacon, that he may understand that he is appointed to light the candles of the church. He shall also receive an empty pitcher to furnish wine for the Eucharist of the blood of Christ." Hence it appears that the Acolyte's office at that period consisted chiefly in two things, viz, lighting the candles of the church and attending the officiating priest with wine for the Eucharist.

The Acolyte of the ancient Western Church is represented in the later Roman communion by the Cerotarius or taper-bearer, whose office consists in walking before the deacons or priests with a lighted taper in his hand.

Both in the East and West the minor orders of ancient times were afterwards conferred as merely introductory to the sacred orders of deacon and presbyter, while the duties which had formerly belonged to them were performed by laymen. In the 7th century the readers and singers in the Armenian Church were laymen—in the 8th century the readers, and in the 12th the estiarri and exorcists were laymen in the Greek Church. Before the year 1300 the four orders of acolyte, exorcist, reader, and ostiarius began to be conferred at the same time in the Western Churches. Not long afterwards it became customary to release the clerks thus ordained from discharging the duties of their orders, which were entrusted to lay clerks. The Councils of Cologne and Trent vainly endeavoured to alter this custom; and laymen continue generally to perform the offices of the ancient orders in the Roman churches to the present day. In England the same custom has prevailed; and the minor orders having for some centuries become merely titular, were dissolved in the Reformation of our Churches.

Fuller information on the subject of the minor orders may be found in Field's Book of the Church, b. v. c. 25; Bingham's Antiquities, b. iii.; Thomassin, Vet. et Nov. Eccl. pars 1, lib. ii. See also Robertson's History of the Church and Palmer's Treatise on the Church of Christ. [D.B.]

ACROSTIC. (Ἀκροστιχίς, ἀκροστιχίον, ἀκροστιχίον, Acrostichis.) A composition in which the first letters of the several lines form the name of a person or thing. The invention is attributed to Epicharmus.

We find several applications of the Acrostic principle in Christian antiquity.

1. The word Acrostic is applied to the well-known formula ΙΧΘΥΣ. [See ΙΧΘΥΣ.]

2. Verses in honour of the Saviour were frequently written in the acrostic form; Pope Damasus, for instance, has left two acrostics on the name Jesus (Chrm. iv. nad v.), the former of which runs as follows:

"In rebus tantis Trina conjunctio mundi Erigit humanum sensum laudare veniste;
Sola satis nobis, et mundi summa potestas
Veni peccati nodum dissolvere fructu.
Summa salus cunctis nituit per sæcula terris."

The same pope, to whom so many of the inscriptions in the Catacombs are due, composed an acrostic inscription in honour of Constantia, the daughter of Constantine. This was originally placed in the apse of the basilica of St. Agnes in the Via Nomentana, and may be seen in Bosio, Roma Subterranea, p. 118. And inscriptions of this kind are frequent. Lest the reader should miss the names indicated, an explanation of the acrostic principle is sometimes added to the inscription itself. For instance, to the epitaph of Licinia, Leontia, Ampelia, and Flavia (Muratori, Thesaurus Novus, p. 1903, no. 5) are added these verses, which give the key:

"Nomina sanctorum, lector, si forte requiris, Ex omni versu te litera prima docuit."

So the epitaph of a Christian named Agatha (Murini, Fratelli Areali, p. 828), ends with the words, "ejus autem nomen capita ver[sum]"; and another, given by the same authority, ends with the words, "Is ejus per capita versorum nomen declaratur." Fabretti (Inscript. Antiq. iv. 150) gives a similar one, "Revertere per capita versorum et invenies pium nomen." Gazzera (Iscrizione del Visconte, p. 91) gives the epitaph of Eusebius of Vercelli, in which the first letters of the lines form the words EVSEBIUS EPISCOPVS ET MARTYR; and another acrostic epitaph (p. 114), where the initial letters form the words CELSVS EPISCOPVS (Martigny, Dict. des Antiq. Chret. 11).

We also find acrostic hymns in Greek. Several of the hymns of Cosmas of Jerusalem, are of this kind; the first, for instance (Gallandi, Bibliotheca Pat. xiii. 234), is an acrostic forming the words, Χριστός Ἰσοϋσθεὶς ἦν ὁπρὸς Θεοῦ μόνον.

ACROTELEUTIC

In order, form another class of acrostics. Such is the well-known hymn of Sedulius. "A solis ortus cardine," a portion of which is introduced in the Roman offices for the Nativity and the Circumcision of the Lord; and that of Venantius Fortunatus (Carm. xvi.), which begins with the words "Agnoscat omne saeculum." St. Augustine composed an Abecedarian Psalm against the Donatists, in imitation of the 119th, with the constant response, "Omnes qui gaudetis de pace, modo verum iudicate."

4. A peculiar use of the acrostic is found in the Office-books of the Greek Church. Each Canon, or series of TROPARIA, has its own acrostic, which is a metrical line formed of the initial letters of the Troparia which compose the Canon. To take the instance given by Dr. Neale (Eastern Church, Introd. p. 832); the acrostic for the Festival of SS. Proclus and Hilarius is,

Σταυροῖς ἀληθραῖς σεπτόν εἰσέρχομαι μέλος.

The meaning of this is, that the first Troparion of the Canon begins with Σ, the second with Ε, and so on. These lines are generally iambic, as in the instance above; but occasionally Hexameter, as,

Τὸν Νικηφόρον ὡς νικηφόρον ἄσμασι μέλω.

They frequently contain a play on the name of the Saint of the day, as in the instance just given, and in for St. Dorotheus of Tyre. The Troparia are sometimes, but rarely, arranged so as to form an alphabetic acrostic, as on the Eve of the Transfiguration (Neale, u. s.).

5. The word ἀκροστιχία, in the Apostolical Constitutions (ii. 57, § 5) denotes the verses, or portions of a verse, which the people were to sing responsively to the chanter of the Psalm, "ὁ λαὸς τὰ ἀκροστιχία ὑποβάλλετω." The constantly repeated response of the 136th Psalm ("For His mercy endureth for ever"), or that of the 'Benedicite omnia Opera' ("Praise Him, and magnify Him for ever"), are instances of what is probably intended in this case. Compare ANTIPHON, PSALMODY (Bingham's Antiq. xiv. 1, § 12).

ACROTELEUTIC. [DOXOLOGY; PSALMODY.]

ACTIO. A word frequently used to designate the canon of the mass.

The word "agere," as is well known, bears in classical writers the special sense of performing a sacrificial act; hence the word "Actio" is applied to that which was regarded as the essential portion of the Eucharistic sacrifice; "Actio dicitur ipse canon, quia in eo sacramenta consecretur Dominica," says Warriff Strabo (De Rebus Eccl. c. 22, p. 950, Migne). Whatever is included in the canon is said to be "infra actionem;" hence, when any words are to be added within the canon (as is the case at certain great festivals), they bear in the liturgies the title or rubric "infra actionem;" and in printed missals these words are frequently placed before the prayer "Communicantes." Compare CANON. (Bona, de Rebus Liturgicis, lib. ii. c. 11; Macri, Hieroleicon, s. v. "Actio".)

Honorius of Autun supposes this use of the word "actio" to be derived from legal termino-

logy. "Missa quoddam iudicium imitatur; unde et canen Actio vocatur" (lib. i., c. 8); and "Canon . . . etiam Actio dicitur, quia causa populi in eum cum Deo agitur" (c. 103). (In Du Cange's Glossary, s. v. "Actio.") But this derivation, though adopted by several mediæval writers, does not appear probable. [C.]

fluence of Christianity on social life was seen, as in other things, so specially in the horror looked on the classes of the Christian Church whose occupations identified them with evil. Among these were Actors and Actresses. It must be remembered that they found the drama tainted by the depravity which infected all heathen society, and exhibiting it in its worst forms. Even Aulus Terentius, whose performances were the favourite amusement of Roman nobles and people (Ovid, Trist. ii. 497-520). The tragedies of Aeschylus or Sophocles, or Seneca, the comedies even of Menander and Terence could not compete with plays whose subject was always the "vettit crimen amoris," represented in all its baseness and foulness (Ibid.). What Ovid wrote of "ob-scena" and "turpia" was there acted. The stories of Mars and Venus, the loves of Jupiter with Dance, Leda, and Ganymede, were exhibited in detail (Cyprian, De Grat. Dei, c. 8). Men's minds were corrupted by the very sight. They learnt to imitate their gods. The actors became, in the worst sense of the word, effeminate, taught "gestus turpes et molles et muliebres exprimere" (Cyprian, Ep. 2, ed. Gersdorf. 61, ed. Rigalt). The theatre was the "sacramentum Veneris," the "consistorium impudicitiae" (Urb. c. 17). Men sent their sons and daughters to learn adultery (Tatian, Orat. adv. Graec. c. 22; Tertull. De Spect. c. 10). The debasement which followed on such an occupation had been recognized even by Roman law. The more active censors had pulled down theatres whenever they could, and Pompeius, when he built one, placed a Temple of Venus over it in order to guard against a like destruction (Ibid. c. 10). The Greeks, in their admiration of artistic culture, had honoured their actors. The Romans looked on them, even while they patronised them, with a consciousness of their degradation. They were excluded from all civil honours, their names were struck out of the register of their tribes; they lost by the "minutio capitis" their privileges as citizens (Ibid. c. 22; Augustin. De Civ. Dei, ii. 14). Trajan banished them altogether from Rome as utterly demoralized.

It cannot be wondered that that Christian writers should almost from the first enter their protest against a life so debased. They saw in it part of the "pompa diaboli," which they were called on to renounce. Tertul-

* Augustine, who in his youth had delighted in the higher forms of the drama (Confess. iii. 2), draws, after his conversion, a distinction between these ("scentium tolerabiliora ludorum") and the obscenity of the mimes (De Civ. Dei, ii. 8).

b No specific reference to this form of evil is found, it is true, in the N. T. The case had not yet presented itself. It would have seemed as impossible for a Christian to take part in it as to join in actual idolatry.

lian wrote the treatise already quoted specially against it and its kindred evils of the circus and the amphitheatre, and dwells on the inconsistency of uttering from the same lips the amen of Christian worship, and the praises of the gladiator or the mime. The actor seeks, against the words of Christ, to add a cubit to his stature by the use of the Cothurnus. He breaks the Divine law which forbids a man to wear a woman's dress (Deut. xxii. 5). Clement of Alexandria reckons them among the things which the Divine Instructor forbids to all His followers (Pædag. iii. c. 77, p. 298). In course of time the question naturally presented itself, whether an actor who had become a Christian might continue in his calling, and the Christian conscience returned an answer in the negative. The case which Cyprian deals with (Ep. 2, ut supra) implies that on that point there could be no doubt whatever, and he extends the prohibition to the art of teaching actors. It would be better to maintain such a man out of the funds of the Church than to allow him to continue in such a calling. The more formal acts of the Church spoke in the same tone. The Council of Ilberis (c. 62) required a "pantomimus" to renounce his art before he was admitted to baptism. If he returned to it, he was to be excommunicated. The 3rd Council of Carthage (c. 35) seems to be moderating the more extreme rigour of some teachers, when it orders that "gratia vel reconciliatio" is not to be denied to them any more than to penitent apostates. The Codex Eccles. Afric. (c. 63) forbids any one who had been converted, "ex quilibet ludicra arte," to be tempted or coerced to resume his occupation. The Council in Trullo (c. 51) forbids both mimes and their theatres, and τὰς ἐν τῶν κωμῶν ὀρχήσεις, under pain of deposition for clerical, and excommunication for lay, offenders. With one consent the moral sense of the new society condemned what seemed so incurably evil. When Christianity had become the religion of the Empire, it was of course, more difficult to maintain the high standard which these rules implied, and Chrysostom (Hom. vi. in Matt., Hom. xv. ad Pop. Antioch. Hom. x. in Coloss. ii. p. 403, i. 38, 731, 780), complains that theatrical entertainments prevailed among the Christians of his time with no abatement of their evils. At Rome they were celebrated on the entrance of a consul upon his office (Claudian in Cons. Mall. 313). On the triumph of the Emperors Theodosius and Arcadius the theatre of Pompeius was opened for performances by actors from all parts of the Empire (Symmachus, Epp. x. 2, 29). With a strange inversion of the old relations between the old and the new societies, the heathen Zosimus reproaches the Christian Emperor Constantine with having patronised the mimes and their obscenity. The pantomimes or ballets in which the mythology of Greece furnished the subject-matter (Medea and Jason, Perseus and Andromeda, the loves of Jupiter), were still kept up. Women as well as men performed in them (Chrysost., Hom. vi. in Thess.), and at Rome the number of actresses was reckoned at 3000. The old infamy adhered to the whole class under Christian legislation. They might not appear in the forum or basilica, or use the public baths. And yet, with a strange inconsistency, the civil power kept them in their degradation rather than deprive the population of the great cities of the empire of the amusements to which they were so addicted. If the Church sought to rescue them, admitting them to baptism, and after baptism claiming immunity from their degrading occupation, it stepped in to prevent any such conversion, except in extremis (Cod. Theod., De Sacerdot. xv.). Compare Milman's History of Christianity, book iv. c. 2; Chastel, p. 211. Perhaps the fullest collection of every passage in Christian antiquity bearing on the subject is to be found in Prynne's Histri-metrix. [P.]

ACUS (acocubium, or acubium, acicula, spine, spinula). Pins made of precious metal, and, in later medieval times, enriched with jewels, for attaching the archiepiscopal (or papal) pallium to the vestment over which it was worn, i. e. the planeta or casula (the chasuble). The earliest mention of these known to the present writer is in the description given by Joannes Diaconus of himself in the 9th century, he notes it as a point of contrast between the pallium worn by St. Gregory and that customary in his own time, that it was nullis acubus perforatum. Their first use, therefore, must probably date between the close of the 6th and the beginning of the 9th century. For details concerning these ornaments at later times, see Bock (Gesch. der liturg. Gewänder, ii. 191). Innocent III. (De Sacro Altaris Mysterio, lib. i. cap. 63) assigns to these pins, as to every other part of the sacerdotal dress, a certain mystical significance. "Tres acus quæ pallio infinguntur, ante pectus, super humerum, et post tergum, designant compassionem proximi, administrationem officii, destructionemque judicii." [W. B. M.]

ADAM AND EVE are commemorated in the Ethiopic Calendar on the 6th day of the month Miaziah, equivalent to April 1. The Armenian Church commemorates Adam with Abel on July 25. (Seale, Eastern Church, Introduct., pp. 800, 812.) [C.]

ADULTERY

(3) July 26 (M. Hieron.).

(4) August 8 (Cal. Armen.).

ADULTERY.—We shall attempt to give a general account of laws and customs relating to this topic, dwelling more fully upon such as elucidate the spirit of their several periods, and upon the principles involved in disputable points. Our outline breaks naturally into the three following divisions:—

1. Antecedents of Christian jurisprudence in Church and State on adultery.
2. Nature and classification of the crime.
3. Penalties imposed upon it.

Our quotations from Eastern canonists when compared with civilians are made from the older Latin versions; on occasion the Greek phrases are added. In imperial laws the Latin is commonly the most authentic. These are numbered, first the Book of Codex, next Title, then Law; but in the Digest, where it is usual to subdivide, the Title is distinguished by a Roman numeral.

1. Antecedents of Christian Jurisprudence in Church and State on Adultery.—Respecting the germs of future differences as regards this and connected subjects traceable in the Apostolic times, Neander has some useful observations (Planting of the Christian Church, Bohn's ed. I. 246-9 and 257, 261). Many circumstances, however, kept down these tendencies to opposition. In an age of newly awakened faith, and under the pressure of persecution, living motive took the place of outward law. The revulsion from heathen sins was strong, and filled the souls of converts with abhorrence, while the tender sympathy of their teachers urged men to control themselves, succour the tempted, and pity the fallen. "I am overwhelmed with sadness," writes Polycarp to the Philippians (cap. xi.), "on account of Valens who was made presbyter amongst you, because he thus knows not the place which was given him." This man had fallen into adultery (see Jacobson in loco). "I grieve exceedingly both for him and for his wife, to whom may the Lord grant true repentance. Be ye therefore also sober-minded in this matter, and count not such persons as your enemies; but as suffering and wayward members call them back, that you may save the one Body of you all. For so doing ye shall establish your own selves."

Clement of Rome, unlike Polycarp, had no special example to deal with; his warnings are therefore general. In Ep. i. 30 and cap. 6 of the 2nd Ep., attributed to him, adultery is stigmatized among the foulest and most heinous sins. His exhortations and promises of forgiveness (l. 7, 8, 9, 50) are likewise general, but invite all such sinners to repentance. The same declarations of remission to all penitents and the losing of every bond by the grace of Christ, occur in Ignat. Ep. ad Philadelph. 8; and in Asia (see Cureton. Corp. Ignat. p. 97). In these addresses we seem to catch the lingering tones and early date should be noted as valuable testimonies. De l'Aubeperre (Bingham, xvi. 11, 2) asserted that adulterers were never taken back into communion before the time of Cyrrian, and, though Bishop Pearson refutes this opinion, he

CHRIST. ANT.

ADULTERY

[C.] allows that respecting them, together with murderers and idolaters, there was much dispute in the early Church. Beveridge also (Cod. Can. vii. 2) believes that its severity was so great as to grant no such sinners reconciliation except upon the very hardest terms.

Of this severe treatment, as well as the difference of opinion alluded to by Pearson, we see various traces; yet the prevailing inclination was to hold out before the eyes of men a hope mingled with fear. Hermas (Pastor Mandat. 4, 1 and 3) conceals one, and but one, repentance to those who are unchaste after baptism; for which mildness and a reluctant allowance of second nuptials, Tertullian (De Pudicit. 10) styles this book an Adulterers' Friend. Dionysius of Corinth, writing to the churches of Pontus on marriage and continency, counsels the reception of all who repent their transgressions, whatever their nature may be (Euseb. iv. 23). Thus also Zephyrinus of Rome announced, according to Tertullian, "ego et moechie et fornicationis delicta, poenitentia functis dimitto;" and though sentence, which forms a chief reason for the treatise (De Pudicit.), probably contains in substance an authentic penitential rite. Of Tertullian's own opinion, since he was at this time a Montanist, it is needless to say that nothing differing from his former views, nor far removed from those maintained by Hermas (cf. De Penitent. 7-10), he now held adultery to be one of those sins not only excluding for ever from the company of believers, but also (cap. 19) absolutely without hope through our Lord's intercession. Exclusion from the faithful was, however, insisted upon in such cases by some Catholic bishops. Cyrrian (ad Antonian.), while himself on the side of mercy, tells us how certain bishops of his province had, in the time of his predecessors, shut the door of the Church against adulterers, and denied them penitence altogether. Others acted on the opposite system; yet we are assured that peace remained unbroken—a surprising circumstance, certainly, considering the wealth and intelligence of that province, and the importance of such decisions to a luxurious population. Cyrrian hints at no lay difficulties, and simply says that every bishop is the dispenser and director of his own act, and must render an account to God (cf. also Cyrr. De Unitate, several Epistles, and Conc. Carthag. Prologium). Hence the determination of one bishop had no necessary force in the diocese of another. So, too, the acts of a local council took effect only within its own locality, unless they were accepted elsewhere. But the correspondence of bishops and churches set bounds to the difficulties which might otherwise have arisen, and prepared the way for General Councils—see, for instance, the fragment (Euseb. v. 25) of the early Synod at Cæsarea in Palestine—its object being the diffusion of the Synodical Epistle. United action was also much furthered by the kind of compilation called Codex Canonum, but the first of these (now lost) was formed towards the end of the 4th century. See Dion. Exig. ap. Justell. l. 101, and Bevereg. Pand. Can. Proleg. vii.

The passages already cited show the strength of Christian recoil from heathen sensuality. In his instructive reply to Celsus (iii. 51) Origen compare the attitude of the Church towards backsliders, especially towards the incontinent, with that feeling which prompted the Pythagoreans to erect a cenotaph for each disciple who left their school. They esteemed him dead, and, in precisely the same way, Christians bewail as lost to God, and already dead, those who are overcome with unclean desire or the like. Should such regain their senses, the Church receives them at length, as men alive from death, but to a longer probation than the one converts underwent at first, and as no more capable of honour and dignity amongst their fellows. Yet Origen goes on to state (59-64) the remedial power of Christianity. Taken together these sections paint a lively picture of the treatment of gross transgressors within and without the Christian fold. On the passage in his De Oratone, which sounds like an echo of Tertullian, see foot-note in Delarue's ed., vol. i. 256.

Christians might well shrink from what they saw around them. Licentious impurities, countless in number and in kind, were the burning reproaches, the pollution, and the curse of heathendom. It is impossible to quote much on these topics, but a carefully drawn sketch of them will be found in two short essays by Professor Jowett appended to the first chapter of his Commentary on the Romans. They demonstrate how utterly unfounded is the vulgar notion that Councils and Fathers meddled unnecessarily with gross and disgusting offences. With these essays may be compared Martial and the Satirists, or a single writer such as Seneca—unus instat omnium—e. g. "Hinc decontissimum sponsaliorum genus, adulterium," &c., i. 9; or again, iii. 16, "Nunquid jam ulla repudi erabescit postquam illustres quedam ac nobiles Gemoniae, non consulum numero, sed maritorum, annos suos computant? et exeunt matrimonii causa, nubunt repudii? . . . Nunquid jam ullus adulteri pudor est, postquam eo ventum est, ut nulla virum habeat, nisi ut adulterum irriter? Argumentum est deformitatis, pudicitia. Quam invenies tam miseram, tam sordidam, ut illi satis sit unum adulterorum par?" &c. In Valerius Maximus we hear a sigh for departed morals—in Christian writers, from the Apologists to Salvian, a recital of the truth, always reprehensible, and sometimes half triumphant. Moreover, as usual, sin became the punishment of sin—Justin Martyr, in his first Apology (c. 27 seq.), points out the horrible consequences which ensued from a heathen practice following upon the licence just mentioned. The custom of exposing new-born babes pervaded all ranks of society, and was authorized even by the philosophers. Almost all these exposed, says Justin, both boys and girls, were taken, reared, and fed like brute beasts for the vilest purposes of sensuality; so that a man might commit the grossest crime unawares with one of his own children, and from these wretched beings the State derived a shameful impost. Compare Tertull. Apology, 9, sub fin. Happy in comparison those infants who underwent the prae or postnatal fate, described by Minucius Felix c. 30. To Laetantius (we may remark) are attributed the laws of Constantine intended to mitigate the allied evils of that later age, cf. Milman (Hist. Christ. ii. 394). "We," continues Justin (c. 29), "expose not our offspring, lest one of them should perish and we be murderers; nay, the bringing up of children is the very object of our marriages." There are passages to the same effect in the Ep. ad Diognet. c. 5, and Athenag. Legat. pro Christianis, (c. 33 al. 28), and thus these early apologists adduce a principle laid down amongst the ends of matrimony in the Anglican marriage-service. They no doubt utter the thought of their fellow Christians in opposing to the licence of the age the purest parental instincts, and these are perhaps in every age the most stringent restraints upon adultery.

The standard of contemporary Jewish practice may be divined from the Diad. cum Tappou, cc. 134 and 141. The Rabbis taught the lawfulness of marrying four or five wives,—if any man were moved by the sight of beauty Jacob's example excused him,—if he sinned, the precedent of David assured his forgiveness.

Surrounding evils naturally deepened the impression upon Christians that they were strangers and pilgrims in the world, that their aim must be to keep themselves from being partakers in other men's sins to suffer not as evil doers, but as Christians, and to use the Roman law as St. Paul used it, for an appeal on occasion—a possible protection, but not a social rule. Hence the danger was Quietism; and they were in fact accused of forsaking the duties of citizens and soldiers—accusations which the Apologists, particularly Tertullian and Origen, answered, though with many reserves. The faithful thought that their prayers and examples were the best of services; they shunned sitting in judgment on cases involving life and death, imprisonment or torture, and (what is more to our purpose) questions of pudor. On the admission of Christians to magistracy as early as the Antonines, cf. Dig. 50, tit. 2, s. 3, sub fin., with Gothofred's notes. Traces of their aversion from such business appear in some few Councils; e. g. Elib. 56, excludes Dunumvirs from public worship during their year of office. Tarracon. 4, forbids bishops to decide criminal causes—a rule which has left its mark on modern legislation. Naturally resulting from these influences, was a higher and diffused tone of purity. Obeying human laws, believers transcended them, Ep. ad Diognet. 5, and compare Just. Apol. i. 17, seq. with 15. He speaks emphatically of the innumerable multitude who turned from licence to Christian self-control. The causeless divorce allowed by law led to what Christ forbade as adultery, while the latter sin was dignified by Him extended to the eye and the heart. In like manner, Athenagoras (Leg. pro Christ. 2) asserts that it was impossible to find a Christian who had been criminally convicted—and that no Christian is an evil-doer except he be a hypocrite—32, 33, al. 27, 28, that impurity of heart is essentially adultery, and that even a slightly unchaste thought may exclude from everlasting life. He says, as Justin, that numbers in the Church were altogether continent; numbers too, lived according to the strictest marriage rule. Athenagoras goes so far (33 al. 28) as to pronounce against all second marriages, because he who deprives himself of even a deceased wife by taking another is an adulterer. through "non concupiscis," and in the same spirit Commodian (Instruct. 48) writes

"Ecum miscellum ubi mors est longe vitate:
Multa sunt Martyria, quae sunt sine sanguine fuso, Alicum non cupere," &c.

Compare other passages on adultery of the heart, Lactant. Listit. vi. 23, and Epi. 8; Greg. Nazianz., Hon. 37 al. 31; and later on, Photius, Epi. 139—a remarkable composition.

Another safeguard from licentiousness was the high valuation now set upon the true dignity of woman not only as the help-meet of man but as a partaker in the Divine Image, sharing the same hope, and a fit partner of that moral union in which our Lord placed the intention and essence of the married state. Clement of Alexandria draws a picture of the Christian wife and mother (Pedag. iii. 11, p. 250 Sylb. and Potter's Gr. marg.); of the husband and father, (Strom. vii. p. 741). Tertullian before him, in the last cap. ad Uxor. describes a truly Christian marriage—the oneness of hope, prayer, practice, and pious service; no need of concealment, mutual avoidance, nor mutual vexation; distrust banished, a freeborn confidence, sym- pathy, and comfort in each other, presiding over every part of their public and private existence.

This language derives additional strength from Tertullian's treatment of mixed marriages. These contracted before conversion fall under 1 Cor. vii. 10-17 (cf. ad Uxor. ii. 2), yet their consequences were most misch'vous. He tells us (ad Scapulan. 3) how Claudius Hermianinus, whose wife became a convert, revenged himself by barbarous usage of the Cappadocian Christians. A mixed marriage after conversion is a very great sin, forbidden by 1 Cor. vii. 39 and 2 Cor. vi. 14-16, and Tertullian ad Uxor. ii. 3 condemns those who contract it as "stupri reos" — transgressors of the 7th Commandment.

Addressing his own wife, he proceeds to describe its serious evils to a woman. When she wishes to attend worship her husband makes an appointment for the baths. Instead of hymns she hears songs, and his songs are from the theatre, the tavern, and the night cellar. Her fasts are hindered by his feasts. He is sure to object against nocturnal services, prison visits, the kiss of peace, and other customs. She will have a difficulty in persuading him that such private observances as crossing and exsufflation, are not magical rites. To these and other remarks, Tertullian adds the sensible arguments, that none but the worst heathens would marry Christian women, and how then could believing wives feel secure in such hands? Their husbands kept the secret of their religion as a nursed it for the day of persecution and legalized murder. Their own motives were of the baser kind—they married for a handsome litter, mules, and tall attendants from some foreign country—luxuries which a faithful man, even if wealthy, might not think proper to allow them. This being the early experience of the Church, we are not surprised to find mixed marriages forbidden in after times sub poena adulteri.

We cannot here pass over a history told by Justin Martyr in his Apol. ii. 2, and repeated by Eusebius iv. 17, respecting which the learned Bingham has been led into a remarkable mistake, copied and added to by Whiston in a note on Antiq. xv. 7, 10. A woman married to a very wicked husband, herself as drunken and dissolute as the man, became a convert to the faith. Thoroughly reformed, she tried to persuade him by the precepts of the Gospel and the terrors of eternal fire. Falling in her attempts, and revolted by the loutsome and unattracted compulsion to which her husband subjected her, she thought repudiation would be preferable to a life of impious compliances. Her friends prevailed upon her to wait and hope for the best, but a journey to Alexandria made her husband worse than before, and, driven to despair, she sent him a divorce. Immediately he informed against her as a Christian; a blow which she parried by presenting a petition for delay to the Emperor Marcus Aurelius, who granted her request. Upon this her husband, thirsting for revenge, accused her teacher in religious truth, and had the satisfaction of seeing three lives sacrificed in succession to his vengeance.

Bingham (xvi. 11, 6) cites the narrative as an instance of a wife's being allowed by the Church to divorce a husband on the ground of adultery. But the valuable writer, led perhaps by Gothofred (Cod. Theod. vol. i. p. 312) has here erred in a matter of fact, for Justin takes some pains to show that the woman's grievance was not adultery at all. Fleury (iii. 49) has apprehended the truth with correctness and expressed it with delicacy. The like case is discussed by an author long called Ambrose in his comment on 1 Cor. vii. 11 (Ambros. op. ed. Benedict., tom. ii. appendix p. 133 E-F), and he determines that, under the given circumstances, a woman must separate from her husband, but she must not marry again. The Imperial law also provided a remedy, Cod. Theod. 9, tit. 7, s. 3. It is certainly noteworthy that, in telling this brief tragedy, neither Justin nor Eusebius says a word against the wife's seeking relief from the heathen custom of divorce. Yet its license was condemned on all sides. The founder of the Empire strove to check it; and, had the aggrieved woman lived under the first Christian emperor, that resource would have been denied her. Clearly, circumstances justified the wife, but it would seem natural to have mentioned the danger of doing wrong, while should say that such cases are exceptional, and the inference from silence is that similar wickedness was not exceptional in those days, and was treated by the Church as a ground of divorce; a mournful conclusion, but one that many facts render probable, e.g. the Imperial law above cited.

From these antecedents our step is brief to laws for the repression of incontinency. The natural beginning was for each community to follow simply the example of St. Paul (1 Cor. v. and 2 Cor. ii.), but, as converts multiplied, it became necessary to prescribe definite tests of repentance which formed also the terms of reconciliation. Such rules had for one object the good of the community, and in this light every offence was a public wrong, and is so looked upon by canon law at this day. But penitence had a second object—the son's health of the offender—and this viewed, the same transgression was treated as a moral stain, and censured

according to its intrinsic heinousness, or, in few words, the crime became a sin. This idea, no doubt, entered into the severe laws of Christian princes against adultery, and is an indication of ecclesiastical influence upon them. Framers of canons had in turn their judgment acted upon by the great divines, who were apt to regulate public opinion, and to enforce as maxims of life their own interpretations of Scripture. Sometimes the two characters met in the same person, as in the eminent Gregories, Basil, and others; but where this was not the case, theologians commonly overlooked many points which canonists were bound to consider.

Church lawgivers must indeed always have regard to existing social facts and the ordinary moral tone of their own age and nation. They must likewise keep State law steadily in mind when they deal with offences punishable in civil courts. That they did so in reality, we learn from the Greek Scholia; and hence, when divorce is connected with adultery (particularly as its cause), the Scholiasts trace most canonical changes to foregoing alterations in the laws of the Empire. The reader should reproduce in his mind these two classes of data if he wishes to form a judgment on subjects like the present. We have called attention to the license which tainted pre-Christian Rome. Of the Christian world, homilists are the most powerful illustrators, but the light thrown upon it by canons is quite unmistakable. The spirit prevalent at the opening of the 4th century may be discerned from its Councils, e.g. Gangra; one object of which (can. 4) was to defend married presbyters against the attacks made upon them; cf. Elib. 33, and Stanley's account of the later Nic. 3 (Eastern Ch., 196-9). Gangra, 14, forbids wives to desert their husbands from abhorrence of married life; 9 and 10 combat a like disgust and contempt of matrimony displayed by consecrated virgins, and 16 is aimed against sons who desert their parents under pretext of piety, i.e. to become celibates, something after the fashion of "Corban." An age, where the springs of home life are poisoned, is already passing into a morbid condition, and legislative churgeons may be excused if they commit some errors of severity in dealing with its evils. But what can be said of the frightful pictures of Roman life drawn, somewhat later, by Ammian. Marcell. xiv. 6; xxvii. 3; and xxviii. 4; or the reduced copies of them in Gibbon, chaps. 25 and 31, to which may be added the fiery Epistles of Jerome (passim), and the calm retrospect of Milman (Hist. of Christ. iii. 230, seq.)? Can any one who reads help reflecting with what intensified irony this decrepit age might repeat the old line of Ennius—

Or can we feel surprised with violent efforts at coercing those demoralized men and women?

Gibbon, in giving an account of the jurisprudence of Justinian, saw that it could not be understood, particularly on the topic of our article, without some acquaintance with the laws and customs of the earliest periods. To his sketch we must refer the reader, adding only the following remarks:—

1. His opinion upon the barbarity of marital rule has found an echo in Hegel (see Werke, Ed. ix. p. 348, seq.). F. von Schlegel, though in his

Concordia highly praising the conjugal purity of ancient Rome, had already (Werke, xiii. 261, 2) blamed that rigid adherence to letter and formula which pervades the system. To such censure Mommsen is thoroughly opposed. In book i. chap. 5, he views the stern simplicity of idea on which all household right was founded as true to nature and to the requirements of social improvement. In chap. 12 he points out how the old Roman religion supplemented law by its code of moral maxims. The member of a family might commit grievous wrong untouched by civil sentence, but the curse of the gods lay henceforth heavy on that sacrilegious head. Mommsen's remarks on religious terrors agree well with the very singular restraints on divorce attributed by Plutarch to Romulus. The impression of ethical hardness is in fact mainly due to the iron logic of Roman lawyers. Father, husband, matron, daughter, are treated as realistic universals, and their specific definitions worked out into axioms of legal right. Yet in application (a fact overlooked by Schlegel) the summu jus is often tempered by equitable allowances, e.g. a wife accused of adultery had the power of recrimination, Dig. 48, tit. 5, s. 13, § 5; and cf. August. De Conjug. Adulterii, li. 7 (viii.) for a longer extract, and a comment on the recrimination. Such facts go far to explain the course pursued by Christian lawgivers.

2. On the vast changes which took place after the 2nd Punic war Gibbon should be compared with Mommsen, b. iii. cap. 13, pp. 884-5.

But neither of these writers, in dwelling on the immoral atmosphere which infected married life, point out any specially sufficient cause why Roman matrons showed such irrepressible avidity for divorce with all its strainings of law, its dissolution of sacred maxims, its connection with celibacy in males, and a frightful train of unbridled sensualities. Perhaps the only true light is to be gained from a comparison with ecclesiastical history. We shall see that in later ages of the Church there came about an entire reversal of earlier opinions on the criminal essence and the very definition of adultery, and that the ground of complaint at both periods (Pagan and Christian) was one and the same; the cause, therefore, may not improbably be one also, viz., the inadequate remedy afforded to women for wifely wrongs. Some particulars will be found in our second division, but the question opens a wide field for speculation, outlying our limits, and belonging to the philosophy of history.

3. The parallel between Church and State ought to be carried further. Imperial Rome, looking back upon the Republic, felt the decadence of her own conjugal and family ties, and wrote her displeasure in the laws of the first Caesars. So, too, when the nobleness of apostolic life ceased to be a substitute for legislation, it sharpened the edge of canonical censure by regretful memories of the better time. The same history of morals led to a sameness in the history of law, the State repeated itself in the Church.

4. Gibbon has a sneer against Justinian for giving permanence to Pagan constitutions. But those laws had always been presupposed by Christian government, both civil and spiritual. The emperors amended or supplemented them, and where bishops felt a need, they petitioned for an Imperial edict—e.g. the canons of three African councils relating to our subject, and noted hereafter, in which the synods decide on such a petition. Then, too, the opposite experiment had been tried. The Codex Theodosianus began with the laws of Constantine (cf. art. Theodosius in Dict. Biograph.); but when Justinian strove to give scientific form to his jurisprudence he found that completeness could no way be attained except by connecting it with the old framework; and, as we have seen, Gibbon himself felt a similar necessity for the minor purpose of explanation.

Our plan here will therefore be to use the great work of Justinian as our skeleton, and clothe it with the bands and sinews of the Church. We gain two advantages; his incomparable method; and a stand-point at an era of systematic endeavour to unify Church and State. For this endeavour see Novell. 131, c. 1, held by canonists to accept all received by Chalcedon, can. 1 (comprehending much on our subject), and Novell. 83, extending the powers of bishops on ecclesiastical offences. His example was afterwards followed by the acceptance of Trull. can. 2, adding largely to the list of constitutions upon adultery; cf. Photii Nomocanon, tit. i. cap. 2, with Scholia, and for the difficulties Bev. Pand. Can. Proleg. viii, ix. For harmonies of spiritual and civil law as respects breaches of the 7th Commandment see Antiocheni Nomoc., tits. xli. and xlii., and Photii Nomoc. tit. ix. 23, and tit. xlii. 5 and 6. Both are in Justellus, vol. II.

After A.D. 305 the Church was so frequently engaged in devising means for upholding the sanctity of the marriage tie that every step in the reception of canons concerning it forms a landmark of moral change. Such an era was the reign of Justinian; it was an age of great code makers—of Dionysius Exiguus and Joannes Antiochenus. Numbers of local constitutions became transformed into world-wide laws; the fact, therefore, never to be overlooked respecting canons on adultery, is the extent of their final acceptance.

We now come to Division II., and must consider at some length the definition of adultery strictly so called. On this point a revolution took place of no slight significance in the great antithesis between East and West. Details are therefore necessary.

I. Nature and Classification of the Crime.—Neglecting an occasional employment of the words promiscue (on which see first of following references), we find (Dig. 48, tit. 5, s. 6, § 1, Papin. n.), "Adulterium in nupta committitur stuprum vero in virginem viduamve." Cf. same tit., 34, Modestinus, and Dig. 1, tit. 12, s. 1, § 5, Ulpian; see Dict. Antiq., and Brissonius de Verb. Signif. 1, s. v. for distinctions and Greek equivalents.

The offending wife is thus regarded as the real criminal; and her paramour, whether married or unmarried, as the mere accomplice of her crime. She is essentially the adultera, and he, because of his complicity with a married woman, becomes an adulter. If the woman is unmarried, the condition of the man makes no difference—the offence is not adulterium.

This was also the position of the Mosiac code—see Lev. xx. 10, compared with Dent. xxii. 22. It is not easy to perceive how the law could stand otherwise when polygamy was permitted; cf. Dict. of Bible, in verbo. Espousal by both codes (Roman and Jewish) is protected as quasi wedlock (Dig. 48, tit. 5, s. 13, § 3, Dent. xxii. 23, 24). So likewise by Christian canons, e.g. Trull. 98, "He who marries a woman betrothed to a man still living is an adulter." Cf. Basil. can. 37.

Both in Scripture language and in ordinary Roman life the legal acceptance of the crime is the current meaning of the word. Hosea (iv. 13, 14) distinguishes between the sins of Jewish daughters and wives; and the distinction is kept in the LXX and Vulgate versions. A like distinction forms the point of Horace's "Matronam terere matronas." Instances are sufficiently common, but, since (for reasons which will soon appear) it is necessary to have an absolutely clear understanding of the sense attached to the word adulterium (= πορνεία) during the Christian period, we note a few decisive references from common usage. Val. Max. (under Tiberius) explains (il. 1, 3) adulteri as "subsecutores alieni matrimonii." Quintilian (under Domitian) defines, Instit. Orat. vii. 3, "Adulterium est cum aliena uxore doni coire." Juvenal (under the Antonines), in the well known story Metamorph. ix., describes the deed, and refers to the law de Adulteris.

Christian writers seldom explain words needless out of their current sense, and when they do so, the explanation is of course incidental. We find an early example in Athenagoras, De Resur. Mort. 23. al. 17, where in treating of bodily appetites occurs a designed antithesis. On the one side "legitimus coitus quod est matrimonium"—on the other, "Inconcessus alienæ uxoris appetitus et cum ea consuetudo—τοῦτο γάρ ἐστὶ μοιχεία." Another early instance is in the Shepherd of Hermas, Mand. iv., which thus begins: "Mando, ait, tibi, ut castitatem custodias, et non ascendat tibi cogitatio cordis de alieno matrimonio, aut de fornicatione." We have here a twofold division like Papinian's above quoted, but instead of opposing stuprum to adulterium (implied in alieno Matrimonio), he employs "fornicatio," an ecclesiastical expression when it has this special meaning. Origen (Levit. xx., Homil. xi.), in contrasting the punishment of adulterers under the Mosiac and Christian dispensations, assumes the same act to be intended by the laws of both. This act, andria, but Delarue (il. 179, 180) writes for Origen. Arnobius (under Diocletian) writes, lib. iv. (p. 142, Varior. ed.), "Adulteria legibus vindicant, et capitalibus efficiunt eos poenis, quos in aliena comprehenderit foedera genitalis se lectuli expugnatioe jecisse. Subsecoriss et adulteri persona," &c.

The canonists, Greek and Latin, use criminal terms like ordinary authors without explanation, and obviously for the same reason. But on our subject the meaning is generally made certain by (1) an opposition of words resembling the examples before quoted; (2) by the case of unmarried women being treated in separate canons; or else (3) by a graduation of penalties imposed on the several kinds of sin.

In the latter half of the 4th century we have again exact ecclesiastical definitions. They are very valuable, because given by two of the greatest canonists the Church ever produced, and also because they were accepted by can. II. Trull. Gregory of Nyssa thus distinguishes (ad Letaium, resp. 4), "Fornicatio quidem dicitur cupiditatis cupidum expletio quae sine iniuria fit iniuria. Adulterium vero, iustitiae et iniuria quae alteri fertur." This antithesis is substantially the same with that in the Digest, but Gregory so states it because (as his canon tells us) he is replying to certain somewhat subtle reasoners who argued that these acts of incontinence are in essence identical—a theory which would equalize the offences, and, by consequence, their punishments. The arguments are such as we should call verbal, eq. what the law does not permit, it forbids—the non proprium must be alium. He answers by giving the specific division made by the Fathers (as above), and maintains (1) its adaptation to human infirmity, (2) the double sin of adultery, and (3) the propriety of a double penitence. With Gregory, therefore, the canonist prevails over the theologian—he refuses to treat the crime merely as a sin.

In Basil's canon ad Amphiloch. 18—which is concerned with lapsed virgins—who had been treated as dignitists, and whom Basil would punish as adulterous, we find an incidental definition: "eum, qui cum aliena muliere cohabitavit, adulterum nominamus."

Basil's important 21st canon is summed by Aristenus: "Virum, qui fornicatus est, uxor propria recipit. Inquinatum vero adulterio uxorem vir dimittit. Fornicator, enim, non adulter est, qui uxori junctus cum soluta" (an unmarried woman) "rem habuerit." Here, again, is the old opposition (as in stuprum and adulterium) the logical essence of the crime turning upon the state of the woman, whether married or sole. But a clause of great value to us is omitted by Aristenus. Basil considers the fornication of a married man heinous and aggravated; he says, "eum poenis amplius gravamus," yet adds expressly, "Canonem tamen non habemus qui eum adulteri crimini subijciat si in solutam a Matrimonio pecuniam commissum sit." This clear assertion from a canonist so learned and veracious as Basil must be allowed to settle the matter of fact, that up to his time Church law defined adultery exactly in the same manner as the civil law.

It is to be remarked, too, that Basil's answer addresses itself to another kind of difficulty from Gregory's, that, namely, of injustice in the different treatment of unchaste men and women. No objection was of older standing. We almost start to hear Jerome (Epistol. Fabiolae) echoing, as it were, the verses of Plautus; cf. the passage (Mercator, iv. 5)—

"Eccesor lexe dora vivont mulieres, Multoque iniquitate miserae, quam viri . . .
. . . Utinam lex esset eadem, quae uxori est vtro."

Yet no writer tells more pointedly than Plautus the remedy which Roman matrons had adopted (Amphitruo, iii. 2)—

"Valens: tibi habess res tuas, reddas mens."

As to the legal process by which women compassed this object, it was probably similar to their way of enlarging their powers respecting property and other such matters, on which see Mommsen, book iii. 13.

We now note among divines a desire to impress upon the public mind the other, i. e. the purely theological idea that all incontinent persons stand equally condemned. They appear to reason under a mixture of influences—1. A feeling of the absolute unity of a married couple, a healthy bequest from the first age; 2. Indignation at marital license; 3. Desire to find a remedy for woman's wrong; 4. The wish to recommend celibacy by contrast with the "servitude" of marriage.

Lactantius (as might be expected from his date) fixes upon points 1 and 2. He finds fault with the Imperial law in two respects—that adultery could not be committed with any but a free woman, and that by its inequality it tended to excuse the severance of the one married body. Instit. vi. 23. "Non enim, sicut juris publici ratio est; sola mulier adultera est, quae habet alium; maritus autem, etiam si plures habeat, a crimine adulterii solutus est. Sed divina lex ita duos in matrimonium, quod est in corpus unum, pari jure conjungit, ut adulter habeatur, quisquis compagem corporis in diversa distinxerit." Cf. next page—"Dissociari enim corpus, et distrahi Deus nolit." It would seem therefore that this Father would really alter the ordinary meaning of the word adulterium, and explain the offence differently from its civil-law definition. He would extend it to every incontinent act of every married person, on the ground that by such an act the marriage unity enforced by our Lord is broken. It is true that another view may be taken of the words of Lactantius. They may be considered as rhetoric rather than logic, both here and in Epitome 8, where the same line of thought is repeated; but this is a question of constant recurrence in the Fathers, and reminds us of Seiden's celebrated saying. The student will in each case form his own judgment; in this instance he may probably think the statement too precise to be otherwise than literal.

The same must be said of Ambrose, whose dictum has been made classical by Gratian. Yet it should be observed that he is not always consistent with himself, eq. (Hexameron, v. 7) he lays it down that the married are both in spirit and in body one, hence adultery is contrary to nature. We expect the same prefatory explanation as from Lactantius, but find the old view: "Nolite quaerere, viri, alienum thorum, nolite insidiarie alienae copulae. Grave est adulterium et naturae injuria." So again, in Luc. lib. 2, sub init., he attaches this term to the transgression of an espoused woman.

The celebrated passage, one chief support of a distinction which has affected the law and language of modern Europe (quoted by Gratian, Decret. ii. c. 32, q. 4), occurs in Ambrose's Defence of Abraham (De Abr. Patr. i. 4). We give it as in Gratian for the sake of a gloss: "Nemo sibi blandiatur de legibus hominum" (gloss—quae dicunt quod adulterium non committitur cum soluta sed cum nupta) "Omne stuprum adulterium est: nec viro licet quod mulieri non licet. Eadem a viro, quae ab uxore debetur castissima. Quicquid in ea quae non sit legitima uxor, commissum fuerit, adulterii crimine damnatur." This extract sounds in itself distinct and consecutive. But when the Apology is read as a whole, exactness seems to vanish. It is divided into three main heads or defensiones: 1st, Abraham lived before the law which forbade adultery, therefore he could not have committed it. "Deus

in Paradiso licet conjugium iudicaverit, non adul-terium damnaverat." It is hard to understand how such a sentence could have been written in the face of Matt. xix. 4-9, or how so great an authority could forget that the very idea of con-jugium implied the wrong of adulterium. 2ndly, Abraham was actuated by the mere desire of offspring; and Sarah herself gave him her hand-maiden. Her example (with Leah's and Rachel's) is turned into a moral lesson against female jealousy, and then men are admonished—"Nemo sibi blanditur," &c., as above quoted. 3rdly, Galat. iv. 21-4, is referred to, and the conclusion drawn, "Quod ergo putas esse peccatum, advertisse esse mysterium; and again "haec quae in figuram contingebant, illis crimini non erunt."
We have sketched this chapter of Ambrose because of the great place assigned him in the controversy of Western against Eastern Church law.

Another passage referred to in this Q. "Dicit aliquis," is the 9th section of a sermon on John the Baptist, formerly numbered 65, now 52 (Ed.
Bened. App. p. 462), and the work of an Am-brosiaster. But here the adulterium (fili testes adulteri) is the act of an unmarried man with his ancilla (distinguished from a concubina, De-cret. 1. Dist. 34, "Concubina ancilla," seq.), i.e.
a sort of Contubernium is called by a word which brings it within the letter of the 7th Commandment.

Perhaps Ambrose and his pseudonym, like many others, saw no very great difference between the prohibition of sins secundum literam
and secundam analogiam—as, for example, Molatry is adultery. It seems clear that he did not with Laetantius form an ideal of marriage and then condemn whatever contradicted it. His language on wedlock in Paradise forbids this explanation.

Looking onwards, there is a famous sermon (37, al. 31) preached by Gregory Nazianzen, in which he blends together "the points we have numbered 2, 3, and 4. He starts (vi.) from the inequality of laws. Why should the woman be restrained, the man left free to sin? The Latin version is incorrect; it so renders καταρροβειν
as to introduce the later notion of adultery.
Gregory thinks (more Aesopi) that the inequality
came to pass because men were the law-makers;
further, that it is contrary to (a) the 5th Commandment, which honours the mother as well as the father; (b) the equal creation, resurrection,
and redemption of both sexes; and (c) the mystical representation of Christ and His Church.
A healthy tone is felt in much of what Gregory says, but (ix.) the good of marriage is described by a definition far inferior in life and spirituality to that of the pagan Modestinus, and (in x.) naturally follows a preference for the far higher good of celibacy. The age was not to be trusted on this topic which formed an underlying motive with most of the great divines.

Chrysostom notices the chief texts in his Expository Homilies. For these we cannot afford space, and they are easily found. We are more concerned with his sermon on the Bill of Divorce (ed. Bened. iii. 198-209). "It is commonly called adultery," he says in substance, "when a man

ADULTERY

wrongs a married woman. I, however, affirm it of a married man who sins with the unmarried.
For the essence of the crime depends on the condition of the injurers as well as the injured.
Tell me not of outward laws. I will declare to thee the law of God." Yet we encounter a qualification: the offence of a husband with the unmarried is (p. 207) μοιχίας ἕτερον εἶδος.
We also find the preacher dwelling with great force upon the lifelong servitude (δουλεία) of marriage, and we perceive from comparing other passages that there is an intentional contrast with the noble freedom of celibacy.

Asterius of Amaseia has a forcible discourse (printed by Combès, and particularly worth reading) on the question: "An liceat homini
dimittere uxorem suam, quacunque ex causa?"
The chief part of it belongs to our next division,
but towards the end, after disposing of insufficient causes, he enters on the nature of adultery. Here (as he says) the preacher stands by the husband. "Nam cum duplice lege matrimo-nia contrahuntur, benevolentiae ac quaeendorum liberorum, neutrum in adulterio continetur. Nec eum affectus locus, ubi in alterum animus
inclinat; ac sobolis omne deus et gratia perit, quando liberi confunduntur." Our strong Pen-tonic instincts feel the truth of these words.
Asterius then insists on mutual good faith, and passes to the point that the laws of this world are lenient to the sins of husbands who excuse their own license by the plea of privileged harmlessness. He replies that all women are the daughters or wives of men. Some man must feel each woman's degradation. He then refers to Scripture, and concludes with precepts on domestic virtue and example. The sermon of Asterius shows how kindly sins may be thoroughly condemned without abolishing established distinctions. But he also shows a general impression that the distinctions of the Forum
were pressed by apologists of sin into their own baser service.

Jerome's celebrated case of Fabiola claims a few lines. It was not really a divorce propter adulterium, but parallel to the history told by Justin Martyr. The points for us are the antithesis between Paulus noster and Papi-nianus (with Paulus Papiiniani understood) and the assertion that the Roman law turned upon dignity—i.e. the matrona as distinguished from the ancillula. Jerome feels most strongly the unity of marriage, and joins with it the proposition that the word Man contains Woman.
He therefore says that 1 Cor. vi. 16, applies equally to both sexes. Moreover, the same tendency appears, as in Chrysostom, to depress wedlock in favour of celibacy. Marriage is servitude, and the yoke must be equal, "Eadem servitus pari conditione censetur." But the word adulterium is employed correctly; and in another place (on Hosea, ii. 2) he expressly draws the old distinction—"Fornicaria est, quae cum pluribus copulatur. Adultera, quae unum virum deserens alteri jungitur."*

Augustine, like Laetantius, posits an idea of marriage (De Genesi, ix. 12 [vii.]). It possesses a sacramentum. "In fide attenditur ne praeter vinculum conjugale, cum altera vel altero concumbatur." But (Quaest. in Exod. 71) he feels a difficulty about words—"Item quaeri solet utrum moechia nomine etiam fornicatio teneatur. Hoc enim Graecum verbum est, quo jam Scriptura utitur pro Latino. Moechos tamen Graeci nonnulli adulteros dicunt. Sed utique ista Lex non solis viris in populo, verum etiam feminis data est" (Jerome, supra, thought of this point); how much more by "non moechaberis, uterque sexus astringitur. . . . Ac per hoc si femina moechia est, habens virum, concubendo cum eo qui vir ejus non est, etiamsi ille non habent uxorem; profecto moechus est et vir habens uxorem, concubendo cum ea quae uxor ejus non est, etiamsi illa non habet virum." He goes on to quote Matt. v. 32, and infers "omnis ergo moechia etiam fornicatio in Scripturis dicitur—sed utrum etiam omnis fornicatio moechia dici possit, in eisdem Scripturis non mihi interim occurrit locutionis exemplum." His final conclusion is that the greater sin implies the less—a part the whole.

Augustine's sermon (ix. nl. 96) De decem Chordis is an expansion of the above topics. In 3 (iii.) occurs the clause quoted Decret. ii. 32, q. 6. (a question wholly from Augustine)—"Non moechaberis: id est, non his ad aliquam aliam praeter uxorem tuam." He adds some particulars reminding us of Asterius. On the 7th Commandment, which Augustine calls his 5th string, he says, 11 (ix.), "In illa video jacere totum pene genus humanum;" and mentions that false witness and fraud were held in horror, but (12) "si quis volutatur cum ancillis suis, amatur, blande accipitur; convertuntur vulnera in joam."

We cannot pass by two popes cited by Gratian. One is Innocent I., whose 4th canon Ad Carp. stands at the end of same c. 32, q. 5. "Et illud desideratum est scribi, cur communicantes viri cum adulteris uxoriibus non convenient: cum contra uxores in consortio adulterorum virorum manere videantur." The gloss explains "communicantes" of husbands who commit a like sin with their wives. But this may or may not mean that they sinned cum conjugatis, and the words "pari ratione," which follow, to become decisive must be read with special emphasis. The other is the great Gregory, quoted earlier in same q. 5. The passage is from Greg. Mag. Moralium, lib. 21, in cap. Jobi xxxi. 9; and as it is truncated in quotation, we give the main line of thought, omitting parentheses: "Quamvis nonnunquam a reatu adulterii nequaquam discrepet culpa fornicationis (Matt. v. 28, quoted and expounded). Tamen plerumque ex loco vel ordine concupiscentis discernitur (instance). In personis tamen non dissimilibus idem luxuria distinguitur reatus in quibus fornicationis culpa, quia ab adulterii reatu discernitur, praedicatoris egregii lingua testatur (1 Cor. vi. 9)." The difference between the two sins is next confirmed from Job. It is easy to see that the old juridical sense of adulterium is not taken away by these expository distinctions.

We now come to the event which gives significance and living interest to our recital of opinions. The canon law of Rome took ground which allied it on this as on other questions with what appeared to be the rights of women. Its treatment of cases arising out of the 7th

Commandment widened the separation of East and West, and left a mark on those barbarian nations which owed their civilization or their faith to pontifical Rome. Our business here is only with a definition, but canonists followed civilians in working their doctrine out to its more remote consequences, and some of these would form a curious chapter in history.

The essence of the pontifical definition is not that a wife is the adultera, and her paramour the adulter, but that the offence be committed "cum persona conjugata," whether male or female. Hence it comprehends two distinct degrees of criminality. It is called simplex in two cases, "cum solutus concumbit cum conjugata, vel conjugatus cum soluta." It is called duplex "cum conjugatus concumbit cum conjugata." These distinctions are taken from F. L. Ferraris, Prompta Bibliotheca (ed. 1781), in verbo. They rest upon the Decretum as referred to by Ferraris, part 2, cause 32, quaest. 4. But the extracts we gave from qs. 5 and 6 should not be neglected.

The Decretum, according to C. Butler (Horae Juridicae Subsecivae, p. 168), is made up from (1) decrees of councils, (2) letters of pontiffs, (3) writings of doctors. But on our subject the last-named is the real source—e.g. q. 4 is from the moral and doctrinal writings of Augustine, Ambrose, Jerome, and Gregory I.; q. 6 wholly from Augustine. This is a very noteworthy fact, since it tends to confirm a conclusion that canonists had previously agreed with the civil law so far as concerns its definition of the crime. Gratian would never have contented himself with quoting theologians if he could have found councils, or canonical writings accepted by councils, to support his own decisions.

Such, then, is one not unimportant antithesis in the wide divergence between East and West. It would form an interesting line of inquiry (but beyond our province) to use this antithesis as a clue in those mixed or doubtful cases of descent where the main life of national codes and customs is by some held homesprung, by others given to old Rome, and by a third party derived from Latin Christianity.

Through all inquiry on this subject the student must bear in mind that a confusion of thought has followed the change in law; e.g. Ducange, Glossar., s. v., commences his article with a short quotation from Gregory of Nyssa's 4th can. ad Let. (explained above), but the sentence cited contains the opinion, not of the saint, but of the objector whom he is answering. Ducange proceeds to trace the same idea through various codes without a suspicion that he has begun by applying to one age the tenets of another. The difficulty of avoiding similar mistakes is greater than at first sight might have been anticipated. In the Dictionnaires of Trevoix, Furetière, Richelet, and Danet, adultrie or adultère is explained from papal law or Thom. Aquin., while the citations mostly give the older sense. In Chaucer's Persones Tale we find the same word (adultrie) defined after the civilians, but soon after he mentions "mo spices" (more species) taken from the other acceptance. Johnson gives to adultery the papal meaning, but his sole example is from pagan Rome, and most modern English dictionary makers are glad to copy Johnson. A still more striking instance of confounded explanations occurs in a remarkable dialogue between the doctor and his friend, vol. iii. 46, of Coker's Buswell.

The natural inference is that the above-mentioned authors were not conversant with the great change of definition undergone by the word adultery and its equivalents. But when those who write on the specialties of church history and antiquities quote Fathers, councils, jurists, and decretals, they ought in reason to note how far the common terms which their catena link together are or are not used in the same sense throughout. This precaution has been generally neglected as regards the subject of this article, —hence endless confusion.

Immediately upon the nature of the crime (as legally defined) followed its Classification. By Lex Julia, 48 Dig. i. 1, it was placed among public wrongs. But a public wrong does not necessarily infer a public right of prosecution; see Gothofred's note on Cod. Theod. 3, tit. 7, s. 2. —"Aliud est publicum crimen; aliud publica accusatio." For Publica Judicia, cf. Dig. as above and Inst. tit. Justin. 4, 18, sub init.

Under Augustus the husband was preferred as prosecutor, next the wife's father. The husband was in danger of incurring the guilt of procurator (lenocinatus) if he failed to prosecute (48, Dig. v. 2, § 2, and 29, sub init.; also 9, Cod. Just. 9, 2). He must open proceedings by sending a divorce to his wife (48, Dig. v. 2, § 2; 11, § 10; and 29, init.). Thus divorce was made an essential penalty, though far from being the whole punishment. By Nov. tit. 117, c. 8, proceedings might commence before the divorce. Such prosecution had 60 days allowed for it, and these must be diem utiles. The husband's choice of days was large, as his libellus might be presented "de plano," i. e., the judge not sitting "pro tribunali" (48, Dig. v. 11, § 6; and 14, § 2). The husband might also accuse for 4 months further, but not "jure mariti," only "ut quis extraneus" (Goth. on 11, § 6). For example, see Tacit. Ann. i. 85; Labeo called to account by the praetor (cf. Orell. note), for not having accused his wife, pleads that his 60 days had not elapsed. After this time an extraneus might intervene for 4 months of available days (tit. of Dig. last quoted, 4, § 1). If the divorced wife married before accusation, it was necessary to begin with the adulterer (2, init.; 39, § 3). The wife might then escape through failure of the plaintiff against him (17, § 6). He was liable for five continuous years even though she were dead (11, § 4; 39, § 2), and his death did not shield her (19, init.), but that period barred all action against both offenders (29, § 5; and 31; also 9, Cod. J. 9, 5). Under Constantine, A. D. 326 (9, Cod. Theod. 7, 2, and 9, Cod. J. 9, 30), the right of public prosecution was taken away. The prosecutors were thus arranged: husband; wife's relations, i. e. father, brother, father's brother, mother's brother. This order remained unaltered (see Balsam. Schol. la Bevereg. Pandect. i. 408, and Blastaris Synagoga, p. 185).

The Mosaic law, like the Roman, made this offence a public wrong, and apparently also a matter for public prosecution; compare Deut. xxii. 22, with John viii. 3 and 10. As long as the penalty of death was enforced, the husband could not condone. But in later times he might content himself with acting under Deut. xxiv. 1-4. See Matt. i. 19. Espousals count as matrimony under Jewish law —even more strongly than under Roman; compare Deut. xxii. 23, sepr., with 48, Dig. v. 13, § 37. See also Hosen, ii. 2, iii. 1, and parallel passages.

By canon law all known sins are scandals, and as such public wrongs; cf. Gothofr. marg. annot. on Dig. 48, tit. 1, s. 1; Grat. Decret. ii. c. 6, 9, 1; J. Clarus, Sent. Rec. v. 1, 6; and on Adultery, Blackstone, iii. 8, 1, and iv. 4, 11. This offence became known to Church authorities in various ways; see Basil 34; Innocent ad Excep. 4; and Elph. 76, 78, Greg. Nyss. 4, where confession mitigates punishment. A similar allowance for self-accusation is found in regard of other crimes, e. g. Greg. Thaum. cans. 8 and 9.

The Church agreed with the State in not allowing a husband to condone (Basil 9 and 21), and on clerks especially (Neocaesarea, 8). Divines who were not canonists differed considerably. Hermas's Pastor (Maudr. iv.) allowed and urged open reconciliation to a penitent wife. Augustine changed his mind; compare De Adulterio. Conju. lib. ii. 8 (ix.) with tractat. lib. i. xix. 6. In the first of these places he hesitates between condonation and divorce; opposes forgiveness "per claves regni caelorum" to the prohibitions of law "secundum terrene civitatis modum," and concludes by advising continence, which law forbids. In the latter passage he speaks of divorce as not only allowed but commanded. "Et ubi dixi hoc permissum esse, non jussum; non attendi aliam scripturam dicentem; Qui tenet adulteram stultus et impius est" (Prov. xviii. 22; lxx.).

A public wrong implied civil rights; therefore this offence was the crime of free persons (Dig. 48, tit. 5, s. 6 init.). "Inter liberis tantum personis adulterium stuprumque passas Lex Julia locum habet." Cf. Cod. J. 9, tit. 9, s. 23 init. A slave was capable only of Contubernium (see Seruus and Matrimonium in Dict. Antiq.). Servitude annulled marriage (Dig. 24, tit. 2, s. 1), or rather made it null from the first (Novell. Just. 22, 8, 9, 10). "Arcellian a toro abjicere" is laudable according to Pope Leo I. (Ad Rustic. 6). That Christian princes attempted to benefit slaves rather by manumission than by ameliorating the servile condition, we see from the above-quoted Novell. and from Harmonop. Proch. i. 14; the slave (sec. 1) is competent to his civil relations, and (sec. 6) his state is a quasi-death.

Concubinage was not adultery (Dig. 25, tit. 7, s. 3, § 1); but a concubine might become an adulteress, because, though not an uxor, she ought to be a matrona, and could therefore, if unfaithful, be accused, not jure mariti, but jure extranei. For legal conditions, see Cod. J. 5, tit. 26 and 27, Just. Novell. 18, c. 5; also 74 and 89. Leo (Nov. 91) abolished concubinage on Christian grounds. For the way in which the Church regarded it, cf. Bals. on Basil, 26, and Conc. Tolet. i. 17; also August. Quæst. in Genesis, 90, De Fid. et Op. Rustic. 4, cf. 6, as given by Mansi) seems to make the legal concubine a mere ancilla; cf. Grat. Decret. i. Dist. 34 (ut supra) and Dict. Antiq. s. v.

We now come to much the gravest consequence of a classification under public wrongs—its effect on woman's remedy. By Lex Julia, the wife has no power of plaint against the husband for adultery as a public wrong (Cod. J. 9, tit. 9, s. 1.). This evidently flows from the definition of the crime, but the glossators' reasons are curious. She cannot complain jure mariti because she is not a husband, nor jura extranei because she is a woman.

The magistrate was bound by law to inquire into the morals of any husband accusing his wife (Dig. 48, tit. 5, s. 13 § 5). This section is from an Antonine rescript quoted at greater length from the Cod. Gregorian. by Augustine, De Conjug. Adulterii, lib. ii, 7 (viii.). The husband's guilt did not act as a compensatio criminis. In England the contrary holds, and a guilty accuser shall not prevail in his suit (see Burns, Eccl. Law, art. "Marriage"). But the wife's real remedy lay in the use of divorce which during the two last centuries of the Republic became the common resource of women under grievances real or fancied, and for purposes of the worst kind. There is a graphic picture of this side of Roman life in Boissier's Cicéron et ses Amis; and for the literature and laws, see "Divortium" in Smith's Dict. of Antiquities. Brissonius de Formulis gives a collection of the phrases used in divorcing.

Constantine allowed only three causes on either side—on the woman's these were her husband's being a homicide, poisoner, or violator of sepulchres (Cod. Theod. 3, tit. 16, s. 1.; cf. Edict. Theodor. 54). This law was too strict to be maintained; the variations of Christian princes may be seen in Cod. J. 5, tit. 17. Theodos. and Valentin. 1, 8, added to other causes the husband's aggravated incontinency. Anastasius, 1, 9, permitted divorce by common consent; this again "nisi castitatis concupiscentia" was taken away by Justinian in his Novell. 117, which (app. 9) allowed amongst other causes the husband's gross unchastity. Justin restored divorce by common consent.

The Church viewed the general liberty to repudiate under the civil law, with jealousy; cf. Greg. Nazianz. Epp. 144, 5 (nl. 176, 181), and Victor Antiochen. on Mark x. 4-12. But it was felt that women must have some remedy for extreme and continued wrongs, and this lay in their using their legal powers, and submitting the reasonableness of their motives to the judgment of the Church. Basil's Can. 35 recognizes such a process; see under our Div. III. Spiritual Penalties, No. 2. Still from what has been said, it is plain that divorce might become a frequent occasion of adultery, since the Church held that a married person separated from insufficient causes really continued in wedlock. Re-marriage was therefore always a serious, sometimes a criminal step. [DIVORCE.]

Marriage after a wife's death was also viewed with suspicion. Old Rome highly valued continence under such circumstances; Val. Max. ii, 1, § 3, gives the fact; the feeling pervades these tender lines which contrast so strongly with Catullus V. ad Lesbiam—

"Ocedit mea Lux, meumque Sidus; Sed carum sequar; arbor-que ut alta
est tellure sinus agunt amores,
Et radicibus implacantur tms;
Sic nos concubimur sepulch,
Et vitis eritnus beatorum."

Similar to Val. Max. is Herm. Mandat. iv, 4. Gregory Nazianz. (Hom. 37, al. 31) says that marrage represents Christ and the Church, and there are not two Christs; the first marriage is law, a second an indulgence, a third swinish. Against marriages beyond two, see Neocæs. 3, Basil, 4, and Leo. Nordl. 90. Curiously enough, Leo (cf. Dict. Biog.) was himself excommunicated by the patriarch for marrying a fourth wife. [DIGAMY.]

III. Penalties.—We are here at once met by a very singular circumstance. Tribonian attributes to Constantine and to Augustus two suspiciously corresponding enactments, both making death the penalty of this crime, and both inflicting that death by the sword. The founder of the Empire and the first of Christian emperors are thus brought into a closeness of juxtaposition which might induce the idea that lawyers, like mythical poets, cannot dispense with Eponyms.

The Lex Julia furnishes a title to Cod. Theod. 9, tit. 7; Dig. 48, tit. 3, and Cod. J. 9, tit. 9; but in none of these places is the text preserved, and we only know it from small excerpts. The law of Constantine in Cod. Theod. 9, tit. 7, s. 2, contains no capital penalty, but in Cod. J. 9, tit. 9, s. 30, after fifteen lines upon accusation, six words are added—"Sacrilogos autem nuptiarum gladio puniri oportet." The word "sacrilogos" used substantively out of its exact meaning is very rare (see Faellolati). For the capital clause, ascribed to the Lex Julia, see Inst. iv, 18, 4; but this clause has been since the time of Cujacius rejected by most critical jurists and historians, of whom some maintain the law of Constantine, others suppose a confusion between the great emperor and his sons. Those who charge Tribonian with emblemata generally believe him to have acted the harmonizer by authority of Justinian. On these two laws there is a summary of the case in Selden, Uxor. Etr. iii, 12, with foot references. Another is the comment in Gothofred's ed. of Cod. Theod. vol. iv, 296, 7. Heineccius is not to be blindly trusted, but in Op. vol. III. his Syll. xi. de Secta Triboniano-mustigum contains curious matter, and misled Gibbon into the idea of a regular school of lawyers answering this description. The passages in Cujacius may be traced through each volume by its index. See also Hoffmann, Ad Leg. Jul. (being Tract iv. in Fellenberg's Jurisprudentia Antiqua); Lipsii Excurs. in Tacit. Ann. iv.; Orelli, on Tacit. Ann. ii, 50; Ortolan, Explication des Institutes, iii, p. 791; Sandars, On the Institutes, p. 605; Dict. Antiq., "Adulterium"; and Dict. Biog., "Justinianus."

The fact most essential to us is that practical Christian emperors generally substituted their own edicts for the provisions of the Lex Julia, and that the successors of Constantine were equally diligent in altering his laws. Historians have frequently assumed the contrary; Valerius' note on Socrates, v, 18, may serve by way of example. The Church could not avoid adopting her canons to the varied states of civil legislation; cf. Scholia on Can. Apost. 5, and Trull. 87, besides many other places. The true state of the case will become plainer if we briefly mention the different ways in which adultery might be legally punished.

1. The Jus Occident. most ancient in its origin; moderated under the Empire; but not taken away by Christian princes. Compare Dig. 48, tit. 5, s. 20 to 24, 32 and 38, with same 48, tit. 8

s. 1, § 5; Cod. J. 9, tit. 9, s. 4; and Pauli Recept. Sentent. ii. 26. This right is common to most nations, but the remarkable point is that Roman law gave a greater prerogative of homicide to the woman's father than to her husband. For a similar custom and feeling, see Lane's Modern Egyptians i. 297. The Jus Occidentis under the Old Testament is treated by Selden, De Jure Nat. et Gent. juxta Discip. Ebraeor. iv. 3; in old and modern France, by Duenage and Bagueau; in England, by Blackstone and Wharton. There is a provision in Basil's Can. 34 directing that if a woman's adultery becomes known to the Church authorities either by her own confession or otherwise, she shall be subjected to penitence, but not placed among the public penitents, lest her husband, seeing hershould surmise what has occurred and slay her on the spot (cf. Blastaris Synagma, letter M, cap. 14). This kind of summary vengeance has often been confounded with the penalty inflicted by courts of law, e.g. its celebrated assertion by Cato in A. Gell. x. 23, though his words "sine judicio" ought to have prevented the mistake. Examples of it will be found Val. Max. vi. 1, 13; the chastisement of the historian Sallust is described A. Gell. xvii. 18; many illustrations are scattered through the satirists, and one, M. Ann. Senec., Controu. i. 4, is particularly curious.

2. The Household Tribunal, an institution better known because of the details in Dion. Hal. ii. 25. The remarks of Mommsen (i. 5 and 12), should be compared with Mr. Hallam's philosophical maxim (Suppl. to Middle Ages, art. 54) that the written laws of free and barbarous nations are generally made for the purpose of preventing the infliction of arbitrary punishments. See for the usage Val. Max. ii. 9, 2, and A. Gell. x. 23, in which latter place the husband is spoken of as the wife's censor, a thought which pervades Origen's remarkable exposition of Matt. xii. 8, 9, compared with v. 32 (tomus xiv. 24). The idea itself was likely to be less alien from the mind of the Church because of the patriarchal power which sentenced Tamar to the flames, and the apostolic principle that "the Head of the Woman is the Man." It is plain, however, that all private administration of justice is opposed to the whole tenour of Church legislation. But perhaps the most pleasant example of the Roman Household Court best shows the strength and extent of its jurisdiction. Pomponia Græcina (Theat. Ann. xiii. 32) was so tried on the capital charge of foreign superstition, and the noble matron, an early convert, as is sometimes supposed, to Christianity, owed her life to the acquittal of her husband and his family assessors.

3. A far more singular penalty on adultery is mentioned, Theat. Ann. ii. 85, Sueton. Tib. 35, and Merville, v. 197. It consisted in permitting a matron to degrade herself by tendering her name to the Aediles for insertion in the register of public women. Tacitus speaks of it as "more inter veteres recepto," and looks back with evident regret upon the ages when such shame was felt to be an ample chastisement. His feeling is shared by Val. Max. ii. 1. A like custom subsisted before 1833 among the modern Egyptians, (see Lane, i. 176-7), differing only in the fact that the degradation was compulsory, a custom curiously parallel to a narrative of Socrates, v. 18,

(copied by Nicephorus, xii. 22), who says that there remained at Rome, till abolished by the Christian Emperor Theodosius I., places of confinement called Sistra, where women who had been caught in breaking the 7th Commandment were compelled to acts of incontinency, during which the attention of the passers-by was attracted by the ringing of little bells in order that their ignominy might be known to every one. Valerius has a dubious note founded chiefly on a mistake, already observed, as to the constancy of Roman punishments. They really were most variable, and here again Egypt offers a parallel, cf. Lane, i. 462-3. Niebuhr (Lectures on Roman Hist. i. 270) thinks the unfixed nature of penalties for numerous offences in Greece and Rome a better practice than the positive enactments of modern times. We now pass to

4. Judicial Punishments.—Augustine (Civ. Dei, iii. 5) says that the ancient Romans did not inflict death upon adulteresses (cf. Liv. i. 28, x. 2, xxv. 2, and xxxix. 18); those who read Plautus will find divorce described as their usual chastisement. The critics of Tribonian generally believe that Paulus (Sentent. ii. 26, 14) gives the text of the Lex Julia. It commences with the punishment of the woman, and proceeds to that of her paramour on the principle before noticed of the adultera being the true criminal, and the adulter her accomplice. After Constantine, though the civil law maintains this ancient position, there is an apparent inclination to punish the man as a seducer—a clearly vital alteration, and due probably to Christian influences.

Augustine places the lenity of old Rome towards adulterous women in contrast with the severities exercised on Vestal virgins. His statement is not necessarily impugned by those who rank adultery among capital crimes (e.g. Cod. J. 9, tit. 9, s. 9), since by some kinds of banishment "eximitur caput de civitate," and hence the phrase "civil death" (see Dig. 48, tit. 1, s. 2; tit. 19, s. 2; tit. 22, s. 3-7). Emperors varied from each other, and from themselves. Augustus exceeded his own laws (Theat. Ann. iii. 24). Tiberius was perverse (Ibid. iv. 42). Appuleius, as actual death, represents the legal; namely the adulteress alive was not an unknown thing (Met. ix. ut supra). Of Macrinus it is expressly stated (Jul. Capit. 12), "Adulteriter reos semper vivos simul incendit, junicis corporibus." Alexander Severus held to a capital penalty (Cod. J. 9, tit. 9), as above. Paulus was of his council (cf. Ael. Lamprid. 25), a fact favouring the supposition that the section (Recept. Sent. ii. 26, 14) which mentions a punishment not capital must represent an earlier law. Arnobius, under Diocletian (see Dict. Biog.), speaks of adultery as capital (iv. p. 142, ed. Var.). With the above precedents before him, the reader may feel inclined to distrust the charge of new and Mosiac severity brought against Constantine and his successors in chap. 44 of Gibbon, vol. v. p. 322, ed. Milman and Smith.

Whether the disputed penal clause of Constantine be genuine or not, by another law of his (Cod. J. 9, tit. 11) a woman offending with a slave was capitally punished, and the slave burned. Constantianus and Constantus (Cod. Theod. 11, tit. 36, s. 4) enacted "partim similique ratione sacerdos nuptiarum, tanquam manifestos parricidiorum, auere culco vivos, vel exurere, judicantem oportet." Compare Dict. Antiq. art. Leges Corneliae, "Lex Pompeia de Parricidiis," and for burning, Pauli Sentent. Recet. v. 24. Baronius (sub fin. Ann. 319) has a note on "Sacerdotes,"—a word which placed the male offender in a deeply criminal light. The execution of the sentence was enforced by clear cases of adultery being executed from appeal (Sent. Recet. ii. 26, 17), and afterwards (Cod. Theod. 9, tit. 38, s. 3-8), from the Easter indulgence, when, in Imperial phrase, the Resurrection Morning brought light to the darkness of the prison, and broke the bonds of the transgressor. Yet we may ask, Was the Constantian law really maintained? Just thirty years later, Ammianus (xxviii. 1) gives an account of the decapitation of Cethegus, a senator of Lome; but though the sword was substituted for fire, he reckons this act among the outrages of Maximin, prefect of the city; and how easily a magistrate might indulge in reckless barbarity may be seen by the horrible trial for adultery described by Jerome (Ad Innocent.), in which both the accused underwent extreme tortures. Again, though the Theodosian code (in force from A.D. 439) gave apparent life to the Constantian law, yet by a rescript of Majorian (A.D. 459) it is ordered that the adulterer shall be punished "as under former emperors," by banishment from Italy, with permission to any one, if he return, to kill him on the spot (Novell. Major. 9). That death in various times and places was the penalty, seems clear from Jerome on Nah. i. 9; the Vandal customs in Salvia, 7; and Can. Willet, 27. Fines appear in later Welsh, as in Salic and A. S. codes. For these and other punishments among Christianized barbarians, see Ancient Laws of Wales; Lindenbrogii Cod. Leg., Wilkins, vol. i. Olaus Mag. de Gent. Septent. XIV.; and Ducange s. v. and under Trotarii.

For Justinian's legislation see his 134th Novell. Cap. 10 renews the Constantian law against the male offender, extends it to all abettors, and inflicts on the female bodily chastisement, with other penalties short of death. Cap. 12 contemplates a possible evasion of justice, and further offenses, to which are attached further severities. Caps. 9 and 13 contain two merciful provisions. Leo, in his 32nd Novell. (cited by Harmenop. as 19th), compares adultery with homicide, and punishes both man and woman by the loss of their noses and other inflictions. For a final summary, cf. Harmenop. Proch. vi. 2, and on the punishment of incontinent married men, vi. 3.

Spiritual penalties may be thus arranged.—1. Against adultery strictly so called (Can. Apost. 61 al. 60). A convicted adulter cannot receive orders.—Aneyra, 20. Adultera and adulter (so Schol., husband with guilty knowledge, Routh and Fleury), 7 years' penitence.—Neocaesarea, 1. Presbyter so offending to be fully excommunicated and brought to penitence.—Neocaesarea, 8. The layman whose wife is a convicted adultera cannot receive orders. If the husband be already ordained, he must put her away under penalty of deprivation.—Basil, can. 9. An unchaste wife must be divorced. An unchaste husband not so, even if adulterous; this is the rule of Church custom. [N.B.—We place Basil here because accepted by Trull. 2.]—Basil, 58. The adulter 15 years' penitence; cf. 59, which gives 7 years to simple incontinence, and compare with both can.

7 and Scholia.—Gregor. Nyss., can. 4, prescribes 18 years (9 only for simple incontinence).—Basil, 27, and Trull. 26, forbid a presbyter who has ignorantly contracted an unlawful marriage before orders to discharge his functions, but do not degrade him.—Basil, 39. An adultera living with her paramour is guilty of continued crime. This forbids her marriage with him, as does also the civil law. Cf. on these marriages Triburiense, 40, 43, and 51.—On intended and incipient sin, compare Neocaesarea, 4, with Basil, 70 (also Scholia) and Blastaris Synlogma, cap. xvi.—The synod of Eliberis, though held A.D. 305, was not accepted by any Universal Council, but it represents an important part of the Western Church, and its canons on discipline are strict. The following arrangement will be found useful. Eliberis, 19. Sin of Clerisy. (Cf. Tarræon. 9.)—31. Of young men.—7. Sic, if repeated.—69. Of married men and women.—47. If habitual and with relapse after penitence.—64. Of women continuing with their accomplices; cf. 69.—65. Wives of clerks.—70. Husbands' connivance (F. Mendoza remarks on the antiquity of this sin in Spain).—78. Of married men with Jewesses or Pagans.

2. Against Adultery as under Spiritual but not Civil Law.—Both canonists and divines joined with our Saviour's precepts, Prov. xviii. 23; Jer. iii. 1 (both LXX); 1 Cor. vi. 16, and vii. 11-16 and 39. They drew two conclusions: (1) Divorce, except for adultery, is adultery. Under this fall the questions of enforced continence, and of marriage after divorce. (2) To retain an adulterous wife is also adultery—a point disputed by divines, e.g. Augustine, who yielded to the text in Proverbs (Retract. i. xix. 6). These divisions should be remembered though the points are often blended in the canons.

Can. Apost. 5. No one in higher orders to cast out his wife on plea of religion. This is altered as regards bishops by Trull. 12, but the change (opposed to African feeling) was not enough to satisfy Rome. It must be remembered that, though divorce was restrained by Constantine, whose own mother had thus suffered (see Eutrop. ix. 22), his law was relaxed by Theod. and Valentin. and their successors, and it was common for a clerk, forced into continence, to repudiate his wife. Trull. 13, opposes the then Roman practice as concerns priests and deacons, and so far maintains, as it says, Can. Apost. 5.—The Scholia on these three canons should be read. For the Roman view of them compare Binius and other commentators with Fleury, Hist. Eccl. xl. 50. Cf. Siricius, Ad Himer. 7; Innocent I. Ad Exup. 1, and Ad Mac. at Sev.; Leo I. Ad Rustic. 3, and Ad Anastas. 4. See also Milman, Lat. Christ. i. 97-100. The feeling of Innocent appears most extreme if Jerome's assertion (Ad Demetrial.) of this pope's being his predecessor's son is literally meant, as Milman and others believe.—Can. Apost. 18, al. 17. On marriage with a cast-out wife; cf. Levit. xxi. 7.—48, al. 47. Against casting out and marrying again, or marrying a dismissed woman. "Casting out" and "dismissed" are explained by the Scholians: "the sense of unlawful repudiations. Sanchez (De Matr. lib. x. de Divort. Disp. ii. 2) quotes this canon in the opposite sense, and brings no other authority to forbid divorce before Innocent I.; indeed in Disp. i. 12, he says, "Posterior (excusatio) est, indissolubilitatem ma-

timonem non ita crete in primitiva Ecclesia intellectum esse, quia liceret ex legitima causa, apud Episcopos provinciale probata, libellum repudiare." E. Mendoza makes a like reserve on Eliberis, 8. It is to be observed that Latin renderings of Greek law terms are apt to be ambiguous; e.g. "Soluta" is sometimes used of a dismissed wife, sometimes of an unmarried woman.—Basil, Ad An. Antioch. can. 9. The dictum of our Lord applies naturally to both sexes, but it is otherwise ruled by custom [i.e. of the Church, see a few lines further, with Scholia; and on unwritten Church custom having the force of law cf. Photii Nomoc. i. 3, and references]. In the case of wives that dictum is stringently observed according to 1 Cor. vi. 16; Jer. iii. 1, and Prov. xviii., latter half of 23 (both in LXX and Vulgate).—If, however, a divorced husband marries again, the second wife is not an adultera, but the first; cf. Scholia. [Here the Latin translator has mistaken the Greek; he renders ὄκη ὄλη ἐὶ δὴ ἄρα by "nescio an possit," instead of "nescio an non"—so as to give the contrary of Basil's real meaning.] A woman must not leave her husband for blows, waste of dower, incontinence, nor even disbelief (cf. 1 Cor. vii. 16), under penalty of adultery. Lastly, Basil forbids second marriage to a husband putting away his wife, i.e. unlawfully according to Aristonius, Selden, Uc. Ebr. iii. 31, and Scholia on Trull. 87. On like Scripture grounds Can. 26 of 2nd Synod attributed to St. Patrick, commands divorce of adulteresses, and permits husband to remarry.—Basil, 21, assigns extra penitence to what would now be called simple adultery (then denied by Church custom to be adultery), i.e. the incontinency of a married man. Divorce is next treated as a penalty—an offending wife is an adulteress and must be divorced—not so the husband; cf. can. 9. Basil, unlike Gregory of Nyssa, does not justify in reason the established custom.—35. Alludes to a judgment of the sort mentioned by Sanchez and Mendoza, and referred to above.—Car. 48. Separated wife had better not re-marry.

Carthage, 105 ap. Bev. (in Cod. Eccl. Afric. 102).—Divorced persons (i.e. either rightly or wrongly repudiating) to remain unmarried or be reconciled, and an alteration of Imperial law in this sense to be petitioned for. This breathes a Latin rather than an Eastern spirit, and is the same with 2 Milevis (Mileum), 17 (repeated Conc. Afric. 69), cf. 1 Arles, 10, and Innocent I., Ad Euzp. 6. The case is differently determined under differing conditions by Aug. de Fül. et Oper. 2 (i), compared with 35 (xix.).

The Scholiasts hold that the Carthaginian canon was occasioned by facility of civil divorce, but superseded by Trull. 87. Innocent III., with a politic regard for useful forgeries, ordained that earlier should prevail over later canons (cf. Justell. i. 311), but the Greek canonists (as here) maintain the reverse, which is likewise upheld and explained by Augustine, De Bapt. II. 4, (iii.), and 14 (ix.).

Trull. 87, is made up of Basil's 9, 21, 35, and 48. The Scholia should be read—but they do not notice that, when it was framed, divorce by consent had been restored by Justin, Novell. 2 (authent. 140). They are silent because neither this Novell. nor all Justinian's 117 were inserted in the Basilica then used; his 134 alone represented the law (see Photii Nomoc. XIII. 4, Sch. 3).—Trull. 87, is so worded as to express desertion, and therefore implies a judicial process, without which re-marriage must be held more adultery (see on this point, Blastaris Syntagma. Gamma. 13). The "divine" Basil, here highly magnified, is elevated still higher in Blastaris, Caus. Justrim. ap. Leuclavii Jus Græco-Roman. p. 514.

This canon closes the circle of Oecumenical law upon adultery, and on divorce, treated partly as its penalty and partly as its cause. The points of agreement with State law are plain; the divergence is an effect of Church restraint upon divorce, which, if uncanonical, easily led to digamy, and formed per se a species of adultery. According to canonists (Photii Nomoc. I, 2, Schol. 2), Church law, having a twofold sanction, could not be resisted by Imperial constitutions.

As the ancient mode of thinking on adultery is alien from our own, it seems right to refer the reader to the vindication of its morality by Gregory Nyssa, (Ad Let. 4).—Gregory is by no means lenient to the incontinency of married or unmarried men with single women; 9 years of penitence with all its attendant infamy made up no trifling chastisement. But he held that the offence of a married woman and her paramour involves three additional elements of immorality—the treacherous, the specially unjust, and the unnatural; or, to put the case another way, he estimated the sin by the strength of the barriers overleaped by passion, and by the amount of selfishness involved in its gratification. So, in modern days, we often speak of an adulteress as an unnatural mother, and visit her seducer with proportionate indignation. This viewed, spuriousness of progeny is not a censure by rule of expediency, but a legal test of underlying depravity.

This section may usefully close with examples showing how the ancient position has been overlooked as well as resisted. We saw that Carthage, 105, and its parallels forbade marriage after divorce, whether just or unjust, and that the view of its being adultery had gained ground in the West. Now, three earlier Eliberitan canons uphold the other principle. Can. 8. Against re-marriage of a woman causelessly repudiating. 9. Against re-marriage of a woman leaving an adulterous husband. 10. Against marriage with a man guilty of causeless dismissal. From this last canon, compared with 8 and 9, it appears that the husband divorcing an adulteress may marry again, which by 9 an aggrieved wife cannot do: cf. the parallel, Basil, 9, supra. Coterius, Bas. 26, 3, to Herm. Past. Mand. iv., quotes can. 9 and 10 as a support to the pseudo-bath to men that the man is favoured above the woman under liba conditions. He is followed by Bingham, xvi. 11, 6, as far as the so-called Ambrose is concerned. But we have sufficiently proved that Church custom did not permit incontinency to be held a like condition in husband and in wife. The pseudo-Ambrose himself misleads his readers—his law agrees with the Basilean canon, but not content with laying down the law, he goes on to reason out the topic—the man's being the head of the woman, &c. The Western Canon ascribed to St. Patrick (supra) seems a remarkable contrast to the Latin rule. The fact is equally remarkable that at no further distance from Eliberis than Arles, and as early as A.D. 314, it was enacted by Can. 10 that young men detecting their wives in adultery should be counselled against marrying others during the lifetime of the adulteresses (cf. Nantes 12). Most curious to us are the decrees of Pope Leo I, Ad Nicet. 1, 2, 3, 4, which allow the wives of prisoners of war to marry others, but compel them to return to their husbands under pain of excommunication should the captives be released and desire their society. Such instances as these and some before cited illustrate the various modes of affirming the law on adultery, and of resisting the law on adultery, and on divorce as the penalty of adultery (afterwards received in Trullo), ere yet the opposition formed an article in the divergence of Greek and Latin Christendom. With them should be compared the extracts from divines given under Division II. supra, which display in its best colours the spirit of the revolution. For other particulars, see DIVORCE.

3. Constructive Adultery.—The following are treated as guilty of the actual crime.—Trull. 98. A man marrying a betrothed maiden; cf. Basil, 37, with Schol., and Dig. 48, tit. 5, s. 13, § 3; also Siricius, Ad Him. 4.—Elib. 14. Girls seduced marrying other men than their seducers.—Basil, 18. Consecrated virgins who sin and their paramours; cf. his 60. These supersede Ancyra, 19, by which the offence was punished as digamy. See on same, Trull. 4; Elib. 13; Siric. Ad Him. 6, Innocent, Ad Vict. 12 and 13. Cyprian, Ad Pompon., pronounced it better they should marry—the offender is "Christi Adultera." Jerome, Ad Demetriad. sub fin., perplexes the case for irrevocable vows by declaring, "Quibus aperte dicendum est, ut aut nubant, si se non possunt continere, aut continent, si nolunt nubere."—Laod. 10 and 31, accepted by Chalced. i. and Trull. 2, forbid giving sons and daughters in marriage to heretics. Eliberis, 15, 16, 17, enact severe penalties against parents who marry girls to Jews, heretics, and unbelievers, above all to heathen priests. 1. Arles, 11, has same prohibition, so too Agde, 67. By Cod. Theod. 16, tit. 8, s. 6 (A.D. 339), Jews must not take Christian women; by Cod. Theod. 3, tit. 7, s. 2 (A.D. 388), all marriage between Jew and Christian is to be treated as adultery, a law preserved by Justinian (Cod. J. 1, tit. 9, s. 6). Some suppose this phrase simply means treated as a capital offence, but Elib. 15, mentions the risk of adulterium animae. The passage in Tertollian, Ad Ur. ii. 3, "fideles gentium matrimonium subvertentes stupri reos esse constat," &c. (cf. Division I. supra) shows how early this thought took hold of the Church. Holiness from Old Testament times downward was adultery; and divines used the principle 1 Cor. vi. 15, 16, and parallel texts, to prove that marriage with an unclean transgressor involved wife or husband in the sinner's guilt. Compare Justin Martyr in the history cited Division I., Cyprian, Testimon. iii. 62, and Jerome, Epiaph. Fideiolic. It would appear therefore that law was thus worded to move conscience, and how hard the task of law became may be gathered from Chalcedon, 14. This canon (on which see Schol. and Routh's note, Opusce. ii. 107) concerns the lower clergy; but the acceptance of Laodicea by Can. 1 had already met the case of lay people. See further under MARRIAGE.

The Church was strict against incitements and scandals. Professed virgins must not live with clerks as sisters. See SCIN-PRODUCTÆ. On promiscuous bathing, Trull. 77, Laod. 30; the custom was strange to early Rome, but practice varied at different times (see Dict. Antiq. Balneæ). On female adornment, Trull. 96, and compare Commodian's address to matrons, Inst. 59, 60.—Elib. 35, forbids women's night watching in cemeteries, because sin was committed under pretext of prayer. Against theatricals, loose reading, some kinds of revels, dances, and other prohibited things, see Bingham, xvi. 11, 10-17, with the references, amongst which those to Cyprian deserve particular attention.

ADVENT (Adventus, Ἐπισημία τῶν Χριστογενέων), is the season of preparation for the Feast of the Nativity, to which it holds the like relation as does Lent to Easter. As no trace of an established celebration of the birth of our Lord is met with before the 4th century [NATIVITY], no earlier origin can be assigned to the ecclesiastical institution of Advent; the statement of Durand (Rationale divin. off. vi. 21), which makes this an appointment of St. Peter (which, like other statements of the same kind, it means only that this was an ordinance of the see of St. Peter), may rest, perhaps, on an ancient tradition, making Christmas an apostolic institution, but is contrary to all historical testimony, and devoid of probability. Expressions which have been alleged on that behalf from Tertullian, St. Cyprian, and other early writers, are evidently meant, not of "Advent" as a Church season, but of the coming of the Lord in the fulness of time. A passage of St. Chrysostom (Hom. iii. ad Eph. t. xi. 22 B), in which καρπὸς τῆς προσόδου is mentioned in connection with τὰ Ἐπισημία (i. e. the ancient Feast of Nativity and Baptism) and with the Lenten Quadragesima, speaks as the context manifestly shows, not of the season of Advent, but of the fit time (or rather fitness in general) for coming to Holy Communion (comp. Menard on Liv. Sacram. S. Gregorii; Opp. t. iii. col. 446). Setting aside these supposed testimonies, and that of the Sermons de Adventu, alleged as St. Augustine's, but certainly not his, we have two homilies In (or De) Adventu Domini, de eo quod dictum est, scilicet fulgur coruscans, &c., et de duobus in le to no, by St. Maximus, Bishop of Turin, ob. 466. In neither of these sermons is there any indication of Advent as a season, any allusion to Lessons, Gospels, &c., appropriated to such a season, or to the Feast of Nativity as then approaching. And, indeed, the fact that the "Sundays in Advent" are unknown to the Sacramental of Pope Leo of the same age sufficiently shows that this season was not yet established in the time of Maximus. Among the Homilies (doubtfully) ascribed to this bishop, edited by Mabillon (Mus. Ital. t. i. pt. 2), one, hom. vii, preached on the Sunday before Christmas, simply exhorts to a due observance of the feast, and contains no indication of any ecclesiastical rule. Even in the Sermons de Adventu, formerly ascribed to St. Augustine, now generally acknowledged to have been written by Caesarius, Bishop of Arles, ob. 542 (S. 116), there is no distinct recognition of Advent as an established observance. In these, the faithful (ante phases dies), for the due celebration of the Nativity, especially of the Christmas Communion, by good works, by guarding against anger and hatred, by modest hospitality to the poor, by strict continence, &c. Still there is no indication of the length of time so to be set apart, nor any reference to Lessons, Gospels, or other matters of Church usage. The preacher urges such preparation, not on the ground of Church observance, but as matter of natural fitness: "Even as ye would prepare for celebrating the birth-day of a great lord by putting your houses in order," &c. "Ideo ab omni inquinamento ante ejus Natalem multis diebus abstinere debetis. Quotiescumque aut Natalem Domini aut reliquas sollemnitates celebrare disponitis, christentem ante omnia fugite," &c. And so in the second sermon: "Et ideo quotiescumque aut dies Natalis Domini, aut reliquas festivitates adventum, sicut frequenter admonui, ante plures dies non solum ab infelicis conebinarum consortio, sed etiam a propriis uxoriis abstinete: ab omni iracundia," &c. There is indeed a canon cited by Gratian (Decretal. xxxiii. qn. 4) as of the Council of Lerida. A. D. 523, prohibiting all marriage from Advent to Epiphany. But this canon is known to be spurious, and does not appear in the authentic codes (see Brun's Concilia, t. ii. 20). A similar canon of the Council of Mâcon, (A. D. 581, ibid. 242) is undisputed. This (can. ix.) enjoins that from the Feast of St. Martin (Nov. 11) to the Nativity there be fasting on Monday, Wednesday, and Friday of each week, and that the canons be then read; also that the sacrifices be offered in the quadragesimal order. (Subsequent councils, after our period, enjoin the observance of this Quadragesima S. Martini as the preparation for Christmas, corresponding to the Lenten Quadragesima before Easter.) It does not appear what were the canons appointed to be read, relating, of course, to the observance of these forty days before Christmas; only, it may be inferred that such canons were, or were supposed to be, in existence, of earlier date than that of Mâcon (in the preface to which council it is said these enactments are not new: "non tam nova quam prisca patrum statuta sancientes" &c.). In the second Council of Tours (A. D. 567), the first of three days in the week is ordered (can. xvii.) for the months of September, October, and November, and from (1) December to the Nativity, omni die. But this is for monks only. St. Gregory, Bishop of Tours, in De Vita Patrum, written between 590 and 595, alleges that Perpetuus, Bishop of Tours (461-490), ordered "a depositione B. Martini usque ad Nat. Dom. terna in septimana jejunia." This may have been one of the prisca statuta appended to; but no trace is extant of any such canon, either in the First Council of Tours, A. D. 460, or in any other Latin council before that of Mâcon. It seems, from all that is certainly known, that Advent took its place among Church seasons only in the latter part of the 6th century. When the Nativity had become established as one of the great festivals, it was felt that its dignity demanded a season of preparation. The number of days or weeks to be so set apart was at first left to the discretion of the faithful: "ante plures dies, multis diebus," as, in the above-cited exhortation of Caesarius. Later, this was defined by rule, and first, it seems, in the Churches of Gaul. Yet not everywhere the same rule: thus the oldest Gallican Sacramentary shows three Sundays in Advent, the Gothic-Gallican only two (Mabillon, Mus. Ital. t. i. pp. 284-288; and de Liturg. Gallicana, p. 98, sup.). But the rule that the term of preparation should be a quadragesima (corresponding with that which was already established for Easter), to commence after the Feast of St. Martin, which rule, as has been seen, was not enacted, but reinforced by the canon of Mâcon, 581, implies six Sundays; and that this rule obtained in other Churches appears from the fact (or Spanish Ordo (or Milan) and Mozarabic number of Sundays; and the same rule was observed (as Martene has shown) in some of the Gallican Churches. The Epistolu ad Ibbianum falsely alleged to be St. Augustine's account of "the offices of divine worship throughout the year" in his diocese of Hippo (see Bened. Admonitio at end of Opp. S. Augustini, t. ii.), also attests this for Churches of Gaul, if, as Martene surmises, this was the work of some Gallican writer. It should be remarked that this writer himself makes the ordo adventus Domini begin much earlier, at the autumnal equinox, Sept. 25, as being the day of the conception of St. John the Baptist, and so the beginning of the times of the Gospel. "Sed quin sunt nonnulli qui adventum Domini a festivitatem B. Martini Turonensis urbis episcopi videntur insipienter excolere, nos eos non reprehendamus" &c. This Quadragesima S. Martini seems to have originated in Gaul, in the diocese of Tours, to which it was specially recommended by the devotion paid to its great saint; an additional distinction was conferred upon his festival in that it marked the beginning of the solemn preparation for the Nativity. So far, we may accept Binterlin's conclusion (Denkbeurtheilen der christ.-kathol. Kirche, vol. v., pt. i., p. 166): the rule—not, as he says, of Advent, but—of this Quadragesima is first met with in the diocese of Tours. It, indeed, the Tractatus de sanctis tribus Quadragesimis, "unde eas observari ac-cepimus, quodque qui ens transgrediantur legem violent" (cp. Cateley, Monum. Eccl. Gr. iii. 425), be, as Cave (Hist. Lit.) represents, the work of Antioch, 561, or 599; this Quadragesima, under another name ("Q. S. Philippi," or "Fast of the Nativity"), was already observed in the East. But the contents make it plain enough that its author was another and much later Anastasius Sinaita, who wrote after A.D. 787. The observance of the "Quadragesima Apostolorum," and "Quadragesima S. Philippi" (the Feast of St. Philip, in the Greek Calendar is November 14) is enjoined upon monks by Nicephorus, Patriarch of Constantinople, 806. This fast of 40 days before Christmas seems to have been kept up chiefly by the monastic orders in Gaul, Spain, Italy, (Martene De Rit. Ant. Eccl. iii. p. 27); it was observed also in England in the time of Beke (Hist. iii. 27; iv. 30), and much later. It was not until the close of the 6th century that the Church of Rome under St. Gregory received the season of preparation as an ecclesiastical rule, restricted, in its proper sense, to the four Sundays before the Nativity (Amalarius De Eccl. Off. iii. 40, A.D. 812, and Abbot Berno, De quibusdam rebus ad Missam pertinentibus, c. iv. 1014); and this became the general rule for the Western Church throughout the 8th century, and later. And, in fact, four is the number of Sundays in Advent in the Sacramentary of Gregory (Liber Sacrament. de circulo anni, ed. Panellus; and in the Lectioarium Romanum, ed. Thomassinus). But other and older copies of the Gregorian Sacramentary (ed. Menard, 1642, reprinted with his notes in the Benedictine Opus. S. Gregorii, t. iii.); the Comes, ascribed to St. Jerome; the Sacramentary of Gelasius, ob. 496 (a very ancient document, but largely interpolated with later additions); the Antiquum Kalend. Sacrae Romanae Eccl. ap. Martene. Thes. Anecd. t. v. (in a portion added by a later hand); the Pontifical of Egbert, Archbishop of York, ob. 787; a Lectioary written for Charlemagne by Paul the Deacon (cp. Mabillon); and other MSS. cited by Martene (t. s. iv. 80, ff.), all give five Sundays. Hence, some writers have been led to represent that the practice varied in different Churches, some reckoning four, others five Sundays in Advent—an erroneous inference, unless it could be shown that the first of the five Sundays was designated "Dominica Prima Adventus Domini." The seeming discrepancy is easily explained. The usual ancient names of the four Sundays, counted backwards from the Nativity, are: Dominica i., ante Nat. Domini (our 4th Advent), Dom. ii., Dom. iii., Dom. iv. ante Nat. Domini. To these the next preceding Sunday was prefixed under the style Dom. v. ante Nat. Dom., not as itself a Sunday in Advent, but as the preparation for Advent. So Amalarius and Berno, u. s., and Durandus: "In quinta igitur hebdomada ante Nat. D. incipitur preparatio adventus . . . nam ab illa dominica sunt quinque officia dominicalia, quinque epistolae et quinque evangelia quae adventum Domini aperte praedicant." The intention is evident in the Epistle and Gospel for this Sunday, which in the Sarum Missal is designated "dominica proxima ante Adventum," with the rule (retained by our own order from that of Sarum), that these shall always be used for the last Sunday before Advent begins.

After the pattern of the Lenten fast, Advent was marked as a season of mourning in the public services of the Church. The custom of omitting the Gloria in Excelsis (replaced by the Venedicamus Domino), and also the Te Deum and Re missa est, and of laying aside the damatic and sublecon's vestment (which in the 11th and 12th century appears to have been the established rule, Micrologus De Eccl. Obs. c. 46; Rupert Abbas Tult. de Din. Off. iii. c. 2), was coming into use during the eighth century. In the Mozarabic Missal, a rubric, dating probably from the end of the 6th century (i.e. from the refashionment of this ritual by Leander or Isidore of Seville), appoints: "In Adventu non dicitur Gloria in Excelsis domine diebus et feriis, sed tantum diebus festis." And Amalarius, ob. 812 (De Offic. Sacr. iii. c. 40), testifies to this custom for times within our period: "Vidi tempore prisco Gloria in Excelsis praetermitti in diebus adventus Domini, et in aliquibus locis dalmaticis;" and iv. c. 30: "Aliqua de nostro officio reservamus usque ad praesentium nativitas Domini, h. e. Gloria in Excelsis Deo, et clarum vestimentum dalmaticam; in aliis vero non ita agitur ut vidi occidit in aliquibus locis." The Benedictine monks retained the Te Deum in Advent as in Lent, alleging the rule of their founder. The Alléluia also, and the Sequences, as also the hymns, were omitted, but not in all Churches. In the Gregorian Antiphonary, the Alléluia is marked for 1 and 3 Advent and elsewhere. In some Churches, the Miserere (Ps. li.) and other mournful Psalms were added to or substituted for the ordinary Psalms. For lessons, Isaiah was read all through, beginning on Advent Sunday; when that was finished, the Twelve Minor Prophets, or readings from the Fathers, especially the Epistles of Pope Leo on the Incarnation, and Sermons of St. Augustine, succeeded. The lesson from "the Prophet" ended with the form, "Haec dicit Dominus Deus, Convertimini ad me, et salvi eritis."

In the Greek Church, the observance of a season of preparation for the Nativity is of late introduction. No notice of it occurs in the liturgical works of Theodorus Studites, ob. 826, though, as was mentioned above, the 40-days' fast of St. Philip was enjoined (to monks) by Nicephorus, A.D. 806. This τεσσαρακονθήμερον, beginning November 14, is now the rule of the Greek Church (Leo Allat. de Consensu iii. 9, 3). Codinus (De Off. Eccl. et Curiae Constantinop. c. 7, n. 20) speaks of it as a rule which in his time (cir. 1350) had been long in use. The piece De Tribus Quadragesimis above noticed, ascribed to Anastasius Sinaita, Patriarch of Antioch, shows that, except in monasteries, the rule of a 40-days' fast before the Nativity was contested in his time (A.D. 1100 at earliest). And Theodore Balsamon, A.D. 1200, lays down the rule thus:—"We acknowledge but one quadragesima, that before Pascha; the others (named), as this Fast of the Nativity, are each of seven days only. Those monks who fast 40 days, viz. from St. Philip (14 Sept.), are bound to this by their rule. Such laics as voluntarily do the like are to be praised therefor." Respons. ad qu. 53 Marci Patriarch. Alex., and ad interrog. monachorum, app. to Photii Nomocanon. In the calendar formed from Evangelia Elogadia of 9th century our 4 Advent is marked "Sunday before the Nativity,"

In the separated Churches of the East, no trace appears, within our period, of an Advent season; unless we except the existing Nestorian or Chaldean rule, in which the liturgical year begins with four Sundays of Annunciation (εορταγλισμοι), before the Nativity (Assemani Bibliotheca Orient., t. iii. pt. 2, p. 380 sup.). This beginning of the Church year is distinguished as Rish phendito, i.e. initium codicis, from the Rish Janoto, i.e. new-year's day in October. The Armenian Church, refusing to accept 25th December as the Feast of Nativity, and adhering to the more ancient sense of the Feast of Epiphany as including the Birth of Christ, prepares for this high festival (6th January) by a fast of 50 days, beginning 17th November.

The first Sunday in Advent was not always the beginning of the liturgical year, or circulus totius anni. The Comes and the Sacramentary of St. Gregory begin with IX. Kal. Jan., the Vigil of the Nativity. So does the most ancient Lictionarium Gallianum; but the beginning of this is lost, and the Vigil is numbered VII, the Nativity VIII. Hence Mabillon (Liturg. Gallic. p. 98, 101) infers that it began with the fast of St. Martin (or with the Sunday after it, Dom. VI. ante Nat. Dom.). One text of the Missale Ambrosianum begins with the Vigil of St. Martin (ed. 1560). The Antiphonarius of St. Gregory begins I. Advent, and the Liber Responsionis with its Vigil. But the earlier practice was to begin the ecclesiastical year with the month of March, as being that in which our Lord was crucified (March 25); a trace of this remains in the notation of the Quatuor Tempora seu Jejunium primi, quarti, septimi, decimi mensis, the last of which is the Advent Ember week.

ADVOCATE OF THE CHURCH (Advocatus, or Defensor, Ecclesiæ or Monasterii; ἑκδικος, ἑκδικος; and Advocatio = the office, and sometimes the fee for discharging it);—an ecclesiastical officer, appointed subsequently to the recognition of the Church by the State, and in consequence (1) of the Church's need of protection, (2) of the disability, both legal and religious, of clergy or monks (Cam. Apost. xx., lxxxi.; Constit. Apostol. ii. 8; Justinian, Novell. cxliii. 6; and see Bingham, vi. 4) either to plead

in a civil court or to intermeddle with worldly business. In its original form it was limited to the duties thus intimated, and took its origin as a distinct and a lay office in Africa (Cod. Can. Ecol. Africæ, c. 97, A.D. 407, "Defensores," i. e. taken from the "Scholastici;" Conc. Arelat. ii. c. 16, A.D. 416; Can. Africæ, c. 64, c. A.D. 421); but received very soon certain privileges of ready and speedy access to the courts from the emperors (Cod. Theod. 2. tit. 4. § 7; 16. tit. 2. § 38). It became then a lay office (defensores, distinguished in the code from "coadvocati" or tunc persons), but had been previously, it would seem, discharged by the oeconomi (Du Cange). And, as it naturally came to be reckoned almost a minor order, so it was occasionally, it would seem, still held by clerics (Morinus, De Ord.; Bingham). The advocatus was to be sometimes asked from the emperors (authorities as above)—as judices were given by the Prætors;—but sometimes was elected by the bishop and clergy for themselves (Cod. lib. i. tit. iv. constit. 19). The office is mentioned by the Council of Chalcedon, ec. 2, 25, 26, A.D. 451, and is there distinguished both from the clergy and from the oeconomus; by Pope Gelasius, Epist. ix. c. 2, A.D. 492-496; and by Maxentius (Uesp. ad Iovinian.) some score of years later. But it had assumed a much more formal shape during this period, both at Constantinople and at Rome. In the former place, as protectors of the Church, under the title of ἑκκλησιαστικῶν, there were four officers of the kind: i. the πρωτεύδικος, who defended the clergy in criminal cases; ii. one who defended them in civil ones; iii. ὁ πῶς ἑκκλησίας, also called the πρωτόπapas; iv. ὁ πῶς ἑκκλησίας; increased by the time of Heraclius to ten, and designed in general for the defence of the Church against the rich and powerful (Justinian, Edict. xiii., and Novell. lvi. and lix. c. 1; and see the passages from Codrinius, Zonaras, Balsamon, &c., in Meursius, Gloss. Græco-Latinæ, voc. ἑκδικος, and in Suicer). They appear also to have acted as judges over ecclesiastical persons in trifling cases (Morinus). They were commonly laymen (so Cod. Theod. as above); but in one case certainly (Conc. Constantin., A.D. 536, act. ii.) an ἐκκλησιαστικῶν is mentioned, who was also a presbyter; and presbyters are said to have commonly held the office, while later still it was held by deacons (Morinus). In Rome, beginning with Innocent I. (A.D. 402-417, Epist. xii. ed. Constant) and his successor Zosimus (Epist. i. c. 3), the Great a regular order of officers (Defensores Romanæ Ecclesiæ), whose duties were—i. to defend Church interests generally; ii. to take care of alms left for the poor; iii. to be sent to help applicants from a distance for Papal protection; iv. to look after outlying estates belonging to St. Peter's patrimony (S. Greg. M., Epist. passim). There were also in Rome itself at that time seven officers of the kind, called Defensores Regionarii (Ordo Roman.), each with his proper region, and the first of the seven known as the Prætorius Defensorum or Primus Defensor (St. Greg. Epist., passim). St. Gregory certainly marks them out as usually laymen, yet in some cases clerics, and generally as holding a sort of ecclesiastical position. And the other Popes who allude to them (as quoted above), are led to do so while treating the question of the steps and delays to be made in admitting laymen to holy orders, and feel it necessary to say that such restrictions apply "even" to Defensores. See also St. Gregory of Tours, De Vita Patrum, c. 6.

The great development of the office, however, took place under Charlemagne; who indeed, and Pipin, were themselves, rex Rexy, "Defensores Ecclesie Romane." And the German emperors became, technically and by title, Advocati et Defensores Ecclesiarum (Charles V. and Henry VIII. being coupled together long afterwards as respectively ecclesie, and fidei defensores). It was then established as a regular office for each church or abbey, under the appellation for each church of Mundicari (or Avopi). Pastores Laici, and sometimes simply custodii auctores; to be nominated by the emperor (Leo IX., however, as Pope appointed (Du Cange)), but then probably for a particular emergency only (Car. M. Capit., v. 31, vii. 308); and usually as an office for life, to which the bishops and abbots were themselves to elect (Conc. Magunt., c. 50, A.D. 813,—"all bishops, abbots, and clergy, to choose 'vicedominus, prepositus, advocatus, sive defensores;" Conc. Aem., ii. c. 24, A.D. 813,—"Ut prepositi et vicedominii securum regulas vel canones constituentur;" and see also Conc. Roman., cc. 19, 20, A.D. 826, and Conc. Papiac., ii. P. iii. c. 5, A.D. 871), but "in presentia comitum" (Legg. Longobard., lib. ii. tit. xvii. § 1, 2, 4, 7), and from the landowners in their own neighbourhood (cap. xv. ex Legg. salica, Romana, et Gumbata,—"Et ipsi [advocati] habent in illo comitatu propriam haereditatem;" and in a capitular of A.D. 742, we find mention of a "Graphio," i. e. count, "qui est defensor;" Morinus, De Ordin., P. III. p. 307); and this, not only to plead in court or take oath there (sometimes two advocati, one to plead, the other to swear, Legg. Longobard., ii. xviii. § 8), but in course of time to hold courts (placita or iudicia) as judges in their own district (Du Cange, but A.D. 1020 is the earliest date among his authorities), and generally to protect the secular interests of their own church or abbey. The Advocatus was at this time distinguished from the Vicedominus, sometimes called Major Domus, who ruled the lay dependents of the Church; and from the Procurator, who ruled its clerical dependents; and from the Oeconomus, who (being also commonly a cleric) managed the interior economy of its secular affairs; although all these titles are occasionally used interchangeably. He was also distinct from the Cancellarius, whether in the older sense of that term when it meant an inferior officer of the court, or in the later when it meant a judge (Bingh, III. xi. 6, 7). Two circumstances however gradually changed both the relative position of the Advocatus to his ecclesiastical clients, and the nature of his functions; the one arising from the mode in which he was remunerated, the other from the mode of his nomination. 1. He was paid in the first instance at this period by sometimes an annual salary, with certain small privileges of entertainment and the like; also, by the third part of the profits of his judicial office (Tertia pars banorum, emendarum, leyum, compositionum, &c., "placitorum ad que ab abbate vocatus fuerit," Charon, Sen., lib. ii. c. 5, in D'Ach. Spicil., ii. 613, ed. 1723; tertius denarius); but commonly and finally by lands held from the church or abbey, a third of their value belonging to himself as his portion. And the growth of the feudal tenure, in addition to other obvious influences, gradually converted him through this last circumstance from a dependent into a superior, from a law officer into a military one, and from a beneficiary into an owner, and sometimes into an usurer outright. In the Ordo Romanus, is an Ordo ad armandum Ecclesie Lancesorem vel ulium Militem, beginning with a beneficium ecclie lanceae, ensis (p. 178 Hittorp., about the time of Charlemagne). His subadvocatus, let us add (the number of whom was limited by various enactments), was to be paid in one instance by the receipt, from each vill of the ecclesiastical property, of one penny, one cock, and one sextarius of oats. 2. The nomination to the office, resting originally with the Church itself or with the emperor, was usurped gradually by the founder, and as an hereditary appanage of his own estate; whence followed first an usurpation of the Church property by the lay Advocatus, and next an usurpation by the same officer of the right of nominating to the church or abbey. And from the latter of these has arisen the modern use of the word advocaton, which now means exclusively and precisely that right which the original advocatus did not possess; the ius patronatus no doubt being attached to the founder of a church from the time of the Council of Orange (c. 10) A.D. 441, and of Justinian (Novell., lvii. c. 2, exxiii. c. 18), A.D. 541, 555; but the combination of foundership with the office of advocatus being an accidental although natural combination, belonging to the ninth and next following centuries. The earliest charter quoted by Du Cange, in which mention is made of an election (in this case of an abbat) "assensu et consilio advocati," is a "privilegium Rudolphi Episc. Halberstad." A.D. 1147. But in Scotland, Wales, and Ireland, the officer analogous to the lay advocatus had usurped the position and the very name of abbat long previous to the 12th century [see ABBIAT]. And instances of similar usurpation abroad may no doubt be found of a like earlier date (see Robertson's Early Scotland). The advocatio of a bishopric seems to have included, at least in England, the custodia (i. e. the profits) of the property of the see, seco vacante; but was a distinct right from that of nomination to the office, the "dignitas episcopalis" (as e. g. in the case between the Welsh Lords Marchers and the English Crown, the former claiming the custodia but not the nomination); although the two became in England combined in the Crown. There does not, however, appear to be evidence, that this particular usurpation was laid to the charge of advocati abroad during the Carolingian period; although the system of lay abbats, commendatories, &c., and the usurpation of such offices by kings and nobles, led to the same general result of usurpation, there also, by the lay, over the ecclesiastical, functionary. Councils in England put restrictions on these usurpations of lay domini, advocati, &c., as early as the Council of Beccaneld, A.D. 696 x 716 and of Clovesho, A.D. 803 (Councils III. 358, Haddan and Stubbs; Wilk. i. 56, 167). Abroad, the first canon on the subject is that of Rheims (c. 6), A.D. 1148, followed among others by the Councils of Salzburg (c. 24), A.D. 1274 and (c. 12), A.D. 1281. But a check upon them was attempted as early as the 10th century by the Capetian dynasty in France.

ADVOCATES

The title of Fidei Defensor, attached to the Crown of England, and so strangely inverted from the special intent of its original Papal donor, may be taken as the last existing trace of the ancient Advocatus or Defensor Ecclesie. Unless (with Spelman) we are to give an ancient pedigree to churchwardens, and find the old office still in them. (Bingham; Du Cange; Meursius, Gloss. Græco-Latinarum; Morinus, De Ordinariis; Thomassin.)

[A. W. H.]

ADVOCATES, NOT TO BE ORDAINED.

—Amongst the laws which imposed restraints upon the clergy was one which forbade them, except in certain specified cases, to act as advocates before civil tribunals; since it was considered that any such interference with worldly matters would be inconsistent with the words of St. Paul (2 Tim., ii. 4 "No man that warreth [with the world] entangleth himself with the affairs of this life;" see St. Ambrose, De Off. Minist., l. 36; and Gelasii Papæ Epist., 17, sec. 15). For this reason the 3rd Council of Carthage (A.D. 397) in its 15th canon prohibits all clerks from becoming agents or procurators. The prohibition is repeated in the 3rd canon of the Oecumenical Council of Chalcedon (A.D. 451), but with the proviso that secular business may be undertaken by the clergy when the bishop directs it for the protection of Church property, or of orphans and widows who are without any one to defend them. This exception was in later times extended to the poor and all others who came under the designation of "miserabiles personee." So likewise were monks forbidden by the 11th canon of the Council of Tarragona (A.D. 516) to undertake any legal business except for the benefit of the monastery and at the command of the abbot.

In France the above-cited provisions of the Council of Chalcedon were repeated by the 16th canon of the Council of Verneuil (A.D. 755) and the 14th canon of the Council of Mayence (A.D. 813).

There are many other canons which prohibit the clergy from mixing themselves up with worldly matters, and which therefore forbid, though not in express terms, their acting as advocates.

There are also several imperial constitutions to the same effect, as, for instance, one of Theodosius II. (A.D. 416) which he afterwards repeated in the Code Theodosianus, A.D. 438 (16, tit. 2, 42), and which was also inserted in the 1st book (tit. 3, s. 17) of the Code Repetitæ Prælectionis of Justinian (A.D. 534).

Similar provisions are to be found in the 34th title of the Liber norrlanum of Valentin III. (A.D. 452), and in the 6th chapter of the 123rd Novellæ of Justinian (A.D. 541).

(Thomassinus, Vetus et nova Ecclesie Disciplina, De Beneficiis, Pars III. lib. 3, cap. 17-19; Bouix, Tractatus de Judiciis Ecclesiasticis, Pars I., 3, 4-5.)

AFFIDATIO (affiance, Spenser; Fr. fiançailles), betrothal. It appears doubtful whether this term came into use within the first nine centuries of the Christian era. It seems rather to belong to the period of fully developed feudalism. The earliest example quoted by Du Cange, from the synodal statutes of the Church of Liège in Martene's Thesaurus Novus Archaicorum, is in the year 1287. The form given in Martene's work, De Antiquis Ecclesie Ritibus (see vol. ii, pp. 136, 137), in which the word occurs, from the rituals of Limoges and of Rheims, are palpably more modern yet, to judge from the passages in French which are intermixed in them. [J. M. L.]

AFFINITY (adfinitas), a relationship by marriage. The husband and wife being legally considered as one person, those who are related to the one by blood are related to the other, in the same degree by affinity. This relationship being the result of a lawful marriage, the persons between whom it exists are said to be related in law; the father or brother of a man's wife being called his father-in-law or brother-in-law. The distinction between affinity and consanguinity is derived from the Roman law. The kinsfolk (cognati) of the husband and wife become respectively the adfines of the wife and husband. We have borrowed the words affinity and consanguinity from the Roman law, but we have no term corresponding to adfines. The Romans did not reckon degrees of adfinitas as they did of consanguinity (cognatio); but they had terms to express the various kinds of adfinitas, as socer, father-in-law; socrus, mother-in-law.

It has resulted from the Christian doctrine of marriage that persons related by affinity have been always forbidden by the Church to marry within the same degrees as those who are related by blood. The Council of Agde (506) particularly forbids the degrees as follows (Can. 61):—"A man may not marry his brother's widow, his own sister, his step-mother or father's wife, his cousin-german, any one nearly allied to him by consanguinity, or one whom his near kinsman had married before, the relict or daughter of his uncle by the mother's side, or the daughter of his uncle by the father's side, or his daughter-in-law, i.e. his wife's daughter by a former husband."

This canon is repeated almost verbatim in the Council of Epone, and again in the second Council of Tours (566). The same prohibitions are also specified in the Council of Auxerro (578).

Certain spiritual relations have been also included within the prohibited degrees. This restriction, however, was first introduced by Justinian, who made a law (Con. Just. lib. 5, tit. 4, de Nuptiis, leg. 26) forbidding any man to marry a woman for whom he had been godfather in baptism, on the ground that nothing induces a more paternal affection, and, therefore, a juster prohibition of marriage, than this tie, by which their souls are in a divine manner united together.

The Council of Trullo (Can. 53) extends the prohibition to the mother of the godchild; and, by the Canon law afterwards, these spiritual relations were carried still further, so as to exclude from marrying together even the baptiser and the baptised, the catechist and catechumen, and various other degrees of supposed spiritual affinity. Such restrictions, however, of course, could not be maintained in practice, and the dispensing power of the Pope was accordingly extended to meet the necessity. (Bingham; Gibson's Codes; Thorndike; Whentley, On Common Prayer.)

AFFUSION. [BAPTISM.]

AFFRICAN CODE. [AFRICAN COUNCILS.]

AFRICAN COUNCILS. Under this head we must include whatever Councils were held in Africa—no matter at what places, only distinct from Egypt—for this simple reason: that so many of their canons were so soon thrown together indiscriminately and made one code, which, as such, afterwards formed part of the code received in the East and West. On this African code a good deal has been written by Justellus (Cod. Eccl. Afric., Paris, 1614, 8vo.), who was the first to publish it separately, Bishop Beveridge (Synod., vol. ii, p. 202, et seq.), De Marca (Diss. de Vet. Coll. Can., c. 17, xi.), and the Ballerini in their learned Appendix to the works of St. Leo (tom. iii. De Antiq. Col. Diss., pars I, c. 3, 21-9), but a good deal also remains unsolved, and perhaps insoluble. Several of the canons contained in it have been assigned to more Councils than one, and several of the Councils differently dated or numbered by different editors or collectors. Perhaps the best edition of it is that published in Greek and Latin by Mansi (tom. iii. pp. 699-843). Not that it was originally promulgated in both languages, though, as Beveridge suggests, the probability is that it had been translated into Greek before the Trullan Council of A.D. 683, by the second canon of which it became part of the code of the Eastern Church. As it stands in Mansi, then, it comprehends, first, the deliberations of the Council of Carthage, A.D. 419; then the canons of the same Synod to the number of 33; then "canones diversorum conciliorum ecclesie Africane"—in the words of their heading, the first of which is numbered 34, in continuous series with the preceding, and the last 138. However, in reality, the canons proper ought to be said to end with the one numbered 133, at which point Aurelius, Bishop of Carthage, who presided, calls upon the Council to subscribe to all that had gone before, which is accordingly done; he signing first, the primate of Numidia second, the legate from Rome, Faustinus. Bishop of Potenza, third, St. Augustine, Bishop of Hippo, fourth; and the other bishops—17 or 229, according to the reading selected—in order; and after them all the two presbyter-legates from Rome, who sign last.

This done, the day following, a letter in the name of the whole Synod was addressed to Boniface, bishop of Rome, to be despatched by the three legates. This is given at length, and numbered 134. It acquaints him with their objections to the "communitorium" or instructions received by the legates from the late Pope Zosimus, particularly to that part of it bearing upon appeals to Rome in conformity with some supposed canons of Nicaea, which they had not been able to find in any Greek or Latin copy of the acts of that Council in their possession, and therefore beg him to send for authentic copies of them at once from the Churches of Antioch, Alexandria, and Constantinople. This course they had already taken themselves, while recommending it to him; and what follows as canon 135 proves to be a letter from St. Cyril of Alexandria to the same bishops, telling them that in conformity with their request he has sent them, by his presbyter Innocent, faithful copies of the authentic Synod of Nicaea, which they would also find, if they looked for them, in the ecclesiastical history; he does not say by whom.

In the same way canon 136 is a letter from Atticus, patriarch of Constantinople, telling them that he too sends them the canons as defined by Nicene Fathers pure and entire, by their messenger Marcellus the sub-deacon, as they had requested. We can hardly suppose the Synod to have been sitting all the time that it must have taken these messengers to go and return. Next a copy of the Nicene Creed follows, and is numbered 137. It had been already recited and accepted, together with the Nicene canons, in the previous deliberations of the Council, before the resolution to send for authentic copies of both had been carried out. Cæcilian, who was Bishop of Carthage at the time of the Council of Nicaea, and had attended it, had brought back with him copies of its creed and canons in Latin, which had been preserved with great care by his Church ever since. What follows in the last place, and is numbered 138, cannot have been written earlier than A.D. 422, it being a letter addressed to Celestine, the successor of Boniface, who died in that year, "our beloved lord (θεοσεβή) and most honoured brother," as he is styled, in the name of Aurelius and others whose names are given (St. Augustine's is not one) and the rest of those present in the universal Council of Africa, in which they tell him that the canons of which his predecessor had spoken were nowhere to be found in the authentic copies of the Nicene decrees just received from the East; and, further, that in no Council of the Fathers could they find it defined that "any should be despatched as it were from the side of his Holiness," as had been attempted in this instance. If he last, or 20th, Council, as it is called, under Aurelius, therefore, has been rightly assigned to A.D. 421,—and Aurelius opens its proceedings by saying that, for reasons well known to his audience, it had been suspended for the space of two years, this connecting it with the Council of A.D. 419,—either it must have sat the year following as well, or there must have been a 21st Council under Aurelius the year following to indite this epistle, which, as has been observed, could not have been done till the accession of Celestine had become known in Africa, that is, till towards the end of A.D. 422. And with it this collection of the canons of the African Church is brought to a close. Dionysius Exiguus, in his edition, heads them appropriately "the Synod of the Africans at Carthage that enacted 138

 canons," meaning of course the Synods of A.D.
 419-22 considered as one, where they were passed or confirmed (Migne's Patrol., tom. 67,
 p. 161 et seq.). Not but there are other collections extant containing fewer or more canons than are included in this. For instance, the Spanish and Isidorian Collections begin with the Synod of Carthage under Gratus, A.D. 348, and end with the Synod of Milevis, A.D. 402, making eight Synods in all, one of Milevis and seven of Carthage (Migne's Patrol., tom. 81, pp. 179-236).
 In Beveridge (Synodic., l. p. 365-72) the synodical letter of a Council of Carthage as far back as A.D. 258 (or 256 according to others) under St.
 Cyprian, is printed in the form of a canon, and placed, together with the speeches made there by him and others, immediately before the Ancyran canons, as though it had been one of the provincial Councils whose canons had been accepted by the whole Church, which it was not. Earlier far than either of them is the compendium of ecclesiastical canons, African mainly, 232 in all, by Fulgentius Ferrandus, deacon of the Church of Carthage, seemingly drawn from independent sources (Migne's Patrol., tom. 67, p. 949-62).
 Then earlier still than his were the two books produced by Boniface, Bishop of Carthage, at the Synod held there by him A.D. 525, as having been discovered in the archives of that church,
 one volume containing the Nicene canons in part,
 and those which had been passed in Africa
 before the time of Aurelius; the other volume called "the book of the canons of the time of Aurelius," in which, according to the Ballerini, nine of the Synods of Carthage under Aurelius,
 and some others of Milevis and Hippo, were contained (Musi, viii, p. 633-56). Finally, there is a "Breviarium canonum Hipponensium" printed in Mansi, with the comments of the Ballerini upon them, supposed to have been passed in the Synod held there A.D. 393, at which St. Augustine was present, but as a priest; and afterwards inserted in the Council of Carthage, held four years afterwards under Aurelius, amongst its own, and evidently confirmed by the 34th canon of the Synod of A.D.
 419, as proposed by one of the bishops named Epigenius.

The argument drawn by the Ballerini, after elaborately comparing these collections, is unfavourable to the title given by Justellus to the 138 canons above mentioned of the African code:
 still as designating those canons alone which have been received generally by the East and West, it cannot be called meaningless; and this fact having been made patent by his publication of them, it remains as a matter of antiquarian
 interest solely to determine what canons belong to what councils. The general account seems to be that there are sixteen Councils of Carthage,
 one of Milevis, and one of Hippo, whose canons were received and confirmed by the Council of A.D. 419 besides its own (Johnson's Fide Mecum., ii, 171); but it is beset with difficulties. The two canons interdicting appeals beyond the sea—118 and 125 according to the Latin numbering, and doubtless 23 and 39 were passed with the same object—have been attributed to a Synod of Hippo by some; but the 22nd canon of the second Synod of Milevis, A.D. 416, to which both Aurelius and St. Augustine subscribed, reads

AFRICAN COUNCILS

identical with one of them, and the 34th canon of a Council of Carthage two years later with the other. It is of more practical importance to ascertain whether they steer clear of the Sardic canons, as some maintain; or were framed in antagonism to them, as others. The Sardic canons, it has been said, allowed bishops to appeal to Rome; the African canons forbade priests and all below priests to appeal to Rome. The African fathers carefully abstained from laying the same embargo upon bishops; nay, they undertook to observe the canons cited by Zosimus as Nicene, till authentic copies of the Nicene canons had been obtained from the East. There can be no doubt whatever that all this is delusive. In the discussion that took place on the canons cited in the "Commonitorium," some were for observing them, pending the inquiry; St. Augustine among the number. But when Aurelius called upon the Council to say definitely what it would do, the collective reply was: "All things that were enacted in the Nicene Council are acceptable to us all." And to no more could they be induced to pledge themselves. Then as to the canons, which if they did not frame, they confirmed; subsequently; the 28th, according to the Latin numbering, is: "It was likewise agreed that presbyters, deacons, or any of the inferior clergy with causes to try, should they have reason to complain of the judgment of their bishops, might be heard by the neighbouring bishops with consent of their own; and such bishops might decide between them; but should they think they ought to appeal from them likewise, let them not appeal to transmarine tribunals, but to the primates
 of their provinces, as has also been frequently enacted in regard of bishops. But in case any should think he ought to appeal to places beyond the sea, let him be received to communion by nobody within Africa." The words "sicut et de episcopis saepe constitutum est," are found in all manuscripts of this canon, as it stands here. They are wanting in the 125th. And the meaning is clearly, that there had been earlier canons in abundance passed for regulating episcopal appeals; for instance, the 6th canon of the Council of Constantinople, where it is said that bishops should be brought before the greater Synod of the diocese, in case the provincial Synod should be unable to decide their case. And nothing had occurred to induce them to legislate further for bishops. The present controversy had originated with a simple priest, Apurarius. Accordingly their canons were directed to prevent priests and all below priests in future from doing as he had done. In short, they told Celestine that "the canons of the Nicene Council left all, whether inferior clergy or bishops themselves, to their own metropolitan; it having been wisely and justly considered there that, whatever questions might arise, they ought to be terminated in their own localities." Which was in effect as much as telling him that the genuine Nicene canons were in flat contradiction upon each point to those so designated by his predecessor. Canon 125 is identical with the preceding, except that it omits
 the clause "sicut et de episcopis," &c., and mentions the African Councils as another legitimate tribunal of appeal besides the primates. Canon 23, that "bishops should not go beyond the sea without leave from their primate," reads very like another outpouring of their sentiments on the same subject; and canon 39, that "no primate should be called a prince of priests, or pontiff," seems almost borrowed from the well-known invective of St. Cyprian against Stephen. Such, then, is the language of some of the canons of the African code, fairly construed, to which the assent of Rome as well as Constantinople has been pledged. And "it was of very great authority," says Mr. Johnson (Vade Mecum, ii. p. 171) in the old English Churches; for many of the "excerptions" of Egbert were transcribed from it.

It only remains to set down the different African Councils in the order in which they are generally supposed to have occurred, with a running summary of what was transacted in each; referring generally for all further information to Mansi, Cave, Beveridge, Johnson, De Marca, the Art de vérifier les dates, and the Bullerini. Numb-ering them would only serve to mislead, at least if attempted in any consecutive series. Cave, for instance, reckons 9 African between A.D. 401 and 603, and as many as 35 Carthaginian between A.D. 215 and 533; but among the latter are included 6 (between A.D. 401 and 410), which he had already reckoned among the 9 African.

CARTHAGE, A.D. 200, 217—Supposed to be one and the same, under Agrippinus, in favour of rebaptizing heretics.

— A.D. 251—Under St. Cyprian; decreed that the lapsed should be received to communion, but not till they had performed their full penance.

— A.D. 252—Against Novatian, who denied that the lapsed were ever to be received to communion again; and Felicissimus, who affirmed they were, even before they had performed their penance.

— A.D. 254, 255—Doubtful in which year; under St. Cyprian, in favour of infant baptism.

— A.D. 256—Under St. Cyprian, approving the consecration by the Spanish bishops of Felix and Sabinius in place of Basil and Martial, two bishops who had purchased certificates, or "libels," of having sacrificed to idols, and declaring that Stephen, Bishop of Rome, had interposed in favour of the latter unreasonably, from having been duped by them.

— A.D. 256—Another held in the same year—or there may have been several—in favour of rebaptizing all who had received heretical baptism, when St. Cyprian uttered his celebrated invective against Stephen. The question was finally ruled in the 7th of the Council's Constantinopolitan canons. This is printed by Beveridge in the form of a canon, immediately before those of Ancyra. It is given in Mansi, i. 922-6; but the speeches belonging to it follow 951-92, under the head of "Concil. Carthag. iii. sub Cypriano episcopo;" what purports to have been the second being given p. 925, and all three supposed to have been held A.D. 256.

CIRTA, A.D. 305—To elect a new bishop in place of one who had been a "traitor;" that is, had surrendered copies of the Scriptures to the Pagan authorities, to which all present, when they came to be asked, however, pleaded equally guilty.

CARTHAGE, A.D. 312—Of 70 Donatist bishops against Caecilian, bishop of that see.

— A.D. 333—Under Donatus, author of the schism; favourable to the "traditores."

— A.D. 348—Under Gratus; its acts are comprised in fourteen chapters, of which the first is against rebaptizing any that have been baptized with water in the name of the Trinity. This is probably the Council whose canons are invoked in canon 12 of the African code.

THEVESTE, A.D. 362—Of Donatists quarrelling amongst themselves.

AFRICAN, A.D. 380—Of Donatists, in condemnation of Tichonius, a Donatist bishop.

CARTHAGE, A.D. 386—Confirmatory of the synodical letter of Siricius, Bishop of Rome.

LEPTIS, A.D. 386—Passed canons on discipline.

CARTHAGE, A.D. 390—Formerly regarded as two separate Councils, under Genethlius, Bishop of Carthage; made 13 canons, by the second of which bishops, priests, and deacons are required to abstain from their wives and observe continence. Mansi prints what used to be regarded as a second Council of this year twice, iii. pp. 691-8 and 867-76.

— A.D. 393—Of Maximian's (Donatist bishop of Carthage) supporters against Primian (another Donatist bishop of Carthage).

HIPPO, A.D. 393—At which St. Augustine disputed "de fide et symbolo" as a presbyter.

CABARUSI and of the CAVERNS, A.D. 394—Of the same on the same subject.

BAGAIS, A.D. 394—Of Primian's supporters, against Maximian.

— A.D. 396—One canon only preserved; against translations of bishops and priests.

BYZATIUM, A.D. 397—Confirming all that had been decreed in 393 at Hippo.

CARTHAGE, A.D. 397—Called the 3rd, either reckoning that under Gratus as first, and that under Genethlius as 2nd; or else supposing two to have been held under Aurelius previously in 394 and 397, and making this the 3rd under him; passed 50 canons, among which the "Breviarium canonum Hipponensium" is said to have been inserted (Mansi, iii. 875, and the notes).

CARTHAGE, A.D. 400—Called the 5th under Aurelius; of 72 bishops; passed 15 canons on discipline (Pagl, quoted by Mansi, iii. p. 972). Yet, p. 979, Mansi reckons a first African Council in 399, and a 2nd and 3rd in 401, which he calls 4th, 5th, and 6th Councils under Aurelius, in the pontificate of Anastasius.

MILEVIS, A.D. 402—To decide several points affecting bishops.

CARTHAGE, A.D. 403, 404, 405—Mansi makes 3 African Councils of these; a 1st, 2nd, and 3rd, in the Pontificate of Innocent, or 8th, 9th, and 10th under Aurelius, for bringing back the Donatists to the Church (iii. pp. 1155 and 1159).

11th, 12th, and 13th Councils under Au-code (iii. p. 1163).

CARTHAGE, A.D. 410—Against the Donatists—probably the 14th under Aurelius.
—A.D. 411—Great conference between the Catholics and the Donatists; Aurelius and St. Augustine both taking part on behalf of the former; 286 bishops said to have been present on the Catholic side, and 279
on the Donatist, yet 313 names are given on the latter side. There were three different stages in the proceedings. (Mansi, iv. pp. 269 and 276.)
—A.D. 412—In which Celestius was ac-

Pope, probably the 15th under Aurelius.
CIRTA, A.D. 412—In the matter of the Donatists
—published a synodical letter in the name of Aurelius, St. Augustine and others. Silvanus, primate of Numidia, heads it.
AFRICAN, A.D. 414—Of Donatists.
CARTHAGE, A.D. 416—Or the 2nd against the Pelagians; probably the 16th under Aurelius; composed of 67 bishops; addressed
a synodical letter to Innocent of Rome, condemning both Pelagius and Celestius.
MILEVIS, A.D. 416—Called the 2nd of Milevis against Pelagius and Celestius—composed of 60 bishops—published 27 canons on discipline—addressed a synodical letter to Innocent of Rome, to which was appended another in a more familiar tone from Aurelius, St. Augustine and three more.
TIBSIDA, A.D. 417—Passed canons on discipline.
CARTHAGE, A.D. 417, 418—Against the Pelagians—regarded as one, probably the 17th
under Aurelius.
HIPPO, SUFFETULA, MACRIANA, A.D. 418—Passed canons on discipline preserved by Ferrandus (Mansi, iv. 439).
THENES, A.D. 418—Published nine canons on discipline.
CARTHAGE, A.D. 419—Attended by 229, or,
according to other accounts, 217 bishops;
and by Faustinus, Bishop of Potenza, and two presbyters as legates from Rome. Its proceedings have been anticipated in what was said on the African code. It would seem as if it really commenced in 418, and extended through 419. Pagi supposes 33 canons to have been passed in the former year, and but 6 in the latter (Mansi, iv. 419); and Mansi seems even to make two synods of it, calling one a 5th or 6th, and the other a 7th Council of Carthage (against the Pelagians, he probably means), and yet evidently reckoning
both together as the 18th under Aurelius.
From 419 it seems to have been adjourned to 421, and then lasted into 422 at least,
as has been shown above; this adjourned council was therefore in reality the 20th under Aurelius, though sometimes headed the 18th, as being one with the council of which it was but the adjournment. Then the 19th under Aurelius is the title given in Mansi (iv. 443) to one held in the interim, A.D. 420, to determine certain questions of precedence amongst bishops, possibly the missing 6th against Pela-gianism.

AGAPAE

NUMIDIA, A.D. 423—In which Antonius, a bishop of that province, was condemned.
CARTHAGE, A.D. 426—At which Leporius, a French presbyter, cleared himself from Pelagianism.
HIPPO, A.D. 426—At which Heraclius was elected successor to St. Augustine at his nomination.
—A.D. 427—Said to have passed canons 29 and 30, in the Latin numbering of the African code (Mansi, iv. 539).
AFRICAN, A.D. 484—To render account of their faith to King Hunneric, when it appeared that of 475 sees, 14 were then vacant: 88 had been deprived of their bishops by death, and most of those who survived were in exile (Mansi, vii. pp. 1156-64 and the notes).
BYZATIUM, A.D. 507—To appoint new bishops in place of those who had died or been exiled.
JUNCA, A.D. 523—under Liberatus; to condemn a bishop of the province of Tripoli who had usurped a church not in his diocese: St. Fulgentius, Bishop of Ruspe, being one of those present.
CARTHAGE, A.D. 525—under Boniface; when two volumes of the canons were found, as already described (Mansi, viii. 635-56).
AFRICAN, A.D. 533—Sent a synodical letter to John II. of Rome by Liberatus, deacon of the church of Carthage, so well known for his writings.
BYZATIUM, A.D. 541—Sent a deputation to Justinian, and legislated on discipline.
AFRICAN, A.D. 550—Excommunicated Vigilius
for condemning the three chapters.
SUFFETULA, A.D. 570—Passed canons on discipline, some of which are preserved.
AFRICAN, A.D. 594—Against the Donatists, probably for the last time.
BYZATIUM, A.D. 602—To examine certain charges made against Clement the primate.
NUMIDIA, A.D. 603—To examine the case of Donadeus, a deacon, who had appealed from his bishop to Rome.
BYZATIUM, NUMIDIA, MAURITANIA, CAR-

of the Lateran Council under Martin I.,

AGABUS, the prophet (Acta xxi. 10), com-

AGAPAE.—The custom which prevailed in the Apostolic Church of meeting at fixed times
for a common meal, of which all alike partook
as brothers, has been touched on in the Dict. of the Bible [LORD'S SUPPER.] It had a precedent

in the habits of the Essene communities in Judaea (Joseph, Bell. Jud. ii. 8), and in the Charities of Greek guilds or associations; in the Charities of Roman law (Ovid, Fasti, li. 616), in the συστήρια of Crete, in the φειδύρια of Sparta. The name apparently was attached to the meals towards the close of the Apostolic age. The absence of any reference to it in 1 Cor. xi. or xiii., where reference would have been so natural, had it been in use, may fairly be taken as negative evidence that it was not then current. The balance of textual authority inclines in favour of ἀγάπαι, rather than ἀνάγναι, in Jude v. 12, and perhaps also, though less decidedly, in 2 Pet. ii. 13, and we may fairly assume (without entering on the discussion of the authorship and date of those epistles) that they represent the terminology of the Church in the period from A.D. 60 to A.D. 80. The true reading of 1 Pet. v. 14 (ἐν φιλημαῖ ἀγάπης) cannot be disjoined from the fact that there was a feast known then or very soon afterwards by that name, at which such a salutation was part of the accustomed ceremonials. Soon the name spread widely both in the East and West. Ignatius (ad Smyrn. c. 8),* for the Asiatic and Syrian Churches, Clement for Alexandria (Paedag. ii. p. 142), Tertullian for Western Africa (Apol. c. 39), are witnesses for its wide-spread use.

It is obvious that a meeting of this character must have been a very prominent feature in the life of any community adopting it. The Christians of a given town or district came on a fixed day, probably the first day of the week (the "stato die" of Pliny's letter to Trajan, Epp. x. 96), in some large room hired for the purpose, or placed at their disposal by some wealthy converts. The materials of the meal varied according to the feeling or wealth of the society. Bread and wine were, of course, indispensable, both as connected with the more solemn commemorative act which came at some period or other in the service, and as the staple articles of food. Meat, poultry, cheese, milk, and honey, were probably used with them (August., c. Paust. xx. 20). Early paintings in the catacombs of Rome seem to show that fish also was used (Airinghi, Roma Sotterranea, ii. pp. 77, 83, 119, 123, 185, 199, 267). Both the fact of its being so largely the common diet of the poor in Syria (Matt. vii. 9, xiv. 17, xvi. 34), and the associations of Luke xxiv. 42, John xxi. 9 (to say nothing of the mystical significance attached to the word ἰχθῆς as early as Tertullian), would naturally lead Christians to use it at their "feasts of love." The cost of the meal fell practically on the richer members of the Church, whether it was provided out of the common funds, or made up of actual contributions in kind, meat or fruit sent for the purpose, or brought at the time. At the appointed hour they came, waited for each other (1 Cor. xi. 33),

* There is a suggestive difference, indicating a change in language and practice, between the shorter and longer texts of the Ignatian Epistles in this passage. In the former the writer claims for the bishop the sole prerogative of baptizing, or ἀγάπην ποιεῖν. In the latter the word προσφέρειν is interpolated between them. The ἀγάπῃ is distinguished, v. e. from the "Supper of the Lord," with which it had been identified; and the latter, thus separated, is associated with a more sacrificial terminology, and placed before the social feast.

men and women seated at different tables, perhaps on opposite sides of the room, till the bishop or presbyter of the Church pronounced the blessing (εὐλογία). Then they ate and drank. Originally, at some time before or after the rest of the meal, one loaf was specially blessed and broken, one cup passed round specially as "the cup of blessing." When the meal was over, water was brought and they washed their hands. Then, if not before, according to the season of the year, lamps were placed (as in the upper room at Troas, Acts xx. 8) on their stands, and the more devotional part of the evening began. Those who had special gifts were called on to expound Scripture, or to speak a word of exhortation, or to (Plin. l. c.) it was the natural time for intelligence to be communicated from other Churches, for epistles from them or their bishops to be read, for strangers who had come with ἐπιστάλαι συστατικά to be received. Collections were made for the relief of distressed churches at a distance, or for the poor of the district (1 Cor. xvi. 1; Justin. M. Apol. ii.; Tertullian. Apol. c. 39). Then came the salutation, the kiss of love (1 Pet. v. 14), the "holy kiss" (Rom. xvi. 16), which told of brotherhood, the final prayer, the quiet and orderly dispersion. In the ideal Agapae, the eating and drinking never passed beyond the bounds of temperance. In practice, as at Corinth, the boundary line may sometimes have been transgressed, but the testimony of Pliny in his letter to Trajan (l. c.), as well as the statements of the Apologists, may be allowed as proving that their general character at first was that of a pure simplicity. The monstrous slanders of the Apologists and "shameless impurity" were but the prurient inventions of depraved minds, who inferred that all secret meetings must be like those of the Bacchanalian orgies which had at various periods alarmed the Roman Senate with their infinite debasement (Liv. xxxix. 13, 14). At Alexandria, indeed, as was natural in a wealthy and luxurious city, there seems to have been a tendency to make the Agapae too much of a sumptuous feast, like the entertainments of the rich, and to give the name to banquets to which only the rich were invited. Clement protests with a natural indignation against such a misapplication of it by those who sought to "purchase the promise of God with such feasts" (Paedag. li. I. § 4, p. 61). It seems probable from his protest against the use of flutes at Christian feasts (Paedag. li. 4, p. 71) that instrumental music of a secular and meretricious character had come to be used instead of the "psalms and hymns and spiritual songs" (Eph. v. 19, Col. iii. 16) which had been in use, without accompaniment, at the original Agapae. Clement, however, permits the employment of the harp or lyre.

At first the practice would naturally serve as a b Chrysostom (Hom. 27 and 64, on 1 Cor. xi.), followed by Theodoret and Theophylact in loc., and most liturgical writers, say "before," but obviously under the influence of later practice, and the belief that the Eucharist could not have been received otherwise than fasting in the time of the Apostles.

witness and bond of the brotherhood of Christians. Rich and poor, even master and slave, met together on the same footing. What took place but once a year in the Roman saturnalia was repeated in the Christian society once a week. But in proportion as the society became larger, and the presence of brotherhood less living, the old social distinctions would tend to reassert themselves. The Agapae would become either mere social entertainments for the wealthy, as at Alexandria, or a mere dole of food for the poor, as in Western Africa (Augustin. c. Faustum xx. 20), and in either case would lose their original significance. Other causes tended also to throw them into the back-ground. When Christians came to have special buildings set apart for worship, and to look on them with something of the same local reverence that the Jews had had for the Temple, they shrank from sitting down in them to a common meal as an act of profanation. The Agapae, therefore, were gradually forbidden to be held in churches, as by the Council of Laodicea (c. 27), and that of 3rd Carthage A.D. 391 (c. 30), and that in Trullo much later^d (A.D. 692). This, of course, together with the rule of the 3rd Council of Carthage (c. 29), that the Eucharist should be received fasting, and the probable transfer, in consequence of that rule, of the time of its "celebration" from the evening to the morning, left the "feast of love" without the higher companionship with which it had been at first associated, and left it to lose more and more the character of a pauper meal. Even the growing tendency to asceticism led men who aimed at a devout life to turn aside fastidiously from sitting down with men and women of all classes, as a religious act. So Tertullian, who in his Apologetica had given so beautiful a description of them, after he became a Montanist, reproaches the Church as large with the luxury of its Agapae, and is not ashamed to repeat the heathen slander as to the prevalence in them even of incestuous licence (De Jejuniis, c. xvii.). One effort was made, as by the Council of Gangra, to restore them to their old position. Those who despised and refused to come to them were solemnly anathematised (c. 11). But the current set in strongly, and the practice gradually died out. Their close connexion with the annual commemoration of the deaths of martyrs, and the choice of the graves of martyrs as the place near which to hold them, was, perhaps, an attempt to raise them out of the disrepute into which they had fallen. And for a time the attempt succeeded. Augustine describes his mother Monica as having been in the habit of going with a basket full of provisions to these Agapae, which she just tasted herself, and then distributed (Confess. v. 2). And this shows the prevalence of the practice in Western Africa. In Northern Italy, however, Ambrose had suppressed them on account of the disorders which were inseparable, and their resemblance to the old heathen Parentalia, and Augustine, when he returned to Africa, urged Aurelius, Bishop of Carthage, to follow the example (Epi. Ist. xxii.). The name, indeed, still lingered as given to the annual dedication feasts of churches at Rome in the sixth century (Greg. M., Epp. ii. 74), and the practice left traces of itself, in the bread, blest as distinct from consecrated, which, under the title of EULOGIA, was distributed in churches, or taken from them to absent members of the congregation, (2) in the practice, prohibited by the Apostolic canons (c. 3), and by the Council in Trullo (c. 28, 57, 99) of bringing to the altar honey, milk, grapes, poultry, joints of meat, that the priest might bless them there before they were eaten at a common table. The grapes appear, indeed, to have been actually distributed with the Agape, or consecrated elements, while the joints of meat are mentioned as a special enormity of the Armenian Church. (3) Traces of the Agapae are to be found lastly in the practice which prevailed in Egypt, from the neighbourhood of Alexandria to the Thebaid, in the 5th century, of meeting on the evening of Saturday for a common meal, generally full and varied in its materials, officiis which those who were present partook of the "mysteries" (Sozom. H. E. vii. 19; Socrates, H. E. v. 22). The practice, then, noticed as an exception to the practice of all other Churches (comp. Augustin. Epist. at Jan. i. 5) was probably a relic of the primitive Church, both as to time and manner, in the Lord's Supper had been, like other suppers, eaten in the evening, when an evening meeting on "the first day of the week" meant, according to the Jewish mode of speech, the evening of Saturday, when the thought that "fasting" was a necessary condition of partaking of the Supper of the Lord was not only not present to men's minds, but was absolutely excluded by the Apostle's rule, that men who could not wait patiently when the members of the Church met, should satisfy their hunger beforehand in their own houses (1 Cor. xi. 34).

The classification of Agapae, according to the occasion on which they were held, as (1) connected with the anniversaries of martyrdoms [comp. NATALITIA], (2) as Communiões [comp. MARRIAGE], (3) as accompanying funerals [BURIAL], (4) as at the dedication festivals of churches [DEDICATIONS], must be looked on as an after-growth of the primitive practice of weekly meetings. Details will be found under the respective headings.

We have lastly to notice the probable use at the Agapae of cups and plates with sacred emblems and inscriptions, of which so many have been found in the Catacombs [GLASS, CHRISTIAN], and which almost suggest the idea of toasts to the memory of the martyrs whose Natalities were celebrated. "Virtus VIVAS IN NOMINE LAURETI" (Buonarrotti. Plate six, fig. 2), "SEMPER FRFRIGERIS IN NOMINE DEI" (Ibid. xx. 2), "THE ZHETAI EN ATAOOIZ, DULCIS ANIMA VIVAS, BIBAS (for VIVAS) IN PACE," are examples of the inscriptions thus found. In the judgment of the archaeologist just referred to, they go back to the third, or even to the second century. The mottoes were probably determined by the kind of Agapae for which they were intended (comp. Martigny, art. Fonds de Coupe). [E.H.P.]

It was assembled "ex permisso domini nostri gloriosissimi magnificissimique regis," sc. Alaric; without any mention of the pope (Synnchichus), save as mentioning his year in the tit'e (Mansi. viii. 319-346). [A. W. H.]

AGE, CANONICAL. The age required by the canons for ordination. In the case of bishops, it appears to have been the rule of the Church from early times that they should be thirty years old at the time of their ordination. This rule, however, was frequently dispensed with, either in cases of necessity or in order to promote persons of extraordinary worth and singular qualifications. It may be questioned whether this rule was observed from the days of the Apostles, as it is nowhere enjoined in St. Paul's Pastoral Epistles or elsewhere in the New Testament. And in the so-called Apostolical Constitutions, which may be taken as expressing the system of the Eastern Church as it was established about the end of the third century, fifty is the age required of a bishop at his ordination, except he be a man of singular merit, which may compensate for the want of years.

The age of thirty is required by implication by the Council of Neocaesarea, A.D. 314, which forbids to admit any one, however well qualified, to the priesthood, under thirty years of age, because the Lord Jesus Christ at that age began His ministry. The Council of Agde (Concilium Agathense) forbids the ordination of bishops or priests under thirty years of age.

By this rule, as enacted by the above-named councils, the ordinary practice of the Church has been regulated. The deviations, however, in special cases have been numerous, and for these a warrant may be found in the case of Timothy, whose early ordination as Bishop of Ephesus is inferred from the Apostle's nomination,—“Let no man despise thy youth” (1 Tim. iv. 12). We learn from Eusebius, that Gregory Thaumaturgus and his brother Athenodorus were both ordained bishops very young; ἔτι νέους ἑσθλα. It is probable that Athanasius was ordained to the see of Alexandria before he was thirty. Remigius, Bishop of Rheims, as all authors agree, was ordained at the age of twenty-two, A.D. 471.

In later times, boys of eleven or twelve years of age have been ordained to the episcopate by papal dispensation; but this abuse was unknown to the ancient Church.

before the age of thirty. Justinian, indeed, enacted that none should be a presbyter before thirty-five; but the Sixth General Council of Constantinople reduced it to the old period, appointing thirty for a priest and twenty-five for a deacon. Which ages were also settled in the Saxon Church, as appears by Egbert's Collection of the Canons then in force in this country.

The councils of Agie, 506, of Carthage, 397, of Tralio, 692, of Toledo, 633, all prescribe twenty-five as the minimum of age for a deacon; and, according to Bingham, this rule was very nicely observed, so that we scarce meet with an instance of any one that was ordained before this age in all the history of the Church. For this the Council of Toledo cites the Levitical precedent.

In the Greek Church the age of thirty is still prescribed for a priest, and twenty-five for a deacon. In our own Church, the first Prayer-book of Edward VI. prescribed twenty-one for deacons, twenty-four for priests. The present rubric is a provision of Canon 34.

[D. B.]

AGENDA (from agere in the special sense of performing a sacred act). A word used to designate both the mass and other portions of Divine service.

1. In the plural.—The second Council of Carthage (390) speaks of presbyters who committed a breach of discipline, in that "agant agenda" in private houses, without the authority of the bishop (Canon 9). Innocent I. (Epistola ad Celebrant other agenda, in contrast with the consecration of the mysteries.

2. The plural form "agenda" came in time, like "Biblia" to be considered a singular feminine. For instance, St. Benedict in his Rule, c. 13 (p. 291), speaking of the morning and evening office, says, "Agenda matutina et vespertina non transant."

3. The word "agenda" is not unfrequently used absolutely to denote the office for the dead. This may not improbably be the case in the canon quoted above by the II. Conc. Carthage; and it is certainly used in this sense by Venerable Bede, when, speaking of local commemorations of the dead, he says, "Per omne sabbatum a presbytero loci illius Agendae eorum sollempniter celebrantur" (Vita St. Augustini, in Ducauge s. v.). Compare Menard's note in his edition of Gregory's Sacramentary, p. 482. (Ducauge's Glossary, s. v. "Agenda").

AGNES, or AGNE (ἄγνη). (1) The virgin, martyr at Rome. Her Natalis, which is an ancient and highly-honoured festival, is celebrated Jan. 21 (Mart. Rom. Vet., Hieron., Bedae): Octave, Jan. 28 (ib.). Proper office for the Natalis in the Gregorian Sacramentary, p. 23, and Antiphon in Lit. Antiph. p. 664. By Theodorus Lector (Ekloga II.) the deposition of her relics is joined with the deposition of those of Stephen and Laurence (see Greg. Sacram. p. 304, ed. Meard). She is one of the saints of the Gregorian Canon, where her name appears in the form Agne.

Tillemont (Mém. Eccl. iv. 345) conjectures that the second festival on Jan. 28 commemorates the apparition of St. Agnes to her parents eight days after her death.

AGNUS DEI

Her remains are said to have been buried in a praedictum belonging to her family on the Via Nomentana. The crypt dug to receive them became the nucleus of the famous cemetery of St. Agnes. Two churches at Rome are dedicated to St. Agnes, one of which is said to be that built by Constantine at the request of his daughter Constantia, and is certainly one of the most ancient basilicas in Rome. In early times, it was customary for the Pope to be present at the festival of St. Agnes in this church, in which Gregory the Great delivered several of his homilies (e. g. in Matt. c. xiii., Hom. 2); and in this church still, on Jan. 21, the lambs are blessed, from the wool of which the PALLIA destined for archbishops are to be made.

St. Agnes.

In the illustration, taken from an ancient glass vessel, the doves on each side bear the two crowns of Chastity and of Martyrdom. This representation illustrates the verse of Prudentius (Peristeph. xiv. 7),

"Duplex corona est praestita martyri."

Representations of St. Agnes are found very frequently on glass vessels in the catacombs; only St. Peter and St. Paul are found more often so represented. When alone, she is generally placed between two trees; sometimes she is at the side of the Virgin Mary; sometimes between the Lord and St. Laurence; between St. Vincent and St. Hippolytus; between St. Peter and St. Paul.

(2) There is another festival of St. Agnes on Oct. 18 (Mart. Hieron.). Tillemont (l. c.) conjectures that this was instituted in commemoration of the dedication of some church in her honour. (Marriguy, Dict. des Antiq. chret. p. 22 ff.; the Abbé Marriguy has also written a monograph, Notice historique, liturgique, et archéologique sur le Culte de Ste. Agnès. Paris et Lyons, 1847.)

AGNUS DEI, commemorated Aug. 10 (Mart. Hieron.).

AGNUS DEI. The versicle "Agnus Dei, qui tollis peccata mundi, Misereere nobis," is generally spoken of as the "Agnus Dei."

1. A reference to the "Lamb of God, which taketh away the sin of the world," was introduced (as was natural) into some of the liturgies at an early period. Thus in the Liturgy of St. Chrysostom, during the breaking of the bread, the priest says, Μελέσεται και διασπέρσεται δ ἀγνὸς τοῦ Θεοῦ (Neale's Tetraëgia, 176); and in that of St. James, after breaking and signing with the cross, the priest says, Ἰδὲ δ' ἀγνὸς τοῦ Θεοῦ, ὁ Υἱὸς τοῦ Πατρὸς, ὁ ἀρῶν τὴν ἁμαρτίαν τοῦ κόσμου. σφραγισθὲις ἐπὶ τῆς τοῦ κόσμου ζωῆς καὶ σωτηρίας (ib. 179). And in the ancient "Morning Hymn" [GLORIA IN EXCELSIS] adopted both in Eastern and Western Liturgies, the deprecation is found: Ὁ Υἱὸς τοῦ Πατρὸς, ὁ ἀρῶν τὰς ἁμαρτίας τοῦ κόσμου Ἐλέησον ἡμᾶς.

2. At the Trullan Council (692) it was decreed, among other matters, that the Lord should no longer be pictured in churches under the form of a lamb, but in human form (Canon 82). The then Pope, however, Sergius I., rejected the decrees of this Council (though its conclusions had been subscribed by the Papal legates), and Anastasius the Librarian (in Baron., an. 701, vol. xii. 179) tells us that this Pope first ordered that, at the time of the breaking of the Lord's body, the "Agnus Dei" should be chanted by clerks and people. Some think that Sergius ordered it to be said thrice, where it had previously been said only once; others, as Krazer (De Liturgiis, p. 545), that he ordered it to be said by the whole body of the clergy and people, as being a prayer for all; not, as previously, by the choir only. However this may be, the evidence of the Ordinines Romani I., II., and III. (Mabillon, Museum Italicum, ii. pp. 29, 50, 59), and of Amalarius of Metz, shows that in the beginning of the 9th century the choir alone, and not the priest at the altar, chanted the "Agnus Dei," and this was the case also when Innocent III. wrote his treatise on the "Mystery of the Altar." The Ordinines Romani do not define the number of repetitions of the versicle; but Martene (De Ritibus Ecclesiae, lib. i., c. 4, art. 9) proves from ancient documents that the threefold repetition was expressly enjoined in some churches—as in that of Tours—before the year 1000; and in the 12th century this custom prevailed in most churches. Subsequently, probably from about the 14th century, the "Agnus Dei" came to be said in a low voice by the priest with his deacon and subdeacon. In later times, says Innocent III. (De sacro Altaris Mystero, l. 4, p. 910, Migne), as trouble and adversity fell upon the Church, the response at the third repetition was changed into "Dona nobis pacem;" in the church of St. John Lateran only was the older form retained. When the substitution of "Dona nobis pacem" was made is uncertain; it is found in no MS. older than the year 1000. The reason which Innocent gives for the introduction of the prayer for peace may perhaps be the real one; but it is not an unreasonable conjecture that it had reference to the "pax," or kiss of peace, which was to follow.

3. Gerbert (De Musica Sacra, i. p. 458) mentions among ancient customs the chanting of the "Agnus Dei" by the choir during the time that the people communicated, before the antiphon called "Communion" (Daniel, Codex Liturgicus, i. 148).

4. The "Agnus Dei" was sometimes interpolated with "tropes;" for instance, the following form is quoted by Cardinal Bona from an ancient missal, the date of which he does not mention: "Agnus Dei, qui tollis peccata mundi, crinina tollis, aspera mollis, Agnus honoris, Misereere nobis.

Agnus Dei, qui tollis peccata mundi, vulnere sanas, a dña plenas, Agnus amaris, Misereere nobis, Agnus Dei, qui tollis peccata mundi, sordida mundas, cuncta fecundas, Agnus odoris, Dona nobis pacem" (De Rebus Liturgicis, lib. ii. c. 16, p. 473). And Rupert of Deutz has the addition, "Qui sedes ad dextram Patris, Misereere nobis" (Daniel, Codex Lit., l. 142).

5. The Ambrosian rite the "Agnus Dei" occurs only in masses for the dead; where, after "Donna nobis pacem," the words are added, "Requiem sempiternam, et locum indulgentiae cum sanctis tuis in gloria" (Krazer, De Liturgiis, p. 637).

6. A legend preserved by Robert of Mount St. Michael (in Bona, J. Reb. Lit., lib. ii. c. 16) tells how, in the year 1133, the Holy Virgin appeared to a woodman at work in a forest, and gave him a medal bearing her own image and that of her Son, with the legend "Agnus Dei, qui tollis peccata mundi, Dona nobis pacem." This she bade him bear to the bishop, and tell him that all who wished the peace of the Church should make such medals as these, and wear them in token of peace. [C.]

AGNUS DEI. A medallion of wax, bearing the figure of a lamb. It was an ancient custom to distribute to the worshippers, on the first Sunday after Easter, particles of wax taken from the Paschal taper, which had been solemnly blessed on the Easter Eve of the previous year. These particles were burned in houses, fields, or vineyards, to secure them against evil influences or thunder-strokes.

In Rome itself, however, instead of a Paschal taper, the archdeacon was accustomed to pronounce a benediction over a mixture of oil and wax, from which small medallions bearing the figure of a lamb were made, to be distributed to the people on the first Sunday after Easter, especially to the newly baptised. (Ordo Romanus, i. pp. 25, 31; Amalarius de Ecl. Off. i. 17, p. 1033; Pseudo-Alcuin, de Div. Off. c. 19, p. 482.)

In modern times this benediction of the Agnus Dei is reserved to the Pope himself, and takes place in the first year of each pontificate, and every seventh year following.

The Paschal taper was anciently thought to symbolise the pillar of fire which guided the Israelites, and the Agnus Dei the Passover Lamb (Amalarius, u. s. c. 18; compare the Gregorian Sacramentary, p. 71; "Deus, cuius antiqua miracula in presenti quoque saeculo conscrvare sentimus").

A waxen Agnus Dei is said to have been among the presents made by Gregory the Great to Theodelinda, queen of the Lombards (Frisi, Memorie di Monza, i. 34); but nothing of the kind is mentioned by the saint himself in the letter (Epist. xiv. 12, p. 1270) in which he gives a list of his presents. One was found in 1725 in the church of San Clemente on the Coelian Hill at Rome, in a tomb supposed to be that of Flavius Clemens a martyr. This Agnus is supposed, by De Vitry (in Calogiera's Raccolta, xxxii. 280), to have been placed in the tomb at the translation of the relics which he thinks took place in the 7th century.

An Agnus was frequently enclosed in a case or reliquary; and some existing examples of such cases are thought to be of the 8th or 9th cen-

ALB (al'a, tunica alba, tunica talaris, podoris, linea, suppuris, subucula, camisia; see also STRI-CHARION).

§ 1. The word and its derivation.—The Latin word alba, the fuller expression for which is tunica alba, first appears, as the technical designation of a white tunic, in a passage of Vopiscius, who speaks of an al'ba subsericea, or tunic
 made of silk interwoven with some other material, sent as a present, circ. 265, A. D., from Gal-liens to Claudius (Hist. August. Script. Tre-bellius in Claudio, p. 208). The same expression, al'ba subsericea, occurs more than once in a letter of the Emperor Valerian. The word survives in the Fr. "aube," as in our own "alb." The corresponding Italian word "canice" is derived from "cinnisia" (see below, § 3).

ALB

§ 2. Ecclesiastical use of the word, and of the vestment.—There are two uses of the term in ancient writers, between which it is not always easy to distinguish. When used in the singular it has generally the technical meaning above noticed, that of a white tunic. But in the plural
 the phrase is al'bis, and the like, may either mean "in albs," or, more vaguely and comprehensively, "in white garments." Context only can determine which is meant.

The first recorded instance of the technical use of the term, as a designation of a vestment of Christian ministry, occurs in a canon of the African church (Concil. Carthag. iv. can. 41), dating from the close of the 4th century. That canon prescribes that deacons shall not wear the alb except when engaged in Divine service, "Ut
 diaconus tempore oblationis tantum, vel lectionis, alba utatur." This probably implies that bishops and presbyters, but not deacons, were allowed to wear in ordinary life a long white tunic, resembling that worn in divine service. Other early canons, on the subject of ecclesiastical habits, show, as does the last quoted, that there was a general tendency on the part of the deacons, and other yet inferior orders, to assume the insignia which properly belonged to the higher grades of the ministry. "Human nature" had found its expression in such and the like ways in the early church as in later times.

This conjecture as to an alb being worn by bishops and presbyters even in ordinary life (from the time of the "Peace of the Church" under Constantine), at least on occasions when "full dress" was required, is confirmed by the remarkable mosaics in the church of St. George at Thessalonica. These date in all probability from the 4th century. Among the personages represented, all of them in the more stately dress of ordinary life, there are two only who are ecclesiastics, Philip Bishop of Heraclea, and the Presbyter Romanus; and the dress of each is so arranged as to show the white chiton (or tunic), though an outer tunic of darker colour is also worn. In this respect their dress differs from that of the other figures, which are those of laymen. These mosaics are figured in the Byzantine Architecture of Texier and Pullan (London, 1864).

That an alb was so worn, more or less generally,
 by presbyters, at least in some parts of the West
 in later centuries, appears clearly from such a direction as that of Leo IV. in his Cura Pasto-ralis: "Nullus in alba qua in suo usu utitur presumat missas cantare." This direction is repeated almost verbatim in the Capitula of Hincmar of Rheims (1882), and in the Disciplina Ecclesiastica of Regino, abbot of Prume, in the following century.

§ 3. Primitive forms of the Alb.—In the early ages of the church the alb of Christian ministry was of full and flowing shape, and distinguished in this respect from the closely-fitted tunic of Levitical priesthood. St. Jerome (Epist. ad Epi-biolanum) follows Josephus (Antiq. Jud. iii. 7) in dwelling particularly on this distinctive characteristic of the Levitical tunic; and in order to convey to his readers an idea of its general appearance, he is obliged to refer them to the linen shirts, called camisiae, worn by soldiers when on service. More than four centuries later, Amalarius of Metz quotes this passage of St. Jerome, in his treatise De Ecclesiasticis Officiis (lib. ii. cap. 18); and expressly notices the fact that the Christian alb differed from the ioderis, or full-length tunic of Levitical ministry, in that, while this was strictum, closely fitted to the body, that of the church was largum, full and flowing. With this statement the earliest monuments of ministering vestments quite accord. The albs (if they be not rather dalmatics) worn by Archbishop Maximian and his attendant clergy in the Ravenna mosaics (see Vestiarium Christianum, Pl. xviii.), and under VESTMENTS, and in a less degree, that assigned to the deacon in the fresco representing Ordination in the cemetery of St. Hermes at Rome (Aringhi, Roma Ant. tom. ii. p. 329); and again those worn under a placata by Pope Cornelius of Rome and St. Cyprian of Carthage in frescoes of the 6th century (De Rossi, Roma Sott. vol. i. pp. 298-304) all agree in this respect. In these last, particularly, the albs (possibly DALMATICS, v. w.) worn under the placata, have sleeves as large as those of a modern surplice.

But while this was, no doubt, the prevailing form, we have pictorial evidence to show, that, in the ninth century certainly, and in all probability at a considerably earlier time, a different form of alb was in use side by side with the first. Considerations of practical convenience determined this, as had been the case, we may well believe, in the case of the Levitical priests. If these latter, in the discharge of their sacrificial duties, would have been not only incumbered but endangered by wearing full and flowing linens, so were there occasions, particularly the administration of baptism, when large and full sleeves, like those of the ordinary alb or dalmatic, would have been inconvenient in the highest degree to those engaged in offices of Christian ministry. We find accordingly, in an illumination dating from the 9th century (see woodcut in the article BAPTISM), that the priest in baptizing wore a closely fitted alb, girded. This is, we have reason to believe, the earliest example in Christian art of an alb so shaped; but in later centuries, as the "sacred vestments" continually increased in number, the alb, which was worn underneath the rest, was gradually more and more contracted in form; and at the present time the alb, technically so called, is a closely-fitting vestment, girded, nearly resembling that of the priest in the plate just referred to.

§ 4. Decoration of the alb.—Like other vestments which, in primitive times, were of white linen only, the alb was often enriched in later times in respect of ornament, material, and colour. Details as to this are given by Bock (Liturgische Gewänder, li. 33) and by Dr. Rock (Church of our Fathers, vol. i. p. 424 sqq.). The most common ornaments of the kind were known as parure (a shorter form of paraturae), which were oblong patches, richly coloured and ornamented, attached to the tunic. Hence a distinction between alba parata, an alb with "apparel" (technically so called), and alba pura, this last being the "white alb plain" spoken of in the first Prayer-book of Edward VI. These albæ paratae date, according to Professor Weiss, from the close of the 10th century (Kostumkunde, u. s. w., p. 667). But this is true only of ecclesiastical use. Ornaments like in kind to these apparels had long been in use for the richer albs worn by persons of high secular rank. They were called Paragaudae, from a Syriac word of similar import. See Casaubon's note on the passage of Trebellius referred to in § 1. [W.B.M.]

Everywhere, of course, there was instruction (κατήχησις) of some kind for converts [CATECHUMENS]; everywhere, before long, there must have been some provision made for the education of Christian children. teachers, and affected, directly and indirectly, the theology of the Church at large. The lives of these teachers, and the special characteristics of their theological speculations will be treated elsewhere. Here it is proposed to consider (1) the outward history of the school; (2) its actual mode of working, and general influence on the religious life of the Alexandrian Church.

(1) The origin of the Alexandrian school is buried in obscurity. Eusebius (H. E., v. 10) speaks of it as of long standing (ἐξ ἀρχαίου ἔθους), but the earliest teacher whom he names is Pantenus, circ. A.D. 180. If we were to accept the authority of Philip of Sida (Fragm. in Dodwell's Dissert. in Iren. Oxf. pp. 488-497), the honour of being its founder might be conceded to Athenagoras, the writer of the Apologia; and this would carry us a few years further. But the authority of Philip is but slight. His list is manifestly inaccurate, the name of Clement coming after Origen, and even after Dionysius, and the silence of Eusebius and Jerome must be held to outweigh his assertion. Conjecture may look to St. Mark (Hieron., Cat. 36), with more probability, perhaps, to Apollon, as having been the first conspicuous teacher at Alexandria. Pantenus, however, is the first historical name. He taught both orally and by his writings, and, though his work was interrupted by a mission to India, he seems to have returned to Alexandria, and to have continued teaching there till his death. First working with him, and then succeeding him, we have the name of Clement, and find him occupying the post of teacher till the persecution of Severus, A.D. 202, when he with others fled for safety. The vacant place was filled by Origen (Euseb. H. E. vi. 3), then only eighteen years of age, but already well known as a teacher of grammar and rhetoric, and as having studied profoundly in the interpretation of the Scriptures. It is probable, but not certain, that he himself had attended Clement's classes. As it was, seekers after truth came to him in such numbers that he renounced his work as an instructor in other subjects, and devoted himself to that of the school which was thus reopened. Clement may possibly have returned to Alexandria, and worked with him till his death, circ. A.D. 220. Origen himself left soon afterwards, and founded, in some sense, a rival school at Caesarea. Of the teachers that followed we know little more than the names. Philip of Sida (l. c.) gives them as Heraclas, Dionysius, Pierius, Theognostus, Serapion, Peter, Menearius, Didymus, Rhodon. Eusebius (H. E. vii. 32) names Pierius as a man of philosophical attainments at Alexandria, and mentions Achillas more distinctly as having been entrusted with the διδασκαλείον there under the episcopate of Theonas. He further speaks of the school as existing in his own time (circ. A.D. 330). Theodoret (i. 1) names Arius as having at one time been the chief teacher there, and Sozomen (H. E. iii. 15) and Rufinus (H. E. ii. 7) name Didymus, a teacher who became blind, as having held that post for a long period of years (circ. A.D. 340-395). During the later years of his life he was assisted by Rhodon as a conjutor, who, on his death, re-

It may be worth while to note the names by which it is described—(1) τὸ τῆς καθήκοντος, or τὸ τῶν ἱερῶν λόγων διδασκαλείον, Euseb., H. E. v. 10, vi. 3, 28. (2) τὸ ἱερὸν διδασκαλείον τῶν ἱερῶν μαθημάτων, Sozom. iii. 15. (3) Ecclēstastica Schola, Hieron., Cat. c. 38.

moved to Sida, where he numbered among his pupils the Phillip from whom we get the list of the succession. This seems to have broken up the school, and we are unable to trace it further.

(2) The pattern upon which the work at Alexandria was based may be found in St. Paul's labours at Ephesus. After he ceased to address the Jews through his discourses in the synagogue he turned to the "school" (σχολή) of Tyrannus (Acts, xix. 9). That "school" was probably a lecture-hall (so the word is used by Plutarch, Vit. Ardi. c. 29), which had been used by some teacher of philosophy or rhetoric, and in which the apostle now appeared as the instructor of all who came to inquire what the "new doctrine" meant. Something of the same kind must have been soon found necessary at a place like Alexandria. With teachers of philosophy of all schools lecturing round them, the Christian School could not but feel the need of lecturers of its own. Elsewhere among slaves and artisans it might be enough to hand down the simple tradition of the faith, to develop that teaching as we find it in the Catechesis of Cyril of Jerusalem. The age of apologists, appealing, as they did, to an educated and reading class, must have made the demand for such teachers more urgent, and the appearance of Pantenus as the first certainly known teacher, indicates that he was summoned by the Church to supply it. In a room in his own house, or one hired for the purpose, the teacher received the inquirers who came to him. It was not a school for boys, but for adults. Men and women alike had free access to him. The school was open from morning to evening. As of old, in the schools of the Rabbis, as in those of the better sophists and philosophers of Greece, there was no charge for admission. If any payment was made it came, in the strictest sense of the word, as an honorarium from grateful pupils (Euseb. H. E. vi. 4). After a time he naturally divided his hearers into classes. Those who were on the threshold were, it is natural to think, called on, as in the Chōn'tis ad Graecos of Clement, to turn from the obscenities and frivolities of Paganism to the living and true God. Then came, as in his Prolegomenus, the "milk" of Catechesis, teaching them to follow the Divine Instructor by doing all things, whether they ate or drank, in obedience to His will. Then the more advanced were led on to the "strong meat" of ἡ ἐπιστημὴ θεωρία (Clem. Alex., Strom. v. p. 686, Pott.). At times he would speak, as in a continuous lecture, and then would pause, that men might ask the quest as which were in their hearts (Origen, in Matt. Tr. xiv. 16). The treatises which remain to us of Clement's, by his own account of them, embody his reminiscences of such instruction partly as given by others, partly doubtless as given by himself. We may fairly look on Origen's treatises and expositions as having had a like parentage. Comp. Guerike, De Scholā Alex.; Hasselbach, De Schola Alex.; Redepenning's Origenes, i. 57, ii. 10; and Art. ALEXANDRIA, COUNCILS OF. There were no councils of Alexandria proportionate to its situation as the marino gate of the East, or to the fame of its catechetical and eclectic schools.

or to its ecclesiastical position, as having been the second see of the world. And the first of them was held A.D. 230, under Demetrius, in a hasty moment, to pass judgment upon one of the most distinguished Alexandrians that ever lived, Origen: his chief fault being that he had been ordained priest in Palestine, out of the diocese. His works were condemned in this, and he himself excommunicated and deposed in a subsequent council; but both sentences were disregarded by the bishops of Palestine, under whose patronage he continued to teach and to preach as before.

- A.D. 245—There was a synod under Heraclas, who is said to have appointed 29 bishops; one of whom, Amnonius, having betrayed the faith, was reclaimed at this synod.
- A.D. 264—This was a synod, under Dionysius, against the errors of Sabellius; in another, Neptianus, a bishop of Egypt, and Cerinthus fell under censure for their views on the Millennium.
- A.D. 306—under Peter; against Meletius, a bishop of Lycopolis, who had sacrificed to idols, and was therefore deposed.
- A.D. 321—Against Arius, who was deposed in two synods this year under Alexander.
- A.D. 324—Against Arius once more; but this time under Hosius, Bishop of Cordova, who had been despatched to Alexandria to make enquiries, by Constantine.
- A.D. 328—When St. Athanasius was consecrated bishop. (On the date, see Mausi, li. 1085.)
- A.D. 340—In favour of St. Athanasius. Deputies were sent from the council to Rome and Tyre in that sense. Its synodical letter is given by St. Athanasius in his 2nd Apology.
- A.D. 352—Called "Egyptian;" in favour of St. Athanasius again.
- A.D. 362—under St. Athanasius, on his return from exile, concerning those who had Arianised. It published a synodical letter. On its wise and temperate decisions, see Newman's Arians, v. 1.
- A.D. 363—under St. Athanasius on the death of Julian; published a synodical letter to the new emperor Jovian.
- A.D. 371—Of 90 bishops, under St. Athanasius; to protest against Auxentius continuing in the see of Milan. This is one of those called "Egyptian."
- A.D. 371—under St. Athanasius the same year; to receive a profession of faith from Marcellus, Bishop of Ancyra, which turned out orthodox.
- A.D. 399—Against the followers of Origen, who were condemned. Part of its synodical letter is preserved in that of the emperor Justinian to Mennas on the same subject long afterwards.
- A.D. 430—under St. Cyril against Nestorius; where St. Cyril indited his celebrated epistle with the twelve anathemas.
- A.D. 457—under Timothy, surnamed Aelurus, or the Cat, at which the Council of Chalcedon was condemned. This was repeated, A.D. 477.
- A.D. 482—At which John Tabenniosites was consecrated bishop; he was ejected at once by the emperor Zeno, when Peter Mogus returned, and in a subsequent synod the same year condemned the 4th council, having first caused a schism amongst his own followers by subscribing to the Henotonicon (Evag. lii. 12-14).

ALEXANDRIA

- A.D. 485—under Quintian, to pronounce Peter the Fuller deposed from Antioch.
- A.D. 578—The last of those called Egyptian; it was composed of Jacobites, to consider the case of the Jacobite patriarch of Antioch, Paul.
- A.D. 589—under Eulogius; against the Samaritans.

A.D. 633—under Cyrus, the Monothelite patriarch: the acts and synodical letter of which are preserved in the 13th action of the 6th general council. This is the last on record.

The interests of the Church History of Alexandria are so great, that a few words may be added respecting its patriarchate.

The patriarchate of Alexandria grew out of the see founded there by St. Mark, "according to the constant and unvarying tradition both of the East and West" (Neale's Patriarch of Alex. l. i.); to which jurisdiction was assigned, as of ancient custom appertaining, by the 6th Nicene canon, over "Egypt, Libya, and Pentapolis." This was, in effect, what was already known as the Egyptian diocese, being one of five placed under the jurisdiction of the prefect of the East, and comprehending itself six provinces. Of these, Augustanica was subdivided into Augustanica prima, and secunda: the first stretching upon the coast from Rhinocorura on the borders of Palestine to Diospolis on the east of the Mendesian mouth of the Nile, with the second immediately under it inland; Egypt proper was likewise subdivided into prima and secunda, of which secunda stretched westwards of the same mouth of the Nile along the coast, with prima lying immediately under it inland. Then Arcadia at Heptanomis, forming the 3rd province, lay under Augustanica secunda and Aegyptus prima on both sides of the Nile; and south of this Thebais, or the 4th province, whose subdivisions, prima comprehended all the rest of the country lying north, and secunda all the country lying south of Thebes, included in Egypt. Returning towards the coast, westwards of Aegyptus secunda, the 5th province, Libya inferior or secunda, was also called Narmarica; and to the west of it was the 6th province, Libya Pentapolis, also called Cyrenaica. The ecclesiastical arrangements in each of these provinces have yet to be given. For this purpose the "Notitia" published by Beveridge (Synod. li. 143-4) might have been transcribed at length; but as the sites of so many of the sees are unknown, their mere names, which are often uncouth and of doubtful spelling, would be devoid of interest. It may suffice to enumerate them, with their metropolis in each case. Thus Augustanica prima contained 14 episcopal sees, of which Pelusium was the metropolis; Augustanica secunda 6, at the head of which was Leonto; Aegyptus prima 20, at the head of which was Alexandria; Aegyptus secunda 12, at the head of which was Cabasa. The province of Arcadia contained 6, under the metropolitan of Oxyrinchus; but 7 are given subsequently, corresponding to the 7 mouths of the Nile, of which Alexandria is placed first.

There were 8 sees in Thebais prima, under the metropolitan of Antino; and twice that number in Thebais secunda, under the metropolitan of Ptolemais. Libya secunda, or Marmarica, contained 8, under the metropolitan of Drancoen; and Libya Pentapolis 6, at the head of which was Soziza. Tripoli was a later acquisition, including 3 sees only. They may have been placed under Alexandria subsequently to the time of the 4th Council, when all to the west of them lay in confusion under the Vannals; and possibly may have been intended to compensate for those two sees of Berytus and Babba bordering on Palestine, of which Alexandria was then robbed to swell the patriarchate of Jerusalem on the south-west (Cave, Ch. Hist. iv, 11). The list of sees in Le Quien (Oriens Christianus, vol. II, p. 330-640), illustrated by a map of the patriarchate from D'Anville, agrees with the above in most respects, only that it is shorter.

Alexandria had been synonymous with orthodoxy while St. Athanasius lived; shortly after his death, however, the next place after Rome, which it had ever enjoyed from Apostolic times, was given by the 2nd General Council to Constantinople. For this it seemed to have received ample compensation in the humiliation of the Constantinopolitan patriarch Nestorius, at the 3rd Council under St. Cyril; when the want of tact and perverseness of his successor Dioscorus enabled the more orthodox patriarchs of Jerusalem and Constantinople to help themselves at its expense, and obtain sanction for their proceedings at the 4th Council. For a time, it is true, Rome peremptorily refused assenting to them; and charged their authors with having infringed the Nicene canons. But Alexandria falling into the hands of those by whom the doctrinal decisions of the 4th Council were called in question and even condemned, Rome naturally ceased taking any further steps in its favour; and under Jacobite patriarchs principally, and sometimes exclusively, Alexandria gradually came to exercise no palpable influence whatever, even as 3rd see of the world, on the rest of the Church. Le Quien reckons 48 patriarchs in all, down to Eustathius, who was consecrated A.D. 801, but several of them were heretical; and there were numerous anti-patriarchs, both heretical and schismatical, from time to time disputing their claims. The 'Art de vérifier les Dates' makes this Eustathius the 66th patriarch. Dr. Neale makes him the 40th, and contemporary with Mark II., the 49th Jacobite patriarch.

There were several peculiarities connected with the see of Alexandria, which have been variously explained. One rests upon the authority of Eutychius, patriarch of Alexandria in the 10th century, and of St. Jerome. The words of Eutychius are as follows: "St. Mark along with Ananias ordained 12 presbyters to remain with the patriarch; so that when the chair should become vacant, they might elect one out of the 12 on whose head the other 11 should lay their hands, give him benediction, and constitute him patriarch; and should after this choose some other man to supply the place of the promoted presbyter, in such sort that the presbytery should always consist of 12. This custom continued at Alexandria till the time of the patriarch Alexander, one of the 318 (Fathers of None) who forbade the presbyters in future to ordain their patriarch; but decreed that on a vacancy of the see, the neighbouring bishops should convene for the purpose of filling it with a proper patriarch, whether elected from those 12 presbyters or from any others." Eutychius adds, "that during the time of the first 10 patriarchs, there were no bishops in Egypt; Demetrius the 11th having been the first to consecrate them." (Taken from Neale, p. 9.) This perhaps may serve to explain the extreme offence taken by Demetrius at the ordination of Origen to the priesthood out of the diocese, if a priest in Alexandria was so much more to the bishop than a priest elsewhere. It may also serve to explain the haste with which Alexander instituted proceedings against Arius. The passage of St. Jerome seems conclusive as to the interpretation to be given to that of Eutychius. This Father in an epistle to Evagrius, while dwelling on the dignity of the priesthood, thus expresses himself: "At Alexandria, from the time of St. Mark the Evangelist to that of the bishops Heraclas and Dionysius (in the middle of the 3rd century), it was the custom of the presbyters to nominate one, elected from among themselves, to the higher dignity of the bishopric; just as the army makes an emperor, or the deacons nominate as archdeacon any man whom they know to be of active habits in their own body." (Ibid.). St. Jerome would be talking nonsense, if the 12 of whom he is speaking had been bishops themselves; that is, of the same rank as their nominee was to be. Hence the theory of an episcopal college, to which Dr. Neale seems to incline, falls to the ground at once. On the other hand, it seems unquestionable that St. Jerome must have meant election, not ordination, from the marked emphasis with which he lays down elsewhere that presbyters cannot ordain. Otherwise, from the age in which Eutychius lived, and still more the language in which he wrote, it would hardly be possible to prove that he meant election only, when he certainly seems to be describing consecration. But again, if there were "no bishops in Egypt during the time of the first ten patriarchs," how could episcopal consecration be had, when once the patriarch had ceased to live? To this no satisfactory answer has ever been returned. Eutychius, though he lived in the 10th century, may be supposed to have known more about the ancient customs of his see, in a land like Egypt, than those who have decried him. And certainly, though we know there were bishops in Egypt under Demetrius, for two synods of bishops (Phot. Bibl. s. 118 and Huet. Origen. i. 12) we are told, met under him to condemn Origen; it would be difficult to produce any conclusive testimony to the fact that there were any episcopal sees there, besides that of Alexandria, before then. The vague statement of the Emperor Adrian, "Illi qui Serapim colunt Christiani sunt; et devoti sunt Serapi, qui se Christi episcopos dicunt," speaking of Egypt, clearly warrants no such inference, standing alone; nor does it appear to have ever been suggested that each of the first ten patriarchs consecrated his successor during his own life-time. Yet there was a strange haste in electing a new patriarch of Alexandria, that seems to require some explanation. The new patriarch, we learn from Libe-

ratus, always entered his predecessor; and before doing so, placed his dead hand on his own head. Can it have been in this way, during that early period, extraordinary as it may seem, that episcopal consecration was supposed to be obtained, as it were, in one continuous chain from St. Mark himself? The position of the patriarch after consecration was so exceptional, that it would be no wonder at all if his consecration differed materially from all others. In civil matters his authority was very great; in ecclesiastical matters it was quite despotic. All bishops in Egypt were ordained by him as their sole metropolitan. If any other bishop ever performed metropolitan functions, it was as his delegate. The Egyptian bishops themselves, in the 4th action of the Council of Chalcedon, professed loudly that they were impotent to act but at his bidding; and hence they excused themselves from even subscribing to the letter of St. Leo while they were without a patriarch, after Dioscorus had been deposed; and that so obstinately, that their subscription was allowed to stand over, till the new patriarch had been consecrated. The patriarch could moreover ordain presbyters and deacons throughout Egypt in any number, where he would; and it is thought probable that the presbyters, his assessors, had power given them by him to confirm. All the episcopal sees in Egypt seem to have originated with him alone. As early as the 3rd century we find him called "papa," archbishop in the next, and patriarch in the 5th century, but not till after St. Cyril. In later times, "judge of the whole world" was a title given him, on account of his having formerly fixed Easter. On the liturgies in use in the Egyptian diocese, Dr. Neale says (General Introduct. i. 323-4), "The Alexandrine family contains 4 liturgies: St. Mark, which is the normal form. St. Basil, St. Cyril, and St. Gregory. . . . St. Mark's was the rite of the orthodox Church of Alexandria. . . . The other three are used by the Monophysites. St. Basil (i. e. the Copto-Jacobite) is the normal and usual form; St. Gregory is employed in Lent; St. Cyril on festivals. . . . Why the first of these liturgies bears the name of Basil" is uncertain. "It is not possible now to discover its origin, though it would appear to have been originally Catholic; to have been translated from the Greek into Coptic, and thence after many ages into Arabic. The liturgy of St. Cyril is to all intents and purposes the same as that of St. Mark. . . . and in both that, and in the office of St. Gregory, the first part is taken from the normal liturgy of St. Basil." Both the proanaphoral and anaphoral parts of the Copto-Jacobite liturgy of St. Basil, together with the anaphoral part of that of St. Mark are given in parallel columns further on in the same work. And the Copto-Jacobite patriarchal church at Alexandria, said to be the burial-place of the head of St. Mark, and of 72 of the patriarchs, is described there likewise, p. 277. Between the two works of Dr. Neale already cited, and the Oriens Christianus of Le Quien, everything further that has yet been discovered on the subject of this patriarchate may be obtained.

ALIENATION

ALIENATION OF CHURCH PROPERTY.

—In treating of a subject like that of the alienation of Church property, the canons and other authorities cited as evidence of the law concerning it might either be arranged according to the various descriptions of property to which they refer, or else the entire legislation of each church and nation might be exhibited in chronological order apart from the rest. The latter plan has been here adopted, both as being more suitable to a general article, and also because in matters of church order and discipline the canons of councils were not in force beyond the limits of the churches in which they were authoritatively promulgated.

The alienation—by which is to be understood the transference by gift, sale, exchange, or perpetual emphyteusis—of Church property [see PROPERTY OF THE CHURCH] was from early times restrained by special enactments.

It is a much debated question amongst Canonists whether or not alienation, except in extraordinary cases, was absolutely prohibited in the first ages of the Church, by reason of the sacred character impressed upon property given to God (see Balsamon in can. 12, Conc. VII. ap. Beveridge Pand. Can. i. 303). As, however, the property of the Church must in those times, have consisted only of the offerings and oblations of the faithful, which were placed in the hands of the bishops,^a it would appear most probable that they were free to make such use of it as they might think would be productive of the greatest benefit to their several dioceses.

The general law of the Church has been well epitomised in the Commentary of Balsamon (ap. Beveridge Pand. Can. ii. 177). "Unusquisque nostrorum Episcoporum rationem administrationis rerum sue Ecclesie Deo reddet. Vasa enim pretiosa Ecclesiarum, seu sacra, et reliqua Deo consecrata, et possessiones immobiles, non sunt alienabilia, et Ecclesie servantur. Ecclesiasticorum autem relictuum administratio secure crediti auctoritate committi debere illis, qui statim temporibus sunt Episcopi." Its history, as it is found in the councils of different churches, has now to be traced.

In the East.—The earliest canon which refers to the subject is the 15th canon of the Council of Ancyra (A.D. 314), which provides that the Church (on the expression τὸ κληροῦν see Beveridge, Advoc. in loc.) may resume possession of whatever property the presbyters of a diocese may have sold during the vacancy of the see; but this canon does not limit any power which the bishop himself may previously have possessed, and is simply an application of the well-known rule "sede vacante nihil innovatur."

The Council of Antioch (A.D. 341) has two canons, the 24th and 25th, bearing upon this question, which are either imitated from the 39th and 40th Apostolic Canons, or have been imitated by the authors of that collection [AROSTOLIC CANONS]. The 24th directs that Church property, which ought to be administered subject to the judgment and authority of the bishop, should be distinguished in such a way that the presbyters and deacons may know of what it consists, so that at the bishop's death it may not be embezzled, or lost, or mixed up with his private property. That part of this canon in which reference is made to the duties imposed on presbyters and deacons is not contained in the Apostolic canon. This omission would seem to point to the conclusion that this council is later in date than the 39th Apostolic canon; and Beveridge (Cod. Can. l. 45) draws the same inference to the date of the 40th Apostolic canon from its not making mention of ο τῶν ἀρχιεπισκοπικῶν κληρικῶν which are to be found in the 25th Canon of Antioch. By the 25th canon it is provided that the Provincial Synod should have jurisdiction in cases where the bishop is accused of converting Church property to his own use, which was also forbidden by the 37th Apostolic canon, ὑποδύσθαι of the presbyters and deacons, and also in cases where the bishop or the presbyters who are associated with him are accused of any misappropriation for their own benefit. Here again it will be noted that the effect of this canon is to make provision for the better and more careful management of Church property, and that it does not abridge any right of alienation which the bishop may have before possessed. It must, however, be observed that the power of the bishop to manage (χειρίζειν) Church property (an expression which would doubtless include the act of alienation) is qualified by the proviso that it must be exercised with the consent of his presbyters and deacons.

^a On the nature of this tenure see Smith's Dictionary of Greek and Roman Antiquities, sub voce, "Emphyteusis." It may be described in brief as the right to use another person's land as one's own, on condition of cultivating it, and paying a fixed rent at fixed times.

^b The oath now taken by bishops consecrated according to the Roman ordinal, contains a clause relating to the alienation of Church property. In what words and at what time a clause of this nature was first introduced into the ordinal is a question which has given rise to much controversy.

The 7th and 8th canons of the Council of Gangra (the date of this council is uncertain, some writers placing it as early as A.D. 324, and others as late as A.D. 371; see Van Espen, Dissertatio in Synodum Gangrænsium, Op. iii. 120, ed. Lovani. 1753, and Beveridge, Adnot. in id. Conc., who inclines to the opinion that it was held a short time before the Council of Antioch, A.D. 341), prohibit under pain of anathema all persons from alienating (διδόναι ἕξω τῆς ἐκκλησίας) produce belonging to the Church, except they first obtain the consent of the bishop or his oecumenus, or officer entrusted with the care of Church property.

The enactments contained in the second Council of Nicea (or as it is generally styled the 7th Oecumenical Council) A.D. 787, will be more conveniently considered below.

The African Church seems to have found it necessary to place special restrictions upon the power of alienating Church property possessed by bishops under the general law. By the 31st canon of the code known as the Statuta Ecclesie Antiqua, promulgated (according to Bruns, Canonnes, l. 140) at the 4th Council of Carthage (A.D. 398), the bishop is enjoined to use the possessions of the Church as trustee, and not as if they were his own property; and by the next canon all gifts, sales, or exchanges of Church property made by bishops without the consent in writing ("absque conniventia et subscriptione") of their clergy are pronounced invalid. In the 31st canon there are further provisions against the unauthorized alienation of Church property by the inferior clergy. If convicted in the synod of this offence they are to make restitution out of their own property.

Again by the 26th (ap. Ben. 29th) canon of the Codex Ecclesie Africanae promulgated A.D. 419, which repeats the 4th canon of the 5th Council of Carthage (A.D. 401), it is ordained that no one sell the real property belonging to the Church; but if some very urgent reason for doing so should arise, it is to be communicated to the Primate of the Province, who is to determine in council with the proper number of bishops (i.e. twelve) whether a sale is to be made or not; but if the necessity for action is so great that the bishop cannot wait to consult the synod, then he is to summon as witnesses the neighbouring bishops at least, and to be careful afterwards to report the matter to the synod. The penalty of disobedience to this canon was deposition. By the 33rd canon (ap. Ben. 36th) presbyters are forbidden to sell any Church property without the consent of their bishops; and in like manner the bishops are forbidden to sell any Church lands (praedia) without the privy consent of their Synod or presbyters. (See on these canons Van Espen, Op. iii. 299, &c.; and the Scholion of Balsamon ap. Ben. Pand. Can. l. 551.)

Passing from Asia Minor and Africa to Italy, the earliest provisions with reference to alienation to be found in the councils are in the council held at Rome by Pope Symmachus in A.D. 502. The circumstances under which the canons of this council were passed (and which relate solely to the question of alienation) are thus described by Dean Milman: "On the vacancy of the see [by the death of Pope Simplicius, A.D. 483] occurred a singular scene. The clergy were assembled in St. Peter's. In the midst of them stood up Basilius, the Patrician and Prefect of Rome, acting as Vicegerent of Odoacer the barbarian King. He appeared by the command of his master, and by the admonition of his master, and to take care that the peace of the city was not disturbed by any sedition or tumult during the election. . . . He proceeded, as the protector of the Church from loss and injury by churchmen, to proclaim the following edict: 'That no one under the penalty of anathema should alienate any farm, buildings, or ornaments of the churches; that such alienation by any bishop present or future was null and void.' So important did this precedent appear, so dangerous even in those days limit the sacerdotal power, that nearly twenty years after, a fortunate occasion was seized by the Pope Symmachus to annul this decree. In a Synod of bishops at Rome the edict was rehearsed, interrupted by protests of the bishops at this presumptuous interference of the laity with affairs of ecclesiastical jurisdiction. The authenticity of the decree was not called in question; it was declared invalid as being contrary to the usages of the Fathers enacted on lay authority, and as not being ratified by the signature of any Bishop at Rome. The same council, however, acknowledged its wisdom by re-enacting its ordinances against the alienation of Church property" (History of Latin Christianity, vol. i, p. 221, 2nd ed.). On this

Connell Boehmer notes that it has not more authority than belongs to it as a Council of the Italian Church, and that therefore its decrees (which go far beyond any yet promulgated elsewhere) were not binding upon other Churches. Previously, however, to this date Pope Leo the Great (A.D. 447) had written to the bishops of Sicily and forbidden the alienation of Church property by the bishops except for the benefit of the Church, and with the consent of the whole clergy (Ep. 17). Pope Gelasius also (A.D. 492-493), writing to Justianus and Faustus (who were acting in the place of their bishop), directed the restitution of all property belonging to the Church of Volterra which had been alienated up to that time; and in another letter he forbade the appropriation of Church lands for the payment of any particular stipend (Fragg. 23 and 24, ap. Thiel).

In the history of the Gallican Church the earliest reference to alienation is to be found in a letter from Pope Hilarius (A.D. 462) to the bishops of the provinces of Vienne, Lyons, Narbonne, and the Maritime Alps, in which he prohibits the alienation of such Church lands as are neither waste nor unproductive ("nec deserta nec damnosa") except with the consent of a council (Ep. 8 sec. ult.).

The Council of Agle (A.D. 506) contains several canons on alienation. The 22nd canon, while declaring that it is superfluous to define anything afresh concerning a matter so well known, and a practice forbidden by so many ancient canons, prohibits the clergy from selling or giving away any Church property under pain of being excommunicated and having to indemnify the Church out of their private resources for any loss, the transaction being at the same time declared void. The 26th canon inflicts the like punishment on those who suppress or conceal or give to the unlawful possessor any document by which the title of the Church to any property is secured. The 48th canon reserves to the Church any property left on the death of a bishop, which he had received from ecclesiastical sources. The 49th canon repeats almost in the same words the above cited 31st canon of the Statuta Ecclesiarum Antiqua; the 53rd canon prohibits, and pronounces void, any alienation by parish priests; while by the 56th canon abbots are forbidden to sell Church property without the bishop's consent, or to manumit slaves, "as it would be unjust for monks to be engaged in their daily labours in the field while their slaves were enjoying the ease of liberty."

The 1st Council of Orleans (A.D. 511) places all the immovable property of the Church in the power of the bishop "that the decrees of the ancient canons may be observed" (canons 14 and 15).

Pope Symmachus, A.D. 513 (who died A.D. 514), in answering certain questions put to him by Caesarius, Bishop of Arles, forbids Church property to be alienated under any pretence, but he permits a life rent to be enjoyed by clerks worthy of reward (Ep. 15).

By the 5th canon of the 1st Council of Clermont (A.D. 535) all persons are excommunicated who obtain any Church property from kings.

In the same year Pope Agapetus writing to Caesarius, Bishop of Arles, says, that he is unwillingly obliged to refuse the bishop permission to alienate some Church lands, "revocant nos veneranda Patrum manifestissima constituta, quibus specialiter prohibetur pœdia juris ecclesiae quolibet titulo ad aliena jura transferre" (Conc. Gall. i. 240).

The 12th canon of the 3rd Council of Orleans (A.D. 538) allows the recovery of Church property within 30 years, and ordains that if the possessor should refuse to obey the judgment of the Council ordering him to surrender, he is excommunicated.

The 23rd canon renews the prohibition against the alienation of Church property by abbots or other clergy without the written consent of the bishop; and by the 9th canon of the 4th Council held at the same city (A.D. 541) it is provided that Church property which has been alienated or encumbered by the bishop contrary to the canons shall, if he has left nothing to the Church, be returned to it; but slaves whom he may have manumitted shall retain their freedom, though they must remain in the service of the Church. The 11th, 18th, 30th, and 34th canons contain further provisions on the subject.

The 1st canon of the 3rd Council of Paris (A.D. 557) is directed against the alienation of Church property, but this canon, as well as those next mentioned, would appear to refer to seizure by force rather than to possession by any quasi-legal process. Alienation is forbidden by the 2nd canon of the 2nd Council of Lyons (A.D. 567).

In the 2nd Council of Tours (A.D. 567) there are two canons—the 24th and 25th—relating to the recovery of Church property from the hands of unlawful possessors.

In Spain the Council held A.D. 589 at Narbonne, which in its ecclesiastical relations must be considered in Spain (Wiltsh. Geog. of the Church, i. 100), prohibits the alienation of Church property by the inferior clergy, without the consent of the bishop, under pain of suspension for two years and perpetual inability to serve in the church in which the offence was committed (can. 8).

By the 3rd Council of Toledo (held in the same year), can. 3, bishops are forbidden to alienate Church property, but gifts which, in the judgment of the monks of the diocese, are not detrimental to the interests of the Church cannot be disturbed; by the next canon bishops may assign Church property for the support of a monastery established with the consent of his Synod.

By the 37th canon of the 4th Council of Toledo (A.D. 633) the bishop is permitted (subject to the confirmation of a Provincial Council) to redeem any promise of reward made for services to the Church.

The 9th Council of Toledo (A.D. 655) contains provisions very similar to the above cited canons of the 3rd Council held at the same place.

In England, Archbishop Theodore of Canterbury (A.D. 668-690) forbids abbots to make exchanges without the consent of the bishop and their brethren (Pœnitentiale—De Abbatibus).

The *Excoꝛtion*es ascribed erroneously to Archbishop Egbert of York (who held that metropolitan see from A.D. 732 to 766) declare that gifts, sales, or exchanges of Church property by bishops without the consent and written permission of the clergy shall be void (cap. 144). The Pœnitentiale, also attributed wrongly to the same prelate, permits exchanges between monasteries with the consent of both communities (addit 25).

The last Council which passed canons on the subject of alienation during the period covered by this article, is the 2d Council of Nicaea (the "Seventh Oecumenical Council") held A.D. 787. The 12th canon making mention of the 39th Apostolic Canon forbids the alienation or transfer of Church lands by bishops and abbots in favour of princes or other secular potentates; and it also, like many of the canons hereinbefore cited, prohibits bishops from appropriating any ecclesiastical property to their own use or to that of their relatives. Even when the retention of any Church lands is unprofitable they may not be sold to magistrates or princes, but to the clergy or to farmers; and these again may not sell them to magistrates, and so contravene the spirit of the canon. Such deceitful transactions are invalid, and the bishop or abbot who is guilty of taking part in them is to be deposed.—See the elaborate Schönon of Balsamon on this canon, ap. Ben. Pand. Can. i. 303.

Having now gone through the principal canons passed by the ecclesiastical assemblies of the first eight centuries, there remain to be considered the laws by which the Christian emperors limited the power of the Church as regards the alienation of its property.

Constantine the Great had in a decree of the year A.D. 323 (secs. 16, 18) assured to the Church the safe enjoyment of its property, and had commanded the restitution as well by the State as by private individuals of all such property as they might have got possession of; but it does not appear that there was any imperial legislation concerning the alienation of Church property until after the promulgation of the Codex Theodosianus in A.D. 438.

The Codex Repetitæ Prælectionis promulgated by Justinian in December A.D. 529 contains in the 2d title of the 1st Book various provisions, made by his predecessors and re-enacted by him, on the subject of alienation.

In the 14th section there is a constitution of the Emperor Leo (A.D. 470) which prohibits the Archbishop of Constantinople, or any of his stewards (oeconomi) from alienating in any way the land or other immovable property or the coloni or slaves or state allowances (civiles annone) belonging to his Church, not even if all the clergy agreed with the Archbishop and his steward as to the propriety of the transaction. The reason given for this stringent law is that as the Church which is the mother of Religion and Faith, is changeless, her property ought to be preserved also without change. Any transactions completed in defiance of this constitution were given to the Church, and all profits resulting therefrom were parties to the act were to be dismissed, and might arise from this infringement of the law. The notaries employed were to be sent into perpetual exile, and the judge who ratified the proceeding was punished by the loss of his office and the confiscation of his property. There the case of a usufruct, the creation of which was permitted for a term of years or for the life of the usufructuary. (The editions of the

The 17th section contains a constitution of the Emperor Anastasius to which no precise date has been promulgated between the years A.D. 491 and 517 (Hacnel, Indices ad Corpus Legum 1857). This constitution, like the last cited, applies solely to the Church of Constantinople, and relates to monasteries, orphanages and other eleemosynary institutions whose property might in cases of necessity be sold, exchanged, mortgaged, or leased in perpetual emphyteusis; provided that the transaction be effected in the manner therein prescribed and in the presence of the civil authorities and the representatives of the particular body whose property is about to be dealt with. It is, however, decreed that there be moveable property (the sacred vessels excepted) sufficient to meet the sum required, the immovable property shall not be touched.

In the 21st section is given a constitution of Justinian himself (A.D. 529) in which he forbids any sale or other alienation of sacred vessels or vestments except only with the object of redeeming captives (and, according to some editions, relieving famine); "quoniam non absurdum est animas hominum quibuscumque vasibus vel vestimentis præferre."

The rule which permitted the sale or melting down of Church plate for the redemption of captives is one of great antiquity. Its propriety is nowhere more eloquently defended than in the following passage from the 2d Book of St. Ambrose De Officiis Ministrorum (cir. A.D. 391) "Quid enim diceres? Timui ne templo Dei ornatus desisset? Responderet: Aurum Sacramenta non quaerunt; neque auro placent, quæ auro non emuntur. Ornatus sacramentorum redemptio captivorum est. Vere illa sunt vasa pretiosa, quæ redimunt animas a morte, ille vero thesaurus est Damii qui operatur quod sanguis Ejus operatus est. . . . Opus est ut quis fide sinceræ et perspicaci providentia munus hoc implet. Sane si in sua aliquis derivat emolumenta, crimen est; sin vero pauperibus erogat, captivum redimit, misericordia est." He concludes by directing that vessels which are not consecrated should be taken in preference to those which have been consecrated; and that both must be broken up and melted within the precinct of the Church (cap. 28). The supreme claims of charity over all other considerations are insisted upon in the same strain by St. Jerome (Ep. ad Nepotianum, A.D. 394) and St. Chrysostom (Hom. 52 in St. Mattheum), while at the same time the proper respect due to the sacred vessels is always emphatically enjoined, as, for example, in St. Optatus, De Schismate Donatistarum vi. 2. An example of the precautions taken against the abuse of this privilege is to be found in one of the letters of Gregory the Great (vii. 13) in which writing (A.D. 597) to Fortunatus, Bishop of Fano, he gives permission for the sale of Church plate in order to redeem captives, but directs, with the view of avoiding all suspicion, that the sale and the payment over of the money received therefrom should be made in the presence of the "defensor."

Passing to the Novells of Justinian—the 7th

Novell (A.D. 535) relates to the question of alienation of Church property, and professes to amend and consolidate the then existing laws, and to extend their operation to the whole of the empire. In the first chapter the alienation, either by sale, gift, exchange, or lease on perpetual emphyteusis, of immovables or quasi-immovables belonging to churches or eleemosynary institutions, was forbidden under the penalties prescribed by the above-cited constitution of Leo.

Under the 2nd chapter alienation is permitted in favour of the emperor when the proper forms are observed and ample compensation made, and when the transaction is for the public benefit. The reason given for this exception is not without significance. In the Latin version it is as follows: "Nec multum differant ab altarato sacerdotium et imperium, et res sacrae a communibus et publicis; quando omnis sacralisimae ecclesiis abundantia et status ex imperialibus magnificentiis perpetuo praebentur."

The third and four succeeding chapters contain regulations for the lease of Church estates by emphyteusis. Their provisions are too elaborate to be set out at length, but may be briefly stated thus: "The usual conditions of these emphyteuses are for three lives—that of the original emphyteuta and of two of his or her heirs, being children or grandchildren, or the husband or wife of the emphyteuta if there be a special clause to that effect (though about this power there is some doubt) in succession. Thus the duration of the lease is indeterminate and contingent. The contract was invalidated by default in payment of the quit rent (canon) for two instead of for three years as was the case with lay emphyteuses" (Colquhoun, Roman Civil Law, § 1709).

The 8th chapter renews the prohibition against the sale, pledge, or melting down of Church plate, except with the object of redeeming captives.

The 12th chapter sanctions the abandonment of all contracts made on behalf of the Church for the acquisition by gift or purchase of unprofitable land.

The 40th Novell (promulgated the following year, A.D. 536) gives to the "Church of the Holy Resurrection" at Jerusalem the privilege of alienating buildings belonging to it, notwithstanding the general prohibition contained in the 7th Novell.

The 46th Novell (A.D. 536 or 537) relaxed the law against the alienation of immovable Church property when there was not sufficient moveable property to pay debts owing to the State or to private creditors. But this step could not be taken except after investigation by the clergy, the bishop, and the metropolitan, and under a decree of the "judex provinciae."

The 2nd chapter of the 54th Novell (A.D. 537) permits exchanges between ecclesiastical and eleemosynary corporations, but the Church of St. Sophia at Constantinople is excepted from the operation of this law as it is also from that of the 46th Novell.

The 55th Novell (A.D. 537) forbids alienation made ostensibly in favour of the emperor, but really for the benefit of private individuals. It also permits churches and other religious bodies (with the exception of the Church of St. Sophia) to lease their lands to one another in perpetual emphyteusis.

The 65th Novell has reference to the alienation of property belonging to the Church of Mysia, but being only of local importance it need not be further considered.

In the 67th Novell (A.D. 538) the number of persons appointed under the 46th Novell to enquire into the propriety of any alienation is increased by the addition of two bishops chosen by the metropolitan from his Synod.

The 10th chapter of the 119th Novell (A.D. 544) permits the alienation by the emperor of Church property which had been transferred to him.

The last of the numerous edicts promulgated by Justinian on the alienation of Church property is contained in the 120th Novell (A.D. 544) in which he again undertakes the task of consolidating the law on this subject.

The first four chapters concern only the Church of Constantinople. The alienation of immovables is forbidden, except in favour of the emperor.

The 5th chapter relates to the property of other Churches. The provisions therein contained, and those contained in the previous chapters on emphyteusis are thus briefly summarized by Colquhoun (Roman Civil Law, § 1709):—"The 120th Novell was promulgated by Justinian in order to modify the rigour of the prohibition against creating perpetual emphyteuses on ecclesiastical property by restricting it to the estates of the Church of Constantinople, leaving the property of other Churches to be regulated by the common law. It is, however, very doubtful whether or not the emphyteusis on Church property can be perpetual without the express stipulation for a term. Nor does the prohibition appear to be absolute even as regards the Church of Constantinople, which had permission to grant perpetual emphyteuses in cases where it owned ruined edifices without the means of restoring them. The Novell fixes the amount at a third of the revenue which such edifices produced before their then ruined state, payable from the date of the emphyteutical title, or at a half of the revenue which the buildings actually produced after their restoration. What is doubtful with respect to the law is clear with regard to ecclesiastical emphyteuses, viz., that they must be reduced to writing. As before, the contract was invalidated by default to pay the quit rent for two instead of three years, as was the case with lay emphyteuses. The point open to discussion, in respect to lay emphyteuses, of whether the rent in arrear may be recovered and the expulsion of the tenant also insisted on, is clear in the case of ecclesiastical emphyteuses in the affirmative. Lastly, the Churches enjoyed a right of resumption entirely exceptional to the common law when the estate accrued 'aut in imperialem domum, aut in sacrum nostrum aerarium, aut in civitatem aliquam, aut in curiam, aut in aliquam venerabilem aliam domum.' This right of resumption applied equally in the case of all transmission of the right, whether inter vivos or mortis causa, without reference to the title of acquisition, and the time for its exercise was two years instead of two months as in lay cases."

to the exchange of ecclesiastical property and the sale of immovables and Church plate for the redemption of captives. The provisions therein contained do not differ in any important particular from the previous laws above cited on the same subject, and they need not be repeated.

The provisions of the Civil Law (which have now been examined) have been usefully arranged by the glossator on the Corpus Juris Civilis, Nov. 7 and Nov. 120 (ed. Lugd. 1627). Immovable property belonging to the Church en-falls within the following classes—1. If it had been given by the emperor (Nov. 120, 7). 2. If the thing to be alienated is the church or monastery itself (ib.). 3. When the proposed trans-ference is the oecumenus or other church (ib.).

4. When the property was given to the Church subject to a condition that it should not be alienated (Nov. 120, 9). 5. If the proposed transference be a heretic (131, 14). But subject to the above restrictions, immovable property may be alienated under the following circumstances, viz.:—1. For debt (Nov. 46).

2. By way of emphyteusis for a term (var.).
3. In exchange with another church (Nov. 54, 2).

4. If the transferee be the emperor (Nov. 7, 2).

5. For the redemption of captives (Nov. 120, 9).

On the other hand movable property can be freely alienated if it be for the advantage of the Church that such a step should be taken. The exception to this rule is in the case of Church plate, which cannot be alienated except for the redemption of captives (Nov. 7, 8 and Nov. 120,

10), and for the payment of debt when it is not necessary for the proper performance of Divine Service (Nov. 120, 10).

The Barbarian Codes contain, as might be expected, many laws directed against the forcible seizure of Church property, but such acts can hardly be considered to fall under the head of alienation. There are, however, a few provisions on the subject anterior in date to the death of Charlemagne.

By the 3rd chapter of the 5th Book of the Leges Visigothorum (cir. A.D. 700; see Davoud Oghlou, Histoire de la Legislation des Anciens Germanais, i. 2) if any bishop or clerk alienate by sale or gift any Church property without the consent of the rest of the clergy, such sale or gift is void, unless it be made according to the ancient canons.

Again in the 20th chapter of the Lex Alaman-norum (which in its present shape was probably compiled about the beginning of the 8th century—see Davoud Oghlou, op. cit. i. 304) the liferous clergy are forbidden to sell Church lands or slaves except by way of exchange.

In the collection entitled Capitularia Regum Francorum there is a Capitulary of the date A.D.
814, forbidding all persons whatsoever to ask for or receive any Church property under pain of excommunication (8, 135).

There are also two Capitularies which are probably not later in date than the one last cited. By the first of these presbyters are for-bidden to sell Church property without the consent of the bishop (7, 27); to which in the second is added the consent of other priests of good reputation (7, 214).

ALLELUIA (Greek Ἀλληλούια). The liturgical form of the Hebrew אֱלֹהֵינוּ, "Sing ye praises to Jehovah;" a formula found in Psalm 117, and in the headings of several Psalms, especially Psalms 113-118, which formed the "Hallel," or Alleluia Magnum, sung at all the greater Jewish feasts. Alleluia and Amen, says the Pseudo-Augustine (Ep. 178, ii. 1160, Migne), neither Latin nor barbarian has ventured to translate from the sacred tongue into his own;
in all lands the mystic sound of the Hebrew is heard.

1. It is thought by some that the early Church transferred to the Christian Paschal feast the custom of singing Psalms with Alleluia at the Paschal sacrifice; and this conjecture derives some probability from the fact, that in the most ancient sacramentaries the Alleluia precedes and follows a verse, as in the Jewish usage it precedes and follows a Psalm. Yet we can hardly doubt that the use of the Alleluia in the Church was confirmed, if not originated, by St. John's vision (Apoc. 19, 6) of the heavenly choir, who sang Alleluia to the Lord God Omnipotent. By the 4th century it seems to have been well known as the Christian shout of joy or victory; for Sozomen (H. E. vii. 15, p. 298) tells of a voice heard (an. 389) in the temple of Serapis at Alexandria chanting Alleluia, which was taken for a sign of its coming destruction by the Christians. The victory which the Christian Britons, under the guidance of Germanus of Auxerre, with their loud shout of Alleluia, gained over the pagan Picts and Scots (an. 429) is another instance of the use of Alleluia for encouragement and triumph (Beda, Historia Ecclesiastica, i. c. 20,
p. 49); and Sidorius Apollinaris (lib. ii. Ep. 10,
p. 53) speaks as if he had heard the long lines of baiters by the river side, as they towed the boats, chanting Alleluia as a "celestium," to make them pull together. These instances are of course not altogether free from suspicion; but they serve to show that in early times the Alleluia was regarded as a natural expression of Christian exultation or encouragement.

2. A special use of the Alleluia is found in the liturgies both of East and West. In most Eastern liturgies it follows immediately upon the CRE-DENDO HYMN, which precedes the greater EN-TRANCE; as, for instance, in those of St. James, St. Mark, and St. Chrysostom (Neale's Tetratolia, pp. 54, 55). In the Mozarabic, which has many Oriental characteristics, it is sung after the Gospel, while the priest is making the oblation:
"Interim quod chorus dicit Alleluia, offerat sacerdos hostiam cum calice" (Neale's Tetratolia,
p. 60). In the West, it follows the GRADUAL,

at. so immediately precedes the reading of the Gospel. In early times it seems to have been simply intoned by the cantor who had sung the Gradual, standing on the steps of the Ambo, and repeated by the choir; but before the 8th century the custom arose of prolonging the last syllable of the Alleluia, and singing it to musical notes (Ordo Romanus II. in Mabillon's Museum Italicum, vol. ii. p. 44). This was called Alleluia. The jubilant sound of the Alleluia, however, was felt to be fitting only for seasons of joy; hence its use was in many churches limited to the interval between Easter and Whitsunday. Sozomen, indeed (H. E. vii. 13, p. 307) seems to say that in the Roman Church it was used only on Easter-day; but we cannot help suspecting that he must have misunderstood his informant, who may have used the word "Pascha" to denote the whole of the seven weeks following Easter-day; for St. Augustine distinctly says (Ep. ad Januarium; Ep. 119 [al. 55] p. 220 Migne) that the custom of singing Alleluia during those fifty days was universal, though in several churches it was used on other days also. In the Rule of St. Benedict (c. 15, p. 297) the use of Alleluia in the responses of the mass seems to be limited to the season from Easter to Whitsunday; but soon after Benedict's time it was probably more common in the West to intermit its use only from Septuagesima to Easter. For at the end of the 6th century, Gregory the Great writes to John of Syracuse (Epist. ix. 12, p. 940) that some murmured because he (Gregory) was overmuch given to following the customs of the Greek Church, and in particular because he had ordered the Alleluia to be said at mass beyond the Pentecostal season (extra tempora Pentecostes); so far, he continues, is this from being the case, that whereas the Church of Rome in the time of Pope Damasus had adopted, through Jerome's influence, from the Church of Jerusalem the limitation of the Alleluia to the season before Pentecost, he had actually innovated on this Greek custom in ordering the Alleluia to be said at other seasons also. This seems the most probable sense of this much-reverted passage, as to the reading and interpretation of which there is much difference of opinion. (See Baronius, Ann. 384, n. 27, vol. v., p. 578; and Mabillon, Museum Italicum, ii. xcvi.) The 4th Council of Toledo (canon 11) orders that (in accordance with the universal custom of Christendom) the Alleluia should not be said in the Spanish and Gaulish churches during Lent—an injunction which seems to imply that its use was permitted during the rest of the year. The same canon (in some MSS.) also forbids the Alleluia on the Kalends of January, "quæ propter errorem gentilium aguntur," but on which Christians ought to fast.

The intermission of Alleluia during a particular season is expressed by the phrase "Alleluia clausum" (Du Cange, s. v.).

3. We have already seen that St. Benedict prescribed the use of the Alleluia in the responses of the Mass from Pasch to Pentecost. He prescribed it also in the ordinary offices (Regula, c. 12, p. 286). From Pentecost to Ash-Wednesday, however, it was to be said in the nocturnal office only with the six last Psalms: "A Pentecoste autem ad caput quadragesime omnibus noctibus cum sex posterioribus Psalmis tan-tum ad nocturnas dicitur" (Regula, c. 15, p. 297).

In the Roman arrangement of the ordinary offices, the Alleluia follows the "Invocatio" in all the hours; but from Septuagesima to the Thursday in Holy Week the verse, "Laus tibi Domine; Rex æternæ gloriæ," is substituted.

4. We learn from Jerome (Ep. 27 [108], § 19, p. 712, ad Eustochium; cf. 23 [38], § 4, p. 175) that the sound of the Alleluia summoned monks to say their offices: "Post Alleluia cantatum, quo signo vocabantur ad collectam, nulli residue licitum erat."

5. It was chanted at funerals; as, for instance, at that of Fabiola (Jerome, Ep. ad Oceanum, 30 [77], p. 466); at that of Pope Agapetus in Constantinople (Baronius, ann. 536, § 64, vol. ix., p. 544).

This usage is found in the Mozarabic rite, and perhaps once existed in the ancient Gallican (Baronius, ann. 590, § 39, vol. x., p. 485).

(Bona, De Divina Psalmodia, c. xvi. § 7; De Rebus Liturgiis, lib. ii., c. 6, § 5; Krazer, De Liturgiis, p. 419.) [C.]

ALL SAINTS, FESTIVAL OF (Omnia Sanctorum Natalis, Festivitas, Solemnitas).—In the Roman Church a particular Sunday, the first after Pentecost, was appropriated in ancient times to the commemoration of all martyrs. Chrysostom, in the Ἐγκόμιον εἰς τοὺς ἁγίους πάντας τοὺς ἐν ἔτει τῷ κόσμῳ μαρτυρήσαντας, says that on the Octave of Pentecost they find themselves in the midst of the band of martyrs; παράθεον ἡμᾶς μαρτύρων χόρος (Opp. ii. 711); and there is a similar allusion in Orat. contra Judæos, vi. (Opp. ii. p. 650). This Festival of All Martyrs became in later times a Festival of All Saints, and the Sunday next after Pentecost appears in the Calendar of the Greek Menologion as Κυριακὴ τῶν Ἁγίων πάντων. The intention in so placing this commemoration probably was to crown the ecclesiastical year with a solemnity dedicated to the whole glorious band of saints and martyrs.

In the West, the institution of this festival is intimately connected with the dedication to Christian purposes of the Pantheon or Rotunda at Rome. This temple, built in honour of the victory of Augustus at Actium, was dedicated by M. Agrippa to Jupiter Vindex, and was called the Pantheon, probably from the number of statues of the gods which it contained, though other reasons are assigned for the name.

Up to the time of St. Gregory the Great, idol-temples were generally thrown down, or, if they were suffered to remain, were thought unworthy to be used in the service of God. Gregory himself at first maintained this principle, but in the latter part of his life, thought it would conduce more to the conversion of the heathen if they were allowed to worship in the accustomed spot with new rites (see his well-known letter to Mellitus, in Bede, Hist. Eccl. ii. 30; Opp. vi. p. 79); and from this time, the principle of converting heathen temples to Christian uses seems to have become fixed. In the beginning of the 7th century, it was at Rome retained almost the solitary monument of the old heathen worship in Rome. In the year 777 Boniface III. obtained from the Emperor Focas the important recognition of the supremacy of Rome over all other churches; and in the same year his successor, Boniface IV., having cleansed and restored

the Pantheon, obtained the emperor's permission to dedicate it to the service of God, in the name
"S. Mariae semper Virginis et omnium Martyr-um;" (Libor Pontif. in Muratori, Rer. Ital. Scriptores, iii. 1, 135). This dedication is commemorated, and is believed to have taken place, on May 13. On this day we find in the old Roman Martyry edited by Rosweyd, "S. Mariae ad Martyres dedicatiois dies agitur a Bonifacio Papa statutus." Baronius tells us, that he found it recorded in an ancient MS. belonging to the Church itself, that it was first dedicated "In honorem S. Mariae, Dei Genetrix, et omnium SS. Martyrum et Confessorum;" and that at the time of dedication the bones of martyrs from the various cemeteries of the city were borne in a procession of twenty-eight carriages to the church. (Martyrol. Rom. p. 204.) The technical use of the word "confessor" seems, however, to indicate a somewhat later date than that of the dedicat on; and Paulus Diaconus (Hist. Longo-bard. iv. 37, p. 570) tells us simply that Phocas granted Boniface permission, "Ecclesiam beatae semper Virginis Mariae et omnium Martyrum
feri, ut ubi quondam omnium non deorum sed
demonum cultus erat, ibi deinceps omnium fieret memoria sanctorum;" and the church bears to this day the name of "S. Maria dei Martiri."
This festival of the 13th May was not wholly confined to the city of Rome, yet it seems to have been little more than a dedication-festival of the Rotunda, corresponding to the dedication-festivals of other churches, but of higher celebrity, as the commemoration of the final victory of Christianity over Paganism.

The history of the establishment of the festival of All Saints on Nov. 1 is somewhat obscure. The Martyrologium Rom. Vct., already quoted, gives under "Kal. Novembr." a "Festivitas Sanctorum, quae celebris et gene-ralis agitur Romae." The very terms here used show that this "Festivitas Sanctorum" was a specially Roman festival, and it was probably simply the dedication-feast of an oratory dedicated by Gregory III. "In honorem Omnium Sanctorum." But in the 8th century, the observance of the festival was by no means confined to Rome. Beda's Metrical Martyrology has

"Multiplex rutilat gemma eae in fronte November, Sanctorum fulget Sanctorum laude decoris."

In the ancient Hieronymian calendar in D'Achery (Spicleg. tom. ii.), it appears under Kal. Novemb., but only in the third place;
"Natalis St. Caesarii; St. Andomari Episcopi;
sive Omnium Sanctorum." The list of festivals in the Penitential of Boniface gives "In solemnitate Omnium Sanctorum;" but the feast is not found in the list given by Chrodegang (an. 762), or in Charlemagne's Capitulary (Opp. Caroli Magni, i. 326) on the subject of festivals. It appears then to have been observed by some churches in Germany, France, and England in the middle of the 8th century, but not universally. It was perhaps this diversity of practice which induced Gregory IV., in the year 835, to suggest to the Emperor Lewis the Pious, a general ordinance on the subject. Siegbert, in his Chronicon (in Pistorius, Script. Germ. tom. i.), tells us, under that year, "Tunc monente Gregorio Papa, et omnibus episcopis assentientibus, Ludovicus Imperator statuit, ut in Gallia et Germania Festivitas Omnium Sanctorum in Kal.

Novemb. celebraretur, quam Romani ex Instituto Bonifacii Papae celebrant." (Compare Adonis Martyrol. ed. Rosweyd, p. 180.) It would seem from this, that the festivals of the latter day and Nov. 1 had already coalesced on May 13 and that the one festival then observed was referred to Boniface IV., who, in fact, instituted that of May 13. The time was perhaps chosen as being, in a large part of Lewis's dominions, the time of leisure after harvest, when men's hearts are disposed to thankfulness to the Giver of all good. From this time, All Saints' day became one of the great festivals of the Church, and its observance general throughout Europe.

It probably had a Vigil from the first, as before the time of its general observance a Vigil and Fast preceded the great festivals of the Church. It may, perhaps, have had an octave from its first institution in Rome itself; but this was not the case in other churches, for an octave of All Saints does not seem to be found in any calendar earlier than the 13th century. Proper collects, preface, and benediction for the "Natalis Omnium Sanctorum" are found in some, but not the most ancient, MSS. of the Gregorian Sacramentary (p. 138).

(Baronius in Martyrologio Romano, May 13 and Nov. 1; Binterlin's Denkwürdigkeiten, vol.
v. pt. 1, p. 487 ff.; Alt in Herzog's Real-Encyclo-pædie, i. 247.)

ALL SOULS, FESTIVAL OF (Omnium fidelium defunctorum memoria or commemoratio).
Very ancient traces of the observance of a day for the commemoration of "the souls of all those who have died in the communion of the body and blood of our Lord" (according to Cyprian) appear in the Fathers of the Church.
Tertullian (De Corona Militis, c. 3) says,
"Oblationes pro defunctis annua die facimus."
And to the same effect he speaks (*De Exhort.
Castitatis*, c. 11, and De Monogam. c. 10) of annual offerings (oblationes) for the souls of the departed. These were probably made on the anniversary of the death, and were especially the business of surviving relatives. So Chrysostom (Hom. 29 in Acta Apost.), speaks of those who made commemoration of a mother, a wife or a child. Similarly Augustine (De Cura pro Mortuis, ch. 4).

It appears from an allusion in Amalarius of Metz (before 837) that in his time a day was specially dedicated to the commemoration of all souls of the departed, and it seems probable that this was the d. following All Saints' Day.
Amalarius says expressly (De Eccl. Officiis, lib.
iii. c. 44) "Anniversaria dies idae repetitur
pro defunctis, quoniam necessarius qualiter eorum causa habentur in altera vita." And in c. 65, he says "Post officium Sanctorum inserui of-ficium pro mortuis; multi enim transierunt de praesenti saeculo qui non illico sanctis conjunguntur, pro quibus solito more officium agitur."
The festival of All Souls is here regarded as a kind of supplement to that of All Saints, and may very probably have taken place on the morrow of that day. But the earliest definite injunction for the observance of a commemoration of all souls of the departed on Nov. 2 appears to he that of Odilo, Abbot of Clugny, in the 10th century. A pilgrim returning from Jerusalem, says Peter Damiani (Vita Odilonis, Opp. ii. 410), reported to Odilo a woful vision which he had had on his journey of the suffering of souls in purgatorial fire; Odilo thereupon instituted in the churches under his control a general commemoration of the souls of the faithful departed on the day following All Saints' Day: "per omnia monasteria sua constituit generale decretum, ut sicut primo die Mensis Novembris juxta universalis Ecclesie regulam omnium Sanctorum solemnitas nigitur; ita sequenti die in psalmis, elemosynis et praeipue Missarum solemnibus, omnium in Christo quiescentium memoria celebraretur." This order was soon adopted, not only by other monastic congregations, but by bishops for their dioceses; for instance, by the contemporary Bishop Notger of Liège (Chronicon Belgicum, in Pistorius's Scriptores Germani, iii. 92). The observance appens, in fact, in a short time to have become general, without any ordinance of the Church at large on the subject.

But even after the observance of a commemoration of All Souls on Nov. 2 became common, we find (Statutus of Calors, in Murten, Theaurus Anecd. iv. 766) that in some places the morrow of St. Hilary's Day (Jan. 14), and in others the morrow of the Octaves of Easter and Pentecost were appropriated to the special commemoration of the souls of the departed (Binterim's Denkwürdigkeiten, vol. v. pt. 1, p. 492 ff.).

ALMS (Ἐλεμοσύνη, non-classical in this sense, either word or thing; although for the thing, see Seneca, De Benefic. vi. 3, and M. Atrial, Épigr. v. 42; and for the word also, Diog. Laert. v. 17: first found in the special meaning of alms in LXX., Dan. iv. 24 [27 Heb.], where the original reads "righteousness;" so also Tobit xii. 9, xiv. 11 [and elsewhere], Ecclesi. iii. 30, iv. 2, vii. 10, xix. 15, 16, xxxv. 2). Alms recognized as a duty throughout the O. T., but brought into prominence in the later Jewish period (cf. Buxtorf, Forl. Hebr. p. 68; Lightfoot, Hor. Hebr. in Mat. vi. 2, Luc. ii. 8), when they were formally and regularly given in the synagogues (Vitring. De Syn. Vet.) to be distributed by appointed officers, as also by putting them into certain trumpet-shaped alms-boxes in the temple, called γαβροφιλάνια (Le Moyne, Not. in Var. Sac. ii. 75; Deyling, Observ. Sac. iii. 175; distinct from the γαβροφιλάνιον or treasury of St. Luke xxi. 1). They were regarded also as a work specially acceptable to God (Prov. xix. 17, xxii. 9, &c.; Tobit, and Ecclesi., passim; St. Luke xi. 41, Acts x. 2). In like manner they became in the Christian Church—

1. A fundamental law of Christian morality (St. Matt. x. 42, xix. 21, xxv. 35; St. Luke xii. 33; Acts ii. 44, iv. 34-37, xi. 29, 30; Rom. xii. 13, xv. 25; 2 Cor. viii. 12, ix. 7; Gal. ii. 1, vi. 10; Ephes. iv. 28; 1 Tim. vi. 18; Hebr. xiii. 16; 1 Pet. iv. 8, 9; 1 John iii. 17), so thoroughly recognized as to make it both superfluous and impossible to enumerate patristic allusions to it. Special acts on almsgiving, by St. Cyprian, De Opere et Elemos.; St. Greg.

Nyss., De Pauperibus Amandis Orat. II. St. Greg. Naz., De Pauperum Amore Orat.; St. Basil M., Serm. de Elemos. inter Serm. non. XXII.; St. Ephraem Syrus, De Amore Pauperum; St. Leo M., Sermones VI. De Coelestibus et Elemos.; St. Maximus, Ad Joann. Chalc., Épist. II. (De Elemos.); and among the sermons attributed to St. Chrysostom, one De Spon., 2 Elemos., and three De Elemos., &c. (and see a collection of patristic citations in Drexelius, De Elemosynis). Even Julian the Apostate, c. A.D. 355, bears testimony that the almsgiving of "the Galileans" overflowed beyond their own poor to the heathen (as quoted below); and thinks it expedient to boast of his own kindness (Ad Themist.). Compare also such notable examples as those, e.g., of Pope Soter as described by his contemporary Dionysius Bishop of Corinth, c. A.D. 160 (sp. Euseb. II. E. iv. 23); of Paulinus of Nola; of Deo Gratias Bishop of Carthage towards Genesius's captives (see Illmin, L. C. i. 265, and Gibbon); of Johannes "Eleemosynarius", Patriarch of Alexandria, A.D. 606-616; and the occurrence of such expressions as, "Hoc praeestat elemosynas quod et Baptisma" (St. Hieron. in Ps. cxviii.), "Christiani sacrificium est elemosyna in pauperem" (St. Aug. Serm. xlii., from Heb. xiii. 16); or again, that almsgiving is the "characteristic mark of a Christian,"—χαριστηριακὸν Χριστιανῶν, and that it is ἡγήρω ἀγάπης, φάρμακον ἀμαρτημάτων, κλημα ἐστὶν τοῦ οὐρανοῦ ἐστηρικμένον (St. Chrys. in Heb. Hom. xxiii., and in Tit. Hon. vi.); or again, that "res ecclesiae" are "patrimonia pauperum."

II. An integral part of Christian worship (Acts ii. 42, vi. 1; 1 Cor. xiii. 1; 1 Tim. v. 3, 16); alms for the poor, to be distributed by the clergy (Acts xi. 30), being a regular portion of the offerings made in church, among those for the support of the clergy, and oblations in kind for the Church services (Justin M., *Apol. and c. 2, lb. 4; and St. Ambrose, Optatus, and the Councils of Lerida and Carthage, above quoted; or later still, Capit. Howard. Archiep. Turon. 116, in Baluz. Capit. l. 1294, and repeatedly in the Capitularies. There was also an alms-box (χαρτοφύλακτον, κοινάριον, see St. Cypr., De Op. et Eleemos., and St. Hieron., Epist. 27, c. 14), placed monthly (Tertull., Apol. 39). And Paulinus (Epist. 32) speaks of a table (mensa) for receiving the offerings. Collections for the poor in church both on Sundays and on week days are mentioned by St. Leo the Great (Serm. de Collectis). The poor also habitually sat at the church door, at least in the East, to receive alms (St. Chrys., Hom. xxvii. De Verb. Apost., Hom. i. in 2 Tim., Hom. iii. De Poenit.).

III. An institution having a formal list of recipients, mainly widows and orphans (St. Ignat., Ad Polycarp. iv.; Constit. Apost. iv. 4, &c.); or, upon occasion, martyrs in prison or in the mines, or other prisoners, or shipwrecked persons (Dion. Corinth. ap. Euseb. II. E. iv. 23; Tertull., De Jejun. 13; Lucian, De Morte Peregrin. § 11, Op. viii. 279, Bipont.; Liban., A.D. 387, Orat. xlv. in Tisamen., Orat. de Victis, ii. 258, 445, ed. Reiske); and special officers, as for other directly ecclesiastical functions, so also for managing the church alms, viz. deacons (Constit. Apost. ii. 31, 32, il. 19; Dionys. Alex. ap. Euseb. II. E. vii. 11; St. Cypr., Epist. xli., and xlix. al. lii., Full.; St. Hieron., Ad Nepot. Epist. xxxiv.); and among women, deaconesses, commonly widows of advanced age (Constit. Apost. iii. 15; St. Hieron., Ad Nepot. Epist. xxxiv.; and Lucian and Libanias as above). See also Tertullian (Ad Uxor. ii. 4 and 8) for the charitable works of married Christian matrons.

IV. These arrangements were supplemented when necessary by special collections appointed by the bishop (Tertull., De Jejun. 13), after the pattern of St. Paul, for extraordinary emergencies, whether at home or among brethren or others elsewhere; e.g. St. Cyprian's collection of "sestertia centum millia nummorum" for the redemption of Numidiana captives from the barbarians (St. Cyp., Epist. ix.); mostly accompanied by fast days (Tertull. ib.—and so, long after, Theodulph, A.D. 787 [Capit. 38], enjoins almsgiving continually, but specially on fast days), but sometimes at the ordinary Church service (St. Leo M., De Collectis); a practice which grew sometimes into the abuse which was remedied by the Council of Tours (ii. A.D. 567, c. 5), enacting that each city should provide for its own poor, and by Gregory the Great, desiring the Bishop of Milan to protect a poor man at Genoa from being compelled to contribute to such a collection (St. Greg., Epist. ix. 126). See also St. Hieron., Ad. Vigilantium.

The ἀγάραι also may be mentioned in this connection (1 Cor. xi. 20, Jude 12; Tertull., Conc. Laod., A.D. 364, c. 5, and see Conc. Quini- act. A.D. 762, c. 74; and under AGAPAE). Also the ἐξωδὸς or ἐξωδοχέαι (St. Chrys., Hom. xlv. in Act. Apostol.; St. Aug., Tract. xxvii. in Joh. § 4); the πρωτοτροφεία, managed by the "κληρ- ικὸν or ἀφ' ἑνὸς τῶν πτωχῶν" (Conc. Chalced. A.D. 451, c. 8; and Pallad., Hist. Laus. v.); the γυροκομεία, the νοσοκομεία (Pallad., V. Chrye. p. 19), the ὀφθαλμοτροφεία: of which the names explain themselves (and see abundant references in Suicer, sub voc., and Justinian also enacts laws respecting such institutions and the clergy who manage them), and which came into being with the Christian Church. E. g., the βασιλικὴ of St. Basil at Caesarea stands as a notable example of a Christian hospital, at once for sick and strangers (St. Basil, M., Epist. 94; 34), with its smaller offshoots in the neighbour- ing country (St. Basil, M., Epist. 142, 143); and so also the hospital of St. Chrysostom, with his advice on the subject to the faithful of Con- stantinople (St. Chrys., Hom. xlv. in Act. Apost., "in portu Romano" by Pammachius and Fabiola (St. Hieron., Ad Ocean. Ep. lxxxiv.). Add also the alms given at marriage and at funerals (St. Chrys., Hom. xxxii. in S. Matth.; St. Hieron., Ad Pammach. de Obitu Uxor. Ep. liv.; Pseudo- Origen., Comment. in Job. lib. iii. p. 437; St. Aug., Cont. Faust. xx. 20; and see Bingham). Our own Council of Ceredythy, in A.D. 810 (c. 10), directs the tenth of a bishop's substance to be given in alms upon his death. The Man- ichaeans appear to have refused alms to needy persons not Manichaeans on some reconditte principle of their connection with the principle or evil, for which they are condemned by St. Aug. (De Mor. Manich. ii. 15, 16) and Theodoret (Haer. Fab. i. 26).

There was apparently no specified rule for division of ecclesiastical revenues, originally of course entirely voluntary offerings, anterior to the 5th century; the bishop being throughout their chief administrator, but by the hands of the deacons (see e.g. St. Cypr., about Felicis- simus, Epist. xli.; and Conc. Gangr., c. 8, and Epiphani., Haer. xl., condemning the Enstatianes for withdrawing their alms from the bishop or the officer appointed by him). In the Western Church in the 5th century (setting aside the questionable decree of the Synod of Rome under Sylvester in 324) we find a fourfold division of them: 1, for the bishop; 2, for the clergy; 3, for the poor; 4, for the fabric and sustentation of the churches. Or again, for 1. Churches; 2. Clergy; 3. Poor; 4. Strangers. This originated with the Popes Simplicius (Epist. 3, A.D. 467) and Gelasius (in Gratian. Caus. 12, q. 2, by St. Gregory the Great at the end of the 6th century (e.g. Ep. iv. 11, v. 44, vii. 8, xlii. 44; J. c. 5), was varied in Charlemagne's and Lud- wig's Capitularies (i. 80, Baluz. 718), as re- garded voluntary offerings, into two-thirds to the poor and one-third to the clergy in rich places, and half to each in poor ones; but was repeated in the old form by the Cypat. of Charle- magne himself respecting tithes (Baluz. i. 356) and by the Counc. f. Worms. A.D. 868, c. 7; Tribur., A.D. 895, c. 13; and Nantes. A.D. 895 (?), c. 10 (if at least this last is not to be referred to the Council of Nantes in 638).

The special office of Almonarius or Almoner occurs in later times, afterwards the name of the superintendent of the alms-house or hospital, but at first a distributor of alms: both in monas- teries (described at length by Du Cange, from MS of St. Victor of Paris), although the office in the older Egyptian monasteries belonged to the œconomus, under the special name of διακονία (Cassin, Collat. xviii. 7, xxi. 9); and afterwards, in England at least, as an officer attached to each bishop (Conc. Oron., A.D. 1222; Lyndw., Provinc. i. 13, p. 67); and lastly to the king, as e.g. in England, and notably to the Kings of France (see a list in Du Cange).

In the history of doctrine, the subject of almsgiving is connected—I. With the notions of community of goods, voluntary poverty, and the difficulty of salvation to the rich; and the current voice of fathers, as e.g. Tertull., Apol. 39, Justin M., Apol. 1, Arab. Adv. Gent. iv. in fin., magnifying the temper indicated by τὰ τῶν πτωχῶν ἄρα καὶ, while others, as St. Clem. Alex. (Strom. iii. 6, p. 336, Potter), rejected its literal and narrow pervasion (see also his tract at length, Quis Dices Sacerdotis?); which perversion indeed the Church condemned in the cases of the Apostolici or Apostaticæ (St. Aug., De Haer. xi. Opp. viii. 9; St. Epiph., Hæc. lxi.), and of the Massilians (St. Epiph., Haer. lxx.), and again in that of the Pelagians, who maintained that rich men must give up their wealth in order to be saved (so at least Pseudo-Sixtus III., De Divitiis; and see St. Aug., Epist. civ. ad Paulin., and Conc. Diospolit. § 6, A.D. 415). Compare Mosheim's Diss. de Vera Nat. Commun. Bonorum in Ecol. Hæres. II. With the relation of good works to justification; alms and fasting standing prominently in the question, i. as comparatively outward and positive acts, ii. as being specially urged from early times as parts of repentance and charity (e.g. Hermas, Pastor x. 4; Salvian, Adv. Avarit. ii. p. 205; Lactant., Div. Inst. vi. 13, tom. i. p. 470; Constit. S. Clem. vii. 12; St. Ambros., De Elia et Jejun. xx.; St. Chrys., Hom. vii. de Pœnit. § 6, Opp. ii. 336 C). "Date et dabitur vobis," found its answer in the repeated occurrence of the words (e.g. St. Caesar, Arel., Hom. xv.; St. Eligius, in Vita ii. 15, ap. D'Ach., Spicil. ii. 96), "Da, Domine, quia dæmus;" but the whole doctrine derived its colour in each case from the successive phases of the doctrine of merit. III. With (in time) the idea of compounding for other sins by alms, a feeling strengthened by the imposition of alms by way of satisfaction and of commutation of penance. The introduction of the practice is attributed to Theodore of Canterbury, c. A.D. 700, but upon the ground only of the Penitentials hitherto falsely attributed to him; while the abuse of it is severely condemned by the Council of Cloveshoe, A.D. 747 (c. 26), and by Theodulph (Capit. 32, A.D. 787). Its grossest instance is probably to be found in the ledger-like calculation of the payments, by which "powerful men" could redeem their penances, in Eadgar's canons, in fin. (Thorpe, ii. 286-289), about A.D. 963. See also Morinus, De Pœnit. lib. x. c. 17, who treats the question at length. IV. With alms for the dead. See Conc. Carth. iv., A.D. 398, c. 79; St. Chrys., as before quoted, and Bingham. See also for later times, Car. M., Capit. v. 364, ap. Baluz. i. 902.

Plough-alms in England (elem. carucarum, Suhl-alm-sson), viz., a penny for every plough used in tillage, to be paid annually fifteen days after Easter (Laws of Eadgar and Guthrun, A.D. 906, c. 6; Eadgar's Laws i. 2, and can. 54, A.D. 959 and 975; Ethelred's, ix. 12, A.D. 1014; Can't's, c. 8, c. A.D. 1030; Rectit. Sing. Pers., § de Villanis), were rather a church due than alms properly so called. As was also St. Peter's penny, Elemos. S. Petri. And Libera Elemosyna, or Frank-Almoign, is the tenure of most Church lands from Saxon times (i.e. tenure on condition, not of specified religious services, but of Divine Service generally), although now incapable of being created de novo (Stat. Quia Emptores, 18 Edw. I.). See Stephen's Blackstone, i., Bk. II. Pt. i. c. 2, in fin. [A. W. H.]

ALBENSE CONCILIIUM. [ALCHESTER, COUNCIL OF.]

ALTAR.—The table or raised surface on which the Eucharist is consecrated.

I. Names of the Altar.

1. Τράπεζα, a table; as τράπεζα Κυρίου, 1 Cor. x. 21. This is the term most commonly used by the Greek Fathers and in Greek Liturgies; sometimes simply, ἡ τράπεζα, as the Table by pre-eminence (Chrysost., in Ephes. Hom. 3), but more frequently with epithets expressive of awe and reverence; μυστικὴ, πνευματικὴ, φοβερά, φρικτὴ, φρικώδης, βασιλικὴ ἀθάνατος, ἁγία, θεία, and the like (see Suicer's Thesaurus, s. v.). St. Basil in one passage (Ep. 73, Opp. ii. 870) appears to contrast the Tables (τράπεζαι) of the orthodox with the Altars (θυσιαστήρια) of Basilides. Sozomen (Ecol. Hist. ix. 2, p. 368) says of a slab which covered a tomb, that it was fashioned as if for a Holy Table (ὡστερ εἰς τὴν ἑψησκείτο τράπεζαν), a passage which seems to show that he was familiar with stone tables.

2. Θυσιαστήριον, the place of Sacrifice; the word used in the Septuagint for Noah's altar (Gen. viii. 20), and both for the Altar of Burnt-sacrifice and the Altar of Incense under the Levitical law, but not for heathen altars.

The word θυσιαστήριον in Heb. xii. 10, is referred by some commentators to the Lord's Table, though it seems to relate rather to the heavenly than to the earthly sanctuary (Thomas Aquinas). The θυσιαστήριον of Ignatius, too (ad Philad. 4; compare Magn. 7; Trall. 7), can scarcely designate the Table used in the Eucharist (see Lightfoot on Philippians, p. 263, n. 2). But by this word Eusebius (Hist. Ecol. x. 4, § 44) describes the altar of the great church in Tyre, and again (Panogr. sub fin.) he speaks of altars (θυσιαστήρια) erected throughout the world. Athanasius, or Pseudo-Athanasius (Disp. cont. Arium, Opp. i. 90), explains the word τράπεζα by θυσιαστήριον. This name rarely occurs in the liturgies. Θυσιαστήριον not unfrequently designates the enclosure within which the altar stood, or BEMA (see Mele, On the Name Altar or Θυσιαστήριον, Works, p. 382 ff.).

3. The Copts call the altar ἱεραστήριον, the word applied in the Greek Scriptures to the Mercy-Seat, or covering of the Ark [compare ANCA]; but in the Coptic liturgy of St. Basil they use the ancient Egyptian word Pianer-schooschi, which in Coptic versions of Scripture answers to the Heb. כַּפֹּת and the Greek θυσιαστήριον (Renaudot, Lit. Orient. i. 181).

4. The word Βωμὸς (see Nitzsch on the Odyssey, vol. ii. p. 15) is used in Scripture and in Christian writers generally for a heathen altar. Thus in 1 Maccab. i. 54, we read that in the persecution under Antiochus an "abomination of desolation" was built on the Temple-altar (Θυσιαστήριον), while idol-altars (Βωμοί) were set up in the cities of Judah; and, again (1. 59), sacrifices were offered "ἐπὶ τῶν βωμῶν ὅς ἦν ἐπὶ τοῦ Θυσιαστηρίου." The word βωμός is, however, applied to the Levitical altar in Ecclesiasticus 1. 12, the work of a gentile writer. It is generally repudiated by early Christian writers, except in a figurative sense; thus Clement of Alexandria (Strom. vii. p. 717) and Origen (c. Celsus vii. p. 389) declare that the soul is the true Christian altar (βωμός), the latter expressly admitting the charge of Celsus, that the Christians had no material altars. Yet in later times βωμός was sometimes used for the Christian altar; Synesius, for instance (Kardaras, c. 19, p. 303), speaks of flying for refuge to the unbloody altar (βωμός).

5. The expression "Mensa Domini," or "Mensa Domini," is not uncommon in the Latin Fathers, especially St. Augustine (e.g. Sermo 21, c. 5, on Ps. lxxiii. 11). And an altar raised in honour of a martyr frequently bore his name; as "Mensa Cypriani" (Augustine, Sermo 310). The word "mensa" is frequently used for the slab which formed the top of the altar (v. infra).

6. Ara, the Vulgate rendering of βωμός (1 Maccab. i. 54 [57], etc.), is frequently applied by Tertullian to the Christian altar, though not without some qualification; for instance, "ara Dei" (de Oratione, c. 14). Yet ara, like βωμός, is repudiated by the early Christian apologists on account of its heathen associations; thus Minucius Felix (Octavius, c. 32) admits that "Delubrum ararum non habemus;" compare Arnobius (adv. Gentes vi. 1) and Lactantius (Divin. Instit. ii. 2). In rubrics, Ara designates a portable altar or consecrated slab. (Maeri Hierozolicon, s.v. "Altare.") Ara is also used for the substructure on which the mensa, or altar proper, was placed; "Altaris aram funditus pessumdam" (Prudentius, Peristeph. xiv. 49). Compare Ara Sinaargus, quoted below.

7. But by far the most common name in the Latin Fathers and in Liturgical diction is altare, a "high altar," from altus (Isidore, Origines. xv. 4, p. 1197; compare alveare, collar). This is the Vulgate equivalent of θυσιαστήριον. Tertullian (de Exhort. Castitatis c. 10) speaks of the Lord's Table as "altare" simply; so also Cyprian (Epist. 45, § 3, ed. Goldhorn), who, by the phrase "altari positus," indicates that the church-altar in his time was moveable; and who, in another place (Epist. 59, § 25), contrasts the Lord's Altar ("Domini Altare") with the "ara" of idols. So again (Epist. 65, § 1) he contrasts "aras diaboli" with "Altare Dei." So Augustine (Sermo 159, § 1) speaks of "Altare Dei." Yet Cyprian speaks (Ep. 59, § 15) of "diaboli altaria," so uncertain was the usage. In the Latin liturgies scarcely any other name of the altar occurs but altare. The plural altaria is also occasionally used by ecclesiastical writers, as invariably by classical authors, to designate an altar; thus Cæcilius of Arles (Hom. 7) says that the elements (eucaruræ) to be consecrated "sacris altaribus impendantur." (Mone's Griech. u. Lat. Messen. p. 6.)

The singular "altarium" is also used in late writers; as in the Canon of the Council of Auxerre quoted below, mass is not to be said more than once a day, "super uno altario." Altarium is also used in a wider sense, like θυσιαστήριον, for the BEMA or Sanctuary; so also altaria.

8. In most European languages, not only of the Romanesque family, but also of the Teutonic and Slavonic, the word used for the Lord's Table is derived, with but slight change, from altare. In Russian, however, another word, prestol, properly a throne, is in general use. [C.]

II. Parts composing altars.—Although in strictness the table or tomb-like structure constitutes the altar, the steps on which it is placed, and the ciborium or canopy which covered it, may be considered parts of the altar in a larger sense, or, at least, were so closely connected with it, as to make it more convenient to treat of them under the same head.

The altar itself was composed of two portions, the supports, whether legs or columns, in the table form, or slabs in the tomb-like, and the "mensa" or slab which formed the top.

The expression "cornu altaris," horn of the altar, often used in rituals (as in the Sacrament. Gelasianum 1, c. lxxviii.), appears to mean merely the corner or angle of the altar, no known example showing any protuberance at the angles or elsewhere above the general level of the mensa, although in some instances (as in that in the church of S. Giovanni Evangelista at Ravenna hereafter mentioned) the central part of the surface of the mensa is slightly hollowed. By the Cornu Evangelii is meant the angle to the left of the priest celebrating, by Cornu Epistolæ that to the right. These phrases must, however, it would seem, date from a period subsequent to that when the Gospel was read from the ambo.

III. Material and form of altars.—It is admitted by all that the earliest altars were tables of wood; in the high altar of the church of S. Giovanni Laterano at Rome is enclosed an altar of the tomb-like form, the mensa and sides formed of wooden planks, on which St. Peter is asserted to have celebrated the Lord's Supper, and at another are preserved to which the same tradition attaches. [ARCA.]

This shows an ancient belief that altars were of wood. And there is abundant proof that in Africa at least the Holy Table was commonly of wood up to the end of the fourth century. Athanasius, speaking of an outrage of the Arians in an orthodox church (Ad Monachos, Opp. i. 847), says that they burnt the Table (ἐξόλησαν τὴν ἁγίαν) with other fittings of the church. Optatus of Mileve, describing the violence of the Donatists, mentions their plaining afresh, or breaking up and using for firewood, the Holy Tables in the churches of their rivals (De Schismate Donatistarum vi. 1, p. 90 ff.); and St. Augustine (Epist. 185, c. 27) declares that they bent the orthodox Bishop Maximianus with the wood of the altar under which he had taken refuge. In England, at a much later date, if we may trust William of Malmesbury (Vita S. Wulstani, in De Gestis Pontif. Angl. iii. 14), Wulstan, bishop of Worcester (1062-1095), demolished throughout his diocese the wooden altars which were still in existence in England as in ancient days, "altaria lignea jam inde a prisca diebus in Angliâ." Martene (De Antiq. Eccl. Ritibus i. 3) and Mabillon (Acta SS. Benedict. Saec. vi., pars 2, p. 860) have shown that wooden altars were anciently used in Gaul.

Yet there is distinct evidence of the existence of stone altars in the fourth century. Gregory of Nyssa (De Christi Baptismate, Opp. III. 295) speaks of the stone on which the altar was made being consecrated. To the same effect St. Chrysostom (on I Cor. Hom. 20). And stone became at the time the usual canonical material of an altar. The assertion that Pope Sylvester (314-335) first decreed that altars should be of stone rests upon no ancient authority (Brun, De Rēv. Lit. i., c. 20, § 1). The earliest decree of a council bearing on the subject is one of the provincial council of Epauona (Pauzier in France) in 517, the 26th Canon of which (Brun's Canones II. 170) forbids any other than stone altars to be consecrated by the application of Chrism.

As this council was only provincial, its decrees were no doubt only partially received. The 14th chap. of the Capitularies of Charles the Great, A.D. 769 (Migne's Patrologia, xvii. 124), orders that priests should not celebrate unless "in mensis lapideis ab Episcopis consecratis." This seems to mark a period when the use of wooden altars, although disapproved of, was by no means unknown. In the Eastern churches the material of the altar has been deemed a matter of less importance, and at all times down to the present day altars have been made of wood, stone, or metal.

Asseman (Bibl. Orient. III. 238) cites a Canon of a Synod of the Syro-Jacobites, held circa A.D. 908, which orders the use of fixed altars of stone, and the disuse of wood; he adds that in the churches of the Maronites and of the Jacobites the altars were sometimes of wood, sometimes of stone (compare Neale, Eastern Ch. Int. 181). In some instances at the present day pillars of stone are used to support a mensa of wood.

This change of material was in some degree occasioned or accompanied by the adoption of a different type of form, that of the tomb. Such adoption has been usually accounted for by the supposition that the tombs in the Roman catacombs known as "arrosolia" were used during the period of persecution as altars. These arrosolia were formed by cutting in the wall of the chamber or oratory, at a height of about three feet from the floor, an opening covered by an arch. In the wall below this opening an excavation was made sufficiently large to receive one or sometimes two bodies, and this was covered by a slab of marble.

Such tombs would evidently furnish sufficiently convenient altars, but there appears to be some deficiency of proof that they were actually so used during the period of persecution, to which, indeed, the far greater number are by some centuries posterior. Some writers assert that up to the time of St. Sylvester the only altars in use were wooden chests (see Antiq. Anc.) carried about from place to place wherever the Roman bishop had his habitation. Whether this opinion be or be not well-founded, it is certain that traces of altars occupying the normal position, viz., the centre of the apse, have been found in the oratories of the catacombs. Bosio and Boldetti state that they had met with such, the one in the cemetery of Priscilla, the other in that of SS. Marcellinus and Peter, and Martigny (Dict. des Antiq. Chret. p. 58), adds that he had been shown by the Cav. de Rossi in the cemetery of Callistus the traces left by the four pillars which had supported an altar. The date of the altars in question does not, however, appear to have been clearly ascertained.

It was, however, not only in Rome that the memorials of martyrs and altars were closely associated; the 83rd Canon of the Codes Can. Eccl. Afric. A.D. 419 (in Brun's Canones, I. 176) orders that the altaria which had been raised everywhere by the roads and in the fields as "Memoriae Martyrum," should be overturned when there was no proof that a martyr lay beneath them; and blames the practice of erecting altars in consequence of dreams and "vanas coniectiones."

In the Liber Pontificalis it is stated that Pope Felix I. (A.D. 269-274) "constituit supra sepulcra martyrum missas celebrari," but perhaps the most clear proofs of the prevalence of the practice of placing altars over the remains of martyrs and saints at an early period, are furnished by passages in Prudentius, particularly that so often quoted (Peristeph. Hymn XI. v. 169-174):—

"Talibus Hippolyti corpus madator obertis Propter ubi apposita est a diacono, Deo,
Illa sacramenti donatrix sacra cadum.
Custos fita sub altaris cippietis,
Servat ad aeterni spem Judice ossa sepulcro Pascit item sanctis tuberculos dapibus."

The practice of placing the altar over the remains of martyrs or saints may probably have arisen from a disposition to look upon the sufferings of those confessors of the faith as analogous with that sacrifice which is commemorated in the Eucharist; and the passage in the Revelation (chap. vi. v. 9), "I saw under the altar the souls of them that were slain for the word of God," no doubt encouraged or instigated the observance. The increasing disposition to venerate martyrs and their relics fostered this practice, by which, as Prudentius says (Peristeph. Hymn. III. v. 211)—

"Sic venerat ossa Ibat Ossibus altar et impositum."

And it took firm root in the Western Church; so much so that a rule has long been established that every altar must contain a relic or relics, among which should be one of the saint in whose honour it was consecrated. [CONSECRATION OF CHURCHES; RELICS.]

This practice, no doubt, conduced to the change of material from wood to stone, and also to a change of form from that of a table to that of a chest or tomb, or to the combination of the two. The table-form seems to have been still common in Africa in the early part of the 5th century: for Synesius (Karaktēras, c. 19, p. 303), says that, in the territories of the Vandal invasion, he would cast himself beneath the altar, and clasp the columns that supported it. The annexed woodcut furnishes an example of the combination of the table-form with the tomb-form. It was discovered in the ruins of the so-called basilica of S. Alessandro on the Via Nomentana, about seven miles from Rome, and may with all probability be ascribed to the fifth century. The mensa is a slab of porphyry, the rest is of marble. The small columns were not placed as represented in the woodcut at the time when the sketch from which it is taken was made; they were, however, found close by in which the bones of St. Alexander are believed to have been deposited. The square opening in the cancellated slab was probably used for the purpose of introducing cloths [BRANDEA], which were laid on the tomb of a saint, and afterwards preserved as relics. A part of the inscription on the front has been lost: what remains reads "et Alexandro Delicatus voto posuit dedicante Aepiscopo Urs...". The name wanting at the beginning is supposed to be that of Eventius, also buried in the same cemetery. Ursus is believed to have been bishop of Nomentum.

The altar in the sepulchral chapel at Ravenna, known as "SS. Nazaro e Celso," is an example of the simple tomb-like form. The chapel was built about A.D. 450, and this altar may be of about the same date. According to the Rev. B. Webb (Sketches of Continental Ecclesiology, p. 429) it is composed of three slabs of alabaster supporting a mensa; on the ends are carved crosses; on the front is a cross between two creep; and on each side of it the device of a crown suspended from a wreath. It is shewn in the engraving of the chapel in Gally Knight's Ecol. Arch. Italy.

In the somewhat earlier mosaics in the baptistry of the cathedral of Ravenna, altars are represented as tables supported by columns with capitals; the tables are represented rod and the columns gold, indicating perhaps the use of porphyry and gilt bronze as the materials. Nor, although the tomb-like form eventually became in the Western Church the ruling one, was the table-form disused, for examples of it of a date even as late as the thirteenth century are still extant.

Altar, from Auriole in France.

A variety of the table-form, in which the mensa is supported by only one leg, is shown in the accompanying woodcut. This altar was found in the neighbourhood of Auriole, in the department of the Bouches-du-Rhône, in France, and may be attributed to the fifth or sixth century.

Martigny (Dict. des Antiq. Chrét., p. 59) mentions other examples in which the mensa is supported by five columns, one being in the centre. One of these found at S. Agriola is supposed to have been erected by S. Agriola in 580. Another, in the Musée at Marseilles, he attributes to the 5th century, and a third he says exists in the crypt of the church of St. Martha, at Tarascon.

In the baptistry of the cathedral of Ravenna is an altar composed of a mensa with two columns in front, and a quadrangular block of marble, in which is a recess or cavity now closed by a modern brass door; the front of this block has some decoration of an architectural character, a small cross, doves, ears of wheat, and bunches of grapes. This central block would appear to be an altar (or part of one) of the 6th century. A very similar block is at Parezano, in Istria, and is engraved in Heider and Eislerberger's Mittelalterliche Künstlerwerke des Oesterreichischen Kaiserstaates (l. 109); the writer of that work is, however, disposed to consider it not an altar but a tabernacle.

Mr. Webb (Sketches of Cont. Ecclesiology, pp. 430, 440) mentions two altars at Ravenna, one in the crypt of S. Giovanni Evangelista, the other in the nave of S. Apollinare in Classe, of the same form as that of the baptistry of the Cathedral described above, and seems to consider this arrangement as original; but says of the altar of the baptistry that it was the tabernacle of the old Cathedral. He remarks that the mensa of the altar in S. Giovanni is not level, but slightly hollowed so as to leave a rim all round.

Many notices of altars may be found in the Liber Pontificali: (otherwise known as Anastasius Bibliothecarius de Vita Pontificum), as that Pope Hilarius (A.D. 461-467) made at S. Lorenzo f. l. m. "altare argenteum pensans libras quadraginta," that Leo III. (A.D. 795-816) made at S. Giovanni Laterano "altare majus mirae magnitudinis decoratum ex argento purissimo pensans libras sexaginta et novem."

In these and in the numerous like instances it is either expressly stated that the altar was decorated with gold or silver, or the quantity of the metal employed is evidently quite insufficient to furnish the sole material; but we are not told whether the altar was constructed of stone or of wood.

In a mosaic at S. Vitale, at Ravenna, dating from the 6th century (engraved in Webb's Cont. Eccles. p. 437), an altar doubtless is represented as standing on feet at the angles, and therefore of the table form. It has, according to Mr. Webb, an ornamental covering of white linen with a hanging beneath.

The annexed woodcut taken from the same work (p. 440) shows an altar similarly represented in a mosaic in S. Apollinare in Classe at Ravenna. This church was commenced between 534 and 538, and dedicated between 548 and 552, but much of the mosaic was not executed until between 671 and 677 (Hübsch, Altchristlichen Kirchen).

Paul the Silentiary, in his poetical description of St. Sophia at Constantinople, as rebuilt by Justinian (between A.D. 532 and A.D. 563), describes the altar as of gold, decorated with precious stones and supported on golden columns. This has of course long since been destroyed, but there still exists an altar of almost equal splendour, though of the other type, viz., that of the tomb, and more recent by three hundred years. This is the high altar of S. Ambrogio, at Milan, made in A.D. 835, measuring 7 ft. 3 in. in length and 4 ft. 1 in. in height, the mensa being 4 ft. 4 in. wide. The front is of gold, the back and sides of silver. It is covered with subjects in relief in panels divided by bands of ornament, and many small ornaments in cloisonné enamel are interspersed. The subjects on the back are chiefly incidents in the life of St. Ambrose; those of the front are Christ seated within an oval compartment within a cross, in the branches of which are the symbols of the Evangelists, figures of the Apostles being placed above and below. On the right and left are subjects from the Gospels or the Acts of the Apostles. On the ends of the altar are crosses in compartments, surrounding which are angels in various attitudes of adoration. It is represented in the woodcut.

Altar of S. Ambrogio, at Milan.

Two examples of the tomb-like form, of stone and of earlier date, may be seen in the lateral apses of the basilican church which forms part of S. Stefano at Bologna. These perhaps date from the 7th or 8th century. On one are a cross and two peacocks, and an inscription in honour of S. Vitalis; on the other, figures of a lion and a stag or ox. It is not clear whether these were constructed to serve as altars, or are tombs converted to that use; but the first seems the more probable suggestion.

The account given by Ardo Smaragdus, in his life of St. Benedict of Aniane (Act. Sanct. Feb. vol. ii. die 12. p. 614), of one of the altars constructed by the latter in the church of that place (in A.D. 782?), is, though somewhat obscure, too remarkable to be passed over; the altar was hollow within, having at the back a little door; in the cavity boxes (capsae) containing relics were preserved on non-festive days. This "altare," which was the high altar, was so constructed (in altari . . . tres aras causavit. subponi) as to symbolize the Trinity.

It is difficult to find the date at which it became customary to incise crosses, usually five in number, on the mensa of an altar; they do not appear to exist on the mensa of the wooden altar in S. Giovanni Laterano at Rome, which is no doubt of an early date, on that of the altar of S. Alessandro, near Rome, or on those of the early altars at Ravenna, or Auriol, or even on the altar of S. Ambrogio. Crosses are however found on the portable altar which was buried with St. Cuthbert (A.D. 687). The very fragmentary state of this object makes it impossible to determine with certainty how many crosses were on it. Two are to be seen on the oaken board to which the plating of silver was attached, and two on the plating itself, but it is quite possible that originally there were five on each. In the order for the dedication of a church in the Sacramentary of Gregory the Great (p. 148), the bishop consecrating is desired to make crosses with holy water on the four corners of the altar; but nothing is said of incised crosses.

The practice of making below the mensa a cavity to contain relics, and covering this by a separate stone let into the mensa, does not appear to be of an early date. [CONSECRATION.]

IV. Structural accessories of the altar.— Usually, though not invariably, the altar was raised on steps, one, two, or three in number. From these steps the bishop sometimes preached; hence Sidenius Apoll., addressing Faustus, Bishop of Riez, says (Carm. XVI. v. 124).—

"Sed te conspicuis gradibus venerabilis aras Conclonaturum plebs seculi circumstitit."

Beneath the steps it became customary, from the fourth century at least, at Rome and wherever the usages of Rome were followed, to construct a small vault called confessio; this was originally a mere grave or repository for a body, as at S. Alessandro near Rome, but gradually expanded into a vault, a window or grating below the altar allowing the sarcophagus in which the body of the saint was placed to be visible. [CONFESSION.]

In the Eastern Church a piscina is usually found under the altar (Neale, Eastern Church Introd. 189), called χωνί, χωνίον or more commonly θάλασσα or θάλασσιδιον. What the antiquity of this practice may be does not seem to be ascertained, but it may have existed in the Western Church, as appears from the Frankish missal published by Mabillon (Liturg. Gall. lit. § 12, p. 314), where, in consecrating an altar, holy water is to be poured "ad basem." So the Gregorian Sacramentary, p. 149.

The altar was often enclosed within railings of wood or metal, or low walls of marble slabs; these enclosures were often mentioned by early writers under the names "ambitus altaris," "circuitus altaris"; the railings were called "cancelli," and the slabs "transenne." Some further account of these will be found under the words.

Upon these enclosures columns and arches of silver were often fixed, and veils or curtains of rich stuffs suspended from the arches; they are frequently mentioned in the Lib. Pontif., as in

V. Ciborium, otherwise umbraculum, Gr. κισβόριον. Ital. baldachino.—Down to the end of the period with which we are now concerned, and even later, the altar was usually covered by a canopy supported by columns, the ciborium. The word is no doubt derived from the Greek κισβόριον, the primary meaning of which is the cup-like seed-vessel of the Egyptian water-lily.

It does not appear when the ciborium came first to be in use, though this was probably as early a date as that in which architectural splendour was employed in the construction of churches. Augusti quotes Eusebins (Vit. Const. M. lib. iii. c. 38) as using the word κισβόριον when describing the church of the Sepulchre at Jerusalem, and connecting it with the word ἡνακαρίον; but in this there seems to be a mistake, as neither word occurs in cap. 38, while in cap. 37 the latter occurs in connection with ἀεθδαριον; by which last it would seem that the spse was meant.

Paulinus of Nola has been thought to allude to the ciborium in the verses (Lib. ii. Epig. 2):

"Divina veneranda tegunt altaria lectus, Compositioque sacra cum cruce martyribus."

Ciborium, from mosaic in the church of St. George at Thessalonica.

Veils are mentioned by St. Chrysostom (Hom. iii. in Ephes.) as withdrawn at the consecration of the Eucharist, and it is probable that these were attached to the ciborium in the fashion represented by the accompanying woodcut, where a ciborium is shown with the veils concealing the altar. This representation, taken from Messrs. Texier and Pullan's work on Byzantine Architecture, is found in the mosaic of St. George at Thessalonica, works certainly not later than A.D. 500, and perhaps much earlier; the authors are indeed disposed to refer them to the era of Constantine the Great.

Ciboria are not mentioned in the Liber Pontificalis in the long catalogue of altars erected in and gifts made to churches erected in Rome and Naples by Constantine, unless the "fastigium" of silver weighing 2025 lbs. in the basilica of St. John Lateran was, as some have thought, a ciborium. Much doubt, it must be remembered, has been thrown on the trustworthiness of this part of the Liber Pontificalis, nor does any mention of one occur until the time of Pope Symmachus (498—514), who, it is stated, made at S. Silvestro a ciborium of silver weighing 120 lbs. Mention is made in the same work of many other ciboria; they are generally described as of silver or decorated with silver. The quantity of metal varies very much; one at S. Paulo f. l. m. is said to have been decorated with 2015 lbs. of silver, that of St. Peter's, of silver-gilt, weighed 2704 lbs. 3 oz., and that at S. Giovanni Laterano only 1227 lbs. All these were erected by Pope Leo III. (795—816). The last is described as "cyboryum cum columnis suis quatuor ex argento purissimo diversis depictum historijs cum cancellis et columnellis suis mirae magnitudinis et pulchritudinis decoratum." The "cancelli" were, no doubt, railings running from column to column and enclosing the altar. The ciborium in St. Sophia's, as erected by Justinian, is described by Paul the Silentiary as having four columns of silver which supported an octagonal pyramidal dome or blunt spire crowned by a globe bearing a cross. From the arches hung rich veils woven with figures of Christ, St. Paul, St. Peter, &c.

Ciboria were constructed not only of metal, or of wood covered with metal, but of marble; the alabaster columns of the ciborium of the high altar of St. Mark's at Venice are said to have occupied the same position in the chapel of the Greek Emperor at Constantinople. They are entirely covered with subjects from Biblical history, sculptured in relief, and appear to be of as early a date as the fifth century; but perhaps the earliest ciborium now existing is one in the church of S. Apollinare in Classe at Ravenna, which is shown by the inscription engraved upon it to have been erected between A.D. 806 and A.D. 810.

Various ornaments, as vases, crowns, and baskets (cophini) of silver, were placed as decorations upon or suspended from the ciboria; and, as has been already said, veils or curtains were attached to them; these last were withdrawn after the consecration but before the elevation of the Eucharist. These curtains are mentioned repeatedly in the Liber Pontif. as gifts made by various popes of the seventh, eighth, and ninth centuries, e. g., "Vela alba holoserica rosata quae pendunt in arcu de cyborio numero quatuor," given to S. Maria Maggiore by Pope Leo III. (A.D. 795—816).

It does not appear when the use of these veils was discontinued in the Western Church; in the Eastern a screen (εικονοστάσις) with doors now serves the like purpose. Some of the ciboria at Rome, according to Martigny (Art. Colombe Eucharistic), having a ring fixed in the centre of the vault, from which he conceives a receptacle for the host to have been suspended. [PERISFERIUM]. No ciborium now existing at Rome seems to be of earlier date than the twelfth century, but the practice of suspending such receptacles is no doubt much earlier.

Martigny is of opinion that besides the ciborium, the columns of which rested on the ground, there was sometimes a lesser one, the columns of which rested on the altar, and that these last were more properly called "peristeria," as enclosing a vessel in the form of a dove, in which the host was contained. [CIBORIUM, TURRIS, PERISTERIUM.]

VI. Appendages of the Altar.—In ancient times nothing was placed upon the altar but the ALTAR-CLOTHS and the sacred vessels with the ELEMENTS. A feeling of reverence, says Martene (de Antiq. Eccl. Lit. i. 112), permitted not the presence of anything on the altar, except the things used in the Holy Oblation. Hence there were no candlesticks on the altar, nor (unless on the columns, arches, and curtains of the ciborium) any images or pictures. Even in the ninth century we find Leo IV. (an. 855) limiting the objects which might lawfully be placed on the altar to the shrine containing relics, or perchance the codex of the Gospels, and the pyx or tabernacle in which the Lord's body was reserved for the viaticum of the sick. (De Cura Pastoralis, § 8, in Migne's Patrologia, cxx. 677.)

The Book of the Gospels seems anciently to have been frequently placed on the altar, even when the Liturgy was not being celebrated (Neale, Eastern Ch. Introd. 188). An example may be seen in the frescoes of the Baptistery at Ravenna (Webb's Continental Ecclesiology, 427).

With regard to the relics of saints, the ancient rule was, as St. Ambrose tells us (Ad Marcellinam, Epist. 85) "Ih[esu]s [Christus] super altare . . . is[te] [martyr] sub [t]ari;" and this was the practice not only of the age of St. Ambrose, but of much later times, even up to the middle of the ninth century, as Mabillon (Acta SS. Benedict. Saec. iii. Praefatio § 105), assures us; for the anonymous author of the Life of Servatius of Tongres says expressly that the relics of this saint, when translated by command of Charles the Great, were laid before the altar, as men did not yet presume to lay anything except the sacrifice on the altar, which is the Table of the Lord of Hosts. And even later, Odo of Clugny tells us (Collationes ii. 28) that when Berno (an. 895) laid the relics of St. Walburgis on the altar, they ceased to work miracles, resenting the being placed "ubi majestas divini Mysterii sollemnmodo debet celebrari." The passage of Leo IV., quoted above, seems in fact the first permission to place a shrine containing relics on the altar, and that permission was evidently not in accordance with the general religious feeling of that age.

In the early centuries of the Christian Church, the consecrated bread was generally reserved in a vessel made in the form of a dove and suspended from the ciborium [PERISFERIUM], or perhaps in some cases placed on a tower on the altar itself (Liber Pontif., Innocent I. c. 57, and Hilary, c. 70). Gregory of Tours (De Gloria Martyrum i. 86) speaks distinctly of the deacon taking the turrus from the sacristy and placing it on the altar, but this seems to have contained the unconsecrated elements [TURRIS], and to have been placed on the altar only during celebration; nor does the reservation of the consecrated bread in the turrus, capsula or pyxis on the altar appear to be distinctly mentioned by any earlier authority than the decree of Leo IV., quoted above (Binterim's Denkwürdigkeiten, ii. 2. 167 ff.).

No instance of a Cross placed permanently on the mensa of an altar is found in the first eight centuries, as we should expect from the decree of Leo IV. The vision of Probianus (Sozomen, Hist. Eccl. ii. 3. p. 49) shows that crosses were seen in the sanctuary (βωσιαετρησιον) in the fourth century; the cross was found on the summit of the ciborium, as in the great church of St. Sophia at Constantinople (Paul the Silentary, Descr. . S. Sophia, 737 [al. ii. 320]), and, in some churches both at Rome and in Gaul, suspended from the ciborium over the altar (Gregory of Tours, De Gloria Mart. ii. 20), but not on the mensa of the altar itself. A cross was, however, placed on the altar during celebration. See Sacram. Celas, i. 41.

The third Canon of the Second Council of Tours (an. 567, Brun's Canones ii. 226), "ut corpus Domini in altari non in imaginario ordine, sed sub crucis titulo componatur," which has been thought to mean, that the Body of the Lord should not be reserved among the images in a receptacle on the reredos, but under the cross on the altar itself, might possibly refer to a suspended cross; but it is probably rightly explained by Dr. Neale (Eastern Ch. Introd. 520) to mean that the particles consecrated should not be arranged according to each man's fancy, but in the form of a cross, according to the rubric.

Tapers were not placed on the altar within the period which we are considering, though it is a very ancient practice to place lights about the altar, especially on festivals. [LIGHTS.]

(Carmina viii. 9) says, addressing St. Rhadegund,

VII. Number of altars in a Church.—There was in primitive times but one altar in a church, and the arrangements of the most ancient Basilicas testify to the fact. (See Pagi on Baronius, ann.
313, No. 15.) Eusebius (Hist. Eccl. x. 4, § 45), in the description of the great church at Tyre, mentions only one altar. St. Augustine (on 1 John, Tract. 3) speaks of the existence of two altars in one city (civitate) as a visible sign of the Donatist schism. But his words should perhaps not be taken in their literal sense; for in the time of St. Basil, there was more than one altar in Neo-Cæsarea; for he, speaking (Hom. 19, in Gordium) of a persecution of Christians in that city, says that "altars (θυσιαστήρια) were overthrown."

The Greek and other oriental churches have even now but one altar in each church (Renaudot, Lit. Orient. i. 182); nor do they consecrate the Eucharist more than once on the same day in the same place. They have, however, and have had for several centuries, minor altars in παρε- κλήσια or side-chapels, which are really distinct buildings. Such side-chapels are generally found where there has been considerable contact with the Latin Church (Neale, Eastern Church, Introd. 183).

Some writers, as Martigny (Dict. des Antiq.
Chrét., art. Autel), rely upon the "arcosolia" or altar-tombs in the catacombs as proving the early use of many altars: two, three, and more such tombs are often found in one crypt, and in one case, a crypt in the cemetery of St. Agnes near Rome, there are as many as eleven arcosolia (Marchi, Mon. delle Arti prin. Crist., tav.
xxv., xxxvi., xxxvii.), eight of which, according to Padre Marchi, might have been used as altars
(p. 191); but there seems to be generally a deficiency of proof that such tombs were actually so used, nor is their date at all a matter of certainty in the great majority of cases.

It would appear probable that the practice of considering the tomb of a martyr as a holy place fitted for the celebration of the Eucharistic sacrifice, and such celebration as an honour and consolation to the martyr who lay below, led first to the use of several altars in a crypt in the catacombs where more than one martyr might rest, and then, when the bodies of several martyrs
had been transferred to one church above ground, to the construction of an altar over each, from a wish to leave none unhonoured by the celebration of the Eucharist above his remains. Such plans were prevalent as early as the beginning of the fifth century, as may be seen in the writings of Prudentius (Peristeph. Hymn. XI. v. 169-174; Hymn. III. v. 211), Pope Damasus, and St.
Maximus, Bishop of Turin (Sermo LXIII. De na- tis sanctorum; v. Marchi, p. 142 et seq.). At that period, and indeed long after, the disturbance of the relics of saints was held a daring and scarcely allowable act, and was prohibited by Theodosius and much disapproved of by Pope Gregory the Great; nor was it until some centuries later that the increasing engerness for the possession of such memorials was gratified by the dismemberment of the holy bodies.

It has been contended that more than one altar existed in the Cathedral of Milan in the latter part of the fourth century. That St.
Ambrose more than once uses the plural "al-taria" in connection with the church proves nothing; for "altaria" frequently means no altar; but in describing the restoration of the church to the orthodox (an. 385), after the attempt of the Arians to occupy it, he has been understood to say that the soldiers rushing in kissed the altar; hence it is argued that, as they could not reach the altar of the Bema or sanctuary, which was closed to the people, there must have been at least one altar in the nave.
But the words "militēs irruentes in Altaria occulis significare pacis signum" (ad Marcellin., Ep. 33) seem rather to imply that the soldiers
rushing into the Bema signified by their kisses
the making of peace. Altaria is used in the same sense, as equivalent to "sanctuary," in the

Theodosian Codex. [ALTARIUM.] However this may be, at the end of the sixth century we find distinct traces of a plurality of altars in Western churches. Gregory of Tours (De Gloria Mar- tyrum i. 33) speaks of saying masses on three altars in a church at Braine near Soissons; and Gregory the Great (Epist. v. 50) says that he heard that his correspondent Palladius, bishop of Saintonge, had placed in a church thirteen altars, of which four remained unconsecrated for defect of relics. Now certainly Palladius would not have begged of the Pope, as he did,
relics for his altars, if the plurality of altars had not been generally allowed. Moreover, the Council of Auxerre of the year 578 (Can. 10; Brun's Canones ii. 238) forbade two masses to be said on the same day on one altar, a prohibition which probably contributed to the multiplication of altars, which was still further accelerated by the disuse of the ancient custom of the priests communicating with the bishop or principal minister of the church, and the introduction of private masses, more than one of which was frequently said by the same priest on the same day (Walafrid Strabo, De Reb. Eccl.
c. 21). Bede (Hist. Eccl. v. 20) mentions that Aeca, bishop of Hexham (deposed an. 732), collected for his church many relics of apostles and martyrs, and placed altars for their venaration, "distinctis porticibus ad hoc ipsum intramuros ejusdem ecclesiae," placing a separate canopy over each altar within the walls of the church. There were several altars in the church built by St. Benedict at Aniane (Acta Sanctorum, Feb. ii. 614).

In the seventh and eighth centuries the number of altars had so increased that Charlemagne,
in a Capitulary of the years 805-6 at Thionville,
attempted to restrain their excessive multiplication.
See Capitula infra Ecclesiam, c. 6 (Migne's Patrol. 97, 283).

This was not very effectual, and in the ninth century the multiplication of altars attained a high point, as may be seen by the plan of the church of St. Gall in Switzerland [CHURCH], prepared in the beginning of that century. In this are no less than seventeen altars. The will of Fortunatus Patriarch of Grado (deu.
c. A. D. 825) also affords proof of the increase in the number of altars then in active progress in one oratory he placed three altars, and five others in another (Marin. Com. dei Veneziani, t. i. p. 270).

VIII. Places of Altars in Churches.—From the earliest period of which we have any knowledge, the altar was usually placed, not against the wall as in modern times, but on the chord of the apse, when, as was almost invariably the case, the church ended in an apse; when the end of the church was square, the altar occupied a corresponding position. St. Augustine therefore says (Sermo 46, c. 1.) "Mensa Christi est illa in medio posita." The officiating priest stood with his back to the apse and thus faced the congregation. In St. Peter's at Rome, and a very few other churches, the priest still officiates thus placed; but though in very many churches, particularly in Italy, the altar retains its ancient position, it is very rarely that the celebrant does so.

That such was the normal position of the altar is shown by many ancient examples, and by the constant usage of the Eastern churches. The ancient rituals invariably contemplate a detached altar as when, in the Sacramentary of Gregory, in the order for the dedication of a church (p. 148), the bishop is directed to go round the altar (vadit in circuitu altaris), or in the Sacramentary of Gelasius where the subdeacon (L. 1, cxlvi.) is directed, after having placed the Cross on the altar, to go behind it (vadit retro altare).

Exceptions at an early date to the rule that the altar should be detached, are of the greatest rarity, if we except the tombs in the catacombs, which have been supposed to have been used as altars. It is possible, also, that in small chapels with rectangular terminations, as the chapel of St. John the Evangelist, annexed to the baptistery of the Lateran, the altar may for convenience have been placed against the wall. When, however, it became usual to place many altars in a church it was found convenient to place one or more against a wall; this was done in the Cathedral of Canterbury [CHURCH], where the altar enclosing the body of St. Wilfrid was placed against the wall of the eastern apse; another altar, however, in this case occupied the normal position in the eastern apse, and the original high altar was placed in the same manner in the western apse.

In the plan of the church of St. Gall, prepared in the beginning of the ninth century, the places of seventeen altars are shown, but of these only two are placed against walls.

In a few instances the altar was placed not on the centre of the chord of the arc of the apse but mere towards the middle of the church; such was the case in S. Paolo f. l. m. at Rome, if the altar occupies the original position. In this instance it stands in the transept. In some other early churches at Rome, the altar occupies a position more or less advanced. The Lit. Pontif. tells us that in the time of Pope Gregory IV. (A.D. 827-844) the altar at S. Maria in Trastevere stood in a low place, almost in the middle of the nave (in humili loco pene in media testudine), the Pope therefore removed it to the apse, and the altar at S. Maria Maggiore seems to have been in the time of Pope Hadrian I. (A.D. 772-795), as appears from the account in the same book of the alterations, effected by that Pope in that church. It is thought by some that in the large circular or octagonal churches of the fourth and fifth centuries, as S. Lorenzo Maggiore at Milan, and S. Stefano Rotondo at Rome, the altar was placed in the centre.

In the churches of Justinian's period constructed with domes, there is usually, as at St. Sophia's Constantinople and S. Vitale, Ravenna, a sort of chancel intervening between the central dome and the apse; when such is the case, the altar was placed therein.

IX. Use of Pagan Altars for Christian purposes.—Pagan altars, having a very small superficies, are evidently ill suited for the celebration of the Eucharist; nor would it appear probable that a Christian would be willing to use them for that purpose; nevertheless, traditions allege that in some cases pagan altars were so used (v. Martigny art. Autel), and in the church of Arilje in Servia, a heathen altar sculptured with a figure of Atys forms the lower part of the altar. (Mittheil. der K. K. Central Comm. zur Erforschung und Erhaltung der Baudenkmale, Vienna, 1865, p. 6.) Such altars, or fragments of them, were, however, employed as materials (particularly in the bases) in the construction of Christian altars. Instances are stated by Martigny to have been observed in the churches of St. Michele in Vaticane and of St. Nicholas de' Cesarini at Rome.

X. PORTABLE ALTARS (altaria portatilia, gestatoria, hística) are probably of considerable antiquity; indeed, it is evident that from the time when the opinion prevailed that the Eucharist could not be fitly celebrated unless on a consecrated mensa or table, a portable altar became a necessity. Constantine the Great (Sozomen, Hist. Eccl. i. 8) carried with him on his campaigns a church-tent, the fittings of which no doubt included a portable altar, as the participation of the mysteries is especially mentioned. Beke (Hist. Eccl. v. 10) tells us that the two Hernalds, the English missionaries to the continental Saxons (an. 692), took with them sacred vessels and a consecrated slab to serve as an altar (tabulam altaris vice dedicatam); and bishop Wulfman, the apostle of Friesland (before 740), was accustomed to carry with him on his journeys a portable altar, in the midst and at the four corners of which were placed relics of saints (Jonas in Surius's Hist. Sanctoria ii. 294). The portable altar of St. Willebrord is described by Brower (Annal. Trevires. an. 718, § 112, p. 364); it bore the inscription: "Hoc altare Willebrordus in honore Domini Salvatoris consecravit, supra quod in itinere missarum oblationes Deo offerre consuevit, in quo et continetur de ligno crucis Christi! et de sudario capitis ejus." This, however, is probably not a contemporary inscription, and the genuineness of the relic may perhaps be doubtful. St. Boniface also carried an altar with him in his journeys. And the monks of St. Denys, when accompanying Charles the Great in his campaign against the Saxons, carried with them a wooden board, which, covered with a linen cloth, served as an altar (Anonymus de Mirac. S. Dionysii i. 20, in Mabillon, Acta SS. Ben. saec. iii. pt. 2, p. 350).

These portable altars seem to have been in almost all cases of wood. Not until the latter part of the eighth century do we find instances of such altars being made of any other material. The capitulary of 796 (quoted above) seems to enjoin the use of stone tablets for portable as well as fixed altars. Hinemar, bishop of Reims (Capitulare iii. c. 3; in Hardouin's Concilia v. 408), forbids any priest to celebrate mass except on a regular altar, or on a "tabula ab episcopo consecrata," which table might be "de marmore vel nigra petra aut licio honestissimo." If the reading is correct, the last term certainly seems to indicate a consecrated cloth [ANTIMENSURIUM] of very rich material; though some (Binterim's Denkwürdigkeiten iv. 1, 109) connect "licium" with "sublicius," and suppose that it means a thick piece of wood. An "altare portatile" is said to have been given by Charles the Bald to the monastery of St. Denis at Paris, square in shape, made of porphyry set in gold, and containing relics of St. James the Less, St. Stephen, and St. Vincent (ib. 107).

A portable altar of wood is preserved in the church of S. Maria in Campitelli at Rome, which is said to have belonged to St. Gregory Nazianzen, but it does not appear to have a legitimate claim to so high an antiquity. Probably no earlier existing example is to be found than that which was found with the bones of St. Cuthbert (dec. A.D. 687) in the cathedral of Durham, and doubtless belonged to him: it is now preserved in the chapter library. The annexed woodcut will render any detailed description needless: it measures 6 inches by 5 1/2, and is composed of wood covered with very thin silver: on the wood is inscribed IN HONOR . . . S. PETRI . . . and two crosses. The sense of the letters on the silver has not been satisfactorily made out (v. St. Cuthbert, by James Haime, p. 200). A similar portable altar is recorded by Simeon of Durham (Monumenta Hist. Brit. p. 659) to have been found on the breast of St. Aeca, Bishop of Hexham (ob. A.D. 740), when his body was exhumed more than 300 years afterwards. It was of two pieces of wood joined by silver nails, and on it was cut the inscription, "Alme Trinitati agle Sophie Sanctae Mariae." Whether relics were placed in it, the writer adds, is not known.

Portable Altar of St. Cuthbert.

The "taboot" still in use in the Abyssinian churches is a square slab of wood, stone or metal, on which the elements are consecrated, in fact, a portable altar. [ARCA.]

In the Greek Church the substitute for a portable altar was the ANTIMENSURIUM.

For the consecration of altars, see CONSECRATION OF CHURCHES.

ALTAR CLOTHS (lintermina, pallia or pallae altaris. In Greek writers, ἄμφια, ἀμφισακτα, ἐσθρῆτα, and authors "infimae actatis," ἄ καθόρακα, and ἄ τραπεζοφόρον). Cloths of different kinds, and of various materials (in the earliest ages, probably of linen only), must have been used in connection with the celebration of Holy Communion from the very earliest times. They were needed partly for the covering of the holy table, and of the oblations, and of the consecrated elements [CORPORATE]; partly also for the cleansing of the sacred vessels, and the like [MAPPA]. The first of these uses, of which we have now more particularly to speak, is referred to by St. Optatus, Bishop of Milevis in Africa (circ. 370 A.D.) as matter of general notoriety. "Who is there," he asks, "among the faithful, who knows not that during the celebration of the mysteries the wood of the altar is covered with a linen cloth ('ipsa ligna linteamine cooperiri,' De Schism. Donat. lib. vi. c. i. p. 92.) With this we may compare the allusion made by Victor Vitensis (De Persec. Afric. lib. i. cap. 12). Writing in the year 487, he says that Genserici, the Vandal, some sixty years before, sent Preculus into Zeugitana, and the latter received the vessels used in holy ministry, and the books, to be given up; and when these were refused they were violently seized by the Vandals, who "rupaci manu cuncta depopulabantur, atque de palliis altaris pro nefas! camisis (shirts) sibi et femoralia faciebant." In the 6th century St. Gregory of Tours speaks of an altar, with the oblations upon it, being covered with a silken cloth during the celebration of mass. "Cum jam altarium cum oblationibus pallio serico operatum esset" (Hiss. Franc. vii. 22; compare Mabillon, Liturgia Gallicana, p. 41). A little later in the same passage he speaks of one claiming right of sanctuary in the church, and laying hold on the "pallae altaris" for his protection. It is remarkable that at Rome no mention is found of any pallia altaris among the many donations to churches recorded by Anastasius, till after the close of the 6th century. Writing of Vitinianus Papa (sed. 658-672), Anastasius says that in his time the Emperor Constans came to Rome and went to St. Peter's in state, "cum exercitu suo," attended by his guards, the clergy coming out to meet him with wax tapers in their hands; and he offered upon the altar "pallium auro textile," or, according to another reading, "pallium auro textilem," after which mass was celebrated (Anast. Bibl. 135, l. 15; Migne, P. C. C. tom. 128, p. 775). The same writer, speaking of Zacharias Papa (sed. 741-752), says that he "fecit vestem super altare beati Petri ex auro textam, habentem nativitatem Domini et Salvatoris nostri Jesu Christi, ornavitque eam gemmis pretiosis." The earliest monument in the west, showing an altar (or holy table) set out for the celebration of "mass," is of the 10th or 11th century (Vestiarium Christianum, Pl. xliii.), one of the frescoes in the hypogean church of S. Clemente at Rome. The holy table is there covered with a white cloth, which is pendent in front, but apparently not so on the two sides. A richly ornamented border, several inches in breadth, appears on the lower edge of this "lineteam" (if such be intended) as it hangs down in front of the altar.

The allusions in Greek writers of early date correspond in character with those above quoted. In the collection of Canons Ecclesiastical (Σύνταγμα Κανόνων) formed by Photius of Constantinople, the earliest in date, bearing upon this point, is one of the so-called "Canons of the Apostles" (Καν. 73) to this effect: "Let no one alienate for his own private use any vessel of gold or of silver, which has been set apart for holy use" (ἁγιασθέν), "or any linen" (ἰδόνην); and the inference we naturally draw that the "linen" here spoken of has reference to altar linen (perhaps also to ministering vestments) is confirmed by the subsequent language of the First and Second Councils of Constantinople. In Canons 1 and 10, after quoting the "Canon of the Apostles" above mentioned, the Council identifies the ἰδόνην of that earlier canon with ἡ σεβασμία τῆς ἁγίας τραπέζης ἐνδοῦς, "the sacred covering of the holy table." On the other hand a passage of Theodoret, which has been alleged (Martigny, Dict. des Antiq. Chrétiennes, in voc. 'Autel') as proving the use of rich cloths for the altar early in the 4th century, has probably a very different meaning from that attributed to it. The word θειαστήριον in early ecclesiastical Greek is more frequently used in the sense of the whole space immediately about the holy table, the "sanctuary," than of the "altar" itself. When therefore Theodoret states (Hist. Eccl. lib. i. cap. xix. al. cap. xxxi.) that at the consecration of a church at Jerusalem, in the case of Constantine the Great, διοκομείτο τὸ θεῖον θειαστήριον βασιλικοῖς τε παρατέταρμασιν καὶ κερμηλίοις λιθοκαλλήτοις χρυσοῖς, the reference is in all probability to rich curtains, or "veils," hung about the sanctuary, not to altar-cloths properly so called. Much more certainly to the purpose is a passage of St. Chrysostom (Hom. l. al. li. in Matt. cap. xiv. 23, 24), part of a homily originally delivered at Antioch, in which he draws a contrast between the coverings of silk, often ornamented with gold (χρυσόπαστα ἐπιπέλαρα), bestowed upon the holy table, and the scanty covering grudgingly given, or altogether refused, to Christ in the person of His poor members upon earth. Among the Acts of the Council of Constantinople, held in the year 538, is preserved (Labbe's Concilia, by Mansi, tom. ix. pp. 1102, 3) a curious letter drawn up by the clergy of the church of Apamea in Syria Secunda. They complain of the iniquitous conduct of Severus, bishop of Antioch, and of their own bishop Petrus; and amid many grave charges brought against the latter, one is that owing to the gross carelessness (worse than carelessness is charged by the letter) with which he celebrated the Holy Liturgy, the purple covering of the altar was defiled (κατέχρωσε πρῶματι τὸ σπτοῦ θειαστήριον τῆν ἀλουρίδα). In the 7th and 8th centuries we find evidence that these richer coverings of the altar were in some cases adorned with symbolic ornaments and with pictures of saints (the χαρταῖρες ἁγίων), which incurred the condemnation of the Iconoclasts, who carried them away together with images and pictures of other kinds. So we learn from Germanus of Constantinople, early in the 8th century (Scti. Germani Patriarchae de Sanctis Synodus, &c. apud Spicilieg. Rom. A. Mai, tom. vii. p. 62). On the other hand, in times of grievous public calamity, we read, in one instance at least, of the altar as well as the person of the bishop and his episcopal throne being robed in black. So Theodorus Lector records of Acacius, patriarch of Constantinople: καὶ ἑαυτὸν καὶ τὸν θρόνον καὶ τὸ θειαστήριον μελανοῖς ἐνδύμασιν ἠμφίσεσεν. In the later liturgical offices (see Goar, Euchol. Graec. pp. 623, 627, sqq.), and in writers such as Symeon of Thessalonica (circa 1420 A.D.), we find mention of an inner covering of linen, known as κατάσαρκα, and of a second and more costly covering without. Patriarch Symeon makes further mention of four pieces of cloth on each of the four corners of the altar. "The holy table hath four pieces of woven cloth (τέσσαρα μέρη ὑφάσματων) upon the four corners thereof; and that because the fulness of the Church was formed out of all the quarters of the world; and on these four pieces are the names of the four Evangelists, because it was by their instrumentality that the Church was gathered, and the Gospel made circuit of the whole compass of the world. But the [inner cover] called κατάσαρκα, has an outer covering (τραπέσοφόρον) immediately above it. For here is at once the tomb, and the throne, of Jesus. The first of these coverings is as it were the linen wherein the dead body was wrapped; but the second is as an outer garment (περιβολή) of glory according to that of the psalm, said at the putting on thereof, 'The Lord is king: he hath put on beauteous apparel'" (Symeon of Thessalonica, apud Goar, Euchol. Graec. p. 216). Of the two words here and elsewhere employed as the technical designation of these two altar-cloths, the first, κατάσαρκα, was originally used of an inner chiton, or tunic, worn "next the skin" (κατὰ σάρκα). Thence its secondary usage as a compound word (τὸ κατάσαρκα) in speaking of any inner covering, as here of an inner covering, of linen, for the holy table. The use of the word τραπέσοφόρον, as a designation for the more costly outer cover, belongs in all probability to a comparatively late date. The word does occur in earlier writers, but in a wholly different sense, and one more in accordance with classical analogy. [W. B. M.]

ALTARIUM (compare ALTAR). This word is sometimes used to designate not merely an altar, but the space within which the altar stood. For instance, Perpetuus, Bishop of Tours, built a basilica in honour of St. Martin, which had "fenestras in altiro triginta duas, in capso viginti" "œtia octo, tria in altario, quinque in capso" (Gregory of Tours, Hist. Franc. ii. 14). Ruinart remarks upon the passage that by "altarium" we are to understand the presbytery, by "capsum" the nave. Compare Mabillon, de Lit. Gall. i. 8, § 1, p. 69. [REMA.]

The plural "altaria" is also used in a similar sense; as by St. Ambrose in the passage (Epist. 33) quoted under ALTAR; and in the Theodosian Codex, where (Lih. ix. tit. 45, De Spatio Ecclesiastici Asyli) it is provided: "Pateant summi Dei templa timentibus; nec sola altaria," etc. The equivalent word in the Greek version is θυσιαστήρια.

The same extended sense is found in some modern languages, e.g. in Portuguese "altar mór" (great or high altar) is used in the sense of choir or chancel (Burton, Highlands of the Brazil, i. 128). [A. N.]

AMA (Amula, Hama, Hamula; compare Ger. Ahm, Ohme).

"Amæ vasa sunt in quibus sacra oblatio continetur, ut vinum. . . . Amula, vas vinarium. Amulæ dicuntur quibus offertur devotio sive oblatio, simile arceolis" (Papias, in Ducange's Glossary, s. v.). The vessel in which wine for the celebration of the Eucharist was offered by the worshippers.

The word Ama is used by Columella and other classical authors, but the earliest instance of its use as a liturgical vessel which has been noticed is in the Charta Cornutianna of the year 471 (Mabillon de Re Dipl. vi. 262), where "hamulæ oblativæ" are mentioned. "Amæ argenteæ" are mentioned in the Ordo Romanus I. (p. 5) among the vessels which were to be brought from the Church of the Saviour, now known as St. John Lateran, for the Pontifical Mass on Easter-Day; and in the directions for the Pontifical Mass itself in the same Ordo (p. 10), we find that after the Pope had entered the seatorium or presbytery, the archdeacon following him received the amulæ, and poured the wine into the larger chalice (calicem majorem) which was held by the subdeacon; and again (c. 14, p. 11) after the altar was decked, the archdeacon took the Pope's amula (compare Amalarius, Ecloga, 554) from the oblationary subdeacon, and poured the wine through the strainer (super colum) into the chalice [CHALICE]; then those of the deacons, of the primicerius, and the others. Whether the "amæ argenteæ" are identical with the "amulæ" may perhaps be doubted; but at any rate the amulæ seem to have been church-vessels provided for the purpose of the offertory. Among the presents which Pope Adrian (772-795) made to the church of St. Adrian at Rome, the Liber Pontificalis (p. 346) mentions "annam unam," and also an "amulam offertorium"

of silver which weighed sixty-seven pounds. They were, however, often of much smaller size, and the small silver vessels (see woodcuts) preserved in the Museo Cristiano in the Vatican are deemed to be amulæ. They measure only about 7 inches in height, and may probably date from the 5th or 6th century. Bianchini in his edition of the Lit. Pontif. has given an engraving of a similar vessel of larger size. On this the miracle of Cana is represented in a tolerably good style. Bianchini supposes this to be of the fourth century.

The material of these vessels was usually silver, but sometimes gold, and they were often adorned with gems. Gregory the Great (Epist. i. 42, p. 539) mentions "amulæ onychinæ," meaning probably vessels of onyx, or glass imitating onyx. [A. N.]

AMBITUS, compass, in music. (Toni debitus ascensus et descensus.) The compass of the earliest Church melodies did not in some instances reach, in few did it exceed, a fifth. "Principio cantilæ ad simplices fufere apud primos Ecclesie, ad vix disparte ascensu ac descensu implerent. Cui consuetudini proxime accessisset diatona Ambrosiani. Deinde paulatim diatona devanum, verum omnium Modorum systema." (Glennus, Dodecachordon, lib. i. cap. xiv.) In Gregorian music the octave was th-limit; the four authentic scales [AUTHENTIC] moving from the key-note to its 8ve, the four plagal [PLAGAL] from the 4th below the key-note to the 5th above it. In later times this compass (ambitus) was much extended. A melody occupying or employing its whole compass was called Cantus Perfectus; falling short of it, Cantus Imperfectus; exceeding it, Cantus Plusquamperfectus. Subsequently other interpretations (such as the course of modulation permitted in fugue) have been given to the word ambitus. With these we are not now concerned. (Gerbert, Script. Mus.; Forkel; Kock, Mus. Lex.) [J. H.]

AMBITUS ALTARIS (Ἱερατεῖον, Renaudot, Lit. Orient. i. 182). This expression is sometimes used, as apparently by Anastasius (Lit. Pontif. in Vita Sergii II.), for the enclosure which surrounded the altar. Pope Sergius II. (A.D. 844-877), he says, constructed at St. John Lateran an "ambitus altaris" of ampler size than that which had before existed.

It would seem that it was, in some cases and perhaps in most, distinct from the presbyterium or "chorus cantorum;" and according to Sarnelli (Antica Basilicographia, p. 84) there was usually between the presbyterium and the altar a raised space called "colea." Various passages in the Lit. Pontif.—e.g. those in which the alterations made by Pope Hadrian I. (A.D. 772-795) at S. Paolo f. l. M., and by Pope Gregory IV. (A.D. 827-844) at S. Maria in Trastevere, are described—show that the position of the altar and the arrangement of the enclosures were not alike in all cases. It seems not improbable but that in the lesser churches one enclosure served both to fence round the altar and to form the "chorus."

In the plan prepared for the church of St. Gall in the beginning of the 9th century (v. woodcut, s. v. CHURCH) an enclosure is marked "chorus," and a small space or passage intervenes between this and an enclosure shutting off the apse, within which stands the altar. This is at the west end of the church; at the east end the apse is in like manner enclosed, but the enclosure of the "chorus" is brought up to the steps leading to the raised apse without a break. A small enclosure is shown round all the altars, except those which are within the enclosures of the apses.

It appears not unlikely that the square enclosure in the church at Djemla in Algeria [CHURCH] may be such an "ambitus;" Mr. Fergusson considers this enclosure a cella or choir, and says that it seems to have been enclosed up to the roof, but that the building is so ruined that this cannot be known for a certainty. A choir enclosed by solid walls would be a plan so anomalous in a Christian church that very strong evidence would be required to prove its having existed. The building in question may, from the purely classical character of the mosaic floor, be safely assigned to an early date, probably anterior to the fourth century.

It is doubtful whether any early example of an "Ambitus altaris" now exists. We may learn from the Lit. Pontif. that they were usually of stone or marble, no doubt arranged in posts or uprights alternating with slabs variously sculptured, and pierced in like manner with the presbyterium at S. Clemente in Rome. The Lit.

Pontif. tells us of the Ambitus which is above mentioned Pope Sergius II. constructed at St. John Lateran, that he "pulchris columnis cum marmoribus desuper in gyro sculptis splendide decoravit;" many fragments of marble slabs with the plaited and knotted ornament characteristic of this period are preserved in the cloister of that church, and may probably be fragments of this "Ambitus."

In the richer churches silver columns bearing arches of the same metal were often erected on the marble enclosure, and from these arches hung rich curtains, and frequently vessels or crowns of the precious metals; repeated mention of such decorations may be found in the Lit. Pontif., and a passage in the will of Fortunatus Patrinch of Grado (Hazlitt, Hist. of the Republic of Venice, vol. i. App.), who died in the early part of the 9th century, describes a like arrangement very clearly in the following words: "Post ipsum altare alium parietem deauratum et deargentatum similitur longitudine pedum xv. et in altitudine pedes iv. et super ipso pariete arcus voluites de argento et super ipsos arcus imagines de auro et de argento."

This expression "ambitus altaris" may perhaps also sometimes stand for the apse as surrounding the altar. [A. N.]

AMBO (Gr. ἄμβων, from ἀναβαίνειν). The raised desk in a church from which certain parts of the service were read. It has been also called πόρπυς, pulpitum, suggestus. By Sozomen (Eccl. Hist. ix. 2, p. 367) the ambo is explained to be the "βῆμα τῶν ἀναγινωσκτῶν"—the pulpit of the readers. From it were read, or chanted, the gospel, the epistle, the lists of names inscribed on the diptychs, edicts of bishops, and in general any communications to be made to the congregation by presbyters, deacons, or subdeacons; the bishop in the earlier centuries being accustomed to deliver his addresses from the cathedra in the centre of the apse, or from a chair placed in front of the altar; St. John Chrysostom was, however, in the habit of preaching sitting on the ambo (ἐπὶ τοῦ ἄμβωνος, Sozomen Eccl. Hist. vi. 5), in order that he might be better heard. Full details as to the use of the ambo will be found in Sarnelli (Antica Basilicographia, p. 72), and Ciampini (Vet. Mon., t. i. p. 21 et seq.); but the examples which they describe are probably later by several centuries than the period with which we are now concerned, and the various refinements of reading the gospel from a higher elevation than the epistle, and the like, are probably by no means of very early introduction. Two and even three ambones sometimes existed; one was then used for the gospel, one for the epistle, and one for the reading of the prophetic or other books of the Old Testament (Martigny, Dict. des Antiq. Chrét.). In the old church of St. Peter's there was, however, but one, which Platner (Beschreibung von Rom) thinks was a continuance of the ancient usage.

Something in the nature of an ambo or desk no doubt was in use from a very early period. Bunsen (Basiliken des Christlichen Roms, p. 48) expresses his opinion that the ambo was originally moveable. In the earlier centuries much of the church furniture was of wood, and the ambones were probably of the same material. Wherever a "presbyterium" or "chorus cantorum" (i.e. an enclosed space in front of the

At St. Sophia's in Constantinople the ambo constructed by Justinian stood nearly in the middle of the church, but more towards the east. A full account of it is given by Paul the Silentary in a poem in hexameter verse upon it. From this we learn that it was ascended by two flights of stairs, one from the west, the other from the east; and that it was covered by a canopy resting on eight columns. It was constructed of the most precious marbles, and adorned with gold and precious stones. The area at the top of the stairs was sufficiently spacious for the coronation of the Emperor, and the space below enclosed by railings was occupied by the singers. During the services the gospels and epistles were no doubt read from the raised part.

Pope Pelagius (555-559) erected an ambo in St. Peter's (Lib. Pontif.), and in the cathedral of Ravenna are the remains of one erected by Archbishop Agnellus (558-566). This last is ornamented with figures of lambs, peacocks, doves, fishes, &c., within panels, the design and execution being poor and rude.

Ambo of S. Apollinare Nuovo, at Ravenna.

The ambo represented in the woodcut is in the church of S. Apollinare Nuovo at Ravenna, the date of its erection has not been ascertained with certainty, but it would seem not improbable that it formed a part of the original fittings of the church built between A.D. 493 and A.D. 525. The pillars on which it is now elevated were doubtless added at some later period, when it was arranged in order to be employed as a pulpit

The ambones in S. Clemente at Rome are of different periods: the smaller and earlier may perhaps be of the same date as the circus with which it is connected (8th century?), but there is some difference in the character of the work. The larger dates probably from the 12th century, as no doubt does also that in S. Lorenzo f. l. M. at Rome. The circumstance upon which the Abbé Martigny (Dict. des Antiq. Chrét.) relies as proving the high antiquity of this last, viz. that a part of its base is formed from a bas-relief relating to pagan sacrifices, cannot be considered as having much weight, as a part of the superstructure is formed from a slab bearing an early Christian inscription, and as the whole style and character of the work are so evidently those in use at Rome during the 12th and 13th centuries.

The lesser and earlier ambo at S. Clemente has two desks—one, the most elevated, looking towards the altar, the other in the contrary direction; the later ambo has a semi-hexagonal projection on each side, and is ascended by a stair at each end. This latter plan seems to have been the more usual; the ambones at Ravenna and those at Rome of the 12th and 13th centuries are all thus planned.

In the plan for the church of St. Gall (c. A.D. 820), the ambo is placed in the middle of the nave but near its eastern end, in front of the enclosure marked “chorus,” and is within an enclosure.

A tall ornamented column is often found attached to the ambo; on this the paschal candle was fixed. This usage may have existed from an early period, but perhaps the earliest existing example of such a column is one preserved in the museum of the Lateran at Rome, which however is probably not older than the 11th century. It is engraved by Ciampini (Vet. Mon., t. i. pl. xiv.).

According to Sarnelli (Ant. Bas., p. 84), the word ambo is the proper expression for the raised platform or chorus cantorium; he however gives no authorities for this use of the word. [A. N.]

AMBROSIAN MUSIC, the earliest music used in the Christian Church of which we have any account, and so named after Ambrose, bishop of Milan (374-398), who introduced it to his diocese about the year 386, during the reign of Constantine.

The notions prevailing among musical and other writers respecting the peculiarities of Ambrosian music are based rather on conjecture than on knowledge. It may be considered certain that it was more simple and less varied than the Gregorian music which, about two centuries later, almost everywhere superseded it. Indeed it has been doubted whether actual melody at all entered into it, and conjectured that it was only a kind of musical speech—monotone with melodic closes, or ACCENTUS ECCLESIASTICUS, a kind of music, or mode of musical utterance, which Gregory retained for collects and responses, but which he rejected as too simple for psalms and hymns. On the other hand, it has been argued more plausibly that, to whatever extent the Accentus or *Modus chorali*ter legendi may nave been used in Ambrosian music, an element more distinctly musical entered largely into it; that a decided cantus, as in Gregorian music, was used for the psalms; and that something which might even now be called melody was employed for (especially metrical) hymns. That this melody was narrow in compass [AMBITUS], and little varied in its intervals, is probable or certain. The question however is not of quality, but of kind. Good melody does not of necessity involve many notes; Rousseau has composed a very sweet one on only three (Consolations des Misères de ma Vie, No. 53).

The probability that this last view of Ambrosian music is the right one is increased by the accounts of its effect in performance, given in the Benedictine Life of St. Ambrose, drawn from his own works, wherein one especial occasion is mentioned on which the whole congregation sang certain hymns with such fervour and unction that many could not restrain their tears—an incident confirmed by an eye-witness, St. Augustine. "How did I weep," he says, "in Thy hymns and canticles, touched to the quick by the voices of Thy sweet attuned Church! The voices flowed into mine ears, and the truth distilled into my heart, whence the affections of my devotions overflowed, and tears ran down, and happy was I therein."* It is difficult to attribute to mere "musical speech," however employed, such effects as these, even upon the rudest and least instructed people, à fortiori, on persons like Augustine, accomplished in all the learning and the arts of his time. The hymns and canticles must surely have been conjoined, and the voices attuned to a sweeter and more expressive song. "Dulcis est cantilena," says Ambrose (Op. t. l. p. 1052) himself, "quae non corpus effeminat, sed mentem animamque confirmat." Whatever its properties, its usefulness, or its dignity, no one would apply the epithet dulcis to the Accentus Ecclesiasticus, or speak of it, or anything like it, as cantilena.

That neither Augustine nor any contemporary writer has described particularly, or given us any technical account of, the music practised by the Milanese congregations of the end of the 4th century, however much we may regret it, need hardly cause us any surprise. We are very imperfectly informed about many things nearer to us in point of time, and practically of more importance. Augustine has indeed told us in what manner the psalms and hymns were sung in the church of St. Ambrose, and that this manner was exotic and new.^b But of the character of the song itself—in what the peculiarity of the Cantus Ambrosianus consisted—he tells us nothing. Possibly there was little to tell; and the only peculiarity consisted in the employment in psalmody of more melodious strains than heretofore—strains not in themselves new, but never before

* "Quantum flevi in hymnis et canticis tuis, suave sonantis ecclesiae tuae vocibus commotus acriter! Voces illae infundebant auribus meis, et aliquantulum veritas in cor meum; et exarscebat inde affectus pietatis, et eurrebant lacrimae, et bene nihil erat cum eis."—S. Augustini Confessionum, lib. ix. cap. vi. c. 14.

so employed; for, "in the first ages of Christianity," says St. Isidore, "the psalms were recited in a manner more approaching speech than song."^c In this view most writers on Ambrosian music have concurred; that it was veritable song, in the proper musical sense of the word, not musical speech or "half-song;" and that, not only was it based on a scale system or tonality perfectly well understood, but that its rhythmus was subject to recognised laws. S. Ubaldo, the author of a work (Disquisitio de cantu a D. Ambrosio in Mediolanensem ecclesiam introducto, Mediolani, 1695) especially devoted to Ambrosian music, says expressly that St. Ambrose was not the first to introduce antiphonal singing into the West, but that he did introduce what the ancients called Cantus Harmonicus, on account of its determined tonality and variety of intervals, properties not needed in, and indeed incongruous with, musical speech. With this Cantus Harmonicus was inseparably connected the Cantus Rhythmicus or Metricus; so that, by the application of harmonic (i. e. in the modern sense, melodic) rule, a kind of melody was produced in some degree like our own. That Ambrosian music was rhythmical is irrefragably attested by the variety of metres employed by Ambrose in his own hymns, and that such was held to have been the case for many centuries is confirmed by Guido Aretinus and John Cotton (11th century).

The first requisite of melody is that the sounds composing it be not only in the same "system," but also in some particular scale or succession, based upon and moving about a given sound. The oldest scales consisted at the most of four sounds, whence called tetrachords. The influence of the tetrachord was of long duration; it is the theoretical basis even of modern tonality. Eventually scales extended in practice to pentachords, hexachords, heptachords, and ultimately octachords, as with us. The modern scale may be defined as a succession of sounds connecting a given sound with its octave. The theory and practice of the octachord were familiar to the Greeks, from whose system it is believed Ambrose took the first four octachords or modes, viz. the Phrygian, Dorian, Hypolydian, and Hypophrygian, called by the first Christian writers on music Protus, Deuterus, Tritus, and Tetrardus. Subsequently the Greek provincial names got to be misapplied, and the Ambrosian system appeared as follows:

These scales differ essentially from our scales,

major or minor, of D, E, F, G, which are virtually transpositions of one another, or identical scales at a higher or lower pitch, the seats of whose two semitones are always in the same places—between the 3rd and 4th and the 7th and 8th sounds severally. Whereas the Greek and Ambrosian scales above are not only unlike one another (the seats of the semitones being in all different), but they are also unlike either our modern typical major scale of C, which has its semitones between the 3rd and 4th and 7th and 8th sounds, or our typical minor scale of A,
which has one of its semitones always between the 2nd and 3rd sounds, another between the 5th and 6th or the 7th and 8th, and in its chromatic form between both.

The 1st, 2nd, 3rd, and 4th Ambrosian scales or tones therefore are not what we now call
"keys," but "modes," differing from one another as the modern major and minor modes differ, in the places of their semitones. Melodies therefore in this or that Ambrosian "tone" have a variety of character analogous to that which distinguishes our major and minor modes so very widely. Thus tenderness is the popular attribute of the minor mode; strength and clearness are those of the major. In like manner one Ambrosian tone was supposed to be characterised by dignity, another by languor, and so on.

The rhythm of Ambrosian melody is thought by some to have consisted only in the adaptation to long and short syllables of long and short notes. "Of what we call time," says Forkel (Gesch. der Musik, ii. 168),—the proportion between the different divisions of the same melody,—the ancients had no conception." He does not tell us how they contrived to march or to dance to timeless melodies—melodies with two beats in one foot and three in another, or three feet in one phrase and four in another, nor how vast congregations were enabled to sing them; and if anything is certain about Ambrosian song it is that it was above all things congregational.

Whether Ambrose was acquainted with the use of musical characters is uncertain. Probably he was. The system he adopted was Greek, and he could hardly make himself acquainted with Greek music without having acquired some knowledge of Greek notation, which, though intricate in its detail, was simple in its principles.
But even the invention, were it needed, of characters capable of representing the comparatively few sounds of Ambrosian melody could have been a matter of no difficulty. Such characters needed only to represent the pitch of these sounds; their duration was dependent on,

and sufficiently indicated by, the metre. Copies of Ambrosian music-books are preserved in some libraries, which present indications of what may however these are musical characters. Possibly it is certain that, in the time of Charlemagne, Am-brosian song was finally superseded, except in the Milanese, by Gregorian. The knowledge of the Ambrosian musical alphabet, if it ever existed, may, in such circumstances, and in such an age, have easily been lost, though the melodies themselves were long preserved traditionally.

AMBROSIANUM.—This word in old liturgical writings often denotes a hymn, from S.
Ambrose having been the first to introduce metrical hymns into the service of the Church.
Originally the word may have indicated that the particular hymn was the composition of S.
Ambrose, and hence it came to signify any hymn.
Thus S. Benedict, in his directions for Nocturns, says, "Post hunc psalmum 94 (Vente) cum antiphona, aut certe decantandus." Inde sequatur Ambrosianum: Deinde sex psalmi cum anti-phonia." Also, S. Isidore de Diein, off. lib. i.
c. 1, § 2, speaking of hymns, mentions S.
Ambrose of Milan, whom he calls "a most illustrious Doctor of the Church, and a copious composer of this kind of poetry. Whence (he adds)
from his name hymns are called Ambrosians," (unde ex ejus nomine hymni Ambrosiani appel-lantur).

AMEN (Heb. אָמֵן). The formula by which one expresses his concurrence in the prayer of another, as for instance in Deut. xxvii. 15.

1. This word, which was used in the services of the synagogue, was transferred unchanged in the very earliest age of the Church to the Christian services [compare ALLELUIA]; for the Apostle (1 Cor. xiv. 16) speaks of the Amen of the assembly which followed the εὐχαριστία, or thanksgiving. And the same custom is traced in a series of authorities. Justin Martyr (Apol.
i. c. 65, p. 127) notices that the people present
say the Amen after prayer and thanksgiving; Dionysius of Alexandria (in Euseb. H. E. vii. 9, p.
253, Schwegler) speaks of one who had often listened to the thanksgiving (εὐχαριστία), and joined in the Amen which followed. Cyril of Jerusalem (Catechismus Mystag. 5, p. 331) says that the Lord's Prayer is sealed with an Amen.
Jerome, in a well-known passage (Prooemium in lib. ii. Comment. Ep. Gal. p. 428) speaks of the thundering sound of the Amen of the Roman congregations.

2. The formula of consecration in the Holy Eucharist is in most ancient liturgies ordered to be said aloud, and the people respond Amen. Probably, however, the custom of saying this part of the service secretly—afterwards universal in the West—had already begun to insinuate itself in the time of Justinian; for that emperor ordered (Novella 123, in Migne's Patrol. tom. 72, p. 1026),
that the consecration-formula should be said aloud, expressly on the ground that the people might respond Amen at its termination. [Compare CANON.] In most Greek liturgies also,

* This is explained as "omnino protrahendo et sub uno aut a pluribus in voce" or as "in directum sine Antiphona." Manuale de Ant. Mon. rit., Lib. I. cap. ii. 22

when the priest in administering says, "σάμω Χριστοῦ," the receiver answers Amen. So, too, in the Clementine Liturgy, after the ascription of glory to God (Apost. Const. viii. 13, p. 215, [Ützen]). (Bona, De Rebus Liturgicis, l. ii. c. 5, 12, 17.) [C.]

AMICE (Amictus, Humeralis, Superhumeralis or Ephod, Anaboladium, Anaboligium, Anagolium). § 1. The word Amictus is employed in classical writers as a general term for any outer garment. Thus Virgil employs it (Aen. iii. 405) in speaking of the toga, ornamented with purple, the end of which was thrown about the head by priests and other official persons when engaged in acts of sacrifice. (See for example "the Emperor sacrificing," from the column of Trajan, Vest. Christ. pl. vi.) The same general usage may be traced in the earlier ecclesiastical writers, as in St. Jerome, and in Gregory of Tours, who uses the word in speaking of a bride's veil. St. Isidore of Seville (circ. 630 A.D.) nowhere employs the word as the designation of any particular garment, sacred or otherwise. But in defining the meaning of anabolidium (a Greek word which at a later time was identified with amictus as the name of a sacred vestment), he describes it as "amictorium lineum feminarum quo humeri operiuntur, quod Graeci et Latini sindonem vocant." (Origines, xix. 25.) With this may be compared St. Jerome on Isaiah, cap. iii, where in referring to the dress of Hebrew women, he says, "Habeat sindones quae vocantur amictoria." This usage of "amictorium," and its equivalent "anabolidium," in speaking of a linen garment worn by women as a covering for the shoulders, will prepare us for the first reference to the "amictus" as a vestment early in the 9th century, when it is compared by Rabanus Maurus (such seems to be his meaning) with the "superhumeralis" of Levitical use (De Instit. Cler. Lib. i. cap. 15). Rabanus, however, does not use the word "amictus," though he seems evidently to refer to the vestment elsewhere so called. Amalarius of Metz, writing about the same time (circ. 825 A.D.), speaks of the "amictus" as being the first in order of the vestments of the Church, "primum vestimentum nostrum quo collum undique cingimus." Hence its symbolism in his eyes as implying "castigatio vocis," the due restraint of the voice, whose organs are in the throat (De Eccl. Off. ii. 17.). Walafrid Strabo writing some few years later (he was a pupil of Rabanus), enumerates the eight vestments of the Church, but without including in them the amice (De Res. Eccl. c. 24.). But in all the later liturgical writers the vestment is named under some one or other of the various designations enumerated at the head of this article. As to its use in this country there is no evidence till nearly the close of the Saxon period. It is not mentioned in the Pontifical of Egbert. In a later Anglo-Saxon Pontifical (of the 10th century, Dr. Rock says,) among the vestments enumerated occurs mention of the "superhumeralis seu poderem," an expression which has been supposed to point to the amice, though the use of "poderis" as an alternative name, seems to make this somewhat doubtful. (Quoted by Dr. Rock, Church of our Fathers, vol. i. p. 465; from the Archaeologia, vol. xxv. p. 28.)

§ 2. Shape of the Amice, its Material, and ornamentation. The amice was originally a square or oblong piece of linen, somewhat such as that which forms the background in the accompanying woodcut, and was probably worn nearly as shown in Fig. 1, so as to cover the neck and shoulders. Early in the 10th century (A.D. 925) we hear, for the first time, of ornaments of gold on the amice. (Testamentum Recti Episcopi in Migne's Patrologia, tom. xxxii. p. 468, "caligas et sandallas parla duo, amictos [sic] cum auro quattuor.") This ornament was probably an "aurifrigium" or "orriey." From the 11th century onwards the richer amices were adorned with embroidery, and at times even with precious stones. These ornaments were attached to a portion only of the amice, a comparatively small patch, known as a plaga, or parura (i. e., paratura) being fastened on (see Fig. 4 in wool-cut) so as to appear as a kind of collar above the alb (see Fig. 5). An example is given of late date, to show the shape of the parura, as, from the nature of the material, very early amices are not extant. These parurae were known in later times as "collaria" or "colleria" (see Rock, Ch. of our Fathers, l. 470).

§ 3. How worn.—All the earlier notices of the amice are such as to imply that it was worn on the neck and shoulders only. Honorius of Autun (writing circ. 1125 A.D.) is the first who speaks of it as being placed on the head. "Humeralis quod in Lege Ephod, apud nos Amictus dicitur, sibi imponit et illo caput et collum et humeros (unde et Humeralis dicitur) cooperit, et in pectore copulatum duabus vltis ad mammillas cingit. Per Humeralis quod capiti imponitur spes caelestium intelligitur." (Genma animae, l. c. 201.) It appears to have been temporarily placed on the head (as shown in Fig. 2 of the above woodcut) till the other vestments were arranged, after which it was turned down so that the parura might appear in its proper place. To this position on the head it is to be referred its later symbolism as a helmet of AMPHIBALUM or AMPHIBALUS. § 1. This word appears to be confined to Gallican writers. And this fact, coupled with its Greek derivation, pointing as this does to a very early period for its introduction, is noticeable, as one among many instances of diversities of usage in minor matters, characteristic of the Gallican church, and indicating an origin distinct from that of other western churches.

§ 2. Form of the vestment, and its prevailing use. There are three passages to which reference may here be made as determining all that can with certainty be known with regard to the vestment now in question. St. Remigius, Archbishop of Arles, dying about 500 A.D., left to his successor in the see "Amphibalum album paschalem," a white amphibalus for use on Sundays and high festivals. (For "paschalis" see Duceange in voc.) We cannot here conclude with absolute certainty that it is of a vestment for church use that he is speaking, though the context seems to imply this. (The quotation is from the Testamentum S. Remigii Remensis, apud Galland, Bibliothec. Pat., tom. x. p. 806.) But in the passages that follow this meaning is beyond doubt. In a life of S. Bonitus (alias S. Bonus), † circ. 710, A.D. written, as it is supposed, by a contemporary (Acta Sanctorum Januar., d. xv. p. 1071 sqq.), we are told that the saint was much given to weeping even in church; so much so, that the upper part of his amphibalus, which served as a covering for his head, was found to be wet with the tears he shed. "Lacrimarum ei gratia in sacro non deerat officio ita ut amphibalus summis, qua caput tegebatur, ex profusione earum madida videretur." This "upper part" of the amphibalus was evidently a kind of hood (like that of the casula), separable, in some sort, from the rest of the garment. For the saint is represented as appearing after death, in a vision, to a certain maiden, devoted to God's service, and sending through her a message to the "mother" of the neighbouring monastery, bidding her keep by her (no doubt as a relic) that part of his amphibalus which covered his head. "Ut partem amphibalus mei qua caput tegitur, secum retineat."

Even in this passage, however, though it is evidently spoken of as worn in church, and during the "holy office," it does not follow that a sacerdotal vestment, distinctively so called, is there intended. The mention of the hood (or hood-like appendage) as worn over the head points rather to use in the choir. But in a fragmentary notice of the Gallican rite, of uncertain date, probably of the 9th or 10th century, the word amphibalus is used as equivalent to the "casula," then regarded as specially belonging to sacerdotal ministry. "The casula, known as amphibalus," the writer says, "which the priest puts upon him, is united from top to bottom . . . It is without sleeves . . . joined in front without slit or opening . . . Casula, quam amphibalum vocant, quod sacerdos induitur (sic), tota unita . . . Ideo sine manicis (sic) quia sacerdos potius benedicit quam ministrat. Ideo unita princeps, non scissa, non aperta." &c. (See Martene, Thesaurus Anecdotorum, tom. v.)

From the above passages we may infer that "amphibalus" was a name, in the Gallican church of the first eight or nine centuries, for the more solemn habit of ecclesiastics, and particularly for that which they wore in offices of holy ministration. Having regard to its (probably) Eastern origin, and to its subsequent identification with the casula, we shall probably be right in thinking that it resembled in shape the white phenolin, in which Eastern bishops are represented in mosaics of the 6th century, in the great church (now Mosque) of St. Sophia at Constantinople. For these last see the article VESTMENTS (Greek), later in this work, and Salzenberg's Altkristliche Baudenkmale, plates xxviii. and xxix. [W. B. M.]

1. The flasks or cruets, generally of precious metal, which contain the wine and water used at the altar. The word "pollen," used in some districts of Germany to designate these vessels (Binterim's Denkwürdigkeiten iv. 1. 183) is probably derived from "Ampulle."

When the custom of making offerings of wine for the Holy Communion ceased, ampullae seem to have taken the place of the larger AMAP

The notion of the ampullae themselves having been large vessels is probably founded on the ancient etymology, "ampulla, quasi vas ampullum," an etymology which Walafrid Strabo (De Hel. Eccl. c. 24) adapts to the facts of his own time by reversing it, "ampulla quasi parum ampla." The first mention of ampullae as altar-vessels, appears to be in the Liber Pontificalis (c. 110) in the life of John III. (559-573), who is said to have ordered that the oratories of the martyrs in the city of Rome should be supplied with altar-plate, including ampullae [al. amulae] from the Lateran church.

2. More commonly the word ampulla denotes a vessel, ἀμφοῦς, used for holding consecrated oil or chrism. In this sense it is used by Optatus Milevitanus (contra Donatistas ii. 19, p. 42), when he tells us that an "ampulla christiana" thrown from a window by the Donatists miraculously remained unbroken. In the Gregorian Sacramentary (p. 65), in the directions for the benediction of Chrism on the "Feria V. post Palmas," or Thursday in Holy Week, "ampullae duo cum olea" are ordered to be prepared, the better of which is to be presented to the Pope. [CHRISM.]

Ampulla at Monza.

By far the most renowned ampulla of this kind is that which was said to have been brought by a dove from heaven at the baptism of Clovis, and which was used at the coronation of the Frank kings. Hincmar, in the service which he drew up for the coronation of Charles the Bald (840), speaks of the first Christian king of the Franks having been anointed and consecrated with the heaven-descended chrism, whence that which he himself used was derived ("caelitus sumpto chrismate, unde nunc habemus, perunctus et in regem sacratum"), as if of a thing well known. In Flodard, who wrote in the first half of the 10th century, we find the legend fully developed. He tells us (Hist. Eccles. Remensis, l. 13, in Migne's Patrol. vol. 133, p. 52 c.) that at the Baptism of Clovis, the clerk who bore the chrism was prevented by the crowd from reaching his proper station; and that when the moment for unction arrived, St. Remi raised his eyes to heaven and prayed, when "ecce subito columba ceu nix adnotat candida rostro defersens ampullam caelestis doni chrismate repletam." This sacred ampulla (the "Sainte Ampouille") was preserved in the abbey of St. Remi, at Reims, and used at the coronation of the successive kings of France. It was broken in 1793, but even then a fragment was said to have been preserved, and was used at the coronation of Charles X. The ampulla represented in the woodcut, from Monza, is said to be of the 7th century. It is of a metal resembling tin, and has engraved upon it a representation of the Adoration of the Magi and of the Shepherds, with the inscription, ΚΑΘΩΣ ΕΥΑΛΟΥ ΖΩΗΣ ΤΩΝ ΑΓΓΛΩΝ ΧΡΙΣΤΟΥ ΤΟΠΩΝ, having been used for preserving Holy Oil. [OIL, HOLY.] [C.]

AMULETS. The earliest writer in whom the word occurs is Pliny (H. N. xix. 4, 19; xxx. 15, 47, et al.), and is used by him in the sense of a "charm" against poisons, witchcraft, and the like ("veneficiorum amuleta"). A Latin derivation has been suggested for it as being that "quod malum amolitur." Modern etymologists, however, connect both the word as well as the thing with the East, and derive it from the Arabic hamulet (= a thing suspended). The practice which the word implies had been in the Christian Church, if not from the first, yet as soon as the Paganism and Judaism out of which it had emerged began again to find their way into it as by a process of infiltration, and the history of amulets presents a strange picture of the ineradicable tendency of mankind to fall back into the basest superstitions which seem to belong only to the savage bowing before his fetiché. Man has a dread of unseen powers around him—demons, spectres, an evil eye—and he believes that certain objects have power to preserve him from them. That belief fastens sometimes upon symbolic forms or solemn words that have once served as representatives of higher thoughts, sometimes upon associations which seem altogether arbitrary. When the Israelites left Egypt, they came from a people who had carried this idea to an almost unequalled extent. The scarabaeus, the hawk, the serpent, the uraeus, or hooded snake, an open eye, outspread wings, with or without formulae of prayer, deprecating or invoking, are found in countless variety in all our museums, and seem to have been borne, some on the breast, some suspended by a chala round the neck. The law of Moses, by ordering the Zizith, or blue fringe on the garments which men wore, or the papyrus scrolls with texts (Exod. xiii. 2-10, 11-17; Deut. vi. 4-9, 13-22), which were to be as frontlets on their brows, and bound upon their arms, known by later Jews as the Tephillin, or when nailed on their door posts or the walls of their houses as the Messua, sought, as by a wise "economy," to raise men who had been accustomed to such usages to higher thoughts, and to turn what had been a superstition into a witness for the truth. The old tendency, however, crept in, and it seems clear that some at least of the ornaments named by Isaiah (iii. 23), especially the ἄμυνή, were of the nature of amulets (Bib. Dict. AMULETS). And the later φλακέρηρα of the N. T., though an attempt has been made by some archaeologists to explain the name as though they reminded

ισαεν φυλάσσει τον νόμον (Schöttgen) were, there can be little doubt, so called as "preservatives" against demons, magic, and the evil eye.* Through the whole history of Rabbinism, the tendency was on the increase, and few Jews believed themselves free from evil spirits, unless the bed on which they slept was guarded by the Messua. Mystic figures—the sacred tetragrammaton, the shield of David, the seal of Solomon—with cabalistic words, AGLA (an acrostic formed from the initial letters of the Hebrew words for "Thou art mighty for everlasting, O Lord"), Abracalan, and the like, shot up as a rank after-growth. Greek, Latin, Eastern Heathenism, in like manner, supplied various forms of the same usage. Everywhere men lived in the dread of the fascination of the "evil eye." Sometimes individual men, sometimes whole races (e.g. the Tibbii of Pontus) were thought to possess the power of smiting youth and health, and causing them to waste away (Plutarch, Sympos. v. 7). And against this, men used remedies of various kinds, the Ἐπίστια γράμματα, the phallos or fascinum. The latter was believed to operate as diverting the gaze which would otherwise be fixed on that which kept it spell-bound (Plutarch, l. c.; Varr. de Ling. Lat. vi. 5), but was probably connected also with its use as the symbol of life as against the evil power that was working to destroy life. It is obvious that superstitions of this kind would be foreign to Christian life in its first purity. The "bonfire" at Ephesus was a protest against them and all like usages (Acts xix. 19). They crept in, however, probably in the first instance through the influence of Judaizing or Orientalizing Gnostics. The followers of Basilides had their mystical Abraxas and Jaldabaoth, which they wrote on parchment and used as a charm (Chr. Biogr. art. BASILIDES). Scarabæi have been found, with inscriptions (Jao, Sabaoth, the names of angels, Bellerman, Ueber die Scarabæen, i. 10), indicating Christian associations of this nature.† The entombs of Rome have yielded small objects of various kinds that were used apparently for the same purpose, a bronze fish (connected, of course, with the mystic anagram of ΙΧΘΥΣ), with the word ΣΩΖΑΙΣ on it, a hand holding a tablet with ΖΗΧΕΣ, medals with the monogram which had figured on the labarum of Constantine (Ariughi, Roma Subterranea, vi. 23; Costadoni, Del Pesce, pl. ii, iii, 19; Martigny, s. v. Poisson). In the East we find the practice of carrying the Gospels (Βιβλία or εὐαγγέλια μικρά) round the neck as φυλακτήρια (Chrysost. Hom. lxxiii. in Matt.); and Jerome (in Matt. iv. 24) confesses that he had himself done so to guard against disease. When the passion for relics set in they too were employed, and even Gregory the Great sent to Theodolinda two of these φυλακτήρια, one a cross containing a fragment of the true cross, the other a box containing a copy of the Gospels, each with Greek invocations, as a charm against the evil spirits or lamiae that beset children (Epp. xii. 7). In all these cases we trace some Christian associations. Symbolism passes into superstition. In other instances the old heathen leaven was more conspicuous. Strange words, περίεργοι χαρακτήρες (Basil. in Pa. xl. v., p. 229 A), names of rivers, and the like (Chrysost. Hom. lxxiii. in Matt.), "lygature" of all kinds (August. Tract vii. in Joann.), are spoken of as frequent. Even a child's caul (it is curious to note at once the antiquity and the persistency of the superstition), and the ἐγκόλιον ἔδωμα became an ἐγκόλιον in another sense, and was used by midwives to counteract the "evil eye" and the words of evil omen of which men were still afraid (Balsamon, in Conc. Trull. c. 61). Even the strange prohibition of "leading about she bears and other like beasts to the delusion (ἐπὶς παλγίων) and injury of the simple," has been referred by the same writer (ibid.), not to their being a show as in later times, but to the fact that those who did so carried on a trade in the φυλακτήρια, which they made from their hair, and which were in request as a cure for sore eyes.

Christian legislation and teaching had to carry on a perpetual warfare against these abuses. Constantine indeed, in the transition stage which he represented, had allowed "remedia humanis quaesita corporibus" (Cod. Theodos. ix. tit. 16, s. 3), as well as incantations for rain, but the Council of Laodicea (c. 36) forbade the clergy to make φυλακτήρια, which were in reality "δερμῆτριά for their own souls." Chrysostom frequently denounces them in all their forms, and lays bare the plea that the old women who sold them were devout Christians, and that the practice therefore could not be so very wrong (Hom. viii. in Coloss. p. 1374; Hom. vi. c. Jud.; Hom. lxiii. p. 536, in Matt. p. 722). Basil (l. c.) speaks in the same tone. Augustine (l. c. and Serm. exv. De Temp.) warns men against all such "diabolica phylacteria." Other names by which such amulets were known were περίπαιτα, περιδωμάτια. We may infer from the silence of Clement of Alexandria and Tertullian that the earlier days of the Church were comparatively free from these superstitions, and from the tone of the writers just referred to that the canon of the Council of Laodicea had been so far effectual that the clergy were no longer ministering to them. ANACLETUS, the pope, martyr at Rome, commemorated April 26 (Mart. Rom. Vet.) [C.]

ANACTORON (Ἀνακτορον from ἄνακτορ), the dwelling of a king or ruler. In classical authors, generally a house of a god, especially a temple of the Eleusian Demeter or of the Dioscuri; also, the innermost recess of a temple, in which oracles were given (Lobeck's Aglaophamus, i. pp. 59, 62). Eusebius (Præpar. c. 9) applies the word to the church built by Constantine at Antioch, whether as equivalent to βασιλική, or with reference to the unusual size and splendour of the church, or with a reminiscence of the classical use of the word, is difficult to say. (Bingham's Antiquities, viii. 1. § 5.) [C.]

ANAGNOSTES—LECTOR—READER.—Tertullian is the earliest writer who mentions this office as a distinct order in the Church (De Præscr. c. 41). It would seem that, at first, the public reading of the Scriptures was performed indifferently by presbyters and deacons, and possibly at times by a layman specially appointed by the bishop. From Tertullian's time, however, it was included among the minor orders, and as such is frequently referred to by Cyprian (Ep. 29, 38, &c.). It is also one of the three minor orders mentioned in the so-called Apostolical Canons, the other two being the σποδίκος and the ψαλτης. The Scriptures were read by the Anagnostes, from the pulpitum or tribunal ecclesiae. If any portion of the sacred writings was read from the altar, or more properly from the bema or tribunal of the sanctuary, this was done by one of the higher clergy. By one of Justinian's Novels it was directed that no one should be ordained reader before the age of eighteen; but previously young boys were admitted to the office, at the instance of their parents, as introductory to the higher functions of the sacred ministry (Biagham, Thorndike). ANAPHORA. (Ἀναφορά). The word ἀναφέρειν acquired in later Greek the sense of "lifting up" or "offering;" as ἀναφέρειν θυσίας, Heb. vii. 27; 1 Pet. ii. 5; ἀναφέρειν εὐχαριστίας, εὐρημάτων, θεολογίας, Chrysostom in Suidas, s. v. Ἀναφορά was also used in a corresponding sense; in Ps. l. 21, [LXX], it is the equivalent of the Hebrew הָרַם, "that which goeth up on the altar.")

1. In the sense of "lifting up" Anaphora came to be applied to the celebration of the Holy Eucharist; whether from the "lifting up" of the heart which is required in that service, or from the "oblation" which takes place in it; probably the latter.

In the liturgical diction of the Copts, which has borrowed much from the Greeks, the word Anaphora is used, instead of liturgy, to designate the whole of the Eucharistic service, and the book which contains it; but more commonly its use is restricted to that more solemn part of the Eucharistic office which includes the Consecration, Oblation, Communion, and Thanksgiving. It begins with the "Sursum Corda," or rather with the benediction which precedes it, and extends to the end of the office, thus corresponding with the PREFACE and CANON of Western rituals.

The general structure of the Anaphora of Oriental liturgies is thus exhibited by Dr. Neale (Eastern Church, Introduction, l. 463).

This table exhibits the component parts of the Anaphorae of all, or nearly all, the Eastern liturgies, in the state in which they have come down to us; but different parts are variously developed in different liturgies, and even the order is not always preserved; for instance, in the existing Nestorian liturgies, the general intercession is placed before the invocation of the Holy Ghost, and other minor variations are found. The principal of these will be noticed under their proper headings.

It is in the Anaphorae that the characteristics are found which distinguish different liturgies of the same family; in the introductory or pro-anaphoral portion of the liturgies there is much less variety. "In every liturgical family there is one liturgy, or at most two, which supplies the former or pro-anaphoral portion to all the others, and such liturgies we may call the normal offices of that family; the others, both in MSS. and printed editions, commence with the 'Prayer of the Kiss of Peace,' the preface to the Anaphora" (Neale, Eastern Church, i. 319). Thus, when the liturgy of Gregory Theologus or of Cyril is used, the pro-anaphoral portion is taken from that of St. Basil; the Ethiopian Church has twelve liturgies, which have the introductory portion in common; the numerous Syro-Jacobite liturgies all take the introductory portion from that of St. James; the three ἁγίων from that of the Apostles. Further particulars will be found under CANON and COMMUNION.

2. The word ἀναφορά is sometimes used in liturgical writings as equivalent to the ἄψα or Chalice-veil; and has found its way in this sense, corrupted in form (Ἀψφίρ) into the Syrian liturgies. (Renaudot, Lit. Orient. ii. 61.) [C.]

ANASTASIA. (1) Martyr under Diocletian. Her Natalis, an ancient and famous festival, falls on Dec. 25 (Mart. Rom. Vet., Hieron. Bedae). Her name is recited in the Gregorian Canon. The proper office for her festival, in the Gregorian Sacram. (p. 7), is headed, in Méhard's text, Missa in Mane prima Nat. Dom., see S. Anastasie; and is inserted between the Missa In Vigilia Domini in Nocte and the Missa In Die Natalis Domini. The titles in the other MSS. are equivalent. In the Byzantine Calendar she is commemorated as φάρμακοθήρη, dissolver of spells on Dec. 22 (see Neale's Eastern Church, Introd. 786).

ANASTASIS.—The Orthodox Greek Church commemorates the dedication of the Church of the Anastasis by Constantine the Great (Ἐγκαίνια τοῦ Ναοῦ τῆς ἁγίας τοῦ Χριστοῦ καὶ Θεοῦ ἡμῶν Ἀναστάσεως) on Sep. 13. (Daniel, Codes Liturgy, iv. 268.) This festival refers to the dedication of the Church of the Holy Sepulchre, or of the Resurrection of the Lord, at Jerusalem, A.D. 335. (Eusebius, Vita Constantini, iii. 26 ff.) A similar name was given to the room where Gregory of Nazianzus preached at Constantinople, afterwards converted into a magnificent church. (Gibbon's Rome, iii. 367, ed. Smith.) [C.]

ANATHEMA, the greater excommunication, answering to Cherem in the Synagogue, as the lesser form did to Niddai, i. e. Separation; this latter is called ἀποσιτισμός in the Constitutions of the Apostles.

The excommunication of obstinate offenders from the Christian fellowship was grounded upon the words of Christ—"If he will not hear the Church, let him be as a heathen man and a publican." So St. Gregory interprets them—"let him not be esteemed for a brother or a Christian"—"videlicet peccator gravis et scandalosus, notorius aut accusatus et convictus"; being reproved by the bishop in the public assemblies of the Church, if he will not be humbled but remains incorrigible and perseveres in his scandalous sins—"tam anathemate feriendus est et corpore Ecclesie separandus" (St. Gregory in Ps. v.), and St. Augustine (Tract xvii. in Johan.) vindicates this severity of discipline on the Church's part in such a case—"quia neque inflexum habet a capite, neque participat de Spiritu Christi."

This application of the word Anathema to the "greater excommunication" was warranted, in the belief of the ancient Church, by St. Paul's use of it (Gal. i. 8, 9), and the discipline itself being distinctly warranted by our Lord's words, as well as by other passages in the New Testament, the anathema was regarded as cutting a man off from the way of salvation; so that unless he received the grace of repentance he would certainly perish.

A milder sense, however, of the word Anathema, as used by St. Paul, has not been without its defenders, both among our own Divines as Hammond and Waterland, and by Grotius. The latter writer, commenting on Rom. ix. 3, gives the following interpretation: "Hoc dicit: Velim non modo carere honore Apostolatus, verum etiam contemptissimus esse inter Christianos, quales sunt qui excommunicati sunt."

And as to the effect of the Ecclesiastical Anathema—it is maintained by Vincentius Lirinensis that it did not bear the sense of cursing among the ancient Christians, as Cherem did among the Jews.

It is certain, however, that the word Anathema is uniformly employed by the LXX as the equivalent of Cherem; and it can hardly be questioned, therefore, that where it occurs in the N. T. it must be understood in the deeper sense—as relating to the spiritual condition—

and not merely to exclusion from Church privileges, whatever may have been the force subsequently attached to the word, as expressing the most solemn form of ecclesiastical excommunication. On this point and on the history of the word in general, the reader is referred to Lightfoot on Galatians; Thordike, vol. ii. 338; Bp. Jeremy Taylor (Ductor Luitantium); J. Lightfoot, De Anathemate Maranatha. [D. B.]

ANCHOR (AS SYMBOL). The anchor is an emblem very frequently used, from the earliest ages of Christianity, in symbolism. As the anchor is the hope and often the sole resource of the sailor, the ancients called it saeculi; to weigh anchor was, "Anchoram saeculi solvere." St. Paul adopts an obvious symbolism, when he says (Heb. vi. 19) that we have hope as "an anchor of the soul both sure and steadfast," so that, in its special Christian sense, the anchor would seem to be an emblem of hope.

By the early Christians we find it used, sometimes with reference to the stormy ocean of human life, but more often to the tempests and the fierce blasts of persecution which threatened to engulf the ship of the Church. Thus the anchor is one of the most ancient of emblems; and we find it engraved on rings, and depicted on monuments and on the walls of cemeteries in the Catacombs, as a type of the hope by which the Church stood firm in the midst of the storms which surrounded it. In this, as in other cases, Christianity adopted a symbol from Paganism, with merely the change of application.

The symbols on sepulchral tablets often contain allusions to the name of the deceased. The Chevalier de Rossi (De Monum. IXOTN exhib. p. 18) states that he has three times found an anchor upon tituli bearing names derived from Spes or Ἐλπίς; upon the tablet of a certain ELPIDIVS (Mai, Collect. Vatican., v. 449), and upon two others, hitherto unpublished, in the cemetery of Priscilla, of two women, ELPIDVSA and SPES. In some cases, above the transverse bar of the anchor stands the letter E, which is probably the abbreviation of the letter Ἐλπίς. Further, we find the anchor associated with the fish, the symbol of the Saviour [ΙΧΘΥΣ]. It is clear that the union of the two symbols expresses "hope in Jesus Christ," and is equivalent to the formula so common on Christian tablets, "Spes in Christo," "Spes in Deo," "Spes in Deo Christo."

The transverse bar below the ring gives the upper part of the anchor the appearance of a crux ansata [Cross], and perhaps this form may have had as much influence in determining the choice of this symbol by the Christians as the words of St. Paul. The anchor appears, as is natural, very frequently upon the tombs of martyrs. (See Lupi, Sæcæne Epitaphium, pp. 131, 137; Boldetti, Osservazioni, 360, 370, &c.; Fabretti, Inscrip-

ANCYRA.—Two synods of Ancyra are recorded, the first of which stands at the head of those provincial synods whose canons form part of the code of the universal Church. It was held under Vitalis of Antioch, who signs first; and of the 18 bishops composing it, several attended the Nicene Council subsequently. Twenty-five canons were passed, about half of which relate to the lapsed, and the rest to discipline generally (v. Beveridge, Synod. ii. ad l.). The date usually assigned to it is A.D. 314. Another synod met there, A.D. 358, composed of semi-Arians. They condemned the second Synod of Sirmium, accepted the term homoiousion, and published 12 anathemas against all who rejected it, together with a long synodical letter. Another synod of semi-Arians was held there, A.D. 375, at which Hipsius, Bishop of Parnassus, was deposed. [E. S. F.]

ANCYRA, THE SEVEN VIRGINS OF, are commemorated by the Armenian Church on June 20, as fellow-martyrs with Theodotus, or Theodorus, of Salatia, the first Bishop of Ancyra of whom we have any account. (Neale, Eastern Church, Introd. p. 800.) [C.]

ANDREW, SAINT, FESTIVAL OF.—As was natural, the name of the "brother fisherman" of St. Peter was early held in great honour. He is invoked by name as an intercessor in the prayer "Libera nos" of the Roman Canon, with the Virgin, St. Peter, and St. Paul; and his principal festival was anciently placed on the same level as that of St. Peter himself (Krazer, De Liturgia, p. 529). His "Dies Natalis," or martyrdom, is placed in all the Martyrologies, agreeing in this with the apocryphal Acta Andree, on Nov. 30. It is found in the Calendar of Carthage, in which no other apostles are specially commemorated except St. Peter, St. Paul, and St. James the Great; and in St. Boniface's list of Festivals, where no other apostles are named except St. Peter and St. Paul (Binterim's Denkwürdigkeiten, v. i. 299). The hymn "Nunc Andree solemnia," for the festival of St. Andrew, is attributed to Venerable Bede. Proper offices for the Vigil and Festival of St. Andrew are found in the Sacramentaries of Leo and Gregory. In the latter (p. 144) there is a clear allusion to the Acta (see Tischenorff's Acta Apost. Apocrypha, p. 127), where it is said that the saint frankly proclaimed the truth, "nec pendens taceret in cruce;" and in the ancient Liber Responsalis, which bears the name of Gregory, is one equally clear to the same Acta in the words of St. Andrew's prayer, "Ne me patiaris ab impio iudice deponi, quia virtutem sanctae crucis agnovi" (p. 838). A trace of the influence of these same Acta is found again in the Gallo-Gothic Missal (probably of the 8th century), published by Mabillon, in which the "contestatio," or preface (Liturgia Gall. lib. lii. p. 222), sets forth that the Apostle, "post iniqua verbera, post carceris sœpta, alligatus suspendo se purum sacrificium obtulit. . . Absolve se non patitur a cruce . . . turba . . . laxari postulat iustum, ne percat populus hoc delicto; interea fundit martyri spiritum." The Armenian Church commemorates St. Andrew with St. Philip on Nov. 16.

The relics of the apostle were translated, probably in the reign of Constantius, though some authorities place the translation in that of Constantine (compare Jerome, c. Vigilantium, c. 6, p. 391, who says that Constantius translated the relics, with Paulinus, Carm. 26, p. 628), to Constantine's great "Church of the Apostles" at Constantinople, where they rested with those of St. Luke; the church was indeed sometimes called, from these two great saints, the church of St. Andrew and St. Luke. Justinian built over their remains, to which those of St. Timothy had been added, a splendid tomb.

The Martyrologium Hieronymi places the translation of St. Andrew on Sept. 3, and has a "Dedicatio Basilicæ S. Andree" on Nov. 3; but most Martyrologies agree with the Martyrologium Romanum in placing the translation on May 9. Several Martyrologies have on Feb. 5 an "Ordinatio Episcopatus Andree Apostoli," in commemoration of the saint's consecration to the see of Patras (Florentinus, in Martyrol. Hieron. p. 300; Baronius, in Martyrol. Romano, Nov. 30, p. 502; Tillmont, Mem. Eccles. i. 320, 589; Binterim's Denkwürdigkeiten, v. i. 503, ff.).

As was natural in the case of so distinguished a saint as the first-called Apostle, churches were dedicated in honour of St. Andrew in early times. Pope Simplicius (c. 470) is said to have dedicated a basilica at Rome in his honour (Ciampini, Ict. Monum. i. 242); and somewhat later (c. 500) Pope Symmachus converted the "Vestiarium Neronis" into a church, which bore the name "S. Andree ad Crucem." This was not far from the Vatican (Ciampini, De Sacris Aedif. p. 80). Later examples are frequent.

The representation of St. Andrew with the decussate cross (X) as the instrument of his martyrdom belongs to the Middle Ages. In ancient examples he appears, like most of the other apostles, simply as a dignified figure in the ancient Roman dress, sometimes bearing a crown, as in a 5th-century Mosaic in the church of St. John at Ravenna (Ciampini, Fœdera Monumenta, tom. i. tab. lxx. p. 235), sometimes a roll of a book, as in a 9th-century Mosaic figured by Ciampini (u. a. tom. ii. tab. iii. p. 162), where he is joined with the favoured disciples, SS. Peter, and James, and John. [C.]

ANGARIENSE CONCILIIUM. [SANGARIENSE CONCILIIUM.]

ANGELS and ARCHANGELS, in CHRISTIAN ART. The representations of angels in Christian art, at various periods, reproduce in a remarkable manner the ideas concerning them, which from time to time have prevailed in the Church. In one and all, however, we may trace, though with various modifications of treatment, an embodied commentary upon the brief but expressive declaration concerning their nature and office which is given in the Epistle to the Hebrews (I. 14). Worship of service rendered unto God (Λειτουργία),^a and work of mislustration (διακοιλία) done on God's behalf to man, these are the two spheres of angelic operation suggested in Holy Scripture, and these, under various modifications^b curiously characteristic of the successive ages in which they are found, come before us in a series of monuments extending from the fourth to the close of the 14th century.

§ 2. First three Centuries. Existing monuments of early Christian art, illustrative of our present subject, are, for the first 500 years, or more, almost exclusively of the West, and, with one or two doubtful exceptions, all these are of a date subsequent to the "Peace of the Church," under Constantine the Great, and probably, not earlier than 400 A.D. As a special interest attaches to these earliest monuments, it may be well here to enumerate them. The earliest of them all, if D'Agincourt's judgment (Histoire, etc. vol. v. Peinture, Pl. vii. No. 3.) may be trusted, is a monument in the cemetery of St. Priscilla,^c

^b Absent (almost, if not altogether) for the first four centuries (see § 2), they assume purposes of dogma (§ 3) in the 5th century; they are Scriptural still, but also in one case legendary (§ 4) in the 6th. From that time forward canonical and apocryphal Scripture and mediæval legend are mixed up together. We find them imperial in character, or sacerdotal and liturgical, as the case may be; while in the later middle ages even feudal notions were characteristically mixed up with the traditions concerning them derived from Holy Scripture. (For this last see Jameson, Sacred and Legendary Art, 3rd edit. vol. i. p. 85, quoting from Il Trovato Leggendario.)

^c The Abbé Martigny (Dictionnaire, &c. in voc. 'Anges') speaks with evident doubt of the date assigned to this fresco. D'Agincourt himself in his description gives no particulars as to the source from which his drawing was derived. Neither earlier nor later antiquaries know anything of its history. And this being so, an unsupported opinion as to its date, resting on the authority of D'Agin-

court alone, carries but little weight. The same subject is reproduced in the Cemetery of SS. Petrus and Saturninus (Verret, vol. lit. pl. xxvi.).
^a The 37th canon forbids the painting upon walls the objects of religious worship and adoration. "Piscit pisci in ecclesia esse non debere, ne quod colitur et adoratur in parietibus depingatur." Roman writers, for obvious reasons, seek to explain away the apparent meaning of this prohibition. As to this, see Bingham, G. A., book viii. cap. viii. § 6.
^b Paulinus, bishop of Nola, early in the 5th century, describes at much length in a letter (Ep. xii.) to his friend Severus the decorations with which he had adorned his own church. His descriptions accord closely with some of the actual monuments (sarcophagi and mosaic pictures) of nearly contemporary date, which have been preserved to our own time.
^c The form of the Nimbus here assigned to our Lord seems to indicate a later date.
^d By the "triumphal arch" of a Roman church is meant what will correspond most nearly with the chancel arch of our own churches. It was full in view of the assembled people on entering the church. And for the first six centuries (or nearly that time) it was reserved exclusively for such subjects as had immediate reference to our Lord; more particularly to His triumph over sin and death, and His session as King in heaven. See farther on this subject Clampini, V. M. tom. i. p. 198, 200.

dating, as he thinks, from the second century. It is a representation of Tobias and the angel. (This same subject, suggestive of the "Guardian Angel," reappears in some of the Vetri Antichi, of the 4th and 5th century.) Another fresco of early but uncertain date in the cemetery of St. Priscilla (Airinghi, R. S. ii. p. 297) has been generally interpreted as representing the Annunciation. The angel Gabriel (if such be the intention of the painter) has a human figure, and the cross commonly assigned to Apostles and other Scriptural personages, but is without wings, or any other special designations. With these doubtful exceptions, no representations of angels, now remaining, are earlier than the fourth century, and probably not earlier than the fifth.
§ 3. Fourth and fifth Centuries. There was an interval of transition from this earlier period, the limits of which are indicated by the Council of Hliberis,^d A.D. 305, on the one hand, and on the other by the Christian mosaics of which we first hear at the close of that century, or early in the next. The first representation of angels in mosaic work is supposed (by Ciampinus and others) to be that of the Church of S. Agatha at Ravenna. These mosaics Ciampinus admits to be of very uncertain date, but he believes them to be of the beginning of the 5th century. (See his Vetera Monumenta, vol. i. Tab. xvi.) The first representations of the kind to which a date can with any certainty be assigned, are those in the Church of S. Maria Major at Rome, put up by Xystus III. between the years 432 and 440 A.D. In those of the Nave of this Church (Ciampini V. M. tom. i. Pl. I. to lixiv.) various subjects from the Old Testament have their place; and amongst others the appearance of the three angels to Abraham (Pl. II.) and of the "Captain of the Lord's Hosts" (by tradition the archangel Michael) to Joshua (Pl. lxii.). But on the "Arcus Triumphalis" of this same Church, there is a series of mosaics, of the greatest possible interest to the history of dogmatic theology; and in these angels have a prominent part. This series was evidently intended to be an embodiment in art of the doctrine decreed just previously in the Council of Ephesus, A.D. 431. The angels represented in the scenes of "The Annunciation," the Worship of the Magi (see woodcut annexed), and the Presentation in the Temple, are here made to serve to the declaration of what had just before been proclaimed, viz.: that He who was born of Mary was not a mere man in whom the Word of God might afterward take up his abode,¹ but was himself God, as well as man, two natures united in one person. The angels throughout are represented as ministering as it were in homage to a king. Even in the Annunciation, not Gabriel only is represented, but two other angels are seen standing behind the seat on which the Virgin Mary is placed. Of these Clampusius rightly says, that they are to be regarded as doing homage to the Word then become incarnate. "Dun illi . . . nstant, sive Gabrielis associate, sine Deiparæ custodes, aut potius incarnate tunc Verbo obsequium exhibentes." They embody, as he observes, the thought expressed by St. Augustine. "All angels are created beings, doing service unto Christ. Angels could be sent to do Him homage, (ad obsequium) could be sent to do Him service, but not to bring help (as to one weak or helpless in himself); and so it is written that angels ministered to Him, not as pitying one that needed help, but as subject unto Him who is Almighty." (St. Aug. in Psal. lvi.)

§ 4. Sixth Century. Between 500 A.D. and 600 A.D., the following examples may be cited: the triumphal arch of the Church of SS. Cosmas and Damianus at Rome (Ciampini V. M. tom. ii. Tab. xv.) ere. 530 A.D., and fifteen years later the mosaics of S. Michael the archangel at Ravenna, ibid. Tab. xvii.). In the apex of the tribune is a representation of Our Lord, holding a lofty cross, with Michael r. and Gabriel (sic) l. On the wall above, the two archangels are again seen on either side of a throne, and of one seated thereon. These two bear long rods or staves, but on either side are seven other angels (four r. and three l.) playing upon trumpets. There is here an evident allusion to Rev. viii. 2, 6, "I saw the seven angels, which stand before God, and to them were given seven trumpets." Comp. Ezek. x. 10, Tobit xii. 15, and Rev. i. 4; iv. 5. (Ciampini V. M. ii, xvii., comp. Tab. xix.) Michael and Gabriel appear yet again on the arch of the Tribune of S. Apollinaris in Classe (ibid. Tab. xxiv.); and there are representations of the four archangels, as present at the Worship of the Magi, in the S. Apollinaris Novus (ibid. Tab. xxvii.) towards the close of that century. To this period also is to be assigned the diptych of Milan,² which is remarkable as containing an embodiment (probably the first in Christian art) of legends concerning the appearance of Gabriel to the Virgin Mary, derived from the Apocryphal Gospels.

§ 5. From 600 to 800 A.D. Art monuments of this period are but few in number. For examples, bearing upon our present subject, see Ciampini V. M. vol. ii. Tab. xxxi. and xxxviii. and D'Agincourt's Peinture, tom. v. Pl. xvi. and xvii. They contain nothing to call for special remark, save that, in the 8th century particularly, the wings of angels become more and more curtailed in proportion to the body; a peculiarity which may serve as an indication of date where others are wanting. One such example in sculpture, of Michael and the Dragon, is referred to below, § 10.

§ 6. Eastern and Greek Representations. Early monuments of Christian art in the East are unfortunately, very rare, the seal of the Iconoclasts, and at a later period of Saracens and Turks, having been fatal to many, which might otherwise have been preserved. The earliest example in Greek art is a representation of an angel in a MS. of Genesis in the Imperial Library at Vienna, believed to be of the 11th or 5th century. It is figured by Seroux D'Agincourt, Peinture, Pl. xix. It is a human figure, winged, and without nimbus or other special attributes. The fiery sword, etc., spoken of in Gen. iii. is there represented not as a sword, in the hand of the angel, but as a great wheel^h of fire beside him. Next in date to this is an interesting picture of the Ascension, in a Syriac MS. of the Gospel, written and illuminated in the year 586 A.D. at Zagba in Mesopotamia. We have engraved this, as embodying those Oriental types of the angel form which have been characteristic of Eastern and Greek art from that time to this. It will be seen that the Saviour is here represented in glory. And the various angelic powers appear in three different capacities. Beneath the feet of the Saviour, and forming as it were a chariot upon which He rises to Heaven, is what the Greeks call the Tetramorphon. The head and the hand of a man (or rather, according to Greek tradition, of an angel), the heads of an eagle, a lion, and an ox, are united by wings that are full of eyes (comp. Ezekiel i. 18). On either side of these again are two pairs of fiery wheels, "wheel within wheel," as suggested again by the description in Ezek. i. 16. These serve as symbolic representations of the order of angels known as "thrones" (comp. § 7 below), and of the cherubim. Of the six other angels, here represented in human form, and winged, four are ministering to Our Lord (Λειτουργοὶ), either by active service, as the two who bear Him up in their hands, or by adoration, as two others who are offering Him crowns of victory (στίβανοι). Two others, lastly, have been sent on work of ministry to men (comp. note ^a above), and are seen, as St. Luke's narrative suggests, asking of the eleven disciples, "Why stand ye here gazing up into heaven?" and the rest. (The central figure of the lower group is that of the Virgin Mary.)

§ 7. The Celestial Hierarchy of Dionysius. The best comment on the picture last described is to be found in the 'Celestial Hierarchy' of Dionysius. The whole number of celestial beings are to be divided (so he tells us), into three orders, in each of which a triple gradation is contained. In the first order are contained the "thrones," the seraphim and cherubim. And these are continually in the immediate presence of God, nearer than all others to Him, reflecting, without intervention of any other created being, the direct effulgence of His glory. Next to these, and of the second order, are dominions, authorities, powers (κυριότητες, εξουσίας, δυνάμεις), forming a link between the first and the third order. To these last (principalities [ἀρχαί], archangels and angels) he assigns that more immediate execution of the divine purposes in the sphere of creation, and towards mankind, which is the belief of religious minds is generally associated with the idea of angelic agency.

This teaching of Dionysius, regarded as it was both in East and West as of all but apostolic authority, has served as a foundation upon which all the later traditions have been built up. And this language, with the additional comments quoted in the next section, will give the reader the key to much that would be otherwise obscure in the allusions of Greek fathers, and in the forms of Greek art.

§ 8. Angels in later Greek Art. The language of the Ἐπιπέλα τῆς Ὑγραφικῆς,^o or 'Painter's Guide' of Panselinos, a monk of Mount Athos in the 11th century, may be regarded [see under APOSTLES] as embodying the unchanging rules of Greek religious art from the 8th century to the present time. Taking up the division quoted above, the writer says, as to the first order, that "the thrones are represented as wheels of fire, compassed about with wings. Their wings are full of eyes, and the whole is so arranged as to produce the semblance of a royal throne. The cherubim are represented by a head and two wings. The seraphim as having six wings, whereof two rise upward to the head, and two droop to the feet, and two are outspread as if for flight. They carry in either hand a hexapteryx,^p inscribed with the words 'Holy, Holy, Holy.' It is thus that they were seen by Isaiah." Then, after describing the "Tetramorphi," he proceeds to speak of angels of the second order.^q These are dominions, virtues, powers. "These," he says, "are clothed in white tunics reaching to the feet, with golden girdles and green outer robes.^r They hold in the right hand staves of gold, and in the left a seal formed thus ⊗."⁷¹ Then, of the third order, (principalities, archangels, angels), he writes thus. "These are represented vested as warriors, and with golden girdles. They hold in their hands javelins and axes; the javelins are tipped with iron, as lances."

§ 9. Attributes of Angels. There are two sources from which we may infer the attributes regarded as proper to angels in early times; the description given of them in the treatise of Dionysius already quoted, and the actual monuments of early date which have been preserved to our times. As to these Dionysius writes that angels are represented as of human form in regard of the intellectual qualities of man, and of his heavenward gaze, and the impassive and dominant which are naturally his. He adds that bright vesture, and that which is of the colour of fire, are symbolical of light and of the divine likeness, while sacerdotal vesture serves to denote their office in leading to divine and mystical contemplations, and the consecration of their whole life unto God. He mentions, also, girdles, staves or rods (significant of royal or princely power), spears and axes, instruments for measurement or of constructive art (τὰ γεωμετρικὰ καὶ τεκτονικὰ σκεῦη), among the insignia occasionally attributed to angels. If, from the pages of Dionysius, we turn to actual monuments, we find the exact counterpart of his descriptions. They may be enumerated as follows:—1. The human form. In all the earlier monuments (enumerated above, §§ 3, 4), angels are represented as men, and either with or without wings. In this Christian art did but follow the suggestions of Holy Scripture. But St. Chrysostom expresses what was the prevailing (but not the universal) opinion of early Christian writers, when he says (De Sacerd. lib. vi. p. 424 D) that although angels, and even God Himself, have oftentimes appeared in the form of man, yet what was then manifested was not actual flesh, but a semblance assumed in condescension to the weakness of mankind^a (οὐ σαρκὸς ἀλθθία ἀλλὰ σγκατάβασις). Both in ancient and in modern art examples are occasionally found of angels thus represented as men, without any of the special attributes enumerated below. 2. Wings. As heavenly messengers ascending and descending between heaven and earth, angels have, with a natural propriety^b as well as on Scriptural

But we suspect that in the original he found στολαί, a word which Greek writers never use in the technical sense of "stoles" (the ecclesiastical vestment known as stola in the West since the 8th century).

^a This is what was known in mediæval times as the "Signaculum Dei," or Seal of God. Such a seal is represented in the hand of Lucifer before his fall, in the Jortus Delictarum, a MS. once in the Library of Strasbourg.

^b With this agrees the language of Tertullian, De Insuperatione Carnis, cap. xlvi. "Angeli aliquid tanquam homines merunt, edendo et bibendo, et pedes lavacro porrigendo, humanam enim indumentum superficiem, salva intus substantia propria. Igitur si angeli, facti tanquam homines, in eadem substantia spiritus permunerantur," &c. Similar language reappears in other Latin Fathers.

^c Comp. Philo, Quæst. in Exod. xxv. 20, αὐ τοῦ θεοῦ πάσαι δυνάμεις πτεροφόροι τῆς αἰῶνός τῶν Πατέρα θεοῦ γλιχόμεναι τε καὶ ἐπίβουλοι. And very beautifully elsewhere he speaks of the angels as going up and down between heaven and earth, and conveying (διαγγέλλ-

authority," been represented in all ages of the church as furnished with wings. We may add that this mode of expressing the idea of ubiquity and power, as superhuman attributes, had prevailed in heathen art from the earliest times, and that in East and West alike. Example of this in Assyrian art are now familiar to us. Similar figures are found in Egypt. They were less common in classical art. Yet Mercury, as the messenger of the gods, had wings upon his feet; and little winged genii were commonly represented in decorative work, and thence were transferred (probably as mere decorations) into early Christian works of art. As to the number of these wings, two only are to be found in all the earlier representations. We do not know of any example of four, or of six wings, earlier than the 9th century, though the descriptions given in Holy Scripture of the "Living Creatures," with six wings, and the four-winged deities of primitive Eastern art, might naturally have suggested such representations. As to later representations of cherubim and seraphim, and the like, see below, section 14. 3. Vesture. The vesture assigned to angels, in various ages of the Church, has ever been such as was associated in men's minds with the ideas of religious solemnity, and in the later centuries, of sacerdotal ministry. In Holy Scripture the vesture of angels is described as white (Matt. xxviii. 3; John xx. 12; Rev. iv. 4; xv. 6), and in mosaics of the 5th and 6th centuries, at Rome and Ravenna (where first we can determine questions of colour with any accuracy), we find white vestments generally assigned to them (long tunic and pallium), exactly resembling those of apostles. But in mosaics, believed to be of the 7th century (St. Sophia at Thessalonica)* angels have coloured himatia (outer robes) over the long white tunic, and their wings, too, are coloured, red and blue being the prevailing tints. And these two colours had, long ere that time, been recognised as invested with a special significance, red as the colour of flame, and symbolical of holy love (caritas), blue as significant of heaven, and of heavenly contemplation or divine knowledge. And in the later traditions of Christian art (from the 9th century onwards)† these two colours were as a general rule assigned, red more especially to the seraphim as the spirits of love, and blue to the cherubim as spirits of knowledge or of contemplation; while the two colours combined, as they often are found, are regarded as Λουρα) the biddings of the Father to His children, and the wants of the children to their Father.

* See the passages in Exodus, Isaiah, and Ezekiel already referred to; and compare the expression in Rev. xiv. 6, of an angel flying (φερόμενος) there.

† For examples see Aringhi, Roma Subterranea, tom. i. pp. 323, 615; tom. ii. p. 167. Compare p. 29, where smaller figures, without wings, are introduced in an ornamental design.

‡ See Ciampini, V. M. li. pp. 58 and 64. He speaks of "tunicæ" and "pallia" as being white; and of "stoles" (really stripes on the tunic), and wings of violet.

§ Vexier and Pailan, Hyzantine Architecture, pl. xi. Compare the curious picture of the Holy Family, a bishop (or other ecclesiastic), and two angels, from Urgut, figured in plate v., where the robes of the angels are white, their wings blue and reddish yellow.

¶ "The distinction of hue in the red and blue angels was first wholly omitted towards the end of the 15th century" (Mrs. Jameson, Sacred and Legendary Art).

ANGELS AND ARCHANGELS 87

suggesting the union of the two qualities of love and knowledge, the perfection of the angelic nature. It should be added that the vestments of angels have not unfrequently such ornament appended to them as was of ordinary usage from time to time in ecclesiastical dress, viz., coloured stripes on the tunic, in the earlier centuries, afterwards orarion or stoles, and even "omophoria," the distinctive insignia of episcopal office in the already noticed, § 6, and in one or two early representations in the catacombs at Rome, angels are represented without the Nimbus. But from the middle of the 5th century onward, this ornament is almost invariably assigned to them. [NIMBUS.] 5. The Wand of Power. Only in exceptional instances during the first eight centuries, are angels represented as bearing anything in the hand. Three examples may be cited, in which angels attendant on our Lord (see § 3) hold wands in their hands, which may either represent the rod of divine power, or, as some have thought, the "golden reed"—the "measuring reed," assigned to the angel in Rev. xxi. 15, as in Ezek. xl. 3. The representations of archangels, particularly of Michael, as warriors with sword, or spear, and girdle, are of later date. 6. Instruments of Music. One early example has been already referred to (§ 4) of a Ravenna mosaic, in which the "Seven Angels" are represented holding trumpets in their hands. In the later traditions of Christian art, representations of angels as the "Choristers of Heaven" have been far more common, various instruments of music being assigned to them.

§ 10. Michael.—The archangel Michael is first designated by name in mosaics of the 5th century, at Ravenna (Ciampini, vol. ii. pl. xvii. and xxiv.). And in other cases where we see two angels specially marked out as in attendance on our Lord, we may infer that Michael and Gabriel are designated. For the names of these two alone are prominent in Holy Scripture. And according to a very ancient tradition, traced back to Rabbinical belief, perpetuated as many such traditions were in the East, and thence handed on to Western Christendom, these two archangels personified respectively the judgment

• In the church dedicated in the name of the archangel Michael at Ravenna, in the year 845, an indication of special honour is given to him by the small cross upon his wand, which is wanting in that of Gabriel (Ciamp. V. M. li. tab. xvii.).

• In yet other traditions the mercy of God, and more particularly His healing grace, is ministered by Raphael. There is great variety in the older Jewish traditions. According to one (Joma, p. 37, quoted by Eilmer in Herzog's Encycl.), when the three angels appeared to Abraham, Michael, as first in rank, occupied the central place, having Gabriel, as second, on his right hand, and Raphael, as third in rank, on his left. This place on the right hand of God is elsewhere assigned to Gabriel, as i. 8, and to Raphael that on the left (near the heart), as in Gen. iii. 24). And again in Philo (Quest. in Gen. iii. 24), the two cherubim on either side of the mercy-seat represent respectively the messengers of the Wrath, and of the Mercy, of the Lord (comp. E. cod. xxix. 5-7).

and the mercy of God, and were therefore fitly placed, Michael, as the angel of power, on the right hand, Gabriel, nearer to the heart, on the left hand. For the special traditions concerning "St. Michael," his appearances in vision at Mount Gargano in Apulia, to St. Gregory the Great on the mole of Hadrian, now the castle of St. Angelo, and to Aubert, Bishop of Avranches in 700, A.D., at "Mount St. Michel" in Normandy (to this our own St. Michael's Mount owes its designation), see Jameson's Sacred and Legendary Art, pp. 94 sqq. The oldest example in sculpture of St. Michael treading under foot the dragon (see Rev. xii. 7, 8), is on the porch of the Cathedral of Catania, believed to be of the 7th century. [Figured above.] Later pictures often represent St. Michael as the angel of judgment, holding scales in his hand, in which souls are weighed.

§ 11. Gabriel (Heb. "Man of God,") as the messenger more especially of comfort and of good tidings, occupies a prominent place in the New Testament, as announcing the birth both of John the Baptist to Zacharias and of our Lord to the Virgin Mary. (In apocryphal legend he is represented as foretelling to Joachim the birth of the Virgin Mary.) In the language of Tasso he is "l'Angelo Annunziatore." Though only twice (as far as I have observed) designated by name in early Christian Art (Clampini, V. M. ii., Tab. xvii. and xxiv.), yet in the various pictures of the Annunciation, which are many, it is he, of course, who is to be understood. By a singular fate, having been regarded by Mahomet as his immediate inspirer, he is looked upon in many parts of the East as the great protecting angel of Islamism, and, as such, in direct opposition to Michael the protector of Jews and Christians.

§ 12. Raphael (Heb. the Healer who is from God, or "Divine Healer") is mentioned in the book of Tobit as "one of the seven holy angels which go in and out before the glory of the Holy One," chap. xii. 15. Through the influence of this beautiful Hebrew story of Tobias and Raphael, his name became associated in early times with the idea of the guardian angel. As such he is twice figured in the Roman catacombs, and allusions to the same story are frequent in the Vetri Antichi. [GLASS, CHRISTIAN.] In mediæval Greek art the three archangels, nobody named are sometimes represented together, designated by their initial letters M, G, and P, Michael as a warrior, Gabriel as a prince, and Raphael as a priest—the three supporting beside them a youthful figure of our Lord, himself represented with wings as the "angelus" or messenger of the will of God. (Figured in Jameson's S. L. A., p. 93.)

§ 13. Uriel (The Fire of God.) The fourth archangel, named Uriel in Ezra ii. 4, has been much less prominent in legend and in art than the three already named.* He is regarded as charged more particularly with the interpretation of God's will, of judgments and prophecies (with reference, doubtless, to Ezra ii.). These "archangels" of Christian tradition are to the Jews the first four of those "Seven Angels" who see the glory of God (Tobias xxii. 15); the other three being Chamuel (he who sees God), Jophiel (the beauty of God), and Zulkriel (the righteousness of God). But these last three names have never been generally recognised either in East or West. And in the first example of the representation of these Seven Angels in Christian art they are distinguished from the two archangels Michael and Gabriel, who hold wands, while to the seven, as already noticed, § 4, trumpets are assigned. (Clampini, V. M. ii., pl. xvii.)

§ 14. Seraphim and Cherubim. These two names appear, the first in Isaiah vi. 2 (there only), and the latter in Exodus xxv. 18, where two are spoken of, and in Ezekiel i. 4-14, who speaks of four (compare the four "living creatures" of Rev. iv. 6). They have been perpetuated in

Seraphim and Cherubim

Christian usage, and the descriptions given of them in Holy Scripture have been embodied (those of the cherubim or four "living creatures," first, and somewhat later those of the seraphim) in Christian art from the 5th century onwards. They were regarded (see above § 9) as the spirits of love and of knowledge respectively. For fuller details concerning the two in Holy Scripture see of its foreseen corruption. 3. Of the messengers sent from the several churches to St. John. It hardly falls within the scope of this article to discuss these interpretations. To unprejudiced readers it will probably be enough to state them, to make their weakness manifest. It is difficult to account for them, except as the suggestions of a foregone conclusion.

On the other hand, as St. John is believed on other grounds to have been pre-eminently the organiser of Episcopacy throughout the Church, so here in this wonderful vision the holy Apostle comes before us, it would seem, very remarkably in this special character; and in the message which he delivers, under divine direction, to each of the seven churches through its angel, we recognize a most important confirmation of the evidence on which we claim for episcopal government, the precedent, sanction, and authority of the apostolic age. ANNATES: lit. the revenues or profits of one year, and therefore synonymous with first-fruits so far; but being, in their strict and technical sense, a development of the Middle Ages, the only explanation that can be given of them here is how they arose. Anciently, the entire revenues of each diocese were placed in the hands of its bishop, as Bingham shews (v. 6. 1-3), who with the advice and consent of his senate of presbyters distributed, and in the Western Church usually divided them into 4 parts. One part went to himself; a 2nd to his clergy; a 3rd to the poor; a 4th to the maintenance of the fabric and requirements of the diocesan churches. Of these the 3rd and 4th were claimants, so to speak, that never died; but in the case of the two former, when offices became vacant by death or removal, what was to be done with the stipend attaching to them, till they were filled up? Naturally, when endowments became fixed and considerable, and promotions, from not having been allowed at all, the rule, large sums constantly fell to the disposal of some one in this way; of the bishop, when any of his clergy died or were removed; and of whom, when the bishop died or was removed, by deposition or by translation, as time went on, but of the metropolitan or primate at last, though, perhaps, at first of the presbytery? And then came the temptation to keep bishoprics vacant, and appropriate "the annates," or else require them from the bishop elect in return for consecrating him. It was but a step further in the same direction for Rome to lay claim to what primates and archbishops had enjoyed so long, when the appointment of both, so far as the Church was concerned, became vested in Rome. But, on the other hand, it is equally certain, that had the primitive rule, founded as it was in strict justice, been maintained intact, each parish, or at least each diocese, would have preserved its own emoluments, or, which comes to the same thing, would have seen them applied to its own spiritual exigencies in all cases. The 34th Apostolical canon, the 15th of Ancyra, and the 25th of Antioch, alike testify to the old rule of the Church, and to what abuses it succumbed. Still, De Marca seems hardly justified in ascribing the origin of annates to direct simony (De Concord. Sac. et Imp. vi. 10). [E. S. F.]

ANNÉ (Ἄννα, ἡ Πῆ). Mother of the Virgin Mary. July 25 is observed by the Orthodox Greek Church as the commemoration of the "Dormitio S. Annæ," a Festival with abstinence from labour (ἀργία). The same day is said to have been anciently dedicated to S. Anne in the West also, and the feast was probably transferred in the Roman Calendar to the 26th (the day on which it is at present held) from a desire to give greater prominence to S. Anne than was possible on S. James's Day. In the Greek Calendar, also, Joachim and Anna, "Θεοπατρὲς," have a festival on Sep. 9, the day following the Nativity of the Virgin Mary. Both the Armenian and the Greek Calendars have on Dec. 9 a "Festival of the Conception of the Virgin Mary," or (as it is called in the latter) Ἡ σύλληψις τῆς ἁγίας καὶ θεοστρατηγῆρος Ἄννης, i. e. S. Anne's Conception of the Virgin, καὶ γὰρ αὐτὴ ἀπεκίνησε τὴν ὑπὲρ λόγον τὸν λόγον κησαρᾶν. In the Ethiopic, "Joachim, nvsus Christi," has April 7; and on July 20 is commemorated the "Ingressus Annæ Matris Mariæ in Templum" or "Purificatio Annæ." (Daniel's Codex Liturgicus, tom. iv.; Alt's Kirchenjahr.) There is no evidence of any public recognition of S. Anne as a patron saint until about the beginning of the 6th century, when Justinian I. had a temple built in her honour, which is described by Procopius (De Aedific. Justin. ch. iii.) as ἱεροσκευές τε καὶ ἀγαστὸν ἕλωσ ἕδος Ἄννης ἁγίας, "whom," he adds, "some believe to be μητέρα Θεοτόκου and grandmother of Christ;" and we are informed by Codinus that Justinian II. founded another in 705.

Her body was brought from Palestine to Constantinople in 740, and her "Inventio Corporis" was celebrated with all the honour due to a saint. [C.]

ANNOTINUM PASCHA. In the Gregorian Liber Responsalis, and in some MSS. of the Sacramentary, following the Domnica in Albis (First after Easter), we find an office in Pascha Annotina. That it was not, however, invariably on the day following the Octave of Easter is shown by Martene (quoted by Binterim, v. l. 240), who found it placed on the Thursday before Ascension Day in an ancient ritual of Vienna. And it is mentioned in later authorities as having been celebrated on various days, as on the Sabbatum in Albis, the Saturday after Easter-Day.

As to the meaning of the expression there are various opinions. Natalis Alexander (Hist. Eccl. Diss. ii. quæst. 2), with several of the older authorities, supposed it to be the anniversary of the Easter of the preceding year. If this anniversary was specially observed, when it fell in the Lent of the actual year it would naturally be omitted, or transferred to a period when the Fast was over; for the services of the Pascha annotinum were of a Paschal character, and consequently unsuited for a season of mourning.

Probably, however, the nature of the Pascha annotinum is correctly stated by the Micrologus (c. 56); Annotine Pascha is a term equivalent to anniversary Pascha; and it is so called because in olden time at Rome those who had been baptized at Easter celebrated the anniversary of their baptism in the next year by solemn services. Honorius of Autun, Durand, and Belet, Thomasius, Martene, and Mabillon. To this calling to mind of baptismal vows the collects of the Gregorian Sacramentary (p. 82) refer. The words of the Micrologus, that this was observed in olden time (antiquitus) seem to imply that even at the time when that treatise was written (about 1100), it had become obsolete (Gregorian Sacram. Ed. Méharn, p. 399; Binterim's Denkwürdigkeiten, v. i. 245 ff.).

ANTEPENDIUM (or Antependium), a veil or hanging in front of an altar. The use of such a piece of drapery no doubt began at a period when altars, as that at S. Alessandro on the Via Nomentana near Rome [ALTAR], began to be constructed with cancellated fronts: the veil hanging in front would protect the interior from dust and from profane or irreverent curiosity. Ciampini (1^{ct.} Mon. t. ii. p. 57) says that in a crypt below the church of SS. Cosmo e Damiano at Rome there was in his time an ancient altar "cum duabus columnis ac epistilio et corona; nec non sub ipso epistillio anuli sunt ferrei e quibus vela pendebant." (Compare t. l. p. 64.)

In the 7th and 8th centuries veils of rich and costly stuffs are often mentioned in the Lib. Pontif. as suspended "ante altare," as in the case where Pope Leo III. gave to the church of St. Paul at Rome "velum rubrum quod pendet ante altare habens in medio cruce[m] de clarysoclavo et periclysin de chrysoclavo," a red veil which hangs before the altar, having in the middle a cross of gold embroidery and a border of the same. It is possible, however, that in this and like cases the veil was not attached to the altar, but hung before it from the ciborium or from arches or railings raised upon the altar enclosure.

(Neale, Eastern Church, Introd. 890.) This book, which was intended to be a convenient manual, has been so swollen by the zeal of successive editors, that it has become, says Leo Allatius, a very monstrous of a book. ANTIGONUS, of Alexandria, commemorated Feb. 26 (Mart. Hieron.). [C.]

ANTIMENSIMUM, a consecrated altar-cloth, "cujus dominis ratio hæc est, quod ea adhibent loco mensæ sive altaris" (Bona, De Lebus Lit. l. xx. § 2). This seems the natural derivation, especially if, as Suidas says (in Suicer's Thesaurus s. v.) the word was a Latin one, meaning a table placed before a tribunal (πρὸ δικαστηρίου κειμένη). Nevertheless, the Greeks always write the word ἀντιμίσσιον, and derive it from μισσος, a canister (Neale, Eastern Church, Introd. p. 186).

These Antimensia were, and are, consecrated only at the consecration of a church (Gor's Euchology, p. 648), when a piece of cloth large enough to form several antimensia was placed on the altar, consecrated, and afterwards divided and distributed as occasion required. "Relics being pounded up with fragrant gum, oil is poured over them by the bishop, and distilling on to the corporals, is supposed to convey to them the mysterious virtues of the relics themselves. The Holy Eucharist must then be celebrated on them for seven days, after which they are sent forth as they may be wanted" (Neale, u. s. p. 187). As to the antiquity of these ceremonies it is difficult to speak with certainty.

Theodore Balsamon (in Suicer, s. v.) says that these Antimensia were for use on the Tables of Oratories (τῶν ἐκκλησιῶν), which were probably for the most part unconsecrated; and Manuel Chritopulus (in Bona, u. s.) says that they were for use in cases where it was doubtful whether the altar was consecrated or not. They were required to be sufficiently large to cover the spot occupied by the paten and chalice at the time of consecration.

The Syrians do not use those cloth antimensia, but in their stead consecrate slabs of wood, which appear to be used even on altars which are consecrated (compare the Ethiopic Arca [ARCA]). The Syriac Nomocanon quoted by Renaudot (Lit. Orient. i. 182) in the absence of an Antimensium of any kind permits consecration of the Eucharist on a leaf of the Gospels, or, in the desert and in case of urgent necessity, on the hands of the deacons. ANTIOCH, COUNCILS OF. Cave reckons only 13 Councils of Antioch between A.D. 252 and 800, at which date the first vol. of his Hist. Literaria stops; Sir H. Nicolas as many as 33, and Mansi nearly the same number. Numbering them, however, is unnecessary, as there are no first, second, and third Councils of Antioch as of Carthage and elsewhere. They may be set down briefly in chronological order, only three of them requiring any special notice.

A.D. 252—under Fabian, against the followers of Novatus (Euseb. vi. 46).

—264, 269—On their dates see Mansi i. 1089-91: both against Paul of Samosata, who was also Bishop of Antioch after Demetrian (Euseb. vii. 27-9). For details, see below.

—331—Of Arians, to depose Eustathius, Bishop of Antioch, for alleged Sabellianism (Soc. i. 24).

—339—Of Arians, to appoint Pistus to the see of Alexandria, to which St. Athanasius had just been restored by Constantine the younger (Life of St. Athanasius by his Benedictine editors).

—341—known as the Council of the Dedication: the bishops having met ostensibly to consecrate the great church of the metropolis of Syria, called the "Dominicum Aureum," the only council of Antioch whose canons have been preserved (Soc. ii. 8). For details, see below.

—345—Of Arians: when the creed called the "Macrosthiche," from its length, was put forth (Soc. ii. 18).

—348—Of Arians: at which, however, Stephen, Bishop of Antioch, himself an Arian, was deposed by order of Constantius for the monstrous plot organised by him against the deputies from Sardica (Newman's Arians, iv. 3, 4).

—354—Of Arians: against St. Athanasius.

—358—under Eudoxius: rejected the words Homousion and Hmoioousion equally: but "without venturing on the distinct Anomean doctrine" (Newman's Arians, iv. 4).

—361—To authorise the translation of St. Meletius under Sebaste to Antioch. A second was held shortly afterwards, by the same party, to expel him for having made proof of his orthodoxy.

—363—Of semi-Arians: addressed a synodical letter to the new emperor Julian, as had been done by the orthodox at Alexandria. St. Meletius presided, and signed first (Soc. iii. 25).

A.D. 367—Creed of the Council of the Dedication confirmed.

—379—under St. Meletius: condemned Marcellus, Photinus, and Apollinaris. Addressed a dogmatic letter to St. Damasus and the bishops of the West, who had sent a similar one to St. Paulinus.

—380—For healing the schism there: when it was agreed that whichever survived—St. Meletius or St. Paulinus—should be accepted by all. Here the τόμος or synodical letter of the Westerns was received (at least so says De Marca, Explic. Can. V. Concil. Const. A.D. 381, among his Dissertations). St. Meletius signed first of 146 others. St. Paulinus, apparently, was not present at all. A meeting of Arians took place there the same year on the death of their bishop Euzolus, when Dorotheus was elected to succeed him (Soc. iv. 35, and v. 3 and 5).

—389—To prevent the sons of Marcellus, Bishop of Apamene, from avenging his murder by the barbarians.

—391—Against the Messalians.

—424—or, as Mansi thinks (iv. 475) in 418: at which Pelagius was condemned.

—431—under John of Antioch, condemning and deposing St. Cyril and five others (Mansi, 5, 1147).

—432—under John also; for making peace with St. Cyril: after which he in this, or another synod of the same year, condemned Nestorius and his opinions.

—435—Respecting the works of Theodorus of Mopsuestia and Diodorus of Tarsus lately translated into Armenian.

—440—On the same subject: occasioned by a letter of Proclus, patriarch of Constantinople.

—445—under Domnus: in which a Syrian bishop named Athanasius was condemned.

—448—under Domnus also: when Ibas, Bishop of Edessa, was accused; but his accusers were excommunicated.

—471—At which Peter the Fuller was deposed, and Julian consecrated in his room; then Peter, having been restored by the usurper Basilicus in 476, was again ejected by a synod in 478 on the restoration of Zeno.

character of their proceedings. They came to the stern resolution of deposing him, yet had to apply to a pagan emperor to enforce their sentence, who, strange to say, did as they requested. No such case had occurred before: it was the gravity of their deliberations and the justice of their decisions that caused them to be respected. With the first of them, as we learn from Eusebius, there were some celebrated names associated. Firmilian, Bishop of Caesarea in Cappadocia, the well-known advocate for re-baptising heretics with St. Cyprian, St. Gregory the wonder-worker, and Athenodorus his brother, the bishops of Tarsus and Jerusalem, and others. Dionysius of Alexandria was invited, but sent excuses on account of his age; declaring his sentiments on the question in a letter addressed to the whole diocese, without so much as naming the accused, its bishop. Those who were present exposed his errors; but Paul, promising amendment, managed to cajole Firmilian, and the bishops separated without passing sentence. At the second council, having been convicted by a presbyter named Malchion, occupying the highest position in the schools of Antioch as a sophist, he was cut off from the communion of the Church; and a synodical letter was addressed in the name of those present, headed by the bishops of Tarsus and Jerusalem—Firmilian had died on his road to the council—and of the neighbouring churches, to the bishops of Rome and Alexandria, and the whole Church generally, setting forth all that had been done in both synods, as well as all the false teaching and all the strange practices—so much in harmony with what is attributed to the sophists of Athens in Plato—for which Paul had been deposed, also that Domnus, son of Demetrian, his predecessor in the see, had been elected in his place. Still, condemned as he had been, Paul held his ground till the emperor Aurelian, having been besought to interfere, commanded that "the house in which the bishop lived should be given up to those with whom the bishops of Italy and of the city of Rome communicated as regards dogma." This settled his fate once for all.

The remaining council of Antioch to be specially noticed is that of the Dedicatio A.D. 341. It was attended by 90 bishops, says St. Athanasius, or by 97 as St. Hilary. Of these but 36 are said to have been Arian: yet they carried their point through Constantius so far as to substitute Eusebius of Hems for St. Athanasius, and, on his hesitating, to get George or Gregory of Cappadocia sent out to be put in possession of the see of Alexandria without delay.

Not content with this, they got their 12th canon levelled against those who, having been deposed in a synod, presume to submit their case to the emperor instead of a larger synod, averring that they deserved no pardon, and ought not ever to be restored again. In this way the restoration of St. Athanasius to Alexandria by Constantine the younger was virtually declared uncanonical and his see vacant. To this canon St. Chrysostom afterwards objected, when it was adduced against him, that it was framed by the Arians. Lastly, they managed to promulgate four different creeds, all intended to undermine that of Nicea. Yet, strange to say, the 25 canons passed by this council came to be among the most respected of any, and at length admitted into the code of the Universal Church. They are termed by Pope Zacharias "the canons of the blessed Fathers;" by Nicholas I. "the venerable and holy canons of Antioch;" and by the Council of Chalcedon "the just rules of the councils." Hence some have supposed two who made the canons; another of 30 or 40 Arians, who superseded St. Athanasius (Inansi, ii. 1305, note). But canon 12 plainly was as much directed against St. Athanasius as anything else that was done there. On the other hand, it laid down a true principle no less than the rest; and this doubtless has been the ground on which they have been so widely esteemed. Among them there are five which cannot be passed over, for another reason. The 9th, for distinctly proving the high antiquity of one at least of the Apostolical canons, by referring to it as "the ancient canon which was in force in the age of our fathers," in connexion with the special honour now claimed for metropolitans—on which see Bever., Synod. ii. ad loc.—canons 4 and 5, for having been cited in the 4th action of the Council of Chalcedon, or rather read out there by Aetius, Archbishop of Constantinople, from a book as "canons 83 and 84 of the holy Fathers;" and likewise canons 16 and 17, for having been read out in the 11th action of the same council by Leontius, Bishop of Magnesia, from a book as "canons 95 and 96;" being in each case the identical numbers assigned to them in the code of the Universal Church, thus proving this code to have been in existence and appealed to then, and therefore making it extremely probable, to say the least, that when the Chalcedonian bishops in their first canon "pronounced it to be fit and just that the canons of the holy Fathers made in every synod to this present time be in full force," they gave their authoritative sanction to this very collection. Hence a permanent and intrinsic interest has been imparted to this council irrespectively of the merits of its own canons in themselves, though there are few councils whose enactments are marked throughout by so much good sense. [E. S. F.]

ANTIPAS, Bishop of Pergamus, traditionally the "angel" of that church addressed in the Apocalypse, commemorated April 11 (Cul. Byzant.).

ANTIPHON—(Gr. Ἀντίφωνον; Lat. Antiphona: Old English, Antefn, Antem [Chaucer]; Modern English, Anthem. For the change of Antefn into Antem, compare O. E. Stefn [þrow] with modern Stem. French, Antienne.) "Antiphona ex Græco interpretatur vox recipiendæ; duobus scilicet choris alternatim psallentibus ordine commutato." (Isidore, Origines vi. 18.)

There are two kinds of responsive singing used in the Church; the Responsorial, when one singer or reader begins, and the whole choir answers in the alternate verses; and the present Anglican practice when the Psalms are not chanted; and the Antiphonal (described in Isidore's definition) when the choir is divided into two parts or sides, and each part or side sings alternate verses. Of these forms of ecclesiastical chant we are now concerned only with the second, the Antiphonal. We shall endeavour, as briefly as may be, to mention (1) Its origin. (2) The different usages of the term "Antiphon." (3) Its application in the Mssal, and in the Breviary; pointing out as they occur any peculiarity or difference of usage between the Eastern and the Western Churches.

1. Its origin may be found in the Jewish Church. For we read (1 Chron. vi. 31 &c.), that David divided the Levites into three bands, and "set them over the service of song in the house of the Lord, after that the ark had rest. And they ministered before the dwelling-place of the tabernacle of the congregation with singing, until Salomon had built the house of the Lord in Jerusalem; and then they waited on their office according to their order." It appears further that the sons of the Kohathites, under "Heman a singer" (v. 33), stood in the centre while the Gershonites, led by Asaph, stood on the right hand, and the Merarites, led by Ethan (or Jeduthun), on the left. These arrangements, and the further details given in 1 Chron. xxv. clearly point to some definite assignment of the musical parts of the tabernacle and temple worship. Some of the psalms, moreover, as the xxiv. and the xxxiv. appear to be composed for antiphonal singing by two choirs.

It appears on the evidence of Philo, that this mode of singing was practised by the Essenes. Speaking of them he says: "In the first place two choirs are constituted; one of men, the other of women. They then sing hymns to the praise of God, composed in different kinds of metre and verse—now with one mouth, now with antiphonal hymns and harmonies, leading, and directing, and ruffing the choir with modulations of the hands and gestures of the body; at one time in motion, at another stationary; turning in one direction, and in the reverse, as the case requires. Then, when each choir by itself has satisfied itself with these delights, they all, as though exhilarated with divine love, combine from both choirs into one."

Phny appears to allude to antiphonal chanting when, in a well-known passage (Epist. x. 97), he says that the Christians sing a hymn to Christ as God, "by turns among themselves" (secum invicem).

The introduction of antiphonal singing among the Greeks is ascribed by an ancient tradition to Ignatius of Antioch (Socrates, Eccles. Hist. vi. 8), who saw a vision of antiphonal chanting in heaven. And this tradition probably represents the fact, that this manner of singing was early introduced into Antioch, and spread thence over the Eastern Church.

We learn from S. Basil that it was general in his time. He says (Ep. cviii. ad Cleric. Neocæsar.) prefacing that what he is going to speak of are the received institutions in all the churches (τὰ νῦν κεκρατηκότεν ἔθη πάσαις ταῖς τοῦ Θεοῦ ἐκκλησίαις συνέφθ' ἔστι καὶ σύμφωνον), "that the people, resorting by night to the house of prayer . . . at length, rising from prayer, betake themselves to psalmody. And now, divided into two parts, they sing alternately to each other (διεχθ' διαμεσηθέντες, ἀντιψάλλουσι ἀλλήλοις . . .). Afterwards they commit the leading of the melody to one, and the rest follow him."

Theodoret (Hist. Eccles. li. 19) ascribes the introduction of antiphonal singing to Flavian and Diodorus, who, while still laymen, he says, were the first to divide the choirs of singers into two parts, and teach them to sing the songs of David alternately (οἱ οὖτοι πρώτοι, διεχθ' διεσόντες τους τῶν ψαλλόντων χοροῦς. ἐν διαδοχῇ ἄδειον τὴν Δαυιδικὴν ὑμνασίαν μελοῦσαν), and then he adds that this custom, which thus took its rise at Antioch, spread thence in every direction.

In the Western Church the introduction of Antiphonal singing after the manner of the Orientals (secundum morem Orientalium), is attributed to S. Ambrose, as S. Augustine says (Confess. ix. c. 7, § 15), and he gives as a reason, that the people should not become weary.

A passage, indeed, is adduced from Tertullian (ad Uxor. ii.), from which it is argued that the practice of alternate singing was in vogue before the time of S. Ambrose. It has also been contended that Pope Damasus, or again Celestine, was its originator in the Western Church. As these opinions do not seem to be generally adopted, and as the arguments by which they are supported may easily admit of another interpretation, it does not appear to be necessary to occupy space by discussing them here.

II. The word Antiphon, however, has been used in several different senses.

1. Sometimes it appears to denote the psalm or hymn themselves, which were sung antiphonally. Thus Socrates (Hist. Eccles. vi. 8) calls certain hymns which were thus sung "antiphonas." When the word is used in this sense there is generally a contrast expressed or implied with a "psalmus directus," or "directaneous." "Psallere cum antiphona" is a phrase much used in this connexion, to which "psallere in directum" is opposed. Thus S. Aurelian in the order for psalmody of his rule, "Dicite Matutinario, il est primo canticum in antiphona: deinde directaneum, Judica me Deus . . . in antiphona dicite hymmum, Splendor potentie glorie." It is not quite certain what is meant by these two expressions; the general opinion is that "psallere cum (or in) antiphona," means to sing alternately with the two sides of the choir; and "psallere directaneum" to sing either with the whole choir united, or else for one chanter to sing while the rest listened in silence (this latter mode of singing, however, is what is usually denoted by "tractus;") while some think that "psallere in" or "cum antiphona" means to sing with modulation of the voice; and that "psallere directaneum" denotes plain recitation without musical intonation. Thus Cassian (De Instit. Coenob. li. 2), speaking of psalms to be sung in the night office, says, "et hos ipsos antiphonarum protelas melodias, et adjunctione quarundam modulationum;" and S. Benedict directs that some psalms should be said "in directum," but many more "modulatis vocibus." A third opinion is that "psallere cum antiphona" means to sing psalms with certain sentences inserted between the verses, which sentences were called antiphons, from their being sung alternately with the verses of the psalm itself. Of this method of singing we shall speak more fully presently. In opposition to this sense, "psallere directum" would mean to sing a psalm straight through without any antiphon; and it may be remarked that the "psalmus directus," said daily at Lauds, in the Ambrosian office, has no Antiphon. The expression "ortio recta" seems also to be used in much the same sense.

2. The word Antiphona^a is also used to denote

a sacred composition, or compilation of verses from the Psalms, or sometimes from other parts of Scripture, or several consecutive verses of the same psalm appropriate to a special subject or festival. This was sung by one choir, and after each verse an unvarying response was made by the opposite choir; whence the name.

Compilations of this nature are to be found in the old office books, etc., in the Mozarabic office for the dead, where, however, they are called "a Psalm of David," as being said in the place of psalms in the Nocturns; and they have this peculiarity, that each verse (with very few exceptions) begins with the same word. Thus the verses of one such "psalm" all begin with "Ad-te;" those of another with "Miserere;" of another with "Libera;" of another with "Tu Domine;" and so on. They are also found in the Ambrosian burial offices, where they are called Antiphonae, each verse being considered as a separate Antiphon, and are headed Antiph. i.
Antiph. ii. and so on. The Canticles, which were appointed to be said instead of the "Venite" in the English state services, there called "hymns," and directed to be said or sung "one verse by the Priest, and another by the Clerk and people"
(i. e. antiphonally), are of this nature.

3. The word "Antiphona" denotes (and this is the sense in which we are most familiar with its use), a sentence usually, but by no means invariably, taken from the psalm itself, and originally intercalated between each verse of a psalm,
but which, in process of time, came to be sung,
wholly or in part, at the beginning and end only.
We shall speak more at length on this head presently.

4. The word "Antiphona" came to denote such a sentence taken by itself, and sung alone without connexion with any psalm. These Antiphons were frequently original compositions.
(We thus arrive at our common use of the word anthem as part of an Anglican choral service.)
Antiphons of this description are of common occurrence in the Greek offices.

As an example take the following from the office for the taking the greater monastic habit (τῷ μεγάλῳ σχήματι). In the Liturgy, after the entrance of the Gospels, the following Antiphons (Ἀντιφωναί) are said:—

Ant. 1. "Would that I could wipe out with tears the handwriting of my offences, O Lord; and please Thee by deceiving me, and wars against my soul. O Lord, before I finally perish, save me.

"Who that is tossed by storms, and makes for it, does not find safety in this part? Or who that is tormented with pain and falls down before it, does not find a cure in the place of healing? O thou Creator of all men, and physician of the sick, O Lord, before I finally perish, save me.

"I am a sheep of Thy rational flock; and I flee to Thee,
O good Shepherd; save me the wanderer from Thy fold,
O God, and have mercy on me."

Then follows "Gloria Patri" and a "Theotokion," which is a short Antiphon or invocation addressed to the B. V. M. as "Theotokos." Then Antiphon ii., after the model of the first, but in

antiphona, and antiphonum, the neuter form denoting antiphons of the nature here described; and the feminine two clauses only. So after another "Gloria"

and "Theotokion," Antiphon iii. in one clause.

III. We shall now refer to the principal uses of Antiphons in the services of the Church.

1st. In the Liturgy, or office of the Mass.
We will take the Greek offices first. In these (and we will confine ourselves to the two Liturgies of SS. Basil and Chrysostom) before the lesser entrance (i. e. that of the Gospels) 3 psalms, or parts of psalms are sung with a constant response after each verse. These are called respectively the 1st, 2nd, and 3rd Antiphon, and each is preceded by a prayer, which is called the prayer of the 1st, 2nd, and 3rd Antiphon respectively.

The Greek liturgical Antiphons consist each of four verses with its response, though occasionally, as on Christmas Day, the third Antiphon has but three; that "Gloria Patri" is said after the first and second Antiphons, but not after the third. (This is doubtless because the office passes on immediately after the third Antiphon to other singing with which we are not now concerned.)
In the first Antiphon the antiphonal response is always the same, and is that given in the cases quoted; in the second it varies with the day to the solemnity of which it has reference;
it always begins with the words "Save us," and ends with "Who sing to Thee, Alleluia" (σῶσον ἡμᾶς . . . ψάλλομέν σοι Ἄλληλουῖα); in the third it varies likewise with the day, but is not so uniform a type. It is, as a rule, the same as the "Apolycicon," an Anthem which is sung near the end of the preceding vespers. That after the "Gloria" in the second Antiphon, instead of repeating the proper response of the Antiphon "O only begotten Son and Word of God," &c., is sung as a response. (This invocation occurs in the office of the "Typics.")

Other compositions, which are virtually Antiphons, are found in Greek offices, and will be spoken of under their proper heads; see CONTA-KION, THEOTOKION.

We turn now to the Liturgies of the Western Church.

The three Antiphons of the Greek Liturgies correspond both in structure and position with the single Antiphon of the Western Church.
The chant which the Church uses at the beginning of the Mass is commonly called "Introitus," or "Antiphona ad Introitum," from its being sung antiphonally when the priest enters upon the service, or mounts to the altar; for both explanations are given [INTROIT]. It still retains its name of "Introitus" in the Roman missal;
and the word "Introit" is frequently used among ourselves at the present day with a similar meaning.

In the Ambrosian Liturgy the corresponding Antiphon was called "Ingressa" for the same reason; while in the Mozarabic and Sarum Liturgies it was called "Officium." In the Gallican rite it was called "Antiphona" or "Antiphona ad praelegendum," or "de praelegere."

The institution of the Antiphon at the Introit is almost universally ascribed to S. Caeclestine, who was Pope A. D. 422, and who is said to have borrowed this kind of singing from S. Ambrose, and to have appointed that the cl. psalms of David should be sung antiphonally before the Sacrifice, which was not done previously, but only the Epistles of S. Paul and the Gospel were read, and thus the Mass was conducted.^b In the account given by S. Augustine (de Civ. Dei, xxii. 8 sub fin.) of a Mass which he celebrated, A.D. 425, there is no mention of such an Introit. After speaking of certain preliminary thanksgivings (as we should say occasional) for a recent miracle, he says, "I saluted the people" . . . when silence was at length established, the appointed lections of Holy Scripture were read as though that was the beginning of the Mass.

It seems, however, doubtful what we are to understand by the singing of Psalms thus instituted by Caesestine—whether an entire Psalm, varying with the office, was sung, or only certain verses taken from the Psalms, and used as an Antiphon. The former opinion is held by Honorius (Gemma animae, 87), who says that "Caesestine appointed Psalms to be sung at the Introit of the Mass, from which (de quibus) Gregory the Pope afterwards composed Antiphons for the Introit of the Mass with musical notations (modulando composit.)" Also by Priscus in his "Acts of the Popes," and by Cardinal Bona.

The latter opinion is held by Micrologus (cap. i.), and by Amalarius (De Eccl. Off. iii. 5), who, in explaining this addition of Caesestine's, says, "Which we understand to mean that he selected Antiphons out of all the Psalms, to be sung in the office of the Mass. For previously the Mass began with a lection, which custom is still retained in the vigils of Easter and Pentecost."

It has again been argued with much force that it was customary to sing Antiphons taken from the Psalms at the Mass before the time of Caesestine.^c S. Ambrose (de Myst. cap. 8) and the writer de Sacr. (iv. 2) speak as though the use of the verse "Introibo," &c., at the Introit were familiar. So, too, Gregory Nazian. says, When he (the priest) is vested, he comes to the altar saying the Antiphon "I will go unto the altar of God" (Introibo ad altare Dei). It is also noticeable that some of the verses said to have been used as Antiphons in early times differ somewhat from Jerome's version. This is strong evidence that the use of Antiphons at the Introit was anterior to the time of Caesestine. However this may be, Caesestine may well have so organized or altered, or developed the custom, as to be called its inventor. And on the whole the more probable opinion seems to be that he appointed entire Psalms to be sung before the Mass and that afterwards Gregory the Great selected from them verses as an Antiphon for the "Introit," and others for the "Responsory,"^d "Offertory," and "Communion," which he collected into the book which he called his Antiphony. In support of this view it may be observed that the Responsory &c. (which are really Antiphons, though the Introit soon monopolized that name) are often taken from the same Psalm as the Introit.

The form of the Antiphon at the Introit was as follows. After the Introit, properly so called, a psalm was sung, originally entire, but afterwards a single verse with "Gloria Patri." The Introit was then repeated, and some churches used to sing it three times on the more solemn days.

^b Liber pontificalis in vita S. Caesestini. See also the Catalogue of the Roman Pontiffs, April, vol. I. (Henschen and Papebrock).

The Introit in the Antiphony of S. Gregory is taken from the Psalms, with a few exceptions, which Durandus (Rat. iv. 5) calls "Irregular Introits." These Introits, taken from other parts of Scripture, are in all cases followed by their appointed "Psalms." There are also a few Introits which are not taken from any part of Scripture. Such is that for Trinity Sunday in the Roman and Sarum missals.

"Blessed be the Holy Trinity, and the undivided Unity; we will give thanks to It, for It has dealt mercifully with us."

And that for All-Saints Day in the same Missal.

"Let us all rejoice celebrating the festival in honour of all the Saints, over whose solemnity the angels rejoice, and John in praising the Son of God."

These non-scriptural Introits, however, are mostly, as will be observed, for festivals of later date, and are not found in Gregory's Antiphony. A metrical Introit is sometimes found. Thus in the Roman Missal in Masses, "in Commemoratione B.V.M., a purific. usque ad pasch." the Introit is:—

Salve, sancta Parens, enixa puerpera Regem, Qui cœlum terramque regit in secula seculorum.*
Psalmus.—Virgo Dei genitrix, quem totus non capit orbis
In tua se clausit viscera factus hono.
Gloria Patri.

Here the "Psalmus" is not from the Psalms, which is very unusual, though this is not a solitary case. That of Trinity Sunday is another. The lines are the beginning of an old hymn to the Virgin, which is used in her office in various Breviaries.

The different Sundays were often publicly distinguished by the first word of their "Officium," or "Introitus." Thus, the first four Sundays in Lent were severally known as, "Invocavit," "Reminiscere," "Oculi," "Laetare." Low Sunday as "Quasimodo," and so in other cases. So too we find week days designated, i.e. Wednesday in the third week in Lent called in Missals, "Feria quarta post Oculi." In rubrical directions this nomenclature is very frequent.

The Ambrosian "Ingressa" consists of one unbroken sentence, usually but by no means always, taken from Scripture, and not followed by a "Psalmus," or the "Gloria Patri." It is often the same as the Roman "Officium." It is never repeated except in Masses of the Dead, when its form approaches very nearly to that of the Roman "Introitus."

The form of the Mozarabic "Officium" though closely approaching that of the Roman "Introitus" differs somewhat from it. The Antiphon is followed by a "versus," corresponding to the Roman "Psalmus," with the "Gloria Patri," before and after which the second clause alone of the Antiphon is repeated.^f

Durandus (Rat. lib. iv. cap. 5) and Belet (De Dic. Off. cap. 35) state that in their time a Tropus was sung, in some churches, on the more solemn days before the Antiphon.

* The line is thus given in the Roman and Sarum Missals. It was probably read "in secula seculorum."

We now come to that use of Antiphons with which we are probably most familiar—a use as an accompaniment to Psalms and Canticles. In general terms an Antiphon in this sense is a sentence which precedes a Psalm or Canticle to the musical tone of which the whole Psalm or Canticle is sung, in alternate verses by the opposite sides of the choir which at the end unite in repeating the Antiphon. This sentence is usually, but by no means universally, taken from the Psalm itself, and it varies with the day and occasion. Originally the Psalm was said by one choir, and the Antiphon was intercalated between each verse by the opposite choir: whence the name. Ps. 136 (Confitemini) and the Canticle "Benedicite" are obvious examples of this method of singing. Indeed in Ps. 135 (v. 10–12) we have very nearly the same words, without what we may call the Antiphon ("for His mercy endureth for ever"), which occur in Ps. 136 with that Antiphon inserted after each clause, and the "Benedicite" is often recited without the repetition of its Antiphon after every verse. Ps. 42 and 43 (Quemadmodum and Judica), 80 (Qui regis Israel), and 107 (Confitemini) will at once suggest themselves as containing an Antiphonal verse which is repeated at intervals.

There are many examples of this earlier use of Antiphons in the Greek Services. For instance: at Vespers on the "Great Sabbath" (i. e. Easter Eve), Ps. 82 (Deus stetit) is said with the last verse, "Arise, O God, and judge Thou the earth, for Thou shalt take all heathen to Thine inheritance," repeated with beautiful application, as an Antiphon between each verse.

Again, in the Office for the Burial of a Priest, Pss. 23 (Dominus regit me), 24 (Dominus est terra), 84 (Quam dilectam), are said with "Alleluia, Alleluia," repeated as an Antiphon between each verse. Here the three Psalms are called respectively the first, second, and third Antiphons.

It appears that in the Roman Church the same custom of repeating the Antiphon after each verse of the Psalm originally prevailed. In an old mass, edited by Menard, in the Appendix to the Sacramentary of S. Gregory, we read, "Anno- nente Episcopo, incipiat psalmus a Cantore, cum Introitu reciprocante."¹

Amalarius, too (De Ordine Antiphonarum, cap. iii.), speaking of the Nocturns of weekdays, has the words, "Ex senis Antiphonis quas vicissim chori per singulos versus repetunt." We have evidence that this custom was not obsolete (in places at least) as late as the 10th century, in the life of Odo, Abbot of Cluny, where we are told that the monks of that house, wishing to prolong the office of the Vigils of S. Martin (Nov. 11), when the Antiphons of the office are short,²

¹ E.g. in the Lauds of the Ambrosian Breviary, and in a still more compressed form in the Mozarabic Lauds; where the word "Benedicite" is omitted from the beginning of each verse after the first.

² The use of "Alleluia" on this and on similar occasions of mourning (e.g. during Lent) is different from the usage of the Western Church.

³ This seems to point more to the mode of singing the Introit than Psalms in the daily office.

⁴ The circumstance of their frequent repetition has been suggested as a reason why the Antiphone to the Psalms in the daily office are, as a rule, so much shorter than that at the Introit of the Mass.

CHRIST. ANT.

and the nights long, till daybreak, used to repeat every Antiphon after each verse of the Psalms. We find also, in a letter by anonymous author to Batheric, who was appointed Bishop of Ratisbon, A.D. 814 (quoted by Thomastus), the writer complaining that he has in the course of his travels found some who, with a view to get through the office as rapidly as possible, that they may the quicker return to their worldly business, recite it "without Antiphons, in a perfunctory manner and with all haste" ("sine Antiphonis, cursim, et cum omni velocitate"). Theodorot also relates (Hist. Eccl. iii. 10) that Julian, when singing the hymns of the impiety of David, added to each verse the clause, "Confounded be all they that worship carved images."

A similar instance of this older use of an Antiphon is found in the "Reproaches" ("versiculi improperii" or "improperia") of the Roman Missal for Good Friday.

These are Gregorian: the Introductory rubric as it stands in the Roman Missal is cited, as it is so precise as to the manner of singing them. It runs thus: "Versiculi sequentes improperii a binis alternatim cantantur, utrosque choro simul repetente post quemlibet versum Leptule, &c."

Sometimes metrical hymns were sung antiphonally after this manner. Thus at the "Salutation of the Cross" the verse of the hymn "Pange lingua," which begins "Cruce fidelis," is sung in the Sarum rite at the beginning, and after every verse of the hymn, the rubric being—

"Chorus idem repetat post unumquemque versum.

"Cruce fidelis Inter omnia," &c.

(... Sacerdotes cantent hunc versum sequentem.)

"Pange lingua gloriosum proelium certaminis," &c.

Chorus—"Cruce fidelis," &c.

And so on. So also before the Benediction of the Paschal Candles on Easter Eve, according to the Sarum rite, the hymn "Invidiosus vituli" is sung in the same manner, with the first stanza repeated antiphonally after each stanza.

A variation of this form of antiphonal interpolation is when the interpolated clause itself varies. The following is a striking example:—

On the morning of Easter Eve in the Greek office, the following Antiphons (τροπαια) are said with Ps. 118, "saying" (as the rubric directs) "one verse (στίχον) from the Psalm after each troparium." These are known as τὰ τροπαια.

"Blessed art Thou, O Lord, O teach me Thy statutes, Blessed are those that are undelled in the way, and walk in the law of the Lord."

"Thou, O Christ, the Life, wast laid low in the grave, and the angelic hosts were amazed, glorifying Thy confederation."

"Blessed are they that keep His testimonies, and seek Him with their whole heart."

"O Life, how is it that Thou dost die? How is it that Thou dost dwell in the grave? Thou payest the tribute of death, and raisest the dead out of Hades."

"For they who do no wickedness walk in His ways."

"We magnify Thee, O Jesu the King, and honour Thy burial, and Thy passion, by which Thou hast saved us from destruction."

And so on throughout the whole Psalm.

In the same manner at the burial of monks, the blessings at the beginning of the Sermon on

⁵ The rubrical directions with respect to the "Improperia" in the Mozarabic Missal are very full,

the Mount (oi μακαρισμοί) are recited with a varying antiphonal clause after each, beginning from the fifth.

As an example from the Western Church, we may refer to the following, which belongs to Vespers on Easter Eve. It is given in S. Gregory's Antiphonary, with the heading Antiph. and Ps. to the alternate verses.

Antiph. "In the end of the Sabbath, as it began to dawn towards the first day of the week, came Mary Magdalene, and the other Mary to see the sepulchre." Alleluia.

Ps. "My soul doth magnify the Lord."

Antiph. "Aunt behold, there was a great earthquake, for the angel of the Lord descended from heaven." Alleluia.

Ps. "And my spirit hath rejoiced in God my Saviour."

And so the Magnificat is sung with the successive clauses of the Gospel for the day used as Antiphons after each of its verses.

The missal Litanies which are said in the Ambrosian Mass on Sundays in Lent, and the very beautiful Preces with which the Mozarabic Missal and Broviary abounds, are so far antiphonal that each petition is followed by an unvarying response. Their consideration, however interesting, scarcely belongs to our present subject.

The repetition of the Antiphon after each verse was called "Antiphonare." In the old Antiphonaries we frequently find such directions as "Hoc die Antiphonamus ad Benedictus," or simply "Hoc die antiphonamus." The word "antiphonare" is explained to mean to repeat the Antiphon after each verse of the Canticle. The "Greater Antiphons" (i. e. "O Sapientia," &c.) are directed to be sung at the Benedictus, with the rubric, "Quas antiphonamus ab In Sanctitate," which means that the repetition of the Antiphon begins from the verse of which those are the first words.⁴

At a later period the custom of repeating the Antiphon after each verse of the Psalm dropped, and its use was gradually limited to the beginning and end of the Psalm. A relic of the old usage still survives in the manner of singing the "Venite" at Nocturns, in which Psalm the Antiphon is repeated, either wholly or in part, several times during the course of the Psalm.

It remained a frequent custom, and more particularly in the monastic usages, at Lauds and Vespers on the greater feasts to sing the Antiphon three times at the end of Benedictus and of Magnificat, once before Gloria Patri, once before Sicut erat, and once again at the conclusion of the whole. This seems to have been the general use of the Church of Tours; and the Church of Rome retained the practice in the 12th century, at least in certain offices of the festivals of the Nativity, the Epiphany, and S. Peter. It was called "Antiphonam triumphare," which is explained by Martene (De Ant. Eccl. Rit. iv. 4) as "ter fari." Antiphonam levare,⁵ or imponere, means to begin the Antiphon.

Other variations in the manner of singing the Antiphon are mentioned by other writers. Thus ⁴ This differs from the later (and the present) practice, according to which these Antiphons are said to the Magnificat at Vespers.

⁵ This is the manner in which the "μακαρισμοί" mentioned above are recited. The first four are followed by no antiphonal sentence.

⁶ Compare our English use of the word to raise.

we are told⁶ that sometimes the Antiphon was said twice before the Psalm; or at least, if only said once, the first half of it would be sung by one choir, and the second half by the other. This was called "responderet ad Antiphonam."⁷

It appears that this method of singing the Antiphon was confined to the beginning and end of the Psalm or Canticle. When repeated during the Psalm, the Antiphon was always sung by one choir, the other taking the verse.

The repetition of the Antiphons was in later times still further curtailed, and the opening words only sung at the beginning of the Psalm or Canticle, the entire Antiphon being recited at the close. Still later, two or more Psalms were said under the same Antiphon, itself abbreviated as just stated. This is the present custom of the Roman Breviary. When the Antiphon was taken from the beginning of the Psalm or Canticle, after the Antiphon the beginning of the Psalm or Canticle was not repeated, but the recitation was taken up from the place where the Antiphon ceases. For instance, the opening verses of the 92nd Psalm are said at Vespers on Saturday in the Ambrosian rite in this manner:—

Ant. "Bonum est."

Ps. "Et psallere non nisi Tuo Altissime." &c.

"Gloria Patri." &c.

Ant. "Bonum est confiteri Domino Deo nostro."

Where the recitation of the Psalm begins with the verse following the Antiphon, though the opening words only of the Antiphon are said at the beginning.

On the more important festivals the Antiphons at Vespers, Matins, and Lauds (but not at the other hours), were said entire before as well as after the Psalms and Canticles. These feasts were hence called "double;" those in which the Antiphons were not thus repeated, "simple."

There are a few peculiarities in the use of Antiphons to the Psalms and Canticles in the Ambrosian and Mozarabic rites which may be mentioned.

1. The Ambrosian Antiphons are divided into simple and double. The simple Antiphons are said in the same manner as the Roman Antiphons on days which are not "double." They are always so said whatever be the nature of the feast. In Eastertide the Antiphon is said entire before the Psalm, and instead of its repetition at the end, "Alleluia, Alleluia," is said.

The double Antiphons consist of two clauses, the second being distinguished by a l. (i. e. versus), and is said entire both before and after the Psalm. The following is a specimen which is said to be one of the Psalms on Good Friday:—

Ant. duplex. "Simon, sleepest thou? Couldst not thou watch with me one hour?"

l. "Or do ye see Judas, how he sleeps not, but hastens to deliver Me to the Jews?"

These double Antiphons occur occasionally and irregularly on days which have proper Psalms.

⁴ By Amalarius, De Eccl. Off. iv. 7.

⁵ In the Vatican Antiphony we find the following direction on the Epiphany:—"Hodie ad omnes Antiphonas respondimus," and so in other instances. In a MS. of the church of Rouen the antiphon before and after the "Magnificat" at first Vespers of the Assumption is divided into four alternate parts between the two sides of the choir, and after the "Gloria Patri" is again sung by both sides together.

Thus on Wednesday before Easter, out of nine Psalms, one was a double Antiphon; on Thursday, out of ten, none, and on Good Friday, out of eighteen, one; on Christmas Day, out of twenty-one, four; and on the Epiphany, out of twenty-one, six. Festivals are not divided into "double" and "simple" as distinguished by the Antiphons.

2. The Mozarabic Antiphons are said entire before as well as after their Psalm or Canticle. Occasionally two Antiphons are given for the same Canticle.* They are often divided into two clauses, distinguished by the letter P, in which case at the end of the Psalm the "Gloria" is intercalated between the two clauses.

Of the nature of the sentence adopted as an Antiphon little is to be said. It is, for the most part, a verse, or part of a verse, from the Psalm it accompanies, varying with the day and the occasion, and often with extreme beauty of application. Sometimes it is a slight variation of the verse; or it is taken from other parts of Scripture; sometimes it is an original composition, occasionally even in verse. E. g. in the 3rd Nocturn on Sundays between Trinity and Advent in the Sarum Diervary:

To Ps. 19 (Uell enarvnd).

"Sponsus ut et thalamo processit Christus in orbem; Descendens coeli Jure saluffero."

The Antiphons for the Venite are technically called the INVITATORIA.

The corresponding Antiphons of the Eastern Church need not detain us, as they are less prominent and important, and present no special features. They are always taken from the Psalm itself, and are said after the Psalm only, and are prefaced by the words καὶ ἔδωκεν (and again), and are introduced before the "Gloria Patri."

Thus Ps. 104 (Benedic animu meū) is said daily at Vespers. It is called the proemiac Psalm; and the Antiphon at the end is—

And again.

"The sun knoweth his going down. Thou makest darkness that it may be night.

"O Lord, how manifold are Thy works. In wisdom hast Thou made them all."

"Glory be," &c. "As it was," &c.

Antiphona Post Evangelium.—An Antiphon said, as its name indicates, after the Gospel, in the Ambrosian rite. It consists of a simple unbroken clause, and is sometimes taken from the Psalms or other parts of Scripture; sometimes it is composed with reference to the day. One example will show its form, that for the Christophory or return of Christ out of Egypt (Jan. 7).

"Praise the Lord, all ye angels of His; praise Him all His host. Praise Him sun and moon; praise Him all ye stars and light."

There is nothing corresponding in the Roman Monastic and Sarum Missals, in which the Gospel is immediately followed by the Creed. In the Mozarabic office the Lauds followed the Gospel. (The Creed, it will be remembered, is sung after the consecration.)

Antiphona ad Confractorem Paris.—An Antiphon said in the Mozarabic Mass on certain days at the breaking of the consecrated Host.² It occurs for the most part during Lent, and in votive Masses. Also on Whitsunday and on Corpus Christi. It is usually short and said in one clause. Thus from the 4th Sunday in Lent (Mediante die Festo), up to Maundy Thursday (In coena Domini), and also on Corpus Christi, it is—

"Do Thou, O Lord, give us our meat in due season Open Thine hand, and fill all things living with piety."

In the Ambrosian Missal the Confractorem corresponds to the Antiph. ad Confrac. There is no Antiphon appointed at the same place in the Roman and Sarum Missals.

Antiphona in Choro.—An Antiphon said in the Ambrosian rite at Vespers on certain days. It occurs near the beginning of the office, before the Hymn, and is said on Sundays, and at the second Vespers of festivals. It is also said at the first Vespers of those festivals which have the office not solemn (officium non solemne) and of some, but not of all, "Solemnities of the Lord." It is not said at first Vespers of a Solemn Office. This is the general rule, though there are occasional exceptions. It varies with the days, and is usually a verse of Scripture, in most cases from the Psalms, and has no Psalm belonging to it. Sometimes it is an adaptation of a passage of Scripture, or an original composition. Thus, on Easter Day, we have—

Ant. in ch. Hallel. Then believed they His words, and sang praise unto Him." Hallel.

Antiphona ad Crucem.—An Antiphon said in the Ambrosian rite at the beginning of Lauds after the Benedictus. It is said on Sundays (except in Lent), on Festivals which have the "Solemn Office" (except they fall on Saturday), in "Solemnities of the Lord" (even though they fall on Saturday), and during Octaves. It is usually a verse from Scripture, but sometimes an original composition with very much of the character of a Greek ᾠδὴ, and always ends with Kyr. Kyr. (i. e. Kyrie eleison, sometimes written K. K. K.). It is said five times, the Antiphon itself is repeated three times, then follows Gloria Patri, then the Antiphon again, then Sicut erat, and then the Antiphon once more. On Sundays in Advent, except the 6th, on Christmas Day, the Circumcision, and the Epiphany, it is said seven times, i. e., is repeated five times before the Gloria Patri.

² In the Mozarabic rite the Host after consecration is divided, as is well known, into nine parts, which are arranged on the paten in a prescribed order, which it would be foreign to our present purpose to describe. In the Eastern Church the Host is broken into four parts by the Priest, who recites an unvarying form of words. But this is not an Antiphon, and therefore beyond our province.

³ Festivals are divided in the Ambrosian rite into Solemnities of the Lord (Solemnitates Domini), and those which have the office solemn (officium solemne), or not solemn (officium non solemne).

Thus on Ascension Day—

Ant. ad crucem quinquies. "Ye men of Galilee, why stand ye gazing up into heaven? As ye have seen Him go into heaven, so shall He come." Hallel. Kyr. Kyr. KyR.

"Ye men," &c.
"Glory be," &c.
"Ye men," &c.
"As it was," &c.
"Ye men," &c.

An Antiphona ad crucem, apparently recited once only, often occurs in the Antiphonary of Gregory the Great, after the Antiphons of Vespers or Lauds. The early writers on the offices of the Roman Church make no mention of it, so that it was probably peculiar to the monastic rites, which more readily admitted additions of this nature. It has been conjectured that the monastic orders derived it from the Church of Milan.

Antiphona ad Accedentes et ad Accedendum.—An Antiphon in the Mozarabic Mass, sung after the Benediction, and before the Communion of the Priest. They do not often change. There is one which is said from the Vigil of Pentecost to the first day of Lent inclusive, one which is said from Easter Eve to the Vigil of Pentecost. In Lent they vary with the Sunday, that for the first Sunday being said on weekdays up to Thursday before Easter exclusive. The first of these which is said during the greater part of the year, is as follows:—

"O taste and see how gracious the Lord is." Allel. Allel. Allel.

V. "I will always give thanks unto the Lord. His praise shall ever be in my mouth." P. Allel. Allel. Allel.

V. "The Lord delivereth the souls of His servants; and all they that put their trust in Him shall not be dejected." P. Allel. Allel. Allel.

C. "Glory and honour be to the Father, and to the Son, and to the It by thost, world without end." Amen. P. Allel. Allel. Allel.

In the Apostolical Constitutions, Pa. 24 (Benedicam), from which this Antiphon is taken, is appointed to be said during the Communion, as it is in the Armenian Liturgy during the distribution of the Azymes.* (During the communion of the people another Canticle is sung.) S. Ambrose alluded to the practice in the words "Unite et Ecclesiam videns tantum Gratiam, hortatur, Gustate et videte."

The second Antiphon, that used between Easter and Pentecost, has reference to the Resurrection. It is adapted from the words of the Gospel narrative, and we need not quote it.

That for Thursday before Easter is much longer, and is broken into many more antiphonal clauses, and is an abstract of the Gospel narrative of the Institution of the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper. Those in use during Lent are of precisely the ordinary form.

There is nothing in the other Western Liturgies which exactly corresponds to this Antiphon. The Roman and Sarum Communito, and the Ambrosian Transitorium, which are the analogous parts of those offices, are said after the Reception. [H. J. H.]

ANTIPHONARIUM (also Antiphonale, Antiphonarius, Antiphonarius liber), an office book of the Latin Church, containing the Antiphons

* These correspond to the French pain bénit. [EULOGIÆ.]

and other portions of the Service, which were sung antiphonally.

The name Antiphonarium is applied to such books by John the Deacon, in his Life of Gregory the Great, who says that that Pontiff was the author of Antiphonaria. The complete collection, however, of Antiphons and Responsories, known by the general name of Antiphonarium or Responsorium, was usually divided into three parts in the Roman Church.

Amalarius writes: "It is to be observed that the volume which we call Antiphonarium has three names" (triu habet nomina) among the Romans. That part which we term Graduale (Gradale) they term Cantatory (Cantatorium), which is still, according to their old custom, in some churches bound in a separate volume. The following part they divide under two headings (in duobus nominibus). The part which contains the Responsories is called the Responsorial (Responsoriale); and the part which contains the Antiphons is called the Antiphonary (Antiphonarius)."

As to the name Cantatorium, we find in the "Ordo Romanus I." (§ 10) the direction:—"After he [the Subdeacon] has finished reading [the epistle], the singer (Cantor), with the Cantatory, mounts, and sings the Response." And Amalarius (De Eccl. Off. iii. 16) says: "The singer holds the Tablets (Tabulas)," where the word Tabulas is thought to mean the same thing as Cantatorium, i. e. the book itself.

The derivation of these words is obvious. The book was called Cantatorium from its containing the parts of the Service which were sung: Gradale, Gradalis, or Graduale (Gradual or Gralle), from their being sung at the steps of theambo or pulpit; and Tabule in all probability from the plates in which the book was contained, and which appear to have been of bone, or perhaps horn. Amalarius, in the context of the passage quoted, says that the tabule which the Cantor holds are usually made of bone (solent fieri de osse).

By whatever name this book was known, it contained those portions of the office of the Mass which were sung antiphonally, and was the first of the three divisions above alluded to. The second part, the Responsoriale, contained the Responsories after the lessons at Nocturns; and the third part, the Antiphonarium, the Antiphons for the Nocturns and diurnal offices.

The three parts together make up what is generally understood by the Antiphonale or Antiphonarium. The book is also sometimes called the Official Book, or the Office Book (Liber officialis). A MS. of the Monastery of St. Gall, of part of an Antiphonary and Responsorial of the usual type, is headed "Incipit officialis liber". It seems also to have been occasionally called the Capitular Book (Capitulare). In a MS. of St. Gall, of apparently about the beginning of the 11th century, we find the direction, "Responsoria et Antiphone sicut in Capitulari habetur"; and though, according to the old Roman use of words, "Capitulare" means the Book of Epistles and Gospels, the context in this place necessitates a De ord. Antiph., Prologus.

the meaning of Antiphony. The word occurs, moreover, throughout the MS. in the same sense.

Antiphonaries are sometimes found in old MSS. divided into two parts—one beginning with Advent, and ending with Wednesday or some later day (for the practice is not uniform) in the Holy Week, and the other comprising the rest of the year. Sometimes, again, they were divided into two parts, containing respectively the services for the daily and the nocturnal offices. Among the books of the Monastery of Plaa (Muratori, Ann. Ital. iv.) we meet with "Antiphonarius octo, quinque diurnas, tres nocturnas," and in an old inventory of the church of Tarbes "Antiphonarum de die" and "Antiphonarum de nocte are mentioned. We have thus to distinguish between—

(2.) The Liber Responsorialis et Antiphonarum, frequently, and in the Roman Church usually, called for brevity Antiphonarum, which comprised the contents of the last-mentioned book, together with the Responsories, originally divided into two distinct parts, but afterwards united into one, and arranged in order of sequence.

(3.) The Antiphonarum, otherwise called Graduale, Gradals, or Gradalls, and which contains those portions of the missal which are sung antiphonally. This is what is called by some Cantatorium.

Those which are most frequently met with are of classes 2 and 3.

2. As to the origin of Antiphonaries.—St. Gregory the Great is, as we have stated, usually considered to have been the author of Antiphonaries. It is, however, maintained by some,^a and with much reason, that as the use of Antiphons and Responsories in the Roman Church was older than the time of Gregory, it is likely that books of Antiphons and Responsories existed likewise previously, and that that Pontiff merely revised and rearranged the Antiphonal and Responsorial books he found in use, much in the same manner as he recast the old Sacramentary of Gelasius into what is now universally known as the Gregorian Sacramentary.

It has been also questioned by some whether Gregory, the reputed author of Antiphonaries, may not be Pope Gregory II. A. D. 715. But as the title of the Great was not ascribed to Gregory I. till long after his death,^b the argument founded on the absence of that title, which is much relied on, does not seem of great force.

The Roman Antiphony, substantially, we may suppose, as Gregory compiled it, was sent by Pope Adrian I. (A. D. 772-795) to Charlemagne. The received story is that the Pope sent two Antiphonaries to the Emperor by two singers (Cantores) of the Roman Church.^c Of these, one fell ill on his journey, and was received at the Monastery of St. Gall, to which monastery

^b In the writings of Isid. Gregory of Tours, &c. &c., he is called Gr. Gregorius, or Gregorius Paps, &c. Gregorius Ecclesiarum Doctor, but not Gregorius Magnus.

^c It was after this, according to Thomasius (Op. l. c. and Schenk), that the Antiphony was divided into the parts above named.

ANTIPHONARIUM

he left an Antiphony. The other book reached its destination, and was deposited at Metz. This Antiphony was held in high estimation, as we learn from St. Bernard, who says that the early Clisterians, who could find nothing more authentic, sent to Metz to transcribe the Antiphony, which was reputed to be Gregorian, for their use. It is also said that the clergy of Metz excelled the rest of the Gallic clergy in the Roman Church song (Romana Cantilena) as much as the Roman clergy excelled them sent by Pope Gregory IV. (A. D. 827-844) to the then Abbot of Corbie, which was known as the Corbie Antiphony; and as this often varies from that of Metz, it is inferred (as is probable) that certain changes and variations between different copies had by that time crept into the Antiphony as compiled by Gregory.

A Roman Antiphony was also sent by Pope Gregory IV. (A. D. 827-844) to the then Abbot of Corbie, which was known as the Corbie Antiphony; and as this often varies from that of Metz, it is inferred (as is probable) that certain changes and variations between different copies had by that time crept into the Antiphony as compiled by Gregory.

After the Gregorian Antiphony was introduced into France, it soon underwent many alterations and modifications.

Walafrid Strabo, who lived in the 9th century, says that the Church of Gaul, which possessed both learned men and ample materials for the divine offices of its own, intermingled some of these with the Roman offices. Hence a great variety in the usages of the different French churches, on which we need not touch.

3. As examples of the contents of these books, we will give a sketch of two.

(1.) The Antiphony for the Mass, or Gradual, attributed to St. Gregory. This is headed "In Dei nomine incipit Antiphonarius ordinatus a St. Gregorio per circulum anni."

This title is followed in the St. Gall MS. by the well-known lines—

"Gregorius traxit merita et omnia digna, Unde genus ducit Summum concedit Honorem," etc.

The book contains the various Antiphons sung at the Mass for the course of the ecclesiastical year, divided into two parts; that for the Sundays and movable feasts, and that for the Saints' days. The first part, corresponding to the Temporale of the Missals, has no special heading. It begins with a rule for finding Advent (that it must not begin before V. Kal. Dec., or after III. Non. Dec.) and then proceeds with the Sundays and Festivals in their course, beginning with the first Sunday in Advent (Dom. 1^{us} do Adventu Domini), giving for each day the Station, the Antiphona ad Introitum, with the tone for the Psalm; the Responsorium Gradale, the Tractus, when it occurs; the Antiphona ad Offertium, and the Antiphona ad Communionem, each with its versus ad repetendum, and the last with its psalm also.

In the arrangement of the year, there is little to be noticed. The Sundays during the summer are counted from the Octave of Pentecost, and are called Dominica prima post Octavam Pentecostas; and so on until the 5th, which is called in some MSS. Dominica prima post Natale Apostolorum, the numbering from the Octave of Pentecost being likewise continued till Advent. After six of these Sundays post-Natale, &c., comes

^a These are now called respectively the Gradual (Graduale, or Gradale), the Offertory (Offertorium), and the Communion (Communio), and the last two are shortened into a single verse.

^b St. Peter and Paul.

Dominica prima post St. Laurentii, and so on for six Sundays more, when we come to Dominica prima post S. Anicij, of which last set of Sundays seven are provided. Trinity Sunday does not appear at the last Sunday before Advent is called "de SS. Trinitate," [Lit.] Dom. xxiv. post Octav. Pentec. and the Antiphons are those now used in the Roman Church on Trinity Sunday, i.e., the Octave of Pentecost. The day being called Oct. Domini. There is also a second office provided for the same day, according to an old practice, called variously In Natal. Sanctae Mariae or De Sancta Maria in Octava Dni, or Ad honorem Sanctae Mariae.¹

The offices for Good Friday "ad crucem adorandam," and the Reproaches (called here simply Ad crucem Antiphona) and that for baptism on Easter Eve, as also various Litanies and other occasional additions to the usual office, are found in their proper places.

The second part is headed "De natalitia Sanctorum," and corresponds with the Synaxaria of later books. It begins with the festival of St. Lucy [Dec. 13], and ends with that of St. Andrew [Nov. 30]. This is followed in the St. Gall MS. by offices for St. Nicholas, the Octave of St. Andrew, St. Dismas [Dec. 11], and the Vigil of St. Thomas, and one for the Festival of St. Thomas, which differs from that previously given. There are also a variety of occasional and votive offices.

The Festival of All Saints is found in some MSS. There is one Festival of the Chair of St. Peter in one of the St. Gall copies on Jan. 18,^a and one in three MSS. on Feb. 22.^b There is no addition in either case of the words Romae or Antiochie, and both are not, it seems, found in the same MS.

As a specimen of the arrangement, take the first Mass for Christmas Day, that in media nocte or in galli cantu.

"VIII. Kalendas Januarii
Nativitas Domini nostri Jesu Christi.
Ad Sanctam Mariam.

Antiphona ad Introitum.

Dominus dixit ad me, Filius meus es tu, Ego hodie genui te. [Dominus dixit.]

Thm. II. oia. evonae.

Ps. 2. Quare fremuerunt gentes? et populi meditati sunt inania? [Dominus dixit.] [Gloria. Dominus dixit.]
V. ad repetendum. Postula a me, et dabo tibi gentes haereditatem tuam, et possessionem tuam terminos terrae. [Dominus dixit.]

Then follow successively the Responsorium gradale, the Antiphona ad offerendam, and the Antiphona ad Communionem, each with its versus, and the last with its psalm and versus ad repetendum. All these Antiphons are repeated in the manner which has been explained in the article on Antiphons; and as they are of the

² i.e. Requiem can be so sung.

³ This has been proposed as an argument for the Gregorian character of this Antiphony: it is said that St. Gregory was in the habit of celebrating two masses on this day, the second of which was "de Sancta Maria."

⁴ This corresponds with the present festival of the Chair of St. Peter at Rome.

⁵ This corresponds with the present festival of the Chair of St. Peter at Antioch.

ordinary form, it does not seem necessary to set them out at length here.

(2.) As an example of an Antiphony for the canonical hours, we will take the Antiphony of the Vatican Basilica. It is a MS. with musical notation differing from that adopted later. It represents the use of the Roman Church in the 12th century, and may be considered as embodying the substance of the Gregorian Antiphony, together with some later additions. It is headed:—"In nomine Domini Jesu Christi incipit Responsoriale et Antiphonarium Romanae Ecclesiae de circulo anni juxta veterem usum Canonico-rum de circulo anni juxta veterem usum Canonico-rum de Basilicæ Vaticanæ S. Petri." It begins with a calendar, with the usual couplets of hexameters at the head of each month, and then, without any further title, proceeds with the Antiphons at the first Vespers of the first Sunday in Advent, and thence onwards throughout the course of the year, giving the Antiphons at Nocturns and all the hours; and the Responses after the lessons at Nocturns. These Antiphons and Responses are so nearly the same as those in the present Roman Breviary that it is unnecessary to quote more than the following specimen of the manner in which they are set out:—

"Dominica I. de Adventu Domini.

Statu ad Sanctam Mariam Majorem ad Praesepe.
Istud Invitatorium cantandum eo die ad Matutinum usque in Vigil. Natal. Domini, exceptis Festivitatibus Sanctorum.

Regem veniurum Dominum, venit adoremus. Venite. In I. Nocturno.

Ant. Misere est Gabriel Angelus ad Mariam Virginem desponsatum Joseph. Psal. Beatus vir. Quare tremuerunt. Domine quid. Domine ne in.

Ant. Ave Maria, gratia plena, benedicta in inter mulieres. Psal. Domine Deus meus. Domine Dominus noster. Confitebor. In Domino confido.

Ant. Ne times Maria, invenisti gratiam apud Dominum; ecce concipies et paries Filium. Alleluia. Psal. Salvum me fac. Usquequo. Dixit insipiens. Domine quis.

V. Ostende nobis Domine misericordiam Tuam.

R. Et salutem Tuam da nobis.

Then follows a long rubric, directing how the Responses should be sung, and the three well-known Responses:—

- (1) Aspiclens a longe, &c.
- (2) Aspiclens in visu noctis, &c.
- (3) Misere est Gabriel, &c.

The lessons are not indicated; but the Responses are usually taken from the book which is being read in its course. Thus, on the octave of Pentecost the Books of the Kings were begun; and we have the rubric, "Historia Regum cantatur usque ad Kalendas Augusti," followed by a series of Responses taken or adapted from those books for use during that time.^a

The Antiphone, &c., for ordinary week days (Foriae) are given after the Octave of the Epiphany. On days on which there are nine lessons, the nine Responses are given. According to the present Roman custom, the ninth is replaced by Te Deum on those days on which it is said.

There is also an Antiphony of this description

^a Including what we call the Books of Samuel.

^b The older Roman custom was to sing in the Octave of Pentecost and during the following week Responses from the Psalms (de Psalmata) after that from the Kings.

attributed to St. Gregory, which exists at St. Gall. It is headed by an introduction in verse, which begins thus—

"Hic quoque Gregorius Patres de more secutus, Instauravit opus, auxit et in melius,
His vigili Clerus memem comanite substat Ordinibus, pascens hoc sua corda fava."
(and so on for 14 lines.)

The MS. bears the heading—"Incipit Responsoria et Antiphona per circulum anni." These are in the main identical with those in the Antiphony just mentioned, but are arranged with reference to the monastic distribution of psalms and lessons.

Towards the end of the Antiphony is a large number of Antiphons, given for the Benedicite, the Benedictus, and the Magnificat respectively.

In a portion of an Antiphony ("ex vetustissimo codice MS. membrance Palatino signatum. 487 in Bibliotheca Vaticana, in quo continentur vetustiores, germanoticeque libelli Ordinis Romani"), containing the service for Easter week, one or more of the Antiphons to the psalms for each day is given in Greek, but written in Roman characters, the others remaining in Latin. Thus at Vespers on Easter Tuesday, the Antiphon to Ps. cxli. is thus given—

"Alleluia. Prosebet: hos mu to nono mu: cline te ue hymon is ta thimata in stonatos mu.
F. Adico en parabolas to stoma mu: pthenomae probnata aparche."

Those to the other psalms at the same Vespers are in Latin.

This may suffice to explain the general nature of Antiphonaries. The consideration of the many points of interest which their details present is beyond the scope of this article. [H. J. H.]

ANTISTES.—This title appears to have been common to bishops and presbyters in the Early Church. As the name "sacerdos" is common to both estates in respect of the offices of divine service which were performed by both, so in respect of the government of the Church in which they were associated, we find them designated alike, sometimes as "Presbyters," as marking their age and dignity—sometimes in respect of their "cure" or charge—as "antistes," προεστῶτες, prepositi. Thus in the first canon of the Council of Antioch, A.D. 341, the bishop and presbyter are both expressly classed among the προεστῶτες, and the corresponding title of "Antistes" is evidently extended to the second order of the ministry by St. Augustine (Serm. 351 de Penitentia), as follows: "Venit (peccator) ad antistes, per quos illi in ecclesia claves ministrantur, et . . . a prepositis sacramentorum recipiunt satisfactionis suae modum." Here it is plain that "antistes in ecclesia" are not the bishop alone, but the bishop and the presbyters. This usage of the word agrees with that of Archisynagogus in the Jewish synagogue, and may have been suggested by it. (Thorndike, Primitive Government of Churches, vol. 1, p. 34.) [D. B.]

APOCREOS (Ἀποκρεως).—The Sunday in the Orthodox Greek Calendar, which corresponds to our Sexagesima Sunday, is called Κυριακή Ἀποκρεως, because from it the abstinence from flesh begins, though the more strict observance of the Lent fast does not commence until the following Sunday. [LENT.] The whole of the preceding week is also named from this Sunday, and is a kind of carnival. (Daniel, Codez Liturgicus, iv. 214; Suicer, Theaurus, s. v. Ἀποκρεως.) [C.]

APODOSIS (Ἀπόδοσις).—When the commemoration of a Festival is prolonged over several days, the last day of this period is called in the Greek Calendar the "Apodosis" of the Festival. For instance, on the Thursday before Pentecost is the Apodosis of the Ascension (Ἀποδοσις ἡ Ἐορτὴ τῆς Ἀναλήψεως). In this case, and in some others (for instance, the Exaltation of the Cross and the Transfiguration) the Apodosis coincides with the octave; but this is not always the case. Sometimes the period is more than an octave; Easter-day, for instance, has its Apodosis on the eve of the Ascension; but generally it is less; the Nativity of the Theotokos (Sept. 8), for instance, has its Apodosi Sept. 12. APOSTASY (ἀποστασία, apostasia, praevariatio) is of three kinds. 1. Apostasy a fide, or perfidiae; 2. Apostasy a religione; 3. Apostasy ab ordine suscepto. Of these the two last will be more appropriately considered under the articles MONASTICISM and DESERPTION.

Apostasy a fide is the voluntary and complete abandonment of the Faith by those who have been made members of the Church by baptism. It is voluntary, and herein to be distinguished from the sin of the lapsed [LAPSE], who fall away through compulsion or the fear of death; it is also complete, and consequently a graver crime than heresy, which is the denial of one or more of the articles of the Faith, but not an entire rejection of the Faith itself. Lastly, Apostasy is an abandonment of the Faith, and therefore an offence which could only be committed by members of the Church, by those who had in baptism taken the soldier's oath to fight under her standard. For this reason apostates were accounted to be traitors of their Master's cause, and deserters from the ranks in which they had sworn to serve. "Praevariatores eos existimamus, qui susceptam fidem et cogitationem Dei adeptam relinquunt; aliorum pollicitos, et aliud nunc agentes" (St. Hilary, Pict. in Ps. 118, vers. 119).

It would also appear that catechumens were by some considered capable of committing the sin of apostasy (Cod. Theod., De Apostat. xvi. 7, 2), although their guilt was not so great as that of the baptized apostate.

Apostates a fide were of two classes: those who became Jews, and those who became Pagans. Of the former class there were those who entirely abandoned the Christian Faith, and who therefore were properly called apostates; and those who did not altogether reject it, but mingled together Christianity and Judaism, and, as it were, made for themselves a new religion. Such were the Coelicolae, Cerinthiani, Ebionaei, Nazaraei, Elcesaei, and Samsaei. There were others, again, who were also called apostates, who, without embracing any distinctive Jewish doctrines, observed parts of the ceremonial law, such as resting on the Sabbath, or who kept the Jewish feasts and fasts, or consulted Jews with the object of procuring charms for the cure of sicknesses.

And, secondly, there were those who voluntarily abandoned Christianity and returned to heathenism. And persons, who without going to this length, accepted the office of flames, or who attended sacrifices (except in the discharge of duty), or joined as actors, stage players, or charioteers in the heathen games, or who sold animals or incense for sacrifice, or manufactured idols and the like, were considered to have betrayed their faith and to be guilty of a sin almost as grave as that of apostasy, and to merit the name of apostates (Devoty. Inst. Can. iv. 3; Bingham, Antiq. xvi. 6, 4).

The crime of apostasy was punished in the same way as heresy, though it was a graver offence. There are also special enactments in reference to it, both in the canons of Councils and in the constitutions of the Christian emperors.

By the 11th canon of the Oecumenical Council of Nicaea (A.D. 325), those who had voluntarily denied Christ, if they gave proof of hearty repentance, were admitted for three years amongst the audientes. For the next seven years they were permitted to become substrati, and were obliged to leave the church at the same time as the catechumens. After the expiration of this term they were allowed to join as consistentes in the prayers of the faithful; but two years had still to elapse before they were permitted to make oblations, or to partake of the Holy Eucharist; then they were said ἐλθεῖν ἐπὶ τὸ ἑτάειον (cf. Beveridge, Pand. Can. Annotationes in loc., and Bingham, Antiq. viii. 3; xviii. 1).

These provisions were an amelioration of the earlier discipline of the Church, as we learn from St. Cyprian (A.D. 252). "Apostatae vero et desertores vel adversarii et hostes et Christi Ecclesiam dissipantes, nec, si accisi praenominata foris fuerint, admitti secundum Apostolum possunt ad ecclesiae pacem, quando: Spiritus nec Ecclesiae tenuerunt unitatem" (St. Cyprian, Ep. lv. ad fin.).

By the 63rd (or 64th) of the Canons of the Apostles, clerks who went into synagogues to pray were deposed and excommunicated; and if laymen committed a like offence they were excommunicated (on the interpretation of this canon with regard to the question whether or not clerks were to be excommunicated as well as deposed, see Beveridge, Pand. Can. Annotationes, in loc.). The same punishments were by the 65th (or 66th) canon inflicted on clerks and laymen who fasted on the Lord's Day, or upon any Sabbath Day except the Great Sabbath, Easter Eve; and by the 69th (or 70th) canon, those were included who observed Jewish fasts or feasts, or (canon 70 or 71) who gave oil for consumption in synagogues or heathen temples.

By the 11th canon of the "Concilium Quini- sextum," or "in Trullo" (A.D. 691 or 692), the clergy and laity were forbidden—the former under pain of deposition, and the latter under pain of excommunication—to eat unleavened bread with Jews, or to have any friendly intercourse with them, or to consult them in sickness, or even to enter the baths in their company.

In Africa, by the 35th canon of the 3rd Council of Carthage (A.D. 397) "Apostaticis conversis vel reversis ad Dominum gratia vel reconciliatio non negetur."

In the East, by the 29th canon of the Council of Laodicea (A.D. 365, according to Beveridge) Christians were forbidden to Judaize (ἰουδαΐζειν) under the penalty of anathema. By the 37th and following canons of the same Council they were forbidden to be present at Jewish or Pagan feasts.

In Spain, the Council of Eliberis (A.D. 305 or 306) contains several provisions for the suppression and punishment of apostasy; for example, by the first canon persons of full age, who after baptism went to a heathen temple and sacrificed to an idol were refused communion, even at the hour of death. By the 46th canon of the same Council apostates who have not been guilty of idolatry are admitted to communion after ten years' penance; by the 49th the blessing of the fruits of the earth by Jews is forbidden, and those who allow that ceremony to be performed are cast out altogether from the Church. Upon this canon Hefele (Concilien-geschichte, i. 148) observes: "In Spain the Jews had become so numerous and powerful during the early ages of the Christian era that they believed they might venture to attempt to convert the whole country. . . There is no doubt that at that period many Christians in Spain of high standing became converts to Judaism."

Again, by the 59th canon of the 4th Council of Toledo (A.D. 633), apostate Jews who practise circumcision are punished; but (canon 81) their children, if believers, are not excluded from succession to their property. The next canon (62) forbids any intercourse between converted Jews and those who remain in their old faith; and there are several other canons which show that apostasy to Judaism was still a prevalent crime in Spain; as, for instance, the 64th canon, which ordains that the evidence of apostate Jews should not be received in a court of justice.

In the French Councils there are several canons relating to apostasy. By the 22nd canon of the 1st Council of Ayles (A.D. 314) it was forbidden to give communion to apostates who sought it in sickness, until they were restored to health, and had exhibited proper evidence of their repentance.

By the 12th canon of the Council of Vannes (A.D. 465) the clergy were forbidden to attend Jewish banquets or to invite Jews to their own tables—a prohibition which was repeated in the 40th canon of the Council of Agde (A.D. 506), and extended to laymen by the 15th canon of the Council of Epone (A.D. 517), and also by the 13th canon of the 3rd Council of Orleans (A.D. 538), and the 15th canon of the 1st Council of Macon (A.D. 581).

In the collections of the Imperial Law—the 'Codex Theodosianus' (which was promulgated A.D. 438) contains various provisions made by the Christian emperors for the punishment of apostasy. Constantine the Great ordained (A.D. 315) that apostates to Judaism should suffer "poenae meritis" (Cod. Theod. xvi. 8, 1), which were defined by Constantius (A.D. 357) to be the confiscation of the property of the offender (Cod. Theod. xvi. 8, 7). They were deprived by Valentinian the Younger (A.D. 383) of the ius testandi, but the action upsetting the will had to be brought within five years of the death of the testator, and by persons who had not in his lifetime known of his offence, and remained silent (Cod. Theod. xvi. 7, 3). Apostates to Paganism were deprived by Theodosius the Great (A.D. 381) of the ius testandi (Cod. Theod. xvi. 7, 1); but another constitution of the same emperor, promulgated A.D. 384, made a distinction between the baptized (Christiani ac fideles) and catechumens (Christiani ac catechumeni), and the latter were permitted to execute testamentary dispositions in favour of their sons and brothers german. By this constitution it was further provided that apostates should not only be unable, with the foregoing exceptions, to bequeath property by will, but should also be incapable of receiving property under the will of another person (Cod. Theod. xvi. 7, 2). One day later Valentinian the Younger promulgated throughout the Western Empire the constitution cited above, which applied to all classes of apostates alike (Cod. Theod. xvi. 7, 3). By a constitution of the year 391 the same emperor ordained that baptized apostates professing Paganism should be deprived of the right of bequeathing by will, of receiving property under a will, of hearing witness in a court of justice, and of succeeding to an inheritance. They were also condemned "a consortio omnium segregari" (on the meaning of this expression see the note of Godefroi, in loc.), and were dismissed from all posts of civil dignity. It was also declared that these penalties remained in force even though the apostate repented of his sin—"perditis, hoc est sanctum Baptismum profanantibus, nullo remedio poenitentiae (quae solet aliis criminibus prodesse) succurritur" (Cod. Theod. xvi. 7, 4-5). Arcadius (A.D. 396) extended the power which his father Theodosius the Great had given to apostate catechumens to make certain testamentary dispositions, and ordained that all apostates, whether baptized or catechumens, should have the power to bequeath property to their father and mother, brother and sister, son and daughter, and grandson and granddaughter (Cod. Theod. xvi. 7, 6). The last constitution contained in the Codex Theodosianus under this title is a very severe enactment of Valentinian the Third (A.D. 426), abrogating the provisions of the above-cited constitution of Valentinian the Younger of the year 323, as far as it related to apostates to Paganism. Under its provisions a person could be accused of apostasy at any time, although five years may have passed since his death, and it was immaterial whether the accuser had or had not been privy to the offence. Apostates were also prohibited from disposing of their property by will and from alienating it by sale or gift (Cod. Theod. xvi. 7, ult.). The "Paratitulum" prefixed to this title in the edition of Godefroi (Leipzig, 1736, &c.) gives a brief but very useful summary of its contents.

The "Codex Repetitive Praelectionionis" promulgated by Justinian in December A.D. 534 contains a title, "De Apostatis" (Lib. i. tit. 7), the first four Sections of which relate to this subject, and consist of extracts from the "Codex Theodosianus."

The first section re-enacts the constitution of Constantius (A.D. 357), by which the property of apostate Jews is confiscated (Cod. Theod. xvi. 8, 7). The second section contains that part of the constitution of Valentinian the younger (A.D. 383), which limits the time in which an accusation of apostasy could be brought (Cod. Theod. xvi. 7, 3). In the third section the constitution of the same emperor (A.D. 391) is re-enacted, which is contained in the Codex Theodosianus (xvi. 7, 4), and is cited above. The fourth section repeats the enactment of Valentinian the Third (A.D. 426), by which very severe penalties were inflicted on apostates (Cod. Theod. xvi. 7, ult. cited above). It appears, therefore, that the legislation of Justinian was not more tolerant than that of his predecessors in its treatment of this offence.

Although beyond the limits of this article, it may be noted that the title of the Decretals relating to apostasy is the 9th title of the fifth book ("De Apostatis et Reiterantibus Baptisma"). The subject is also considered by St. Thomas Aquinas (Summa Theol. 2-2, quaestio 12). [I. B.]

στολος is used in the Greek Calendar to designate not only those who are called Apostles in the New Testament, but the Seventy Disciples and others who were companions of the Apostles, strictly so called. It is applied, for instance, to Agabus, Rufus, Asyncretus, and others, supposed to be of the Seventy (April 8); and to Ananias of Damascus (Oct. 1). But the Apostles, in the narrower sense, are distinguished from others to whom the title is applied by some epithet or description. For instance, Nov. 30 is described as the Festival ταῦ ἁγίου ἐνδοξου καὶ πανεσφύμου Ἀποστόλου Ἀνδρέου τοῦ Πρωτοκλήτου, κ.τ.λ.; SS. Peter and Paul are described by the terms πρωτοκροφηαῖοι, in addition to the epithets applied to St. Andrew. It is noteworthy that the Constantinople "Typicum" expressly forbids St. Peter to be called the Apostle of Rome, inasmuch as he was a teacher and enlightener of the whole world; and it hints that if any place is to be connected with his name, it should be Antioch (Daniel, Culex Lit. iv, 261).

The term Ἰσαβήταλος, the equal of the Apostles, is applied to

1. Bishops supposed to be consecrated by Apostles; as Abercius of Hierapolis (Oct. 22).

2. Holy women who were companions of the Apostles; as Mary Magdalene, Junia, and Thekla.

3. Princes who have aided the spread of the Faith; as Constantine and Helena in the Orthodox Greek Church, and Vladimir in the Russian Church.

4. The first preachers, or "Apostles," of the Faith in any country; as Nina, in the Georgian Calendar (Neale, Eastern Church, Introduct. p. 761). [C.]

APOSTLES IN CHRISTIAN ART. § 1.

In representations of the Twelve, antecedent to the year 1300 A.D. or thereabouts, only slight variations of treatment are to be observed, whether in Eastern or in Western monuments. It will be convenient to speak separately of these two classes.

§ 2. Of the Eastern and Greek Churches.—Eastern monuments of an early date are very limited in number, owing to the destructive zeal, first of the Iconoclasts, and afterwards, in many cases, of the Turks. And among these the only representations of the Twelve Apostles known to the present writer are the following. In an early Syriac manuscript of the Gospels written at Zagba in Mesopotamia in the year 585 A.D., now in the Library of the Medici at Florence, is a picture of the Ascension, in which twelve (not eleven only) Apostles are represented, the Virgin Mary standing in the midst of them (see this figure under ANAULS). Of about the same date are some mosaics in the church of St. Sophia at Thessalonica, figured by Fexier and Pullan in their 'Byzantine Architecture,' pl. xl., xli. Separate representations of many of the Apostles will be found among the illuminations of the Menologium Græcorum of the emperor Basil. These, though of considerably later date (10th or 11th century), are all but identical in character with those above mentioned. Indeed the religious art of the Greeks, as everything else pertaining to religion, has been stereotyped once for all from the close of the 8th century until now. "Greek art," says M. Didron, "is wholly independent of time and place. The painter of the Morea reproduces at this day art such as it was at Venice in the 10th century; and those Venetians again reproduce the art of Mount Athos four or five centuries before. The costume of the personages represented is everywhere and at all times the same, not only in shape, but in colour and drawing, even to the very number and size of the folds of a dress." For in the eyes of the Greeks, at all times, religious art has been, what one of the Fathers of the Seventh General Council described it—not a matter to be regulated by the inventive power of painters, but by the prescriptions and tradition of the Church (Labbe's Concil. tom. vii. col. 831).

§ 3. Early Monuments in the West.—Representations of the Apostles in monuments of early date, still existing in Italy and in France, are very numerous, and of very various kinds; as, for example, in mosaics, frescoes, marble sarcophagi, and even in smaller objects of art, such as vessels of glass or ornaments of bronze. The principal works in which these are figured or described are enumerated in § 12 below.

in the West.—Repre- monuments of early y and in France, are ry various kinds; as y precious, marble sarcophagi, objects of art, such ents of bronze. The these are figured or de- § 12 below.

§ 4. Costume and insignia.—In all the early monuments above referred to, whether of the East or of the West, in which the Twelve are represented, almost exactly the same costume and insignia are attributed to them. Only St. Peter and St. Paul [see PAUL, and PETER below] have any special attributes. The dress assigned to them is a long tunic reaching to the feet (with rare exceptions, which are confined, as far as the writer knows, to some of the Roman catacombs) and with a pallium (ladriov) as an outer garment. The insignia by which they are designated are a roll of a book (volumen) generally in the left hand, indicative of their office as Preachers of the Divine Word, or a chaplet (corona), also held in the hand, significant either of the Martyr's crown, or of what is but a slight variation of the same idea, the crown of Victory which fully unto the end. The scroll above spoken of is sometimes replaced by a codex or book of more modern form (this latter is generally the distinctive mark of a bishop). In the mosaics of St. Sophia at Thessalonica above mentioned (§ 2) the roll is assigned to some, the codex to others, while others are represented without either. [For an example of the codex assigned to an apostle in Western Art, see Ciampini, Vet. Mon. tom. ii. tab. xliii., a monument of the 9th century.] They are occasionally represented as seated on 'thrones' or chairs of state (see woodcut, p. 106) in reference to their delegated authority (compare Luke xxii. 30) to rule in Christ's name over the Church. And in one mosaic, probably of the 5th century, in the church of St. John in Fonte at Ravenna, all the Twelve wear a kind of tiara or peaked cap, suggestive of the thought that the office of the Apostles in the Church corresponds to that of the High Priest under the Law. [See further under TIARA.] This monument is engraved by Ciampini, Vet. Mon. tom. i. tab. lxx.

§ 5. Names of the Apostles in early Monuments.—In early representations of the whole number of the Twelve the addition of names to each is of very exceptional occurrence. The only example known to the present writer is that of a mosaic referred to above in the church of St. John in Fonte at Ravenna. The arrangement there is a circular one, the figures being so disposed that St. Peter and St. Paul occupy the principal position, while the names, and figures, of the rest occur in the following order: ANDREAS—JACOBS—JOANNES—PHILIPUS—BARTOLOMEUS—SIMON—JUDAS THADEUS—JACOBUS III.—MATHEUS—THOMAS. It will be observed that the number Twelve is obtained, after inserting the name of St. Paul, by omitting that of Matthias. This last omission is generally made in similar enumerations of the Twelve in later centuries.

§ 6. Mode of representation.—In Western monuments of the first eight centuries (the period with which we are here principally concerned) the Twelve are almost invariably represented as standing, or as seated, on either side of our Lord, who is either figured in His human person, or (much more rarely) symbolically designated. In either case He is distinguished from the Apostles themselves by conventional designations of higher dignity. And in the case of the Apostles themselves symbolical designations sometimes take the place of any more direct representation, while in other cases, as on many of the sarcophagi, the two modes of representation are combined.

§ 7. Direct representation.—In many early monuments (see under PAUL and PETER) there has been an evident attempt at portraiture in the case of the two "chiefest Apostles." Of the rest, some are represented as youthful appearance, and beardless, others as bearded, and of more advanced years. But beyond this no special traditional rules of representation can be traced in early monuments.

§ 8. Symbolical designation.—Of the symbols employed to represent the Twelve, the most common is that of twelve sheep, adopted (so it has been thought) with reference to those words of Our Lord, "Behold I send you forth as sheep in the midst of wolves." These twelve sheep are commonly represented six on either side of Our Lord (personally or symbolically represented), who is generally seen standing upon a rock, whence flow four streams. To such a representation Paulinus refers (in his Epist. xxxii. addressed to his friend Severus, bishop of Milevis in Africa; Migne, P. C. C. tom. lxi. p. 366) in speaking of his own church at Nola in Campania. He is writing circ. 400 A.D.

"Petram superstat Ipse petra Ecclesie,
De qua sonat quatuor fontes vivani, Evangelicæ, viva Christ! flumina."

The two groups, each of six sheep, are generally represented as issuing from two towers representing Bethlehem and Jerusalem, the cities of the birth and the passion of Our Lord, the beginning and the end, as it were, of that Life upon earth, of which the Apostles were the chosen witnesses. Another symbol, founded also, in all probability on words of Our Lord ("Be ye . . . harmless as doves," Matt. x. 16) is that of twelve doves. Paulinus, bishop of Nola, in the letter already quoted, speaks of a mosaic picture on the roof of the apse of his church, on which was represented, inter alia, a Cross surrounded with a 'Corona,' a circle of light, to use his own words, and round about this Corona the figures of twelve doves, emblematic of the twelve Apostles. Beneath this picture was the following inscription, descriptive of its meaning:—

"Pleno coruscant Trinitas mysterio;
Stat Christus acro; vox patris cælo tano;
Et per columbam spiritus æternus fluit,
Circum coronæ tunc dicit glorio,
Cui coronæ sunt corona Apostoli,
Quorum figura est in columbarum choro."

A representation* of the Twelve, nearly answering to this description, forms the frieze of an early sarcophagus preserved in the Museum at Marseilles, and figured below (after Millin, Voyages, etc. plate lvi. 6). Yet other symbols are occasionally used in designation of Apostles, but these, as being less capable of definite interpretation, are rather accompaniments of personal

* A crucifix with twelve doves upon the four portions of the cross itself, in the apse of the church of St. Clement at Rome, is of the 13th century. So Didron, in the Annales Archæologiques, tom. xxvi. p. 17. This cross is figured by Altamura, Spiegazione, &c., tom. i. p. 118.

representations of the Twelve, than substitutes for them. Such are palm trees, vines, and other trees, to which a mystical reference was given in Christian art as well as in early Christian literature. St. Hilary of Poitou, commenting on Matt. xiii. (the parable of the 'Sinapis' or Mustard Plant), sees in the seed committed to the ground, and then springing up therefrom, a type of Christ, and in the branches of the tree, put forth by the Power of Christ, and embracing the whole earth beneath their shade, a type of the Apostles, branches to which the Gentiles, like birds of the air, should fly from the world's troubling storms, and find rest. St. Augustine uses nearly similar language in reference to the same parable. (Sermo in Feste S. Laurentii.) And this traditional application affords a probable interpretation of the small bush-like trees^b which are seen associated in some early frescoes with figures of Our Lord and the Apostles. The symbolism of the vine resulted naturally from the words addressed to His disciples by Our Lord ("I am the vine; ye are the branches," Joh. xv. 5). The palm-tree, as the recognised symbol of victory and of triumph, was suggestive of the same thoughts as those indicated by the victor's chaplet (corona) which Apostles often bear in their hands, or have bestowed upon them by a hand from heaven.

Yet one other symbol may be referred to, unique of its kind, adopted, so it has been ingeniously suggested,^c by some poor man who could not by any other more elaborate means express the Christian faith and hope in which he rested. On the walls of the cemetery of St. Callistus is an inscription, in rude characters, much such as that here given:—

The central letters of the inscription are believed to represent the A and Ω, which frequently occur in early monuments as symbols of Our Lord; while the twelve letters on either side signify the twelve Apostles, who in early monuments, and especially on sarcophagi, are frequently represented, six on either hand.

§ 9. Later conventional designations of the different Apostles.—Christian art in the West for the last five centuries, or rather more, has assigned special attributes to each one of the Twelve, most of them having reference to late traditions concerning them, unknown to the early Church. These traditions, by their late date, lie beyond the range properly embraced by the present work. But for the sake of comparison and contrast with the older representations above described, it may be well very briefly to notice them. For fuller particulars, the reader should consult Didron's Manuel d'Iconographie (see below § 12) and Jameson's Sacred and Legendary Art.

§ 10. As Authors of separate Articles of the Creed.—Probably the earliest of these later modes (after 1300 A.D.) of designating the several Apostles, is that of assigning to each (written on a scroll held in the hand) the particular article of the Creed of which each was, by tradition, the author. (For the tradition as to this authorship, see Durand, Rationale, lib. iv. cap. xxv.) In the cathedral church of Aibi (Didron, Manuel d'Iconographie, p. 304) the Apostles are represented in this manner.

§ 11. Distinguished by special Insignia.—As an example of yet another mode of designating the Apostles individually, we may refer (with M. Didron) to a series of enameled figures in Limousin in the church of St. Peter at Chartrés. The Twelve are there represented with the following insignia:—St. Peter with the Keys; St. Paul with a Sword; St. Andrew with a Cross, saltier-wise; St. John with a Chalice; St. James the Less with a Book and a Club; St. James the Elder with a Pilgrim's Staff; a broad Hat with scallop-shells, and a Book; St. Thomas with an Architect's Square; St. Philip with a small

^h All the insignia here mentioned are assigned to St. James (the St. Iago of Spanish legend), as the patron of pilgrims. The pilgrimage to Compostella, the reputed place of St. Iago's burial, was a favourite object of medieval devotion.

For the Syriac MS. referred to in § 2, see the Bibliotheca Medicea of S. E. Assmannus, Florentinae, fol. 1742. For the Greek Monuments, see Texier and Pullan, Byzantine Architecture, fol. London, 1864. The Monologium Graecorum referred to in § 2 was published at Urbino, 3 vols. fol. 1727. And on the subject of the later Greek Religious Art generally, see Didron, Manuel d'Iconographie Chretienne, Grecque, et Latine, Paris, 1845. (This is a French translation of the Ἐμπνεῖα τῶν ζωγραφικῶν, or 'Painter's Guide' of Penselinos, a monk of Mount Athos in the 11th century, and the recognised authority in the school of Greek Art which has its centre in the same "holy mountain" to this day. It is enriched with very valuable notes by the editor. For what relates to the Apostles, see p. 299 sqq.) For early monuments at Rome and Ravenna—Ciampini, Vetera Monumenta, Rome, fol. 1699; and for those of the Roman Catacombs more particularly—Aringhi, Roma Subterranea, 2 vols. fol. For fol. 1732; and at Milan, Allegrezza (Giuseppe), Spiegazione o Riferimenti, etc., Milano, 4^o 1757. For early sarcophagi at Arles, Marseilles, Aix, and other towns in France, the chief authority is Millin, Voyages dans les Départemens du Midi de la France, 8^o and 4^o Paris, 1807-1811. One monument of special interest, that of the Sancta Pentecostiana at Rome (the figures of the Twelve, ten only of which now remain, are believed with good reason to be of the 4th century, though the upper part of the mosaic is of the 8th) may best be studied in the coloured drawing and description given by Labarte, Histoire des Arts Industriels, etc., vol. iv. p. 166 sqq., and the Album of Plates, vol. II. pl. cxxi. This mosaic is also represented in Gally Knight, Ecclesiastical Architecture of Italy (London, 1842), vol. I. pl. xxiii.

APOSTLES' FESTIVALS AND FASTS.

—1. Festivals.—1. In the Apostolical Constitutions (viii. 33, § 3) we find abstinence from labour enjoined on certain "days of the Apostles" (τὰς ἡμέρας τῶν ἀποστόλων ἀργεῖταιον), but « Petite croix de roseaux." So Didron. A reference given, suggests the explanation above given. The shape described is that of a traveler's staff; and the emblem marks the apostle as a preacher of Christ crucified to distant nations.

« See note 8, preceding page.

« According to Western tradition he was sawn and ender; but in the Greek representation of his martyrdom he is affixed to a cross exactly like that of our Saviour (Jameson, vol. I. p. 253).

what these days were does not appear, though the injunction to abstain from labour betokens a great festival.

2. As the services of Easter week, following the evangelic narrative of the events after the Resurrection, placed a commemoration of the solemn sending and consecration of the Apostles (St. John xx. 21-23) on the first Sunday after Easter, this day appears to have been sometimes called "the Sunday of the Apostles." This Sunday was one of the highest festivals in the Ethiopinn Calendar (Alt, Christliche Cultus, ii. 33, 184).

3. In the West the commemoration of all the Apostles was anciently joined with that of the two great Apostles, St. Peter and St. Paul; and this festival appears to have been, at the time of the Apostles; the only festival in honour of the Apostles; for we find in the Missa for that festival in the Leonine Sacramentary (Migne's Patrol. vol. 55, p. 44) an "oratio super oblata," which runs, "Omnipotens sempiterno Deus, qui nos omnium apostolorum merita sub tua tribuisti celebrare venerari." And this seems to have been the case also when the "Epistola ad Chromatium" quoted by Casforus (in Leonine Sacram. p. 44) was written; for we there read that the Apostles were commemorated on one day, "ut dies varii non videantur dividere quos una dignitas Apostolorum in coequesti gloriâ fecit esse sublejos."

4. It was no doubt from this close connection with the Festival of SS. Peter and Paul (June 29) that the Festival of the Twelve Apostles (Συναχὴ τῶν δώδεκα Ἀποστόλων) came to be celebrated in the orthodox Greek church on the morrow of that festival—June 30—as it is to this day. This is a great festival, with abstinence from labour (Ἀργία).

5. In the Armenian calendar, the Saturday of the sixth week after Pentecost is dedicated to the Twelve Holy Apostles, and their chiefs, Peter and Paul; and the Tuesday in the fifth week after the elevation of the Cross is dedicated to Ananias of Damascus, Matthias, Barnabas, Philip, Stephen, Silas and Silvanus, and the Twelve Apostles. (Alt, Christliche Cultus, ii. 242, 256.)

6. The Micrologus tells us (c. 55) that on May 1, "invenitur in Martyrologiis sive in Sacramentariis festivitas SS. Philippi et Jacob. et omnium Apostolorum." The existing Martyrologies and Sacramentaries, however, mention no commemoration on May 1, beyond that of SS. Philip and James; but the mention of a commemoration of all Apostles may have arisen from the "Deposition" of the bodies of SS. Philip and James in the "Basilica omnium Apostolorum." (Binterim's Denkwürdigkeiten, v. i. 365; Wetzer and Welte's Archäologie, xii. 57.)

7. The 15th of July is in the Roman calendar the Feast of the "Division of the Apostles," (Divisio SS. Apostolorum). This was probably intended to commemorate the traditional event related by Rufinus (H. P., l. 9), that the Apostles, before leaving Jerusalem to begin their work of preaching the Gospel to all nations, determined by lot the portions of the world which each should evangelise. By others, however, the Feast is supposed to commemorate the "Divisio octavium Petri et Pauli." The legend to which this refers is as follows:—The remains of St. Peter and St. Paul were placed together after their martyrdom, and when Pope Sylvester, at the consecration of the great church of St. Peter, desired to place the sacred remains of the patron saint in an altar, it was found impossible to distinguish them from those of St. Paul; but after fasting and prayer, a divine voice revealed that the larger bones were those of the Preacher, the smaller of the Fisherman; and they were consequently placed in the churches of St. Peter and St. Paul respectively. (Clampii, de Sacris Aedificiis, p. 53, quoting Beleh, Explicat. Divin. Offic. c. 138.)

11. Fasts.—1. As early as the Apostolical Constitutions (v. 20, § 7) we find the week following the octave of Pentecost marked as a fast. The intention of this probably was, as no fast was allowable in the joyful season between Pasch and Pentecost, that men should endeavour to render themselves fit recipients of the gifts of the Holy Spirit by subsequent mortification. This fast was afterwards extended to the eve of the Festival of SS. Peter and Paul, and as it now filled the whole space between the "Apostle Sunday" and the great commemorations of the Apostles on June 29 and June 30, it came to be called the "Apostles' Fast." Ἡστέια τῶν ἁγίων Ἀποστόλων. (Augusti, Handbuch der Christl. Archæologie, iii. 481.)

2. There is a collect for a Fast in the mass already referred to in the Leonine Sacramentary. This, perhaps, indicates that an extraordinary fast, instituted in the time of St. Leo for the relief of Rome, or for some other reason, concurred with the Festival of All Apostles. (Note in the Leonine Sacram. Migne's Patrol. vol. 55, p. 44.)

III. Dedications.—A church (Ματρίσιον), dedicated to the Twelve Apostles, second in splendor only to that of St. Sophia, was built at Constantinople by Constantine the Great, who intended it for the place of his own sepulture (Eusebius, Vita Constantini, lib. iv., cc. 58–60). He also dedicated at Capua, in honour of the Apostles, a church to which he gave the name of Constantinian (Liber Pontif., under 'Sylvester,' Muratori Scriptores, iii. 1). The ancient church at Rome dedicated to the Apostles, is said to have been begun by Pope Pelagius I. (555–560), and completed by his successor John III. (560–573). (Clampii, de Sacris Aedif. p. 137.) [C.]

APOSTOLUS, the formal missive of the judge of a lower court, whereby a cause was transferred to a higher court to which appeal had been made from him. See Justinian, Cod. vii. 62, &c. &c., and under APPEALS. [A. W. H.]

APOSTOLICAL CANONS. About 500 A.D., Dionysius Exiguus, a Roman monk of great learning, at the request of Stephen, Bishop of Salona, made a collection of Greek canons, translating them into Latin. At the head of this collection he placed 50 canons, with this title, "Incipiunt Regule Ecclesiasticæ sanctorum Apostolorum, prolatae per Clementem Ecclesie Romanæ Pontificem." At the same time, however, Dionysius says in the preface to his work, "In principio itaque canones, qui dicuntur Apostolorum, de Græcæ translationibus, quibus quædam plurimi consensus non præbuere faciem, hoc ipsum vestram nolimus ignorare sanctitatem, quamvis postea quædam constituta pontificum ex ipsis canonibus assumpta esse videantur."

These words obviously point to a difference of opinion prevailing in the Church, though it has been doubted by some whether the dissentients spoken of rejected the canons altogether, or merely denied that they were the work of the apostles. And with regard to the last clause, it is much disputed whether previous popes can be shown to have known and cited these canons. Hefele denies that "Pontifices" means Popes, and would understand it of bishops in their synodical constitutions.^b

The subsequent course taken by the Church of Rome in relation to these canons is not altogether clear. In the last decade of the 5th century Pope Gelasius published a decree De Libris non recipiendis, and in the text of this decree as it now stands in the Decretum Gratiani there appears, amongst other rejected works, 'Liber canonum Apostolorum apocryphus.' But it is said that these words are not found in the most ancient MSS. of the decree, and Hincmar of Rheims, in speaking of it, expressly says that Gelasius is silent as to the Apostolical Canons. Moreover, Dionysius, who was by birth a Scythian, does not seem to have come to Rome until after the death of Gelasius, and consequently his collection cannot have appeared at the time of the decree.^c

Hefele therefore thinks that the words in question were for the first time inserted by Pope Hormisdas (514–523), when he republished the decree 'De Libris non recipiendis' (Councils hiet. i. 719).^d If so, the point is not very material. It is clear that Dionysius, in setting forth a later collection during the popedom of Hormisdas (of which the preface alone is now extant) left out these canons. He says: "Canones qui dicuntur Apostolorum et Sardicensis concilii atque Atricanæ provincie quos non admisit universitas, ego quoque in hoc opere prætermissi, &c."^e

^a Bishop Pearson contends that Leo, Innocent, and Gelasius himself, refer to them (Vindice Ignat., part i. cap. iv.); but this has been as strongly denied. Bickell thinks that Dionysius may have had in view expressions of Siricius (Ep. ad Dio. Episc., anno 388) and Innocent (Ep. ad Victic., anno 404), which, however, he conceives him to have misunderstood (Arch. der Kirchenrechtl., p. 74). Von Drey seems to think the canons were not known at Rome till the version of Dionysius; but Hefele observes that they might have been known in their Greek form. Dionysius in his preface says that he had been exhorted to the work of translation by his friend Laurentius, who was "confusio præcæ translationis offensus." Does this point to an existing version of the canons, or is it to be understood of the other matters contained in his collection? The latter seems most in accordance with the received theory.

^b See his Conciliengeschichte, vol. i. p. 767. But unless it can be limited to East-ru bishops, this view would equally admit that the canons so quoted or relied on must have been known in the Western Church.

^c Dionysius says in his preface: "Nos qui eum (Gelasium) præsentia corporali non vidimus." This in itself would not be conclusive as to the decree, though the only alternative would be to admit that the canons were known at Rome before Dionysius's translation. Bishop Pearson seeks to throw doubt on the decree (Vindice Ignat., part i. cap. iv.); but much of his reasoning is not inconsistent with the theory of Hefele.

^d So too, apparently, Bickell, vol. i. p. 74.

^e Cited in Bickell (i. 75), who also mentions that they were omitted from the Spanish collection of canons in the 7th century, with these words: "Canones autem qui dicuntur Apostolorum, sed quia eodem nec sedes apostolica recipit, nec SS. patres illis consensum præbuerunt, but to a difference of Church, though it has then the dissentients none altogether, or were the work of the to the last clause, it previous popes can be cited these canons."

ken by the Church of Rome is not altogether of the 5th century decree De Libris non recitatis as it now appears, "Liber canonum But it is said that in the most ancient memoir of Rheims, it says that Gelasius is the author of the Canons. Moreover, a Scythian, does not until after the death of his collection cannot of the decree."

that the words in question inserted by Pope Horre-ban inserted the decree (Concilium hie, 1.

not very material. It setting forth a later dom of Hormisdas (of no extent) left out Canones qui dicuntur concilii atque Afridmisi universitas, ego rmitis, &c."*

at Leo, Innocent, and Gelasius. Ignat., part 1. cap. 1. is not only denied. Bickel thinks in view expressions of Innocent (Ep. ad Romanos, p. 74). Canons were not known at Antioch; but Hefele observes that he had been exhorted by his friend Laurentius, who is the author of the canons, or is it to be ascertained in his collection in accordance with the

vol. I. p. 767. But unless bishops, this view would be of no avail or relied on must be in Church.

"Nos qui cum (Gelasius) in his canones sunt in victimis." This in itself is to be decreed, though the only translation. Bishop Pearson in Concilium hie, 1.

vol. I. p. 74. He also mentions that they collection of canons in the translation. Bishop Pearson in Concilium hie, 1.

At all events it must be taken that the Church of Rome at the present day does not accept these canons as of apostolic authority. Though the citations made by Gratian under the head "De auctoritate et numero Canonum Apostolorum," are not very consistent with each other, yet the latest canonists speak more distinctly.

"Canones illi non sunt opus genuinum apostolorum, nec a' omni sacro immunes; merito tamen reputantur insigne monumentum disciplinae Ecclesiae per priora secula," says M. leard in his Prælectiones Juris Canonici at St. Sulpice (published with the approbation of the authorities of the Church) in 1852, and he then cites the Gelasian decree declaring them apocryphal.

Nevertheless great attention has been paid to them. Extracts were admitted by Gratian into the Decretum, and, in the words of Phillips ("Du Droit ecclésiastique dans ses Sources," Paris, 1852) "ils ont pris rang dans la législation canonique."

But we must turn to the 6th century. About fifty years after the work of Dionysius, John of Antioch, otherwise called Johannes Scholasticus, patriarch of Constantinople, set forth a σύνταγμα κανόνων, which contained not 50 but 85 Canons of the Apostles. And in the year 692 these were expressly recognized in the decrees of the Quinisextine Council, not only as binding canons, but (it would seem) as of apostolic origin.† They are therefore in force in the Greek Church.

How it came to pass that Dionysius translated only 50 does not appear. Some writers have supposed that he rejected what was not to be reconciled with the Roman practice.‡ But, as Hefele observes, this could hardly be his motive, inasmuch as he retains a canon as to the nullity of heretical baptism, which is at variance with the view of the Western Church. Hence it has been suggested that the MS. used by Dionysius was of a different class from that of John of Antioch (for they vary in some expressions, and have also a difference in the numbering of the canons), and that it may have had only the 50 translated by the former. And an inference has also been drawn that the 35 latter canons are of later date.§ Indeed, according to some, they are obviously of a different type, and were possibly added to the collection at the same time pro eo quod ab hæreticis sub nomine Apostolorum compositi dignoscuntur, quamvis in eisdem quaedam inveniantur verba, auctoritate tamen canonica et apostolica eorum gesta constat esse remota et inter apocryphica deputata."

"Ἐβαδὲ καὶ ταῦτο τῇ ἁγίᾳ ταύτῃ συνόδῳ ἐκάλιστά τε καὶ σπουδαίωτα, ὥστε μένειν καὶ ἀπὸ τοῦ νόμου βασιλέως καὶ ἀσφαλείᾳ πρὸς ψυχῶν θεραπεύειν καὶ λαοὺς παύειν τοῖς ὑπὸ τῶν πρὸ ἡμῶν ἁγίων καὶ μακαρίων πατέρων θεοθέτους καὶ ἐπινοήσαντας, ἀλλὰ μὴν καὶ παραθεθέντας ἡμῖν ὀνόματι τῶν ἁγίων καὶ ἑυδόκων ἀποστόλων ὑποθέσει. Canon II., cited in Ülzen, Pref. p. ix.

Beveridge argues that the word ὀνόματι shows that, while their validity as canons of the Church was admitted, their apostolic origin was not decided.† Contra Hefele, Concilium hie, 1. 788.

The additional 35 canons in the collection of Scholasticus have not been in any way recognized by the Church of Rome.

* As, for instance, De Marca; and see Ayliffe's Parergon, Introduct., p. iv.

† See on this subject, Hefele, l. 768. Scholasticus says there were previous collections containing 85.

that the canons were appended to the Constitutions.

It is time to come to the Canons themselves. Both in the collection of John of Antioch and in that of Dionysius they are alleged to have been drawn up by Clement in the directions of the Apostles. In several places the Apostles speak in the first person, and in the 85th canon Clement uses the first person singular of himself.

Their subjects are briefly as follow:—
1 & 2 (I. & II.). Bishop to be ordained by two or three bishops; presbyters and deacons, and the rest of the clerical body by one.
3 & 4 (III.) relate to what is proper to be offered at the altar; mentioning new corn, grapes, and oil, and incense at the time of the holy oblation.

5 (IV.). First-fruits of other things are to be sent to the clergy at their home, not brought to the altar.

6 (V.). Bishop or presbyter or deacon not to put away his wife under pretence of piety.

7 (VI.). Clergy not to take secular cares on them.

8 (VII.). Nor to keep Easter before the vernal equinox, according to the Jewish system.

9 (VIII.). Nor to fail to communicate without some good reason.

10 (IX.). Laity not to be present at the reading of the Scriptures without remaining for prayer and the Communion.

11 (X.). None to join in prayer, even in a house, with an excommunicate person.

12 (XI.). Clergy not to join in prayer with a deposed man as if he were still a cleric.

13 (XII. & XIII.). Clergy or lay persons, being under excommunication or not admitted to Communion, going to another city not to be received without letters.

14 (XIV.). Bishop not to leave his own diocese and invade another, even on request, except for good reasons, as in case he can confer spiritual benefit; nor even then except by the judgment of many other bishops, and at pressing request.

15 (XV.). If clergy leave their own diocese, and take up their abode in another without consent of their own bishop, they are not to perform clerical functions there.

16 (XVI.). Bishop of such diocese not to treat them as clergy.

17 (XVII.). One twice married after baptism, or who has taken a concubine, not to be a cleric.

18 (XVIII.). One who has married a widow or divorced woman, or a courtesan or a slave, or an actress, not to be admitted into the clerical body.

* So Bickell, l. 26 and 235. For the Constitutions, see the next article.

† Beveridge however contends, from the variations and omissions in MSS. and versions, that the introduction of the first person is a mere interpolation of late date, in order to promote the fiction of apostolic origin (cod. cau. in Cotel., vol. ii. p. 73, Appendix). See instances in Canons XXIX., L., LXXXII., LXXXV. The various readings may be seen in Ülzen's edition, and in Lagarde's Reliq. Jur. Ecclæs. Antiquæ.

‡ The numbering varies. This Canon III. of the Greek text is divided into two by Dionysius. The Arabic numerals represent the order in Dionysius; the Roman that in the Greek of Johannes Scholasticus. Cotelierus, again, gives a different numbering, making the canons only 76 in all.

19 (XIX.). Nor one who has married two sisters or his niece.

20 (XX.). Clergy not to become sureties.

21 (XXI.). One who has been made a eunuch by violence, or in a persecution, or was so born, may be a bishop.

22 (XXII.). But if made so by his own act, cannot be cleric.

23 (XXIII.). A cleric making himself so, to be deposed.

24 (XXIV.). A layman making himself a eunuch to be shut out from Communion for three years.

25 & 26 (XXV.). Clerics guilty of incontinence, perjury, or theft, to be deposed, but not excommunicated (citing Nah. 1, 9 οὐκ ἐδικήσας δις ἐπὶ τὸ αὐτό).

27 (XXVI.). None to marry after entering the clerical body, except readers and singers.

28 (XXVII.). Clergy not to strike offenders.

29 (XXVIII.). Clergy deposed not to presume to act, on pain of being wholly cut off from the Church.

30 (XXIX.). Bishop, &c. obtaining ordination by money to be deposed, and, together with him who ordained him, cut off from communion, as was Simon Magus by me, Peter.

31 (XXX.). Bishop obtaining a church by means of secular rulers to be deposed, &c.

32 (XXXI.). Presbyters not to set up a separate congregation and altar in contempt of his bishop, when the bishop is just and godly.

33 (XXXII.). Presbyter or deacon under sentence of his own bishop not to be received elsewhere.

34 (XXXIII.). Clergy from a distance not to be received without letters of commendation, nor unless they be preachers of godliness are they to have anything beyond the supply of their wants.

35 (XXXIV.). The bishops of every nation are to know who is chief among them, and to consider him their head, and do nothing without his judgment, except the affairs of their own dioceses, nor must he do anything without their judgment.

36 (XXXV.). Bishop not to ordain out of his diocese.

37 (XXXVI.). Clergy not to neglect to enter on the charge to which they are appointed, nor the people to refuse to receive them.

38 (XXXVII.). Synod of bishops to be held twice a year to settle controversies.

39 (XXXVIII.). Bishop to have care of all ecclesiastical affairs, but not to appropriate anything for his own family, except to grant them relief if in poverty.

40 (XXXIX. & XL.). Clergy to do nothing without bishop. Bishop to keep his own affairs separate from those of the Church, and to provide for his family out of his own property.

41 (XLI.). Bishop to have power over all ecclesiastical affairs, and to distribute through the presbyters and deacons, and to have a share himself if required.

42 (XLII.). Cleric not to play dice or take to drinking.

43 (XLIII.). Same as to subdeacon, reader, singer, or layman.

44 (XLIV.). Clergy not to take usury.

45 (XLV.). Clergy not to pray with heretics, still less to allow them to act as clergy.

APOSTOLICAL CANONS

46 (XLVI.). Clergy not to recognize heretical baptism or sacrifice.

47 (XLVII.). Clergy not to rebaptize one truly baptized, nor to omit to baptize one polluted by the ungodly, unless otherwise he contemns the cross and death of the Lord, and does not distinguish true priests from false.

48 (XLVIII.). Layman who has taken away his wife not to take another, nor to take a divorced woman.

49 (XLIX.). Baptism to be in name of Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, not of three eternal, or three sons, or three paracletes.

50 (L.). Baptism to be performed by three immersions, making one inflation—not one single immersion into the Lord's death.

LI. Clergy not to hold marriage or the use of meat and wine things evil in themselves, or to abstain on any other than ascetic grounds.

LII. Bishop or presbyter to receive, not to reject penitents.

LIII. Clergy not to refuse to partake of meat and wine on feast days [as if evil, or on other than ascetic grounds].

LIV. Clerics not to eat in taverns except on a journey.

LV. Clerics not to insult bishop.

LVI. Nor presbyter or deacon.

LVII. Nor to mock the maimed, deaf, dumb, blind, or lame, nor must a layman do so.

LVIII. Bishops and presbyters not to neglect their clergy or people.

LIX. Nor to refuse succour to the needy clergy.

LX. Nor to publish in the church as sacred works forged by the ungodly in false names.

LXI. Those convicted of incontinence or other forbidden practices not to be admitted into the clerical body.

LXII. Clerics from fear of Jew or Gentile or heretic denying Christ to be excommunicated, or if only denying that they are clerics, to be deposed. On repentance, to be admitted as laymen.

LXIII. Cleric eating blood, or things toru by beasts, or dying of themselves, to be deposed, on account of the prohibition in the law. Laymen doing so to be excommunicated.

LXIV. Cleric or layman entering synagogue of Jews or heretics to pray, to be deposed and excommunicated.

LXV. Cleric in a struggle striking a single blow that proves mortal to be deposed for his precipitancy. Laymen to be excommunicated.

LXVI. Neither cleric nor layman to fast on Sunday or on any Saturday but one.

LXVII. Any one doing violence to an betrothed virgin to be excommunicated. He may not take another, but must keep her, though poor.

LXVIII. Clergy not to be ordained a second time, unless when ordained by heretics, for those baptized or ordained by heretics have not really been brought into the number of the faithful or of the clergy.

LXIX. Bishop, presbyter, deacon, reader, or singer, not fasting in the holy forty days, or on the fourth and sixth days, to be deposed, unless summoned by the bishops; and if he appear and confess the charge, or be proved guilty, to have appropriate sentence; but if he do not obey the summons, then to be summoned a second and third time by two bishops personally; and if he still be contumacious, then the Synod is to make the fit decree against him, that he may not appear to gain anything by evading justice.

LXXV. No heretic, nor less than two witnesses, even of the faithful, to be received against a bishop (Deut. 19, 15).

LXXVI. Bishop not to ordain relatives bishops out of favour or affection.

LXXVII. One having an eye injured or lame

APOSTOLICAL CANONS 113

Mark's, Luke's, John's; fourteen epistles of Paul; two epistles of Peter; three of John; one of James; one of Jude; two epistles of Clement;
and the regulations addressed to you bishops through me, Clement, in eight books, which it is not right to publish before all, on account of the mysteries in them; and the Acts of us, the Apostles.

The above is merely the substance of the canons in an abridged form. It will not of course supersede the necessity of referring to the original in order to form an exact judgment. For the sake of brevity the penalties have been in most cases omitted. They are usually deposition for the clergy, excommunication for laymen.

Turrianus attempted to maintain that these canons really are what they profess to be, the genuine work of the apostles. Duillé, on the other hand, contended that they were a production of the middle or end of the 5th century.
Against him Bishop Beveridge entered the field;
and in two treatises of great learning, acuteness,
and vigour, sought to show that though not the work of the apostles themselves, they were yet
of great antiquity, being in substance the decrees
of primitive Synods convened in different places and at different times during the latter part of the 2nd, or at latest the earlier part of the 3rd century. And he further thinks that during the 3rd century they were brought together and formed into a collection or Codex Canonum, which was recognized, and cited as of authority
in the Church.^c

Bishop Pearson also holds the canons in a collected form to have been in existence prior to the Council of Nice (Vindic. Inqut. part i. cap. iv. in Cotel. vol. ii. append. p. 295).

It will be well to endeavour to give some samples of the evidence which Beveridge adduces
to show that the canons are quoted in all events from the first part of the 4th century downwards.

George of Cappadocia buys the favour of the Prefect of Egypt, and is thrust into the bishopric of Alexandria. Athanasius thereupon says, τὸ τοιοῦτον ἐκκλησιαστικὸν κανόνας παραλάσσει: (ad ubique orthod. c. 1, p. 945). The reference, it is alleged, is to Apost. Can. 30 (xxix.) and 31 (xxx.)

^d Judicium in Cotel. vol. i. pp. 436-441; and see *Cod.
Can.* in Cotel. vol. ii. Appendix, pp. 8-10, et alibi. He appears to think that in many cases they may represent apostolical traditions. They were called "apostolical" from this feeling, and also because framed by apostolical
men. He allows, however, that they were probably collected by divers persons, some of whom put together more, some fewer. Irenæus Dionysius is found only 60 in the Codex from which he translated, while Scostasticus found 85. Hincmar of Rheims is cited by Beveridge as on his side; but it would seem that he looked on the Apostolical Canons as collections of apostolical traditions made by pious persons, rather than as decrees of synods. He speaks of them as "antiquum episcoporum consilio liberè independent celebrata, a devotis quibusque collecta."
See Cod. Can. in Cotel. vol. ii. App. p. 12.

^e The question of the collection, however, stands on very different grounds from that of the antiquity of particular canons, and the two points should be kept separate in investigating the subject.

APOSTOLICAL CANONS

at the beginning of the 6th century, when the whole 85 were appended to the constitutions.

Bickell while adopting a similar theory does not press it so far. He believes the collection to have been made out of like materials to those specified by Drey, but to be not later than the end of the 4th century...

This Clem. Rom. speaks of τὸν ἀποστολικὸν τῆς λαειτουργίας αὐτοῦ κανόνα (Ep. l. 41), and it is not to be supposed that he can here allude to any synodical decree...

The following table gives what he supposes to be the original of the various Canons—

I, II, VI, VII, XVII, XVIII, XX, XXVI, XXXIII, XLVI, XLVII, XLIX, LI, LII, LIII, LIX, LXIV, are all taken from the Apostolical Constitutions; the first six books of which he considers as of later half of 3rd century.

LXXIX. is from the 8th book, which is later, but before the year 325.

XXI.-XXIV., and LXXX., are taken from the Nicene Decrees.

VIII.-XVI., and XXVIII., and XXXI.-XLI., from those of Antioch.

XLV., LXX., LXXI., from those of Laodicea.

LXXV. from those of Constantinople, A.D. 381.

XXVII. from those of Constantinople, A.D. 394.

XXIX., LXVIII., LXXXIV., LXXXI., LXXXIII., from those of Chalcedon.

XIX. from Neocaesarea.

XXV. from a canonical letter of Basil.

LXIX. and LXX., out of the supposed Epistle of Ignatius, Ad Philadelph.

About a third of the Canons Drey treats as of unknown origin. The subject matter of many of them he considers may be more ancient, but not in the form of canons.

As to the distinction said to be apparent between the first 50 Canons and the residu, see Bickell, l. 86 and 236.

For an examination of these instances from a contrary point of view, see Beveridge (Cod. Can. lib. l. cap. xl). But the reader should notice that in Nic. Can. 18, he inexactly translates ὡςπερ οὕτε ὁ κανὼν οὕτε ἡ συνήθεια παρῶντες by "ne canones nec consuetudinem esse," and neglects the words κατὰ κανόνα καὶ κατὰ τήν συνήθειαν at the end of the Canon. He understands the Canon of Neocaesarea, that there must be seven deacons, κατὰ τὸν κανόνα, to allude to Acts vi. (the written law of Scrip-

Bickell also thus interprets the letter of Alexander to Meletius, and that of Constantine, which as we have seen (vide, p. 114) Beveridge takes as allusions to the apostolical canons.

In short Von Drey and Bickell maintain that the instances brought forward by Beveridge are not really proofs that the set of canons called apostolical are there quoted or referred to, but rather that allusion is made to broad and generally acknowledged principles of ecclesiastical action and practice, whether written or unwritten; (see Bickell, l. p. 2, and p. 81, 82, and the notes). But they go further and proceed to allude on their side what they consider to be a positive and decisive argument. Many canons of the Council of Antioch, A.D. 341, correspond not only in subject but to a very remarkable degree in actual phraseology with the apostolical canons. Yet they never quote them, at least nominally.

The following table gives the parallel cases:— Antioch I. compared with Can. Apost. VII.

Table with 4 columns: Antioch Canon, Apost. Canon, and corresponding references. Rows include: II. (IX, X, XI, XII, XIII), III. (XV, XVI), IV. (XXVII), V. (XXXI), VI. (XXXII), VII, VIII. (XII, XXXIII), IX. (XXXIV), X. (XXXV), XVII, XVIII. (XXXVI), XX. (XXXVII), XXI. (XIV), XXII. (XXXV), XXIII. (LXXVI), XXIV. (XL), XXV. (XLI).

On this state of facts Von Drey and Bickell maintain that the apostolical canons are obviously borrowed from those of Antioch, while Beveridge argues that the converse is the case. The argument turns too much on a close comparison of phrases, and of the respective omissions, additions, and modifications, to admit of being presented in an abridged form. It will be found on one side to some extent in Bickell, vol. i. p. 79, et seq., and p. 230, et seq. (who gives ture). Some might possibly contend that the words of the Epistle of Alexander (supra, p. 114) refer to 2nd Epist. John 10. He also deals with a Canon of Ancyra (Can. 21), which mentions that ὁ παύσας ὄρος refused communion, except on the death-bed, to unchaste women guilty of abortion. This Beveridge argues does not mean a "Canon" at all, but rather a decision of Church discipline. Hefele, on the other hand, thinks it alludes to a Canon of Elvira, refusing the sacrament to such cases at death (Conciliengesch. l. 208).

As to a certain extent, Beveridge discusses this theory when put forward by "Observernt" (see Cod. Can. lib. c. 11, p. 44), and appears to contend that κανὼν is not used for unwritten law, at all events by Councils in their decrees. There certainly seems some apparent distinction drawn in Nic. Can. 18, οὕτε ὁ κανὼν οὕτε ἡ συνήθεια παρῶντες.

It will be observed that all the Apostolical Canons except one, for which parallels are here found in the Antioch decrees, fall within the first 50; and the parallel to the LXXVth Canon is very far-fetched.

the references to the corresponding parts of Von Dray's work); and on the other, in Beveridge's Codex Canonum, lib. l. cap. lv. and cap. xi., and elsewhere in that treatise.³

As a general rule the apostolical canons are shorter, the Antioch canons fuller and more express a circumstance which leads Bickell to see in the former a compendium or abridgment of the latter, but which, according to Beveridge, proves the former to be the brief originals, of which the latter are the subsequent expansion.

Beveridge observes with some force that though the apostolical canons are not quoted by name, the canons of Antioch repeatedly profess to be in accordance with previous ecclesiastical rules, whereas the apostolical canons never mention any rules previously existing.⁴ Still the same question must arise here as in relation to the canons of Nice, viz., whether the allusion really is to pre-existing canons of councils, or whether the terms used are to be otherwise explained. And as regards the silence of the apostolical canons as to anything older than themselves, it must be recollectcd that any other course would have been self-contradictory. They could not pretend to be apostolic and yet rely on older authorities. Hence even had such references been found in the materials of which they were composed, these must have been struck out when they were put together in their present shape.

The synod of Antioch lying under the reproach of Arianism, it may seem improbable that any decrees should have been borrowed from it. To meet this objection Bickell urges that though the Antioch clergy were Arian, the Bishop Meletius was not un-orthodox, and was much respected by the Catholics. And he throws out the theory that the apostolical canons, which shew traces of Syrian phraseology, may be a sort of corpus canonum made at that period in Syria, and drawn up in part from the Antioch decrees, in part from the apostolical constitutions (which shew like marks of Syrian origin), and in part from other sources.⁵ This work, it is conjectured, Meletius brought with him when he came to the Council of Constantinople (where he died) in 381 A.D., and introduced it to the favourable notice of the clergy: a hypothesis which is thought to account for the apostolical canons being cited (as Bickell thinks for the first time) at the Provincial Synod of Constantinople, A.D. 394.

The opinion of Hefele may be worth stating. He thinks that though there is a good deal to be said for the theory that many of the apostolical canons were borrowed from those of Antioch, b The suggestion is there made that the Council studiously re-quoted certain orthodox canons, in order to gain a good reputation, while they thrust in here and there a canon of their own so framed as to tell against Athanasius and the Catholics. See Cod. Can. lib. l. cap. lv. ad fin.

³ However, it is to be observed that the 37-39 Canons of Laodicea, which closely resemble the LXX. and LXXXI. Apostolical Canons, do not in any way refer to them, though on Beveridge's theory the Apost. Canons must have been in the hands of the Fathers of Laodicea.

the converse is quite possible, and the point by no means settled. In regard to the Council of Nice, it would appear, he thinks, that it refers to older canons on the like subjects with those which it was enacting. And it is by no means impossible that the allusion may be to those which are now found among the apostolical canons, and which might have existed in the Church before they were incorporated in that collection. This view he thinks is supported by a letter from certain Egyptian bishops to Meletius at the commencement of the 4th century,* in which they complain of his having ordained beyond the limits of his diocese, which they allege is contrary to "mos divinus" and to "regula ecclesiastica;" and remind him that it is the "lex patrum et propatrum. . . in alienis parocciis necesse alieni episcoporum ordinationes celebrare." The inference, Hefele thinks, is almost irresistible that this refers to what is now the 38th (xxxv.) Apostolical Canon. And at all events he appears to hold with Bickell that the apostolical canons are referred to at Ephesus, Constantinople (A.D. 448), and Chalcedon. But such a view falls short of that of Beveridge.

Coming to the internal evidence, we find great stress to have been laid by Duillé, Von Drey, Bickell, and others on the contents of the canons, as distinctly marking their late date. Thus the 8th (viii.) (as to Easter) is in harmony with the present interpolated text of the apostolical constitutions, but is at variance with what Epiphanius read there, and with the Syrian didascalia (see infra, pp. 122, 123). It relates to the settlement of a particular phase of the Easter controversy which did not, according to Hefele, spring up until the 3rd century (Conciliengesch. i. 305 and 776).⁶ Moreover, if known and recognized previous to the Council of Nice, it seems extraordinary that this canon should not have been mentioned in Constantine's famous letter to the Nicene Fathers on the Easter Controversy (Ensch. Vita Const. lii. 18-20).

Canon 27 (xxvi.) hardly savours of a very early time. On this canon Beveridge (Annot. in Can. Apost., sub canone xxvi.) cites the Council of Chalcedon (A.D. 451), as saying that in many provinces it was permitted to readers and singers to marry; and understands it of those provinces in which the apostolical canons had been put in force, they having been, he says, originally passed in different localities by provincial synods. (See also his Not. de Can. Apost. § xii. in Cotel. vol. i. p. 436.) This seems to derogate somewhat from the general reception which he elsewhere appears disposed to claim for them. So limited an operation even in the 5th century is scarcely what was to be expected if the whole collection had been made, and promulgated a century and a half before.

The 31st (xxx.), the lxxxi., and lxxxiii., all appear to speak of a time when the empire was Christian (see Hefele, vol. i. p. 783, 789; Bickell, i. 80).⁷

* Given in Routh, Rel. Sacr. vol. iii. pp. 381, 382.

² If Hefele's view on this subject be accepted, Beveridge must be held to have confused the special point here ruled with other questions in dispute in the Easter controversy (Cod. Can. lib. 2, c. iii.).

⁷ Von Hefele, however, points out that it is difficult to suppose a council under the empire would act thus so openly against the emperor's interference. If so, some

APOSTOLICAL CANONS

The 35th (xxxiv.), recognizing a kind of metropolitan authority, has also been much insisted on by Von Drey and Bickell, as well as by Dullé, in proof of an origin not earlier than the 4th century (see contra, Bev. Cod. Can. lib. 2, cap. v..)
 The 40th suggests the remark that if it were in existence at the time of Cyprian, it would surely have been cited in the controversy as to heretical baptism. It agrees with the doctrine of the apos-tolical constitutions vi. 15, and according to some has probably been taken thence. Beveridge indeed observes that Cyprian (Epist. to Jubajanus) does rely on the decree of a synod held under the presidency of Agrippinus (see Jud. de Can. Ap.
§ xi. and Cod. Can. lib. 3, cap. xii.). This decree he seems to think may be the original of canon 40. If so, however, it would seem to shew
 the local and partial character of the apostolical canons, for we know that the Roman Church held at this very time a contrary view (Comp.
 the admissions of Iley, in Jud. de Can. § xli.)
 Again, other orders besides bishop, priest, and deacon appear in the clerical body. We have sub-deacons, readers, and singers (canon 43). Though the second of these is found in Tertullian, the first and last are not to be traced further back than the middle of the third century.

Not to mention other instances, it may in conclusion be observed that much contest has taken place over the list of canonical books in the last canon, and as to the reference therein to the constitutions, Beveridge thinks that the variation in that list from the canon of Scripture as eventually settled, is a proof that it was drawn up at an early date and before the final settlement was made. But at the same time he (somewhat inconsistently) is inclined to take refuge in the theory that this last canon has been interpolated.
 Here again it would be vain to attempt an abridgement of the argument (see Cod. Canon.
lib. 2, c. ix. and Jud. de Can. Apost. § xvi. et seq.)
 Before concluding, the opinions of one or two other writers must be mentioned. Krabbe thinks that at the end of the 4th or early in the 5th century, a writer of Arias or Macedonian tendencies drew up both the 8th book of the constitutions and the collection of canons, the former being composed out of precepts then in circulation under the Apostles' names, with many additions of his own, the latter out of canons made in different places during the 2nd and 3rd centuries, with any part might be hence gained for the theory that these canons (in the present form, at all events) did not really emanate from any council.

Beveridge observes that the Apostolical Canon merely speaks of τῶν πρώτων ἐπιστολῶν, whereas the corresponding Canon of Antioch has τὸν ἐν τῇ μητροπόλει
 προστάτη ἐπισκοπῆς; the latter being in conformity with the name metropolitan. This name did not arise till the 4th century; and he therefore thinks the Apostolical Canon is proved to be the older of the two, and to be before that era. Moreover the Canon of Antioch professes its enactment to be κατὰ τὸν ἀρχαιότερον κρητίσματα ἐν τῶν πατρῶν ἡμῶν κανόνα. It may be worth observing that there is no trace of a primacy among bishops in the Apostolical Constitutions, even in their present state.

Sometimes we find only a general expression, as in
 Can. 9 (viii.), which runs εἰ τις ἐπισκοπος ἢ presbiteros
 ἢ διάκονος ἢ ἐκ τῶν καναλόγων τοῦ ἱερατικοῦ; the latter words comprehending the other orders, and being apparently strictly equivalent to the phrase ἢ ἄλλος τοῦ κληρικῶν τῶν Ἀποστόλων in Can. 16.

APOSTOLICAL CANONS 117

the interpolation of the 7th and 85th canons forged by himself (see Ülzen, p. xvi. pref.).

Bunsen attaches much importance to the apostolical canons. He regards them as belonging to a class of ordinances which were "the local customs of the apostolical Church," i. e. if not of the Johannine age, at all events of that immediately succeeding. Yet such "never formed any real code of law, much less were they the decrees of synods or councils. Their collections nowhere had the force of law. Every ancient and great church presented modifications of the outlines and traditions here put together; but the constitutions and practices of all churches were built upon this groundwork" (Christ. and Mankind, vol. ii. 421). Our apostolical canon served this purpose in the Greek Church. The fiction which attributes them to the Apostles is probably ante-Nicene (vol. vii. p. 373); but they are now in an interpolated state.

Internal evidence shows, he thinks, that the original collection consisted of three chapters:—

- I. On ordination.
- II. On the oblation and communion.
- III. On acts which deprive of official rights or offices.

These comprise, with some exceptions, rather more than a third of the whole. To these, he says, were appended, but at an early date—
 IV. On the rights and duties of the bishop;
 and subsequently when the collection thus extended had been formed—
 V. Other grounds of deprivation.

Canon 6 (v.), 27 (xxvi.), he considers from internal evidence to be interpolations. Relying on the fact that the Coptic version (to which he attaches much weight, calling it "The Apostolical Constitutions of Alexandria") omits canons xvii., xlviii., xlix., 1, he treats these also as of later date. Canon 35 (xxxiv.) he appears to consider as a genuine early form of what subsequently became the system of metropolitan authority.

Coming then to what he styles "The Second Collection, which is not recognized by the Roman Church," i. e. to the canons not translated by Dionysius, he says they "bear a more decided character of a law book for the internal discipline of the clergy, with penal enactments."
 Canon lxxxi. is a repetition and confirmation of one in the first collection, viz., xi. compared with 31 (xxx.). This and canons lxxxi., lxxxi., are post-Nicene. The canon of Scripture also is spurious, as contradicting in many points the authentic traditions and assumptions of the early Church. It is wanting in the oldest MS., the Codex Barberinus (Christianity and Mankind, vol. ii. p. 227).

Ülzen, though modestly declining to express
 a positive judgment, evidently leans to the view of Bickell that the Antiochene decrees were the foundation of many of the canons, and regrets that Bunsen should have brought up again
 the theory of Beveridge, which, he considers,
 "receitiores omnes hujus rei indices refuta-verunt" (Pref. p. xvi. note, and p. xxi.).

There are Oriental versions of the apostolical canons. As Bunsen has observed, the Coptic and Aethiopic (the former being a very late but faithful translation from an old Sahidic version, see Tatam's Edition, 1848) omit certain of the canons relating to heretical baptism. Except in the special point here noted

is that that it is difficult to this and in Can. lxxxv. they do not differ in any important degree.* Some account of these versions, and also of the Syriac, may be seen in Bickell, vol. I. append. iv. He considers even the last-named to be later than our Greek text, and that little assistance is to be derived from them (see p. 215); others, however, as Bansen, rate them highly. The subject deserves further inquiry.

To attempt to decide, or even to sum up so large a controversy, and one on which scholars have differed so widely, would savour of presumption. It must suffice to indicate a few points on which the decision seems principally to turn. The first question is, Can we come to Beveridge's conclusion that a corpus canonum corresponding to our present collection, and possessing a generally recognized authority, really existed in the 3rd century? If so, much weight would deservedly belong to it.

But if an impartial view of Beveridge's arguments should be thought to lead merely to the conclusion, that a number of canons substantially agreeing with certain of those now in our collection, are quoted in the 4th century, and presumably existed some considerable time previously, we find ourselves in a different position.

In this case the contents of our present collection may possibly be nothing more than decrees of synods held at different and unknown times, and in different and uncertain places, not necessarily agreeing with each other, and not necessarily acknowledged by the Church at large, at all events till a later period.¹⁰

Again, if our present collection as a whole be not shown to be of the 3rd century, the question at once arises when and how it was made, and whether any modification or interpolation took place in the component materials when they were so collected together.¹¹

If it be to be looked upon as a digest of pre-existing canons brought together from various sources, it is necessary to consider how far the fact that any particular canon is authenticated

* In Can. LXXXV the Copic omits Esther from the O. T. and puts Judith and Tobit in place of Macabees, and after mentioning the 16 Prophets, it goes on: "These also let your young persons learn. And out of the Wisdom of Solomon and Esther, the three Books of Macabees, and the Wisdom of the Son of Sirach, there is much instruction." In N. T. it adds the Apocalypse, between Jude and the Epistles of Clement, and says nothing whatever about the eight books of regulations. "The Acts" are merely mentioned by that name, and follow the Gospels in the list.

¹ Some may, no doubt, be of an early date: thus Von Drey admits the probable antiquity of Can. I, Can. 10 (ix.), Can. 11 (x.), and others. See notes to the Canons in Hefele's Concilien-geschichte, vol. I. Append.; and comp. Bickell, vol. I. pp. 80, 81.

¹⁰ Beveridge speaks of the Apostolical Canons as the work "not of one but of many synods, and those held in divers places" (Cod. Can. lib. I. cap. II.). He thinks that the name of the month Hyperberetanus in Can. XXXVII. shews that Canon to be of Eastern origin; while he argues that the rule as to Easter in Can. VIII. proves that Canon to belong to the Western Church, inasmuch as the rule in question does not agree with the Oriental practice (Jud. de Can. a. 12; and s.e. 27.)

by being cited at Nice or elsewhere, in any degree authenticates any other canon not so cited. For unless some bond of connexion can be shewn, two canons standing in juxtaposition, may be of quite different age and origin.

These considerations have been principally framed with reference to the arguments of Beveridge. Of course if the views of Von Drey be adopted, any importance to be attached to the canons is materially diminished. Up to a certain point Beveridge certainly argues not only with ingenuity but force, and his reasoning does not seem to have received its fair share of attention from Von Drey and Bickell.¹² Still, after allowing all just weight to what he advances, a careful consideration of the points just suggested, may perhaps tend to shew that it is not difficult to see why controversialists of modern times have not ventured to lay much stress on the apostolical canons.

But there is another reason for this. No Western church can consistently proclaim their authority as they now stand. Protestant churches will hardly agree, for instance, to the rule that one who was ordained unmarried, may not afterwards marry, nor will they recognize the Macabees as a canonical book; while the canons which require a trine immersion in baptism, and the repetition of baptism when performed by heretics, will not be accepted by either Protestant or Roman Catholic.¹³

It may be proper to add that the canons here discussed are not the only series extant which claim apostolical authority.

Thus, for instance, besides the Διατάξεις τῶν ἁγίων ἀποστόλων περὶ χειροτονιῶν, διὰ Ἰεροπόλου καὶ Αἰ διατάξεις αἱ διὰ Κλημῆντος καὶ κανόνες ἐκκλησιαστικοὶ τῶν ἁγίων ἀποστόλων (both of which will be treated of in connexion with the Apost. Constitutions), we have certain pretended canons of an apostolic council at Antioch (the title being τῶν ἁγίων ἱερομόναχων Παμφίλου ἐκ τῆς ἐν Ἀντιοχείᾳ τῶν ἀποστόλων συνόδου, τούτ' ἐστὶν ἐκ τῶν συνοδικῶν αὐτῶν κανόνων μέρος τῶν ὑπ' αὐτοῦ εὐρεθέντων εἰς τὴν Ἐπιπέδου βιβλιοθήκην). They are in Bickell, i. 138, and Lagarde, Relig. Juris Eccles. p. 18.

We also find another set of apostolic canons (Ἦρος κανονικὸς τῶν ἁγίων ἀποστόλων) also published by Bickell, i. 131, and Lagarde, p. 36 (and of which the latter critic says that it is "nondum theologis satis consideratum"); and yet again a curious series of alleged apostolic ordinances (many of which resemble parts of the apostolical constitutions), in three ancient Syriac MSS., one translated into Greek by Lagarde (Rel. Jur. Eccles. p. 89), and two into English, with notes, by Cureton, in "Ancient Syriac Documents,

* Yet it is certainly remarkable that, when we first hear of these Canons, the question seems to be whether they are apostolic or apocryphal. The view that they are an authentic collection of post-apostolic synodical decrees does not seem to have been suggested itself.

¹² Refined distinctions have indeed been drawn to qualify the apparent sense of some of these Canons (see Rev. Cotel. Can. in Cotel. vol. II. Append. p. 100, and p. 130; but the difficulty attending them has probably had its share in preventing their full recognition. Hefele speaks of the Canon on Heretical Baptism as contrary to the Roman rule. Can. LXVI. is also contrary to the discipline of Rome; but not being in the first 50, it is held apocryphal.

It is not perhaps a wholly unreasonable hope that further researches into the ecclesiastical MSS. of Syria may be the means of throwing more light on the perplexing questions which surround alike the apostolic canons and the apostolic constitutions, both of them, in all probability, closely connected in their origin with that Church and country.†

APOSTOLICAL CONSTITUTIONS. The apostolic constitutions consist of eight books. Their general scope is the discussion and regulation (not in the way of concise rules, but in diffuse and hortatory language) of ecclesiastical affairs. In some places they enter upon the private behaviour proper for Christians; in other parts, in connexion with the services of the Church, they furnish liturgical forms of considerable length.‡ A large share of the whole is taken up with the subjects of the sacraments, and of the powers and duties of the clergy.

At the end of the eighth book, as now commonly edited, are to be found the apostolical canons. These we have already treated of in the previous article.

The constitutions, extant in MSS. in various libraries, appear during the middle ages to have been practically unknown. When in 1540,

* Bickell, however, warns us that the fruits of such researches must be used with caution, on account of the uncritical way in which various pieces are put together in these MSS. (vol. i. p. 218).

† These belong especially to the question of Liturgies, and will not therefore be considered at length here.

‡ An account of the MSS. is given in Utzen's edition, and by Lagarde in Bunsen's Christ. and Man., vol. vi. p. 25.

Carolus Capellus, a Venetian, printed an epitome of them in Latin translated from a MS. found in Crete, Bishop Jewell spoke of it as a work "in these countries never heard of nor seen before." (Park. Soc., Jew., i. 111.) In 1563 Bovius published a complete Latin version, and in the same year Turrianus edited the Greek text. It is not expedient here to pursue at any length the question of subsequent editions, but it may be as well to mention the standard one of Cotelerius in the Patres Apostolici and of Cotelierus in the Patres Apostolici and the useful and portable modern one of Utzen (Suerin, 1853). There is also one by Lagarde, Lipsiæ, 1862.

The constitutions profess on the face of them to be the words of the Apostles themselves written down by the hand of Clement of Rome.

Book 1 prescribes in great detail the manners and habits of the faithful laity.

Book 2 is concerned chiefly with the duties of the episcopal office, and with assemblies for divine worship.

Book 3 relates partly to widows, partly to the clergy, and to the administration of baptism.

Book 4 treats of sustentation of the poor, of domestic life, and of virgins.

Book 5 has mainly to do with the subjects of martyrs and martyrdom, and with the rules for feasts and fasts.

Book 6 speaks of schismatics and heretics, and enters upon the question of the Jewish law, and of the apostolic discipline substituted for it, and refers incidentally to certain customs and traditions both Jewish and Gentile.

Book 7 describes the two paths, the one of life, the other of spiritual death, and follows out this idea into several points of daily Christian life. Then follow rules for the teaching and baptism of catechumens, and liturgical precedents of prayer and praise, together with a list of bishops said to have been appointed by the Apostles themselves.

Book 8 discusses the diversity of spiritual gifts, and gives the forms of public prayer and administration of the communion, the election and ordinations of bishops, and other orders in the Church, and adds various ecclesiastical regulations.

This enumeration of the contents of the books is by no means exhaustive—the style being diffuse, and many other matters being incidentally touched upon—but is merely intended to give the reader some general notion of the nature of the work.

From the time when they were brought again to light down to the present moment, great differences of opinion have existed as to the date and authorship of the constitutions.

Turrianus and Bovius held them to be a genuine apostolical work, and were followed in this opinion by some subsequent theologians, and notably by the learned and eccentric Whiston, who maintained that (with the exception of a few gross interpolations) they were a record of what our Saviour himself delivered to his Apostles in the forty days after his resurrection, and that they were committed to writing and were sent to the churches by two apostolic councils held at Jerusalem, A. D. 64 and A. D. 67, and by a third held soon after the destruction of the city.

On the other hand Baronius, Bellarmine and Petavius declined to attach weight to the Constitutions, while Daillé and Blondel fiercely attacked their genuineness and authority.

Whiston's main argument was that the early Fathers constantly speak of διδασκαλία ἀποστολική, διατάξεις, διαταγαί, διατάγματα τῶν ἀποστόλων, κανὼν τῆς λειτουργίας, κανὼν τῆς ἀληθείας. and so forth, which is true; but he has not proved that these expressions are necessarily used of a definite book or books, and far less, that they relate to what we now have as the so-called Apostolical Constitutions.

It will be well to look at some of the chief of these passages from the Fathers.

We may begin with the words of Irenaeus in the fragment first printed by Pfaff in 1715. of ταῖς δευτέραις τῶν ἀποστόλων διατάξεσι παρηκολουθήκότες Ἰησοῦ τὸν κύριον νέαν προσφορὰν ἐν τῇ καιρῇ διαθήκῃ κἀεστηκέναι κατὰ τὸ Μαλαχίου κ. τ. λ.

Professor Lightfoot is disposed to see here a reference to the apostolical constitutions, but does not recognise the Pfluffian fragments as genuine.^c (Lightfoot On Epist. to Philippians, London, 1868, pp. 201, 202.) But if the genuineness be admitted, the reference is surely in the highest degree vague and uncertain. There is no evidence that the ordinances spoken of (whatever they were) were to be found in any one particular book—still less is there anything to identify what is spoken of with the apostolical constitutions either as we now have them, or under any earlier and simpler form. Moreover, it appears singular that if the Constitutions were really what the writer was relying on, he should not quote some passage from them. Instead of this, he goes on to cite the Revelation, the Epistle to the Romans, and the Epistle to the Hebrews, almost as if these contained the διατάξεις in question. What is meant by the word δευτέραι it seems very difficult to say with certainty.

Origen speaking of fasting (in his 10th Homily on Leviticus) says, "Sed est et alia adhuc religiosa [jejunandi ratio], ejus laus quorundam apostolorum literis prædicatur. Invenimus enim in quodam libello ab apostolis dictum, Beatus est qui etiam jejunat præ eo ut alat pauperem. Hujus jejunium valde acceptum est apud Deum et revera digne satis: imitatur enim illum qui animam suam posuit pro fratribus suis."

The terms in which Origen introduces this citation do not seem very appropriate to such a work as the Constitutions, nor in point of fact do the words (which seem meant as an exact quotation) occur in it. There is indeed (Book v. l.) a general exhortation to fast in order to give the food to the maims, but the passage has a primary reference (at all events) to saints imprisoned on account of the faith. There is, therefore, a considerable divergence between the words in Origen and those in the Constitutions; and we are hardly justified in seeing any reference to the latter in the former.^d

^c Hilgenfeld appears to take a like view, both as to the Apostolical Constitutions being intended, and as to the passage not being genuine. (Nov. Test. extra Canon. except. Fascic. iv. pp. 63, 84.) Bunsen thinks the Fragment genuine, and that it refers to some early "Ordinances," not necessarily the same as we now have: Christ. and Man., vol. ii. p. 398, et seq.

^d Prigā incl. too, "literae quorundam apostolorum" is not an apt designation of a work professing to represent the joint decrees of all.

A later treatise entitled 'De Aleatoribus,' of unknown date and authorship, erroneously ascribed to Cyprian, refers to a passage "in doctrinis apostolorum," relating to Church discipline upon offenders. Here again no effort has succeeded in tracing the words of the citation either in the constitutions or in any known work. There is, indeed, a passage of a similar effect (Book ii. c. 39), but the actual language is not the same; and a similarity of general tenor is not much to be relied upon, inasmuch as the subject in hand is a very common one.

We come now to Eusebius. In his list of books, after naming those generally allowed, and those which are ἀντιλεγόμενοι, he goes on—"We must rank as spurious (νόθοι) the account of the 'Acts of Paul,' the book called 'The Shepherd,' and the 'Revelation of Peter,' and besides these, the epistle circulated under the name of 'Bar-nabas,' and what are called the 'Teachings of the Apostles' (τῶν ἀποστόλων αἱ λεγόμεναι δι-δασκαί), and moreover, as I said, the 'Apocalypse of John,' if such an opinion seem correct, which some as I said reject, while others reckon it among the books generally received. We may add that some have reckoned in this division the Gospel according to the Hebrews, to which those Hebrews who have received [Jesus as] the Christ are especially attached. All these then will belong to the class of controverted books." (Euseb. Hist. Eccl. iii. 25.)

The place here given to the διδασκαί (even supposing them to be the constitutions) is inconsistent with their being held a genuine work of the Apostles. It speaks of them, however, as forming a well-known book, and from the context of the passage, they seem to be recognised as orthodox; but there is nothing to identify them directly with our present collection.

Athanasius, among books not canonical, but directed to be read by presbyters for instruction in godliness, enumerates the Wisdom of Solomon, the Wisdom of Sirach, Esther, Judith, Tobias, and what he styles διδασχὴ καλουμένη τῶν ἀποστόλων. The same remarks obviously apply to this Father as to Eusebius (Op. S. Athan. i. 963, Ed. Bened.).

The language of neither of them indicates that the work in question was looked upon as an authoritative collection of Church laws. Lagarde denies that either of them is to be considered as quoting any book of our constitutions, laying much stress on the distinction between διδασκαί and διατάξεις or διαταγαί ἀποστόλων. (Bunsen, Christ. and Man., vol. vi. p. 41.) Bunsen, however, himself is inclined to see here a real reference to a primitive form of the constitutions. (Ibid. vol. ii. p. 405.)

We now come to Epiphanius, who, writing at the close of the 4th century, has numerous explicit references to the διδασκαί of the Apostles, meaning thereby apparently some book of a similar kind to that which we now have. His view of its character and authority is to be found in the following passage:—

"For this purpose the Andrian themselves [a body of heretics] allege the Constitution of the Apostles, a work disputed indeed with the majority [of Christians] yet not worthy of rejection. For all canonical order is contained therein, and no point of the faith is falsified, nor yet of the confession, nor yet of the administrative system, nor yet of the administration (Hær. 70, No. 10; comp. also loc. cit. No. 11, 12; 75, No. 8; 80, No. 7.)

But when we examine his citations, we find that none of them agree exactly with our present text, while some of them vary from it so widely, supposition that they were meant to be made ad sensum not ad litteram. Even this resource fails in a famous passage, immediately following that just cited, where Epiphanius quotes the constitutions as directing Easter to be observed according to the Jewish reckoning, whereas in our present copies they expressly enjoin the other system. (See Book v. 17.)

In a work known as the opus imperfectum in Mathæum, once ascribed to Chrysostom, but now considered to have been the production of an unknown writer in the 5th century, there is a distinct reference to "the 8th book of the apostolic canons." And words to the effect of these quoted are found in the second chapter. Another citation, however, in the same writer cannot be verified at all.

It is not necessary to pursue the list further. From this time forwards references are found which can be verified with more or less exactness, and in the year 692 the council of Constantinople, known as Quinisextum, or the Trullan council, had the work under their consideration, but came to a formal decision, refusing to acknowledge it as authoritative on account of the extent to which it had been interpolated by the heterodox.

It appears then that we must conclude that there is no sufficient evidence that the Church generally received as of undoubted authority any collection of constitutions professing to have come from the Apostles themselves, or at least to be a trustworthy primitive record of their decisions. Even Epiphanius bases his approbation of the work of which he speaks on subjective grounds. He refers to it, because he thinks it orthodox, but admits that it was not received as a binding authority. Yet had such a work existed, it should seem that from its practical character it must have been widely known, perpetually cited, and generally acted upon.

Indeed that the so-called apostolic constitutions, as they now stand, are not the production of the Apostles or of apostolical men, will be clear to most readers from their scheme and contents. "Apostles," says the author of an article on the subject in the 'Christian Remembrancer' in 1851, "are brought together who never could have been together in this life; St. James, the greater (after he was beheaded), is made to sit in council with St. Paul (Lib. vi. c. 14), though elsewhere he is spoken of as dead (Lib. v. c. 7). Thus assembled, they condemn heresies and heretics by name who did not arise till after their death (Lib. vi. c. 8); they appoint the observance of the days of their death (Lib. vii. c. 33); nay, once they are even made to say, 'These are the names of the bishops whom we ordained in our lifetime' (Lib. viii. c. 47)."

Most persons will also be of opinion that there is a tone about the constitutions themselves which is by no means in harmony with what we know of apostolic times. Thus for instance, the honour given to the episcopate is excessive and hyperbolic.

οὗτος [i. e. ὁ ἐπίσκοπος] ὡμῶν βασιλεὺς καὶ συντάκτης οὗτος ὡμῶν ἐπιτελεῖ Θεὸς μετὰ Θεόν. ὡς δελεῖται τῆς παρ' ὡμῶν τιμῆς ἀπολαβεῖν (citing 1s. lxxvii. 6 and Exod. xxii. xxviii. in lxx.). Ὁ γὰρ ἐπίσκοπος προκαθεῖσθαι ὡμῶν ὡς Θεοῦ ἀξίᾳ περιτμυμένος, ἢ κρατεῖ τοῦ κλήρου καὶ τοῦ λαοῦ παντῶν ἔρχει (Book ii. 26; comp. also Book ii. 33).

And in Book vi. 2 we read—
εἰ γὰρ ὁ βασιλευὸς ἐπεγεύριμενος κολάσει τὸν ἕξοι. κἂν υἱὸς ἢ κἂν φίλος πῶς μάλλιν ὁ ἱερεῖον ἐπιστάμενος; Ὅσα γὰρ ἱερωσύνη βασιλείας ἀμείνων, περὶ ψυχῆς ἔχουσα τὸν ἀνάνα ποσοῦται καὶ βαρύτερον ἔχει τὴν τιμωρίαν ὁ ταύτη τυλιγμένη ἀνομιματεῖν, ἢ περὶ τῆ βασιλείας.

A system, too, of orders and classes in the Church stands out prominently, especially in the 8th book, of which there is no trace in the earliest days (see Bickell, vol. i. p. 62). Thus we have subdeacons, readers, &c., with minute directions for their appointment. Ceremonies also are multiplied. The use of oil and myrrh in baptism is enjoined (Book vii. 22), and the marriage of the clergy after ordination is forbidden (vi. 17).

We must therefore feel at once that we have passed into a different atmosphere from that of Clement's Epistle to the Corinthians, and that the connection of Clement's name with the work must be a fiction, no less than the assertion that he wrote its contents at the mouth of the apostles. Even those who think that they trace something like the origin of such a system in the letters of Ignatius must allow that it is here represented in a state of development which must have required a considerable period of time to bring about.

The questions, however, still remain:—

To what date are we to assign the work in the form in which it now exists?

Can we show that it was in any degree formed out of pre-existing materials?

Bishop Pearson¹ and Archbishop Usher regard the variations between the citations of Epiphanius, and what we read in our present copies of the constitutions, as conclusive evidence that there have been alterations and interpolations on a large scale since the time of that Father, and the latter of these writers thinks that the same falsifier has been at work here, who expanded the shorter epistles of Ignatius into the so-called longer epistles.²

According to Pearson, we should probably attribute the work in its existing form to about the middle of the 5th century, while Usher refuses to place it higher than the 6th century. If, on the other hand, we could suppose that Epiphanius quoted loosely, and that the book which he had may, with occasional exceptions, have resembled in substance what we now have,^k we should be able to put its antiquity somewhat higher. But whatever conclusion may be come to on this point, there is no satisfactory evidence to warrant its being assigned to any period sufficiently early to make it, as it stands, an authority as to apostolic usage.

But the question still remains. Can we trace its composition, and in any degree identify the materials out of which it has been put together?

That the work was a pure and simple forgery is improbable. Such was not the course which matters took in early days; nor would the measure of acceptance which it obtained be easily accounted for on this theory.

Moreover it contains passages which seem manifestly to belong to an early age. Thus in case of quarrels the Christian is recommended to seek reconciliation even at a loss to himself, καὶ μὴ ἀρξέσθω ἐπὶ κριτήριον ἔθνικόν (book ii. c. 45)—words which at all events savour of a time before the empire was Christian. So again, the secular judges are said to be ἔθνικοι καὶ οὐ γινώσκοντες θείοντα. So also martyrdom and persecution on account of Christianity are spoken of as by no means exclusively belonging to the past (see Lib. 5, init. et alibi).

And to mention but one more point, the charge of Arianism, which was at one time freely brought against the constitutions, and used to prove that they had been corrupted, if not forged, by heretics,^l has in later days been sometimes made the ground of an opposite inference. It is thought by some modern writers merely to show that the phrases excepted against date from a time before the controversy arose, and when therefore men spoke with less of dogmatic exactness.^m

Perhaps it is possible to go even a step further, at all events, by way of not unreasonable conjecture. We have seen that Whiston relied on a number of places in which the early Fathers speak of διδασχά, διδασκαλία, διατάξεις τῶν ἀποστόλων, and some years before Whiston wrote, Bishop Pearson (in his Vindicie Ignatianae) had suggested the idea that, so far as such expressions really referred to any specific works at all, they were to be understood of smaller, more ancient, and more fragmentary treatises, of a kind not rare in the Primitive Church, professing to contain the words of the apostles or of apostolical men on matters of doctrine and Church order. Some of these were the production of heretics, some were of an orthodox character. Those which related to doctrine were called didascalie, those which gave rules of ritual or discipline, διατάξεις or Constitutions. These works, written at different times and in different parts of the Church, furnished (as Pearson supposes) the materials to the compiler, who, with many alterations and interpolations formed out of them our present constitutions (Vindic. Ignat., Part i. c. 4).

Other critics have spoken in terms which seem rather to point to a gradual accretion, added to from time to time to express the Church system as developed, and modified at the periods when such additions were respectively made. Thus Lagarde says, "Communis virorum doctorum fere omnium nunc invaluit opinio, eas [Constitutiones] sæculo tertio clam secretissime et quum sex aliquando libris absolutæ fuissent, septimo et octavo actas esse postea" (Reliq. Juris Eccles. Antiq. 1856).

That the work as we have it is a composite one is indeed manifest enough "from the general want of internal unity, method, or connexion; the difference of style in the various portions, and sometimes statements almost contradictory; the same topics being treated over and over again in different places; besides a formal conclusion of the end of the sixth book, and other indications of their being distinct works joined together" (Christ. Remembr. ubi supra).

In the Paris Library is a Syriac MS. called the Didascalia or Catholic doctrine of the 12 Apostles and holy disciples of our Saviour. It contains in a shorter form much of the substance of the first six books of the constitutions, but with very great omissions, and with some variations and transpositions.

Its contents were printed in Syriac by De Lagarde (without his name) in 1854; and the same critic, in the 6th vol. of Bunsen's Christianity and Mankind, has published, 1st, our present text, with what he states to be the variations of the Syriac; and 2nd, a shorter Greek text or 'Didascalia Prior,' founded on the Syriac.ⁿ

Bickell, who, however, when he wrote had only seen extracts, thought this Syriac MS. a mere abridgement of the larger work, and therefore posterior in date to it, and adding little to our knowledge.

But Bunsen (Christianity and Mankind, vol. i. p. x.), Lagarde (Rel. Jur. Eccl. Ant. pref., p. iv.), and the author of the article in the Christian Remembrancer 1854, all agree that we have here an older and more primitive, if not the original work. Hilgenfeld says, "Æquidem et ipse Syriacam Didascalam ad hujus operis primitivam formam propius accedere existimo, sed eundem nunquam mutatum continere valde dubito." He concludes, on the whole, "tertio demum sæculo didascalia apostolica in eam formam reducta esse videtur, quam Eusebius et Athanasius narrant, quam recensionem a nostris constitutionibus apostolicis valde diversam fuisse antiquissima decent testimonia, præcipue Epiphanius. Ea autem ^k Comp. Bickell, l. pp. 67, 68, note. Epiphanius, however, never quotes from the 7th or 8th books, which on any theory are doubtless of late date.

^l See for instance Le Clerc, in Cotel. Patr. Apost. vol. ii. App. p. 492, et seq.; and Bruno, ibid. p. 171, et seq. Indeed Photius and the Trullan Council had imputed the same accusation (Niblioth. Cur. 112, 113).

^m See Bickell, p. 58, note, p. 61, and p. 69, note. Comp. Bull. Def. Fid. Nic. lib. 2, c. 3, § 4.

ⁿ It does not seem, however, that this literally represents the Syriac. For one of the passages given by Hilgenfeld (see infra), which undoubtedly exists in the Syriac, is not to be found in the 'Didascalia Prior.' It is much to be regretted that neither Lagarde nor any other Oriental scholar has published a literal translation of the Syriac text.

etiam a Syriaca didascalia quamvis cognata saepius discedunt." He thinks that the Syriac appears not to be very consistent on the subject of the calculation of Easter. It seems, however (from the translations which he gives), that it contains a passage agreeing in substance with what Epiphanius quotes as to keeping Easter by the Jewish method (anteq. 121); "Ihr sollt aber beginn- den dann, wenn eure Feinder aus dem Volk [Israel] das Pascha halten, weil, als unser Herr und Lehrer mit uns das Pascha ass, er nach dieser Stunde von Judas verrathen wurde. Und um dieselbe Zeit haben wir angefangen, bedrückt zu werden, weil er von uns genommen war. Nach der Zahl des Mundes, wie wir zählen nach der Zahl der gläubigen Hebräer, am zehnten im Monat, am Montag haben sich die Priester und Aeltesten des Volks versammelt" u. s. w., and subsequently — "Wie auch der vierzehnte des Pascha fällt, so sollt ihr auch nicht der Tag in jedem Jahre mit dieser Zeit, sondern er ist verschoben."*

This is worthy of serious attention, as an argument for the antiquity of this Syriac work. It would seem that it must at all events be admitted that the original work from which the Syriac was taken consisted of six books only. The 7th and 8th books, as they now stand, formed no part of it.

The same is the case with an Aethiopic version translated by Mr. Platt. This also, though said to be very loose and of little value as a guide to the original text, is a witness to the fact that there were but six books when it was made. The like is true of the Arabic versions, of which some account was first given by Grabe, and of which two MSS. are in the Bodleian.†

Not only do these facts tend to isolate the first six books from the 7th and 8th; but the formal conclusion which occurs at the end of the 6th even in our present Greek, and the style of the contents itself, furnish internal evidence in the same direction.

It has therefore been contended that the kernel out of which, to a great extent, the six books sprang was a shorter book called didaskalia των αποστόλων, of which the Syriac version furnishes a fair idea, if not a really pure text.

And as none of Epiphanius's citations are made from the two last books, it is suggested that we may have here something like a key to the work as it was in his time, the 7th and 8th books having been added since.‡

Coming to the 7th book, we must notice that its first thirteen chapters or thereabouts exhibit a great similarity, both in matter and expression, to the first part of an ancient tract printed by Bickell from a Vienna MS., and entitled AI δια- τεραι α δια Κλημεντος και κανονες εκκλησιαστι- kol των αγίων αποστόλων. This tract professes to contain short and weighty utterances by the apostles (who are introduced as speaking successively) on Christian morals, and on the ministers of the Church. An Aethiopic version (for it is extant in Coptic, Aethiopic, and Arabic) calls it "canons of the apostles which they have made for the ordering of the Christian Church." It is the piece which Bickell and others after him have called "Apostolische Kirchenordnung." It is assigned by him to the beginning of the 3rd century. The same date is given in the article on the subject in Herzog's Encyclopädie, where it is treated as a document independent of the constitutions. Bunsen, removing the dramatic form and presenting only the substance of the piece, considers it to be in fact a collection of rules of the Alexandrian Church. This view, however, is warmly disputed by the writer in the Christian Remembrancer (1854, p. 293), who contends that its whole garb, style, and language show that it was not an authoritative work, but was the production of a pious writer, who arrayed in a somewhat fictitious dress what he sought to inculcate. It is more remarkable for piety than knowledge; for though the number of twelve apostles is made out, it is by introducing Cephas as a distinct person from Peter, and by making him and Nathanael occupy the places of James the Less and of Matthias. St. Paul does not appear at all—a fact, perhaps, not without its bearing on conjectures as to its origin.

It should be observed that the language of the first part of this tract, and of the 7th Book of the Constitutions, coincides to a great extent with the latter part of the Epistle of Barnabas, leaving it doubtful whether it was taken thence or whether the transcribers of that epistle subsequently incorporated therewith a portion of this treatise. Borrowing and interpolation must, it would seem, have taken place on one hand or on the other, and, as in other cases, it is difficult to decide the question of originality.

Upon this state of facts the writer in the Christ. Rem. argues that this tract furnished materials for the first part of the 7th Book of the Constitutions. He also thinks that it is itself the work referred to by Eusebius and Athanasius under the name of διδασχλη των αποστόλων. We have seen already that the title in the Greek varies from that in the Aethiopic, and it is urged that (considering the subject) there seems no reason why it may not also be suitably designated 'Teaching of the Apostles.' Now in an old stichometry appended to Nicephorus' chronography,† and being of earlier date than that work, the number of lines contained in certain works is given, and from this it would appear that the 'Doctrina Apostolorum' was

* See Hiltgenfeld, Novum Test. extra Can. recep. Fasciculus iv. p. 79, et seq. (Lipsiae, 1866).

† There are in the Arabic five chapters not in the Greek.

‡ The fact that there is no Oriental version of the eight Greek books as a whole, has been relied on to show that they had not been united together in one work up to the year 451, when the Egyptian, Aethiopic, and Syriac churches were severed from the communion of the Greeks and Latins (Christ. Remembr., 1854, p. 278). The same authority is inclined to date the Didascalia in the latter part of the 3rd century.

¶ It is the former of these points alone which the likeness appears between this work and the 7th Book of the Constitutions.

‡ See Bickell ubi supra; and t. p. 86.

§ It mentions only "Reader;" in addition to the three orders of the ministry; and as Tertullian does the same (De Praescr. Haer., c. 41), this is thought a ground for attributing it to his epoch (Bickell, vol. i. p. 92). See also Hiltgenfeld, Nov. Test. extra Can. rec. Fasciculus iv. pp. 93, 94.

shorter than the Book of Canticles, and that a book called the 'Teaching of Clement,' was as long as the Gospel of Luke. Hence, if the 'Doctrina' of this list be the same as that of Eusebius, it must have been a book very much shorter than our present constitutions, and one not far differing in length from the tract of which we have been speaking; while the 'Teaching of Clement' (a larger work) may be a designation of the earlier form of our present first six books—in short, of the Didascalia. Rufinus, in a list otherwise very similar to those of Eusebius and Athanasius, omits the 'Teaching of the Apostles,' and inserts instead 'The two ways, or the Judgment of Peter.' Assuming that the 'Doctrina' is the tract we have been discussing, reasons are urged for supposing that it reappears here under a different title. We have already seen that the Greek and Aethiopic give it two different names, and its contents might perhaps render the designation in Rufinus not less appropriate. For St. John, who speaks first, is introduced as beginning his address with the words, "There are two ways, one of life and one of death;" and St. Peter intervenes repeatedly in the course of it, and at the close sums up the whole by an earnest exhortation to the brethren to keep the foregoing injunctions. Such is the hypothesis of the learned writer in the Christ. Rem.

Hilgenfeldt, it may be mentioned, has independently arrived at a conclusion in part accordant with the above. He argues strongly that the treatise published by Bickell is that spoken of by Rufinus under the name of 'Dnae viae vel Judicium Petri,' but does not apparently identify it with the 'Doctrina Apostolorum' of Athanasius. He thinks the book was known in some form to Clemens Alexandrinus, and agrees that great part of it passed into the 7th Book of the Constitutions (see Hilgenfeldt's Norma Test. extra Canonem Acceptum, Lipsiae 1866; Fasciculus iv. p. 93).

We now come to the 8th Book. Extant in several Greek MSS. (one being at Oxford) are large portions of the matter of the earlier part of this book, not however connected together throughout, but appearing in two distinct and apparently separate pieces. The first of them is entitled 'Teaching of the Holy Apostles concerning gifts' (χρησμάτων), the second 'Regulations' (τάξεις) of the same Holy Apostles concerning ordination [given] through Hippolytus' (πρὸς χειροτονίαν διὰ Ἰππολύτου). The two together, as just observed, comprise a very large proportion of the 8th Book, but are not without some omissions and several variations from it. In that book as we have it, the two portions represented respectively by these separate treatises stand connected by a short chapter, containing nothing of importance, and seeming to serve only as a link.

Hence it has been suggested that we have in the treatises in question an older and purer form of the 8th Book, or rather the materials used in its composition. The 'Regulations' are also in existence in Coptic (indeed there are two Coptic forms differing from each other and from the Greek by additions and omissions and probably in age), in Syriac, Arabic, and Aethiopic, the text being in many cases a good deal modified.*

* The Syriac and Coptic form part of the collections

Bunsen treated these as a collection of Alexandrian Church rules, and viewed the portions common to them and to the 8th Book of the Constitutions as in a great degree derived from a lost work of Hippolytus πρὸς χειροτονίαν (Christ. and Man., vol. ii., p. 412).

On the other hand Bickell argues that the tracts in question are nothing more than extracts from the constitutions, more or less abridged and modified. He relies, for example, on the fact that in one of these treatises no less than in the text of our 8th Book, St. Paul (who is introduced as a speaker) is made to command Christian masters to be kind to their servants, "as we have also ordained in what has preceded, and have taught in our epistles." This he considers to be a clear reference to what has been before said in the constitutions on the same subject (Book vii. c. 13).

Lagarde expresses a similar view, and draws mentioned infra, p. 125. See also Christ. Remembr., p. 280, as to another Syriac MS., and comp. p. 283.

* The inscription on the statue of Hippolytus at Rome mentions among his works πρὸς χειροτονίαν ἀποστολική παράδοσις. It is not clear whether the πρὸς χρα. was one treatise and ἀποστ. παράδ. another, or whether the whole is the title of one work. See Bickell, p. 60, note. As regards the πρὸς χειροτονίαν, Bunsen considers it to have been the subject of much interpolation, and regards its fate in this respect to have been like that of the Constitutions themselves, the composition of which he describes in words worth quoting in relation to the general subject: "Here we see the end of the ante-Nicene period they made the old simple collections of customs and regulations into a book, by introducing different sets of 'contumacia,' by a literary composition either of their own making, or by transcribing or extracting a corresponding treatise of some ancient father. Thus the man who compiled our 7th book has, as everybody now knows, extracted two chapters of the ancient epistle which bears the name of Basilides. The compiler of the 8th book, or a predecessor of his in this sort of compilation, has apparently done the same with the work of Hippolytus on the Charismata" (Christianity and Hellenism, vol. ii. 418). Elsewhere, in the same work, he expresses an opinion that the old collections of customs here spoken of were themselves made at a much earlier time—perhaps in the 2nd century—and express the practice of various great churches; and that the consciousness of apostolicity in that primitive age justified, or at least excused, the fiction by which they were attributed to Apostles—a fiction which deceived no one, and was only meant to express an undoubted fact, viz. the apostolicity of the injunctions as to their substance (vol. ii. 399). Ascending still a step higher, he believes that the materials employed in these old collections were of all but apostolic times. The oldest horizon to which we look back as reflected in them is perhaps the age immediately posterior to Clement of Rome, or first century (see vol. i. p. 402). To Bunsen's mind, full of faith in the power and fact of subjective criticism, this means more than to the mind of theologians of the English school. He believed in the possibility of applying the critical magnet to draw forth the true fragments of steel from the mass in which to our eyes they seem inextricably buried. He thus speaks of the subjective process by which he makes the first step upwards: "As soon as we get rid of all that belongs to the bad taste of the fiction, some ethic introductions, and all ostentatious moralising conclusions, and generally everything stonily re-written with literary pretension; and lastly, as soon as we expunge such some interpolations of the 4th and 5th centuries, which are easily discernible, we find ourselves unmistakably in the midst of the life of the Church of the 2nd and 3rd centuries" (vol. ii. p. 405).

attention to the circumstance that in one part of the Munich MS. of the περι χειρισμών, there is a note which expressly speaks of what follows
as taken out of the apostolical constitutions.^b

In conclusion, it may be remarked that all such researches as those we have been considering as to one piece being the basis or original of another, are beset with much difficulty, because certain statements or maxims often recur in several tracts which (in their present state at all events) are distinct from each other, though at sometimes bearing similar names. Lagarde points out (Rel. Jur. Eccl. Ant., preface p. xvii., and Bunsen's Christianity and Mankind, vol. vi. p. 38, and 39) that there once was a Syriac collection in eight books equally professing to be the work of Clement, yet far from being identical with our present Greek constitutions, though here and there embracing similar pieces. Passages which 3rd Books have been extracted from the 2nd and from fragments found in the same Paris MS.
(Sangern. 38) which contains the Syriac Didascalia (see his Rel. Jur. Eccl. Ant. Syrian, 1858).
He has also translated them into Greek (see his Rel. Jur. Eccl. Ant. Græcæ, p. 80, and Preflection, also in eight books, the relation of which to the above-mentioned Syrian Octateuch is discussed by Lagarde (Rel. Jur. Eccl. Ant., preface, and Bunsen's Christ. and Mankind, vol. vi. p. 39).

We have thus endeavoured to present a sketch of some of the leading theories which have been put forward as to the apostolical constitutions.
Did space permit it would not be difficult to add others. Krabbe appears to have thought that Eusebius, Athanasius, and Epiphanius knew the first seven books, and that they were composed in the East not long after the time of Cyprian (the seventh being a kind of appendix to the others), and probably by one author, whose object was to model the Church on a Levitical pattern, and who perhaps described not so much what existed as what he desired to see. At a later period (end of 4th or beginning of 5th century)
the 8th Book was added, embracing divers precepts which were commonly supposed to be apos-tolical, together with much from the writer him-

^a Lagarde, Rel. Juris Eccl. Ant., Preface, p. viii.; and see also, ibidem, a theory as to the name of Hippolytus,
as connected with the treatise.

^c This must not be confounded with the Syriac Didascalia previously mentioned, from which it is quite distinct.

^d Matter closely agreeing with these fragments, though not in quite the same order, and connected with much that is additional, is also found in a MS. of the 12th cent.
in the Cambridge Univ. Library. This MS. (brought by C. Buchanan from Southern India) contained eight books of Bible; but it is now in a dilapidated state. It may be that the Paris fragments are extracts from it, or, on the other hand, this MS. (as the later of the two in date) may possibly contain a subsequent development. It may be hoped that further attention will be paid to it by Oriental scholars. Its existence seems to have been unknown to Lagarde.

^e Of this Egyptian collection, the first two books are printed in a Greek version by Lagarde in Bunsen's *Christ.
and Mankind*, vi. 461; and see Bunsen's analysis of the collection, ibid. vii. 372. Another Coptic MS. was translated by Dr. Tattam in 1848. There is a notice of it in the Christ. Remembr. for 1864, p. 282.

self, probably an Arian or Macedonian. This second writer probably is responsible for many interpolations in the previous books.^f

Von Drey again, who spent much labour on the subject, advocated the view that the treatises of four distinct writers are combined in our present work. The first six books, he thought, were written after the middle of the 3rd century,
to teach practical religion, and were adapted for catechumens. The seventh is probably of the date of A. D. 300, and treats of the mysteries for the use of the faithful alone. The 8th Book is a kind of pontifical of some Eastern Church, being full of liturgies for the use of the clergy. It dates perhaps from the 3rd century, but has been altered and adapted to the state of things in the middle of the 4th. Athanasius, who speaks of the διδασχὴ καλοῦμένη τῶν ἀποστόλων, is to be taken as referring to the six first books,
But before the time of Epiphanius the eight books were joined as one work.

Interesting as such inquiries are, they cannot at present be considered as having removed the question of the origin and date of the apostolical
constitutions out of the class of unsolved problems.
The majority of scholars will perhaps decline to say with confidence more than that the precise age and composition of the work is unknown,
but that it is probably of Eastern authorship,
and comprises within itself fragments of very different dates, which we have no certain means for discriminating from one another, and which have undergone great modifications when incorporated with the rest. The consequence is that, as it stands, the work cannot be deemed to reflect a state of things in the Church much, if at all, prior to the Nicene age.^g

Nor can it be said ever to have possessed, so far as we know, any distinct ecclesiastical authority. We are in the dark as to its authorship, and there is no such proof of its general and public reception at any period as would seem needful to establish its validity as an authoritative document. There are indeed signs of a common nucleus of which various churches seem to have availed themselves, but in adopting it into their respective systems they modified it in relation to their respective needs, with a freedom hardly consistent with the idea that it was entitled to very great veneration.

Authorities.—F. Turrianius, Proem. in Zir.

^f When, however, a very late date is attempted to be assigned, it should be remembered à contra that, as observed by Bickell, metropolitan authority does not appear;
if we hear of asceticism (in book viii.), there is no mention of monasticism.

^g While, on the other hand, the 85th of the Apostolical
Canon perhaps refers to the 7th and 8th when it speaks of the Apostolical Constitutions as διαταγὴ δὲ τοῦ κυρίου ἡμῶν Ἰησοῦ χριστοῦ ἐν πάσαις ταῖς ἐν αὐτοῖς μερικαῖς.

^h See the words of Lagarde in Bunsen, Christ. and Mankind, vol. vi. p. 40.

ⁱ See Bickell, vol. I. p. 63, who assigns several grounds for this conclusion. It is worth noting that throughout the Constitutions the Church of Rome never occupies any position of priority or pre-eminence.

^k The age of the Syriac Didascalia is of course another question. It demands fuller consideration, which it can hardly receive from scholars in general until it has been literally translated. According to the Didascalia Purior in Bunsen, it is not free from very hyperbolic language in relation to the clergy.

APOSTOLICUS, a title once common to all bishops (the earliest instance produced by Du Cange is from Venantius Fortunatus, 6th century, addressing Gregory of Tours, Prolog. to V. S. Martini and elsewhere; but none of his quotations use the word absolutely and by itself, but rather as an epithet); but from about the 9th century restricted to the Pope, and used of him in course of time as a technical name of office. It is so used, e. g., by Rupertus Tuitiensis, 12th century (De Piviu. Offic. l. 27); but had been formally assigned to the Pope still earlier, in the Council of Rheims A. D. 1049.—“quod solus Romanie sedis Pontifex universalis Ecclesie primus esset, et Apostolicus,”—and an Archbishop of Compostella was excommunicated at the same council for assuming to himself “culmen Apostolice nominis” (so that, in the middle ages, Apostolicus, or, in Norman French, l'Apostole or l'Apostole, which = Apostolicus, not Apostolus, became the current name for the Pope of the time being). Claudius Taurinensis, in the 9th century, recognizes the name as already then appropriated to the Pope, by ridiculing his being called “not Apostolus, but Apostolicus,” as though the latter term meant Apostolus crucos for which Claudius's Irish opponent Dungal takes him to task. (Du Cange; Raynaud, Cont. Baronii.) [A. W. H.]

APOSTOLIUM (Ἀποστολείον), a church dedicated in the name of one or more of the Apostles. Thus Sozomen (Hist. Eccl. ix. 10, p. 376) speaks of the Basilica of St. Peter at Rome as τὸ Πέτρον ἀποστολείον; and the same writer, speaking of the church which Rufinus built at the Oak (a suburb of Chalcedon) in honour of SS. Peter and Paul, says that he called it Ἀποστολείον from them (Hist. Eccl. viii. 17, p. 347). [MARTYRIUM, PROPHETEUM.] [C.]

APOTAXAMENI (ἀποτάξασθαι)—renunciates, renouncers, a name by which the monks of the ancient Church were sometimes designated, as denoting their renunciation of the world and a secular life, e. g. in Palladius Hist. Laotic., c. 15, and Cassian, who entitles one of his books, De Institutis Renunciantium. (Bingham, book vii. c. 2.) [D. B.]

APPEAL (Appellatio in reference to the court appealed to, Provocatio in reference to the opponent; ἔφεσις in classical Greek, verb in N. T. ἐπικαλεῖσθαι), a complaint preferred before a superior court or judge in order to obtain due remedy for a judgment of a court or judge of an inferior rank, whereby the complainant alleges that he has suffered or will suffer wrong. We are concerned here with ecclesiastical appeals only. And they will be most conveniently discussed 1st—distinguishing between 1, appeals from an ecclesiastical tribunal to another also ecclesiastical, and 2, appeals from an ecclesiastical to a lay tribunal, or vice versa, and further, as regards persons, between (A) bishops and clergy, to whom in some relations must be added monks and nuns, and (B) laity—we treat successively, as regards subject matter, of 1. Spiritual Discipline properly so called, II. Civil Causes, and III. Criminal ones. It will be convenient also to include under the term Appeal, both appeals properly so called, where the superior tribunal itself retries the case; and that which is not properly either revision or rehearing, where the jurisdiction of the superior tribunal is confined to the ordering, upon complaint and enquiry, of a new trial by the original, or by an enlarged or otherwise altered, body of judges; and that again which is properly a mere revision, where the case is revised by a higher tribunal but without suspending sentence meanwhile; and, lastly, the transference also of a cause from one kind of tribunal to another not co-ordinate with it, as e. g. from lay to spiritual or vice versa, which, if the first court have completed its sentence, practically constitutes the second into a court of appeal to its predecessor. It is necessary also to bear in mind the difference between a friendly interference, such as brotherly love requires on the part of all bishops if any fall into heresy or sin, but which implies no formal authority of the adviser over the advised; and an arbitration, where the arbiter, who may be any one, derives his authority from the mutual and free consent of (properly) both parties, but (as will be seen) in certain cases sometimes from the sole action of one; and an appeal, where some definite superior tribunal may be set in motion by either party, but has in that case exclusive as well as compulsory jurisdiction; and the yet further step, where (like the intercessio of the Tribuni Plebis) the superior court or magistrate has the power of calling up the case for revision, and of suspending sentence meanwhile, suo iure. An appeal, however, of whatever kind, implies the legality in the abstract, and assumes the fact, of the jurisdiction of the court appealed from as a primary court. And it becomes needful, therefore, here to assume, although it is no business of this article either to detail or to prove, the extent and limits of ecclesiastical jurisdiction in the first instance; in order clearly

of the subject to the period antecedent to Charlemagne, excludes from consideration the whole of the elaborate fabric built up by the Canon Law of later times, mainly upon the basis of the False Decretals. And we have nothing to do, accordingly, with that grand innovation, whereby, in the West, the entire system of purely ecclesiastical appeals (and, indeed, of justice) was in effect perverted and frustrated, viz., the right was gradually allowed of appealing immediately from any ecclesiastical tribunal, high or low, upon nor yet with the elaborate disputes upon the nature and limits of mayores causas (the phrase, however, dating from Innocent I.); nor with the encroachments of the highest or of other ecclesiastical tribunals upon those of the State;
nor with the celebrated Appel comme d'Abus in medieval and later France; nor with such questions as the legitimate effect of the clause appellatione renata or postposita in a Papal brief; nor with the appeal from the Pope to a General Council, present or future; or from the Pope ill-informed, to the Pope well-informed;
nor again, on another side of the subject, with distinctions between appeals judicial or extrajudicial, or from sentences definitive or interlocutory; nor with the system, at least as subsequently elaborated, of Apostoli (certainly not derived from post appellationem) or letters di-missory, whether reverential, refutatory, repository, testimonial, or conventional, whereby the act of court formally transferred the cause to the upper one; nor with the fatalia appel-lationum, scilicet, the fixed times within which an appeal must be laid, carried to the upper court
by means of Apostoli, prosecuted, and concluded;
nor, in a word, with any other of the elaborate details of the later Canon Law upon the subject.
Our attention must be confined to the system
so far as it was worked out under the Roman Empire, and renewed or modified under that of Charlemagne.

1. I. Spiritual jurisdiction in matters of discipline over clergy and laity alike, rested in the beginning both by Scriptural sanction and by primitive practice with the bishop, acting, however, rather with paternal authority and in the spirit of mutual love, through moral influence on the one side met by willing obedience on the other, than according to the hard outlines of a fixed Church law laid down in canons; although such canons gradually grew into existence and into fulness, and the ultimatum of excommunication must have existed all along as the punishment of obstinate or repeated transgression. The Apostolic canons, however (xxxvii. and lxxiv.).
recognize as the then Church law, and the Nicene Council (A. D. 325) formally establishes, the authority of the synod of each province as a court of (revision rather than) appeal from a single bishop: enacting, that "excommunicate clerks and laymen shall abide by the sentence of their bishop," but that, "to prevent injustice, synods of the bishops of a province (ἐπαρχία) shall be held twice a year, in order that questions arising on such subjects may be enquired into by the community of the bishops; a sentence of excommunication, if confirmed by them, to hold good until a like synod should reverse it" (Conc. Nic.

can. 5); such right of appeal being apparently the common law of the Church, and the Council interfering only to secure it by requiring synods to be held with sufficient frequency. And this right, as respects presbyters and all below presbyters, was recognised and confirmed by Conc.
Carth., A. D. 390 can. 8, and A. D. 398 can. 29, Conc. Miler. A. D. 416 c. 22, for Africa; by Conc. Laonens. A. D. 442 can. 5, and Conc. Venc.
A. D. 465 can. 9 ("Episcoporum audientiam, non secularium potestatum," in this last instance, for Gaul and Armorica; by Conc. Hippol. A. D.
599 cc. 5, 9, for Spain; and by Conc. Antioch.
cc. 6, 11, A. D. 341, directed both against the Pope and against appeals to the Emperor (adopted into the canons of the Church Catholic), and by the Council of Constantinople in 381, cc. 2, 3, 6, for the East. The last-named Council also in effect limited the right of appeal from above as well
as below, by forbidding all bishops ταῖς ἐπαρχίαις
ἐκκαθ' ἑαυτοὺς, and by establishing each province in an independent jurisdiction (Conc. Constantinop. c. 2).

a. Confining ourselves first to the case of clergy,
the right of the bishop to judge his brethren or his clerks, was further limited, in that part of the Church where Church law was earliest and most formally developed, viz., Africa, by the requirement of twelve bishops to judge a bishop, of six to judge a presbyter, of three to judge a deacon (Conc. Carth. A. D. 348 can. 11, A. D. 390 can. 10, A. D. 397 can. 8). And a dispute between two bishops was still later referred by the (African) Council of Mileum A. D. 416 (can. 21), to bishops appointed by the metropolitan. In the East, and generally, bishops (and presbyters)
canon merely to the natural resort of an appeal from one synod to another and a larger one, viz.
to the metropolitan and bishops of the next province; which is the express rule laid down in Conc. Antioch. A. D. 341, cc. 11, 12, 14, 15, and in Conc. Constantinop. A. D. 381, can. 6. So also canon 13 of the collection of Martin of Braga.
But between the Nicene and Constantinopolitan Councils and that of Chalcedon in 451, a further modification took place in accordance with the settlement of the several Patriarchates, whereby the appeal was made to lie from the bishop to him to the Patriarch; with the further claim gradually emerging on the part of the Bishop of Rome to a right of supreme judicial authority over the entire Church. (But whether the sentence was to remain in force pending the appeal seems to have been a doubtful question, variously settled at different times and places; see Bal-samon in Can. Afric. 32.) The first step was that, in the West, of the Council of Sardica, A. D.
347, intended to be oecumenical but in result only Western, and not accepted as authoritative either by the Eastern or even by the African Churches:
which attempted to make the system work more fairly, and perhaps to escape reference to an Arian Emperor, by giving presbyter or deacon an appeal to the metropolitan and the provincial bishops (can. 14 Lat.). and by enacting with respect to bishops, in the way of revision rather than appeal, that, whereas ordinarily they should be judged by the bishops of their own province,
if a bishop thought himself aggrieved, either the bishops who tried him or those of the neighbouring province should consult the Bishop of Rome, and if he judged it right, then the comprovincial or the neighbouring bishops should by his appointment retry the case, with the addition (if the complainant requested it, and the Bishop of Rome complied with his request) of presbyters representing the Bishop of Rome, who were to take their place in that capacity among the judges (can. 4, 5, 7): no successor to be appointed to the deposed bishop pending such new trial. The choice of the Bishop of Rome as referee (to decide, however, not the case itself, but whether there ought to be a new trial) has some appearance of having been personal to Julius the then Pope (as was the subsequent grant of Gratian to Pope Damasus), to whom the right is granted by name in the Greek version of the canons (so Richerius and De Mareis); but certainly it was determined to the see of Rome, not through previous precedent, or as by inherent right, but as in honour of the one Apostolic see of the West,—“in honour of the memory of St. Peter.” It was in fact giving to the Pope the right previously possessed exclusively by the Emperor, save that the latter would refer causes to a Council. Prior to 347, the case of Fortunatus and Felicissimus A.D. 252 (striving to obtain the support of Pope Cornelius against their own primate St. Cyprian, and eliciting from the latter an express assertion of the sufficiency and finality of the sentence passed upon them by their own comprovincial African bishops, St. Cyp. Epist. 59, Fell)—and that of Marcian, Bishop of Arles A.D. 254 (whom the bishops of Gaul are exhorted to depose for Novatianism, St. Cyprian interfering on the sole ground of brotherly episcopal duty to urge them to the step, and asking Pope Stephen to interfere also, but solely on the like ground, Id. Epist. 68)—and those of Basileides and of Martial, Bishops respectively of Leon with Astorga and of Merida, also A.D. 254 (deposed by the Spanish bishops as having lapsed, and of whom Basileides, having deceived Pope Stephen into re-admitting him to communion, and into “encompassing” for his restoration, was rejected nevertheless by the Spanish, seconded by the African bishops, Id. Epist. 67)—sufficiently shew that while the Nicene canons only confirmed and regulated the previously established and natural principle of the final authority of the provincial synod, that of Sardica introduced a new provision, although one rather opening the way for further extensive changes than actually enacting them. In 341, also, the Council of Antioch, representing the East, repudiated the same Pope Julius’s interference on behalf of St. Athanasius (Sozom. iii. 8; Socrat. ii. 15) and passed a canon against the return of a deposed bishop to his see unless by decree of a synod larger than that which had deposed him (can. 12); as well as against appeals of deposed bishops to emperors, unanctioned by the comprovincial bishops: canons adopted into the code of the whole Church. In the West, however, the Sardican canon became the starting point of a distinctly marked advance in the claims of the Bishop of Rome, although not without opposition on the part of the Church, nor, on the other hand, without political support from the Emperors. In 367 a Council of Tyana restored Eustathius of Sebastea to his see, among other grounds, on the strength of a letter of Pope Liberius; but the proceeding was condemned in strong terms by St. Basil the Great (Epist. 263 § 3). In 378, the Emperor Gratian added State sanction—at least during the Popedom of Damasus, and in reference to the schism of the antipope Ursicinus—to the judicial authority of the Bishop of Rome, but in conjunction with six or seven other bishops if the accused were a bishop himself, and with an alternative of fifteen comprovincial bishops in the case of a metropolitan, the attendance of the accused bishop at Rome to be compelled by the civil power (Conc. Rom., Epist. ad Gratian. et Valentin. Supp. A.D. 378, in Mansi, iii. 624, and the Rescript appended to it of the same Emperors ad Aquilinum Vicarium). In 381, however, the epistle of the Italian bishops (including St. Ambrose) to Theodosius, claims no more respecting Eastern bishops in the case of Maximus (deposed by the Council of Constantinople), than that the voice “of Rome, of Italy, and of all the West,” ought to have been regarded in the matter. But in some year between 381 and 398 (see Tillmont, Mém. Eccl.), although Theodoret (v. 2^o) seems to place it under Innocent I. in 402, Flavian, accepted by the East, but rejected by Egypt and by Rome and the West, as Bishop of Antioch, was summoned by the Emperor to go to Rome to be judged there by the Bishop of Rome, but refused to submit; and was finally accepted by the Pope, to whom he sent a deputation of bishops, at the intercession of St. Chrysostom, but without any pretence of trial. In 404-406, Innocent’s interference to procure St. Chrysostom’s own restoration to his see, even to the extent of withdrawing communion from St. Chrysostom’s opponents, proved as great a failure as Pope Julius’s like attempt on behalf of St. Athanasius (Sozom. viii. 26-28, and the letters of St. Chrysostom and Pope Innocent in Mansi, iii. 1081-1118); although the mean proposed was not a trial by the Pope but a general Council. While St. Chrysostom himself at the same period affirms the old principle, that causes must not ὀρεσπολιὸν ἔλκεσθαι, ἀλλ’ ἐν ταῖς ἐπαρχίαις τὰ τῶν ἐπαρχῶν γυνώσκουσαι (in Mansi, ib.). But even in the Western Church at the same period the Roman claim was admitted with difficulty, and only gradually and by continual struggles. Innocent I. indeed declared that, “si majores causae in medium fuerint devolunt, ad sedem Apostolicam, sicut synodus statuit” (meaning, of course, but exaggerating, the Sardican canon) “et vltus sive inveterata consuetudo exigit, post iudicium episcopale referantur.” (Epist. 2 ad Victor.). But in actual fact, 1. in Africa, A.D. 417-425, the appeal to Pope Zosimus of the presbyter Apiarius, condemned by his own Bishop, Urbanus of Sicca, whom the Pope summoned to Rome to be judged, and on refusal sent legates to his successive Carthaginian Councils to enforce his claims, was in the first instance provisionally compromised, by a temporary admission of the Papal authority (Epist. Conc. Afric. ad Bonific. Papam A.D. 419, in Mansi, iv. 511), on the ground of the canons of Sardica, alleged by the Popes (Zosimus, Boniface, Celestine) to be Nicene; but on the production of the genuine canons of Nicaea from Constantinople and Alexandria, was absolutely rejected (Epist. Conc. Afric. ad Caecili. um A.D. 425, in Mansi, iv. 515); whilst the canon (22) of Mileum, A.D. 416, which is repeated by Carth-agian Councils down to A.D. 525 (Mansi, viii. 644), assigns presbyters and all below them to appeal, "non ad transmarina julicia sed ad primates suorum provinciarum; ad transmarina autem qui putaverit appellandum, a nullo intra Africam ad communionem suscipiatur;" and the Cod. Can. Afric. 18 tit. 31 (A.D. 419), adds to this—"sicut et de Episcopis super constitutum est," the genuineness of which last clause is supported by Tillemont, De Marca, and Beveridge, although denied by Baronius. It seems certainly to have been inserted in the canon by some African council of this period. At the same time, while the gloss of Gratian on the word "transmarina"—"nisi forte ad Romanam sedem appellaverit"—is plainly of the kind that as exactly as possible contradicts its text; it is evident by St. Augustin's letter to Pope Celestine in 424 (Epist. 209), that applications from Africa in a friendly spirit to Rome in disputes respecting bishops, both to judge and to confirm others' judgments, and this not only during the provisional admission of the Papal claim (as in the case of the Bishop of Fussala), but before it, had been frequent. It is hard to believe, in the face of the precisely contemporary and unmistakable language of the assembled African bishops at the close of the controversy respecting Aparin; that such applications could have been in the nature of formal appeals; although the case of Pope Leo I. and Lupicinus, A.D. 446, shows the Papal claim to have been still kept up (St. Leo, Epist. xii. al. i. § 12).

2. In Illyria,—whereas, in 421, the Emperor Theodosius had decreed that doubtful cases should be determined by a council, "non absque scientia" of the Bishop of Constantinople (Cod. Theod. xvi. tit. 2. s. 45),—in 444, Pope Leo I., insisting upon the canons apparently of Sardica, and as part of the Papal measures for securing the whole of Illyria to the Roman Patriarchate, commanded appeals ("causae graviores vel appellationes") from Illyria to be brought to Rome (St. Leo, Epist. v. § 6). And 3. in Gaul, in 445, Zosimus in 418, which had constituted Arles the metropolitan see of the province, insisted on Bishop Projectus and of Celdionius Bishop either of Vesonio or of Vienne, whom Hilary of Arles had deposed, and carried the point, although with strong opposition from Hilary (St. Leo, Epist. x.). Pope Hilary, however, 461-462, Epist. xi., respecting the Metropolitan of Vienne and Arles, "decreta principum." And undoubtedly a decree of the Emperor Valentinian III., in the year 445, definitely assigned to the Pope, not simply an appellate jurisdiction, but the right of avoking causes to Rome suo motu, by enacting that "omnibus pro lege sit qui quid sanxit vel sanxerit Apostolicæ sedis auctoritas, ita ut quisquis Episcoporum ad iudicium Romani antistitis evocatus venire neglexerit, per moderatorem ejusdem provincie adesse cogatur" (Cod. Theod. Novell. tit. xxiv. Suppl. p. 12). An ultimate appellate jurisdiction was also given at the same period, but by Church authority, viz., by the general council of Chalcedon in 451, to the Bishop of Constantinople: the order of appeal being there fixed from bishop to the metropolitan and synod, and from the latter to the particular Patriarch or to the Bishop of Constantinople (Conc. Chalced. c. 9).

CHRIST. ANT.

The Eastern rule appears to have henceforward remained the same; except that Justinian A.D. 533, confirming the canon of Chalcedon in other respects, dropped all special mention of the Bishop of Constantinople, but enacted in general that an appeal should lie from bishop to metropolitan, and from metropolitan alone to metropolitans with synod, but that from the synod appeal in his own Patriarchate, as final was in civil cases the Præfectus Prætorio (Justin. Cod. vii. tit. 62. s. 19); although no cause was to come to him at once unless in the form of a request that he would delegate it to the bishop, who was the proper primary tribunal (Id. i. tit. 4. s. 29, 7. tit. 62. s. 19; Novell. cxliii. 22). A law of Leo and Constantius in 838 (Leunclav. Jus Gr. Rom. II. of ecclesiastical jurisdiction, whose decision, therefore, is final, unless indeed he chooses to review it himself. And so also, apparently, the 6th General Council of Constantinople A.D. 870 (Act. 10, cc. 17, 20). It is to be added, however, that in the case of any one under the degree of bishop, and in cases not ecclesiastical, the bishop was the primary judge, but from him the case might be taken to the civil judge, the Emperor deciding if they differed; but in the case of a bishop, the right of appeal to the patriarch enacted by Justinian is final (Justin. Novell. lxxiii. 12, cxliii. 21, 22).

In the West, the changes in the matter relate to two points, to the fruitless attempts of the Popes to obtain appellate jurisdiction over the East, and to their more successful efforts to secure their Western claim of the like kind under the altered laws and policy of the new Barbarian rulers of Europe; efforts which may be said to have finally secured success under the Carolingians, in the popedom of Nicholas I. about 858, and as confirmed by the false Decretals, first used by Nicholas in 864 (Gieseler). For the former, in 449, Flavian no doubt appealed from Dioscorus and the Ephesine Latrocinium nominally to the Pope, but Leo's own letter to Theodosius in consequence (St. Leo, Epist. 43 al. 31, and 44 al. 40; Liberat. Brev. 12, in Mansi, ix. 378), shows that the tribunal of appeal contemplated by even the Pope himself, was a general council (see Quenstedt and Van Espen). In 484, however, Felix II., in a synod at Rome, as the issue of a long dispute, during which, among other steps, he had summoned Acacius of Constantinople to be tried at Rome upon the strength of the canons of Sardica, misnamed Nicene, made an open schism with the East, which lasted 40 years, by excommunicating and deposing Acacius (Mansi, vii. 1054); a sentence which, it need not be said, was disregarded. In 587, Pelagius II. seems to have confirmed the sentence of acquittal passed by a tribunal at Constantinople, summoned by the Emperor, in the case of Bishop Gregory of Antioch, while protesting against the title of universal bishop applied by the same authority to the Bishop of Constantinople (St. Greg. M., Epist. v. 18; Evagrius, vi. 7); a protest renewed, as every one knows, by Gregory himself. But this implied no formal superiority over Eastern bishops. And the claim unhesitatingly advanced by Gregory—"De Constantinopolitana ecclesia quis eam dubitet Apostolicæ sedi esse subjectam" (St. Greg. M., Epist. ix. 12)—was assuredly not admitted by the Church of Constantinople itself. Further, the Council in Tullo in 691, repeated not only the 3rd canon of Constantinople in 381, but the 28th of Chalcedon in 451, which latter equals Constantinople to Rome (Conc. Quinisext. can. 36); and also the 17th of the same Council of Chalcedon (ib. 38), which involves the 9th of the same Council, viz., that which (as above said), so regulates the course of appeals as to put the patriarch of a province with an alternative of the Bishop of Constantinople as the ultimate tribunal. The dispute which a century after issued in the great schism, cut short the narrower, by absorbing it in the broader, controversy. For the West, however, matters proceeded more successfully. Gelsius (492-496), while allowing the subordination of the Pope to a general council approved by the Church, asserts positively (Epist. 13), that the see of St. Peter "de omni ecclesia sui habent iudicandi, neque cuiquam de eius licet iudicare iudicio," and that "ad illam de qualibet mundi parte canones appellari voluerit, ab illa autem nemo sit appellare permittitur." In 503, although the Arian Theodorice appointed a commission of bishops, under the presidency of a single bishop (of Altino), to judge of the disputed election of Symmachus to the Popedom, and although Symmachus in the first instance admitted their jurisdiction, and both parties appealed to the judgment of Theodorice himself; yet 1. a Roman synod (Synodus Palmaris) both sanctioned Symmachus's election without presuming to make enquiry, and declared the interference of laity in Church elections or property to be against the canons (Mansi, viii. 201, sq.; Anastas. Lit. Pontif. in v. Symmacho); and 2. Eusebius of Nicæna, in 511, formally asserted in an elaborate document the absoluteness of the Papal power, and especially that the Pope is himself the final court of appeal, whom none other may judge (Mansi, viii. 282-284). And at the end of the century Gregory the Great assumes as indisputable that every bishop accused is subject to the judgment of the see of Rome (Epist. ix. 59). During the following period, however,—while the sultrian African Church, retaining her privilege untouched, but as a privilege, under Gregory the Great, yet practically gave up her ancient opposition a few years later (Epist. Episc. Afric. ad Paganum Theodotum, in Act. Conc. Lateran. A.D. 649, Mansi, x. 919),—the European Churches were practically under the government of the kings, although the theoretical claims of the Popes remained undiminished. The Irish Churches, indeed, were still independent of the Pope, the end of the seventh century being the close of the Celtic schism, except in Wales. In Saxon England, the proceedings of both kings and synods in the appeals of Wilfrid (678-705), when the Pope reversed the judgments of English synods on Wilfrid's complaint, showed on the one hand a feeling of reverence for the Pope (e.g. the Council of Nidd, A.D. 705 [Eddius 58] did not repudiate the Pope's decree, but the testimony of Papal letters, which might be forged, as against the inâ ræ evidence of Archbishop Theodore); but on the other, disregarded such decree in practice, by enforcing that precise severance of Wilfrid's diocese against which he had appealed. And the Council of Cloveshoe, A.D. 747, pointedly limits appeals to the provincial council, and no further (can. 25). In Spain, although Gregory the Great interfered by a legate authoritatively in favour of deposed bishops, viz., Stephanus and Junarius, on the ground, first, of Justinian's law as being their Patriarch, and if that was refused, then by the right of the see of Rome as head of the Church (Epist. xlii. 45), yet in 701 or 704, King Witiza, in a Council of Toledo, expressly forbade appeals to any foreign bishop (Conc. Tolet. xvlii.). And a little earlier, admission into Church communion was declared dependent on the will of the Prince (Conc. Tolet. A.D. 681 c. 3, and 683, c. 9). The Kings in effect were in Spain supreme judges of bishops (Cenni. De Antiq. Eccl. Hisp. il. 153, quoted by Gieseler). In Gaul, the cases of Salonius, Bishop of Embrun, and Sagittarius, Bishop of Gap, deposed in 577 by a synod of Lyons, restored by Pope John III, on appeal, but by permission and power of King Guntram, and then again finally deposed in 579 by a Council of Châlons (Greg. Turon., Hist. Franc. v. 21-29), leave the Papal claim in a similar state of half recognition to that in which it stood in England. And in the ensuing century the Royal authority here also practically superseded the Papal. In 615, the administration of ecclesiastical discipline is made subservient to the king's intercession (Conc. Paris, c. 3, as confirmed by Chlotarius II.). And many instances of depositions of bishops occur without appeal to the Pope, beginning with that of Salaric of Paris, deposed by a second synod there, to which he had appealed from a former one, under King Chilperic, A.D. 555. Gregory the Great, indeed, renewed the ingenious expedient of appointing the Bishop of Arles his vicar to decide such causes in Gaul, in conjunction with twelve bishops; and yet even so, most of such causes were decided without even the presence of the Papal vicar (De Marca, vii. 19). The Capitula of Hadrian I., sent to Ingilram of Metz in 785, introduced the first great innovation upon preceding rules, by enacting (c. 3) that no bishop should be condemned unless in a synod called "Apostolica auctoritate;" and again, that, if a deposed bishop, whose primary tribunal was the comprovincial synod, appealed from it to Rome, "id observandum esset quod (Papa) ipse censuerit" (c. 20, 23, and Epitome Capit. A.D. 773). But they contained also the African prohibition of appeals ad transmarina iudicia (see Gieseler). And while the Capitulum of Aix in 789, repeated more expressly by the Council of Aix in 816 (cc. 73, 74), repeats the Nicene and Antiochene (341) canons without the addition of those of Sardica, the Capitulaires as collected by Benedict Levita contain also the Sardican canons. For bishops, then, Charlemagne allowed the appeal to Rome for a new trial, the comprovincial synod being still held to be the proper tribunal for such cases; and an appeal being also allowed to more numerous episcopal judges if dissatisfaction were felt with those originally appointed by the metropolitan, and, again, from them to a synod (Capit. vii. 413), or again, from a suspected judge to another (ib. vii. 240, and Add. iii. 25, iv. 18, sq.);—see Capit. v. 401, 410, vi. 300, vii. 102, 103, 314, 315, 412, Add. iii. 105—but left the ordinary and direct right of a proper appeal to the Pope, and the condition of his prior consent to the trial of an accused bishop, anciently unsettled to lead to the great disputes of the following period, of

In a Council of Orleans, in a Council of Clermont, and a little earlier, the union was declared prince (Cone. Tolet. which the case of Hincmar and Bishop Rothad is the primary case. The Carolingian Princes, indeed, deposed bishops in synods, just as they elected them, without any reference to the Pope. But the Papal power gradually increased. And while Gregory IV., in 835, and Leo IV., about 850, expressly claim a proper appellate jurisdiction, Pope Nicholas I., 858-867, he said to have finally established the claim of his fulness. Even in 791, however, the claim of Friuli asserted for the Patriarch of Aquileia archimandrite be deposed, in his Patriarchate, without consulting him (can. 27); the same right which Hadrian claimed universally for the Bishop of Rome. As regards all below bishops, the Council of Frankfurt in 794, can. 6, re-enacts the order of appeal from bishop to metropolitan, i.e., to the provincial synod, but no further; and, in addition, orders the civil magistrate (Comes) to act as assessor, and to refer to the Emperor all cases too hard for the metropolitan. And Capit. iii. 1, A.D. 812, includes bishops also among those who are to bring their disputes to the Emperor for settlement.

In sum, appeal from a bishop or bishops to his neighbouring brethren, under their metropolitan, i.e., from one or few bishops to many, was the Church's common law; the appeal terminating there, until the law of Valentinian in 445 for the Bishop of Rome, the canon of Chalcedon in 451 for the Bishop of Constantinople and patriarchs generally, and the law of Justinian in 533 for all patriarchs without distinction, allowed further appeal from bishops to their patriarchs: the Bishop of Rome, however, sufficient basis of the canons of Sardica, and in- ton, and in time also the broader and sentimental decretals first established in the West. The False meaning, the absolute both appellate and im- mediate jurisdiction of the Popes as of Divine right, in the 9th century, during the Papacy of Nicholas I. It remains to add, that the Cyprian, the Arminian, the Georgian, the Bulgarian, and the Ravennate, claims to be autocephalous, were simply remnants of the older condition of things before the existence of patriarchates, differing from each other only in the fact that the Cyprian right was actually tried and confirmed by a general council.

B. The above canons for the most part leave laymen to their original right of appeal to a provincial synod, according to the canon of Nice. And this was plainly their right, generally speaking, throughout; and is confirmed (as above said) by the Council of Frankfurt in 794. In Africa, however, where the right of appeal was more jealously guarded than elsewhere, it was enacted at one time (Conc. Carth. A.D. 397 can. 8, and A.D. 398 can. 22, 23) that the bishop of the place "agnoscat et finiat" the causes of all presbiteria clericorum suorum." Hincmar, in the 9th century, limits the same class of appeals to the provincial synod, protesting only against any further right of appeal in such cases to the Pope. 1, 2. The interference of lay tribunals in causes spiritual, after the Emperors became Christian, belongs properly to other articles. Questions of faith and such as were purely ecclesiastical, as it is sufficient here to state upon the unqualified testimony of Gothofred (Comment. in Cod. Theo. 16. tit. 2. s. 23, quoted by Bingham), were ordinarily to bishops and synods, by laws received from Constantius to Justinian (e.g. Novell. lxxviii. cxliii. 21). And the law of Honorius in 399 (C.d. Theod. 16. tit. 11. s. 1), among others, which expressly denies any proper right of Church courts to civil jurisdiction, affirms also that causes of religion as properly belong to them. When, however, either questions of faith or private causes became of political importance, the Emperors from spiritual tribunals naturally grew up. Our business is with the latter, i.e. brief, that the Emperors throughout claimed and exercised a right of ordering a new trial by spiritual judges; the choice of whom they rested with themselves, that they took them so far seemed good from another province than that of the parties accused or accusing. So Constantine very, appointing first Meletius of the Donatist contro- three Gallic bishops to judge the case at Rome, and then, upon the dissatisfaction of the Donatists, commanding a synod to rehear it at Arles (without the Pope at all) in 314. The precise question, however, was one of discipline more than of belief. And Constantine disclaimed all right of appeal from the episcopal tribunal to himself. So also Basilianus of Ephesus, and Emperor Marcian, asked letters from the Council in 451 might judge their appeals. And that somewhat earlier period Theodosius in a like case transferred causes from one province to another (De Marca, De Conc. Sac. t. Imp. iv. 3). So also Theodorice appointed bishops to decide the case of Pope Symmachus's case, A.D. 500, although, after commencing the case, they ultimately refused to judge the Bishop of Rome, by a merely formal judgment. And the deprivation any appellant to a civil tribunal, excepts the case of those who ask from the Emperor "episc. pale judicium." On both sides, however, this middle course was occasionally transgressed. Bishops sometimes were occasionally Emperors themselves to decide their appeals: e.g., even St. Athanasius, while in his Synod, expressly repudiating the Emperor's power to decide such a cause, yet, after the Council of Tyre had deposed him, requested the Emperor nevertheless, not only to assemble a "lawful" council of bishops to rehear the case, but as an alternative, ἢ καὶ αὐτὸν δεῖσθαι the Council of Antioch accordingly, in 341, took occasion (as above said) to prohibit all applications to the Emperor except such as were backed by letters of metropolitan and provincial bishops, and to insist upon the restriction of fresh trials to "a larger synod" &c. canons repeated down to the days of Charlemagne, and adopted by the Church at large, although repudiated as Arian by St. Chrysostom and by Pope Innocent I., when quoted against the former. And about A.D. 380, and his fellow bishops had done wrong in allow- ing Priscillian to appeal to the Emperor, and lays it down that he ought to have appealed to other bishops. Yet both Pope Symmachus and his opponent Laurentius requested the Arian Lombard Theodoric to decide between them. On the other side, when mentioning a very late case, where the Emperor transferred a cause of a spiritual kind from the Patriarch Luke of Constantinople, A.D. 1156-1169, to a civil court, Balsamon (in can. 15 Syn. Carthag.), while affirming this to be against the canons, yet admits that a lay co-judge might rightly be asked of the Emperor. And Justinian (Novell. cxxiii. 21) reserves indeed a right upon appeal of assigning judges, from whom an appeal lay "secularum legum ordinem," i.e. ultimately to the Praefectus Praetorio and Quaestor Palatii (Cod. 7. tit. 62. s. 32); but ecclesiastical causes are expressly excepted from such appeal. On the other hand, Arcadius and Honorius expressly prohibit appeals from councils to themselves; unless, indeed, this refers only to civil and criminal causes. The Carlovingian Emperors (as we have seen above) reserved an appeal to themselves in difficult cases from the metropolitan, in causes of presbyters and all below them; besides appointing the civil magistrate as assessor to the metropolitan in the first instance. And in the case of Leo III. A.D. 800, when Charlemagne convened a synod at Rome to investigate accusations against that Pope, the bishops appointed declined to act, on the ground that it was the Pope's right to judge them, and not theirs to judge the Pope (Anastas, in V. Leon. III.).

II. We pass next to civil causes: and the jurisdiction of bishops in these, whether lay or clerical, is of course, as a coercive jurisdiction, purely a creation of municipal law. As founded upon 1 Cor. vi. 4, it could not have been until the time of Constantine more than a voluntarily conceded power of arbitration, whereby both plaintiff and defendant, being Christians, agreed to be bound (see Estius, ad loc.). But upon principles of Christian love and of avoiding scandal, the decision of such cases became the common and often the inconveniently troublesome business of bishops: e.g. of Paphnutius (see Rufinus), Gregory Thaumaturgus (St. Greg. Nyss. in Vita), St. Basil the Great (St. Greg. Naz. Orat. 20), St. Ambrose (Epist. 34), St. Augustine (Posid. in Vita), St. Martin of Tours (Sulp. Ser. Dial. ii.): and is recognized as their work by St. Chrysostom (De Sac. iii. 18). The Apost. Constit. ii. 45-47 regulate the process. St. Cyprian (Adr. Judices iii. 44), speaking of resort to the bishop and not to the secular court as the duty of Christians, may serve as a specimen of the feeling upon which the practice rested. And while Socrates (vii. 37) speaks of Bishop Sylvanus of Troas as declining it either for himself or his clergy, it is recognized even by the Council of Tarragona in 516 (c. 4) as extending to presbyters and deacons also. The practice was changed from a precarious to a recognized and legal institution by Constantine. Either party to a suit was allowed by him, not in form to appeal from magistrate to bishop, but to do so in effect; in that he gave to either the power to choose the bishop's court in preference to the magistrate's, the bishop's sentence to stand as good in law as if it were the Emperor's (Euseb., De V. Constantini, iv. 27; Sozom. i. 9); and if the law at the end of the Theodosian code is (as Selden, and, among later writers, Haenel and Walter [see Robertson's Deebet, p. 80] think, but Gothofred denies), then took the still further step of empowering either, without the other's consent, and even already decided by the civil court, to claim a rehearing in the court of the Bishop (Extrac. de Elect. Judic. Episo. Cod. Theod. vi. 303).

a. This power was enlarged in the case of the clergy into a compulsory jurisdiction, the Church forbidding clergy to take civil cases in which they were concerned before any other tribunal than the bishop's (Conc. Carth. A.D. 397 c. 9, Conc. Milevil. A.D. 416 c. 19, Conc. Chalco. A.D. 451 c. 2, Conc. Venedic. A.D. 465 c. 9, Conc. Cahillon. i. A.D. 470 c. 11, Conc. Matisson. A.D. 582 c. 8), while the Emperors permitted and ratified episcopal jurisdiction between clergy in civil cases, and where both parties agreed to the tribunal (Valentin. III., Novell. de Episo. Judicio, xii. Gothofr.). And Justinian in 539 gave civil jurisdiction outright to the bishops over the clergy, the monks, and the nuns, subject to an appeal to the Emperor in case the civil judge decided differently to the bishop (Novell. lxxix., lxxxiii., cxxiii. c. 21). The law also of Constantius, in A.D. 355, refers all complaints against bishops without distinction, and therefore civil as well as criminal, to an episcopal tribunal (Cod. Theod. 16. tit. 2. s. 13); which Justinian specifies into a regular chain of appeal to metropolitan and patriarch, unless in one exceptional case, where either the Praefectus Praetorio per Orientem, or "judges appointed by the Emperor," are to decide (Novell. cxxiii. c. 22, 24). If a layman, however, were a party to the suit, it rested with him to choose the tribunal.

β. With respect to laymen, indeed, generally, the law of Constantine, if it ever did go to the length of allowing a transfer of the cause at the will of either party, and at any stage of the suit, was soon limited. Arcadius and Honorius A.D. 408 require the consent of both parties (Cod. Justin. 1. tit. 4. s. 7, 8). And both they, and Valentinian III. A.D. 452, expressly allow a layman to go if he chooses to the civil court, and in all cases and persons require the "vinculum compromissi," and the "voluntas jurgantium," as a prior condition to any episcopal (coercive) jurisdiction at all; expressly laying down also that bishops and presbyters "forum non halere ne de aliis causis praeter religionem posse cognoscere" (Cod. Theod. 16. tit. 11. s. 1; and Valentin. III., as before cited). Justinian, however, appears to have gone further. 1. He granted to the clergy of Constantinople a right to have all their pecuniary causes, even if a layman were concerned, tried in the first instance by the bishop; and not only if the nature of the case hindered him from deciding it, then, but not otherwise, before the civil court (Novell. lxxxiii.); and 2. he appointed the bishop generally co-judge with the civil magistrate, and with an appeal from the latter to the former (Novell. lxxxvi.). And both in Conc. Carthag. A.D. 399 c. 1 (Cod. Can. Afric. 5), and in Justin. Novell. cxxiii. § 7, Cod. 1. tit. 3. s. 7, and Cod. Theod. 11. tit. 39. s. 8, provision is made to protect a bishop or clergyman, who had thus acted as judge, from being subsequently molested by a discontented party to the

The law of Constantine in its widest form, and as applying to laity as well as clergy, is alleged (281), expressly as a renewal of the (extreme) Theodosian enactment, but very serious doubts are thrown on the genuineness of the re-enactment: viz., that "Quicumque litem habeat, sive possessore sive petitor fuerit, vel in initio litis vel peroratur sive cum jam coeperit promi sententia, si iudicium elegerit sacrosanctae legis Antistitia, illico sine aliqua dubitatione, etiam si alia pars refragatur, ad Episcoporum iudicium cum sermone litigantium dirigatur: . . . omnes itaque causas, quae vel praetorio jure vel civili tractantur, Episcoporum sententiis terminatae, pertractati negotium, quod Episcoporum sententia decidit."—thus interposing an absolute right of appeal in civil cases for either party, whether lay or clerical, at every stage of the civil suit, from the civil judge to the bishop, and vice versa, and Gratian, Decret. P. II., c. xl. qu. 1. 11th ed.; and Hallam, Middle Ages, ii. 148, Conc. Francof. A.D. 794 c. 6, above referred to, that an appeal to the Emperor himself was allowed, even from the metropolitan, in all civil cases. The joint jurisdiction of bishops and archdeacons in Saxon England belongs to a different subject.

III. In criminal cases, this article is not concerned to define the limits and nature of the exemptions or privileges of clergy, beyond the brief statement that, 1. Clergy, and in particular the Emperors in criminal cases, provided that first the delicta were levia, and next the consent of the plaintiff if a layman were obtained; and 2. Episcopal intercession for criminals, all along looked upon as a duty and regarded with favour, received a civil sanction at the hands of Justinian; while Heraclius A.D. 628 formally committed jurisdiction over the criminal offences of clergy to the bishops, to be judged "κατὰ ῥωμαίων κανόνας" (Lennclav. Jus Graeco-rom. i. 79). In relation to appeals, we have cases of clerks, appoints the bishop and civil Emperor (Novell. cxxiii. c. 21); the civil judge to try the case, but within two months, and the bishop then (if the accused is condemned) to deprive (Novell. lxxiii.); and that in the law of Heraclius, just mentioned, occurs the well-known phrase—that if the case were beyond the canonical punishment, then the bishop should be directed, "τὸν τοιοῦτον τοῖς πολιτικοῖς ἀρχαῖσι παραδίδόνθαι, τὰς τὸν ἡμετέρας διαμαρτυρούμενος νόμους τιμωρίας ὑποσχεσόμενον." And in such cases, therefore, the cause was thenceforth transferred from the spiritual to the lay tribunal. So also Justinian (Novell. lxxiii.) requires the convicted criminal clerk to be first deposed by the bishop, and then, but not before, ὄντ τὰς τῶν νόμων χρεῖσθαι χρεῖστας. Under the Carolingian empire, the apocrisiarius or Archicapellanus acted as the Emperor's deputy in the final decision of clerical causes of all kinds, the Emperor being the ultimate judge in these as in secular ones (Conc. Francof. A.D. 749 c. 6; and see for Cappellani under the Franks, Walafr. Strab., De Reb. Eccl. c. 31).

APPROBATION OF BOOKS. [CENSORSHIP OF BOOKS.]

APRONIANUS, martyr at Rome, commemorated Feb. 2 (Mart. Rom. Vet.). [C.]

APSE, the niche or recess which terminates a church at the end near which the high altar is placed. This feature existed in the basilicas or halls of justice constructed by the Romans, the tribunal for the presiding magistrate having been placed in the centre of the arc forming the apse.

In the earlier centuries the apse was almost invariably semicircular, in some churches and date from the third or early part of the fourth century the apse is internal, so that the building has a rectangular termination. At Sta. Croce in Jerusalem, at Rome, has this plan, though it when it first became a church; but in Italy it is very rarely found; in Africa and in Asia it seems to have prevailed, particularly in the earlier period: the basilica of Reparatus at Orlensville, in Algeria, believed to date from A.D. 252; the churches at Deyr Abu-Fannah near Hermapolis Magna, at Hermonthis (Erment) in Egypt, at Ibrihm in Nubia, at Pergamus, and Ephesus, are all thus planned. [CHURCH.]

In the basilica of St. Reparatus there is a second apse, also internal, at the other end of the building; this is believed to have been added about the year 403.

In the churches built in the fifth century in the East three apses are often found, the naves as well as the central nave being so terminated; in the following century this plan, the so-called parallel triapsal, was introduced into Italy and built A.D. 538-549, (though with a peculiar modification), and the Duomo at Porenzo (A.D. 542), exhibit it. In the eighth and ninth centuries it appears at Rome, as in St. Maria in Cosmedin (A.D. 772-795), and a few other churches.

The transverse-triapsal plan, that in which there are three apses, one projecting from the end, and one from each side of the building, is rarely found in churches of the usual basilican plan, or in any anterior to the sixth century. It occurs (with some modification) in St. Sophia's, Constantinople, and in other churches for which that building served in some degree as a model, and in the eleventh and twelfth centuries is common in Germany. It is, however, found at Rome in oratories, even in the fifth century, as in that of St. John the Baptist opening from the baptistry of the Lateran, built by Pope Hilarus, cir. A.D. 461, and that of Stn. Croce, built by the same pope, but now destroyed.

About the year 800 churches in Germany were constructed with an apse at each end; the greater church at Reichenau, in the Lake of Constance, begun in 816, has a semicircular apse at one end and a square recess at the other; the plan prepared for the church of St. Gall in the beginning of the ninth century shows a semicircular apse at each end.

The altar was usually placed in the chord of the arc of the apse, the cathedra or chair for the bishop in the centre of the arc against the wall, while a stone bench, or a series of such, one above the other, afforded places for the clergy. At Torcello, near Venice, there are six such ranges. Apses so fitted appear to have been called "apsides gradatæ." [CURCH.] [A. N.]

APULEIUS, disciple of Peter, martyr at Rome, commemorated Oct. 7 (Mart. Rom. Vet., Bedæ); in Riehm's MS. of the Gregorian Sacramentary (see Menard's ed. p. 418).

AQUAMANIILE (other forms, Aquamaniium, Aquamanus, Gr. Χερσίδιον), the basin used for the washing of the hands of the celebrant in the liturgy. The aquamanile with the urecus are the hasna and ewer of the sacred ceremony.

In the Statuta Antiqua called the "Canons of the Fourth Council of Carthage" (Canon V.), it is laid down that a subdeacon should receive at his ordination from the hands of the archdeacon an aquamanile (corruptly written "aqua et manile") as one of the emblems of his office. Compare Isidore, De Eccl. Off. ii. 10. And these directions are repeated verbatim in the office for the ordination of a subdeacon in the Gregorian Sacramentary (p. 221). In the Greek office, the subdeacon receives χερσίδιον καὶ μανδύλιον, where the word χερσίδιον perhaps includes both urecus and aquamanile (Daniel's Codex Lit. iv. 550).

In the Ordo Romanus I. (p. 5), the acolytes are directed to carry an aquamanus (among other things) after the Pope in the great procession of Easter-Day.

Aquamaniilla of great splendour are frequently mentioned in ancient records. Desiderius of Auxerre is said to have given to his church "aquamaniilla pensans libras ii. et uncias x.; habet in medio rotam liliatam et in cauda caput hominis;" and Brunhilda, queen of the Franks, offered through the same Desiderius to the church of St. Germanus "aquamaniillum pensans libras iii. et uncias ix.; habet in medio Neptunum cum tridente" (Krazer, De Liturgiis, p. 210). ARCA, ARCULA. 1. A chest intended to receive pecuniary offerings for the service of the church or for the poor (Tertullian, Apologeticus, c. 39). Of this kind was probably the "arca pecuniae," which Pope Stephen (an. 260) is said to have handed over, with the sacred vessels, to his archdeacon when he was imprisoned (Liber Pontif. c. 24); and such that which Paulinus Petricordus says (in Vita S. Martini, lib. iv. ap. Ducange) was committed to the charge of a deacon chosen for the purpose. The box from which priests received their portions is described as an "arca sancta" by Marcellus (Vita S. Felis, c. 3).

2. It is used of a box or casket in which the Eucharist was reserved: thus Cyprian (De Lapsis, c. 26, p. 486) speaks of an "arca in qua Domini sacramentum fuit," from which fire issued, to the great terror of a woman who attempted to open it with unholy hands. In this case, the casket appears to have been in the house, and perhaps contained the reserved Eucharist for the sick.

3. Among the prayers which precede the Ethiopic Canon (Renaudot, Lit. Orient. i. 501) is one "Super arcam sive discum majorem." The prayer itself suggests that this arca was used for precisely the same purpose as the paten, inasmuch as in both cases the petition is that in or upon it may be perfected (perficatur) the Body of the Lord. Renaudot (p. 525) seems to think that it may have served the purpose of an ANTIMENSUM (q. v.).

It does not appear, however, that its use was limited to the case of unconsecrated altars; and when we remember that the Copts applied the term ἱεραρχία to the Christian altar (Kennan

It is worth noticing that chests are said to have been anciently used as altars in Rome [ALTAR]. Dr. Neale (Eastern Church, Introd. p. 186) says that the tabout or ark of the Ethiopic Church is used for the reservation of the Sacrament. ARCANI DISCIPLINA [DISCIPLINA AR-

ARCHBISHOP.—The earliest use of this title was probably the same as that with which we are familiar in the Modern Church, viz., as designating a metropolitan or chief bishop of a province. Afterwards, however, as the hierarchical system of the Church was further extended to correspond with the civil divisions of the Roman empire, it became appropriated to the higher dignity of patriarch. Thus according to Bingham (ii. 17), Liberatus (ibid. c. 37) gives all the patriarchs this title of archbishops, and he adds, so does the Council of Chalcedon frequently, speaking of the patriarchs of Rome and Constantinople under the name of archbishops also. About the time of Constantine the empire was divided into dioceses, each of which contained many provinces. This division, like the earlier one as the State had an exarch or vicar in the capital city of each civil diocese, so the Church, in process of time, came to have her exarchs or patriarchs in many, if not all, the capital cities of the empire. These patriarchs were originally called archbishops, which title had therefore a much more extensive signification than it has at present. The principal privileges of the archbishops of that period were—1. To ordain all the metropolitans of the diocese, their own ordination being received from a Diocesan Synod; 2. To convene Diocesan Synods and to preside in them; 3. To receive appeals from metropolitans and from Metropolitan Synods; 4. To censure metropolitans, and also their suffragans when metropolitans were remiss in censuring them. The Patriarch or Archbishop of Alexandria had from very early times some peculiar privileges within his diocese, but originally all patriarchs were co-ordinate, as well as mutually independent as regards actual power, though some had a precedence of honour, as those of Rome, Constantinople, Alexandria, and Jerusalem, to whom the canon gave precedence of all others.

For "Archbishop" in its later and present signification, see METROPOLITAN. [D. B.]

ARCHDEACON. — 'Αρχιδιάκονος, 'Αρχιδιάκων, 'Αρχιδιάκονη (Catal. Patriarch, Constant. 10306, ap. Mai Script. Vol. iii. 243, though perhaps somewhat late), Archidiaconus, Archidiacon, Levita septimus (Joannes Secundus, Vit. Greg. Max. l. i. c. 25).

1. Origin of Name and Office.—That there was from the first a primacy among deacons, as there appears to have been among presbyters, and as there was afterwards among bishops, is more a matter of conjecture than of historical certainty. It is reasonable to suppose that some one deacon, either the senior in office or the most eminent in ability, took the lead of the rest, as St. Stephen deacons (whence the Menologium gives him the title 'Αρχιδιάκονος); but it is uncertain when this became a part of the regular ecclesiastical order. The name is sometimes given by later writers to prominent deacons of the first four centuries; for example, St. Lawrence, who had evidently some precedence over his brother deacons, is called archdeacon by his brother (Serm. de Diversis, cxi. cap. 9; Sanctus Laurentius called archdeacon by Optatus of Carthage is Paris, 1679). But other writers describe the office by a periphrasis; for example, Theodoret (H. E. i. 26) uses the phrase ὁ τοῦ χοροῦ τῶν διακόνων ἡγούμενος to describe the position—which was evidently equivalent to that of an archdeacon—of Athanasius at Alexandria; and there is the negative evidence that neither the Apostolical Constitutions (although some have supposed the phrase ὁ παρῆρτος τῶ ἀρχιερεὶ διάκωνος, in ii. 57, to refer to it), and that Cornelius (ap. Euseb. H. E. vi. 43) omits the archdeacon from his list of Church officers at Rome. The first contemporary use of the title is, in the Eastern Church, in the old version of the acts of the Council of Ephesus (Labbe, Supplem. Concil. p. rome cap. Ep. xv. ad Rusticum). After that period it is in constant use.

In both East and West the title appears to have been restricted to the secular clergy; the first in rank of the deacons of a monastery seems to have had, in the East, the title of προποδίακωνος (but not universally, for Joannes Climacus, Scal. Parad. p. 58, also uses the title ἀρχιδιάκων of a monk); a deacon in a similar position in the West seems to have had, at least in early times, no special designation.

II. Mode of Appointment.—The mode of appointment varied with particular times and places. At first, and in some places permanently, the deacon who was senior in date of ordination appears to have held the office, without any special appointment, by right of his seniority. That this was the usual practice at Constantinople is clear from the answer of Anatolius to Leo the Great in the case of Andrew and Aetius. Leo, probably having the use of the Roman Church in his mind, assumes in his letter of remonstrance to Anatolius that the latter had appointed (constituisset) Andrew archdeacon. Anatolius replies that, on the ordination of Aetius as presbyter, Andrew had succeeded him as archdeacon in regular order (non dignitate honoratus—S. Leon. Mag. Op. vol. i. p. 502, ed. Paris, 1675). But, on the other hand, Sozomen speaks of Serapion as having been appointed by Chrysostom (ὁ ἀρχιδιάκων αὐτοῦ ἀπετέθησε—H. E. viii. 9), and Theodoret notices that Athanasius was at the head of the deacons, though young in years (ὡς τὴν ἡλικίαν), which could hardly have been the case in so large a church as that of Alexandria if the rule of seniority had been followed. St. Jerome has indeed been sometimes quoted to show that the practice at Alexandria was for the deacons to elect their archdeacon, but the hypothetical form of the sentence ("quomodo si . . . diaconi elegant de se quod . . . iudicium noverint et Archidiaconum vocent") makes it difficult to use the passage as an assertion of an existing fact. In the West there appears to have been a similar diversity of practice. The phrases which are sometimes used (e.g. by Joannes Secundus, lit. S. Greg. Mar. i. 25, "levitiam septimum ad suum adiutorium constituit") seem to show, what might also be expected from the nature of the case, that when the archdeacon became not so much the first in rank of the minor officers of the Church as the bishop's secretary and delegate, the bishop had at least a voice in his appointment. But there is a canon of a Gallic council in A.D. 506 (Conc. Agath. can. xxiii., Mansi, viii. 328) which strongly asserts the rule of seniority, and enacts that even in cases in which the senior deacon, propter simpliciore naturam, was unfit for the office, he was to have the title (loci sui nomen teneat), although the burden of the duty devolved upon another. In later times, however, it is clear that the right of appointment rested absolutely with the bishop.

III. Number, and Duration of Office.—It is clear, both from the statement of St. Jerome (Ep. xv. ad Rusticum, "singuli ecclesiarum episcopi, singuli archiepiscopi, singuli archidiaconi") and from the invariable use of the singular number in the canons of the councils which refer to the office, that for several centuries there was but one archdeacon in each diocese. When the number was increased is not altogether clear. The increase seems to have been a result partly of the increase in the number of rural parishes, partly of the difficulty of dividing dioceses which were coextensive with civil divisions. The fact of the Council of Merida (A.D. 866) having directly prohibited the appointment of more than one archdeacon in each diocese seems to indicate that such a practice had been contemplated, if not actually adopted (Conc. Emerit. can. x., Mansi, xi. 81); but the first actual record of a plurality of archdeacons occurs a century later in the diocese of Strasburg. In 774, Bishop Heddo divided that diocese into three archdeaconries (archidiaconatus rurales), and from that time there appears to have been throughout the West—except in Italy, where the dioceses were small—a general practice of relieving bishops of the difficulties of the administration of overgrown dioceses by appointing archdeacons for separate divisions, and giving them a delegatio (ultimately a delegatio perpetua) as to the visitation of parishes. Thence grew up the distinction between the "Archidiaconus magnus" of the Cathedral Church and the "Archidiaconi rurales." The former was at the head of the cathedral clergy, whence in much later times he was known as the provost (prepositus) of the cathedral, ranking as such before the archpresbyter or dean. The latter had a corresponding status in their several districts; they were usually at the head of the chapter of a provincial town, and they had precedence, and perhaps jurisdiction, over the "Archipresbyteri rurales," who were at the head of subdivisions of the archdeaconries, and corresponded to modern "rural deans." There was this further difference between the two classes, that the rural archdeacons were usually priests, whereas the cathedral archdeacon, even so late as the 12th century, was usually a deacon.

Originally, the office was limited to deacons; an archdeacon who received priest's orders ceased thereby to be an archdeacon. Proofs and examples of this are numerous. St. Jerome says (in Ezech. c. xlviii.) that an archdeacon "injuriarum putat si presbyter ordinatur." Antolinus made his archdeacon Aetlius a presbyter in order to get rid of him, of which proceeding Leo the Great, in a formal complaint to the Emperor Marcian on the subject, says "dejectionem innocentis per speciem promotionis implevit" (S. Leon. Magn. Epist. 57, al. 84); and Sidonius Apollinaris speaks of an archdeacon John who was so good an archdeacon that he was kept from the presbyterate in consequence ("dignitate non potuit augere ne potestate posset absolvi"—lib. iv. ep. 24). It is not certain at what date presbyters were allowed to hold office as archdeacons; probably the earliest certain evidence on the point is that which is afforded by Hincmar of Rheims, who (A.D. 874) addresses his archdeacons as "archidiaconibus-presbyteris" (Mansi, xv. 497).

IV. Functions.—At first an archdeacon differed only from other deacons in respect of precedence. In the churches of the East he was probably never much more. Individual archdeacons attained to eminence, but not by virtue of their office. Their office gave them such privileges as the right of reading the Gospel in the cathedral (e.g. at Alexandria; Sozomen, vii. 19), and of receiving the sacred elements before the other deacons (Joannes Citri, Resp. ad Cabasil. sp. Meursius, Gl. Græco-Barb. a. v.); but they appear to have had no administrative functions, and at Constantinople, so unimportant did the office become, from an ecclesiastical point of view, that at last the archdeacon became only an officer of the Imperial court (Codinus, De Off. Constantin. c. xvii. 38).

It was different in the West. Partly from the fact that the deacons, and especially, therefore, the senior deacon, were the administrative officers of the Church; partly from the fact that the senior deacon had been from early times especially attached to the bishop, the office, which, even in the time of St. Leo, was called the "officiorum primatus" (S. Leon. Magn. Ep. 106, al. 71), assumed an importance which at one period was hardly inferior to that of the episcopate itself.

The functions of the office may conveniently be distributed under two heads, according as they grew out of the original functions of the deaconate, or out of the special relation of the archdeacon to the bishop.

(1) The archdeacon seems to have had charge of the funds of the Church; e.g. both St. Ambrose and St. Augustine, in speaking of St. Lawrence, speak of him as having the "opæ ecclesie" in his custody (S. Aug. Serm. de Divers. cit. c. 9); and St. Leo describes the appointment of an archdeacon by the phrase "quem ecclesiasticis negotiis præposuit" (S. Leon. Magn. Ep. 85, al. 58).

the poor; St. Jerome speaks of the archdeacon as "mensuram et viduarum minister" (S. Hieron. in Ezech. cxlviii.), and the 4th Council of Carthage prohibits a bishop from attending to the "gubernationem viduarum et peregrinarum" himself, but orders him to do so "per archipresbyterum aut per archidiaconum" (IV. Conc. Carth. can. xvii.; Mansi, iii. 952).

Afterwards, if we are to trust the letter of Isidore of Seville to the Bishop of Cordova, he appears to have distributed to the clergy of the several orders the money which was offered for their support at the communion (Isid. Hisp. Ep. ad Ludifr., Op. ed. Paris, 1601, p. 615).

(2) The archdeacon had the "ordinatio ecclesiac," that is, the superintendence of the arrangements of the cathedral church and of divine service. He was "master of the ceremonies." As such he had (a) to keep note of the calendar, and to announce the fasts and festivals (Isid. Hisp. ibid.; cf. the phrase "concionatur in populo" of Jerome in Ezech. c. xlviii.). (B) He had to correct offences against ecclesiastical order during divine service; for example, at Carthage a woman who kissed the relics of an unrecognized martyr was reproved (correcta) by Caecilian (Optat. i. p. 18). Probably this was a duty of the archdeacon in the East as well as in the West; at least it is difficult to account for the origin of the unseemly scuffle between Meletius and his archdeacon at Antioch (Sozom. H. E. iv. 28) unless we suppose that the latter was exercising a supposed right. (γ) He had to see that the arrangements of the Church for divine service were properly made, and that the ritual was properly observed. Isidore of Seville (ibid.) assigns to him in detail, "cura vestiendi ritaris a levitis, cura incensi, et sacrificii necessaria sollicitudo, quis levitarum Apostolum et Evangelium legat, quis preces dicat."

(8) The same authority, or quasi-authority, may be quoted for his having also charge of the fabric of the cathedral church: "pro reparanda diocesanis basilicis ipse suggerit sacerdoti" (ibid.).

(3) The archdeacon had to superintend and to exercise discipline over the deacons and other inferior clergy. This was common to both East and West; and as early as the Council of Chalcedon we find it stated that a deacon (Maras of Edessa) had been excommunicated by his archdeacon (ἀκωνάγγελός ἐστι τῷ ἴδιῳ ἀρχidiaκόνῳ; but the bishop, Ibas, who is speaking, goes on to say, οὐδὲ ἐπιπέσει ἀκωνάγγελος, which seems to implicate that the bishop and the archdeacon had co-ordinate jurisdiction over deacons; Mansi, vii. 232). A curious instance of the extent of their authority is afforded by a canon of the Council of Agde, in Gaul, which enacts that "Clerici qui comam nutritum ab archidiacono etiam si noluerint inviti detondeantur" (Conc. Apath. can. xx.; Mansi, viii. 328). This ordinary jurisdiction of an archdeacon over the inferior clergy must be distinguished from the delegated jurisdiction which he possessed in later times. The canon of the Council of Toledo which is cited in the Decretals as giving him an ordinary jurisdiction over presbyters is confessedly spurious (Mansi, iii. 1008).

(4) This power of exercising discipline was combined with the duty of instructing the inferior clergy in the duties of their office. The 4th Council of Carthage enacts that the ostiarius before ordination is to be instructed by the archdeacon. Gregory of Tours identifies the archdeacon with the "preceptor" (H. F. lib. vi. c. 36), and speaks of himself as living at the head of the community of deacons (Vit. Patr. c. 9). The house of this community appears to have been called the "diaconium" ("lector in diaconio Caecilian" — Optat. lib. i. c. 21), and is probably referred to by Paulinus when he says that he lived "sub cura" of the deacon Castus (Paulin. V. Ambros. c. 42).

ARCHDEACON

(5) As a corollary from these relations of an archdeacon to the inferior clergy, it was his office to enquire into their character before ordination, and sometimes to take part in the ceremony itself. Even in the East it is possible that he had some kind of control over ordinations, for Ibas is said to have been prevented by his archdeacon from ordaining an unworthy person as bishop (κωλύεις παρὰ τοῦ τριμκάδα ἀρχidiaκόνου αὐτοῦ—Conc. Chalc. act. x., as quoted by Bur. érou—vii. 224). In the African Church the archdeacon was directed to take part in the ordination of the subdeacons, acolyths, and ceterarius (IV. Conc. Carthag. Mansi, iii. 951). Throughout the West his testimony to character appears to have been required. At Rome this was the case even at the ordination of presbyters; but Jerome speaks of it as "unius urbis consuetudinem" (S. Hieron. Ep. ci. al. lxxxv. ad Evang.). In later times the archdeacon enquired into the literary as well as into the moral qualifications of candidates for ordination; but there is no distinct authority for supposing this to have been the case during the first nine centuries; the earliest is that of Hincmar of Rheims, in 874, who directed his archdeacon-presbyters to enquire diligently into both the "vita et scientia" of those whom they presented for ordination (Mansi, xv. 497). In one other point they appear in some places to have conformed to later practice, for Isidore of Pelusium (Ep. i. 29) reproves his archdeacon for making money from ordination fees (ἀπὸ τιμῆς χειροτονιῶν).

2. The second class of an archdeacon's functions were those which grew out of his close connection with the bishop. The closeness of this connection is shown as early as the 4th century by St. Jerome, who says of the "primus ministerium," i.e. the archdeacon, that he never leaves the bishop's side ("a pontificis latere non recedit"—Hieron. in Ezech. c. xlvi.). This expression has, without any corroborative evidence except the indefinite phrase of the Apostolical Constitutions (quoted above), been interpreted exclusively of his attendance upon the bishop at the altar. It is probable that this is included in the expression, but it is improbable that nothing else is meant by it. The mass of evidence goes to show that while the arch-presbyter was the bishop's assistant chiefly in spiritual matters, the archdeacon was his assistant chiefly in secular matters.

(1) He was attached to the bishop, probably in the capacity of a modern chaplain or secretary. He transacted the greater part of the business of the diocese; for example, St. Leo speaks of the office as involving "dispensationem totius causae et curae ecclesiasticae" (Ep. lxxiv. al. lvii.). He conveyed the bishop's orders to the clergy; for example, when John of Jerusalem prohibited Epiphanius from preaching, he did so "per archidiaconum" (S. Hieron. Ep. xxviii. al. li.). He acted as the bishop's substitute at synods; for example, Photinus at the Council of Chalcedon (Mansi, vi. 567). Compare the canon of the Council of Trullo, in 692 (Mansi, xi. 943), which forbids a deacon from having precedence over a presbyter, except when acting as substitute for a bishop, and the canon of the Council of Merida, in 666 (Mansi, xi. 79), which expressly disapproves of the practice. Ordinary deacons were sometimes called the "bishop's eyes," whence Isidore of Pelusium, writing to his archdeacon, says that he ought to be "all eye" (ὅλος ὀφθαλμὸς ὀφείλεις ὑπάρχειν—Isid. Pel. Ep. l. 29).

(2) In somewhat later times he was delegated by the bishop to visit parishes, and to exercise jurisdiction over all orders of the clergy. There is no trace of this in the East. It grew up in the West with the growth of large dioceses, with the prevalence of the practice of appointing bishops for other than ecclesiastical merits, and with the rise of the principle of the immunity of ecclesiastical persons and things from the jurisdiction of the secular power. But it is difficult to determine the date at which such delegations became common. The earliest evidence upon which reliance can be placed is that of the Council of Auxerre in 578, which enacted that, in certain cases, a parish priest who was detained by infirmity should send "ad archidiaconum suum," implying a certain official relation between them. More definite testimony is afforded by the Council of Châlons in 650, which expressly recognises his right of visiting private chapels ("oratoria per villas potentium"—I. Conc. Catill. can. 14; Mansi, x. 1192). A similar enactment was made at the second Council of Châlons, in 813, which, however, censures the exacting of fees for visitations ("ne census exigant"—II. Conc. Catill. c. 15). In later times this "delegatio" became a "delegatio perpetua," not revocable at the pleasure of the bishop who had conferred it; but that such was not the case during the first nine centuries is clear from the letter of Hincmar to his archdeacons (quoted above), and also from the fact that Isidore of Seville, whose authority, or quasi-authority, was so frequently quoted to confirm the later pretensions of the archdeacons, only speaks of their visiting parishes "cum iussione episcopi."

The rise of the separate jurisdiction of the archdeacon is still more obscure. In the 6th century we find him named as the bishop's assessor in certain cases (I. Conc. Matic. can. 8, Mansi, ix. 933; II. Conc. Matic. can. 12; Mansi, ix. 954); but there is no trustworthy evidence in favour of the existence of an "archdeacon's court" within the period of which the present work takes cognizance.

(3) In the East, during the vacancy of a see, the archdeacon appears to have been its guardian or co-guardian. Chrysostom writes to Innocent of Rome, complaining that Theophilus of Alexandria had written to his archdeacon "as though the church were already widowed, and had no bishop" (ὡςπερ ἦδη χηρῶσιν τῆς ἐκκλησίας καὶ οὐκ ἔχουσιν ἐπίσκοπον—Mansi, iii. 1085); and in the letter which the Council of Chalcedon wrote to the clergy of Alexandria to inform them of the deposition of their bishop Dioscorus, the archdeacon and the oecumenos are specially named. In the West it is not clear that this was the case; but sometimes the archdeacon was regarded as having a right of succession. Eulogius (ap. Phot. Bibl. 182) says that it was a law at Rome for the archdeacon to succeed; but the instance which he gives, that of Cornelius making his archdeacon a presbyter, to cut off his right of succession, is very questionable, the date being earlier than the existence of the office. No doubt, many archdeacons were chosen to succeed, but the most striking instances which are sometimes quoted to confirm the statement of Eulogius, those of St. Leo and St. Gregory, were probably both exceptional.

(An amusing blunder identified the archdeacon, who was sometimes called not only "oecus episcopi," but "oecus episcopi," with the chorepiscopus or suffragan bishop; the blunder, which has been not unfrequently repeated, seems to be traceable in the first instance to Johannes Abbas de translatione reliquiarum S. Glodisvidis, quoted in H. Vales. Adnot. ad Theodoret. l. 26.) [E. H.]

ARCHELAI¹, or ARCHILLAUS, commemorated Aug. 23 (Mart. Rom. Vet.). [C.]

ARCHIMANDRITE (ἀρχων τῆς μονῆρας, prefectus cœnobii), lit. ruler of "the fold"—the spiritual fold that is—a favourite metaphor for designating monasteries in the East, and very soon applied. As early as A.D. 378 we find St. Epiphanius commencing his work against heresies in consequence of a letter addressed to him by Acacius and Paul, styling themselves "presbyters and archimandrites," that is, fathers of the monasteries in the parts of Carthage and Beroea in Coele-Syria. Possibly St. Epiphanius omits to style them "archimandrites" in his reply, because the term was not yet in general use.* But at the time of the Council of Ephesus the Emperors Theodosius and Valentinian received a petition from "a deacon and archimandrite," named Basil (Mansi, tom. iv. p. 1101). At the Council of Constantinople, A.D. 448, under Flavian, 23 archimandrites affixed their signatures to the condemnation of Eutyches, himself an archimandrite. Sometimes the same person was styled archimandrite and hegumen indifferently; but, in general, the archimandrite presided over several monasteries, and the hegumen over but one. The latter was therefore subject to the former, as a bishop to a metropolitan or archbishop. Again, there was an exarch, or visitor of monasteries, by some thought to have been inferior to the archimandrite, by some superior, and by some different only from him in name. But if it is a fact that archimandrites were admitted to their office by the patriarch alone, though he, of course may have sometimes admitted the others as well, it would seem to suggest that they occupied the highest rank in the monastic hierarchy, analogous to that of patriarch amongst bishops. According to Gear (Euchol. p. 240) archimandrites had the privilege of ordaining readers, which the ordinary hegumens had not; but he has omitted to point out where this privilege is conferred in the form of admission given by him further on (p. 492). ARCHIPPUS, the fellow-labourer of St. Paul commemorated March 20 (Mart. Rom. Vet.); as "Apostle," Feb. 19 (Cul. Byzant.).

ARCHISUBDIACONUS.—This is a word which occurs in the canons of the synod of Auxerre (Synod. Autissiodor. can. 6; Mansi, ix. 912), but apparently not elsewhere. If the reading be genuine, it would appear that in some dioceses the subdeacons as well as the deacons had their primate; but it is probable that the reading should be subarchidiaconum, which may have been another name for the officer known to the Greeks as δευτερεύων, and to some of the stern dioceses as secundarius. [E. H.]

ARCHIPRESBYTER. (ἀρχιπρεσβύτερος, term was πρωτοπρεσβύτερος, which is found applied to the same person in the corresponding passage of Socrates, H. E. vi. 9; cf. also Phot. Bibl. 59, in the account of the irregular synod against Chrysostom, and Mansi, vii. 252, from which it appears that the word was found in some versions of the acts of the Council of Chalcedon; in later times = πρωτοππάς, Codin. De Off. Eccl. Const. c. l.; archipresbyter, S. Hieron. Ep. xcv. ad Rustic.)

The origin of the office is not clear; after the permanent establishment of the distinction between the episcopate and presbyterate it appears that the senior presbyter had certain recognized rights in virtue of his seniority; but there is no evidence of his having had a distinct name until the close of the 4th century, when we find it, as quoted above, in Socrates.

For some time the name, when given at all, seems to have been given as a matter of course to the presbyter who was senior in date of ordination. But the assertion of Gregory Nazianzen (Orat. xliii. 39) that he refused την των προ-βυτερων προτιμωσιν, which Basil offered him, and the phrase of Liberatus (Brev. c. xiv.) "qui [see Dict. of Chr. Biogr. art. DIOSCORUS OF ALEXANDRIA] et eum [see Dict. of Chr. Biogr. art. PROTERIUS] archipresbyterum fecerat" seem to show that in some places in the East the bishop held the power of making a special appointment. In the West, however, this was regarded as a violation of the regular order, for St. Leo (Ep. v. ad xvii.) finds great fault with Dorus of Bene-ventum for giving precedence (he does not use the word archpresbyter) to a newly ordained presbyter over his seniors.

At first there appears to have been only one archpresbyter in a diocese (cf. S. Hieron. Ep. xcv. ad Rustic., "singuli ecclesiarum episcopi, singuli archipresbyteri, singuli archidiaconi"). He took rank next after the bishop, all of whose functions he performed during the vacancy of a see, and some of them, e.g. baptism, during the bishop's temporary absence. It has been held that he had also a right of succession, but this is hardly proved. With the increase in the population of the large dioceses of the West and the growing difficulty of subdividing them, on account of their identification with civil divisions, began the system of placing an archpresbyter (arch. ruralis) in each of the larger towns, who stood in the same relation to the clergy of the surrounding district as the archpresbyter of the cathedral to the rest of the clergy of the cathedral. The first mention of these rural archpresbyters is in Gregory of Tours (Metr. i. 78, ii. 22). Their duties may be gathered from various canons of Tours, in 567, enacted that subpresbyters were to be liable to penance if they neglected to compel the presbyters and other clergy of their respective districts to live chastely (Mansi, ix. 787). The Council of Auxerre, in 578, inflicted a similar but heavier penalty on them if they neglected to inform the bishop or the archdeacon (the first instance of such a subordination of rank) of clerical delinquencies; and also enacted that "sæcularium" who neglected to submit to the institutionem et admonitionem archipresbyteri astical privileges but also to be fined at the king's discretion (Mansi, ix. 797). From Can. 19 of the Council of Rheims, in 630, it would appear that certain feudal rights of seigniority had begun to attach to the archpresbyters, in consequence of which the office was being held by laymen (Mansi, x. 597). The Council of Châlons, in 650, enacted that lay judges were not to visit monasteries or parishes, except on the invitation in the archpresbyter (Mansi, x. 1191).

The name decanus, which was given to the archpresbyter of the cathedral, and decanus ruralis, which was given to the archpresbyter of a country district, as also the struggle for precedence between the archpresbyters and the archdeacons, in which the latter were ultimately victorious, belong to a later period. ARCHIVES. [REGISTERS.]

ARCOSOLIUM. This word is derived by Murigny (Dict. des Antiq. Chret.) from "arcus," an arch, and "solum," which according to him is sometimes used in the sense of sarcophagus. The word is found in the sense of sarcophagus in the cornice of the Palazzo Borghese (Marchi, Mon. delle Arti Christ. pri nit. p. 85), which runs thus: "Domus æternalis Aur. Calsi et Aur. Iarionobis et nostris [leg. comparativum] fecimus cuius suo in pacem." make mention of it, and it has been supposed to denote those tombs hewn in the living rock of the catacombs at Rome (and elsewhere), in which there is an arched opening above the portion reserved for the deposition of the body to be interred, the grave being dug from above downwards into the reserved portion below the arch.

There seems, however, some reason for doubting whether the attribution of the word is correct, and whether we ought not rather to understand by it the sepulchral chambers or cubicles in which the great majority of these tombs are found.

It is difficult to understand how one tomb of the kind could contain more than about five bodies, even if two were placed in the grave below, and three in loculi cut in the wall under the arch; while the inscription quoted above would seem to imply that a much larger number were to be placed in the arcosolium made by Aurelius Celsus; but it may be that these persons were all mentioned in order that the right of interment of relations or friends might not be disputed if claimed.

It is not clear how or where the parieticulum or partition could be placed. Martigny says that the arcosolia were divided into several compartments by these walls, but does not explain in what way. If the word mean merely the tomb, parieticulum would probably mean the wall included under the arch.

The word may really be derived from "arca," a sarcophagus, and "solium," which among other meanings has that of a piscina or reservoir in a bath, and in mediæval Latin of a chamber generally, it may thus denote a vault containing sarcophagi.

In the tombs of this kind the receptacle for the corpse was sometimes covered by a slab of marble, or sometimes a marble sarcophagus is inserted. In a few cases the sarcophagus projects forward into the chamber, and the sides of the arch are continued to the ground beyond the sarcophagus.

Such slabs or sarcophagi have been supposed to have served as altars during the period of persecution, as being the resting-places of saints or martyrs, and in some instances this may have been the case; but the far greater number of these tombs are no doubt of later date, and simply the monuments used by the wealthier class. The bishops and martyrs of the 3rd century were, as may be seen in the cemetery of Callixtus (on the Via Appia near Rome), placed, not in these "arcosolia" or "monumenta arcuata," but in simple "loculi," excavations in the wall just large enough to receive a body placed lengthwise (v. De Rossi, Toma Sott. Crist. t. II. tav. I. II. III.). It seems hardly probable that, when such illustrious martyrs were interred in so humble a manner, more obscure sufferers should be more highly honoured; this consideration seems to afford ground for the supposition that, where a saint or martyr of the first three centuries has been placed in a decorated tomb, such a memorial is to be attributed not to the period of the original interment, but to the piety of a later time. In the 4th and 5th centuries the humble "loculus" was altered into the decorated "monumentum arcuatum," and the whole sepulchral chamber in many cases richly adorned with inscriptions of marble, with stucco, and with paintings. An excellent example of this is afforded by the chamber in the cemetery of Callixtus, in which the remains of the Pope Eusebius (309-311) and Militades (or Melchades, 311-314) were placed, a part of which is represented in the annexed woodcut.

In the walls of this chamber are three large "arcosolia," in front of one of which was a marble slab, with an inscription by Pope Damasus commemorating Pope Eusebius (v. De Rossi, t. II. tav. III. IV. and VIII.). The whole chamber has been richly decorated with marble incrustations, paintings, and mosaics. These decorations it would seem reasonable to assign to Pope Damasus, who undoubtedly set up the inscription. Another inscription by Pope Damasus found in the crypt of St. Sixtus in the same cemetery, testifies the desire then felt to lie in death near the remains of holy personages, and at the same time the awe and respect felt for them in these words—

"Hic fateror volui Damasus mea condere membra Sed ciores timui sanctos vexare pium."

This pleas are gradually diminished, and loculi are found excavated above, below, before, at the side of the sepulchre of confessors and martyrs. Hence the formulæ "ad sanctos," "ad martyres," "supra sanctos," "retro sanctos," "ante sanctos," often found in inscriptions in the catacombs. A good instance of this practice may be seen over the tomb of Pope Eusebius, where a painting representing the Good Shepherd has been cut through in order to form a loculus.

Arcosolium in the Cemetery of Callixtus.

Loculi so excavated within the arch of the "arcosolia" are, however, too common to be always accounted for in this manner, and in many instances were no doubt intended for the children or near relatives of those who lay below.

In the year 1859, in the cemetery of St. Callixtus, an unviolated "arcosolium" was discovered; in this a marble sarcophagus was found, in which lay a body swathed in numerous bands of linen exactly in the manner shown in the early representations of the raising of Lazarus.

These "arcosolia" were often decorated with paintings, either on the front of the sarcophagus or on the wall above it. Examples may be found in Perret's work on the "Catacombs," vol. I. pl. LVII.-LXX. One of the most remarkable instances is the tomb of St. Hermes in the cata-combs near Rome called by his name.

The tombs of this class are more usually found in the "cubicula," or small chambers, than in the galleries of the catacombs: in the former, two, three, or more are often found. Martigny seeks to draw a distinction between those found in the "cubicula," which he thinks may often or generally be those of wealthy individuals made at their own cost, and those in the so-called chapels or larger excavations, which he thinks were community. In one such chapel in the Christian of St. Agnes near Rome there are eleven such tombs. Rostell (Beschreibung von Rom, by Bunsen and others, vol. i. p. 408) gives it as his opinion that such chapels, especially connected with the veneration of martyrs, do not usually date from an earlier period than the 4th or 5th century.
The work of the Cav. de Rossi on the catacombs (Roma Crist. Sotterranea) will no doubt when completed throw great light on all these questions, which cannot be satisfactorily solved except by that union of the most careful and minute investigation, and candid and impartial criticism, which that learned archaeologist will bring to bear upon them.

Examples of tombs of the same form may be found in structures above ground at a much later date: two such are in the walls of the entrance to the baptistry at Albenga, between Nice and Genoa, a building probably not later than the 7th century. One tomb is quite plain, the other decorated with plaited ornaments in the style prevalent circa 800.

AREA. I. A space within which monuments stood, which was protected by the Roman law
from the acts of ownership to which other lands were liable. Such areas are frequent by the side of most of the great roads leading into Rome, and letters on the monument describe how many feet of frontage, and how many in depth, belong to
it. The formula is, IN FR. P. . . IN AG. T. . .
It, "In fronte pedes—"; "In agro pedes—."
The size of these areas varied much; some were about 125 feet each way seems to have been common; the example in Horace (Sat. i. 8, 12) gives us 1000 feet by 300; and some appear to have been even larger than this; one of Gruter's Inscriptiones, for instance, (l. 2, p. cccxcix. 1), runs, "Huic monumento cedunt agri puri jugera decem." So large a space was required, not for the mausoleum which was to be erected, but in some cases for the reception of many tombs, in others for the performance of sacra, in others for numerously attend (Northcote and Brownlow's Roma Sotterranea, pp. 47 f.).

On a monument or a boundary stone of the area was engraved a formula indicating that this plot was not to pass to the heirs of him who set it apart for sepulture. This was generally H. M. H. N. S. i. e., "Hoc monumentum haereditas non sequitur" (Orelli's Inscriptionum, No. 4379). The corresponding Greek form was, "τοῖς κληρονό-μοις αὐοὺς ἐκαταλύθησθε τοῦτο τὸ μνημεῖον" (Böckh's Corpus Inscriptionum, No. 3270).

In the Roman catacombs care has evidently been taken lest the subterranean excavations should transgress the limits of the area on the surface (Northcote, u. s. 48).

This reverence of the Roman law for burial-places enabled the early Christians, except in times of persecution or popular tumult, to preserve their sepulchres inviolate. The areas about the tombs of martyrs were especially so preserved, where meetings for worship were held,
and churches frequently built. Tertullian (Ad Scapula, 3) tells us that when Maximian, a persecutor, had issued an edict against the formation of such areas, the result was that the areas (threshing-floors) of the heathen lacked corn the following year. So the Acta Proconsularia of the trial of Felix (in Baronius, ann. 314 § 24) speak of the areas, "where you Christians make prayers," (ubi orationes facitis). These areas were frequently named from some well-known person buried there; thus St. Cyprian is said to have been buried "in area Canidii Procuratoris" (Acta Mart. S. Cypriani in Ducange's Glossary s. v.). In the Gesta Purgationis Caeciliani (Utd.), certain citizens are said to have been shut up "in area

ARLES, COUNCILS OF (ARELATENSIS CONCILIA).—I. A. D. 314, summoned by the Emperor Constantine to try affirmed by the of the Donatists against Caecilian, Bishop of Carthage,—a cause "de Sancti Coelestique Nunimius cultu et fide Catholica;" because the former complained that the judgment given at Rome in 313 by the Pope and certain Gallic bishops (whom Constantine had appointed to try the case there), was an unfair one. The emperor accordingly summoned other bishops, from Sicily, Italy (not the Bishop of Rome, he having been one of the former judges), the Gauls (which include Britain), and Africa itself, to the number of 200 according to St. Augustin, to come to Arles by August 1 to retry the case. The ann-mons to Chrestus of Syracuse (Mansi, II. 466, 467, from Euseb. x.) desires him to bring two presbyters and three servants with him at the public expense. And the letter of Constantine to the Vicarius Africae (ib. 463-465) claims it as the emperor's duty to see that such contentions are put an end to. The sentence of the Council, adverse to the Donatists, is likewise to be enforced by the civil power (Rescript. Constant. post Synodum, lb. 477, 478). But Constantine in the same letter expressly disclaims all appeal to himself from the "judicium sacerdotum" (ib. 478). The Synod also announces its judgment and its canons to Pope Sylvester, in order that "per te potissimum omnibus insinuari," regretting also the absence of their "frater dilectissimus," who probably would have passed a severer sentence. The canons begin with one enacting that the observance of Easter shall be "anodie et tempore," the Bishop of Rome "juxta consuetudinem" to make the day known. They include also among other regulations a prohibition of the rebaptizing of heretics if they had been baptized in the name of the Holy Trinity; an exhortation ("consilium") to those whose wives had been guilty of adultery, not to marry another "viventibus uxoris;" a requirement to the consecration of a bishop of eight bishops, if possible, but of three at the least; and a condemnation of those "sacerdotes et Levitae," who do not abstain from their wives. The Council was purely a Western one, and of the emperor's selection, although St. Augustine (De Bapt. cont. Donat., II. 9, and elsewhere) calls it "universal." Among the signatures to it, according to the most authentic list, are the well-known ones of, "Eborius Episcopus de civitate Eboracensi provincia Britannia; Restitutus Episcopus de civitate Londinensi provincia supra scripta; Adelinus Episcopus de civitate Colonia Londinensium" (i. e. probably, Col. Legionensium i. e. Caerleon on Usk); "exinde Sacerdos presbyter, Arminius diaconus" (Mansi, ib. 476, 477). There were present, 23 deacons, 2 readers, 7 exorcists, besides 2 presbyters and 2 deacons to represent Pope Sylvester.

II. A. D. 353, of the Gallic bishops, summoned by the Emperor Constantine to condemn the person of St. Athanasius (but without discussing doctrine) under penalty of exile if they refused, Paulinus, Bishop of Trèves, being actually exiled for refusing (Sulp. Sever., II.; Hilar., Libell. ad Constant.; and Mansi, III. 231, 232).

III. A. D. 452, called the second, which compiled and reissued 56 canons of other recent Gallic Councils respecting discipline (Mansi, VII. 875). Possibly there had been another in 451 (Id. ib. 873).

IV. A. D. 455, commonly called the third, provincial, determined the dispute between Bishop Theodoris and Faustus abbat of Lerins, by decreeing that the right of ordination, and of giving the chrism, &c., pertain to the bishop, but the jurisdiction over laymen in the monastery to the abbat (Mansi, VII. 907).

V. A. D. 463, provincial, convened by Leontius, Archbishop of Arles, to oppose Mamertinus, Archbishop of Vienne, who had encroached upon the province of Arles (Mansi, VII. 951, from St. Hilary's Epist.).

VI. A. D. 475, provincial, under the same Leontius, to condemn the error of "predestination."

The books of Faustus, De Gratia Dei, &c., were written to express the sense of the Council, and the Augustinians condemned it as semi-Pelagian (Mansi, VII. 1007).

VII. A. D. 524, commonly called the fourth, provincial, among other canons on discipline, appointed 25 as the age for deacons' orders, and 30 for priests' (Mansi, VIII. 625).

VIII. A. D. 534, commonly called the fifth, provincial, chiefly to reduce monasteries to obedience to their bishop (Mansi, IX. 702).

IX. A. D. 813, under Charlemagne, enacted 26 canons respecting discipline, and among others, that the Bishop "circumcat parochiam suam semel in anno" (c. 17), and that "Comites, iudices, seu reliquus populus, obedientes sint Episcopo, et invicem consentiant ad justitias faciendas" (c. 13; Mansi, XIV. 55). ARRHAE, or ARRAE SPONSALITIAE, also Arrha's, Arra's, earnest money on betrothal. The practice of giving earnest money on betrothal, of which traces are to be found in all parts of the world, has its root evidently in the view, common yet to many savage races, of marriage as the mere sale of a wife, to which betrothal stands in the relation of contract to delivery.

Among the Jews, as will be seen from Selden's treatise, De Uxor. Hebraicâ (Book II. cc. 1, 2, 3, 4), betrothal was strictly a contract of purchase for money or money's worth (although two other forms were also admitted); the coin used being, however, the smallest that could be had. The earnest was given either to the wife herself, or to her parents. It could not be of forbidden things or things consecrated to priestly use, or things unlawfully owned, unless such as might have been taken from the woman herself; but a lawfully given earnest was sufficient to constitute betrothal without words spoken. In strict consistency with the view of marriage as a purchase by the man, it was held that the giving of earnest by the woman was void. And when, at a later period, the use of the ring as a symbol of the earnest crept into Jewish betrothals from Gentile practice, so carefully was the old view preserved that a previous formal inquiry had to be made of two witnesses, whether the ring offered was of equal value with a coin.

The first legal reference among the Romans to the arrha on betrothal, and the only one in the Digest, belongs to the 3rd century,—i.e. to a period when the Roman world was already to a great extent permeated by foreign influences,—at this time chiefly Oriental. It occurs in a passage from Paulus, who flourished under Alexander Severus, 225-235 (Dig. 23, tit. 2, § 38). The jurist lays it down that a public functionary in a province cannot marry a woman from that province, but may become betrothed to her; and that if, after he has given up his office, the woman refuses to marry him, she is only bound to repay any earnest-money she has received,—a text which, it will be observed, applies in strictness only to provincial functionaries, and may thus merely indicate the existence of the practice among subject nations. Certain it is that the chapter of the Digest on betrothals (De Sponsalibus, 23, tit. 1) says not a word of the arrha; Ulpian in it expressly states that "bare consent suffices to constitute betrothal," a legal position on which the stoic betrothals in Plautus supply an admirable comment.

About eighty years later, however—at a time when the northern barbarians had already given development to Rome—the arrha appears in full under Constantine—in his life of Maximinus the younger (killed 313), says that he had been betrothed to Junia Fodella, who he had afterwards married to Toxotus, that he was remained with her royal arrhae, "but these things, as Junius Cordus relates from the testimony of those who are said to have examined into these things, a necklace of nine pearls, a net of eleven emeralds, a bracelet with a clasp of four jacinths, besides golden and all regal vestments, and other insignia of betrothal."* Ambrrose indeed (346-397) speaks only of the symbolical ring in relating the story of St. Agnes, whom he represents as replying to the Governor of Rome, who wished to marry her to his son, that she stands engaged to another lover, who has offered her far better adornments, and given her for earnest the ring of his affiance (et annulo fidei suae subarrhavit me, Ep. 34). To a contemporary of Ambrrose, Pope Julius I. (336-352) is ascribed a decree that if any shall have espoused a wife or given her earnest (si quis uxorem vel uxorem vel subarrhaverit) his brother or other near kinsman may not marry her (Labbe and Mansi, Concil. ii. 1266). About a century later, the word arrha is used figuratively in reference to the Annunciation, considered as a betrothal, by Peter Chrysologus, Archbishop of Ravenna in 433, as quoted by Du Cange, in rebo.

In the days of Justinian, we see from the Code

that the earnest-money was a regular element in Byzantine betrothal. It was given to the intended bride or those who acted for her, and was to be repaid in the event of the death of either party (Cod. 5, tit. 1, § 3, Law of Gratian, Valentinian, and Theodosius, A.D. 380), or of breach of promise by the woman; in the latter case, indeed, the woman sui juris, or the father, mother, grandfather or great-grandfather of one under age having to pay an equal woman under age was only bound to simple re- payment, as was also the case in the event of some cause unknown at the time of betrothal which might dispense the woman from fulfilling her promise. The fourth penalty of the earlier law was still, by the one now quoted, made exigible by special contract (Id. 5, Law of Leo and Anthemius, A.D. 469). Simple restitution chose to embrace a religious life (1. tit. 1, § 5; Nov. 123, c. xxxix.); or in case of diversity of religious faith between the betrothed, if discovered or occurring after betrothal, but not otherwise (Code, 1. tit. 4, § 18, law of Leo and Anthemius, A.D. 469).

It is difficult not to seek for the reason of this development of the arrha within the Roman or Byzantine world of the 6th century in some foreign influence. Accordingly, if we turn to the barbarian races which overran the empire from the end of the 4th century, we find almost everywhere the prevalence of that idea of wife-buying, which is the foundation of the betrothal earnest; see for instance in Cincini, Leges Barbarum Antiquae, vol. ii. 85, the (reputed) older text of the Salic law, tit. 47, as to the purchase of a widow for three solidi and a denarius, vol. iii. 17, 18, 22; the Burgundian Law, titles xii. 1 and 3, xiv. 3, and xxiv. 2; vol. v. 49, 50; and the Saxon Law, titles vi. 1, 2, 3, xii. xviii. 1, 2, &c., or (in the volume of the Record Commission) our own Laws of Ethelbert, 77, 83; Ire, 31. And in the regions overspread by the Frankish tribes in particular, the arrha, as a money payment, is visible as a legal element in betrothal. Gregory of Tours (544-595) repeatedly refers to it (l. 42; iv. 47; x. 16).

In the earlier writers there is nothing to connect the betrothal earnest with a religious ceremony. Nor need we be surprised at this, when we recollect that, in the early ages of Christianity, marriage itself was held by the Roman world as a purely civil contract; so that Tertullian, enumerating those ceremonies of heathen society which a Christian might innocently attend, writes that "neither the virile annulus, aut conjunctio maritalis flows from any honour done to an idol" (De idolol., c. 16). And indeed the opinion has been strongly held, as Augusti points out, whilst disclaiming it, that church betrothals did not obtain before the 9th century. The earliest mention of a priestly benediction upon the sponsa appears to occur in the 10th canon of the Synod of Reggio, A.D. 850 (see Labbe and Mansi, Concil. xiv. p. 934); and it is not impossible that that confusion between the sponsus and maritus, the sponsa and uxor, which has absolutely prevailed in French, Welsh, editi Dei, &c., were of the Council, and it as semi-Pelagian called the fourth, as on discipline, apocryphans orders, and 30 called the fifth, pro- nasteries to obedience (2).

sponsa, sponsa, are synonymous with marit and fermina in the sense of marit. In a contemporary document, the reply of Pope Nicolas I. (858-867) to the consultation of the Bulgarians, the question whether betrothal was a civil or religious ceremony remains undecided; but as he professes to exhibit to them "a custom which the holy Roman Church has received of old, and still holds in such unions," his testimony, though half a century later than the death of Charlemagne, deserves to be here recorded, bearing witness as it does expressly to the betrothal earnest.

"After betrothal," he says, "which is the promised bond of future marriage, and which is celebrated by the consent of those who enter into this, and of those in whose authority they are, and after the betrother hath betrothed to himself the betrothed with earnest by marking her finger with the ring of alliance, and the betrother hath handed over to her a dower satisfactory to both, with a writing containing such contract, before persons invited by both parties, either at once or at a fitting time (to wit, in order that nothing of the kind be done before the time prescribed by law) both proceed to enter into the marriage bond. And first, indeed, they are placed in the Church of the Lord with the oblations which they ought to offer to God by the hand of the priest, and thus finally they receive the benediction and the heavenly garment."

It will be seen from the above passage that whilst Pope Nicolas recognises distinctly the practice of betrothal by arrha, symbolized through the ring, yet the only benediction which he expressly mentions is the nuptial, not the sponsal one.

It has been doubted in like manner whether church betrothals were practised at this period in the Greek Church, and whether the form of betrothal in the Greek Euchologium is not of late insertion. That at the date of the last quoted authority, or say in the middle of the 9th century, the Greek ceremonies appertaining to marriage differed already from the Roman appears from the text of Pope Nicolas himself; his very object being to set forth the custom of the Roman Church in contrast to that of the Greek (consuetudinem quam Graecos in nuptialibus contuberniis habere dicunt). Now the striking fact in reference to the form of the Euchologium is that in it the earnest or ἀρραβών is not a mere element in betrothal, but, as with the Jews, actually constitutes it—a practice so characteristic that it can hardly be supposed to flow otherwise than from ancient usage. Here, in fact, the words ἀρραβών, ἀρραβωνίζεσθαι, can only be translated "betrothal," "betrothing." The formula, repeated alternately by the man and the woman, runs: "So and so, the servant of God, betroths to himself (ἀρραβωνίζεσθαι) this handmaid of God in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost, new and ever, and world without end. Amen." The prayer is in like manner: "Look upon this Thy servant and this thine handmaid, and confirm their betrothal (σφραγίζον τὴν ἀρραβῶνα αὐτῶν) in faith and concord, and truth, and love. For thou, Lord, didst show us to give the earnest and thereby to confirm all things." And the heading—which may indeed well be more modern—is "service for betrothal, otherwise of the earnest."

The most therefore that can be concluded on this still doubtful subject seems to be this—1st. That the earnest-money on betrothal, symbolizing as it clearly does the barbarous custom of wife-buying, must essentially have been everywhere in the first instance a civil, not a religious act. 2. That the practice was unknown to ancient Greek and Roman civilization, and was especially foreign to the spirit of the older Roman law. 3. That it was nevertheless firmly rooted in Jewish custom, and may not improbably have passed from thence into the ritual of the Eastern Church, where, as with the Jews, the giving of earnest constitutes the betrothal. 4. That it was very generally prevalent among the barbarian tribes which overran the Roman empire, and seems from them to have passed into its customs and its laws, making its appearance in the course of the 3rd century, and becoming prominent by the 6th century in Justinian's Code, at the same time when we also find its prevalence most distinctly marked in Gaul, and as a Frankish usage. 5. That no distinct trace of it in the ceremonies of the Church can however be pointed out till the later middle age, although it may very likely have prevailed in the Eastern Church from a much earlier period.

It follows, however, from what has been said above that whatever may have lingered in later times of the betrothal arrha must be ascribed to very ancient usage; as in the formula quoted by Selden from the Parochial of Ernest, Archbishop of Cologne and Bishop of Liège, which includes the use, not only of the ring, but also, if possible, of real purses with three pieces of silver, "Ioco arrhae sponsa dantur." Our own Sarum ordinal says in reference to betrothal: "men call arrae the rings or money or other things to be given to the betrothed by the betrother, which gift is called sarratio, particularly however when it is made by gift of a ring." And the two forms of Sarum and York respectively run as follows: "With this ring I thee wed, and this gold and silver I thee give;" (York) "With this ring I wed thee, and with this gold and silver I honour thee, and with this gift I honour thee." The latter formula indeed recalls a direction given in one of the oldest rituals relating to marriage given by Martène, De Antiquis Ecclesiae Ritibus, vol. ii. p. 127 (extracted from a Rennes missal, to which he ascribes about 700 years of antiquity, or say, of the 11th century), entitled, "Ordo ad sponsam et sponsam benedicendam," which says that "after the blessing of the ring in the name of the Holy Trinity . . . the betrother shall honour her (the betrothed) with gold or silver according to his means" (honore auro vel argento prout poterit sponsas).

As respects the use of the ring in betrothal, see further under RING, and also BETROTHAL.

(Augusti, Denkwürdigkeiten, vol. ix. 295, and foli. may be consulted, but is far from satisfactory. Bingham, Antiquities, book xxii. ch. iii., confounds together everything that can be confounded. Selden, Uxor Hebraica, took it, remains by far the best single source of reference.) [J. M. L.]

ASCENSION DAY: (Ascensio and Ascensa Domini; dies festus Ascensionis; ἑορτὴ τῆς ἀναλήψεως; ἡ ἀνάληψις and ἡμέρα ἀναλήψεως).

This festival, assigned, in virtue of Acts i. 3, to the fortieth day after Easter-day, is not one of those which from the earliest times were generally observed. No mention of it occurs before the 4th century, unless an earlier date can be made good for the "Apostolic Constitutions," or for the passages in which mention is made of this festival—1 Th. v. 19: "From the first day (Easter-day) number ye forty days to the fifth day (Thursday), and celebrate the Feast of the ἀνάληψις τοῦ Κυρίου καὶ ἡν πληρώσας πέντε οἰκονομίας καὶ διδάραξιν ἀνήλαθι, κ. τ. α." vili. 33, "On what days servatae are to rest from work: τὴν ἀνάληψιν ἀγγελωσάντων διὰ τὸ πέρας τῆς κατὰ Χριστὸν οἰκονομίας." Origen (c. Cel. viii. 362), names as holy-days generally observed, besides the Lord's Day, only Parascene (Good Friday), Pascha (Easter-day), and Pentecost. No others than these are mentioned by Tertullian. Of sermons preached on this festival, the oldest seems to be one extant only in a Latin version, ap. Sirmoudi Opp. Varie. grounds, assign to Eusebius the Church historian; and the preacher dwells chiefly on the Resurrection; but the opening words show that it was coeli de restitute presentia, in qua Dominum suscepere victorem." Next, perhaps, in point of antiquity, is one by Epiphanius (t. ii. 285, ed. Petar.). In the opening, he complains that the greatness of this festival is not duly appreciated, though it is, to the others, what the head is to the body, the crown and completion. First, he says, is the Feast of Incarnation; second, the Theophania; third, the Passion and Resurrection. "But because it still left the risen Lord fettered to this earth. The Pentecost, also, on which the Holy Ghost was communicated, contains a great, un-speakable joy. But to-day, the day of the opening highest heavens, &c." It is, of course, here named before Ascension. There were included, 1, 5, and 34 ad fin., and other Gnostics (represented by the Ascensio Esauie, Aethiop.), who assigned a period of eighteen months to our Lord's sojourn on earth after the Resurrection; and besides, there are traces of a belief among the orthodox that the bodily presence of the risen Lord with his disciples, from time to time, was continued during three years and six months (Eus. Dem. Ec. viii. 400 B; Bromer's Ordo Saeculorum, p. 82 f.); but certainly the day on which the Ascension was celebrated was, in all the churches, the fortieth after Easter-day. Of about the same time, is a sermon by St. Gregory Aegumenon τῷ ἐπιχώριον τῶν Καραβάδων 1061, ἡμέρα τ. X. Bingham, Augusti, Rheinwald, Alt, and others, explain this as ἑορτὴ τῆς ἐπισημοῦ ἀναλήψεως, with reference to the crowning work of redemption in the glorification of the Manhood. The name, marked by Gregory as local to Capadocia, is not retained in the Greek calendar, but it occurs in the title of St. Chrysostom's 19th sermon on the Statues (ad pop. Antioch., t. ii. 188 Ben.), τῆ κυριακῇ τῆς Ἐπισημοῦ ἀναλήψεως. Leo Allatius (de Domn. et Hebdom. Ascensionum, § 28), who evidently knows the designation only from the two places, says that of the Sunday is 'the fifth after Easter, the Sunday dictine' (Benefat. t. ii. xi. 174) infers from the preface of this sermon in the series between S. 18, at the end of the Quadragesima, that it was delivered on Passion Sunday, 5 Lent. But Anna (t. iv. p. 1 A.) clearly shows that the 19th sermon is later by "many days" than the 21st, preached on Easter-day; see the Benefat. Anna, and also (for Montfaucon's final conclusion) Vit. Chrysost. t. xiii. 128 sqq. ed. Par. Ben. 2. Hence it appears that the Sunday Ἐπισημοῦ ἀναλήψεως cannot be, as Savile (t. viii. 803) supposes, the octave of Easter, dominica in albis, and it seems most probable that Leo Allatius is right in making it the Sunday of Ascension week. In this case, the term Ἐπισημοῦ ἀναλήψεως belongs to the Feast of Ascension. Baumgarten (Erkält. des Christl. Alterthums, p. 299 ap. Augusti) takes it to mean any day specially retained for solemn celebration over and above the great festivals; in this sense, or rather, perhaps, in that of "a holiday gained or secured in addition," it will be suitable to the Feast of Ascension as one of recent introduction, regarded as a welcome boon especially to servants and labourers. On the Feast itself, Chrysostom has one sermon (t. ii. 447), of uncertain date. The celebration was held in die τῆς Good Friday (Serm. de Coemet. et de Cruce, t. ii. 397), was here done on a special occasion, in Flavian had rescued from impure contact, and translated to the martyrrium called Romanesia extramural celebration or procession was the established practice at Antioch on Ascension-day. In the sermon de Philogonia, preached extolling the dignity of the approaching Feast of Nativity (then of recent introduction), says: "From this the Theophania and the sacred Pascha, and the Ascension, and the Pentecost have their origin. For had not Christ been born as the flesh, He had not been baptised, which Pascha; had not sent the Spirit, which is the Pentecost." Here the words καὶ ἡ ἀνάληψις are clearly an interpolation. The three ancient festivals, he would say, are Theophanin, Pascha, Pentecost; they require Nativity as their ground. So in Serm. 1 de Pentecoste (t. l. 458)—also of unknown date—he enumerates as the three leading festivals, Epiphany, Pascha, Pentecost, with no mention of Nativity or of Ascension, although p. 461 he refers to the Ascension as an event: "for, ten days since, our nature ascended to the royal throne," &c. But in another, the second de Pentecoste (ib. 469), he says: "Not long since we celebrated the Cross and Passion, the Resurrection, after this, the Ascension into heaven of our Lord Jesus Christ."

On the whole, it would seem that, so far as our sources of information go, the institution of this festival, in the East, dates at earliest from the middle of the 4th century.

Nor do we find it earlier in the Western Church: there is no mention of it in Tertullian, SS. Cyprian, Ambrose, Hilary, or in the canons of the early councils. In St. Augustine's time, indeed, the usage was so well-established that he speaks of it as universal, therefore of Apostolic institution. In the Epistle to Januarius, liv. [fol. cxviii.] (t. ii. 123, sqq. Ben.), he ranks it with Pascha and Pentecost. "Illa autem quae non scripta sed tradita custodiuntur, quae quidem toto terrarum orbe servantur, datur intelligi vel ab ipsis Apostolis vel plenariis conciliis. . . commendata atque statuta retineri, sicuti quod Domini passio et resurrectio et ascensio in caelum, ad adventus de caelo Sp. sancti, anniversaria solemnitate celebrantur," &c. (He does not name the Nativity, this was well understood to be of recent institution.) Beveridge, Cod. Can. Vindic. c. ix. puts the argument thus:—"Whatever is universal in the Church must be either Apostolic or ordained by general councils; but no general council did ordain these festivals, therefore they come to us from the Apostles 'hemselves.'" On the authority of this passage of St. Augustine, liturgical writers, Martene and others, have not hesitated to conclude that the Feast of Ascension is as old as Pascha and Pentecost. In the silence of the first three centuries, we can, at most, accept the passage as testimony to matter of fact, that at the end of the 4th century Ascension-day was generally kept; as in the second of his five Ascension-sermons (261-265, t. v. 1065 sqq. Ben.), St. Augustine says, § 3, "Ecce celebratur hodieus dies toto orbe terrarum." From this time, certainly, the observance of the day was general in East and West. But it does not appear to have ranked with the highest festivals, which were Nativity, Easter, and Pentecost (Concil. Aqathense, n. 506, can. 63, and Aurelianense 1, a. 511, can. 25). As a feast of secondary order, it ranked, in the Latin Church with Epiphany and St. John Baptist's-day (comp. Concil. Aqath. can. 24). In the Eastern Church it was celebrated with solemn extra-mural processions—possibly as early as St. Chrysostom's time at Antioch, though, as before observed, this is not necessarily implied in the passage cited; in Jerusalem, to the Mount Olivet, in which the Empress Helena had erected a church. Beale says that the celebration there was almost as solemn as that of Easter; it began at midnight, and with the multitude of tapers and torches the mountain and the subjacent landscape were all ablaze (de loc. sac. c. 7). Elsewhere, the procession was to the nearest hill or rising ground, from which at the same time a benediction was pronounced on the fields and fruits of the earth. In the Western Church this procession and benediction were transferred to the Rogation-days; and when Gregory of Tours, ob. 595 (Hist. Franc. v. 11), speaks of the solemn processions with which Ascension-day was everywhere celebrated, perhaps he means only processions into the churches. Martene describes one such as held at Vienne, in France. The archbishop, with deacon and subdeacon, headed it: on their return to the church, they are received by all standing in the nave; two canons advance towards the cantors; Cant. Quem quaeritis? Canon. Jesus qui resurrexit. Cant. Jam ascendit, sicut dixit. Canon. Alleluia. Then all proceed into the choir, and mass is celebrated. There was also, on this day, in some churches (in others reserved for Pentecost) a service of benediction over leaves provided for the poor, and also over the new fruits of the earth.

The vigil of Ascension was kept by some as a fast, as an exception to the ancient rule, rigidly maintained by the Greeks, and long contended for by many of the Latins. "Hoc [paschali] tempore nullius festi vigiliam jejunare vel observare jubemur, nisi Ascensionis et Pentecostes." (Micrologus, de Eccl. Observat. c. 55.) Isidore of Seville (610) (de Eccl. Off. c. 37) acknowledges no fast whatever between Easter and Ascension-day: he holds that all fifty days to Pentecost are days of rejoicing only; but some, he says, on the ground of our Lord's words, St. Matt. ix. 15, "Can the children of the bride-chamber mourn," &c., kept fast on the eight days from Ascension to Pentecost. The extended fast of three days before Ascension, which Amalarius (de Eccl. Off. iv. 37) calls triduanum vigiliae Ascens. jejunium (apologising, as do other early liturgical writers, for that institution as an innovation upon the known ancient rule of East and West) came but slowly into general observance in the Western Church. Especially was this the case in Spain. "Hispani, propter hoc quod scriptum est," says Walafrid Strabo (821) (de rebus Eccl. c. 28), "Non possunt filii sponsi lugere quamdiu cum illis est sponsus, infra quinquagesimam Paschae recuantes jejunare, litanias suas post Pentecosten posuerunt, quinta, sexta et septima feriis ejusdem hebdomadis eas facientes." Accordingly, in the Spanish collection of the Canons, the wording of those relating to the Rogation Fast is altered. In Conc. Aurelian. i. can. 27, the title, "De Litanis ante asc. Domini celebrandis," is made, "Ut Litanie post Dom. asc. celebrentur;" and in the body of the Canon, for "Rogationes, i. e., Litanias ante asc. Dom. ab omnibus ecclesiis placuit celebrari ita ut praemisum triduanum jejunium in Dom. ascensionis festivitate solvatur," the Spanish coena has, "Rog., i. e., lit. post Asc. Dom. placuit celebrari, ita ut praem. tril. jej. post Dom. asc. solemnitatem solvatur;" and the next canon which pronounces censure "de clericis qui ad litanias venire contempserint," is made to affect only clerics who refuse to come ad officium, ad opus sacrum generally.

The Mosarabic Order does not even recognise a vigil of Ascension, though it has one for Pentecost.

There was no octave of Ascension; the following Sunday is simply Dominica post Ascensionem.

ASCETICISM. The difficulty of tracing the history of asceticism in the early ages of Christianity arises in part from scantiness of materials, but chiefly from the circumstance that this and the cognate terms have been used in two senses, one general, one more specific. These two significations, and this enhances the difficulty, cannot be strictly assigned to different periods, being not infrequently synchronous; nor is it always easy to distinguish one from the other merely by the context. The neglect of this important distinction and the vehemence of this important complicated the controversy on the origin and that Ascetics as an order are coeval with Christianity, some denying their existence altogether till the 4th century. Neither statement can be accepted without some qualification. The following attempt at an historical sketch of asceticism among Christians, in its earlier phases, is based on a collation of the principal passages in early Christian writers bearing on the subject.

The principle of asceticism, and this is allowed on all sides, was in force before Christianity. The Essenes, for instance, among the Jews, owed their existence as a sect to this principle. It was dominant in the oriental systems of natagomism between mind and matter. It asserted itself even among the more sensuous philosophers of Greece with their larger sympathy for the pleasurable development of man's physical energies. But the fuller and more systematic development of the ascetic life among Christians is in contact with the Alexandrine coming into contact with the Alexandrine school of thought, and exhibits itself first in a country subject to the combined influences of Judaism and of Platonic philosophy. Indeed, the great and fundamental principle on which asceticism, in its narrower meaning rests, of a two-fold morality, one expressed in "Precepts" of universal obligation for the multitude, and one expressed in "Counsels of Perfection" intended only for those more advanced in holiness, with its doctrine that the passions are to be extirpated rather than controlled (Orig. Ep. ad Rom. Lib. iii.; Tertull. 775) is very closely akin to the Platonic or Pythagorean distinction between the life according to nature and the life above nature, as well as to the doctrine of the supremacy of the contemplative above the practical life, and is more naturally deducible from this source than from any other (Porphyry, de Abstinent.; Eus. H. E. li. 17). In fact the ascetics of the 3rd and 4th centuries loved the designation of philosophers (Row. Vitae Patr. pass.; cf. Greg. Nyss. Orat. Catech. 18; Soz. H. E. l. 13). At the same time it must be noted that the Church uttered its protests from time to time against the idea of there being anything essentially unholy in matter, and its cautions against excessive abstinence. Thus Origen insists that the Christian reason for abstinence is not that of Pythagoras (c. Celsum r. 264); and the so called "Apostolic Canons" (51, 53) while approving asceticism as a useful discipline condemn the abhorrence of things in themselves innocent as if they involved any contamination (cf. Ens. II. E. v. 3).

During the 1st century and a half of Christian distinctness there are no indications of ascetics as a class, and while the Church, as a small and compact community, was struggling for existence against opposing forces on every side, the profane ascetic Christianity was itself a profession of faith of hardihood, of constant self-denial (cf. Acts ii. 44; iv. 34, 35). Thus, even at a rather later date, Clemens of Alexandria represents Christianity as an ἀσκησις (Strom. iv. 22; cf. Migne. Fel. Ort. ec. 12, 31, 36). Similarly the term is applied to any conspicuous example of fortitude or patience. Eusebius so designates certain martyrs in Palestine (de Mart. Pal. 10), a region introduced till the middle of the 4th century (Hieron. Vit. Hilar. 14), and Clemens of Alexandria, calls the patriarch Jacob an ἀσκητής (Pedagog. i. 7). This more vague and more general use of the word appears again and again even after the formal institution of monachism. Athanasius, or whoever is the author, speaking of the sufferings of the martyr Lucian, in prison, calls him "a great ascetic" (Synops. Ser. Sior.). Cyril, of Jerusalem, calls those who, like Anna the prophetess, are frequent and earnest in prayer "ascetics" (Catech. l. 19). Jerome applies the word to Pictorius for his self-chosen poverty, and to Serapion, Bishop of Antioch because, prior to his lapse into heresy, he had abstained, though without any vow, from marriage (Haer. xlii.). Cyril of Alexandria uses ἀσκησις as equivalent to self-denial (in Joan. xiii. 35) in the same way as Chrysostom speaks of virtue as a discipline (Hom. in Inscr. Act. Apostol. ii. 8). So far there is nothing to prove the existence of an ascetic class or order bound by rules not common to all Christians.

For about a century subsequent to 150 A.D. there begin to be traces of an asceticism more sharply defined and occupying a more distinct position; but not as yet requiring its votaries to separate themselves entirely from the rest of the community. Athenagoras speaks of persons habitually abstaining from matrimony (Apol. pro Chr. xviii. 129; cf. Irenaeus ap. Ens. II. E. v. 241; cf. Dionys. Alexandr.). Eusebius mentions devout persons, ascetics, but not an order, who ministered to the poor (de Mart. Pal. ec. 10, 11), and calls Narcissus, Bishop of Jerusalem, an "ascetic" (H. E. vi. 9). Tertullian uses the term "exercitanti" or disciplined, (de Puerc. 14), but, apparently in reference to students of Holy Scripture. Clemens of Alexandria styles the ascetics ἐλεγκτῶν ἐκείνων "more elect than the elect" (Hom. "Quis Dives?" 36; cf. Strom. viii. 15); and Epiphanius in a later century speaks of monks as of σπουδαίοι or "earnest" (Expos. Fid. 22; cf. Ens. II. E. vi. 11). The age to be restricted to those who devoted themselves to a life of more than ordinary strictness. This increasing reverence for austerities as such is seen in most of the sects, which were prominent in the 2nd century; only with the exaggeration which usually characterises movements of the kind. The Neutaniists prescribed a rigorous asceticism, not for their more zealous disciples only, but for all indiscriminately. The Syrian Gnostics, the followers of Saturninus and Basilides, the Encratitae, the disciples of Cerdo and Marcion in Asia Minor and Italy, all carried the notion of there being an inherent pollution in the material world, and of it being the positive duty of Christians to shun all contact with it, to an extent which left even the Church doctrine of asceticism far behind (Iren. adv. Haer. i. 24; Epiph. Haer. 23). How far their practice corresponded with theory is doubtful. The proueness of human nature to a reaction into excessive laxity after excessive austerities hardly admits of exception, and gives probability to the allegations made by the orthodox writers of flagrant licentiousness in some cases.

The middle of the 3rd century marks an era in the development of Christian asceticism. Antony, Paul, Ammon, and other Egyptian Christians not content, as the ascetics before them, to lead a life of extraordinary strictness and severity in towns and villages, aspired to a more thorough estrangement of themselves from all earthly ties; and by their teaching and example led very many to the wilderness, there to live and die in almost utter seclusion from their fellows. The Great Decian persecution was probably the immediate occasion of this exodus from the cities into the desert; not only by driving many to take refuge in the desert, but by exciting a spirit which longed to emulate the self-renunciation of the martyrs and confessors. But it was probably the influence of the Alexandrine teaching, as has been already suggested, which had fostered the longing to escape altogether from the contaminations and persecutions of an evil world. It was no longer, as in earlier days, only or chiefly from external enemies that a devout Christian felt himself in danger. As Christianity widened the circle of its operations, it became inevitably less discriminating as to the character of those who were admitted into the community; and the gradual intrusion of a more secular spirit, among Christians, first forced those who were more thoroughly in earnest to aim at a stricter life in the world, and then thrust them out of the world altogether. Eusebius bears witness to this Alexandrine influence on Christian asceticism in a remarkable comparison of the ascetics of his own creed with the Therapeutae in Egypt (H. E. ii. 17; Sez. H. E. i. 13). There seems to have been something in the climate and associations of Egypt (as in Syria) which predisposed men thus to abdicate the duties and responsibilities belonging to active life. The exact position which these Therapeutae occupied is uncertain. Probably they were in existence prior to Christianity; are not to be confounded with the Essenes; but were chiefly, though not exclusively, Jews. From Philo's account (de Vita Contempl. pp. 892-4) it seems clear, at any rate, that this manner of life resembled in many respects that of the Christian ascetics in the desert. They dwelt in separate cells not far from one another; renounced their possessions; practised fastings and other austerities; and devoted themselves partly to contemplation, and in part to study. In this last point their example was not imitated by their Christian anti-types in Egypt. They seem to have been imbued with the mystical spirit of Alexandria. Their name signifies that they gave themselves either to serve God, or, more probably, to cultivate their own souls and those of their disciples. (Eus. H. E. ii. 17.)

Hitherto Christian asceticism has been individualistic in its character. About the middle of the 4th century it begins to assume a corporate character. Naturally, as the number of recluses increased, the need was felt of organisation. Pachomius is generally regarded as the first to form a "Coenobium," that is an association of ascetics dwelling together under one supreme authority (Hieron. Reg. Pach.; cf. Gravesen Hist. Eccl. i. 116). A fixed rule of conduct and a promise to observe the rule were the natural consequences of forming a society. But the execution of an irrevocable and lifelong vow belongs to a later phase of asceticism. James of Nisibis speaks of ascetics practising a rigid celibacy (Serm. 6tus). The term ascetic begins now to be nearly equivalent to monastic. The so-called "Apostolical Constitutions," which are generally assigned to this period, enumerate "ascetics," but not "monks" among orders of Christians (13). The λόγος ἀσκητικῶς of Basil of Caesarea is on the monastic life. So ἀσκησις is used by Palladius (Hist. Consl. Proem. c. 46, &c.); in eunuchs of the Council of Gangra against excessive asceticism (12, 13), and by Athanasius in his life of Antony. Athanasius calls the two disciples who waited on Antony ἀσκητικοί, "learning to be ascetics." Ἀσκητικὸν in Socrates (H. E. iv. 23) means what is now called a monastery; ἀσκητικὴ καλῶσις, a monastic cell (Theodoret, H. E. iv. 25). At that time μοναστηριῶν was, as the word literally expresses, a separate cell; ἀσκητηριῶν a common dwelling-place under the rule of a superior, in which those who desired, according to the idea of the age, a yet higher stage of perfection, might be trained and disciplined for absolute seclusion (Greg. Naz. Or. xx. 359). In the middle ages the word "asceterium" was altered into "archisterium" or "archisterium" (Du Cange, s. voce.).

In the beginning of the 6th century the widows and virgins who were officially recognised as such, are designated ἀσκητρίαι (Justinian, Novell. cxliii. 43). At a later period the word means a nun; and is the Greek equivalent for "sanctimonialis," or "monialis" (Phot. Nomocan. Tit. ix. 1 p. 207). Ἀσκητρίαι is a later form for ἀσκητής.

The history of asceticism, after the institution of monastic societies belongs to the history of MONASTICISM. There it will be seen with what marvellous rapidity this development of Christian asceticism spread far and wide from the deserts of the Thebaid and Lower Egypt; how Basil, Jerome, Athanasius, Augustine, Ambrose, were foremost among its earliest advocates and propagators, and how Cassian, Columbanus, Benedict and others crowned the labours of their predecessors by a more elaborate organisation. It is enough here to endeavour to trace the gradual and almost imperceptible process by which asceticism, from being the common attribute of Christianity, became in course of time the distinctive speciality of a class within the Christian community.

ASIATICUM CONCILIIUM.—A council was held, A.D. 245, in Asia Minor against Noetus, but at what place is uncertain. [E. S. F.]

ASINARI (Tertull. Apol. c. xvi.), a term of reproach against the early Christians. That ass, was a worshipped an ass, or the head of an Gentile world. Tacitus (Hist. v. 4) says that there was a consecrated image of an ass in the temple, the reason for this special honour being that a herd of wild asses had been the means of guiding the Jews, when they were in the desert, to springs of water. Plutarch (Sympos. iv. 5, 2) tells virtually the same story. Diodorus Siculus says (lib. xxxiv. Frag.) that Antiochus Epiphanes found in the temple a stone image representing a man sitting upon an ass; but on the other hand Josephus (c. Apion. ii. c. 7) adduces the fact that no such image had been found in the temple by any conqueror as an argument for the grandness of the columny.

The same belief appears to have prevailed in reference to the early Christians. It is mentioned by both Tertullian (Ad Nat. i. 14; Apol. xvi.) and Minucius Felix (Octav. 9 and 28), but, though referred to in later times, appears to have died out in the course of the 3rd century. (The fact mentioned by Servetus, De Trin. Error. c. 16, that he heard the same reproach made by the Turks against the Christians in Africa is probably to be connected with the medieval "Festival of the Ass" rather than with the earlier calumny.)

The origin of the reproach has been a subject of various speculations:—(1) It has been considered to have arisen somewhere in the Gentile world, and to have been applied to the Jews before the Christian era. On this hypothesis various explanations of it have been given. Morinus (De Capite Asinino Deo Christiano, Dordrecht, 1620) thought that there was a confusion between the two words Chamer (חָמֶר), which is used (?) for the "pot" of manna in the temple, and Chamor (חָמֹר), which means a "wild ass," and that this confusion was confirmed by the appearance of the pot of manna with its two large tunis in paeta, Eriart, 1716) thought that the ritans among the Jews (? more probably late Samaritans) the more sacred word "Jehovah" (= "name") for getel the perversion "asinus" may have suggested; and Heinsius (De Laude Asini, p. 185, el. 1629) thought that the supavds which the Jews were reputed to worship ("nil praeter anbes et ocell nomen adorant," Juv. Sat. xiv. 97) was corrupted into as. (2) It has been considered to have arisen in Egypt, and on this hypothesis two explanations have been given. Tanaquil Faber (Epist. i. 0) thought that it was a corruption from the name of Onias, who built a Jewish temple at Heliopolis; and Bochart (Hierozoic. i. 2. c. 18) thought that the Egyptians wilfully perverted the expression "Pi iao" (= "mouth of God") into "Pieo," which in an Egyptian vocabulary edited by Kircher signifies "ass." (3) It has been viewed as a calumny of the Jews against the Christians, which was refuted back upon the Jews themselves. In favour of this view it is urged that Tertullian distinctly speaks of it as a Jewish calumny; and against it is the prevalence of the story in writers when a Jewish calumny, however industriously spread, would hardly originate from the use of the ass as a symbol by some Gnostic sects. That the ass was thus used is clear from the statement of Epiphanius (c. Haeres. 26, 10; see also Origen, c. Cels. vi. 9)

Between these various hypotheses it is hardly possible, in the absence of further evidence, to make a choice; the question must be left undecided. A slight additional interest has been given to it by the discovery at Rome, in '856, on a wall under the western angle of the Palatine, mentioned by Tertullian. The apologist's words are (Ad Nat. i. 14)—"nuper quidam perillidissior in isto ditivato, etiam suae religionis desertor, in sola detrivato, cutis Judeans . . . preturam in nos proposuit sub ista proscriptioe ONOCOETES. Is erat auribus anteriorum et in toga, cum libro, altero pede unglato. Et creditit vulgus infami Judaeo." The graffito in question represents an almost similar caricature, evidently directed against some Christian configure with a human body wearing an intervala, figure lifting up his head, possibly in the attitude of prayer. Underneath is written ΑΛΕΞΑΜΕΝΟΣ ΣΕΒΕΤΕ ΘΕΟΝ ("Alexamenos is worshipping graffito having been written towards the end of the 2nd century, about the very time at which Tertullian wrote (see P. Garnucci's article, with serie 3, vol. iv. p. 529). This graffito is now preserved in the library of the Collegio Romano in Rome. [E. H.]

ASPERGILLUM. The brush or twig used for sprinkling Holy Water (HOLY WATER). It anciently was, or was said to be, of hyssop, a plant supposed to possess cleansing virtues, from its use in the Mosaic law, and the well-known reference to it in the 51st Psalm. Thus, in the Gregorian Sacramentary (p. 148) the bishop in seven times with hyssop, sprinkles the altar name Goupi indicates that a fox's brush was some time used as an aspergillum. ASTERISCUS (sometimes called Stellula by Latin writers). To prevent the veil from disturbing the particles arranged on the discus or Lucharist, St. Chrysostom is said to have invented two small arches to support it. These, when placed so as to cross each other, resembled a star, and hence were called ἀστροὶ or ἀστρίσκος, the star; hence the priest, placing it over the patient, is directed to say, "And the star came and stood over where the young child was." In modern times the arches are riveted together at the point of intersection, but so loosely as to admit of one arch being turned within the other for convenience of carriage. See woodcut. ASTROLOGERS. No element of heathenism was more difficult to eradicate than the belief that the stars in their courses influenced the lives of men, and that the destinies of individuals and of nations might be foretold by those who studied their combinations. Under the names of Chaldei (as representing those who were more famous than any other people of the ancient world for their devotion to this study), Mathematici (in popular language this had become the exclusive meaning of the word), Apotelesmatici (dealing with the ἀποτελεσματα, or influences of the stars), Genethliaci (as casting horoscopes of the positions of the planets at the hour of birth), they were to be found in every city of the empire. They became on many grounds objects of suspicion to its police. They were cheats and impostors; they brought in the foreign, eastern superstitions of which Roman magistrates stood in dread; they might at any time play into the hands of political rivals by predicting their success as the favourites of heaven. The annals of the empire accordingly present a series of edicts against them. They were banished from Rome by Agrippa and Augustus (Dion. Cass. xlix. 43, lvi. 25), by Tiberius (Tacit. Ann. li. 32; Sueton. Tiber. c. 36), by Claudius (Tacit. Ann. xii. 52), by Vitellius (Sueton. Vitell. 14). The frequent repetition of the measure shews how ineradicable was the evil. Sometimes the emperor himself, Vespasian, in his eager ambition (Tacit. Hist. ii. 78), Domitian, in his restless suspicion, yielded to their influence. Otho's murder of Galba had been prompted by their counsels. Over the minds of most men, and yet more, of women, they exercised an unbounded sway (Juven. vi. 553-568), often in proportion to the notoriety which they had gained by being mixed up in political or other mysteries, and were on that account expelled from the city.

Christian feeling was opposed to the practice on other grounds. It belonged to the system of demon-worship and lying magic, which Scripture had forbidden. The astrologer was a child of the devil. His art had come down from the Egyptians and Chaldeans (Clem. Alex. Strom. i. 10, p. 132). It substituted the idea of destiny for that of the providence of God, and tampered with the sense of responsibility by leading men to impute their vices to the stars. (August. de Civ. Dei, v. 1; Tract. in Ps. lxi.; de Mithem.; Greg. Nyss. Epi. contr. Julian.; Tertull. de Idol. c. lx. p. 156.) Some teachers voluted to the case of Esau and Jacob, born in the same hour yet with such different destinies, as a proof that the system was false (August. de Doctr. Christ. ii. 21). Some concealing that the heathen world was subject to these influences, favourable or malignant, held that baptism placed men in another region in which they were set, and that the "new birth" annulled the horoscope that was cast for the first nativity. The action of the Church was in accordance with the teaching of its chief writers. The burning of the books of those who used "curious arts" in Acts xix. 19, served as a precedent. Mathematici were to give up their books to the bishop, or to burn them (Constit. . . .). Clergy of all orders were forbidden to practise the art under pain of excommunication (C. Laod. c. 36). In two or three instances the operation of the laws connects itself with memorable names. Aquila, the translator of the Old Testament, was said to have been expelled from the Church on the charge of being an astrologer (Epiph. de Mens. et Pond. § xv. t. li. p. 171, but the narrative is hardly more than a legend). Eusebius, of Emesa, had to contend against the suspicions to which his love of science exposed him, that he was addicted to the μυστὸν ἀστρολογικὸν of astrology (Sozom. II. E. iii. 6). It was one of the crimes imputed to the Priscillianists of Spain that they had revived the old superstitions of the Mathematici, and had taught men that the several parts of their body were under the control of the signs of the zodiac (August. de Haer. lxx.) ATHEISTS (ἄθεοι), a name of reproach which was applied to the early Christians. The absence of material symbols of the Deity, of sacrifice, of temples, and of almost all the external observances which constituted the religion of contemporary heathendom, naturally induced a popular cry that Christianity was a new form of atheism. The cry was repeated by Jews as well as by Gentiles (see Justin Mart. 1. 1. c. xviii.). It was a leading cause of the general animosity against the Christians and the apologists were at some pains to refute it (see especially Athenag. Legat. pro Christ. 3 and 4). The following are the chief allusions to the calumny outside the writings of the apologists:—Eusebius (H. E. iv. 15) tells us that the formula in which Polycarp was desired by the proconsul to abjure his faith was ἀποστρέψασθε. Dion Cassius (lxvii. 14) relates whom some writers have identified with Clemens, Romanus, and who was no doubt a Christian,

was put to death for atheism. Lucian (Alcibiad.
Psoud. c. 25, cf. c. 38) says that Pontus was full century we find Lucian accusing Constantine of having embraced τὴν ἀθεῖαν δόξαν (Euseb. Vit.
Const. c. 15); and Julian summed up his objections to Christianity when he described it as ἀδόξητρα (Julian, Ep. ad Arsac. ap. So. om. II. E.
v. 16). But by that time the Christian fathers had already begun to turn the tables upon their adversaries and atheism became a reproach, not of Paganism against Christianity, but of Chris-tianty against Paganism (see Clem. Alex. Pro- trept. p. 11).

ATHRIUM, the court attached to churches in the earlier centuries. It was usually placed before the front of the church, and surrounded by porticoes. In the centre of the open area was a fountain, or at least a cistern (CAN- THARUS), a large vessel containing water for ablution. This fountain was sometimes covered with a roof and surrounded by railings. The atrium was in the earlier ages considered an important, almost indispensable adjunct to any of the larger churches. Eusebius describes four porticoes in his account of the church built by St. Paulinus at Tyre; and atria dating from the 5th century existed at St. Peter's and St.
Paolo f. l. M. at Rome. Examples, though not dating from the period with which this work is concerned, may be seen in several churches
at Rome, as S. Clemente, S. Cecilia, and others, and indeed elsewhere. In the ruins of the basilica of S. Stefano, in Via Latina, the atrium, instead of occupying its normal place, is placed by the side of the apse, the reason probably being that the Via Latina ran past the apse, and that those who wished to enter the church from that great thoroughfare would thus pass through the atrium. Where, however, no important street or public building prevented the architect from fully developing his plans, the atrium, if should seem, during the whole period treated of in this work (and indeed until a later period), in Italy
at least, and probably elsewhere, formed a part of every important church. [A. N.]

AUDIENTES (Ἀκούουνοι). Two stages have to be noted in the history and significance of this word. Down to the time of Novatus and system of the Church, it is used as equivalent to catechumen. The Audientes are those who are present in the Church, but are not yet baptized, and who therefore, in the nature of the thing, were not present during the passages of the Fideles, or the yet more sacred service which followed. They heard the psalms, the lessons, the sermon, and then left (Tertull. de Vocat.
c. vii. vii.; Cypr. Ep. 13). At Carthage they were placed under the special care of a catechist or Audientium Doctor (Cypr. Ep. 31). The treatise of Augustine, de catechizandis rudibus, was what was the nature of the instruction given.
The word seems to be used with somewhat of the same vagueness by Augustine (Serm. 132).
There is no trace at this period, if indeed at any time in the West, of a distinct position for them in the place where Christians met for worship.

In the East, however, we find from the time of Gregory Thaumaturgus onwards a more systematic classification, and that one made subservient to an elaborate penitential system. The Audientes are the second in a graduated series of those who, as catechumens or members of the Church, have fallen, and need to be restored.
Outside the Church stood the Fientes (ἀλαλούουνοι) mourning over their guilt, catching only the indistinct sounds of what was passing within, exposed to sun or rain. Then within the church, but communicating with it by open doors, were the Audientes (Greg. Thaum. Serm.
xi.). They might stay there and listen, like those who bore the same name in the older system, till the sermon was over. Then the deacon bade them depart along with the unbelievers (Const.
Apost. viii. 5), and they had not the privilege of joining in any prayers. After a year thus passed they came within the church, as Fientes (γαυυυαίνορες), joining in the prayers up to the commencement of the proper Eucharistic service, but kneeling in their contrition. Lastly, they became Consistentes (συνιστάουνοι), standing with those in full communion with the Church, but not yet admitted themselves to that privilege. Such was the ideal system laid down by the Council of Nicea (c. xi.), elaborated by Basil (Can. xii., lxxv.), and more or less acted on throughout the churches of the East. It brought with it, in the risk of degradation from a higher order to one of shame and dishonour, from the position of full membership to any one of them, a system of secondary punishments the actual effect of which it is not easy to estimate. [CATECHUMENS; PENITENTS.] [E. H. P.]

AUDIENTIA EPISCOPALIS. This forms one of the heads or titles in the first book of Justinian's Code, and is there used in relation to an authority, not only in spiritual but also in certain secular matters, conferred upon the bishops of the Church. In conjunction with the temporal magistrates, they were empowered to take part in managing the revenues of cities, the guardianship of young persons, and various other matters of a civil nature (see Guizot, Hist. of Civilization in Europe, Lecture II., as to the influence which the Church thus exercised in society). But the phrase more especially denotes the power given to the bishops of hearing and deciding disputes as to temporal rights in certain cases. Thus we find (Code, l. tit. 4, s. 8) "ad qui ex consensu apud eos legem antistitem litigare volebant, non veniantur. Sed experiantur illius in civili duntaxat negotio, more arbitri sponte residentes, iudicentur" and (Ibid., s. 9) "Episcopale iudicium ratum sit omnibus, qui se audiri a sacerdotibus elegunt; tantum eorum iudicium adhibendum esse reverentiam iubeamus, quam vestris detur necesse est potestibus, a quibus non recet provocare, &c." Two limitations appear on the face of these passages:—1. That the matter in controversy must be of a civil character, no criminal cases being to be thus decided. 2. That both parties to the dispute must voluntarily agree to have their cause thus tried. The result therefore is to make the bishop an authoritative arbitrator, whenever the parties submitted themselves to his decision. This repeats what had been previously authorized by Arcadius and Honorius (see Theod. Code, De Jurisdic., ii. 1), and by Valentinian III.; and, indeed, was perhaps little more than an acceptance and recognition on the part of the state of a custom which had long prevailed in Christian communities, of bringing their disputes before their Christian superiors instead of before heathen judges, in accordance with the words of St. Paul (1 Cor. vi.). At one period, however, there is some ground to believe that the secular power of Rome was inclined to go much further. According to Eusebius (Vit. Const., iv. 27) and Sozomen (l. 9), Constantine ordained that either party in a dispute of a civil nature might select the bishop as his judge, even against the will of the other party; and that the episcopal decision should be conclusive, and should be executed by the temporal authorities. This compulsory setting aside of the ordinary tribunals of the Roman Empire at the pleasure of either litigant, did not long endure, and seems to have been superseded by the more moderate principle adopted by Arcadius and Honorius. Indeed the learned commentator Gothofred, who is followed by Bingham (Antiq., ii. 7, 3), doubts whether Constantine ever really made any such decree. Later writers, however, have not shared these doubts (see Herzog, Real. Encycl., sub voce, "audientia Episcopali"). This alleged decree was in later ages revived in the west, being then attributed to Theodosius. In that form it was accepted by Charlemagne (Capit., vi. 396), passed into the collections of laws, and finally found its way into the Decretum of Gratian (Part II., causa xl. quest. i. 35). Innocent III. lays stress upon it (Decretal., Greg. i. lib. 2, tit. l. 13), and indeed in this shape it was well calculated to minister to the Papal pretensions. [E. H.]

AUGUSTINE'S OAK, Conference at, between Augustine of Canterbury and the British bishops.—1. In A.D. 602 or 603, and probably at Aust on the Severn, or some spot near to it, with a view to induce the British bishops to give up their Easter Rule, and to co-operate with Augustine in preaching to the Saxons. The first conference (Bæd. ii. 2) was only preliminary (Augustine, however, working a miracle at it, acc. to Bede), and led to—II. A more formal conference shortly after, in the same year, at the same place, at which seven British bishops were present, with "many learned men," especially from Bangor monastery (near Chester), then called Dineth as its abbat. On this occasion Augustine limited his demands to three, conformity in keeping Easter, and in the baptismal rite, and co-operation in preaching to the Saxons; suppressing, if Bede's account is complete, all claim of the jurisdiction which Gregory the Great had bestowed upon him over the British bishops, and saying nothing of the tonsure; but disgusting the Britons by refusing to stand up at their approach—a token, according to the words of a certain anchorite whom they had consulted, that he was not a man of God, and therefore was not to be followed. The conference accordingly broke up without any other result than that of drawing from Augustine some angry words, which unfortunately came true a dozen years afterwards, when he was dead, in the slaughter of the Bangor monks at Chester (Bæd. ib.). The baptismal differences have been conjectured by Kilmstann to relate to trine immersion, by Dr. Roek (upon the better evidence of the Stowe Missal) to have referred to the washing of the feet which the Britons are supposed to have attached to baptism; but both are conjectures only. For the date, locality, and history of these conferences, see Haddan and Stubbs, Councils, iii. 40, 41. And see the well-known "Answer of Dineth," which is probably the work of some mediæval Welsh writer, see ib. i. 122. [A. W. H.]

AUTHENTIC. The sounds connecting the final (in Gregorian music) with its octave, or a melody in which they only are employed, were called Authentic. In contradistinction to those connecting the 4th below the final with its 8ve, the 5th above it, which were called Plagal (v. PLAGAL). In Ambrosian music authentic scales only were employed, and of these only four; the Phrygian (D-d), Dorian (E-e), Hypolydian (F-f), and Hypophrygian (G-g) of the Greek system. The Aeolian (A-a) and the Ionian (C-c), subsequently added to the number of the church scales (tones or modes), were subjected to the same classification. Authentic scales are characterized by the harmonic division (6 : 4 : 3) of their octaves; e. g. C—g—c; the plagal by the arithmetical division (4 : 3 : 2); e. g. G—C—g. Authentic melodies are thought to have generally greater dignity and strength than plagal. A good modern example of the former is the well-known German chorale Ein feste Burg ist unser Gott, and of the latter our Evening Hymn, attributed to Tallis; and it would be difficult to find in pure melodic music better examples of the sublime and the beautiful. But the tune known in England as the Old Hundredth (essentially plagal) certainly contravenes this theory in a very striking instance and manner.

The relations of subject and answer in the modern tonal fugue (as when C—g are "answered" not by g—d but by g—C) obviously grew out of the division of scales into authentic and plagal. [J. H.]

AUTISSIODORENSE CONCILIUM. [AEXINAS, COUNCIL OF.]

AUTOCEPHALI (Αὐτοκέφαλοι, from αὐτός κεφαλή), a name given by canonists and in the Notitiae—1. To Metropolitans who remained independent of Patriarchs after Patriarchs were established, i. e., who then continued still to be what all Metropolitans originally were. So the Cyprian archbishop (Conc. Ephes. A. D. 431, act. vii.; and again, as late as Conc. Trull. A. D. 681, can. 35, at a time when the Cypriots had fled from Cyprus itself, and had taken refuge in the Ἐπαρχία Ἐλασηπόντιος); to whom Balsamon joins the archbishops of Bulgaria and of Iberia (Georgia). The privilege had been given to the former of these two by Justinian. (See, however, Le Quien, Oriens Christ., vol. i. 96.) The latter would seem to have been at first reckoned as subject to the Patriarchate of Antioch, and then to Constantinople; but from A. D. 450 he styled himself ἀὐτοκέφαλος, and appears to have been considered as such (Mulan, Hist. of Geog., Ch. 35, 196, &c.). The Armenian Church is also so styled in the Notitiae (see Bingham, II. xviii. 2); but it would rather appear to have claimed to be in itself a patriarchate, inasmuch as Nerses its second bishop, present at Conc. Constant., A. D. 381, styled himself Patriarch and Katholikos of Armenia, as did thenceforward his successors (Mulan, Life of the Westery the Libanator, 27). Ravenna in the west is also said to have arrogated the privilege of "autocephalism," and only to have surrendered it under the pontificate of Pope Donus, A. D. 676-679. Roman (and Welsh) Britain, which is usually adduced as another western instance, and which undoubtedly had no relations to the Roman patriarchate or any other for three centuries (400-700),—as neither had Celtic Ireland nor Columban Scotland,—was rather a cess of bishops who still remained without a metropolis, the legends of the archbishoprics of Caerleon or of St. David's, all except as an honorary and unmeaning title, being without any historical authority whatever. The epithet is applied to Britain only by late controversial writers.

2. A name given to a class of bishops who came to exist in the 9th century in the eastern patriarchates, as Constantinople, Jerusalem, Antioch, who were dependent directly upon their metropolis, and who might be more accurately (and sometimes were) called archbishops or metropolitan themselves, only without suffragans (see Bingham, II. xviii. 3).

3. The name might be applied, on the same principle upon which it is attached to metropolitans whose independence survived the establishment of patriarchs, to bishops whose independence survived the establishment of metropolitans. But the origin of metropolitans was too early and too universal to allow of any ancient authority signifying possible temporary exceptions of this kind by a name. The British bishops, however, appear to be (substantially) a case in point. And Valesius, although inaccurately in point of fact, has applied the name to the Bishop of Jerusalem before that Bishop became himself a patriarch (Bingham, ib. 4).

4. No doubt also the name might be applied, as Bingham suggests, to any case where there happened to be only one bishop in the country, as in Scythia in the time of Sozomen. Accephalus (Ἀκεφάλος) is said to be sometimes used for Autocephalus.

BALANCE (SYMBOL). The balance appears sometimes upon Christian tombs. A sepulchral stone from the cemetery of St. Cyriac (Arianghi, Roma Subt. II. 139) displays this instrument in conjunction with a crown; it may also be seen upon a marble slab taken by Bosio from a cemetery of the Via Latina (Arianghi, II. 658), accompanied by a house, a fish, by a doubtful object which has been taken wrongly for a candelabrum, and by a mummy set up in a niche. A monument of the same nature reproduced in the work of M. Perret (Inscrip. No. 37) represents a balance with a weight (see woodcut). De Rossi (Roma Subt. T. i. p. 81) notices another example in the church of St. Cecilia at Rome.

Balance with weight, from the Catacombs.

Some antiquaries, as Mamachi (Origines v. 98) have supposed that the balance is symbolical of judgment or justice. And it is true that it is found, doubtless with this signification, on coins of Gordian, Diocletian, and other emperors of pagan Rome. The mediæval artists again have frequently made use of this idea. We may see it, for instance, in the tympanum of the great doorway of Notre Dame in Paris, and in that of the cathedral of Autun, where it may be considered as a translation in sculpture of the words of the Apocalypse (xxii. 12). But in the first two instances which we have mentioned, and which are almost the only examples transmitted to us by Christian antiquity properly so called, it is important to observe that mention is made of the contract entered into between the purchasers of the tombs and the FOSORES MONTANI and CALEVIUS: VRSICINVS ED QVINTILIANA SE IIBI (vivi) CONPARAVERNT LOCV A MONTANV. || CALEVIVS BENDIDIT (vendidit) AVIN TRISOMV.

It is therefore more natural to suppose that the balance symbolises purchase and sale, per aes et libram.

Sometimes upon tombs the balance is simply indicative of a trade, as for example on the slab of a Roman moneyer found in the cemetery of St. Priscilla (Marini Papiri diplom. p. 332): AVR. VENERANDO. NVM || QVI VIXIT. ANN. XXXV || ATILIA. VALENTINA. FECIT || MARITO. BENEMERENTI. IN. PACE. Bronze balances were found in a Frankish sepulchre of the Merovingian period by the Abbé Cochet (Sepult. Gauloises, p. 253 and following), where in all probability they indicated the tomb of a monetary officer, or fiscal agent, or accountant of some kind. This is rendered almost certain by the fact that a balance in the Faussett collection (Inventory Sepulchrale, p. 43; pl. xvii. fig. 1, 2, 3), was found in the same tomb with a "touch-stone" for the trial of metals. Another, found like the preceding in an ancient tomb in Kent, is described and figured by Mr. Roach Smith in Collectanea Antiqua, vol. iii. pp. 12-14:

St. Cyriac (Aringhi, this instrument in it may also be seen by Bosio from a (Aringhi, ii. 658), fish, by a doubtful wrongly for a canvas set up in a niche. A figure reproduced in Script. No. 37) repeated (see woodcut). De (86) notices another Cecilia at Rome.

the Calocombi.
nchi (Origines v. 98) is symbolical of it is true that it is signification, on coins of all emperors of all artists again have idea. We may see panum of the great Paris, and in that of here it may be contemplation of the word:). But in the first have mentioned, and examples transmitted properly so called, that mention is made co between the pure ROSORES Montanus AD QVINTILIANA AVERVXT LOCV A S BENDIDIT (ve-

BAPCHILD, COUNCIL OF (BACCANGLDENSE CONCILIUM), or rather WITENAGEMOT.

(1) Between A.D. 696 & 716, at Bapchild, near Sittingbourne, in Kent; a Kentish Witenagemot, at which abbesses and presbyters, as well as bishops and abbots, were present, and where the celebrated Privilege of Wilfred was enacted, granting to the Kentish metropolitan a free election in the case of abbats, abbesses, priests, and deacons. The date cannot be precisely determined; and is further confused by a discrepancy between the Canterbury Register and the Textus Roffensis on the one hand, and the Anglo-Saxon Chronicle on the other, respecting the dates of Gebmund and Tobias, successively bishops of Rochester. Spurious forms of the Privilege extend it to the election of bishops and to the whole of Saxon England. See Haddan and Stubbs, Councils, iii. 238-247.—(2) A.D. 798, if at all; said to have been held under Kenulf, king (not of Kent, but) of Mercia, and Archbishop Athelard, with bishops (two lists, both spurious) abbats, and an archdeacon; and to have prohibited lay interference with churches and monasteries, in compliance with a mandate of Pope Leo III. The decree, however, is verbatim that of the (genuine) Council of Cloveshoo of A.D. 803, from which also one of the lists of bishops is partially taken (Kemble, Cod. Dipl. 1018, 1024, Wilk. i. 162; Haddan and Stubbs, Counc. iii. 517). The copy in Reg. A 1 at Canterbury, however has no signatures. [A. W. H.]

BAPTISM. This Article is arranged as follows:—I. Terms used to designate Baptism.

II. The Order of Baptism in various Churches. III. The several Parts of the entire Ritual, viz.: Consecration of the Water; Interrogations and Responses (Renunciation and Profession); Preparatory Uncction; Unclotting of the Catechumen; the Immersion; the Baptismal Formula; the subsequent Ceremonies, viz.: the Kiss, the lighted Tapers, the white Garments, the red and white Thread, the Chaplet, and the washing of Feet. IV. At what times, in what places, and by whom, Baptism was administered; with what matter, in what mode, and at what age. V. Graphic representations of Baptism. VI. Literature. The subject of Spousons, and that of Baptismal NAMES, are treated separately in their alphabetical order.

I. Terms used to designate Baptism.

§ 1. Baptizo and derived words. The meaning of this verb is not, as commonly asserted, identical with that of baptizo, to "dip," but presented this idea under special modifications characteristic of the various ages in which it was employed. In classical usage it was commonly used metaphorically in speaking of one "drenched" with the like. Polybius uses it (iii. 72) in speaking of troops passing through water which reached up to their breasts: μόλις ἕως τῶν μαστῶν of πρὸς βαπτίζουσαι διεβαίον. In the Canonical Books of the LXX, it occurs but once in speaking of Naaman either "washing" or "dipping" himself in the Jordan (1 Kings v. 14). In the Apocrypha, in speaking of one washing herself (ἑβαπτίζετο ἐπὶ τῆς πηγῆς, Jud. xii. 7) at a spring; and again (Ecclus. 24, 37 al. 29) of one washing himself after touching a dead body; both cases having reference to ceremonial purification. In the New Testament it is occasionally used metaphorically (Matt. xx. 22; Mark x. 38, 39; Luke xii. 50). But it generally has reference either to Jewish ceremonial purification (Mark vii. 4; Luke xi. 28), or to Christian Baptism.

§ 2. Λουτρον, or πηγή, λουτρον, fontes. These terms (laver and font) have reference, like the last noticed, to the outward circumstances of the Baptismal Rite. Λουτρον, the Latin lavacrum, "body," that is, either the vessel, or the water so used. St. Paul twice (Eph. v. 26, and Tit. iii. 5) uses the word in reference to baptism. In Justin Martyr it appears as an evidently technical designation of baptism (τὸ λουτρον ποιούμεθα, Apol. I. c. 79), and from that time onward the word is repeatedly used. The terms πηγή and fontes, meaning a spring, or a pool fed by a spring, date natural terms from the time when either fountains or pools (see § 39) in the open air, or baptismal springs, were made use of for the purpose of Christian baptism.

§ 3. Terms expressive of doctrine.—The most common of these doctrinal designations are those which have reference to the idea of Regeneration—in Greek ἀναγέννησις, and more rarely καταγενεσία and θεογένεσις, in Latin regeneratio, secunda or spiritualis nutritio, renasci, and renascentia. Terms of regeneration had been used in a figurative sense both by classical authors and by Hellenists, such as Philo and Josephus, before they were adopted into the language of Christianity. They served to express the idea of an entire change of condition, as for example the passing out of a state of misery, of slavery or of subjection, into a state of well-being, of freedom and of independence. (See Wetstein on Matt. xix. 28; Trench's Synonymus of N. T. pp. 71, 72. Add Tertullian, de Bapt. c. 5.) The Rabbinical use of such terms more directly illustrates the Christian meaning of these words, but the ultimate date to which that use is to be traced is open to doubt. (See Lightfoot on John iii. 4; Opp. tom. ii. p. 610, fol. Rotterdam 1687; Schoettgen, Hor. Hebr. i. p. 704, Dresden 4, 1733; Carpzovii Annot.iones in Th. Goodwinii Moses et Aaronem, Francofurti 4, 1748, lib. i. cap. iii. § vii.)

§ 4. Σφραγίς, Signaculum, &c. Baptism is not unfrequently spoken of as "the seal," or more fully "the seal of the Lord," (Clemens Alex.), and that partly perhaps with reference to the language of Holy Scripture (2 Cor. i. 22, Eph. i. 13, and iv. 30). But other thoughts were also connected with the term, as σφραγίς of the sign of the cross (this being more especially the seal) being the seal of the Christian covenant or of the "spiritual circumcision." (St. Cyril. Hieros. Catech. v. Μετὰ τὴν πίστιν τὴν πνευματικὴν λαμβάνουμεν σφραγίδα, Ἁγίῳ Πνεύματι διὰ τοῦ λουτροῦ περιτεμνόμενοι.) Hence further modi-flections of the same idea, such as "Character Dominicus," the mark impressed by the Lord (St. Augustine de Bapt. c. Pontif., lib. vi. cap. 1. and E. hist. 184 bis, c. vi. § 23. Migne, tom. p. 80.) θεσπεσιος σημεῖον, a mark in token of ownership or dominion (St. Greg. Naz. Or. vi.; compare St. Isaac of Armenia, quoted below, § 104); or again the Nota Militaris (St. Augustine de Bapt., lib. i. cap. iv.), ἡ τοῦ στρατιώτου σφραγίς (St. Chrysostom in II. Cor. Hom. lii. ad fin.), the mark put upon soldiers to ensure their recognition.

§ 5. Terms of Initiation or Illumination.—The idea of baptism being an initiation (ἰνιτῆρις ἀναταγῶσα, τελετή) into Christian mysteries, an enlightenment (φωτισμός, illuminatio, illustratio) of the darkened understanding, belonged naturally to the primitive ages of the Church, when Christian doctrine was still taught under great reserve to all but the baptized, and when adult baptism, requiring previous instruction, was still of prevailing usage. Most of the Fathers interpreted the φωτισθεῖς, "once enlightened," of Heb. vi. 4, as referring to baptism. In the middle of the second century (Justin M. Apol. li. καλεῖται δὲ τοῦτο τὸ λουτρὸν φωτισμός ὡς φωτισμένη τῆν διδασκίαν τῶν ταῦτα μαθητόντων) we find proof that "illumination" was already a received designation of baptism. And at a later time (St. Cyril Hieros. Catech. passim), of φωτισμοῦ (illumination) occurs as a technical term for those under preparation for baptism, αὐ φωτισθεῖς of those already baptized. So of ἀμύητοι and ἀμεμώμενοι, the uninitiated and the initiated, are contrasted by Sozomen, H. E. lib. i. c. 3.

§ 6. Modern terms.—In most of the modern European languages the words expressive of baptism are derived directly from the Latin baptizare, and testify to the fact of Latin having been in the Western Churches the one ecclesiastical language almost to the exclusion of all others. But there is one notable exception. The German taufen, to "baptize," akin to our English "dip," has the same technical meaning as baptizare, and reveals the time when on the conversion of the German tribes baptism was as a rule performed by "dipping" (see § 92), and when not Latin, but as far as possible the mother-tongue of the converts was employed in the baptismal offices. Our countryman, St. Boniface, in his Statuta (Martene, de Ant. Lit. Rit. tom. i. p. 48) desires that the catechumens be taught to make the B-annunciations and Confessions of Faith in Baptism "in ipsa lingua qua nati sunt," and directs any presbyter to leave the diocese who is too proud to obey this direction.

II. The Order of Baptism in various Churches of the East and of the West.

§ 7. Described by Justin Martyr.—The earliest description of the actual rite of baptism is that given by Justin Martyr in his first Apology (cap. lxxix.), which dates from the middle of the second century. "We will now relate after what manner we dedicated (ἀνεδίκαυσεν) ourselves unto God, when we were new-made through Christ (καυνομένημεν διὰ τοῦ Χ.). So many as are convinced, and believe the truth of what we teach and affirm, and who promise to be able to live accordingly, are taught both to pray, and with fasting to ask of God remission of their past sins, while we join with them in their prayers and in their fast. Then they are conducted by us to a place where the water, and they are regenerated (ἀναγεννώμεναι) after the same manner of regeneration as that in which we ourselves were regenerated. For they then make their ablution (τὸ λουτρὸν ποιῶμεναι) in the water, in the name of God, the Father and Lord of the Universe, and of our Saviour Jesus Christ, and of the Holy Ghost. For Christ said: 'Except ye be regenerated (ἄνευ τοῦ ἀναγεννηθῆτε) ye cannot enter into the kingdom of heaven.'"

§ 8. It will be seen that the description here given is without full details concerning the rite itself, as was indicated in a writing concerning a Christian sacrament to persons who were not Christians themselves. But we may trace clear allusions to the preparatory instruction and guidance of the catechumens—to the baptismal promises or stipulations—to a place of assembly for the faithful (ἔρχονται ὅς ἡμῶν ἕσθαι ὄσθα ἐσθῆ). We find also the baptismal formula, "in the name of the Father, of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost," though with slight interpolations which are probably due to the need of some explanation in addressing a heathen audience on such a subject.

§ 9. Ritual described by Tertullian.—About fifty years later than Justin Martyr, and about the close of the second century, we find evidence in the works of Tertullian of the nature of the baptismal rite as observed at that time. He speaks first of the Preparation of the Catechumens immediately before baptism—saying that they should be frequent in prayer, with fasting and kneeling (then a penitential attitude), and watching, and with confession of all former sins. "Ingressuras baptismum, orationibus erubris, jejuniis et genitalationibus, et pervigiliis, orare oportet, et cum confessione omnium retro delictorum, et exponant etiam baptismum Joannis, Tinguntur, inquit, continentis delicta sua" (De Bapt. c. 20).

§ 10. He describes the solemn renunciation of the devil and his pomp, and his angels, distinguishing the renunciation made at the time of baptism from that made some time previously in the church (on admission as catechumens). "Aquam adituri ibidem, sed et aliquanto prius in ecclesia sub antistitis manu, contestamur nos renuntiare diabolo et pompe et angelis ejus." De Car. Mil. c. 3. He speaks then of other "responses" made by the baptized while standing in the water, alleging these as an example of custom founded on tradition only, not on any express direction of our Lord. ("Dehinc ter merguntur amplius aliquid respondentibus in Dominum in evangelio determinavit." Ibid. See below, § 91.)

§ 11. The words (ter merguntur) just quoted, and those of the treatise De Bapt. c. 1. "in nomine homo demissus et inter pauca verba (necesse) esse credence to the Trine Immersion then adopted" (see below, § 49) and the use of the words implicitly prescribed in Matt. xxviii. 19. These points he more exactly determines elsewhere. ("Novissime mandum in finem in Patrem et Filium et Spiritum Sanctum, non in unum; nam nec semel sed ter, ad singula nomina, in persona singulari tinguntur." Adv. Praxeram, c. 26.) § 12. Among the traditional customs, Tertullian mentions the tasting of a mixture (concordium) of honey and milk on leaving the font ("Inde suscepti lactis et mellis concordiam

 no reference to this in his treatise de baptismo, so that it may not improbably have been of occa-

 intimately connected with the actual baptism,

 § 14. Ritual at Jerusalem. A. D. 347. The Lent, a. 347, picture to us in tolerably full detail the ceremonial usages there customary in his time. Throughout Lent (Catech. i. τεσσαράκωντα ἡμέρας οὐ ἀναδέξαι ἐν προαύχῃ; and catechumens assembled day after day in the church of the Anastasis (Cat. xiv.) for prayer, and for catechetical instruction. § 15. And at the close of Lent, on the "Sabbath," or Easter Eve, as the evening (Myst. Catech. i. κατ' ἐσπερινὸν τοῦ βαπτισμαίου τῆς ἑσπερας. Compare Chry-sost. in 1 Cor. Hom. xi., where he speaks of τὴν
 ἑσπερινὰν ἐκλεπνῆ, an evening in which baptism is solemnized) chosen in upon the holy city, those to be baptized assembled in the outer chamber of the baptistry (ἐν τῷ ἑσπερινῷ τοῦ βαπτισ-τηρίου ὄκλῳ, Myst. Catech. i.) and facing towards the west, as being the place of darkness, and of the powers thereof, with outstretched hand, and made open renunciation of Satan. § 16. Then turning them about, and with face towards the East, "the place of light," they exclaimed, "I believe in the Father (ἐν τῷ Π.) and in the Holy Ghost, and in the Son, and in one baptism of
 into the inner chamber (ὄκλῳ) of the baptistry, and (Myst. Cat. ii.) put off the garment (chiton)
 naked were anointed with oil from head to foot.
 § 18. After this preparatory unction they were led by the hand to the font itself, and then each one was asked, "Dost thou believe in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost?" and they, in answer, witnessed the saving confession of their faith, and dipped themselves three in the water, and thrice lifted themselves up from out thereof; and so set forth, by symbol, the three days' burial of the Lord, and his Resurrection; and the saving once "a tomb and a mother." § 19. Then, on coming forth from the water, they were clothed with white garments, significant of the purity and brightness of that spiritual vesture with which they were ever henceforth to be clothed (Myst. Cat. iv. in p.). § 20. Afterward, as Christ, coming up out of the waters, was associated with the unction of the Holy Ghost, descending upon Him in bodily shape as a dove,

 an unction, not bodily but spiritual, so the baptized, when made partakers of "the anointed," are themselves "anointed" with a holy oil (on the forehead, the ears, the nostrils, and the breast) and while the body was thus touched with material ointment, the spirit was sanctified [or "consecrated," ἀγιό(ε)ται] by the holy and life-giving Spirit" (Myst. Cat. iii.). § 21. Holy Communion. After this followed holy communion,
 of which all the newly baptized were partakers,
 therein becoming "of one body and of one blood"
 with Christ (συνσώματοι καὶ σὺναιμαὶ τοῦ Χριστοῦ), and there partaking of a heavenly bread, and of a cup of salvation, that sanctify both soul and body (ib. iv.). § 22. Faiths and lights. Under the figurative language employed by St. Cyril in his preliminary address, we may see evident allusions to the accompanying ceremonial of the great Easter rite. This was celebrated, as we have already mentioned, on the eve, and had we already (ἐστὲ ἀπὸ τῆς βελῆς οὐδ' ὄρου ἐκλεπνῆ τῆς ἑσπερας κατ. α., in profato) preceding Easter day.
 And the use of artificial light, thus rendered necessary, was singularly in harmony with the occasion, and with some of the thoughts most prominently associated with it (see § 5 above), moving than that pictured to us in the pages of St. Cyril, when on the eve of the Saviour's resurrection, and at the doors of the church of the Anastasis, the white-robed (§ 19) band of the newly baptized, was seen approaching from the neighbouring baptistry, and the darkness was turned into day (τὸ σκότος τὸ ἡμεροπαινῆται, Profat. at Catech.) in the brightness of unum-bered lights. And as the joyous child swelled upwards, "blessed is he whose unrighteousness is forgiven, and whose sin is covered," it might well be thought that angels' voices were heard echoing the glad acclaim, "blessed is the man unto whom the Lord imputeth no sin, and in whose spirit there is no guile." (ὅτε διὰν ἀθε-νήσονται, Μακάριοι ὡς ἀφένθησαν, κατ. α., Præfat.)
 § 23. Other Eastern rites. In Egypt. The order of baptism which we have traced above as observed at Jerusalem in the year 347 A. D., bears a close resemblance in all its more important details to those of which we find record elsewhere.
 The limits of this article do not admit of our quoting these in full. For the order followed in the Egyptian Church, see the Constitutions Ecclésiasticæ Aegyptiacæ, § 46 seqq., published by Lagarde (cf. Biblioth. in his Leçons sur l'Église primitive d'Égypte, Annuaire). It will be found also in Busen-berg's Christianity and Manhood, vol. vi, p. 465, seqq., in a Greek translation by Lagarde from the Coptic original. With this, which may probably date from the 4th or 5th century (not as a MS.
 but as a rite), may be compared the Ordo Baptismi of Severus, Patriarch of Alexandria in the 7th century (Biblioth. Max. Patr. m, Paris, fol.
 1654, tom. vi. col. 25), and, for a much later time, see Vansleb, Histoire de l'Église d'Alexandrie, Paris, 1677, cap. 21, p. 80.
 § 24. In Aethiopia. The Ethiopic rite must originally have resembled that of Alexandria.
 Our first detailed accounts of it come to us from the Jesuit missionaries (Bibl. Max. Patr. as above, tom. vi. col. 57, seqq.). With their statements, which coming from various quarters appear at times somewhat inconsistent with each other, may be compared the account given by Ludolf in his Historia Aethiopia, lib. iii. cap. vi.

§ 25. The Descriptions of the Rite given by Dionysius, the so-called Areopagite (Ecc. Hier. lib. ii.), and in the Apostolical Constitutions, cannot be assigned with certainty to any particular date or locality; but they afford interesting points of comparison with the ritual described elsewhere.

§ 26. Western Rites. The only complete Ordines Baptismi of any early Western churches are the Roman and the Gallican. The Roman may be traced with slight variations in the sacramentary attributed to Gelasius (Migne, Patrol. tom. 74, p. 1105, and Muratori, Liturg. Romana. Vet.), and that of Gregory the Great (ed. H. Menard). Many variations of the Gallican Ordo Baptismi are given by Martene (De Ant. Ecc. Rit. tom. 1. Part 1), and of these we select one example as being of exceptional interest.

§ 27. The Gallican-Gallican Rite. The earliest of the Gallican Ordines Baptismi is probably that sometimes described as the Gothic, as having been in use in the Visigothic Church. The order commences with a prefatory address, remarkable for the figurative language employed, which is utterly unlike that to be met with in any other known ritual, and in which we may probably see traces of the peculiar circumstances under which Christianity was first introduced into Gaul. "Standing, dearest brethren, on the bank of this crystal-clear fount, bring ye from the land to the shore new-comers to ply the traffic whereof they have need (mercatores sui commercia). Let all who embark on this voyage make their way over this new sea, not with a rod (virga, probably with reference to Moses and the Red Sea), but with the cross; not with bodily touch, but with spiritual apprehension; not with traveller's staff, but in sacramental mystery (non virga, sed cruce, non tactu sed sensu, non baculo sed sacramento). The pace is small but full of grace. Happy hath been the pilotage of the Holy Spirit. Therefore let us pray the Lord our God, that He will sanctify this fount, and make it a laver of most blessed regeneration in remission of all sins; through the Lord." § 28. The Collect then follows, being a prayer for the benediction of the fount. "God who didst sanctify the fount of Jordan for the salvation of souls, let the angel of thy blessing descend upon these waters, that thy servants being bathed (perfundi) therewith may receive remission of sins, and being born again of water and the Holy Spirit, may devoutly serve thee for ever; through the Lord."

§ 29. The Contestatio. "It is meet and right, Holy Lord, Almighty Father, Initiator of the Saints, Father of all Unction, and author of a new sacrament through thine only Son our Lord God; Who, through the ministry of water bestowed in place of the riches of the world (ante divitias mundi), evidently from the Greek ἐπι τοῦ πλοῦτος τοῦ κόσμου) thine Holy Spirit; Thou that providest the waters of Bethesda through the healing operation of the Angel; Who didst sanctify the channel of Jordan by the worthiness of Christ thy Son; have regard, O Lord, to these waters prepared for the doing away of the sins of men; grant that the Angel of thy fatherly love (pietatis tue) may be present to this holy fount; may he wash off the stains of the former life, and sanctify a shrine wherein Thou mayest dwell, causing them that herein shall be regenerated to grow and be strengthened evermore in the inner man (procursans at regenerationem viscera aeterna florescent, probably ἐν ἑαυτῶν εἰς τὸν αἰῶνα τὰ σπλάγγνα τῶν ἀναγεννησάντων), and bestowing that true renewal which is of baptism. Bless, Lord God, this water that Thou didst create, and let Thy healing power (virtus tua) descend upon it. Pour down from above Thy Holy Spirit, the Paraclete, the messenger [angel] of truth. Sanctify, O Lord, these waters as thou didst the streams of Jordan; that they who go down into this fount, in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost, may be found worthy to obtain both pardon of sins and the on-pouring of the Holy Spirit, through our Lord Jesus Christ, Who with (apud) Thee and the Holy Ghost is blessed for evermore." § 30. Consecration with Christ. "Then thou makest a cross with chrism, and sayest: I exorcise thee, thou water of God's creation; I exorcise thee, the whole army of the devil, the whole power of the adversary, and all darkness of evil spirits; I exorcise thee in the name of our Lord Jesus Christ of Nazareth, to whom the Father hath subjected all things in heaven and in earth. Fear and tremble, Thou and all the malice that is thine: give place to the Holy Spirit, that all who descend into this fount may have the laver of the baptism of regeneration, unto remission of all sins, through Our Lord Jesus Christ, who will come unto the judgment seat of the Majesty of His Father with the holy angels, to judge thee thou enemy, and the world, through fire, for evermore." § 31. Insufflation. "Then thou shalt breathe (see § 42) three times upon the water, and put chrism therein in the form of a cross, and say: 'the on-pouring of the salutary chrism of Our Lord Jesus Christ, that this may be made a fountain of water springing up unto life eternal.' Amen." § 32. The interrogations and the baptism. "While baptizing thou shalt make the interrogations (dum baptizas interrogas; see below, § 43) and say: 'I baptize thee (naming him) in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost, unto remission of sins, that thou mayest have eternal life. Amen.'" § 33. Unction. "While touching him with chrism thou shalt say: 'I anoint thee with the (chrism) unction of holiness, the clothing of immortality, which our Lord Jesus Christ first received, bestowed by the Father, that thou mayest present it entire and undiminished before the judgment seat of Christ, and mayest live for ever and ever.'" § 34. The washing of feet. "While washing his feet, thou shalt say: 'I wash thy feet, as our Lord Jesus Christ did unto his disciples. Do thou the like to strangers and pilgrims, that thou mayest have eternal life.'" § 35. The clothing. "While putting the garment upon him thou shalt say: 'Receive this white garment, which thou mayest keep and present (quam perferas) before the judgment seat of our Lord Jesus Christ.'" § 36. The collect. "Let us pray, most dear brethren, our Lord God, for these his neophytes, now baptized, that when the Saviour shall come in His ma-

§ 38. Peccatorities of this Rite.—There is strong internal evidence that this rite in its present shape is a translation into debased Latin of an older Greek original. There are many parts of it of which the sense can only be guessed by first translating it back into Greek, word for word, taking Latin, such as that of the translator of Irenaeus, as a guide in so doing. And this opening address being taken wholly from the language of trade and of navigation, bears out in a remarkable manner the conclusion to which other independent evidence points, viz., that Greek missionaries, and in connection with great line of commercial traffic of which Marseilles was the chief western entrepôt, and the principal eastern ports. It has another point of interest for English readers, viz., that there are strong grounds for believing that the primitive British and Irish rites were based on the old Gallican use, of which that just quoted presents, probably, the oldest example now remaining.

§ 39. British and Irish Rites.—No complete Ordo baptisimus appears to have been preserved which will illustrate the primitive usage of the British and Irish Churches. Incidental notices remaining in ancient documents serve to designate many points of detail which will be noticed in their place. The fullest of these, and one which is of great interest on many grounds, is the story told by Tirechan (6th century) in the Book of Arnaugh, concerning St. Patrick's baptizing the two daughters of King Loaghair at the pool of Clebach in Connaught. For this, see Todd's Life of St. Patrick, p. 452.

§ 40. Spanish Rite.—Such details as can now be determined concerning the primitive baptismal rite in Spain are contained in a treatise of St. Ildephonsus of Seville (7th century), De Cognitione Baptismi. Further particulars may be inferred from Isidore of Seville De off. Eccl. lib. ii. cap. 24; and from the Mozarabic Liturgy, attributed by some to him. That Spanish usage in the 4th century differed in some respects from that of Rome, is indicated by the letter of Siricius of Rome to Himerius Tarraconensis. See below, § 73.

III. Details of the Ritual of Baptism.

§ 41. Theodulf, bishop of Orleans, just at the close of the 8th century, wrote a treatise De Ordine Baptismi (Migne's Patrol. cv. 223), in which he describes the complicated Ritual practised in Western Churches in his own time. Taking his description as a basis, but omitting here the notice of such points as will come under separate discussion in other articles, we may proceed now to describe separately the main features of the order of baptism as they had been developed in the 8th century, viz., the Consecration of the Water, the Renunciations, the Profession of Faith, the Immersion with accompanying Interrogations, and the subsequent ceremonial.

§ 42. Consecration of the Water of Baptism.—This consecration is first mentioned by Tertullian (de Bapt. c. iv.) as brought about by invocation of God. St. Cyprinus (Epist. lxx. ad Januar.), speaks of the water "being cleansed beforehand and sanctified by the bishop (a sacerdotus)," and a Council held at Carthage under him, speaks of this sanctification being brought about (prece sacerdotis) by the bishop's prayer. St. Cyril of Jerusalem, Catech. iii., speaks of the water receiving power and being sanctified upon invocation of the Holy Spirit and of Christ. St. Basil the Great (de Sp. Sancto, cap. 27) reckons the blessing of the baptismal water among the traditional customs derived from the Apostles. From St. Augustine, however (de Bapt. lib. vi. c. 25) we learn that the "Invocations" were not regarded as essential to the validity of the sacrament. In St. Augustine first (in Joann. Evang. Tract. 118 ad fin.) we hear of the sign of the poured crosswise, was used, at least in some churches, in the consecration of the water. (Dionys. Areop. De Hier. Eccl. cap. 11; Severus Patriarch. Alexandr. De Ordine Baptismi, Bibl. Sacramentaria of St. Gregory the Great and the early Gallican Rite already quoted in § 30. This ceremony, and the baptism of an infant by immersion, are represented in the engraving below, which is from a Pontifical of the 9th century. A further ceremony, used as time went on, was Exorcism accompanied by insufflation, or breathing upon the waters. See § 31 above, and Martene, De A. E. K. tom. i. pp. 63, 64.

Consecration of Water, and Baptism.

The Interrogations and Responses.

§ 43. Renunciation and Profession.—The two portions of the Order of Baptism next to be considered, viz., Renunciation followed by Profession of Faith, are often classed together in early writers under the designation of the Interrogationes et Responsa, ἑρωτηθῆαι καὶ ἀποκρίσθαι, in reference to the formulæ of question and answer by which both one and the other were expressed. These phrases had their ultimate origin probably in an exceptional word (ἑρωτηθῆαι, put) used by St. Peter (1 Pet. iii. 21) in speaking of baptism. This was a word of technical legal use, having reference especially to forms of covenant stipulation. And this, with very slight modification only, appears as a received technical term of the baptismal ceremonial in the middle of the 3rd century. At that time there were forms of interrogation and response recognised as of "legitimate ecclesiastical rule" in Africa (Tertullian, above, § 10; Cyprian, Epist. lxx. ad Januar.), in Egypt (Dionysius apud Enseb. II. E. lib. vii. c. 9), in Cappadocia (Firmilianus apud Cyprian. Opp. Baluz. Ep. lxxv.), and at Rome (ib.).

§ 44. The ceremonial of Renunciation.—The Catechetes of St. Cyril of Jerusalem, when combined with allusions incidentally made by Dionysius, St. Basil, and others, put before us very vividly the ceremonial with which these renunciations were made. St. Cyril (Cat. Myst. i.) addressing the neophytes, says, "Ye entered in first into the outer chamber of the baptistery, and standing with your faces to the west ye heard how ye were bidden to stretch forth the hand with a gesture of repulsion (ἀποθύρα τὰς χεῖρας, Dionys. Areop. Ecc. Hier.), and ye renounced Satan, as though there present before you . . . saying, 'I renounce thee, Satan' . . . Then, with a second word thou art taught to say, 'and thy works' . . . and then again thou sayest, 'and [his] thy pomp.' And afterward thou sayest, 'and all thy worship' (λατρείαν) . . . When thou hast thus renounced Satan, breaking altogether all covenants with him, then . . . turning from the west toward the sunrise, the place of light, thou wast told to say, 'I believe in the Father, and the Son, and the Holy Ghost, and in one baptism of repentance.' From Dionysius we learn further that before making this renunciation the catechumen was divested of his upper garment, and standing barefoot, and in his chiton (shirt) only, made three separate renunciations in answer to questions put to him [this is implied, but not so distinctly stated by St. Cyril], and then being turned toward the east was bidden to look up to heaven, and with uplifted hands (τὰς χεῖρας ἀναείπωντα) to declare his allegiance unto Christ (συντάξασθαι τῷ Χριστῷ), and after so doing he again, in answer to questions put to him, thrice made confession of his faith.

§ 45. Words used in Renunciation.—These are given with more or less of detail, according to the use of various churches, by the following writers after Tertullian and Cyprian already quoted:—St. Cyril, Catech. Myst. i.; St. Basil, De Sp. S. cap. xi. and xxvii.; St. Chrysostom, Hom. xxi. ad Pop. Antiochenum; Liber Sacram. Gelasii apud Martene, De A. E. R. i. p. 65; Isidore Hispal. De Eccl. Off. lib. ii. cap. 20; and St. Ithophonius, De Corp. Bapt. cap. iii.; Ephraem Syrus, De Avrenuntiatione, &c. (Opp. ed. Voss, 2 fol. Romæ 1589, t. i. p. 199). For the Gallican usage, see Martene, as above, tom. i. p. 64. The mode of making the Renunciations, and the words employed, are very fully described in the treatise De Sacramentis, attributed to St. Ambrose, but of uncertain date and of doubtful authenticity. In the Baptism of Infants the Renunciations and the Profession of Faith were made by the Sponsor.

The Profession of Faith.

§ 46. Baptism "in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost," involves in its very nature a profession of Faith. And of the formal Declaration of Faith made in Baptism, we may see the first trace, probably, in Acts viii. 37 (si sana est lectio). Fuller details will be found in Tertullian, De Bapt. c. vi. and De Corona Mil. c. iii.; in St. Cyprian, Ep. lxx. and the letter of Firmilian published with St. Cyprian's works (Ep. lxxv.). A comparison of the many passages in later writers referring to these Interrogations and Responses, leads to the conclusion, that this profession was originally a recitation of the Creed, assented to with a "Crede" by the Catechumen, much as in our own baptismal service now. The form, however, varied according to the gradual enlargement of the original Creed, and special questions were sometimes added having reference to prevailing heresies or schisms in particular Churches. Examples will be found in the Missale Gallicanum quoted by Martene (De Ant. Ecc. Lit. t. i. p. 65) and in the Ordo iii. ibid. p. 64.

The Preparatory Unction.

§ 47. Without entering at length upon the subject of "Unction," which will be treated in a separate article, it may be well to note here that in many documents dating from after the close of the 3rd century, we find allusions to an Unction preceding Baptism, in addition to that which was given (see § 58) after Baptism. Neither Justin Martyr, nor Tertullian, nor St. Cyprian, say anything of such a preparatory Unction. But this is spoken of in the Apostolical Constitutions (lib. iii. c. 15), even in the earliest form in which they have been preserved to us, and by St. Cyril of Jerusalem (Catech. Myst. ii.). This last gives us as a fixed date the year 347 A.D. The use may of course have been even earlier than this at Jerusalem and elsewhere. But in Africa we may infer that it had not been introduced even at the close of the 4th century, as St. Augustine nowhere alludes to any such rite; and, what is more, in one passage (Sermo cxxxvii. in die Paschæ; ad. De Diversis, 83) he dwells with much emphasis on the fact (necessary to the argument he is pursuing) that the Unction of Christians follows after their baptism. Among books of doubtful date, which contain allusions to this particular rite are the "Recognitions," ascribed, though falsely, to St. Clement of Rome (lib. iii. c. lxxvii.); the Responsiones ad Orthodoxos (Quæst. 137, ed. Ben. p. 501, E. 7) falsely attributed to Justin Martyr; the Ecclesiastical Hierarchy of Dionysius, the so-called Areopagite (see § 39, above); and the Constitutions of the Egyptian Church already referred to.

The Unclothing of the Catechumens.

§ 48. A comparison of all the evidence leads to the conclusion that the catechumens entered the font in a state of absolute nakedness. See particularly St. Cyril, Hieros. Myst. Catech. ii. ad init.; St. Ambrose, Serm. xx. (Opp. t. v. p. 153, Paris, 1642); and Enarrat. in Ps. lxi. 32 (BB. t. i. p. 966); St. Chrysostom, ad Alim. Cat. i. (Migne, tom. ii. p. 268). Possibly a cineture of some kind (quo pudori consuleretur) may have been worn, as indicated in some mediæval works of art. But in any case, the question arises, considering the great numbers, of both sexes and of all ages, baptised at one time, how could the solemn celebrations at Epiphany, Easter, or Pentecost have been conducted with decency and order? The explanation of this difficulty seems to lie in the construction of the ancient bap-

tom. iii. p. 23), and others, speak of Baptism as invalid if not given with these words.

§ 52. Apparent exceptions. In the language of Holy Scripture itself authority seems, at first sight, to be found for a certain variety of expression in giving effect to the command of Our Lord. Thus, in the Book of the Acts of the Apostles we find expressions such as baptizing "in the name of Jesus Christ," Acts ii. 38; "in the name of the Lord Jesus," ibid. viii. 16; or simply "in the name of the Lord," ibid. x. 48. But in all probability these are only to be regarded as compendious expressions, equivalent in meaning to a statement that the persons in question received "Christian Baptism." And the apparent exception afforded by the language of Justin Martyr, quoted above in § 7, is probably apparent only, and not real. Addressing himself as he there does to persons unacquainted with Christian Doctrine, he somewhat amplifies the actual formula, which would otherwise have been unintelligible to a heathen, and speaks of Christians being baptized "in the name of God the Father and Lord of the Universe, and of our Saviour Jesus Christ, and of the Holy Spirit."

§ 53. Real Exceptions. On the other hand we find evidence, even as early as St. Cyprian's (Epist. lxiii.) time, that there were some who maintained that it was sufficient to administer "in the name of Jesus Christ." St. Ambrose favours this opinion, if the treatise De Spiritu Sancto (lib. i. cap. 111) be really his. In later times this same opinion was formally maintained by more than one authority. The Council of Frejus, a. 792, and Pope Nicholas I. in his Responsa ad Bulgares, all maintain more or less emphatically the validity of such a formula.

Directly contrary to this is the decree of the Synodus Londinensis, held in the year 605, by Augustine of Canterbury, Laurentius, Justus, and Mellitus. There, as we learn from a letter of Pope Zacharias to St. Boniface, it was decreed, that anyone who had been "washed" without invocation of the Trinity had not the Sacrament of Regeneration. The omission of the name of any one person of the Trinity was held to be fatal to the validity of the rite (Wilkins, Concilia, p. 29). St. Ildephous of Toledo (De Copit. Baptismi, lib. i. c. 112), circ. a. 663, uses similar language. "Quod si omnia qualibet Trinitatis personæ baptismum conferunt, omnino nihil egisse baptismi solemnitas deputetur nisi tota Trinitas veraciter invocetur." For the opinions of the Schoolmen on this question see Martene De A. E. R., lib. i. cap. i. Art. xiv. 20. And for those of various theologians at the time of the Reformation, and subsequently, see Augusti Denkwürdigkeiten, vol. vii. p. 239.

§ 54. Slight variations. The passages above quoted shew that all the earlier Church authorities, almost without exception, speak of the use of the words "In the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost," as absolutely required. Yet it is worth noting that it was an essential not a literal identity of expression that was required. The main point of faith in the three Persons of the Blessed Trinity being secured, slight verbal variations in the formula were not regarded as of vital importance. Indeed the usage of various churches was not absolutely identical. Thus while in most cases the identical words of Our Lord eis τὸ ὄνομα τοῦ

Πατρὸς καὶ τοῦ Υἱοῦ καὶ τοῦ ἁγίου Πνεύματος, were exactly reproduced (in Latin Ritual "In Nomine Patris et Filii et Spiritus Sancti"), the words eis τὸ ὄνομα, "in nomine," were in some churches omitted. The formula, as given by Tertullian (§ 11) and in the Apostolical Constitutions (lib. iii. c. 14), serves to exemplify this omission. Elsewhere additions were made to the formula, as thus; "In nomine Patris, Amen; et Filii, Amen; et Spiritus Sancti, Amen." The corresponding Greek words are the formula of the Greek Church to this day. In the Gothic missal already quoted in § 32, we find "In nomine Patris et Filii et Spiritus Sancti in remissionem peccatorum, ut habeas vitam æternam." In an ancient Gallien Missal, there is still greater variation, "Baptizo te credentem in nomine Patris et Filii et Spiritus Sancti ut habeas vitam æternam in sæcula sæculorum," or again, "Baptizo te in nomine Patris etc. . . . unum habentium substantiam, ut habeas vitam æternam et partem cum Sanctis." Again Martene (De A. E. R. tom. i. p. 31, § xix.) quotes the formula once in use at Cambray, in which the words "Ego baptizo" were altogether omitted, and the ministrant said only, "In nomine Patris et Filii et Spiritus Sancti. Amen." Hugo de St. Victor, Peter Lombard, and others, held this to constitute a valid baptism; Pope Alexander III. decided in a contrary sense. This was in the year 1175 A.D. About 400 years earlier, Zacharias (Martene § xix.), then Roman Pope, had formally to decide whether Baptism given by an ignorant Priest "In nomine Patris Filia et Spiritus Sanctus" was valid or no. St. Boniface had decided that such baptism was invalid, and was for rebaptizing a child who had so received it. But he was opposed by two other bishops (Virgilius and Sidonius) whose opinion was endorsed by the bishop of Rome on appeal made to him. "If" (so he wrote) "he who so ministered baptism did so not by way of introducing error or heresy, but only through ignorance of our Roman speech spoke with a broken utterance, we cannot consent to any repetition of the baptism so conferred."

§ 55. Eastern and Western Forms. One difference there is between the mode of employing the "Evangelical words," which is characteristic of Eastern and of Western Churches respectively. In the West, with very rare exceptions only, the personal office of the ministrant has been made somewhat prominent by the formula "I baptize thee (Ego baptizo te) in the name" etc. But in the Eastern use this is not the case, the third person being employed, βαπτίζεται ὁ δεῖνα (sometimes ὁ δοῦλος τοῦ θεοῦ, adding the name) eis τὸ ὄνομα κ. τ. λ. "Such an one" (naming him), or "The servant of God, N. or M. is baptized in the name," &c. The exceptions among Eastern Churches are very few. The Coptic Formula (Abudacni Historia Jacobitarum seu Coptorum, Oxon. 1675. J. E. Gerhardt, Execr. de ecclesia Coptica, 1666) is in the first person, "I baptize thee in the name of the Father, Amen; I baptize thee in the name of the Son, Amen; I baptize thee in the name of the Holy Ghost, Amen." And the Nestorians (Badger's Nestorians and their Rituals) of Syria, though their own older formula agreed with that of other Eastern Churches, adapted also that prescribed by the Roman Church, expressed in the first person. able exception to the usual Eastern practice is that of the Aethiopian Church, if it really were as described. Alvarez, one of the Jesuit Mis- sionaries, states in one place that the form they employ is "I baptize thee in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost," And Ludolf (who has no sympathy with these Roman authorities when he thinks them moved by prejudice) states that in the ritual books of the Ethiopians he had never been able to find any other formula. On the other hand there were others of the same Jesuit Mission who spoke of the great variety of forms which they found in use, obliging them to rebaptize. See Ludolf, Hist. Aethiop. lib. iii. cap. vi.

Subsequent Ceremonial.

§ 56. The ceremonies subsequent upon the actual baptism are commonly (as by Bellarmine, de Bapt. lib. i. cap. 27) reckoned as five in num- ber, the Kiss, the Unction of the Head (distinct from the Unction in Confirmation), the lighted Taper, the white Robe, the Tasting of Milk and Honey. To these may be added the Washing of Feet, and the Chaplet on the head, which found place in the Ritual of some early Churches.

§ 57. The Kiss. We first hear of this as a customary practice in Africa in St. Cyprian's Epist. lxxv. (ad liv.) ad Pitam. St. Augustine quotes the passage (contra duas epist. Pelag. lib. iv. cap. viii. §§ 23, 24) in a way which shews that the usage had been maintained to his own time. It is expressly prescribed (to be given by the bishop first and afterwards by the assembled faithful) in the ritual of the Egyptian Church Chrysostom (Sermo 50 de util. lej. script. tom. iii. p. 80 l.) we find proof of a similar usage.

§ 58. The Unction of the Head. No trace is to be found in the earliest records of more than one Unction after baptism, viz., that given in Confirmation by the bishop. Its introduction is attributed, by Roman tradition, to St. Sylvester, bishop of Rome, from 314 to 335 A.D. See further under UNCTION.

§ 59. The Use of Lights. We have already seen that in the 4th century certainly, and prob- ably therefore in yet earlier ages, baptism was administered after dark (generally late on Easter Eve). In this, as in so many other cases, what doctrinal or symbolical reasons took its rise in consideration of practical convenience or neces- sity, references made to the use of Lights by St. Cyril Hieros., have already been alleged (§ 22). And to the same effect, though with Nazianz. Orat. xl. "The station that thou shalt take before the great lema (of the church), after thy baptism, is a foreshadowing of the glory that shall be from heaven; and the wherewith thou shalt be received is a prelude of the hymns that thence shall sound; and the lamps that thou shalt kindle set forth in mystery that virgin souls shall go forth to meet their Lord, and bring the lamps of faith bright and burning." With these passages compare Ambrosius, de divo Imp. apud Baronium ad ann. 401; Gregor. Hist. Franc. lib. v. c. 11; St. Gregory the Great, Lib. Sacram. de sabbato sancto; Al-cunus, de Div. off. de sabbato sancto; Amala- rius, de eccl. off. lib. i. c. 18; Rabanus, de Inst. Cler. lib. ii. c. 38, 39; St. Ivo, of Chartres, de Sacramento Neophytorum; and the Ordo Bap- tismi xviii. in Martene, de Ant. Eccl. Rit. tom. i. p. 78.

§ 60. The wearing of white garments (λευκε- μουεῖν or λαμπροφορεῖν in Greek writers) by the newly baptized was of universal custom throughout the west to the Lord's Day immediately following, thence called the "Do- διακανθήσου (Gaar, Euchol. Graec. p. 373) of the Greeks. By their colour these garments were significant both of innocence and of joy (Marriott, Vestiarium Christianum, p. 182, n. 19), and by their material, which was generally linen, they were associated with the idea of deliverance from death (Philo de Sonibus, p. 597. Paris, fol. 1640, and Jerome, Epist. ad Fabol. Opp. tom. ii. p. 574. Paris, fol. 1693). The allusions to this practice in early writers are in- numerable. It will suffice here to state a few particulars as to the various vestments of which we find mention.

§ 61. The Alb. The outer garment, vestis alba, or simply "alba" (i. v., λαμπρά ἢ λευκή, or ἐμφαντίον, was probably not unlike the ministry. In some instances we hear of this being kept as a memorial of baptism, to serve as the covering for the body after death (Antonini Mart. Itinerarium "induti sindones . . . quas sibi ante sepulcrum servant.") So Constantine the Great, dying shortly after his baptism, was buried μετ' αὐτῶν τῶν ἐμφαντίων, in the garments which he had then worn (St. Germanus Patriarch. De Sanctis Synodus etc. apud Spiell. Rom. A. Mai, tom. vii. § 14). And so Probus Anicinus in his epitaph (Besio, Rom. sub. p. 47) is described as one, "Qui nova decedens munus aetherii vestimenta tulit." At other times these white garments were presented to the Church. This is implied in the story of Euphrophorus and the Deacon Maritta, told by Victor of Utica (de Persec. Vandal. lib. v. Bibl. Patr. Max. tom. viii. p. 699). For the use of the poor they were provided gratuitously, as e.g. by Constantine the Great (Sarii Vit. Sancto-um, in S. Syl- vestro, die 31 Dec., and by Gregory the Great (Epist. iv. 16; and vii. 24).

§ 62. The Subannum. This word (in Greek ὑδάβατον) as originally used meant either a large wrapper for covering the body immediately after bathing, or a towel used for drying it. The same word is occasionally used (as by Victor and Iticensis) in speaking of baptismal vestments. A letter is extant from Pope Paul I. in which he thanks King Pepin for having sent him the "Subannum" used at the baptism of the king's daughter Gishana. It is not clear whether this is identical with the "alba" or no.

§ 63. The Crismale. This was a piece of white linen tied round the head, and intended to retain the christ upon the head throughout the week " . . . tribis."

§ 64. The twisted thread. In the Armenian rite, as still celebrated, there is a curious relic of the primitive customs in regard of baptismal dress. We here read [Translation, unpublished, by the Rev. S. C. Malan) of the priest "twisting the thread." And the Catholicos (bishop) Joseph, in his Russian translation of this order of baptism, enlarges this rubric as follows: "While the choir sings, the priest takes two threads, one white and the other red, in remembrance of the water and the blood that flowed from the side of the Saviour of the world. He lists them up under the holy cross, and lays them on it last upon the catechumen or child to be baptized." There can be little doubt that this is a last trace of former white baptismal robes with red embroidery. This hypothesis is confirmed by some references in ancient authors. A MS. at Turin, of unknown authorship and date [from internal evidence it appears to the writer to be of the 11th century], thus describes the "chrismale." "Inluitur deinde chrisimali neophytus, scilicet alba veste quae instar cappae lineae caputium habet, quo caput quasi quadam mitra operitur, et filo rubeo supersursum." Durandus too (Rationale Div. Off. lib. vi. c. 82), mentions a custom still existing in his time (13th century) in Narbonne, that the white garment of the baptized had sewn upon it a red band like a 'corona.' And the same combination of colours was still preserved in the usage of the Ethiopic Church two centuries ago (Ludolf, Hist. Aethiop. lib. iii. c. 6), and may be traced back in Africa to the 5th century of our era. Victor of Utica (de Pers. Vand. lib. ii.) speaks of the white robe as "purpura sanguinis Christi decoratum."

§ 65. The Chaplet (corona or στέφανος). The earliest certain reference to this as worn by Neophytes is in the ritual of Alexandria described by Patriarch Severus in the 7th century. "Then (i. e. after baptism and unction) he takes the baptized to the altar, and gives them the sacrament of the Eucharist, and the priest crowns them with garland." (Hist. Mar. Patr. Paris 1654, tom. vi. p. 25). This usage was still maintained at Alexandria 200 years ago. Vansleb, describing their baptismal ritual, writes as follows. The priest, "trempe dans l'eau du baptême la ceinture et la ceinture de l'enfant qui a été baptisé, et lui met cette couronne sur la tête, et il lui ceint les reins de cette ceinture," &c. (Hist. de l'Eglise d'Alexandrie, Paris 1877, 12). Allusions to a similar rite, on very slight grounds however of what is probably merely metaphorical language, have been imagined in the Gallican Missal (baptizati et in Christo coronati), in St. Chrysostom, Catech. I. ad Illuminandos (ὅταν διάδημα [not a chaplet, but a royal crown], ἀναδύνηθε τῶν ἡλιακῶν ἀκτίων φαειρότερας ἔχον παντάχως ἐκπρόδους λαμπρόνας), and Catech. II. τὸν στέφανον τῆς δικαιοσύνης, a quotation from Scripture.) A passage of Gregory Nazianz. (Oratio xxiii. ad inl.), quoted by Augusti for this usage, has certainly nothing whatever to do with baptism, as an examination of the entire context will conclusively shew. The "crowns" there spoken of are the words of public encomium wherewith St. Gregory welcomes Heron, a confessor of the faith, comparing him to one who has conquered in the arena.

§ 66. Tasting of milk and honey. This symbolical usage, like many others, originated in a prevailing metaphor. "Quid ergo lac et mel?" asks Barnabas. "Quia nimirum infans lacte et melle vivificatur, sic et nos fide promissionis et verbo nutrimur." Tertullian in more than one passage (see § 12 above, and adv. Marc. lib. i. c. 14); Clement of Alexandria (Pædag. lib. i. cap. vi.); the Third Council of Carthage, can. 24; the Constitutions of the Egyptian Church, § 51; St. Jerome (adv. Lucifer. Opp. tom. ii. p. 180, and in Essaiam. cap. iv.); and the Leonine Sacramentary (Muratori, Liturg. Rom. Vet. tom. i.), all allude to the tasting of mingled milk and honey after baptism. The rite is again mentioned by Macarius Bishop of Memphis, circ. a. 756, and was still preserved both in Alexandria and in the Ethiopic Church two hundred years ago (Vansleb and Ludolf, referred to above).

§ 67. Peditivium. The washing of feet. A peculiar custom prevailed in the early Gallican ritual, of a symbolical washing of the feet of the newly baptized, having reference to the action of our Lord recorded in the Gospel of St. John (xiii. 1-16). The so-called Gothic missal, and another early Gallican missal (Martene, De A. E. R. tom. i. pp. 63, 64), both contain references to this as a recognized part of the baptismal ritual. In the first, see above § 34, immediately after the application of the chrism, we read, "Dum pedes ejus lavas, dicis, 'Ego tibi lavo pedes. Sicut Dominus noster Jesus Christus fecit discipulis suis, tu facias hospitibus et peregrinis ut habeas vitam aeternam.'" (then follows the impositio vestimenti). In the second of the two documents, a collect is given "ad pedes lavandos," which follows, as before, "ad pedes lavandos," which follows, as before, "Infusio Chrismæ," immediately upon the treading Jesus Christus apostellis suis pedes lavit: Ego tibi pedes lavo, ut et tu facias hospitibus et peregrinis, qui ad te venerint. Hoc si feceris habebis vitam aeternam in saecula saeculorum. Amen." In yet a third Gallican sacramentary (Mabillon, Mus. Roll. tom. i. and Martene, De A. E. R. tom. i. p. 64) the same rite is noticed, but is placed after the clothing with the "Vestis Candida," instead of immediately before as in the two earlier MSS.; and there is a slight variation in the terms of the collect prescribed. From two treatises of doubtful authenticity attributed to St. Ambrose (De Sacram. lib. iii. c. 1 and De Myster. c. 6), it has been inferred that the rite was in use at Milan. In the first of the two passages the writer, whoever he was, mentions that the rite in question was not of Roman usage. No traces of it are now to be found in the Ambrosian ritual. Allusions to a similar rite after baptism, occurring in the works of St. Augustine, are not, as might be thought, a proof of a similar usage in the African Church. They occur in a sermon (De tempore 160) which on other grounds had been judged not to be St. Augustine's, but to have been composed by Caesarius Archbishop of Arles (†540). He quotes the words of a Gallican missal still extant (Martene, De A. E. R. p. 64): "Secundum quod ipsis in baptismo dictum est, Hospitium pedes lavent," &c. The 48th canon of the Council of Illiberis, forbidding the practice (neque pedes eorum [qui baptizantur] lavandi sunt a sacerdotibus vel clericis), marks probably a previous attempt to introduce the observance in some parts of Spain, in imitation of the usage elsewhere existing. No traces of the rite are now anywhere to be found in connection with the administration of baptism. But a ceremonial, similar in its origin in which the

IV. At what times Baptism was administered.

§ 68. In the Apostolic Age no special times were appointed for the administration of baptism, this being determined by the varying circumstances consequent, in the nature of things, on the first establishment of the faith. The first administration of the baptism, properly so called, was on the first Christian Pentecost (Acts ii.), when some 3000 persons gladly receiving the words of Peter were at once baptized on the same day (ver. 41). The Ethiopian eunuch (Acts viii.), when Philip, taking occasion from the prophecy of Isaiah (cap. liii.), had taught him the glad tidings of Jesus, was straightway baptized in water by the way side. The jailor at Philippi (Acts xvi.), when the word of the Lord had been spoken unto him (ver. 32) by Paul and Silas, was baptized with all his household while it was night (ver. 33 compared with ver. 25). And neither in Scripture nor in any of the earlier Christian writers before Tertullian, is any special season to be found of the settling apart of any special season as more suited than others for the administration. This greater liberty of the Apostolic times is often alluded to by early fathers, when dissuading men from the indefinite deferring of baptism under pretext of observing the fixed times appointed by the Church for its more solemn administration.

§ 69. Special seasons spoken of by Tertullian. The first mention of any particular season as being set apart for solemn administration of baptism, is found in Tertullian (de Bapt. c. xix.) writing about the close of the 2nd century. "Pascha" (i. e. Easter), he says, "offers a more solemn season for baptism, for then was fulfilled the Passion of the Lord into which we are baptized. . . . And afterward Pentecost" (i. e. the whole period from Easter to the day of Pentecost) "is a lengthened time for the preparation of the waters (ordinandis aquis). Therein was the Resurrection of the Lord celebrated among the disciples, and the grace of the Holy Spirit bestowed, and the hope of the advent of the Lord suggested." But in mentioning these as times when baptism was administered with more than usual solemnity, he is careful to add, that "every day is the Lord's. . . . no hour, no time, unsuitable for baptism; the solemnity may be less, but in the grace given there is no diversity." Other references to these two periods, or one of them, as specially observed for the solemn administration of baptism, will be found in St. Jerome, St. Gregory Nazianz., St. Chrysostom, and other writers both in East and West.

§ 70. Baptism at Epiphany. Beside the two seasons of Easter and Pentecost, there were not a few churches in which the Epiphany festival was observed in the same way. Towards the close of the 4th century, Siricius Bishop of Rome stated (Epist. ad Himerium, Labbe, Concil. t. ii. p. 1018), that all Churches agreed with that of Rome in an exclusive observance of Easter and Pentecost. But in this he was mistaken. Many Eastern Churches, and not a few in the West, which by origin or by subsequent intercourse came under Eastern influence, observed Epiphany (traditionally the time of our Lord's baptism in Jordan) as a season for solemn administration of baptism. We find evidences of this in the churches of Cappadocia (St. Greg. Nazianz. Orat. xl. μένω τὰ φάρα), at Antioch, but before St. Chrysostom's time (this by inference from a comparison of St. Chrysostom's Catechesis I. ad Illuminandos; Migne, t. ii. p. 268; De Baptismo Christi, ibid., p. 433, seqq.; and Hom. III. in Ephes. i. ibid. t. xi. p. 25); at Jerusalem (Typicun S. Sabae, quoted by Valesius on Theodoret. Hist. Eccl. lib. ii. c. 27); and the Himerarium, Antonini Martyris; in Africa (Victor Uticensis, De Persec. Vandil. lib. ii. iniquabat jam futurus dies . . . Kalendaram Februarium"); in Spain and Sicily (Siricius ad Himerium, already referred to, and Leo, ad Episcopos Siciliae, Labbe, Concil. t. iii. p. 1297); in Gaul (see Martene, de A. E. R. lib. i. cap. i. p. 2); in Ireland (St. Patrick . . . Synodi, Canonos, &c., ed. T. P. Villanova, Dublini 1835; Wilkins, Concilia, p. 26, can. xiv). These canons are of late date in their present form, but preserve some genuine traditions).

§ 71. Other days were observed in some churches. Thus we hear of "Natalitia Christi," or Christmas, in Spain and in Gaul (see Martene, as above), and of Festivals of Apostles and Martyrs, in Spain (Siricius ad Himerium), in Campania, Samnium, and Picenum (Leo M. Epist. 136), and of the Festival of St. John Baptist (Gregor. Turon. Hist. Franc. cap. 9). All days were allowable for the more private administration in cases of pressing necessity from sickness or other causes.

§ 72. Roman usage, however, was much more strict in this particular than that of other Western Churches. And with the zeal for ritual uniformity which has ever been characteristic of that Church (Gregory the Great a notable exception), her bishops, and a series of councils more or less under Roman influence, made repeated efforts to confine the solemn administration to the two seasons of Easter and Pentecost.

§ 73. Papal decrees to this effect, directed to churches of the Roman obedienc, are those of Siricius (385-398), in his epistole (Labbe, Concil. ii. p. 1018) to Himerius, Bishop of Tarraco, in Spain; of Leo the Great (440-461), writing to the bishops of Sicily (Labbe, Concil. iii. p. 1297); of Gelasius (492-496), to the bishops of Lucania; Gregory II. (715-731) to the clergy and people of Thuringia, and Nicolas I. in his responsa ad Bulgares, cap. 69. It is curious to find the same Roman tradition seeking to assert itself in England many centuries later, in the face of a superstitious belief on the part of some that it was perilous to have children baptised at those times. So we learn from the language of Otto, Cardinal Legate at the Council of London, a 1237 ("Nemulli in Anglia periculum suspicantur si praefatis diebus pueri baptizentur." Wilkins, Concil. p. 650).

§ 74. Councils. Identical in effect with the decrees last quoted are the canons of a series of provincial councils, extending from the 6th to the 13th century. The earliest of these is the Council of Gerunda, in Hispania Tarraconensis, a. 517. With this agree the Councils of Autisiodorum (Auxerre), a. 578; of Moguntia (Mayence), a. 813, can. 4, and again, a. 847, can. 3; of Paris (Parisiense vi. a. 829, part 1, can. 7); of Meaux (Meldense, a. 845); of Worms (Worma-tiense, a. 868, can. 1); of Tribur, or Teuver, near Mueence (Triburiense, a. 895, can. 12); of Rouen (Rothomagensis, a. 1372, can. 23); of Winchester (Wintoniense, a. 1074, can. 7); of London (Londinense, a. 1237).

§ 75. *Inferal and other authorities were not wanting from time to time to enforce a practice which popes and provincial councils were thus continually enacting. The capitularies of Charlemagne, a. 804, direct "ut nullus baptizare presumat nisi in Pascha et Pentecosten, excepto lafirmo." To the same effect are the capitularia collected by Benedictus Levita (lib. 1, n. 171). "Ut baptismus non fiat nisi statutis temporibus id est Pascha et Pentecosten, nisi infirmitas intercesserit." Aad lib. ii. n. 171: "Ut nullus baptizare presumat nisi per duo tempora, id est vigilia Paschae et vigilia Pentecostes, praeter mortis periculum." Bishops sometimes made this observance matter of special injunction to the clergy at their ordination (St. Hildephonsus De Cogn. Baptismi, lib. i. c. 108; Rodulf Archiepis. Bituricensis Capitular. n. 20; Ratherii Veronensis Episcopi Synodica, apud Martene, Spicilegium, tom. ii.), or desired parish priests to enforce this duty upon their people from the pulpit (Otto, Cardinalis, apud Wilkins, Concordia, p. 650).*

§ 76. Later usage.—The limitation of baptism to one or two special periods in the year was of advantage in the first four centuries, or thereabouts, when the baptism of adults, requiring previous instruction and preparation, was still of prevailing usage. But this limitation no longer served any important end, when under the changed circumstances of the church the baptism of adults was rare and exceptional. And accordingly these restrictions have long ceased to be observed in churches both of the East and of the West.

Places of administering Baptism.

§ 77. *Originally no limitation of place was observed. Water by the roadside (Acts viii. 36-38), private houses (Acts ix. 18), or a prison (Acts xvi. 29, 30), were all made use of for the purpose. And in sub-apostolic times we find proof of the same freedom from all limitation. See Justin Martyr, quoted above, § 7; Clementis Recog. lib. iv. c. 32, and lib. vi. c. 15; Tertullian de Bapt. c. 4. To the same effect are the traditional stories, in early Hagiologies, of baptisms performed in private houses, in prisons, in the public road. See the lives of St. Laurentius (Serii Vit. Sanct. die 23 Julii), of St. Apollinaris (ibid. die 10 August), and of the Deacon Cyriacus (ibid. die 16 Jan.). It is not till the close of the 3rd century that we meet with any mention of baptisteries properly so called, and under the name "baptisterium" (See the story of St. Cyriacus apud Surius, die 16 Jan.). [BAPTISTERY.]*

Baptism, by whom administered.

§ 78. *In the first five centuries, or thereabouts, the rule and the practice of the Church was, that the solemn celebration of baptism, whether at Epiphany, Easter, or Pentecost, should be presided over by the bishop. The earliest authorities bearing upon this subject are, St. Ignatius, ad Smyrn. cap. 8; Tertullian de Bapt. c. 17; Constit. Apost. lib. iii. cap. xi. (bishops and presbyters to baptize, deacons being in attendance upon them); St. Gregor. Nyssen. Orat. xl. (Paris, Morell, fol. 1630, tom. i. p. 656) where* baptism by bishops and presbyters is spoken of Council of Illiberis, a. 313, can. 77, decreeing that if a deacon baptise any one, without either bishop or presbyter, the sacrament must be "completed" afterwards by the benediction of the bishop; St. Jerome, adv. Lucifer. c. 4 (saying that neither Presbyter nor deacon have the right of baptising without direction from the bishop, though even laymen are frequently allowed to baptise if necessity so require). In the 5th and 6th centuries we find at one time (Gelasii Papae Epist. ad univ. episc. and Isidor. Hispal. Off. Eccl. lib. ii. c. 24), a declaration that bishops and presbyters are the only proper administrators (cases of necessity excepted); at another (Concil. Hispal. ii. a. 619, can. 7), the vindication of the supreme right of bishops in this matter, in depreciation of that of presbyters. Of the practice of the Eastern Churches at this time we find an indication in a letter written by the people of Edessa at the time of the Council of Chalcedon, a. 451, and inserted among its Acta. In it they beg that Abas, their bishop, will return to them as soon as possible, on account of the approaching Easter Festival, his presence being required for the instruction of the catechumens, and for those who are found worthy to receive holy baptism. More remarkable is a somewhat similar letter (quoted by Martene De A. E. R. tom. i. p. 7), in which certain of the clergy in Italy write to Constantine, begging that the emperor will allow Dacius, bishop of Milan, to return to his diocese after an absence of fifteen or sixteen years, giving as a reason that almost all the bishops customarily ordained by the Bishop of Milan were now dead, and an immense multitude of people died without baptism (quia cum pene omnes episcopi, quos ordinare solet, . . . mortui sint, immensa populi multitudo sine baptismo moritur). It is worthy of note in connection with this that from the time of St. Ambrose to that of Cardinal Borromeo, if not later, the traditions of the Church of Milan have maintained in a variety of ways the special office of the bishop in the administration of baptism. Paulinus, writing (circ. 420) the life of St. Ambrose, says that St. Ambrose had with his own hands baptised more persons than five succeeding bishops. And in the Ceremoniale Ambrosianum, published by Cardinal Borromeo (Martene, p. 7), it is stated that the archbishop administered baptism solemnly twice in the year, at Easter and at Pentecost, and also at other times throughout the year in the event of any adults, converted from unbelief, being presented for baptism.

§ 79. *In later centuries. The provision last mentioned will of itself serve to suggest why it was that as time went on the personal action of the bishop, as the recognised administrator of baptism, became gradually less and less; while that of presbyters, deacons, and even of clergy of the minor orders, was continually increasing. From the time when the baptism of adults became the exception rather than the prevailing rule, and when, from the wider extent of the Church, the number of the children brought to baptism was continually increasing, the older practice of the Church gradually changed. It was revived at a later time by missionary bishops, such as our own countryman St. Boniface in Germany, or St. Otto of Bamberg in Pomerania (Hist. S. Bonifacii and Hist. S. Ottonis, lib. ii.*

c. 19, quoted by Martene De Ant. Eccl. Rit. lib. i. cap. i. art. iii.). But with exceptions such as these last, exceptions which prove the rule, the tendency in most Churches, from about the close of the 5th century, was to make the administration of baptism of less prominent importance; and the part taken by the bishop himself became gradually less and less. In the Gregorian Sacramentary, not the bishop, but the presbyters, are spoken of as being in a special sense the ministers of baptism (ministri baptismi). And even at the more solemn ceremonies of the Easter Baptism at Rome and elsewhere, the bishop merely inaugurated the ceremony by baptising a few himself, leaving the rest to presbyters, to deacons, or if need were to acolytes. (Ordo Romanus apud Mabillon Mus. Ital. t. ii., and Martene De A. E. R. t. i. p. 8, col. 2.)

§ 80. Lay Baptism. Tertullian (de bapt. cap. 17) and St. Jerome (adv. Lucif. cap. 4; see above, § 78) say, in effect, that for a layman to baptise is not only contrary to essential Christian principles, but also contrary to ecclesiastical order. And though practically has been the judgment of the Church in all later times, forbidding lay baptism as a rule, but recognising it in cases of necessity. See as to this the Council of Illiberis, a. 313, lay baptism became very common. See, as illus- trating English usage in this matter, the Council of Durham (between the years 1217 and 1222; in Wilkins, Concil. p. 575) and the Council of Oxford, a. 1222 (ibid. p. 594).

§ 81. Baptism by Women. The question whether women may lawfully baptise is first adverted to by Tertullian. Nothing can well be stronger than his language, diluted though it be by some later writers into the assertion that women may not "publicly baptise in the church." After saying (de bapt. cap. 17) that in cases of per- ous necessity laymen should not hesitate to give baptism, he goes on to say that women, though they took upon themselves to teach, would scarcely, with all their presumption, attempt to create a right to administer baptism, unless indeed some strange beast arose like to one that formerly had been. That former one sought to do away with baptism; some successor might perhaps seek to confer baptism herself. Compare De Virgin. veland. cap. 9, and De Prescript. cap. 41. The Apostolical Constitutions, lib. iii. cap. 9; Epiphanius, Haeres. 70; and the Fourth Council of Carthage, a. 398, canon 20 ("Malier, quamvis docta et sancta, viros in con- ratu docere, vel aliquos baptizare, non praesumit"), are all to the same effect. Isidore of Hispala is referred to (by Augusti, Denke. p. 115) as saying that persons baptised by women are not to be re-baptised. And Joannes Moschus (Pratum Spirituale, cap. 3) says that it is contrary to the canons for women to baptise, yet makes an ex- ception for cases of the last extremity. Even as late as the 12th century we find Hugo de S. Victore speaks of it as still with some a disputed question whether baptism by women was valid.

§ 82. Baptism by Heretics. The question of the validity or otherwise of baptism by heretics is one which was forced on the attention of the Church in the 3rd century by the Donatist Schism. The dissension thence arising (between St. Cyprian (supported by all the African bishops and by several of the Eastern Churches) and Stephen

Bishop of Rome, is on many grounds of great importance to early Church history. But this lies beyond the scope of the present article. The final settlement of the question was based upon the principle that the unworthiness of the ministrant cannot mar the act of God, or as was said, that the wickedness of the sower affects not the vitality of the seed. Hence the question of re-baptising or otherwise was for the most part determined simply by the question whether the essential elements of baptism were wanting or no, viz.: water and the words prescribed by our Lord. If these were employed the baptism was regarded as valid, though irregular, and the person so baptised was admitted into communion, if on other grounds found worthy, after imposition of the hands of the bishop.

§ 83. Baptism by Pagans and Jews, and excom- municate persons, has been held to fall under the same rule as that last stated. But opinions have not been altogether at one upon this point. See lib. i. cap. 1, art. iii.

§ 84. Baptism administered in sport. Perhaps the strongest illustration of the feeling of anti- quity in this matter is afforded by the story told by Socrates (Hist. Eccl. lib. ii. c. 16) and by Rufinus (Hist. Eccl. lib. i. c. 14). When Athanasius was a boy, so the story is told, he was playing with some young companions on the shore at Alexandria. The bishop, Alexander by name, happened to be looking on from a distance as they played, and observed, to his astonishment, that they were imitating the ceremonial of baptism, Athanasius acting as "boy-bishop," to anticipate a phrase of well-known Medieval usage. "On diligent inquiry," we translate now the words of Rufinus, "both from those who were said to have been baptised, as to what they had been asked and what they had replied (the ερωτησεις and the αποκρισεις, above, § 43), and from him also who had put the baptismal questions, when the bishop found that all things had been duly performed according to the ob- servances of religion, he conferred with the ob- isin council, and is said to have decided to this effect, that, as water had been poured upon these persons after the interrogations and responses had been duly made, their baptism ought not to be repeated, but only be made complete by the customary sacerdotal acts (adimplere ea quae a sacerdotibus mos est). Doubts have been raised as to whether such an occurrence ever actually took place; but whether the story be true or no it serves equally to illustrate the feeling of the Church at the time the story was first told.

§ 85. Baptism self-administered. To make this subject complete, it may perhaps be added that on one occasion the question arose whether baptism self-administered was valid. The question was decided in the negative by Pope Innocent III. on the ground that there is an essential distinction of person between the baptiser and the baptised. The Council of Nismes (a. 1283) embodied this decision in one of their canons: "Si quis se ipsum baptizaverit talem non esse baptismatum ecclesiae iudicabit."

With what matter Baptism was administered.

§ 86. Of water as the material element. Water from natural associations has ever been associated with ideas of life in the minds of most cultivated nations. And to Heathens (Tertullian, de bapt. c. 5), as well as to Jews, it was associated not in thought only, but in actual ceremonial usage, with ideas of religious purification. This was the material element employed in the Baptism of our Lord, this that was united in mention by Him with the Name of the Spirit, when speaking (John iii.) of the gift of a new spiritual birth. And this accordingly from the first Christian Pentecost (Acts ii.) to this time, has been regarded in all parts of Christendom and at all times as determined by divine appointment to be the material element in the administration of Baptism. The few exceptions to this statement which require notice are the following.

§ 87. Baptism by fire. Philastrinus of Brescia (De Haeres. n. viii. apud Biblioth. Patr. Galland. tom. vii. p. 489), and St. Augustine quoting him as an authority (De Haeres. cap. lix. BB. tom. viii. p. 20 s. 7), speak of Seleucus and Hermas as founders of a Sect of which one characteristic was their maintaining the only true baptism to be "Spiritu et igni." And in an anonymous Treatise on Heretical Baptism we read of some who, by what means is not known, produced an appearance of fire on the baptismal water, in order to complete what they thought necessary for Christian Baptism. And so again Irenaeus and Clement of Alexandria speak of certain heretics (Carpocratians and Heraclians) who branded a mark upon the ears of their disciples, this being in their eyes the true sealing (σφραγισμῶ) with the Holy Ghost.

§ 88. Baptizing with wine and the like. The authority of a bishop of Rome, Siricius (a. 384 to 389), or according to others of Stephanus II. or III., has been claimed for the assertion, that Baptism in wine is valid though not to be allowed except in cases of the last necessity. The facts concerning this, much disputed by Roman Ritualists, may be determined by comparison of the following authorities: Antoninus Augustinus de emendatione Gratiani, p. 200. Baluzius, Notae in Anton. August. p. 431. Martene de Ant. Ecc. Rit. lib. i. cap. l. Art. xiv. Bertini de Sacrament. Vincl. 1774, p. 507. Harduini Dissert. de baptismo in vino. Others mingled wine with water and were condemned (Execrta Egberti, i. 750 in Wilkins, Concil. p. 104) for so doing.

§ 89. Baptism with sand. In one case, for which Joannes Moschus is the earliest authority, the question arose not as a mere abstract disputation, but in reference to an actual matter of fact, whether baptism in sand be legitimate or no. In the reign of Marcus Aurelius Antoninus a certain Jew was travelling in company with some Christians through a dry and desert country, when he was seized with grievous illness; and being apparently at the point of death begged his companions to baptize him. They replied that there was neither priest nor water at hand, and that without these baptism could not be had. "But being earnestly adjured not to refuse him, they divested the man, and sprinkled him three times with sand instead of water, saying that they baptized him in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost." Upon this (so the story proceeds) his strength was miraculously restored, and on their return, Dionysius, then Bishop of Alexandria, being consulted on the subject, decided "Baptisatum esse Judaeum si modo aqua denuo perfunderetur," in other words that the only thing wanting to his Baptism was the element of water, with which he was to be "perfusus." Authorities for this will be found in Joannes Moschus, Praxum Spirituale, cap. 176 (De la Bigne, Biblioth. Patr. tom. ii. pp. 1132, 1133); in Nicophorus (Hist. Ecc. lib. iii. c. 37); and the story is told in detail by the Magdeburg Centuriators, who are quoted by Bingham (Antiq. book xi. c. 2, § 5).

§ 90. Baptism with milk. Benedictus Abbas Petroburgensis (in Gestis Henrici II. ad ann. 1171, edit. Hearne tom. i. p. 38) states that a custom prevailed in the early Irish Church of baptizing the children of the rich in milk. Occasional references are found elsewhere to such a practice. See Michelet, Histoire de France, vol. i. p. 253. Note.

§ 91. Figurative expressions. Phrases such as "the baptism of blood," meaning martyrdom; "Baptism with fire," meaning either martyrdom (as in Euseb. H. E. lib. vi. c. 4) or gifts of the Holy Spirit (as St. Cyril of Jerusalem, in three different passages); the Baptism of Tears, meaning Repentance (as in Isidore of Seville and others), are merely metaphorical expressions, bearing indeed upon primitive Ritual to which this article is limited.

Modes of administering Baptism (by Immersion, Ablusion, Asperision).

§ 92. Immersion. Passages already quoted in this article will have sufficed to show that the ordinary mode of Baptism in primitive times, at least in the case of adults, was that the Catechumen should descend into a Font of water (whether natural or artificial), and while standing therein dip the head thrice under the water. See §§ 11, 18, 49.

§ 93. Affusion. Yet there are not wanting indications both in literature and in art of another usage, viz., that of the bishop or other ministrant pouring water out of the hand, or from some small vessel, on the head of the baptized. Thus we meet more than once in Latin writers with the expression "perfusus" applied to the Catechumen (see §§ 28 and 89; and aqua infusa § 84). And it is to be noted that the word βαπτισμῶ, which is used in Greek Ritual in speaking of the act of the ministrant, might be used with perfect propriety of such a pouring of water upon the head and body as that now in question. One common mode of bathing among the ancients was the pouring of water from vessels over the body, as we may see in ancient some small vessel, upon the head of our Lord.

And there is a similar representation, varying,
however, in some of its details, in the Church of
S. Maria in Cosmedin, also at Ravenna (Ciampini Vet. Mon. i. Tab. xliii.), the Mosiacs of which are said to date from the year 553 A.D.
And it would seem probable on a review of all the evidence, that in primitive times, while adult Baptism was still of prevailing usage, the two modes hitherto described were combined. The dipping of the head under water took place, in some churches certainly, so we find clearly stated, during the final Interrogations. And where this was the case we may infer that the "Affusio" or "Perfusio," the pouring on of water by the Ministrant, took place during the pronunciation of the formula. This hypothesis of a double use explains some difficulties in ancient authors, more particularly in the Tre- nise De Sacramentis attributed to St. Ambrose, and in the Egyptian Ritual already referred to.
And its probability is confirmed by the fact that in the Armenian Order of Baptism even to this day the double usage of Immersion and Affusion is maintained. There the actual administration is described as follows: The priest asks the child's name, and on hearing it, lets the child down into the water, saying, "This N. servant of God, who is come from the state of childhood (or from the state of a Catechumen) to Baptism, is baptized in the Name of the Father and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost." While saying this the priest buries the child, (or Catechu-men) three times in the water, as a figure of Christ's three days' burial. Then taking the child out of the water he thrice pours a handful of water on his head, saying, "As many of you as have been baptized into Christ have put on Christ. Hallelujah. As many of you as have been enlightened by the Father, the Holy Spirit is put into you. Hallelujah." (From an unpublished translation by the Rev. S. C. Malan.)

§ 94. Affusion and Aspersio in clinic Baptism.
In one case of very common occurrence in early times, viz., that of the Baptism of the sick under fear of approaching death, the administration was necessarily by Affusion or by Aspersio. And in the middle of the third century we find the question formally raised, by one of the African bishops, whether persons so baptized (clinic), or as they were also called gratularii, baptized on a sick-bed) could be regarded as "legitimi Christiani," could be supposed, in other words, to have received baptism in a legitimate and regular manner. The manner in which Cyprian replies to the enquiry (Cypriani Epist. lxxvi. al. lxx.
ad Magnun) shows that no formal decision had,
to his knowledge, ever been given previously on the question. He judges of the question submitted to him to the best of his own ability (quantum concepit mediocritas nostra), and expresses an opinion that the mode in which the water was applied was a matter of minor importance, provided that Faith was not wanting on the part both of Ministrant and Recipient.

In the sixth century Walafrid Strabo speaks of Baptism by Affusion, "desuper fundendo," as exceptional only (De lib. Eccl. cap. 26). Not till the 13th century (Augusti Denkwürdig. cap. ix. § 11) do we find proof that Affusion or Aspersio had become the rule of the Western Church.
The older practice is maintained in the East to this day.

Age at which Baptism was conferred. (Infant and Adult Baptism.)

§ 95. Infant Baptism. St. Irenaeus. Direct evidence of the practice of Infant Baptism first occurs in St. Irenaeus, who was born, probably, in the year 97 A. D., and who had sat at the feet of Polycarp, the disciple of St. John. In his book against Heresies (lib. ii. cap. 39 al. 22) he says that our Lord came (into the world) in order that through Himself He might save all men, infants, and little ones, and children and youths
and elders, even all who through Him are born again into God. No unprejudiced interpreter acquainted with the forms of speech habitually employed by Irenaeus himself, and by the early fathers generally, will doubt that when Irenaeus thus speaks of infants and little ones, as well as others of more mature age, being "born again unto God," he refers to the fact of their being baptized. (For Irenaeus' own usage see particularly ado. Haer. lib. i. c. 18 eis ἑκάστην τῶν βαπτισματων τῆς εἰς θεὸν ἀναγεννησεως, and cap.
xix., where authority to baptize is described as "potestas regenerationis in Deum.")

§ 96. Tertullian was of full age before the death of Irenaeus, and in knowledge of antiquity, and of the usages of the Church, was second to none then living. And he gives absolutely conclusive proof that Baptism of Infants was a common practice of the Church in his own time, towards the close of the second century. With characteristic freedom he expresses his own opinion that the practice might wisely be altered, stating reasons for his opinion (de Bapt.
c. 18). But he nowhere says one word to imply that the practice of his own contemporaries was an innovation upon the earlier usage of the Church.

§ 97. Origen. We have testimony no less decisive from Origen as to what was the traditionary practice of the more Eastern Churches.
He was born probably in the year 186 A. D. and was a disciple of Clemeus Alex. and an inheritor of his great learning. His language in several passages shows not only that Infant Baptism was a recognised practice of the Church in his own day, but that in his belief (and no man knew more of antiquity) had been equally so from the time of the Apostles. See his Hom. viii. on Leviticus (Oberthur t. vi. p. 137) and Hom. xiv.
on St. Luke (t. xiii. p. 335), where he argues that infants must have original sin, "else why are they baptized?"—and his comment in Ep.
ad Rom. lib. v. c. vi. (ecclesia ab apostolis traditionem accepit etiam parvulis baptismum dare).

§ 98. Other early evidence, but indirect and inferential only, has by some been cited (Bingham C. A. book xi. ch. iv. §§ vi. vii.) from Clement of Rome, and from Justin Martyr. More conclusive than these is an expression of Clemens Alex. in the second century, when (Pædag. lib. iii. c. 11) he speaks of τὰν ἐξ ὕδατων ἀνακαλύψων παιδίων, the children that are drawn up from out of the water, in a context which shows clearly that it is of Baptism that he speaks.

§ 99. Jewish Proselyte Baptism.—In order to complete the subject of the evidence for Infant Baptism, it may be well to refer to the arguments based on the analogy of Christian Baptism both to the Proselyte Baptism of the Jews, which was given to infants as well as to adults, and to the rite of circumcision, administered on the 8th day after birth, and only in exceptional cases to adults. For the first of these, the Baptism of Proselytes, the argument from analogy is exceedingly strong, on the assumption that the practice in question really existed before the Apostolic age. Lightfoot (on Matt. iii. and John iii.) and many other Hebraists assume the pre-existence of the Jewish rite without doubt. To the present writer there appear to be the strongest grounds for this opinion. But among Continental scholars at the present time the prevailing opinion appears to be opposed to that of Lightfoot. A summary of the arguments on either side, and full references to the best authorities, will be found in Carpovizius Annotations in T. Goodrici Mosca et Avronem. Francofurti, 4, 1748. See particularly the Notes on Lib. i. cap. iii. § vii. For additional authorities see the Bibliographia Antiquaria of T. A. Fabricius, p. 385.

§ 100. The Analogy of Circumcision (administered as this was in infancy) with Christian Baptism, is recognised both in Scripture (Col. 2. ii.) and in early Christian writers, as Justin Martyr, Dial. cum Tryph. Jud. : in Iosepho udr. Haer. lib. iv. c. xxx. (this, however, open to dispute). In St. Cyprian's time so close was this analogy considered by some as to cause doubt whether in view of "eighth day circumcision" any day earlier than the eighth were allowable for Christian Baptism (Cyprian Epist. lix.). St. Gregory Nazianz. expressly appeals to this as analogous to the practice of Infant Baptism (Orat. xl. de Bap. p. 658).

§ 101. Adult Baptism. The general conclusion, resulting from an impartial investigation of all the evidence now available, appears to the present writer to be, that in the first four centuries of Christian History adult baptism was, from a variety of concurrent causes, the prevailing practice. Yet that during the same period infants were always baptised without delay if in apparent danger of death. But in the absence of such danger their baptism was deferred to the time of solemn baptism held at Epiphany, Easter, or Pentecost. And it is probable that in many cases Christian parents may have shared, and have acted on, the opinion expressed by Tertullian in the second century, and by Gregory Nazianz. in the fourth, and thought it well to defer the baptism of children, cases of grave sickness excepted, till they were able to make answer on their own behalf to the interrogations of the baptismal rite (see Gregor. Naz., Orat. xl. He urges the baptism of infants in case of danger, and yet shortly after advises the deferring their baptism in other cases till they were three years old). In the year 450 or thereabouts, we find evidence that in Syria, if not elsewhere, the baptism of infants was regarded as not allowable only but matter of absolute duty. (St. Isaac the Great in Assemani i. lib. Oriental. t. i. 221. "Let the lambs of our stock be sented from the first, that the Robber may see the mark impressed (§ 4) upon their bodies and tremble. Let not a child that is without the seal (§ 4) suck the milk of a mother that hath been baptised. . . . Let the children of the kingdom be carried, from the womb, to baptism.")

V. Baptism as represented in Ancient Art.

§ 102. Direct Representations. Of two modes in which we find baptism represented in ancient art, the first, that of direct representation, is confined to a very limited number of examples. The earliest, probably, is one of those engraved for this article (see § 93) from the cemetery of St. Callistus at Rome, and believed by De Rossi to be of the second century. It serves to illustrate what has been said above of what appears to have been one customary mode of administering the rite, viz., by pouring water from the hand, or from a small vessel held in the hand, upon a person standing in shallow water. Two Mosaics, at Ravenna and at Rome, in which the baptism of our Lord is represented, have been already described (see § 93). Another similar representation is painted in fresco on the walls of a chamber in the cemetery of Pontianus, originally used as a baptistery; and yet another in the church of S. Maria in Cosmedin, at Ravenna (the Mosaic said to be of the 6th century), figured in Ciampini, Vet. Monum. i. p. 78. Millin (Midi de la France) has engraved (Atlas, Pl. lxx. 11) a peculiar representation of this subject from a sarcophagus. With this may be compared that on the diptych of Milan, figured and described by Bugati (Memorie di S. Celso, p. 282), and reproduced in facsimile by the Arundel Society. No other such representations are known to the present writer, dating certainly from any period antecedent to 800 A.D. But two curious representations were engraved by Ciampinus in his Monumenta Vetera (tom. i. p. 16) of Sarcophagi, to which he attributed a very great antiquity. In the first is represented the baptism of a king and queen (their rank being indicated by a Royal crown on the head of each), and these he supposes to represent Agilulfus and his wife Theodelinda, queen of the Lombards, baptised, as he thinks, in the year 590. On the other sarcophagus a somewhat similar scene is represented. A man somewhat advanced in years kneels to receive baptism, which is administered by affusion only, water being poured upon his head from a small vessel, which has been filled evidently from one of larger size (not unlike the upper part of a modern English font) which stands near. Ciampinus supposes (but on very slight grounds) that the event represented is the baptism of Arrichius, second Duke of Beneventum, a contemporary of Gregory the Great, circ. 591 A.D. It is remarkable that in both these scenes the ministrant of the baptism has the distinctive dress of a layman, while all the other men represented are designated by an ecclesiastical or a monastic dress. The real date of these sarcophagi must, however, be regarded as extremely uncertain. To the 12th century belongs a fresco in the church of St. Lorenza, at Rome (ibid. tom. I. Tab. vi.), representing the baptism of St. Romanus, by St. Laurentius. This embodies the tradition alluded to by Walafrid Strabo in the 9th century. "Notandum non solum mergendo verum etiam desuper fundendo multos baptizatos fuisse, et adhuc posse ita baptizari si necessitas sit, sicuti in passione B. Laurentii quendam urceo aliato legimus baptizatum. Hoc etiam solet evenire cum profectionum granditas corporum in minoribus vasibus hominum tingi non potitur." The baptism of two adults by St. Paul, represented in the same point (from a chapel in the church of S. Pudenziana) is probably of the same date. To the same period is to be assigned the representation of the imaginary baptism of Constantine by St. Silvester, formerly on the façade of St. John Lateran, at Rome (Champioli de Sac. Aedif. tab. II. fig. 4). The picture engraved below is from a Baptismal Ceremony, from a Fontical of the Ninth Century.

Fontical of the 9th century, now in the S. Minerva Library at Rome. It represents the baptism of an infant and of an adult, and it is remarkable that the latter is represented as wearing a tunic in the font. This is in opposition to the conclusions drawn from literary evidence, noticed above in § 48. The engraving in § 43 is from the same MS., or rather from an exact copy in the collection of Pope Clement XI., now in the Royal Library at Windsor.

§ 103. Symbolical Representation. From a very early period indeed, the practice obtained of representing baptism symbolically under a figure due, probably, in the first instance, to an expression recorded in Mark i. 17 ("I will make you fishers of men"), and to the parable wherein our Lord compares the heavenly kingdom to a net enclosing fish both bad and good. A well-known passage of Tertullian will suffice for illustration of this symbolical meaning. "Nec pisciculi secundum piscem nostrum in aquis nascuntur, nec ubi in aquis permanendo salvi sumus." We smaller fishes, after the example of our Ichthus, are born in water, and only by continuing in the water do we remain safe (de Bapt. c. 1). We find the same figure in a passage of St. Hilary (In Matthæum, ed Ben. tom. iii. p. 679), in which he says that in the words recorded in Matt. iv. 19, "The future work of the Apostles is set forth, in drawing forth men, like fish from out of the sea, into the light of the heavenly habitation." And to come somewhat nearer home we find St. Patrick and his nephew Secundinus frequently employing the same language in reference to the missionary work in which they were engaged. The former says in his "Confession," "Valde debitor sum Deo qui mihi Deum renascere dedit at populi multi per me in mare ducuntur . . . Idcirco oportet quidem bene et dicens, venite post me, faciam vos fieri piscatores hominum." And Secundinus, speaking of St. Patrick:—

"Dominus illum elegit ut doceret barbaras Nationes et posceret per doctrinæ retin. Ut de sacculo credentes traheret ad gratiam. Dominumque sequerentur sedem ad ædificandum."

This symbol of the fish is of frequent occurrence in the Roman catacombs, and in various parts of France. The writer has observed in manuscripts, and in ecclesiastical monuments of various kinds at Antun, Clermont Ferrand, and at Paris, a peculiar application of this symbol, which has not hitherto, to his knowledge, been either described or explained. Two fishes are represented in close proximity, attached the one to the other by a string which issues from the mouth of one, and attaches to the head of the other. This is in all probability a Christian adaptation of an old Celtic symbol familiar to the Gauls in Pagan times. Their God of Eloquence was represented with a golden cord issuing from his mouth, and entering the ear of one to whom he is supposed to speak. And so in the Christian symbolism of Gaul at a later period, He who spoke as never man spoke, is represented under the well-known figure of an IXOTC or Fish, drawing to Him by the power of His Word one who is himself in the language of the Antun inscription) IXOTOC OTPANIOY TENOC, the offspring of that henvenly Fish. This representation may be seen over the western doors of the cathedral at Autun, in a MS. Bible (11th century probably) in the public library at Clermont Ferrand, and on the capital of a column in the baptistery of the church of St. Germain des Prés at Paris. There also appears a modification of the fish symbol, which is probably unique in its kind. Figures are represented which are half-man and half-fish, with their hands clasped upon a fish, which is rising upwards through the water, as shown in the accompanying woodcut. The church in which this capital is still to be seen is, even in its present state, the oldest in Paris. When it was built in the 11th or 12th century in place of a church, originally built six centuries before, the capitals of many of the older columns were preserved, and employed in the construction of the present building. And on these, as on other grounds which cannot now be stated in detail, there can be little doubt that this representation dates, in origin at least, from the very earliest period of the Gallican Church. (See Marriott's Testimony of the Catacombs, &c., p. 142, sq.)

VI. Literature.

§ 104.—It only remains to mention briefly the chief sources of information upon the various matters treated in this article. Details as to the primitive ritual of baptism are to be sought in the various authors and treatises already quoted or referred to. See particularly §§ 27 to 40. Among modern authors, who have treated of the ritual of Baptism, may be mentioned Hugo Ménardus, whose notes on the sacramentary of St. Gregory the Great abound with instruction upon this as upon other matters of which he treats. The treatise of Edmond Martene, De Antiquis Ecclesie Ritibus, part i., is full of information as to Western usages, and gives, what is of especial value, a large collection of the earliest "Ordines Baptismi." But he shows little acquaintance with Greek authors, and his references to them, and occasionally to Latin writers, are not always exact. Goar, in his Euchologion Græcorum, gives full details of the later Greek rites, and his notes upon these, illustrating modern usage from the older writers, are valuable. Bingham (Antiquities, book xi.) does not appear to have investigated the early ritual of baptism very thoroughly, but the later editions of his treatise are of use as containing in the notes full citations from the original text of the various authors whom he quotes. The Treatise of Augusti, Archæologie der Taufe, forming vol. vii. of his Denkwürdigkeiten aus der Christlicher Archæologie, contains more, and more exact information, than any of the older writers on the subject. And it is also valuable as giving lists of writers who have treated either of baptism generally, or of special questions in connection with it. Binterim has given (Die Vorzüglichsten Denkwürdigkeiten der Christ-Catholischen Kirche, vol. i. pt. 1.) a fair account of the ceremonies of Baptism, with abundant citations; and an essay on Baptism in Wine, Milk, and Sand (Denkw. ii. pt. 1., pp. 2-34). [W. B. M.]

BAPTISM, ANGEL OF. Tertullian in his treatise de Baptismo, cc. 5 and 6, speaks of an angel who is present at baptism (baptismi arbiter), and who prepares the waters of the font (aquis in salutem hominis temperandis aestus—aquis intervenit), and under whose auspices men are prepared, by the cleansing of the font, for the following gift of the Holy Spirit (in aqua emundati sub angelo Spiritu Sancto præparantur). His language is not inconsistent with a belief that this may have been a mere liturgical speculation of his own, rather than a doctrine generally accepted in his time. No parallel to this language has hitherto, as far as the writer knows, been alleged from any other early writers. But in more than one of the early "Ordines Baptismi" there will be found expressions, derived, in all probability, from this very passage of Tertullian. See the Article BAPTISM, § 29, where there is the same allusion as in Tertullian to the angel at Bethesda (angelum aquis intervenire si novum videtur, exemplum futuri præcucurrit. Piscinam Bethesdam angelus intervensiens commovebat. . . . de Bap. c. 5). With this compare the "Collectio" of the Gotho-Gallican Missal. "Descendat super has aquas angelus benedictionis tue," and again "qui Bethesdæ aquas angelo medicante procuras . . . angelum pietatis tue his sacris fontibus dedisse dignare." So too in the Liber Sacramentorum of Gelasius Papa (Martene, De Ant. Eccl. Rit. tom. i. p. 66), "Super has aquas angelum sanctitatis emittas." [W. B. M.]

BAPTISM, ITERATION OF. (Αναβαπτισμῶς). Denuo baptizare; baptismum iterare.) It has always been held, as matter of theory, that baptism once really conferred can never be really repeated. And yet, from the 2nd century to the present time, questions concerning the repetition of baptism have continually arisen, and have been determined upon other considerations than that of the abstract principle just stated. Yet the principle itself was always maintained. Those who rebaptized heretics did so, as St. Cyril Hieros. says (Catech. i. οἱ αἰρετικοὶ ἀναβαπτίζονται ἐνεὶ τῷ τῷ πρότερον οὐκ ἔχοντες βάπτισμα), on the ground that the former (repeated) baptism was not really baptism. And baptism administered in cases where the fact of previous baptism was open to doubt, was defended in terms which imply that any conscious or intended repetition of baptism would be matter for grave condemnation. (Non potest in iterationis crimen devenire, quod factum esse omnino nescitur. L. M. Epist. xxxvii. ad Leon. Ravenn. Lubbe t. iii. p. 1326). But the abstract principle was wholly inadequate to the solution of the more difficult question, "what constitutes valid baptism?"

§ 2. Baptism by Heretics.—Among the questions thus left open the most important was whether baptism given by heretics and schismatics was to be regarded as valid or no. This question came prominently before the Church in connection with the Donatist controversy in the 3rd century. St. Cyprian, supported by many bishops in the East, maintained that baptism given "outside the Church" (extra ecclesiam), i.e. by schismatics or by excommunicated heretics, was not to be accounted valid, and was therefore to be repeated (in theory, given for the first time), in the case of penitents seeking reconciliation with the Church. Similar questions had to be determined in respect of the Marcionites, Paulinians, Arians, Eucumians and others.

the controversy concerning rebaptization was the acceptance, in the West absolutely, but with more of reserve in the East, of the principle that the validity of the Sacrament depended upon administration in accordance with Christ's Institution (i. e. with water and the "Evangelic words") without regard to the orthodoxy or otherwise of the administrator. This doctrine finds decisive expression in the language of St. Augustine (contra Petil. de unico baptismo, c. 3). "Si de ipsa Trinitatis unitate dissentientem haereticum invenio, et tamen evangelica et ecclesiastica regula baptizatum, intellectum hominis corrigo non Dei violo sacramentum." And again in speaking of baptism given by Marcion, "Si evangelicis verbis in nomine Patris et Filii et Spiritus Sancti Marcion baptismum consecravit, integrum erit sacramentum, quamvis ejus fides sub eisdem verbis aliquid opinantis quam catholica veritas docet non esset integra, sed fabulosis falsitibus inquinata." The Council of Arles (a. 448) for the reasons stated by St. Augustine, allowed the baptism of the Bonosian as valid, but rejected that of the Photinians. And the precedents thus established have been followed in the West, ever since, with scarcely any exceptions. See BAPTISM §§ 82 to 89. But in the Eastern Churches the difference of tendency indicated in what has been already said may clearly be traced in other cases. St. Cyril Hieros., as we have already seen, says simply that "Heretics ara rebaptized," as their baptism is not really such. And with this accords the language of the Apostolic Canon, quoted by Photius (Syntagma Canonum: Spicil. Rom. A. Mai, tom. vii.). "If a bishop or presbyter re-baptize one who has true baptism (τὸν κατὰ ἀλήθειαν ἔχοντα βάπτισμα), or if he refuse to re-baptize one who has been defiled" (i. e. by a pretended baptism—compare St. Athanasius quoted below) "by the ungodly, let him be regarded as making mockery of the Cross and of the Death of Christ, and not distinguishing priests (ιερείας) from pretended priests." With this St. Athanasius agrees both in doctrine and in expression. The Arians, he says (Orat. ii. cont. Arian, BB. tom. i. p. 510) are in peril as to the fulness of the Sacrament itself. "The baptism they bestow must be (ἔλλο ἂν εἴη)—falling short of absolute assertion) alien from the truth, even though out of regard to what is written" [in Holy Scripture] "they make pretence of naming the Father and the Son." And again to the same effect (ibid. § 43) speaking of other heretical bodies which do but utter the divine names (in the Formula of Baptism), but without a right intention, and without salutary faith, the water that they bestow is, he says, "without profit (ἀνομιτέλεις), being destitute of true godliness, so that he who is sprinkled (βαπτίζομενον) by them is rather defiled (βαντίζομενον) by them with the ransom of Christ." This ἀνομιτέλεις, "without profit," reminds us of the recurrent formula of St. Augustine, in speaking of heretical baptism, when followed by repentance and reception into the Church. In heresy men may have baptism, though they have not (per quod utile est) its beneficial effect. On repentance and conversion, "prodesse incipit ad salutem," that baptism "begins to avail unto salvation," which before availed only to condemnation (De baptismo c. Donat. lib. i. cap. xii., lib. iv. capp. iv. and xv., lib. v. capp. v. and viii., and xviii. &c.).

A tone like that of Athanasius may be traced in the decisions of various Eastern Councils quoted by Photius. After the "Canon of the Apostles" already quoted, there follows Canon 29 of the Council of Nicea, which orders the rebaptizing of the followers of Paulinus. It has been conjectured (by St. Augustine first, De Haeres. c. 44) that this was because of some defect in the formula which they employed. This is very probable, but there is nothing in the language of the canon to imply this. Forty years later, at the Council of Laodicea, a distinction was made. Canon 78 directs that Novatians or Photinians and Quartodecimans are to be received back on conversion, with chrism and imposition of hands, and then adds, "Moreover we rebaptize, as heathens (Εἰσλήθας) Manichaeans, Valentinians, and Marcionists." See further Canons on the same subject in the Syntagma Canonum of Photius.

§ 4. Rebaptizing in case of doubt.—The second class of cases involving the question of iteration of baptism was that of children whose baptism was matter of doubt. This question was formally brought before a Synod at Carthage (the Fifth, a. 425) in reference to children redeemed from slavery, and who could neither themselves recollect, nor had witnesses to testify, whether or no they had been baptized. It was determined "absque ullo scrupulo eos esse baptizandos ne ista trepidatio eos faciat sacramentorum purgatione privari." This canon was re-enacted by Conc. Carthage, vi. a. 525; and in the East, in almost identical terms, by the Quinisext Council (Constantinople a. 691). It appears again in collections of medieval canons, and amongst others in those of Theodore, Archbp. of Canterbury, in the Excerpta of Egbert of York, and the Syntagma Canonum of Photius. The hypothetical form of baptism, "If thou art not already baptized," &c., was apparently unknown till the 8th century. The earliest example of it is found in the Statuta of St. Boniface, Archbp. of Mayence (Martene De Rit. Antiq. Eccl. t. i. p. 59). "Si de aliquibus dubium sit utrum sint baptizati absque ullo scrupulo baptizentur: his tamen verbis praemissis: non te rebaptizo, sed si nondum es baptizatus ego te rebaptizo in nomine Patris et Filii et Spiritus Sancti." Cases of doubt arising from other causes have been noticed under BAPTISM, §§ 80 to 89. [W. B. M.]

BAPTIST, NATIVITY OF. [ST. JOHN BAPTIST, FESTIVALS OF.]

BAPTISTERY (Lat. Baptisterium, Greek Βαπτιστήριον, also Domus illuminationis, φωτιστήριον), the building or chamber set apart for the celebration of the sacrament of baptism. The receptacle for the water was called in Latin "piscina," in Greek "κολυμβήθρα," and more rarely by some other names, as πυλωτός, λιανερών, νατορία. Besides the receptacle for the water a baptistery was furnished with an altar, for the practice existed from a very early period until the 10th century, and perhaps even later (v. Martene, De Antiq. Eccl. Rit. t. i. p. 153), of allowing the newly baptized, even if infants, to partake of the Eucharist. In the earliest ages the administration of baptism was confined to the principal church of the diocese; and this practice still exists at Florence, Pisa, and elsewhere in Italy. Pope Marcellus (A. D. 304-309) is said, in the Lib. Pontif., to have appointed twenty-five "tituli" in Rome "as though (quasi) dioceses, on account of the baptism and penance of many." Many passages in the Lib. Pontif. shew that baptisteries existed attached to many of the minor churches down to the 9th century, and it is probable that every parish church in Rome had its baptistery. The existence of many baptisteries in one city was, it would seem, almost or quite peculiar to Rome.

As, during the earlier centuries, immersion, either alone or accompanied by aspersion, and not merely sprinkling, was deemed to be the proper mode of administering the rite (v. Martene, De Antiq. Eccl. Rit. t. i. p. 135), a large receptacle for water was required; and as Easter, Pentecost and the Epiphany were seasons specially appointed for baptisms, and large crowds of people were therefore attendant at those feasts, it became necessary to provide a spacious apartment in which the sacrament might be administered. When on Holy Saturday St. John Chrysostom was attacked, three thousand men had been baptized, and many more, both men and women, died, who were still waiting to undergo baptism (Chrysostom, Epist. ad Innocent.; Opp. iii. 518, ed. Montfuccon; Palladius, Vita Chrysost. c. 9). The presence of the "piscina," or receptacle for water would have been inconvenient in a church, and all the space of even a very large edifice would be required, at the great festivals above mentioned, by those attending the solemn services of those occasions. From these circumstances the practice of constructing a building distinct from the church or basilica very naturally arose, and though we have no existing baptistery which can be referred to any period earlier than the 4th century, nor indeed any distinct account of the building of one before the time of Constantine the Great, it seems highly probable that where in Asia or elsewhere churches had been built at earlier periods they were accompanied by baptisteries. In the earliest ages a river or a pool may have served as a place of baptism, and indeed the spot in the Jordan where our Saviour was baptized by St. John is said to have been lined with marble and resorted to by crowds on the eve of the Epiphany (v. Martigny, Dict. des Antiq. Chrét., art. Baptistère).

That Easter was still in the 8th century chosen as a peculiar season for baptism at Rome is shewn by a passage in the Lib. Pontif. in the life of Hadrian I. (772-793). This Pope, we are told, repaired the Claustral Aqueduct, which supplied the baths of the Lateran palace and the baptistery of the church, and from which, it is added, many churches were supplied on the holy day of Easter. Charles the Great, by a capitulary of A.D. 804, ordered that baptisms should take place only at Easter and Pentecost.

Passages in the writings of Tertullian (De Coron. Mil. c. 3) and of Justin Martyr (Apol. i. c. 61) shew that baptism was not administered in the church, but that the place of baptism was without it. Such places of baptism are believed to have existed in the catacombs at Rome; in one of these, in a cemetery known as the Ostrinun, not far from the church of St. Agnes on the Via Nomentana, St. Peter is traditionally said to have baptized. The spot was known as "ad Nympbas S. Petri," or "fons S. Petri" (v. De Rossi, Roma Sott. Crist., t. i. p. 189).

Boltetti believed that he had discovered more than one of these baptisteries; but Padre Marchi says expressly (Mon. delle Arti Crist. Prim., &c., p. 222) that the only "battisterio cimenteriale" known at the time that he wrote (1844) was that in the cemetery of St. Pontianus. This (engraved in Pl. xliii. of Marchi's work) consists of a small cistern or "piscina" supplied by a current of water. The piscina would appear to be between 3 and 4 feet deep and about 6 feet across; it is approached by a flight of steps, between the base of which and the water is a level space about 5 feet wide, on which the priest or bishop may have stood while performing the rite. There seems to be no trace of an altar, nor, indeed, any fit place for one. Above the water is a painting representing the baptism of Our Lord, and on another side, and partly hidden by the water, a painting of a cross adorned with gems and throwing out leaves and flowers from its stem. Two lighted candelabra rest upon the arms of the cross, and an alpha and an omega hang suspended from them by chains. [See A and ω , p. 1.]

The lighted candelabra are no doubt in allusion to the divine illumination of the soul attendant on baptism, whence baptisteries were often called φωτιστήρια, as has been remarked above.

This baptistery has been noticed at some length, as although the date of the paintings which decorate it cannot be fixed with any certainty, it is perhaps one of the earliest examples now remaining of a chamber set apart for the performance of this rite.

Of the construction of baptisteries in the time of Constantine the Great we have abundant proof. The anonymous pilgrim of Bordeaux, who visited Jerusalem c. A.D. 334 when speaking of the basilica which Constantine had just built at the Sepulchre of our Lord says, that by its side were reservoirs for water, and behind it a bath where children were "washed" (balneum ubi infantes lavantur), that is, no doubt, the balneum evidently includes a baptistery. The Exedrae of the church of Paulinus at Troves, and Paulinus of Nola (Ep. 12, ad Severum) says that Severus built a baptistery between two basilicas. Cyril of Jerusalem speaks of the baptistery as having a porch or anteroom, προαβλίος οίκος, where the catechumens made their renunciation of Satan and Confession of Faith, and an εὐαγγέλιος οίκος, the inner room where the ceremony of baptism was performed. This shows that a well-considered plan for such buildings then existed.

Constantine is usually said to have built this baptistery of the Lateran, and the Lib. Pontif. contains a long detail of the magnificence with which he decorated it. Niebuhr understands by the account, which is not without obscurity, that the walls of the baptistery were covered with porphyry and that the piscina was of silver, five feet in height; the water is said to have flowed into this receptacle from seven stags of silver and a lamb of gold. On the right hand of the lamb stood an image of the Saviour, of silver, five feet high, and on the left one of St. John the Baptist, of the same size and of the same metal. In the middle stood columns of porphyry bearing a "phiala" of gold, weighing 52 lbs., in which the Paschal candle was placed. As, however, the expression which Niebuhr interprets to mean the building or baptistery, is "fons sanctus," and the expression "fons baptisterii" occurs immediately afterwards, it may be doubtful whether the meaning of the passage is not that the building (i.e. the baptistry) was constructed of or covered with porphyry, but that the piscina which it contained was of porphyry covered with silver.

Niebuhr and several other writers have questioned whether this part of the Lib. Pontif. can be relied on as historical; the erection of images of the Saviour and of St. John the Baptist is certainly not in accordance with the practice of the Church at that period, and, in conjunction with other statements of a doubtful nature, must throw considerable doubt upon the trustworthiness of the account of the buildings and donations of Constantine which the book contains. There is, however, no doubt but that Constantine erected a basilica within the Lateran palace, or at least converted some hall of the palace into a church, and a baptistry in all probability formed a part of the group of ecclesiastical buildings. It is generally believed that the existing baptistry owes its form (though it has undergone many alterations and been much added to), to Pope Sixtus III. (A.D. 432-440). He is said by the compiler of the Lib. Pontif. to have added, as a decoration to the "fons," the porphyry columns
"apistylia," by which we should understand not only the capitals but the architraves, as those now there are no doubt antique, and have inscribed upon them sixteen verses referring to baptism (printed in the Besch. v. Rom., bd. iii. abt. 1.), which are doubtless those which the Lib.
Pontif. alludes to, though by a corruption of the text they are said to have been placed not on the architraves but on the columns.

The building as it now exists is an octagon about 62 feet in diameter, in the centre of which are eight columns of porphyry
carrying antique capitals and architraves;
lesser columns are placed on the architraves, and support the roof. This octagon is entered from a large portico with apsidal ends which may answer to the προαίλιος οἶκος mentioned by Cyril of Jerusalem.

Hübisch (Alt. Christ. Kirchen) asserts that the walling as well of the octagon as of the portico to a height of about 50 feet bears
the stamp of the Constantinian period.

Another very remarkable building at Rome is no doubt of the period of Constantine, but it is uncertain whether it is to be regarded as a baptistry or as a sepulchral church. This is the circular church close to St. Agnes, on the Via Nomentana, known as Sta. Costanza. The Lib.
Pontif. (in vita S. Silvestri) says that Constantine built "basilicam Sanctae Martyriae Agnetis" and "baptisterium in eodem loco" and, as no trace of any other baptistry has been found near the place, this church has been usually taken to be the baptistry mentioned in the above-quoted book. No trace of a "piscina" has however, it would seem, been noticed; the building was certainly the place of sepulture of one or more members of the imperial family; and it appears doubtful whether at that period it would have been deemed right to bury in a basilica or a baptistry any person, of rank however exalted.

BAPTISTRY

A building very similar to this, the circular church at Nocera del Pagani, known as Sta. Maria Maggiore, was no doubt constructed for a baptistry, as it possesses a large and apparently original piscina. It is a circle about 80 feet in diameter, with an apse of about three-fourths of a circle in plan, projecting from one side. Thirty columns arranged, as at Sta. Costanza, in pairs, support arches on which rests a dome, and the nise has barrel vaults. The piscina in the centre is circular and about 20 feet in diameter and nearly 5 feet deep; within are two steps or benches running round the whole circumference,
and there is a raised wall or parapet round it, octagonal on the exterior. This parapet was decorated on the outside with slabs of marble bearing incised patterns, and upon it stood eight columns, which perhaps once supported a canopy;
three only of these columns now remain (v.
Hübisch, Alt. Christ. Kirchen, Pl. xvii. xviii.). The date of this building is not known from any historical data, but it may perhaps be attributed with probability to the 5th century.

Another baptistry, which, though probably considerably older than that at Nocera, has the piscina arranged in a very similar manner, is that at Aquileia. It is now in ruins, but the annexed woodcut copied from the engraving in Baptistry at Aquileia.

the Mittelalterliche Kunstdenkmale des Esterreichischen Kaiserstaates, by Heider and Eitelberger (bd. i. a. 119), will give a good idea of the manner in which a baptistry at the period was arranged.
The piscina is hexagonal, and would seem to have one step and a low parapet wall on the outside, and two steps in the inside. The authors of the above-quoted work, however, state that the number of steps is five, meaning probably that any one ascending from the floor and descending to the bottom of the piscina would mount two steps and descend three. In the eastern angle of the octagon is a small apse.

This baptistry is entered by a vaulted passagelike building in three compartments, which bears the name of "Chiessa dei Pagani," and probably served as a place of assemblage and instruction for the catechumens before they were admitted to baptism. It appears to have had an upper story, which may have been set apart for women,
as there is ground for believing that such a separation of the sexes was practised in the baptisteries or the apartments connected with them.

No one of the baptisteries of this period has come down to the present time in a more unaltered condition than that of the Cathedral of Ravenna, known, like many other baptisteries in Italy, as S. Giovanni in Fonte.

It was, if not built, at least renovated and decorated by Neon, archbishop from A.D. 425 to 430, as an inscription (v. Ciampini, Vel. Mon. t. 1. cap. xxv.) formerly existing within it testified. Hübsch (All. Christ. Kirchen) expresses an opinion that the decorations now existing may be considered as for the most part, if not entirely, the work of Neon. The occurrence of a monogram, which may be read Maximilianus (Archbishop of Ravenna in the time of Justinian), of an inscription in the mosaics, which appears to refer to Theodoric the Great (Webb, Contia. Eccles. p. 428), and very close similarity in the patterns of the marble inlay on the walls to those in St. Saphin's at Constantinople, and in the Duomo at Parenzo, in Istria, lead to the conclusion that the work of decoration was only gradually executed and not completed until the middle of the 6th century.

As will be seen by the plan annexed, the building is an octagon, with two niches or apses; it measures about 40 feet in diameter. Recent excavations have shown that there were originally four apses. In the centre is the piscina, lower part of the walls is lined with the same material in long slabs; above this are panels of "opus sectile," marqueterie in porphyry, serpentine, marbles of various colours, and brick. Beneath the arches carried by the upper range of columns are figures of saints (?) executed in stucco in low relief, as to the age of which there is some difference of opinion. The dome is covered with mosaic; in the centre the baptism of our Lord is represented, round this the twelve Apostles, and below them a range of eight compartments, in each of these are alternately two cathedrae placed under canopies with an altar between them, and two tombs of an altar form standing under canopies, between which is what seems to represent a slab or low tombstone lying on the ground, over which hangs a mass of drapery supported on ornamental posts. The meaning of these representations has not been clearly explained; the cathedrae and altars have been supposed to symbolize a council, but this leaves unexplained the signification of the tombs; the altar-tombs appear to stand for tombs of confessors or martyrs, as wreaths appear to crown them and lilies or palm branches to spring from them; the tombs over which the draperies hang are thought by Clamphil (t. i. p. 178) to represent the tombs of bishops. The intention may have been to symbolize the whole Church, the cathedrae standing for living bishops, the tombs for saints and bishops deceased.

The church now called S. Maria in Cosmedin, in Ravenna, was also once a baptistery, having been built (it is believed) in the time of Theodoric for the use of the Arians; it is circular internally, octagonal externally, with a small rounded apse projecting from one of the sides and a loggia of three arches from another. It is covered by a dome, on which are mosaics representing the baptism of our Lord and the twelve Apostles. These are believed to be of later date than the original building.

The baptistery of St. Sophia's, Constantinople, which no doubt is that erected by Justinian, has a portico or narthex, and is rectangular externally, with a rectangular projection containing an apse; internally it is octangular, with on the ground-plan four niches (besides the apse) on four of the sides; the upper story is octangular, with a large window in each side. It is placed near the south-west angle of the cathedral, facing westwards (Sulzenberg, Baudenkmale v. Constantinopel, pl. vi.). At Parenzo, in Istria, the baptistery stands in front of the duomo, and connected with it by a square atrium, which last position was one frequently adopted.

The preceding examples will give a sufficient idea of the form, arrangements, and decorations of baptisteries down to the 6th century. One curious example, which perhaps should be attributed to the 7th, is the baptistery at Poitiers; this is in plan an oblong, with an apse projecting from one of the longer sides; this apse is straight lined, but not rectangular on the outside and five-sided within. Two large arches in the end walls make it probable that niches existed entered by them. A building of later date has been added on the side opposite to the apse, so that the form of the original entrance cannot now be determined. The piscina, nearly in the centre of the oblong, is octagonal. The architectural decoration is partly original and partly made up from old materials; what is original is rude, but has something of a classical character (v. Gailhabaud, Mon. Anc. et Mod., t. ii.).

The baptistery at Albenga, between Nice and Genoa, is octangular externally, but within semi-circular; three rectangular niches are formed in the thickness of the wall, and on the eighth side was the entrance. It is roofed by a dome, in the drum below which were eight windows, which were filled with slabs of marble pierced in patterns of circles and crosses. The vault of the niche opposite the entrance and the wall at its back have been covered with mosaic; the labarum, doves, and a lamb can be distinguished. No remains of the piscina are now to be traced, but a perfectly plain cylindrical font stands in one of the niches. Those architectural details which are original, e.g. the slabs in the windows, are very rudely executed, and the building is perhaps not earlier than the 7th or even the 8th century.

About A.D. 750, Cuthbert, archbishop of Canterbury, erected a church to the east of his cathedral, and almost touching it, to serve as a baptistery, and for other purposes (Edmer, Vita S. Gregorii, Ang. Sac. t. ii. p. 186). It was dedicated in honour of St. John the Baptist.

During the 8th and 9th centuries baptisteries continued to be in full use in Italy, as we may learn from the Liv. Pontif., where mention is made of the building or rebuilding of five baptisteries attached to churches in Rome, between A.D. 772 and A.D. 816. In one of these cases, that of S. Andrea Apostolo, rebuilt by Pope Leo III. (795-816), we are told expressly that the place was too small for the people who came to baptism, and that the Pope therefore built a circular baptistery "anaph largitate," that he also enlarged the "fons" and decorated it with porphyry columns round about.

Martigny (Dict. des Antiq. Chrét.) expresses an opinion that in France the practice of placing the baptistery first in the portico and then in the interior of the church, began in the 6th century; but the passage in the Hist. Franc. of St. Gregory of Tours (l. ii. chap. xxi.), to which he refers, seems hardly sufficient to prove this statement. St. Gregory himself states that he constructed a baptistery "ad basilicam" (apparently of St. Perpetuus, at Tours), and the baptistery at Poitiers was evidently a separate building. The baptistery at Fréjus, which according to Texier and Pullan (Byz. Arch.) was built in 810, is also a detached structure.

In Germany and Italy baptisteries were built as detached structures down to a much later date; but this was not an invariable practice, for in the plan for the church of St. Gall [Citron], prepared in the beginning of the 9th century, there is no detached baptistery, but a circular "fons," about six feet in diameter, in the middle of the nave towards the west end of the church, surrounded by a screen.

It has been seen that the earlier baptisteries were, if not circular, octagonal; it is uncertain whether these forms were adopted merely from reasons of convenience, or as symbols. The circular form was that almost invariably adopted for a sepulchral chapel or memorial church, and the immersions, with which the rite of baptism was in the earlier centuries invariably performed, were considered as typical of dying to the world.

of marble, and the

The octagonal form is said to have been adopted as typical of perfection.

The piscina was usually octagonal, but sometimes hexagonal, and sometimes circular. In Lusitania, we are told by Gregory of Tours (Do Gloria Martyrum, l. i. c. 23), it was customarily constructed of variegated marble in the form of a cross.

Of baptisteries in Asia or Africa we have but little information. Textler and Pullan (Byz. Arch. p. 14) however state that small baptisteries are frequently found adjoining ancient churches in the East; and Count de la Vogüe has given a drawing and plan of one at Decy-Seta, in Central Syria (Arch. Civ. et Reliq. en Syrie, &c. pl. 117), of an hexagonal form, which would appear to be of the 6th century. It has the peculiarity of three doors, one in each of three contiguous sides; in the centre was an hexagonal piscina, with a column at each angle.

Mr. Curzon (Movist. of the Levant, cap. 131) describes us entered from the vestibule of the church of the White Monastery (or Derr Abou Shenoud) in Egypt, a small chapel or baptistry, 25 feet long, arched with stone, with three niches on each side, and a semicircular upper end, the whole highly decorated with sculptured ornament of very good style. This, as well as the adjacent church, are said to have been built by order of the Empress Helena.

Besides being used for baptisms, baptisteries were used as places for assemblies. Cuthbert, archbishop of Canterbury, is stated to have built the baptistry mentioned above, in order that it might serve for "baptisterin, examinationes judiciorum," and also that the bodies of the archbishops might be there buried (Anglia Sacra, ii. 185).

This practice of burying in baptisteries, though prohibited at an earlier period (as by the 14th Canon of the Council of Auxerre in 578), was common before burial in the church was allowed.

Many of the archbishops of Canterbury were buried in the baptistry from the time of Cuthbert, who built it, until A.D. 1067, when it was burnt. In the original entrance to the baptistry at Albenga are two tombs in the fashion of the "arcosolia" of the Roman entombs, as early as the 8th or 9th centuries.

Baptisteries appear to have been in the earlier ages (at least in the West), almost always dedicated under the invocation of St. John the Baptist.

BARBARIANS, BISHOPS FOR. In ordinary cases the election of a bishop required the consent or suffrage, not only of the clergy of the diocese over which he was to preside, but of the faithful laity also. This rule, however, could obviously be applied only to countries already Christian. When a bishop was to be sent out to a distant or barbarous nation, it was required by the Council of Chalcedon, Can. xxviii., that he should be ordained at Constantinople, to which city, as the New Rome, equal privileges with "the Elder royal Rome," were now to be assigned. The Bishop of Tomi in Scythia, is an instance of a missionary bishop thus ordained, and commissioned by the Patriarch of Constantinople—the consent of the people to whom he was sent to minister being, of necessity, dispensed with. In the previous century it is recorded by the Church historians that Athanasius ordained Frumentius at Alexandria to be Bishop of the Ethiopians, when, as Bingham remarks, "No one can imagine that he had the formal consent, though he might have the presumptive approbation of all his people." It also forbade ordinations per saltum; and ordered, in the election of a bishop, a choice by lot from two or three candidates, to be nominated by the "clerus et plebs" of the diocese, and presented to the metropolitan and bishops (Labb. v. 1605, 1606). BARCINONENSE CONCILIIUM. [BARCELONA, COUNCIL OF.]

BARDINIANUS, martyr in Asia; commemorated Sept. 25 (Mart. Hieron.). [C.]

BARNABAS, ST. LEGEND AND FESTIVAL OF. There is a tradition that he became a believer after witnessing the miracle wrought by our Lord at the pool of Bethesda, and that he was one of the seventy disciples. (Eusebius, Hist. Eccl. i. 12, and ii. 1.) It is also said that he was the first preacher of Christianity at Rome, that he converted Clemens Romanus to the faith and that he founded the churches of Milan and Brescia. But these and other statements about him may certainly be regarded as unworthy of credit. There is however a general agreement of testimony about the time, place and cause of his death. From very early times, in the Western as well as in the Eastern church, he has had the credit of martyrdom. It is believed that he was stoned to death by the Jews of Salamis in Cyprus about the year 64 A.D. Tradition says that his death took place on the 11th of June and that he was buried at a short distance from the town of Salamis. Nothing however seems to have been heard of his tomb until about the year 478 A.D.

The discovery of his body is fully related in the Eulogy of St. Barnabas, written by Alexander, a monk of Cyprus, about the beginning of the sixth century. After giving an account of the martyrdom and burial of Barnabas, this writer asserts that in consequence of the many miraculous cures that had occurred in the neighbourhood of the tomb the spot had been called the "place of healing" (tráos íyíelas). But the cause of these miracles was unknown to the Cypriotes until the discovery was made in the following way. Peter the Fuller, Patriarch of Antioch, a man who had been very successful in creating dissensions, was endeavouring to bring Cyprus under his episcopal sway, on the plea that the Word of God in the first instance was carried from Antioch to Cyprus. The Cypriotes resisted this claim on the ground that their church had from the time of its founders been independent of the see of Antioch. Anthemius, the Bishop of Cyprus, a timid and retiring prelate, was scarcely a match for an opponent so able and experienced as Peter. But he was encouraged by Barnabas himself who appeared to him several times in a vision. At the saint's bidding he searched a cave in the neighbourhood of the τόπος βύβλας, and found a coffin containing the body of Barnabas and a copy of St. Matthew's Gospel. He proceeded to Constantinople, where the dispute was heard before the Emperor Zeno, and in support of his claim to remain independent he announced that the body of Barnabas had lately been discovered in the cloister. On hearing this the emperor gave his decision in favour of Anthemius, bade him send a copy to Cyprus for the copy of St. Matthew's Gospel, and as soon as it arrived had it adorned with gold and placed in the imperial palace. After conferring great honours on Anthemius, the emperor sent him back to Cyprus with instructions to build a magnificent church in honour of Barnabas near the spot where the body was found. This orator was strictly carried out, the body was placed at the right hand of the altar and the 11th of June consecrated to the memory of the salut. (Acta Sanctorum: Junii xl.)

However ready we may be to reject this account of the finding of the body of Barnabas, there is every reason to believe that in the Eastern Church these events were the origin of the festival. No church however was built to the saint's memory at Constantinople. It is also remarkable that from early times the day was kept in the Eastern Church in honour of Bartholomew as well as of Barnabas. When the second saint's name was added is quite uncertain, but there are good grounds for believing that the day was originally sacred to Barnabas only. In the Menologion Basilianum, edited by command of the Emperor Basil in the year 886 A.D., the day is the joint festival of the two saints. At what time it was first observed in the Western Church is very doubtful. Papebrochius asserts that the festival was not kept in Eastern earlier than in Western Christendom, but he has not proved this statement. The day occurs as the Feast of Barnabas in the calendar of the Venerable Bede, so that unless this be one of the additions made after the author's death, we may conclude that the day was observed in the Western Church in the 8th century. It does not however occur in all the old service-books. In the Martyrologium Romanum it appears as the Festival of Barnabas only.

The principal account of the traditions concerning Barnabas is the work above referred to, Alexander Monachi Laudatio in Apost. Barnabam; in Migne's Patrol. Series Græca, vol. 87, col. 4087; Surius, Vitæ Sanctorum, Junii xl.

BARTHOLOMEW, bishop; commemorated with Pachemius, Talsis 11 = Dec. 7 (Crit. Ethion.). [W. J. J.]

BARTHOLOMEW, ST., LEGEND AND FESTIVAL OF. The New Testament tells us but little of this Apostle, and there is an equal absence of any great amount of early trustworthy tradition. He is by some, with a great show of probability, identified with Nathanael, for the arguments as to which derived from scripture, see Dict. Bibl., under BARTHOLOMEW, NATHANAEL. It may be further remarked in favour of the identification that in such a matter Eastern tradition is more to the point than Western (considering that is, the scene of this Apostle's labours and martyrdom), and that the former uniformly identifies Nathanael with Bartholomew. For example, from the Armenian and Chaldean writers cited by Assemani (Lit. Or. vol. iii. part 2, p. 4), e.g. Elin, bishop of Damascus, and Ebedjesu Sobensis, we may infer that Nathanael was in those churches included among the Apostles, and viewed as one with Bartholomew; in fact, Assemani remarks, "Bartholomæum cum Nathanaele confundunt Chaldei" (ibid. p. 5). Moreover in martyrologies and calendars, both of Eastern and Western Churches, the name of Bartholomew is of constant occurrence, while that of Nathanael is ordinarily absent, which would be strange on the hypothesis of a difference between the two. It must be allowed, however, that the Egyptian and Ethiopian Churches seem to identify Nathanael with Simon the Canaanite, for in their Menologies and Calendars, edited by Job Ludolf (Frankfort, 1691), there is no mention of Simon the Canaanite, but on July 10 is "Nathanael the under the days April 22, May 10 is a similar identification, as also in the Russian Calendar for the latter day.

BARTHOLOMEW

The general account given by tradition of the labours of this Apostle is to the effect that he preached the gospel, using especially that by St. Matthew, in India, where he suffered martyrdom by beheading, having been, according to some writers, previously flayed (Euseb. Hist. Eccl. v. 10; Jerome, De viris Illustribus, 36, vol. ii. 651, ed. Migne. Cf. also Ado's Libellus de festis SS. Apostolorum in Migne's Patrol. Lat. cxxiii. 185). In the appendix De vitis Apostolorum to Sophronius's Greek version of the De viris Illustribus allusion is made to the Apostle's mission ἰσθῆτος τοῖς καλοῦμένους εὐδαίμοισιν, which might possibly refer to Arabia Felix, and it is added that he suffered in Albanopolis, a city of Armenia Major (Jerome, vol. ii. 722). The latter statement is also found in several other writers (e.g. infra: and the Martyrologies of Florus and Rabanus), generally in the form that the Apostle suffered through the machinations of the priests, Polymius whom Bartholomew had converted. See further the Pseudo-Abdias's Acta of this Apostle, published by Fabricius (Codex Pseudoepigraphus Novi Testamenti, vol. i. pp. 341 seqq.).

The tenor of the tradition as to the disposition of the relics of St. Bartholomew is on the whole consistent, though not altogether free from difficulties. Theodoros Lector, a writer of the sixth century, tells us (Collectan. 2, in Mag. Bibl. Patr. vol. vi. part 1, p. 505 ed. Col. Agr. 1618) that the Emperor Anastasius gave the body of St. Bartholomew to the City of Darns in Mesopotamia, which he had recently founded (circa 507 A.D.). We next find that before the end of the sixth century, a translation had been effected to the Lipari islands (cf. Greg. Turon. De Gloria Martyrum, i. 33). Thence in 809 A.D. the relics were transferred to Beneventum, and finally in 983 A.D. to Rome, where they lie in a tomb beneath the high altar in the church of St. Bartholomew in the island in the Tiber (See Ciampini, De Sacris Aedificiis &c., vol. iii. pp. 58, 60, who refers to a temporary transference of the relics to the Vatican Basilica in consequence of an overflow of the Tiber during the Episcopate of Paul IV.). For these statements we may refer, in addition to the writers cited above, to a panegyric of Theodorus Studita (ob. 826 A.D.), translated into Latin by Anastasius Bibliothecarius, and published in D'Achery's Spicilegium (vol. iii. pp. 13 seqq.); to an oration of a certain Joseph, possibly Joseph Hymnographus, a contemporary of Theodorus Studita (Acta Sanctorum, August, vol. v. pp. 43 seqq.); and to a panegyric of Nicetas Paphlago (Combes, Auct. v. Nov. Patrum, l. p. 392).

It would seem that not before the eighth century did the previously existing festival commemorating the collective body of the Apostles, held upon the day after the feast of St. Peter and St. Paul, develop itself into festivals of individual Apostles; consequently it is in writers of the eighth and ninth centuries that notices are to be looked for of a festival of St. Bartholomew, which would appear to have originated with the Eastern Church (for the notices in Latin writers are later), probably with that of Constantinople. Of this, indeed, the encomiastic orations of Theodorus and Nicetas are evidence, and we further have a direct statement on the part of the latter (§ 2) to the effect that the festival of this Apostle was then annually celebrated.

It will of course follow from what has been said that in the more ancient Sacramentaries (e.g. those of Gelasius and Gregory) in their original form there is no trace of a festival of this Apostle, nor indeed is there in any Latin writer for a considerable time after their date. As to the special day or days on which this festival was held, very great diversity exists in ancient Martyrologies and Calendars:—thus in the Calendar of the Byzantine Church, we find on June 11, "Bartholomew and Barnabas," while on August 25 is the "Translation of Barnabas the Apostle and Titus the Apostle;" the Armenians held the feast on February 25 and December 8, as may be seen in the two Calendars given by Assemani (Hib. Or. vol. iii. part 2, p. 645). The Ethiopic or Abyssinian Church again commemorates St. Bartholomew on November 19 and June 17 (Ludolf pp. 11, 31). In the Arabian Calendar the name occurs several times, sometimes alone, sometimes with the added title martyr, and on November 15 and June 30, with the addition Apostle (Selden, De Synedris Veterum Ebraeorum, bk. iii. c. 15, pp. 228, 243, ed. Amsterdani, 1679). It is explained in the Greek metrical Ephemerides that the one day (June 11) commemorates the martyrdom ἐν Βενετρίαι σταύρωσαν ἑμάρω Βαρθολομαῖον; and the other (August 25), the finding of the relics, ὁδὸν ἴκεν εἰκαδὶ πέμπτη Βαρθολομαίε ἔφευρον—on which latter day several Calendars associate him with Barnabas, e.g. in the Pictorial Moscow Calendar prefixed by Papebroch, together with the preceding, to the Acta Sanctorum for May, vol. i. Cf. Assemani Calendarium Ecclesiae Universae, vol. vi. pp. 420, 541.

The ancient Latin Martyrology which bears the name of St. Jerome follows the Greek in the double announcement, and on June 13 has "In Perside natalis S. Bartholomaei Apostoli;" on August 24, "In India natalis S. Bartholomaei Apostoli" (vol. xi. 463, 472). The later Martyrologies content themselves with a notice on August 24 or 25; for example, those of Bede (Migne, Patr. Lat. xciv. 604), and the amplification of this by Florus (ib. 1015), of Rabanus Maurus (ib. ex. 1144), of Wandelbert (ib. cxii. 608), of Ado (ib. cxliii. 167, 335), and of Usuardus (ib. cxv. 393).

We subjoin the notice of the day as given in the Metrical Martyrology of Wandelbert,

"Bartholomaeus nonam exornat retio-tique leatam,
Indita quo doctore Del cognovit honorem,
Herculis et Raehi insens vix eruta sacristi,
Nunc lium fame est veris pro sorte sepulchri,
Accolium Lipare Benevendi et templa tenne."

With regard to the relative importance of this festival, Binterim (Denkwürdigkeiten, l. 445) refers to Schulting, who gives an extract from an old English Missal which contained a special preface for St. Bartholomew's day, and he adds that before the middle of the tenth century this festival was viewed in England as of considerable importance. It is not certainly known whether the vigil is coeval with the festival; in most Calendars, however, drawn up before the middle of the tenth century the vigil is wanting, while it is marked in later ones.

We have already called attention to the fact that the date of the rise of this festival is such as to preclude its appearance in the ancient Roman Sacramentaries in their original form. In the various later recensions, however, of Gregory's Sacramentary, is a collect, &c., for this day (said first to occur in the Cod. Gemeticensis, of about the year 1000 A.D.) on which the collect of our own prayer book is based. (Migne Patrol. lxxviii. 138.)

The name of Bartholomew has apparently not been a favourite with the writers of pseudonymous literature. Traces, however, of writings bearing his name are not altogether wanting. Thus Jerome (Prolog. in Comm. in S. Matt. init., vol. vii. 17) refers to an apocryphal gospel bearing the name of Bartholomew, doubtless the same condemned by a Council held at Rome in the episcopate of Gelasius, "Evangeliolum nomine Bartholomaei Apostoli apocryphum" (Migne Patrol. lix. 182) and this also may be that referred to by the Pseudo-Dionysius Areopagita, Ὁὐκ ᾄδω δὲ θεῖος Βαρθολομαῖός ἦναι, καὶ πολλὰν τὴν θεολογίαν εἶναι καὶ ἐλαχίστην καὶ τὸ εὐαγγέλιον πλατὸν καὶ μύγα, καὶ ἀδὴς συντεταμένον (Mystica Theologia, c. 1 § 3). Finally, in the Apostolic Constitutions (lib. viii. c. 19, 20) is given under the name of the Apostle Bartholomew the regulation as to the appointment of Deaconesses. [R. S.]

Art. BASILICA.]

BASILICA (sc. aula, aedes). This word in its classical acceptation signifies a hall suited for or employed as a court of justice or a place of meeting. Such buildings, often of great size and splendour, existed in every Roman city; they were usually oblong in plan, sometimes with, sometimes without ranges of columns dividing the space into a nave and aisles; at one end was usually a semi-circular apse (v. Dict. of Greek and Roman Antiq., Art. "Basilius"; Bunsen, Die Basiliken des Christ. Roms). When Christianity became the religion of the state, these buildings were found to be so well adapted to the celebration of public worship that some were by some slight modifications fitted and used for this purpose, and the new buildings constructed expressly to serve as churches were built almost universally on the same model. Hence basilica came to be used in the sense of church by the writers of the fourth and later centuries without any regard for the form or size of the building.
Earlier writers use "dominicum" in Latin, or κοινωβιον in Greek, and some other names [CHRUCH]. Eusebius, in his account of the church built by Constantine at Jerusalem, calls
it βασιλειος ναος, and the nave βασιλειος κλιμα. The use of the word "basilica" as meaning a church seems to have arisen gradually, for the anonymous pilgrim who, in 333,
wrote an itinerary from Bordeaux to Jerusalem,
when he says that a "basilica" had been built
: the Holy Sepulchre by Constantine, adds the explanation, "id est dominicum." Mabillon (Op. posthum., t. ii. p. 355) says that it has been satisfactorily shown that in the writings of authors who wrote in Gaul in the 6th and 7th centuries "basilica" is to be understood as meaning the church of a convent, cathedral and parish churches being called "ecclesiae;" the writers of other countries do not observe this distinction.

Seven churches at Rome—S. Pietro in Vati-cano, S. Giovanni Laterano, Sta. Maria Maggiore, Sta. Croce in Gerusalemme, S. Paolo fuor le Mura, S. Lorenzo in Agro Verano, and S. Sebastianiano—aro styled basilicas by pre-eminence and enjoy certain honorific privileges.

Basilica is used by St. Paulinus (Epist. xii. ad Severum) and by Avitus Viennensis (Epist. vi.)
for a chapel or oratory.

The word basilica is found in the Salic Law
(tit. 58, c. 3, 4, and 5) in the sense of a monument erected over a tomb, apparently, the tomb of a person of high rank. With the Franks they appear to have been constructed of wood, as mention is made of their being burnt. Clampini has engraved (Vat. Mon., t. i. tab. xlv.) two monuments which in his time existed in the portico of S. Lorenzo in Agro Verano at Rome, which he conceives to have been basilicae or basiliculae.

One may be described as a model of a temple with four pilasters on each side, and without a cella. It has a somewhat elegant and almost classical character. The other would seem to have been only the lower part of a monument;
it has three fluted pilasters in front, with an open space behind them. These pilasters carry a base of many mouldings of somewhat classical character, upon which rest the bases of two plain pilasters. Clampini gives no hint as to the date of these monuments.

Tombstones of very early date may be found,
in which the top is ridged like the roof of a house and carved with an imitation of tiles or shingles; one (engraved in Fustroke's Encycl.
of Antiq., vi. 1, p. 132) at Dewsbury, in Yorkshire, may be as early as the 7th or 8th century.
Tombs in the form of chapels of early date still remain in Ireland (Petric, Round Towers and Architecture of Ireland, p. 454), and did exist at Iona, and probably at Glastonbury and elsewhere, such structures are no doubt instances of what the Salic Law calls "basilicane" [TOMBS].

The word basilica is used in the Vulgate (e. g.
2 Chron. vi. 13) for the court of the Temple;
hence Christian writers occasionally use the expression "basilica ecclesiae," as equivalent (seemingly) to the ΑΝΑΤΟΜ or fore-court of a church. (Blaterim's Denkwürdigkeiten, iv. i.
24.) [A. N.]

BATH. Baths in the earlier Christian centuries were in such frequent use, that they were almost necessary adjuncts to houses of a superior class. Moreover, a practice existed that cate-chumens should bathe before baptism, and priests
on the eve of certain festivals and other occasions. We therefore find that bathe, Αεωρα, are mentioned among the adjuncts of the Church of the Twelve Apostles, built by Constantine at Constantinople (Euseb., Vit. Const., l. iv. c. 59). They are also mentioned in the Codex Theod., b. ix. tit. 4, among the buildings and places included within the precincts of churches.

The anonymous pilgrim of Bordeaux, who was at Jerusalem c. A. D. 333, says that a "balneum" was placed behind the basilica, built by Constantine over the Sepulchre of our Lord, but as he adds the words "ubi infantes lavantur," it is probable that he speaks of a baptistery, or of the piscina of a baptistery.

The Lit. Pontif. frequently mentions baths in connexion with churches. Pope Hilarius (A. D. 401-437), we are told, built the "balneum" of St. Stephen, and in the life of Pope Hadrian I. (772-785) mention is made of a bath at the Lateran palace, and of another near St. Peter's; at this last we are told the poor who came to receive alms at Easter were accustomed to bathe. Sometimes these baths were made sources of profit, as Pope Damasus (A. D. 367-385) is stated to have built or given a bath near the "titulus," S. Lorenzo in Damaso (which he had created), which bath yielded 27 solidi. Martigny (Dict. des Antiq. Chret.) mentions other instances of bishops, —as St. Victor of Ravenna, in the 6th century, and Anastasius II. of Pavia—who erected or adorned baths for the clergy; and in the 7th, of St. Aguelius of Naples, who made an ordinance obliging the priests under his authority to bathe on certain days, and made a foundation to furnish them with soap at Christmas and Easter. Certain hot baths at Pozzuoli he states are still known as "tons episcopi."

In an enclosure near the apex of the ruined church of S. Stefano, in Via Latina, near Rome, discovered in the year 1858, is a small reservoir (v. woodcut under CHURCH), which has been considered to have been a bath. It seems, however, possible that it may have been the piscina of a baptistery, or, if the area in which it stands was the atrium of the church, the place of the fountain or cantharus.

[A. N.]

BATHING. The common use of baths throughout the Roman Empire presented to Christian converts a special difficulty and danger. The habits of the time had given a marked preference to the thermae or hot-air baths such as we now know as "Turkish," and neither these nor the balneae (swimming or plunge baths) were to be had in their own houses. To give these up was to sacrifice comfort, and, it might be, health, and yet to go to them was in many cases to run the risk of moral contamination. The feeling of the older Romans, which hindered even a grown-up son from bathing with his father (Cic. De Off. l. 35; Valer. Max. ii. 17), had died out, and in the thermae of all large cities were to be found crowds of men and boys, frequently of women also, sitting naked in the tepidarium or Laconicum. It lies in the nature of things that in a society corrupt as was that of the Empire, this, even without the last-named enormity, must have brought with it many evils, foul speech and foul acts. It might have seemed at first, as if those who were seeking to lead a purer life would have had to renounce the habit altogether, as they renounced the obscenities of the mimes, and the ferocities of gladiatorial shows.

It is noticeable, however, that the rigorism of early Christian life never reached this point. Doubtless, in every city, there were establishments of different grades, and the Christian could choose those which were conducted with greater decency. Probably, too, before long, as the employment was not a forbidden one, Christians would be found to enter on it and reform its evils. The public baths at Rome which were established by emperors or placed under magisterial control, were free from the grosser evils of the mixture of the two sexes; and it is recorded to the honour of many of the emperors who were, more or less, under the influence of a higher culture, that they sought to check them. Hadrian (Spartianus, p. 25), Antoninus Pius (Julius Capit. p. 90), Alexander Severus (Lamprid. c. 42), are all named as having taken steps to put down the lavaria mixta, which were so flagrant an outrage on all natural decency. As it is, though the practice, like most others in the common routine of life, is but little noticed unless where its accompaniment calls for censure, we find traces enough to show that the most devout Christians did not think it necessary to abstain from the public bath. It was in the "baths" of Ephesus that St. John encountered Cerinthus (Euseb. H. E. iii. 38). Tertullian, with all his austerity, acknowledged that bathing was necessary for health, and that he practised it himself (Apol. c. xlii.). Clement of Alexandria (Pedag. iii. c. 9), lays down rules, half medical and half moral, for its use. It formed part of the complaints of the Christians of Lugdunum and Vienna, and was mentioned by them as the first sign of the change for the worse in their treatment, that they were excluded from the public baths (Euseb. H. E. v. 1). Augustine narrates how on his mother's death, led by the popularly accepted etymology of βαλανεῖον (as if from βαλλειν δαίριον) he had gone to the thermae to assuage his sorrow, and found it fruitless ("neque enim exsolvit de corde meo mororis amaritudo." Confess. ix. 32). The old evils, however, in spite of the reforming Empire, continued to prevail, probably in worse forms in the provinces than in the capital. Epiphanius mentions λοιπά ἀπόβρυγα as common among the Jews of his time (Haer. 30). Clement describes the mixture of the sexes as occurring in the daily life of Alexandria (Pedag. iii. 5); Cyprinus as in that of Carthage (de Cult. Virg. p. 73); Ambrose as in that of Milan (de Off. l. 18); and both plead against it with an earnestness which shows that it was a danger for Christians as well as heathens. Even those whose sense of shame led them to avoid the more public exposure, submitted to the gaze and the cares of male attendants (Clem. Al. l. c.). It is even more startling to find that it was necessary, after the conversion of the Empire, to forbid, under pain of deposition, the clergy of all orders from frequenting baths where the sexes were thus mingled (C. Laod. c. 30; C. Trull. c. 77). Offending laymen were in like manner to come under sentence of excommunication. Gradually the better feeling prevailed, and the lavaria mixta fell into a disrepute like that of houses of ill fame. It was reckoned a justifiable cause of divorce for a wife to have been seen in one (Coul. Justin. V. tit. 17 de Repud.).

Another aspect of the practice remains to be noticed. Traces meet us here and there of a distinctly liturgical use of bathing, analogous to the

BELL, BOOK, AND CANDLE. [EX-COMMUNICATION.]

BELLS. I. Names of Bells.—The name campanum or campana is commonly said to have been given to bells, because they were invented by Paulinus of Nola in Campania. Paulinus, however, who more than once describes churches, never mentions bells, and the more probable supposition is, that bells in early times were cast from Campanian brass, which Pliny (Nat. Hist. xxxiv. 8) describes as the best for such a purpose, and so received the name campana or campanum. The word nola can scarcely be derived from the city Nola, and is perhaps imitative of the sound, like the English "knoll."

The word which we have in the form clock (compare Irish clog, French cloche, Germ. glocke) was adopted in later Latin, both in the neuter form cloccum (Vita S. Bonifacii, in Act. Sancti June, tom. i. p. 472) and the feminine clocca (Bonifacii Epist. 9 et 75); the latter is the usual form. The "Anonymus Thuanus," quoted by Binterim (Denkwürd. iv. 1. 290) gives the form cloqua for a turret-bell (cloquam turris).

Signum (Ital. segno, old French scint, whence tocsin) is the most usual word for a church-bell from the 6th century. In some cases it appears to designate not a bell, but some other kind of semitron. (Ducange's Glossary, s. v.; Rosweyde, Vitae Patrum, (monast. s. v. p. 1056).)

Small bells, such as were rung by hand in the refectories of monasteries, were called tintinnabula; and the still smaller bells which were sometimes appended to priestly vestments, were designated tinniola, from their tinkling sound. (Ducange, s. v.) Tintinnum seems to have been sometimes used for a larger bell (see Tatwin, quoted below).

The word skella, skilla, scilla, squilla, or esquilla (Ital. squilla, Germ. schelle) is also used for a small bell: see below. In the Tabularium of St. Remi (quoted by Ducange) a "schilla de metallo" is mentioned as well as "signum ferreum."

Other designations occasionally found are aes, aeramentum, lebes, muta, κόδων.

II. Use of Bells.—For the purpose of announcing meetings of Christians in times of persecution a messenger was employed [CURSOR]; in quiet times future services were announced by a deacon in time of divine worship; in some parts of Africa a TRUMPET seems to have been employed to call the people to their assemblies.

After the time of Constantine some sonorous instrument, whether a clapper [SEMITRON] or a bell, seems to have been generally employed to give notice of the commencement of Christian assemblies. The word "signum" in Latin writers is probably used to designate both these instruments, and it is not always easy to say which is intended. Gregory of Tours (Hist. Franc. ii. 23, p. 73) mentions a "signum" as calling monks to matins; in the time of Sidonius Apollinaris; and elsewhere (De Mirac. S. Martini, ii. 45, p. 1068) he mentions the "signum" (signum quod commoveri solet) as if it were something swung like a bell. So Venantius Fortunatus (Carm. ii. 10) speaks of the "signum" of the principal church in Paris calling to prayer. St. Columba is said, in the life by Cuminus Albus (Acta SS. Junii, tom. ii. p. 188, c. 10), to have gone into the church when the bell rang (pulsante campana) at midnight; and Bede (Hist. Eccl. iv. 23) mentions that at St. Hilda's death, one of her nuns at a distance from Whitby heard suddenly the well-known sound of the bell which roused or called them to prayer when she departed from this world. These testimonies seem to show that bells of considerable size were used in England, at least in convents, as early as the 6th century. Tatwin, archbishop of Canterbury (731-734) in some verses "De Tintinno" (Hook's Archbishops, i. 206) speaks of a bell "superis suspensus in auris" hastening the steps of the crowd. The Excerptiones attributed to Egbert (canon ii.), enjoin "ut omnes sacerdotes horis competentibus diei et noctis sursum sonent ecclesiarum signa."

St. Sturm when dying (an. 779) ordered all the bells (glogus) of his convent to be rung (Eigil's Vita S. Sturmii, c. 25, in Migne's Patrol. cv. 443).

In Gaul we have already seen that "signa" were used as early as the 6th century. At a later period, Flodoard (Hist. Remens. ii. 12) tells us of the miraculous silence of two of the bells of a Gascon church in which St. Rigobert (†749) was praying. We cannot, of course, insist upon all the details of this narrative as if they were literally true, but the account shows at any rate that Flodoard (about 950) took for granted that in the 8th century the great churches in the Gascon territory had many bells, which were rung at certain hours; and that even country churches had more than one, for the two silent bells had been stolen from a country church; moreover, the bells must have been of considerable size, for the narrator speaks expressly of their loud sound (his altisono reboantibus). It is worth observing, too, that he uses the words campanae, noctae, and signa as precisely synonymous.

By the time of Charles the Great, in fact, the use of church-bells seems to have become common in the empire. Charles encouraged the art or bell-founding, and entertained bell-founders at his court. Among the most famous of these was Tancho, a monk of St. Gall, who cast a fine bell for the great church at Aachen. (The Monk of St. Gall De Gestis Caroli, i. 31.) He asked for 100 pounds of silver as alloy for the copper, from which we infer that the bell may have weighed 400 or 500 pounds.

Bells appear to have been held in especial regard by the Irish ecclesiastics of the fifth and succeeding centuries. Their bells seem to have been chiefly hand-bells; but Dr. Petrie (Round Towers of Ireland, p. 383) says that "it is perfectly certain that bells of a size much too large for altar-bells were abundantly distributed by St. Patrick in Ireland, as appears from his oldest lives." Sinall of Cill Airis, in the tripartite life of St. Patrick supposed to have been originally written in the 6th century, is called campanarius. Hand-bells are preserved, which are attributed to Irish Saints or ecclesiastics from the 5th century downwards. They seem to have been reckoned among the most necessary insignia of a bishop: thus in the annotations of Tirechan, in the Book of Armagh, we are told that Patrick conferred on Fiac the degree of a bishop and gave him a box or satchel containing a bell, a "monaster" (i. e. a reliquary), a crozier, and a "polaire" or ornamental case for a book (Petrie, p. 338). The earliest of these bells and the most highly venerated is that known as the 'Clog-an-eadhachta Phatraic,'—the bell of the will of Patrick,—given to the church of Armagh by St. Columba; this is of quadrangular form, of thick sheet iron, six inches high, five inches by four at the mouth and diminishing upwards, with a loop at the top for the hand (v. woodcut). It is kept in a splendidly ornamented case, made for it between A.D. 1091 and 1105.

Many other such bells are in existence, as the bell of St. Gall, in the Treasury of the church of St. Gall in Switzerland; the bell of St. Mogue (d. A.D. 824), in possession of the Primate of Ireland, &c.

In the 9th century, according to Dr. Petrie (Round Towers of Ireland, p. 252), the quadrangular form which is found in all the early bells began to give way to the circular. The early bells are usually of iron, but one of bronze in the collection of the Royal Irish Academy, which has been ascribed to St. Patrick, in consequence of its being inscribed with the name "Patrici," is of bronze, as are some others.

In the East, church-bells were of later introduction. No mention of them in the East appears to occur until Orso, duke of Venice, towards the end of the 9th century, gave twelve large bells of brass to Michael (or Basil) the Greek emperor, who added a bell-tower to the church of St. Sophia at Constantinople for their re-ception. (Baronius, in Augusti's Handbuch, i. 402.)

We gather from the above examples that from the 6th century at least bells were used in the West, first in convents, afterwards in churches generally, to summon worshippers to the various services, and to give notice to the faithful of the passing away of one of the brotherhood. Details of the manner of making and hanging these bells are altogether wanting.

Besides these uses, we find that bells were anciently used by the Western Church in processions. For instance, the rubric of the Mozarabic Missal (p. 106, ed. Lesley) directs that a boy ringing a hand-bell (esquillum) should precede the procession which bears the Eucharist to the Sepulchre on Maundy Thursday.

Another ecclesiastical use of small bells is the following—Benedict of Aniane (see his Life by Ardo, c. 8, in Acta SS., Febr. tom. ii. p. 612) ordered a spuilla to be rung in the monk's dormitory before the signum of the church rang for the nocturnal "Hours."

It is generally agreed, that there is no trace within our period of the practice of ringing either a small bell or the great bell of the church at the elevation of the Host. The ancient Irish hand-bells may probably have been used in processions, or in monasteries for such uses as those described above.

The belief that the ringing of bells, whether the great bells of a church or hand-bells, tended to dispel storms is of considerable antiquity. The origin of this belief is traced by hagiographers to St. Salaberga, who lived in the beginning of the 7th century. The story is, that a small bell attached to the neck of a stag, was brought from heaven to St. Salaberga, for the relief of her daughter Anstrudis, who was terrified at thunder. This belief is expressed in the lines

"Belliquæ sanctæ Salabergæ et campana prærens Expellunt febris et ipsa tonitrua pellit."

See Mabillon's Acta SS. Bened. sæc. ii. p. 414; Bollandist Acta SS. Sept. tom. vi. p. 517. This supposed property of dispelling storms is alluded to in the services for the benediction or "baptism" of bells.

III. Benediction of Bells.—It is probable that from the time that bells first became part of the furniture of a church, they were subjected, like other church-furniture and ornaments, to some kind of consecration. Forms for the benediction of a church-bell (Ad signum ecclesie benedictionum) are four in the Reims and the Corbeil MSS. of the Gregorian Sacramentary (Sacram. Greg. ed. Ménard, p. 438) to the following effect. After the benediction of the water to be used in the ceremony, Psalms 145-150 (Vulg.), were chanted; meantime the bell was washed with the holy-water, and touched with oil and salt, by the officiating bishop, who said at the same time the prayer, beginning, "Deus, qui per Moysen legiferum tubas argenteas fieri præcepisti;" the bell was then wiped with a napkin, and the Antiphon followed, "Vox Domini super aquas" (Ps. xxix. 3, Vulg.); the bell was then touched with christ seven times outside and four times inside, while the prayer was said, "Omnipotens sempiternus Deus, qui ante arcam Foederis, &c.;" it was then fumigated with incense within and without, and "Viderunt te aquae" (Ps. lxxvi. 16) was chanted; the service concluded with the collect "Omnipotens Dominator Christe, quo secundum assumptionem carnis dormiente in navi," &c. Both the verses and the prayer allude to the supposed power of the bell to calm storms.

The office Ad signum ecclesie benedictionum given in Egbert's Pontifical (pp. 177 ff. ed. Surtees Society, 1853) differs in no essential point from the Gregorian.

The custom of engraving a name upon a bell is said by Baronius (Annales, an. 901, c. 93) to have originated with Pope John XIII., who consecrated a bell and gave it the name John. This will probably be accepted as sufficient testimony to the fact, that the custom of engraving a name on a bell, in connexion with the ceremony of consecration, did not arise in Italy before the 10th century. It is, of course, possible that in other countries, as in Ireland, it may be of earlier date; or the names engraved on some ancient Irish bells may simply indicate ownership.

In Charles the Great's capitulary of the year 789, c. 18, the words occur, "Ut clocean non baptizentur." As it is almost certain that some kind of dedication-rite for church-bells was practised continuously through the period, we must either conclude that some particular practice in the matter—it is impossible to determine what—is here condemned or that the ding the old English, and Monastic uses, among the psalms of lauds, on Sundays and festivals, immediately before Ps. cxviii., cxlix., cl. It usually has an antiphon of its own, though in some uses the psalms at lauds are all said under one antiphon. The antiphonal clause, "Laudate et superexaltate eum in secula," is only said after the first and last verses. Gloria Patri is not said after it, as after other canticles, but in its place the verses—

Benedicamus Patri et Filium cum Spiritu Sancto:
laudemus et superexaltamus eum in secula.
Benedictus es, Domine, in firmamento cael: et laudabitis et gloriosus et superexaltatus in secula.

In the Ambrosian lauds for Sundays and festivals, Benedicite occurs with an antiphon varying with the day, and preceded by a collect [Oratio secreta] which varies only on Christmas Day and the Epiphany. During the octave of Easter *Halt-hjalt is said after each verse.

Benedicite also occurs in the private thanksgiving of the priest after mass; in the Roman office in full; in the Sarum the last few verses only.

In the Mozarabic breviary this canticle is found in the lauds for Sundays and festivals in a somewhat different form, with a special antiphon, and is called Benedictus. It begins at v. 29; the antiphonal clause is omitted altogether till the end; and the opening words of the Benedicite proper, "Benedicite omnia opera Domini Domino," are never repeated after their first occurrence.

In the offices of the Greek Church this canticle is the eighth of the nine "Odes" appointed at lauds. The antiphonal clause is said after every verse, and a supplementary verse is added at the end, "εὐλογεῖτε Ἀράστολο, Προφήτα, καὶ Μάρτυρες Κυρίου, τὸν Κύριον κ.τ.λ. This canticle is sometimes called (e.g. by St. Benedict and by St. Fructuosus Archb. of Bragas, † 665) from the nature of its contents the Benedictio, in the same way as the last three psalms of the Psalter are known as the Laudes. [H. J. H.]

BENEDICTA, religious woman, martyr at Rome under Julian, commemorated January 4 (Hart. Rom. Vet.).

[C.]
BENEDICTINE RULE AND ORDER, founded by St. Benedictus of Nursia, born A.D. 480, and died probably 542. [See Dict. of Chr. Biogr. s. v.] Even before the institution of the Benedictine Rule, monasticism was widely established in Southern and Western Europe, and the herds which overran the prostrate Roman Empire. But there was as yet neither uniformity nor permanency of rule (Mab. Act. O. S. B. Praef.). In the words of Cassian, which seem to apply to Occidental as well as Oriental monachism, there were as many rules as there were monasteries (Instit. ii. 2). In Italy, always easily accessible to Greek influences, the Rule of Basil, which had been translated into Latin by Rufinus (Praef. Reg. Bas.), was the favourite; in Southern Gaul, and in Spain, that of Cassian, or rather of Macrobius; and as the Rule of Benedict worked its way into the North-west of Europe, it was confronted by the rival system of Columbanus (Pellic. Polit. Ecc. Chr. i. iii. 1, § 4;

* So spelt in the Ambrosian books.

Mab. Ann. Praef.). Like Aaron's rod, in the quaint language of the Middle Ages, it soon swallowed up the other rules. But, in fact, there was often a great diversity of practice, even among those professing to follow the same Rule, often a medley of different rules within the same walls (Mab. Ann. Praef.), and a succession of new rules in successive years (Mab. Ann. i. 29). The Columbanists, for instance, were not, strictly speaking, a separate order (Mab. Ann. Praef.). The Benedictines may fairly be regarded as the first in order of time, as well as in importance, of the monastic orders.

The Benedictine Rule gave stability to what had hitherto been fluctuating and incoherent (Mab. Ann. Praef.). The hermit-life had been essentially individualistic, and the monastic communities of Egypt and the East had been an aggregation, on however large a scale, of units, rather than a compact and living organization, as of "many members in one body." Benedict seems to have felt keenly the need of a firm hand to control and regulate the manifold impulses, of one sort and another, which moved men to retire from the world. Apparently there was a good deal of laxity and disorder among the monks of his day. He is very severe against the petty fraternities of the Sarabaitae, monks dwelling two or three together in a "cell," or small monastery, without any one at their head, and still more against the "Gyrovagi" monks, who led a desultory and unruly life, roving from one monastery to another. Unlike his Eastern predecessors, who looked up to utter solitude as the summit of earthly excellence, Benedict, as if in later life regretting the excessive austerities of his youth, makes no mention at all of either hermits or anchorites (Prolog. Reg. S. B.). Anything like anarchy offended his sense of order and congruity; and, with his love of organizing, he was the man to supply what he felt to be wanting.

Accordingly, in Benedict's system the vow of self-addiction to the monastery became more stringent, and its obligation more lasting. Hitherto, it had been rather the expression of a resolution or of a purpose, than a solemn vow of perpetual perseverance (Aug. Ep. ad Mon. 109, p. 587; Aug. Rett. c. Joinian. ii. 22; Hieron. Ep. 48; Cass. Inst. x. 23). But by the Rule (c. 58) the vow was to be made with all possible solemnity, in the chapel, before the relics in the shrine, with the abbat and all the brethren standing by; and once made it was to be irrevocable—"Vestigia nulla retrorsum." The postulant for admission into the monastery had to deposit the memorial of his compact on the altar; and from that day to retrace his steps was morally impossible. The Rule contemplates indeed the possibility of a monk retrograding from his promise, and re-entering the world which he had renounced, but only as an act of apostasy, committed at the instigation of the devil (c. 58). Previously, if a monk married, he was censured and sentenced to a penance (Basil. Respons. 36; Leo, Ep. 90, ad Rustic. c. 12; Epiphani. Hier. lxi. 7; Hieron. Ep. ad Dem. 97 (8); Aug. de Bon. Vid. c. 10; Gelas. Ep. 5, ad Eysic. Luun. ap. Grat. Caus. xxvii.; Quest. i. c. 14; Conc. Aurd. i. c. 23); but the marriage was not annulled as invalid. After the promulgation of the Rule, far heavier penalties were enacted.

The monk, who had broken his vow by marrying, was to be excommunicated, was to be compelled to separate from his wife, and might be forcibly reclaimed by his monastery: if a priest, he was to be degraded (Greg. M. Ep. l. 33, 40, vii. 9, xii. 20, ap. Gr. Grat. xviii.; Qu. l. c. 15; Conc. Turon. ll. c. 15). These severities were no part of Benedict's comparatively mild and lenient code; but they testify to his having introduced a much stricter estimation of the monastic vow.

At the same time, as with a view to guard against this danger of relapse, Benedict wisely surrounded admission into his order with difficulties. He provided a year's novitiate, which was prolonged to two years in the next century (Greg. M. Ep. x. 24); and thrice, at certain intervals, during this year of probation, the novice was to have the Rule read over to him, that he might weigh well what he was undertaking, and that his assent might be deliberate and unwavering (c. 58). The written petition for admission was required invariably (c. 58). None were to be received from other monasteries, without letters commendatory from their abbat (c. 61); nor children without the consent of parents or guardians, nor unless formally disinherited (c. 59). Eighteen years of age was subsequently fixed as the earliest age for self-dedication. The gates of the monastery moved as slowly on their hinges at the knock of postulants for admission, as they were inexorably closed upon him when once within the walls (cf. Fleury, Hist. Ecc. xxxv. 19—note by Bened. Editor; Aug. Vinlel. 1768).

Benedict had evidently the same object before his eyes, the consolidation of the fabric which he was erecting, in the form of government which he devised for his order. This was a monarchy, and one nearer to despotism than to what is called a "constitutional monarchy." Poverty, humility, chastity, temperance, all these had been essential elements in the monastic life from the first. Benedict, although he did not introduce the principle of obedience, made it more precise and more implicit (cc. 2, 3, 27, 64; cf. Mab. Ann. iii. 8); stereotyped it by regulations extending even to the demeanour and deportment due from the younger to the elder (cc. 7, 63); and crowned the edifice with an abbat, irresponsible to his subjects. Strict obedience was exacted from the younger monks, towards all their superiors in the monastery (cc. 68-71); but the abbat was to be absolute over all (c. 3). He alone is called Dominus in the Rule; though the word in its later form, Dominus, became common to all Benedictines (c. 63). The monks had the right of electing him, without regard to seniority. Supposing a flagrantly scandalous election to be made, the bishop of the diocese, or the neighbouring abbats, or even the "Christians of the neighbourhood," might interfere to have it cancelled; but once duly elected his will was to be supreme (c. 64). He was indeed to convocate a council of the brethren, when necessary: on any important occasions, of them all; otherwise, only of the seniors; but in every case the final and irrevocable decision, from which there was no appeal, rested with him (c. 3). He was to have the appointment of the prior, or provost (c. 65; cf. Greg. M. Ep. vii. 10), and of the deacons or deans, as well as the power of deposing them (c. 21);* the prior after four, the deans after three warnings (c. 65). Benedict was evidently distrustful of any collision of authority, or want of perfect harmony, between the abbat and his prior; and preferred deans, as more completely subordinate (c. 65); for, while the abbat held his office for life, the deans as well as all the other officers of the monastery, except the prior, held theirs for only a certain time (cc. 21, 31, 32). Even the cellerarius, or cellarius, the steward, who ranked next to the abbat in secular things, as the prior in things spiritual, was to be appointed for one, four, or ten years; the tool-keepers, robe-keepers, &c., only for one. The abbat was armed with power to enforce his authority on the recalcitrant, after two admonitions in private and one in public, by the "lesser excommunication," or banishment from the common table and from officiating in the chapel; by the "greater excommunication," or deprivation of the rites of the Church; by flogging, by imprisonment, and other bodily penances (cc. 2, 23-29; cf. Mart. de Ant. Mon. Lit. ii. 11) in case of hardened offenders; and, as an extreme penalty, by expulsion from the society. Benedict, however, with characteristic clemency, expressly cautions the abbat to deal tenderly with offenders (c. 27); allowing readmission for penitents into the monastery, even after relapses; and, as though aware how much he is entrusting to the abbat's discretion, begins, and almost ends, his Rule with grave and earnest cautions against abusing his authority.

Benedict's constitution was no mere democracy, under the abbat. All ranks and conditions of men were indeed freely admitted, from the highest to the lowest,[†] and on equal terms (c. 51; cf. Aug. de Op. Mon. 22); within the monastery all the distinctions of their previous life vanished; the serf and the noble stood there side by side (c. 2). Thus even a priest, whose claims to precedence, being of a spiritual nature, might have been supposed to stand on a different footing, had to take his place simply by order of seniority among the brethren (c. 60), though he might be allowed by the abbat to take a higher place in the chapel (c. 62), and might, as the lay-brothers, be promoted by him above seniors in standing (c. 63; cf. Fleury, Hist. Ecc. xxxii. 15). Similarly, a monk from another monastery was to have no especial privileges (c. 61). But, with all this levelling of distinctions belonging to the world without, the gradations of rank for the monks as monks were clearly defined. Every brother had his place assigned him in the monastic hierarchy. Such offices as those of the hebdomadarius or weekly cook, of the lector or reader-in-charge in the refectory, were to be held by each in turn, unless by special exemption (cc. 35, 38), and the younger monks were enjoined to address the elder as "nonni," or fathers, in token of affectionate reverence (c. 61). Benedict seems to have had an equal dread of tyranny and of insubordination.

Indeed, the strict obedience exacted by the Rule is tempered throughout by an elastic and considerateness, which contrast strongly with the inflexible rigour of similar institutions.

Like the Evangelic Sermon on the Mount, which he makes his model (Prof. Reg.; cf. c. 4), Benedict often lays down a principle, without shaping it into details. Thus he enjoins silence, as a wholesome discipline, without prescribing the times and places for it, beyond specifying the refectory and the dormitory (c. 6). Like Lycurgus, he wishes to bequeath to his followers a law which shall never be broken (c. 64); and yet, in the closing words of his Rule, he reminds them that the Rule, after all, is imperfect in itself (c. 73). More than once he seems to anticipate the day when his order shall have assumed larger dimensions, and provides for monasteries on a grander scale than existed when he was writing his Rule (cc. 31, 32, 53). Thus, about dress, as if foreseeing the varying requirements of various climes, he leaves a discretionary power to the abbat, affirming merely the unvarying principle that it is to be cheap and homely (c. 55); and that there are to be two dresses, the "scapulare," or sort of cape, for field-work, and the "ocucillus," or hood, for study and prayer (cf. Fleury, Hist. Ecc. xxiii. 16). The colour of the tunic or toga, being left undetermined by the founder, has varied at different times: till the 8th century it was usually white (Mab. Ann. iii.). Nor is there any Procrustean stiffness in the directions about diet. Temperance, in the strictest sense, is laid down as the principle: but the abbat may relax the ordinary rules of quantity and quality (c. 40); more food is ordered whenever there is more work to be done (c. 39); baths for the sick (c. 36), for the young or aged (c. 37), as well as for guests who may chance to be lodging in the monastery (c. 42); and even wine, forbidden by Eastern Asiatics, is allowed, sparingly, by Benedict, as if in concession to the national propensities imported into Italy by the barbarians, and to the colder climate of Northern Europe (c. 40). Even those minuter rules, in which Benedict evinces his love of order, proportion, and clocklike regularity, and which show that Benedict, like Wesley, wished to direct everything, originate almost always in a wise and tender consideration for human weaknesses. The day is mapped out in its round of duties, so that no unoccupied moments may invite temptation (c. 48), but the hours allotted for work, prayer, or rest, vary with the seasons. Benedict seems to take especial delight in arranging how the Psalter is to be read through, ordering certain Psalms on certain holy days; but he leaves it open to his followers to make a better distribution if they can (cc. 15, 18). The first Psalm is to be recited slowly; but this is to give the brethren time to assemble in their oratory. The monk who serves as cook is, during his week of office, to take his meals before the rest (c. 35); the cellarer, or steward, is to have fixed hours for attending to the wants of the brethren, that there may be no vexation or disappointment (c. 31); a list is to be kept by the abbat of all the tools and dresses belonging to the monastery, lest there may be any confusion (c. 32); the monks are to sleep only ten or twelve in the same dormitory, with curtains between the beds, and under the charge of a dean, for the sake of order and propriety (c. 22); the Historical Books of the Old Testament were not to be read the last thing before going to bed, as unodying to weak brethren (c. 42); and, last and not least, no monk is to take the knife, which was part of his monastic equipment, with him to bed, lest he should hurt himself in his sleep (c. 22). But it is, above all, in its treatment of weaker brethren (the "infirmi" or "pusillanimes"), that the Rule breathes a mildness, and what Aristotle would call "εὐτακεία," rare indeed in those days. The abbat is to "love the offender, even while hating the offence;" he is to "beware lest he break the vessel in scouring it;" he is to let "mercy prevail over justice" (c. 64). A whole chapter (c. 43) is devoted to meting out the degrees of correction for monks coming late to chapel or refectory; and, in this unlike Wesley, Benedict expressly discourages the public confession of secret faults, a practice inevitably tending to ungravity and irreverence (c. 46), as well as loud and demonstrative private prayer in the chapel (c. 32). There is something peculiarly characteristic of Benedict's gentle and courteous spirit in his oft-repeated cautions against murmuring on the one hand (cc. 31, 40, 41, 53), and, on the other, against anything like scurrility (cc. 43, 49, &c.).

Compared with Eastern Rules, the Benedictine Rule is an easy yoke (Sev. Sulp. Vit. S. Martini, i. 7; Cass. Instit. i. 11); and this may be attributed partly to the more practical temperament of the West, partly to the exigencies of European climates, partly, too, to the personal character of the lawgiver (cc. 39, 40, 46, &c.). Taking the passage in the Psalms, "Seven times a day will I praise Thee," and another, "At midnight I will rise to give thanks unto Thee," as his mottoes, he portioned out day and night into an almost unceasing round of prayer and praise (c. 16). But whereas his predecessors had ordered the whole of the Psalter to be recited daily, Benedict, though with a sigh of regret for the degeneracy of his age, was content that it should be gone through in the week (c. 18). There is a curious direction, too (c. 20), against lengthy private devotions, especially in chapel after service. In harvest time, or if they were far from home, the monks were to say their devotions in the field, to save the time and trouble of returning to the monastery (c. 50; cf. Mab. Ann. iii. 8). Whatever ascetic austerities were introduced at a later date into some of the reformed Benedictine orders, we find no trace at all in the original Rule of those ingenious varieties of self-torture which had been so common in Egypt and Syria. Benedict shows no love of self-mortification for its own sake; and, while prizing it in moderation as a discipline, makes it subservient to other practical purposes. Thus he orders some more suitable occupation to be allotted to such of the brethren as may be incapacitated in any way from hard work out of doors (c. 48). The diet allowed by the Benedictine Rule would have seemed luxurious to the monks of the East (c. 39, &c.).

But the great distinction of Benedict's Rule was the substitution of study for the comparative uselessness of mere manual labour. Not that his monks were to be less laborious; rather they were to spend more time in work; but their work was to be less servile, of the hand as well as of the hand, beneficial to future ages, not merely furnishing sustenance for the bodily wants of the community, or for almsgiving (cc. 38, 48: cf. Cass. Instit. x. 23; Hier. Ep. ad Eustoch. 18, 22). As if conscious of his innovation Benedict seems to restrict the word "labor," as heretofore, to manual occupations; to these he still devoted the larger part of the day; and his range of literature is a narrow one, specifying by name only the Holy Scriptures and the writings of the Fathers (cc. 9, 48). But, by reserving some portion for study, he implanted the principle, which afterwards bore so glorious fruits in the history of his order, that liberal arts and sciences were to be for them not permitted merely, but sanctioned and encouraged (c. 48). It is a question how far Benedict is indebted for this to Cassiodorus, his contemporary, wrongfully claimed by some zealous Benedictines as one of their order (Mign. Patrol. lxi. 483). But the "Vivarium" which Cassiodorus founded in Calabria seems to have been more like an university, or even the intellectual and artistic Court over which Frederick II. presided in that part of Italy during the 13th century, more genial in its tone and wider in its range of studies (Cassid. de Instit. Div. Litt. cc. 28, 30, 31). Probably Benedict and his more secular contemporary were both alike affected by the same impulses, inherited from the dying literature of Imperial Rome.

A monk's day, according to the Rule, was an alternation of work, manual or mental, and prayer, in the words of the Rule of the "opus Dei or divinum officium" and "labor et lectio," with the short intervals necessary for food and rest (cf. Mab. Ann. iii. 8; Fleury, Hist. Ecc. xxxii. 15 et seq.). In winter the middle of the day, and in summer the morning and evening, were for manual labour; for study the heat of the day in summer, and the dusk and darkness of morning and evening in the short days of winter (cc. 8, 48). After the midday meal in summer, the monk might take his siesta, or a book (c. 48). The seven hours for divine service were those called "canonical;" and the services were—matins (afterwards called lauds) at sunrise (in summer), prima, tierce, sext, nones, vespers, compline, separated each from each by three hours, as well as a midnight service, which was to be held a little before the matins, called in the Rule "nocturnus vigiliæ" (c. 16). On Sundays the monk was to rise earlier and have longer "vigiliæ" (c. 11), and was to substitute reading for manual work (c. 48). Each service was to include a certain number of Psalms, often selected with especial reference to the time of day, as the third for nocturnus, of Canticles, and of lections, or readings from Holy Scripture or the Fathers (c. 8, &c.). On Sundays and holy days all the brethren were to receive the Holy Communion (c. 25). The precise times for the several avocations of the monastic day were to vary with the four seasons, both of the natural and of the Christian year (c. 8, &c.). The work or the book for the time was to be assigned to each at the discretion of the abbat (c. 48). The evening meal was to be taken all the year round before dark (c. 41). As the monk had to rise betimes, so his thoughtful legislator would have him retire early to rest.

Chapters 1-7 in the Rule are on the monastic character generally—obedience, humility, &c.;

8-20 on divine service; 21-30 on dens, and the correction of offenders; 31-41 on the cellarer and his department, especially the refectory; 42-52 are chiefly on points relating either to the oratory or to labour: the remaining twenty-one rules hardly admit of classification, being miscellaneous and supplementary to those preceding.

On the whole, the Benedictine Rule, as a Rule for Monks, must be pronounced, by all who view it dispassionately, well worthy of the high praise which it has received, not from monks only, but from statesmen and others. "First and foremost in discretion, and clear in style," is the appropriate comment on it of Gregory the Great (Diad. ii. 36). In the 7th century the observance of it was enjoined on all monks, by the Council of Angostonnum (c. 15), and by Lewis the Pious (Exh. ad Epi. Abb. Pult. ap. Migne, Præf. Reg.). It is commonly entitled in councils "the holy Rule" (Migne, Præf. Reg.); and by one held in the 9th century it is directly attributed to the inspiration of the Holy Spirit (Conc. Inzaco. ii.). By one writer it is contrasted with previous rules as the teaching of Christ with that of Moses (Gaufr.-Abb. Vincoen. Sermo de S. B. ap. Migne, Præf. Reg.). It was a favourite alike with Thomas Aquinas, as a manual of morality, and with the politic Cosmo de' Medici, as a manual for rulers (Alb. Butler, Lives of the Saints, s. voce; cf. Guéranger, Enchirid. Bened. Præf.). Granted the very questionable position, that the life of a monk, with its abdication of social and domestic duties, is laudable, Benedict's conception of that life, in principle and in detail, is almost unexceptionable. His monks are indeed treated throughout as simply children of an older growth: they may not even walk abroad (c. 67); nor, if sent outside the precincts, may they stop anywhere to eat, without the abbat's leave (c. 51); nor may they even receive letters from home (c. 51). The prescribed washing of strangers' feet (c. 53), and the very strict prohibition against a monk having anything, however trifling, of any sort to call his own, are all part of this extension into maturer years of a discipline proper for children. But, if treated as children, the followers of Benedict were at any rate under a wise and sympathising Master; and the school where they were to be trained in humility and obedience was not one of needless and vexatious mortifications. Order, proportion, regularity, these are the characteristics of the Rule; with an especial tenderness for the "weaker brethren." As in all monastic institutions, self-love seems to force its way through all the barriers heaped around it; tingeing even the holiest actions with a mercenariness of intention (Prot. &c.). Thus the motive proposed for writing sedulously on the sick is the reward which may be won by so doing (c. 37). But the Rule appeals also, though less expressly, to higher motives than the fear of punishment or the hope of recompense—to the love of God and of man (e. g. P. of.). It cannot be said of Benedict's Rule, as of solitary asceticism, that self is the circumference as well as the centre of the circle. The relations of the brethren to their father, and to one another, tend, in the Rule, to check that isolation of the heart from human sympathies which is the basis of monasticism. thing like the ties of family is duly recognised within the order, hallowing even the trivial details of daily life. The monastery is the "House of God," and even its commonest utensils are made either any merit in keeping the divine law, or any power to do so without help from heaven (Prof.).

In style the Rule is clear and concise; largely interspersed with apposite quotations from the Scriptures, especially the Psalms. But its Latinity is very unclassical, not only in syntax, but in single words (e. g. odire for odisse, c. 4; solutium, for "helper," cc. 31, 35; lupus for "arrogance" or "circumlocution," c. 31). In this respect the Rule contrasts unfavourably with Cassian's comparatively accurate and polished style. The text may have been corrupted; but there seems to have been a serious deterioration in Latin literature during the 5th century.

With the lapse of time, the right meaning of many passages in the Rule gave rise to violent controversies. Its very brevity and conciseness were themselves the occasion of an uncertainty, frequently enhanced by the changes of meaning which the same word often undergoes in successive periods. Whether such phrases as "Commenio" and "Missa" are to be taken in their more technical and ritualistic sense, or merely for "charity" and the "termination of divine service;" whether "excommunicatio" means the greater or the lesser sentence of deprivation (cc. 24, 25); whether "clerici" (c. 62) means deacons only, or priests as well; all these have been questions with commentators and reformers. "Matutini" in the Rule is said to correspond with the service afterwards known as "Laudes;" and "Laudes" in the Rule to mean the three last Psalms, all commencing "Laudate" (Fleury, Hist. Ecc. xxiii. 15). "Prior" seems in one place (c. 63), where the younger brethren are ordered to salute the "priors," to mean merely older, at least in precedence; while in another place (c. 68), which treats of obedience, it seems to mean those in office. There is some ambiguity about the several articles of dress prescribed (c. 55); and still more about the diet. "Mixture" (c. 38) is supposed by some to mean "wine and water," by others "wine and bread;" and it is a vexed question, whether eggs and fish, birds and fowls, as well as "pulse," are included in the word "pulmentum" (Mart. Comm. in Reg. cc. 38, 55; Mab. Ann. i. 53, xiii. 2, xiv. 46). The enactment that "even a small part" of the brethren may elect the abbat is variously explained, as meaning either a minority, in certain circumstances, or, more probably, "a majority however small" (Comm. in Reg. c. 64); and another provision in the next chapter, that "a council of the brethren" is to take part in electing the prior, is vague both as to the size of the council and the extent of its powers (c. 65). A distinction familiar to Roman Catholic enthusiasts has been drawn by some commentators between the "precepts" and "counsels" in the opening words of the Prologue to the Rule; and, however that may be, the opinion has prevailed that the spirit rather than the letter of the Rule is to be observed, and that it is not strictly obligatory in its lesser details (note by Ed. on Fleury, Hist. Ecc. xiii. 12, Ang. Vind. 1768; cf. Bern. de Praec. et Dispens., Patrol. clix. ii.; Petr. Clun. Epp. i. 28, lv. 17, Patrol. clxxxix.; Hospi. de Monachatu, pp. 132-134). But the hottest dispute has been on the permissibility of secular studies for the brethren. In the 17th century Mabillon and others argued against their Trappist opponents, that though not mentioned expressly, these studies are implied and involved in the Rule; that as the order in time came to consist more and more largely of students, and as Latin became to them a dead language, instead of being one with which they were habitually familiar, such pursuits became for them an absolute necessity (Mab. Breve Script. de M. n. Stud. Rat.; cf. Maitland's Dark Ages, 158-171).

The Rule of Benedict soon reigned alone in Europe, absorbing into itself the Rule of Columbanus, which had been dominant in Western Europe (Mab. Ann. Praef. i. 13, v. 11). In Italy it was accepted generally, before the close of the century in which Benedict died (Jann. Diac. Vita Greg. M. iv. 80). It was probably introduced into Gaul during his lifetime by his disciple Maurus, from whom the famous monastery of St. Maur claims its name; and there it soon made its way, its comparative elasticity prevailing over the rigidity of the rival system. Thus Faremoutier transferred itself from the Columban Rule to that of Benedict (A. Butler, Lives of the Saints s. S. Fara). The Council of Anchen in 788 A.D. ordered the Benedictine to be observed, and no other, in the Empire of Karl and his son (Conc. Aquisgran., cf. Conc. Augustod. c. 15). It won Germany early in the 9th century (Conc. Mogunt. c. 11; cf. Pertz Legg. i. 166, c. 11), and Spain in the next century (Mab. Ann. Praef. iv. succ.). It is a question at what date it was introduced into England; whether by Benedict Biscop, by Willulf (Ling. Ang.-Sax. Church, ch. 5), or, as Mabillon and other learned writers have asserted (see in A. Butler's Lives of the Saints, under Benedict), by Augustine, importing it from the monastery of S. Andrea on the Caelian hill, under the auspices of Gregory. A lax Rule probably prevailed till the time of Dunstan (see Marsham's Praef. 747 A.D.). [v. BENEDICTUS, in Viet. Chr. Biog.] In the 10th century the Benedictine Rule held almost universal sway in Europe (Pellie. Polit. Ecc. Chr. i. iii. 1, § 4), and wherever it penetrated it was the pioneer not of Christianity influences. For their labours in clearing forests and draining swamps, in setting an example of good husbandry generally, as well as for having fostered what little there was of learning and refinement in that troublous and dreary period, a debt of gratitude is due to them, which cannot easily be overrated.

For more than three centuries after its institution one Rule sufficed for the Benedictine order generally. Between the 9th and 15th centuries, as the order extended itself more widely, and as reformers, ardent against abuses, arose here and there in its ranks, various "constitutions" were engrained on the original Rule. For so early as in the 8th century there were symptoms of decay. The rich endowments granted by kings and nobles had brought with them, as was inevitable, the seeds of luxury and self-indulgence, and the very popularity of the "religious" life often gave occasion to unreality in professing it. Thus, as for instance in England, when it had become the fashion for kings and queens to quit their palaces for a monastery, and to lavish their treasures on it (Bed. Ecc., Hist. iii. 19, 23, 24; Ling. A.-S. C. i. 211, 214), this fatal munificence served to attract, in the course of years, oppressive taxes, or spoliation of a more downright sort (Boiff. Ep. ad Cuthbert. c. 11, ap. Bed. Hist. Ecc. p. 353, Hussey). Often too the immunity (Pertz, Legg. i. 223) and comparative security of the monastic life tempted a noble to assume the name, without the reality, of abbat; in order to escape legal obligations he would get his "folkland" converted into "boeland" on pretence of conveying it to the service of God, and there would live with his family and dependants, an abbat in name and in tone, but in nothing more (Bele, Ep. ad Egb. ap. Hist. Ecc.; Ling. A.-S. C. i. 226-7, 230, 407, 411). The need of reformation soon called into existence reformers. Clugni, in the 10th century, was the first separate congregation, with a separate Rule of its own (Mab. Praef. Ann.; Thomas. Vct. et Nova Discipl. i. iii. 21, 25). The four centuries which followed witnessed the birth of more than twenty "Reformed Orders," all professing to hold the original Rule of Benedict in its pristine purity and integrity, but each superadding its own special exposition of the Rule as binding on its members (Hospin. de Mon. p. 132). Monte Casino, the head-quarters at first, if not the birthplace, of the order, retained its supremacy, which, according to some authorities, the founder intended for it (see note on Fleury, Hist. Ecc. xxxiii. 12), for some three centuries; its primacy has never been denied. It was sacked by the Lombards in 591 A.D. (Clint. Fast. Rom.), or 580 A.D. (Fleury, Hist. Ecc. xxxiii. 10), and the fugitives who escaped founded the Lateran Monastery at Rome (Paul. D. Hist. Lomb. iv. 18; cf. Mab. Ann. vii.). In the beginning of the 8th century it rose again in its ruins, and received within its walls Carloman, weary of the cares of empire. But Odo, the founder of Clugni, became "General" of his own "congregation," and his example has been followed by others (Mab. Ann. i. 19).

Among the most famous Benedictine abbeys (the term is a speciality of the order) were, besides those already mentioned, Bamberg, Fontevraud, Fulda, Sta. Giustina at Padua, including in its jurisdiction Sta. Scholastica (A. Butler, Lives of Saints; see St. Bened.), Grotta Ferrata, Marmoutier, S. Paolo fuori near Rome, S. Severino at Naples, &c., and in England, St. Albans, Glastonbury, Malmesbury, &c., with many of our Cathedrals. The preference of the old Benedictines for mountainous sites is proverbial:

"Bernardus valles, colles Benedictus amabat."

It would be endless to enumerate the distinguished members of the order. The list of those belonging to Monte Casino alone, during its first six centuries, fills 25 folio pages of Fabricius' Bibliotheca Ecclesiastica, with a brief notice of each (Petr. Diac. De Vir. Ill. Casin.). Trithemius, the learned abbat of Spanheim, counts on the roll of the order, in the beginning of the 16th century, 18 popes (Gueranger, A.D. 1862, says "30," Enchirid. Bened. Praef.), more than 200 cardinals, 1600 archbishops, about 4000 bishops, and, almost incredible as it sounds 15,700 famous abbats, with an equal number of canonized saints! (r. Fabric. Bibl. Ecc. s. v.: cf. Mab. AA. Praef. vi.; Ziegelbauer u. Lepoint; Hist. Lit. O. S. B.). St. Paul is the Patron Saint of the Order.

The original copy of the Rule is said to have been burnt at Teano, near Monte Casino, towards the close of the 9th century (Leo Muric, ap. Mab. Ann. iii. 263). Sigebertus Gemblacensis, in the 12th century, states that it was first made public by Simplicius, third abbat of Monte Casino (Fabric. Bibl. Ecc. s. v. Bened.). Hospinian gives no authority for his counter-statement, that many attribute it to Gregory the Great (De Monach. p. 116). Mabillon assumes it to have been made by Benedict himself at Monte Casino about 528 A.D. (Ann. iii. 8; A. Butler, Lives of Saints, see St. Bened.). Wion speaks of more than a hundred editions of the Rule in 1554 A.D. (Lign. Vir. l. 7). It is said to have been translated into English by Dunstan (Mign. Praef. Reg. S. Bened.).

The best commentaries on it are those of Martene and Calmet. That of Mege is considered lax by stricter Benedictines. The commentaries of Smaragdus, probably abbat of St. Michael's, not Smaragdus Arbo, and of Hiltegarus, a French Benedictine in the 8th century, are commended by Martene, in his preface to the Rule (Mign. Patrol. lxxvi.); also that of Bernardus, a monk of Lerins, afterwards abbat of Monte Casino in the 13th century, and one, incomplete, by Trithemius lately mentioned. But especially he praises those of Menard, a monk of St. Denys, who afterwards placed himself under the stricter rule of St. Maur; and of Haesten, a Benedictine prior, the author of the prolix Disquisitiones Monasticae, in twelve books, epitomized by Stengel or Stengellus. Mabillon seems to have contemplated a Commentary on the Rule, but from want of time to have resigned the task to Martene (Praef. Reg. S. B. ap. Mign. Patrol. lxxvi.; cf. Not. ce. 2, 9). The Rule was harmonized with other monastic rules by Benedictus Anianensis. [See Dic. of Chr. Bio. s. v.]

BENEDICTION, the spousal or nuptial. Among the Jews special benedictions were in use both for betrothal and actual marriage, the latter constituted, as with the Romans, by a ductio or procession accompanying the bride; which however with the Romans had for its goal the house of the husband, with the Jews the nuptial bed itself. A passage in Tobit (vii. 13, 14) indicates the close connexion of the blessing with what we should term the marriage settlement. Forms of both benedictions will be found in Selden's Uxor Hebraica, bk. li., cc. vii., xii. But Maimonides expressly observes (Uxor. Ehr. bk. li. c. 13) that not the blessing of the betrothed makes marriage, but the leading of the bride to the nuptial bed.

Certain heathen marriages, e.g. the Roman confarreatio, being also accompanied with a benediction, it was but natural that the same custom should prevail in reference to Christian ones. A good deal, however, of confusion seems to have arisen on the subject, especially through not distinguishing the legal and spiritual aspects of the benediction. It cannot be too often repeated that for many centuries both betrothal and marriage were in the eyes of the Church primarily civil contracts, valid although celebrated according to heathen rites, in conformity with the civil law, subject only to certain peculiar Christian restrictions. It is not meant, however, by these expressions that such contracts were looked on as merely "secular," as many would term them now, or "profane," as the middle ages termed them. For Our Lord and His Apostles, human society itself was a sacred thing: the State, which embodied it for all purposes of civil life, was sacred (Rom. xiii., 1, 4, 6); marriage above all, the very keystone of all human society, had a primordial sacredness (Matt. xiv. 4), entirely transcending all enactments of municipal or ceremonial law.

But this view in nowise prevented the Church from claiming spiritual control over such contracts as between the faithful, from recognizing and sealing their unions by its benediction, or even from looking upon such unions with disfavour when this was not solicited. Thus the 5th chapter of the Epistle of Ignatius to Polycarp (admitted by Dr. Cureton as genuine into his 'Corpus Ignatianum') says: "It is meet that men and women who are marrying should unite with the approval of the bishop, that the marriage be according to the law and not according to lust." So Tertullian (writing about A. D. 200), in his work De Pudicitia, speaks of "secret unions, that is, not first declared before the church" ("non prius apud ecclesiam professæ") as running the risk of being deemed nigh to adultery and fornication. Another passage of his (Ad Uxor. c. 8), is generally quoted as one of the first distinct authorities in favour of the ecclesiastical benediction on marriage. According to the ordinary reading, it runs thus: "How should we be sufficient to set forth the bliss of that marriage which the Church brings about (con-stat), and the oblation confirms, and the benediction seals, angels proclaim, the Father ratifies?" It must, however, be observed that, if the above reading be correct, the substitution of the benediction for the execution of the ut valeat nuptiales, which the words "et obsignat benedictio" imply, antedates by many centuries the rule of the Church in the matter. It is remarkable, too, as pointed out by Augusti, that one text, instead of the words "et obsignat benedictio, angeli renuntiant," has simply "et obsignatum angeli renuntiant," "the angels proclaim when sealed,"—a reading which brings back the passage into accordance with the law and practice of the time, but at the expense of the decisive word "benedictio" itself. That such benedictions were pronounced, however, there can be no reason to doubt. Thus Ambrose, writing against mixed marriages, says: "For since marriage itself should be sanctified by the priestly veil (velamine sacerdotali) and by benediction, how can that be called a marriage where there is no agreement of faith?" (Bk. ix. Ep. 70). But, as Selden has observed, the like benedictions were often claimed on behalf of many other kinds of contract besides that of marriage,—a sale for instance. The total absence from the Apostolical Constitutions of any notice of church usages in respect to it, seems a conclusive proof that nothing of the kind formed part of the ritual of the early church during the 3 or 4 centuries (or even more) over which the collection of the materials for the compilation in question probably extended.

There is however extant, under dates ranging as far back as the former half of the 2nd century, a whole series of authorities enforcing the necessity of the ecclesiastical benediction, upon which the Church of Rome has unhesitatingly built its practice as to the ceremonial validity of the rite, and which have been quoted without comment by Bingham and other Protestant writers. But as these are, for the most part, spurious documents of the forged Decretal class, and are only so far important as they show the points for which it was sought to claim the sanction of an earlier period, and thus to establish the jurisdiction of the clergy in matters connected with marriage, they may be passed over.

Turning to the Eastern Church, we find that Chrysostom in his voluminous works never indicates the existence of a marriage liturgy, or the indispensableness of sacerdotal benediction. Two letters of Gregory Nazianzen show clearly that such benediction was looked upon rather as a seemly accompaniment to Christian marriage than as a condition of it, since the writer, in that graceful tender style of which he is a master, professes to give his by letter. One is to Procopius (Ep. 57, otherwise 44), on the marriage of "his golden Olympias." "I join to each other," he writes, "the right hands of the young people, and both to that of God. For it is fitting that like many other good things, so should marriage take place in the best way in all respects, and according to our common prayers." However visible may be

It should not be overlooked that the same Tertullian, in his treatise on Idolatry (c. 18), expressly admits the purity of betrothal and marriage in themselves, even when celebrated among heathens, and therefore the lawfulness of a Christian betrothal and marriage in themselves, and therefore the absence of both. See page

here the habitual form of Christian marriage, nothing can be more obvious than that the interference of the Church is not treated as indispensable. Another letter to Eusebius (171) is still more conclusive, as shewing that whilst Gregory made it a rule, whenever present at a wedding, to laterpose the prayers of the church, the actual rites of marriage he left to be performed by others, and considered that a sufficient consecration of them could be given from afar, since prayers "are not bounded by space."

We must now however notice a singular document, which is included by Labbe and Mausi among those of the 4th century, and appended by them to the Acts of the Nicene Council, as being attributed to the Nicene Fathers by a Vatican codex. It is termed "Sanctiones et decreta alia ex quatuor regum"—quaror, regulorum?—"ad Constantinianum libris descripta" (L. and M., Councils, vol. II. p. 1029 and foll.), and is written in Latin, though evidently representing the practice of the Greek Church. The 2nd chapter of these 'Sanctions and Decrees' forbids marriage with a person's nuptial paraphernalia, with whom "the benediction of the crowns" is received. Benedictions are mentioned in like manner in c. 6 and 7, but it is clear that the ceremony of the Greek ritual known as the benediction of the crowns, and not the Latin benediction of the marriage itself, is what the above passages refer to. But when we attempt to fix a date for the work which contains them, we shall be compelled to carry this to the second half of the 6th century at earliest. For it is a remarkable fact that Justinian's legislation, minutely occupied as it is with Church matters, never once refers to the ecclesiastical benediction of marriage: it requires a will to see it, as some have done, in the mere expression "vota nuptialia," and this although it will be seen (CONTRACT of marriage) that a kind of church-registration of marriages was provided for.

It is however by no means improbable that between the 6th and 7th centuries the regular practice of an ecclesiastical benediction upon marriage, and the Greek ritual of marriage itself, became established. And it is a well-known Greek name which now carries us back to the next Western authority on the subject,—that of the canons of a Council, held in England towards the end of the 7th century, under Archbishop Theodore, which enact that "in a first marriage the priest should perform the mass and bless both" parties (c. 59); implying, it would seem, the practice set forth by the 'Sanctions and Decrees,' of confining the blessing to the as yet unmarried party only, where the other has been married already.

In the Carlovingian era, finally—to which belong the head springs of the great stream of church forgeries,—forgeries which, amongst other authorities, have so dealt with the Capitularies themselves that it is frequently impossible to determine the precise age of a given text—the priestly benediction entered into the civil law as an essential requisite of marriage; and the various spurious authorities from the annals of the Western Church above commented on were apparently invented for the purpose of carrying back to a remote period the ecclesiastical recognition of its necessity. And it may be observed that the mention of it almost invariably occurs in connexion with the subject of consanguinity,—another great source of clerical influence and income in its relation to marriage, which has been even more prolific in suggestions of pious fraud. By the 50th article of the first Capitulary of 802, none are to be married before inquiry be made as to whether they are related; "and then let them be united with a benediction." (Comp. also vi. 130, vii. 179, viii. 408.) The 473rd article (vii. 473), "on lawful marriage" is almost exactly identical in its wording with the supposed letter of Pope Evaristus, and may, it is submitted, be fairly deemed its original.

We may briefly refer to certain canons of the patriarch Nicephorus, recorded by Cotelierus, and perhaps enacted at the Council of Constantinople in A.D. 814, which indicate that at this period at least the benediction was by the Church decreed to constitute the marriage. If any having a concubine would neither leave her nor allow her to receive the benediction, and have her with the sacramental rite, his offerings were not to be received (can. xxiv.). And lastly, the well-known document known as the reply of Pope Nicolas to the Bulgarians, though belonging only to the latter half of the 9th century, preserves to us probably the practice of the Roman Church on this subject from an earlier period. It indicates evidently a different ceremonial from that of the Greek Church, and although dwelling on the formalities of betrothal, speaks of no blessing but the nuptial one.

To sum up the conclusions of this inquiry: 1st. There never was a period when the Christian Church did not rejoice to sanction the nuptial rite by its benedictions, and did not exhort the faithful to obtain them for their unions. 2nd. But having a profound faith in the primordial sanctity of marriage in itself, many centuries elapsed before the pronouncing of such a benediction was held essential to the validity of marriage, when duly contracted according to the municipal law, and not contrary to the special ethical rules of the Church in reference to marriage. 3rd. Hence the total absence of marriage liturgies from the early Christian rituals, extending to about the beginning of the 7th century; the genuineness of the one in the Gelasian Missal (end of the 5th century) being confessedly impugned by the absence of any in the Gregorian, a century later. 4th. It may however be admitted that by the end of the 7th century the priestly benediction of marriage had probably become the rule in both great branches (divisions not yet) of the Church; and in the course of the 8th and 9th centuries it hardened into a legal institution within the domains of the great usurpers of the West, the Carlovingians, being now largely supported by supposititious church authorities, carried back as far as the beginning of the 2nd century. 5th. It is also possible that about this period a practice of sacerdotaly blessing betrothals likewise grew up, and promising to open a new source of income to the clergy and above all to the Roman pontiffs, was in like manner sought to be maintained by spurious authorities; but the date of this cannot be fixed earlier than A.D. 860, since Pope Nicolas, in his reply to the Bulgarians, clearly, speaks only of the nuptial benediction. BENEDICTIONS

BENEDICTIONS. (Benedictio, eblayia.)

1. Definition, &c.—Like many other points of ritual, the practice of benediction passed from the Jewish to the Christian Church. In the infancy of the former, under Aaron, we discover the existence of the blessing of the congregation by the priest after the morning and the evening sacrifice (Lev. ix. 22); and later notices may be seen in 1 Chron. xxiii. 13, Ecclesi. xxxv. 17, sly. 15, l. 20. The actual form is prescribed in Num. vi. 22 sqq; cf. Ps. lxxvii. 1.

The benediction, ordinarily pronounced by priests (as e.g. in the case of Zacharias, for whose blessing the people waited, Luke i. 21), would on occasions of special solemnity be reserved for the high priest. Even the king, as the viceroxy of the Most High, might give the blessing (cf. 2 Sam. vi. 18, 1 Kings viii. 55, 1 Chron. xvi. 2). It would appear that Levites had ordinarily, though not invariably, the power of giving the blessing. Cf. perh. 2 Chron. xxx. 27. The actual formula referred to above does not occur in the New Testament, though our Lord is spoken of as blessing little children and His disciples (Mark x. 16, Luke xxiv. 50), besides the blessing on the occasion of the institution of the Eucharist (Matt. xxvi. 26). Still, the general tenor and form of the blessing, must have been similar, and the familiar "peace" of the benediction is probably a relic of the old Aaronitic form.

Before proceeding to consider the various occasions of benediction in the Christian Church, attention may be called to the strict definition of the term, in contradistinction from the allied expressions, consecration, dedication, although the distinction is not unfrequently lost sight of. Benediction, then, may be defined to be a certain holy action which, combined with prayer, seeks for God's grace for persons, and, in a lower degree, a blessing upon things, with a view whether to their efficiency or safety. We may add St. Ambrose's definition (De Benedictionibus Patriarcharum, c. 2), "Benedictio est sanctificationis et gratiarum votiva collatio." On this point the following extracts may be cited from Gillebert (bishop of Limerick in the 12th century), De Usu Ecclesiastico, in Du Cange's Glossary, s. vv. "Consecrare," "Benedictio." "Dedical pontifex deciare enim est locum Deo offerre, benedicere et sacrificare. Consecrat autem episcopus utensilia ecclesie, que fere omnibus sacerdotibus sunt communia, vestimenta videlicet sacerdotalia et corporalia, altaris velamina, calicem, patenam et corporalia et vasculum Eucharistias, chrisma, oleum, vns chrismale, thus et thuribulum, baptismum, aream vel serinium reliquiarum, cibotium, id est altaris umbraculum, crucem, tintinabulum et ferrum judiciale. Ea enim tantum consecrat que a communal usu in cultum divinum separantur." . . . "Benedicere autem dico presecrare vero ipsa utensilia. Benedicere ergo pontifex reginam, et virginem cum velatur, et quemlibet fidelem benedici postulatum et totum populum ante pacem." These benedictions may not be conferred by a priest in the presence of a bishop. Gillebert had previously said, "Benedicere potest presentie episcopo ad dominicus sacerdos et prandium et sponsum et aquam judicii vel panem et cetera. In absentia vero episcopi potest benedicere coronam clerici et velum vidue, novos fructus, candelas in Purificatione S. Marie, ciores in capite jejuni, et lecturam Evangelium, et populum cum dimittitur, aquam benedictam aspergit ad benedicenda nova domos et cetera nova."

11. Minister of Benediction.—It will be obvious from the nature of the case, that a benediction is imparted by a superior to an inferior (cf. Heb. vii. 7, where this is explicitly stated). Hence it is laid down in the Apostolic Constitutions (viii. 28) that a bishop may bestow the blessing, and receive it from other bishops, but not from priests; so too a priest may bless his fellow-priests and receive the blessing from them or from a bishop; the deacon merely receives and cannot impart the blessing. Thus if a bishop be present, to him does the Benedictio supra presbiteros appertain, and only in the absence of a bishop, unless special authority be given, is it permitted to the priest, whose blessing, however, is not held as of the same solemn import as that of the bishop.

The ancient Sacramentaries do not distinguish between Episcopal and Sacerdotal blessings; while in later times a minutely developed system has been formed, as may be seen, for example, from the extracts from Gillebert given above. To enter, however, at any length into these accretions is foreign to our present scope. It will suffice to allude to one or two general points. Here will appertain the division of Benedictions into solemnes and communes, magne and parvae, and the like, although these distinctions are by no means uniformly explained. The benedictio sollemnis appears to belong strictly to the bishop, and, in his absence, to the priest acting as his representative: other benedictions, it has been seen, the priest may confer in the presence of the bishop. In no case, however, can they be imparted by a deacon or layman (cf. Apostolic Constitutions, viii. 48, iii. 10).

The distinction between the b. parva and the b. magna is variously explained: by some they are held to be the blessings conferred by priest and bishop respectively; by others, that the former implies a private benediction, the latter a public and solemn one (cf. Cotelier's note, Patres Apost. i. 284, ad. 1698).

Here may be added a remark as to special powers of blessing possessed by abbots. Their pre-eminence above priests in general consists in a superiority of jurisdiction, not in a higher order of consecration. From the 8th century; however, abbots who were priests have possessed sundry episcopal rights both of benediction within the limits of their own cloisters and even of several lower forms of consecration, the latter of which indeed was specially allowed by the second General Council of Nicaea, A.D. 787, can. 14 (Labbe & Cossart, Concilia vii. 908). This example seems to have been further acted on, for in the time of Charlemagne we find abbesses assuming to themselves the right of conferring benedictions even upon men, with laying on of hands and the sign of the cross, although this was distinctly prohibited. (Baluzius, Capitularia Reg. Franc. [anno 789] i. 238, ed. Paris, 1677.)

III. Objects of Benediction.—It will be readily seen that Benedictions may be divided into Liturgical and non-Liturgical, that is, into such as are in immediate connection with various holy offices, and those which may be viewed as independent offices. Those of the former class especially regard persons, those of the latter may regard either persons or things. We shall touch briefly on each class of objects separately.

(A.) Benedictions of Persons.—Here may be reckoned in the first place all Liturgical blessings, whether (a) general, the blessing communicated to the whole congregation in the dismissal-formula (ἀνάστασις), as Domine vobiscum, pax vobiscum, &c., in the ordinary services of the Church, as those of the Canonical Hours, of which the Benediction is an essential element in both Eastern and Western ritual, varying however in the former according to the day of the week: or—(b) special, as those at the Eucharist, Baptism, Ordination, Marriage, Penance, Extreme Unction, Burial. We shall briefly comment here on the Benedictions entering with the first of these offices, for the others reference may be made to the several articles on these rites.

The old Latin Sacramentaries agree in placing a Benediction in the Mass after the Lord's Prayer and before the Communion, a custom which, in the Romish ritual, appears to have been introduced from the Gallican and Mozarabic Liturgies (Daniel, Cod. Liturg. i. 141). Up to this point the congregation was prohibited from leaving, as e.g. by the Council of Agde (506 A.D.) and the First and Third Councils of Orleans (511 and 538 A.D.). "Missas die Dominicis a secularibus totas teneri speciali ordinatione precipimus, ita ut ante benedictionem sacerdotis populus egressi non presumat." (Conc. Agath. can. 47; Labbé, iv. 1391.) Menard (Greg. Sacram. p. 297; but cf. Mabillon, De Liturgia Gallicana, l. 4, § 13, 14) refers this to the benediction at the end of the Mass. "Populus non ante discedat quam Missae solennitatem compleatur, et ubi episcopus fuerit, benedictionem accipiat sacerdotis." (Conc. Aurel. l. can. 26; Labbé, iv. 1408. Sirmund remarks that the edd. have no MS. authority for prefixing a negative to fuerit, and that the error is apparently due to its not being perceived that episcopus and sacerdos are used synonymously.) "De Missis nullus laicorum ante discedat quam Dominicae dicatur oratio; et si episcopus praesens fuerit ejus benedictio expectetur." (Conc. Aurel. can. 29; Labbé, v. 302.) The Mass in one sense was now over, and thus those who did not communicate might leave. (Cf. e.g. Greg. Tur., De Miraculis S. Martini, ii. 47: "Cumque expletis Missis populus coepisset sacrosanctum corpus Resumptoris accipere.") We may further cite the injunction laid down by the Fourth Council of Toledo (633 A.D.), which, after finding fault with those priests who "post dictam orationem . . . antequam statim communicent et postea benedictionem a populo dant," proceeds "post or. Domini . . . benedictionem . . . et calicis benedictio in populo sequatur. et tum demum corporis et sanguinis Domini sacramentum sumatur" (can. 18; Labbé, v. 371). This may be further illustrated by a remark of Caesarius of Arles, to the effect that he who wishes "Missas ad integrum cum lucro animae suae celebrare" must remain in the church "usquequo or. Domini datur et benedictio populo datur." (Serm. 281, § 2; Migne, xxxix. 2277.) This benediction, which is properly the prerogative of the bishop, is uttered generally in three, sometimes however in four and even five or more divisions, at the end of each of which is responded, Amen.

The following is the manner in which this benediction is ordinarily introduced. The deacon, if one be present, having called with a loud voice, Humiliate vos benedictioni (cf. Caesarius, Serm. 286, § 7), the imparter of the blessing follows with Domini sit semper vobiscum, to which is responded Et cum spiritu tuo; then follows the benediction. As showing the nature of this, we subjoin the benediction for the festival of St. Stephen, from three old Latin Liturgies, the Gallican, the Gregorian, and the Mozarabic respectively (Migne, lxviii. 232; lxxviii. 33; lxxv. 199). "Deus, qui tuos martyres ita vixisti caritate ut pro te etiam mori cuperent, non perirent, Amen; et beatum Stephanum in confessione ita succendisti fide, ut imbrem lapidum non timeret, Amen. Exaudi precem familiae tuae amatoris inter festa plaudentem, Amen. Accedat ad te vox illa intercedens pro populo, pro inimicis quae orabat in ipso martyrio, Amen. Ut se obtinente et te remunerante, percipiat illic plebs adquisita per gratiam, ubi te, caelis apertis, ipse vidit in gloriam, Amen. Quod ipse praestare digneris, qui cum Patre et Spiritu Sancto vivis et regnas in saecula saeculorum." "Deus qui beatum Stephanum Protomartyrem coronavit, et confessione fidei et agone martyrii mentes vestras circumdet, et in praesenti saeculo corona justitiae, et in futuro perducet vos ad coronam gloriae, Amen. Illius obtentu tribuat vobis Dei et proximi charitatem semper exuberare, qui hanc studuit etiam inter lapidantium impetum obtinere, Amen. Quo ejus exemplo roborati, et intercessionis multati, ab eo quem illa dextera Dei vidit stantem, mereamini benedicti, Amen. Quod ipse . . ." "Christus Dei Filius, pro cuius nomine Stephanus martyr lapidatus est innocens, contra incensantium demonum letus vos efficiat fortiores, Amen. Quique eam pro inimicis orantem consummatum martyrio prevertit ad caelum, conferat in vobis ut sine confusione ad eum veniat post transitum, Amen. Ut illic letaturis post istud saeculum accedat anima vestra, quo praedictus martyr spiritum suum suscipi exorabat, Amen."

Besides the above, there was here also a short benediction at the end of the service, such as "Pax Domini sit semper vobiscum," or the two following taken from Saxon offices, "Benedictio Dei Patris Omnipotentis et Filii et Spiritus Sancti maneat semper vobiscum." "B. post datur et Fil. et S. S. et pax Domini sit semper vobiscum." (Palmer, Orig. Lit. iv. § 24.)

By way of illustration of this last we may cite Amalarius (De Eccl. Off. iii. 36), "Hunc morem tenet sacerdos, ut post omnia Sacramenta consummata benedictio populo;" and Rabanus Maurus (De Inst. Cleric. l. 33), "Post communionem ergo, et post ejusdem nominis canticum, data Benedictione a sacerdote ad plebem, dicens praedicta Missae officium esse peractum, datur licentiam abundi."

In the Apostolic Constitutions (lib. viii.), it is ordained that before the Missa Fidelium a solemn dismissal-blessing should be pronounced over catechumens, enquirers, and penitents (cc. 6-8). The solemn blessing over the congregation is to be found later (c. 15) after the communion, the deacon having first uttered the usual form, Τὸ Θεὸς διὰ τοῦ Χριστοῦ ἀπὸ τοῦ αἰῶνος καὶ εὐλογεῖσθε.

The blessings entering into Eastern liturgies are frequent; and we find them at various points of the service introduced by the formula εὐλόγητος ὁ θεὸς διὰ τοῦ Χριστοῦ. It has been remarked as in some degree significant of the characters of the two great divisions of Christendom that when such a request as the above has been made by the deacon to the priest, in the Western Church the latter proceeds to invoke God's blessing on the congregation and himself, in the Eastern Church he answers it as a rule by an ascription of praise to God. Thus at the beginning of the Prothesis (or introductory part of the Eucharistic Service) in the Liturgy of St. Chrysostom, the deacon's request to bless is answered by εὐλογητός ὁ θεὸς ἡμῶν πάντοτε νῦν καὶ ἀπὸ τοῦ αἰῶνος καὶ εὐλογεῖσθε τῶν αἰώνων. Ἀμήν. (Daniel, iv. 329, and often.) Or again, we may cite the form as used at the beginning of the proanaphoral part of the Liturgy (i. e., the continuation of the service up to the Sursum corda) εὐλογημένη ἡ βασίλειά τοῦ Πατρὸς καὶ τοῦ Υἱοῦ καὶ τοῦ Ἁ. Πν. νῦν καὶ ἀπ. κ. τ. λ. (ib. 340).

The long benediction we have spoken of as occurring in Latin liturgies after the Lord's Prayer, is not found in the Eastern ritual, at the corresponding part of which occurs what is known as the "Prayer of Inclination," answering in character to the "prayer of humble access" of our own church. (Neale, Holy Eastern Church, Introd. p. 515.)

A further enumeration of the benedictions of Greek liturgies appertains rather to a description of the Eastern Eucharistic offices; it may, however, be mentioned that in addition to the final dismissal-blessing, universal here as in the Latin ritual, some of the Eastern liturgies (as those of St. Mark and the Coptic so-called liturgy of St. Basil) give a long benediction after the post-communication prayers of thanksgiving (see e. g. Neale, ib. pp. 688, 694); also the Nestorian liturgy of Theodore the interpreter closes with a similar benediction (Daniel, iv. 193). The above are too long for quotation here, but we may cite as an example of a Greek benediction the final blessing from the liturgy of St. Mark (Daniel, iv. 170): εὐλογεῖται ὁ θεὸς ὁ εὐλογεῖν καὶ ἁγιῶν καὶ ἀσκήτων καὶ διατηρῶν πάντας ἡμῶν διὰ τῆς μεθέξεως τῶν ἁγίων αὐτοῦ μυστηρίων, ὁ δὲ εὐλογητός εἰς τοὺς α. τῶν α. I may be mentioned as a curious peculiarity that in the Constantinopolitan rite the priest does not give the final blessing till he has disrobed (Daniel, iv. 372).

At the end of the Ethiopic liturgy is a prayer of the people, of the nature of a benediction, spoken after the blessing of the bishop or priest has been pronounced, preluded too by the call of the deacon to kneel: "May the Lord bless us His servants . . ."

Besides the above, there was another solemn benediction, the special prerogative of the bishop, the b. matutinalis et vespertinalis, said, as its name implies, at the end of matins and vespers. For this we may again refer to the Council of Agde (can. 30), "Plebs collecta oratione ad vesperam ab episcopo cum benedictionibus dimittatur." (Labbe, iv. 1388; cf. also Conc. Barcels. [540 A.D.] can. 2; ib. v. 378.)

(Non-liturgical blessings appertaining to persons, we may briefly speak here of the general blessing, properly though not exclusively the episcopal prerogative, as may be seen from e. g. Basil, Ep. 199, § 27 [v. 724, ed. Migne], and Athanasius, Vita S. Anton. c. 47. It would seem that, especially on the entrance of a bishop into a place, his blessing was vehemently sought by the people. Cf. Chrys. Hom. Evcon. in Mel. § 2; Aug. Ep. 33, § 5 [ii. 131, ed. Migne]; and Greg. Nyas. Vita Macrinae [iii. 976, Migne]. This blessing was eagerly sought for even by princes, as by Clodoveus from Remigius, or by the Empress Eudoxia from the Bishop Porphyrius (Acta Sanctorum, i. 154 Oct.; iii. 653 Feb.). This may be further illustrated by a statement of Philostorgius (see Valesius' note on Theodoret iv. 5) to the effect that when all the other bishops went to pay homage to Eusebia, wife of the Emperor Constantine, Bishop of Tripoli, refused to do so save on the condition that the empress should rise at his approach, and with bowed head ask his blessing. It was allowed by the Council of Epno [517 A.D.] for people of rank (cives superiorum natalium) to invite the bishop to themselves to receive his blessing at Christmas and Easter.

(B.) Benedictions of things. Before proceeding to enumerate some of the more striking cases of benedictions of things, we may once more call attention to the distinction already dwelt on between benediction and the stronger term consecration, in that in the one regard it had but to the bestowal of certain grace or efficacy, whereas in the other, a thing is not only destined for a holy use, but is viewed as changed into a holy thing. Augusti (Benkticir-diph. x. 192) brings out this distinction by a comparison of the phrases panis benedictus and panis consecratus; and so the Greek Church recognizes the difference between εὐλογία on the one hand and ἀγιασμός or καθιέρωσις on the other. Similar is the distinction between benedictiones introcituivae and b. constitutivae, sacramentivae, destinativae, the names of which show that the one invoke God's grace, the other dedicate permanently to His service.

We shall now enumerate some of the more frequent instances of special benedictions of things, for detailed information respecting which reference may be made to the separate articles. (1) H. fontis, the blessing of the baptismal water, &c. [BAPTISM]. (2) b. aquae lustralis [HOLY WATER]. (3) b. panis et vini, which substances when blessed bore the name of the saint on whose festival the benediction took place, as St. John's wine, St. Mark's bread, &c. (4) b. salis [SALT], whether for admixture with holy water or otherwise. (5) b. lactis et mellis [MILK AND HONEY]. (6) b. olei, whether for the catechumens at baptism or confirmation, or for the Chrism, or for the sick (εὐχέλαιος) [CHRISM; OIL]. (7) b. incensi. (8) b. cereorum, as for the special feast of Candlemas Day, Feb. 2. (9) b. cinerum, of Palm Sunday processions. (10) b. palmarum, of Palm Sunday processions. (11) b. paschales, whether of Easter eggs, or the paschal lamb or the Easter candles; and to these may be added an immense number of varieties of benedictions for almost every imaginable occasion, wherein the pious of past ages deemed that the church could draw forth on their behalf from a rich store of blessing. Thus we may mention, in addition to those already cited, the following benedictions of things, occurring, unless the contrary be specified, in the Gregorian Sacramentary: (1) h. donaus. (2) uvae vel favae (= fabae). (3) ad fructus novos. (4) ad omnia quae volueris. (5) carnis. (6) putoi (Gall.). (7) casei et ororum (Euch. Graec.). (8) ijpmi (Pontif. Egb.). (9) liborum (ib.).

IV. Mode of imparting Benediction. However various the objects for which blessings are sought, and however different therefore the formulae in which they are conferred, still there are certain accompaniments which are as a rule always present, and as to which the directions, simple enough in the earliest Church, have been in process of time rendered more and more definite, to leave as little as possible to individual will.

(a) As showing how the Christian Ritual on these points is foreshadowed in the Jewish, we have thought it well to prefix a brief note as to the laws of blessing in the latter. The priests, to whom the power of imparting blessings was committed, were to do so standing (cf. Deut. x. 8; xxvii. 12), with outstretched hands. We cite here a passage from the Mishna, the earliest authority to which we can appeal next to the Bible. "In what way is the sacerdotal blessing performed? In the provinces [i. e. away from the temple] they say it in three blessings [i. e. the formula of Numbers vi. 24-26 is divided into three clauses, and Amen responded at the end of each], but in the temple in one. In the temple they say the Name as it is written [i. e. the תפארתא ממוסא], in the provinces with the substituted name [i. e. Adonai]. In the provinces the priests raise their hands on a level with their shoulders, but in the temple above their heads, except the high-priest, who does not raise up his hands above the dindem." [Or perhaps rather a plate of gold worn upon the forehead of the high-priest. The reason of the prohibition in his case was because of the presence of the Sacred Name upon the plate.] Mishn. Sota, vii. 6. In a somewhat later authority, the commentary on Numbers and Deuteronomy known as Sifree, we have further directions given: (1) the blessing is to be pronounced in the Hebrew language; (2) the imparting of the blessing is to stand, and (3) with outstretched hands. (4) The sacred name יהוה is to be used; (5) the priest must face the people, and (6) speak in a loud voice. (Sifree on Numb. vi. 22-27.) Reference may also be made to a still later authority, the Babylonian Talmud itself (Sota, fol. 38).

During the conferring of the blessing the people must not look at the priest, for for the time the glory of God is supposed to rest upon him (vide infra). Also, his hands are disposed so that the fingers go in pairs, forefingers with middle fingers, ring fingers with little fingers, with the tips of the two thumbs and of the two forefingers respectively touching each other, thus arranging the whole ten fingers in six divisions. We shall quote in illustration of this from the Lekach Tob of R. Eleazar b. Tobiah (the so-called Pesikta Zolarta) on Numbers, l. c. "It is forbidden to look at the priests at the moment that they lift up their hands,—and he divides his hands into six parts, as it is said, 'Every one had six wings.' Isa. vi. 2."

One more extract will suffice, which we take from the ancient commentary on Numbers (in loc.), the Bammidbar Rabba (c. 11). "Therefore it is said (Cant. ii. 9), 'Behold he stands behind our wall,' that is, synagogues and colleges. 'He looks from the windows'—At the time when the Holy One, Blessed be He, said to Aaron and his sons 'Thus shall ye bless' &c., Israel said to the Holy One, 'Lord of the Universe, thou tellest the priests to bless us, we want only Thy blessing and to be blessed from Thy mouth; according as it is said, Look from the abode of Thy holiness, from heaven' (Deut. xxvi. 15). The Holy One said, 'Although I commanded the priests to bless you, I am standing with them and blessing you.' Therefore the priests stretch forth their hands to indicate that the Holy One stands behind us, and therefore it says, 'He looks from the windows' [i. e. from between the shoulders of the priests]. 'He peeps from the lattice work' [i. e. from between the fingers of the priests]."

(B) The foregoing points afford a very close parallel to the usages of the Christian church. But the imparting of the blessing should stand in that accordance with the natural order of things, and thus is a point universally observed, so that the Latin church does but stereotype what is used, when in the ritual of Paul V. it is laid down as a Rubric stando semper benedico. As to the kneeling of the recipients of the blessing, we may find ancient evidence in the Apostolic Constitutions (viii. 6), where the injunction is prefixed to the Benediction, "... and let the deacon say, κλίνατε καὶ εὐλογείθε."

The order of the Jewish ritual that the priest should face the people is paralleled (to say nothing of unvarying custom) by the Rubric before the benediction in the mass in ancient Sacramentaries, (thus e. g. "Postea dicit episcopus convertens ad populum," in an ancient mass for Easter. Greg. Sacram. p. 248); and that to pronounce the blessing in a loud voice by the equivalent command constantly met with in Greek service books (e. g. ἐπὶ ὕψους ὁ ἱερεὺς μεγαλόφωνος, Goar, Euchol. p. 42).

The lifting up of hands (ἔπαραι τῶν χειρῶν) is an inseparable adjunct of benedictions. It is constantly associated in the Bible with actions of a more solemn character, as oaths (e. g. Gen. xiv. 22; Rev. x. 5), or prayer (e. g. Psalm xxvii. 2; xlv. 21 [20, E. V.]; lxxii. 5 [4, E. V.]; 1 Tim. ii. 8), or benediction (e. g. Lev. ix. 22; Luke xxiv. 50). An occasional addition is that of the laying on of hands: of this we find traces in Gen. xlviii. 14, 18; Matt. xix. 13, 15; Mark x. 16; and we may again refer to the Apostolic Constitutions (viii. 9), where the benediction upon penitents is associated with the laying on of hands (χειροθεσία). The feeling of the greater worth and power of the right hand is shown in patriarchal times (Gen. l. c.); and in later times it is either taken for granted or is expressly commanded that the right hand should be used.

(7) With this natural and almost universal gesture, the act of benediction is constantly represented in ancient art. Thus, the Lord extends His open hand over the demonic, in the bas-reliefs of a sarcophagus at Verona (Maffei, Verona Illustrata, pars iii. p. 54); and also over a kneeling figure in an ARCOSELTUM of the cemetery of St. Hermes (Dottari, Pittura e Scultura, clxxxvii. No. 2).

Christian ritual, a particular disposition of the fingers in the act of blessing became usual. In the Greek church, and in Greek paintings for the most part, the hand outstretched in blessing has the thumb touching the tip of the ring-finger, while the forefinger, the middle, and the little finger are erect. According to a view mentioned by Ciampini (De Sacris Aedif. Const. p. 42, from Theoph. Raynaud, De Attribu is Christi, 4, p. 733, who cites it from some fragments of a Greek writer of uncertain date, Nicolaus Malaxus), the erect forefinger with the curved middle finger make IC, i. e. 'Iησοῦς,' and the curving of the thumb and ring-finger and the curving of the little finger make XC, i. e. 'Χριστός.' One cannot but agree here with the remark in the Actu Sanctorum (June, vol. vii. p. 135) that this is rather an ingenious speculation of Malaxus than a received doctrine of the Greek church. According to Gear (Euchologion, p. 923) the thumb and ring-finger crossed made a X, the other fingers erect with the fore and middle fingers slightly separated were supposed to represent υ, ι, the whole standing for 'Iησοῦς Χριστός υικτός.' He also gives (pp. 114, 115) pictures of St. Methodius and St. Germanus, with the fingers disposed as above, save that the fore and middle fingers are united. Evidence, however, is not forthcoming as to the date of these representations. (Cf. Leo Allatius, De Cons. Eccl. Occid. et Orient. pp. 1358 sqq., who describes as used by the Greeks a disposition of the fingers akin to that spoken of by Malaxus, and considers it as indicating the doctrines of the Trinity and of the twofold nature of our Lord.) Neale (ib. 352, n.) thus describes the eastern method, "The priest joins his thumb and third finger, and erects and joins the other three; and it is thus supposed to symbolize the procession of the Holy Ghost from the Father alone; and, according to others, to form the sacred name IHC by the position of his fingers."

In the Latin manner of benediction the fingers are the thumb, the forefinger and the middle finger, while the other two are doubled down on the palm of the hand. The hand of the Lord is thus represented in some monuments, when He works a miracle, not holding a rod in the hand: for instance, in the healing of the man born blind (Bottari, tav. xix.), that of the woman with an issue of blood (xxi.), and in the representation of Christ's entry into Jerusalem (cxxxiii.); see also the illustrations of ANANIAS, HEALING OF, and BETHESDA. The same arrangement of the fingers is observed in the bas-relief of an ancient sarcophagus, representing the God Shepherd blessing His sheep. In some cases the representation of the natural gesture of an orator or teacher resembles the act of blessing; as, for instance, in the representation of Christ in the midst of the doctors, given by Bottari (liv.). This arrangement of the fingers is said to be found in the most ancient pictorial representations of the Popes (Molanus, Hist. SS. Invginum, p. 468 n.; ed. Lournain, 1771). Pope Leo IV.

in the representation of Christ's entry into Jerusalem (cxxxiii.); see also the illustrations of ANANIAS, HEALING OF, and BETHESDA. The same arrangement of the fingers is observed in the bas-relief of an ancient sarcophagus, representing the God Shepherd blessing His sheep. In some cases the representation of the natural gesture of an orator or teacher resembles the act of blessing; as, for instance, in the representation of Christ in the midst of the doctors, given by Bottari (liv.). This arrangement of the fingers is said to be found in the most ancient pictorial representations of the Popes (Molanus, Hist. SS. Invginum, p. 468 n.; ed. Lournain, 1771). Pope Leo IV.

(Hom. de Cura Pastoralis, Migne's Patrol. avv. 678) seems to enjoy a somewhat different arrangement, still for the purpose of symbolizing the Trinity; "districtis duobus digitis at pollice intus recluso, per quod Trinitas annuitur." These words, however, though given by Labbe, are wanting in many authorities.

But it seems certain, that it is only in comparatively modern times that the rite of benediction has constituted a distinction between the Greek and Latin Churches. For instance, in the most Roman of monuments, the Vatican cospicuo (or crypt) of St. Peter (see the frontispiece to Borgia's Vaticana Confessio B. Petri), the Lord gives the blessing in the Greek manner; in the triumphal arch of St. Mark's Church, in the Latin manner; in the tribune of the same church, after the Greek manner; so also in a mosaic of the ancient Vatican (Ciampini, De Sacris Aedif. p. 43), executed under the direction of Innocent III. (1198-1216), who, treating expressly of this matter (De Sacro Altaris Myst. ii. 44), prescribes the elevation of three fingers, without indicating which. On the other hand, the bas-relief of a Greek diptych given by Foggi (De Roma. Itin. Petri, p. 471), represents St. Peter giving the blessing in the Latin manner, while St. Andrew, the reputed founder of the Church of Constantinople, blesses in the Greek manner; a circumstance which may perhaps indicate that different gestures of blessing were regarded as characteristic of East and West respectively (see Martigny, Dict. des Antiq. Chrét. p. 84).

(3) THE SIGN OF THE CROSS (see the article) constantly accompanies benedictions both in the Eastern and the Western rites, and was thought to impart validity to the act; "quod signum nisi adhibeatur . . . nihil horum rite perficitur," says St. Augustine (Tract. in Joannem, 118, § 5).

(e) INCENSE is a frequent accompaniment of Benedictions; and the employment of Holy Water to be sprinkled on persons or things may be regarded as a form of benediction [HOLY WATER]. The modern Romish Ritual makes a special vestment incumbent on the priest who gives a blessing. This, however, is beside our present purpose.

V. Benedictionals.—It has been already shown that various early forms of benedictions are found interspersed in ancient Sacramentaries. In that attributed to Pope Leo are found forms of blessing "ascendentibus a fonte," and "lactis et mellis," as well as a "benedictio fontis," which is possibly a later addition. It is, however, in the somewhat later Sacramentary of Gregory the Great that we meet with specimens of benedictions on a more extended scale, in some MSS. variously interspersed through the book, and in some given separately, forming the so-called Benedictionale. This is the case with the very ancient MS. of the Caesarean Library, edited by Lambecius, not knowing that the greater part of it had, under a different arrangement, already been edited by Ménard. Another of somewhat different form has been edited by Pamelius (Liturg. vol. ii.) from two MSS. of the time of Charlemagne now in the Vatican. The Liber Sacramentorum of Ratoldus, of the tenth century, also contains numerous benedictions, but the fullest Benedictional is that found in two MSS. of the Monastery of St. Theodor, near Rheims, written about the year 900. Ménard has also edited a Benedictional from a MS. in the abbey

A large collection of benedictions is also to be found in the Pontifical of Egbert (Archbishop of York, A.D. 732-766), published by the Surtees Society in 1853. It will be observed that all the above are merely recensions, more or less added to, of the benedictions in the Gregorian Sacramentary; it will suffice to mention, in addition to those, the benedictions of the Gothic Missal, first edited by Joseph Thomassin and then by Mabillon (Museum Italicum, vol. ii.), which are numerous, but of very different form.

VI. Literature.—For the matter of the present article we have to express considerable obligations to the essay Sejen und Fluch in Binterim's Denkwürdigkeiten (vol. vii. part 2), and to Augusti's Denkwürdigkeiten aus der Christlichen Archæologie, vol. x. pp. 165 seqq. We have also consulted the articles Benedictiones and Sejnen in Herzog's Realencyclopædie, and in Wetzer and Weite's Kirchen-Lexicon. See also Gerhard, De Benedictione Ecclesiastica, and Haerner, De Ritu Benedictionis sacerdotialis. BENEDICTUS, of Nursia, abbot of Monte Cassino, born A.D. 480, and died probably 542. [See Dict. of Chr. Biogr. s. v.] His festivals are as follows:—

Under March 21, the Mart. Rom. Vet. has "In Cassino Castro, Benedicti Abbatibus;" Mart. Hieron. "Depositio Benedicti Abbatibus;" Mart. Bedae, "Natale Benedicti Abbatibus."

Under July 11, Mart. Bedae has, "Floriano adventus S. B. A.;" Mart. Adonis, "Translatio S. B. A.;" while M. Hieron. has again "Depositio S. B. A."

Under Dec. 4, the M. Hieron. has "Floriano adventus Corporis S. B. A."

The Cal. Byzant. celebrates "Benedict of Nursia, Holy Father," on March 14.

We see that the festival of March 21 commemorates the death (or burial) of the saint; that of July 11, the translation of his relics to Fleury (St. Benoit sur Loire), in 653. The Mart. Hieron., here as in some other places, is inexplicable.

The name of St. Benedict is recited in the prayer Communicantes of the Gregorian canon, and in the ancient canon of Milan (Ménard's Greg. Sacram., p. 546). The Corbey MS. of the Sacram. Greg. has on vi. Idus Julii (July 10) "Vigilia S. Benedicti Abbatibus," with proper collect, &c., and on v. Id. Jul. (July 11) "Natale S. B. A.," with proper collect, &c., for the mass. The MSS. of Reims and of Ratold have also the Natale on this day, but the office is simply de communi unius abbatibus (Ménard, u. s. p. 407). Antiphon in l. b. Antiph. p. 703. Compare Liber Responsalis, p. 810.

Stephen of Tournai (Epist. 105) tells us that the ancient church of St. Benedict at Paris was built so that the sanctuary was towards the west, an arrangement which was afterwards altered (in Ménard, u. s. p. 329). [C.]

BENEDICTUS. The song of Zacharias contained in S. Luke i. 68-79, so called from its first word. This canticle has been said at lauds in the Western Church from early times every day throughout the year, whatever be the service. The introduction of the custom is attributed to S. Benedict. It is said with a varying antiphon which is double, i. e., said entire both before and after the canticle, on double feasts; in the Roman, Monastic, and other offices derived from a Gregorian or Benedictine origin, at the end of lauds, immediately before the oratio or collect, and occupies the same position at lauds which the Magnificat occupies at vespers. In the Ambrosian office it occurs on the contrary at the very beginning of the office, after the opening versicles. The Ambrosian rules too for the duplication of antiphons are different from the Roman. The Benedictus is also found elsewhere, e. g., in the Mozarabic lauds for the nativity of S. John Baptist. In the Greek rite, the Benedictus called προσευχη Ζαχαρίου, τοῦ πατρὸς τοῦ Προφῆτου, forms together with and following the Magnificat the list of the nine odes [ODE] appointed for lauds.

The introductory part of the Song of the Three Children, which precedes the Benedictiones, or Benedicite proper, is also known as the Benedictus from its opening, "Benedictus es Domine Deus patrum nostrorum, &c. . . ." This is said daily in the Ambrosian rite at matins before the psalms, in the place the Venite occurs in other western rites. The whole of the Song of the Three Children is also called the Benedictus in the Mozarabic breviary, and said daily at lauds, as has been already stated. [H. J. H.]

BENEFICE. This subject occupies a larger space in the writings of Canonists than almost any other question within the cognisance of ecclesiastical law; but its history prior to the year 814 may be compressed into a small compass.

The term benefice is thus defined—the perpetual right of receiving profits from real property established, by authority of the Church in favour of a spiritual person in respect of the performance of a spiritual office.

The expression seems to have originated in the practice of granting the right of occupation in Church lands to laymen in exchange for protection afforded to the Church. These were called benefices, and the property, when restored to the Church, retained the name.

The custom of assigning to ecclesiastics a life interest in Church property appears to have commenced about the beginning of the 6th century, and is referred to in the 22d canon of the Council of Agde (A.D. 506) and in the 23rd canon of the first Council of Orleans (A.D. 511), also in a letter of Pope Symmachus to Caesarius, Bishop of Arles (A.D. 513).

But the grant was not larger than a life interest to the beneficiary; and it therefore lacked the condition of perpetuity, which was an essential characteristic of a benefice in later ecclesiastical law (Ducange, Glossarium, sub voce; Ferraris, Bibliotheca Canonica, sub voce; Thomassinus, Vetus et Nova Ecclesie Disciplina, ii. 3, 13, 5; Boehmer, Jus Ecclesiasticum, iii. 5, 492). BERONICUS, martyr at Antioch in Syria; commemorated Oct. 19 (Mart. Rom. Vet., Adonis). [C.]

BERSTED, COUNCIL OF (BERGHAMSTEDENSE CONCILIUM), or rather WITENAGEMOT, of Kent, at Bersted near Maidstone, A.D. 696, at which the ecclesiastical laws of Wihtrud, king of Kent, were passed. The date is uncertain, Gebmund, bishop of Rochester (who was present), living until 696 according to the Textus Roffensis (whence the laws are taken), but dying as early as at least 694 according to the Saxon Chronicle. "To the Church, freedom from imposts," or, more probably, "freedom in jurisdiction and revenue," is the beginning of the first law (Haddan and Stubbs, Conc. iii. 233-238; Thorpe, Anc. Laws and Institutes, ii. 16-19). [A. W. H.]

BERYTUS, COUNCIL OF, A.D. 448, as Mansi thinks (vi. 501-2), in September, to hear a charge preferred against Ibas, bishop of Edessa, by nine of his clergy, which was twofold: first, that he had said, "I envy not Christ being made God, having been made so myself as much as I," which he denied indignantly; and next, that he had called St. Cyril a heretic, which he avowed he never had after the reconciliation between John of Antioch, his own superior, and St. Cyril. To refute this, his celebrated letter to Maris, of subsequent date, was adduced in evidence, containing a narrative of the whole controversy between Nestorius and St. Cyril. He rejoined by producing a testimonial in his favour addressed to Eustathius, bishop of Berytus, and Photius, bishop of Tyre, two of his judges, and signed by upwards of sixty presbyters, deacons, and subdeacons of his diocese. His acquittal followed: which, having been reversed at Ephesus by Dioscorus of Alexandria the year following, was confirmed in the tenth session of the Council of Chalcedon, where the acts of this Council are preserved (Mansi vii. 211-72). His epistle to Maris, indeed, was afterwards condemned at the fifth General Council. [E. S. F.]

BETHESDA, MIRACLE OF (IN ART). Of this miracle there is an ancient representation on a sarcophagus from the Vatican cemetery, engraved in Bottari (Sculture e Pitture, tav. xxix.: see woodcut). The subject occupies the centre of the tomb. A wavy line, representing water, divides the composition horizontally into two compartments: on the lower, the impotent man is seen lying on his couch, which is covered by a stragulum or coverlet; on the upper, he is seen healed and carrying his couch, while the Lord stretches forth his hand towards him; another figure raises his hand, the fingers arranged as in the Latin form of benediction. The background is formed by an arcade of three arches supported by columns, intended, no doubt, to represent one of the "five porches" (St. John v. 2) in which the impotent folk were laid (Martigny, Dict. des Antiq. Chret. p. 542). The same miracle is represented, in a very different style, in the great Laurentian MS. See Assemani, Bibliotheca Medicea Catal. tab. xix., and Westwood's Palaographia Sacra. [C.]

Miracle of Bethesda, from an ancient Sarcophagus.

BETHLEHEM (ARCHITECTURE). In the Ethiopic churches, a small building is thrown out from the east end of the sanctuary, where the bread for use in the eucharist is prepared by the Deacon alone, and baked in the oven with which the place is furnished. This building is called the Bethlehem, or "house of bread" (Neale, Eastern Church, Intro. 190). [C.]

BETHLEHEM (SYMBOL). In an ancient mosaic of the church of SS. Cosmas and Damian, in the Via Sacra at Rome (Ciampini, Vetera Monumenta, ii. tab. xvi.; see woodcut) two flocks, each of six sheep, pass from cities labelled respectively JERUSALEM and BETHLEHEM towards the figure of a lamb, representing the Lord, which stands on a moand in the centre. Similar representations are found in Buonarroti (Frammenti di Vasi, tav. vi. 1) and Perret (Cat. combes de Rome, v. pl. iii.). The Abbé Martigny (Dict. des Antiq. Chret. p. 225) supposes Jerusalem and Bethlehem to symbolize respectively the Jewish and Gentile Churches; but this scarcely seems a probable opinion. It is difficult to see how Bethlehem could represent the Gentile church, and the twelve sheep are generally supposed to represent the Apostles, none of whom came forth from the Gentiles. On the whole, it seems more probable that the issuing forth of the flock of Christ from Jerusalem and Bethlehem symbolizes the fact that the church is founded on the Nativity, the Passion and the Resurrection of the Lord. Bethlehem was the scene of the former, Jerusalem of the two latter. See Ciampini (Vet. Mon. i. 189).

Bethlehem and Jerusalem as Symbols.

BETHPHANIA. [EPIPHANY.]

BETHURIUS, martyr at Carthage under Saturninus; commemorated July 17 (Mart. Rom. Vit.). [C]

BETROTHAL. Under this head we shall consider only the ordinary contract of that name, reserving for the head of ESPOUSALS the specially religious applications of the idea.

The two influences which must have chiefly built up the earliest practice of the Church must have been the Jewish and the Roman, as embodied in the civil law of the Empire. But as respects marriage, these influences were different in character. The Jewish law of marriage embodied much of the old and to this day widely prevalent custom among uncivilized races, of treating it as the purchase of a wife; with this remarkable feature indeed, that the woman was at a very early age (i. e. within her 12th year, see Selden's Uxor Hebraica, bk. ii. c. iii.) held fit to dispose of herself. Under this system, betrothal, if not the actual marriage, which was held to consist in the leading of the bride to the nuptial bed, was yet really, for most purposes, the marriage contract, the violation of which by connexion with another was deemed adultery, and punishable as such, the dissolution of which could only take place by a "writing of divorcement" (Selden, quoting Maimonides, u. s. c. l.). The contract was made by persons held to be of full age (i. e. speaking generally, and neglecting some exceptional minutiae, males in the last day of their 13th year, women in the second half of their 12th) at their own will; but girls under age might be betrothed by their fathers or guardians (though only by money or writing), with power, however, at 10 to repudiate the engagement; it could also be entered into through go-betweens,—those proreneticici of the Greeks and Romans,—whose name has, in ordinary parlance, been shortened in form and widened in meaning into that of our "proxies," but who represent a still recognised function and calling in the Jewish communities of our day. Where the contract was in writing, with or without the giving of earnest money, it was to be written out by the man in the presence of witnesses, and handed over to the woman, who must know its purport, otherwise there was no contract. Selden gives the form of such a writing, specifying the man's pronouncing of the words of betrothal, the assent of the girl, and his promise of a jointure.

The Roman looked upon the marriage contract with different eyes from the Jew. At the time when the Christian Church grew up, the idea of it as the purchase of a wife had quite died out from men's minds. Marriage, and still more betrothal, was (with one exception) a purely civil contract, verbally concluded. Under the later Roman law (we need not here go in detail into the enactments of the Lex Julia, or Papian, which forms the second and main basis of church practice on the subject, betrothal is viewed simply as a contract for future marriage. It was of more weight indeed than our "engagement," since it was held as much a note of infamy to enter into two contracts of betrothal as of marriage (Dij. 3, tit. 2, s. 1, 13), so that Tacitus says of the younger Agrippina, when thinking of marrying her son Domitian to Octavia, daughter of Claudius, that it could not be done "without crime," since Octavia was already betrothed to Silvanus (Ann. bk. xii. c. 3), but it was a compact for which mere consent without writing, even of absent parties, was sufficient (Dij. 23, tit. 1, s. 4), although for its full validity the consent of all parties was required whose consent would be necessary to marriage (s. 7). The consent of a daughter, however, to her father's betrothal of her was implied, in default of proof to the contrary (s. 12); and Julianus held that the like consent of a father was to be implied, in default of proof of his dissent, to his daughter's betrothal of herself.

No forms were requisite for the early Roman betrothal, and there seems no reason for supposing that the stage betrothals which are so frequent in Plautus would not have been strictly legal. (Aful. ii. 2, vv. 77-9; Poenul. v. 3, vv. 37, 8; Trinum. ii. 4, vv. 98-103.) In these the essence of the contract lies evidently in the question and reply (the interrogatory form being a characteristic of the early Roman law): "Spondesne?"—"Spondeo." At the same time, the early Roman betrothal was generally accompanied with the sending to the woman of the iron BRIDAL RING (see this head).

We may infer from the much larger space assigned to betrothal and its incidents in the Code (5, tit. 1-3.) than in the Digest that with the growth of the empire the contract both assumed greater importance, and was at the same time more frequently broken. The practice of giving earnest-money [ARRHAE] becomes now prominent; whilst gifts on betrothal are also largely dwelt upon. Under Constantine we see that the passing of a kiss between the betrothed had come to have a legal value. (Code 5, tit. 3, s. 16.)

A glimpse at the forms usual in the later Roman betrothals, towards the beginning of the 3rd century, is given to us by Tertullian. In his treatise de Veland. Virgin. c. ii., he observes that even among the Gentile girls are brought veiled to betrothal, "because they are united both in body and spirit to the man by the kiss and the joining of right hands." This passage evidently shows that in his time Gentile betrothal had grown to be a ceremony, of which the veil, the kiss and the clasped hands were among the elements; his mention of the kiss illustrating the before quoted constitution by Constantine, later indeed by nearly a century and a half. He does not indeed name the ring; but the use of it [BRIDAL RING] is testified to by himself in another passage, and by several other authorities.

The greater prominence of the betrothal contract under the later emperors—say from the 3rd century inclusively—is best explained through the gradual permeation of the Roman empire by the which which populal lective barbari a positi in the e almost Salic law only th carries o is to pa (Factus whilst t to her h violence 200 solid the Angl Ethelbert essey off money," (83). Th century l Ethelbert purchase: riage take &c. (31).

The forms of coopeperors of th indinitely varied the offer of a s contract could be u when Chlodowi through his env

by the barbarian races, the main source from which all the most energetic elements of its population were recruited, long before any collective invasion. For when we turn to the barbaric Codes, we generally find betrothal in a position of prominence quite unlike anything in the earlier Roman law—the ruling idea being almost invariably that of wife-buying. The Salic law deals with the subject, after its wont, solely through money-payments. If any one carries off a betrothed girl and marries her, he is to pay 62½ soldi, and 15 to her betrothed. (Pactus antiprior, t. xiv. arts. 8, 9.) If any, whilst the bridegroom is conducting the betrothed to her husband, kills on her in wrath and with violence commits adultery with her, he shall pay 200 soldi (art. 10). Amongst our forefathers of the Anglo-Saxon period, we find the laws of Ethelbert (597-616) decreeing that "if a man errs off a maiden betrothed to another man in money," he is to "make bot with 20 shillings" (83). The laws of Ina (688-725), though a century later, do not any more than those of Ethelbert seem to distinguish betrothal from purchase: "If a man buy a wife and the marriage take not place, let him give the money," &c. (31).

But it is in the Wisigothic and Lombardic laws that we find most matter under this head. The former attribute almost absolute authority in the betrothals of women to the father or his representative. One of the more ancient enactments bears that "if any have had a girl betrothed to him with the will of her father or of the other near relations to whom by law this power is given," the girl may not marry another she do, both parties shall be handed over to the power of him who had had her betrothed to him with her parents' will, and any relatives abetting the marriage shall pay 1 pound of gold. The betrothal contract is by the Wisigothic law treated as so far equivalent to marriage, that the term adultery is freely used of its violation by the parties. A husband or betrothed are moreover declared not to be responsible for killing those who commit adultery with their wives or betrothed (l. 4). Again, the same title of the law embraces the rupture of both contracts (De divorciis Nuptiarum et discidio Sponsorum, t. i.).

The Wisigothic Code has been always held to have been drawn up under priestly influence. The Lombards were never looked on with favour by the Church. Yet between the two systems of legislation there is less difference on the head which occupies us than might be expected. The Lombard law, like the Wisigothic, adopts from Rome the two years' maximum for delay in carrying out a betrothal contract. (Laws of Rotharis, A.D. 638 or 643, c. 178.)

The laws of Luitprand (A.D. 717) are very severe against too early marriages of girls. If any betroth to himself or carry away [as his wife] a girl under 12, he is to compound as for rape.

The forms of betrothal among the barbarian conquerors of the Roman Empire must have been infinitely varied. The Salic betrothal was by the offer of a sedes and denarius, and the contract could be made between absent parties; as when Chlodowig (Clovis) espoused Chlotildi through his envoys (Nelegarius, Epit. c. 18).

Cauciani, from the Euphemian Codex of Verona, has published two formulae, one apparently of a Lombard, the other of a Salic betrothal (vol. ii. pp. 467, 476), which, although the text of them may be somewhat later than the period to which this work relates, no doubt, like most written formulae, exhibit with some faithfulness the usages of an earlier period. In both of them the betrothal has palpably become a judicial act. A sword and a glove are the main features of the former: "For this cometh M., for that he willeth to espouse D., daughter of P. Camest thou because of this?" "I came." "Give pledge, that thou wilt make unto her a fourth part of whatever thou hast; and by this sword and this glove I betroth to thee M., my daughter, and thou, receive her by title of betrothal." "Thou, father of the woman, give pledges to him that thou givest her to him to wife, and sendest her under his mundium. And thou, give [pledge] that thou receivest her; and whoever shall withdraw, let him compound in a thousand soldi." The Salic formula is confined to the case of the second marriage of a "Salic widow;" it belongs self-evidently to the Carolingian era, and in it the ideas of betrothal and of marriage seem to run into each other.

We come now to the legislation of the Church itself on the subject of betrothal. Tertullian in his treatise on Idolatry (c. 16), seeking to determine what actions and matters a Christian is not to meddle with on account of their idolatrous character, says: "But as concerning the offices of private and common solemnities, as these . . . of betrothal or marriage, I think no danger is to be apprehended from any the objects must be considered for which the office is performed. I deem those pure in themselves, for neither . . . the ring nor the marriage bond flows from the worship of any idol." It may be fairly concluded from this passage that towards the end of the 2nd or beginning of the 3rd century, betrothal was considered by the Church as being in itself a perfectly valid and lawful contract, and even when celebrated between heathens, involving no contamination for the Christiana who should take part in the proceedings connected with it.

It is unnecessary to notice the forgeries which support sacerdotal claims. The first unimpeachable authority on the subject is found in Basil's Canonical Epistle to Amphilochous, bishop of Iconium. It will be seen that he treats of betrothal in a quite incidental manner. In one passage (c. xxii.) he takes the case of men who have violently carried away the betrothed of another; these are not to be received to communion until they put their wives away, and submit to the will of those to whom these were at first betrothed. Yet he views betrothal as so far approximating to marriage that he allows (c. 69) a reader or subdeacon seducing his betrothed before marriage to be admitted to communion after a year's penance, without loss of office, but so that he cannot be promoted; but in case of his misconducting himself without betrothal with a woman he is to be deprived of his office itself.

Of more interest, both in itself, and as being probably, the first genuine utterance of a Pope which suffices to dispose of a whole mass of antedated forgeries, is a letter of Pope Benediet I. (A.D. 573-7) to the Patriarch of Gran. The Pope had been asked whether, where a girl had been betrothed by word of mouth only, and died before marriage, her sister could marry the same man. The Pope replied that it was consanguinal intercourse that made two one; "how by bare words of betrothal they can be made one we can in nowise see. Do not therefore deny, that which you can show no reason for denying."

It is indeed evident, from the application itself, that the question whether the contract of betrothal did not of itself create a consanguinity between the parties, sufficient to render the subsequent marriage of either with a kinsman or kinswoman of the other unlawful, was already a moot one. We might not be surprised if Gregory the Great (A.D. 590-603), in whose powerful mind a strong vein of ascetic feeling is discoverable—should have taken the opposite side to Benedict. He remains indeed quite within the law in allowing a betrothed woman to dissolve her engagement in order to enter a convent; writing (bk. vi. Ep. 20) to the bishop and defensor of Naples, where one Stephen, betrothed to a girl who had been "converted" in one of the monasteries of the city, was alleged to detain her and her property, that after due examination he was to be exhorted to restore the girl herself and her things, and if he did not, then to be compelled to do so.

The Council (3) of Constantinople in Trullo (A.D. 680-1) is the first oecumenical authority for assimilating betrothal to marriage, so far as to make it adultery to marry a betrothed woman in the life-time of her first betrothed. Now about this period indeed betrothal becomes a very frequent subject of church legislation or church jurisprudence. One of the canons (105) of a Council held in England, under Archbishop Theodore, towards the end of the 7th century, provides that if a man after betrothing to himself a wife, will not live with her, he shall restore the money given to him and add a third to it. Another (129) forbids parents to give a betrothed girl to another "if she resist altogether," but they may send her to a convent (for this seems the cruel sense of the enactment). A collection of canons of the Irish Church, supposed to be also of the end of this century, enacts, somewhat singularly, that when betrothed girls have been dishonoured by other men, they are to be bought and given back to their first betrothed (bk. xli. c. 37). The "Excerpt" of Pope Gregory III. (A.D. 731-41) mentions five years, "or more humanely three," as the penance for attempting to seduce another's betrothed. In the case (which is that mentioned in the 25th canon of the Council of Ancyra) of a man seducing the sister of his betrothed, and of his victim killing herself, all who are implicated in the deed must do ten years' penance, or some say seven (c. 18). The first Council of Rome under Pope Zacharias, A.D. 743, anathematizes those who rashly presume to steal a maid or widow for their wife, unless betrothed to them (c. 7). The Carolingian Capitularies enact that a betrothed girl ravished by another man is to be given back to her former betrothed, but that in case of his refusing to take her she may marry a stranger, but not her ravisher, under pain of anathema (c. 124), and follow generally in the tracts of the spurious letters of Evaristus and Siricius.

Finally, the reply of Pope Nicolas to the Bulgarians in 860, shows that at the end of the 9th century the form of betrothal had become confined to the placing of the ring, by way of earnest, on the woman's finger, and her endorsement by the man in the presence of invited witnesses, a greater or less interval separating betrothal from marriage.

If we are not mistaken, the history of the 8 or 9 first centuries shows in the Church a gradual recession from the freedom both of the Jewish and of the Roman law upon the subject of betrothal. Two causes seem to have operated to produce this result,—on the one hand, the influence of the barbarian codes, which generally look upon the woman more or less as the property of her father, if not of her family generally,—on the other, that of the growing spirit of asceticism in reference to the relations between the sexes, leading to the encroachment of the Church upon the domain of the civil power as respects the whole subject of marriage, and thereby again fostering restrictive church legislation with all its attendant covetousnesses and corruptions. The Carolingian era, with which we break off, is that of the first establishment of this system. [J. M. L.]

BIDDING-PRAYER. This term is used by Bingham to designate a prayer of a particular form uttered by the Deacon in the Liturgy. As, however, the modern English Bidding-Prayer appears to be of mediæval origin, it seems best to treat of the ancient prayer under its proper designation [PROSHONESIS]. [C.]

BIGAMY. Under this head we shall designate only, according to modern usage, the case of matrimonial union to two persons at the same time; premising that until the beginning of the 17th century, at least, the term was applied to all cases of second marriage, whether during the existence of a prior union or after its dissolution; the word "polygamy" being applied to the former case. Thus Sir E. Coke in his 3rd Institute (p. 88) writes: "The difference between bigamy or trigamy and polygamy, is quia bigamus seu trigamus, etc., est qui diversis temporibus et successive duas seu tres, etc., uxores habuit: polygamus qui duas vel plures simul duxit uxores;" the distinction being thus made entirely to turn on the simultaneous or successive nature of the marriage relations. [BIGAMY.]

It is of course not from Jewish precedent that Christendom has borrowed its condemnation of bigamy. The foundation of the Church's law in this matter lies in the teaching of our Lord, Matt. xix. 4 and foll.; Mark x. 5 and foll., and in the developments of that teaching by St. Paul. (Compare also, as an early and quite consonant authority, Hermas, Bk. ii. Man. 4; likewise Apost. Const. Bk. vi. c. 14.) In church practice indeed it has been always contested whether the expressions in 1 Tim. iii. 2, 12; Tit. i. 6, which our version renders "husband" or "husbands of one wife," apply to simultaneous marriages only, or to successive marriages as well. The ordinary Protestant interpretation assigns to them the more restricted meaning; but this conclusion will probably appear the more doubtful, the more Christian antiquity and the usages of the time are studied. Whatever might be Jewish theory on the subject, there is no hint whatever in the New Testament at either bigamy or polygamy as a Jewish practice, and neither was certainly legal in either Ephesus or in Crete, when the Epistles above referred to were written to the respective bishops of those churches. Monogamy was the law both of Greece and of Rome. So long therefore as the Roman power subsisted, the monogamy inculcated by the Church was also enforced by the law. The influence upon this state of things of the barbarian invasions must have been very various. Tacitus notes of the ancient Germans that "almost alone among the barbarians they content themselves with one wife, except a very few, who not through lust but for honour's sake enter into several marriages" (Germ. 18). His words, however, appear to have applied more or less to all the Teutonic races. On the other hand, among the Celtic races, or those mixed with them, e.g. the Britons, Scots, and Hibernians of our own islands,—a community of wives or something closely equivalent to it is testified to by Caesar, Jerome, and Strabo. Subjection to Rome, the preaching of Christianity, did not suffice to introduce monogamic habits, and we find Gildas lamenting that his countrymen were not restrained by polygamy from frequenting harlots (quam plurimas uxores habentes, sed scortantes). Monogamy seems to have been equally unknown to the Slavonic races, as well as to the Tartar; Attila's harem is well known. It is also to be presumed that the weakening of the Roman power in Asia allowed old polygamic practices, familiar to Orientals, to revive. With these preliminary observations we shall endeavour to trace briefly the course of Church legislation on the subject.

The first authority we find is a doubtful one—that of those Canons attributed to the Council of Nicaea (A.D. 325), which are only to be found in the Arabic version. The 24th of these (26th in the version of the Monroite Abraham Echellensis) bears that "none ought to marry two wives at once, nor to bring in to his wife another woman for pleasure and fleshly desire." If a priest, such person is to be forbidden to officiate and excluded from communion, until such time as he cast out the second, whilst he ought to retain the first; and so of a layman. The 66th Canon (71st of the Echellensian version) enters in still more detail into the case of a priest or deacon taking another wife, whether free or slave, without having dismissed the first, the penalty being deposition; or for a layman in the same sin, excommunication. The 67th Canon again (22nd Echellensian) enacts that whosoever shall have accepted two women at once in marriage shall himself be excommunicated with his second wife. It is difficult to attribute Nicene authority to these Canons, which show so vividly the corruptions that grew up in the more distant Oriental churches. But whether illustrative of the degeneracy of Arabian Christendom before the rise of Mohammedanism in the 7th century, or of the influence of Mohammedan polygamy itself upon it at a later period, they are not the less valuable. The tradition of a condemnation of bigamy by the Nicene fathers appears also from the singular collection attributed to them, from a Vatican Codex, intitled by Labbe and Mansi (see vol. ii. p. 1029 and foll.), "Sanctiones et decreta alia ex quatuor regum ad Constantinum libris decernpta." The 5th chapter of the 1st book bears that "to no Christian is it lawful to have two or more wives at once, after the manner of the Gentiles, who marry three or four at once; but one is to be married after the other, that is, the contract is to be made with a second after the death of the first." If any dares to go counter to this prohibition, he is to be excommunicated. Reference is made to the holy fathers assembled in the Council, and the enactment is declared to be binding on all Christians, whether laymen or clerics, priests, deacons, princes, kings and emperors.

The "Sanctions and Decrees," whatever be their authority, belong evidently to the Eastern Church. But from the canonical epistle of Basil to Bishop Amphilochius of Iconium, the spuriousness both of the above quoted canons from the Arabic, and of the "Sanctions and Decrees," so far as they claim Nicene authority, may be inferred, since he says that the subject of polygamy has been pretermitted by the fathers, assigning a four years' penance for it before the offender can be admitted to communion (C. lxxx.).

The practice of the West, except in far outlying provinces, seems to have been generally more strict than in the East, and we have thus to infer the spirit of the Western Church towards bigamy chiefly from enactments against concubinage. The first Council of Toledo (A.D. 400) excludes from communion a man having a faithful wife and a concubine, but not one who has a concubine and no wife, so long as he contents himself with one woman (c. 17). Passing over an alleged decree of Pope Celestin (A.D. 423-32), which declares that of Pope Celestin (A.D. 423-32), which declares that a second wife married against church forbiddance is not a wife, although the first should not have been betrothed (c. 4, Gratian); we should notice a letter (12) of Leo the Great (A.D. 440-61), addressed to the African bishops of the province of Mauritania Caesariensis, which speaks of an actual case of bigamy in the priesthood of that province. Neither apostolic nor legal authority, it says, allow the husband of a second wife to be raised to the pastoral office, much less him who, "as it has been related to us, is the husband of two wives at once" (c. 5). Another letter of Leo's (dated 458 or 9), to Rusticus Bishop of Narbonne, is probably the first authority for the lower modern view of the concubinate. Not every woman united to a man is the man's wife, for neither is every son his father's heir. . . . Therefore a wife is one thing, a concubine another; as a handmaid is one thing, a freewoman another. . . . Wherefore if a clerk of any place give his daughter in marriage to a man having a concubine, it is not to be taken as if he gave her to a married man; unless haply the woman appear to have been made free, and lawfully jointured and restored to honour by a public marriage (c. 4). Those who by their father's will are married to men are not in fault if the women which such men had were not had in marriage (c. 5). Since a wife is one thing, a concubine another, to cast from one's bed the bondmaid and to receive a wife of ascertained free birth is not a doubling of marriage, but a progress in honourable conduct (c. 6).—The Council of Angers in 453 enacts excommunication against those who abuse the name of marriage with other men's wives in the lifetime of their husbands (c. 6). That of Vannes (A.D. 465) deals in the same way with those who having wives, except by reason of fornication, and without proof of adultery, marry others,—both enactments, however, pointing perhaps rather to marriage after separation.

Towards the same period, however (latter half of the 5th century), we must notice a Nestorian Synod held in Persia, under the presidency of Barstamas Archbishop of Nisibis, as affording probably the first instance of what may be called the modern Protestant interpretation of the Pauline μὴς ἑνωμένοις ἀνψ. A priest, its canons declare, "should be one who has one wife, as it is said in the Apostle's Epistle to Timothy, 'Whoever marries, let him have one wife; if he transgresses, he is to be separated from the Church and the priestly order. But if a priest not knowing marriage, or whose wife is dead, should wish for lawful marriage, let him not be forbidden by the bishop, whether he have wished to marry before or after his priesthood.'" Any one who contravenes these canons is anathematized, and if a priest, to be deposed (see Lubbe and Mansi, Conc., vol. viii. pp. 143-4). It is clear that the Nestorians in this case interpreted St. Paul as speaking not of successive but of simultaneous marriage. That this was not however the view of the Greek Church generally is evident from many authorities; see, for instance, the Canons of the Council of Constantinople in Trullo, A.D. 691 and following years.

If Burchard's collection is to be credited, a canon (16) was adopted by the 4th or 5th Council of Arles (A.D. 524 or 554) forbidding any man to have two wives at once, or a concubine at any time (see neque unquam concubinam). A collection of Irish Canons, supposed to belong to the close of the 7th century, shows that the Celtic kings of Ireland must, as in Britain in the days of Gildas, have had regular harems. The barbarous Latin title of one of its chapters (bk. xxiv. c. vii.) is, "De rege non habente uxores plurimas," and the Synod is represented as enacting (if the term can be used) as follows: "According as is the dignity which the king receives, so great should be his fear; for many women deprave his soul, and his mind, divided by the multitude of his wives, falls greatly into sin."

To the 8th century belongs one of the most curious incidents in the treatment of this question by the Church. In a letter of Pope Gregory II. (A.D. 714-30) to Boniface, the Apostle of Germany, written in answer to a series of questions put to him by the latter, we find the Pope treating the case of a wife, who through bodily infirmity becomes incapable of fulfilling the conjugal duty. Can the husband in such an event take a second wife? The Pope replies, that it is good for him to remain united to her. "But he who cannot contain" (referring evidently to 1 Cor. vii. 9), "let him marry rather," but without withdrawing maintenance "from her whom infirmity hinders, but no detestable fault excludes" from his bed—a decision closely akin to that of Luther and the Protestant theologians in the case of the Landgrave of Hesse. Further on (c. 6) the Pope condemns bigamy generally, "since that is not rightly to be deemed marriage which exceeds the number of two, for the yoke is not borne except by two" (quia nisi in duobus non geritur jugum)—not a very complimentary argument in favour of monogamy (S. Bonif. Epist. ed. Würdtwein, No. 24).

We find the question of the lawfulness of a second marriage in case of a wife's bodily infirmity recurring in a work not of much later date than Pope Gregory's letter to Boniface, Archbishop Egbert of York's Dialogue on Church Government (Dialogus per interrogationes et responsiones de institutione ecclesiastica). The archbishop is however more cautious than the Pope. He puts the case (c. 13) only in the shape of a dissolution of the marriage tie by agreement of both parties (ex convenientia amorum), because of the infirmity of one of them; can the healthy one marry again, the infirm one consenting, and promising continence? The archbishop implies that he may: "By change of times necessity breaks the law . . . in doubtful cases one should not judge (in ambiguis non est ferenda sententia)."

Another example in the 8th century, though bearing rather on concubinage than on bigamy, is to be found in certain replies reported to have been given by Pope Stephen III., whilst he was in France, in the town of Kierzy, at the Breton monastery (in Carisio villa Britannico monasterio), to various questions addressed to him A.D. 754. He expressed his approval of Pope Leo's view as to the propriety of dismissing a bondmaid concubine and marrying a freewoman, and (c. 3) in further reply to a case put to him of a man marrying a bondmaid in a foreign country, then returning to his own and marrying a freewoman, then again going back to the former country and finding his bondmaid wife married to another, gave it as his opinion that "such a one may take another bondmaid (si potest aliam accipere)," but not in the lifetime of the free wife.

The relaxation of the sanctity of the marriage tie in the Carolingian era seems indeed to have become extreme. This may be inferred, for instance, from the frequency of enactments forbidding married men to have concubines, for which see Ansegis, bk. vi. cc. 230, 433, and again bk. vii. c. 338, the last garnished with the somewhat naïf argument, "lest love of the concubine detach the man from his wife." A contemporary capitulary (A.D. 774) by Arechis Prince of Benevento, forbids a man having a lawful wife to give ought by any device to his sons or daughters born during her life of another unlawful wife (c. 8), an enactment which seemingly points at 8th century, though earlier than on bigamy, is reported to have been in III., whilst he was at Kierzy, at the Breton in Brittanico monasterio addressed to him A.D. 430, approval of Pope Leo's of dismissing a bonding a free woman, and case put to him of a in a foreign country, and marrying a free woman back to the former maid wife married opinion that "such a man (is potest aliam lifetime of the free

A contemporary records Prince of Beche a lawful wife to give sons or daughters mother unlawful wife in seemingly points at practices avowedly bigamous. The dismissal of wives by the Carolingian sovereigns, in order to marry others, becomes likewise so common that it is almost impossible to distinguish between patent bigamy and bigamy veiled under the name of divorce. At the summit of the Carolingian world the great emperor, besides actual and divorced wives, sets the law at defiance by keeping concubines. The East was even below the West in servility towards the vices of the sovereign. In the year 809 a Council of Constantinople pronounced a second marriage of the reigning emperor Constantine, after sending his first wife to a convent, lawful, on the ground that "the Divine law can do nothing against kings."

The reader is referred to the head DIGAMY for the further consideration of this subject; in the meanwhile we may conclude that, whilst the church of the eight or nine first centuries never formally sanctioned simultaneous marriage relations with two persons, it yet sometimes indirectly permitted them in outlying provinces in the case of a wife's infirmity, and certainly was not powerful enough to check them among the great of the ruler races, nor probably generally in the Carolingian era.

BIOTHANATOS (Βιοθανάτος). "Qui morte violenta perit," says Suicer, sub v.: as if it had been contracted from "biathanatos" which is the definition of "ol Biothavatoúvres," given by St. Chrysostom in disputing against the opinion that the souls of such after death become demons (De Lazaro Serm. ii. § 1; Op. vol. i. p. 727; Ed. Mozart. Comp. Tertull. De Anima, c. 57). According to Baronius, A.D. 138, n. 4-5, it was one of the terms applied to Christians generally by way of reproach for preferring to lose their lives sooner than deny Christ: an application that would have been unmeaning had not the prominent notion attached to the hands upon themselves, and hence, according to the story told by Cassin (Collat. iii. 6; comp. las. viii. 14), a monk who had thrown himself into a well under temptation of the devil, and been drowned, was all but reckoned by his abbot among such, as being unworthy to be commemorated among those who had gone to their rest in peace. Pagan moralists, we are told by Mr. Lecky (Europ. Mor. ii. 46, et seq.), condemned suicide upon four grounds. "Christian theologians," he adds, "were the first to maintain dogmatically that a man who destroys his own life has committed a crime similar both in kind and in magnitude to that of an ordinary murderer. . . . On the other hand, the high position assigned to resignation in the moral scale, . . . and, above all, the Christian doctrine of the remedial and providential character of suffering, have proved sufficient protection against despair. Enthusiasm, in early times, indeed, animated many to court martyrdom; and Christian women were honoured, or at least excused, for committing suicide to guard their chastity. But this feeling died away with the occasions which evoked it, and even asceticism was gradually subjected to rule, when experience had shown the extreme limits to which it could be carried without injury to the constitution." The "Circumcelliones," a wild sect of the Donatists, are frequently reproached for looking upon suicide in the light of a virtue by St. Augustine (Cont. Ep. Parm. iii. 6; Brev. Coll. com. Dom. Die iiii. c. 8, § 13, &c.). By the 18th canon of the first Council of Braga, A.D. 560 (Mansi ix. 774-84, and Pagi, Ibid.), those who committed it in any way "were neither to be commemorated at the oblation, nor to be carried to the grave with psalm-singing." BIRD (AS SYMBOL). The birds represented in the earliest Christian art are generally distinguished by their species [see DOVE, EAGLE, PHOENIX, &c.]. This is not only the case in the early sarcophagi and frescoes of the catacombs, but it is specially remarkable in the first gothic works of the Lombard churches in the North of Italy. See Ruskin (Stones of Venice, Appendix, vol. i., Byzantine and Lombard Carvings) where early Lombard work is contrasted with Byzantine. But in the very earliest tombs (see Aringhi, Il. 324, and De Rossi almost passim, Bottari t. 178. vill. tav. 174, &c.) birds assignable to no particular species are introduced, apparently with symbolic purpose. In De Rossi they occur so often on tombs, with or without the palm branch, that they may clearly be taken as images of the released soul seeking its home in heaven. Aringhi recognizes this in a passage of some beauty (Il. 324); he takes the lightness and aerial nature of the Bird as a symbol of the aspiration of faithful spirits "quorum jugis potissimum conversatio, ut Apostolus ait, in coelis est" (see also Ps. cxxiii. 6 of the released soul). He refers to Bede who says "Volucres sunt qui aurum cor habent, et celestia concupiscunt;" and who looks on the bird also as a sign of the resurrection. The faithful, like birds "obviam Xti in aëre ex mortuis sunt ituri." [Note the curious analogy of the Psyche-butterfly, and compare with it Hadrian's "Anima vagula, blaudula," &c., as if addressed to a thing of uncertain flight.] Caged birds are occasionally found in paintings or other representations (Boldetti, p. 154, tav. vi.). They are supposed to represent the human soul in the prison of the flesh, or they may be emblems of the imprisonment of a martyr. Martigny describes a mosaic in the tribune of St. Maria in Transtevere, in Rome, where one of these cages is placed near the prophet Jeremiah, with inscription "Christus Dominus captus est in peccata nostris;" and another by Isaiah, with the words "Ecce virgo concipiet et pariet filium"—referring thus to the Passion and the Incarnation of our Lord.

The symbolism of the cross by a bird's outspread wings is Tertullian's (De Oratore, c. 29 [al. 24]): Herzog conjectures that the pictures or carvings of birds with flowers and fruits combined are symbolic of Paradise. In the illustrations to Le Blant's MSS. Chrétiennes de la Gaule nondescript birds are found almost passim, generally in pairs on each side of the monogram of Christ, and almost always with the letters A ω, which appear more frequently in the ancient documents of Christian France.

Pairs of drinking birds, peacocks (see s. v.), and also of conventional shape, are still to be seen among the most ancient fragments of Byzantine domestic sculpture in Venice (Stones of Venice, ii. 138, plate xi.). They may be carried back to the 11th or 12th century, perhaps: at all events they are clearly decorative repetitions of the bird-symbols in the catacombs and earlier monuments.

BIRRUS, cf. BYRRHIUS. (Bēpos, Βύρριος.) The word Birrus or Byrrhus was an old Latin word (Festus in con.) equivalent to "rufus" or red, and identical probably with the Greek ροῦβός. So St. Isidore seems to have thought, though late copyists, ignorant as most of them were of Greek, have made nonsense of his text. "Birrus a Graeco vocabulum trahit: illi enim birrum bibrium (? ροῦβός or Βύρριος) dicunt." (Orig. lib. xx. cap. 24.) No traces of the word, as the name of a garment, are to be found before the Christian era. The earliest known instance of such an use is in Artemidorus (early in 2nd century). Speaking of the significance of various articles of dress, when seen in dreams, he says that the Chlamys (a short military cloak), "which some call Munyas, others Ephestris, others Byrrus, portends trouble and difficulty, and to prisoners under trial portends condemnation, by reason that it compasses about and confines the body" (Oneirocritica, lib. ii. cap. 3). Other writers identify it with the "amphibalus" (q. v.). "Birrus: amphibalus villosus," says Papius. And the author of the life of St. Deicolus (Acta SS. Ord. Bened. saec. 2, p. 105), "Birrum . . . quem Graeci amphibalum vocant." A fresco in the cemetery of Pontianus (Aringhi, Roma Sotterranea, tom. i. p. 383), in which are represented three laymen, SS. Milix, Abdon, and Sennes, and one ecclesiastic, St. Vicentius, will probably give a good idea of the difference between the Chlamys, the Birrus, and the Casula (or Planeta). St. Milix is represented wearing a Chlamys; Abdon and Sennes a heavy cloak reaching from the shoulders to the back of the knee, and in form differing but little from the Chlamys (see woodcut, p. 8). But the Birrus (if such be the garment intended) is provided with a hood, or cowl, for wearing over the head, as were most such outer garments when intended, as was the Birrus, for out-door use. And this hood is here represented as worn on the head. Such a rough Birrus as this was allowed to be worn by slaves under the provisions of the Theodosian Code (Lex I. de Habitu, speaking of them as viles birri). And hence some have inferred, though wrongly, that the Birrus was at that time regarded as a garment suitable only for persons of the lowest class. This was not so. There were "viles birri," cheap cloaks, such as those here allowed as a privilege to slaves; there were "pretiosi birri," costly cloaks, such as those of which St. Augustine says that they might perhaps be fitting for a bishop, but not fitting for Augustine, "a poor man, as his parents had been poor before him" (Sermo de Diversis, 356, tom. v. p. 1579). From the 4th century onward the mention of the Birrus is not unrequent, as of an out-door dress used alike by laymen (St. Augustine, De Verbis Apost. Serm. xviii. cap. 10) and by ecclesiastics. And in these later notices it is almost always referred to as being either a somewhat expensive dress, or as having a certain secular character attaching to it as compared with the dress worn by monks. Thus Cassianus (circ. 418 A.D.) describing the dress of monks, says (De Habitu Monach. lib. i. cap. 7) that they avoid the costliness and the pretence to dignity implied in the Planeta and the Birrus (Planetaeum simul atque birrorum: pretia simul et ambitionem declinant). And St. Isidore in like manner couples together the Planeta and the Birrus as garments which are not allowable to monks (Linco non licet Monachum Indui. Orarium, birros, planetas, non est fas uti, Regula, cap. 13). And this will account for the peculiar language of the 12th Canon of the Council of Gangra (a. 319), warning men against attributing too much importance to the monastic dress for its own sake, and despising those who wore "birri" (τροῖς Βύρριος ποροῦντας). Towards the close of the 6th century we find St. Gregory the Great using the term "Birrus albus" in speaking of the vest: "Christening-Cloak" worn by the newly baptized (Lib. vii. Indict. i. Epist. 5). And the word has many descendants in mediæval Latin, such as Biretum, Birra, Biratti (the Carmelite Monks, "Les Freres Barrez," were so called); and in old French, as "Bure" (same cloth, Bureau (Fr. and Eng.), a table covered with coarse cloth, such as was used for official business (Menage). BISHOP (Επίσκοπος, a term adopted by the Christian Church through the LXX. usage of it, and first by the Hellenic portion of the Church, ἐπίσκοπῃ [Acts i. 20] being formed from it to express the office) = in the Acts, in St. Paul's Epistles, and in the contemporary St. Clement of Rome (but wrongly so interpreted in the spurious Epist. of St. Ignatius to Hero, ec. iii. viii.), first an appellative (Acts xx. 28), and then an interchangeable title, of the ἑπισκόποι, who ministered to the several Churches under the Apostles;

but from the earliest years of the 2nd century, and from St. Ignatius onwards, the distinctive name, adopted as such in every language used by Christians, Eastern (Syriac, ܩܦܕܝܐ); Arabic, مُسْتَف; Ethiopic, ሉዲዎስ; Coptic, ΜΕΤΡΙΚΟΝΟΡ) as well as Western (Scandinavian and Teutonic, as well as Latinized), of the single president of a diocese (παροικία, διοί-κηση), who came in the room of the Apostles,

having presbyters, deacons, and laity under him,
and possessing exclusive power of ordination, and primarily of confirmation, with primary authority in the administration of the sacraments and of

ii. E. v. 24; St. Clem. Alex. Quis Dives Salvator, and πρεσβύτερος); while St. Augustin, after 1 Pet. v. 1, call presbyters "compresbyteri nostri;" and 4th century writers, as Ambrosiust. in 1 Tim. iii. 10, and the Qu. Vot.

et Nov. Test. cl. in Append. to St. Aug. III. li. 93, describe the bishop as "primus presbyter" or "inter presbyteros," and speak of "compresbyteri" and "consacriotes" (the use of "prælati" for bishop exclusively is altogether modern; but "De Prælatore Simplicitate" was a title of St. Cyp. de Unit. Eccl.; and the word is used for bishops and presbyters together in St. Greg. M. Reg. Pastoral.; it is used also of an abbat, as in Conc. Suss. li. A. D. 853).

Called also, and from an early date, by names exclusively belonging to bishops specifically such, as Ἀρχιεπίσκοπος, or Principes, Ecclesie, or Populi (Origen, cont. Cels. li.; Euseb. H. E. vi. 28, viii. 1; St. Chrys. de Sacerd. li. 14; St. Jerome repeatedly; Paulinus, Epist. ad Alys. xlv.; Optat. i. p. 15, ed. 1679; and so ἀρχιεπίσκοπος for bishopric, as e. g. in Eusebius, H. E. vi. 29); or Principes simply (St. Jerome in Ps. xlv. and Ev. Ix. 17, &c.; and so in the 5th century [or more probably, in D'Achery, and in Haddan and Stubbs, Conc. II.]; Rector, as in Hilary the Deacon, in Epist. Iv., and Greg. M. Reg. Pastor.; Præsul (Pope Julius, Epist. ad Euseb. ap. Constant. i. 382 [see Du Cange], and so Præsulatus = Episcopatus in e. g. Cassiodor.); Προηγούμενος and Πρωτοκαθήμενος (Herm. Past. Vra. li. 9); Πάπας or Papa (especially, at first, in Africa, Dion. Alex. ad Philen. in Euseb. H. E. vii. 7; Tertull. de Pudic. xlii.; Letters of St. Cyprian, St. Augustine, Silvan. Apollin. &c., and in St. Jerome, Prudentius, Sulp. Severus, &c.—compare also Abbas, in the Church of Abyssinia), used down to a period later than Charlemagne (e. g. in Walaf. Strab. de Reb. Eccl. vii., about A. D. 840, and Eulog. Cordub. about A. D. 850) of all bishops (Bligh. II. li. 7; Casaubon, Exercit. xiv. § 4; Thomassin, I. l. 4, 50; Suicer; Du Cange); and in the East (as still in the Greek and Russian Churches) of presbyters also, and especially of abbots (but Gour's distinction, πάπας = a bishop, and παπάς = one of the lower orders of clergy, seems a refinement), but gradually restricted by usage in the West to the bishop of Rome (see Conc. Tolet. A. D. 400, Labbe, ii. 1227; Conc. Rom. Patm. A. D. 503; and Ennodius, Lib. Apologet., of the same date; Conc. Constantin. A. D. 681, Act. 1, and 2; Gieseler refers to Jo. Dieemann, de Vocis Papæ Actibus, Viteberg. 1671), and finally and absolutely so limited by Greg. VII. in a Council of Rome, A. D. 1073 (Baron. Martyrol. Jan. 10); and in the East to the bishop of Alexandria (Thomassin, I. i. 50, § 14, Du Cange; but that it was granted formally to St. Cyril of Alexandria by Pope Celestine [Niceph. xiv. 34] is a manifest and confessed [Baron. as above] fiction);—sometimes, again, in the 5th century, Ἀρχιεπίσκοπος (St. Aug. Epist. 142; St. Ambrose in 1 Cor. xi. 1; St. Jerome in 1 Cor. xi. 1, iv. 14, and from Rev. i. 11, and compare Gal. i. 8, iv. 14, and possibly 1 Cor. xi. 10); and so, in Saxon England, God's "Bydels," or messengers ("Bydels" Laus of Ethelred, vii. 19, and of Canute, 26);—and Ἐπίσκοπος, and the office Ἐπισκοπία (Philostorg. iii. 4, 15); and, in the 8th and later centuries, latinoised into Speculator (in Conc. Suss. li. A. D. 862); and varied by Anglo-Saxon "pompositas," in episcopal signatures to charters, into Inspector, Superspector, Visitor, Inspector Plebis Dei, Katescopus Legis Dei, &c. &c. (Kemble, Cod. Dipl. passim);—called also Patriarcha (so Dupin, Dissert. i. § 5, and Suicer; the name being first confined to the higher bishops, see, to Suicer, by Socrates v. 8, c. A. D. 440), yet only theoretically so called in St. Greg. Naz. (Orat. 20, 30, 41) and St. Greg. Nysa. (Orat. Funer. in Melet.); and see Bligh. II. li. 9), but as an ordinary name under the Gothic kings of Italy (Athalaric, Epist. ad Joann. Pap. in Cassiodor. ix. 15).

Called also by names indicative of their functions) as, ἱεραρχία (Pseudo-Dion. Areop. Eccl. Hierarch. c. v.; &c.);—Sacerdos or Pontifex, often of bishops exclusively (Taylor, Epist. Assert. § 27); and so Aeropyria for bishopric, e. g. in Euseb. vi. 29.—Summus or Maximus Pontifex, or Summus Sacerdos (ironically in Tertull. de Pudic. i., but seriously, de Bapt. xvii.; and of all bishops as such, in St. Ambrose, St. Jerome, St. Augustine, Silvan. Apollin. Qu. in Vet. et Nov. Test. ci. &c.; Conc. Agath. A. D. 508, can. 35, and down to the 11th century [see Du Cange], the analogy of the Jewish Ἀρχιεπίσκοπος occurring as early as St. Clem. Rom. ad Cor. 1);—Pater Patrum and Episcoporum Episcoporum, but rhetorically only (Silvan. Apollin. Epist. vi. 1, after Pseudo-Clem. ad Jacob. Epist. 1); while in Africa, where the power of the metropolitan developed more slowly, St. Cyprian (p. 158, Fell) in Conc. Carth. declares that no one in Africa "Episcoporum se Episcoporum constituit;" and Conc. Carth. A. D. 256 (in St. Cyprian), and Conc. Hippon. Reg. A. D. 394, can. 39, in Cod. Con. Eccl. Afric., forbid expressly the assumption of such titles as "Principes Sacerdotum, aut Summus Sacerdos, aut aliquid hujusmodi," and command even the Primate of Africa to be called by no other title than that of "primæ sedis Episcopus;"—or again from the 4th century (but the term was also in substance in St. Ignatius, ad Ephes. vi. Ἐπισκοπῶν ἐς αὐτὸν τὸν Κόριον, and St. Cyp. Epist. 55, 63; and cf. 2 Cor. v. 20), Vicarius Christi—Domini—Dei (St. Basil. M. Constit. Haer. iii. 3; St. Cyp. Epist. 62, 69; Firmilian in St. Cyp. Epist. 55, 75; Conc. Carth. lii. in St. Cyprian, A. D. 256, can. lxxix.; St. Jerome, Epist. li. al. lvii.; Pseud. Dion.  For the nature and institution of the Christian ministry as such—in so far as it is common to bishops and presbyters—see CLERGY, PRESBY-TERS. The special episcopal office as above described,—consisting in a presidency over the clergy and laity of a particular diocese, with a veto, and with a sole power of ordination,—and whether regarded [with later schoolmen] as one order with the presbyterate, on the ground of the powers of the ministry common to both,
 differed only by peculiar and additional powers belonging to bishops, or (according to the earlier and more common view) as a distinct order, on the ground of those additional powers,—finds its actual institution implied and recorded in the N. T.: 1. in the position of St. James of Jerusalem (Acts xii. 17, xv. 13, xxi. 18, thl. ii. 0), affirmed also by all antiquity to have been bishop of Jerusalem;—2. in the appointment by St. Paul when his "measure" (1 Cor. x. 16) grew too large for his own personal supervision, of single officers, with powers of ordination (1 Tim. iii. 13, Tit. l. 5) and jurisdiction (both in church worship, 1 Tim. ii. 1-12, and over all church members, including presbyters, 1 Tim. v. 1-22, Tit. i.
 5, ii.), and probably of confirmation (1 Tim. v.
 22), in the Apostle's stand (1 Tim. i. 3, Tit. i. 5),
 i. e. of bishops in the later sense of the term (removable, like later bishops, and, as it seems, actually removed, when the needs of the Church in a particular case required it),—viz. Timothy at Ephesus, and Titus in Crete, certainly (and as the Fathers with one accord); and, not improbably, Epaphroditus at Philippi (Phil. ii. 25, and eo Theodoret in 1 Tim. vi. 1), and Archippus at Colosse (Col. iv. 17); to whom the Fathers add a great many more (see a list in Apost. Constit. vii. 47, and among moderns in Andrewes, Epist. l. ad Pet.

Molin., Opp. Posth. pp. 185, 180);—3. in the "Ἀγγελος of Rev. i.-iii. [ANGELS OF CHURCHES], who were real individual persons, although symbolized as stars (Rev. i. 20), just as the Churches
 they governed were real Churches, which are symbolized likewise as ecclesiasticks; and who are proved to have been bishops, (i.) by the analogy of Gal. i. 8, iv. 14; (ii.) by their standing for and representing their several Churches; (iii.) by the fact (see further on) that St. John appointed bishops from city to city in these verified; (iv.) by the current interpretation of the term from early times, as in St. Jerome, St. Ambrose, St. Aug., Oecumen. and Arctans in Apost. p. &c.; to which may be added the probable mention (the reading of Rev. ii. 20 being not altogether certain) of the wife of one of them.
 And these intimations find their counterpart and confirmation, (1) in express statements of early Fathers, as (i.) St. Clem. Rom. ad Cor. l. 44, that the Apostles, having appointed presbyter-bishops and deacons in the several Churches in the first instance, proceeded, as a further and distinct step, in order to provide for the continuance of the ministry without schisms or quarrels, to appoint some further institution, whereby the succession of such presbyters and deacons might be kept up, as first by the Apostles themselves, so after them by other chosen men;
 i. e. in other words, instituted the order of bishops:

 [Joannes] Evangelium, rogatus ab Asine Epit-scopis";—testifying to the appointment by St.
 John of bishops from city to city, and to their existence as a settled and established order from his time. (2) In the fact, that bishops in the later sense are actually found in every Church whatsoever, from the moment that any evidence exists at all; and that such evidence exists,
 either simply to an actual bishop at the time,
 or more commonly to such a bishop as in succession to a line of predecessors traced up to

Apostles, and with no intimation of such episcopate being anything else but the original, appointed, and unbroken order: and this, in the case of Antioch, and of Asia Minor generally, as early as the first decade of the 2nd century, in other cases within the first forty years of that century; in others, as e. g. Ephesus, Alexandria, Jerusalem, Athens, within the last quarter of the first—i. e. either close upon the death of the last Apostle, or within about a quarter of a century of it, or long before it happened—a space of time within which, taken at the longest, it is historically impossible that so great a revolution (if it had been one) should have been not only accomplished but forgotten. A detailed list of these cases may be found in an Excursus by Professor Lightfoot On the Philippians. The only discoverable exceptions,—that of the Church of Corinth when St. Clement wrote to it, and that of Philippi when St. Polycarp wrote to it,—are so few and so temporary, as to prove merely that the whole of the needs of a rapidly growing Church could not be supplied at once, and that circumstances (as e. g. the martyrdom perhaps, or that deportation, of an Apostle) might leave this or that Church temporarily unprovided with a bishop. In the words of Ambroaster (i. e. Hilary the Deacon), it so happened, "quia aliqui rectores Ecclesie non omnibus locis fuerant constituti" (In 1 Cor. xi. 2). And there certainly were bishops in both the places named immediately afterwards. Nor, further, (3) was there any substantial difference in the office itself from that subsequently so styled. St. Clement of Rome, for instance, so absolutely represented his Church as to write in the name of that Church; and is described by Irenaeus Pastor (Vis. ii. 4) as officially communicating in its name with foreign Churches; and is placed by St. Irenaeus and others as one in a series of bishops, all so called in the same sense. And although the succession of the heads of the school at Alexandria (for which see Bing. III. x. 5) may well have been more important in point of influence than that of the bishops of that see, it did not interfere with the office and succession of those bishops, which is carefully recorded (as is that of all the principal sees) by Eusebius. Nor again does St. Irenaeus, who speaks of a "succession" also of "presbyters," and indeed calls bishops themselves occasionally "presbyters," know of any difference between the bishop of Rome of his own time (assuredly a bishop in the later sense) and the succession of single heads of the Church of Rome, whom he names in order from Apostolic times down to that same bishop.

The Episcopate then is historically the continuation, in its permanent elements, of the Apostolate. And, accordingly, the reasons assigned for the actual appointment of the episcopate are: (1) as given by St. Paul himself, to take the place of the Apostles (Tim. i. 3; Tit. i. 5), and for the better maintenance of the faith (ib.), and in order to a due ordination of the ministry (Tit. i. 5). To these the Fathers add, (2) other reasons, drawn apparently from their own experience of the benefits of the episcopate: as St. Clem. Rom. and St. Jerome, who allege it to have been instituted as a preventive of schisms; and St. Irenaeus and Tertullian, a little later than the first named, who regard it as a safeguard of the faith (and see 1 Tim.

i. 3; Tit. ii. 1); and St. Cyprian, a little later still, who chiefly dwells upon it as a bond of unity; in which point of view St. Ignatius also had regarded it at the beginning. The further suggestion hazarded by St. Jerome—that it was an afterthought of the Apostles, suggested to them by the schisms at Corinth—is inconsistent with the fact that bishops existed before those schisms. And the gradual spread of the institution is best explained by the sensible and natural remark of Eriphanus, that ὅτι πάντα εὐθὺς ἠδυνήθησαν οἱ Ἀπόστολοι καταστήσαι, and that presbyters and deacons could administer a church for a while, until χρεία γέγονε (Haer. lxxv. § 5; Opp. i. 908). Bishops, who came in place of Apostles, could not, indeed, have existed both coincidentally and contemporaneously with those in whose place they came, but only as the growth of the Church, and the removal of the Apostles, required and made room for them. A theory started recently (by Rothe, Aufstieg der Christlichen Kirche, 354–392, quoted by Lightfoot) of a special and formal Council of the Apostles, which among other things instituted episcopacy, as one among a series of "second ordinances," seems to rest upon insufficient grounds (see Lightfoot's Excursus to the Philippians, before quoted), and to transform a really apostolic origin into a single definite and formal apostolic act: like the parallel but ancient tradition respecting the composition of the Creed. On the other hand, space of time literally shuts out the much older theory, viz. that there was a period at the beginning when each Church was governed by a college of presbyters, until "ecclesiastical authority" established a bishop over each college, in order to put an end to schisms, and notably to those at Corinth; unless, with St. Jerome, the originator of it, we take the "ecclesiastical authority" to mean the Apostles themselves, and the period in question to be reduced therefore so as to fall within the lifetime of the Apostles, and so refer it simply to the colleges of presbyters, who during such lifetime did undoubtedly govern the several Churches under the Apostles: thus rendering the hypothesis at once very true and equally innocuous, and in effect identifying it with the contemporary statement of St. Clem. Rom. before quoted. Later repetitions of St. Jerome's theory, and often of his words, may be found in writers of the Western Church (see quotations in Morinus, de Sac. Ord. III. ii. 11 sq.) down to the 10th or 11th century. But these are of course simply St. Jerome over again. Contemporaneously however with him,—yet (as it should seem) chiefly with the view of repressing the presumption (not of bishops but of deacons, or (as in Augustin's case) in order to turn a courteous compliment to a presbyter (viz. St. Jerome),—the original identity both of the names, and of the offices, of bishop and presbyter, became a current topic: e. g. in St. Aug. Epist. 19 ad S. Hieron.; Ambrosian, in 1 Tim. iii., and in Eph. iv.; Qu. Vet. et Nov. Test. ci.; Anon. in 1 Tim. iii. 17, in App. ad Opp. s. Hieron.; Lit. ad Euseb. de VII. Grad. Eccl. in the same App.; and Sedul. Scot. in Epist. ad Tit. i.; Isid. Hispal. de Offic. Eccl. vii.; and of course St. Jerome himself. And while St. Augustin assigns the "usus Ecclesiae" as the ground for the subsequent appropriation of the names ("honorum vocabula"), St. Jerome (as already said) affirms of the office itself, as disinct from the Ecclesiastical Dominion, that it is himself the one and in as such above or could do like duties of the general curacy, in Eph. caretur, evangelic explanation est Ecclesiae tor et et nullum resset, pte creditum pressurae had fully had still law, acts which w particular and of ar of contr stances, are here the Church discharge are done tullian's whether absolute minister that in s for the d lions, see 1. Ellec a. Illo goravla se from the and (exce bishop sent by St. At i. 19, The Sixtus by diocese ov clergy and the relative apparently but by Ap instance b. vian [Nim tione"] [Ac Fell],—anc mon sense; scopus pra pleissime inivis detu or that, "C bus eligat Παπὰ πάρρη (Suenos) (C iv. 698) commonly t

finet from that of presbyter, that it arose "ex Ecclesie consuetudine magis quam dispositionis Dominice veritate" (which means, apparently, that it rests upon no written words of our Lord Himself) asserting, at the same time, that it was the one absolutely necessary preventive of schism, and in effect that the Apostles had established it as such; and also (in common with all the others above quoted) that presbyters, whatever else they could do, could not ordain. Another view, of a like date with St. Jerome's, probably represents the general facts of the case with very fair accuracy, viz. that contained in Hilary the Deacon, in Ephes. iv.: "Ut cresceret plebs et multiplicaretur, omnibus inter initia concessum est et evangelizare et baptizare et Scripturas in ecclesia explanare: ubi autem omnia loca circumplexa est Ecclesia, conventicula constituta sunt et rectores et cetera officia in Ecclesiis sunt ordinata, ut nullus de clero auderet, qui ordinatus non esset, præsumere officium quod sciret non sibi creditum vel concessum." In other words, under pressure of necessity, before the Church could be fully organized, and before a longer duration had stiffened it into orderly system and regular law, acts were allowed and held good to any one, which were properly and primarily the office of particular officers, viz. of "Rectores," i. e. bishops, and of an ordained clergy; those acts being done of course not against—but owing to circumstances, not by—the clergy. And those which are here specified, moreover, are such only as the Church has ever held to be capable of being discharged by any Christian man, so that they are done in unity with the Church. Even Tertullian's well-known words do not make it plain, whether he meant to affirm that, in case of absolute necessity, laymen might formally administer the Eucharist, or whether not rather that in such a case the will would be accepted for the deed. For this, however, and like questions, see PRIEST, BAPTISM.

1. The first step towards making a bishop was his

1. Election.

a. Who elected.—The election of bishops [γερουσία sometimes, commonly ἐκλογή] pertained from the beginning to the neighbouring bishops, and (except in the obviously special cases of a bishop sent to the heathen [as e. g. Frumentius by St. Athanasius to the Abyssinians,—Socrat. i. 19, Theodoret, i. 23,—or St. Augustine to the Saxons by St. Gregory], or of one sent to a diocese overrun with heresy or schism), to the clergy and laity of the particular Church. But the relative rights of each class of electors were apparently determined, not by express enactment, but by Apostolic practice, defended in the first instance by Jewish precedent—"Traditione Divina" [Num. xx. 25, 26] and Apostolic observation" [Acts i. 15, vi. 2] (St. Cyp. Epist. lxxvii. Fell.)—and subsequently upon grounds of common sense and equity,—as that, "Deligatur episcopus preesente plebe, quae singulorum vitam pleissime novit" (id. ib.), or that, "Nullus invitatus detur episcopus" (Caelestin. Epist. ii. 5); or that, "Qui praefaturus est omnibus, ab omnibus eligatur" (Leo M. Epist. lxxix); or again, Παρὰ πάντων τῶν μελλόντων ποιμαίνεσθαι ψηφισμένοι (Conc. Chalc. A. D. 451; Act. xl. Labbe, iv. 698). The judgment [ἐπιτελεῖς iudicium] i. e. commonly the choice, and the ratification [κρῆσις], naturally inclined to the bishops, so that for the first 500 years such elections were ordinarily ruled by them. The approval [συνεδοκασία, consensus] and the testimony to character [λαογραφία testimonium] were the more proper office of the clergy and laity of the diocese itself. While the formal appointment [κατάστασις, which included the ordination] belonged exclusively, as to the Apostles at first, so to the ἐλλόγιμοι ἄνδρες (St. Clem. Rom. ad Corinth. i. xlvii.) who succeeded them, i. e. the bishops. But both classes of electors are found (so soon as we have any evidence to the point, i. e. from the middle of the 3rd century) taking the initiative in different cases. And the clergy, and the people, alike, possessed the right of giving a "suffragium de personā," as well as a "testimonium de vitā" (Andrews, Resp. ad Bellarm. xiii.); a right, however, alternating in point of fact between a choice and a veto, and fluctuating with circumstances.

The germ of such a mode of election is found in the N. T. The κατάστασις (Acts vi. 3, Tit. i. 5, and compare Heb. v. 1, viii. 3, and St. Matt. xxiv. 45, &c.) was throughout reserved to the Apostles or their successors; but the "choice" of the persons and the "testimony" to their character pertained to the people in the case of the seven deacons (Acts vi. 2, 3); the former to St. Paul and the latter to "the brethren," in that of Timothy (Acts xvi. 2, 3); St. Paul alone (unless so far as the "presbytery" joined in the act) both chose and sent Timothy and Titus respectively to Ephesus and to Crete (1 Tim. i. 3, 18; Tit. i. 5); the whole of the disciples appear to have chosen the two between whom lots were to be cast in the case of St. Matthias (Acts i. 23), which is however an exceptional case; while the word χειροτονέω (Acts xiv. 23) leaves it undetermined whether St. Paul and Barnabas only ordained, or did not also choose, the Pisidian presbyters. The earliest non-Scriptural witness, writing however before the N. T. canon was closed, St. Clement of Rome (as above), agrees precisely with the N. T., in terms as well as substance. He reserves the κατάστασις, as by express Apostolic appointment, to the Apostles and their successors, but συνεδοκασίας τῆς Ἐκκλησίας πάσης: speaking, it is true, of the case of ἐπίσκοποι who were presbyters, but in language which must almost certainly apply also to that of bishops properly so called. In conformity also with this we find, after A. D. 69, and upon the martyrdom of St. James, the remaining Apostles and personal disciples of Christ and His surviving relatives, meeting together and joining in the appointment of Symeon the son of Cleopas to the bishopric of Jerusalem (Euseb. H. E. iii. 11). The theory, that at first the "senior presbyter" succeeded as of right to the episcopate, and that at some early time a change was effected, "prospiciente cœcilio," such that thenceforth "meritum, non ordo," should select the bishop, seems to be only a 4th century hypothesis, based upon what no doubt was a frequent practice, of Ambrosiaster, i. e. Hilary the Deacon, in Eph. iv. 12; who however is thinking of the election, not of the consecration, of a bishop, whose specific office is also he distinctly recognizes in the passage itself.

The natural course of things, and the increasingly fixed and detailed organization of the Church, gradually defined and modified the original practice thus inaugurated: 1. by introducing the metropolitan (and, further on, the patriarch), as a power more and more preponderant in such elections; and 2. by regulating the rights of the provincial bishops; both points formalized into canons by the great Nicene Council; 3. by substituting for the unavoidable disorder and evil of a strictly popular suffrage (ὄχλοισι), an election by the chief only of the laity (a change begun by the Councils of Sardica, A.D. 347, and Laodicea, A.D. 363, and finally established by Justinian); still further restricted in practice in important cases to a nomination by the emperor alone; and changed from the middle of the 6th century into a general right of royal consent, converted commonly, and as circumstances allowed, in the case of the European kingdoms, and partially in that of the Eastern empires also, into a right of royal nomination, concurrent with, but gradually and in ordinary cases reducing to a mere form, the old canonical mode of election. The substitution, further, in the West, of the clergy of the cathedral as the electoral body, and in the East of the provincial bishops solely, in place of the old "plebs et clerus" of the diocese, or at the least of the cathedral town, hardly dates before the 6th and 10th centuries.

The classical passages for ante-Nicene times are principally from St. Cyprian, and belong to Africa, A.D. 252-254.—"Diligenter de traditione Divina et Apostolica observatione servandum est et tenendum (quod apud nos quoque et fere per provincias totas tenetur), ut ad ordinationes rite celebrandas, ad eam plebem cui praepositus ordinatur, episcopi ejusdem provinciae proximi qui conveniant, et episcopus deligatur plebe praesente, quae singulorum vitam plenissime novit, et uniuscujusque actum de ejus conversatione prospexit" (Epist. lxxvii. addressed to the Spanish Churches).—"Instruit et ostendit (Deus) ordinationes sacerdotales nominis sub populi assistentis conscientia fieri oportere" [scil. Num. xv. 25, 26; Acts i. 15, vi. 2]; "ut plebe praesente vel detegantur in malorum crimina vel honorum merita praedicentur; et sit ordinatio justa et legitima, quae omnium suffragio et judicio fuerit examinata" (id. ib.).—"De universae fraternitatis suffragio, de episcoporum qui in praesentia conveniant judicio (id. ib.).—"Episcopo semel facto, et collegarum et plebis testimonio et judicio comprobato" (id. Epist. xlv.).—"Cornelius factus est episcopus [Romae] de Dei et Christi Ejus judicio, de clericorum pene omnium testimonio, de plebis quae tunc adfuit suffragio, et de sacerdotum antiquorum et honorum virorum collegio" (id. Epist. lv.).—"Post Divinum judicium, post populi suffragium, post co-episcoporum consensum" (id. Epist. lix.).—"Episcopo Cornelio in Catholica Ecclesia de Dei judicio, de cleri ac plebis suffragio, ordinato" (id. Epist. lxviii.).—In which passages, suffragium, judicium, testimonium, consensus, appear to be used without precise discrimination, either in regard to meaning, or to the several classes of electors and their respective functions, and to express little more than St. Clement of Rome's vaguer term, συνεὸδοκτος.

The same rule is testified in the East by the joint evidence of Origen.—"Requiritur in ordinando sacerdote praesentia populi, ut sentiant omnes et certi sint, quia qui praesentior est ex omni populo, qui doctior, qui sanctior, qui in omni virtute eminentior, ille eligatur ad sacerdotium; et hoc, adstante populo, ne qua postmodum retractatio culpam, ne quis serpens residet" (Hom. vi. in Levit., Opp. ii. 216, ed. Leharue);—and of the cases mentioned by Eusebius; as, e. g., Ἀλέξανδρος τῶν ὁμῶν Ἐκκλησίαν προσηκόων, to elect Dins bishop of Jerusalem, c. A.D. 190 (H. E. vi. 10);—Alexander, ordained Bishop of Jerusalem, A.D. 214, μετὰ κοινῆς τῶν Ἐπισκόπων οἱ τὰς περὶ διέσειον Ἐκκλησίας γνώμης (ib. 11);—Τὸν πάντα λαὸν . . . ἄξιον ἐπιβοῆσαι [seried out that Fabian was worthy to be bishop of Rome], τῶν ἀδελφῶν πάντων χειροτονίας ἐνεκεν τῆς τοῦ μέλλουτος διαδόχου τῆν ἐπισκοπὴν ἐπὶ τῆς Ἐκκλησίας συγκαροτημένων (ib. vi. 29, A.D. 236);—and, similarly, the neighbouring "bishops, presbyters, deacons, and the Churches," assembled at Antioch A.D. 269 or 270, deposed Paul of Samosata, and appointed Demas bishop of Antioch in his place, The Apostolic Canons (can. i.), and Apostolic Constitutions, viii. 27, require three or at least two bishops to the χειροτονία, which at least involves the election, of a bishop. The former (can. xxiv.) take also the farther step of requiring reciprocally the γνώμη τοῦ πρώτου (the metropolitan), and the γνώμη πάντων to all church acts. And the latter (viii. 4) enjoin that the people shall be thrice asked if the candidate is worthy. Apostolic Canon lxxvi. further enjoins, that no bishop, in order to gratify a brother or any other relative, shall εἰς τὸ ἀξίωμα τῆς ἐπισκοπῆς ὄν βούλεται, χειροτονεῖν. And the Council of Ancyra (A.D. 314, can. xviii.) proves the power of the people, as the last quoted canon does that of the bishops, by providing for the case of one "constituted" (κατασταθείς) a bishop, but rejected by the diocese (παροικία) to which he had been consecrated, such rejection being apparently assumed to be conclusive as regarded the particular diocese; although in Apost. Can. xxxvi. it is ordered, on the contrary, that the bishop in such a case shall "remain." The case of Alexandria in early times was confessedly exceptional, and arose from the seditious character of the Alexandrians (Epphan. Haer. lix. 11). The presbyters of that city by themselves chose one of their own number (nec. to the well-known words of St. Jerome), and that immediately, i. e., as it should seem, without waiting for the voice of the people, or for that of the bishops of the patriarchate (see also the strange story in Liberatus, Breviar. xx.). The Christian (and Jewish) practice, "in praedicandis sacerdotibus qui ordinandi sunt," was also recognized, and copied, in the case of provincial governors, by the emperor Alexander Severus (Lampyril, in V. Alex. Severi). The Council of Nice (A.D. 325) reorganized and established the power of the provincial bishops, and the authority of the metropolitan, by requiring (can. iv.), if it can be had [πρωτεύου μάλιστα], the personal presence of "all the bishops of the province (ἐπαρχία)," in order to the appointment (καθίστασθαι) of a bishop; but if this cannot be had, then of at least three, συνάξιον γινόμενον καὶ τῶν ἀπόντων καὶ συγθεμιμένων διὰ γράμματα, the ratification (εἶρησι) being reserved to the metropolitan; and (can. vi.) by voiding elections made χωρὶς γνώμης μητροπολίτου. The Council of Antioch, A.D. 341, recognizes also both people, provincial bishops, and metropolitan, by voiding (can. xvi.) an election made δίχα τελείας συνόδου (defined to be one "at which the metropolitan is present"), καὶ εἰ πᾶς ὁ λαὸς ἔλοιτο. It repeats also in substance (can. xix.) the 4th Nicene canon; while (in can. xviii.), providing for the case of a bishop refused by his diocese, it refers the final decision to the synod. And it voids (can. xxiii.) an appointment by a single bishop of his own successor, referring such election, according to τὸν ἐκκλησιαστικὸν θεσμὸν, to the synod and judgment of the bishops, whose right it was. The Council of Sardica, A.D. 347 (can. ii.), cancels an election made by the "clamour" of the people, with suspicion of bribery or undue influence; and (can. vi.) also requires the consent of the metropolitan [τὸν ἐξάρχου τῆς ἐπαρχίας]. That of Laodicea, A.D. 365, assigns the choice (κρίσις) to the metropolitan and οἱ περίε Ἐπίσκοποι (can. xii.); and, on the other side, takes the first step against popular elections by forbidding (can. xix.) τοὺς ὄχλους ἐπιτρέπειν τὰς ἐκλογὰς ποιεῖσθαι τὸν μελλόντων καθίστασθαι εἰς τὴν ἱερατείαν. The Council of Constantinople, A.D. 381, informs Pope Damasus of the validity of the election of Nectarius to the see of Constantinople, as having been made "by the common consent of all, in the presence of the emperor, with the applause of clergy and all people"—of the like validity of that of Flavian to Antioch, because "canonically elected by the assembled bishops" τῆς ἐπαρχίας καὶ τῆς ἀνατολικῆς διακονίας, πάσης συμφήρου τῆς Ἐκκλησίας—and of that of Cyril to Jerusalem, because, similarly, παρὰ τῶν τῆς ἐπαρχίας χειροτονηθέντα (Epist. Synod. ap. Theodoret. v. 9). Of the Councils of Carthage, the Second (so called), A.D. 390 (can. xii.), requires the consent of the primate; the Third, A.D. 397 (can. xxxix.), three bishops at least, appointed by the primate; the Fourth, A.D. 398 (can. i.), the "consensus clericorum et laicorum," and the "conventus totius provinciae episcoporum, maximeque metropolitanorum auctoritas vel presentia." The Council of Ephesus, A.D. 431 (can. xix.), secures their right to the bishops of Cyprus as against the patriarch of Antioch, but as not being within his jurisdiction. And that of Chalcedon, A.D. 451 (Act. xvi. Labbe, iv. 817), requires the consent of all or the major part of the bishops of the province, τὸ κύριος ἔχουτος τοῦ μητροπολίτου; and affirms the authority of the metropolitan also in Act. xiii. (p. 713), and in can. xxv. (p. 768). Similar testimony to the necessity of the metropolitan's consent is borne by Pope Innocent I., "Extra consentium metropolitani episcopi nullus audeat ordinare episcopum" (Epist. i. c. 2, A.D. 402 x 417); by Boniface I. (Epist. iii. A.D. 418 x 423); by Leo the Great (Epist. lxxxix. i. c. 1); by Pope Hilary (Epist. ii. A.D. 461 x 468); by Conc. Turin., can. i. A.D. 401; and by Conc. Arelat., can. v. A.D. 452.

On the other hand, these enactments respecting the provincial bishops, and the growing power of the metropolitans, did not extinguish the rights of the clergy and all people; who remained a real power for many centuries still, and continued so in name (in the West) down to the 12th century. The Council of Nice itself, in dealing with the Meletian schism, required the choice of the people (εἰ ὁ λαὸς ἀποίτη), as well as the sanction of the Alexandrian metropolitan (συνεπιψηφίζοντας καὶ ἐπισφραγίζοντας τὸν τῆς Ἀλεξανδρίας Ἐπισκόπου), in case a recon- ciled

Meletian bishop was appointed to a see (Epist. Synod. ap. Theodoret. i. 9, Socrat. i. 9). St. Athanasius, immediately after the council, was elected bishop of Alexandria, ψήφῳ τοῦ λαοῦ πάντος (St. Greg. Naz. Orat. xxi.), and by the acclamation and demand of πάν τὸ πλῆθος καὶ πᾶς ὁ λαὸς τῆς καθολικῆς Ἐκκλησίας (Epist. Synod. Alex. ap. Athanas. Apol. ii.); and Peter, who succeeded him, was chosen first by the priests and magistrates, and then accepted by the people (ὁ λαὸς ἄπας ταῖς εὐφημίαις ἔδηλουν τὴν ἡγήνην, Theodoret, iv. 20); which indicates that Alexandrian elections did not then at any rate possess any exceptional character. So also Pope Julius (in S. Athan. Apol.) condemns the intrusion of Gregory into the see of Alexandria, as being, 1. A stranger; 2. Not baptized there; 3. Unknown to most; 4. Not asked for by either presbyters, bishops, or people. Later still, the rights of the "clerus" and "plebs" are testified by a continuous chain of witnesses: as, e. g., by the Councils of Antioch, A.D. 341, can. cviii., and the 4th Council of Carthage, A.D. 398, can. i. (both above quoted), and Con. Loc. African., can. xiii., ὅπῳ πόλλων—a multis—χειροτονεῖσθαι; and again, (1) in the West, by Pope Siricius (A.D. 394 x 398, Epist. i. c. 10, "Si cum cleri ac plebis evocaverit electio," and this either to presbyterate or episcopate); Pope Zosimus (A.D. 417, Epist. iii.); Pope Caecilius (A.D. 422 x 422, Epist. ii. c. 5, "Cleri, plebs, et orlinus"); Leo the Great (A.D. 440 x 461, Epist. lxxxv., "Cleri plebsque," and the metropolitan to decide a disputed election;—Epist. lxxxix. "Vota civium, testimonia populorum, honoratum arbitrium, electio clericorum";—Epist. xcii. "A clericis electi, a plebibus expetiti, a provincialibus episcopis cum metropolitani iudicio consecrati"); Pope Symmachus (A.D. 498 x 514, Epist. v. c. 6); Pope the Great (Gratian, see quotations in Thomassin, II. ii. 10); by the form itself of election in the Ordo Romanus (Suppl. PP. c. 104); by the system of Episcopi Interiores or Interiores, or, later, Visitatores, sent down to the vacant see to superintend the election, and not only existing in Africa, but repeatedly mentioned in the letters of Gregory the Great, of Innocent, &c. See [INTERVISITATORES; VISITATORES]; by St. Jerome ("Spectulator Ecclesiae vel episcopus vel presbyter, qui a populo electus est," in Eccl. lib. x. c. 33; Opp. iii. 933); Optatus ("Suffragio totius populi," lib. i.); Sulpic. Severus (de V. B. Martin. c. vii., of the election of St. Martin of Tours, A.D. 371); Silius Apollinaris (Epist. lib. viii. Ep. 5, 8, 9, of the election of the metropolitan of Bourges, A.D. 472); St. Augustine (Epist. cx. Opp. ii. 601, of the election of his own successor); by Conc. of Orleans II. A.D. 533, can. vii.,—of Clermont in Auvergne, A.D. 535, can. ii.,—of Orleans III. A.D. 538, can. iii.;—and (2) in the East, by the case of Eustathius, compelled to accept the see of Antioch, A.D. 325, by οἱ ἀρχιερεῖς τε καὶ λεῖται καὶ ἄπας ὁ λαὸς ὁ φιλόχριστος, ψήφῳ κοινῇ (Theodoret, l. 7); by that of Eusebius to the see of Caesarea in Pontus, A.D. 362, ὁ δῆμος ἄπας . . . ἔκοντα συναρπάσαντες . . . τοῖς Ἐπισκόποις προηγήσαντο, τελεσθῆναι τε ἤξιον καὶ κηρυχθῆναι, πειθὸν βίαν ἀναμίζοντες (St. Greg. Naz. Orat. xix., condemning also the carrying such elections κατὰ φρατρίδας καὶ συγγενείας); by that of Nectarius to the see of Constantinople, A.D. 381, κοινῇ ψήφῳ τῆς συνόδου (Sozom. vii. 8), but also ἀρπασθεὶς ἐκ τοῦ λαοῦ (Socrat. v. 8); by that of St. Chrysostom, A.D. 397, to Constantine, whom ὁ βασιλεὺς Ἀρκάδιος μεταπέμψεται, to make him archbishop, ψηφίσματι κοινῷ ὁμοῦ πάντων, κλήρου τε φημι καὶ λαοῦ (Socrat. vi. 2); to which may be added the recognition by Leo the emperor (A.D. 457 × 474) of the κλήρος καὶ τοῦ κοινῷ (Evagr. iii. 12); and abundant other evidence, of which some will occur further on.

The Laonicene Council, however, A.D. 365 (as above quoted), took the first step towards the ultimate practical extinction of really popular elections; although elections by acclamation, held to be not irregular as springing from a kind of supposed Divine inspiration, or again by cries of Dignus or ἄξιος, still occurred: as, e.g. in the cases mentioned by St. Ambrose, St. Augustin, Philostorgius, Photius, cited by Bingham, IV. ii. 6; in the case of St. Ambrose himself (Paulin. in V. S. Ambrosii, Theodoret, iv. 7; Sozom. vi. 24); in that of Sisinius at Constantinople, A.D. 426 (Socrat. vii. 26). But a general suffrage was from that time gradually superseded as the ordinary rule by the votes of the rich or high in station. And successive councils recognized the practice, up to the time when Justinian enacted it by express law. In the Council of Ephesus, A.D. 431, Memnon, bishop of Ephesus, complains that his opponent sought to be elected by the votes of τὸ σέμνον βουλευτήριον καὶ τοὺς λαμπροτάτους (Epist. Cathol. in Conc. Ephes. Labbe ii. 764). Leo the Great and the Roman Council, on occasion of Flavian's condemnation by the Catrociniūm Ephesinum, A.D. 442, write in his favour, "Clero, honoratis, et plebi, consistenti apud Constantinopolim" (Conc. Chalced. A.D. 451, p. i. c. 22; Labbe, iv. 47). And the same Leo also mentions the "honorati" expressly, although not exclusively, Epist. lxxxix. cvi. Stephen of Ephesus (Conc. Chalced. Act. xi.; Labbe, iv. 687) claims to have been appointed by forty bishops of Asia, ψήφῳ καὶ τῶν λαμπροτάτων καὶ τῶν λογάδων καὶ τοῦ εὐλαβεστάτου πάντος κλήρου καὶ τῶν λοιπῶν πάντων τῆς πάλεως πάσης. And in Act. xvi. of the same council (Labbe, ib. 618), the right of election is said to belong to the clergy, the κλήρους καὶ λαμπροτάτους ἄνδρες, and the bishops, "all or most," of the province. Again (ib. p. lii. c. 21, Labbe, ib. 890), the people of Alexandria and its "honorati et ciriales et nauticari," are said to have demanded Timothy as their bishop; while Liberatus (Breviar. xiv. xv.) affirms that Proterius, on the other hand, the bishop upon whom Timothy was intruded, was elected by the "nobiles civitatis," which he also expresses as "decreto populi." Finally, Justinian established by direct law that the κληρικοὶ καὶ πρῶτοι τῆς πάλεως should choose three persons, whenever a vacancy occurred, of whom the ordainer [i. e. the metropolitan] should ordain the one who in his judgment was the best qualified (Novell. cxxiii. c. 1, cxxvii. c. 2, and Cod. lib. i. tit. lii. De Episcopis, l. 42). The 2nd Council of Arles, A.D. 452, had previously adopted a different plan for attaining the same end; viz. that the bishops should choose the three candidates, out of whom the "clerici vel cives" were to select one (can. liv.). And the Spanish Council of Barcelona subsequently, A.D. 399, so far varied the rule of Justinian as to enact (after the pattern of St. Matthias' election) that the decision should be made by lot, between two or three, electd by the "clerus et plebs," and presented to the metropolitan and bishops (can. liii.). The common phrase in St. Gregory the Great's Letters is "clerus, ordo, et plebs;" or, "clerus et nobiles, ordo et plebs."

From the time of Justinian onwards, both in East and West, the chief power in the election of bishops, on the Church side, inclined to the metropolitan, but as choosing with the provincial bishops from three candidates elected by the principal people, clergy and laity, of the see; the whole process, however, being summarily overruled upon occasion by the emperors; as also in course of time, and much more continuously and absolutely, by the Frankish, Spanish, and Gothic kings. Before this time, indeed, both Theodosius the Great, and Theodosius the Younger, had interferred by an absolute nomination in three several appointments to the see of Constantinople (Socrat. vii. 8, 29, 40), for obvious political reasons. And Valentinian had interferred in a like manner to enforce the popular demand for the consecration of St. Ambrose to Milan (Theodoret, iv. 6). But such interference was confessedly irregular, had been expressly condemned by Can. Apostol. xxx., and was in earlier times protested against, as, e.g. by St. Athanasius (Epist. ad Solit. V. Agentes, § 51, Opp. i. 375), demanding, Ποῖος κανὼν ἐπὶ παλαιῶν πέμπασθαι τὸν Ἐπισκοπον). But from the 6th century onwards, in the case of at least important sees, the emperors, although leaving the old forms of election intact, appear to have commonly interferred to make (or at the very least to sanction) nominations themselves. St. Gregory the Great treats the sole imperial nomination in such cases as a matter of course. Instances will also be found, both from him and from later times, down to Heraclius, Justinian II., Philipppicus, Constantine Copronymus, A.D. 754, in Thomassin, II. ii. 17; while the 2nd Council of Nice, A.D. 787, protests against such lay interference uncomproisingly (can. liii. Πᾶσαν ψήφον παρὰ ἀρχόντων, Ἐπισκόπων, ἢ πρεσβυτέρων, ἢ διακόνων, ἔκτρον μένει). Saracen conquerors, as might be expected, interferred in a like manner: as, e.g. in Syria, A.D. 736, in the case of the patriarch of Antioch (Thomassin, II. ii. 17, § 7). But it remained for Nicophorus II., A.D. 963 × 969, to enact as an universal law, that no bishop whatever should be elected or consecrated ἄνευ τῆς ἀποῦ γνώμης (Cehren, p. 658, and so also Zonaras); a law however which did not last long. Finally, in the East, the custom settled down into an election by the clergy, and ultimately only by the provincial bishops, of three, of whom in such cases as the see of Constantinople the emperor, but ordinarily the metropolitan, selected one (Morinus, ii. 193). The ancient form of election however, as modified by Justinian, still held its ground for a considerable time. In the case, e.g. of Epiphanius of Constantinople, A.D. 528, "the emperor (Justin) and empress, the magnates, the bishops, priests, monks, and the most faithful people," concurred (Epist. Epiphani. inter Epist. Hormisd. Papie post Epist. lxxi., Lal' xv. 1534). In that of Sophronius of Jerusalem, A.D. 634, "the clergy, monks, faithful laics, in a word all the citizens" (Sophron. Epist. ad Sergium Constantinop. ap. Conc. Constantin. A.D. 680, Act. xi.; Labbe, vi. 854). In that of Stephen of Larissa, who was chosen out of three, elected by the "clerus"

Rom.* pp. 6, 7). While the council in Trullo, A.D. 681, speaks of an election by all the bishops of the province as the "ancient custom" (can. xxxix.); and Joh. Antioch. (Nomocan. l. i. vii. in Bibl. Jur. Can. p. 610) rules that a bishop must be elected by the metropolitan, and by all the bishops of the province, either present or sending a written consent; and that such elections (ἐκλογαί) must not be entrusted to the multitude; and, lastly, Zonaras and Balsamon, glossing the older canons by the custom of their own time, exclude the "clerus et plebs" altogether, and refer the whole matter to the metropolitan and bishops, the former choosing the "dignissimus" out of three, elected by the bishops without the presence of the metropolitan (according to Symeon of Thessalonica), and presented by them to him (see the form at length in Syn. Thessal. ap. Morin. ii. 149, sq.). Probably the emperor really determined the choice, wherever his power enabled, and his policy inclined, him to do so; while as a rule he left ordinary cases to the ordinary methods. See, however, Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 136, 169.

In the West, a like retention of the old form of election ran parallel with a gradual increase (less, than elsewhere) of the power of the metropolitan, and with the practical assumption of the sole nomination, especially in France, by the king. In France, the Councils of Orleans II., A.D. 533, canons i., viii., of Clermont, A.D. 535, can. ii., of Orleans III., A.D. 538, can. iii., specify the "clerici, cives," bishops of the province, and metropolitan, but require the consent of all the provincial bishops only in the election of the metropolitan himself. But in the Council of Orleans V., A.D. 549, canons x. and xi., occurs first the significant phrase, "cum voluntate regis," although still "juxta electionem cleri ac plebis," and with consecration by the metropolitan and provincial bishops, and with a special enactment that "nullus invitis detur episcopus, sed nec per oppressionem potentium personarum . . . cives aut clerici inclinatur;" and although also checked almost immediately by the Council of Paris III., A.D. 557, can. ii., which voids the "principis imperium," if against the will of the metropolitan and bishops. Absolute nominations by the kings, however, occur earlier: e.g. under Theodoric of Austrasia, A.D. 511 x 534 (Greg. Tur. de SS. Patrum VI. c. iii.). And compare also the appointment to the see of Léon, of Paulus I.ensis, by Childbert (V. S. Paul. Leon.), A.D. 512. The issue between royal, and metropolitan or ecclesiastical, nominations was directly raised A.D. 563, in the case of Emerius, bishop of Santes; whom the king (Charibert) forced upon the see in defiance of the metropolitan, as being his predecessor Lothaire's nominee (Greg. Tur. II. E. iv. 26). And Lothaire II.,—in confirming a re-enactment of can. ii. of the second Council of Paris, made by the Council of Paris V. A.D. 615 (can. i.), and again re-enacted at the Council of Rheims, A.D. 625, can. xxxv., and at the Council of Chalons, A.D. 649, can. x.,—requires to such elections, made "a clero et populo," the subsequent "ordinatio principis," with no other qualification than that "certe si de palatio eligi (Mansi. x. 543). Thenceforward, the action of the people of the diocese, under the Frankish kings, is commonly termed, not "electio," but "agitatio" or "petitio," or is expressed as "suppliciter postulamus," addressed to the king. Regular forms for the donation of a bishopric by the king, nominally "cum consilio episcoporum et procerum"—in Marculphus, and in Sirmund (Conc. Gallie. ii. Append.; see also the Quo modo a clero et a populo eligitur episcopus in propria sede cum consensu regis archiepiscopis et ceterisque omnium populo [sic], in Morinus, de Ordin. ii. 304)—exhibit the choice, even when made by the clergy and people, and sanctioned by the metropolitan, as ultimately and in effect made by the king. And in point of fact, the bishops were so nominated. Carloman, however, and Pipin (Conc. Liptin. A.D. 743, and Conc. Stess. A.D. 744), professed to restore liberty of election to the church. And a new set of "formulae" occurs accordingly (in Baluz. ii. 591, and in Sirmund), as "usurpatae post restitutum electionum libertatem." And Charlemagne, upon the advice of Pope Adrian, that he should leave episcopal elections to the "clerus et plebs" according to the canons (Conc. Gallie. ii. 96), issued a capitulary, A.D. 803 (Conc. Aquisgran. c. ii., repeated by Louis, A.D. 816, Capit. Aquisgran. c. ii.), consenting "ut episcopi per electionem cleri et populi secundum statuta canonum de propria diocesi eligantur;" but he did so as granting a grace, not as admitting a right. And as the bishops in point of fact continued to be appointed by the emperors (see e.g. Baluz. ad Conc. Gall. Narbon. p. 34, and ad Capit. ii. 1141), and no choice could be made save by the emperor's special permission (so Gieseler, and this as late as Conc. Vatican. A.D. 855, can. vii.), and special privileges of free election were given to particular churches (Baluz. ib.), which imply the universality of the opposite practice,—not to add also the much disputed but after all possibly genuine grant by Adrian to Charlemagne (in Gratian, Dist. 63, c. 22) of an absolute right to the appointment and investiture of all bishops and archbishops in all provinces of his empire,—it is obvious that the change was more in name than in reality (as indeed the "formulae" themselves, as above in Sirmund, &c., shew), until at least the 9th century in the time of Hincmar. On the other hand, the power of the metropolitan and the right of free election were continually reasserted, although with little effect (see the councils above quoted, from that of Orleans in 523 to that of Rheims in 649); until under Charlemagne's immediate successors, whose right to nominate is actually recognized at the Council of Paris VI. A.D. 829 (can. xxii.), and that of Thionville in 845 (Capit. Car. Calv. tit. ii. c. 2), &c.; and this, although Carloman and Pipin had both of them professedly restored the rights of the metropolitan as well as freedom of election (A.D. 742, Capit. c. i., and A.D. 755, can. ii.). See the whole subject carefully treated in Henry C. Lea's Studies in Church History, pp. 81-90 (Philad. U. S. 1869).

In Saxon England, king, witan, and metropolitan appear to have predominated, although the first gradually became as a rule the real nominator. At the same time, the canonical form of election was kept up; and when the king was weak and the Church strong, it occasionally became a reality. The Kentish and Northumbrian kings agreed in choosing Wighard, but accepted Theodore, A.D. 688, as Archbishop of Canterbury, at the hands of the pope, upon Wighard's unexpected death at Rome (Baed. H. E. iii. 29, iv. 1). Northumbrian kings and witenagemots adjudicated the various disputes about Wilfrid's sees. And Theodore and a synod of bishops chose and consecrated Cuthbert to the see of Lindisfarne, A.D. 684, but "sub presentia Regis Egfridi" (id. iv. 28). Wiltreat's privilege, A.D. 696 × 710, in its genuine form refers to Kent and to abbots and presbyters, not to England at large, or to bishops (Haldan and Stubbs, Counc. iii. 238-247). And Agatho's privilegium to the "congregatio" of the monastery of St. Paul's, A.D. 673 × 681, to elect their own bishop, is a forgery (ib. 161). On the other hand (although no doubt contemporary both with the Carolingian nominal restoration of liberty of election in France, and with the breaking up of the Northumbrian kingdom), Alcuin's letters, "ad Fratres Eboracenses," of Aug. 796, before the election of Eanbald to York, distinctly affirm, that "hucusque sancta Eboracensis Ecclesia in electione sua inviolata permansit," adding, "violete ne in diebus vestris maneat;"—imply that Alcuin himself had a voice in the election;—and urgently exhort the York clergy to elect a proper person, if he himself cannot come in time for the election (Ejst. 54, 55, Migne; 48, 49, Froben.). "Professiones," also, of a little later date, distinctly assert an election by the diocese: e. g. that of Beornmod of Rochester, A.D. 805, or a year or two earlier,—"electus ab Ethelardo archiepiscopo et a servis Domini in Cantia constitutis" (in Wharton, A. S.),—and that of Aethelfield (probably Kynferth, A.D. 833 × 836),—"quoniam ne tota Ecclesia provinciae nostrae sibi in episcopatum officium elegerunt" (Cotton MSS. (Clop. E. 1).)—and that of Helmstun of Winchester, A.D. 838, "a sancte et Apostolice sedis dignitate et ab congregatione civitatis Wentanae nonnullis Ethelwulfis regis et totius gentis occidentalis Saxorum ad episcopalis officii gradum electus" (ib.),—and that of Deorlaf of Hereford, A.D. 857 × 866,—"quoniam ne tota congregatio Herefordensis Ecclesiae sibi in officium episcopate elegerunt" (App. ad Text. Raff.). In a little later time, we find Olo made archbishop, A.D. 942, by the "regia voluntas," followed by the "assenus episcoporum" (Will. Malm. G. P. A. i.); Dunstan, A.D. 960, made so by Edgar (id. ib.), but with an election also by acclamation according to his Life; and Living, A.D. 1013, "suffragio Regis Ethelredi" (W. Malm. ib.). And in the time of Edward the Confessor, Aelfric is elected by the monks of Canterbury, but set aside by the king in favour of Robert, made archbishop "regis munere" (T. Eadoc. ed. Luard, pp. 399, 400). By that time the election by the "clerus et plebs" of the diocese, so far as it still survived at all, had gradually shrivelled up into an election by the clergy, and by the clergy of the cathedral,—a process materially accelerated by the monastic character of the chapters, coupled with the monastic privilege of choosing their own abbots,—but which was also perpetually set aside by the necessity of the royal consent, running naturally into a right of royal nomination. See also the evidence collected by Freeman, Hist. of Norm. Conq. ii. 61, 117, and 571-577. The case of the see of Rochester was exceptional, the archbishop of Canterbury claiming, and frequently obtaining, the right of nomination to that see, as against the crown, until the days of King John.

In Spain, the power of the bishops in the election of the kings preserved and extended also their own power, and among other things, in episcopal elections. The Council of Toledo X., A.D. 656, for instance, elected a metropolitan of Braga (the former bishop being deposed for incontinence) without consulting the diocese. See however Dunbar, Hist. of Spain and Portugal, bk. ii. c. ii., who rather leans towards the royal power in such elections. Ultimately the king and the metropolitan of Toledo seem to have acquired practically a joint power of nomination. Conc. Tolet. XII., A.D. 681, empowers the archbishop of Toledo, as primate, to consecrate at Toledo, "quoscunque regalis potestas elegerit et jam dicti Toletani episcopi iudicium dignus esse probaverit" (can. vi.). And see also the history of King Witiza, A.D. 701-710. Martin of Braga too, distinctly says that the people are not to elect bishops.

In Italy, also, the royal power gradually overruled without superseding the older canonical form of election. But that the latter continued in all ordinary cases, save that the metropolitan's influence and veto had grown more powerful, is palpable by St. Gregory the Great's letters. On the other hand, Orosius, A.D. 476-483, with the "advice" of Pope Simplicius, forbade the election of a bishop of Rome without his (the king's) consent. And the interference of (the Arian) Theodoric in the disputed election of Pope Symmachus, A.D. 501, was both asked for and submitted to; although it called forth Anodius' Apologetic Letter, and also a protest from the Conc. Palm. A.D. 502, which declare Orosius' law invalid. Yet the Gothic kings continued to exercise such a power. Theodoric appointed successive popes during his reign, down to Felix III. A.D. 526 (Greenwood, Cathed. Pet. iii. c. 4). And Athalaric issued regulations about papal elections on occasion of the outrageous simony that attended the accession of John II. A.D. 533 (Cassiod. ix. 15). And not only so, but the Greek emperors, when they recovered Italy, exercised it likewise; so that, e. g. Gregory the Great, A.D. 590, after due election by the "clerus, senatores, populusque Romanus," still required the "praeceptio" of the emperor Maurice to complete his election (Jo. Diae. in f. Greg. M. lib. i. ep. 39, 40). And Pipin and Charlemagne fell heirs to the like "jus et potestatem eligendi pontificem;" for all which see details under POPE. The election of the pope indeed remained like other elections of the kind, until the decree of the Conc. Rom. of A.D. 1059 under Nicholas II. (for which see Gieseler, ii. 369, Eng. transl.); which itself was a change analogous to the contemporary changes elsewhere.

In brief, then, during this period, the old canonical diocesan election continued throughout the Western Church as the right and proper mode of election; but (1) was in itself gradually absorbed into a vote of the cathedral clergy ("electio clericorum" allowed in overruled, which its superceded provincial.

For special conditions attending the election of metropolitans, and for the relation of the metropolitans to the patriarchs in the matter, see METROPOLITAN, PATRIARCH.

At what times special questions arose respecting the qualifications which gave a right to vote in the election of a bishop—how such questions were determined—in what way votes were actually taken—and other questions of like detail—there remains no evidence to shew; except that we may infer from such accounts as c. g. that in Synesius, Epist. 67, that where there was a popular assembly ordinarily acting in other and civil matters, such assembly acted also, at first, in the choice of a bishop. Synesius' description also illustrates forcibly the ἄλαος of the Laodicean Council, the women being preeminently noisy on the occasion, and even the children.

B. Who were eligible.—Such being the electors, it follows next to consider the qualifications of those who were to be elected. The general disqualifications for the clerical office—such as, c. g. having been a demoniac, or done public penance, or lapsd, the occupations of pleader, soldier, play- actor, usurer, the being a slave, or illegitimate, the having any of his own immediate family still unconverted heathens, &c. &c.—will be best treated under PRESBYTER, CLERGY, or the several subjects themselves. The special conditions of eligibility for a bishopric were, (1) that the candidate should be, acc. to Apost. Const. ii. 1, fifty years of age; but acc. to Conc. Neocaes. A.D. 314 (requiring 30 for a presbyter, on the ground of St. Luke iii. 23—a canon adopted by the Church universal), and acc. to similar later canons (Ardt. IV. A.D. 475, can. i., Agath. A.D. 506, can. xvii., Ancient. III. A.D. 533, can. vi., Tolet. IV. A.D. 581, can. xx.; and again, Justin. Novell. cxxxiii. 1; and again, Charlemagne at Aix, A.D. 789, Capit. l. 49, and at Frankfurt, A.D. 794, can. xlix.), the age of 30 only was insisted on. And so also Balsamon. Photius in one place (sp. Snicer.) says 35, which is likewise Justinian's rule in another Novel (cxxxvii. 1). And Socrates and apparently Zosimus (Sir. ad Himer. Epist. 1 § 9, Zos. ad Hesych. Epist. 1, § 3, a detailed lex omnibus in both cases) place the minimum at 45. Special merits, however (St. Chrys. Hom. in 1 Tim. v. xi.), and the precedent of ed Mignes. 3, speaking of νεωτερικῆ τάξις = a youthful appointment), repeatedly set aside the rule in practice (see instances in Bingham, II. x. 1); apparently not much more than 23 when consecrated bishop. (2) That he should be of the clergy of the church to which he was to be con- secrated.—ἀπ' αὐτοῦ τοῦ ἑπαρχείου—"de propria clero" (so Pope Julius, Epist. ad Orient. np. S. Athanas. Apol. ii.; Pope Celestinius, Epist. ii. c. 4; Pope Hilary, Epist. i. c. 3; Leo M., Epist. lxxxiv.; Gregory the Great repeatedly; and as part of the old canonical rule, the Capit. of Charle- magne above quoted, "de propria diocesi")—a rule likewise repeatedly broken under pressure of circumstances, special merit in the candidate, the condition of the diocese itself, &c., and by translations, so far as translations were allowed; but one also enforced by the nature of the case so long as the voice and testimony of the people of the diocese was an important element in the election, and on like grounds disregarded in proportion as metropolitan, or still more royal, nominations became prelominent. St. Jerome's well-known statement about Alexandria seems to speak of it as almost a special privilege of that see from early times; which it plainly was not. If the presbyter chosen was not of the diocese itself, the consent of his own bishop was requisite (Conc. Nicean. can. xvi. &c. &c.; and see below, III. 1, α. x.). (3) That he should be a presbyter, or a deacon at the least, and not become a bishop per saltum, but go through all the interstitia or several stages;—also at first an ecclesiastical custom, grounded on the fitness of the thing (c. g. Pope Cornelius "non ad episcopatum subito pervenit sed per omnia ecclesiastica officia," &c. and again, "cunctis religionis gradibus ascendit," St. Cypr. Epist. 52 nl. 55; and similarly Greg. Naz. Orat. xx. of St. Basil; and so repeatedly St. Gregory the Great, objecting to a layman being made bishop), but turned into a canon by Conc. Sardic. A.D. 347, can. x. (καθ' ἑκαστον βαθμῶν κ.τ.λ., and naming reader, deacon, priest; the object being to exclude neophytes), and by some later provincial councils (Conc. Aurelian. III. A.D. 538, can. vi.; Bracon. I. A.D. 563, can. xxxix.; Barcinon. II. A.D. 589, can. iii.); and so Leo the Great (admitting deacons however on the same level with priests), "Ex presbyteris ejusdem Ecclesie vel ex diaconibus optimis eligatur" (Epist. lxxxix. c. 6);—broken likewise perpetually under special circumstances (see Motin. de Sacr. Ordin. III. xi. 2). Instances of deacons, indeed, advanced at once to the episcopate, are numerous, and scarcely regarded as irregular, beginning with St. Athanasius (see a list in Bingham, II. x. 5; but St. Greg. Naz. Orat. xxi. speaks of St. Athanasius as πάσαν τῆν τῶν βαθμῶν ἀκολουθίαν διεξελθόν). But the case of a reader also is mentioned in St. Aug. (Epist. cxlii.), and of a subdeacon in Liberatus (Breviar. xxii.). And although expressly forbidden by Justinian (Novell. vi. 1, cxxiii. 1, cxxxvii. 1) and by Conc. Ardet. IV. A.D. 455, can. li., yet the well-known cases of St. Cyprian, St. Ambrose, St. Martin of Tours, St. Germanus of Auxerre, and others, prove the admissibility of even a layman, if under the circumstances—as, c. g. by reason of the sudden acclamation of the people—such a choice was held to be "voluntate" or "judicio Dei" (Hieron. in Jonam. iii. Opp. iii. 1489; Pontius, in V. S. Cypri.; Paulin, in V. S. Ambros. iii.; &c.). Instances may also be found in the Alexandrian church (Renaudot, ap. Denzinger, Bib. Orient. 145, 146). And the rubric in the Nestorian Pontifical expressly admits the possibility of a bishop elect being a deacon as well as a presbyter (Denzinger, ib. 146). At the same time there is the well-known case of the patriarch Photius, deposed, because ordained on five successive days respectively monk, reader, subdeacon, deacon, priest, and on the sixth day bishop (Conc. Nicean. II. A.D. 787, can. iv.). See also under ADVOCATE OF THE CHURCH. But then (4) such candidate was not to be a neophyte (1 Tim. iii. 6), or a heathen recently baptized, who had not yet been tried (Apost. Can. lxxx.; Conc. Nicaen. can. ii.; Conc. Laodic. A.D. 365, can. iii.); but one converted at least a year before (Conc. Aurelian. III. A.D. 538, can. vi.); or who had been a reader, or a subdeacon, or (acc. to one copy) a deacon for a year (Conc. Bracar. II. A.D. 563, can. xx.); or acc. to yet another provincial council (Epimn. A.D. 517, can. xxxvii.), at the least a "praenissen religione." Yet here too special circumstances were held to justify exceptions; as in the case of St. Cyprian himself, "adhuc neophytus" (Pont. ib.); of St. Ambrose and of Eusebius of Caesarea in Pontus, not yet baptized (Theodoret, iv. 7, Socrat. iv. 30, Sozom. vi. 24, St. Greg. Naz. Orat. xix.); of Nectarius, την μυστικὴν ἐσθῆτα ἐπιλαβισσάμενος, &c. (Sozom. vii. 8). And all these are cases of immediate consecration; and the later practice of ordaining to each step on successive days, in order to keep the letter while breaking the spirit of the rule, dating no earlier than the case of Photius above mentioned (Bingh. II. x. 7). (5) Apost. Can. xxi. permits the consecration of one made a eunuch by cruelty, or born so; and (ib. lxxvii.) of one maimed or diseased in eye or leg; but (ib. lxxviii.) forbids it in the case of a deaf or dumb person. (6) Lastly, the bishop who was appointed Interrentor to a see during the vacancy was pro hoc vice ineligible to that see. [INTERVENTORES.] It remains to add (7) that the candidate's own consent was not at first held to be requisite, but that in many cases consecration was forced upon him ἔκοντα; as in the instances in Bingh. IV. vii. 2: to which may be added others, us. c. g. that of Eusebius of Caesarea in Pontus, A.D. 362 (Greg. Naz. Orat. xix.). And Apost. Can. xxxvi. orders the excommunication of a bishop who refuses the charge of the people assigned to him. But first St. Basil (id. Amphilo. h. x.) exempts those who in such a case had "sworn"—ὀμνούντες μὴ καταδέχεσθαι τὴν χειροτονίαν. And afterwards the emperors Leo and Majorian forbade forced ordinations altogether (Nordl. ii. in Append. ad Cod. Theodos. vi. 34). And similarly Pope Simplicius (Epist. ii.), and Conc. Aurelian. III. A.D. 538 (can. vii.). At the same time the law of Leo and Anthemius (Cod. Justin. lib. i. tit. iii. De Episcopis, l. 31) describes the "nolo episcopari" temper proper to one to whom a bishopric is offered—"ut quaeratur eogendus, rogatus recelat, invitatus refugiat, sola illi suffragetur necessitas obsequendi;" and that "profecto indignus est sacerdotio, nisi fuerit ordinatus invitus." And so the Fathers generally (Thomassin, II. ii. 65).

γ. Time, mode, and place of election.—Further, (1) the election was ordered to be made, and the new bishop consecrated, ἐν τῷ τριῶν μηνῶν, unless delay was unavoidable, by Conc. Chalced. A.D. 431, can. xxv. And the alleged practice at Alexandria (doubtless from the special character of the place already mentioned) was to elect immediately after the death of the last bishop, and before he was interred (Epiphani. Haer. lxxix. § 11, Liberat. Heretic. xx., and see Socrat. vii. 7); a practice followed in one instance, that of Proclus, A.D. 434—447, at Constantinople also (Socrat. vii. 40). The time allowed in Africa, however, was much longer, the episcopos interrentor being only superseded if he allowed the election to be delayed beyond a year (Conc. Carthag. V. A.D. 398, can. iii.; Cod. Can. Eccl. Afric. lxxiv.). On the other hand, Conc. Rom. A.D. 606, to prevent bishops nominating their own successors, forbids election until the third day after the last bishop's death. (2) Such election was not to take place ἐν τῇ παρούσῃ ἀκαθαρσίᾳ—"in the presence of the hearers," i. e. the class of catechumens so called (Conc. Laodic. A.D. 365, can. v.); probably because accusations might on such occasions be brought forward against clergy. (3) Later canon law (Greg. IX. Decret. l. vi. De Elect. et Electi Potest. c. 42) specifies three modes of electing; scil. by "compromissarii" (delegates by whose act the body of electors bound themselves to abide), by scrutiny of votes, by "inspiration" (if the electors agree in an unanimous and unpremeditated choice). Of these three, compromissarii are mentioned by Gregory the Great, although not under that name (Epist. iii. 37). And election by acclamation was (as we have seen) not unknown. The other was of course the ordinary way, viz. by some kind or other of scrutiny of votes. (4) The election was properly to take place in the diocese itself (whereas "compromissarii" might be sent elsewhere to perform it), that the people might be able to give their testimony (St. Cypri. Epist. lxxvii.). Conc. Aurelian. IV. A.D. 541, can. v. &c. &c., refer to the place of ordination, for which see below. So long as that also took place in the diocesan cathedral (see c. g. St. Aug. Epist. 261, and below), so long no doubt the election took place there likewise. But even when the ordination came to be transferred to the metropolitan see, the election still remained commonly as to be done on the spot itself. [INTERVENTORES; VISITATORS.]

2. Confirmation.—The bishop elect was next to be confirmed, viz. by the metropolitan. And so far as such confirmation merely referred to the metropolitan's share in the election, it would certainly seem to follow from Conc. Nicaen. can. vi. (κρατέτω ἡ τῶν παλαιῶν ψήφισι), from Conc. Antioch. A.D. 341, can. xix. (repeating the Nicene canon), and even from so late a witness as Conc. Aurelian. II. A.D. 452, can. v., that in the first instance and canonically the voice of the majority of bishops was final. At the same time, a certain right of ratification is assigned to the metropolitan, even from the time of the Council of Nice itself. And it certainly seems that the metropolitan in course of time, practically, if not expressly, came to have a veto. So, c. g. Pope Hilary, A.D. 465, Epist. ii. c. 1. In the form of election, however, in Sym. of Thessal., the bishops alone vote at all, the metropolitan not being even present. [METROPOLITAN.] So likewise with the patriarch, later still (see, however, for both, Conc. Chalced. A.D. 451, Art. xvi., Labbe, iv. 818, and PAVIARUCH). But from xvi. no doubt the earliest times, and corresponding to the proof (δοκιμασία) required in 1 Tim. iii. 7, 10, something must have existed like: "Qui enactum of Conc. Cath. IV. c. called: "Qui episcopus ordinandus est, antea examinatur, si natura sit prudens, si docibilis, si moribus temperatus, si litteratus, si in lege Domini instructus, si in Scripturarum sensibus cautus, si in dogmatibus ecclesiasticis exercitatus; et ante omnia, si fidei documenta verbis simplicibus assentit, id est, Patrem et Filium et Spiritum Sanctum unum Deum esse confirmans," &c. &c. So also Theodoret (in 1 Tim. v. 22).—Ἐξῆτάειν γὰρ πρότερον χρῆ τῶν χειρονομούμενων τὸν βίον εἶθ' οὕτως καλεῖν ἐπ' αὐτὸν τὴν χάριν τοῦ Πνεύ- αγορας. See also the Apost. Constit., and the description in the Greek Pontificals of the bishop to be consecrated, as already επιψηφιστος και επιερωμενος=elect and confirmed. Certainly, from the 4th century onward, the confirmation was a distinct technical act, following upon the election; so far distinct, indeed, that in time (from the 4th century itself according to De Marca, de Conc. Sacerd. et Imp. VIII. ii. 1; but Van Espen, Jur. Eccl. Univ. I. xiv. 1, § 7, more probably refers it to the 11th or 12th) confirmation was held to confer upon the bishop not yet consecrated the power of jurisdiction, but not that of order. Justinian enacts that a bishop elect shall carefully peruse the "rules laid down by the Catholic and Apostolic Church," and shall then be interrogated by his ordainer (i. e. the metropolitan) whether he is competent to keep them; and upon his solemn profession accordingly, and after a solemn admonition, shall then be ordained. And so we find Gregory the Great, A.D. 596 (Epist. vii. 19), desiring the archbishop of Ravenna to summon into his presence the bishop elect of Ariminum (elected by "clerus et plebs"), and to examine him; and if "ea in eo quae in textu Heptatici montis muletata sunt, minime fuerint reperta, atque fidelium personarum relatione ejus vobis quidem vita placent, ad nos cum decreto pagina, destinata, iuxta tenus a nobis . . . consecratur antistes." So again in Carolingian times, two centuries and a half later, upon the election of Gillebert to the see of Chalons sur Marne, Hincmar, archbishop of Rheims, with the other bishops of the province, or their vicars, the abbots, canons, monks, presbyters, deacons, and subdeacons, being assembled at Chiersi (near Laon)—the archbishops of Rouen, Tours, and Sens, being also present—the "clerus, ordo, et plebs" of Chalons presented the decree of election to Hincmar and his fellow-bishops, and (after an explanation respecting a previous election that had been set aside) declared the unanimous consent to it of the "canonici, monachi, parochi, et nobiles" of the diocese. Thereupon Hincmar interrogated the bishop elect respecting his country, condition, literary proficiency, and past ordinations; and ascertained that he had not been "conductor alienarum rerum, nec turpia lucra vel exactiones sine tormenta in hominibus exercens;" and further, as he had held some court office, that his accounts with the king were settled; to the former of which points certain clerical and noble laymen bore testimony, while for the latter he produced a royal letter, duly sealed, and containing also an intimation of the royal wish for his consecration. Testimonies of a bishop and certain monks to his good behaviour were then produced; and the consent of the archbishop of Tours was given to the transfer into another province of one born and ordained at Tours. Hincmar, then, with the archbishop of Tours as his assessor, desired the candidate to read, or listen to, and promise to keep, the Pastoral of Gregory the Great, the Canons, and the rules usually given by the ordainer to the ordained, and which were subsequently given to him in writing; and to write out and subscribe the Creed, and hand it so subscribed to the metropolitan. The written consents of the absent bishops were then produced and read, and the day and place of consecration fixed (Chron. Gallie, Simond, ii. 651). See also the Ordinals in Martene (ii. 386) and Morinus (de Sac. Ord. li.). A professio, i. e. at first both of his faith and of canonical obedience to his archbishop, came also to be part of the formal proceedings of the confirmation of a bishop. The English "Professions" begin early in the 9th century; and the early ones commonly contain a kind of creed, as well as a promise of obedience. So likewise in the East, the 2nd Conc. of Nice, A.D. 787 (can. ii.) requires a careful enquiry to be made whether the candidate is well acquainted with the Canons, with the Gospels, Epistles, and the whole Scriptures, and is prepared himself to walk, and to teach the people committed to him, according to God's commandments. And the bishop elect was required to profess that he "receives the Seven Synods, and promises to keep the canons enacted by them, and the constitutions promulgated by the Fathers." A solemn recitation and subscription of the Creed, and a disclaimer of simony, were required also of the bishop elect before his consecration (Syn. Thessal. ap. Morin. ii. 156). In the Western Church, even at this date, no further confirmation was usual or necessary. The pope only intervened in a few extraordinary cases (Thomassin, II. ii. 30, § 1; and see PATRIARCH, POPE).

3. Ordination (χειροτονια most commonly, as probably in Acts xiv. 23, although the word is also used of election, as 2 Cor. viii. 19; χειροθεσια, which also means sometimes benediction only, as δ προεβότερος χειροθετει, ου χειροτονει, Apost. Constit. viii. 28 [and so χειροτονει and χειροθετει are distinguished in the spurious Epist. of St. Ignat. to Ihero, c. iii.]; καθησους; τελεσιουργια; ἀφορισμος; and in Pseudo-Dion. Areop., rhetoricized into τελεισιους ιερατικη αποπληρωσις, διακοσμησις, κ. τ. λ.)—followed upon the completion of the confirmation.

And (a) first, the matter and form (as it was afterwards called) of ordination was, from the beginning, laying on of hands (ἐπιθεσις των χειρων, Acts vi. 6, 1 Tim. iv. 14, v. 22, 2 Tim. i. 6; χειροθεσια, Euseb.), accompanied necessarily by words expressive of the purpose of the act, but by no invariable and universal formula claiming apostolic authority. Other rites, added as time went on, cannot claim to be either apostolical or universal, and pertain therefore, at best, "to the solemnity, not to the essence," of the rite. (i.) The only other rite indeed in episcopal ordination, that has any appearance of a claim to the "ubique et ab omnibus," but which is not traceable (although it very probably existed) before the 3rd century, is the laying of the Gospels, open in the ancient and in the Greek church, shut acc. to the Ordo Romanus, upon the head (in some rites, upon the neck and shoulders) of the bishop to be ordained.—Const. Apostol. viii. 4: Και σωπης γερομενης, εις των πρωτων επισκοπων εμα και δυσιν ετεροις πλησιον του θυσιαστηριου εστως, των λοιπων επισκοπων και προεβυτερων σωτη προσεχομενων,

* The special appropriation of the term consecration to episcopal ordination is purely modern; Leo M., e.g., uses the term indifferently of bishops, priests, or deacons; and Gillebert, quoted by Du Cange, opposes it to "dedicare," the latter meaning to devote to God, the former to set apart for holy uses.

Apostol.* iii. 3 (assigning the act to deacons), Pseudo-Chrys. (Hom. de Uno Legislator. Opp. vi. 410, Montfauc.), Pseudo-Dion. Areop. (de Eccl. Hier. V. i. 7, iii. 7), and almost every ritual, Eastern and Western, including (so Denzinger) Nestorian, Maronite, and Jacobite (assigning it either to the patriarch or to the assisting bishops). And although it came to be used in Egypt in the consecration of the patriarch only, yet there too if the Pseudo-Dionysius represents the Alexandrian rite, it must have been used at first for all bishops (Denzinger, Rit. Orient. 135). Alcuin however (de Div. Off.) Amalarius (de Offic. Eccl. ii. 14), and Isidor. Hispal. (de Div. Offic. ii. 5), quoted by Merinus, seem (rather unaccountably) to imply its absence in Gaul, Germany, and Spain, in the 8th and 9th centuries. And it is certainly wanting in two pontificals in Mahillon (Mus. Italic. tom. ii. numm. viii. ix.). The actual delivery of the Gospels to the consecrated bishop occurs among the Maronites, but not among the Jacobite Syrians or the Nestorians (Denzinger); and in the West, it is in the present Roman Pontifical, but was unknown until the 11th century (Morinus, iii. 25).—(ii.) Anointing of the head in episcopal ordination is a much less ancient or general rite than the imposition of the Gospels. Among the Easterns it never existed at all (Morinus, Denzinger, &c.); the few ambiguous expressions in Eastern rituals (cited by, e. g., J. A. Assmann) referring to spiritual anointing, while the testimony to the absolute non-occurrence of the material rite is express. It is found in Gaul in the 6th century (Rit. ap. Morin. de Ordin. ii. 261, sq.); in Africa not at all; doubtfully in Spain (Morinus); but in Italy, also in the 6th century (S. Leo M., Serm. viii. de Passion. Domini; Greg. M. in Cap. l. x.; ap. Morin. ib. iii. vi. 2, § 2); and in Saxon England it was extended to hands as well as head in the 8th century (Egbert's Pontif. c1. Greenwell); and so also in the Roman ordinal in Morinus, ii. 288.—(iii.) The sign of the cross, accompanying the imposition of hands (which is therefore called appayis), is mentioned by St. Chrys. (Hom. Iv. in Matth.), and by the Pseudo-Dionysius as above. In the later Greek ritual it occurred thrice (see Morinus, iii. 254).—(iv.) Delivery of pastoral staff and ring became also a part of the Western rite from about the latter part of the 6th century (Maskell, Mon. Lit. vol. iii. 273). It occurs in the Pontificals of Gregory the Great and Egbert, but not in those of Gelasius or Leo. The staff indeed dates from the 4th century, as one of the insignia of a bishop, both in East and West. And the ring, which is unused in the East (except by the Maronite Syrians, and by the Armenians, the latter of whom borrowed it from Rome—so Denzinger—and the σφραγίς, or sign of the cross, is ἀντί δακτυλίου, acc. to Sym. Thessalon.), occurs in the West as early as Isid. Hispal. de Div. Off. ii. 5; but "is not in either Amalarius, Alcuin, or Rab.

Maurus" (Maskell). Both staff and ring are in Conc. Tolet. IV. A. D. 633, can. xviii. (mentioning "orarium, anulum, baculum"); and, seemingly, in Conc. Frey of A. D. 781, can. x. (mentioning, however, only in general, "episcopalia"). [RING; CROSSED STAFF.] But as part of the rite of ordination, they belong to the West, and to the latter part of the 6th century. [SYMBOLISM.] The staff, however, occurs in a late Greek Pontifical in Morinus (de Sac. Ord. ii. 124).—(v.) The ζωοφόριον, or pallium (a linen vestment marked with crosses), also came to be given at episcopal ordination in the East. It is mentioned as an (Eastern) episcopal vestment as early as Isidor. Pelus. in the 5th century (lib. i. Ep. 136; beginning of the 5th century (lib. i. Ep. 136; and see Morinus, p. ii. pp. 220 sq., and Denzinger); and occurs in the Eastern rituals. In the West, the delivery of a vestment also called by the name of pallium followed ordination, not of all bishops, but of archbishops, as a totally distinct ceremony, and with an entirely different meaning and purpose. And this began about A. D. 500; see Gieseler, ii. 133, Eng. ed., and under PALL.—(vi.) The delivery of the mitre at ordination (vi.) The delivery of the mitre at ordination in the West dates only after the close of the period to which this article refers; occurring first about the 10th century (see Maskell's Mon. Lit. iii. 275). It is in the Sursum, as in all later Pontificals. As part of the episcopal dress during Divine service, in some shape or other, and under various names, it occurs both in East and West, from apparently the 4th century. [MITRE].—(vi.) The delivery of the paten, "cum oblativis" and of the chalice "cum vino," which forms a principal part of the later additions to the ordination of a presbyter [ΠΡΑΞΥΤΙΚΑ], is found for the first time in the Sacram. of Gregory the Great (Morinus, ii. 277, iii. 134), and in the consecration of a bishop (in which however it does not occur again). Among the Syrians, however, the consecrating bishop touched the consecrated elements with his hands before laying hands upon the head of the bishop to be consecrated (Denzinger); and in the Apost. Constit. viii. 5, one of the consecrating bishops is ordered ἀναφέρειν τὴν θυσίαν ἐπὶ τῶν χειρῶν τοῦ χειροτονουμένου.—(vii.) The ἀνάβηθρον or proclamation (proclatio, pronuntiatio, ἀνακρούσις, ἐπικρούσις, or κρούσις ἐξ ὀνόματος), and (viii.) the litis of pace, are mentioned by Pseudo-Dion. Areop. as following upon the consecration. The latter is mentioned also in Apost. Constit. viii. 5, but as occurring at the subsequent enthronization. And it was repeated four times during the service in the East in the time of Sym. of Thessal. (ap. Morin. ii. 171). The former occurs in the time of Symeon before the consecration, and was in that position a public proclamation by name of the appointment (ἡ θεία χάρις προχειρίσεται) of the elect bishop, made by the consecrating archbishop (among the Jacobites and Copts, however, by the archdeacon—Denzinger). There were indeed two such ὑμνηματα: one, the declaration made to the bishops, intimating the choice made by emperor; and the other, the proclamation of the name to the people (Morinus, iii. 254). In the older Latin Rituals the same form occurs in substance in like phrase (ut ib. 27); viz. as a declaration by the consecrator, that "cives nostri elegerunt sibi illum pastoreca, oremus itaque pro hoc viro," &c. It is also in use among the Syrians (id. ib. 31). The Apost. Constit. do not mention it. But St. Greg. Naz. seems to allude to it under the term ἐπισημίζερα (Mor. ib. 30). Ἀναθήσις is also used in Synesius (Epist. 67) as equivalent to consecration; and see also Suler in voce.

All these, however, are later additions to the rite; arising (as was not unnatural) out of the gradual extension of the "traditio instrumenti" which had constituted the ordination of the minor orders from the beginning (see Conc. Carth. IV.), to the higher orders also; and accompanied in the case of some of them by an equally natural conversion of accessories in course of time into essentials. It is waste of words to prove that the one and only essential act from the beginning was imposition of hands. This also, however, in process of time, became varied, 1. by repetition, 2. by the use of one or both hands, and the like; for which details see IMPOSITION OF HANDS.

The form of ordination was not similarly fixed. Pope Innocent III., speaking as a canonist, and Habert, writing of the Greeks as a theologian, expressly declare that the Apostles appointed no form of words; that it rests therefore with the Church to appoint such a form; and that, apart from Church authority, any words whatever, adequate to the purpose, would suffice. And the facts of the case are in themselves enough to establish this. In the Greek Church, the form in Syn. Thessal. runs thus: Ἡ θεία χεῖρς προσημίζερα τὸν δεῖνα εἰς Ἐπίσκοπον, κ.τ.λ.; these words, which are used at the ἀναθήσις, being repeated at the actual consecration. Denzinger, however (pp. 140, 141), considers the essential words in the Eastern rites which he mentions to be found in the prayers which accompanied the laying on of hands, and to be of a precatory form. In the Latin Church, since the 11th century, it has been simply, "Accepit Spiritum Sanctum," without express mention in the act or by description, the context sufficiently limiting the purpose of the words (Vazquez, &c.). Prior to that date, the "consecratio" of a bishop was not an imperative declaration, but was in the form of a prayer. [ORDINATION.]

β. The ordiners were necessarily bishops (see below, III. 1. a. 1). "Two or three at the least," was the rule of the Apostolic Canon (1), and of the Apost. Constit. (viii. 4, 27); the latter also deposing both ordained and ordainer, if any were ordained (of course, without sufficient cause), by one bishop (viii. 27), yet expressly not voiding such ordination if the case were one of necessity. But while St. Cyprian (Epist. 67) implies the ordinary presence of all or most of the provincial bishops, the Nicene Council (can. iv.) requires the actual participation in the consecration, of three absolutely, as a minimum—of all, if possible—but in any case with the consent of least of the rest of the provincial bishops, or (can. vi.) of the major part of them. And so also Conc. Chalced. Act. xvi. Several Gallican provincial councils go further, by requiring in one case (Conc. Arlet. I. A. D. 314, can. xx.) seven as a rule, but if that is impossible, at least "infra tres non aude[re] ordinare;" or again (Conc. Arlet. II. A. D. 353, can. v.) the metropolitan with three suffragans (or, according to another reading, the metropolitan in person or by letter, and three suffragans), with the consent of the remainder, or of at least the major part of the whole number, in case of division; or yet again (Conc. Aracensis, I. A. D. 441, can. xxi.), by actually deposing the ordainer, and (if a willing participant in the irregularity) the ordained bishop also, if "two bishops presume" to ordain; while yet a fourth like council (Acephens, A. D. 439, can. ii.) not only censures but voids a consecration, which shall lack any of the three conditions, of consent of provincial bishops, presence of three of them, and assent of metropolitan. The rule requiring three is also matter of constant reference (as, e. g., in Conc. Epton. A. D. 517, can. 1; or again by popes from Damasus onward to Leo III., in discussing the position of chorepiscopi; see Morin. iii. 58). Spanish councils simply repeat the Nicene canon on the subject (e. g., Conc. Tolet. IV. A. D. 681, can. xviii.; and so Isidor. Hispal. de Offic. Eccl. II. 5). And in Africa, at an earlier date, Conc. Carth. III. A. D. 397, can. xxxix., condemns consecration by two bishops, pronounces the requirement of twelve (which had been suggested) impracticable, and repeats accordingly the old rule of three: can. xl. of the same council prohibiting the three from proceeding to consecrate, in case objections are taken to the bishop-elect, until themselves with "one or two" more have enquired into those objections on the spot, and found them groundless. The rule in the East was the same (Denzinger, p. 142), "scilicet non minuat numerus ternarius," and Conc. Seleuc. et Ctesiph. A. D. 410 (ed. Jamy, 1869), deposes (if the record is genuine) both consecrated and consecrators, if any be ordained bishop by one bishop or by two. But then the principle which underlay this rule, was not the inability of one bishop by himself to consecrate, but the desirableness that many, and if possible all, should co-operate in, and testify to, the act of consecration. So expressly the Apost. Constit. viii. 27; adding with like clearness a proviso, that "one" may consecrate in case of necessity, if only a greater number signify their sanction of the act. So Gregory the Great, in the well-known Answers to Augustine, requires "three or four" if possible, but speaks of the presence of more than one only as "valde utilis," as of those "qui testes assistant;" and distinctly authorizes consecration by one on the ground of necessity. So Synesius (Epist. 67) censures the consecration of Siderius, bishop of Palaeiscea, as (not invalid but) εὐθέτως, i. e. because not in Alexandria or with the consent of the patriarch; but also, 2. because performed by "not three," but a single bishop; and Theodoret (v. 23) that of Evagrius of Antioch, as also παρὰ τὸν ἐκκλησιαστικὸν θεσμόν, "because (among other things) Paulinus alone consecrated him. But Synesius adds, that necessity justified the former of these consecrations, and had led St. Athanasius to allow the like; and in that of the latter, both the bishop of Alexandria and the Western bishops recognized it none the less (Theodoret, ib.; Innocent I. Epist. 14). So again the bishops of Pontus (Epist. ad fin. Conc. Chalced.) speak of Dioscorus of Alexandria as actually bishop, although consecrated by only two bishops (and those under censure), "cum regulæ patrum . . . tres episcopus corporaliter adesse . . . prospiciant." Of the very councils then, Arles II. and of Riez, above quoted, the former

recognizes the reality of the consensual consecration by appointing the bishop consecrated by two to one of the sees vacated by the deposition of his consecrators, if the irregularity had been without his consent; and the latter,—although its canon can scarcely be explained away (as by Thomassin) by referring it to election and not consecration,—yet both permits the deposed bishop to confirm, and allows the orders he may have already conferred, subject only to the favour of the metropolitan; or in other words, does not venture to quash the consecration outright. The Welsh and early Irish and Scotch practice—of only one consecrator—was no doubt at first a matter of necessity; although continued after it had ceased to be so. The Saxon Church resumed the canonical rule of three, on the other hand, as soon as possible. And even in 664 a Wessex bishop called in two British bishops, albeit he must have thought them schismatical, to complete that number (Baed. H. E. iii. 28). The sees of Pope Pelagius I. A. D. 555, ordained by two bishops and a presbyter (Lib. Pontif. in V. Felux.), and of Novatian long before, calling in three bishops, ἀποστατικούς καὶ ἀνομοτάτους, from some corner of Italy, to ordain him to the see of Rome (Euseb. H. E. vi. 43), and long afterwards, the permission given by the popes (see Bellarm. de Eccl. iv. 8) to make up the number of three by two or more nitred abbots, so that there was one bishop (Labbe, i. 53),—prove at once the existence of the rule which they violate its spirit. Pope Sirivius also (Epist. H. E. c. 2, A. D. 384 × 398) forbids “ne unus episcopus episcopum ordinare presumat;” but it is “propter arrogantiam,” and “ne futurum beneficium praestitum videntur.” Michael Oxita (patriarch of Constantinople, A. D. 1145–6) also rejected two bishops who had been ordained by a single bishop (Bever. Pandect. ii. Annct. p. 10). Among the Nestorians, again, the patriarch Timotheus, about A. D. 900, asserting the “need” of three bishops, allows in a case of necessity the sufficiency of two, so long as the necessity lasted; but enjoins that the Gospels shall be placed on the right hand upon a throne in lieu of a third bishop (Assenmani, Bibl. Orient. iii. l. 163). Compare finally the distinction drawn in the Pontificals between the consecrator and the “assisting bishops”—“socii ordinationis” (Coptic Rit.): or again the words of the bishops of Pontus mentioned above, “per suffragium consensuumque duorum episcoporum cum ipso (patriarcha) praesentium.” Whether chorepiscopi, consecrated by one bishop, were bishops themselves, see CHOREPISCOPI.

7. The place of ordination was properly and originally the actual see itself to which the bishop was to be ordained. So St. Cyprian (Epist. 67), Possid. (in V. S. Aug. viii.), St. Augustin himself (Epist. 261), Pope Julius (Epist. Aud. Orient. ap. St. Athan. Apol. ii.), Conc. Chalced. Act. xi. (Labbe, iv. 700), Conc. Rom. A. D. 531 (in Holstein. Collect. Rom. p. 7), and Synesius (Epist. 67, as above). The practice however came in time to be that the metropolitan appointed the place to be that the metropolitan (see Constit. iii., Synes. ib.; Conc. Tol. IV. A. D. 581, can. xviii.), although it was commonly the metropolitan see, and the metropolitan himself was always to be consecrated there (Conc. Tol. ib.). If, however, not there, then, by Conc. Tarracon. A. D. 518, can. x., the bishop consecrated elsewhere was to present himself to the metropolitan within two months. And Conc. Auchlin. IV. A. D. 541, can. v., restricts it to the metropolitan see, unless unavoidably removed elsewhere; and even in that case commands the presence of the metropolitan, and that it shall be within the province. In whatsoever town it was, the rite was always celebrated at the altar of the church, the candidate kneeling (Pseudo-Dion. as above, and repeatedly; Theodoret, iv. 15, κατὰ τὴν ἑαυτοῦ τῶν περὶ). A natural custom also in course of time marked out the Lord's Day, or at any rate some great festival, as the “legitimus dies” for a bishop's consecration (Pope Zosimus, Epist. vi.; Conc. Tol. IV. can. xviii.); while Leo the Great (Epist. ix.) insists upon the Lord's Day, but as beginning from the Saturday evening; and Pope Gelasius actually limits the ordinations of presbyters and deacons to the Saturday evening exclusively. But there was certainly no restriction of days at all until the 4th century (Pagi, ap. Bingham, IV. vi. 7). In the East the same rule of Sunday came to prevail universally (Benzinger); but the Nestorian rubric (as does also common Western practice) admits festivals likewise (ib.). Ember-days, when they came to exist, belonged to presbyterial and diaconal ordinations. The hour also came to be limited as well as the day, viz. to the time of the celebration of the Eucharist, i. e. the morning (τῆς ἑσπέρης ἑσπέρης) (as σπουδαίως, says Theodoret, Hist. Reliq. xiii., speaking however of presbyterial ordination); and this at an early period, inasmuch as Novatus is censured (Euseb. H. E. vi. 43), as having been (among other things) consecrated ἕως ἑσπέρης, i. e. somewhere about 4 P. M. In the East the rule became equally fixed, and on like grounds; and this as regards bishops universally; save (as before) the one exception of the Nestorians, who leave it optional, and provide rubrics for ordinations made “extra missam” (Benzinger). Theodore in England enacts (Constit. ii. iii. 1), that in the ordination of a bishop “debet missa cantari ab episcopo ordinante.” The particular part of the liturgy, however, at which the ordination was to be (so to say) interpolated, differed in East and West. The “dies anniversarius” of the ordination, i. e. the “dies natalis” or the “natalitia” of the bishop, was also commonly kept as a kind of festival (St. Aug. Cont. Lit. Petil. ii. 23, Hom. xxxii. de Verb. Dom. Hom. xxiv. et xxv. ex Quinquagesima, Hom. cxxi. ed. Bened.; Leo M., Hom. i. li. iii.; Paulin. ed. Bened.; St. Ambros. Epist. v.; Pope Hilary, Epist. ii.; Sixtus, Epist. ad Joh. Antioch. Labbe, iii. 1261; Pagi, ap. Bingham, IV. vi. 15).

8. The ordainers were also, according to African rule (Cod. Can. Afric. 89), to give letters under their own hand to the bishop ordained, “continentes consulem et aliam.” In order to prevent future disputes about precedence. And a register of ordinations (archives, matricula, ἀρχερωσ, μαρτυριον) was to be kept both in the primate's church and in the metropolis of the province for the like purpose (ib. 86; and see Bingham, II. xvi. 8).

4. Euthronization (ἐυθρονισμῶν, invechthronē), which is mentioned in the Apost. Constit., and in Greek Pontificals, as the concluding act of ordination, followed upon ordination, either (as at first) immediately or (in course of time) after an interval; a regular service being then provided for it, which is described by Sym. Thess. c.

vil. A sermon was thereupon preached, at least in the East, by the newly consecrated bishop, styled "sermo enthronizationis," of which instances are given in Bingh. II. xi. 10. And il levois communicatiois, or ἀποδοξια, or ἐνθρονιστιῶν, γράμματα κανονικά, ἀλλὰ ἀβαλ ἐθ' ουσιακά, were written to other bishops, to give account of the sender's faith, and to receive letters of communion in return (Bingh. ib.). Τὰ ἐνθρονιστικά, also, were payments which came to be made by bishops on occasion of their enthronization. The Arabic version of the Nicene canons has a rule about enthronization (can. lxxi.), viz. that the bishop be enthroned at once by a delegate of the archbishop, and that the archbishop visit him personally after three months, and confirm him in the see. In 694 or 5, when Wilfrid was consecrated at Compiègne by twelve French bishops, they carried him, with hymns and chants, "in sella aurea seclentem, more eorum" (Edd. in I. Wulf. xii.).

5. A Profession of Obedience to the metropolitan, and (in the Carolingian empire) an oath of allegiance to the emperor or king, began to be required, prior to confirmation, the former from the 6th century onwards, the latter from the time either of Charlemagne or of his immediate successors; but far earlier in Spain. a. The earliest written profession of obedience to the metropolitan produced by Thomassin—"cartula de obedientie sponsione"—is one made by the metropolitan of Ephrus to the archbishop of Thessalonica, and is condemned by Pope Leo I. A. D. 450 (Epist. lxxxiv. c. 1). And some kind of written promise—"tempore ordinationis nostrae unusquisque sacerdos cautionem scriptis emittimus, studiosae fidei ordinatoris nostri"—was made to the patriarch of Aquileia, c. A. D. 590, by his suffragans (Baron. in an. 590, num. xviii.). But Spanish councils of a little later date are (as might be expected) most express on the point. Con. Emerit., indeed, A. D. 606, can. iv.,—extending to bishops, &c., an enactment of Conc. Tolos. IV. A. D. 581, can. xvii., respecting presbyters and deacons,—only enjoin the metropolitan at the time of his ordination, and the bishops at the time of theirs, respectively to promise "vivere caste, recte, et sobrie." But Conc. Tolet. XI. A. D. 675, can. x., requires every one of all grades of clergy, before "consecration," to bind himself, not only to keep the faith, live piously, and obey the canons, but also "ut debitum per omnium honorem atque obsequium reverentiam praecelesti sibi unanquisque depndat." St. Boniface shortly after, in Germany, A. D. 723, when consecrated bishop by Pope Gregory II., goes a long step further, by giving a written promise (addressed to St. Peter), "vobis, beato Petro, vicario tuo B. Papae Gregorio, successoribusque eius," that he will keep the faith in its purity, &c., and that he will "fitem et puritatem," &c., "praedicto vicario tuo atque successoribusque per omnia exhibere," &c. (S. Bonif. Epist. xvii. c. l. Juste); an innovation which Thomassin tells us was not repeated by any one, not even by St. Boniface's own successors at Mentz. Further on, in Gaul, Conc. Cabillon. A. D. 813, can. xlii., expressly forbids the oath which some then exacted at ordination, "quod digni sint, et contra canones non sint ficturi, et obedientes sint episcopo qui eos ordinat," &c.; "quod juramentum quia periculosum est, omnes una inhibendum statuimus."

CHRIST. ANT.

And a Capitulary of Ludov. Plus, A. D. 816 (Capit. l. c. 97), noticing the "sacramenta," as well as "munera," which Lombard bishops then exacted "ab his quos ordinabant," forbids "omnibus modis, ne ulterius fiat." But this prohibition applied to the exacting of an oath of fealty (Canelan, Leg. Barbar. v. 121). Professors to the metropolitan by the bishop to be consecrated were, certainly, from that time forward the regular practice. The form of that of the bishop of Terouenne to Hincmar of Rheims is in Conc. Gallie. II. 655. And English professions likewise run on from the like date. A special oath to the pope, and the meaning attached to the reception of the St. Boniface's oath a lone excepted. In the East, made by the bishop to the patriarch, is in Jur. Orient. l. 441; and is expressly sanctioned by the 8th can. of Conc. Constantin. A. D. 863, while condemning certain unauthorized additions to it. It may also be mentioned here that St. Augustin procured an enactment, at a Council of Carthage, that all canons relating to the subject, "ab ordinantibus ordinandis vel ordinatis in notitiam esse deferenda" (Pessid. I. 8. Jur. viii). B. A general oath of allegiance to the king, from all subjects, occurs repeatedly in the Spanish councils (e. g. Conc. Tolet. XVI. A. D. 693). And a promise of fidelity from bishops is mentioned in Gaul as early as the time of Leo I. A. D. 450, and St. Eligius, c. A. D. 610. But special mention of an oath of fidelity taken by a bishop at his ordination seems to occur first at the Council of Toul, A. D. 850, where it is declared that the archbishop of Soys had three sworn allegiance to Charles the Bald, the first time being when the king gave him his bishopric. Such an oath of allegiance seems also to be meant by Conc. Tur. III. A. D. 813, can. i.; and by Conc. Aquigr. II. A. D. 833, cap. ii. can. xli.; although spoken of with no reference to ordination. But the absence of all formulae for it in earlier times is conclusive against throwing back the date before Charlemagne. Homage in the feudal sense belongs to a later period still. At the same time Charlemagne introduced an oath of fealty in the case of bishops, and invested a bishop with the temporalities of his see by ring and crossier (De Marca, de Conc. Eccl. et Imp. pp. 402, 426). As regards the East, there is no mention whatever in Symeon Thessalon. of any oath to the emperor taken by a bishop at ordination. 7. The oath against simony may also be mentioned here, enacted by Justinian (Novell. cxxvii. c. 2) as to be taken by a bishop at ordination; an enactment repeated by Pope Adrian I. (Epist. ad Car. M. in Conc. Gallie. ii. 97). (See also above, I. 2; and SIMONY.)

II. We have next to consider how a bishop ceased to be so, either of a particular see, or altogether. And,

1. Of Translation, which, as a rule, was forbidden, but only as likely to proceed from selfish motives, and therefore with the exception, expressed sometimes, but seemingly always understood, of cases where there was sufficient and good cause. Before the period of the Apostolic Canons this prohibition would have been hardly needed. Apost. Can. xiv. forbids it, unless there be a εὐλογος αἰτία, scil. a prospect of more spiritual "gain" in saving souls; and guards the right practical application of the rule by the proviso, that neither the bishop himself, nor the παροικία desiring him, but "many bishops," shall decide the point, and that παρακληθῆσι μεγίστοις. The Council of Nice (can. xv.), Conc. Antioch. A.D. 341 (can. xxi.), Conc. Sardic. A.D. 347 (can. i.), Conc. Carth. III. A.D. 397 (can. xxxvii.), and Conc. Carth. IV. A.D. 398 (can. xxvii.), forbid it likewise: the first two without qualification; and the second, whether the suggestion proceed from the bishop, the people, or other bishops; but the third, if ἀντὶ πόλεως μικρᾶς εἰς ἐρέταν; and the fourth, also in case it be "de loco ignobili ad nobilem," while allowing it if it be for the good of the Church, so that it be done "by the sentence of a synod," and at the request of the clergy and laity. And the Council of Nice itself both shewed that exceptional cases were not excluded, by actually itself translating a bishop (Sozom. l. 2, quoted by Pagi), and is explained by St. Jerome as prohibiting it, only "ne virginalis pauperumque societate contempta, ditioris adulescentis quaerat amplexus" (Epist. lxxxiii. ad Occum.). St. Athanasius indeed gives us the alter dictio of an Egyptian council, condemning translation as parallel with divorce, and therefore with the sin of adultery (Athan. Apol. ii.). And similarly St. Jerome (Epist. lxxxiii. ad Occum.). But Pope Julius condemns it on the assumption throughout that its motive is self-aggrandizement. Pope Damasus also condemns it, but it is when done "per ambitionem;" and Pope Gelasius, but only "nullis existentibus causis." Leo the Great, c. A.D. 450 (Epist. lxxxiv. c. 8) deposes a bishop who seeks to be translated, but it is "ad majorem plebem," and "despecta civitatis suae mediocritate." And Pope Hilary, in Conc. Rom. A.D. 465, condemns a proposed Spanish translation, among other things, as contrary to the Nicene canon (Hilar. Epist. 1-3). While Conc. Chalced. A.D. 451, can. vi. re-enacts the canons against "transmigration." At the same time, both translations, as a matter of fact, were repeatedly sanctioned, beginning with the noted case of Alexander and Narcissus of Jerusalem (Hieron. de Script. Ecol. 62); as may be seen in Sozom. vii. 35, &c., St. Greg. Naz., indeed, A.D. 382, speaks of the Antiochene canon on the subject as a σβῶσις πάσαις τεθῆναι; and St. Socrates actually tells us in terms, that translations were only forbidden when persecutions ceased, but had previously been perfectly free to all; and asserts that they were a thing ἀδιόφορος, whenever circumstances made them expedient (v. 8, vii. 35); and the author of the tract De Translationibus in the Jus Orient. (i. 293) sums up the matter tersely in the statement that ἡ μετᾶβασις κεκάλυπται οὐ μὴν ἢ μετᾶθεσις; i. e. the thing prohibited is "transmigration" (which arises from the bishop himself, from selfish motives), not "translation" (wherein the will of God and the good of the Church is the ruling cause); the "going," not the "being taken," to another see. The same rule and practice prevailed both in East and West down to the 9th century, complicated however in the West by frequent cases of sees destroyed in war, or removed "ad alia loca quae securiora putamus" (St. Greg. M. Epist. ii. 14). Many cases occur in Gregory's letters, of bishops of Italy, Corsica, &c., translated by him for these or like causes, but always under pressure of necessity (see Thomassin, II. ii. 62); and Joann. Dinc. (iii. 18) asserts expressly that Gregory "nunquam episcopum ab integritate suae Ecclesiae vel ipse in aliam commutavit vel sub quacunque occasione migrare consensit." Gregory of Tours supplies instances of like translations in Gaul, all made "consensu regum et episcoporum," but "iaconsulta sede apostolica" (Thomassin, ib. § 5). So in Spain (Conc. Tolet. X. A.D. 658, and XVI. A.D. 693, can. xii.). In Saxa England, after the first shifting of sees consequent upon the settlement of the Church down to Abp. Theodore was passed, no translations occurred at all, except the simoniacal instance of Wine in 666, until that of Dunstan from Worcester to London, A.D. 959, except in the cases of (1) the ever-shifting sees of Hexham and Whitby, and there once, in 789, and (2) the archbishops of Canterbury and York; and even in the case of the archbishops, Cuthbert's was the only instance (A.D. 740) until the 10th century. In the East, while the case of Anthimus, condemned by Conc. Constantin. A.D. 536, Act. i., for τὴν μοιχικὴν ἀρχαίην τῆς βασιλείας Ἐκκλησίας, viz. Constantinople, and for leaving his own (smaller) see of Trapezus, "widowed and without a husband, against the canons,"—condemned also by Pope Agapetus I. ("Impossibile translatum in illa sede permanere," Liberat. Breviar. 21).—shews the existence of the old feeling on the subject; the counter case of Germanus of Cyzicum, translated A.D. 714 to Constantinople, "suffragio atque consensu religiosorum, presbyterorum, diaconorum, et totius sanctoris cleri sacrique senatus et populi imperatricis hujus civitatis" (Thomassin, from Theophanes in an. and Anastasius), shews equally that translations, if circumstances were thought to justify them, were not prohibited. In the Alexandrian Church the rule appears to have been exceptionally strict, so that originally it was forbidden to translate a bishop, already such, to the patriarchate, although in later and Mohammedan times this rule after great contentions became relaxed (Benzinger); and among the Nestorians, as one result of such relaxation of a like rule, it came to pass that patriarchs were often actually re-consecrated (Assemani and Renaudot, op. Douzinger).

2. Of Resignation, and (a) of resignation simply; respecting which there is no express canon, absolutely speaking; but Can. Apostol. can. xxxvi. Conc. Ancyr. can. xviii., Conc. Antioch. A.D. 341, can. xvii. xviii., assume or enact that a bishop once consecrated cannot refuse to go to a see, even if the people will not receive him; and the two latter refer the decision to the synod, which may allow him to withdraw or not as it judges best. Instances accordingly occur of resignations allowed because circumstances rendered it expedient for the good of the Church, as where the people obstinately refused to submit to the bishop; e. g. St. Greg. Naz., when archbishop of Constantinople, with the consent of the Council of Constantinople (Theodoret, v. 8; Sozom. v. 7; Sozom. vii. 7; Orat. xxxii., and Carmen de Vita Sua); Meletius when bishop of Sebaste in Armenia (Theodoret ii. 31); Martryrius, bishop of Antioch (Theod. Lector i.); all cases in point to the canons above mentioned, the people in each case being factious and perverse; but the second and third (although the latter was at Antioch itself), apparently in direct synodic the will tyrius, "Ἐκκλησία occur a tingham (Hom. x. Theodos African at the Carthag. of Perga, *Conc. In Saxony shifting of sees consent of the Church down passed, no translations the simoniacal instance of at of Dunstan from Worcester 959, except in the cases of Hexham and Whitby in 789, and (2) the archbishop and York; and even in copies, Cuthbert's was the only until the 10th century. In case of Anthimus, Constantin. A.D. 539, Act. i. for τῆς βασιλῆος Ἐκκαθλια, and for leaving his own as "widowed and without canons,"—condemned also "Impossible translationum permanere." direct contradiction to the Antiochene rule, no episcopal decision being mentioned, but only the will of the bishops themselves: e.g. of Mar- tyrius, Καὶ ἄπο ἀνοσιώδους, καὶ λαφ' ἀπειθεί, καὶ ὁ Ἐκκλησία ἐβήρωσεν ἀποτάττωμαι. Instances though not accepted) for peace' sake: as St. Chrys. (Hom. xi. in Epheos), Flavian of Antioch under Theodosius (Theodoret, v. 23), the Catholic African bishops under Aurelius and St. Augustine at the time of the Donatist schism (Collat. Carthg. A.D. 411, die i. c. xvi.). And Eustathius of Perga again, was permitted to resign by the Conc. Ephes. A.D. 431 (Act. vii. in Epist. ad Synod. Pamphyliae), on account of old age, retaining τῶ τε τῆς ἐπισκοπῆς ὄνομα καὶ τὴν τιμὴν καὶ τὴν κωνανίαν, but without authority to act as bishop unless at a fellow-bishop's request. And a pension out of the revenues of the see was granted to Domnus, who had resigned the see of Antioch, by the Conc. Chalced. A.D. 457 (Act. vii. Act. x. Labbe, iv. 681), at the request of Maximus, who had succeeded him. These and like instances testify to the gradual establishment of a rule, permitting resignations under circumstances of obvious expediency for the Church, so that they were sanctioned by at least the provincial synod. And forms of voluntary resignation both for patriarchs and bishops in the East occur in Leunclav. Jus Orient. At the same time the feeling of the Church ran strongly against resignations, as being a giving up of work for Christ. So Leo M., Epist. xcii. And Cyril Alex. puts the dilemma: "If worthy, let them continue; if unworthy, let them not resign but be deposed" (Epist. ad Domnum ap. Balsam., quoted by Thomassin). Although St. Chrys. in like case bids a bishop, conscious of serious guilt, resign rather than be deposed (de Sacerd. lib. iii. c. 10). From the 6th century onward, resignations occur not unfrequently in the West (see a list in Thomassin, II. ii. 52), with the consent of the clergy, or at least the metropolitan and council, and of the laity, or at least the king. In the East, the consent of the emperor and of the patriarch of Constantinople became necessary; as in the case of Paulus of Antioch in the time of Justin (inter Epist. Hormisd. Papae, post Epist. lxx.). The conception of a matrimonial tie, such that no authority could sever it unless (in the West) that of the bishop of Rome, developed after at least the 8th century. The canonical grounds for a resignation, as summed up, later lit. ix. de Roman. c. 10), are in substance those already intimated:—i. Guilt, limited however from earlier severity to such only as impedes the discharge of the episcopal office: ii. Sickness (in which case Gregory the Great would have permitted a coadjutor only); iii. Ignorance; iv. Perverse rebelliousness of the people; v. The healing of a schism; vi. Irregularity, such as, e.g. bigamy. A desire to take monastic vows, although a not infrequent case, and in some instances not tolerated, was not a canonical ground of resignation. (B) Resignation in favour of a successor, however, was distinctly prohibited, by Conc. Antioch. A.D. 341, can. xxiii.: Ἐπίσκοπον μὴ ἐξείναι τὸ αὐτὸ καθίστην ἕτερον αὐτοῦ διδδοχον, κεν τὸς τῆ τελευταίῃ τοῦ βίου τυγχάνῃ· εἰ δέ τι ταῦτον γίγνηται, ἄκυρον εἶναι τὴν κατάστασιν.

But it was so, as the rest of the canon shews, only in order to secure canonical and free election when the see became actually vacant,—μετὰ τῆς κόλλησιν τοῦ ἀπαυσαμένου. And the object was, not to prohibit, but to prevent the abuse of aged bishops of their successors; a practice the recommendations very commonly made by aged bishops of their successors; a practice strongly praised by Origen (in Num. Hom. xxii.), in Num. c. xlvii.), but which naturally had often a decisive influence in the actual election: as, e.g. in the case of St. Athanasius recommended by Bishop Alexander, and Peter recommended by St. Athanasius, both of whom were duly elected; &c., but after the bishopric was actually vacant; the story being apparently without grounds, of an intervening and rival episcopate before St. Athanasius, of Aehillas, and of Theonas (Epphan. Haer. lxxviii. 6, 12; Theodoret, iv. 18). So also St. Augustine recommended his own successor, Euraclius. But such recommendations slipped naturally into a practice of consecrating the successor, sometimes elected solely by the bishop himself, before the recommending bishop's death, thus interfering with the canonical rights of the coming provincial bishops and of the diocese itself. Limiting then the prohibition to the actual election by a single bishop of a successor to take his own place during his own lifetime, the Antiochene canon is repeated by, e.g. Conc. Paris. V. A.D. 615, can. ii. ("ut nullus episcoporum se vivente alium in loco suo eligeret"), and became the rule; and though one often broken in the West in the 7th and 8th centuries, as e.g. in the noted case of St. Boniface, who was permitted by Pope Zacharias, although after strong remonstrances, and with great reluctance, to nominate and ordain his own successor. But then we must distinguish (?) that qualified resignation, which extended only to the appointment of a coadjutor—not a coadjutor with right of succession, which was distinctly uncanonical, but simply an assistant during the actual bishop's life, and no further. The earliest instance indeed of a simple coadjutor, that of Alexander, coadjutor to Narcissus of Jerusalem (Euseb. II. E. vi. 11), was supposed to require a precedently thenceforward, both in East and West (e.g. in Sozom. ii. 20; Theodoret, v. 4; St. Ambros. Epist. lxxix.; St. Greg. Naz. Orat. xii. ad Patr. Opp. i. 248. c., quoted by Bingham); including St. Augustin himself, who did not "succeed," but "accede," to the see of Hippo, predecessor therein first of all to his predecessor Valerius, by the consent of "his metropolitan, and the whole clergy and people of Hippo," yet this "contra morem Ecclesiae" (Possid. V. S. Aug. viii.); the canon of the Nicene Council, which prohibits two bishops in one city, being held to prohibit only two independent and distinct bishops, and not where one was (as English people might now call it) curate to the other, although Augustin afterwards thought that canon condemned himself. But a coadjutor with right of succession was distinctly uncanonical; although instances occur of this also: as of Theotecnus of Caesarea in Palestine (Euseb. II. E. vii. 32), before the Antiochene canon, and of Orion, bishop of Palaestina (Synes. Epist. lxxvii.); and of Augustin himself, but with this difference, that he was formally and canonically elected, so that the one point in his case was his being can-separated before his predecessor's death. So also Paulinus of Antioch, whose act was condemned as uncanonical by St. Ambrose (Epist. lxxviii.), and by Theodoret (v. 23) and by Socrates (ii. 15). And a like case in Spain, where a bishop of Barcelona, with consent of the metropolitan and provincial bishops and the whole of his own diocese, sought to make a neighbouring bishop (who was also his heir) his coadjutor and successor, but was condemned for so doing by Pope Hilary and a Roman Council, A. D. 465, protesting against making bishoprics hereditary (Hilar. Epist. ii. iii.). So also Pope Boniface II. A. D. 531, was compelled to desist from his attempt to appoint Vigilus his own successor. And Pope Boniface III. in a Roman Council, A. D. 606, forbade any formal discussion about a successor to a deceased bishop until "tertio die depositionis ejus, adnotato clero et filiis Ecclesiae; tunc electio fiat." Thomassin sums up the case by laying down, (1) that coadjutors or successors were up to the 9th century never asked for from the Pope; (2) that the consent of metropolitan and provincial synod was necessary; and (3) after the 5th century that of the king; but that, lastly, with these last-named sanctions, coadjutors were permitted whenever it was for the good of the Church, although coadjutors with right of succession were forbidden. The hereditary benefices of the Welsh Church of the 11th and 12th centuries, and of the contemporary Breton Church, and, indeed (in some degree or other), of other churches also, are too late to come into this article. So far of the removal of bishops merely from a particular see. But, next, of

3. The Deposition of bishops. And here only of the case of bishops as such, referring to CLERGY, DEGRADATION, for the general "irregularities," which affected all clergy, and therefore inclusively bishops also.

(A.) The grounds upon which bishops as such were deposed were as follows. (a.) First, there were certain irregularities which vitiated an episcopal consecration ab initio; and these were for the most part, although not wholly, irregularities such as disqualified for consecration at all, as those already referred to above. (i.) If prior to ordination to a bishopric the candidate had not been examined in the faith, or had failed to meet such examination, Justinian (Novell. cxxxvii. c. 2) deplored both the ordainer and the recently ordained. (ii.) Although the Conc. Neoces. (can. ix. A. D. 314) speaks of a belief that ordination remitted sins, except fornication, yet Conc. Nicean. (canons ix. x.) rules that those who are ordained through ignorance or laxity, being guilty of sins (without any exception) that would rightly disqualify them, ῥωσθίβητες καθαράντα. (iii.) The canons that require the consent of metropolitan and synod, &c., to the consecration of a bishop, sometimes proceed to void a consecration made in violation of them, μηδὲν ισχύει (Conc. Antioch. A. D. 341, can. xix.), and similarly Conc. Rejiens. can. ii., Conc. Aurelian. v. canons x. xi., Conc. Carthagen. I. can. x. &c. Yet it does not appear that in such a case the consecrated bishop suffered commonly more than the forfeiture of the see, ἔκρουσεν εἶναι τὴν καθόριστον. (iv.) Consecration of a bishop into a see already lawfully filled was reckoned as no consecration (Bingh. XVII. v. 3, quoting St. Cyp. Epist. lv.; Conc. Sardic. acc. to Hilary, de Syn. p. 128; Conc. Chalced.

P. iii. Epist. 51, 54, 56, 57, &c., about Timothy the Cut; Liberat. Brevarii. xv.). (v.) The ordination of one under sentence of deposition was also void (Conc. Chalced. Act. xi.). But then (B) bishops already validly consecrated were liable to deposition, as well for the general causes affecting all clergy, as also in particular for causes relating to their own especial office; as, e. g. (i.) if they ordained, or if they preached (Conc. Trull. can. xx.), without permission, outside their own dioceses (Apostol. Can. xxxv.; Conc. Antioch. A. D. 341, c. xii.); or (ii.) if they received a clergyman who had disobediently quitted his own diocese (Conc. Antioch. A. D. 341, can. iii.; Conc. Chalced. A. D. 457, can. xx. excommunicated them in this case); or (iii.) if they ordained for money (Apostol. Can. xxix.; Conc. Chalced. A. D. 451, can. ii.); or (iv.) according to a late Gallican council (Conc. Arac. A. D. 441, can. xi.), if two bishops presumed to consecrate by themselves, whereupon both of them were to be deposed; or (v.) according to Pope Innocent I. (Epist. xxiii. c. 4, A. D. 402 x 417), bishops who ordained soldiers were themselves to be deposed; or (vi.) if they ordained a bishop into a see already full (Conc. Chalced. A. D. 451, as above); or (vii.) if they ordained any that had been baptized or rebaptized or ordained by heretics (Apost. Can. lxxviii.); or (viii.) if they ordained any of their own unworthy kindred (Apost. Can. lxxvi.); or (ix.) if they absented themselves from their diocese for longer than a year (Conc. Constantin. IV. A. D. 870, can. xvi., says six months), and persisted in disobedience when duly summoned to return (Justinian, Novell. vi. c. 2; see also below under III. 1, a. xv.). (x.) For simony, see SIMONY; or (xi.) if they did not duly enforce discipline [DISCIPLINE]; or (xii.) if they sought to create a bishopric for themselves out of another, either in a place where there had been none (Conc. Tolet. XII. A. D. 681, can. iv.; see however below), or by getting royal authority to divide a province, so as to erect a new metropolis in it (Conc. Chalced. A. D. 451, can. xii.). And yet further (γ), bishops were liable to excommunication as well as deposition, if (i.) they received as clergy such as were suspended for leaving their own diocese (Apost. Can. xvi.; Conc. Carthag. V. A. D. 398, can. xiii. &c. &c.); or (ii.) if they "made use of worldly rulers to obtain preferment" (Apost. Can. xxx., often repeated); or (iii.) if, being rejected by a diocese to which they have been appointed, they move sojourn in another diocese (Conc. Ancyr. A. D. 314, can. xviii.; &c. &c.). (B.) Lastly, bishops were liable to suspension or other less censure, (i.) if they refused to attend the synod when summoned (Conc. Carthag. V. A. D. 398, can. x.; Ardat. II. A. D. 452, can. xix.; Tarracon. A. D. 536, can. vi. &c. &c.); and if when summoned to meet an accusation, they failed to appear even to a third summons, they were deposed (Conc. Chalced. A. D. 451, Act. xiv.); or (ii.) if they unjustly oppressed any part of their diocese, in which case the African Church deprived them of the part so oppressed (St. Aug. Epist. cxlxi.); &c. &c.

(B.) The authority to inflict deposition was the provincial synod; and for the gradual growth and the differing rules of appeal from that tribunal, see APPEAL.

degradation of a bishop to the rank of a priest: he must be degraded altogether or not at all. And Conc. Antioch. canons xi. xii. A.D. 341, forbids recourse to the emperor to reverse a sentence of deposition passed by a synod. [DEGRADATION; ORDERS.]

III. From the appointment and the removal of a bishop, we come next to his office, as bishop. And here, in general, the conception of that office—consisting in, 1. τὸ ἔρχεσθαι, and, 2. τὸ ἐπαρτινεύειν (so St. Ignat. interpol. Ep. ad Smyrn. c. 9)—was plainly, at the first, that of a ruler; not autocratic, but (so to say) constitutional, and acting always in concert with his clergy and people, as he had in the first instance been elected by them; and of a chief minister, in subordination to whom, for the sake of the essential unity of the Church, all Christian sacraments and discipline were to be administered, yet not as mere delegates, but as by the due cooperation of subordinate officers, each having his own place and function: for the former of which points and no less so St. Ignatius for the latter. The legal powers and the wealth gradually acquired by the bishop, the weight derived from his place in synods, and the gradual increase of the power of a single ruler holding office for life, and habitually administering discipline and the property of his diocese, naturally rendered the essential "monarchy" of the episcopate more and more absolute, from Constantine onwards, and especially under Justinian; while, on the other hand, the bishops, pari passu, became also more and more under State control, especially in the East. In the West, and from the break up of the Roman empire, the monopoly in the hands of charismen of knowledge and of civilization, the political powers thrown (and necessarily thrown) into the hands of the bishop, the unity of the Church of all the separate kingdoms, and its relations to the still respected imperial, as well as to the pontifical, influence of Rome,—to which no doubt might be added at the first the reverence for the priesthood as such felt by barbarians, and especially by Germanic peoples, met and strengthened by the Christian view of the priestly office,—gave to the bishops special weight, as the leaders of the Church: a weight exceptionally increased in Spain by the elective position of the Visigoth kings; but qualified there, and much more elsewhere, especially in France, by the right of nomination of bishops assumed by the kings, and by their simoniacal and corrupt use of it, and by the assumption on the part of the State of a full right of making laws for the Church. But to proceed to details. And here—

(1.) OF THE SPIRITUAL OFFICE of a bishop, as pertaining to him essentially and distinctively. And of this, first (a), in respect to his own diocese.

(a.) I. the power of ordination belonged to bishops exclusively. They were the organ by which the Church was enabled to perpetuate the ministry. Starting with the fact, that no one is spoken of in the N. T. as ordained except either by an Apostle, or by one delegated by an Apostle to this special office, the earliest intimation we meet with is the statement of St. Clem. Rom., already quoted, which draws a plain distinction between the original appointment of presbyter-

bishops and deacons, and the subsequent provision made by the Apostles of an order of men who should be able to perpetuate those offices. When next the subject happens to be mentioned, the ordainers are assumed, as of course, to be bishops, and the question is only of their requisite number and acts, or the like; as in Conc. Apost. I., "Ἐπίσκοπος χειροτονέσθω ὑπὸ ἐπικόπων δύο ἢ τριῶν, and can. ii. πρεσβύτερος ὑπὸ ἐνὸς ἐπικόπου χειροτονέσθω; and in Conc. Carthag. III., A.D. 397, can. xlv. "Episcopus unus . . . per quem presbyteri multi constitui possunt;" and IV. A.D. 398, canon ii. iii. &c., which is the classical passage (so to call it) respecting the rites of ordination, and which allows presbyters no part at all in episcopal consecration; and in presbyterial, only to hold their hands "juxta manum episcopi super caput illius" (qui ordinator), and "episcopo eum benedicente et manum super caput ejus tenente." And this latter practice (which however does not exist in the Eastern church [Denzinger]), although supposed to be based upon I Tim. iv. 14) appears to be alluded to by Firmilian (in St. Cyp. Epist. lxxv., "majores natu . . . ordiandi habent potestatem." Similar assumptions occur in Conc. Nic. can. xix., Antioch. A.D. 341, can. ix., Chalced. A.D. 451, can. ii. &c. &c.; and in Conc. Sardis. A.D. 347, can. vi., "Ἐπίσκοποι καθ' ἑαυτοὺς ἐπίσκοποι; and also Pseudo-Dion. Aerop. Eccl. Hier. v. So also not affirming simply but assuming the fact, St. Jerome (Epist. ad Evangel., "Quid facit, excepta ordinatione, episcopus, quod presbyter non faciat?") and St. Chrys. (Hom. xiii. in 1 Tim.), Οὐ γὰρ δὲ πρεσβύτερος τὸν ἐπίσκοπον ἐχειροτονοῦν (and similarly, Hom. i. in Philipp.) and (Hom. xi. in 1 Tim. iii. 8), Τῆ γὰρ χειροτονία μόνον (οἱ ἐπίσκοποι) υπερβέβηκασι, καὶ ταῦτα μόνον δοκῶσι πλεονεκτεῖν τοῖς πρεσβυτέροις; while Eriphranus (Haer. lxxv.), expressly affirming what at length Aetius had denied, lays down that Πατέρας γὰρ γεννᾷ (ἢ τῶν ἐπισκόπων τάξει) τῆ Ἐκκλησίᾳ, ἢ δὲ (τῶν πρεσβυτέρων) πατέρας μὴ δυναμένη γεννᾶν, διὰ τῆς τοῦ λειτουργοῦ παλιγγενεσίας τέκνα γεννᾷ. So again, in actual practice, the cases of Ischyras, denied to be only a "layman" by an Alexandrian synod, A.D. 324 or 325 (Neale, Hist. of East. Ch. Alexandria, vol. i. p. 135), because ordained presbyter ὑπὸ Κολλοῦθου τοῦ πρεσβυτέρου φαντασθέντος ἐπισκόπῳ (St. Athanas. Apol. ii. Opp. i. p. 193, ed. 1698), and of certain presbyters declared to be laymen for the like reason by Conc. Sardis. A.D. 347, can. xix.; while the much later Council of Seville (Conc. Hispal. II. A.D. 619, can. v.) pronounced certain presbyterial and diocesan ordinations void, because, although the bishop had laid his hands upon the candidates, a presbyter, the bishop being blind, "illis contra ecclesiasticum ordinem benedictionem dedisse fertur." The one and only distinct assertion of a contrary practice upon this point, and this too (even had it been trustworthy) of a single and exceptional case, is that of Euty chius, patriarch of Alexandria, A.D. 933-940, born A.D. 876, who affirms in his Origines, that in Alexandria, from the beginning, the twelve city presbyters not only chose the Alexandrian patriarch, upon a vacancy, out of their own number, but also by imposition of hands and benediction created him patriarch; and that this lasted down to the patriarchate of Alexander, who was at the Nicene Council, i. e. down to about A.D. 308 or 313; or, in other words, that the bishop, in whose time an Alexandrian synod deposed one who had received presbyterial ordination, and on that very ground, viz. Ischyrius, was himself ordained by presbyters, and that all his predecessors had been so likewise. Both date, and the internal evidence of this and of many other equally gross blunders (see Pearson, Vindici. Ignit. c. XI. ii. 2, pp. 270, 282 sq., ed. Churton), make Eutycheus' statement unworthy of the notice it once attracted. And it is, besides, an obvious perversion of the fact alleged by St. Jerome, that up to the time (not of the patriarch Alexander, but) of the patriarchs H. acilas and Dionysius, viz. A.D. 232 or A.D. 264, "Alexandrine presbyteri semper unum ex se electum, in excelsiori loco collocaunt, episcopum nominant;" and of the stranger practice still, mentioned by Liberatus (as above in l. 1, γ). That there were bishops enough in Egypt to consecrate legitimately (Eutycheus also affirming that there were no others except the bishop of Alexandria until A.D. 190), is evident by the testimonies collected in Pearson (as above, pp. 296, sq.: there were above a hundred at one of Bishop Alexander's councils). The further assertion of both Ambrosiaster (in Ephes. iv. 11) and of the author of the Quest. in Vet. et Nov. Test. cl., that in Egypt "presbyteri consignant si presens non sit episcopus," and tant "in Alexandria et per totam Aegyptum, si desit episcopus, consecrat presbyter," is ruled to mean either the consecration of the Eucharist or the rite of confirmation, not that of ordination, whether to the episcopate or the presbyterate, 1. by the date of the statements, viz. long after the period fixed even by Eutycheus, and much more that named in St. Jerome; 2. by the meaning of the word consignare; 3. by the case of Ischyrius, above mentioned, which is conclusive. Other instances of alleged presbyterial ordination are either "mere mistakes," (see a list with explanations in Bingham, II. iii. 7), or depend upon the assumption that chorepiscopi were not bishops, or upon a misinterpretation of an obscure canon of the Council of Ancyra, can. xiii. [CHOREPISCOPI.] The early Scotch and Irish Churches, in which the presbyter-abbats of certain monasteries exercised an anomalous jurisdiction, never allowed presbyterial ordination (see Adamnan in Y. S. Columbae, and other authorities, in Grub's Hist. of Ch. of Scotl. c. xi. vol. i. 152-160). That a bishop however was not at liberty to ordain clerks "sine consilio clericorum suorum, in ut civium conventum et testimonium quaerat" (Conc. Carth. IV. can. xxii.), but did so "communio consilio" (St. Cyprian, Epist. xxxviii.), see below in (a) x. Moreover, he was strictly forbidden to ordain in the diocese of another bishop (see below, (a) xii.), or indeed in any way ἀλλοτριουσιαστικῶν.

(a) ii. Confirmation, in accordance with the intimations in the N. T. (Acts viii. 17, xix. 6), appears also, when first mentioned, as the office of the bishop (Constit. Apost. iii. 16; Pseudo-Dionys. Hierarch. Eccl. ii. p. 254; Conc. Carthage. II. A.D. 390, can. iii., "ut chrismata, &c., a presbyteris non fiant"). But (through the difficulty of always securing the bishop's presence) the practice gradually issued in a severance between the two acts, of imposition of hands, which was restricted to the bishop (St. Cyprian, Epist. lxxiii.; Firmilian, ap. St. Cyprian, Epist. lxxv.; Anon. de Bapt. Hier. in Append. ad S. Cyprian. Opp.; Conc. Elberit. A.D. 205, canons xxxviii. lxxvii.; Euseb. H. E. vi. 43; St. Chrysostom, Hom. xviii. in Act. Apost. § 3; St. Jerome, cont. A.D. 400, can. xx.; Bracar. II. A.D. 563, can. xix., and III. A.D. 572, can. iv.; Autissiod. A. 578, can. vi.; Barricem. can. iv.; Autissiod. A. 578, can. vi.; Pope Innocent I. Epist. i. A.D. 398, can. xxxvi.; Vascon. I. A.D. 442, can. iii. &c. &c.); but the actual application of it, with some qualifications and in certain cases, allowed to presbyters: as e. g. in the Church of Rome, there being a double anointing, that of the forehead was restricted to the bishop, the rest not so; in Gaul, a single anointing was ordinarily the presbyter's office; in the East, a single anointing also, but ordinarily the bishop's office, and only in his absence, as at Alexandria and in Egypt, allowed to presbyters; but in West and East alike, allowed to presbyters in cases of urgency, as of emergens, or of those at the point of death, or again by commission from their bishop (see Bingham, XII. ii. 1-6). The Constit. Apostol. vii. 43, 44, describe the practice of the 3rd or 4th century. [CONFIRMATION.]

(a) iii. In the administration of sacraments, the bishop's authority was primary, that of presbyters, and a fortiori of deacons, subordinate. St. Ignatius, ad Smyrn. viii.: Ὁὐκ ἔδωκεν ἑστὶν ἑπιτοπῶν τοῦ ἐπισκόπου ὅτι βαπτίζουσιν ὅτι ἀγάσαν ποιεῖν. Tertull. de Bapt. 17: "Dandi (baptismum) jus quidem habet summus sacerdos, qui est episcopus: dehinc presbyter et diaconi; non tamen sine episcopi auctoritate, propter Ecclesiae honorem; quo salva, salva pat. est." Hieron. cont. Lucif. IV.: "Inde venit ut sine jussione episcopi neque presbyter neque diaconus jus habere baptizandi." St. Ambrose, de Sacram. iii. 1: "Licet presbyteri fecerint, tamen exordium ministerii a summo est accipere." Similar statements are numerous (Bingham, Lay Bapt. i. § 2, sq.). So e. g. Conc. Elberit. A.D. 205, can. lxxvii.—"If any are baptized by a deacon, episcopus eos per benedictionem perficere debet." So also Conc. Vern. I. A.D. 755, can. viii., forbids presbyters baptizing, or celebrating mass, "sine jussione episcopi." Although no doubt the statement of Ambrosiaster in Ephes. iv. is true also,—as it is indeed perfectly consistent with the principle above laid down, and both would be and is in like case the Church's rule now,—that, before the Church was settled, laymen were allowed "evangelizare et baptizare et Scripturas in ecclesia explanare." See also Van Espen, Jur. Eccl. Univ., De Bapt. c. iii. § 1; and Bingham on Lay Baptism.

(a) iv. The office of formal preaching, as distinct from exposition of Scripture, belonged also properly to bishops. So e. g. in the African formal preaching, as discripture, belonged also to e. g. in the African Church, if the bishop were present, until the time of St. Augustin; who was the first African presbyter that preached "coram episcopo," but this, "accepta ab episcopis potestate" (Possid.

 V. S. Ant. v.). So also in Spain, Conc. Hispan. II.
 A. D. 619, can. vii. In the East the practice was otherwise, since there it was only "in quibusdam Ecclesiis, tacere presbyteros et presentibus episcopo non loqui" (Hieron. Ad Nepot. Epist. li.).
 Yet there also the privilege depended on the consent of the bishop, and was taken away in Alexandria by an absolute prohibition: Πρεσβύ-τερος ἐν Ἀλεξανδρείᾳ οὐ προσομιλεῖ (Socrat. v.
 22; Sozom. v. 17, vii. 19), from the time of Arius. In Rome, on the other hand, it is asserted that no bishop (ὄντε δ' ἐπίσκοπος ὄντε ἄλλος τις,
 sec. to Sozom. vii. 19, repeated by Cassiodorus, Hist. Tripart.) preached at all until Leo the Great (Thomassin, II. iii. 83, § 5). To preach, however, every Sunday, was reckoned ordinarily the duty,
 as well as the privilege, of the bishop; on the ground that he is to be διδασκτικὸς = apt to teach (see ὁρθὸς διδασκαλικὸς = the bishop's throne, in St. Chrys. Hom. ii. in Tit., and ἀξίωμα διδασκα-λικὸν = the bishop's office, in St. Cyril Alex.
Epist. ad Monach. in Conc. Ephes. Labbe, iii. 423;
 —and Sozom. vii. 19, Μάρτυς δ' τῆς πόλεως ἐπίσκοπος διδάσκει, —and St. Ambros. de Offic. i. 1,
 "Episcopi proprium munus docere populum").
 And see also Origen, Hom. vi. in Levit. Conc. Laudic. c. A. D. 366, can. xix., and Conc. Valent. A. D. 855, can. 1, take the practice for granted. King Gun-tram, A. D. 585 (Edict. confirm. Conc. Mit. c. II.), exhorts bishops to frequent preaching; Charlemagne enjoins their leaving suitable homilies (Cayn. I. A. D. 813, c. xiv., and Conc. Arelat. can. x., Moyn. can. xxxv., and Rhem. canons xiv. xv., all of the same year), and deprives bishops of their sees who should not have preached before a fixed day (Monach. S. Gall. i. 20); Ludov. Pius enjoins bishops to preach either in person or by their vicars (Cayn. i. 109); and Conc. Trivan.
 A. D. 850, can. v., threatens deposition to all bishops who did not preach at least on Sundays and holidays. Ethelred also in England enjoins bishops to preach (Laws. vii. 19; repeated by
Tolat. XI. A. D. 675, can. ii. Bishops are also enjoined by Conc. Turon. III. A. D. 613, can. xvii., to have homilies about the Catholic faith and a holy life, and to cause them to be translated
 "in rusticam Romanam linguam aut Theoliscam, quo facilis enecti possint intelligere," &c. In the East, the Council in Trullo (A. D. 691, canons rx. xx.), while deposing bishops who preached outside their own dioceses without permission, enjoins all bishops to preach at least every Sunday, and if possible every day. And Balsamon, on can. lxxv. of the same council, lays down the principle, that "to teach and expound belongs by divine grace to bishops only, and so to those to whom bishops delegate the office." It is assumed to be the bishop's duty, also, in Cod. Theodos.
 lib. xvi. tit. ii., de Episc. l. 25; and also lib. ix.
 tit. xi. de Poenis l. 16; and in Cod. Justin. lib.
 i. tit. xix. de Crim. Sacrilegii, l. 1.

(a) v. As in the points hitherto mentioned, so also in the administration of discipline, the bishop took the lead; the presbyters (and apparently in some cases the deacons) held their proper subordinate place under him, and formed his council. Bishop and presbytery occur together passim in St. Ignatius. The condemnations of Origen (Amphil. Apol. ad 1. hoc. Cod. cxviii.), of Novatian (Euseb. II. E. vi. 43), of Paul of Samosata (id. vii. 28, 30), of Noëtus

 (Euphian. Itier. lvii. 1), of Arius at Alexandria (id. lxx. 3; and see Coteler. ad Constit. Apost.
 viii. 28), proceeded from the bishop, or bishops,
 but with presbyters, the πρεσβύτερον alone indeed being mentioned in the case of Noëtus, and deacons as well as presbyters in that of Arius.
 So also Pope Siricius in the case of Jovinian,
 "facto presbyterio" (Siric. Epist. ii., the deacons also it appears concurring); and Synesius, bishop of Ptolemais, in that of Andronicus, a layman (Synes. Epist. lvii. lviii.). At the same time, the bishop was the chief, and ordinarily the sole judge in the first instance in cases of excommunication ("nucro episcopalis"), following the authority of 1 Tim. v. 1, 19 (but see also 1 Cor.

 synod [APPEAL]: although his power came to be limited in Africa by a Carthag. Council (II. A. D.
 390, can. x.), by the requirement of twelve bishops to judge a bishop (which came to be the traditional canonical number), of six to judge a presbyter, and of three, in addition to the ac-cused's own diocesan, to try a deacon. The power of formal absolution from formal sentence is throughout assumed by the canons to be in such sense in the bishop, that presbyters could only exercise it (apart from him) in cases of imminent danger of death, unless by leave of the b' p: (Dion. Alex. in Euseb. II. E. vi. 44; Conc. Carth.
 II. canons ii. iv., and III. can. xxxii.; Conc. Arausic.
 I. A. D. 441, can. i.; Conc. Eyaou. A. D. 517, can.
 xvi. &c. &c.). St. Cypr. (Epist. xiii.) allows a deacon to absolve, only if neither bishop nor presbyter can be had, and in a case of extreme urgency. But he also speaks of "episcopos et clerus" as both uniting in the solemn act of absolution by imposition of hands. And the rule is laid down fully in Conc. Eliberit. A. D. 305, can. xxxii.: "Apud presbyterum . . . placuit agere poenitentiam non debere sed potius nrius episcoporum: cogente tamen infirmitate, necesse est presbyterum communionem preestare d. bere. et diaconum si ei jusserit episcopus." See also Mar-

This authority extended over the whole diocese and all its members. Exemptions, as of monasteries, from episcopal jurisdiction, are directly in the teeth of the Council of Chalced. canons vii. viii., of Justinian's law (Cod. I. tit. iii. de Episc. l. 40),
 of the provincial councils of Orleans, I. A. D. 511, can. xix.; Conc. Agath. A. D. 506, can. xxxviii.; Conc. Ilerdens. A. D. 546, can. iiii.; &c. The well-known case of Faustus of Lerins ar his bishop at the Council of Arles in A. D. 455, was an adjustment of rights as between abbat and bishop, but not an exemption in the proper sense of the word (as Hallam superficially states). The earliest rent came to belong to the 8th century, when Zachary, A.D. 750, granted a privilege to Monte Casino, "ut nullius iuri subiacent nisi solius Romani pontificis" (Mabil. Act. S. Ord. Bened., Sac. iii. p. 643). Precedents for such exemptions, as granted by royal authority, occur in the Formulae of Marculfus. [EXEMPTION; MONKS.]

(a) vi. As in the special subject of discipline, so generally in the affairs of the diocese, the bishop had the primary administration of them, with the power of veto, but (as throughout) with the counsel and consent of his presbyters, and of the diocese at large. So e. g. St. Cyprian, repenting the statement over and over again in equivalent terms,—"Nihil sine consilio vestro (presbyterorum) et sine consensu plebis mea privata sententia gerere." The same rule, as regards the presbyters, and in their place the deacons, is prominent in the language of St. Ignatius in the earliest time. And the "concessus presbyterorum" is likened by St. Jerome to the bishop's "senate," and by Origen and others to the βουλή Ἐκκλησίας, and by St. Chrysostom and Synesius to the Sahebdrim (συνέδριον). That presbyters also shared in diocesan synods, "adstantibus dincousi," see COUNCIL, SYNOD. On the other hand, μηδὲν ἄνευ γνώμης τοῦ ἐπισκόπου ("conc. Laodic. can. lvii.) is repeated so endlessly by Laodiceans, and asserted by church writers, as to make it needless to multiply quotations. Imperial legislation, in conferring special powers upon bishops, tended largely to increase episcopal authority. Yet provincial synods of presbyters (and of abbots) still continued, throughout, down to Carolingian times. [COUNCIL; SYNOD.] And Guizot (H. de la Civ. en France, Leçon 15) joins priests with bishops as the really governing body of the Church in the earlier Frankish period. In the particular matters of creeds, liturgies, and church worship generally, the bishop is also inferred to have had authority to regulate and determine all questions, partly as being a natural portion of his office, partly from the fact, that in essentials, even the creeds, much more liturgical points, varied in various dioceses, within undefined but obvious limits. And so Basil of Caesarea, we learn, composed certain εὐχῶν διατάξεις καὶ ἐνομοίας τοῦ βήματος for his own Church while still a presbyter, of which Eusebius his bishop sanctioned the use. St. Augustin (Epist. 86, ad Casulan.) assumes a like power in the bishop to appoint fasting days for his own diocese. And the like is implied in the tradition, that St. Ignatius introduced antiphons and doxologies into his own church (Cassiod. Hist. Tripartit. x. 9). So Proclus of Constantinople, A.D. 434-447, is said to have introduced the Trisagion into that Church. It was the bishop's office also to consecrate churches and cemeteries [CHURCH, CEMETERY; mentioned as early as Euseb. H. E. x. 3, Ἐγκαινῶν ἑορτὰν . . . καὶ τῶν ἁγίων νεοταγῶν προσευκτηρίων ἀφιεράσεις, ἐπισκόπων τε ἐπὶ ταῦθ' ἐνελεύσας.

(a) vii. Visitation of his diocese was, at first, rather a duty following as a matter of course from a bishop's office, than a legal and canonical obligation: see St. Athanas. Apol. ii. § 74; St. Chrys. Hom. l. in Epist. ad Titum (ἐπισκέψεις); Sulp. Sever. Dial. ii. (of St. Martin); St. Aug. Epist. vi. Opp. ii. 144; Greg. Tur. II. E. v. 5, and De Glor.

Confess. lix. cvl.; St. Greg. M. Dial. iii. 38, &c.; and see also under CHOREPISCOPI, and ΠΕΡΙΟΔΟΥΤΗΣ or VISITATOR. Accordingly, no enuons at first defined or enforced the duty. But in course of time, so soon as enuons came to be made upon the subject, the bishop became bound to visit his diocese once a year, both to confirm and to administer discipline, and generally to oversee the diocese: St. Bonif. Epist. lix. ed. Jaffé; Conc. Tarraco., A.D. 516, can. viii.; Conc. Braac. III. A.D. 572, can. i.; Conc. Tolet. IV. A.D. 633, can. xxxvi.; Conc. Tolet. VII. A.D. 643, can. iv.; Conc. Liptin. A.D. 743 (i. e. St. Bonif. see, as above); Conc. Suess. A.D. 744, can. iv.; Conc. Arelat. A.D. 813, can. xvii.; Capit. Car. M. lib. vii. cc. 94, 95, 109, 305, A.D. 769, 813, &c.

(a) viii. Further (1), it was the bishop's office to issue letters of credence to any members of his diocese, which alone enabled them to communicate in other churches; see Litterae formatae, or canonicae, &c. So, Can. Apost. xxxii., no stranger bishop or clergy were to be received ἄνευ συστατικῶν; Conc. Laodic. A.D. 368, can. xii., Ὁ δὲ ἱερατικὸν ἢ κληρικὸν ἄνευ κωνοικῶν γραμμάτων ὀδένειν; Conc. Antioch. A.D. 341, can. vii., Μηδένα ἄνευ εἰρηλικῶν δέχεσθαι τῶν ξένων; Conc. Carthay. I. A.D. 348, can. vii., "Clericus vel laicus non communicet in aliena plebe sine litteris episcopi sui." So also Conc. Midevit. A.D. 402, can. xx. ("formatam ab episcopo accipit"); Conc. Agath. A.D. 506, can. liii., and repeated Conc. Epaon. A.D. 517, can. vi. ("sine antistitis sui epistolis"); but, in each case, of the clergy, who should travel from home. And the Councils of Arles (A.D. 314, can. ix.) and of Eliberis (A.D. 305, can. xxv.) forbid "confessors" to give such letters, and order those who have them to procure fresh "communicatorie" from the bishop. The Council of Antioch, A.D. 341, can. viii., permits choriepiscopi διδόναι εἰρηλικὰς, but forbids presbyters doing so; and the Council of Eliberis (A.D. 305, can. lxxxi.) prohibits the worse abuse of the wivas (apparently of bishops) giving and receiving such "pacificae." These letters, according to their purpose, were called "commendatitiae" (of credence, or recommendation), "pacificae" (also "ecclesiastice" or "cannonice," of communion), or "dimissorie" (ἀπολυτικά, συστατικά, or again εἰρηλικαί, or "concessorie"); see e. g. Conc. Trull. can. xvii. (not necessary or granted, like modern letters dimissory, to any one who desired to be ordained in another diocese than his own—vivo, however, had of course to obtain leave to do so—but only when a clergyman desired to change his diocese); and they are to be distinguished from the unauthoritative "libelli" given by martyrs or confessors during a persecution to those who had lapsed. Conc. Chalced. A.D. 451, can. xi., orders systraticas to be given only to such as were "suspectae" but to those who were poor and in want, or εἰρηλικαί, and not systraticas—pacificas, and not commendatitias. (2.) The bishop also represented his diocese collectively, besides answering for its individual members; as in communicating with other dioceses. So, e. g. St. Clement of Rome writes to the Corinthian Church, as speaking for the Church of Rome, of which he was bishop; and is spoken of by Hermas Pastor (Via. ii. 4) as officially communicating with Christians of other dioceses. It is needless to give evidence from later times.

The income and offerings of the Church, and its alms, were likewise, in the first instance, under the disposition of the bishop, to be dispensed either by himself or by his proper officers (see ALIENATION OF CHURCH PROPERTY, ALMS, ARCHDEACON, DEACON, OECONOMUS); and this upon the ground of Acts iv. 35, 37, v. 2, 1 Cor. xvi. 3, 4; but with the general consent of his presbyters, as Acts xi. 30. Τὰ τῆς Ἐκκλησίας . . . διοικῆσαι προσήκει μετὰ κλήσεως καὶ ζήλου τοῦ ἐπισκόπου (Conc. Carth. IV. A.D. 398, can. xxxii., "Irrita erit donatio episcoporum vel venditio vel commutatio rei ecclesiasticae, absque conviventia et subscriptione clericorum." Compare also the established exceptional cases wherein church plate, &c., might be sold, viz. for redeeming captives, &c., might be sold (as St. Cyril of Jerusalem, in Theodorët. ii. 27, and Sozom. iv. 25); in which, as in other cases of real necessity, the bishop allowably disposed of the property, but with the consent of the primate "cum statuto numero episcoporum" (Conc. Carth. V. A.D. 398, can. iv.), or "quod duos vel tres comprovinciales vel vicinos episcopos" (Conc. Agath. A.D. 506, can. vii.); which last canon, however, permits the bishop by himself to dispose of "terrulae aut vineolae exiguae aut ecclesiae minus utiles," &c. (can. xlv.); and Conc. Epion. A.D. 517, can. xii., requires the "consentia metropolitani" to a like sale, Councils of Orleans, III. and IV. A.D. 538, 541, repeat like rules. And in Spain, Conc. Hispal. II. A.D. 619, canons ix. and xlix., and Tolet. IV. A.D. 633, can. xviii., and the Capit. of Martin of Braga; in Italy, the letters of Gregory the Great, and Com. Rom. VI. under Symmachus, A.D. 504; and in the East, Justinian (Novell. 123, c. 23, 131, c. 11), shew a like system. This general rule, however, held good only so long as the church goods of such diocese formed a common fund. After the appropriation of special incomes to special officers and to particular parishes, the bishop of course ceased to have control over more than his own there, except over alms and general contributions, and in like cases (see TRINES): unless so far as he still retained the power of appointing clergy and ordaining them to particular benefices. The era of such limitation may be taken to be the Conc. Troasian. (Trois, near Soissons), A.D. 909, can. vi.; the old rule lingering still during the time of Charlemagne (see Thomassin, III. l. 8). About 600, a year is Gibbon's estimate of an average episcopal revenue in the time of Justinian; the valuation fluctuating at the time from 2 pounds of gold to 30 (Justin. Novell. 123, c. 3).

(a.) x. The bishop also appears, in the first instance, to have so taken charge of his whole diocese, as that, the diocesan city being served by clergy of his own ordaining, the country districts were served from the city by clergy at his appointment, although with counsel and consent of both presbyters and laity. The diocese was in fact one parish, there being no such thing as a parish in the modern sense. And this original condition of things gradually settled into rule, as follows:—1. That no clergyman could migrate to, or be ordained to a higher order in, another diocese than that in which he had been born and ordained, or (if this involved two dioceses) in which he had been ordained, without the express leave of the bishop who had ordained him; the presbyters being bound to the bishop who had ordained them, as he in turn was bound to certify them if in need. See CLERGY, LITURGICAL DIMISSORIAE, PRESBYTER. An exception however came to exist in favour of the bishop of Carthage, in relation to Africa, "ut soli ecclesiae Carthaginensis licent alienum clericum ordinare" (Ferrand. Breviar. c. 230). 2. That no clergyman, when benefices came to exist, could resign his benefice, or remove to another, within the particular diocese, without his bishop's consent. Conc. Carth. IV. A.D. 398, can. xvii., probably refers to different dioceses,—"Inferioris gradus sacerdotis vel alii clerici concessione suorum episcoporum possunt ad alias ecclesias transmigrare." But in later times, Conc. Remens. A.D. 813, can. xx., Conc. Turon. A.D. 813, can. xiv., and Conc. Nismet. can. xvi., are express, "De titulo minori ad majorem migrare nulli presbytero licitum est"; and are confirmed by Charlemagne, Capit. liii. vi. c. 197.—"Nullus presbyter exaltatus sibi ecclesiam sine consensu sui episcopi derelinquat et licetum suasionem ad aliam transeat;" and see also ib. vi. c. 85, lib. vii. c. 73. But, at the same time, the bishop could not remove or eject a clergyman against his will or at his own pleasure, the rule composing to be that three bishops were required to judge a deacon, and six a presbyter, including their own diocesan, and with an appeal to the provincial synod; see APPEAL, DEACON, PRESBYTER, SYNOD. 3. That the bishop as a rule collated to all benefices within his diocese, concurring, by ordination to a particular "title," the spiritual jurisdiction, which drew with it the temporal endowments (see Bingh. IX. viii. 5, 6; Thomassin, II. l. 33–35). But, 4. that the right of nominating to a church in another's diocese was granted, as time went on, to a bishop who had founded that church (and apparently to his successors, on the assumption that he founded it out of church property), in the West (Conc. Arlesic. I. A.D. 441, can. x.); and in the East from Justinian, and ultimately in the West likewise (e.g. Conc. Tolet. IX. A.D. 655, can. ii.; Conc. Francof. A.D. 794, can. liv.), to laymen also in like position;

and in both East and West, by the time of Justinian and of Charlemagne respectively, to kings, nobles, and other laymen, without any such ground: although the right of the bishop to determine whether the presentee was fit, and if unfit, to reject him, remained still, even in the case of noblemen's chaplains. Further, 1. in the East, a limit also was put to the "requests" (δυσωπήσεις) of the nobles, and to the "command" (κέλευσις) of the emperor, in making such presentations (Novell. 3. in Praef. and c. 2.); and, 2. in the West, the Council of Arles, VI. A. D. 813, can. iv., commands, "ut laici presbyteros absque iudicio proprii episcopi non eji- ciant de ecclesiis nec alios inmittere praesumant"; and the Council of Tours, III. A. D. 813, can. xv., "interdicendum videtur clericis sive laicis ne quis cullebit presbytero praesumat dare ecclesiam sine licentia et consensu episcopi sui"; while, on the other hand, both Charlemagne and Louis the Pious guard the lay side of the question by enacting, "Si laici clericos probalibus vitae et doctrine episcopis consecrandos suisque in ecclesiis constituendas obtulerint, nulla qualibet occasione eos rejiciant"; or if they do reject them, then, "diligens examinatio et evidens ratio, ne scandalum generetur, manifestum faciat" (Capit. lib. v. c. 178, and Lud. Pii Capit. in Conc. Gall. ii. 430.); an enactment repeated by Conc. Paris. A. D. 829, can. xxii. See also Conc. Rom. A. D. 826 and 853, can. xxi. The right of presentation to such a benefice by lapse, as developing upon the bishop, is not traced by Thomassin (li. i. 31, § 5) higher than the time of Hincmar. The consent of the Church, necessary in the time of St. Cyprian to the ordination of a presbyter, does not appear to have been required in that of a deacon—"diaconi ab episcopis fiunt" (St. Cyp. Epist. lxx.)—and a fortiori not in the case of minor orders.

(a.) xi. The bishop became also a judge or arbitrator in secular causes between Christians, on the ground of 1 Cor. vi. 4; necessarily, however, by consent only of both parties, and by an authority voluntarily conceded to him; an office which continued so late as the time of St. Augustin; sitting on Mondays for the purpose: for which, and for other details, see Apost. Constit. ii. 45-53. See also under APPEAL. As an office conferred by the State, and endowed with legal power, see also below under (2).

(a.) xii. All these powers belonged to a bishop solely in relation to his own diocese. Beyond that diocese—not to discuss here, 1. the authority of synods, or, 2. the gradual growth of the offices of archbishop, primate, metropolitan, exarch, patriarch (for which see the several articles)—each bishop had no right to interfere, except under circumstances (such as the prevalence of schism or heresy, or of persecution, or the like) which would obviously constitute a necessity superseding law. So, e. g. St. Athanasius καὶ χριστονομίας ἐποίησε in cities out of his diocese, as he returned from exile (Socrat. ii. 24.) And similarly Eusebius of Samosata, in the Arian persecution under Valens (Theodoret, iv. 13, v. 4.) And Epiphanius likewise in Palestine; defending his act on the ground that, although each bishop had his own diocese, "et nemo super alienam mensuram extenditur, tamen praepunitur omnibus caritas Christi" (Epist. ad Joann. Hieros. Opp. ii. 312.) Compare also the letters of Clement of Rome to the Corinthians, and of Dionysius of Corinth (καθολικαὶ ἐπιστολαὶ) to the Lae- daemonians, and to the Athenians, and many others (Euseb. H. E. lv. 23.) and St. Cyprian's interference in Spain in the cases of Martial and Basilides, and in Gaul in that of Marcinus. And see Du Pin, de Antiq. Eccl. Discipl. pp. 141, sq. Still, the rule was—

(a.) xiii. A single bishop to each diocese, and a single diocese to each bishop. "Unus in Ecclesia ad tempus sacerdos," is St. Cyprian's dictum (Epist. lli. al. lv.). And St. Jerome, "Singuli Ecclesiarum episcopi, singuli archipresbyteri, &c., in navi unus gubernator, and repeatedly." And similarly St. Hilary, Diac. (in Phil. i. 1, in 1 Cor. xii. 28, &c.) And Socrat. vi. 22; Sozom. lv. 15; Theodoret, ii. 17 (ἐἰς Θέος, ἐἰς Χριστὸς, ἐἰς ἐπίσκοπος), and iii. 4; and, above all, Conc. Nicæn. A. D. 325, can. viii. &c. &c. &c. And to the same effect the numerous canons forbidding the intrusion of any one into a diocese as bishop during the lifetime of the bishop of that diocese, unless the latter had either freely resigned or been lawfully deposed. The seeming exceptions to this, indeed, prove the rule. Merely as a temporary expedient, in order to heal a schism, the Catholic bishops in Africa offered to share their sees with the Donatist bishops (Collat. Carthag. l. die c. v. in Labbe, ii. 1352.); as Meletius long before had proposed to Paulinus at Antioch to put the Gospels on the episcopal throne while they two should sit on either side as joint bishops (Theodoret, v. 3.); the proposal dropping to the ground in both cases. See also what is said above of condutors; and the conjecture, not however solidly grounded, of Hammond and others, respecting two joint bishops, respectively for Jews and Gentiles, in some cities in Apostolic times (see Bingh. II. xiii. 3.) It must be added, however, that Epiphanius (Haer. lxxvii. 6.) does say that Alexandria never had two bishops, ὡς αἱ ἄλλαι πόλεις. On the other side, two sees to one bishop was equally against all rule. The text, "Unius uxoris virum," says the De Dign. Sacerd. c. iv. inter Opp. S. Ambros., "si ad altiorum sensum concessimus, inhibet episcopum duas usurpare Ecclesias." And later writers, e. g. Hincmar, work the same thought with still greater vehemence, and loudly inveigh against spiritual adultery. And apart from this exalted view, the canon of Chalcedon, which forbids a clergyman being inscribed upon the roll of two dioceses, was (very reasonably) held to include bishops. The exceptional cases (indefinitely Interventores, and of the temporary "commutation" of a diocese to a neighbouring bishop [INTERVENTORES, COMMENDA]) occur, the former in the early African Church, the latter as early as St. Ambrose himself (Epist. xlii.). And a case occurs in St. Basil the Great's letters (290 and 292), where a provincial synod, under urgent necessity, and not without vehement opposition, by a dispensation (τὸ τῆς οἰκονομίας ἀναγκάτων), allowed a bishop, promoted to the metropolitan see of Armenia, to retain his previous see of Colonia. And Gregory the Great in several cases joined together in Italy ruined or impoverished or depopulated sees. St. Mehard also, in 532, united the sees of Noyon and Tournay, upon the urgency of his metropolitan and provincial bishops, and of the king, nobles, and people (Surius, in

Y. S. Med. Jun. 8). But pluralities, in the sense of two or more previously independent bishoprics held together for merely personal reasons, do not seem to have crept in until early Carolingian times; when, e. g., Hugh, son of Drogo, became archbishop of Rouen, A. D. 722, and added thereto the abbey of Jumièges and Fontanelles (Chron. Gemnetic.), for no other apparent reason than that he was nephew of Pippin the Elder. In England, Worcester and London together, in order no doubt to further his monastic schemes, A. D. 957-960. And this is followed by the well-known series of archbishops of York who were also bishops of Worcester, from 972 to 1023; and this, again, by the union of the same unfortunate see of Worcester to that of Crediton in the episcopate of Living, 1027-1046. The union of other preferment, as of deaneries or abbey, to bishoprics, began much about the like period, when circumstances tempted to it. And for two abbey held together, see ANAT. The apparent exception of the province of Europa in Thrace in earlier times, in which two bishops were allowed upon their own petition by the Council of Ephesus (A. D. 431, Act. vii. sub finem) to hold each two, and in one case more, bishoprics together, on the ground that those bishoprics had always been held together, brings us rather to the previous enquiry respecting the size of dioceses, and whether necessarily limited to one city and its dependent country, and if so, of what size the city must be.

(c.) xiv. And here, there being no principle involved beyond that of suitability in each case to the particular locality, and the original diocese in each case being the great city of the neighbourhood with so much of its dependent country and towns as was converted to the faith, questions necessarily arose, as the district became completely Christianized, and were determined in different ways in different places, as to the subdivision of the original vaguely limited diocese. In some countries that subdivision was carried so far as to call forth prohibitions against placing bishops ἐν κἀμῃ τινὶ ἢ ἐν βραχέει πόλει (Conc. Sardic. A. D. 347, can. vi.); or again, ἐν ταῖς κώμας καὶ ἐν ταῖς χώραις (Conc. Laodic. about A. D. 366, can. lvii.), which latter canon perhaps only prohibits chorepiscopi. Leo the Great also vehemently condemns the erecting sees "in castellis," &c., in Africa (Ejst. lxxxvii. c. 2). And it was made an objection to the Donatists that (to multiply their numbers) they consecrated bishops "in villis et in fundis, non in aliquibus civitatibus" (Collat. Carth. c. 181; Labbe, ii. 1399). The prohibition is repeated in later times, as by Pope Gregory III. A. D. 738, and Pope Zacharias, A. D. 743. The practice however had continued nevertheless; as is obvious by St. Greg. Naz., St. Chrysostom, Synesius, and others, quoted in Bligh. II. xii. 2, 3; and by Sozomen (vii. 19), stating, but as an exceptional case, that ἐστὶν ὄρη καὶ ἐν κώμας ἐπίσκοποι ἱερουργοῦναι. ὡς παρὰ Ἀραβίους καὶ Κυρπύσις ἔχουσι. On the other hand, the conversion of the German and other European nations, as it were, wholesale, upon the conversion of their kings, led in a large part of northern Europe to sees of nations rather than cities, and to sees therefore of often unwieldy extent. E. g., in Scythia, τοιαῦτα πόλεις ὄντες ἔκδοται ἐνὰ πάντες ἐπίσκοπων ἔχουσι (Sozom. vii. 19; and see also vi.

21); viz. the Bishop of Tomi. In the older countries it might obviously happen, very naturally, that (as in the province of Europa) two or more towns or "civitates" of small but nearly equal size might come to be united in one diocese, of which yet neither of them could claim to be pre-eminently the city. Just as, on the other hand, Sozomen tells us, that Anastas and Majuma, being two "civitates" (although very small ones) and also two bishoprics, were united by the emperors into one "civitas," yet remained two bishoprics still (v. 4). The actual number of bishops in the time of Constantine is reckoned by Gibbon as 1800, of whom 1000 were Eastern, 800 Western. The authority for subdivision was "voluntas episcopi ad quem ipsa diocesis pertinet, ex consilio tamen plenarie et primitivis auctoritate" (Ferrand. Breviar. xiii. in Justell. Bibl. Jur. Can. i. 448). See also Conc. Carthag. II. A. D. 397, can. v., and III. A. D. 397, can. xlii. (Labbe, ii. 1160, 1173), and St. Aug. Ejst. cclxi., respecting his erecting the see of Fussula with the consent of the primate of Numidia. The consent of the bishop of Rome was not asked or thought of, until in the West in the time of St. Boniface, and even then it was chiefly in respect to newly converted countries. Compare the well-known history of Wilfrid in England in the end of the 7th century, the action of Pope Formosus a century later in respect to the same country, and the history of Nominot and the Breton sees in 845. The Pope's consent became needful about the time of Gregory V. The consent of the king became also necessary from the commencement of the Frank kingdom, and in Saxon England. While in the East the absolute power of erecting new sees accrued to the emperors solely, without respect to diocesan bishop, metropolitan, council, or any one else (Thomasin. De Mtra. &c.). An exceptional African canon (Cod. Can. Afric. cxlv.), in order to reconcile Donatists, allowed any one reclaiming a place, not a bishop's see, to retain it for himself as a new and separate bishopric upon a prescription of three years. And so again in Spain, according to Conc. Tolet. A. D. 633, can. xxxiv., and Conc. Emerit. A. D. 666, can. viii., thirty years' undisturbed possession by one bishop, of what had previously been a part of another's bishopric, constituted a prescriptive right on behalf of the possessor. The Conc. Chelvi. A. D. 451, can. xi., had fixed the same period. The union of sees was subject to the same rules with the subdivision of them. There were in England no instances of such union within our period, except in the cases of the temporary sees of Hexham and of Whitherne, and of the possible brief-lived see of Ripon; the union of Cornwall and Devonshire being of considerably later date. The transference of the episcopal see from one place to another within the same bishopric, as distinct from any change in the limits or independency of the bishopric itself, seems to have followed a like rule with the larger measures of union or division. The bishop, with sanction of his comprovincials, and with the acquiescence of the State, was sufficient authority at first in European kingdoms or in the East; as, e. g., in the shifting of the see of East Anglia, or of that of Wessex, &c. The consent of the Pope came to be asked afterwards; as in the time of Edward the Confessor, in the case of the removal of Crediton to Exeter, or in that of the great movement of sees from smaller

to larger towns in the time of William the Conqueror in England generally; which however were both of them done, and the latter of the two expressly, "by leave of the king."

(c.) xv. Finally, bishops were required to reside upon their dioceses. The Council of Nice (can. xvi.), enjoining residence on the other orders of clergy, plainly takes that of bishops for granted, and as needing no canon. The Council of Sardien, A.D. 347, can. xv., in the case of bishops who have private property elsewhere, permits only three weeks' absence in order to look after that property, and even then the bishop so absent had better reside, not on his estate itself, but in some neighbouring town where there is a church and presbyter. And Conc. Trull. A.D. 691, can. lxxx., deposes a bishop (or other clerk) who without strong cause is absent from his church three Sundays running. A year's absence from his diocese forfeited the see altogether, acc. to Justinian's law (at first it had forfeited only the pay, Novell. lxxv. c. 2), or six months acc. to Conc. Constant. A.D. 870 (see above). Presence at a synod (which was compulsory) was of course a valid reason for absence. Bishops however were not to cross the sea, acc. to an African rule (Cod. Can. Afric. xxiii.); and so also in Italy, Greg. M. Epist. vii. 8), without the permission and the letter (ἀπολυτική, τελευτωμένη, formati) of the primate; nor to go to the emperor without bishops of both primate and provincial bishops (Conc. Antioch. A.D. 341, can. xi.). Nor were they to go into another province unless invited (Conc. Sardic. can. ii.); nor indeed to go to court at all unless invited or summoned by the emperor; nor to go too much "in canali" or "canallo" (along the public road) "ad comitatum" (to the court) to present petitions, but rather to send their deacon if necessary (ib. can. ix.-xii.). Yet, A.D. 794, by Conc. Francof. can. lv., some four and a half centuries later, Charlemagne is permitted to have at court with him, by licence of the Pope and consent of the synod, and for the utility of the Church, Archbishop Angelram and Bishop Hildebald. Bishops, again, were not to leave their dioceses "negotiandi causa," or to frequent markets for gain (Conc. Eliberit. A.D. 305, can. xviii.). How far persecution, martyrdom, St. Augustin excuses an absence of his own on the ground that he never had been absent "licentia libertate sed necessaria servitute" (Epist. cxxxviii.). And Gregory the Great repeatedly insists upon residence. And to come later still, Conc. Francof. A.D. 794, canon xl. xlv., renews the prohibition of above three weeks' absence upon private affairs. And Charlemagne at Aix (Capit. Aquisgr. A.D. 789, c. xli.) restrains the bishop's residence, not simply to his see, but to his cathedral town: just as previous Frank canons repeatedly enjoin his presence there at the three great feasts of Easter, Whitsunday, and Christmas. The bishop, too, by a canon of Conc. Carthag. IV. A.D. 398, can. xiv., was bound to have his "hospitium" close to his cathedral church. The sole causes, in a word, that were held to justify absence, were such as arose from service to the Church; as when at synod, or employed on church duties elsewhere, or summoned to court on church business or for Christian purposes (but this was an absence jealously watched: see Conc. Sardic. &c. &c. as above). Absence also on pilgrimage was seemingly, yet hardly formally, acquiesced in. And a journey to Rome (by permission of the prince) would come under the same class of exemption as the attending a synod. By the time of Charlemagne, moreover, the office of Missi Dominici, and other State duties, were held to justify at least temporary non-residence.

β. From the spiritual office of the bishop singly, we pass to his joint authority when assembled in provincial synod; and this, i. as respects the consecration of bishops, for which see above; and, ii. as a court of appeal and jurisdiction over individual bishops, for which see APPEAL, COUNCIL, SYNOD; and, iii. as exercising a general jurisdiction over the province; for which, and for the relative rights of bishops and presbyters, &c. in synod assembled, see COUNCIL, SYNOD.

γ. Thirdly, for the collective authority of bishops assembled in general council, i. as respects doctrine, ii. as respects discipline, see COUNCIL, OECUMENICAL.

III. (2.) Over and above the spiritual powers inherent in the episcopate as such, certain TEMPORAL POWERS AND PRIVILEGES were conferred upon the bishop from time to time by the State; and these, partly, in his general capacity as of the clergy (for which see CLERGY), partly upon him as bishop.

(i.) The judicial authority in secular causes between Christians, which attached to the bishop as a matter of Christian feeling, became gradually an authority recognized and enlarged by state law. See details under APPEAL. He was limited in the Roman empire to civil causes, and to criminal cases that were not capital, and almost certainly to cases where both parties agreed to refer themselves to the bishop. In England, however, the bishop sat with the alderman in the Shire Gemot, twice a year, "in order to expound the law of God as well as the secular law" (Eadgar's Laws, ii. 5, &c. &c.); an arrangement to which (as is well known) William the Conqueror put an end. In Carolingian France, the bishop and the comes were to support one another, and the two as Missi Dominici made circuits to oversee things ecclesiastical as well as civil (Capit. of A.D. 789, 802, 806, &c.; see Gieseler, ii. 240, Eng. tr.). Questions relating to marriages, and to wills, were also referred to the bishops by the Roman laws, and by the Carolingian (see under MARRIAGE, TESTAMENT). The bishop also was authorized by Cod. Justin. l. v. 25, to prohibit gaming; as he had been by Cod. Theod. IX. iii. 7, XVI. x. 19, to put down idolatry; and IX. xvi. 12, sorcerers; and XV. viii. 2, pimps. He had also special jurisdiction, in causes both civil and (subsequently) criminal, over clergy, monks, and nuns — "episcopalis audientia" — from Valentinian, A.D. 452 (Novell. iii. de Episc. Judicio), and from Justinian, A.D. 539 (Novell. lxxix. and lxxxiii.), and so also cxxiii. c. 21); and from Heraclius, A.D. 628 (for the inclusion of criminal cases, see Gieseler, ii. 119, n. 14, Eng. tr.). And this exemption of the clergy from civil courts was continued by Charlemagne (Gieseler, ib. 256).

(ii.) Bishops also became members of the great council of the kingdom in all the European states; the result of such amalgamation being to merge ecclesiastical councils to some extent in civil ones. Their political position had also the effect of rendering them more despotic, while

(ii.) Under the Roman emperors it would seem also that civil magistrates were placed in a certain sense under the jurisdiction of the bishop in respect to their civil office. Conc. Arel. A.D. 314, can. vii., de Præsidibus, "placuit ut cum pro-moti fuerint, literas acceptant ecclesiasticas communicatorias: ita tamen ut in quibuscunque locis gesserint, ab episcopo ejusdem loci cura de-illis agatur: ut cum eaperint contra disciplinam publicam agere, tum denum a communione excludantur: similiter et de his qui rempublicam agere volunt" (Labbe, l. 1427). And so Socrates (vii. 13), writing of St. Cyril of Alexandria and Orestes the Profectus Augustalis of Egypt. The episcopal power of excommunication seemed to afford ground for this authority. And so St.
Gregory of Nazianzum declares to the Δυνασταί
Ἀρχιεπίσκοποι: that δ τοῦ Χριστοῦ νόμος ἑποριθεῖται ὑμῶν τῷ ἐπιδοταρίῳ καὶ τῷ ἐπιδοθῆναί, κ.τ.λ. (Orat. xvii.). In Spain, at a later period, Conc. Tolet. III. A.D. 589, can. xviii., describes the bishops as "prospectores qualiter iudices cum populo agant," an enactment repeated by Conc. Tolet. IV. A.D. 633, can. xxxii. And a constitution of Lothaire in France, about A.D. 559, enacts, in case of an unjust decision by the civil judge, that, in the absence of the king, "ab epis-copo castigetur" (Labbe, v. 828). And this seems to have been based upon Justinian's Code
(l. iv. 26), and upon Novell. viii. 9, lxxxvi. 1
and 4, cxviii. 23 (see Gieseler, ii. 118, 119, Eng. tr.)

(iv.) The more special office of protecting widows, orphans, prisoners, insane people, foundlings, in a word all that were distressed and helpless, was also assigned to bishops;
at first, as a natural adjunct to their office (see,
e.g. Conc. Sardic. A.D. 347, can. vii.; St. Jerome, ad Geront. [of a widow protected "Ecclesie presidio"]; St. Ambrose, de Offic. ii. 29; St. Aug.
Epist. 252 al. 217, and Serm. 176, § 2); afterwards by express law (Cod. tit. l. c. iv. de Episc.
Audientia, li. 22, 24, 27, 28, 30, 38); repeated further on by Gallic councils (Aurelian. V. A.D.
548, can. xx.; Turon. II. A.D. 567, can. xxix.; Matic. II. A.D. 585, can. xiv.; Francof. A.D. 794, can. xi.; Aelat. VI. A.D. 813, can. xvii.); and by Spanish ones (Tolet. III. A.D. 589, can. xviii.);
and referred to in Italy in the letters of Gregory
the Great frequently. The manumission of slaves belonging to the Church (e.g. Conc. Agath. A.D.
506, can. vii.), and the protection of freedmen (ib.
can. xxix., and Conc. Aurelian. V. A.D. 549, can.
vii. &c.) were also permitted and assigned to bishops; and this not only in Gaul but elsewhere (see Thomassin, II. iii. 87, sq.). And the manumission of slaves generally was often made in their presence (e.g. in Wales and England, Conc. I. 206, 676, 686, Haddan and Stubbs), and was furthered by their influence.

(v.) The practice of anointing kings at their coronation, and the belief which grew up that the right to the crown depended upon, or was conveyed by, the episcopal unction, added further power to the bishops. But this began in the West (if we except the allusion in Gildas to the practice, and the well-known case of St. Columba and King Aidan) only from about Carolingian times; in the East, however, from the emperor Theodosius, A.D. 408 (see Maskell's Dissert. in Mon. Lit. iii.), and a list in Morinus, de Sac.

Ordin. ii. 243; and CONONATION, UNCTION).

(vi.) Bishops were further exempted from being sworn in a court of justice, from Conc. Chalced.
(A.D. 451, Act. xi.); confirmed by Marcin and by Justinian (Cod. l. tit. iii. de Episc. et Cler.
l. 7, and Novell. cxviii. 7); the privilege, however,
being mixed up in the first instance with the general question of the legality of oaths at all to any Christian. And this privilege was repeated by the Lombard laws (L. ii. tit. 51, and L. iii. tit.
1), and is traceable in the Capit. of Charlemagne
(ii. 38, iii. 42, v. 197). But oaths of fidelity to the king were imposed upon bishops by Charlemagne (see above). It was extended to presbyters also in so-called Egbert's Excerptis, xix. (9th century), and by the provincial Council of Tribur (near Mayence, A.D. 895, can. xxi.): as it was always, by both law and canon, in the East, acc.
to Photius in Nomocan. tit. ix. c. 27, and Bal-samon, ib. Bishops indeed had the privilege of not being summoned to a court to give evidence at all, from at least Justinian's time (as above);
possibly from that of Theodosius (Cod. lib. xi. tit.
xxxix. de Fide Testium, l. 8); but the latter law is taken to mean only that a clergyman chosen to act as arbiter could not be compelled to give account of his decision to a civil tribunal (see Bingh. V. ii. 1). The value of a bishop's evidence, and that not on oath, was also estimated, according to a very suspicious law assigned to Theodosius (Cod. xvi. tit. xii. de Episc. Audient. l. 1), as to be taken against all other evidence whatever;
and certainly was ranked by Anglo-Saxon laws (Wiltred's Dooms xvi.) with the king's, as "incontrovertible." See also Egbert's Dialogus, Resp. l.; and a fair account of "compurgation," as required or not required of the clergy, in
H. C. Lea's Superstition and Force, pp. 30, sq.
Philadelphia, 1870. Gregory of Tours, when accused, contended, "regis causa" and "licet canonibus contraria," to exculpate himself by three solemn denials at three several altars;
although it was held superfluous for him to do this, because "non potest persona inferior" [which was the case here] "super sacerdotem credi." Conc. Meld. A.D. 845, can. xxxvii. forbids bishops to swear. And the Capit. of Carolus Calvus, A.D. 858 (Conc. Curisic. c. xv.) is express in forbidding episcopal oaths upon secular matters, or in anything but a case of "scanda-lum Ecclesie suae." The office of Advocatus Ecclesie, among other things, was connected with this inability to be sworn. See also H. C.
Lea, as above.

(vii.) Bishops had also a privilege of intercession
for criminals in capital or serious criminal cases;
which the Council of Sardica regards as a duty
on their part calling for frequent exercise:
"Ἐπει πολλὰκις συμβαίνει τινὰς . . . καταργεῖν
ἐπὶ τὴν Ἐκκλησίαν . . . τοῖς τοιοῦτοις μὴ ἀργητέον εἶναι τὴν βοήθειαν, ἀλλὰ χωρὶς μελέτησού,
κ.τ.λ. (can. vii., transportation and banishment to an island being the penalties named). As an office naturally as well as legally attached to the episcopate, such intercession is mentioned by St. Ambrose, by St. Augustin (interceding for the Circumcellions, Epist. clviii. and clx.), by St. Jerome (ad Nepot., Epist. xxxiv.), by Socrates

(v. 14, vii. 17). It did not extend to pecuniary causes, on the ground that in these to help the one side would be to injure the other (St. Ambros. de Off. iii. 9). It is mentioned later still by Sulp. Severus, Diad. iii. of St. Martin, by Eusebius of St. Epiphanius of Ticinum, &c. Restrictions, however, are placed upon the (admitted) right by Cod. Theod. (IX. tit. xl. c. 10, 17), renewed by Justinian (l. tit. iv. De Episc. Aulicis. l. 6), and again by Theodorik in Italy (Filicet. c. 114): free access being given nevertheless to bishops to enter prisons with a view to such "Interventiones" (Append. Cod. Theod. c. xlii.). And Charlemagne gives authority to bishops to obtain pardon for criminals from the secular judges at the three great festivals (Capit. vi. 106). A series of councils, mostly in Gaul, had put limits, before Charlemagne, to the Church's right of protecting criminals. See COUNCIL, SANCTUARY.

(viii.) A bishop's character, life, and property, were also placed under special legal protection: (1.) By the canons, rejecting the evidence of a heretic altogether, and requiring more than one Christian lay witness, against a bishop (Apost. Can. lxxix.); or again, rejecting in such case the evidence of one known to be guilty of crime (Conc. Carth. II. A.D. 300, can. vi.); or of one, cleric or lay, without previous enquiry into the character of the witness himself (Conc. Chalced. A.D. 451, can. xxi.); which provisions occur also in Conc. Constantin. (A.D. 381, can. vi.), with the qualification that they do not apply to suits against a bishop touching pecuniary matters, but only to ecclesiastical cases. (2.) By the canons which excommunicated any one proved to have falsely accused a bishop (Apost. Can. xliii.); extended also to priests and deacons by Conc. Elvicit. A.D. 305, can. lxxv. Under the Germanic states this protection was carried still further (see, e.g. for Anglo-Saxon laws, Thorpe's index, vol. i.; and across the Channel, Leg. Alaman. cc. x. xii.; Leg. Longob. l. ix. 27; Leg. Bajuvar. l. 11; and Capit. Carol. et Ludov. lib. vi. cc. 98, 127; vii. c. 362; and Capit. Ludov. Add. iv. c. 3): provisions suggested by Justinian's legislation of a like kind.

How far bishops were exempt, with other clergy, from civil jurisdiction, see under CLERGY. Justinian gave to bishops the special privilege, that they could not be brought before the civil magistrate for any cause, pecuniary or criminal, without the emperor's special order (Novell. xxxiii. l. 8).

(x.) In addition however to privileges thus accorded to bishops by the State, their office as bishops entailed upon them also certain restrictions and burdens, partly in common with clergy generally (for which see CLERGY, PRESBYTERS, &c.), partly peculiar to themselves, or belonging to them more especially than to the clergy of lower rank. As (1.) in the disposal of their property by will: wherein, in the case of any lands acquired by them after ordination, they were required to leave such lands to the Church (Conc. Carth. III. A.D. 397, can. xlix.), and could only dispose of such as had come to them by inheritance or by gift, or such as they had possessed before ordination. And even those they could not leave save to their kinsfolk, nor to them if they were

heretics or heathens, but were bound to leave them by will to the Church in such case (Con. Eccl. Afric. 48). Justinian also allows bishops to leave nothing by will except what they possessed before being ordained. Bishops, or what might have accrued to them since that time by inheritance from kinsmen up to the 4th degree, and no farther; all else to go to the Church, or to works of piety (Cod. I. de Episc. et Cler. l. 33): the goods of a bishop dying intestate to go wholly to the Church (ib.). And Gregory the Great acts upon a like rule. And in Gaul, Conc. Agath. A.D. 506, can. vi.; Epston. A.D. 517, can. xvii.; Paris. III. A.D. 557, can. ii.; Luphan. II. A.D. 567, can. ii., contain various enactments founded on like principles, although not quite so rigorous. So likewise Spanish councils from Conc. Tarracon. A.D. 516, can. xii.; Conc. Valent. A.D. 524, can. ii. iii., onwards; carefully guarding the right of the Church to all church goods (especially, it must be owned, in the matter of limiting the manumission of slaves belonging to the Church), while leaving the bishop's property, otherwise acquired, to his heirs. And all these enactments were backed by a strong feeling in favour of the principle, that a clergyman, and especially a bishop, should have no private wealth, but should give up all to the Church and the poor; see e.g. Possidius' Life of St. Augustin. He was to have "vilem suppellectile et mensam ac victum pauperum," acc. to Conc. Carthag. IV. A.D. 398, can. xv. Nor was he to become executor under a will (ib. xviii.); or to go to law "pro rebus transitoris" (ib. xix.). But see for this under CLERGY, POVERTY. The requirement of the royal consent to a bishop's will in England in Norman times arose from a totally different source, viz. the king's right to the temporalities during vacancy, and the regarding the bishopric as a fee in the feudal sense. See also the parallel case of abbats, under ABBAT. (2.) Acc. to Conc. Carthag. A.D. 398, can. xvi., a bishop was not to read "gentilium libros, hereticorum autem pro necessitate et tempore." But see, for the fluctuations of the dispute respecting classical study and the reading of Pagan writers, Thomassin, II. i. 92. (3.) For prohibitions about hunting and hawkling, and social matters generally, see CLERGY. (4.) Under the Frank kings also, and notably under Charlemagne and his successors, bishops, who with the other clergy enjoyed large exemptions under the Roman empire (see CLERGY), became liable to certain duties, arising from their wealth and position, and gradually assuming large proportions as the feudal system grew up; as, e.g. annual gifts to the crown, the entertainment of the king and his officers on progress (jus githi, jus metatus, &c., see Du Cange sub vobis, and Thomassin, III. l. 38, sq.), the fuelling soldiers for the emperor's service, &c. &c. But feudal dues belong to a later date. Clergy had been especially exempted from the "jus metatus" under the Roman emperors.

(xi.) We may also mention here the custom of educating boys in the bishop's house for the ministry (see Possid. in V. S. Aug., and Sozom. vi. 31, speaking respectively of Africa and of Egypt); and Conc. Tolot. II. A.D. 531, can. i. and ii., and IV. A.D. 633, can. xxiv. (regulating the practice in Spain); and Conc. Turon. V. A.D. 567, can. xii. for Gaul). See Thomassin, III. l. 92-97.

III. (3.) From the office, we pass to the HONORARY PRIVILEGES and rank of a bishop; of whom in general the Apost. Constit. (ii. 34) declare, that men ought ὄν ἐπίσκοπον ἀρέσκειν ὡς πατέρα, φοβέσθαι ὡς βασιλέα, τιμᾶν ὡς κύριον. But no doubt many of such privileges belong to Byzantine times, and date no earlier than the 3rd or 4th centuries at the earliest. And here—

(1.) Of the modes of salutation practised towards him from the 4th century onwards. As, 1. bowing the head to receive his blessing—ὀμοχλίειν κεφαλήν—Incline caput; see Bingh. ii. ix. 1, and Vales. in Theoloret. iv. 9, from St. Hilary, St. Chrysostom, St. Ambrose, &c. speaking of bishops only; and a law of Honorius and Valentinian, speaking of bishops as those "quibus omnis terra caput inclinatur." 2. Kissing his hand—manu osculari (Bingh. ib. 2, kissing Savaro on Sidon. Apollin. Epist. viii. 11). 3. Kissing the feet also—pedes deosculari—appears by St. Jerome, Epist. lxi. (speaking of a bishop of Constantina in Cyprus; and see Cassanbon, Ecclesi. xiv. § 4), to have been at one time a mark respected common to all bishops; being borrowed indeed from a like custom practised towards the Eastern emperors. The deacon is to kiss the bishop's feet before reading the Gospel, see to the Ordo Romanus. It was restricted to the Pope as regards kings, by Gregory VII. 4. The forms of address, and the titles and epithets, applied to bishops, have been mentioned already.

(ii.) The insignia of a bishop were,—1. the mitre; seemingly alluded to by Eusebius, x. 4, as ὄν ὑβρίων τῆς δίξης στεφανον, and certainly mentioned by Greg. Naz. Ovat. v, under the name of κίδαρις, and by Ammian. Marcell. lib. xlix. under that of "corona sacerdotialis," yet not occurring in Pontificals in the West until after the 10th century (Meuardus, in Du Cange), and not reckoned among the "episcopalia" even in A.D. 633 (see above); while in the East, Symeon of Thessalonica tells us that all bishops officiated with bare heads except the bishop of Alexandria, who did then wear a κίδαρις; and the homily attributed to St. Chrysostom, de Uno Legislat. (Opp. vi. 410, Montf.), implies that there was then no τιάρα or κορυμβάσιον appropriated to bishops at their consecration. The "aurea lamina," however, attributed to St. John by St. Jerome (de Script. Eccl.), and by Eusebius (vitalis), iii. 31, v. 24) on the authority of Polycrates,—and again by Epiphanius (Hæc. xxix.), on that of Eusebius and Clement of Alexandria, to St. James of Jerusalem,—seem to favour the supposition that some kind of mitre soon became usual. See Maskell, Mon. Rit. iii. 274. [MITRE.] 2. The ring, peculiar to the West, and alluded to by Optatus (lib. 1); see above, and under EXO. 3. The staff, belonging apparently to patriarchs in the East (so Balsamon), and of a shape to supply the ordinary uses of a staff, viz. to lean upon; in the West, growing by Charlemaign times into a sceptre of some seven feet long, occasionally of gold (see the Monach. S. Gall. f. 19, quoted by Thomassin, l. ii. 58); so that instead of golden bishops carrying wooden staves, there had come to be (acc. to a saying quoted by Thomassin) wooden bishops carrying golden ones. See STAFF. The two last named, the ring and the staff, were so for the characteristic insignia of a bishop before the time of Charlemaign as to become the symbols by which bishoprics were given (see above). And they are recognized as such A.D. 633 in Spain, in conjunction with yet another, viz. 4. the oscularium; for which see ORARIES. 5. A cross borne before him was peculiar in the East to a patriarch; in the West it does not occur until the 10th century, unless in such exceptional cases as that of the first entry of St. Augustin into Canterbury, A.D. 597; the cross of gold mentioned by Aleuin as carried about with him by Willibrod being apparently only a pectoral cross. See CROSS. 6. The tonsure, when general rules about modestly cut hair, &c., settled into formal rule about the 6th century, was not peculiar in any special form to bishops; see TONSURE. Nor yet, 7. was there apparently any special dress for bishops apart from solemn occasions and in ordinary life during the period with which this article is concerned; as appears, among other evidence, by the rebukes addressed by popes to the Gallic bishops of the 6th century onwards, who, being monks before they were bishops, retained their monastic habit as bishops (see at length Thomassin, l. ii. 43, sq.). For the vestments used during divine service, see VESTMENTS.

(iii.) Singing hosannas before a bishop on his arrival anywhere, is mentioned only to be condemned by St. Jerome (in Matt. xxi. Opp. vii. 174 b). But see Vales. ad Euseb. II. E. ii. 23; and Augusti, Denkwürd. aus der Christl. Archæol. v. 218.

(iv.) The form of addressing a bishop by the phrase corona tua et vestra, and of adjuring him per coronam, frequent in St. Jerome, St. Augustin, Sidon. Apollin., Enodius, has been explained as referring to the mitre, to the tonsure, or to the corona or consecratio of the bishop's presbyters. The personal nature of the appellation appears to effect the last of these. Its being peculiar to bishops is against the second. While the objection taken by Bingham against the first, viz. that bishops did not wear mitres at the period when the phrase came into use, seems scarcely founded on fact. And the bishop's head-covering was also certainly called "corona," as by Anianianus Marcellinus. At the same time, the phrase after all possibly means nothing more definite than "your beatitude," or "your highness."

(v.) The bishop's throne—θρόνος, θρόνος ἀποστολικός—or (after the name of the founder of the see) ὁ Μάρκου θρόνος, for Alexandria, &c.—βῆμα—θρόνος ὑψηλός, in contradistinction to the "second throne" of the presbyters—"linteata sedes" (Pacini. ad Senpiron. ii.)—"cathedra velata" (St. Aug. Epist. cxi.)—θρόνος ἐσθλασμένος ἐπισκοπικῶς (St. Athan. Apolog.)—was also a mark of his dignity. The Council of Antioch, A.D. 364, condemns Paul of Samosata for erecting a very splendid throne, like a magistrate's tribunal (Euseb. H. E. vii. 30). See also above in this article under Enthronisation. By Om. Carthag. IV. A.D. 398, canons xxxiv. xxxv., a bishop is enjoined that, as a rule of courtesy, "quolibet loco sedens, stare presbyterum non patiar;" and that although "in Ecclesia et in consensu presbyterorum sullivaner sedet, intra domum . . . collegam se presbyterorum esse cognoscat." During prayers, according to the Arabic version of the Nicene canons (lxii.), the bishop's place in church was "in fronte templi ad medium altaris" (Labbe, ii. 334).

(VI.) If we are to take the pretended letter of Pope Lucius (Labbe, l. 721) to be worth anything as evidence in relation to later times, the bishop of Rome was habitually attended by two presbyters or three deacons, in order to avoid scandal.

IV. (1.) The relation of bishops to each other was as of an essentially equal office, however differentiated individuals might be in point of influence, &c., by personal qualifications or by the relative importance of their sees. St. Cyprian's view of the "unus episcopatus"—the one corporation of which all bishops are equal members—is much the same with St. Jerome's well-known declaration (Ad Evangel. Epist. c.), that "ubicunque fuerit episcopatus, sive Romae sive Egbubii, . . . ejusdem meriti, ejusdem est et sacerdotii." And a like principle is implied in the litterae communitative or synodicae,—συνωγράμματα κοινωνικά, sometimes called litterae eithronisticae, συλλαβαί εθρονιστικαί,—by which each bishop communicated his own consecration to his see to foreign bishops as to his equals (Bingh. II. xi. 10). The order of precedence among them was determined by the date of consecration (see, e. g. the Cod. Can. Eccl. Afric. lxxxvi., Conc. Bracar. II. A. D. 563, can. vi., and Tolet. IV. A. D. 633, can. iv., and Bracar. IV. A. D. 675, can. iv.; and the English Council of Hertford, A. D. 673, can. viii.; and Justinian's Cod. I. tit. iv. l. 29; and above under l. 3. 5). But—

(2.) This equality was gradually undermined by the institution of metropolitans, archbishops, primates, exarchs, patriarchs, pope: for each of whom see the several articles.

(3.) However, apart from this, there came to be special distinctions in particular Churches: as, e. g. in Mauritania and Numidia the senior bishop was "primus;" but in Africa proper, the bishop of Carthage (Bingh. II. xvi. 6, 7); and in Alexandria the bishop had special powers in the ordinations of the suffragan sees: for which see ALEXANDRIA, (Patriarchate of), p. 48; METROPOLITAN.

(4.) The successive setting up of metropolitans and of patriarchs gave rise to exceptional cases [ἀποκεφάλαι], all bishops whatever having been really ἀποκεφάλαι, i. e. independent (save subjection to the synod), before the setting up of metropolitans, and all metropolitans before the establishment of patriarchs: see Bingh. II. xviii. [ΑΥΤΟΚΕΦΑΛΑΙ], METROPOLITANS, PATRIARCHS]. Whether there continued to be any bishop anywhere, ἀποκεφάλαι in such sense as to have neither patriarch nor metropolitan nor provincial bishops, appears doubtful: and such a case could only occur, either in a country where there was but one bishop (as in Scythia in the 5th century), or as a temporary state of things in a newly converted country: see Bingh. ib. 4.

(5.) For Chorepiscopi, in contradistinction from whom we find in Frank times Episcopi Cathedralis (Du Cange), 6. for Suffragans, 7. for Coadjutors, 8. for Intercessores and Interventores, and, 9. for Commendatarii, see under the several titles.

V. There remain some anomalous cases; as, (1.) Episcopi vacantes, σχολαίοι, σχολάζοντες, viz. bishops who by no fault were without a see, but who degenerated sometimes into epi-scopi vagi or ambulantes, ἀπόλιδες, or βακάντιβοι (Βακάντιβοι, in Syues. Epist. 67), εραυνίτι, and among whom in Carolingian times, and in northern France, "Scotti" enjoyed a bad pre-eminence. Bishops indeed without sees, either for missionary purposes to the heathen, or merely τιμῆς ἕνεκεν (Sozom. vi. 34, οὐ πάλας τινός), existed from the time of the Council of Antioch, A. D. 341, can. xix.; and see Apost. Can. xxxvi., But "Episcopi vagi, vagautes, ambulantes, qui parochiam non habent," are condemned by Conc. Vermer. A. D. 752 or 753, cau. xiv., and Conc. Vernens. or Yernotens. A. D. 755, can. xiii., Conc. Calc. A. D. 816, can. v., and Conc. Meld. A. D. 845, can. x.; and the "Scotti, qui se dicunt episcopos esse," by Conc. Cabillon. II. A. D. 813, can. xliii. Compare the case of the early Welsh and Irish (Scotch) churches for honorary bishops, and again for the custom of diocessless bishops, "Episcopi portatiles" is a very late name for them (Conc. Laud. A. D. 1449).

(2.) For the bishop-abbots or bishop-monks, principally of Celtic monasteries, but also in some Continental ones, the former having no see except their monastery (see ABBAT), the latter being simply members of the fraternity in episcopal orders, but (nonnally) under the jurisdiction of their abbat, and performing episcopal offices for the monastery and its dependent district: see Toll's St. Patrick; Reeves' edition of Adamann's Life of St. Columba; Mabillon, Annal. Bened.; Martene and Durand, Theas. Nov. Anecd. vol. i. Pref. Five bishops of this class—"episcopos de monasterio S. Mauricii, &c. &c.—were at Conc. Attinia. A. D. 765.

(3.) Episcopus or Antistes Palatii, was an episcopal counsellor residing in the palace in the time of the Carolingians, by special leave (see above, III. 1, a. xv.). For the court clergy, whether under the Roman emperors from Constantine, or under the Franks, see Thomassin, II. iii. 589, and Neander, Ch. Hist. vol. v. pp. 144, sq. Eng. transl.

(4.) For Episcopus Cardinalis, which in St. Gregory the Great means simply "proprius," i. e. the duly installed (and "incardinated") bishop of the place, see Du Cange, and under CARDINALIS.

(5.) Episcopus Regionarius, i. e. without a special diocesan city: see REGIONARIUS.

(6.) Titular bishops, and bishops in partibus infidelium, belong under these names to later times.

(7.) Episcopus Ordinarius, in Frank times, was an occasional name for a conajutor bishop to assist in conferring orders (Du Cange).

(8.) For the special and singular name of Libra, applied to the suffragans of the see of Rome, see LIBRA.

(9.) For lay holders of bishoprics, see COMMENDATORS.

(10.) And, lastly, it almost needs an apology to mention such mockeries as Episcopi Fulwornii—Innocentium—Puerorum; all too of later date: for which see Du Cange.

BISOMUS, a sepulchre capable of containing two bodies (σώματα). The word is found in inscriptions in Christian cemeteries at Rome and elsewhere, as in one found in the cemetery of Callistus, near Rome: "Bonifacius, qui vixit annis xxii. et ii. (menses), positus in bisomum in pace, sibi et patr. suo." [A. N.]

BLASPHEMY: lit. "defamation," and to blaspheme, βλάπτει τὴν φήμην, "to hurt the reputation; to reproach or speak injuriously of another;" which is the meaning of both words in Plato, Demosthenes, Isocrates, and other subsequent writers, where they occur: particularly the LXX. translators of the Old Testament. Accordingly, when the Proconsul bade St. Polycarp revile Christ, the answer was, "How can I blaspheme"—that is, speak evil of—"the King who has saved me?" (Euseb. E. II. iv. 15). By the writers of the New Testament this word would seem appropriated to any wickedness said or done against God, especially where used without adjuncts, as the Jews said of our Lord, "This man blasphemeth," (Matt. ix. 3), and St. Paul of his own doings at one time, "I compelled them to blaspheme" (Acts xxvi. 11); and it is the willful and persistent commission of this act against the Third Person in the Godhead, or the Holy Ghost, which is denounced by our Lord Himself as the one sin or blasphemy which is never forgiven (Mark iii. 29; cf. Heb. vi. 4-7 and 1 John v. 16), on which see Bingham at great length (xvi. 7, 3; cf. Bloomfield on Matt. iii. 31). He had previously shewn that "blasphemy" was by the primitive Church placed first of the sins against the third Commandment; for which reason it was, doubtless, that all Christians are forbidden by the 15th African canon to revile places where blasphemy was used. Very rarely the word occurs in a good sense for salutary chiding or remonstrance: see Liddell and Scott's Lexicon for its classical, and Schleusner's Lexicon and Suicer's Thes. for its Scriptural and ecclesiastical senses. [E. S. F.]

BLESSING. [BENEDICTION.]

BLIND, HEALING OF (IN ART). The healing of the blind is frequently represented on ancient monuments, perhaps as a symbolical representation of the opening of the eye of the soul wrought by the power of the Saviour (1 Pet. ii. 2). See Bottari, Sculture e Pitture, tav. xix. xxxii. xxxix. xlix. lxxviii. cxxxvi.; Millin, Mémoires de la France, lxx. 5.

In most cases only one blind man, probably the "man blind from his birth" of St. John ix. 1, is being healed. He is generally represented sitting or reclining, to mark his inferiority to the Saviour and the Apostles (when any of the latter are introduced), is shod with sandals and bears a long staff to guide his steps. The Saviour, young and beardless, touches his eyes with the fore-finger of the right hand. This representation is found on an antique vase given by Mamachi (Origines, v. 520), on an ivory casket of the fourth or fifth century, engraved by D'Agincourt (Sculpture, pl. xxii. No. 4); in a bas-relief of a tomb of the Sextian family, in the museum of Aix in Provence, of about the same epoch (France Pittoresque, pl. cxxxvii.); and elsewhere.

In a few cases (e.g. Bottari, tav. cxxxvi.) the blind man healed appears to be Bartimeus, from the circumstance that he has "cast away his garment" (Judith, Mark x. 50) before throwing himself at the feet of Jesus.

On a sarcophagus in the Vatican (Bottari, xxxix. see woodcut) is a representation of the healing of two blind men; probably the two who were healed by the Lord as He left the house of Jairus (Matt. ix. 27-31). Here, too, the figures of those upon whom the miracle is wrought are of small size; the blind appears to lead the blind, for one only has a staff, while the other places his hand upon his shoulder. The Lord lays His hand upon the head of the figure with the staff, while another, probably one of the Apostles, raises his hand, the fingers arranged as for the Latin manner [BENEDICTION] in blessing. (Martigny, Dict. des Antiq. Chréti.) [C.]

BODY, in the sense contemplated by St. Paul when he said of the Church, "Which is His body" (Eph. i. 23), meaning Christ's, which is expressed further on, "For the edifying of the body of Christ" (iv. 12), and of Christians generally, "Ye are the body of Christ, and members in particular" (1 Cor. xii. 27). The Apostle, we know, spoke (Acts xxi. 37), as well as wrote, Greek; but being a Roman citizen (ib. xxii. 27) he probably had some knowledge of Latin as well; and it is to this circumstance, therefore, that we must ascribe his attaching a sense to the Greek word σῶμα, long before appropriated by its Latin equivalent "corpus," but which it had never itself shared hitherto. What Greek ears had always understood hitherto by σῶμα was a physical or material body, organic or inorganic, as the case might be; and occasionally the latter in a confused mass, as "body of water" or "of the universe." But "corpus," besides these senses, had for some time been familiar to Latin ears as denoting a combination of living agents in various relations: a troop of soldiers, a guild of artisans, or the whole body politic; of these the second acceptation was beginning to be stereotyped in law, where "corpore" (corporations) quickly became synonymous with what, in classical literature, had been known as "collegia" (colleges). There must have been many such in existence at Rome when the Apostle wrote; and they were extended, in process of time, to most trades and professions. The general notion attaching to them was that of "a number of persons"—the law said, not fewer than three—"and the union which bound them together" (Smith's Dict. of Roman and Greek Antiq., p. 255). Tit. 1 of B. xiv. of the Theodosian Code is headed "De Privilegiis Corporationum urbis Romae," and Tit. 14 of B. xi. of that of Justinian is on the same subject. Writing from Rome, therefore, where such "bodies" abounded—his own craft possibly, that of tent-makers, among the number—what could be more natural than for the Apostle to apply this designation to the new brotherhood that was forming, and then paint it in glowing colours to his Ephesian converts as a corporation, whose head, centre, and inspiring principle was Christ? He was the union that bound it together and supplied it with life. So far, indeed, it stood on a different footing, and required to be placed in a different category from all other corporations; still, as outwardly it resembled them, might it not also be described in terms which they had been beforehand with it in appropriating, and invested with a new idea? The Apostle authorised this for all languages in communicating the adopted sense of the Latin word to its Greek equivalent. Accordingly with us too the Church of Christ is both spoken of and exists as a corporation. But though it has many features in common with all such bodies, it has essential characteristics of its own, evidenced in its history throughout, which are not shared by any other. Their agreement, therefore, must have been one, not of identity, but of analogy, to which the Apostle called attention. And this is clear from his having recourse to other kindred analogies elsewhere, to develop his meaning. "The husband," he says, "is the head of the wife, even as Christ is the Head of the Church; and He is the Saviour of the body." As if he had said, "Do not misunderstand me: the relation of the church to Christ is not merely that of corporations in general to the principle which binds them together: it is closer still. It may be compared to the marriage tie, described when first instituted in these solemn words: 'They two shall be one flesh' (Eph. v. 23-32). Even this falls short of my full meaning. I would have you 'grow up into Him in all things, which is the Head, even Christ, from whom the whole body fitly joined together and compacted by that which every joint supplieth, according to the effectual working in the measure of every part, maketh increase of the body unto the edifying of itself in love' (Eph. iv. 15, 16). Realise the vital connexion that subsists between the head and members of each individual man; realise the depth of communion that there should or may be between husband and wife; realise the full force of the bond determining the character and cohesion of every society, or corporate body; then from all these collectively, form your estimate of the church of Christ. Each of them illustrates some feature belonging to it which is not so clearly traced in the others; therefore none of them singly will bear overstraining, and all together must not be supposed to exhaust the subject." Unseen realities cannot be measured or determined by what can be seen or felt. "It is the description of a man and not a state," said Aristotle of the Republic of Plato, in which every body could say of every thing, "it is my property" (Pol. ii. 1). Spiritual union is neither political, nor conjugal, nor physical, nor anything earthly. It may be illustrated from such earthly relations, but it transcends them all; nor is it explained really, when called "sacramental," further than that it is then asserted to have been assumed to us by what are called in theological—not Scriptural—language, the Sacraments of the Church. As Hooker says: "Christ and His holy Spirit with all their blessed effects, though entering into the soul of man we are not able to apprehend or express how, do notwithstanding give notice of the times when they use to make their access, because it pleaseth Almighty God to communicate by sensible means those blessings which are incomprehensible" (Ecc. Pol. v. 57, 3). That is to say, when such blessings are communicated through the Sacraments. Another writer adds: "We are told in plain and indubitable terms that Baptism and the Lord's Supper are the means by which men are joined to the Body of Christ, and therefore by which Christ our Lord joins Himself to that renewed race of which He has become the Head. . . . These facts we learn from the express statements of St. Paul: 'For by one Spirit we are all baptized into one body;' and again, 'We being many are one bread and one body; for we are all partakers of that one bread.'" Herein it is expressly declared that the one and the other of these Sacraments are the peculiar means by which union with the Body of Christ is bestowed upon men. They are the 'joints' and 'bands' whereby the whole body in its dependence on its Head has nourishment ministered" (Wilberforce's Lectures, p. 415). . . . Body, then, in the sense predicated by St. Paul of the Church, stands for a multitude of singulars, and not an abstraction. It means the collection or aggregate of Christian souls who, cleansed, quickened, and inhabited by Christ, form one brotherhood in Him. What each of them is separately, that all of them are collectively, neither more nor less. Numbers cannot affect its integrity. To say that a body so composed is one is to say no more of it than must, from the nature of the case, be said of every body corporate without exception. The fact of its unity resulting from a personal union of each of its members with one and the same Person, viz. Him who redeemed them, is its distinguishing feature. "From the oneness of His Body which was slain, results the oneness of His body which is sanctified." [E. S. P.]

BODY, MUTILATION OF THE

I. The Pentateuch forbade the exercise of the priest's office to any of the Aaronites who should have a "blemish," a term extending even to the case of a "flat nose" (Lev. xxi. 17-23); whilst injuries to the organs of generation excluded even from the congregation (Deut. xxiii. 1). The Prophets announce a mitigation of this severity (Is. lvi. 3-5), which finds no place in the teaching of our Saviour (Matt. xix. 12), nor does any trace of it remain in the rules as to the selection of bishops and deacons in the Pastoral Epistles (1 Tim. iii., Tit. i.). Nevertheless, the Jewish rule seems to have crept back into the discipline of the Christian Church,—witness the story of the monk Ammonius having avoided promotion to the episcopate by cutting off his right ear,—for which see Socrat. H. E. iv. 23 (Baronius indeed holds him to have been eventually ordained). And one of the so-called Apostolical Canons (learned probably antecedent to the Nicene Council of A.D. 325), which provides that one-eyed or lame men, who may be worthy of the episcopate, may become bishops, "since not the bodily defect" (ἀσθεν, mutilatio), "but the defilement of the soul, pollutes" the man (c. 69, otherwise numbered 76 or 77), leaves at least open the question whether such defects are a bar to the first reception of clerical orders. No general rule however as to mutilation is to be found in the records of any of the early General Councils, but only in those of the non-ecumenical ones of the West, or in the letters, &c., of the Popes, always of suspicious authority. Thus, a letter of Innocent I. (402-17) to Felix, bishop of Nucera, says that no one who has voluntarily cut off a part of any of his fingers is to be ordained (Ep. 4, c. 1). A Council of Rome in 465 forbade from admission to orders those who had lost any of their members, requiring even the ordaining bishop to undo his act (c. 3). So Pope Gelasius (492-6) in a letter to the bishops of Iuxentia, complains that persons with bodily mutilations are admitted to the services of the Church; an abuse not allowed by ancient tradition or the forms of the Apostolic see (Ep. 9, c. 16). A fragment of a letter of the same Pope to the clergy and people of Brindisi condemns in like manner the ordination of a man "weak and blemished in any part of his body." But a letter to Bishop Palladius says down—in accordance with the Apostolical Canon above quoted—that a dignity received whilst the body was yet whole was not to be lost by subsequent enfeeblement; with which letter may be connected, for what it is worth, a canon or alleged canon of the Council of Herda in 524, quoted by Ivo, to the effect that a cleric made lame by a medical operation is capable of promotion. Not to speak of an alleged canon of Gregory the Great, 590-603, against the ordination of persons self-mutilated in any member, to be found in Gratian; two centuries later, in a capitulary of Pope Gregory II. (714-30) addressed to his delegates for Bavaria, we find in like manner any bodily defect treated as a bar to ordination. On the other hand, we may quote a testimony later indeed than the period embraced in this work, but as occurring after the schism of East and West, above the suspicion of all Romanizing partiality, that of Balsamon (nd Marci Alex. interrog. 23, quoted by Cotelerius, Patres Apost. i. pp. 478-9), who says that bodily injuries or infirmities supervening after ordination, even if they rendered the priest unable physically to fulfil his office, did not deprive him of his dignity, as "none was to be hindered from officiating through bodily defect" (ἀσθεν), also rendered by Beverigo as mutilation).

We may take it therefore that the rule of the Church as to mutilations and bodily defects generally was this: such mutilations or defects were a bar to ordination, especially if self-inflicted; but supervening involuntarily after ordination, they were not a bar to the fulfilment of clerical duties, or to promotion in the hierarchy. There is, however, one particular form of mutilation—that of the generative organs—which occurs with peculiar prominence in early Church history, and is dealt with by special enactments.

One sect of heretics, the Valesians (whose example is strangely recalled by the practices of a well-known body of dissenters from the Russian Church at the present day), enforced the duty of emasculation both on themselves and others (Epiph. cont. Haer. 58; Aug. de Haeres. c. 37). Their catechumens, whilst uninitiated, were not allowed to eat flesh, but no restrictions as to food were imposed on the mutilated. They were said to use not only persuasion but force in making converts, and to practise violence for the purpose on travellers, and even on persons received as guests.

The most notorious instance of self-mutilation in Church history is that of Origen, who, when a young catechist at Alexandria, inflicted this on himself in order to quench the violence of his passions (Euseb. H. E. vi. 8). He was nevertheless ordained by the bishops of Caesarea and Jerusalem, two of the highest authority among the prelates of Palestine. But Demetrius of Alexandria, who had formerly spoken of him in terms of high praise, began attacking the validity of his ordination, and the conduct of his ordaining bishops. It is indeed remarkable that Epiphanius mentions three separate traditions as to the mode which Origen adopted to maintain his continence—two of them not implying actual mutilation, but only extinction of the generative power—and seems to consider that a good many idle tales had been told on the subject (Contra Haer. 64). It is well known, at any rate, that Origen was condemned and sentenced to be deprived of his orders for self-mutilation by the Council of Alexandria, A.D. 230. This is not the place, of course, for dwelling on the unworthy motives mixed up in Origen's condemnation; but if what is recorded of the Valesians be true—whose heresy appears to have been contemporaneous with Origen—it was absolutely necessary that the Church should firmly resist not only the return to the emasculate priesthoods of the heathen, but the utterly ant-social tendencies which such practices portended or expressed. The Council of Achaia, by which the Valesians were condemned, is usually set down to the year 250.

If the Apostolical Canons are as a whole anterior to the Council of Nicene, they constitute the next authority on the subject. According to these, whilst a man made a eunuch against his will was not excluded from being admitted into the clergy, yet self-mutilation was assimilated to suicide, and the culprit could not be admitted, or was to be "altogether condemned" (expelled?) if the act were committed after his admission (c. 17, otherwise numbered 20-22, or 21-23). A layman mutilating himself was to be excluded for 3 years from communion (c. 17, otherwise 23 or 24). It may however be suspected that on this head at least these canon laws have been interpolated after the Nicene Council (325), or they would have been referred to in that well-known one which stands first of all in the list of its enactments,—that if any one has been emasculated either by a medical man in illness, or by the barbarians, he is to remain in the clergy; but if any has mutilated himself he is, if a cleric already, on proof of the fact by examination, to cease from clerical functions, and if not already ordained not to be presented for ordination; this however, not to apply to those who have been made eunuchs by the barbarians or by their masters, who, if they are found worthy, may be admitted into the clergy. Contemporaneously, or nearly so, with the Council we find a constitution of the emperor Constantine rendering the making of eunuchs within the "orbis Romanus," a capital crime (Cod., bk. iv. t. xlii. l. 1).

It is, however, at this period that we find the next most prominent instance of self-mutilation in Church history after that of Origen,—that of Leontius, Arian bishop of Antioch in the time of Athanasius, who, when a presbyter, had been deposed on this account, but was nevertheless promoted to the episcopate by the emperor Constantius, against the decrees of the Nicene Council, observes Theodoret (p. 23; cf. Fusb. vi. 8). This Leontius figures by no means favourably in the Church histories. Athanasius was very hostile to him, and he was accused of cunning and double-dealing, of promoting the unworthy and neglecting the worthy in his diocese.

A canon on bodily mutilation similar to the Nicene one was enacted by the Synod of Selucia in Persia, A.D. 410 (c. 4), and by a Syrian synod in 465, and the interdiction against the admission to orders of the self-mutilated was also renewed by the Council of Arles, A.D. 452 (c. 7). Pope Gelasius, in his before quoted letter to the Lucanian bishops, recalls as to the self-emasculation that the canons of the Fathers require them to be separated from all clerical functions, as soon as the fact is recognized (Epist. 9, c. 17). It thus appears that this most serious form of mutilation, so long as it was not self-inflicted, was no bar either to clerical ordination or promotion, but that if self-inflicted, it was a bar to the exercise of all clerical functions.

II. Mutilation as a Crime.—An alleged decretal of Pope Eutychianus (275-6) to be found in Gratian, enacts that persons guilty of cutting off limbs were to be separated from the Church until they had made friendly composition (the very idea of composition for such an act was entirely foreign to the Italy of the 3rd century) before the bishop and the other citizens, or, if refusing to do so after two or three warnings, were to be treated as heathen men and publicans. The document may probably safely be set down to the 9th century, but in the meanwhile we find in the records of the 11th Council of Toledo, A.D. 675 (from which it is perhaps borrowed), evidence that similar crimes were committed by the clergy themselves. The 6th canon enacts amongst other things that clerics shall not inflict or order to be inflicted mutilation of a limb on any persons whomsoever. If any do so, either to the servants of their church or to any persons, they shall lose the honour of their order, and be subject to perpetual imprisonment with hard labour. The Excerpt from the Fathers and the Canons attributed to Gregory 111. bears that, for the wilful maiming another of a limb, the penance is to be three years, or more humanely, one year (c. 30). The Capitulary of Aix-la-Chapelle, in 789, c. 16, and the Council of Frankfort, 794, forbid abbots for any cause to blind or mutilate their monks (c. 18)—enactments which sufficiently shew the ferocity of the Carolingian era, and with which may be noticed the 2nd Capitulary of Theodulf, bishop of Orleans, to his clergy, A.D. 797, treating amongst minor sins the maiming of a man so that he shall not die, the reference being at least mainly to clerical maimers.

In the early barbarian codes no difference was made in principle between the various shapes of bodily mutilation, and all cases were punished by pecuniary compensation. But in the later Roman law we find absolute distinction made between emasculation and every other form of mutilation, the former being the only one which it is deemed necessary to legislate against. We have already seen that Constantine had made the former a capital crime, when committed within the Roman world. The 142nd Novel goes further still. Speaking of the crime as having become rife again, it enacts the lex talionis against male offenders, with confiscation of goods and life-long labour in the quarries if they survive the operation; or as respects females, flogging, confiscation and exile. We may probably ascribe to the character of the imperial law on this subject the influence of the Christian Church, which, at the risk of whatever incongruities in its practice, has always treated emasculation as a crime rei generis, analogous only to murder and suicide, according as it is endured or self-inflicted.

III. Mutilation as a Punishment.—Mutilation is no infrequent punishment under the Christian emperors of the West: Constantine punished slaves escaping to the barbarians with the loss of a foot (Cod. 6, tit. 1, s. 3). The cutting off of the hand was enacted by several Novels; by the 17th (c. viii.) against exactors of tribute who should fail to make proper entries of the quantities of lands; by the 33rd (c. 1) against those who should copy the works of the heretic Severus. It is nevertheless remarkable that the 134th Novel finally restricted all penal mutilation to the cutting off of one hand only (c. xiii). In the barbarian codes, mutilation is a frequent punishment. The Saxon law frequently enacts castration of the slave, but only as an alternative for composition (for there above 40 denarii in value, t. xiii), and see also the law for adultery with the slave-woman, and the effects of it, t. xxix. c. 6). The 10th canon in law, by a late enactment (Addit.), supposed to be by Sigismund, extends the mode of dealing to Jews.

Even in the legislation of the Church itself mutilation as a punishment occurs; but only in its rudest outlying branches, or as an offence to be repressed. Thus, to quote instances of the former case, in the collector of Irish Canons, supposed to belong to the end of the 7th cen-

Another fragment from an Irish synod, appended by Labbe and Mansi to the above, enacts the loss of a hand as an alternative punishment for shedding the blood of a bishop, (collyrium) is needed; and no salve when it does reach the ground, and salve is required. Instances of the latter case have been already given in the enactments against abbats at least under pretext of enforcing discipline. In the 'Excerptions' ascribed to Egbert, archbishop of York (but of at least two centuries later date), we find a canon that a man stealing money from the church-box shall have his hand cut off or be put into prison (c. lxxiii.). BOOKS, CENSURE OF. A studious life was strongly enforced upon the clergy by the ancient Fathers, and enjoined by various canons of the earlier Councils. St. Chrysostom in particular insists strongly and very fully on the duty in the clergy of qualifying themselves by patient and laborious study for the office of preaching, and for the defence of the faith against heretics and unbelievers; resting his argument on the exhortation of St. Paul to Timothy (1 Tim. iv. 13)—"Give attendance to reading, to exhortation, to doctrine; meditate upon these things; give thyself wholly to them; that thy profiting may appear to all men." Exhortations to the like effect occur also in the writings of St. Jerome, Cyprian, Lactantius, Hilary, Minucius Felix, and others. In all these writers the study of the Holy Scriptures is urged upon the clergy as being of primary obligation, and the foundation on which all the superstructure of a more general and extensive learning was to be raised. Certain canons also required, e.g. Conc. Tolet. li. c. 7, that in their most vacant hours, the times of eating and drinking, some portion of Scripture should be read to them—partly to exclude trifling and unnecessary discourse, and partly to afford them proper themes and subjects for edifying discourse and meditation.

Next to the Scriptures the study of the best ecclesiastical writers was recommended as most profitable and appropriate to the clerical office; assigned the first place in such writings, however, being were always reckoned of the greatest use and not only of the Church's discipline and doctrine and government, but also rules of life and moral practice—on which account it was ordered that the Canons should be read over at a man's ordination; and again, the Council of Toledo (iv. c. 25) required the clergy to make them a part of their constant study, together with the Holy Scriptures. The Canons, it should be remembered, were then a sort of directory for the pastoral care, and they had this advantage of any private directory, that they were the public voice and authorised rule of the Church, and therefore so much the more entitled to respectful attention. In later ages, in the time of Charlemagne, we find laws which obliged the clergy to read, together with the Canons, Gregory's treatise De Curi Pastoralis.

With regard to other books and writings there was considerable restriction. Some of the canons forbade a bishop to read heathen authors; nor would they allow him to read heretical books, otherwise than as a matter of duty, i.e. unless there was occasion to refute them, or to caution others against the poison of them; e.g. Conc. Carth. iv. c. 16: "Ut episcopus Gentilium libros non legat: hæreticorum autem pro necessitate et tempore."

In some cases, however, the study of heathen literature might be advantageous to the cause of Christian truth; and the Church's prohibition did not extend to these. Thus St. Jerome observes that both the Greek and Latin historians are of great use as well to explain as confirm the truth of the prophecies of Daniel. St. Augustine says of the writings of heathen philosophers, that as they said many things that were true, both concerning God and the Son of God, they were in that respect very serviceable in refuting the vanities of the Gentiles. And in fact all who are acquainted with the Fathers and ancient writers of the Church know them to have been for the most part well versed in the classical or heathen literature.

On the whole it appears that the clergy were obliged in the first place to be diligent in studying the Scriptures, and next to them, as they had ability and opportunity, the canons and approved writers of the Church. Beyond this, as there was no obligation on them to read human learning, so there was no absolute prohibition of it; but where it could be made to minister as a handmaid to divinity, there it was not only allowed, but encouraged and commended; and there can be no doubt that in many instances the cause of Christian religion was advanced by the right application of secular learning in the primitive ages of the Church. The principles on which such studies were maintained are summed up by St. Ambrose, Proem. in Luc. Evang.: "Legimus aliqua, ne leguntur; legimus ne ignodiuemus;" (Bligham). [D. B.]

BOSCI (Boskoi), Syrian monks in the 4th century, so called because they lived on herbs only. Sczomen speaks of them as very numerous near Nisibis, and names a bishop among the most famous of them. They had no buildings but lived on the mountains, continually praying and singing hymns. Each carried a kaulis, with which to cut herbs and grasses (Soc. H. E. vi. 33). A connexion has been traced between them and the sect of Ascetians or Adumitae, who went about naked. The principle is the same—of returning to a state of nature—but the Bosci are not accused, as the Adumitae, of licentiousness; and with them the motive was apparently austere self-mortification. Frequent instances of similar abstinence are recorded of Eastern hermits in Moschus (Prat. Spirit.), Theodoret (Philoth.), and Evagrius (H. E. i. 21). (Tillemont, H. E. viii. 292.) [L. G. BOSTRA, COUNCIL OF, A.D. 243 or 244; instead, there probably were two such: one in which Beryllus, bishop of Bostra, was reclaimed from his strange views respecting the Person of our Lord by Origen; and another at which Origen refuted some Arabians, who said that the souls of men died with their bodies, and came to life with their bodies again at the resurrection (Euseb. vi. 33 and 7; Mansi, i. 787-90). [E. S. F.]

BOURGES, COUNCIL OF (BURIGENSIS CONCILIUM), at Bourges, but (1) A.D. 454, only conjecturally in that city. That there was a council in that year in that neighbourhood appears by a synodical epistle signed by the bishops of Bourges, Tours, and another (Sirmond. Conc. Gall. iii. App. 1507; Labbe, iv. 1819). Hincmar wrongly calls it a Council of Rome, under the mistaken impression that the Leo who signs it was the Pope.—(2) A.D. 473, to elect Simplicius to the see of Bourges (Sidon. Apoll. Epist. vii. 5, 8, 9, &c.); and his oration to the people for Simplicius, Labbe, iv. 1820-1827). Sidonius requests the intervention of Agroecius, archbishop of Sens (although out of his province), and of Euphronius of Autun, the provincial bishops being too few in number. And the "plebs Biturigena" appear to have referred the nomination to Simplicius himself.—(3) A.D. 767, under Pipin, mentioned by Regino and Fredegarius, but with no record of its purpose or acts (Labbe, vi. 1836). BRACARENSE CONCILIUM. [BRAGA, COUNCIL OF.]

between the Minho and Douro. (1) A.D. 411 (if genuine), of ten bishops, to defend the faith against Arians, Suevi, and Vandals, who were either Arians or heathens, under Pausanias of Braga (Labbe, ii. 1507-1510).—(2) A.D. 561 or 563, of eight bishops, "ex precepto Ariamiri (or probably Theodomi) Regis," to condemn the Priscillianists. It passed also twenty-two canons, about uniformity of ritual, church revenues, precedence, burial without and not within a church, and other points of discipline (Labbe, v. 836-845).—(3) A.D. 572, June 1, of twelve bishops, under Archbishops Martin of Braga and Nitigisus of Lucca, under Miro, king of the Suevi, passed ten canons, about bishops exacting undue fees, appointment of metropolitan to proclaim annually the date of Easter, and other points of discipline. It was also the first to use the formula, "regnate Christo" (Labbe, v. 894-902). Mailoc, bishop of Britonia, was one of the bishops present.—(4) A.D. 675, under Archbishop Leocadius, with seven suffragans (including a bishop of Britonia), passed nine canons; prohibiting the giving of milk, or of the bread dipped in the wine, or of grapes instead of wine, at the Eucharist; allowing a priest to have dwelling with him no other woman than his mother, not even his sister; and on other points of discipline (Labbe, vi. 561-570). [A. W. H.]

BRANE, COUNCIL OF (BRANNAGENSIS CONCILIUM), at Braine near Soissons (Berti near Compiègne, acc. to L'Art de Vérifier les Dates, but wrongly), rather a State than a Church Council, held, A.D. 580, under King Chilperic, excommunicated Leudastus (who had been Count of Tours) for falsely accusing Gregory of Tours of having calumniated Queen Fredegunda. Witnesses were not produced, "cunctis dicentibus, non potest persona inferior super sacerdotem credi." And Gregory exculpated himself by solemn oath at three several altars after saying mass, the accusers in the end confessing their guilt (Greg. Tur., Hist. Franc. v. 50; Labbe, v. 965, 966). [A. W. H.]

BRANDEUM. The word Brandemum probably designated originally some particular kind of rich cloth. Thus, Joannes Diaconus (Vita S. Greg. lib. iv., in Du Cange, s. v.) speaks of a lady wearing a head-dress "candidis brandei." But the usages with which we are immediately concerned are the following:—

1. The rich cloth or shroud in which the body of a distinguished saint was wrapped. Thus Hincmar (Vita S. Remigii, c. 73) describing the translation of St. Remigius, says the body was found by the bishops who translated it wrapped in a red brandemum. Compare Feuard, Hist. Remensis, l. 20, 21.

2. Portions of such shrouds were used as relics; for instance, a portion of the red brandemum which enveloped St. Remigius, enclosed in ivory, was venerated with due honour (Hincmar, l. c.).

3. When relics of some saint could be regarded as absolutely essential to the consecration of a church [CONSECRATION], pieces of cloth which had been placed near them were held to be themselves equivalent to relics. St. Gregory the Great sets forth his view of this practice in a letter to Constantia (Epist. lib. vi.). It is not, he says, the Roman custom, in placing relics of saints, to presume to touch any portion of the

The breviary is usually divided into four parts, called after the four seasons of the year, "Pars biennalis, vernalis, nivalis [v. nivalis], autumnalis." When this fourfold division was first adopted is doubtful. Traces of it have been found in the 11th century. Each of these parts, in addition to the introductory rubrics, calendar, and other tables, has four subdivisions: (1) the Psalter [Psalterium], comprising the psalms and canticles arranged according to the order of their weekly recitation, and also other subordinate parts of the office which do not vary from day to day; (2) the Prayer of the Season [Proprium de tempore], containing those portions of the offices which vary with the season; (3) the Prayer of the Saints [Proprium Sanctorum]; i. e., the corresponding portions for the festivals of saints; and (4) the Communion of the Saints. BRIBERY. The Old Testament is so full of warnings against "the gift" that "blindeth the wise, and perverteth the works of the righteous" (Ex. xxiii. 8), of denunciations of those that "judge for reward" (Micah iii. 11), that we could not expect otherwise than to find the like teachings embodied in the more spiritual morality of the New Testament. It may indeed be a question whether the qualification required of bishops and deacons by the Pastoral Epistles, that they should not be "given to filthy lucre" (αἰσχροπρεβείας), 1 Tim. iii. 3, 8; Tit. i. 7, implies proneness to bribery, properly so called, or covetousness generally. If, however, we reckon the Apostolical Constitutions as representing generally the Church life of the 2nd century, we see that the offence was then beginning to take shape. The bishop is directed not to be open to receive gifts, since unconscious men "becoming acceptors of persons, and having received shameful gifts" will spare the sinner, letting him remain in the Church (bk. ii. c. 9). Another passage speaks of either the bishops or the deacons sinning by the acceptance of persons or of gifts, with the addition of the remarkable words: "For when the ruler asks, and the judge receives, judgment is not brought to an end" (ib. c. 17). A third deals with the still more heinous offence of condemning the innocent for reward, threatening with God's judgment the "pastors" and deacons who, either through acceptance of persons or in return for gifts, expel from the Church those who are falsely accused (ib. c. 42).

There was of course nothing exceptional in this morality. In the Roman law there were numerous enactments against bribery. Theodosius enacted the penalty of death against all judges who took bribes (Cod. Theod. v, tit. 27, s. 5). In Justinian's time, although the penalty of death seems to have been abrogated, the offence is subjected to degrading punishments (Nov. viii., cxxiv.).

The law of the Church on the subject of bribery was substantially that of the State. The spiritual sin was looked upon as equivalent to the civil offence, and the Church needed no special discipline to punish the former. One form of bribery indeed, that relating to the attainment of the orders or dignities of the Church, is considered separately under the head of SIMONY.

BRIDAL RING. That the present use of the ring in marriage has grown out of its use in betrothal, is historically clear. The origin of the latter is, however, obscure, though probably it is the meeting-point of several different ideas and practices. If marriage was originally wife-catching, as seems probable, the ring may be considered as the symbol of the wife's captivity. Again, before money was invented, or before its use became common, a ring would be one of the aptest representatives of wealth, and as such would easily constitute either the actual price of betrothal, or the earnest of it; whilst we know that in some countries the ring has actually taken the place of money, e. g. the "ring-money" of our Teutonic forefathers. Again, as signet-rings came into use, the ring itself would easily grow to be looked upon as a pledge of contracts, a symbol of faith between man and man. Lastly, as men's feelings became more refined, the idea of the ring, (1st) as a symbol of the wife's subjection, (2nd) as the price, or the symbol of the price, of her purchase, (3rd) as the pledge of the contract for her person, would lose itself in that of its spiritual significance as a symbol of endless indissoluble union.

It is certain, at any rate, that the bridal ring of early Christian custom was not derived from Jewish practice, since it appears clearly that its use by way of earnest on betrothal among the Jews was of late introduction, derived from the Gentiles, and depended for its validity on the ring being worth money [ARRHAE]. But the early Christians, as above indicated, found it in use among the Romans, unconnected (as was ordinary marriage itself) with any superstitious practices, and naturally adopted it. Tertullian uses the term annulus metonymically for betrothal itself, in that passage of his treatise on idolatry, in which, examining what transactions among the Gentiles a Christian man may lawfully take part in, he decides that betrothals are among the number, since "the ring" is not derived from the honour paid to any idol (c. 16). The same author shews in his Apology that by his time the use of gold for the betrothal ring must have long replaced that of iron, since he speaks of the woman of old knowing "no gold, save on one finger," which her betrothed "oppignorasset pronubo nunulo" (c. 6), with which may be compared Juvenal's "digito pignus fortasse delicti" (Sat. vi. 17).

It will be obvious from the last two passages that the main significance of the betrothal ring in the early centuries of the Christian era was that of a pledge. Hence its abiding significance as representing the arrhæ. Its value in this respect was by no means confined to the betrothal contract; thus in the Digest, Ulpian, in reference to the arrhæ on an ordinary contract of sale, puts the case of a ring being given by way of earnest and not returned after the payment of the price and delivery of the thing sold (Dig. 19, tit. 1, s. 11, § 6; with which compare 14, tit. 3, s. 15).

There is the expression "a well-known Ambrose, with the governor marry his son" "given her (annulo fidelis)

As late as the ring was constit rage. This is a to the Bulgarian future bridegroom of the Crown, which would answer to a Bull. It may be added that a Brief may be suppressed, as it is not issued in the same open form as a Bull; and there are, it is said, instances of Briefs being suppressed altogether. It may also be cancelled or superseded by a subsequent Brief, whereas a Bull can be cancelled only by a Bull. For the most part also a Brief is of less extensive application than a Bull, the latter being sometimes binding on the entire Christian world in communion with Rome.

It must be stated, however, that some of the particulars just specified, though characteristic of Bulls and Briefs at this day and for a long period, are not observed in very early documents. Thus, for instance, in the Liber Diurnus Romanorum Pontificum, a work probably of the 8th century (printed in Migne's Patrologiæ Cursum Completus, vol. xv.) forms of commencements of Papal letters are given, in which the name of the Pope follows instead of preceding that of the great person to whom the letter is addressed.

Thus to a Patrician the letter begins "Domino excellentissimo, atque præcellentissimo filio [name] patricio, [name of Pope] Episcopus servus servorum Dei." And to the archbishop of Ravenna—"Reverendissimo et Sanctissimo fratri [name of archbishop] Coepiscopo, [name of Pope] servus servorum Dei." And even to a Presbyter we have—"Dilectissimo filio [name of presbyter], [name of Pope] servus servorum Dei." In a Dissertation annexed to the edition of the Liber Diurnus of 1860, the Jesuit Gesner states that the custom of putting the Pope's name first does not seem to have come in until about the 9th century. It will thus probably be nearly contemporaneous with the appearance of the Forged Decretals, and will appropriately mark the era when the Popes first put forward regal and ultra-regal pretensions.

The Councils called "Britannica," in Cave, Wilkins, Labbe, &c., are either those above named (mostly misdated and incorrectly described), or are pure fables; while Cave has chosen to add to them the Northumbrian Synod of Ousestreth of A.D. 702, which see under its proper title. [A. W. II.]

BROTHERHOOD. The origin of brotherhoods or fraternities in the Christian Church and world, whether clerical, lay, or mixed, is far from being satisfactorily ascertained. The history of monastic fraternities will be found under their appropriate headings, though we may here remark that the formation of such fraternities was in direct opposition to the very impulse which produced monachism itself, and sent the monachos, or solitary, as a 'hermit' into the wilderness (ερημους). Yet such fraternities were practically in existence in the Egyptian lousae, when Serapion could rule over a thousand monks; they received their first written constitution from St. Basil (328-379), and both Basil and Jerome (who had himself been a hermit) having declared their disapproval of solitary monachism, the social or fraternal type must be considered to have become fully impressed on the monastic system during the course of the 4th and 5th centuries.

Dr. Brechtius, in his work On the History and Development of Guilds (London, Triibner, 1870), expresses indeed the opinion "that the religious brotherhoods of the middle ages, and as they still exist in Catholic countries, have their origin in a connexion with monasticism, and in an imitation of it . . . and that this origin is to be sought in Southern lands, in which Christianity and monasticism were first propagated" (p. 9). If this be so, it must be admitted that the imitation was almost coeval with its model, for he himself ascribes to the 3rd century—the age of the Egyptian hermits—the "Christian brotherhood for nursing the sick" of the Parabolani,—whose Muratori was the first to point out as a sort of religious fraternity, in opposition to various writers quoted by him (in the 75th Dissertation of his Antiquitates Medii Aevi, vol. vi.), who had held that such fraternities date only from the 9th or even the 12th centuries. [PARABOLANI.] Muratori also suggests that the lectarii or decani, who are mentioned in the Code (1 tit. 2, s. 4), and in Justinian's 43rd and 50th Novels, by the latter as fulfilling certain functions at funerals, must have been a kind of religious fraternity. On the other hand, the old sedulitas, or its equivalent the Greek φρατρια (henceforth Latinized as "phratría" or "fratéria"), appears to have become more and more discredited, since the 18th century of the Council of Chalcedon (A.D. 451) requires the cutting off of all clerics or monks forming "conjuraciones vel sedalitates" (Isidore Mercator translates "phratris vel factiones"); for if "the crime of conspiracy or of sedulitas is wholly forbidden even by external laws, much more should it be so in God's Church." A decree of the Vandal king Gunlemar (to be found in the 10th vol. of Labbe and Mansi's Councils, p. 510), about A.D. 610, directed to the priests of the city of Carthage, speaks in like manner of fratris et conjurationis against the Metropolitan Church. So again the 6th Ecumenical Council, that of Constantinople in Trullo, A.D. 680-1, has a canon (34) against clerics or monks επισημασμενοι η φρατριας (translated "signati conjurationes vel sedalitates inuncte"), who are to lose their rank; and other similar enactments could be adduced.

In the 8th century we find a disposition on the part of the Church to confine the idea of fraternity to clerical and monastic use. We may take as an instance of this in our own country the 'Dialogue by question and answer on Church government' of Archbishop Egbert of York (middle of the century), in which the terms frater and soror will be found applied both to clerics and monks or nuns, but never apparently to laymen. But there is at the same time ground for surmising that the term "fraternity," which in the 12th and 13th centuries is used ordinarily as a synonym for "guild," was already current in the 8th century organization, been on the 8th century the bulk usually. The Council has been others as repeated of Arch 852 or 8 of "thos termed co consortia collectis vocant," called gild ful are lights, in dead, in feasts and exactions, quarens, went to clerics dejection from satisfaction.

the 8th or 9th to designate these bodies, the organization of which Dr. Brentano holds to have been complete among the Anglo-Saxons in the 8th century (Brentano on Gilds, pp. 11-12), and the bulk of which were of lay constitution, though usually of a more or less religious character. The connection between the two words is established in a somewhat singular manner. A Council of Nantes of very uncertain date, which has been placed by some as early as 658, by others as late as 800, has a canon (9) which is repeated almost in the same terms in a capitulary of Archbishop Hincmar of Rheims, of the year 852 or 858 (c. 16). But where the canon speaks of "those gatherings or confraternities which are termed consortia (de collectis vel confratris quae consortia vocant)," the archbishop has "de collectis quas gildonias vel confratris vulgo vocant,"—"gatherings which are commonly called gilds or confraternities." Whilst the faithful are authorized to unite "in oblations, in lights, in mutual prayers, in the burial of the dead, in alms and other offices of piety," those feasts and banquets are forbidden, where "undue exactions, shameful and vain merriment and quarrels, often even hatred and dissensions are wont to arise;" the penalty assigned being for clerics deprivation, for laymen or women exclusion from communion till they have given due satisfaction.

But the term "gild" itself was already in use to designate societies for mutual help before the days of a reform. We meet with it in a capitulary of Charlemagne's of the year 779, treated by Caucani and Muratori as enacted for Lombardy, but by Pertz as the contrary (in his Monumenta Germaniae Historica) as enacted for France, which bears "As touching the oaths mutually sworn by a gild (per gildum, Cauc.; gildonia, Pertz), that no one presume to do so. Otherwise as touching their maintenance (alimonia; or "alms," elemosinis, Pertz), or fire, or shipwreck, though they may make covenant (quavis convenientis faciant) let none presume to swear thereto" (see also bk. v. of the general collection, c. 290, "de sacramentis pro gildonia (gildonia) in vicem conjuratum"; and the sacramentum fieri audent.") It is thus clear that the gilds of the latter half of the 8th century existed for purposes exactly the same as those which they fulfilled several centuries later. So far indeed as they were usually sanctioned by oath, they were obviously forbidden by the capitulary above quoted, as well as by several others against "conjurations" and conspiracies which Dr. Brentano refers to from Pertz, the last (the Thionville Capitulary of 805) of a peculiarly treacherous character.

It may be suspected that the subject of religious or quasi-religious brotherhoods or fraternities in the early Church (apart from monastic ones) has been but imperfectly investigated as yet. It may at least be said that specific bodies are found apparently answering to the character, attached to particular churches, during the 3rd, 4th, 5th, and 6th centuries. In the West, however, we seem first to discern them under the feutonic shape of the gild, which in its freer forms was palpably the object of great jealousy to the political and spiritual despots of the Car-

BURIAL OF THE DEAD 251

BUCOLUS, Bishop of Smyrna, consecrated by St. John; commemorated as "Holy Father," Feb. 6 (Cal. Byzant.) [C.]

BULLS. [BRIEFS AND BULLAS.]
HURDGALENSIS CONCILIIUM. [BORDEAUX, COUNCIL OF.]

BURFORD COUNCIL OF (BERGHFORDENSE CONCILIIUM), provincial, "juxta vadium Berghford," at Burford in Oxfordshire, A.D. 685; witnesses a grant by King Hertwald, an under-king of Ethelred of Mercia, to Althelm and the abbey of Malmesbury (charter in Will. Malm. G. P. A. F., and Kemble, Cod. Dipl. 20; the latter correcting the impossible date DCXXXV into DCLXXXV, and thus removing the main objection to the genuineness of the document, which however he still marks as spurious; Haddan and Stubbs, Counc. liii. 169.) [A. W. H.]

BURIAL OF THE DEAD. Among the many points of contrast between the Christian Church and the systems which it supplanted, the treatment of the departed furnished one of the most conspicuous. Side by side with their unexampled hospitality and their austere purity of life, Julian enumerates their care for the burial of the dead as one of the means by which the Christians against whom he strove, had succeeded in converting the Empire (Epist. ad Arsac. lix., Opp. ed. Spahnheim). That which was characteristic of the new faith was not only its belief in the resurrection of the body, but its reverence for that body as sharing in the redemption, and this showed itself in almost every incident connected with the funeral rites.

1. Mode of Burial. In Egypt and in Palestine the Christian Church inherited the practice of embalming. It had prevailed from the earliest period of which we have any record. It had originated in a belief which Christians recognised as analogous to their own (August. Serm. de Div. ex. 12). So the patriarchs and kings of the Old Testament had been interred, so had been their Lord himself. It was natural that those who found the practice in existence should not discard it, even though they no longer looked on it as essential. The language of Tertullian implies that it was in general use in Western Africa (Apol. c. 42); that of Augustine (l. c.) shows that it was adopted in Egypt. In Greece, on the other hand, the dead had been consigned to the funeral pyre, and the ashes collected in an urn of bronze or clay, from the heroic age downward. Rome, which in the earlier days of the Republic had interred its dead, had adopted the Greek usage in the time of Sulla (the dictator is said to have been the first Roman whose body was so disposed of) and had transmitted it to the Empire (Plin. Hist. Nat. vii. 54; Cic. de Legg. ii. 25). Against this usage Christian feeling naturally revolted. Even while contending that no variation in the mode of burial could affect the resurrection of the body, Christian writers protested against cremation as wanting in reverence, and suggesting a denial of the truth which they held so precious. We, they said, "veterem et meliorem consuetudinem humani frequentamus" (Minuc. Felix, Octav. c. 39; August. de Civ. Dei. i. 12, 13). And accordingly, when their persecutors sought to inflict the most cruel outrages on their feelings, they added to the tortures by which they inflicted death, that of burning the bodies of the dead. In this way, they thought, they should rob the Christians of that resurrection which they hoped for, or at least trample on that which they held sacred (Euseb. H. E. v. 1, ad fin.). As a rule, accordingly, it may be held, that interment, with or without embalming, according to local custom or the rank of the deceased, obtained from the first in all Christian Churches.

2. Place of Burial. At first, in the nature of things, it was not in the power of Christians to transgress the laws of the Empire which forbade interment within the walls of cities (Cic. de Legg. ii. 58). The Jewish custom had in this respect agreed with that which prevailed throughout the heathen world, strengthened by the feeling that contact with the graves where the dead reposed brought with it a ceremonial defilement. The tomb of Christ, e.g., was in a garden high unto the city, but outside the gates (Matt. xxvii. 60), and the same holds good of the burial at Nain (Luke vii. 12), and of that of Lazarus (John xi. 30). The demoniac of Gadara had "his dwelling in the tombs," because they were remote from human habitations (Mark v. 5). Commonly, as on the Appian way, and the road from Athens to the Piræus, the strip of ground on each side of the most frequented highway, beginning at the city gate, became the burial-place of citizens. Slaves and foreigners were laid in some less honourable position. The Jews at Rome and in other cities had burial-places of their own.

The wish to avoid contact with idolatrous rites, and to escape interruption and insult in their own funeral ceremonies, would naturally lead Christians to follow the example of the Jews, and to secure, as soon as possible, a place where they could bury their dead in peace. The earliest trace of this feeling is found in an inscription, which records the purchase by Fanstus, a slave of Antonia, the wife of Drusus, from Jacundus, a Christian, of the "jus ultimum," the right, i.e. of burying the remains of the dead in a columbarium. The Christian, i.e. will no longer burn the bodies of those for whom he cares, nor have his own body to be burnt, but sells his interest in the pagan sepulchre, and provides another for himself (Muratori Inscr. xviii. 6). So in like manner Cyprian (Ep. 68) makes it a special charge against Marcellus, bishop of Astura, that he had allowed his sons to be "apud profana sepulera depositos." During the long periods in which they were exempt from persecution, they were allowed in many cities to possess their burial-grounds in peace. At Carthage, e.g., they had their areæ, and it was only in a time of popular fury that their right to them was disputed (Tertull. ad Scap. c. 3). At Alexandria they had what they had been the first to call κοιμητήρια, and it was not till the persecution under Valerian and Gallienus that they were forbidden to have access to them (Euseb. H. E. vii. 11). [CEMETERY.] Soon afterwards, however, they must have been restored, as we find Diocletian and Maximian again closing them. Special edicts of this nature are, of course, exceptions that prove the rule. Where, as at Rome, Naples, and Milan, the nature of the soil lent itself readily to subterraneous interment, this was sought at as giving at once the privacy and security which the Christians needed. As Christianity spread, it was not difficult, by payment or by favour—often, perhaps, through a secret sympathy—to obtain from the owners of the land which was thus excavated a prescriptive right to its use; and, as a matter of fact, the sanctity of the catacombs never seems to have been violated. [CATACOMBS.] Whatever other purposes they might serve, as meeting-places or refuges, this was, beyond question, their primary and most lasting use.

During persecution, especially in localities where there was not the facility for concealment presented by the catacombs, the Christians had, of course, to bury their dead as they could. When the conversion of Constantine restored free liberty of choice, the places which had been made sacred by the bodies of saints and martyrs were naturally sought after. The tomb became the nucleus of a basilica. The devout Christian wished to be helped by the presence and protection of the martyr (August. de Civit. ger. pro Mort. c. 1 and 7). The phrases POSITUS AD SANCTOS, AD MARTYRES, are found frequently on monumental inscriptions in Italy and Gaul (Le Blant, Inscriptions Chrétiennes, i. 83). Gradually, through the influence of this feeling, the old Roman practice of extramural interment fell into disuse. Burial within the basilica was reserved for persons of the highest rank. Constantine was the first to set the example, and was followed by Theodosius and Honorius (Chrysost. Hom. 26 in 2 Cor.). The distinction was eagerly sought after, and the desire to obtain it had to be placed under restrictions both by imperial laws, as by those of Valentinian and Gratian, and by the canons of councils (Cenc. Bracer, A.D. 563, c. 18). During the transition period many cities seem to have adhered to the old plan, and to have refused their sanction to any intramural interment (ibid.). Where that sanction was given, the precincts of the church, sometimes its atrium or courtyard, where it was constructed after the type of a basilica, became the favourite spot. In the 9th century Gregory of Tours supplies the first instance of a formal consecration of a churchyard for such a purpose (De Glor. Confess. c. 6). A special prohibition against the use of the baptistery for interments is found in Gaul about the same period (Cenc. Antissiod. c. 14).

FUNERAL RITES. The details of Christian burial present, as might be expected, points both of resemblance and contrast to heathen practices. Wherever the usage was the expression of natural reverence or love, there it was adopted. Where it was connected with any pagan superstition it was carefully avoided.

(1.) Starting from the moment of death, the first act of the by-standers, of the nearest of kin who might be present, was to close the eyes and mouth of the corpse (Euseb. H. E. vii. 22). Among the Romans this had been followed by reopening the eyes when the body was placed upon the pyre (Plin. Nat. Hist. xi. 37), probably as symbolizing the thought that though they had ceased to look upon the world which they were leaving, they were yet on the point of passing to another state of being where they would see and be seen again. Of this latter custom we have no trace in Christian history. Then followed the washing, the anointing, sometimes the embalming. In the society around them this made it a work of even for vii. 22).

them this had been left to the pollinutores, who made it their business. With Christians it was a work of love, done for friends and kindred, or even for strangers and the poor (Euseb. H. E.
 vii. 22).

(2.) In Palestine and throughout the East generally interment followed upon death after an interval of a few hours, during which the hired mourners made their lamentations (Matt.
 ix. 23; 2 Cor. xiii. 25; Jerem. xxii. 18).
 This was due in part, of course, to the rapidity with which decomposition sets in under such a climate, but still more to the feeling common to both Jew and heathen, that the presence of the dead body brought defilement to the house and its inmates. Here also Christian thought shewed itself in contrast, and the interval between death and burial was gradually prolonged to three or four days. The body was swathed in white linen, sometimes with the insignia of office, or with ornaments of gold and gems, placed in the coffin or sarcophagus, and laid out, sometimes in the chamber of death, sometimes in the church, that friends might come and weep and take their last look (Euseb. Vit. Conat. iv. 64, 67; Ambros.
Orat. in obit. Theodos.; August. Conf. ix. 12).
 Vigils were held over it, accompanied by prayers and hymns. Hired mourners, like those of the East or the præfatos of the Romans, were not allowed.

(1.) The feeling that a funeral was a thing of evil omen for the eye to fall on led the Romans to choose night as the time for interment.^a The Christian Church, on the contrary, as soon as it was able to develop itself freely, and was free from the risk of outrage, chose the day, and gave to the funeral procession somewhat of the character of a triumph. The coffin was borne on the shoulders of the nearest friends and kinsmen. Where, as in the case of Paula (Hieron. Ep. 27 ad Eustoch.), honour was to be shewn to some conspicuous benefactor of the Church, it was carried by the bishops and the clergy. The leading clergy of a diocese took their place as bearers at the funeral of a bishop, as, e. g., in that of St. Basil (Greg.
Naz. Orat. xx. p. 371). They and the others who took part in the ceremonial carried in their hands branches, not of the funeral cypress, as among Greeks and Romans, but of palm and olive, as those who celebrate a victory. Leaves of the cypress were and Ivy were placed in the coffin
 in token of the hope of immortality (Durand.
Rit. Div. off. vii. 35). Others, again, in like token of Christian joy, carried lighted lamps or torches (Chryso. Hom. IV. in Hebr.; Greg. Nyss. Vit.
Maria. ii. p. 201). The practice of crowning the head with a wreath of flowers was rejected,^b partly as tainted with idleness, partly as associated with riotous revels or shameless effeminacy (Clem. Alex. 1 aed. ii. 8; Tertull. de Cor. Milit.
 c. 19), but flowers were scattered freely over the bier. Others, again, carried thuribles, and fragrant clouds of incense rose as in a Roman

^a Julian, in his edict against the practice of funeral procession, occasioned by those which had been held at Antioch in honour of the martyr Bahyas, falls back upon the old superstition: "Qui enim dies est bene ali-quis a funere? Aut quomodo ad Deos est templa venturum."—Cod. Theod. ix. tit. 17, l. 5.

^b The denial of what had come to be a recognized mark of honour was turned in the earlier ages of the Church into a ground of attack. "Coronas etiam seputchris triumph (Baron. Annal. Act. 310, n. 10; Chrysost. Hom. cxvi. l. 6). Nor did they march in silence, but chanted as they went hymns of hope and

 joy. "Right dear in the sight of the Lord is the death of His saints;" "Turn again unto thy rest, O my soul, for the Lord hath rewarded thee;" "The souls of the righteous are in the hand of God"—were among the favourite anthemns (Const. Apost. vi. 50; Chryso. Hom.
 30, de Dorm.). Bells were not tolled till the eighth or ninth century, nor can the practice of carrying the cross in the procession be traced beyond the sixth (Greg. Turon. Vit. Patr. c. 14).
 When they reached the grave, hymns and prayers were renewed, and were followed by an address from the bishop or priest.^c

(4.) Either in the church or at the grave it was customary, as early as the fourth century,
 to have a celebration of the eucharist in token of the communion that still existed between the living and the dead. (23 C. Carth. iii. c. 29).
 With this were united special prayers for the soul of the departed. The priest first, and afterwards the other friends, gave the corpse the last kiss of peace (Dionys. Arcep. Hierarch. Eccles. c. 7). For some centuries, in spite of repeated prohibitions by councils of the Church, the practice prevailed, in Western Africa, in Gaul, in the East, of placing the consecrated bread itself, steeped in the wine, within the lips of the dead (C. Carth. iii. c. 6;
 vi. c. 83; C. Antissiod. c. 12; C. Trullan. c. 133).
 Another practice, that of burying the Eucharistic bread with the dead, though not between the lips, had a higher sanction. St. Basil is reported, on one occasion, after consecration, to have divided the Eucharist into three parts, and to have reserved one to be buried with him (Amphilochius in Spicileg. vii. p. 81); and St. Benedict, in like manner, ordered it to be laid upon the breast of a young monk, as he was placed in the grave.
 (Greg. Vitaley. ii. 24; cf. Martene de Ant.
Eccles. Rit. i. 162, ed. 1.) The old Latin traces of the Agape and the Supper of the Lord left traces of itself here also, and the Eucharist was followed by a meal, ostensibly of brotherhood, or as an act of bounty to the poor, but often passing into riotous excess (August. de Mor. Eccl. c. 34).

When the body was lowered into the grave it was with the face turned upwards, and with the feet towards the east, in token of the sure and certain hope of the coming of the Sun of Righteousness and the resurrection of the dead (Chryso. Hom. cxvi. t. vi.). Other positions, such as sitting or standing, were exceptions to the general rule (Arringh. Roma sub. c. 16,
 p. 33). The insignia of office, if the deceased had held any such position—gold and silver ornaments, in the case of private persons—were often flung into the open grave, and the waste and ostentation to which this led had to be checked by an imperial edict (Cod. Theodos. xi.
 tit. 7, l. 14), which does not appear, however, to have been very rigidly enforced. The practice

^c denegata is the language of the heathen in the Oecumenicus of Minucius Felix; and the Christian in his reply acknowledges "nec mortuus coronatus" (c. xii. xxxviii).
 Flowers were however scattered over the grave (Prædent. Cathermerinon. x. 177).

^d The funeral orations of Eusebius at the death of Constantine, of Ambrose on that of Theodosius, are the most memorable instances; but we have also those of Gregory of Nazianzum on his father, brother, and sister.

retained in our English service, of a solemn prayer while the first handful of earth are thrown upon the coffin, is not traceable to any early period. In the Greek Euchologion the earth is cast in by the bishop or priest himself. When the grave was closed the service ended with the Lord's Prayer and Benediction.

There were, however, subsequent rites connected more or less normally with the burial. On the third day, on the ninth, and on the fortieth, the friends of the deceased met and joined in psalms or hymns and prayers (Const. Apost. viii. c. 42).

The feeling that death in the case of those who fell asleep in Christ was a cause not for lamentation but for thanksgiving, shewed itself lastly in the disuse of the mourning apparel which was common among the Romans, of the ashes and rent garments, which were signs of sorrow with the Jews. Instead of black clothes, men were to wear the dress which they wore at feasts. The common practice was denounced as foreign to the traditions and the principles of the Christian Church (Cyprian, de Mortal. p. 115; August. Serm. 2, de Consol. Mort.). Here, however, the natural feeling was too strong to be thrust out, and gradually the old signs of a sorrow, which could not but be felt, even though it were blended with hope, made their way into use again.

It was characteristic of the religious care with which the Church regarded every work connected with the burial of the dead, that even those whose tasks were of the lowest kind, the grave-diggers (κατάρατα, fossarii), the sandaliarii, and others, whose functions corresponded to those of the undertaker's men in our own time, were not merely a class doing their work as a trade, but were reckoned as servants of the Church, and as such took their place as the lowest order of the clergy.

The more developed and formal ritual of interment in the Eastern Church is given at some length by the Pseudo-Dionysius the Areopagite, and contained, as its chief elements, the following:—(1) The body was brought to the bishop or priest by the next of kin, that he might offer thanksgiving as for one who had fought the good fight, and the relations sang triumphant and rejoicing hymns. (2) The deacons recited the chief Scriptural promises of the resurrection and of eternal life, and sang creeds and hymns of like tenor. (3) The catechumens were then dismissed, and the archdeacon spoke to the faithful who remained, of the bliss of the departed, and exhorted them to follow their example. (4) The priest then prayed that the deceased might find a resting-place with Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob in the land where sorrow and sighing should flee away. (5) The bishop, followed by the kindred or friends, then gave the corpse the kiss of peace. (6) When this was over, the bishop poured oil upon the dead body, and it was then placed in the grave. The anointing of baptism was to prepare the athlete for his conflict; that of burial was a token that the conflict was over, and the combatant at rest: (Eccles. Hierarch. vii. p. 355.)

(847-855) is also reported by the same authority to have placed in the church of St. Peter, "butronem ex argento purissima, qui pendet in presbyterio ante altare, pensantem libr. clix"; and another, also of pure silver, "cum gematis argenteis pendentibus in catenulis septem."

These buttones seem to have been suspended cups used for lamps. CAESAREA, COUNCILS OF. (1) In Palestine, A.D. 196, according to Cave (Hist. Lit. i. 87) on the Easter controversy that had arisen between Pope Victor and the churches of Asia Minor.—Narcissus of Jerusalem, Theophilus of Caesarea, Cassius of Tyre, and Clarus of Ptolemais being present, as we learn from Eusebius (v. 25). They beg, in what he has preserved of their letter, to be understood as keeping Easter on the same day as the Church of Alexandria. But, curiously enough, several versions of the acts of this Council have been discovered in the West, beginning with that ascribed to Bede (Nicene's Patrol. xc. 607; comp. Mansi i. 711-716) at much greater length: the only question is, are they in keeping with the above letter? (2) In Palestine (Mansi ii. 1122), summoned A.D. 331, to inquire into the truth of some charges brought against St. Athanasius by his enemies, but not held till 334, when he was further accused of having kept the Council appointed to try them, waiting thirty months. He seemed too well to what party the bishop of the diocese, and father of ecclesiastical history, belonged, to appear even then; and on his non-appearance, proceedings had to be adjourned to the Council of Tyre the year following.

(3) In Palestine, A.D. 357 or 358 apparently, under Acacius its Metropolitan, when St. Cyril of Jerusalem was deposed (Soz. iv. 25). Sozomenes (ii. 40) adds that he appealed from its sentence to a higher tribunal, a course hitherto without precedent in canonical usage; and that his appeal was allowed by the emperor.

(4) In Pontus, or Neocaesarea, A.D. 358, according to Pagi (Mansi iii. 291), at which Eustathius, bishop of Sebaste, was deposed; and Melatius, afterwards bishop of Antioch, set in his place.

(5) In Cappadocia, A.D. 370 or 371, when St. Basil was constituted bishop in the room of Eusebius, its former Metropolitan, whom he had been assisting some years, though he had been ordained deacon by St. Meletius. The Libellus Synodiensis, a work of the ninth century (Mansi i. 25, note) makes St. Basil anathematise Dianius, the predecessor of his own predecessor at this synod; but St. Basil himself (Ep. li. al. lxxxvi.) denies ever having done so. Further on in his epistles (xviii. al. cclix.) he seems to speak of another synod about to be held in his diocese, to settle the question of jurisdiction between him and the Metropolitan of Tyana, consequent on the division of Cappadocia by the civil power into two provinces. St. Basil stood upon his ancient rights: but eventually the matter was compromised, as we learn from his friend St. Gregory (Orat. xl. iii. § 59 al. xx.), by the erection of more sees in each, the carrying out of which, however beneficial to their country, proved so nearly fatal to their friendship. The date assigned to this Council by Mansi (iii. 453) is A.D. 372. [E. S. FF.]

CALCHUTHENSE CONCILIIUM. [CALCHUTHIE.]

CALCULATORES, or according to Portz, CAUCULATORES, casters of horoscopes. This term does not appear to figure in church history till the time of Charlemagne. An ecclesiastical capitulary of 789, dated from Aix-la-Chapelle, referring to the precepts of the Pentateuch against witchcraft and sorcery, enacts that "there shall be no calculators, nor enchanters, nor storm-raisers (tempestarii), or obdignatores (?); and wherever they are, let them amend or be condemned"—the punishment being apparently left to the discretion of the judge (c. 64). The term figures again, and in much the same company, in a similar enactment contained in certain "Capitula Excerpta" of the year 802, also dated from Aix-la-Chapelle (c. 40). [J. M. L.]

CALENDAR (Kalendarien, Comptus, Distributio Officiorum per circuli totius anni, μηναιον χρονιακον, ημερολογιον, εφημερις; later, καλενταριον). It does not belong to this article to treat of the calendar except in its ecclesiastical form as used for liturgical purposes during the first eight centuries of the Christian era. The early Christian communities continued to use the mode of reckoning and naming days and years which existed in the countries in which they had their origin. The distinctive church calendar exists for the purpose of denoting the days, either of a given year, or of any year, which are marked for religious celebration.

First among these liturgical requirements is the specification of the Lord's Day. This was facilitated by a contrivance borrowed from the heathen Roman calendar. [SUNDAY LETTER.]

But together with the week of seven days, of which the first day or Sunday was assigned to the celebration of the Lord's Resurrection, there existed from the earliest times a yearly commemoration which, eventually, by general consent of the churches, at first divided on this point (EASTER), was assigned to the Sunday next after the day on which, according to certain calculations, the Jews were, or should have been, celebrating their Passover, that is, the day of the full moon nearest to the vernal equinox. Hence the year of the Christian calendar is partly solar of the Julian form, partly lunar. All the Sundays which are related to Easter, i.e. all from our Septuagesima Sunday to the last Sunday after Trinity, change their places year by year; the rest, i.e. from 1 Advent to the Sunday before Septuagesima shifting only to a place one day later; in leap-years, two. About the middle of the 4th century, the Nativity of Christ, until then commemorated, if at all, on the 6th January, was fixed to the 25th December [CHRISTMAS]. And as other days, commemorative of bishops, martyrs, and apostles came to be celebrated, these also were noted in the fixed calendar.

The calendar existed in two forms: one, in which all the days of the year were noted, with specification of months and weeks; the other, a list of the holy days, with or without specification of the month date. Of the full calendar, what seems to be the earliest extant specimen is furnished by a fragment of a Gothic calendar, composed, probably, in Thrace in the 4th century, edited by Müll, Script. vet. nova collectio, v. i. 69-68. Comp. de Gabelentz, Urkunden, ii. 1, p. xvii. Kraft, Kirch. Gesch. der germanischen Völker, i. 1, 371, 385-387. This fragment gives only the thirty-eight days from 23 October to 30 November. It assigns the festivals of seven saints, two of the New Testament, three of the Universal Church, two local, namely Gothic. Not less ancient, perhaps, is a Roman calendar, of the time of Constantine II., forming part of a collection of chronographical pieces written by the calligrapher, Furius Dionysius Filocalus, in the year 354; edited, after others, by Kollar, Analekt. Vinobona, i. 191, sqq. This, while retaining the astronomical and astrological notes of the old Roman calendars, with some of the heathen festivals, is so far Christian that, side by side with the old nundinal letters A—H, it gives also the dominical letters A—G, of the ecclesiastical year; but it does not specify any of the Christian holy days. (Comp. Ideler, Handb., 2, 140.) Next in point of antiquity is the calendar composed by Ptolemy Silvius, in the year 448, edited by the Hollandists, Acta Sincletorum Januar. vii. 176 ff. This is a full Roman calendar adapted to Christian use, not only as that of A. D. 354, just noticed, by specification of the Lord's Days, but with some few holy days added, namely, four in connexion with Christ, and six for commemoration of martyrs.

Of the short calendar, the most ancient specimen is that which was first edited by Bucherius, de Doctrina Temporum, c. xv. 206 sqq (Antwerp, 1634)—a work of Roman origin dating from about the middle of the 4th century, as appears from the contents, as also from the fact that it is included in the collection of Filocalus, thence edited by Kollar, o. s.; also with a learned commentary by Lambecius, Catal. Codd. MSS. in Biblioth. Casar. Vinobon. iv. 277 ff, and by Graevius Theas. viii. It consists of two portions, of which the first is a list of twelve popes from Lucius to Julius (predecessor of Liberius), A. D. 253-352; not complete, however, for Sixtus (Xystus) has his place among the martyrs, and Marcellus is omitted. The other part gives names and days of twenty-two martyrs, all Roman, including besides Xystus, those of earlier popes, Fabianus, Callistus, and Pontianus. Together with these, the Feast of the Nativity is noted on 25th December, and that of the Cathedra Petri assigned to 22nd February.

A similar list of Roman festivals with a lectionary (Capitulare Evangeliorum totius anni) was edited by Fronto (Paris, 1652, and in his Epistolae et Dissert. ecclesiasticae, p. 107-233, Veron. 1733), from a manuscript written in letters of gold, belonging to the convent of St. Geneviève at Paris. This seems to have been composed in the first half of the 8th century. Another, also Roman, edited by Martene, Theas. Analekt. v. 65, is perhaps of later date.

A calendar of the church of Carthage, of the like form, discovered by Mabillon, by Ruinart appended to his Acta Martyrum, is by them assigned to the 5th century. It contains only festivals of bishops and martyrs, mostly local. It opens with the title, "Hic continentur dies natalium martyrum depositiones episcoporum que ecclesie Carthaginis anniversaria celebrant."

As each church had its own bishops and martyrs, each needed in this regard (i.e. for the days marked for the Depositiones Episcoporum and Natalitia Martyrum) its separate calendar. It belonged to the bishop to see that these lists were properly drawn up for the use of the church. And to this effect we find St. Cyprian in his 36th epistle exhorting his clergy to make known to him the days on which the confessors suffered. "Dies eorum, quibus excedunt, nunciate ut commemorationes eorum inter memorias martyrum celebrare possimus. Quoniam Tertullus . . . scripsit et scribit et dignificet mihi dies, quibus in carcere beati fratris nostri ad immortalitatem gloriose mortis citus transeunt, et celebrentur hic a nobis oblationes et sacrificia ob commemorationes eorum." of these calendar notices grew the MARTYROLOGIES which, however, they greatly surpass in authority and importance. For the calendar, being essential as a liturgical directory, was therefore composed only by the bishop or by some high officer of the church appointed by him. Nothing could be added to, or altered in, the calendar but by his authority. It was accordingly prefixed or appended to the Sacramentaries and other liturgical books. As an example of an early form of this liturgical Resp. no. i. de an I. Antiphona ascribed to St. Gregory the Great (ed. Thomasinus):—

A knowledge of the calendar, being indispens- able for the due performance of the liturgy, was one of the essential qualifications for the priestly office. It is a frequent injunction in the capitula of bishops, "presbyteri computum discant." A canon of the council of Aix-la-Chapelle, A.D. 789, c. 70, and the Capitula Interregationis, A.D. 811, of Charlemagne, l. 68, enjoin (with n-ew to the supply of qualified persons) "ut scholae legentium puerorum fiant, psalmus, notae, cantum, computum, grammaticam discant." For instruction in this department of civil education and ecclesiastical learning, An elaborate work of this kind is the de Computo of Rabanus Maurus, archbishop of Mayence (A.D. 847), edited by Baluzius, Miscellan. t. i. p. 1. Early, on the feast of Epiphany, the bishop announced the date of Easter for that year, as enjoined et. c. by the 4th Council of Orleans, A.D. 511, can. 1 (Brius, ii. 201); and from him the clergy, together with this announcement, received notice of any new festival appointed, in order that the same might be entered in their calendar, and made known to the people.

It results, partly from these subsequent additions made to the original texts of the calendars, which cannot always be discriminated in the ink, and other palaeographical criteria, that it is not always easy to say to what age, or to what province of the Church, a given calendar belongs. It is doubtful whether any of them contains the genuine materials of such lists existing in times earlier than the beginning of the 4th century. For of these lists, scarcely any can be supposed to have escaped, in the Diocletian persecution, from the rigorous search then decreed for the general destruction not only of the copies of the Scriptures, but of all liturgical and ecclesiastical documents, among which the calendars, lists of bishops and martyrs, and acts of martyrs, held an important place (Euseb. H. E. viii. 2; Arnob. adv. Gentes, iv. 36). Some rules, how- ever, which may help to determine the relative antiquity of extant calendars, may be thus sum- marized, chiefly from Binterim, Denkwürdig- keiten, v. i. 20, sqq. :—

1. Brevity and simplicity in the statement concerning the holy-day are characteristic of the earlier times. Only the name of the martyr was given, without title or eulogy; even the prefix S. or B. (sanctus, beatus) is sparingly used. Sometimes the martyrs of a whole province are included under a single entry. Thus the Calendar of Carthage, in which eighty-one days are marked, has, at 2 Kal. Jan. sanctorum Fundanionum; 15 Kal. Aug. SS. Nictimorum. In several other calendars, one name is given, with the addition, et sociorum (or comitantum), ejus.

2. To one day only one celebration is assigned in the oldest calendars. "Commemorations" were unknown or very rare in the earlier times. These seem to have come into use in the 9th century, by reason of the increasing number of saints' days.

3. The relative antiquity of a calendar is especially indicated by the paucity, or entire absence, of days assigned to the B. Virgin Mary. Writers of the Church of Rome satisfy themselves in respect of this fact with the explanation, that the days assigned to the Lord include the commemoration of the Blessed Virgin Mother. Thus, for example, Morcelli (Afr. Christiana, cited by Binterim, u. s. p. 14) ac- counts for the entire silence of the Calendar of Carthage concerning the days of the V. Mary; and the like explanation is given of the fact that of St. Augustine we have no sermon preached for a festival of the Virgin.

4. Another note of antiquity is the absence of all saints' days and other celebrations from the period during which Lent falls. Thus March and April in the Carthaginian Calendar exhibit no such days; and the like blank appears in the calendars of Bucherus and Fronto. For the 51st canon of the Council of Laodicea (cir. A.D. 352) enjoins: ὅτι οὐ δεῖ ἐν τεσσαρακοντῇ μαρτύρων γενέσθαι ἑπιπέσειν ἄλλα τῶν ἁγίων μαρτύρων μνηταὶν κωνὴν ἐν ταῖς σαββάτοις τοῖ

κατακτάς: "a martyr's day must not be kept during the quadragesima, but must (at that time) be reserved for sabbaths and Lord's-days" (Bruns, i. 78). And with this agreed the rule of the Latin Church, as expressed in the 1st canon of the 10th Council of Toledo, A.D. 656 (Bruns, i. 298), where, with especial reference to the falling of Lady-day (F. of Annunciation, 25 Mar.) in Lent, or on Easter-day itself, it is said: "eodem festivitas non potest celebrari condigne, cum intermedium quadragesime dies vel paschale festum videtur incumbere, in quibus nihil de sanctorum solemnitatibus, sicut ex antiquitate regulari cautum est, convenit celebrari."

5. Before the 5th century, no day of canonised bishop or other saint is marked to be kept as festival, unless he was also a martyr. The occurrence of any such day is a sure indication that the calendar is of later date than A.D. 400; or, that the entry is of later insertion. To the bishops is assigned the term Depositio; to the martyrs, Natidis or Natalitium.

6. Vigils are of rare occurrence in the oldest calendars. Not one vigil is noted in the Kal. Bucerianum and Kal. Carthaginense. The Kal. Frontonianum (supra) has four. A Gallican Calendar of A.D. 826, edited by d'Achery (Spirit. x. 130), has five; and another, by Martene, for which he claims an earlier date (Thes. Anecd. v. 65), has nine.

For the determination of the Province or Church to which a Calendar belongs, the only criterion to be relied on is the preponderance in it of names of martyrs and saints known to be of that diocese or province. Naturally, each Church would honour most its own confessors and champions of the faith. Especially does this rule hold in respect of the bishops, whose names, unless they were also martyrs or otherwise men of highest note in the Church, would not be likely to obtain a place in the calendars of other than their own Churches.

The Greek Church had its calendars, under the title ἡμερησίαι (ἑορταστικῆ), μηναίων (ἑορτ.); later, καλεσάριον, which, as containing the offices for each celebration, grew into enormous dimensions. One such, with the designation, Μηνολόγιον τῶν εὐαγγελίων ἑορταστικῶν sive Kalendarium Ecclesiae Constantinopolitane, edited from a manuscript in the Albani Library by Morelli, fills two quarto volumes, Rome, 1788. But the title μηνολόγιον corresponds not with the Latin Kalendarium, but with the Martyrologium. Cave, in a dissertation appended to his Historia Literaria, part ii. (de Libris et officis ecclesiasticis Graecorum, p. 43) describes the καλεσάριον or Ephemeris ecclesiastica in usum totius anni, as a digest of all church festivals and fasts for the twelve months, day by day, beginning with September. "That calendars of this kind were composed for the use of the churches is plain from Biblioth. Vindobon. C.d. Hist. Eccl. xvii. l. xiii., which gives a letter written by the head of some monastery in reply to questions concerning monastic observances of holidays; to which is appended a complete Church Calendar." [H. B.]

CALL TO THE MINISTRY

CALL. Irrespectively of its meaning as symbol of an EVANGELIST, the image of the calf or ox is held by Aringhi (lib. vi. ch. xxxii. vol. ii. p. 320) to represent the Christian soul, standing to Christ in the same relation as the sheep to the shepherd. He also takes the calf or ox to represent Apostles labouring in their ministry, quoting various Fathers, and finally St. Chrysostom's idea, that the oxen and fatlings spoken of as killed for the Master's feast are meant to represent prophets and martyrs. The calf or ox, as a sacrificial victim, has been taken to represent the Lord's sacrifice; for which Aringhi quotes a comment on Num. xvii. These similitudes seem fanciful, and pictorial or other representations hardly exist to bear them out. A calf is represented near the Good Shepherd in Buonarrotti (Vetri, tav. v. fig. 2); and Martigny refers to Allegranza (Mon. antichi de Milano, p. 125) for an initial letter at Milan, where the animal is represented playing on a lyre: typifying, he thinks, the subjugation of the human nature to the life of faith. He also refers to St. Clemeat of Alexandria (Paedog. lib. i. c. 5) for a comparison of young Christians to sucking calves (μασχάρια γαλαθηνά), connected perhaps in the Father's mind in the same way as in his own; though, as Bishop Potter remarks in his note (ad loc.), no such comparison exists in Scripture. The plate in Allegranza is of considerable interest, being from a "marmo" belonging to the ancient pulpit of S. Ambrogio. The calf is lying down, and turning up its forehead to the lyre, or "antica cetra." It is engraved in the loop of an initial D. The preceding "marmo" is a representation of an Agnus, from the posterior parapet of the pulpit; and Allegranza considers the calf to be a symbol connected with the Agnus. See above, Clem. Alex. Paedog. i. 5. See also a v. LYRE, that instrument being held typical of the human body in its right state of harmony with, and subjection to, the divinely-guided soul. For oxen with Dolia see Bottari, iii. 155, 184.

[R. St. J. T.]

CALIGAE. These were stockings, made of various material, serving for a defence against cold, and as such worn at times by soldiers (Casaubon on Suetonius); by monks, if infirm or exposed to cold (Cassianus, lib. i. c. 10; S. Benedictus, Regula, c. 62; Gregor. Magnus, Dial. cc. 2, 4); and by bishops in out-door dress (Gregor. Taron. Hist. Franc. lib. vi. c. 31). The Lude of St. Ferreolus (quoted by DuCange, s. v.), c. 32, has an amusing passage forbidding the elaborate cross-gartering of these caligae, out of mere economy. The earliest writer who mentions the caligae as among the "sacred vestments" to be worn by bishops and cardinals is Ivo Carnotensis (†1115). "Antequam induantur sandaliis vestiuntur caligis byssinis vel lineis, usque ad genua protensis et ibi bene constructis" (Sermo de significatibus instrumentorum sacerdotalium, apud Hittorpium de Dic. Off.). [W. B. M.]

CALIXTUS [CALLISTUS].

CALL TO THE MINISTRY is more a matter of Christian ethics than of Church canons; and in that point of view it became mixed up, in the Church of the 4th century and onwards, with the parallel error of the adoption of the monastic or the celibate life. The temper that ought to animate them to be, on the one hand, to serve God, and on the other, also, to be obedient to the call of the duties which humility, to more it felt the true non-ness, measure, pare Rom. x. view of the law, but it the common ful electors (or the bishop) brate, up the higher or enacted that degree could would apply into the mini supplementec necessity of that the call authority. *Con. became the common designation of all. (Suicer. Thesaur. s. v., cf. Pallad. Hist. Lus. ciii. κελος, where Innocentius is called δ κελος γερων). These Eastern monks have preserved from the first, with characteristic tenacity, the Rule of St. Basil. Thus their fastings are more frequent and more rigorous than those in Western Christendom. Their offices too are more lengthy; but partly from this very circumstance, and partly from the office-books being very costly, some are not infrequently omitted (Helyot. Hist. des Ordres Relig. I. xix. 6). They are divided, like their Western brethren, into three kinds, Cenobitae, dwelling together under one roof; Anachoretae, scattered round the several monasteries and resorting thither for solemn services on festivals, &c.; and Eremitae, or solitary recluses. The Cenobitae, or monks proper, are again subdivided into Archarii, novices; Microschemi; and Megaloschemi, the highest grade (Helyot. I. xix.).

The "Hours" observed by the Caloyers are much the same as those in the West, being, in fact, derived from a common source. After a prolonged service at midnight they sleep from 2 a.m. to 5 a.m. Then a service corresponding to matins, lauds, and prime, the last portion of which is simultaneous with sunrise. After an interval spent in their cells, they meet again at 9 a.m. for tierce, sext, and mass. At mid-day dinner, with the usual lectures, in the refectory. At 4 p.m. vespers; at 6 p.m. supper, followed by the ἀπιδειπνον, a sort of complique; at 8 p.m. to bed (Helyot. I. xix.).

They have four especial seasons of fasting in the year, and their abstinence, as has been said already, is more severe than in Western climes. Besides Lent, as in the West, there are the "Fast of the Apostles," commencing on the 8th day after Whitsunday, and lasting about 3 weeks; the "Fast of the Assumption," lasting 14 days; and "A Ivnt" (Helyot. I. xix.).

Their robes, more flowing and voluminous than those of Western Orders, are marked on the cape with the Cross, and with the letters IC. XC. NC. (Jesus Christus Vincit). The tonsure extends all over the head; but they wear beards (cf. Mab. Ann. I. xv. 32). (Helyot. I. xix.). Numerous lay brothers are attached to each monastery, for the field work; and considerable taxes are collected from each by the "exarchs" or visitors, for the Patriarch (Helyot. I. xix.).

The greatest of the Asiatic monasteries is on Mt. Simi, founded, it is said, by Justinian, and renowned as the residence of St. Athanasius of Mt. Simi, and of St. John Climacus, whose name figures in Western Hagiologies also. Here, as at Mt. Casino, the abbat exercises a large ecclesiastical jurisdiction: he is archbishop ex officio. As a precaution against Arabs there are no doors, and the only gateway is blocked up. Provisions and pilgrims, &c., are all drawn up in a basket to the window. In Europe there are several monasteries; among which that of St. Sahas, in the wilderness near Bethlehem, and those on the isles in the Levant are famous. But the greatest are those on Mt. Athos, where the peninsula is entirely and exclusively occupied by the "Caloyers" (Helyot. I.). [I. G. S.]

CALUMNIES AGAINST THE CHRISTIANS. It was hardly possible that a new society like the Christian Church should escape misrepresentations. It had enemies on all sides. It offended men by presenting a higher standard of purity than their own, and they revenged themselves by imputing to it their own impurity. The secrecy that attended some portions of its life or worship gave rise to suspicions. Other societies, heretical or fantastic, which were popularly identified with it, brought upon it the discredit to which their defects made them liable. Popular credulity was ready to accept any sensational tale of horror which malice or ignorance might suggest. The result was that the popular feeling of dislike took definite shape, and that the persecutions of the Christians in the first three centuries were stimulated by the general belief that they were guilty of crimes which made them enemies of the human race. But over and above these influences, there was also, if we may trust the statements of many early Christian writers, a system of calumny, organised and deliberate, of which the Jews were the chief propagators. Envoys (ἀπόστολοι) were sent from Jerusalem with circular letters to the synagogues throughout the empire, and these became centres from which the false reports were disseminated among the heathen (Just. M. Dial. c. Tryph. c. 17, p. 234; Euseb. in Essaim, xxiii. l. p. 424). They spread the charge of Atheism, which was so large an element in the accusations to which Christians were exposed, and were active, as in the case of Polycarp, in stirring up the multitude (Epist. Smyrn. 9; Clem. Alex. Strom. vii. 1). The calumnies in question are, of course, the chief subject-matter of the Apologetic treatises of the 2nd and 3rd centuries. Of these, the treatise of Tertullian, ad Nationes, as being addressed, not, like his Apologetics, to emperors and proconsuls, but to the Gentiles at large, is perhaps, the most exhaustive. It will be convenient to deal with the chief charges singly.

(1) The Agape and the more sacred Supper which was at first connected with them, furnished material for some of the more horrible charges. "Thyestelian banquets and Oedipodean incest" became bye-words of reproach (Athenaz. Apol. c. 4) side by side with that of Atheism. When they met, it was said, an infant was brought in, covered with flour, and then stabbed to death by a new convert, who was thus initiated in the mysteries. The others then ate the flesh and licked up the blood. This was the sacrifice by which they were bound together (Tertull. ad Nat. i. 15; Apol. c. 8; Mianz. Felix, Octav. c. 9). Two sources of this monstrous statement may be assigned with some probability. (a) To drink of human blood had actually been made, as in the conspiracy of Catiline, a bond of union in a common crime (Sallust, Catil. c. 22), and the blood, it was said, was that of a slaughtered child (Dio. Cass. xxxvii. 30). It had entered into the popular imagination as one of the horrors of a secret conspiracy. Christians were regarded as members of a secret society, conspiring together for the downfall of the religion and polity of the empire. It was natural to think that they had like rites of initiation. (b) The language of devout Christians as to the Supper of which they partook would tend to confirm, even if it did not originate, the belief. It was not common bread or common wine which they ate and drank but Flesh and Blood. By participation came membership; that with this (l. c.) to dw charges, on port them. mysteria c the heathen cause of this participation in that flesh and blood they became members of one body. It is singular, however, that the Apologists do not meet the charge with this explanation, but confine themselves (l. c.) to dwelling on the incredibility of such charges, on the absence of any evidence to support them. Their unwillingness to expose the mysteries of their faith to the scorn of the heathen was, it can hardly be questioned, the cause of this reticence.

(2.) Next in order came the charge of impurity. When the members of a Christian Church met, men and women, it was at night. A lamp gave light to the room, and to its stand a dog was fastened. After they had supped and were hot with wine, meat was thrown to the dog so as to make him overthrow the lamp-stand in his struggles to get at it, and then the darkness witnessed a scene of shameless and unbridled lust, in which all laws of nature were set at naught (Tertull. Apol. c. 8; ad Nat. c. 16; Euseb. H. E. iv. 7-15; Origen, c. Cel. vi. 27; Minuc. Felix, l. c. 9). Here, too, we may trace the calumny to two main sources. (a) In the Bacchanalia and other secret mysteries, revelations of which had from time to time startled the Roman world (comp. Livy, xxix. 13 for those of B.C. 185), turpitude of this kind had been but too common. Men of purit imaginations imputed it even where the lives of the accused were in flagrant contradiction to it. (b) The name of the Agapae, interpreted as such men would interpret it, was sure to strengthen the suspicion. They could form no other notion of a "love-feast" held at night. It may be that the "holy kiss," the "kiss of peace," which entered into the early ritual of the Eucharist, was distorted in the same way; and that the names of "brother" and "sister" by which Christians spoke of each other were associated with the thought that the intercourse which was assumed to take place was incestuous in its nature (Minuc. Felix, l. c.). (c) It seems probable that in some cases abuses of this kind actually exist in the Agapae. [AGAPAE.] They became conspicuous for licence and revelry. The language of the later Apostolical Epistles (2 Pet. ii. 13, Jude v. 12) shows that excesses had occurred even then. The followers of Carpocrates followed in the same line, and are said by Clement of Alexandria (Strom. iii. 2-4, p. 185), and Eusebius (H. E. iv. 7, § 5) to have been guilty in their Agapae of practices identical with those, which were popularly imputed to the Christians at large.

(3.) The charge of Atheism was natural enough as against those who held aloof from all temples and altars, and, though it was a formidable weapon in the hands of their persecutors, can hardly be classed as a distinct calumny. Still less can we group under that head the accusation that they worshipped one who had died a malefactor's death, though this too from the time of the Apostles downward was a frequent topic of reproach (Tacit. Annal. xv. 63; Justin M. Dial. c. Tryph. c. 91; Minuc. Fel., p. 86). It was not strange either that the reverential use which the Christians of the 2nd century made of the sign of the cross should lead to the notion that they worshipped the cross itself. We may wonder rather that the Apologist who speaks of the accusation should be content almost to admit the fact without any explanation, and to retort with the argument that the framework scaffolding of most of the idols before which the Gentiles bowed down exhibited the same form (Tertull. Apol. c. 16). We enter upon the region of distinct slander, however, when we come across statements of another kind, as to the objects of Christian adoration. Of these the most astounding is that they worshipped their God under the mysterious form of a man with an ass's head. It seems strange that such a charge should have been thought even to need denial, and yet it is clear that it was at one time widely received. Tertullian (Apol. c. 16 ad Nat. c. 11) speaks of a caricature exhibiting such a form, with the inscription "THE GOD OF THE CHRISTIANS"—ONOKOITES.* And a picture answering to this description has actually been found on a wall of the palace of the Caesars on the Palatine Hill. A man is represented as offering homage to a figure with an ass's head, and underneath is the inscription ΑΛΕΧΑΜΕΝΟΣ ΣΕΒΕΤΕ (for ΣΕΒΕΤΑΙ) ΘΕΟΝ. The fragment is now in the Kircher Museum, and exhibits the lowest style of art, such as might be found in a boy-artisan bent on holding up some fellow-workman to ridicule.^b It has to be noted that this was but the transfer to the Christians of an old charge against the Jews, and that there it was connected with the tradition that it was through the wild asses of the desert that the Jews had been led to find water at the time of the Exodus (Tacit. Hist. v. 3).

(4.) The belief that Christians were worshippers of the sun obtained even a wider currency, and had more plausibility (Tertull. Apol. c. 16, Just. M. Apol. i. 68). They met together on the day which was more and more generally known as the Dies Solis. They began at an early period to manifest a symbolic reverence for the East; and these acts, together with the language in which they spoke of Christ as the true light, and of themselves as "children of light," would naturally be interpreted as acts of adoration to the luminary itself. With this we may perhaps connect the singular statement ascribed to Hadrian that they were also worshippers of Serapis (Vopiscus, Hist. Aug. p. 719). This, however, never rose to the rank of a popular calumny, and seems to have had its beginning and end in the fantastic eclecticism of that emperor, who identified Serapis with the sun, and so reproduced the current belief under this form.

(5.) It was also reported that the members of the new sect worshipped their priests with an adoration which had in it something of a palling character ("Alii eos ferunt ipsius anstittis ac sacerdotis colere genitalia," Minuc. Felix, Octav. c. 9). In this case, as in the charge of immoral excesses, we have probably the interpretation given by impure minds to acts in themselves blameless. Penitents came to the presbytery of the church to confess their sins, and kneel before them as they sat, and this attitude may have suggested the revolting calumny to those who could see in it nothing but an act of adoration.

(6.) Over and above all specific charges there was the dislike which men felt to a society so utterly unlike their own. These men who lived apart from the world were a hucitaya natio. They were inftructuosi in negotiis. They were guilty of treason because they would not offer sacrifice for the emperors, and looked for the advent of another kingdom. They were ignorant, rude, uncultivated, and yet they set themselves up above the wisest sages. They led men to a dark fatalism by ascribing to God all their power to act (Tertull. Apol. 35-42). They showed a defiant obstinacy in their resistance, even to death, to the commands of civil magistrates (Marc. Aurel. xi. 3). [E. H. P.]

CALUMNY. [DETRACTION; SLANDER.]

CAMBRICUS CONCILIUM, A.D. 465, is a fiction, taken from Geoffrey of Monmouth, &c. [A. W. H.]

CAMELAUCIUM. A covering for the head, in use chiefly in the East, of very unsettled orthography. We find camelaucium, camelaucus, caltauucium, and in Greek καμηλαύκιον and κιμελαύκιον. It appears to have been a round cap with ear-flaps of fur, originally camel's hair if the ordinary etymology is to be accepted, or wool, and sometimes adorned with gems. The form and name being preserved, it sometimes became a helmet and was worn in battle. We find it adopted both by royal personages and by ecclesiastics. The head-covering taken from Totila when killed, A.D. 552, and presented to Justinian, is called by Theophanes (Chron. p. 193) καμηλαύκιον διάλαθον. Constantine the Great appears on his triumphal arch at Rome similarly attired. [See CROWN.] Ferrario (Costumi, Europa (Rs) vol. iii. part i. pl. 30), and Constantine Porphyg. (de Adm. Imp. c. 13) describe by the same name the sacred caps, preserved at the high-altar of St. Sophia's, traditionally believed to have been sent by an angel's hands to Constantine the Great, and used in the coronation of the emperors of the East.

Its ecclesiastical use in the East seems to have been chiefly confined to the monastic orders. Goar (Euchology, p. 156) tells us that the mitre of the metropolitan of Constantinople had this name only when he was taken from the monastic ranks. It is defined by Allatius (de utriusque Eccl. Consens. lib. iii. c. viii. no. 12, apud Ducange), as a round woollen cap worn by monks. It was worn by Armenian bishops when officiating at the altar (ib., Isaac Invectio secundus in Armen. p. 414). [MITRE.]

Fuller particulars and authorities may be found in the Greek and Latin Glossary of Ducange. For its form, Ferrario u. s., Goar, Euchology, p. 156, and the plates prefixed to Ducange's Gloss. Med. et Inf. Græc. may be consulted. [E. V.]

CAMERA PAMENTI. [SACRISTY.]

CAMISIA. (Hence the Ital. 'Camicia' a shirt, and 'Camice' an alb; Sp. 'Camisa'; and the Fr. 'Chemise,' in Languedoc 'Camise.') St. Jerome (Ep. ad Fabiolam), in describing the vestments of the Jewish priesthood ("Volo pro-legentis facilitate abuti sermone vulgato. Solent militantes habere lineas quæ camisias vocant sic aptas membris et astrictas corporibus ut expedit sint vel ad cursum vel ad prælium," &c.), and a scholiast on Lucan (sunarum est genus vestimenti quod vulgo camisia dicitur, id est interlata) speak of this word as belonging to the linpna vulgaria. St. Jerome's description shews it to have been a shirt fitted to the body so as to admit of active exertion of the limbs, which was not the case with the flowing garments worn by the more wealthy in ordinary life. St. Isidore (Orig. xix. 22, 29) derives the word "a camis" ("quod in his dormimus in camis, id est in stratis nostris"). With him it is a night-shirt or bed-gown. The word 'camna' still retains the meaning of a 'bed' in the Spanish language, to which St. Isidore, himself a Spaniard, seems to refer. The Arabic 'kamis' is no doubt connected with the Spanish 'camisia.' See further references in Ménage, Dict. Etym. 'Chemise,' and in Ducange, Glossarium, 'camisia.' [W. B. M.]

CAMPAGAE. (Other forms of the same word are Campacus, Gambacus, Campobus.) A kind of ornamented shoe worn by emperors and kings (Trebellius, in Gallieno; Capitolinus, in Maximin. Jun., and by various officers of state ("pretoribus Palatinis et quibusvis aliis;" cf. Ducange, in loc.). At a later period they were worn by the higher ecclesiastics at Rome, and by others elsewhere, but in disregard of the special privileges claimed in regard of these by Roman authorities. Gregor. Magnus, Ep. vii. indict. i. ep. 28. "Pervenit ad nos," &c. [W. B. M.]

CAMPANA. [BELL.]

CAMPANARIUS. The special office of Campanarius, or bell-ringer, in a church is perhaps not mentioned in the literature of the first eight centuries. See, however, the so-called Excerpta Eberti, c. 2, and the Leges Presbyt. Northunbr. c. 36.

In more ancient times the duty of ringing the bells at the proper seasons seems to have been laid upon the priests themselves (Capitulari Episcop. c. 8; Capit. Caroli Magni, lib. vi. c. 168). To the same effect Amalarius (de Dir. Off. iii. 1) says, speaking of the ringing of bells, "ne despiciat presbyter hoc opus agere." (Ducange s. vv. Campanum, Campanarius.) In later times the Ostiarius was the bell-ringer (Martene de Rit. Eccl. ii. 18, ed. 1783). [C.]

CAMPANILE. [BELFRY; TOWER.]

CAMPIO, "champion"; one whose profession it was to fight for another in cases where single combat was permitted by law to decide the right "in campo duellum exercens." People were allowed their advocate in court, and their champion in the field. But the latter was a mediæval institution, and therefore beyond our limits. He was a superior personage to the gladiator of old Rome, so far in that he fought, not for a mere display of brute force, but for the triumph of justice. See Du Cange, Hoffmann, Spelman, and Blount, s. v. [B. S.]

Cyril of Jerusalem (Catech. xxii. 11) says it represents the change of the wine into the blood of the Lord in the eucharist; and this idea has been applied with eager inconsequence to the support of the full dogma of transubstantiation. The miracle is represented on an ivory, published by Mamachi, Bottari, and Gori, which is supposed to have formed part of the covering of a throne belonging to the exarchs of Ravenna, and is referred to the 7th century. Bandini (In Tyndam eburnea Observations, 4to. Florentiae, 1746) gives a plate of it: and the present writer saw it in the Duomo of Ravenna in 1871. See woodcut.

In Bottari, tav. xix. and xxxii., our Saviour, wearing the ordinary tunic, and tyga over it, touches or points respectively to three and two vessels with a rod. In tav. li. five jars are given, as also in lxxxviii.; four in tav. lxxxix. The vessels or hydriæ are of different, and generally humble forms, on these sarcophagi. Bottari remarks that the sculptors may have been hampered by knowing the water-vessels to have been large, containing a "metretræ." But those on Bandini's ivory are gracefully-shaped ampheæ. Here the Lord bears a Greek cross on a staff, and motions with the other hand to the bridegroom, or a servant, who is carrying a cup to the master of the feast, gazing steadily at it, and extending his left hand towards the Saviour. The first-quoted of these plates (xix. and xxxii.) of Bottari's are from sarcophagi found in the Vatican, and of high merit in an artistic point of view. The later ones, not much inferior, are from the cemetery of Lucina, in the Callixtine catacomb, or from a sarcophagus dug up in 1807, in preparing foundations for the Cupella Borghese at Sta. Maria Maggiorè. [E. St. J. T.]

CANCELLI (Podium, Pectoralia, Mensana; Κάγκελλοι, Δριφρακτα, Κάγγελοι, Κάγκελλοι, Κάγκελλα). These words are applied to a partition formed of open work in wood or iron, or even of stone (Papias, in Duongue, s. v. Cancellis), especially to the open-work screen or grating which separates the choir from the nave of a church, or the sanctuary from the choir. Eusebius (Hist. Eccl. x. 4, s. 44), after describing the thrones of the πρόεδροι in the upper part of the great church at Tyre, the benches (seemingly) for the rest of the clerks, and the altar or sanctuary, says, "These again, that they might be inaccessible to the laity, he enclosed with wooden gratings, wrought with so delicate an art as to be a wonder to behold." These cancelli seem to have enclosed the whole of the space occupied by the clergy. Compare CHURCH.

St. Ambrose is said (Sozomen, Hist. Eccl. vii. 25, 317) to have excluded the emperors from the sanctuary, and to have assigned them a place just outside the rails which enclosed it (πρὸ τῶν δριφρακτῶν τοῦ ἱερατείου). Here the ἱερατείου seems to correspond with what we call the chancel, including the whole of the space assigned to the clergy, and not merely the sanctuary; for the emperor's position is said to indicate his precedence among the people, and his inferiority to the clergy. The rails seems to have been, in short, a chancel-screen rather than an altar-rail.

Cyriac, in the Life of Caesarius of Arles (Acta SS. Bened. sæc. i. App.) says that the saint did not hesitate to give for the redemption of captives things belonging to the administration of the sacrament, as chalices and censers, and even took down the silver ornaments from the cancelli. In this case, the context suggests that the cancelli were near the altar. Paul Warnefrid (De Episcop. Metens. in Pertz, Monum. German. ii. 266) says that Chrodegang caused to be made a church in honour of St. Stephen, and his altar, and cancelli, and a presbytery, where again the rail or grating seems to have been the enclosure of the altar.

Athanasius (Epistola ad Orthodoxos, Opp. i. 646) speaks of the κάγκελοι of a church as among the things destroyed by Arian fury.

Ciril of Scythopolis, in the Life of Euthymius († 673; in Acta SS. Jun. ii. 302 ff.), tells how a Saracene, leaning on the screen of the sanctuary (τῷ καγγέλω τοῦ ἱερατείου) while the offering was being made, saw fire descend from heaven and spread itself over the altar. Here the screen clearly enclosed the bema, or sanctuary, and admitted of the altar being seen from without. And again, in the Life of St. Sabas (in Cotelerius, Monum. Eccl. Græcæ, tom. iii.), he speaks of the rails of the sanctuary (κ. τοῦ θυσιαστηρίου).

Some have thought that the RUGÆ frequently mentioned in the Liber Pontificalis among the presents of various popes to Roman churches were cancellated doors. But see the article.

Germanus of Constantinople* (Hist. Eccl. p. 148, ed. Paris, 1560) says that the rails (κάγκελλα) mark out the space to the outside of which the people may approach, while inside is the Holy of Holies, accessible only to the priests. Here we must conclude, either that the phrase τὰ ἅγια τῶν ἁγίων includes choir as well as sanctuary, which is highly improbable, or that the people entered the choir at any rate for the purpose of communicating. Compare CHURCH.

* It is doubtful whether this work is to be attributed to the Germanus of the 8th century, or to his namesake of the 12th.

Durandus (Rationale, l. 3, 35) observes that in ancient times the enclosure of the choir was not so high as to prevent the people from seeing the clerks; but that in his own time a curtain or partition was generally interposed between the clerks and the people, so that they could not see each other.

(2) In addition to the use of this word for the lattice-work protecting the altar of a church and the raised area on which it stood, Canellus was also employed to designate a railing round a tomb. We find it used in this sense by Augustine (e.g. Serm. de Divers. xxxi, de Civ. Dei xlii. 7, &c.; Gregory of Tours, de Mirac. l. 69; ii. 20, 46, 47; id. Hist. vi. 10, where thieves are described as breaking into St. Martin's Church at Tours by raising against the window of the apse "cancellum qui super tumulum cujusdam defuncti erat").

Another word used in the same sense from the similarity of its form was Cataracta, καταβάκτης, "a portcullis." The letters of the legates to Pope Hormisdas relative to the request of Justinian for some relics of the apostles speaks of the "secunda cataracta." Labbé Conc. iv. 1513; and the "cyclo of Vigilius, Ep. xv. mentions the "cataracta Beati Petri," i. e. the iron railing surrounding his "confessio" (ib. v. 330). [E. V.]

CANDLE. [LIGHTS; TAPER.] [C.]

CANDLEMAS. [MARY, FESTIVALS OF.]

CANISTER, or CANISTRUM. (1) A basket used for holding consecrated bread, or perhaps EULOGIAE. Compare ARCA. St. Jerome (Ep. ad Rustic. c. 20), speaking of the practice among Christians in his day of carrying home the consecrated elements both of bread and wine, uses the expression, "Qui corpus Domini in canistro vimineo et sanguinem portat in vitro;" from which it appears that a wicker basket was used for holding the consecrated bread.

This passage is remarkably illustrated by a fresco discovered in the crypt of St. Cornelius by Cavalieri de' Rossi. This represents a fish swimming in the water, bearing on its back a basket having on the top several small leaves, and inside a red object, clearly visible through the wicker-work, which seems to be a small glass flask of wine. This is marked in the engraving by a somewhat darker tint. We have thus the FISHER, the well-known symbol of the Redeemer, combined with the representation of the sacred bread and wine.

In another painting of the same cemetery is represented a tripod table, on which are laid three loaves and a fish, and round which are placed seven baskets full of loaves. Here, also, it cannot be doubted that the loaves are eucharistic, either as being the loaves actually consecrated, or those blessed for distribution (EULOGIAE) (Martigny, Dict. des Ant. Chrét. p. 246).

Epiphanius the Presbyter (in Indiculis Hermisidum, quoted by Ducange, s. v. Canistrum) says that certain persons proved themselves to be heretics by the very fact that on the approach of what they called persecution, i. e. the predominance of the orthodox Church, they consecrated great quantities of sacramental bread, and distributed full baskets (canistra plena) to all, that they might not be deprived of communion. Ducange refers this to the eulogiae; but the eulogiae would scarcely have been regarded as a substitute for communion, and the passage may probably be referred, like that of St. Jerome, to the distribution of bread actually consecrated.

(2) The disk or tazza placed under a lamp. This sense is frequent in the Liber Pontificalis. For instance, Pope Adrian (772-795) is said to have given to a church twelve silver canistri, weighing thirty-six pounds. Leo III., his successor, gave a silver canister with its chains, weighing fifteen pounds. Gregory IV. gave two canistra of nine lights (canistra enaufodia = ενναφώδρια). In the latter case, the lights were probably distributed round the circumference of the tazza. (Ducange's Glossary, s. v.) [C.]

CANON. Κανών, a rule; applied ecclesiastically to many very diverse things, but with the one notion of fixity or regularity underlying all of them: as—

Of this system, however, its limits to speak which is the first Canonica, was not a century, and even before, which form the basis of the canon law of some time after therefore, to confirm collections of church law.

CANON LAW. The term Canon Law, as commonly used at the present day, is generally understood to relate to that complex system of ecclesiastical jurisprudence which grew up in the Church of Rome during the Middle Ages.* Of this system, however, it hardly falls within our limits to speak. The Decretum of Gratian, which is the first part of the Corpus Juris Canonici, was not drawn up until the 12th century, and even the Decretals of the Pseudo-Isidore, which form so large an extent the basis of the canon law of Rome, did not appear till some time after the year 800. We have, therefore, to confine ourselves to the earlier collections of church law

"It is not to be supposed (says Ayliffe, in his Introduction to his Parergon Juris Canonici) that the communion of the Church could long subsist after the death of the Apostles, without some other laws and obligations, holding men to peace and concord among themselves, than those contained in holy writ; considering the pride and passions of men, and an overweening conceit of their own particular ways in point of Divine worship, and the ceremonies of it."

The earliest approach to a lex scripta other than and beyond the Scriptures, probably consisted partly of letters of eminent bishops in reply to questions put to them on disputed topics (a kind of "responsa prudentum")—partly of traditional maxims, "coutumes," as Bunsen calls them (Christianity and Mankind, vol. ii. 421), reduced to writing, and generally accepted, with or without synodical sanction—

* It is sometimes also applied to the provincial canons and constitutions passed by domestic synods in this country. It is to these that the act 26 Hen. 8. c. 19, relates. But these also belong to a time subsequent to the year 800, and do not therefore fall to be noticed here.

partly of decisions of local councils, in which certain neighbouring dioceses met together and agreed upon rules for their observance in common.

The so-called apostolical canons, and apostolical constitutions [see APOST. CANONS and APOST. CONSTITUTIONS] probably contain fragments derived from this early period. The ancient pieces edited in Lagarde's Reliquiæ Juris Ecclesiastici Antiquissimæ, and in Bickell's Geschichte des Kirchenrechts, and in Bickell's to some extent the state of things at a later stage, with more or less of subsequent addition and interpolation.

Eusebius mentions synods or meetings of the orthodox on the subject of the Easter controversy as early as the close of the 2nd century (H. E. v. 23; see Bickell, i. 38). In the 3rd century like assemblies were held on the question of baptism by heretics, and on the condition of the bapti. Of letters of bishops received as having weight in ecclesiastical questions, few or none remain of a very early date. The epistle of Clement of Rome, and the epistles of Ignatius, hardly fulfil this character, and the pretended letters of early popes in the Pseudo-Isidorian Decretals are forgeries. But in the 3rd century we have a letter of Dionysius of Alexandria, and one of Gregory Thaumaturgus, which were written in reply to questions put to them, and which find a place in the Codex Canonum of the Greek Church. It is therefore possible that similar epistles of other bishops may have exercised more or less influence in regulating the affairs of infant churches during the previous period.

At the beginning of the 4th century, provincial councils became numerous. Before the year 325 we have, for instance, councils at Elvira, Arles, Ancyra, and Neocesarea. Then begins the series of general councils, that of Nice being the first, followed, in 381, by the first Council of Constantinople, minor councils having been held in the interim. [COUNCIL.] It is not surprising, therefore, that some effort was now made to collect the laws of the Church. We begin with the Eastern Church.

The first collection of which we hear has not come down to us in its original form. It appears to have contained at first only the canons of Nice, and those of the provincial councils of Ancyra, Neocesarea, and Gangra. As the three last mentioned councils were connected with the diocese of Pontus, it has been conjectured, from the prominence given to them, that the collection originated there.

By degrees other councils were added, and this Codex Ecclesie Orientalis, thus enlarged, became a work of recognized authority, and was quoted at the Council of Chalcedon in 451 A.D. Justellus edited in 1519 a Codex Canonum Ecclesie Universalis, which he professed to be the collection quoted at Chalcedon, and to have been the work of Stephen, bishop of Ephesus, at the end of the 4th century. In point of fact, however, the work published by Justellus contains much additional matter, and cannot be considered as an exact representation of the early form of the collections in question.^b Subsequently to the Council of Chalcedon, divers collections appear to have been made, varying from one another more or less in the order and character of their contents. Meanwhile, another element had been added to church law by the decrees of the Christian emperors, collected in the Codes of Theodosius and Justinian (Biener, p. 14).

In the middle of the 6th century, John, surnamed Scholasticus, a priest of Antioch, and subsequently Patriarch of Constantinople, made a more systematic and complete collection, introducing into it sixty-eight passages from the works of Basil, which the Oriental Church receives as authoritative. At the same time he also extracted and put together, from the legislation of Justinian, a number of laws bearing on ecclesiastical matters. These two collections, when afterwards combined (probably by another hand), obtained the name of Nomocanon.

We now come to the council in Trullo, held A.D. 692, the decree of which furnishes a list of what was then received. The council acknowledges 85 apostolic canons, and those of Nice, Ancyra, Neocaesarea, Gangra, Antioch, Laodicea, Constantinople, Ephesus, Chalcedon, Sardica, and Carthage,⁴ also of the Synod of Constantinople under Nectarius.⁵ It further recognizes the so-called canons taken from the works of Dionysius and Peter, archbishops of Alexandria, Gregory Thaumaturgus, Athanasius, Basil, Gregory Nyssen, Gregory Theologus, Amphilochius, Timotheus, Theophilus and Cyril of Alexandria, and Gennadius, patriarch of Constantinople. Lastly, it confirms the Canon of Cyprian as to the baptism of heretics, which it states to have been recognized by the usage of the Church.

Not quite two centuries later appeared the great Nomocanon of Photius, patriarch of Constantinople. This comprehended a digest of the canons according to their subject matter, and of the laws of Justinian on the same subjects. A close connexion was thereby practically established between the decrees of councils and those of emperors (Biener, p. 22). It seems to be the aim of this work to embrace the same canons in the main as were recognized by the Trullan Council, and to add them to the Trullan decrees, and those of the following councils:—

The so-called 7th Council, or 2nd Nicene; the so-called Primo secunda, held A.D. 861; that of St. Sophia, called by the Greeks the 8th Council, A.D. 879.⁶

The council styled by the Latins the 8th, viz., that held against Photius A.D. 869, not being acknowledged by the Greeks, did not appear in this collection.

In the 11th century the work of Psellus, in ² It contained the Apostolic Canons, and those of Nice, Ancyra, Neocaesarea, Sardica, Gangra, Antioch, Laodicea, Constantinople, Ephesus, and Chalcedon, and the so-called Canons of Basil.

the 12th, the commentaries of Zonaras and Balsamon, and of Aristenus, and later still, the labours of Blastares, would require special mention, as forming marked eras in the growth of canon law in the East, as distinguished from the mere collection and publication of existing canons.

But we have already passed our chronological limit, and we therefore turn to the churches of the West.

The canons of Nice appear to have been speedily translated into Latin, and to have been circulated in the West, together with those of Sardica. Soon after the Council of Chalcedon, a further collection called the "Prisca translatio" appeared, which began with the Council of Ancyra, and comprehended those of Chalcedon and Constantinople. We hear also of a Gallic collection. The African church, too, as it had numerous councils, appears to have collected their decrees [see COD. CANONUM Ecclesie Africanae]. In or about A.D. 547 Ferrandus, a deacon of Carthage, published his Brevitio Canonum, which was not merely a compilation, but a systematic digest, and comprehended also the Greek Councils to which, he appears to have had access through a Spanish version.

Spain, indeed, had at an early period a collection of her own. The fact that a Spanish bishop presided at the Council of Nice would ensure a prompt entrance into that country for the Nicene decrees. The canons of other councils followed, some of which were held in Spain itself. An old Codex Canonum appears to have existed, though not now extant in its original form. It is said to have been cited at the Council of Braga, A.D. 591.

Martin, archbishop of Braga, also compiled extracts from Greek councils, which became a valuable contribution to the canon law of the Spanish church. In the seventh century we come to the collection which goes by the name of Isidore of Seville, and which seems to be of his date, though perhaps not his work. This was edited at Madrid in 1808 and 1821 from a Spanish MS. This collection is a very full one, and at once attained to a high position. It contains not only canons of councils but decretals of popes. In its composition use was no doubt made of the Roman work of Dionysius of which we are about to speak.

We must now go back a few years in order to trace the state of things at Rome. The decrees of Nice and Sardica were speedily accepted and acted upon by the popes, but the history of any regular collection of canons is obscure until the end of the 5th century, when the Syrian monk Dionysius Exiguus settled at Rome, and not long afterwards undertook to edit a systematic compilation. That his work is not entirely new is clear, because he states that one of its objects was to give a new and better translation of the Greek canons. This seems to refer to the defective nature of the "Prisca translatio" above mentioned. The labours of Dionysius resulted in a collection both more accurate and more complete than any previously existing at Rome. It comprised 50 of the apostolic canons, 27 canons of Chalcedon, 21 of Sardica, and 138 of various African councils. The work gave so much satisfaction that its author proceeded to make a second and further one, into which the former was interwoven. He now collected and edited the decretal letters of the popes down to Anastasius II. As the first systematic editor of decretals, Dionysius gave a new prominence to that branch of Canon Law (assimilating it to the Rescripts of the Emperors), and thus contributed much to strengthen the Papal pretensions.^k That in a work which no doubt was much valued and widely circulated, the epistles of popes should be placed on a level with the canons of councils, was no light matter. Accordingly the Spanish collection of Isidore, of which we have just spoken, borrowed and republished these decretals from the work of Dionysius, thus giving them standard authority in the code of the church of Spain. The way was thus prepared for the systematic interpolation of the Isidorean collection with a host of forged decretals purporting to be the genuine letters of early popes, but being in reality fictitious documents framed to advance the extravagant papal pretensions then rising into notice. This, indeed, did not take place until the ninth century, and the Pseudo-Isidorian work must not be confounded with the earlier collection of Isidore.^l

The work of Dionysius became extensively known as the standard repertory of canon law. Cresconius appears to have reproduced its contents for the use of the church of Africa; Chilperic in Gaul is said to have been acquainted with it; and in England, Theodore is believed to have quoted from it at the Synod of Hertford in 673. It is thought to have made its way even into the East. Its most important recognition, however, was that which was accorded to it by Pope Adrian I. when he transmitted a copy (augmented by certain additions) to Charlemagne; and by Charlemagne himself when he caused the work to be solemnly received by the synod held at Aix-la-Chapelle. From this period it is frequently spoken of by the title of Code de Hadriano, sometimes also by the name of Code de Canonum.

At this point we pause.^k The next century, saw the Pseudo-Isidorian collection foisted upon the church.

A new era then commenced; the era of extravagant papal claims, and of canonical sub-

^k Last of all he published a revised and corrected edition, which however has perished.

^l In connection with the word "decretal," the following explanation of terms, as used in the later canon law, may not be out of place:—"A canon is said to be that law which is made and ordained in a general council or provincial synod of the Church. A decree is an ordinance which is enacted by the pope himself, by and with the advice of his cardinals assembled, without being consulted by any one thereon. A decretal epistle is that which the pope decrees either by himself or else by the advice of his cardinals. And this must be on his being consulted by some particular person or persons thereon. A dogma is that determination which consists in and has a relation to some essential point of doctrine, or some doctrinal part of the Christian faith." Ayliffe, xxxvii.

^m The letter of Pope Siricius to Himerius, bishop of Tarragona, a.d. 385, seems the first authentic Papal decretal.

ⁿ It may be well to add a word as to Pseudo-decretals. These were designed to regulate the penances to be canonically inflicted on penitents. They do not appear to have had general sanction, but were locally adopted owing to the position and influence of their authors. Thus we have the Pseudo-decretals of Gregory the Great, of Theodore, of Bede, and others. See Ayliffe, xv.

ties engendered by ecclesiastics, whose professional labours and commentaries developed the law of the church into a system more artificial and intricate than that of the state. But these things lie beyond our present province, and it is only necessary to draw attention to the new phase which from this period the whole subject of canon law assumes.

From this time forward, the student has to do not merely with a collection of statutes but with a fabric of jurisprudence—not merely with a Codex Canonum, but with a Corpus Juris.

CANON OF THE LITURGY. That portion of the Liturgy which contains the form of consecration, and which in the Roman and most other rites is fixed and invariable, is called the Canon.

I. Designations. The word κανὼν designates either the standard by which anything is tried, or that which is tried by such standard (see Westcott on the Canon of the N. T., App. A). It is used in the first sense by Clement of Rome (1 Cor. 41), where he desires the brethren not to transgress the set rule of their service (τὸν ἀρισμὲνον τῆς λειτουργίας κανὼνα); in the second, when it is applied by liturgical writers to the fixed series of Psalms or Troparia for a particular day. It is in the second sense that the word canon is applied to the fixed portion of the Liturgy. As the names of certain saints were recited in this canon, the word κανὼν came to designate the act of entering a name in a liturgical list or DIPTYCH, and saints whose names were so entered were said to be canoni-ed.

It is also called Actio (see the article), and the title Infra Acti-nem (infra being used for infra), is not uncommonly placed over the prayer Communicantes in ancient MSS. See Le Brun, L'exposition de la Messe, tom. i, pt. iv, art. 4.

Pope Vigilius (Epist. ad Iroputarum) and Gregory the Great (Epist. vii. 64) call the canon Preceem, Preceem Canoniam, as being the prayer by pre-eminence.

It is also called Secreta and Secretum Missæ, from being said in a low voice. [SECRETUM.]

Tertullian appears to use the word Benedictio (= εὐλογία) to designate that portion of the Eucharistic service, or Actio, which included consecration. See De Pudic. c. 14; Ad Uxorem, ii. c. 6.

II. Early notices of this portion of the Liturgy. On the scriptural notices it is not necessary here to dwell.

In Justin Martyr's account of the celebration of the Eucharist for the newly-baptized (Apol. i. c. 65), this portion of the service is described as follows. "Then is presented (προσφέρεται) to the brother who presides, bread, and a cup of water and mixed wine (κράματος), and he, receiving them, sends up praise and glory to the Father of All, through the name of the Son and the Holy Spirit, and offers a thanksgiving (εὐχαριστιαν) at some length for that He has vouchsafed to us these blessings. And when he has finished the prayers and the thanksgiving, all the people present respond by saying Amen . . . And after the president has given thanks and the people responded, those who are called among us deacons give to each of those who are present to partake of the bread and wine and water over which thanks have been given, and carry them to those not present. And this meal is called with us eucharistia, of which none is permitted to partake, except one who believes that the things taught by us are true, and who has passed through the washing for remission of sins and new birth, and so lives as Christ commanded. For we receive these not as common bread or common drink, but as Jesus Christ our Saviour being incarnate by the Word of God possessed both flesh and blood for our salvation, so also we were taught that the food over which thanksgiving has been made by the utterance in prayer of the word derived from Him (τὴν δι' εὐχῆς λόγου τοῦ παρ' αὐτοῦ εὐχαριστηθεῖσαν τροφήν) is the flesh and blood of that incarnate Jesus. For the Apostles, in the memoirs which they wrote which are called Gospels, transmitted to us that Jesus Christ thus charged them; that after taking bread and giving thanks, He said, 'Do this in remembrance of me; this is my Body;' and that, in like manner, after taking the cup and giving thanks, He said, 'This is my Blood;' and that He gave to partake to them alone."

The same ceremony is more briefly described in the following chapter, in the account of the ordinary Sunday services, with the addition that the president sends up prayers and thanksgiving, "ὡς θύναμ αὐτῶν" according to his ability; for, as F. Xavier Schmid observes (Liturghik, i. 44), "even the prayers of the sacrifice of the mass depended for their contents and length on the pleasure of the several presidents, though they might often be moulded on a type given by some apostle or apostolic man."

Justin connects the notion of sacrifice with the Eucharist. In the Didache (c. 117, p. 386) he speaks of the acceptableness of the sacrifices (θυσίας) which Christ ordained, "that is, over the Eucharist or thanksgiving (ἐπι τῇ εὐχαριστίᾳ) of the bread and the cup;" and he regards the offering of fine flour (Lev. xiv. 10) as a type of the Eucharist.

In Irenaeus, with many passages interesting in a dogmatic point of view (with which at present we are not concerned) are several which contain liturgical indications. He dwells (Haer. iv. 18, § 4, p. 251) on the difficulty which they, who do not believe Christ to be the very Word of God through Whom all things were made, must experience in receiving the truth that the bread over (or, by occasion of) which thanks have been given ("panem in quo gratiae actae sint") is the Lord's Body. And again he says (Haer. v. 22, § 3, p. 294) that natural bread receives over it the word of God, and the thank-offering becomes the Body of Christ (ὁ γενοὺς ἄρτος ἐκδέχεται τὸν λόγον τοῦ Θεοῦ καὶ γίνε- ται ἡ εὐχαριστία σώμα Χριστοῦ). [EUCCHARIST.] Speaking of the heretic Marcus (Haer. i. 13, § 2), he says, that he pretended to perform a eucharistic service, and that by uttering a long form of invocation (ἐπὶ πλείον ἐκτείνων τὸν λόγον τῆς ἐπιλήθεως) he caused the liquid in the cups to appear red and purple. This was no doubt in imitation of the EUCCLYSIS of the orthodox. In Fragment 38, we read: "The offering (προσφορά) of the Eucharist is not fleshly, but spiritual, and therein pure. For we offer (προσφέρομεν) unto God the bread and the cup of blessing, giving thanks (εὐχαριστοῦντες) unto Him, for that He bade the earth bring forth these fruits for our sustenance; and at that point, after completing our offering, we call forth (ἐκκαλοῦμεν) the Holy Spirit, to declare (ὡς αὐτοφῶν) this sacrifice and the bread the Body of Christ and the cup the Blood of Christ, that they who partake of these figures (ἀντιτύπων) may obtain remission of their sins and everlasting life." And again (Haer. iv. 18, s. 5, p. 251) we read, that bread produced from earth, receiving over and above its proper nature the invocation or calling-forth of God (προσλαβέντος τὴν ἐκκλησίαν τοῦ Θεοῦ) is no longer common bread, but Eucharistia.

It is supposed by some that Clement of Alexandria describes the great eucharistic thanksgiving of his time, when he says that Christians, thank God for the blessings of creation and for the gifts of nature (Colortio ad Gentes, pp. 7 and 92, ed. Potter); for His mercy in redeeming us by His Word from the misery of the Fall; for Christ's life and works (ib. pp. 6 and 8; compare p. 87). This is not quite evident; nor is it clear that the allusions to the Cherubic hymn of Isaiah (Strom. v. 6, p. 112, p. 880) relate to the use of that name in the liturgy. But Clement is clearly right in the Eucharist, when he insists, against the Marcionites, on the use of wine (ELEMENTS), and says (Pedag. ii. 2, p. 186) that the Lord "blessed (εὐλόγησεν) the wine, saying, 'Take, drink; this is My blood,' the blood of the vine; under the figure of the holy stream of gladness He describes the Word shed forth for many for the remission of sins (τὸν λόγον τὸν περὶ πολλῶν ἐκχέμενον εἰς ἄφεσιν ἁμαρτιῶν εὐφροσύνης ἄγων ἀλληγορικῶς)." He gives no details of the form of consecration.

Tertullian's works contain many eucharistic allusions. The intercessions which, according to his testimony, Christians made on behalf of emperors and the peace of the empire (Apol. c. 30, 39), on behalf of enemies (Apol. c. 31), and for fruitful seasons (ad Scapulam, c. 4); and the commemoration of and intercession for the dead (De Echar. Cast. c. 11; De Monogami. c. 10) probably all took place in connexion with the sacrifice of the Eucharist (ad Scapulam, c. 2). According to the Marcionite theory, he says (adv. Marcion. i. 23), the eucharistic giving of thanks is performed over alien bread to another than the true God ("super alienum panem alii Deo gratiarum actionibus fungitur"), implying that a giving of thanks to the true God over the eucharistic bread, took place in the service of the Church. He describes (De Anima, c. 17) the blessing of the Cup in the Last Supper as "consecration;" and the consecration of the bread to be a representation ("figura") of the Lord's Body he held to have been accomplished by the words, "Hoc est corpus meum" (uda. Marcion. iv. 40; cf. de Orat. c. 6). Prayers which are called "orationes sacrificiorum" followed communion (de Orat. c. 14).

St. Cyprian says (Epist. 63, c. 17), that in the eucharistic action, "because we make mention of His Passion in all our sacrifices (for the Passion of the Lord is the sacrifice which we offer) we ought to do no other thing than He did; for scripture says that so often as we offer the cup in commemoration of the Lord and His Passion, we should do that which it is evident that the Lord did." He is arguing here especially for the mixed chalice (ΕΛΕΜΕΝΤΑ), but his words clearly have an application to the eucharistic office in general. We find also from Cyprian that in the eucharistic action ("in sacrificiis nostris"), as well as in prayers ("orationibus") intercession was made for brethren suffering affliction (Epist. 61, c. 4), whose names were recited (Epist. 62, c. 5), as were also the names of those who made offerings (Epist. 16, c. 2) and of the dead who had departed unscathed in communion with the Church (Epist. 1, c. 2). The liturgical office of a priest seems to be summed up (Epist. 65, c. 4) in sacrificing the oblation, in prayers and supplications ("orationes et preces"); and the brethren are admonished, that when they come together to celebrate the divine sacrifices with the priest of God, they should not indulge in noisy and unseemly prayers (De Orat. Dom. c. 4); a passage which seems to imply that the congregation took a prominent part in the eucharistic service.

Origen has more than one passage bearing upon the hallowing of the elements in the Eucharist. We read (contra Celsum, lib. 8, p. 399, ed. Spencer, 1658), "Let Celsus, as one who knows not God, pay his thank-offerings (χαριστήρια) to demons; but we, doing that which is well-pleasing to the Maker (Θεμιουργῶ) of the universe, eat the loaves offered with thanksgiving and prayer over the gifts (τοῖς μετ' εὐχαριστίας κ. εὐχῆς τῆς ἐπὶ τοῖς δοθεῖσι προσαγομένουσιν ἄρτοι), loaves which are made, in consequence of the prayer, a certain body, holy and hallowing those who use it with sound purpose." Again, in the Comment on St. Matthew (c. 14), Origen speaks of the bread being hallowed by the word of God and prayer. It is worthy of notice, that in the Alexandrian Liturgy, the priest in administering the bread says, σῶμα ἅγιον, not σῶμα Χριστοῦ (Daniel, Codex Lit. iv. 168).

Firmilian (†269), bishop of Caesarea in Cappadocia (Cyprian Epist. 75, c. 10, p. 818, Hartel) describes an ecstatic woman who performed a mock eucharistic act and sanctified the bread with an invocation of considerable power ("invocacione non contemptibili"), and offered the sacrifice to the Lord without the mystic words of the accustomed form ("sine sacramenta solite praedicationis"). In this passage invocatio probably corresponds to ἐπίκλησις, and praedictio to κήρυγμα, a word used by St. Basil (Epist. 141) for a liturgical form. It seems to be here implied that the form of the epiclesis used by the ecclesiastical was her own effusion; while the usual "praedicationes" of the sacred act were

"mysterics," and either unknown to her, or rejected as not satisfying her aspirations.

In the liturgical directions of the second book of the Apostolical Constitutions (c. 57, §§ 13, 14) no explicit account is given of the central portion of the service. After describing the bidding-prayer, or PROPHONEMAS of the deacon, and the prayer, with benediction, of the priest, the writer proceeds: "And after this let the sacrifice be made (ἱερῆσθω ἡ θυσία), all the people standing and praying in a low voice; and when the offering has been made (ἕταν ἀνευχθῆ), let each order partake severally of the Lord's Body and the precious Blood." No details are given of the sacrifice or anaphora, perhaps in consequence of the silence imposed in that respect by the "Disciplina Arcaica." The eighth book contains what is commonly called the Clementine Liturgy, which is considered elsewhere.

Cyril of Jerusalem gives us a description (Catech. Mystag. V.) of the liturgy as it was actually celebrated at Jerusalem in the early part of the 4th century. After describing the Sursum Corda, Preface, and Sanctus, he proceeds (§ 7): "Then, after hallowing ourselves by these spiritual hymns, we beseech the merciful God to send forth His Holy Spirit upon the elements displayed on the table (τὰ προκειμενα), to make the bread the Body of Christ and the wine the Blood of Christ. For most certainly, whatsoever the Holy Spirit may have touched, that is hallowed and transformed (ἡγιασται καὶ μεταβιβληται). Then, after that the spiritual sacrifice, the unbloody service (λατρεία) is completed, over that sacrifice of propitiation we beseech God for the common peace of the churches, for the welfare of the world, for kings, for soldiers and allies, for those in infirmity, for those in special trouble, and, generally, we all pray for all who need help; and this sacrifice we offer. Then we make mention also of those who have gone to rest before us, first patriarchs, prophets, apostles, martyrs; that God at their prayers and intercessions would receive our supplication (ἵπως ὁ Θεὸς ταῖς εὐχαῖς αὐτῶν καὶ προσβόλαις προσδέξηται τὸν ἡμῶν δέσπον); then also on behalf of the holy fathers and bishops who have gone to rest before us, and generally all of our body who have gone to rest before us; believing that the greatest benefit will accrue to their souls for whom the supplication is offered (ἢ δέσπας ἀναφύερα) while the holy and most awful sacrifice is displayed (προκειμένης)." Then follows the Lord's Prayer, the τὰ ἅγια τοῖς ἁγίοις, and communion.

St. Basil, in a remarkable passage (De Spiritu Sancto, c. 27 [al. 66], p. 34) speaks of some of the ceremonies of the Eucharist as having been derived from unwritten tradition. "The words of the Invocation [ΕΠΙΚΛΗΣΙΣ] at the displaying or dedicating (ἐπὶ τῇ ἀναδείξει) of the bread of thanksgiving and the cup of blessing, which of the saints left behind for us in writing? For, you know, we are not content with the things which the Apostle or the Gospel relate, but we prefix and suffix other expressions (προσέλογον καὶ ἐπιλόγομεν ἕτερα) which we regard as highly important for the mystery, having them handed down to us from unwritten tradition (ἐκ τῆς ἄγραφου διδασκαλίας παραλαβόντες)." This clearly indicates that the general form of consecration in the time of St. Basil corresponded to that in the existing Greek Liturgies, in that the portion actually taken from Scripture was preceded and succeeded by forms not scriptural, reputed to be taken from apostolic tradition, and that an Epiclesis was an essential part of the form.

St. Chrysostom informs us (on 2 Cor. Hom. 18) that after the Kiss of Peace there followed the blessing of the priest, to which the people responded, "And with thy spirit;" then, it is implied, came the "Lift up your hearts," &c., with the response "It is meet and right" and the cherubic hymn. As to the petitions of the great thanksgiving, he tells us (on St. Matt. Hom. 25 [al. 26]) that the priest bids us make the eucharistic offering (εὐχαριστήν) on behalf of the world, of those who have gone before and those who are to follow after us; and again (on 2 Cor. Hom. 2) for bishops, for presbyters, for kings and rulers, for land and sea, for wholesome air, for all the world. It appears also that founders of churches, and the village for which a church was founded, were specially named in the sacred service (In Acta, Hom. 18, c. 5). It also appears that the Agnus Dei was repeated in connexion with the eucharistic intercession: (ὁ κτῆρ αὐτῶν πρόειπε, δέξμενοι τοῦ ἀγνοῦ τοῦ κεμένου τοῦ λαβόντος τὴν ἁμαρτίαν τοῦ κοσμοῦ); on 1 Cor. Hom. 4; compare on St. John, Hom. 24, and on Acts, Hom. 21), and that the Lord's Prayer formed part of the canonical prayers (In Gen. s. Hom. 27). The τὰ ἅγια τῶν ἁγίων [SANCTA SACRATA] formed the transition to COMMUNION (Pseudo-Chrys. on Hebr. Hom. 17).

St. Augustine, at the end of the 4th century, testifies to the general order of the canon in his time in the North-African churches, which probably differed little in this respect from the Italian. Thus we find (ad Infant. de Sacramentis, p. 227) that the Sursum Corda formed the introduction to the more solemn part of the service, which is called "sanctificatio sacrificii Dei," and that this was followed by the Lord's Prayer. Again, that the intercessions at the altar included prayer for unbelievers, that God would convert them to the faith; for catechumens, that He would inspire them with a longing for regeneration; for the faithful, that they may persevere in that which they have begun (Epist. 217, Ad Vital.; De Bono Persere ant. c. 7); and for the dead (De Cura pro Mortuis, cc. 1 and 4). That the North-African Church exercised special care in regard to the prayers to be used at the altar, even while strict uniformity was not insisted upon, is indicated by the provision (III. Conc. Carth. c. 23, circ. A.D. 397) that the altar-prayers should always be addressed to the Father ("cum altari assistitur semper ad Patrem dirigatur oratio"), and that the celebrant is not to adopt prayers from extraneous authorities, "nisi prius eum instructioribus fratribus contulerit." A nearer approach to uniformity is indicated by the decree of a somewhat later council (Rheinwald's Archäol. p. 355), "ut preces quae probatae fuerint in concilio, sive praefationes sive commendationes seu manus impositiones, ab omnibus celebrentur."

The pseudo-Ambrosius de Sacramentis, writing probably in the 4th century, discusses (iv. c. 4) the question of consecration in the Eucharist. "By what words," he says, "and whose expressions (sermonibus) is consecration effected? By those of the Lord Jesus. For in the rest of the service praise is given to God, prayer is made for the people, for kings, for the rest. When the point of completing the venerable sacrament is reached, the priest no longer uses his own expressions, but the expressions of Christ."

Summary.—We find, then, that from the middle of the 2nd century, the presentation of the elements was regarded as a thank-offering or sacrifice [EUCARIST], especially for the fruits of the earth; that thanks were given to God over the bread and mixed wine, with prayer, which probably included the Lord's Prayer; that this was done in especial commemoration of the Lord's death, though it is not absolutely certain that the words of Institution were in all cases recited over the elements; and that there was in many churches an Invocation of the Holy Spirit. Moreover, it is clear that from the time of Tertullian at least intercession was made in the eucharistic service for the dead as well as the living. In the 2nd century, the details of the prayers and thanksgivings seem to have depended upon the president of the assembly, though a general type was probably in all cases followed; in the 4th century, the canon of the liturgy was evidently fixed, both in East and West, in forms not materially differing from those found in extant liturgies. From this point we proceed to consider these latter. For the discussion of their respective dates and mutual connexion, see LITURGY.

III. The Canon in existing Liturgies. In the extant Liturgies we find the Canon (which corresponds nearly to the ΑΝΑΠΟΙΟΝ of the Eastern ritual) consisting in all cases of nearly the same elements, variously arranged. We have in nearly all canons, after the Sanctus, commemoration of the Lord's Life and of the Institution, Oblation, prayer for living and dead, leading on to the Lord's Prayer, with Embolismus. In the Eastern Liturgies always, sometimes in the Gallican and Mozarabic masses, but not in the Roman or Ambrosian, we have an EPICLESIS, or prayer for the descent of the Holy Spirit on the elements. The annexed analytical table shows the principal differences of arrangement. The Canon is generally understood to exclude the Sanctus, while the Anaphora includes both the Sursum Corda and the Sanctus.

The portion between the Sursum Corda and the Sanctus will be described under PREFACE. In the Alexandrian (St. Mark's) Liturgy alone, the prayers for the living and the dead, and for acceptance of the sacrifice, are inserted in the midst of it. The arrangement of St. James's liturgy is typical of that usual in the orthodox Eastern Church, from which the Nestorian arrangement differs mainly in having the intercession for living and dead before the Epiclesis. The Gregorian (which is nearly identical with the modern Roman) and the Gallican (the arrangement of which is nearly the same as that of the Mozarabic) represent the principal Western types.

The canon of the Roman or Gregorian liturgy is divided into ten portions, which are usually known by their first words. These are as follows: 1. Te igitur, for acceptance of the sacrifice to be offered. 2. Memento, commemorating the living. 3. Communicantes, commemorating

The most remarkable peculiarity of the Roman rite is, that the commemoration of the living is separated from that of the dead, and precedes consecration, while in the Eastern liturgies the intercessions for living and dead form one prayer, and follow the recitation of the words of Institution. It seems probable that originally the Memento etiam followed the Memento immediately, just as in Greek liturgies the μνησθητι is followed by μνησθητι καὶ; and in fact in Gerbert's text of the Gelasian Sacramentary a Memento etiam, in a form differing considerably from the Gregorian, does follow immediately upon the Memento, so that both precede the Communicantes; while a Memento etiam in the Gregorian form follows the supra quas propitio (Daniel's Codex Lit. i. 15, 19; Gerbert, Vetus Liturgia Alemannica, i. 365). This arrangement may perhaps represent the state of transition from one form to the other, the earlier Memento etiam having been struck out when another nearly identical was introduced in another place.

The Gallican canon has peculiarities which show that it belongs to a wholly different family from the Roman. The prayers for living and dead, with the kiss of peace, precede the sursum corda and sanctus; the sanctus is immediately followed by what is called the "collectio post sanctus" (sometimes called the canon), which is again immediately followed by the recitation of the words of Institution. While the Roman canon is invariably the Gallican, which is very short, changes with every mass. To give one by way of example, the canon for the eve of the Nativity in the Gallo-Gothic missal (Daniel, Cod. Lit. i. 83) is "Vere sanctus, vere benedictus Dominus Noster Jesus Christus Filius tuus manens in coelis manifestatus in terris. Ipse enim pridie quam patretur, etc."

The same form, Vere sanctus, etc., follows the sanctus also in the Mozarabic liturgy. This is not, however, immediately followed by the words of Institution, but by a prayer commencing "Adesto, adesto Jesu bone pontifex," containing a petition for the sanctification of the oblation, which is followed by "Dominus Noster Jesus Christus, in qua nocte tradebatur, accepit panem, etc.," reciting the Institution.

In Mabillon's Sacramentarium Gallicanum the Roman canon is given with the first mass, and perhaps served, as Mabillon remarks (p. 453, Migne) for all; he supposes, however, that at an earlier period the Gallican had its own canon, and that the introduction of the Roman canon was the beginning of the supersession of the Gallican rite by the Roman, which was afterwards completely established (Prefat. § iv.).

The Commemoration of the Lord's Life begins in most cases, with taking up the ascription of holiness to the Almighty already set forth in the sanctus. For instance, in the Greek St. James, the ἄγιος of the preceding hymn is repeated in "Ἄγιος εἶ, βασιλεὺ τῶν αἰώνων . . . ἄγιος καὶ δ' μονογενὴς σου τοῦ Θεοῦ . . . ἄγιος δὲ καὶ το Ἐπιπέδ σου τὸ Ἅγιον (Daniel, Cod. Lit. iv. 109) which commences the commemoration; and the variable Ipsi Suetus of the Gallican and Mozarabic liturgies begins very commonly with the words "Vere sanctus, vere benedictus Dominus Noster Jesus Christus." The "commemorations" in St. James and St. Basil (Daniel iv. 427) recite with great dignity and beauty the creation of man, his state in Paradise, his fall, and redemption by God's mercy; so leading on to the commemoration of the Lord's death and the Institution of the supper. That of St. Chrysostom is much shorter. St. Mark (Daniel iv. 158) has in this place a mere allusion to the manifestation of the Lord, and a prayer for the descent of the Holy Spirit to bless the sacrifice. The Pot Suetus of the Gallican and Mozarabic canon contains, at least on the Lord's festivals, a commemoration of some portion of His Life; a feature entirely absent from the Roman. Some liturgies contain in this portion allusions to peculiar opinions with regard to the person of Christ; the Armenian, for instance, after reciting (Liturgy of the Armenian Church, tr. by Rev. S. C. Malan, p. 39) God's mercy in the prophets and the law, speaks of the Son as having taken a body "by union without confusion from the Mother of God and Holy Virgin Mary."

The Ethiopic liturgy agrees with the Coptic St. Basil and St. Gregory (Renaudot, Lit. Orient. i. 13, 29, 516) in breaking this portion of the office with responds. That of St. Gregory, for example, thrice inserts the "Kyrie Eleison."

The transition from the preceding prayer or ascription to the Commemoration of Institution is generally made in the Eastern liturgies by the words "ὅς τῆ ψυκῆς ἢ παρείδωτο," or some equivalent formula; those of St. James and St. Chrysostom add "μάλλος δὲ ἐαυτὸν παρείδου;" but this addition is not found in the Syriac St. James. The Coptic St. Basil (Renaudot, Lit. Orient. i. 14) has a wholly different form: "He instituted this great mystery of piety and worship, when He had determined to deliver Himself to death for the life of the world." The usual Western form is "Qui pridie quam pateretur;" but the Mozarabic has here "Dominus Noster Jesus Christus in qua nocte tradebatur," approaching in this, as in other respects, more nearly to the Eastern type. It has indeed been contended that this form is a comparatively recent interpolation, inasmuch as the prayer which follows is called the "Post Pridie" as if the usual formula had preceded (Krazer, De Liturgiis, 515; Neale, Eastern Church, Int. 472). But in fact the title "Post Pridie" is probably not so ancient as Isidore's time, who calls the prayer which follows consecration the "Confirmatio Sacramenti"; and it is surely very much more probable that the heading "Post Pridie" should have been inserted by some revisor familiar with Roman liturgical diction, than that the form "Qui pridie," common to the whole of Western Christendom, should have been displaced by one entirely unheard of, and that in the most solemn part of the Liturgy.

In no liturgy, in the narrative of institution, is any one Gospel followed, and the form adopted is such as to suggest rather an independent tradition than an artificial arrangement from the Gospels. Many of the forms add epithets expressive of veneration for the Person of the Lord.

Very many liturgies contain a reference to the Lord's raising his eyes to Heaven before breaking the bread. This is the case in those of St. James and St. Mark, but not in that of St. Chrysostom or in the kindred Nestorian forms; it is the case in all the Western forms, except the Mozarabic. St. Mark and St. James insert the raising of the eyes to Heaven before the blessing of the cup also. St. James and St. Basil mention the displaying or dedicating (ἀναβιβάζει) of the bread to God the Father.

The mingling of the wine with water is a well-known and almost universal custom; but in none of the Western liturgies is any mention of it made in the canon, while in the East it constantly appears. The Basilian has simply "mingling" (κεράσαι) (Daniel, iv. 429); St. James the fuller form, "mingling of wine and water." So also Coptic St. Gregory (Renaudot i. 30); and many of the Syro-Jacobite liturgies, as for instance that of St. John (ib. ii. 164). St. Chrysostom has no reference to the mixing; but it is nevertheless found in the liturgy of Nestorius, which is in a great measure derived from that of Constantinople.

It is an ancient belief that the Lord Himself partook of the bread and the cup in the Last Supper. This, however, appears but rarely in the Liturgies. The Coptic forms of St. Basil and St. Gregory refer to the Lord's tasting the Cup (Renaudot, i. 15, 31); and some of the Syro-Jacobite liturgies refer to His partaking of the Bread; for instance, St. James of Edessa (ib. ii. 373). That of Nestorius (ib. ii. 629) makes the Lord partake both of the bread and the wine.

Some of the Syro-Jacobite liturgies, drawn up at a time when the controversy was rife as to the use of leavened or unleavened bread in the Eucharist, [ELEMENTS] introduce into the canon such expressions as "common" or "leavened" bread. For instance, those of James Baradai and Matthew the Pastor (Renaudot, ii. 335, 348); and some, as that of Dioscorus (ib. 495) speak of His accomplishing the Mosaic Passover; as does also Nestorius (ib. ii. 629).

With regard to the actual words said over the bread, the usual Latin form is simply, "Hoc est Corpus Meum." The Ambrosian, in one text adds "quod pro multis confringetur;" in Pamelius's text, "quod pro vobis confringetur" (Daniel's, Collex i. 86); the Mozarabic, "quod pro vobis tradetur."

In the Greek, St. James has, "This is my Body, which is broken and given for you for the remission of sins," and with this the principal liturgies agree, except that few give both the words "broken" and "given." The words found in St. Luke and St. Paul, τὸ ὑπὲρ ἡμῶν διδόμενον, or κλάμενον, appear indeed in all Eastern liturgies with the exception of that of the Syriac Eustathius (Ren. ii. 236). Many of the Syro-Jacobite liturgies amplify the solemn words of the Lord by the insertion of peculiar expressions.

Of the words said over the wine, the Clementine Liturgy (Const. Apost. viii. 12, § 16) has the simplest, as probably the most ancient form—"This is My Blood, which is shed for many for the remission of sins." St. Chrysostom has a form identical with that in the English Prayer-Book; St. James and St. Mark have "shed and distributed" instead of the simple to be of so much importance that St. Boniface (about 750) consulted Pope Zacharias on the subject, who in answer sent him a copy of the canon with the crosses inserted in the proper places. This copy has unfortunately perished. Innocent the Third (De Myst. Missae, v. c. 11) states the correct number of crosses in the canon as twenty-five, the number still used in the Roman rite.

The prayer Hanc igitur has long been recited by the priest with hands extended over the Host and Chalice, in imitation of the gesture of a sacrificing priest under the Mosaic Law (Lev. iv. 4, &c.). But the more ancient practice was for him to recite this prayer profoundly inclined to the altar, as is clear from the testimony of Amalarius (Ecl. v. c. 30, p. 1331 A, Migne); and this practice continued as late as the end of the 13th century (Durandus, Rationale, iv. c. 39).

In the prayer Quam oblativem, at the words beneficium, uno vitam, ratam, ratam bibem, acceptabilem, occurs the second group of crosses of the Ordo Rom. II., which however defines nothing as to the number of crosses, or the manner of signing the oblation. The Ordo published by Hittorp at this point directs the priest to stand upright, blessing (i. e. signing with the cross) the bread only; then, at the words, Ut nobis Corpus et Sanguis fiat, to bless both the Host and the Chalice. The present custom, according to which the priest at the words Benedictam, &c. makes three crosses over the Host and Chalice together, is at least as old as the 11th century (Mierol. De Ecl. Ob. serv. c. 14).

At the words Qui Prælie, &c. the priest takes the Bread into his hands. In this prayer is introduced the third group of crosses of the Ordo R. II., at the words accipiens panem . . . benedixit, et item gratias agns benedixit.

Amalarius (Ecl. 31, p. 1331) expressly states that in his time the whole of the Canon was said secretè (see further under SECRETA). Of the ELEVATION of the Bread and Wine immediately after Consecration no mention is found in the old Sacramentaries, in the most ancient of the Roman Ordines, or in the early commentators on the rite, Amalarius, Walafrid Strabo, Florus, Remigius of Auxerre, Pseudo-Alenin, and the Micrologus. The only indication of elevation in those of the Ordines Romani which are older than the 12th century, is that at the words Per quem hæc omnia, noticed later.

At the words Hostiam puram, says the Ordo Rom. II (c. 10), is introduced the fourth group of crosses. Amalarius (Ecl. v. c. 30, p. 1331) says, "Here the priest makes the sign of the Cross four times over the Host, and a fifth over the Chalice only;" a practice somewhat different from that of modern times.

After the prayer Supra quæ propitia, the priest inclines himself with bowed head before the altar, and recites the Supplicite Te rogamus, in which he inserts a private prayer (Amalarius, u. s., c. 31); a direction for which is also found in some ancient MSS. of Sacramentaries. No crosses are noted by the Ordo Rom. II. at the words Sacrosanctum Fi. u. Tui &c., whence we may conclude that the crosses now used there are of later introduction than the 9th century. That they were introduced into the Roman rite not later than the 12th century is clear from the testimony of Innocent III. (De Myst. Missae, v. c. 11).

The beginning of the prayer Nobis quoque peccatoribus was anciently said with the voice somewhat raised, that the congregation might be able to join in it (Ordo Rom. II., c. 10). The priest beats his breast, as bewailing his sinfulness.

At the words sanctificans, vivificans, benedicens, &c. comes the fifth group of crosses, according to Ordo Rom. II. The Ordo Rom. II. (p. 61) is more explicit, desiring the priest to sign Host and Chalice three several times, making three several crosses. Compare Amalarius, Ecl., p. 1332. It is thought by some (as Bona, De Reb. Lit., ii. 14, n. 5) that at the words of this prayer which refer to God's creating and vivifying power, an offering of the fruits of the earth, if any were to be blessed, was placed on the altar by the attendant deacon. There is no doubt that a benediction of fruits of the earth is in some few ancient Sacramentaries prescribed in this place; but it is hard to say whether this is a relic of what was once an universal custom, or a peculiar observance of a few churches.

At the words, Per quem hæc omnia, &c., the archdeacon rose, the other deacons still standing with bowed heads, drew near to the altar, removed the fult of the corporal which covered the chalice, wrappd the oleritorium or veil round the handles, and at the words Per ipsum, &c. raised the chalice by the handles. The celebrant touched the chalice, still held by the archdeacon, with the consecrated wafers, making two crosses, and saying, Per ipsum et cum ipso . . . per omnia sæcula sæculorum. He then restored the wafers to their place on the altar, and the archdeacon placed the chalice by them (Ordines Rom. i. c. 16; ii. c. 10; iii. c. 15; compare Amalarius, Ecl., p. 1332). These directions respecting the crosses were changed in later times.

For the manner of saying the Pater Noster, see LORD'S PRAYER. Here it may suffice to say that, while in the Eastern, Gallican, and Spanish Churches this prayer was said by the whole people, in the Roman, from the time of Gregory the Great at least (see Epist. vii. 64) it was said by the priest alone, yet in an audible voice, so that the people (or the choir) might "acclaim" at the last petition. The Amen is not commonly found in ancient Sacramentaries; nor does it seem in place here, as the Lord's Prayer is prolonged in the Libera nos [EMULSUS] which follows.

When the celebrant (in a papal mass) reached the words Ab omni perturbatione securi, the archdeacon (Ordo Rom. I., c. 18) took the paten^d from the regionary sub-deacon, who was standing behind him, kissed it, and passed it to the second deacon. So Ordo Rom. II., 11, and III. 16. The fifth Ordo Rom., probably of considerably later date, desires the deacon to present the patens to the celebrating bishop to kiss.

For the remaining portion of the liturgy, see KISS, FRACTION, COMMUNION. [C.]

2. The accepted values of the several notes constituting the musical scale expressed philosophically. The reader is referred to Smith's Dictionary of Antiquities [MUSICA] for a general description of the sounds assumed by the Greeks, and the systems in which they were arranged. The assumptions of the Greek writers were of course adopted by the Latins, and appeared throughout the whole of the early and middle ages as the basis on which all their music rested. Considerable uncertainty is caused in this subject by the fact that there were two somewhat conflicting schools, the Aristoxeneans and the Pythagoreans. Pythagoreans having discovered the simple ratios of $\frac{1}{2}, \frac{2}{3}, \frac{3}{4}, \frac{4}{5}$, for the Octave, the Fifth, the Fourth, and the Tone (major), which last is the difference between the Fourth and Fifth, his disciples maintained that all sounds should be defined by determinate ratios, while Aristoxenus discarded this idea altogether, and maintained that the Tetrachord or Fourth should be divided into intervals, the values of which were to be determined by the ear only. This is probably the germ of the dispute which has lasted to the present day respecting the temperment of instruments with fixed tones: and as the true measure of an interval is a logarithm, it was of course impossible to reconcile at all completely these two opinions. Ptolemy examined the matter and established the truth of the Pythagorean views; Euclid seems to have endeavoured to combine them, that is, if the two treatises attributed to him, the Introductio Harmonicæ and the Sectio Canonis, are both genuine. The latter of these is usually considered genuine, and it is purely Pythagorean and rigidly exact; while the former, which is certainly Aristoxenean, and perhaps written ad populum, is considered more doubtful.

The canons according to Euclid or Aristoxenus can be reproduced with pretty considerable accuracy by means of logarithms and converging fractions: there will of course be a little discrepancy according as the 30th part of a Fourth or the 12th part of a Tone is taken for the element, these not being exactly equal: the former seems preferable; and it gives for the logarithm of the element .004165; and the following results in the cases not as yet determined:—

the Meson, or $\frac{3}{4}$ of those of the Hypaton. All these will be expressed in terms of the Proslambanomenos (A) by multiplying each of them by $\frac{8}{9}$.

The Greek Chromatic Scale then will be expressed in modern musical notation as nearly as possible; the following; Didymus's canon being taken for the sake of simplicity of notation:

And the Enharmonic Scale will be, according to Didymus's canon, this:

* The notation C is adopted to mean a C slightly flattened, C somewhat flatter still, and so for C: the actual amount of flattening or sharpening is determined by the ratio given. At present we have no notation to express these things; in the 16th century the symbol x was used to indicate the enharmonic diesis, but as it is now used for a double sharp, it has been thought prudent to avoid employing it here.

The word canon is applied in the Armenian rite to a section of the psalter, which in that rite is divided into eight sections called canons.

[H. J. II.]

CANONICAL BOOKS (Libri Canonici, Εκκλησιαστικὰ; Βιβλία Κανονίζιμενα, ἀναγιγνωσκόμενα). The question of the determination of the CANON, both of the Old and the New Testament, has been already fully treated in the DICTIONARY OF THE BIBLE (pp. 250 ff.). The present article relates mainly to the authoritative promulgation of lists or catalogues of books to be read, under the name of Scripture, in the services of the Church. The canon of books to be publicly read is not wholly identical with the canon of books from which the faith is to be established (see Westcott, u. s.).

1. Athanasius (Ep. Festal, tom. 1. pt. ii. p. 962, ed. Ben.) divided all the books which claimed the title of Holy Scripture into three classes. (1.) Βιβλία κανονίζιμενα, books which belonged in the fullest sense to the canon, and were the standard of the faith. (2.) ἀναγιγνωσκόμενα, books which, though not belonging in the strictest sense to the canon, might be read in time of divine service, and recommended to catechumens, "for example of life and instruction of manners." (3.) ἄσκηρα, spurious books claiming authority under venerable names. This distinction between the books truly canonical and the books proper to be read has been perpetuated in the Greek Church to this day; and it is the present rule of the English Church, which, in the sixth Article, after enumerating the books of the Hebrew canon, proceeds to say that "the other books (as Hierom saith) the Church doth read for example of life and instruction of manners; but yet doth it not apply them to establish any doctrine."

2. In the Latin Church also at the same period a distinction was drawn by some between the books of the Hebrew canon and the later additions. Rufinus (Erpos. in Symb. cc. 37, 38) divides the books into three classes: "Canonici . . . quos patres intra canonem concluderant, ex quibus fidei nostrae assertiones constare voluerunt; . . . ecclesiastici . . . quos legi quidem in ecclesiis voluerunt, non tamen proferri ad auctoritatem ex his fidei confirmandum; . . . ceteros vero scripturas apocryphas nominarunt, quas in ecclesiis legi voluerunt." Here, the ecclesiastici are exactly equivalent to the ἀναγιγνωσκόμενα of Athanasius. Jerome, in the Prologus Galeatus, enumerates the twenty-two books of the Hebrew canon, and adds, "quidquid extra hoc est inter apocrypha ponendum," giving the word apocrypha a wider meaning than that adopted by Rufinus, so as to include all books claiming to be Scripture not found in the Hebrew canon. This use of the word Apocrypha, which seems in ancient times to have been peculiar to Jerome, was adopted by the English and other Reformers in the sixteenth century, and so has become familiar to us. It is not, however, used in the sixth Article, where, as we have seen, the books read by the Church but not reputed strictly canonical are called simply "the other books."

3. The Apostolic Constitutions were probably intended to give an appearance of apostolic authority to actually existing practices, and the substance of the first six books may be as old as the 3rd century. In the fifty-seventh chapter of the second book (p. 67, ed. Ulltzen), we have an approach to a catalogue of the books to be read as Scripture in public worship. The passage is as follows: "Let the reader, standing in the midst on a raised space, read the Books of Moses, and of Joshua the son of Nun, those of Judges and of Kingdoms (Βασιλειῶν), those of Chronicles and the Return from Captivity [Ezra and Nehemiah]; in addition to these those of Job and of Solomon and of the sixteen Prophets . . . After this let our Acts [Acts of Apostles] be read and the Epistles of Paul our fellow-worker, which he enjoined on the church according to the guidance of the Holy Spirit; and after these let a deacon or presbyter read the Gospels which we, Matthew and John, delivered to you, and those which Luke and Mark, Paul's fellow-workers, received and left to you."

In this catalogue (unless Esther be omitted) the canon of the Old Testament is exactly that of the Jews. The Catholic Epistles are possibly included under Acts; for in a Syrian version, which places the Catholic Epistles immediately after the Acts, at the close of the Epistles follows the colophon, "The end of the Acts," (Wiseman, Horae Syriacae, p. 217, quoted by Westcott, Bible in Church, p. 176) as if the term Acts included the Epistles. It is not easy to see on what ground A. Ritschl (Alt-kathol. Kirche, p. 329, note 1) affirms the sentence relating to St. Paul's Epistles to be "plainly interpolated." It does not appear that there is any variation of MSS. in this place.

The list contained in the eighty-fifth of the Apostolic Canons, of the books to be held in veneration by all clergy and laity, is no doubt of much later date; but as it is in itself remarkable, and had a powerful influence on some of the Eastern Churches, it is given in the parallel arrangement opposite.

After the foundation of Constantinople (about A.D. 332), Constantine desired Eusebius to provide fifty splendid copies of the Scriptures for the churches of his new city. How he fulfilled his charge we cannot exactly affirm, as he gives no catalogue of the books he included in the collection, and not one of his copies is known to exist; probably the canon of these books differed little, if at all, from that of Cyril and Laodicea.

A catalogue of the books of Scripture, the authority of which is strictly ecclesiastical and not imperial, is found in the works of Athanasius. That great prelate joined to his "Festal Letter" * of the year 365 a list of the books which were canonized and traditional and confidently believed to be divine (τὰ κανονίζιμενα καὶ παραδεδεγμένα πιστευθέντα τε θεῶν εἶναι βιβλία). In the New Testament, this list gives exactly the books which we receive in the order in which they stand in the oldest Greek MSS. In the Old Testament, Baruch and the Letter are added to Jeremiah; Esther is placed among the Apocrypha; and the books of Maccabees are omitted altogether.

* The circulars in which the bishop of Alexandria annually announced to the different churches of his province the date of Easter were called "Paschal" or "Festal" letters.

books.^b The ecclesiastical canon of the Latin Church has in fact from the date of the first Latin translation included what we call the Apocryphal Books, though we not infrequently meet with expressions which show that the Latin Fathers were conscious that the books of their canon were in fact of very different degrees of authority. Gregory the Great, for instance, speaks of the books of Maccabees as not belonging, in the proper sense, to the canon.

At the third Council of Carthage, at which St. Augustine was present, and at which his influence no doubt predominated, a decree was made which determined the list of canonical Scriptures. The forty-seventh canon (Brun's Canones l. 133) begins thus: "It is also agreed, that besides Canonical Scriptures nothing be read in the Church as Holy Scripture (sub nomine Divinarum Scripturarum)," and a list of canonical writings follows, in which the Apocryphal books are mingled with those of the Hebrew canon, without distinction. Some of the MSS. however omit the two books of Maccabees. The canon ends with saying, in one text, "Let it be made known to our brother and fellow-bishop Boniface [of Rome], or other bishops of those parts, for confirming that canon, that we have received from our fathers these books to be read in churches;" in another text, "The books then amount to twenty-seven; let the churches across the sea [i. e. Italian] be consulted about that canon." In both texts, permission is given to read the Passions of Martyrs on their anniversaries.

The confirmation of Rome was probably obtained, and this canon of Carthage, though of course only binding in its proper force on the churches of a particular province, became the general ecclesiastical rule of the West. "Usage received all the books of the enlarged canon more and more generally as equal in all respects; learned tradition kept alive the distinction between the Hebrew canon and the Apocrypha which had been drawn by Jerome" (Westcott, Bible in Church, p. 190).

The Apostolical, Laodicæan, and Carthaginian canons were all confirmed by the second canon of the Quinisextine Council, A. D. 692 (Brun's Canones l. 36), no regard being had to their variations. The 68th canon made provision for the reverent treatment of copies of the sacred books.

In these lists, the first and second books of Kings are of course those which we call the first and second books of Samuel, and the third and fourth books of Kings those which we call the first and second books of Kings. It is not always easy to say with certainty what is intended by the first and second books of Esdras. In the Vatican and Alexandrian MSS. of the LXX., "I. Esdras" is the apocryphal book which we call the first book of Esdras, while "II. Esdras" is composed of the books of Ezra and Nehemiah (Westcott, Bible in Church, pp. 303 ff.). In the Vulgate, "I. Esdras" is the canonical book of Ezra, and "II. Esdras" the canonical book Nehemiah. Jerome in the Prologus Galeatus mentions only one Esdras, which (he says) the Greeks and Latins divided into two books; these two books were, as appears from the Praef. in Esdras and the Ep. ad Paulinum

^b Canon Westcott has however pointed out [art. CANON, p. 256] that his language is inconsistent on this point.

(c. 16) the canonical books of Ezra and Nehemiah. A letter of Pope Innocent I. to Exsuperius, bishop of Toulouse (A. D. 405) contains a list (given by Kircher, Quellensammlung, p. 504) identical in contents with that of the Council of Carthage, but differing in the arrangement of the books. There is also a papal list attributed to Gelasius (Pope A. D. 492-496) and another to Hormisdas (514-523). But none of these lists are free from suspicion. They were unknown in the middle of the 6th century to Cassiodorus, who collected the lists of canonical books current in his time, and still later to Isidore of Seville; and different copies of the Gelasian list vary in such a way as to suggest that they were not all derived from the same original. The letter of Innocent is found in the collection of Decretals attributed to Dionysius Exiguus, but that collection, as is well known, contains matter of a much later date than that of its supposed compilation (about 500). It is not, in fact, until the 8th century that we have distinct evidence of its existence, when it formed part of the Code sent to Charlemagne in the year 774 by Pope Hadrian I. The list of canonical books in the decree of Gelasius does not distinctly appear till about the 10th century. Both lists simply repeat the Canon of Carthage (Westcott, Bible in Church, 194 ff.). It is a remarkable instance of the rapid victory of usage over scholarship, that in the Codex Amiatinus (written about 541) of Jerome's Vulgate, the books of the Apocrypha are mixed with those of the Hebrew canon, against the express judgment of Jerome himself. But indications are not wanting, that the question of the value and authority of certain works was regarded in the Latin Church as distinct from that of ecclesiastical use.

The determination of the canon in Spain was a matter of unusual importance. The Priscillianists during the 5th century introduced a multitude of apocryphal writings, which it was one of the chief cares of the orthodox bishops to destroy. The Arian Goths probably rejected the Epistle to the Hebrews and the Apocalypse, as well as the Apocrypha of the Old Testament. On their conversion, they bound themselves to accept the Roman canon, as well as other decrees of the see of Rome. Isidore of Seville (456) follows Augustine expressly in dealing with the Old Testament Apocrypha, and reckons among "Canonical Scriptures" books which the Hebrews do not receive (see Origines, vi. 2). In the list which he gives (Kircher's Quellensammlung, p. 505), the books of the Old Testament are enumerated exactly as in the English canon, except that Job and Esther are placed after Solomon's Song. After Malachi, he adds, without any mark of distinction, "Judith et Tobias et Machabeorum Libri quibus auctoribus scripti sunt minime constat." Ecclesiasticus, Wisdom, and the apocryphal books of Esdras, do not seem to be mentioned at all. In the New Testament, after the Gospels and Acts, he proceeds, "Pauli Epistolæ xiv, novem ecclesiasticæ, reliquæ discipulis scriptæ." Ad Hebraeos a plerisque Latinis ejus esse dubitatur, propter dissonantiam sermonis; eandem autem Barnabæ, alii Clementi adscribunt. Jacobi, Petri II, Cath. Judæ et Johannis. Johannis Apocalypsis. Cætera Apocrypha." He seems therefore to have acknowledged only one epistle of St. John.

The code which Charlemagne gave at Aix for the government of the Church was founded upon that which he received from Pope Hadrian as mentioned above. In this it was enjoined that "the Canonical Books only be read in the Church;" but it does not appear that any definite list was given, though in the printed editions the list of Laodicea was appended. Aleuin, the well-known English scholar (†804), Charlemagne's chief literary adviser, was commissioned towards the close of his life to undertake a revision of the Latin Bible for public use. He restored in a great measure Jerome's text in those books which Jerome had translated, but did not separate the Apocrypha. Several MSS. remain which claim to be derived from Aleuin's revision. One of the finest of these, known as "Charlemagne's Bible," is in the British Museum. A peculiarity of this copy is, that it contains the apocryphal Letter to the Laodiceans as a fifteenth Epistle of St. Paul. [C.]

CANONICAL HOURS. [HOURS OF PRAYER.]

CANONICI. The canonical clergy have occupied an intermediate position between the monks and the secular clergy. As living together under a rule of their own they were often regarded popularly as a species of monks; while, inasmuch as their rule was less strict, and their seclusion from the world less complete, they were sometimes, from a monastic point of view, classed even with the laity, as distinguished from those who were "religious." Thus the colleges of the "canonici" were sometimes called "monasteria" (Hospin. De Monach. iii. vi. p. 72 b.); while Dudo (De Act. Normān. iii. v.) broadly dividing Christians into "regular" or "contemplative," and "secular" or "practical" places "canonici" among the "secular" (Du Cange, Gloss. Latinit. s. voce). The canonici did not fully assume this quasi-monastic character till the 8th century. The theory which would trace them back as a monastic order to St. Augustine, and which ascribes to him the Augustinian Rule scarcely needs refutation (Hospin. De Monach. iii. vi. p. 71 b.; Bingh. Origin. Eccles. vii. ii. § 9).

The "canonici" were at first the clergy and other officials attached to the church, and were called either as bound by canons (v. Du Cange, s. v.), or more probably as enrolled on the list of ecclesiastical officers, kanonoi, matricula, albus, tabula (Socr. H. E. i. 17; Theod. Lect. H. E. i. p. 553; Conc. Chalced. 451 A. D. c. 2; Vales. ad Socr. H. E. v. 19; Bingh. i. v. § 10). Du Cange explains the word by the "canon" στροφάλις; a certain proportion (one-fourth) of the sines of the faithful set apart for the maintenance of the clergy and other officers of the church (Conc. Agath. 506 A. D. c. 36; Aurel. iii. 538 A. D. c. 11; Narbon. 589 A. D. cc. 10, 12). Another, but most improbable derivation is from kanonikoi (Du Cange, s. v.). A passage is cited by Du Cange from the life of Antony attributed to Augustine—ἐρίμα τὸν κανόνα—to show that the word was equivalent to "clerus." But "canonici" was at first a more comprehensive word than "clerus," embracing all who held ecclesiastical offices, as readers, singers, porters, &c. (Thomass. Vet. et Nov. Discipl. i. ii. 34; Bingh. i. v. § 10).

Some bishops even before the 5th century, for instance Eusebius of Vercelle, Ambrose of Milan, the great Augustine, and Martin of Tours, set an example of monastic austerity to the clergy domiciled with them, which became widely popular (Conc. Tolet. ii. A. D. 531, c. 1; Turon. ii. A. D. 567, c. 12). Gelasius I. at the close of the 5th century founded an establishment of "canonici regulares" at Rome in the Lateran (Hospin. iii. vi. p. 72 b.; Bingh. vii. ii. § 9). In 531 A. D. the 2nd Council of Toledo speaks of schools conducted by the "canonici" wherein the scholars lived "in domo ecclesie sub Episcopi presentia" (cc. 1, 2); and, before the end of the same century, the 3rd Council of Toledo orders the Scriptures to be read aloud in the refectory of the priests, "sacerdotali convivio" (c. 7). A similar phrase, "mensa canonica," is quoted by Du Cange from Gregory of Tours (Hist. x. ad fin.) in reference to the "canonici" established by Baudinus, archbishop of Tours, in the 6th century, and from a charter granted by Chilperic in 580 A. D. (Miraei Diptom. Belg. ii. 1310, ap. Du Cange, s. v.). In the 3rd Council of Orleans, A. D. 538, the "canonici" are forbidden secular business (Conc. Aurel. iii. c. 11). The college in which the canons resided, or rather the church to which the college was attached, is styled "canonica" in a charter 724 A. D. (Chart. Langob. Brunett. p. 470, ap. Du Cange, s. v.).

Bishops, especially for missions, were frequently chosen out of the monasteries; and these naturally surrounded themselves with monks. In the words of Montalembert many a bishopric was "cradled" in a monastery. Thus in Armenia "the principal communities formed by the monastic missionaries (from Britain in the 5th century) were soon transformed into bishoprics." (Monks of the West, II. 273.) In countries which owed their Christianity to monks, the monastery and the cathedral rose side by side, or under one roof. But cathedral-monasteries are, strictly speaking, almost peculiar to England (Stubbs, Introd. to Epp. Cantuar. xxi.); for, while elsewhere, for the most part, either the cathedral or the monastery ousted the other, in England many of the cathedrals retained their monastic, more exactly their quasi-monastic character till the Reformation. Usually it was the mother-church, as Canterbury or Lindisfarne, which thus adhered to its original institution, while the new cathedrals for the sub-divided diocese passed into the hands of the non-monastic clergy (Stubbs, v. sup. xxi.). In either case, as at Worcester, the cathedral clergy were the parochial clergy of the city (Stubbs, The Cathedr. of Worcester in the 8th Century, Communic. to the Historic. Sect. of the Instit. July, 1862). The result of this combination on the clergy generally, and on the monks, was twofold. On the one hand the clergy became, in the first instance, more monastic; on the other, a somewhat more secular tone was given for a time to the monasteries. But, as these cathedral-monasteries came to lose their missionary character, other monasteries arose, by a reaction of sentiment, of a less secular and of a more ascetic kind; e. g. in England, Crowland, and Evesham, in contrast to Peterborough and Worcester (Stubbs, v. sup.). By the Council of Clovesho, A. D. 747, all monasteries proper in England were placed under the Benedictine rule;

and thus the severance was defined of the chapters and the monasteries. (Conc. Cloesh. c. 24; cf. Rep. S. Bened. c. 58; cf. Mabill. AA. O. S. B. I. Praef. lvi.)

But Chrodegang, or Chrodegang, cousin of Pepin and archbishop of Metz, in the latter part of the 8th century, was virtually the founder of "canonici" as a semi-monastic order. By enforcing strict obedience to the Rule and the Superior he tightened the authority of the bishop over the clergy of his cathedral (Reg. Chrodeg. ap. Labb. Conc. vii. 1445). But, while retaining the monastic obligations of "obedience" and of "elastity," he relaxed that of poverty. His "canonici" were, like monks, to have a common dormitory and a common refectory (Reg. Chrod. c. 3; Conc. Mogunt. 813 A. D. c. 9). Like monks they were to reside within the cloister; and egress, except by the porter's gateway, was strictly forbidden (Conc. Aquisgr. 816 A. D. cc. 117, 144). But they were allowed a life interest in private property; "though after death it was to revert to the church to which they belonged; and, which is especially curious, they were not to forfeit their property, even for crimes and misdemeanours entailing otherwise severe penance. (Reg. Chrod. cc. 31, 32; cf. Stubbs, Lipp. Cantuar. Introd. xxiv.) Thus the discipline of the cloister was rendered more palatable to the clergy; while a broad line of demarcation was drawn between them and monks (Conc. Mogunt. cc. 9, 10; Conc. Turon. III. c. 25). They were not to wear the monk's cowl (Reg. Chrod. c. 53, interpolated from Conc. Aquisgr. c. 125). The essential difference between a cathedral with its "canonici" and an abbey-church with its monks, has been well expressed thus: the "canonici" existed for the services of the cathedral, but the abbey-church for the spiritual wants of the recluses happening to settle there (Freeman, Norman Conquest, ii. 443).

Chrodegang's institution was eagerly adopted by the far-seeing Karl, in his reformation of ecclesiastical abuses; indeed he wished to force it on the clergy generally (Robertson's Ch. Hist. II. 200). He ordered the "canonici" to live "canonice," and to obey their bishop as abbat; a similar enactment was made at the Councils of Aachen, 788 A. D. and of Mentz, 813 A. D. (Conc. Aquisgr. cc. 27, 29; Conc. Mogunt. c. 9; cf. Du Cange, s. v.; Hospin. xxii. 154; Robertson's Ch. Hist. II. 198). It was evidently the great legislator's intention to make these colleges of canons instrumental for education (Conc. Cabill. 813 A. D. c. 3; Alt-eer. Ascticon. II. 1). Thus one of the principal canons was the "Scholasticus" (schoolmaster, or more properly, chancellor, Freeman, Norman Conquest, II. 443), and the buildings were arranged mainly to be used as schools (Hospin. p. 153-6).

The rule of Chrodegang in its integrity was short-lived. By the middle of the 9th century it was in force in most cathedrals of France, Germany, Italy, and, more partially, in England (Robertson's Ch. Hist. II. 200). But, though milder even than that mildest of monastic rules—the Benedictine—it was too severe to be generally accepted by the clergy, especially in England. In the 9th century (Robertson, II. 209), or, rather, by the end of the 8th (Stubbs, Et. p.

* Also, the diet was more generous. (Reg. Chrod. c. 32; Conc. Aquisgr. 816 A. D. c. 122.)

Cantuar. Intr. xvii.), bodies of secular clerks, with the character if not the name of "canonici," had supplanted monks in many parts of England; but they soon lost the ground which they had gained. Partly, perhaps, from the popularity of monks with the laity in England, as the harbinger of Christianity, and as intimately connected with the history of the nation, partly from the repugnance of the clergy to asceticism, the "Iotharingiana" rule never took root here (Freeman, v. sup., II. 85). According to William of Malmesbury (Stubbs, De Innoct. Cruz. Intr. ix.), it never was accepted here. "An attempt was made to introduce it in the Legatine Council of 786, which probably went no farther in effect than to change the name of secular clerks into canons, and to turn secular abbots into deans" (Stubbs, v. sup. x.; Conc. C. l. yth. c. 4.) By 1050 A. D. it was nearly obsolete in England (Stubbs, v. sup. ix.). Celibacy seems to have formed no integral part of the plan in the foundation of Waltham. (Freeman, v. sup. II. 443; Stubbs, De Ino. Cruz. xii.)

Even where it had been at first in vogue the Rule of Chrodegang was soon relaxed; nor were the efforts of Adalbero, Willigis, and others, effectual to restore it (Robertson's Ch. Hist. II. 477). The "canonici" became, first, a community dwelling together under the headship of the bishop, but not of necessity under the same roof with him; next, an "acephalous" community,—a laxity which had been specially condemned by the Council of Aachen, already mentioned (c. 101)—and, gradually, instead of representing the clergy of the diocese they developed into a distinct, and, sometimes, antagonistic body (Robertson, II. 476). As their wealth and influence increased they claimed a share in the government of the diocese (Robertson, II. 401). Trithemius speaks of the "Canonici Trevirenses" in the close of the 10th century, as both "in name and in reality "seculares non regulares"; and Hospinian protests against the very expression "canonici seculares,"^c as a contradiction in terms, like "regulares irregulares." (Hospinian, v. sup. p. 73.)

The "Canons Regular of St. Augustine," founded by Ives of Chartres and others, in the 11th century, may be regarded as resulting from the failure of the attempts to force the canonical rule on the clergy of the cathedral and collegiate churches (Robertson's Ch. Hist. II. 708). These "canonici" differed but slightly from the monks; and, unlike the "canonici" of older date, resembled the monks in the renunciation of private property. This order was introduced into England very early in the 12th century by Adelwald, confessor of Henry I, but some assign an earlier date. At the Reformation there were, according to Hospinian (p. 73), more than 8000 "coenobia canonicorum" in Europe; the number declined greatly afterwards. The various mediaeval subdivisions of "canonici," enumerated by Du Cange (s. v.) do not fall within our present scope. (See also Thomassin, Vetus et Nova Disciplina, I. lii.)

^b Till the 14th century these semi-regular, semi-secular foundations seem to have been ungenial to the English. Harold, the founder of Waltham, is an exception. (Freeman, Norm. Conq. II. 445.)

^c The expression "secular canon" sometimes occurs prematurely (e.g. in Freeman's Norman Conquest) where "secular clerks" would be more exact.

Canonice in the primitive church were devout women, taking charge of funerals and other works of charity (Socr. II. E. l. 17; Soz. II. E. viii. 23, cf. Justin. Novell. cc. 43, 59, ap. Menardi Comm. in S. Bened. Anim. Conc. Reg. c. 68). They not originally bound by a vow, nor compelled to live in a community (Bingh. Orig. Ecl. VII. iv. § 1; but cf. Pelliccia Ecl. Christ. Polit. l. iii. 3, § 1), they lived apart from men, and had a special part of the church reserved for them in the public services (Du Cange, s. v.). In the 8th century the "canonice," "canonissae," or "canonichissae," lived together after the example of the "canonici," being like them attached to particular churches (Pellie. l. iii. 4, § 1). They are distinguished from nuns (Conc. Francof. 794 A.D. cc. 46, 47); but, like nuns were strictly debarred from the society of men (Conc. Aquigr. 816 A.D. c. 20; cf. C. n. Cabill. 813 A.D. c. 53). They were to occupy themselves specially, like the "canonici" in education (Conc. Francof. c. 40; C. n. Aquigr. c. 22). See further Martyrb. Centur. viii. 6. The "do- micline" or secular canonses are of later date (Du Cange, s. v.). (See also Thomass. Vet. et Nov. Discipl. l. iii. cc. 43, 51, 63; Altescras Aetion. III. 3.) [I. G. S.]

CANONISTAE. [CANON LAW.]

CANONIZATION is defined by Ferraris (sub voc. Venerabilis Sanctorum) to be a "public judgment and express definition of the Apostolic See respecting the sanctity and glory of one, who is thereupon solemnly added to the roll of the saints, and set forth for the public veneration of the whole Church militant, and the honours due to saints decreed to him." And it is distinguished by him from beatification, which means, according to the same authority, a like "lawful grant by the pope to a particular kingdom, province, religious body, or place, to venerate and invoke, in the mass and by exposition of relics," &c., some particular person, deceased. Both, in this sense, date subsequently to the period of which the present work treats, the first formal canonization by a pope being said to be either that of St. Sulpert by Pope Leo III. A.D. 804, at the request of Charlemagne (Ferraris, as above), or (which however depends on a letter said to be a forgery) that of Udalric, bishop of Augsburg, by diploma of Pope John XV. A.D. 993 (Mabill. Act. SS. Ben. Saec. V. Pref. § 101; Gibbings, Traject. on the Diptychs, p. 33, Dubl. 1864). But canonization in some sense (= inserting in the Canon of the Mass) is the outgrowth of a practice of very early date (being alluded to by Tertullian, De Cor. iii., and, earlier still, in the Martyr. Polycarp. xviii., ap. Euseb. II. E. iv. 15), viz. that of reciting at a certain part of the Eucharistic service the names (among others) of deceased saints and martyrs [DIPTYCHS]; not for invocation ("non invocatur," St. Aug. De Civ. Dei, xxii. 10), but "in memory of those who have finished their course, and for the exercising and preparation of those who have yet to walk in their steps" (Mart. S. Polyc.). The authority by which a name was inserted in this list—the saint being then said to be "vindictatus" (Optat. De Schism.

Donat. l. 16)—was, until at least the 10th century, that of the bishop, with (no doubt) the consent of his clergy and people, and, as time went on, of the synod and metropolitan, and according to Mabillon (Pref. in Act. SS. Bened. p. 412), of the emperor or king. But the consent of the last named could only have been asked or given in cases of political importance, real or supposed. The last use of canonization by a metropolitan is said to have been that of St. Gaultier, or Gaucher, abbat of Pontoise, by the Archbishop of Liouen, A.D. 1153 (Gibbings, as above). And a decree of Pope Alexander III. A.D. 1170, gave the prerogative to the pope thenceforth, so far as the Western Church was concerned [CALENDAR; MARTYROLOGY; MENOLOGY]; who proceeded (acc. to Ferraris) in two ways, either by formally sanctioning local or other saints, who had long before been canonized in effect by common consent, or by initiating the process himself in new cases. "Canonizare" is also used to signify simply to "approve," or to "appoint to a canonry," or to enrol in the "canon" of the clergy, or to make a canon in a Council. (Salig. De Diptychis; Du Cange; Suicer; Ferraris, Prompta Biblioth.) [A. W. H.]

CANOPY. The fixed solid canopy, or corporium, over the altar, has already been described under ALTAR, p. 65. It has been supposed, however, that the altar was sometimes anciently covered with a canopy of a lighter kind, as of silk. In the will of Abbot Aredius (in the Works of Gregory of Tours, p. 1313, ed. Ruinart), who died A.D. 591, we find, among other things declared necessary for a church, "cooperarius holosericos tres; calices argenteos quatuor . . . item cooperarium lineum . . ." These silken coverings Binterim (Deutschl. vii. 3, 353) believes to be not altar-cloths, but canopies, while the "cooperarius lineus" is an altar-cloth, distinct from the corporal. Gregory of Tours also, a contemporary of Aredius, describing a dream or vision, says, "cum jam altarium cum oblationibus pallio serico cooperatum esset," Gauthmann entered (Hist. Franc. vii. 22, p. 347, ed. Ruinart). Here again Binterim (u. s.) supposes that a canopy is intended, insisting on the words of Optatus (De Schism. Donat. vi. 1, p. 92), that it was a matter of notoriety that the boards of the altar were covered with linen. The words of Optatus, however, written of the African church in the 4th century, have but little application to Gallican customs at the end of the 6th, nor are they in fact contradictory to the words of Gregory; for the altar may have been first covered with linen, and the oblations upon it afterwards covered with a silken veil. This was probably the case; for a word derived from "cooperire" would naturally refer to covering up closely, rather than to shading as a canopy does. Compare ALTAR-CLOTHS, p. 69. There can be little doubt that Mabillon and Ruinart are right in explaining the word cooperarius of an altar-covering or VEIL. The "cooperarius Sarmaticus," which Gregory rejects (De Vitis Patrum, p. 8, 1195), seems to have been intended for a similar use.

The custom of carrying a canopy over the pope in certain processions does not seem to be mentioned earlier than the 12th century (see Ordo Romanus XI. 17 126; 40, 136); and the use of a canopy to overshadow the Eucharist in Corpus Christi processions is later still.

For the canopy surmounting the seat of a Bishop, see TIMONÉ. [C.]

CANTABRARI. Literally, bearers of the cantabrum, or cruciform standard of the later Roman emperors, in military or religious processions. The word occurs in the Cod. Theod. xiv. 7, 2, as applied to a guild of such persons, and has no direct connexion with ecclesiastical antiquity. Bingham, however (xvi. 5, 6), cites the passage in its bearing upon the mention of centurions by the C. in Trullo (c. 61) as connected with divination; and hence it appears in the index to his work as the name of "a sort of conjurers." The cantabrum itself is mentioned by Minucius Felix (Octav. c. 27) and Tertullian (Apol. c. 16) as an instance of the unconscious honour paid by the heathens to the figure of the cross. [E. H. P.]

CANTATORIUM. [ANTIPHONARIUM.]

CANTERBURY, COUNCIL OF, two in Labb. &c.:—(1) A.D. 605, fictitious, resting on a forged charter of Ethelbert to St. Augustine's monastery at Canterbury (see Haddan and Stubbs, Conc. iii. 56, 57). (2) A.D. 685, founded on a mere mistake. [A. W. H.]

CANTHARUS (or -UM), also PHARO-CANTHARUS, also CANTHARUS CEROSTATUS or CEROSTRATUS, i. a chandelier for ecclesiastical use, described by Ducange, s. v. as "a disc of metal, furnished with candles fixed upon it." The word is of very frequent occurrence in Anastasius and other early authorities: e.g. S. Sile. xxxiv. § 34, "canthara cerostrata xii aerea;" ib. § 36, "pharancia cantharum argenteum cum delphinis cxx, ubi oleum ardet ardinum pisticum . . . canthara cerostrata in gremio basilicene quinquaginta." S. Symmach. liii. § 80, "ad beatum Petrum xx canthara argentea fecit." Among the articles of church property confiscated by Pope Sergius I. CANTIANILLA, with CANTIANUS and CANTUS, martyrs at Aquileia, commemorated May 31 (Mart. Rom. Vet., Usuardi). [C.]

CANTIANUM CONCILIIUM. [KENT.]

CANTICLE (Canticum). A species of sacred song. St. Paul (Eph. v. 19) mentions "psalms and hymns and spiritual songs," ᾠδοὺς ἐν τοῖς ψαλμοῖς καὶ ᾠδαῖς πνευματικαῖς ("cantics spiritualibus," Vulg.). He also couples the three terms in Col. iii. 16. Some of the psalms are called in the LXX. and Vulg.: ψαλμὸς ᾠδῆς (Psalms Cantic), e.g. LXVII, XCI. (LXVIII, XCII), or ᾠδὴν ᾠδῆς (Lauds Cantic); e.g. XCI. (XCIII). On the distinction between a psalm and a canticle, Augustine remarks (on Ps. LXVII.) that some before his time had made this distinction between a canticle and a psalm, that since a canticle is sung with the voice alone, but a psalm with the accompaniment of an instrument; so by a canticle, the intelligence of the mind is signified, by a psalm the operation of the body. He goes on to give as a reason why the book of Psalms is so called rather than the book of Canticles, that a canticle may be without a psalm, but not a psalm without a canticle. Jerome distinguishes to the effect that psalms properly belong to the region of ethics, so that we know through the bodily organs what to do or avoid—while canticles deal with higher matters, the harmony of the universe, and the order and concord of creation. Hymns are distinguished from both, as being directly occupied with the praises of God. Others distinguish differently, while Chrysostom and Basil define to much the same effect. So also Thomasius. Bona distinguishes between four sorts of sacred song: (1) Canticle (Canticum) which is sung by the voice alone; (2) Psalm (Psalms), which is sung by the voice, accompanied by a musical instrument; (3) Canticle of a psalm (Canticum Psalmi), when there is an instrumental prelude to the voice; (4) Psalm of a canticle (Psalms Cantic), when the voice begins and the organ or other instrumental accompaniment follows. But this seems to be over refining, and hence some have considered the three words [Psalm, Canticle, Hymn] as virtually synonyms, on the ground that it is easy to show that sacred songs were called by these three names, but not so easy to show that these names represent different kinds of song, since they are used promiscuously in the titles of the psalms. Hence it has been thought: by some that St. Paul in the passages referred to is simply recommending the use of the psalter. On the whole we may be satisfied with St. Augustine's conclusion, who after discussing the point at some length, says he will leave the question to those who are able, and have the leisure to make the distinction, and to define it accurately. The broad distinction, to which the derivation of the Greek words would lead, seems to be that a psalm was sung to instrumental accompaniment, a canticle with the voice alone; while a hymn is a direct praise of, or thanksgiving to God.

In ecclesiastical use the word canticle is applied to those poetical extracts from Holy Scripture, which are incorporated among the psalms in the divine office. For the most part they are said at Lauds. In the Gregorian and its derived rites, a canticle is said every day among the psalms at Lauds, immediately before the three final psalms; and St. Benedict in his rule directs that on each day at Lauds a canticle from the Prophets shall be sung, "sicut psalmi Ecclesie Romanae." These canticles, still retained in the Roman and cognate breviaries, are: seven from the Old Testament, said in the following order—

At Lauds:—

- On Sundays and Festivals, "Benedicite."
- On Mondays, The Song of Isalah (Is. xii).
- On Tuesday, The Song of Hezekiah (Is. xxxviii. 16-20)
- On Wednesday, The Song of Hannah (1 Sam. ii. 1-10)
- On Thursday, The Song of Moses (Ex. xv. 1-19)
- On Friday, The Song of Habakkuk (Hab. iii. 2-19)
- On Saturday, The Song of Moses (Deut. xxxii. 1-43)

And also three from the New Testament:—

CANTICUM EVANGELICUM

These canticles are said with an antiphon, in the same manner as the psalms.
 Other Western breviaries use a greater variety of canticles: thus the Benedictine and other monastic breviaries of the same type, have these canticles instead of psalms, in the third nocturn on Sundays and festivals.
 In the Office of the Greek Church, the following nine canticles, called odes (ὕδα), are appointed at Lauds:—

- (1) The Song of Moses in Exodus (Ex. xv. 1-19).
- (2) The Song of Moses in Deut. (Deut. xxxii. 1-43).
- (3) The Prayer of Hannah (1 Sam. ii. 1-10).
- (4) The Prayer of Habakkuk (Hab. iii. 2-19).
- (5) The Prayer of Isaiah (Is. xvi. 9-20).
- (6) The Prayer of Jonah (Jon. ii. 2-9).
- (7) The Prayer of the Three Holy Children (Dan. iii. 3-34). [Jo Apocry.]
- (8) The Song of the Three Holy Children. [BANK-PIETRE.]
- (9) Magnificat and Benedictus.

These are assigned:—(1) to Sunday and Monday; (2) to Tuesday; (3) to Wednesday; (4) to Thursday; (5) to Friday; (6) and (7) to Saturday; (8) and (9) are said at a different time.
Benedictus and Benedicite were in early times sung in some masses: the former before the prophecy in some early Gallican masses; the latter is prescribed in the 4th Council of Toledo to be sung before the epistle on Sundays and festivals of martyrs.

"Te Deum" is the only composition not taken from Holy Scripture, which is usually considered a canticle. Some ritualists, however, think it should be reckoned among hymns.

For a fuller collection of canticles see the Mozarabic breviary, and Thomasius, vol. ii.

[H. J. H.]

CANTICUM EVANGELICUM. "Benedictus" was sometimes so called, probably to distinguish it from the other canticle said at Lauds, which is taken from the Old Testament. The expression occurs in a MS. Pontifical of the Church of Poitiers of about 800 A.D., and elsewhere.

[H. J. H.]

CANTICUM GRADUUM. The Gradual Psalms were sometimes so-called. They were recited in the following order: the first five with Requiem aeternam, &c., and followed by a few verses, were said "pro defunctis." The next ten each with "Gloria;" five "pro congregatione," and five "pro familiaribus;" each group being followed by a few verses and a collect.

[H. J. H.]

CANTOR. (Psalmista, ψάλτης, ψαλτηρὸς, ὕδης)

Among the clerical of the ancient Church are to be reckoned, as a distinct order, the Cantores or Psalmistae, whose institution dates, it would seem, from the 4th century. They are mentioned in the Apostolical Constitutions, so called (ii. 25, § 12; iii. 11; viii. 10, § 2, etc.) and in the Apostolical Canons (c. 26, 43, 69). In the fifteenth canon of the council of Laodicea, A.D. 365, they are called κωνοικὸν ψάλται, i.e. singers enrolled in the canon or catalogue of clergy, to whom the office of singing in the church was then restricted. The reason of their appointment seems to have been to regulate and encourage the ancient psalmody of the Church. There can be no question but that from the apostolical age, singing formed a part of the public worship, the whole congregation joining, as in the prayers; but when it was found by experience that the negligence and unskillfulness of the general body of the people rendered them unfit to perform this service without instruction and guidance, it was resolved to set apart a peculiar order of men for the singers' office, not with a view to abolish the ancient psalmody, but to retrieve and improve it. That the restriction imposed by the council of Laodicea must be regarded as a temporary provision, designed only to revive and develop the ancient psalmody, then falling into decay, appears from the facts collected by St. Augustine, Chrysostom, Basil, and others, that in their own age the custom of congregational singing was again generally observed in the churches.

As to the form of ordination by which the cantores were set apart for their office, this was done, as in the case of the other inferior orders, without imposition of hands; but in one thing it differed from the others, that whereas the latter were usually conferred by the bishop or a chorepiscopus, this order might be conferred by a presbyter, using the form of words following, as given in the 4th council of Carthage, c. 10: "See that thou believe in thy heart what thou singest with thy mouth, and approve in thy works what thou believest in thy heart." [Compare CONFESSOR, § 4.] Bingham, iii. 7; Martene de Ant. Eccl. Ritibus l. c. viii. art. 8, § 4. [D. B.]

CAPA or CAPP. [COPE.]

CAPITOLINI. A name of reproach applied by the Novatians to the Catholics, because the latter charitably resolved, in their synods, to receive into communion again, upon their sincere repentance, such as had offered sacrifice in the Capitol (Bingham, b. i. c. 3). [D. B.]

CAPITULA. The name of a prayer in the Mozarabic breviary immediately preceding the Lord's Prayer, which in this rite occurs near the end of the office. It changes with the day and office, and also varies much in length, but has no special characteristics to distinguish it from other Mozarabic prayers. The corresponding prayer in the Mass, not however called by this name, is directed to be said "ad orationem dominicam." Baronius, referring to an epistle of Pope Viglius, observes that formerly the word Capitulum was used of "preces quedam prolixiores in honorem Sanctorum vel Solemnitatum." [H. J. H.]

CAPITULARIUM. [ANTIPHONARIUM, p. 100.]

CAPITULARY. The term "Capitulary," means a set or collection of capitula or little chapters. It is applied to the laws and ordinances of the early Frankish sovereigns, because the laws enacted at one time and place were usually collected and published in a continuous series. The collective series was called a "Capitulary;" the several laws which were the members of the series were called "Capitula." The term has not in itself any ecclesiastical meaning, being also applicable to temporal laws. But, as a fact, the majority (though by no means the whole) of the Frankish Capitula were of an ecclesiastical character.

The edition of Baluze^a begins with Childeric's Constitution for the Abolition of Idolatry, 554 A.D. This is followed by various other capitula of the first race of kings, viz. of Lothaire I. and II., Dagobert, and Sigebert. Crime, slavery, marriage, contracts, pledges, judicial and ecclesiastical regulations, all find place among these laws, which furnish some interesting evidence of the religious, political, and social condition of France. They show strong traces of clerical influence, in the care which they take of ecclesiastical interests. The Merovingian princes were rude and unlearned, and were glad to make use of the abilities and learning of the priesthood; they were also dissolute, and perhaps glad to compound for their excesses by gratifying the priesthood; and both these causes conspired to throw wealth and power into episcopal hands. Nor was this state of things wholly without its advantages. The influence of the clergy mitigated the ferocity of the nobles, and it has been suggested that the humane tone of portions of the Merovingian laws is probably due to the part which they took in the formation of them.

It may be briefly mentioned that the following subjects appear repeatedly and with prominence:

The right of sanctuary in churches. The crime of doing violence to churches or monastic houses. The crime of violence to the persons or property of the clergy or monks.^b The right freely conferred on all men, without restraint, of making gifts of land or other property to the Church. The duty of a strict observance of the Lord's day.^c

It is impossible, however, here to discuss these laws in detail. Indeed, in the judgment of Guizot, they hardly deserve it. Civilisation during the Merovingian dynasty persistently declined, and in the Church the bishops came by degrees to constitute an irresponsible and ill-organized aristocracy,—the power of the Metropolitan and of the State having gradually declined.

We come next to a few Capitularies in the nominal reign of Childeric III., but in reality the work of Charlemagne and Pepin, and then to the Capitularies of Pepin le Bref as sovereign of the Franks in the year 752.

Of these latter Baluze gives five or six, but Hallam notices that only one is expressly said to be made "in generali populi conventu." The

^a Guizot speaks of this as, when he wrote, the best edition, but still only to be regarded as the materials for a really correct and satisfactory edition of the Capitularies. Since that time the voluminous and elaborate work of Periz has appeared, in which the Capitularies have been re-edited from MS. authority, and several unpublished by Baluze added to the number. This is therefore probably now the standard edition; but the references in this article have been kept to the work of Baluze, because it is more portable, and probably more accessible, and because Guizot's references are always made to it.

^b "In all temporal affairs the Theodosian Code was the universal law of the clergy. But the barbaric jurisprudence had liberally provided for their personal safety: a subdeacon was equivalent to two Franks; the arstunition and priest were held in similar estimation; and the life of a bishop was appraised far above the common standard, at the price of 500 pieces of gold" (Gibbon, vol. vi. chap. xxxviii.).

^c This subject recurs continually in the Capitularies.

rest appear to be due to synods; but it would, perhaps, be rash to conclude positively that they may not, in some cases, have had some kind of subsequent assent from the lay Counts.^d

It is, perhaps, hardly quite correct to say that the Capitularies of Pepin "relate without exception to ecclesiastical affairs" (Hallam, Med. Ages, vol. i. chap. ii. part 2). Not only are they concerned with questions of marriage and kindred matters, which perhaps are quasi-ecclesiastical, but one or two deal with tolls, with the regulation of money, with parricide, and with the administration of justice as well as secular as spiritual. The general complexion, however, is ecclesiastical. Amongst other things, two synods are to be held annually, and detailed regulations are made as to the rights of bishops, abbots, monks, and clergy.

The continuance in the laws of Pepin, and, as we shall see, in those of Charlemagne, of the same strong ecclesiastical type which is found in those of the Merovingians, is perhaps due, amongst other causes, to the desire to attract the Church to the side of the new dynasty. "In order to encounter and subvert the reverence which was still yielded to a merely titular monarch, the supposed descendant of the gods, it was necessary to enlist on their own side religious feelings of a far deeper nature, and of a much more solemn significance." (Sir J. Stephen, Lect. on Hist. of France, vol. i. p. 81.)

From the time of Pepin, however, the Sovereign Power set itself not only to advance the interests of the Church, but to correct its disorders. The strengthening of the Metropolitan authority and that of the Crown were among the means used for reorganizing the system.

We turn next to the important and copious legislation of Charlemagne.

The public Capitularies of Charlemagne are reckoned by Guizot at sixty in number. Five other documents of a more private character may also claim, in the opinion of that writer, a right to the name.^e Nearly all these Capitularies contain a large number of Capitula, or distinct articles in each of them. These amount in all to 1150, and are upon very various subjects, even when included in the same Capitulary. Guizot classifies—

^e Baluze's collection contains many errors, but this is due to the loose use of the word "capitulary." Periz of course gives more still; and some of these last might probably be fairly considered as of a public character, and subject to the computation of Guizot.

conventiones lucranda causa inhonesta res quaslibet congregare decertant" (Baluze i. 454). This is the 16th capitulum of a Capitulary made A.D. 806. It is rather a maxim of ethics than an edict or law.

Religious legislation in the above classification is such as relates not to ecclesiastics alone, but to all the faithful. In some points this resembles the moral in its tone. Thus we find: "Ut nullus credat quod non in tribus linguis (probably Latin, Greek, and German) Deus orandus sit: quia in omni lingua Deus adoratur, et homo exauditur, si iuste petierit" (Baluze i. 270). This is No. 50 of a set put forth A.D. 794.

Canonical legislation is the term for what concerns the relations of the clergy among themselves. The tendency of this class of Capitula is to uphold the power of the bishops. Even the monastic bodies are to be in subordination to them. In fact, Charlemagne appears to have considered that by reducing all the clergy under the episcopate, and then exercising a personal influence over the bishops himself, he was providing the best remedy for the condition of the Church, which was one of much disorganisation. He aimed at a stronger and more pervading discipline, not by reducing the episcopal powers, but by taking care that their vast powers were well exercised.

With the other heads of the classification we have not here to do, except in so far as under the title of "Political Legislation" some regulations are found as to the relation of the secular and ecclesiastical powers. These tend to show that Charlemagne, while giving great power to the bishops, consulting with them on church matters, and using their learning and intelligence for the general purposes of his government, was careful not to become their tool, nor to subject his own authority to theirs. "The laws which fix the obligations, the revenues, and the duties of the clergy, are issued in the name of the emperor; they are monarchical and imperial, not papal or synodical canons" (Millman, Lat. Christ. book v. chap. 1). In return for his having confirmed the system of tithes by a law of the empire, Charlemagne "assumed the power of legislating for the clergy with as full despotism as for the laity," though "in both cases there was the constitutional control of the concurrence of the nobles and of the higher ecclesiastics, strong against a feeble monarch, feeble against a sovereign of Charlemagne's over-riding character. His institutes are in the language of command to both branches of that great ecclesiastical militia, which he treated as his vassals, the secular and the monastic clergy." —Ibid.

In any inquiry, however, on the subject of Capitularies, it is necessary to bear in mind the extremely loose use of the word which prevails in Baluze and other editors. Guizot has pointed out that they apply this title equally to no less than twelve distinct kinds of documents. "We find in their collections of so-called Capitularies" —he says—

- "1. Ancient laws revised. (Bal. i. 281.)

¹ See 4th Capitulare, A.D. 806, cap. ii. (Bal. i. 450), and 1st Capitulare, A.D. 802, cap. xv (Ibid. i. 366). Pepin had laid down the same principle (Bal. i. 169).

"2. Extracts from ancient laws put together for some special purpose. (Ibid. i. 395.)

"3. Additions to ancient laws (amounting probably to new laws. (Ibid. i. 387.)

"4. Extracts from previous Canons. (Ibid. i. 209.)

"5. New laws properly so called.

"6. Instructions given by Charlemagne to his Missi, to guide them in their duties. (Ibid. i. 243.)

"7. Answers given by Charlemagne to questions from counts, bishops, &c., as to practical difficulties in their administration. (Ibid. i. 401.)

"8. Questions drawn up in order to be proposed for discussion to the bishops or counts at the next assembly, e. g., 'To ascertain on what occasions and in what places the ecclesiastics and the lay seek, in the manner stated, to impede each other in the exercise of their respective functions. To inquire and discuss up to what point a bishop or an abbot is justified in interfering in secular affairs, and a count or other layman with ecclesiastical affairs. To interrogate them closely on the meaning of those words of the Apostle: "No man that warreth for the law entangleth himself with the affairs of this life." Inquire to whom these words apply.' (Ibid. i. 477.)

"9. Sometimes the so-called Capitula seem to be little more than memoranda. (Ibid. i. 395.) (Perhaps, however, this class is identical in reality with Class 6.)

"10. Judicial decrees. (Ibid. i. 398.)

"11. Regulations for the management of the royal lands and possessions. (Ibid. i. 331.)

"12. Matters of an executive and administrative rather than legislative nature. (Ibid. i. 26, in Art. 1, 6, 7, 8, 53, 54.")

It is obvious that a very different kind of sanction might be required for some of them from that which would be needed for others. No general rule can therefore be laid down applicable to all. Nor even in respect to those which are in the strictest sense legislative is it easy to discern an uniform constitutional procedure.

As regards ecclesiastical matters, it may probably be considered that the prelates were always consulted, though in most cases the initiative, and in all cases the final, authorization came from the Sovereign. Thus a Capitulary A.D. 813 of Canonical Rules is entitled—

"Capitula de confirmatione constitutionum quas episcopi in synodis auctoritate regia nuper habitis constituerunt."

If it could be safely assumed that all legislative Capitularia, on whatever subject, had the collective assent of one of the General Assemblies held in every year, it would follow that ecclesiastical laws had the assent of the laity. For

* See Baluze, Preface, §§ 7-9. He suggests that some of the apparent exceptions consist of capitula which are mere extracts from the Church Councils, and which therefore the royal authority may have been deemed competent to promulgate. In some other instances, he thinks in these assemblies, counts and great men, as well as prelates, were present. Hincmar, in an important document at the close of the ninth century (Guzot, Lois, 20), gives some account of these assemblies, and says that it was in the option of the lay and ecclesiastical lords to sit together or separately, according to the affairs of which they had to treat—ecclesiastical, secular, or both. From this it might at first appear that canonical matters were considered by the clergy alone, but perhaps this may be rather understood of the previous discussion and preparation of the law. If so, it is consistent with its being finally submitted for the consent and approbation of the whole assembly.

The further question, as to which much controversy has taken place, whether the lesser freeholders had a share in legislation, and if so, whether their voice was given in the assembly, or when the Capitularies passed by the assembly were subsequently proclaimed locally in the different districts, is a matter rather of political inquiry, and hardly belongs to the subject of the present work. It is discussed by Hallam (Middle Ages, chap. ii, part II.), where references will be found to other authorities.

Upon the whole, it must always be borne in mind that in that early state of society—a state in which the master-mind of Charlemagne was reducing to something like order very chaotic elements—we must not expect to find any peculiar exactness of constitutional law. The will of the Sovereign was the motive power of the whole system, but before exercising it he availed himself of the advice of the counsellors who were most likely to be of service: no far all is clear. The extent to which he submitted every legislative regulation to the whole body of the assembly, held, with certain modifications, twice in the year, is a matter on which it is more difficult to speak positively. Perhaps the practice even as to legislative regulations was not uniform, while certainly the boundary between legislative and executive regulations was very ill-defined.

On the reception accorded to the Capitularies by the Church, and the quasi-canonical authority attributed to them, much information will be found in the Preface of Baluze, § 18 et seq. See also the letter of Leo IV. in Gratian, Dist. 10, c. 9.

Capitularies subsequent to the reign of Charlemagne do not fall within our limits. The latest are those of Carloman in 882, after which there is a long blank in French legislation.

It does not seem that a formal collection of the Capitularies was made till they were edited in four books by Augustus, Abbot of Fouteuilla, who died in 833. These four books contain the laws of Charlemagne, and a portion of those of Louis le Débonnaire. Charles the Bald cites this work as a code of authority. Subsequently Benedict, a deacon of Mayence, about the year 842, added three more books. These, however, contain fragments of Roman and canon law, besides the Capitularies of the Carolingian kings. Four supplements again have been added by anonymous compilers.

capitularies may in the first instance have been put forth by the sole authority of the sovereign, but subsequently submitted to the general assemblies for their recognition and consent, where such a step seemed to be expedient.

Butler says, "They (the Capitularies) were generally promulgated in public assemblies composed of the sovereign and the chief men of the nation, as well ecclesiastics as secular" (Home Juridicæ, p. 129, edit. 1807).

In one case, in the reign of Childéric III., in a capitulary due to Pepin, we read that synods are to be held annually, "ut hæcæis amplius in populo non resurgat, sicut invenimus in Adalberto hæresim, quem publiciter nisi voce condemnaverant xxiii. episcopi et alii multi sacerdotum cum consensu Principis et populi," &c. (Bibl. i. 157). Here the laity seem to have had a consentient voice even in so purely spiritual a matter as heresy.

Hallam notices the more frequent mention of "general consent" in the capitularies of Charlemagne, as compared with those of his predecessors (Middle Ages, vol. i. p. 215, 216, ed. 1855). On the other hand, the author of the article "Capitularies" in Herzog thinks that Hincmar's words point to a separation made by Charlemagne between the clergy and laity, so that the former obtained a right to make "leges ecclesiasticæ," as distinguished from capitularies (for which latter general assent was still needful); but subject to a veto on the part of the sovereign.

tributed to them, much information will be found in the Preface of Baluze, § 18 et seq. See also the letter of Leo IV. in Gratian, Dist. 10, c. 9.
