church, as we have already said, commemorated apart from St. Simon. There is also a festival on August 15, whom we should assume to be the same as distinct from the arch, however (infra), evidently the same St. Jude in his notes to call Ephemerides published by Sanctorum (May, vol. i. p. notices here are — ἡγία καὶ θεοτάτη Ἰούδας, and ἡγία Βάσιλα ἀρέστη. In the Armenian commemorations of Thaddeus and Bartholomew 30 (Nelle, Eastern Church, 304). Whether, however, both be referred to St. Jude we are not sure. We may refer lastly to the ca-

endars of the Egyptian and Ethiopic churches published by Ludolf (Pastor Sacri Ecclesie Alexandrinae). Here we find "Jude, Apostle," commemorated by the former church on Jan. 26 and May 10 (pp. 19, 28); and a commemoration by both churches of Thaddeus on June 29 (p. 32), and of the Translation of the body of Thaddeus on July 23 (p. 35). The last two are perhaps to be referred to Thaddeus viewed as external to the Twelve.

3. Whether the apostle St. Jude is to be considered as the author of the canonical epistle bearing the name of Jude, we do not discuss here; reference may be made on this point to the DICTIONARY OF THE BIBLE. But little pseudonymous literature is connected with the name of St. Jude; an apocryphal gospel bearing the name of Thaddeus is mentioned in some forms of the records of the council held at Rome in 494 A.D. under the episcopate of Gelasius (Patrol. lix. 162). It has been suggested, but does not seem probable, that Thaddæi is a false reading for Matthæi. There are also extant Acta Thaddæi, of which the Greek text was first published by Tischendorf (Acta Apostolorum Apocrypha, pp. 261 sqq.). In this is contained the letter of Abgarus to our Lord in a somewhat different form from that given by Eusebius. The Apostolic Constitutions (viii. 25) give, in the name of "Lebbeus, surnamed Thaddeus," the regulation as to the order of widows in the church, and also as to exorcists. Finally, we may refer for the legendary history to the Historia Apostolica of the Pseudo-Abdias (lib. vi.; Fabricius, Codex Pseudepigraphus Novi Testamenti, i. 591 sqq., ed. 1719). In addition to works already cited, see also Augusti, Denkwürdigkeiten aus der Christlichen Archäologie, vol. iii. pp. 206 sqq. Van Heeke in the Acta Sanctarum (October, vol. xii. pp. 437 sqq.); Assemani, Kalendarium Ecclesie Universae, vi. 432 sqq.

[R. S.]

JUDGE. The early ecclesiastical jurisdiction was exercised without formality or strict adherence to legal rights and requirements, in a quasi-paternal manner. [Compare DISCIPLINE.] No special training was therefore required for it. The bishop himself was the usual and "ordinary" judge; and appeals from him went to the provincial synod or to the metropolitan, primate or patriarch in person. [APPEAL; AUDIENTIA EPISCOPALIS; BISHOP, p. 236.]

The earliest officer of the bishop occupying in any sense an independent position was the OECONOMUS or treasurer. This office was often united with that of the defensor or guardian and advocate of the liberties of the church, who is spoken of in the 2nd canon of the council of Chalcedon. [ADVOCATE OF THE CHURCH.] Gothofredus (in Col. l. iii. 33. 2) says that the defensor became in time a judge in small causes; and his office is supposed by Ayliffe (Parerg. 160) to have been the original of the modern official or chancellor.

The word "official," the technical word in later times (as in the 12th century) for the officer exercising coercive jurisdiction on behalf of the bishop or metropolitan, is not used in this sense in the Code or in the Novels. The word indeed often occurs in them, but as the name of a secular officer.

The 9th canon of the council of Chalcedon speaks of arbitrators being chosen with the bishop's consent to determine civil controversies between clerks, instead of the bishop.

The greater formality and style of the ecclesiastical courts grew up with the increase of jurisdiction over civil matters and with the appointment of "officials" in the 12th century. The presence of a registrar to make solemn record of the decrees of the court was first ordered in the council of Lateran held under Innocent III. A.D. 1215; though it was probably customary to have a scribe or notary present at the formal sittings of the courts for some time before this; and we actually hear of notaries at the pseudo-council of Ephesus, A.D. 449. Apparitors or summoners to the bishop's courts are spoken of in the Code and Novels, where the fees to be taken by them are specially regulated.

In what has been said as to the bishop being the "ordinary" judge, it is not intended to imply that he decided, at any rate grave cases, alone, or without the advice and concurrence of his clergy.

Similarly the metropolitan, even if he did not convene the whole provincial synod, collected some of the bishops of the province to assist him in deciding the causes brought before him. In some cases the canons or imperial laws speak of the metropolitan, in others of the synod, as the proper court.

The jurisdiction of abbots [AUBAT] had hardly grown up during the period of which we are treating. They had at the utmost a sort of parental authority subordinate to the bishop. [JURISDICTION.] [W. G. F. P.]

JULIA. (1) Virgin, martyr in Corsica; commemorated May 22 (Mart. Adonis, Usuardi).

(2) [FLORENTIUS.]

(3) Virgin, martyr at Troyes; commemorated July 21 (Mart. Usuardi).

(4) Martyr in Lusitania with Venerissima and Maxima (S.).

(5) Virgin, martyr at Augusta Eufrestasia; commemorated Oct. 7 (Mart. Rom. Vet., Adonis, Usuardi).

(6) Virgin, martyr at Emerita (Merida) with Eulalia; commemorated Dec. 10 (Mart. Adonis, Usuardi). [W. F. G.]

JULIANA. (1) Martyr "apud Augustanum urbem" with Quiriacus, Largio, Crescentianus, Ninnius, and 20 others; commemorated Aug. 12 (Mart. Usuardi).

(2) Virgin, martyr at Cumæ, in the time of Maximianus; commemorated Feb. 16 (Mart. Rom. Vet., Bedæ, Adonis, Usuardi).

(3) Martyr of Nicomedia, A.D. 299; commemorated Dec. 21 (Cal. Byzant.). [W. F. G.]

JULIANUS. (1) Martyr with Maximianus and Lucianus (Mart. Usuardi).

(2) and Basilissa, martyrs at Antioch under Diocletian and Maximian; commemorated Jan. 6 (Mart. Rom. Vet., Hieron., Adonis, Usuardi) Nov. 25 (Cal. Armen.).

(3) Martyr in Egypt with five others; commemorated Feb. 16 (Mart. Adonis, Usuardi).

(4) Martyr in Africa with Publius; commemorated Feb. 19 (Mart. Usuardi).

(5) Martyr at Alexandria; commemorated Feb. 27 (Mart. Rom. Vet., Adonis, Usuardi).

(6) Bishop; deposed at Toledo, March 6 (Mart. Usuardi).

(7) [SYMPHOROSA.]

(8) Tharsenus, martyr; commemorated June 21 (Cal. Byzant.).

(9) Martyr at Damascus with Sabinus, Maximus, Macrobis, Cassius, Paula, and 10 others; commemorated July 20 (Mart. Adonis, Usuardi).

(10) Martyr at Rome with Peter and 18 others; commemorated Aug. 7 (Mart. Rom. Vet., Adonis, Usuardi).

(11) Saint in Syria; commemorated with Macarius, Aug. 12 (Mart. Rom. Vet., Adonis, Usuardi).

(12) Martyr at Clermont; commemorated Aug. 28 (Mart. Hieron., Adonis, Usuardi).

(13) Presbyter, martyr at Terracina with Caesarius the deacon in the time of Claudius; commemorated Nov. 1 (Mart. Rom. Vet., Bedae, Adonis, Usuardi).

(14) Patriarch of Alexandria, *†*A. D. 189; commemorated Magabit 8 = March 4 (Cal. Ethiop.).

[W. F. G.]

JULITTA or JULIETTA, martyr at Antioch with her son Cyricus or Cyrillus, A. D. 296; commemorated June 16 (Mart. Rom. Vet., Hieron., Adonis, Usuardi); Jan. 21 (Cal. Armen.); July 15 (Cal. Byzant.).

[W. F. G.]

JULIUS. (1) The pope, martyr under Constantius; commemorated April 12 (Mart. Rom. Vet., Bedae, Hieron., Adonis, Usuardi, Cal. Bucher.).

(2) [FELIX (5).]

(3) Senator, martyr at Rome under Commodus; commemorated Aug. 19 (Mart. Rom. Vet., Adonis, Usuardi).

(4) Martyr in Thrace; commemorated Dec. 20 (Mart. Hieron., Usuardi).

(5) Martyr in Mesia at Dorostorum; commemorated May 27 (Mart. Rom. Vet., Adonis, Usuardi).

(6) Martyr with Potamian, civ. Thagora; commemorated Dec. 5 (Mart. Usuardi). [W. F. G.]

JUNCA, COUNCIL OF (Juncense concilium). Of Junca in Africa, A. D. 523 (see AFRICAN COUNCILS). A canon attributed to it by Ferrandus (n. 23) is to the effect that no bishop may claim anything for himself in a flock that is not his own (Mansi, viii, 633).

[E. S. FE.]

JUNIA and Andronicus, apostles, (Rom. xvi. 7); commemorated May 17 (Cal. Byzant.).

[W. F. G.]

JURISDICTION. Before the time of Constantine the Great such jurisdiction as was exercised in the church must have been of a purely spiritual character, and its sanctions must have been purely spiritual. Sinners were brought before the tribunal of the bishop, who judged and inflicted spiritual censures, and inflicted them probably without appeal.

Upon the recognition by Constantine of the church as a collegium licitum, these spiritual judgments and censures began to have an effect of which the civil law could take cognizance, and a civil effect was given to them. They were also made use of to assist or sometimes even take the place of the sanctions of the civil law.

In criminal causes where the accused was a clerk, or in any way specially connected with the performance of religious observances, there was an early tendency to make the bishop the judge, first in conjunction with the lay judge and in time as the sole judge. Judging as a spiritual judge over spiritual persons, a confusion arose between the sentences which he imposed in execution of the discipline of the Church, and those which he imposed as a delegate of the power of the State and armed with the authority of a criminal judge. The two matters are so intertwined, that it will be convenient to discuss together the jurisdiction in spiritual matters and that over spiritual persons.

A second fountain of jurisdiction in the courts of the church was arbitration. Bishops were encouraged by the Christian Emperors to arbitrate on moral grounds between Christians disputing as to matters of right and property, and the civil law gave a civil force to their judgments. Where clerks were parties, the propriety of a recourse to the tribunal of the bishop was considered to be greater. Where a clerk was defendant, his right to escape the annoyance of appearing before a secular tribunal was paralleled and strengthened by his privilege to be tried by the bishop when defendant on a criminal charge. Hence arose jurisdiction between parties generally.

Lastly, certain special matters of civil litigation began to be considered, irrespective of the parties, as being peculiarly fit for the cognizance of the ecclesiastical judge. Hence arose a jurisdiction over special civil causes.

Jurisdiction in spiritual matters and over spiritual persons.—We have here first to consider the difference between the forum internum and the forum externum. The forum internum was the tribunal in which the bishop or sometimes the priest decide^d on cases of conscience, gave spiritual directions, and counselled with fatherly authority penitential discipline. The procedure and the decision of this tribunal were not, except in the cases where public penance was required, necessarily known to any but the penitent and his judge. The terror of conscience was the only sanction, and there could be no formal appeal. But along with this forum the church from its earliest time possessed also a forum externum (see 1 Cor. v.; 1 Tim. i. 20). [PENITENCE.]

When the gravity of the offence altered the relation of the parties and converted the father into the avenger, or made it necessary to prefer the public weal of the community to the individual welfare, the sentences of deposition or excommunication were inflicted.

These sentences on clerk or layman were inflicted by the bishop. They were or ought to be recognized by all other bishops, and there was originally no appeal. The so-called Apostolical Canons, though requiring the imposition of these sentences in several cases, are silent as to the procedure by which they were to be inflicted. The Nicene Canons for the first time provides limited right of appeal.

The 5th canon says that clerics or lay people

asures began to have an effect. If law could take cognizance, was given to them. They were to assist or sometimes even take actions of the civil law.

cases where the accused was a layman specially connected with the religious observances, there was a tendency to make the bishop the judge. Judging as a spiritual person, a confusion of discipline of the Church, and imposed as a delegate of the lay judge. The two matters are so mixed that it will be convenient to discuss jurisdiction in spiritual matters and persons.

of jurisdiction in the courts of arbitration. Bishops were Christian Emperors to arbitrate between Christians dividers of right and property, and to use a civil force to their judges. Clerks were parties, the property to the tribunal of the bishop was greater. Where a clerk had the right to escape the annoyance of a secular tribunal was paralleled by his privilege to be when defendant on a criminal case jurisdiction between parties special matters of civil litigation considered. Irrespective of the peculiarly fit for the cognizance of the judge. Hence arose a jurisdictional causes.

spiritual matters and over spiritual have here first to consider between the forum internum and externum. The forum internum was which the bishop or sometimes on cases of conscience, gave and counselled with fatherly discipline. The procedure this tribunal were not, except public penance was required, to any but the penitent and error of conscience was the only could be no formal appeal. Forum the church from the (L. 1. 20). [PENITENCE.]

ty of the offence altered the and converted the fatherly made it necessary to prefer the community to the individual sentences of deposition or were inflicted.

on clerk or layman were imposed. They were or ought to be other bishops, and there was civil. The so-called Apostolical inquiring the imposition of these cases, are silent as to which they were to be inflicted. for the first time provides says that clerics or lay people

separated from communion by their own bishop, shall be held everywhere to be so separated; but that in order that no one should be expelled from communion through a contentious or harsh spirit of their bishop, the occasion of their expulsion shall be inquired into by the provincial synod, which is to be held for this purpose twice a year. The decision of the synod is to be final. It was not till considerably later, when, it does not exactly appear, that further appeals were allowed. [APPEAL; INDULGENCE.]

The original discipline of the church had made all crimes as imputing sins the subjects of the penitential discipline or the forum internum, and by consequence in the graver and more public cases, or where penitence was not shown, of the forum externum. It became however obviously impossible, as the church tribunals took a more formal shape and as appeals came to be allowed, that ordinary criminal offences against the laws of the state should be tried in any fashion by the church courts; and hence a division arose, whereby certain offences became the subject of the almost exclusive jurisdiction of the church courts, while on other offences they were not allowed to sit in judgment.

Offences of laymen subject to the jurisdiction of the church courts were heresy (Van Espen Jus Eccles. Univ. pars iii. tit. iv. cap. 2, and the article HERESY), magic (can. 10, caus. 26, q. 5), blasphemy, to be punished by bishop or count according to the capitularies of the Frank kings (lib. vi. cap. 101), and probably cases of laying violent hands on clerks. It seems that incest and incontinence were not distinctly reckoned as offences over which the church had coercive jurisdiction till late in the 9th or the 10th century, though they were of course subject to penitential discipline [FORNICATION; MARRIAGE; INCEST].

Every offence which when committed by a layman subjected him to the jurisdiction of the ecclesiastical court, subjected a fortiori a clerk.

But the subjection of clerks to the ecclesiastical tribunals was much wider than this. In A.D. 376 a law of Gratian and Valentinian is said to have subjected clerks for small offences or offences of an ecclesiastical nature to their diocesan synod (L. 23, Cod. Theod. de Episcopis et Clericis). But a special exception was made of such offences as gave rise to a criminal action before the ordinary or extraordinary judges or the higher officials classed as the Illustres. So in A.D. 399, Arcadius and Honorius are said (L. 1. Cod. Theod. De Religione) to have ordered causes relating to religion to be tried by the bishops, but questions which related to the civil law to be tried according to the law (i.e. by the lay judges). Rather stronger is an edict attributed to Valentinian Theodosius and Arcadius (L. 3 Cod. Theod. de Episcop. Jud.) Van Espen (Jus Eccl. pars iii. tit. iii. cap. i.) cites a constitution of Honorius, A.D. 412 (L. 41, Cod. Theod. de Episcop. et Clericis) which would apparently subject the clerk for all offences to the bishop; but it is held that the words, though vague and general, do not really refer to other than ecclesiastical offences.

We come next to Justinian. The Code contains an enumeration of the courts by which an accused clerk is to be tried as follows: he is to be tried before his bishop. If the bishop be "suspected" there is to be an appeal (or possibly an original trial) before the metropolitan. If his decision be not satisfactory, an appeal lies to the provincial synod and thence to the patriarch, whose judgment (subject to certain peculiar rights in the patriarch of Constantinople) is to be final. The law then proceeds as follows: "As for these proceedings, if they relate to ecclesiastical matters, we order that they be of necessity tried only by the most religious bishops or metropolitans, or by the sacred synods, or by the most holy patriarchs. But if there is a controversy as to civil matters, though we will allow those who wish it to bring the question before the bishops, yet we will not compel them, since there are civil tribunals, if they prefer to go to them, before which tribunals also criminal proceedings can be had" (Cod. i. iv. 29).

This law seems to confuse civil and criminal proceedings, and has a relation to both. The 83rd Novell is more precise. It recites a request of Menas or Mennas, the patriarch of Constantinople, and proceeds to confer certain privileges upon clerks. The first relate to civil suits. As to criminal causes, it enacts that where they relate to secular matters they shall be tried before the lay judge; but before the lay judge proceeds to execute the sentence, he shall allow the bishop to depose or degrade his clerk. Criminal causes relating to ecclesiastical matters are to be tried by the bishop. The 123rd Novell effected a further alteration (cap. xxi.) Making the same reservations as to ecclesiastical causes, it provides that a clerk accused of a secular criminal offence shall be brought before the bishop, who if he find him guilty shall depose him ab honore et gradu, from his office and order, and send him to the lay judge for secular punishment; or he may be brought before the lay judge first, in which case the lay judge is to transmit the evidences of his guilt to the bishop, who is to depose him and send him back to the lay judge for secular punishment. This Novell extends to monks, deaconesses, and nuns.

Van Espen (loc. cit.) quotes some canons of the 6th century as going further in this respect, and the capitularies of the Frank kings enact that clerks shall not be judged by lay judges, but by ecclesiastical ones (lib. i. cap. 38); and that no one shall presume to accuse a clerk, monk, or nun before a lay judge (lib. v. cap. 378).

In England it is well known that the distinction between secular and ecclesiastical courts did not exist during the Anglo-Saxon rule, the sheriff and the bishop sitting side by side on the same bench.

The punishments or censures inflicted by the episcopal tribunals were at first mere acts of penance, the discipline retaining its original penitential character. So early indeed as the Theodosian Code (L. 21 De Haereticis) a fine of ten pounds of gold seems to have been imposed on any clerk or bishop who was convicted of heresy; but it does not appear whether this fine was imposed by the ecclesiastical judge or by the lay judge after sentence by the ecclesiastical judge. [FINES, p. 671.]

Seclusion in a monastery both for laymen and more especially for clerks and bishops was an earlier punishment. It seems to be mentioned in the Epistles of St. Gregory (lib. 2 Epist. 27, 40), and in a canonical rule of about the year 816 as a substitute for scourging. [IMPRISONMENT, p. 829.]

The 123rd Novell (cap. xi.) orders that any bishop who has been by law expelled from his see, yet returns to the city, shall be shut up in a monastery.

Exile or banishment from the city they disturbed, or in which the public offence was committed, seems to have been first used as an ecclesiastical punishment towards the close of the period of which we are writing (see Epist. of St. Gregory, lib. 9, Ep. 66). It is very doubtful though whether it was ever exercised in vitium, unless it was supported by a special decree of the civil authority. The bishops of large towns, particularly Constantinople, were however often armed with a power of sending back to their own dioceses clerks disorderly frequenting the capital.

Scourging, as a means of penitential discipline, is mentioned by St. Augustine (Epist. 133) and St. Gregory (Epist. lib. 2, Epist. 52, lib. 9, Epist. 66) [CORPORAL PUNISHMENT]. It seems to have been used by bishops with reference to their younger clerks, and by abbots with reference to monks. In the canon law (can. 10, c. 26, q. 5) an epistle of St. Gregory is quoted in which he orders practisers of magic if they be slaves to be scourged, if free men, to be secluded till they are penitent. The 38th of the Apostolical Canons orders that any bishop, priest, or deacon, who endeavours to make himself feared by scourging either sinners or men outside the Christian community who have done wrong shall be deposed. St. Paul requires as a qualification of a bishop that he should be "no striker" (1 Tim. iii. 3). The 123rd Novell (cap. xi.) forbids the bishop to beat any one with his hands.

Besides these corporal punishments, the ecclesiastical courts continued to administer and inflict their old censures, now become also of worldly import, of excommunication and deposition or degradation.

So clearly was the distinction between these last censures and matters of internal and penitential discipline now marked, that St. Augustine seems to say that bishops cannot prohibit any one from communicating unless the penitent has confessed his crime or been convicted by a secular or an ecclesiastical judge; "nos a communione prohibere quenquam non possumus . . . nisi aut sponte confessum, aut in aliquo sive seculari sive ecclesiastico iudicio nominatum atque convictum" (Serm. 351, § 16; Opp. v. 1358, ed. Bened.). Conformably to this the 123rd Novell (cap. xi.) forbids the excommunication of any one till after a full trial.

It should be said here that monks, who were originally subject to their bishops like any other laymen, were made in a special and further degree subject to them by the council of Chalcedon at the suggestion of the emperor Marcian (Van Espen pars III. tit. xii. cap. 1). There seems to have been no question of their exemption from episcopal authority till the 6th century; and even then the exemptions conferred on them were not exemptions from jurisdiction, but from despotic invasion of their internal rights.

The abbot or dean exercised a subordinate jurisdiction, such as remains now with our deacons and chapters; and actual exemption from their bishop's authority sometimes was conferred on monasteries. [EXEMPTION OF MONASTERIES.]

The trial of bishops has been reserved for separate mention.

It is first provided for in the Apostolical Canons (can. 74). This is the more remarkable as there are no provisions in these canons regulating the trials of clergy or laity.

This canon provides that a bishop when accused by credible persons shall be summoned by other bishops (that is, the other bishops of the province), to appear before them. If he appears and confesses, or is convicted, his punishment is to be decreed. If he does not appear, he is to be summoned a second time personally by two bishops, and so if necessary a third time, after which he is to be tried and condemned in his absence. The 75th canon prevents heretics from giving evidence against a bishop, and requires the evidence of two witnesses.

The Nicene Canon (can. 5) as to the appeal of clerks and laymen to the diocesan synod (quoted p. 894 supra) has been held by many, notably by St. Augustine (see Van Espen, pars III. tit. iii. cap. 5) to relate also to the trial of bishops. However this may be, the 6th canon of the council of Constantinople undoubtedly provides for the trial of bishops. After refusing the evidence of heretics, excommunicated persons and persons accused of crimes, it proceeds to enact that if any not disqualified person has any ecclesiastical charge to prefer against a bishop, he shall bring it before the provincial synod. If the synod cannot correct the crime, the bishops thereof shall go before the greater synod of that "diocese" (diocese is here used in the imperial sense of a larger province, exarchate or patriarchate), but shall not bring their accusation till they have submitted to undergo a like penalty, if they are found calumniators. The decree is to be then made by the greater synod, and there is to be no appeal either to the emperor or to a general council from it.

The 9th canon of the council of Chalcedon seems to relate primarily to civil suits. It orders that any dispute between a clerk and a bishop (whether his own bishop or not) shall be tried by the provincial synod. If bishop or clerk have a dispute with the metropolitan, the trial should be before the exarch of the diocese or the emperor.

The 123rd Novell provides (cap. viii.) that a bishop shall not, whether in a pecuniary (civil) or criminal cause, be brought against his will before any civil or military judge; and (cap. xvii.) that disputes between bishops, whether on ecclesiastical or other matters, shall be tried in the first instance by the metropolitan and his synod, with an appeal to the patriarch; while bishops accused of crimes are to be tried by the metropolitan (apparently alone), from whom an appeal lies first to the archbishop (that is probably the primate or exarch or president of the greater synod), and thence to the patriarch.

Jurisdiction between parties.—In the early days of the church, when Christians formed a small and separate society, it was natural and almost necessary that disputes between them should be settled by arbitration within their own body, to avoid the scandals to which references to heathen judges might give rise. St. Paul expressly ters; and actual exemption from authority sometimes was conferred [EXEMPTION OF MONASTRIES]. Jurisdiction over bishops has been reserved for provided for in the Apostolic (1 Cor. vi. 8). The arbitrator chosen would naturally be the bishop, and this appears to have been the case.

After the recognition of the church by Constantine, provision was made for giving a legal sanction to these arbitrations. Constantine himself is said (Van Espen, pars III. tit. i. cap. 2) to have allowed litigants to choose the bishop instead of the lay judge, and to have ordered effect to be given to the sentence of a bishop as judging. A constitution of Arcadius and Honorius is preserved in the Code (l. iv. 7) allowing litigants to go before the bishop in civil matters only and as before an arbitrator.

Another constitution of Honorius and Theodosius (Cod. l. iv. 8) orders that the bishop's judgment shall be binding on all those who have chosen him as judge, and shall have as much force as a judgment of the praetorian prefect, from whom there could be no appeal.

It appears that at this time Jews had the privilege of trying their disputes if they pleased before their rabbi or "patriarch." Valentinian III. allowed the same result to be obtained by means of a previous formal "compromissum" or submission to arbitration. None of these constitutions, however, in the least degree compel the resort to the ecclesiastical tribunal, unless the matter in question be of an ecclesiastical nature, not even though the defendant be a clerk.

So the emperor Marcian (Cod. l. iii. 25) speaks of an episcopal audience for clerks who are sued at law, but gives the plaintiff the power of choosing the lay tribunal.

The 67th Novell makes provision for the mode of trial, which is to be summary. There being the power of resorting to the arbitration of the bishop, the church compelled by threats of censure every clerk at least to resort only to the tribunal of the bishop. Among other canons on this subject may be cited that of the council of Chalcedon (can. 9) which orders that any clerk who shall have a dispute with another clerk shall not go before the secular tribunals, but shall plead his cause first before his bishop, or before such person, with the consent of the bishop, as both parties shall choose to decide the question.

The 9th canon of the 3rd council of Carthage orders that any bishop, priest, deacon, or clerk, who has a civil matter in dispute, and brings it before the secular tribunals, shall lose all that he gains by the sentence of the secular tribunal, or shall be deprived of his office. There are also canons of the 4th council of Carthage to the same effect.

The 79th Novell (cap. 1.) gives the fori privilegium for the first time. It provides that any one having a cause with any of the venerable holy men (the monks) or the holy virgins, or any women living in nunneries, shall go before the bishop. The bishop is to send to the monastery and to provide for the appearance of the defendants before him, either by the intervention of their abbots or of agents (responsales) or is on no account to come before the secular judges.

reprobates the practice of "brother going to law with brother, and that before the unbelievers" (1 Cor. vi. 8).

The arbitrator chosen would naturally be the bishop, and this appears to have been the case.

After the recognition of the church by Constantine, provision was made for giving a legal sanction to these arbitrations. Constantine himself is said (Van Espen, pars III. tit. i. cap. 2) to have allowed litigants to choose the bishop instead of the lay judge, and to have ordered effect to be given to the sentence of a bishop as judging. A constitution of Arcadius and Honorius is preserved in the Code (l. iv. 7) allowing litigants to go before the bishop in civil matters only and as before an arbitrator.

Another constitution of Honorius and Theodosius (Cod. l. iv. 8) orders that the bishop's judgment shall be binding on all those who have chosen him as judge, and shall have as much force as a judgment of the praetorian prefect, from whom there could be no appeal.

It appears that at this time Jews had the privilege of trying their disputes if they pleased before their rabbi or "patriarch."

Valentinian III. allowed the same result to be obtained by means of a previous formal "compromissum" or submission to arbitration.

None of these constitutions, however, in the least degree compel the resort to the ecclesiastical tribunal, unless the matter in question be of an ecclesiastical nature, not even though the defendant be a clerk.

So the emperor Marcian (Cod. l. iii. 25) speaks of an episcopal audience for clerks who are sued at law, but gives the plaintiff the power of choosing the lay tribunal.

The 67th Novell makes provision for the mode of trial, which is to be summary.

There being the power of resorting to the arbitration of the bishop, the church compelled by threats of censure every clerk at least to resort only to the tribunal of the bishop. Among other canons on this subject may be cited that of the council of Chalcedon (can. 9) which orders that any clerk who shall have a dispute with another clerk shall not go before the secular tribunals, but shall plead his cause first before his bishop, or before such person, with the consent of the bishop, as both parties shall choose to decide the question.

The 9th canon of the 3rd council of Carthage orders that any bishop, priest, deacon, or clerk, who has a civil matter in dispute, and brings it before the secular tribunals, shall lose all that he gains by the sentence of the secular tribunal, or shall be deprived of his office. There are also canons of the 4th council of Carthage to the same effect.

The 79th Novell (cap. 1.) gives the fori privilegium for the first time. It provides that any one having a cause with any of the venerable holy men (the monks) or the holy virgins, or any women living in nunneries, shall go before the bishop. The bishop is to send to the monastery and to provide for the appearance of the defendants before him, either by the intervention of their abbots or of agents (responsales) or is on no account to come before the secular judges.

The 83rd Novell, which has been already referred to,^a extends the privileges. Any one having a pecuniary cause against a clerk is to go before the bishop,^b who is to decide summarily without writing. His sentence may, however, be put in writing. There is to be no recourse to the civil tribunals; but the main object of the Novell is to avoid long delays and pleadings, rather than to change the tribunal which is to adjudge.

The 123rd Novell puts the privilege on a firm basis. Clerks, monks, deaconesses, nuns, and ascetic women, are to be impleaded before the bishop. The lay judge is to execute the bishop's sentence, if there is no appeal. But either of the parties may appeal within ten days to the local lay judge. If he decides in accordance with the bishop's judgment, the decision is final.

If the lay judge decides contrary to the bishop, his sentence may be appealed from in the regular way of civil suits.

If the bishop delayed to hear or decide on the cause, the plaintiff might go at once before the lay judge. This Novell expressly reserves all ecclesiastical suits for the sole cognizance of the bishop.

The capitularies of the Frank kings (lib. i. cap. 28) ordered all disputes between clerks to be settled by their bishop, and not by secular judges; while another capitulary (lib. vi. cap. 366) recites and enforces an edict, attributed to Theodosius, declaring that the sentences of the bishops, however declared, and apparently in whatever causes, shall be ever held inviolate. This edict was declared by Charlemagne to be binding over all parts of his empire.

The object of these laws also seems to have been to avoid prolixity of pleadings, technicality of procedure, and long disputes, distracting holy men from their proper avocations, rather than any supposed impropriety of secular judges exercising jurisdiction over clerks.

The constitution of the special court of his bishop for the clerk or monk, seems to have been considered by the secular authorities as a privilege given to him, which he might waive, the secular court having always the capacity to exercise jurisdiction over him, if the privilegium fori were not set up. But the canons and decrees of the councils and synods leave the clerk no option, forbidding him to sue, or to abstain from raising his privilege when sued, in the lay court.

The secular authorities seem to have retained nevertheless their view of this exemption as a privilege and capable of waiver. Gothofred (in Cod. l. iii. 33 and 51) cites a constitution of the emperor Frederic (apparently Frederic II.) strongly denouncing any assertion of jurisdiction by the lay judge in civil or criminal matters; but yet allowing the clerk to waive his privilege and submit to the jurisdiction.

The emperor Alexius Comnenus brought the matter under the general rule "actor sequitur forum rei" (Constit. Imp. 289, § 11).

Jurisdiction over special civil causes.—This is mainly the outgrowth of a period later than that prescribed for this work.

^a Supra, p. 895.

^b The text seems to say "archbishop," but this must be a mistake.

The jurisdiction over testamentary causes did not arise in Western Europe till the 12th century. It appears to have arisen early in the 12th century in England; not till the end of the 12th or beginning of the 13th century in France.

The only indication of testamentary jurisdiction in Eastern or Western Europe during the period of which we treat, appears in the commission given by the Christian emperors to the bishops, to take care that the wishes of the dead should be faithfully performed.

Charlemagne especially intrusted the bishops with the duty of protecting wards, widows, and paupers, and of seeing that no wrong was done to them. This led in time, but not during our period, to a sort of jurisdiction over all cases where a member of one of these classes was concerned.

Matrimonial causes, though infringements of the marriage vow were probably treated of with other matters of spiritual discipline, did not as involving formal legal rights or questions of property, fall to the jurisdiction of ecclesiastical tribunals till the 11th century.

Suits relating to ecclesiastical matters are in many of the Imperial Constitutions mentioned as unquestionably matters for the bishop's jurisdiction. The term "ecclesiastical matters" is vague, and probably varied at different times; but before the expiry of our period, causes relating to tithes and offerings were probably considered as coming within its meaning.

[Authorities referred to for this article.—Corpus Juris Civilis, cum notis Gothofredi, ed. Van Leeuwen, Amsterdam, 1663; Ayliffe, Parergon Juris Canonici Anglicani, ed. London, 1734; Van Espen, Jus Ecclesiasticum Universum, pars tertia; Commentarius in Canones; ed. Louvaine, 1753; Landon, Manual of Councils, 1846; Phillimore, Ecclesiastical Law, 1873.] [W. G. F. P.]

JUSTA. (1) [FLORENTIUS (1).]

(2) Martyr in Spain, at Seville, with Rufina; commemorated July 19 (Mart. Rom. Vet., Adonis, Usuardi). [W. F. G.]

JUSTINA, virgin, martyr with Cyprian, the bishop; commemorated Sept. 26 (Mart. Rom. Vet., Bedae, Adonis, Usuardi); and Oct. 2 (Cal. Byzant.). [W. F. G.]

JUSTINUS. (1) The philosopher, martyr at Pergamus with Carpus the bishop, Papius the deacon, and Agathonica, and many other women; commemorated April 13 (Mart. Rom. Vet., Adonis, Usuardi); June 1 (Cal. Byzant.).

(2) Martyr with companions, A.D. 142; commemorated June 1 (Cal. Byzant.; see Daniel's Codex, iv. 260).

(3) [SYMPHOROBA.]

(4) Martyr in terra Parisiensi; commemorated Aug. 1 (Mart. Usuardi).

(5) Presbyter, martyr at Rome under Decius; commemorated Sept. 7 (Mart. Rom. Vet., Adonis, Usuardi). [W. F. G.]

JUSTUS. (1) [FELIX (14).]

(2) Martyr in Spain at Complutum [ALCALA], with Pastor his brother under Decius (Mart. Adonis, Usuardi).

(3) Bishop of Lyons, "Natalis," Sept. 2 (Mart. Adonis, Usuardi): translation Oct. 14 (ib.).

(4) Martyr in terra Belvacensi (Beauvais); commemorated Oct. 18 (Mart. Usuardi).

[W. F. G.]

JUVENALIS. (1) Bishop, confessor at Rome under Adrian; commemorated May 3 (Mart. Usuardi).

(2) Martyr on the Island Pontia; commemorated May 7 (Mart. Rom. Vet., Usuardi).

[W. F. G.]

ENALIS

LORENTIUS (1.)
 in, at Seville, with Rufina; 19 (Mart. Rom. Vet., Adonis,
 [W. F. G.]

, martyr with Cyprian, the ted Sept. 26 (Mart. Rom.
 Uuuardi); and Oct. 2 (Cal.
 [W. F. G.]

The philosopher, martyr at us the bishop, Papirius the ca, and many other women;
 13 (Mart. Rom. Vet., Adonis,
at. Byzant.).

companions, A.D. 142; com-Cal. Byzant.; see Daniel's

a Parisiensi; commemorated ill).

tyr at Rome under Decius;
 7 (Mart. Rom. Vet., Adonis,
 [W. F. G.]

ELIX (14.)
 a at Complutum [ALCALA]. ther under Decius (Mart.

, "Natalis," Sept. 2 (Mart.
 nulation Oct. 14 (ib.).

ra Belvacensi (Basuvaia);
 8 (Mart. Uuuardi).
 [W. F. G.]

) Bishop, confessor at Rome nemorated May 3 (Mart.

Island Pontia; commemoom. Vet., Uuuardi).
 [W. F. G.]

K
 N.B.—Greek words beginning with K, and their derivatives, are generally given under C, as CATARACTA, CATALOGUS, CATECHUMEN, CORNOSTEM.

KALENDS

KALENDS (Kalendae), the first day of each month in the Roman calendar. The Rule of Fructuosus (c. 10) orders that on the first of each month (per capita mensium), the abbats of a district shall meet in one place, and earnestly celebrate monthly litanies, and implore the help of the Lord for the souls committed to their charge. The monks of Fulda in their petition to Charles the Great (§ 1, Migne, Patrologia, cv. 419) beg that they may be allowed, according to the custom of their fathers, to hold one vigil
 and say fifty psalms on the kalends of each month, for their brethren departed this life. This was in addition to the daily commemoration. (Mar-tene, de Rit. Monach. II. xiii. 1.) For the observance of the Kalends of January in particular, see CIRCUMCISION, I. 394; NEW YEAR. [C.]

KEVIN (or COEMGIN), abbat of Glen-da-och (valley of the two lakes), in the county of Wicklow in Ireland, and bishop (ob. circa A.D.
 618). He is commemorated on June 3 (Acta Sanctorum, June, vol. i. p. 303). [R. S.]

KELLAC, bishop and martyr in Ireland (died early in the 7th century, A.D.), commemorated [especially at Eiscreach, in Galway] on May 1.
 (Acta Sanctorum, May, vol. i. p. 106.) [R. S.]

KENELM, boy-martyr in England (ob. A.D.
 819), son of Kenulf, king of Mercia, commemorated on July 17; especially at Winchelcombe Abbey, which had been built by his father. In the Sarum Breviary are three lessons for the day (add. to Uuuard, Acta Sanctorum, July, vol.
 iv. p. 297). [R. S.]

KENTIGERN, bishop of Glasgow (circa A.D.
 560), commemorated on Jan. 13. Some martyrologies also give July 1, "In Scotia, Translatio S. Kentigerni, ep. et conf." The reference, however, is quite unknown. (Molanus, Add.
 to Uuuard; Acta Sanctorum, Jan. vol. ii. p. 87.)
 [R. S.]

KESSOG (or MACKESSOG), bishop of the provinces of Leven and Boiu in Scotland (ob. circa A.D. 560), commemorated on March 10.
 CHRIST. ANT.—VOL. II.

KEYS OF ST. PETER

(Breviarium Aberdonense; Acta Sanctorum, Mar.
 vol. ii. p. 35.) [R. S.]

KEYNA, virgin recluse of Brecon in South Wales, in the 5th or 6th century. From her Keynsham in Somersetshire, one of her abodes,
 is said to take its name; where the ammonites found in the neighbouring quarries were long attributed to her miraculous destruction of the serpents. She is commemorated on Oct. 8. (Acta Sanctorum, March, vol. iv. p. 275.) [R. S.]

KEYS OF ST. PETER (IN ART). The key or keys appear to be one of the natural emblems of early civilisation, always conveying the idea of deputed authority and power. The abbd Auher (Symbolisme Religieux, vol. i. p. 199) speaks of the symbolic meaning of the keys in the Scandinavian-Gothic household. He further connects the prophecy of Isaiah xxii. 22, "I will set on his shoulder the key of the house of David,"
 with Rev. iii. 7, where the church of Philadelphia is said to be in possession of the key of the house of David, and gives various interpretations of that expression, making it refer, very properly as it appears, to the Lord's Incarnation as a member of the house of David after the flesh, as the key or central doctrine of the Gospel. It seems unnecessary to follow him into the further meanings of the keys of hell in the Apocalypse; but it is preferable to take the symbol in its obvious meaning of deputed power,
 committed to the holder by a higher authority,
 as the Northern or Roman husband committed the keys of his house to the custody of his wife.
 (Smith, Dict. of GR. AND ROM. ANT. s.c. Matri-monium; Festus, s. c. Clavis.) "The bride saluted her husband with the words 'Ubi tu Calus ego Caia,' and after she had entered the house with distaff and spindle, she was placed on a sheepskin; and there the keys of the house were delivered into her hands." The distaff, spindle, and sheepskin will remind the Christian archaeologist of their frequent appearance on the sacrophagi.

The delivery of the keys to St. Peter occurs in early bas-reliefs. See D'Agincourt, Sculpture, planche viii. 11, where the apostle is certainly receiving a key, as it appears a single one, though two are delivered to him on other monuments. In Ariangi (t. i. p. 293) there appear to be two handles, though the wards of only one key are visible. On the sarcophagus on which this subject occurs, St. Peter is bearing the cross and receiving a roll of the Gospel from the Lord's hand, with another apostle. Martigny refers to Perret (vol. i. pl. vii.) for a remarkable but dubious fresco of the catacomb called Platonis,* where our Lord is seen half issuing from a cloud, with St. Peter on His right and St. Paul on the left, and giving the keys to the former. From Bottari (i. 185) we give a woodcut of this subject, which Bianchini regards as of great antiquity (note in Anast. Vita Urbani, p. 18). It forms part of the bas-relief round a vase. St. Peter and the keys appear next to our Lord in the church of St. Cecilia, in a mosaic restored by Paschal I., about 820 (Ciampini, Vet. Mon. ii. tab. lii. 160).

From Martigny, after Bottari.

St. Peter is also represented with the keys on a sarcophagus at Verona (Maffei, Museum Veron. p. 484; Arch. Numm. vii. 22), and in the mosaic of the great vault of the basilica of St. Peter, on the Via Ostiensis, dated 441 (Ciampini, V. M. tab. lxxviii.); also in that of S. Maria in Cosmedin, at Ravenna, A.D. 553, where he seems to be presenting them before the throne of the Lamb (ibid. ii. tab. xxiii.). Martigny mentions a Greek MS. in the Vatican, dating as far back as the emperor Justin I., where St. Peter holds three keys on a large ring. (Alemani, de Lateranens. parietin. tab. vii. p. 55. See also Perret, vol. iii. pl. xii.) Alemani considers the third key as conveying authority over the Empire and the temporal power in general. [R. St. J. T.]

KEYS, POWER OF THE. The metaphor implied in the symbolic use of the word "key" is obviously derived from the fact that he who has the key of a house can admit or exclude whom he will. Thus in Isaiah xxii. 22, the promise is given to Eliakim that on his shoulder shall be laid "the key of the house of David, . . . so he shall open and none shall shut; and he shall shut and none shall open." With a similar intension the Lord Himself is said (Rev. iii. 7) to have the "key of David," and again (Rev. i. 18) to have "the keys of hell and of death."

* Probably that built by St. Damasus. Anastasius: "Et edificavit Platoniam, ubi corpora apostolorum Juconron." † c. S. Petri et S. Pauli. Ducange: Platonis; Platoniae; Platonis—marmora in tabulis dijecta.

With the same use of metaphor our Lord gave the famous promise to St. Peter, "I will give unto thee the keys of the kingdom of heaven" (Matt. xvi. 19), implying a power of opening and shutting the portals of the church on earth. We are not here concerned with the critical interpretation of the passage, but simply with the use of the term "power of the keys" (clavium potestas) in the ancient church.

The general belief of the fathers was, that the words were addressed to St. Peter as representing the whole church (Van Espen, de Censur. Eccl. c. 2, § 1; Opp. tom. iv. ed. Colon. 1777). Cyprian (de Unit. Eccl. c. 4) identifies the power given to St. Peter with that given to all the apostles after the Resurrection; it was given in the first instance (he thinks) to one man to indicate more emphatically the oneness of the church; and he proceeds to insist on the oneness of the episcopate. This power he seems in another place (Epist. 73, 7) to limit to the remission of sins in baptism. The power of "binding and loosing," and of putting away sins by the healing method or treatment (curatio peccata dimittendi), is expressly assigned to bishops in the treatise De Aleatoribus (c. 1) in Cyprian's works (vol. ii. p. 93, ed. Hartel).

Augustine (c. Advers. Legis, i. 17) says expressly that Christ gave the keys to the church, and that St. Peter in receiving them represented the church. So also in commenting on St. John (Tract. 50, quoted by Gratian, causa 24, qu. 1, c. 6), he repeats that St. Peter in receiving the keys symbolised (significavit) the holy church; and again (Tract. 124) he says, "the church which is founded on Christ received from Him the keys of the kingdom of Heaven in the person of Peter, that is the power of binding and loosing sins." Leo the Great (Serm. 3 in Anniv. sanc. Assumpt. and Serm. 2 de Nat. Apostl. in Gratian, cau. 24, qu. 1, c. 5) holds that the power in the church derived from St. Peter must be administered in the spirit of St. Peter in order to have validity: "manet ergo Petri privilegium, ubi cunque ex ipsius fertur aequitate iudicium, nec nimia est vel severitas vel remissio; ubi nihil erit ligatum, nihil solum, nisi quod bestus Petrus aut solverit aut ligaverit."

The "power of the keys," then, is held to reside primarily in the church at large, though it be exercised through its bishops and other ministers. And, as Jansen (quoted by Van Espen, u. s.) has noted, in the primitive church sinners were in fact, after a first and second admonition, brought before the whole church of the place, that is, the whole body of Christians duly convened, and there, if found impenitent, excommunicated with the assent and approbation of all (1 Cor. v. 4). The evidence of Tertullian (Apol. c. 39) and Cyprian (Epist. 30, c. 5; 55, c. 5; 64, c. 1) shews that questions involving the reception or excommunication of a member of the church were not decided by the bishop alone, but by the bishop with the assent of the presbyters, deacons, and faithful laity. And although in after times the power of the keys came to be exercised by the ministers of all shut and none shall open," attention the Lord Himself is to have the "key of David," (18) to have "the keys of hell use of metaphor our Lord gave to St. Peter, "I will give to thee the kingdom of heaven" applying a power of opening portals of the church on earth, concerned with the critical passage, but simply with term "power of the keys" in the ancient church.

of the fathers was, that he referred to St. Peter as representative (Van Espen, de Censur. c. tom. iv. ed. Colon. 1777). Eccl. c. 4) identifies the power with that given to all the resurrection; it was given in (thinks) to one man to indicate the oneness of the church; insist on the oneness of the power he seems in another to limit to the remission of the power of "binding and loosing away sins by the healing at (curative) peccata dimittimus" assigned to bishops in the Dec. c. 1) in Cyprian's works (artel).

Legis. i. 17) says that he gave the keys to the church, a receiving them represented in commenting on St. John by Gratian, causa 24, qu. 1. at St. Peter in receiving the episcopate) the holy church; (124) he says, "the church a Christ received from Him dom of Heaven in the person power of binding and loosing (Serm. 3 in Anniv. sac. 2 de Nat. Apostt. in Gratian,) holds that the power in from St. Peter must be spirit of St. Peter in order anet ergo Petri privilegium, fertur aequitate iudicium, veritas vel remissio; ubi ill solutum, nisi quod beatus ut ligaverit."

the keys," then, is held to the church at large, though igh its bishops and other Jansen (quoted by Van ed, in the primitive church t, after a first and second e before the whole church of e whole body of Christians here, if found impudent, he assent and approba- 4). The evidence of Ter-) and Cyprian (Epistt. 30, c. 1) shows that questions ion or excommunication of ch were not decided by the e bishop with the assent eacons, and faithful laity, er times the power of the ercised by the ministers of the church and ecclesiastical judges without consulting the church, yet the source of that power remains in the church, so that it has always the right to prescribe the conditions on which that power is to be exercised. It is on the "power of the keys" that the right of the church to exclude offenders from its pale, and again to readmit them to its privileges and graces, to prescribe penance and grant absolution, is held to depend. The distinctions between the "forum internum," or penitential jurisdiction, and the "forum externum," or penal jurisdiction; and between the "potestas ordinis" and the "potestas jurisdictionis," were probably not drawn before the twelfth century (Morinus, de Sacram. Penit. vi. 25, § 12); with these therefore we are not here concerned. [EXCOMMUNICATION, PENITENCE.]

[C.]

KIARA (or CEAR, CERA, etc.), virgin (ob. circa A.D. 680 according to her chronicler, though this date is probably too late), commemorated at Killehrea, in the south of Ireland, on Oct. 16. There is also another commemoration, perhaps of a translation, on Jan. 5 (Acta Sanctorum, Oct. vol. vii. p. 950).

[R. S.]

KIRAN (CIARAN, CIERAN, etc.) (1) bishop and abbot of Saigir in Ossory, in Ireland (ob. circa A.D. 520), commemorated on March 5. (Acta Sanctorum, March, vol. i. p. 387.)

(2) O Queran, abbot of Cluain-Mac-Nois, in Westmeath, in Ireland (ob. circa A.D. 548), to whom is due one of the most famous of the Monastic Rules of Ireland. He is commemorated on Sept. 9. (Mart. Usuard. "In Scotia, Querani abbas" Acta Sanctorum, Sept. vol. iii. p. 370.)

[R. S.]

KILIAN (KYLLENA, KILLENA, KILINUS, CHILIANUS, etc.), the apostle of Thuringia and bishop of Würzburg, in the latter part of the 7th century, commemorated on July 8 (Usuard, Wandelbert, Rabanus, Notker). His day had its proper office, and seems to have had a vigil at an early period (Acta Sanctorum, July, vol. ii. p. 608).

[R. S.]

KINDRED. [PROHIBITED DEGREES.]

KINEBURGA and KINESWITHA, virgins, daughters of Penda, king of Mercia (ob. A.D. 655), who, with their kinswoman Tibba, are commemorated on March 6, or according to some martyrologies on March 5. In one case, a separate commemoration of Kineswitha is assigned to Jan. 31 (Acta Sanctorum, March, vol. i. p. 443).

[R. S.]

KINEDUS (KYNEDUS, KINETHUS, etc.), hermit and confessor in Gower, in South Wales, in the 6th century (ob. circa A.D. 529), commemorated on August 1. (Acta Sanctorum, Aug. vol. i. p. 68.)

[R. S.]

KINGS, PRAYER FOR. Prayers for the reigning Sovereign were introduced into the Liturgy at a very early date, in obedience to the injunction of St. Paul. In the so-called Clementine Liturgy we read: "Furthermore we implore Thee, O Lord, on behalf of the King, and those in high station (ὅν ὑπεροχῆν), and all the army," &c. Tertullian writes (ad Scapulam, c. 2): "We sacrifice for the safety of the Emperor; but to our God, and his, but in the manner which God has commanded, in simple prayer." So Arnobius (Contra Gentes, iv. 36), in a passage thought to refer to the Diocletian persecution: "Why have our writings to be cruelly broken up, in which prayer is made to the Supreme God; peace and pardon asked for all in authority; soldiers, kings, friends, enemies; alike for those who are still of the flesh?" So also Cyril of Jerus. (Catech. myst. v.): "Then after that spiritual sacrifice is completed . . . we beseech God for the common peace of the churches, for the tranquillity of the world, for kings, for soldiers," &c. Many other patristic references to the practice might be adduced. St. Athanasius (Apol. ad Const.) states that prayer was made in the liturgy for the heretical emperor Constantius; and Theophylact, on 1 Tim. ii. 1, 2, observes that the minds of Christians would probably be disturbed if ordered to pray for unbelieving kings at the time of the Holy Mysteries, and that St. Paul on this account gave as the motive for the command, and the inducement to obey it, that we may lead a quiet and peaceable life

In accordance with these passages the name of the reigning sovereign was inserted in the Diptychs which were read in the liturgy, and was so continued from the time of Leo the Great till the twelfth century.

The Liturgy of St. Chrysostom contains the following prayer in the canon (ἀναφορά); after the commemoration of the saints, and prayers for the orthodox bishop and clergy, the church and the "religious," follows:—"Moreover we offer unto Thee this reasonable service . . . on behalf of our most faithful and Christ-loving kings, and all their court [lit. palace, παλάτιον] and army. Grant them, O Lord, a peaceful reign, that in their tranquillity we too may lead a calm and quiet life in all righteousness and holiness." The Liturgy of St. Basil, in the corresponding place, contains the prayer: "Remember, O Lord, our most religious and faithful kings, whom Thou hast ordained to have rule upon earth. Invest them [lit. crown, στέφανωσον] with the armour of truth, with the armour of Thy blessing; shelter their head in the day of battle; strengthen their arm; exalt their right hand; confirm their kingdom; subdue to them all barbarian nations, who wish for war; grant to them a deep peace which shall not be taken away; speak to their hearts good things concerning Thy Church and all Thy people, that in their tranquillity we may lead a calm and quiet life in all righteousness and holiness. Remember, O Lord, all rulers and authorities, and our brethren who are in the palace, and all the army."

Both the Liturgies of St. Chrysostom and St. Basil contain also the following prayer, immediately after that for the bishop and clergy, in the εὐχητικὰ [see LITANY] at the beginning of the service, which are the same for both liturgies: "For our most religious and divinely

* e.g. Dion. Alex. (suprad. Euseb. Hist. vii. 11); St. Augustine (Ep. 89, ad Paulin.); Tertullian (Apol. 30, 31); St. Ambrose (de Sacr. iv. c. 4), &c.

† ὅν τῶν παλατίων. We should say, "who are about court," or "who are members of the household," but the expressions are somewhat too familiar to form part of a prayer.

protected kings, for all their court (παδριω) and army, let us beseech the Lord,

"R. Kyrie Eleison.

"For his help to them in war, and that He will put under their feet every enemy and foe, let us beseech the Lord,

"R. Kyrie Eleison."

The Roman canon contains, near the beginning: "Imprimis, que tibi offerimus pro ecclesia tua Sancta Catholica . . . unum cum famulo tuo Papa nostro N., et Antistite nostro N., et Rege nostro N., et omnibus orthodoxis," &c.

There are also votive masses, pro imperatore and pro rege.

The following prayer is found in Roman missals from an early date.^d It is one of a series of intercessory prayers said on Good Friday, after the reading of the Passion according to St. John, headed successively: "Pro pace ecclesie," "Pro Papa," "Pro universis gradibus ecclesie," "Pro Imperatore," &c., and each introduced with its own preface of "Oremus," &c. That for the emperor is as follows:—

"Oremus et pro christianissimo Imperatore nostro N., ut Deus et Dominus noster subditum illi faciat omnes barbaras nationes ad nostram perpetuam pacem.

"Oremus. Flectamus genua. Levite. Omnipotens sempiternus Deus, in cujus manu sunt omnium potestates et omnium jura regnorum, respice ad Romanum benignus imperium; ut gentes, quae in sua feritate confidunt potentiae tuae dextera comprimentur. Per Dominum. Amen."

The Ambrosian canon has nearly the same words as the Roman: "una cum famulo et sacerdote tuo Papa nostro III., et Pontifice nostro III. et famulo tuo III. Imperatore, sed et omnibus orthodoxis," &c.; and the two missal Litanies said on the Sundays in Lent, each contained a similar prayer: "Pro famulo tuo III. Imperatore, et famula tua III. Imperatrice, et omni exercitu eorum. R. Kyrie Eleison."

[Litany used on first, third, and fifth Sundays in Lent.]

The litany used on the alternate Sundays has an almost identical clause.

The Mozarabic Liturgy, in which the eucharistic intercession is short, contains, in its present form,^e no special prayer for the king.

Prayers for the king, however, are by no means confined to the Liturgy, but are found under varied forms scattered throughout the offices of the church.

Thus in those of the Greek Church the intercessions (επιηυκτα) at the end of the daily midnight office contain the clause, "Let us pray . . . for our most religious and divinely-protected kings,

"R. Kyrie Eleison.

"For the prosperity and the efficiency of the Christ-loving army,

"R. Kyrie Eleison."

Also at the end of Vespers is a prayer headed by the rubric, "And we confirm the kings, say-

^c This clause is omitted in some modern editions of St. Chrysostom's Liturgy.

^d It is in the collection of liturgies by Pamelina.

^e Mentioning his name. See Ménard on Greg. Sacram. note 997, p. 572.

^f The Mozarabic canon bears signs of having been rearranged.

ing" (καὶ ἡμεῖς σπερδαίμεν τοὺς βασιλεῖς λέγομεν), which begins thus: "O King of heaven, confirm our faithful kings, establish the faith, calm the nations, give peace to the world," &c. The Euchology again contains a long prayer "for the king and his army," to be used in time of war and threatenings of war.

In the Latin Church we may refer to the ordinary form of Litany said according to Roman use on Fridays in Lent, St. Mark's Day, and the Rogation Days, which contains the petition, "Ut regibus et principibus Christianis pacem et veram concordiam [ante victoriam Sarum] donare digneris,

"Te rogamus audi nos."

And also the verse "Domine saluum fac regem, R. Et exaudi nos in die qua invocaverimus te," which enters into the preces of Lauds and Vespers according to the Roman Breviary, and into those of Prime according to the Ambrosian.

[H. J. H.]

Prayer was also made for kings in the daily hour-offices. Thus the Council of Clovesho, A.D. 747 (c. 15, de Septem Canonis Horis), desires the clergy, secular and monastic, in saying the ordinary offices, not to neglect to pray for kings and for the safety of the Christian church (Hadden and Stubbs, Councils, iii. 367); and the monks of Fulda in their petition to Charles the Great (c. i. Migne, Patrol. cv. 419), pray the emperor, in the first place, that he may be permitted to continue their daily prayer for him and his children, and all Christian people, which they said after the Capitulum. [C.]

KINGS, THE THREE. [EPIPHANY, I. 620.]

ΚΙΣΣ—KISS OF PEACE (ἀσπασμός, εἰρήνη, osculum pacis, pax, salutatio).

The kiss, the instinctive token of amity and affection, from the earliest time found a place in the life and the worship of the Christian Church. The symbol of peace and love could nowhere find a more appropriate home, in its highest and purest idea, than in the religion of peace and love. As a form of Christian greeting, indicating the inner communion of spirit, "a holy kiss" is four times enjoined by St. Paul at the close of his Epistles (Rom. xvi. 16; 1 Cor. xvi. 20; 2 Cor. xiii. 12; 1 Thess. v. 26); and "a kiss of charity" (or "of love") once by St. Peter (1 Pet. v. 14). No limitation is expressed or implied. The Christians were simply bidden thus to "greet one another." Nor is there any doubt that the primitive usage was for the "holy kiss" to be given promiscuously, without any restriction as to sexes or ranks, among those who were all one in Christ Jesus; who thus, in St. Augustine's words, "in token of catholic unity, when about to communicate in the Church, demonstrated their inward peace by a mutual kiss" (de Amicit. c. vi.). In the early Christian worship, there is no reference to any restriction, while the cautions and admonitions we meet with as to its profanation and abuse plainly indicate the indiscriminate character of the salutation. A primitive extracanonical scripture, quoted by Athenagoras, A.D. 177 (Legat. pro Christian. § 32), shews that the kiss was sometimes given a second time, in certain cases, for the gratification of appetite, σπερ αὐτὸν τοὺς βασιλεῖς λέγειν thus: "O King of heaven, fulfill kings, establish the faith, give peace to the world," again contains a long king and his army," to be and threatenings of war. Church we may refer to the Litany said according to days in Lent, St. Mark's Day, Days, which contains the bus et principibus Christianis concordiam [atque victoriam] neris,

"Te rogamus nudi nos."
"Domine saluum fac regem, in die qua invocaverimus te," o the preces of Lauds and to the Roman Breviary, and according to the Ambrosian.

[H. J. H.]
made for kings in the daily as the Council of Clovesho, de Septem Canonibus Norwic, secular and monastic, in ry offices, not to neglect to for the safety of the Christian and Stubbs, Councils, iii. 367; of Fulda in their petition to (c. i. Migne, Patrol. c. 419), in the first place, that they to continue their daily prayer adren, and all Christian people, ter the Capitulum. [C.]

THREE. [EPIPHANY, I.

PEACE (ἀσπασμός, εὐφρην, saluti).

distinctive token of amity and earliest time found a place in rship of the Christian Church. ace and love could nowhere riate home, in its highest and in the religion of peace and of Christian greeting, indomunion of spirit. "a holy as enjoined by St. Paul at the (Rom. xvi. 16; 1 Cor. xvi. 2; 1 Thess. v. 26); and "a (or "of love") once by St.). No limitation is expressed Christians were simply bidden e another." Nor is there any rimitive usage was for the given promiscuously, without o sexes or ranks, among these Christ Jesus; who thus, in St.

"in token of catholic unity, municate in the Church, downward peace, outward (c. vi.). In frequent s of peace which exist in the rship, there is no reference to the cautions and admonitions as to its profanation and cate the indistinguishable chation. A primitive extra-, quoted by Athenagoras, A.D. ristian" § 32, shews that the ea given a second time, in the gratification of appetite, adding, "therefore the kiss, or rather the salutation, should be given with the greatest care, since, if there be mixed with it the least defilement of thought, it excludes us from eternal life." Clement of Alexandria also condemns "the shameless use of the kiss which ought to be mystical," with which certain persons "made the churches resound, occasioning foul suspicions and evil reports" (Pædagog. lib. iii. c. 11). Origen, too, commenting on Rom. xvi. c. 11), stating that this and similar passages had given rise to the custom among the churches, for Christians after prayer to receive one another with a kiss, goes on to say that this kiss should be "holy, i.e. chaste and sincere; not like the kiss of Judas, but expressive of peace and simplicity unfeigned" (in Roman. lib. x. § 33). Tertullian speaks of the reluctance likely to be felt by a heathen husband that his wife should "meet any one of the brethren to exchange a kiss," "alicui fratrum ad osculum convenire" (ad Exor. lib. ii. c. 4). The calumnious charges against the Christians to which this custom gave rise, joined to the real peril of it, especially when false brethren began to creep into the Church, led to the abrogation of the promiscuous salutation, and its restriction to persons of the same sex. The Apostolical Constitutions supply the earliest example of this distinction: "Let the deacon say to all, 'Salute ye one another with the holy kiss'; and let the clergy salute the bishop, the men of the laity salute the men, the women the women" (Const. Apostol. lib. viii. § 2). We find the same less distinctly stated in the 19th canon of the council of Laodicea (A.D. 371): "After the presbyters have given the peace to the bishop, then the laymen are to give the peace to one another" (Labbe, Concil. i. 1500). An early Oriental canon given by Renaudot (Liturg. Orient. Collect. vol. i. p. 222) from the collection of canons by Ehdnassalus (c. xii.), lays down the same rule: "The men shall kiss one another, but the women shall kiss other women; nor shall men give the kiss to them." It also prevailed in the Western Church. An Ordo Romanus, probably anterior to the 9th century, ordains that the "archdeacons should give the peace to the bishop first; then the rest in order; and the people, the men and women separately" (Muratori, tom. ii. p. 49). Amalarius, when speaking of the dangers and inconveniences which led to this limitation, remarks that if the men are distinguished from the women in their place in church, much more should they be in the reception of the kiss (de Eccl. Offic. lib. iii. c. 32).

This primitive custom seems to have been maintained in the Western Church till after the 13th century. We find from the acts of the Council of Frankfurt, A.D. 794 (c. 50), and those of the Council of Mentz, A.D. 813 and 9th centuries. Cardinal Bona says that it is mentioned as still in use by Innocent III. (A.D. 1198-1216) in his Myst. Miss. (lib. vi. c. 5). But not long afterwards we first read of the introduction of a mechanical substitute for the actual kiss, in the shape of a small wooden tablet, or plate of metal, bearing a representation of the Crucifixion (Osculatorium, de Osculatorium, p. 2). This, after having been kissed by the priest and deacon, was handed by the latter to the communicants, who, by all kissing Christ. This departure from primitive usage, in deference to the growing corruption, is attributed to the Franciscans by Bona (Her. Liturg. lib. ii. c. xvi. § 7). The earliest notice of these instruments is in the records of English councils of the 13th century; (Scudamore's Notit. Eucharist. p. 438). The rite of the holy kiss has not entirely ceased in the Greek Church. In the Armenian Church the people simply bow to one another; but in the strictly Oriental churches, of whatever language, the kiss is observed without any difference (Renaudot, Lit. Orient. vol. ii. p. 76).

The holy kiss originally formed an element of every act of Christian worship. No sacrament or sacramental function was deemed complete in its absence. To quote the words of Bona, "Osculum non solum communionis, sed et omnium Ecclesiasticarum functionum signaculum et sigilobus" (Her. Liturg. lib. ii. c. xvi. § 7). Even to lack something essential to its true character Tertullian calls it "signaculum orationis," "the seal of prayer," and asks "what prayer is complete from which the holy kiss is divorced? what of sacrifice is that from which men depart without the peace?" (Tert. de Orat. c. 14).

(a.) Kiss of Peace at the Holy Communion.—The Holy Eucharist is the Christian rite with which the Kiss of Peace was most essentially connected, and in which it was preserved the longest. It is found in all primitive liturgies, and is mentioned or referred to by the earliest writers who describe the administration of the Lord's Supper. The primitive place of the holy kiss is that which it still maintains in the Oriental Church, between the dismissal of the non-communicants and the Oblation. The earliest author who mentions it, Justin Martyr, thus salutes one another with a kiss. There is then brought to the president bread and a cup of wine," &c. (Apology, i. c. 65.). St. Cyril of Jerusalem places it between the washing of the deacon's hands and the Sorsum corda. "Then and let us kiss one another." "This kiss is the sign that our souls are mingled together, and have banished all remembrance of wrongs" (cf. Matt. v. 23), (Cit. Lect. xxiii. Myst. v. § 3). In the same way the 19th canon of the Council of Laodicea, already referred to, places "the Peace" before the holy oblation; and St. Chrysostom, "when the gift is about to be offered" (de Compunct. Cordis, lib. i. c. 3); and the Pseudo-Dionysius, at the time of the oblation of the bread and wine (de Eccl. Hierarch. c. 3). St. Chrysostom, in another passage, after describing the exclusion from the holy precincts of those who were unable to partake of the holy table, writes: "When it behoveth to give and receive peace, we all alike salute each other," and then proceeds to speak of the celebration of the "most awful mysteries" (Hom. xviii. in 2 Cor. viii. 24, § 3).

The Apostolical Constitutions also introduce the Holy Kiss after the two prayers for the faithful before the Oblation (lib. viii. c. 11). The primitive liturgies are likewise unanimous in assigning to the kiss the same position in the Eucharistic ritual. In that of St. James it comes just before the Sursum cordi and the Tere dignum, &c. (Renanot, vol. ii. p. 30); in that of St. Mark it follows the Great Entrance, and immediately precedes the creed and the oblation of the people (ib. vol. i. p. 143); in those of St. Basil and St. Cyril it also occurs before the Anaphora (ib. pp. 12, 39), and occupies the same place in that of St. Chrysostom (ib. vol. ii. p. 243). In all it is introduced by a prayer asking for the gift of peace and unfeigned love, unfeigned by hypocrisy or deceit (Collectio ad Pacem, Εὐχὴ τῆς εἰρήνης). The rite is also found in all Oriental (as distinguished from Greek) liturgies, and always follows the departure of the non-communicants, and precedes the Anaphora and Preface (Renanot, vol. ii. pp. 30, 76, 134, &c.). It is introduced by three prayers (cf. Concil. Laod. can. 19), those of the Veil, that of the Kiss, and another of Preparation, but in uncertain order (Scudamore, Not. Euch. p. 435).

When we turn from the Eastern to the Western church we find the Kiss of Peace generally occupying a different position in the Eucharistic rite. It is not at all probable that in primitive times the usage of the Occidental was different from that of the Oriental church on this point. Indeed, in the earliest liturgies of the Spanish and Gallican churches, as well as in the most ancient forms of the Ambrosian rite, the Holy Kiss occupies its primitive position between the dismissal of the catechumens and the Preface. In the Mozarabic liturgy the collect of peace follows the prayer and commemoration of the living and the dead. The priest then says, "Make the peace as ye stand," and proceeds to give the kiss to the deacon, or acolyte, who gives it to the people while the choir chant "My peace I give unto you" &c. (Martene, de Ant. Eccl. Rit. lib. i. c. 4, art. 12; Ord. 2, vol. i. p. 461; Isidor. Hispal. de Eccl. Off. lib. i. c. 15). The Gallican use was similar. A Gothic missal printed by Muratori (Lit. Rom. Vet. vol. ii. col. 517, s. q.) gives the Collectio ad Pacem, with petitions referring to the Kiss, immediately before the Preface, after the recitation of the diptychs and the collect post nomina (cf. Martene, u. s. Ord. i. p. 454). Its position is the same in the Missale Gallicanum Vetus (Muratori, u. s. col. 698, s. q.), and the Sacramentarium Gallicanum (ib. col. 776 ff.), (cf. Bona, Rever. Liturg. lib. i. c. 12, p. 369 ff.). The position of the kiss is also indicated by the mention of it by Germanus (bishop of Paris in the 6th century), immediately before the Preface (Leposit. de Miss., apud Martene, Thesaur. Anecd. vol. v. p. 95). But in the churches of Africa and Rome from the 5th century, when the earliest notices of it occur, onwards to the time of its virtual abrogation, it stands at a later period in the service, after the consecration, and immediately before the communion. Thus in a sermon included among those of St. Augustine, but more truly ascribed to Caesarius of Arles, we read: "When the consecration is completed, we say the Lord's Prayer. After that, Pax vobiscum is said, and Christians kiss one another with the Kiss which is the sign of peace." (Aug. Homil. de Diversis, lxxxiii.)

The reference to the kiss in the undisputed

works of St. Augustine (e. g. Contra Iherosol. Felicitati, lib. ii. c. 23; Homil. VI. in Joann. § 4) do not define its place in the ritual. From the letter to Decentius, bishop of Engubium, ascribed to pope Innocent I., A. D. 416, "but certainly at later date" (Scudamore, Not. Euch. p. 437), we find that the Peace was given in some of the Latin churches previously to the consecration. Whether in the injunction that it should be given after the completion of the mysteries, that the laity might thus signify their assent to all that had been done, the writer was introducing a novelty, or reasserting the primitive Latin use, is warmly contested between Bossage (Annal. Eccl. Polit. anno 56) and Sala (ib. 592). Bona refutes the groundless assertion that the use of the Holy Kiss was first introduced into the Roman liturgy by Innocent I., "Non enim instituit, sed absum emendavit" (Rever. Liturg. lib. ii. c. xvi. § 6). The impugned custom must probably have been the remnant of an earlier rite. Whatever may have been the date of the change of the position of the Kiss, in which respect they differed from all the other liturgies of the East and West, it is certain that in the liturgies of Milan, Rome, and Africa, the Salutation of Peace followed instead of preceding the consecration. On the conclusion of the canon, the bread being broken, and divided for distribution, and the Lord's Prayer recited, the clergy and people interchanged the Kiss of Peace, and all communicated. In the sacramentary of Gregory, the salutation follows the Lord's Prayer and precedes the Agnus Dei (Muratori, Liturg. Rom. Vetus, vol. ii. p. 6). The Ordo Romanus, earlier than the ninth century, given by Muratori (ib. col. 74, § 18), places it at the end of the canon when the host is being put into the chalice. "The archdeacon gives the peace to the bishop first, then to the rest" [of the ministers] "in order, and to the people" (§ 18). In the second Ordo, not much later, there is a slight variation in the rubric: "the rest [give the peace] in order; and the people, men and women, separately" (ib. col. 1027, § 12). In the liturgy of Milan, the Peace is bidden by the deacon before the priest communicates, in the words, "Offer the Peace to one another," to which the people respond, "Thanks be to God." The priest then says a secret prayer for the peace of the church, based on John xiv. 27, or, as an alternative, utters aloud, "Peace in heaven, peace on earth, peace among all people, peace to the priests of the church of God. The peace of Christ and the Church remain with us for ever." Then, according to the MS. printed in the revision of St. Charles Borromeo, A. D. 1560, he gives the peace with the formula, "Hold the bond of love and peace [habete vinculum instead of the more usual osculum], that ye may be meet for the most sanct mysteries of God" (Martene, de Ant. Eccl. Rit. vol. i. p. 478; lib. i. c. iv. art. 15, § 5; Bona, Rever. Liturg. lib. ii. c. xvi. § 5). This formula occurs also in the liturgies of the East and Bangor, and may have been adopted by Augustine from the older Gallican liturgies. The mention of the Kiss in the account of the Eucharist celebrated during a temporary fast by Maximian, bishop of Syracuse—"they gave one another the kiss; they received the body and the Blood of the Redeemer" (Gregory, Mag. Dial. lib. iii. c. 36)—also shows that in the

(e. g. Contra Iheros Felicit. VI. in Journ. § 4) is not a ritual. From the letter of Eusebius, ascribed to p. 418, "but certainly at the time, Nov. Euvh. p. 437) was given in some of the only to the consecration, action that it should be plation of the mysteries, thus signify their assent there, Nov. Euvh. p. 437) was given in some of the only to the consecration, action that it should be plation of the mysteries, thus signify their assent there, the writer was in- r asserting the primitive contested between Basnage (no 56) and Sala (p. 452). undess assertion that the as first introduced into the cent l., "N-n enim insti- endavit" (Rev. Liturg. lib. nupugned custom must pro- ment of an earlier rite. en the date of the change s Kiss, in which respect they other liturgies of the East in that in the liturgies of ica, the Salutation of Peace preceding the consecration. the canon, the bread being for distribution, and the clergy and people in of Peace, and all communi- tary of Gregory, and the Lord's Prayer and pre- (Muratori, Liturg. Rom. The Ordo Romanus, earlier rite, given by Muratori (*de it at the end of the canon put into the chalice. "The eace to the bishop first, f the ministers" "in order, § 18). In the second Ordo, re is a slight variation in t [give the peace] in order; a and women, separately." In the liturgy of Milan, by the deacon before the in the words, "Offer the e," to which the people re- to God." The priest then or the peace of the church, 27, or, as an alternative, e in heaven, peace on earth, ple, peace to the priests of The peace of Christ and the us for ever." Then, accord- in the revision of St. D. 1560, he gives the peace Hold the bond of love and m instead of the more usual ay be met for the pe- od" (Martene, de Ant. lib. l. c. iv. art. 19, p. 5; . II. c. xv. p. 5). This in the liturgy of Milan and re been borrowed by August- Gallican liturgies. The in the account of the En-uring a temple, at sea by Syracuse—"they gave me ey received the God, and Redeemer" (Gregory Magn. —also shews that the* time it came immediately before communion. In the modern Roman liturgy the Pax vobis un- stands in the same place, between the Lord's Prayer and the Agnus Dei.

At the conclusion of the eucharistic rite it was customary for the bishop to give the Kiss to the laity who had received it from him. On this custom see the notes of Valesius (in Cornet. Epist. LX. ad Fab.), in which he refers to Jerome (Epist. lxiii.) and Paulus Diaconus (de Vit. Patr. Emeritens. c. vii.)

Before leaving this part of the subject, it may be mentioned that Tertullian informs us (de Crat. c. 18) that certain persons in his day objected to giving or receiving the Holy Kiss in public on a fast-day, "subtrahunt osculum pœis." This custom he strongly reprehends, not only because the kiss was the "seal of prayer," which was incomplete without it, but because such an omission of the accustomed rite proclaimed the act of fasting in violation of our Lord's injunction (Matt. vi. 17, 18). The same objection did not hold against the received custom of omitting the kiss on Good Friday, "die Pasche . . . merito deponimus osculum," because that was an universally acknow- ledged fast-day. An illustration of this omis- sion may be derived from the remark of Procopius (Hist. Arcan. c. 9), that Justinian and Theodora began their reign with an evil omen, commencing it on Good Friday, a day when it was unlawful to give the salutation. The kiss was also omitted on Easter Eve, but was given on all other stated fasts (Muratori, in Tertull. loc. cit.) (Augusti, Handbuch der christ. Arch. vol. ii. p. 718, s. q.; Bona, Rev. Liturg. lib. II. c. xvi. § 6-7; Bingham, Orig. Eccl. bk. xv. c. iii. § 3; Binterim, Denkwürdigkeiten, vol. iv. part iii. p. 485, s. q.; Goar, Eucholog. p. 134; Martene, de Ant. Eccl. Rit. lib. i. c. iii. § 4, 5; Muratori, Liturg. Rom. Vt. passim; Palmer, Anti. of English Ritual, vol. ii. pp. 100-103; Renanot, Liturg. Oriental. Collect. vol. i. p. 222, ff.; vol. ii. p. 76, ff.; Scudamore, Notit. Eucharist. c. ii. § 2, pp. 434-442.)

(b) The Kiss of Peace at Baptism.—After the administration of the sacrament of baptism, the newly-baptized person, whether infant or adult, received the Holy Kiss as a token of brotherly love, and a sign of admission into the family of Christ. The kiss was first given by the baptizer and then by the other members of the congregation. There is a reference to this custom in a letter of Cyprian (ad Fidum Episcopum, Ep. lxiv. (viii.) § 4), where the language is so beautiful that it deserves to be given at length. Cyprian is correcting the erroneous idea that an infant, as still impure, should not be baptized before the eighth day after its birth, asserting that as soon as it was born it was meet for baptism. He writes: "No one ought to shudder at that which God hath condescended to make. For although the infant is still fresh from its birth, yet it is not just that any one should shudder at kissing it, in giving grace, and making peace; since in kissing an infant every one of us ought, for his very religion's sake, to bethink him of the hands of God themselves, still fresh, which in some sort we are kissing in the man lately formed and freshly born, when we are embracing that which God hath made." This custom of giving the Kiss of Peace to infants at baptism Martene erroneously confines to the African church. But it is referred to not only by Augustine (Cont. Epist. Pelag. lib. iv. c. 8), but also by Chrysostom, (Homil. 50 de Utilitat. legend. Script.): "Because before his baptism he was an enemy, but after baptism is made a friend of our common Lord; we therefore all rejoice with him. And upon this account the kiss is called 'peace' (τὸ φίλημα εἰρήνη καλεῖται), that we may learn thereby that God has ended the war, and brought us into friendship with Himself." A relic of this rite still survives in the Pax tecum found in many baptismal rituals (Augusti, Hand- buch, vol. ii. p. 451; Bingham, bk. xii. c. iv. § 6; Binterim, vol. i. c. i. § 2, p. 163; Rhein- wald, Kirchlich. Archäolog. II. iii. § 108).

(c) The Kiss at Ordination.—The imparting of the brotherly kiss to the newly ordained formed an essential element of the service for the ordination of presbyters and bishops in all churches. It is enjoined in the Apostolical Con- stitutions in the ordination of bishops: "Let him [the newly consecrated bishop] be placed in his throne, in a place set apart for him among the rest of the bishops, they all giving him the kiss in the Lord" (ap. Const. lib. viii. c. 5), and is mentioned by the Pseudo-Dionysius (de Eccl. Hierarch. c. v. p. 2, § 6), who states that the newly ordained presbyter was kissed by the bishop and the rest of the clergy. So also in the Sacramentary of Gregory, in the consecra- tion of a bishop, we find the direction, at the conclusion of the rite, after the delivery of the ring, staff, and gospels: "then the elect gives the kiss to the pope, and to all the deacons. The archdeacon holding him conveys him into the presbytery, and he gives the kiss to the bishop and the presbyters." He is again kissed by the pope on the reception of the host (Muratori, u. s. vol. ii. col. 442). At the ordination of presbyters they are similarly enjoined to give the kiss of peace to the ordaining bishop, and then to the bishops, presbyters, deacons, and other ministers who are present, and they receive it themselves from the ordaining bishop at the holy communion, and are thence kissed by him at the conclusion of the rite with the words, pax Domini sui roboremus (Ibid. col. 429, 430). In the Greek church the order is the same, both with bishops and presbyters. In the ordination of the patriarch of Alexandria the kiss is given in the same place, and in the same order (Renanot, vol. i. p. 481); while in that of a presbyter, after the imposition of hands, the stole is brought over the right shoulder of the new presbyter, the casula is put on, and he then takes his stand among them, reading his mass. (Goar, Eucholog. p. 298, 6; Bingham, bk. ii. c. xi. § 10; c. xix. § 17; bk. iv. c. vi. § 15; Binterim, vol. i. part i. p. 492; Augusti, Hdbch. vol. iii. p. 242.)

(d) At Espousals.—On the espousal of two Christians, the contract was solemnly ratified by a kiss given by the man to his future wife. This was an innocent custom dictated by nature, adopted by the members of the church from their heathen ancestors, among whom the marriage rite was ratified by the kiss, "uxorem aut maritum tantum osculo putari" (Quintil. De laudat. 276). It is mentioned by Tertullian as an old heathen

custom (de Velant. Virgin. c. 11). So much stress is laid on the kiss as the ratification of espousals, that Constantine made the inheritance of half the espousal donations, on the death of one party before the consummation of the marriage, to depend on the kiss having been given or not. (Col. Theodos. lib. lii. tit. 5; de Sponsalibus, leg. 5; Cod. Justin. lib. v. tit. 3; de Donat. ante Nupt. leg. 16); (Bingham, bk. xxiii. ch. iii. § 6; Binterim, vol. vi. part 2, p. 164.)

(e) To the Dying.—The kiss dictated by natural affection to dying friends was not forbidden by the church of Christ. We find it mentioned by the Pseudo-Amphilochius in his life of St. Basil (c. 129). It is prescribed in several early monastic rituals in the case of a sick monk; e. g. in the ritual of the abbey of St. Giles of Noyon, ante ann. 500. After receiving extreme unction, the mouth of the sick man is washed, he then first kisses the cross, and afterwards all who are present; and in that of St. Ouen of Rouen, c. A. D. 400, where, after communion, the sick man kisses the cross, and is then kissed by the priest, and afterwards by all the monks present in succession, each asking pardon of him both before and after the kiss. (Martene, u. s. lib. ii. c. 11; lib. iii. c. 15; Ordo viii., xii.)

(f) To the Dead.—At the funerals the voice of nature was again listened to, and a final kiss was given to the corpse before the actual interment. This tribute of natural affection is mentioned by Ambrose on the occasion of the funeral of his brother Satyrus: "Procedamus ad tumulum, sed prius ultimum coram populo valedico, pacem prædico, osculum solve" (Ambros. de Excessu Satyri, c. 17). The Pseudo-Dionysius describes how, after the prayer made by the priest over the dead body, it is kissed by him, and then by all who are present (de Eccl. Hierarch. c. vii. § 8). We learn also from Goar that it was given to the dead (Eucholog. p. 542), and the custom is punctually observed in the Greek church to the present day. The prohibition of the kiss by the Council of Auxerre, A. D. 578 (Concil. Autissiodor. can. 12) had reference to the superstitious practice of administering the eucharist, with which, as we have seen, the Osculum pacis was inseparably connected, to the dead: "Non licet mortuis nec Eucharistiam, nec osculum tradi" (Augusti, Hæsch. vol. iii. p. 306; Bingham, bk. xxiii. ch. iii. § 14).

(g) As a Mark of Reverence and Respect.—As a token of reverence it was the habit to kiss not only the hands, feet, and vestments of bishops and other ecclesiastics, but also the walls, doors, thresholds, and altars of the sacred buildings. The references to this custom are very frequent. Paulinus, the biographer of St. Ambrose, says this token of respect was commonly paid to priests in his day (Vit. Ambros. p. 2). St. Ambrose himself refers to the hands of priests being kissed by kings and princes when requesting their prayers (de Dignitat. Sacerd. c. ii.), and St. Chrysostom relates how, on the first arrival of Meletius at Antioch, the people eagerly touched his feet and kissed his hands (Hon. de Melet. § 2, p. 521). But no more need be remarked on a custom so common in all countries.

The custom of kissing the pope's feet is of considerable antiquity. In the ordinals included in the sacramentary of Gregory the newly ordained presbyter is enjoined to kiss the feet of the ordainer, and the newly consecrated bishop of the consecrating pontiff. In the latter case, if the pope be not the consecrator, the mouth is to be kissed instead of the feet (Muratori, u. s. cols. 429, 443). In the Ordo Romanus of a pontifical mass, the deacon is directed to kiss the pope's feet before reading the Gospels (ib. col. 1022, § 8). The earliest mention of this mark of homage in Anastasius (Vitæ Pontif. Roman.) is in the case of Constantine, A. D. 708-714, before whom Justinian the younger prostrated himself, on meeting him in Bithynia, wearing his crown, and kissed his feet (Anastasus, cc. § 17.).

The reverent affection of the early Christians for the house of God and everything belonging to it was indicated by embracing and kissing the doors, threshold, pillars, and pavement of the church, and above all, the holy altar. We have a striking example of this last in an account given by St. Ambrose of the eagerness manifested by the soldiers who brought the welcome intelligence of the revocation of the young Valentinian's decree for surrendering the Porcian basilica to the Arians, to rush to the altar and kiss it [Ambros. Epist. xxxiii. (xiv.)]. So Athanasius speaks of those who "approach the holy altar, and with fear and joy salute it" (Homil. adv. eos qui in Homine spem fiunt, tom. ii. p. 304), and the Pseudo-Dionysius, of "saluting the holy table" (Eccl. Hierarch. c. ii. § 4). The custom of kissing the doors is vividly depicted in Chrysostom's words: "See ye not how many kiss the porch (επιθύρα) of this temple, some stooping down, others grasping it with their hand, and putting their hand to their mouth" (Homil. xxx. l.; 2 Cor. xiii. 12). Prudentius also speaks of those who

"Apostolorum et martyrum Exosculantur limina."

Peristeph. Hymn II. vv. 519, 520.

And again—

"Oscula persæptæ figunt impressa metallo."

Peristeph. Hymn xi. v. 193.

And Paulinus describes a rustic who, having lost his oxen, and appealing to St. Felix for their restoration—

"Sternitur ante fores et postibus oscula figit."

Natal. vi. Felicia, v. 250.

These prostrations and kisses must be regarded as nothing more than natural tokens of reverence and affection. The kisses of the altar, the Book of the Gospels, the sacred vessels, &c., which occur so abundantly in the early rituals, have a distinctly liturgical character (see Martene, u. s. lib. i. c. iv. art. 3, § 2, and art. 5, § 6; Goar, Euchol. p. 298, d). [E. V.]

KNEELERS. [PENITENTS.]

KNEELING. [GENUFLEXION, I. 723.]

KNOP (Nodus, pomellum), the bulbous ornament on the stem of a chalice. It is found in some of the earliest known chalices, though it could not be said that every chalice had a knop amongst the earliest Christians. The cups on all the so-called Jewish coins represented in Migne, Dict.naire d'Archéologie Sacrée, all have a knop. It will be enough, he says, to consult these in order to get an idea of the form of the chalice actually used by our blessed Lord at the

of Gregory the newly oris enjoined to kiss the feet of the newly consecrated bishop during pontif. In the latter case, the consecrator, the mouth is seal of the feet (Muratori, u. s. in the Ordo Romanus of a pontifex is directed to kiss the reading the Gospels (ib. col. earliest mention of this mark stasius (Vitus Pontif. Roman.) of Constantine, A.D. 708-714, inian the younger prostrated at his feet in Bithynia, wearing at his feet (Anastas. xc. § 17), section of the early Christians God and everything belonging by embracing and kissing the pillars, and pavement of the all, the holy altar. We have of this last in an account prose of the eagerness manifers who brought the welcome revocation of the young Va-for surrendering the Porcian rians, to rush to the altar Epist. xxxiii. (xiv.). So of those who "approach the with fear and joy salute it" in Homine spem futuram, tom. pseudo-Dionysius, of "saluting loci Hierarch. c. ii. § 4). The feet is vividly depicted in : "See ye not how many kis (πύθρα) of this temple, some hers grasping it with their their hand to their mouth" Cor. xiii. 12). Prudentius who

martyrum
mina." Peristeph. Hymn li. vv. 519, 520.

figunt impressa metallo." Peristeph. Hymn xl. v. 193. describes a rustic who, having lost belonging to St. Felix for their res et postibus ocula figit." Natal. vi. Felicis, v. 250. kisses must be re- more than natural tokens of ion. The kisses of the altar, spels, the sacred vessels, &c., adantly in the early ritua- surgical character (see Mar- v. art. 3, § 2, and art. 5, § 6; 3, d). [E. V.]

[PENITENTS.]
[GENUFLEXION, I. 723.]

comellum), the bulbous orna- of a chalice. It is found in t known chalices, though it at every chalice had a knob for Christians. The cups on all coins represented in Migne, Iconologie Sacrée, all have a enough, he says, to consult at an idea of the form of the l by our blessed Lord at the Institution of the Eucharist. It may be observed that all the chalices figured on Jewish coins of the time of Simon the Maccabee (B.C. 143—B.C. 135) seem to be uniformly provided with a knob (Madden, History of Jewish Coinage, p. 43, ed. 1864). Hence it appears that the knob in the sacred cup was pre-Christian. The chalices that have survived to us from the period traversed in this work are extremely rare; and the examples of the knob within the same period are therefore rare also. (See Mr. Albertances of Sacred Use,' Archæological Journal, vol. iii. p. 131). The knob, however, occurs in what Dr. Lubke describes as "the oldest* of the chalices known in Germany," which was given to the Monastery of Kroms-münster by the Duke Tassilo, who founded the monastery in the year 777 (Ecclesiastical Art in Germany, p. 140, ed. 1876, Engl. transl.). Amongst the decorations of this chalice is a figure of our Lord, in the act of benediction. From the position of His hand the chalice seems to be of Eastern origin. The Gourdon Chalice, which Labarte (Histoire des Arts industriels, vol. i. p. 495, ed. 1864) shews to have been buried between A.D. 518 and A.D. 527, stands upon a conical stem, and has a knob, the germ of the knob, at the junction. This is the earliest example known. [CHALICE, I. 338.]

It is a mistake to suppose that the knob was invented for the purpose of adding strength to the chalice-stem,—a result which it could not effect, for the strength of a knopped stem would still be only the strength of its weakest or thinnest part. It may have been introduced first for the purpose of decoration, though afterwards it was expressly adopted to assist the priest in holding the chalice between his fingers in the act of consecration. He joins his finger and thumb, and then holds the chalice with the remaining fingers. In the Latin rite the priest while holding the sacred host in his right hand over the chalice is directed to hold the chalice itself in his left hand, "per nodum infra cupam." The dates given above shew that the knob existed before the doctrine of Transubstantiation was formulated.

Authorities.—The writer is not aware of any monograph on the subject in any language. The knob is not even mentioned in the Hærolexicon by the brothers Maeri. Fol. Romæ, 1677. But besides the works quoted above, the reader may consult Annales Archéologiques, vol. xxi. p. 336 and vol. xxii. p. 21; the Arundel Society's publication on Ecclesiastical Metal Work of the Middle Ages, and Diversarum Artium Schedula, by Theophilus. [H. T. A.]

KOINONIKON (Κοινωνικόν). [Compare COMMENTATORY LETTERS, I. 407.] I. A letter of communion given to travellers, enabling them to communicate with the Church in the place to which they journeyed. The Nomoconon of the Greeks (c. 454; Cotel. Mon-m. Gr. i. 142) orders that "no stranger be received (to communion) without a koinonikon." Such letters were also called ἐπιστάλια or εἰρηνικά, as by the Council of Chalcedon, A.D. 451 (Can. 11): "We have decreed that all the poor and those needing help shall, after investigation, travel with letters (epistolla), that is to say, with ecclesiastical eirenica only, and not with letters of commendation" (κοινωνικαῖς; comp. 2 Cor. iii. 1). The former word, epistolium, we find used in the West, as by the 2nd Council of Tours, A.D. 566, which decreed "that no one of the clergy or laity, except the bishop, presume to give epistolium" (Can. 6). The other name, eirenica, is used by the Council of Antioch, A.D. 341: "No stranger is to be received without letters of peace" (Can. 7); Sim. in the West, Conc. Elib., as below.

* It is figured on p. 339, vol. i. of this work.

It appears that the issue of such letters of communion had to be watched and regulated in every part of the Church. Thus the Council of Antioch (Can. 8) allowed chorepiscopi to grant them, but forbade presbyters. From the Council of Eliberis, A.D. 305 (Can. 25), we learn that intending travellers sometimes obtained them from confessors, as the lapsid did their libelli: "To every one who has brought confessors' letters are to be given letters communicatory; the confessor's name being cancelled, forasmuch as, under the glory of this name, they everywhere astonish the simple." The same Council (Can. 31) forbade women (supposed to be the wives of bishops and presbyters) to write litteræ pacificæ for the laity, or to receive them. The Council of Arles, in 314 (Can. 9):—"Concerning these who present letters of confessors, it is decreed that such letters be taken from them, and that they receive others communicatory." The Council of Carthage, A.D. 348 (Can. 17): "Let no clerk or layman communicate in a strange congregation (in alienâ plebe) without his bishop's letters." The Council of Agathæ, in 505 (Can. 52), and that of Epone in 517 (can. 6): "Let no one grant communion to a presbyter, or deacon, or clerk, travelling without his bishop's letters."

In the Capitularies of the French kings we find these documents called litteræ peregrinorum, travellers' letters (cap. v. an. 806, tom. i. col. 456), and formatæ (1225). The last name is given to them by the Council of Milevi, A.D. 416 (Can. 20): "It is decreed that any clerk who desires to go to court, wherever it be, on his own business, shall receive a formatâ from his bishop. But if he shall choose to go without a [FORMATIA, I. 682.]

II. The same names were given to those letters which bishops, on their ordination, sent to other bishops as an offer and claim of communion, and to letters which passed between bishops at any time as a token of adherence to the same faith. Thus Cyril of Alexandria, "If John, the most religious bishop of Antioch, subscribe it (a confession of faith), . . . then give to him τὰ κοινωνικά" (Inter Acti Conc. Eph. Labbe, iii.); that is, as the ancient translation of the West renders it,—the letters communicatory" (Nov. Coll. Conc. col. 910; Baluz. Synodicon, c. 204). A more common expression was κοινωνικά γράμματα. This is used by the Council of Antioch, A.D. 289, when announcing to the popes of Alexandria and Rome the election of Domnus to the see of Antioch. It requested them to send him letters of communion, that they might receive the like from him in return (Euseb. Hist. Eccl. vii. 30). Using the same term, St. Basil challenges those who accused him of being in communion with Apollinarius to produce any letters of communion that had passed between them (Epist. 347, cont. li. p. 1122). The same expression used by Cyrus of Alexandria (Ep. ad Maximian. inter Acta Conc. Eph. c. 81) is rendered in the ancient Latin version of the Acts of the Council of Ephesus by the unusual phrase of litterae communicativae (Saluz. Nova Collect. Concil. vol. 597). In the version of his epistle to Theognostus (Synod. c. 85) we have the more common litterae communicativae (col. 793). St. Augustine, writing in 397, says: "We wrote to some of the chiefs of the Donatists, not letters of communion (communicatorias litteras), which now for a long time, owing to their perversion from the Catholic unity throughout the world, they do not receive, but such private letters as it is lawful for us to address even to pagans" (Ep. xliii. § 1). He repeats this in his work Contra Litteras Peticionii (l. 1). The same father declares the bishop of Carthage to be "united per communicatorias litteras to the Church at Rome, . . . and to other lands, whence the gospel had come to Africa" (Ep. xliii. § 7). He again and again speaks of such letters as a sign and proof of the inter-communication of churches (ibid. §§ 8, 16, 19). These letters, like those granted to travellers, came under the general head of formatae. Thus Augustine, speaking of a schismatical bishop, says, "We asked whether he could give letters communicatory, which we call formatae, where I wished" (Ep. xlv. § 5).

III. A troparion in the Greek liturgy, which is varied for "the day or the sabbat" (Goar, Lit. Chrys. p. 81; Typicon Sabae, 7). It is now sung after the response to the Sancta Sanctis, and before the hot infusion and fraction. Originally, however, it was sung, as its name implies, during the communion of the people. This is evident from the following statement in the Chronicon Paschale of Alexandria (tom. i. p. 714; ed. Niebuhr). "This year, in the month Artemisins, the Roman May, 12th Indiction, under Sergius the Patriarch of Constantinople, was first introduced the custom that after all have received the holy Mysteries, while the clerks are removing the precious fans, patens, and cups, and other sacred utensils, also after the distribution of the Eulogiae from the side-tables, and the singing of the last verse of the koinonikon, this antiphon should be sung, Let our mouth be filled with praise," &c. This was in the year 624 of our era. In the Liturgy of St. James, from which the Greek is derived, the words, "O taste and see how gracious the Lord is" (from Ps. 34), are both said by the priest and sung by the choir (Cod. Liturg. Assen. v. 57) before the communion of the former; but probably the Greek anthem rather took the place of four psalms (23, 34, 145, 117), which were said at the fraction in St. James. A shorter form would be sufficient, when the communicants became fewer. The words, "O taste," &c., were sung at Jerusalem in the 4th century, after the response to the Sancta Sanctis, and therefore also before the communion. St. Cyril, addressing the newly baptized, says (Catech. Myst. v. 17). "After this ye hear him who sings with divine melody, exhorting you and saying, 'O taste,'" &c. In St. Mark's Liturgy, the celebrant says a certain prayer, "or else, Like as the martyr," &c., i. e. Psalm 42 (Liturg. Orient. Renaud. i. 162); but there is no proper koinonikon. In the Clementine the 33rd Psalm (34th) is to be said while all the rest are communicating" (Cotelier. l. 405). The Armenian Liturgy provides proper hymns to be sung by the choir, "while they who are worthy are communicating" (Le Brun, Miss. x. art. 21). In the Coptic rite "they sing from the psalm" during the fraction, which is followed immediately by the communion of the celebrant (Renaud. i. 21). In the Greek Liturgy of St. Basil "the people say the 50th (51st) Psalm and the koinonikon for the day" between the fraction and the communion (Renaud. i. 84, 345). In that of St. Gregory, only the 105th Psalm is then said (ibid. 124). In the Syrian St. James, used both by Melchites and Jacobites, and therefore earlier than the schism, the koinonikon is represented by an invitory, sung by the deacon and subdeacons while the people are communicating (Renaud. li. 42): "The Church cries, My brethren, receive the body of the Son; drink His blood with faith, and sing His glory," &c. A similar form occurs in the vestorian Liturgy (ibid. 596; Lit. Mab. Raulin, 326). According to the Abyssinian, which comes from St. Mark, "skilled persons chant some verses, while the sacrament is ministered to the people, . . . which the people repeat singing" (Biblioth. Max. PP. xxvii. 663).

The Greek koinonikon corresponds to a hymn, which they began to sing at Carthage in St. Augustine's time, "when that which had been offered was being distributed to the people" (Retract. li. 11); and to the Antiphona ad Communionem of Rome, said to have been introduced by Gregory I. (Honorius, Genava Animae, l. 90); and to the Antiphona ad Accedentes of the Mozarabic Missal (Leslie, p. 7). In the last, we may observe, the anthem from Whitsun Eve to Lent, and on All Saints' day is, "O taste and see," &c., so familiar to the East. It cannot now be ascertained whether anything was sung during the communion in the original liturgy of Gaul (Liturgia Gallicana, Mabill. 33). [W. E. S.]

KYRIE ELEISON. [LITANY.]

L

LABARUM. In Christian antiquity the military standard bearing the sacred monogram ✠ D, adopted by the emperor Constantine as an imperial ensign subsequently to his celebrated vision and the victory over Maxentius, is described by Eusebius (Vit. Const. lib. ii. c. 28-31), and in later times the device itself, or the cross alone. The labarum has often been spoken of as if it were something altogether novel both in form and use (Gretser, de Cruce Chr. vol. i. p. 493). But the thing, and probably also the name, were already familiar in the Roman army. The labarum of Constantine was, in fact, nothing more than the ordinary cavalry-standard (vexillum), from which it differed only in the Christian character of its symbols and decorations. Like that it preserved the primitive type of a cloth fastened to the shaft of a spear, and consisted of a square piece of some textile material elevated on a gilt pole, and sus-er kolonionem. In the Clementine (34th) is to be said while all announcing" (Coteler, k. 405). Liturgy provides proper hymns to "sing," while they who are worthy "sing" (Le Brun, Miss. x. art. 21). In the "they sing from the psalm" which is followed immediately by the celebration of the Greek Alexandrian of people say the 50th (51st) Psalm for the day" between the communion (Renaud, l. 84, of St. Gregory, only the 105th old (ibid. 124). In the Syrian both by Melchites and Jacobites, earlier than the schism, the presented by an invitatory, sung and subleucous while the people sing (Renaud, ll. 42): "The brethren, receive the body of His blood with faith, and sing A similar form occurs in the (ibid. 596; Lit. Mab. According to the Abyssinian, in St. Mark, "skilled persons, while the sacrament is ministered, . . . which the people repeat H. Max. PP. xvii. 663). monicon corresponds to a hymn to sing at Carthage in St. "when that which had been g distributed to the people" to the Antiphona ad Communionis, Gemma Animae, i. 90; Antiphona ad Accedentes of the (Leslie, p. 7). In the last, we anthem from Whitson Eve to Saints' day is, "O taste and ear to the East. It cannot now either anything was sung during the original liturgy of Gaul (Mabill. 33). [W. E. S.]

ISON. [LITANY.]

L

In Christian antiquity the bearing the sacred monogram by the emperor Constantine ensign subsequently to his and the victory over Maxentius by Eusebius (Vit. Const. and in later times the device alone. The labarum was often if it were something altogether firm and use (Gretser, de Cruce). But the thing, and probably were already familiar in the the labarum of Constantine was more than the ordinary cavalry-m, from which it differed only character of its symbols and e that it preserved the primitive fastened to the shaft of a ed of a square piece of some levated on a gilt pole, and sus-

ended from a cross bar, by which it was kept expanded. The eagle of victory surmounting the shaft was replaced by the sacred monogram confined within a chaplet. The emblems brodered on the banner were also Christian. They were usually wrought in gold on a purple ground. To the eyes of the early Christians, accustomed to discern the emblem of salvation in everything around them, the cruciform framework of the Roman standard had already marked it out as an appropriate symbol of the true faith. "In your trophies," writes Tertullian (Ap. log. c. 18), "the cross is the heart of the trophy . . . those hangings of the standards and banners (contabrorum aliter labarorum) are the clothings of crosses"; and Minucius Felix (c. 29), "the very standards, and your camps, what are they but gilded crosses, imitating not only the appearance of the cross there one of the Roman ensigns the consecration of which to the honour of Christ would have so powerful an influence, especially on the army. For, as Sozomen informs us, "it was valued beyond all others, being always carried before the emperor, and worshipped by the soldiery as the most honourable symbol of the Roman power" (Soz. H. E. lib. l. c. 4). When therefore Constantine adopted it, consecrated by the symbols of his newly adopted faith, as "the saving sign of the Roman empire" (σάβηρον σημεῖον τῆς Ῥωμαίων ἀρχῆς), he took the surest method of uniting both divisions of his troops, pagans and Christians, in a common worship, and to a prerer faith, since, to quote Tertullian again (c. 3), "the camp religion of the Romans was all through a worship of the standards." Neither was the word labarum a newly-coined one. Even if the various reading, labarum for contabrum, in Tertullian and Minucius Felix is rejected, Sozomen, when describing the result of Constantine's vision, speaks of it as a word already in use—"he commanded the artists to remodel the standard called by the Romans labarum"—τὸ παρὰ Ῥωμαίων καλοῦμενον λάβαρρον (H. E. lib. i. c. 4). According to Suicer (sub voce) the word came into use in the reign of Hadrian, and was probably adopted from one of the nations conquered by the Romans. The orthography varies in different writers, as is usual with a half-naturalised foreign word. It is written λάβαρρον by Sozomen and Nicophorus (H. E. vii. 37), and λάβουρον by Chrysostom (Homil. iii. in 1 Tim.), who speaks of it as "the royal standard in way usually called labarum." Its derivation is still uncertain, "in spite," writes Gibbon, "of the efforts of the critics, who have ineffectually tortured the Latin, Greek, Spanish, Celtic, Teutonic, Illyric, Armenian, &c., in search of an etymology." We find λαβάρων, "to seize;" εὐλάβεια, "piety;" λάβουρα, "spoils;" λαίφος, a "cloak;" and even the Latin labor, with other still more h-tretched "ivations enumerated by Gothofred (Col. Theod. vol. ii. p. 142). Ducauge's derivation from a supposed Celtic root, lab hair = panniculus exercitus, is repudiated by Celtic scholars. The word is most probably of Basque origin, in which language, according to Baillet (Dictionnaire Celtique, s. v.) labarra signifies a standard. According to Larramendi (Dictionario Trilingue), the word is of Cantabrian origin, and is derived from labarra, signifying anything with four heads or limbs, such as the cruciform framework of a military standard. Contabrum, used as a synonym for labarum, indicates the country from which it was derived. The form of the labarum is very minutely described by Eusebius (Vit. Const. lib. l. c. 31): "A long spear, overlaid with gold, formed the figure of a cross by means of a transverse bar at the top. At the summit of the whole was fixed a wreath of gold and precious stones, within which the symbol of the title of salvation was indicated by means of its first two letters, the letter P being intersected by X in the centre (χρυσούμενον τῶν π κατά τὸ μεσάτωρ) . . . From the cross bar of the spear was suspended a square cloth of purple stuff, was suspended a brodered with gold and precious stones. Beneath the crown of the cross, immediately above the embrodered banner, the shaft bore golden medallions of the emperor and his children." This original standard formed the pattern of others which Constantine ordered to be made to be carried at the head of all his armies. Fifty δρακίνοισι, were selected by him as the perpetual guard of the labarum, which was to be borne by them singly by tarns. Eusebius relates a story he had heard from the emperor himself of a fierce engagement in which the soldier whose duty it was to carry it, panic struck, transferred the labarum to another and fled, paying for his cowardice with his life, while the soldier who boldly carried the sacred symbol escaped unhurt (Euseb. u. s. lib. ii. c. 8). Not content with having it represented on his standards, Constantine commanded that the monogram should also be engraver on the shields of his soldiers (ib. lib. iv. c. 21). Lactantius (de Mort. Persec. c. 44) is silent as to the shields—"transversa X litera, summo cune circumflexa (i.e. with a line drawn through the middle and letter E) into a loop at the top, forming the letter E) Christum in scutis notat." Prudentius describes the monogram as decorating both the standards (the labarum proper) and the shields of Constantine's army on his triumphal entrance into Rome after the defeat of Maxentius. "Christus purpureum gemmantibus textus in auro Signabat labarum; clypeorum insignia Christus Scripserat; ardebat summis crux addita cricis." Contr. Symmach. l. 487-489. and again: "Agnoasce Regina (Roma) illic mens signa necesse est, In quibus effigies crucis aut gemmata reficit, Aut longis solido ex auro præfertur in hisis." Id. 464-466. and speaks of its acceptance by the senate as an object of adoration: "Tunc ille senatus Militiæ utriculæ titulum, Christiano verendum Nomen adoravit quod collocabat in armis." Id. 494-496. Paulinus furnishes us with a singularly detailed description of the monogram, forming a golden cross, depending from a "corona levis,"

in the basilica of St. Felix at Nola, explaining how all the characters of XPICTOC are contained in it:

"Nam nota, qua his quinque notat numerante Latino Cedulus, hæc Græcicè chi significatur, et medium rho Cypus apex et sigma tenet quod rursus ad ipsam
Curvatus virgam facit, a velut orbe petacto.
Nam rigor obliquus facit, a quasi in Heliale loto est;
Tau idem stylus ipse brevis retro acuminis ductus Efficit," &c.—Poem, six. (Circa, xi. in St. Felicein).

The notes of Muratori on this curious, and not very easily intelligible, passage, should by all means be consulted.

Once adopted by Constantine as the imperial ensign, it was continued by his successors. Ambrose, begging the emperor Theodosius to take forcible possession of a Jewish synagogue, exhorts him to order his troops to carry in "his victorious ensign," i. e. the labarum consecrated with the name of Christ (Epist. lib. vi. Ep. 29); and in another passage utters the following prayer for the success of Gratian's arms against the Goths: "Turn, O Lord, and raise the standard of Thy faith. Here it is not the eagles, nor the flight of birds that lead the army, but Thy Name, O Lord Jesus, and Thy worship" (Ambros. de Fide, lib. ii. ad fin.). The sacred symbols were naturally removed from the standards by Julian (Solz. H. E. lib. v. c. 17; Greg. Naz. cent. Julian I. tom. i. p. 75), but were restored by Jovian and his Christian successors, and continued to be borne by the later Byzantine emperors.

No. 1. Coin of Constantine II.

Examples of the labarum, both as a standard and as borne on the shield, in different forms, are abundantly furnished by the series of imperial medals given by Ducange in his Familie Augustae Byzantinae, which usually forms part of the same volume with the Constantinopolis Christiana, from which the subsequent illustrations are chiefly drawn.

No. 2. Coin of Constantine II and Constans.

Fig. 1 is from a tiny coin of Constantine II., "a third brass of the smallest size." The engravings are much larger than the coins they represent. This "most important of the numismatic memorials of the triumph of Christianity," "of a rarity commensurate with its interest," (C. W. King, Early Christian Numismatics, p. 25), represents the labarum as described by Eusebius. The spiked end of the shaft of the banner transfixes a serpent (cf. Euseb. vit. Const. lib. 3). On the banner are embazoned three roundels (interpreted by Mr. King's engraver, but without sufficient warrant, as DEO), above is the sacred monogram; on the exergue CONS. The obverse bears "the boyish, not to be mistaken, features of Constantine II." (Ibid.) Examples of Constantine I. with the same reverse type are in existence [NUMISMATICS].

Fig. 2, of Constantine II. (tab. v. p. 21), represents him in military dress, standing on a galley, steered by Victory. He bears a phoenix on a globe in his right hand, and in his left the labarum in the form of a banner, with the sacred monogram; the motto is Fel[icium] Temp[or]um Reparatio. This was a favourite device with Constantine II. and Constans (King, u. s. p. 68). Fig. 3, a coin of Constans (tab. xi. p. 33),

No. 3. Coin of Constans. From Ducange.

shows the emperor holding a labarum of the same form in his right hand, with the motto Triumphator Gentium barbararum. This design is frequently repeated, e.g. tab. xii, xiii, pp. 35, 37; tab. ii. p. 56. The emperor is sometimes represented holding the labarum in one hand and seizing a captive in the other, e.g. a coin of Gratian (fig. 4, tab. ii. p. 56); at other times trampling a captive under foot (tab. xiii. p. 37). A not unfrequent design represents the labarum planted in the ground with fettered captives seated beside it, e.g. tab. vi. p. 23; vii. p. 25; viii. p. 27, &c. Sometimes we find the sacred monogram on a shield, as in fig. 5, a coin of Aelia Flaccilla, wife of Theodosius (pl. i. p. 61), where the shield is borne by a seated Victory. As examples of the monogram alone, we give a coin of

No. 4. Coin of Gratian. From Ducange.

• Or perhaps Fel[icium] Temp[or]um Reparatio.

LABARUM

"most important of the numismatic triumph of Christianity," mnesurate with its interest," Early Christian Numismatics, as the labarum as described by spiked end of the shaft of the aserpent (cf. Enseb. Vit. Const.

banner are emblazoned three reted by Mr. King's engraver, ent warrant, as DEO), above is gram) on the exergue CONS. rs "the boyish, not to be mis- of Constantine II." (Ibid.) onstantine I, with the same in existence [NUMISMATICS]. antantino II. (tab. v. p. 21), a military dress, standing on a y Victory. He bears a phoenix right hand, and in his left the orin of a banner, with the sacred motto is Fel(iciam) Temp(or)is was a favourite device with and Constans (King, u. s., p. coin of Constans (tab. xi. p. 35), of Constans. From Durange.

or holding a labarum of the s right hand, with the motto feliciam barbararum. This design is depicted, e.g. tab. xii, xiii, pp. 56. The emperor is sometimes holding the labarum in one hand, as a captive in the other, e.g. a (fig. 4, tab. ii. p. 56); or holding a captive under foot (A). A not unfrequent design of the labarum planted in the ground with vines seated beside it, e.g. tab. xxi, p. 25; xviii, p. 27, &c. A sacred monogram on a shield, coin of Aelia Flaccilla, wife of Gratian. From Durange.

. i. p. 61), where the shield is decorated with the Victory. As exemplified alone, we give a coin of fel(iciam) Temp(or)is Reparatio.

LABARUM

Decentius, fig. 6 (pl. xiii. p. 37), and one of Justinian, fig. 7 (pl. ii. p. 90), as well as a remarkable gem (fig. 8), figured by Lipsius de

No. 5. Coin of Aelia Flaccilla. From Durange.

Cruce (p. 74), bearing on the obverse Victory bearing a palm and a chaplet, with the legend V. I. A. V. G. In several of these we notice the

No. 6. Coin of Decentius. From Durange.

Greek characters Λ , Ω , on either side of the monogram. The meaning of this addition is elaborately explained by Paulinus, l. c. A very beautiful representation of the labarum is found on a lamp engraved by Mamachi. It is in the usual form of a standard supported on a spear,

No. 7. Coin of Justinian.

No. 8. From a Gem.

with the sacred monogram encircled with a wreath above, and ΕΝΤΕΛΕΙΩΝΙΚΑ (sic) embroidered on the banner itself. A soldier fully armed stands on either side guarding the standard. [LAMP.]

(Augusti, Hdbch. der Christ Arch. vol. iii. pp.

LACUNARY WORK

571 ff.; Ducange, Glossar. sub voc.; Enseb. Vit. Const. lib. i. c. 31; lib. ii. c. 81 [lib. iv. c. 21]; Gothofred in Theod. Cot. vol. ii. pp. 143 ff.; Greiser de Cruce, lib. ii.; King, Early Christian Numismatics; Lipsius de Cruce, c. 13, 16; Meursius, Glossar.; Milman, Hist. of Christi inty. vol. ii. p. 287; Munter, Symboldr. pl. iii. Nos. 70, 71; Suicer, Theaurus, sub voc.; Vossius, L'hyndol. sub voc. [E. V.]

LAHIS. [SPOON.]

LABORANTES. [COPIATAE; FOSSARII.]

LABRA (Ἀδῶρα), a form of the Egyptian word Adra, a lane or narrow street (Epiphani. Haeres. 69), has been misunderstood (Acheri, Hierol. s. v. Labra) as equivalent to "parish" or "district." See LATRA. [C.]

LACERNA. [BIRRU; PAENULA.]

LACRYMATORY. A name given by some modern antiquaries to certain small vessels not unfrequently found in tombs, once supposed to be intended to contain tears. They are in fact Vasa unguentaria, vessels intended to contain perfumes, like the ἄδδραρον of the Gospels. (Matt. xxvi. 7, etc.) See Lovon Antiquities found at Rouphim, described by the late Prof. Henslow; edited by Prof. Churchill Babington; Beccles [1872]. Prof. Babington refers to Millin, Dict. des Beau-Arts, s. v. Lacrymatoire. [C.]

LACTANTIUS, Bole; LETATIUS, Usuard, one of the Scyllitan martyrs, July 17, appears as Lactatus, July 18 (Mart. Hieron. D'Ach.). [E. B. B.]

LACTICINIA, dishes prepared from milk and eggs (ἀδγάλα), the use of which was permitted, according to some authorities, in Lent and other times of fasting [FASTING; LENT]. [C.]

LACTINUS, Lactennus, Lactocus or Molactocus, founder of the abbey of Freshford (Aghadhur) and abbat of Cluier (died 622), commemorated March 19. There was a spring sacred to him in Cassel and a convent (Lis-lechtin) in Ardier diocese (v. Acta SS. Mart. iii. 32). [E. B. B.]

LACTIS DEGUSTATIO. [BAPTISM, § 66, I. 164; HONEY AND MILK, I. 783.]

LACTISSIMA, lc. LAETISSIMA, martyr, April 27 (Mart. Hieron. D'Achery. Spic. iv.). [E. B. B.]

LACULATA, sc. vestis, a kind of dress, in which were square spaces (lacus), containing pictures, added in various ways: "Laculata est quae lacus quadrates quosdam cum pictura habet intextos, aut additos acu." (Isid. Etym. xix. 22.) For this sense of lacus, cf. Columella (l. 6), where the word is used for square spaces, with which granaries are divided for the storing of different kinds of grain separately. (See Ducange, Glossary, s. v.) [R. S.]

LACUNARY WORK. (Lambris, Fr.) The lacunari or laquearii were hollow spaces or panels originally formed by the planks arranged at regular intervals, to compose the ceiling of a room. During the Romano-Byzantine period

these were gilded and inlaid with ivory (Hornae, Od. ii. 18); sometimes they were adorned with paintings (Suet. Vit. Ner. 31). The vaulted or wagon-roofed variety was called CAMARA or CAMERA. [DICT. OF GR. AND ROM. ANTIQ. s. v.] The panelling was applied also to the soffit or under surface of an arch; but this practice is apparently not earlier than the Renaissance, and was an innovation on the original custom, since earlier arches had no soffits properly so-called. The ancient basilicas had the ground of these recesses enriched with Caissons square, trefoil, hexagonal, in much variety; often again with roses, masques of animals, and such like; but these in later examples. The lacunary work was employed both in public and private buildings; "Laquearia, quae aunc et in privatis domibus auro teguntur," says Pliny (Nat. Hist. xxxiii. 18), and especially in Italy the ceilings of all the rooms of a house would be of this kind; some being more richly ornamented than others. It is to be distinguished from mosaic work (musivum opus); see MOSAIC.

When in the third and fourth centuries A.D. the Christians began to erect large and costly churches, the ceilings were often ornamented with this work. Eusebius (Vit. Const. lib. iii. capp. 31-40) tells us that the church which Constantine built at Jerusalem had a vaulted roof (καυδοσαν λακωνιστων), of which the whole was divided into panels, carved and gilded.

Paulinus, bishop of Nola in Campania (A.D. 409-431), has described in one of his letters (Ep. 12, ad Severin.) a new church there, upon which the highest decorative art of the period appears to have been exercised. Of this roof of the nave and galleries were panelled (lacunato). The term is frequently used by St. Jerome (A.D. 340-420), who did not altogether sympathise with the prevailing habit of lavishing ornament on churches. He says (Ep. 2 ad Neptilian.), "Marmora nitent auro, splendent laquearia, gemmis altare distinguitur," &c.

Patien, bishop of Lyons, is recorded to have built a cathedral church in that city, of which we have a contemporary description from the pen of Sidenius Apollinaris (A.D. 431-482). He says:

"In tus lux micat, atque bracteatum
Solsic sollicitatur ad lacunar
Fulvo at concolor erect in metallo."

That is, the golden sunshine played over the golden plates of the panels in the church.

But yet the lacunary hardly appears to have been the prevailing style of ornamentation in these early centuries, at all events for churches. It was revived and much extended under the Renaissance.

LADICUS. [LADICEUS.] [E. B. B.]

LAELIUS, Spanish martyr, June 27 (Mart. Hieron. D'Ach.) [E. B. B.]

LAETANIA. [LITANY.]

LAETANTIUS [P. LACIANTIUS].

LAETUS. (1) Bishop of Leptis in Africa, martyred by Hunneric, Sept. 6. Ado. (C. Baronius and Acta SS. Sept. ii. 677).

(2) Presbyter at Orleans, † Nov. 5 (Usuard.) [E. B. B.]

LAIIDGEN, Jan. 11, Colgan, Acta SS. Hib. p. 57 = Laidgend, Jan. 12, in the Felire of Aengus the Culdee. He was of Clonfert, A.D. 660 (Mart. Donegal). (2) May 20. (3) Oct. 23. (4) of Achadh-raithen, Nov. 28 (Ibid.) [E. B. B.]

LAIITY. I. In the Old Testament, when the Israelites in general are distinguished from the priests, they are spoken of as "the people." In the Greek of the Septuagint this is δ λαός. See examples in Lev. iv. 3; Deut. xviii. 3; Ezra vii. 14; Is. xxiv. 2; Jer. i. 18, v. 31; Hosea iv. 9. Hence the use of λαϊκός to denote one not of the priesthood. Thus Clemens Alex. says that the hounding at the door of the tabernacle (Exod. xvi. 36) was a "protection against lay unbelief" (Strom. v. 5, 33). The author of the Questions and Answers to the Orthodox, ascribed to Justin Martyr, observes that while the law "destroys by fire a priest's daughter guilty of fornication, it slays by stoning the daughter of the layman" (τοῦ λαϊκοῦ ἀνδρός) (Resp. ad Qu. 97). Philo calls the layman of his nation ἰδιώτης, a private person. Thus he says that at the passover "the ἰδιώται do not bring the victims to the altar, but the priests sacrifice; but the whole nation, by the ordinance of the law, assumes the priestly office" for the occasion (de Vit. Mos. iii.). Less restrained by revelation, the first Christians, being educated as Jews, would naturally draw a somewhat similar line between their own office-bearers and the mass of believers. How far they were encouraged to do so by their inspired teachers may be gathered to a great extent from Scripture itself. Not to dwell on the relation of the whole body to the Apostles, whose commission was in some respects extraordinary, we find each local church or congregation subject to other rulers (ἡγουμένους, Heb. xiii. 17), who were "over them in the Lord" (1 Thess. v. 12; comp. 1 Tim. iii. 5, v. 17), under the name of overseers (ἐπίσκοποι), bishops) and elders (πρεσβύτεροι, whence priest), to whose teaching, exhortation, and rebuke, and to whose judgment in some things, they were required to submit (1 Tim. iv. 6, 11, vi. 17; 2 Tim. ii. 2, iv. 2; Tit. i. 9, 13, ii. 15, iii. 10). To their care and oversight the "laity" were committed, as a flock to the shepherd (Acts xx. 28; 1 Pet. v. 1, 2). The distinction was observed everywhere; elders being ordained in every church (Acts xiv. 23; Tit. i. 5; comp. Acts xi. 30), and provision was made for the perpetuity of the system (2 Tim. ii. 2). Sometimes the laity were distinguished as "the church" or "the brethren." E.g. "when Paul and Barnabas were come to Jerusalem, they were received of the church, and of the apostles and elders" (Acts xv. 4); and when "the apostles and elders, with the whole church" send a letter to "the brethren which were of the Gentiles in Antioch and Syria and Cilicia," it begins thus, "The apostles and elders and brethren send greeting unto the brethren" (δ. 22, 23). This epistle was accordingly delivered, not to the rulers of the church at Antioch, but to "the multitude" (30). Compare Acts xii. 17: "Show these things unto James (the ruler) and to the brethren;" and 1 Tim. iv. 6: "If thou put the brethren in remembrance of these things, thou shalt be a good minister of Jesus Christ." The distinction visible in these passages is preserved in the earliest extra-Scriptural records

1. 11, Colgan, Acta SS. Ill. p. 12, in the Felice of Aengus of Clonfert, A.D. 660 (Mart. y. 20. (3) Oct. 23. (4) of Nov. 28 (ibid.). [E. B.-B.]

the Old Testament, when the laity are distinguished from the clergy as "the people." In the Septuagint this is δ λαός. See Exod. xix. 10; Deut. xviii. 3; Exra vii. 16; 18, v. 31; Hosea iv. 9. Hence to denote one not of the priests—the tabernacle (Exod. xvi. 36) "against lay unbelief" (Strom. author of the Questions and Answers, ascribed to Justin Chrysolostomus) while the law "destroys the daughter guilty of fornication," the daughter of the layman (ὁ δὲ λαός) (Resp. ad Qu. 97). Philo of his nation Ἰουδαῖος, a private says that at the passover "the king the victims to the altar, sacrifice; but the whole nation, of the law, assumes the priestly position (de Vit. Mos. iii.). Un-revelation, the first Christians, Jews, would naturally draw a line between their own officiousness of believers. How far they went to do so by their inspired gathered to a great extent from the Apostles, whose common respects extraordinary, whose church or congregation subject ἰσχυροῦς, Heb. xiii. 17), who in the Lord" (1 Thess. v. 12; 5, v. 17), under the name of ἐπίσκοποι, bishops) and elders (πρεσβύτεροι, presbyters), to whose teaching, rebuke, and to whose judgment they were required to submit (1 Tim. ii. 2, iv. 2; 5, iii. 10). To their care and discipline were committed, as a shepherd (Acts xx. 28; 1 Pet. v. 1, 2) was observed everywhere; elders in every church (Acts xiv. 23; Acts xi. 30), and provision was made of the system (2 Tim. ii. 2) the laity were distinguished from "the brethren." Eg. Barnabas were come to Jerusalem received of the church, and of elders" (Acts xv. 4); and when elders, with the whole church "the brethren which were of Antioch and Syria and Cilicia." "The apostles and elders and meeting unto the brethren" (ὁ λαός) was accordingly delivered, of the church at Antioch, but de (30). Compare Acts xiii. 17; and 1 Tim. iv. 6: "If thou in remembrance of these things, good minister of Jesus Christ," desirable in these passages is earliest extra-Scriptural record of the church. Thus Clement, himself bishop of Rome, in an epistle by which he sought to allay dissensions at Corinth, addressing "the brethren" there, says, "Ye did all things without respect of persons, and walked by the laws of God, being subject to those who had the rule over you, and yielding due honour to the presbyters among you" (Ep. i. c. 1). He illustrates the relative position of the laity and clergy by the parallel of the Jewish priesthood and people: "To the high-priest his proper ministries have been assigned, and to the priests their proper place appointed, and on the Levites their service: have been imposed. The layman (δ λαϊκός) is bound by the precepts that affect laymen. "Let each of you, brethren, give thanks unto God in his own station (ἀγῶνας), keeping a good conscience, and not overstepping the appointed rule of his ministry" (cc. 40, 41). This state of things was to continue; for the apostles, he tells us, not only appointed the first rulers in each church, but also "gave direction how, at their decease, other approved men should succeed to their ministry" (c. 44). In the Visions of Hermas, which many critics assign to the age of Clement, the laity, under the name of "the elect," are spoken of as being taught and ministered to by the apostles and bishops and doctors (i.e. presbyters; see Pearson, Vind. Ignat. ii. 13, 3) and ministers" (i.e. deacons) (Past. i. Vis. iii. 5). The following sentence from Ignatius is common to all the recensions: "My soul be surety for them who are subject to the bishops, presbyters, deacons" (Ep. ad Polycarp. c. vi.; Cureton, Corp. Ignat. p. 12). In the epistles known to Eusebius, A.D. 324 (Hi. Eccl. iii. 30) such expressions are frequent. In Tertullian, A.D. 192, the word "laicus" occurs often, E.g. "The chief-priest, which is the bishop, has the right of giving (baptism). Then presbyters and deacons, not, however, without the authority of the bishop, for the honour of the church, which being saved, peace is saved. From another point of view even laymen have the right" (de Baptismo, xvii.). The same writer says of certain heretics that among them, "one man is to-day a bishop, to-morrow will be a reader; to-day one is a presbyter, who to-morrow will be a layman; for they enjoy priestly (sacerdotalia) duties on laymen" (de Præscr. Hæret. c. 41). In the so-called apostolical canons, the first fifty of which, at least, are supposed to have been collected about the end of the 2nd century, the word layman is of very frequent occurrence. Thus, "If any clerk or layman who is segregated, and not received, goes to another city, and is there received (to communion) without letters commendatory, let both receiver and received be segregated" (can. 12). By can. 31, a presbyter who, in contempt of his bishop, gathers a separate congregation, and all the clerks who adhere to him are to be deposed, "but the laymen to be segregated." See also canons 15, 24, 43, 48, 57, 62-66, 69, 70, 71, 84, 85. Cyprian, A.D. 250, speaks of a "conference held with bishops, presbyters, deacons, confessors, and also with the laymen who stood firm" (in a persecution) (Epist. 34, ad Rom.). Elsewhere he says, "The faith of the militant people (of God) is disarmed, while its vigour and the fear of Christ is taken away. Let the laity see how they provide for this. On the priest falls greater labour in asserting and defending the majesty of God" (Ep. 59, ad Cornel.). The more frequent name for the laity with this writer is plebs, e.g. "The clergy and people (plebs) and the whole brotherhood received with joy" certain schismatics who had returned to the church (Ep. 51, ad Corn.). He warned some unruly persons that "when a bishop was once made and approved by the testimony and judgment of his colleagues and the people (plebs), no other could in anywise be appointed" (Ep. 44, ad Corn.).

11. Laymen duly qualified might give religious instruction among the Jews. In the synagogues it was usual for the elder to ask anyone of repute to comment on the lesson for the day (Luke iv. 17; Acts xvii. 2), or to deliver a "word of exhortation" (Acts xiii. 15). This liberty was continued under the Gospel in the case of those who had the gift of "prophecy" (Rom. xii. 6; 1 Cor. xii. 10, 28, xiv. 1-6, 31, &c.). Among unbelievers all Christians were expected to teach the gospel as opportunity was given. "They that were scattered abroad" by the persecution on the death of Stephen "went everywhere preaching the word" (Acts viii. 4). The majority of these would be laymen. Thus St. Paul, before he received the laying on of hands (Acts xiii. 3), "preached boldly at Damascus in the name of Jesus" (Acts ix. 27); Aquila and Priscilla "expounded unto Apollus the way of God more perfectly" (ib. xviii. 26); and Apollus himself "mightily convinced the Jews, and that publicly, shewing by the Scriptures that Jesus is the Christ" (23). "At first all taught and baptized on whatever days and seasons occasion required. . . . That the people might grow and multiply, it was at the beginning permitted to all to preach the gospel, and to baptize, and to explain the Scriptures in church, but when the church embraced all places, houses of assembly were constituted, and rulers (rectores) and the other offices in the church were instituted. . . . Hence it is that now neither do deacons preach in the congregation, nor clerks nor laymen baptize" (Hilar. Diac. Comm. in Ep. ad Eph. iv. 11, 12). When Demetrius of Alexandria complained that Origen, who was not a priest, had been asked by the bishops of the district to "discourse and to interpret holy Scripture publicly in church" at Caesarea, the bishops of Jerusalem and Caesarea denied the truth of one ground taken by Demetrius, viz. that laymen had never been known to preach before bishops. "If," said they, "any persons are anywhere found capable of benefiting the brethren, they are encouraged by the holy bishops to preach to the people. Thus at Larnudi, Eulapius was asked by Neon; and at Iconium, Paulinus by Celsus; and at Smyrna, Theodorus by Atticus;—our brethren now in bliss. And it is probable that this has been done in other places without our knowing it" (Euseb. Hist. Eccl. vi. 19). Frumentius and Aedesius, while laymen, laid the foundation of the church in Abyssinia (Soer. Hist. Eccl. l. 19). The same service was rendered to Iberia (Georgia) by a female captive, who having healed by her prayers the king and his wife and son, exhorted them to believe in Christ, through whose name their cure had been effected (ib. c. 20).

A law of Valentinian and Theodosius, published in 394, "touching laymen who presume to dispute about religion," forbids the opportunity being permitted to any one of "coming into public and discussing or handling matters of religion" (Cod. Theodos. 2 in Capit. Car. Mag. vii. 195). Four years later a council held at Carthage decreed that "a layman should not dare to teach in the presence of clerics, unless they themselves ask him;" and absolutely, that "no woman, however learned or holy, should presume to teach men in a meeting" (cann. 98, 99). Leo I., A.D. 453, writing to Maximus the patriarch of Antioch, in view of danger from the growth of the Nestorian and Eutychian heresies, entreats him to take order "that beside those who are priests of the Lord, no one presume to claim for himself the right to teach or to preach, whether he be monk or layman" (Epist. 92, c. 6). He repeats this in a letter to Theodoret of Cyrus (Ep. 93, c. 6), and expresses a hope that his letter to Maximus would be dispersed by him and "come to the knowledge of all." The council in Trullo at Constantinople, A.D. 691, declares "that a layman ought not to dispute or teach publicly, thence arrogating to himself the right to teach, but that he should be obedient to the order handed down from the Lord." Those who should violate the canon were to be segregated for forty days (cann. 64). There is, we think, no evidence that laymen were at any time permitted to read the eucharistic lessons, either in the East or West. A law of Charlemagne entirely forbids it: "A layman ought not to recite a lesson in church, nor to say the alleluia, but only the psalm or responsories without alleluia" (Capit. v. 112). [LITURGY.]

III. Hilary, the deacon, as above quoted, appears to say that laymen could not confer baptism even in the first post-apostolic age. This was probably the general opinion; for the Greek compiler of the Clementine Constitutions ascribes the following prohibition to the apostles themselves: "We do not permit laymen to perform any of the sacerdotal functions, as sacrifice or baptism, or laying on of hands, or the lesser or greater benediction" (iii. 10). This would make them absolutely incapable; and the opinion of their incapacity was probably widely spread in the East to the end of the first four centuries after Christ. St. Basil, A.D. 370, implies that he held it, when he speaks with approbation of an argument against baptism by schismatical priests, which he attributes to Firmilian, one of his predecessors at Caesarea, and to St. Cyprian. It was to the effect that schismatical priests being cut off from the body of Christ, and thus losing their orders, having now "become laymen, have no power either to baptize or to ordain, being no longer able to impart to others the gift of the Holy Ghost, from which they have fallen themselves. On which account they commanded that those who came to the church from them (i.e. from any schismatical body) should be cleansed by the true baptism of the church" (Epist. ad Amphil. i. can. 1). An ancient Greek scholium, found in one MS. of this epistle (Cod. Amberg. b. c.), enlarging on this point, says, "He falls from the sacerdotal grace, which he received from Him to whom he was united, and becomes for the future a layman," not able to impart to others that which he no longer has, nor able to obtain a new supply of it from the body which he has joined (Bever. Pand. ii. annot. 221). We must observe, however, that St. Basil, though with evident reluctance, admitted the baptisms of priests in schism, feeling himself overruled by numbers: "But since it has seemed good to some of those in Asia, out of consideration for the multitude, that their baptism should be received, let it be received" (Ep. u. s.). May we not suppose that he would also have confessed, if the question had come before him, that the church had power to authorise or accept, under special circumstances, the baptisms of laymen in full communion with her?

Tertullian, on the other hand, whom St. Cyprian used to call his master, teaches that, abstractedly, laymen have power to baptize, but that they can only exercise it by permission, expressed or understood. He argues that "what is received equally (by all) can be imparted equally" (by all); but he adds, "How much more is the discipline of reverence and modesty incumbent on the laity, seeing that it is the part of those greater than themselves (i.e. the priests and deacons) not to take on them the office of the episcopate, which is assigned to the bishops. Emulation is the mother of schisms" (de Bapt. 17). The principle laid down by Tertullian receives a curious illustration from the well-known story told by Rufinus, A.D. 390 (Hist. Eccl. i. 14), of some boys baptized in play by Athanasius when himself "quite a child" (Socr. A.D. 439, Hist. Eccl. i. 15). The bishop of Alexandria, who happened to see what was done from a distance, finding on inquiry that water had been duly used and the right form of words said, decided, after conference with his clergy, that the children should not be rebaptized, but he supplemented their irregular baptism by confirming them himself. There is a difficulty in the story from the great youth which it assigns to Athanasius about the year 312; but it would not have been related by Rufinus, or repeated at length by Sozomen, A.D. 460 (Hist. Eccl. ii. 17), without some protest, if the ground on which the bishop was said to have acted had not been widely accepted in the church at that time.

From the council of Elvira, about A.D. 300, we first learn under what circumstances it was held lawful for a layman to baptize. Its 38th canon decrees that "during foreign travel, at sea, or if there be no church near, one of the faithful, who has his own baptism entire (not clinic, duly confirmed, and probably also not impaired by lapse in persecution), and is not a bigamist, may baptize a catechumen in extremity of sickness, on condition that if he recover, he take him to the bishop that he may receive the benefit of the laying on of hands." St. Jerome, writing in 378, says that "without chrism and the command of the bishop, neither presbyter nor deacon have the right to baptize; which nevertheless we know to be often permitted to laymen, if necessity compel. For as one receives, so can he also give" (Contra Lucifer. 9). The reader will observe here the reasoning of Tertullian very similarly expressed. St. Augustine, about 400: "If any layman, compelled by necessity, shall have given to a dying man that which, when he received it himself, he learnt the manner of le to impart to others that has, nor able to obtain a new body which he has joined (not. 221). We must observe, Basil, though with evident and the baptisms of priests in itself overruled by numbers; seemed good to some of those consideration for the multitude, should be received, let it be confessed, if the question had that the church had power to, under special circumstances, men in full communion with the other hand, whom St. Cyprian his master, teaches that, men have power to baptize, only exercise it by permission, understood. He argues that "what (by all) can be imparted"; but he adds, "How much line of reverence and modesty laity, seeing that it is the part man themselves (i.e. the priests to take on them the office of which is assigned to the bishops, another of schisms" (de Bapt. can. 1). The example laid down by Tertullian's illustration from the well-known boys baptized in play by himself "quite a child" (Socr. Hist. Eccl. i. 15). The bishop of Alexandria to see what was done from inquiry that water had the right form of words said, reference with his clergy, that he should not be rebaptized, but he irregular baptism by himself. There is a difficulty in a great youth which it assigns about the year 312; but it would be repeated by Rufinus, or repeated at the ground on which he had acted had not been in the church at that time. The council of Elvira, about A.D. 300, under what circumstances it was a layman to baptize. Its 38th canon "during foreign travel, at the no church near, one of the his own baptism entire (not affirmed, and probably also not in persecution), and is not a baptize a catechumen in extremity addition that if he recover, he take up that he may receive the benefit of hands." St. Jerome, writing in without christ and the command either presbyter nor deacon have baptize; which nevertheless we permitted to laymen, if necessary, as one receives, so can he also (Lact. 9). The reader will be reasoning of Tertullian very St. Augustine, about 400; and, compelled by necessity, shall dying man that which, when he himself, he learnt the manner of giving, I know not if any one could piously say that it ought to be repeated. For to do it without necessity is to usurp the office of another; but to do it under pressure of necessity is either no fault or a venial" (Contra Epist. Parmen. ii. xvii. 29). In a work written shortly after this he shows a disposition to go further, and to recognise the outward act under whatever circumstances performed. He is speaking of several questions that might be raised,—"whether that baptism is to be owned which is received from one who has not himself received it;" whether it is valid, whatever the faith, or motive, or position (as a catholic or schismatic) of the giver or receiver, or of both, &c. He even includes the case of baptism conferred on the stage where the actors are heathens, and here he clearly leans to the affirmative, if the person baptized has had a sudden access of faith at the time; but when God has not thus interposed (neque ille qui ibi acceperet, ita crederet, sed totum ludere et mimicæ et joculariter ageretur), he thinks that only an express revelation could decide. He would in all such questions defer to a "plenary council"; but as an answer to the last must be sought by united and most earnest prayer (de Bapt. c. Donat. vii. 53). He says also that at all events he would at such a council "not hesitate to maintain that they have baptism who have received it consecrated by the words of the gospel anywhere and from any one whomsoever without deceit on their own part and with some faith" (ib. § 102). In Gratian (P. iii. de Consecr. iv. 21) we have an extract from a letter ascribed to Augustine:—"We are wont to hear that even laymen are accustomed to give the sacrament which they have received in a case of necessity, when neither bishops, presbyters, nor any of the ministers are found, and the danger of him who seeks it, lest he die without that sacrament, is pressing." In another passage from the same epistle we find a story (which the writer confesses to be uncertain) of a catechumen and a penitent in danger of being shipwrecked together. As they were the only Christians in the ship the penitent baptized the catechumen and was in turn reconciled by him. What they did was approved by all (ib. c. 30). The question raised by St. Augustine, as to the effect of a mock baptism on the stage, probably suggested a tale of wonder which we find, with differences of detail, both in the East and West. An actor who personated a catechumen receiving baptism was said to have been suddenly and miraculously converted. One version lays the scene at Rome in the presence of Diocletian, about 285, and gives the name of Gnesiolus to the comedian. The other calls him Gelasius, and makes the place Heliopolis in Phœnicia, and the year 297. In both cases the neophyte is said to have been led forth to martyrdom (Tillemont, Mém. Eccl. in St. Genés). The authorities are, for Gelasius, the Paschal Chronicle of Alexandria, compiled in 630 (p. 642); and for Genesius, some Acta of uncertain date which were copied by Ado in his Martyrologium (A.D. 858) at Aug. 25. Gelasius, bishop of Rome, A.D. 494, speaking of deacons:—"Let them not presume to baptize without (the authority of) the bishops or presbyters, unless extreme necessity compel them,—those officers being purchase settled a long way off,—to do which is for the most part permitted even to lay Christians" (Epist. ad Episc. Lu an. jo. § 7). Isidore of Seville, A.D. 610, cites our Lord's words to the apostles (John xx. 22, 23; Matt. xxviii. 19) to shew that it is "not lawful for laymen (privatis = ιδιωταις) nor for clerks out of the higher orders (sine gradu; see 1stly, 1 Tim. iii. 13), to baptize, but for priests only" (sacerdotibus = bishops and presbyters). Therefore, he concludes, it is not lawful even for deacons to do so "without (the authority of) the bishops and presbyters, except when they are far absent and the last necessity of illness compel,—which is for the most part permitted even to the lay faithful, lest any one should be called out of this world without the saving remedy" (de Eccl. Of. ii. 24).

CHRIST. ANT.—VOL. II.

IV. There is evidence to shew that during the earlier part of our period the laity came up to the holy table to make their offerings and to communicate. Dionysius, the pope of Alexandria, A.D. 254, speaks of a layman as "going up to the table," and "standing at the table" (Euseb. Hist. Eccl. vii. 9). Even women (nisi in abscessu) were, according to him, then permitted to "approach the holy of holies" and to "draw near to the holy table" (Ep. ad Basilid. can. 2). St. Chrysostom:—"Let no Judas, no Simon, come up to the table" (Hom. 50, in St. Matt. § 3). By the 19th canon of the council of Laodicea, about 365, it was "permitted to those only who were in holy orders to enter the place of the altar and to communicate there." This probably only sanctions a custom already becoming general. Theodosius the Great, at Milan in 390, took his offering up to the altar, but was not allowed to remain in the chancel for the communion (Theodorct, Hist. Eccl. v. 18). In the East, however, he had been accustomed to stay and to communicate within the homon (ib. comp. Sozom. Hist. Eccl. vii. 43). His grandson Theodosius says of himself in 431, "We draw near the most holy altar only to offer the gifts, and having gone into the enclosed tabernacle of the sacred circles, at once leave it" (Concil. Labbe, iii. 1237). For the East the rule was finally settled by the council in Trullo, A.D. 691. It forbade any of the laity to "enter within the sacred altar-place," except the emperor, "when he wished to offer gifts to the Creator" (can. 69). Turning to the West we find the Council of Tours, A.D. 566, permitting "the holy of holies to be open to laymen and women for prayer and communion, as the custom is," but forbidding laymen to "stand by the altar, at which the sacred mysteries are celebrated, either on vigils or at masses" (can. 4). This prohibition was confirmed by a council held at some uncertain place in France, about the year 744; but the permission is not also repeated (can. 6; Cypri. Reg. Franc. i. 153). The whole of the canon of Tours, however, appears in the Capitularies of Charlemagne (vii. 279). In the earliest editions of the Ordo Romanus, the bishop is represented as "going down" to receive the gifts of the people, and being "conducted back to the altar" after receiving them (Man. Hist. ii. 13, 74). This exhibits the custom at Rome in the 8th century. At that time the men and women were on different sides of the church, and the clergy went to their several places to communicate them (ib. 10, 50). In an epistle of Theodosius and Valentinian (Codex Theodos. ix. 45) the navē (ὁ ναός) of the church is called ἐκκλησίαν τοῦ λαοῦ, "the praying-place of the laity." In a law of Justinian, A.D. 528 (Codex l. iii. xlii. 10), the clergy are exhorted to a punctual observance of their hours of prayer by an appeal to the example of "many of the laity, who for the good of their souls constantly frequent the most holy churches, and shew themselves diligent in the practice of psalmody." From this we may infer, as probable, that at that time laymen often met together in church to sing psalms out of the hours of public worship, and when the clergy were not present.

LAMB, THE HOLY. In the Orthodox Greek Church the oblation of bread for the Liturgy (ἡ προσφορά, oblata) is prepared of leavened bread, baked with special care, in the form of a moderate-sized, round, flat loaf or cake. In the centre is a square projecting portion, impressed with a stamp called the seal (σφραγίς), consisting of a cross, in the angles of which are stamped the words $\Gamma \bar{\Gamma} \text{ NI KA}$, i. e. Ἰησοῦς Χριστὸς νικᾷ. This square projection is called the Holy Lamb, or in the rubrics the Holy Bread (ὁ ἅγιος ἄρτος). The circular (στρογγυλοειδής) shape, as of a coin, is considered by Durandus (iv. c. 41) to symbolise the price of man's redemption. The form, however, seems to have varied. Gabriel of Philadelphia (Apol. pro Eccl. Orient.) states that the bread for the oblation was made either round or square; and adds that the round shape is symbolical of our Lord's Divinity, the square of the universality of redemption. Allatius, too (de Eccl. Occ. et Orient. Conc., lib. iii. c. 15, s. 18), writes: "The Greeks when they make the bread for the sacrifice, for the most part do not make it round (ut plurimum non rotundant), but draw it out into four arms in the form of a cross: they then impress the seal (sigillum), just explained,^a in the centre of the cross and at the extremities of each arm. The priest who is about to celebrate takes the bread, in the Prothesis, and divides it in such a manner that each portion has a complete seal, and these parts are called seals (σφραγίδες, signacula)." [FRACTION.]

According to this description each portion would be approximately square; but whether the whole oblation be round or square, the Holy Lamb itself is square.

In the "office of the Prothesis," called διδραχίς τῆς θείας καὶ ἁγίας λειτουργίας, which is performed in the chapel of the Prothesis, on the north side of the bema, as introductory to the liturgy, and in which the priest assumes the eucharistic vestments, and selects and prepares the elements for consecration; he separates the

^a v. Neale, Introd. p. 242.

^b This word is sometimes used for the impression;

sometimes for the bread itself, as bearing the impression.

^c Martene, vol. i. p. 117.

^d This is identical with that described as impressed on the Holy Lamb.

"lamb" from the rest of the oblation, cutting it away squarewise with the "spear" (ἡ ἄγρια λόγχη), which is a knife in the form of an elongated spear-head, with a short handle, ending in a cross, and symbolical of the spear which pierced our Lord's side; and lays it on the paten or disc (ὁ ἅγιος δίσκος), arranging afterwards in a specified order particles (μερίδες) cut in a pyramidal form from the oblation.

Five loaves or oblations are usually prepared in the Prothesis; in the Russian Church invariably so, according to King (p. 144), but in Greece one only is often prepared, and of old the number varied. The oblation thus prepared is covered with the "asteriscus" [p. 149], a sort of frame, consisting of two bars crossing each other and joined by a hinge at the centre, and bent into such a shape as to form, when they are at right angles, a support for the "veils," of which there are three; the innermost being called δισκοκάλυμμα, and the outer ἄψυ. It then remains in the Prothesis till the "great entrance," i. e. of the Elements in the liturgy.

At the "fraction" in the liturgy the priest breaks the Holy Lamb, there called "the Holy Bread" (τὸν ἅγιον ἄρτον), into four parts, and arranges them crosswise in the disc, thus—

He makes the sign of the cross over the chalice with the part $\Gamma \bar{\Gamma}$, which he then puts into the chalice; he communicates himself and assistants with the part $\text{X} \bar{\text{C}}$, and the remaining two parts are divided among the lay communicants (Neale, Introd. 518).

For details of the office of the Prothesis, and their symbolical significance, see διδραχίς τῆς θείας καὶ ἁγίας λειτουργίας, as given in the Eschologion mega; also Goar, Rit. Græc. (note in S. Joan. Chrysost. Missam); Neale, Introduction, pp. 341, &c.; Martene, de Antiq. Eccl. Rit. vol. i. p. 117; and Allatius (ut supra).

[II. J. II.]

LAMB, THE. [IN ART.] It appears best to treat early representations of the lamb as symbolical of our Lord (whether in the act of suffering or of triumph), apart from those of the sheep, which represent human members of the church of Christ. They are frequently brought together on the sarcophagi, and especially in the later mosaics within our period, as at SS. Cosmas and Damianus, and at St. Praxedis, in Rome; and ^e In the Roman Liturgy the Host (oblata) is divided into three parts: in the Mozarabic into nine, with special symbolism.

Ciampini (V.M. tab. xv. vol. ii. : also tab. xlvii.), perhaps with reference to the Paschal Feast.

Two or more sheep of the church frequently accompany the Good Shepherd, besides the one which He bears on His shoulders. They are often made to look to Him with an expression of awe and affection, and His hand is sometimes extended to bless them (Arioghi, i. 531, 532, 573, 587, from catacomb paintings; on sarcophagi, i. 295, 303, 307).

The Church is supposed to be symbolised by the curious painting of a lamb between two wolves [vol. i. p. 389]. The original is rude in execution. As an emblem of innocence, the lamb is found in Boldetti, p. 365, and with an Orange, Bosio, p. 445. [R. St. J. T.]

LAMB, OFFERING OF. The general rule as to oblations upon the altar was that nothing should be offered there but the first fruits of corn and grapes in their season (Can. Apost. 3, Conc. Africam. can. 4), and bread and wine for the eucharist were constantly offered. In some churches, as, e.g. the Gallican, the rule was not so strict, so that money and other things were permitted to be offered (Conc. Aurel. i. can. 16); and it appears from a passage in Walafrid Strabo (d. 849) (de Re us Eccles. c. 18), that a custom even existed in some places of consecrating a lamb, or offering it upon the altar, on Easter Day. This accusation is repeated by Photius, patriarch of Constantinople A.D. 866, in his letter against the doctrines and practices of the West (Ep. 2, ad Patr.). The writers who replied to Photius in defence of the Western church, Katramnas and Eneas, bishop of Paris, do not apparently deny the existence of such a custom. Du Pin (Cent. ix. p. 113) notices that an example of this usage is to be found in the life of St. Udalric, and that a form was provided in the old Ordo Romanus for consecrating the lamb to be sacrificed. Cardinal Bona, too (Her. Liturg. ii. 8, n. 5), may be cited as a witness to the truth of the statement.

At first sight the practice looks very like a continuation of the Jewish passover. The strong repulsion, however, of the church from Jewish practices in those ages seems to render this unlikely; and we must probably regard it as being a singular and extremely crude way of indicating a mystical reference to the sacrifice of Jesus Christ, the Lamb of God.

It can only have been an infrequent and obscure practice, and after the period mentioned we hear no more of it. [S. J. E.]

LAMBERT (1) Bishop of Maestricht † 709 (al. A.D. 696), comm. Jun. 5, Mart. Metr. Bede:

"Junius in Nonsi mundo mitratu ad(m)ptum Et Sancti Lauterli nobisiam trans sidera verti," but Sept. 17 (as a Martyr) Mart., Bed., Hieron., Gell., Ado., Rab., Us., Notk., Cal. Angl., Stab., Autis. :

"Lambertus quintum denum (xv. Kal. Oct.) virtute coronat Facto quem caenam semper tremibunda pavisset."— Wandelbert.

A church with shrine was erected on the site of the martyrdom, and Grimoald, son of Pepin, was killed there while praying for his sick father, A.D. 714. Thither, in A.D. 727, the relics of Lambert were translated from St. Peter's church, Maestricht, and see also, and the saint became patron of the city of Liège, that grew up round his cathedral. The shrine was unhurt when the church was burnt by the Normans, A.D. 882 (Acta SS. Sept. v. 556). Dec. 24 was the local anniversary of the translation (e. Reiner, ib. p. 552). There were also churches to him, before A.D. 776, at Nyvels and Hermael, near Maestricht, where the blind and lame were cured on occasion of the aforesaid translation (v. Godescalcus, ib. p. 580). Liège appears to have been a favourite pilgrimage. Sept. 17 is noted as a feast, in Cl. Verd., and a 9th cent. calendar discovered by Biatirim (Denkskriftj-keiten. v. i. 460).

LAMBERT (2) Bishop of Lyons, 7th century, † Apr. 14, church at Fontenelle dedicated to him. Oct. 1. (Mart. Hieron. Florentini; Acta SS. Bull. Apr. ii. 215.)

(3) Martyr at Saragossa, commemorated Apr. 16 (ib. p. 419). [E. B. B.]

LAMBESE, COUNCIL OF (Lambesitanum Concilium), said to have been held (A.D. 249) at Lambese in Algeria, when ninety bishops condemned Privatus for heresy, as we learn from St. Cyprian (Ep. 55 : comp. Mausl, i. 787). [E. S. FE.]

LAMBESES, martyrs of, in Africa, Feb. 23 (Mart. Hieron. D'Ach.), namely, Luciana, Felix, and 36 others. [E. B. B.]

LAMMAS, a name applied in England to August 1, the festival of St. Peter in the Fetters (ad Vincula) [PETER, ST., FESTIVALS OF]. Somner's account of it (Diet. Sar. Lat. Angl. s. v.) is, that Lammas is a corruption of Hlafmaesse, or loaf-mass, because it was an ancient custom to offer on that day loaves made of the new corn [FRUITS, OFFERING OF; LOAVES, BENEDECTION OF]. A fanciful hypothesis is, that St. Peter became patron of lambs, from the Lord's words to him, "Feed my lambs" (John xxi. 15). [C.]

LAMPADARY (λαμπάδριος). 1. An official of the Greek church, whose business it was to set the wax-tapers in their places before they were kindled. (Heineccius, Abbildung der Griechischen Kirche, ii. 299; iii. 48, 58.)

2. An officer of the Imperial Court at Constantinople, whose duties are but imperfectly known. (Ducange, s. v.) [C.]

LAMPADIUS, martyr at Antioch, July 19 (Mart. Hieron. D'Ach., Eptern.). [E. B. B.]

LAMPADUS, "our father the worker," hermit of Irenopolis, commemorated July 4 (Men. Basil.) He has a special office July 5 in the present Byzantine liturgy. From this it appears that "the cave, where his precious and holy relic" lay, was at one time a favourite pilgrimage (Arcudius, Anthol.) [E. B. B.]

LAMPASUS, martyr at Africa, Feb. 19 (Mart. Hieron. D'Ach., Gellou.). [E. B. B.]

LAMPRA. Easter Day is sometimes called λαμπρά (sc. ἡμέρα or κυριακή) simply. Thus the Leucostarion (quoted by Sulzer, Tesaurus ed from St. Peter's church, see also, and the saint to city of Liège, that grew real. The shrine was un- ch was burnt by the Nor- SS. Sept. v. 556). Dec. 24 rary of the translation (c. here were also churches to), at Nyvels and Hermael, re the blind and lame were of the aforsail translation p. 580). Liège appears to a pilgrimage. Sept. 17 is Cat. Verd., and a 9th cent. by Binterim (Denkwürdig-

Bishop of Lyons, 7th century, Fontenelle dedicated to him. m. Florentini; Acta SS. Bull.

ngossa, commemorated 1 Apr. [E. B. B.]

CUNCIL OF (Lambestanum have been held (A.D. 249) at), when ninety bishops con- nor heresy, as we learn from ; comp. Mausi, i. 787). [E. S. Ff.]

martyrs of, in Africa, Feb. 23 ch.), namely, Luciana, Felix, [E. B. B.]

name applied in England to vestival of St. Peter in the ount of it (Dict. Sac. Lat. at Lammas is a corruption of -mass, because it was an azer on that day leaves made of UITS, OFFERING OF; LOAVES, . A fanciful hypothesis is, ame patron of lambs, from the him, "Feed my lambs" (John [C.]

Y (λαμπαδάριος). 1. An official arch, whose business it was to s in their places before they inecius, Abbildung der Griech- 299; iii. 48, 58.) f the Imperial Court at Con- ne duties are but imperfectly [C.]

S, martyr at Antioch, July 19 'Ach., Eptern.). [E. B. B.] , "our father the wonder- of Irenopolis, commemorated (asil). He has a special office July Byzantine liturgy. From this "the cave, where his precious ay, was at one time a favourite idius, Anthol.) [E. B. B.]

, martyr at Africa, Feb. 19 'Ach., Gellou.). [E. B. B.] Easter Day is sometimes called phra or κυριακή simply. Thus on (quoted by Suicer, Thesaurus

s. v.) speaks of κανόνες τῆς λαμπρῆς μετὰ τῶν εἰρημῶν, the canons [of odes] for Easter Day, with the hymn. [U.]

LAMPROPHORIA (λαμπροφορία), the wearing of white clothing (εὐθὺς λαμπρὰ), especially by the baptized in the week following their BAPTISM [§ 60, l. 163]. (Suicer's Thesaurus, s. vv. λαμπροφορέω, λαμπροφορία, λαμπροφύ- [C.]

LAMPS. The lamps of the early Christians have been found in many places in great abundance, more especially in the catacombs of Rome and other cemeteries. For the early Christians were accustomed, in common with Jews and pagans, to place lamps in the company of the dead* (Raoul Rochette in Mém. de l'Acad. des Inscr. t. xiii, pp. 758-764 (1838); Birch, Inscr. Pott. part iv. c. ii.; Martigny, Dict. s. v. Lampes Chrétiennes, and the references). Lamps of clay were found upon sarcophagi, at Vulci, in 1834, with Christian symbols, in company with coins of Constantine and his successors (Raoul-Rochette, u. s. p. 783); and have been met with either outside or inside Christian tombs and chambers in Rome, Naples, Corneto, Syracuse, Arles, Lyons, Carthage, and Alexandria. Others, of bronze, with chains attached for suspension, have been exhumed from the subterranean galleries and crypts of Rome, and in some rare cases hanging from the roof or vault; also clay lamps and candlesticks have been discovered in niches in the same situations, to give light to guide the wanderer through the gloom (Martigny, u. s. and references). A few (of clay) have been found in churches in Egypt, and were probably used for evening service (see Duange, s. v. Lucernarium). Clay lamps, with Christian symbols, have also been met with among the ruins of the Palatine in Rome, and of houses in Geneva (De Rossi, Bull. di Arch. Crist. 1867, pp. 23-28), and in the recent excavations in and about Jerusalem, in other places beside tombs. Indeed clay lamps have been found in very many parts of the ancient Christian world; but not always bearing Christian symbols. Many from the Roman

* Many of them shew signs of having been much used, and there is little doubt that from about the 4th century lamps and candles were often kept alight before the tombs of the saints. This excited the indignation of Vigilantius (A.D. 404), who thought it heathenish and idolatrous; St. Jerome (adv. Vigil. c. 7), who is inclined to censure it as being "pro honore martyrum," notwithstanding it is "in perpetua et sempiterna secularium baniumi- ve centi religiosum monumentum." Not very long afterwards, however, Perpetuus, bishop of Tours, left provision for his will (A.D. 474), "ut oleum pareret pro Domini Martini sepulchro indieshenter illustrando" (D'Aclery, Spirit. t. iii, p. 304, ed. 1723). At an earlier period more dislike was felt to keep lights burning during the day in cemeteries. The council of Elvira in Spain (A.D. 324) says in its 34th canon: "Cereæ per diem placuit in coemeterio non incedi. Inquietant enim sanctorum spiritus nos sumi," where, however, we have a curious superstition. See Bingham, Antiq. lib. viii c. 6, § 21. The practice of placing lamps with in sepulchres was easily explained in a pious sense, "ad significandum lumine fieri illustratos sanctos decessisse, et modo in superna patria lumine gloriæ splendere" (St. Jerome, quoted by Martigny, Dict. p. 381), but both the references (adv. Vigil. et Vit. Paulæ, tacitly taken from Boldetti, Cimit. p. 825) are erroneous.

catacombs, for example, have only seallops and ornamental patterns of various kinds (Verret, Cat. de Rome, t. iv. pl. xix.); and the same remark may be made of some of the lamps from Jerusalem in the museum of the Palestine Exploration Fund, reasonably presumed to be Christian (Rev. G. J. Chester in Recovery of Jerusalem, pp. 481-486, with figures)^b as well as of others from Egypt and various other countries contained in the British Museum. In our own country early Christian lamps, like all other Christian works of the Roman period, are of the rarest possible occurrence. Hubner (Inscr. Brit. Lat. p. 240, n. 27) mentions one in the museum at Newcastle, with the chrismata (☩), and there is another, of red clay, in the collection of the Rev. S. S. Lewis, with the same device in the centre and palm branches at the sides, found in Cannon Street, London (very like that figured by Bartoli, Ant. Luc. part iii. c. 22). A third was found at Colchester, of pale terra-cotta, having the chrismata slightly raised and coloured black (Journ. Brit. Arch. Assoc. 1855, p. 91, and H. Syer Cuming, in lit.). Lamps were also, though rarely, made of silver. In an inventory of church plate delivered by Paul of Ciria to the persecutors in the time of Diocletian, occurs the item, "lucernæ argenteæ septem" (Ad calc. Optati, p. 266 in Bingham, u. s.); and it appears that a silver lamp has been found in Rome (R. Rochette, u. s. p. 759); a single example of an amber lamp, without any ornament, has also been met with in the same city, in the cemetery of St. Callixtus (Boldetti, Cimit. p. 297, t. i. 7). The forms and symbols which the terra-cotta and bronze lamps present are sufficiently different to make it desirable to describe them separately.

(A) Terra-cotta lamps.—They are of various forms, but one of the most common is that which much resembles a modern teapot. It has a round body, with one or two apertures for oil; an ascending handle, often looped or perforated for suspension; and a horizontal spout opposite the handle for the wick. But the handle, body, and spout, are all liable to modifications of form, and the first and last (often nearly obsolete) are sometimes wholly wanting. The lamp may thus approach the form of a boat or of a shoe, to both which it has been sometimes compared; indeed, it was sometimes made in direct imitation of these objects either in clay or in bronze.^c Occasionally the handle is of a whimsical form, as a female holding palm-branches (Perret, Cat. vol. iv. pl. xv. fig. 3), or, it may have a crescent outline (Sévroux d'Agincourt, Recueil, pl. xxiv. n. 4). Pagan lamps are not rarely made in imitation of altars and other objects (see Birch, passim); and we have an example of a Christian lamp in the form of an altar (Perret, u. s. pl. xix. fig. 4).

^b Among these is an Arabesque pattern, which may be intended for vine branches, where Mr. Chester supposes a reference to the Enchiræ to be intended. The vine branch with grapes is realistically represented on a lamp of yellow unglazed clay of the common type from Melos, in the writer's possession, where many Christian lamps, nearly all bearing the cross, have been found; it may possibly be Christian. A not very legible potter's mark (☩), perhaps ΕΦ: MH, is cut on the under side. Pottery marks have not been found on any Christian lamps at Jerusalem, and they would seem from the silence of authors to be very rare on Christian lamps generally. De Rossi mentions a lamp with the Good Shepherd and vine-branches, recently found in the Palatine excavations, having on the under side "the name of the potter or proprietor of the works stamped in beautiful letters, as on the pagan lamps, reading ANNI SEI:" probably, as he suggests, for anni sereiani. The letters, he thinks, are of the 2nd or 3rd century; so that this will be amongst the earliest Christian lamps in existence (Bull. di Arch. Crist. 1867, p. 16, and 1874, p. 79, pl. vi figs. 1, 2). Mr. H. Syer Cuming has a similar specimen.

The great mass of the terra-cotta lamps found in the catacombs of Rome, "lesquelles sont au premier rang des objets d'antiquité chrétienne qu'on en retire" (Raoul Rochette, Cat. de Rome, p. 49), appear to be of the 4th and 5th centuries; some are considered to be older (Sévroux d'Agincourt, Recueil, passim), while a few seem to be later. Martigny (Dict. p. 152) thinks that a great many (un grand nombre) may be referred to the 2nd or to the 3rd century; but this is perhaps too much to say. Those of Gaul may be, like the sepulchral inscriptions, mostly of the 5th and 6th centuries; but it would be interesting to investigate the dates of Christian lamps more accurately than appears to have been done at present. Several recently found in the Palatine in Rome, bearing the fish, lamb, palm, chrisma, and cross, are considered by De Rossi to be of the 4th and 5th centuries; but others with the two last types (ornamented with gems) he inclines to place in the 6th century. Two of the three lamps from Geneva figured by him (one with the Apostles' heads, the other with a palm-tree), he places in the 4th century; the other bearing a chrisma, beautifully inlaid with crosses, squares, &c., about the beginning of the 6th. (See his Bull. di Arch. Crist. 1867, pp. 11, 24, 25.) Those from Egypt in the British Museum are probably of the 4th and 5th centuries. The principal^d types are as follows:—

(1) Christ as the Good Shepherd. Bearing a sheep on his shoulders, probably from Rome* (Bartoli, Ant. Luc. Sep. pars iii. t. 28, Rome, 1691). The same type, with other sheep at his feet, sun and moon above, accompanied by ark and dove, scenes from Jonah's life, &c., catacombs of Rome. (Id. 29, and Perret, Cat. de

^c Without referring to pagan examples, we have a notable instance of the boat of St. Peter and St. Paul (see below); a bronze lamp, on whose handle a dove is perched, and which may therefore not improbably be Christian, the body of which is a foot in the soldier's shoe (enliga), is figured by Licetus (Luc. Ant. p. 170); another, in the form of a boat, with palm branches on the sides, of terra cotta, probably Christian, is figured by Boldetti, Cimit. p. 64.

^d It is probable that among the lamps found in Africa more especially, of which the museums of Turin and Algiers possess large collections, there may be types not here enumerated. See Martigny's remarks on the rarity of their emblems (Dict. p. 353). The figures of lamps in the older books of Licetus, &c., are but rarely quoted, being of rude execution. Some of these and various others are repeated in Matranga's edition (Rom. 1841) of Mamachi's Origines et Antiq. Christianae, especially in tom. iii., while some would seem to have been originally excluded from Matranga's work. The subjects are (with the exception of the alabrum, see below) of the same general character as those which are here mentioned independently.

^e When the locality of the lamps figured in this book is expressly mentioned, it is always Rome; where indeed the title-page professes that they were all found.

Rome, vol. iv. pl. xvii. fig. 2; De Rossi, Bull. di Arch. Crist. 1870, pp. 85–88.) The same type of the shepherd, vine branches at the sides, Rome. (Perret, u. s. pl. xlii. fig. 1; see also a previous note.) Others in De Rossi, Bull. Arch. 1870, pl. 1 (from Ostia), and Sacken and Kenner, Die Sammlungen des K. K. Münz- und Antiken-Cabinetes, p. 256 (Wien, 1866), who, as well as other writers, observe the similarity of the style of the figure to that of Hermes Kriophoros. Some of these may probably be earlier than the 4th century.

Clay Lamp, with Pastor Bonus, and other subjects. (Bartoli)

Clay Lamp, with Christ accompanied by angels, &c. (De Rossi)

(2) Christ accompanied by angels. Christ standing, having a cruciform nimbus in the

fig. 2; De Rossi, Bull. di 85-88.) The same type of lamps at the sides, Rome.
fig. 1; see also a previous De Rossi, Bull. Arch. 1870, pl. 1 en and Kenner, Die Samm-
und Antiken-Cabinets, p.
9, as well as other writers,
of the style of the figure of the figure.
Some of these than the 4th century.

and other subjects. (Bartoli.)

accompanied by angels, &c. (De Rossi.) accompanied by angels. Christ
a cruciform nimbus in the Byzantine style, bearing a long cross, between two flying angels, trampling on a lion and adder (cf. Ps. xci. 13). The Palatine, Rome;

of the florid style, probably later than the 5th century. (De Rossi, Bull. di Arch. Crist. 1867,
p. 12, fig. 1. Another and more perfect example in the Castellani collection, exhibited (1876) in the British Museum.) Christ seated, front view, between two flying angels, each holding a crown. Found in a subterranean chamber at Corneto, full of Christian lamps, given to R.
Rochette by Melch. Fossati, who regarded it as a Transfiguration, but this is doubtful. (R. Rochette, u. s., p. 762, note; Martigny, u. s. p. 352.)

(3) Fish, a symbol of Christ. Rome, Catacombs, and Palatine. (De Rossi, u. s. p. 12, fig. 5; Perret, u. s. pl. vii. fig. 1, and pl. ix. fig. 3.)
Carthage (British Museum.) Fish surrounded by six dolphins; very fine work in red clay, Algeria. (Martigny, u. s. p. 353.) See also below, under Inscriptions, and Fish (vol. i. p. 673).

(4) Lamb, a symbol of Christ. Rome, Cata-combs, and Palatine. (De Rossi, u. s. p. 12, fig. 2; Perret, u. s. pl. ix. fig. 2.)

(5) Christina or monogram of Christ. As X combined with P (✠), having a circle in centre;
palm-branches at the sides of the lamp (Bartoli,
u. s. t. 22). With loop of P to left; beautiful gemmed work; probably about the 6th century;

Clay Lamp, with gemmed christina. (De Rossi.)

Rome. (De Rossi u. s. p. 12, fig. 8. For similar work compare Birch, Anc. Pot. vol. ii. fig. 192.)
Others in Séroux d'Agincourt, u. s. pl. xxiv.
fig. vii.; De Rossi, u. s. p. 12, figs. 3 and 4; Perret, passim, &c. With loop of P to left, formed like a crook; Rome. (Séroux d'Agin-court, u. s. pl. xxiv. fig. ix.) The christina, besides being found on Roman lamps in various forms, occurs also commonly in Gaul (Martigny,

u. s.), and has been met with in Britain (see above), and in the catacombs of Syracuse (British Museum) and in Carthage (British Museum), and doubtless in many other places.

(6) Alpha and Omega (a monogram between them); Rome. (Séroux d'Agincourt, u. s. t. xxiv. fig. vi.) Christa between them, the letters inverted (Rev. S. S. Lewis).

(7) The Cross. Latin cross, with circle in centre (De Rossi, u. s. p. 12, fig. 6); Greek cross (Perret, u. s. pl. xiii. fig. 4). Including five circles, and various pellets, a representation of a pendant (De Rossi, u. s. p. 13, fig. 11; Séroux d'Agincourt, u. s. pl. xxiv. fig. viii.). All the above are from Rome. With the extremities forked, accompanied by an inscription (see below); also the Maltese cross; Jerusalem (Chester,
u. s. pp. 484-5, both figured.) The cross is common on Gaulish lamps, and found on several vases from Milo (Melos) (Martigny, u. s.). Carthage (gemmed work); Calymna (one curiously formed of lozenges, with open centre); Egypt.
(All in the British Museum.)

(8) Apostles. Figure seated on a throne surrounded by twelve heads; De Rossi thinks a prince or other illustrious convert is represented in the midst of the Apostles; Geneva, in the ruins of a house. Probably of the 5th century.
(De Rossi, u. s. p. 25, fig. 1.) Heads of the twelve Apostles surrounding a gemmed christina; Roman catacombs. (Mus. Corton. t. 84; Perret, u. s. pl. xiii. fig. 2.) [Two heads, suggested to be Peter and Paul, in caps surmounted by cruciform stars, are really those of the Discipuli; same locality. (Séroux d'Agincourt, u. s. pl. xxiv.
fig. 5.)]

(9) Fisherman, as symbol of an Apostle.
Holding net and staff in his right hand, a fish
in his left; on reverse of lamp a gemmed cross.
(Mus. Corton. t. 85.)

(10) Female saint between angels. Carthage.
(British Museum.)

(11) Cock, symbol of vigilance (Martigny, u. s.
p. 177), by some presumed to refer to St. Peter (Chester, u. s. p. 483); Rome. (Perret, u. s.
pl. ix. fig. 4. Compare one in Brit. Mus.)

(12) Dove, symbol of innocence. Rome. (Perret,
u. s. pl. xv. fig. 4.) Common on lamps of Gaul.
(Martigny, u. s.) Carthage; on one lamp two doves facing; on another, one only. (British Museum.) See also Sacken and Kenner, u. s.

(13) Pheasant, with tail spread out, and ornamented with three nimbi; emblematic of the Trinity. In Mr. H. Syer Cuming's collection. (Cuming, in lit. See also Journ. Brit.
Arch. Assoc. 1855, p. 91.)

(14) Horse, symbol of the end of life's course;
Rome. (Perret, u. s. pl. xix. fig. 2.)

(15) Stag. (Cf. Ps. xli. 1.) Rome? (Licet, de Lucern. Antiq. recond. p. 927, with fig.) Algeria (Münter, Symb. p. 112, referred to by Martigny, u. s. p. 353).

(16) Urn, supposed to be symbol of the swiftness of life, Lyons; on a vase of red clay, in the possession of the abbé Martigny. (Martigny, u. s. p. 353. See also p. 368, s. v. Lièvre.)

(17) Frog, as a symbol of the resurrection.
Egypt, in the catacombs of Alexandria among other places, in conjunction with the cross.
(Birch, Anc. Pot. vol. i. p. 52; Chester, u. s. p.

483. See also below under Inscriptions.) Several examples in the British Museum. Many lately found bear a late Greek A (Α), impressed on the bottom, probably for Alexandria, where they were made. Chester, in Academy, Feb. 5, 1876, p. 123, who has some valuable remarks on the varied forms of these lamps.

The symbolic interpretation of the frog may be regarded as determined by the inscription given below; but it is not so certain that some of the animals mentioned above were meant to have any symbolical interpretation whatever. Some of them occur on Pagan lamps (Birch, u. s. vol. ii. p. 289), as does also the lion, which likewise is found on a lamp, of Christian fabric apparently, in the British Museum. This animal was sometimes taken as a Christian symbol of watchful power. (Martigny, u. s. p. 369. See also the articles in this Dictionary under the titles of the animals named above.)

(18) Chalice, Western Christendom. (Chester, u. s. p. 483.) One with two handles, a tree springing from it, Calymna (British Museum). Cf. Chalcion, vol. i. p. 337.

(19) Palm-tree, Rome. (De Rossi, u. s. p. 13, fig. 9.) Geneva. (Id. p. 25, fig. 2.)

(20) Palm branches, Rome. (Perret, u. s. pl. xiii. fig. 4, and pl. xix. fig. 4.) Jerusalem, much conventionalised. (Chester, u. s. pp. 483-4, one figured.) Egypt. (British Museum.)

(21) Star, inscription around; see below; Egypt. (Séroux d'Agincourt, u. s. pl. xvii. fig. 14.)

The following subjects, to say nothing of doubtful types, are from the Old Testament:—

(22) Noah's ark and dove. See above, under No. 1.

(23) Scenes from life of Jonah. See above, No. 1. Jonah beneath gourd. (Mansueti, u. s. tom. i. p. 254, tab. lv. fig. 3.) Jonah and the whale (a sea-dragon). (British Museum.)

(24) Spies bearing grapes, Carthage. (British Museum.)

(25) Jewish candlestick, under various forms. With seven branches, six being bent in the middle at right angles; palm branch (?) on either side. Catacombs and Palatine, Rome. (Séroux d'Agincourt, u. s. pl. xxiv. fig. iii.; De Rossi, u. s. p. 7, fig. 12.) No palms, and branches of candlestick curved (Birch, Anc. Pot. vol. ii. fig. 192; Bartoli, u. s. t. 32; perhaps a Jewish work; probably from Rome). Quite conventionalised Rome (Perret, u. s. pl. xviii. fig. 5); sometimes with a Christian inscription; Jerusalem. (Chester, u. s. pp. 484, 485, one figured.) Algeria. (Martigny, u. s. p. 353.) Carthage. (British Museum.)

Of Pagan types, Christianised, we have the following:

(26) Venus holding apple, transformed into an Eve, as Séroux d'Agincourt suggests, but? Catacombs of Rome; good work, and probably of a very early period. (Séroux d'Agincourt, u. s. pl. xxiv. fig. 2.)

(27) Orpheus, who is made as a kind of symbol of Christ. Catacombs of Rome. (Perret, u. s. pl. xvii. n. 1.)

There are also some other lamp-types of the Christian period, but which can hardly be intended to bear any Christian significance. The most curious is a fish swallowing an aquatic bird (De Rossi, Bull. di Arch. Crist. 18. O. tav. iv. n. 9, seemingly about the 6th century): another is a man killing a lion with a sword (British Museum). Some lamps appear to bear Christian portraits, either full-length (De Rossi, u. s. p. 7, p. 25), or the bust only; one in the British Museum has apparently the head of an emperor, perhaps of Justinian.

Passeri (Lucern. Fict. vol. iii. pp. 126-7, t. xli.) publishes a lamp of the usual type bearing the Graces, at the bottom of which is a cross, in dotted lines, which leads him to suspect that it is made by a Christian artist; and adds, "nam et aliae plures apud me asservantur, quae omnino Christianae sunt, et tamen ethnicorum symbolis atque imaginibus adornantur, praesertim Victoriae, Herculis, Palladis et Apollinis citharoedi sive Orphei, suae omnes, cum per otium licebit, sua in sede collocatas publicabimus." This promise does not appear to have been fulfilled; and the Christianity of such lamps (the Orpheus-type excepted) may be questioned. De Rossi cannot accept the cross on the bottom of a lamp "per segno certo di Christianesimo" (Bull. di Arch. Crist. 1870, p. 80).

The same types, as was to be expected, are not found in all places where Christian lamps have been discovered in considerable numbers. The Rev. G. J. Chester observes of those of Jerusalem: "Many lamp-types of more Western Christendom, from the catacombs of Rome, Syracuse, and Carthage, such as the Good Shepherd, the Sacred Monogram, the Dove, the Cuck of St. Peter, and the Chalice, are entirely absent; and the same may be said of the disgusting and probably Gnostic device of the toad" [rather frog] "associated with the cross, so often found in the catacombs of Alexandria and elsewhere, in Egypt. The earthenware bottles, with the effigy of St. Menas, an Egyptian saint, who flourished in the 4th century . . . so commonly found with Christian lamps in Egypt, are also absent. [See Böckh, C. I. G. p. 8978 and Academy, u. s.] The usual symbols of the Jerusalem lamps, which are all of a rude and cheap description . . . are the cross . . . ; the seven-branched candlestick . . . and the palm branch . . . These emblems, which the Christians of the mother of churches used and rejoiced in, in common with their brethren in more western lands, are all more or less conventionalised, and are represented in a distinctive and different manner." (Recovery of Jerusalem, pp. 483-4.)

The types commonly occupy the disc or centre of the body of the lamp, while the sides are either plain or more usually decorated with floral or geometrical ornaments, or with subordinate types, as a wreath of palm-branches, or medallions enclosing the chrisma, &c.; or, more rarely, they bear inscriptions. In the lamps of Palestine, however, the emblems are placed along the edge, and not in the body of the lamps, which are in most cases not round but pear-shaped (Recover. of Jerus. p. 484).

Inscriptions on terra-cotta lamps.—These are rare, only three being contained in Böckh's Greek-Christian inscriptions, though a few others are now known. The following are the most important:—

(1) Séroux d'Agincourt, Recueil, p. 59, pl. xvii. fig. 14; Böckh, C. I. G. n. 8980:

ΤΟΥ ΑΓΙΟΥ ΠΟΛΥΚΤΟΚΟΣ (sic),

i. e. τοῦ ἁγίου Πολυέκτου (the Holy Polyektus)

w
t
U
O
o
(
n
p
w m
(S

(2
with

le. q shine
simil
from blun
same
the J tion

Clay T

museu
inscrib
Dr. Bir
ΘΕΟΛΟ
of God)

with a sword (British appear to bear Christ in length (De Rossi, u. s. 1877; one in the British Museum the head of an emperor,

z. vol. III. pp. 126-7, f. of the usual type bearing om of which is a cross, leads him to suspect that an artist; and adds, "nam me asservantur, quae ut, et tamen ethiœcorum mibus adornantur, praemis, Palladis et Apollinis, quas omnes, cum per collocatas publicabimus." appear to have been ful- nity of such lamps (the may be questioned. De e cross on the bottom of erto di Christianesimo" 70, p. 80).

was to be expected, are s where Christian lamps in considerable numbers. observes of those of Jeru- types of more Western catacombs of Rome, sym- ch as the Good Shepherd, the Dove, the Cuck of St. are entirely absent; and f the disgusting and prof- of the toad" [rather frog] cross, so often found in the a and elsewhere, in Egypt, es, with the effigy of St. aut, who flourished in the commonly found with pt, are also absent. [See s and Actedony, u. s.] The Jerusalem lamps, which are description . . . are the -branched candlestick . . . ch . . . These emblems, f the mother of churches n common with their bre- lands, are all more or less are represented in a dis- manner." (Recovery of occupy the disc or centre while the sides are either decorated with floral or with subordinate types, branches, or medallions en- cke; or, more rarely, they ne lamps of Palestine, how- placed along the edge, and lamps, which are in most ear-shaped (Recov. of Jerus.

a-cotta lamps.—These are contained in Böckh's Greek- though a few others are lowing are the most im-court, Recueil, p. 59, pl. C. I. G. n. 8980:

ΠΟΛΥΟΚΤΟΣ (sic),

αγκυρω (the Holy Polyoctus)

written near the edge of a lamp, with a star in the centre, found in a church at Coptos in Upper Egypt, probably dedicated to that saint. Others of the same character, bearing the names of St. Sergius, abbat, and St. Christina, abbess (ἀγία), and St. Cyriacs, may be seen in Böckh, nos. 8979, 8981, and Birch, Anc. Pott. vol. I. p. 52. The lamp in the Roman College, on which is written in ink Ο ΑΥΘΟC ΚΑΚΕΡΔΑΟC, may have been destined for the priests' use. (See Martigny, u. s.)

Clay Lamp, with star and Greek inscription. (Schronx d'Agincourt.)

(2) G. J. Chester, Recov. of Jerusalem, p. 485, with figure;

ΦΩC ΧΥ ΦΕΝΙ ΠΑCΙΝ, i. e. φῶς Χριστοῦ φάειν πάντων (the light of Christ shines to all; adapted from I John ii. 8). Another, similar, accompanied by a cross; both are from Jerusalem. The same inscription variously blandered occurs on several lamps found in the same neighbourhood, on more than one of which the Jewish candlestick occupies the same position as the cross in the lamp here figured. The museum at Leylen has a lamp (from Egypt?) inscribed ΦΩC ΕΞ ΦΩΤΟC (Light of Light); and Dr. Birch mentions the same legend, and also ΘΕΟΛΟΓΙΑ ΘΕΟΥ ΧΑΡΙC (Theology is the grace of God), as occurring on Christian lamps from Egypt (u. s.). Of other lamps from Jerusalem one bears the same candlestick with seven lights, and reads in letters partly inverted, Αὐχράδια καλὰ (beautiful lights). In allusion to the type. Another appears to have ΙΧΘ for ΙΧΘΥC (the Fish). See Chester, as above (where more information may be found), and the Egyptian lamps in the British Museum.

Clay Lamp, with cross and Greek inscription. (G. J. Chester.)

(3) Chabouillet, Catal. des Cunees, &c. de la Bibl. Impér. p. 607. (A drawing sent to him by M. Muret.) A lamp doubtless found in Egypt, formerly in the collection of the Abbé Greppo, has upon it the representation of a frog, with a cross and the inscription—

ΕΤΩ ΕΙΜΙ ΑΝΑΚΤΑCΙC.

The transformations of the frog seem to the designer symbolical of the Resurrection; there seems no necessity to suppose any Gnostic feeling. The words are an adaptation from Joeh. xi. 25.

(4) A lamp is figured by Matranga in Manna- chi, Orig. et Antiq. Christ. tom. iii. p. 37, tab. vi. fig. 2, on which a labarum of considerable size stands between two soldiers; on the tablet below the wreathed chrisma is written in two lines, ΕΝ ΤΑΥΤΩ (sic) ΝΙΚΑ. The margin is finely decorated with leaves, wreaths, and medallions. Apparently from the catacombs of Rome (in coemeteriis repertum). This is termed vetustissimum monumentum; it may be of about the 5th or 6th century, to judge from the figure.

Clay Lamp, with labarum between soldiers, reading εν ταυτω (misceit) νικα. (Matranga.)

(5) Raoul Rochette (u. s. p. 763) mentions that lamps of the 4th century were found in 1834 in a little Christian cemetery at Vulci, bearing the type of heads surrounded by a nimbus, with in-

IMAGE EVALUATION
TEST TARGET (MT-3)

Photographic Sciences Corporation

23 WEST MAIN STREET
WEBSTER, N.Y. 14580
(716) 872-4503

10
11.6
18 20 22
25
28
32
36 40
45
50
55 60
65
70
75
80
85
90
95 100

10
11.6
18 20 22
25
28
32
36 40
45
50
55 60
65
70
75
80
85
90
95
100

scriptions terminating with PAX CUM SANTIS (sic) or CUM ANGELIS. The early part probably mentioned the name of the person buried.

With regard to the paste, glaze, and style of art, it varies a good deal. The greater part appear to be of the bright red unglazed ware, called false Samian, which have been found in Egypt, among other places, where, however, the art of making lamps "seems to have been in a very low condition, and certainly inferior to its state in Rome and the provinces of Greece and Asia Minor." (Birch, u. s. i. 52, ii. 291.) The lamps of Palestine are of unequal merit, none being very high; while among the Roman lamps, of various ages, some are of very good work.

The number of Christian lamps, of terra-cotta, which enrich the museums of Europe, to say nothing of those in private hands, is very large; Martigny calls them almost infinite (u. s.). In this country the museum of the Palestine Exploration Fund contains the largest collection of Christian lamps of that region: in the British Museum there is a considerable number (between one and two hundred) of others from various localities.

(b) Bronze lamps.—With regard to the lamps of bronze, which have been found in the catacombs and elsewhere, they are generally thought to be for the most part of a later age than those of clay; and some of those which are preserved in museums lie under a suspicion of being forgeries (Martigny, Dict. p. 352). They have sometimes one spout, sometimes two, and are generally pierced for suspension by chains, some of which still exist. The chains sometimes met in an inscribed tablet, which was itself suspended. The curved pin for trimming the wick is occasionally found attached (Baldetti, u. s. p. 64). The earlier symbols, as the fish, hardly ever occur; the chrisma is frequent, and also the cross. Several of these lamps are figured by Bartoli, p. iii.; Perret, tom. v. u. s. tabb. 23, 24, 25, 26, 30, 31; Bottari, Roma Sotterr. t. iii. tav. cxxi.-cxxiii.; and the British Museum has about twenty others.[†]

The following notice of the Christian types which occur on bronze lamps must suffice:—

(1) Chrisma.—The handle formed by the chrisma in a circle, surrounded by vine leaves (Bartoli, t. 23). The same, surrounded by Jonah and his gourd (ib. t. 30). The same, plain, with transverse bar, accompanied by a

[†] There are also some figured in the older work of Licetus, partly taken from Cassalius, which seem to be of metal. See a very curious one, if it be genuine, with two spouts, a star on the body of the lamp, and a horse-man standing on the side attached to the handle, which is a circle enclosing a chrisma, p. 782; also another, p. 870 (not made for suspension), having the Good Shepherd bearing a sheep, his head radiated, a suspicious peculiarity. For others more like those mentioned in the text, see pp. 951, 954, 994, which last gives a female called a Venus, under a gourd, otherwise much resembling Bartoli, t. 30. If indeed the two figures represent the same specimen, the drawing of Licetus is very bad; yet this seems to be the case: see Bellori's remarks.

The writer desires to express his special obligation to Mr. Percy Gardner for drawing up descriptions of the more important bronze lamps contained in the British Museum, as well as to the other officers of the museum for affording him every facility to inspect the objects mentioned both in this and in his other articles.

and ω ; an inscribed tablet above (see figure, id. t. 24). The same form of chrisma, on which a dove perches (id. t. 26).

Bronze Lamp, with handle formed by the chrisma, and ω and bearing the name of Nonius Atticus vir clarissimus of Illici-a (Bartoli).

(2) Cross.—Handle formed by a cross, above which dove (Perret, u. s. t. v. fig. 5). Other handles are formed by crosses of various forms (British Museum). By a cross, on the top of a gryphon's head, a chrisma on the body of the lamp (Bartoli, t. 25). Same type, but lamp has two spouts, and no chrisma (British Museum; same type, but done above cross; Syracuse, recently found; Rev. S. S. Lewis). By a cross placed between and overshadowed by wings (British Museum). A cross placed in the middle of an ornamented handle, with three central discs (British Museum). A few of the above lamps are somewhat boat-shaped.

(3) Bird.—Body of lamp in the shape of a phoenix (British Museum, two specimens). Cf. Licetus, p. 871 (with figure). Others in British Museum in form of a peacock or a duck, probably Christian.

(4) Palm branches.—Placed near the nozzles (Bottari, u. s. t. cxxviii).

(5) Boat, as a symbol of the Church (see Martigny Dict. s. v. 'Navire').—(a) A bronze lamp in the form of a boat, is now in the cabinet of the Grand Duke of Tuscany (Bartoli, u. s. t. 31; Cahier et Martin, Mémoires Archéol. vol. iii. p. 15; Perret, u. s. t. 1). Two figures (Peter steering and Paul preaching) are at the ends of the boat, which bears an inscription on a label at the top of the mast in three lines:

DOMINVS LEGEM
DAT VALERIO SEVERO
EVTRUPI VIVAS.

This inscription has long been a puzzle for the learned. (See Bellori at the end of Bartoli, p. 11; also Martigny, Dict. p. 352.) De Rossi (Mon. di Arch. Crist. 1867, p. 28) seems to have hit on the true explanation, by suggesting that Eutropius is the praenomen of Valerius Severus; and that the acclamation congratulates him on ed tablet above (see figure, id., the form of chrisma, on which a t. 28).

Handle formed by the chrisma, and a cross of Nontus Asiaticus vir christianus of Illyria Handle formed by a cross, above ret. u. s. t. v. fig. 5). Other ed by crosses of various forms). By a cross, on the top of a chrisma on the body of the (25). Same type, but lamp has no chrisma (British Museum; done above cross; Syracuse, Rev. S. S. Lewis). By a cross and overshadowed by wings). A cross placed in the middle of handle, with three central (base). A few of the above hat boat-shaped.

ly of lamp) in the shape of a Museum, two specimens). Cf. with figure). Others in British of a peacock or a duck, proches.—Placed near the nozzles (revillii).

symbol of the Church (see Mars-Navire').—(a) A bronze lamp pont, is now in the cabinet of the Tuscany (Bartoli, u. s. t. 31; Mélanges Archéol. vol. iii. p. 13;

Two figures (Peter steering bag) are at the ends of the boat, inscription on a label at the top rea lines:

OMINVS LEGEM
VALERIO SEVERO
VTROPI VIVAS.

has long been a puzzle for the lort at the end of Bartoli, p. 11; id., p. 352.). De Rossi (Bull. di, p. 28) seems to have hit on Entrom, by suggesting that Entromen of Valerius Severus; and nation congratulates him on having accepted the law of the Gospel, he having been previously a pagan.

Bronze Lamp, in form of a boat, in which are St. Peter and St. Paul. (Giniez in Cahier and Martin, vueuse Ferret.)

This most interesting lamp was discovered during excavations of the Mons Coelius at Rome, in the 17th century, and appears to have been first published by De la Chausse in his Museum Romanum, Rom, 1690, and has since been repeatedly noticed, but only recently correctly drawn by M. Giniez. It is probably one of the earliest Christian bronze lamps known, being found along with other antiquities "of a good period of the empire" (Bellori).

Bronze Lamp (boat?), bearing chrisma, gryphon, and dolphin. (De Rossi.)

(6) Bronze lamp, perhaps intended for a boat, of very fine work, terminating at the poop in a gryphon's head, an apple in his mouth; the chrisma, on which a dove is perched, is between its ears; on the body of the lamp is another chrisma; at the other end (the prow) is a dolphin, with a loaf (?) in his mouth.

The dolphin, though no true fish, is here, as elsewhere, taken to be the symbol of Christ (as a fish). The apple in the dragon's mouth is interpreted by Monsignor Baillet to be the apple of Eve; while the loaf in the dolphin's mouth is regarded by him as the living bread of the Eucharist. [See DOLPHIN, FISU, GEMS.]

Probably (see De Rossi) of the end of the 4th or beginning of the 5th century. Found in the excavations of Porto. (De Rossi, Bull. di Arch. Crist. 1868, p. 77, tav. I, fig. 1, and for 1870, pp. 72-76.)

It should be added that lamps as well as candles were, from the 4th century onwards, placed in churches on candelabra suspended from the roof. These were of metal, bronze, silver, or even gold. Allusion is repeatedly made to them in the Liber pontificalis, and elsewhere; they were often of large size and elaborate ornamentation. They were commonly known by the name of Pharos (watch-tower) or Coroni, indicative of their general shape. (See Duncange, Gloss. under each word; and Martigny, Dict. p. 153.) They were of various forms as respects details. (See Papius, quoted by Duncange, u. s. Pharos.) A representation of one which approaches our period is given in a MS. of about the 9th century by Spallart, Tribl. Hist. des Cost. et Meurs, pl. xx. n. 4, referred to by Guenebault (see below). It is in the form of an architectural composition surrounded by towers. See

CORONA LUCIS. (For copious references to the earlier and later literature of Christian lamps, see Fabricius, Bibl. Antiq. pp. 1035, 1036; Guenebault, Dict. Iconogr. des Monum. Chrét. p. 105, Paris, 1843. In M. Cahier's paper on the Coronne de lumieres d'Aix-la-Chapelle is much information about early Christian lamps and chandeliers (Cahier et Martin, Mé. d'Archéol. vol. iii. pp. 1-61). There are also treatises by Fanciulli, De Lampadibus et Lucernis pensilibus in sacris aedibus Christianorum, 4to. (with plates); and Greppo, Sur l'usage des Cierges et des Lampes dans les premiers siècles de l'Eglise, Lyon, 8vo, 1842, which the writer has not seen.* [C. B.]

* Since the above was written the Rev. S. S. Lewis has called the writer's attention to an able paper by M. de Villefosse in the Musée Archéologique for 1875, entitled "Lampes Chrétiennes inédites" (3), to which is added an enumeration of the Christian lamps (15) in the Museum of the Louvre. Most of them have the same general types as those named in this article; but the following from Algeria and Tunis are additional:—(1) The Three Children in the furnace, in Phrygian caps, accompanied by the Guardian Angel; (2) The Magi (in Phrygian caps) and the Star (imperfect); both these are figured; (3) Christ of St. Paul (?); (4) Daniel (?). All are of clay. Mr. W. R. Cooper, in a paper on the Horus Myth in hel tion to Christianity, read before the Victoria Institute (March 6, 1876), mentions two terra-cotta lamps, showing the influence of the Horus myth on Christian works of art. One in the Boston Museum, of which he gives a figure, bears "a large Grek cross, which completely divides it into four sections, in the two lower of which is placed the crux ansata, or the mystical cross of life, which was

LAMPS, LIGHTING OF. Lamps in churches were in early Christian times lighted just before the beginning of vespers, which were originally appointed to be said at the twelfth hour, i. e. the last hour before sunset, whence the office itself is sometimes called duodecima. "Prima sic dici debet, pungentibus jam radiis solis, et vespera adhuc declinantibus radiis ejus." "In aestivo vero tempore adhuc altius stante sole Lucernarii inchoantur propter breves noctes" (Reg. S. Bened. cc. e. 34). The Benedictine practice in the last century is said to have been to say vespers in the winter at 3 P.M., in the summer at 3½ P.M. (Graucolas. Com. in Brev. cap. xxxviii.)

The lighting of the lamps was accompanied by certain prayers and psalms. These were known as psalmi and preces lucernales (St. Basil, ad Amphil.; St. Jerome, Ep. ad Lactam, &c.), and the office of vespers as lucernarium or *lucernalis v. lucernari hora (St. Aug. Sermo i. ad fratres in Er.). "Hora nona [i. e. as the context shews, after the ninth hour] lucernarium facimus," and the hours of prayer are thus enumerated: "hora tertia, sexta, nona, lucernarium, medio noctis, gallicantio, mane primo." [St. Jerome in Ps. 119 (120).] The apostolic constitutions also bid the faithful come together at eventide to sing psalms and offer prayers, and they call Ps. 140 (141) ἐπιλόχιον (i. 59 and viii. 35).

These psalms and prayers were originally said separately from, and as introductory to, vespers properly so called; later they were incorporated into the office, the first part of which was known as lucernarium, or in Greek τὸ λυχνικόν, and the whole office of vespers was sometimes, though less accurately, called by the same name. The directions for the "lychnic" in the Greek Lu-hology, for a solemn vigil (ἀγρυπνία), are as follows: The officer who put the lamps or candles in their places was called λαμπάδριος; he who lighted them, καταγοιδίτης (al. κατηγοιδίτης, Goar, 272).

The priest, having vested in the sacristy (ἐπαρτέον), comes out and censes the whole church and the icons, and, entering into the bema, censes the holy table, saying with a loud voice—"Glory be to the holy, and consubstantial, and life-giving and indivisible Trinity, in all places now and ever, and to ages of ages. R. Amen." Then the superior, or the appointed monk (δ) προεστὴς ἢ ὁ ταχθεὶς μοναχὸς^b, sings the proemic psalm, i. e. Ps. 103 (104), the priest remaining within the bema, with the holy doors closed. At the verse, "When Thou openest Thy hand they are filled with good," he comes out with the canonarch (or precentor—μετὰ τοῦ always held in the hands of the Egyptian gods and goddesses, and which the good spirit applied to the lips of the mummy to bring it again to life." (Catacombs of Alexandria.) He considers the adaptation of Egyptian sacred emblems to Christian purposes to be clear enough in these figures. Another from Denderah, which he figures after Denon, has the crux ansata for the principal cross, the looper postern of which surrounds the mouth of the lamp, and the central stem is extended upwards, so as to resemble a Greek cross also. No inscription on either lamp.

* By this term, however, Cassian appears to mean Nocturns.

^b St. Basil, Ep. 37, ad Neocæsarienses.

Κανονάρχου), and, after a prescribed reverence, goes to his place: the canonarch remains standing in the centre, and recites the stichi, or versicles for the day. At the verse of the psalm, "In wisdom hast Thou made them all,"^a the priest removes, and, standing bare-headed, says the "prayers of the lychnic" before the holy doors. These prayers are seven prayers for pardon and protection during the night, each ending in the usual manner with the ascription of praise. After their conclusion the priest says the great "synapte" (τὴν μεγάλην συναπτήν). The appointed section (or Cathism—κάθισμα) of the Psalms is then said, and after that the deacon says the little "synapte."^c The office of vespers proper is then continued.

When there is no vigil, the rite is simple. The holy doors are not opened, but the priest, standing before them bare-headed and vested in a stole, says with a loud voice—"Blessed be our God in all places now and ever, and to ages of ages." Then the superior or the appointed monk recites the proemic psalm without modulation (χόμα, i. e. "fusa voce sine cantu," &c., Goar), and the rest of the office is gone through as before.

In the Ambrosian office, the antiphon at the opening of vespers is still called "Lucernarium," and contains an obvious allusion to the name.

That for ordinary Saturdays and Sunday is:

"For Thou, O Lord, shalt light my candle; O Lord my God, make my darkness to be light.

"V. For in thee I shall discomfit a host of men [Lat. eripiar a tentatione]; O Lord my God make my darkness to be light.

Iterum. For Thou, O Lord," &c.

and that for other week days:

"The Lord is my light and my salvation; whom then shall I fear?

"V. The Lord is the strength of my life: of whom then shall I be afraid?

Iterum. "The Lord is my light," &c.

The Mozarabic vespers also begin with the Kyrie Eleison and Pateroster, said secretly with the salutation by the priest, "In nomine Domini nostri Jesu Christi lumen eum pace. R. Deo Gratia," and the "Lauda" which, with its prayer, immediately follows, has reference to the old rite, and is of precisely the same character as the Ambrosian "lucernarium."

The well-known hymn attributed by some to St. Ambrose, "Deus qui certis legibus noctem discernis ac diem," said in the Mozarabic

^a This word is interpreted by Goar (p. 29), "Canonum dux et inceptor," and may be sufficiently neatly represented by Precentor.

^b There is a difficulty in understanding these directions, as the verse, "In wisdom," &c., occurs earlier in the psalm than "When thou openest," &c.

^c The word synapte (συναπτή) is explained by Goar as "prayers compiled (compositae) for various persons and objects, and collected into one; whence the Greeks call it συναπτή, we (i. e. the Latins) collected." Its form is that of a Litany, with Kyrie Eleison repeated after each clause. Of the two forms, here called great and small, one is fuller than the other. Prayers of this character are also called terevy, from their length, sometimes also εὐχημα, because the first petition they contain is for peace, or εὐχαιρέα, because said by the deacon. They are of varied form and contents, and occur very frequently in the Greek offices. The earliest form of a synapte is given in the Apostolic Constitution, viii. 9.

after a prescribed reverence, the canonarch remains standing and recites the stich, or
 At the verse of the psalm, "Thou made them all," the standing ware-headed, says "psychic" before the holy verses are seven prayers for them during the night, each in a manner with the ascription of the canonarch. The priest says " (την μεγάλην συναπήν). (or Cathism—κἀθισμα) of a psalm, and after that the "synapte." The office of the canonarch continues.

On vigils, the rite is simple, not opened, but the priest, in bare-headed and vested in loud voice—"Blessed be our God ever, and to ages of superior or the appointed proemiac psalm without i.e. "fusa voce sine cantu," the rest of the office is gone

On the office, the antiphon at the stich is called "Lucernarium," an allusion to the name.

Saturdays and Sunday is :
 O Lord light my candle; O Lord my light to be light.

On Lord's day, the priest says "O Lord my God make my darkness

O Lord," &c.

On week days :

On the strength of my life: of whom then is my light," &c.

On the responses also begins the "Paternoster," said secretly by the priest, "In nomine Christi lumen cum pace. R. he "Lauda" which, with its follows, has reference to of precisely the same character "lucernarium."

On the hymn attributed by some to is qui certis legibus noctem " said in the Mozarabic

On the word by Goar (p. 29). "Canonum may be sufficiently nearly repre-

On the sity in understanding these direc- "wisdom," &c., occurs earlier in than openest," &c.

On the συναπτῆ) is explained by Goar as (synapostas) for various persons and to one; whence the Greeks call it (synapte) collecta." Its form is that of a leaf, repeated after each clause called great and small, one is Prayers of this character are also of length, sometimes also circumplex, on they contain six or seven, or eight by the deacon. They are of and occur very frequently in the earliest form of a synapte is given in the edition, viii. v.

breviary on the second Sunday in Lent, is headed in a hymnary printed by Thomasius, vol. ii., "recedente sole, ac die cessante, hora incensum Lucernae;" and the hymn of Prudentius, "Inventor rutili Dux bove fulminis," is called "Hymnus ad incensum Lucernae." This is the ordinary opinion. Lesley, however, in the preface to the Mozarabic Missal, gives reasons derived from the composition of the hymn in favour of its having been composed, not for daily use, but for the lighting of the Paschal candle on Easter Eve. The hymn is said in the Mozarabic breviary on the Sunday after the Octave of the Epiphany, and, according to the Sarum and York rites, on Easter Eves at the benediction of the Paschal candle.

See also Martene, De Ant. Rit. iv. 42, &c.; Granello, Commen. in Brev. Rom. i. c. 38, &c.; Casali, de Veler. Sacr. Christ. Ritib. c. 44; Gavanti, sec. iv. c. 6.

Reference to the Lucernarium may be seen in the following collects, which are the first collects (orations) at vespers in the Ambrosian rite on an ordinary Wednesday and Friday.

On Wednesday.—Vespertinum incensum nostrum quaesumus Domine, clementer intende, ut ignitum eloquium tuum credentium corda purificet. Per Domianum.

On Friday.—Gratias tibi agimus, omnipotens Deus, quod declinante jam die, nos vespertini luminis claritate circumdas: petimus immensam clementiam tuam: ut, sicut nos hujus luminis claritate circumvallas, ita Sancti Spiritus tui lues corda nostra illuminare digneris. Per Domianum. [H. J. H.]

LAMPASACUS, COUNCIL OF (Lampsacon concilium), held at Lampskaki on the Hellespont, A.D. 364, as Agri shews. Orthodox bishops were invited to it; and it is described as a council of Homousians by Sozomen (vi. 7) if the reading is correct. But those who directed it must have been really Semi-Arians; for they professed to be partisans of the Homousian formula, and of the creed published at Antioch, besides siding with Macedonius by whom the godhead of the Holy Ghost was denied. What made Sozomen think well of them probably was that they were treated with marked favour by Valentinian; while they condemned the extreme party which Valens espoused, and which he ordered them into exile for dissenting from. On this too they seem to have despatched a still more orthodox account of themselves to Rome, which contained Liberius (Soc. iv. 12; comp. Mansi, iii. 378, and Roman Councils, 16). [E. S. FF.]

LANCE, HOLY (ἀγία λόγχη, cuttellus); a liturgical instrument of the Greek Church, in the shape of a small knife formed like a spear. The annexed representation from Goar gives its form. It is used in the common Greek rite in the preparatory office of prothesis to divide the Host from the holy loaf previous to consecration. This earlier fraction, the primitive antiquity of which is doubtful, is distinctly symbolical, and has no reference to the subsequent distribution, for which another fraction has always been made. The typical allusion to the circumstances of our Lord's Passion receives greater force and vividness in the Greek Church, from the use of the "holy spear" for the division of the loaf, as commemorative of the piercing of our Lord's body by the Roman soldier. The priest makes four cuts to separate the host from the oblation, and also stabs it more than once, accompanying

Λ Ο Ψ Χ Η
 The Holy Lance. (From Goar.)

every cut or stab with appropriate texts of Scripture, e.g. "He was led as a lamb to the slaughter;" "One of the soldiers with a spear pierced His side," &c.

The use of the holy spear is not found in the purely Oriental liturgies, e.g. those of the Syrians and Egyptians, a fact which leads Renaudot to question whether the rite is of primitive antiquity, since these churches borrowed their discipline from the Greek Church in the earliest ages. It is entirely unknown in the Western Church.

(Augusti, Handbuch, vol. ii. p. 751; Bona, Rer. Liturg. lib. i. c. xxv. § 6; Goar, Enchol. p. 116; Neale, Eastern Church, p. 342; Seudamore, Act. Euch. p. 539.) [E. V.]

LANCIANA, martyr at Amecia in Pontus, Aug. 18 (Mart. Hieron. D'Ach.). [E. B. B.]

LANDAFF COUNCILS OF (Landavensia concilia). Three such are given in Mansi (ix. 763 sqq.) dated A.D. 560; but, even if genuine, they were simply meetings of the bishop, his three abbats, and his clergy, for excommunicating or absolving great offenders: in the 1st see Mauric, in the 2nd Morgan, kings of Glamorgan; in the 3rd Gwaednerth, king of Gwent; all of them under Oudoceo third bishop of Landaff, and therefore scarcely before the 7th century. "The book, however, in which these records occur is a compilation of the 12th century" (Haddan and Stubbs, Councils and Documents, i., notes to pp. 125 and 147). [E. S. FF.]

LANDEBERT. [v. LAMBERT (1).]

LANDELIN, founder of the abbey of Lobbes, and of St. Crispin at Valenciennes, † June 15, A.D. 687 (v. Acta Sanctorum, Jun. iii. 538). [E. B. B.]

LANDERIC, bishop and founder of the Maison Dieu at Paris (7th cent.), † June 10 (v. Acta Sanctorum, Jun. ii. 280). [E. B. B.]

LANDOALD, apostle of Ghent, commemorated March 19 (v. Acta Sanctorum, Mar. iii. 35), also June 10 (MS. Kal. Belg.). [E. B. B.]

LANDRADA, abbess of Bilsen under Lambert, † July 8 (Acta Sanctorum, Jul. ii. 619). [E. B. B.]

LANDRIC, bishop of Metz, c. 700, † Apr. 17 (Acta Sanctorum, Apr. ii. 483). [E. B. B.]

LANDS OF THE CHURCH. [PROPERTY OF THE CHURCH.]

LANDULF, bishop of Erreux, Aug. 13 (7th century) (Mart. Hieron. D'Ach.), called Landulf, Acta Sanctorum, Aug. iii. 96. [E. B. B.]

LANDUS. [v. LANNUS.]

LANIPENDIA. In the Rule of Caesarius for Virgins (c. 27 in Acta SS. Jan. i. p. 732) the care of the wool from which the sisters' habits were to be made is committed to the care of the superior (præpositæ) or the lanipendia, the sister appointed to take charge of the woollen manufacture. The word is used in a similar sense by Paulus, Digest. 24, 1, 38. [C.]

LANISTA. (1) A trainer of gladiators, who frequently contracted for the supply of swordsmen for Roman spectacles. The horror which the Christians felt for GLADIATORS [see the word] was of course intensified in the case of one who was regarded as a trader in man's flesh, and as necessary to murder. Thus Tertullian (de Idol. c. 11) says that if homicides are excluded from the church, lanistæ are of course excluded. What they had done by the hands of others, they must be reputed to have done themselves.

Prudentius (c. Symonach. ii. 1093), speaking of the inhumanity of the vestals in going to the gladiatorial shows, seems to use lanista in the sense of a gladiator simply:

"sedet illa verendis

Vittarum insignis phaleris fruiturque lanista."

(2) The word lanista was sometimes used contemptuously by Christian writers to designate a priest who actually slew victims with his hands. Thus Ennodius of Ticino († 521), in his sermon on the dedication of a church of the Apostles on the site of an idol's temple (Dict. ii.; in Migne, Patrol. 63, p. 268 C), speaks of the multitude of victims slain by the butcher-priests (ver lanistas). He even speaks of the priest under the Mosaic law as "lanista Judaicus." (Lend. Cerei, Opusc. ix. 260 B.)

(Bingham's Antiq. XVI. x. 13; Macri Hierozet. s. v. Lanista.) [C.]

LANITANUS or LAMTANUS, martyr at Thessalonica, June 25 (Mart. Hieron. D'Ach.).

[E. B. B.]

LANNUS, martyr at Horta in Italy, May 5 (c. A.A. SS. May, ii. 49; compare p. 9*).

[E. B. B.]

LANTA, martyr, May 31 or June 1 (Mart. Hieron. D'Ach.).

[E. B. B.]

LANTERN. [IN ARCHITECTURE.] The elevated portion of the fabric covering the intersections of the nave and transepts of a church. In the earlier churches of the domical or basilican plan the cruciform arrangement is not of frequent occurrence; where it is met with it is sometimes merely indicated by the position of the columns, no corresponding alteration being made in the roof. Sometimes the transept takes the form of another nave with its own continuous roof placed at right angles to the true nave, from which it is separated by the "arch of triumph." Neither of these arrangements allows of the introduction of a lantern. The earliest examples of this feature are met with in the Lombard churches, especially those of Pavia, in which a combination was attempted of the long nave and aisles of the old basilicas, and the dome of the Byzantine churches. The section of St. Michael's, at Pavia [GALLERY, I. 706], affords a very good example of this combination. We there see the centre of the cross elevated into a low octagonal tower, covered with a tiled roof containing a hemispherical cupola, supported on arched pendentives. We have a similar arrangement in the churches of San Pietro in cielo d'oro, built by king Luitprand, after A.D. 712, and San Teodoro, c. 750, in the same city. This novel feature speedily found general favour, and by the influence of the Carolingian kings of Italy, the Lombard style having passed into the Rhenish provinces and into France, the lantern was universally adopted in later churches. [E. V.]

LAODICEA, COUNCILS OF (Laodivena Concilia).

(1) Held at Laodicea, in Phrygia, whither St. Paul, according to the inference drawn from Col. iv. 16, addressed a letter now lost (Westcott, Canon. p. 408, and App. E.): and St. John a remonstrance, as one of the churches named in the Apocalypse. Its date has been much canvassed. It was once thought contemporary with the council of Neo-Cæsarea, and prior to that of Nicea. Beveridge says the mention of the Photinians in the 7th canon negatives this, as there was no such sect then. But Ferrandus the deacon, in quoting this canon, omits the Photinians. The Isidorian version does the same. Besides, the classing of Photinians, who were fell heretics, between the Novntians and Quartodecimans, who were merely schismatics, in a canon where no others are named, seems more the act of a scribe than a council. Dionysius, however, bears out the Greek. On other grounds it may be said that these canons, having been from the earliest times placed after the canons of Antioch in the code of the church, we can hardly date them earlier than A.D. 341; and if their connexion with a council of Illyria, suggested by Beveridge (Annot. p. 193), and with the semi-Arian bishop Theodosius, suggested by Godfrey (ad Philostorg. viii. 3-4), be allowed, probably not earlier than A.D. 375 [ILLYRIAN COUNCIL, I. 813]. It would be thus a semi-Arian council, like that of Antioch, whose canons were received ultimately by the church for their intrinsic worth. We will consider the form in which they have come down to us further on. They were 59 in number, all on discipline: but the 59th, when given in full, is sometimes divided, so as to form a 60th.

By the 1st second marriages may be condoned after a time. By the 11th the appointment of female presbyters (επισβύριδες) is forbidden. Fourteen canons, beginning with the 14th, relate to services in church, and should all be studied, particularly the 19th, which is a locus classicus on the ordering of the liturgy. The 35th seems directed against the errors which St. Paul condemns (Col. ii. 18). The 45th forbids baptizing after the second week in Lent. The 46th appoints Maundy Thursday for the redditio symboli. The 50th forbids the breaking of the Lenten fast on that day. By the 52nd weddings and birthdays are not to be celebrated in Lent. By the 57th bishops are not to be ordained in future to villages and country places: and all who have been are to do nothing without leave from the city bishop. The presbyters destined to be their substitutes are to be similarly bound.

And now comes the 59th canon, of which there is a shorter and a longer form: the longer con-

its longer or its shorter form, it was certainly not confirmed to the exclusion of the Apocalypse from the church catalogue.

2. A.D. 481-2, at which Stephen junior, who had been elected to the see of Antioch, but thrust out on false charges, was restored (Mansi, vii. 1021). [E. S. Fr.]

LAOSYNACTES (λαοσυνάκτης), an official of the patriarchal church of Constantinople, whose business it was to assemble the deacons and take care that they attended to their duties. (Suicer, Theaurus, s. v.) [C.]

LAPETA, COUNCIL OF (Lapetense Concilium), one of three synods held A.D. 495, or thereabouts, under Barsumas, Nestorian archbishop of Nisibis, at Lapeta, near Bagdad. Three canons are given to it; but a thirteenth has been cited. By the third of them all the clergy, as well as the laity, are permitted to marry at their discretion (Mansi, viii. 143, et seq.) [E. S. Fr.]

LAPIDES SACRI. I. Bounds or landmarks, so called because originally consecrated to Jupiter by Numa Pompilius (Festus, s. v. Terminus).

They must be distinguished from the milestones or milliaria, which were also known as lapides. (Dict. of GR. AND ROM. ANT. art. Milliare; Terminalia.)

The reverence for boundaries was, however, of far older growth. The Mosaic law forbade the removal of a landmark (Deut. xxvii. 17). Josephus (Antiq. Jud. lib. i. c. 2) attributes the first use of boundaries to Cain.

Among the Greeks landmarks were commonly put under the protection of some divinity (Plato, de Leg. viii.; Ulpian, Collat. Leg. Mosaic. xii.; Paulus, Sentent. i. 16, and v. 22, 2).

Caius Caesar (A.D. 37-41), in his agrarian law, imposed a fine on those who should remove landmarks, dolo malo, of fifty aurei, to go to the state (Digests, lib. xvii.; tit. de Termino Moto, 22, n. 3).

Nero (A.D. 54-68) ordered the slave who should commit this offence to be put to death, unless his master would pay the penalty (ib. and see Callistratus, de Cognitionibus, lib. 3, 5).

Hadrian (A.D. 117-138) promulgated a law punishing the offence with various periods of imprisonment, with forced labour or with stripes, according to the position and age of the offender (ib. n. 2).

In the Corpus Juris Civilis a great mass of references has been collected by way of commentary on these laws, which may be consulted with advantage.

Later codes are much less distinct than the foregoing in their provisions, and less severe. In the code of Theodosius, A.D. 438 (lib. ix. tit. 1; de Accusatione, lib. 1), we have merely, "qui fines aliquos invaserit, publicis legibus subjugetur."

Similarly in that of Justinian, A.D. 529 (lib. ix. tit. 2, de Accusationibus et Inscriptionibus), "eos qui terminos effuderunt, extraordinaria animadversione coerceri debent, praesens provincia non ignorabit."

II. This phrase is also employed to censure the effacing of the ancient boundaries of dioceses, by bishops desirous of extending their jurisdiction. Pope Innocent (A.D. 402-417), in one of his letters (Ep. 8, ad Florentinum), reminds the bishop to whom he wrote that the Scriptures forbade the removing of boundaries, and that therefore he should abstain from endeavouring to reduce others under his rule. In this sense we find pope Leo I. (A.D. 440-461) also writing to Anastasius, bishop of Thessalonica (Ep. l. c. 8): "Suis igitur terminis contentus sit quisque, nec supra mensuram juris sui aliequet augeri."

Among the False Decretals are to be found many instances of the employment of the phrase in this symbolic sense, which is so far an evidence of usage at the time when they were concocted.

III. In the record of the proceedings of the second Nicene Council, A.D. 787, we find sacred images or statues referred to under this phraseology. [S. J. E.]

LAPSI. The term applied to Christians who in time of persecution denied their faith. In the early persecution under Domitian, A.D. 95-6, when it may be presumed that all who had been converted to Christianity had counted the cost of their profession, the name does not occur. But the severe onslaught on Christianity which was made a century later, in the reign of Severus, found the Christians less prepared to resist unto blood in behalf of their religion. Some bribed the soldiers and accusers to overlook them, others paid a sort of periodical tax to secure toleration. The exemption thus purchased, though stopping short of a positive lapse, was at best a compromise; and although the usage was permitted by some bishops, it, like flight in time of persecution, was abhorrent to the rigid Montanism of Tertullian (Tertull. de Fugâ in Persecutione, ec. 12, 13). The next persecution was that under the emperor Decius, A.D. 249-51. It was a systematic attempt to eradicate Christianity, not so much by putting its adherents to death, as by compelling them to recant. Participation in a heathen sacrifice was the test ordinarily applied. And the shameful eagerness with which Christians rushed to purge themselves by this test, and even carried their infants with them, is disclosed by Cyprrian (de Lapsis, ec. 8, 7). Multitudes also only avoided the actual sacrifice by bringing certificates [LIBELLI] from the magistrates to the effect that they had offered. During the troubles of the church under Valerian, A.D. 258-60, instances of recantation were far more rare. But in the final persecution, which began under Diocletian, A.D. 303, and raged with intense severity until the edict of Constantine establishing religious equality, A.D. 313, the Christians were exposed to a new trial, to which numbers succumbed. An attempt was made to extirpate the sacred scriptures, and the lapsi who delivered up their books were branded with the name of TRANSTORES.

The treatment of the lapsed who had polluted themselves with Paganism in the Decian persecution occupies a considerable part of the Epistles of Cyprrian. His treatise de Lapsis, written immediately after the termination of the persecution, is an appeal to them to seek readmission into the church by penitence. The terms however on which they should be admitted were not easily decided. Cyprrian him-accents (A.D. 402-417), in one of his sermons, de Flowentium, reminds the congregation that the Scriptures are not to be moved of boundaries, and that he would abstain from endeavouring to alter under his rule. In this sense also I (A.D. 440-461) also writing to the bishop of Thessalonica (Ep. l. c. 8): "I am firmius contentus sit quisque, nec quicquam iuris an affectet augeri." False Decretals are to be found in the collection of the employment of the phrase "lapsed," which is so far an evident error at the time when they were record of the proceedings of the council, A.D. 787, we find several references referred to under this phrase—

[S. J. E.]

The term applied to Christians who had renounced their faith. In the time of the emperor Domitian, A.D. 95-6, it was presumed that all who had returned to Christianity had counted the price of their profession, and the name does not occur. In the reign of the Christians less prepared to defend in behalf of their religion, soldiers and accusers to the emperor were paid a sort of periodical tax to exempt them from the punishment of stepping short of a positive confession, and although sometimes permitted by some bishops, it was in the time of persecution, was abbreviated and contemptuous of Tertullian (Tertullianus de Spectatione, cc. 12, 13). The next year that under the emperor Domitian, it was a systematic attempt to purge the Church, and even carried to the death, as by compelling them to offer a heathen sacrifice was applied. And the shameful punishment which Christians rushed to die, and even carried to purge their names, is disclosed by Cyprian (de Multitudine) also only avoided the punishment by bringing certificates from the magistrates to the effect that they were not persecuted. During the troubles of Valerian, A.D. 258-60, instances were rare for more rare. But in the reign which began under Diocletian, persecuted with intense severity until Constantine establishing religious freedom, the Christians were exposed to which numbers succumbed. It was made to extricate the sacred name the lapsi who delivered up their names with the name of TRADItion of the lapsed who had polluted their names by Paganism in the Decian persecution a considerable part of the Church. His treatise de Lapsis, written after the termination of the persecution, an appeal to them to seek restoration to the church by penitence. The manner on which they should be admitted was easily decided. Cyprian himself had gone into concealment while the persecution was hottest, a course which somewhat compromised him in the eyes of the Roman clergy (Ep. viii.), but which he defended on the ground that he had received a divine direction (Ep. xvi. 3), and that his presence only exasperated the fury of the populace (Ep. xx. 1, de Lapsis, c. 8). From his concealment he had to determine how the lapsed should be treated. The matter was complicated by a practice which appears to have originated in the African church during the Severan persecution (Tertullianus ad Martyr. c. 1), of confessors and martyrs giving letters of recommendation to penitents, requesting the bishops to shorten their penance. The practice was kept in some order by deacons checking them in the distribution of their favours (Ep. xv. 1). On the cessation of the Decian persecution the privilege was greatly abused; for not only were letters given to any penitent (albeit indiscriminately), but given in the names of martyrs who were dead (Ep. xvii. 1, 2), and given in such a form as to include the friends of the petitioner (Ep. xv. 3). The custom afterwards led to such disorders as to call for the interference of councils (Conc. Eborac. c. 25, 1 Conc. Arelat. c. 9). The holders of these letters demanded immediate communion, which some bishops, yielding to the popular clamour, granted (Ep. xxvii. 3). The decision of Cyprian was that the holders of letters of martyrs who were pressed by sickness, might be at once restored after confession, even before a deacon if death was imminent (Ep. xviii.) and after imposition of hands (Ep. xix.); but that the rest must wait till tranquillity was restored and "the bishops meeting with the clergy and in the presence of the laity who stood fast," could grant them the public peace of the church. If any meanwhile received the lapsed into communion, they should themselves be excommunicated (Ep. xxiv. lv. 3). This decision was announced to the Roman clergy (Ep. xxvii.) and to the confessors at Rome (Ep. xxviii.) and met with the approval of the Roman church (Ep. xxx.). In the spring of 251 Cyprian returned to Carthage, and in a council with his bishops (Ep. lv. 4), made a formal investigation into the case of the lapsed. The conclusion announced was that libellatics were to be received at once (Ep. lv. 14); that some who had once sacrificed, but when put to the trial a second time, rather endured banishment and confiscation of goods, were likewise to be restored (Ep. xxiv. xxv.); that others who had at first confessed Christ, and when afterwards exposed to torture denied Him, and had been doing penance for three years, should no longer be excluded (Ep. lvi.); and that those who were sick should receive penance early at the point of death (Ep. lvii. 1). Of the remainder, the penance should be long protracted, but the hope of ultimate communion not denied (Ep. lv. 4). These decisions were also submitted to Rome, and accepted by Cornelius in a largely-attended synod (Ep. lv. 5). So matters remained till the following year, when Cyprian receiving, as he intimated, a divine warning of the renewal of the persecution, announced to Cornelius that a Carthaginian synod had resolved to receive into communion all the lapsed who desired to return (Ep. lvii.).

CHRIST. ANT.—VOL. II.

It was on the solution of these questions that Novatian broke away from the church. At the beginning of the difficulty two letters attributed to him (Ep. xxx. xxxvi. apud Cyp.) requested that the lapsed who were sick might be restored to communion. But afterwards, when his notions had become more rigid, he took up the position that the church had no power to restore them on any terms; he did not deny repentance could ever lead to a re-admission to church communion. A lapsus by a unanimous decree of the Western church was debarred from ordination (Ep. lxvii. 6). And a priest who lapsed was restored only to lay communion. Cyprian indignantly repudiates the libel that the lapsing priest Trophimus was allowed after due penitence to resume his sacerdotal functions (Ep. lv. 8). But in troubled times these rules could not always be enforced (Bingham, Antiq. VI. il. 4). [Compare LIBELLATI.] [G. M.]

LARGIO, martyr at Augsburg, Aug. 12, Usuard (from Acts of St. Africa). He may be the same as the martyr, and Augsburg a mistake for August. [E. B. B.]

LARGUS, martyr on Salarian Way, translated to Ostian Way by pope Marcellus; commemorated March 16 (Mart. Rom. Gell., Bede, Ado, Usuard, Wandl.); and Aug. 8 (Kal. Bucher, Mart. Hieron. D'Ach., Gell., Mart. Ado, Usuard.) (others do not name him this day); and (2) martyr in the East, Aug. 9 (Mart. Hieron.); and (3) at Aquileia, Mart. 16 (Usuard), 17 (Hieron. D'Ach.) are probably the same. Is the name Aquileia introduced from the martyrdom of Hilary? [E. B. B.]

LARNAX (Λάρναξ) is sometimes used for a coffin. Thus the author of the life of St. Martina of Rome (Acta SS. Jan. i. p. 18) says that her body was placed in a coffin or shrine of oxyc (onychinum larnacem). Compare Torrigi de Cryptis Vaticanois, p. 551, 2nd ed. (Mart. Hieron. s. v. Larnax). [C.]

LASCO, martyr in Asia, Feb. 23 (cod. Usuard. Marchian.). D'Achery's edition of the Mart. Hieron. has Cosco. It may be the name of a place, or a confusion with Grisco. [E. B. B.]

LASREN, Lasrian, Laisrenn, Molaisi, Dolaisi, are forms of a name under which are distinguished or confounded—(1) son of Nadfrach, abbat of Devenesh, on Lough Erne, d. Sept. 12, 563, commemorated at Belach Ui Michen, Sept. 15. (2) or Lazarinus, abbat of Durrow, 3rd abbat of Iona, d. Sept. 16, A.D. 605. (3) at Men (in Queen's Co.?), Sept. 16. (4) on Lough Laogh in Ulster, Oct. 25. (5), (6), (7), (8), Dec. 26, Jan. 17 and 19, March 8. (9) son of Caire, hermit at Lamhush, on coast of Arran, abbat of Rathkill and Leighlin, consecrated bishop at Rome † 639, commemorated April 18 (Mart. Donegal, p. 105, Bp. Forbes, Kalendaris of Scotch Saints, p. 407 (who names him Molio, because a cave at Lamhush is called St. Molio's cave); Acta SS. Holland. Apr. ii. 540). (10) abbat of Innis Murray, † Aug. 12, v. Reeves, Adamnan, p. 287. [E. B. B.]

LASREN, ORDER OF, or Molaisi, one of the eight orders of Irish monks. This Lasren was either (1) celebrated for love of a stone prison and of hospitality, or (2) "a flame of fire with his comely choristers." (Martyrology of Donegal, Dublin, 1864, pp. 245-247.) [E. B. B.]

LASSARA, virgin, Jan. 29 (Colgan, AA. SS. Hibern.). Thirteen others are commemorated in the Mart. Donegal, q. v. [E. B. B.]

LATERAN, COUNCIL OF (Lateranense Concilium), held A.D. 649, soon after the accession of pope Martin, in the church called Constantine's, at his palace on the Lateran, and chronologically the first of that name. Its deliberations were purely doctrinal and antimonotheistic. Its acts have come down to us in Greek as well as in Latin, though Latin was, of course, the language employed. The Greek documents are said to have been translated into Latin in each case by one of the Roman notaries, before they were read out; letters from the African church, being in Latin, were read out as they stood. The number of bishops subscribing to it was 106, almost all Italians, including the pope; and of its sessions, or secretaries—so called from being held in the sacristy—five. The first was opened by a speech from the pope, followed by a letter to him from Maurus, bishop of Ravenna, to the same effect, which was read and approved. At the second, other orthodox documents addressed to himself or his predecessor were recited. At the third, writings of a contrary description, by Theodore, bishop of Pharan, and the patriarchs of Alexandria and Constantinople, Cyrus and Sergius, together with the Ecthesis of the emperor Heraclius, inspired by the latter, were pronounced and reflected upon. At the fourth, after some further comments on what had been read at the third, two more documents of the same kind were rehearsed:—1, a letter of Paul, actual patriarch of Constantinople, to the late pope Theodore; and 2, the Type of Constans, the reigning emperor. Both having been pronounced unsound, codices of the dogmatic rulings of each of the previous five general councils were produced from the papal archives and read out in answer to them all. Among these was the celebrated ordinance at the end of the definition of the fourth council, on the unalterableness of the creed. Attention was again directed in the last session to that subject, by reciting what the fifth council had said of its entire agreement with the other four, and with all the great fathers and doctors of the church; extracts from whom were then read, to show their harmony with each other. Similarly, passages were produced afterwards from the works of earlier heretics, to expose their agreement with the errors that were now broached. Twenty canons followed in condemnation of Monothelism and its patrons in the East, who are several times mentioned by name; complete reserve being maintained about pope Honorius throughout. Letters to announce this result, or in connexion with this subject, were despatched by the pope to the emperor Constans, the metropolitans of Carthage and Philadelphia, and other churches of the East; besides an encyclic to the faithful in general. In all of them he styles himself "servus servorum Dei." Maurus, bishop of Ravenna, it should be added, in writing to him, arrogates the same style. (Mansi, x. 789-1188.) [E. S. Ff.]

LATERCULUS. A tile or earthenware tablet on which the times of the moveable festivals, or at least of Easter, were inscribed, with the view of giving public notice of them. Thus the 4th council of Orleans (A.D. 541) enacted (c. 1) that Easter should be celebrated according to the laterculus or cycle of bishop Victorius. That confusion arose in Spain at a somewhat later date from the difference of the Paschal-cycles in use (diversa observantia laterculorum) is evident from the 5th canon of the 4th council of Toledo (A.D. 633), which enjoins the several metropolitans, three months before Epiphany, to consult each other, and when they have ascertained the proper day for the celebration of Easter to signify it to their provincial metropolitans. [C.]

(Maeri Hierolex. n. v. Laterculus.) [C.]
LATIN, USE OF [LITURGICAL LANGUAGE.]

LATINA, martyr, June 2 (Mart. Hieron. D'Ach.). [E. B. B.]

LATINUS, bishop of Brescia (2d century), March 24 (Acta Sanctorum, March, iii. 473). [E. B. B.]

LATOPOLIS, COUNCIL OF (Latopolitana Concilium), A.D. 317, at Latopolis, in Upper Egypt, at which St. Pachomius was put on his defence. (Mansi, iii. 141.) [E. S. Ff.]

LATROCINALIS is a name given to the avoal which met at Ephesus A.D. 449 [EPHESUS, COUNCIL OF (6), I. 615]. It was also applied by pope Nicolas to the "conciliumbulum" assembled by Photius, patriarch of Constantinople, in the year 863. [C.]

LATUNUS, first bishop of Seix in Normandy, † June 20 (Acta SS. Jun. v. 10). The name is almost certainly Teutonic. [E. B. B.]

LAUDA. (1) A short antiphon which occurs after the gospel in the Mozarabic mass. In the Regula prefixed to the breviary, a Lauda is thus distinguished from an antiphona—"Antiphona est, quae dicitur sine Alleluia; et Lauda quae cum Alleluia dicitur." But a lauda retains its name when Alleluia is omitted at the proper season. The Gospel is concluded with "Amen," and then after the salutation "The Lord be with you," R. "And with thy spirit," follows the Lauda. The normal form is a verse, usually, though not always, taken from the Psalms, preceded and followed by Alleluia. Thus the Lauda for Ascension Day is "Alleluia, V. God is gone up with a merry noise, and the Lord with the sound of the trump. Alleluia." After the first Sunday in Lent Alleluia is omitted till Easter Eve, when it is resumed; an additional lauda without Alleluia being said on that day after the Epistle. On the Thursday before Easter the Lauda is longer than usual, and consists of seven verses (not consecutive) of Ps. cviii. (cix. Eng. Ver.); and on Good Friday there is no Lauda, but Proces instead.

In the Ambrosian mass the corresponding antiphon is called Antiphona post Evangelium. In the Roman there is nothing which corresponds, and the Creed follows the Gospel immediately.

(2) An antiphon of the same character as the foregoing, but longer, and broken up into verse

US. A tile or earthenware of the movable feasts of Easter, were inscribed, with public notice of them. Thus Orleans (A.D. 541) enacted should be celebrated according to the cycle of bishop Victorius, as in Spain at a somewhat later period of the Paschal-cycles in (Evantia Intercolonaria) is evident canon of the 4th council of (383), which enjoins the several months before Epiphany, and when they have proper day for the celebration to be to their provincial

z. s. v. Laterculus. [C.]
OF [LITURGICAL LANGUAGE].

artyr, June 2 (Mart. Hieron. [E. B. B.]
bishop of Brescia (2nd century), Sancorum, March, iii. 473). [E. B. B.]

COUNCIL OF (Latopoli-), A.D. 347, at Latopolis, in which St. Pachomius was put (Mansi, iii. 141.) [E. S. FF.]

ALIS is a name given to the at Ephesus A.D. 449 (EPIPHANES, I. 615). It was also applied to the "conciliabulum" otius, patriarch of Constantinople. [C.]

first bishop of Seix in Nor- (Acta SS. Jun. v. 10). The rntly Teutonic. [E. B. B.]

A short antiphon which gospel in the Mozarabic mass, eized to the breviary, a lauda hael from an antiphona—"Antiphona sine Alleluia; et lauda dicitur." But a lauda retains Alleluia is omitted at the proper pel is concluded with "Amen," e salutation "The Lord be with thy spirit," follows the mal form is a verse, usually, s, taken from the Psalms, preid by Alleluia. Thus the lauda y is "Alleluia, V. God is gone noise, and the Lord with the up. Alleluia." After the first Alleluia is omitted till Easter resumed; an additional lauda being said on that day after the Thursday before Easter (the ven usual), and consists of several of Ps. cviii. (six. Eng. cod Friday there is no lauda, i.

an mass the corresponding antiphona post Evangelium. In is nothing which corresponds, lows the Gospel immediately, n of the same character as the ger, and broken up into vers and response, several of which occur in the day-hours of the Mozarabic breviary. They vary with the office of the day. They are thus said:—

At Vespers, two; one at the beginning of the office, short, and usually with a reference to the time of day; the other before the hymn, somewhat longer, and with "Glory and honour," &c. (q), introduced before the last clause. Also at the close of the office after the benediction, additional lauda are found. Most frequently one, though often two or more (for instance, on the third Sunday in Lent there are as many as six), each followed by a short prayer (oratio), generally a reproduction of the sentiment of the lauda. These correspond in some measure to the Commemorations of the Roman breviary.

At lauda two are said in the course of the office, and one, or sometimes more, each with its prayer at the end, as at vespers.

At each of the lessor hours, except compline, when there is none, a lauda is said before the hymn. This is the general arrangement, but there are of course exceptions. There is also a short "commemoration" (of the time of day) after vespers and lauda daily, which consists of a short lauda and a prayer.

As specimens of the ordinary form of lauda, those for the first verses of the first Sunday in Advent may be given:—

Lauda at the beginning of the Office.—"From the rising up of the Sun, unto the going down of the same. P. The Lord's name be praised. V. Blessed be the name of the Lord, from this time forth for evermore."

[This lauda never has "Alleluia."] Before the Hymn.—"Alleluia. Send us help from the sanctuary; and strengthen us out of Sion, O Lord." P. When we call upon thee, Alleluia, Alleluia. V. We will rejoice in thy salvation, and triumph in the name of the Lord our God. P. And strengthen us out of Sion, O Lord. V. Glory and honour, &c. P. When we call upon thee." [H. J. H.]

LAUDACIA (Mart. Gell.); Laudaia (Hieron. D'Ach.); martyr, July 26. Probably a copyist's error for the place Laudicea. [E. B. B.]

LAUDACUS. [LAUDICEUS.]

LAUDANA or LAUDUNA. In Anastasius Vitas Pontiff. (s. v. Adrian, § 325, Migne), we read that pope Adrian made two "laudans" of silver, weighing eight pounds each, which he placed over the RUOAE [probably doors or curtains] of the presbytery, where the silver arch is. Calepinus supposes these laudnae to have been rods or cornices of silver; but in fact their nature and use appear to be altogether matter of conjecture.

(Macri Hierolex.; Ducange, Gloss. s. v.) [C.]

* The Mozarabic form of the Gloria Patri is "Gloria et Honor Patri et Filio et Spiritui Sancto in saecula saeculorum." The word Honor was added at the fourth council of Toledo, the addition being justified by the words of Ps. 29 [E. V. 29] v. 2, "Afferte Dominio gloriam et honorem," &c., and by the description of praise in Apoc. v. 12, "Hicurus est Agnus... accipere honorem et gloriam et benedictionem" (Brevia Musae Musae abum Explicatio, A. Lorenzana).

* Title "P" is explained by Arevalus as Psalmus. It has also been taken to stand for Presbyter.

LAUDENIUM (also written Laudinium). The name which is given to the price which a farmer or a vassal paid to the owner or feudal lord of the land on being invested with the possession of a copyhold tenure (EMPHYTEUSIS), or on a renewal of the investiture; or for the right of alienating the fief to another. "Concessimus quod de feodis et retrofeodis: in emphiteosis . . . datis . . . nulla financia debeatur, nisi seu fuerint castra, ville, seu loca alia . . . quo a nobis in feulium vel homagium, seu ad servitium aliud teneantur, de quibus alienationem fieri volumus sine nostro Laudemio, aut nostra gratia speciall." (Præcep. Lud.: x. F. Reg., quoted by Ducange.) The amount of the Laudemium of the estimated value of the property at the time of entering or renewal: and in Bavaria, amount to 5 per cent. of that value. The law and introduced into ecclesiastical law with but slight modification of the civil procedure. The object of emphyteusis was always real property, usually land, but it might be a building. The owner of the property was called dominus emphyteusis; and the tenant, emphyteusarius, or emphyteuta.

The word laudes is used in a similar sense for the price paid by a vassal to his feudal lord for the power of alienating his fief to another; and laudus in the sense of receiving such laudes. The words laudimium and laudes both imply the consent and approbation which the feudal lord gives to the translation. (v. Ducange in loco, Pichler, Jus Can. lib. ii. lit. xvii. 24, &c.)

[H. J. H.]

LAUDICEUS, bishop, buried in the cemetery of Callistus, and perhaps after the time of Sixtus III. commemorated, with the other popes and bishops there buried, on Aug. 9 (De Rossi, Roma Sott. li. 33-46, 228, 229).

[E. B. B.]

LAUDOMAR [v. LAUNOMARUS].

LAUDS (1), see HOURS; OFFICE, THE DIVINE.

(2) Under the Lower Empire when public honour was done to a great personage; the acclamations of the people, which took a conventional shape, were called Laudes (Gr. πολυχόδιον). The customary formula under the heathen emperors may be learnt from the cries of the Roman army on an occasion mentioned by Lampridius (Vita Diocletian.): "Jupiter Optime Maxime, Macrinus et Antonino vitam. Tu scis, Jupiter, Macrinus vinci non potest. Tu scis, Jupiter, Antoninus vinci non potest" (Lindenberg, in Amman. Hist. xvii. 13). After a speech of Constantinus to his soldiers (A.D. 358) the whole assemblage of them, "voebus festis in laudes imperatoris assurgens, Denique ex usu testata non posse Constantium vinci, tentoria læta repetit" (Amman. u. s.). Whether they gave a Christian turn to the laudes or retained the old cry does not appear. The historian uses the word Deum in the case of Julian (363), whose soldiers would certainly appeal to Jupiter: "Principein superari non posse Deum usitato more testati" (xvii. 1); and it is worthy of note that the soldiers of Valens, when deserting to Procopius at Mlygdos in 365, called Jupiter to witness: "Teatati Jovem invictum Procopium"

fore" (ibid., xxvi. 6). The custom, however, at length assumed a Christian character, and was observed even in churches. When St. Augustine, in a synod held in the church of the Peace at Hippo, A.D. 426, proposed Eraclius as his coadjutor with right of succession, "a populo acclamatum est. Deo Gratias: Christo Laudes, dictum est vicies terties. Exaudi Christe, Augustino ius, dictum est sexies decies. Te patrem, te episcopum, dictum est octies" (August, Epist., 213, § 1). A similar instance occurs in the history of a synod held under Symmachus, who became pope in 498: "Exaudi, Christe. Symmacho papae vita sit," was repeated twelve times (Gratian, li. xvi. 57). About the year 520 we read of the legates of the bishop of Rome being met by Justin the emperor and Vitalian the consul, "cum gloria et laudibus" (Anast. Biblioth. Vitae Pont., R. n. 53; comp. nn. 84, 105; Greg. Tur. Hist. Franc., vi. 11). The portraits of the usurper Phocas and his wife were received with acclamations at Rome on April 25, 602, "in the basilic of Julius by all the clergy and senate," the cry being, "Exaudi, Christe. Phocae Augusto et Leontiae Augustae vita" (Relatio inter Epp. Greg. M. xl. 1; Labbe, Cono., v. 1509; comp. Vita Greg., auct. Joan. Diacon. iv. 20). On one of Charlemagne's visits to Rome Hadrian, while "celebrating masses to Almighty God, caused lauds to be paid to the aforesaid Charles" (Anast. u. s. n. 97). When the same prince was crowned by Leo III. on St. Peter's Day, 800, the lauds were, "Carolo piissimo Augusto a Deo coronato, magno, pacifico imperatori" (ibid., 98). After anointing him the pope said mass, or more probably proceeded with it—the account being thus continued: "Et peracta missa . . . obtulit hae," &c. From later authorities we learn that acclamations in a mass took place after the collect. See Martene, de Ant. Eccl. Rit., i. lv. iii. 13; Ordo Rom. xli. 1, 2, xlii. 7, 10 (ante epistolam post orationem), xiv. 31; in Mus. Ital. ii. They were at length formed into litanies to Christ and the saints—e.g. the priest says thrice and the clerks respond, "Christus vincit, Christus regnat, Christus imperat. Then the priest says, Exaudi Christe. The clerks answer, Nicolao summo Pontifici et universali papae vita. The litany follows. Salvator mundi, Tu illum adjuva. S. Petre, S. Paule, S. Andrea, &c. And the response to each is, Tu illum adjuva. Then follows, Exaudi Christe. Ludovico a Deo coronato, magno et pacifico regi vita et victoria. Redemptor mundi, Tu illum adjuva. S. Michael, S. Gabriel, S. Raphael, S. Joannes, &c., with the response to each, Tu illum adjuva;" and similarly for any number of persons, fresh saints being invoked for each (Bona, Res. Lit., ii. v. 8, from Goldastus, Antiq. Alem. ii. 2). Compare a form in Martene u.s. from a Solsons MS. Durandus (Pontificale MS. cited by Sala on Bona u. s.) speaks of lauds which began like the foregoing (Christus vincit, etc), as said after the collect, but "immediately after the Kyrie eleison." [W. E. S.]

LAUDULF [v. LANDULF].

LAUNOMARUS, abbat, † at Dreux, Jan. 19 (8th or 7th century), Usuard (Wandelbert ?), v. Acta SS., Jan. ii. 593. [E. B. B.]

LAURA. The small monastic communities in Egypt, Palestine, and Syria, called Lauras, are a connecting link in the history of the rise and progress of monachism, between the solitary asceticism of the hermitage and the more organized, less self-dependent asceticism of the monastery. A laura was an aggregation of separate cells, under the not very strongly defined control of a superior, the inmates meeting together only on the first and last days, the old and new Sabbaths, of each week for their common meal in the refectory, and for their common worship in the chapel attached to each of these lauras. On the other days of the week they dwelt apart from one another, each in the silence and solitude of his cell, subsisting on bread and water, the ordinary fare of the primitive founders of monasticism. The cells, though separate, were in close proximity to one another, like the wigwags of an Indian encampment, and all clustering round the chapel of the community. (Bened. Anian. Concord. Regul. Menardi Comment. lll. l.; Du Cange, Glossar. Lat. s. v. Laura; Joan. Hierosol., 3 it. Joan. Damasc. p. 693.) Usually each cell contained one inmate only; but under Pachomius, in Tabenna, three resided together in each cell (Sozom. H. E. li. 14).

The origin of the word "Laura" is uncertain. By one account it is Ionie (Du Cange, Glossar. Gr., s. v.); by another, it is a contraction of the Greek for labyrinth (λαβύρινθος) and expressive of the narrow pathways winding in and out among the cells ("wynds"); more probably it is another form of "labra" (ἀδύρα), the popular term in Alexandria for an alley or small court. (Suicer, Theas. Eccles., s. v.; Euphian. Hieros. xlix.) The worst explanation of the word is that which derives it from "of Aool ἰόσσει," as if it were a thoroughfare, along which a crowd streams.

One of the most celebrated lauras was one founded by Chariton, a hermit, at Pharan, near Jerusalem (Bulteau, Hist. de l'Ordre de S. Benoît, l. l.). Others are recorded to have been founded in the 5th century by Sabas, a celebrated desert-saint, Gerasimus, Euthymius and the empress Eudocia.

As the coenobitic life became more prevalent, young and inexperienced monks were discouraged generally from venturing on the solitary life without previous training with other monks, under the authority and supervision of an abbat. Thus Euthymius advised the youthful Sabas to quit his separate cell in the laura, and to join a coenobium for a time (Cyril. Seythopol. Vit. S. Sab.). Gerasimus is said to have established a coenobium in the midst of his laura (Cyril. Seythopol. Vit. S. Euthym.).

Obviously life in a laura incurred a twofold danger, being exposed at the same time to the temptations peculiar to solitude, and to those which are incidental to a number of persons living together under no strict rule, without much restraint of any kind, and without the necessity of constant occupation. The denizens of a laura are sometimes termed "lauretae" (Mosch. Prat. cc. 3, 4); they have been compared to the "includi" of Western monachism, but there are many points of difference. [See INCLUSI.] [I. G. S.]

LAURENCE, ST. [IN ART]. St. Laurence usually carries a copy of the Gospels to denote

The small monastic communities of the East, and Syria, called Lauras, are taken in the history of the rise and development of monasticism, between the solitary ashermitage and the more organized and independent asceticism of the laura was an aggregation of under the not very strongly defined of a superior, the inmates meeting on the first and last days, the others, of each week for their common refectory, and for their common chapel attached to each of these on the other days of the week they met in his cell, subsisting on bread and wine, the primitive founders of the laura. The cells, though separate, were in proximity to one another, like the tents in an Italian encampment, and all were in the chapel of the community.

Concord. Regul. Menardi Comment. de Glosar. Lat. s. v. Laura; Joann. Joann. Damasc. p. 693.) Usually the inmates were one inmate only; but under the Emperor Theodosius, three resided together in the laura. H. E. iii. 14.

The word "Laura" is uncertain. It is from lauros (Du Cange, Glossar. Gr.), which is a contraction of the Greek λαβρινθος and expressive of the winding in and out among the rocks; or more probably it is another word (λαβρα), the popular term in an alley or small court. (Sulzer, v. s. v.; Euphan. Heret. xlix.) The etymology of the word is that which "of λαβρα," as if it were a place, along which a crowd streams.

The most celebrated laura was one of the desert, a hermit, at Pharos, near Antioch. Hist. de l'Ordre de S. Basile. Others are recorded to have existed in the 5th century by Sabas, a celebrated ascetic, Gerasimus, Euthymius and others.

The solitary life became more prevalent, and experienced monks were discouraged from venturing on the solitary life of the laura, and to those devoted to the solitary life of the laura, and to those devoted to a number of persons living under no strict rule, without much regard, and without the necessity of a superior. The denizens of lauras are termed "lauretae" (Moseh. Prot.), and they have been compared to the monks of the Western monachism, but there are many differences. [See INCLUSI.]

[I. G. S.]

LAURENCE, ST. [IN ART.] St. Laurence is represented as a copy of the Gospels to denote his office of deacon. In the church of St. Laurence, in Agro Verano, at Rome, there is a mosaic of the 6th century, representing the martyr with an open book in his hand, on which may be read the words "dispersit, dedit pauperibus" (Clampit. Vet. Mon. tab. lxxi. 2), in allusion to his kindness to the poor.

St. Laurence. From Martigny.

Like other martyrs he bears a cross, frequently jewelled (Ariughi, il. 354). In the basilica of Gallia Placida, at Ravenna, there is a mosaic showing him standing before the heated gridiron, holding the cross and the Gospels (Vet. Mon. i. lxxvii). On the bottom of a glass cup the sacred monogram, with A on one side and ω on the other, is placed behind the head of the saint (Bottari, tab. ccxviii). Sometimes we find him seated between St. Peter and St. Paul, as though the Apostles having introduced him into the heavenly city were giving him an honourable place therein (Buonarroti, p. 104). Another glass cup has the figure of the saint, with the legend Victor Vivas, in nomine Lavretti (Buonarroti, ix. 2); this cup may very likely have been used at an AGAPE on the martyr's day, which was observed at Rome with much solemnity. Lapi (Dissert. e Litt. i. 192-197) describes two ancient representations of the martyrdom of St. Laurence; one, a cameo, shews the saint stretched upon a gridiron, while two executioners stir the fire beneath, and a third brings wood to replenish it; in the other, a leaden medallion, we see the martyr at the moment of death, his soul, personified by a female figure, ascending with clasped hands, receives a crown from the outstretched arm which symbolises the Almighty; the emperor, laurelled and sceptred, is seated in a curule chair, and seems by his attitude to be giving directions; a slave stands by his side. Arevallo (in Prudent. p. 96) gives a glass which represents the martyr face downwards on the gridiron, his name LAVRECV being written above.

(Martigny, Dict. des Antiq. Chret. s. v.) [C.] LAURENCE (Laurentius, Lorenzo, Laurent, Louverij), chief deacon of Rome, broiled to death Aug. 10, A.D. 258.

The fact is not mentioned by extant writers till the middle of the 4th century, and yet had an immediate and wide-spread influence (which it will be the object of this article to trace) on the life of the church.

It may be taken as a typical instance of martyrdom, so that under this head it will be possible to gather specimens of all the honours that were paid to martyrs.

I. As administrator of the charities of the metropolitan church, Laurence is celebrated in ancient liturgies almost as much as for his sufferings. "He hath dispersed, he hath given to the poor," is quoted in the Greek cathisma, and is the introit in the Gregorian missal. The Mozarabic lessons, Eccles. xxxi. 5-12; 2 Cor. ix. 7-13; Matt. vi. 19-34, apply rather to the deacon than to the martyr, and there is the same epistle in the Ambrosian liturgy (Patrol. lxxxv. 811). Nor did he only administer temporal relief, but the reading of the Gospel and the cup of the Lord. Hence the late legend of his connexion with the Holy Grail. However he had died, all the Christians and all the poor of Rome would have felt his loss.

II. When such a man was stretched naked (ἀναθετός, lit. 'simplified', Menology of Basil) on an iron grating over a slow fire, and "his living limbs hissed over the coals" (the phrase is found also in the Roman Sacramentaries of Leo and of Gelasius, in the Mozarabic and the Gothic), the grief, the horror, the admiration, and the awe, would make it an anniversary never to be forgotten. The death by torture of a Roman citizen was not a common thing. It was a deed intended to strike terror far and wide.

III. His anniversary is fixed to Aug. 10 by the Feriale of Liberius (A.D. 354), and the universal consent of Western and Byzantine calendars, Aug. 11, if ever found, is merely a slip. In the metrical martyrology of Bede, for 'bissens,' read

"Bis binis victor superat Laurentius hostem."

The lectionary of Luxeuil and sacramentary of Bobbio are said to stand alone in the West in omitting Laurence (Patrol. lxxxv. 811). But as the same sacramentary commemorates Laurence daily in the ordinary mass, it is manifest that the omission only shews that Columban's monks had no special service for the day, not that they omitted the commemoration. He is found in the Feriale of Aengus the Culdee.

There does not seem to be the same general consent about any other festival of the church whatsoever.

IV. Prudentius, in his hymn for the day, declares that from that day forward the worship of the foul gods grew cold, that his death was the death of the temples (sept. aedificiorum, iii. 497, 509). The canon in the Greek liturgy speaks of him (ode 8) as "finally plucking down the memorial of the impious conceit of the erring."

If this be so, it is important to fix the epoch of his death. Now this may be done with certainty, though from the close of the 5th century onwards there was a wide-spread error as to the date, which referred it to the persecution of Decius. We are, however, enabled to correct the error by the abundant evidence that Laurence suffered a few days after pope Xystus or Sixtus II. And we know, from the contemporary evidence of Cyprinus, that Sixtus was executed on the 8th of August in the opening of the persecution of Valerian, A.D. 258 (Cypr. Ep. 82, ed. Migne). Cyprian himself suffered in the following month.

V. Now generally the Greek menologies, the Egyptian-Arabic menology (v. Acti SS. Aug. tom. ii. 125 b), the Spanish-Gothic calendar (Migne, Patrol. lxxxv. 1051), and the Mozarabic missal and breviary, transfer Xystus from the 6th to be subordinated to and celebrated along with Laurence on the 10th. This is the more remarkable, as Xystus is said to have been of Greek extraction, and as the Mozarabic lessons are concerned with the divouate of Laurence. The fact that while Ambrose has separate hymns (72, 73) for Sixtus and Laurence, Prudentius has only one for both, seems to shew that these were the primitive arrangements in Spain. They are quite peculiar to that country in the West. The Synaxarion in the menology of Basil makes Xystus say to Laurence, "To-morrow we are delivered up." But Prudentius (like Ambrose, de Off. i. 41) makes him predict the martyrdom of the latter after an interval of three days, c. 28.

VI. The canon in the Greek liturgy is addressed to Laurence alone, and consists of eight odes, 32 troparia on the ACROSTIC [see I. 14].

Λαυρέντιον κράτιστον ἡμῶν προφρόνως.

VII. In Ethiopia Laurence seems to be commemorated as Iavernius on Nahasse 15=Aug. 8 (v. Ludolf, Comm. Hist. Ethiop. p. 425). In the ancient Syrian martyrology, Sixtus is the only Roman martyr (see De Rossi, Roma Sotterranea, ii. 376). Eusebius in his history seems ignorant of the martyrdom even of Sixtus. Cyprian does not mention Laurence. The calendar of Carthage, like the rest of the West, distinguishes the festivals of Xystus and Laurence.

VIII. There is another saint joined with Laurence in the Greek liturgy, his jailor and convert Hippolytus, whose name seems to have suggested that he should be dragged along the ground by wild horses till he died:

τὸν Ἰππόλυτον ἰσχυροτέρων λόγων
ἐπιόντων πασχόντα τῇ κλίσει πάθος.

His death is clearly mentioned as subsequent to those of Laurence and Xystus. The calendar of Polemeus Silvius at Rome in A.D. 448, including nine only of the most popular festivals, omits Xystus, but inserts both Laurence and Hippolytus (Migne, Patr. Lat. xiii. 676).

IX. These two festivals were the great harvest home of the Roman church. St. Laurence's day is still the signal for burning the stubble in the Campagna (Knight, Latium, 3). So the rustics would perhaps be better able to resort to the city for the second festival, which is graphically described by Prudentius.

X. The Sacramentary of Leo has only one mass distinctly for Hippolytus's festival, but seven for Sixtus, and fourteen for Laurence. The 1st, 10th, and 12th of these seem to be for his vigil, for they speak of 'preventing' his day. There is also a mass for the vigil in the Sacramentaries of Gelasius and Gregory.

XI. In the Sacramentary of Gregory, two masses are given on the day itself, an early and a public mass. The Capitulare given in Martene (Thes. v. 76), which is referred by De Rossi to the opening year of Benedict II., gives the gospel for the vigil Blatt. xvi. 24-28; for the early mass Matt. x. 37-42; for the public mass John xii. 24-26. One of Augustine's sermons for the festi-tival (Sermon 305) is on the last-named gospel. Sermon 304 refers to Prov. xxiii. 1, 2 as the Old Testament lesson. Sermons 302 and 303 seem to refer to Matt. v. 12 and Luke xii. 19 as read in the gospel for the day, but the references may really be to Matt. x. 42 and Matt. xvi. 25, in which case the arrangements would be the same in Africa as at Rome, and Sermon 303, in which he complains of the small attendance and great heat, would be preached at the vigil. In the modern Roman missal the gospel is John xii. 24-26 still, and the epistle is abridged from that in the Mozarabic and Ambrosian liturgies. Chrysologus of Ravenna, in his 135th sermon, quotes Phil. i. 29 as part of the epistle for the day. This would be very applicable to the deacon in the absence of his bishop. To Maximus of Turin three homilies (74-76) and four sermons (70-73) on this feast are ascribed. The 3rd of these sermons (72) is word for word the same as is ascribed to Leo. Three times in the other sermons he quotes Luke xii. 49, which may have been one of the gospels read at the festival in Turin.

XII. The Sacramentary of Gelasius, though it does not give a second mass to the day, gives vesper collects such as this:—"May his blessing be with us in Thy glory whose confession in Thy virtue has to-day been made our plea." Cf. 2 Pet. i. 3.

XIII. The Sacramentary of Gregory does not give a special service for the octave. No more does the modern missal, though the day is still observed. This, and the octave of Peter and Paul, are the only two in Ueard. The permanence of his felicity is repeated in Leo and Gelasius the ground for a repeated memorial of it.

XIV. The Gothic missal has neither vigil nor octave. From the absence of a triple benediction the feast would seem to have been less important in France than those of Andrew, Stephen, John, the Holy Innocents, Cecilia and Clement. Neither Boniface nor Charlemagne prescribes it as a holiday (sabbatizandum), only Chrodegang names it among those on which there is to be full service (Biaterim, Denkwürdigkeiten, t. 5, pt. 1, p. 299). In this missal Sixtus and Hippolytus are not associated with Laurence on his day, but he is commemorated in the proper prefaces on theirs as well as on his own. The Sacramentary of Leo says much of Sixtus leading the way for his deacons, but it commemorates two others of them along with him. The Gothic missal applies the same thus: "He was an example to others, for Laurence followed." And on the 13th it says: "Whom Hippolytus was yet occupied in the tyrant's service of a sudden modest him the fellow of Laurence." So the Mart. Hieron., which belongs to Auxerre, names both Laurence and Hippolytus on the 6th, as well as on their own days.

XV. In the Greek church the triple festival falls within the octave of the Transfiguration, which is therefore commemorated on it. Hence in one échos the martyrdoms are viewed as themselves a theophany.

XVI. In the litany used at compline throughout Lent, in the Greek church, Laurence is named next to the Apostles and Stephen. He is invoked in the Breton Litany (Huddan and Stubbs, Councils, ii. 82). Also in the Coronation Litany (Muratori, Lit. Rom. ii. 463).

25) is on the last-named gospel. r. to Prov. xxiii. 1, 2 as the Oll. Sermons 302 and 303 seem to be 12 and Luke xii. 19 as read in tt. x. 42 and Matt. xvi. 25, in arrangements would be the same some, and Sermon 303, in which the small attendance and great preached at the vigil. In the missal the gospel is John xii. the epistle is abridged from that and Ambrosian liturgica, Chrysaost, in his 135th sermon, quotes part of the epistle for the day. very applicable to the deacon in a bishop. To Maximus of Turin (4-70) and four sermons (70-73) ascribed. The 3rd of these word for word the same as is Three times in the other sermons il, 49, which may have been one ad at the festival in Turin. namentary of Gelasius, though it second mass to the day, gives ch as this:—"May his blessing y glory whose confession in Thy been made our plea." Cf. 2 Pet.

ramentary of Gregory does not rices for the octave. No more missal, though the day is still and the octave of Peter and only two in Ueard. The per- felicity is made in Leo and ound for a repeated memorial ic missal has neither vigil nor the absence of a triple benedic- ould seem to have been less rance than those of Andrew, the Holy Innocents, Cecilia and er Boniface nor Charlemagne holiday (sabbatizandum), only es it among those on which ll service (Binterim, Denkwür- t. 1, p. 299). In this missal yltura are not associated with day, but he is commemorated efaces on theirs as well as on ramentary of Leo says much the way for his deacons, but it wo others of them along with o missal applies the same thus: mple to others, for Laurence on the 13th it says: "Who was yet occupied in the tyrant's en modest him the fellow of ne Mart. Hieron., which belongs es both Laurence and Hippo- as well as on their own days. eek church the triple festival octave of the Transfiguration e commemorated on it. Hence e martyrdoms are viewed as ophany.

any used at compline through- eek church, Laurence is omed stles and Stephen. He is in- on Litany (Haddan and Stubbs. Also in the Coronation Litany on. ii. 463).

XVII. He is commemorated in the ordinary canon of the mass, in the Gelasian, Frankish and Gregorian missals, and in that of Bobbio. He is put next to the early popes and Cyprian. (For the Western liturgies in the above article we have used Muratori Liturgia Romana, t. i. 389-401, 658-662; t. ii. 108-113, 625-629; also t. i. 696; il. 3, 693, 777. For the Eastern, Arcudius, Anthologica.)

CHURCHES OF ST. LAURENCE.

A. Rome, Foris Murum.

I. The Basilica di San Lorenzo fuori is said to have been founded by Constantine (Anastasius, Vita Silvestri).

II. Of Sixtus III. we are told, "Moreover he made a basilica to the blessed martyr Laurence, which Valentinianus Augustus (the 3rd) granted, where also he offered gifts" (Anast. Vit. xvi). This was a new basilica beside the old. Rededication of it to Laurence, Sixtus and Hippolytus is mentioned in the Mart. Hieron., Nov. 2 (De Rossi, Roma Sott. ii. 39). Hilary made beside the church of Laurence, monasteries and a bath and a praetorium of St. Stephen (Anast. Vit. xviii). Then after the one year's popelom of Anastasius, Symmachus in the days of Theodoric, "constructed beside the church of St. Laurence," as well as of St. Paul and St. Peter, "habitations for the poor" (Anast. Vit. liii). We read in the time of Belisarius (A.D. 537), that "the churches and bodies of the martyrs were exterminated by the Goths" (Anast. Vit. lx. § 89).

Anastasius tells us that Pelagius II. (A.D. 577-590), who was made pope at a time when the Lombards were devastating Italy, and when there were such rains as threatened a deluge (and would therefore endanger a church built on a hillside), "made over the body of the blessed martyr Laurence a basilica constructed from the foundation, and adorned his sepulchre with tablets of silver" (Anast. Vit. lxx). The mosaic inscription enables us to identify the presbytery or most ancient part of the present church as identical with this church of Pelagius. The old pavement, recently brought to light, dates from the 6th century.

For a discussion of this basilica De Rossi in the Buletini for 1864 may be consulted.

B. Rome, within the Walls.

I. In Damaseo, parochia.—We are told by Anastasius that Pope Damasus made two basilicas, one to St. Laurence near the theatre of Pompey, another outside the walls on the Aurelian Way, where he himself rests, †385.

II. In Fonte.—S. Lorenzo in Fonte is near the Forum of Trajan on the way to the Esquiline, and is said to contain the fountain that sprang up at his prayers to enable him to baptize Hippolytus. This church may also have been founded by Damasus; see an epigram in Migne (Patrol. xiii. 411 n.).

III. In Lucinae.—The church in Lucinae, which is on the site of the Horologium of Augustus, is said by Tillemont to be often mentioned in the time of Symmachus, A.D. 498-514 (Tillem. Mém. iv. 597).

IV. In Miranula, monasterium.—S. Lorenzo in Miranula is in the temple of Antoninus Pius, and Faustinae in the Forum, near the church of St.

Adriano, in the old temple of the Three Fates. There was a monastery that had long been in ruins and inhabited by seculars, that Adrian restored in the name of SS. Adriano and Lorenzo and richly endowed.

V. In regione tertia, parochia.—Simplicius (A.D. 468-483) constituted a hebdomada [OCTAVE] for the third region at St. Laurence, that presbyters should remain there for the sake of penitents and baptism. S. Loreazo a' Monti may represent the parish, but not the site of the church.

VI. In Panis perna.—The church in Panis perna is said to be where Laurence was put to death in the baths of Olymptas. There have been many conjectures as to the name, but it is simply explained by the fact that there was a temple of Silvanus or Pan at this place (see Venuti, Antichità di Roma, c. vi. p. 101).

VII. Ad Taurellum.—The roof of a church of Laurence ad Taurellum, "dum nimis vetustissimum iacerat," was repaired by Adrian. Of S. Lorenzo in piscina PP. delle scuole, close to St. Peter's, I find no trace unless it be this.

VIII. In Formosa.—The church in Formosa was close to the church of St. Cyriacus, probably therefore on the Pincian (Anastasius, Vita Adriani Patr. xvi. n. 95). This, and those in Lucina and in Damaseo, were the three important churches of Laurence in Rome in Charlemagne's time. Montfaucon (Var. Ital. c. 14, p. 205) gives no reason for identifying it with Panis perna.

IX. In Palatinis, Monasterium.—There was a monastery of St. Laurence "on the Palatine in the deserts" that Adrian restored and joined with a monastery of Stephen, called Bijanda. It is often mentioned later, as a limit of floods. Mr. Burn (Rome, p. 177, see plan at p. 155) thinks he has identified the basilica of Jove, where Laurence was tried, as on the Palatine.

XI. Oratorium in the Lateran.—There was a chapel of Laurence in the Lateran where Toto was ordained, A.D. 768.

XII.—Stations in the Churches.—There were stations in the churches and basilica on I.XXma. Sunday ad S. Laurentium; gospel, the labourers in the vineyard.

Foris Murum.

The Friday after the 1st Sunday in Lent.

The 3rd Sunday.

The Saturday before the 5th Sunday.

The Wednesday after Easter. John xxi.

In Lucinae; Friday after the 3rd Sunday in Lent.

In Damaseum; Tuesday after the 4th Sunday.

Those in italics are still observed.

C. Elsewhere.

I. In Constantinople.—The relics of ST. STEPHEN are said to have been brought by Eulocia, the wife of Theodosius II., to Constantinople in A.D. 439, and laid in the church of St. Laurence there, which her husband's sister Pulcheria had built near her own palace, in a place called Petron or Blacherne, on the left of the Ceratine Gulf, in front of a church of the Virgin. Marcellinus Comes (in De la Bigne, vi. 1, 365); Theodoros Lector (ib. 505); Procopius (de Aedif. Justin. i. 8, 17). The union of the relics of Stephen, Laurence, and Agnes in this church is said to be commemorated Sept. 29, but is not in the Mecology of Basil (Tillem. iv. 592).

II. At Ravenna.—There was in the beginning of the 5th century a church of St. Laurence at Ravenna.

III. At Milan.—The basilica of St. Lorenzo at Milan was originally the cathedral. There is an epigram on it by Ennodius, bishop of Ticino (A.D. 505), poem vii. (De la Bigne, Bibl. Vet. Patr. vi. l. 301).

IV. At Tivoli and Porto.—There was also a church of Laurence at Tivoli, restored by Leo III. And at Porto he had both a church and a monastery on the island, with vineyards attached.

V. At Norcia there was a church destroyed by the Lombards, and rebuilt by Sanctulus, as we are told by Gregory the Great (Dial. 3, 36).

VI. In Switzerland.—At Brionum Castra (probably Brione, in the Val Verzasca) there was a church of St. Laurence burnt down by the Lombards, in the rebuilding of which a celebrated miracle occurred. See Gregory of Tours (Glor. Mart. i. 42).

VII. In Gaul.—The churches of St. Laurence traceable in Gaul are—a. At Vienne, built by St. Severus about A.D. 450, on a hill between four mountains above the town, with a treasure found on the spot (Acta SS. August, t. ii. p. 350).

b. To St. Laurence and St. Germain at Clermont, built by Eriacus, king of the Goths, where St. Gall was buried (Greg. Tur. Hist. Franc. ii.).

c. A monastery in Paris in the time of Clotaire, of which St. Domnolus was abbat before he was bishop of Le Mans. It is now a parish in the faubourgs (see Greg. Tur. Hist. Franc. vi. 9, 25).

d. On Mont Lois, near Tours, built by Perpetuus, sixth bishop of that city (Ibid. x. 6).

VIII. In Africa.—Relics of Laurence were deposited under an altar at Setif, in Africa, in A.D. 452 (De Rossi, Roma Sott. i. 220).

(2) An earlier martyr named Laurentius is mentioned by Cyprian (Ep. 34), commending Celerinus: "His grandmother, Celerina, was long ago crowned with martyrdom; also his uncle on the father's side, Laurence, and on the mother's side Egnatius. Sacrifices for them, as ye remember, we offer as often as we celebrate in common the passions and anniversary days of the martyrs." Yet the Calendar of Carthage knows no other Laurence but the saint of Aug. 10. The little Roman martyrology celebrates him along with Celerinus on Feb. 3, but it appears by the Mart. Hieron. that this day properly belongs to Celerina, and that the African Laurence belongs to Sept. 24 or 28.

(3) Another is mentioned April 12. (Mart. Hieron.)

(4) Laurentinus and Pergentinus, boys, brothers, martyred at Arezzo under Decius, June 3. (Mart. Rom.) The Mart. Hieron. mentions Laurentius only.

(5) The martyrdom of Laurence and Hippolytus under Decius at Fossombrone (Forum Sempronianum), Feb. 2 (Mart. Hieron.) is very suspicious. St. Apronianus is commemorated the same day. The cathedral of Fossombrone is sacred to this St. Laurence. (Acta SS. Feb. i. 286.)

(6) The illuminator, bishop of Spoleto, Feb. 3. Seemingly an apocryphal personage. (Acta SS. Feb. i. 362.)

LAURENCE (7) On May 10, the Byzantine distich is,— συναλλαγή τις πρὸς Θεὸν Δαυρεντίου τόνος Ἐδέμ λαβοῦσα τὴν κορμωμένην.

(Acta SS. May, ii. 389.)

(8) Presbyter of Novari, and ecclesiastical, writer of the 4th century. Martyred, with the boys he taught, by the Arians on April 30. (Acta SS. April, iii. 763.)

(9) Archbishop of Milan, † July 19, A.D. 512.

(10) Bishop of Siponto in Apulia, † Feb. 7, A.D. 550. (Acta SS. Feb. ii. 57.)

(11) Archbishop of Canterbury. † Feb. 2, A.D. 619. Into Laurencekirk in Scotland no woman might enter. (Acta SS. Feb. i. 289.)

(12) Bishop of Naples, † July 19, A.D. 717. [E. B. B.]

LAURENTINUS. [LAURENCE (4).]

LAURIANUS, of Seville, killed July 4 (6th century). (Mart. Hieron.) [E. B. B.]

LAURINUS, martyr of Terni, April 14. (Mart. Hieron.) [E. B. B.]

LAURUS (1) and Florus, twins, sculptors, thrown into a well in Illyricum by Licinius. Their relics were revealed to Constantine, and brought by him to their native Byzantium, August 18. (Menology of Basil.)

(2) Of St. Malo, 7th century, † Sept. 30. (Acta SS. Sept. viii. 692.) [E. B. B.]

LAUSTRANUS, died 640, commemorated Apr. 11 (Men. Scot.), as well as LASREN, Apr. 18. [E. B. B.]

LAUTO, bishop of Coutances, † Sept. 22, A.D. 568. [E. B. B.]

LAVABO. The description of the Eucharistic rite by Cyril of Jerusalem (Catech. Myst. v. 2, p. 325) begins with the deacon presenting water to the celebrant (τῷ ἱερεῖ), and the presbyters who encircle the altar, for the purpose of ablution. And this (Cyril continues) was not merely for the sake of personal cleanliness, it was a symbolic act, to which refer the words of David, "I will wash my hands in innocency, O Lord, and so will I go to thine altar" (Ps. xxv. [E. V. xvi.] 6). It does not appear from this whether the verse was actually chanted during the ablution, though its appositeness is recognised. (Compare Dionys. Areop. Hierarch. Ecl. c. 3.) According to some MSS. of the Liturgy of St. Chrysostom (Daniel, Codex Ld. iv. 330), the priest and deacon after vesting for the liturgy wash their hands in the prothesis, saying, "Νίψουμαι ἐν ἁγίοις," and the rest of the psalm. In the Roman rite, the washing of the hands occurs after the oblation of the unconsecrated elements, and thus precedes the preface and the more solemn part of the office. After the censing of the altar and the priest, while the deacon is censing the other ministers, the priest washes his hands, saying, "Lavabo inter innocentes manus meas et circumdabo altare tuum, Domine," and the rest of the psalm. As Amalarius of Metz († 837) does not mention this custom, it was probably introduced in the Roman office after he wrote his treatises de Ecclesiasticis Officiis and Elogus de Officio Missae. [C.]

On May 10, the Byzantians

ἡ ἑξ ὁσῶν ἀσπερίτω
τῆς τῆν πορροπόρησιν.

Novari, and ecclesiastical
ary. Martyred, with the
the Arians on April 30, (33.)
tilan, † July 19, A.D. 512.
into in Apulia, † Feb. 7, Feb. ii. 57.)
Canterbury. † Feb. 2, A.D.
rk in Scotland no woman
S. Feb. i. 289.)
es, † July 19, A.D. 717.
[E. B. B.]

[LAURENCE (4).]

Seville, killed July 4 (6th ron.) [E. B. B.]
tyr of Terni, April 14.
[E. B. B.]

Florus, twins, sculptors,
in Illyricum by Licinius.
ealed to Constantine, and their native Byzantium,
y of Basil.)
7th century, † Sept. 30,
92.) [E. B. B.]

died 640, commemorated
as well as LASREN, Apr. 18.
[E. B. B.]

of Coutances, † Sept. 22,
[E. B. B.]

description of the Eucharistic asalem (Catech. Myst. v. 2, a the deacon presenting ε (τῶ ἑπερ), and the presbe
the altar, for the purpose of (Cyril continues) was not of personal cleanliness, it which refer the words of my hands in innocency,
I go to thine altar" (Ps.

It does not appear from re was actually chanted though its appositeness is e Dionys. Areop. Hierarch. to some MSS. of the
the osation (Daniel, Codec Lit.
and deacon after vesting for eir hands in the prothesis, ἀσπασ), and the rest of oman rite, the washing of s, and thus precedes the e solemn part of the office.
the altar and the priest,
ensing the other ministers,
is hands, saying, "Lavabo
anus meus et circumdabo
," and the rest of the psalm.
z († 837) does not mention er he was probably introduced in er he wrote his treatises de
and Eclogae de Officio Missae.
[C.]

LAVACRUM. [BAPTISM; FONT.]

LAVATORY [MONASTIC]. Monasticism has never been partial to frequent personal ablutions.
On the contrary, it has from the first discouraged them, as a form of self-indulgence, and as inconsistent with bodily austerities. Probably this inherent antipathy to bathings and washings was in great measure a result of the reaction from the luxury and licentiousness of the Roman baths under the empire. Certainly the maxim which places cleanliness next to godliness has no place in the biographies of the saints and heroes of monasticism, even in climates where bathing would seem almost one of the necessities of life.
Jerome warns ascetics against warm baths as morally enervating (Hieron. Ep. ad Ru-tic.);
and in a letter to one of his female disciples
denounces every sort of bathing for women (Id.
Ep. ad Laet.). Augustine allows a bath* once a month only (Aug. Ep. 109). This aversion to bathing is one of the many indications of the tendency, which seems inseparable from monasticism, to the Manichean notion of matter being intrinsically evil.

The various monastic rules agree very closely in discouraging the use of baths. Even the tolerant rule of the great Benedict only permits them for those who are weak and delicate, forbidding them generally ("tardius concedatur")
for the young and healthy (Bened. Reg. c. 36).
Evidently he is speaking only of baths within the walls of a monastery; bathing in a river or lake, or in the sea, being of course out of the question (cf. Martene ad loc.). Hildemarnus interprets the expression "tardius" to mean only before the three great festivals—Christmas, Easter, Whitsuntide. Other commentators restrict the phrase to Christmas and Easter only;
others take it as a permission for the monks to bathe after doing any very dirty work, &c.
(Martene ad loc.) Similarly, Isidorus Hispalensis orders baths to be used very sparingly, only as a remedy, never for gratification (Isid. Reg. c.
20). The rule of Caesarius of Arles permits them only in cases where the doctor prescribes them, and without any regard to the inclination of the patient (Caesar. Reg. c. 39). The rule ascribed to Augustine is to the same effect (Reg. Au. c. 29), and adds that no monk is to go alone to the baths, nor to choose his companions, but that two or three of the brethren are to be told off by the prior for this purpose.
In the same way the council of Aachen in A.D.
817 enacts that the control and regulation of the baths is to belong to the prior (Conc.
Aquisgr. c. 7). An anonymous rule, which has been ascribed to Columbanus, called Regula Cajusdium, orders delinquent monks, as a penance, to make the necessary preparations for the washing of their brethren's heads on Saturdays, and for their baths just before the great festivals, especially Christmas (Reg. Cuj. c. 12; cf.
Columban. Poenit.; ap. Menard, Comment. ad loc.). Radegundis is said to have built baths for the use of the nuns in the convent (of St. Croix) which she founded at Poitiers; before long some

* In his Confessions, where he describes his grief for the death of his mother, he speaks of bathing as recommended to him for his depression of spirits, and mentions an absurd derivation of the Greek word βαλαντιον as meaning a relief to anxiety.

irregularities occurred, which the abbas was accused of conniving at, in regard to the use of these baths (Gregor. Turon. Hist. Franc. x. 16).
See further Martene, de Antiquis Ecclesie
Ritibus. [I. G. S.]

LAW.

SYLLABUS.

- I. "Law" and "Law of Nature," and early Christian authorities upon.
- II. Positive Law of the State. Attitude of the earlier Christians to.
Law of the State as directly affecting the Christian Church before Constantine, and legislation of Constantine.
Legislation between time of Constantine and of Justinian.
Justinian's legislation.
Legislation of the Barbarian, Frank, and English kings.
Legislation of Charlemagne.
- III. Internal legislation of the Church.

The word Law has this in common with the Latin jus, the French droit, and the German recht, that it is at once abstract and concrete. It means both the idea of rules of conduct proceeding from a competent authority and also the rules themselves. The word and the various meanings conveyed by it have been submitted to searching criticism of late years in this country, especially by Bentham and writers more or less distinctly influenced by him. The only part of the controversies thus originating which is relevant here is that which relates to the use of the word law, in such expressions as "Law of Nature," "Natural Law," "Law of God," "Moral Law." It is not very satisfactory nor historically true to conclude, with Mr. Austin (Lectures on Jurisprudence), that the original use of the term Law is a political one, and that the ethical and theological uses are wholly metaphorical and derived. Sir H. S. Maine's review of the history of the expression "Law of Nature" (Ancient Law, chap. iv.), rather supports the doctrine that the expression was borrowed from quite another region than the political one, and that it was in the task of correcting and amending this one that it found its most worthy uses. There is no doubt that Hooker's opposition of "humane law," "that which men probably gathering it to be expedient they make it a law," to that other law which, "as it is laid up in the bosom of God, they call eternal, receiveth according to the different kinds of things which are subject unto it different and sundry kinds of names," certainly expresses a logical distribution of law as old as the Christian Church itself, and somewhat older. The constant references in Cicero's writings to the distribution of jus into natura and lex (see particularly De Leg. i. 15, 16, and Orat. partit. 37), are especially interesting from the attention which Laetantius (vi. 8) calls to them, in the celebrated passage in which, citing Cicero's panegyric on the "vera lex recta ratio naturae congruens constans sempiterna," he speaks of "dei lex illa sancta illa celestis quam Marcus Tullius in libro de Republica tertio pœne divina voce dixit." The expressions of St. Paul in reference to a law written in the hearts of the Gentiles (Rom. ii. 15) are quite in accordance with the doctrines of the leading Roman jurists a century after his time, when Roman law was at its climax; as for instance appears from the language of Paulus (47 Dig. iii. 1, § 3) about theft, "quod lege naturali prohibitum est admittere." The early Christian writers constantly allude to the law of nature, and often base elaborate arguments either on its existence or on its precepts. Thus Origen (c. Celsus, viii. 52) speaking of the persuasion he had of the salvation of the heathen whose lives had been good, and recalling noble practical maxims laid down even by the enemies of the faith, says, "you will find no men in whom the common notions of what is good and bad, just and unjust, have been wholly blotted out." So, again, Tertullian (adv. Jul., cap. v.) says he contended that "before the law of Moses was written on tables of stone, there was an unwritten law which was naturally understood and held in trust by the patriarchs." St. Ambrose (Epist. ad Rom., cap. v.) divides the "natural law" into three parts, one concerned with shewing honour to the Creator, another with leading a good life, and a third with making known God and the right way of life to others. St. Jerome (Epist. ad Galat., chap. iii.) says that by this "legem naturalem" Cain acknowledged his offence, and Pharaoh, before the law was given by Moses, confessed his misdeeds. St. Chrysostom builds an elaborate argument on the existence and import of a law of nature (Homil. xii. ad Pop. Ant.), and says that "at the beginning God made the knowledge of good and evil self-taught; for we stand in no need of learning that indulgence is evil and self-restraint good, but we know it from the first;" and "when He said 'thou shalt do no murder,' He did not add, 'for murder is doing wrong;' but He simply said, 'thou shalt do no murder,' thereby merely forbidding what was sinful without teaching why it was so." The general subject of the attitude of the earlier writers, Christian, Jewish, and Heathen, towards the law of nature, will be found discussed in such works as Selden, 'De Jure Naturae et Gentium secundum disciplinam Hebraeorum,' Puffendorf, 'Jus Gentium et Naturae,' and the Prolegomena to Grotius, 'De Jure Belli et Pacis.' From the above extracts it will sufficiently appear from what sources a knowledge of the law of nature was to be extracted, and what was the import of the assertion of the later canonists that no dispensation from it was obtainable.

As contrasted with the "Law of Nature," what is sometimes called "Positive Law" may be considered under three heads:—I. Such part of the general laws of the state as happened to affect Christians because of conflicts of allegiance to which it casually gave rise. II. Such special laws of the state as were enacted in different countries and at successive epochs for the purpose of regulating the Christian society, and determining the organisation of the Church; and III. Such internal regulations as were made by the church itself, either in pursuance of what it held to be an inherent legislative authority, or in the character of a subordinate legislature, exercising permissive powers in dependence on the state.

1. The attitude of Christians towards the general law of the state in the territory of which they found themselves, was broadly de-

finied for them at the very opening of Christian history, in the words so much quoted in after times, "Render unto Caesar the things which are Caesar's," and in the part of the twelfth chapter of St. Paul's epistle to the Romans, in which the Apostle discusses the relation of the members of the Church to the "powers that be." It would seem that during the whole of the first century no questions of seriously conflicting allegiance presented themselves, the only aspect in which the early church found itself in opposition to the laws of the empire being that it was not formally incorporated among the recognised cults, that is, it was not, like Judaism, a "religio licita." Nevertheless Tertullian intimates that it had slipped in as such, and that Tiberius had even proposed, on receiving the report of Pontius Pilate, to give Christ a place among the gods (Apol. c. 5, and 26). Pliny's letter to Trajan (about A.D. 111) describes the Christians in Bithynia as a law-abiding people, "bound together by no unlawful sacrament, but only under mutual obligations not to commit theft, robbery, adultery, or fraud." It was, however, when he submitted them to the test of adoration before the statues of the gods and of the emperors, and the malediction of Christ, that they were recalcitrant. The amount of subservience to customs bearing the semblance of idolatry which was justifiable in a Christian became the subject of serious perplexity between the period at which the Christians had grown to be numerous and important enough to attract public attention, and that at which the church secured its political victory over paganism. The difficulty was encountered at two points; one, where, owing to general suspicion on other grounds, a Christian was subjected to the test of sacrificing or doing an overt act of worship to the emperor; the other, where the common functions of a civil or military life involved what seemed to be idolatrous usages. It is a matter of some doubt how far the Christians of the 2nd and 3rd centuries consented to serve in the imperial armies, though the expressions of Christian writers, and the arguments of Tertullian with respect to the extent to which Christians might go in receiving military rewards, leave no doubt as to the prevalent opinion that service was not sinful in itself, nor as to the actual practice (Tertull. de Coronâ Milit., cap. xi.; see Milman's History, bk. ii. cap. vii. and Neander). Some of the Christian writers bestow great pains in solving the casuistical problems as to how far conformity might go. Thus Tertullian (de Idololatriâ, cap. xvii.) thinks a Christian might walk simply in a procession but must not sacrifice, nor give the word for another to sacrifice, nor place the victims, nor bind their temples, nor pronounce any solemn words, nor make any adjuration. Then again, he discusses the question as to what slaves and faithful freemen should do when their masters or patrons are officially engaged in sacrificing. He intimates, in another place (Apol. c. 34), that it might be allowable to call the emperor lord but not god.

With respect to the general duty of obeying the law of the state, the Christian writers are unanimous in upholding it. Indeed they habitually base their defence against imputations from without on their loyalty. Thus Justus Martyr

the very opening of Christian is so much quoted in after to Caesar the things which in the part of the twelfth al's epistle to the Romans, in discusses the relation of the church to the "powers that be,"
 at during the whole of the estions of seriously conflicting at themselves, the only aspect church found itself in oppo-
 of the empire being that it incorporated among the reigus, it was not, like Judaism, a Nevertheless Tertullian inand slipped in as such, and that a proposed, on receiving the Pilate, to give Christ a place
 (Apol. c. 5, and 26). Pliny's (about A. D. 111) describes the aynia as a law-abiding people,
 y no unlawful sacrament, but al obligations not to commit adultery, or fraud." It was, submitted them to the test
 e the statues of the gods and
 and the malediction of Christ, preeletrant. The amount of astons bearing the semblance was justifiable in a Christian t of serious perplexity between ich the Christians had grown and important enough to attract and that at which the church
 tial victory over paganism
 s encountered at two points;
 to general suspicion on other an was subjected to the test oing an overt act of worship
 the other, where the common r military life involved what tnatrous usages. It is a matter ow far the Christians of the ries consented to serve in the though the expressions of
 , and the arguments of Ter-go to the extent to which ce was not sinful in itself, nor practice (Tertull. de Coronâ
 see Milman's History, bk. ii. ader). Some of the Christian ent pains in solving fine casus to how far conformity might (de Idolâtrâ, cap. xvii.)
 might walk simply in a pre-not sacrifice, nor give the ward erifice, nor place the victims temples, nor pronounce any make any adoration. Then,
 the question as to what slaves
 en men should do when their ns are officially engaged in itimates, in another place
 it might be allowable to call but not god.
 o the general duty of obeying ate, the Christian writers are olding it. Indeed they habitueving against imputations from loyalty. Thus Justin Martyr

(Apol. l. 17) says that "wherever we are pay the taxes and tribute imposed by you, as we worship God alone in all other matters, we cheerfully submit ourselves to you, confessing
 you to be the kings and rulers of men." Irenæus
 (v. 24), speaking even more strongly, and alluding to the perpetual "calumny of the devil"
 to the contrary, says, "we ought to obey powers and earthly authorities, inasmuch as they are constituted not by the devil but God;" and "that kings are the ministers of God, and are put in authority by the command of that same One to whose command men owe their very existence." Tertullian (Apol. c. 42) presents a vivid picture of the complete implication of the life of the Christians with that of the pagans, in a passage which leaves no doubt that it was the persuasion of the church that conformity was a general duty, and nonconformity only a particular exception from it. "Itaque non sine fore non sine macello non sine balneis tabernis officis tabulis nudinis vestris coeterisque com-mercis cohabitamus in hoc sæculo; navigamus et nos vobiscum in militemus et rusticamur et mercamur; proinde miscemus artes, opera nostra publicum usui vestro."

Later Christian history, however, brought forward a wholly new class of problems arising out of the active interference of the secular government with the internal affairs of the church. This led to the question being mooted which has never been theoretically answered as to how far the church and its members are morally entitled to resist a law which indirectly affects, as they think perniciously, the interests of the church. The letter of Gregory the Great, addressed to the emperor Maurice (A. D.
 582-602), who had interdicted all persons occupying civil functions from becoming clerks or entering a monastery, may be cited in order to shew what was probably a characteristic mode of solving such problems after the time that the church became an authority competing with the state. "As for me, submitting to thy order, I have sent this law to the various countries of the earth, and I have said to my serene lords in this paper whereon I have deposited my reflections, that this law goes against that of the al-powerful God. I have therefore fulfilled my duty upon each side; I have rendered obedience to Caesar, and I have not been silent as to what appeared to me to be against God." (Greg. M.
Epist. lli. p. 65.)

11. The laws of the state specially affecting the Christian Church may affect it as a corporate society, or assemblage of corporate societies;
 or may affect its officers individually; or its members individually. And among the laws that affect the members of the church individually will properly be included all those which confer privileges or impose disabilities on any persons whatever on the ground of their not being members of the church. Thus the general purposes of the church. Thus the he church may be arranged as those of (1) conferring privileges, or imposing disabilities on members of the church as such, or upon other persons not being such, as, e.g., Jews, pagans, heretics, and apostates; (2) prescribing and controlling the organisation of the church, personal and material; and, with this view con-fering privileges or imposing disabilities on church officials of all classes; (3) regulating the property of the church, of its officers, and of its members; (4) determining questions of dis-pable jurisdiction in respect of ecclesiastical, civil, and criminal suits and offences; and (5) giving effect to the internal legislation of the church itself. It might be expected that at some periods of church history some of the classes of laws owing their origin to these different purposes would be found to be more prominent than the rest, and at other periods other classes of laws. Indeed, it is the case that for long periods together some of these classes of laws often seem to be wholly absent, either there being no materials recognisable by the state on which law could operate. For instance, in early days the whole of the civil law as affecting the church would be gathered up in the disabilities and penalties inflicted on its individual members. But between the time of Pliny's letter and the persecution at the beginning of the 4th century, under Galerius and Diocletian, the organisation of the church was becoming recognised, if not formally protected, and even the property of the church secured to it by law.

Thus it seems that about the time of Alexander Severus (A. D. 222), "Christian bishops were admitted at court in a recognised official character, and Christian churches began to rise in different parts of the empire, and to possess endowments in land" (Milman, ii. 231). "The Christians" (says Gibbon, writing of this period,
 c. xvi.) "were permitted to erect and consecrate convenient edifices for the purpose of religious worship; to purchase lands, even at Rome itself,
 for the use of the community; and to conduct the elections of their ecclesiastical ministers in so public, but at the same time in so exemplary,
 a manner, as to deserve the respectful attention of the Gentiles." But the history of a few years later shews upon what a frail foundation these privileges rested; and it was not till after Constantine's victory over Maxentius in A. D. 312 that the legal rights and duties of the Christian church, its officers, and its members, began to be ascertained with a constantly advancing precision. It is not necessary to distinguish here the successive steps by which Constantine first supported by his legislation paganism and Christianity impartially; then co-operated with the organisation of the church; and finally (as in his dealings with Arius) overbore that organisation by the weight of his personal authority.
 There are scarcely enough materials in existence to decide the question as to how far, at any time, Constantine went in suppressing the use of pagan rites by the general law. After reviewing all the authorities and the passages in Eusebius directly bearing on the point, Dean Milman is of opinion that Constantine only abolished two kinds of sacrifices, that is, private sacrifices connected with unlawful acts of the-tory or of magic; and the state sacrifices heretofore offered by the emperor himself, or by others in his name. The passage in the Theo-dosian Code (Cod. Th. xvi. 10, 2), from a law of Constantius in which he cites an edict of his father, is distinctly in favour of an universal prohibition. "Cesset superstitio, sacrificiorum

aboleatur insana. Nam quicumque contra legem divi Principis preautis nostri et hanc nostrae mansuetudinis jussionem census fuerit sacrificia celebrare competens in eum vindicta et praesentia sententia exeratur." We have in the Theodosian Code very clear indications of the legal measures by which Constantine (1) fenced round the Christian community, by inflicting disabilities on those outside, as in the law (Cod. Th. v. 1) to the effect that all privileges given in respect of religion attached only to "Catholicae legis observatoribus; haereticos autem atque sensuaticos non tantum ab his privilegiis alienos esse sed etiam diversis muneribus constringi et subici;" (2) recognised the organisation of the church by allowing slaves to be manumitted "in gremio Ecclesiae," provided it was done "sub aspectu antistitum" (Cod. Th. iv. 71), and supported its institutions by allowing to other business than emancipations and manumissions to be performed on Sunday (Cod. Th. iii. 12, 1, 2, 3). Constantine also exempted the clergy from the burdensome liability to serve on town councils (Cod. Th. xvi. 2; 1, 2, 3). A provision was, however, introduced which throws light on the notion of ordination prevailing at the time, to the effect that if any one should, subsequently to the making of the law, become ordained solely in order to evade his civil obligations, he must be restored to his civil character (restitui et civilibus obsequiis inservire). The whole of this law may be instructively contrasted with the legislation of Justinian (Con. i. 4, 28), by which he specially provides for bishops becoming an essentially constituent part of provincial town councils.

In the two hundred years which intervened between the time of Constantine and that of Justinian, legislation directly affecting the Christian church made rapid progress in all its departments. It was in the joint reign of Gratian, Valentinian, and Theodosius (A.D. 380) that the formal law was passed which figures in the codes both of Theodosius and of Justinian, by which Christianity was constituted the exclusive religion of the Roman empire, both in the East and in the West. "We command all who read this law to embrace the name of Catholic Christians, deciding that all other idiots and madmen should bear the infamy attaching to their heretical opinions, and as they will first meet with the penalty of divine vengeance, so they will afterwards receive that condemnation at our hands which the Heavenly Judge has empowered us to administer." (Cod. Jus. I. i. 1.)

From this period laws begin to appear for determining questions of disputable jurisdiction, such as the law of Arcadius and Honorius A.D. 399 (Cod. Th. xvi. 11, 1), giving the bishops exclusive jurisdiction in "religious" matters, but in these only; "quotiens de religione agatur episcopos convocet iudicare; ceteras vero causas quae ad ordinarios, cognitores vel ad usum publici foris pertinent legibus oportet audiri." At the very end of the Theodosian Code appears what is called an "extravagant" law of Valentinian, Theodosius, and Arcadius, "de episcopali iudicio," prescribing that bishops be not occupied in trying ordinary matters, but whenever a matter presented itself relating to Christian authority (quae pertinet ad Christianam facultatem), it should be decided by the highest priestly functionary in the district (see AUDIENTIA EPISCOPALIS, I. 152). The special penalties imposed on immoral clergy belong also to the part of the law which regulates and supports the organisation of the church. Such were those imposed by the law of Valens and Valentinian (A.D. 370, Cod. Th. xvi. 11, 20) on ecclesiastics, or "ex ecclesiasticis vel qui continentium se volent nomine nunciari viduarum ac pupillarum domos adeant;" they were "publicis exterminari iudicibus," and were held incapable to take any benefit under a will of a woman to whom they had attached themselves under pretext of religion. The practice of requiring such laws as directly affect the church to be publicly read in the church, is an interesting token of the public recognition of these Christian buildings. The law just cited is said to have been read in the churches, "lecta in ecclesiis;" and Theodosius the younger had his law against the Nestorians, and Constantine his letter to the church of Alexandria, in absolution of Athanasius, read in the churches; and the practice was in use under the Visigoths at the close of the laws of which people we read, "Suprascriptas leges omnes lectas in ecclesia S. Mariae Toleti sub die xi. Kalend. Feb."

The laws affecting the Christians which were enacted between the time of Constantine and the publication of the Theodosian Code in A.D. 438, are mostly contained in the 16th book of that code, the code itself having been promulgated in the same year, both in the Eastern and Western empires. The next important legislative events occurred in the middle of the sixth century, in the reign of Justinian. The product of Justinian's legislative exertions in respect of the church appears in the first book of his code (the revised edition of which—the only one which has come down to us,—was published in A.D. 534), and his Novells which cover a period of legislation extending from A.D. 535 to A.D. 565. The first book of the code also contains the laws which had been passed by successive emperors since the publication of the Theodosian Code. Of this intermediate period between A.D. 438 and A.D. 534, there appear in Justinian's Code (Book 2) several important laws regulating the rights and liabilities of the clergy, confirming the claims of the church to have property transferred to it in life and on death (Cod. i. 2, 14), directing the clergy as to the administration of property left by will for the redemption of captives, and for the use of the poor (l. 3, 28), and determining the rights, duties, and general functions of those betaking themselves to a conventual and monastic life. The right of sanctuary as available in all parts of the empire is explicitly vindicated and defined by a law of Leo I. in A.D. 466. (Cod. i. 12, 6.)

The comprehensive legislation of Justinian, especially that which took place between A.D. 535 and A.D. 565, and is recorded in his Novells, extends to all the branches of law in which, according to the above classification, it is possible for the civil law directly to affect the Christian community. It will be convenient to review the general character of the laws passed in Justinian's reign in conformity with that classification.

(1.) Of laws conferring privileges or imposing disabilities on individual members of the church, or on other persons because they are not such members, the fifty-second constitution

DIENTIA EPISCOPALIS, I. 152). imposed on immoral clergy
 part of the law which regu-
 the organisation of the those imposed by the law of alian (A.D. 370, Cod. Th. xvi vices, or "ex ecclesiasticis vel volent nonnum nuncupari arum domos adent," they terminari iudicibus," and were take any benefit under a will in they had attached them-t of religion. The practice laws as directly avert the ily read in the church, is an
 of the public recognition of ings. The law just cited is and in the churches, "lecta in dosin the younger had his torians, and Constantine his of Alexandria, in absolution in the churches; and the under the Visigoths at the
 of which people we read,
 s, omnes lectas in ecclesia S.
 xi. Kalend. Feb."

the Christians which were time of Constantine and the theodosian Code in A.D. 438,
 d in the 16th book of that having been promulgated in in the Eastern and Western important legislative events
 de of the sixth century, in an. The product of Jusexertions in respect of the
 the first book of his code (the
 ick—the only one which has was published in A.D. 534), ch cover a period of legisla-A.D. 535 to A.D. 565. The first so contains the laws which successive emperors since the theodosian Code. Of this int-ween A.D. 438 and A.D. 534, ain's Code (Book 2) several lating the rights and liability-confirning the claims of the erty transferred to it in life
 l. i. 2, 14), directing the ministration of property left nption of captives, and for
 (i. 3, 28), and determining ad general functions of those to a conventual and monastic tary as available in all parts ically vindicated and defined
 A.D. 486. (Cod. i. 12, 4).
 The legislation of Justinian, es-book place between A.D. 535 recorded in his Novells, ex-ches of law in which, accordication, it is possible for ily to affect the Christian be convenient to review the
 the laws passed in Justinianity with that classifica-

transferring privileges or im-individual members of the persons because they are the fifty-second constitution

(Novell. Auth.) is an instance, the effect of which was to exclude Jews, Samaritans, Montanists, and other heretics (aliter respondens homines
 quos nodum hæcenus reeta et immaculata fides illucet sed et in tenebris sedent animis vernon sentientes sacramenta) from the beneficial exemptions enjoyed by the orthodox in respect of service on town councils, and to allow their testimony in courts of law only in cases in which the interest of an orthodox suitor, or that of the state seemed to call for it. Another instance is supplied by the limitation of the newly conceded rights of intestate succession in accordance with natural, instead of the older civil relationship to those who belonged to the "Catholic Faith." (Nov. Auth., 114.) Yet a further instance is the law forbidding marriages between god-potent and god-child (Cod. v. 4, 26) on the ground that "nothing else could so surely introduce an affectionate paternal relationship, and thereby justify fornil marriage, as a tie of this sort by which souls are bound together through the mediation
 of God."

(2.) With laws regulating and protecting the organisation of the church Justinian's legislation is replete, and the 134th Novell is a small code in itself. Bishops and monks were absolutely forbidden to act as guardians, and priests and deacons were allowed to act only on their formal request, and they were all forbidden to undertake any civil function. The bishops were forbidden to move from place to place without the permission of the metropolitan or the emperor. The bishops, patriarchs, and archbishops in each province were to assemble once or twice a year, and to examine into all causes and offences. By the 59th Novell it is forbidden to introduce the "sacred mysteries" into private houses, unless certain of the clergy were especially invited with the approval of the bishop.
 The limitation of the number of the clergy, and of the expenses attending on ordination, were carefully provided for (Nov. Auth. 3, 5, 16).

(3.) Of laws regulating the property of the church the seventh constitution is an important specimen. It lays down the general principle that no church or church officer is entitled to lease, any immovable property of the church, or the sacred vessels of the church, save only (in this last case) for the redemption of prisoners, the right of the Government to force a sale at a fair price being reserved. A later law (Nov.
Auth. 43) permits the alienation of immovables in the case of inability to pay state dues, and if the income of the immovables does not suffice;
 and a still later law (Nov. Auth. 67) provides that lands and other immovables left to the church by will for the redemption of captives, or for the support of the poor, may be sold for the purpose should it appear that no certain income from the property can be relied upon otherwise [ALIENATION, I. 50]. To the same class of topics belong the legal restrictions upon building churches, monasteries, and houses of prayer without first making a preliminary grant of the property to provide for the services (Nov. Auth.
69, 2).

(4.) Laws regulating jurisdiction, of course, became increasingly precise at this period, and the final Novell, already cited, contains numerous provisions on the subject. By the 80th

Novell, persons having any cause of action against monks, ascetics, or nuns, must bring the case before the bishop; or nuns, must bring the bishop might, in case a judge deferred giving sentence, either press the judge to proceed or sentence, and report the neglect to the emperor.
 Provision was also made for parties trying their case before a friendly tribunal composed of the judge and the bishop, so as to avoid the necessity of referring the case to the tribunal at the capital.
 Bishops administering justice with partiality were to be punished. In the 134th Novell important provisions are contained, by which all causes of complaint against a member of the clerical body are to be laid, in the first instance, before the bishop, and the sentence, if accepted by both parties within ten days, is to be carried out by the civil judge; if the sentence is not accepted the civil judge is to examine the case afresh, and if he differs from the bishop an appeal is allowed (see APPEAL, I. 126). In criminal cases, if the bishop condemns, the convicted clerk is first to be shorn of his "honour and grade" according to ecclesiastical rules, and is then tried by the civil judge. If the civil judge is approached first, and the prisoner is found to be a clerk, the case must go before the bishop, who, if he finds the clerk guilty, is to deprive him of his office and hand him back for sentence to the civil judge.
 If the bishop does not find him guilty he is to defer the deprivation, while security is taken and the case referred to the emperor for his decision.

(5.) As to laws enforcing the internal legislation of the church, the 120th Novell is important, the first chapter of it solemnly giving the force of law to the sacred ecclesiastical rules expounded or established by the four Councils of Nicaea, Constantinople, Ephesus, and Chalcedon.
 Subsequently to the time of Justinian, the iconoclastic controversy in the East (commencing A.D. 726) is interesting, in reference to the present subject as exhibiting the firm legislative control that the Eastern emperors either retained or assumed to themselves over the ritual of the church. The conquests of Justinian in Italy led to his complete body of laws being applied en masse to the subjects of his recon-quered provinces, for whose use the Novells, or such of them as originally appeared in the Greek language, were translated into Latin. But before the victories of Justinian in Italy the Theodosian Code had already been introduced in an almost complete shape into the code of the Visigoths issued in A.D. 506 by Alaric II. He was succeeded by Theodoric, his father-in-law, who united thereby the kingdoms of the Ostrogoths and the Visigoths. In this way it appears that in the early part of the sixth century the laws affecting the church, as they were embodied in the Theodosian Code and in the code and Novells of Justinian, were introduced into Italy almost simultaneously from the East and the West; and it may be conjectured that, in this way, the legislation of Justinian, as well as of his predecessors, became the basis of the legislation of the barbarian kings. There is reason, however, to suppose that the barbarian kings were less disposed to interfere with the internal order of the church than the Eastern emperors. They were mostly Arians, they were not gifted with the theological subtlety which seems to have distinguished some of the rulers in the East, and some of the most eminent of them are conspicuous either for toleration or for religious intolerance (see Guizot's Civilisation in France, Lect. xii.). In an edict of Clothaire II. (A.D. 615) we have a distinct recognition of the principle that the clergy are, in the first instance, to be tried by an ecclesiastical and not by a civil court; and, for the case of suits between the clergy and other persons, a court is established composed of chiefs of the church sitting together with the ordinary secular judge. The law of the Riparian Franks (Lex Rip. cxxi. § 3, lviii. § 1) provides for the clergy being tried by the Roman law. The Salic law, in its oldest form, bears few marks of ecclesiastical legislation, and is almost exclusively occupied with defining the pecuniary penalties for civil and criminal offences. In its reformed shape it wears the impress of the mature ecclesiastical legislation of Charlemagne.

The laws of the Saxon kings in various English kingdoms afford instruction as to contemporaneous legislation in all the German kingdoms under the influence of the Roman church. The code of Ethelbert, who seems to have begun to reign about A.D. 561, contains a number of precise regulations on general matters, of which only the first touches the church, robbery from which is to be punished by a fine of twelve times the value stolen; robbery from the bishop, by a fine of eleven times the value; from a priest, of nine times; a deacon, of six times; and so on. In the code of Wihtraed, who seems to have begun to reign in A.D. 691, there is a fair amount of ecclesiastical legislation, including the principle that the church shall enjoy immunity from taxes, and sundry minute rules in respect of compensation for offences by and against the clergy. The celebrated laws of Ina, who came to the throne about A.D. 688, mark a distinct stage in social and political advance. While dealing largely with the common criminal offences, against which the previous codes were mainly directed, they also contain numerous specific laws directly affecting the church; as that, "the ministers of God shall observe their own proper laws"; that "children shall be brought to be baptized within thirty days, under a penalty of thirty solidi"; that "a slave doing work at his master's bidding on the Lord's day shall thereby become free"; and that "the right of sanctuary availed to save the life of a criminal, but he must make compensation" (Wilkins's Leges Anglo-Saxonice Ecclesiasticæ et Civiles). Some curious instances of the active co-operation of the church and the state in respect of punishing the offences of the clergy against the ordinary civil and criminal law in the earlier part of the seventh century in Britain appear in some very early works cited by Mr. Haddan and Professor Stubbs (Councils and Ecclesiastical Documents relating to Great Britain and Ireland, 1869). The Liber Landavensis (a compilation of the twelfth century) records the excommunication by Oudaens, bishop of Llandaff, at the beginning of the seventh century, of Mensig and of Morgan, kings of Glamorgan, for murder, after swearing amity upon relics in the bishop's presence. In each case lands being given to the see of Llandaff by the culprit when reconciled. The same work records similar proceedings in the case of a fratricide committed by Gwoednerth, king of Gwent; and in other cases Eddlus, in his life of Wilfrid (A.D. 709), mentions that the holy bishop, Wilfrid, on one occasion, standing before the altar, and turning to the people, "enumerated before the kings the lands which previous kings had granted and the sacred sites which the British clergy had deserted in flying before the enemy." This seems to imply a re-endowment by the Saxon kings with lands previously held by the British church.

The legislation of Charlemagne, which continued through his entire reign, that is, from A.D. 768 to A.D. 814, and which was reproduced over and over again in closely resembling forms in the different countries successively reduced under his rule, recalls that of Justinian by its comprehensiveness and its particularity. Nevertheless, the capitularies of Charlemagne not only mark the progress which the church had made during the past 200 years in internal organisation, but they also seem to bespeak the spontaneous energy of the church in legislating for itself, rather than the mere weight of imperial authority, to which so many of the earlier laws were due. Much of Charlemagne's legislation in respect of the church is identical with that of Justinian, and with that of the earlier Saxon codes, and this affords evidence that legislation of this sort was largely controlled by ecclesiastical usage and tradition, and by the direct influence exercised by the authorities of the church on the civil lawgiver.

It will be convenient to exemplify Charlemagne's legislation by reference to such of the main department of possible legislation in reference to the church as were above distinguished for the purpose of convent arrangement, and are alone prominent at this date. They concern (1) the organisation and ritual of the church, (2) the property of the church, of its officials, and of its members, and (3) jurisdiction.

(1.) In respect of the organisation and ritual of the church, the laws of Charlemagne are extremely numerous and precise. Thus (Cap. A.D. 769) priests are to be subject to their bishops, and to give an exact account on the first day of Lent of their ministry, and of the rites they have performed; and to entertain the bishop on his visitations. No priest is to undertake the care of a church without the bishop's assent, nor to pass from one church to another. Priests are not to celebrate mass except in places dedicated to God, or, if upon a journey, in a tent and at a table consecrated by the bishop. The bishops and clergy were specially interdicted from engaging in battle or accompanying the armies, excepting a few bishops with their attending priests selected to perform sacred duties; also from hunting with dogs and keeping hawks and falcons. Every bishop was to visit his diocese (parochia) once a year, and put a step to pagan rites and ceremonies (auguria, phylacteria, incantationes vel omnes superstitias gentium). Bishops were to have due authority over priests and other clerics within their diocese (Cap. A.D. 779), and to be themselves subject to the metropolitans. A bishop was not to receive a cleric attached to another diocese, nor to ordain him to a higher function. The faith and good life of candidates for ordination was to be investigated by the bishop, and fugitive clerics and strangers were not to be received or ordained without "litteræ commendatiæ" and the licence of

Wilfrid (A. D. 709), mentions, on one occasion, an altar, and turning to the king before the kings the lands had granted and the sacerdotal clergy had deserted in my." This seems to imply the Saxon kings with lands the British church.

of Charlemagne, which concentrate reign, that is, from which was reproduced in closely resembling forms countries successively reduced to the condition of Justinian by its and its particularly. Nevertheless Charlemagne not only which the church had made years in internal organisation seem to bespeak the spontaneous reference to such of the possible legislation in reference were above distinguished convenient arrangement, and at this date. They concern the ritual of the church, the church, of its officials, and (3) jurisdiction.

The organisation and rituals of Charlemagne are extremely precise. Thus (Cap. A. D. 779) the king is subject to their bishops, and account on the first day of the year, and of the rites they to entertain the bishop on the priest is to undertake the out the bishop's assent, nor except to another. Priests are chosen in places dedicated to the journey, in a tent and at the bishop. The bishops are generally interdicted from accompanying the armies, except with their attending priests and sacred duties; also from and keeping hawks and dogs, and was to visit his diocese, and put a stop to pagan practices (auguria, phylacteria, magus spurcitas gentium), and authority over priests in their diocese (Cap. A. D. 779) and to receive a cleric unless, nor to ordain him to the faith and good life of the church, and was to be investigated and convicted, or ordained without the assent of the bishop, and the licence of their own bishop (Cap. A. D. 789). Bishops were precisely directed as to the subjects of their preaching, such as belief in the doctrines of the Trinity, of the Incarnation, and of the Resurrection, sins for which eternal punishment was due, love of God and one's neighbour, faith, hope, humility, patience, alms, confession, and the like. A number of general directions were given to the clergy as to conduct, such as in respect of swearing in the course of conversation (sed simpliciter cum puritate et veritate omnia decet), entering taverns, getting drunk, or making others so, and preaching the gospel to the people on festival and the Lord's days. Precise regulations are given as to the observance of the Lord's day. No servile work was to be done, or journeys undertaken, except for purposes of warfare, fetching food, and burying the dead. Everyone was to attend church, and the celebration of the mass, and praise God for all the good things He had done on that day. Official public meetings and the public administration of justice were not to take place on that day, except in circumstances of urgent necessity (Cap. A. D. 789, de partibus Saxoniae). The bodies of Christian Saxons were to be buried in the cemeteries of the church, and not in the "tumuli" of the pagans. Children were to be baptized within a year, or a fine was imposed on the person responsible for the neglect. The right of sanctuary was defined very much in the same language as in earlier laws. Homicides and other persons accused of committing crimes punishable with death would not be excused by taking refuge in a church, and no food must be given them there (Cap. A. D. 779). By a later capitulary of A. D. 789 none were to be violently expelled from a sanctuary, but they were to remain till a formal judicial inquiry could take place (dum plectum praesentetur); see also Cap. A. D. 803, 3. Breaking into a church was an offence punishable with death. A synod was to meet twice a year (Cap. A. D. 806). A province was never to be divided between two metropolitans. Lastly (Cap. A. D. 803), reading in church was to be distinct (lectiones in ecclesia distincte legantur).

(2.) As to the property of the church, a considerable part of Charlemagne's laws is concerned with regulating the right to tithes. The general principle of paying tithes is laid down in the capitulary of A. D. 789 ("De partibus Saxoniae"), that every one, noble as well as free born, should give the tenth part of his substance and his labour to the church and the priests." The principle is affirmed over and over again, and applied in detail to various kinds of property. The history of this part of Charlemagne's legislation is passed succinctly in review by Professor Brewer in an Appendix to his Endowment and Establishment of the Church of England, Part I., to which it is sufficient for the present purpose to refer. Bishops and abbots were cautioned as to bestowing a diligent custody on the treasures of the churches, lest by treachery or negligence any gems, vases, or other treasures be lost (Cap. A. D. 806, 3). It was specially provided (Cap. A. D. 804, 3) that if any one wishes to build a church on his own property, he must first have the bishop's assent and licence, and that the ancient tithes payable to the older churches must not be diverted to the new one.

(3.) With respect to jurisdiction no judge was to punish a priest, deacon, or cleric, "without the consenting knowledge of the pontifex," under pain of separation from the church till he confesses and amends. Bishops were to administer justice to the clergy in their dioceses; and obey an abbot, priest, deacon, sub-deacon, does not if they the bishop, the metropolitan must interpose, and if he cannot settle the matter, the parties must come to the king. "cum literis metropolitani" (Cap. A. D. 794). Priests accused of crimes were to be tried at a synod in accordance with a capitulary of pope Innocent's; if they were convicted, they were to be removed from the sacerdotal office. By Cap. A. D. 812, if bishops and abbots could not settle their disputes they must come before the king himself. All other officials were warned against presuming to try such high matters without special authorisation from the king. The decrees of the councils of Nicaea, Chalcedon, Antioch, and Sardica were incorporated in the capitulation. From the preface to some of the capitularies, it seems that the laws were in fact passed as much by the authority of the church as by that of the state. Thus the capitulary of A. D. 779 opens "Anno feliciter undecimo, &c. qualiter congregatis in unum synodaliter concilio facto capitulare episcopis abbatibus virisque iustitribus comitibus una cum Domino nostro se," &c. [See CAPITULARY.]

III. The laws made by the church itself, whether in pursuance of an inherent legislative faculty it holds itself to possess, or as a subordinate legislature dependent on the state, must be considered under the heads of (1) the modes by which the law has at different periods been made, and (2) the modes by which it has been enforced. (1.) It will have been seen from the preceding review to what an extent at different periods and from opposite causes, such as the complete preponderance of the state over the church at one period and the intimate implication of the state with the church at another, the same authority which enacted laws for the state also prescribed the most minute regulations for the internal order of the church, and often at the same moment and in the same document. So true is this, that in the case of some of the capitularies of Charlemagne, and of the legislative acts of the early Saxon kings in England, it is hard to say whether the law-making authority was a church synod or the king surrounded by his ordinary councillors, the bishops, abbots, and chief secular officials in the kingdom. Nevertheless, the church claimed from the earliest times the right of independent legislation, though the limits of this right became soon contested in practice through the interposition of the Eastern emperors, and in theory also as soon as the church of Rome assumed for itself the claim of being the chief, or even the exclusive organ of church legislation (see COUNCIL, I. 473; CANON LAW, I. 265; DECRETAL, I. 539), and thereby precipitated the inevitable controversy with the secular authority in different countries.

(2.) The modes by which the church has been enabled, or has attempted, to make her laws effective by applying suitable penalties for their infraction have always been in fact largely subject to the explicit or implied control of the state, and the more so as the church and the state became co-extensive. Nevertheless, the church has also succeeded in herself punishing her own members and officers for breaches of her laws, and, in the times of her greatest strength, has done so even when the offender, as in the case of Theodosius the Great, was a crowned head. Apart from excommunication, partial or total, temporary or permanent, and public reproof or degradation of office, the most common forms that ecclesiastical penalties gradually took was the enforcement of some painful austerity or discipline [PENITENCE], subsequently commuted for, or admitting of, a regular substitute in a fine. [FINES, I. 671.] It is well-known by what gradual but certain steps this notion of accepting pecuniary compensation for some of the lighter offences gradually led to the principle of admitting for all but a very few "mortal" sins a like satisfaction; and then to the whole system of INDULGENCES [I. 834] by which ecclesiastical penalties were mitigated. An examination of the older Saxon law and the Riparian law, already alluded to, will go far to explain how the notion of pecuniary compensation for sins so easily took root in the Western church. It was, in fact, the common form of all the civic legislation in the German kingdoms which was not directly borrowed from Rome. It has, however, been observed that Tertullian's education as a lawyer led him in his treatise De Poenitentia (c. 19), to regard the ecclesiastical fine exacted for "homicidium, idololatria, fraus, negatio, blasphemia et fornicatio," rather as a "satisfactio" or temporary security for future good conduct than as a penalty for past transgressions. Probably both ideas coalesced in the late church law relative to penance.

The question naturally suggests itself how far, before the death of Charlemagne, the church was in a position to rely upon the co-operation of the state in enforcing her own laws and the procedure of her own courts; for instance, by imparting to a sentence of deprivation its appropriate civil consequences. The truth was that, from the times of the earlier Christian emperors, the jurisdiction of the bishops, in respect of certain matters and persons, was placed upon exactly the same level as the jurisdiction of a civil court (see especially the law of Honorius and Theodosius II., A.D. 408, giving the force of a civil judgment to the sentence of a bishop on a voluntary reference to his arbitration—a law often imputed to Constantine,—and Justinian's 134th Novell already cited). Again, under the municipal government of the empire, in all the later stages of its history, the bishop was intimately concerned in civic administration of the most secular kind in all the chief towns and especially at Rome (see 1 Cod. Jus. iv., and Guizot's Civilisation in Europe, Lect. ii. and Gibbon in reference to Gregory I. chap. xlv.). Lastly, Charlemagne, in constituting his itinerant magistracies, combined in one commission a Comes and a bishop, "ut uterque pleniter suum ministerium peragere possint" (Cap. A.D. 803, chap. iv.). It thus resulted that all the machinery was constantly at hand for enforcing the judgment of the bishop in strictly ecclesiastical matters in the same way as the judgment of a secular court.

But, furthermore, it is to be borne in mind that the canons by which ecclesiastical penalties were imposed were, up to the death of Charlemagne, scarcely distinguishable from the ordinary laws of the empire. The legislative body was, as often as not, constituted in exactly the same way whether engaged in secular or religious legislation, and frequently discharged both classes of business at the same sitting. Both Justinian and Charlemagne expressly incorporated among the published laws of the realm the canons of four general councils (not the same ones); an incessant control and supervision is exercised by the civil ruler over the sitting of councils, and provision is made for the time being fairly distributed between secular and religious business. Thus king Sigibert, in addressing Desiderius, the bishop of Cahors (A.D. 650), directs that no "synodale concilium" be held in his kingdom without his knowledge. The seventeenth council of Toledo in A.D. 694 decreed that in the first three days of every such assembly ecclesiastical affairs should be debated, and then—but not till then—the affairs of the state; and Charlemagne (Cap. A.D. 811, chap. iv.) directs that the abbats, bishops, and counts are to be distributed into different chambers with a view to laymen not interfering with ecclesiastical affairs. Again, while it is probable enough that during the period here concerned excommunication was felt to be a heavier punishment than any ordinary punishment known to the secular laws, and therefore needed no supplement from these, there are signal instances on record of specific legislation for the purpose of moderating or increasing the effect of an ecclesiastical sentence. Thus, in A.D. 595, Childebert makes a decree against those who were excommunicated for murder, still continue rosinate. Pepin (Cap. A.D. 755) makes a similar decree: "Si aliquis ista omnia contemserit et episcopus emendare minime poterit regis judicio exilio condemnetur;" and, lastly, Charlemagne, in redressing a curious abuse which followed from persons excommunicated for murder wandering about the country and presenting scandalous exhibitions of distress, decrees (A.D. 789) "nec isti nudi cum ferro sinantur vagari qui dicunt se data sibi poenitentia ire vagantes. Mellius videtur ut si aliquid inconsumetum et capitale crimen commiserint in loco permanent laborantes et servientes et poenitentiam agentes secundum quod sibi canonice impositum est."

It may be said, generally, that up to the epoch at which the legal organisation of the church was distinct and complete enough to enable the pope to contend on equal terms with the emperor, either the necessities for secular aid in support of ecclesiastical discipline were too rare to attract general attention, or such general harmony of spirit and such a use of common judicial machinery prevailed, as to disguise the real character and amount of the secular interference, or the extreme ecclesiastical penalties were in practice more potent than any civil ones, and therefore stood in no need of support from these.

(See Phillips, Kirchenrecht; Walter, Kirchenrecht; Bickell, Geschichte des Kirchenrechtes; Hebenstreit, Historia Jurisdictionis Ecclesiastice; Biener, de Collectionibus Canonum Ecclesie Græcæ; Baluze, Capitularia Regum Francorum; Gengler, Germanische Denkmäler; Hadan and Stubbs, Councils and Ecclesiastical

istinguishable from the ordinary ire. The legislative body was, nstituted in exactly the same ngaged in secular or religious requently discharged both as at the same sitting. Both harlemagne expressly incorpo-published laws of the realm four general councils (not the easant control and supervision
e civil ruler over the sitting provision is made for the time ributed between secular and
s. Thus king Sigibert, in erlus, the bishop of Cahors that no "synodale concilium"
nglom without his knowledge.
council of Toledo in A.D. 694
the first three days of every eclesiastical affairs should be
—but not till then—the affairs

Charlemagne (Cap. A.D. 811, that the abbats, bishops, and be distributed into different view to laymen not interfering l affairs. Again, while it is that during the period here nunication was felt to be a t than any ordinary punish-secular laws, and therefore ement from these, there are on record of specific legislation moderating or increasing the sistential sentence. Thus, in ert makes a decree against g excommunicated for murder,
inate, Pepin (Cap. A.D. 755)
ecree: "Si aliquis ista omnia
episcopos emendare minime
adicto exilio condemnatur;"
magne, in redressing a curious ved from persons excommuniwandering about the country
andalous exhibitions of distress,
) "nec isti audi cum ferro
ui dicunt se data sibi poeni-tes. Melius videtur ut si um et capitale crimen com-permaneat laborantes et ntentiam agentes secundum impositum est."

l, generally, that up to the
the legal organisation of the net and complete enough to to contend on equal terms er, either the necessities for port of ecclesiastical discipline attract general attention, or mony of spirit and such a use al machinery prevailed, as to character and amount of the ace, or the extreme eccle-were in practice more potent and therefore stood in no om these.

irchenrecht; Walter, Kircheneschichte des Kirchenrechtes;
oria Jurisdictionis Ecclesie; Collectionibus Canonum Eccluze, Capitularia Regum Fran- Germanische Denkmäler; Hab-
Councils and Ecclesiastica

Documents illustrative of the Ecclesiastical History of Great Britain and Ireland; Wilkins, Leyes Anglo-Saxonne Ecclesiastice et Civiles; Codex Theodosianus; Corpus Juris Civilis.)

LAWSUITS. [LITIGATION.]

LAWYEES. The attitude of the church towards lawyers, as towards all persons holding anything like official positions, was, during the era of persecutions, that of suspicion and almost dislike. In some churches they could not be ordained; for we find in a letter of pope Innocent I. (A.D. 402-417) (Ep. 23, ad Cono.
Thet. c. 2) that he complained of the custom existing in the Spanish church of admitting such to ordination, and proposed "that no one should be admitted to the clerical order who had pleaded causes after he was baptized." That this represents the practice of the Roman church there can be little doubt, nor that the rule was soon extended over the French and Spanish churches. And he orders that for the future such persons, if ordained, should be deposed, together with those who ordained them: "ut quicunque tales ordinati fuerint, cum ordinatoribus suis deponantur." We find the council of Sardica (A.D. 347) enacting in its thirteenth canon that a lawyer (σχολαστικὸς ἀπὸ τῆς ἀγορᾶς) might proceed through the grades of reader, deacon, and priest, even to the episcopate, if he were a suitable man. But as Du Pin observes (Cont. iv. p. 261), the Sardican canons were never received by the whole church, nor embodied in the collection authorized by the council of Chalcedon.

We find that such legal assistance as was required by a church or diocese was in the East often, perhaps usually, rendered by a clergyman.
The record of the council of Ephesus shews us Asphalius, a presbyter of Antioch, managing the law business (τὰ πράγματα τῆς αὐτῆς ἐκ- κλησίας) of that church. Similarly John, who appears in the account of the Constantinopolitan council held under Flavian A.D. 448), and ecclesiastical history affords many other instances.

And in the course of another hundred years,
this state of things had so far developed that it was necessary for Justinian to prohibit (Novell.
cxviii. c. 6) the clergy from practising in the courts, or discharging the official function of bail or surety: "Sed neque procuratorem litis, aut fidejussorem pro talibus causis episcopum,
aut alium clericum, cujuslibet gradus, aut mon-asterii sinium;" and the reason assigned is that they would be thereby hindered in their sacred ministry. In earlier time, the apostolic canon (can. 6) had briefly forbidden bishop,
priest, or deacon, to undertake any secular cares, on pain of deposition. The Theodosian code has many provisions against the oppressions practised by those holding legal offices; excessive and illegal exactions, maintenance for themselves
while on their circuits, and such like, which do not immediately concern us here.

The quotation given above from the Novellæ
of Justinian shews that a need was actually experienced by churches and religious houses for the aid of men learned in the law in the management of their property and the defence of suits at law. The need grew with the growth of ecclesiastical possessions; and a tendency shewed itself among the clergy and monasteries even in the West, to find the men required out of the members of their own body, in spite of the canonical prohibitions, which seem to have been in a great degree arbitrary from the first, or which at best rested on a tradition descending from the period of the persecutions. Pope Gelasius (492-496) admitted these officers to the minor orders: "Continuo Lector, aut Notarius, aut certe Defensor ecclesie, post tres menses existat Acolythus." The formula with which the defensores were admitted is curious: "Si nulli clericiens alterius civitatis, nec in nullo canonum obviat statuta, officium Ecclesie Defensorum recipias," &c. We may, perhaps, conclude from a letter of pope Gregory the Great (590-604) that the notaries of the church of Rome were usually subdeacons (lib. vii. Ep. 17).

But by the time we come to the latter part of the 7th century, we find that these legal offices were for the most part in the hands of laymen, at all events in Gaul. The second bidding lawyers to prosecute suits on the Lord's Day, under pain of being disbursed (can. 1).
And we find among the Decretals of pope Eugenius II. (A.D. 824) one forbidding "advocati," evidently laymen, to usurp or seize by force any recompense beyond what they were entitled to by ancient right and custom. [S. J. E.]

LAY BAPTISM. [BAPTISM, § 80, I. 167; LITURGY, § 3.]

LAY COMMUNION. Offences which in a layman were punished by ἀφορισμός, segregation or suspension of the right to communicate, were in the clergy punished by reduction to "lay communion." That is to say, they were reduced to the condition of laymen, deprived of office, and forbidden to exercise their clerical functions. When a clerk was said to be denied lay communion, it meant that he was excommunicated as well as deprived. As two erroneous opinions have been maintained respecting lay communion, one that it meant communion in one kind, the other that it meant communion in the sacrament with the laity, i.e. without the bema or the chancel, it is desirable to illustrate the subject by an ample chain of testimony. The 15th Apostolical canon orders that any clergyman staying in another diocese against the will of his own bishop, shall not be allowed to celebrate, "but may nevertheless communicate there as a layman." By the 62nd, a clerk who had denied Christ, or his own office, in a time of persecution, was "after penance to be received as a layman." Cornelius of Rome writing to Fabius of Antioch, about 251, says of one of the bishops who had consecrated Novatian, but afterwards confessed his fault, "All the people present entreatng for him, we communicated with him as a layman" (Euseb. Hist. Eccl. v. 43). When says, "He was received into lay communion,"
that phrase having sprung up in the interval, Cyprian, writing in 252, says of Trophimus, who is supposed to be the bishop mentioned by Cornelius, "He was so admitted that he communi-cates as a layman" (Epist. 55 ad Anton.). Two years later the same father says that Basilides, another offending bishop, on his repentance, "thought himself sufficiently happy, if it were granted him to communicate even as a layman" (Ep. ad Felicem, &c.). Again, in a letter to Stephen of Rome, A.D. 256, St. Cyprion declares that it had long been settled at Carthage "by consent and common authority" that presbyters and deacons, who had fallen into heresy or schism, should "on their return be received on this condition, that they should communicate as laymen" (Epist. 72 ad Steph.). There is extant an account of a council held in that city in the same year, at which a bishop delivered it as his opinion, that "all schismatics and heretics who had turned to the church should be rebaptized, but that those who seemed to have been ordained should also be received among the laity" (sent. 4). The council of Elvira, A.D. 305, orders that a deacon who had committed a great crime before ordination, and did not come forward as his own accuser, should be five years in penance, and then "receive lay communion" (can. 76). This is the earliest instance of the use of that expression. At the council convened at Cologne to consider the case of the Arian bishop of that city, one of the bishops present expressed himself thus: "Because Euphrates denies that Christ is God, I agree that he cannot be a bishop, who ought not to receive even lay communion" (Synod. Agripp. sent. 2). This council is assigned with some doubt to the year 346. We may observe that in the last two instances there is a probable reference to the Eucharist, the reception of which was the chief privilege and sign of communion in the other sense. In 347 the council of Sardica decreed that if two bishops whom it deposed "asked for lay communion, it should not be denied them" (can. 19). St. Athanasius, writing in 349 or the year following, says that it was "notorious, and a thing beyond doubt with every one, that Colluthus (who had affected the title and performed the acts of a bishop) had died a presbyter, and that every ordination by him had been annulled, and all ordained by him in the schism had been made laymen, and so came to synaxis" (Apol. contra Arianos). St. Basil A.D. 370: "Those clerks who sin a sin unto death are deposed from their order, but not kept from the communion of laymen. For thou shalt not punish the same offence twice" (ad Amphilocho, c. 32). Siricius of Rome, A.D. 385: "Let any clerk who shall have married either a widow, or at all events a second wife, be at once stripped of every privilege of ecclesiastical dignity, lay communion only being conceded to him" (Epist. ad Himer. c. 11). At a general African council assembled at Hippo in 393, it was decreed that the Donatist clergy should on their return to the church be "received into the number of the laity" (can. 41). The council of Toledo, A.D. 400 (can. 4) decreed that a subdeacon who was deposed for the third time should, after suffering penance, communicate for two years, "being excluded by penance, communicate among laymen." A Roman council under Felix, A.D. 487, decreed that those who had been rebaptized among heretics "shall be proper that they lie under penance (should they repent) to the last day of their life; and that they be not on any account present at the prayers, not of the faithful only, but even of the catechumens, to whom lay communion only is to be restored at their death" (can. 2). The council of Agde, in France, A.D. 506, of clergymen guilty of crime: "deposed from the honour of office let such an one be thrust into a monastery, and there let him receive lay communion only as long as he lives" (can. 50). The council of Lerida, in Spain, A.D. 524, of clergymen who, after professing repentance, had fallen again into gross sin: "Let them not only be deprived of the dignity of office, but not even receive the holy communion, except when dying" (can. 5). Here the sacrament is distinctly meant, by the reception of which they might have been consigned to "lay communion" in its true and proper sense. The council of Orleans, A.D. 538, orders that any clerk, from a subdeacon upwards, who shall cohabit with his wife, be "deposed from office according to the decrees of former canons, and be content with lay communion" (can. 2). By two other canons of this council, the offenders are to be reduced to lay communion, but that phrase is not employed. In one case, "deposed from office, communion being granted to him, he is to be thrust into a monastery for the whole period of his life" (can. 7); in the other, "communion being granted to him, he is to be degraded from his order" (can. 26). That "lay communion" was used as a punishment to the end of our period and later appears from the following chapter out of the 6th book of the Captivities of the French Kings collected by Benedict the deacon, A.D. 845: "If any bishop, presbyter, or deacon, or subdeacon shall go to the war, and put on warlike arms for fighting, let him be deposed from every office, so that he have not even lay communion" (c. xl. Comp. Cronozes, Isaac Episc. Lingon. tit. xl. c. x.).

From the foregoing extracts it will be inferred that the expression "lay communion" had generally no immediate reference to the reception of the Eucharist. It merely denoted the whole position of a layman in full communion with the church. But as that sacrament was only given to persons in full communion with the church, it came to the same thing whether a deposed clerk were said to be allowed lay communion, or to receive the sacrament of the holy communion. One who passed out of penance into lay communion would of course be formally absolved by the bishop, before he could receive the sacrament; but there is no reason to believe that any form of admission was generally employed when a disqualified clerk passed, without performing penance, into the position of a lay communicant. There appears, however, to have been one exception in the church of Rome, if we may trust to an Epistle ascribed to Innocent I., about 404, but believed on good grounds to be spurious: "It is the law of our church to grant lay communion only to those who come over from the heretics (who however have been baptized among them) by the imposition of hands" (Ep. ad Epist. Maced. c. 4).

A criminous clerk fell into lay communion by the application of a principle laid down by many councils and writers; viz. that one who had been under public penance was incapable of orders. Thus St. Augustine: "It hath been most strictly decreed that after penance performed for crime liable to condemnation no one should be a clergyman" (Epist. 185, ad Bonif. c. x. § 45). [See PENITENCE; ORDERS, HOLY.]

2. The council of Agde, in of clergymen guilty of crime; he honour of office let such an into a monastery, and there let communion only as long as he b. The council of Lerida, in of clergymen who, after proe, had fallen again into gross not only be deprived of this but not even receive the holy nt when dying" (can. 5). Here distinctly meant, by the recep- y might have been consigned to " in its true and proper sense, Orleans, A.D. 538, orders that subleaven upwards, who shall wife, be "deposed from office decrees of former canons, and lay communion" (can. 2). By of this council, the offenders l to lay communion, but that oyled. In one case, "deposed ion being granted to him, he to a monastery for the whole (can. 7); in the other, "com- d to him, he is to be de- order" (can. 26). That "lay used as a punishment to the ad later appears from the fol- of the 6th book of the Cypria- A Kings collected by Benedict 45: "If any bishop, presbyter, ceon shall go to the war, and as for fighting, let him be de- office, so that he have not even (c. lxi. Comp. Canoncs, Isaac xi. c. x.).

ing extracts it will be inferred ion "lay communion" had idiate reference to the reception It merely denoted the whole n in full communion with the hat sacrament was only given communion with the church, me thing whether a deposed e be allowed lay communion, erament of the holy commu- out of penance into lay of course be formally absolved re he could receive the sacra- is no reason to believe that sion was generally employ- ed clerk passed, without per- into the position of a lay- n appears, however, to have n the church of Rome, it was pistic ascribed to Innocent I., lered on good grounds to be e law of our church to grant nly to those who come over (who however have been hem) by the imposition of ist. Macc. c. 4).

ck fell into lay communion by a principle laid down by many ers; viz. that one who had e penance was incapable of Augustine: "It hath been eed that after penance per- able to condemnation no one ma" (Epist. 185, ad Bonif. PENITENCE; ORDEIS, HOLY.

LAY COMMUNION

Heresies returning to the church were always sub- jected to this discipline. St. Augustine represents the Donatists who thus: "If, say they, it of the church, and against the church, that we may be capable of salvation, how is it that we remain clerics or even bishops after that pen- nce?" (Ord. § 44). Replying to this, St. Augus- good in itself for the church, but was permitted in order to end a worse evil, the continuance of the schism. When the Nicene council, A.D. 325, admitted the Novatian clergy to communion, it imposed no penance, and even allowed them to retain their rank and exercise their functions, if they live in places where there was room for it (can. 8). When Cornelius was restored, he received the Novatian presbyter Maximus to com- munion, he also permitted him to continue in his office (Epist. 49, inter Epp. Cyp.).

II. There was another punishment for offend- ing clerks, of which we read in a few canons under the name of communio peregrina, the communion of travellers, or, as it has been less properly rendered, of strangers. The 3rd canon of Nice, A.D. 325, directs that a schismatical bishop shall on his return to the church either be "encouraged by the title of chorepiscopus, as the 8th canon of Nicea speaks, or by peregrine communion, as they say." The council of Agde orders that contumacious and neglectful clerks shall have "peregrine communion assigned to them, but so that when penance shall have corrected them, they may be again enrolled and reassume their order and dignity" (can. 2). Here we observe in passing that the penitential of which this canon speaks must be repentance or private penance; because, as we have seen, no one could exercise any clerical function who had ever been subject to public penance. The same council says: "If any clerk shall have stolen from a church, let peregrine communion be assigned to him" (can. 5). The 16th canon of Lerida directs that a clerk who, on the death of his bishop, had stolen anything from his house, or fraudulently concealed anything, shall be condemned with the longer anathema, as guilty of sacrilege, and that the communion of trav- ellers be hardly granted to him." The 2nd and 5th canons of Agde appear in the code of Charlemagne and his successors compiled by Angustinus and Benedict in the 8th century (Cypt. Rep. Franc. i. 1075, 1094, 1225).

Peregrine communion has been supposed by several writers to be identical with lay commu- nion. That they differed, and how, will appear from the following considerations. (1) There travellers having no more to do with lay com- munion than residents. (2) The council of Agde in one canon (50) imposes lay communion on clerks guilty of capital offences, forgery, and false witness; while others inflict peregrine communion on contumacy (c. 2) and theft from a church (c. 5). From this we infer that the latter penalty was something less severe than the former. (3) Again, the 2nd canon of Agde shows that a clerk refused to peregrine commu- nion might be restored; whereas we have seen that lay communion was for life. (4) The same suggests the nature of the punishment. It appears to intimate that the clerk on whom it was inflicted was placed in the position of a traveller who came to a strange church without bringing letters of communion. [See KOISKO- STRON.] Such a visitor was admissible to the less sacred offices of religion, but not permitted to receive the Eucharist until a letter, vouching for him, arrived from his own bishop, vouching we see that peregrine communion involved absten- tion from the sacrament for a time, which lay communion did not. [W. E. S.]

LAZARUS

LAY ELDERS. [Eldena.]

LAZARUS (1). In Ethiopia his first death is commemorated March 14, his resurrection March 16, his second rest, in Cyprus, of which he was bishop, May 22. From Citium in Cyprus his relics were brought to Constantinople, Oct. 17, A.D. 890, by Leo the Wise (Tillem. ii. 36). Before that time he had no fixed day among the Greeks, unless he be meant by Lycarion, Feb. 8 (Menol. Lucil.), but was celebrated on the vigil of Palm Sunday (Tillem. ii. 37). At Rome in the 7th century he was commemorated with Martha only, Dec. 17—a custom seemingly taken from their convent near Bethany (Mart. Rom.; Usuard).

(2) Bishop of Milan, † Feb. 11, A.D. 449, (Acta SS. Feb. ii. 521).

(3) The name occurs in the Mart. Hieron. April 12.

(4) Oct. 18. (Cal. Ethiop.)

(5) With Thalassius, Dec. 6. (Cal. Ethiop.) [E. B. B.]

LAZARUS (IN ART). The Resurrection of Lazarus is naturally a subject very frequently represented in Christian Art. We find it in catacombs, churches, and cemeteries, in paintings, sculptures, and mosaics, on simple slabs, and on sarcophagi! (Ciampini, Vet. Mon. ii. tab. 97). In some cases, where no such painting, mosaic, and sculpture exists, either outside or inside the tomb we find small statues of Lazarus, in metal or ivory, affixed to the exterior. In early representations of this great event, Lazarus appears as a small manmy-like figure swathed in bandages, the head is bound with a napkin, which surrounds the face, leaving it uncovered (Buonarrotti, Vet. tab. vii. 1). The Lord stands before this figure, which is placed upright at the entrance to a small temple, and in most instances He touches it with a rod. Sometimes He extends His right hand, whilst in the left He holds a half-opened volume (Bottari, tab. xxviii.-xlii. etc.). In some examples the right hand is free, and raised in the act of benediction according to the Latin form (Arianghi, ii. 121), sometimes His hand is laid upon the head of Lazarus (ib. ii. 181). An example in the cem- etery of Callixtus (id. i. 565) shows us an exact representation of a chrysis instead of the swathed figure; possibly allusion to the resur- rection may be here intended. On some Gal- lican sarcophagi, Lazarus appears extended on the ground, no tomb being visible, as in an example in the "Musée Lapidaire" of Lyons (No. 764; Millin, Midi de la France, Atlas, pl. lxxv.). On glass cups, where the greater portion of the design is, as usual, in gold, the graveclothes are in silver (Buonarrotti, vii. 2; Perret, iv. pl. xxxii. 97). Disregarding the sacred text, we find some artists giving fold- ing-doors to the tomb of Lazarus (Buonarrotti, vii.

3), though it was in fact closed with a stone. Sometimes it is hewn out of the natural rock, without any attempt at architecture (Ariughi, ii. 331), and shrubs are placed upon the two steps at the entrance.

Some artists, who probably had but a slight acquaintance with Jewish customs, have placed the body of Lazarus in a sarcophagus (Bottari, tab. lxxix.), adorned with lions' heads, and even supported by sphinxes, subjects of very rare occurrence in early Christian Art (ib. tab. cxcviii.). The diminutive, even infantine, proportions of the body of Lazarus, as represented by ancient artists, cannot fail to excite attention. It may be that the beginning of a new life is thus symbolized; but more probably this is only an instance of a custom frequent in other representations of the Lord's miracles, of making the object of the miracle small in comparison with the Lord Himself [BLIND, HEALING OF, I. 241]. A curious fresco in the cemetery of Rennes (Ariughi, ii. 329), shows the swathed figure standing on the flat without any support, and without the usual temple. In paintings and on glass [GLASS, I. 730], the two essential figures—the Lord and Lazarus—are alone represented. A fragment of a mosaic given by Marchi (Monum. tab. xlvii.) furnishes perhaps the only exception to this rule. In this, a female figure, presumably one of the sisters of Lazarus, kneels at the feet of the Lord, and extends her hands towards him.

LAZARUS. From Martigny.

This is of much more frequent occurrence in the bas-reliefs of sarcophagi. These are of more recent date, and always complete the scene with the figures of Martha and Mary (Ariughi, i. 335), or at least the latter, prostrate or kneeling, at the feet of the Saviour (ib. i. 323, etc.), or sometimes devoutly kissing his hand (ib. i. 423). A curious sepulchral stone, unfortunately broken, shows two hands behind the Lord, all that remains of a figure, probably that of Mary, which formerly stood there (Perret, iv. 13). Sometimes the scene is completed and enlarged by the figures of two or more disciples, towards whom the Lord turns as if to draw their attention to the miracle (Ariughi, i. 427).

The Christian artists of these early times frequently connect Old and New Testament subjects, between which any real or fancied analogy is traceable. Thus, in many instances, particularly on sarcophagi, we have Moses striking the rock, introduced as a pendant to the resurrection of Lazarus. We even find the two subjects united, as in the fresco of an arcossolium given by Ariughi (ii. 123). In another fresco in the cemetery of Rennes, the figures of the Lord and Moses are nearly identical in dress, in attitude, and even in countenance (ib. 329). Even on simple sepulchral slabs we find the two subjects associated in a similar manner (Perret, v. pl. lxiii. 29).

The tomb of Lazarus was guarded with religious care by the faithful, and visited by them with the other sacred and memorable places in Palestine (Jerome, Eyrist. ii.). We learn from Jerome also (De Loc. Heb. s. v. Bethania) that a church was built upon the site. This is also mentioned by Bede, but it seems certain that there was no church there in the time of Constantine, as the itinerary of Jerusalem made in that emperor's reign contains no allusion to it. (Martigny, Dict. des Antiq. Chret. s. r.) [C.]

LEA (1) Widow, friend of Jerome † at Bethlehem, March '2 (Acta SS. Mar. iii. 381).

(2) Martyr in Africa, Sept. 28 (Mart. H. r. Florentini). [E. B. B.]

LEACUS, martyr at Nicomedia, Jan. 27 (Mart. Hieron. D'Ach.), in Africa, Mart. Gallon. [E. B. B.]

LEANDER. Bishop of Seville, and converter of Goths from Arianism under Recared, commemorated Feb. 27, Ado (Usuard). His name is added, without specification, in the Hieronymus Mart. Also on Feb. 28 (D'Ach. Spicileg. iv. 630). [E. B. B.]

LECERUS, deacon at Antioch, Jan. 15 (Mart. Hieron. D'Ach.). [E. B. B.]

LECTERN (lectorium, lectoria). A standing desk in a church, from which certain portions of service were read. It appears to have been of later introduction than the Ambo [AMBO], and to have differed from that by being placed in the centre of the choir instead of at the side. Lectoria are very frequently mentioned in the "litter pontificalis" of Anastasius among the gifts made by the popes to the basilicns. They are described as being of large size, often made of, or coated with, the precious metals, and richly moulded and embossed. They were usually provided with candelabra (cerostati) standing on either side, lighted on Sundays and festivals (Anastas. pp. 397, 419, 546). Leo III. (A.D. 795, 816) gave a lectern "of purest silver of wondrous size" with candelabra to St. Peter's (Anastas. p. 399). Leo IV. (A.D. 847-855) also gave to the same basilica one of silver, chased, standing on four feet, surmounted by a lion's head, with four candelabra plated with silver (ib. 552). St. Eligius is stated to have plated a lectern with gold (Audoenus, Vit. S. Elig. apud Duange). Hierulphus (apud Duange) speaks also of lectoria constructed of marble, silver and gold.

The cloth that covered a lectern was termed lectorinus. (Ann. l. Medivan. apud Muratori, tom. xvi. col. 810.) [E. V.]

artists of these early times from Old and New Testament subjects, any real or fancied analogy is, in many instances, participating. We have Moses striking the rock as a pendant to the resurrection. We even find the two subjects in a fresco of an arcosolium given (123). In another fresco in the pines, the figures of the Lord and his disciples are, in dress, in attitude, and in countenance (ib. 329). Even on the slabs we find the two subjects in similar manner (Perret, v. p.

Lazarus was guarded with religious faithfulness, and visited by them in sacred and memorable places in the time, Epist. ii.). We learn from De Loc. Heb. s. 7. (Beniano) was built upon the site. This is by Bele, but it seems certain no church there in the time of the itinerary of Jerusalem made in the reign contains no allusion to the Dict. des Antiq. Chret. s. v.)

[C.]

low, friend of Jerome † at Bethlehem (Acta SS. Mar. iii. 381).

in Africa, Sept. 28 (Mart. H. r.)

[E. B. B.]

martyr at Nicomedia, Jan. 27 (D'Ach.), in Africa, Mart. Gallon.

[E. B. B.]

Bishop of Seville, and confessor under Ricared, Feb. 27. Ado (Usuard). His name is not specified in the Hieronymus. Also on Feb. 28 (D'Ach. Spicilij.) deacon at Antioch, Jan. 15 (D'Ach.).

[E. B. B.]

[E. B. B.]

(lectorium, lectoria). A standing lectern, from which certain portions of the Scriptures are read. It appears to have been of wood, and from that by being placed in the choir instead of at the side. Lectionarium mentioned in the "liber Anastasius among the gifts made to the basilicas. They are described of various size, often made of, or coated with, various metals, and richly moulded. They were usually provided with a tabula standing on either side.

Leo III. (A.D. 795, 816) gave a silver lectern of wondrous size to St. Peter's (Anastas. p. 399). Leo IV. (817-855) also gave to the same silver, chased, standing on four feet by a lion's head, with four lions on silver (ib. 552). St. Basil is said to have plated a lectern with silver, Vid. S. Elij. apud Ducauge, ib. 17-855) also speaks of a lectern of marble, silver and gold. A lectern covered in leather was termed lecternum. Mediolan. apud Muratori, (0.)

[E. V.]

LECTICARIUS. The name given in Justinian's Novella 43 (Pref.) to the members of a guild for interring the dead, from their carrying the lectica or bier. See COMIATAE, DECANUS (1.)

[C.]

LECTION (lectio; ἀνάγνωσις; Lectio; Eng. Lesson). The words ἀνάγνωσις and Lectio may be taken in a wider sense to include all readings which formed part of Divine Service. [EPISTOLAE; GOSPEL; PROPHECY.] The word Lectio is here however taken in a narrower sense, to denote the readings of selected passages during the ordinary daily office. Such readings were of three kinds.

1. Passages of Holy Scripture.
2. Passages from comments or homilies of the Fathers.

3. Acts of Martyrs or other saints. The readings from Holy Scripture, of which Justin Martyr speaks, were connected with the administration of the Eucharist, and are therefore to be regarded rather as corresponding to the Epistle, Gospel, and Prophecy of later times, than to the lectures with which we are now concerned. It is not until a later date that we find distinct indications of the mingling of lectures with Psalms, as in the Hour-Offices of the present day.

There are in the Eastern Daily Offices no lectures from Scripture. The scheme of service given in the Apostolical Constitutions (ii. 57-62) contains none, and even to this day the ordinary Greek offices are entirely devoid of them. In the morning office on Sundays and Festivals the Gospel is read. That lectures from Scripture were in use in the province or district represented at the council of Laodicea, in the fourth century, we have distinct evidence in the canon quoted below, though ultimately another system prevailed in the East generally. This system was that of the intermixture of Orders with psalms; and Archdeacon Freeman regards these as the equivalents of the Western lectures, which, with their long responsories, came to be in fact, "a long and elaborate piece of music interrupted at intervals by a very brief recitative out of Holy Scripture" (De iure Sacrificii, i. 70, 125, 345). We may perhaps regard this absence of lectures from the Eastern offices as an indication of their connection with the synagogue, where Moses appears to have been read "every Sabbath day" only.

The council of Laodicea, about A.D. 360, enjoined (c. 17) that in the assemblies for worship (συναγωγαι) the psalms should not be said in continuous series, but that between each psalm there should be a lecture (ἀνάγνωσις); and this only from Canonical Scripture [CANONICAL BOOKS, i. 279]. At a somewhat later date, John Cassian tells us (De Coenob. Inst. ii. 4) that throughout all Egypt the custom was to divide the psalms into groups of twelve; after the saying of each twelve there followed two lectures, of the Old and the New Testament. This very ancient custom is observed (he says) the more religiously in all the monasteries of that district, because it was reputed to be no invention of man, but to have been brought from heaven by an angel. The third council of Carthage (c. 47) forbade anything but canonical Scripture to be read in churches. St. Augustine also (Epist. 64. c. 3) speaks of the danger of reading in the church other writings than those contained in the canon received by the church. Isidore of Seville (Lequit. c. 7) says that in the office the lectures were taken generally from the Old and New Testament, but on Saturdays and Sundays from the New only.

The Rule of Caesarius ad Monachos (c. 20) prescribes that in vigils from the month of October to Easter there should be two Nocturns and three "Missae" [i.e. lectures, whether from the Bible or from Passions]; also (c. 25) that on every Sabbath, every Lord's day, and every Festival, there should be twelve psalms, and every Festival, and three lectures; one from the Prophets, one from the Apostle, and a third from the Gospel. The Rule of Aurelian (Migne, Patrol. vol. 68, p. 304) orders in the nocturns on ordinary days two lectures of the Apostle or the Prophets, and Capitulum in Paschal nocturns three, from the Acts, the Apocalypse, and the Gospels. It also (c. 14) enjoins that the ordinary course of the lectures be interrupted and proper lectures substituted, on festivals.

St. Benedict's Rule (c. 9) prescribes that in the winter half of the year, when the long nights permitted prolonged nocturns, after the saying of six psalms and the abbat's benediction, while all sat on benches there should be read in turns by the brothers from the book on the lectern three lectures, with a responsory at the end of each, the last responsory followed by a Gloria. These lectures are to be not only from the Old and New Testament, but also from the explications of Scripture by orthodox doctors and Catholic Fathers of the highest repute (nominatissimis). After these three lectures come the remaining six psalms, with Alleluia; then the lecture of the Apostle (i.e. the Capitulum) said by heart, the verse and the Kyrie Eleison. Who are to be reckoned "nominatissimi doctores" is a matter of some doubt; some only reckon Ambrose, Jerome, Augustine, and Gregory to belong to this class; others add such writers as Basil, Hilary, John Chrysostom, Gregory Nazianzen, and Bede. See the note on c. 9 in the Regula Commentata (Migne, Patrol. vol. 66, p. 272).

We learn from the Miracu a S. Stephanii (ii. 2; in Martene, iv. v. 2) that a letter of bishop Severus was read after the canonical lectures. And it appears from a letter of Gregory the Great (Epist. x. 22) that in some cases at least the comments of distinguished doctors were read in his time; for he disapproved the conduct of Marinianus, bishop of Ravenna, who had ordered his (Gregory's) comments on the Book of Job to be read at vigils; "bid him," he writes to John the sub-deacon, "cause comments on the Psalms to be read at vigils, as being especially adapted to promote good dispositions among the seculars; for while I am yet in the flesh, I will not have anything which I may chance to have written published at once to all men." From which it appears that there was no objection to the reading of comments on Scripture in the offices—which, indeed, seems to have been a recognised practice—but only to reading comments of the then living pope.

In the life of St. Stephen the younger, A.D. 767 (Migne, Patrol. Ser. Grec. vol. 100, p. 410), we read that the saint while yet a boy, instead of sitting down, as was the custom during the reading of the lectures, stood close to the chancel rails and listened to the reader, and so learned to repeat what was read, whether a martyrdom, or a life, or a sermon of some pious Father, especially St. John Chrysostom.

The council of Clovesho, A.D. 747 (c. 15, Hadan and Stubbs, iii. 367), forbids the clergy to sing or read in their offices anything not sanctioned by common usage; that is, they are to use only what is sanctioned by Holy Scripture and what the practice of the Roman church permits (tantum quod ex S. Scripturarum auctoritate descendit et quod Romanae Ecclesiae usus permittit). This canon shows that lections were taken not only from Holy Scripture, but from other books sanctioned by the Roman church.

In the lections used in the daily office, which were not wholly scriptural, many defects and errors had been introduced before the eighth century, especially in the Gallican lectionaries. This led Charlemagne, in a Constitutio de Emendatione Librorum et Officiorum Ecclesiasticorum of the year 788 (Baluze, Capitul. i. 203), to make the following provision for their amendment: "Whereas we have found many of the lections compiled, with however good intent, for use in the nocturnal office, unfit for their purpose, as having no name of an author appended and being full of innumerable blunders; we do not allow in our days inharmonious solecisms to be heard in divine lections in the sacred offices, and have given our mind to bring the same lections into a better way. And we laid the perfecting of that work upon Paul the deacon, one of our household, namely, that carefully going through the sayings of the Catholic Fathers, he might (as it were) gather certain flowers out of their exquisite meads, and weave those which are most profitable into one garland. Who, desiring to yield devoted obedience to our Highness, after reading through the tracts and sermons of divers of the Catholic Fathers and choosing the best, has presented to us in two volumes a series of lections, cleared of errors, suitable for each festival throughout the circle of the year. Of all which pondering the text with our sagacity, we sanction the same volumes with our authority, and deliver over to you, religious readers, to read in the churches of Christ."

That the practice of reading Acts of Martyrs on their festivals had begun before the time of St. Augustine is evident from a sermon of his on St. Stephen (Sermo 315, c. 1), in which he lays stress on the fact that the passion of the first martyr was contained in a canonical book, while acts of other martyrs to be recited at their commemorations could scarcely be found at all. And again he says (Sermo 273, c. 2), "You heard the questions of the persecutors and the answers of the confessors when the passion of the saints was read." Nor was this a custom peculiar to Africa. Various old monastic rules (e.g. Aurelian de Ordine Psallendi, Migne's Patrol. tom. 68, p. 396) prove that the reading of lives of the saints or acts of martyrs in the offices was also a custom of the Gallican church. A lectionary of Luxeuil, which Martene believed to be of the seventh or eighth century, contains lections from the acts of SS. Juliana and Basilica. Avitus of Vienne († 523) in a fragment of a homily (Fr. vi.; Migne, Patrol. 59, p. 297) mentions that the passion of the martyrs of Agaune was read "according to custom"; and Caesarius of Arles (Sermo 300 in Augustine's Works, v. v. p. 2319, Migne) speaks of the long readings from passions (passiones proluxae) in the church. Gregory of Tours (De Gloria Martyrum, i. 286) states that the Passion of Polycarp was publicly read.

In the church of Lyons it seems that none but Scripture lessons were anciently read, even on the vigil of a saint. The bishops who were present at the Collatio Episcoporum before king Gundebald in the year 499 (D'Achery, Spicilegium, iii. 304 ff. Paris, 1723), unanimously determined to hold vigil at the tomb of St. Justus, whose festival happened to occur at that time. In this office we find that the lections were wholly from the Scriptures of the Old and New Testament; no acts of St. Justus were read even in the vigil of his own festival. Nor was the church of Rome by any means ready to admit Acts of Martyrs into the public offices. The decretal of Gelasius I. (Gratiani Decret. Dist. xv. c. 3, § 17) states that such acts are, in accordance with ancient custom, not read in the Roman church, out of caution, for in many cases the names of the writers are unknown, and they are sometimes written by infidels or unskillful persons in a manner altogether unworthy of the subject. And even at a comparatively late date Acts of Martyrs seem to have been excluded from the offices in some districts, for Martene (iv. v. 4) states that in many MS. lectionaries of the Cistercian order in Maine, about five hundred years old in his time (i.e. so late as the twelfth century), no lections are found, but passages of Scripture and homilies of the Fathers.

And the same distrust of the numerous acts of martyrs which were current in the church, appears in the sixty-third canon of the Trullan Council, at the end of the seventh century. "We decree," runs the canon, "that Martyrologies falsely composed by enemies of the truth, with the view of dishonouring the martyrs of Christ, and bringing those who hear them into unbelief, should not be published in the churches, but delivered to the fire; and we anathematize those who receive them or give heed to them as true." In the same spirit pope Hadrian writes (Epist. ad Car. Magn.): "Lives of the Fathers not resting on authority (sive probabilibus auctoribus) are not read in the church. Those which bear the names of orthodox writers are both received and read. For the canons of the church sanction the reading of the Passions of the Martyrs in the church when their anniversaries are celebrated."

In the time of St. Augustine, if not earlier, the practice had established itself of assigning certain lections to certain days; these, says the saint in the opening of his exposition of the first epistle of St. John, were so fixed in their courses that no others could be read. To the same effect, the first (Mansi's second) council of Braga (circ. A.D. 563), decreed (c. 2) that in the vigils or "missae"^b of festivals, all [the clergy of the province] should read the same and not different lections.

^a The copies of this document vary greatly, and it is difficult to say how much is interpolated.

^b It must be borne in mind that this word was not limited to altar-offices. [MISSA.]

...ding to custom"; and Caesarius 300 in Augustine's Works, v. v.
e) speaks of the long readings missions prolixae) in the church.
s (De Gloria Martyrum, i. 286) Passion of Polycarp was publicly of Lyons it seems that none but s were anciently read, even on The bishops who were pre-lato Episcoporum before king year 499 (D'Achery, Spicilicium, 1723), unanimously determined the tomb of St. Justus, whose l to occur at that time. In this at the lections were wholly from

of the Old and New Testament;
ists were read even in the vigil ival. Nor was the church of ans ready to admit Acts of Mar-public offices. The Decretal of iani Devet. Dist. xv. c. 3, § 17) acts are, in accordance with not read in the Roman church, for in many cases the names of unknown, and they are some-invidious or unskillful persons in their unworthy of the subject.
Comparatively late date Acts of
have been excluded from the istricts, for Martene (iv. v. 4)
any MS. lectionaries of the Cis-aine, about five hundred years
e. so late as the twelfth cen-
s are found, but passages of ilies of the Fathers.

istrust of the numerous acts of
were current in the church, ty-third canon of the Trullan ad of the seventh century. "We e canon, "that Martyrologies by enemies of the truth, with mouring the martyrs of Christ,
e who hear them into unbelief,
ublished in the churches, but ree and we anathematize those o give heed to them as true."
it pope Hadrian writes (Epist.
"Lives of the Fathers not ity (sine probabilius auctoriin the church. Those which of orthodox writers are both For the canons of the church
ng of the Passions of the March when their anniversaries are

St. Augustine, if not earlier, established itself of assigning ertain days; these, says the g of his exposition of the first were so fixed in their courses
d be read. To the same effect, second] council of Braga [circ.
d (c. 2) that in the vigils or ivals, all [the clergy of the ead the same and not different is document vary greatly, and it is ch is interpolated.

is in mind that this word was not [Missal.]

It does not appear however, even when certain lections were assigned to certain days, that their extent was limited in the same exact manner as in modern Breviaries; the reader continued to read the passage of Scripture, or of a Father, or the Passion, as the case might be, until the chief person in the choir signed to him to stop. A common practice in monastic churches was for the presiding brother to clap his hands; in the church of St. Martin, at Tours, he called out "fac faciem," the words which Martene (iv. v. 6) found written at the end of the lections in an old lectionary.
Charles the Great, when he was present at the office, used to stop the reader by some kind of cough or grunt (sono gutturis); and in a church where the emperor was present it was useless to "get up" a portion beforehand; every one in the choir had to be prepared to read, if called upon, any portion of the lections of the day (De Eccl.
Curia Car. Mag., quoted by Martene, iv. v.
6). In the Roman church it was an ancient custom for the deacons to sing the first words of Tu autem Domine at the end of lections (Ordo Rom. pp. 193 and 174). It was not uncommon for the end of the lections to be marked beforehand in the book with a piece of wax, such as Martene (u.s.) says that he has often seen in ancient lectionaries still adhering to the spot.

As to the extent of each lection it is ordered in the rule of Aurelian that three or four pages be read, according as the copy used was written in larger or smaller characters.

The practice of reading a certain series of passages in the offices having once grown up, it was natural that books should be formed containing the requisite extracts. This took place in fact at a comparatively early period. Sidonius Apollinaris (Epist. iv. 2) mentions among the good deeds of Claudian († 470), brother of Mamertas of Vienne, that he drew up a lectionary:

"Hic solemnibus annis paravit Quae quo tempore lecta convenirent."

Gennadius (De Scriptis. Eccl. c. 79) says of Musaeus, a Gallican writer contemporary with Claudian, that he extracted from Holy Scripture
the lections for the festivals of the whole year, with responsories and capitula adapted to the lections and the season.

The Liber Pontificalis (c. 218, p. 1055, Migne) relates of pope Zacharias († 752) that he placed in charge of the armarius or librarian of St. Peter's church at Rome all the codices belonging to his own house, which are read throughout the year at matins (qui in circulo anni leguntur ad matu-tinum). It is, however, not quite clear in this case whether the books in question were lection-aries, or whether they were not rather the works from which lections were taken. The work described under INSTRUCTION (l. 862) was a lectionary, though of limited extent.

LECTIONS were generally said not by persons in major orders, but by sub-deacons or persons in minor orders. Gregory the Great (Epist. iv. 44; App. n. 5, p. 1334; Migne) laid down on this point that the saying of Psalms and other lections was to be performed by sub-deacons, or, in case of necessity, by yet lower orders; a decree which seems to exclude mere laymen from this office altogether.
To the same effect the second [third] council of Braga (c. 45) decreed that no one should act as singer or reader in the choir without regular ordination to such office (non liceat in pulpito psallere aut legere nisi qui a presbytero [al.

episcopo] lectores sunt ordinati; compare Conc.
Laod. c. 15). The second Council of Nicaea also
(c. 14) censures the practice of young persons, who had received no imposition of hands from the bishop, reading on the ambo, whether in monastic or other churches. The first [second] Council of Braga (c. 11) ordered that readers should not perform their office in the church in their secular dress. [LAITY, II, 914.]

Silence was proclaimed before a lection.
"What trouble is there," says St. Ambrose (Enerr. in Ps. i. c. 9, p. 741), "to obtain silence in the church when I read?"
And it was usual for the bishop or the principal person present in choir to give his benediction and sign to the reader to begin. The reader coming in with his book, says Gregory of Tours (De Mirac. S. Martini, i. 5), was not allowed to begin to read until the saint [Ambrose] gave him permission by a nod. This, however, relates to an altar-lection.

It is evident from several passages quoted above that the lections were read on the ambo or pulpitum, by which we are to understand in many cases not merely a pulpit or lectern, but the whole of the raised stage or foot-piece in a church on which the choir was stationed. The church of the monastery of Bee had, in Martee's time (IV. v. 11), at the top of the steps of the ambo a pulpit for lections.

For the congregation to sit during the reading of lections was regarded in early times as a concession to infirmity; "when long Passions or other lessons are read," says Caesarius of Arles (Serm. 300, u.s.), "let those who are unable to stand, humbly sit in silence, and with attentive ears listen to what is read." Sitting afterwards became the usual posture. St. Benedict in his rule (c. 9) expressly permitted the brothers to sit during lections; and at a later period (about 1060) Peter Damian (Opusc. 39) speaks of sitting during lections as a universal custom of his time.

With the reading of lections was connected from ancient times the use of RESPONSORIES (see the article).

(Martene, de Ritibus Antiquis; Granelas, Traité de l'Office Divin; Freeman, Principles of Divine Service, vol. i.) [C.]

LECTIONARY.—I. Proofs of early Use.—

Those who refer the use of a formal table of stated lessons taken from Holy Scripture to the Church of the 3rd century [Vol. I. p. 622] can plead in favour of their opinion that, before the close of the 4th century, such a practice was both universal and regarded as already ancient.
Chrysostom devotes a whole homily to explain the reason why the Acts of the Apostles are publicly read throughout the festival season between Easter-day and Whitsun-day, and elsewhere states that the rule of the fathers (των πατερων b rduos) directs that book to be laid aside after Pentecost. Even such a purely arbitrary arrangement as the reading of the book of Genesis in Lent had become so in venerate in his time (ταυτα γαρ ηντι ανεγνωσθη σήμερον), that after having gone through the first part of that book in his discourses at Constantinople in the Lent of A.D. 400, he defers the remainder until the season came round again the following year: the offering up of Isaac alone, as Augustine tells us, "ideo in ordine suo, diebus quadragesimae, non recitatur," as being reserved for the services of Holy Week. Chrysostom also advises his hearers to read at home during the week-days such Saturday and Sunday lessons as they knew would be expounded in course on the next Lord's day, and Bingham (Antiquities, book xiv. ch. iii. s. 3) adds to these well-known passages others to the same purport gathered from Origen, Augustine, and Ambrose, vouching for the custom (de more) of reading Job and Jonah during the Holy Week. Cyril of Jerusalem also (A.D. 348), having to speak of the Ascension, remarks that on the previous day, being a Sunday (τῆ χθις ἡμέρα κατα τὴν κυριακῆν), that event had formed the subject of the appointed lesson (ἐν τῇ συνάξει τῆς τῶν ἀναγασμάτων ἀκολουθίας). Since in all these scattered notices we meet with nothing to contradict, but everything to correspond with the established order of later times, Dean Burgon is fully justified in his conclusion that, "although there happens to be extant neither Synaxarium (i. e. Table of proper lessons of the Greek Church), nor Evangelistarium (i. e. Book containing the ecclesiastical lections in extenso), of higher antiquity than the 8th century,—yet that the scheme itself, as exhibited by those monuments—certainly in every essential particular—is older than any known Greek manuscript which contains it by at least four, in fact by full five hundred years" (Last Twelve Verses of St. M. r⁴, p. 195). Yet even the oldest Greek manuscripts (for to the Greek calendar of lessons we are for the present confining ourselves) bear distinct traces of having been used for liturgical purposes. Without insisting upon more doubtful instances, it is thus that we can best explain the omission of the confessedly genuine verses (Luke xxii. 43, 44) from four of our chief uncial MSS. (A, B, R, T) of the 4th and 5th centuries; the sacred words not having been publicly read in their proper place, but after Matth. xxvi. 40, as a part of the service for the vigil of Good Friday, where they occur in every extant lectionary, and even in one cursive copy of the Gospels (Cod. 69), which, though itself as late as the 14th century, is known to follow a very ancient text. The double insertion of the noble doxology, Rom. xvi. 25-27, after ch. xiv., as well as in its proper place at the end of the epistle, by the Codex Alexandrinus of the 5th century, is best accounted for by its being so set in lectionaries as part of the proper lesson for the Saturday before Quinquagesima. Codex Bezae (D), again, of about the 5th century, prefixes to Luke xvi. 19 the formula εἶπεν δὲ καὶ ἔτερον παραβολῆν, which is the liturgical introduction to the Gospel for the 5th Sunday of St. Luke. Another of Cod. D's prefixes, καὶ εἶπεν τοῖς μαθηταῖς αὐτοῦ, John xiv. 1, is almost identical with that in the English Prayer Book for St. Philip and St. James's Day. But the strongest case of all is perhaps Mark xiv. 41, where after ἀπείχει is read in Cod. D and a few of later date (e.g. Cod. 69), the senseless interpolation τὸ τέλος or τῆλος, "the end," which manifestly came into the text from the margin of ver. 42, where it is in like manner in the usual manner the close of the Gospel for the third day of the carnival week. Since in this last case the patent transcriptional error is met with also in the Peshito Syriac, and in some forms of the Old Latin version, which together will probably carry us back to the 2nd century, it is hard to resist the inference "that the lessons of the Eastern church were settled at a period long anterior to the date of the oldest manuscript of the Gospels extant" (Burgon, p. 226).

II. Greek Liturgical Books.—The earliest known Synaxaria, or tables of ecclesiastical lessons throughout the year, are found in two copies of the Gospels now at Paris, C. d. Cyprus (K) and Campianus (M). These, together with fragments of Menologia, or tables of saints'-day lessons, annexed to them, were published by Schulz at the end of the first volume of his Greek Testament, in 1830. The margins of both these manuscripts, and of their contemporary, Cod. I., also at Paris, all three being of the 8th or 9th century, are covered with liturgical notes either by the original scribe or by a hand of the same period, which indicate, mostly in red ink, the beginnings and ends of the lessons (APXH, TEAOZ), the days on which they are to be used, and often the initial words whereby they are to be introduced. After this date quite a majority of manuscripts of the Gospels proper are furnished with marginal notes of this kind, and very many with synaxaria and menologia, full of crabbéd abbreviations and sometimes added in a later age. Perhaps no known evangelistarium, or book containing the ecclesiastical lessons in full, like those English church lectionaries which have recently come into use, can be ascribed with confidence to an earlier period than the 9th century. A fragment at St. Petersburg, described by Tischendorf, contains some Arabic writing decidedly more modern, yet dated A.D. 1011. A noble and complete copy at Parham (No. 18), written at Ciscisai in Cappadocia, bears the date of A.D. 980, and Harl. 5598 in the British Museum is only fifteen years later. A few others, e.g. Cod. Vaticanus 171, in the Grand Ducal Library at Venice, and Arundel 547 in the British Museum, are probably anterior to the dated copies just mentioned, which, however, we are safest in taking as the groundwork of our conjectural estimates in regard to others which are not dated. Evangelistaria of the 10th and 11th centuries are almost always large folios, written (as was convenient for the purpose they were intended to serve) in bold characters of the uncial form, a fashion which in other books had almost entirely given place to the cursive or running hand. Their material is a coarse thick parchment, quite inferior to the fine vellum employed a few centuries before, though the leaves of a few, such as Parham 18, are still thin, white, and delicate. The lectionaries are almost always written with two columns on a page, and the headings and initial letters are often illuminated in gold and colours. Musical tones, in red ink, above and below the text, must have been designed to guide the reader's voice. Uncial codices of lessons from the Gospels number about seventy, those of the Acts and Epistles are less than ten; but indeed copies of the latter (commonly called the Apostolos or Praxipostolos) of any age scarcely amount to eighty, while of those of the Gospels about three hundred survive in various libraries, public and private. Some of the cursive or more recent lectionaries are also in the Peshito Syriac, and of the Old Latin version, which probably carry us back to the 2nd century to resist the inference that the Eastern church were settled long anterior to the date of the text of the Gospels extant"

Surgical Books.—The earliest, or tables of ecclesiastical for the year, are found in two volumes now at Paris, C. dd. Cyprianus (M). These, together with menologia, or tables of saints'-day to them, were published by of the first volume of his Greek 160. The margins of both these of their contemporary, Col. L, three being of the 8th or 9th read with liturgical notes either scribe or by a hand of the same kind, mostly in red ink, the ends of the lessons (APXH, on which they are to be used, special words whereby they are to after this date quite a majority of the Gospels proper are furgical notes of this kind, and synaxaria and menologia, full of lessons and sometimes added in sions no known evangelistarium, g the ecclesiastical lessons in glish church lectionaries which e into use, can be ascribed to an earlier period than the fragment at St. Petersburg, hendorf, contains some Arabic more modern, yet dated A.D. and complete copy at Parham at Cissicia in Cappadocia, bears 980, and Harl. 5598 in the only fifteen years later. A Cod. Vatican, 171, in the Grand Venice, and Arundel 547 in the are probably anterior to the mentioned, which, however, we regard as the groundwork of our dates in regard to others which evangelistaria of the 10th and are almost always large folios, convenient for the purpose they serve) in bold characters of the tion which in other books had given place to the cursive or heir material is a coarse thick inferior to the fine vellum eaders before, though the leaves s Parham 18, are still thin. e. The lectionaries are almost d and two columns on a page, and initial letters are often d and colours. Musical tones e and below the text, must d to guide the reader's voice. Lessons from the Gospels num- those of the Acts and Epistles but indeed copies of the latter the Apostolos or Praxipostolos) ally amount to eighty, while of als about three hundred survive es, public and private. Some more recent lectionaries are sumptuously bound, the covers being adorned with enamel and silver gilt ornaments, in rare cases forming single figures or groups, of much artistic merit. Tables of the Greek church lessons were printed at Venice in 1615-24 in two volumes which do not range together (Cantabrigie Univ. Library, il. 288), and again, at the same place, in 1851. The following lists, however, are derived from manuscripts which in the venetola differ widely from each other. While the great church festivals are common to them all, different generations and provinces, and even dioceses, had their favourite worthies whose memory they specially cherished; so that the character of the menology (which sometimes formed a considerable, sometimes but a small, part of a whole lectionary) will help to direct us to discover the district in which the volume itself was written. The lectionaries were chiefly used for our present purpose, are, in the Gospels, Arundel 547, Parham 18, Harl. 5598 (all described above), Christ's College, Cambridge, F. 1, 8, of the 11th century; Burney 22, in the British Museum, presenting a very remarkable text, with a subscription dated A.D. 1319; Dean Gale's O. iv. 22, of the 12th century, now at Trinity College, Cambridge; but this last contains the full lessons from Easter to Pentecost, with those of the Saturdays and Sundays only (σαββατοκυριακαί) for the rest of the year. Wake 12, of the 11th century, at Christ Church, is not an evangelistarium, but replete with notes. For the Apostoles we have used but one copy, unfortunately imperfect, the week-day lessons of which are unusually full, viz. MS. No. iii. 24 (of about the 12th century) in the library of the Baroness Burdett-Coutts. In some service-books will be found a few (in B-C. iii. 42 they are many) lessons taken from either division of the New Testament, which were read in connection with the liturgies of St. Basil and St. Chrysostom.

III. The Greek Ecclesiastical Year.—The Greek church seasonably begins its ecclesiastical year with the highest of our festivals, being Easter Day (ἡ ἅγια καὶ μεγάλη κυριακὴ τοῦ πάσχα), reckoning the seven weeks onward from Easter week (ἡ διακινήσματος) and Low Sunday (ἀντίπασχα) to Whitsun-day (ἡ κυριακὴ τῆς πεντηκοστῆς). The Gospels from St. John (except a few proper lessons) and the Epistles from the Acts run on successively throughout these seven weeks, and evidently form one continuous scheme for every day in each week. Beyond this season, for the rest of the year, the Saturday and Sunday lessons stand apart from those of the five ordinary week days, which indeed seem to have been selected at a later period than the rest. On the morrow of the Pentecost (ἡ ἐπέτειον τῆς πεντηκοστῆς), St. John's Gospel having been exhausted, that of St. Matthew begins, and is read for eleven weeks without interruption, and is Sunday after Whitsuntide not being kept as Trinity Sunday, as it has been in the Western church since the 12th century, but as the Greek All Saints' Day. The Greeks commemorate the Council of Nice on the Sunday before Pentecost. On the second day of the eleventh week after Whitsun-day St. Mark's Gospel is taken up, and read from the Monday to the Friday (παρασκευὴ) inclusive, for seven or at least for five weeks, the Saturday and Sunday lessons being still derived from St. Matthew. At this point comes in the difficulty, arising from the yearly variation of Easter Day in the calendar, which the Western church provides against by varying the number of its Sundays after Trinity. By the time that fifteen Sundays have elapsed after Pentecost, the Greek civil new year may have begun (Sept. 1) and with it the new in fiction, when the Gospel of St. Luke was opened (ἀρχὴ θεολογιστοῦ Λουκᾶ, Arundel 547, Parham, 18). The Mark, however, from the 7th century downward, would seem to have gone on until after the day of the Exaltation of the Cross, Sept. 14 (which is still used in England to fix our autumnal to a festival recently instituted. (Δεῖον γινώσκον ὅτι ἀρχεται ὁ Λουκᾶς ἀναγινώσκεισθαι ἀπὸ τῆς κυριακῆς μετὰ τὴν ἑψησὼν τὸς γὰρ καὶ ἡ ἰσχυρία γίνετται ὁ καλεῖται νέον ἔτος. Ἡ δὲ ἀπὸ τῆς κγ' τοῦ Σεπτεμβρίου ὁ Λουκᾶς ἀναγινώσκειται, Burney 22, p. 191.) From whichever proceeded without any break for eleven weeks, and varied with the lessons from St. Mark for the five middle days of the week, for five or at least for three weeks more, when, if the Easter of the new year was early, the fast of Lent would be approaching. After reading as many of the lessons from St. Luke as were necessary, that for the seventeenth Sunday of St. Matthew (ct. xv. 21-28), called from its subject the Cana-nitess, was in all ways resumed (whether it had been read in that or proper place or not), for the Sunday preceding Septuagesima, called by the Greeks the Prodromia (from the subject of its Gospel (Luke xv. 11-32). Then follow the Sunday of the carnival (τῆς ἀποκρίεα), our Sexagesima, and that of the Quinquagesima, corresponding to our Quinquagesima. Next come the vigil of the fast of Lent, its six Sundays (the last being services of the Holy Week), and the very full year ending of course on Easter Even. Since the whole number of Sundays thus enumerated (even when the Cana-nitess is reckoned twice) would amount to but fifty-three, a number which might easily of itself be insufficient to fill up the interval between two consecutive Easter Days, we must bear in mind that the menology supplies lessons for the Sundays before and after Christmas and Sept. 14, and for a Sunday after Epiphany, which could either be added to or subtracted from the ordinary Gospels, as occasion required. The system of lessons from the Acts and Epistles is much simpler than that of the Gospels. Except between Easter and Pentecost they are not found at all for common week days, except in a very few lectionaries. The book of Genesis, it will be remembered, was read on such week days during Lent.

IV. Table of Gospels and Epistles daily read throughout the Year in the Greek Church.

Ἐκ τοῦ κατὰ Ἰωάννην (7 weeks or 8 sundays).

Easter Day (τῆ ἅγια καὶ μεγάλη κυριακὴ τοῦ πάσχα)	John 1. 1-17	Acts 1. 1-8
2nd day τῆς διακινήσματος	"	"
3rd	1. 18-29	" 1. 12-26
4th	Luke xxiv. 12-35	" 11. 14-21
	John 1. 35-52	" 11. 38-48

5th day	John	iii. 1-15	Acts	iii. 1-8	3rd day of 1st week	Math.	iv. 25-v. 11
4th	"	ii. 12-22	"	ii. 22-26	4th	"	v. 20-30	(Mat B-C III.
7th (σαββάτω) ..	"	iii. 22-33	"	iii. 11-16	5th	"	v. 31-41	24).
Ἀρτίσταχο, or Low	"	xx. 19-31	"	v. 12-20	6th (παρασκευῆ)	"	vii. 9-18
Sunday	"	"	"	"	7th (σαββάτω) ..	"	v. 42-46	Rom. i. 7-12
2nd day of 2nd week	"	ii. 1-11	"	ii. 19-26	Κυριακῆ α', All Saints	"	x. 32, 33; Heb. xi. 33
3rd	"	iii. 16-21	"	iv. 1-10	(ἵνα ἁγίων πάντων)	"	xix. 27-30	" xii. 2
4th	"	v. 17-24	"	iv. 13-22	2nd day of 2nd week	"	vi. 31-34	Rom. ii. 1-8
5th	"	v. 24-30	"	iv. 23-31	3rd	"	vii. 15-21	" ii. 13, 17-27
6th (παρασκευῆ) ..	"	v. 30-vi. 2	"	v. 1-11	4th	"	viii. 21-23	" ii. 28-iii. 4
7th (σαββάτω) ..	"	vi. 14-27	"	v. 21-32	5th	"	viii. 23-27	" iii. 4-9
Κυριακῆ γ', or 2nd	Mark	xv. 43-47	"	vi. 1-7	6th (παρασκευῆ) ..	"	ix. 14-17	" iii. 8-19
after Easter	"	xvi. 8	"	vi. 8-vii. 60	7th (σαββάτω) ..	"	vii. 1-8	" iii. 19-28
2nd day of 2nd week	John	iv. 48-54	"	viii. 5-17	Κυριακῆ δ'	"	iv. 18-23	" ii. 10-16
3rd	"	vi. 27-33	"	viii. 18-25	2nd day of 3rd week	"	ix. 38-x. 8	" iv. 4-8
4th (6th day of Gals; O. 4.22)	"	vi. 48-54	"	viii. 26-39	3rd	"	x. 9-15	" iv. 8-12
5th	"	vi. 40-44	"	viii. 46-ix. 19	4th	"	x. 16-22	" iv. 13-17
6th (παρασκευῆ) ..	"	vi. 35-39	"	ix. 18-31	5th	"	x. 32-38; xi. 1	" v. 12-14
7th (σαββάτω) ..	"	xv. 17-xvi. 1	"	ix. 33-42	6th (παρασκευῆ) ..	"	vii. 24-viii. 4	" iii. 28-iv. 3
Κυριακῆ ε', or 3rd	"	v. 1-15	"	x. 1-16	Κυριακῆ γ'	"	vi. 22, 23	" v. 1-10
2nd day of 4th week	"	vi. 56-69	"	x. 21-33	2nd day of 4th week	"	xi. 2-15	" v. 15-17
3rd	"	vii. 1-13	"	xiv. 8-19	3rd	"	xi. 16-20	" v. 17-21
4th	"	vii. 14-30	"	x. 34-43	4th	"	xii. 20-26	" vii. 1, ...
5th	"	viii. 12-20	"	x. 44-xi. 10	5th	"	xi. 27-30	(Mat B-C iii.
6th (παρασκευῆ) ..	"	viii. 21-30	"	xii. 1-11	6th (παρασκευῆ) ..	"	xii. 1-8	24).
7th (σαββάτω) ..	"	viii. 31-42	"	xi. 19-30	7th (σαββάτω) ..	"	viii. 14-23	Rom. vi. 11-17
Κυριακῆ ε', or 4th after	Mark	iv. 6-42	"	xii. 12-17	Κυριακῆ δ'	"	viii. 5-13	" vi. 18-23
Easter (of the Samaritan woman)	"	iv. 42-51	"	xii. 25-xiii. 12	2nd day of 5th week	"	xii. 9-13	" vii. 19-viii. 13
2nd day of 5th week	"	viii. 51-58	"	xiii. 13-24	3rd	"	xii. 14-16; 22-30	" viii. 2-9
3rd	"	vi. 5-14	"	xiv. 20-27	4th	"	xii. 38-45	" viii. 8-14
4th	"	ix. 39-x. 9	"	xv. 6-12	5th	"	xiii. 3-12	" viii. 22-27
5th	"	x. 17-28	"	xv. 36-41	6th (παρασκευῆ) ..	"	ix. 8-13	" ix. 6-13
6th (παρασκευῆ) ..	"	x. 27-38	"	xvi. 1-9	7th (σαββάτω) ..	"	xv. 31-38	" viii. 14-21
7th (σαββάτω) ..	"	ix. 1-39	"	xvii. 1-9	Κυριακῆ ε'	"	viii. 28-ix. 1	" x. 1-10
Κυριακῆ ς', or 5th after	"	xi. 47-54	"	xviii. 19-27	2nd day of 6th week	"	xiii. 10-23	" ix. 13-19
after Easter	"	xii. 19-38	"	iii. 24).	3rd	"	xiii. 24-31	" ix. 17-28
2nd day of 6th week	"	xii. 38-47	"	xviii. 22-28	4th	"	xiii. 31-38	" ix. 23-33
3rd	"	xii. 36-47	"	xviii. 22-28	5th	"	xiii. 44-54	" ix. 33; x. 15-21
4th	"	xii. 36-47	"	xviii. 22-28	6th (παρασκευῆ) ..	"	xiii. 44-54	" ix. 15
5th Ἀναλήψεως, Ascension Day	πρωτὶ (Matins)	Mark	xvi. 9-20	Κυριακῆ ς'	"	ix. 1-8	" xii. 6-14
For the Liturgy	Luke	xxiv. 36-53	Acts	i. (or 9)-12	2nd day of 7th week	"	xiii. 54-58	" xi. 2-8
6th (παρασκευῆ) ..	John	xiv. 1-10	"	xix. 1-8	3rd	"	xiv. 1-13	" xi. 7-12
7th (σαββάτω) ..	"	xiv. 10-21	"	xx. 7-12	4th	"	xiv. 35-xv. 11	" xi. 13-20
Κυριακῆ ζ', or 6th after	John	xvii. 1-13	"	xx. 16-38	5th	"	xv. 12-21	" xi. 19-24
Easter (ἵνα ἁγίων τῶν ἐν Νικαίᾳ)	"	xvi. 2-13	"	xxi. 28-32	6th (παρασκευῆ) ..	"	xv. 29-31	" xi. 25-28
2nd day of 7th week	"	xvi. 15-23	"	xxiii. 1-11	7th (σαββάτω) ..	"	x. 37-xl. 1	" xii. 1-3
3rd	"	xvi. 23-33	"	xxvii. 1-xviii. 1	Κυριακῆ ζ'	"	ix. 27-35	" xv. 1-7
4th	"	xvi. 23-33	"	xxviii. 1-31	2nd day of 8th week	"	xvi. 1-8	" xi. 29-38
5th	"	xvi. 23-33	"	xxviii. 1-31	3rd	"	xvi. 6-12	" xii. 14-21
6th (παρασκευῆ) ..	"	xvii. 10-26	"	xxviii. 1-31	4th	"	xvi. 20-24	" xiv. 16-18
7th (σαββάτω) ..	"	xxii. 14-25	"	xxviii. 1-31	5th	"	xvi. 24-28	" xv. 8-12
Κυριακῆ τῆς πεντηκοστῆς, πρωτὶ (Matins)	"	xx. 18-23	"	xxviii. 1-31	6th (παρασκευῆ) ..	"	xvii. 10-13	" xv. 13-16
For the Liturgy	"	vii. 37-viii. 12	"	ii. 1-11	7th (σαββάτω) ..	"	xii. 30-37	" xiii. 1-10

N.B.—John vii. 53-viii. 11 is not included in the lesson for the Pentecost, but is appointed in menologies to be read at the feasts of certain penitent women (p. 65).

Ἐκ τοῦ κατὰ Ματθαίου.
 2nd day of 1st week (τῆ ἑορταίου τῆς πεντηκοστῆς) Math. xviii. 10-20 Eph. v. 8-19

LECTIONARY

Table of lectionary readings for the left page, including dates like '7th day of 10th week' and references to 'Math. iv. 23-v. 11'.

LECTIONARY

Table of lectionary readings for the middle page, including dates like '7th day of 10th week' and references to 'Math. xvii. 24-1'.

LECTIONARY

then the omitted Epistles are used when St. Luke commences, and the Epistle for each succeeding Saturday and Sunday must be looked for, out of its place, one or two weeks back. But if it be actually the 18th Sunday after Pentecost, all the following Epistles will be given correctly.

Table of lectionary readings for the right page, including dates like '2nd day of 1st week' and references to 'Luke v. 1-11'.

Then follow, if read in this place—
N.B.—If this week was required before the new year or new indictment began, some of the lessons from St. Mark which follow the 12th week so far as needed, and after them (the Epistles for the week being 2 Cor. iii. 4-12; iv. 1-6; 11-18; v. 10-15; 15-21).

2nd day of 1st week of new year
N.B.—If the 16th or 17th Saturdays of St. Matthew be not read at the end of the old year,

2nd day of 1st week of new year
N.B.—If the 16th or 17th Saturdays of St. Matthew be not read at the end of the old year,

Κυριακὴ θ' (Apost. κς')	Luke xii. 16-21	Eph. v. 5-19
2nd day of 10th week	.. xvii. 20-25
3rd xvii. 26-37;
	.. xviii. 18
4th xviii. 15-17;
	.. 26-30
5th xviii. 31-34
6th (παρασκευῆ) xix. 12-24
7th (σαββάτω) x. 19-21	Gal. v. 22-vi. 2
Κυριακὴ ι' (Apost. κς')	.. xiii. 10-17	Eph. vi. 10-17
2nd day of 11th week	.. xix. 37-44
3rd xix. 45-48
4th xx. 1-8
5th xx. 9-18
6th (παρασκευῆ) xx. 19-28
7th (σαββάτω) xii. 32-40	Col. 1. 9-13
Κυριακὴ ια' (Apost. κη)	.. xiv. 16-24	2 Cor. ii. 14-iii. 3
2nd day of 12th week	.. xx. 27-44
3rd xxi. 12-19
4th xxi. 5-8; 10, 11; 20-24
5th xxi. 24-33
6th (παρασκευῆ) xxi. 37-xxii. 8
7th (σαββάτω) xiii. 19-29	Eph. ii. 11-13
Κυριακὴ ιβ' (Apost. κς')	.. xvii. 12-19	Col. iii. 4-11
2nd day of 13th week	Mark vii. 11-21
3rd viii. 22-26
4th viii. 30-34
5th ix. 10-16
6th (παρασκευῆ) ix. 33-41
7th (σαββάτω) Luke xiv. 1-11	Eph. v. 1-8
Κυριακὴ ιγ' (Apost. λ')	.. xvii. 18-27	Col. iii. 12-16
2nd day of 14th week	Mark ix. 42-x. 1	1 Thess. i. 6-10
3rd x. 2-11	.. 1. 9-ii. 4
4th x. 11-18	.. ii. 4-8
5th x. 17-27	.. ii. 9-14
6th (παρασκευῆ) x. 24-32	.. ii. 14-20
7th (σαββάτω) Luke xvi. 10-15	Col. 1. 2-8
Κυριακὴ ιδ' (Apost. λα)	.. xviii. 35-43	{ 2 Tim. i. 3-9 (1 Tim. i. 15-17, 19-C iii. 24).
2nd day of 15th week	Mark x. 46-52	1 Thess. iii. 1-8
3rd xi. 11-23	.. iii. 6-11
4th xi. 22-26	.. iii. 11-iv. 6
5th xi. 27-33	.. iv. 7-11
6th (παρασκευῆ) xii. 1-13	.. iv. 17-v. 3
7th (σαββάτω) Luke xvii. 3-10	Col. ii. 6-12
Κυριακὴ ιε' (Apost. λβ')	.. xix. 1-10	1 Tim. vi. 11-16
2nd day of 16th week	Mark xii. 13-17	1 Thess. v. 4-11
3rd xii. 18-27	.. v. 11-15
4th xii. 28-34	.. v. 15-23
5th xii. 34-44	2 Thess. i. 1-5
6th (παρασκευῆ) xiii. 1-9	.. 1. 11-ii. 5
7th (σαββάτω) Luke xviii. 1-8	1 Tim. ii. 1-7
Κυριακὴ ις' (the Pulpit, Apost. λγ')	.. xviii. 9-14	{ 2 Tim. iii. 10-15 (1-C iii. 42).
2nd day of 17th week	Mark xiii. 9-13	{ 2 Thess. ii. 12-iii. 5
3rd xiii. 14-23	.. iii. 3-9
4th xiii. 24-31	.. iii. 10-18
5th xiii. 31-xiv. 2	1 Tim. i. 1-8
6th (παρασκευῆ) xiv. 3-9	.. 1. 8-14
7th (σαββάτω) Luke xx. 48-xxi. 4	.. iii. 13-iv. 5

N.B.—The Gospel for the Sunday preceding that which the Western church calls Septuagesima is always that of the Cananites (Matth. xv. 21-28), which would sometimes displace one or two of those immediately preceding, as in the case of our Sunday next before Advent. Two weeks' lessons from the Epistles are also kept in reserve, to be used here if necessary. They are numbered from the weeks after Pentecost, as indeed are all the Epistles in the Greek lectionaries, viz.—

Κυριακὴ λδ'	2 Tim. iii. 10-15
(2)	1 Tim. ii. 5-15
(3) iii. 1-13
(4) iv. 4-9
(5) iv. 11-v. 10
(6) v. 17-vi. 2
σαββάτω λε' iv. 9-15
Κυριακὴ λε'	2 Tim. ii. 1-10
(2)	1 Tim. vi. 2-11
(3) v. 17-21
(4)	2 Tim. i. 8-14
(5) 1. 11-ii. 2
(6) ii. 22-26
σαββάτω λς' ii. 11-19

The day before Septuagesima Sunday is—

σαββάτω πρὸ τῆς ἀποκρίου (before Canival)	Luke xv. 1-10
Κυριακὴ πρὸ τῆς ἀποκρίου (the Pro-diyal)	xv. 11-32 1 Thess. v. 14-23
2nd day of Canival week	Mark xi. 1-11 2 Tim. iii. 1-10
3rd xiv. 10-42 .. iii. 11-iv. 5
4th xiv. 43, xv. 1 .. iv. 9, 14
5th xv. 1-15 Titus i. 5-12
6th (παρασκευῆ) xv. 20, 22; 25, 31-41 .. 1. 15-ii. 10
7th (σαββάτω)	Luke xxi. 8, 9, 25-27, 33-38 } 1 Cor. vi. 12-20
Κυριακὴ τῆς ἀποκρίου (Canival, our Sexagesima)	Matth. xxv. 31-46 } 1 Cor. viii. 8-ix. 12 (1 Cor. vi. 13-20, ii. 21)
2nd day of the week of the Cheese-eater (τροφοῦδου; a lighter fast)	Luke xix. 28-10; xxii. 7, 8, 9 } Heb. iv. 1-13
3rd xxiii. 39-xxiii. 1 } .. v. 12-vi. 8
4th deest.
5th xxiii. 1-43; 44-58 } .. xli. 11-27
6th (παρασκευῆ) deest.
7th (σαββάτω)	Matth. vi. 1-13 } Rom. xlv. 19-27; xvi. 2-27 (p. 50)

Κυριακὴ τῆς τροφοῦδου (the Cheese-eater, our Quinquagesima)

Genesis was read on the five middle weekdays of Lent (p. 50). The special lessons from the New Testament were—

Ἰαννουῖς τῆς ἁγίας ἑγρησίας (Vigil of Lent)	Matth. vii. 7-11.
τῶν ἑγρησίων (Lent), σαββάτω α'	Mark ii. 23-iii. 5 Heb. 1. 1-12
Κυριακὴ α'	John i. 44-52 .. xi. 24-40
σαββάτω β'	Mark i. 35-44 .. iii. 12-11
Κυριακὴ β' ii. 1-12 .. 1. 10-ii. 3
σαββάτω γ' ii. 14-17 .. x. 32-36
Κυριακὴ γ' viii. 34-ix. 1 .. iv. 11-v. 2
σαββάτω δ' vii. 31-37 .. vi. 9-12
Κυριακὴ δ' ix. 17-31 .. vi. 13-21
σαββάτω ε' viii. 27-31 .. ix. 2-29
Κυριακὴ ε' x. 32-45 .. ix. 11-14
σαββάτω ς' (St Lazarus)	John xi. 1-45 .. xii. 2-23
Κυριακὴ ς' τῶν βατῶν (Palm Sunday)—πρωί (Matins)	Matth. xxi. 1-11 15-17

day next before Advent, Two from the Epistles are also kept in order here if necessary. They are the weeks after Pentecost, as the Epistles in the Greek Lec-

Table of lectionary readings for the weeks after Pentecost, listing Gospel and Epistle readings for various days.

Septuagesima Sunday is —

Table of lectionary readings for Septuagesima Sunday, including Luke xv. 1-10 and other Gospel and Epistle readings.

end on the five middle week- (50). The special lessons from ant were—

Table of lectionary readings for the Lenten season, including Heb. 1: 1-12 and other Gospel and Epistle readings.

on (Palm Sunday)— Math. xxi. 1-11; 15-17

LECTIONARY

Κυριακή ἑῆς τῆς Ἀσπῆς Mark x. 46-xi. 11 For the Liturgy—John xii. 1-18 Phil. iv. 1-9

The services of the Holy Week (ἡ ἄγία ἡ μεγάλη) are given at full length in nearly all the lectionaries, viz.—

Table of lectionary readings for the Holy Week, listing Gospel and Epistle readings for the 2nd, 3rd, 4th, and 5th days.

At this season were read the twelve Gospels of the Holy Passion (τῶν ἁγίων παθῶν), viz.—

Table of the twelve Gospels of the Holy Passion, listing Gospel and Epistle readings for each day.

Gospels for the hours of the vigil of Good Friday (τῆς ἁγίας παραμονῆς)—

Table of Gospels for the hours of the vigil of Good Friday, listing Gospel and Epistle readings.

Good Friday (τῆ ἁγίας παρασκευῆ) for the Liturgy—

Table of Gospels for Good Friday, listing Gospel and Epistle readings.

Easter Even (τῆ ἁγίας καὶ μεγάλης σαββάτου)—

Table of Gospels for Easter Even, listing Gospel and Epistle readings.

To these lessons from the New Testament for the whole ecclesiastical year from Easter Day to Easter Even nearly all the lectionaries annex eleven morning Gospels of the Resurrection (ἐπαγγελία ἀναστασιμῶ ἐθωρῶν), which were read in turn, one every Sunday at matins, viz.—

Table of morning Gospels of the Resurrection, listing Gospel and Epistle readings for each day.

V. Syriac Lectionaries.—A valuable evangelarium, written in a peculiar dialect of the Syriac language, called for the sake of distinction the Jerusalem Syriac, was first used by Adler in the Vatican (MS. Syr. 19), and has lately been published in full by Count F. Miniscalchi Trezza (Verona, 1861-64). This book enables us to see that the ordinary lessons of the Syriac church at the period that it bears date (A.D. 1030), and probably long before, were identical with those of the Greek church as described above. In fact the Jerusalem Lectionary differs from the Greek for the portions which it contains little more than the various Greek copies do from each other. It does not supply the ordinary week-day lessons except from Easter to Pentecost and those of the Holy Week; the Menology also, as might have been expected (p. 51), is widely different in the two churches. Modern Syriac manuscripts and editions, however (such as that published by Professor Lee in 1819), are constructed on other principles; and agree with the Greek only on the occasion of such high festivals as hardly admitted a choice in their selection.

LECTIONARY

VI. The Coptic Lectionary.—For the Coptic, the other great branch of ancient Christianity in the East, we depend for the present mainly on a Coptic and Arabic manuscript, translated by Prelate Malan in his Original Documents of the Coptic Church, No. IV. (1874), which he believes to agree very well with what is known elsewhere of the whole year. It contains only the Sunday and feast-day Gospels throughout the year, with the appropriate versicles and greetings annexed to each at full length; although we have the express testimony of Cassian (Inst. iii. 2) for the 5th century, that the Egyptians read both Epistle and Gospel every Saturday as well as every Sunday in their public services. The Sundays are arranged according to the months of the Coptic ecclesiastical year, which began August 29. The vigil or eve was always regarded as the commencement of each day. The manuscript being defective, the lessons for the first three Sundays, and some few others, cannot be given.

Month of Tot (Aug. 29-Sept. 27)—

Table of lectionary readings for the Month of Tot, listing Gospel and Epistle readings for the 4th Sunday.

Month of Babeih (Sept. 28-Oct. 27)—

Table of lectionary readings for the Month of Babeih, listing Gospel and Epistle readings for the 1st, 2nd, 3rd, and 4th Sundays.

Month of Hator (Oct. 28-Nov. 26)—

Table of lectionary readings for the Month of Hator, listing Gospel and Epistle readings for the 1st, 2nd, 3rd, and 4th Sundays.

Month of Kihak (Nov. 27-Dec. 26)—

Table of lectionary readings for the Month of Kihak, listing Gospel and Epistle readings for the 1st, 2nd, 3rd, and 4th Sundays.

Month of Tubeh (Dec. 27-Jan. 25)—

Table of lectionary readings for the Month of Tubeh, listing Gospel and Epistle readings for the 1st Sunday.

2nd Sunday—Evensong	xiv. 22-37, or	Mark vi. 45-54 (Hiat. M.)
Matins	Mark	iii. 7-12
Liturgy	Luke	xi. 27-36
3rd Sunday—Evensong	John	v. 1-18
Matins	iii. 1-21
Liturgy	iii. 22-36
4th Sunday—Evensong	v. 31-47
Matins	vi. 47-58
Liturgy	ix. 1-38
Month of Amshir (Jan. 26—Feb. 24)—
1st Sunday—Evensong	John	vi. 15-21
Matins	viii. 51-59
Liturgy	vi. 22-38
2nd Sunday—Evensong	iv. 46-54
Matins	iii. 17-21
Liturgy	vi. 5-14
3rd Sunday—Evensong	v. 39-51. 2
Matins	xii. 41-50
Liturgy	vi. 27-10
(in another copy v. 27-46)
4th Sunday—Evensong	Luke	xvii. 1-10
Matins	(in another copy to var. 19)
Matina	John	v. 27-39
Liturgy	xix. 1-10

The four days which follow this Sunday comprise the fast days of Jonah.

2nd day of week ..	Matins ..	Math.	vii. 5-12
	Liturgy	xii. 35-39
3rd day ..	Matins ..	Luke	xiii. 6-9 ?
	Liturgy	xi. 29-36
4th day ..	Matins ..	Math.	xi. 27-30
	Liturgy	xv. 32-xvi. 4
5th day (Passover of Jonah)	Matins ..	Mark	viii. 17-21
	Liturgy ..	John	ii. 12-25

Great Sunday of the first gathering in of Crops—

Evensong ..	Mark	xi. 22-26
Matins ..	Luke	xxi. 34-38
Liturgy ..	Math.	vi. 1-4

For any 5th Sunday of the Month in the first six Months of the Year—

Evensong ..	Math.	xiv. 15-21
Matins ..	Mark	vi. 35-14
Liturgy ..	Luke	ix. 12-17

Gospel lessons for the seventh month, Barmahat (Feb. 25—March 26), and the eighth month, Barmulch (March 27—April 25) are not given, inasmuch as the proper lessons for the holy season, from the beginning of Lent to Pentecost, here intervene and extend to the second Sunday of the ninth month, Bashansh.

The Holy Fast—

1st Sunday—Evensong ..	Math.	vi. 34-vii. 12
Matins	vii. 22-29
Liturgy	vi. 19-33

(2nd, 3rd, and 4th Sunday wanting. Hiat. M.)

5th Sunday—Evensong ..	Luke	xviii. 1-8
Matins ..	Math.	xxiv. 3-36
(In another copy Luke xviii. 9-14)
Liturgy ..	John	v. 1-18

6th Sunday—Evensong ..	Luke	xiii. 22-35
Matins ..	Math.	xxiii. 1-39
(In another copy Math. xx. 17-28)
Liturgy ..	John	ix. 1-39

Saturday of Lazarus—
Matins ..	Luke	xviii. 31-43 (in another copy Mark x. 46-52)
Liturgy ..	John	xi. 1-45

7th Sunday of Hosannas (Palm Sunday)—

Evensong ..	John	xii. 1-11
Matins ..	Luke	xix. 1-10
Liturgy (1)	Math.	xxi. 1-17
(2)	Mark	xi. 1-11
(3)	Luke	xix. 29-48
(4)	John	xii. 12-19

Great Thursday of the Covenant of the Hash—Gospel .. John xiii. 1-17
Liturgy .. Matth. xxvi. 20-29

[Good Friday has no service now—]

Saturday of Lights (Easter Even)—
Matins .. Matth. xxvii. 62-66
Liturgy .. xxviii. 1-20

Feast of the Glorious Resurrection—
Matins .. Mark xvi. 2-9
Liturgy .. John xx. 1-18

Feast of Terms, or of the Fifty Days—
1st Sunday—Evensong .. Luke v. 1-11
Matins .. John xxi. 1-11
Liturgy .. xx. 24-31

2nd Sunday—Evensong vi. 16-21
Matins vi. 21-34
Liturgy vi. 35-46

3rd Sunday—Evensong vii. 35-?
Matins viii. 21-30
Liturgy viii. 30-50

4th Sunday—Evensong vii. 54-69
Matins viii. 51-59
Liturgy xii. 3-50

5th Sunday—Evensong xiv. 21-25
Matins xv. 4-8
Liturgy xv. 9-16

Ascension Day—Evensong Luke ix. 51-62
Matins .. Mark xvi. 12-20
Liturgy .. Luke xxiv. 36-53

6th Sunday—Evensong .. Mark xii. 24-40
(in another copy John xiv. 1-7)
Matins xiv. 8-20
Liturgy xvi. 23-33

7th Sunday (Pentecost)—
Evensong vii. 37-44
Matins xiv. 26-xv. 4
Liturgy v. 26-xvi. 13

Month of Bashansh (April 26—May 25)—

3rd Sunday—Evensong .. Math. xxii. 34-40
Matins .. { From Luke: the Resurrection

Liturgy .. Luke x. 25-38
4th Sunday—Evensong .. Math. xii. 1-5
Matins .. John xxi. 1-13
Liturgy .. Luke iv. 1-13

Month of Bawanah (May 26—June 24)—

1st Sunday—Evensong .. Math. xvii. 1-13
Matins xxviii. 7-20
Liturgy .. Luke xi. 1-13

2nd Sunday—Evensong iv. 38-41
Matins .. Mark xvi. 2-5
Liturgy .. Luke v. 17-26

3rd Sunday—Evensong .. Math. vii. 7-12
Matins .. Luke xxiv. 1-12
Liturgy .. Math. xii. 22-34

4th Sunday—Evensong v. 27-48
Matins .. John xx. 1-18
Liturgy .. Luke vi. 27-38

Month of Abib (June 25—July 24)—

1st Sunday—Evensong .. Luke ix. 1-8
Matins .. Math. xxviii. 7-20
Liturgy .. Luke x. 1-20

2nd Sunday—Evensong xvi. 1-13
Matins .. Mark xvi. 2-5
Liturgy .. Math. xviii. 1-11

3rd Sunday—Evensong .. Luke xiv. 7-15
Matins xxiv. 1-12
Liturgy ix. 10-17

4th Sunday—Evensong vii. 1-10
Matins .. John xx. 1-18
Liturgy xi. 1-15

Month of Mesre (July 25—Aug. 23)—

1st Sunday—Evensong .. Mark vi. 45-56
Matins .. Math. xxviii. 7-20
Liturgy .. Luke xx. 9-19

2nd Sunday—Evensong .. Luke xviii. 9-17
Matins .. Mark xvi. 2-5
Liturgy .. Luke v. 27-39

of the Covenant of the House—
 Gospel .. John xlii. 1-17
 Liturgy .. Matth. xxvi. 20-29
 (as no service not d)
 Gospels (East-ry Evn)—
 Matins .. Matth. xxvii. 62-66
 Liturgy xxviii. 1-20
 Gospels Resurrection—
 Matins .. Mark xvi. 2-8
 Liturgy .. John xx. 1-18
 or of the Fifty Days—Evensong .. Luke v. 1-11
 Matins .. John xxi. 1-11
 Liturgy xx. 24-31
 Evensong vi. 16-21
 Matins vi. 21-34
 Liturgy vi. 35-46
 Evensong vii. 30-2
 Matins viii. 21-30
 Liturgy viii. 30-50
 Evensong vi. 54-69
 Matins viii. 51-59
 Liturgy xli. 3-50
 Evensong xiv. 21-25
 Matins xv. 4-8
 Liturgy xv. 9-16
 Evensong .. Luke ix. 51-62
 Matins .. Mark xvi. 12-20
 Liturgy .. Luke xxiv. 36-53
 Evensong .. Mark xii. 24-40
 Another copy John xiv. 1-7
 Matins xiv. 8-20
 Liturgy xvi. 23-33
 Pentecost—
 Evensong vii. 37-14
 Matins xiv. 29-xv. 4
 Liturgy x. 29-xvi. 15
 Wh (April 26-May 25)—
 Evensong .. Matth. xxii. 34-40
 Matins .. } From Luke: the Resurrection
 Liturgy .. Luke x. 27-28
 Evensong .. Matth. xii. 1-8
 Matins .. John xx. 1-18
 Liturgy .. Luke iv. 1-13
 Wh (May 26-June 24)—
 Evensong .. Matth. xvii. 1-13
 Matins xxviii. 7-20
 Liturgy .. Luke xi. 1-13
 Evensong iv. 38-41
 Matins .. Mark xvi. 2-5
 Liturgy .. Luke v. 17-26
 Evensong .. Matth. vii. 7-12
 Matins .. Luke xxiv. 1-12
 Liturgy .. Matth. xii. 22-34
 Evensong v. 27-18
 Matins .. John xx. 1-18
 Liturgy .. Luke vi. 27-38
 June 25-July 24)—
 Evensong .. Luke ix. 1-6
 Matins .. Matth. xxviii. 2-20
 Liturgy .. Luke x. 1-20
 Evensong xvi. 1-13
 Matins .. Mark xvi. 2-5
 Liturgy .. Matth. xviii. 1-11
 Evensong .. Luke xiv. 7-15
 Matins xxiv. 1-12
 Liturgy ix. 10-17
 Evensong vii. 1-10
 Matins .. John xx. 1-18
 Liturgy xi. 1-15
 July 25-Aug. 23)—
 Evensong .. Mark vi. 45-56
 Matins .. Matth. xxviii. 2-20
 Liturgy .. Luke xx. 9-19
 Evensong .. Luke xviii. 9-17
 Matins .. Mark xvi. 2-5
 Liturgy .. Luke v. 27-39

3rd Sunday—Evensong .. Luke xi. 27-36
 Matins xxiv. 1-12
 Liturgy .. Mark iii. 22-34
 4th Sunday—Evensong .. Luke xvii. 20-37
 Matins .. John xx. 1-18
 Liturgy .. Mark xiii. 3-31
 Short or Intercalary month Nissi (Aug. 24-28, with a sixth day in leap year)—
 Sunday—Evensong .. Luke xxi. 12-33
 Matins .. Mark xiii. 32-37
 Liturgy .. Matth. xxiv. 3-38
 For a fifth Sunday in any of the six summer months two sets are given, to be used as required—
 Evensong .. Matth. xiv. 16-21 .. Luke xiv. 16-24
 Matins .. Mark vi. 35-44 .. Matth. xvi. 5-11
 Liturgy .. Luke ix. 12-17 .. Mark viii. 13-21
 VII. The National Lctionaries of the Eastern Churches compared.—This Coptic table of Sunday Gospels throughout the year is far ruder and less satisfactory in every way than that of the GREEK.

Sunday before Christmas	Matth. i. 1-25
Christmas Eve	Luke ii. 1-20
Christmas Day	Matth. ii. 1-12
Dec. 28— is tin synafin tis theotokou (Communion of the Mother of God)	" ii. 13-23
Saturday pro ton photon (Feast of Light, or Epiphany)	" iii. 1-6
Sunday pro ton photon	Mark i. 1-8
Vigil of the Theophania	Luke ii. 1-18
Theophania (Epiphany)—Matins	Mark i. 1-8
Liturgy	Matth. iii. 13-17

Thus the Coptic Christians agree with the Greeks in commemorating the Lord's baptism only on Jan. 6, and not the visit of the Magi, which was principally regarded in the Western church [EPIPHANY]. Yet the Gospels relating to the baptism (Matth. iii. 13-17, Luke iii. 23)
 appear in the old lectionary of the Gallican

	GREEK.
Feb. 2.—Presentation in the Temple	Luke ii. 22-40
Aug. 6.—Transfiguration—Matins	or Mark ix. 29-36
Liturgy	Matth. xvii. 1-9

In contrast with these resemblances it is well to note that in the services for the 7th century festival, that of the Elevation of the Cross, which has such influence on the later forms of the

	GREEK.
Sunday before the Elevation	Gal. vi. 11-18
Sept. 14.—Elevation of the Cross	John iii. 13-17
Saturday after the Elevation	John xix. 6-35
Sunday after the Elevation	1 Cor. i. 26-29
	John viii. 21-30
	Gal. ii. 16-20
	Mark viii. 31-ix. 1

In the Jerusalem Syriac, John xi. 53 precedes
 ch. xix. 6-35 as the Gospel for Sept. 14.

VIII. Lctionaries of the Western Church.—
 The tables of lessons we have hitherto examined have little in common with the Epistles and Gospels of the English church, and were evidently constructed on a different principle. The season of Advent, which is purely a Western Greek church, to which, at first sight, it bears a little resemblance. On closer inspection it may be observed that the Gospels for the early morning service, several of which recur three or four times over, are often identical with the Gospels of the Resurrection used periodically by the Greeks at the same hour (p. 57). The Copts also agree with the Greeks in reading St.

 John's Gospel almost exclusively between Easter and Pentecost, while the appointed Gospels for the Holy Week (including the preceding Saturday), as also for Ascension Day, accord to a degree which cannot be accidental. The same may be said in regard to the services of the great unmovable season of Christmas, which we here submit. The Jerusalem Syriac lessons are the same as the Greek. We infer, on the whole, from these partial resemblances in the midst of general diversity, that the lessons for the chief festivals, being in substance the same in all the lectionaries, were settled at an earlier date than those for ordinary occasions.

	GREEK.		COPTIC.
.. Evensong	Matth. i. 1-17
.. Matins	" ii. 13-25
.. Liturgy	" Luke ii. 1-29
.. Evensong	" iii. 23-38
.. Matins	" John i. 11-17
.. Liturgy	" Matth. ii. 1-12
.. Eve of the Glorious Baptism—
.. Evensong	Matth. iv. 12—
.. Matins	" John xii. 22-29
.. Liturgy	" Luke iii. 1-18
.. Glorious Baptism—
.. Evensong	Matth. iii. 1-12
.. Matins	" John i. 1-11
.. Liturgy	" John i. 18-34

church, which had early and close communion with the East (p. 60); and Luke iii. 15-23 is still the English second lesson for the morning service.

A comparison of the lessons for the other festivals pertaining to our Lord suggests the same conclusions as those for the Christmas season.

In Greek lectionaries (p. 52), there is but a single passage in common between the two nations, and that one (John viii. 28-30) too obvious to be overlooked by either.

	GREEK.		COPTIC.
.. Sept. 14.—Evensong	John viii. 28-42
.. Matins	" xli. 26—
.. Liturgy	" xx. 2—

institution, being regarded as a prelude to the high festival of Christmas, has appropriately opened the ecclesiastical year through western Christendom, at least from the 7th century downwards. The yearly changes rendered necessary by the variation of the Easter season were henceforward made by fixing the proper positions for Advent and Septuagesima Sundays,

	COMES.	GALLICAN.	MOZARABIC.
Sunday after Ascension	1 Pet. iv. (7)-11 John xv. 26-xvi. 4	Acts xviii. 22-xix. 12. John xvii. 1-28	Apoc. vii. 9-12 Acts xiv. 7-16 Mark ix. 13-25 Num. xi. 16-29 Acts xix. 7-8 John iii. 1-18
Vigil of Pentecost	Gen. i. xlii.; Ex. xv.; Deut. xxxi.; Isai. iv.; Jer. iii.; Ps. xlii. Acts xix.; John xiv.
Day of Pentecost	Acts ii. 1-11 John xiv. 23-31	Joel ii. 21-32 Acts ii. 1-21 John xiv. 16-29	Apoc. xxii. 6-17 Acts ii. 1-21 John xiv. 15-27
Octave of Pentecost	Apoc. iv. 1-10 Acts v. 29-42? John iii. 1-15	Gal. vi. 8-14 Matth. xvi. 24-27 Lüke xix. 1-18
2nd Sunday after Pentecost	1 John iv. 8-21 Luke xvi. 1 or 19-31	1 Cor. xiv. 28-40 Matth. iv. 18-25
3rd "	1 John iii. 13-18 Luke xiv. 16-24	2 Cor. iii. 4-iv. 6 Matth. viii. 23-27
4th "	1 Pet. v. 6-11 Luke xv. 1-10	Gal. iii. 13-26 Matth. xii. 30-50
5th "	Rom. viii. 18-23 Luke vi. 36-42	Phil. ii. 6-18 Matth. viii. 28-ix. 9
6th "	1 Pet. iii. 8-15 Luke v. 1-11	1 Cor. iii. 18-iv. 5 Matth. xiii. 3-23
7th "	Rom. vi. 3-11 Matth. v. 20-24	1 Cor. i. 18-ii. 9 Matth. xiii. 24-43

For the rest of the ecclesiastical year we can use only the Comes, whose lessons are here almost identical with those of our Book of Common Prayer, only that they are sometimes rather shorter.

8th Sunday after Pentecost	Rom. vi. 19-23
9th "	Mark viii. 1-9 Rom. viii. 12-17 Matth. vii. 15-21
10th "	1 Cor. x. 6-13 Luke xvi. 1-9
11th "	1 Cor. xii. 2-11 Luke xix. 41-47
12th "	1 Cor. xv. 1-10 Luke xviii. 9-14
13th "	2 Cor. iii. 4-9 Mark vii. 31-37
14th "	Gal. iii. 16-22 Luke x. 23-37
15th "	Gal. v. 16-24 Luke xvii. 11-19
16th "	Gal. v. 26-7 Matth. vi. 24-33
17th "	Eph. iii. 13-21 Luke vii. 11-16
18th "	Eph. iv. 1-6 Luke xiv. 1-11
19th "	1 Cor. i. 4-8 Matth. xxii. 34-46
20th "	Eph. iv. 23-29 Matth. ix. 1-8
21st "	Eph. v. 15-21 Matth. xxii. 1-14
22nd "	Eph. vi. 10-17 John iv. 46-53
23rd "	Phil. i. 6-11 Matth. xviii. 23-35
24th "	Phil. iii. 17-21 Matth. xxii. 15-21
25th "	Col. i. 8-11 Matth. ix. 18-22
26th "	Rom. xi. 25-32? Mark xii. 28-34?
Sunday next before Advent	Jer. xxiii. 6-8 (for the Epistle) John vi. 5-14

The Roman service-books do not contain the lessons for the 26th Sunday after Pentecost, though, like the Comes, they appoint Jer. xxiii. 5-8 and John vi. 5-14 for the Sunday next before Advent. The Sarum missal adopts the modern method of reckoning by Sundays after Trinity, and even in the Comes the extra lesson from the Apocalypse, and perhaps the Gospel also, bear upon the mystery now commemorated on the octave of Pentecost. Thus in the Roman use, as in our modern books, the Sundays of the year provided with Epistles and Gospels are fifty-four, in the Comes fifty-five, since the service for the octave of Epiphany could be taken for the first Sunday after Epiphany, if six Sundays should intervene between Jan. 6 and Septuagesima. It also deserves notice that in the Ambrosian Liturgy, which has not yet been displaced by the Roman in the province of Milan, as also in the Mozarabic use, there are six Sundays in Advent, which commences on the first Sunday after St. Martin's day (Nov. 11), not on the Sunday nearest to St. Andrew's day (Nov. 30), as in the rest.

X. Menologies, or Calendars of Saints' Days, with their proper Lessons.—The several schemes for ordering the Epistles and Gospels throughout the year, as adopted by the ancient church in its various branches, bear so little resemblance to each other that it seemed advisable to keep the Greek Synaxaria separate from the corresponding tables of the Coptic and Western communions. The menologies, on the other hand, wherein the lesser festivals and saints' day services are arranged according to their respective places in the ecclesiastical year, may very well be comprised in a single table. We select from the mass of such days those which have been widely celebrated or are in any other way characteristic or remarkable. The italic letters, c, g, m, r, s, will suffice to indicate what belongs to the Coptic, Gallican, Mozarabic, Roman (Comes), or Jerusalem Syriac books respectively. The lessons to which no such letter is annexed are of Greek origin, and we commence with the beginning of the Eastern ecclesiastical year, being Aug. 29 with the Copts, Sept. 1 with the Greeks. The variations noted (e. g. Sept. 2 infra) are those of Greek manuscripts adapted to church reading.

Aug. 29. The New Year (1st day of Tot)—

Evansong .. Matth. ix. 14-17

Matins .. Mark ii. 18-22.

Liturgy .. Luke iv. 14-22. &

The Copts kept the Beheading of John the Baptist a day later, vide infra.

Sept. 1. Simeon Stylites—

Col. iii. 12-16. Luke iv. 16-22. Also in s.

Table with 2 columns: Date and Reference. Includes entries for 22-xix. 12., 11. 1-26, etc., with references to Apoc., Acts, Mark, Num., etc.

ypse, and perhaps the Gospel the mystery how commemorated Pentecost. Thus in the Roman lection books, the Sundays of the first Epistles and Gospels are Comes fifty-five, since the service of Epiphany could be taken Sunday after Epiphany, if six intervene between Jan. 6 and Feb. 2 also deserves notice that in liturgy, which has not yet been common in the province of Milan, Mozarabic use, there are six Sundays which commences on the first of Martin's day (Nov. 11), not on that of St. Andrew's day (Nov. 30), or Calendars of Saints's Days, Lessons.—The several schemes of Epistles and Gospels throughout by the ancient church in its bear so little resemblance to the present seemed advisable to keep the separate from the corresponding Eastern and Western communions. The other hand, wherein the lesser feast's day services are arranged in respective places in the ecclesial very well be comprised in a select from the mass of such days were widely celebrated or are characteristic or remarkable. c, g, m, r, s, will suffice to belong to the Coptic, Gallican, (Comes), or Jerusalem Syriac. The lessons to which no need more of Greek origin, and the beginning of the Eastern being Aug. 29 with the Copts, Greeks. The variations noted are those of Greek manuscripts reading.

Year (1st day of Tot)— song .. Matth. ix. 14-17; .. Mark ii. 18-22. .. Luke iv. 14-22, & kept the Beheading of John the later, vide infra. 2-16. Luke iv. 16-22. Also in z.

LECTIONARY

Table with 2 columns: Date and Reference. Includes entries for Sept. 2. John the Easter—, 1 Tim. ii. 1-7, etc., with references to Heb., Wake, Hari, Parham, etc.

LECTIONARY

Table with 2 columns: Date and Reference. Includes entries for The Greeks kept this festival on the Sunday after Pentecost, but on Nov. 1 (some place it July 1), The Holy Poor (Sancti Pauperum), Cosmas and Damianus—, 1 Cor. xii. 27-xiii. 7; Matth. x. 1, 5-8, etc.

Dec. 28. Holy Innocents, r—
Mosar. Jer. xxxi. 15-20; 2 Cor. i. 2-7;
 Matth. xviii. 1-11.

Jan. 1. Circumcision—1 Cor. xiii. 12-xiv. 5; Luke ii.
 20, 21; 40-52.
 For Western service, see p. 61.

.. 3. Saturday πρὸ τῶν φώτων—1 Tim. iii. 13-17; 5; Matth. iii. 1-6.

Sunday πρὸ τῶν φώτων—2 Tim. iv. 6-8 (B-C
 iii. 24); Mark i. 1-8.

.. 5. Vigil of θεοφανία—1 Cor. ix. 19-x. 4; Luke
 iii. 1-18.

.. 6. θεοφανία (Ephiphany)—
 Matins .. Mark i. 9-11.
 Liturgy .. Tit. ii. 11-14; iii. 4-7; Matth.
 iii. 13-17.

Saturday μετὰ τὰ φώτα—Eph. vi. 10-17;
 Matth. iv. 1-11.

Sunday μετὰ τὰ φώτα—Eph. iv. 7-13; Matth.
 iv. 12-17. Also in s.
 For the Coptic Ephiphany services see p. 60;
 for those of the West, p. 62.

.. 7. John the Kere-runner—1 John v. 1-8; John i.
 28-34. Also in s.

.. 8. Marriage at Cana, c—Evensong .. Matth. xix. 1-12.
 Matins .. John iv. 43-54.
 Liturgy .. John ii. 1-11.

.. 10. Gregory the Younger (Nysen)—Eph. iv. 7-13;
 Math. iv. 25-v. 12 (John x. 39-42, s).

.. 11. Theodosius the Coenobiarch—Luke vi. 17-23;
 x. 1-8, s.

.. 15. Ἰωάννου τοῦ καλύβιτου (Juhannas Tentoril)— Matth. iv. 25-v. 12, s.

.. 16. Mourning for our Lady, the Virgin, c—Evensong .. Luke x. 38-42.
 Matins .. Matth. xii. 35-50.
 Liturgy .. Luke i. 39-56.

.. 18. Chair of St. Peter, r—
Comes. Heb. v. 1-10; Matth. xvi. 13-18.
Gallic. Acts xii. 1-17; Matth. xvi. 13-19;
 John xxi. 16-19.
Mosar. 1 Pet. v. 1-5; Matth. xvi. 13-19.

.. 20. Euthymius—2 Cor. iv. 6-11; Matth. xl. 27-30.

.. 22. Timothy—2 Tim. i. 3-9; Matth. x. 32, 33, 37, 38; xix. 27-30.

.. 23. Clement—Phil. ii. 9-7; Matth. xii. 1-8.

.. 28. Efreem patris nostri—Matth. v. 14-18.

Feb. 1. Vigil of Presentation—(πρὸ ἑορτῆς), Heb. vi.
 19, 20; vii. 1-7.

.. 2. Presentation of Christ in the Temple—
 Heb. vii. 7-17; Luke ii. 22-40. Also in s.
 For Coptic service see p. 60; for Western, p. 62.

.. 3. Simeon ὁ θεοδόχος and Anna—Heb. ix. 11-14;
 Luke ii. 25-38.

.. 15. Oneaimus the Apostle, bishop of Illyricum—Phileni. 1-3, 10-18, 23-25.

.. 23. Polycarp—Eph. iv. 7-13; John xii. 24-38.

.. 24. Finding of John Baptist's Head—
 Matina .. Luke vii. 18-29.
 Liturgy .. 2 Cor. iv. 6-11; Matth. xi.
 5-14 (2-15, s).

March 6. Hormas the Apostle, bishop of Dalmatia—
 Heb. xii. 1-10.

.. 9. The Forty Martyrs in Sebais—Heb. xii. 1-3?; Matth. xx. 1-16. Also in s.

.. 24. Vigil of the Annunciation—Luke i. 39-58 (Gale).

.. 25. Annunciation—Heb. ii. 11-18; Luke i. 24-38.
 Also in s.
Mosar. Phil. iv. 4-9; Matth. i. 1-23.
Sarum Ec. Luke i. 26-38.

April 1. Marian Agryptiacae—Luke vii. 36-50. See note on Sept. 18.

.. 23. St. George the Martyr, ὁ τροπαιοφόρος—
 Matins .. Mark xiii. 9-13 (B-C iii. 42).
 Liturgy .. Acts xii. 1-11 (Vod. Bezac), or 1 Cor. iii. 9-17.

April 25. (Oct. 19, B-C iii. 24) Mark the Evangelist—
 Col. iv. 6, 10, 11, 18; Mark v. 1-7, 14, 15.

.. 30. James, son of Zebedee—Matth. x. 1-7, 14, 15.

May 2. Athanasius—Heb. iv. 14-v. 6; Matth. v. 14-19.

.. 21. Constantine and Helen—Acts xxx. 13-19 (xxvi.
 1, 12-20, B-C iii. 24); John x. 5-5, 27-30.

.. 26. Jude the Apostle—John xvi. 21-24.

June 11. Bartholomew and Barnabas the Apostles—
 Acts xi. 19-30; James v. 7-13.

.. 14. Elisha the Prophet—Mark v. 10-20; Luke iv.
 22-30. Also in s.

.. 19. Jude ὁ ἀδελφός—Mark vi. 1-13.

.. 23. Vigil of John the Baptist—
Comes. Jer. i. 5; Luke i. 5-17.
 Isai. xii. 27, &c.; Luke i. 18-25.

.. 24. Birth of John the Baptist—Rom. xiii. 11-xiv. 4;
 Luke i. 1-25, 57-80. Also in s.
Comes. Isai. xlix. 1-7; Luke i. 57-68.
Gallic. Isai. xl. 1-10; Acts xiii. 16-47;
 Luke i. 6-25, 56-67, 68, 80.
Mosar. Jer. i. 5-19; Gal. i. 11-24; Luke i.
 57-80.

.. 28. r. Vigil of St. Peter and St. Paul—Acts iii. 1, &c.;
 John xxi. 15-24.

.. 29. St. Peter and St. Paul—2 Cor. x. 21-xii. 9;
 Matth. xvi. 13-19. Also in s.
Gallic. Acts viii. 15-27; Matth. v. 1-16.
Mosar. Eph. i. 1-14; John xv. 1-16.
Sarum. Acts xii. 1-11; Matth. xvi. 13-19.

.. 30. The Twelve Apostles—Matth. x. 1-8 (ix. 36-
 x. 8, s).

July 8. Procopius—Luke vi. 17-19; ix. 1, 2; x. 16-21.

.. 22. Mary Magdalene, ἡ κηροφόρος—2 Tim. ii. 1-10;
 Mark xvi. 9-20 (Luke viii. 1-3, s).

Aug. 1. The Maccabees—Heb. xi. 24-40; Matth. x.
 16-22. Also in s.
Mosar. Wld. v. 1-5, 16, 17; Eph. i. 1, &c.; Luke ix. 1-6.

.. 6. Transfiguration—Matins .. Luke ix. 28 (28, s)-46, or Mark ix. 2-9.
 Liturgy .. 2 Pet. i. 10-19; Matth. xvii.
 1-8 (s adde 10-22).
 For the Coptic see p. 60; Mosar. as in octave of Pent-cost.

.. 7. Domestius the Martyr—Mark xi. 22-26; Matth.
 vii. 7, 8.

.. 15. Assumption of the Virgin—Phil. ii. 5-11;
 Luke x. 38-42.

.. 20. Thaddeus the Apostle—1 Cor. iv. 9-16; Matth.
 x. 16-22.

.. 25. Titus—2 Tim. ii. 1-10; Matth. v. 14-19.

.. 29 (30 of Copts, as 29 begins their new year). Be-heading of John the Baptist—Matina .. Matth. xiv. 1-13.
 Liturgy .. Acts xiii. 25-32 (30, B-C iii. 24).
 Mark vi. 14-30.

Also in s.
Comes. Heb. xi. 38, &c.; Mark vi. 17, &c.
Gallic. Heb. xi. 33-xii. 7; Matth. xiv. 1-14.
Mosar. 2 Cor. xii. 2-9; Matth. xiv. 1-14.

At the end of the Calendar are added in most lectionaries a few proper lessons for special occasions. Such are the following:—

Εἰς τὰ ἑγκαίνια, Dedication of a Church—2 Cor. v. 15-21, or Heb. ix. 1-7; John x. 22-28.

.. Comes. Apoc. xxii. 2, &c. Gallic. Gen. xxviii. 11-22.
 1 Cor. iii. 8, &c. 1 Cor. iii. 9-17.
 John x. 22-28. John x. 22-28.

.. 1 Kings viii. 22, &c. Luke xix. 1, &c. Luke xix. 1-10.

Εἰς ἀσθενοῦντας—James v. 10-16; Rom. vi. 16-23; xv.
 1-7; Matth. viii. 14-17; x. 1; John iv. 46-53.

Εἰς ἀνομβρία—James v. 17-20 (B-C iii. 24); Matth.
 xvi. 1-3; Luke iv. 21-26 (Hari. 5699).

Εἰς κοιμηθέντας—Acts ix. 32-42; Rom. xiv. 6-9; 1 Cor.
 xv. 20-58; 2 Cor. v. 1-10; 1 Thes. iv. 13-17;
 John v. 24-30. The last two lessons are included

nople, asserts that the people of Constantinople possessed a certain portion of himself, "quandam mei portione[m]." The council of Sardica (c. 7) desired the bishop of Rome, in case of need, to send "presbyters from his own side" (ἀπὸ τοῦ ἰδίου πλεούρου πρεσβυτέρους, de latere suo presbyteros) into the provinces in order to determine appeals from bishops who had been forced to abdicate by provincial councils [APPEAL, I. 127]. Legates of this kind were sent on various occasional missions. Thus Leo I. sent Julian of Cos to the emperor Marcian after the council of Chalcedon for the purpose of opposing the progress of the Eutychian and Nestorian heresies, and invested him for this particular duty with the full power of the papal see (Leo Mag. Epist. 113 [al. 59]), and in an epistle to Pulcheria states that he has constituted him his full representative that he might be a pledge and hostage of his own loyalty (Id. Epist. 112 [al. 58]). Sometimes the legates were to act in conjunction with the bishops of the province to which they were sent. So Leo I. sent Lucentius (a bishop) and Basilius (a priest) to Constantinople, joined in commission with Anastolius, then bishop, after the pseudo-synod of Ephesus, with power to receive into communion those who should repudiate their share in the council, the case of Dioscorus alone being reserved for the judgment of Rome (Leo I. Epist. 85 [al. 46]). Sometimes they were sent merely to inquire and report. So Leo I. sent Prudentius, a bishop, to Africa to ascertain the truth concerning certain alleged irregularities connected with the ordination of bishops. In this case he was to possess the authority of the papal see as far as inquiry went, but only to report to Rome the result of his inquiries (Leo I. Epist. 12 [al. 87]).

The great missionaries of early times, who have gone forth under the authority of the Roman see, are frequently spoken of as papal legates. Thus Augustine of Canterbury, who was sent by pope Gregory the Great, is sometimes spoken of as his legate, though it does not appear that when he became archbishop of the English greater powers were conferred on him than on other archbishops who received the pall from Rome (Thomassin, I. i. 31, 6). Or Boniface, the great apostle of Germany, Hincmar says (Epist. 30, c. 20, p. 201) that popes Gregory II. and Gregory III. constituted him "legatum Apostolicæ sedis," for the reformation of the Christian religion in the parts where he laboured. His commission, which was a peculiar one, empowered him to ordain presbyters and afterwards bishops, without assigning him any particular see. It was not until the year 751 that pope Zacharias, the successor of Gregory III., made him bishop of Mentz and metropolitan of Germany and part of Gaul (Thomassin, I. i. 31, 1-5).

The COUNCILS of the church have from the first afforded a field from the claims of papal legates. At Nicea the representatives of the Roman see were the two presbyters, Victor [or Vitus] and Vincentius, who would have accompanied the pope, if he had been able to make the long journey from Rome to Bithynia. Who were the presidents in this famous assembly has been matter of endless dispute. Eusebius (Vita Const. iii. 13) simply says that the emperor, after his opening speech, gave place to the presidents of the assembly (παρεβίδου τὸν λόγον τοῖς τῆς συνόδου πρεσβυτέροις); but who were these? Athanasius (Apol. de Fuga, c. 5, quoted by Theodoret, E. II. ii. 15) speaks of the venerable Hosius as a man who, from his weight of character, of course took a leading part in any synod where he was present (ποιᾶς γὰρ ὄχι ἡγήσατο συνέδοσι); but he gives no hint that he derived any precedence from papal delegation. There can, in fact, be little doubt that Hosius and Eusebius of Caesarea were the real presidents at Nicea, and that mainly through the favour of the emperor. Gelasius of Cyzicus (Labbe, ii. 155), writing towards the end of the fifth century, is the first to assert that Hosius appeared at Nicea as a delegate of Rome, and the same authority (ib. 267), in the confessedly imperfect list of subscriptions, makes Hosius sign first, followed by the Roman presbyters Victor (or Vito) and Vincentius. Perhaps Gelasius, who was evidently a wholly uncritical reporter, has transferred to Nicea the practice of his own age. For by the fifth century it had become a common practice for the popes to send representatives to councils.

In what capacity Hosius presided at the Council of Sardica has been much discussed; it seems probable that he owed his pre-eminence rather to his personal merits and the favour of the emperor than to any appointment of the see of Rome.

The African bishops in council at Carthage, A.D. 419, protested against the presence of the legates from Rome, declaring that sanction for sending such legates could be found in none of the councils, and entreating him to withdraw them for the sake of peace (Cod. Eccl. Afric. c. 138; Brun, Canones, i. 200). The legates, however, Faustinus, bishop of Potentia, and two presbyters named Philippus and Asellus, were received at the council, the place of Faustinus being second to Aurelius the president, in conjunction with Valentinus, bishop of Numidia (Cod. Eccl. Afric. Præfat., in Brun, Canones, i. 156.)

In the council of Constantinople of the year 381, neither Damasus of Rome nor any other Western prelate took any share, either personally or by legate.

Cyril, patriarch of Alexandria, was locumtenens or legate of Rome in the Nestorian controversy; "vicem nostram propter maria et terrena spatia ipsi sancto fratri meo Cyrillo delegavimus," says Celestinus in the document by which he professes to excommunicate Nestorius (Labbe, iii. 373). To the council of Ephesus the pope had sent two bishops, Arcadius and Projectus, and a presbyter, Philip, with instructions to regulate their conduct by the advice of Cyril, but in all things to uphold the authority of the see of Rome. They were not to press their attendance upon the assembly; when they were present, they were to take notes of what passed, without joining in the debates; at the close of the council, they were to report to the pope himself, and afterwards accompany Cyril to Constantinople, to lay the conclusions of the Fathers before the emperor (Greewood, Cathedra Petri, i. 335). Great pains were taken on this occasion to make the vindication of orthodoxy at Ephesus appear the work of the pope, acting through Cyril and the legates; their instructions were read in the council, and re-

(παρεβίδου τὸν λόγον τοῖς τῆς πόλεως): but who were these? Pol. de Fuga, c. 5, quoted by J. ii. 15) speaks of the venerable who, from his weight of character a leading part in any synod present (τοῖας γὰρ οὐχ ἡγήσατο) gives no hint that he derived from papal delegation. There is little doubt that Hosius and Irenaeus were the real presidents at Carthage, mainly through the favour of the emperor. Hosius of Eusebius of Cyzicus (Labbe, ii. 155), at the end of the fifth century, is the one that Hosius appeared at Nicæna in 325. Hosius of Eusebius of Rome, and the same authority confessedly imperfect list of successors Hosius sign first, followed by Eusebius Victor (or Vito) and Eusebius Gelasius, who was evidently a contemporary reporter, has transferred the name of Hosius to the pope of the same name of his own age. For by the time Hosius had become a common practice to send representatives to councils, Hosius presided at the Council of Carthage in 390. Hosius had been much discussed; it seems to have owed his pre-eminence rather to his merits and the favour of the emperor than to any appointment of the see of Hosius in council at Carthage, declared against the presence of the emperor, declaring that sanction for legates could be found in none and entreating him to withdraw for the sake of peace (Cod. Eccl. Brun., Canones, i. 200). The legates were Faustinus, bishop of Potentia, and Eusebius, bishop of Asellus. At the council, the place of Faustinus was taken by Aurelius the president, in the person of Valentinus, bishop of Numidia. See Præfat., in Brun., Canones, of Constantinople of the year 325 of Rome nor any other took any share, either personally of Alexandria, was locum tenens of Rome in the Nestorian canon nostram propter marina et in sancto fratri meo Cyrillo et Celestino in the document of excommunication Nestorius. To the council of Ephesus sent two bishops, Arcadius and a presbyter, Philip, with authority to regulate their conduct by the emperor in all things to uphold the see of Rome. They were not present upon the assembly; present, they were to take notes without joining in the debates of the council, they were to report to the emperor, and afterwards to accompany the emperor, and to lay the conclusions of the emperor (Greenwood, 335). Great pains were taken to make the vindication of orthodoxy appear the work of the pope, Cyril and the legates; their read in the council, and recorded in its minutes; the legate Philip then declared its proceedings to have been in conformity with them, and in the name of the see of Rome pronounced the condemnation and deposition of Nestorius, "according to the formula which the holy pope Celestinus had committed to his care." Arcadius and Projectus signified their assent. Cyril then caused the papal ratification to be recorded in the terms in which it had been conveyed to them (Greenwood, p. 339 f.).

These may suffice as instances of the employment of legates to represent the Roman see in the great councils. One or two examples may be given of legates sent from Rome to England, as having a special interest of their own.

At the council of Hatfield (A.D. 680) John the Roman preceptor was present, having come from Rome under the guidance of the English Benedictine Bishop, to introduce the Roman manner of saying the offices in his new monastery at Wearmouth. It is said of him that he joined with the rest in confirming the decrees of the Catholic faith (pariter Catholicæ fidei decreta firmabat), i.e. in receiving the decrees of the first five general councils, and declaring the orthodoxy of the English church in respect of the Monothelites; but nothing is said of any precedence granted to him; the council was summoned by command of the English kings, and presided over by the English archbishop Theodore (Bede, H. E. iv. 17, 18; Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 141 ff.).

The Anglo-Saxon Chronicle (ad an. 785) relates that in that year there was a contentious synod at Calcey [probably Chelsea], and also that in that year messengers were sent from Rome by pope Adrian to England, to renew the faith and the peace which St. Gregory had sent us by Augustine the bishop, and they were worshipfully received. The head of this legation was George, bishop of Ostia. These legates, in fact, were present at two councils, one in the north and one in the south of England, probably at Fichale and Chelsea respectively, but as to the extent of the authority they claimed we know nothing, except that they made application to the Mercian and Northumbrian kings respectively for the assembling of the councils. Their names do not appear among the subscriptions (Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 443-401).

The bearers of the letters sent by pope John IV. (A.D. 640) to the Irish bishops and abbots about the Pelagian heresy were in some sort legates, as two of them at least—Hilary, the arch-presbyter, and John, the primicerius—are described as vicegerents of the apostolic see (servans locum sanctæ sedis apostolicæ). (Bede, H. E. ii. 19, p. 100.)

And it may be observed generally that in the earlier ages of the church papal legates in councils by no means took the position which a later age assigned to them, after Gregory VII.'s vigorous assertion of the privileges of his see. Thus the legate Faustinus, at the council of Carthage, took his place below the bishop of that see, Aurelius; Eusebius of Vercelli, legate as he was, yielded precedence at Alexandria to Athanasius. At Chalcedon [l. 334] the lay dignitaries occupied the place of honour, and controlled the proceedings of the council throughout; on their left were the Roman legates, on their right Dioscorus of Alexandria and Juve-

of Jerusalem. Julianus, who was rather a legate to the emperor than to the council, took his place after the first twenty bishops. Cyril took the first place among the bishops in the third general council at Ephesus, but this precedence was probably due as much to his rank as patriarch of Alexandria, as to the fact that on this occasion he was vicegerent of the pope [EPIPHANES, I. 615]. Moreover, legates did not (in the period with which we are concerned) attempt to set themselves above the sovereign power, but addressed themselves to kings and emperors respecting the summoning of councils and other ecclesiastical business. As the claims of papal legates simply represent the claims of the papacy, the further account of them must be referred to the article Pope.

2. The Apostolicarij or Responsales were so called, as being the persons through whom the Responsa or judgments of their principal were communicated to the court to which they were accredited. Hincmar says that Apostolicarij were instituted when Constantine removed the seat of empire from Rome to Byzantium, from which time agents (responsales) both of Rome and of other chief sees were maintained at the imperial court; a statement probable in itself, though the authority is late. Hosius, bishop of Cordova, certainly acted as a kind of ecclesiastical minister at the court of Constantine, but there is no evidence whatever that he represented the see of Rome there, or that he held any definite office under Constantine (Stanley, Eastern Church, p. 112, 3rd edition). Petrus de Murea (De Concord. Sacror. et Imp. v. 16) places the formal institution of Apostolicarij at a later date. Referring to the letter of Leo the Great to Julianus, bishop of Cos (Epist. 89), in which the pope gives him a general commission to act on behalf of the Roman see at the court of Constantinople in the repression of the Nestorian and Eutychian heresies, he says, "this gave occasion to the sending of agents or apostolicarij (responsales) of the apostolic see to the capital city, especially after the time of Justinian; . . . for at that time there were constantly in the court diaconi responsales, who both took charge before the emperor of cases in which the Roman church was peculiarly interested, and kept watch over matters of faith and discipline. At the same time they were as it were hostages of the public faith, guaranteeing the obedience due to princes."

Several legates of the Roman see at the court of Constantinople are known to history. Thus Liberatus records (Breviarium, c. 22) that pope Agapetus made the deacon Pelagius his apostolicarij at the imperial court; and Gregory the Great relates that he himself, when a deacon, acted as apostolicarij of Pelagius II. with the emperor, using the expression, "tempore quo exhibendis responsis ad Principem ipse transmissus sum" (Dialogus, iii. 23). Justinian (Novel. 6, c. 2; 123, c. 25) desires bishops not to come in person to court, but to transact their business there by the agency of apostolicarij.

After the 6th Oecumenical Council we find Constantine Pogonatus writing to Leo II. to send him an apostolicarij, who in all ecclesiastical matters should not only represent his person but actually possess his power, "in emergentibus sive dogmaticis sive canonicis et prorsus in omnibus ecclesiasticis negotiis vestrae sanctitatis exprimat ac gerat personam." (Conc. vi. Act. 18, Labbe.) Leo in consequence sent the subdeacon Constantine, who had been one of his legates at the council, and requested the emperor to receive him as his minister, "ut ministrum digne suscipiat." Thomassin (Vet. et Nor. Ecol. Discip. i. 2, c. 108, §§ 27, 28) thinks that this was an evasion of the request to send a legate with full powers, lest he should be induced by the power of the emperor to commit himself to acts for which the papal see would be responsible.

3. The popes of Rome have frequently granted special privileges, such as may be called legatine or vicarial, to certain distinguished sees. The first of these was that of Thessalonica. In the year 379 the great prefecture of Illyricum Orientale was assigned to the Eastern emperor. But the see of Rome had probably for a long time claimed patriarchal authority over this division of the empire, and Damasus, the then pope, was unwilling to allow a mere political severance to affect his spiritual authority, and therefore appointed Acholius, bishop of Thessalonica, metropolitan of that prefecture, his representative or vicar for the diocese of Illyricum Orientale (Greenwood, Cathed. Pet. i. 259). From the sanctities of our information as to this transaction we know little or nothing of the exact nature of the powers conferred on this legate. Leo the Great (Epist. ad Avilium Thesa.) confirms to the archbishop of Thessalonica powers over Illyricum which (he says) had been conferred under his predecessors Damasus, Siricius, and Anastasius. See the Responsio Pii VI. ad Metropolitanus Mogunt. etc. super Nuntiariis Apost. Romae 1790. Vicarial or legatine powers were also conferred on the see of Arles, the "Gallican Rome." Thus Zosimus (A.D. 418) made Patroclus, bishop of Arles, his vicegerent; Hilary gave the same office to Leontius; Gelasius I. to Aeonius; Symmachus to Caesarius; Vigilius to Auxonius; and at length, the same privilege having been continued to a series of bishops, it was definitely granted and assigned to the see of Arles (Gregorii Epist. iv. 50, 52, 54). See also Gregory's seventh response to Augustine of Canterbury, in Haddan and Stubbs, Councils, iii. 22. And the same thing took place also with regard to other sees.

(Petrus de Marca, de Concordia Sacerdotii et Imperii, lib. v.; Böhmer, Jus Ecclesiasticum, lib. iii., tit. 37, c. 36; Van Espen, Jus Ecclesiasticum; Thomassin, Nota et Vet. Ecol. Discip.; Walther, Kirchenrecht; Jacobson in Herzog, Real-Encyclop., s. v. Legaten.) [P. O. and C.]

LEGATION (Legatio, πρεσβεία). A body of legates entrusted with any commission, e.g. Soc. H. E. iv. 12; Soz. H. B. vi. 11. When the legates were not a mere deputation, but had full power to act on their own authority, it was called a free legation, "legatio libera" (Cod. Ecol. Afric. c. 94, 97; see Ducange, Gloss.). The commission given to the legates was called a letter of legation, "litterae legationis." At the 6th council of Carthage the various legates presented their credentials, which were read to the council, "offerentibus legationis litteris et recitatis" (Cod. Ecol. Afric. c. 90). Sometimes it appears to have been used for the duty entrusted to a legate. Thus Leo I. (Epist. 26) speaks of a commission given to the emperor Pulcheria to procure the summoning of a fresh council after the Pseudo-Synod of Ephesus as a legation, hæc sibi speculiter a beatissimo Petro Apostolo legatione commissa. But the word for the most part is convertible with LEGATE.

[P. O.]

LEGENDA. This word properly denotes whatever is appointed to be read to the congregation during public worship. It has however acquired the restricted sense of the records of the lives and acts of the saints and martyrs, which were appointed to be thus read. Collections of these records date from the 2nd century, and were known as Acta (i. e. the registers containing the official records), Sanctorum, or Acta Martyrum. They contained the most important sayings and deeds of the saints, both martyrs and confessors. The earliest reputed compiler of the acts of martyrs is St. Clement of Rome, who is said to have employed scribes "notarios," to collect the acts of martyrs throughout the different districts of the city. The practice appears to have spread into the African church. St. Cyprian (Ep. 57, ad Clericum) writes: "Denique et dies eorum quibus excedunt, annotat, ut commemoraciones eorum inter memorias martyrum celebrare possimus."

Eusebius also (Hist. v. 4) speaks of such a collection, "Whoever cares to do so, may easily obtain the fullest information on this subject by reading the epistle itself," which, as I have already said, I have inserted in the collection of the Acts of Martyrs [τῆ τῶν μαρτυρίων συναγωγῆ]. He gives at length the account of the martyrdom of Polycarp and his companions (iv. 15. See also vii. 41-42).

Hence Eusebius has been often looked upon as the first to compile a martyrology. St. Jerome made a compendium of the acts as compiled by Eusebius.

Any further question as to the growth of martyrologies belongs more properly to another place [MARTYROLOGY]. It is sufficient here to point out their origin and antiquity.

In the persecution of Diocletian many authentic records of this nature perished, in consequence of a general edict to burn them (Gregor. Taron. de Gloria Martyr.). Gelasius (A.D. 492) rejected as spurious writings of this nature then in circulation, and forbade them to be read in churches.

The third council of Carthage (A.D. 397), Can. 47, after ruling that besides the canonical scriptures nothing should be read publicly in the church under the name of Holy Scripture, adds that the passions of the martyrs may be read on their anniversaries. "Licet etiam legi passionem martyrum, quum anniversarii eorum dies celebrantur." And it appears from various sermons of St. Augustine (Ser. xlviii. de Sanctis, &c.) that the practice was general in his day. Cassiodorus, in the 6th century, writing to certain abbats says (Instit. div. Lett. c. 32), "Passiones martyrum legite constanter."

The practice was to read the "acts" of those saints and martyrs who were to be commemorated in the liturgy on the day following, in order that the faithful might join in the commemora-

* I. e. from the martyrs of Lyons to Eleutherus.

ate. Thus Leo I. (Epist. 26) mission given to the emissary the summoning of a fresh Pseudo-Synod of Ephesus as a specialiter a beatissimo Petro commissa. But the word for convertible with LEGATE.

[P. O.]

This word properly denotes pointed to be read to the public worship. It has how- restricted sense of the records acts of the saints and martyrs, dated to be thus read. Collected date from the 2nd century, as Acta (i. e. the registers official records), Sanctorum, or They contained the most im- portant deeds of the saints, both founders. The earliest reputed acts of martyrs is St. Clement of Rome, which is said to have employed scribes to collect the acts of martyrs in different districts of the city. St. Cyprian (Ep. 37, ad Clericum) speaks of dies eorum quibus ex- commemorationes eorum ar- tium celebrare possimus.

Hist. v. 4) speaks of such a never ceases to do so, may easily information on this subject by itself,* which, as I have inserted in the collection of "Martyrs" [τῆ τῶν μαρτύρων γίνεσθαι] at length the account of Polycarp and his companions vii. 41-42).

has been often looked upon as a martyrology. St. Jerome of the acts as compiled by attention as to the growth of martyrs more properly to another legenda. It is sufficient here to mention its origin and antiquity.

of Diocletian many au- thors of this nature perished, in con- sequence of an edict to burn them (de Gloria Martyr.). Gelasius of Caesarea, in his de scripturis, and as spurious writings of this nature, and forbade them to be read.

of Carthage (A. D. 397), which besides the canonical should be read publicly in the name of Holy Scripture, adds of the martyrs may be read on the anniversary of their death. "Licitat etiam legi possessiones anniversarii eorum dies cele- brantur in variis sermonibus." (Ber. xlviii. de Sanctis, &c.) that general in his day. Cassiodorus, writing to certain de Lit. c. 32), "Passiones constantur."

to read the "acts" of those who were to be commemorated on the day following, in order that they might join in the commemora-martyre of Lyons to Eleutherus.

tion with memories refreshed. When the daily services were reduced to order, the martyrology was appointed to be read in choir, at the end of Prime, after the Orison (Oratio) which is followed by the usual "Benedicamus Domino," R. Deo gratias; the lection which contains the memorials of the saints for the next day being read. The lection is followed by the Verse and Response. V. Pretiosa in conspectu Domini. R. Mors sanctorum ejus; and a few prayers.

From a MS. appendix to the Roman Responsorial and Antiphony, which is considered to be of the 9th century, it appears that the passion and acts of a saint were only read in the churches dedicated to that saint (ubi ipsius titulus erat) until the time of pope Adrian I. A. D. 772.

This reading of the martyrology with the prayers which follow it is usually considered a distinct office from Prime, and known as officium capitulare. In many churches it was said in a different place. Thus in the old statutes of the church of Paris: "Thence (i. e. from the choir after Prime) they go into the chapter house, [or possibly another chapel in the church], where, after the reading of the acts of the saints, and the diptychs of the deceased, let prayers be made for their repose." [Inle in capitulum progrediuntur, ubi gestis sanctorum et diptychis defunctorum perfectis, fiant preces pro eorum requiem.] Again, in the rite of Avranches: "Prime ended, let the brothers assemble in the chapter house, and let the lection of the Martyrology be read, lest any festival of a saint which should be celebrated on the morrow be omitted through inadvertence." [Primâ finitâ, in capitulum convenient fratres, Martyrologii lectio legatur; ne aliqua sancti festivitatis in crastino celebranda negligenter omittatur.] So also the old ritual of St. Martin at Tours. Chrodegang, bishop of Metz, A. D. 742, introduced the practice into his chapter among his reforms. On the other hand the martyrology was often read in choir, not in chapter. This was directed by the old ordinarium of Seulis, which, after directions for the office of Prime, proceeds: "After the aforesaid orison the calendar* (calenda) is read by one of the boys, and terminates thus: and of all the many other holy martyrs and confessors and virgins. Then the anniversary which is contained in the Martyrology is announced." So also the ordinarium of the Cathedral of Tours. "Then follow the lection from the martyrology, read in choir with a sufficiently loud voice . . . A boy says 'Vive, Domine, benedicere.' The priest gives the benediction,^d and after the reading of the lection is to say "Pretiosa in conspectu," &c. After this a boy is to announce the anniversary which is to be celebrated on the following day. The reading of the Martyrology in chapter appears to have been limited to the more important monastic houses and colleges of canons, and usually in connexion with the reading of the rubric of the house, which by the council of Aix in Chapelle (A. D. 817) was directed to be bound in one volume with the martyrology. The custom gradually died out (it had ceased at St. Martin's at Tours in the 15th century); and in the printed breviaries, monastic as well as secular, the officium capitulare is printed so as to form part of Prime without any break.

^b Locus in quem conveniunt Monachi et Canonici, sic dictum, inquit Papias, quod capitulum ubi legantur (Du- rante in loco). [CHAPEL-HOUSE, I. 349.]

^c I. e. the list of names for the day.

^d I. e. the appointed benedictory formula before the lection.

In a decree of the Congregation of Rites (10 Jun. 1690. Meratus in Ind. Decr. Brev. 163) we find the following ruling:—

"After what has been said, the hour of Prime is terminated when 'Benedicamus Domino' is said, and what follows is only a sort of appendix to the church here inserts daily the reading of the Martyrology, and Prime of the Blessed Virgin, when this is to be said, so anything else may be inserted; though we do not recommend that this should be done, because what is now supplemented is considered to complete Prime as it were [Primam veluti integrare],* or to be an additional part of it."

In addition to the readings at Prime, on festivals with three nocturns, the lessons of the second nocturn are as a rule taken from the acts of the saint of the day.

The custom of reading at nocturns such acts as were worthy of credit is thought to have grown up in the 8th century; that of reading them in the liturgy much earlier, as has been already stated. They were read before the epistle and briefly recapitulated in the preface. In the course of the liturgy, the bishop ascended the chair (cathedram enseculente) and gave an explanation of the Fathers in honour of the martyrs (see, inter alia, S. August. Sermo 2, de S. Steph.). This custom was kept up in France till the 9th century, and in Spain till beyond the 10th; and the acts were inserted in the sacramentaries and missals of both countries.† They were never inserted in the Roman, as appears from the Gelasian and Gregorian sacramentaries and missals, which make but sparse and cautious mention of the martyrs and their sufferings in the preface alone.

Among Latin martyrologies, those compiled by Bede, and by the Benedictine monk Usuardus, in the 9th century, may be mentioned.

The Greek equivalent to the martyrology is the menology (μηνολόγιον), so called because its contents are arranged according to months. The lection for the day is called the "synaxarion" (συναξαρίον), and is inserted at full length in the menæa (which contains the variable parts of the office, and so in some measure correspond to the proprium Sanctorum of the Latin breviaries) after the sixth ode of the canon for the day said at Lauds. It is introduced by its proper stichos, nearly always two iambic lines, containing some allusion to the saint or play upon his name, followed by a hexameter line, of the nature of a "memoria technica" of the date. There is usually more than one synaxarion to a day, each in commemoration of a different saint; in which case, with few exceptions, each has its own Ionic stichos; but the first alone the hexameter line. Other saints of the day are commemorated by the simple reciting of their names and death, stating usually its manner, followed by a stichos, but with no synaxarion. These readings and commemorations are concluded with the clause—"By their holy intercessions, O God, have mercy upon us. Amen" (ταῖς αὐτῶν ἁγίαις πρεσβείαις, ὁ θεὸς, ἐλέησον ἡμᾶς. Ἀμήν).⁴ There are great variations in different menologies. The emperor Basil the Macedonian directed one to be compiled, A.D. 885, which may be taken as a type of others.

* I. e. to fill up the measure of. Compare Lucretius, t. 1031.

† The Mozarabic Missal is still distinguished for the variety and length of its prefaces, called Illatioes. They vary with each mass, and that for St. Vincent, for example, occupies more than three closely-printed quarto columns, and one and a half or nearly two columns of the same type is a frequent length. The prefaces of the old Gallican Missal, called Involutions or Contextationes, are as varied as the Mozarabic, but as a rule considerably shorter. [PREFACE.]

Baronius, Præf. ad Martyr. Rom. Paris, 1607; Bona, de Div. Psal. c. xvi. 19; Durant, de Rit. Eccl. iii. c. 18; Gavanti, Comm. in Kub. Miss. Rom. sec. v. c. 21; Martene, de Ant. Rit. iv. 8; and the Breviaris and the Meneia passim; Cavalieri, Op. Lit. vol. ii. cap. 37, Dec. 2, and c. 41, Dec. 12 and 17, &c. See also Augusti, Christ. Archaeologia, vol. vi. p. 104. [H. J. H.]

LEGER, ST. [LEODEGARIUS.]

LENEY, COUNCIL OF (Leniense Concilium), held at Lenev in Ireland, A.D. 630, or thereabouts, respecting Easter, which was kept differently then in Scotland and Ireland from what it was in Rome. In other words, if the fourteenth day of the moon fell on a Sunday, it was kept on that Sunday, and not the following. St. Fintan here prevailed with his countrymen in favour of the old rule; but it was unfair of contemporaries to call them "Quartodecimans" at that account. (Ussher, Brit. Eccl. c. 17; comp. Mansi, x. 611.)

[E. S. Ff.]

LENT (τεσσαρακοστή, Quadragesima. The English name is derived from the Anglo-Saxon Lencten, spring; with which may be compared the German Lenz, and the Dutch Lente. The titles for this season in languages of Latin derivation are merely corruptions of the name Quadragesima, as the French Carême, Italian Quaresima, etc. So also in the Celtic languages, as the Welsh Garweys, Manx Kuryys, Breton Coryz, etc. In Teutonic and allied languages, the name for the season merely indicates the fast, as the German Fastenzeit, Dutch Vaste, etc. So also in the Calendar of the Greek church it is ἡ νήστεια).

1. History of the observance.—We can trace up to very early times the existence of a preparatory fast to Easter, for it is mentioned definitely by Irenæus and Tertullian. While, however, the fast seems to have been one universally kept, there seems to have been very great latitude as to the duration of the fast. Thus Irenæus writing to Victor, bishop of Rome, and referring to the disputes as to the time of keeping Easter, adds that there is the same dispute as to the length of the preliminary fast. "For," he says, "some think they ought to fast for one day, others for two days, and others even for several, while others reckon forty hours both of day and night to their day" (οἱ δὲ τεσσαράκοντα ἕρας ἡμερῶν τε καὶ νυκτερῶν συμμετροῦσι τὴν ἡμέραν αὐτῶν). Irenæus then goes on to say that this variety is not merely a thing of his own time, but of much older date (πολὸν πρότερον); an important statement, as carrying back the existence of the fast practically up to apostolic times (Irenæus, Ep. ad Vict.; apud Euseb. Hist. Eccles. v. 24).

Before, however, we pass on to consider the references in Tertullian, it must be noted that much discussion has arisen as to the punctuation of the above passage; for the translation of Rufinus puts a full stop after τεσσαράκοντα, a plan which is adopted by some, as by Stieren and Harvey, the most recent editors of Irenæus. We must remark, however, that not only are the MSS. said to be unanimous in giving the first-mentioned reading, but as Valesius (not. in loc.) justly points out, the general run of the Greek is palpably in favour of the same way.⁵ (For a defence of the opposite theory, see Massuet, Diss. in Iren. ii. 23.)

We pass on next to consider the evidence furnished by Tertullian, who in one place speaks of the fast "die Paschæ," as "communis et quasi publica jejunii religio" (De Orat. c. 18). This, of course, would be a fast on Good Friday. That the fast, however, was not confined to this day only, we learn from another place, where writing as a Montanist he says of the Catholics that they considered that the only fasts which Christians should observe were those "in which the bridegroom was taken away from them" (De Jejuniis, c. 2; cf. also c. 13, where he draws a distinction between the obligation of the fast of the above-mentioned days and other fasts, especially the Stations, so called). Here then we have a fast for the period during which our Saviour was under the power of death.

Thus far it would appear that there was in any case a fast, whether on the day of our Lord's death, or for the above longer period; but in some cases extra days were added, varying in different churches. At a later period the same kind of variation prevailed, as we find, e.g. from Socrates and Sozomen. Thus the former (Hist. Eccles. v. 22) speaks of those in Rome as fasting for three

⁵ For ἡμέραν, Valesius (not. in loc.) conjectured that νηστειῶν should be read, on account of the difficulty of understanding the expression "day," as applied in any sense to a period of 40 hours. There is, however, no MS. authority for this, and it cuts the knot of the difficulty rather than solves it.

⁶ Thus a climax seems indicated in the καὶ οἱ δὲ καὶ πλείονας, and we should look for some connecting particle with the ἕρας. The Latin of Rufinus is "nonnulli etiam quadragesima, ita ut horas diurnas . . ." the ita has a decidedly suspicious appearance after the termination of the preceding word. Moreover, the fact introduced by ita ut, as to the fast being observed during the hours both of day and night, is simply inexplicable when taken in connexion with the preceding "nonnulli etiam quadragesima."

⁴ The following, for St. Polycarp (Feb. 23), may serve as a specimen:

Στίχοι. σοὶ Πολύκαρπος ὀλοκαυτῶθ ἁλόε, κασπὸν πόλιν δοῦν ἐκ πυρὸς ξενότητος.

εἰκάδι ἐν τριτάτῃ κατὰ φλόξ Πολύκαρπον ἔκαυσε.

⁵ This is the usual form of words and the invariable part of the clause. Sometimes it runs "By the prayers of thy martyrs, O Lord Christ, have mercy upon us and save us. Amen" (ταῖς τῶν σὸν μαρτύρων εὐχαῖς, Χριστὲ ὁ θεὸς, ἐλέησον καὶ σώσον. Ἀμήν).

the fast. Thus Irenaeus writes of Rome, and referring to the time of keeping Easter, the same dispute as to the binary fast. "For," he says, ought to fast for one day, and others even for several, forty hours both of day and night (of δε τεσσαράκοντα ὥρας νηστείας συμπερούσι τὴν νηστείαν then goes on to say is not merely a thing of his much older date (παλαιοῦς statement, as carrying of the fast practically up to Irenaeus, Ep. ad Hæc., apud v. 24).

we pass on to consider theilian, it must be noted that arise as to the punctuation age; for the translation of stop after τεσσαράκοντα, and by some, as by Stieren and sent editors of Irenaeus. We ever, that not only are the unanimous in giving the first-but as Valsius (ut. in loc.) a general run of the Greek is of the same way. (For a te theory, see Massuet, Diss.

to consider the evidence further who in one place speaks of "e," as "communis et quasi" (De Orat. c. 18). This fast on Good Friday. That as not confined to this day another place, where writing of the Catholics that they only fasts which Christians those "in which the bride-ay from them" (De Jejunio, here he draws a distinction of the fast of the above-other fasts, especially the Here then we have a fast which our Saviour was eath.

It appear that there was in her on the day of our Lord's longer period; but in some added, varying in different r period the same kind of s we find, e.g. from Socrates the former (Hist. Eccles. v. n Rome as fasting for three

(not. in loc.) conjectured that on account of the difficulty of "day," as applied in any ours. There is, however, no MS. cuts the knot of the difficulty indicated in the καὶ οὐ καὶ look for some connecting par e Latio of Rufinus is "nonnulli horas diurnas . . ." the its appearance after the termina-ord. Moreover, the fact intro-fact being observed during the fast, is simply inexplicable when the preceding "nonnulli etiam weeks before Easter, except on Saturdays and Sundays. In Illyria, through all Greece, and in Alexandria [those of Illyria, the West (ὁ πρὸς δόξαν throughout all Libya, in Egypt and Palestine (Sozomen, Hist. Eccles. vii. 18)], a fast of six weeks' duration was observed. Others again continued it for seven weeks; these are spoken of vaguely by Socrates as ἄλλοι, and more specifically by Sozomen as those of Constantinople, and the countries round about as far as Phoenicia. Socrates, however, states that these, while beginning the fast seven weeks before Easter, only fasted for fifteen days by intervals (τρεῖς μῶνας νηθημῶναι ἐκ διαλημμάτων); and Sozomen speaks of some who fasted three weeks by intervals (σποράδην) out of the six or seven weeks. Lastly, some fasted for two weeks, as the Montanists did.

Gregory the Great (Hom. in Evang. l. 16. 5; vol. i. 1494, ed. Bened.) speaks of the fast as of thirty-six days' duration, that is to say, of six weeks, not counting in the six Sundays. It will have been noticed above that Sozomen speaks of six weeks as the period observed by the Westerns, whereas it lasted through seven weeks in Constantinople and the East. Now in the East, Saturday as well as Sunday partook of a fasting character,* and thus the number of actual fasting days would be in either case thirty-six. Of course those Eastern churches which only took six weeks would have but thirty-one days' fast. [The Saturday which was Easter Eve was of course in all cases excepted from the general rule of Saturdays.] In any case thirty-six was the maximum number of days' fast' (cf. Cassian, Collat. xxi. 24, 25; Patrol. xlix. 1200).

By whom the remaining four days were added, that is Ash-Wednesday and the three days following it, does not clearly appear. Gregory the Great (ob. A.D. 604) has often been credited with it (see e.g. the Micrologus, c. 49; Patrol. cli. 1013), but his remark which we have referred to above seems conclusive against this. The evidence also derivable from the Gregorian sacramentary, into which we must enter in detail when we come to speak of the liturgical part of our subject, points the same way. Thus the headings for these first four days never include the term Quadragesima, which occurs for the first time on the Sunday; and there seems ground for omitting the words cajut jejuniu in the heading to Ash-Wednesday. Martene (De Ant. Eccles. Rit. iii. 58, ed. Venice, 1783) shews that even after the time of Gregory the Great,

* There is some difficulty here in the remark as to the Roman fast not holding on the Saturday. See Valsius's not. in loc.

† In illustration of the longer period of the fast observed in the East, we may refer to the case mentioned by Photius (Biblioth. 107; Patrol. Gr. cli. 371).

‡ For an illustration of this, see e.g. Chrysostom (Hom. xi. in Gen. § 2; vol. iv. 101, ed. Gaume), who speaks of the fast on Saturday and Sunday. As regards the West an exception must be made in the case of Milan, where Saturday was viewed as in the East (see Ambrose, de Vita et Jejunio, infra), also for Gaul (see Aurelian, infra).

§ We may refer here to the notion that, since thirty-six days was one-tenth of the year, therefore in Lent was fulfilled the Mosaic precept of paying tithes (Casellian, l. c.).

the four additional days cannot for some time have been observed, at any rate at all universally, for the Regula Magistri, a writing apparently of the 7th century, orders that from Sexagesima the monks should fast till the evening on Wednesdays, Fridays, and Saturdays, but that on other days up to Quadragesima they should take their meal at the ninth hour. Thus by the addition of these six days, the diminution caused in Lent by the taking out of the six Sundays was exactly counterbalanced (c. 28, Patrol. lxxxviii. 997). Clearly, therefore, this writer can in no way have viewed Lent as definitely beginning with Ash-Wednesday, and indeed the following day is not reckoned as part of the fast at all. On the other hand, the addition is certainly not to be fixed later than the time of Charlemagne, for (Martene, l. c.) the title "feria quarta in capite jejunii" occurs in MSS. of sacramentaries of and perhaps before his time. Similar evidence is furnished by the Rule of Sierac bishop of Metz, in the latter part of the 8th century (c. 30, Patrol. lxxxix. 1071), and apparently in the Penitential of Egbert, archbishop of York from A.D. 732 to 766 (l. i. 37, Patrol. lxxxix. 410).

Others have referred the addition to Gregory II. (ob. A.D. 731), but the matter seems quite doubtful. It may be remarked here in connexion with this latter prelate, that the Micrologus (c. 50, supra) states that it was he who first required the Thursdays throughout Lent to be kept as fasts, contrary to the ancient Roman usage. It is to Melchisedes that the appointment of Thursdays as exceptions to the law of fasting in Lent is referred. This, however, is very doubtful, when viewed in connexion with the words of Gregory the Great already quoted.

Considering the diversity which we have found to prevail as to the duration of Lent, it is curious to see how persistently the word τεσσαράκοντα is adhered to, a point which puzzled Socrates (l. c.) in the 5th century. Although the origin of this name is by no means clear, there are at any rate some reasonable grounds for connecting it with the period during which our Lord yielded to the power of death, which was estimated at forty hours [e.g. from noon on Friday till 4 A.M. on Sunday]; and we have seen that Tertullian twice refers to the fast as continuing for the days "in quibus ablatu est sponsum." We must also not lose sight of the forty days' fasts of Moses, Elijah, and our Lord, as being especially suggestive of the number of forty. It will have been noticed that when the duration of the fast was considerably lengthened, in the majority of cases the number of days of actual fasting was still approximately forty.

2. Object and purport of Lent.—We may inquire in the next place what was the primary idea in the institution of such a fast, and what other reasons were subserved in the maintenance of it. (A) From a passage of Tertullian already cited (de Jejunio, c. 13) it is clear that the fast primarily lasted for the time during which our Lord was under the power of death, to mark the mourning of the church when the bridegroom was taken away. Of this mourning then, Lent is the perpetual commemoration. It is interesting to note here that the Montanists who observed three Lents in the course of the year (Jerome, Epist. 41, ad Marcellum, § 3; vol. i. 189, ed. Vallarsi), and kept one of them after Pentecost (Jerome, Comm. in Matt. ix. 15; vol. vii. 51), still agreed with the Catholics in viewing it as the mourning for the absent bridegroom, in accordance with our Lord's declaration.

¶ It is clear that in some parts the additional four days cannot have been accepted for a long time, for Martene (p. 59) speaks of the end of the 11th century as the period when they were recognised in Scotland.

(B) This primary reason having been fixed, we need not dwell on that reason for its maintenance drawn from its use as a means of quickening zeal, and as an aid to devotion generally, since this is applicable to any fast and has no exclusive reference to Lent. This particular fast, however, served as a special preparation for several important events directly connected with Easter. Chief among these was the Easter communion, which, even in the earlier days of the church, when Christians ordinarily communicated every Sunday, must have had an exceptional prominence; much more in later times when this frequency of communion had greatly diminished, and we find for example canons of councils ordering that all Christians should communicate at least three times a year, of which Easter should be one. (See e.g. Concil. Aquitense [A.D. 506], can. 63, 64; Labbe, iv. 1393.) This idea is dwelt upon by Chrysostom (in eos qui primo pascha jejulant, § 4; vol. i. 746, ed. Gaume; also Hom. 1, § 4, vol. iv. 10), and by Jerome (Comm. in Jonam, lii. 4; vol. vi. 416).

(γ) Easter again was the special time for the administration of baptism, which was necessarily preceded by a solemn preparation and fasting. The importance of the Lent fast to those about to be baptized is dwelt upon by Cyril of Jerusalem (Catech. i. 5; p. 18, ed. Touttée). The names of those who sought baptism had to be given in some time before (ἀνοματογραφία, Pro-catech. c. 1, p. 2; cf. c. 4, p. 4). A council of Carthage or Laus that this shall be done a long time (diu) before the baptism (Conc. Carth. iv. [A.D. 398] can. 85; Labbe, ii. 1206), but a canon of Siricius, bishop of Rome (ob. A.D. 399) defines the time as not less than forty days (Ep. i. ad Himerium, c. 2; Labbe, ii. 1018).

(δ) Lent was also a special time of preparation for penitents who looked forward to readmission for the following Easter. (See Cyprilian, Epist. 56, § 3; Ambrose, Epist. 20 ad Marcellinum sororem, c. 26; Patrol. xvi. 1044; Jerome, Comm. in Jonam, l.c.; Greg. Nyss. Epist. Cusan. ad Letianum, Patrol. Gr. xiv. 222; Petr. Alexandr. can. 1, Labbe, i. 955; Concil. Anciranum [A.D. 314], can. 6, p. 1437.)

3. Manner of observance of Lent.—The special characteristics of Lent consisted in various forms of abstinence from food, the cessation of various ordinary forms of rejoicings, the merciful interference with legal pains and penalties, and the like.

(a) First of all must be noted the actual fast, which was generally a total abstinence from all food till the evening, except on Sundays, and in some cases on Saturdays. (Ambrose, de Elia et Jejunio, c. 10; Patrol. xiv. 743; Serm. 8 in Psal. 118; Patrol. xv. 1383; Basil, Hom. i. de Jejunio, c. 10; Patrol. Gr. xxxi. 181; Chrysostom,

Hom. iv. in Gen. c. 7, vol. iv. 36; Hom. vi. in Gen. c. 6, vol. iv. 58; Hom. viii. in Gen. c. 6, vol. iv. 76.)

As to the particular kinds of food made use of when the fast was broken for the day, there would appear to have been in early times the utmost latitude. This may be gathered, for example, from the passage of Socrates already quoted (Hist. Eccles. v. 22). "Now we may notice," he says, "that men differ not only with respect to the number of the days, but also in the character of the abstinence from food, which they practise. For some abstain altogether from animal food, while others partake of no animal food but fish only. Others again eat of birds as well as fishes, saying that according to Moses they also were produced from water. Others abstain also from fruits (ἀρσώδρα) and eggs, while some partake only of dry bread, and others not even of that. Another sort fast till the ninth hour, and then have their meal of various sorts of food" (διόφορον ἔχουσι τὴν ἰστίασιν).^a He then goes on to argue that since no rule of Scripture can be produced for this observance, therefore the apostles left the decision of the matter to every man's judgment. It will thus be seen that though the fast was to be kept throughout the day, there was as yet an absence of any restriction as to the character of the food taken in the evening; it being, of course, assumed that great moderation was shown, and that luxuries were avoided, in fact that the fast was not to be a technical matter of abstaining from this or that food, merely to enjoy a greater luxury of a different kind. The abstaining from flesh as any absolute and fundamental rule of the church was not yet insisted on, but still remained to some extent a matter of private judgment. An example, which illustrates a transitional state of things, is found in the incident related by Sozomen (Hist. Eccles. i. 11) of Spyridon, bishop of Trimythus in Cyprus. He, when once visited by a stranger at the beginning of Lent, offered him some swine's flesh, which was the only food he had in the house. The latter refused to partake of it, saying that he was a Christian. "All the more therefore," said the bishop, "should it not be refused, for that all things are pure to the pure is declared by the word of God." Bingham (Orig. xxi. 1. 17), who cites the above instance, has strangely omitted to add that before acting thus, the bishop besought the Divine indulgence (εὐξάμενος καὶ συγγνώμην αἰτήσας), as though he were straining a point in doing, as he did, though, on the other hand, such straining had not yet become a violation of a universally recognised law. We find a somewhat parallel illustration in Eusebius (Hist. Eccl. v. 3), where a certain Christian prisoner named Alcibiades, who had lived on bread and water all his life, received a divine monition through Attalus, one of his fellow prisoners, that he did not well in thus refusing the good gifts of God.

On the other hand, we continually find protests being made against the conduct of those who, so long as the technical rules were observed, thought themselves at liberty to indulge in every luxury, instead of devoting the money saved by the fast

^a The Greek here seems rather curious. Valesius conjectured that we should read διόφορον, sine discrimine ciborum.

c. 7, vol. iv, 36; Hom. vi. in Gen. v. 58; Hom. viii. in Gen. c. 6, ular kinds of food made use of was broken for the day, there have been in early times the

This may be gathered, for the passage of Socrates already (vol. v. 22). "Now we may think that men differ not only with respect of the days, but also in the abstinence from food, which some abstain altogether from while others partake of no animal food."

Others again eat of birds as well as of beasts, and of things that according to Moses are produced from water. Others eat of fruits (ἀκρῶθρα) and eggs, and of such things as are not forbidden that. Another sort fast till the evening and then have their meal of bread and wine.

Others again eat of birds as well as of beasts, and of things that according to Moses are produced from water. Others eat of fruits (ἀκρῶθρα) and eggs, and of such things as are not forbidden that. Another sort fast till the evening and then have their meal of bread and wine.

Others again eat of birds as well as of beasts, and of things that according to Moses are produced from water. Others eat of fruits (ἀκρῶθρα) and eggs, and of such things as are not forbidden that. Another sort fast till the evening and then have their meal of bread and wine.

Others again eat of birds as well as of beasts, and of things that according to Moses are produced from water. Others eat of fruits (ἀκρῶθρα) and eggs, and of such things as are not forbidden that. Another sort fast till the evening and then have their meal of bread and wine.

Others again eat of birds as well as of beasts, and of things that according to Moses are produced from water. Others eat of fruits (ἀκρῶθρα) and eggs, and of such things as are not forbidden that. Another sort fast till the evening and then have their meal of bread and wine.

Others again eat of birds as well as of beasts, and of things that according to Moses are produced from water. Others eat of fruits (ἀκρῶθρα) and eggs, and of such things as are not forbidden that. Another sort fast till the evening and then have their meal of bread and wine.

Others again eat of birds as well as of beasts, and of things that according to Moses are produced from water. Others eat of fruits (ἀκρῶθρα) and eggs, and of such things as are not forbidden that. Another sort fast till the evening and then have their meal of bread and wine.

Others again eat of birds as well as of beasts, and of things that according to Moses are produced from water. Others eat of fruits (ἀκρῶθρα) and eggs, and of such things as are not forbidden that. Another sort fast till the evening and then have their meal of bread and wine.

Others again eat of birds as well as of beasts, and of things that according to Moses are produced from water. Others eat of fruits (ἀκρῶθρα) and eggs, and of such things as are not forbidden that. Another sort fast till the evening and then have their meal of bread and wine.

Others again eat of birds as well as of beasts, and of things that according to Moses are produced from water. Others eat of fruits (ἀκρῶθρα) and eggs, and of such things as are not forbidden that. Another sort fast till the evening and then have their meal of bread and wine.

Others again eat of birds as well as of beasts, and of things that according to Moses are produced from water. Others eat of fruits (ἀκρῶθρα) and eggs, and of such things as are not forbidden that. Another sort fast till the evening and then have their meal of bread and wine.

Others again eat of birds as well as of beasts, and of things that according to Moses are produced from water. Others eat of fruits (ἀκρῶθρα) and eggs, and of such things as are not forbidden that. Another sort fast till the evening and then have their meal of bread and wine.

Others again eat of birds as well as of beasts, and of things that according to Moses are produced from water. Others eat of fruits (ἀκρῶθρα) and eggs, and of such things as are not forbidden that. Another sort fast till the evening and then have their meal of bread and wine.

to the relief of the poor. (Augustine, Serm. 205, § 2, vol. v. 1337, ed. Gaume; Serm. 207, § 2, ib. 1341; Serm. 210, § 10, ib. 1353; Leo, Serm. 3, de Jejunio Pentecostes, vol. 1. 319, ed. Bullerini.)

The same kind of reaction of feeling manifested itself in the indulging in special enjoyments in the days before the fast, and of this the carnival may serve as an illustration.

It is not, however, to be supposed from all this, that there is an absence of positive enactments on the subject.† Thus one of the so-called apostolical canons orders that all clerics shall fast in Lent under penalty of deposition, unless they can plead bodily infirmity; a layman to be excommunicated (can. 69).

The fourth council of Orleans (A.D. 541) also enjoins the observance of Lent, adding a rule that the Saturdays are to be included in the fast. (Concil. Auct. iv. can. 2; Labbe, v. 382; cf. Concil. Toletanum viii. [A.D. 653], can. 9; Labbe, vi. 407.) It may be noted that Aurelian, bishop of Arles (app. A.D. 545) in laying down the rule for monks, orders that the fast shall be observed every day from Epiphany to Easter, save upon Saturdays and Sundays and greater festivals (Patrol. lxxviii. 396).

It was evidently considered that there should be a stricter rule for such than for Christians generally. The last part of the order refers to an increased severity of the fast during the last week; see e. g. Epiphanius, Epist. Filii c. 22; vol. i. 1105, ed. Petrus. On this part of the subject reference may be made to the special article. [HOLY WEEK.]

(B) A second point which characterised the season was the forbidding of all things which were of a festal character. Thus the Council of Laodicea (circa A.D. 365) ordered that the oblation of bread and wine in the Eucharist should be confined to Saturdays and Sundays during Lent (can. 49, Labbe, i. 1505). A later council, that in Trullo (A.D. 692) ordains that on days other than the above two and the day of the Annunciation, there may be a communion of the presanctified elements (can. 52; Labbe, vi. 1165).

Again, the Council of Laodicea forbids the celebration of festivals of martyrs in Lent, except the following canon forbids the celebration of marriages and of birthday festivals in Lent, without any reservation. This last, however, perhaps only gradually came to be observed, for in the collection of Eastern canons by Martin, bishop of Braga in Spain, he cites no other canon for this use but that of the Council of Laodicea. Cf. also as to this point Augustine, Serm. 205, § 2 (vol. v. 1336); Egbert, Pendientia, l. 21 (Patrol. lxxix. 406); Theodulfus of Orleans, Capitul. 43 (Patrol. cv. 205); Nicolaus I. Resp. ad consult. Bulg. c. 48; (Patrol. cxix. 1000).

A fortiori all public games, theatrical shows, and the like, were forbidden at this season.

† Thus Augustine (Serm. 210, l. c.), "ut pretiosas cibos quaerat, quis carne non vescatur, et inuestatos liquoros, quis vitum non bibit."

‡ On this point, see J. C. Zeumer, Bacchanalia Christianorum, subop. das Carneal, Jena, 1899.

§ The subject of dispensations relaxing the strictness of rules as to diet in Lent falls outside our present limits. We may perhaps just call attention to the word Lactancia (cf. French Laitage), often occurring in such documents for a mainly milk diet, as a curious parallel to the τοπιμαίος of the Greeks.

Gregory of Nazianzum reproves one Celestus, a judge, who had authorised spectacles during the fast (Epi-t. 112; vol. ii. 101, ed. Bened.). Chrysostom, in a homily delivered in Lent, asks his hearers what profit they have gained from his sermons, when through the investigations of the devil they all have "rushed off to that vain show (καυμά) of Satan, the horse-race" (Hom. vi. in Gen. c. 1; vol. iv. 48); and again he speaks of the great injury men who follow such practices do to themselves, and the scandal they are to others" (Hom. vii. in Gen. c. 1; vol. iv. 59).

(C) The severity of the laws was relaxed during Lent. Thus the Theodosian Code in a law promulgated in A.D. 380 prohibits all hearing of criminal cases during that season (Cod. Theod. s. lib. ix. tit. 35, leg. 4; vol. iii. 252, ed. Gothofredus). Another law, published in A.D. 389, forbids the infliction of punishments of the body "sacris Quadragesimae diebus" (op. cit. 253).

As a parallel case, probably referring to the Lent season, we may allude to what is said by Ambrose, in his funeral eulogy of the younger Valentinian, where he praises him in that when some noblemen were about to be tried in a criminal case, and the prefect pressed the matter, the emperor forbade a sentence of death during a holy season (de Obitu Valentinii, Consolatio, c. 18; Patrol. xvi. 1424). See also Nicolaus I. (op. cit. c. 45, col. 998), Theodulfus of Orleans (op. cit. c. 42, col. 205).

A rarely occurring exception only serves to bring out more sharply the general observance of the rule, and thus it may be noted that the younger Theodosius orders (A.D. 408) that in the case of the Isaurian robbers, the examinations by torture should be held even in Lent or at Easter (Cod. Theod. lib. ix. tit. 35, l. 7; p. 255, ed. cit.), on the ground that the suffering of the few was expedient for the benefit of the many.

Not only the criminal, but also the civil code was relaxed, for Ambrose speaks of the sacred season of the week before Easter when "solent debitorum laxari vincula" (Epist. 20, c. 6; Patrol. xvi. 1038).

(D) Besides all these negative characteristics, we find also the endeavour to maintain a higher spirit of devotion, by an increased number of religious services. Thus in many cases, it would appear, sermons were delivered to the people daily throughout Lent, and Chrysostom's Homilies on Genesis, to which we have already often referred, and those his rois ὑποβίβλας were of this kind. (See esp. Hom. xi. in Gen. c. 3; vol. iv. 102). We may also cite here Theodulfus of

Orleans, who had authorised spectacles during the fast (Epi-t. 112; vol. ii. 101, ed. Bened.). Chrysostom, in a homily delivered in Lent, asks his hearers what profit they have gained from his sermons, when through the investigations of the devil they all have "rushed off to that vain show (καυμά) of Satan, the horse-race" (Hom. vi. in Gen. c. 1; vol. iv. 48); and again he speaks of the great injury men who follow such practices do to themselves, and the scandal they are to others" (Hom. vii. in Gen. c. 1; vol. iv. 59).

(C) The severity of the laws was relaxed during Lent. Thus the Theodosian Code in a law promulgated in A.D. 380 prohibits all hearing of criminal cases during that season (Cod. Theod. s. lib. ix. tit. 35, leg. 4; vol. iii. 252, ed. Gothofredus). Another law, published in A.D. 389, forbids the infliction of punishments of the body "sacris Quadragesimae diebus" (op. cit. 253).

As a parallel case, probably referring to the Lent season, we may allude to what is said by Ambrose, in his funeral eulogy of the younger Valentinian, where he praises him in that when some noblemen were about to be tried in a criminal case, and the prefect pressed the matter, the emperor forbade a sentence of death during a holy season (de Obitu Valentinii, Consolatio, c. 18; Patrol. xvi. 1424). See also Nicolaus I. (op. cit. c. 45, col. 998), Theodulfus of Orleans (op. cit. c. 42, col. 205).

A rarely occurring exception only serves to bring out more sharply the general observance of the rule, and thus it may be noted that the younger Theodosius orders (A.D. 408) that in the case of the Isaurian robbers, the examinations by torture should be held even in Lent or at Easter (Cod. Theod. lib. ix. tit. 35, l. 7; p. 255, ed. cit.), on the ground that the suffering of the few was expedient for the benefit of the many.

Not only the criminal, but also the civil code was relaxed, for Ambrose speaks of the sacred season of the week before Easter when "solent debitorum laxari vincula" (Epist. 20, c. 6; Patrol. xvi. 1038).

(D) Besides all these negative characteristics, we find also the endeavour to maintain a higher spirit of devotion, by an increased number of religious services. Thus in many cases, it would appear, sermons were delivered to the people daily throughout Lent, and Chrysostom's Homilies on Genesis, to which we have already often referred, and those his rois ὑποβίβλας were of this kind. (See esp. Hom. xi. in Gen. c. 3; vol. iv. 102). We may also cite here Theodulfus of

Orleans, who had authorised spectacles during the fast (Epi-t. 112; vol. ii. 101, ed. Bened.). Chrysostom, in a homily delivered in Lent, asks his hearers what profit they have gained from his sermons, when through the investigations of the devil they all have "rushed off to that vain show (καυμά) of Satan, the horse-race" (Hom. vi. in Gen. c. 1; vol. iv. 48); and again he speaks of the great injury men who follow such practices do to themselves, and the scandal they are to others" (Hom. vii. in Gen. c. 1; vol. iv. 59).

(C) The severity of the laws was relaxed during Lent. Thus the Theodosian Code in a law promulgated in A.D. 380 prohibits all hearing of criminal cases during that season (Cod. Theod. s. lib. ix. tit. 35, leg. 4; vol. iii. 252, ed. Gothofredus). Another law, published in A.D. 389, forbids the infliction of punishments of the body "sacris Quadragesimae diebus" (op. cit. 253).

As a parallel case, probably referring to the Lent season, we may allude to what is said by Ambrose, in his funeral eulogy of the younger Valentinian, where he praises him in that when some noblemen were about to be tried in a criminal case, and the prefect pressed the matter, the emperor forbade a sentence of death during a holy season (de Obitu Valentinii, Consolatio, c. 18; Patrol. xvi. 1424). See also Nicolaus I. (op. cit. c. 45, col. 998), Theodulfus of Orleans (op. cit. c. 42, col. 205).

† Thus Augustine (Serm. 210, l. c.), "ut pretiosas cibos quaerat, quis carne non vescatur, et inuestatos liquoros, quis vitum non bibit."

‡ On this point, see J. C. Zeumer, Bacchanalia Christianorum, subop. das Carneal, Jena, 1899.

§ The subject of dispensations relaxing the strictness of rules as to diet in Lent falls outside our present limits. We may perhaps just call attention to the word Lactancia (cf. French Laitage), often occurring in such documents for a mainly milk diet, as a curious parallel to the τοπιμαίος of the Greeks.

* A curious extension of this idea is found in the Scarpapeus of abbat Pirmilinus (ob. A.D. 785), who among other things decrees the use of whiteles in Lent (Patrol. lxxxix. 1041). Again Nicolaus I. protests against the practice of hunting at that season (op. cit. c. 44, col. 997).

† We may note here that the council of Nicea (A.D. 325) appoints Lent as one of the two periods in the year for the sitting of a synod of the bishops of the province to revise the sentence of excommunication inflicted by any undue severity in the preceding season, as a check upon the number (can. 9, Labbe, ii. 32).

‡ For another special manifestation of the same idea, see the rule laid down by the third council of Braga, that the three days at the beginning of Lent should be devoted to special forms of prayer, with litanies and psalms, by

Orleans, in whose Capitulum (c. 41, supra) it is ordained that all, save excommunicate persons, shall communicate on every Sunday in Lent. (Cf. also Augustine, Serm. 141 in Append. c. 5, vol. v. 2715.)

4. Liturgical Notices.—The earliest Roman sacramentary, the Leonine, is unfortunately defective in the part where Lent would occur, and we therefore first notice the references in the Gelasian sacramentary (Patrol. lxxiv. 1064 sqq.). This, in the form in which we now have it, has prefixed to the services for Lent an ordo agentibus publicum poenitentium (c. 16), wherein it is ordained that the penitent be taken early on the morning of Ash Wednesday, clothed in sackcloth, and put in seclusion till Maundy Thursday, when he is reconciled. Then follow the forms for the week from Quinquagesima to the following Sunday, provision being made for the Wednesday, Friday, and Saturday, viewed as preliminary to, but as yet not forming part of, Lent. Thus in the Secreta of the first Sunday in Lent, we find "Sacrificium Domini, quadragessimis initiis solemniter immolamus. . . ." Services are given for all the Sundays in Lent, and for all the week-days except Thursday [save only in the case of Maundy Thursday]. In the Micrologus (l. c.), Melchisedech, bishop of Rome (ob. A.D. 314) is credited with the order that the Thursdays in Lent should not be observed as fasting days. As we have above remarked, the same authority speaks of Gregory II. as having been the first to require the Thursdays to be observed like the other days of Lent.

After the forms for the first week is given that for the first sabbath of the first month "in xii. lect. mense primo," which is followed by forms for ordination. The mass for the third Sunday bears the heading, "Quae pro scrutiniis electorum (i. e. for baptism) celebratur." In the Canon mention is to be made of the names of those who are to act as sponsors for those about to be baptized, and afterwards the names of these latter themselves. The fourth Sunday is headed, "pro scrutinio secundo," with the recitations of names as before, as also on the fifth Sunday. After this are given the various forms requisite for baptism, and the attendant rites, ad faciendum catechumenum, benedictio salis, exorcism, etc., with the setting forth of the creed (Greek and Latin), and the Lord's Prayer. It may be noted finally that Palm Sunday bears the further heading De Passione Domini, a title which in the Gregorian sacramentary is given to the previous Sunday. For details as to the week from thence to Easter (the real Passion-week, though this name, by an imitation of Roman usage, is often, with infinitely less point, applied to the preceding week), reference may be made to the special article [HOLY WEEK].

In the Gregorian Sacramentary, after forms for Septuagesima, Sexagesima and Quinquagesima, comes the mass for Ash Wednesday (col. 35, ed. Menard). It is headed Feria iv., Caput Jejunii, the latter words, however, are wanting in one of the best MSS., the Cd. Reg. Suec., a fact which has a bearing on the question as to Gregory the Great having been the first to add on the four days at the beginning of Lent, a view which we considered his own words already cited rendered very improbable. It may further be noted that while this sacramentary provides services for every day from Ash Wednesday to Easter, there is no trace of the word Quadragesima till the first Sunday, the previous Saturday, e. g. being Sabbatum intra Quinquagesimam.

In the Ambrosian Liturgy, the service for Quinquagesima is immediately followed by that for "Dominica in capite Quadragesimae" (Pamellus, Liturgy. Lat. l. 324). The services for the week days in this liturgy are the same as in the Gregorian. The Sundays after the first bear the following names, from the subjects of the Gospels, (2) Dominica de Samaritana, (3) de Abraham, (4) de Civeo, (5) de Lazaro, [to the Saturday in this week is the heading in traditione Symboli, that is, for the approaching baptism], (6) in Ramis olivarum.

The ancient Gallienic lectionary and missal, edited by Mabillon, make no mention of Septuagesima, Sexagesima, and Quinquagesima, or of Ash Wednesday. The former gives for the Prophetic Lection and Epistle for the "Initium Quadragesimae" (sic) i. e. the first Sunday in Lent, Isaiah lviil. 1-14, 2 Cor. vi. 2-15. (Mabillon, de Liturgia Gallicana, lib. ii. p. 124.) The Gospel is unknown, as well as all the lections for the succeeding days till Palm Sunday, eight leaves of the MS. being wanting. The numbers, however, prefixed to the sets of lections shew that the missing ones correspond exactly with the number of Sundays in Lent, with nothing for any week day. For Palm Sunday the Prophetic Lection, Epistle and Gospel, are respectively Jeremiah xxxi. . . . 34 [the beginning is unknown, owing to the gap in the MS.], Heb. ii. 3-34, John xii. 1-24.

In the Gothico-Gallic missal are seven masses in all for the season of Lent, the first being headed "in initium Quadragesimae" (op. cit. p. 228), followed by four headed "Missa jejunii," and these by one "Missa in Quad." The seventh is a "Missa in Symboli traditione" (cf. op. cit. infra, p. 338 sqq.). Probably the two last masses are both for Palm Sunday; and these are followed by one for Maundy Thursday. As regards the mass "in Symboli traditione" it will have been observed that the Ambrosian liturgy orders the creed to be communicated to the catechumens on the previous Saturday. Palm Sunday was the time ordinarily chosen in Spain and Gaul (cf. Isidore, de Eccles. Off. i. 37. 4; Patrol. lxxxiii. 772; also Concil. Agath. [A.D. 506], can. 13; Labbe, iv. 1385), where eight days is fixed as the period before baptism when the creed is to be imparted. Leslie (op. cit. 283) speaks of the above name as given to the fourth Sunday in Lent, but only cites a canon of the third council of Braga, which fixes the interval as twenty days (Concil. Brac. iii. [A.D. 572], can. 1; Labbe, v. 896). According to Isidore (l. c.), Palm Sunday was called capitulivum, because the children's heads were then washed with a view to the approaching Easter baptism.

In the Mozarabic liturgy, as we now have it, Sundays are reckoned up to the eighth after the octave of the Epiphany, followed by the "Dominica nata diem Cineris," and this by "feria iv. in Capite jejunii." It is clear, how-ecclesiastics assembling together from the neighbouring churches, and "per auctoritatem Basilicas amulantes" (Concil. Bracar. lit. [A.D. 572], can. 9, Labbe, v. 893.)

of Lent, a view which we have already cited rendered. It may further be noted that the liturgical provisions for Ash Wednesday to Easter, there is no Quadragesima till the previous Saturday, e. g., being Quinquagesima.

In the Roman Liturgy, the service for the first Sunday is immediately followed by that for the second, "in capite Quadragesimae" (Patrol. Lat. i. 324). The services for the first and second Sundays are the same as for the first and second Sundays after the first Sunday, from the subjects of the Quadragesima, (1) De Dominica de Samaritanis, (2) De Caeco, (3) De Lazaro, [to the week is the heading in traditione for the approaching baptism], De Lazaro.

In the Gallican lectionary and missal, the first Sunday, make no mention of Septuagesima, and Quinquagesima, or of the former gives for the first and second Sundays the "Initium" (sic) i. e., the first Sunday in 1-14, 2 Cor. vi. 2-15. (Mabil. Gallieana, lib. ii. p. 124.) The same, as well as all the lections for the first and second Sundays till Palm Sunday, eight being wanting. The numbers, 1-14, 2 Cor. vi. 2-15, shew that the first and second Sundays correspond exactly with the first and second Sundays in Lent, with nothing for Palm Sunday the Prophetic and Gospel, are respectively 1-14 [the beginning is unknown, as in the MS.], Heb. ii. 3-34,

In the Gallic missal are seven masses for the first Sunday of Lent, the first being Quadragesimae (op. cit. p. 4), four headed "Missa jejuni," Missa in Quad. The seventh and eighth traditions" (cf. op. cit. p. 4). Probably the two last for Palm Sunday; and these for Maundy Thursday. As in Symbulii traditione it is observed that the Ambrosian creed is to be commemorated as on the previous Saturday. The time ordinarily chosen for the first Sunday is the 13th (cf. Isidore, de Eccles. Off. i. xliii. 772; also Council. Agath. 3; Labbe, iv. 1385), where the first Sunday is the period before baptism is to be imparted. Leslie (op. cit. p. 10) gives the above name as given to the first Sunday in Lent, but only cites a council of Braga, which fixes the first Sunday as the first Sunday of Lent, according to Labbe, v. 896). According to the Gallican Sunday was called capite Quadragesimae children's heads were then washed to the approaching Easter liturgy, as we now have observed up to the eighth after Epiphany, followed by the Quadragesima, and this by the Quinquagesima. It is clear, however, that in Spain, Lent originally began on the Sunday after Quinquagesima, which left thirty-six fasting days (cf. Isidore, l. c.; Council. Tolet. viii. can. 9, supra), and thus there is no form for Ash Wednesday in the Hispano-Gothic use. The Mozarabic missal, therefore, has borrowed from the Toledo missal the office for the benediction of the ashes; and the Gospel and prayers correspond with those for the first Sunday in Lent in the Hispano-Gothic use, and the Prophetic Lection and Epistle with those for the following Wednesday. Altogether the services in the Mozarabic liturgy are much out of order (Leslie, Not. in Liturg. Mozarab.; Patrol. lxxxv. 287). As a further consequence of the putting on of Ash Wednesday and three following days, whereas in the Hispano-Gothic use the title Dominica in cinere carnes tollendas belongs to the first Sunday in Lent, in the Mozarabic it refers to Quinquagesima.

This latter has forms for Sundays, Wednesdays, and Fridays throughout Lent, and also for Maundy Thursday and Easter Eve. Under Ash Wednesday is given the form for the benediction of the ashes. In this rite (which, it may be remarked in passing, is one of those noted by Gillebert, bishop of Limerick [ob. after A.D. 1139], which may only be performed by a priest in the absence of the bishop, see Bénédictions, p. 165), the priest or bishop (sacerdos), after blessing the ashes, sprinkles them with holy water, and they are then received from his hand by the clerics and laymen present. As each takes of them he is addressed in the words, "Memento, homo, quia cinis es, et in cinerem revertaris, age poenitentiam, et prima opera fac." The Prophetic Lection, Epistle and Gospel for this day are Wisdom i. 23-33; James i. 13-21; Matt. iv. 1-12.

A common name in Spain for the first Sunday in Lent was Dominica in Alleluia, because of the markedly festal way in which the day was observed, and from the special singing of Alleluia on that day. We may take this opportunity of remarking that the ancient Spanish use was to close on this day the doors of the baptistery, which were sealed with the bishop's seal, till Maundy Thursday. The seventeenth Council of Toledo [A.D. 694] dwells on this rule (cap. 2; Labbe, vi. 1364; cf. Hildesonus Toletanus [ob. A.D. 699] Adnot. de cognitione baptismi, c. 107; Patrol. xvi. 156). A notice of the same custom as prevailing in the Alexandrian church is found in the ancient lectionary published by Zaenagius (Collectanea Monumentorum Veterum, p. 718).

The following are the Old Testament Lections, Epistles and Gospels given in the Mozarabic liturgy for the Sundays in Lent; those for the Wednesdays and Fridays we have not thought it necessary to add. (i.) Isaiah lv. 2-13 (but formerly 1 [3] Kings xix. 3-14, Leslie, op. cit. 296); 2 Cor. v. 20-vi. 11; John iv. 3-43. (ii.) Prov. xiv. 33-xv. 8; Gen. xli. 1-46; James ii. 14-23; John ix. 1-36. (iii.) Prov. xx. 7-28; Num. xii. 2-xxiii. 11; 1 Peter i. 1-12; John vi. 56-71. (iv.) "mediante die festo" [a name due not only to the fact that on this day was the middle point of Lent according to the Hispano-Gothic use, but also because of the occurrence of the words "Jam autem die festo mediante ascendit Jesus in templum" in the Gospel for this day; Leslie, op. cit. 353] Ecclesi. xiv. 11-22;

1 Sam. i. 1-21; 2 Pet. i. 1-12; John vii. 1-15. (v.) Ecclesi. xlvii. 24-30, 21-31; 1 Sam. xxvi. 1-25; 1 John i. 1-8; John x. 1-17. (vi.) "Dominica in ramis Palmarum, ad benedictionem flores vel ramos." [For this rite see HOLY WEEK; also Leslie, op. cit. 380.] Ecclesi. xlii. 2-18; Deut. xl. 18-32; Gal. i. 3-13; John xli. 58-xli. 14.

In the Greek church there is a special service book, called the Triodion, for the period extending from what would be with us the last of the Sundays after the Epiphany (called with them the Sunday of the Pharisee and Publican, from the Gospel for the day) to Easter Eve. Septuagesima, Sexagesima, and Quinquagesima, are respectively the Sundays of the Prodigal (from the Gospel for the day), ἡγία ἀνοκτώ (because from Sexagesima onwards flesh was not eaten; cf. οὐ μὴ φάγω κρέα 1 Cor. viii. 13, which enters into the Epistle for the day), and ἡγία τυροφάγω (from the nature of the diet taken in the ensuing week). The Lent of the Greek church is begun on the day after Quinquagesima, no special regard being paid to Ash Wednesday. The Armenian church, however, begins on the Monday before Quinquagesima; the fast of the Monday week being known as the Artsiburion, a word of very doubtful origin (Noble, Eastern Church, Introduct. p. 742). The Epistles and Gospels used in the Greek church for the six Sundays of Lent are as follows: (i.) κωνιακή τῆς ὁρθοδοξίας (in memory especially of the final overthrow of the Iconoclasts), Heb. xi. 24-26, 32-40; John i. 44-52. (ii.) Heb. ii. 10-ii. 3; Mark ii. 1-12. (iii.) κωνιακή σταυροῦ παυλοῦ ἁγίου, or simply σταυροῦ παυλοῦ [See CROSS, ADORATION OF, i. 501]. Heb. iv. 14-v. 6; Mark viii. 34-ix. 1. (iv.) Heb. vi. 13-20; Mark ix. 17-31. (v.) Heb. ix. 11-14; Mark x. 32-45. (vi.) Phil. iv. 4-9, Gospel for Matins, Matt. xxi. 1-11, 15-17, for Liturgy, John xii. 1-18.

5. Literature.—For the foregoing matter, I am much indebted to Bingham, Origines, bk. xxi. ch. i.; Binterim, Denkwürdigkeiten der Christ-Katholischen Kirche, vol. ii. part 2, pp. 592 sqq.; vol. v. part i. pp. 169 sqq. Augusti, Denkwürdigkeiten aus der Christlichen Archäologie, vol. x. pp. 393 sqq.; Ducange, Glossarium, s. v. Quadragesima; Martene, de Antiquis Ecclesie Ritibus, vol. iii. cc. 18, 19. Reference may also be made to Filesacus, Diatriba de Quadragesima Christianorum, in his Opuscula, Parisiis, 1614; Dassel, de Jure Temporis Quadragesimalis, Argentorati, 1617; Duillé, de Jejunio et Quadragesima, Daventrie, 1654; Homberg, de Quadragesima veterum Christianorum, Helmstadt, 1677; Lienke, Die Quadragesimalfasten der Kirche, München, 1853.

[R. S.]

LEO I. (1) the Great, pope A.D. 440-461, is named first of all confessors in the Breton Litany (Haddan and Stubbs, ii. 82), second only to Silvester in that at the mass for an emperor in Sac. Gregor. (Muratori, 463), Nov. 10, and commemorated that day (Mart. Hier. Raban), but April 11, (Bede, Raban, Notker), "Cujus temporibus synodus Chalcidensis constituta" is added on that day first by Usuard. Commemorated in the Greek church, Feb. 18. April 11 is probably the day of his translation to a more conspicuous tomb in the basilica of St. Peter, by Sergius (A.D. 687-701). He had an oratory in the days of pope Paul below the basilica of St. Peter without the walls (Anast. 85-95).

LEO (2) Pope A.D. 683, June 28 (Anastasius, the Capitulary published by Fronto, Mart. Rom. Bede, Ado, Usuard). Sollerius would make out that this was originally a festival of Leo I. But it is not certain that all the celebrations in the sacramentary of Gregory really date from Gregory's time. (For the collects there given v. Muratori, p. 100, or Migne; v. Rossi, i. 127.)

(3) Bishop of Catania, Feb. 20 (Cal. Byz.)

(4) Martyr, March 1 (Mart. Hieron.)

(5) Bishop of Sens, Apr. 22 (Mart. Hieron.)

(6) Confessor at Troyes, May 25 (Usuard.)

(7) Or Leontius, (Mart. Gellon.) martyr, Oct. 2 (Mart. Hieron.)

(8) Subdeacon, martyr at Rome, June 30 (Mart. Hieron. Usuard.)

(9) Martyr, drowned by the mob at Patara in Lycia, under Lollianus, on February 18 (Cal. Byz. v. Tillem. v. 381); not in the Menology of Basil. He seems to have been confounded with Leo I. His acts, however, assign his death to June 30, an attempted identification with (8).

[E. B. B.]

LEOBARDUS, monk of Tours, † Jan. 18, A.D. 583. (Acta SS. Jan. ii. 582.) [E. B. B.]

LEOBINUS, bishop of Chartres, † A.D. 557; commemorated Sept. 15. (Bede, Raban, Wandelbert, Usuard.) [E. B. B.]

LEOCADIA, virgin, of Toledo, commemorated Dec. 9 (Cal. Hispano-Goth. ; Mart. Rom. Puvrum). Ado adds that she died in prison on hearing of the tortures of Eulalia. She had three churches in Toledo: one on the site of her martyrdom, in which the Gothic kings were buried; a parish church at the spot where she was born; and a cathedral over her tomb, in which the councils of Toledo were held. On the Saracen invasion, about A.D. 724, her relics were carried into Hainault. (De Vitis Sanctorum, Cologne 1605. Soller's Usuard.) [E. B. B.]

LEODEGARIUS, LEUDEGARIUS, LAUDEGARIUS (Sr. LEGER), bishop of Autun, killed by Ebroic, mayor of the palace, A.D. 678, and commemorated Oct. 2, with a special service in the Gothic missal, as a martyr: "O beatum virum Laudegarium antistitem qui corpus ueribus absolutum, ora labii minuatum oculisque orbatum, exilium perpetratum, lubricitatis sacculi postpositum, diversis tormentis passum, exemplum episcopis reliquit, . . . coronam immarcebilibus floribus remuneratur unde multae post reliquiae in Gallis flourerunt." The grammar is not perfect, nor is it clear what is meant by the relics of his heavenly crown blooming in Gaul. He is not named in the metrical martyrology of Bede. The place of his martyrdom is still St. Leger's wood. He was buried at Sercin. Afterwards the oishops of Autun, Arras, and Poitiers, contended for the possession of his body. They drew lots, and it fell to the latter, and was translated to the monastery of Maxentius at Poitiers, March 16, where a church had been dedicated to him the 30th October preceding. (Acta SS. Oct. i. 427, 428.) Monasteries were dedicated to him at Morbach in Alsace, and

Massevaux or Masminster on the Upper Rhine, about A.D. 726. (Ib. p. 434.)

LEODEGARIUS (2) Priest in Le Pertois, 6th century, † June 23. (Acta SS. Jun. v. 414.) [E. B. B.]

LEODOWINUS, archbishop of Treves (7th century), † Sept. 29. (Acta SS. Sept. viii. 160.) [E. B. B.]

LEOGISILUS, LENOGISILUS, or LONEGISILUS, presbyter at Le Mans (7th century), † Jan. 13. (Acta SS. Jan. ii. 112.) [E. B. B.]

LEOLINUS, bishop of Padua (4th century), † June 28. (Acta SS. June, v. 483.) [E. B. B.]

LEOMENES, Pontius, of Epineium in Crete, under Decius, martyred Dec. 23. (Cal. Byz.) [E. B. B.]

LEONADIUS (1) commemorated in Ethiopia, Dec. 27; called by the Copts Leontius the patriarch, and commemorated by them on the 28th. (Ludolf, Comm. ad Hist. Ethiop. p. 403.)

(2) Commemorated in Ethiopia along with Benikarus, on Jan. 7. (Ib. 404.) [E. B. B.]

LEONARD, (1) A noble disciple of St. Remigius, founder of the monastery of Noblat (St. Leonard), near Limoges; commemorated Nov. 6. He is now honoured in the Greek church also on that day (Arcudius, Anthologion.)

(2) A monk of Le Mans, who refused to be prior, † Oct. 15, A.D. 570. His relics translated to Corbigny A.D. 877. (Acta SS. Oct. vii. 45.) The two following are found in the additions to Usuard.

(3) Confessor at Vendoeuvre, Nov. 27.

(4) Confessor at Châteaudun, Dec. 8.

[E. B. B.]

LEONIANUS, abbat of Vienne, † Nov. 18, circa A.D. 510. [E. B. B.]

LEONIDES (1) Bishop of Athens, commemorated April 15. (Cal. Byz.)

οσιος συνιχη τας Αθηναις δεδωον δυναμιος αυτης ηλιου Λεωνιδου.

Ha is perhaps intended by the mention of the name on April 16 in the Hieronymian Martyrology.

(2) Father of Origen, and martyr circa A.D. 204. On June 28, the name is joined with Potamiaena and the other disciples of Origen, and thus attached as a companion to Ireaena the same day. (Mart. Hieron.; Acta SS. June vii. 321.) Supposed to be the one mentioned with Arator, Quiriacus, and Basilus, April 22 in the Mart. Hieron. and Acta SS. April, iii. 10.

(3) Martyr at Antioch, April 26. (Mart. Hieron.)

(4) Burnt to death with Eleutherius, Aug. 8. The Mart. Hieron. names Leonides only, and assigns him to Philadelphia. Some menologies add, "and the babes," and say that their synaxis was performed "in the house of St. Irene, in the buildings of Justinian outside the gate." (Acta SS. Aug. ii. 342.)

(5) The name is mentioned March 1 or Jan. 28, as a martyr at Antinous in the Thebais, under Decius. (Acta SS. Jan. ii. 448.) [E. B. B.]

LEONILLA, martyred with her three twin grandchildren, under M. Aurelius or Aurelian, antstener on the Upper Rhine, b. p. 434.)

(S 2) Priest in Le Pertois, 23. (Acta SS. Jun. v. 414.) [E. B. B.]

archbishop of Treves (7th c. (Acta SS. Sept. viii. 169.) [E. B. B.]

LENOGISELUS, or LONEGISE- Mans (7th century), † Jan. ii. 112.) [E. B. B.] shop of Padua (4th century), 3. June, v. 483.) [E. B. B.]

antius, of Epineium in Crete, red Dec. 23. (Cal. Hys.) [E. B. B.]

commemorated in Ethiopia, he Copts Leontius the patri- arch by them on the 28th. (Hist. Ethiop. p. 403.)
l in Ethiopia along with (Id. 404.) [E. B. B.]

A noble disciple of St. Re- ne monastery of Noblat (St. es; commemorated Nov. 6. in the Greek church also on Anthologion).

Mans, who refused to be 570. His relics translated. (Acta SS. Oct. vii. 45.)
a found in the additions to endeuvre, Nov. 27.

ateaudun, Dec. 8. [E. B. B.]
bat of Vienne, † Nov. 16, [E. B. B.]

bishop of Athens, commemo- (Byz.)

τῶν Ἀθηνῶν ἀρχιεπί- σκωπος Ἀθανάσιος.

ed by the mention of the the Hieronymian Martyroen, and martyr circa A.D. the name is joined with other disciples of Origen, a companion to Irenaeus t. Hieron.; Acta SS. Juna to be the one mentioned is, and Basilus, April 22 nd Acta SS. April, iii. 10. ioch, April 26. (Mart.

with Eleutherius, Aug. 8. ames Leonides only, and elphia. Some menologies and say that their synaxis house of St. Irene, in the outside the gate." (Acta mentioned March 1 or Jan. nous in the Thebas, under . iii. 448.) [E. B. B.]

tyred with her three twin M. Aurelius or Aurelian, in Cappadocia, and translated to Langres in Gaul (Acta SS. Jan. ii. 437); commemorated Jan. 17 (Cal. Byz., Mart. Hieron., Bede, Ado, Usuard, but not in the Parvum Romanum). The Greeks call her Neonilla. (Men. Basil.) [E. B. B.]

LEONIS

LEONIS, martyr at Augsburg, or more probably at Rome (Acta SS. Aug. ii. 703 A), Aug. 12. [E. B. B.]

LEONIUS (1) Confessor, of Melun (St. Liene); commemorated Nov. 12 (Usuard, Wandelbert). Baronius refers him to Nov. 16, but this is a confusion with Leo (Sollier).
(2) Of Poitou, if not the same, Feb. 1. (Acta SS. Feb. i. 91.) [E. B. B.]

LEONORIUS, bishop in Brittany in the 6th century, † July 1. (Acta SS. July, i. 121.) [E. B. B.]

LEONTIUS (1) and his brothers, fellow-martyrs of Cosmas—Oct. 17 (Cal. Byz.); Sept. 27 (Mart. Rom. Parv. etc.).
(2) Martyr at Tripoli in Syria, under Vespasian, June 18. (Menol. Bas.)
(3) Bishop of Autun (5th century), † July 1. (Mart. Hieron.)
(4) Martyr at Nicopolis of Armenia, under Licinius, July 10 (Menol. Bas.). In the Mart. Hieron. Alexandria stands for Armenia [contracted aria]. He is assigned to the right place next day.
(5) Martyr under Diocletian at Perga in Pamphylia, August 1. (Menol. Basil.)
(6) Martyr at Amasea in Pontus, August 19. (Mart. Hieron.)
(7) In Lucania with Valentia, August 20. (Mart. Hieron.)
(8) The entry is repeated next day, but the name is said here to belong to a bishop of Bordeaux of the 6th century. (Acta SS. Aug. iv. 442.)
(9) Martyr with Carpophorus at Vicenza, cf. Peter de Natalibus, l. 7, c. 87, either Aug. 20 (A. S. S. iv. 35) or March 19 (Acta SS. March, iii. 29).
(10) Martyr at Alexandria with Serapion, Sept. 15. (Mart. Hieron.)
(11) in Cappadocia, Nov. 22 (ib.). Bishop † A. D. 337. (Acta SS. Jan. ii. 63.)
(12) Martyr in the days of the Mussulmans in Ethiopia, May 26. (Ludolf, Comm. p. 416.) [E. B. B.]

LEOPARDUS, martyr at Rome; honoured at Aix-la-Chapelle from the time of Charlemagne, Sept. 30. (Acta SS. Sept. viii. 430.) [E. B. B.]

LEOTHADIUS, bishop of Auch, † Oct. 23, A.D. 717? (Acta SS. Oct. x. 122.) [E. B. B.]

LEPERS, LEPROSI. There are few notices of the treatment of lepers in the early church. It is probable the disease did not assume such dimensions as to call for special enactments. Ugolini, under the heading De Morbis Biblicis, has collected (Thesaurus, vol. xxx. 1544) several reasons why leprosy was less prevalent in the Christian than in the Jewish church. The council of Ancyra (A.D. 314) has a canon (c. 17) directed against τὸν ἀλογουσαμένους καὶ λεπρωθὲς βύτας ἤτοι λεπρωσάντας; which may refer either to actual lepers, or may signify that those who polluted themselves with unanatural crimes contracted a moral leprosy. The council orders that their station shall be among the γαμάρηνοι, inter hyemantes [HYEMANTES]. In the Gallic church the bishops are directed by the 5th council of Orleans, A.D. 549 (c. 21), to take care that no lepers within their diocese are left destitute, but that they are supplied with food and raiment from the church funds. The 3rd council of Lyons, A.D. 583 (c. 6), gives a similar injunction, with the addition that the lepers are to be prohibited from wandering from one diocese to another. In some instances they must have been in danger of being cut off from all church membership, for pope Gregory II., A.D. 715-731 (Ep. xiii. ad Bonifac.), gives a formal sanction to the Holy Communion being administered to them, although not in company with others free from disease. Some special directions are also given by pope Zacharias, A.D. 741-752 (Ep. xii. de regio morbo laborantibus; the regius morbus in this instance has been held by some to signify leprosy. Martene (De Rit. Antiq. iii. 10) has printed from French rituals various specimens of the forms and services to be observed in the treatment of lepers, but they lie outside our period. [G. M.]

LEPTIS, COUNCIL OF (Leptense Concilium), held A.D. 386, or thereabouts, at Leptis, in Africa, when nine canons contained in a synodical letter of pope Siricius to the African bishops, were received. By the second of them it is ordained that no single bishop may ordain another. (Mansi, iii. 670, and Supplem. ad Colet. i. 252, and see AFRICAN COUNCILS.) [E. S. Ff.]

LERIDA, COUNCIL OF (Lerdense concilium), held A.D. 546—not 524, as was once thought—at Lerida in Catalonia, and passed sixteen canons on discipline, to which eight bishops subscribed, the bishop of Lerida subscribing last, and after him one presbyter representing a ninth. By canon 1, all who minister at the altar are commanded to abstain from shedding of blood under pain of being suspended for two years, and excluded from promotion ever afterwards. By canon 8, no clerk may lay hands upon any slave or pupil of his who has taken sanctuary. By canon 10, those who refuse to leave church, when ordered out for misbehaviour by the priest, are to be deemed contumacious and treated accordingly. By canon 14, the faithful may not communicate, nor so much as eat, with the rebaptized. Other canons are given to this council by Burchard: among them, one referring to the purification of pope Leo III., which took place two and a half centuries afterwards (Mansi, viii. 609 sq.; comp. Catalan, Conc. Hisp. iii. 172.) [E. S. Ff.]

LESSON. [LECTION; LECTONARY.]

LESTINES, COUNCIL OF (Liptinesse Concilium), said to have been held at Liptines, or Lestines, in Hainault, A.D. 743, or according to Mansi, 745; described as one of the five councils under St. Boniface, but beset with as many difficulties as the rest. 1. All the four canons assigned to it reappear among Carloman's capitulares, dated Liptines, A.D. 743 (Mansi, xi. Append. 105); indeed the first of them speaks of

refer either to actual lepers, or may signify that those who polluted themselves with unanatural crimes contracted a moral leprosy. The council orders that their station shall be among the γαμάρηνοι, inter hyemantes [HYEMANTES]. In the Gallic church the bishops are directed by the 5th council of Orleans, A.D. 549 (c. 21), to take care that no lepers within their diocese are left destitute, but that they are supplied with food and raiment from the church funds. The 3rd council of Lyons, A.D. 583 (c. 6), gives a similar injunction, with the addition that the lepers are to be prohibited from wandering from one diocese to another. In some instances they must have been in danger of being cut off from all church membership, for pope Gregory II., A.D. 715-731 (Ep. xiii. ad Bonifac.), gives a formal sanction to the Holy Communion being administered to them, although not in company with others free from disease. Some special directions are also given by pope Zacharias, A.D. 741-752 (Ep. xii. de regio morbo laborantibus; the regius morbus in this instance has been held by some to signify leprosy. Martene (De Rit. Antiq. iii. 10) has printed from French rituals various specimens of the forms and services to be observed in the treatment of lepers, but they lie outside our period. [G. M.]

LEPTIS, COUNCIL OF (Leptense Concilium), held A.D. 386, or thereabouts, at Leptis, in Africa, when nine canons contained in a synodical letter of pope Siricius to the African bishops, were received. By the second of them it is ordained that no single bishop may ordain another. (Mansi, iii. 670, and Supplem. ad Colet. i. 252, and see AFRICAN COUNCILS.) [E. S. Ff.]

LERIDA, COUNCIL OF (Lerdense concilium), held A.D. 546—not 524, as was once thought—at Lerida in Catalonia, and passed sixteen canons on discipline, to which eight bishops subscribed, the bishop of Lerida subscribing last, and after him one presbyter representing a ninth. By canon 1, all who minister at the altar are commanded to abstain from shedding of blood under pain of being suspended for two years, and excluded from promotion ever afterwards. By canon 8, no clerk may lay hands upon any slave or pupil of his who has taken sanctuary. By canon 10, those who refuse to leave church, when ordered out for misbehaviour by the priest, are to be deemed contumacious and treated accordingly. By canon 14, the faithful may not communicate, nor so much as eat, with the rebaptized. Other canons are given to this council by Burchard: among them, one referring to the purification of pope Leo III., which took place two and a half centuries afterwards (Mansi, viii. 609 sq.; comp. Catalan, Conc. Hisp. iii. 172.) [E. S. Ff.]

LESSON. [LECTION; LECTONARY.]

LESTINES, COUNCIL OF (Liptinesse Concilium), said to have been held at Liptines, or Lestines, in Hainault, A.D. 743, or according to Mansi, 745; described as one of the five councils under St. Boniface, but beset with as many difficulties as the rest. 1. All the four canons assigned to it reappear among Carloman's capitulares, dated Liptines, A.D. 743 (Mansi, xi. Append. 105); indeed the first of them speaks of the counts and prefects, as well as hishops, who had met there to confirm what a former synod had passed. 2. The heading says it was celebrated under Carloman, and makes no mention of Boniface. 3. Hincmar and others, who are supposed to refer to it, affirm that a legate from Rome, named George, presided at it jointly with St. Boniface. But George was not sent into France by Zachariah, but by Stephen II.; nor before Feb. 755 (Cod. Carol. Ep. viii. ed. Migne), by when St. Boniface had been dead eight months. Hence some have supposed a second council of Liptines at that year. The question is rather, whether the first has been truly described as a council. (Mansi, xii. 370-5 and 589. Comp. Hartzheim's Con. Germ. i. 50, et seq.)

[E. S. Ff.]

LETTERS COMMENDATORY [COMMENDATORY LETTERS].

LETTERS DIMISSORY [DIMISSORY LETTERS].

LETTERS, FORMS OF [LIBER DIURNUS; SUPERScription].

LETTERS, PASCHAL [PASCHAL LETTERS].

LETTERS, PASTORAL [PASTORAL LETTERS].

LETTERS ON VESTMENTS. In the examples of early Christian art to be seen in the frescoes of the catacombs, and the mosaics of the basilicas, the dresses of the persons depicted are, in innumerable instances, marked by one or more letters or monograms on the border or outer fold. The letters thus employed are very various, and usually, if not always, belong to the Greek alphabet, and it must be acknowledged that hitherto no satisfactory explanation of their occurrence has been given. Those most frequently met with are I, H, X, T, T, F. The last letter, the capital gamma, was of such frequent use on the ecclesiastical robes of the Greek church, that it gave its name to a class of vestments [GAMMADIA]. Arbitrary symbols are also found, to which no meaning can be assigned, such as [Γ], [J], [Π], [Ξ], [Ω], [Φ]. The earlier school of Christian archaeologists which was resolved to find a sacred meaning in every detail of the picture or bas-relief under consideration, had no difficulty in deciding that T and X represented the cross in different forms, while both I and H stood for Jesus, and Γ invariably denoted an apostle (Bosio, Rom. Sott. lib. iv. c. 3, p. 592; Aringhi, Rom. Sott. lib. vi. c. 28; Mellini apud Ciampini, Vet. Mon. tom. i. c. xiii. p. 98). This supposed law, hastily deduced from insufficient evidence, has been entirely refuted by wider examination. Ciampini (l. c.) proves it to be quite baseless. The theory however propounded by him, and supported by Buonarroti (Vetri, p. 89), that these letters and monograms on the dresses were the weavers' marks is equally destitute of a solid foundation, and is ridiculed by Ferrario (Costume antico e moderno: Europa, vol. iii. p. 149; Monumenti di Sant' Ambrogio in Milano, p. 176), since the same marks appear in mosaics most widely separated both by time and place. Other theories, e.g., that the letters indicate the name of the individual represented, or of the mosaic-workers, or even of the tallors who made the clothes, prove equally untenable, and the hopelessness of discovering any principle that would satisfactorily account at the same time for the variety and the identity of the marks has led some to assert that they were used capriciously (e.g., Suarez, bishop of Vaison, de Vestibus literatis, p. 7), without any fixed law, simply in imitation of an already established custom. The existence of this custom of weaving, or embroidering letters in the fabric, or sewing them on to the stuff, is proved by classical authorities. Pliny speaks of the ostentation of Zenxis the painter, in having his name woven in golden letters on the border of his pallium at Olympia (Hist. Nat. lib. xxxv. c. 36, § 2). Apuleius speaks of "lacinias auro literatas" (De Asia. cur. lib. 6, ad init.). Vopiscus describes Carinus as adopting the same custom (Vopisc. in Ciria). Suidas (s.v.) defines τριβωφοδρος as "one wearing a robe, having on it signs like small letters" (σημεία ὡς γραμμάτια). The purple clavi sewn on the senatorial robes, which gave its designation to the laticlavium, are considered by Rubens to have been "letters, not mere stripes," "literas lacinias palliorum insertas" (Le Ro ves'aria, lib. iii. c. 12). In the well-known vision of Boethius, the ascent from practical to theoretical wisdom is symbolised by the letter Π woven into the bottom of the border of the robe of Philosophy, and Θ at the top, the intervening space being occupied with letters arranged like the steps of a ladder (De Consolat. lib. i. pro. 1). Although it is impossible to believe that the selection of the letters in the Christian representations was entirely capricious, it must be confessed that no satisfactory explanation of them has yet been given, and that the subject requires further elucidation. [E. V.]

LEUCIUS (1) Bishop of Brindisi, or LEONTIUS, or LAURENTIUS (Greg. Ep. vi. 62 (ix. 73), cf. De Rossi, Rom. Sott. li. 228), is commemorated Jan. 11. (Mart. Hieron.)

(2) Companion martyr of Thyrsus, at Nicomedia, under Decius, Dec. 14 (Cal. Byz. and Men. Basil.); but Jan. 18 and 20 Mart. Hieron. which on the latter day refers them to Nijon in Switzerland, whither their relics had been transferred; and at Apollonia Jan. 28. (Mart. Rom. Petr. etc.) [E. B. B.]

LEUDOMARUS, bishop of Chalons, † Oct. 2, before A.D. 589. (Acta SS. Oct. i. 335.) [E. B. B.]

LEUGATHUS, martyr; Oct. 22. (Acta SS. Oct. ix. 536.) [E. B. B.]

LEUTFREDUS, a confessor who by his prayers caused a fountain to well forth in Mier near Montfort-l'Amaury. June 21, Usuard. [E. B. B.]

LEVITE. (Λευίτης, Aevetrens, Levita.) Professor Lightfoot has remarked (on Philippians, p. 187, 2nd ed.) that "the Levite, whose function it was to keep the beasts for slaughter, to cleanse away the blood and offal of the sacrifices, to serve as porter at the temple gates, and to swell the chorus of sacred psalmody, bears no strong resemblance to the Christian deacon, whose ministrations lay among the widows and orphans, and whose time was almost wholly spent in works of charity." Nevertheless, when the three order is derivative vestments

mediæ passage monastic Egypt.

clothes, prove equally unnecessary of discovering any satisfactorily account at the variety and the identity of the robe to assert that they were made by Suarez, bishop of Vaison, p. 7), without any fixed law of an already established custom of this custom of weaving, or the fabric, or sewing, is proved by classical writers in having his name woven in the border of his pallium at Acta SS. lib. xxv. c. 36, § 2, "laciniis auro literatis" (ibid. p. 6, ad init.). Vopiscus describing the same custom Suidas (s.v.) defines περιβαλλόμενον a robe, having on it letters (συνεμία ὡς ὑφανθεία), on the senatorial robes, and to the liticivium, are said to have been "letters," "literas laciniis palliorum" (Suidas, lib. iii. c. 12). In the robes of Boethius, the ascent from wisdom is symbolised by the bottom of the philosophy, and at the top, being occupied with letters of a ladder (De Consolat.), though it is impossible to mention of the letters in the robes was entirely capricious, that no satisfactory explanation has been given, and that the proper elucidation. [E. V.]

shop of Brindisi, or LEONARDUS (Greg. Ep. vi. 62 (ix. 73), Acta SS. lib. ii. 228), is commemorated on Jan. 28.

shop of Thyraus, at Nicomedia, Dec. 14 (Cal. Byz. and Mart. Hieron.), and on Jan. 18 and 20 (Mart. Hieron.) refers them to Nijon in their relics had been transcribed Jan. 28. (Mart. Rom.) [E. B. B.]

bishop of Chalons, † Oct. 10, Acta SS. Oct. i. 335.

shop of Metz, Oct. 22. (Acta SS.) [E. B. B.]

a confessor who by his martyrdom attained to well forth in Mercurius. June 21, Usuard. [E. B. B.]

shop, Neveltris, Levita. Pro-remarked (on Philippinus), the Levite, whose function was to slay, to cleanse the gates, and to swell the robe, bears no strong resemblance to a deacon, whose ministerial duties are to assist the widows and orphans, and to be wholly spent in works of charity, when the three orders of the Christian ministry came to be universally recognised, the analogy between the bishop with his attending presbyters and ministering deacons, and the high-priest with his attending priests and ministering Levites, was on the surface so strong, that the terms appropriate to the one soon came to be transferred to the other. Thus Origen (Hon. 12 in Jerem. 3, iii. p. 196, ed. Delorme), quoted by Lightfoot (ibid. p. 256), regards the priests and Levites as corresponding to the presbyters and deacons respectively. From the third century onward Levite is a frequent designation of the Christian ministry. Thus the 2nd council of Carthage, A.D. 390, designates (c. 2) the three orders of the ministry as antistes, sacerdotes, and Levitae (Codex Eccl. Afric. c. 3). Synesius (Epist. 58, p. 35, ed. Paris, 1640) speaks of the different grades of the ministry as Levites, presbyters, and bishops.

LEVITO

In the early portion of the Apostolical Constitutions, however, the bishops are regarded as succeeding to the Levitical privileges of the older dispensation. The bishops who serve the holy tabernacle, that is, the Holy Catholic Church, are the Levites in respect of the congregation (ii. 25, 5); the bishops inherited the Levitical privilege of receiving gifts for the benefit of the community (iv. 8, 1). On the other hand, in the later portion of the Constitutions (viii. 1, 2), the high-priest, priest, and Levite are regarded as analogous to bishop, presbyter, and deacon. [C.]

LEVITO (also Levitarium, Levito, Levitarium, Levites; Λεβιτῶν, Λεβιτῶν, Λεβιτῶν, Λεβιτῶν, Λεβιτῶν, etc.). The name Levito, a word apparently of Coptic origin* (see Tattam's Lexicon Aegyptiaco-Latinum, in Append.), is used for a kind of sleeveless cloak, ordinarily worn by Egyptian monks.—Levitarium est colobium sine manicis, quod Levitarium est colobium sine manicis, quod nonnachi Aegyptii tumentur (Isidore, Etyim. xix. 22). The word occurs frequently in the Rule of Pachomius, of which we have Jerome's translation from Eusebius (17a, c. 2; Regula, cc. 2, 67, 70, 81; in Jerome, vol. ii. 53 sqq. ed. Vallarsi). From this we learn that each monk was allowed two Levitariorum and a Psithium, or mat, in his cell. The material, of which this dress was made, was doubtless linen. Ménard (Not. ad Concord. Regularum, Benedicti Anionensis, c. 2; Patrol. ciii. 1237) argues that in the passage of Isidore cited above, the word linenum has dropped out after colobium, for Papius, the grammarian, quoting apparently from Isidore, so reads it. Also, Ruffinus (de Vita Patrum, c. 7; Patrol. xxi. 411) speaks of it as "stuppeum colobium." Casian again (de Coenobiorum Institutis, i. 5; Patrol. xlix. 68, where see Gazet's note) speaks of the Egyptian monks as "colobii lineis induti." Also the Rule of Pachomius speaks of it directly as "tunica linea." We need not therefore attach weight to the definition given by Suidas, χρῶν μοναχικῶς ἐκ τριχῶν συντεθειμένους. For further references, see

* In the article Colobium it is suggested that the word is derived from Levita, since the colobium was the special vestment of deacons. This view, though found in some medieval writers, is, I think, quite untenable, as the passages already cited point distinctly to a primarily monastic use, and connect the dress essentially with Egypt.

LIBELLI

981

Ephrem Syrus (de Humilitate, c. 88; vol. i. 320, ed. Assemani) and Palladius (Hist. Lausica, cc. 38, 52; Patrol. Gr. xxiv. 1099, 1138); also Duceage, Glossaries, s. vv. [E. S.]

LIAFWINI [LIVINGS.]

LIASINONUS (LIASFAMON), Egyptian martyr; commemorated Feb. 9 (Mart. Hieron.; Acta SS. Feb. ii. 294). [C. H.]

LIBANIUS (LEVANGIUS), bishop of Sennis, 6th century; commemorated Oct. 19 (Acta SS. Oct. viii. 447). [C. H.]

LIBANUS, Egyptian abbot; commemorated Ter. 3 = Dec. 29 (Cal. Et'rop.). [C. H.]

LIBARIA, virgin and martyr in Lorraine, 4th century; commemorated Oct. 8 (Acta SS. Oct. iv. 228). [C. H.]

LIBEL (L'ellus famosus). The frequent enactments, both in ecclesiastical and civil legislation, against the circulation of libels, that is, scandalous charges circulated in writing, prove the frequency of the practice. The Theodosian Code (lib. ix. tit. 34, de Famosis Libellis) has detailed and rigorous enactments. Even the reader or collector of such libels is to be liable to capital punishment. And that of Justinian has provisions substantially the same. This seems to have been because the person in possession of or circulating a libel, was presumed, in law, to have been the author of it and punished as such (sciat se quasi auctorem hujusmodi . . . subjungantur). And this presumption might probably be rebutted by suitable evidence. The Apostolical Canons (Nos. 54, 55, 83) deal only with the case of a clergyman maligning another cleric, or a bishop, or the emperor; in the latter case he was to be deposed. Sozomen (Hist. Eccles. lib. i. c. 17) remarks on the proneness of the clergy to present to the emperor accusations (βήβηλα) against each other before the first council of Nice, and relates that Constantine ordered all these libelli to be burnt unread.

In a collection of canons said to have been delivered by pope Adrian to Ingilram, bishop of Metz, we find one apparently founded on the rule of law mentioned above, and embodying similar provisions. And the Council of Eliberis (A.D. 305) anathematized in its 52nd canon those who should be found to have circulated libels, "famosos libellos," in the church.

In the 6th century denunciations of this offence become much rarer. From that period forwards we have only a very few canons, and those in general terms, against libel. The councils are mostly occupied with a different class of offences, such as would naturally arise in the ruler state of society which followed upon the irruption of the barbarians and the fall of the empire. [S. J. E.]

LIBELLATICI [LIBELLI.]

LIBELLICI. I. In the Decian persecution the constitution of the courts employed to enforce conformity, and the number of minor officials dealing with individuals, rendered evasion easy. The approved form of submission to the state ritual was (as under Trajan) to offer sacrifice or incense, but it was possible also to tender submission in writing. The name of one who "professed" in this way was subscribed to a renunciation of Christianity, or to a denial of the charge, or to a declaration of having recently or habitually attended sacrifices, or sometimes (unless Augustine has fallen into an unlikely mistake) to a mere profession of readiness to conform. This document was delivered to a magistrate, entered on the Acta, and finally published in the Forum.

II. Certificates of exemption, like the "Parliamentary Certificates" of our own history, were offered by officials for money, and actually thrust on persons who believed themselves, after privately avowing their faith, to be only purchasing exemption from the obligation to conform. This would have been simply a species of confiscation, which has rarely given great offence (the church penance for it was of six months' duration, S. Pet. Alex. can. 5; but on the Montanist view of such acts see Tillemont sur la persécution de Dèce, note iii). But it is evident from the efforts of Cyprian to awaken penitence in respect of them, that the purport of this kind of libellus was not less objectionable than the first. They cannot have sanctioned exemption without some grounds alleged, and those grounds can scarcely have been any other than that the certifying officer declared himself satisfied of the sound paganism of the recipient.

The difficulties found by authors on the subject of libelli have arisen from the assumption that they were all of one kind, or that there could be any regular formal procedure for the evasion of procedure. On the contrary, every conceivable means would be adopted. The accounts are not irreconcilable, but are about different things. Cyprian's language is precise to technicality in the use of professional terms.

I. (1). That libellus which the suspected Christian tendered is characterised in Cyprian de lapsis, xxvii. 22, "Professio est denegantis, contestatio christiani quod fuerat (cf. for this peculiar phrase, Cyp. c. Demetr. xiii. 11, id quod prius fueram) abnuentis." In Ep. 30, iii. 3, "Professio libellorum" is again the exhibition or putting in of such documents. Proferri is the proper term, as in the Acts of St. Agape (Ruinsart, p. 424), Christi negationem scriptam proferri, and compare Aug. de Bap. c. Don. iv. 6. Again, contestatio means the plea, or statement of his own case, made by either party to a suit, answering to the δισμωρία of the Athenian courts. The Roman clergy in Cypr. Ep. 30, iii. 3, argue correctly that although a man may never have approached the altar, he is bound by the fact of having put in a legal affirmation (contestatus sit) that he had done it.

In the above passages the libellus is a document emanating from the recanting persons. Such are described in Peter of Alexandria (can. 5) as ἡσυχροφάτοις. The nature of its contents is indicated in the passage of the de Lapsis, "He has declared himself to have done whatever another in fact sinfully did" (faciendo commissit), although this passage implies further the appearance of a deputy, a slave or heathen friend to personate him in the sacrificial act, as was common in the persecution of Diocletian.

The offence of the bishop Martial (Ep. 67, vi.) who was "stained with the libellus of idolatry," is explained by this use of the word contestatus. In the public proceedings (actis publica habitis apud) before the Decurion Procurator, he had appeared to put in a declaration that he had denied Christ and adopted a heathen cultus. He is not accused of having ever actually sacrificed, and according to Augustine (l. c.) libelli might contain only a declaration of readiness to do so.

(2) A second class are spoken of by Novatian and the Roman clergy, as having virtually "given acknowledgments, quittances, or discharges" (accepta fecissent, the best authenticated reading, is a common term (Dirksen, Manuale, s. v.), but "acta facere," which Neander adopts, makes good sense, namely, "to put in a plea in a process"), though not present in person, "cum fierent," inasmuch as they had made a legal appearance (praesentiam suam fecissent) by commissioning a proxy to register their names (mandando ut sic scriberentur) on the lists of conformity. Novatian argues that, as one who orders a crime is responsible for its commission, so one who sanctions (consensu) the reading in public (public legitur) of an untrue declaration about himself is liable to be proceeded against as if it were true.

II. The other kind of libellus which emanated not from the renegade but from the magistrate, is described with equal precision. In the Epistle to Antonian (55, xi. 8), Cyprian says some of the Libellatici had received such. An opportunity for obtaining one presented itself unsought (occasione libelli oblata . . . ostensa); they went in person or by deputy (mandavi) to a magistrate, informed him of their religion, and paid a sum for exemption from sacrifice. Since no magistrate could issue an order simply staying the execution of an edict, his certificate undoubtedly contained a statement of the satisfactory paganism of its holder. Thus Cyprian tried to awaken their consciences, while they felt that they had avowed their religion, and that the form of the document was not their affair.

Again, in the Exhortation of Martyrdom, Christians are urged if a libellus is offered (libelli oblata sibi occasione) not to embrace the gift (decipitulum malum munus), by the example of Eleazar, who refused the facilities offered him of eating lawful flesh as a make-believe for pork. The official connivance in each case would have enabled them to seem to do what they did not. The libellus is here something offered, and is a munus.

Thus nothing remains more clear than that the libellus of conformity is used for two kinds of documents. Maran thought the distinction was merely as to whether persons had been present or not at the registration of their names (vita Cypriani, vi.). Rigalt says that the libellatici only purchased a libellus of exemption. Tillemont alone has guessed that there might be two ways, "Peut-estre que l'on faisait et l'un et l'autre." Whether a document was issued also in cases of registration is not apparent; but all three sorts of persons are included under the name of libellatici.

III. Libellus is the proper name of a perfectly distinct kind of document issued by confessors or martyrs in prison, to those who had "filled." When the reaction commenced among the lapsed, some reappeared before the tribunals and suffered ecceny Procraator, he had a declaration that he had adopted a heathen cultus, having ever actually sacrileg to Augustine (l. c.) libelli a declaration of readiness to is spoken of by Novatian as having virtually "given quitances, or discharges" the best authenticated readm (Dirksen, Monale, s. v.), which Nonnder adopts, namely, "to put in a plea in a cot present in per. on, "cum as they had made a legyal (nam sum fecissit) by cono register their names (manentur) on the lists of conargus thit, as one who sponisible for its commission, s (consensus) the reading in ur) of an untrue declaration ble to be proceeded against

d of libellus which emanated d but from the magistrate, ual precision. In the Epistle 8), Cyprian says some of the ived such. An opportunity presented itself unsought ta . . . ostensa); they went puty (mandavi) to a magis- of their religion, and paid a from sacrifice. Since no ue an order simply staying a edict, his certificate un- a statement of the satisfac- its holder. Thus Cyprian ter consciences, while they avowed their religion, and the document was not their Exhortation of Martyrdom, if a libellus is offered (libelli e) not to embrace the gift m munus), by the example sed the facilities offered him h as a make-believe for pork- em in each case would have em to do what they did not. something offered, and is a mainly more clear than that mity is used for two kinds an thought the distinction ether persons had been pre- registration of their names Rigalt says that the libella- a libellus of exemption. guessed that there might ut-estre que l'on faisait et ether a document was issued tration is not apparent; but rsons are included under the e proper name of a perfectly ment issued by confessors or to those who had "fallen," commenced among the lapsed, recover their lost standing, ore the tribunals and suffered torture or death; others dedicated themselves to the service of confessors, others entered on penances of undefined duration (Cyp. Ep. 24, 21, 56). Many more relied on vicarious imputations of merit, by means of intercessions, always owned as availing for the individual before God (prærogativa eorum adjuvari apud Deum possunt, Ep. 18, cf. Ep. 19, II.), but now first used in subversion of church order. At first a letter from a martyr to the bishop only prayed that the case of a lapsed friend might be enquired into on the cessation of persecution; a period of penitence and the imposition of hands being understood to be necessary just as for other sins; some, like Saturninus, declined to venture even on this; Mappalicus requested it only for his sister or mother (Cyp. Ep. 20). But the presbyters who composed at Carthage the fiction hostile to Cyprian perceiving the effectiveness which might be given to the practice, anticipated not only the bishop's enquiry but even the death of martyrs, and "offered the names" of lapsed persons (see Aubespine, Obs. Ecc. L. i. § vii., prefixed to Priorius's Optatus, 1676, p. 40), and gave them communion as duly restored penitents (Ep. 34) upon receiving such letters from confessors without the bishop's sanction. These libelli sometimes specified only one of a group to whom they were granted, "Communicet ille cum suis" (Ep. 15). Then they were issued in the name of deceased confessors, and of confessors too illiterate to write themselves (Ep. 27), and this so copiously that some thousands were supposed to be circulating in Africa (Ep. 20). The chief authority in this issue, Lucianus, when remonstrated with by Cyprian, seems to have replied almost at once by promulgating in the name of "all the confessors" (compare the letter of ἕως χάριτος μαρτύρων from Nicomedia, end of cent. iii. Lucian ap. Routh, Reliquiæ, vol. iv.) an indulgence to "all the lapsed," and requesting Cyprian himself to communicate it to the provincial bishops, the sole condition annexed being that their conduct since their fall should have been satisfactory. This extraordinary document is extant, as Cyp. Ep. 23. Cyprian himself was prepared to concede some weight to these libelli in cases not undeserving of restitution, but the influence of the martyrs was ignored in the council (Carth. Sub. Cyp. i.) which regulated the terms of readmission. [AFRICAN COUNCILS, I. 38.]

The seditious libelli of the martyrs seem to have had no existence at Rome. This was no doubt due to the influence in the exactly opposite direction of Novatian over the confessors, whom he commends for maintaining "Evangelica disciplina" (Ep. 30, iv. 4), and who at first adhered to him, and not to the milder Cornelius. The Roman presbyters sympathise with the African episcopate, and deplore the similar revolts in Sicily, and in "nearly all the world." They say of Rome, "We seem to have escaped so far the disorders of the times." The petition of Celerinus at Rome to the confessors of Carthage for "Peace" to be granted to his sisters, implies that libelli could not practically be obtained at Rome (Ep. 22); accordingly the Roman confessors who correspond with Cyprian, urge humility on the Carthaginians, and go beyond him in strictness (Ep. 27, 31, 32).

[E. W. B.]

LIBER DIURNUS. The Liber Diurnus Pontificum Romanorum is a collection of formulae used in the correspondence and ordinary business, the "negotia diurna," of the Roman Curia.

Its date is determined within certain limits by internal evidence. In c. ii. tit. ix. p. 28, Constantine Pogonatus is referred to as departed. The formula which contains this reference therefore must have been drawn up or added to after the year 685. And Garnier argues that the book must have been compiled before the year 752, as it contains formulae of addresses to eparchs, which would, he thinks, not have been inserted after the date when eparchs were superseded. He considers the Liber Diurnus to have been drawn up in the time of Gregory II. (715-731), mainly on the ground, that in the second "professio fidei" of a newly-elected pope which it gives (p. 33 ff.), expressions and sentiments occur identical with some found in letters of that pope to the emperor Leo. Zaccaria, however, has shown that at any rate the MS. which Garnier used was almost certainly not written earlier than the time of Gregory IV., as it contains an allusion (c. ii. tit. 2, p. 13) to the date of that pontiff's consecration (Nov. A.D. 827). And as it is very probable that many forms were left standing after they had ceased to be in actual use, no certain inference as to the date of the collection as a whole can be drawn from the fact, that forms are given for addresses to an archerch.

It was made use of by the early canonists, as Ivo of Chartres, Anselm, Deusdedit, and Gratian (Dist. xvi. c. 8); but as in the course of time forms of proceeding changed, it gradually fell out of use, and copies became rare.

Some time before the year 1650 the well-known Lucas Holstenius saw in the Cistercian monastery of S. Croce in Jerusalem at Rome an ancient MS. of the Liber Diurnus, and with some difficulty obtained from the abbat leave to have it transcribed—a task which is said to have been performed in a single night. While he was preparing to publish this, he heard of another MS. at Paris, in the possession of Sirmondi, which was sent to him at Rome (Sirmondi Opera, iv. pp. 685 f. and 701). He does not appear however to have made any use of this MS., for what reason we do not know. His edition was printed, and a copy is found in the Vatican Library with the following title-page in Holstenius's own hand-writing: "Diurnus Pontificum, sive vetus Formularium, quo S. Rom. Ecclesia ante annos XI utebatur. Lucas Holstenius edidit cum Notis. Romæ typis Lud. Griniani, MDCL. 8vo." The notes are wanting, but Zaccaria, towards the end of the last century, saw Holstenius's preparations for them still preserved at Rome. The sheets were ready then in 1850, but not issued. The same book exactly, with the exception of some slight variations in the last sheet, is found with the printed title, "Liber Diurnus Romanorum Pontificum ex antiquissimo codice ms. nunc primum in lucem editus Romæ typis Josephi Vannucci, 1658." But the censors intervened, and the book was not published, though some sheets of it were sent to Petrus de Marca in 1660 (Baluze on de Marca, de Concordia, l. ix. 7). It is almost certain that this suppression of the book was due to its condemnation of pope Honorius (Professio Pontif. p. 41) as abetting heretics, a sentiment which seemed to Cardinal Bona, when the matter was submitted to him as president of the Congregation of the Index, a perilous one. In the pontificate, however, of Benedict XIII. (1724-1730) copies of the edition called of 1658 (really of 1650) were permitted to circulate.

* This MS. is described by Pertz (Ital. Reise, in A. u. M. für ältere Deutsche Geschichtskunde, v. 27) as an 8vo. volume of parchment of (probably) the 6th century.

Meantime Jean Garnier published an edition of the Liber Diurnus in quarto at Paris, in the year 1680. This seems to have been founded on the Paris MS. In 1685 Mabillon (Mus. Ital. i. 75) saw at Rome the original MS. which had been copied for Holstenius, and finding in it some formulæ not contained in Garnier's edition, inserted them in his Museum Italicum (i. pt. 2, pp. 32, 37), together with a selection of passages in which the reading of the MS. differed from that of Garnier's edition. These additions and various readings were used by Hoffmann in preparing the edition which he inserted in his Acta Collectio Scriptorum, vol. ii. pp. 1-268 (Leipzig, 1733). J. D. Schöfflin in his Commentationes Hist. et Crit. (Basil. 1741), pp. 502-524, having had access to a copy of the edition of Holstenius, noted almost all the places in which this differs from that of Garnier, and also added (pp. 525-530) those portions which are wanting in Garnier's edition, omitting four paragraphs, for what reason is not apparent. The edition of Riegger (Vienna, 1762) is a mere reprint of the original Paris edition. This is also reprinted in Migne's Patrologia, vol. 105, with Mabillon's additions.

Garnier found the hundred and four formulæ in the codex without arrangement or division into parts or chapters. He arranged the matter and divided it into seven chapters. Of these the first contains the proper forms for papal letters to the emperor, the empress, the patriarch, the exarch, a consul, a king, a patriarch, etc.; the second treats of the election and consecration of a pope, together with the proper forms of the letters to be written on such occasions to the emperor, the exarch, and other official personages; the third, of the consecration by the pope of the suburbicarian bishops; in the fourth are four formulæ for the bestowing of the Pallium; the fifth contains twenty-one formulæ for various transactions between the pope and the bishops of his own consecration; the sixth relates to the management of the estates of the Church; and the seventh to the granting of privileges to various ecclesiastical corporations, as monasteries and hospitals.

The book contains matter of great interest both in a dogmatic and an archaeological point of view. The "Professions" of a newly elected pope refer to such matters as ecclesiastical tradition, the respect due to the creeds of Nicaea and Constantinople, the heresies to be abjured and condemned, the claims of the Roman primate. The particulars of the order to be observed and the persons to be informed, on a vacancy of the papal see, are brought into clearer light by this document than by any other of so early a date. Much is learned as to the relation between the pope and the bishops of his own archdiocese, and also between the pope and the metropolitans who owned his jurisdiction, as to the conditions and the periods of ordination generally, to the residence of bishops, to the care and distribution of the property of the church; as to the different classes of churches—basilicas, tituli, oratories, and the like—their consecration, their endowment, and the offices to be performed in them; and as to the care of the sick and poor. In a word, a considerable portion of the ecclesiastical—especially the Roman ecclesiastical—life of the 8th century, or thereabouts, receives illustration from the Liber Diurnus.

(See Garnier's preface to the Liber Diurnus [Migne, Patrol. cv. pp. 11-22; and Zaccaria's Dissert. de L. D., in his Biblioth. Rit. t. ii. sec. ii. pp. cccxix-cccxxvi, Rome, 1781; and in Migne, cv. pp. 1361-1404. The most recent edition is that by Eng. de Rozière; Paris, 1869.) [C.]

LIBERA NOS. The amplification of the petition "Deliver us from evil," in the Lord's Prayer, found in almost all liturgies. For instance, that of the Gallican (which is variable), is on Christmas Day—"Libera nos, omnipotens Deus, ab omni malo et custodi nos in omni opere bono, perfecta veritas et vera libertas Deus, qui regnas in sæcula sæculorum." That of St. James's Liturgy is given under EMPOLESMUS [l. 609]. Many liturgies contain supplications for the intercession of saints in the Libera nos. [INTERCESSION, l. 844.] [C.]

LIBERALIS (1) Martyr of Alexandria; commemorated April 24 (Mart. Hieron.; Acta SS. Apr. iii. 265). [C. H.]

(2) Of Altinum in Venetia, confessor, circ. A. D. 400; commemorated April 27 (Usuard. Act.; Acta SS. Apr. iii. 489). [C. H.]

LIBERATA (1) Of Ticinum (Pavia), circ. A. D. 500; commemorated Jan. 16 (Acta SS. Jan. ii. 32). [C. H.]

(2) Of Mons Calvus (Chaumont), 6th century; commemorated Feb. 3 (Usuard. Act.; Acta SS. Feb. iii. 361). [C. H.]

(3) Of Comm (Corno), virgin and martyr, circ. A. D. 580; commemorated Jan. 18 (Acta SS. Jan. ii. 196). [C. H.]

LIBERATUS (1) Of Amphitrea (unknown); commemorated Dec. 20 (Mart. Usuard.) [C. H.]

(2) Abbat and martyr, circ. A. D. 483; commemorated in Africa Aug. 17 (Usuard. Act.; Acta SS. Aug. iii. 455). [C. H.]

(3) Physician and martyr, circ. A. D. 484; commemorated in Africa Mar. 23 (Acta SS. Mar. iii. 461). [C. H.]

LIBERIUS (1) Archbishop of Ravenna, circ. A. D. 200; commemorated April 29 (Usuard. Act.; Acta SS. Apr. iii. 614). [C. H.]

(2) (LIBERUS, LIBUS) Bishop; commemorated at Rome May 17 (Mart. Hieron.; Acta SS. May iv. 26). [C. H.]

(3) Bishop of Rome; commemorated Sept. 23 (Mart. Hieron., Ado. Append.; Usuard. Act.; Acta SS. Sept. vi. 572); Taguen 4=Aug. 27, and Tekempt 7=Oct. 4 (Neale, Cal. Ethiop.); Aug. 27 and Oct. 6 (Daniel Cod. Liturg.). [C. H.]

the pope and the metropolitans election, as to the conditions ordination generally, to the
 to the care and distribution
 e church; as to the different
 -basilicas, tituli, oratories, consecration, their endow-
 to be performed in them;
 f the sick and poor. In a portion of the ecclesiastical man ecclesiastical—life of thereabouts, receives illus-Diurnus.

ference to the Liber Di- nus
 pp. 11-22]; and Zaecaria's his Biblioth. R. t. ii. sec.
 vi., Rome, 1781; and in -1404. The most recent
 Eug. de Rozière; Paris,
 [C.]

the amplification of the s from evil," in the Lord's most all liturgies. For inallican (which is variable),
 —"Libera nos, omnipotens
 at custodi nos in omni opere et vera libertas Deus, qui saeculorum." That of St.
 given under EMBOLISMUS
 rgies contain supplications
 of saints in the Libera nos.
 [C.]

Martyr of Alexandria;
 24 (Mart. Hieron.; Acta
 [C. H.]

u Venetia, confessor, circ. orated April 27 (Usuard.
 iii. 489). [C. H.]

Of Ticinum (Pavia), circ. orated Jan. 16 (Acta SS.
 [C. H.]

(Chaumont), 6th century; (Usuard. Auct.; Acta SS.
 [C. H.]

omo), virgin and martyr, mmemorated Jan. 18 (Acta
 [C. H.]

(Of Amphitrea (unknown);
 O (Mart. Usuard.) [C. H.]

artyr, circ. A.D. 483; com-Aug. 17 (Usuard. Auct.
 [C. H.]

martyr, circ. A.D. 484; ica Mar. 23 (Acta SS. Mar.
 [C. H.]

rchbishop of Ravenna, circ.
 orated April 29 (Usuard.
 iii. 614). [C. H.]

s) Bishop; commemorated
 Acta SS. May
 [C. H.]

rt; commemorated Sept. 23
Append.; Usuard. Auct.
 72); Tagmen 4=Aug. 27;
 4 (Neale, Cal. Ethiop.); Daniel Cod. Liturg.).

[C. H.]

LIBERTINUS

LIBERTINUS, martyr at Gildoba in Thrace; commemorated Dec. 20 (Mart. Hieron.
 cf. Usuard, ad diem, Obs.). [C. H.]

LIBIUS (LIBUS), martyr in Pannonia; commmemorated Feb. 23 (Mart. Hieron.; Usuard.
Auct.; Acta SS. Feb. iii. 366). [C. H.]

LIBORIUS, bishop of Mans, patron of Pader-born, 4th century, confessor; commemorated July 23 and June 9 (Usuard. Auct.; Ado, Mart.
Append.; Acta SS. July, v. 394; see also Usuard.
Auct. ad April 28, May 28). [C. H.]

LIBOSA; commemorated at Nicomedia Feb.
 22 (Mart. Hieron.; Acta SS. iii. 289). [C. H.]

LIBOSUS; commemorated at Rome June 3
 (Mart. Hieron.; Acta SS. June, i. 237). [C. H.]

LIBRA. In the later Roman empire the pound of gold was divided into 72 aurei or solidi (Codex,
 x. tit. 70, a. 5; see DICTIONARY OF GREEK AND ROMAN ANTIQ. s.v. "Aurum"). It was probably from this circumstance that a number of 72 witnesses was called Libra Occidua (Baronius ad aa. 302, § 91 ff.). The same term is said to be applied to the suffragan bishops of the see of Rome, who were in number about 72 (Macri, Hierol. s. v. Libra; Bisior, I. 240). [C.]

LIBRANUS, of Clofmid, in Neath, abbat of Iona, 6th cent., and at Durrow, Mar. 11 (Aengus).
 [E. B. L.]

LIBRARIES BELONGING TO CHURCHES AND MONASTERIES. The information that we are able to give on this subject is fragmentary, but not without interest.

I. The most ancient library of Christian books
 mentioned by any historian is that at Aelia (Jerusalem), collected by Alexander, the bishop of that city, A.D. 212. Eusebius of Caesarea, writing about 330, says that it contained the epistles, from one to another, of many learned ecclesiastics of the time of Origen (A.D. 230), and that he had himself made very great use of it in compiling his history (Hist. Eccl. vi. 20).
 There was a much larger and more famous library at Caesarea in Palestine, which appears to have been founded by Origen, with the munificent aid, we may suppose, of his friend Ambrosius, and to have been greatly enlarged by Pamphilus, the friend of Eusebius, A.D. 294.
 That it existed before the time of Pamphilus is clear from St. Jerome's account: "Having sought for them (books) over the world, but devoting himself especially to the world, but Origen, he gave them to the library at Caesarea" (Expos. in Ps. 126, Ep. 34 ad Marcellam, § 1).
 The same author calls it the library of Origen and Pamphilus (De Vir. Illust. c. 113). In this library there was, as he informs us, the supposed Hebrew original of St. Matthew's Gospel (ibid.
 c. 3), which is probably the book (in the same collection) which he elsewhere describes as a Gospel in Syro-Chaldaic, used by the Nazarenes (Contra Pelag. iii. 2). In another work he says,
 "I have been somewhat diligent in searching for copies, and in the library of Eusebius at Caesarea I found six volumes of the Apology for Origen" (by Pamphilus) (C. Rufin. ii. 12).
 It contained copies of the greater part of the

LIBRARIES

works of Origen, made by Pamphilus himself (Hieron. de Vir. Illust. c. 75). The originals of the Hexapla were there, and Jerome corrected
 his copy from them (Comment. in Tit. iii. 9).
 Before the time of Jerome this library had fallen more or less into decay, but endeavours to restore it were made by two successors of Eusebius, viz. Acacius, 340, and Euzoios, 366 (Hieron. ad Marcell. u. s.). Of Euzoios, he says, on the authority of Thespesius Rhetor, that he "strove with great labour to refurbish with parchments the library of Origen and Pamphilus, which was already decayed" (De Vir. Illust.
 c. 113). Isidore of Seville, A.D. 636, asserts that the library of Pamphilus at Caesarea contained nearly 30,000 volumes (Orig. vi. 6).

There is extant the legal record of some proceedings that took place at Cirra or Constan-tia, in Africa, during the persecution of 303-304. It relates that the officers "went to the church in which the Christians used to assemble, and spoiled it of chalices, lamps, &c., but when they came into the library (bibliothecum), the presses (armaria) there were found empty" (in Gesta apud Zenophilum, Optati Opp. App. ed.
 1703; comp. August. c. Crescon. iii. 29). Constantine directs Eusebius the historian in a letter which the latter has preserved (De Vita Const. iv. 36) to cause to be written for the new churches in Constantinople, "by calligraphic artists, thoroughly skilled in the art, fifty volumes of the sacred writings, such as he knew to be most necessary for the supply and use of the church, on well-prepared parchments, legible and portable for use." Such a gift would,
 we may suppose, be in many cases the germ of a great church library. Julian the emperor, A.D.
 362, orders Ecdicius the prefect of Egypt to send him the library of George, the Arian bishop of Alexandria: "See that all the books of George be sought out. For there were at his residence many philosophical, many rhetorical works, and many of the doctrine of the impious Gallienus (Christians), which we could wish were all destroyed, but lest with these the more useful be made away with, let them also be carefully sought for. But let your guide in this search be the scribe [perhaps secretary] (νοτάριος) of George himself. . . . But I am myself acquainted with the books of George; for he lent me many, though not all, when I was in Cappadocia, for transcription, and had them back again" (Epist. Jul. 9). Julian was collecting books to enrich the library founded by Constantius in the portico of the imperial palace, and removed by himself to a more suitable edifice, which he had erected for the purpose.
 See Duencan, Constantinople's Christian, i. 4, 9, 3.
 Hence it appears that the books of which the church was robbed did not return to her.
 Georgius Synceilus tells us that he had brought to him from the library of Caesarea in Cappa-docia an excellent copy of the book of Kings,
 "in which was an inscription to the effect that the great and holy Basil (bishop of that see from 370 to 378) had himself compared and corrected the copies from which it had been transcribed" (Chronogr. p. 382; ed. Dinlorf).
 St. Jerome, after referring a correspondent to several authorities, says, "Turn over the commentaries of all whom I have mentioned above;
 and make good use of the libraries of the churches; and thou wilt arrive more quickly at that which thou desirest and hast begun" (Epist. ad Jannach. 49, § 3; comp. Epist. 112, ad August. § 19). St. Augustine, writing at Hippo about the year 428, says, "I have heard that the holy Jerome wrote on heresies; but neither have we been able to find that little work of his in our own library, nor do we know from where it may be obtained" (De Her. sub fin.). When Augustine was dying, "he directed that the library of the church and all the books should be carefully kept for posterity for ever." He also left libraries to the church, "containing books and treatises by himself or other holy persons" (Possid. Vita Aug. 31). Theodosius the younger, 408-450, "collected the sacred books and their interpreters so diligently, as not to come behind Ptolemy" (Niceph. Call. Hist. Eccl. xiv. 3). Whether his collection was for the imperial library or the Patriarchium, we are not told; but the fact is worth noting, because it shows the spirit of the age. The leading ecclesiastics would not be behind the emperor. Hilary of Rome, A.D. 461, according to the Liber Pontificalis, "made two libraries in the Lateran baptistery" (Anast. Vit. Pont. 47). From the same authority we learn that the works of Gelasius, A.D. 482, were "kept laid up in the library and archive of the church" down to the 9th century (n. 50). Gregory I. A.D. 598, replying to the request of Eulogius of Alexandria that he would send him the Acts of the Martyrs collected by Eusebius, says, "Besides those things which are contained in the books of Eusebius himself concerning the deeds of the holy martyrs, I know none in the archives of this our church, or in the libraries of the city of Rome, except a few collected in the roll of a single book" (Epist. vii. 29). A narrative assigned to the year 649 or thereabout, shews that there was at that time a library already attached to St. Peter's. It is said that when Taio, bishop of Saragossa, who had been sent from Spain by king Chindaswind to procure the latter part of the M. ratiis of Gregory, could not learn from the pope or anyone else where it was, the very press in which it lay was pointed out to him in a vision, as he watched and prayed by night in that church (De Visione, etc., Labb. Cons. v. 1844). Willibald, A.D. 760, in the life of St. Boniface, says that the four books of St. Gregory were to his day put into the "libraries of churches" (Pertz, Monum. Germ. Hist. ii. 334). At this period, and earlier, as we learn from an epistle of Taio, above mentioned, few books were composed or copied in the west, and all were in danger of destruction, from the constant wars which desolated the Latin world (Epist. ad Quiicum; Præfat. Saec. ii. O. S. B. § v. lv. 17). His evidence refers to Spain, but the evil was felt at Rome equally, as we learn from a statement of the Roman synod in 680, to the emperors who had convened the 3rd council of Constantinople. After describing themselves as "settled in the northern and western parts" of the empire, the Latin bishops say, "We do not think that any one can be found in our time who can boast of great knowledge, seeing that in our regions the fury of various nations is every day raging, now in fighting, now in overrunning and plundering; whence our whole life is full of care, surrounded as we are by a band of nations, and having to live by bodily toil, the ancient maintenance of the churches having by degrees fallen away and failed through divers calamities" (Labbe, vi. 681). Agatho, then bishop of Rome, made this an excuse for his ignorance of his legates, whom he sent to the council, as he said, "out of the obedience which he owed" to the emperors, "not from any confidence in their knowledge" (ibid. 634). Bede (De Temp. Rat. 66, followed by Hincmar, Opusc. 20 c. Hincmar, Laud.) says that when they arrived at Constantinople they were "very kindly received by the most reverend defender of the Catholic faith Constantine (Pogonatus), and by him exhorted to lay aside philosophical [om. Hincmar.] disputations, and to seek the truth in peaceable conference, all the books of the ancient fathers which they asked for being supplied them out of the library at Constantinople." The records of the council tell us that the same legates besought the emperor that the "original books of the patristic testimonies added might be brought from the Patriarchium" (Act. vi. Labb. vi. 719); and we find the bishop of Constantinople himself speaking of the "books of the holy and approved fathers which were laid up in his Patriarchium" (Act. viii. ibid. 730; comp. 751, 780). A large number of extracts from the fathers are said to have been compared with the originals in the "library of the Patriarchium" (Act. x. coll. 788, 790, 798, &c.). Several testimonies alleged are also said to have been compared with a "silver-bound parchment book belonging to the σκευοφυλάκιον of the most holy high church" in the same city (ibid. 813, 814, &c.). There was at Constantinople also a registry or repository of documents (χαρτοφυλάκιον, n. s. 803) under the charge of an officer called the χαρτοφύλαξ (ibid.). Whether this was a department of the library or distinct from it does not appear. The great esteem in which the church library at Constantinople was held by all parties is attested by the fact that the iconolater Theophanes refused to look at a copy of Isaiah, brought from the emperor's library, alleging that all his books were corrupted, but asked for one from the library of the Patriarchium instead (Continuatio, iii. 14).

For some centuries after this the Greeks possessed advantages for the acquisition of knowledge over the Latins; though there were many in the west, especially among the bishops, who employed themselves in collecting and multiplying good books. Thus Bede says of Aeca, who succeeded Wilfrid at Hexham, A.D. 710, that he "gathered together the histories of the sufferings (of the martyrs, &c.), with other ecclesiastical books most diligently, and made there a very large and noble library" (Hist. Eccl. v. 20). Egbertus, bishop of York from 782-786, is another example in our own country. Aleuin, in 796, writing to Charlemagne from Tours, where he had opened a school, says, "I am partly in want of books of scholastic erudition, that are somewhat difficult to be procured, which I had in my own country, through the good and most devoted diligence of my master, or my own labour, such as it was." He therefore desired that some youths might be sent into Britain to bring back whatever was necessary, "that there might not only be 'a garden enclosed' at York, but that there may be at a

r
I
c
7
C
li
is co
of
to le (G at not in bec
x
yea
and bap
sion
Gre
coll
serv
a ch
11
terit
The
of t ing insti
impl
work 553 rule
libra
throu
The r
"Let
terium whom time,
and al
be ask let wor
(c. 9).
were t
allowe

by bodily toil, the ancient churches having by degrees passed through divers calamities." Bede, then bishop of Home, speaks for the ignorance of his country to the council, as he said, "I know which he owed" (c. 9). "I am any confidence in our country" (Bede, De Temp. Rat. 434). Bede (De Temp. Rat. Cassin., Opus. 20 c. Hincm. ann. they arrived at Constan- tium very kindly received by the ruler of the Catholic faith Con- stantine), and by him exhorted to a [Cath. Hincm.]disputations, both in peaceable conference, and in ancient fathers which they died them out of the library. The records of the council name legates besought the "original books of the pa- radise which he brought him" (Act. vi. Labb. vi. 710); "I am any confidence in our country" (Bede, De Temp. Rat. 434). Bede (De Temp. Rat. Cassin., Opus. 20 c. Hincm. ann. they arrived at Constan- tium very kindly received by the ruler of the Catholic faith Con- stantine), and by him exhorted to a [Cath. Hincm.]disputations, both in peaceable conference, and in ancient fathers which they died them out of the library.

The records of the council name legates besought the "original books of the pa- radise which he brought him" (Act. vi. Labb. vi. 710); "I am any confidence in our country" (Bede, De Temp. Rat. 434). Bede (De Temp. Rat. Cassin., Opus. 20 c. Hincm. ann. they arrived at Constan- tium very kindly received by the ruler of the Catholic faith Con- stantine), and by him exhorted to a [Cath. Hincm.]disputations, both in peaceable conference, and in ancient fathers which they died them out of the library.

ies after this the Greeks were sent for the acquisition of the Latin; though there were especially among the bishops, themselves in collecting and books. Thus Bede says of Wilfrid at Hexham, A.D. 662, "I brought together the histories of the martyrs, &c.), with other most diligently, and made a noble library" (Hist. Bede, bishop of York from example in our own country, coming to Charlemagne from the north opened a school, says, "I have books of scholastic erudi- tion difficult to be procured, in my own country, through the great diligence of my master, such as it was." He there- fore some youths might be sent to the buck whither was sent might not only be a garden but that there may be at

Tours also 'plants, an orchard with pleasant fruits.'" (Cant. iv. 13), (Epst. 38). From William of Malmesbury (De Gest. Reg. Angl. l.) we learn that the master of whom Alcuin speaks is Egbert of York. Alcuin also celebrates in verse the library which Alcuin, another bishop of York, attached to his cathedral church, and gives the names of many of the fathers, poets, and grammarians, whose works were contained in it (Poema de Pont. Ebor. II. 1525 et seq. tom. II. p. 257). In 787 a great stimulus was given to the formation of libraries in cathedral churches within the dominions of Charlemagne, by an order issued by him for the establishment of schools in connexion with them (Labbe, Cona. v. 1779). Such schools, as we have seen, implied a good collection of books. A later edict of the same prince, after providing that there be "set up schools of reading boys," adds, "Let them learn the psalms, notes, chants, the art of determining the seasons (computum), and grammar [in its ancient sense], in every monastery and episcopal church (episcopatum). Let them also have Catholic books, well corrected" (Casal. ann. 789, c. 70). These laws of Charlemagne would certainly lead to the foundation of cathedral libraries where they had not existed before. It is probable that the smaller libraries found in connexion with many other churches owe their origin in a great measure to a similar edict of Lewis in 816. By this, bishops were ordered to "see that the Presbyters had a missal and lectionary and other books necessary to them" (c. 28; Capit. Reg. Franc. i. 569). What some at least of these "other books," supposed to be necessary, were, we may gather from the following list in an ancient polyptychon, preserved in the church of St. Remigius, at Rheims: "A book of the gospels, a psalter, an antiphonary, a breviary [i.e. a table of the gospels for the year, in which they were indicated by their first and last words]. . . . a computus, an order of baptism, a martyrology, a penitential, a pas- sional, a volume of canons, forty homilies of St. Gregory" (Ibid. ii. 1159). As soon as such a collection went beyond the requirements of the service, as in this case it did, the foundation of a church library was already laid.

II. We read of libraries attached to monas- teries in the west at a somewhat early period. The rule of St. Benedict, A.D. 530, speaks of the benefit to be derived from the reading of the Catholic fathers, their conferences, institutes, and lives (c. 73), in a manner which implies access to a considerable number of such works. Compare the rule of Ferreolus, A.D. 533 (c. 19). In Lent every monk under the rule of St. Benedict received a book "from the library" (bibliotheca), which he was to read through before he could have another (c. 48). The rule of Isidore, A.D. 593, enters into details: "Let the keeper of the sacramin (here=secratarium) have charge of all the books; from whom let all the brethren receive them one at a time, which they shall carefully read and handle, and always return after vespers. Let the books be asked for every day at the first hour; and let none be given to him who shall ask later" (c. 9). To shew the care with which the books were treated, we may mention that monks were allowed to have handkerchiefs in which to wrap them (Theodmar. Cassin. ad Car. Magn. in Capit. Reg. Franc. II. 1080), and that the council of Aix, 817, left it to the prior to determine, "when books had been received from the library," whether others should be given out or not (cap. 19). It would seem that, except in Lent, the ordinary monk did not have books out of the library for his private use; but the practice of reading aloud at meals implies a variety of suitable works. We hear of this even before the days of Benedict, viz. in the rule of Caesarius, A.D. 502: "While they eat at table, let no one speak, but let one read some book; that as the body is refreshed by food, so may the soul be refreshed by the word of God" (c. 9; comp. Reg. S. Ben. c. 38). Other times for reading were also appointed in some houses, as by the rule of Donatus for nuns, A.D. 640: "From the 2nd hour to the 3rd, if there be no need for them to work, let them employ themselves in reading. . . . Let one of the elder read to the rest, as they work together" (c. 20).

Cassiodorus, who built, or entered, the monas- tery of Vivarium, about the year 562, collected books for it from the more distant parts of the world, and directed his monks that, if they met with any book that he wanted, they should make a copy of it, "that by the help of God and their labour, the library of the monastery might be benefited" (De Instit. Div. Litt. 8). In the preface to his work on Orthography, he gives a list of twelve books on the subject which he used in compiling his own. As he was then 93 years old, they were presumably all at hand in his own monastery. The fact suggests a good collection of works on general subjects, as well as in one written (A.D. 590) to the Defensor of Naples representing that the books of the monas- tery of Macheris had in a time of trouble been carried into Sicily by a certain presbyter, who had died and left them there, and requiring that they should be restored (Epist. viii. 15). The monks of our own country were not behind others in collecting books. E.g. Benedict Biscop, abbat of Wearmouth, having visited Rome in 671, "brought home not a few books of all divine erudition, either bought with a set price or given to him by the kindness of friends, and when on his return he came to Vienne he re- ceived those which he had bought and intrusted to friends there" (Bede, Hist. Abbat. W. cem. § 4). In 678 he paid another visit to Rome, and then "brought home an innumerable quantity of books of every kind" (Ibid. 5). "A great quantity of sacred volumes" was part of the result of a third visit in 686 (§ 8). In his last illness he gave directions that "the very noble and complete library, which he had brought from Rome, as necessary for the instruction of the church, should be anxiously preserved entire, and neither suffer injury through want of care nor be dispersed" (9). This collection, which was divided between the monasteries of Wear- mouth and Jarrow, was "doubled" by the zeal of his successor, Coelfrid (12). It is to these libraries chiefly that we owe the learning of Bede. The order of Charlemagne in 787 al- ready mentioned was addressed to abbats as well as bishops, and the only copy extant is that which was sent to the abbat of Fulda. It is interesting to know that less than 50 years after its promulgation, the famous Rabanus Maurus built a library there, which he amply stored with books (Vita per Rodolf. in Cave, Hist. Litt. nom. Raban.). A beginning had been made, however, so far back as 754. When Boniface, the Apostle of Germany, was murdered by the Pagans at Dokem in east Frisia, they "broke open the repository of books . . . and scattered those which they found, some over the level fields, others in the reed-bed of the marshes, and flung and hid others away in all sorts of places." They were afterwards found and taken to Fulda, where three of them are still shewn, viz. a New Testament, a book of the Gospels, said to have been written by the martyr himself, and a volume stained with his blood, containing, with other tracts of St. Ambrose, de Spiritu Sancto and Pono Mortis (Willibaldi Vita S. Bonif. xi. 37, and Mabillon's note). In 799 Charlemagne founded an abbey at Charroux, which "he enriched with many relics and most magnificent gifts brought to him from the east, and with a very rich library" (Gallia Christiana, ii. 1278). Many monastic libraries were destroyed by fire in the 9th and following centuries, in several of which books must have been accumulating during a lengthened period. For example, in 870, when the Danes destroyed the minster of Medhamsted (Peterborough), founded about 656, "a vast library of sacred books was burned with the charters of the monastery" (Ann. Bened. iii. 167, § 16, from Ingulf.). In 892 the monastery at Teano, near Monte Cassino, was burned down, "in which fire most of the deeds and instruments of the Cassinates were consumed, with the very autograph of the rule which the holy father Benedict had written with his own hand" (ibid. p. 283, § 67). About the year 900, the Hungarians destroyed the monastery of Noanantula by fire, and "burned many books" (ibid. 305, § 30).

We can give no certain information on the origin and condition of monastic libraries in the east during the period to which we are confined. We may, however, infer with great probability that monasteries began very early to collect books, from the fact that manuscripts of the highest antiquity are found in them at the present day. About 400 volumes of MSS. are now in the British Museum, which were brought in the years 1839, 1842, 1847 from a single Syrian monastery, viz. that of St. Mary Deipara, in the Desert of Nitria, or Valley of Scete. As a proof of the antiquity of some of these books, we may mention that the three volumes in which occur the several copies of the Epistles of St. Ignatius published by Mr. Cureton are, one earlier than 550, another some 50 or 60 years later, and the third "certainly not later than the 7th or 8th century" (Corpus Ignatianum, Introd. xvii. xxxiii.). In the second of these volumes is a notice curiously similar to one quoted above respecting an English abbat, to the effect that Moses of Nisibis, the superior of the monastery, "gave diligence and acquired that book together with many others, being 250, many of which he purchased, and others were given to him by some persons as a blessing [see EULOGIAE (5)], when he went to Bagdad" (xxx.). This bears date A.D. 931. The MS. bible found by Tischendorf (1844, 1859) in the monastery of St. Catherine, on Mount Sinai, is assigned to the 4th century (Nov. Test. Sinaii, Tisch. Proleg. ix.). He obtained many other books from the same library, and many from monasteries in Palestine, at Berytus, Laodicea, Smyrna, in Patmos, and at Constantinople (Notitia Editt. Cod. Sinaii, p. 7). In his collection, now at St. Petersburg, are various Greek fragments of the 5th and 6th centuries (ibid. p. 56); five of the New Testament of the 6th and 7th; and one of the 7th or 8th (p. 50); parts of some Homilies of St. Chrysostom (p. 55), and some liturgical remains of the 8th (p. 56); all in the same language; and a Syriac version of hymns and sermons by Gregory Nazianzen written in the 7th (p. 64). We do not multiply such facts, because, though very probable indications of the existence of monastic libraries in the East within our period, and of the nature of their contents, they do not amount to a direct and positive proof. [W. E. S.]

LIBRARIUS. The word librarius has two meanings—viz. either a 'book-seller' or a 'transcriber': we are concerned with the latter sense. Of course there must have been transcribers in abundance before Christian times, if, as is said, the libraries of the Ptolemies at Alexandria, and of the kings of Pergamus in Asia Minor contained between them a million volumes, and upwards in all languages (DICT. OF GR. AND ROM. ANTS. art. 'Bibliotheca'). Transcribers were frequently slaves at first, or else worked for money, and were not well paid. Hence the endless complaints of their ignorance, carelessness, or dishonesty which occur in the Fathers as well as in classical authors (Wower, de Polymath. c. 18, ap. Gronov. Thes. x. 1079). But with Christian times the office of transcriber for libraries insensibly passed into better hands. It was not that he became, strictly speaking, a public functionary, but he copied far more frequently for ecclesiastical bodies than for private persons: a ' was, in most cases, a member of the body for which he worked. Thus he worked, not for money, but as a duty; and not on chance books, but on books carefully selected for their contents by his superiors. This altered the character of his performances materially, besides going far to ensure their preservation. It is a simple fact in history, that Christianity stands between us and the written records of all preceding ages, and is our sole guarantee for their trustworthiness in their present state.

Origen was one of the first Christians who is said to have employed transcribers regularly for literary purposes (Βιβλιογράφους, Euseb. E. H. vi. 23). Alexander, bishop of Jerusalem, his friend and patron, was one of the first to form an episcopal library, which Eusebius found of great use in collecting facts for his history (ib. c. 20). Eusebius himself, by order of the emperor Constantine, had 50 choice copies of the scriptures made by experienced calligraphers on vellum, arranged in ternions and quaternions (Vit. Const. iv. 34-7, and Vales. ad l.). Pamphilus, the presbyter and martyr, with whom Eusebius was so intimate, enriched Caesarea with a large library, consisting of the works of Origen and other ecclesiastical writers, transcribed by himself (ib. c. 32, comp. St. Hier. de Vir. Illust. s. v.); and it was still in existence, and handy for readers, when St. Jerome wrote. [LIBRARIES.]

st. Sicut. Tisch. Proleg. ix.) other books from the same from monasteries in Palestine, Asia, Smyrna, in Patmos, and at St. Petersburg, are various of the 5th and 6th centuries of the New Testament of the one of the 7th or 8th (p. 50); of St. Chrysostom (p. 55); of the 8th (p. 56); of the 9th; and a Syriac version of the 10th (p. 64). We do not multiply examples, though very probable instances of monastic libraries in the 9th period, and of the nature of which do not amount to a direct

[W. E. S.]

The word librarius has two meanings: a 'book-seller' or a 'transcriber' concerned with it in the latter sense there must have been transcribers before Christian times, if not before the Ptolemies at the kings of Pergamus in Asia Minor, between them a million volumes in various languages (Dicit. or Geogr. art. 'Bibliotheca'). Transcribers were slaves at first, or else free, and were not well paid, complaints of their ignorance, dishonesty which occur in the works of classical authors (Wower, de Libr. Palimp., p. 2) and in the works of ap. Gronov. Thes. x. 1079). In the times of the office of transcriber in the monasteries passed into better hands. The transcriber became, strictly speaking, a scribe, but he copied far more frequent bodies than for private use, in most cases, a member of the house he worked. Thus he worked, not as a duty; and not on books carefully selected for his superiors. This altered his performances materially, to assure their preservation. In the history, that Christianity and the written records of all ages and is our sole guarantee for the truth in their present state.

Some of the first Christians who were employed as transcribers regularly for the church (Βιβλιογράφος, Euseb. E. H. ii. 17, 18), was one of the first to form a school, which Eusebius found of collecting facts for his history of his own times, by order of the emperor, had 50 choice copies of the text, by experienced calligraphers, and decorated by ornaments and quarters. De Libr. Palimp. iv. 34-7, and Vales. ad l. p. 10. The presbyter and martyr, with whom was so intimate, enriched Caesarea with a library, consisting of the works of the ecclesiastical writers, transferred to him (ib. c. 32, comp. St. Hier. de Libr. Palimp. v.). and it was still in existence for readers, when St. Jerome

[L.]

When parchment was scarce, one work was often copied to make way for another. This may have been dictated here and there by religious prejudice: but in general what was least wanted at the time made way for what was most. The Scriptures themselves, or the works of the Aeschylus—then regarded with almost equal reverence—were written over sometimes, as well as works like the Republic of Cicero—"Latent hodie," says Knittel (quoted by Blone, de Libr. Palimp. p. 2) in palimpsestis libris codices Novi Testamenti remotissimas antiquitatis: haec est prima ratio, cur magnae sint utilitatis codices rescripti."

We must never forget, in estimating their practices or productions, that Christian transcribers were of all ranks and capacities. "The highest dignitaries of the church and princes even, says Mr. Taylor (Transmission of Ancient Books, c. ii. § 5), "thought themselves well employed in transcribing the Gospels and Epistles, the Psalter, or the Homilies and Meditations of the Fathers: nor were the classical authors... neglected by these gratuitous copyists." And again: "Every church and every convent and monastery had its library, and its librarian and other officers employed in the conservation of books" (ib. c. i. § 1). Then, further, as Mr. Taylor observes, "The property of each establishment was always highly prized—passed down from age to age, as if under the hand of a proprietor: and was therefore subjected to fewer dispersions and destructions than the mutability of human affairs ordinarily permits" (c. i. § 1). And again: "The places in which the remains of ancient literature were preserved during the middle ages were too many, and too distant from each other, and too little connected by any kind of intercourse, to admit of a combination or conspiracy for any supposed purposes of interpolation or corruption. Possessing, therefore, as we do, copies of the same author, some of which were drawn from the monasteries of England, others from Spain, and others collected in Egypt, Palestine, or Asia Minor, if, on comparing them, we find that they accord except in variations of little moment, we have an incontestable proof of the care and integrity with which the business of transcription was generally conducted" (ib.).... Transcribers were frequently concealed under other names, from being attached to some special office, or else from their art having come to be divided into different branches. They were the notaries, chancellors, clerks, readers, amanuenses, of most convents, as Mabillon shews (Dipl. i. 13). St. Isidore tells us of the another distinction which is still more to the point. "Librarii," he says, "idem et antiquarii vocantur: sed librarii sunt, qui et nota et vetera scribunt: antiquarii, qui tantummodo vetera, unde et nomen sumpserunt" (Etym. vi. 14). If this be true, and other authorities might be cited for it, there was a class of copyists whose labours were confined to retranscribing old MSS.

Illuminators, again, formed another branch of the profession. They designed the initial letters, laid on the gold, or painted the miniatures. Under this last word, again, we have the record of another class: miniatores, who filled in the 'rubrics.' In general, the transcriber left blanks both for the rubrics and illuminations, as we see from many MSS. whose blank spaces have been but partially filled, or left altogether untouched. Sometimes it happened that there were transcribers who did all for themselves. Otherwise, we may occasionally find the dates of the handwriting and of the decorations separated by a wide interval. [MINIATURE.]

After a MS. had been transcribed, it passed through other hands to be corrected (Mabill. Suppl. c. xlii. 29): and the corrections in many cases not being erasures, we see what was judged erroneous, and what was judged right at the time. They are perhaps oftener corrections of the spelling, or of words omitted, than of anything else: while numerous errors of grammar are left untouched.

Handwriting, of course, varied with the age, though two or more were almost always in full use at the same time. The handwriting of the 13th century, for instance, was always much later, but it was unknown to transcribers who lived much earlier. Antiquaries could reproduce obsolete styles, but could not anticipate styles as yet unborn. Consequently, the rise of the different styles may be fixed with some accuracy; not so their duration after they had become current.

"The instruments," say the authors of the Nouv. Trait. Diplom. (p. ii. § 1. c. 10), "with which antiquity required that the work-room of a transcriber should be provided, were the ruler, compass, lead, scissors, penknife, hone, sponge, style, brush, quill or reed, inkstand or inkhorn, writing table, desk, vial with liquid for thinning ink become too thick, vial with vermilion for writing titles of books or chapters, and a box of pounce. Each of these instruments had its own special use."

Their materials were more limited. "Parchment," says Mr. Taylor (c. ii. § 1), "so called, long after the time of its first use from Pergamus, a city of Mysia, where the manufacture was improved... is mentioned by Herodotus and Ctesias as a material that had been from time immemorial used for books." Almost all the early MSS. we possess are written on this. "In the east, leaves of the mulberry or palm were used in remote times... and the inner bark of the linden or teal tree... called by the Romans 'liber,' and by the Greeks 'biblos,' was so generally used as a material for writing as to have given its name to a book in both languages... Tables of solid wood called codices, whence the term 'codex' for a MS. on any material... were also employed... leaves or tablets of lead or ivory are mentioned... and still oftener 'tablets covered with a thin coat of coloured wax; removable' by an iron needle called a style." Paper made from the papyrus in Egypt was in considerable demand at one time, but it was found to be less durable than parchment. Cotton paper, 'charta bombicina,' which began to be used in the west about the 10th century, led to the introduction of paper from rags, as at present, about two centuries later.

"Transcribers frequently subscribed their names at the end of a MS., with the year in which it was written, accompanied by a pious wish that posterity might profit by its perusal, and other particulars; numerous instances might be cited. The celebrated 'codex Amiatinus,' used by Tischendorf in his latest edition of the Vulgate of the Old Testament, has an inscription at the end of the book of Exodus, from which he infers it was transcribed by one of the disciples of St. Benedict named 'Servandus,' about A.D. 541" (Proleg. p. viii. lx.). Mabillon, in his Diarium Italicum, mentions a MS. of the Acts of the Apostles and the Epistles of St. Paul, inscribed with the name of Theophylact, presbyter and doctor of law, and dated 6492 from the Creation, or A.D. 984 (c. 25). This was in Greek. Another, the Life of St. Gregory the Great, by John the deacon, in Latin, has the following: "Ego, Ugo, indignus sacerdos, inchoavi hunc librum 8 Cal. Sept. et explevi eum 14 Cal. Oct. feliciter concurrente sesto, indict. 15." Another, a work of Matthew Palmer the poet: "Antonius, Marii filius, Florentinus civis atque notarius, transcripsit Florentinae ab originali 11 Cal. Jan. MCCCXLVIII. Valeas qui legas." . . . (Ib. and comp. c. 27.) "Qui legitis, orate pro me," was another pious and favourite parting sentence.* Most of the oldest MSS., however unfortunately, supply no such clue to their authorship or date, and there are very few that have not had later additions appended to them, often in the same handwriting, which throw doubts upon their earlier parts. Often, again, the same work has not been copied all through by the same scribe; and sometimes the writing of contemporary scribes varies as much as the writing of one age from another. Dedicatory pieces again, especially when in verse, are apt to mislead. Sometimes it is their complimentary vagueness, sometimes it is the affectation of a higher antiquity than really belongs to them, that has enhanced the value of a MS. unduly. When Waterland, for instance, speaks of the Vienna MS. as "a Gallican psalter, written in letters of gold, and presented by Charlemagne, while only king of France, to pope Adrian I., at his first entrance upon the pontificate, in the year 772" (Crit. Hist. p. 101), he draws his conclusion from the dedicatory verses in gold letters at its commencement. But these might have been written by any king Charles, on giving this psalter to any pope Adrian. And there was a combination of just such another king, and just such another pope in Charles the Bald and Adrian II.

For authorities, see Montfaucon, Palaeogr. Graeca; Mabillon, Iter Ital. and de Re Diplom. with the Suppl., Nouveau Traité Dipl. in 6 vols.; Schwarz, de Ornam. Libr., with additions by Leuchner; Casley, Pref. to MSS. in the King's Library; Mone, de Libr. pilimp.; Guéranger, Inst. Liturg. p. li. c. vi.; Labarte, Handbook, c. ii., and Arts Indust. vol. iii.; Taylor, Transmission of Ancient Books; and the magnificently illustrated works of Count Bastard, Professor Westwood, and M. Silvestre. [E. S. Fr.]

LIBRI POENITENTIALES [PENITENTIAL BOOKS].

LICERIUS (GLYCERIUS), bishop and con-

* The names of the principal caligraphers whose osmes have been preserved have been collected by Guéranger, Institutions Liturg. tom. iii. p. 288 ff.—[Ed.]

fessor at Conserans, 6th century; commemorated Aug. 27 (Usuard. Auct.; Acta SS. Aug. vi. 47). [C. II.]

LICINIUS (LAZINIUS), bishop of Angers, confessor; commemorated Feb. 13 (Uuard. Auct.; Acta SS. Feb. ii. 678); June 8 (Mart. Ado.) [C. II.]

LICTA; commemorated at Caesarea, April 5 (Mart. Hieron.) [C. II.]

LICTISSIMUS (LECTISSIMUS), martyr; commemorated in Africa Apr. 26 (Mart. Hieron.; Acta SS. Apr. iii. 415). [C. II.]

LIDORIUS (LYDORIUS, LITTORIUS, LITORIUS), bishop of Tours, 4th century; commemorated Sept. 13 (Mart. Hieron., Usuard. Auct.; Acta SS. Sept. iv. 61). [C. II.]

LIGATURAE (Ligameta, Ligamina, Alligaturae, Suballigaturae, Béreis, καταβέαις, καταβεραι, επιδικματα, επιπλατα) were amulets or phylacteries bound (ligatae) to any part of the body of man or beast, in the hope of averting or driving away evil. The name was, however, often given to amulets attached to the person in any other way; as when suspended, in which case they were sometimes called by the Greeks επιφύλακτα. This is one among many gainful superstitions which St. Chrysostom charged "certain of the vagabond Jews" (Acts xix. 13) with practising, as their fathers had done before them. Thus he says to Christians to whom they promised health by such means: "If thou persevere for a short time, and spurn and with great contumely cast out of the house those who seek to sing some incantation over, or to bind some perisupta to the body, thou hast at once received refreshment from thy conscience" (Adv. Jud. Hom. viii. § 7). The heathen were equally addicted to their use. Two or three examples out of many given by Pliny in his Natural History will suffice to shew this. Wool stolen from a shepherd, bound to the left arm, was supposed to cure fever (xxix. 4); the larged-tined horns of the stag-beetle bound to infants "acquired the nature of amulets" (xxx. 15). A stone taken from the head of an or bound to an infant relieved it in teething (ibid.). As the ox was believed to spit this stone out, if it saw death coming, its head must be cut off suddenly. These facts may serve to indicate the source of the superstition among Christians. Until the conversion of the emperors this practice was regarded by all as magic and unlawful. Thus Tertullian (A.D. 192) says of the wound caused by the bite of a scorpion, "Magic binds something round it; medicine meets it with steel and cup" (Scorpiac.). In the Apostolical Constitutions, probably compiled about the end of the 2nd century, bishops are forbidden to receive as catechumens those who "make ligaturae" (επιδικματα, viii. 32). The earliest intimation of their use by professed Christians occurs in the 36th canon of the Council of Nodice, held probably about 365: "It is unlawful for those of the sacerdotal and clerical orders . . . to make phylacteries, which are the bonds of their souls. We have ordered those who wear them to be cast out of the church." It is implied here that these "phylacteries" were bound on, i.e. were ligaturae. When Martin of Braga (A.D. 560)

ana, 6th century; commemorated
d. Auct.; Acta SS. Aug. vi. 47).

[C. H.]

(LIZINIUS), bishop of Angers, commemorated Feb. 13 (Acta; SS. Feb. ii. 678); June 8 (Mart.
[C. H.]

commemorated at Caesarea, April 5
[C. H.]

US (LECTISSIMUS), martyr; com-Africa Apr. 26 (Mart. Hieron.;
i. 415). [C. H.]

(LYDORIUS, LITTOHUS, LITOof Tours, 4th century; com-
t. 13 (Mart. Hieron., Usuard,
i. Sept. iv. 61). [C. H.]

E (Ligamentu, Ligamina, Alligaturae, δέσμις, καταβάσεις, καμμάτια, ψελλάρα) were amus bound (ligatae) to any part ing or beast, in the hope of ing away evil. The name was iven to amulets attached to the other way; as when suspended, they were sometimes called by αμμάτια. This is one among superstitions which St. Chrysostom of the vagabond Jews" (Acts raising, as their fathers had
n. Thus he says to Christians romised health by such means:
ere for a short time, and spurn
contumely cast out of the house
o sing some incantation over, or aps to the body, thou hast at reshment from thy conscience" viii. § 7). The heathen were to their use. Two or three many given by Pliny in his will suffice to shew this. Wood epherd, bound to the left arm, cure fever (xxix. 4); the large-
e stag-beetle bound to infants ture of amulets" (xxx. 15). A the head of an ox bound to an in teething (ibid.). As the ox spit this stone out, if it saw head must be cut off suddenly.
serve to indicate the source among Christians. Until the ne emperors this practice was ne magic and unlawful. Thus 192) says of the wound caused scorpion, "Magie binds, some medicine meets it with steel and In the Apostolical Constituticompiled about the end of the ops are forbidden to receive as e who "make ligaturae" (επιe). The earliest intimation of fessed Christians occurs in the Council of Laodicea, held pro-
"It is unlawful for those of d clerical orders . . . to make ch are the bonds of their souls,
h those who wear them to be urch." It is implied here that ies" were bound on, i. e. were a Martin of Braga (A. D. 580) made his collection of canons, he rendered the word "phylacteries" by "ligaturae" (can. 59; Labbe, v. 912). The words were, in fact, treated by many as synonyms, except when the Jewish practice mentioned in Scripture was intended.

Of this we shall have further proof as we proceed.
St. Epiphanius (A. D. 366) explains that the "phylacteries" of Matt. xxiii. 5 are not
"periapts," as might be supposed "from the circumstance that some called periapts phylacteries" (Haer. 15, c. Scriptus). When a distinction was made by Christian writers, the name of phylactery was restricted to those ligaturae which had writing in them. Thus Boniface at the council of Lipines, A. D. 743; "If any presbyter or clerk shall observe auguries . . . or phylacteries, id est scripturas, let him know that he is subject to the penalties of the canons" (Stat. 33). To proceed: St. Basil, in Cappadoeia (A. D. 370) seems to imply an extensive recourse to such amulets by Christians: "Is thy child sick? Thou lookest about for a charmer, or one who puts vain characters about the neck of innocent infants, or at last goest to the physician and to medicines, without any thought of Him who is able to save" (in Paulin.
xlv. 2). Gaudentius, bishop of Brescia (A. D. 385) warns his neophytes against all such practices
as among the "abominations of the Gentiles" and "by-ways of idolatry," "Deeds of witchcraft, incantations, suballigaturae, . . . are parts of idolatry" (Tract. iv. de Lect. Exodi). St.
Augustine, in Africa, speaks of our subject in writings ranging from 397 to 426. Thus after mention of several "superstitious" practices, he says, "To this class belong also all ligaturae and remedies which even the science of the physicians condemns, whether in prencations or in certain marks which they call characters, or in any object to be suspended and bound on," &c. (De Doctr. Christ. ii. 20, § 30). A reference to earrings in this passage is cleared up by another (Ep. ad Possid. 245, § 2), "The exec-crable superstition of ligatures, wherein even the earrings of men are made to serve as pendants at the tops of the ears on one side (De Doctr. Chr. in summo aurium singularum) is not practised to please men, but to serve devils."
Here, it will be observed, objects that were merely suspended are called ligaturae. In a sermon to the people the same father says, "One of the faithful is lying bed-rid, is tormented by pains; prays, is not heard; or rather is heard, but is proved, is exercised; the son is scourged that he may be received back. Then when he is tortured by pains, comes the temptation of the tongue. Some wretched woman or man, if he is to be called a man, comes to his bedside, and says, 'Make that ligature and thou wilt be well. Such and such persons (ask them) did it and were made well by it.' He yet he has a struggle. He has no strength, and conquers the devil. He becomes a martyr on his bed, crowned by Him, who for him hung on the tree" (Serm. 283, § 7). Compare a strictly parallel passage in Serm. 318, § 3. Elsewhere he says, that the "evil spirits devise for themselves certain shadows of honour, that so they may deceive the followers of Christ; and this so far . . . that even they who seduce by ligature, prencations, by machinations of the enemy, mix the name of Christ with their precautions" (Tract. vii. in Ev. Joan. § 9). Again,

"Who, by head aches, we praise thee, if thou hast put the gospel to thy head, and not had recourse to a ligatura. For the weakness of men has gone so far, and men who fly to li-gaturae are so much to be bewailed, that we rejoice when we see that a bedridden man tossed with fever and pains has placed his hope in nothing but in the application of the gospel to his head; not because it was done to this end, but because the gospel has been preferred to li-gaturae" (ibid. § 12). St. Chrysostom (398) is witness to the prevalence of the superstition both in Syria and Greece, e. g. in a homily preached at Antioch: "Who should one say of scarlet thread, and the rest, full of great folly?
 while nothing ought to be put round the child,
 who hath converted the world . . . is despised,
 and woof and warp and such ligaturae (επιαμμάτια) are intrusted with the safety of the child?" (Hom. xii. in Ep., ad Cor. § 7) "What should we say of those who use incantations and Macedonian about their heads and feet?" (Ad Ilum. Catech. ii. 5). He says of Job that he did not, when sick, "bind periapts about him" (Adv. Judae. Hom. viii. § 6); and of Lazarus that "he did not bind plates of metal (ψελλάρα) on himself" (ibid.). "Some," he says, "told about them the names of rivers" (Hom. viii. in Ep. ad Col. § 5). It appears that some alleged the compatibility of such practices with a sound belief. Hence St. Chrysostom warns his hearers, that "though they who have to do with periapts offer numberless subtle excuses for them, as that 'we call on God and nothing more,' and that 'the old woman is a Christian and one of the faithful,' it is nevertheless idolatry" (ibid.).
 He bids them as Christians make the sign of the cross, and to know no other remedy out of medicine (ibid.). Like St. Augustine he encourages the sufferer to resist the temptation to use amulets by telling him that patience has the merit of martyrdom: "Thou hast fallen into a sore disease, and there are present many who would force thee to relieve the mauldly, some
 by incantations, others by ligaturae (επιαμμάτια), some by some other means? Through the fear of God thou hast borne up nobly and with constancy, and wouldst choose to suffer anything rather than endure to commit any act of idolatry? This wins the crown of martyrdom," &c.
 (Hom. lii. § 5, in Ep. i. ad Thess. Comp. Hom.
 viii. in Ep. ad Col. u. s.). In France Caesarius of Arles (A. D. 502) denounces the use of "diabolical phylacteries hung" on the person (Serm.
 66, § 5). Gregory of Tours (A. D. 573) speaks of a harlots who "mutters charms, casts lots, hangs ligaturae from the neck" of a sick boy (Mirac. ii. 45). In another case which he relates, to expel "the noonday demon," they applied "ligamina of herbs," with incantations (De Mir. S. Mart. iv. 36). In a third, the parents of the patient, "as the custom is of country people, carried to him ligamenta and potions from the fortune-tellers and soothsayers" (ibid. i. 26). Isidore of Seville, in Gothic Spain, writing in 636, copies in his Etymologicum (viii.
 9) the passage cited above from St. Augustine, de Doctr. Christ. St. Eley, bishop of Noyen, A.D. 640: "Let no Christian presume to hang ligamina on the necks of man or any animal whatsoever, even though it be done by clerks, and it be said that it is a holy thing and contains divine lectures" (De Rect. Cath. Convers. § 5). In 742, Boniface, writing to Zacharias of Rome on the difficulties put in his way by the report of scandals tolerated in that city, says that his informants declared that they saw there among other relics of paganism, "women with phylacteries and ligaturae, bound, in pagan fashion, on their arms and legs, and publicly offering them for sale to others" (Epist. 49). The pope, in reply, says that he has already endeavoured to suppress these superstitions (Epist. i. 9). Boniface himself, the next year at the council of Liptines, sanctioned a decree for the abolition of all pagan practices. A list of them was appended to it, and in this we find, "Phylacteries and Ligaturae" (n. 10). In the 6th book of the Carolingian Capitularies is the following law: "That phylacteries or false writings, or ligaturae, which the ignorant think good for fevers and other diseases, be on no account made by clerks or laymen, or by any Christian, for they are the insignia of magic art" (cap. 72). Instead of such means, prayer and the unction prescribed by St. James are to be used. By the 42nd canon of the council of Tours (813) priests are directed to admonish the people that "ligaturae of bones or herbs applied to any mortal thing (man or beast) are of no avail, but are snares and deceits of the old enemy" (Sim. Add. iii. Capit. Reg. Franc. cap. 93). When the Bulgarians, A.D. 866, asked Nicholas I. if they might retain their custom of "hanging a ligatura around the throat of the sick," he replied, "ligaturae of this kind are phylacteries invented by the craft of the devil, and are proved to be bonds for men's souls" (Epist. 97, § 79). Probably we shall not be wrong in inferring from the foregoing testimonies that the practice prevailed at one time or another in every part of Christendom. It is also probable that it suggested the manner of many attempts to cure by those who looked solely for divine aid. E.g. St. Cuthbert (A.D. 685) sent a linen belt to the abbess Elfred, who was sick. "She girded herself with it," and was healed. The same belt "bound round" the head of a nun cured her of headache (Baeda, Vita S. Cuthb. c. 24).

In the 8th century we find a name of profession applied to those who offered to cure by means of ligaturae: "We decree that none become calculators and enchanters, nor storm-raisers, nor obligators." (See Conc. Aquagr. (A.D. 789), can. 63 (Labbe, 64); Capit. Car. M. at Lud. P. i. 62; vi. 374.) Similarly in a later law of Charlemagne (c. 40; Capit. Reg. Fr. i. 518).

[W. E. S.]

LIGHHOUSE (Pharos). The lighthouse, as a symbol of the happy termination of the voyage of life, is of frequent occurrence in the cemeteries of the early Christians. Sometimes a ship in full sail appears to be steering towards it (Baldetti, Osservazioni, p. 372, but it is often found without the ship, as in the monumental slab of FIRMIA VICTORIA (Fabretti, Inscript. Ant. p. 566), in which, appearing with the crown and palm branch, and in conjunction with the name Victoria, it plainly typifies the triumph close of a Christian career.

A kind of tower in four stories, crowned with flame, bearing an exact resemblance to a funeral pyre, is found on some imperial medals, particularly on those of Antoninus Pius, Marcus Aurelius, and Commodus (Mionnet, De la rarité et du prix des Médailles Romaines, t. i. pp. 218, 226, 241). This symbol, however, though it misled Fabretti, does not appear to have any Christian significance (Martigny, Dict. des Antig. Chret. s. v. Phare). [C.]

LIGHTNING, PRAYER AGAINST.

Among the prayers for special occasions which follow the general form of office for a Lite in the Greek church, to be embodied in it as occasion shall serve [LITE], is one to be used in the time of danger from thunder and lightning. The prayer is too long to quote; it contains a confession of sin, an appeal to God's mercy, and an earnest supplication that he would assuage the fury of the elements.

In the Roman Ritual, under the head de Processionibus, we find "Preces nō repellendam tempestatem." The order is as follows:

The bells are rung, and those who are able to attend assemble in the church, and the ordinary litanies are said, in which the clause "a folgure et tempestate, R. Libera nos Domine," is said twice; and after the litany and the Lord's prayer, Ps. 147 (147, v. 12, E. V. Laudis Jerusalem). Then follow some preces or versicles, said by the priest and people alternately, and the office concludes with five collects, and aspersion. Of the collects, the first is of an ordinary penitential character. The last four are these:

"A domo tua, quaesumus Domine spiritales nequitiae repellantur, et aeriarum discedat malignitas tempestatum."

"Omnipotens sempiterna Deus, parce metuentibus, propitiare supplicibus: ut pest nosios ignes nubium, et vim procellarum, in misericordiam transeat laudis conminatio tempestatum."

"Domine Jesu, qui imperasti ventis et mari, et facta fuit tranquillitas magna, exacti preces familie tue, ut hoc signo sanctae crucis et omnis discedat saevitia tempestatum."

"Omnipotens et misericors Deus, quo nos et castigando sanas, et ignoscendo conservas: praesta supplicibus tuis ut et tranquillitatis optatae consolatiois laetetur, et dono tuae pietatis semper utamur. Per."

The Roman missal contains a mass "contra tempestates" in which the collect is the first of these four collects, and the post-communion the last.

In the Ambrosian ritual there is a "Benedictio contra aëris tempestatem," of the same type as that in the Roman.

The clergy and people kneel before the high altar, where the tabernacle of the sacrament is opened, and after Deus in adiutorium, &c., these Psalms are said: 1, 14 [E. V. 15]; 53 [E. V. 54]; 69 [E. V. 70]; 86 [E. V. 87]; 92 [E. V. 93].

Then follow the Litanies, Pater noster, some

* This collect is quoted by Martene (ii. 502) from an old MS. of cir. A.D. 500.

† Augus opt. in missal.

It plainly typifies the triumph of the Christian career. It is in four stories, crowned with exact resemblance to a funeral some imperial medals, part of Antoninus Pius, Marcus Commodus (Mionnet, De la rarité des médailles Romaines, t. I, pp. 218, symbol, however, though it does not appear to have any appeal (Martigny, Dict. des Antiq. [C.]

PRAYER AGAINST for special occasions which is a form of office for a Live in the to be embodied in it as occasion [C.], is one to be used in the time of thunder and lightning. The to quote; it contains a couplet appeal to God's mercy, and an that he would assuage the ritual, under the head de Pro- "Preces ad repellendam tem-peris" is as follows:

g, and those who are able to the church, and the ordinary which the clause "a fulgure Libera nos Domine," is said to be a litany and the Lord's prayer, 12, E. V. Lauda Jerusalem). preces or versicles, said by the (teratately, and the office collects, and asperation. Of the s of an ordinary penitential at four are these:
I. Ihesusum Domine spiritales
II, et aeriarum discedat maligpiternae Deus, parce metuensupplicibus: ut post noxias vium procellarum, in miserilaudis comminatio tempe-

ni imperanti ventis et mari, et litas magna, exaudi preces hoc signo sanctae crucis + tia tempestatum."
misericordia Deus, quo nos et et ignoscendo conservas:
tuis ut et tranquillitatis
is laetemur, et dono tuae
nur. Per."

ritual contains a mass "contris which the collect is the first of
and the post-communion the ritual there is a "Benedictio tatem," of the same type as people kneel before the high sacrament of the sacrament is Deus in adiutorium, &c., mid: 1, 14 [E. V. 15]; 53

V. 70]; 86 [E. V. 87]; 92

Litanies, Pater noster, nome

ed by Martene (ll. 302) from an preces, and two prayers, each much longer than the corresponding Roman collects, but to the same effect, and the office ends with an aspersion with holy water at the door of the church.

[H. J. H.]
LIGHTS, THE CEREMONIAL USE OF. It may be safely affirmed that for more than 300 years there was no ceremonial use of lighted candles, torches, or lamps in the worship of the Christian church. This is evident from the language of early writers, when they have occasion to refer to the heathen practice of burning lights in honour of the gods. Tertullian, for example, A.D. 205, ridicules the custom of "exposing useless candles at noon-day" (Apol. xlii.), and "encroaching on the day with lamps" (ibid. xxxv.). "Let them," he says, "who have no light, kindle their lamps daily" (De Idolol. xv.). Lactantius, A.D. 303: "They burn lights as to one dwelling in darkness . . . Is he to be thought in his right mind who offers for a gift the light of candles and wax tapers to the author and giver of light? . . . But their gods, because they are of the earth, need light that they may not be in darkness; whose worshippers, because they have no sense of heaven, bring down to the earth even those superstitions to which they are enslaved" (Instit. vi. 2). Gregory Nazianzen, about 70 years later, says, "Let not our dwellings blaze with visible light; for this indeed is the custom of the Greek holy-moon; but let not us honour God with these things, and exalt the present season with unbecoming rites, but with purity of soul and cheerfulness of mind, and with lamps that enlighten the whole body of the church; that is to say, with divine contemplations and thoughts," &c. (C. cat. v. § 35). The reader will observe that the objection is not to the use of lights in idolatrous worship only, but to all ceremonial use of them, even in the worship of the true God.

I. There was, however, already by the end of the 3rd century a partial use of lights in honour of martyrs, which would greatly facilitate their introduction as ritual accessories to worship at a later period. We learn this in the first instance from their prohibition by the council of Illiberis in Spain, probably about the year 305: "It is decreed that wax candles be not kindled in a cemetery during the day; for the spirits of the saints ought not to be disquieted" (can. 34). By the saints we must here understand the faithful who went to the martyr's for prayer. This is the explanation of Binius, Dupin, Mendoza, and others. They would certainly be more or less distracted by the presence of the lights, and they might fear to excite the attention of the heathen by them. Many, if we may infer from the language of the writers quoted above, would be offended at the rite itself. The practice, nevertheless, maintained its ground in Spain and elsewhere. For at the beginning of the next century, we find it attacked by Vigilantius, himself a Spaniard, of Barcelona. Jerome, who replied to him, does not deny that such a custom existed. His language even shews that he did not in his heart disapprove of it; but he pleads that it was due to the "ignorance and simplicity of laymen, or at least of superstitious (religiosum) women," who "had a zeal for God, but not according to knowledge." Speaking for the church at large he says, "We do not, as you groundlessly slander us, burn wax tapers in clear light, but that we may by this means of relief moderate the darkness of the night, and watch till dawn." Yet he inconsistently defends the practice which Vigilantius condemns, comparing those who supplied the lights "in honour of the martyrs" to her who poured ointment on our Lord (Contra Vigilant. § 8).

II. In the time of St. Jerome we first hear of another practice, which would inevitably end in the ceremonial use of lights; viz. their employment as a decoration in churches on festivals. This is first mentioned by Paulinus of Nola, A.D. 407, who thus describes his own custom on the feast of St. Felix, to whom his church there was dedicated: "The bright altars are crowned with lamps thickly set. Lights are burnt odorously with waxed papyrus. They shine by night and day: thus night is radiant with the brightness of the day, and the day itself, bright in heavenly beauty, shines yet more with light doubled by countless lamps" (Poem. xiv. Nat. 3, l. 99; comp. P. xix. N. 11, ll. 405, &c.). This does not prove his common use of lights by day, but that it is made probable by another poem, in which, describing apparently the ordinary appearance of his church, he says:—

"Tectoque superna
Pendentes Lychni splris rotin-entur ahenis,
Et modo in vacuo laevis vaga lumina nutant
Fumibus: undantes flammæ levis aurs fulgunt."
Poem. xxxvii. Nat. ix. l. 389.

If such a practice prevailed in any degree during the 4th century, it probably affords the explanation needed in the well-known story of Eppiphanius, who once, when passing through a country place called Anablatha, "saw, as he went by, a lamp burning, and on inquiring what place that was, learnt that it was a church" (Epist. ad Joan. Hieros.).

III. The ritual use of lights for which such a custom prepared the way would probably have been only occasional for many ages, but for the conditions under which the worship of Christians was held during the first 300 years. Seclusion was necessary when persecution was active, and great privacy at all times. This led to their assembling after the daylight had failed, or before the sun rose. When the disciples at Troas "came together to break bread," it was evening, "and there were many lights in the upper chamber, where they were gathered together" (Acts xx. 7, 8). Pliny the younger, some 50 years later, told the emperor that the Christians were in the habit of meeting for common worship "before it was light" (Epist. lib. x. n. 97). From Tertullian (De Coronâ, iii.) we learn that it was the custom of his day to "attend the sacrament of the Eucharist in assemblies held before dawn." The fear of discovery which induced this precaution caused them also to avoid themselves of the catacombs and other subterranean places in which, while they were more free to choose their time of meeting, the natural darkness of the place itself would make artificial light essential. St. Jerome, speaking of the catacombs at Rome at a time when they were no longer in use for Christian worship, says, "They are all so dark that to enter into them is, in the language of the psalmist, like going down into hell" (Comment. in Ezek. lib.

xii. c. xl.). Some of the first churches even were, for the reason that we have indicated, built under ground. There is one still to be seen at Lyons, containing the remains of St. Irenaeus, "fort profonde et fort obscure," which is believed to be "one of the first churches in which the first Christians of Lyons used to assemble" (De Moleon, Voyages Liturgiques, p. 71). Now there is every reason to believe that the necessary lights of this period became the ceremonial lights of the next. We do not know when they ceased to be necessary. Even in the 7th and 8th centuries, the station before the celebration of the Eucharist on high festivals still began at daybreak (Ordo Rom. i. 4; ii. 1; iii. 3; Misae. Ital. tom. ii.). They could hardly be needed to give light at that time; but a mystic meaning, already attached to them, must have led to their retention. The following is a description of their use in a pontifical mass of that period. When the bishop left the secretarium, he was preceded by 7 acolytes, each bearing a lighted wax candle (Ordo R. i. 8; ii. 5; iii. 7). As they came near the altar, they divided, 4 going to the right, and 3 to the left, that he might pass through. When the deacon went to the ambo to read the Gospel two of the lights were carried before him in honour of the book which he bore in his hands (i. 11; ii. 8; iii. 10). Our earliest authority now quoted does not tell us whether the lights were extinguished at any part of the service; but according to the next in date they were "extinguished in their place after the reading of the Gospel" (ii. 9). This was clearly a reminiscence of their original use. From the first two we learn that after the Kyrie the acolytes set the candle-stands (cero-stata) on the floor (i. 26; ii. 5; comp. v. 6). The second further tells us that they were put "4 on the right and 3 on the left, or (as some will have it) in a row from south to north" (ii. 5). At a later period they were set "so as to form a cross" (vi. 5). After the Collect they were in the earlier age put "in one line from east to west, in the middle of the church" (ii. 6). In a later, we find them when extinguished set behind the altar (v. 7)—a practice which, in conjunction with the need of light at an early celebration, in due time paved the way for the introduction of altar-lights. The earliest document to which we have here referred is supposed by Ussher, Cave, and others to have been compiled about the year 730; but it evidently did not create all the rites which it prescribes. We therefore assume that those now described were practised at Rome at least during the latter part of the 7th century.

IV. To the same period we may, on the same grounds, refer the office of the TENEBRAE in its first stage. It was celebrated on the night before Good Friday. One-third of the lights in the church were extinguished after the first psalm of Nocturnus; another third after the second, and the remainder, with the exception of seven lamps, after the third. These seven were extinguished at Matins; the first on the right side of the church, when the antiphon before the first psalm was heard; the second, on the left, at the end of the psalm, "and so on either side alternately down to the Gospel, i. e. the Benedictus; but at the Gospel the middle light is put out" (Ordo, i. 33; comp. App. § 2).

V. The Paschal Light (Paschal Post, Cereus Paschalis) is heard of at an earlier period. We have an almost certain reference to it in the Liber Pontificalis, where we are told (n. 42), that Zosimus, A.D. 417, "gave permission for the blessing of candles in the suburbicarian dioceses." Some copies (Concil. Surii, Annal. Baronii) even read cereum Paschalem here, and the passage can hardly refer to anything else. This was the tradition of Siegbert of Gemblours; "Zosimus the pope orders a wax candle to be blessed throughout the churches on the holy Sabbath of Easter" (ad ann. 417; Biblioth. PP. vii. 1358). Similarly Leo Ostleensis, Chron. Cassin. iii. 31). Two forms for the benediction of the Paschal Light were composed by Ennodius, who became bishop of Ticino in 511. They are still extant (see his works by Sirmund, Opusc. 9, 10, p. 453). Gregory the Great, writing in 605 to a bishop who was sick, says, "Let the prayers which in the city of Ravenna are wont to be said over the wax candle, and the expositions of the gospel which are made by the bishops (sacerdotibus) at the Easter solemnity, be said by another" (Epist. xi. 28, al. 33).

From the first Ordo Romanus (about 730) we learn that on Maundy Thursday, at the 9th hour, a light was struck from flint in some place outside the basilicæ at the door, if there was no oratory, from which a candle was lighted and brought into the church in the presence of the congregation. A lamp lighted "from the same fire" was kept burning until Easter Eve, and from that was lighted the wax candle which was solemnly blessed on that day (Ordo Rom. i. 32). Zachary, who became pope in 741, in a letter to Boniface of Mentz, says that "three lamps of great size (so lighted) placed in some more secret part of the church, burned to the third day, i. e. Saturday." He adds that oil for them was collected from every candle in the church, and that "the fire for the baptism of the sacred font on Easter Eve was taken from those candles" (Ep. zil. Labbe, Conc. tom. vi. col. 1525). It will be observed that lamps and candela are here synonymous. From the fragment of a letter of Hadrian I. A.D. 772, to the monks of Corbie, we learn that the priests and clerics did not put on their stoles and plaquettes on Easter Eve "until the new light was brought in that the wax candle might be blessed" (Comment. Praev. in Ord. Rom. Mabill. Mus. R. tom. ii. p. cil.). The blessing was pronounced by the archdeacon (Rabanus, de Instit. Cler. ii. 38).

There are two forms of the Benedictio cerei in the Gregorian Sacramentary (Murat. Liturg. Rom. Vet. tom. ii. col. 143). The former of these is also found in the Missale Gothicum (Liturg. Gallic. p. 241), in the Missale Gallicanum (Ibid. p. 357), and again in the Besaçon Sacramentary discovered by Mabillon at Bobio (Mus. Ital. tom. i. p. 321). This may be thought to prove that the rite was derived to France from Rome.

In Gothic Spain and Languedoc, both the prayers and ceremonial differed from those of Rome. The clergy assembled, not on Maundy Thursday, but Easter Eve at the 9th hour in the processus, a chamber connected with the church, and in small churches identical with the sacrum. There the deacons received 12

Light (Paschal Post, Cereus of an earlier period. We certain reference to it in the where we are told (n. 42), 417, "gave permission for the in the suburbicarian dioceses." St. Suri, Ann. il. Buroni) even chalem here, and the passage anything else. This was the bert of Gemblours: "Zosimus a wax candle to be blessed urches on the holy Sabbath of 417; Biblioth. PP. vii. 1358. iensis, Chron. Cassin. iii. 31, the benediction of the Paschal eed by Eanodlus, who became 511. They are still extant Sirmond, Opusc. 9, 10, p. 453. , writing in 605 to a bishop "Let the prayers which in na are wont to be said over d the expositions of the gospel d the bishops (sacerdotibus) at y, be said by another" (Epist.

Ordo Romanus (about 730) we Sunday Thursday, at the 9th truck from flint in some place at the door, if there was no ch a candle was lighted and urch in the presence of the lamp lighted "from the same rning until Easter Eve, and ighted the wax candle which d on that day (O. do Rom. i. o became pope in 741, in a of Mentz, says that "three (so lighted) placed in some of the church, burned to the rday." He adds that oil for d from every candle in the d the fire for the baptism of Easter Eve was taken from o. zil. Labbe, Conc. tom. vi. be observed that lampas and nonymous. From the frag of Hadrian I. A. D. 772, to the ve learn that the priests and on their stoles and plaucete all the new light was brought adle might be blessed" (Com-Ord. Rom. Mabill. Mus. It. The blessing was pronounced (Rabanus, de Instit. Cler. ii.

forms of the Benedictio cerei in ramentary (Murat. Liturg. col. 143). The former of l in the Missale Gothicum (241), in the Missale Gallica- and again in the Besanoen vered by Mabillon at Bobio n. 321). This may be thought rite was derived to France and Languedoc, both the onal differed from those of r assembled, not on Maundy rter Eve at the 9th hour in chamber connected with the all churches identical with ere the deacons received 12

wax candles from the bishop, who retained one for himself. They then entered the sacrum, where the bishop himself proceeded to strike the flint. A candle (candela) was first lighted with the fire thus obtained, and a lamp (lucerna) was then lighted from the candle. They then returned into the processus, where the bishop took his seat. He next lighted his own candle from the lamp which a deacon had brought from the sacrum, and the deacons then lighted theirs, also from the lamp. The deacon who held it then received a blessing from the bishop, for which no words were prescribed; and the bishop said an "Oratio ad benedicendam lucernam." They then entered the church in procession, the deacons with their lights preceding the lamp, the bishop and presbyters following it. As they entered the choir they sang an antiphon (Lumen verum, St. John i. 9) with versicle (populus qui sedebat, St. Matt. iv. 16) and gloria. The bishop or a priest next goes to the altar and says a prayer "ad benedicendum cereum." After this the deacons, who are themselves to bless the paschal lamp and candle, receive a benediction from the bishop, which is to fit them for that office. They then, while the bishop is in his chair behind the altar, and the presbyters are standing by him, solemnly pronounce a long form of blessing (benedictio lucernae) given in the sacramentary. A similar benedictio cerei followed, and the bishop then comes in front of the altar, and proceeds with the service of the day (Missale Mozarabicum, Leslie, pp. 174-178).

The benediction of the lamp appears to have been peculiar to this office, and the prayer is said by Elipandus, A. D. 792, to have been composed by Isidore of Seville (Epist. ad Alcuin. § xi. inter Opp. Alc.). He quotes a passage in it: "Induit carnem, sed non exiit majestatem," &c. by which we are enabled to identify it. See Miss. Moz. p. 178. It is certain that the 4th council of Toledo, A. D. 633 (can. 9), at which Isidore presided, recognised both the paschal lights:—"The lamp and the candle are not blessed in some churches on Easter Eve, and they inquire why they are blessed by us. We bless them solemnly because of the glorious sacrament of that night; that in the benediction of the hallowed light we may discern the mystery of the sacred resurrection of Christ, which took place on this votive night. And forasmuch as this rite is practised in churches in many lands, and districts of Spain, it is fit that for the unity of peace it be observed in the churches of Gallicia."

At Rome there was a singular custom in connexion with the paschal candle which, so far as we have been able to discover, was not adopted elsewhere. The number of years from the crucifixion was inscribed on it. Bede (De Tempor. Ed. c. 45) records such an inscription, which had been copied at Rome by some pilgrims from England, viz.: "From the passion of our Lord Jesus Christ ars 668 years."

The paschal candle played a considerable part in the baptisms which took place on Easter Eve. When the font was blessed, "at the invocation of the Holy Spirit, which the priest pronounces with a loud voice, i. e. with deep emotion of mind, the candle that has been blessed, or those that have been lighted from it, are put down into the water to shew the presence of the Holy Ghost"

CHRIST. ANT.—VOL. II.

(Pseudo-Alcuin, de Div. Off. Hittorp. col. 259): Only the lower part was immersed (ibid.), while the whole, when lighted, represented Christ the pillar of light; the part not yet burning, but ready to furnish the means of light, symbolised the Holy Ghost (Amal. Var. Lect. Hittorp. 1447). This was the baptism of the font mentioned above by Zachary. When the catechumens had been baptized, an unlighted candle was put into the hand of each. Litanies were then sung in the Roman ritual (probably only Ayris), and then the Agnus Dei, during which the precursor gave the word, "Light up," and the candles of the neophytes (Amalar. de Antiqu. c. 44; Pseudo-Alcuin, Hitt. col. 260), and all throughout the church (Ord. Rom. i. 45; Amal. ibid.), were at once lighted. Till that moment the lamps and candles of the church were not lighted for three nights, "to teach us," says the archdeacon of Rome to Amalaricus (u. s.), "to turn away from joyfulness to sadness," as "joy was quenched in the hearts of the disciples of Christ so long as he lay in the tomb" (Amal. ibid.). They were lighted at the Agnus to shew that every one ought to receive light through that "Lamb that taketh away the sins of the world" (Amal. de Eccles. Off. i. 30). The mass of the resurrection began after the lighting of the candles (Ord. Rom. i. 45, and Append. 10; Amal. de Antiph. c. 44; Rabanus, de Instit. Cler. ii. 38). For "the seven white days," i. e. until Low Sunday, the newly baptized were daily present at the celebration of the Eucharist in their white robes and with their candles in their hands (Alcuin, Ep. ad Car. Magn. in Hittorp. col. 300; Raban. u. s. cap. 59). The symbolism is thus explained: "The eight days of the neophytes represent the course of this present life. For as the Hebrew people, after passing the Red Sea, entered the land of promise, trampling over their foes, preceded by fire throughout their journey by a pillar of fire, so our baptized, their past sins done away, are daily led to the church preceded by a lighted pillar of wax" (Pseudo-Alc. u. s. col. 262).

VI. We first hear of these baptismal lights in the 4th century.* Zeno of Verona, A. D. 380, speaks of the "salt, fire, and oil, and poor tunic" given to the newly baptized (Tract. i. xiv. 4). St. Ambrose, 374, addressing a lapsd virgin, says: "Hast thou forgotten the holy day of the Lord's resurrection in which thou didst offer thyself to the altar of God to be veiled? In so great and so solemn an assembly of the church of God, amid the blazing lights of the neophytes, among candidates for the kingdom of heaven, didst thou come forward as if to become the bride of the King" (De Lips. Virg. v. 19). Gregory Nazianzen, in a discourse delivered on Easter Day about 385: "Our white dresses sad light-bearing yesterday, which we celebrated both privately and publicly, all conditions of men nearly,

* Cyril of Jerusalem, A. D. 350, has been supposed to mention these lights: "The call to be soldiers of Christ, and the lamps that lead the bride home, and the desire of the kingdom of heaven. . . . have been yours" (Catech. Praef. l.); but he is speaking, not to the baptized, but to competentes, and by the bridal lamps he means those motions of the Holy Ghost and spiritual instructions which had lighted their way to Christ, and to the entrance of His kingdom.

and every high officer, illuminaing the night with abundant fire," &c. (In S. Pascha, xlv. § 2). About the year 500, a large number of Jews were converted at Auvergne, and we are told by Gregory of Tours, 573, that at their baptism "candles blazed, lamps shone, the whole city was bright with the white-robed flock" (Hist. Franc. v. 11). At the request of Gregory, Fortunatus wrote a poem on the event (Poem. v. 5), from which we may cite the following lines:—

"Indique rapta manu lux cerea provocat astrum:
Credas ut stellis tre trabendo comas.
Lacteus hinc vest color est; hinc lae pede fulgor
Ductor, et vario lumine picta dies."

We should infer from this that at baptisms of great interest others, beside the neophytes, carried lights. This is confirmed by the account which an eyewitness gives of the baptism of Theodosius the Younger, A.D. 401: "All were in white, so that you might fancy the multitude covered with snow. Illustrious patricians went before, and every dignitary with the military orders all carrying wax lights, so that the stars might be supposed to be seen on earth" (Marcus Gaz. Epist. ad Arcad. apud Baron. ad ann. § 28). The symbolism of these lights is thus explained by Gregory Nazianzen to some candidates for baptism: "The lamps which thou wilt kindle are a mystical sign of that lamp-bearing from thenceforth, wherewith we, bright and virgin souls, will go forth to meet the Bridegroom" (Orat. xl. in Senat. Bapt. § 46).

VII. The gospel lights, to which incidental reference has been made, are first heard of in the 4th century. St. Jerome, A.D. 378, tells us that, "through all the churches of the east, when the gospel is to be read, lights are kindled, though the sun is already shining; not, indeed, to dispel darkness, but to exhibit a token of joy; . . . and that under the figure of bodily light, that light may be set forth of which we read in the psalter, 'Thy word is a lantern unto my feet, and a light unto my paths'" (Cont. Vigilant. c. iii.). In the west the custom is first mentioned by Isidore of Seville, writing in 636, which makes it probable that it travelled to Roma through Spain, as several other rites appear to have done. He says (Symol. vii. xii. 29), "Those who in Greek are called acolytes are, in Latin, called cerotarii, from their carrying wax candles when the gospel is to be read, or the sacrifice to be offered; for these lights are kindled by them, and carried by them, not to dispel darkness, for the sun is shining the while, but for a sign of joy, that under the form of bodily light may be represented that light of which we read in the gospel: 'He was the true light.'"

VIII. There is ample evidence of the use of lights, both stationary and processional, at funerals in every part of the Christian church. When the body of Constantine lay in state, "they lighted candles on golden stands around it, and afforded a wonderful spectacle to the beholders, such as was never seen on the earth under the sun since the world was made" (Euseb. Vita Constant. iv. 66). Gregory Nyssen, A.D. 370, speaking of his sister's funeral, says that "No small number of deacons and sub-deacons preceded the corpse on either side, escorting it from the house in orderly procession, all holding wax candles" (De Vita S. Marianne, in fin.). From

Gregory^b Nazianzen, we learn that the rite was in frequent, if not general, use at this time; for referring to the burial of Constantius, he says: "He is carried forth with the acclamations and escort of the people, and with these our solemn rites, viz. hymns by night, and torch-bearing, with which we Christians are wont to honour a religious departure" (in Julian. Invect. ii. Or. v. 16). St. Jerome, of the obsequies of Paula, A.D. 386: "She was borne by the hands of bishops, who even put their shoulder to the bier, while other pontiffs carried lamps and candles before her (Ad Eustoch. Ep. cviii. § 29). St. Chrysostom: "Tell me what mean those shining lamps. Do we not conduct them (the dead) forth as athletes?" (in Epist. ad Hebr. c. 2; Hom. iv. § 5). When the remains of Chrysostom himself were removed from Comana to Constantinople in 438, "the assemblage of the faithful covered the mouth of the Bosphorus at the Propontis with their lamps" (Theodoret. Hist. Eccl. iv. 36; comp. 34). At the funeral of St. Germanus of Auxerre, A.D. 447, "the multitude of lights beat back the rays of the sun. I maintained their brightness even through the day" (Constant. in Vita S. Germ. ii. 24; ap. Surium, Jul. 31). When Euthymius died in Palestine, A.D. 467, the patriarch of Jerusalem "went down to the laura himself, and transferred, with accompaniment of lamps and psalms, that holy body of the blessed one to the abode which he had himself built, trusting it to his own hands alone" (Euthymian Vita, c. 112; Eccl. Gr. Monum. ii. 296, Cotel.). Corippus, the grammarian, describing the ceremonial at the funeral of Justinian, A.D. 565, says that, "a thousand stands of gold and silver with candles set on them filled the halls," and that when the corpse was taken out for burial, "the whole populace went out in procession from the palace, the mournful bands burning funereal torches" (De Laet. Justin. Min. iii. 9, 38).

At Paris, in 555, king Guntram buried a murdered grandson "with the decoration of innumerable candles" (Greg. Turon. Hist. Franc. vii. 10). When queen Radegund was buried at Poitiers in 587, "the freewomen, who carried candles (cereos) before her, all stood round the grave. Every one gave her name inscribed on her candle. They all, according to the order prescribed, gave the candles to one of the servants. A dispute arises among the people; some said that the candles themselves ought to be put into her holy tomb; others said not" (Vita St. Radeg. auct. Baudouvia, cap. v.; Boll. Acta SS. Aug. 13). The question was settled by one of the candles leaping out of the hands of the servant who held them, and falling at the feet of the corpse.

IX. From this use of lights the transition was easy to leaving them in the sepulchre, or near the grave, when the nature of the place admitted of it. We accordingly often read of candles in the martyria or oratories erected

^b Gregory (Orat. vii. 15) has been quoted as if that his mother carried a lamp at the funeral of her son Caesarius, but the original has, not λαμπροφορία, but λαμπροφωρία, and tells us that she wore a shining white dress. The error is due to the old Latin translation, which gives "cereorum gestatione" as the equivalent to λαμπροφωρία. See edit. Morell. Or. x. tom. i. p. 166.

, we learn that the rite was general, use at this time; for of Constantius, he says: "with the acclamations and, and with these our solemn by night, and torch-bearing, Christians are wont to honour a" (In Julian, Tract. ii. Or. v. of the obsequies of Paula, A.D. ene by the hands of bishops, shoulder to the bier, while ed lamps and candles before Ep. cviii. § 29). St. Chryso- at mean those shining lamps. t them (the dead) forth as t. ad Hebr. c. 2; Hom. iv. § mains of Chrysostom himself Comana to Constantino in ge of the faithful covered the orus at the Propontis with odoreti Hist. Eccl. iv. 36; funeral of St. Germanus of the multitude of lights beat ep. Sirmium, Jul. 31). ed in Palestine, A.D. 467, the em "went down to the laura red, with accompaniment of hat holy body of the blessed which he had himself built, own hands alone" (Enthyria Gr. Monum. ii. 296, Cotel). marian, describing the cere- of Justinian, A.D. 565, and stands of gold and silver them filled the halls," and he was taken out for burial, ce went out in procession e mournful bands burning De Louv. Justin. Min. iii.

king Guntram buried a mur- with the decoration of innu- Greg. Turon. Hist. Franc. vii. Rade Gund was buried at the freewomen, who carried her, all stood round the gave her name inscribed on all, according to the order candles to one of the ser- vices among the people; some themselves ought to be put others said not" (Vita St. nivia, cap. v.; Boll. Acta SS. tion was settled by one of out of the hands of the ser- vants, and falling at the feet of

of lights the transition was in the sepulchre, or near nance of the place admitted gly often read candles in tories erected

15) has been quoted as a lamp at the funeral of her son nal has, not λαμπάδες, but us that she wore a shining white e to the old Latin translation, gestatione" as the equivalent to Morell. Or. x. tom. i. p. 169.

mains of martyrs. We have already seen this forbidden in the daytime by the council of Illi- beris, about 305, because it tended to distract those who resorted to them for prayer. St. Jerome, as we have also seen, owns and defends the practice, though ascribing it to weak and ignorant persons. We may cite an instance from the Dialogues of Gregory, A.D. 595. That author relates that St. Peter once appeared to the sacer- dot, not long deceased, of the church dedicated to him at Rome, and in which the saint's body lay, when he had risen at night "to trim the lights by the entrance" (lib. liii. c. 24). Gregory's sug- gested explanation is, that he did so in order to shew that he was always cognizant of, and always ready to reward "whatever was done out of reverence for him." Gregory of Tours tells us that two emergents entering a monas- tery at Mallineum (Maillet-Lallier), decla ed that it contained the tomb of St. Solemois, and said: "When you have found it, cover it with hang- ings, and burn a light." Miracles followed the discovery, and we read that one person who had been cured of an ague, "having prayed and lighted candles, held them in his hands throug- out the night, keeping vigil there" (De Glor. Conf. 21). A lamp gave perpetual light at the tomb of St. Marcellinus of Iverdun (ibid. c. 69), and of St. Marcellus of Die in Dauphny (ibid. 70). The oil in both these instances was sup- posed to be endued with miraculous power. Franco, bishop of Aix, A.D. 566, having been plundered by a powerful neighbour, is said to have addressed St. Merre, before whose tomb he had prostrated himself, in these words: "Neither light shall be burnt here, nor psalms sung, most glorious saint, unless thou first avenge thy servants of their enemies, and restore to holy church the things by force taken from thee" (ibid. 71).

X. The next step, naturally, was to treat any supposed relic of the saint, however small, with similar tokens of veneration. In the 5th cen- tury, we read of a man who had been cured of lameness after praying in a church where relics of St. Stephen and other saints were thought to be preserved, "lighting candles and leaving his staff there" before he went home (Erodius, de Mirac. St. Steph. i. 4; App. vi. Opp. Aug.). Gregory of Tours having dedicated an oratory, removed thither from a church relics of St. Euphronius and others, "candles and crosses shining" as they went (De Glor. Conf. 20). In another oratory at Tours were alleged relics of John the Baptist, before which a lamp burnt, the oil of which bubbled miraculously (Mirac. i. 15). The bishop of a certain sea-town in the east, hearing that some relics of St. Julian were in a ship that had just arrived, "moved the people to go in procession to the port with lighted torches" (ibid. ii. 33). During an epidemic at Rheims in 546, a relic of St. Remigius was carried through the city "with lighted candles on crosses, and with candlesticks" (De Glor. Confess. 89). Lights fixed on crosses were an invention of St. Chrysostom, who employed them in those nocturnal processions which he instituted at Constantinople to counteract a simi- lar custom of the Arians (Socrates, Hist. Eccl. vi. 8).

XI. Lights before relics were naturally fol- lowed by lights before images, when the lat'er began to be madly honoured. There are no in- stances, however, earlier than the 6th century. Some MSS. of Gregory of Tours relate a miracu- lous cure performed with oil from a lamp before the picture of St. Martin in a church at Lavenna (De Mirac. St. Ma t. i. 15). This proves, at least, that the practice was known to the writer, while its novelty and partial distribution may be inferred from the fact that Paulus Warnefrill, tell- ing the same story, says that "there was an altar in honour of St. Martin, with a window near it, in which a lamp was set to give light" (De Gest. Longob. ii. 13). In the east, J. ha Moschus, A.D. 630, tells the story of a hermit who, when about to visit any holy place, used to set a candle before the picture of the blessed Virgin, trust- ing to her to keep it burning until he returned (Pratum Spirit. c. clv.). In 715, Germanus, Patriarch of Constantinople, writing to another bishop, says: "Let it not scandalize some that lights are before the sacred images and sweet perfumes. For such rites have been devised to their honour. . . . For the visible lights are a symbol of the gift of immaterial and divine light, and the burning of sweet spices of the pure and perfect inspiration and fulness of the Holy Ghost (Ep. ad Thomam, in Labbe, Conc. vii. 313). In 787, the second council of Nicea gave its sanction to the practice already popular by a decree that "an offering of incense and lights should be made in honour" of the icons of Christ, of angels, of the blessed Virgin, and other saints (Labbe, u. s. 556). This was one of the practices which even the more moderate of the emperors opposed to image worship en- deavoured to put down (Epist. Mich. Bah. ad Ludov. Pium in Decreta de Cultu Imag. Gold- ast. p. 619).

XII. During the last three centuries of our period, a custom prevailed of offering candles to God, and at length to the saints, with prayer for recovery from sickness, and other benefits. E.g. a girl who had been long ill made a candle of her own height, which she lighted and held burning, "by the help of which (God pitying her in the name of the holy woman St. Rade Gund), the cold was expelled before the candle was consumed" (Vita St. Rudoy, § 32; Venant. Fortun. A.D. 587; compare the Life by Baudon, § 20). Gotselin, the monk who, in the 9th century, wrote a life of St. Augustine of Canterbury, when relating the cure of a cripple, says, that he had received from a charitable woman "a light to offer" to the saint (§ 2, Acta SS. O. B. tom. i.). By the council of Nantes, A.D. 660, all persons were forbidden "to make a vow or to carry a candle or any gift when going to pray for their health, except at the church to the Lord their God" (can. 20). The object, it must be explained, was to put down heathen superstitions, not to dis- courage saint-worship. In the life of St. Sabas, ascribed to Cyril of Scythopolis, A.D. 553, there is a story of a silversmith who, having been robbed, "went immediately to the martyrdom of St. Theodore, and for five days supplied (and gave, and remained there night and day weeping at the rails of the bema" (§ 78, Cotel. Mon. Græc. iii. 355).

XIII. Candles were also offered as a token of thankfulness for mercies received. For example, when Justin the Younger, on his accession, went with the empress to a public service of thanksgiving, they both offered frankincense and candles (Corippus, u. s. ii. 9, 71; comp. v. 317). A wax candle was offered at the tomb of St. Eucherius of Orleans, A.D. 738, by a woman whom he had converted (Vita S. Eucher. § 10; Acta SS. O. B. iii. 599).

XIV. The Liber Pontificalis (Anastat. Bib. vth. n. 85) tells us that Sergius I, A.D. 687, ordered that on the feast "of St. Simeon, which the Greeks call Hypapante, a litany (i.e. procession) should go forth from St. Adrian's, and the people meet it at St. Mary's." The Greeks had observed the feast for some time (with what ceremonies we cannot say); but this appears to be its introduction at Rome. Sergius was a Syrian of Antioch by birth, and was more likely to bring in an eastern custom than many of his predecessors. This feast (Feb. 2) was afterwards called the Purification of St. Mary, and was marked by so profuse an use of lights that it acquired the name of Visa Luminum (Candlemas). Lights are not mentioned in the above account, nor by the interpolator who in the 9th century or later adapted Gregory Nyssen's Sermon de Occursu Domini to the feast; but they were so common in processions at Rome, that they were probably carried in it from the first; especially as the words of Simeon (Luke ii. 32) suggested them as appropriate to the occasion. The earliest witness to their use however is Bede, 730, who says that the festival took the place of the old lustrations of February: "This custom of lustration the Christian religion did well to change, when in the same month, on the day of St. Mary, the whole people with the priests and ministers go in procession through the churches and suitable parts of the city with the singing of hymns, all carrying in their hands burning wax lights, given them by the pontiff" (De Temp. Rat. 10). The only other witness before the death of Charlemagne is Alcuin, in a sermon (in Hypapanti; § 2) before that prince: "The solemnity of this day, while it is unknown to some Christians, is held by many in greater honour than the other solemnities of the year; but above all in that place, where the Catholic Church has obtained the primacy in its chief pastor, is it held in so great reverence, that the whole populace of the city collected together, shining with huge lights of wax candles, celebrate the solemn rites of masses, and no one without a light held in his hand enters the approach to a public station;—as if, in sooth, being about to offer the Lord in the temple, yet, to receive also the light of faith, they are outwardly setting forth by the sacred symbolism (religione) of their offering that light wherewith they shine inwardly" (Baluz. Miscell. ed. Mansi, ii. 52). Martene and others have cited similar references to the lights of this festival, which, if genuine, would be earlier than Bede, from homilies ascribed to St. Eloy, bishop of Noyon, A.D. 640, and Hildephonsus, bishop of Toledo, 657; but those homilies are by careful critics assigned respectively to the 9th and 12th centuries. See Oudin in an.

It will be observed that Bede speaks of the candles as "given" by the bishop of Rome. He does not say "blessed." Similarly, Pseudo-Alcuin (De Div. Off. Hittorp. 231): "They receive all a single wax candle from the hand of the pontiff." Annularius, A.D. 827 (De Ecol. Off. iv. 33) and Rabanus, 847 (De Instit. Cleri. ii. 33), also mention the lights, but not any benediction. Nor can we find any form of blessing in any sacramentary written before the 9th century. There is one in a Tours missal of that age, but so inferior in composition that it can hardly be older than the missal itself. We give it here:—"A Prayer at the Blessing of the Lights. O God, the true light (lumen), propagator and author of the light (lucis); everlasting, pour into the hearts of Thy faithful the brightness of perpetual light (luminis); and (grant) that whosoever in the holy temple of Thy glory are adorned with lamps of present lights, being purified from the contagions of all vices, may be able to be presented unto Thee, with the fruit of good works, in the temple of Thy heavenly habitation; for the," &c. (Martene, de Ant. Eccl. Rit. iv. 13, 5). [W. E. S.]

LILIOSA, martyr; commemorated Aug. 27 (Usuard. Mart.); Bede as LIBIOSA same day.

LILY. Though this flower may be considered as a scriptural symbol from St. Matt. vi. 28, no particular meaning seems to have attached to it at any early date. The spina of that passage may be the scarlet anemones which every traveller must have observed in the Holy Land during the spring, or rather, as the writer is inclined to fancy, the delicate and lovely cyclamens which flower in great plenty in both spring and autumn in the valley of Jehoshaphat. The early Christian decorators made little generic distinction in the wreaths of flowers they painted or carved on graves. The lily was used from the earliest times from viotto and the early Florentine Renaissance, and would then refer to the red or white Giglio of the city arms. The subject of the Annunciation, so frequently treated from the earliest Byzantine or Lombard-Romanesque dates, would sooner or later bring the favourite flower of Florence and of France* in special pictorial relation to the blessed Virgin. In later days, it is considered as the lily of the tribe of Judah, and accordingly forms a symbolic essential to pictures of the Annunciation (Guénebault, Dictionnaire des Monuments, &c.). But as a symbol, carved or painted, it is either ethnic or mediæval, though used to convey the idea of virginal beauty in Cant. ii. 2, 16, &c. Its connexion with the lotus, dwelt on by Auber (Symbolisme, iii. 546), is not made out, and appears to be simply architectural, and founded on the convex or concave form of the bells of capitals of columns (1 Kings vii. 19, 22). See Ruskin, Stones of Venice, ii. 128, 242, 137.

The following meanings are attached to the lily in the Clavis attributed to Melchior Sarda (Spicilegium Solemnense, iii. p. 101). It is fairest of flowers, and so resembles him (Cant. ii. 1). It is golden on white, as his petals and six leaves, both perfect flowers, representing perfect deity and humanity. It possesses both beauty and medicinal virtue ("membris medetur austus"), and so resembles the mother of God, who has pity on sinners.

* A earlier than Philip Augustus (Auber, op. cit. p. 547).

wax candle from the hand of carius, A.D. 827 (De Eccl. Off.
 847 (De Instit. Cleri, II, 33), lights, but not any benediction.
 any form of blessing in any time before the 9th century.
 Tours missal of that age, but position that it can hardly be of itself. We give it here:— Blessing of the Lights. O at (lumen), propagator and (lucis) everlasting, pour into faithful the brightness of (ummis); and (grant) that holy temple of Thy glory are of present lights, being contagions of all vices, may be unto Thee, with the fruit of the temple of Thy heavenly
 " &c. (Martene, de Ant. Eccl.
 [W. E. S.]

tyr; commemorated Aug. 27
 Bede as LIBIOSA same day.

in this flower may be central symbol from St. Mett. vi.
 meaning seems to have atearly date. The spira of
 be the scarlet anemones ilder must have observed in ring the spring, or rather, as used to fancy, the delicate and which flower in great plenty autumn in the valley of Jehuy Christian decorators made tion in the wreaths of ted or carved on graves.
 the lily may probably date
 early Florentine Renaissance, or to the red or white Giglio of subject of the Annunciation, and from the earliest Byzantine esque dates, would sooner or ourite flower of Florence and icial pictorial relation to the later days, it is considered ible of Judah, and accordingly essential to pictures of the debutant, Dictionnaire des Monu-
 a symbol, carved or painted,
 or mediæval, though used to
 of virginal beauty in Cant. ii.
 onexion with the lotus, dwelt Solismæ, iii. 546), is not made be simply architectural, and avex or concave form of the of columns (1 Kings vii. 19, Stones of Venice, ii. 128,

meanings are attached to is attributed to Melchior Solemnense, iii. p. 171.
 wers, and so resemble is golden on stipes, has leaves, both persons of et deity and humanity. It auty and medicinal virtue r adustus"), and so resembles d, who has pity on anti-

Phillip Augustus (Auber, to

Its green signifies humility; its whiteness, chastity; its golden hue, charity. It is the holy church; it is the glory of immortality; it is the Holy Scriptures, with reference to Cant.
 iv. 5; and a variety of impertinences of symbolism, which have been its weak side, and the base of religious art, from a distressingly early date in the history of religion and art alike.

[R. St. J. T.]

LIMINIUS, martyr, in Auvergne, circ. A.D.
 255; commemorated Mar. 29 (Acta SS. Mar. iii.
 769).

[C. H.]

LINFENTIUS, confessor near Tours, 6th century; commemorated Jan. 25 (Acta SS.
 Jan. ii. 628).

[C. H.]

LINUS (1) Bishop and martyr at Tyre;
 commemorated Feb. 20 (Mart. Usuard.).

(2) Bishop of Rome, martyr; commemorated
 Sept. 23 (Usuard. Auct.; Ado, Mart. Append.; Acta SS. Sept. vi. 539), and Nov. 26 (Mart.
 Usuard.; Vet. Rom. Mart.). One of the saints of the Gregorian canon.

[C. H.]

LIOBA (LEOBGYTHA, TRUTHGEBRA), abbess, circ. A.D. 780; commemorated Sept. 28 (Mart.
Ado, Append., Usuard. Auct.; Acta SS. Sept. vii.
 748).

[C. H.]

LION. It is difficult, as Ciampini admits (Vet. Mon. tab. 17), to attach specially Christian meaning to the form of an animal which has been an ethnic or universally human symbol of strength and courage from the earliest records of Egypt and Assyria. As part of a composite form, the shape of the lion is connected with the cherubic symbol. [See CUERUB in Smith's Dict. of the Bible.] The twelve lions of Solomon's throne (1 Kings x. 19, 20), to which Ciampini alludes, were intended of course as emblematic sentinels, after the fashion of Assyrian imagery; and he also notices that the eagle is used in the same manner, often in company with the lion, apparently for state and ornament alone. It is pretty certain, however, that the ideas of watchfulness and vigour, or authority in the faith, were connected with the leonine form, as it not unfrequently occurred in Christian churches, especially under Lombard rule. It is placed at the doors, very frequently as a solid base to small pillars in the porch, or tympanum;
 and also at the foot of ambons or pulpits; as a symbol no doubt of watchfulness, or even of wakefulness, according to the tradition of the lion's sleeping with open eyes. The lions of the gate of Mycææ may be an instance of ancient Greek use of the form in this sense. To this effect Martigny quotes Alciati's Emblema (Dolice Ital. Pælarum, p. 20, Francof. 1558):
 "Est leo, sed custos, oculis qui dormit apertis; Templorum idcirco ponitur ante fores."

It is natural, of course, that archaeologists of all dates should wish to attach a specially Christian symbolism to the lion-form. But, as Ciampini shews, the principal sculptures of the subject are of early pre-Christian date; he gives two, in particular, from ancient Egypt (Vet.
Mon. i. tab. 17), and the same associations have attended the image of the king of beasts from the first records of ideas. By the early church, it was adopted, like the originally ethnic images of the shepherd, the vine, or the fish; though not sanctioned, like them, by the Lord's use of the image.

Lions are sometimes represented as grasping the "hystrix" or porcupine, or holding a small human figure in their claws, apparently with tenderness, in the latter case (see Ciampini). The hystrix will in this case represent the power of evil, the human form the race of mankind. The Veronese griffin, mentioned by Prof. Ruskin (Modern Painters, vol. iii. ch. viii.
 p. 106), holds a dragon in his claws to typify victory over evil by the angelic powers.

On a gem figured vol. i. p. 715, the lion and serpent are represented on each side of a dove, which is placed on a wheat-sheaf, bears the olive branch, and evidently represents the church.
 This Mr. King considers an illustration of the precept to be wise as serpents, and harmless as doves; though it seems possible that the idea of contest with the lion and adder, the young lion and the dragon, may be connected with it. This subject, though rare, occurs in a Vatican ivory from the abbey of Lorch, part of the binding of its ancient Evangelii; and again in Gori (Theat. Diptychorum, vol. iii. lv.).

For the lions as attendant on Daniel, on sarco-phagi and elsewhere, see Bottari, passim.

[R. St. J. T.]

From Bottari, 'Sacramentary of Gallone.'

LIPHARDUS (1) (LIETHPHARDUS), bishop of archbishop of Canterbury and martyr; circ.
 A.D. 640; commemorated Feb. 4 (Bede, Mart., Auct.; Acta SS. Feb. ii. 492). [LIPHARDUS.] Bede
 has Liphard under both days.

(2) (LIPHARDUS), of Magdunum (Meun); commemorated June 3 (Mart. Hieron.; Bede, Auct.; Usuard. Auct.; Acta SS. June, i. 298).

[C. H.]

LIPPIENSE CONCILIIUM. [PADERBORN,
 COUNCIL OF.]

LIPSTADT, COUNCIL OF. [PADER-
 BORN.]

LIPITINENSE CONCILIIUM. [LESTINES,
 COUNCIL OF.]

LITANY (Litania, Litania v. Letania). A litany is strictly any united prayer and supplication in the churches or assemblies of the faithful. "Litania, quæ Latine Rogatio dicitur, inde et Rogationes." Ordo Romanus. By the word, however, is usually understood a form of alternative prayer, intercessory or deprecatory, and of a penitential character, containing invocations to the Holy Trinity and to the saints, in which the people respond to each clause of the priest by the repetition of a short and expressive formula.

Litanies date from the earliest times of settled forms of Christian worship. Originally they were confined to the liturgy, properly so called; but in course of time, as forms of public prayer developed themselves, they are more frequently found apart from the liturgy, and appropriated to occasions of more than ordinarily earnest and penitential supplication, and specially associated with processions, during which they were repeated. Hence the procession itself was often called litanía.

The word is sometimes spelt "letania," and some have drawn a distinction between the two forms, and argued that letania means a day appointed for special rejoicing. "Laetum ac festivum diem significat." The words are, however, generally, and probably always, used as synonyms.⁵

The earliest and simplest form of Litany is the Kyrie Eleison, repeated three,⁶ six,⁷ twelve,⁸ forty,⁹ or more times. Mabillon (Comm. in Ord. Rom. i. 2, p. 34) describes a procession in which the people chanted alternately three hundred times Kyrie Eleison, Christe Eleison; and the Capitulary of Charlemagne (vi. c. 197) directs that during the funeral office, if the people do not know the Psalms, the men should repeat Kyrie Eleison and the women Christe Eleison while they were being chanted.

The expression has been thought by some to have been suggested by a sentence of Arrian (Comment. de Epicteti Disput. ii. c. 7), "Calling upon God we beg of Him κύριε ἰσχυρόν." It occurs however with slight variations in the Old Testament, and was in use in the Christian church before the date of the sentence just quoted. It has been used in the ecclesiastical offices of all nations, and from the earliest times. It is found in the liturgies of St. James, of St. Mark, and of the Greek Fathers, as well as in those of the Armenians, Syrians, and other Oriental Christians, whose rites are among the oldest extant, and who repeat it in the vernacular.

There is some uncertainty by whom it was introduced into the Latin Church. The chief writers on Ritual¹⁰ attribute the introduction to Gregory the Great. But the custom appears to have been in use before his time, as the 5th canon¹¹ of the 2nd council of Vaison, in the time

⁵ v. Pappenbrock, Acta Sancti. Jun. 28, in S. Leon. II., where he gives his reasons.

⁶ Augusti (Chris. Arch. 10. 33) says, "Aber dieser willkürlich gemachte Unterschied scheint nur auf einem Wortspiele zu beruhen."

⁷ As in the daily offices, passim.

⁸ As in the litanies after Terce on certain days, in the Ambrosian use.

⁹ As after the hymn at Lauds, and in Lent at the end of Vespers in the same use, and in Vespers of the Greek church.

¹⁰ As in the daily night and day hours of the Greek church.

¹¹ e. g. Micrologus, Amalarius.

¹² There is some confusion in the canons of the two councils of Vaison (Vasio, in Gallia Narbonensis); the first was in the time of Leo the Great, A.D. 442.

of Felix IV. (A.D. 529), seems to shew, which speaks of the Kyrie Eleison as being then established in all the provinces of the East and of Italy, and directs it to be used in the churches of Gaul; and Gregory himself (lib. 7, Ep. 64), in answer to some who spoke of him as wishing to introduce the rites of the church of Constantinople into that of Rome, says: "We neither have hitherto said, nor do we now say, Kyrie Eleison, as it is said by the Greeks" [now neque diximus, neque dicimus, &c.], and then he points out the double distinction: (1) that with the Greeks the whole congregation say it together, whereas with the Romans the clergy and people say it alternately; and (2) that the Roman use is to repeat Christe Eleison as often as Kyrie Eleison has been said, which the Greeks never do.

The words were always said by the Latin church in Greek, for which practice different symbolical reasons have been given. St. August. (Ep. 178) compares it with the use of the Greek Homoousion, and remarks that as by the word Homoousion the unity of substance of the Trinity is confessed by all believers, so by that other, Kyrie Eleison, the nature of the One God is invoked by all Romans and barbarians. The words were said after the Intruit, but originally the number of repetitions was not prescribed, but Kyrie Eleison was repeated by the choir until the presiding prelate directed it to be changed into Christe Eleison: "Schola vero, finita Antiphonia, ponit Kyrie Eleison, Prior vero scholae custodit ad Pontificem ut ei annuntiet si vult mutare¹² numerum Letaniae!" (Ordo Rom. v. noni. 6).

It appears that in the 9th century the number of repetitions was prescribed (v. Amalarius, de Div. Off. iii. cap. 8), and by the 12th century at latest was established at nine, i.e. Kyrie Eleison (thrice), Christe Eleison (thrice), Kyrie Eleison (thrice). At this number it has since remained. Various symbolical reasons have been assigned for this number, on which it is not necessary to dwell. In the Ambrosian rite Kyrie Eleison is said thrice after the Gloria in Excelsis, thrice after the Gospel, and thrice at the end of the mass.

It has been questioned to whom the invocation is to be considered as addressed. When the form Kyrie Eleison alone is used, the prevailing opinion appears to be that it is addressed to the second person in the blessed Trinity, and Anastasius Sinaiticus¹³ (Contemp. in Hexaemeron. lib. vii. cont.), referring to Dionysius the Areopagite,¹⁴ says that God the Word was properly called Lord (Dominus, Kύριος), after and with reference to the Incarnation, and the dominion which He thereupon received. "He is called Lord [Dominus, nempe Kύριος] because He has the Lordship [ex eo quod κυριεύει]. Rightly, therefore, and fittingly and suitably, when God the Word in His advent to man took flesh and was seen upon earth, was He also called Lord. For previously He was called God (θεός), as being the over-creator (θεωπρῆξις) of the world."

¹ In the Ambrosian rite the invocation Christe Eleison is very rarely found, and only in borrowed forms.

² Other-wise called "mutare Litaniam."

³ i. e. In alteram formulam, sc. Christe Eleison.

⁴ Vid. Biblich. Mus. Patr. vol. xiv.

⁵ Id. vol. ii.

1.), A. D. 529, seems to shew, Kyrie Eleison as being then the provinces of the East and as it to be used in the churches gory himself (lib. 7, Ep. 64), who spoke of him as washing tes of the church of Constantino of Romo, says: "We neither, nor do we now say, Kyrie d by the Greeks" [nos neque mus, &c.], and then he points ctinction: (1) that with the congregation say it together, Romans the clergy and people and (2) that the Roman use te Eleison as often as Kyrie l, which the Greeks never do, always said by the Latin for which practice different ave been given. St. August. it with the use of the Greek marks that as by the word y of substance of the Trinity believers, so by that other, nature of the One God is mans and barbarian. The or the Interit, but originally titions was not prescribed, was repeated by the choir prelate directed it to be te Eleison: "Schola vero, oant Kyrie Eleison, Prior ad Pontificem et de amant numerum Letanial" (Ordo

the 9th century the number escribed (v. Amalarius, de and by the 12th century at d at nine, i. e. Kyrie Eleison ion (thrice), Kyrie Eleison mber it has since remained, reasons have been assigned which it is not necessary to rosian rite Kyrie Eleison is Gloria in Excelsis, thrice l thrice at the end of the eed to whom the invocatio addressed. When the form used, the prevailing opinion is addressed to the second Trinity, and Anastasius Si- Hexameron, lib. vii. cont.), the Arcopagite," says that properly called Lord (Do- and with reference to the dominion which He there- is called Lord [Dominus, se He has the Lordship [ex Rightly, therefore, and y, when God the Word in ook flesh and was seen upon illed Lord. For previously (és), as being the overseer be the invocation Christe Eleison only in borrowed form, are Litaniarum." Antiphonari, sc. Christe Eleison, Antiphonari, vol. xiv.

When Christe Eleison is interposed, the invocation is usually considered to be addressed successively to each of the persons in the Trinity (see Amalarius, lib. iii. 6, and iv. 2; and S. Tho. Aquin. Summus, part iii. qn. 83, art. 4).

We have entered at some length into the use of Kyrie Eleison, as these words are the germ of all litanies. We will now proceed to their use and development.

I. As to the use of litanies in the Liturgy. In the Greek liturgies from the earliest times long intercessory prayers, broken into clauses, each with the same beginning, and responded to in the same words, have formed part of the introductory or proanaphoral part of the liturgy. In the Clementine liturgy, these prayers begin as follows. They are called "The Bidding of Prayer over the Faithful" (προσφώνησις ἐπὶ τῶν πιστῶν).

"Let us pray for the peace and the stability of the world and of the holy churches, that the God of the universe may give us His perpetual peace which cannot be taken away; that He would keep us to the end of our lives in the fullness of piety and godliness. Let us pray for the holy Catholic and Apostolic Church throughout the world, that," &c., and so on; the successive petitions comprising prayers for the diocese, the bishop and clergy, the married, the single, relations, travellers, captives, slaves, enemies, those who are in error, infants, &c.

Here no response is given at the end of each clause, but each begins with the same form, Let us pray for (ὁρίε . . . δεηθῶμεν).

In the Liturgy of St. James these prayers occur in the same position as in the Clementine liturgy, shortly before the beginning of the Anaphora. They are of precisely the same nature, though differently worded. They are called the catholic and universal collecta or synapte (συναπτή); and, after a few opening words by the deacon, begin thus: "That God may send peace from heaven; that He may be gracious unto us, and preserve our souls, Let us beseech the Lord," and so on for twelve such clauses, each ending Let us beseech the Lord (τοῦ Κυρίου δεηθῶμεν), and the last followed by κύριε ἐλέησον (thrice).

In the liturgies of St. Basil and of St. Chrysostom these prayers are the same for each. They occur in both at the opening of the liturgy, before the prayer of the first antiphon.

The deacon says: "Let us beseech the Lord in peace."

"R. Kyrie Eleison.
"Deacon. For peace from above, and for the salvation of our souls, let us beseech the Lord."

"R. Kyrie Eleison.
"For the peace of the whole world, for the stability of God's holy churches, and the unity of them all, let us beseech the Lord."

"R. Kyrie Eleison.
and so on, the petitions making mention of all ivers of men, for the king, his court and army, for success in battle, for fine weather, for the fruits of the earth, &c. These prayers are called in the rubrics, εἰρηναῖα, because of the introduction, "Let us beseech the Lord in peace," the first petition in all of them, as will be seen in the examples given, being for peace. They are also known as διακονικά, because said by the deacon; as συναπτή [Collecta], because their form, as it were, a concatenation of petitions fitted together into one; or as Ectene (ἐκτενή), because they are ordinarily long. They were recited by the deacon from the Ambo.

In the Armenian liturgy a litany of the same character, except that the response is not always the same, is said by the deacon and the choir alternately, immediately after the Trisagion, and before the lessons from Scripture, and the Creed.

In the West, missal litanies were also common. It was usual to say them immediately after the Kyrie on those days on which Gloria in Excelsis was not said, and this custom continued until the 9th century. They contained prayers for all estates of men, and were of the same character as the Greek.

An old form contained in a MS. at Fulda, and called a missal litany, begins thus:

- "Let us all say with our whole heart and mind,
- " O Lord hear and have mercy [Domine exaudi et miserere].
- "Thou who beholdest the earth and makest it tremble,
- " We beseech Thee, O Lord, hear and have mercy.
- "For profoundest peace and tranquillity of our times,
- " We beseech Thee," &c.
- "For the holy Catholic Church, which is from the borders of the world unto the ends thereof,
- " We beseech Thee," &c.

and so on for 15 clauses.

In the Ambrosian liturgy, the missal litany is still said on the Sundays in Lent, immediately before the Oratio super populum, which corresponds with the Roman collect for the day. There are two litanies, of which one is used on the first, third, and fifth Sundays in Lent, the other on the alternate Sundays. They are framed entirely on the Greek model; often in almost the same words. They are said by the deacon, the choir responding. The first runs thus:

- "Imploring the gifts of divine peace and indulgence with our whole heart and soul, we beseech Thee,
- " Lord, have mercy.
- "For the holy Catholic Church, which is here, and is dispersed throughout the whole world, we beseech Thee
- " Lord, have mercy," &c., &c.

The original of this litany, which is a good specimen of missal litanies, is as follows:

- "Divite pacis et indulgentiæ munera supplicantes ex toto corde et ex tota mente precamur te,
- " Domine miserere" (repeated at the end of each clause).
- "Pro Ecclesia sancta Catholica, quæ hinc et per universum orbem diffusa est, precamur Te." [These two words repeated at the end of each clause.]
- "Pro Papa nostro III. et Pontifice nostro III. et omni clero eorum, omnibusque Sacerdotibus ac Ministris, precamur Te.
- "Pro famulis Tuis III. Imperatore, et III. Rege, Duce, milite, et omni exercitu eorum,
- "Pro pace Ecclesiarum, vocations gentium, et quiete populum,
- "Pro civitate hac et conservatione ejus, omnibusque habitantibus in ea,
- "Pro aeris temperie ac fructu et fecunditate terrarum,

» The English word collect conveys quite a different notion.
» This must be distinguished from the Sanctus of the liturgy.
» Sc. III.

o Gear. Not. in S. Chryso. Lit.

"Pro virginibus, viduis, orphanis, captivis, ac poenitentibus,

"Pra navigantibus, iter agentibus, in carceribus, in claustris, in metallis," in exillis constitutis.

"Pro his qui diversis instrumentibus detinentur, quique spiritibus vexantur inmundis,

"Pro his qui in Sancta Ecclesia Tua fructus misericordiae largiuntur.

"Exaudi nos Deus in omni oratione atque deprecatione nostra,

"Dicamus omnes, Domine miserere."

The other litany is of precisely the same nature, but worded differently.

In the Mozarabic liturgy, missal litanies, called preces, are said on the first five Sundays in Lent, after the psallendo, which follows the prophecy, or Old Testament lection, and before the epistle. There is no essential difference of character in them from those hitherto mentioned, though prayers for mercy for the particular congregation occupy a larger space, and there is a much greater number and variety in them. They also have a distinctly rhythmical and stanzaic character, and an approximately accentual scansion, which a few corrections of the text, often corrupt, would probably restore throughout. Those for the first, second, and third Sundays are addressed to the Saviour; those for the fourth and fifth are put into His mouth. Their rhythmical character is clearly seen in the following opening of that for the second Sunday in Lent, which is in accentual iambic lines:

"Preces. Miserere et parce clementissime Domine

populo tuo: Quia peccavimus Tibi.

Prostrati omnes lacrymas productimus,

Pandentes Tibi occulta quae admisimus

A Te Deus veniam deposcimus.

R. Quia peccavimus Tibi.

"Orationem sacerdotum accipe,

Et quaeque postulant (? possunt) affluenter tribue,

Ac Tuae plebi miserere Domine.

Quia peccavimus Tibi."

And so on for nine such stanzas.

Or in that for the third Sunday:

"Rogamus Te, Rex Saeculorum, Deus Sancte,

Jam miserere, peccavimus Tibi.

Audi clamorem, Pater altissime,

Et quae precamur, clemens acribus,

Exaudi nos Domine. Jam miserere, &c.

Bone Redemptor, supplices quae sumus,

De toto corde flentes, requirimus

Adiuste propitius. Jam miserere, &c."

And so on for seven stanzas.

That for the fourth Sunday begins thus:

"Vide Domine humilitatem meam, quia erectus est inimicus

"R. Miserere Pater Juste et omnibus indulgentiam dona."

"A Patre misus veni

Perditos requirere,

Et hostes captivos

Sanguine redimere,

Plebs datus subjecti ma.

R. Miserere, &c.

"Fraedictus a Prophetis

Natus sum ex Virgine,

Assumpsit formam servi

Dispensos colligere,

Venantes esperunt me.

R. Miserere, &c."

And so on for nine stanzas, recounting the incidents of the Passion.

In the Roman liturgy these litanies did not establish themselves permanently. None appear

* A very frequent petition in these litanies.

† In the office books they are printed without distinction of lines.

in the sacramentary printed by Thom. (v. 1. v.) which cannot be later than the end of the 6th century.*

The interpolated or forced kyries, said at the mass instead of the simple kyrie on certain days, hardly come within our limits of time; but a reference to them, in connexion with the subject before us, may be allowed. They were common in the Middle Ages, and probably were intended to assist the devotion and bring out the mystical signification of the words. A few are printed in an edition of the Roman missal of Paul III., with the heading "Sequuntur quaedam devota verba super Kyrie Eleison, Sanctus, et Agnus Dei, ibi ob pascebam nonnullorum Sacerdotum devotionem posita, quae licet non sint de ordinario Rom. Eoc., tamen in certis missis ibidem annotatis licite dicendae." These interpolated kyries were called "tropes."

The following is appointed for festivals, other than those of the highest class:

Kyrie. Rex genitor Ingenite, vera essentia, Eleison.

Kyrie. lumen fons, rerumq; conditor, Eleison.

Kyrie. qui nos tuae imaginis signasti specie, Eleia. v.

Christe Deus formae humanae particeps, Eleison.

Christe lux ortus per quem sunt omnia, Eleison.

Christe qui perfectus es sapientia, Eleison.

Kyrie. Spiritus vivificus, vitae vis, Eleison.

Kyrie. Utique visor in quo cuncta, Eleison.

Kyrie. expurgator scelorum et largitor gratiae, quae sumus propter nostras offensas non nos relinquere, consolator dolentis animae, Eleison.

II. In other of the daily offices of the church, litanies of the same description as those in the liturgy often occur. For instance, in the Greek church a litany, whether called "synapte" or by any other name, is said in the daily office of nocturns, and at great vespers of a vigil at the office of lighting of lamps. They also form part of many of the offices of the church contained in the euchology.

In the Ambrosian office, litanies are said (among other days) after terce on Wednesdays and Fridays in Lent ("litaniae post tertiam"). These consist mainly of a series of penitential antiphons, divided into two parts by invocations to saints and two collects, and other forms.

The Mozarabic daily offices abound in short litanies, of the same nature as those in the mass. They are placed at the end of most of the offices in Lent and on days of penitence. They are in most cases evidently rhythmical, and are addressed to the Saviour.

The following is from terce on Tuesday in the fourth week in Lent, and is a fair specimen:

* Among other reasons (1) because Filius does not appear in the mass; (2) because there are no masses for Thursday in Lent, which (on the authority of Anas-tasius) Gregory II. instituted early in the 8th century, and (3) because masses for some festivals are wanting which were instituted early in the 7th century.

† They were in common use in England, and are said by some to have been introduced by Bede, and twentynine are given from the various missals. The Sarum missal directs that on all double feasts throughout the year one of the following Kyries (which are there given), with its verses (cum suis versiculis), shall be sung at the choice, within certain limits, of the precentor. It is said they were in use in Sicily in the middle of the last century. The one given in the text is found in the Sarum and Hereford missals.

ary printed by Thom ...
not to later than the end of

l or forced kyries, said at the simple kyrie on certain days,
in our limits of time; but a in connexion with the subject allowed. They were common s, and probably were intended and bring out the mystical e words. A few are printed the Roman missal of Paul III.,
"Sequuntur quaedam devota
e Eleison, Sanctus, et Agnus
lam nonnullorum Sacerdotum
quae licet non sint de ordina-mento in certis missis libere entiae." These interpolated
"tropes."

appointed for festivals, other highest class:

ingenite, vera essentia, Eleison.
renuque conditor, Eleison.
magisne signati specte, Eleison.
humane particeps, Eleison.
quae sunt omnia, Eleison.
se sapientia, Eleison.
lice, vita vis, Eleison.
por in quo cuncta, Eleison.
celorum et largitor gratiae, quae-nistras offensas non nos relinquere, tis animae, Eleison.

the daily offices of the church,
e description as those in the
For instance, in the Greek whether called "synapte" or is said in the daily office of reat vesper of a vigil at the lamps. They also form part ices of the church contained an office, litanies are said after terce on Wednesdays ("Litaniae post tertium").

ly of a series of penitential into two parts by invocations ollects, and other forms.
daily offices abound in short nature as those in the mass.
the end of most of the offices s of penitence. They are in ly rhythmical, and are ad-ur.

From terce on Tuesday in the e, and is a fair specimen:

... because Filioque does not ... because there are no masses for
... (on the authority of Amatus
... early in the 8th century
... for some festivals are wanting
... early in the 7th century.
... non use in England, and are said
... introduced by Bede, and twenty-
... various missals. The Sarum
... all double feasts throughout the
... Kyries (which are three given),
... versulenti), shall be sung at the
... of the precentor. It is said
... in the middle of the last cen-
... the text is found in the Sarum

Preces. Dicamus omnes: Misereere nobis Deus.
R. Misereere nobis.
V. Tu Redemptor, Jesu Christe, salva mundum Tuum morto. R. Misereere nobis.
Qui pro nobis es perensatus, et inique Judicatus.
R. Misereere nobis.
Qui ligatus crucem portas, et in cruce Patrum vocas.
R. Misereere nobis.
Cujus latens perfoditur, et humilitas ardetur.
R. Misereere nobis.

The "miserationes" said at compline on week days in Lent are of the same nature. There is a different form for each day in the week.

III. The typical form of litany differs from those already noticed. It was, moreover, appropriated to other occasions of prayer, and used at other times than the ordinary liturgy or daily offices,
and especially in connexion with processions.

The original and simplest form was, as we have seen, Kyrie Eleison and its repetitions.
The smallest and most usual number of these repetitions was three, in the place of the second of which the Roman church, at an early period, substituted the form Christe Eleison. To this introduction was added an invocation to each Person of the Blessed Trinity severally and to all collectively, with miserere nobis at the end of each clause. Then followed invocations to the Blessed Virgin, angels and saints, each with ora pro nobis. Then "deprecations" from various evils, spiritual and temporal, each followed by Libera nos Domine; supplications for the church, and all estates of men, each followed by Te rogamus, audi nos; the whole series concluding with the Agnus Dei thrice repeated, with the three successive responses—Parce nobis Domine; Exaudi nos Domine; miserere nobis. Then Christe audi nos; Christe exaudi nos; Kyrie, &c.; Pater noster, a few "preces" (said alternately),
a psalm, or disconnected verses of psalm, said
consecutively, and sometimes called "cantica,"
and the whole concluded with prayers or collects (orationes), mainly for forgiveness and protection.

This is the outline of a Roman litany in its full development. The names of the saints invoked varied with the place, or the occasion, or the service, as in the Ambrosian litanies in Lent, already referred to, in which they vary with each litany. The list was always headed by the Virgin and the heavenly host. The Agnus Dei was added in the 9th or 10th century.
According to some authorities the essential parts of a litany, without which no form of prayer is properly entitled to the name, are the invocation of saints, and the Christe audi nos, &c., at the end of the supplications.

The following litany is found, under the title Litania Romana, in an old MS. sacramentary of Gregory the Great. It was doubtless adopted in some church or churches of Gaul, as appears from the introduction of the names of some saints who were not specially venerated at Rome (S. Maurice, † A.D. 286. S. Germanus, † A.D. 448, &c.), and from the petition for the Emperor of the Franks.

Incepit Litaniam Romanam.
Kyrie Eleison .. ter. S. Philippe .. va.
Christe audi nos .. ter. S. Bartholomaeae .. va.

Letter from J. M. Tommasi to Eras. Gattola, abbat and librarian of Montecassino, dated Rome, 1690.

Sancta Maria, ora pro S. Mattheae .. ora. nobis. S. Simon .. ora.
Sancto Michael .. ora. S. Thadlaee .. ora.
S. Gabriel .. ora. S. Mattiaee .. ora.
S. Raphael .. ora. S. Marce .. ora.
S. Johannes .. ora. S. Barnaba .. ora.
S. Petro .. ora. S. Marce .. ora.
S. Paulo .. ora. S. Luca .. ora.
S. Andrea .. ora. S. Stephane .. ora.
S. Jacobo .. ora. S. Cletus .. ora.
S. Johanne .. ora. S. Clemente .. ora.
S. Thoma .. ora. &c. &c.
S. Jacobo .. ora. &c. &c.

[And so on for 101 names.*]

Omnes Sancti .. ora. Orate pro nobis.
Propitius esto .. ora. Parce nobis Domine.
Propitius esto .. ora. Libera nos Domine.
Ab hoste malo .. ora. Libera.
A periculo mortis .. ora. Libera.
Per crucem tuam .. ora. Libera.
Peccatores .. ora. Te rogamus audi nos.
Ut pacem nobis dones .. ora. Te rogamus.
Ut sanitatem aeris dones .. ora. Te rogamus.
Ut fructum terrae nobis dones .. ora. Te rogamus.
Ut aeris temperiem nobis dones .. ora. Te rogamus.
Ut domum Apostolicum illi in sancta religionis conservare digneris, Te rogamus.
Ut domum Imperatorem de exercitum Francorum conservare digneris, Te rogamus.
Ut cunctum populum Christianum pre-tioso sanguine tuo redemptum conservare digneris, Te rogamus.
Ut iram tuam ab eo auferre digneris, Te rogamus.
Fili Dei, Te rogamus.
Agnus Dei qui tollis peccata mundi, Miserere nobis.
Christe audi.
Kyrie eleison.

Later forms of litanies are fuller, but in character do not differ from the earlier.

In the early Latin church various kinds of litanies were distinguished by different names.
The principal of these were—

1. The greater litany (litaniam major), called also the sevenfold litany (litaniam septiformis).

This is said to have been instituted by Gregory the Great, A.D. 590, to be observed on St. Mark's day (April 25), for the purpose of averting the Divine wrath on the occasion of a pestilence then ravaging the city. In a sermon preached the day before, he urged the people to come at daybreak the next day with contrite heart and amendment of life to the sevenfold litany, for which he then proceeds to give directions. It was so called from its being divided into seven litanies or processions, each of which started from a different church, and singing litanies on their road, all met in the church of St. Mary the Great. "Let the litany" (i.e. the procession), he continues, "of the clergy proceed from the church of St. John the Baptist; the litany of men from the church of St. Marcellus the Martyr; the litany of monks from the church of SS. John and Paul; the litany of the handmaidens of God from the church of the Blessed Martyrs Cosmas and Damian; the litany of married women from the church of the Blessed Stephen the Protomartyr; the litany of widows
from the church of the Blessed Martyr Vitalis;
the litany of the poor and infants from the

* The number of these invocations was sometimes much larger. A litany of the church of Tours, assigned to a date not later than A.D. 800, has more than 300.

church of the Blessed Martyr Cecilia" (S. Greg. Ep. lib. ii. 2). In another passage Gregory speaks of Litanies as already in existence, and their observance as familiar to the people:—"The return of this annual devotional celebration reminds us, beloved brethren, that we ought, by the help of God, to celebrate with earnest and devout hearts the litany which is called by all the greater (major)."

But there is an uncertainty. It may well be that Gregory found some litanies on a smaller scale in existence, and developed them. These litanies on St. Mark's day are still observed in the Ambrosian rite.

2. There were the litanies on the three Rogation days. These are said to have been instituted by St. Mamertus, archbishop of Vienne, A.D. 477. St. Avitus, his disciple, Sidonius Apollinaris (lib. i. 7, &c.), and Gregory of Tours (Hist. Franc. lib. ii. c. 34), relate the circumstances. The latter says there had been a great and destructive earthquake in the city of Vienne, which also suffered from war and wild beasts, and that as Mamertus was celebrating mass on Easter Eve, the royal palace in the city was struck with fire from heaven (divino igne) and destroyed. Upon this, he ordered litanies, with fasting, for the three days previous to Ascension Day. The rite was adopted in other French churches, and enjoyed by the council of Orleans, A.D. 511. These litanies were not introduced into the church of Rome till the pontificate of Leo III. (A.D. 795-816). In Spain they were received still later. According to Ambrosian use, they are not observed on the original days of their institution, as is supposed on account of our Lord's words, "Can the children of the bridechamber fast, while the bridegroom is with them," &c. (St. Mark, ii. 19), but a week later, i.e. on the Monday, Tuesday, and Wednesday in the octave of the Ascension. The litanies are said after terce as on the days in Lent, and are of the same description, but somewhat longer. In the Mozarabic breviary the four days next before Pentecost are appointed as days of fasting—"ad exorandum Dⁿⁱ nostrum J. C. pro peccatis nostris, ac pacem impetrandam vel pro sacris lectionibus audiendis; et ut veniat Spiritus Paraclitici, et munda nostra reperiat habitacula Ecclesiam Dⁿⁱ. frequentemus" (Lib. in Brev. Moz.). The ordinary service is modified by the addition of short preces at the end of terce, sext, and none.

There is some variation in the name by which the litany of the Rogation days is known. At first it seems to have been called, in Rome at least, letania "minor," partly to distinguish it from the litany on St. Mark's day, which was always called "major," and to which the epithet was appropriated, and partly, possibly, as suggested by Durandus—"quæ minorem nacta sit auctorem; non Romanum Pontificem, sed Mamertum Viennæ Allobrogum Episcopum." These litanies, however, were soon called "major," as in the council of Metz, can. 33, A.D. 813—"Pneuit nobis ut Litania major observanda sit a cunctis Christianis diebus tribus," &c. Me-

* This sevenfold order is said to have been kept up at Tours as late as the 17th century, the clergy of the seven churches in the city starting each from their own church and meeting in the abbey church of St. Martin.

nardus also says (in Litania major): "Hæc Litania major est Rogationum, quæ in triduo ante Dominicam Ascensionem celebranda," &c. It was also sometimes called Galleiana, from the country in which it was instituted, while the litany on St. Mark's day was called Romana.

The directions for the order of the Litany and procession on the Rogation days are given very fully from a MS. ceremonial of the Church of Vienne by Martene, iii. 126, and also the Litanies themselves for each day from a MS. ordinary of the church of Lyons. They present no peculiar features, but are interesting as pointing out clearly where the Stations occur, and at what churches. They are always said after Terce. After the ordinary litany, in which no psalm is said (Nulla dicitur capitula sed orationem tantum), Sext is said, the processional office continuing with more invocations and antiphons, and at the last station of the day None is said, and then Mass. Afterwards the procession returns, saying alternately certain preces, and the whole terminates with the "Litany for any trouble" [Letania de quacunque tribulatione].

Litanies of the same character were said in some churches at other times. Thus the Mozarabic breviary prescribes Litanies and days of fasting on the Jejunium calendarum Junii, i.e. the three days next before the Epiphany, for three days before the festival of St. Cyprian [Sept. 13], and for three days before that of St. Martin [Nov. 11], called Jejunium calendarum Novembris, as well as on certain other week days.

The Ambrosian rite also appoints Litanies for the week days of the last week in Advent, called Feriae de Exceptato.

3. Certain Litanies were also called septenary, quinary, ternary (septena, quina, trina). They were thus said at the fast on Easter Eve:

The first subdeacon begins Kyrie Eleison, then the second repeats Kyrie Eleison, and so on till the seventh.

Then the first begins Christe Eleison, and so on till the seventh.

Then the first begins Christe audi nos, and so on till the seventh.

And the whole litany is gone through in the same manner, each clause being repeated seven times, once by each of seven subdeacons. In the Invocations of the saints, seven names are recited out of each order of saints (dicuntur de quolibet choro septem sancti), seven from the apostles, seven from the martyrs, seven from the confessors, and seven from the virgins.

Then follows the quinary litany, said in the same manner by five subdeacons, the names of five saints being recited from each order, and then the ternary, said in the same manner by three.

Litanies were also used at baptisms, at administering extreme unction, and on other occasions, which it is not necessary to specify.

In a MS. Pontifical of Salzburg, the following metrical litany occurs:—

Rex sacrorum Angelorum, totum mundum adjuva,
Ora primum tu pro nobis, Virgo mater Germinis Et ministri Patris summi, ordines Angeli.

Rex Sanctorum.

Supplicate Christo regi, coetus Apostolorum,
Supplicesque permagnum sanguis fusus Martyrum.

Rex Sanctorum.

Rex Sanctorum.

(
u
l

v

u cl
of pr
de re
bo
vo
ka
T
dec cat
Im
Cor
by N Ar
·
ob
sen
cun
·
I
cal
cont
and disq
the

a
the other et la b A pendi
A.D. 1

(in Litania major): "Hæc Rogationum, quæ in triduo Ascensionem celebrantur," &c. It is called Galiciana, from the fact it was instituted, while the king's day was called Romana. For the order of the Litany and Rogation days are given very ceremonially of the Church of Rome, lib. iii. 126, and also the ones for each day from a MS. Church of Lyons. They present a variety, but are interesting as regards where the Stations occur. They are always said in the ordinary litany, in which (Nulla dies capitula sed Oratio) is said, the processional with more inventions and ornaments at the last station of the day None Mass. Afterwards the procession alternately certain proces, imitates with the "Litany for Pestilence" of quatuordecim tribusame character were said in other times. Thus the Mozza describes Litanies and days of litany calendarum Junii, i.e. next before the Epiphany, for the festival of St. Cyprian or three days before that of J, called Jejunium calendarum as on certain other week days. It also appoints Litanies for the last week in Advent, called o.

ies were also called septenary, septena, quina, triu). They are said on Easter Eve: on begins Kyrie Eleison, then Kyrie Eleison, and so on till begins Christe Eleison, and so begins Christe audi nos, and so in the clause being repeated seven of seven subdeacons. In the Litanies, seven names are recited of saints (dicantur de quolibet li), seven from the apostles, seven martyrs, seven from the confessor the virgins.

quinary litany, said in the seven subdeacons, the names of recited from each order, and said in the same manner by so used at baptisms, at adunction, and on other occasions necessary to specify. of Salzburg, the following lorum, totum mundum adjo, obis, Virgo mater Germinis, nunt, ordines Angelicæ, Res Sanctorum, et, coetus Apostolicæ, norum sanguis fuit Martyrum, Res Sanctorum.

Inplorato Confessores, consonato Virgines, Quo ducetur magnas nobis diæ indulgentias,

(and so on through all the orders of saints, ending thus):

Præsta Patri, atque Nati compar Sancte Spiritus, Ut te solus semper omni diligamus tempore,

The following is "ex pervastato collice seu ordine Romano Wirtinnensis, in dioecesi Monasteriensis:—

"Litania" (for the first day of Rogation). Humil prece ad Te clamantes semper exaudi nos, Summus et Omnipotens Genitor qui cuncta creasti, Acturus Christus Filius atque Deus; Necnon sanctissimus Dominator spiritus almus, Unica majestas trinitate sola Deo, Ipsa Dei Genetrix, reparatrix inelyta mundi, Quis Dominum casto corpore concipiens, Propetua semper radians cum virginitate Indignos famulos Virgo Maris tuæ,

Angelici proceres, coelorum exercitus omnis, Aeterno semper lumine conspicua, Amenur ter trino supere per sidera regno Laudibus æternum concelibrans Dominum, Et Jacob sanctus nos relevat precibus, Andrea, Mattheus, Barabas atque Johannes, Mattheus, Lucas, Marcus et Mattheus,

(and so on for 78 Elegiac verses, embodying the usual invocations of saints, and supplications of a litany).

These curious litanies are given by Martene, vol. iii. [See also LITE, PROCESSION.]

LITE (Λιτή). This word is explained as the united supplication of many. In the Greek church it has acquired the technical meaning of a religious procession accompanied with prayer; or of prayer for a special object made during such procession. Hence Λιτή and περιπάτος are used by Codinus* as synonyms, and both as equivalents of the Latin processio, ἐπιβαλλομένων τοῦ ὄρθρου γίνεσθαι ὁ περιπάτος, καὶ ἐστὶν ἀνάγκη γενέσθαι ἐς ἕως λιτήν, ἐν δὲ τῇ λιτῇ περιπάτῳ τὸν βασιλέα. "Mututinis decantatis, processio fit, et necesse est supplicationem in procedendo fieri, et in supplicatione Imperatorem proceetere." (Codinus De off. aul. Const. c. li.) Again λιτή and λιτανία are used by Cedrenus† as synonymous, ἀόχμοῦ γενομένου λιτανίαν ἐποίησαντο οἱ τοῦ βασιλέως ἀδελφοὶ . . . ἐποίησε δὲ καὶ ἑτέραν λιτήν ὁ πατριάρχης σὺν τῷ κλήρῳ. So λιτανεῖον is used in the sense of "to walk in such a procession" (Typicon Sabae, c. 42).

Litæ were used on various occasions of public calamity and intercession. The Greek euchology contains a general "office for different Litæ, and vigils with supplications" [ἀκούσθητε εἰς διαφόρους λιτὰς καὶ ἀρχωνίας παρακλήσεων], the framework of which is common to all Litæ,

* Codinus held the office of Cyropalate at the court of the last emperors of Constantinople, and wrote (among other works) de Officiis Eccl. et aulæ Constantin. (Graz. at Lat.

† A Greek monk of the 11th century, who wrote Compendium Historiarum from the beginning of the world to A.D. 1057.

and is adapted to the special occasion by the introduction of proper prayers, epistle, gospel, and canon. These and some other minor varying portions are given for the following emergencies: in time of Drought; in peril of Euthymate; in time of Pestilence; in storms on Land and at Sea; on occasion of Inroads of Barbarians; in anticipation of War. There are also special prayers for occasions of intercession, such as, in any public calamity; for the Christian people; for the Emperor and his Army; in times of famine; in danger of thunder and lightning.

The outline of the service is as follows: The customary opening formulae (Ter sanctus—τρισάγιον. Most Holy Trinity—παναγία τριάς). The Lord's prayer. Kyrie eleison twelve times.

Psalm 142 [143, E. V. Domine exaudi]. The great Synapte. A few Troparia of the usual character. Psalm 6.

"Then the first of the priests says a prayer proper to the Lite, and the deacon the little Synapte" (ἐπειτὰ λέγει ὁ πρῶτος τῶν λεπτῶν μίαν εὐχήν, κατὰ τὴν λιτὴν, ὁ δὲ δίακονος συνάπτην μικροῦ).

Then begins the second station:— [καὶ ἀρχόμεθα τῆς δευτέρας στάσεως.] Psalm 101 [102, E. V. Domine exaudi]. A few Troparia.

The second of the priests says another prayer. The little Synapte.

Psalm 78 [79. Deus venerunt]. A few Troparia and the gradual psalms. The proper gospel and canon. Dismissal. [εὐαγγέλιον κατὰ τὴν λιτὴν, καὶ ὁ κανὼν παρομοίων.]

The special prayers in these offices are long; several occupying a closely printed folio column and a half, or more, and one (in time of pestilence) almost five such columns.

A Lite of a somewhat different nature from the foregoing occurs in the course of Great Vespers of a Vigil.

After the prayer of Inclination of the head [εὐχὴ τῆς κεφαλῶκλισίας] the rubric proceeds: "Then we sing in this manner the idionelon proper to the saint of the day, making procession in the Narthex (ἀιτανεῖοντες ἐν τῷ νάρθηκι) the priest and the deacon going first with lights and censer. Gloria. Stichos of the saint. And now, Theotokion, and after this the deacon, if he is present, or if not, the priest, says this prayer."

Then follows a prayer for protection through the intercessions of the saints, and prayers for all conditions of men, framed as an ordinary Ectene, but with Kyrie eleison repeated not after each clause, but three times after a group of several in the course of the prayer, and forty times at the conclusion.

The priest then says a short prayer, bids Peace to all, and after the injunction by the deacon to bow the head to the Lord, says a prayer for protection identical in substance with that immediately preceding the Ectene.

* There are corresponding offices for nearly all these occasions in the rituals of the Western church.

† The same, with the omission of the clauses for the King, &c., as that said in the office of the LUCERNARIUM.

‡ i. e. certain antiphons, or stichs, i. e. verses.

§ i. e. an antiphon to the B. V. M.

Then the Aposticha (ἀποστιχα) are begun, and while they are being sung, the procession returns into the nave, preceded by lights, and singing both the Aposticha and the Stichia belonging to them (ἀπόδοτες καὶ τοῦς τυχόντας στιχίους ἀνάων).

The office then finishes with the benediction of the leaves [see Article].

[This is extracted from the office for vespers (ἐκλογὴ τοῦ ἱεραρινοῦ) given in the euchology. The "order of the sacred ministry" (διδάχαις τῆς ἱεροδιακονίας), in the same book, gives fuller and more complicated rubrics, but the office is the same.]

Symeon, Archbishop of Thessalonica, speaking of this office (op. cont. Haeres.) says, "This (ἀρχή) is celebrated out of doors (ἔξωθεν) in the Narthex of the church, on Saturdays and chief festivals." He assigns also as the reason why the Lite is celebrated in the Narthex, that as the Saviour descended to our lower regions, so we implore His mercy, standing at the doors of the church as though at the doors of heaven.

Other occasional and extraordinary Litae take place, he says, when any plague or public calamity threatens. [See also LITANY and PROCESSION.] [H. J. H.]

LITERAE COMMENDATORIAE. [COMMENDATORY LETTERS.]

LITERAE DIMISSORIAE. [DIMISSORY LETTERS.]

LITERAE FORMATAE. [FORMA.]

LITERAE PASCHALES. [PASCIAL LETTERS.]

LITRAE PEREGRINORUM. [KOINONIKON, l. 907.]

LITIGATION (lites). Lawsuits of any kind, especially before secular courts, were discouraged as far as possible. The 3rd Council of Carthage (c. 9) provides that any of the clergy who might appeal to a secular court in a civil matter, should in case of success forfeit what they had gained, if they desired to retain their offices. The 4th council of Carthage goes still farther. A bishop is altogether forbidden to undertake any lawsuit about a temporal matter (Statut. Eccl. Antip., c. 19; Bruns, Canones, i. 141). The disputes of the clergy among themselves were to be settled by the bishop, either by persuasion or authority, those refusing to obey him were to be condemned by the synod (c. 59). Any catholic, lay or clerical, who referred any case, just or unjust, to the decision of a non-catholic (alterius fidei) judge was to be excommunicated (c. 87). The council of Chalcedon (c. 9) provides a series of appeals to ecclesiastical courts, ending with the tribunal of the emperor at Constantinople (cf. Codes Eccl. Afric., c. 125). The council of Vannes however (c. 9) permits the clergy to appeal to the secular courts by permission of their bishops, but an appeal from the decision of a bishop, or a suit against a bishop, must be made to other bishops, and on no account, on peril of excommunication, be referred to a secular court. The council of Agde (c. 31, 32; Bruns, Can. ii. 152) provides that those who refuse to cease from litigation at the bidding of the bishop shall be excommunicated, and forbids any of the clergy to carry a cause into a secular court without permission of the bishop, but permits them to plead in a cause that has already been taken there. The evidence of those who were prone to litigation was to be regarded with suspicion and not received without very careful inquiry into its truth (Statut. Eccl. Antip., c. 58). In all lawsuits the faith and moral character of both parties were to be taken into consideration (ibid., c. 96). [P. O.]

LITTEUS (LITEUS), bishop and confessor in Africa; commemorated Sept. 10 (Mark. Usuard. Ado.; Acta SS. Sept. iii. 485). [C. H.]

LITURGICAL BOOKS. The present article relates not merely to such books as are necessary for the performance of the Liturgy proper, or Mass; but to all that are used in the performance of the offices of the church.

1. Before enumerating these, it will be convenient to attempt some answer to the question, "When were liturgies or other formularies committed to writing; for use in the church?"

It is sometimes alleged that the great variety and length of the prayers, &c. in the liturgies and offices of the church preclude the supposition that these can ever have been said without book. And this is no doubt true; but it only throws us back on the further enquiry, when it was that liturgies and services became so lengthy and complicated as absolutely to require written manuals for their due performance—a question to which no definite answer can be given.

We cannot, in fact, inquire when liturgies were first written, without first inquiring when they were first celebrated in set forms; forms must have been adopted before they were written down, though it by no means follows that they were at once written; some forms may have been long handed down by tradition before they were committed to writing.

As it is certain that the Jews used forms of devotion in the Temple and in the Synagogue before the Incarnation, and as the services of the church were unquestionably influenced by those of the Synagogue, it seems to be a fair presumption that Christians also adopted set forms in their public devotions from an early period. To this it is objected that Justin Martyr (Apol. i. c. 67) describes the president of a Christian assembly as sending up prayers "according to his ability"—an expression which (it is thought) must imply that the prayers were wholly dependent upon the powers of him who uttered them. But in fact it is probable that the words ὡς δύναμις ἀνάω simply mean "with all his strength," referring to the vehemence with which the prayer was uttered, and not to the matter of it; and Valesius has noted (on Euseb. H. E. iv. 15, § 36), that ἀναπέμψεν is used specially of uttering with a loud voice. Indeed, when Justin describes (l. c.) the Christians as

* Goss (in loco) calls these τὰ ἀνά στιχίους στιχίονα. They are στιχίονα appended to ἀναπέμψεν, or fragmentary verses from the psalms, and are explained as "versus Davidicis versus compositi."

† Ibid. Max. Pat. xxii.

* In saying this, the writer does not contend that forms of prayer were adopted to the exclusion of ex tempore prayer.

must be made to other bishops, on peril of excommunication, secular court. The council of nus, Can. ii. 152) provides that no case from litigation at the top shall be excommunicated, if the clergy to carry a cause without permission of the bishop who to plead in a cause been taken there. The evils were prone to litigation was with suspicion and not received full inquiry into its truth (p. 58). In all lawsuits the character of both parties were to ration (ibid. c. 96). [P. O.]

BOOKS. The present article to such books as are necessary of the Liturgy proper, all that are used in the practices of the church.

Regarding these, it will be considered as to the question, rites or other formularies current use in the church?

It is alleged that the great variety of prayers, &c. in the liturgies of the church preclude the supposition ever have been said without no doubt true; but it only the further enquiry, when it and services became so lengthy absolutely to require written due performance—a question an answer can be given.

In fact, inquire when liturgies without first inquiring when celebrated in set forms; forms adopted before they were written by no means follows that they written; some forms may have been by tradition before they writing.

That the Jews used forms of temple and in the Synagogue, and as the services of the Christian church were doubtably influenced by those of the Jews, it seems to be a fair presumption also adopted set forms in Christian churches from an early period. That Justin Martyr (Apol.) the president of a Christian church up prayers "according to his custom which (it is thought) the prayers were wholly depowers of him who uttered it is probable that the words simply mean "with all his might to the vehemence with which was uttered, and not to the fact that Jesus has noted (on Euseb. Hist. Eccl. i. 16), that ἀναπέμψαι is used with a loud voice. Indeed, in the Acts (1. c.) the Christians as the writer does not contend that forms were used to the exclusion of ex tempore

standing up together in a body, and uttering prayers (εὐχὰς πέμψουσαν), we can hardly avoid the conclusion that the harmonious utterances of a multitude must have taken some well-known form, perhaps rather of the nature of short "pieces" than more lengthened "orations." And when he says (Apol. i. c. 13) that Christians "thought it right to send "pompas and hymns" to the Creator by means of language, rather than as the heathen did his words suit better the majestic style of Eastern prayers and odes, such as we have them, than the unpremeditated effusions of a presiding brother.

Another objection is found in Tertullian's assertion (Apol. c. 30), that Christians prayed without a prompter (sine monitor) because they prayed from the heart. We know too little of the functions of the heathen "monitor" to be able to say with certainty what kind of contrast is intended. If the monitor dictated the words of the prayer, the passage seems to imply that Christians needed no such aid, but prayed in such words as the heart prompted; if the monitor, like the deacon in Christian assemblies at a somewhat later date, simply proclaimed the object for which prayer was to be made from time to time, no such inference can be drawn. And, as Bingham has remarked (xiii. v. 5), in public prayer the presiding brother or presbyter must, in any case, have dictated words to the rest, whether with the help of a set form or not, or there could have been no common worship. On the whole, we conclude that Tertullian, in the passage before us, simply means that Christians needed no urging to pray, as some of the heathen did; they needed no prompting but that of their own hearts.

Again, it is contended (c. g. by Le Brun, tom. ii. Diss. i. p. 11) that certain expressions of St. Basil prove conclusively that liturgies were not committed to writing in his time. The passage in question is the following: τὰ τῆς ἐκκλησίας ἅματα ἐπὶ τῇ ἀναπέμψαι τοῦ ἁγίου τῆς εὐχαριστίας καὶ τοῦ παντῆρος τῆς εὐλογίας τὴν τῶν ἁγίων ἐγγράφως ἡμῶν καὶ ἀλέοιται; (De Spiritu Sancto, c. 27, § 66); that is, "which of the saints left behind for us in writing the words of the invocation at the displaying (or dedicating) of the bread of thanksgiving and the cup of blessing?" On this passage we have to remark, that St. Basil is here defending apostolic tradition; if, he says, we were to reject everything which has not direct written [i. e. scriptural] authority as being of no great importance, we should very much endanger the church; for many well-known practices rest only on tradition; as the use of the sign of the cross in baptism, the turning towards the East, the use of the words of invocation [EPICLESIS]. That he is referring to the want of scriptural authority for certain parts of the church service, not to the absence of written copies, is evident from the words which follow the passage quoted above: "for we do not by any means content ourselves with those words which are recorded in the Epistles or the Gospels, but we prefix and suffix others, as being of great efficacy in respect of the mystery, receiving them from the unwritten discipline (ἐκ τῆς ἀγράφου διδασκαλίας παραλαβόντες)." Clearly when St. Basil says that the words of the Epiclesis were not received in a written form from any of the saints, he means that they were not contained in scripture, but formed a part of that mass of non-scriptural tradition which included so many well-known church observances. On the question, whether these formularies were committed to writing in his own time, his words determine nothing; what he says is virtually, that they were not contained in any writing of the apostolic age. In any case, St. Basil's expressions relate only to the Epiclesis in the liturgy, the exact words of which may perhaps not have been committed to writing until a comparatively late period, from the dread of profanation by the heathen.

¹ P. is the application of the word κομψή to language, compare Pseudo-Plato, Λόγος, p. 389 D, κομψή καὶ ἡμεῶν ἀγαθότης.

In another of Le Brun's arguments (tom. ii. Diss. i. art. 5, p. 29-32), that the fathers expressly forbade the Lord's Prayer or the Creed to be written down on paper or parchment, he seems to have forgotten both that the Lord's Prayer and the Creed were regarded as much more secret and sacred than most other portions of divine service, and that these cautions were addressed to catechumens.

On the other hand, it has been supposed that some at least of St. Paul's quotations, which are not found in canonical scripture, are taken from Christian liturgies. As, for instance, in 1 Cor. ii. 9, the quotation, "eye hath not seen nor ear heard . . ." which is introduced with the words "καθὼς γέγραπται," is by no means exactly taken from Isaiah lxiv. 4, and may (it is contended) have been taken from a liturgy. The expression does in fact occur in the liturgy of St. James (Daniel, Codex, iv. 113), which however is, as a whole, unquestionably of much later date than the apostolic age. With greater probability it has been thought that the expression "faithful is the word" (πιστὸς ὁ λόγος), several times occurring in the pastoral epistles (1 Tim. i. 15; iii. 1; 2 Tim. ii. 11; Tit. iii. 8) implies the quotation of a saying or γυνή familiar to the Christians in their assemblies, perhaps one which they were accustomed to repeat "with one voice;" the passage 2 Tim. ii. 11 in particular has very much the rhythm of an "ode" intended for chanting.

Whether we should reckon the books or rolls found in ancient Christian pictures [i. 877] as liturgical books is very doubtful. But we come upon the traces of at least some forms committed to writing in the 2nd century. Celsus (Origen c. Cels. vi. 40, p. 302 Spencer) says that he saw in the possession of Christian priests certain "barbaric books, full of names of demons and portentous expressions." These were in all probability forms of EXORCISM [i. 651], though Daniel (Codex, iv. 28 ff.) considers them to have been DIRTY. They were at any rate some kind of formulae used by Christians. And the way in which Origen replies to Celsus, that Christians who duly worship God in the set prayers (προσταχθείσαις εὐχαίς) are free from the assault of demons, seems at any rate to indicate the existence of forms. Eusebius declares (H. E. v. 28, § 5) that written odes (ὑμνοὶ) testified from the very beginning of the divinity of Christ the word of God; a passage which reminds us of the well-known phrase of Pliny (Epist. x, 96 [al. 97]), "carmen Christiquasi Deo dicere." In the account of the martyrdom of Felix (†250) of Tubyyza in Africa (Baluz. Miscell. ii, 77), the emperor is said to have put forth an edict, that the books—meaning apparently those which were the property of the church—should be taken from the bishops and priests by violence if necessary; and in the same narrative, the priest Januarius and the readers Fortunatus and Septimianus declare that the bishop had the custody of the books. In the 4th century, the evidence of the existence of liturgical books becomes more clear and definite. Pseudo-Athanasius, for instance, speaking of the rage of the Arians against the orthodox (Epist. Adv. et Episc. ad Marcum, in Migne, vol. 28, p. 1445), says that, among other things, they burned the church books. It is not improbable that the book which Hilary of Poitiers is said to have compiled (Jerome de Scripturis Eccl. c. 100), called Liber Hymnorum et Mysteriorum, was a collection of forms for the celebration of the sacraments. Gennadius (De Viris Ill. c. 48) describes certain books which Paulinus of Nola compiled as Sacramentarium and Hymnarium. Victor Vitensis (Pe-sec. Vandal. i. 12) tells how Geiseric compelled the priests to give up the sacred vessels or all their books (ministra divina vel libros cunctos).

The existence of something of the nature of a "mass-book" in the 5th century is testified by Gregory of Tours in the following circumstance (Hist. Franc. ii, 22). Sidonius Apollinaris († ca. 488), when the book from which he was accustomed to read the sacred office (per quem sancta sollemnitas agere consueverat) had been mischievously taken away, was able to go through the whole service of the holy day "a tempore," to the admiration of all. This is mentioned as an instance of his readiness and command of expression, not of his memory; but even if we suppose that the saint extemporised the office, the passage equally proves that a "libellus" was in common use. Gregory also (Vitae Patr. c. 16, § 2, p. 1229) relates of Venantius, that coming one day to the church he said, "my eyes are dim and I cannot see the service book (libellum)," and requested a presbyter to say the office, which was (as the subsequent narrative shews) the altar service.

II. List of Liturgical Books.—The rule of Chrodegang (c. 79, in Conc. Germ. i. 119) lays down that every priest ought to have in his church the books which are necessary to enable him to read masses, epistles, gospels, baptismal and penitential offices, the series of offices for the year (circulus anni) or the nocturnal lectures, without further defining the books. The English Aelfric at a somewhat later date required that every presbyter should possess before ordination a psalter, a book of the Epistles, a book of the Gospels, a mass-book (librum missalem), books of the Canticles, a manual or enchiridion, a "gerim," a penitential, and a lectionary (Hardouin's Conc. vi. 982). Instead of the word "gerim," Mansi gives (Suppl. Conc. i. 1168) "Numerale," which is thought to mean a calendar or martyrology. [LIBRARIES, II. 986.]

We proceed now to give a list of liturgical

* Or "understand," if "intelligt" be the right reading rather than "legere."

books actually existing, and used (in most cases) from ancient times.

a. Of the Western Church.—For the saying of the several offices at the altar or in the choir there would evidently be required—

1. Some kind of directory as to the order and manner of performing the services and ceremonies appropriate to the several days. Such a book, which would contain what in modern times we call the Rubrics, the Latins called ORDO.

2. The actual matter of the prayers, thanksgivings, prefaces, &c., which were to be used in the offices. The SACRAMENTARY or MISSAL contained the prayers, &c., used in the altar offices on the several festivals throughout the year.

The plenary MISSALS, which contain all that is necessary for the performance of the altar-services, do not fall within our chronological limits. The Collectarium contained the COLLECTS [I. 403], and CAPITULA [I. 289], to be said in the Hour-offices.

3. The PSALTER contained the Psalms arranged for saying in the daily offices, together with the CANTICLES [I. 284], and the Psalm Q. iconque Vult.

4. Provision was of course made for the reading the Scripture-portions appointed in the offices, whether at the altar or in choir. This was done either by marking in a copy of the Gospels, Epistles, or other books of Scripture, the passages to be read in the several offices; or by extracting the several passages and arranging them in a separate book [EPISTLE, I. 621; GOSPEL, I. 740; LECTONARY, II. 953].

5. The ANTIPHONARY [I. 100] contained the Antiphons, Responses, and Invitatories used in divine service.

6. The Hymnarium contained the metrical hymns used in the offices.

7. It was sometimes found convenient to place the Benedictions in a separate volume called a BENEDICTIONAL [I. 199].

8. The MANUAL contained those offices (other than the Mass and the Hour-offices), which a presbyter could administer; and

9. The PONTIFICAL, those which only a bishop could perform.

10. The Penitential (Poenitentiale) contained not only the form of administering penance, but also the penances required for various forms of sin. [PENITENTIAL BOOKS.]

11. The Passional (Passionale, or Liber Passionario) contained the acts of the martyrs who were commemorated on certain days of the year. [LEGENDA, MARTYROLOGY.]

B. The Greek Liturgical books in the list given below are probably, in several cases, of later origin than the eighth century; but as there is great difficulty in determining their exact date it seemed best to give the whole list according to the modern arrangement.

1. The Directory for saying the offices was called by the Greeks ΤΥΠΙΚΟΝ (tympikon).

2. The LITURGY proper (Λειτουργία) contains the fixed portions of the office of the altar. If to this the offices for the administration of the other sacraments, benedictions, etc. are added, the whole volume is called ΕΚΧΟΛΟΓΙΟΝ.

3. The MENAE contains the portions both of the choir-services and altar-offices which are

g, and used (in most cases)

Church.—For the saying at the altar or in the choir to be required—rectory as to the order and the services and cere- the several days. Such a contain what in modern Librics, the Latins called

ter of the prayers, thank- which were to be used in CRAMENTARY, or MISSAL s, &c., used in the altar festivals throughout the s, which contain all that is ormance of the altar-ser- in our chronological limits. tained the COLLECTS [I. I. 289], to be said in the contained the Psalms ar- the daily offices, together [I. 284], and the Psalm course made for the read- rations appointed in the a altar or in choir. This rking in a copy of the other books of Scripture, and passages and arranging ok [EPISTLE, I. 621; GOS- BR. II. 953].

[I. 100] contained the and Invitatories used in contained the metrical es. es found convenient to s in a separate volume L [I. 199].

tained those offices (other Hour-offices), which a ster; and those which only a bishop

(Poenitentiale) contained ministering penance, but ired for various forms of OKS.]

Passionale, or L'et Pas- s of the martyrs who certain days of the year. OGY.]

real books in the list given a several cases, of later century; but as there is emining their exact date the whole list according to

g saying the offices was

PICTM (τυτικόν). per (λειουργία) contains he office of the altar. If e administration of the ditions, etc. are added, led EUCHOLOGION.

sains the portions both of altar-offices which are proper for the several Saints'-days or other festi- vials.

4. The HOROLOGION [I. 784] contains the daily offices for the hours of prayer.

5. The Greeks, like the Latins, have a book of the Gospels (εὐαγγέλιον); of Epistles (ἀποστόλος, or πρᾶξι ἀποστόλου); and of Lessons from the Old Testament (ἀναγνώσεων βιβλίου). Also

6. The PSALTER (ψαλτήριον), containing the Psalms, arranged for recitation, and several other offices or portions of offices.

7. The TRIDION contains the CANONS of odes to be used in Lent; and a similar book, the PENTECOSTARION, contains the proper odes, &c. for the period from Easter to the octave of Pentecost.

8. The PARACLETICON, or Paraclete, contains the Troparia for the ferial offices.

9. The OCTOICHIUS contains the ferial Stichera and Troparia from the vespers of the Saturday till the end of the liturgy on Sunday.

10. The MENOLOGION is equivalent to the MARTYROLOGION of the Western Church.

The ANTHOLOGION [I. 91] and Synopsis ought, perhaps, scarcely to be reckoned among liturgical books, as they are mere compilations for the use of ordinary worshippers, from the Paraclete, Menaea, and Hologion, of such portions as are most commonly in use.

The Hirmologion is a collection of HIRMOI (I. 773).

The Synaxaria are "the abbreviated lections from the Menologion, extracted from the Menaea, and published, for convenience sake, by themselves" (Neale's Eastern Ch. Int. 890).

The PANEGRYCON is a collection of sermons, by approved authors, for various festivals.

III. Among liturgical books, the first place, both for its importance and the splendour with which it was written, illuminated, and decorated [see below], is to be given to the Evangelii, or book of the Gospels. Evangelistaria, or books containing only those passages of the Gospels which were read in the altar-office, are rare within our period, while many ancient MSS. of the Gospels bear marginal words or marks which shew that they have been used for liturgical purposes [LEXICONARY].

The book of the Gospels was an object of veneration in many ways. When the church was able to celebrate its services and arrange its churches without fear of persecution, and the sacred books were no longer concealed from the prying eyes of informers; then it came to be usual to lay the book of the Gospels in some conspicuous place in the church, or even on the altar itself [ALTAR, I. 66] (Augustine, de Civ. Dei, x. 29; see the representations figured by Ciampini, Vet. Mon. tab. xxxvii.). Compare ENTRANCE, GOSPEL. In councils it was not unusual for the Codex of the Gospels to be enthroned with great solemnity at the beginning of the assembly, as was done in the councils of Chalcedon, in the third and fourth of Constantinople, the second of Nicaea, and in the Roman synods of the years 642, 745, and 969. In the Christianised Empire, Justinian ordered the book of the Gospels to be deposited in the courts of justice (Binterlin, lv. i. 225). From Chrysostom (Hom. 72 [al. 73] in Matt., p. 669, Migne), and Jerome (Comm. on Matt. xxiii. 6, p. 186), we learn that in their time it was not unusual for Christians to have a copy of the Gospels hung from their necks, which was also a practice of pious ladies in the fifth century, according to the testimony of Isidore of Polusium.

The oath in the Gospels was from ancient times regarded as one of the most solemn adjurations. [OATH.]

On the use of the book of the Gospels in ordination, see BISHOP, I. 221, and ORDINATION.

The Fathers of the Eighth General Council (Constantinople, A.D. 869, c. 7) approved the veneration paid to the book of the Gospels by the faithful.

The Evangelii, to protect it from injury, was commonly placed in a clasped or sealed CAPSA when not actually in use; an example may be seen in a mosaic of the Liberian church in Rome, said to have been completed under Sixtus III. (Ciampini, Vet. Mon. i. 16). [C.]

IV. LITURGICAL BOOKS IN ART.—Dom Guéranger (Instit. Liturg. iii. 223 ff.) dwells on the devoted care with which the sacred books were transcribed, edited, and corrected, in early days. There was required of them, he says, accuracy and fidelity enough to set all men free from the least fear of alteration in the text; personal morality, well suited to the sanctity of civic mysteries; and a degree of dignity, if possible of splendour, in execution such as might impress the eye and the mind with religious respect. The MSS., when completed in the scriptoria, were corrected under the care of bishops and abbots, who either entrusted that duty to confidential hands, or, in many cases, executed it themselves. The copyists would have thought it sacrilege to depart in any degree from the words given them to reproduce.

Guéranger (iii. 225) quotes the prologue found in Alcuin's sacramentary, as a specimen of the spirit in which church-books were compiled and copied.

"But since there are some other forms which the holy church necessarily makes use of, and which the said father saw had been set forth by others, and so himself had passed them by, on this account we thought it worth the while to gather these up like blossoming flowers of the field, and collect them in one, and set them apart in the body of this MS. . . . and for the sake of this distinction we have set this prologue in the midst, so as to be the end of the first part of the book and the beginning of the second. . . . We pray you therefore, whoever shall have taken in hand this roll to read or transcribe it, that ye pour out your prayers to the Lord for me, for that we have been diligent to collect and correct these things for the profit of as many as may be. And we pray you to copy it again so diligently, as to its text, that it comfort the ears of the learned, and allow not any of the simpler sort to go astray. For it will be no avail, as saith blessed St. Jerome, to have made correction in a book, unless the corrected reading be preserved by the diligent care of the book-keepers."

Some of the personal prayers or benedictions of actual scribes are of great beauty, but few appear to have been preserved before the 11th century. One or two may be repeated here. Guéranger has extracted the first from a Greek evangeliary of that period. Their mournful piety is certainly different from the quiet greeting of St. Paul's secretary, "I Tertius, who wrote this epistle, salute you."

"This book has been written by the hand of a sinner. May the most holy mother of God, and Saint Eutychius, vouchsafe to accept its homage, and may the Lord God, by intercession of the most holy mother of God and Saint Eutychius, grant us eternal life in heaven. Amen."

The two illustrious (and ominously named) calligraphers of the 9th-century evangeliary of St. Emmeran of Ratisbon speak to this purpose on its last page, in Latin elegiacs:—

"Bis quadringenti volitant et septuaginta Anni, quo Deus est virgine natus Homo;
Ter densis annis Karolus regnavit et uno,
Cum codex actus illius imperio.

Hactenus undosum calamo descripsimus aequor,
Littoris ad finem nostra carina manet,
Sanguine nos uno patris matrisque creasti,
Atque sacerdotis servit uterque gradum,
En Berengerius, Luthardus nomine dicti,
Quis fuerat audor diffidisse nimis,
Hic thibimet, lector, succedant verba precantis,
Ut dicas, capiant regna beata poli."

Mabilion, Iter Germanicum, p. 63.

"Twice four hundred years are fled and seventy, since the God-Man was born of a virgin; thrice ten years and one Charles had reigned when by his command this book was begun. Thus far we have traced our course over a troubled sea with our pen; our bark is staid on the shore at last: we two were born of the blood of one father and one mother, and each of us serves the office of priest, even we, called by name Berengarius and Luthard, to whom has been told much and hard. Here, O reader, mayest thou thyself take up words of prayer, and say, May they reach the blessed kingdom of heaven."

Charlemagne exerted himself, amidst all the cares of his vast empire, to multiply exact copies of evangeliaries, psalters, and sacramentaries, often destined as presents to his bishops for the use of their dioceses. There can be no doubt of the important effect produced on deep and imaginative minds, not greatly aided nor encumbered by book-study, by the lovely ornament, and sometimes energetic and powerful realizations of actual events, which are found in the great MSS. of early ages. There is no reason to doubt the story that king Alfred received help in the pursuit of knowledge, if he was not induced to learn to read, by the ornamental letters of a MS. (Asser, pp. 7, 8, ed. Walsingham). Charlemagne's devotion to the subject induced him to attempt the art of calligraphy and illumination with his own hand (Eginhard, Vita B. Caroli Magni, cap. vii.), "sed parum prosperè successit labor præposterus et sero inchoatus."

Mabilion and Montfaucon both describe a MS. which is said to have been copied by the hand of Eusebius of Vercell in the 4th century. (See Iter Italicum, xxv. p. 9, ed. 1687; Diarium Italicum, p. 445, 1702.) It contains the gospels of St. Matthew and St. Mark, as Mabilion says; and it may here be observed, in passing, that the early grandeur of uncial characters, inajuscular or minuscular, often made it necessary, for want of space, to divide the evangeliaries into parts; or even prevented their completion. The Eusebian evangeliary is in uncial writing, chiefly minuscular, says Guéranger (Institutiōnes Liturgicæ, iii. 312.) and Montfaucon gives its alphabet. But both he and Mabillon speak of it as in a most lamentable state of fragility and decay, caused more by damp and former accidents, than by its age. "Membrana situ fere corrupta est, characteres paene fugientes et semideleti tantisper a Romana scriptura degenerant," says the latter; and Montfaucon seems to have regretted its probable destruction somewhat the less because he found it as a version, "a vulgata nostra toto celo discrepantem." It has been published by Bianchini, Rome, 1749,^a and is said to be still preserved in the treasury of its ancient convent.

^a Krazor (De Liturg. p. 234) quotes Charlemagne's Capitularies (l. 62) thus: "Pueros vestros non sinitis eos vel legendo vel scribendo occupare: et, si opus est, Evangelium, et Psalterium, et Missale scribere, perfectæ ætatis nomine scribant cum omni diligentia."

In the 5th century the principal authentic specimens of evangeliaries yet remaining are the Vatican MS. above mentioned (1209), the Gothic evangeliary of Ulfilas, kept at Upsal,^b the Latin evangeliary of St. Germain des Prés, and those at Cambrige, with perhaps the most important of all, the Syriac gospels, transcribed by the monk Rabula in 586,^c now in the Laurentian Library at Florence. The Leonian sacramentary, the psalter of St. Germain des Prés,^d and that of Zurich,^e complete Guéranger's selection of liturgical MSS. of this century. Without giving his full list (iii. 289-292) of the works and calligraphers of the 7th, 8th, and 9th centuries, we may mention the evangeliaries of Monza,^f of Notre Dame de Paris, and that which bears the name of Colbert, both in the Bibliothèque Nationale at Paris;^g the Anglo-Saxon Cottonian MS. in the British Museum, and St. Kilian's at Würzburg, in the cathedral treasury, with the Cottonian psalter of St. Augustine. Of the 8th century, the Sacramentary of Gellone will be found admirably illustrated by Count Bastard, vol. i.; and the great Greek evangeliary of Vienna, with the Missale Francorum, Missale Gothicum, the Cottonian MSS., and others, in Silvestre's Poleographie Universelle.

Before proceeding farther, it may be well to call the reader's attention to the accurate meanings of a few terms, and one or two necessary explanations. The first has reference to the real function of the calligrapher, as distinguished from that of the illuminator or miniature-artist of later times. The illuminators, as Guéranger observes, begin their reign at the end of the

^a The silver cover of this ancient MS. is described by Mabilion, and will be referred to later in this article.

^b See Migne, Ulfilas.

^c Assesein, Catalogue of Laurentian Library; D'Agincourt, Hist. de l'Art par les Monuments; Peinture pl. xxvii.

^d See Nouveau Traité de Diplomatique, vol. i. p. 686, nos. 2 and 3 in plate.

^e Dom. Tassin. Nouveau Traité de Diplomatique, tom. i. p. 686, no. 14 in plate.

^f Mabilion, Iter Italicum, p. 219: "Codex ex membranis purpureis, quadratis litteris aureis exaratus, sed mutilum; Gregorii Antiphonarum continens; cum operculis ex ebore, quae ex una parte præferunt effigiem Davidis regis, ex alia Sancti Gregorii cum diebus," etc. "Est et duplex alterius codicis majoris operculum ex auro, cum cruce ex utraque parte, addita tunc et his hæc inscriptiones. Ex doliis Dei dedit Theophiloida Reg. in Basilea (sic), quam tuncavit in Modicis juxta palatium suum."

^g Count Bastard, vol. i. Peintures des MSS.

ir completion. The Eusebian capital writing, chiefly minusculer (Institutiones Liturgiquae, Bacon gives its alphabet. But on speak of it as in a most languidly and decay, caused more accidents, than by its age. ere corrupta est, characteres semideleti tantisper a Romana ant," says the latter; and o have regretted its probable at the less because he found vulgata nostra toto coelo disben published by Bianchini, said to be still preserved in ancient convent.

The principal authentic liturges yet remaining are the mentioned (1209), the Gothic as, kept at Upsal,¹ the Latin Germain des Prés, and those perhaps the most important gospels, transcribed by the 36,² now in the Laurentian . The Leonian sacramentary, rmain des Prés,³ and that of ranger's selection of litur-er's. Without giving his 92) of the works and calli-, 8th, and 9th centuries, the evangelaries of Monza,⁴ Paris, and that which bears t, both in the Bibliothèque the Anglo-Saxon Cottonian Museum, and St. Kilian's he cathedral treasury, with r of St. Augustine. Of the sacramentary of Gellone will llustrated by Count Bastard, reat Greek evangelary of Missale Francorum, Missale onian MSS., and others, in ophie Universelle.

Further, it may be well to tion to the accurate mean- and one or two necessary first has reference to the calligrapher, as distinguished iminator or miniature-artist illuminators, as Guéranger ir reign at the end of the

this ancient MS. is described by rferred to later in this article.

que of Laurentian Library; Art par les Monuments; Peinture de Diplomatique, vol. I. p. 686,

u Traité de Diplomatique, tom. I.

um, p. 213: "Codex ex mem-arts literis aureis exaratus, sed phonarum continens; cum opera parte praesertim effligent acti Gregorii cum diatēba," etc. is codicis majoris operaculum ex aequa parte, addita hinc et inde Jouis Dei delli Theodosiana Reg. fundavit in Modeste Justa pal-

A. Peintures des MSS.

12th, and enter on decided pre-eminence in the 13th century. They have little to do with our period, and their work marks the commencement of a new period when the study of natural beauty had begun, and the vegetable kingdom in particular began to be illustrated for ornamental purposes in the service books of the church. A distinction will be found, under article MINIATURES, between truly calligraphic and artistic ornament. (See Westwood, Palaeographia Sacra.) Much of what we have to say on the subject of artistic ornamentation belongs to article MINIATURES: for the present the distinction must always be observed between the beauty, elegance, or splendour of the letters as writing, which is calligraphy, and the power of colour, form, and imagination displayed in pictures attached to the writing, which is fine art. It is difficult, if not impossible, to assign proper limits between these phases of decoration; and it is enough to say that they are combined in most liturgical MSS. of the earliest date which still remain to us; and, further, that in most of the most valuable the calligraphic art has its full share of importance, and that the decoration is subordinate to the writing, and dependent on the text, not only as to meaning and import, but also in appearance. The effect of the whole page, as to form and colour, has evidently been the chief object of the calligraphic artists as such, apart from the genuine piety of aim which really seems to have influenced them as their main motive. The text and its pictures form a whole, united, generally speaking, by the effect of grandly ornamented capital letters; unless, of course, the MS. be on purple vellum, when the ground colour gives the main effect, and determines all the rest of the ornament. Perhaps only one modern artist has revived this idea of the old calligraphists in a perfectly original way, but with exact analogy. The illustrations and ornamented writing of Blake's various poems, copied and executed by his own hand, renew and illustrate that excellent moderation of judgment of the old copyists, which made their pictorial ornament, however beautiful and ingenious, still always subsidiary to their calligraphy. The pictures were beautiful, they thought, the text was sacred; but even because the latter was chief and the one thing needful, too much attention could not possibly be given to the former.

The capital letters in liturgical MS. are generally of the kind called rustic, especially when several lines consist of smaller capital letters. But they are frequently executed in the best Roman style, as in the evangelaries of Soissons and of Gellone, and in the sacramentary of Drogon. (Count Bastard, vol. i. ii.; Silvestre, Palaeographie Universelle, 3^{me} partie, § 2.) The uncial characters, or rounded capitals, with their particular beauties of size, clearness, and order, appear and reappear in all the richer MSS. down to the 11th century, when writing begins to be altogether Gothicked or made cursive, and the ornament is concentrated on the initial letters, and their accompanying miniatures. The artistic use of varied colour may be said to be based on the minium or red lead, from which the word miniature is derived, Green and yellow follow almost immediately in the Visigothic and Merovingian work; but while the richest MSS. were executed on purple or azure grounds, the use of varied hues was of course out of the question, and writing and ornament were alike executed in gold or silver. A very grand specimen of the earlier chrysographs, as they are called, in uncial capitals of gold and silver, is the celebrated psalter of St. Germain (Bastard, i. 1). But the use of purple vellum for books destined for the use of imperial students goes back to comparatively early days of the empire, on the eve of the triumph of the Christian faith; Maximin the younger received a purple vellum MS. of Homer as a present from his mother (Jul. Capitolin, Vita Maximin). Sacred books, and in particular the evangelaries, would naturally have been the first objects of Christian splendour, when such a thing became possible. The gospels of Ulfilas, the psalter of St. Germain above mentioned, with that of Zurich, and the evangelary of Brescia, are on purple, and the evangelary of Brescia on azure-blue vellum; but that of St. Germain has one side of each page dyed purple, the other in azure.

St. Wilfrid of York gave a purple evangelary to his cathedral in the 7th century: the 8th produced those now at Vienna and Monza. Charlemagne presented one to his church at Aix-la-Chapelle, and another of his evangelaries, entirely on purple vellum, is still, says Guéranger, the principal ornament of the library of Abbeville.⁵ The splendid MS. preserved in the library of the Remonstrants at Prague, appears to the writer to be of about the same date. The great emperor's attachment to the art of calligraphy has been mentioned, and the splendour of the early empire was revived by him in this use of purple or azure books, necessarily written in either gold or silver. They reappear during the Carolingian age, and go out of use almost entirely in the 10th century, though the Bodleian Library at Oxford possesses a purple evangelary, with whole-page pictures, dating from the 11th.

Silver-ink MSS. are much rarer than chrysographs, strictly so-called, but both metals are frequently used together, as in the evangelary of Ulfilas and the psalters of St. Germain and of Zurich. The evangelaries of Verona and Brescia are written almost entirely in letters of silver.⁶ In the others the text is silver, with golden headings and initials, gold being used also for the sacred names.

Purple vellum begins to be economised in or before the 9th century, as in Charlemagne's psalter, presented to Adrian VIII. about the end of the 8th. This is now in the Imperial Library at Vienna, and has a limited number of purple pages. The antiphonary of Monza, of nearly the same date, is entirely purple.

In the sacramentaries of the 9th century, the canon of the mass is frequently on purple, or the frontispiece and first pages of the books; or texts to which special attention is to be drawn, are thus distinguished. Gradually the purple is arranged with other hues on a white ground, and begins to be used, artistically speaking, as a colour.

Golden writing was not, or was not long, con-

⁵ Notice par M. de Belleval, Mémoires de la Société Royale d'émulation, d'Abbeville, 1836, 37.

⁶ The latter admits a few golden letters.

fined to the purple, violet, or azure MSS.* Many which have but few coloured pages are chryseographs throughout; as the evangeliaries of Charlemagne (or of St. Martin des Champs), of St. Martin and St. Mélard of Soissons (in Count Bastard's second volume). The expense of purple vellum seems to have been very great; so much so, that as early as the 4th century the bishop Theonas enjoins on Lucianus, the emperor's chamberlain, not to have the MSS. of the imperial library entirely in colour, unless by special order (D'Achery, Spirolegium, tom. xii.). Charlemagne seems to have reserved this magnificence especially for evangeliaries, the Vienna psalter being only gold in part. For chryseographs on white, in the 9th century, they are too numerous to allow of more than brief mention of a few, besides those of St. Mélard and St. Martin already named. The evangeliaries of St. Emmerand at Munich, of Lothaire in the National Library of France, with his psalter; those of the abbays of Hautvillers (Bastard, ii.) and Lorch (the latter now at the Vatican, with fine uncial writing on alternate bands of purple and azure), and the antiphony of Goubert, monk of St. Bertin, are named by Dom Guéranger. Those of Charlemagne, or St. Martin des Champs (Gothic writing), and of St. Mélard, and another very grand one, written for Charlemagne, in fine uncial, with large whole-page illustrations [see MINIATURES], the sacramentary of Drogo (golden uncial, rustic capitals, and cursive Gothic, with splendid Roman initials), the evangeliaries of Lothaire and Louis le Débonnaire, are all magnificently illustrated by Count Bastard, vol. ii., with that of Hautvillers. He also gives pictures from two magnificent bibles, written for Louis le Débonnaire and Charles the Bold; and one presented to the latter monarch by Count Vivien, abbat commendatory of Tours, which shews great progress in miniature painting, and attains something like a climax of splendour in ornamental calligraphy. The ceremony of its presentation to Charles the Bald is illustrated on its title-page with considerable skill, and perhaps with some attempts at portraiture. Its writing is a perfect example of what is called the Caroline uncial and deminicial.

Guéranger goes back to the 7th century for the first employment of artistic design by the liturgical calligraphers of the Western church. They began naturally with their initial letters, making the illustration a part of the page considered as a whole, and keeping their art in equal alliance with their calligraphy. In the Eastern church the Rabula MS. shews how much could be done even in the 6th century, but its miniatures are inserted in rectangular spaces, and independent of the writing. (See Professor Westwood's Palaographia Sacra, Introduction; also CRUCIFIX and MINIATURE.)

The canons of Eusebius of Cæsarea were very early added to the sacred text: they are found in the MS. of Rabula, in the 6th century, accompanied with a free and luxuriant ornament: and in the western world the evangeliary of Ulfilas, of the same period, possesses them. The idea of architectural decoration of pages struck the calligraphers at once, as was natural. To consider a row of parallel columns as an arcade, separated by pillars, and to lavish wreath, scroll-, and flower-work, or even birds, on their traceries, was an obvious and pleasing system of decoration. The Colbert evangeliary (Bastard, i.), 7th century, has its columns drawn firmly and beautifully with the pen; and it is most interesting to the artist, in an age of mechanical copying, to observe the extraordinary power and freedom of manual execution in many of these MSS., which in the opinion of the present writer, fully raise the ancient calligraphy to the level of a fine art. The O of Giotto was doubtless a fair test of his great executive power; but it is excelled in difficulty and interest by the pen-drawn birds and grotesques of the MSS. See GROTESQUE, I. 751 f; LION, II. 999, for instances of true pen-drawing. It is singular that the last relics of the vanished art should be the swans or birds of the modern writing-master's flourish.

* The names of these colours are somewhat vague and must necessarily convey rather different ideas to different persons. The greater number of purple MSS. are at present of what would be called a puce colour, mostly dark and rich, but occasionally lightened by tints, or deadened almost into black.

The 8th and 9th century MSS. are richest in their decoration of the canons, and those of St. Martin des Champs, St. Mélard, of the Church of Mans of Hautvillers, and that written for Lothaire, are models of gorgeous grotesque. Sometimes there are twenty or twenty-five pages of them, worked out with inexhaustible variations and fancies. Gold and silver are lavished everywhere; the horizontal lines end in non-descript heads, the leaf-work is rich but chaste, and wreaths about the pillars like "the gadding vine;" and a faint sign of naturalistic imitation appears in the very skillful use of gold to imitate the wavy cloudings and changing lines of polished marble pillars. Animals and small figures present themselves apparently just where they like, though always in places well adapted to balance of pattern and ordered arrangement. They are in some cases emblematic, as the evangelical symbols present themselves constantly, and there are endless nondescripts. A list is appended, taken from the above-mentioned MSS., which differ from the wild grotesques of the Gellone sacramentary of 7th century, by being often drawn with careful attention to natural character.†

A decided falling off in colour-power, with some carelessness of drawing, will be observed in the Hautvillers MS.: the bibles of Charles the Bald are either Franco-Saxon or Gallo-French, showing the serpentine spirals and endless interlacings of the Northern-Gothic work. Count Vivien's MS. shews equal splendour and higher aim in the artist: the great zodiac illumination is given by Count Bastard (vol. ii.).

In the Visigothic work of the Sacramentary of Gellone, 8th century, there is a crucifixion,

† List of animals represented in 9th century MSS. of the Western church:—

Antelope.	Peacock.
Centaur.	Pheasant.
Cock and hen.	Rhinoceros (bull-like).
Crane.	marking the idea of the "Unicorn"
Dove (white).	(MS. Lothaire).
Eagle.	Swan.
Elephant.	Stag and hind.
Hound and compounded as griffin).	Stork.
Lion (and compounded).	Stockdove.

ld the evangeliary of Ulflin, possesses them. The idea of a calendar of pages struck the calligrapher as natural. To consider the initials as an arcade, separated by a wreath, scroll, and flowers, on their traceries, was an original system of decoration. The Book of Hours (Bastard, i.), 7th century, has a firm and beautifully with the interesting to the artist, in the copying, to observe the order and freedom of manual work of these MSS, which in the present writer, fully raise the art to the level of a fine art. It is doubtless a fair test of his power; but it is excelled in the pen-drawn birds of the MSS. See GROSSEAU, 1899, for instances of true pen-work that the last relics of the swans or birds of the birding-master's flourish.

A 9th century MSS. are those of the canons, and those of the camps. St. Melard, of the Hautvillers, and that written in models of gorgeous grotesque, in twenty or twenty-five pages out with inextinguishable varnish. Gold and silver are lavished on horizontal lines and in non-decorative work is rich but chaste, the pillars like "the giddy sign of naturalistic line the very skilful use of gold to loadings and changing lines of pillars. Animals and small figures appear just where they always in places well adapted to an ordered arrangement. The scenes emblematic, as the evanescent themselves constantly, less nondescript. A list is given in the above-mentioned MSS, of the wild grotesques of the 7th century, by being careful attention to natural g off in colour-power, with drawing, will be observed in the bibles of Charles the Franco-Saxon or Gallo-French, the spirals and endless interlathen-Gothic work. Count a equal splendour and higher the great zodiac illumination of Bastard (vol. ii.).

The work of the Sacramentary, there is a crucifixion, represented in 9th century MSS. of Peacock.

Pheasant.
Rhinoceros (bull-like),
marking the sides of the "Unicorn"
(MS. Lothaire).
Swan.
Stag and hind.
Stork.
Stock dove.

with angels; much blood is used, and the drawing is very rude. There is a miniature of the crucifix in the canon of the mass, the cross forming the T in the words "Te igitur." In the same MS. the Mass of the Invention of the Cross has in its initial letter the figure of a man squaring a tree-trunk, as if to form the upright stem. The "Leonic" sacramentary, in the Boileian, 9th century, has highly-ornamented initials in the canon of the mass, but is without figures. Our Lord sits in the initial of the word Quoniam, at the beginning of St. Luke's Gospel, in the MS. of St. Melard. The grand whole-page St. Matthew of the Charlemagne evangeliary, with its mystic fountain and symbolic building of the Church, is an interesting example of the decoration of manuscripts. As Guéranger remarks, the ideas of the heavenly city or palace, and possibly the pillars and polished corners of the Hebrew Temple, may have been in the minds of the artists (Ps. cxliv. 12). We cannot agree with him (Inst. Lit. p. 366) as to their admirable knowledge of perspective; but ingenuity of invention, splendour of material, harmony of colour, and minute accuracy of hand, can go no further than in most of their works. Information about Byzantine architecture is certainly to be gathered from the illustrations of the Menologion or Calendar of the emperor Basil the Younger, and other works; as, for instance, Charlemagne's evangeliary. They remind the student of the architectural backgrounds of Giotto of Pisa, in the lower church of Assisi and elsewhere.

The ease with which cheap copies of the holy scriptures and other books are to be obtained in our own day, may prevent us from understanding the real and practical value of the sacred MSS. of the earlier ages, and still more from understanding the single-hearted devotion, and happy self-concentration, with which the copyists seem to have carried on their labours. It is probable that in most cases the best educated monks, or men of more natural refinement than others, must have been employed in the scriptoria of the great houses; at least in every monastery which professed the life of labour and prayer with sincerity, some sensible division of labour, according to various capacities, must have taken place, and the fine hands of the calligrapher or painter would hardly be set to hew wood or draw water, unless for temporary discipline.

It is singular that Martene, who records forms of benediction in use for all other objects, from emperors and empresses down to pilgrims' staves and scrips, says nothing in his chapter "De Benedictionibus," of forms for dedication of sacred books, though he gives the full order for blessing a writing-desk (scrinium) or book-case (capsa), (De Antiquis Ecclesie Ritibus, lib. iii. cap. 1). This is quoted from an English pontifical MS., and a second from a MS. of St. Victor, said to have been 500 years old, in his own time. The first, however, seems to apply to an area or credence, and neither are within the limits of our period.

A specimen of malediction on any person guilty of stealing a 13th-century MS. is not to be omitted (Colbert, Bibliothèque Natimole). "This sacred gospel has been copied by the hand of George, priest of Rhodes, by the exertions and care of Athanasius, cloistered monk and by the labour of Christonymus Chartinos, for their souls' health. If any man dares to carry it off, either secretly or publicly, let him incur the malediction of the twelve apostles and let him also receive the heavier curse of all monks. Amen." The first day of the month of September, year 6743, of Jesus Christ 1215."

The missal of St. Maur des Fossés speaks to the same purpose. "This book belongs to St. Mary and St. Peter, of the monastery of the Treuches. He who shall have stolen or sold it, or in any manner withdrawn it from this place; or he who shall have been its buyer, may he be ever in the company of Judas, Pilate, and Caiaphas. Amen, amen. Fiat, fiat. Brother Robert Gualensis (of Wales?), being yet young and a Levite, hath devoutly written it for his soul's health, in the time of Louis (le Gros), king of the French, and of Asselin, abbat of this place. Richard, prior and monk, caused this book to be copied, in order to deserve the heavenly and blessed country. Thou, O priest, who ministerest before the Lord, be mindful of him. Pater noster."

The bindings and outer cases (capsae) of the more important liturgical books are in themselves a subject of no small interest. That of the Eusebian evangeliary of Verceil is thus described by Mabillon (Iter Ital. p. 9, April 1685). "Codex operculum ex argento, a Berengario imperatore ab annis fere octingentis instauratum, ex una parte Salvatoris effigiem, ex alio sanctum Eusebium exhibet; ad cuius caput hi versus adscripti leguntur:

Præsul hic Eusebium scripsit, solvitque vetustas;
Rex Berengarius sed reparavit idem.

In infima vero parte ad pedes Eusebii

Argentum [?] postquam fulvo decompit et auro, Ecclesie Præsuli obtulit ipse suae."

He also mentions (p. 213, Jan. 1686) the ivory covers of St. Gregory's purple antiphonary, at Monza, one of which has a medallion of David, the other of the donor. The great MS. of Theodolinda (supra) has a golden cover, with the cross on each side. These ancient relics may be classed according to their material and ornaments, whether of carved ivory, of chased metal, or of metal with jewelled ornaments. A special interest attaches to the ivory covers, not only from their intrinsic value, but from the use of ancient consular diptychs (DIPTYCHA). There is no doubt that many of these ancient ivories have been employed by later ages in the bindings of liturgical books, sometimes with slight changes and adaptations, as in the antiphonary of Monza. This is, perhaps, the typical example of a consular diptych, converted to ecclesiastical use. Two ivory panels or plaques bear each its figure, perfectly recognisable as a consul of the 5th century, by the dress and the mappa of the games. But one of them has been converted to St. Gregory the Great, by the addition of a tonsure, and the addition of a cross to his staff of office. The other has had his wand lengthened and curved into a shepherd's staff, and passes for David. The consular ivory of

* This Professor Westwood denies, Early Christian Sculptures, p. 34

Flavius Taurus Clementinus, now at Nuremberg, had an ecclesiastical diptych-list engraven on the ivory itself, and the Diptychon Leodiense, in memory of the consul Flavius Astyrius, forms one of the sides of an evangelary in St. Martin's, of Liège, and is also engraved on the inside. (See Donati, De Dittici degli Antichi profani e sacri, Lucea, 1753-4; Gori, Thesaurus veterum Diptychonum, Flor. 1751, fol.; and Maskell, Ivories, 1876.)

There is a passage in Cassiodorus in which he speaks of having designed and published, or set forth in a collected volume, a number of examples of carvings, or designs of some kind, for the external bindings of sacred books. "We have moreover designed skillful artifices in the coverings of our MSS.; so that there might be a covering of outer ornament over the beauty of the sacred text, herein perhaps in some sort imitating that example of the Lord's figuring. Who clothed in marriage garments those whom He thought worthy of invitation to His supper. Among which we have set forth many examples of designs (facturarum) represented in one volume, that any studious person may choose for himself any form of covering he shall prefer." (De Institutione divin. Scripturarum, cap. xxx.) These would probably be executed in ivory for the most part. The Ivory of Murano (described by Costadoni in the collection of Calogera, tom. xx.) is of the greatest interest, as it is covered with reliefs of the ancient cubicles of the catacombs and of the earlier sarcophagi, and it may be considered earlier than the 8th century. The nail-holes intended to fix the ivory panel on the cover of the book to which it belonged still remain, as is the case with many ivories, which have been used for reliquaries and shrines, as in the case of the diptychs of Symmachus and Nicomachus (Gori, Thesaurus, tom. i. p. 207). For 9th-century ivories as bindings of church books, those of the evangelary of Lorch in the Vatican, and of the sacramentary of Droyon and evangelary, No. 99 of the Bibliothèque Nationale, may be referred to. The collection, or catalogue, of Professor Westwood, is the best reference in this country for all the more ancient documents on ivory.

The Gothic evangelary of Ulphilas is called Codex Argenteus, on account of its rich binding of that metal; and the evangelaries of St. Médard and St. Emmeran possess covers of enamel and gold respectively, the latter with embossed portraits. Plates of vermilion-enamel occur in the Eusebian gospels, and one of the covers of the Lorch evangelary is of this material. This use of different metals was practised by Victor III., while at Monte Casino, under the name of Didier; who ornamented an epistolary for his abbey, with gold plate on one side and silver on the other; this binding was called dimidius (D'Achery, Spicilegium, tom. iii. p. 402). Precious stones, and even relics, have been enclosed in these bindings, as by Didier of Monte Cassino, in the MS. of St. Emmeran, in the splendid ones of the Sainte-Chapelle,* and in many instances, and with great magnificence, in the Eastern church."

The subjects represented in Ivory or metal on covers of sacred books are of course, in most cases, simple in choice and in execution during our period. Guéranger mentions in particular the grand ivory cover of the Lorch evangelary in the Vatican, which bears some resemblance in its carving to the work of the later sarcophagi, and which he vindicates on Gori's authority (Thes. v. Diptych. tom. iii. tab. lv.) from the imputation of being a pagan ivory, altered and adapted to Christian use.¹ Our Lord is represented as holding the Gospel and treading down the Lion and the Dragon, attended by two angels bearing sceptres and rolls; above are two flying angels with a cleft cross, and below, two subjects of the Magi before Herod, and also making their offerings to the Holy Child and His Mother.

On the great MS. 99 of the Bibliothèque Nationale, are Lazarus, the Samaritan woman, and the Entry into Jerusalem, treated much as in the sarcophagi. See Treor de Numismatique, Bas-reliefs et Ornaments, X. Série, II. Classe, 2 partie, pl. ix. x. xi. The sacramentary of Droyon has liturgical rites chased or embossed on its cover in eighteen compartments.

The embossed figure of our Lord on the Vercelli Gospels is probably one of the earliest in such a place, and dates from about 888. Representations of the crucifixion also begin in that age.

The folio work of Prof. Westwood, published 1869, contains an appendix note on the magnificent book-covers, "auro argento gemmisque ornata, which are repeatedly mentioned in connexion with fine early copies of the Gospels. They have, for the most part, long ago disappeared; but there still exist a number of metal cases which have served to hold some of the smaller Irish MSS., which generally exhibit restorations at various periods." They are also generally ornamented with crystals or other gems, and are known under the name of cumbdachs. See article on the Book of Armagh, p. 80; on the Psalter of S. Columba, p. 82; the Book of Diurna, pp. 83, 84; and the Gospels of S. Mellig, p. 93. Plate 51, fig. 9, represents a party of ecclesiastics from the cumbdach of the Stow missal, p. 88. The front of that of St. Molaise or Molasch is at fig. 6, pl. 51. "It is 5½ inches by 4½ inches, and 3½ inches deep; of bronze, bound with silver, overlaid with openwork, riveted, on white metal, silvered . . . a cruciform or wheel-cross design, with the emblems of the Four Evangelists at the angles, barbarously designed. Portions of gold filigree and interlaced ornaments, with some jewels, occupy some of the remaining compartments of the openwork, one ruby still remaining in its setting."

The capsae or cases in which the books thus gorgeously ornamented were deposited for safety were generally made of, or adorned with, plates

* Even in Constantinople, The Russian service books have been pronounced the most splendid in the world (La Neuville, Relation de Moscou, à Paris, 1699, p. 193, quoted by Guéranger).

¹ It appears to be 8th or 9th century by the limb, the image cleft, and its overlaid ornament; it cannot be supposed to be of anything like primitive or classical antiquity.

* On the gold bindings of the Sainte-Chapelle evangelaries:—

No.	Emeralds.	Pearls.	Sapphires.	Rubics.
1.	30	140	35	24	(10th cent.)
2.	26	60	12	10	Onyx 2.

seem n
gregat
tongue
Christ
so. S

The
frank stitute
Bath
vocifera

with great magnificence, in uted in ivory or metal on is are of course, in most and in execution during r mentions in particular
 of the Loreh evangeliary
 bears some resemblance work of the later sarcoindicates on Gori's autho-
 h. tom. iii. tab. iv.) from ng a pagan ivory, altered tian use.¹ Our Lord is the Gospel and treading Dragon, attended by two and rolls; above are two plicate cross, and below,
 ight before Herod, and also
 s to the Holy Child and

o) of the Bibliothèque Nae Samaritan woman, and em, treated much as in Treſor de Numismatique,
 ts, X. Série, II. Classe,
 . The sacramentary of rites chased or embossed compartments.
 of our Lord on the Ver-
 one of the earliest in such about 888. Representa-also begin in that age.
 Prof. Westwood, published pendix note on the magnario argento gemmis-
 re repeatedly mentioned ne early copies of the
 for the most part, long t there still exist a s which have served to nder Irish MSS., which ations at various periods,
 ornated with crystals,
 known under the name
 cle on the Book of Armagh, f S. Columba, p. 82; the e 84; and the Gospels of e 51, fig. 9, represents a rom the cumbach of that
 The front of that St.
 at fig. 6, pl. 53. "It is and 3½ inches deep; of iver, overlaid with opu-tent metal, silvered . . . a oss design, with the em-gelists at the angles, harrations of gold filigræe and with some jewels, occupy compartments of the openemaining in its setting."
 in which the books thus were deposited for safely
 f, or adorned with, plates

e. The Russian service books
 e most splendid in the world
Moscou, à Paris, 1698, p. 192.

th century by the nimble,
 e enclosed ornament; it cannot g like primitive or classical

of gold, silver, &c. They are mentioned repeatedly in mediæval documents beyond our period; but Gregory of Tours says that Childebert obtained, in the plunder won from Annalaric, about twenty of these cases for evangeliaries, all covered with pure gold and precious stones" (Hist. Francor. cap. lxxiii. p. 114; Migne, 71, 259). St. Wilfrid of York's evangeliary had a case of this kind (Acta SS. O.S.B. Saec. II. part ii. Vita S. Wilfredi).

The study of this subject must necessarily lend, as has been said, to a full understanding of the reverence paid to the text of the Gospels, in particular, during the dark ages, and at a period when that text, like the oral prophecies of the Lord in Samuel's early days, was rare and precious in the eyes of those who were its keepers. Yet, in looking at the few and splendid relics of the magnificence of Byzantine or Carolingian ritual, it is impossible to help thinking of the vast mass of perished MSS. of far earlier days, written on humbler materials and for humbler hands; and on the important question, how far the skill, enterprise, and numbers of the regular book-transcribing and selling trades of Rome and the larger cities of the empire may have multiplied cheap copies of the Holy Scriptures in the first three centuries. This is for other hands; an article on the learning of the early Church by the Rev. Prof. Milligan (Cont. Rev. vol. x. April 1869) is well worthy of reference as bearing on the subject; but the important and strictly correct remark of the Commendatore de Rossi, that the early cycle of Christian ornament in the Catacombs is merely a ciel. biblicæ, or scriptural repertory of Christian symbolism and history, bears also on this observation. It is impossible not to see that in the earliest centuries the Holy Scriptures were held to be the exclusive repertory of subjects for Christian art, and that the true and exclusive use of Christian popular art was general instruction in Scripture.

It seems possible that evangeliaries or forms of sacramental ministration may have been multiplied on papyrus, like other books, in large numbers by means of dictation—possibly to educated slaves or freedmen. If so, they have perished with other books in the wrecks of ancient civilisation.

The following inscription from the first folio of the Gospels of Treves may be taken (as prefixed to the facsimiles of Anglo-Saxon and Irish miniatures) to represent the commendatory inscriptions of the Greek MSS.

"Scriptori vita aeterna; Legenti pax perpetua; Videnti felicitas perennis; Habenti possessio e salute. Amen Dō gracias; Ora pro me; D's tecum." [R. St. J. T.]

LITURGICAL LANGUAGE. It would seem natural that prayer and praise in the congregation should be made in the vernacular tongue of the people; and in the early days of Christianity there can be no doubt that it was so. St. Paul's depreciation of "speaking with tongues," in comparison with "prophesying" (1 Cor. xiv. 1-7), has not indeed a direct bearing on the question of liturgical language, for the "tongues" of which he speaks do not appear to have been foreign languages, but utterances which only persons specially gifted could interpret; but his reasoning on the necessity of so giving thanks and so speaking that the congregation may be edified, and may not merely hear sounds which convey no definite impression, applies in full force to services celebrated in languages "not understood of the people." Even Guéranger (Inst. Lit. iii. 86, 88; compare Bona, de Heb. Lit. l. 5), eagerly as he defends the modern Roman usage, "has no difficulty in conceding that originally the church must have employed the vulgar tongue at the altar. . . . As for the apostles themselves, there is no doubt that they celebrated the liturgy in the language of the people whom they instructed." In truth, we may safely conclude, on the testimony of Origen (c. Celsus, viii. c. 37, p. 402, Spencer), that in the third century "each man prayed to God in his own common speech (κατὰ τὴν ἑαυτοῦ διάλεκτον), and sang hymns to Him as he could."

Over a large portion of the East there can be no doubt that Greek—in which were written the great liturgies which bear the names of St. James, St. Basil, St. Chrysostom, and St. Mark—was the language of public devotion; for, from the beginning of the fourth century, Greek was the official language of the Eastern empire, and Constantinople the seat of a patriarchate. Numerous liturgies are also found in Syriac, whether translations of Greek originals or of independent origin. The Armenian, the Ethiopic, and the native Egyptian churches had also vernacular services. Of the early use of the latter we have an instance in the circumstance which Athanasius (Vita Antonii, c. 2, p. 633) relates of St. Anthony, that he was induced to sell all that he had by hearing the parable of the rich young man read in church. As we are expressly told that the saint knew none but his native language, this lecture must have been in Coptic. Where a vernacular version, from whatever cause, was not used in the services, an interpreter explained what was read. Thus Procopius held three offices in the church at Seythopolis; first, that of reading; second, that of interpreting Syriac (in Syri interpretatione sermonis); third, that of exorcist.

It is probable that even in the West the first missionaries of Christianity spoke mainly Greek, the "lingua franca" of the educated class throughout Europe, and of the scattered communities of Jews and Jewish proselytes in Gentile cities. The church in Rome to which St. Paul wrote was a Greek-speaking community, and so it continued to be for several generations. Polycarp came to Rome to confer with Anicetus on the observance of Easter in the year 170. Eusebius tells us (H. E. v. 24) that on this occasion the pope—himself almost certainly a Greek—ceded to the stranger the privilege of consecrating the eucharist. It is in the highest degree probable that Polycarp celebrated in any other language than Greek. At the beginning of the third century Hippolytus wrote in Greek, and evidently contemplated the church in Rome as a Greek-speaking society. The inscriptions on the tombs of popes Fabian (A.D. 251), Lucius (A.D.

¹ The same author tells a story of a goldsmith who fraudulently combined with the saint's messenger to substitute silver for gold in the binding of an evangeliary. Both were swallowed up by the earth, "viventes et vacillantes." (De Gloria Confess. cap. lxxiii. p. 946.)

252), and Eutychanus (A.D. 275) are in Greek; a fact which, as De Rossi (Roma Sott. Christ. i. p. 126) points out, evidences the official use of the Greek tongue by the Roman church in its solemn acts. And at an even later date, pope Sylvester (†435) wrote against the Jews in the Greek tongue; unless indeed the treatise which we possess is a Greek translation of a Latin original. From this time all trace of Greek as the language of the church of Rome vanishes; it probably migrated to Byzantium with the emperor and the court. Pope Leo (440-461) seems to have been ignorant of Greek; he was certainly unable to write it, for he speaks of the necessity of having an accurate Greek translation made of his letter to Flavian (Epist. 131 ad Julian.); and the words of Proterius (Leo, Epist. 133), apologising for the omission of a Latin translation of his letter, the responsibility of which (as it seems) he wished to leave to the pope, seem to imply that he could not read it in Greek. Survivals of the days when Greek was the liturgical language of the church of Rome are found in the Kyrie Eleison so frequent in her services; in the use of the Greek Trisagion—Agios o Theos, agios ischyros, agios atavatos, eisions inas—in the Holy Week; in the recitation of the Creed in Greek on behalf of a child to be baptized [CRED. I. 492]; in the reciting of certain lectures in Greek as well as in Latin [INSTRUCTION, I. 862]; and in the singing of the angelic hymn in Greek in the Christmas mass (Martene, lit. Ant. I. iii. 2. § 6).

In the half-Greek districts of Southern Italy, Greek rites naturally lingered long; but the Greek element received a large accession when Leo the Isaurian, in the eighth century, placed a considerable part of Southern Italy under the ecclesiastical jurisdiction of the patriarchs of Constantinople, who not only founded new sees, but made vigorous efforts to introduce Greek rites. And these efforts of the pope's adversaries were seconded by the pope's adherents; for many Basilian monks who, like the pope, defended images, took refuge in the same region, where they naturally maintained their own services in their monasteries, which were numerous (P. P. Kollota, Dell' Origine, Progresso, e stato presente del Rito Greco in Italia osservato dai Greci Monaci Basiliani e Albanesi, Roma, 1758). There is a strong indication of the mixture of the two languages in the following circumstance. The author of the life of Athanasius of Naples (†877), commonly supposed to be Peter the Deacon, speaks of "laity and clergy not ceasing in common prayer in Greek and Latin." Even the purely Western Benedictine Order was not insensible to the influence of the Greek colonies in its neighbourhood. Thus we read that the monks of Monte Cassino on Easter Tuesday, going from their monastery to the church of St. Peter, sang mass with a bilingual chant (Greek and Latin) to the end of the gospel (Codex Cussin. in Martene, Monach. Rit. III. xvii. n. 14).

In Southern Gaul we find another region which had received its civilisation mainly from Greece. There, says Dean Milman, "Latin had not entirely dispossessed the Greek even in the fifth century;" and Jourdain (Traductions d'Aristote, p. 44) refers to a MS. of Limoges in the National Library at Paris (No. 4458), which gives the Gloria, Sanctus, and Agnus Dei in the mass of Pentecost, in Greek. Doublet (Antiq. de St. Denis, c. 48, p. 366) tells us that on the festival of St. Denis the monks of the abbey of St. Denis, near Paris, chanted the whole mass in Greek, in honour of the Greek apostle of France, with Epistle and Gospel in Latin as well as in Greek.

The MS. Sacramentary, No. 2290, of the Paris National Library, which is of the ninth century, contains at the beginning the Gloria in Excelsis, the Nicene Creed, the Sanctus, and the Agnus Dei, in Greek, but in Latin characters. In the so-called "Athelstane's Psalter" (British Museum, Galba, A. xviii.), in a portion of the MS. which belongs to the early part of the ninth century, we find a short Litany, the Lord's Prayer, the Apostles' Creed, and the Sanctus in Greek, in Anglo-Saxon characters. And in a Psalter in the library of Corpus Christi College, Cambridge, called "Pope Gregory's Psalter," is a Creed in Greek.

At the time when Christianity was first preached, Latin was rapidly becoming the common tongue of a large part of Western Europe; the conquests of Rome, as St. Augustine remarks (De Civ. Dei, xix. 7), imposed the Latin language on the subject races. Latin was commonly spoken in the Roman colony of Africa, and in Africa we find the most considerable Latin writers of the early ages—Tertullian and Cyprian. St. Augustine tells us of himself (Conf. l. 14) that he learned Latin in the nursery, and contrasts the perfect ease with which he acquired this with the difficulty which he afterwards experienced in learning Greek. In preaching at Hippo he assumes that his congregation all spoke Latin, while some at least did not understand the native Punic; for, quoting a Punic proverb, he thinks it necessary to translate it into Latin: "quia Punicæ non omnes nostis" (Serm. 167, on Eph. v. 15, 16). The earliest distinct mention of a liturgical form in Latin appears to be Cyprian's citation of the Sursum Corda (De Unit. Don. c. 31). Gaul from the time of its subjugation adopted the Roman customs and idiom with remarkable readiness; and in later times the civilised Gauls imposed their tongue on their Frankish and Norman conquerors. An incident related by Sulpicius Severus (Vita S. Mart. c. 9) may serve to shew that Latin was what we may fairly call the vernacular of at least a portion of Gaul in the fourth century. Martin was taken by force from his beloved monastery by a crowd of the neighbouring villagers to be made bishop. In the church to which he was taken some one in the crowd, opening a Psalter at random, read aloud from the eighth psalm the verse, "Ex ore infantium et lactentium perfecti laudem propter inimicos tuos, ut destruas inimicum et defensorem." There was instantly a shout raised, for the people looked upon the passage as of ill omen to the defender, a neighbouring bishop who had opposed Martin's election. In Spain also, after its subjugation by the Romans, the Latin language came into common use. It seems also to have been spoken in Dalmatia. Jerome at least, who was born there, clearly regarded it as his native language, and complains that he never heard of it in its purity while he

* The word defensorem is used in the older version for the ultorem of the present.

Greek. Doublet (Antiq. &c.) tells us that on the feast of the monks of the abbey of St. Chanté the whole mass in the Greek apostle of France, the Gospel in Latin as well as in ary, No. 2290, of the Paris which is of the ninth century, being the Gloria in Excelsis, the Sicutus, and the Agnus Dei in Latin characters. In the so-called "Psalter" (British Museum, a portion of the MS. which is part of the ninth century, the Lord's Prayer, the Sanctus, in Greek, in Latin. And in a Psalter in the Christy College, Cambridge, "y's Psalter," is a Creed in Christianity was first rapidly becoming the common part of Western Europe; as St. Augustine remarks imposed the Latin language. Latin was commonly in a colony of Africa, and in the most considerable Latin languages—Tertullian and Cyprian. is of himself (Conf. l. 34) in the nursery, and converse with which he acquired uld which he afterwards ng Greek. In preaching at his congregation all spoke at least did not understand r, quoting a Punic proverb, y to translate it into Latin: ones nosis" (Serm. 167, on e earliest distinct mention in Latin appears to be the Sacrum Cordi (De Orat. yrom the time of its subju-Roman customs and idiom adiness; and in later times posed their tongue on their n conquerors. An incident Severus (Vita S. Mart. ew that Latin was what ve vernacular of at least a por- urth century. Martin was his beloved monastery by a ouring villagers to be made ch to which he was taken d, opening a Psalter at ran- the eighth psalm the verse, et letentium perfectio iojos tuos, ut destruas ini- " There was instantly a people looked upon the pas- o Defensor, a neighbouring osed Martin's electio. In subjugation by the Romans, ame into common use. It eo spoken in Balmatica. no was born there, clearly ve language, and complains of it in its purity while he was living in the East (Epist. 7 [al. 43] ad Ciron., p. 18). Even in Britain after the time of Agricola the upper classes adopted to some extent the Roman language and customs (Tacit. Agric. c. 21).

m is used in the older versio ent.

When Latin was so generally diffused, it could not fail soon to become the vehicle of public worship. When public prayer was first offered in Latin in Rome itself we cannot tell, but it is an obvious conjecture that when the "old Italic" version of the New Testament came into use in Rome, prayers and thanksgivings were also said in the Latin tongue. That at an early date Latin became the liturgical language of (at least) much the greater part of Italy, of Gaul, and of Spain, admits of no doubt whatever. The "clerks" and officials everywhere spoke Latin throughout the Western empire. And even when Christianity was introduced into regions where little or no Latin was spoken, as Britain and Ireland, there is no evidence of vernacular services; the early evangelists of Britain, St. Patrick and his followers in Ireland, the Roman missionaries to the Angles and Saxons, alike seem to have retained the Roman language in the offices which they introduced. Probably it would have seemed a kind of profanation to translate sacred phrases into the "gibberish" of barbarian tribes. Indeed it came to be maintained that a certain sacredness attaches to the three languages, Greek, Latin, and Hebrew, of the inscription on the Lord's cross (Hilary of Poitiers, Prod. in lib. Pass. c. 13; Honorius of Autun, Geniva Animæ, i. 92), and that these tongues alone—Syriac being taken to represent the ancient Hebrew—are fit vehicles for the public prayers of Christians. Hilary further elevates Latin to a dominant position among the three tongues, as the language of Rome, "specialiter evangelica doctrina in Romani imperii, sub quo Hebraei et Graeci continentur, seculi consistit." Ulfilas did indeed give the Goths a vernacular version of the Bible, but even here there is no trace remaining of Gothic offices.

That the Latin of the service-books was often, even among the so-called "Latin" races, a tongue "not understood of the people" seems scarcely doubtful. In Italy, for instance, where even at this day the peasantry speak several dialects neither mutually intelligible nor intelligible to those who only understand the literary Italian, we cannot suppose that the language of Leo and Gregory was everywhere understood. The same may be said of Spain and Gaul, and still more of Britain and Ireland. Provision was no doubt made for instructing the several races in their own tongues wherein they were born, and there is no reason to doubt that the nature of the several offices was explained to the faithful; but the offices themselves seem to have been invariably said in Latin. Whatever may be the case with the Syriac or other Eastern offices, in the districts where Greek and Latin were the ecclesiastical languages the gulf between the tongue of the church and the tongue of the people was always widening; the dialect of the streets came to differ widely from the unchanging idiom of the church, even while it retained the same name. In the eighth century this divergency became so marked that it was recognised by authority. A council at Frankfort in the year 794 (c. 52, Conc. Germ. i. 323; Baluze, Cypit.

Reg. Fr. l. 270) expressly repudiated the theory of the three sacred languages, on the ground that God heareth prayer in every tongue; and Charles the Great, insisting (Capit. v. 161, in Baluze, l. 855) that all men should learn the Creed and the Lord's Prayer, makes provision for the ease of those who know none but their mother tongue: "qui aliter non potuerit vel in sua lingua hoc discat." The same monarch further directs (Capit. vi. 185; Bal. l. 954) that every presbyter should teach men publicly in his church, in the tongue which his hearers understand, truly to believe the faith of Almighty God in Unity and Trinity, and also those things which are to be said to all generally; as avoiding evil and doing good, and of the command to come in the Resurrection. He cannot do this of himself is to get a proper form of words written out by some more learned person, which he may read; and he who cannot even do this must exhort the people in the words, "Repente ye, for the kingdom of heaven is at hand." Herard (Capit. 55, Bal. l. 1289) ordered that no man should be admitted to be a godfather who did not understand the Creed and the Lord's Prayer in his own tongue, and the nature of the covenant made with God. A council at Rheims, A.D. 813 (c. 15), enjoined bishops to preach in the dialects of their several dioceses, and in the same year a council at Tours (c. 17) ordered bishops to translate their homilies into the rustic-Roman or the Teutonic tongue. So the council of Mayence (c. 2) in the year 847. At a still earlier date the council of West, A.D. 743 (Concc. Germ. i. 51; Swainson, The Nicene and Apostles' Creeds, p. 22) had ordered the Renunciations and Professions in baptism to be made in the vernacular—which is given in the canon—of the Teutonic converts. These instances shew that, while care was taken to instruct the faithful in the cardinal truths of Christianity, the offices in general were in the ecclesiastical tongue, Latin.

When the Slavonic races were converted in the 9th century, pope John VIII. (A.D. 880) not only permitted but recommended that the divine offices and liturgy should be said in their vernacular. It is interesting to notice that he expressly repudiates the theory of three sacred languages and no more, saying that Scripture calls upon all nations and all peoples to praise the Lord, and that the apostles spoke in all tongues the wonderful works of God (Epist. 293, ad Sacerdotes, Migne, 126, p. 906). Nor is it (he continues) in any way contrary to sound faith and doctrine to say masses in the Slavonic tongue; or to read the gospel, or lessons of the Old or New Testament, well translated or interpreted; or to sing other hour-offices in it; for he who made the three chief tongues (linguas principales), Hebrew, Greek, and Latin, also made the others to His honour and glory. The pope however makes this reservation, that the gospel, to give it the more honour, should always be read first in Latin, and afterwards translated into Slavonic. Swentopnk and his judges may, if they please, hear mass in Latin. The Russian church returns to this day its vernacular services.

The following are instances of provision being made for the wants of a district where several languages were spoken. Theodosius the archimandrite built within the circuit of his monastery four churches; one for the brothers of the house, in which the offices were said in Greek; one in which they were said in the vernacular of the Bessene, a barbarous tribe of the neighbourhood; one in which they were said in Armenian; and a fourth in which the brothers who were vexed with devils, and those who had charge of them, had their special service. The ordinary daily offices were thus said severally; but when the eucharist was celebrated, the office was said in the several churches and tongues to the end of the gospel, and then the several congregations (except the demoniacs) assembled in the Greek—the proper monastic—church for the remaining portion of the celebration (Simeon Metaphr. Vita Theod. c. 24, in Surius, Jan. 11). It is not quite clear whether the restriction of the more solemn part of the mysteries to one church and one tongue arose simply from a desire to symbolise more emphatically the oneness of the community, or from a reluctance to recite the anaphora in any other than one of the recognised "sacred" languages; and the same ambiguity attaches to the following somewhat similar instance. St. Sabas is said (Cyril Scythop. Vita Sab. cc. 20, 32, in Cotelierus, Mon. Eccl. Græc. iii. 247, 264) to have provided the Armenians with an oratory, and afterwards with a church, where they might say the psalms, the megalion, and other portions of the divine office separately in their own tongue, but at the time of oblation join the Hellenists and communicate with them. The same event is narrated in Surius (Dec. 5) in the following form. Sabas transferred the Armenian congregation to the church which he had built, on condition that the glorification and reading of the gospels should take place in their own tongue, while they should partake of the divine mysteries with the rest. And the writer adds, that when some adopted an addition made by Peter the Fuller to the angelic hymn [SACRUS], Sabas desired them to chant that hymn in Greek, that he might know whether they adopted the correct version; he apparently did not understand Armenian.

Literature.—Ussher, Historia Dogm. de Script. et Sacris Vernaculis; Boua, de Heb. Liturg. l. v. 4; Biugham, Antiq. XIII. iv.; Martene, de Rit. Ant. l. iii. 2; Krazer, de Liturgiis Occ. sec. v. c. 3; Binterim, Denkwürdigkeiten, vol. iv. pt. 2, p. 93 ff.; Martigny, Dict. des Antiq. Chrét. s. v. Liturgies Liturgiques; Bishop A. P. Forbes, On Greek Rites in the West, in the Church and the World, 1867, p. 145 ff.; W. E. Scudamore, Notitia Euchaistica, p. 207, first edition; Probst, Liturgie der drei ersten Christl. Jahrhunderte, Einleitung, § 4. [C.]

LITURGY. (1.) The Greek words λεiturγία, λεiturγία, λεiturγία, in their early usage refer to the work or the agent in any public service. Etymologically we may compare δημιουργός. Λεiturγία thus means to perform some service for the public. In Athens, it came to be used technically for the duty which wealthy men were especially called upon to render to the state, and the λεiturγία was the service which they rendered. [See "Liturgia," in DICTIONARY OF GREEK AND ROMAN ANTIQUITIES.]

(2.) Except in a passage of Plutarch where the limitation is effected by the context, we do not find in classical Greek any special application of the word LITURGY other than is contained in the above. But in the Septuagint it is generally, though not exclusively, used in this behalf. Thus we have the word and its derivatives applied to the service at the altar; or to the service in or to the tabernacle; and in Daniel vii. 10, "Thousand thousands ministered unto Him."

(3.) In the New Testament the usage of the words is less restricted. Thus, kings are ministers to God, in attending on the duties of their high office (Rom. xiii. 6). Hence we pass on to the parabolic use of the word λεiturγία, in Rom. xv. 16. "So that I should be a minister: to Jesus Christ (λεiturγία 'I. X.') for the Gentiles, in administering in sacerdotal or sacred fashion (επιποιούοντα) the gospel of God, in order that the offering up of the Gentiles might become accepted, being sanctified in the Holy Ghost." Another instance of this parabolic use is to be found in Phil. ii. 17. "But even if I am poured out as a libation over the sacrifice and ministry (λεiturγία) of your faith, I rejoice and congratulate you all." Thus the special meaning of the word and its cognates in any particular passage must be determined (if at all) by the context. There can be no doubt of the meaning in Luke i. 23, "when the days of his ministration were accomplished." Some doubt is felt as to Acts xiii. 2, "As they ministered to the Lord, and fasted." Chrysostom explains the word by κηρύσσοντων (preaching); it would rather seem to refer to some public ministration to the Lord, such as was accompanied with a fast. Of the Saviour it is recorded (Heb. viii. 3), that He has obtained a more excellent ministry than the ministry of Aaron: the explanation being given in vv. 1, 2. "He is seated on the right hand of the Majesty in the heavens, a minister of the sanctuary and of the true tabernacle." Thus the angels are ministering spirits, sent forth for service (εις διακονίαν), for the sake of those who are to inherit salvation.

(4.) In early Christian literature the word λεiturγία was soon adopted in reference to sacred functions. Thus Clemens Romanus (l. c. 8) speaks of the old prophets as the ministers of the grace of God, speaking through the Holy Spirit. And in c. 44 he speaks of the office of the apostles as being their Liturgy or Ministry. In the process of time the word liturgy came, in practice, to be regarded as the appropriate designation of the Eucharistic office, but it is not quite clear when this limitation was generally accepted. At the council of Ancyra, (A. D. 314), a presbyter who had offered to an idol, was forbidden (c. i.) "either to offer or to address the congregation, or to minister: any part whatever of the hieratic ministrations," ἢ βλασ λεiturγίαν τὰ τῶν ἱερατικῶν λεiturγιῶν. Canon 2 enforced a similar rule on deacons who had lapsed. Athanasius speaks of the Arians stopping the bread (τῶν λεiturγιῶν καὶ τῶν παρθένων) of the ministers and the virgins. In the acts of the council of Ephesus mention is made of the evening and morning liturgies, and Theodoret (iii. 114) is also quoted as speaking of the evening liturgy, i. e. the evening service. The same writer (iii. 1065) speaks of the liturgy of the Holy Baptism:

affected by the context, we see the usual Greek name applied to the Liturgy other than is common. But in the Septuagint it is not exclusively used in this sense. We have the word and its derivative used in the service at the altar; or to the tabernacle; and in Daniel and thousands ministered unto the use of the word is restricted. Thus, kings are ministered unto in attending on the duties of a king (Rom. xiii. 6). Hence we pass to the use of the word λειτουργία, "So that I should be a minister to the Gentiles, in sacerdotal or sacred fashion of the service of God, in order that the Gentiles might become sanctified in the Holy Ghost," of this parabolic use is to be seen in 17. "But even if I am poured out over the sacrifice and ministry of your faith, I rejoice and congratulate you. Thus the special meaning of the word in any particular passage is determined (if at all) by the context. There can be no doubt of the meaning here in the days of his ministry." Some doubt is felt as to Acts 13:10, "ministered to the Lord, and from whom the word is derived is rather seem to refer to the Lord, such as with a fast. Of the Saviour (Matt. x. viii. 3), that He has obtained ministry than the ministry of the Lord, being given in vv. 1, 2, the right hand of the Majesty of the Lord, the sanctuary and the altar." Thus the angels are sent forth for service (1 Pet. i. 12) for the sake of those who are to in-

Christian literature the word is not adopted in reference to the Liturgy. Thus Clement Romanus (1. c. 44) speaks of the office of the Liturgy or Ministry, and regards as the appropriate name the Eucharistic office, but it is only in this limitation was given. At the council of Ancyra, the word was used to refer to the office of either to offer or to regulate, or to minister: "the hieratic ministrations," ἐκείνη τὰ τῶν ἱερατικῶν λειτουργιών. Athanasius speaks of the bread (τῶν λειτουργιῶν) of the ministers and the acts of the council of Ephesus of the evening and morning (iii. 114) is also quoted in the evening liturgy, i. e. the Liturgy of the Holy Baptism:

and Ep. cxlvi. p. 1032, he says that in almost all the churches the apostolic benediction (2 Cor. xiii. 13) forms the introduction to the mystical liturgy. The additional mystical course limits the term Liturgy, and, in fact, we shall find that this benediction stands at the commencement of the anaphora in most of the liturgies that will come under our review. It is not found in that of St. Mark, nor the Coptic St. Basil, nor in the Mozarabic. I may mention also here that it is not found in either the Roman or the Ambrosian or the Gallican Canon. Theodoret therefore refers to the liturgies of the Oriental churches proper.*

(5.) Turning now to the services for the administration of the Eucharist, which are specifically called LITURGIES, we may note in passing that the newly discovered complement to the first letter of Clement Romanus contains liturgical phrases which we find also in the liturgy of the church of Alexandria, of which below. Apart from this, the earliest records of such service are contained in the letter of Pliny to Trajan, and the Apology of Justin Martyr. From the former, we know that the Christians used to meet on a stated day before it was light, and repeat alternately a hymn to Christ as God, and bind themselves sacramentally that they would commit no crime; then they separated, and came together again a second time to partake of food, ordinary and innocent. The use of the word sacramentum here certainly seems to point to the reception of the Eucharist, for it is, of course, inconceivable that an oath to this effect should be repeated on every occasion:—it may, however, point to the Baptismal promise. But the accounts in Justin Martyr give us more information. He describes the service as it was performed after the administration of Baptism, and again on an ordinary Sunday. Combining the two accounts together we learn that during the service the records of the apostles or the writings of the prophets were read by a special reader, and, when he had ceased, the President instructed the congregation, urging them to imitate the noble things of which they had heard. United or common prayer was offered for those who were assembled, for those who had been baptized, and for all believers everywhere, that now that they had learned the truth they might by their good works be enabled to keep God's commandments so that they might attain to eternal salvation. The prayers were said standing, and apparently by all; and these being concluded they saluted each other with the kiss of peace. Then bread was brought to the president and a cup of wine and water; and now he, alone, with all his energy, sent up his prayers and thanksgivings, and the people assented with the word "Amen," and the deacons gave to each of those who were present a portion of the bread and wine and water over which the thanksgiving had been offered, and portions were also sent by their hands to those who were absent, and, Justin adds, the wealthy and willing give freely, each according as he wishes, and the collection is deposited with the president, and he assists the orphans and widows, those who are impoverished by sickness or other cause, those that are in prison, and strangers who may happen to be sojourning amongst them: and Justin twice announces that this is done on the day called Sunday. In his dialogue with Trypho we have frequent references to the Eucharist. From one of them we learn that at the time when the Christians offered their sacrifice to God, mention was made of the sufferings which the Son of God underwent (Dialogue, § 117).

* The use of λειτουργία as embracing the evening service continued even to the end of the 6th century (see Eustratius; Migne, 86, p. 2380 a).

(6.) A question has arisen whether this account refers to the service in Palestine—or Justin was a native of Samaria—or to the service near Rome, the seat of the emperors to whom his apology was addressed. The question seems to be settled by the following considerations:—The kiss of peace is given in the Roman church in the solemn mass after consecration; here it is before it. Again, it is one of the points which are noted as differing the Roman from the other missae, that in the Roman order there was generally no lesson from the prophets. Here there was such lesson every Sunday.

Thus we have apparently sufficient warrant for the conclusion of Palmer (Origines Liturgicæ, vol. i. p. 42) that Justin Martyr's account is of the liturgy of the patriarchate of Antioch. And it is interesting to note that later narratives agree with his description as far as it goes. All the points he introduces are found in the later liturgy of Jerusalem.

(7.) Liturgy of Jerusalem.—Passing over for the time the liturgy contained in the eighth book of the Apostolic Constitutions, we proceed from Justin Martyr, who must have written about A. D. 150, to the lectures of Cyril, who was bishop of Jerusalem from the year 351 to 386. Cyril has left us seventeen lectures, delivered, apparently about the year 347, to the catechumens in the course of Lent, and five to the recently baptized, delivered shortly after Easter. In these five he gives descriptions and explanations of the sacramental offices, and, in the last of all, an account of the Communion Service. His hearers had been present at it, but they had not been taught the meaning of its several parts.

(8.) There can be no doubt that every marked feature of the office, as it then existed, is noted here by St. Cyril. He commences, however, after the dismissal of the uninitiated; at a point (that is) corresponding to the close of the sermon in the account of Justin Martyr. He describes the ablutions, possibly with LAVABO [I. 938], followed by the Kiss of peace, and then proceeds to the Sursum Corda, Preface, Sanctus, Consecration, Intercession, Lord's Prayer [CANON, I. 269], Sancta Sanctis, Gustate, and COMMUNION [I. 413].

(9.) It is interesting to compare with this the liturgy of St. James,—the liturgy, that is, of the church of Palestine.

We have it in two forms: the one form from two Greek manuscripts (with a fragment of a third), of which the first was written during the 12th century at Antioch; the second MS. appears to have been transcribed at Mount Sinai during the 10th (Palmer, i. 21, 22). The second form, published by Renaudot, vol. ii. p. 21, is found in Syriac, and is still retained amongst the Monophysites or Jacobites in the East (Palmer,

i. 16). The points of similarity are sufficient to prove that they had a common origin, and undoubtedly what is common to the two must have been in use in the united church at the beginning of the 5th century, i.e. before the schism of A.D. 451.

(10.) We see, therefore, here, on the one hand, how the service of Cyril's time was even in a hundred years augmented by many additions, and we find on the other that nearly everything which Cyril mentions remains untouched, both in the Greek and Syriac liturgies. We have the "Sursum Corda" in both,—the "Vere dignum," the "Sanctus sanctus"; the precise words that the Holy Spirit may make this bread the Body of Christ, and this cup the Blood of Christ, the prayers for the living, the commemoration of, and the petitions for, the dead. The very words used by Cyril are found in the Greek. And thus we take a step forward in our history; and it is interesting further to notice that Jerome in his controversy with the Pelagians (book ii. sect. 23; Migne, vol. xxiii. p. 587), mentions that the voices of the priests daily sing that "Christ is the only sinless One." We find the expression both in the Syriac and in the Greek liturgies before us: "He is the only sinless one that has appeared upon the earth." Again, in the same dialogue, book iii., sect. 15, p. 612, Jerome says that our Lord taught His apostles that "daily at the sacrifice or sacrament of His body (the manuscripts read sacramento) believers should dare to say—Our Father which art in heaven." He refers, no doubt, as before, to the liturgy of Jerusalem, for his work seems to have been written in the neighbourhood of the Holy City shortly after the opinions of Pelagius had received encouragement from the bishop Johannes. Once more in his commentary on Isaiah, book ii. chap. vi. v. 20 (vol. xxiv. 88 of Migne), Jerome says, "Quotidie caelesti panis saturati dicimus; Gustate et videte quam suavis est Dominus,"—words which occur (I believe) only in the liturgy of St. James. The whole psalm is recited in the Syriac St. James.

(11.) Further illustrations have been drawn from the Homiletic writings of St. Chrysostom, of which several were written when he was a presbyter of the church of Antioch (see Palmer, i. 80, and Bingham, Antiquities, book XIII. vi.). It will be unnecessary to carry out this comparison at length, but we may note that Chrysostom speaks of the whole congregation joining in common prayer for those who were afflicted by evil spirits and those who were in a state of penance; and then he reminds his hearers how, when only the initiated remain, they prostrate themselves on the pavement, rise together, and the priest alone offers up the prayers, and the people respond. He mentions the benediction, "The Grace of our Lord," and the address, "Up with our mind and hearts." He speaks of the reasonable service, the bloodless sacrifice; he speaks of the cherubim and seraphim, of the invocation of the Holy Spirit to be present and touch the gifts lying upon the holy table; he speaks of the commemoration of the living and the dead, of the Lord's Prayer, of the holy things for holy persons, of the breaking of the bread of the Communion. All these but one (of which below) are found both in the Syriac and in the Greek, and so far our position is strengthened—that much that is common to the two belongs at least to the 4th or 5th century.

(12.) Two points remain to be noticed. i. After the words of institution the oblation in the Greek is this: "remembering then His life-giving sufferings, His saving cross, His death and resurrection from the dead, and His ascension into heaven; His session at the right hand of Thee, O God and Father, we offer to Thee this fearful and bloodless sacrifice."

The words in the Syriac liturgy correspond almost exactly to these, except that the oblation is made to Christ: "We remember Thy death and resurrection, Thy ascension into heaven, Thy sitting at the right hand of God the Father, and we offer to Thee this fearful and bloodless sacrifice." The difference is momentous, and the question at once arises which of the two is the more ancient form.

The Syriac is, as we have seen, in use at the present day. The Greek is, as we shall see, affected by later additions from foreign sources; but this fact alone would not, of course, decide the question as to the original form of this momentous formula.

(13.) ii. Our second point is this: Palmer draws attention (Origines, i. 24, 25) to several indications that the Greek liturgy of St. James has been affected by late interpolations. These we need not repeat here. I would add that the introduction of a Creed in the proanaphora is a further indication that the liturgy was altered after the date which I have specified. Another indication of change is this: that the prayer for the king, mentioned by St. Cyril and retained by the Syriac (p. 35), is omitted in the Greek, probably because the state rulers of Palestine favoured the Jacobites more than the orthodox. The appeal χαίτε κεχαριστωμένην, which is introduced, is entirely out of place, and ungrammatical; it must, therefore, be a late addition; and it is not in the Syriac. There is no prayer in the Greek for the engorgement, nor for the penitents, nor the catechumens, and no notice of their exorcism. This fact also shews that the text of our manuscripts which we possess had been altered at a period when the custom of excluding the two former classes had ceased to be observed.

(14.) The paucity of the Greek manuscripts of course indicates that the rite of St. James has long ceased to be of general observance; in fact, it was first interpolated out of the liturgy of Constantinople, and then gave way before it. Yet it is said to be still used in islands of the Archipelago and elsewhere on St. James's day, but no manuscripts of the modern form have been brought to the west. The conclusion is that the Greek use was generally discontinued before the 13th century. Charles the Bald stated that the rite was celebrated before him; and we learn from Theodore Balsamon and his contemporary Marcus, orthodox bishop of Alexandria, that it, or a rite which went by his name, was still used in the 12th century on great feast-days in the churches of Jerusalem and the rest of Palestine. It was at that time unknown at Anti ch.

(15.) Liturgies of the Churches of Egypt.—It will be best now to turn to the liturgies of the churches of Alexandria, with which I would connect the liturgy of the Coptic version of the Apostolic Constitutions. We have three

it much that is common to the lists to the 4th or 5th century. The parts remain to be noticed, of institution the oblation in "remembering then His life—His saving cross, His death and the deal, and His ascension session at the right hand of Father, we offer to Thee this sacrifice."

The Syriac liturgy correspond to these, except that the oblation is: "We remember Thy death Thy ascension into heaven, Thy hand of God the Father, and His fearful and bloodless sacrifice is momentous, and the rises which of the two is the

we have seen, in use at the Greek is, as we shall see, additions from foreign sources; we would not, of course, decide on the original form of this point is this: Palmer Origines, i. 24, 25) to several Greek liturgy of St. James by late interpolations. These here. I would add that the Creed in the pronounaphora is a that the liturgy was altered which I have specified. Another is this: that the prayer for d by St. Cyril and retained by is omitted in the Greek, probably rulers of Palestine favoured than the orthodox. The εὐχαριστία, which is introduced, place, and ungrammatical; it a late addition: and it is not ere is no prayer in the Greek, nor for the penitents, nor had no notice of their ex- so shews that the text of we possess had been altered at custom of excluding the two ceased to be observed.

y of the Greek manuscripts of at the rite of St. James has of general observance; in fact, pointed out of the liturgy of and then gave way before it.

is still used in islands of elsewhere on St. James's day, ts of the modern form here the west. The conclusion is e was generally discontinued century. Charles the Bald was celebrated before him; Theodore Balsamon and his orthodox bishop of Alex- a rite which went by this d in the 12th century on great churches of Jerusalem and the It was at that time unknown of the Churches of Egypt.— now to turn to the liturgies of Alexandria, with which liturgy of the Coptic version constitutions. We have three notices of the celebration in this version; two of them analogous to that in the eighth book of the Greek version, which is called the Clementine liturgy, and is really an account of a service after the consecration of a bishop. There are several points of deep interest connected with the Coptic constitutions, not the least that the Copts had introduced into their language the Greek terms for presbyter, deacon, bishop, Spirit, Eucharist, offering, salutation; indeed we may say every technical term connected with the celebration. We read (Tattam, Apostolical Constitutions in Coptic, with Translation; Orient. Trans. Fund, 1848; bk. ii. p. 32), "After the salutation and the kiss of peace, the deacons present the offering to the newly-made bishop; he puts his hand upon it with the presbyters, and says the eucharist." It begins with the prayer, "The Lord be with you all," and the people say, "And with thy spirit." The bishop says, "Lift up your hearts;" they reply, "We lift them up unto the Lord." He says again, "Let us give thanks unto our Lord;" the people say, "It is right and just;" and then he is directed to say the prayers which follow according "to the form or custom of the holy offering." It is quite clear that the service was in Greek throughout when this version of the "canons of the apostles" was made. But Archbishop Tattam, to whom we owe our edition of the book, unfortunately missed some of the points in his translation; and thus, to the mere English reader, his words can scarcely be said to represent adequately the character of the original. This εὐχαριστία, he translates "Let us pray." It was really a mistake for εὐχαριστία.

(16.) We have a further account in the same second book (Tattam, p. 62). This may be compared with the last lecture of St. Cyril of Jerusalem, for it is the account of the Communion as administered to the newly baptized. We have again the instruction that the deacon should bring the offering to the bishop, and that the latter should give thanks over the bread and over the cup of wine, because of the similitude of the one to the flesh of Christ, and of the other to the blood of Christ. Mention is made of an offering of milk and honey in remembrance of the promise made to the fathers: "I will give you a land flowing with milk and honey." Then the bishop divides the bread, and gives a portion to each. "This is the bread of heaven, the Body of Christ Jesus" (the last clause in Greek). The presbyter or deacon takes the cup, and gives them the blood of Jesus Christ our Lord, and the milk and the honey, saying, "This is the Blood of Christ Jesus," and he who receives says, "Amen."

The account concludes: These things have been delivered to you briefly concerning the holy Baptisma and the holy Offering.

(17.) There is yet a third account in the fourth book (§ lxxv. p. 116). This is a second representation of the service after the ordination of a bishop; it is somewhat longer than the other, supplying additional details. Thus we have the direction of the deacon: "Let no unbeliever remain in this place," the words bidding them salute one another with a holy kiss; the exclusion of the catechumens and the "hearers," and of all who were not partakers of the holy mysteries. The deacons bring the gifts to the bishop to the holy altar (θυσιαστήριον), the presbyters standing on his right hand and on his left, and the "high priest" prays over the offering, and the Holy Spirit may descend upon it and the blood of Christ. Then all partake; first the clergy, then all the people, and then all the women; a psalm was sung during the distribution, and when all was over the deacons called out, "We have all partaken of the blessed Body and Blood of Christ; let us give thanks to Him;" the bishop gives them the blessing, and they are told to depart in peace.

(18.) There can be no doubt that the rubrics of these second and fourth books represent the service at slightly different epochs; thus the word ἀρχιερέως, which is limited to the Jewish high priest on p. 108, is given to the bishop on p. 122. The word θυσιαστήριον occurs, however, twice in the first book (p. 20). But the whole account will serve us as an introduction to the later liturgies of the church of Alexandria as we find them in the Greek and Coptic versions.

(19.) Of the Alexandrine Fathers, Clemens speaks (Stromat. i. 19) of those who use bread and water in the offering not in accordance with the canons of the church; and Origen of our offering sacrifices to the Father through Christ (on Isa. vi. 6; Homil. i. near the end; tom. xiii. Lonnatzsch). Of the liturgies that have come down to us as connected with various branches or offshoots of the church of the patriarchate of Alexandria, Renaudot gives several, but they may be reduced to three distinct works:—

- (1) The Greek liturgy of St. Mark and the Coptic of St. Cyril.
- (2) A Coptic, Arabic, and Greek liturgy, entitled the liturgy of St. Basil. This must be carefully distinguished, as we shall see hereafter, from the liturgy of the church of Caesarea.
- (3) A Coptic, Arabic, and Greek liturgy, entitled the liturgy of St. Gregory the Theologian, i.e. Gregory Nazianzen.

To these we must add what is called 'The Universal Canon of the Athiopic Church.'

(20.) The Greek liturgy of St. Mark and the Coptic liturgy of St. Cyril are related to each other, as are the Greek and Syriac liturgies of St. James; they have much in common; but the liturgy of St. Cyril has been used even to the present day by the Monophysites, who have formed the mass of the Egyptian Christians, whilst that of St. Mark was in use only for a limited time by the Melchites or orthodox. For the latter body being small in numbers, and weak in influence, have, for many ages, been drawn within the circle of the church of Constantinople, and have used the liturgy of that church. And thus it is that apparently only one copy of the Greek liturgy of St. Mark has survived. This was found in a monastery of the order of St. Basil, at Rossano, in Calabria. Renaudot saw it at Rome in the house of the religious of the same order. The MS. is of the 10th or 11th century. By comparing the two together, we are able to infer what was the common property of the whole patriarchate before the schism of A.D. 451, and thus also to discover what each body added at later periods. The liturgies of St. Basil and St. Gregory are also used by the Monophysites (Renaudot, i. 154); the former on fast days, the latter on feast days, except in Lent and the month "Cohiac" during which the liturgy of St. Cyril is used.

(21.) We will turn first to the Greek liturgy of St. Mark and the Coptic of St. Cyril. We have already mentioned that words recently discovered in the Epistle of Clemens Romanus are found here. These words are (Bryennius, p. 105), "Raise those that are fallen; bring back those who are wandering; feed those who are hungry; deliver those of us who are in bonds; comfort the feeble-minded." They are all found both in the Coptic (Renaudot, vol. i. p. 65), and in the Greek (Neale, Greek Liturgies, ed. 1888, p. 21). The Coptic has also: "Save those of us who are in trouble," which are also Clementine. This fact is interesting in more ways than one, as we shall see. I may mention now that it is a renewed proof of the connexion between the churches of Alexandria and Rome, to which Dr. Neale speaks in his 'General Introduction' (vol. i. p. 120). In the Greek St. Mark, we have the introductory or proanaphoral portion, which is quite distinct from anything in the Coptic. In point of fact, the liturgy of St. Cyril begins with the kiss of peace immediately preceding the Sursum Corda (Renaudot, i. 38). We are informed that the "Preparation" which is given in the Coptic St. Basil (Renaudot, i. 1-82) is always used, whatever the liturgy proper may be. Passing on to the canon, I would observe that the intercessory prayers, which are offered by the priest after the giving of thanks in the "dignum et iustum est," are addressed in the Greek liturgy to the Father, in the Coptic to our Lord. In both, the Virgin is commemorated, whilst the "Hail thou that art highly favoured," occurring in the Greek, is not found in the Coptic. This, therefore, is apparently of late introduction. In the Coptic the prayer is addressed to Christ to receive "the sacrifices and oblations of those who offer on His spiritual heavenly altar;" in the Greek a similar prayer is addressed to God. The petitions which I have mentioned just now as occurring in Clemens Romanus occur at this part of the service. The words of St. Paul with reference to Christ (Eph. i. 21) are found in both, and thus it is with reference to Christ that the words follow, "Thousand thousands, and ten thousand times ten thousand of holy angels and archangels stand before Thee!" Then the words of institution follow. In both versions the appeal is made to God the Father that we are setting forth the death of His Son, and confessing His resurrection, and waiting for His second coming to judge the world; and with this before our mind "we have set before Thee Thine own of Thine own gifts." The epiclesis or invocation follows, the same in both, bearing, however, internal marks that it was composed after the council of Nicea, a prayer for sanctification, and the Lord's Prayer. Here the Coptic of St. Cyril lapses into the Coptic St. Basil. The Greek, however, proceeds to the end. The "Sancta sanctis," on p. 28, and the "unus Pater sanctus," etc., on the same page; the benediction and the dismissal, p. 30.

(22.) By comparing the Coptic St. Basil with the Greek and Arabic versions of the same liturgy, we are again able, in some degree, to note the history of liturgic change. It would appear that many of the Greek phrases were continued in use in the Coptic church, as we have already noticed them in the Coptic version of the Apostolic Constitutions (Renaudot, i. 13). Here, after the "Sanctus," the liturgy reverts to the history of our fall, our being placed in paradise, our transgression. It thus passes onwards with great beauty through the warnings given by the prophets to the birth of the Saviour, His love for us, His death, His resurrection, His ascension. Then it records how He left to us this great mystery of piety (the words of 1 Tim. iii. 16) and instituted the Eucharist, giving the words of the institution. Then it proceeds, as in the Greek St. Mark, only where that had "we have offered to Thee of Thine own gifts," here we read, "we offer Thee." The epiclesis follows, in the Coptic the appeal being to Christ, in the Greek and Arabic to God.

Then come the intercessory prayers (not before the words of institution, as in St. Mark and St. Cyril), and these are addressed to God. Commemoration is made also of the Virgin and other saints, including, in the Coptic St. Basil, several of a late date, and the diptychs are read and the Lord's Prayer follows; then an interesting absolution of a precatory character and the "Sancta sanctis." The fraction takes place and a confession (which we also find in the Gregorian liturgy), "that this is the flesh of Christ which He received from the Virgin, and made one with His divinity and delivered for us all on the cross." Further intercessions—in some respect like those of Clemens Romanus, but with the addition, "give rest to those who have fallen asleep before us"—follow in the Arabic, but are not in the Coptic. The dismissal of the people takes place, and then that of the deacons. This does not occur in the Coptic. The communion of the people is mentioned in the Coptic (p. 24), but not in the Greek or Arabic.

(23.) The liturgy of St. Gregory will not detain us long; it begins in the Greek and Arabic with a prayer which is also found in the Greek St. James (Neale, G. L. p. 54), with a few words interpolated that the "sacrifice may be for the rest and refreshment of our fathers who have fallen asleep before us, and for the strengthening of Thy people." Moreover, in the Greek "St. James" it is addressed to God, in the Egyptian "St. Gregory" to Christ. This liturgy resembles the Egyptian St. Basil rather than that of St. Cyril; after the "vere dignum," however, there is a hymn of thanksgiving which we do not find there, but, in some respects like the other, it passes on to a touching appeal to God. "No language can measure the ocean of Thy love: Thou madest me a man, not Thyself being in need of my service; . . . it is Thou who, in the bread and the wine, hast delivered to me the mystic participation of Thy flesh."

The account of the Institution follows in the form of a narrative addressed to the Saviour, and the priest continues: "Remembering Thy coming upon earth, Thy Death, Thy Resurrection, Ascension and coming Advent, we offer to Thee of Thine own gifts"; and he beseeches Christ to come and complete the mystic service, to send His Spirit and sanctify and change the gifts into the Body and Blood of our redemption.

f Liturgic change. It would of the Greek phrases were in the Coptic church, as we find them in the Coptic version constitutions (Renaudot, l. 13). Sanctus." the liturgy reverts our fall, our being placed transgression. It thus passes beauty through the words prophets to the birth of love for us, His death, His ascension. Then it records this great mystery of piety (m. iii. 16) and instituted the words of the Institution. In the Greek St. Mark, only we have offered to Thee of here we read, "we do offer sacrifice follows, in the Coptic the Christ, in the Greek and Arabic Intercessory prayers (not of institution, as in St. Mark these are addressed to God, made also of the Virgin and Child, in the Coptic St. Basil, etc., and the diptychs are read or follows; then an intercessory character and the fraction takes place and we also find in the Gregorian is the flesh of Christ which the Virgin, and made one with delivered for us all on the Intercessions—in some respect mens Romanus, but with the to those who have fallen follow in the Arabic, but are The dismissal of the people on that of the deacons. This is the Coptic. The communion mentioned in the Coptic (p. 24), k or Arabic.

of St. Gregory will not detain in the Greek and Arabic with also found in the Greek St. . . . p. 54), with a few words in "sacrifice may be for the at of our fathers who have us, and for the strengthening Moreover, in the Greek "St. used to God, in the Egyptian Christ. This liturgy resembles Basil rather than that of the "vere dignum," however, of thanksgiving which we do, in some respects like the to a touching appeal to God. measure the ocean of Thy me a man, not Thyself being ice; . . . it is Thou who, in wine, has delivered to meation of Thy flesh." The Institution follows in the addressed to the Saviour, thus: "Remembering Thy Thy Death, Thy Resurrection, coming Advent, we offer to a gifts"; and he beseeches complete the mystic service, and sanctify and change the and Blood of our redemption.

Intercessory prayers now follow, and the commemoration of the saints departed; the diptychs are read, and another appeal to Jesus Christ. The Lord's Prayer follows, and after a while the thanksgiving after Communion; but here both the Coptic and the Arabic fail us, so that the prayers in the Greek which follow appear to be late.

(24) It remains only to speak of the Ethiopic canon, which commences (Renaudot, vol. i. 472) with some beautiful passages from Holy Scripture. From p. 476 we have much in common with the Coptic St. Basil. The canon proper begins on p. 486, but it is strange that we have nothing corresponding to the "Lift up your hearts" of almost all the other liturgies. The intercessory prayers precede the words of institution, and then follows the appeal, "We are setting forth Thy death, O Lord. We believe Thy resurrection, ascension, and second advent, and keeping the memorial of Thy death and resurrection we offer to Thee this bread and this cup." The epiclesis follows: the prayer for pardon for the living, the prayer for rest for the dead. The Sancta sanctis with the confession as we find it in St. Basil, the Communion of the people, the thanksgiving after Communion and the Lord's Prayer—the only instance that yet we have met with of such position. We need not discuss the other Ethiopic forms; they are seven in number, but five have never been published (Neale, i. 325).

(25.) Some question has arisen as to the relative claims of these liturgies of St. Basil and St. Mark to be the primitive liturgy of the Egyptian church. Renaudot gives the place to "St. Basil," Palmer to "St. Mark." The latter founds his judgment in part on the comparison of both with the Universal Canon of the Ethiopians, which he considers to "agree exactly in order and substance with the liturgies of Cyril and St. Mark, and no others" (i. p. 90). An entirely independent collation leads the writer to reject this statement, and to regard the Alexandrine St. Basil, and the Ethiopian Canon as intimately connected with each other. A comparison of the liturgies with quotations by any of the Alexandrine Fathers, may facilitate our judgment.

(26.) We shall receive but little assistance from the general tone of Origen's treatise on prayer, except by noting that when he expresses (as he seems to do) his wish that prayer should be addressed mainly to the Father through the Son, his language would seem to intimate that in his time the general custom of his church was to address their prayers to Christ. His reference to the thousand thousands and myriads of myriads (against Celsus, viii. 34) may be paralleled out of all the liturgies. Cyril of Alexandria (we take these references from Palmer, i. 102-3) refers to the Seraphin (not Cherubin as Palmer has it) veiling their faces; this is not mentioned in "Basil," but it is mentioned in the others. The same father says (Epist. ad Johan. Anti ch.), "We are taught also to say in our prayers, 'O Lord our God, give us peace: for Thou hast given us all things,'"—words to which we find the nearest resemblance in the Basilian Coptic and Greek. St. Mark has only "O king of peace, give thy peace to us in harmony and love." Origen on Jeremiah (xiv. § 14) remarks, "We often say in our prayers, Give me a portion with the prophets, give me a portion with the apostles." A petition resembling this is found both in the Coptic St. Basil and St. Cyril, and the Greek St. Mark. It would be scarcely fair to draw from this the conclusion that what is called St. Basil's Liturgy was used at Alexandria in the time of Cyril, rather than that which we call St. Mark's; but it would seem that when St. Cyril wrote the words I have quoted, the liturgy which bears his name had not been amended. Other references have been noticed in Dionysius of Alexandria, Isidore of Pelusium, and Athanasius, but they do not throw any light on the point before us. It is worthy however of remark that Isidore states distinctly that the sacerdos or bishop uttered the words "Peace be with you," from the extremity or highest point of the church, "imitating the Lord assuming His chair when He gave His peace to His disciples."

(27.) Liturgy of Caesarea.—There can be no doubt that St. Basil, who was bishop of Caesarea in Cappadocia during the years 370-379, committed to writing, and delivered to the order of monks which he established, a liturgy. And when we look at the well-known words which have been often quoted from his treatise on the Holy Spirit [CANON, l. 269], we can scarcely doubt that this liturgy preserved (at least in its chief features) that form and order which had been traditionally used within the diocese or (possibly) the patriarchate of Caesarea. Our difficulty is to retrieve the service as it came from the hands of Basil. We have the form which passes by his name and now in the East shares with the so-called liturgy of St. Chrysostom the reverence of the churches. It is used, we are told, on all Sundays in Lent but Palm Sunday, on Maundy Thursday and Easter Eve, on the festival of St. Basil himself, and on the vigils of Christmas and of the Epiphany. Dr. Neale and Dr. Littledale (Greek Liturgies) have printed this from two recent editions, published the one at Venice, the other at Constantinople; whilst Daniel has given it in a form presenting considerable variations from both.

The Alexandrine liturgy assigned to Basil we have already noticed. With the exceptions mentioned below (§29), it differs entirely from the Greek St. Basil. Besides this there is a Syriac liturgy which goes by the name of Basil, a Latin translation of which Renaudot gives from Masius in his second volume. But most important for our purposes is the Greek copy, found in a manuscript of the end of the 9th century which belonged once to the library of St. Mark at Florence (introduced probably at the time of the council), but is now in the Barberini collection at Rome. This was printed for the first time in Bunsen's Hippolytus and his Age (vol. iv.), and again in his Anacletus Antequanensis (vol. iii. pp. 201-236), and it is strange that it has not attracted the attention it deserves.

(28.) This liturgy commences with the prayer which the priest offered in the sacristy, when he placed the bread upon the disc; this is followed by the prayers of the three antiphons. These are all found in the liturgy as published by Daniel, but we must exclude here, as throughout, almost all the rubrical directions relating to the action and language of the deacon. The prayer of Introit is given next, then the prayer of the Trisagion, and the prayer said by the bishop when he took his throne. This is now omitted, in consequence, no doubt, of the change of ritual. Prayers for the catechumens, for the faithful, for the bishop himself (the last connected with the cherubic hymn) follow, and then the prayer of oblation, which is distinctly stated to be a prayer of the holy Basil. The kiss of peace here follows, and the order to the deacons to look "to the doors," and the people say the creed. Then come the apostolic benediction and the 'Sursum Corda.' The "digum et justum est" is entirely eucharistic, and this is succeeded by an eucharistic introduction to the words of institution. But here, unhappily, a sheet (four leave-) of the manuscript is missing, and we are unable to say what was the exact form of the prayer of invocation, or of that of intercession until we come to the petition for the clergy, in the middle of which the next sheet commences. The words with which the Lord's Prayer is introduced are interesting. It is followed by a petition that Christ our God would attend to us from His holy habitation, and come to sanctify us, seated above with the Father, and invisibly present with us. Then the "sancta sanctis," and the "unus sanctus;" and the priest is directed to take portions from the holy Body, and place them in the holy cup. Then "after all have partaken," whilst the deacon is saying τὴν εὐχὴν, the priest ἐπέχερα. This is a prayer of thanksgiving for the reception. Collects follow: one to be uttered outside the sanctuary, the other when the priest retires to the sacristy, and so the liturgy concludes. If we may supply from the more modern liturgy the parts lost in the missing sheet, availing ourselves of the analogy which the collations of the rest of the work suggest, we must conclude that the words of institution were embodied in an address to God the Father, and pleaded that "remembering the sufferings of His Son, His cross, His death, His resurrection, ascension, and second coming, and offering to God His own of His own—in all things, and because of all things—we bless Him, we glorify Him, we give thanks to Him." In the prayer of invocation the priest pleads that being admitted to minister at God's holy altar, not because of his own righteousness but because of God's mercy and pity, he draws nigh to it: and that having offered the antitypes of the holy Body and Blood of His Christ, he beseeches God that His Spirit should come on the congregation and the gifts and (ἀνατίθειαι) exhibit the bread and cup as the precious Body and Blood of our Lord. There is a prayer that all who partake of the one bread and the cup may find mercy with all the saints (the Virgin and St. John the Baptist are especially mentioned), and then after a while the prayer passes on to petitions for the living.

(29.) Reverting now for a moment to the Alexandrine liturgy of St. Basil, we must notice that the three prayers, which in the Greek and Arabic are distinctly ascribed to the great bishop, i. e. the prayer of the Kiss of Peace (Renaudot, i. 60), the prayer at the breaking of the bread (p. 72), and the doxology (now in the Lord's Prayer), and prayer of bending the head (p. 76) are all of them found in the Barberini copy, and are all of them contained in the modern liturgy. Not one of them however is in the Coptic St. Basil; these facts may possibly allow us to infer that the Alexandrine Greek received its title from the prayers of St. Basil which it incorporated, but that the Coptic version was made before they were admitted. If so, we have some little light thrown upon the relative dates of the various documents, and it would appear that the Coptic is older than the Greek Alexandrine in its present form. We have already mentioned that in no other respect can we trace any similarity between the Alexandrine Basil and those which bear the great Bishop's name in the Barberini manuscript and in the modern Oriental Church.

(30.) Daniel has noted the portions which are common to the modern Basil, and the so-called liturgy of St. James. A comparison with the Barberini manuscript will help us to judge how far these portions are modern. For example, in both we have the apostrophe, "Let all human flesh be silent and stand with trembling, for the King of kings and Lord of rulers comes forward to be sacrificed, and to be given for the food of the faithful." In the liturgy of St. James this is found near the commencement of the service, when the priest is bringing in the holy gifts: in that of St. Basil, it is placed after the invocation, before the communion of the priest. It seems scarcely appropriate in either place. The fact is that it is not to be found either in the Syriac St. James, or in any of the liturgies that bear the name of St. Basil.

Daniel is silent on the comparison between the Greek and Syriac liturgies of St. Basil (see Renaudot, vol. ii. 543). On comparing the latter with the Barberini copy (supplemented where it fails from the modern service), it will be found that from the apostolic benediction to the words speaking of the memorial of Christ's death and resurrection, the language is nearly identical (Renaudot, ii. 545-548; Bunsen, 214-223). This identity stops suddenly where the latter has, "We offer to Thee Thine own, of Thine own," the former passing on to an appeal for mercy and pardon. The invocation is nearly identical, but the Syriac immediately afterwards gives indications of being interpolated; it has a superabundance of epithetic additions. This is followed by prolonged intercessory prayers, one of which connects the liturgy with the church of St. Peter and St. James; but the collect introducing "Our Father" is, as we have said, the same. The prayer beginning "Father of mercies, God of all comfort," has received modifications. The distinguishing feature of the Syriac liturgy is, that the verbal oblation of the venerated and bloodless sacrifice is made after the invocation.

(31.) Liturgy of Constantinople.—The patriarchate of Constantinople dates from the year 381, and the churches subject to this metropolis have used for many years a liturgy which bears the name of St. Chrysostom. Lebrun contends that there was no liturgy ascribed to this great father for 300 years after his death; and it seems not improbable that the work which now bears his name received that name as being used in the city of which he was the most famous bishop in its earlier years. The modern liturgy of St. Chrysostom is used most extensively in the east; Dr. Neale says, through the

gy. Not one of them however is Basil; these facts may possibly show that the Alexandrine Greek from the prayers of St. Basil varied, but that the Coptic version they were admitted. If little light thrown upon the various documents, and it is the Coptic is older than the one in its present form. We mentioned that in no other respect similarity between the Alexandrine those which bear the great Barberini manuscript and the Alexandrian Church.

is noted the portions which are modern Basil, and the so-called ones. A comparison with the manuscript will help us to judge how they are modern. For example, in the apostrophe, "Let all human stand with trembling, for the Lord of rulers comes forward and to be given for the food of the liturgy of St. James this commencement of the service, bringing in the holy gifts: in it is placed after the invocation, union of the priest. It seems to be in either place. The fact is to be found either in the Syrian one of the liturgies that bear Basil.

on the comparison between the liturgies of St. Basil (see § 543). On comparing the latter with a copy (supplemented where it is a later service), it will be found that the benediction to the words memorial of Christ's death and language is nearly identical (§ 548; Bunsen, 214-223). This is identical where the latter has, "Thine own, of Thine own." It is an appeal for mercy in invocation is nearly identical, immediately afterwards gives interpolated; it has a supererogatory additions. This is found in necessary prayers, one of the liturgy with the church of St. James; but the collect introduced is, as we have said, the beginning "Father of mercifulness," has received modifications, the verbal oblation of the veneration sacrifice is made after the Constantinople.—The patriarchal dates from the year 543 are subject to this metropolis in years a liturgy which bears resemblance. Lebrun contends that the liturgy ascribed to this great saint after his death; and it is probable that the work which now bears that name as being of which he was the most earlier years. The modern Constantinople is used most extensively. Dr. Neale says, through the four patriarchates and Russia, except on the days when the liturgy of St. Basil is used. To us this is a disadvantage, because, if this were the only evidence we possessed, it would be the more difficult to discover what parts of it are truly ancient. Dr. Neale gives the service as he found it in a work printed at Venice in 1840, corrected by a later edition from Constantinople; Daniel (vol. iv. 327-372) "ad normam ecclesiae Graecorum hodie acceptam et probatam." Dr. Neale's book was originally published in the year 1850, two years before Baron Bunsen printed in the fourth volume of his work Hippolytus and his Age, a transcript of this liturgy from the Barberini manuscript. It seems to be inexcusable, however, that Daniel, whose fourth volume came out in 1853, should have been content with the meagre collations with this MS. given by Goar in his Euchologion, and have neglected the transcript of Bunsen.

(32.) With the aid of this manuscript we may put upon one side as of uncertain date the thirteen paragraphs which occupy pages 337 to 339 in Daniel's book, and besides this, we must reject the eight succeeding pages, with the exception of one brief prayer. Almost all the rubrical directions (as in St. Basil) disappear; they belong to a period since the time of Charlemagne. On the more, the prayers which the deacon is requested to repeat outside, whilst the priest is rejected also as of later introduction; and the division of the consecrated bread into the four parts, each part containing two letters of ΙΧΘΥΝΑ [see ELEMENTS, I. 603; FRACTION, I. 687], is also proved to be later.

The rubric directing the elevation of the bread (Daniel, p. 365; Neale's G. L. p. 140) is also shewn to be modern; so too the introduction of the boiling water. And one thing more attracts attention. As in the rite of St. Basil so here, it was assumed that all would partake. This is altered now. Lastly, in the modern Greek ritual there is an appeal at the very close to St. John Chrysostom that, "having used his liturgy, we may have his intercession that our souls may be saved;" this is also proved now to be of later date than the year 900. Indeed, the liturgy itself is sine titulo (Bunsen, iii. 197). The very ascription of the Liturgy, therefore, to St. Chrysostom may be of a date subsequent to the time when this MS. was transcribed.

(33.) It only remains for us to note that in this the early edition of St. Chrysostom, the Kiss of Peace precedes the Creed, and the Creed precedes the Apostolic Benediction. The "dignum et iustum est" is truly eucharistic, and the "Sanctus, sanctus" is specially followed by the words of institution. The text with reference to the bread resembles that accepted now in the Epistle to the Corinthians, τοῦ ἐστι τὸ σῶμα αὐτοῦ τὸ σῶμα ἡμῶν. The liturgy proceeds: "Remembering His saving command and all things done by Him, and offering Thine own of Thine own, we raise Thee." The priest proceeds: "We offer to Thee, moreover, this reasonable and bloodless service, and we beseech Thee, send down Thy Holy Spirit on us and on these gifts that lie here before Thee, and make this bread the Body of Thy Christ . . ." The offering is represented as made on behalf of all who have gone to rest: in the faith, "Fathers, patriarchs, prophets, especially the Holy Virgin." Then intercessions follow on behalf of the living;—amongst them, "for those in mountains, caves, and holes in the earth." (This is now omitted.) "For faithful Kings, and our Queen, lover of Christ." (This possibly points to a precise date when the original of this manuscript was prepared.) Then there is a prayer of commendation to God of ourselves, our lives, and our hopes, followed by the Lord's Prayer. Christ is entreated to come to sanctify us. At last we have the "Sancta sanctis," the "Unus sanctus," and the thanksgiving after the Communion.

(34.) Liturgy of the Nestorians or Chaldean Christians.—Notwithstanding the fearful massacres to which even during the last forty years they have been subjected, there still remain among the cities of Mesopotamia Christians who trace their origin to the influx of Nestorians after the council of Ephesus. They possess three liturgies, or rather three anaphoras, ascribed respectively to the Apostles (i. e. SS. Adaeus or Thaddaeus and Mari), to Theodore of Mopsuestia, and to Nestorius himself. These are used at specified times of the year, but the pro-anaphoral and post-Communion portions of the liturgy of the "Apostles" are never omitted. Latin translations of the three from Syrian manuscripts brought into Europe by emissaries of the Roman church are given by Renaudot in his collection (vol. ii.).

An English translation of the services now in use has been recently published by Dr. Badger. Any effort to point out what portions of these are really ancient, apart from the instruction we have received from our previous investigations, must rest on hypothesis only; but the distinguishing features of the liturgy of the Apostles are (1) that in it our Lord's words of institution are not introduced at all, and (2) that the prayers of intercession both for the living and the dead are connected with the oblation which is made before the epiclesis. In the liturgies of Theodore and of Nestorius, the words of institution are found. It would certainly seem from this that, so far, the 'Liturgy of the Apostles' must be very ancient, as it is inconceivable that the words of our Lord, if at any time brought into the service, could at any subsequent period have been omitted (see § 59 below).

There are some points of difference between the liturgy as given by Renaudot and that given by Dr. Badger, indicating probably that even during the last few hundred years additions have been made to that which had been in use; but as these additions must fall into a period far below the 9th century, it is unnecessary to discuss them further here. We should mention, however, that the canon begins with the apostolic benediction, and we have, as everywhere else, the "orsum corda." The words are introduced simply in the liturgy of the Apostles; but in the liturgies of Theodore and Nestorius, as given by Dr. Badger, they are embodied in a highly rhetorical appeal. Some passages of a Nestorian tendency are discoverable in the last-named liturgy. The other two have no such traces.

(35.) Liturgy of the Apostolic Constitutions.—It remains now only that we should briefly discuss the liturgy of the Apostolic Constitutions, commonly called, "The Liturgy of St.

Clement." [APOSTOLICAL CONSTITUTIONS, I. pp. 119-126.] We have already given (§§ 15, 17) a brief account of the Eucharistic services as we find them in the Coptic edition of these constitutions. Ludolf, in his Commentarius ad Ili-to-sim Aethiopicum (pp. 324-327), gives a Latin translation of the corresponding passage in the Ethiopic version of the constitutions. This has been reproduced by Baron Bunsen in his Andrecto Ante-Niceno (vol. iii. pp. 106-126). It commences with "The Lord be with you, and with thy spirit. Up with your hearts," etc.; then an Eucharistic address to God for the gift and work of His Son, passing at once to the words of institution, which are given in the simplest form. The prayer proceeds, "calling to mind, therefore, His death and His resurrection," etc., "we offer to Thee this bread and cup, rendering Thee thanks that Thou hast made us worthy to stand before Thee, and to perform the functions of Thy priesthood." The Holy Spirit is invoked upon the oblations, but there is no prayer that He will make them the Body and Blood of Christ. The prayer is, "that those who partake of the gifts may be fulfilled with that Spirit." We have the "Sancta sanctis," and the "Unus Pater sanctus," etc., and the "Hymn of Praise;" the latter, possibly, consisting of the 148th Psalm. The people enter to receive the "medicine of their souls," and the thanksgiving follows with a collect. The service concludes, "Depart in peace, and so the Eucharist is accomplished." It will be noticed that the Lord's prayer is not introduced.

(36.) Neither is the Lord's Prayer introduced in the so-called liturgy of St. Clement. This liturgy is found in some MSS. of the eighth book of the Greek Apostolical Constitutions, but in the valuable Oxford manuscript (Codex Bezaecianus); it is entirely omitted. There are other marks that it is an interpolation of late date. In the manuscripts where it occurs, it follows on the service for the consecration of a bishop, as it does in the Coptic and Ethiopic constitutions. The Greek liturgy begins with the apostolic benediction, and the unbelievers, the hearers, the catechumens, etc., are then dismissed in order. Then comes a long intercessory prayer, the "kiss of peace" is given, and the apostolic benediction is repeated in a slightly different form; we have the "sursum corda" and the "dignum et iustum." This is Eucharistic, detailing the blessings of the creation and the history of God's dispensations to mankind. When we reach the victories of Joshua, the ascription of glory by the Cherubim and Seraphim, "Sanctus, sanctus, sanctus," is introduced, and the Thanksgiving passes on to record the mercies of the incarnation, death, burial, resurrection, and ascension of our Lord; then the bishop introduces the words of institution, and recites how, "Remembering His sufferings, His resurrection, His ascension, and second coming, we offer to Thee, our King and God, according to His appointment, this bread and this cup, giving thanks to Thee by Him;" then follow the epiclesis and the great intercessory prayer, the various clauses of which are introduced by the words, "We pray Thee," or "we entreat Thee," or "we offer to Thee," or "we beg Thee." After this come the "Sancta sanctis" and the "Glory to God in the highest." All the people receive in order; first, presbyters, then deacons, sub-deacons, etc. The psalm, "I will always give thanks to thee," (which includes the words, "O taste and see,") is sung during the Communion. The post-Communion service begins with a prayer of thanksgiving, the benediction from the bishop follows, the deacon says, "Depart in peace."

(37.) Considerable doubts are felt as to whether the liturgy was ever celebrated after this fashion. At all events we have here the advantage of examining a rite, as it was proposed at some time not later than the 4th century. It can scarcely have been altered or interpolated since that time. It is worthy of mention that the liturgical expressions, which have been noted in the recently recovered pages of the genuine Epistle of Clemens Romanus, are not found here as they are found in the Alexandrine service books; this would be an additional proof, if proof were wanting, that the ascription of the liturgy to St. Clement is purely fictitious.

(38.) Liturgy of the Churches of Carthage, etc.—In passing from Alexandria along the coast of Africa to Carthage we pass from an order of things of which the characteristics were Greek to another whose characteristics were Latin. The early writers of the Carthaginian churches are so important and so voluminous that from their works which have come down to us we can supply many details of the Carthaginian services—our sources of information being perhaps more trustworthy than any "liturgy" would be which professed to have been prepared by St. Augustine. Thus we know from Tertullian (Apology, xxxix.) that in the gatherings of the faithful, "the most approved seniors presided." The same chapter in the Apology mentions that at their gatherings the Christians in one body sued God by their prayers. They prayed for the emperors and for their ministers, for the state of the world, for the quiet of all things, "for the delay of the end." The sacred writings were called to remembrance, selections being made apparently with a view to the emergencies of the times,—and an exhortation followed. Then we infer that all were directed to leave the church who were under censure. A collection of money was made on one day of the month, the money collected being used for the relief of the poor, and for the succour of those who were suffering for conscience sake. No doubt Tertullian is describing features of the ordinary Sunday Eucharist. The section passes on to speak of the Agapae. Elsewhere we learn that the passages from Scripture were taken from the Prophets, from the Epistles or Acts of the Apostles, and from the Gospel (Apology, xxii.), and that psalms or (Ad Uxor. ii. 9) hymns intervened between these sections. Tertullian frequently insists that these rites had been "handed down to us." In praying they turned to the east (Apology, xvi.), lifting up their hands to God the Father (Idolat. vii. 7). We have two ascriptions of glory, one (Ad Uxor. i. 1) "To whom be honour, glory, majesty, dignity, and power, for ever and ever." The other (De Oratione, iii.), "To whom be honour and power for all ages."

With regard to the second part of the eucharistic office, to which he apparently gives the title 'Officium sacrificii' we have additional evidence. The prayers for the emperor seem to

His gift they may persevere in that which they have begun—a prayer analogous to what we have seen in the liturgy of St. Clement. The Domine Deus Sabbathi, and the Holy, Holy, Holy, are introduced in his interesting letter to Januarius (iv.), in which mention is also made of the Alleluia, and of the custom of praying standing between Easter and Pentecost.

In the Oriental liturgies mention was made of the church dispersed throughout the world; the words are found in Letter lxxxvii. The custom of a loving is referred to in more than one place. But the classical passage is in his famous letter to Paulinus (No. cxlix.), in which he tries to explain the meaning of the different words in 1 Tim. ii. 1, prayers, orations, supplications, etc. If we take the words as they are found consecutively in our version, he would say that the supplications embrace all that is done in the celebration of the sacrament before that which is on the table of the Lord begins to be blessed,—the prayers, when it is being blessed and sanctified and broken for distribution, the part “which ends in almost every church with the Lord’s Prayer,”—the intercessions, when the people is being blessed by the imposition of hands and commended to God’s great mercy,—the giving of thanks, concluding all.

(42.) We thus have the following clearly laid down as contained in the African Liturgy in the time of St. Augustine. The preliminary part included lessons from Scripture, hymns, sermons, and the prayers for the unbelievers, catechumens, and believers which we have described above.

Then, all being excluded except the initiated, the oblations of the people appear to have been made, and the opening words, “Suscum corda,” with the “Vere dignum et justum est;” with this we connect of course the “Sanctus.” Then came what Augustine would call the “sanctification of the sacrifice,” concluding with the fraction, and probably a prayer of fraction, such as we found in the Alexandrian liturgies; the Lord’s Prayer ensued. Then came the kiss of peace, this being followed by the benediction of the people, “whom the priest offers up to God;” then the participation of the sacrament and the giving of thanks,—the last part of the service before the dismissal. The three petitions mentioned by Augustine (Letter cxlix.) are also mentioned by Fulgentius of Ruspe in his letter to Bitellus (No. cvii.); two of them are alluded to in a treatise of the same bishop, De bono perseverantiae. It is probable that no great change was introduced into the liturgy for many years after the death of the great bishop Augustine.

(43.) Spanish Liturgies, of the time of Isidore.—The liturgy of the Spanish Church in its earlier years has a singular interest in several respects. It is quite clear that it was framed in the first instance independently of the Roman Church, although in the time of Innocent the First great efforts were made to render it similar to that of the church of the prince of the Apostles. But time was required for these efforts to succeed. Thus Guéranger (vol. i. p. 133) refers to a council of Gironne, held in the year 517 (Labbe, vol. i. p. 588), the first canon of which directed that throughout the province of Tarragona the use of the metropolitan church was to be observed. The council of Braga, in the year

565, passed an enactment of the same character for the province of which it was the metropolis, which would be nearly contemporaneous with Galicia. The same lessons were to be read at mass through all the churches; all the bishops or presbyters and the people were to retain the salutation, “The Lord be with you,” “And with thy spirit,” “in the manner that all the East observed it from apostolic tradition,” but at the same time directions were given that the masses were to be celebrated in the order which their late bishop, Profuturus, had received in writing from the authority of the apostolic see. In 633 a uniformity was established, not in each province severally, but throughout the whole extent of the peninsula or, as it is called, through all Spain and Gaul (that is Gallia Narbonensis); and amongst other things it is mentioned about the same time that the Kyrie Eleison was repeated, and the “Sicut erat in principio” was added to the “Gloria Patri,” to meet the heresy of the Priscillianists, “as it had been done not only at the apostolic see, but also through out all the East, Africa, and Italy.”

(44.) Isidore, the famous archbishop of Seville, who presided in one or more councils at Toledo, has left us two books on the ecclesiastical offices, which are supposed to have been written about the year 633. (He succeeded Leander as bishop in the year 595, and died in the year 636.) In the thirteenth and three following chapters of the first book, he gives us information as to the liturgy of his day. He mentions that, “In Africa the Alleluia was sung only on Sundays, and on the fifty days after Easter; but with us, according to the ancient tradition of the Spains, it is sung at all times, except the days of Lent and other fast days.” It would appear also, that what was called the offertorium was sung. With reference to the order of the mass, or “the prayers with which the sacrifices offered to God are consecrated,” he claims that St. Peter was the author of the service which was celebrated throughout the whole world. He speaks of there being seven prayers or orations, the first being one of exhortation to the people, inciting them to earnest prayer to God; the second is a prayer to God, that He will mercifully receive the prayers and oblations of the faithful; the third is poured forth either for those who offer, or for the faithful who have departed this life, that by the same sacrifice they may obtain pardon; fourthly, comes, connected with the kiss of peace, a prayer that all, being mutually reconciled to each other, may partake worthily of the sacrament of the Body and Blood of Christ, because the indivisible Body of Christ admits not of dissension. Then follows, fifthly, the illatio, which answers to the PREFACE in the Roman Missal. It is described by Isidore as connected with the sanctification of the oblation in which “the whole universe of terrestrial creatures and heavenly powers are urged to join in the praise of God,” and the “Hosanna in the Highest” is sung. Then succeeds, sixthly, that which in some manuscripts is described as the “confirmatio” of the sacrament, in others, the “conformatio,” that “the oblation which is now offered to God, being sanctified by the Holy Spirit, may be conformed to the Body and Blood of Christ.” Seventhly, the Lord’s Prayer fol-ment of the same character in which it was the metropolis, nearly continuous with Gallians were to be read at Mass churches; all the bishops and the people were to retain the Lord be with you," "And with the manner that all the East apostolic tradition," but at the us were given that the masses ted in the order which their late a, had received in writing from the apostolic see. In 633 a un- blished, not in each province oughout the whole extent of the is called, through all Spain and dia Narbonensis); and amongst mentioned about the same time leison was repeated, and the cipio" was added to the "Gloria he heresy of the Priscillianists, one not only at the apostolic ght out all the East, Africa, and the famous archbishop of Se- ded in one or more councils left us two books on the ces, which are supposed to an about the year 633. (He r as bishop in the year 565, ear 636.) In the thirteenth g chapters of the first book, ation as to the liturgy of his is that, "In Africa the Alleluia Sundays, and on the fifty days t with us, according to the of the Spains, it is sung at all days of Lent and other fast appear also, that what was um was sung. With reference e mass, or "the prayers with es offered to God are conse- that St. Peter was the author ch was celebrated throughout He speaks of there being orations, the first being one of e people, inciting them to God; the second is a prayer ill mercifully receive the ons of the faithful; the third er for those who offer, or for ve departed this life, that by e they may obtain pardon; connected with the kiss of at all, being mutually recom- may partake worthily of the Body and Blood of Christ, ible Body of Christ admits not follows, fifthly, the Illatio, the PREFACE in the Roman scribed by Isidore as con-secration of the oblation whole universe of terrestrial enly powers are urged to join d," and the "Hosanna in the Then succeeds, sixthly, the nuscripts is described as the sacrament, in others, the at "the oblation which is being sanctified by the Holy rmed to the Body and Blood thly, the Lord's Prayer follows, in which he notices likewise seven petitions—the first three for things eternal, the last four for things temporal. In chapter xvi, Isidore speaks of the Nicene Creed as proclaimed to the people at the time of the sacrifice, and in the next, of the priestly benedictions. In chapter xviii, he teaches on the nature of the sacrifice. [Compare ELEMENTS, I, 602.]

(45.) Isidore does not mention the part of the service at which the Nicene Creed, as he calls it, was recited; but we know that at the third council of Toledo, in 589, king Recared had ordered that the creed of the hundred and fifty should be recited "in the liturgy before the Lord's Prayer throughout all the churches of Spain and Gaul, according to the form of the Oriental churches." [CREED, I, 491.] This position of the creed is not that which was adopted by the Roman church, but it is that which the creed of the hundred and fifty occupies in the liturgy which we must proceed now to discuss, namely—

(46.) The Spanish or Mozarabic Liturgy.—The Mozarabic Liturgy was first printed under the direction of Cardinal Ximenes, in the year 1500. The manuscript which he used must have been of a comparatively late date; for as Lorenzani, subsequently archbishop and cardinal, noticed in the preface to his edition (which was dedicated to Benedict XIV. and has been reprinted in Migne's series, vol. lxxxv.) the book makes mention of St. Francis, St. Dominic, St. Thomas Aquinas, St. Anthony of Padua, all belonging to the 13th century, to which I would add, that in the first part, amongst the greater festivals, there is a mass for the feast of Corpus Christi, which we know was not introduced until the same century. It would be extremely difficult, therefore, to say what parts of the services are ancient, and what portions fall below the chronological limit by which we are bound; and it must be understood that much that follows is stated under reservation.

(47.) On comparing, however, the account given by St. Isidore, with the masses which we find in the Mozarabic Liturgy (as given by Lorenzani, Migne, p. 109; compare Daniel, i. p. 65, etc.), we have every point mentioned by Isidore reproduced in the liturgy. The exhortation to the people is found almost everywhere, under the heading Missa. We have the Alleluia at the beginning, apparently, of every mass, except those to be used in Lent (Daniel, pp. 55-57). We have the prayer that God would receive the oblation (ibid. p. 67). We have the prayer for the offerers (ibid. p. 69). The prayer for the Holy Spirit must have been displaced, for in the modern form it follows here. We have the "Dominus vobiscum" and "Et cum Spiritu tuo" (p. 71). That connected with the kiss of peace, which is the fourth prayer mentioned by Isidore, follows on p. 77. Then the "Illatio" follows, p. 79. It is, as Daniel describes it, a somewhat long ascription of glory, beginning with the "Dignum et justum est," varying almost every Sunday of the year, but always ending with the "Sanctus, sanctus" and the "Hosanna in the Highest." The "Confirmatio," or "Confirmatio," consists of the narrative of the institution. The choir recite the creed whilst the priest elevates the consecrated elements; the Lord's Prayer follows, and the benediction before the communion. Thus, with the one exception of the invocation of the Holy Spirit, the position of each prayer mentioned by Isidore is found here to be the same as that to which he assigned it.

(48.) There are some points which have not yet been mentioned which establish still more closely the connection of this liturgy with those of the Oriental churches. We have three Lessons at least—four in Lent. The first, or first two, from the Old Testament; the next, from the Acts of the Apostles or the Epistle; the last from the Gospel. The offering was distinctly made before the consecration, the choir retained the use of the Greek words, "Agyos, Agyos, Agyos." The Apostolic Benediction is found as in the Greek liturgies. After the Kiss of Peace we have the "Sursum corda" and the "Habemus ad Dominum." In the other Latin liturgies the words of institution are always introduced thus: "Qui pridie quam pateretur." In the Greek liturgies it always was, "Who, in the night in which He was betrayed." The Mozarabic follows the Oriental form, and this serves as an indication that, at all events, in some points the Spanish has never been altered, for the prayer which follows is (I believe) throughout the volume entitled Post prandii oratio, i. e. the modern rubric assumes that the prayer of consecration had run in the Roman form. [CANON, I, 272.] Once more, we have the Sancta sanctis here, and the choir sings, Gustate et videte quoniam suavis est Dominus. I think I might add that we have the words, "Give redemption to the captives, health to the infirm," as we had them in the liturgy of St. Mark, and "Rest to the departed," as we found the addition made in another of the Oriental liturgies.

(49.) But most curious of all is the rite which is peculiar to the Mozarabic Liturgy, of dividing the bread. [FRACTION, I, 688.]

(50.) One point more remains to be noticed: That the prayer "Post nomina" is very frequently addressed to Christ, and in many of the petitions so addressed our Lord is entreated to "accept the offering now made to Him;" the same may be noted in the petitions Post prandii, in which our Lord is entreated to sanctify the sacrifices. (See for examples, Migne, pp. 129, 138, 175, 195, 202, 204, etc.) Thus it is apparent that the canon of the church of Carthage, to which attention has been drawn, was not observed in Spain at the time when these services were framed.

(51.) Gallican Liturgies.—We know from the correspondence which passed between Gregory the Great and the missionary Augustine that the customs of the churches in Gaul and at Rome were different, even in the Mass or Eucharist. (Greg. Ep. xi. 64; Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 19.) The difference continued during the seventh and the greater part of the eighth centuries; but the introduction of the Roman chant into Gaul in the time of Pepin was followed up by a command of Charlemagne that every presbyter should celebrate the Mass according to the Roman order (Capitul. v. cap. 219-37), and for this purpose Charles obtained a copy of what professed to be the Gregorian Sacramentary from his friend Pope Hadrian. This order was not carried out: without some heartburnings, for we find in the next century the abbat Hilduin remarking to Louis the Pious that the older rites had been observed in Gaul from the very earliest times, and, as a proof, he referred to "the missal books, which were most ancient and were almost eaten up by age." (Hilduin, Vita Dionys. Areop., in Surius, Oct. 9; Palmer, I, 145.)

(52.) We must, of course, conclude that these "missal books" were not reproduced in the schools founded by Charlemagne and watched over by Alcuin and others. Indeed, they became so rare before the accession of Charles the Bald, that that monarch mentioned in his famous letter to the clergy of Ravenna (quoted by Mabillon, Lit. Gall. p. 20) that he was indebted to the clergy of the church of Toledo for his knowledge, that "up to the time of his grandfather, the Gallican churches had celebrated the divine offices in a manner different from those adopted in the churches of Rome and Milan." We cannot be surprised, therefore, at finding that the liturgical remains of the early Gallican church are very scanty, and we shall welcome with the greater thankfulness the discoveries of Thomasius, Martene, Mabillon, and Mone.

(53.) If we remember the early connexion of the churches of Lyons and Vienne with the East, we shall of course expect that the ritual of these churches must exhibit some points of resemblance with the ritual of the church of Ephesus. From the undoubted writings of Irenaeus (I abstain from using the so-called Pfallian fragment), we learn but little of the eucharistic office of his day, but we do learn that it contained the words eis tou̅s ai̅w̅nas tou̅n ai̅w̅non, that the service included an offering or sacrifice to God through Christ Jesus of the first fruits of His creatures, that there was an invocation (ἑκκλησις or ἐπικλησις) on the bread and the temperamentum offered (i. 3. 1; iv. 17. 5; 18. 4, 5). These points remind us of the Oriental rites. Later allusions to the Gallican service, found in the writings of Gregory of Tours and others, have been collected by Mabillon in his learned work, de Liturgiâ Gallicana, published in 1685; and additional light is thrown upon the subject by the discovery in the library of St. Martin's, at Autun, of two letters, ascribed in the MS. to Germanus, the famous bishop of Paris, who died in the year 576. The discovery was made by Martene, who published the document verbatim et literaliter in his Thesaur. Anecd. tom. v. They are reproduced in Migne's series (vol. lxxii. pp. 83-98), and Migne has given as an appendix to them Mabillon's work de Liturgiâ Gallicana (pp. 101-447), and also the same writer's further work, entitled Sacramentarium Gallicanum (pp. 448-576).

(54.) We have altogether in these reprints:—
a. The letters of St. Germanus, of which I have spoken. They seem to be somewhat fragmentary, and I am disposed to regard the former as giving an account specifically of the service on Easter Eve and Easter Day. (Migne, ut sup. pp. 89-98.)

b. A Lectiary of the Gallican church, which Mabillon found at Luxeuil, and which he assigned to the end of the seventh century. (Migne, pp. 171-216.)

c. A Missal, entitled in the manuscript, though in a later hand, Missale Gallicanum. This is considered by the learned as representing the ritual of the south of France about the beginning of the eighth century. (It contains a service for the martyrdom of St. Leodgar, who was killed in 678.) The volume is very interesting, exhibiting indisputable marks that the services it contains were framed not merely at different times, but on different principles. Several holy days are noted by Mabillon as having been introduced at a period subsequent to the Lectiary, which he described as above. (Migne, pp. 225-318.)

d. Then follows a missal entitled Missale Franco-rum, in consequence of petitions that it contains for the king and kingdom and rulers of the Franks. This missal concludes (at least in its present form) with a fragment of the Roman canon as it exists in the Gregorian Sacramentary; the earlier part is occupied with very interesting ordination offices. Morinus considered the MS. to be of the sixth century, but Mabillon puts it later. It evidently belongs to an epoch at which the Roman services were ousting those of the Gallican church. (Migne, pp. 318-340.)

The MSS. (c) and (d) are now in the Vatican. The former is numbered Vat. Reg. 626, or Alex. Vat. 317 (the accounts differ); the number of the other is apparently Alex. Vat. 257. They must have come from the Library of Fleury, which was dispersed by the Huguenots.

e. The Missa Gallicanum which follows in Mabillon (Migne, pp. 340-382) is also at the Vatican (Vat. Pal. 493); it came from the library at Heidelberg. It contains interesting expositions of the Creed and Lord's Prayer, and, almost unutilized, the services for Easter Day. It is believed to represent the use of Mid-France in the eighth century.

f. To these must be added the Sacramentarium Gallicanum, above referred to. It was found by Mabillon at Bobio, and was regarded by him, as by others, as indicating the services of the neighbourhood of Besançon. It commences with the Gregorian Canon under the title Missa Romanensis collatiana (Migne, pp. 451-580).

g. And M. Mone, the librarian at Carlsruhe, discovered in the library under his care palimpsests from which he was enabled to decipher several old masses. The volumes came from the famous Benedictine convent of Reichenau, the island near Constance. Baron Bunsen has thrown additional light upon them in the third volume of the Analecta Ante-Nicaena.

(55.) A comparison of these manuscripts shows that if the suppositions regarding their origin are correct, there must have been a great variety in the details of the Eucharistic services in the various dioceses or provinces of France. Taking, however, the liturgy of St. Germanus as our guide, we learn that in his time, on the day or days of which he describes the services, when the priest came from the sacristy the clerk sang a kind of introt, and then the deacon proclaimed silence. The salutation followed, Domine sit semper robiscum, with the usual response. Lecti- ons were read from a Prophet, an Apostle, and a Gospel. The "Aius," or Ἄγιος, in Greek and then in Latin, preceded the "prophet," and the Song of Zacharias followed it. The Benedictio followed the Apostle, the "Aius" being again sung before the Gospel. The book was carried to the pulpit, preceded by seven candles, signifying the seven gifts of the Spirit. [Compare GOSPEL, I. 743.] A homily followed upon the

(It contains a service for St. Leodegar, who was killed in 559, and is very interesting, exhibiting that the services it contains were used more or less frequently at different times, but especially at several holy days as we have been introduced at in the Lectionary, which he (Migne, pp. 225-318.)

is a missal entitled Missale sequence of petitions that it king and kingdom and rulers of missal concludes (at least in with a fragment of the exists in the Gregorian Sacrament part is occupied with very long offices. Morians consisting of the sixth century, but later. It evidently belongs to the Roman services were the Gallican church. (Migne, (d) are now in the Vatican. (See Vat. Reg. 626, or Alex. Vat. 257. They are in the Library of Fleury, by the Huguenots.

Gallicanum which follows in pp. 340-382) is also at the (493); it came from the Greg. It contains interesting Creed and Lord's Prayer, and the services for Easter Day. Present the use of Mid-France

Y. He added the Sacramentarium referred to. It was found in 1600, and was regarded by him as indicating the services of the 6th century. It commences with under the title Missa Romanica, pp. 451-580).

the librarian at Carlsruhe, library under his care palimpsest was enabled to decipher the volumes came from the convent of Reichenau, in the diocese of Constance. Baron Bunsen has written upon them in the third volume of his Ante-Nicæna.

One of these manuscripts shows various readings regarding their origin and have been a great variety of Eucharistic services in the provinces of France. Taking, for instance, the service of St. Germanus as our standard, we find in his time, on the day of the services, when the sacristy the clerk sang then the deacon proclaimed followed, Dominus with the usual response. Then a Prophet, an Apostle, and a saint, or Ayios, in Greek and called the "prophet," and followed it. The Benedictio, the "Agnus" being again followed. The book was carried by seven candles, signifying the Spirit. [Compare the homily followed upon the Gospel, and a prayer by the deacon. Then, Germanus says, intimation was given that the catechumens must leave the church; but his words seem to show that though the form was kept up, the occasion had ceased. The oblations were now brought in (they are designated as being the Body and Blood of Christ, which seems to me to indicate that we have here the service of Easter Eve) amidst the singing of the choir; the Lauds or Alleluia followed, "as in the Revelation" (iv. 8-11), and the Angelic Hymn; and the names of the departed saints were recited, "as if heaven were opening at the second coming of Christ." The Kiss of Peace was given, and then the Sursun corda, the "contractio et commixtio corporis Christi" (the breaking being connected with a strange legend), whilst the prostrate clerks were singing an anthem (apparently the Sinctus, Sanctus). On this followed the Lord's Prayer, the benediction of the people ("Pax fides et communicatio corporis et sanguinis Domini sit semper vobiscum"), and the communion. Then, what Germanus called the "mystery of the Trinity," in such words as seem to me to suit only the ἑὸς ἕνος κ. τ. λ. of the Oriental liturgies; and with this Germanus's account of the form of the service terminates. It will be noticed that he omits to inform us of the moment when the consecration took place, although we find in an earlier part of the letter that "pridie quam pateretur Dominus," our Saviour said, "Hic est calix sanguinis mei mysterium fidei qui pro multis effundetur in remissionem peccatorum;" which are the words of the Gregorian Canon. This omission and other reasons prevent me from accepting this account as a description of the ordinary liturgy of the Gallican church at the time of Germanus. The account seems rather to be that of one of the services at the season of Easter.

(56.) With this we may compare the results of Mone's discoveries amongst the palimpsests at Carlsruhe. We should not be justified in regarding the originals of these as all of one date, but we may supplement the account of Germanus by what we find here. It would appear that there was occasionally or generally a prayer post prophetiam, and, after the catechumens were dismissed, a præfatio, which was an address to the congregation, explaining the service which followed, and calling upon them to join heartily in it. This was followed by a collect. The oblations were then made, and the names both of living and departed members of Christ's body were read, prayers being offered both ante nomina and post nomina. Then came the kiss of peace and the prayer ad pacem, and the service proceeded with the Sursun corda, etc. (though this is not mentioned) and the contestatio, which answered to the modern preface. Of these contestations there was evidently a great variety. This of course led up to the Sinctus, and we have various collects entitled post sanctus; the words of institution (we have not them at length) were introduced "qui pridie," and part of them seem to have been uttered secreta, for, after them, comes in one missa a "post secreta." (We have three instances here of an invocation.) Then came the Lord's Prayer with variable introductions, all entirely different from the Gregorian, and a variable EMBOLESMUS. Then must have followed the Communion, for the next prayer is entitled generally post omnia, once only post mysterium; then came the collect and the final benediction:

(57.) The first sacramentary published by Mabillon entirely upholds the correctness of our inferences drawn from these palimpsests, and at the same time exhibits marks of progress towards later modes of thought. In these missals, which were prepared for the Sundays and older established festivals, we have the præfatio, still the title for an address to the congregation: the collectio post nomina frequently shows that the names recited had been names of the living who had made their offerings or sacrifices, at the same time that it included at times a prayer for the dead. The Vere dignum et iustum est is entitled (generally in the older services) immolatio missæ, sometimes contestatio. The form of the mysterium or secreta always begins qui pridie. The words of consecration are not given. The post secreta is either a prayer or an expression of belief. There seems to have been two benedictiones populi, one a prayer before communion, the other a blessing before dismissal. The general character of the Missale Gallicanum (Migne, pp. 339, etc.) is the same. We still find the titles immolatio and contestatio prefixed to the Vere dignum et iustum est, but there are a few indications that a change of service was being introduced when the manuscript was prepared, such as immolatio nunc missæ or contestatio nunc, and in a very few instances the post communionem is altered to post eucharistiam. The character of the collects post nomina is the same as in the Gothic missal.

(58.) The other two sacramentaries i.e. the Missale Francorum, and the Sacramentarium Gallicanum (which Mabillon found at Bobbio) contain, either in whole or in part (the former manuscript being mutilated), the Gregorian canon. We must therefore assign them to the ninth century (or the later years of the eighth) at the earliest. In the former the title super oblatam has replaced the words post nomina, and the offerings have become the oblations of God's people. The names of the offerers are no longer recited; and the Memento etiam appears in the canon, after the consecration. We have still benedictions "ad plebem," pp. 336, 337.

From the letter of the Monks of Mount Olivet to pope Leo III., we know that the creed of Constantine was used in the chapel of Charlemagne. [CREED, §15, I. 492.] We find no notice of it in any of the manuscripts.

(59.) Roman Liturgy.—We must now turn to one of the most difficult subjects,—the history and characteristics of the liturgy in use in Rome. We have seen evidences that it differed materially from the Liturgy of Gaul in the middle of the 8th century, and we know, with considerable accuracy, the form which it assumed before the end of the 9th century; but

* A prayer in the earlier MS. (p. 227), "Give deliverance to the captive, sight to the blind," may remind us of a similar petition in the Alexandrine liturgies. The prayers post nomina, ad pacem, post secreta, are also frequently addressed to our Lord. There is a distinct invocation of the Holy Spirit on pages 246, 257, and on page 266 (the Thursday in Holy Week) I notice the "Agnus Dei."

the evidence is very limited as to its previous growth. In the accounts of the 9th century we meet with statements that Alexander (A.D. 100 to 106) combined the history of the Passion of our Lord with the prayer of the priest, when the masses were celebrated (see § 34); that Xystus (107-116) directed that during the service the people should sing the hymn Sanctus, Sanctus, Sanctus, etc.; that Telesphorus (117-127) ordered that at the commencement of the sacrifice the angelic hymn Gloria in excelsis Deo should be sung on the night of the Nativity alone. These and similar statements, found in the works of Walafrid Strabo and others, indicate a belief that the portions referred to were of great antiquity. Greater credence may perhaps be given to details such as these which follow. Caecilius (422) is said to have directed that Psalms of David should be sung before the sacrifice, in addition to the reciting of parts of St. Paul's Epistles and the Holy Gospel. Of Leo the Great (440-462), it is distinctly stated that he added the words "sanctum sacrificium et aeterna;" and of Gelasius (about 495), that he framed with great caution prefaces for the sacraments. The letter of Vigilius to Profuturus, Bishop of Braga, has been already referred to; he sent to the Spanish bishop the text of the "canonical prayer," "which by God's mercy we have received (he said) from apostolic tradition." The letter is preserved, the enclosure unhappily is lost. But in the letter he gives the important information that "in the celebration of masses, at no time and on no festival was the order of the prayer different. They always consecrated in the same form the gifts offered to God." Then we come to the work of Gregory the Great, of whom it is stated by the Deacon John that he made additions to the ritual of the church, that he ordered the ALLELUIA [l. 56] to be said at other times beside Pentecost, the Ayrie eleison to be sung, and the Lord's Prayer to be recited immediately after the canon over the sacrifice. (The Canon here would seem to be the list of saints commemorated in the Nobis quoque peccatoribus. For an example of this limited meaning, see Muratori de Lit. Rom. i. 555.) Gregory is also declared by his biographer to have reduced into one volume the Gelasian codex of the solemnities of the mass, by removing many things, altering a few, and adding others "pro exponendis Evangelicis lectionibus." His letter to John the bishop of Syracuse (Epist. ix. 12) seems to shew that the Deacon John was correct in his account of the alterations which Gregory had introduced, and several writers agree in narrating that Gregory added the words "diesque nostros in tua pace disponas." They are found in the prayer Hanc igitur. With these brief hints we shall be better able to examine the documents which have come down to us.

(60.) The first, and undoubtedly the oldest, is a sacramentary discovered in the library at Verona, and published by Blanchini in the year 1735. He gave to it the title Sacramentarium Leonianum, and attributed it (without any documentary evidence) to pope Leo the Great. An examination of the contents of the work has induced almost all the great ritualists to differ herein from Blanchini; and it seems now to be generally agreed that the manuscript was prepared by some ecclesiastic for his own, either private or public, use. It is mutilated at the commencement, and does not give the canon of the Mass. It contains, however, a collection of prayers such as were used at the eucharistic services, one or two collects for the day, a prayer of oblation, a Vere dignum, a prayer after communion, and a benediction. Of these there is an immense variety; thus there are eight "sets" of prayers for the festival of St. John and St. Paul, and twenty-eight for that of St. Peter and St. Paul (Migne, iv. pp. 47, 49, etc.). Titles to the prayers occur very rarely; we have, however, preces for the collects on p. 110; super oblata on pp. 106, 110; and on the same pages, postcommunio and super populum. We are thus severed from the post nomina of the Gothic sacramentary, and brought more into connexion with the Missale Francorum and the Bobio manuscript. The Ballerini have remarked that in a mass for Pentecost the prayer Hanc igitur is represented as preceding the Communiantes (p. 40). On p. 70 there is an embolismus (the only one I have discovered), and on p. 75, "Quod ore sumpsimus, Domine, quaesumus, mente capiamus," etc., and a distinct invocation of the Holy Spirit on pp. 79, 147 (compare p. 139). On p. 117 we find two prayers, still more resembling the Gregorian Hanc igitur and Quam oblationem; the former has the words "diesque meos clementissima gubernatione disponas"; in the latter it seems to have been assumed that the reader needed only the first few words, his memory would supply the rest. If so, we carry the petition, Quam oblationem, back to a period before the time of Gelasius.

We meet with so many prayers for the rulers or princes of the "Roman Name" that we can have no difficulty in assigning the book to some Roman priest or bishop; and the manner in which the Roman primacy is urged (as we find it in no other sacramentary) may be deemed to justify Blanchini in his opinion that Leo might have been the compiler. We learn from Gerbert (Vetus Liturgia Aemmanica, i. 80) that the effect of the discussions which followed his publication on the mind of Blanchini was this; he became persuaded that the work was still more ancient than at first he deemed it to be, and attributed it to Sylvester, who was pope from 314 to 355. One thing is clear, that, when the book was written, the liturgy at Rome had not assumed the character which Vigilius ascribed to it in the middle of the sixth century, unless we limit most rigidly his language as to the form of consecration.

(61.) In the year 1680 the learned Thomasius (afterwards Cardinal) published the contents of a manuscript which, having belonged to Petan, was then in the library of Queen Christina, and is now in the Vatican (Vat. 1455 according to Daniel, 316 according to Muratori). This part of Thomasius' work was republished by Muratori in the first volume of his learned work Liturgia Romana Vetus, and with it, in Migne's series, vol. lxxiv. p. 847, etc. The manuscript is of the tenth century, and is entitled, Liber Sacramentorum Romanae Ecclesiae ordinis anni circuli. It contains several prayers for the princes of the Roman kingdom and the governors of the Roman empire (Muratori, pp. 729-731); but one of the well-known collects for Good Friday (p. 561)

bratur," varies in the details which I shall mention as I proceed.

(66.) What is now called the Ordo (of which we have no notice in the Gelasian Sacramentary) is given briefly but satisfactorily. Mention is made of the Introit, the Kyrie eleison, the Gloria in excelsis Deo, to be used on Sundays and festivals if a bishop is present, otherwise only at Easter. When the Litany is said, neither the Gloria in excelsis nor the Alleluia is sung. Then followed the Oratio or Oratio Missalis, i. e. the collect for the day; the Apostolum (sic) or Epistle; then either the Gradalis or the Alleluia; then the Gospel. This was followed by the offertory, and the prayer super oblata, which varied; it is called the secretis in one MS. It concluded with the words, Per omnia saecula saeculorum, which were recited aloud. The absence is noted (Gerbert, p. 301) of the salutations before the Epistle and before the Gospel, of the Creed, and of the Sermon. Then the canon commenced, but the records end with the salutation after the embolismus; i. e. we have no account of the communion, or the kiss of peace, or the benediction. The Vatican MS. used by Muratori has, however, one line more, Agnus Dei qui tollis peccata mundi, miserere nobis, which is also contained in two or more other MSS. In the body of the books we have for each day a prayer ad complendum, answering to the similar prayer in the modern missal.

(67.) I think it is certain that all the known MSS. of this sacramentary were used north of the Alps, yet not one of them refers to the use of the "Nicene" Creed in the service of the Mass. We know, however, that the Gallican churches used the Gloria in excelsis every Sunday, and that the recitation of the creed spread very much after the fall of Felix and Elipandus. The collects super oblata have never (I believe) any reference to the offenders. This had been discouraged by Pope Innocent I. The persons named in the Te igitur are different in the different manuscripts. In some places the king was prayed for; in others the emperor; many omitted the petition, pro omnibus orthodoxis, and all the MSS. but one (the Vat. Othob.) omit the words, Pro quibus tibi offerimus.¹ The Memento civium on behalf of those who have died with the sign of faith is absent from five of the MSS., and in two other early copies it is inserted in the margin. The names adduced in the prayer commencing Nobis quoque are again all Roman. (This collect is referred to by Innocent III. as indicating the growth of the Roman service.)

(68.) Ambrosian Liturgy.—The church of Milan was said to have been founded by Barnabas, and it seems to be undoubted that it was regarded as entirely independent of Rome until Gregory in 593 attempted to exercise patriarchal privileges within the province. Milan certainly had a liturgy of its own, which, notwithstanding repeated efforts on the part of the Roman patriarch, was, though with some modifications, retained until our own times. One of the most important of these efforts was encouraged by Charlemagne, who, in his anxiety to compel the Lombards to follow the example he had set to his earlier subjects, carried off to Rome all the service-books he could collect at Milan, with the intention of replacing them by Roman offices (Mabillon, Her. Ital. tom. i. part ii. p. 106, etc.). Eugenius, a Gallian bishop, induced Leo to exercise some forbearance in the matter, and thus the Milanese rite was preserved; but, as the account proceeds, only one copy of the earlier service-book could be discovered, so that from it the more recent copies must have been taken.

¹ They are omitted in loco both in the Bobio MS. and in the Missale Francorum, and in the explanation of Amalarius.

(69.) This statement seems to be in some degree corroborated by the fact that no manuscript of very ancient date has been discovered containing the Ambrosian rite. The sacramentary published by Pamelius in 1571 differs considerably even in the canon from the modern rite given by Daniel, and it differs too in the service for the Thursday before Easter from that which Saxe, the librarian at Milan, furnished from a very old manuscript to Muratori (de Lit. Rom. i. 131). The text of Daniel approximates more nearly to that of the modern Roman Ordo and Canon than that given by Pamelius, shewing, I conceive, that the efforts of various popes to induce the Milanese to resign their inheritance have tended to encourage the admission of details from the Roman liturgy. Thus, the text of the Confiteor (Daniel, p. 50) and the absolutions, the Munda cor meum (p. 62) and the Hanc igitur (p. 84, in which the well-known Gregorian words Desuper nostros in tua pace disponas are to be found), the Supplices te rogamus (p. 90), the Libera nos (p. 96) do not occur in Pamelius, nor do other prayers of great importance given by Daniel (pp. 100, 102, 104); and the language of many others differs considerably.

(70.) Taking the text of Pamelius as our guide, we observe that, after two private prayers said by the priest before and whilst he draws near to the altar, an Ingressa takes the place of the Roman Introit; and that before the Gloria in excelsis there is an oratio super populum, corresponding to our collect for the day. The salutations, Dominus vobiscum, etc., are very frequent; after the Gloria in excelsis (in which, as in the older copies, the Qui tollis peccata mundi miserere nobis is not repeated) the Kyrie eleison follows. (In the Gregorian it precedes the Angelic Hymn.) Three lessons were read, as in the Gallican and Spanish rites—the Prophecy, the Epistle, the Gospel; a Psalmus, consisting of two (or more) verses suited to the Prophecy, was sung after it; a Benedictus preceded the Epistle, and a verse for the day with the Alleluia followed it; the first few words of the Gloria in excelsis and a suitable benedictory prayer preceded the Gospel; salutations, the Kyrie eleison, and an antiphon succeeded it. The oblations of the bread and the cup were then made, and they were made even until our own day in a manner recalling the earlier conceptions of the church; they were brought in, not by the deacon, but by ten aged men and as many women, and presented by them to the priest. He had previously offered an oratio super sidonem, which varied with the day or season; then came the orationes secretae ad munus Oblatum, and a prayer resembling the suscipe Sancte Pater of the Roman office, and two others commencing Et suscipe Sancta Trinitas (these differ in very interesting details from those which in the Roman book follow the recitation of the creed). According to the book before us a prose hymn entitled offerenda was all the service-books he could find with the intention of replacing offices (Mabilion, Iter Ital. 96, etc.). Eugenius, a Gallican, used to exercise some forbearance, and thus the Milanese rite, as the account proceeds, the earlier service-book could be that from it the more recent were taken.

It seems to be in some degree a fact that no manuscript of any age has been discovered containing the sacramentary published by Daniel, which differs considerably even in modern rite given by Daniel, the service for the Thursday after which Saxe, the librarian at Rome, from a very old manuscript (Rom. i. 131). The text of the Canon than that given by me, I conceive, that the efforts to induce the Milanese to resign themselves to encourage the service from the Roman liturgy, the Confiteor (Daniel, p. 50) the Munda cor meum (p. 62), 34, in the well-known vesque nostros in tua pace dis- and the Symphonicis to populum nos (p. 96) do not occur in the prayers of great importance (pp. 100, 102, 104); and by others differing considerably, the text of Pamelius as our guide, after two private prayers said and whilst he draws near to missa takes the place of the Gloria that before the Gloria in oratio super populum, collected for the day. The in vobiscum, etc., are very Gloria in excelsis (in which, the Qui tollis peccata mundi repeated) the Kyrie eleison precedes the Anglican services were read, as in the rites—the Prophecy, the Psalmus, consisting of suited to the Prophecy, was edictus preceded the Epistle, with the Alleluia followed by the Gloria in excelsis victory prayer preceded the Kyrie eleison, and an it. The oblations of the were then made, and they il our own day in a manner conceptions of the church; a, not by the deacon, but by many women, and presented e. He had previously ordered mem, which varied with the came the orationes secretæ and a prayer resembling the of the Roman office, and two Et suscipe Sancta Trinitas interesting details from the Roman book follow the d). According to the book ymn entitled offerenda was then chanted (it began Ecce apertum est templum tabernaculi testimonium, and ended with the Sanctus of the Apocalypse), and this introduced the creed. Then followed the varying prayer super oblationem repeated aloud, and the "preface to the canon" followed. The prefaces (they are so entitled) are numerous. The canon commenced in a manner similar to the Gregorian, but the Hanc igitur and Quam oblationem were replaced by a single prayer commencing Fac nobis. (This is not in Daniel, nor is there notice there of the washing of the fingers of the priest which here ensued, its position differing from that in the Roman book.) Then immediately ensued the consecratio panis per verba Christi and the consecratio calicis, and the commemoratio passionis resurrectionis et ascensionis Domini—all differing from the Gregorian text; but we have the Memento etiam and the Nobis quoque. The Per quem differed materially: there was a special prayer for the confection and commixtion, and the Lord's Prayer followed with a doxology. The Pacis nuntiatio, including a prayer, Pax in caelo, pax in terra, pax in omni populo, pax saeculorum ecclesiarum Dei; pax Christi et ecclesiae maneat semper in vobiscum. Then he communicated, and the communion of the bystanders (V. Corpus Christi, R. Amen). With the last exception, and that of the offering of the priest after his reception, Deo gratias, Deo gratias, etc., the modera or Daniel's text here differs almost entirely from that of Pamelius, which has nothing analogous to the prayers of the Roman Liturgy. Then, an appeal to the church to rejoice, entitled transitorium; a varying prayer post communionem; Dominus vobiscum: Kyrie eleison; Benedicet et exaudiat nos Iesus; Procedamus in pace, R. in nomine Christi, and the service concluded.

(71.) The importance of our subject is such that it is necessary to say a few more words on the canon which Muratori printed in his famous work (p. 131), from the copy furnished to him by Saxe. Here we find the Hanc igitur oblationem adapted for the day, and the Quam oblationem which is in Pamelius; but there is a prayer commencing Hanc facimus, to which I know of nothing analogous anywhere else. The service is represented as then passing on to a prayer resembling in some respects that commencing Per quem, and on this the Lord's Prayer follows. Thus then (if Muratori's account may be implicitly trusted) we have no offering after consecration, no prayer for those who have departed with the sign of faith, no commemoration of the Roman martyrs, no ceremony of fraction before the Lord's Prayer: all of which are contained in the rite as published by Pamelius. The fact is remarkable, and the discrepancy seems to require some explanation. We have an indication in both services that, as we have them, they are later than 800; for in both we have a prayer for the emperor, and Charles was not crowned emperor before that year.

(72.) We have no account of the early liturgy of the patriarchate of Aquileia.

(73.) Liturgy of the British Islands.—We are in almost entire ignorance of the character of the liturgies of the ancient British and Celtic churches. It is of course most probable that they resembled in some degree the uses of the churches in Gaul or Spain, but of the extent of this resemblance it is impossible to speak precisely. A curious document originally published by Spellman, and much used by Ussher, Stillington, and others, may be found in Haddan and Stubbs (i. 138-140). It seems to have been written in the latter part of the seventh or in the eighth century, and professes to give some notes on the various 'courses' in use in Western Europe. The 'Cursus Gallorum' is referred to St. John, and it is stated that it was used widely. The 'Cursus Scottorum,' of which a marked feature was that the Sanctus, the Gloria in excelsis Deo, the Lord's Prayer, and the Amen were chanted by all the congregation, male and female, is assigned to St. Mark; and its introduction into Britain and Scotland is attributed to Germanus of Auxerre and Lupus, who visited the islands about the year 429. It thus (as Professor Stubbs says) is silent on the liturgy of Britain before 429, and its evidence, so far as it is worth anything, only asserts that the Irish liturgy used by St. Patrick was neither Roman nor Gallican, but Alexandrian." Coming down to the next century, we find an assertion attributed to Gildas, that the Britons were opposed to the whole world and to the Romans in particular, "in the mass" (H. and S. i. 112). The date is questioned by Mr. Stubbs, who would refer the assertion to a later period; but, of course, if true in the seventh or eighth century it must have been true in the sixth as to the opposition to Rome. The words of Gregory to Augustine (ib. iii. 19) authorised the latter to form a purely Anglican rite, and we know from his proposals to the British bishops (Bede, E. H. ii. 2, in Palmer, i. 178), that in matters of custom, in which at the time "the latter differed from the use of Rome and of the church universal," Augustine would give up all points but three. He insisted that they should celebrate Easter at the proper time, should baptize after the Roman ritual, and should join him in preaching the word of the Lord to the English nation. "Everything else, however contrary to our customs, we will bear with equanimity." Of course as long as the Britons and Celts refused to observe the Roman Easter, they must have refused to adopt the Roman ritual for the Eucharist. And we know that the Roman Easter was not observed either in Scotland or Ireland before the beginning of the eighth century. Bede (H. E. v. 13, see Haddan and Stubbs, ii. 110) states that Adamnan came to Aldred, king of the Angli, about the year 704, and whilst staying with him saw the canonical rites of the church, and was then persuaded how undesirable it was for him and his people, very few in number and living in an extreme corner of the earth, to retain customs which were opposed to those of the whole Christian world. Adamnan succeeded in inducing the North Irish churches to adopt the Roman Easter, but he died before he could persuade his own monastery at Iona to do the same. It yielded, however, about the year 716 (H. and S. ii. 114). The British churches lasted for a few years longer, but at length, between the years 755 and 850, the bishops in Wales gave way one by one (ib. i. 203, 204), following the example of their countrymen amongst the West Saxons, who had yielded to the persuasion of Alhelm in 705 (ib. i. 674).

(74.) One Tirechanus, writing about the year

750 (H. and S. i. 115, 141, 154), stated that the second order of Irish saints (beginning from the year 544) receive their office of the Mass from David, Gildas, and Cadoc. Dr. O'Connor, in the year 1819 gave some account of a manuscript (then in the library at Stowe, now in the collection of Lord Ashburnham) which contained a missal that must have been in use in Ireland. His account has been supplemented and corrected by Dr. Todd. We are still, unhappily, in great ignorance as to the character of the service contained in the MS. Two things of moment, however, are known. First, that a copy of the Nicene Creed is found in it, omitting the word Filioque. But we are not told whether this is in the office of the Mass or in the scrutiny in preparation for baptism. If the latter, we are reminded of the Gelasian or Gregorian Sacramentary, for the exclusion of the Filioque points to a mark of difference in the Irish church from the churches of Spain and Gaul. We are told, secondly, that there are several collects in this missal before the Epistles; and we know that at a synod of Mâcon, held about 624, the objection was raised against the famous Columbanus, that he celebrated the solemnities of the Mass with a multiplicity of prayers or collects. Eustatius, who was then abbat of Luxeuil (the convent had been founded by Columbanus), defended the use. Additional confirmation is furnished by the two very interesting books of Mullen and Dimma, in the library of Trinity College, Dublin. They are undoubtedly Irish, and although they contain only services for the visitation of the sick, yet these services bear very strong resemblance to each other, and the words, Refecti Christi corpore et sanguine, tibi semper dicamus, Domine, alleluia, alleluia (which are repeated), are found, almost identically, in the words of the Spanish Liturgy, Refecti Christi corpore et sanguine, te laudamus Domine, alleluia, alleluia, alleluia. A post-communion collect commencing Refecti is frequently found in the Gallican and other services, but the jubilant alleluia is connected with it only in the Mozarabic rite. I have not seen in the Spanish books the concluding thanksgiving, Deus tibi gratias agimus, etc.

Mabillon (De Liturg. Gall. lib. i. col. iii. § 2) shews that the Roman order was not introduced into Ireland before the 12th century.

(75.) Mr. Haldan (H. and S. ii. p. 275) considered that the one fragment of Scottish-Celtic liturgical documents, that has as yet seen the light, is contained in the book of Deer—a portion of the service for the Visitation of the Sick. It resembles closely that contained in the books I have just named, and thus it seems probable that the service was known from Aberdeen to Wexford. We thus connect the early Scottish rites also with those of Spain. It seems that in the 12th century the bishop of Glasgow introduced, with the consent of Pope Alexander III., the Sarum offices into his cathedral, and that his example was followed by other bishops in the next century (H. and S. 275 and 3:). As the Sarum missal contains the Gregorian Canon, the inference is that the Scotch use up to that time must, like the Irish, have continued to differ from that adopted in Gaul and England.

(76.) Returning to England, we have only to notice that the Sarum, Bangor, York, and Hereford uses, which continued until the 16th century, all agreed in adopting the text of the Gregorian Canon. We must conclude that that canon had been introduced universally before the end of the 10th century, and thus we have proof that the 13th canon of the council of Cloveshoo (A.D. 747) had secured complete obedience, and that "in the celebration of the masses all things were then done after the example which they had in writing from the Roman church." This canon seems to refer only to days kept in memory of events in the life of our Lord, but the spirit of the enactment is manifest. And doubtless when the Welsh bishops finally adopted the Roman Easter, they adopted simultaneously the Gregorian Liturgy. [C. A. S.]

LITERATURE.—It is impossible to attempt to give here a complete account of the very extensive literature connected with liturgies. The following list contains the principal collections and editions of ancient liturgies, and works useful in the study of the principal rites of antiquity.

GENERAL COLLECTIONS.—J. A. Assemani, Codex Liturgicus Ecclesie Universae; Rome, 1749-66. H. A. Daniel, Codex Liturgicus Ecclesie Universae in Eptomen Redactus; Leipzig, 1847-1853. [Includes the most characteristic portions of modern, as well as ancient, liturgical forms.]

SPECIAL COLLECTIONS AND EDITIONS.—E. Renandot, Liturgiarum Orientalium Collectio, Paris, 1716. [Reprinted, Frankfurt, 1847]. T. Brett, A Collection of the principal Liturgies, particularly the Clementine, the Liturgies of S. James, S. Mark, S. Chrysostom, S. Basil; translated into English by several hands. With a Dissertation upon them. London, 1720 [Reprinted, London, 1838]. J. M. Neale, Translation and Parallel Arrangement of the Anaphorae of S. Chrysostom, S. Basil, S. James, S. Mark, Coptic-Jacobite S. Basil, Lesser S. James, Theodore the Interpreter, the Armeno-Gregorian, and the Mozarabic Rite, in the Introduction to his History of the Eastern Church, p. 525 ff.; London, 1850; Tetralogia Liturgica; see S. Chrysostomi, S. Jacobi, S. Marci missae, quibus accedit Ordo Mozarabicus, parallelis ordine; London, 1849; The Liturgies of S. Mark, S. James, S. Clement, S. Chrysostom, and the Church of Malabar, with Translation; London, 1859; The Liturgies of S. Mark, S. James, S. Clement, S. Chrysostom, S. Basil [in Greek and in English]; London, 1868. H. Denzinger, Ritus Orientalium, Coptorum, Syrorum et Armeniorum in administrandis Sacramentis; Würzburg, 1863-64. [Bishop Rattray], Liturgia Primitiva Hierosolymitana; being the Liturgy of St. James, etc., London, 1744. W. Trollope, The Greek Liturgy of St. James, with Introduction, etc., and a Latin Version of the Syriac Copy; Edinburgh, 1848. Jac. Gear, Euchologium Magnum, sive Rituale Graecorum; Paris, 1647. R. F. Littledale, Offices from the Service-books of the Holy Eastern Church; London, 1863.

J. Pamellus, Liturgica Latinorum, Cologne, 1571; some later copies bear the title Missale SS. Patrum Latinorum; J. M. Thomsius, Opera omnia, ed. Vezzosi; Rome, 1747. Gregorii Dicit Sacramentorum Liber was printed by Pamellus in his Liturgica Latinorum (Cologne, 1571), from a Cologne MS. Again by Angelo Rocca from a Vatican MS., in his edition of Gregory's Ferd. Probst, Liturgie der drei ersten christlichen Jahrhunderte, Tübingen, 1870; Sakramente und Sakramentation, Tübingen, 1872; W. E. Scudamore, Notitia Eucharistica, London, 1872; second edition, London, 1876.

J. G. Janus, de Liturgijs Orientalibus Dissertatio, Wittenberg, 1724; J. M. Neale, The Liturgies of the Eastern Church, in the Introduction to his History of the Eastern Church, p. 317 ff., London, 1850; J. W. Etheridge, The Syrian Churches, their early History, Ritual, &c., London, 1849; G. P. Badger, The Nestorians and their Rituals, London, 1852; S. C. Malan, The Divine Liturgy of the Armenian Church, translated, London, 1870; Original Documents of the Coptic Church, translated, London, 1872, etc.; J. M. Rodwell, Ethiopic Liturgies and Prayers, translated from MSS., London, 1864, etc.; G. B. Howard, The Christians of St. Thomas and their Liturgies, Oxford and London, 1864.

Leo Allatius, de Libris et Rebus Ecclesiasticis Græcorum Dissertationes variae, Paris, 1646; in Fabricius, Bibliotheca Graeca, tom. v.; W. Cave, Dissertatio de Libris et Officijs Ecclesiasticis Græcorum, in his Historia Literaria, tom. ii. ed. Oxon. 1744-5; J. M. Heinecius, Abbildung der alten und neuen Griechischen Küche, Leipzig, 1711.

N. P. Sibbern, de Libris Latinarum ecclesiasticis et liturgicis, Wittenberg, 1706; A. Krazer, de Ecclesiae Occidentalis Liturgijs, Augsburg, 1786; A. G. Gräser, Die Röm.-Kathol. Liturgie nach ihrer Entstehung u. Ausbildung, Halle, 1829.

J. Mabillon, de Ritu Ambrosiano, in his Museum Italicum, tom. i. pt. 2, p. 95 ff.

Sam. Maresius, Disputatio Historico-Theologica de Mozarabum Officio, in his Disputationes selectae, pt. ii. pp. 355-368, Groningen, 1663; Dissertation on the ancient Spanish Liturgy in the third volume of España Sagrada by H. Florez, Mantuae Carpet. 1748; Jo. Pinus, Tractatus Historico-Chronologicus de Liturgia Antiqua Hispanica, Gothica, Isidoriana, Mozarabica, Toletana, Mieta, in the Acta Sanctorum, July, tom. vi. pp. 1-112; C. W. Flügel, Bemerkungen über die Mozarabische Liturgie, in Henke's Magazin für Religions-Philosophie u. s. w., Bd. iv. p. 115 ff. [C.]

LIUDGER, bishop of Mimigardford; commemorated March 26 (Acta SS. Mar. iii. 616).

[C. H.]

LIVARIUS, martyr at Marsal; commemorated Nov. 25 (Usuard. Auct.).

LIVENTIUS (Usuard. Auct. Jan. 25). [LIVENTIUS.] [C. H.]

LIVING, COMMEMORATION OF. [CANON; DIPTYCHS.]

LIVINUS (LIVINIUS, LIAFWINUS, LEBVINUS, LEBVIN, LIVIN), apostle of Flanders, 7th century, archbishop and martyr; commemorated Nov. 12 (Usuard. Auct.; Mart. Ado Append.; Acta SS. Ord. Bened. ii. 431; Surius, Prob. Sanct. Hist., ad diem). [C. H.]

LIZERIUS, Roman martyr at Venice, temp. Diocletian; commemorated Oct. 2 (Acta SS. Oct. i. 324). [C. H.]

LIZINIUS. [LICINIUS.]

LLAWDOG or LLEUDAD, Welsh saint, late in 6th century, commemorated Jan. 15, at

Llanllawdog in Carmarthen (Rees, Welsh Saints (Lond. 1636), p. 274). [E. B. L.]

LLECHID, early in 6th century, Dec. 2, at Llanlechid, in Carnarvon (ib. p. 223).

LLEUDAD v. LLAWDOG. [E. B. B.]

LLIBIO, late 7th century, Feb. 28, at Llanlibio, in Anglesey (ib. p. 308). [E. B. B.]

LONIO Lawhir ap Alan, early 6th century, has a church at Llanio, in Cardigan (ib. p. 221). [E. B. B.]

LLWCHAIARN, late 6th century, Jan. 11, at Llanllwchaiarn (ib. p. 275). [E. B. B.]

LLWNI, late 7th century, Aug. 11, at Llanllwni, in Carmarthen (ib. 308). [E. B. B.]

LLWYDIAN, late 7th century, Nov. 19 (ib.).

[E. B. B.]

LLYR, late 7th century, Oct. 21, at Llanlllyr in Cardigan (ib. v. also p. 169).

[E. B. B.]

LLYWEL or Luhlil, at Llywel in Brecon mid. 8th century, p. 253. [E. B. B.]

LOAVES, MULTIPLICATION OF. Representations of this miracle are very frequent in early Christian art. Perhaps the most common form of treatment is that given by Bottari (pl. lxxxv.), in which the Lord lays one hand on the loaves and the other on the fishes presented by two disciples, whilst at his feet are the "baskets" containing the "fragments." A sarcophagus in the Vatican, however, presents a noteworthy variation from this type (lit. pl. xix.). Here the loaves are placed in three baskets at the Lord's feet; in His right hand He holds a rod, which He extends over them, whilst He lays His left hand on the fish, presented by a disciple (see woodcut). The principal symbolic use of this subject was doubtless to keep before the minds of the faithful the perpetual supply of the heavenly bread provided in the Eucharist for the nourishment of their souls. Hence we find the second of the two recorded miracles of multiplication is the one usually chosen for representation, as in it the loaves multiplied are supposed to have been of wheat, the "barley loaves" being expressly mentioned on the first occasions. The seven baskets, which are of almost invariable occurrence in these representations, show unmistakably that the second of those miracles is referred to. [Compare MANNA.]

From Bottari (Sarcophagus of Junius Bassus).

LOAVES

Marthen (Rees, Welsh Saints 4).
[E. B. B.]
y in 6th century, Dec. 2, at Arvon (ib. p. 223).

LLAWDROG. [E. B. B.]
h century, Feb. 28, at Llan-
b. p. 308). [E. B. B.]
ep Alau, early 6th century, Llanio, in Cardigan (ib. p.
[E. B. B.]
N, late 6th century, Jan. 11,
p. 275). [E. B. B.]

7th century, Aug. 11, at Arthen (ib. 308). [E. B. B.] ate 7th century, Nov. 19 (ib.).
[E. B. B.]
century, Oct. 21, at Llan-V. also p. 169). [E. B. B.]
uhil, at Llywel in Brecon
253. [E. B. B.]

PLICATION OF. Representatracle are very frequent in Perhaps the most common is that given by Bottari (pl.
e Lord lays one hand on the r on the fishes presented by
at his feet are the "baskets" gments." A sarcophagus in er, presents a noteworthy type (Ill. pl. xix.). Here ed in three baskets at the right hand He holds a rod, er them, whilst He lays His presented by a disciple (see ipal symbolic use of this sub-o keep before the minds of etual supply of the heavenly Eucharist for the nourish-Hence we find the second miracles of multiplication hosen for representation, as ipied are supposed to have "barley loaves" being ex-on the first occasions. The h are of almost invariable representations, show unmis-e of these miracles is
are MANNA.]

Sarcophagus of Junius Bassus.

LOAVES, BENEDICTION OF

The Lord almost always appears with a rod in his hand (Buonarri, Petri, tav. viii.). Upon a sarcophagus given by Bottari (ib. p. 201) the Lord holds a rod in one hand, and from the other rays of light appear to stream upon the three baskets of loaves. This subject is represented in paintings, in sarcophagi (v. Bosio, passim) and sepulchral slabs (Perret, vol. v. pl. xviii. 18), on glasses (Buonarri, loc. laud.), and on mosaics (Ciampini, Vet. Monim. li. 98). On a curious sarcophagus in the Vatican the Jews appear to seize the Lord, perhaps to take him by force and make him a king (St. John vi. 15). [C.]

LOAVES, BENEDICTION OF. The procession of the Lite which occurs in the office of Great Vespers [v. art. LITE] returns into the nave of the church while the Aposticha are being sung; and each one puts down his candlestick on either side of a table*, already prepared by the Cellarius (or steward), on which stands a dish with corn and five loaves, such as we are in the habit of offering in church, and on either side of the dish are two vessels (ἀγγεῖα); the one on the left filled with wine, the other on the right with oil. The priest with the deacon stands within the beautiful doors (τῶν ὀραίων πυλῶν). When the Aposticha are finished, Nunc dimittis, the Trisagion, and the Lord's prayer are said; and after certain troparia belonging to the day, and certain ceremonies which are detailed in the rubrics, relating mainly to the censuring of the loaves, the priest takes one loaf in his hand, and says the following prayer in a loud voice:

"O Lord Jesus Christ, our God, who didst bless the five loaves in the desert, and didst feed five thousand men; do Thou bless these loaves also, the corn, the wine, and the oil; and multiply them in this holy monastery [or in the city], and throughout the whole world which is Thine, and sanctify the faithful who partake of them. For Thou art He that blesseth and sanctifieth all things, Christ our God; and to Thee we offer up (ἀναπέμπωμεν) glory, with Thine eternal [lit. without beginning] Father, and Thine all Holy and Good and Life-giving Spirit, now and to all ages. Amen."

Then Psalm 33 [34 E. V. Benedicam Domino] is said as far as the words, "Shall want no manner of thing that is good."

And the priest goes from his place, and stands before the Holy doors looking West. And after the end of the psalm he says:

"The blessing of the Lord and His mercy

* τὰ μαρῶν δία. So called because carried in the hand. ἡ τετραπόδιον. Called in the parallel rubric in the office for Vespers ἀναλόγιον, which word is explained as pulp. tum portabile.

† It is disputed what is meant by this term. Here it evidently means the doors which separate the body (nave) of the church from the narthex; for the rubric on the procession of the Lite, which starts from the interior of the church, says—διελθόντες διὰ τῶν ὀραίων πυλῶν . . . ἵστάνται ἐν τῶν ἁγίων, whence they are now returning. Dr. Neale, however, holds that these doors are the exterior doors of the narthex. The question appears to be connected with some ambiguity in the use of the term narthex, and probably with some structural variation in different churches. See Ducange, Constantin. Christos and Gloss. Gr. Barb. 288; Guar. Euch. pp. 12, 14, &c.; Neale, Intr. pp. 107, &c. [Doors, p. 574.]

LOCALIS ORDINATIO 1039

come upon you, by His grace and love for men now and ever and to all ages."

And the dismissal takes place.

A note at the end of the office of vespers adds: "Be it known that the bread which has been blessed is a preservative against all sorts of evils, if it be taken with faith."

The following form of "Blessing bread and distributing it to the poor on the feasts of the Ascension or Pentecost" is from an old Pontifical of Narbonne, and is stated [Martene, iii. 193] to have been used in other churches.

After rubrical directions for the procession, and other ritual observances, the deacon reads the gospel from St. John vi. 1. The officiating priest or bishop (Sacerdos vel Pontifex) begins, and the choir continues the antiphon De quibus panibus, &c.

- The Priest.* Dispersit dedit pauperibus.
- V. Beatus qui intelligit super egenam et pauperem.
- R. In die mala liberabit eum Dominus.
- V. Numquid panem poterit dare?
- R. Aut parare mensam in deserto?
- V. Pluit illis manna ad manducandum.
- R. Et panem coeli dedit eis.
- V. Cibavit illos ex adipe trument,
- R. Et de petra melle attravit eos.
- V. Manducaverunt et saturati sunt.
- R. Et desiderium attruli eis.
- V. Panem angelorum manducavit homo.
- R. Misit eis cibaria in abundantia.
- V. Domine exaudi orationem meam.
- R. Et clamor meus ad te veniat.

And the form concludes with two collects (the former of which is substantially the same as the Greek prayer already given, in a Latin shape) for blessing the bread, and that it may convey spiritual and bodily health and protection against all diseases to those who partake of it.

[H. J. H.]

LOCALIS ORDINATIO. By ancient custom, no priest, deacon, or other ecclesiastic was permitted to be ordained without having a definite sphere in which to exercise his ministry, or, in the later phrase, without a title to orders. This was termed in the Western Church localis ordinatio, and the clergy, because ordained to the charge of a particular church or monastery, were termed locales. And it was specially forbidden that a clerk should be ordained to two churches, "canoniarum enim est" (Syn. Nic. II. can. 15). The first Council of Arles (A.D. 314) recognises this custom incidentally in its 22nd canon, ordering that priests and deacons who should relinquish the churches to which they were bound by their ordination (in quibus ordinati sunt) should return and officiate there only, and that those who did not obey should be deposed. And the Council of Valencia in Spain (A.D. 524) expressly forbids ordination unless the candidate should have first promised to keep to a single post (se futurum localem) in order that none ordained might be able to transgress ecclesiastical rule and discipline with impunity by removing from one church to another. To the same effect the Oecumenical Council of Chalcedon (A.D. 451) in its 6th canon, forbidding any to be ordained ἀπολελυμένως, i.e. absolutely and without a title. It annuls ordinations performed in breach of this rule. By the two following canons it declares all clergy residing in a . . . ari or serving chapels of the martyrs, to be locales. And we find pope Leo (Ep. 92, ad Rustic. c. 1.) instructing his correspondent accordingly that ordination without this designation to a particular place was null, "vana est habenda ordinatio, quae nec loco fundata est, nec auctoritate munita."

The principle in fact was that such ordinations had no mission, and this idea kept in mind will in every instance give the reasons of the rule. It is not to be understood as binding a priest to the same church throughout his life, but it would seem that he was expected to keep as a general rule to the same diocese. He owed obedience to the bishop who ordained him to his first grade, and was bound to go and exercise his ministry whither he was sent by him. The 3rd Council of Carthago (A.D. 397) obliged Julian, a bishop, to send back to another bishop, Epigonius, a youth whom the latter had ordained no reader, although Julian had advanced him to the diaconate, and so might seem to have a claim upon him (can. 44). It was not usual for a bishop to promote to a higher grade a clerk ordained by another bishop. This was expressly forbidden by the ninth canon of a synod held at Angers, and by the tenth of another held at Vannes in Brittany. It was the breach of this well-known and understood rule that occasioned the loud complaints made by Demetrius of Alexandria when Origen, who was one of his deacons, was raised to the presbyterate in Palestine by the bishops of Caesarea and Jerusalem. We find Gregory the Great (A.D. 590) writing to the bishop of Syracuse, requesting him to send back to their ordinary certain clerks who had taken refuge with him, having been ordained by another bishop (Epist. iii. 42).

Canonical penalties were imposed for breaches of this rule. The Council of Ilerda (Lerida, A.D. 524) suspended the bishop so offending from the power to ordain (can. 12). The third of Orleans (538) sequestered him altogether from officiating for six months (can. 6). The civil power appears at some periods to have been called in to relegate wandering clerks to their own diocesan (Conc. Tolet. xiii. A.D. 683, cann. 11, 12). The number of these seems to have been very great throughout the Western Churches. Isidore, writing in A.D. 595, calls them Acephali, and speaks of them as disgracing the church, and hardly deserving the name of clergy at all (Isid. Hispal. de Eccles. Offic. lib. ii. c. 3).

The same Gregory wishing to appoint the archdeacon of Catania to the vacant see of Syracuse, formally asked for him a release by the bishop of Catania from this bond of localis (Epist. iv. 30). In like manner the assent of the archbishop of Ravenna was formally applied for before the appointment of Florentius, archdeacon of Ravenna, to the see of Ancona (Epist. xii. 6). Many such instances occur in history. Charlemagne himself presided over a council held at Frankfort in 794, when complaint was made of the wandering habit of a part of the clergy, and sundry prohibitions of this were repeated (Cap. Frankf.). That neither bishop, presbyter, nor deacon should migrate from city to city, but remain attached to their own church according to rule (can. 7). That bishops should not receive wandering clergy (can. 27). That none should be ordained unattached (absolutè) (can. 28).

Nor could they throw off their clerical character in order to escape this bond of localis (Syn. Cæsariensis, can. 6; Conc. Chalced., can. 7; Justinian, Novell. vi. c. 7, de clericis in alium ritae formam transentibus). But the clerk could not be removed from his church or preferment at the mere will of the bishop (Greg. Mag. Epist. l. 19; iii. 13), though he might be transferred, "non invitus," from one to another (Conc. Carthag. iv. can. 27). The bishop might not in ordinary cases send a clerk into another diocese (Conc. Antioch. can. 22; Can. Apost. c. 35); but he might send him on a mission to the heathen, as e. g. Gregory the Great sent Augustine to the heathen English.

The priest might not travel without the licence and commendatory letters of his bishop under penalty of suspension (Conc. Laodic. A.D. 361, can. 42; also can. 41; and especially Concil. Milan. A.D. 416, can. 20, which is very express and detailed on this point). Similar canons were passed by the second of Seville (A.D. 619, can. 3; Worm. 868, can. 19). In 506 the Council of Agde imposed by its 64th canon the penalty of three years' suspension upon priests for absence from their churches for even three weeks.

The clerk seems not to have been quite helpless before the power of his bishop. The Council of Sardica (A.D. 381) gave permission to a clerk unjustly accused to appeal to neighbouring bishops, and to these a discretion to hear and judge of such a case (can. 17). But it is very cautiously worded, and seems to point rather to the rehabilitation of the clerk in his own diocese, than his admission to another. The thirteenth of Toledo, however, in its 12th canon gives to clerks a distinct right of appeal to the metropolitan and even to the sovereign. And see also a letter of Pope Leo I. (ad Anastas. c. 9), which imposes upon the metropolitan the obligation of compelling such a fugitive to return to his own church. And Conc. Wormat. can. 18.

There were occasional exceptions to this rule of making all clergy locales. Paulinus, bishop of Nola (A. D. 353-431) writes in his first letter to Sulpicius Severus that he was ordained a presbyter at Barcelona upon the express condition that he should not be bound to that church. But his was altogether a special case; that of a man of high rank and large fortune who was induced to take upon him the priesthood by the urgent persuasions of the people. The case of Jerome (A.D. 340-420) again is peculiar. He was ordained a presbyter by Paulinus, bishop of Antioch, having previously stipulated that he should not be obliged to quit his monastic life. He says (Apol. ad Pammach. tom. ii. p. 181) that he told Paulinus "si tribus presbyterum et monachum nobis non auferas, tu videre de iudicio tuo." And from the tone of his description it would seem that like Paulinus of Nola, he too had been solicited to receive ordination. Yet we learn from Epiphanius that it struck him as very unusual and improper that Jerome and another presbyter, Vincentius, lived in retirement, discharging none of the duties of their function; not even celebrating the holy communion; a very remarkable thing at that time. But Jerome, whatever may have been his actual motive, was really in agreement with the principle of the canon of Chalcedon referred to above, which forbade men, ordained as he had been, to exercise their office. Theodoret in this bond of localis (Syn. 6; Conc. Chalced. can. 7; l. c. 7. de clericis in altum vitas). But the clerk could not be promoted or preferred at the church (Greg. Mag. Epist. l. 19; might be transferred, "not to another (Conc. Carthage), bishop might not in ordinary into another diocese (Conc. Apost. c. 35); but he might cession to the heathen, as c. g. ent Augustine to the heathen not to travel without the notatory letters of his bishop suspension (Conc. Laodic. A.D. an. 41; and especially Concil. 20, which is very express and blunt). Similar canons were of Seville (A.D. 619, can. 3; 4). In 509 the Council of 64th canon the penalty of cation upon priests for absence for even three weeks.

not to have been quite helpless his bishop. The Council gave permission to a clerk to appeal to neighbouring use a discretion to hear and (can. 17). But it is very ad seems to point rather to the clerk in his own diocese, to another. The thirteenth of its 12th canon gives to clerks appeal to the metropolitan reign. And see also a letter Justinian. c. 9), which imposes on the obligation of compel- to return to his own church. can. 18.

ional exceptions to this rule locales. Paulinus, bishop 31) writes in his first letter that he was ordained a a upon the express condition bound to that church. But special case; that of a man e fortune who was induced e priesthood by the urgent eople. The case of Jerome ain is peculiar. He was er by Paulinus, bishop of viously stipulated that he g to quit his monastic l. ad Pammach. tom. ii. p. Paulinus "si tribus pres- um nobis non auferas, tu io." And from the tone of ld seem that like Paulinus been solicited to receive e learn from Epiphanius as very unusual and im- and another presbyter, Vi- tirement, discharging none ir function; not even cele- emation; a very remarkable But Jerome, whatever my motive, was really in agree- of the canon of Chalcedon ich forbade men, ordained as e their office. Theodoret

(Histor. Relig. c. xiii. 3) records that Flavian, another bishop of Antioch, sent for Macedonius, a famous monk out of the neighbouring desert, and having ordained him a presbyter against his will, allowed him to return.

It is evident that even these exceptions are more apparent than real; that the rule of localis was absolute, and was strictly observed.

It extended also to bishops. No bishop was to be consecrated, except to a particular diocese, and to that he was to confine himself. We find the 1st Council of Nicaea (can. 15) recognising this fact in the plainest manner, and applying it to all the clergy, bishops, priests, or deacons. The above refers to clergy obtaining these removals, so to speak, by fair means: can. 16 of the same council deals with the case of presbyters and deacons breaking the rule of localis altogether lawlessly. Justinian promulgated a law (Novelt. lib. iv. c. 2) forbidding bishops to be absent from their dioceses more than a year, except by command of the emperor. The 3rd of Carthage (397) forbids (can. 38) the translation of bishops; and this canon recites the case which formed its occasion, viz. that Cresconius, bishop of Villa Regia, had left his see, and settled himself over that of Tubunae, contrary to the rule. For a bishop might not be transferred from his original see without the approval of a provincial synod (iv. Carth. can. 27, which no doubt embodies an earlier rule).

Yet even here we find some exceptions. Sozomen (Hist. Eccles. vi. c. 34) relates that Barsees and Eulogius, monks of Edessa, and Lazarus, a monk of Mount Sigoron, were raised to be bishops, not of any diocese, but purely and simply as an honour, ὡς πόλεως τιμὴς, ἀλλὰ τιμὴς ἑνεκεν. These appear, however, to be the only cases expressly recorded of a honorary episcopate, until a much later period. In the 2nd Council of Mâcon (A.D. 585) there were three bishops present who subscribed the acts of the council "non habentes sedes." The Council of Vermeria [Verberie, dioc. Soissons] (A.D. 752) complains of the number of vagranti bishops, and refuses to recognise the ordinations performed by them (can. 14), and three years after (A.D. 755) one at Verneville appealed to such bishops not to ordain in the dioceses of others (can. 13). For the case of the chorepiscopi, or assistant bishops, see CHOREPISCOPIUS. Their want of title and jurisdiction in the Western Church was, in the reign of Charlemagne, held to be fatal to their episcopal character, "nam episcopi non erant, qui nec ad quandam episcopalem sedem titulati erant, nec canonice a tribus episcopis ordinati." The whole class were therefore to be recognised as presbyters only, and their ordinations were to be disallowed "pro inanis vacuisque habitae." [S. J. E.]

LOCULUS. [CATACOMBS, I. 306.]

LOCUTORIUM. [PARLOUR.]

LOGIUM. [RATIONALE.]

LOGUORGUE, martyr, commemorated May 4 (Hieron. Mart.) [C. H.]

LOIS, grandmother of Timothy, commemorated July 27 (Arm. Cal.) [C. H.]

LOMANUS, bishop of Trim, commemorated with bishop Fortchern Feb. 17 (Boll. Acta SS. Feb. iii. 13). [C. H.]

LONDON, COUNCIL OF (Londinense Con- ciliūm), A.D. 605 or thereabouts, according to Mansi (x. 495), following Spelman and Wilkins, who mistake a general assertion of St. Boniface for one. (Stubbs's Wilkins, notes to pp. 51-2.) [E. S. FF.]

LONGI (Μακροί). A name by which some Egyptian monks were known, who were concerned in the dispute between Theophilus of Alexandria and St. John Chrysostom, archbishop of Constantinople (Sozomen, Hist. Eccl. lib. vi. c. 30). He explains that the appellation applied only to three brothers, Ammonius, Enebius, and Dioscorus, who were remarkably tall. [S. J. E.]

LONGINUS (1) Said to have been the soldier who pierced the Lord's side. His martyrdom at Caesarea in Cappadocia was commemorated March 15 (Hieron. Mart.; Usuard, Mart.; Boll. Acta SS. March, ii. 384). In the Vet. Rom. Mart. he occurs under Sept. 1, and in the Auctaria of Bede under March 15 and Nov. 22. Under the latter date a person of the same name, but otherwise not designated, occurs as suffering in Cappadocia (Hieron. Mart.).

(2) Said to have been the centurion who stood by the cross, martyr, commemorated Oct. 16 (Byzant. Cal.; Basil, Menol.; Daniel. Cod. Liturg. iv. 271). The Bollandists make Longinus the soldier and Longinus the centurion both martyred at Caesarea in Cappadocia and both commemorated on March 15 (Acta SS. March, ii. 384). In Bede's Auctaria, Oct. 23, occurs a Longinus who suffered at Caesarea in Cappadocia.

(3) Soldier and martyr at Marseille, commemorated July 21 (Bede, Auct.).

(4) Martyr in Africa, commemorated Sept. 28 (Hieron. Mart.) [C. H.]

LONGUS (1) Martyr at Rome, commemorated Oct. 2 (Hieron. Mart.).

(2) Martyr in Phrygia, commemorated Oct. 27 (Hieron. Mart.) [C. H.]

LOQUUMFAS, female martyr at Barcelona, commemorated Feb. 15 (Hieron. Mart.) [C. H.]

LORD (κύριος, δεσπότης, Dominus). On the Old Testament (LXX) usage of these several words, see DICT. OF THE BIBLE, art. Lord.

1. Dominus, see under that heading in vol. i. II. Kýrios is a general title of respect, and, when employed in the vocative, exactly like Sir in English (St. John iv. 11, xii. 21).

Δεσπότης is employed sometimes in the same connexion; the use of dominus in later times is exactly similar.

Δεσπότης, κύριος, and dominus are bestowed upon bishops. In a letter from Eusebius of Nicomedia to Paulinus, bishop of Tyre, we find him styling his correspondent lord (κύριος). This was probably an excess of adulation. The Prooimium to the acts of the 1st Council of Arles (A.D. 314) speaks of pope Sylvester as "Lord" (Dominus). Similarly the epistle of the synod at Gangra (324) speaks to the bishops of Armenia, as "dominus honorabilibus consacer-doctus." A letter of the Egyptian bishops to pope Marcellus (336) asking for copies of the Nicene canons, is addressed (if we may trust the text) "dominus sanctus et Apostolicus culminis veneranda pagina. And he, in replying, used a similar formula, "dominus venerabilibus fratribus." So the epistle of the Orientals to pope Julius I. (337).

In and after the time of Constantine we find many examples of this usage. St. John Chrysostom, writing to pope Innocent (A.D. 402-417, Episc. 122, ad Innoc. Episc. Rom.), supercribes his letter "τῷ δεσπότῃ μου τῷ ἀδελφωτάτῳ καὶ θεοφιλεστάτῳ ἐπισκόπῳ . . . Ἰουδῆν ἐν Κυρίῳ χαίρειν." In fact henceforward it was applied to men of high rank, both in church and state, "pariterque caeteri principes atque nobiles tum ecclesiae tum reipublicae" (Spelman, Glossar. s. v. "Lord").

But yet the designation "Lord" was not universal in addressing bishops: many letters are found without it and it is remarkable that St. Jerome, writing to pope Damasus, although he was his superior and patron, calls him merely "beatissimus papa." (The letter is curious, as being written to suggest that the "Gloria Patri" and Alleluia should be added to the psalms when sung; which had not, up to that time, been done at Rome.) Yet in the very next letter we find Stephen, archbishop of Aphricae (? Antipatra in Libya), addressing the same man in a similar letter, as "lord" (dominus). So also does very Damasus in a letter to the bishops of Bithynia calls them "domini venerabiles."

The truth seems to be that whenever any one, cleric or layman, addressing a bishop, wished to be particularly respectful, he said "dominus" not otherwise.

By the early part of the 6th century it had become, in some parts of the church, an official style of those in high position, whether ecclesiastical or civil. The early Frank kings both received it themselves and bestowed it upon others. (Epist. Clodov. Reg. Franc. ad Syn. Aurel. I.) Compare SUPERSCRPTION.

III. Kúporos, dominus, was especially a title of the emperors, both in earlier and later times, before and after the Christian era. Augustus, indeed, forbade by an edict the addressing of himself as dominus (Suet. Vit. August. c. 53), probably from a prudent political motive; and Tiberius (Suet. Vit. Neron. c. 27) renewed the prohibition. But afterwards the use of the title became very common; and Domitian caused himself to be styled, not only "dominus" but "Deus" (Suet. Vit. Domit. c. 13). Tertullian (Apolo. c. 34) praises the moderation of Augustus, and explains in what sense he himself employed the word; "dicam plane imperatorem dominum, sed more communi; sed quando non cogor ut dominum Dei vice dicam. Ceterum liber sum illi; Dominus enim meus meus est, omnipotens Deus aeternus. . . Qui potest, quae est, quomodo dominus est? Sed et gratius est, quia pietatis quam potestatis: etiam imperatoris patris quam domini vocatur."

Arius and Euzoios, writing to Constantine about A.D. 326, call him "dominus master." The bishops of the Council of Rimini (A.D. 359) address Constantius as "domine, amantibus Deo Imperator."

IV. Lord (dominus) appears to be sometimes used during this period in the sense of "saint," (Epist. Cuthon. Conc. ad Theod.) [S. J. E.]

V. Liturgical use. The word Kúporos is applied both to the first Person of the Holy Trinity, as in St. James, c. 26 (Daniel, Codex. iv. 105), where God the Creator is invoked as Kúporos ó Θεός; to the second, as in St. James, c. 5, where He is addressed as ó Kúporos καὶ Θεός ἡμῶν Ἰησοῦς Χριστός; and to the Holy Trinity itself, as in St. James, c. 19, where Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, to whom the hymn is sent up, are addressed as Kúporos ó Θεός ἡμῶν. Δεσπότης is similarly used; in St. James, c. 21, for instance, we find it Δέσποτα ó Θεός ó παντακράτωρ, ó Πατήρ τοῦ Χριστοῦ σου, where God the Father is addressed; in St. James, c. 3, the Son is addressed as Δέσποτα Kúporos Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ. In Latin, the word dominus is used as an appellation both of the Father to whom the prayer is addressed, and of the Son through whom it is offered.

In most Western rites the reader, when about to recite a lesson, says "Jube, domine, benedicere." It has been doubted whether this is addressed to God or to the priest. It probably, however, as archdeacon Freeman (Divine Service, l. 113) has pointed out, is a request to the priest that he would desire a blessing, and might be rendered, "Sir, desire God to bless us" (compare Leslie's Portiforium Sarrid. p. 5, and note, p. lii.). The corresponding Greek form is simply εὐλόγησον δέσποτα, as (eg.) in the Byzantine liturgy (Daniel, iv. 327, 329, etc.), where the δεσπότης is clearly the priest. It is noteworthy, that in the East the priest responded to the request by blessing God (εὐλόγηστος ó Θεός), in the West by blessing himself and the congregation. See on this point the Regula Benedicti Commentata, note on n. 9, in Migne, Patrol. vol. lvi. p. 272. [C.]

LORD'S DAY. (ἡ κυριακή ἡμέρα, Dominicus or Dominica dies.) The origin of the name is undoubtedly to be found in the well-known passage (Rev. i. 10), ἐγενόμην ἐν πνεύματι ἐν τῇ κυριακῇ ἡμέρᾳ. Even if that passage stood alone, it would be difficult to accept either of the rival interpretations, one of which refers the name to the Sabbath, and the other to the "Day of the Lord." But taking into consideration the remarkable catena of patristic usage which, from Ignatius downwards, establishes the regular and technical use of ἡ κυριακή for the "first day of the week," it is not too much to say that these interpretations may be dismissed as unworthy of serious attention. The same usage, moreover (especially in connection with the history of the Paschal controversy), seems effectually to dispose of a third interpretation, which understands by the τῇ κυριακῇ the annual festival of the Resurrection, or Easter day. (On these points see Dr. Hessey's article "Lord's Day" in Smith's DICTIONARY OF THE BIBLE.) We accept, therefore, unhesitatingly the traditional interpretation which sees in this passage of St. John a reference to the weekly Lord's day, as a well-known and established festival in the apostolic church. The more common scriptural designation of that day is the ἡ μίση ἢ μίση σαββάτου (Matt. xxviii. 1; Mark xvi. 2; Luke xxiv. 1; John xxi. 19; Acts xx. 7; 1 Cor. xvi. 2.) In one passage, Mark xvi. 9 (the disputed passage of in the sense of "saint," and the d. [S. J. K.] The word Kipios is applied on of the Holy Trinity, as (Daniel, Cudez, iv. 105), as is invoked as Kipios d. or in St. James, c. 5, ed as d Kipios kai Oeods; and to the Holy Trinity, c. 10, where Father, Son, and the hymn is sent up, d Oeods hman. Δεσπότης St. James, c. 21, for Δέσποτα d Oeods παντο- Χριστού σου, where God d; in St. James, c. 3, the Δέσποτα Κύριε Ἰησοῦ word Dominus is used as the Father to whom the and of the Son through es the reader, when about ys "Jube, domine, bened- doubted whether this is the priest. It probably, a Freeman (Divine Service, is a request to the priest a blessing, and might be God to bless us" (compare αὐτὸς p. 5, and note, p. ag Greek form is simply a (esp. in the Byzantine 17, 329, etc.), where the priest. It is noteworthy, priest responded to the (ἐπιδόγγητος θ Θεός), in himself and the congrega- the Regula Benedicti 9, in Migne, Patrol. vol. [C.]

κυριακή ημέρα, Dominicus origin of the name is un- the well-known passage ἐν πνεύματι ἐν τῇ κυρι- ant passage stood alone, it cept either of the rival which refers the name to ther to the "Day of the on consideration the re- tristic usage which, from ablishes the regular and ακή for the "first day of much to say that these dismissed as unworthy the same usage, moreover with the history of the seems effectually to dis- tation, which understands a annual festival of the day. (On these points "Lord's Day" is Smith's MILE.) We accept, there- traditional interpretation passage of St. John a y Lord's day, as a well- festival in the apostolic common scriptural desig- η μία or μία σαββάτου xvi. 2; Luke xxiv. 1; 7; 1 Cor. xvi. 2.) In 9 (the disputed passage at the close of the Gospel, we have πρώτη σαβ- βάτου or σαββάτου. The use of the ἡ κυριακή by St. John marks transition to the common post-apostolic usage. In one well-known passage in the (so-called) Epistle of Barnabas (c. xvi.), for a reason suggested by the context, we find the day, in contrast with the Jewish sabbath, called the ὀρθοὴ ἡμέρα, an expression taken up and amplified in the ὀρθοὴ ἡμέρα ἡ καὶ πρώτη of subsequent Fathers. At a later period, when the hebdomadal division of the time began to prevail in the Roman empire, we find Christian writers designating the day by its heathen name (the ἡ τοῦ ἡλίου λεγομένη ἡμέρα of Justin Martyr). And from the time of the celebrated edict of Constantine, which speaks of the "venerabilis Solis dies," the two names were much interchanged, Christian writers sometimes using (though less frequently than we do) the name "Sunday," and on the other hand the Christian designation making its way into the statute book, as in the edict of Gratian, a.n. 386 ("Solis die, quem Dominicum ritè dixere majores"). [WEEK.]

(1.) Turning from the name to the thing, it seems impossible to doubt that from the earliest existence of the church the Lord's day was observed as the characteristic Christian festival, hallowed as a commemoration of that Resurrection of the Lord, which was the leading subject in the earliest forms of Christian preaching. To this primary consecration of the day was added a second, in the descent of the Holy Spirit on the day of Pentecost, which in that year fell on the first day of the week. The passage in the Epistle of Barnabas referred to (ὁδοὶ καὶ ἔργων τῆν ἡμέραν τὴν ὀρθοὴν εἰς εὐφροσύνην, ἐν ἧ καὶ ὁ Ἰησοῦς ἀνίστηθι ἐκ τῶν νεκρῶν καὶ φανερωθεὶς ἀνέβη εἰς τοὺς οὐρανοὺς) seems even to indicate the notion that it was the day of the Ascension also. We may naturally ask, How could a day so hallowed fall of reverent festal observance? We trace indications of such observance, brief indeed, but unmistakable, in Holy Scripture itself (see Dr. Hessey's article or his Bampton Lectures); and these are still further illustrated by the testimony of early writers.

But the undoubted fact of this observance by no means involves the inference often drawn from it, that the keeping of the Lord's day must be traced to an apostolic decree, transferring to it, directly or by implication, the sanctity of the Sabbath, which was familiar to the early Christians, as being themselves Jews, or having been converted under Jewish influence. It is almost needless to say that of such a decree we have no evidence whatever, either in Holy Scripture or in Church History. Now in regard to Holy Scripture, it would, indeed, be most unsafe to allege its silence as conclusive against the existence of such a decree; although that silence must to some degree tell against it, especially when we consider the many references in the Pastoral Epistles to details of church order and practical religious life. But we are not left here to negative evidence. There are positive indications of an absolute freedom of dealing with such subjects, quite incompatible not merely with the existence of a formal apostolic decree, but even with the idea that the observance of the Lord's day had yet attained to the supreme and unique sanctity accorded to it in later ages.

St. Paul's treatment of the general question of the observation of days in Rom. xiv. 5 (ὅς μὲν κρίνει ἡμέραν παρ' ἡμέραν, ὅς δὲ κρίνει πάσαν ἡμέραν ἕκαστος ἐν τῷ ἰδίῳ κατ' ἀλλοφροσύνην), and his unqualified condemnation of the "observ- ing of days" in Gal. iv. 10—to say nothing of the tone of his celebrated reference to the abolition of the sabbath in Col. ii. 16—appear decisive on this point. Granting that the special reference of the apostle was in all cases to the Jewish festivals, it is instructive to compare with his sweeping treatment of the sub- ject the apologetic comments on these very pas- sages, made by patristic writers, at a time when the Lord's day and other Christian festivals had established themselves in definite observance. See, for example, St. Jerome's twofold attempt to an- swer ("simpliciter" and "acutius respondere") the objection, "Dicat aliquis; Si dies observatio non licet . . . nos quoque simile crimen incurra- mus, quantum sabbati observantes et Parasceven et diem Dominicam" (Comm. in Gal. lib. ii. ad c. iv. 10). If we pass from Holy Scripture to the writers of the early church, the fact of utter silence on this subject becomes more and more significant, when we remember their natural anxiety to appeal on all points to ap- ostatic authority, their constant declaration or assumption that all Jewish observances had passed away, and their delight in tracing these transitory observances types of the higher Christian ordinances, which were not to pass away. Hence we must, indeed, fully agree with those who urge that the celebration of the Lord's day is one of these essential and principal ele- ments of the religious life of the church, which can plead apostolical authority. A priori we should hold it all but impossible that the day should have been neglected among the followers of Him who "was declared to be the Son of God with power by the resurrection from the dead." From the indications in holy Scripture, which have been so often commented upon, we cannot doubt that it was so regularly hallowed, as to make its observance, both to Christian and heathen, a distinctive mark of Christianity. But the notion that the Lord's day, in that complete- ness of sacred distinction from all other days which is now universal among all Christians, was formally established by apostolic decree is, prob- ably, in relation to historical truth, much what the old legend of the composition of the Apostles' Creed is to the actual process of its formation. In both cases what are chief treasures of our later Christianity grew up by the natural fitness of things and were never formally made. It is obvious that the true view of their genesis de- tracts nothing from their sacredness, nothing from their claim to be of the essence of the Christian system.

The history of the celebrated Paschal contro- versy is singularly instructive on this very point. If the Lord's day had been already stamped by definite apostolic decree as the one great Christian festival, deriving its sacred- ness from the resurrection of the Lord, it would have been impossible for the churches of Palestine and Asia to dream of keeping the annual commemoration of the resurrection itself on any day, except the Lord's day. But the gradual acceptance of the Roman view, disre- garding all Jewish associations in consideration of the greater fitness of the Lord's day* is exactly that which we might expect to result from such a process of gradual establishment of the Lord's day, as has been described above.

(II.) It is likely that in this case, as in so many others, the close of the apostolic age was a period of rapid development of formal church ordinance. The existence in A. D. 170 of a regular treatise on the subject by Melito, bishop of Sardis (see Eusebius, Hist. Eccl. iv. 26), connected apparently with the Paschal controversy, seems plainly indicative of such a development. The well-known passage of Justin Martyr in his Apology, describes how "on the day called Sunday" there was a religious assembly of those who dwell either in the cities or in the country. It notes the chief points of an established service—viz. the reading of the Apostles or the Prophets, the sermon, the prayers, the partaking of the bread and wine consecrated by thanksgiving and prayers, and the giving of alms, containing the germ of the clearly ancient liturgies. Nor is it possible to doubt that this celebration had become so marked as to impress the mind of the heathen with the distinctive character of the status dies of Pliny's famous letter to Trajan. In the passage from Dionysius of Corinth (A. D. 175), quoted by Eusebius (H. E. iv. 22), the keeping of the Lord's day is spoken of as a matter of course (τὴν σήμερον κυριακὴν τὴν ἄλιαν ἡμέραν διηγάζομεν), very much as we might speak now. And in the method of its observance (the celebration of the Holy Communion being, of course, excepted) much was probably borrowed from the practice of the synagogue on the sabbath day. But it must not be supposed for a moment that such observance was identified in any degree with sabbatical observance, or based on formal obligation of the fourth commandment. On the contrary, the principle of its observance is exactly that which is indicated in the celebrated passage of Ignatius (ad Magn. ix.), μηκέτι σαββαρίζοντες ἀλλὰ κατὰ κυριακὴν^b ζώοντες, ἐν ᾗ καὶ ἡ ζωὴ ἡμῶν ἀνέτελεν ἐν κύρῳ. To "sabbatize" is the mark of the Jew; the Christian is to live κατὰ κυριακὴν, i. e. not only in the observance of the Lord's day, but according to the spirit of that day, as something wholly diverse from the conception of the sabbath. The very types of the observance of the Lord's day, often fanciful enough, which were traced in the Old Testament, mark an entire separation in thought from the idea of the

* In the treatise of Bede, de Aquinectio Vernali, there is a curious account of a council of Caesarea, held under Theophilus, on the Paschal controversy. In the course of it (see Labbe, Concilia, i. 714) the bishops are represented as declaring the Benedictions of the Lord's day, (a) Because on it the light was created. (b) Because on it the people passed to freedom through the Red Sea. (c) Because on it the manna was given. (d) Because Moses (Ex. xii. 16; Lev. xxiii. 7, 8) commanded to keep "the first and the last day" (hoc est dominicus et sabbatum). (e) Because in Pa. cxviii. the words are spoken of it: "This is the day which the Lord hath made." (f) Because the Lord on it rose from the dead. The historical value of the account is of course more than questionable. But the light which it throws on the traditional ideas of the Lord's day is very interesting.

^b The ζωὴν found here in the ordinary text is probably to be omitted, as in the Latin. If it be read it must be taken with ζώοντες.

sabbath. In the Epistle of Barnabas (c. xxi.) for instance, the sabbath is a type of the millennium after the six thousand years typified in the six days of creation; the Lord's day, as the eighth day, is the beginning of another world (ἀλλου κόσμου ἀρχή).^c Justin Martyr, when he describes the special celebration of public service of the "day called Sunday" derives its sacredness, first, from its being the first day on which God, dispelling darkness and chaos, made the world, next, from the resurrection on it of the Lord Jesus Christ. This is in his Apology, addressed to the heathen (Apol. i. 67). Where he argues with the Jews, he actually makes the eighth day of the circumcision a type of our receiving the true circumcision of the heart through the Resurrection of Jesus Christ from the dead on the first day of the week, which after the completion of the cycle of the days is the eighth day, though it is still the first (Dial. with Trypho, sect. 19).^d This conception, fanciful as it is, is taken up more than once by later writers. Thus St. Augustine asks of circumcision, "Quare ergo octavo die? Quia in hebraicis libris idem primus qui octavus . . . Finiuntur septimus, Dominus sepultus: reditur ad primum, Dominus resuscitatus. Domini enim resuscitatio promisit nobis aeternum diem, et consecravit nobis Dominicum diem" (Serm. de Script. clix. 1170 c). Hence our Lord Himself, as being this rest of the just, giving them a σαββατισμός in the millennial kingdom, is occasionally called the Great Sabbath, of which the "little sabbath" of the Jews is but a type. The idea is perhaps suggested by Col. ii. 16, where the sabbath and the other Jewish festivals are "the shadow of things to come, but the body" (or substance) "is of Christ." And His rest in the tomb marked what was technically known as the Μεγά σάββαρον, the last of the ancient sabbaths; His rising from the dead on the Lord's day began the new Christian era. The notion afterwards embodied in the title of the "Christian sabbath"—that the Lord's day is a spiritualized sabbath, to which the obligation of the fourth commandment is transferred, perhaps a revival of a patriarchal sabbath of all mankind, which had been for a time overborne by the rigid legalism of the Mosaic sabbath—has no locus standi whatever either in Scripture or in primitive antiquity.

But it should be noticed that the development of the Lord's day in relation to the sabbath would naturally differ considerably in Jewish and Gentile Christianity. To the Jewish Christians, in the earliest stages of the history of the church, the sabbath and the sabbatical rest would remain unaltered. Just as they united the "being with one accord in the temple" with the "breaking of the bread at home," so the cele-

^c Compare St. Aug. Serm. de Tempore, cclix. 2 (vol. v. p. 1548 a. Ben. ed. 1838): "Octavae idea in fine sacrae novam vitam significat: septimum quietem futuram sanctorum in hac terra." The sermon was preached on the first Sunday after Easter (the octave), and begins—"Hodiermus dies magno sacramenta perpetuae felicitatis est nobis."

^d Even in the eight saved in the ark for a new world he finds a type of the eighth day, on which Christ, the head of a new humanity, arose from the dead. (Dial. with Trypho, c. 138.)

virtual substitution of the Lord's day for the sabbath, not prevented by the assertion of the same superiority over it which the gospel manifests over the law. If we turn to Tertullian, the same conception of substitution presents itself in a more concrete form. He is anti-Judaic enough; the sabbaths and all the ceremonials of the law are, in his eyes, absolutely gone; they were but preparatory, and cannot continue when their function is completed. But in pleading against frequenting idolatrous festivals he makes the keeping of the Lord's day and the Pentecost the badge of Christianity, contrasting them with the heathen festivals on one side, and the sabbaths and "feriae aliquando a Deo dilectae" on the other. In speaking of the habit of standing in prayer on the Lord's day, he urges that on that day we should cast off all worldly anxieties, "differentes etiam negotia ne quem diabolo locum demus" (de Oratione, c. 23). The rest enjoined is, no doubt, simply a means, not an end; but it is notable as the first direct recognition of a sacred rest, as inseparable from the idea of the Lord's day. In a time like Tertullian's, when the church system was fully, even rigidly, organised, it is not difficult to trace here a preparation for some sabbatarianism hereafter.

In fact, two lines of thought must have co-existed in the church. On the one side there was the conviction, not only that the Jewish sabbath had passed away, but that the spirit of strict legal observance, especially in any negative aspect, was foreign to the whole spirit of the gospel. On the other side, there was the tendency to more regular and formal Christian observance, gathering naturally round the recurring weekly festival of the resurrection; and allied with this, the perception of the value of an ordinance of weekly rest, such as that ordained in the fourth commandment, to man as man. From this, by a natural transition, would grow up the disposition to set up the Lord's day, first for religious worship and then for rest, in some rivalry to the ancient sabbath, as being, indeed, superior in dignity and spirituality, but yet a supreme and unique festival, to be observed with equal strictness. These last lines of thought might enter sometimes into alliance, sometimes into conflict. Each would in turn emerge into prominence, and the conception of the Lord's day would fluctuate accordingly.

(III.) But with the beginning of the conversion of the empire a crisis came. The most important epoch in the history of the Lord's day is marked by the issue of the celebrated edict of Constantine: "Omnes iudices urbanaeque plebes et cunctarum artium officia venerabili die Solis quiescant. Ruri tamen positi agrorum culturae liberè licenterque inserviant, quoniam frequenter eventit ut non aptius alio die frumenta sulcis aut vineae scrobibus mandentur, ne occasione momenti perat commoditas caelestis provisione concessa" (see Cod. Just. book iii. tit. 12, 3). This edict was clearly intended to pay honour to the great Christian festival, although, in accordance with Constantine's general policy, it declined to identify the emperor with the religion, which he desired only indirectly to support, and only gradually to establish. The use of the heathen name of the "solis dies," with the vague title "venerabilis"—a title rendered the more ambiguous by the known reverence which Constantine had delighted to pay to the Sun-god—was something more than conventional. But the effect of the edict, at a time when Christianity was rising as rapidly as heathenism was sinking into decay, must undoubtedly have told mainly on the Christian festival. It would invest the observance of the Lord's day with all the strength (and the weakness) which the sanction of civil law to religious observance must necessarily produce. But more particularly by the prominence given to the idea of rest from ordinary work, which was emphasised all the more by the exemption granted to agricultural labour on the plea of necessity, it introduced a new conception of the day itself. The advocates of the sabbatarian view in later times were not wholly wrong when they compared Constantine to Moses, on the ground that he instituted a kind of new sabbath in the Christian church. For whatever tendency there was already existing to sabbatize the Lord's day would be enormously increased by this interference of the temporal power. The idea of rest would become primary instead of subsidiary; the observance would have more of the law, less of the spirit.

The tendency towards sabbatarianism was evidently slow, for it had the old and well-established conception of the day to overcome. But, although slow, it appears to have been sure.

The edict itself was only the beginning of a long series of imperial laws, constantly increasing in stringency and in unambiguous connexion of the solis dies with Christianity. Eusebius (de Vit. Const. iv. 18, 19, 20) declares that Constantine himself went much farther in this course, as his adhesion to Christianity became more decided. He speaks of two edicts to the army, enjoining rest from arms on that day and celebration of religious worship, by the Christians in the church service, by the pagans in the fields, offering to the supreme Deity a prayer authorised by the emperor. This prayer he quotes. It is a prayer in which nothing occurs distinctively Christian, but which is essentially monotheistic and entirely unconnected with the pagan mythology. In speaking of the ordinance for the Christians, Eusebius calls the day the Σαβήτιος ἡμέρα ἢ καὶ φωτὸς εἶναι καὶ ἡλίου ἐπάνωθεν συμβαίνει: in reference to the heathen, simply ἡ τοῦ φωτὸς ἡμέρα. He then adds, διὰ τοῖς ὑπὸ τὴν Ῥωμαίων ἀρχὴν πολιτευομένοις ἅπανιν σχολὴν ἀγειν ταῖς ἐπώνυμοις τοῦ Σαβήτιος ἡμέρας ἐνούθετες, ὁμοίως δὲ τὴν πρό τοῦ σαββάτου ἑταῖρᾶν μὴ ἤμας.

In another law of Constantine, A.D. 321, there is a recognition of the fitness of certain exceptional legal operations for this day: "gratum et iucundum est eo die quae sunt maxime votiva compleri, atque libè emancipandi et mansuettendi die festo cuncto licentiam habeant" (Nov. Theod. II. tit. viii. 1). This appears to have been borrowed from older practice as to heathen festivals. But it is not improbable that in this case there was a special reference to the characteristic idea of the Lord's day, as the day of the completion of our redemption.

This is an emendation for τὰς τοῦ σαββάτου, evidently necessary. There is a passage in Sozomen (Hist. Eccl. i. c. 8) which forms an excellent elucidation of this, especially of the last clause, in the words εἶμα δὲ τὴν Κυριακὴν, ὡς ἐν ταύτῃ τοῦ Χριστοῦ ἀναστάσιος ἐκ νεκρῶν τὴν δὲ εἶραν, ὡς ἐν αὐτῇ σταυρωθέντος.

Constantine had delighted to pay was something more. But the effect of the edict, Christianity was rising as rapidly as sinking into decay, must untold mainly on the Christian world invest the observation of the Sabbath with all the strength (and the weakening of civil law to religious sanction of civil law to religious sanction necessarily produce. But more prominent given to the idea of religious work, which was emphasised the exemption granted to agriculture on the plea of necessity, it was a conception of the day itself, the sabbatarian view in later wholly wrong when they come to Moses, on the ground that of new sabbath in the Christian whatever tendency there was to sabbatize the Lord's day was increased by this intertemporal power. The idea of a primary instead of subsidiary; could have more of the law, less towards sabbatarianism was for it had the old and well-entrenched of the day to overcome, it appears to have been sure. It was only the beginning of the imperial laws, constantly in tendency and in unambiguous consensus with Christianity. Const. iv. 18, 19, 20 declares himself further much in his adhesion to Christianity. He speaks of two edicts instituting rest from arms on that occasion of religious worship, by the church service, by the emperor, offering to the supreme authority by the emperor. This is a prayer in which the Christian, but which is not a mythological and entirely uncanonical mythology. In speaking for the Christians, Eusebius Σωτήριος ἡμέρα ἦν καὶ φωτὸς πάντων συμβαίνει; in reference, simply ἡ τοῦ φωτὸς ἡμέρα, ἡ τοῦ ὑπὸ τῆν Ῥωμαίων ἱερῶν ἄριστων σχολῶν ἄγειν τὰς Σωτήριος ἡμέρας ἐνούθηται, τοῦ σαββάτου ἑ τιμῶν μνήμης of Constantine, A.D. 321, there is a witness of certain exceptional law: "gratum et iucundum est eo die divina compleri, atque idē enandandis de festo concesso licentia habere." II. tit. viii. 1. This appears to be from older practice as to be rather improbable that in this case reference to the characteristic idea of the day of the completion of our

of Constantine, A.D. 321, there is a witness of certain exceptional law: "gratum et iucundum est eo die divina compleri, atque idē enandandis de festo concesso licentia habere." II. tit. viii. 1. This appears to be from older practice as to be rather improbable that in this case reference to the characteristic idea of the day of the completion of our

ἐνεκά μοι δοκεῖν τῶν ἐν ταῖς τῷ κοινῷ Σωτηρίᾳ περιεχθῆναι μνημονευομένων. This passage extends the statement to the civil population, and adds the celebration of the Friday to that of the Sunday. It is true that these edicts of Constantine are not found in the codes, and that Eusebius is anxious to make the most of the Christianity of the subject of his panegyric. But it is incredible that he should have been either misinformed or insincere in the main substance of his statements; and it would have been quite accordant with Constantine's temporising policy to issue such commands, as special edicts, not to be enrolled among formal laws. However this may be, under Constantine's successors there were reiterated enactments in this direction, free from the ambiguity of the original law.

Thus we have two laws prohibiting exaction of debt on that day, one under Valentinian and Valens (A.D. 368), protecting Christians against being forced into litigation on that day, the "dies solis, quæ dicitur fastus habetur" (Cod. Theod. VIII. tit. viii. 1); the other under Gratian, Valentinian, and Theodosius (A.D. 386), extending this immunity to all, calling the day plainly the "dies solis quem Dominicus ritè dixere majores;" and branding any infringer of the law as "non modo notabilis, verum etiam sacrilegus" (Cod. Theod. VIII. tit. viii. 2). The progress marked by the contrast of these two laws is significant. The former, recognising the Christians as a sect, is exactly of the same nature as a law of Honorius and Theodosius in 409, protecting the Jews from being forced to work or litigation on the sabbath or other of their sacred days (Cod. Theod. II. tit. viii. 3). The latter accepts Christianity as the religion of the empire, and enforces on all by law the sacredness of its chief festival.

Again, the celebration of the day was gradually separated by law from all heathen and even secular associations. In 389, under Theodosius, the "solis dies" and the "Sancti Paschæ dies" (the weeks before and after Easter) are included with the harvest and vintage seasons, the Kalends of January, and the days of the foundation of Rome and Constantinople, as forensic holidays (Cod. Theod. II. tit. viii. 2). In 386 it was ordered that no one should present to the people any spectacle on the "dies solis," "ne divinum venerationem confectâ sollemnitate confundat" (Cod. Theod. XV. tit. v. 2). In 425, under Theodosius the younger, we find a law enacting an entire abstinence from all amusements of the theatre or the circus, on the "Dies Dominicus," Christmas day, Epiphany, and the Pentecost, in order that the whole minds of Christians may be devoted to worship of God. It denounces any infringement of the law by "the infatuated impiety of the Jews or the stolid error and madness of heathenism," and orders the celebration even of the emperor's birthday to be set aside for the sake of the Christian holy day (Cod. Theod. XV. tit. v. 5). The same law is reiterated in even stronger terms under Leo and Anthemius (A.D. 469) in reference to the Lord's day, which is to be kept absolutely sacred, not only from business, but also from "obscene pleasures" of the theatre, the circus, and the amphitheatre (Cod. Just. lib. III. tit. xii. 11). Nor should we pass over a remarkable law of Honorius and Theodosius (A.D.

409), which expressly orders that on the Lord's day the judges shall have prisoners brought before them, to inquire whether they have been treated humanely, to see that food is given to the destitute, and that the prisoners be allowed, under guard, to go to the bath. The bishops were to put the judges in mind of this duty (Cod. Just. i. tit. iv. 9). It may be noted that at a later period (A.D. 529) under Justinian, the bishops were ordered to visit the prisoners on Wednesdays or Fridays (the Lord's day being probably thought to be too much occupied), to inquire into the cases of the prisoners, and to see whether any neglect of duty on the part of the magistrates had taken place (Cod. Just. tit. iv. 22). But the fifth council of Orleans, twenty years later (A.D. 549), orders the archdeacon or provost (praepositus ecclesiae) to make the visitation on the Lord's day itself, with a Labbe, Councils, vol. ix. p. 134). It should be observed that these laws recognise the positive duty of works of charity on the Lord's day, precisely as He Himself had recognised it on the sabbath.

This long series of temporal enactments (in considering which we have, for the sake of exhibiting them as a whole, anticipated chronological order) must have told very powerfully upon the conception of the Lord's day in the church itself, not only tending to formalize its celebration, but to invest it in great degree with the character of a sabbath. Still, however, there was no connexion of its observance with the obligation of the fourth commandment, and therefore no application to it either of the laws of the Jewish sabbath, or of our Lord's teaching on the subject, as modifying and spiritualizing these laws.

But when the legal enforcement of rest on the Lord's day was once established, the next step would not unnaturally follow. In fact, the conception of it, as formally sanctioned by a divine law, would recommend itself to different schools of thought. It would be a refuge to any who scrupled to accept in respect of Christian festivals the authority of a merely temporal power, not yet absolutely identified with Christianity. It would appear to earnest-minded men as a short and ready way of maintaining a high spirituality of tone, in the face of the conventional and insincere observance to which the imperial interference would probably give rise. It would afford to the courtly satellites of the emperor an opportunity of flattering his desire of being "a bishop as to things and men without," by representing him as being the restorer of a half-forgotten divine law. From various causes it would make its way; and, if once admitted, its simplicity and cogency would help it to supersede other pleas for the sacredness of the day.

(IV.) This effect is not at first visible in the great leaders of ecclesiastical opinion and faith. In them we find the same general line of thought which has already been described. It will be sufficient to quote a few leading examples from the East and West. St. Athanasius delights to trace signs of honour due prophetically to the Lord's day, the resurrection day of the Lord (Ἀναστάσιμος ἡμέρα), as in the title of the sixth Psalm, "Upon the eighth" (which, however, seems to have no reference to the eighth day at all) or in the celebrated passage of Ps. cxviii. 24, "This is the day which the Lord hath made," which he connects with the "stone male the head of the corner" (see v. 22). In the treatise "de Sabbato et Circumcisione" (which is ascribed to him, and questioned by the Benedictine editors somewhat hesitatingly), there is a curious passage, comparing the sabbath and the Lord's day. His idea is that the first creation had its end, and therefore its sabbatical rest; the second or new creation has no end, and "therefore God rested not in it, but worketh hitherto" (ὡς ἄρτι ἐργάζεται), referring, of course, to John iv. 17. Accordingly (he says) "we keep no sabbath day (οὐδὲ σαββατίζομεν ἡμέραν), but we look forward to the sabbath of sabbaths" in heaven, which "the new creation does not accept as its end, but its manifestation and perpetual festival." But he adds, "as God commanded men formerly to keep the sabbath day as a memorial of the end of the older dispensation, so we keep the Lord's day as a memorial of the beginning of the second new creation" (οὗτος τὴν Κυριακὴν τιμῶμεν μνήμην ὄσων ἀρχῆς δευτέρας ἀνακτίσεως). (See vol. iii. pp. 42, 43, 44, Bened. ed.) On the subject of circumcision, he repeats the old symbolism of the eighth day, as signifying the Lord's day; and adds significantly, ἢ οὐδὲν τὸ σάββατον ἔλυσε καὶ οὐ τὸ σάββατον τὴν οὐδόην. But though in all this there is some suggestion of future ideas, there is still no view of the Lord's day as a sabbath. The passage in the Homily de Semine (falsely ascribed to him), in which we find the words, "The Lord changed the sabbath day into the Lord's day" (μετέθηκε δὲ ὁ Κύριος τὴν τοῦ σαββάτου ἡμέραν εἰς Κυριακὴν), speaks obviously in this the language of later times; and is as absolutely at variance with the tone of his teaching on this subject as with his general style and line of thought.

This same idea is still more fully and strikingly worked out by Epiphanius. He calls the sabbath of the Jews the "little sabbath," and, referring to the disciples' supposed breach of the sabbath in the corn-fields, he says that it signified the relaxation of the bond of this little sabbath, because "Christ, the great Sabbath was come," of whom Noah was a type and Lamech's words (Gen. v. 29) a prophecy; who is the great sabbath, first, because He gives us rest from our sins, and next, because the Father and the Holy Spirit have rested in Him (ἀναπέταυται ἐν αὐτῷ), and in Him all saints found rest" (adv. Hæc. lib. i. tom. ii. p. 32). He refers, indeed, to the Lord's day, as of apostolic celebration, but in this he joins with it the Wednesday and Friday (adv. Hæc. lib. i. tom. ii. pp. 23, 24); and mentions the occasional festive observance of the sabbath, and Marcion's deliberate protest against this by keeping it as a fast. From him alone we should hardly gather even what we know to have been true of the gradual emergence of the Lord's day into an unique observance, both as to worship and as to rest.

In connexion with this period it may be well to glance at the remarkable treatment of this subject in the "Apostolical Constitutions" which [see APOSTOLICAL CONSTITUTIONS] must be referred to about the fourth and fifth centuries. These exemplify in the clearest way the statement above made, that the preservation of the observance of the old sabbath tended to give clearness and certainty to the true idea of the Lord's day. In Book ii. c. 59, 2, we find the sabbath and "the day of the resurrection, the Lord's day" joined in an exhortation to special religious assemblies, which, however, goes on to dwell especially on the Lord's day, as that to which "the reading of the prophets, and the proclamation of the gospel, and the offering of sacrifice and the gift of spiritual food" peculiarly belong. In Book v. c. 18, 19, we have a vivid description of the fast of the "Great Sabbath," "when the bridegroom was taken away," and of the vigil of the Easter day, ending in the "offering of the sacrifice." Otherwise the general command is to keep both the sabbath and the Lord's day as feasts, the one in memory of the work of the Creator, the other of the resurrection (see Book vii. c. 23, 2). In a prayer of thanksgiving given in Book vii. c. 36, there is a remarkable passage on the sabbath and the Lord's day, which tells how the "sabbath is the rest from creation, the completion of the world, the seeking of God's laws, the praise of thanksgiving to God for all that He has given us. But rising above all these ideas, the Lord's day manifests to us the Mediator Himself, the guardian and lawgiver of men, the source of resurrection, the firstborn before all creation, God the Word, man born of the Virgin Mary, . . . who died and rose again; and so commands us to offer to God the highest of all thanksgiving." In Book viii. 33, 1, we find a command given in the names of St. Peter and St. Paul, "Let servants work five days, on the sabbath and the Lord's day let them rest, with a view to instruction in godliness in the church." This command introduces a series of commands to rest on holy days. It is notable, as looking like an apostolic extension of the enactment of the fourth commandment. But when the decalogue is expounded, we find that commandment explained thus, "Thou shalt keep a sabbath, on account of Him who ceased from creation but not from providence, a sabbath not of idleness of hands, but of meditation on his laws" (ii. 361). There is no idea of its transference for a Christian to the observance of the Lord's day.

In St. Chrysostom there is perhaps the first indication of the idea that the sabbath was so far of perpetual obligation, that the one day in seven should always be set apart. In his 10th Homily on Genesis, c. 1, we find him declaring that "God from the beginning teaches us figuratively, instructing us to set aside one day (or 'the first day') in the cycle of the week, and to devote it to work in spiritual things; for it was for this reason that God allowed the seventh day" (ἢ ὅτι ἐντεῦθεν ἐκ προοιμίῳ αἰνιγματικῶς διδασκαλίαν ἡμῖν ὁ Θεὸς παρέχεται, παιδεύων τὴν μίαν ἡμέραν ἐν τῷ κύκλῳ τῆς ἑβδομάδος ἵνασαν ἀνατιθεῖται καὶ ἀφορίζῃ τῇ τῶν πνευματικῶν ἐργασίᾳ, διὰ γὰρ τοῦτο ὁ δεσπότης, κ.τ.λ.) (See Bened. ed. vol. iv. p. 80.) This treatment, however, of the subject is but slightly indicated, and it exists side by side with teaching of a more ancient type. Thus the sabbath is to him also the type of eternal rest in heaven (Comm. on Heb. iii. 8, vol. xii. p. 63). In his 39th Homily emphatically in the clearest way

 we made, that the preservation of the old sabbath tended to certainty to the true idea of In Book ii. c. 59, 2, we find the day of the resurrection, the
 in an exhortation to special es, which, however, goes on to on the Lord's day, as that to ng of the prophets, and the
 the gospel, and the offering of gift of spiritual food" pe-
 In Book v. c. 18, 19, we cription of the fast of the
 "when the bridegroom was t of the vigil of the Easter
 e "offering of the sacrifice."
 eral command is to keep both the Lord's day as feasts, the
 the work of the Creator, the rrection (see Book vii. c. 23, f thanksgiving given in Book
 a remarkable passage on the
 the Lord's day, which tells how rest from creation, the com-
 and, the seeking of God's laws, asking to God for all that

But rising above all these day manifests to us the Me-
 the guardian and lawgiver of
 of resurrection, the firstborn
 God the Word, man's born of
 . . . who died and rose again;
 us to offer to God the highest . . . In Book viii. 33, 1, we find in the names of St. Peter and servants work five days, on the Lord's day let them rest, instruction in godliness in the command introduces a series of on holy days. It is notable, an apostolic extension of the fourth commandment. But is expounded, we find that explained thus, "Thou shalt account of Him who ceased not from providence, a substitute of hands, but of meditation. (ii. 361). There is no idea of a Christian to the observance of the sabbath.

There is perhaps the first instance that the sabbath was so far from, that the one day in seven apart. . . In his 10th Homily find him declaring that "God teaches us figuratively, inside one day (or 'the first of the week, and to devote it things; for it was for this allowed the seventh day."
 ομομιμον αινυματωδως διδα-παρεχεται, παιδειων την μιν φη της εβδομαδος ημεραν
 ολεεν τη των πνευματικων το δ δεσποτης, κ.τ.λ.) (See 80.) This treatment, however, is slightly indicated, and with teaching of a more the sabbath is to him also rest in heaven (Comm. on
 p. 63). In his 39th Homily on St. Matthew, he speaks of the formal sabbath as a concession to the hardness of the hearts of the Jews, and urges that we should always keep festival by abstaining from evil, and "be idle with a spiritual idleness" (ἀργαίως ἀργίαν πνευματικῆν), by keeping our hands from recklessness (vol. vii. p. 435). Still it is significant;

 it appears to indicate a transition towards the later idea of connecting the fourth commandment directly with the observance of the Lord's day.
 The circumstances of his time, and the evils with which he had to grapple, may have suggested this short and easy way of maintaining the sanctity of the great Christian festival.

We turn to the West, and take as specimens of church opinion, the three whom Millman has called the great organizers of Latin Christianity.
 St. Ambrose (on Ps. xlii.) holds, like St. Athananasius, that the Lord's day is "the day which the Lord hath made," of Ps. cxviii.; of all the days on which God works mighty works, it has the leadership (prærogativa), because illuminated by the rising of the Sun of Righteousness. In his commentary on Ps. xlviii, we observe a marked instance of the tendency to supersede the sabbath
 by the Lord's day. The Psalm is to be sung
 "Secundâ Sabbati." What (he asks) is this but
 "the Lord's day, which followed the sabbath?"
 He clearly means that it followed it in old times, not only in order, but in dignity; for he goes on to speak of the "eighth day, at once the eighth and the first," as "sanctified by the resurrection," and now accordingly having
 "ex numeri Ordine prærogativam, et ex Resurrectione Domini sanctitatem." He actually interprets the ἀσβατον βερερπρωτων as signifying that "the sabbath, which was once first,
 now begins to be but the second after the first;"
 and lastly, he uses the phrase "Prima requies cessavit, secunda successit," connecting with this the declaration of the "sabbath keeping for the people of God" (in Heb. iv. 8, 9). Similarly commenting on the passage "Vespere Sabbati, que lucebit in primam Sabbati," he remarks,
 "Before the resurrection the Evangelist spoke of the sabbath; after the resurrection he called it the first day of the week." It is true that he speaks of the "rest in Christ" as the true and "great sabbath," in the same sense as Epiphanius (de Obitu Theod., vol. ii. 1206 n, Bened. ed.
 1690). But, while he would have doubtless repudiated the idea that the Lord's day was the "Christian sabbath," his words certainly prepare for it.

St. Jerome's treatment of the subject is markedly characteristic. He (adv. Jovin. ii. 25) deals with the six days of work as representing this life, the seventh the "true and eternal sabbath," in which we shall be free. In the passage already referred to (in Galat. lib. II.
 vel. vii. p. 456, Bened. ed.) he lays it down that,
 strictly speaking, all days are equal to a Christian,
 "nec per Parasceven tantum crucifigi Christum et die Dominicâ resurgere, sed semper sanctam resurrectionis esse diem et semper eum carne vesi Dominicâ," and he goes on to contrast the strict limitation of the Jews to certain days with the freedom of the Christian to fast, to pray, to celebrate a Lord's day by receiving the Body of the Lord, at all times. On Ezek. xx. 10, 11, he has a curious passage, declaring the sabbath
 and circumcision to have been given as signs,

"ut sciamus nos perfecto et æterno sabbato
 requiescendum a sæculi operibus." "Unde in sex diebus operantes septimo die requiescimus, ut
 nihil aliud die ac nocte faciamus, nisi unum quod vivilimus, debere Domino noverimus, et redemite
 hebdomade totos nos nomini ejus consecremus."
 While he bears constant testimony to the solemn observation of the Lord's day by religious worship, it is truly remarked by Dr. Hessey (Dampton Lectures, Lect. III.) that he describes the Egyptian œnothotæ, as after church making garments for themselves or others, and tells the story of his visits to the tombs of the apostles and martyrs,
 not as religious ceremonies, but as seemingly re-practice, his view of the Lord's day is highly spiritual, with no tendency whatever to legal or sabbatical observance.

The same remark applies to the teaching of St. Augustine, who constantly refers to the question of the sabbath, and not infrequently to the Lord's day. He expresses himself with singular clearness against any continuance of sabbatical obligation. In his De Genesi ad Litteram (Book iv., Opp. vol. iii. 208) he expressly says that in the time of full revelation of grace, that method of observance of the sabbath, which was symbolized by the rest of a single day, was taken away from the observance of the faithful (observatio illa sabbati, quæ unius diei vacacione figurabatur, ablata est ab observatione fidelium). Similarly in his Epistle to Januarius (Ep. iv. vel. ii. 203) he expressly distinguishes the fourth (or, as he calls it, the third commandment, connecting it mystically with the third Person of the Holy Trinity), as one to be observed figuratively, from all the others, which are to be observed literally. In both passages he urges on the faithful a perpetual sabbath, partly of rest from the "old works," partly of working whatever good they work with a view to the eternal sabbath of heaven. The Lord's day (he adds) was declared not to the Jews but to the Christians by the resurrection of the Lord, and from that time only began to have its festal character. There was indeed a mystical signification of the eighth day (octaviæ Sacramentum) under the law, which he traces fancifully enough, but it was reserved and concealed, and the sabbath alone given for celebration. Exactly in the same way he declares against the Manicheans (contra Ad-mantum, sect. 2, 16, and contra Faustum, book
 vi. vol. viii. 209, 240, 243), that the literal or carnal observance of the sabbath is abolished, while its spiritual significance remains, in the acceptance of the invitation, "Come unto me, and I will give you rest." His principle is formally enunciated thus, "Apostolicam inter-pretationem spiritaliter teneo; Carnalem Servi-titium observationem libertate contemo." In his treatise de Spiritu et Littera, sect. xiv. (vol. x.
 328) he takes it so absolutely for granted that the observance of the sabbath according to the letter is carnal, that he thinks it necessary to plead that the principle, "the letter killeth," applies not only to the fourth commandment, but to the other nine. The sabbath day, he says elsewhere (on Ps. cl. vol. iv. 2411), signifies rest, the Lord's day, resurrection. The two ideas are in his view contrasted, as the old and new covenants are contrasted. Such is his genuine teaching. There is, indeed, a passage in one of the Homilies de Tempore (Hom. 251), attributed to him, but unhesitatingly rejected by the Benedictine editors, and assigned by them to the 9th century, in which he is made to say that "the doctors of the church decreed to transfer all the glory of the Jewish sabbath-keeping to the Lord's day, so that what they celebrated in figure, we might celebrate in reality" (see vol. v. p. 3101). But this is in direct opposition to St. Augustine's general teaching; it clearly breathes the spirit of a later time, and shews traces of a well-known passage of Aleuin.

(V.) In these leading representatives of Christian thought, we find, therefore, not only a preservation of the older and truer ideas, but, generally speaking, a care (possibly prophetic) to enforce the spirituality of the Lord's day more carefully than ever. It is rather in the enactments of councils, embodying the common opinion of the church at large, that we trace the changes of conception which have been described above.

The great Council of Nicaea, taking the Lord's day and its observance for granted, merely directs that on the Lord's day and within the Pentecost, all shall pray standing (Canon 20). Subsequent councils, however, of the 4th, 5th and 6th centuries legislate frequently on the subject.

The first class of enactments is directed to the enforcement of ritual and devotional observances. Thus absence from the church on their Lord's days is made a ground for excommunication; fasting on the Lord's day is denounced as savouring of Manicheism; the refusal to join the prayers and receive the Holy Eucharist, and the practice of leaving the church during preaching, are censured and punished; all frequenting of the games or the circus on the Lord's day is strictly forbidden (see Hesse's Bampton Lectures, Lect. III.). These enactments have no special significance as to the conception of the day. They simply take for granted its religious celebration after the primitive fashion; their existence only indicates that this celebration was becoming more and more a matter of legal regulation and enforcement.

There is, however, another class of enactments intended to secure and guard a quasi-sabbatical rest. To this the well-known canon of Laodicea (A.D. 363) seems certainly to belong. (See Labbe, Concilia, vol. ii. pp. 564, 565.) It declares that Christians "are not to Judaize and rest on the sabbath day, but to work on that day, and preferring the Lord's day in honour, on it, if possible, to rest as Christians (την δε κυριακην προτιμωμεντες, εθγε δυναιντα, σχολαζειν ως Χριστιανου). Obviously there is a marked distinction intended between the Jewish and Christian idea of rest; but still the result is to transfer a sabbatical rest to the Lord's day, and so to make it a kind of spiritualized and Christianized sabbath. This step being once taken, its necessary consequences follow, accumulating regulations of prohibition or injunction, until the original distinction is obscured or lost. The councils, in fact, were placed between tendencies to extreme observance and to extreme neglect. Thus at the third Council of Orleans (A.D. 538), we see that a certain public opinion had been growing up (persuasum est populis) that on the Lord's day no horse or ox or carriage should be used, no food prepared, nothing done for the cleanliness of the house or person. This the council wisely desires to check, and protests that such minute regulations "savour rather of Jewish than Christian observance" (ad Judaicam magis quam ad Christianam observantiam pertinere). It is accordingly laid down, somewhat vaguely, that the freedom hitherto used on the Lord's day should be preserved (quod antea fieri licuit, liceat). But in the very same canon abstinence from rural work in general is not only advised, in order that men may have leisure for church-going and prayer, but, in case of neglect, enforced by ecclesiastical sanctions (see Labbe, vol. ix. p. 10). On the other hand, the second Council of Mâcon (A.D. 585) declares itself driven to legislation, because "the people rashly profane the Lord's day, and as on ordinary days (privatis diebus) devote themselves to unceasing work." Accordingly the first canon pleads eloquently for the observance of the Lord's day, "which has given us the new birth and freedom from all our sins" (quae nos deinde peperit et a peccatis omnibus liberavit); on it "being made free from sin and become servants to righteousness, let us show the service which is perfect freedom" (liberam servitutem exhibeamus). "The day is the day of perpetual rest, which is suggested to us by the type of the seventh day in the law and the prophets." Hence it is urged that men should abstain from litigation and pleading, and should not even allow themselves on plea of necessity to yoke their oxen. Their whole soul is to be absorbed in hymns and praises; their eyes and hands raised all day to God. Not that there is value in bodily rest (corporali abstinentia), but in an obedience by which earthly actions may be set aside, and the soul raised to heaven. All this is spiritual exhortation; but it is significantly added that disobedience will be punished primarily by God, secondarily "by the implacable anger of the priest;" "pleaders shall be nansuited, peasants or slaves severely scourged, clerks or monks suspended for six months from communion with their fellows." (See Labbe, ix. 847.) It will be observed that in this case there is a vague reference to the seventh day's rest, laid down in the fourth commandment, as foreshadowing the Lord's day. But this is a tentative step anticipatory of the future. Every enactment of quasi-sabbatical rest prepared for a sabbatarian theory; but it was far from being as yet established.

This is clear, if we turn to the writings of Gregory the Great, the foremost man of his day in character as in office, and the unconscious founder of the future papal power. He obviously followed St. Augustine in his view of the Lord's day and its significance, and in some of his references to Old Testament types of its sacredness (see Hom. in Ezech. ii. 4). In a celebrated letter to the Romans (Epi. l. xiii. 1), written in reference to some introduction of strict rest on the sabbath, he declares that it

^b One is, however, peculiar. On Job i. 5, he contends that in his sanctifying his sons after the seven days, he prefigured the eighth day or Lord's day. He says: "Quia ergo octavo die offerre septem sacrificia dicitur, plenus a pluriformis gratiae Spiritu pro spe resurrectionis Domine deservisse perhibetur."

mimaribus cuilibet Christiano ad ecclesiam, conveniendum est al vigilias sive ad matutinum oblationibus. Concurrentium est etiam cum oblationibus ad missarum solemniam. Et dum ad ecclesiam convenitur nulla causa dici debet vel audiri, nulla jurgia sunt habenda: sed tantummodo Deo vacandum est, in celebratione videlicet sacrarum oblationum, et exhibitione elemosinarum, et in Dei laudibus cum amicis, proximis, et peregrinis spiritaliter epulatum.¹

But Alcuin, Charlemagne's great ecclesiastical adviser, speaking of the Jewish observation of the sabbath, says expressly, "cujus observationem mos Christianus ad diem Dominicum competentius transtulit" (Homil. xviii. post Pentec., quoted by Heylin). It is true that this is said to have been done by custom; there is no word of scriptural authority, or even of any institution of the apostles. But still this passage seems to enunciate for the first time the idea of "the Christian sabbath."¹ And its meaning is illustrated by the laws of the time. A law attributed to Clotaire lays it down that no one should work on the Lord's day, "quia hoc lex prohibet, et Sacra Scriptura in omnibus contrahit." Under Pepin (A.D. 791) a council at Friuli had strictly enforced the observance of the day, with some special restrictions apparently taken from the observance of the sabbath. But Charlemagne opens an imperial edict on the subject with the express words, "statuimus secundum quod et in lege Dominus praecepit," and proceeds to minute prohibitions against various kinds of work and to injunctions for attendance at divine service. (See Heylin, part ii. c. v.)

It is notable that not long after an edict appears at Constantinople by the emperor Leo Philosophus (A.D. 884) for the observance of the Lord's day, referring to the old edict of Constantine as too lax in its exemptions, and declaring absolute rest for labour, as "decreed by the Holy Spirit and the apostles taught of Him" (quod Spiritus Sancto ab ipsoque institutus apostolis placuit), arguing that "if the Jews honoured their sabbath, which was but a shadow of ours, how much more should we honour the day which the Lord hath honoured, and on it delivered us from dishonour and death!" (Constit. 54, see Heylin, part ii. c. v.). We note here that it is on apostolic authority that the sanctity of the Lord's day is based, although at the same time the Jewish sabbath is looked upon as the shadow of the Christian. The period is, in fact, one of transition. That the sabbatical authority of the Lord's day was not held in theory is clear, from the fact that the general teaching of the schoolmen follows the express declaration of Aquinas that "the observance of the Lord's day in the new law supersedes the observance of the sabbath, not by obligation of the (divine) law, but by the ordinance of the church and the custom of Christian people" (non ex vi legis sed ex constitutione ecclesiae et consuetudine populi Christiani), or as it is elsewhere expressed, "non de jure divino, sed de jure humano canonico." But the "custom of Christian people," when once directed in the line of quasi-sabbatical observance, would be apt to ground itself naturally on the divine law, which such observances seemed to suggest, and to which reference is certainly made in the decrees already quoted.

It lies beyond the limits of this article to trace the steady and excessive development of festal observance in the mediæval church, the tendency to place other holy days on nearly the same level as the Lord's day, and to guard all alike by quasi-sabbatarian regulations of an elaborate and burdensome nature. Nor can we do more than allude to the twofold protest made against this at the Reformation. On the Continent generally, it tended to reject all holy days, and treat the Lord's day itself as a matter of simple church ordinance, which any church at its will might alter; in England, Scotland, and Holland, it singled out the Lord's day, placing it on a scriptural basis, as the Christian sabbath, ordained in the fourth commandment, and surrounded it too often with a more than Judaic rigour.

The conclusions, to which within the historical limits assigned to this article we must come, may be thus briefly recapitulated.

(a) The Lord's day must be regarded as a festival, coeval with the existence of Christianity itself—growing up naturally from the apostles' time, gradually assuming the character of the one distinctively Christian festival, and drawing to itself, as by an irresistible gravitation, the periodical rest, which is enjoined in the fourth commandment on grounds applicable to man as man, and which was provided for under the Mosaic law by the special observance of the sabbath.

(b) The idea of the Lord's day is wholly distinct from that of the sabbath, never for a moment confused with it in the early church, in which, indeed, the observance of the sabbath long survived, sometimes as a festival, sometimes as a fast. Wherever rest is associated with it, such rest is invariably regarded as entirely secondary, as simply a means to a higher end. Accordingly the original regulation of observances connected with the Lord's day is positive and not negative, and directed by principle rather than by formal rule.

(c) The tendency to sabbatize the Lord's day is due chiefly to the necessities of legal enforcement—first, as exemplified in the series of imperial laws, then in the decrees of councils, generally backed by the secular power—leading inevitably in prohibition more than in injunction, and so tending to emphasize negative instead of positive observance. For such enactments the law of the Old Testament "mutatis mutandis" became naturally a model, and the step was an easy one, from regarding it as a model to taking it as an authority.

(d) The direct connexion, however, of such observance with the obligation of the fourth commandment can claim no scriptural and no high ecclesiastical authority. Either the observation of that commandment is expressly declared to be figurative (consisting of rest from sin, rest enjoyed in Christ, and rest foreseen in heaven), or careful distinction is made between the moral obligation of religious observance in general, and the positive obligation, now passed

¹ Heylin (Hist. of Sabbath, part ii. c. v. 13) asserts that the phrase itself is first found in Petrus Alfonsus in the 12th century: "Dies dominica . . . Christianorum sabbatum est."

Christian people," when once the idea of quasi-sabbatical observance is brought to ground itself naturally which such observance seemed which reference is certainly already quoted.

The limits of this article to trace the successive development of false mediæval church, the tendency of days on nearly the same level and to guard all alike by regulations of an elaborate and . Nor can we do more than protest made against this On the Continent generally, all holy days, and treat the matter of simple church service at its will might Scotland, and Holland, the Lord's day, placing it on as the Christian sabbath, and surmounting with a more than Judaic which within the historical this article we must come, recapitulated.

any must be regarded as a the existence of Christianity naturally from the apostles' timing the character of the Christian festival, and drawing an irresistible gravitation, which is enjoined in the at on grounds applicable to which was provided for under a special observance of the

The Lord's day is wholly dis- the sabbath, never for a th it in the early church, observance of the sabbath times as a festival, some- wherever rest is associated is invariably regarded as as simply a means to a singly the original regula- connected with the Lord's not negative, and directed man by formal rule.

to sabbatize the Lord's to the necessities of legal exemplified in the series in the decrees of councils, the secular power—dealing tion more than in injunction to emphasize negative servance. For such enact- Old Testament "mutatis naturally a model, and the a, from regarding it as a an authority. In addition, however, of such obligation of the fourth aim no scriptural and no authority. Either the obser- and that is expressly de- (consisting of rest from Christ, and rest foreseen in distinction is made between of religious observance in ive obligation, now passed away, to keep the sabbath in particular. The notion of connecting it with the keeping of the Lord's day grows up in the first instance through the natural supersession of the sabbath by the Lord's day in the Christian church, and the temptation to transfer to the latter the positive divine sanction of the former; and, once introduced, maintains itself by the very fact of presenting a strong and intelligible plea against any degradation of the high Christian festival.

On this subject the following works may be consulted with advantage: Heylitz's History of the Sabbath, part ii., full of learning, though defective in arrangement and criticism; Bingham's Antiquities, book xx. c. ii., containing much valuable matter, though needing some correction; Dr. Lessy's Bampton Lectures on Sunday, presenting the literature of the subject accurately and popularly; Probst, Kirchliche Disciplin der Drei ersten Jahrhunderte (pt. iii. c. i. art. 1) discuss the principal passages bearing on the question found in the writers of the first three centuries; Binterim's Denkwürdigkeiten der Christ-Katholischen Kirche, vol. v. part i. c. 4. In all there is much common material, derived from the obvious source of information on this subject—the writings of the Fathers, the edicts of the Imperial Cædes, the canons of councils, and the mediæval laws so often based upon them. The distinction is chiefly in the inferences drawn from these historical materials.

[A. B.]

LORD'S DAY (LITURGICAL). The observance of Sunday began after None on Saturday, "ut dies dominica a vespere usque in vespem servetur" (Conc. Francofurt. A.D. 794), and the reason is given by Durandus (Rat. v. 3, 2): "Quia vespertina synaxis seu hora primum est officium diei sequentis." The Sunday office was longer and more solemnly observed than that of other days. The number of psalms and lessons, and the number of nocturns at the night office was increased. The Gregorian distribution of the Psalter gives eighteen psalms and nine lessons in three nocturns, instead of twelve psalms and three lessons in one nocturn; and the Benedictine twelve psalms, and three canticles, with twelve lessons in three nocturns instead of twelve psalms and three lessons, in two nocturns on week days. Te Deum was said at the end of Matins, except in Advent, and from Septuagesima to Easter.

The nocturnal office and that of Lauds were to be said (Mart. de Ant. Eccl. Rit. iv. 9) with modulation tractum, which word is explained as lenti ac morosa modulatione. Incense was offered (oblatum) at each nocturn, and the high altar censured at Benedictus at Lauds. The solemn benediction of the holy water "salis et aque," a custom which is considered to have been introduced by pope Leo IV. A.D. 847-855, took place before mass; with which ceremony a procession was in many places joined. At the mass Gloria in excelsis was said except during Advent, and from Septuagesima to Easter Eve; and the creed was said at the mass and at Prime in the Sunday office throughout the year. The reserved Eucharist was renewed. Many other distinctions between the Dominical office, and that for week days, might be pointed out. Those already enumerated are among the most conspicuous.

In the Ambrosian use the Dominical office differs from the Ferial in several points, of which the following are the most prominent. No psalms are said at matins, but in their place three canticles, one in each nocturn.

In Nocturn I. The Canticle of Isaiah, cap. xxvi. De nocte rigidat.

In Nocturn II. The Canticle of Hannah, I Reg. II. Confirmatum c. t.

In Nocturn III. The Canticle of Jonah, cap. 1. Canavi; or, during the winter: i.e. from the first Sunday in October till Easter, the Canticle of Habakkuk, cap. ii. Domine auidi.

Each of these canticles has its proper antiphon, and is followed by the usual form. V. Benedictus es, Deus. R. Amen.

After the third canticle three lessons are read, each with its response. These are not, as on week days, taken from scripture, but from a Homily on the Gospel of the day, and correspond therefore to the lessons in the third nocturn of the Roman Breviary. These are followed, except not during Advent and Lent, by Te Deum, which is said separately, the office ends with a collect, and the customary form. V. Benedictamus Domino. R. Deo Gratias.

At Lauds after Benedictus, which begins the office both in the Dominical and the Ferial office,* follow, each preceded by its oratio secreta, and with its proper antiphon, the canticle of Moses (Exod. xv.) Cantemus Domino and Benedicite. In the place of these, on week days other than Saturday, Ps. l. (ii.), Miserere is said, and on Saturday, Ps. cxviii. (cxviii.) Confitemini.

At the other hours there are certain differences in the disposition and number of the collects and antiphons, by whatever names they are called, but, as the general character of the office is unaltered, it is not necessary to enter minutely into them. Certain greater festivals, called Solemnitates Domini, have the office nearly identical with that of the Sunday.

In the Mozarabic rite the daily office differs throughout so much for the ordinary Western type that it is not easy to point out clearly in a few words the variations between that of Sunday and other days. The most conspicuous variation is at the beginning of matins, which on Sunday (after the opening) begin with the hymn Asterius rerum conditor, followed by its oratio, and the three Psalms; iii. Domine quid, l. (ii.) Miserere, lvi. (lvii.) Miserere mei, each with its antiphon and oratio, while on week days the corresponding portion of the office is an antiphon called matutinarium, and Ps. l. (ii.) Miserere,^b with its antiphon and oratio. Sundays were of different degrees. The classification varied at different times, and in different churches, but the general Western division was into Greater Sundays: Dominicæ majores v. solemnis v. privilegiatæ; and

* Except on Sundays in Advent, when the Song of Moses (Deut. xxxii.) Astende Coelum, is said. On Christmas Day both are said.

^b This is the direction given in the Regula printed at the head of the Breviary. In the body of the Breviary the Psalm appointed for a week-day varies among the three Sunday psalms; and the matutinarium occurs later in the office, in the course of Lauds. The Mozarabic ritual directions are sometimes difficult to reconcile.

into Ordinary Sundays: Dominicae communes, v. per annum. Martene, de Ant. Mon. rit. iv. § 4, from the capitula of Lanfranc, says, "Quinque dies Dominici sunt, qui communia quaedam inter se habent separata a caeteris diebus Dominici, Dominica vid. prima de Adventu Domini, Dominica primae Septuagesimae, Dominica prima Quadragesimae, Dominica in medio Quadragesimae, Dominica in Palmis." He then proceeds to specify certain ritual peculiarities of those days mainly relating to the dress of the clergy, and the performance of the office in choir.^c In this classification Easter day and Pentecost have already been reckoned among the "quinque praecipuae festivitates."

Another classification given by Durandus [vii. 1-4] defines Dominicae principales v. solemniores to be those "in quibus officia mutantur," of which he reckons five. Dominica prima de Adventu, Dominica in Octavis Pascha, Dominica in Octavis Pentecostes, Dominica qua cantatur Letare Hierusalem [sc. Midlent Sunday] et Dominica in Ramis Palmarum; Easter and Pentecost being as before otherwise accounted for. To these the first Sunday in Lent was afterwards added, "quia fit officii in ea mutatio."

The later Roman arrangement, which is still in force, subdivides the greater Sundays, Dominicae maiores, into two classes: (1) Sundays of the first class, Dominicae primae classis, viz. the first Sunday in Advent, the first Sunday in Lent, Passion Sunday, Palm Sunday, Easter day, Low Sunday, Whitsunday, and Trinity Sunday; and (2) Sundays of the second class, Dominicae secundae classis, viz. the second, third, and fourth Sunday of Advent, Septuagesima and the two following Sundays, and the second, third and fourth Sundays in Lent. The other Sundays in the year are ordinary Sundays, Dominicae per annum.

The Ambrosian rule classifies Sundays according to their office, as follows:—Easter day, Pentecost and Trinity Sunday are reckoned among the Sollemnitates Domini, the highest class of festivals. The other Sundays are divided into two classes—(1) those which have a proper office, and (2) those which have the ordinary Sunday office.

Those which have a proper office—officium proprium—are the Sundays in Advent, those in Lent, and the Sunday after the Nativity.

The Sundays between Easter and Pentecost have the Paschal office—Paschale officium—which has certain ritual peculiarities, and the Sundays from the Epiphany to the beginning of Lent have a mixed office, officium partim proprium, partim commune.

The Sundays from the second after Pentecost to Advent have the ordinary office (officium commune).

The classification of Sundays in the Greek calendar is not so minute. Easter day stands in a class by itself, at the head of all the festivals of the year; and Palm Sunday and Whitsunday are reckoned among the Troctes,^d which rank next in importance.

^c Among other points it is directed that the refectory tables be covered with clean cloths (festivae mappae; sint et quotidiane, totae tamen), and clean towels provided (manutergia candida et honesta).

^d Otherwise called θεσπρωσαι v. κυριακαι επορα. They

Many Sundays were (and are still) often designated by the first word of the introit of the Roman mass. Thus the first five Sundays in Lent are often known by the names, Innocentii,^e Reminiscere, Oculi, Laetare, Judica; and the four Sundays following Easter as Quasimodo, Miserere, cordis Domini, Jubilate, Cantate. Some again are customarily known by some peculiarity in the celebration. Thus the Sunday next before Easter^f is known as Palm Sunday and Dominica palmarum v. in ramis palmarum, from the Benediction of the palm branches, and the subsequent procession which takes place on that day after terce and before mass; and the Sunday after Easter as Dominica in albis, or more fully in albis depositis, as it is called in the Ambrosian missal; ^g from its being the day after the Saturday on which those who had been baptized on Easter eve laid aside their white garments; or sometimes as Clausum^h Paschae, from its being the conclusion of the Paschal celebration, and the second and following Sundays after Easter were sometimes called *Dominica*ⁱ and ii^h and post albas, or post clausum Paschae.

Other less familiar designations for particular Sundays which are found, are Dominica carnevale, de carne levatio v. de carne levanda, which would be Quinquagesima Sunday where Lent began on the following Wednesday, and the first Sunday in Lent in the Ambrosian ritual, which begins Lent on that day; Dominica in Quadragesima for the first Sunday in Lent, Dominica mediana v. mediante die festo [Miss. Mozar.] for the fourth Sunday in Lent, Dominica Osanna for Palm Sunday, also Pascha floridum from the flowers which were associated with Palm branches in the office for their benediction. Thus in the Mozarabic missal the office is to be said ad benedicendos flores vel ramos, and in the prayer of the office the clause occurs, "Hos quoque ramos et flores palmarum . . . hodie tua benedictione sanetifica." So also in the Ordo Romanus, "Dies palmarum, sive florum atque ramorum dicitur"; also in the Sarum missal the office is called benedictio florum ac frondium, and the phrase creatura florum vel frondium, or equivalent expressions frequently recur in it. In the York missal, too, we find the words "hos palmarum atque florum ramos, etc. . . ." Dominica Rogationum v. D. ante Litanias for the Sunday before Ascension.ⁱ Many other similar names might be adduced, though several would not fall within our limits of time.

were originally seven in number, and a mystical reason for that number is given from St. Chrysostom. It was afterwards increased to twelve. The list at first contained Easter day, which afterwards was placed by itself, and has otherwise slightly varied, the number remaining at twelve. The next order of festivals is called adweekes, i. e. not of the twelve; but it contains no Sunday.

^e Thus the rubrics of the Missal speak of Feria ii, etc. post Innocentii, etc.

^f So termed in the English Prayer Book.

^g In the Ambrosian rite the days of Easter week are called Feria ii, iii, etc. . . . in albis, and those in the week next following Feria ii, iii, etc. . . . post albas.

^h This expression must not be confounded with Clausum Paschae.

ⁱ It may be noticed that several of these terms have established themselves in familiar use to England, though they nowhere appear in the service books, e. g. Midlent Sunday, Palm Sunday, Rogation Sunday.

re (and are still) often design-ward of the introit of the
 the first five Sundays in by the names, Innocentii, Petre, Judicis; and the four aster as Quasimodo, Misericordi- te, Cantate. Some again are by some peculiarity in the
 the Sunday next before Palm Sunday and Dominica
palmarum, from the Benedicranches, and the subsequent es place on that day after ss; and the Sunday after in Albis, or more fully in called in the Ambrosian
 the day after the Saturwho had been baptized on their white garments; or a Paschae, from its being e Paschal celebration, and wing Sundays after Easter Dominica I^a and II^a and Assum Paschae.

designations for particular und, are Dominica carnele- va de carne levanda, which esima Sunday where Lent
 g Wednesday, and the first e Ambrosian ritual, which Sunday in Lent, Dominica
de festo [Miss. Mozar.] for Lent, Dominica Osanni for Pascha sturidium from the e associated with Palm ice for their benediction.
 missal the office is to be said
in ramis, and in the prayer occurs, "Hoc quoque ramos
 . . . hodie tua benedictione
 in the Ordo Romanus, "Dies
 atque ramorum dicitur";
 missal the office is called frondium, and the phrase
frondium, or equivalent exrecure in it. In the York be words "hos palmarum
" Dominica Ro-
mas for the Sunday before or similar names might be al would not fall within umber, and a mystical reason from St. Chrysostom. It was twelve. The list at first con-afterwards was placed by itself, varied, the number remaining

 of festivals is called ἀδωδέατα,
 it contains no Sunday.
 Missal speak of Feria II^a, etc.

ish Prayer Book.
 the days of Easter week are
 . . . in Albis, and those in the II^a, III^a, etc. . . . post Albas.

not be confounded with Claves

at several of these terms have familiar use in England, though the service books, e. g. Milrent
oration Sunday.

The Dominical calendars throughout the year varied in different churches, and deserve a few words.

The Roman Calendar, as in use to the present time, is substantially the same as the early English (and as that now used among ourselves).
 The chief difference is that in it the Sundays
 throughout the summer are reckoned "post Pentecostem," instead of post Trinitatem as in the Sarum (and modern English) use; and that there are fewer of them. Thus in the Roman missal there are twenty-four Sundays post Pen- tecostem, in the English twenty-five post Trini- tatem. In the York missal the Sundays were reckoned post octavas Pentecostes.

Allatius (de Dominica et hebdomadibus Grae- corum dissertatio) gives a Calendar "ad usum Brevarii Romani e bibliotheca Vaticanae Codicis antiquissimo"; which (omitting all that does not relate to Sundays) runs thus:—

- Dominica prima de Adventu Domini.
- Dominica secunda ante Natale Domini.
- Dominica tertia ante Natale Domini.
- Dominica quarta ante Natale Domini.
- Dominica prima, etc. post Epiphaniam.

(The Sundays after the Epiphany are reckoned up to Lent, but the names for the last three, Septuagesima, etc. are recognised.)

- Dominica in Quadragesima.
- Dominica prima mensis primi.
- Dominica III^a, IV^a, V^a, VI^a in Quadragesima.
- Dominica Sancta in Pascha.
- Dominica Octava Paschae.
- Dominica I^a, II^a, III^a post Octavam Paschae.
- Dominica post Ascensum Domini.
- Dominica Pentecosten.
- Dominica Octava Pentecosten.
- Dominica II^a, etc. Pentecosten.
- Dominica post Natale Apostolorum [I. e. SS. Pet. et Pauli. Jun. 29].
- Dominica I^a, II^a, etc. post Octavam Apostolorum.
- Dominica I^a, III^a, etc. post S. Laurentii [Aug. 10].
- Dominica I^a, II^a, etc. post S. Cypriani [Sept. 28].

The last of these Sundays is that next after the festival of St. Andrew, and then follow the three Sundays of Advent.

The Mozarabic Calendar contains six Sundays in Advent. The Sundays after the Epiphany are numbered continuously till the beginning of Lent, counting the names Septuagesima, etc., the Sunday corresponding to Quinquagesima being known as Dominica ante diem Cinerum v.
ante carnes tollendis, after Pentecost are reckoned as the first, second, etc., seventh Sunday after Pentecost. After the seventh no Sunday mass and therefore no Sunday name is given till Advent, except one for "In Dominica ante jejunium Calendarum Novembrium."

The Ambrosian Dominical Calendar, which in its main features is of high antiquity, is as follows:—

- Dominica I^a, II^a, III^a, IV^a, V^a, VI^a in Adventu.

(These six Sundays are exclusive of and in addition to the Vigil of the Nativity, when it falls on a Sunday.)

- Dominica post Nativitatem Domini.
- Dominica I^a, II^a, etc. post Epiphaniam.
- Dominica in Septuagesima, in Sexagesima, in Quinquagesima.
- Dominica I^a in Quadragesima (the beginning of Lent).

Dominica II^a in Quadragesima (sometimes called the Sunday of the Samaritan Woman).

Dominica III^a in Quadragesima (or the Sunday of Abraham).

Dominica IV^a in Quadragesima (or the Sunday of the Blind Man).

Dominica V^a in Quadragesima (or the Sunday of Lazarus).

Dominica Olivarum.
 Dominica Resurrectionis, v. Dies Sanctus Paschae.

Dominica in Albis deponitis.
 Dominica II^a, III^a, IV^a, V^a post Pascha.

Dominica post Ascensionem.
 Dominica Pentecosten.

Dominica I^a post Pentecosten.
 Dominica in qua celebratur Festum Sanctissimae

Trinitatis.
 Dominica II^a post Pentecosten, v. Dom. infra Octavam Corporis Christi.

Dominica III^a, etc. post Pentecosten.
 Up to the Decollation of St. Joh. Bapt. [Aug. 29].

Dominica I^a, II^a, III^a, IV^a, V^a post Decollationem.
 Dominica I^a, II^a, III^a Octobris.

Dominica III^a. In Dedicatione Ecclesiae majoris.
 Dominica I^a, II^a, III^a post Dedicationem.

The Greek Dominical Calendar differs in many respects. In all Western calendars the ecclesiastical year begins with Advent. The Greek Church has no such season,^a and the year begins with the Sunday of the Pharisee and the Publican, which corresponds to the Sunday next before Septuagesima. The order of the Sundays is as follows:—

Sunday of the Pharisee and the Publican [also called προφητισμος].^b

Sunday of the Prodigal Son, answering to Septuagesima Sunday.

Sunday of Apocryes [so called because it is the last day on which meat is eaten].

Sunday of Tyrophagus [the last day on which cheese
 is eaten].

First Sunday of the Fast, or Orthodoxy Sunday,
ἀνάστασις τῆς ἑσπέρης κρυαῆς τῶν ἁγίων ὑπορείων, ἡμέρα τῆς ὀρθοδοξίας [Typ. Sabas, cap. xviii.]. The celebration under this name is in commemoration of the overthrow of the Iconoclasts.^c

Second, Third, Fourth, Fifth Sundays of the Fast.

Palm Sunday (εὐχαριστῆ τῶν βασιῶν).

Pascha (or Bright Sunday, ἀναστάσις κρυαῆς).

Antipascha (or the Sunday of St. Thomas), sometimes New Sunday, καὶ ἡ νέα κρυαῆ [Theod.

Baisamon in Expos. de S. Bas. etc. ad Aouphl. de Spir. Sanct.].

Sunday of the Ornment Bearers (τῶν κρυφοφόρων).

Sunday of the Paralytic.

Sunday of the Samaritan Woman, or Mid Pentecost [μεσοπεντηκοστή].

Sunday of the Blind Man.^d

Sunday of the Three hundred and eighteen [i. e. the Fathers of Niceaea]. Sunday in the Octave of the Ascension.

Pentecost.

All Saints Sunday (Trinity Sunday or First Sunday of Matthew).

^a There is a fast preparatory to the Nativity, called the Fast of the Nativity, which lasts for the forty days before Christmas.

^b This and similar names of Sundays are derived from the subjects of the Gospels for the day.

^c For the reasons given for this name, see Allatius
de Dominicis et Hebdomadibus Graecorum, s. viii.

^d There is a long and peculiar office for the day in the Triodion, but it is without our limits of time.

^e The Sundays after Antipascha are variously reckoned as the 2nd, 3rd, etc., or as the 3rd, 4th, etc. Sunday after Pascha.

The Sundays from this point are called Sundays of Matthew or of Luke according as the gospels are taken from those Evangelists.*

Second Sunday after Pentecost, or Second Sunday of Matthew.

Third Sunday after Pentecost, or Third Sunday of Matthew.

and so on, up to the Exaltation of the Cross [Sept. 14], the Sunday before which festival is called:—

The Sunday before the Exaltation; and that following it
The Sunday after the Exaltation.

After this the Sundays resume their reckoning from Pentecost, which varies with the years and are called Sundays of Luke, whose gospel is now read.

First Sunday of Luke.

Second " "

Sunday before the Nativity.

Sunday before the Lights (ἡμέρῃ τῶν φάτων, sc. Epiphany).

Sunday after the Lights.

The numeration from Pentecost, and of the Sundays of Luke is then resumed and continued till the Sunday of the Pharisee and the Publican, (Martene, de Ant. Eccl. Rit. iv. (See also Allatius, de Dom. et Heb. Græc.; Ducange in v. Dominica; Micrologus; and the Latin and Greek office books passim. [Compare LECTONARY.] [H. J. H.]

LORD'S PRAYER (the Liturgical use of the). I. In nearly all ancient liturgies this was said between the consecration of the elements and the communion. The earliest direct witness is Cyril of Jerusalem, A.D. 350; who, after explaining to his competentes, the Sanctus, prayer of consecration, and the intercessions, as they occur in the order of the service, proceeds, "Then, after these things, we say that prayer which the Saviour delivered to His intimate disciples, out of a pure conscience addressing God and saying, Our Father," &c. (Catech. Myst. v. 8). Optatus in Africa (A.D. 368), charging the Donatist bishops, who "gave remission of sins as if they had no sin themselves," with a self-contradiction, says, "For at that very time, when ye impose hands and remit offences, soon turning to the altar, ye are obliged to recite the Lord's Prayer, and in fact say, Our Father, which art in heaven, forgive us our debts and sins" (de Schism. Don. ii. 20). Now we know from St. Cyprian (de Lupus, p. 128; ed. 1690) that in Africa penitents were reconciled after the consecration. St. Augustine, also in Africa (A.D. 397), puts the Lord's Prayer there; "When the hallowing (of the elements) has taken place, we say the Lord's Prayer" (Serm. 227, ad Infantem, i.e. the newly baptized; see before, vol. i. p. 836). Again, writing in 414, he says that by προσευχῆς in 1 Tim. ii. 1, he understands those Prayers which are said "when that which is on the Lord's table is blessed, and hallowed, and broken for distribution; which whole form of prayer nearly every church concludes with the Lord's Prayer" (ad Paulin. Epist. 149, § 16). Again, to competentes: "When ye are baptized, that prayer is to be said by you daily. For in the church that Lord's Prayer is said daily at the altar of God, and the faithful hear it" (Serm. 58, c. x. § 12; see also Serm. Don. ii. vi. § 26; Serm. 17, § 5; 49, 8). St. Jerome must have thought the practice of saying it somewhere in the liturgy universal, for he says in a work written about 415, "So He taught His apostles, that daily in the sacrifice of His body, believers should make bold to speak thus, Our Father," &c. (Diad. contra Pelag. iii. 15.) Germanus of Paris is a witness to the use of France in the middle of the 6th century: "But the Lord's Prayer is put in that same place (i.e. after the consecration and contrafraction) for this reason, that every prayer of ours may be concluded with the Lord's Prayer (Expos. Brev. in Martene de Ant. Eccl. Rit. i. lv. xii. ii.). In the treatise de Sacramentis, ascribed to St. Ambrose, but probably written in France, near the end of the 8th century (see Scudamore, Notitia Eucharistica, pp. 590, 622, 2nd ed.) we read, "I said to you that before the words of Christ, that which is offered is called bread. When the words of Christ have been uttered, it is no longer called bread, but is named the Body. Wherefore then in the Lord's Prayer which follows after that, does he say, 'our bread' (lib. v. c. iv. § 24)?" Leontius of Cyprus relates of his contemporary, John the Almoner, pape of Alexandria, who died in 616, that during the celebration he sent for and exchanged forgiveness with a clerk, who was not in charity, after which "with great joy and gladness, he stood at the holy altar, able to say to God with a clear conscience, forgive us," &c. (Vita Joan. c. 13; Roswey, p. 186). St. Augustine (as above) alleges the use of the Lord's Prayer after the consecration in "nearly every church." We find it in that place in every ancient liturgy, except the Clementine (Constit. Apost. viii. 15), in which it does not appear at all, and the Abyssinian (Renaudot, Liturg. Orient. i. 521), in which it is said, as in the English, after the communion. In the Nestorian of Malabar it occurs both before and after the communion (Liturg. Mal. Ravlin, 324, 327).

* The Sundays of Matthew and Luke are sometimes also called by the headings of the sections read.

When the Greek compiler of the liturgy called after St. Clement of Rome omitted the Lord's Prayer, he was probably guided by the old Greek liturgy of Rome, which we may suppose to have been before him. We know from St. Gregory, writing in 598, that, until he inserted it, the Lord's Prayer was, according to the plain meaning of his words, certainly not said between the consecration and reception, and therefore probably not said at all in the Eucharistic office of his church. He had been blamed for having (among other innovations) "given an order that the Lord's Prayer should be said soon (mox) after the canon" (Epist. viii. 64). His defence was, "We say the Lord's Prayer soon after the prayer (of consecration), because the apostles were wont to consecrate the host of oblation to that very prayer only (ad ipsam solummodo orationem), and it seemed to me very unbecoming to say over the oblation a prayer which some scholastic had put together, and not to say the prayer (traditionem, lege fors. orationem) which our Redeemer composed over His body and blood" (ibid.). The Lord's Prayer, then, had not been said over the elements either during or after the act of consecration, nor in any place suggested at which it was said. From the Lord's Prayer is said daily at the faithful hear it" (Serm. de Serm. Dom. ii. vi. § 26; p. 10). St. Jerome must have been saying it somewhere in the East, for he says in a work of his, "So He taught His apostles, and His disciples, the office of His body, believers should say, Our Father," &c. (ibid. iii. 15.) Germanus of Auxerre, in the use of France in the 5th century: "But the Lord's Prayer is the same place (i.e. after the Mass) for this reason, that it may be concluded with the words of the Brev. in Marteano de Ant.

In the treatise of Sacraments, Ambrose, but probably near the end of the 4th century, Notitia Eucharistica, &c. we read, "I said to you that Christ, that which is called the Word, that which is called the Body, wherefore then follows after that, &c." (ibid. v. c. iv. § 24?") The dates of his contemporary, Athanasius of Alexandria, who died in the celebration he sent for and with a clerk, who was not a priest, "with great joy and with the holy altar, able to say conscience, forgive us," &c. (ibid. p. 186.) St. Augustine in the use of the Lord's Prayer in "nearly every church," in the 5th century liturgy. (Constit. Apost. viii. 13), appear at all, and in the Liturgy. Orient. i. 521), in the English, after the Nestorian of Malabar it after the communion (ibid. 324, 327).

The compiler of the liturgy of Rome omitted the Lord's Prayer, probably guided by the custom of Rome, which we may see before him. We know in 598, that, until he the Lord's Prayer was, according to his words, certainly not consecration and reception. It is not said at all in the liturgy of the church. He had been among other innovations the Lord's Prayer should be the canon" (Epist. viii. 64). We say the Lord's Prayer of consecration, because it is to consecrate the host in the prayer only (ad ipsam) and it seemed to me very dear the oblation a prayer and put together, and not additionem, leje fers. ora-deemer composed over (ibid.). The Lord's Prayer, over the elements either of consecration, nor is which it was said. From one of the canons of the 4th Council of Toledo (A.D. 633) we should infer that there were some in Spain who did not, even at that time, think it a necessary part of the liturgy; "Some priests are found throughout the Spain, who do not say the Lord's Prayer daily, but only on the Lord's day. . . . Whoever therefore of the priests, or of the clerks subject to them, shall fail to say this prayer of the Lord daily, either in a public or private office, let him be deprived of the honour of his order" (can. 10).

II. The statement of Gregory that the apostles consecrated by saying the Lord's Prayer only is probably a mistake; but it is repeated by Amalarius, A.D. 827, and Leo VII. A.D. 936. The first says of the wine on Good Friday, "The apostolic method of consecration is observed, which said the Lord's Prayer only over the Lord's body and blood. Therefore, if it were not prescribed by the Ordo Romanus that the body of the Lord should be reserved from the 5th day of the week to the 6th, its reservation would be unnecessary; because the Lord's Prayer alone would be sufficient for the consecration of the body, as it is for the consecration of the wine and water" (de Eccl. Off. var. Lect. Hittorp. col. 1445; see also l. 15). After inquiries made at Rome in 831, Amalarius omitted this passage, but not the letter of Gregory, who had been his authority (iv. 26). Micrologus, without citing Gregory, or mentioning the apostles, remarks that the Ordo Romanus commands the priest to consecrate on Good Friday wine not consecrated before with the Lord's prayer and imposition of the Lord's body, that the people may be able to communicate fully" (de Eccl. Off. 19). The Ordo itself ascribes the consecration to the mixture only (Amal. u. s. col. 1445; see Scudamore, Notitia Eucharistica, p. 707, ed. 2). Leo forbade the Lord's Prayer in a grace at meals, "because the holy apostles were wont to say this prayer only in the consecration of the body and blood of our Lord Jesus Christ" (Epist. ii. Labbe, ix. 697).

III. In the ancient liturgies the Lord's Prayer is introduced by a preface. In the Roman and Ambrosian this is not connected with any preceding form, but in the Greek, Oriental, and Ephesine, it is the conclusion of a separate prayer. The Roman preface is as follows, "Oremus. Præceptis salutaribus moniti et divina institutione formati, audemus dicere" (Sacram. Gelas. Murat. i. 697). The Liturgy of Milan uses the same form generally, but on some feasts, as Easter and Christmas (Le Brun, Dissert. iii. 2; Pamel. Liturgiconi, i. 304), the following: "Divino magisterio edocti et salutaribus monitis instituti audemus dicere," which is identical with a Gothic-Gallican form (Liturg. Gall. Mabill. 297). The original Ambrosian canon, however, was followed by a prayer for the presence of Christ, ending thus, "That we may receive the verity of the Lord's body and blood; through the same Jesus Christ our Lord, saying, Our Father," &c. (Murat. Liturg. Rom. i. 134). The Roman and Milanese prefaces have been given above in Latin, that the reader may compare them with the language of St. Cyprian, A.D. 252, in his treatise on the Lord's Prayer (in iud.): "Evangelica præcepta . . . nihil sunt alia quam Magisteria divina . . . Inter sua salutaris monita et præcepta divina . . . etiam orandi ipse formam dedit." Of the title "Our Father," he says, "Quod nomen nemo nostrum in oratione videret attingere, nisi ipse nobis sic permisisset orare" (compare St. Jerome, as above). It is a probable inference that a preface, or prefaces, resembling those quoted, was used with the Lord's Prayer in the Latin church of Africa in the 3rd century. In the old Gallican missal there is a variable prayer, called Collectio ante Orationem Dominicam, of which the following is a brief example: "We beseech Thee, O God the Father Almighty, in those positions whereunto with our Lord Jesus Christ, thy Son, hath commanded us to pray, saying, Our Father," &c. (Miss. Goth. Lit. Gall. 190). Some of these "collects" in the Gothic-Gallican missal are exhortations (195, 202, &c.). One (238) is partly addressed to God and partly to the people. The Gallicanum Vetus of Mabillon (p. 346), and the fragment known as the Reichenau missal (Gallican Liturgies, Neale and Forbes, p. 1), have each an example of exhortation. This collect disappears from the missal Francorum (Lit. Gall. 326) and the Besançon sacramentary found at Bobio (Mus. Ital. l. 281), as they had both adopted the Roman canon. We do not know the preamble used by the Franks, as the Besançon canon is followed by the Gallican preamble, "Divino magisterio edocti, et divina institutione dicere, Pater," &c. In the Mozarabic missal the formulæ before the Lord's Prayer (headed Ad Orationem Dominicam) is often long. In some instances (Leslie, 20, 63, 85, &c.) it is not verbally connected with the latter. It may be a prayer to the Father (16, 20, 22, &c.) or to the Son (8, 12, 93, &c.), or an address to the people (10, 26, 32, &c.). The following example can hardly be classed under any of these heads: "That which is the way hath He shewn, that we might follow in it; that which is the life hath He taught, that we might speak of it; that which is the truth hath He ordained, that we might hold it. To Thee, Supreme Father, let us from the earth with trembling of heart cry aloud, Our Father," &c. (40).

In the ancient liturgy of Jerusalem, known as St. James, at the close of a long secret prayer, the priest says aloud, "And deign that we, O merciful Lord, may with boldness, uncondemned, with a pure heart, a contrite soul, unashamed face, sanctified lips, dare to call upon Thee, the holy God, the Father in the heavens, and to say, Our," &c. (Trollope, 99). This Ἐκφώνησις appears in abridged forms in the derived liturgies of St. Basil (Goar, 174), St. Chrysostom (80), and the Armenian (Neale's Introd. 622). In St. Mark, the priest concludes his secret prayer thus, "That with the holy disciples and apostles, we may say unto Thee this prayer, Our," &c. (Renaud. i. 159.) Then he says aloud the form above given from St. James, and the people say the Lord's Prayer. In the Syro-Jacobite liturgies there is also a secret prayer, which leads up to the Lord's Prayer thus,—"That we may dare to invoke Thee . . . and pray, and say, Our," &c. (Renaud. ii. 39, 131, &c.). In the Egyptian (Renaud. i. 20, 37, 60, 75, 116) and Nestorian (ii. 595) liturgies, the Lord's Prayer is introduced in a similar manner at the end of the prayer of Fraction.

IV. St. Augustine's expression, "All the faithful hear it" (see above), seems to imply that in Africa the people did not repeat the Lord's Prayer themselves in his time. When Gregory introduced it at Rome, he did not assign it to the congregation. "Among the Greeks, the Lord's Prayer is said by all the people, but among us by the priest alone" (Epist. u. s.). Yet elsewhere in the Latin church they said it. That it was so in France in the 6th century is clear from a story in Gregory of Tours. A dumb woman "on a certain Lord's day stood with the rest of the people. But it came to pass that, when the Lord's Prayer was said, she also opened her mouth and began to sing that holy prayer with the rest" (Mirac. S. Mart. ii. 30). In the Mozarabic Liturgy the people responded "Amen" at the end of the first clause, and the first three petitions: after "Give us this day our daily bread," they responded, "for Thou art God": after the two following petitions, "Amen": and after "Lead us not into temptation," they concluded with "But deliver us from evil" (Leslie, 6). In all the Eastern rites, as in their sources, St. James and St. Mark, this prayer is said by the people. In the Egyptian (Ken. i. 76, 77) and Syro-Jacobite (ii. 40, 131) they begin at "Hallowed be," &c. In the Nestorian, they say it all (Badger, Nestorians, ii. 237; Renaud, ii. 595).

V. St. Augustine more than once alludes to a custom of beating the breast when the words "forgive us our trespasses" were said in the liturgy: "If we are without sin, and we beat our breasts, saying, Forgive, &c., in this very thing at least we sin, even gravely; as no one can doubt; seeing that we lie while the very sacraments are being celebrated" (Serm. 351, 3, § 6. Similarly, Serm. 388, § 2). To what extent this custom prevailed does not appear.

For the form which followed the Lord's Prayer in every ancient liturgy, see EMBOLISMUS.

[W. E. S.]

LORD'S SUPPER (Coena Domini, Coena Domini, Δείπνον Κυριακόν). I. The primary notion was of the Last Supper of our Lord, at which the eucharist was instituted. That, says Hippolytus, A.D. 220, was the "first table of the mystical supper" (in Prov. ix. 1, Fragm.). St. Chrysostom, A.D. 398, commenting on 1 Cor. xi. 20, says that St. Paul, by using the words "Lord's Supper," takes his hearers back to that "evening in which the Lord delivered the awful mysteries" (Hom. 27, in Ep. 1, ad Cor. § 2). With this view, he argues, the apostle called τὸ ἄριστον δεῖπνον, that which in practice was taken early in the day by the name commonly given to the meal which was eaten last (ibid.). Somewhat similarly Pseudo-Dionysius (probably about 520): "The common and peaceable participation of one and the same bread and cup . . . brings (us) to a sacred commemoration of the most divine and archetypal (ἀρχισυμβόλου) supper" (Ecol. Hierarch. c. iii. Cont. iii. § 1). Maximus, the commentator on this book, A.D. 660, here explains that "the mystical supper of the Lord is said to be ἀρχισύμβολον, in relation to the divine mysteries now celebrated" (Solutio in loc.). The "Lord's Supper" was, therefore, in the conception of the early ages of the church, in the first instance and emphatically, that supper of which our Lord partook Himself with His disciples the night before His death, and of which the first reception of the holy eucharist was conceived a part.

II. For some length of time the eucharist was celebrated in connexion with a meal taken by the faithful in common, in resemblance of the Last Supper [AGAPE]. It is probable that at first the whole rite, agape and communion, was called the supper, or the Lord's Supper, partly to veil the sacrament from unbelievers, and partly owing to the language of St. Paul in 1 Cor. xi. 20 being so understood. To illustrate this, we may mention that the word agape itself in one passage appears to cover both the meal and the sacrament. "It is not lawful either to baptize or to make an agape apart from the bishop." This is found in the epistle of St. Ignatius to the church at Smyrna (c. 8), one of those mentioned by Eusebius, and the passage itself is cited by Antiochus Monachus, A.D. 614 (Hom. 124; Migne, No. 89, col. 1822). Now when the compiler of the twelve epistles of Ignatius came to this passage, he expanded the words ὄφει ἀγάπην ποιῆν thus: "Nor to offer, or bring a sacrifice, or celebrate a feast" (δοξῆν). See Cureton's Corpus Ignatianum, 109. Tertullian in 198 describes the agape under the name of a supper: "our Supper shews its nature by its name. It is called that which love is among the Greeks" (Apol. 39). At a later period, when the agape was celebrated with the eucharist on one day of the year only, viz., Maundy Thursday, in commemoration of the institution of the sacrament on that day, it was still called the Lord's Supper. E.g. the council of Carthage, A.D. 397, decrees that the "sacraments of the altar be celebrated only by men fasting excepting on that one day in every year on which the Lord's Supper is celebrated" (can. 29). Three years later St. Augustine, speaking of the custom of bathing at the end of Lent, says that "for this purpose that day was rather chosen in which the Lord's Supper is yearly celebrated" (Epist. 54, vii. § 10). Again, "We compel no one to break their fast (prandere) before that Lord's Supper, but neither do we dare to forbid any one" (ibid. § 9). In 691 the council of Constantinople (can. i. 29) cites the canon of Carthage, as given above, and abolishes the permission which it left.

III. The eucharist was the chief part of the Lord's Supper, whether that name was applied to the occasion of its institution or to the united observance of the first period after Christ. Hence it was almost inevitable that when the unessential part of that observance was dropped, the name should adhere to the sacrament. Some of the Fathers, indeed, thought, as we shall see, that St. Paul applied it directly to the eucharist in 1 Cor. xi. 20; so that the designation had a double origin. It is necessary to bring many testimonies to the extent of this usage, because it has been rashly denied, in a polemical spirit (by Maldonat, Suarez, and others), that the sacrament was called the "Lord's Supper," or a "supper," however qualified, in the early church. Our earliest witness is Tertullian, who paraphrasing the words of St. Paul in 1 Cor. x. 21, says, "We cannot eat the supper of God and the supper of devils" (de Spect. 13). When Hippolytus, as above, calls the institution "the first table of the mystical supper," he implies the night before His the first reception of the received a part.

of time the eucharist was on with a meal taken by on, in resemblance of the

It is probable that at agape and communion, was the Lord's Supper, partly at from unbelievers, and language of St. Paul in understood. To illustrate on that the word agape appears to cover both the ment. "It is not lawful to make an agape apart this is found in the epistle church at Smyrna (c. 8), ed by Eusebius, and the

by Antiochus Monachus, Migne, No. 89, col. 1822), or of the twelve epistles of passage, he expanded the thus: "Nor to offer, celebrate a feast" (ὁμοίαν) Ignatianus, 109. Terse the agape under the "our Supper shows its It is called that which reeks" (Apol. 39). At a the agape was celebrated one day of the year only, day, in commemoration the sacrament on that day, the Lord's Supper. Ep. the A.D. 397, decrees that the altar be celebrated only by on that one day in every rd's Supper is celebrated" ars later St. Augustine, n of bathing at the end of this purpose that day was which the Lord's Supper is p. 54, vii. § 10). Again, break their fast (prandere) upper, but neither do we " (ibid. § 9). In 691 the ple (can. i. 29) cites the given above, and abolishes t left.

was the chief part of the r that name was applied institution or to the united st period after Christ.

inevitable that when th t observance was dropped, e to the sacrament. Some thought, as we shall see, t directly to the eucharist that the designation had a necessary to bring many ent of this usage, because ent in a polemical spirit ez, and others), that the "Lord's Supper," or a qualified, in the early witness is Tertullian, who ds of St. Paul in 1 Cor.

not eat the supper of God devils" (de Spect. 13).

above, calls the institution he the mystical supper," he implies that any subsequent celebration may be so called. Dionysius of Alexandria, A.D. 254, says that Christ "gives Himself to us in the mystical supper" (Tract. c. Samos. R. ad Qu. 7). St. Basil, A.D. 370: "We are instructed neither to eat and drink an ordinary supper in a church, nor to dishonour the Lord's Supper (by celebrating it in a house" (Regulae brevis tract. 310). St. Augustine, A.D. 396, expressly says that St. Paul "calls that reception itself of the eucharist the Lord's Supper" (Ep. 54, v. § 7). Again, "He gave the supper to His disciples consecrated by His own hands; but we have not reclined at that feast, and yet we daily eat the same supper by faith" (Serm. 112, iv.). In the regions of the East most do not partake of the Lord's Supper every day" (In Serm. Dom. ii. 7, § 25). Judas "drew near to the Lord's Supper equally" (with the other apostles) (Tract. 50 in St. Joan. Ev. § 10). "He permitted him to partake of the holy supper with the innocent" (Epist. 93, iv. § 15; Sim. Psalm, c. Part. Dom. di. 16; c. Litt. Petil. ii. 23, § 53; 106, § 243; Enarr. ii. in Pa. xxi. (xxii). § 27). St. Chrysostom, A.D. 398, he says again, "As oft as ye eat it, ye do shew the Lord's death; and this is that supper" (of which St. Paul speaks) (Hom. xxvii. in Ep. i. ad Cor. § 5). "As to draw near at random is perilous, so not to partake of those holy mystical suppers is famine and death" (ibid. § 8). "Believe that even now this is that supper at which He Himself reclined" (Hom. 405 in St. Matt. xiv. 34-36). Pelagius, A.D. 405: "The Lord's Supper ought to be common to all, because He delivered the sacrament equally to all His disciples who were present" (Comment. in Ep. i. ad Cor. (xl. 20); inter Opp. Hieron. v. ii. 997). Cyril of Alexandria, A.D. 412: "Let us run together to the mystical supper" (Hom. x. tom. v. ii. 371, and commonly). Theodoret, 423: "He (St. Paul) calls the Master's mystery the Lord's Supper" (Comment. in Ep. i. ad Cor. xi. 20). St. Nilus, 440: "Keep thyself from all corruption, and be every day partaker of the mystical Supper; for thus the body of Christ begins to be ours" (Paracleticus n. 120). Anastasius Sinaita, 561: "On the 5th day (of Holy Week) He gave the mystic supper which absolves all sin" (in Hexameron v.). Gregory of Tours, 573: "The day on which the Lord delivered the mystic Supper to the disciples" (de Glor. Mart. 24). Hesychius, 601: "The thanksgiving, that is, the oblation which holds the chief place in the Lord's Supper" (in Levit. p. 146 c.). The sacrament is frequently called by this author the mystical or the divine "Supper" (ibid.). Since the time of Justinian the Second, A.D. 688 (Leo. Allat. de Domin. Graec. xxi.), the choir have sung on Maundy Thursday in the Liturgy of St. Basil, "Make me this day, O Son of God, a partaker of Thy mystic Supper" (Goar, Euchel. 170). The foregoing testimonies appear to give an ample sanction to the usage of the Church of England, and to the statement of the Catechism of Trent, that "the most ancient Fathers, following the authority of the apostle, sometimes called the sacred eucharist also by the name of supper" (P. li. de Euch. v.).

LORD'S SUPPER

IV. In the 8th century we first find the name 'Coena Domini' given to Maundy Thursday, but generally then with some addition or explanation. ANT.—VOL. II.

LORD'S TABLE 1059

nation. The earliest example known to the writer occurs in a document of the year 519, "Quinta feria, hoc est, Coena Domini" (Exempl. Supp. 2ae Germani, inter Epp. Hormisdas, Labbe, Conc. iv. 1488). Gregory of Tours, A.D. 573, uses the phrase "Day of the Lord's Supper" (Hist. Franc. ii. 21), and calls its rites "Dominicane Coenae Pascae" (ibid. viii. 43). The first council of Mâcon, 581, "Coena Domini usque ad primum Pascae" (Can. 14). Isidore of Seville, 610, calls it Coena Domini in the heading of a chapter, but explains, as if the usage were not familiar, "This 'Supper of the Lord' is the fifth day of the last week of Lent" (de Eccl. Off. i. 28). The Besançon sacramentary, written later in the 7th century, gives an "Epistle of St. Paul to the Corinthians to be read on Coena Domini" (Mus. Ital. i. 315). The Gallican Lectionary also gives "Lessons for Coena Domini at Matins" (Liturg. Gallic. 128). In the first Ordo Romanus, probably about A.D. 730, the day is called both Feria quinta Coenae Domini, and Coena Domini (Mus. Ital. ii. 19, 30-33). A law of Carloman, in 742, says, "On Coena Domini let him (the presbyter) always seek fresh chrism from the bishop" (c. iii. in Capit. Reg. Franc. 147. So a law of Charlemagne in 769, col. 192). In 744 a chapter of Pepin ordered "every presbyter always on Coena Domini to give to the bishop a statement of the method and order of his ministry" (c. 4; u. s. i. 158). In the capitularies of the French kings is an order that "the presbyter on Coena Domini take with him two ampullae, one for the chrism, another for the oil to anoint catechumens and the sick" (L. i. c. 156). See other instances (coll. 824, 865, 953, &c.). It is evident that this singular designation of a day had quite established itself by the end of the 8th century. See MAUNDY THURSDAY. [W. E. S.]

LORD'S TABLE. I. For more than three hundred years after the institution of the sacrament the altar is but once called a table in the genuine remains of Christian writers. The exception occurs in an epistle of Dionysius of Alexandria (A.D. 254) to Xystus of Rome. He speaks of a communicant as "standing at the Table" (Euseb. Hist. Eccles. vii. 9). The next instance is a full century later, viz. in the commentary of Hilary the deacon, 354: "When he partakes of the table of devils, he outrages the Lord's Table, i. e. the altar" (Comm. in 1 Cor. x. 21). The explanation in the last words implies that the same remark applies to a passage in the Disput. c. Arvanos ascribed to Athanasius, but certainly later. The table in Prov. ix. 2 is there understood of "the Table" prepared by Christ, "That is, the holy altar" (c. 17; App. Opp. Athan. iii. 164). The usage was never general in the West, and the examples found in the Greek writers of the 4th and 5th centuries, considering how much they have left, are not really numerous. The following are from every great division of the church:—St. Basil, A.D. 370, says that the orthodox in the district of Gangra "overthrew the altars" of the heretic Basilides and "set up their own Tables" (Epist. 226). Paulinus in Italy, 398: "There is every where one cup and one food of the Lord, and one Table and house of God" (Poema 17). Prudentius in Spala, A. D. 405, "calls the altar dedicated to God" poetically, illa sacramenti donatrix Mensa (de Coron. Hymn. 9). St. Augustine in Roman Africa, writing probably in 416: "The sacrament is prepared on the Lord's Table (in Dominica Mensa), and is taken from (de) the Lord's Table" (Tract. 26 in Joan. Ev. § 15). Cyril of Alexandria not many years later speaks of the "holy Table" (adv. Nestor. 4; vii. 116). Socrates, 439, relates of Alexander the bishop of Alexandria that in the distress caused by the apparent triumph of Arius, he "entered the altar-place and prostrated himself on his face beneath the sacred Table" (Hist. Eccl. i. 37). At a later period the name of Mensa was, in the Latin church, generally given to the slab alone, while the whole structure was called an altar. In the east on the other hand, the latter name became infrequent; the phrases "holy Table" (ἅγια τραπέζα) or "sacred Table" (ἱερά τρ.) being used instead. It will be sufficient to refer here to the rubrics of some ancient liturgies. That of St. James has, "When the priest sets the cup on the holy Table" (Trollope, 111). St. Basil, "The holy mysteries being removed from the sacred Table" (Coar, 175); "the setting down of the divine gifts upon the holy Table" (164). St. Chrysostom similarly has both "sacred" (82) and "holy (72, 73, 74, &c.) Table." The Armenian, "holy table" only (Neale's Introd. 582, 594, &c.). The rubrics of SS. Basil and Chrysostom do not employ the word "altar"; but it occurs in those of the earlier St. James (p. 36), St. Mark (Renaud. Liturg. Orient. i. 141) and St. Clement (Constit. Apost. viii. 12), the two latter using no other. We find it also in the Armenian rubrics (394, 432), in those of the Coptic St. Basil (Renaud. i. 4, 5, &c.); the Greek Alexandrian of St. Gregory (Ibid. 91), the Ethiopian (500), the Syrian Ordo Communis (with "table of life") (ibid. ii. 42), and the Nestorian (Ibid. 566, &c.). "Table" does not occur in the Nestorian rubrics. We cannot ascribe them to the age of Nestorius, but the fact witnesses to the early usage of the churches which became infested with his heresy. They adhered to the tradition of Ignatius and the sub-apostolic period, while the Syro-Jacobites, who separated from the church later, reflect the language of a later age.

II. We have cited a poem of Paulinus, in which he calls the altar "the table of God." That such language was not usual in Italy in his time appears certain from the fact that the same author in a prose composition gives the name of the "Lord's Table" to a table, as it is thought, in the Gazophylacium on which were set the gifts brought for the use of the poor. "Let us not suffer the Lord's Table to be left void for ourselves and empty for the poor" (Serm. 34, § 1); "Thou wilt know how much more profitable it is to put money out to increase on the Lord's Table" (§ 2). Our inference will hold, if Paulinus by the "Lord's Table" means a chest in the treasury, or even if it be a figure for the alms themselves.

III. The phrase "Lord's Table," "mystical Table," &c., are frequently used by ancient writers to denote not the structure (the use of which is, however, implied in them), but the Holy Communion itself. This usage may have arisen from the language of St. Paul (1 Cor. x. 21); it would certainly be fostered by it. For while some, as Hilary the deacon (Comm. in loco, "Mense Domini, i. e. altari"), understood "the Lord's Table" of the altar, others, as Theodoret (in loc.), supposed the sacramental feast to be intended. Thus the latter paraphrases, "How is it possible for us to have communion with the Lord through His preclous body and blood, and with the devil-toe, through the food that has been offered to idols?" This use of those terms is, however, common without any reference to 1 Cor. x. 21. Thus Gregory Nazianzen, A. D. 374: "Reverence the mystic table to which thou hast come; the bread thou hast received, the cup of which thou hast partaken" (Orat. 40, de Baptismo, l. 660). St. Ambrose, 374: "The mystical table is prepared for by fasting . . . That table is attained at the cost of hunger, and that cup . . . is sought by a thirst for the heavenly sacraments" (de Elia, x. § 33). St. Augustine, 396: "Thou hast sat down at a great table (Proc. xxiii. 1) . . . What is that great table, but that from which we receive the body and blood of Christ?" (Serm. 31, § 2; Sim. S. 304, § 1; 328, § 1; 332, § 2; Tract. 47, in St. Joan. Ev. § 3.) On the words "the poor shall eat and be satisfied" (Ps. xxii. 30), "for they have been brought to the table of Christ, and received of His body and blood" (de Gratia, N. T. 27, § 66). Again, after speaking of a "life-giving feast" which "Christ gave to His church, "satiating us with His body, inebriating us with His blood," he says, "the church exults, fed and quickened by this table, against them that trouble her" (Serm. 367, § 6). St. Chrysostom, 398: "With a pure conscience touch the sacred table, and partake of the holy sacrifice" (Hom. vi. in Pomic. ii. 326). "On the festivals they come anyhow to this table" (Hom. vi. de Philog. i. 499). St. Hilary, 430: "There is a table of the Lord from which (ex qua) we take food, to wit, of the Living Bread . . . There is also the table of the Lord's lessons, at which we are fed with the meat of spiritual teaching" (Tract. in Ps. 127, § 10). Anastasius Sinaita, 561: "Many never trouble themselves about the self-cleansing and repentance with which they come to the sacred table; but with what garments they are adorned" (de Sacra Synaxi; Migne, 120. 89, col. 830). As the lay communicants did not "sit at," "touch," or even "come to" the material table or altar (see Scudamore, Notitia Eucharistica, 361, 702, ed. 2), the foregoing passages cannot be understood of that. There are many, however, which must be understood of it, though from the inappropriate epithets employed, they appear at first sight to speak of the sacrament, e. g., "I am not worthy to look towards this thy sacred and spiritual Table." This occurs in a prayer or preparation said before the priest places himself at the altar in the liturgy of St. James (Trollope, p. 27). [W. E. S.]

LOT. [SORTILEGE.]

LOUTIERN is invoked in the Breton liturgy given by Haddan and Stubbs (ii. 82). [C. H.]

LOVE-FEAST. [AGAPÆ.]

LUBENTIUS, presbyter and confessor of Treves, commemorated Oct. 13 (Usuard. Act. Boll. Acta SS. Oct. vi. 202). [C. H.]

encon (Comm. in loco, "Men-1"), understood "the Lord's others, as Theodoret (in loc.), mental feast to be intended.
phrases, "How is it possible union with the Lord through d blood, and with the devil's that has been offered to
of these terms is, however,
reference to 1 Cor. x. 21.
lanzen, A.D. 374: "Reverto which thou hast come to received, the cup of which" (Orat. 40, de Baptismo), rosa, 374: "The mystical of fasting . . . That table is by hunger, and that cup . . .
for the heavenly sacra-(33). St. Augustine, 398:
at a great table (Proo-
at that great table, but that ive the body and blood of § 2; Sim. S. 304, § 1; 320, 47, in St. Joan. Ev. § 3.)
oor shall eat and be satis-
"for they have been brought it, and received of His body ia, N. T. 27, § 66). Again,
"life-giving feast" which church, "satiating us with us with His blood," he ults, fed and quickened by em that trouble her" (Serm.
rysostom, 398: "With a
in the sacred table, and purifice" (Hom. vi. in Pocat.
festivals they come anyhow
i. vi. de Philog. i. 499).
St. re is a table of the Lord
we take food, to wit, of the ere is also the table of the
which we are fed with the aching" (Tract. in Ps. 127, sinaita, 561: "Many never about the self-cleansing which they come to the with what garments they are Synaxi; Migne, 120. 89, col.
communicants did not "sit in "come to" the material Scudamore, Notitia Eucha-
2), the foregoing passages of that. There are many,
to be understood of it, though e epithets employed, they
to speak of the sacrament,
y to look towards this thy Table." This occurs in a n and before the priest
e altar in the liturgy of St.
77). [W. E. S.]

[E.]

oked in the Breton liturgy
1 Stubba (ii. 82). [C. H.]

[AGAPAE.]

resbyter and confessor of ed Oct. 13 (Usuard, Auct.
i. 202). [C. H.]

LUBERCUS

LUBERCUS, martyr of Caesarea in Spain, commemorated April 15 (Hieron. Mart.). Lu-bertus occurs for this day in the Auctaria of Bede. [C. H.]

LUCANIA, martyr in Africa, commemorated
Dec. 18 (Hieron. Mart.). [C. H.]

LUCANUS (1), African martyr, commemorated
April 28 (Bede, Mart. Auct.).

(2) Bishop of Sabiona, commemorated at Belunum July 20 (Acta SS. Jul. v. 70). [C. H.]

LUCAS (1) (ST. LUKE), evangelist, commemorated generally on Oct. 18. At Jerusalem, March 15 was set apart to him and to St. James the Apostle; at Aquileia, Sept. 3 was observed for the "ingressio reliquiarum" of St. Andrew, St. Luke, and St. John; in the city "Piralice," St. Luke's natalis was kept on Sept. 21 (Hieron.
Mart.). In the Auctaria of Bede, and in the Ethiopic Calendar, October 19 is assigned to St. Luke. The relics of St. Luke, with those of St. Andrew and St. Timothy, are said to have been transferred by order of the emperor Con-stantinus to Constantinople, and there deposited in the church of the Apostles [ANDREW, p. 82].
(Hieron. cont. Vigilantium: Patrol. Lat. xxii. 345; Basil. Menol. Oct. 18). St. Luke's translation was observed "in Oriente" on Oct. 18 (Hieron.
Mart.), and his natalis on the same day (Usuard, Mart.; Bede, Mart.). His commemoration generally is given under Oct. 18 in Basil, Menol.
and Cal. Byzant. See also Boll. Acta SS. Oct. viii.
310.

The sacramentary of Gregory (p. 136) has a collect for St. Luke's natalis, which is assigned to Oct. 18; it prays the Lord for St. Luke's intercession; but the festival is omitted in some MSS. Kræmer (de Liturgiis, 497) states the general belief that St. Mark and St. Luke are not mentioned in the Roman canon in the prayer Communicantes because of the uncertainty as to the fact of their martyrdom. Ciampini (de Sacr. Aedif.) does not mention any churches dedicated to St. Luke, but he cites various authors explaining why the vitulus of the Apocalypse was assigned as the symbol of this evangelist (Vet. Mon. i. 192). [EVANGELISTS IN ART, l. 633.] [C. H.]

(2) Deacon at Emesa, martyr with bishop Silvanus and the reader Mocius; commemorated
Feb. 6 (Basil, Menolog.; Jan. 29 (Byzant.)).

(3) Called "our father Lucas," of Sterion in Greece, commemorated with "our father Parthe-nius," bishop of Lampascus, on Feb. 7 (Cal.
Byzant.).

(4) Bishop, martyr of Caesarea in Cappadocia, commemorated March 2 (Bede, Mart. Auct.).

(5) Bishop and martyr at Nicomedia, commemorated March 15 (Bede, Mart. Auct.).

(6) Martyr in Africa, commemorated March
20 (Hieron. Mart.).

(7) Deacon and martyr at Cordula, commemorated April 22 (Usuard, Mart.; Vet. Rom. Mart.; Bede, Mart.). The name in Bede is Lucus.

(8) Martyr at Milan, commemorated Nov. 27
(Hieron. Mart.).

(9) Stylite, commemorated Dec. 11 (TAKSAAS, 15), (Cal. Aethiop.). [C. H.]

LUCIANUS

1061

LUCIA. [LUCIA.]

LUCELLA (1) Martyr at Nicomedia, commemorated Feb. 16, Mar. 25 (Hieron. Mart.).

(2) Martyr in Africa, commemorated May 7
(Hieron. Mart.).

(3) Martyr at Rome, commemorated May 10
(Hieron. Mart.).

(4) Martyr, commemorated Aug. 10 (Hieron.
Mart.) [C. H.]

LUCELLUS, martyr in Africa, commemorated March 19 (Hieron. Mart.). [C. H.]

LUCERNAE. [LIGHTS.]

LUCERNARIA, virgin, commemorated July
30 (Vet. Rom. Mart.). [C. H.]

LUCERUS, martyr, Jan. 18 (Aengus), appears as Luricus in the Mart. Hieron. Perhaps the name should be Glycerus. [E. B. B.]

LUCETELLA, martyr, commemorated Mar.
13 (Hieron. Mart.). [C. H.]

LUCIA (1) Virgin, commemorated Feb. 19
(Cal. Aethiop.).

(2) Virgin, martyr at Thessalonica, commemorated June 1 (Hieron. Mart.; Boll.
Acta SS. June, i. 48).

(3) Virgin, martyr at Rome, commemorated June 24 (Hieron. Mart.), and on June 25 (Vet.
Mart. Rom.).

(4) Virgin, martyr in Campania, commemorated July 6 (Basil, Menol.).

(5) Noble matron at Rome, martyr, commemorated with SS. Geminianus and Euphemia on Sept. 16 (Usuard, Mart.; Bede, Mart.; Vet.
Rom. Mart.; Boll. Acta SS. Sept. vi. 286). In Gregory's Sacramentary Sept. 16 is assigned as a festival to Lucia and Geminianus, neither of whom are named in the collect, though Euphemia, who is also separately commemorated on that day, is (Greg. Mag. Lb. Sac. 130). The "natalis" (no day being named) of Euphemia, Lucia, and Geminianus, occurs in the Antiphona-rium, but their names are not in the collect (Greg. Mag. Lb. Antiph. 710). Basil's Meno-logy assigns Sept. 17 to Lucia, widow, and Geminianus jointly.

(6) [St. Lucy of Anglican Calendar] Virgin, martyr at Syracuse under Diocletian, commemorated on Dec. 13 (Hieron. Mart.; Bede, Mart.; Usuard, Mart.; Vet. Rom. Mart.; Cal. Byzant.).
She is one of those mentioned in the canon (Greg. Mag. Lb. Sac. 4, 290 n.) occurring in connexion with Agatha and Agnes. There is a special service for her day and vigil (day of the month not mentioned) in the Liber Respons- alis (842). In the Liber Antiphonarum (654)
the festival of "St. Lucia, virgin," occurs between the second and third Sundays in Advent,
but the collect does not contain her name.

(7) Virgin, martyr, commemorated at Antioch.
Dec. 14 (Hieron. Mart.). [C. H.]

LUCIANA (1) Martyr in Africa, commemorated Feb. 23 (Hieron. Mart.).

(2) Martyr at Constantinople, commemorated
May 18 (Hieron. Mart.).

(3) Martyr in Lucania, commemorated Oct.
29 (Hieron. Mart.). [C. H.]

LUCIANUS (1) Bishop and confessor at Leontium in Sicily, commemorated Jan. 3 (Acta SS. Jan. i. 136).

LUCIANUS (2) Martyr in Africa, commemorated Jan. 5 (Hieron. Mart.; Florus ap. Bed. Mart.).

(3) Presbyter of the church of Antioch, martyr at Nicomedia, commemorated Jan. 7 (Hieron. Mart.; Florus ap. Bed. Mart.; Usuard, Mart.; Vet. Rom. Mart.; Acta SS. Jan. i. 357). The Mencology of Basil and Daniel (Cod. Lit. iv. 371) place him under Oct. 15.

(4) Martyr at Beauvais, called both presbyter and bishop (Hieron. Mart.; Usuard, Mart.; Florus ap. Bed. Mart.; Acta SS. Jan. i. 459).

(5) Martyr with Paula and others; commemorated Jan. 19 (Acta SS. Jan. ii. 220).

(6) Martyr at Ravenna, commemorated Feb. 1 (Hieron. Mart.).

(7) Martyr at Nicomedia, commemorated Feb. 22, and another at the same place, Feb. 24 (Hieron. Mart.). Feb. 24 (Florus ap. Bed. Mart.; Acta SS. Feb. iii. 460).

(8) Martyr in Campania, commemorated Mar. 18 (Hieron. Mart.; Bed. Mart. Auct.).

(9) Martyr at Caesarea in Spain; commemorated April 15; also a bishop and confessor of the same place, on the same day (Hieron. Mart.).

(10) Martyr in Pontus, commemorated April 16 (Hieron. Mart.). Bede's Auctaria mentions him on the same day, at a place unknown.

(11) Martyr in Africa, commemorated April 28 (Hieron. Mart.).

(12) Martyr at Terni, commemorated May 27 (Hieron. Mart.; Bed. Mart. Auct.).

(13) Martyr in Sardinia, commemorated May 28 (Hieron. Mart.; Usuard, Mart.; Bed. Mart. Auct.).

(14) Martyr at Rome, commemorated June 3 (Hieron. Mart.).

(15) Martyr at Caesarea in Cappadocia, commemorated June 7 (Hieron. Mart.; Vet. Rom. Mart.; Acta SS. June, ii. 8).

(16) Martyr in Africa, commemorated June 13 (Hieron. Mart.; Bed. Mart.; Acta SS. June ii. 678).

(17) Martyr with Peregrinus at Dyrrachium; commemorated July 7 (Basil, Menol.).

(18) Martyr at Antioch, commemorated July 19 (Hieron. Mart.).

(19) Martyr in Africa, commemorated July 26 (Hieron. Mart.; Bed. Mart. Auct.).

(20) Martyr at Ancyra in Galatia, commemorated Aug. 31 (Hieron. Mart.).

(21) Martyr in Cappadocia, commemorated Oct. 14 (Hieron. Mart.).

(22) Martyr at Florence, commemorated Oct. 25 (Bede, Mart. Auct.).

(23) Martyr at Nicomedia, commemorated Oct. 26 (Hieron. Mart.).

(24) Martyr in Africa, commemorated Oct. 30 (Hieron. Mart.).

(25) Martyr at Caesarea, commemorated Nov. 18 (Hieron. Mart.; Florus ap. Bed. Mart.).

(26) Martyr, commemorated Nov. 25, but no place mentioned (Hieron. Mart.).

(27) Martyr in Africa, commemorated Dec. 1 (Hieron. Mart.).

LUCIANUS (28) Martyr at Tripoli, commemorated Dec. 24 (Usuard, Mart.). [C. H.]

LUCIDEUS, Martyr in Africa, commemorated Jan. 3 (Hieron. Mart.). [C. H.]

LUCIFERUS, bishop in Sardinia, commemorated May 20 (Acta SS. May, v. 187,* vii. 819). [C. H.]

LUCILLA (1) Martyr in Africa, commemorated Mar. 19 (Bed. Mart. Auct.).

(2) Martyr at Nicea, with 400 others, commemorated Mar. 25 (Bed. Mart. Auct.).

(3) Daughter of deacon Nemesius, martyr at Rome, commemorated Aug. 27 (Florus ap. Bed. Mart.), but Oct. 31 according to Usuard. [C. H.]

LUCILLIANUS, aged martyr at Byzantium, commemorated June 3 (Cal. Byzant.; Basil, Menol.; Daniel, Cod. Liturg. iv. 260; Acta SS. June, i. 274). [C. H.]

LUCINA, Roman matron, "discipula apostolorum," martyr at Rome; commemorated June 30 (Usuard, Mart.; Vet. Rom. Mart.; Acta SS. June, v. 533). [C. H.]

LUCINA. In the Diurnum Romanum, i. 7, c. 17, we find: "Sed dispensator qui pro tempore fuerit in eadem venerabili diaconia (i.e. quando lucina perficitur in eadem diaconia pro remissione peccatorum nostrorum), omnes diaconites et pauperes Christi, qui ibidem conveniunt Kyrie elaison exclamare student." Deaconess supposes lucina here either to be synonymous with LUCERNA, the lamplighting, or to be a mistake for LITANIA. But in another instance that he quotes, "quantum vix in undecim lucinia laborare poterant," where he supposes it to mean simply 'days,' it would be more natural to take it for some special occasion of busy labour. Whether a great baptism day, or a great almsgiving day, or what else might be meant by it, and whether the name be taken from the church of San Lorenzo in Lucina, or the church named from the office, must be matters of pure conjecture. [E. B. B.]

LUCINUS (1) Martyr "in Afrodiris," commemorated April 30 (Hieron. Mart.).

(2) Two martyrs of this name at Rome were commemorated on May 10 (Hieron. Mart.).

(3) Martyr at Rome, commemorated July 10 (Hieron. Mart.). [C. H.]

LUCIOLA, two martyrs of this name, one in Africa, the other it is not said where, were commemorated March 3 (Hieron. Mart.). [C. H.]

LUCIOSA (1) Martyr, it is not said where, commemorated Feb. 25 (Hieron. Mart.).

(2) Martyr at Thessalonica, commemorated Feb. 27 (Hieron. Mart.).

(3) Martyr, it is not said where, commemorated Mar. 2 (Hieron. Mart.).

(4) Martyr at Rome, commemorated June 2 (Hieron. Mart.). [C. H.]

LUCIOSUS, martyr at Constantinople, commemorated May 18 (Hieron. Mart.; Bede, Mart. Auct.). [C. H.]

LUCIUS (1) Confessor at Alexandria, commemorated Jan. 11 (Hieron. Mart.).

martyr at Tripoli, commended. Mart.. [C. H.]
 r in Africa, commemo-
 rted. [C. H.]
 in Sardinia, commemo-
 SS. May, v. 197,* vii.
 [C. H.]
 r in Africa, commemo-
 t. Auct..
 with 400 others, com-
 i. Mart. Auct..
 on Nemesius, martyr at Aug. 27 (Florus ap.
 according to Usnard.
 [C. H.]
 ed martyr at Byzantium, (Cal. Byzant.; Basil, turg. iv. 260; Acta SS.
 [C. H.]
 atron, "discipula apo-Rome; commemorated
 rt.; Vet. Rom. Mart.;
 [C. H.]
Dionium Romanum, i. 7, ensator qui pro tempore
 sili diaconia (i.e. quando em Diaconia pro remisrum), omnes diaconites
 qui ibidem conveniunt studeant." Ducange supposed to be synonymous with ting, or to be a mistake
 other instances that he undecim lucinis laborare poses it to mean simply e natural to take it for busy labour. Whether a great almsgiving day,
 eant by it, and whether m the church of San
 the church named from era of pure conjecture.
 [E. B. B.]
 r "in Afrodiris," commended. Mart..
 this name at Rome
 May 10 (Hieron. Mart.).
 commemorated July 10
 [C. H.]
 tyrs of this name, one s not said where, were (Hieron. Mart.).
 [C. H.]
 r, it is not said where,
 (Hieron. Mart.).
 alonica, commemorated
 said where, commemorted. Mart..
 commemorated June 2
 [C. H.] at Constantinople, commended. Mart.; Bebe,
 [C. H.]
 or at Alexandria, commended. Mart..

LUCIUS

LUCIUS (2) Two martyrs of this name were commemorated Jan. 19 (Hieron. Mart.).
 (3) Martyr at Tarragona, commemorated
 Jan. 21 (Hieron. Mart.).
 (4) Martyr at Apollonia, commemorated Jan.
 27 (Hieron. Mart.). An African martyr of this name was commemorated the same day (Acta SS. Jan. ii. 768).
 (5) Martyr in the city of Augusta (London)
 in Britain, commemorated Feb. 7 (Hieron.
Mart.).
 (6) Martyr, commemorated Feb. 8, but it is not said where (Hieron. Mart.).
 (7) Bishop, martyr at Hadrianople, commemorated Feb. 11 (Acta SS. Feb. ii. 519).
 (8) Martyr at Interamna, commemorated Feb.
 15 (Hieron. Mart.).
 (9) Martyr, commemorated March 2, but it is not said where (Hieron. Mart.). A bishop and martyr of this name at Caesarea in Cappa-docia was commemorated on the same day (Acta SS. Mar. i. 130).
 (10) Pope and martyr, commemorated on Mar. 4 (Vet. Rom. Mart.; Bebe, Mart. Auct.; Acta SS. Mar. i. 301). Two martyrs of this name at Rome, but without any designations, are mentioned in the Mart. of Jerome under this day.
 Florus (ap. Bebe Mart.) gives the bishop and martyr of Rome under Aug. 25.
 (11) Martyr in Nicomedia, commemorated
 March 13 (Hieron. Mart.).
 (12) Bishop and martyr in Cappadocia, commemorated March 15 (Hieron. Mart.). The Acta SS. (Mar. ii. 391) say that Cappadocia should be Nicomedia.
 (13) Martyr at Alexandria, commemorated
 March 21 (Hieron. Mart.).
 (14) Of Cyrene, commemorated May 6 (Acta SS. May, ii. 99); the Menology of Basil makes him martyred at Cyprus, Aug. 21.
 (15) Martyr of Alexandria, commemorated
 May 13 (Hieron. Mart.).
 (16) Martyr in Africa, commemorated May 23 (Bebe, Mart. Auct.). Hieron. Mart. names him Lucus.
 (17) Martyr in Sardinia, commemorated May
 28 (Hieron. Mart.).
 (18) Martyr at Navedunum (Nyoon), commemorated June 6 (Hieron. Mart.). The Acta
SS. (June, ii. 632) mention Lucius and Aman-tius, martyrs of Parma, under this day, but leave the period uncertain.
 (19) Martyr in the city of Dorostorum, commemorated June 8 (Hieron. Mart.).
 (20) Senator, martyr in Cyprus, commemorated Aug. 20 (Acta SS. Aug. iv. 28).
 (21) Bishop and martyr in Africa, commemorated Sept. 10 (Usnard. Mart.).
 (22) Martyr with Chaeremon and others at Alexandria, or perhaps elsewhere in Egypt, commemorated Oct. 4 (Acta SS. Oct. iv. 329).
 (23) Martyr in Africa, commemorated Oct.
 18 (Hieron. Mart.; Acta SS. Oct. viii. 344).
 (24) Martyr with Tertius at Antioch, buried at Alexandria, commemorated Oct. 19 (Vet.
Rom. Mart.).
 (25) Martyr at Nicomedia, commemorated
 Oct. 20 (Hieron. Mart.; Bebe, Mart. Auct.).

LUDI SACERDOTALES 1063

LUCIUS (26) One of four "soldiers of Christ," martyred at Rome under Claudius, commemorated Oct. 25 (Bebe, Mart.).
 (27) Martyr at Rome, commemorated Oct. 27
 (Hieron. Mart.).
 (28) Martyr, but it is not said where, commemorated Oct. 28 (Hieron. Mart.).
 (29) Martyr in Lucania, commemorated Oct.
 29 (Hieron. Mart.).
 (30) Martyr at Rome, commemorated Dec. 1
 (Hieron. Mart.).
 (31) Martyr, commemorated Dec. 14 (Daniel, Cod. Liturg. iv. 277).
 (32) Martyr in Africa, commemorated Dec.
 15 (Hieron. Mart.; Bebe, Mart. Auct.). [C. H.] LUCOSA, martyr at Antioch, commemorated on Mar. 5 (Hieron. Mart.). [C. H.] LUCRATIVE TAX (Descriptio Lucrative- rum, and also unioae and denarismus). A payment made to the Curiales of a city by the inheritors of an estate bequeathed to any one not a member of the Curia. Property left to the church was exempted from this payment by a law of Justinian. [IMMUNITIES AND PRIVILEGES
 OF THE CLERGY, sect. ii. § 8; I. 826.] [S. J. E.]
 LUCRE. [COVETOUSNESS.]
 LUCRETIA, virgin and martyr at Emerita (Merida), commemorated Nov. 23 (Usnard.
Mart.). [C. H.]
 LUCRITUS, martyr in Africa, commemorated on Jan. 14 (Hieron. Mart.). [C. H.] LUCROSA, martyr at Augustodunum (Autun), commemorated on Sept. 24 (Hieron.
Mart.). [C. H.]
 LUCUS (1) Martyr in Greece, commemorated Jan. 8 (Hieron. Mart.).
 (2) Martyr in Africa, commemorated Jan. 18
 (Hieron. Mart.).
 (3) Martyr with Musas, both deacons at Cordula, commemorated April 22 (Bebe, Mart.).
 (4) Martyr in Africa, commemorated April 24
 (Hieron. Mart.).
 (5) Martyr at Constantinople, commemorated
 May 8 (Hieron. Mart.).
 (6) Martyr at Alexandria, commemorated
 May 18 (Hieron. Mart.).
 (7) Martyr in Africa, commemorated May
 23 (Hieron. Mart.).
 (8) Martyr at Rome, commemorated June 2
 (Hieron. Mart.).
 (9) Martyr at Rome, commemorated June 12
 (Hieron. Mart.).
 (10) Martyr at Alexandria, commemorated
 Aug. 9 (Hieron. Mart.).
 (11) Martyr at Alexandria, commemorated
 Aug. 16 (Hieron. Mart.).
 (12) Martyr in Mauritania, commemorated
 Oct. 17 (Hieron. Mart.). [C. H.]
 LUCUSA, martyr at Rome, commemorated
 May 10 (Hieron. Mart.). [C. H.] LUDDULUS, martyr, it is not said where,
 commemorated Oct. 9 (Hieron. Mart.). [C. H.] LUDI SACERDOTALES. A law of the Emperor Theodosius the younger (Cod. Theod.

lib. vii. tit. 13; de Tironibus Leg. 22) releases certain persons in the proconsular province of Africa from payment of the tax known as aurum tironicum, a sum of money levied in lieu of the contingent of recruits to the legions which every province was liable to render. And these persons are denominated sacerdotes. The question arises, what class of persons are denoted by this term? There are two theories; the one that the persons intended were heathen priests, who were obliged by their office to exhibit ludos to the people at great expense; whence the reason for their exemption (Gothofred, Comment. in Cod. Theod. in loc.) The exhibition of ludi was no doubt a very expensive charge. But there appears to have been no kind of these games which the priests were bound to exhibit at their own expense (see DICTIONARY OF GR. AND ROM. ANTIQ. s. v. Ludi), whilst those few in which they and not the aediles took the chief place, for the most part belong, as e.g. the Liberalla, to the class of feriae stativae, and entailed little trouble or expense in their celebration. Apart therefore from the difficulty of supposing a Christian emperor to be founding a special exemption for the benefit of the heathen priesthood, which the Christian clergy were not to share, the reasons adduced appear not to be conclusive. Tertullian (Apol. c. ix.) mentions incidentally the absolute prohibition by law of the sacrifices to Saturn throughout this very province of Africa, in the reign of Thierius.

The other theory, maintained by Petit (Variar. Lect.), regards the Christian bishops as being the persons thus exempted. It is hardly probable that bishops should be classed with the heathen priests under the common title sacerdotes, a course which both parties would have resented as an insult. And it is not clear what in the case of bishops could have been the "majoribus expensis," which are alleged as the reason for this exemption. Yet this is perhaps to be preferred as the solution of an obscure question.

[S. J. E.]

LUGIDUS (LUANUS), abbat of Cluinfernt in Ireland, commemorated Aug. 4 (Acta SS. Aug. i. 339).

LUGLIUS and LUGLIANUS, brothers, martyred at Lillierum in Artois and Mondiderium in Picardy, see. vii., commemorated Oct. 23 (Acta SS. Oct. x. 117).

[C. H.]

LUGO, COUNCIL OF (Lucense Concilium), held at Lugo, in Gallicia, by order of king Theodemir, A.D. 569, to lay down the bounds of the different sees in his dominions, with a view of curtailing any that were too large, which was accordingly done; Lugo thus itself becoming a metropolitan see. We find from the sees enumerated that his dominions extended into Portugal. The last named is called that of the Britons, and had thirteen churches belonging to them, and one monastery, given to it. A second council is supposed, by Mansi and others, to have taken place A.D. 572; the only real foundation for it being, that Martin, bishop of Braga, transmitted the collection of canons approved at Braga that year in a letter to the metropolitan of Lugo, with this address: "Nitigesio episcopo, vel universo concilio Lucensis ecclesiae;" which need not imply that any council was then sitting, or about to sit. (Mansi, ix. 815, et seq., with the later divisions appended there, and 845.)

[E. S. F.]

LUGUSTA, martyr in Africa, commemorated May 19 (Hieron. Mart.).

[C. H.]

LUKE, ST., THE EVANGELIST (IN ART). [See EVANGELISTS, I. 633.] Martigny refers to Borgia (De Cruce Veliterna, p. 133) for an engraving of a brazen cross, probably of the 8th or 9th century, which bears on its extremities busts of the four evangelists in person, instead of the symbolic creatures. Here St. Luke, like the others, bears a closed book in one hand and points to it with the other. It has been supposed that the evangelists are also personally represented on sarcophagi, as in that of Probus and Proba (Bottari, tav. xvi.; and at pl. cxxxi. in particular). In this last example, three figures hold the volume or roll, and stand in all probability for St. Matthew, St. John, and St. Mark. But the roll or book is frequently placed in the hands of all or any of the apostles. However, in a sepulchral urn, No. 36, in the Museum of Art, the apostles are represented with books rolled up, and the remaining four with them unfolded: the names are written on the rolls; St. Luke's as LYCANVA. The non-apostolic evangelists are, however, seldom added to the number of the twelve.

M. Perret (in Catacombes de Rome, vol. ii. pl. lxvi.) publishes a greatly damaged fresco from an arcosolium in the cemetery of Saint "Zoticus," wherever that may be. However, the fresco represents four standing figures, each of whom has at his feet a "seriunum" full of rolls. The two letters MA are legible near one of them, which may be St. Matthew or St. Mark. St. Luke must be one of the others. He is also represented among the four evangelists in the mosaics of the baptisteries of Ravenna (Ciampini, Vet. Monumenta, tab. lxxii. A.D. 451). Four figures holding books cannot well be other than the writers of the Gospels, though Ciampini expresses some doubt as to the subject of the painting.

The earliest representation of St. Luke as a painter is in the Menologium of Basil II., A.D. 980. See D'Agincourt, Peinture, pl. xxxi., where the Virgin is sitting to him in a pleasant garden scene (perhaps on a house top), which reminds us of some of Fra Angelico's works. [R. St. J. T.]

LUKE, ST. [LUCAS (1).]

LULUS, archbishop of Mainz, commemorated Oct. 16 (Acta SS., Oct. vii. pt. 2, p. 1083).

[C. H.]

LUMINARE. [CATACOMBS, I. 311.]

LUMINOSA, virgin, at Pavia or Pavia, in Italy, commemorated May 9 (Acta SS. May, ii. 460).

[C. H.]

LUMINUM DIES. [EPIPHANY.]

LUPATUS, martyr at Rome, commemorated Sept. 16 (Hieron. Mart.).

[C. H.]

LUPENTIUS, abbat of Catalaunum (Châlons-sur-Marne), commemorated Oct. 22 (Acta SS. Oct. ix. 609).

[C. H.]

eclesiae:" which need nail was then sitting, or
 ix. 815, et seq., with added there, and 845.

[E. S. F.]

in Africa, commemorated
 [C. H.]

EVANGELIST (IN srs, l. 639.) Martigny uce Velite-na, p. 133) for en cross, probably of the h bears on its extremities gels in person, instead es. Here St. Luke, like sed book in one hand
 the other. It has been gels are also personally
 gi, as in that of Probus
 . xvi.; and at pl. cxxii.
 his last example, three or roll, and stand in all thew, St. John, and St.
 ook is frequently placed
 r any of the apostles.
 r turn, No. 36, in the apostles are represented and the remaining four he names are written on as LYCANVS. The non-however, seldom added
 elve.

ombes de Rome, vol. ii.
 ically damaged fresco
 the cemetery of Saint that may be. However,
 r standing figures, each et a "scrinium" full of MA are legible near one e St. Matthew or St.
 e one of the others. He ng the four evangelists
 baptisteries of Ravenna
ata, tab. lxxii. A.D. 451).
 aks cannot well be other ospels, though Ciampini
 s to the subject of the ation of St. Luke as a um of Basil II., A.D. 980.

re, pl. xxxi., where the
 a pleasant garden scene
), which reminds us of
 orks. [R. St. J. T.]

(1.)

o of Malnz, commemo-
 SS., Oct. vii. pt. 2, p.
 [C. H.]

ACOMBS, I. 311.]
 at Papia or Pavia, in ay 9 (Acta SS. May, ii.
 [C. H.]

[EPHIPPANY.]

at Rome, commemorated
 [C. H.]

of Catalaunum (Châlons-Oct. 22 (Acta SS.
 [C. H.]

LUPERCIUS

LUPERCIUS or LUPERCULUS, martyr
 at Elusa (Eause), commemorated June 28
 (Acta SS. June, v. 351). [C. H.]

LUPERUSS, one of the eighteen martyrs of Saragossa, commemorated April 16. (Usuard.
Mart.) [C. H.]

LUPIANUS, confessor, commemorated July
 1 (Acta SS. July, i. 32). [C. H.]

LUPICINUS (1) Bishop of Lyon, commemorated Feb. 3 (Hieron. Mart.; Acta SS. Feb. i.
 360).

(2) Martyr, it is not said where, commemorated March 3 (Hieron. Mart.).

(3) Abbat, martyr, in the territory of Lyon, commemorated March 21 (Usuard. Mart.; Acta SS. Mar. iii. 262).

(4) Martyr, at Rome, commemorated April 12
 (Hieron. Mart.).

(5) Martyr in Lydia, commemorated April 27.

(6) Hermit and confessor in Gaul, commemorated June 24 (Greg. Tur. Vit. Pat. cap. 13, Patrol. Lat. lxxi. 1084; Acta SS. Jun. iv. 817).

(7) Bishop, martyr at Vienne (Hieron.
Mart.; Bed. Mart. Auct.) [C. H.]

LUPRANPODUS, martyr in Cappadocia, commemorated Oct. 14 (Hieron. Mart.). [C. H.]

LUPUS (1) Bishop of Châlons-sur-Marne commemorated Jan. 27 (Acta SS. Jan. ii.
 776).

(2) Martyr at Militana in Armenia, commemorated May 2 (Hieron. Mart.)

(3) Bishop of Limousin, commemorated May 22 (Acta SS. May, v. 171).

(4) Martyr at Rome, commemorated May 31
 (Hieron. Mart.)

(5) Martyr at Thessalonica, commemorated
 June 1 (Hieron. Mart.).

(6) Bishop of Troyes and confessor, his depositio commemorated at Troyes July 29 (Hieron.
Mart.; Usuard. Mart.; Bed. Mart. Auct.;
Acta SS. July, vii. 51).

(7) Bishop and confessor at Sens, commemorated Sept. 1 (Usuard. Mart.; Bed. Mart. Auct.; Acta SS. Sept. i. 248).

(8) Bishop and confessor, his depositio commemorated at Lyon Sept. 24 (Hieron. Mart.).
 Usuard calls him bishop and anchorite, and places him under Sept. 25; as also Acta SS.
 Sept. vii. 81.

(9) Martyr with Aurelia at Cordova, commemorated Oct. 14 (Hieron. Mart.; Bed. Mart.
Auct.; Acta SS. Oct. vi. 476).

(10) Bishop of Angers, confessor, commemorated Oct. 17 (Acta SS. Oct. viii. 104).

(11) Bishop of Soissons, commemorated Oct.
 19 (Acta SS. Oct. viii. 448). [C. H.]

LURICUS v. LUCERUS.

LUSOR, youth at Bourges, confessor, his depositio commemorated Nov. 4. (Hieron. Mart.; Bed. Mart. Auct.) [C. H.]

LUSTRALIS COLLATIO (so called because it was paid at the end of every lustrum; also

LUXURY

χρυσάργυρον, chrysargyrum, because the payment was made in gold and silver coins). A trading or licence tax, exacted from all who carried on any kind of trade. The inferior clergy were at first exempted from it. (See IMMUNITIES AND PRIVILEGES OF THE CLERGY,
 sect. ii. par. 3.) [S. J. E.]

LUTICIANUS, martyr at Antioch, commemorated Dec. 9 (Hieron. Mart.) [C. H.]

LUTRUDIS (LUTRUDE, LINTRUDE), virgin in Gaul, commemorated Sept. 22 (Acta SS.
 Sept. vi. 451). [C. H.]

LUXURIUS, martyr in Sardinia, commemorated Aug. 21; presumably the same as LUXURUS, martyr in Sardinia, Sept. 26; both in Hieron.
Mart. He is called Laxorius, and assigned to Aug. 21, in Acta SS. Aug. iv. 414. [C. H.]

LUXURUS or LUXURIUS, martyr in Sardinia, placed under Aug. 21 and Sept. 26.
 [C. H.]

LUXURY (Luxuria). The original signification of the word luxuria was that of an overflow or excess of fertility in crops or fields;
 thence it had the meaning of wantonness and of luxury generally; in mediæval ecclesiastical Latin it expresses sins of uncleanness, "luxuria concubinatine, luxuriosos vel adulteros luxu-riam explere cum consanguinea sua." (See Ducange, s. v.)

The church from the very first assumed an attitude of antagonism to luxury in every form.
 Simple and comely dress, plain food, an active,
 not an idle life, and a disregard of riches, were the outward marks of a Christian profession;
 and the circumstances of the early Christians were obviously such as to restrain any tendency to self-indulgence. So soon, however, as the church obtained any toleration in the empire and wealthy members joined her ranks, the case was altered. Even as early as the 2nd century Tertullian has frequent denunciations against intemperate "voluptates." He will not allow the public shows to be frequented by Christians.
 "The state of faith," he declares (de Spectac.
 c. 1), "the argument of truth and the rule of discipline bar the servants of God from the pleasures of the public shows." The outrageous immodesty of the theatre, no less than the contagion of idolatry in the whole apparatus of the shows, was held to render them inconsistent with the renoucements which were made at baptism. (For the words of renunciation, see BAP-TISM, I. 160; RENUNCIATION.) What the church opposed was not festivity in itself, but the vice inseparable from the exhibition of the public plays. Cyprian, for example, writing to Donatus
 (c. 7), inveighs with severity against the shows;
 yet he dates his own treatise on the fest of the vintage (ad Donat. c. 1), which he implies that he was himself observing. An instance of the corruption which then prevailed in theatrical representations appears from the play which was called Maius, a part of which consisted in the exhibition of naked women swimming in water. This disgraceful display was the subject of no less than eight imperial laws, and was not finally prohibited till the time of Arcadius (Cod.
Theod. XV. vi. 2).

The tendency to luxury in the adornment of the person in the 2nd and 3rd centuries is apparent from the exhortations of Tertullian (de Cultu Fœminæ), and Cyprian (de Habitu Virginis), in the West, and of Clement in the East (Stromata, ii. 10). They could not tolerate that Christian women should exhibit the same immodesty in their apparel, and should deck themselves with the same meretricious arts as were common in the depraved society of the heathen world. Cyprian treats of what is becoming in dress and behaviour in a consecrated virgin, but his treatise also exhibits the fashions which beguiled women generally in that age. He warns them (de Habitu Virginis, c. 7) against exposing their face and figure in public from want of modest clothing; he asks (c. 9) if it is God's wish that their ears should be scarred and traversed with costly earrings, or that a circle of black should be drawn round the eye; he cautions them against tampering with what God has formed, whether with "yellow dye or black powder or rouge;" and as the sum of the matter he gives them his fatherly advice, "be what you were fashioned by your Father's hand, remain with your countenance simple, your shoulders let alone, your figure natural, wound not your ears, circle not arm or neck with precious chain, fetter not ankles with golden bonds, stain not your hair, and keep your eyes worthy of seeing God." All such lascivious arts he regards, in common with other Christian fathers, as having been taught mankind by the apostate angels (ibid., c. 9). Closely allied to immodest dressing is wantonness of manners. Cyprian (ibid., c. 10) rebukes those of his flock who make no scruple when they attend marriage parties of abandoning themselves to revelry, "they interchange unchaste speeches, hear what is unbecoming and say what is unlawful, and are exposed to view, and countenance with their presence shameful language and convivial excess." The wedding-feasts very frequently formed an excuse for riot; and the lascivious singing and promiscuous dancing practised on these occasions were brought under canonical censure. The clergy more than once were forbidden (Conc. Venet., c. 11; Conc. Agath., c. 39) to sanction such gatherings by their presence. With respect to bathing, that luxury was not altogether prohibited, but the public baths were to be used with a regard to that honour which the doctrine of the Incarnation teaches is due to the human body. As a proof of the need that the church should regulate the use of the baths, Cyprian found it necessary to exhort even the virgins to abstain from bathing in company with men (de Habitu Virginis, c. 11). For a fuller account of these various developments of luxury, see BATHING, DANCING, DRESS, HAIR.

Part of the subject of over-indulgence in the pleasures of the table is treated under the heading of DRUNKENNESS. It remains to notice the efforts of the church to check luxury in food. The sumptuous meals, the pains and expense lavished in obtaining rare delicacies, the unbridled indulgence of the appetite which prevailed among the wealthy classes of the Roman empire are matters of notoriety. It was a primary duty of a society, one of whose fundamental moral precepts was the restraint of fleshly appetites, to make a stand against such flagrant abuses. Tertullian (Apolog., c. 39) contrasts the simplicity of the Christian agapæ, in which the guests eat as much as hungry men desire, with the Apurtrian and Bacchanal festivals, for which a levy of cooks is ordered; and asks his opponents which is most likely to propitiate heaven in time of calamity (ibid., c. 40), the heathen daily fed to the full and about forthwith to dine, or the Christian dried up with fasting and pinched with every sort of abstinence. The simplicity of the agapæ did not long survive, and some allowance must be made for Tertullian's rhetorical language, and his own habits of rigid self-denial; but after these deductions sufficient remains to shew that Christian meals in the 2nd century were a standing protest against luxury and excess in matter of food. Clement of Alexandria inveighs (Paedagog., ii. 1) against the lavishness and gluttony of heathen meals, and exhorts Christian converts to be satisfied with plain fare; he urges that meat should be eaten without sauces and boiled rather than roast, but recommends in preference such food as olives, herbs, milk, cheese, fruit, and honey. Among more specific directions of a later date the fourth council of Carthage, A.D. 398 (c. 15), requires the African bishops to maintain a frugal table. The plea that bishops should be free in entertaining magistrates and others in office that they might thus obtain reader access to them to intercede for criminals, is rejected by Jerome (Ep. ad Nepotian., cc. 3, 4). Judges, he says, will shew greater respect to frugal clergy than to luxurious ones. He adds, in the same epistle, that a clergyman who takes every opportunity of going to the entertainments to which he is invited soon sinks in estimation. By the Apostolical Constitutions (ii. 4) widows who are brought to want from gluttony or idleness are not to receive relief from the church. The directions in the Rule of Benedict, which was practical rather than ascetic in its aim, give the diet which was considered sufficient for all the purposes of an industrious life in Italy at the beginning of the 6th century. Each monk was allowed 1 lb. of bread daily, but flesh only in case of illness. At dinner two dishes of cooked pulmentaria were to be placed on the table, and a third dish of fruit and salad when it could be got (Regula, cc. 39, 40). The composition of these "pulmenta" or "pulmentaria" was various. Grain and vegetables cooked in different ways were their ordinary ingredients. Eggs, fish, cheese, and even fowls, if the flesh was minced, were admitted into them. One definition states that they were made ex mediæ qualitatis materiâ; another, that they included any ordinary food except bread and meat. (See DUNCEAN, s. v.) As we advance into the middle ages the ecclesiastical injunctions regarding food take the form of prohibitions of gluttony rather than of luxury. Gross feeding was one of the particular vices of the barbarian tribes which were being gradually incorporated into the church. The council of Autun, A.D. 670 (Labbe, Concilia, vi. 1888), forbade any priest who had overreached himself to touch the sacrifice. In the Penitential of Gildas, which probably contains the earlier canonical rules of the British church, it is enacted that if a monk is sick from too much food on a day when he has received the sacrifice, he shall go without his supper and keep seven additional fasts (c. 7);

ullian (Apolog. c. 39) con- of the Christian agapae, in as much as hungry men turian and Bacchian fest- y of cooks is ordered; and hich is most likely to pro- of calamity (Ibid. c. 40), o the full and about forth- Christian dried up with h every sort of abstinence. agapae did not long sur- cease must be made for Ter- guage, and his own habits ut after these deductions ew that Christian meals were a standing protest xcess in matter of food, inveighs (Paedagog. li. 1) and gluttony of heathen Christian converts to be are; he urges that meat ed sauces and boiled rather mends in preference such milk, cheese, fruit, and e specific directions of a later il of Carthage, A.D. 398 rican bishops to maintain es that bishops should be magistrates and others in thus obtain readier acces r criminals, is rejected by an. cc. 3, 4). Judges, he respect to frugal clergy . He adds, in the same an who takes every oppor- entertainments to which s in estimation. By the s (li. 4) widows who are gluttony or idleness are from the church. The e of Benedict, which was aetic in its aim, give the ered sufficient for all the rious life in Italy at the century. Each monk was daily, but flesh only in ner two dishes of cooked e placed on the table, and e and salad when it could 40). The composition of "pulmentaria" was va- tables cooked in different ry ingredients. Eggs, fish, if the flesh was minced, m. One definition states ex mediae qualitatis ma- ney included any ordinary meat. (See Ducange, s. v.) middle ages the ecclesi- arding food take the form ny rather than of luxury, of the particular vices of hich were being gradually church. The council of Concordia, vi. 18th), forbid eretaten himself to touch entential of Gildas, which earlier canonical rules of is enacted that if a monk h food on a day when he sifies, he shall go without ven additional fasts (c. 7);

on any other day he shall keep one fast and be severely chided (c. 8). Similar injunctions are found in the early ecclesiastical documents of the Anglo-Saxon church. Theodore in his Penitential (l. i. 8) imposes a penance of three days on any one making himself ill by gluttony, with an additional penance (c. 9) if the offence is committed after receiving the sacred elements. In these rules he is followed by Archbishop Egbert, who moreover inflicts different sentences on different orders. Thus a 'clericus' overeating himself is to fast forty days (Penitent. xi. 7), a monk or deacon sixty, a priest seventy, a bishop eighty (Ibid. Penitent. vi. 3, 4). Theodore (l. i. 4) made an exemption in favour of any one who had been fasting a long time, and then at Christmas or Easter, or any of the saints' days eat moderately, but did not make allowance for the weakness which succeeds a long fast, and causes sickness on eating.

The eating of unclean food frequently comes under notice in the Penitential Books of the 7th and 8th centuries. The existence of these decrees points to some remote influence of the Mosaic Law in the mediæval church, and also indicates the lingering of barbarous habits among the converts to Christianity in the remote corners of Europe. The Canones Hibernenses (Wasserschleben, Die Zussordnungen der Abendländischen Kirche, p. 136) inflict (c. 13) four years on bread and water on any eating horseflesh; a severity which was probably called for by some local practices. For the same canons only impose (cc. 14, 15) forty days on those who eat flesh which dogs have torn or which has died from natural causes. By the Penitential of Theodore (l. vii. 6) it is no canonical offence if carrion is eaten from necessity. In the case (cc. 8, 9) of food which has been contaminated by a mouse or weasel having been drowned in it, if there is a small quantity it must be thrown away; but if there is much, it will be sufficient to sprinkle it with holy water. A goat or deer found dead in the forest (li. xi. 1), unless there is some appearance of its having been slain by the hand of man, must be thrown to the swine or dogs, on no account be eaten. Birds or beasts strangled in nets or slain by hawks (c. 2) must also be rejected, because the Capitula in the Acts of the Apostles prohibit the using of things strangled. Fish, however (c. 3), caught in a net may be eaten, because they belong to another order. The direction with regard to horse-flesh (c. 4) differs from the Irish canon. Theodore does not forbid it, but states it is not customary to eat it. Hares are allowable (c. 5), their flesh is said to be good for dysentery, more particularly the gall mixed with pepper. The Confessio of Pseudo-Egbert adds that it is a remedy for face-ache. Bees (c. 9) stinging a man to death must be killed, but their honey may be kept. It is not necessary to reject either swine or fowl (c. 7) which have fed on carrion or human blood; but any which have fed on human flesh must not be eaten (c. 8) till the meat has been soaked. Bede (Penitential. vii.) lays down the same injunctions in the main about unclean food. In these he is followed by Egbert, with some curious varieties of penance. Any one (Egbert, Penitential. xiii. 4) knowingly eating or drinking what has been polluted by a cat or dog shall chant 100 psalms, or fast three days; if the offence is committed unknowingly the penalty is halved. So any secular (c. 5) deliberately drinking any liquor in which a mouse or a weasel has been drowned, shall do seven days' penance in a monastery and chant 300 psalms. The penalty of eating food half raw was three days' penance, or chanting the psalter.

Luxuria in the middle ages was used in ecclesiastical language to signify lust, more particularly such indulgence of the passions as was not included under ADULTERY, FORNICATION, or INCEST. The lascivious desire which stopped short of overt act was not generally brought under canonical censure; the rule of discipline being that the church judges actions only, and of actions those alone which create scandal. Secret thoughts, intentions, and desires were left to spiritual remedies. So the council of Neocaesarea, A.D. 314 (c. 4), merely states that any man who desires to sleep with a woman and does not accomplish it, has fallen from grace. No mention is made of penance. Even the Penitentials which pursue offenders into the minutest details, either assign no penalty to a desire, or a very slight one. The British canonical book which bears the name of the Penitential of Vianianus (Wasserschleben, p. 108) states that if a man has meditated uncleanness but checked himself, although the sin is the same, the penance may be light. And Theodore (l. ii. 21, 22) only bids such a man seek pardon from God; but if he has proceeded to wanton words, then he must be a penitent for seven days. Kissing a woman per desiderium was punished with twenty days (l. viii. 2). Rape was severely visited, both by civil and ecclesiastical law. One of the laws of Constantine (Cod. Theod. IX. xxiv. 1) condemned to the flames not only any one who committed a rape on a virgin, but even carried her off with her own consent against the will of her parents. This severity was a little modified by Constantius (Ibid. c. 2); the crime was still a capital one, but only slaves guilty of it were to be burned. Under Jovian the scope of the law was extended (Cod. Theod. IX. xxv. 2), not only was it a capital offence to ravish a consecrated virgin, but even to solicit her to marry against the rule of her profession, whether she was willing or not. The offence was also brought under canonical discipline. The Apostolical Canons (c. 66) expel a virgin not espoused to him, and prohibits his marrying any one but her however poor she may be. Basil assigns (ad Amphilo. c. 22) four years' penance to one carrying off a virgin espoused to another man; and directs (Ep. 244) that not only shall the man himself suffer, but all his accomplices shall be censured, even to his family and the inhabitants of his village. The proof of the widespread existence of unnatural crime during the decay of the empire is too strong to be questioned (Clement Alex. Pædagog. ii. 10; Cyprian, cont. Donat. c. 8). And no serious efforts were made by the heathen emperors to put an end to it (see the authorities quoted by Bingham, Antiq. XVI. ix. 11). In the Christian imperial code, however, it was treated with extreme severity. Constantine ordered (Cod. Theod. IX. vii. 3) that offenders should be executed; and Theodosius (Ibid. c. 6) that they should be burned. The decrees of the church on the subject shew that even Christians were not altogether clean. Tertullian (de Pudicit. c. 4) states that offenders were kept not only from the porch of the church, but from contact with any part of the building, for such sins were not "delicta" but "monstra." The council of Elvira, A.D. 305 (c. 71), denies them communion even at death. By a canon of Ancyra, A.D. 314 (c. 18), those guilty before the age of twenty were to do penance as prostrators fifteen years, and then to be permitted to join in the prayers only for another five years before being admitted to full communion; if they are older than twenty, ten years are to be added to the penance; and if they exceed fifty years, then they are to be granted communion only at death. Basil (cc. 7, 62, 63) fixes their penance at either twenty or thirty years. The Penitentials which represent the ecclesiastical code of races which had not yet cast off the vices of barbarism, abound, as might be expected, with injunctions against unnatural lusts. In the British code the Penitential Book of Gildas (c. 1) lays down in curious detail the punishment of a presbyter or deacon who had sinned. His penance was to extend over three years, every hour of which he was to beg pardon, and every week he was to add an extra act of penance (superpositionem) except on the fifty days after Easter: on the Lord's day he might eat bread without stint, and some dish fattened with butter, but on other days he was to take only a British formella of dried bread (paximatum) and vegetables and a few eggs. His allowance of drink was to be a Roman hemina of milk to recruit his strength, but if he had work to do, he was to be given a Roman sextarius of skimmed (tenuclae vel bolthutae) milk: his bed was to be made without much grass; and if at the end of a year and a half he showed deep repentance he might receive the eucharist and sing the psalms again with the brothers. By the Penitential of Theodore (I. vii. 1) boys polluting themselves were to be flogged; and an offence against nature combined with any other ortimen capitale was to be expiated only by seclusion in a monastery for life. For further particulars on a matter which does not admit of detail, but where the details are only too numerous, the reader is referred to these early Penitential Books (Theodor. I. ii. vii.; Bed. iii.; Egbert. iv. v.) [G. M.]

LYCARION, monk, martyr with Martha and Mary, commemorated Feb. 8 (Basil, Menol.).

[C. H.]

LYDIA (1) Purple-seller of Thyatira, commemorated Aug. 3 (Acta SS. Aug. i. 199).

[C. H.]

(2) Wife of Philetus, a senator, martyr, commemorated March 27 (Basil, Menol.).

[C. H.]

LYING. It does not appear that the mere uttering of a falsehood, apart from any injury it might inflict, was brought under ecclesiastical censure. Tertullian, writing after he had joined the Montanists, and not likely therefore to err on the side of laxity, contrasts (de Pudicit. c. 19) the deadly sins which were visited with excommunication with those lighter offences of daily incursion of which discipline took no cognizance; and among these latter he enumerates thoughtlessly speaking evil, rash swearing, the breaking of a promise, and the telling of a lie from shame or necessity. This list does not include perjury, which was treated as a grave canonical offence. [OATHS.] Whether and under what circumstances it was held pardonable by any of the fathers to tamper with the truth, is a matter difficult to decide absolutely. Passages may be adduced which support a strict adherence to veracity at all times; and at all hazards: on the other hand there are passages which seem to countenance equivocation or economy. What is beyond question is that they did not attempt to build up a system of accurate casuistry. That is the production of a later age. A collection of quotations bearing on the subject will be found in Jeremy Taylor (Ductor Dubitantium, III. ii. 5). One of the tenets which Augustine charges (contra Mendac.) the Priscillianists with upholding is, that they were at liberty to forswear themselves in order to conceal their secret doctrines.

On false witness the imperial code, following the early Roman law, affixed a heavy penalty. The false accuser was to undergo the same punishment (Cod. Theod. IX. xxxix. 1, 2, 3; XVI. ii. 21) which his accuser, had it been substantiated, would have brought upon the accused. This law of retaliation was to hold good (ibid. IX. i. 9, 14) whether the false charge attacked another's reputation or property or life. The frequent mention of the same offence in the canonical law shews that the evil was widespread in the church. The council of Elvira, A.D. 305 (c. 74), sentences a false witness to five years' abstention from communion; the kindred but, in the circumstances of the early church, far graver offence of "delatio" was visited by a lifelong exclusion (c. 73). [INFORMER.] The council of Agde, A.D. 506 (c. 37), puts false witnesses in the same category with murderers, and excommunicates them in general terms till they repent (cf. Conc. Venet. c. 1; IV. Conc. Carthay. c. 55). The legislation with regard to libel occupies a chapter of the Theodosian Code (IX. xxix. de famosis libellis). [LIBEL.] [G. M.]

LYONS, COUNCIL OF (Lugdunensis Concilii). Of the councils of Lyons, several have been misnamed and misnumbered.

1. Snid to have been held A.D. 197, because this seems to have been the year in which St. Irenaeus addressed a letter, in the name of the brethren in France, over whom he ruled, to pope Victor, on the disputed question of keeping Easter, and because Eusebius speaks in general terms of synods and meetings of bishops having been held in connection with it (E. H. v. 23-4, comp. Mansi, i. 715 and 726).

2. A.D. 475, when a priest named Lucidus is said to have retracted his errors on predestination. But the only record of this is found in a work of Faustus, bishop of Riez, who was himself a semi-Pelagian.

3 and 4. A.D. 501 and 516, in which St. Avitus, of Vienne, is supposed to have taken part. But the first was a mere conference between the orthodox and the Arians (Mansi, viii. 241, comp. Pagi ad Baron. A.D. 501, n. 4), and to the second he refers himself but casually (Ep. xxviii. comp. Mansi, vi. 537).

5. A.D. 517, where Viventolus, bishop of Lyons, with ten others, passed and subscribed to six canons. In the first of these, the twentieth does not include perjury, a grave canonical offence, and under what circumstances pardonable by any of the truth, is a matter of duty. Passages may be found that show a strict adherence to the law at all hazards; or the passages which seem to be on or economy. What is it that they did not attempt to curate casuistry. That after age. A collection of the subject will be found in Dubitantium, III. II. 5). which Augustine charges the schismatics with upholding at liberty to forswear and conceal their secret doc-imperial code, following affixed a heavy penalty, to undergo the same code. IX. xxix. 1, 2, 3; accusation, had it been brought upon the acclamation to be held good whether the false charge of property or life. The council of Elvira, as a false witness to five communion; the kindred of the early church, far as it was visited by a life- [INFORMER.] The council (7), puts false witnesses with murderers, and in general terms till they c. 1; IV. Cona. Carthay. with regard to libel ecclesiastical Code (IX. xxiv. [G. M.]

OF (Lugdunensia Con- of Lyons, several have numbered.

held A.D. 197, because a year in which St. Peter, in the name of the emperor whom he ruled, to the question of keeping Eusebius speaks in general meetings of bishops having with it (E. H. v. 23-4, 726).

priest named Lucius is in errors on predestination of this is found in a of Riez, who was him-516, in which St. Avitus, have taken part. But conference between the (Mansi, viii. 241, comp. n. 4), and to the second usually (Ep. xviii. comp.

Viventolus, bishop of passed and subscribed to of these, the twentieth canon passed at Epone respecting incestuous marriages, was reaffirmed with special application to Stephen, an official of king Sigismund, whose possible displeasure may have dictated the second and third. St. Avitus is also thought to have taken part in this council, but he is not named among those who subscribed to it. The title given to it of the first council of Lyons is misleading; and several canons are cited by Burchard and others as of this council, for which there would seem to be no foundation (Mansi, viii. 567-74).

6. Held A.D. 567, by command of king Guntram, and called the second council of Lyons, in which two bishops, named Salonius and Sagittarius, were condemned; eight bishops and six representatives of absent bishops subscribed to its canons, six in number; the bishop of Vienna subscribing first, and of Lyons second. Canon 2 decrees that the wills of the departed should be religiously maintained and carried out, even when they ran, or seemed to run, counter to the civil law. Canon 4 decrees that persons suspended from communion are to be restored only by him who suspended them. Canon 6 is of a piece with the second and third of Gerona, (Mansi, ix. 785-90, comp. Conc. Gerund.)

7. Held A.D. 589, under king Guntram, and called the third council of Lyons. Here the bishop of Lyons subscribed first, and of Vienna second, of eight present bishops, and twelve who subscribed through their representatives. Once more the number of canons passed was six; in most cases for giving effect to former canons. By the sixth lepers are to be sufficiently fed and clothed by the bishop of the diocese to which they belong, and not allowed to be wanderers (Mansi, ix. 941-4). [E. S. Ff.]

LYRE. The lyre is borne by the mystic Orpheus (see Aringhi, vol. I. pp. 547, 563, both pictures from vaultings of the Callixtine catacomb, and Faesco, I. 898), and is held to represent the attractive power of the Lord. Aringhi quotes St. John xi.: "And I, if I be lifted up, will draw all men to Me," and proceeds to reflect on the lyre of Orpheus, "qui dulcisonis et concinnatis ad plectrum vocibus feras pertrinebat." Eusebius makes ingenious use of the simile in his oration de Laudibus Constantini Imp., where he speaks of the Lord's saving all, "by the instrument of the human body with which He invested Himself; not otherwise than Orpheus the singer, who makes known his skill in art by his lyre, so that, as it is said in the Greek tales, he could tame all kinds of beasts with his singing; and by touching the strings of his instrument with the plectrum, could soften the wrath of merciless wild beasts."

Clemens Alexandrinus (Paedag. lii. 11, p. 246 D) includes the lyre among the symbols permitted to be used as signs. [GEMS, I. 712, 716.] For a curious illustration of the symbolic lyre of the passions or bodily nature, see CALF, I. 258. [R. St. J. T.]

