CAPITULUM, CAPITULARE, = Κεφάλαιον.—(1) Properly, a summary or heading, under which many particulars are arranged; "brevis multorum complexio" (Papian ap. Dr Cange). Hence (2), in the plural, codes of law, ecclesiastical or civil, digested under chapters or capitula (so used in Cod. Theodos.). And inasmuch as these mostly applied to special emergent cases not adequately met by existing general laws, Capitula came to mean Addimenta et Appendices legum. So the Capitula or Capitularia of Charlemagne and his successors, mostly passed in mixed assemblies of clergy and laity. (3) The word came also to mean the (usually short) "chapter" itself, of which it was properly the heading. As, e.g. the capitula or short lessons (e.g. from the Psalms) for particular days, mentioned in the Council of Agda, A.D. 506, can. 21, and by Pope Vigilius, A.D. 538 × 555, Epist. 2; and by Pope Vigilius in the same Council of Agde, can. 30. And Capitularia Evar. et aliorum in circulo Anni was a list of the beginnings and endings of the Gospels for the Church year. So also, again (besides our modern use of the word "chapter"), the Capitula of a Monastic Rule. (4) And from this last-mentioned usage, coupled with the practice of reading a capitulum or chapter of the Rule, or (as was St. Augustine's practice) of the Scriptures, to the assembled canons or monks, the assembled canons or monks themselves came to be called, in a body, the capitulum or chapter [CHAPTER], and their meeting-place the chapter-house. And in process of time the term in this sense became limited to the cathedral chapter: "Capitulum dicitur respectu ecclesie cathedralis; concensus respectu ecclesie regularis; collegium respectu ecclesie inferioris ubi est collectio viventium in communi" (Lyndwood's Congregatio was the earlier term. [A. W. H.]

Ch
Rule assem mart
days,
days, were Rule
are f was Ribb
Bene
Bene
abbot ment (s. 1
rally (Coo held This of St.
was the b jobou after
The
ancie
Mona CHAP
(5) canon psalm Script
when brosin often ally fr by th prece Gratia
(6) Lauds and v Sunda
hadst said a lowing adell [Du 4., 1
Walco
CAL
morat
CAL
case, casket
1. T crated the (n the pr celebra passage observ we are of the which after f olation sponds, the Gre
canon

information will be found in § 18 et seq. See also Gratian, Dist. 10, c. 9. In regard to the religion of Charwithin our limits. The man in 882, after which French legislation. A formal collection of the till they were edited in the abbey of Foutenella, the four books contain the and a portion of those of Charles the Bald cites authority. Subsequently Mayence, about the year 860. These, however, Roman and canon law, ties of the Carolingians again have been added.

Historia Regum Francorum. monachi et aliorum forte doctissimorum virorum. utelensis in unum collectis, sive manuscriptos ineditos, primum edidit, nunc illus- travit. Guizot's Lectures on Civilization in France, trans- lated by Bogue, 1846. Hallam's Medieval Europe, Encyclopædia, Art. 17, Monuments in Germani- um, Hanover, 1835. [B. S.]

CAPITULARE, is a head- ing, particulars are arranged; capitulum (Papius ap. De in the plural, codes of law, digested under chapters or Cod. Theodos.) And in- applied to special emergent met by existing general to mean Addimenta et Capitula or Capitularia successors, mostly passed of clergy and laity. (3) The mean the (usually short) which it was properly the capitula or short lessons for particular days, men- of Agde, A.D. 506, can. 21, s. A.D. 538 x 555, Epist. 21 in the same Council of Agde, Alare Evarzylorum in circulo the beginnings and endings of Church year. So also, ap- use of the word "chapter", monastic Rule. (4) And from usage, coupled with the capitulum or chapter of the Rule, stine's practice) of the Scrip- tured canons or monks, the monks themselves came to y, the capitulum or chapter- meeting-place the character- of time the time in this d to the cathedral chapter: r respectu ecclesie regulari- respectu ecclesie inferiori ad est in communi" (Lyndwood) e earlier term. [A. W. R.]

Chrodegang, bishop of Metz († 766), in his Rule (c. 18) desires the canons of his order to assemble after prime, to hear a reading of a martyrology or some similar work; on Sundays, Wednesdays, and Fridays, and on saints' days, treatises or homilies of an edifying kind were to precede this reading; on other days, the Rule itself, or a portion of it. Similar directions are frequent in later statutes. This assembly was called capitulum. (Martene, De Antiq. Eccl. Ritibus, lib. iv. c. vii. § 4.) See also the Life of Benedict of Aniane by Ardo, c. 52 (in Acta SS. Bened. ssec. iv. pt. 1). In the Life of Germar, abbot of Flavivacum († 658?), the third hour is mentioned as the time for holding capitulum (c. 15, in Acta SS. Hen. ssec. II.); so in Adrevaldus, De Mirac. S. Bened. (c. 28, ib.). Dunstan (Concordia, cc. 1 and 5) desires capitulum to be held after prime in summer, after terce in winter. This seems to be in accordance with the intentions of St. Benedict: for one object of the capitulum was the distribution of the day's labour among the brethren; and according to his Rule, c. 48, labour was to begin after prime in summer, after terce in winter.

The place of holding the capitulum seems anciently (according to the Ordo Conversal. Monast. c. 3) to have been the cloister; but see CHAPPER-NOISE.

(5) The "little Chapter," said at all the canonical hours excepting Matins, after the psalms. It consists of one or two verses of Scripture, usually taken from the Epistles, whence the corresponding passage in the Ambrosian breviary is called Epistolella. It is often taken from the Prophets, and occasionally from other parts of Scripture. It is recited by the officiating priest, standing, and is not preceded by a Benediction. At the end "Deo Gratias" is said. See (3) above.

(6) An anthem in the Ambrosian rite said at Lauds after the psalms and before the antiphon, and varying with the day. That for ordinary Sundays is "Cantato Doroño canticum novum: laudatio ejus in ecclesia sanctorum." It is also said at the lesser hours, and at Compline following the Responsio brevis, after the Epistolella. [H. J. H.]

[Du Cange, Mayer, Diss. in his Theas. Nov. Stat. Eccl. Bætes. Cathedr. et Colleg. in Germaniâ; Walcott, Sacred Archaeology.]

CAPRASIUS, martyr at Agen, is commemorated Oct. 20 (Mart. Usuardi). [C.]

CAPSA, also CAPSULA, CAPSELLA. A box or case. The name is applied to several kinds of caskets for ecclesiastical use.

1. The casket used to contain the unconsecrated elements. According to the direction of the Ordo Romanus I. c. 8, two acolytes bear in the procession before the pope, when about to celebrate, "capsas cum sanctis aptetas." On this passage Binterim (Denkwürdigkeiten, vii. 1, 363) observes that by 'sancta' in the neuter plural we are to understand, not the consecrated Body of the Lord, but the yet unconsecrated Elements, which the acolytes bore before the mass, just as after it they carried off the remains of the oblations in 'sacculi.' This procession corresponds, in fact, to the 'Greater Entrance' of the Greeks, in which the elements are borne in a solemn procession from the altar to the Holy Table.

solemn procession from the altar to the Holy Table.

2. Capsa sometimes designates the vessel in which the reserved Eucharist was borne from one place to another. The seventeenth canon of the council of Orange enjoins, "cum capsâ et calice offerentibus est, et admittens Eucharistie consecrandis" [CONSECRATION]. The meaning of this, Mabillon (Comm. Prier. in Ort. Rom. p. cxxxix) considers to be that, together with the 'capsa' containing the sacred vessels and perhaps the Eucharist, the chalice was also to be brought to the altar. The word TURRIS is used in a similar sense. Compare TABERNACLE.

3. A repository or SHRINE (Fr. châsse) for preserving the relics of saint. The legate of the Apostolic See in their letter to Horminadas (in Horminadas Epistole, p. 475, Migue) says that they suggested the making of shrines (capsellas) for the relics of each of the apostles severally in the church of the Apostles at Constantinople. In the description of the altar built by St. Benedict at Aniane, we read that an opening was made in the back of it for inserting the 'capsas' which contained relics of saints (Acta SS. Feb. II. 614). Compare ALTAR, p. 84.

4. A casket to contain the book of the Gospels. Ado of Vienne speaks (Chronicon, A.D. 519) of twenty 'capsas evangeliorum' of gold, richly jewelled [LITURGICAL BOOKS]. [C.]

CAPSARIUM. The room in which the capsas containing relics were placed. Perpetuus of Tours (circa A.D. 490), in his will (D'Achery's Spicilegium, v. 105) distinguishes a reliquary which he left to a friend from another gilded 'theca' which was in his capsarium, and which he left to the church (DuCange's Glossary, s. v.). [C.]

CAPSUM. The nave of a church. Gregory of Tours (Hist. Franc. li. 14) describes a certain church as having thirty-two windows in the sanctuary, twenty in the nave (in capsu). (DuCange's Glossary, s. v.) [C.]

CAPTATORES. The leaving by testament the institution of an heir to the secret will of another was by the Roman law termed a captatoria institutio, and forbidden (see Dig. bk. xviii. t. v. ll. 70, 71, 81; Code, bk. vii. t. xxii. l. 11). In a less technical sense, however, the captator answered substantially to our legacy-hunter, and the scandal is one which seems to have been rife in the early church—as indeed the satirists shew it to have been in the heathen world of the day. Perhaps we may see a germ of it in what St. Paul says (ii. Tim. iii. 1, 2) of the "covetous" who shall be "in the last days," adding, "for of this sort are they which creep into houses, and lead captive silly women" (v. 6), though his description applies mainly to dishonest and selfish teachers. By the end of the 4th century, at any rate, Christian emperors had to legislate against it. A law of Valentinian, Valens, and Gratian (A.D. 370) in the Theodosian Code, enacted that clerics or professors of continence were not to frequent the houses of widows and female wards, but should be banished by public judgment, if the relatives of such females should deem fit to prosecute them; nor should any such persons receive aid from the woman with whom they might become connected under pretext of religion, by any kind of liberality, or by her last will; but any bequest to them from such females should be void, nor could they have and enjoy any trust either by donation or testament. Should anything be so given or bequest to them after the date of the law, the public exchequer was to receive it. Another law in the same Code (l. 27), of Valentinian, Theodosius, and Arcadius (A.D. 390), contains special provisions as to liberality by deaconesses, who amongst other things were forbidden to nominate as their heirs any church, cleric, or poor man; this however was partly revoked a few months later (l. 28 ib.) by the same emperors, so far as allowing the enjoyment of certain articles of personal use by clerics or servants, under the name of a church (Bingham does not seem quite to have understood the bearing of this last enactment). These laws, although as will be seen, they did not hold their ground in the state, are remarkable from the reference to them in one of Jerome's best known letters (Ep. 2, ad Nepotianum): "Shameful to say, the priests of idols, actors, charioteers, harlots receive inheritances; only to clerics and monks is this forbidden by law, and forbidden, not by persecutors but by the princes. Nor do I complain of this law, but lament that we should have deserved it." And he proceeds to draw one of his scathing sketches of those who devote a shameful service to old men and childless old women, besieging their bedsides, performing for them the most menial and repulsive offices, in dread at the doctor's entrance, asking with trembling lips if the patient be better, in peril if he become a little stronger, feigning joy whilst their minds are tortured by their avarice, sweating for an empty inheritance.

There is a striking analogy between Jerome's picture and one traced in one of the novels of Leo and Majorian, annexed to the Theodosian Code (bk. viii. N. vi. § 11; A.D. 458). It pretenses to restrain the avidity of these captatores, who by attendance by the bedside of persons they scarcely know, corrupt by simulated affection minds wearied with bodily illness and having no longer any clear judgment, so that forgetting the ties of blood and affinity, they may name strangers their heirs. Medical men are suborned to persuade their patient to wrong, and neglecting the care of healing become ministers to the covetousness of others. And it proceeds to enact that persons who could not claim in case of intestacy in any degree from a testator, if they should receive anything by way of bequest or trust, should give one-third to the treasury, until by fear of this the injustice of testators and dishonesty of captators should come to an end. It must be observed that this law, instead of being confined to clerics and monks like the previous ones, is of a general character. Perhaps, though it had not held its place, it has not been without influence on the differential duties imposed by most modern states on legacies and successions, which are generally highest as against strangers to the family of the testator or predecessor.

As respects the clergy, indeed, we find by a law almost contemporary with the last, inserted in Justinian's code, that of Valentinian and Marcian, A.D. 455 (bk. l. t. ii. l. 13), that widows, deaconesses, virgins dedicated to God, nuns, and women bearing any other name of religious honour or dignity, received full liberty to leave by will or otherwise all or any part of their fortune. In short, the strongest laws against clerical captation which Jerome applauded seem to have been tacitly abrogated, utterly inconsistent as they were with the growth of Romish or Oriental priestcraft.

The term hæresopitæ seems only to differ from that of captatores, so far as it implies only the captation of inheritances, not of gifts from the living. [J. M. L.]

CAPTIVES, REDEMPTION OF. The disasters which fell upon the Roman empire in the 4th and 5th centuries gave a special prominence to this as one of the forms of Christian love, and it connects itself accordingly with some of the noblest acts and words of the teachers of the Church. Ambrose was charged by his Arian opponents with sacrilege for having melted down the eucharistic vessels of the church at Milan for this purpose, and defends himself against this charge on the grounds that this was the highest and best use to which he could have applied them (De Offic. ii. 28). Augustine did the same at Hippo (Possidius, Vita, c. 24). Acaclus, Bishop of Amulius, ransomed as many as 7000, who had been taken prisoners by the Persians (Socr. H. E. vii. 21); Deogratias, Bishop of Carthage, the Roman soldiers who had been carried off by Genseric after the capture of Rome (Victor Utic. de persecut. Vandal. l. Beñ. Patr. vii. p. 691). It is worth noting that this was not only admired in individual actions, but that the truth that mercy is above sacrifice was formally embodied in ecclesiastical legislation. The Code of Justinian (l. tit. 2, de Sacros. Eccles. 21), while forbidding the alienation of church vessels or vestments for any other purpose, distinctly permits them to be pledged or even sold for this or other like works of mercy or necessity. [E. H. P.]

CAPUA, COUNCIL OF, A.D. 389, provincial, respecting the schism at Antioch between Flavianus and Evagrius; also respecting the denial by Bonosus of the perpetual virginity of the B. V. Mary; passed also a canon against rebaptizing, re-ordination, and translation of bishops, embodied in the African code (S. Ambros. Epist. 78, 79; Cod. Can. Afric. 48; Labb. ii. 1039, 1072). [A. W. H.]

CAPUT JEJUNII. [Lent.]

CAPUTIUM, a covering for the head, worn by monks, sometimes sewn on to the tunic, as a hood (Reg. Comm. S. Bened. c. 55). [I. G. S.]

CAR, CART, CHARIOT, &c. Herzog (Real-Encyclopädie für protestantische Theologie u. Kirche, 8vo. Götta, 1861, s. v. "Sinbilder,") mentions a sculpture in St. Callixtus, which contains a chariot without driver, with pole turned backwards, and whips left resting on it. This, as he says, appears evidently intended as a symbol of the accomplished course of a life. In Bottari, tav. clx., two quadrigæ are represented at the base of an arch (covered with paintings of ancient date) in the second cubiculum of the catacomb of St. Priscilla on the Salarian Way. The charioteers carry palms and crowns in their hands, and the horses are decorated with palm-branches, or perhaps plumes; which connects the image of the chariot with St. Paul's imagination of the

Christ
(See M in this Gue sacient Pittore
waggon
St. Deu
Pittore
of the
vol. I. century
Peint catacou ombr powerfu not of into his CAR
ad (180
It was peror M in conce
Ferrari Ecclesia clerics (c riog to t dom of t to the c Lyons, w tury, at Gallic en with ele him agai de Ro caracalla
the fish bâpaxo caracalla
was leng
So we m Victor ;
vexisset que plebe nomine Spartian
some effe quæ pop anteda no tonianan Romanæ
frence t (Epist garments was furn lilam me gore ocul cavillæ." made by mere repr
cap. 10. autem ve culæ.")
CARA
CARI
Gaul, la c CARI
April 28
CARI

Christian race (1 Cor. ix. 24; 2 Tim. iv. 7). (See Martigny, s. v. "Cheval," and article HONOR in this book.)

Guenebault refers to a sculpture from an ancient Gothic or Frank tomb at Langres (Univ. Pittoresque (France), pl. xlv.), and to a cart or waggon on one of the capitals in the crypts in St. Denis (pl. iv. vol. ii. in A. Hugo, France Pittoresque et Monumentale). In Strutt (View of the Inhabitants of England, Lond. 1774, 4to. vol. i. p. 5, fig. 6) there is a chariot of the 9th century, so presumed. See also D'Agincourt, Peinture, pl. cxiv. No. 14, and pl. cxvii. In the catacomb of St. Praetextatus (see Perret, Catacombes, vol. i. pl. lxxii.) there is a somewhat powerful and striking representation of the Chariot of Death, which is taking a departed woman into his car. [R. St. J. T.]

CARACALLA (in late Greek writers καρακάλλω). Originally a garment peculiar to Gaul; it was introduced into Roman use by the emperor M. Aurelius Antoninus, commonly known in consequence as Caracallus or Caracalla. See Ferrarius, de Re Vest. pars. ii. lib. i. c. 28. Ecclesiastical writers speak of it as worn by clerics (Ven. Beda, Hist. Eccl. lib. i. c. 7, referring to the year 305 A.D. and to the martyrdom of St. Alban), and as corresponding in shape to the Jewish ephod. So says St. Eucherius of Lyons, writing about the middle of the 5th century, and referring evidently to the genuine Gallic caracalla, which was a kind of short tunic with sleeves and furnished with a hood. With him agrees Dio Cassius (quoted by Rubenius, de Re Vest. lib. i. c. 6), who describes the caracalla as a sleeved tunic made somewhat in the fashion of a corselet, χειρῖσθωδὸς χιτῶν ἐς ὄρθρα καὶ τῶσαν τινα περικλυμένης. But the caracalla introduced into use by M. Aurelius was lengthened so as to reach nearly to the feet. So we must infer from the statement of Aurelius Victor: "Cum e Gallia vestem plurimum devesisset, talareque caracallas fecisset, coegissetque piebem ad se saltantium talibus introire, de nomine hujus vestis Caracalla nominatus est." Spartianus speaks still more distinctly to the same effect: "Ipse Caracalla nomen a vestimento quod populo dederat, devenisse usque ad talos, quod unctio non fuerat, unde hodieque dicuntur Antoniniane Caracallae ejusmodi, in usu maxime Romanæ plebis frequentatæ." From the reference to this vestment made by St. Jerome (Epistle to Eustobius), we may infer that, like other garments suited for out-door use, the caracalla was furnished with a hood. "Ephod . . . pallium miræ pulchritudinis præstritiogens fulgore oculis in modum caracallarum sed absque cuculla." The statement to the same effect made by St. Eucherius of Lyons, is evidently a mere reproduction of St. Jerome. (Enst. lib. ii. cap. 10. "Ephod, vestis sacerdotalis . . . Est autem velut in caracallas modum, sed sine cuculla.") [W. B. M.]

CARACALLA (in late Greek writers καρακάλλω). Originally a garment peculiar to Gaul; it was introduced into Roman use by the emperor M. Aurelius Antoninus, commonly known in consequence as Caracallus or Caracalla. See Ferrarius, de Re Vest. pars. ii. lib. i. c. 28. Ecclesiastical writers speak of it as worn by clerics (Ven. Beda, Hist. Eccl. lib. i. c. 7, referring to the year 305 A.D. and to the martyrdom of St. Alban), and as corresponding in shape to the Jewish ephod. So says St. Eucherius of Lyons, writing about the middle of the 5th century, and referring evidently to the genuine Gallic caracalla, which was a kind of short tunic with sleeves and furnished with a hood. With him agrees Dio Cassius (quoted by Rubenius, de Re Vest. lib. i. c. 6), who describes the caracalla as a sleeved tunic made somewhat in the fashion of a corselet, χειρῖσθωδὸς χιτῶν ἐς ὄρθρα καὶ τῶσαν τινα περικλυμένης. But the caracalla introduced into use by M. Aurelius was lengthened so as to reach nearly to the feet. So we must infer from the statement of Aurelius Victor: "Cum e Gallia vestem plurimum devesisset, talareque caracallas fecisset, coegissetque piebem ad se saltantium talibus introire, de nomine hujus vestis Caracalla nominatus est." Spartianus speaks still more distinctly to the same effect: "Ipse Caracalla nomen a vestimento quod populo dederat, devenisse usque ad talos, quod unctio non fuerat, unde hodieque dicuntur Antoniniane Caracallae ejusmodi, in usu maxime Romanæ plebis frequentatæ." From the reference to this vestment made by St. Jerome (Epistle to Eustobius), we may infer that, like other garments suited for out-door use, the caracalla was furnished with a hood. "Ephod . . . pallium miræ pulchritudinis præstritiogens fulgore oculis in modum caracallarum sed absque cuculla." The statement to the same effect made by St. Eucherius of Lyons, is evidently a mere reproduction of St. Jerome. (Enst. lib. ii. cap. 10. "Ephod, vestis sacerdotalis . . . Est autem velut in caracallas modum, sed sine cuculla.") [W. B. M.]

CARACALLA (in late Greek writers καρακάλλω). Originally a garment peculiar to Gaul; it was introduced into Roman use by the emperor M. Aurelius Antoninus, commonly known in consequence as Caracallus or Caracalla. See Ferrarius, de Re Vest. pars. ii. lib. i. c. 28. Ecclesiastical writers speak of it as worn by clerics (Ven. Beda, Hist. Eccl. lib. i. c. 7, referring to the year 305 A.D. and to the martyrdom of St. Alban), and as corresponding in shape to the Jewish ephod. So says St. Eucherius of Lyons, writing about the middle of the 5th century, and referring evidently to the genuine Gallic caracalla, which was a kind of short tunic with sleeves and furnished with a hood. With him agrees Dio Cassius (quoted by Rubenius, de Re Vest. lib. i. c. 6), who describes the caracalla as a sleeved tunic made somewhat in the fashion of a corselet, χειρῖσθωδὸς χιτῶν ἐς ὄρθρα καὶ τῶσαν τινα περικλυμένης. But the caracalla introduced into use by M. Aurelius was lengthened so as to reach nearly to the feet. So we must infer from the statement of Aurelius Victor: "Cum e Gallia vestem plurimum devesisset, talareque caracallas fecisset, coegissetque piebem ad se saltantium talibus introire, de nomine hujus vestis Caracalla nominatus est." Spartianus speaks still more distinctly to the same effect: "Ipse Caracalla nomen a vestimento quod populo dederat, devenisse usque ad talos, quod unctio non fuerat, unde hodieque dicuntur Antoniniane Caracallae ejusmodi, in usu maxime Romanæ plebis frequentatæ." From the reference to this vestment made by St. Jerome (Epistle to Eustobius), we may infer that, like other garments suited for out-door use, the caracalla was furnished with a hood. "Ephod . . . pallium miræ pulchritudinis præstritiogens fulgore oculis in modum caracallarum sed absque cuculla." The statement to the same effect made by St. Eucherius of Lyons, is evidently a mere reproduction of St. Jerome. (Enst. lib. ii. cap. 10. "Ephod, vestis sacerdotalis . . . Est autem velut in caracallas modum, sed sine cuculla.") [W. B. M.]

CARACALLA (in late Greek writers καρακάλλω). Originally a garment peculiar to Gaul; it was introduced into Roman use by the emperor M. Aurelius Antoninus, commonly known in consequence as Caracallus or Caracalla. See Ferrarius, de Re Vest. pars. ii. lib. i. c. 28. Ecclesiastical writers speak of it as worn by clerics (Ven. Beda, Hist. Eccl. lib. i. c. 7, referring to the year 305 A.D. and to the martyrdom of St. Alban), and as corresponding in shape to the Jewish ephod. So says St. Eucherius of Lyons, writing about the middle of the 5th century, and referring evidently to the genuine Gallic caracalla, which was a kind of short tunic with sleeves and furnished with a hood. With him agrees Dio Cassius (quoted by Rubenius, de Re Vest. lib. i. c. 6), who describes the caracalla as a sleeved tunic made somewhat in the fashion of a corselet, χειρῖσθωδὸς χιτῶν ἐς ὄρθρα καὶ τῶσαν τινα περικλυμένης. But the caracalla introduced into use by M. Aurelius was lengthened so as to reach nearly to the feet. So we must infer from the statement of Aurelius Victor: "Cum e Gallia vestem plurimum devesisset, talareque caracallas fecisset, coegissetque piebem ad se saltantium talibus introire, de nomine hujus vestis Caracalla nominatus est." Spartianus speaks still more distinctly to the same effect: "Ipse Caracalla nomen a vestimento quod populo dederat, devenisse usque ad talos, quod unctio non fuerat, unde hodieque dicuntur Antoniniane Caracallae ejusmodi, in usu maxime Romanæ plebis frequentatæ." From the reference to this vestment made by St. Jerome (Epistle to Eustobius), we may infer that, like other garments suited for out-door use, the caracalla was furnished with a hood. "Ephod . . . pallium miræ pulchritudinis præstritiogens fulgore oculis in modum caracallarum sed absque cuculla." The statement to the same effect made by St. Eucherius of Lyons, is evidently a mere reproduction of St. Jerome. (Enst. lib. ii. cap. 10. "Ephod, vestis sacerdotalis . . . Est autem velut in caracallas modum, sed sine cuculla.") [W. B. M.]

CARACALLA (in late Greek writers καρακάλλω). Originally a garment peculiar to Gaul; it was introduced into Roman use by the emperor M. Aurelius Antoninus, commonly known in consequence as Caracallus or Caracalla. See Ferrarius, de Re Vest. pars. ii. lib. i. c. 28. Ecclesiastical writers speak of it as worn by clerics (Ven. Beda, Hist. Eccl. lib. i. c. 7, referring to the year 305 A.D. and to the martyrdom of St. Alban), and as corresponding in shape to the Jewish ephod. So says St. Eucherius of Lyons, writing about the middle of the 5th century, and referring evidently to the genuine Gallic caracalla, which was a kind of short tunic with sleeves and furnished with a hood. With him agrees Dio Cassius (quoted by Rubenius, de Re Vest. lib. i. c. 6), who describes the caracalla as a sleeved tunic made somewhat in the fashion of a corselet, χειρῖσθωδὸς χιτῶν ἐς ὄρθρα καὶ τῶσαν τινα περικλυμένης. But the caracalla introduced into use by M. Aurelius was lengthened so as to reach nearly to the feet. So we must infer from the statement of Aurelius Victor: "Cum e Gallia vestem plurimum devesisset, talareque caracallas fecisset, coegissetque piebem ad se saltantium talibus introire, de nomine hujus vestis Caracalla nominatus est." Spartianus speaks still more distinctly to the same effect: "Ipse Caracalla nomen a vestimento quod populo dederat, devenisse usque ad talos, quod unctio non fuerat, unde hodieque dicuntur Antoniniane Caracallae ejusmodi, in usu maxime Romanæ plebis frequentatæ." From the reference to this vestment made by St. Jerome (Epistle to Eustobius), we may infer that, like other garments suited for out-door use, the caracalla was furnished with a hood. "Ephod . . . pallium miræ pulchritudinis præstritiogens fulgore oculis in modum caracallarum sed absque cuculla." The statement to the same effect made by St. Eucherius of Lyons, is evidently a mere reproduction of St. Jerome. (Enst. lib. ii. cap. 10. "Ephod, vestis sacerdotalis . . . Est autem velut in caracallas modum, sed sine cuculla.") [W. B. M.]

CARACALLA (in late Greek writers καρακάλλω). Originally a garment peculiar to Gaul; it was introduced into Roman use by the emperor M. Aurelius Antoninus, commonly known in consequence as Caracallus or Caracalla. See Ferrarius, de Re Vest. pars. ii. lib. i. c. 28. Ecclesiastical writers speak of it as worn by clerics (Ven. Beda, Hist. Eccl. lib. i. c. 7, referring to the year 305 A.D. and to the martyrdom of St. Alban), and as corresponding in shape to the Jewish ephod. So says St. Eucherius of Lyons, writing about the middle of the 5th century, and referring evidently to the genuine Gallic caracalla, which was a kind of short tunic with sleeves and furnished with a hood. With him agrees Dio Cassius (quoted by Rubenius, de Re Vest. lib. i. c. 6), who describes the caracalla as a sleeved tunic made somewhat in the fashion of a corselet, χειρῖσθωδὸς χιτῶν ἐς ὄρθρα καὶ τῶσαν τινα περικλυμένης. But the caracalla introduced into use by M. Aurelius was lengthened so as to reach nearly to the feet. So we must infer from the statement of Aurelius Victor: "Cum e Gallia vestem plurimum devesisset, talareque caracallas fecisset, coegissetque piebem ad se saltantium talibus introire, de nomine hujus vestis Caracalla nominatus est." Spartianus speaks still more distinctly to the same effect: "Ipse Caracalla nomen a vestimento quod populo dederat, devenisse usque ad talos, quod unctio non fuerat, unde hodieque dicuntur Antoniniane Caracallae ejusmodi, in usu maxime Romanæ plebis frequentatæ." From the reference to this vestment made by St. Jerome (Epistle to Eustobius), we may infer that, like other garments suited for out-door use, the caracalla was furnished with a hood. "Ephod . . . pallium miræ pulchritudinis præstritiogens fulgore oculis in modum caracallarum sed absque cuculla." The statement to the same effect made by St. Eucherius of Lyons, is evidently a mere reproduction of St. Jerome. (Enst. lib. ii. cap. 10. "Ephod, vestis sacerdotalis . . . Est autem velut in caracallas modum, sed sine cuculla.") [W. B. M.]

CARACALLA (in late Greek writers καρακάλλω). Originally a garment peculiar to Gaul; it was introduced into Roman use by the emperor M. Aurelius Antoninus, commonly known in consequence as Caracallus or Caracalla. See Ferrarius, de Re Vest. pars. ii. lib. i. c. 28. Ecclesiastical writers speak of it as worn by clerics (Ven. Beda, Hist. Eccl. lib. i. c. 7, referring to the year 305 A.D. and to the martyrdom of St. Alban), and as corresponding in shape to the Jewish ephod. So says St. Eucherius of Lyons, writing about the middle of the 5th century, and referring evidently to the genuine Gallic caracalla, which was a kind of short tunic with sleeves and furnished with a hood. With him agrees Dio Cassius (quoted by Rubenius, de Re Vest. lib. i. c. 6), who describes the caracalla as a sleeved tunic made somewhat in the fashion of a corselet, χειρῖσθωδὸς χιτῶν ἐς ὄρθρα καὶ τῶσαν τινα περικλυμένης. But the caracalla introduced into use by M. Aurelius was lengthened so as to reach nearly to the feet. So we must infer from the statement of Aurelius Victor: "Cum e Gallia vestem plurimum devesisset, talareque caracallas fecisset, coegissetque piebem ad se saltantium talibus introire, de nomine hujus vestis Caracalla nominatus est." Spartianus speaks still more distinctly to the same effect: "Ipse Caracalla nomen a vestimento quod populo dederat, devenisse usque ad talos, quod unctio non fuerat, unde hodieque dicuntur Antoniniane Caracallae ejusmodi, in usu maxime Romanæ plebis frequentatæ." From the reference to this vestment made by St. Jerome (Epistle to Eustobius), we may infer that, like other garments suited for out-door use, the caracalla was furnished with a hood. "Ephod . . . pallium miræ pulchritudinis præstritiogens fulgore oculis in modum caracallarum sed absque cuculla." The statement to the same effect made by St. Eucherius of Lyons, is evidently a mere reproduction of St. Jerome. (Enst. lib. ii. cap. 10. "Ephod, vestis sacerdotalis . . . Est autem velut in caracallas modum, sed sine cuculla.") [W. B. M.]

CARACALLA (in late Greek writers καρακάλλω). Originally a garment peculiar to Gaul; it was introduced into Roman use by the emperor M. Aurelius Antoninus, commonly known in consequence as Caracallus or Caracalla. See Ferrarius, de Re Vest. pars. ii. lib. i. c. 28. Ecclesiastical writers speak of it as worn by clerics (Ven. Beda, Hist. Eccl. lib. i. c. 7, referring to the year 305 A.D. and to the martyrdom of St. Alban), and as corresponding in shape to the Jewish ephod. So says St. Eucherius of Lyons, writing about the middle of the 5th century, and referring evidently to the genuine Gallic caracalla, which was a kind of short tunic with sleeves and furnished with a hood. With him agrees Dio Cassius (quoted by Rubenius, de Re Vest. lib. i. c. 6), who describes the caracalla as a sleeved tunic made somewhat in the fashion of a corselet, χειρῖσθωδὸς χιτῶν ἐς ὄρθρα καὶ τῶσαν τινα περικλυμένης. But the caracalla introduced into use by M. Aurelius was lengthened so as to reach nearly to the feet. So we must infer from the statement of Aurelius Victor: "Cum e Gallia vestem plurimum devesisset, talareque caracallas fecisset, coegissetque piebem ad se saltantium talibus introire, de nomine hujus vestis Caracalla nominatus est." Spartianus speaks still more distinctly to the same effect: "Ipse Caracalla nomen a vestimento quod populo dederat, devenisse usque ad talos, quod unctio non fuerat, unde hodieque dicuntur Antoniniane Caracallae ejusmodi, in usu maxime Romanæ plebis frequentatæ." From the reference to this vestment made by St. Jerome (Epistle to Eustobius), we may infer that, like other garments suited for out-door use, the caracalla was furnished with a hood. "Ephod . . . pallium miræ pulchritudinis præstritiogens fulgore oculis in modum caracallarum sed absque cuculla." The statement to the same effect made by St. Eucherius of Lyons, is evidently a mere reproduction of St. Jerome. (Enst. lib. ii. cap. 10. "Ephod, vestis sacerdotalis . . . Est autem velut in caracallas modum, sed sine cuculla.") [W. B. M.]

CARACALLA (in late Greek writers καρακάλλω). Originally a garment peculiar to Gaul; it was introduced into Roman use by the emperor M. Aurelius Antoninus, commonly known in consequence as Caracallus or Caracalla. See Ferrarius, de Re Vest. pars. ii. lib. i. c. 28. Ecclesiastical writers speak of it as worn by clerics (Ven. Beda, Hist. Eccl. lib. i. c. 7, referring to the year 305 A.D. and to the martyrdom of St. Alban), and as corresponding in shape to the Jewish ephod. So says St. Eucherius of Lyons, writing about the middle of the 5th century, and referring evidently to the genuine Gallic caracalla, which was a kind of short tunic with sleeves and furnished with a hood. With him agrees Dio Cassius (quoted by Rubenius, de Re Vest. lib. i. c. 6), who describes the caracalla as a sleeved tunic made somewhat in the fashion of a corselet, χειρῖσθωδὸς χιτῶν ἐς ὄρθρα καὶ τῶσαν τινα περικλυμένης. But the caracalla introduced into use by M. Aurelius was lengthened so as to reach nearly to the feet. So we must infer from the statement of Aurelius Victor: "Cum e Gallia vestem plurimum devesisset, talareque caracallas fecisset, coegissetque piebem ad se saltantium talibus introire, de nomine hujus vestis Caracalla nominatus est." Spartianus speaks still more distinctly to the same effect: "Ipse Caracalla nomen a vestimento quod populo dederat, devenisse usque ad talos, quod unctio non fuerat, unde hodieque dicuntur Antoniniane Caracallae ejusmodi, in usu maxime Romanæ plebis frequentatæ." From the reference to this vestment made by St. Jerome (Epistle to Eustobius), we may infer that, like other garments suited for out-door use, the caracalla was furnished with a hood. "Ephod . . . pallium miræ pulchritudinis præstritiogens fulgore oculis in modum caracallarum sed absque cuculla." The statement to the same effect made by St. Eucherius of Lyons, is evidently a mere reproduction of St. Jerome. (Enst. lib. ii. cap. 10. "Ephod, vestis sacerdotalis . . . Est autem velut in caracallas modum, sed sine cuculla.") [W. B. M.]

CARACALLA (in late Greek writers καρακάλλω). Originally a garment peculiar to Gaul; it was introduced into Roman use by the emperor M. Aurelius Antoninus, commonly known in consequence as Caracallus or Caracalla. See Ferrarius, de Re Vest. pars. ii. lib. i. c. 28. Ecclesiastical writers speak of it as worn by clerics (Ven. Beda, Hist. Eccl. lib. i. c. 7, referring to the year 305 A.D. and to the martyrdom of St. Alban), and as corresponding in shape to the Jewish ephod. So says St. Eucherius of Lyons, writing about the middle of the 5th century, and referring evidently to the genuine Gallic caracalla, which was a kind of short tunic with sleeves and furnished with a hood. With him agrees Dio Cassius (quoted by Rubenius, de Re Vest. lib. i. c. 6), who describes the caracalla as a sleeved tunic made somewhat in the fashion of a corselet, χειρῖσθωδὸς χιτῶν ἐς ὄρθρα καὶ τῶσαν τινα περικλυμένης. But the caracalla introduced into use by M. Aurelius was lengthened so as to reach nearly to the feet. So we must infer from the statement of Aurelius Victor: "Cum e Gallia vestem plurimum devesisset, talareque caracallas fecisset, coegissetque piebem ad se saltantium talibus introire, de nomine hujus vestis Caracalla nominatus est." Spartianus speaks still more distinctly to the same effect: "Ipse Caracalla nomen a vestimento quod populo dederat, devenisse usque ad talos, quod unctio non fuerat, unde hodieque dicuntur Antoniniane Caracallae ejusmodi, in usu maxime Romanæ plebis frequentatæ." From the reference to this vestment made by St. Jerome (Epistle to Eustobius), we may infer that, like other garments suited for out-door use, the caracalla was furnished with a hood. "Ephod . . . pallium miræ pulchritudinis præstritiogens fulgore oculis in modum caracallarum sed absque cuculla." The statement to the same effect made by St. Eucherius of Lyons, is evidently a mere reproduction of St. Jerome. (Enst. lib. ii. cap. 10. "Ephod, vestis sacerdotalis . . . Est autem velut in caracallas modum, sed sine cuculla.") [W. B. M.]

CARACALLA (in late Greek writers καρακάλλω). Originally a garment peculiar to Gaul; it was introduced into Roman use by the emperor M. Aurelius Antoninus, commonly known in consequence as Caracallus or Caracalla. See Ferrarius, de Re Vest. pars. ii. lib. i. c. 28. Ecclesiastical writers speak of it as worn by clerics (Ven. Beda, Hist. Eccl. lib. i. c. 7, referring to the year 305 A.D. and to the martyrdom of St. Alban), and as corresponding in shape to the Jewish ephod. So says St. Eucherius of Lyons, writing about the middle of the 5th century, and referring evidently to the genuine Gallic caracalla, which was a kind of short tunic with sleeves and furnished with a hood. With him agrees Dio Cassius (quoted by Rubenius, de Re Vest. lib. i. c. 6), who describes the caracalla as a sleeved tunic made somewhat in the fashion of a corselet, χειρῖσθωδὸς χιτῶν ἐς ὄρθρα καὶ τῶσαν τινα περικλυμένης. But the caracalla introduced into use by M. Aurelius was lengthened so as to reach nearly to the feet. So we must infer from the statement of Aurelius Victor: "Cum e Gallia vestem plurimum devesisset, talareque caracallas fecisset, coegissetque piebem ad se saltantium talibus introire, de nomine hujus vestis Caracalla nominatus est." Spartianus speaks still more distinctly to the same effect: "Ipse Caracalla nomen a vestimento quod populo dederat, devenisse usque ad talos, quod unctio non fuerat, unde hodieque dicuntur Antoniniane Caracallae ejusmodi, in usu maxime Romanæ plebis frequentatæ." From the reference to this vestment made by St. Jerome (Epistle to Eustobius), we may infer that, like other garments suited for out-door use, the caracalla was furnished with a hood. "Ephod . . . pallium miræ pulchritudinis præstritiogens fulgore oculis in modum caracallarum sed absque cuculla." The statement to the same effect made by St. Eucherius of Lyons, is evidently a mere reproduction of St. Jerome. (Enst. lib. ii. cap. 10. "Ephod, vestis sacerdotalis . . . Est autem velut in caracallas modum, sed sine cuculla.") [W. B. M.] rinth, is commemorated April 16 (Mart. Rom. Vet., Usuardi). [C.]

CARITAS. [CHARITAS.]

CARPAPHORUS. (1) One of the COCONATI QUATUOR, commemorated Nov. 8 (Mart. Rom. Vet., Usuardi).

(2) Presbyter, martyr at Spoleto, commemorated Dec. 10 (Mart. Rom. Vet., Usuardi). [C.]

CARPUS. (1) Bishop, martyr at Pergamus, commemorated April 13 (Mart. Rom. Vet., Usuardi).

(2) The disciple of Paul, martyr at Tross, commemorated Oct. 13 (Mart. Rom. Vet., Usuardi); as "Apostle" and one of the Seventy, May 27 (Cal. Byzant.).

(3) Bishop of Thyatira, martyr, Oct. 13 (Cal. Byzant.). [C.]

CARDINAL. As the Benedictine Editors of St. Gregory the Great (Ad Ep. l. 15) truly remark: "Nomen vetus, nova æt dignitas, purpuræ rectoris." Our chronological limits extend at most to the early dawn of the dignity, which is a long way out of sight of the purple. Cardinal winds, cardinal numbers, cardinal virtues, the cardinal altar, and car-nal mass, are expressions all illustrative of the gradual adaptation of the term to that which was chief in the hierarchy. As the name of "pope," or "papa," was originally common to all bishops, so the chief presbyters and deacons of any church to which a cure of souls was attached were apt to have the term "cardinal" applied to them by way of distinction long before it was applied to the presbyters and deacons of the Church of Rome in particular. Parish churches had come to be called "titles," as conferring a title upon those who served them; and a title, from the notion of fixity that was implied in it, "cardo," the hinge on which, when fixed to a door, the door turns. Then, as there were chapels and oratories that were not parish churches—in other words gave no distinctive title—so there were priests and deacons attached to parish churches temporarily, that were not fixtures; or who went by their titles, yet were not therefore called cardinals. In the writings of St. Gregory the Great this distinction comes out strongly, being applied by him even to bishops, as is shown by Thomassin (De Ren. ii. part. ii. 115). Thus, on one occasion, he bids the Bishop of Grosseto visit the church of Porto Barate, then vacant, and ordain "one cardinal presbyter and two deacons there" (Ep. i. 15). On another occasion we find him naming Martin, a Corsican bishop, whose see had been destroyed, "cardinal priest," or "pontiff," of another church in the island that had long been deprived of its bishop (l. 79). Elsewhere, he forbids Januarius, archbishop of Cagliari, making Liberatus "a cardinal-deacon," unless furnished with letters dimissory from his own diocesan (i. 83). "Cardinales violentè in parochiis ordinatos forensibus in pristinum cardinem revocant Gregorius," as is said of him by his own biographer, John the Deacon (iii. 11), a writer of the 9th century; instances of which abound in his epistles: "cardinare" and "incardinare" are words used by him in describing this process. The bishop, priest, or deacon, made "cardinal" of a church in this sense, was attached to it permanently, in contradistinction to bishop; administering the affairs of a diocese during a vacancy, and priests or deacons holding subordinate or temporary posts in a parish church. Of titles, or parish churches in Rome, the number seems to have varied in different ages. According to Anastasius, or whoever wrote the lives of these popes (on which see Cave, s. v.), St. Eusebius, A.D. 100-9, divided the city amongst his presbyters, and appointed seven deacons. St. Fabian, A.D. 234-50, divided its "regions" amongst these deacons. Cornelius, the next pope, tells us himself of as many as 44 presbyters there then, while the number of deacons remained the same (Euseb. vi. 43). From St. Dionysius, A.D. 259-69, being also credited by his biographer with having divided the churches in Rome amongst his presbyters, and instituted cemeteries and parishes or dioceses, we must infer that the old arrangements had been thrown into confusion, and the number of churches diminished considerably, by the persecutions under Decius and Valerian. And this would explain what we are told once more by Anastasius, that St. Marcellus, A.D. 308-10, appointed 25 titles, as parishes (quasi dioceses) in the city, for administering baptism and penance to the multitudes converted from paganism, and for burial of the martyrs. Long after this, the number of titles in the city stood at 28. Accordingly, when we read of a presbyter or deacon of the Roman church without any further distinction, a member of the Roman clergy is meant who was attached to some chapel or oratory within the city. When we read of a presbyter or deacon of some particular title there, a member of the Roman clergy is meant, who was either temporarily or permanently attached to one of the 25 or 28 parish churches, or seven regions of the city; and to those permanently attached to either the name of "cardinal" was given, after it had got into use elsewhere. Anastasius himself, or a namesake and contemporary of his, had it applied to him (Cave, s. v.). The fact that the popes in those days were elected, like most other bishops, by the clergy and people of their diocese, is amply sufficient to account for the prodigious importance that attached gradually to the cardinal presbyters and deacons of the Church of Rome, throwing those of all other churches into the shade. Cardinal bishops were not known there for some time afterwards, as Thomassin shews (ib. c. 116). On the contrary, the rule laid down under anathema by the synod under Stephen IV. A.D. 769, was, in the words of Anastasius, that "nobody, whether a layman, or of any other rank soever, should be capable of being advanced to the pontifical dignity, who had not risen regularly step by step, and been made cardinal presbyter or deacon." But when Anastasius, a little further on, speaks of the same pope appointing the seven bishops, whom he calls "hebdomadal cardinals," to functionate at the altar of St. Peter in turn, he is probably not using the phrase in the exact sense which it has since borne: as in the Council of Constantinople that restored Photius, A.D. 879, and was contemporary with Anastasius, Paul, bishop of Ancona, and Eugenius, bishop of Ostia, were present as legates of John VIII., and were styled and subscribed as such; while Peter, the third legate, subscribed as "presbyter and cardinal," and was so styled throughout (Bever. Synod. ii. 299). Similarly, in the list of subscriptions to the Roman synod that precede it, all the bishops write themselves bishops only, while the presbyters and deacons are written "cardinals" in addition. The seven bishops of Ostia, Porto, St. Rufina, Albano, Sabina, Tusculum, and Praeneste, began, in point of fact, to be called "cardinals" in the 11th century, or the age of St. Peter Damian, himself one of them, when formed into a college with the cardinal presbyters and deacons by the decree of Nicholas II. A.D. 1059, for electing all future popes. And it was a much later development by which bishops of distant sees came to be made cardinal deacons or presbyters of some church in Rome as well. For a description of the Roman church in the 11th century, by which time the seven cardinal bishops had been appointed to officiate there in turn for the pope: and the 28 cardinal presbyters distributed between the four churches of St. Mary Major, St. Peter, St. Paul, and St. Laurence, seven at each, see the old ritual in Barua, A.D. 1057, n. 19; Comp. the Liber Diuini Pontif. Rom. iii. 11, in Migne's Patrol. v. p. 77; and more in Du Cange, Hoffman, Moreri, Morone, s. v.; and Muratori, Antiq. Ital. v. 155-8. [E. S. F.]

U

CARENA (= Quadragesima). A forty-days' fast, imposed by a bishop upon clergy or laity, or by an abbot upon monks [PENTENCE]. A MS. Penitential, quoted by DuCange (s. v.), speaks of fasting on bread and water, "quod in communi sermone carina vocatur." [C.]

CARNIPRIVIUM, or CARNISPRIVIUM. This name is said by Macer (Hieroglyphicon, s. v.) to be applied to Quinquagesima Sunday, as being the last day on which it was permitted to eat flesh, the Lent fast anciently commencing on the following day, as, he says, is still customary with the Orientals and with some religious orders in Europe. In the calendar of the Greek Church, however, the Κυριακή Ἀποκριῶν [ΑΠΟΚΡΙΟΙΣ] is Scagesima Sunday. Beeth says (Rationale, c. 65), "Secunda Dominica Septuagesimae dicitur vulgo carnis-privium," where by the "second Sunday of Septuagesima" we must no doubt understand Quinquagesima; and this Sunday is called in the Mozarabic Missal Dominica ante carnis tollendas (DuCange's Glossary, s. v.) [C.]

CARNIVAL. This word, variously derived from "curo vale," or "ubi caro valet," is applied, in the narrowest sense, to the three days preceding Ash-Wednesday; in a wider sense to the whole period from St. Blaise's Day (Feb. 3) to Ash-Wednesday. The period immediately preceding Lent has long been a season devoted to somewhat more than usual gaiety, in anticipation of the austerities of Lent. (Wetzer and Welte's Kirchenlexicon.) [C.]

CARPENTORACENSE CONCILIIUM [CARPENTRAS.]

CARPENTRAS, COUNCIL OF [near Narbonne, CARPENTORACENSE], A.D. 527, Nov. 6, respecting the fair distribution of revenue between the bishop and the parish-priest [Lab. Conc. iv. 1663]. [A. W. H.]

CARTHAGE, COUNCILS OF. [AFRICAN COUNCILS.]

CASK, as symbol. [DOLIUM.]

CASK common (2) 1 monite
(3) M (Rom.
(Mart.
(4) M
Dec. 3
(5) C
29 (Cal.

CASS
memora
(2) M Usuardi

CASS Casaque determin older gam ment and have the French calla" (se senting au through 3, 6-8; irruids nexion wit cides (a the 2nd c Belgus, 4 tain garr kaza. "
... Acu
verba sun
... Acu
alias origi eaces in que?

CASTO Rome, is Vel, Usua

CASTO
April 27
28 (ib.).

CASTO
memorate
(2) Mar
(Mart. Rom

CASTO
century, is Vel, Bada
(3) Mar
(3) Mar
Usuardi).

CASUL ISPULA, P.
§ 1. The Cantia (wh nature orig before us i It is used, f or hat; as
S. Juliani, c (De Off. Ec also, and fai an outer g

syuod that precede it. themselves bishops only, and deacons are written. The seven bishops of Albano, Sabina, Tuscan, in point of fact, to in the 11th century, or an, himself one of them, with the cardinal preside decree of Nicholas II. future popes. And it ment by which bishops e made cardinal deacons urch in Rome as well. Roman church in the time the seven cardinal te to the church of nte there in turn for rdinal presbyters distr- churches of St. Mary ul, and St. Laurence, old ritual in Baroa. de Liber Diu nus Pontif. Patrol. v. p. 77; and an, Moreri, Morone, s. v.; l. v. 155-8. [E. S. F.] ragena). A forty-days' p upon clergy or laity, onks [PENTECOSTE]. A d by Duengue (s. v.), and water, "quod in vocatur." [C.]

OF CARNISPRIVIVM. This (Hiero'caricon, s. v.) gesima Sunday, as being it was permitted to eat ently commencing on the s, is still customary with some religious orders in ar of the Greek Church, Αρόρεως [ΑΡΟΡΕΩΣ] is eleth says (Rationie, e. a Septuagesimae dicitur here by the "second a" we must no doubt ma; and this Sunday is ic Missal Dominica ante e's Glossary, s. v.) [C.]

word, variously derived abi caro valet," is applied, to the three days pre- in a wider sense to Blaise's Day (Feb. 3) to period immediately preben a season devoted to and gaily, in anticipation at. (Wetzer and Welte's [C.]

TENSE CONCILIVM

COUNCIL OF [FRANCIFENSE]. A.D. 527, Nor. distribution of revenue d the parish-priest [Abb. [A. W. H.]

COUNCILS OF. [AFRICAN

[DOLIVM.]

CASSIANUS

CASSIANUS. (1) Martyr at Saragossa, 18 commemorated April 16 (Mart. Usuardi).

(2) Bishop and confessor of Autun, is commemorated Aug. 5 (Mart. Usuardi).

(3) Martyr at Rome (Bede), or at Imola (Rom. Vet., Usuardi, is commemorated Aug. 13 (Mart. Rom. Vet., Bedae, Usuardi).

(4) Martyr at Tangiers, is commemorated Dec. 3 (Mart. Usuardi).

(5) Of Rome, A.D. 431, is commemorated Feb. 29 (Cal. Byzant.). Perhaps identical with (3). [C.]

CASSIUS. (1) Martyr at Damascus, is commemorated July 20 (Mart. Usuardi).

(2) Martyr, is commemorated Oct. 10 (Mart. Usuardi). [C.]

CASSOCK. (Ital. Casacha, Casachina; Fr. Casaque; Flem. Casacke.) It is not easy to determine with what older words, or with what older garment, the present 'cassock,' as a garment and as a word, is to be identified. Some have thought that the Italian 'casacha' and the French 'casaque' are to be traced to 'caracalla' (see the article above), 'casacha' representing an older 'caracha.' Others trace the word through κασῶς or κασῶς (Xenophon, Cyrop. viii. 3, 6-8; Jul. Pollux, vii. 68, describing it as ἰσχυρὸς χιτῶν) to κάς, skin or hide. In connection with this it may be noticed that Agatharctides (a Greek grammarian, at Alexandria, of the 2nd century B.C.), quoted by Lepsius (Ep. ad Belgas, 44), states that the Egyptians had certain garments made of felt which they called κάραι. "Apud Aegyptios στολὰς τινὰς πηλῆρας, verba sunt Agatharctidae, προσαγορεύουσι κάραις . . . Acue in ultima habes 'casack,' difficulti alias originations." See this and other references in Ménage, Dict. Etym. under 'Casaque.' [W. B. M.]

CASTOLUS, or CASTULUS, martyr at Rome, is commemorated March 26 (Mart. Rom. Vet., Usuardi). [C.]

CASTOR, martyr at Tarsus, is commemorated April 27 (Mart. Hieron., Usuardi); also March 28 (ib.). [C.]

CASTORIUS. (1) Martyr at Rome, is commemorated July 7 (Mart. Rom. Vet., Usuardi). (2) Martyr at Rome under Diocletian, Nov. 8 (Mart. Rom. Vet., Bedae, Usuardi). [C.]

CASTIS. (1) Martyr in Africa in the 3rd century, is commemorated May 22 (Mart. Rom. Vet., Bedae, Usuardi).

(2) Martyr, Sept. 4 (Mart. Hieron., Usuardi). (3) Martyr at Capua, Oct. 6 (Mart. Hieron., Usuardi). [C.]

CASULA. (See also AMPHIBALUM, PLANETA, BIVLA, PAENULA.)

§ 1. The word and its derivation.—The word Casula (whence Fr. and Eng. Chasuble), a diminutive originally of casa, "a cottage," comes before us in patristic literature in two senses. It is used, first, in its literal meaning of a cottage or hut; as by St. Gregory of Tours (De Mirac. S. Juliani, cap. xlv.), and by St. Isidore of Seville (De Off. Eccl. lib. II. 'de mon'chis'). It is used also, and far more commonly, as a designation for an outer garment; the word having been in all probability a provincial term, of popular use, for the garment which in the older Latin was known as a paenula. St. Isidore of Seville, circ. 600 A.D., is the first writer who gives any formal derivation of the word, or anything approaching to a description of the garment itself. "The casula," he says (De Origin. xix. cap. 21), "is a garment furnished with a hood (vestis cucullata); and is a diminutive of 'casa,' a cottage, seeing that, like a small cottage or hut, it covers the entire person." Philo Judaeus, some 600 years earlier, had used a similar comparison, when, describing a garment made of goat-skins (no doubt a rough paenula) commonly worn in his time, he says that it formed a "portable house" (φορητὴ οἰκία) for travellers, soldiers, and others, who were obliged to be much in the open air. (De Victimis, Philonis Opp. Fol. Paris, 1640, p. 836, A.)

CASULA

293

§ 2. Form and material of the Casula.—As a description of the form or appearance of the casula, which will add anything to that of St. Isidore already quoted, the earliest notice we have is in a MS. of uncertain date (probably 9th century, or thereabout), containing fragmentary notices of the old Gallican liturgy (Martone, Theaurus Anecdot. tom. v. col. 99): "Casula, quam amphibalum vocant quo sacerdos induitur, tota unita . . . Ideo sine manicis, quia sacerdos potius benedicit quam ministrat. Ideo unita extrinsecus, non scissis, non aperta, quia multae sunt Scripturae sacrae secreta mysteria, quae quasi sub sigillo sacerdos doctus debet abscondere," etc. This "vestment," for Church use, for such it here is (see below, § 5), is here described as "made in one piece throughout," as "without sleeves," and "without slit or opening in front." This description is exactly what might be expected on the supposition that the casula was virtually a paenula under another name. And it exactly corresponds with the earliest representations of the chasuble preserved in ecclesiastical art. (See PLANETA.)

The materials of the casula varied according to the purposes to which it was designed to serve. In the earlier periods of its history, when it was regarded as a garb of very humble pretensions, it was made of wool (St. Augustine, De Civit., quoted below, § 9), and probably also, like the paenula, often of skins, dressed with the wool or fur upon them. But, from the sixth century downwards, we hear of chasubles of brilliant colour (superbis coloris), and of costly materials, such as silk. Boniface III. (A.D. 806) sent a chasuble, formed partly of silk and partly of fine goats'-hair, as a present to king Pepin. (Bonifacii, P. P. III. Epist. III. apud Oct. Ferrarium, De Re Vest. p. 685.)

§ 3. Various uses of the Casula.—The earliest notices of the casula shew that, like the paenula, it was originally a garment of very humble character, such as would be worn by peasants and artisans as their ordinary out-door dress, for protection against cold and wet. Being furnished with a hood, it was both hat and cloak in one. St. Augustine, writing about the close of the 4th century, but speaking of a story dating from before his own time, tells a tale of one Florentius, a working tailor at Hippo, who lost his casula, and had no money to buy a new one (De Civit. Dei, lib. xxii. cap. 8, § 9). Fifty "folles," as we learn from the course of the story, would have been thought about a reasonable sum for him to pay. But he himself for greater economy meant to buy some wool, which his wife might make up for him as best she could. In another passage (Sermon evil. cap. v. opp. tom. v. p. 530) St. Augustine speaks of the casula as a garment which any one of his congregation might be expected to possess, and one which every one would take care to have good of its kind. A notice of the casula, preserved to us in Procopius (De Bello Vandalico, lib. ii. cap. 26), shews that even to his time (circa 530) the tradition had survived of the very humble character attaching to this dress. He has occasion to speak of the abject submission by which Areobindus, when defeated by Gotharis, sought to disarm the anger of the victor. And he speaks of him as putting upon him an outer garment insulted for a general, or for any warlike usage, but befitting a slave or a man of humble station; this being, he adds, what the Romans, in the speech of Latium, call casobla.

§ 4. Worn by Monks, and, as an out-door dress, by the Clergy.—The same reasons which made the casula a suitable dress for peasants, recommended it also as a habit for monks. Ferrandus, first the deacon and afterwards the biographer of Facondus, bishop of Ruspæ, in Africa, tells us that the bishop retained his monastic dress and ascetic habits after being advanced to episcopal dignity (circa 507 A.D.). He continued to wear a monk's leathern girdle (pelliceam cingulum); and neither used himself, nor permitted his monks to use, a casula of costly quality or of brilliant colour ("Casulam pretiosam vel superbi coloris nec ipse habuit, nec suos monachos habere permisit"). At a period a little after this St. Caesarius, archbishop of Arles in Gaul († 540), is described as wearing a casula in his ordinary walks about the streets (S. Caesarii Vita, apud Acta Sanctorum, Augusti d. xvii. tom. vi.). And he had also one special casula, of finer material doubtless, and either white or of some rich colour, for processional use. ("Casulam, qua in processionibus utebatur, et albam paschalem, profert, latque egeno, jubetque ut vendat uni ex clero.") The same bishop, in his will, when disposing of his wardrobe, distinguishes between the indumenta paschalia, or vestments for church use on Sundays and high festivals, which had been presented to him, and his casula villosa, or long-napped clonk, which would be suitable for out-door wear only:—"Sancto et domino meo archiepiscopo, qui mihi indigno digne successerit . . . indumenta paschalia, quæ mihi data sunt, omnia illi serviant, simul cum casula villosa et tunica vel galnape quod melius dimisero. Reliquæ vero vestimenta mea, excepto birro amiculari, mei tam clericis quam laici . . . dividant."

At or just after the close of the sixth century a further notice of the casula, preserved to us by John the Deacon (Vita Gregorii Vita, lib. iv. cap. 63), serves to indicate that the casula, worn at Rome as an out-door habit by ecclesiastics, must have differed in some respects from the customary dress then worn in the East by persons of the same class. One abbot John, a Persian, came to Rome in St. Gregory's days, "ad adorandum loculos sanctorum Apostolorum Petri et Pauli." "One day," so he himself tells the story, "I was standing in the middle of the city, when who should come across towards me but Papa Gregorius. Just as I was thinking of making my obeisance to him ("miltere me ante eum"), the pope came close up, and seeing my intention, sicut coram Deo dico, fratres, he bowed himself to the ground before me, and would not rise till I had done so first. Then embracing me with much humility, he slipped three pieces of money into my hand, and desired that a casula should be given me, and everything else that I required."

This use of the casula as the characteristic out-door garb of the clergy, and in many places also of monks, was maintained in the West from the 5th to the 8th century. In the Council of Ratisbon, held in April, A.D. 742, under the presidency of St. Boniface, one of the canons determined on was directed against those of the clergy who (in out-door life, as we may infer) adopted the dress of laymen, the surpula, or short open clonk then commonly worn. "We have decreed that presbyters and deacons shall wear, not 'surpula, but 'casulae, as becometh servants of God." ("Decevinus quoque ut presbyteri vel diaconi non singis laicorum more, sed casulis utantur, cum servorum Dei.")

§ 5. Use of the Casula as a Vestment of Holy Ministry.—From the 5th to the 8th century the term PLANETA (q. v.) appears to have been the term ordinarily employed in Italy and Spain, if not elsewhere, for the supervestment worn in offices of holy ministry. The earliest un doubted evidence of the word casula being used in this precise meaning dates from the 9th century, or possibly the 8th, if the Sacramentary of St. Gregory belongs in its present form to that time. But the usages of words in formal documents such as this last, confirmed as this is by the nearly contemporary writings (circa 820) of Rabanus Maurus, Amalarius, and Walafrid Strabo, indicate, generally, a considerably earlier popular usage. However this may be, we know that from the date of these last writers to the present time, the word casula has been used as the exact equivalent of planeta by western ritualists, and has in general usage quite superseded all other terms, such as amphibalium, infula, planetæ, by which at various times it has been designated.

It does not fall within the compass of this work to trace the various modifications of the 'chasuble,' in respect of form, material, and ornament, from the 9th century downwards, or to treat of the various symbolical meanings attributed to it. Full information, however, upon these points will be found in the following treatises. Boek, Geschichte der liturgischen Gewänder des Mittelalters, 2 vols. 8vo., Bonn, 1866; Pugin, Glossary of Ecclesiastical Ornament, fol., London, 1846; Rock, The Church of our Fathers, London, 1849; and in the Vestiarius Christianum (London, 1808) of the writer of this article. [W. B. M.] CATABASIA (Καταβασία). An anthem or short hymn in the Greek offices, so called because the two sides of the choir come down (καταβαίνουσα) into the body of the church and unite in singing it. It often occurs between the "odes" of a "cannon;" and its construction is that of any other "troparion." Sometimes two "catabasies" occur together between each ode, as on the Sunday after Christmas-day, where each pair consists of the first troparion of the corresponding odes of the two canons for Christmas-day, mentioned in a preceding article. [H. J. H.]

CATACOMBS. Few words are more familiar, or more universally intelligible than "Catacombs," as an struc its or whate nation partic

The
which rived low," spread Βακού
A-S. valley skrit
d. Inf vluia elbor καλέρ near th of Hon from it designa
ment
his Co erection
A. D. 11
words, Cirem Basilica name i stantia Constant Maurice excusing the Apoc gift to t (Greg. M ing of th he writ millaria collocat found in Myropol to adopt his, and for "coe cunas n believing were know later per Primitiv mongrel, second cle is based o sibly he r of St. Sel reason for onymous nu of St. Seb loco qui el batur." All thron catacumbas terranean sense) adju ("in loco q beati Sebas

* For other generic cf. "C
"basilica," &c

... he bowed himself and would not rise till men embracing me with three pieces of money and that casula should be else that I required." as the characteristic outward in many places also in the West from the ... In the Council of A.D. 742, under the pre- of the canons deter- minant those of the clergy in Italy and Spain, if not vestment worn in offices earliest undoubted evi- being used in this precise 8th century, or possibly of St. Gregory he to that time. But the documents such as this by the nearly contem- of Rabanus Maurus. St. Abbo, indicate, gener- or popular usage. How- that from the date of present time, the word the exact equivalent of lists, and has in general all other terms, such as castra, by which at various ted.

... in the compass of this modifications of the of form, material, and century downwards, or symbolical meanings information, however, found in the following Lehrbuch der liturgischen 2 vols. 8vo., Bonn, of Ecclasiastical Orna-; Rock, The Church of; and in the Vestiarius (18) of the writer of this [W. B. M.] Barla). An anthem or offices, so called because come down (karabala) the church and unite in between the "odes" construction is that of Sometimes two "cata- between each ode, as of -mas-day, where each -trouper of the corre- canons for Christ- -ing article. [H. J. H.]

... words are more familiar, ible than "Catacomb," as signifying a subterranean excavation con- structed for the internment of the dead. Yet in its original meaning the word had no connection whatsoever with sepulture, or even with exen- tious, but was simply used as the name of a particular district in the vicinity of Rome.*

The word Catacumbæ, the earliest form in which we meet with it, is unquestionably de- rived from the Greek κατὰ and κῦμα, "a hol- low," and so "a cup," "a boat," &c., a widely spread root which we trace in the Greek κῦμα, βαθος, the Latin Cymba, the Celtic Cym, the A.-S. Cūmbe, and the Piedmontese Comba, "a valley," or "hollow." It is allied to the Sans- krit kaumbha, "a pit." In DuCange (Gloss. Med. & Inf. Græcitas) we find "Κῦμα, Cymba— κλαία περιφερὴ Ῥωμαίων, Ἰνδίας." "κῦματιον, εἶδος ποταμοῦ παραλίθιον τῷ σχήματι κλοῖον ἢ καλεῖται κῦματιον." Auctor. Etymol. The district near the tomb of Cecilia Metella and the Circus of Itonulus on the Appian Way appears, probably from its natural configuration, to have borne this designation. In the Imperii Cæsariani, a document of the 7th century, printed by Eckard in his Corpus Hist. Med. Aet. vol. i. p. 31, the erection of the Circus of Maxentius, or Romulus, A. D. 311, in that locality is spoken of in these words, "Maxentius Terminus in Palatio fecit et Circum in Catecumbis." The site of the adjacent Basilica of St. Sebastian is indicated by the same name in a letter of Gregory the Great to Con- stantia (the daughter of the Emperor Tiberius Constantinus, married by him to his successor Maurice) towards the end of the 6th century, ex- ceusing himself for not sending her the head of the Apostle Paul, which she had requested as a gift to the Church she had erected in his honour (Greg. Mag. Epist. iv. Ind. xii. Ep. 30). Speak- ing of the bodies of the Apostles Peter and Paul he writes "quæ ducta usque ad secundum urbis miliarium in loco qui dicitur [ad] cat-cumbas collocata sunt." A various reading, catocumbas, found in some MSS., and adopted by Baronius, Hystorol. ad xiii. Kal. Feb. has led some writers to adopt a different etymology, ad (κατὰ) tum- bus, and to consider the word an early synonym for "coemeterium." But the best MSS. read cumbas not tumbas, and there is no ground for believing that Christian burial places generally were known by any such name till a considerably later period. The view of Padre Marchi (Monum. Primæ, p. 209), that the word cat-cumbæ is a mongrel, half Greek and half Latin, and that the second element is to be found in the verb cumbo, is based on false philological principles, and may safely be rejected. The distance of the Basilica of St. Sebastian from the Tiber is a sufficient reason for discrediting the etymology of the anony- mous author of the History of the Translation of St. Sebastian, c. vi. "Milliaris tertio ab Urbe, loco qui ob stationem navium Catacumbas dicitur."

All through the middle ages the phrase "ad catacumbas" was used to distinguish the sub- terranean cemetery (cat-cumb) in the modern sense) adjacent to the Basilica of St. Sebastian ("in loco qui appellatur C. Catecumbas ubi corpus beati Sebastiani martyris cum aliis quiescit.")

* For other examples of a local name becoming generic cf. "Capitol," "Palace," "Academy," "Newgate," "Bollan," &c.

Anast. Hadrian. l. § 343; "coemeterio Sancti Christi martyris Sebastiani in cat-cumba." Id. Nicolaus l. § 601) while the term itself in its re- stricted sense designated a subterranean chapel communicating with that Basilica in which, according to tradition, the bodies of the two great Apostles had been deposited after the in- effectual attempt of the Greeks, referred to by S. Gregory u. s. to steal them away (Hosio, Rom. Soteran. cap. xiii.). In documents from the 6th to the 13th century we continually meet with the expressions "festum ad catacumbas," "locus qui dicitur in catacumbas," and the like. The earliest authority is a list of the Roman ceme- teries of the 6th century, where we find "cime- terium catecumbas ad St. Sebastianum Via Appia." In the De Mirabilibus Rebus of the 13th century we read "Coemeterio Calisti juxta Catacumbas." The first recorded use of the word in its modern sense out of Rome is at Naples in the 9th century (De Rossi, R. S. l. 87.)

Here, at the beginning of the 8th century, writes, de Sæ actibus sancti ad ann. 4327. "Damasus, Romæ episcopus fecit basilicam juxta theatrum S. Laurentio et aliam in cat-cumbis ubi jace- runt corpora sancta Apostolorum Petri et Pauli." The celebrity acquired by this cemetery as the temporary resting-place of the chief of the Apostles led to a general familiarity with its name, and a gradual identification of the term "cat-cumbæ" with the cemetery itself. When in process of time the other underground places of internment of the Christians fell into neglect and oblivion, and the very entrances to them were concealed, and their existence almost for- gotten, this one beneath the Church of St. Sebastian remained always open as the object of pilgrimage, and by degrees transferred its name to all similar subterranean cemeteries. "A visit to the cemeteries became synonymous with a visit ad cat-cumbas, and the term cat-cumb gradually came to be regarded as the specific name for all subterranean excavations for purposes of burial, not only in the neighbourhood of Rome, but also in Naples, Malta, Paris, Sicily, and wherever else similar excavations have been discovered" (Northeote, R. S. 109).

Origin.—Until a comparatively recent period a very erroneous opinion as to the origin of the subterranean cemeteries of Rome was univer- sally entertained. No one thought of calling in question the assertion that they were ex- hausted sandpits, and had been originally exca- vated for the purpose of obtaining the volcanic stratum known as arena by the ancients, and as porzolana by the moderns, so extensively used by them in the composition of their mortar; and that the Christians, finding in the laby- rinthine recesses of these deserted arenarie suit- able places for the concealment of the bodies of their martyred brethren, had taken possession of them and employed them as cemeteries. There was great plausibility about this view. It seemed to derive support from the 'Martyro- logies' and other ancient documents in which the expressions in arenario, or juxta arenarum, or in cryptis arenariis are of not unfrequent occurrences. It also removed the seeming difficulty, which a fuller understanding of the laws regulating sepulture among the Romans has dissipated, as to the possibility of a small and persecuted body excavating galleries of such enormous extent, and disposing of the material extracted from them without attracting the notice and provoking the interference of the supporters of the dominant religion. Once started and given to the world under the authority of the names of men of acknowledged learning it found general acceptance, and became an historical tradition indolently accepted by one generation of investigators after another. Bosio, the pioneer of all subsequent examinations of the catacombs, maintained a discreet silence upon the origin of the subterranean cemeteries; but their Pagan origin is accepted by Baronius, Severano, Bottari, Boldetti, and other writers on the subject. Marchi, with a touch of quiet sarcasm, affirms that it causes him no surprise that this hypothesis should have been maintained by Bottari, who, it is abundantly evident, "studied the subterranean Rome quite at his ease not under but above ground." (Marchi, u. s. p. 15.) But he confesses to astonishment that "the excellent Boldetti," with all the opportunities afforded by personal examination for perceiving the wide difference between the arenariæ and the cemeteries which lie below them, should have never seen the untenableness of the traditional view. In more modern times the same origin of the catacombs was asserted by D'Agincourt, Raoul-Rochette, and indeed by every one who wrote on the subject. Padre Marchi has the merit of being the first to promulgate the true doctrine that the catacombs were the work of Christians alone, and from the first designed for places of sepulture. The Padre ingeniously informs us (p. 7) that he commenced his investigations with the most unquestioning faith in the universally received theory, and that it was only by degrees that his studies and experience, not among books and papers, but in quarries, cemeteries, and sand-pits, led him to an opposite conclusion, and put him in a position to declare to the world as an unquestionable fact, that in the Christian cemeteries no Pagan ever gave a single blow with pickaxe or chisel. The brothers De Rossi, the pupils of Padre Marchi in the work of investigation, have continued his labours in the same path of patient examination of facts, and that with such success that it may now be regarded as established beyond controversy that the origin of the catacombs was Christian and not Pagan, and that they were constructed expressly for the purpose of interment, and had no connection with the arenariæ beyond that of juxtaposition. In certain cases, as at St. Callistus and St. Agnes, the catacombs lie at the side of or beneath those excavations, so that they are entered from them, the arenariæ effectually masking the doors of access to the Christian galleries, while they afforded them an easy mode of removing the excavated earth.

* In the same way as this cemetery of St. Sebastian was known by the designation "ad catacumbas," others were specified as "ad Nymphas," "ad Ursinum pileatum," "inter duas lauros," "ad Sextum Philippi," and the like.

Padre Marchi's confidence in the old theory of the Pagan origin of the catacombs was first disturbed by a careful examination of the geological characteristics of the strata in which they were, as a rule, excavated. The surface of the Campagna surrounding Rome, especially on the left bank of the Tiber, where the catacombs are chiefly situated, is almost entirely formed of materials of volcanic origin. These igneous strata are of different composition and antiquity. We will only specify the three with which we are concerned, viz., the so-called tufa litoidè, tufa granolare, and pozzolana pura. The pozzolana pura is a friable sand rock, entirely destitute of any cementing substance to bind the molecules together and give them the nature of stone. The tufa granolare is in appearance almost the same rock as the pozzolana pura. The distinguishing mark is the presence of a slight cement, which gives the mass some degree of solidity, and unites the sandy particles into a stone which is cut with the greatest ease. The third stratum, the tufa litoidè, is a red conglomerate cemented into a substance of sufficient hardness to form an exceedingly useful building stone. Of these three strata, it was the first and the last alone which were worked by the ancient Romans for architectural purposes, while it is exclusively in the second, the tufa granolare, that the catacombs were excavated. The tufa litoidè was employed from the earliest ages, as it still is, in the buildings of Rome. The interior of the Clœca Maxima, the Tabularium of the Capitol, and others of the most ancient architectural works, attest its durability, as well as the early date of its use, and it is still extensively quarried as building stone at the foot of Monte Verde, outside the Porta Portese (Murray's Hand-book for Rome, p. 324). While this formation furnished the stone for building, the third named—the pozzolana pura, found in insulated deposits, rarely of any considerable extent—supplied the sand required for the composition of the mortar, and as such is commended by Vitruvius (Arch. iii. 7) as preferable to every other kind. The vicinity of Rome, and indeed some parts of the city itself, abounded in pozzolana pits, or arenariæ, forming an intricate network of excavations, not running in straight lines, as the galleries of the catacombs do almost universally, but pursuing tortuous paths, following the direction of the sinuous veins of the earth the builders were in search of. References to these sand-pits, whose dark recesses afforded secure concealment as well to the perpetrators of deeds of blood as to their intended victims, appear in some of the chief classical writers. Cicero mentions that the young patrician Asiaticus had been inveigled into the gardens of the Esquiline, where he was murdered and precipitated into one of the sand-quarries: "Asinius autem . . . quasi in hortulos iret, in arenarias quasdam extra Portam Esquilinam deductus occiditur" (Orat. pro Cluentio, c. 13). Suetonius also relates that when the trembling Nero, fearing instant assassination, took refuge in the villa of his freedman Pharon, between the Nomentan and Salaria roads, he was advised to conceal himself in a adjacent sand-pit, "in specum egestas arenæ," but he vowed that he would not go underground alive. "negavit se vivum sub terram Iturum" (Sueton. in Neron. 48).

Exhausted sand-pits of this kind also afforded burial places for the lowest dregs of the populace, for slaves, and others who on ceremonial grounds were denied the honour of the funeral pile. The best known are those left by the sand-diggers on the Esquiline, which, we learn from H. for the their p. rescued converted (7-16).

• Huc Cosc Huc

(Cf. the the pass tantur p publica pits wen publicatæ cardag were als (Faciolæ simi, l. We no theory se miss. Miss nings of horrible brium of words, th with the than the where the laid, and were left ace with absurdity the correct call into might be with the cious mad servation Jan. 1859.

But, if connection teries of proved by P. Marchi, of the bro aluded at pozzolana excavators system of tufa gran arated th which con threefold t granular t which con inconveni engineers a which wou and in whic could have stratum of adapted for bility of th cannot be l Northcot: sistency to ries and chis its porous n off from it wholesome, ere the catacombs are entirely formed of origin. These igneous composition and antiquity, e three with which we e-called tufa litoides, tufa granularis, tufa arenaria. The pozzolana ck, entirely destitute of to bind the molecules the nature of stone.

appearance almost the stans pura. The distin-essence of a slight cement, some degree of solidity, articles into a stone which eases. The third stratum, a conglomerate cemented ient hardness to form an dging stone. Of these first and the last alone the ancient Romans for while it is exclusively in granulare, that the cata-The tufa litoides was est ages, as it still is, in e. The interior of the ularium of the Capitol, st ancient architectural lity, as well as the early still extensively quarried e foot of Monte Verde, ese (Murray's Handbook) hile this formation fur-ding, the third named—and in insulated deposits, the extent—supplied the composition of the mortar, ved by Vitruvius (Arch. every other kind. The indeed some parts of the pozzolana pits, or aren- cate network of excava-right lines, as the galleries most universally, but pur-following the direction of e earth the builders were nces to these sand-pits, brled secure concealment ators of deeds of blood as is, appear in some of the Cicero mentions that sianus had been inveigled Esquiline, where he was nted into one of the sand-tem . . . quasi in hora quasiam extra Portam oceditur" (Orat. pro tonius also relates that ero, fearing instant assassn the villa of his freedvised to conceal himself pit, "in spectum egestas d that he would not go negavit se rivum sub on. in Neron. 48). of this kind also afforded lowest dregs of the poputhers who on ceremonial the honour of the funeral n are those left by the squiline, which, we learn

CATACOMBS

from Horace, were used as common receptacles for the vilest corpses, and defiled the air with their pestilential exhalations, until Maecenas rescued the district from its degradation and converted it into a garden (Horat. Serr. i. 8, 7-16).

"Huc prius angustis ejecta cadavera cellis, Conversus vili portanda locabat in arca.
Huc miserae plebi stabat commune sepulchrum."

(Cf. the commentary of Acron the Scholiast on the passage: "Huc aliquando cadavera portabantur plebeiorum sive servorum: nam sepulchra publica erant antea.") These loathsome burial pits were known by the names of puteoli or puteolae; a diminutive of puteus, "a well," according to the etymology given by Festus. They were also designated culinae, from their shape. (Faciolat. sub. voc. culina; Padre Lupi, Dissertationi, I. § cxxxix. p. 63).

We need not pause to refute the monstrous theory so carelessly propounded by Basnage, Burnet, Mison, &c., which identified the first beginnings of the Christian catacombs with these horrible charnel-houses, which were the opprobrium of Paganism, and asserted, in Burnet's words, that "those burying-places that are graced with the pompous title of catacombs are no other than the puteoli mentioned by Festus Pompeius, where the meanest sort of the Roman slaves were laid, and so without any further care about them were left to rot." The most superficial acquaintance with the catacombs will convince us of the absurdity of such an hypothesis, and prove the correctness of the assertion that "the puteoli into which the carrion of the Roman slaves might be flung had not the slightest analogy with the decorous, careful, and expensive provisions made by the early Christians for the conservation of their dead" (Edin. Rev. No. 221, Jan. 1859).

But, if otherwise probable, this presumed connection between the arenariae and the cemeteries of the Christians would be at once disproved by the remarkable fact first noticed by P. Marchi, and confirmed by the investigations of the brothers De Rossi, to which we have alluded above, that the strata which furnished pozzolana pura were carefully avoided by the excavators of the catacombs, who ran their vast system of galleries almost exclusively in the tufa granularis. While, on the one hand, they avoided the solid strata of the tufa litoides, which could not be quarried without at least threefold the time and labour required in the granular tufa, and the excavated material from which could not be disposed of without great inconvenience, with equal care these subterranean engineers avoided the layers of friable pozzolana which would have rendered their work insecure, and in which no permanent gallery or rock tomb could have been constructed, and selected that stratum of medium hardness which was best adapted for their peculiar purpose. The suitability of the tufa granularis for the object in view cannot be better stated than in the words of Dr. Northcote: "It is easily worked, of sufficient consistency to admit of being hollowed out into galleries and chambers without at once falling in, and its porous nature causes the water quickly to drain off from it, thus leaving the galleries dry and wholesome, an important consideration when we think of the vast number of dead bodies which once lined the walls of the subterranean cemeteries" (Roma Sotterr. p. 321). To these advantages may be added the facility with which the rock was triturated so as to be carried out of the excavations in the form of earth instead of heavy blocks of stone, as would have been the case in the quarries of compact tufa.

CATACOMBS

Plan of Arenaria

The exclusively Christian origin of the catacombs, and their destination from the first for purposes of interment is also evident, from the contrast furnished by their plan, form, and mode of construction, to the arenariae, or sand-pits, and lapidinae, or stone quarries, of ancient times. This contrast is made evident to the eye by Padre Marchi, from whom the annexed woodcuts are borrowed (Tuo i. iii. ix.-xii.), and by

Plan of St. Agnes.

Dr. Northcote and Mr. Brownlow in the plan and atlas appended to their Roma Sotterranea. The ground plans given by Marchi lay before us in successive plates the ichnography of the stone quarry which lies above the catacomb of St. Pontianus, and of the arenaria which lies above that of St. Agnes, and the portions of the cemetery immediately beneath them. Nothing could more forcibly show the difference between the vast cavernous chambers of the quarry, where this object was to remove as much of the stone as was consistent with safety, and the long narrow galleries of the catacomb in which the object was to displace as little of the stratum as would be consistent with the excavator's purpose. The plates also enable us to contrast the tortuous passages of the arenariae, running usually in curved lines, with a careful avoidance of sharp angles, and wide enough to admit a horse and cart for the removal of the material, and the straight lines, right angles, and restricted dimensions of the ambulacra of the catacombs. Another marked difference between the arenariae and the subterranean cemeteries of the Christians is, that the walls of the latter always rise vertically from the floor of the gallery, while, on account of the frailness of the material in which they were excavated, the walls of the sand quarries are set at a re-entering angle, giving the gallery almost the form of a tunnel. This mode of construction renders it impossible to form sepulchral recesses with exactly closed apertures, as we find them in all the galleries of the catacombs. The friability of the material also forbids the adaptation of a plate or marble or tiles to the aperture of the recess, which was essential to confine the noxious effluvia of the decaying corpses.

The wide distinction between the mode of construction adopted in the quarries and that rendered necessary by the requirements of the cemeteries, and the practical difficulties which stood in the way of transforming one into the other are rendered more evident by the few instances in which this transformation has been actually effected. The examples we would bring in proof of our statement are those given by Mich. Stef. De Rossi from the cemeteries of St. Hermes and St. Priscilla (Anat. Geol. ed. Arch. vol. i. pp. 31, 32, sq.; Northcote, R. S. pp. 323, 329). In the first piano of the catacomb of St. Hermes we have a specimen of a sepulchral gallery with three rows of lateral loculi, constructed in brick and masonry, within an ancient arenaria. At first sight the difference between the form and proportions of the galleries and loculi, and those of the usual type, is scarcely noticeable. Closer inspection, however, shows that the side walls are built up from the ground, in advance of the tufa walls of the gallery, which is two or three times the ordinary width, leaving space enough for the depth of the loculi. These are closed in the ordinary manner, with the exception of those of the uppermost tier, where the closing slabs are laid at an angle, sloping up to the barrel vault of the gallery, and forming a triangular instead of a rectangular recess. When the galleries cross one another the space becomes wider and the walls more curved, and the vault is sustained in the centre by a thick wall containing tombs, which divides the ambulacrum into two parallel galleries. This example indicates the nature of the alterations required to convert an arenaria into a cemetery. These as a rule were so costly and laborious that the Christians preferred to undertake an entirely fresh excavation.

The second example is that from the cemetery of St. Priscilla, on the Via Salaria Nova. The annexed plan given from De Rossi enables us, by a variation in the shading, to distinguish between the original excavation and the form into which it was subsequently converted when it became a Christian burial-place, and helps us to appreciate the immense labour that was expended in the erection of "numerous pillars of various sizes, long walls of solid masonry, sometimes straight, sometimes broken into angles, partly concealing and partly sustaining the tufa and the sepulchres of the galleries, frequent niches of various size often interrupted by pillars built up within them," and the other modifications necessary to convert the original excavation into its present form. We may mention a third example of the same kind; the arenaria adjacent to St. Saturninus, on the same road. A portion of this cemetery has been excavated in good pozzolana earth, and has the characteristics of a true arenaria. The galleries are wide, and are curved in plan. The walls and vault are arched, and it has not been thought consistent with security to construct more than two ranges of loculi near the pavement, and even these occur at wider intervals than is usual where the rock is harder. In all respects the contrast this division of the cemetery presents to the ordinary type is most marked. "Here we have another instance of the Christians having made the attempt to utilise the arenaria, but it appears that they found it more convenient to abandon the attempt, and to construct entirely new galleries, even at the cost of descending to a greater depth into the bowels of the earth" (Northcote, R. S. p. 330).

Plan of part of the Catacomb of St. Priscilla from the West showing the adaptation of an Arenaria to a Christian cemetery. The dark shading represents the tufa rock; the lighter the added masonry.

These examples when candidly examined lead to a conclusion directly opposite to that affirmed so confidently by Raoul-Rochette and others. So far from its being the case that the Christians commenced their subterranean cemeteries by adopting exhausted arenariae, which they extended require ordinary such in marked catcombs confirm teries of from the ment a investg dition of and is to grounds

The t referred tigators Marchi stia pass tionable of certain rto, juze arenariae derived Martyru their tex dates, ar rical aut containe and they further, deserve De Rossi they en fact for little mor were used were con and were which the According Arch. vol. to a range are so mo in which interred a while of t refer to actually f with the fact may b ment with impugning distinct na It descry lessness of that two o meals in o and Alexan that of S. P localities w but where c constructed is quite w arenarium, o could have e With reg the place of cellious. P is not said cryptis aren arenas," and quently converted when burial-place, and helps immense labour this erection of "numerous long walls of solid masonry, sometimes broken and partly sustained by pillars of the galleries, is size often interrupted in them," and the other to convert the original form. We may mean of the same kind: the Saturninus, on the same cemetery has been excavated, and has the character. The galleries are a plan. The walls and it has not been thought to construct more than the pavement, and even intervals than is usual where all respects the contrast cemetery presents to the market. "Here we have Christians having made a arenaria, but it appears convenient to abandon construct entirely new galleries descending to a greater depth of the earth" (Northcote, carefully examined lead opposite to that affirmed by the Rochette and others. In the case that the Christians subterranean cemeteries by arenarias, which they extended and enlarged to suit their increasing requirements, so that "an arenaria was the ordinary matrix of a catacomb," the rarity of such instances that can be adduced, and the marked contrast between the arenaria and the catocomb both in plan and mode of construction, confirm our assertion that the subterranean cemeteries of the Christians had a distinct origin, and were intended for places of interment alone, and that what, previous to recent investigations, was regarded as the normal condition of things, was really extremely exceptional, and is to be explained in each case on exceptional grounds.

1. Plan of the passage from De Rossi, showing a Christian cemetery. The dark lines represent the original masonry; the lighter the added masonry.

The traditional hypothesis to which we have referred, by which the conclusions of all investigators before the memorable epoch of Padre Marchi were fettered, had its foundation in certain passages in ancient documents of very questionable value, which describe the burial-places of certain martyrs and others as being in arenaria, juxta arenarium, ad arenas, or in arenis arenariis. These passages are almost exclusively derived from the documents known as "Acta Martyrum," which, from the extent to which their text has been tampered with at different dates, are generally almost worthless as historical authorities. None of those in question are contained in Ruinart's Acta Martyrum Siveva, and they are probably of little real weight. And further, even if the statements contained in them deserved to be received with more confidence De Rossi has very acutely demonstrated that they cannot fairly be considered to prove the fact for which they are adduced. They show little more than that the terms arenarium, &c., were used more loosely at the time these "Acts" were compiled than strict accuracy warranted, and were applied to the whole "hypogaeum" of which the sand-pit at most only formed part. According to Mich. Stef. De Rossi (Analisi Geol. ed. Arch. vol. i. pp. 13-34), if we confine ourselves to a range of five or six miles out of Rome, there are no more than nine passages of these "Acts" in which martyrs are recorded to have been interred in arenario or in cryptis arenariis; while of this limited number of authorities, four refer to cemeteries in which an arenaria is actually found more or less closely connected with the cemetery, and in which therefore the fact may be at once acknowledged to be in agreement with the record, without in the least impugning our conclusion as to the generally distinct nature of the two.

It deserves notice also, as showing the worthlessness of these records as statements of fact, that two of the passages which speak of interments in cryptis arenariis, that of SS. Nereus and Alexander in the cemetery of Domitilla, and that of S. Laurentius in that of Cyriaca, refer to localities where potestana is not to be found, but where the stratum in which the cemetery is constructed is that known as capellaccio, which is quite worthless for building purposes. No arenarium, or crypta arenaria, properly so called, could have existed there.

With regard to the passage which refers to the place of sepulture of SS. Marcus and Marcellinus. Padre Marchi justly observes that it is not said that these martyrs were buried in cryptis arenarum, but "in loco qui dicitur ad arenas," and therefore merely in the neighbourhood of the pits from which the walls of the city were built.

But although the exclusively Christian origin of the catacombs has to be distinctly asserted, and the idea that they had their origin in sand quarries, already existing in the first ages of the Church, must be met with a decided contradiction, we must be careful not to press the distinction so far as to deny the connection which really exists, in very many instances, between the cemetery and an arenaria. We must also allow that there are examples in which loculi for Christian interment have been found in the walls of the tortuous roads of a sand quarry. Mr. J. H. Parker, who by his accurate investigations is conferring on the architecture and topography of Rome the same benefits he has bestowed on the architecture of his native country and of France, has discovered loculi in the sides of a sand-pit road, near the church of S. Crisano alla Caffarella. This road evidently communicated with the cemetery of Prætextatus, to which the main entrance was from the church, originally an ancient tomb. A modern brick wall, built across the road, prevents any further examination of the locality. Such communications between the cemeteries and the adjacent arenarias were frequently opened in the days of persecution, when, as Tertullian informs us, the Christians were "daily besieged, and betrayed, and congregations in their very assemblies and congregations; their enemies having informed themselves as to the days and places of their meetings" (Tert. Apol. vii. ; ad Nat. l. 7.), and when, therefore, it became necessary as far as possible to conceal the entrances to their burial places from the public gaze. In those times of trial the original entrances to the catacombs were blocked up, the staircases destroyed, and new and difficult ways of access opened through the recesses of a deserted sand-pit. These afforded the Christians the means of ingress and egress without attracting public notice, and by means of them they had facilities for escape, even when they had been tracked to the catacomb itself. The catacomb of S. Callistus affords examples of these connections with arenaria. (Cf. the plans given by De Rossi, Northcote, and Marchi.)

History.—The practice of interring the entire corpse unconsumed by fire in a subterranean excavation has been so completely identified with the introduction of the Christian religion into Rome that we are in danger of losing sight of the fact that this mode of burial did not in any great contrast between the sepulture after cremation in the urns of columbaria, or the indiscriminate flinging of the dead into the luthsome puticoli, and the reverent and orderly interment of the bodies of the departed in the cells of a catacomb, the Christians, in adopting this mode, were only reverting to what one of the early apologists terms "the older and better custom of inhumation" (Minuc. Fel. Octav. c. 34). It is well known that the custom of burying the dead was the original custom both with the Greeks and Romans, and was only superseded by burning in later times, chiefly on sanitary grounds. The Etruscan tombs are familiar examples belonging to a very early period. In Rome, cremation did not become general till the later days of the republic. The authority of Cicero is definite on this point. He states that Marcius was buried, and that the Gens Cornelia adopted cremation for their dead in living memory, Sulla being the first member of that Gens whose body was burnt (Cic. de Leg. ii. 22). Under the Empire cremation became the almost universal custom, though not so as absolutely to exclude the other, which gradually regained its lost hold on the public mind, and was re-established by the fourth century. Macrobius asserts positively that the custom of burning the dead had entirely ceased in his day. "Urendi corpora defunctorum usus nostro saeculo nullus" (Macrobius Saturn. ii. lib. vii. c. 7). Of the practice of inhumation of the unburied body we have not unfrequent examples in Rome itself. The tomb of the Scipios, on the Appian Way (now within the Aurelian walls), is a familiar instance. The correspondence between the arrangements of this tomb and those of the earlier Christian catacombs, e.g. that of Domitilla, is very marked. In both we have passages excavated in the tufa, giving access to sepulchral chambers arranged in stories, burial places cut in the native rock and covered with a slab of stone; sarcophagi standing in recesses, partially hollowed out to receive them. Visconti was of opinion that this tomb was a used-out stone quarry. In this he is followed by Raoul-Rochette, Tableau des Catac. p. 23. It is favoured by the irregularity of the plan. Another like example is the tomb of the Nasos, on the Flaminian Way, described by Martell, in which Raoul-Rochette has traced a marked resemblance to the plan and general disposition to the catacomb of St. Hermes, which, as we have seen already, presents many marked variations from the ordinary plan of the Christian catacombs. Other examples are given by De Rossi, R. S. I. 88, who remarks that this mode of interment was much more general in Rome and its vicinity than is usually credited. He quotes from Fabretti, Inscr. Dom. p. 55, a description of a tomb found by him at the fourth mile on the Flaminian Way. "Necium cremationis instituta in topho indigena excavatum sepulchrum . . . quædam in nostris Christianorum coemeteriis visuntur," and mentions a numerous series of cells of a similar character cut in the living rock examined by him in different localities in the vicinity of the city.

But although Pagan subterranean burial places possess a family likeness to the cemeteries of the Christians, they are unmistakably distinguished from them by certain unerring marks. They are of much more contracted dimensions, being intended for the members and dependants of a single family, instead of being open to the community of the faithful generally. As being destined to be the abodes of the dead only, their entrances were firmly closed, while the burial niches were frequently left open; while on the other hand, in the Christian cemeteries, constantly visited for the purposes of devotion and for the memorial of the departed, the loculi were hermetically sealed, to prevent the escape of noxious gases, while the entrance stood always open, and the faithful could approach each separate grave with their prayers and their offerings. These distinctions are broadly maintained as a rule. As regards dimensions, however, there are exceptions even way. We meet with some isolated Christian burial chambers designed to receive the individuals of a single family; and on the other hand, some heathen tombs exceed the usual limits of a single chamber. De Rossi mentions the existence of many hypogæa, opening from the tombs and columbaria on the Appian and Latin Ways, which contain a few small cubicula and three or four very short ambulæ. Such hypogæa were assigned by Marchi, without sufficient evidence, to the adherents of idolatrous Oriental sects (De Rossi, R. S. I. pp. 88-92).

But it is not in these heathen examples that we are to find the germ of the Christian catacombs. We are to look for them in the burial places of another people, with whom the Christians of Rome were from the first closely connected, and indeed in the popular mind identified—the Jews. The first converts to the faith in Rome were Jews; and, as Deau Milman has remarked (Lat. Christianity, i. 31), no Church seems to have clung more obstinately to Judaizing tenets and Jewish customs than the Roman. In their manner of sepulture, therefore, we should anticipate that the Roman Christians would follow the customs of the land which was the cradle of their religion, and to which so many of them traced their parentage—customs which were faithfully adhered to in the land of their dispersion. They had an additional reason for regarding this mode of interment with affectionate reverence, as we have seen, hallowed to them by the example of their crucified Master, and in Him associated with the hopes of the resurrection. The practice of burial in sepulchres hewn out of the living rock was always familiar to the Jews, and was adopted by them in every part of the world wherever they made settlements and the nature of the soil permitted it. The existence of Jewish catacombs in Rome, of a date anterior to Christianity, is no matter of conjecture. One was discovered by Bosio at the opening of the 17th century, and described by him (R. S. c. xxii. p. 141 seq.), bearing unmistakable evidence of a very early date. This cemetery, placed by him on Monte Verde, outside the Porta Portese, has escaped all subsequent researches (Marchi, p. 21 seq.). From the meanness of its construction, the absence of any adornment in painting, stucco, or marble, and the smallness and paucity of its cubicula (only two were found), it was evidently a burial place of the poorer classes. There was an utter absence of all Christian symbols. Almost every loculus bore—either painted in red or scratched on the mortar—the seven-branched candlestick. On one inscription was read the word ΚΥΝΑΡΙΩΝ , συναγωγή .

Another Jewish catacomb is still accessible on the Via Appia, opposite the Basilica of St. Sebastian. According to Mr. Parker (who has included photographs of this catacomb in his invaluable series, Nos. 1160, 1161), part of it is of the time of Augustus, part as late as Constantine. It contains two cubicula, with large arcosolia, ornamented with arabesque paintings of flowers and birds, devoid of distinctive symbols. Some of the loculi present their ends instead of their sides to the galleries—an arrangement very rarely found in Christian cemeteries. The inscriptions are mostly in Greek characters, though the language of some is Latin. Some bear Hebrew words. Nearly all have the candlestick. In

1866 another catacomb, the Vigna

The hieroglyphs of large an have been existing in as illustrious founded as the capital excavation Nor was I should have should have ritics. No even a him dead there Christian s it to rend The ordin dead afford no less th enactment, have been in the operatio not violat ture of the tians were wishes in t was there n are in the ntios. They which had which the molested. C to observe, v within the v the Christian will show th of them are scribed by M within a rro Aurelian wall mile from the been found; Alexander; w are again met the towns an Rome itself" Stef. de Rossi, Legal enact convenience hation of the C operated to f regard to th were to serve-gathering of essential that the soil was d flooded by the to the infiltrat not observed, the corpses h rapidly, and galleries them with mud and find, therefore trices, as a r heads, and res higher grounds where the geol 1866 another extremely poverty-stricken Jewish catacomb, dug in a clay soil, was excavated in the Vigna Cimarra, on the Appian Way.

The idea so long and so widely prevalent, that works of such immense extent, demanding so large an amount of severe manual labour, could have been executed in secret, and in defiance of existing laws, is justly designated by Mommsen as ridiculous, and reflecting a discredit, as unfounded as it is unjust, on the imperial police of the capital. It is simply impossible that such excavations should have escaped official notice. Nor was there any reason why the Christians should have desired that their burial places should have been concealed from the state authorities. No evidence can be alleged which affords even a hint that in the first two centuries at least there was any official interference with Christian sepulture, or any difficulties attending it to render secrecy or concealment desirable. The ordinary laws relating to the burial of the dead afforded their protection to the Christians no less than to their fellow citizens. A special enactment, of which we find no trace, would have been needed, to exempt the Christians from the operation of these laws. So long as they did not violate any of the laws by which the sepulture of the dead was regulated the Roman Christians were left free to follow their taste and wishes in this matter. Nor, as we have seen, was there anything altogether strange or repulsive in the mode of burial adopted by the Christians. They were but following an old fashion which had not entirely died out in Rome, and which the Jews were suffered to follow unmolested. One law they were absolutely bound to observe, viz., that which prohibited internment within the walls of the city. And a survey of the Christian cemeteries in the vicinity of Rome will show that this was strictly obeyed. All of them are contained in the zone at once prescribed by law and dictated by convenience, within a radius of about 2½ miles from the Aurelian walls. "Between the third and fifth mile from the walls no Christian sepulchre has been found; at the sixth, only one, that of St. Alexander; while beyond the seventh mile tombs are again met with, but these belong rather to the towns and villages of the Campagna than to Rome itself" (Northcote, R. S. p. 344; Mich. Stef. de Rossi, Anal. Geol. ed Arch. i. 45).

Legal enactments and considerations of practical convenience having roughly determined the situation of the Christian cemeteries, a further cause operated to fix their precise locality. Having regard to the double purpose these excavations were to serve—the sepulture of the dead, and the gathering of the living for devotion—it was essential that a position should be chosen where the soil was dry, and which was not liable to be flooded by the neighbouring streams, nor subject to the infiltration of water. If these rules were not observed, not only would the putrefaction of the corpses have taken place with dangerous rapidity, and the air become poisoned, but the galleries themselves would have been choked with mud and been rendered inaccessible. We find, therefore, that the planners of the cemeteries, as a rule, avoided the valleys and low lands, and restricted their operations to the higher grounds surrounding the city, particularly where the geological conditions of the soil provided them strata of the tufa granulata, in which they by preference worked, and where springs of water were absent. As an example of the disastrous consequences of not attending to these precautions we may name the cemetery of Castulus, on the Via Labicana, re-discovered by De Rossi in 1864 (Bullettino de Arch. Crist., Fev. 1865). From its low position, the galleries are filled with clay and water, which have reduced them to ruin and rendered the cemetery quite inaccessible.

As a rule, each catacomb occupies a separate rising ground of the Campagna, and one divided from any other by intervening valleys. The general humidity of these low grounds, and the streams which flow along them, effectually prohibit the construction of galleries of communication between the various cemeteries. The idea broached by Raoul-Rochette, and contended for by Marchi, that a subterranean communication at a low level exists between the whole of the Christian cemeteries of Rome, as well as with the chief churches within the city, is, in Mommsen's words, "a mere fable"—in fact, a complete impossibility. Such galleries of connection, if formed, would have been constantly inundated, if they had not at once become mere conduits of running water.

Each of the larger cemeteries, then, may be regarded as an insulated group, embracing several smaller cemeteries, corresponding to the original funeral arvae assigned to the internment of the early Christians, but never crossing the intermediate depressions or ravines, and seldom, if ever, having any communication with each other (M. Stef. de Rossi, R. S. Anal. Geol. ed Arch. i. 41, seq.).

The notions which have been entertained as to the horizontal extent of the catacombs are very greatly exaggerated. It has been even gravely asserted that they reach as far as Tivoli in one direction and Ostia in the other. It is probably quite impossible to form a correct estimate of the area actually occupied by them, from our ignorance of their real extent. Not a few which were known to the older investigators cannot now be discovered, and it can hardly be questioned that others exist which have never been entered since the period when they were finally given over to neglect and decay. M. Stef. de Rossi, in his valuable Analisi Geologica ed Architettonica, so often referred to, p. 60, declares his belief that nearly the whole of the available space within the above-named cemetery zone, where the soil was suitable for the purpose, was occupied by burial vaults. But he discreetly abstains from any attempt to define either their superficial area or their linear extension. The calculations that have been hazarded by Marchi and others are founded on too vague data to be very trustworthy. Marchi calculated that the united length of the galleries of the catacombs would amount to 800 or 900 miles, and the number of graves to between six and seven millions. The estimate quoted by Martigny (Diction. des Ant. Chré. p. 128) does not go beyond 587 miles. That given by Northcote (R. S. p. 26) is more modest still,—“on the whole there are certainly not less than 350 miles of them.” But all such estimates are at present simply conjectural.

The beginnings of these vast cemeteries were small and comparatively insignificant. There is little question that almost without exception they had their origin in sepulchral areas of limited extent, the property of private families or individuals, devoted by them to this sacred purpose. The investigations of De Rossi, an explorer as sagacious as he is conscientious, have satisfactorily proved that the immense cemetery of Callistus, with its innumerable cubiculi and stories of intricate ramifications, originally consisted of several small and independent burial grounds, executed with great regularity within carefully prescribed limits. The manner in which a subterranean cemetery was constructed was as follows. First of all a plot of ground suitable for the purpose was obtained by gift or by purchase, extending so many feet, in fronte, in length, along the high road, so many, in agro, in depth, at right angles to the road. That which used to be known as the cemetery of Lucina, the most ancient part of the cemetery of Callistus, measured 100 Roman feet in length by 180 feet in depth. A second area of the same cemetery including the Papal crypt and that of St. Caecilia measured 250 along the road, and reached back 100 feet in agro. Such a plot was secured by its Christian proprietor as a burial-place with the usual legal formalities. The fact of the individual being a Christian threw no impediment in the way of the purchase, or of the construction of the cemetery. All were in this respect equally under the protection of the laws. The first step in the construction of the cemetery was the excavation of a passage all the way round the area, communicating with the surface by one or more staircases at the corners. Loculi were cut in the walls of these galleries to receive the dead. When the original galleries were fully occupied, cross galleries were run on the same level, gradually forming a network of passages, all filled with tombs. If a family vault was required, or a martyr or other Christian of distinction had to be interred, a small rectangular chamber, cuta ulian, was excavated, communicating with the gallery. In the earlier part of the cemetery of Callistus a considerable number of these small burial chambers are found, succeeding one another as we proceed along the ambulacrum with as much regularity as bedrooms opening out of a passage in a modern house. When the galleries in the original plano had reached their furthest extension consistent with stability, the excavators commenced a new system of galleries at a lower level, reached by a new staircase. These were carried out on the same principle as those in the story above, and were used for sepulture as long as they afforded space for graves. When more room was wanted the fossorae formed a third story of galleries, which was succeeded by a fourth, and even by a fifth. Instances indeed are met with, as in some parts of the cemetery of Callistus, where, including what may be called a mezzanine story, the number of piani reaches seven. Sometimes, however, according to Cav. Mich. S. de Rossi (Analisi. Geol. ed. Architet. del Conterno di Callisto, vol. ii. p. 30), the upper piani are of later date than the lower, experience having given the excavators greater confidence in the security of the strata, and the complete cessation of persecution removing the temporary necessity for concealment. Some of these later galleries are not more than from three to four inches below the surface. The extreme narrowness of the galleries is one of the most marked characteristics of the Christian catacombs. The object of the excavators being to economize space and make the most of a limited area, the gallery was not formed of a greater width than would be sufficient for the purpose of affording two loculi of sepulchral recesses, with room enough between for the passage, usually, of a single person. The narrowest galleries, which are by no means rare, are from 2 ft. to 2½ ft. wide. The normal width is from 2½ ft. to 3 ft. A few are 3½ ft. wide. A still smaller number, and those usually very short, are from 4 ft. to 5 ft. in width. These rules, says M. S. de Rossi, are unalterable, whatever be the piano, or the quality of the rock. The only variation is that where the rock is more friable the galleries are less numerous, and more of the intervening stratum is left untouched; while they become more numerous and intricate the greater the solidity of the formation. The ceiling is usually that, sometimes slightly arched. The height of the galleries depends on the nature of the soil in which they are dug. The earliest were originally the least elevated; the fossorae being apprehensive of making them too high for security. As they gained confidence in the strength of the rock, space required for more graves was obtained by lowering the floor of the galleries, so that not unfrequently the most ancient are now the most lofty. Sometimes the construction of galleries at a lower level was stopped by the cessation of the strata of tufa granularis; and at others, as in the Vatican cemetery, by the occurrence of springs, which threatened the inundation of the galleries and the destruction of the graves. When further progress downwards was prevented, another funeral area was opened by the side of the original one, and the same process was repeated. It often happened that in the course of time independent cemeteries which had been formed in adjacent plots of ground were combined together, so as to form one large necropolis. Examples of this are found in almost all the great cemeteries of Rome, and the combination of names which has thus arisen has given rise to no little confusion. Portions of what has since become one cemetery bear different appellations in the ancient documents, and it is not easy to unravel the tangled skein: e. g. the cemetery "ad Ursium pilanum" on the "Via Portuensis" bears the titles of St. Pontianus, SS. Abdon and Sennen, and St. Pignemus. That on the "Via Appia," usually known as the cemetery of St. Praxetextus, is also called after St. Urbanus, SS. Tiburtinus and Valerianus, St. Balbina and St. Marcus.

Tradition and documentary evidence have assigned several of the Roman catacombs to the first age of the Church's history. For some, an apostolical origin is claimed. It may be difficult to prove beyond question that any of the existing catacombs belong to the age of St. Peter and St. Paul, but the matter has been very carefully and dispassionately examined by De Rossi, R. S. i. p. 184 seq., and the evidence he collects from the existing remains in support of the traditional view is of a nature to convince us that some of them were constructed at least in a very early period. This evidence is presented by paintings

rare adm decoratio architect not heav
and even cornices o with pain instead o walls th recesses; bearing c tinctivel though r one or mo combs th very earl Salazia N
tia, of P portion of cemetery

The evi scriptions borne in m
have the consls, up the anlie of the mo dated Chr of Vespasi unknown (Roma Be
detti, p. 8 Virius Gal
Hippolytus
D.M., and prestions.
Senecio, A and Balan the cataco (Baldetti, p here also Gallicanus

The begi Christians common to to them by of the auth destructive Hippolytus
Zephyrinus earliest ge seen reason Christian c there must this one to its care to years since have little conclusion ( must be rei
r. me, or to of it under cemetery w Callistus "a bodies of m which is cal terium Calli Zephyrinus
the rule wh ereption wh of Rome sh

The extreme narrowness of the most marked Christian catacombs. The purpose being to economize space in a limited area, the width of a greater width than the purpose of affording recesses, with room for a passage, usually, of a narrowest galleries, which are from 2 ft. to 2½ ft. in width is from 2½ ft. to 3 ft. wide. A still smaller width is very short, are from 1 ft. to 1½ ft. in length. These rules, says Maffei, are not inalterable, but they are generally the rule. The width of the galleries is more or less numerous, and the stratum is set unevenly more numerous and the solidity of the formation usually that, sometimes the height of the galleries of the soil in which they were originally the least being apprehensive of a fall for security. As they are the strength of the rock, a grave was obtained by the galleries, so that not at ancient are now the galleries the construction of level was stopped by the tufa gneiss: and at a cemetery, by the ceiling threatened the tunnels and the destruction of further progress downward another funeral area was the original one, and was repeated. It often happened time independent cemeteries formed in adjacent plots of together, so as to form Examples of this are the great cemeteries of Rome, of names which has thus no little confusion. Perhaps become one cemetery bear in the ancient documents, unravel the tangled skein: Ursum pileatum" on the titles of St. Pontianus, and St. Pignemus, "pia," usually known as the extatus, is also called after Ursus and Valerianus, St. is. Documentary evidence have the Roman catacombs to the history. For some, so claimed. It may be difficult ion that any of the existing the age of St. Peter and matter has been very carefully examined by De seq., and the evidence being existing remains in support of s of a nature to convince us here constructed at least in a this evidence is presented by paintings in a pure classical style, with a very rare admixture of distinctly Christian symbols; decorations in fine stucco, displaying a chaste architectural spirit; crypts of considerable size, not hewn out of the living tufa, but carefully, and even elegantly, built with pilasters and cornices of brick and terra-cotta; wide corridors with painted walls, and recesses for sarcophagi, instead of the narrow ambulatoria with their walls thickly pierced with shelf-like funeral recesses; whole families of inscriptions to persons bearing classical names, and without any distinctively Christian expressions; and lastly, though rarely, consular dates of the second, and one or more even of the first century. The catacombs that present these distinctive marks of very early date are those of Priscilla on the Via Salaria Nova, that of Domitilla on the Via Ardeatina, of Prætextatus on the Via Appia, and a portion of that of St. Agnes, identified with the cemetery of Ostrianus or Fons Petri. The evidence of early date furnished by inscriptions is but scanty. It must, however, be borne in mind that only a very small proportion have the date of the year, as given by the consuls, upon them. The chief object was to fix the anniversary of the death, and for this the day of the month was sufficient. The most ancient dated Christian inscription is of the third year of Vespasian, A.D. 72, but its original locality is unknown (Northcote, R. S. p. 65). Röstel (Roms Beschreibung, i. 371) quotes from Boldetti, p. 83, one of the consulate of Anelius and Virius Gallus, A.D. 98, from the catacomb of Hippolytus; but it begins with the letters D.M., and contains no distinctly Christian expressions. One of the consulate of Sura and Seneccio, A.D. 107, and another of that of Piso and Bolaus, A.D. 110, were seen by Boldetti in the catacomb beneath the basilica of St. Paul (Boldetti, pp. 78, 79). The same explorer found here also an inscription, which the name of Gallianus fixes either to A.D. 127 or A.D. 150. The beginning of the third century finds the Christians of Rome in possession of a cemetery common to them as a body, and doubtless secured to them by legal tenure, and under the protection of the authorities of the city. We learn this instructive fact from the Philosophumena of Hippolytus (ix. 11), where we read that Pope Zephyrinus "set Callistus over the cemetery," κατεργασεν ἐν τῷ κομητήριον. As we have seen reason to believe that at this period several Christian cemeteries were already in existence, there must have been something distinctive about this one to induce the bishop of Rome to intrust its care to one of his chief clergy, who in a few years succeeded him in his Episcopate. We can have little hesitation in accepting De Rossi's conclusion (for the grounds of which the reader must be referred to his great work Roma Sotterranea, or to Dr. Northcote's excellent abridgement of it under the same title) that this was the cemetery which we read in Anastasius, § 17, Callistus "made on the Appian Way, where the bodies of many priests and martyrs repose, and which is called even to the present day coemeterium Callisti." In a crypt of this cemetery Callistus himself was buried, in violation of the rule which had prevailed almost without exception up to that period, that the bishops of Rome should be laid where St. Peter was believed to repose, in the crypt of the Vatican. Of the fifteen bishops who are reported to have preceded Zephyrinus, all but Clements, who is recorded to have been buried in Greece, and Alexander, whose sepulchre was made near the scene of his martyrdom, on the Via Nomentana, according to the oldest and most trustworthily recensions of the Liber Pontificalis, were supposed to sleep in the Vatican cemetery. Of the eighteen who intervened between him and Sylvester, no fewer than thirteen repose in the cemetery of Callistus. Slabs bearing the names of Anteros, A.D. 236, Fabianus, A.D. 251, (the first bishop of whose martyrdom there is no question), Luceus, A.D. 253, and Eutychianus, A.D. 275, in Greek characters, the official language of the Church, with the words Episcopus, and, in the case of Fabianus, martyr, added, have been discovered by Cav. de Rossi in this crypt. An adjoining vault has revealed the epitaph of Eusebius, A.D. 311, set up by Damasus, and engraved by his artist Furius Dionysius Philocalus, whose name it bears. In another crypt in the same cemetery De Rossi's labours have been rewarded by the fragments of an epitaph which is reasonably identified with that of Cornelius, A.D. 252, whose portrait, together with that of his contemporary and correspondent Cyprian, is painted on its wall. Callistus himself does not lie in the catacomb that bears his name. He met his end by being hurled from a window into a well in the Trastevere, and his corpse was hastily removed to the nearest cemetery, that of Calepodius, on the Via Aurelia. It cannot be reasonably questioned that a cemetery which was the recognised burial-place of the bishops of the city had a public, official character distinct from the private cemeteries with which the walls of Rome were surrounded. To the period of peaceful occupation and undisturbed use of the cemeteries by the Christian population of Rome succeeded that of persecution. We cannot place this earlier than the middle of the third century. There might be occasional outbreaks of popular violence directed against the Christians, and isolated acts of cruelty and severity towards the professors of an unpopular religion. We know from the famous correspondence between Pliny and Marcus Aurelius, that even under the merciful survey of so wise and benevolent a ruler, the position of a Christian was far from one of security. Of this we have a proof, if it be really authentic, in the touching record of a martyrdom within the precincts of the catacombs, given by the celebrated epitaph of Alexander from the cemetery of Callistus (Bosio lib. iii. c. 23, p. 216). "Alexander mortuus non est sed vivit super astra et corpus in hoc tumulo quiescit. Vitam explevit cum Antonino Imp. qui ubi multum beneficii anteverire previderet pro gratia odium reddidit. Genua enim flectens vero Deo sacrificaturus ad supplicia ducitur. O tempora infusta quibus Inter sacra et veta ne in cavernis quidem salvari possumus. Quid miserius vita, sed quid miserius in morte cum ab amicis et parentibus sepeliri nequeant. Tandem in caelo coruscant. Parum vixit qui vixit iv. x. Ten." Another of almost equal interest, from the same cemetery, is also found in Bosio, p. 217, referring to a martyrdom in the days of Hadrian. "Tempore Adriani Imperatoris Marius ado-lesceas Dux militum qui satis vixit dum vitam pro christo consumsit. In pace tandem quiescit. Beneemeritis cum lacrimis et metu posuerunt."

CATACOMBS

CATACOMBS

There was no general persecution of the Christians in Rome from the reign of Nero, A.D. 65, to that of Decius, A.D. 249-251. "During that period," writes Denn Milman (History of Christianity, bk. iv. c. ii. p. 323, note 2), "the Christians were in general as free and secure as the other inhabitants of Rome. Their assemblies were no more disturbed than the synagogues of the Jews, or the rites of other foreign religions. From this first terrible but brief onslaught under Decius, to the general and more merciless persecution under Diocletian and Galerius, A.D. 303, there is no trustworthy record of any Roman persecution." These epochs of persecution left their marks on the construction of the catacombs. The martyrdom of Xystus II. in the cemetery of Prætextatus, A.D. 257 ("Xystum in cimiterio animalversum acinis . . . et cum eo diaconos quatuor," Cyprian, Ep. 80), and the walling up alive of a considerable number of the faithful, men, women, and children, near the tombs of the martyrs Chrysanthus and Daria, in a catacomb on the Via Salaria, recorded by St. Gregory of Tours, De Gloria Martyr. i. c. 28; and other traditions of the same period, even though we are compelled to hesitate as to some of them, testify to the danger that attended the meetings of the faithful in the cemeteries, and the necessity which had arisen for secrecy and concealment if they would preserve the inviolability of their graves, and continue their visits undisturbed. To these fierce times of trial we may safely assign the alterations which we find made in the entrances of and staircases leading down to the catacombs, and the construction of concealed ways of ingress and egress through the arenaria which lay adjacent to them. We may instance the blocking up and partial destruction of two chief staircases in the cemetery of Callistus, and the formation of secret passages into the arenaria. One of these is approached by a staircase that stops suddenly short some distance from the floor of the gallery, and was thus rendered utterly useless to any who could not command a ladder, or some other means of connecting the lowest step with the arenaria (Northcote, R. S. pp. 331, 347; De Rossi, R. S. ii. 47-49). It happens not unfrequently that galleries are found completely filled up with earth from the floor to the vault. It has been considered by many that this was the work of the Christians themselves, with the view of preserving their sepulchres inviolate by rendering the galleries inaccessible to friend or foe. This view, first propounded by Buonarroti, (Osserv. p. xii, is strongly maintained by De Rossi, R. S. ii. 52-58, who assigns this earthing-up of the tombs to the persecution of Diocletian, A.D. 302. But the opinion maintained by other equally competent authorities is more probable, that this proceeding was simply dictated by convenience, as a means for disposing more easily of the earth excavated from newly-formed galleries. It must always have been a tedious and laborious operation to convey the freshly-dug earth from the catacomb to the surface, through the long tortuous passages, and by the air-tunnels. The galleries already piled with tombs, and therefore useless for future interments, offered a ready reception for the material, and in these it was deposited. This is the view of Marchi, p. 94, and Raoul-Rochette, Tableau des Catac. p. 35, and even of Holdetti, pp. 697; although the last-named author is unable altogether to reject Buonarroti's idea that the galleries were thus filled up to save the hallowed remains they contained from the sacrilegious hands of the heathen.

The middle of the fourth century, which saw the establishment of Christianity as the religion of the Roman states, was the commencement of a new era in the history of the catacombs. Subterranean interment gradually fell into disuse, and had almost entirely ceased by the close of that century. The undeniable evidence of the inscriptions with consular dates as given by De Rossi, Inscr. Christ. i. p. 117, &c., shows that between A.D. 318 and A.D. 360 two out of three burials took place in the subterranean portions of the cemeteries. Between A.D. 364 and A.D. 369 the proportions are nearly equal, and a new era in the history of the cemeteries began—the era of religious interest. The zeal displayed by Pope Damasus A.D. 366-384 in repairing and decorating the catacombs; erecting new staircases for the convenience of pilgrims, searching for the places of the martyrs' interment, and adorning them with exquisitely engraved epitaphs in large faultless characters, the work of an artist named Furius Dionysius Philocalus, caused a short sudden outburst of desire to be buried near the hallowed remains, resulting in wholesale destruction of many hundreds of early paintings with which the walls of the cubicula and arcosolia were covered. But the flame soon died out. Between A.D. 373 and A.D. 400 the subterranean interments were only one in three, and after A.D. 410, the final year of the taking of Rome by Alaric, scarcely a single certain example is found. But although the fashion of interment came to an end, the reputed sanctity of those whose remains were enshrined in them caused them to be the object of wide-spread interest. Pilgrims flocked to visit the places hallowed by the memories of so many confessors and martyrs, for whose guidance catalogues of the chief cemeteries and of the saints buried in them were from time to time drawn up, which have proved of considerable service in their identification. Even hermits came from a distance and fixed their cells in their immediate neighbourhood.

It appears evident from Jerome's well-known description of his visits to the catacombs when a schoolboy, circa A.D. 354, Hieron. in Epist. c. xi, that even in the latter half of the fourth century interment was rare in them. He speaks of visiting "the tombs of the apostles and martyrs," and describes the walls of the crypts "lined with the bodies of the dead;" but his language is that of one describing a cemetery long since disused, not one in daily activity. So also, Præf. ad Lib. ii. in Galat., "Ubi alibi tanto studio et frequentia ad martyrum sepulchra curritur?" The words of the poet Prudentius, written about the same time, describing the tomb of Hippolytus, lend to the same conclusion. His lengthened and minutely detailed description does not contain a word that indicates that the cemetery which contained this sacred shrine was used for actual interment.

Amib-
barbarin suek of of dunn be simpl likely the led the the ple risk-pels, which en bright w ad notle certainly the entac or, it of the s burial wa
ad notle found or and cemet pation wa ceases to to the fith for the d burials in subterrane 104). In the entaco and were popes, who tified the Anast. § 8 five pontif these conse plexity to cover the Nothing bu quaintance and orname us to disti the genuin paintings sacred, an the conclus from the p the catacom evidence us the primiti ditions, prev ing invest recent date widely prev resulting to concomitant not fairly de places of re determine w the subterr cellae, the b had gradual them; but t has been spo
We have d Goths under 537, extende pora sancto Gothis" (Am
have they h Vigilius, who epitaphs of l very correct. an inscription the Vatican ;
CHRIST. AN

ly reception for the was deposited. This is and Raoul-Roehette, and even of Boldetti, the named author is at Bucurruuti's thea has filled up to save contained from the entire.

h century, which saw thinly as the religion of the commencement of the catacombs. Subsequently fell into disuse, ceased by the close of able evidence of the r dates as given by
p. 117, &c., shows that 360 two out of three subterranean portions men A.D. 304 and A.D. nearly equal, and a the cemeteries began terest. The zeal dis-A.D. 306-384 in re-o catacombs; erecting venience of pilgrims, the martyrs' internment, exquisitely engraved characters, the work of Dionysius Philocalus, thrust of desire to be ed remains, resulting of many hundreds of hich the walls of the ere covered. But the Between A.D. 373 and n internments were only A.D. 410, the fatal year by Alaric, scarcely a found. But although came to an end, the whose remains were then to be the object

Pilgrims looked to by the memories of d martyrs, for whose o chief cemeteries and nem were from time to ave proved of considerification. Even hermits fixed their cells in their m Jerome's well-known o the catacombs when a Hieron. in Ezech. c. xi. half of the fourth cene in them. He speaks s of the apostles and the walls of the crypts them; but that which e of the dead;" but his describing a cemetery e in daily activity. So Goth., "Ubi alibi tanto d martyrum sepulchra of the poet Prudentius, e time, describing the to the same conclusion. tely detailed description d that indicates that the d this sacred shrine was Amidst all the levitation committed by the barbarian conquerors both in the first and second sack of Rome, A.D. 410, 457, we have no record of damage inflicted on the cemeteries. It may be simply luck of evidence. We cannot deem it likely that any feeling of reverence would have led the Goths to refrain from the rich plunder the plenty of devotees had stored up in the burial rags. Prudentius informs us that the aedificia which enshrined the relics of St. Hippolytus was bright with solid silver, and other catacombs were certainly as sumptuously decorated. But whether the catacombs were devastated by Alaric's hordes or no, it is certain that after A.D. 410 "the use of the subterranean cemeteries as places of burial was never resumed, and that inscriptions and notices that seem to refer to them will be found or closer examination to relate to basilicas and cemeteries above ground. The fessores' occupation was gone, and after A.D. 426 their name ceases to be mentioned. The liturgical books of the fifth century refer constantly, in the prayers for the dead and the benediction of graves, to burials in and around the basilicas, never to the subterranean cemeteries." (Northcote R. S. p.

104). But though disused as places of sepulture the catacombs continued to be visited by pilgrims, and were regarded with special devotion by the popes, who from time to time repaired and beautified them (e. g. Symmachus, A.D. 498-514; Anast. § 81). The fatal zeal displayed by successive pontiffs in the restoration and decoration of these consecrated shrines is the cause of much perplexity to the investigator who desires to discover their original form and arrangements.
Nothing but long experience and an intimate acquaintance with the character of the construction and ornamentation of different periods can enable us to distinguish with any accuracy between the genuine structure of the catacombs and the paintings with which they were originally adorned, and the work of later times. Many of the conclusions drawn by Roman Catholic writers from the paintings and ritual arrangements of the catacombs as we now find them, and the evidence supposed to be furnished by them as to the primitive character of their dogmas and traditions, prove little worth when a more searching investigation shows their comparatively recent date. An analogous exaggeration has widely prevailed with regard to the custom of resorting to these gloomy vaults as places of concealment in times of persecution. We cannot fairly doubt that they occasionally served as places of refuge, though it is not always easy to determine whether the language used refers to the subterranean part of the cemetery, or to the cellae, the basilicas, and other buildings which had gradually risen in the area that lay above them; but that which was at most exceptional has been spoken of almost as if it were the rule.

We have direct evidence that the ravages of the Goths under Vitiges, when they sacked Rome, A.D.
537, extended to the catacombs, "Ecclesie et cor-porum sanctorum martyrum exterminatae sunt a Gothis" (Anast. § 99). On their retirement the have they had committed was repaired by Pope Vigilius, who replaced the broken and mutilated epitaphs of Pope Damasus by copies, not always very correct. These good deeds stand recorded in an inscription of this pope now in the Gallery of the Vatican:—

CHRIST. ANT.

"Dum peritura Getae possident castra sub urbem Moverunt non tunc tanta nefanda pueri, Totaque sacrilego vertentur corde sequitra Martyribus quondam rite sacrata pia.
Affixi monente des Damasus abbi Papa probatus Sed prius titulus contracto marmore sanctus Nec tamen his laerum posse latere fuit.
Diruta Vigilius nam posthabe Papa geminece Hostibus expulsa cum novavit opus."

The reverence for the catacombs was now gradually dying out. One pope after another attempted to revive it by their decrees, but without any permanent effect. John III., circa A.D. 598, restored the cemeteries of the holy martyrs, "and ordered that oblations" (the Eucharistic elements), "cunctis, and lights" (oblations, anipullae (Lat. lect. "annule"), vel "inmimaria"), should be supplied from the Lateran every Sunday" (Anast. § 110). It is also recorded in commendation of Sergius I., A.D. 687-701, that when he was a presbyter it was his wont to "celebrate mass diligently through the different cemeteries" (Anast. § 158). In the next century, circa 735, Gregory III., a zealous builder and repairer of churches, arranged a body of priests to celebrate mass, and provided that lights and oblations should be furnished from the palace for all the cemeteries round Rome (Anast. § 204). In neither of these cases, however, can we affirm that the reference is chiefly to underground cemeteries or catacombs.

We have now reached the period of the religious spoliation of the catacombs, from which they have suffered more irreparably than from any violence offered by sacrilegious hands.
The injuries commenced by the Goths had been repeated by the Lombards under Astolphus, A.D. 756. But these invaders did little more than complete the devastation which was being already caused by the carelessness of those by whom these cemeteries should have been religiously tended. The slothfulness and neglect manifested towards these hallowed places are feelingly deplored by Paul I. in a Constitution dated June 2, A.D. 761. Not only were sheep and oxen allowed to have access to them, but folks had been set up in them and they had been defiled with all manner of corruption.
The holy father therefore resolved to translate the bodies of the saints and enshrine them in a church he had built on the site of his paternal mansion (Anast. § 259, 260). Paul's immediate successors reversed his policy, and used all their endeavours to restore the lost glories of the catacombs. But it was too late, the spirit of the age had changed. As the only means of securing the sacred relics from desecration, Paschal, A.D. 817-827, was forced to follow the example set by Paul, July 20, A.D.
817. He translated to the church of St. Praxe, as recorded in an inscription still to be read there, no less than 2300 bodies. The work was continued by succeeding popes, and many transferred at this period from the catacombs to the Pantheon. The sacred treasures which had given the catacombs their value in the eyes of the devout having been removed, all interest in them ceased. Henceforward all inducement to visit them was lost, and with some insignificant exceptions the catacombs lapsed into complete oblivion, in which they remained wrapped for more than six centuries. It was not till May 31, 1578, that their fortuitous discovery revealed to the astonished inhabitants of Rome the hidden treasures that lay beneath their feet, and awoke an interest which, though sometimes flagging and not always intelligently exercised, has never since expired, and which the combined genius, learning, and industry of Marchi, and his pupils, the brothers De Rossi, together with the remarkable discoveries which have rewarded their researches, and the skill with which they have known how to interpret and employ the results of their investigations, have of late raised to a pitch that has never before been equalled.

It is not within the scope of this article to record the names and trace the labours of the investigators who have employed themselves in this field of research. This will be found in the chronological sketch prefixed to Raoul-Rochette's excellent and unprejudiced little work, "Tableaux des Catacombes de Rome," Paris, 1853, as well as in the opening pages of the Roma Sotterranea of De Rossi, and the English abridgement by Dr. Northcote and the Rev. W. R. Brownlow, London, 1869.

Description.—The catacombs of Rome, to which as the most interesting and most thoroughly investigated of the subterranean cemeteries our present remarks will be confined, consist of a vast labyrinth of narrow subterranean passages or galleries excavated in the strata of volcanic earth that underlie the city and its neighbourhood, for the purpose of the interment of the dead. These galleries are excavated at different levels, forming various stories or piani, one beneath the other, communicating by narrow flights of steep stairs cut in the native rock, as well as by shafts and wells sunk for the purpose of affording light and air. These stories of galleries lie one below the other sometimes to the number of five, or even, as in the cemetery of St. Callistus, of seven. The galleries as a rule preserve the level of the piano to which they belong, so that it is very rare to meet with galleries, gradually descending by an inclined plane to a lower story. The only communication, as a rule, between the stories is by flights of steps. The lowest are usually the latest; the additional labour of removing the earth from the greater depth not being undertaken until the want of burial space in the story above forced it upon its possessors. Instances occur where a stratum of considerable thickness having been left by the original constructors between two stories of ambulacra, an intermediate story (a mezzanine or entresol), has been excavated in later times. These corridors, or ambulacra, follow no definite system. They more usually than not run in straight lines, forming an intricate network continually crossing and recrossing one another at different angles, and as no law of parallelism is adopted in laying out the plan, it is not easy to reduce them to any system. These galleries are not merely passages of access to the cemetery, but themselves constitute the cemetery. They do not conduct to the places of interment, but the dead are interred in them. The walls are vertical, and (as represented in the annexed woodcut) are pierced on each side with long low horizontal recesses, commencing a few inches above the level of the floor, and rising tier above tier, like the berths in a ship's cabin, to the number of five, six, and sometimes even twelve ranges. They are divided from one another by an intervening shelf of tufa as thin as was compatible with security. The length of these niches is almost invariably in the direction of the gallery. This form was much easier to excavate, and enabled the corpse to be laid in its tomb with greater facility and reverence than when the recess entered deep into the rock, at right angles to the axis of the corridor. Examples of this latter form do exist in the Roman catacombs, but very rarely. Padre Marchi, Monumenti delle Arti Christi. Prim. pp. 110, 225, tav. xiv., xliii., xlv., gives a description and engravings of 20 specimens discovered by him in the cemetery of St. Cyriac (see ground plan). The same mode of construction appears in the heathen catacombs in Egypt, and those of the Saracens at Taormina, engraved by D'Agincourt, pl. ix. The name given in modern times to these sepulchral cavities is loculus. The original term, appearing thousands and thousands of times in the inscriplxiii. I grave.

Section of the Crypt of St. Lucius in the Catacomb of St. Callistus, from De Rossi.

Gallery with "Loculi," from Northcote's "Roma Sotterranea."

Lupi in writes terii pa rumve
Rev. Ma recess instance creasing criving were do accordi were des terms a that of et Maxe 285.) " pace biso neofite b Trisomi: somu" (C Domnina
(ib). Quo locum Ma
39; see M
in later ti and as so show, not Another ex epitaph fro anti || et c rerant || a ribus)." A Capitol giv
p. 181, no.
1500 folle have been bargain wa and Lauren ab Arjtaen
tium || dati
S. Præsent times loculi fossor with sorris disenc
The loculi ar able for an r by thousand al labour of removing the depth not being underburial space in the stony possessors. Instances of considerable thickness the original constructors ambulacra, an intermediate or entresol, has been. These corridors, or loculi system. They more a straight lines, forming continually crossing and at different angles, and is adopted in lying out to reduce them to any are not merely passages very, but themselves cou-

Norwicote's "Horns Sutteranea."

They do not conduct to, but the dead are interred are vertical, and (as red woodcut) are placed on horizontal recesses, some above the level of the floor, or, like the berths in a ship's of five, six, and sometimes they are divided from one shelf of turf as thin security. The length of invariably in the direction form was much easier to the corpse to be laid in its ability and reverence than red deep into the rock, of the corridor. Examples exist in the Roman cata- y. Padre Marchi, Mou- t. Prim. pp. 110, 225, tav. a description and engraving discovered by him in the ca (see ground plan). The tion appears in the heather ad those of the Saracens at D'Agincourt, pl. ix. The times to these sepulchral original term, appearing and of times in the inscripmons of the catacombs, was locus. The word loculus, properly signified a hier or a coffin, "cujus (Agapeti) corpus in loculo plumbeo translatum est (Constantinopoli) usque in basilicam B. Petri apostoli" (Anastas. lix. § 95; cf. Ibid.

CATACOMBS

Loculi in the Catacomb of St. Cyriaca, from Marchi.

lxiii. 110), and is incorrectly applied to the grave. Its use in this sense was introduced by Lupi in the early part of the 18th century. He writes "loculus appello excavatum in coemeterii parietibus fenestram parvam ad unum alterumve cadaver excipientium" (Lupi, Dissert. ad Sev. Martyr. Epitaph. 1734, p. 2, note 3). Each recess usually contained a single body. But instances are by no means rare where by increasing its depth it was made capable of receiving two, three, or four corpses. Such recesses were designated bisomi, trisomi, quadrisomi, etc., according to the number of bodies for which they were destined. Examples of the use of all these terms appear in the epitaphs. Bisomi: from that of St. Callistus, "Donata se viv. emit sibi et Maxentiae locum bisomum." (Boldetti, p. 286.) "Sergius et Junius Fossores B. N. M. in pace bisom." (Boldetti, p. 65.) "Octavie coivgi neofite bisomv. maritus fecit" (Bosio, p. 507). Trisomi: "Seberus, Leontinus Victorinus. Trisomu" (Bosio, p. 216.) "Se biba (viva) emet Domniga locum a Successum trisomu ubi positi," (lb.). Quadrisomi: "Consulatu Nicomai ubi positi," (lb.). Quadrisomi: "Consulatu Nicomai ubi positi," (lb.). Quadrisomi: "Consulatu Nicomai ubi positi," (lb.). The loculi were in later times purchased of the sextons, fossores, and as some of the inscriptions already given show, not infrequently in a person's lifetime. Another example is the following ungrammatical epitaph || et Gaudiose compares || se vivi comparaverunt || ab Anastasio et Antiocho FS. (fossoribus)." An inscription from the Museum of the Capitol given by Burgon, Letters from Rome, p. 181, no. 25, acquaints us with the price paid, 1500 folles (the folles is said at that time to have been equivalent to an obolus), and that the bargain was struck in the presence of Severus and Laurence his brother sexton. "Emit locum ab Arisemilium visomum || hoc est et presidium || datum Fossor Philalatro yd est Fol. N. S. Praesentia Severi Foss. et Laurent." Sometimes loculi were excavated by the heirs of the fossor with whom the bargain was made, "fossoris descenditibus" (De Rossi, R. S. i. 215). The loculi are found of all sizes, from those suitable for an infant of a few days old which occur by thousands to those adapted to the body of a full grown man." In the more ancient galleries apertures of various dimensions occur confusedly, having been formed as occasion required. The early loculi are also of much larger dimensions than was needful for the reception of the body, and neither in the form of the niches themselves nor in their arrangement does the idea of economy of space shew itself. But experience taught the excavators how to make the most of the space at command, and Marchi, pp. 112, 113, tav. xv., produces an example from the cemetery of St. Cyriaca, where the loculi are arranged in groups according to their dimensions, every square inch of rock being utilised as far as was consistent with stability. In some cases the back wall of the loculus instead of being parallel to the lines of the opening is set at an angle, forming a trapezoidal recess in which bodies of different stature might lie side by side (see annexed ground plan and section) (Marchi, tav., xv. xviii.). In later times space was also economised by making the recess wide at the head and narrow at the feet. Examples are not wanting of graves being dug like those of our own day in the floor of the corridors. Marchi gives instances from the catacombs of Calepodius and Callistus, tav. xi. xvi. etc. But they are very unfrequent. The loculi, after the introduction of the body were closed with great care, either with slabs of marble (tabulae) or with large tiles, usually three, very exactly cemented together, and luted round with lime to prevent the escape of the gases of the putrefying bodies. The tiles closing the early loculi in the cemetery of Domitilla are of vast size. (De Rossi, Bullett. de Ant. Christ. Magg., 1865.) On the slabs of the earlier loculi, e.g. in the cemeteries of Prisella and Domitilla, the name is only painted in red and black pigment, not cut or scratched (Fabretti Insc. Dom. viii. p. 579; Aringhi, R. S. iv. 37, p. 126; Boldetti, lib. ii. c. 1). The striking fact that, in the words of Denn Milman (Lat. Chr. i. p. 27), "for a considerable part of the first three centuries the church of Rome was a Greek religious colony;" that its language, organisation, writers, scriptures, liturgy, were Greek, is evidenced by the inscriptions on these primitive burial places. They are almost exclusively in Greek. When engraved the letters are often coloured with vermilion. But an immense number of loculi are entirely destitute of any Inscription (Bosio, lib. iii. c. 41; Boldetti, lib. ii. c. 1; Lupi, p. 38). On these slabs were engraved the funeral inscription or epitaph, often accompanied with some of the more usual Christian emblems, the dove, the anchor, or the monogram of Christ. The word tabula appears in some of the epitaphs, e. g., of a master to a pupil, "Posuit tabula magister discenti Pempino benemerenti" (Marchi, p. 119). "Bicentivis karo filio karissimo benemerenti posuit tabula qvi bixit annos iiii et dies xxii" (Ib. p. 120). Both from the catacomb of St. Cyriaca.

CATACOMBS

Plan of above loculi (bisomi) from the Catacomb of St. Cyriaca, from Marchi.

A small glass vessel containing indications of the presence of a red fluid, is often found embedded in the mortar at one extremity of the loculus. This was formerly considered to be a certain mark of a martyr's tomb, the "Congregation of Relics" having so decided (Apr. 10, 1868), the red sediment being supposed to be blood. But this opinion has long ceased to be entertained by the best and most unprejudiced Christian archaeologists who almost unanimously agree that the vessel contained Eucharistic wine, and was used at the funeral agape. [GLASS, CHRISTIAN.] Incised on the slab, or scratched on the mortar, the palm branch is one of the symbols that most constantly presents itself in connection with the loculus. This also has been authoritatively declared to be an indisputable evidence of a martyr's tomb, "palmam et vas sanguine tinctum pro signis certissimis martyrii haberi," (Decree of the Cong. of Relics, u. s.), and has been as completely set aside by later and less enthusiastic investigators. Not to dwell on the fact that the epitaphs found in connection with the palm branch, have as a rule, no reference to a martyr's death, this symbol is found on tombs prepared by individuals in their lifetime (e. g., "Leopardus se hiv. fecit" between two palm branches, Boldetti, p. 264), and decorates those of young children (Ib. p. 268); dignities that of Lucifer, bishop of Cagliari, who died in schism, (Ib. p. 262); and even appears on pagan tombstones (Ib. p. 281, sq.). Not a few of the marble slabs (tabulae), closing the loculi, prove on examination, like some of our mediæval sepulchral brasses, to have been used before, their back bearing a second inscription. These are known as opisthographs. They are usually heathen slabs, but not always. One described by Marchi, p. 53, bears on one side "Hilara in Pace," and on the other "Irene in Pace"—both Christian. Boldetti, lib. ii. c. 10, supplies a large number of examples of these twice used slabs. Mabillon (Iter. Ital. p. 136), writes of this custom, "Christiani mos erat ut a sepulchris gentiliū lapides reverenter in suos usus, et relicta ex ea parte quae interiora Christiani tumuli spectabat profana inscriptione aliam in exteriori apponerent ritu Christiano" (Cf. Idem. Euseb. Roman. p. 34; Marchi, pp. 53, 123).

Besides the opisthographs where a heathen slab has been applied to a Christian use no inconsiderable number of distinctly pagan epitaphs has been discovered, in which no such transformation has taken place. Boldetti, lib. ii. c. 9, gives no less than 57 heathen inscriptions without any Christian admixture from the various catacombs, and the list might be very largely increased. One such is mentioned by Mabillon in his Iter. Italicum. Mus. It. vol. i. p. 47, which though it was destitute of Christian tokens was sent to Toulonse as the slab of a supposed martyr, Juli Euodia, when it was really that of Costa her mother, and was pagan. In Boldetti, p. 447, we have a curious heathen slab from St. Agnes, with the inscription "Dionise frater illius semper Rosse tatalna" and xyi. bois of gaming. De Rossi found pagan sarcophagi and pagan inscriptions in the catacomb of Callistus in excavations made under his own eye (Rom. Sott. ii. pp. 169, 281-290). It has been usually held that these were slabs which had been removed from the heathen tombs in the vicinity of the catacombs after the Christian religion had become dominant, and brought down to be re-engraved and fitted for their new purpose. "Primos Christianos Paganorum memorias titulosque sulfuratos esse et suis loculis coemeterialibus claudendis propriis nominibus insculptis et profanorum absconditis aut abrasis . . . ostendere possumus" (Fabretti Ins. Ant. p. 307). But another and widely different view has lately been propounded by Mr. Parker and others, that the rigid separation usually supposed to exist between Christians and heathen in the places of sepulture was not always maintained, and that when in the fourth century the burning of the dead ceased the catacombs became the common burial places of Rome for heathen and Christians alike. This is one of the many questions in connection with the catacombs in which fuller light may show that the traditional view requires some modification, but which must wait the result of further investigations for complete resolution. A class of mixed inscriptions remains to be noticed in which the heathen formula D. M., or even the full Dis Manibus appears in connection with Christian phraseology and Christian emblems. "Debita sacerdotis manibus officia" is quoted from Gruter by Fabretti Ins. Rom. 112 A., as a Christian inscription. From the same collection (Gruter, M. XL.) he also gives one in which occurs the line "Sanctique Manes nobis petentibus adsit," in connection with the clause "quiescit in pace," and the term "depositio." Other inscriptions from Fabretti's collection evidence the same lingering retention of heathen formula and phraseology in the expressions "Luchesis," "Taenariæ fauces," "fatis creptus iniquis," and the like. The strangely unchristian phrase "Tartara custodia" occurs in the epitaph of a presbyter (Fabr. p. 329, no. 484). "Domus aeterna" is by no means infrequent: e. g., "Florentina quae vivit annis xxvi Crescens fecit Venemerenti et sibi et suis domo aeterna in pace" (Ib. p. 114, no. 289). The untenable fallacy contended for by Boldetti, lib. ii. c. 11, Fabretti, and the earlier school of antiquaries, that the letters D. M. stood for Deo Maximo has been deservedly exploded. De Rossi allows that they can only stand for Dis Manibus, and we may safely regard the occurrence of these letters on Christian tombstones as an instructive example of the slowness with which an entire people changes its ancestral faith, and of the obstinacy with which certain usages are clung to long after their real force and meaning has passed away.

* On this subject and its kindred topics the dispassionate verdict of Dean Merivale may be read with advantage. "The first Christians at Rome did not separate themselves from the heathens, nor renounce their ordinary callings; they intermarried with unbelievers, a supposed martyr, Juli really that of Casta bet in Boldetti, p. 447, we slab from St. Agnes, with the frater illis semper nati, boys of gaming. De sarcophagi and pagan inscriptions of Callistus in excavations (De Rossi, R. S. i. p. 103, usually held that these were removed from the heathen catacombs after the became dominant, and re-engraved and fitted for Primos Christianos Paganosque sulfuratos esse et blas claudendis propriis notorianum absconditis aut possimus" (Fabretti Ins. other and widely different propounded by Mr. Parker separation usually syn- Christians and heathen ure was not always main- in the fourth century the ased the catacombs became nes of Rome for heathen This is one of the may on with the catacombs in show that the traditional modification, but which of further investigations on. A class of mixed in which the be noticed in which the M., or even the full Dis connection with Christian istinian emblems. "Debita a" is quoted from Gruter om. 112 A., as a Christian e same collection (Gruter, ne in which occurs the hae obis petentibus adsint," in clause "quievit in pace." setio." Other inscriptions ection evidence the same heathen formula and phras- ions "Luchesis," "Taeoa- ceptus iniquis," and the like, ristian phrase "Tartarea the epistaph of a presbyter o. "Donus aeterna" is by e.g. "Florentia quae viuit fecit Venemerenti et sibi et in pace" (ib. p. 114, no e fallacy contended for by Fabretti, and the earlier s, that the letters D. M. no has been deservedly er- llovs that they can only s, and we may safely regard these letters on Christian ructive example of the an entire people changes and of the obstinacy with are elung to loog after meaning has passed away.

its kindred topics the dispo- Meriviate may be read with Christians at Rome did not ex- heathens, nor remove their intermarried with unbelievers,

CATACOMBS

Examples are not wanting where the work of excavation has not been completed, and the form of the loculus is still seen as it was sketched by the fossore on the wall of the ambulacrum.

The bodies of the faithful were not buried naked, but with the same feeling of reverence that pervaded the whole rite, were, like that of their master, wrapt in linen cloths "as the manner of the Jews is to bury." Sometimes the body was enveloped in a sheet; sometimes swathed in many lengths of bands, in the same fashion as Lazarus is represented in the early Christian pictures and bas reliefs. Bosio assures us that in his investigations he found instances of both modes. He mentions that, in excavating the foundations for St. Peter's, bodies were exhumed bound with linen bands, and that he himself had seen very many wrapt in linen sheets of exceeding fineness, which fell to dust at a touch (Bosio, R. S. cap. 19; Marchi, p. 19). The story of the double discovery of the body of St. Caecilia first by Pope Paschal, c. 820, and then by Cardinal Siontati, A.D. 1599, in the robes of golden tissue she had worn in life is familiar. (It may be read in Northcote, R. S. pp. 154-157.) That the bodies placed in the loculi were embalmed is probable from the known custom of the early Christians. Boldetti, lib. i. c. 59, affirms that on repeated occasions when he was present at the opening of a grave in the catacombs the assembled company were conscious of a spicy odour diffusing itself from the tomb. Of this custom Prudentius writes:

"Asperaque myrrha Sabao, Corpus medicamentis servat."

(In Exeg. Vez. Hymn 10).

Another and ruder mode of averting the evils which might arise from the putrefaction of the bodies in galleries which were the frequent resort of the living was to bury the corpse in quick lime. Padre Marchi remarked frequent examples of this custom, especially in the cemetery of St. Agnes. The lime appeared to have been placed between two winding sheets, one coarser and the other finer, of the tissue of which it retained the impress (Marchi, p. 19).

Interment in the loculus though infinitely the most common, was not the only, and perhaps not the earliest mode adopted by the Christians. Cav. de Rossi has been led by his investigations to the conclusion that the earliest form of Christian burial was in sarcophagi placed in detached chambers, and that burial in the loculus was of later date. The truth may however be that the bodies of the wealthier were laid in sarcophagi, which must have always been costly, while the friends of the poorer contented themselves with a simple loculus in the wall. The Cemetery of St. Domitilla at Tor Marancia, which is considered by De Rossi to be the monument of a Christian family of distinction, and is shown by the classical character of its architecture and decoration to have belonged to the first age of the church, affords examples of interment in sarcophagi, as nor even in their unions with one another did they neglect the ordinary forms of law. It would seem that they burnt their dead after the Roman fashion" (can this be shown to be true?), "gathered their ashes into the sepulchres of their patrons, and inscribed over them the customary dedication to the Divine Spirit."—History of the Romans, ch. liv.

CATACOMBS

well as of the transition from the sarcophagus to the loculus, in some graves which "though really mere shelves in the wall are so disguised by stucco and painting on the outside as to present to passers by the complete outward appearance of a sarcophagus" (De Rossi, R. S. i. 187, 195, 267; Northcote, R. S. p. 72, 73). Another example is the so-called Capella Graeca of the catacomb of St. Priscilla. This crypt is of a very peculiar character, formed in the recesses of an ancient arenaria, not hollowed out of the tuft, but constructed of brick. The burial-places here are not loculi, but large arched recesses destined to contain sarcophagi of which in Bosio's time numerous fragments remained, and some still exist (Bosio, R. S. 513, 533; De Rossi, R. S. i. 188 sq.). The cemetery of Domitilla contains also numerous examples of sarcophagi of terra cotta buried in the floor of the ambulatory.

Another form of interment analogous to the sarcophagus was that in the Table Tombs or Sepolcro a mensa, an oblong chest either hollowed out in the living rock, or built up of masonry slabs of stone or large tiles, and closed by a heavy slab of marble lying horizontally on the top, forming a table. The rock was excavated above the tomb, to form a rectangular recess. When the niche assumed a circular form, which is the more frequent though not the earlier shape, it is known by the name of arcosolium [ARCOSOLIUM.] Both forms of tomb are met with in the galleries among the loculi, but their more usual position is in the sepulchral chambers, or cubicula, which opened out of the galleries. The table tombs sometimes stands in front of the wall, projecting from it, like the altar tombs of our own churches. Examples of this arrangement appear in the tombs of the presbyters Eusebius and Gregorius in the papal crypt in the cemetery of St. Callistus (De Rossi, vol. ii. p. 108, tav. I. A.). More frequently it is let into the wall, and stands in a recess, as we see in the tomb assigned by De Rossi to St. Zephyrinus, which formed the original altar in the same crypt (ib. pp. 20, 21, 51), and that of St. Cornelius in the same catacomb (ib. vol. i. p. 284, tab. v.). The arched form or arcosolium proper is not found in the more ancient cemeteries, or in the earliest constructed cubicula. This is an indication of date of great importance in determining the relative antiquity of the catacombs. De Rossi remarks (vol. ii. p. 245) that "the arcosolium is the dominant form in every part of the second and third area of the cemetery of St. Callistus, and appears frequently in some of the crypts added to the original rectangular area to unite it to the second area, but is entirely wanting (with one exception which serves only to prove the rule) in all the cubicula of the primitive area, even in the most noble and illustrious of its sepulchres" (Cf. De Rossi, vol. i. pp. 284, 285; vol. ii. p. 21).

Table Tomb.

Arcosolium.

In addition to the ordinary places of interment in the ambulacra, the catacombs contain an immense number of sepulchral chambers or cubicula, each enshrining a larger or smaller number of dead, as well in tomb-tombs and areosolia as in loculi pierced in the walls. These were originally family burial places, excavated and embellished at the expense of the friends of the departed, and from the date of their first construction served for the celebration of the eucharistic feast and agape, on the occasion of the funeral, and its successive anniversaries. In times of persecution they may have supplied places of religious assembly where the faithful might gather in security for the celebration of the holy mysteries at the graves of the departed martyrs and others whose faith they might be soon called to follow and seal their testimony with their blood. The name cubiculum is of exclusively Christian use as applied to places of interment. We find it repeatedly used in that sense in the Liber Pontificalis of Anastasius. In the life of Sixtus III. A.D. 432-440, it is distinctly used for a family vault "Cujus" (Bussi) "corpus sepelivit ad Beatum Petrum apostolum in cubiculo parentum ejus" (Anast. xlv. § 63). Padre Marchi, p. 101, gives several inscriptions from the catacombs themselves, in which the term occurs in this reference: e.g. CVBICVLVM DOMITIANI; CVBICVLVS FAL. GAUDENTI ARGENTARI, from the catacomb of St. Callistus. An inscription of the year 336 given by De Rossi, No. 45, indicates the family vault of Aurelia Martina CVBICVLVM AURELIAE MARINAE. "These inscriptions indicate," writes Marchi, p. 101, "that in the fourth century the persons named caused that their own cubicula should be excavated at their own expense. Each cubiculum was of sufficient dimensions to serve for several generations of their respective families. If it proved insufficient loculi were added at a greater or less distance from the cubiculum." Sometimes we find the arch of an areosolium of the first century cut through and used as a door or entrance to a second cubiculum excavated in its rear, the original sarcophagus being removed and carried to the back of the chapel that other bodies might be placed near it (Bulletin. di Arch. Christ. 1867). The number of these sepulchral chambers is almost beyond computation. Marchi reckons more than sixty in the eighth part of the catacomb of St. Agnes. In that of St. Callistus they amount to some hundreds. They are equally frequent in the other cemeteries. Their form is very varied. In the catacomb of St. Callistus, with very few exceptions, they are rectangular, and that appears to have been the earlier shape. But the plates of Marchi, Boldetti, &c., afford examples of many other forms, triangular, pentagonal, hexagonal, octagonal, circular, and semi-circular. Among the examples given by Boldetti, pp. 14, 15, and Marchi, tav. xxiii., of which we give a plan and section, one from the cemetery of Callistus is circular, with a domed vault, and is surrounded by six arched niches. Another from that of St. Helena on the Via Labicana is square, with an insulated tomb in the centre, the roof being supported by four columns standing quite free of the walls, cut out of the native tufa. The roof is sometimes a barrel vault, sometimes a coved ceiling, nearly flat; in one instance, it expands into a lofty dome, lighted by a luminare (Bosio, p. 489, Marchi, tav. xxxi.). Both the roof, the vaults, and the recesses of the areosolia are generally coated with stucco, and richly decorated with religious paintings. In the later restorations the walls are often veneered with very occup laetia the h Moest

In the Catacomb of St. Agnes, with seats hewn out of the rock.

Plan of Cubiculum from Catacomb of St. Callistus.

Section of Cubiculum from Catacomb of St. Callistus.

the F
the P Blind Mirac limite Christ
wearis branch peacoc
The w securo suppor or form tav. xi cubicul
tav. xx 303, ha stucco, rini is claims r whether covere not un commun called known a Vit. M meterio amples s Jerome's in Ezechiel luminaria admissum seestram
And again per crypt aspierem.
phant, xi
"Occurr
Quae Attamen Crebra
Sic dista Cerner
The Acts that the m burning her her with ste lapisidius of
From an ep
luminaria
"larger" at
It is so follo (Sisto) locu miae maj marito an x cula from th Peter (pl. xx immediately a case as it air to chambe Painted on th an alive bran the same lu arcosoli m of the first d used as a door or en-am excavated in its rear, is being removed and the chapel that other ear it (Bulletin, di Arch. number of these sepulchral and computa ion. Marchi in the eighth part of the In that of St. Callistus hundreds. They are other cemeteries. Their the catacomb of St. Cal-ceptions, they are recto have been the lates of Marchi, Boldetti, many other forms, triangular, octagonal, circu-Among the examples 14, 15, and Marchi, tav. a plan and section, one

Catacomb of St. Callistus

Catacomb of St. Callistus

Callistus is circular, with a surrounded by six arches that of St. Helena on the width an insulated tomb in ng supported by four coring ceiling, nearly flat: is into a lofty dome, lighted 489, Marchi, tav. xxii.) ta, and the recesses of the coated with stucco, and religious paintings. In the walls are often veneered with plates of costly marble [PLATONIA]. In a very large number of examples the Good Shepherd occupies the centre of the ceiling, the surrounding lunettes containing Adam and Eve after the Fall, the history of Jonah, the Sacrifice of Abraham, Moses striking the Rock, the Three Children in the Furnace, the Visit of the wise men to Christ, the Raising of Lazarus, the Healing of the Blind man, the Paralytic carrying his Bed, the Miracle of the Loaves, and other scenes from the limited cycle of Scriptural subjects to which early Christian art confined itself, treated with a wearisome uniformity; embellished with palm branches, vines laden with grapes, the dove, the peacock, and other familiar Christian symbols.

The walls of the chamber were also similarly decorated [FRESCOS]. The vault is in some cases supported by columns, either cut out of the tufo, or formed of brick coated with stucco (Marchi, tav. xix. xxii. xxx. xxxiii.). A very interesting cubiculum from the Via Latina given by Marchi, tav. xxii. p. 141, sq. from a plate of Bosio's, p.
303, has a domical vault and pillars covered with stucco, ornamented with vine branches and omoni in relief. The character of the decoration claims for this a very early date. It is doubtful whether any other of the kind has been discovered in the catacombs. Light and air were not unfrequently admitted by means of a shaft communicating with the surface of the ground, called luminare. A chamber so lighted was known as a cubiculum clarum (Cf. Anastas. Bibl.
tit. Marcellina, "Sepelivit (corpore) . . . in coe-meterio Priscillae in cubiculo claro"). For examples see Marchi, tav. viii. xxix. xxvii. xlviii.
Jerome's well known description of the catacombs in Ezechiel, c. xl. contains an allusion to these luminaria. His words are "raro desuper lumen admissum horrorem temperat . . . ut non tam festestram quam foramen demissi lumen putes." And again, praefat. in Daniel, "Cum et quasi per cryptam antubulans rrum desuper lumen aspicrem." Prudentius also in his Peristephanda, xi.-v. 161-8 uses similar language:—

"Occurrit crenis immissa foraminis tectis Quae faciunt clarum antra super radio.

Attenet excelsi subter cava viscera montis, Cretas torbrato fornice lux penetat, Sic datur absentis per subterranea solis Cenere fulgore in lumenibuscque frui."

The Acts of SS. Marcellinus and Peter record that the martyr Candida was put to death by hurling her down an airshaft, and overwhelming her with stones, "per luminare cryptae iactantes lapidibus obruerunt," ap. Holland, ii. Jun. n. 10.
From an epitaph given by Marchi, p. 165, the luminaria appear to have been divided into "larger" and "smaller," "maiora," "minora." It is as follows: "cum paravi Saturninus n]Susto (Sisto) locum visumum auri solid]os duo in luminare majore. Que postea est ibi que fuit cum marito an xl." Marchi gives an interesting example of a luminare majus serving for two cubi-cula from the cemetery of SS. Marcellinus and Peter (pl. xxix. pp. 165 sq.). A cylindrical shaft immediately above the ambacrum expands into a cone as it descends, so as to supply light and air to chambers on opposite sides of the passage.
Painted on the wall of the shaft is a dove with an olive branch. In the cemetery of Callistus the same luminare sometimes serves for three chambers (Northcote, R. S. p. 128). Examples of the smaller luminaria from the cemetery of St. Helena may be found in Marchi, tav. vi. vii. viii. If the strata through which the shaft was driven were not sufficiently solid to stand without support, it was lined with a wall, carried up a little distance above the level of the ground, to avoid accidents. Many of the existing lumi-naria belong to the Damascine period, having been opened to admit light and air to the tombs of the more renewed martyrs when they became the object of pious visits. We may instance that of the crypt of St. Cecilia. If, as was most usual, there was no luminare, the chambers were illuminated by lamps, sometimes suspended by chains from the vault, sometimes standing in niches, or on small brackets of tile or marble often placed at the angle of a loculus. Bottari, vol. i. p. 17, asserts that when the catacombs were first opened some of these lamps were found still in their place, and we are informed by Marchi, p. 136, that the upper part of the niches, and the walls or ceilings above the lamps still retained the blackness caused by the smoke.

These cubacula were very frequently double, one on either side of the gallery, and, as we have just noticed, in some instances a luminare was sunk in the centre so as to give light to both (Boldetti, p. 16, b.). An inscription of the highest interest given by De Rossi, vol. i. p. 208, describes a double cubiculum of this kind constructed by the permission of Pope Marcellinus, A. D. 296-308, by the Deacon Severus for himself and his family, "Cubiculum duplex cum arcosoliis et luminare n] jussu P. P. sui Marcellini Diaconiste n] Severus fecit mansionem in pace quietam n] sibi suis que." De Rossi describes a luminare of very large size and unusual character in the cemetery of St. Balbina discovered by him. It is nearly hexagonal, and opens on the subterranean excavations with no less than eight rays of light illuminating as many distinct chambers and galleries (R. S. i. 265).

Each side of the cubiculum usually contains a table tomb or an arcosolium. That facing the entrance, behind which the rock is often excavated so as to form an apse, was the chief tomb of the chamber, and very frequently contained the remains of a martyr, and according to primitive usage, based on Lev. vi. 9-11, furnished an altar for the celebration of the Eucharist. The altar was sometimes detached from the wall. But this was not a primitive arrangement. In the papal crypt in the cemetery of Callistus we have traces of two altars. The original altar remains hewn out in the rock, the front of brickwork, and the stone slab covering it forming the holy table. In front of this, a raised marble step or podium, with four shallow holes or sockets is an evidence of a second later altar standing on four pillars. We have noticed above an example of an insulated altar from the cemetery of St. Helena. As more space was required for the interment of the bodies of members of the same family the walls above and around the original tombs were pierced with loculi, sometimes amounting to nearly a hundred. The desire of reposing in the same locality with the blessed dead, and in close proximity to a saint or martyr, which was awakened at so early a period and exercised so much power (cf. August. de Cura pro Mortuis gerenda; retract. lib. v.

c. 64. Maximus Taurinensis. Hom. lxxxi Ambros. ad pop. de SS. Gervas. et Protais. Paulinus Nol. in Panegy. Celsi led to the excavation of loculi in the walls behind the earlier tombs, with complete disregard of the paintings decorating them, which were thus mutilated or destroyed. A very badly spelt and ungrammatical inscription given by Marchi, p. 102, from Boldetti, who copied it from the cemetery of St. Cyriaca, tells us of two ladies Valeria and Sabina, who in their lifetime had purchased from fassores named Apro and Viator a double grave (bisomum) in the rear of that in which the bodies of recognised saints had been buried, "retro sanctos." It is as follows: IN CRYPTA NOVA RETRO SANCTUS EMERITUM (-RUM?) SE VIVAS BALER | RA ET SABINA MERUM LOCUM | BISONI AN APHONIE ET A | BIATORIE. The inscription set up by Damasus in the cemetery of Callistus in honour of the companions in martyrdom of Pope Xystus bears witness to his participation in this feeling, and his relinquishment of the fulfilment of his wishes lest he should disturb the ashes of the faithful.

"Hic lateor Damasus volui mea condere membra, Sed cineres timui sanctos vexare paruum."

An inscription given by Gruter, Insc. Antiq. Christ. p. 1167, No. 4, testifies the same sentiment.

"Sanctorum exuvias penitus confine s'pulechrum, Promeruit sacro digna Marina solo."

St. Ambrose also states that he had resigned the place beneath the altar in which he had intended his own body should lie, "dignum est enim ut ibi requiescat sacerdos ubi olerere consuevit" to the relics of the recently discovered martyrs Gervasius and Protais, and contrasts the position of Christ present on the altar with the saints beneath it, "ille super altari qui pro omnibus mortuus est, isti sub altari qui illius redempti sunt passione." (Ambros. Ep. xxii. 15.) See also Jerome, adv. Vigilant. p. 359. [ALTAR.] For examples of this ruthless destruction of earlier decorations (Cf. De Rossi, vol. ii, tav. 27, 28, 29; Northcote, R. S. Plate xvi.) When the cubiculum was absolutely too full to receive any more bodies loculi were dug in its vicinity, their connection with the family vault being indicated by an inscription to that effect, e.g. Marchi, p. 101, LOCA ADVERTIMENTES AD CUBICULUM GERMANIANI.

The altar was sometimes protected from any careless approach by lattice work of marble, transenna, the prototype of the cancelli of later Christian churches. Fragments of an enclosure of this kind were found by De Rossi in the papal crypt, and supply the authority for the restoration (R. S. vol. ii, pp. 20-27, tav. i. l. A.). Other examples are given by Boldetti from the cemeteries of Praetextatus and Helena, and Priscilla (pp. 34, 35, Marchi, p. 128). A very beautiful example of the transenna is seen in the cemetery church of St. Alexander, A.D. 498.

We know that it was the universal custom of the early church to celebrate the Eucharist at the time of a funeral, provided it took place in the morning (for authorities see Bingham bk. xxiii. ch. iii. § 12). By degrees a corrupt custom crept in, based on a superstitious view of the magical power of the consecrated elements, of administering the Holy Communion to the departed (Bingham Orig. bk. xv. c. iv. § 20). The prohibition of this profane custom in the canons of some early councils (e.g. Auxerre, A.D. 578, can. 12; Carthage iii. A.D. 397, can. 6; Trullo, A.D. 691, can. 83) is evidence for its existence. The consecrated bread was laid as a charm on the breast of the corpse. The wine enclosed in small glass or earthenware bottles was placed in the grave, or imbedded in the mortar at the mouth of the loculus, and the red colour left by the exsiccated wine mistaken for blood in the early stages of catacomb investigation has created thousands of false martyrs. Another analogous custom was that of pouring libations of wine on the graves after the old heathen fashion, and supplying the dead with food for their last journey, viaticum. The 22nd canon of the Second Council of Tours A.D. 567 mentions those "qui in festivitate cathedre domini Petri Apostoli cibos mortuis offerunt." Paulinus of Nola Poem. xxvii. vv. 566-7 thus alludes to the libations—

"Simplicitas pietate cadit, male credula sanctos Perfusus balante mero gaudere sepulchris."

Another purpose of the cubicula was for the celebration of the Funeral Feast on the anniversary of the day of death. This was a custom inherited from the heathen sepulchral rites, which too often degenerated into heathen license. St. Augustine deplors that "many drink most luxuriously over the dead, and when they make a feast for the departed, bury themselves over the buried, and place their gluttony and drunkenness to the score of religion" (De Mor. Eccl. Cath. c. xxiv.), and condemns those who "make themselves drunk in the memorials of the martyrs" (Cont. Faust. lib. xx. c. 21). (Cf. Arceus. de Elia. c. xvii.; August. Confess. vi. c. 2.) In primitive times it may be charitably believed that such abuses were the exceptions, and that the anniversary was observed in a seemly manner, and with a cheerfulness tempered by religion. (On this custom see Neander, Ch. Hist. i. 454, Clark's edition; Bingham, Origines, bk. xx. ch. viii. §§ 1-10; bk. xxiii. ch. iii.; §§ 3-17; Bosio, lib. iv. c. 34.) The pictures on the walls of the cubicula in some of the catacombs furnish representations of these funeral feasts, of which they were the scene. The most curious is from an arcosolium in the catacomb of SS. Marcellian and Peter (Bosio, p. 391). Three guests—a woman between two men—are seated at a crescent-shaped, or sigma table, at the two ends of which, in stately curule chairs, two matrons are seated. No dishes appear on the table; they are placed on a small three-legged stand in the centre, at which a lad is stationed preparing to execute the orders of the guests, which are written above their heads—"Irene da Calda," "Agape misce mi" (cf. Juven. Sat. v. 63; Marcellian. lib. i. Ep. 11; lib. viii., Ep. 63; lib. xiv., Ep. 95). Another painting from the same cemetery represents six persons, three of each sex, seated at an empty table. One is drinking from a rythion; another stretches out his hand to receive a cup from a person of whom no more than the arm is left (Bosio, p. 355).

The cubicula generally speaking are of small dimensions, and are incapable of containing more than a very limited number of worshippers. But there are also found halls and chambers of

mu side on t par ting nom into larg typi
com figu and

Man part
and wide
The
galle women gallery viled f stucco

tuary. cathedr by a sto which out so r solium
and occ
ment.
with ti altar.
solium
Marchi have be tinue of beyond of whic father's two sex cases (p the chu before th

bk. xv. c. iv. § 20). The same custom in the canon (e.g. Auzerre, A.D. 518, A.D. 397, can. 6; Trullo, evidence for its existence, was laid as a charm on wine. The wine enclosed in rare bottles was placed in the mortar at the end and the red colour left by mistake for blood in the investigation has created myths. Another analogous rite being libations of wine on old heathen fashion, and with food for their last canon of the 22nd canon of the Synod of A.D. 567 mentions the theodre domini Petri Apostolus. Paulinus of Nola thus alludes to the libation, male credula sanctos gaudere sepulchris."

The cubicula was for the annual Feast on the anniversary. This was a custom heathen sepulchral rites, adapted into heathen license, as that "many drink most dead, and when they make dead, bury themselves over their gluttony and drunken religion" (De Mor. Eccl. condemns those who "make the memorials of the martyr. xx. c. 21). (Cf. Ar. vi. must. Confess. vi. c. 2.) It may be charitably believed the exceptions, and that observed in a seemly manner, less tempered by religion. Neander, Ch. Hist. i. 454, Ham, Origines, bk. xx. ch. xxiii. ch. iii.; §§ 3-17;

The pictures on the walls of the catacombs furnish these funeral feasts, of which the most curious is from the catacomb of St. Marcellinus (391). Three guests—a man—are seated at a crescent table, at the two ends of the chairs, two matrons appear on the table; they are three-legged stand in the station preparing to the guests, which are "Irene da Cadda," cf. Juven. Sat. v. 63; Mar. lib. viii., Ep. 63; lib. xiv. dining from the same companions, three of each sex, able. One is drinking from a person of whom no more (Bosio, p. 355).

Generally speaking arts of small incapable of containing more than a number of worshippers. Round halls and chambers of much larger proportions, which have been considered by the chief Roman Catholic authorities on the subject to have been constructed for the purpose of religious assemblies. These are distinguished by Padre Marchi, by an arbitrary nomenclature which has failed to find acceptance, into crypte, for the smaller, and ecclesie, for the larger excavations. Of the latter the most typical example is that discovered in the catacomb of St. Agnes in 1842, and described and figured by Marchi (pp. 182-184; Tav. xxxv.-xxxvii.) from whom we borrow the annexed plan and section. This comprises five quadrangular com-

CATACOMBS

Plan of supposed Church, from the Catacomb of St. Agnes, from Marchi.

partments, three on one side of the ambulacrum and two on the other, connected by a tolerably wide passage cutting the gallery at right angles. The two compartments to the right of the gallery are supposed to have been reserved for women, and two of the three to the left of the gallery for men. The third compartment, divided from the others by an arch supported on stuccoed columns, formed the chancel or sanctuary. In the centre of the end wall stands the cathedra, or bishop's seat, flanked on each side by a stone bench running along the side walls, which formed seats for the clergy. Hollowed out so as to furnish loculi for children, an arcosolium fills the space behind the episcopal chair, and occupies both sides of each of the compartment. The walls above the arcosolia are pierced with tiers of loculi. There is no trace of an altar. The cathedra entirely prevents the arcosolium fronting the entrance being so used. Marchi therefore concludes that the altar must have been portable. The whole is entirely destitute of painting, or decorations of any kind, beyond a rich marble paneling, a small portion of which remains. The result of the learned father's researches was to satisfy him that the two sexes reached the church by distinct staircases (p. 42) and by separate corridors, and that the church itself must have been constructed before the commencement of the third century; but the whole rests on too conjectural a basis to be accepted as anything more than a possible hypothesis.

Section of supposed Church, from the Catacomb of St. Agnes, from Marchi.

CATACOMBS

Some of the so-called crypte are destitute of arcosolia, or have the arcosolia placed at too great an elevation to serve as holy tables for the celebration of the sacred mysteries. These are assumed by Marchi to have been devoted to the instruction of catechumens. They usually consist of two chambers, one for each sex, and are provided with chairs for the (presumed) catechists, and benches cut in the tufa rock for the catechumens (cf. Marchi, pp. 130-133; tav. xvii.). But such an identification is exceedingly doubtful.

When the catacombs became places of refuge in times of persecution (as it is indisputable they did, though not to the extent popularly credited), it was essential that there should be the means of obtaining a supply of water without leaving the limits of the cemetery. This want was supplied by wells and *spring*s, whether dug for this purpose or not, many of which remain to the present time, still holding water. We may mention one in the Arca prima of the Catacomb of St. Callistus (F₁ in De Rossi's plan), which may still be used for its original purpose. The shaft of this well is furnished with foot holes, to enable a man to descend for the purpose of cleaning it out, as is the case, according to De Rossi, in all the ancient wells connected with the catacombs (M. S. de Rossi, Analisi. Geol. ed Arch vol. ii. p. 97). Wells are also mentioned by Boldetti (p. 40) as existing in the cemeteries of Praetextatus and St. Helena, and natural springs in those of St. Pontianus, Ostrianus or Fons Petri and the Vatican.

In close connection with the wells of the catacombs stand the so-called Baptisteries. The most remarkable of these is that in the Catacomb of St. Pontianus, the purpose of which is put beyond doubt by its pictorial decoration (Aringhi, i. 381; Bottari, tav. xlv.; Boldetti, p. 40; Marchi, pp. 32, 220-224; tav. ii. xlii.). A descent of ten steps leads to a cistern filled by a natural stream flowing through a channel in the rock. The wall above the cistern retains a fresco of the Baptism of our Lord, and on that at the back of it is a magnificent jewelled cross, the stem immersed in the water, blossoming into flowers and leaves, and from its arms, which support lighted candles, the characters A. Ω. suspended by chains. Another of these so-called baptisteries is found in the lowest piano of galleries in the Catacomb of St. Agnes. It is a well-preserved chamber, with rude columns out in the tufa rock in the corners. A spring of water runs through it. The paintings have entirely perished from damp.

In connection with some cemeteries we find provision for washing the corpse. This is seen in the very remarkable early Cemetery of Domitilla at Tor Marancia. The entrance is above ground on the side of a hill cut down for the purpose. On each side of the doorway is a vestibule, or covered porticus. To the left is a chamber where may be traced a well and cistern, with the place for the pulley of the bucket. This chamber was probably devoted to the customary washing of the dead body before interment. (See Bosio, R. S. cap. 17.) A similar chamber is found at the entrance of the Jewish Catacomb on the Via Appia. It has a mosaic pavement, and drains to carry the water away.

Entrance to the Catacombs of St. Domitilla, from De Rossi.

a) Entrance to the Catacombs. (b) Porter's lodge with a well and chamber for washing the bodies. (c) "school," or place of meeting.

Some of these wells probably had no other object than that of draining the catacombs. This was the case with that dug by Damasus in the Vatican Cemetery. The galleries of this catacomb being rendered unfit for the purpose of sepulture by the infiltration of water, Damasus cut away the rock till he found the spring, and diverted its waters to supply a baptistery. It is this spring which now supplies the fountain in front of the Pontifical Palace.

Damasus records his good work in the following inscription:—

"Cingebant latentes noctem teneoque meatu Cori ora multorum cineres atque ossa trabant.
Non tulli hoc Damasus communi lege sepultos Post equalem tristis iterum persolvere poemus.
Propterea aggressus magnum superare laborem Ageris inmensi deus cili caluitus montis, Intima offitice seruitus viscera terras, Siccavit totum quod liquid mellefecerat humor, Invenit fontem præbebat quæ dona salutis.
Hæc curavit Mercurius Levita fidelis."

The singular variety of objects discovered within the loculi of the catacombs is an evidence of the permanence of the old heathen idea, which regarded the life after death as a continuation of the present life with its occupations and amusements, as well as of the strength of the universal human instinct, which leads the bereaved to deposit in the grave of their loved ones the tools and ornaments and playthings which had lost their use by the death of their possessor. Boldetti, lib. ii. cc. 14, 15, furnishes us with very interesting details of the results of his investigations in this department, together with engraved representations of some of the more curious and typical objects discovered by him, some of which are still to be seen in the Christian Museum of the Vatican. Among the objects extracted from children's graves are jointed dolls of ivory or bone, similar to those which we learn from Cancellieri de Seor, Basil. Vatican. tom. II. pp. 995-1000, were found in the bier of Maria, the daughter of Stilicho and wife of Honorius, belonging to the close of the 4th century—little earthenware money-jars,—mosaics, and a very great abundance of small bronze bells, such as we know to have been in use in classical times for the amusement of children, frequently met with in heathen tombs, and mice in niel or terra-cotta. Female tombs have furnished numerous examples of toilet equipments and personal ornaments; mirrors, combs in ivory or boxwood, bad'ins, pins of ivory or bone, vinegrettes, toecovers, toothpicks, and earpicks; bracelets and armlets, carrings and necklaces; buckles and brooches, ribs and seals; studs and buttons, lullacs, and other similar objects, setting before us vividly the Roman Christian ladies of the first ages. In not a few instances, according to the same authority (Boldetti, Osserv. p. 297), the false hair worn in life was buried with the corpse. Among other objects of interest discovered in the loculi we may mention di'e, ivory knife-handles, withards, a lock and key, one half of an ivory egg with portraits of a husband and wife and the Christian monogram engraved on the flat section; tortoiseshell, weights of stone, and small glass fish engraved with numbers, the purpose of which has not been determined.

The number of lamps discovered in and about the tombs is countless. The majority are of terra-cotta, but some have been found of bronze, and some even of silver and amber. One in this last material was found in the catacomb of St. Priscilla (Boldetti, Osserv. p. 298, tav. i. no. 7). By far the greater part of these lamps have only the monogram of Christ impressed on them. But there are a very large number which present other familiar symbols, such as the palm-branch, the dove, the fish, the ship, and A and Ω. The Good Shepherd is of frequent occurrence. The lamps found in the Jewish catacombs almost universally bear the seven-branched candlestick.

The so-called instruments of torture which the eager imagination of pious enthusiasts, resolved to convert every buried Christian into a martyr, has discovered enshrined in the loculi, or incised on their closing slabs, in the opinion of the best informed and most calm judging writers, are nothing more than implements of handicraft. One singular pronged weapon, specimens of which are preserved in the Vatican and the Collegio Romano, has been identified with a heathen sacrificial instrument, and its presence in a Christian catacomb has yet to be explained.

TOPOGRAPHY OF THE ROMAN CATACOMBS.

The following catalogue of the ancient Christian cemeteries of Rome, the names of which stand recorded in ancient historical documents, arranged according to the chief lines of road leading from the city, is derived from De Rossi's great work. The first column gives the name of the road. The second that which De Rossi's investigations have led him to believe to have been the primitive names of the larger cemeteries in the first age of the Church. In the third column appear the designations by which they were known in the fourth century, after the establishment of the peace of the Church. The fourth column gives the titles of certain lesser cemeteries or isolated tombs of martyrs, which are often confused with the larger cemeteries to which they were adjacent, and with which they were sometimes locally connected. The later cemeteries formed, subsequent to the peace of the Church, occupy the last column.

Roads.	Greater Cemeteries.		Lesser Cemeteries, or Isolated Tombs of Martyrs.	Cemeteries constructed after the Peace of the Church.
	Primitive Names.	Names in the 4th Century. Time of Peace.
Appia	1. Callixti	Lucinae Zephyrini Juliani Hippolyti	S. Xysti S. Caeclinae SS. Xysti et Cornelli S. Januarii SS. Urbani, Felicesimiliani, Agapiti, Januarii, Guirini SS. Tiburtii, Valeriani, et Maximi	27. Soteridiae
	2. Praetextati	S. Sebastiani S. Petronillae SS. Petronillae, Nereae, et Acutillae		38. Falbinae sive S. Marci 39. Damiani
	3. Ad Catacumbas
Ardeatina	4. Domitillae
	5. Basilide
Ostiensis	6. Commodillae
			28. Sepulcrum Pauli Apostoli in praedio Lucinae 29. Coemeterium Thimothei in horto Thronis 30. Ecclesia S. Thronae 31. Ecclesia S. Zecconi Portuensis	7. Pontiani ad Ursinum	SS. Abdoni et Seneonis S. Anastasii, pp. S. Innocentii, pp. S. Pancratii		40. Julii via Portuensis mill. III. S. Feliciae via Portuensis 41. S. Feliciae via Aureliae
Aurelia	8.
	9. Lucinae	SS. Processi et Martiani S. Agathae ad Gloriarum
	10. Calepodii	S. Callisti via Aureliae Julii via Aureliae Comella
			32. Memoria Petri Apostoli et septuaginta episcoporum in Vaticano Flaminia	11.	S. Valentini
Civus Cucumeris	12. Ad Septem Columnas	Ad caput S. Joannis S. Hermetis SS. Hermetis, Basiliae, Proti, et Hyacinthi S. Pamphili S. Felicitatis
Salaria Vetus	13. Basiliae 14.
Salaria Nova	15. Maximi
			33. Ecclesia S. Hilarii in horto ejusdem 34. Crypta SS. Chrysostomi et Darinae 35. Coemeterium Novellae
	16. Thrasone	S. Saturnini S. Alexandri
	17. Jordanorum	SS. Alexandri, Vitalis et Marcellis et VII. Virginum S. Silvestri S. Marcelli
	18. Priscillae	Coemeterium majus Ad Nymphas S. Petri Fontis S. Petri
Montana	19. Octavianum vel Ostrianum			36. Coemeterium S. Agnetis in ejusdem agello 37. Coemeterium S. Nicomedis
Tiberina	20.	S. Hippolyti S. Laurentii S. Gorgonii
Labicana	22. Ad Duas Lauros	SS. Petri et Marcellini S. Tiburtii S. Castini S. Gordiani SS. Gordiani et Epimachi SS. Simplicii et Servilliani, Quarti et Quinti, et Sophiae S. Tertulliani S. Eugeniae		42. In Comitatu sive SS. Quatuor Coronatorum 23.
Latina	24.
	25.
	26. Aproniani

the objects extracted from the jointed dolls of ivory or bone we learn from Cancelli, tom. II. pp. 995-1000, of Maria, the daughter of Honorius, belonging to very little earthenware as we know to have been for the amusement of with in heathen tombs, -cotta. Female tombs examples of toilet equipments; mirrors, combs in pins of ivory or bone, thipicks, and earpicks; wrings and necklaces; seats and seals; and similar objects, setting man Christian ladies of few instances, according to Osserv. p. 297, he was buried with the objects of interest do not mention diver, ivory lock and key, one half of a husband and wife gran engraved on the weights of stone, and with numbers, the been determined.

discovered in and about The majority are of been found of bronze, and amber. One in this l in the catacomb of Osserv. p. 298, tav. i. er part of these lumps of Christ impressed on a very large number miliar symbols, such as ve, the fish, the ship, Shepherd is of frequent found in the Jewish rarily bear the seven- ts of tortore which the us enthusiasts, resolved Christian into a martyr, l in the loculi, or ins- os, in the opinion of the calm judging writers, plements of handicraft. weapon, specimens of the Vatican and the been identified with a ment, and its presence as yet to be explained.

ROMAN CATACOMBS.

of the ancient Christian names of which stand torical documents, are e chief lines of road derived from De Rossi's luma gives the name of that which De Rossi's aim to believe to have of the larger cemeteries Church. In the third nitions by which they rth century, after the

CATACOMBS OF NAPLES, &c.

To the north of the city of Naples, four subterranean Christian cemeteries are known to exist, in a spur of Capodimonte, no great distance from one another. They have been distinguished by the names of S. Vito, S. Severo, S. Marci della Santita, and S. Gennaro (Januarius) dei parvi. There is also a fifth at some distance under the monastic Church of S. Eufremo. That of S. Gennaro is the only one now accessible. It has been fully described by Pelliccia (de Christianis Eccles. Polit. Neapol. 1781, vol. iv. Dissert. V.), and more recently in an elaborate treatise of great value, embracing the whole subject of interment in the catacombs, by Chr. Fr. Bellermann, Hamburg, 1839.

With many points of resemblance as regards the formation of the graves, and the actual mode of interment, the Neapolitan Catacombs differ very widely in their general structure from those of Rome. Instead of the low narrow galleries of the Roman Catacombs, we have at Naples wide lofty corridors, and extensive cavern-like halls, and subterranean churches. The chief cause of this diversity is the very different character of the material in which they are excavated. Instead of the friable tufa granolare of Rome, the stratum in which the Neapolitan catacombs lie is a hard building stone of great durability and strength, in which wide vaults might be constructed without any fear of instability. To quote the words of Mabillon, Her. Italicum, "altiores habent quam Romana Coemeteria fornices ob duritatem et firmitatem rupis secus quam Romae ubi arena seu topus tantum altitudinis non patitur." It is probable that these catacombs were originally stone quarries, and that the Christians availed themselves of excavations already existing for the interment of their dead. On this point Marchi speaks without the slightest hesitation (Monum. Primitivæ, p. 13).

The Catacomb of St. Januarius derives its name from having been selected as the resting-place of the body of that saint, whose death at Puteoli is placed A.D. 303, when transferred to Naples by St. John, who died A.D. 432.

Mabillon speaks of three stories: "triplez ordo criptarum alius supra illum." Two only are mentioned by Pelliccia and Bellermann as now accessible. The galleries which form the cemetery proper, are reached through a suite of wide and lofty halls, with vaulted ceilings cut out of the rock, and decorated with a succession of paintings of different dates, in some instances lying one over the other. The earliest frescoes are in a pure classical style, and evidently belong to the first century of the Christian era. There is nothing distinctly Christian about these. In many places these have been plastered over, and on the new surface portraits of bishops, and other religious paintings, in a far inferior style and of a much later date, have been executed. [Fresco.]

The interments are either in loculi, arcosolia, or cubicula. The loculi are cut without order or arrangement, the larger and smaller apertures bring all mixed together, with no attempt at economising space. The arcosolia have barrel vaults. Some of them are painted; one contains a fresco of the peacock, and on the wall above portraits of a mother and daughter whose remains are interred below, with a rudely written inscription, "Vixit Rufina annos lv. et filia ejus . . . xxxvii." Another also presents the portraits of its occupants, all in prayer; a bearded father, Michelinus; a girl, Illiaris aged 14, and a child Nonnosia aged 2 years 10 months, with spotted frock, pearl head-dress and earrings, necklace, and buckle to belt. In a third is the bust of a young man in white tunic and red pallium, with the inscription "Hic requiescit Proculus." A fourth contains full-length figures of St. Paul and St. Lawrence. The cubicula average 7 palms broad, by 10 palms in height and depth. The roof is horizontal or slightly convex. Each contains from 3 to 8 loculi. The graves were hermetically sealed with slabs of marble. But all have been opened and ransacked. The interments in the lower piano occur in two long parallel galleries, one much wider than the other, communicating with one another by 14 transverse passages. In the upper story the graves are cut in the sides of three large, broad, low vaulted halls excavated out of the rock, and certainly with no original view of sepulture.

At the entrance of the lower piano we find a so-called martyrs' church, with a slightly vaulted roof. It was divided into a nave and sanctuary by two pillars, the bases of which remain, with cancelli between. In the sanctuary stands the altar, built of rough stone, and a rude bishop's seat in an apse behind it. On the South wall are the arcosolia of John I. A.D. 432, and Paul A.D. 784, who, according to Joannes Diaconus, desired to be buried near St. Januarius. In other rooms we find a well and a cistern, recesses for lamps, and the remnants of a Christian mosaic painting. In a niche in the upper piano, which was traditionally the place of the font, is the symbol

IC | XC

Here, according to Pelliccia, iv. 162, a marble shell was discovered, since used as a holy water-basin in the church of St. Gennaro. The inscriptions in these catacombs go down to the 9th or 10th century.

Among other Christian catacombs known to exist in different parts of the shores of the Mediterranean, of which we are still in want of fuller and more scientific descriptions, we may particularize those of Syracuse known as "the grottos of St. John," and described by D'Agincourt as "of immense size," and believed by him to have passed from pagan to Christian use: the Samcean catacomb near Taormina, with ambulacra as much as 12 feet wide; the loculi at right angles to, not parallel with, the direction of the galleries; each, as in the Roman catacombs, hermetically sealed with a slab of stone: those of Malta, supposed by Denon (Voyage in Sicile, Par. 1788), to have served a double purpose, both for the burial of the dead, and as places of refuge for the living; and which, according to the same authority, "evidence a purpose, leisure, and resources far different from the Roman catacombs;" and those of Egypt. Of these last D'Agincourt gives the ground-plans of several of pagan origin. The most remarkable is one beyond the canal of Canopus, in the quarter called by Strabo, xvii. p. 793, "the Necropolis." The plan of this hypogaeum is drawn with great regularity, very unlike the intricate maze of those of Rome. The walls round length has b De Ro

is aut by a s a stou a cubic openin all set of p layers is assi this is Aut
detti, liri ed Setter estrot tionu Mabill delle c Cristi
(W. R speiler corum conces Catac
Cristo Roma
de l'art CAT given in and 50)
church.
that p names the Euc made o lastly o
church.

CAT in admit ism pres different constan plise in converts or charac picture churches reserve t identified, where de
it. It w to be said
(11.) The Place of Teaching.

I. Instra mission given fro wards be Apollon way of t had been Gospel hi (Luke I. 4 though no would nat

and daughter whose ow, with a rudely Kufina annos iv. et Another also presents ants, all in prayer;
ua; a girl, Hilaria osa aged 2 years 10 pearl head-dress and uckle to belt. In a ng man in white tunica he inscription "His fourth contains full-and St. Lawrence, as broad, by 10 palma roof is horizontal or ntains from 3 to 8 hermetically sealed all have been opened ments in the lower parallel galleries, one ther, communicating inverse passages. In is are cut in the sides v vaulted halls exanded certainly with lower plane we find a with a slightly vaulted a nave and sanctuary of which remain, with sanctuary stands the e, and a rude bishop's On the South wall are n. 432, and Paul A.D.

James Diaconus, desired arius. In other rooms n, recesses for lamps, cristian mosaic painting, ntio, which was tradifont, is the symbol ng to Fellicca, iv. 162, overed, since used as a church of St. Gennaro. catacombs go down to the catacombs known to the shores of the Mell-re still in want of fuller ptions, we may particknown as "the grottoes ed by D'Agincourt as believed by him to have ristian use: the Saracen na, with ambulatoria as he loculi at right angles the direction of the galoman catacombs, hermeof stone: those of Malta, age in Sicily, Par. 1788), e purpose, both for the as places of refuge for according to the same purpose, leisure, and rethe Roman catacombs;" of these last D'Agincourt of several of pagan origin. one beyond the canal of r called by Strabo, xvii. ia." The plan of this ch great regularity, very e of those of Rome. The walls are pierced with three ranges of loculi, running, as at Taurinian, at right angles to their length. Very recently a small Christian catacomb has been discovered at Alexandria, described by De Rossi (Bullettino, Nov. 1864, Agost. 1865). It is entered from the side of a hill, and is reached by a staircase, which conducts to a vestibule with a stone bench and an apse. This is succeeded by a cubiculum, with an arcosolium on three sides, opening into an ambulatorium containing 28 loculi, all set endways to the passage. The whole is full of paintings, of various dates, on successive layers of stucco. One, of a liturgical character, is assigned by De Rossi to the 4th century. But this is probably much too early.

Authorities.—Aringhi, Roma subterranea. Boldetti, Osservazioni sopra i cimiteri de' santi martiri ed antichi Cristiani di Roma. Bosio, Roma Sotterranea. Bottari, Sculture e pitture sagre estratte dai cimiteri di Roma. Fabretti, Inscriptionum antiquarum explicatio. Lupi, Dissertationi. Mabillon, Iter Italicum. Marchi, I monumenti delle arti cristiane primitive nella metropoli del Cristianesimo. Northcote (J. S.) and Brownlow (W. R.), Roma Sotterranea. Panvinius, De ritu sepulchri mortuorum apud veteres Christianos et eorum coemeteriis. Perret (Louis), Les catacombes de Rome. Raoul-Rochette, Tableau des Catacombes. Rossi (J. B. de'), Inscriptiones Christiane. Rossi (J. B. de' and Mici, S. de'), Roma Sotterranea. Seroux D'Agincourt, Histoire de l'art par les monuments. [E. V.]

CATALOGUS HIERATICUS, the name given in the Apostolic Canons (15 and 51, or 14 and 50) to the list of the clergy of a particular church. The term is also said to be applied to that part of the DIRECTORY which contained the names of those, still living, who were named in the Eucharistic service; viz. of those who had made offerings, emperors, patriarchs, &c., and lastly of the bishop and clergy of the particular church, as above said. [A. W. H.]

CATECHUMENS. The work of the Church in admitting converts from heathenism or Judaism presented, from the nature of the case, very different features, according to the varying circumstances with which she had to deal. Discipline might be more or less highly organised, converts of higher or lower grades of knowledge or character. If we attempt to form a complete picture from data gathered from different churches and centuries, it must be with the reserve that all such pictures are more or less idealised, and that practically there were everywhere departures more or less important from it. It will be convenient to arrange what has to be said under the heads (I.) The Catechumens. (II.) The Catechists or Teachers. (III.) The Place of Instruction. (IV.) The Substance of the Teaching.

I. Instruction of some kind, prior to the admission of converts by baptism, must have been given from the first, and the word, which afterwards became technical, meets us in the N. T. Apollus was "instructed" (κατηχημένος) in the way of the Lord (Acts xviii. 25). Theophilus had been "instructed" in the main facts of the Gospel history which St. Luke inscribes to him (Luke I. 4). The επιστολὴ of the apostolic epistles, though not confined to the stage prior to baptism, would naturally include those who were passing through it; and in the στοιχεῖα τῆς ἀρχῆς τῶν λογίων τοῦ Θεοῦ of Heb. v. 12, we have, probably, a summary of the instruction which the writer looked on as adapted for such persons. In practice, however, as in the instances of the Ethiopian eunuch (Acts viii. 36*), and the Philippian gauler (Acts xvi. 31), it must have been of the briefest and simplest kind. The traces of the process and method of instruction in the sub-apostolic age, and the two centuries that followed, are fragmentary and vague. It is not till we get to the 4th century, with its strivings after a more elaborate organisation, that we meet with the developed system which has now to be described. So far as we may think of it as having actually prevailed, it deserves attention as presenting the most complete plan of systematic mission-work that the Church has ever known.

The converts, it is obvious, might be of any age—might have been Jews, or heathens, or heretics—might be ignorant or educated, of good or bad character. They might have been led to offer themselves by the influence of personal friends, or by the sermons preached in Christian assemblies at the religious services to which even outsiders were admitted. They presented themselves to the bishop or priest, and were admitted sometimes after inquiry into character, sometimes without any delay, by the sign of the cross (August. Conf. i. 11, De peccat. merit. ii. 26) and imposition of hands, to the status of catechumens (1 Cor. Arch. c. 6, Conc. Elv. c. 3). The Councils, as might be expected, prescribe conditions and allow immediate admission only in cases of sickness and of at least decent conduct. St. Martin, however, in his mission work in Gaul, is reported to have admitted his hearers to be catechumens as they rushed to him caeteratim on the spot (Sulpicius, Vita, ii. 5, p. 294). From that moment they were recognised as Christians, though not as "fideles" (1 Conc. Constant. c. 7; Conc. Theod. xvi. tit. vii. de Apostat. leg. ii.), and began to pass under instruction. The next epoch in their progress was the time when they were sufficiently advanced to give in their names as candidates for baptism; and some writers (e. g. Suicer and Bisnaga) have accordingly recognised only two great divisions, the AUDIENTES, and the COMPLETES. Others, like Bona and Bingham, have made three or four divisions, though differing in details; and it will be well for the sake of completeness to notice these, though it is believed that the classification was never a generally received one.

(1.) Bingham's first class are the ἐκθροβόμενοι, those, i. e., who were not allowed to enter the church, and received whatever instruction was given them outside its walls. The existence of such a body is, however, very doubtful. It rests only upon an inference drawn from the fifth canon of the Council of Neo-Cæsarea, ordering that a catechumen (one of the Audientes) who had been guilty of grievous offences should be driven out (ἐκθροβισθῶ), and there is no mention of such a class either in the canon itself or elsewhere. What is described is the punishment of an individual offender; and even if the offenders were numerous enough to attract notice, there would be no ground for classing them as in a distinct stage of instruction.

* The interpolation of the question and answer of v. 37 in the MSS. of later date shows an unconsciousness of the difference between the ecclesiastical and the apostolic practice.

(2.) The next division, that of the AUDIENTES, or ἀκούοντες, rests on better evidence. The Greek term is, indeed, not found as the designation of a class till the 4th century, but the Audientes or Auditores are mentioned both by Tertullian (de Pœnitent. c. 6) and Cyriac (Epist. 13 to 34). Over and above the instruction they received from their teachers, they were allowed to attend in churches and to listen (hence their name) to the scriptures and to sermons, sharing this privilege with the unbelievers, but probably occupying a distinct place in the congregation.^b They were not allowed, however, to be present when the strictly liturgical worship of the church began, and when the sermon was over, the deacon, mounting on a rostrum of some kind, proclaimed that it was time for them to go (Const. Apost. viii. 5). As applied to these, or to the whole body of those who were under catechetical training, the missa catechumenorum became the dividing point between the more general worship of the church and the λειτουργία, properly so called.

The feeling which showed itself in this discipline arcani kept them in like manner from hearing the Creed or the Lord's Prayer till they took their place among the fidèles (Chrysost. Hom. xix. in Mt.). Sozomen (H. E. l. 20) even hesitated about inserting the Nicene Creed in his history lest it should fall into the hands of those who were still in the earlier stage of their Christian training. The practice of repeating the Lord's Prayer secreta, which still prevails in the Western Church, probably originated in a like precaution. Assuming the Audientes to represent the first class of beginners in Christian training, we may fairly identify them with the "rudes" of Augustine's treatise (De catechiz. rudibus) and the ἀτελέστεροι of the Greek Canonists (Balsamon ad Conc. Nœvocaesar. c. 5). The time of their probation probably varied according to the rapidity of their progress, and the two years specified by the Council of Elberis (c. 42), or the three fixed by the Apostolical Constitutions (viii. 32), can hardly be looked on as more than rough estimates of what was thought advisable. Any lapse into idolatrous practices or other open sins involved, in the nature of things, a corresponding prolongation of the time of trial. Where the offence was flagrant, the term, in which penance rather than instruction was now the dominant element, might be extended to the hour of death, or to some great emergency (Conc. Elib. c. 68).

(3.) Writers who maintain a threefold or fourfold division of the body of catechumens see the third class in the prostrati or genuflectentes (γυνυκλινοῦντες). These were admitted, not only to stand and listen, but to kneel and pray. As being thus more prominent, they seem to have been known as specially the catechumens, as, e.g., in the εὐχὴ καθηγουμένων of the C. of Laodicea, c. 19. The name, it will be remembered, was applied also to those who were in one of the stages of the penitential discipline of the Church, the fidèles being degraded from their rightful position and placed on a level with those who were not as yet entitled to the privileges of membership. [PENITENTS.]

^b The place assigned for the Audientes was the Narthex or portico of the church. (Zonaras, ed. Conc. Nœvocaes. c. 11.)

(4.) After these stages had been traversed, each with its appropriate instruction, the catechumens gave in their names as applicants for baptism, and were known accordingly as Competentes (συμβαπτόμενοι). This was done commonly at the beginning of the Quadragesimal fast, and the instruction, carried on through the whole of that period, was fuller and more public in its nature (Cyril Hieros. Catech. l. 5; Hieron. Ep. 61, ad Pinnach. c. 4). To catechumens in this stage the great articles of the Creed, the nature of the Sacraments, the penitential discipline of the Church, were explained, as in the Catechetical Lectures of Cyril of Jerusalem, with dogmatic precision. Special examinations and inquiries into character were made at intervals during the forty days. It was a time for fasting and watching and prayer (Const. Apost. viii. 5; 4 C. Cath. c. 85; Tertull. De Bapt. c. 20; Cyril. l. c.), and, in the case of those who were married, of the strictest continence (August. de fide et oper. v. 8). Those who passed through the ordeal were known as the perfectiores (τελειώτεροι), the electi, or in the nomenclature of the Eastern Church as Βαπτίζόμενοι or Φωτισθέντοι, the present participle being used of course with a future or gerundial sense. Their names were inscribed as such in the album or register of the church. They were taught, but not till a few days before their baptism, the Creed and the Lord's Prayer which they were to use after it. The periods for this registration varied, naturally enough, in different churches. At Jerusalem it was done on the second (Cyril. Catech. iii.), in Africa on the fourth Sunday in Lent (August. Serm. 213), and this was the time at which the candidate, if so disposed, might lay aside his old heathen or Jewish name and take one more specially Christian (Sozom. H. E. vii. 21). The ceremonies connected with their actual admission will be found under BAPTISM. It is only necessary to notice here that the Sacramentum Catechumenorum of which Augustine speaks (De Peccat. Merit. ii. 26) as given apparently at or about the time of their first admission by imposition of hands, was probably the εὐλογία or panis benedictus, and not, as Bingham and Augusti maintain, the salt which was given with milk and honey after baptism.*

* It may be well to quote the passage referred to:— "Non unius est modi sanctificatio; nam et catechumenos secundum quendam modum suum per aliquam Christi et orationem et manus impositionem puto sanctificari: et quod accipiunt, quoniam non sit corpus Christi, sanctum est tamen, et sanctios quoniam cibi quibus similar, quoniam sacramentum est." Bingham (x. 2, 16), following Bona, infers from a canon of the 3rd Conc. Carth. c. 5, forbidding any other sacramentum than the "solitum sal" to be given to catechumens during the Easter festival, that this must be that of which Augustine speaks; and it is beyond question that this was given during the period of probation, as well as immediately after baptism. It would seem, however, from the canon itself, that some other sacramentum was given at other times; and the word of Augustine, "quoniam non sit corpus Christi," imply, it is believed, something presenting a greater outward likeness to the Eucharistic bread than could be found in the salt. The proviso would hardly have been needed, on Bingham's supposition.

It is themse would might
In that through ing to months long ear
c. 14);
ever, w as indic test w sias we generat they w admitte might, without without
(1 C. Br prayers their su poor in some all beyond admitted in Philip not Ineu accepted.
The deat brose (de
What wa baptism as an ar tullian d triet of pues ab in the fo crucial i rigorous baptism v iv. 22).
(that of sudden sic had expir heists to pensed w instructio bed of dent II. It is matic disci was no o pastoral of who were well as of of priests, den found,
of a catech whom Cypri andis Rud deacon, the delivered b presbyter.
ngly, a fun took that καταλόγος work like t applied on speak to the

from their rightful level with those who have the privileges of memstruction traversed, had been, the catechumens as applicants for accordingly as Compe- was done commonly in the most public, and through the whole of more public in its h. l. 5; Hieron. Ep. catechumens in this the Creed, the nature of the discipline of in the Catechetical rule, with dogmatic questions and inquiries intervals during the or fasting and watch- ing, viii. 5; 4 C. Carth. 20; Cyril. l. c.), and were married, of the de pde et oper, v. 8), the ordal were know (epn), the electi, or in stern Church as Bar- the present participle at future or gerundial inscribed as such in church. They were days before their bap- Lord's Prayer which The periods for this ly enough, in different it was done on the a Afflic on the fourth (Serm. 213), and this candidate, if so dis- hield heathen or Jewish specifically Christian ceremonies connected will be found under sary to notice here chunenorum of which eat. Merit. ii. 26) as out the time of their on of hands, was pro- benedictus, and not, i) maintain, the salt milk and honey after the passage referred to— to; nam et catechumeno- per signum Christi et nem puto sanctificari: et corpus Christi, sanctum quitus alimur, quantum x. 2, 18), following Boni, conc. Carth. c. 4, forbidding the "solitum sal" to be e Easter festival, that this e speaks; and it is beyond na the period of probation, s. 11. It would seem, how- some other sacramentum the words of Augustine, et," imply, it is believed, outward likeness to the e found in the salt. The ce needed, on Bingham's

It is clear that many cases would present themselves in which the normal order of progress would be interrupted. (1.) The catechumen might lapse into idolatry or other grievous sin. In that case he was thrown back, and had to go through a penitential discipline, varying, according to the nature of the offence, from a few months to three or five years, or even to a life-long exclusion (C. Elib. c. 4, 10, 11, 68; C. Nicæen. c. 14; C. Neo. Caesar. c. 5). In no case, however, was the sacrament, which was thought of as indispensable to salvation, refused to the penitent when the hour of death approached. Their sins were looked on as committed in their unregenerate state, and therefore less heinous than they would have been in those who had been admitted to full Christian fellowship. (2.) They might, however, through their own neglect, die without baptism. In that case, they were buried without honour, with no psalms or oblations (1 C. Bracar. c. 35), and were not mentioned in the prayers of the Church. The one comfort left to their surviving friends was to give alms to the poor in the hope that thus they might obtain some alleviation for the souls that had passed beyond the grave without the new birth that admitted them to the Kingdom (Chrysost. Hom. 1 in Philipp.). (3.) Where the loss of baptism was not incurred by their own default, the will was accepted, at least in special cases, for the deed. The death of the younger Valentinian led Ambrose (de Obit. Valent. p. 12) to the wider hope. What was true of catechumen-martyrs and the baptism of blood, as supplying the lack of the baptism of water—and this was received almost as an axiom by all Christian writers from Tertullian downwards (see Bingham, x. 2, 20)—was true of one of whom it might be said "hunc sua pietas abiecit et voluit." Augustine, following in the footsteps of his master, appended to the crucial instruction of the penitent thief against the rigorous dogmatism of those who thought that baptism was absolutely indispensable (de Bapt. iv. 22). (4.) Another common case was naturally that of those who were stricken down by some sudden sickness before the term of their probation had expired. In this case the Church did not hesitate to anticipate the washed-for goal, dispensed with all but the simplest elements of instruction, and administered baptism on the bed of death. [BAPTISM, p. 169.]

II. It is noticeable that, with all this systematic discipline as to the persons taught, there was no order of teachers. It was part of the pastoral office to watch over the souls of those who were seeking admission to the Church, as well as of those who were in it, and thus bishops, priests, deacons, or readers might all of them be found, when occasion required, doing the work of a catechist. The DOCTOR AUDIENTIUM, of whom Cyrillus speaks, was a lector in the church of Carthage. Augustine's treatise, de Catechizandis Rudibus, was addressed to Deogratias as a deacon, the Catechases of Cyril of Jerusalem were delivered by him partly as a deacon, partly as a presbyter. The word Catechist implied, accordingly, a function, not a class. Those who undertook that function were known sometimes as παιδαγωγοι (Const. Apost. ii. 37), as having a work like that of those to whom that title was applied on board ship. It was their part to speak to those who were entering the ark or ship of Christ's Church, to tell them of the perils of the voyage which they were about to undertake, and take their pledge for payment of the fare. The word was part of the metaphor which saw in the bishop the steersman, and in the presbyters the sailors, in the Church itself the navis or ship.

III. The places in which catechetical instruction was thus carried on must have varied widely at different times and in different places: sometimes the room or building in which the fideles met to worship, before or after service; sometimes a room in the presbyter's or deacon's house, probably at Alexandria, from the special nature of the case, a lecture-room, like the "school" of Tyrannus in Acts xix. 9. It is not till we come to the fully-developed organisation of the Church that we read of special buildings for the purpose, under the name of κατηχηματα. They are mentioned as such in the 97th canon of the Trullan Council, and appear, from a Novella of the Emperor Leo's, to have been in the δωρίπιον, or upper chamber of the church; probably, i. e. in a room over the portico. In some instances the baptistery seems to have been used for this purpose (Ambros. Ep. 33), while in others, again, perhaps with a view to guarding against premature presence at the rite of baptism, they were not allowed to enter the building in which it was administered (Conc. Arusiæ, c. 19).

IV. The ideal scheme of preparation involved obviously a progress from lower to higher truths. The details varied probably according to the discretion of the teacher and the necessities of the taught, but two great representative examples are found of the earlier stage in Augustine's Enchiridion de Catechizandis rudibus, and in the Catecheses of Cyril of Jerusalem. The range of subjects in the former includes the sacred history of the world from the Creation downwards, and then proceeds to the truths of the resurrection and judgment according to works. The better educated may be led to the allegorical meaning of Scripture, and the types of the law. Then came the Gospel narratives, and the Law of Christ. The teaching of Cyril, as intended for the competentes, took a wider and higher cycle of subjects, and are based (Catech. iv.) upon a regula fidei, including the dogmas (1) of God, (2) of Christ, (3) of the birth from the Virgin's womb, (4) of the cross, (5) of the burial, (6) of the resurrection of Christ, (7) of the ascension, (8) of judgment to come, (9) of the Holy Spirit, (10) of the soul, (11) of the body, (12) of meats, (13) of the general resurrection, (14) of the Holy Scriptures.

[E. H. P.]

CATHEDRA (Καθδρα).—(1) First and properly, in ecclesiastical usage, the actual throne or seat of the bishop in his episcopal church; or βθουα και θρόνος ἐπίσκοπος of Eusebius (H. E. vii. 30), to which Paul of Samosata arrogantly added a σκήπτρον,—distinguished by the same Eusebius from the δευτέρου θρόνου of the presbyters (ib. x. 5, 23);—who also speaks of the ἀνορθωτικός θρόνος of St. James at Jerusalem, meaning the actual seat itself still preserved there (ib. viii. 19, 32);—called cathedra veletta by St. Augustine (Epist. ad Maxim. civi.), and littorata by Pacian; and inveighed against by St. Greg. Naz. (Orat. xi.) as βήλαι θρόνοι; and so Prudentius speaks of the bishop's seat, "Fronte sua adversa [i. e. as the upper end of the apse] gradibus sublimè tribunal Tollitur" (Peristeph. II. iv. 225). St. Mark's chair is said to have existed for a long time at Alexandria (Vales. ad Euseb. H. E. vii. 9). And one assigned to Pope Stephen is said to have been found in the catacombs by Pope Innocent XII. The wooden chair, with its heathen ivories, representing the labours of Hercules, which is so carefully honoured in St. Peter's at Rome as St. Peter's, is at once the most celebrated, and the most unfortunately chosen, specimen of the class. Episcopal chairs are frequently represented in ancient Christian mosaics or marbles, sometimes adorned with two lions' heads, sometimes with two dogs' heads, sometimes with our Lord Himself represented as sitting in them, sometimes with the B. Virgin, sometimes with the open Gospels laid upon them, sometimes with the bishop himself (Ciampini, Vol. M. n. 1. tab. 2, 37, 47, 11. tab. 41; and cf. St. Aug. Epist. ad Divo. lvi.); sometimes raised upon steps (gradatas, St. Aug. Epist. ad Maxim. cccii., and see Aringhi, ii. 325); sometimes "veiled" (velatae, St. Aug. as above, see Bosio, Rom. Sotter. p. 327). And certain chairs or seats, cut in the tufa stone in the catacombs, are conjectured to have been intended for the bishop at the time when persecution compelled the Christians to hold service there. A Council of Carthage, A. D. 535, forbids a bishop "cathedram collocare in monasterio," i. e. to ordain there.

But hence (2) the word was transferred to the see itself of the bishop, as in Victor Vitens. De Persec. Vandal. iv. So Conc. Milevit. ii. cans. 21, 24; and "Cathedrae viduatae" in Cult. Carthage. i. c. 185, 217; "Cathedrae matricae," in Conc. Milev. ii. c. 25; and Cod. Can. Afric. 123; and "Cathedrae principales," in Cod. Civ. Afric. 38. So also Greg. Tur. H. F. iii. 1, and Sidon. Apollin. repeatedly. And earlier than all these, Tertullian (De Praescript. xxxvi.) speaks of "Cathedrae Apostolorum," as still existing in the "Ecclesiae Apostolicae;" meaning, not the literal chairs, but the specially Apostolic succession of the bishops of those sees.

(3) The word became used for the Episcopal Church itself, "principalis cathedra," in Conc. Aquisgr. A. D. 789, can. 40, meaning the cathedral as opposed to the other churches in the diocese: "Ecclesia Cathedralis," Conc. Tarracon. A. D. 516, c. ult.: called also "Ecclesia mater," in the Conc. Rom. sub Sylvestro, c. 17; and "Ecclesia matrix," in Conc. Mogunt. i. c. 8; and "matrix," simply, by Ferrand. Breviar. cc. 11, 17, 38. But "cathedral," used absolutely for the "ecclesia cathedralis," dates from the 10th century, and belongs to the Western Church only. [CATHEDRAL.] [Du Cange; Bingham; Martigny; Walcott, Sacr. Arch.] [A. W. H.]

CATHEDRA PETRI. [PETER, FESTIVALS OF.]

CATHEDRAL, also in later times DOM-KIRCHE, DUOMO: the chief and episcopal church of a diocese; not so called however until the 10th century, when the epithet, derived from the bishop's cathedra or chair, became a substantive name; and called previously the mother church, or the ecclesia matricae, in distinction from the parish churches, which were called tituli or ecclesiae dioecesanae. [CATHEDRA.] It was also sometimes called the "Catholic" church. [CATHOLIC.] The architectural features of a cathedral are treated in the article CHURCH. The gradual formation and character of the cathedral chapter will be found under CHAPTER. And for the immunities belonging to it simply as a church, see CHURCH, SANCTUARY. As a cathedral church, it was held to be—what at first and in the earliest times it literally was—the parish church of the diocese, to which the others stood as it were in the relation of chapels. In it the bishop was formally enthroned: so cathedra e and incathedravit, to enthrone. And in it he was to be consecrated, according to ordinary rule. [BISHOP.] Ordinations also, and diocesan synods, were commonly held there. And manumissions of serfs, in Celtic and Saxon England, took place at the altar of the cathedral in the presence of the bishop. Schools and libraries were attached in course of time to cathedrals. And Charlemagne, who ordered monastic schools, and founded palatine schools, found episcopal schools ready to his hand. [SCHOOLS; CANONIC, p. 281.] [A. W. H.]

CATHEDRATICUM.—(1) A pension paid annually to the bishop by the churches of his diocese, "in signum subjectionis;" acc. to Conc. Bracar. ii. c. 2, "pro honore cathedrae;" and to Conc. Ravenn. A. D. 997, c. 2, "pro respectu Sedis;" both councils limiting the payments in each case to two shillings severally. So also Conc. Bracar. iii. A. D. 572, and Tolet. vii. c. 4.—(2) Το εὐθροιστικόν, a fee paid by the bishop to the bishops who had consecrated him, and to the clerks and notaries who assisted (Julian. Antecessor, Const. i. 115, 431; Justinian Novell. cxxiii. c. 3; quoted by Du Cange). [A. W. H.]

CATHISMA (Κάθισμα). A section of the psalter.

(1) The psalter in the Greek Office is divided into twenty sections, called Cathisina. Each Cathisma is sub-divided into three Staseis, and "Gloria" is said at the end of each stasis only. These divisions and the order of reciting the psalter will be explained in a later article. The reason for the name assigned is that, while the choir stand two and two by turns to recite the psalms, the rest sit down.

(2) A short hymn which occurs at intervals in the offices of the Greek Church. It consists of one stanza, or troponion (τροπώνιον), and is followed by "Gloria." The name is said to indicate that while it is sung the choir sit down for rest. [H. J. H.]

CATHOLIC, καθολικός, Catholicus, used in its ordinary sense of "universal," not only by heathen writers (as, e. g. Pliny), but also not uncommonly by ecclesiastical writers also (as, e. g. Justin Martyr, Diad. cum Tryph. 81, Καθολική ἀπόστασις, and Tertullian, Adv. Marcion. ii. 17, "Catholica . . . homitas Dei," &c. &c.); but commonly employed by the latter as an epithet of the Christian Church, Faith, Tradition, People; first in St. Ignatius (Ad Smyrn. viii.), in the Martyrdom of St. Polycarp (in Euseb. H. E. iv. 14, &c.), in the Passio S. Pionii under Decius (ap. Baron. in an. 254, n. lx.), in St. Clem. Alex. (Strom. vii. p. 899, Oxf. 1715), and thenceforward commonly, being embodied in the Eastern (although not at first in the Western) creed;—indicating (1) the Church as a whole, as in St. Ignatius above quoted; and so in Arius' creed (Socrat. i. 20), $\eta\eta\ \alpha\pi\theta\ \nu\epsilon\pi\alpha\tau\omega\ \zeta\omega\ \nu\epsilon\pi\alpha\tau\omega$;

(2) the
is in λῆρ (when attach to Chr steph.
to "of Pacian nomen Antioch posed t
A. D. 35 to here xviii. a to enq ἀλλὰ.
So also religion men be epithet, nolist argum by expl nion, s dicator
Aug. *Ep resaltit 52, § 1, totum r larly list Hieroa.
the wor that the truth, b the Cath as early vi. 25);
καθόλου
And not those of γὰρ ἐκεί
So Tertu tradition nition of Lerins, a ubique, e ii.), in e ubique d of his de who was general r the Rom confound a suppos also som ing; vice or cathed churches;
καθολική to the sma rr. 22).
vi. 170),
posed to (and by i brated in the orator epithet of ail, in dis (Codinus, Patriarch
nians, of CHRIST.*

(2) that portion of the universal Church which is in any particular place, as ἡ ἐν Χαλκιδῶν καθολικὴ ἐκκλησία, as in the Mart. S. Polywip.; (3) (when it had grown into an epithet ordinarily attached to the word church), used as equivalent to Christian, "Catholic files" in Prudent. Peristeph. iv. 24, "Catholici populi," id. ib. 30: or to "orthodox," as opposed to "heretical," as in Pacian. Epist. i. ad Semprom. "Christianus mihi nomen est, Catholicus cognomen;" and in Conc. Antioch. A.D. 341, αἱ καθολικαὶ ἐκκλησίαι, as opposed to the Samosatenians; and in Conc. Arimin. A.D. 359, ἡ καθολικὴ ἐκκλησία in like opposition to heretics; and in St. Cyril. Hieros. Lect. Catech. xviii. advising, in a town where there are heretics, to enquire, ποῦ ἐστὶν ἀπλῶς ἡ ἐκκλησία, ἀλλὰ, ποῦ ἐστὶν ἡ καθολικὴ ἐκκλησία, &c. &c. So also in the Athanasian Creed, "the Catholic religion," and "the Catholic faith." When men began to look about for a rationale of the epithet, or when driven to do so as in the Donatist controversy (the Donatists meeting the argument against them, drawn from the word, by explaining it, "non ex totius orbis communione, sed ex observatione omnium praeceptorum divinarum atque omnium sacramentorum," St. Aug. Epist. 94, § 23), taken to indicate the universality of the Church; so in St. Aug. Epist. 52, § 1, "Καθολικὴ Græce appellatur, quod per totum orbem terrarum diffunditur;" and similarly Isidor. Scriptent. i. 16, &c. &c. And St. Cyril. Hieros. (Lect. Catech. xviii. § 23) dilates upon the word rhetorically in this sense, as intimating that the Church subjugates all men, teaches all truth, heals all sin, &c. In somewhat like way, the Catholic Epistles are so called (= Ἐγκύκλιαι) as early as the 3rd century (Euseb. H. E. vi. 25, vii. 25); because written, οὐ πρὸς ἐν ἕθνος ἀλλὰ καθόλου πρὸς πάντα (Leont. De Sect. Act. 2). And not only these, but such epistles also as those of Dionysius of Corinth (Καθολικαῖς πρὸς τὰς ἐκκλησίας ἐπιστολαῖς, Euseb. H. E. iv. 23); St. Tertullian, again (De Monog.), of Catholic tradition. And similarly the well-known definition of "vere Catholicum," in St. Vincent of Lerins, as that which had been held "semper, ubique, et ab omnibus." Optatus (Cont. Donat. ii.), in explaining the term by "rationalis et ubique diffusa," was possibly in the first half of his definition thinking of the "Rationalis," who was also called καθολικός, being the general receiver of the imperial revenue under the Roman empire; but more probably was confounding the real derivation καθ' ὅλον, with a supposed one from κατὰ λόγον. (5) Used also somewhat later of the Church as a building; viz. as the distinctive epithet of the bishop's or cathedral church, as against the parish churches; e.g. in Epiphanius, Haer. lix. § 1 (ἡ καθολικὴ ἐκκλησία ἐν Ἀλεξανδρείᾳ, in opposition to the smaller churches there, and so also Niceph. iv. 22). (6) In Conc. Trull. can. lix. (Labbe. vi. 1170), as the name of the church, as opposed to an oratory (ἐκκλησιῶν ὀκω), baptisms (and by inference the eucharist) being celebrated in the καθολικὴ ἐκκλησία, but not in the oratory. (7) In Byzantine Greek times, an epithet of the parish church, which was open to all, in distinction from the monastic churches (Cobinius, Balsamon, &c.). (8) Still later, the Patriarchs or Primates of Seleucia, of the Armenians, of the Ethiopians, were styled Catholici

CHRIST. ANT.

(Du Cange). See also Thomassin, I. l. 24. The Catholicus of the Persian Church was so called as early as Procopius (De Bell. Persico, ii.); and the Catholicus of Seleucia was made so independently of the Patriarch of Antioch (Arabic Vers. of Nicæna Canons). The term means, more exactly, a primate, having under him metropolitans, but himself immediately subject to a patriarch. [CATHOLICUS.] Καθολικὸν ὄνομα, in Theophan. (in V. Constant. Copronymi), were the sees of Rome, Alexandria, Antioch, and Jerusalem. (9) The term became a title of the King of France, Pipin being so called A.D. 767; and very much later, of the King of Spain also. (Pearson, On the Creed, art. 'Holy Catholic Church,' Du Cange; Suicer.) [A. W. H.]

CATHOLICUS. "I have ordered the catholicus of Africa to count out 3000 pures to your holiness," said the Emperor Constantine to Caecilian, bishop of Carthage (Euseb. H. E. x. 6). A similar order to indemnify Eusebius the historian for the costs of getting 50 copies of the Bible transcribed for general use was issued by him to the catholicus of the diocese; that is, of the civil diocese called the East (ib. Vit. Const. iv. 36). A former holder of this office, Eusebius elsewhere tells us, named Adanctus, had been martyred under Diocletian (H. E. viii. 11). Apparently there was one such for each of the 13 civil dioceses, and a 14th attached to the imperial household—ἐπὶ τῶν καθόλου λόγων λεγόμενος εἰς βασιλεως (ib. vii. 10)—who was in later times, according to the Basiliens, or co-le of the Emperor Basil I., called the λοιοτοητὴ (ib. vi. tit. 23). Various ordinances relating to this office are to be seen there. The two prominent ideas attaching to it were that of a receiver-general, and of a deputy-receiver. It was formerly discharged in England by the sheriff or viccomes of each county, who forwarded his annual account of receipts and disbursements to the king's exchequer. The ecclesiastical officer called "catholicus" was of a piece with the civil. Procopius, in his history of the Persian war (ii. 25) under Justinian, says that the chief dignitary among the Christians of Dnhis was called "catholicus," as presiding over the whole country, namely, Persia. But according to Dr. Neale (Eastern Ch. i. 141), this title had been assumed at a much earlier date by the bishops of Seleucia, meaning by it that they were "procurators-general," in the regions of Parthia, for the Patriarch of Antioch, to whose jurisdiction they were subject, till for political reasons their independence was allowed. The "catholicus" mentioned by Procopius was doubtless head of the Nestorians in Persia, whose teaching was speedily carried thither from Edessa, as the well-known letter of Ibas, bishop of the latter place, to the Persian Maris, alone would shew. Having on the death of Acacius, twenty-second catholicus of Seleucia, A.D. 496, obtained possession of that see, they established their head-quarters there, constituting its archbishop patriarch, and styling him "catholic patriarch." By this phrase they must have meant however not deputy-patriarch, which he was no longer, but occumental patriarch, like to them he was in fact. So that when the title got into sectarian hands, it seems to have shifted its meaning to some extent, and implied universal rather than vicarious powers. But as it the article CHURCH, and character of the word under CHAPTER, belonging to it simply SANCTUARY. As a held to be what at times it literally was—diocese, to which the relation of chapels, really enthroned: so to, to enthroned. And created, according to Ordinations also, and only held there. And tie and Saxon England, the cathedral in the Schools and libraries of time to cathedrals, eral monastic schools, oods, found episcopal [SCHOOLS]; CANONICI, [A. W. H.]

(1) A pension paid to the churches of his "otions," acc. to Conc. onore cathedrae; and c. 2, "pro respectu liting the payments in everally. So also Conc. Tolet. vii. c. 4.—(2) To by the bishop to the ated him, and to the assisted (Julian. Ante- r; Justinian. Novell. Cange). [A. W. H.]

ca). A section of the Greek Office is divided led Cathisnata. Each into three St. ues, and end of each stasis only. order of reciting the in a later article. The signed is that, while two by turns to recite own. ich occurs at intervals ch Church. It consists νίου (τροπάρμιον), and is The name is said to sung the choir sit down [H. J. H.] eds, Catholicus, used in universal," not only by y. Pliny), but also not istical writers also (as, l. cum Tryph. 81. Καθολικὸν, Adv. Marcion. Antis Dei, &c. &c.); but the latter as an epithet Faith, Tradition, People; d Smyrn. viii.), in the arp (in Euseb. H. E. iv. S. Pionis under Decius . ix.), in St. Clem. Alex. f. 1715), and thencefor- embedded in the Eastern (the Western) creed— ch as a whole, as in St. and so in Arius' creed περὰ τῶν ἑως περὰ τῶν; was a dignity confined at first to the eastern portions of the single patriarchate of Antioch, and there common to the orthodox and heterodox alike, we must not expect to find the accounts given of it clear or always consistent. As a general rule the "catholicus" was subordinate to the patriarch, as I had metropolitans under him; but the officer answering to this description among the Jacobites was more commonly called "naphrian," or "fruit-bearer;" the Nestorians on all occasions doing their best to monopolize the other title. Still we read of a "catholicus" for Armenia and for Georgia among the former, as well as for Chaldaea and Persia among the latter; and Jacobite patriarchs also called themselves "catholic," in imitation, and to the annoyance, of the Nestorian. (Aseman. De Monoph. § 8, and De Syris Nestor. c. xi.; Du Cange, Gloss. Graec. s. v.) Later writers, again, speak of a "catholicus" of Ethiopia, of Nubia, of the Isles and elsewhere: that is to say, this title came to be applied in time to any grade between metropolitans and patriarchs (Bever. Synod. i. 709), and to be no longer peculiar to a single patriarchate. [E. S. F.]

CATULINUS, deacon, martyr at Carthage, is commemorated July 15 (Mart. Carthag., Usuard). [C.]

CAUPONA, CAUPONES, tavern, tavern-keepers. The Apostolical Constitutions enumerate the caupo amongst the persons whose oblations are not to be accepted (bk. iv. c. 9). If such oblations were forced on the priest, they were to be spent on wood and charcoal, as being only fit for the fire (ib. c. 10). A later constitution still numbers the caupo amongst those who could not be admitted to the church unless they gave up their mode of life (bk. viii. c. 32). Bingham, indeed, holds the caupo of the Apostolical Constitutions not to have been strictly a tavern-keeper, but a fraudulent huckster, and there is no doubt that the word is to be found used in a more extended sense in many instances. But there is in the present one no reason for diverting it from its ordinary use. It is clear from too many evidences that the ancient tavern—the caupona of the Romans—differed little from a brothel; see for instance Dig. bk. xxiii. t. ii. l. 43; Code, bk. iv. t. l. vi. l. 3. A Constitution of Constantine (A.D. 326), whilst declaring that the mistress of a tavern (the words caupona and taberna are here used indifferently) was within the laws as to adultery, yet if she herself had served out drink, assimilated her to a tavern-servant, classing such persons among those whom "the wileness of their life has not deemed worthy to observe the laws" (Code, bk. ix. t. ix. l. 29). In the work called the "Lex Romana," which is considered to represent the law of the Roman population in Italy during Lombard times, and which is mainly founded on the Theodosian Code, a similar provision is contained, but with the use of the word taberna alone (bk. ix.). This evidently implies that the caupo himself, or the caupona or taberna dominæ, was undistinguishable from the brothel-keeper, and the forbiddance to receive the caupo's offering resolves itself into that contained in Deut. xxiii. 18.

This view is confirmed by almost all later church authorities. Thus a cleric found eating in a caupona, unless through the necessities of travel, was by the 46th (otherwise 53rd) of the Apostolical Canons—supposed to be of the 4th century—sentenced to excommunication, the Canon evidently intending a tavern and not a more huckster's shop. The 24th Canon of the Council of Laodicea (latter half of the 4th century, but the alleged dates varying from 357 to 367), enacts that none of the priestly order (λεπτικαὶ), from the presbyter to the deacon, nor outside of the ecclesiastical order to the servants and readers, nor any of the ascetic class shall enter a tavern (καπηλείον; see also the 7th Canon of the so-called African Council, which however itself only designates a general collection of African Canons). The book of Canons of the African church, ending with the Council of Carthage of 419, c. 40, repeats substantially the above-quoted article of the Apostolical Canons.

In spite of these enactments, we find by later ones that clerics, who were forbidden to enter taverns, actually kept them. Thus certain "Sanctions and Decrees" printed by Labbé and Mansi, after the various versions of the Nicene Canons, from a codex at the Vatican, but evidently from a Greek source, require (c. 14) that the priest be neither a caupo nor a tabernarius, making thus a distinction between the two terms, which often appear in later days to be synonymous. A canon ascribed by Ivo to the Synod of Tours, A.D. 481, states that "it hath been related to the holy synod that certain priests in the churches committed to them (an abuse not to be told) establish taverns and there through caupones sell wine or allow it to be sold;" so that where services and the word of God and His praise should alone be heard, there feasting and drunkenness are found. Such practices are strictly forbidden, the offending priest is to be deposed, the laymen, his accomplices, to be excommunicated and expelled (cc. 2, 3). In the East, indeed, it appears certain from the 43rd Novel, that in the first half of the 6th century, and presumably since the days of Constantine, taverns were held on behalf of the church, and must have been included among the 1100 separate trading establishments which were the property of the cathedral church of Constantinople. But apparently this tavern-keeping for the church was not held equivalent to tavern-keeping by clerics, since about sixty years later, the 9th Canon of the Council of Constantinople in Trullo, A.D. 691, bears "that it shall not be lawful for any cleric to have a tavern. For if it be not permitted to him to enter one, how much less can he serve in it, and do there that which is not lawful?" He must therefore either give it up or be deposed. And although the 68th Canon of the same Council uses a compound of the Greek synonym for caupo, in a more general sense (τοῖς βιβλιοκαπηλοῖς, translated librorum cauponatoribus, i.e. book-sellers), yet in the 76th the strict idea of the tavern seems to recur, where it is enacted that no καπηλείον is to be set up within the holy precincts, nor food or other things to be exhibited for sale. And by the 8th century the original sense of caupo, caupona is palpable through the more modern word (in this application) taberna, which occurs in numerous repetitions more or less literal of the above-quoted Apostolical Canon; as in a Capitulary of Theodulf, Bishop of Orleans, to his clergy, A.D. 797, forbidding them to go from tavern one of a MS. priests Canon peror's effect, of 801 Council

chapter Council
to men
A.D. 8

It wi the Ap ficial imes, 5 furing pied, pe by cleric still mo incompa witness effect, b including at least stantia
vidual foundati

CAVE
CONCILI

CEAL

CUTHREN

cially in called Ch or possib of Octav

the legate renew the

and Engla

and the s appears to bring the to archb

which actu council w

Stubbs, Co

"Poultice

now extant

iii. 465).

mde to S

Stubbs, iii

cause was the Bishop and Stubbs

at the same

CELED

CELED

is commemo

Usuard).

CELEN

held in a s against the 1st Council

CELERI

is commemo

Theron, Rom

otherwise 53rd) of the posed to be of the 4th excommunication, the g a tavern and not a the 24th Canon of the r half of the 4th censes varying from 357 to of the priestly order eshyter to the deacon, istic order to the ser-ny of the ascetic class αλετών; see also the 7th African Council, which quates a general collec-The book of Canons of ng with the Council of eports substantially the e Apostolical Canons, nents, we find by later vere forbidden to enter them. Thus certain ' printed by Labbé and versions of the Nicene e the Vatican, but evi-cence, require (c. 14) that any, o nor a tabernarius, tion between the two ar in later days to be scribed by Ivo to the , states that "it hath ly synnod that certain mitted to them (can-ublish taverns and there wine or allow it to be vices and the word of ld alone be heard, there s are found. Such rbidden, the offending laymen, his accommated and expelled (c. 2, it appears certain from the first half of the 6th y since the days of Con-held on behalf of the een included among the ublishments which were theolical church of Constantly this tavern-keep-eld equivalent to tavern-about sixty years later, ouncil of Constantinople s "that it shall not be ve have a tavern. For if to enter one, how much and do there that which st therefore either give it although the 68th Canon ases a compound of the upo, in a more general Aois, translated librorum (s-sellers), yet in the 76th tavern seems to recur, at no καθηλειών is to be y precincts, nor food or ilitated for sale. And by ginal sense of caupo, augh the more modern word taberna, which occurs in more or less literal of the al Canon; as in a Capitial of Orleans, to his dding them to go from

CAVERNENSE CONCILIIUM

tavern to tavern, drinking or eating (c. 13); one of the injunctions of Charlemagne, from a MS. of the Monastery of Angers, forbidding priests to enter a tavern to drink; the 19th Canon of the Council of Frankfurt, and the emperor's Frankfort Capitulary (794) to the same effect, but extending also to monks; a capitulary of 801 (general coll., bk. i. c. 14), quoting the Council of Laodicea and the African; and the 325th chapter of the 5th book; the Canons of the Councils or Synods of Rheims (c. xxvi.), applying to monks and canons, and of Tours (c. xxi), both n. A. D. 813; the Edict of Charlemagne in 814, c. 18.
 It will thus appear that whilst the severity of the Apostolical Constitutions against the individual tavern-keeper is not followed in later times, yet that the Western Church, at least during the period with which this work is occupied, persistently treated the use of the tavern by clerics, otherwise than in cases of necessity, still more their personal connexion with it, as incompatible with the clerical character. The witness of the Eastern Church is also to the same effect, but its weight is marred by the trade, including that in liquors, which for two centuries at least seems to have been carried on at Constantinople for the benefit, not indeed of individual devices, but of churches and charitable foundations. [See also Diction. Eccl.]

[J. M. L.]

CAVERNENSE CONCILIIUM. [AFRICAN COUNCILS.]

CEALCHYTHE, COUNCILS OF. [CALCUTHENSES.] Exact locality unknown, but certainly in Mercia, and probably Chelsea, originally called Chelcheth, Chelchyth, &c. (1) A. D. 787, or possibly 788, a legate council, George, bishop of Ostia, and Theophylact, bishop of Toli, being the legates for Pope Adrian I. Its object was to renew the "antiquum amicitiam" between Rome and England, and to affirm "the Catholic faith" and the six Oecumenical Councils. But it also appears to have been made the occasion of preparing the way for the erecting of Lichfield into an archbishopric independent of Canterbury, which actually took place in 788. A companion council was held in Northumbria (Haddan and Stubbs, Conc. iii. 444, sq.). (2) A. D. 789, called "Pastificale Concilium;" grants made there now extant (K. C. D. 155; Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 465). (3) A. D. 793, at which a grant was made to St. Alban's (K. C. D. 152; Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 478). (4) A. D. 799, at which a cause was adjudicated between King Coenulf and the Bishop of Selsey (K. C. D. 116, 1034; Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 528). There were several councils at the same place after A. D. 800. [A. W. H.]

CELEDEL. [COLIDEL.]

CELEDONIUS, martyr at Leon in Spain, is commemorated March 3 (Mart. Rom. Vet., Usuardi). [C.]

CELENENSE CONCILIIUM, A. D. 447, held in a small place close to Lugo in Galicia, against the Priscillianists; an appendage to the 1st Council of Toledo (Lab. Conc. iii. 1466). [A. W. H.]

CELERINA, martyr in Africa under Decius, is commemorated with CELERINUS, Feb. 3 (Mart. Baron., Rom. Vet., Usuardi). [C.]

CELIBACY

CELIBACY. The history of Christian thought and legislation in reference to this subject is essentially one of development. From the first there were the germs of two different systems, at first in due proportion, each the complement of the other. Then, under influences which it will be our work to trace, one passes through rapid stages of growth till it threatens to overpower or crush the other. Protests are uttered from time to time, with more or less clearness. The idea which seemed threatened with extinction finally revives and in its turn dominates unduly. It remains for the future to restore the balance which we recognise in the primitive records of the faith.

1. Any preference of celibacy over marriage was, it need hardly be said, foreign to the ethics of the Old Testament. Wedlock and the fruits of wedlock were God's best gifts. To be unmarried or childless was to be under a "reproach," which it was difficult to bear. The asceticism of the later sects of Jews made in this respect no difference. Even the Essenes lived the life of a communist rather than a monastic society and had wives and children with them. No book of the Canonical Scriptures is stronger in its praises of marriage, or its condemnation of the sins that mar its perfection than that which represents the ethical teaching of the Judaism of Alexandria (Eclus. xxv. xxvi.). Preference for the celibate life had, it must be confessed, so far as the Christian Church was concerned, its origin in the New Testament. The birth from the Virgin's womb, the virgin-life of the Baptist and of the Son of Man, the strange words of implied blessing on those who "made themselves eunuchs for the kingdom of heaven's sake" (Matt. xix. 12) could not fail to make an impression on the minds of many disciples. The work of the great Apostle, whose activity threw that of all others into the shade, tended in the same direction. He declared without reserve that it was a good and noble thing for a man not to "touch a woman" with the touch even of wedded love (1 Cor. vii. 1). Himself leading a celibate life, he wished that all men could follow his example (1 Cor. vii. 7), and laid down principles which, though limited by his reference to a "present necessity" (1 Cor. vii. 26), led on almost inevitably to a wider generalisation. If the man or woman unmarried was more free from "care," more able to render an undivided service to their Lord, it would be a legitimate inference to think of that life as the more excellent of the two. The degree of its superiority might be exaggerated at a later period, but a higher excellence of some kind was certainly implied in the language of St. Paul. The vision of the 144,000 in the Apocalypse as of those who were "virgins, who were not defiled with women" (Rev. xiv. 4) seemed to carry the recognition of that higher excellence into the glorified life of the heavenly Jerusalem.

2. All this was, however, balanced by the fullest recognition of the sacredness of marriage, and was as far as possible removed from the Manichaean tendencies which afterwards corrupted it. The presence of Christ at the marriage-feast of Cana (John ii. 1), his vindication of the sacredness of marriage against the casuistry of the scribes as resting on God's primeval ordinance and the laws of human life (Matt. xix. 4), his choice of Apostles who had wives (Matt. viii. 14), and probably children (Matt. xix. 27, 29), guarded against any tendency to treat marriage as among the things common and unclean. Nor was the teaching of St. Paul less clear. The great casuistic Epistle recognises it as a divine institution, makes all limitation on the ius conjugii but a temporary means to an end beyond itself (1 Cor. vii. 3-5); allows even, though not approving, the marriage of widowers and widows (1 Cor. vii. 39). The duties of husbands and wives are enforced on new and more mystic grounds than in the ethics of Judaism or Heathenism (Eph. v. 22-33). Their life, in all its manifold relations, was recognised as giving scope for the development of a high and noble form of Christian holiness (1 Pet. v. 1-7). With what might seem an almost startling contrast to his own example St. Paul required the bishop-presbyter to have had the experience of marriage and with at least a preference for those who had brought up children (1 Tim. iii. 2, 4), and extended the requirement even to the deacons of the Church (1 Tim. iii. 11, 12). The writer of the Epistle to the Hebrews at least implied, perhaps asserted, that marriage was, or might be, "honourable in all things and the bed undefiled" (Heb. xiii. 4). "Forbidding to marry" is classed by St. Paul as one of the "doctrines of devils" which were to be the signs of the apostasy of the latter days (1 Tim. iv. 1).

* This is not the place to discuss the question. It may be enough to say that it is a rash exegesis which sees a reference to a wife in the "true yoke-fellow" of Phil. iv. 3 or finds, not celibacy, but married continence, in 1 Cor. vii. 7, 8.

3. The two lines of thought thus traced, ran on through the Church's history, but in unequal measure. Gradually the teaching which St. Paul condemned mingled itself with his, and the celibate life was exalted above that of marriage, not only because it brought with it a scope of more uninterrupted labour and more entire consecration, but on the ground that there was in marriage and its relations something impure and defiling. In the language of some Gnostic sects, it belonged to the kingdom of the Demiurgus, of the creator of the material universe and of the human body as a part of it, not to that of the higher Christ-Aeon, who was Lord of the kingdom (Tertull. de Praescript. c. 33; Irenaeus, i. 28; Hippolytus, Refut. Omn. Haer. i. 16). First, women (VIRGENS), and then men, devoted themselves to unwedded life, as offering a higher spirituality. At first, indeed, the more prominent teachers kept within the limits of Apotolitic thought. Hermas (ii. 4, 4) almost reproduced the language of St. Paul. Ignatius (Ep. ad Polyc. c. 5) while introducing another thought, that the life of celibacy is "in honour of Our Lord's flesh," warns men against boasting of this, and exalting themselves above others. Even Tertullian, reproducing his own experience, while declaiming vehemently against second, or against mixed marriages, draws, with great power, a picture of the beauty and blessedness of a marriage in which husband and wife are both true worshippers of Christ (Ad Uxor. ii. 8). Clement of Alexandria even ventures to depict the true ideal Gnostic as one who marries and has children and so attains to a higher excellence, because he conquers more temptations than that of the

celibate life (Strom. vii. 12 p. 741). There were not wanting, however, signs of a tendency to a more one-sided development. Putting aside the treatise de Virginitate ascribed to Clement of Rome,^b as probably one of the many spurious writings for which the authority of his name was claimed, and belonging to the 3rd century rather than the 1st, there remain the facts (1) that, outside the Church, TATIAN and the ENCRATITES developed their rigorous asceticism into a total abstinence from, and condemnation of, marriage; (2) that Athenagorus (Legat. c. 33), while not condemning it, speaks of many men or women as "growing old unmarried, in the hope of living in closer communion with God," and passes sentence upon second marriage as being no better than a "decent adultery"; (3) that Justin confirms at once his statement and his opinion (Apol. i. 15); (4) that Origen claims a special glory in the world to come for those that have chosen the life of consecrated celibacy (Hom. xix. in Jerem. 4), and gave a terrible proof in his own self-mutilation of the excesses to which a literal interpretation of the mysterious words of Matt. xix. 12 might lead. Many bye-currents of theological thought and feeling tended to swell the stream. The influence of Eastern Dualism, the assimilation by the Church of the feeling, if not of the dogma, which culminated in Manichaeism, the growing honour for the mother of the Lord as the Ever-virgin, the deepening sense of the awfulness of the Eucharistic sacrifice, the embarrassment caused by domestic ties in times of persecution, perhaps also the difficulty of maintaining the purity of married life in the midst of the faithless social corruption of the great cities of the empire—all these led men to take what seemed to them at once the easier and the shorter road to the higher blessedness of heaven. As the monastic life spread, those who embraced it thought of themselves, and were looked upon by others, as being already "as the angels in heaven." The praises of the virgin-state became a common topic for the rhetoric of sermons and treatises; and the dialogue of Methodius of Tyre (Convivium decem Virginum) is probably far from being an exaggerated specimen of its class.

Through all this, however, strong as might be the influence of dogma or of feeling, the question, as regards the lay-members of the Church, was left as St. Paul had left it, as a matter for each man's conscience. The common sense of Christian writers led them to see the absurdity of a rule of life which would have led rapidly to the extinction of the Christian society: their reverence made them shrink from condemning what had been from the first a divine ordinance and had now become the symbol of the mystic union between Christ and his Church. There was no attempt so far to enforce the higher life by any legislation.^d Even second marriages, though ^b The authenticity of the treatise has been denied by Roman Catholic theologians. An English translation has been published in Clark's Ante-Nicene Library.

^c Comp. the picture drawn by Clement of Alexandria (Pedagog. lit. 2, 3), as showing what was possible even among those who were nominally Christians.

^d A solitary exception is found in the correspondence between Dionysius of Alexandria and Pinytus of Thessalonica (H. E. iv. 24). The latter, it would seem, had tried to enforce celibacy among those committed to his care. The former warns him against rashly placing a cond not cler exhib tern that thein to in even were bisho

to co
To centu Proto to th
and child and t looker
with haps the r
The
indee sent c but, a
There
which disten a man voacati the c bisho wica, nent i being It allo
implie Towar diple w so-call tution
of the keeper appoin garded enough pnaish Aothe 314) st in favor ordinati that th they did were to The g state th been jus the first might f their abso

is obvious stringency under bina
One Novatus, (Epist. ad mancrudi-11) Hefel that there (Bairidge,

in pressing it was the Heliodorus, then bishop of Tricea, who, in earlier life, had written the sensuous, erotic romance of the Aethiopia (Soer. II. E. v. 22). This is one of the instances, however, in which the exception proves the rule, and the general practice of the Eastern Church was not affected by the rigorous asceticism of its European provinces. Even bishops had children born to them after their consecration. This, however, was in its turn opposed to the dominant practice, and the fact that Synesius (A.D. 410) refused to accept the bishopric of Ptolemais unless he was allowed to continue to cohabit with his wife, shews that a dispensation was necessary, and that he too was an exception to the general practice. It came accordingly to be the rule of the Eastern Church that men who were married before their ordination might continue, without blame, to live with their wives, but that a higher standard of self-devotion was demanded of bishops, first by public opinion and afterwards by ecclesiastical and even civil legislation. The feeling found a formal expression in the Council in Trullo, which sanctioned cohabitation in the case of subdeacons, deacons, and priests (c. 13) married before ordination, but ordered the wife of a bishop to retire to a convent or to become a deaconess (c. 48).^b Those who had married after their ordination were however to be suspended, and in future absolutely deposed (c. 36). The strong protest in c. 33 against the growth of a Levitical hereditary priesthood in Armenia may indicate one of the elements at work in bringing about the more stringent enforcement of celibacy. Even the former were subject to restrictions analogous to those which governed the ministrations of the Jewish priesthood, and were not allowed to contract marriage after their ordination, the rule being based on the canon of the Council of Ancyra already referred to, but excluding the power which that conceded of giving notice of the intention to marry, at the time of ordination. The Theodosian Code (De Episcop. 14, 2) enforced the same rule, and children born of marriages so contracted were to be treated as illegitimate (Cod. Theod. de bonis clericis, Justinian. Norell. v. c. 8). The Emperor Leo the Wise (A.D. 886-911) confirmed the Trullan canon, with a modification tending towards leniency. Clergy who so married were not to be reduced as before to lay communion, but were simply degraded to a lower order and shut out from strictly priestly functions. The results of this compromising legislation were probably then, as they are now, (1) that nearly all candidates for the priesthood married before they were admitted to the diaconate, (2) that they continued to live with their wives, but did not marry again, if they were left widowers; and (3) that the great mass of the secular clergy being thus ineligible for the episcopate, the bishops were mostly chosen from among the monks.

[It is interesting to note that the Nestorians till the middle of the 6th century relaxed considerably the rules of the Trullan Council, and that the Monophysite Abyssinians allowed their bishops to retain their wives and live with them.

^b The Council, however, recognized, while it deplored, the fact that bishops continued to live with their wives in Africa, Libya, and elsewhere (c. 12). It forbade the scandal for the future, and punished offenders with deposition.

Zacharias, Nuova Giustificazione del Celibato Sacro, pp. 129, 130.] [I. G. S.]

It remains to trace the progress of a more stringent and "thorough" policy in the Churches of the West. The principle asserted at Elvira extended to Western Africa, and was carried further in application. Not only bishops, presbyters, and deacons, but those of a lower grade who ministered at the altar were to lead a celibate life (2 C. Carth. c. 2). It was assumed as an axiom that the intercourse of married life was incompatible with prayer and the sacrifice of the altar, and as the priest ought always to pray, and daily to offer that sacrifice, he must of necessity abstain altogether (Hieron. Contr. Jovinian. l. 34). The bishops of Rome used their authority in the same direction. Siricius, in the first authentic decretal (A.D. 385), addressed to Himerius, bishop of Tarragona, forbade absolutely the marriage of presbyters and deacons. Innocent I. (A.D. 405) in two decretals addressed to Victorius, bishop of Ronen, and Exsuperius of Toulouse, enforced the prohibition under pain of degradation (Corp. Juris Can. c. 4, 5, and 6 Dist. 31). Leo I. (A.D. 443) tried to unite the obligation of the marriage vow and the purity of the consecrated life by allowing those who were already married to continue to live with their wives, but "habere quasi non habeant . . . quo et salva sit caritas conubiorum et cessant opera nuptiarum" (Epist. 167 ad Rusticum). If this law were not kept, they were to be subject to the extreme penalty of excommunication. So in like manner the 1st Council of Toledo (c. 1) forbade the promotion of deacons or presbyters "qui incontinenter cum suis uxoriis vixerint" to a higher grade. So also the 1st Council of Orange (can. 22, 23, 24) forbade the ordination of deacons unless they make a vow of chastity, and punishes subsequent cohabitation with deprivation. The 1st Council of Tours, as if with deprivation. The 1st Council of Tours, as if afraid of the consequences of this extreme rigor, reduced the penalty to the suspension of those who were already priests from priestly functions, and, in the case of others, excluded them from any higher grade than that which they already occupied (1 C. Turon. c. 1, 2), but allowed both to partake of the sacrament of the altar. The subdeacons, perhaps as finding less compensation in the respect of the people and in the nature of their work, held out longer than those of higher grade. The yoke was, however, pressed on them too by Leo (Epist. 34 to Leo of Catania) and Gregory the Great (Corpus Juris Can. c. 14, Dist. 31), and Spain still kept its old pre-eminence in ascetic rigor. The 8th Council of Toledo (c. 6), A.D. 653, condemned both the marriage of subdeacons after their ordination, and continued cohabitation if they were married before. Their work as bearing the vessels of the altar required that they should keep themselves free from the pollution which was inseparable from that union. Offenders were to be sentenced to something like perpetual imprisonment in a monastery. The 9th Council (c. 10), A.D. 659, described every such union, from bishops to subdeacons, as a "conubium detestandum," and their issue were not only treated as illegitimate and excluded from all rights of inheritance, but treated as slaves "jure perenni" of the Church against which their fathers had offended. It is melancholy, but instructive, to find another Council of the same Church, seventy-two years later (A.D. 731), con-pelled

spread pronou on the the guilty attem quest the di and it Stephe
Wester
Charch

[The feeling mate o and fo
(c. 1) tian th puts th cel azo

Oce genera of Mil its inde thority rule of own ar was all They w lity o
b. vi. c.
Damian of log bore its organiz famous

It do to carr been sui on his e he was for shou of the cl precede law of t ception would b of a the what he the sacer authorit

[Obvie lopment bacy was influence by step, monastic tightly k celibacy
after sup feeling o regard th hopeless bination being af

! The pe pared with dictum" on readings bation aft dies, &c.

pelled to pass canons on the one hand against the spread of unnatural crime among the clergy, pronouncing the sentence of deposition and exile on the bishops, priests, and deacons who were guilty of it, and, on the other, against the attempts at suicide which were becoming frequent among those who had been subjected to the discipline of the Church, with its censures and its penances (18 C. Tollet. c. 3 and 4). Stephen IV. (A.D. 769) enforced the rule of the Western as contrasted with that of the Eastern Church (Corpus Juris Can. c. 14, Dist. 31).

[The contrast between Eastern and Western feeling is shown singularly enough in their estimate of the relative guilt of clerical marriage and fornication. The Council of Neo-Caesarea (c. 1) punishes the latter with greater severity than the former. That of Orleans (c. 1) calmly puts the two on the same level, "si quis pollicitus vel uxori se jungat."] [I. G. S.]

One marked exception has to be noted to the general prevalence of this rigour. The Church of Milan, in this as in other things, maintained its independence of Rome, and, resting on the authority of Ambrose, was content with the Eastern rule of monogamy, and applied it even to its own archbishops. "The practice of marriage was all but universal among the Lombard clergy. They were publicly, legally married, as were the laity of Milan" (Milman's Latin Christianity, b. vi, c. 3). The practice against which Peter Damian raved in the 11th century was clearly of long standing, and it may be noted that it bore its fruit in the high repute, the thorough organization, which made the Milanese clergy famous through all Italy.

It does not fall within the limits of this work to carry on the history further. Enough has been said to shew that when Hildebrand entered on his crusade against the marriage of the clergy he was simply acting on and enforcing what had for about seven centuries been the dominant rule of the church. The confusions of the period that preceded this had relaxed the discipline, but the law of the Church remained unaltered. The exceptional freedom enjoyed by the Church of Milan would but make one who strove after the unity of a theocracy more zealous to put a stop to what he regarded as at once a defilement of the sacred office and a rebellion against divine authority.

[Obviously this rapid and yet gradual development which has been traced of clerical celibacy was very largely, if not mainly, due to the influence of monasticism. Celibacy becomes, step by step, compulsory on all the clergy, while the monastic obligation is rivetted more and more tightly by an irrevocable vow. In the monk celibacy was, as has been indicated, an aspiration after superhuman holiness, intensified by that feeling of despair with which he was apt to regard the world around him, and its apparently hopeless state of corruption; and in subtle combination with motives of this kind was the bantering after wonder and veneration. In every way the example of the monks told powerfully on the clergy. The more devoted longed to attain the monk's moral impossibility; lower natures were attracted by the prospect of gaining for themselves the monks' commanding position. Thus the rivalry, which never ceased, between the regular and the secular clergy, made the clergy generally more willing to accept the hard conditions exacted of them by the policy of their rulers. So at least it was in Western Christendom. In the East there was a more complete severance between the monks and the secular clergy, the former being debarred more closely from intercourse with the world, and the latter acquiescing in what was for them ecclesiastically a lower standing.] [I. G. S.]

¹ The passages from Ambrose have been much tampered with, and the text is doubtful. "Monogamia sacerdotum" and "castimonia" present themselves as various readings. One text permits, another prohibits, cohabitation after marriage. See the discussion in Mitman's etc., &c.

It is obvious that just in proportion to the stringency with which the law of celibacy was carried into effect were its evils likely to shew themselves. One—and that for a time a very formidable one—will form the subject of a separate article. It men had not wives, while the habits of society made them dependent on the domestic services of women, they must have house-keepers. The very idealism of purity which held that husband and wife might live together as brother and sister, seemed to imply that any man and any woman might live together on the same footing without risk or scandal. The scandal came, however, fast enough—and the SUB-INTRODUCTÆ or Συμεισαστορ came to occupy a very prominent position in the legislation of the Church. [E. H. P.]

[See, further, Alteserræ, Asceticon vel Origo loci Monasticae, Par. 1674; S. Bonaventuræ, Sentent. iv. xxxvii. Opp. Venet. 1751; Hallier, De Sacr. Elect. et Ordinat. v. i. 10, Paris, 1536; Gerson, Dialogus sup. Celibatu, Opp. ii. p. 817; Antwerp, 1606; Ferraris, Bibliotheca, a. v. Clericus, Conjuges, Venet. 1778; Lunney, Impediment. Ordin. Opp. I. ii. p. 742, Colon, 1731; Schramm, Compend. Theolog. iii. p. 694; Augsburg, 1768; Bingham, Origines Eccles. 1755; Lond. 1727; Concina, De Celibatu, Romæ, 1755; Paleotimo, De Celibatu, Suavia Orig. Eccles. Venet. 1766; Mich. de Medina, De Sacr. Hom. Continentiâ, Ven. 1568; Campegius, De Celib. Sacerdotum, Ven. 1554; G. Callixtus, De Conjug. Cleric. Helmstadt, 1831; Osiander, Exam. Celib. Cleric. Tübingen, 1684; H. C. Lea, History of Christian Celibacy, Philadelphia, 1867.] [I. G. S.]

CELLA or CELLA MEMORIAE, a small memorial chapel erected in a sepulchral area over the tomb of the deceased, in which at stated times, especially the anniversary of his decease, his friends and dependents assembled to celebrate an agape, and partake of a banquet in his honour. These were often built over the tombs of martyrs, and were then known as Martyria, Memories Martyrum, Comitia Martyrum, and Confessiones. Sepulchral buildings of this character were common both to heathens and Christians. Indeed here, as in so much else, Christianity simply inherited existing customs, purged them of licentious or idolatrous taint, and adopted them as their own. Thus heathen and Christian monuments mutually throw light on one another. A Christian inscription, recording the formation of an area and the construction of a cella, is given in the article CEMETERY.

Directions for the erection of a building bearing the same title, and devoted to a similar purpose by a pagan, are given in a very curious will, once engraved on a tomb at Langres, a copy of a portion of which has been discovered in the binding of a MS. of the 10th century in the Library at Basle. The will is printed by De Rossi in the Bullettino di Arc. Crist., Dec. 1863. In it we find most particular directions for the completion of the cella memoriae, which the testator had already begun, in exact accordance with the plan he left behind him. This cella stood in the centre of an area. In front of it was to be erected an altar of the finest Carrara marble in which the testator's ashes were to be deposited. The cella itself was to contain two statues of the testator, one in bronze, one in marble. Provision was to be made for the easy opening and shutting of the cella. There was to be an exedra, which was to be furnished with couches and benches on the days on which the cella was opened. Coverlets (lodiceae) and pillows (cervicalia) to lay upon the seats were also to be provided, and even garments (abotiae and tunicae) for the guests who assembled to do honour to the departed. Orchards and tanks (lacus) formed part of the plan. It was also ordered that all the testator's freedmen were to make a yearly contribution out of which a feast was to be provided on a certain day, and partaken of on the spot. Additional light is thrown upon the last-named provision by the terms of a long and curious inscription relating to a colleium for the burial of the dead, consisting chiefly of slaves, of the year A.D. 133. One of the regulations was that the members of the confraternity were to dine together six times in the year (Northcote, R. S. p. 51). These cellae were memorial halls for funeral banquets. The Christians were essentially men of their country and their age, following in all things lawful the customs of the time and place in which their lot was cast. The recent investigations of De Rossi do much to dispel the idea of the specific and exclusive character of the Christianity of the primitive Church. Rejecting the abuses arising from the license of pagan morals, there was nothing in itself to take exception at in the funeral feast. Indeed the primitive agapae or love-feasts were often nothing more than funeral banquets held in cellae at the tombs of the faithful, the expenses of which, in the case of the poorer members, were provided out of the arca communis or church-chest. We are familiar with pictorial representations of banquets of this nature derived from the Catacombs. Bottari supplies us with two such of remarkable interest from the cemetery of SS. Marcellinus and Peter (Bottari, Pittura, tom. ii. tav. 107, 109, 127), and one from St. Callistus (ibid. tom. iii. p. 1, 110, 118). [CATACOMBS.] There was a remarkable correspondence between the arrangements of the Christians and heathens in these matters. In both not only was the cost of the funeral banquet paid out of the general fund, but suitable clothing was also provided for those who were present at these banquets. In an inventory of furniture confiscated in the Diocletian persecution in a house where Christians were in the habit of meeting at Circa in Namidia, in addition to chalices of gold and silver, and lamps, &c., we find articles of attire and shoes (tunicae muliebres lxxvii, tunicae viriles xvi, caligae viriles parva xiii, caligae muliebres parva xlvii), and other entries of a similar nature. These cellae were not only used for the funeral feasts, which were necessarily infrequent, but also formed oratories to which the faithful resorted at all times to offer up their devotions over the remains of their departed brethren. The name cella, as applied to such places of reunion, seems to have been restricted to non-subterranean buildings erected in the funeral area, above the grave of the individual whom it was desired to commemorate. Chambers constructed for this purpose in the subterranean cemeteries were known as cubicula [CATACOMBS]. Another appellation by which they were known whether above ground or below, was memoriae martyrum or martyria until they lost their primitive name of cellae, and became known as basilicae (Hierom. Ep. ad Vigilant.). In fact, the magnificent basilica erected above the tombs of the martyrs in the age of the peace of the Church, by Constantine and other Christian emperors, were nothing more than amplifications of the humble cellae or memoriae built in the area of the cemeteries.

We know from Anastasius (§ 21) that many buildings were erected in the cemeteries by the direction of Pope Fabianus (A.D. 238-354), "multas fabricas per coemeteria fieri precepit." These fabricae we may safely identify, with Ciampini, Ansaldo, De Rossi, &c. with the cellae memoriae of which we have been speaking. "They were probably little oratories constructed either for purposes of worship, or the celebration of the agapae, or of mere guardianship of the tombs according to the common practice of the Romans" (Northcote, R. S. p. 86). The peace which the Church had at this time enjoyed for nearly 50 years would have encouraged the erection of such buildings, and rendered the use of them free from apprehension.

Cella and cellula were employed at a later time for sepulchral chapels built along the side walls of a church. It is used in this sense by Paulinus of Nola, in whose writings such chapels are more frequently termed cubicula. [CATACOMBS.]

An example of the use of the word in the sense of a monastic cell is given by Combens, De Templo S. Sophie p. 260, δέδοται τῷ κλήρῳ καὶ κελλία εἰς τὰ περίε κατὰ τὴν τάξιν αὐτῶν. [E. V.]

CELLERARIUS, Cellarius, κελλῆριος, κελλῆριος. One of the highest officials in a monastery. As the prior was next to the abbat in spiritual things, so the Cellerarius, under the abbat, had the management and control of all the secular affairs. He was sometimes called oeconomus (οἰκονόμος), dispenser or procurator. According to most commentators on the Benedictine Rule he was to be appointed by the abbat with consent of the seniors, and was to hold office for one year or more (Reg. S. Bened. c. 31, cf. Concord. Regul. c. 40). [I. G. S.]

CELLITAE, Κελλιῶται. A class of monks, midway between hermits and coenobites. Strictly speaking, they were the anchorites, ἀναχωρίται, so called because they withdrew or retired from the coenobia, wherein the monks dwelt together, to small cells in the immediate vicinity. On festivals they repaired to the church of the monastery, and thus, being still semi-attached to the community, they differed from the hermits, ἐρημίται, who were independent of control

(Sol. comple living hesych atrpia v. 3).

The the ca (Soc. came t place; which and su togethe even to but ust the old is used (Hist. tuence of the disc Agnave but it is to cells of the " Cassi of monk who dw without The san disorder Western Agath. c. properly in Egypt quasi com unity the abba The first founded 4th cent Mon. d' those cent to the fo the latte Mon, Dis

The r tery to o it was, n tude, in Each cel which th (On Cang was a m ordinary Vienna, in a solitu (Mab. An A etric the 9th to be nen one from window.

Κελλιῶται the court of = Ad p communitas founded by not only used for the necessarily infrequent, to which the faithful offer up their devotions and departed brethren, but to such places of been restricted to non- in the funeral the individual whom it orate. Chamberlains came in the subterranean cubicula (ΣΑΤΑΚΟΜΗ) which they were known below, was memoriae until they lost their and became known as Vigilanti. In fact, the above the tombs of the peace of the Church, or Christian emperors, amplifications of the built in the area of (§ 21) that many in the cemeteries by the (A.D. 238-354), "mul-teteria fieri precepit." safely identify, with coeli, &c. with the coeli have been speaking, oratories constructed worship, or the celebra- of mere guardianship of the common practices cod. R. S. p. 86). The had at this time enjoyed would have encouraged the use, and rendered the use employed at a later time built along the side walls in this sense by Paul- writings such chapels are cubicula. [CUBICULUM.] of the word in the sense given by Combens, De 30, δέδοται τῷ κλήρῳ καὶ τὴν τάξιν αὐτῶν.

[E. V.]

Cellarius, κελλάριος, highest officials in a monas- next to the abbat in the Cellerarius, under the cement and control of all He was sometimes called dispensator or procurator. commentators on the Bene- appointed by the abbat seniors, and was to hold Reg. S. Bened. c. 31, [I. G. S.]

αἰδῶν. A class of monks, its and coenobites. Strictly the anchorites, ἀναχωρήται, withdrew or retired from the monks dwell together, in immediate vicinity. On ad to the church of the being still semi-attached they differed from the her- were independent of control

(Solk. Thes. s. v.). As preferring the more complete privacy and quiet of these cells to living in common, they were sometimes called hesychastae, ἡσυχασταί, and their cells ἡσυχαστήρια (Bligh. Orig. VII. li. 14.; Justin. Novell. v. 3).^a

The word "cella," κελλῶν, originally meaning the cave, den, or separate cell of each recluse (Soz. H. E. vi. 31; Greg. Dial. li. 34),^b soon came to be applied to their collective dwelling-place; in this resembling the term monasterium, which signified at first a hermit's solitary abode, and subsequently the abode of several monks together. "Cella," in its later use, was applied even to larger monasteries (Mab. Ann. v. 7); but usually to the offshoots or dependencies of the old foundation (Du Cange, s. v.) "Cellula" is used for a monastery by Gregory of Tours (Hist. vi. 8, 29, &c.). In the Rule of St. Fructuarius "cella" stands for the "black-hole," the place of solitary confinement for offenders against the discipline (Mab. Ann. Alii. 41). The Regula Agricensis forbade separate cells for the monks; but it is not clear whether this prohibition refers to cells within the walls or to the cells outside of the "cellitae."

Cassian, in his account of the different kinds of monks in Egypt, condemns the "Sarabaitae," who dwelt together in small groups of cells without rule or superior (Cass. Coll. xviii. 17). The same distrust of what inevitably tended to disorder and licence is shown in the decrees of Western Councils (e.g. Concc. Aurel. I. c. 22; Agath. c. 38). But the cells of the "Cellitae," properly so called, resembled rather a "Laura" in Egypt and Palestine, each Laura being a quasi coenobitic cluster of cells, forming a community to which, in the earlier days of monachism, the abbat's will was in place of a written rule. The first of these "Lauras" is said to have been founded by St. Chariton, about the middle of the 4th century, near the Dead Sea (Bulteau, Hist. Mon. d'Orient. 282). Other famous lauras were those of St. Euthymius, near Jerusalem, in the 5th century, and of St. Sabas, near the Jordan; to the former only grown men were admitted, to the latter only boys (Helyot, Hist. des Ordres. Mon. Dissert. Prelim. § 5).

The motive for withdrawing from a monastery to one of these little cells clustering round it, was, apparently, a desire in some cases of solitude, in others of a less austere mode of life. Each cell had a small garden or vineyard, in which the monk could occupy himself at pleasure (Du Cange, s. v.). But sometimes the "Cellita" was a monk with aspirations after more than ordinary self-denial. Thus it was a custom at Vienna, in the 6th century, for some monk, selected as pre-eminent in sanctity, to be immured in a solitary cell, as an intercessor for the people (Mab. Ann. iv. 44, cf. vii. 57).

A strict rule for "Cellitae" was drawn up in the 9th century by Grimalac. Their cells were to be near the monastery, either standing apart one from another or communicating only by a window. The cellitae were to be supported by their own work or by alms: they might be either clergy or laymen. If professed monks, they were to wear the dress of the order; if not, a cape as a badge. None were to be admitted into the "Cellitae" except by the bishop or the abbat, nor without a novitiate. They were to have their own chapel for mass; and a window in the wall of the church, through which they might "assist" at the services, and receive the confessions of penitents. A seal was to be set by the bishop on the door of each cell, never to be broken, except in urgent sickness for the necessary medical and spiritual comfort (Helyot, Diss. Prél. § 5; Bulteau, Hist. de l'Ordre S. B. I. li. 21).

^a Κελλωτής also meant an imperial chamberlain at the court of Constantinople.

^b "Ad propriam cellam revertentur" is taken by some commentators as referring to a convent of nuns already founded by St. Scholastica (Greg. Dial. li. 34).

The term cellitimus has been supposed equivalent to cellita. It is used by Sidonius Apollinaris for the Lerinensian monks (IX. Ep. 3, ad Faust.). According to Du Cange it sometimes means a monk sharing the same cell with another. [I. G. S.] CELSUS. (1) Chill-martyr at Antioch under Diocletian, is commemorated Jan. 9 (Mart. Rom. Vet., Usuard).

(2) Martyr with Nazarius at Milan, June 12 (Mart. Usuard).

The Mart. Rom. Vet. places the invention of the relics of these saints on this day, the martyrdom on July 28. The Cal. Byzant. commemo- rates them on Oct. 14. [C.]

CEMETERY (Κοιμητήριον, Coemeterium). In the familiar term coemeterium we have an example—one among many—of a new and nobler meaning being breathed by Christianity into a word already familiar to heathen antiquity. Already employed in its natural sense of a "sleeping place" (Diod. apud Athenenum, 143, C.), it became limited in the language of Christians to the places where their brethren who had fallen asleep in Christ were reposing until the morning of the Resurrection. Death, through the Resurrection of Jesus Christ, had changed its nature and its name. "In Christianis," writes St. Jerome, Ep. 29, "mors non est mors, sed dormitio et somnus appellatur." "Mortuus convescit dicere dormientes quia evigilaturus, id est resurrectiones vult intelligi" (Aug. Rs. in 1/s. lxxxvii). And the spot where the bodies of the departed were deposited also changed its designation and received a new and significant title. The faithful looked on it as a κοιμητήριον, "a sleeping-place;" the name being, as St. Zephyrosus says, a perpetual evidence that those who were laid there were not dead but sleeping: διὰ τοῦτο αἰεὶς ὁ τόπος κοιμητήριον ἀνίσταται ἵνα μὴ ἴσθι ὅτι τελευτήκτες καὶ ἐπιθάλα κλημένοι οὐ τεθνήκασι ἀλλὰ κοιμῶνται καὶ καθύψουσι. (Homil. lxxii.)

The earliest example of the use of the word is, perhaps, in the Philosophumena of Hippolytus, c. 222, where we read that Zephyrinus, bishop of Rome, "set" Callistus, afterwards his successor, "over the cemetery," εἰς τὸ κοιμητήριον κατέστησεν (Philosophum. lib. ix. c. 7). Here the word is recognized as an already established term. That its origin was exclusively Christian, and that in its new sense it was a term unknown, and hardly intelligible to the heathen authorities, is evidenced by the form of the edicts which supply the next examples of its use. In the persecution under Valerian, A.D. 257, Aemilianus the prefect prohibited the Christians of Alexandria, is τὰ καλούμενα κοιμητήρια εἰσέλαιναι. This edict was revoked by Gallienus on the cessation of the persecution, c. 259, and an imperial rescript again permitted the bishops τὰ τῶν καλουμένων κοιμητηρίων ἀπολαμβάνειν χωρία. Had the term been one in familiar use among the heathen inhabitants, it would have been needless to have thus specified them.

A distinction between the burial places of Christians and those of another faith had its origin in the very first ages of the Church. This principle of jealous separation after death between the worshippers of the True God and the heathen was inherited from the Jews. The Jews wherever they resided had their own places of sepulchre, from which all but their co-religionists were rightly excluded. In Rome they very early had a catacomb of their own in the Monte Verde on the Via Portuensis, outside the Trastevere quarter of the city, which was their chief place of residence. Another has been investigated by De Rossi on the Via Appia; the construction of which he considers takes us back as far as the time of Augustus. So also the Christians, in death as well as in life, would seek to carry out the apostolic injunction to "come out, and be separate, and touch not the unclean thing." The faithful brethren of the little flock, the "peculiar people," lay apart, still united by the ties of a common brotherhood, waiting for "the great and terrible day" which according to the universal belief of the primitive church was so near at hand. As an evidence of the abhorrence felt in very early, though not the earliest, times of uniting Christians and pagans in one common sepulchre, we may refer to the words of Cyprian, A.D. 254. This Father upbraids a lapsed Spanish bishop named Martialis, among other crimes, with having associated with the members of a heathen funeral college and joined in their funeral banquets, and having buried his sons in the cemetery over which they had superintendence—"Praeter gentiliam turpia et luttulenta convivia et collegia diu frequentata, filios in eodem collegio, exterarum gentium more, apud profana sepulchra depositos et alienigenis consepultos" (Cyprian, Epist. 67). Hilary of Poitiers, c. 360, also commenting on the text, "let the dead bury their dead," asserts the same principle, "Ostendit Dominus . . . inter filelem filium patremque infidelem jus paterni nominis non relinquere. Non obsequium humani patris negavit, sed . . . admonuit non admisceri memoris sanctorum mortuorum infideles" (Comm. in Matt. cap. vii.). These Christian cemeteries were in their first origin private and individual. The wealthier members of the Church were buried each in a plot of ground belonging to him, while the tombs of the poorer sort, like that of their Lord, were dug in the villas or gardens of rich citizens or matrons of substance who had embraced the faith of Christ, and devoted their property to His service. The titles by which many of the Roman cemeteries are still designated, though often confused with the names of conspicuous saints and martyrs who in later times were interred in them, are derived from their original possessors, some of whom may with great probability be referred to very early if not apostolic times. The cemeteries which are designated as those of Lucia, Domitilla, Commodilla, Cyriaca, Priscilla, Praetextatus, Pontianus, &c., were so called, not as being the burial places of these individuals, but because the sepulchral area which formed the nucleus of their ramifications had been their property. Not that in every instance the original cemetery received this large extension. Underground Christian tombs have been found in the vicinity of Rome consisting of no more than a single sepulchral chamber, so that some of these cemeteries may have been always limited to the members and adherents of a single family. The only necessary restriction was that of a common faith. A few years ago a gravestone was found in the catacomb of Nicomedes outside the Porta Pia, bearing an inscription in which a certain Valerius Mercurius, according to the Roman custom, bequeathed to his freedmen and freedwomen and their posterity the right of sepulture in the same cemetery, provided that they belonged to his own religion, AT (ad) RELIGIONEM PERTINENTIS MEAM. We have another example of the same kind in an inscription which may still be seen in the most ancient part of the cemetery of Nereus and Achilleus. In this it is recorded that M. Antonius Restitutus made a hypocaustum for himself and his family trusting in the Lord, "sibi et suis filientibus in Domino." We have no example of language of this kind in any heathen epitaph. The strongest tie of brotherhood among Christians was a common faith. This bond outlasted death, and nowhere was its power more felt than in their burials. Nor was there anything in the social or religious position of the first Christians in Rome and elsewhere to curtail their liberty in the mode of the disposing of their dead. They lived in, and with their age, and followed its customs in all things lawful. On the contrary, all the ordinances of the Roman legislation under which, as citizens, they lived, were favourable to the acquisition and maintenance of burial places by the Christians. In Rome had need for interment became ipso facto invested with a religious character which extended not only to the area in which the sepulture took place, but to the hypocauste or subterranean chambers beneath it, and perhaps also to the cellae memoriae, the gardens, orchards, and other appurtenances belonging to them. The violation of a tomb was a crime under the Roman law visited with the severest penalties. According to Paulus (Digest. lib. xvii. tit. xii. § 11) those convicted of removing a body or digging up the bones were, if persons of the lowest rank, to suffer capital punishment; if of higher condition, to be banished to an island, or condemned to the mines. This privilege reached even to those who, as martyrs, had forfeited their lives to the law. The leges contains the opinions of some of the most eminent Roman lawyers that the bodies of criminals might legally be given up to those who asked for them. "Corpora animadversorum quibuslibet petentibus ad sepulcrum danda sunt" (Paulus ap. Digest. lib. xviii. tit. xxiv.). Ulpian (vid. § 1) adduces the authority of the Emperor Augustus for the restoration of the bodies of criminals to their relations. In his own time, he remarks, a formal petition and permission was requisite, and the request was sometimes refused, chiefly in cases of high treason. This exception may have sometimes interfered with the Christians obtaining possession of the body of a martyr who has Caesar." is no c unless t altoget the exist of some of a we would b

of legal (collegia) celebrati
The Chr enter int jurist M century, Corpor. prohibit clubs, an excepts r ligious, provided the senate classes in payment the dece teulorib men seme such asso the object expenses the Apolo of the arce makes a s the month
strus die, vided only compelled. common fr in feasting in feeding eleotis Au
The first l ference in Africa, the civil p of popular ad Sicul. general ali before that ad even th teries them in the sac as to any p cemeteries civil power.
We cannot must have its corpora very early p whose dead the pious gished men borence of admirare v their findin columns. bodies of t an undying to be the la with the m en, were so called, and of these individuals, are which formed the ones had been their property instance the original extension. Under-ve been found in the ng of no more than a y, so that some of these always limited to the a single family. The was that of a common a gravesono was found edes outside the Porta in which a certain Va- g to the Roman custom, on and free-women and of sepulture in the same they belonged to his IONEM PERTINENTIS, or example of the same which may still be seen in the cemetery of Nereus it is recorded that M. e a hypocaustum for hith- ington in the Lord, "sibi domo." We have no his kind in any heathen it of brotherhood among in faith. This bond out- ro was its power more s. Nor was there any re- gious position of the and elsewhere to cartall of the disposing of in, and with their age, in all things lawful, on with them. On the con- of the Roman legislation they lived, were favour- maintenance of burial as. In Rome had used ossario facto invested with a extended not only to the uture took place, but toanean chambers beneath the cellae memoriae, the other appurtenances he- violation of a tomb was an law visited with the ording to Paulus (Digest. those convicted of remov- up the bones were, if per- , to suffer capital pun- ishment, to be banished to the mines. This to those who, as martyrs, is to the law. The libet some of the most eminent bodies of criminals might those who asked for them. rum quondamlibet petenti- and. xiv.) (Paulus ap. xxiv.) (Ulpian (l. d. § 1) of the Emperor Augustus of the bodies of criminals in his own time, he re- tion and permission was est was sometimes refused, h treason. This exception interferred with the Chris- of the body of a martyr who had refused to swear "by the fortune of Caesar." But for the first two centuries there is no evidence of any such prohibition, and unless the "Acts of the martyrs" are to be altogether discredited, the nucleus of many of the existing catacombs was created by the burial of some famous martyr on the private property of a wealthy Christian. The facilities for burial would be also further enlarged by the existence of legalized funeral guilds or confraternities (collegia), associated together for the reverent celebration of the funeral rites of their members. The Christians were not forbidden by any rules of their own society, or laws of the empire, to enter into a corporate union of this kind. The jurist Marcian, at the beginning of the third century, as quoted in the Digests (De Colleg. et Corpor. lib. xlvi. tit. xlii. 1), when stating the prohibitions against collegia sodalicia, soldiers' clubs, and other illicit combinations, expressly excepts meetings the object of which was religious, "religiosis causis eorum non prohibentur," provided they were not forbidden by a decree of the senate; as well as associations of the poorer classes meeting once a month to make a small payment for common purposes, one of which was the decent burial of their members, "permittitur tenuioribus stipem mensuram conferre, dum tamen semel in mense eorum" (Digest. ibid.). That such associations existed among Christians with the object, among others, of defraying the funeral expenses of their poorer brethren, is clear from the Apology of Tertullian. He says, speaking of the arca publica, or public chest: "Every one makes a small contribution on a certain day of the month (modicum unusquisque stipem mensura die . . . appoint), or when he chooses, provided only he is willing and able, for none is compelled. . . . The amount is, as it were, a common fund of piety. Since it is expended not in feasting, or drinking, or indecent excess, but in feeding and burying the poor, &c. (egenis sistentis humanitas-que)." Tertull. Apolog. c. xxix. The first historical notice we have of any interference with the Christian cemeteries is found in Africa, A.D. 203. And this was not an act of civil power, but was simply an outbreak of popular bigotry. "Arcae non sicut," Tertull. de Spectul. c. iii. [AREA]. We do not find any general edict aimed at the Christian cemeteries before that of the Emperor Valerian, A.D. 257; and even this is directed not against the cemeteries themselves but against religious meetings in the sacred precincts, and is absolutely silent as to any prohibition of burial. After this, the cemeteries became expressly recognized by the civil power.

CEMETERY

We cannot doubt that places of interment must have been provided by the Church, in its corporate capacity, for its members at a very early period. It was not every Christian whose dead body would be sure of receiving the pious care that attended the more distinguished members of the Church. Their abhorrence of cremation, and repugnance against admittance with the departed heathen forbade their finding a resting place in the heathen columbaria. The horrible practice where the bodies of the lowest slaves were thrown to rot in an undistinguished mass, could not be permitted to be the last home of those for whom, equally with the most distinguished members of the Church, Christ died. "Apud nos," writes Lactantius, "inter pauperes et divites, servos et dominos, interest nihil" (Lact. Div. Inst. v. 14, 15). A common cemetery would be one of the first necessities of a Christian Church in any city as soon as it acquired a corporate existence and stability. Rome could not have long dispensed with it. And when we read of Callistus being "set over the cemetery," by Pope Zephyrinus (c. 202), we cannot reasonably question that the cemetery which we know from Anastasius "Callistus made (fecit) on the Appian way, and which is called to the present day the cemetery of Callistus" (Anastas. § 17), was one common to the whole Christian community, formed by Callistus on a plot of ground given to him for this purpose by some Roman of distinction. It is a plausible conjecture of De Rossi that the example of those who had bestowed this cemetery on the Christian community would speedily be followed by other believers of wealth, and that others of the larger cemeteries which surround Rome owe their origin, or fuller development to this epoch. This probability is strengthened when we find it recorded by Pope Fabian, in the early part of the same century (A.D. 248), that "after he had divided the regions among the denizens he ordered numerous buildings to be constructed in the cemeteries" (Multas fabricas per coemeteria fieri precepit, Anast. § 21). It was in one of these memorial chapels that in all probability Pope Xystus II. was martyred, A.D. 261, "in coemeterio animalversum," Cyprian, Ep. 80 (81). Anastasius records that the charge under which he suffered was contempt for the commands of Valerian (Anast. § 25), and, as we have seen, one of the persecuting edicts of that emperor forbade the Christians to enter their cemeteries. Among the internal arrangements of the church attributed in the Liber Pontificalis to Dionysius (A.D. 261-272) is the institution of cemeteries, "coemeteria instituit" (Anast. § 28). From this period large public cemeteries became a recognized part of the organization of the Christian Church. It was considered a duty incumbent on the richer members to provide for the reverent interment of the poor, and where other means were wanting, St. Ambrose sanctioned the sale of the sacred vessels by the Christian community rather than that the dead should want burial (Ambros. de Offic. lib. ii. c. 28).

CEMETERY

The form, position, and arrangements of the early Christian cemeteries were not regulated by any uniform system, but were modified according to the customs of the country, the nature of the soil, and the conditions of climate. Attention having been for a long time chiefly drawn to the subterranean cemeteries of Rome, it has been too hastily inferred that all the early Christian burial places were underground vaults. But as Mommsen says, "the idea that the dead were usually buried in such vaults in early Christian times is as erroneous as it is prevalent" (Contempor. Rev., May 1871, p. 166). We know that at Carthage the Christian dead were buried, not in hypocausts, but in open plots of ground, "arcae sepulchrorum nostrarum." Against these burial places the populace directed their mad attack with the wild cry, "Down with the burial places" (arcae non sint), and with the fury of Bacchanals dug up the graves, dragged forth the decaying corpses, and tore them into fragments (Tertull. ad Scap. 3, Apolog. c. xxviii.). Half a century later we find the word in use at Carthage. St. Cyprian was buried "ad arcus Marcobili Caudilliani proconratoris" (Ruinar, Acta Martyrum Sincera, p. 203). It also occurs in the Acts of Montanus and Lucius, "in medio eorum in area solum servari jussit (Montanus) ut nec sepulturae consortio privaretur" (S. 279). The same term is found in connection with a monumental cemetery chapel, cella memoriae, in a very remarkable inscription from Caesarea in Mauretania (Iol) given by De Rossi (Bullet. di Arch. Crist. April, 1864):—

"Aream at (ad) sepulchra cultor verbi contulit, Et cellam struxit suis cunctis sumptibus.
Ecclesiae sanctae hanc reliquit memoriam.
Salvete fratres puro corde et simplici, Euclypius vos salos sancto spiritu.
Ecclesia Fratrum hunc restituit titulum.
Ex Ing. Asteri."

"This graveyard was given by the servant of the Word, who has also built the chapel entirely at his own expense. He left the memoria to the Holy Church. Hail, brethren! Euclypius with a pure and simple heart greets you, born of the Holy Spirit." The remainder of the inscription records the restoration of the titulus, which had been damaged in one of the former persecutions, by the Ecclesia Fratrum. The concluding words, "ex ingenio Asteri," give the name of the poet.

We find sufficient evidence of this custom of burying in enclosed graveyards, according to the modern usage, prevailing in other districts. The language of St. Chrysostom with respect to the immense concourse of people who assembled on Easter Eve and other special anniversaries for worship and the celebration of the Eucharist in the cemeteries and at the martyria, with which the city of Antioch was surrounded, can only be interpreted of cemeteries above ground. There is not the slightest reference to subterranean vaults, which would have been altogether inadequate to receive the multitudes who thronged thither (cf. Chrysost. Hom. 81, eis τὸ ὄνομα κοινῆς κληρονομίας; Hom. 65, de Martyriis; Hom. 67, in Drosidem). The same inference as to the position of the cemeteries may be legitimately drawn from other passages of early writers. This is the only satisfactory interpretation of the passage in the Apostolical Constitutions (lib. vi. c. 30), relating to assemblies held in the cemeteries "for reading the sacred books, singing in behalf of the martyrs which are fallen asleep, and for all the saints from the beginning of the world and for the brethren that are asleep in the Lord, and offering the acceptable Eucharist." We learn also from Athanasius (Apolog. pro Fide, p. 704) that during the week after Pentecost the people fasted and went out to pray περὶ τὰ κοιμηθήρια. The prohibitions of the Council of Elvira (A.D. 305, Canon, 34, 35) of the custom of females passing the night in the cemeteries, which was the cause of many scandals under the colour of religion (cf. Petron. Arbit. Matrona Ephes.), and of the lighting of candles in them during the day-time, "placuit cereis in coemeteriis non accendi, inquietandi enim Sanctorum spiritus non sunt" (cf. 1 Sam. xxviii. 15, "Quare inquietasti me ut suscitarer?"), indicate open-air cemeteries furnished with martyria, monuments, and memorial chapels, not subterranean vaults. We would explain in the same way the 110th canon of the Council of Laodicea (A.D. 360) forbidding members of the Church to resort to the cemeteries or martyria of heretics for the purpose of prayer and divine service, εὐχῆς ἃ ὁσπασίας ἔχουσιν. Sidonius Apollinaris, bishop of Clermont, d. 482, describes the burial place of his grandfather as a grave (scroba) in a field (campus) (Sidon. Apoll. lib. iii. ep. 12).

Nor even in Rome itself, though the actual place of interment was as a rule in a subterranean excavation, now known as a catacomb, does the word coemeterium exclusively denote these underground vaults. De Rossi, following Settele (Atti della Pont. Acad. d' Arch. tom. ii. p. 51) has abundantly shown in his Roma Subterranea (cf. vol. i. pp. 86, 93, &c.), that coemeterium when it occurs in the Lives of the Popes and other early documents frequently denotes the monumental chapels and oratories, together with the huts of the fossores and other officials, erected in the funeral enclosure. "The long peace from the reign of Caracalla to that of Decius might well have encouraged the Christians to erect such buildings, and allowed them to make frequent use of them notwithstanding occasional disturbances from popular violence" (Northcote, R. S. p. 80-87). When we read of popes and other Christian confessors taking refuge in the cemeteries and living in them for a considerable period, we are not to suppose that they actually passed their time underground, under circumstances and in an atmosphere which would render life hardly possible, but in one of the buildings annexed to the cemeteries, either for religious purposes, or for the guardianship of the sacred enclosures.* Thus when we read in Anastasius (§60) that Boniface I. in the stormy period that accompanied the double election to the papedom, A.D. 419, "habitavit in coemeterio Sanctae Felicitatis," we find Symmachus, his contemporary, writing without any allusion to the place of his retirement, "extra murum deductus non longe ab urbe remoratur" (Symmach. Ep. 1. 73). We have a distinct example belonging to the same period, of residence in a cella of a cemetery. This is the priest Barbatianus, who having come from Antioch to Rome retired to the cemetery of Callistus, "clam latens in cellula sua" (Agellius, Vitae Pont. Ravenn.). Ptolemaeus Silvius, quoted by De Rossi, Bullettino, Giugno, 1863, writing A.D. 448, speaks of the innumerable cellulae dedicated to the martyrs with which the areas of the cemeteries were studded. All these buildings taken collectively were often comprised under the name coemeterium. Onuphrius Panvinius (d. 1568), one of the earliest writers on Christian interment, De Ritu sepelendi. Mort. apud vet. Christ., p. 85, expressly states that "inasmuch as worshippers were wont to assemble in large numbers at the tombs of the martyrs on the anniversaries of their death, the name of cemetery was extended to capacious places adjacent to the cemeteries, suitable for public meetings for prayer." "We read," he continues, "that the early Roman pontiffs were in the habit of keeping these stations, that is, performing all their public pontifical acts among the tombs of

* Express reference is made by Ulpian to the habit of dwelling in sepulchres (Digest. lib. xviii. tit. xii. § 3). the mar

to the Ch of praye swords, a the word

That t to the su clear from catacomb tury, we buried in §55; An
A.D. 422, Even of the catac come not tombs of
pu. . . . lae" (Ana letter to mention c
"in coem
p. 801).

Rom. Sot parent exc Sistus III. of whom Sanctum 65, 71), only prov at this tim of St. Cyp altar (con by Constant suecus. named un that the ce tury the h all buildin is in accord no single performed primitive e Although
were gener area, and instances a a single g Rossi (*R. refers to Ch 910-16;
lingual insc 527, in whi
in Baldetti, Malta stati purchased Zestinus,
adduces an this design
TABIAAH
The word is themselves.
111. 67), in BIBAR, is pe
The Latin
usually fou
FACT IN PA Synonym. In*

Although
were gener
area, and instances a
a single g Rossi (*R. refers to Ch 910-16;
lingual insc 527, in whi
in Baldetti, Malta stati
purchased Zestinus,
adduces an this design
TABIAAH
The word is
themselves.
111. 67), in BIBAR, is pe
The Latin
usually fou
FACT IN PA
Synonym. In*

Although
were gener
area, and instances a
a single g Rossi (*R. refers to Ch 910-16;
lingual insc 527, in whi
in Baldetti, Malta stati
purchased Zestinus,
adduces an this design
TABIAAH
The word is
themselves.
111. 67), in BIBAR, is pe
The Latin
usually fou
FACT IN PA
Synonym. In*

Although
were gener
area, and instances a
a single g Rossi (*R. refers to Ch 910-16;
lingual insc 527, in whi
in Baldetti, Malta stati
purchased Zestinus,
adduces an this design
TABIAAH
The word is
themselves.
111. 67), in BIBAR, is pe
The Latin
usually fou
FACT IN PA
Synonym. In*

Although
were gener
area, and instances a
a single g Rossi (*R. refers to Ch 910-16;
lingual insc 527, in whi
in Baldetti, Malta stati
purchased Zestinus,
adduces an this design
TABIAAH
The word is
themselves.
111. 67), in BIBAR, is pe
The Latin
usually fou
FACT IN PA
Synonym. In*

* In the S in Cymeritis,
"coemeterium vaults. We would ex-110th canon of the 301) forbidding man sort to the cemeteries for the purpose of prayer § 3) deparatis chess. op of Clermont, d. 482, ce of his grandfather as (campus) (Sidon. Apoll.

self, though the actual as a rule in a subter-
 known as a catacomb, tum exclusively denota De Rossi, following Acad. d' Arch. tom. li. shown in his Roma Sot- 36, 93, &c.), that coem- the Lives of the Popes rents frequently denota and oratories, together sacros and other officials, enclosure. "The long Carmentis to that of De-couraged the Christians to ad allowed them to take notwithstanding occasional ar violence" (Northcote, on we read of popes and rs taking refuge in the them for a considerable suppose that they actually erground, under circum-phere which would render in one of the buildings ries, either for religious ndship of the sacred en-ead in Anastasius (§ 60) a stormy period that ecection to the popehood, in coemeterio Sanctae Fe-machus, his contemporary, fusion to the place of his urum deductus non longe Symmach. Ep. x. 73). We ile belonging to the same celli of a cemetery. This as, who having come from el to the cemetery of Cal-in cellula sui" (Agellus, Ptolemaeus Silvius, quoted Giugno, 1863), writing A.D. umerable cellulae dedicato which the areas of the lded. All these buildings ere often comprised under am. Onuphrius Pavinius earliest writers on Christian sepeliend. Mort. apud vet. uly states that "Inasmuch went to assemble in large s of the martyrs on the death, the name of cemetery cious places adjacent to able for public meetings ed," he continues, "that ntiffs were in the habit of ons, that is, performing all it acts among the tombs of

CEMETERY

the martyrs. And thus these cemeteries were to the Christians as it were temples, and places of prayer in which bishops used to gather their crowds, administer the sacraments, and preach the word of God." [CHURCHYARD.]

That the term coemeterium was not restricted to the subterranean places of interment is also clear from the fact that though interment in the catacombs had entirely ceased in the 5th century, we read of one pope after another being buried in coemeterio (cf. Siricius, A.D. 398, Anast.
 § 55; Anastasius A.D. 402, ib. § 56; Bonifacius, A.D. 422, ib. § 61; Coelestinus, A.D. 432, ib. § 62).
 Even of Vigilius, who died A.D. 555, long after the catacombs were disused for burial and had become nothing more than places of devotion at the tombs of the martyrs, we read (ib. § 108), "corpus . . . sepultum est . . . in coemeterio Priscilla-e" (Anast. § 108). Hadrian I. in his celebrated letter to Charlemagne on images, also makes mention of the pictures executed by Coelestinus "in coemeterio suo" (Concilia, Ed. Mansi xiii.
 p. 801). (For fuller particulars, see De Rossi, Rom. Sott. vol. i. p. 216, 217). There is an apparent exception in the case of Zosimus, A.D. 418, Sixtus III. A.D. 440, and Hilarius, A.D. 468, all of whom are stated to have been buried "ad Sanctum Laurentium in crypta" (Anast. § 59, 65, 71). But as De Rossi remarks the exception only proves the rule. For this crypt did not at this time form part of the extensive cemetery of St. Cyriacus, but was the substructure of the altar (confessio) of the Basilica erected over it by Constantine, A.D. 330, of which it formed the nucleus. The result of his investigation is thus summed up by De Rossi, u. s.: "It is manifest that the cemeteries in which during the fifth century the bodies of the popes were interred were all buildings under the open sky, and that history is in accord with the monuments in presenting no single example in that period of a burial performed according to the ancient rites in the primitive subterranean excavations."

Although the words κοιμητήριον, coemeterium, were generally applied to the whole sepulchral area, and the buildings included within it, yet instances are not wanting in which it is used of a single grave. The examples adduced by De Rossi (R. S. p. 85) are exclusively Greek. He refers to Corpus Inscr. Graec., n. 9298; 9304-6; 9310-16; 9439-40; 9450; and mentions a bi-lingual inscription from Narbonne of the year 537, in which the tomb is styled KYMETEPION.
 In Baldetti, p. 633, we have an inscription from Malta stating that the KOIMHTHPION had been purchased and restored by a Christiana named Zosima, Aringhi also (Rom. Subt. tom. i. p. 5) adduces an example of a sarcophagus bearing this designation, KOIMHTHPION TOTTO OK- TABIAAH TH IAIH ΓΥΝΑΙΚΙ ΛΑΤΔΑΚΙΕ.
 The word is of excessive rarity in the catacombs themselves. The epitaph of Sabinus (Perret V.
 III. 67), in which we read CYMETERIUM BAL- BIANAE, is perhaps the only instance known.

The Latin equivalents for κοιμητήριον most usually found were either dormitorium—e.g., VECTI IN PACE DOMINI DOMITORIUM (cf. Reines, Synonym. Inscr. Antiq. 356); or Pompeiana ma-

¹ In the Sacramentarium Eccl. Roman. the Missa de Quaveris, cap. 163, contains prayers for the souls "omnium fidelium in hac Basilica quiescentium."

CHALCEDON

trona corpus ejus de judice eruit et imposuit in dormitorio suo" (Acta S. Maximi, apud Kulnart, p. 264)—or in Africa, acochitorium (De Rossi, R. S. i. p. 86). A long list of other names by which at various epochs and in different countries, Christiana places of interment were designated may be found in Baldetti (Osservazioni, pp.
 584-586).

(Uingham, Orig. Eccl. bk. viii. ch. 8-10, bk. xxiii. ch. 1-2); Baldetti, Osservazioni sopra i Cineterii; Bottari, Sculture e pitture antiche; Bosio, Roma Sotterranea; Aringhi, Roma Sotter- ranea; Panvinus, De Ritu Sepeliendi; Anastasius, De Vita Rom. Pontif.; Raouli-Rochette, Tableau des Catacombes; De Rossi, Roma Sotter- ranea; Nestle and Brownlow, Roma Sotter- ranea. [E. V.]

CE (SER. [THURSDAY.]

CELESTINIUS, bishop and confessor at Auxerre (about A.D. 500, is commemorated June 10 (Mart. Usuard). [C.]

CEREA: S. (1) Martyr at Rome under Hadrian, is commemorated June 10 (Mart. Rom.
Vet., Usuard). [C.]

(2) Soldier, martyr at Rome under Decius, Sept. 14 (Mart. Usuard). [C.]

CEREMONIALE A book containing directions or rubrics for the due performance of certain ceremonies. The more ancient term for such a book is ORDO, which see. [C.]

CERREUS. [TAPER.]

CERREUS PASCIALIS. [MAUNDY

THURSDAY.]

CHAIR. [CATHEDRA; THRONE.]

CHALCEDON (COUNCILS OF). (1) A.D.
 453, better known as "the Synod of the Oak"—a name given to a suburb there—at which St.
 Chrysostom was deposed. To appreciate its proceedings, we should remember that St. John Chrysostom had been appointed to the see of Constantinople five years before, and that Theophilus, bishop of Alexandria, had been summoned thither by the emperor Arcadius to ordain him.
 Theophilus had a presbyter of his own whom he would have preferred, named Isidore, so that in one sense he consecrated St. Chrysostom under constraint. It was against the 2nd of the Con-stantinopolitan canons likewise for him to have consecrated at all out of his own diocese: but in another sense he was probably not loth to make St. Chrysostom beholden to him, and be possessed of a pretext himself for interfering in a way threatening to eclipse his own, where he could do so with effect. Hence the part played by him at the Synod of the Oak, over which he preside, and in which no less than 12 sessions were occupied on charges brought against St. Chrysostom himself, and a 13th on charges brought against Heraclides, bishop of Ephesus, who had been ordained by him (Mansi III. 1141-54). The number of charges alleged against St. Chrysostom was 29 at one time and 18 at another. When cited to appear and reply to them, his answer was: "Remove my avowed enemies from your list of judges, and I am ready to appear and make my defence, should any person bring aught against me; otherwise you may send as often as you will for me, but you will get no further."
 And the first of those whom he reckoned as such made by Ulpian to the habit of Digest. lib. xviii. tit. xii. § 3).

was Theophilus. One of the charges against him was some unworthy language that he had used to St. Epiphanius, lately deceased, who had supported Theodosius in condemning the originalists, regarded by St. Chrysostom with more favour. The others refer to his conduct in his own church, or towards his own clergy. The synod ended by deposing St. Chrysostom, having cited him four times to no purpose; when he was immediately expelled the city by the emperor, and withdrew into Bithynia, to be very shortly recalled.

(2) The 4th general—held its first session, October 8, A.D. 451, in the church of St. Euphemia—for the architectural arrangements of which see Evagrius (ii. 3)—having been convened by the emperor Marcian shortly after his elevation. In his circular to the bishops (Mansi, vi. 551-4) he bids them come to Nicaea—the place chosen by him originally—to settle “some questions that he says have arisen apparently respecting the orthodox faith, and been also shown him in a letter from the archbishop of Rome.” But in reality St. Leo had urged a very different course. In his 1st epistle to the late emperor he had indeed petitioned that a council might be held in Italy, should a council be required at all (ib. 83-5); and when Marcian applied to him “to authorise” the council about to be held (ib. 93-4), his reply was that he would rather it were postponed till the times were more favourable (ib. 114-5). It was only when he found his advice unheeded that he decided on sending representatives thither (ib. 126-9), and then on the solemn understanding that there should be no resettlement attempted of the Nicene faith. Even so, he reminds the empress (ib. 138-9) that his demand had been for a council in Italy; and tells the council expressly that his representatives are to preside there, custom forbidding his own presence (ib. 131-5). His representatives, on their part, warn the emperor that unless he is present in person they cannot attend (ib. 557-8). Hence, to facilitate this arrangement, the council is transferred to Chalcedon. Bishops to the number of 360 attended, in some cases by deputy, the 1st action, and 19 of the highest lay dignitaries represented the emperor. Usually 630 bishops are said to have been at the council sooner or later (Bever, ii. 107). It might have been supposed this total had been gained originally by placing the 6 before, instead of after, the 3: still there are 470 episcopal subscriptions to the 6th action, and members of the council themselves spoke of it as one of 600 bishops (Mansi, vii. 57, and the note).

As to their places in church, the lay dignitaries occupied the centre, in front of the altar-screen; and one of the most remarkable traits of this council is their control of its proceedings all through. On their left were the legates from Rome, and next to them Anatolius of Constantinople, Maximus of Antioch, Thalassius of Caesarea, Stephen of Ephesus, and other Easterns. On their right were Dioscorus of Alexandria, Juvenal of Jerusalem, and the bishops of Egypt, Illyria, and Palestine generally. On the motion of Pascasinus, the first legate, Dioscorus was ordered by the magistrates to quit the seat occupied by him in the council, and to take his place in the midst where the accused sat. The charges alleged against him by the legates were that he had held a council and sat as judge, without permission of the apostolic see. Eusebius of Dorylaeum, sitting in the midst as his accuser, complained of the iniquitous sentence passed upon Flavian and himself at the council of Ephesus (see the art. on this) two years before. Dioscorus begged its acts might be read. This was done: but meanwhile Theodoret, bishop of Cyrrus, who had been deposed there, having since been restored by St. Leo, and invited to this council by the emperor, entered and took his seat, amidst vehement protests from the bishops on the right. After the acts of the “Robbers’ Meeting” had been read, which included those of the two synods of Constantinople preceding it, all agreed that Dioscorus, Juvenal, Thalassius, and three more, who had been most forward in deposing Eusebius and Flavian, deserved to be deposed themselves. The rest might be pardoned, as having acted in ignorance or under coercion.

Action or session 2 followed, October 10. The judges or lay dignitaries proposing that the faith should be set forth in its integrity, the bishops replied that they were limited to the creed of Nicaea, confirmed at Ephesus, and interpreted by the letters of SS. Cyril and Leo more particularly. On this it was recited by command of the judges, from a book by Eusebius, bishop of Nicomedia, amidst shouts of adhesion. And immediately after, without a word more, by order of the same judges, Actius or Atticus, deacon or archdeacon of the church of Constantinople, recited from a book what purported to be the creed of the 150 fathers, that is, of the 2nd general council, on which some remarks have been made elsewhere. [CONC. CONST. AND ANTIOCH.] But the abruptness of its introduction here merits attention, especially when viewed in connection with a short scene in the 1st action (Mansi, vi. 631-2). Diogenes, bishop of Cyzicus, there remarked that Eutyches had dealt fraudulently in professing his faith in the words of the creed of Nicaea, as it stood originally; for it had received additions from the holy fathers since then, owing to the false teaching of Apollinarius, Valentinus, Macedonius, and their followers; two such being “from heaven” after “descended,” and “by the Holy Ghost of the Virgin Mary” after “incarnate.” This is the first clear reference to the new clauses of the Constantinopolitan creed in this or any other council extant. And it is to be observed that even the creed of Nicaea, quoted in the definition, contains them. But Diogenes had hardly finished his sentence, when the Egyptian bishops exclaimed, “nobody will bear of any additions or subtractions either: let what passed at Nicaea stand as it is.” Dioscorus had urged this all along. Thus advantage was promptly taken of his condemnation to promulgate this creed in the same breath with that of Nicaea, while the account given of the additions occurring in it by Diogenes is such as to connect it at once with those synods of Apollinarius and Rome, at which the errors of Apollinarius and Macedonius were condemned. Its recital was followed by the same shouts of adhesion as, in older form, which is the more remarkable, to that time, stress had been laid exclusively, both here and at the synods rehearsed in the first action, on the creed of Nicaea, confirmed at Ephesus, with this thing that I After this, that had been council under Leo to Flavian prevented at Greek trash called in que Palestine; but similar expressions accepted. Final deliberation.

At the 3 two days in nitaries were having brought, fresh also, by two church, and after having deposed—the delivering the order assenti disposition were Nestorius. I sal empress them with it.

Action 4 f (see Mansi, v true to the minutes of t out, to the m at the 3rd.

to declare w respecting the anouncing the Ephesus to h not expounded to Flavian.

Juvenal, Thal thins, the five been classed at in the co alteration of who objected had elected a ad archiman per were ne mas the St Flavian. The Dioscorus sho canons of An it numbered and they wer whether to su Lastly, Photi the rights of Berytus, who polis by the and the judg tress them canons, and constitutions.

On the 5th the judges cal had been def read it gave Easterns, as r The former t they might; he said a syno ant as judge, without ilic see. Eusebius of amidst as his accuser, sentence passed self at the council of (his) two years before might be read. This e Theodoret, bishop of sed these, having since ), and invited to this entered and took his otests from the bishops acts of the "Robbers' ), which included those tantinople preceding it, us, Juvenal, Thalassius, been most forward in Flavian, deserved to be rest might be par in ignorance or under followed, October 10.

 aries proposing that the orth in its integrity, they were limited to the ed at Ephesus, and in s of SS. Cyril and Leo this it was recited by
 , from a book by Euseelia, amidst shouts of lately utter, without a the same judges, Actia chdeacon of the church ted from a book what eed of the 150 fathers, neral council, on which been made elsewhere. ooch.] But the abruply here merits attention, l in connection with a ction (Mansi, vi. 631-2). eus, then remarked that audently in professing of the creed of Nicaea, as it had received additions since then, owing to the arius, Valentinus, Maceowners; two such being descended," and "by the rgin Mary" after "in-first clear reference to the antinianopolitan creed in il extant. And it is to be e creed of Nicaea, quoted ins them. But Diogenes his sentence, when the aimed, "nobody will hear tractions either: let what as it is." Dioscorus had g. Thus advantage was condemnation to promulgate breath with that of ont given of the additions Diogenes is such as to connect e synods of Antioch and errors of Apollinarius and sdenmed. Its recital was sbouts of adhesion as, up e more remarkable as, up had been laid exclusively, e synods rehearsed in the eed of Nicaea, confirmed at Ephesus, without the slightest reference to anything that had ever passed at Constantinople.

 After this, the two letters of St. Cyril were read that had been heard already from the acts of the council under Flavian, and then the letter of St.
 Leo to Flavian—the reading of which had been preented at the "Robbers' Meeting"—in a Greek translation. Three passages in it were called in question by the bishops of Illyria and Palestine; but Aetius and Theodoret producing similar expressions from St. Cyril, they were accepted. Five days were allowed for further deliberation.

At the 3rd action, however, October 13, two days in advance from which the lay dignitaries were absent, Eusebius of Dorylneum having brought another indictment against Dioscorus, fresh charges were produced against him also by two deacons and one layman of his own church, and he not appearing to meet them, after having been twice summoned, was formally deposed—the Roman legates, by general consent, delivering their judgment first, and the rest in order assenting to it—but the sentence of his deposition was framed on the model of that of Nestorius. Letters were written to the emperor and empress and to his own clergy, acquainting them with it.

Action 4 followed, October 17, or rather 15 (see Mansi, vii. 83), when the judges appeared true to their engagement. By their order minutes of the 1st and 2nd actions were read out, to the marked exclusion of what had passed at the 3rd. They then called upon the bishops to declare what had been decided by them respecting the faith. The legates replied by pronouncing the faith of Nicaea, Constantinople, and Ephesus to have been embraced by the council and expounded faithfully by St. Leo in his epistle to Flavian. To this, all present assented; and Juvenal, Thalassius, Eusebius, Basil, and Eusta-thius, the five bishops who had, in the 1st action, been classed with Dioscorus, were permitted to sit in the council on subscribing to it. Consideration of a petition from 13 Egyptian bishops who objected to do so was adjourned till they had elected a new archbishop. Eighteen priests and archimandrites who had petitioned the emperor were next heard. Among them was Bartholomaeus the Syrian, accused of having murdered Flavian. The burden of their petition was that Dioscorus should be restored. The 4th and 5th canons of Antioch were quoted from a book—in it numbered as canons 83 and 4—against them, and they were allowed 30 days for consideration whether to submit to the council or be deposed.
 Lastly, Photius of Tyre was heard in behalf of the rights of his church against Eustathius of Berytus, whose city had been created a metropolis by the late emperor. The council ruled, and the judges concurred, that the question between them should be settled according to the canons, and not prejudiced by any pragmatial constitutions of the empire.

On the 5th action, commencing October 22, the judges called on the bishops to produce what had been defined by them on the faith. When read it gave offence to the legates and some few Easterns, as not including the letter of St. Leo.
 The former threatened to leave, and were told they might; but on reference to the emperor, he said a synod should be held in the West, if they could not agree. A committee was therefore formed of the principal bishops, and at length the definition appeared with the creeds of Nicaea and Constantinople following in succession, but authorised equally, in the first part of it; and in the second, the synodical letters of St. Cyril to Nestorius and to the Easterns, and the letter of St. Leo to Flavian, as their received exponents on the mystery of the Incarnation.

 On the doctrine of the Trinity, those creeds, it was particularly said, required no further explanation; nor was any other faith to be taught, or creed proposed for acceptance, to converts from what heresy soever, under pain of deposition in the case of the clergy and excommunication in that of the laity.

At the 5th action, October 25, all subscribed to this definition—the Roman legates attesting merely that they subscribed, the rest that they defined as well. This was done in the presence of the emperor Marcian, the empress Pulcheria, and a splendid suite; the emperor telling them in a short address that he had come thither, like Constantine, to confirm what they had done, not to display his power. After which, he approved of their definition, and announced his intention of punishing all who contravened it, according to their station. At his instance three rules were made; one for making monks more dependent upon bishops, and two more forbidding the clergy to undertake secular posts, or migrate from the church to which they belonged. And here the council, doctrinally speaking, ends.

The other actions, to the 14th inclusively, related to matters between one bishop and another, and occupied the rest of October. At action 7 sanction was given to a territorial arrangement between the bishops of Antioch and Jerusalem, by which the former was in future to have jurisdiction over the two provinces of Phoenicia and that of Arabia—the latter over the three called Palestine. At the 8th action Theodoret, who had already subscribed to the definition with the rest, was called upon to anathematise Nestorius, which he did, including Eutyches, and three more bishops similarly called upon did the same.
 The 9th and 10th actions passed in enquiring into what had been decided at the synods of Tyre and Berytus respecting Ibas, bishop of Edessa, three years before. Their acts having been rehearsed, and the sentence passed upon him at the "Robbers' Meeting" summarily cancelled, he was declared orthodox on anathematising Nestorius and Eutyches, and restored to his see. Yet, inconsistently enough, in another case, that of Domnus of Antioch, the judgment of the "Robbers' Meeting" was allowed to stand, his successor, Maximus, having been consecrated by Anatolius of Constantinople, recognised by St.
 Leo, and received at this council. Domnus, whose piety was admitted by all, was adjudged a pension out of the revenues of the see in which he had been uncanonically superseded. The Greek account of this proceeding indeed has been lost, but two of the Latin versions containing it purport to have been made from the Greek (Mansi, vii. 177-8, 269-72, and 771-4). Actions 11 and 12 were taken up in hearing a contention between Bassianus and Stephen for the see of Ephesus, as bishop of which, Stephen had hitherto sat and voted at this council. Neither had been canonically ordained in the judgment of the council, so that a fresh election had to be made, but both were allowed their rank and ordered a pension of 200 aurei respectively out of the revenues of that see. In the former of these actions, the 16th and 17th canons of Antioch were read out of a book by Leontius, bishop of Magnesia, numbered as 95th and 96th, and applied to their case. At the 13th action Eunomius, bishop of Nicomedia, complained that the privileges of his church had been infringed by the bishop of Nicaea. Imperial constitutions were quoted on both sides, which, according to the judges themselves, had nothing at all to do with the rights of bishops: and the 4th Nicene canon which Eunomius read out of a book as the 6th, settled the question in his favour. The insertion of a salvo to the see of Constantinople, proposed by its archdeacon, was negatived by the judges, who said that its rights of ordaining in the provinces would be declared in their proper order. At the 14th action, Athanasius and Sabinianus, who had each sat and subscribed as bishop of Perrhe, submitted their respective claims—the former adducing two letters in his favour from SS. Cyril and Proclus, the latter the acts of the synod of Antioch under Domnus, deposing his rival, and the fact of the "Robbers' Meeting" having restored him. For the judgment of the council, see Concil. Hierap. A.D. 445.

What is printed as the 15th action, without date or preface, would seem to be, strictly speaking, a mere continuation of the 10th action by the hierarchy for framing canons after the judges had retired. This would follow from what is said to have passed in the 16th action, October 28—at least, if this date is correct. There the legates complained to the judges of what had been done yesterday, after the latter had retired, and subsequently to their own withdrawal also. Now, October 27 had been the day of the 10th action, and the 11th action was not till October 29. Consequently there was just the interval required for them to have complained on October 28, and had the canon to which they objected read out publicly. Thus, when Ibas had been acquitted, the judges withdrew, and the bishops, probably not expecting any more business, remained to make canons. Twenty-seven in all, including those previously recommended by the emperor, were drawn up, and, according to one of the oldest Latin versions extant, were subscribed to by all, not excepting the legates (Mansi, vii. 400-8). After the legates had retired, the Eastern bishops again remained, and agreed to three more, making a total of 30; but to the last three the legates had not been parties, and equally declined subscribing the day after (Mansi, ib. 429-54). As Beveridge remarks, they are omitted as well by John Scholasticus as by Dionysius Exiguus (ii. 124), nor have they ever been received in the West.

Only the 28th, however, demands any notice. Those who were most interested in it said in their defence that they had asked the legates to take part in framing it, and they had replied that they were without instructions. The judges, on the other hand, had bade them refer it to the council. And doubtless it was as much a question for the council as those which had been settled in the 7th and 13th actions. In one sense it merely renewed the 3rd canon of Constantinople, A.D. 381, conferring honorary precedence (προσβία, throughout—erroneously rendered by the Latinus in each case "primatum"); upon the bishop of that city next after Rome, and for the same reason as had there been given. And if, in addition, it gave the bishop of that city the right of ordaining metropolitans in the dioceses of Asia, Pontus, and Thrace, still this was afterwards proved to have been done with the full consent of the bishops of those dioceses. And so we are brought to what really passed at the 16th action, opening abruptly with a speech of the legate Lucentius (Mansi, vii. 441), as reported in the Greek version. Here both sides were called upon by the judges to produce the canons on which they relied; and the legates, in quoting the 6th of Nicaea, substituted for the first clause of it, "Quoi ecclesia Romana semper habuit primatum." No protest was actually made to these words, but it was cited in its genuine form afterwards by the Constantinopolitan archdeacon. And as for the 3rd of Constantinople, Eusebius of Dorylaeum testified to having read it himself at Rome to the Pope, and to his having received it (p. 449). The judges at last having delivered their opinion that the primacy before all, and chiefest honour, according to the canons, should be preserved to the archbishop of elder Rome, but that the archbishop of Constantinople ought to have the honour and power assigned him in this canon, it was accepted by all present, in spite of the legates, who had previously desired to have their protest recorded against what had been passed in their absence, for this 2nd speech of Lucentius clearly followed the reading out of the canon, October 28. Afterwards it was denounced in a series of epistles by St. Leo, who nevertheless, neither by his legates, nor in his own name, seems ever to have objected to the 9th and 17th canons of this council, authorising appeals to the see of Constantinople far more fully than the Sardican canons ever had Rome (Bever. ii. 115-6). Yet these form part of the 27 subscribed to by all, including the legates, and received in the West. No others among them, save the first, are worth noticing; but these, perhaps, have never been sufficiently noticed. By the first it is decreed that "the canons of the Holy Fathers, made in every synod to this present time, be in full force"—in other words, the collection of canons published by Beveridge, Justellus, and others, as the "code of the universal Church," is ordered to become law (Bever. ii. 108; Cave, Hist. Lit. i. 486-7). It only remains to observe that Evagrius attributes no more than 14 actions to this council (ii. 18), and seems to say that most of the canons were framed at the 7th. Other accounts, that of Liberatus, for instance (Brev. l. 13), vary from his. Before separating, the bishops addressed the emperor in vindication of their definition, and the Pope in vindication of their 28th canon (Mansi, vii. 455-74 and vi. 147-61), telling St. Leo that he had interpreted the faith of Peter to them in his epistle, and presided over their deliberations in the person of his legates, as the head over the members. The Pope was deaf to all argument on the subject of the canon, while setting his seal to their definition. In one of his letters to Anatolius (Mansi, vi. 263) he goes so far as to say that the 3rd canon of Constantinople had never been notified to the apostolic see, though Eusebius of Dorylaeum had testified received perhaps, creed of Constantine received and index atque prola Leon. In was his one time definition Edicts ordering and fort points se peror, c Meeting; the titles Gangra I nvertibhel mirers, in Encyclius addressed. on his acc counter- 735-98).

CHAL

CHAL

CHALCEDONIAN MAN, KET which the of the H communicatio are sever comm in which arial, in nunciant Vessels required tant of th obvisio th such mus seem possi to be dist next from hips the mark by poses was use, is the 10; "Si calice deju tiani sacra moechia n

It seems Eucharist and locali the distin each purp afterwards the earlies tion of the eucha table.

The are "calix" a cular.

offering honorary pre-shout—erroneously renuch case "primum") city next after Rome, as had there been given.
 ave the bishop of that g metropolitans in the and Thrace, still this o have been done with bishops of those dioceses. o what really passed at abruptly with a speech of asi, vii. 441), as reported Here both sides were s to produce the canons d the legates, in quoting ed for the first clause Romana semper habit s was actually made to ited in its genuine form in Constantinople archdeacon.
 Constantinople, Eusebius o having read it himself l to his having received at just having delivered primacy before all, and ng to the canons, should bishop of elder Rome, but Constantinople ought to wer assigned him in this y all present, in spite of eviously desired to have gainst what had been
 , for this 2nd speech of ed the reading out of the erwards it was denounced y St. Leo, who neverthees, nor in his own name, eted to the 9th and 17th uthorising appeals to the far more fully than the ad to Rome (Bever. ii. a part of the 27 subscribed e legates, and received in omg them, save the first, but these, perhaps, have noticed. By the first it ons of the Holy Fathers, o this present time, he in words, the collection of Beveridge, Justellus, and "the universal Church," is w (Bever. ii. 108; Cave, It only remains to observe es no more than 14 actions ), and seems to say that were framed at the 7th of Liberatus, for instance m his. Before separating, the emperor in vindication d the Pope in vindication (Mansi, vii. 455-74 and vi. ew that he had interpreted them in his epistle, and lliberations in the person of d over the members. The argument on the subject of g his seal to their defunctio. o Anantolus (Mansi, vi. 203) say that the 3rd canon of never been notified to the Eusebius of Dorylaeum had testified at the council to his having publicly received it himself. In the same spirit it is, perhaps, too, that he never once mentions the creed of the 150 fathers; in other words, that of Constantinople, by name, though he must have received it with the definition of this council: and indeed he said of it latterly, "tam plenis atque perfectis definitionibus cuncta firmata sunt, ut nihil et regulae quae ex divina inspiratione prolata est, aut addi possit nisi minui" (Ep. ad Leon. Imp., Mansi, vi. 308). Such, however, was his zeal against the canon that he was at one time thought not to have approved of the definition.

Edicts in succession issued from the emperor, ordering all persons to submit to the council, and forbidding all further discussion of the points settled by it. The law of the late emperor, confirming the acts of the "Robbers' Meeting," was reopened; Eutyches deprived of the title of priest; and Dioscorus exiled to Gangra in Paphlagonia. Great opposition was nevertheless made to its reception by their admirers, in Egypt especially, to which the "Codex Encyclicus," or collection of letters in its favour, addressed for the most part to the emperor Leo, on his accession, A.D. 458, was intended to be a counter-demonstration (Mansi, vii. 475-627 and 755-98).

[E. S. F.]

CHALDAEI. [ASTROLOGERS.]

CHALICE. (Latin, calix; Greek, ποτήριον, πόταλον; French, calice; Italian, calice; German, Kelch; Anglo-Saxon, calic.) The cup in which the wine is consecrated at the celebration of the Holy Communion, and from which the communicants drink. Chalices have been divided into several classes, of which the more important are—offertorial, in which the wine brought by the communicants was received; communional, in which the wine was consecrated; and ministerial, in which it was administered to the communicants.

Vessels of this description being indispensably required for the celebration of the most important of the rites of the Christian religion it is obvious that from the very earliest period some such must have been in use, but it does not seem possible to determine how soon they began to be distinguished by form, material, or ornament from the cups used in ordinary life. Perhaps the earliest notice which we have of any mark by which a cup used for eucharistic purposes was distinguished from those in ordinary use, is the passage in Tertullian (De Pudic. c.
 10): "Si forte patrociniabitur pastor, quem in calice depingis, prostitutorem et ipsum Christianum sacramenti, merito et ebrietatis idolum et moechiae asylum post calicem subsequetur."

It seems indeed quite possible that at that early period when the administration of the Eucharist was connected both as regards time and locality with the feasts of charity (agapae) the distinction between the vessels used for each purpose was less strongly drawn than afterwards came to be the case, and that in the earliest centuries there was little or no distinction of either form or decoration between the eucharistic cup and that of the domestic table.

The eventually exclusive adoption of the word "calix," as signifying the eucharistic cup, may CHURCH, ANT.

perhaps be deemed to imply that the form of cup most generally employed in the celebration of the Communion, was that specifically called "calix." This word is held usually to denote a cup with a somewhat shallow bowl, two handles and a foot. Vases of various forms are often depicted on the walls or vaults of the catacombs, but it is generally uncertain how far these are merely ornaments, and it would not appear that in any one instance a representation of what can with certainty be assumed to be a eucharistic chalice has been observed among these paintings.
 It would at first sight appear extremely probable that among these numerous representations of vases, some at least should be intended to represent that which was above all precious to those for whom these decorations were executed, but the paintings of the earlier period are with hardly an exception allegorical or symbolical, scarcely ever in a primary sense historical, and never liturgical, unless the allusions to the sacraments conveyed by figures of fishes, baskets of bread, and the like deserve to be so called.

Vase from Sarcophagus at Bordeaux.

It has been supposed by some, Boldetti (Osservazioni sopra i Cimiteri dei SS. Martiri) among others, that the glass vessels decorated with gold leaf, the bottoms of which have been found in considerable numbers in the catacombs attached to the plaster by which the tiles closing the loculi were fixed, were, if not actually challices, at least drinking-vessels in which the com-

Vase from the Sarcophagus of Anisiphus at Milan.

municants received the consecrated wine, and from which they drank. Padre Garrucci (Vetri Ornati d' Oro, Pref. xi) has however shown that this opinion does not rest on any secure foundation. It has also been thought that the figures of vases so often found incised on early Christian memorial stones were intended to represent chalices, and thereby to indicate that the deceased person was a priest. Though this may possibly have sometimes been the case, other and more probable explanations of the occurrence of these figures of vases may be suggested; but there is a marked similarity between the type of vase usually employed and the forms of the earliest chalices of which we have any positive knowledge.

The woodcut represents one of these vases as shown in low relief on the sarcophagus in the chapel of St. Aquilinus attached to the church of S. Lorenzo at Milan, which is supposed to have contained the remains of Ataulphus king of the Goths (c. A.D. 415), or of his wife Placidia.

The earliest chalice still existing is probably that found with a paten at Gourdon in France, Chalice found at Gourdon.

and now preserved in the Bibliothèque Impériale in Paris. This is represented in the annexed woodcut, and is of gold ornamented with thin lines of garnets. With it were found 104 gold coins of Emperors of the East, 25 of which of Justin I. (518-527) being in a fresh and unworn condition and the latest in date of the entire hoard, it is reasonable to conclude that the deposit was made in the earlier part of the 6th century.

Of not much later date were the splendid chalices belonging to the basilica of Monza, no longer in existence, but of which representations, evidently tolerably accurate, have been preserved in a large painting probably executed in the latter half of the 15th century, and now in the library of that church. This painting represents the restitution to the basilica of the contents of its treasury which took place in 1345. These chalices are represented in the accompanying woodcuts, both were of gold set with jewels; their weight is variously stated at from 105 to 170 ounces. These there is ground to believe, were in the possession of the church of Monza before the year 600, and may indeed with great probability be supposed to be of even greater age. A rude sculpture over the west doorway of that church, believed to date from circa A.D. 600, represents several chalices of various sizes, some with and some without handles.

Chalice from Monza.

Chalices of glass of very similar form are met with, and may with much probability be attributed to the 6th or 7th centuries; two examples are in the British Museum; these are of blue glass and somewhat roughly made. As, however, these bear neither inscriptions nor any Christian symbol, it cannot be affirmed with certainty that they were sacramental chalices. Moroni (Descrizione di Edizione Storico-Ecclesiastica) mentions a chalice of blue glass as being preserved in the church of the Isola S. Giulio in the lake of Orta in Lombardy, as a relic of the saint who lived in the 5th century; this, he says, was without a foot. It is not now to be found there.

In the church of the church of Sta. Annetasia at Roncole a chalice is preserved as a relic, as it is said to have been used by St. Jerome; the bowl is of white opaque glass with some ornament in relief, the foot is of metal.

A chalice is preserved (at Maastricht), which is believed to have belonged to St. Lambert, bishop of that city (ob. 708); it is of metal, (? silver) gilt, the bowl hemispherical, the foot a frustum of a cone; the whole without ornament.

A chalice of exactly the same form is to be seen in an illumination in the very ancient gospels preserved in the library of Corpus Christi College at Cambridge, and known as St. Augustine's.

Chalice formerly at Chelles.

Until the year 1792 the abbey of Chelles, in the diocese of Paris, possessed a most splendid example of ancient work of date from Fortunatus and the allegorical transition somewhat in the bowl ten inches of a French

A single chalice was Culbert year 1100 in its lion, the lion Bull. 2 was not presented. Of the able exam minister in woodcut) or incrustation that it was it is probable when that Great.

One of the brogio at M example of of the 9th handles.

So much examples, or also be collected and weight of they were church of Monza before ced with great proba-even greater age. A west doorway of that from circa A.D. 600, of various sizes, some inlaid.

Similar forms are met with probability be attributed; two examples; these are of blue metal. As, however, found nor any Christ-ianity with certainty that chalice. Moroni (Di- Ecclesiast.) mentions a being preserved in the in the lake of Orta of the saint who lived in the 5th century, as he says, was without a foot.

Church of Sta. Anastasia served as a relic, as it is by St. Jerome; the bowl with some ornament in it.

(? at Maastricht), which belonged to St. Lambert, c. 708; it is of metal, hemispherical, the foot the whole without orna-the same form is to be found in the very ancient library of Corpus Christi and known as St. Au-formerly as Challes.

at the abbey of Challes, in possessed a most splendid

CHALICE

example of a golden chalice (see woodcut), which ancient inventories asserted to have been the work of St. Eligius (or Eloi), and therefore to date from the first half of the 7th century.
Fortunately an engraving of it has been preserved in the Panoplia Sacerdotalis of Du Saussay, and the character of the work corresponds with the alleged date. It is obviously an instance of transition from earlier to later forms, though somewhat exceptional from the great depth of the bowl. It was about a foot high and nearly ten inches in diameter, and held about the half of a French litre.

A singular exception in point of form was the chalice which was found with the body of St.
Cuthbert when his relics were examined in the year 1104; this is described as of small size and in its lower part of gold and of the figure of a lion, the bowl which was attached to the back of the lion being cut from an onyx (Act. Sanct.
Brit. 2 Mart.). It may be surmised that this was not really made for a chalice, but had been presented to him and converted to that use.

Of the next century, the 8th, a very remarkable example still exists in the convent of Krem-Chalice at Kremsmünster. minster in Upper Austria; this chalice is (vide woodcut) of bronze ornamented with niello and incrustations of silver. As the inscription shows that it was the gift of Tassilo, Duke of Bavaria, it is probably earlier than A.D. 788, the year when that prince was deposed by Charles the Great.

One of the bas-reliefs of the altar of S. Am-brogio at Milan (finished in 835) gives a good example of the form of a chalice in the beginning of the 9th century. It has a bowl, foot, and handle.

So much may be gathered from still existing examples, or representations of them; much may also be collected, especially as regards the size and weight of chalices and the materials of which they were composed, from the notices to be found in various historical documents, and particularly in the Liber Pontificalis.

CHALICE

339

It has been asserted that in the apostolic age chalices of wood were in use; but for this assertion there is no early authority; St. Boniface indeed is reported in the 18th canon of the Council of Tribur to have said that once golden priests used wooden chalices, and Platina (De Vit. Pont.) asserts that Pope Zephyrinus (A.D. 197-217) ordered that the wine should be consecrated not as heretofore in a wooden but in a glass vessel.
The Liber Pontificalis in the life of Zephyrinus, however, merely says that he ordered patens of glass to be carried before the priests when mass was to be celebrated by the bishop. Glass was no doubt in use from a very early date; St.
Jerome (ad Rustic. Mon. Ep. 4) writes of Exu-perius, bishop of Toulouse, as bearing the Lord's blood in a vessel of glass, and St. Gregory (Dialog. lib. i. c. 7) says that St. Donatus, bishop of Arezzo, repaired by prayer a chalice of glass broken by the heathens. The use of wood for chalices was prohibited by several provincial councils in the 8th and 9th centuries (Conc.
Tribur. can. 18), of horn by that of Celchythe (Conc. Calcut. can. 10), and Pope Leo IV. (847-855) in his homily, De Cura Postorali, lays down the rule that no one should celebrate mass in a chalice of wood, lead, or glass. Glass, however, continued to be occasionally used to a much later date. Martene (De Antiq. Eccl. Rit. t. iv. p. 78) shows from the life of St. Winocus that in the 10th century the monks of the convent in Flanders founded by him still used chalices of glass. Pewter was also in use, and it would seem was considered as a material superior to glass, for we are told of St. Benedict of Aniane (ob. 821) that the vessels of his church were at first of wood, then of glass, and that at last he ascended to pewter (see his Life, by Ardo, c. 14, in Mabillon's Act. SS. ord.
S. Benedicti, Sæc. iv.).

A chalice of glass mounted in gold is mentioned in the will of Count Everhard, A.D. 837 (Miræus, Op. Dip. t. i. p. 19). A chalice of ivory and one of cocoon-nut (?) (de nucæ) set with gold and silver are mentioned in the same document; these however may have been drinking-cups, not sacramental chalices.

The use of bronze appears to have been exceptional and perhaps peculiar to the Irish monks.
St. Gall (Mabillon's Act. SS. ord. S. Ben. Sæc. 2, p. 241), we are told, refused to use silver vessels for the altar, saying that St. Columbanus was accustomed to offer the sacrifice in vessels of bronze (acrels), alleging as a reason for so doing that our Saviour was affixed to the cross by brazen nails. This traditional use of bronze was no doubt continued by the successors of the Irish missionaries in the South of Germany, and explains why the Kremsmünster chalice is of that material, a circumstance which has caused the question to be raised whether that vessel was anything but a mere drinking cup. The use of niello and of damascening with thin silver in the decoration of this vessel, and the peculiar patterns of its ornamentation, connect it closely with the Irish school of artificers, who were in the habit of employing bronze as the main material of their works.

The precious metals were however from a very early, perhaps the earliest, period most probably the usual material of the chalice. The earliest converts to Christianity were not by any means exclusively of humble station, and it was not until it spread from cities into remote villages that many churches would have existed whose members could not afford a silver chalice: nor do we until a later age find traces of a spirit of asceticism which would prefer the use of a mean material. We have at least proof of the use of both gold and silver in the sacred vessels in the beginning of the 4th century, for we are told by Optatus of Milevi that in the Diocletianian persecution the church of Carthage possessed many "ornamenta" of gold and silver (Opt. Mil. De schism. Donat. i. 17). The church of Ciria in Numidia at the same time possessed two golden and six silver chalices (Acta Purgat. Caccitoni, in the Works of Optatus). That it was believed that the churches possessed such rich ornaments at an earlier period is shown by the language which Prudentius puts into the mouth of the Prefectus Urbis interrogating St. Lawrence—

"Argutea serpens ferant, Lumare sacrum sanguinem," &c.
(Peristeph. Hyann III. 69).

The passages in the Lib. Pont. which relate the gifts of Constantine to various churches are with reason suspected as untrustworthy, but are at least of value as recording the traditions existing at an early age. They make mention of many chalices, some of gold, some of silver; 40 lesser chalices of gold, each weighing 1 lb., and 50 lesser ministerial chalices of silver, each weighing 2 lbs., are said to have been given to the Constantinian Basilica (St. John Lat.), and in lesser numbers and of very various weights to many other churches. Whatever, however, may be the historical value of these passages, that churches in the 4th and 5th centuries possessed great numbers of golden or silver chalices, cannot be doubted. Gregory of Tours (Hist. Franc. I. iii. c. x.) tells us that Childebert in the year 531 took among the spoils of Amalariac sixty chalices of gold. Many instances of gifts of chalices of the precious metals to the churches of Rome by successive popes are to be found in the Lib. Pont. Of these the following may deserve special mention: a great chalice (calix major) with handles and adorned with gems, weighing 58 lbs.; a great chalice with a siphon (cum siphone) or tube, weighing 36 lbs.; a covered (sphoclostus, i. e. ἐπαβάκλειστος) chalice of gold, weighing 32 lbs.; all three given by Pope Leo III. (795).

Little is to be found as to the decoration of chalices; occasionally they bore inscriptions, as in the case of that made by order of St. Remigius (Remi, ob. 533), which Frodoard tells us bore the following verses:—

"Haurit hinc populus vitam de sanguine sacro, Injeto ac ratum quem fides habere Christus, Remigius reddidit dominum et sua sacerdos."

The golden chalices of Monza, it will be seen by the woodcuts, were splendidly adorned with gems, which in the painting from which these figures have been drawn, are coloured green and red, but the only symbol betokening their destination is the cruciform arrangement of the larger gems on one of them. The chalice found at Gourdon also has neither inscription nor Christian symbol, and if it had not been found in company with a paten bearing a cross its destination might have been a matter of doubt.

On the chalice of Kramsbrunn are on the bowl half-length figures of Christ and the four Evangelists, on the foot like figures of four prophets.

The division of chalices into various classes evidently belongs to a period when primitive simplicity of ritual underwent a change to a more complex and elaborate system. The earlier Ordo Romanus speaks of a "calix quotidianus" and opposes to this the "calix major" to be used on feast-days ("dignus vero festis calicem et patenam majores"), but says nothing of any distinction between the "calix sanctus" and the "calix ministerialis." Reasons of convenience no doubt caused the use of chalices of very different sizes. The great number of chalices of small size mentioned in the Lib. Pontif. and elsewhere may lead to the supposition that at one period the communicants drank not from one but from many chalices; but this matter is involved in doubt.

A practice existed of communicating the clergy alone by means of the chalice in which the wine was consecrated, and of pouring a few drops from this into the larger chalice which was offered to the laity. When this practice originated or how long it lasted seems obscure. It is suggested in the article "Calix," in Ducange's Glossary, that the verses engraved by order of St. Remi on the chalice which he caused to be made (p. ante) allude to this practice; but this does not seem certain. It is mentioned in the Ordo Rom. (c. 29), but the vessel in which the drops of consecrated wine were mixed with the unconsecrated, and from which the laity drank through a "fistula" or "pugillar," is called scyphus, and is apparently the same vessel as that carried by an acolyte at the time when the oblation were received from the laity and into which the contents of the calix major (c. 13) were poured when the latter had become filled. Pope Gregory II. (A.D. 731-735), in his epistle to Boniface, disapproves of the practice of placing more than one chalice on the altar ("congruum non esse duos vel tres calices in altario ponere"). When this practice was in use we may conclude that the large chalices with handles were those used for the laity.

The large chalices were also used to receive the wine which the intending communicants brought in amulæ; as in the last Ordo Rom. c. 13 ("Archidiaconus sumit amulam Pontificis... et refundit super eolum in calicem"). When used in this manner it is called "offertorius" or "offerendarius." "Calices baptismi" or "baptismales" were probably those used when the Eucharist was administered after baptism, and possibly for the milk and honey which it was the custom in some churches (Act. Concil. iii. c. 24) to consecrate as the sign and to administer to infants. Pope Innocent III. (A.D. 402-417) is said in the Lib. Pontif. to have given "ad ornatum baptisterii" (apparently of the basilica of St. Gervasius and Prothasius at Rome) three silver "calices baptismi," each weighing 2 lbs. Whether the baptismal chalices differed from other chalices in form or in any other respect is not known.

Besides the chalices chiefly used in the rites of the church, vessels called "calices" were sus-pendent from the calice; the Lib. Pontif. of silver calices; the Vat.

forty; the of these rases, it aluminum

The dra
the gre lamp, P. the Lot

CIA
CATION.

CHÂ (CHAUL [cact. J.
1820).

gitaris

Dep. de

A.D. 56

ag in de

Lib. C

gulate cellus a

v. 155.

bishop

Bonnich

(5) A.D.

with th cuons i

A.D. 69

CIA

dore, H contine generall

gating

"Chanc

in Douc

characte

Western

fiction the choi that bel latter th choir is between

Cione, I

CHA

CHA

the perf

bearing a cross. Its destination is a matter of doubt. Remains are on the cross of Christ and the four not like figures of four calices into various classes in the period when primitive underwent a change to a separate system. The earliest of a "calix quatuoridarius," the "calix major" to be "calicibus vero festis calicem" but says nothing of any "calix sanctus" and the Reasons of convenience use of chalices of very great number of chalices of in the Lit. Pontif. and the supposition that at ancient drank not from one; but this matter is in-communicating the clergy chalice in which the wine of pouring a few drops from chalice which was offered to practice originated or how obscure. It is suggested in Duane's Glossary, that by order of St. Remi on the used to be made (c. ante) ce; but this does not seem oned in the Ordo Rom. (c. a) which the drops of com- mixed with the uncon- the laity drank through "calicibus" is called scyphus, same vessel as that carried a time when the oblation the laity and into which the major (c. 13) were poured com- filled. Pope Gregory in his epistle to Boniface, practice of placing more than altar ("congruum non esse in altario ponere"). When use we may conclude that with handles were those used es were also used to receive the intending communicants; as in the 1st Ordo Rom. c. sumit amulam Pontificis... column in calicem"). When it is called "offerentius" or "Calices baptismi" or "probably those used when the minister after baptism, and the "calicibus" which it was the Ordo Rom. (c. 24) and to administer to (A. D. 402-417) is said to have given "ad ornatum" of the basilica of SS. (c. 24) at Rome) three silver chalices weighing 2 lbs. Whether they differed from other in any other respect is not was chiefly used in the rites of the "calices" were sus-ended from the arches of the ciborium and even from the intercolumniations of the nave and other parts of the church as ornaments. In the Lit. Pontif. we find mention of sixteen "calices" of silver placed by Pope Leo IV. (847-8) on the enclosure of the altar (super circuitu altaris) in the Vatican basilica, of sixty-four suspended between the columns in the same church, and of forty in a like position at S. Paolo f. l. m. Many of these were, however, most probably cups or Suspended Chalices.

rases, not such as would have been used for the administration or consecration of the Eucharist. The drawings in MSS. show suspended vessels of the most varied forms; some examples taken from the great Carolingian bible formerly in the Biblio- theque, Paris, now in the Musée des Souverains in the Louvre, are shown in woodcuts. [A. N.]

CHALICE, ABLUTION OF. [PURIFICATION.]

CHÂLONS-SUR-SAÔNE, COUNCILS OF. [CHALONENSES], provincial:—(1) A. D. 470, to elect John bishop of Châlons (Labb. Conc. iv. 1820). (2) A. D. 579, to depose Salonius and Sagaritarius, bishops respectively of Embrun and Gap, deposed by a previous council (of Lyons and Gap, 567), restored by Pope John III., and now again in desposal (Grog. Yar. Hist. Franc. v. 21, 28; Labb. Conc. v. 963, 964). (3) A. D. 594, to regulate the psalmody at the church of St. Marcellus after the model of Agune (Labb. Conc. v. 1531). (4) A. D. 603, to depose Desiderius, bishop of Vienne, at the instigation of Queen Brunichilde (Frelegar. 24; Labb. Conc. v. 1612). (5) A. D. 650, Nov. 1, of thirty-three bishops, with the "vicarii" of six others, enacted 20 canons respecting discipline: dated by Le Comte A. D. 694 (Labb. Conc. vi. 387). [A. W. H.]

CHANCEL (τὰ ἔθρον των κηρικιδων, Theodor. H. E. v. 18). The space in a church which contains the choir and sanctuary, and which was generally separated from the nave by a rail or grating (cancelli), from which it derives its name. "Cancellus, cantorum excellens locus" (Papian, in Duane, s. v.; compare CANCELLI). It is a characteristic difference between Eastern and Western churches that in the former the distinction between the bema (or sanctuary) and the choir is much more strongly marked than that between the choir and the nave, in the latter the distinction between the nave and the choir is much more strongly marked than that between the choir and the sanctuary. Compare Choir, PRESBYTERY. [C.]

CHANT. [GREGORIAN MUSIC.]

CHAPEL. A building or apartment used for the performance of Christian worship in cases in which the services are of an occasional character, or in which the congregation is limited to the members of a family, a convent, or the like. Greek, παρεκκλησία; Latin, capella, oratorium. In the languages of the Latin and Teutonic families a modification of the word 'capella' is in use, as also in Polish. In Russian pridal.

The derivation of the word 'capella' is a matter of doubt. The Monk of St. Gall (Lit. Cur. Mag. l. 4) states that the name was derived from the 'capa' or cloak of St. Martin: "Quo nomine (i. e. 'capella') Francorum reges propter capam St. Martini sancta sua appellare solebant." The word 'capella' is said to be found in inscriptions in the Roman catacombs in the sense of a sarcophagus, a grave, or place of burial. It occurs at a later time as used for a reliquary, and for the chamber in which reliques were preserved; as in a charter of Childeric, t. A. D. 710, published by Mabillon (De Ro Dipl.), in which the passage "in oratorio suo sen capella S. Marthini" occurs. The canopy over an altar was also called 'capella' (compare CUPELLA). In the sense of a chamber or building employed for divine worship, it does not seem to have been in use in early times. Among early instances of its employment which have been noticed, are in the capitularies of Charles the Great (Capit. v. 182), where it is applied to chapels in or annexed to palaces; and in the passage in the laws of the Lombards (iii. 3, 22), "ecclesie et capellae quae in vestra parochia sunt," where detached buildings are probably referred to. In the earlier centuries "oratorium" would no doubt have been used in either sense, as in the 21st cap. of the Council of Agde, A. D. 506, "Si quis etiam extra parochias in quibus legitimus est ordinarius conventus oratorium in agro habere voluerit reliquis festivitibus ut ibi missas tenent propter fatigationem familiae justa ordinatione permittimus" but with the proviso that the greater festivals should be celebrated "in civitatibus aut in parochiis."

Chapels may be divided into several classes:—1st, as regards their relation to other churches; being (A) dependent on the church of the parish, or (B) independent, in some cases even exempt from episcopal visitation. 2dly, as regards their material structure; being (A) apartments in palaces or other dwellings; (B) buildings forming part of or attached to convents, hermitages, or the like; (C) buildings forming parts of or attached to larger churches; (D) sepulchral or other wholly detached buildings. No strictly accurate division is, however, possible, for in some cases buildings might be placed in either of two classes.

It is here proposed to speak of chapels with regard to their material aspect only; and buildings which from an architectural point of view do not differ from churches will be mentioned under the head CHURCH. As however it is impossible to draw a clear line between churches and chapels, several buildings will be found treated of under CHURCH, which in strictness should perhaps be rather deemed chapels; some of these, as Sta. Costanza at Rome, being too important in an historical point of view, or too extensive and magnificent, to be omitted from any attempt to trace the progress of church building in its main line.

Gatticus (De Orat. Dom.) has collected many proofs of the early existence of domestic or private chapels; but the earliest existing example of the first class is probably the small chapel now known as the Sancta Sanctorum (originally St. Lawrence) in the fragment of the ancient palace of the Lateran which still remains. It was the private chapel of the popes, and appears to have existed as early as A.D. 384; for Pope Pelagius II. then placed there certain relics (MSS. Bibl. Vat. ap. Baronius). It is a small oblong apartment on an upper floor. The example next in date has fortunately been singularly well preserved. It exists in the palace of the archbishops of Ravenna, being their private chapel. It was constructed, or at any rate decorated with mosaic, by the Archbishop Peter Chrysologus (elected in A.D. 429). It is a simple oblong with a vaulted roof. Of the same character is the chapel at Cividale in Friuli, which, although forming part of a Benedictine convent, as it measures only 30 feet by 18 feet, can hardly have been other than a private chapel, probably of the abbat. It is attributed on historical evidence to the 8th century. It is a parallelogram without an apse, about two-fifths being parted off by a low wall, to serve as a choir.

Oratory at Gallorus.

Buildings of the second class, viz., conventual chapels, were intended for the private and daily use of the community; the larger churches for celebration on great festivals, when large numbers of strangers attended the services. In some instances even more than two chapels existed in a monastery; for Adamnan (De situ terrae Sanctae, ii. 24) says that at Mount Thabor, within the wall of enclosure of the monastery, were three churches, "non prae aedificii." In the tower or keep of the convent of St. Macarius in the Nitrian valley are three chapels, one over the other (Sir Gardner Wilkinson, Handbook of Egypt); but it does not appear what their date is. Sir Gardner Wilkinson (Handbook of Egypt, p. 305) states that a tradition among the monks attributes the foundation of the convent to the 5th century.

In Ireland still exist some small chapels which may be assigned with probability to very early dates. Mr. Petrie (The Ecclesiastical Architecture of Ireland, p. 133) thinks that such structures as the Oratory at Gallorus in Kerry, shown in the woodcut, may be considered to be the first erected for Christian uses, and as ancient as, if even not more ancient, than the conversion of the Irish by St. Patrick. This example measures externally 2½ feet by 10, and is 16 feet high, the walls being 4 feet thick. It has a single window in its east end. On each of the gables were small stone crosses, of which the sockets only now remain.

Of somewhat later date, but Mr. Petrie thinks as early as the 5th or 6th centuries, are such buildings as Tempull Cennannach, on the middle island of Arran, in the bay of Galway. This measures internally 16 feet by 12, and is built of very large stones, one not less than 18 feet in length. The church of St. MacDara, on the island of Crunch Mhic Dara, off the coast of Connemara, measures internally 15 feet by 11. Its roof was of solid stone, built in courses until they met at the top.

The above-mentioned examples are simple quadrangular buildings without distinction between nave and chancel, but others are met with, apparently of equal antiquity, in which a small chancel is attached to the nave and entered by an archway. In no case is an apse found in Ireland.

The buildings of this class are so rude and simple that it is not easy to establish satisfactorily any chronological arrangement founded on their architectural character; it would appear, however, that buildings of similar character were constructed until in the 11th or 12th centuries more ornate structures were erected.

Many of these small chapels were, however, constructed of wood, and the whole class was known (Petrie, p. 343) as 'duir-theachs,' or 'dertheachs,' the probable etymology of which is "house of oak." It appears from a fragment of a commentary on the Brehon laws (Petrie, p. 365) that 15 by 10 were customary dimensions for such buildings, and the stone chapels are usually found not to differ very greatly from them.

Buildings of very similar character exist in Cornwall, and their foundation is attributed to the missionaries from Ireland: such was the chapel of Perran, or St. Piran in the sand, said to have been founded by St. Piran (or as he is called in Ireland St. Kieran) in the 5th century. It had been completely buried in the shifting sand of the coast, but in 1835 the sand was removed, and a perfect state was discovered; as simple plan by a wall apparently.

The chapel, but in one angle and chancel way. Mer will be fo in vol. li. sory of t ular, but tel of ste not seem like charn of the cost Ebb's Nook resembles to connect St. Oswald

Some of rather tho the same of buildings in Chapels churches, A, those fo ground; B, ing, but dis or crypts.

Although a.d. 800, ex tolembly e knowledge any clear placed in th cannot supp in very man centuries in narthex to having been the lateral use, since w linus of No a sacristy, the devout prayers; if, as to admit for prayer, rites of the ape on the la the descri (Ep. xxiii.)

is, however, passage: "T tium alto et porticus di acus column porticus qua serts secretis tantium sac militarium ac quon loco p

This pass some in Instance tiles of the optional, for of such a pla noticed th in Kerr, shown in the plan to be the first erected ancient as, if even not a version of the Irish by a measures externally 3 feet high, the walls has a single window each of the sockets only but Mr. Petrie thinks the centuries, are such anachron, on the middle of Galway. This measure 12, and is built of very than 18 feet in length. Para, on the island of the coast of Connemara, by 11. Its roof was of as until they met at the examples are simple without distinction bell, but others are metal antiquity, in which led to the nave and can a archway. In no case found in Ireland.

findings of this class are simple that it is establish satisfactorily ological arrangement on their architectural it would appear, how- buildings of similar were constructed until or 12th centuries more acture were erected.

of these small chapels ever, constructed of the whole class is Petrie, p. 343) as "dair- or "dertheachs," the pro- nology of which is "house It appears from a frag- a commentary on the laws (Petrie, p. 365) that were customary dimen- such buildings, and the apels are usually found y from them.

ilar character exist in andation is attributed and: such was the chapel Piran in the sand, said by St. Piran (or as he is teran) in the 5th century. y buried in the shifting in 1835 the sand was removed, and the building discovered in an almost perfect state; it is 29 ft. long externally by 16j broad; as will be seen from the plan, it was a simple parallelogram, but divided into two parts by a wall or screen. The tomb of the saint apparently served as an altar.

CHAPEL

The chapel of St. Maddern is very similar in plan, but has the peculiarity of having a wall in one angle; that of St. Gwythian has both nave and chapel, the latter entered by a narrow doorway. Mention of several others of like character will be found in a paper by the Rev. W. Haslam, in vol. ii. of the Architectural Journal. The masonry of these buildings is very rude and irregular, but the huge stones, and roofs constructed of stone, which are found in Ireland do not seem to occur in Cornwall. A building of like character was discovered from the sands of the coast of Northumberland in 1853, near Ebb's Nook, not far from Bamborough; it closely resembles the Cornish oratories. The name seems to connect it with St. Ebban (ob. 683), sister of St. Oswald, king of Northumberland.

Some of the Cornish chapels were perhaps rather those of hermitages than of convents, and the same observation may be applied to the like buildings in Ireland.

Chapels of the third class, those attached to churches, may be divided into three sections: A, those forming part of the main building above ground; B, those connected with the main building, but distinct from it; C, those under ground, or crypts.

Although very many churches built before A.D. 800, exist in such a state that we may feel tolerably certain that we possess an accurate knowledge of their original ground-plans, scarcely any clear examples of chapels which could be placed in the first section can be pointed out. We cannot suppose the apartments which are found in very many of the churches of the 5th and 6th centuries in central Syria on either side of the narthex to have been chapels in the sense of having been used for divine worship; nor were the lateral apses originally constructed for a like use, since we have contemporary testimony (Paulinus of Nola, Ep. xxxii.) that one was used as a sacristy, and the other as a place in which the devout might read the scriptures and offer prayers; if, however, we define the word chapel so as to admit apartments destined to serve as places for prayer, but not for the celebration of the rites of the church, we must consider the lesser apse on the left of the great apse as a chapel. In the description which St. Paulinus has given (Ep. xxii.) of the basilica of St. Felix, mention is, however, made of 'cubicula' in the following passage: "Totum extra concham basilicæ, spatium alto et lacunato culmine geminis utrinque peritibus dilatatur, quibus duplex per singulos acies columnarum ordo dirigitur. Cubicula intra peritibus quaternis longis basilicæ lateribus in atriis secretis orantium vel in lege Domini meditationum præterea memoriis religiosorum et familiarium accommodatos ad pacis æternæ requiem locos præbent." [CUMCULUM.]

This passage seems to show clearly that in some instances apartments were placed by the sides of the nave, but this was probably very exceptional, for, as has been said above, no example of such a plan now exists. It should, however, be noticed that in two churches of very early date openings have existed in the side walls with which chapels may have been connected; these are the churches of Sta. Croce in Gerusalemme and that of Sta. Balbina, both at Rome; in the first were five openings on each side of the nave, in the second six. The first of these buildings is, however, held to have been the hall of the palace of the Sessorium, and not originally constructed to serve as a church; the second is believed to date from the 5th century, but to have been reconsecrated by St. Gregory about A.D. 600.

CHAPEL

At a very much later date we find in the church of Sta. Christina at Pola de Lena, near Oviedo, in Spain, apartments attached to and entered from the nave. These are no doubt contemporary with the church, the date of which is probably near A.D. 809. These apartments may have been chapels, but it has been surmised that they were really built to serve as sacristies. The like arrangement occurs at Sta. Maria de Naranco, near Oviedo, which dates from A.D. 848. One almost unique example exists in the church of Romlin Motier, where the upper story of the narthex has a small apse on the east, and was therefore probably intended to serve as a chapel; it is nearly square in plan, and divided into three aisles by two ranges of columns supporting groined vaults. As the church of which this forms a part was a large conventual one, this was probably intended to serve as the smaller chapel generally found in convents. The church is believed to date from 753, the narthex to be somewhat later.

The chapels which belong to the second section, viz. those attached to churches, but distinct buildings, are not very numerous, and in most cases their primary object was sepulchral. Such the three attached to the church of St. Lorenzo at Milan would appear to have been, though it has been suggested that that on the south was a baptistery, and that on the north a porch or vestibule.

That on the south, now called the church of St. Aquilinus, is octagonal externally, while internally semicircular and rectangular niches alternate, one in each face; in it are two massive sarcophagi, one of which is believed to contain the remains of Ataulphus, king of the Goths. The conchs of two of the niches retain some mosaics of a very early period, perhaps the 5th century. This building is connected with the church by a vestibule, supposed by Hübsch (Alt-Christliche Kichen, p. 22) to be of later date; it is a square vaulted chamber with apses east and west. The chapel of St. Sixtus on the north side has exactly the same plan, but is much smaller; that of St. Hippolytus at the east end of the church is also octangular externally, but internally forms a cross with four equal limbs. All three are probably not remote in date from the church itself, which would seem to have been built about the end of the 4th or the beginning of the 5th century.

In like manner Pope Hilarius (461-467) added to the baptistery of the Lateran chapels dedicated in honour of St. John the Baptist and St. John the Evangelist.

Of the early part of the 9th century we have a most interesting example in the chapel of St. Zeno attached to the church of St. Praxedis (Sta. Prassede) at Rome, built by Pope Paschal I.

about 819, and fortunately preserved almost unaltered. It is in plan a square with three rectangular recesses, the walls are covered with marble and the lunettes and vaults with mosaic.

This chapel is entered from the nave, and the doorway is very remarkable, being partly made up of ancient materials and partly original work, as the inscription testifies, of Pope Paschal's time. Over this doorway is a window, and the wall round it is covered with medallion portraits of our Lord, the Apostles, and some other saints in mosaic. The execution is but rude. This chapel is contemporaneous with the church to which it is attached, and is perhaps the earliest undoubted instance of such an arrangement; it is, however, so constructed as both externally and internally to seem an independent building attached to the church and not a portion of it.

The practice of constructing such appendages to a church seems, however, to have continued exceptional until the end of our period. None appear on the plan for the monastery of St. Gall, no doubt prepared between 820 and 830; nor do any seem to have formed parts of the minister of Aix-la-Chapelle.

Crypt under Ripon Cathedral.

In the East, as the rule that there should be only one altar in a church has always existed, chapels (in the sense of apartments in which celebrations of the eucharistic service could take place) have rarely formed parts of churches, but sometimes are found attached to them. One instance of a chapel attached to a church would appear to exist in the church of St. Demetrius at Thessalonica, where a small triapsal building is attached (v. Texier and Pullan, Byzantine Arch. pl. xviii.) to the east end of the south side of the church. It has been suggested that this was a sacristy, but its form seems to show that it was really a chapel; it may possibly have belonged to the adjacent monastery. To the church of the convent of St. Catherine on Mount Sinai six chapels are attached on each side of the nave, but these are doubtless not of the original fabric.

The third class, viz. subterranean chapels, doubtless had their origin from the chambers in the catacombs in which the remains of martyrs or confessors had been placed. What could be more natural than that when a church or an oratory was built over the spot where a martyr had been interred, the chamber should be preserved and made accessible?

We have probably an instance of one of these chambers preserved in the remains of the basilica of St. Stefano, in Via Latina, built by Pope Leo I., 440-461. Where, however, no chamber existed, a crypt was not constructed. Hence, in the earlier churches of the city of Rome, we find no crypt forming part of the original plan, but small excavations under the altar, to receive some holy corpse brought from the extramural cemeteries. [COSSIGNO.]

St. Gregory, we are told, "fecit ut super corpus beati Petri et beati Pauli Apostolorum Missae celebrarentur." He probably formed a crypt and placed the "loculus" in it, erecting an altar in the church above over the bodies. After this time frequent mention is made of the confession as a vault with stairs leading into it. In those churches of the earlier period at Rome, which remain in a tolerably unaltered state as Sta. Sabina (A.D. 425) and Sta. Maria in Trastevere, only very small vaults are found as confessions, but in St. Apollinare in Classe, at Ravenna, a crypt appears as part of the original structure; it consists of a passage running within the wall of the apse, and another passing under the high altar.

French antiquaries (Martigny, Dic. des Antiq. Chret. art. 'Crypte') have claimed a very high antiquity for crypts under several churches in France, e.g. that under the church of St. Mellon (? St. Gervais), at Rouen, is alleged to show the construction of the 4th century. It would seem probable that in most cases where they belong to early periods they are ancient sepulchral chapels or oratories, or, possibly, tombs of the Roman period, and not structural crypts. Two crypts, however, exist, which were it would seem, structural; these are those of St. Irenaeus at Lyons and of St. Victor at Marseilles. The first of these has a central and side aisles divided originally by columns which carry arches, the courses of which are of brick and stone alternately, above there is a string and a barrel vault. The central aisle ends in an apse; the church is said to have been founded in the 4th century. The crypt of St. Victor is in connection with some catacombs, the original church dated from the 5th century. The crypt consists of a series of vaulted compartments divided by very massive rectangular piers.

Two remarkable crypts exist in England, those in the cathedral of Ripon and in the abbey church of He who Bipon about Lefeb

cath place
and t is not
The
of th person been which fession galler vault sembl semet
Rome
SS. Pe
a con
The pl. xii nearly small height the tw while while by no have i in his resort were l niches contain her to by a nises, be carr beneath norme, corred Whether altars is A cry bury, an (quoted Ecd.), it was b had sever formed the addi is unkn of St. G two par steps de to the r seems to from the outside t two, and short pa to a spo close res that in (as Sta. of the w both cry
In the

the remains of martyrs placed. What could be at when a church or on the spot where a martyr chamber should be possible?

An instance of one of these remains of the basilica (St. Paul's), built by Pope Leo I., never, no chamber existed, destroyed. Hence, in the city of Rome, we find no of the original plan, but after the altar, to receive light from the extramural [no.]

are told, "fecit ut super beati Pauli Apostolorum." He probably formed a "loculus" in it, erecting it above over the bolies. A mention is made of it with stairs leading into of the earlier period at in a tolerably unaltered state as Sta. Sabina (A.D. 425) and Sta. Maria in Trastevere, only very small vaults are found as confessions, but in S. Apollinare in Classe, at Ravenna, a crypt appears as part of the original structure; it consists of a passage running within the wall of the apse, and another passing under the high altar.

French antiquaries (Martigny, Dict. des Antiq. Chréti. art. "Crypte") have claimed a very high antiquity for crypts under several churches in France, e.g. that under the church of St. Mellou (? St. Gervais), at Rouen, is alleged to be of the 4th century. It is that in most cases where periods they are ancient or oratories, or, possibly, period, and not structural, as, however, exist, which structural; these are those of St. Victor at Lyons of these has a central and originally by columns which rises of which are of brick, above there is a string of the central aisle ends in no said to have been founded. The crypt of St. Victor in the catacombs, the original of the 5th century. The crypt of vaulted compartments are rectangular piers.

Crypts exist in England, those at Ripon and in the abbey church of Hexham: both are attributed to St. Wilfrid, who founded monasteries at both places; that at Ripon between 670 and 678, that at Hexham about 673. It appears from the testimony of Island (Itin. i. 89, 2nd ed.) that the actual cathedral of Ripon does not occupy the same place as the church of the abbey built by Wilfrid, and there is much uncertainty whether the like is not true of the church of Hexham.

The similarity of the plans and the peculiarity of the structures can leave no doubt that one person planned both, and this can hardly have been any other than St. Wilfrid. The model which he followed was evidently not the confession of a church but the cubiculum and galleries of a Roman catacomb, and the principal vault in each does in fact bear considerable resemblance to the cubiculum adjacent to the cemetery of St. Callixtus (about two miles from Rome in the Via Appia), in which the bodies of St. Peter and Paul are said to have remained for a considerable time.

The vault in question (Marchi, Roma Sott. pl. xli.; CATACOMBS, p. 310) has an arched roof nearly semicircular, but really formed by five small segments of circles, and has the same height, about 9 feet, and the same width, 8 feet, as the two crypts, but being in plan nearly square, while the crypts are oblong, is only 8 feet long, while they are 11-3 and 13-4. It is evidently by no means unlikely that St. Wilfrid may have intended to construct models of a place in his time most highly venerated and much resorted to, such as models of the Holy Sepulchre were built in later times. Some of the small niches in the wall were probably intended to contain relics or to hold lamps. The ante-chamber to the principal vault is stated to be covered by a demi-vaulted roof, as Mr. Wallbrun surmises, in order that the steps of the altar might be carried on it. If these structures were not beneath churches, probably small "cellae memoriae," such as will be hereafter noticed, covered and protected the access to them. Whether they were originally provided with stairs is uncertain.

A crypt existed in the Saxon church of Canterbury, and was, we are told by Edmer, the chanter (quoted by Gervase, De Convent. et Rep. Norw. Eccl.), "ad instar confessionis S. Petri fabricata," it was beneath a raised choir, and appears to have had several passages or divisions. Whether this formed part of the early church, or was one of the additions made by Archbishop Odo (cir. 950), is unknown.

A crypt also appears in the plan for the church of St. Gall (made cir. A.D. 800). It consisted of two parts, a "confessio," which was reached by steps descending between two flights ascending to the raised presbytery, and a "crypta," which seems to have consisted of two passages entered from the transepts on either side, but running outside the walls; a third, connecting the former two, and running in front of the apse, and another short passage running from the last mentioned to a spot beneath the high altar. There is a close resemblance between this arrangement and that in the Roman churches of the same period (as St. Cecilia) where the crypt follows the line of the wall of the apse. Altars were placed in both crypt and confession.

In the church of Brixworth, in Northamptonshire, which there is evidence for believing to date from cir. A.D. 700, is a crypt running round the apse externally, originally covered with a vault; and, according to Mr. Poole (Reports and Papers of Arch. Soc. of Antiquaries, York, and Lincoln, i. 122) there are also traces of a short passage running westwards from this to the probable position of a "confessio" below the high altar. Mr. Watkins, however (The Basilica &c. of Brixworth), asserts that there could have been no crypt under the apse, as the original door was on a level with the rest of the church. [Continued.]

A remarkable crypt or "confessio" exists under the raised presbytery of the church of St. Cecilia at Rome, and apparently dates from the construction of the building by Pope Paschal I. (817-824). It consists of a vaulted space south of the altar (the church stands nearly north and south), a passage running round the interior of the apse, and another passage running south from the north end of the former, but stopped by a mass of masonry supporting the high altar. Within this mass is a sarcophagus, containing the body of the saint. The passages are lined with slabs of marble set on end; many of these have early inscriptions, and were probably brought from an adjacent cemetery. The same arrangement exists at Sta. Prassede, and nearly the same at SS. Quattro Coronati and St. Pancrazio—all at Rome—and it seems to have been the normal arrangement about this period. It will be observed that it is very much the same as that at Brixworth and St. Gall. At Falda, in Hesse Cassel, is a crypt which is usually attributed to the 9th century. It consists of a circular passage, within which is a circular space, the vault of which rests on a short clumsy column, with a rude imitation of an Ionic capital.

Buildings of the fourth class, i.e. sepulchral chapels, were constructed at a very early period. The practice of erecting large structures for such purposes being familiar to several nations of antiquity before the Christian era it is not surprising that when they became converts to Christianity they continued a practice which their new faith would rather encourage than reprehend.

The greater part of the chambers in the catacombs near Rome may be considered as belonging to the class of sepulchral chapels. [See CATACOMBS.]

At what time the practice of placing an altar and of celebrating the eucharistic service in a sepulchral chapel was first introduced cannot be stated with precision. We are indeed told in the Liber Pontificalis of Pope Felix I. (250-274), that he "constituit super sepulcra martyrum missas celebrari," but altars not placed over tombs may have already been used. As, however, the practice of praying for the dead existed in the 4th and even in the 3rd century, it seems not unlikely that the practice of placing altars in sepulchral chapels may have come into use in the former of those periods. Perhaps the earliest undoubted instance of a chapel having been constructed to serve at once as a place of sepulture and of divine worship is that of the "Templum Probi," a small basilica attached to the exterior of the apse of St. Peter's at Rome, and built by Sixtus Aemilius Petronius Probus, who died A.D. 355. He and his wife were undoubtedly buried in it, and its form makes it highly improbable that the celebration of the eucharist within it was not contemplated by the builder.

Cav. de Rossi, however, appears (Bull. di A. ch. Crist. 1864, p. 25) to think that in the earlier centuries the chief use of such "celle memorie" was to afford a fit place for the banquets held in honour of the dead, and such buildings he believes to have been erected in AREAE, or enclosures set apart for sepulture outside the walls of cities, as early as the 2nd century, or probably even at an earlier period. That such buildings were also used as oratories there can be little doubt, since Sozomen (Ecc. Hist. ix, 2) states that the martyr St. Eusebia was placed in a εὐχέρσιον near Constantinople, on the spot where the church of St. Thyrsus was afterwards built. [CELLA MEMORIAE.]

An example has been recently discovered outside the gates of Rimini of very similar plan, which is described as that of a Greek cross, before which is an oblong apartment. Some remains of bas-reliefs, and a sepulchral inscription dated Maximo Consule (i. e. A. D. 523), give ground for the presumption that the building is not of later date than the 6th century. The remains of an altar were discovered; but as this contained a "sepulchrum" in which was a leaden box, doubtless containing relics, it could hardly have been caved with the building.

Of about the same date were apparently the chapels at the cemetery of St. Alessandro, about six miles from Rome, discovered a few years ago: these had been formed from chambers in the first level of a catacomb, and are partly below the ground. There were two chapels with a space between them; one of these ends with an apse, on the chord of which is what appears to be the substructure of an altar; the other has a rectangular termination: at the end of this was found a marble cathedra raised upon a platform, and below this platform an altar, under which is a shallow grave lined with slabs of marble, from which the body of St. Alexander is believed to have been removed. Another chapel opened from this, and is of an irregular square form, with a small apse. The general character of the pavements and such ornamental portions as remained is of circa A. D. 500, and a monumental inscription bore the names of consuls of 443 and 527.

Of sepulchral chapels or mausoleums of undoubted date, perhaps the earliest is the tomb of the Empress Helena, outside Rome (cl. A. D. 328), a circular building standing on a square basement, in which is a vault. In the circular portion, which is about 66 feet in diameter internally, are on the floor, eight large niches, and above them as many windows; the whole is covered by a dome. It may be said that this is merely a tomb, but the large size of the windows points to an use other than that of a sepulchre. The Liber Pontificalis states that it was provided by the Emperor Constantine with an altar of silver and much church furniture and many vessels, but the trustworthiness of this part of the book is doubtful. Of nearly the same date is Sta. Costanza, the mausoleum of a daughter of the Emperor Constantine, also a circular building with a dome, but which has an internal peristyle and had also one externally. Further description of this building will be found under CHURCH.

Another circular mausoleum, which no longer exists, was that built by the Emperor Honorius in connexion with the Vatican Basilica; it was about 100 feet in diameter and very similar to that of the Empress Helena. In the ruins of this, in 1548, a marble sarcophagus containing the remains of one or both of his wives was discovered.

The building next to be mentioned is one of peculiar interest having come down to our time almost uninjured, and containing the sarcophagi, which it was constructed to receive, unviolated; this is the chapel at Ravenna now called the church of SS. Nazario e Celso, erected by the Empress Galla Placidia, as a mausoleum for herself and family before the year 450, it has, as will be seen by the plan, the form of a Latin cross. There was originally a portico by which it was connected with the atrium of the adjacent church of Sta. Croce. Three immense sarcophagi are placed in the three upper arms of the cross, and contain the remains of the Empress Galla Placidia, and of the Emperors Honorius II. and Constantius III. Between these stands the altar, but this is said to have been brought from the church of St. Vitale. The chapel is paved and lined with rich marbles up to the springing of the arches which carry the dome; this last, the lunettes below the dome and the arches and the soffits of the arches are all covered with mosaics of very beautiful character.

SS. Nazario e Celso, Ravenna.

Of the highest interest, both architecturally and historically, is the tomb of Theodoric (cl. 526), outside the walls of Ravenna; this is Mausoleum of Theodoric.

of two stories, the lower externally deagonal, but enclosing a cruciform crypt. The upper story is circular and was surrounded by a range of small pillars carrying arches; opposite to the entrance is a niche, which no doubt once contained an altar; this story is covered by a low dome 30 feet in diameter internally, hollowed out from a single slab of Istrian marble. There are many peculiarities of detail in this building, among the cross with ing lines containing placed in

In one that of the Emperor
conventua a magnific plan of a whether a mosaic to splendid t looked up ma. A building w Detail
convents,

tury the and the c Count de

propos. p. or chapels Kalybes is an inscript
have been
be observed trace of any and that, in building, w doubt wheth
One exam chapel of an sepulchral, (367-385) b
Rome, but a um, which no longer the Emperor Honorius ian Basilica; it was r and very similar to

s. In the ruins of this hagus containing the f his wives was dis-mentioned is one of me down to our time aining the sarcophagi, o receive, unviolated;

enna now called the Nazario e Celso Ravenna.

ced in the three upper contain the remains of a, and of the Emperors is III. Between these is said to have been a of St. Vitale. The with rich marbles up arches which carry the ettes below the dome splits of the arches are of very beautiful cha-both architecturally omb of Theodoric (ob. of Ravenna; this is Theodoric.

er externally decagonal. rn crypt. The upper surrounded by a range arches; opposite to the no doubt once contained covered by a low dome ternally, hollowed out rian marble. There are detail in this building,

CHAPEL

among them a small window in the form of a cross with limbs of equal length, all the bounding lines of which are convex. The sarcophagus containing the body of the king was probably placed in the centre of the upper chamber.

In one very remarkable instance, however, that of the Minster at Aix-la-Chapelle, the great Emperor founded neither an episcopal nor a conventual church, but constructed a building on a magnificent scale indeed, but essentially on the plan of a mausoleum of the earlier Empire; whether or not it was the intention of Charlemagne to construct at once a Minster and a splendid tomb, it is certain that it has ever been looked upon as the "memoria" of that great man. An account of this very remarkable building will be found under CRECHEN.

Detached chapel-like buildings not attached to convents, and not sepulchral, Plan of Kalybe.

are not often met with, though probably once common. In most instances they have perished either from time or neglect. In the Haouran, however, where since the 6th century the ruined cities have been uninhabited and the country a desert, many buildings which Count de Vogüé (La Syrie Centrale, Avant-propos, p. 8) considers to have been oratories or chapels still exist, a good example of these Kalybes is that of Omm-es-Zeitoun, which an inscription engraved on its front shows to have been built in A. D. 282. It must, however, be observed that there seems to be in them no trace of any altar or of any place to receive it, and that, in that at Chaggn, is a vault below the building, which latter circumstance gives rise to a doubt whether they may not have been sepulchral.

Kalybé at Omm-es-Zeitoun

One example may be mentioned of a detached chapel of an early date, which was not certainly sepulchral, that, namely, built by Pope Damasus (367-385) near the baptistery of the Lateran at Rome, but not now in existence. It had a short nave, a square central portion, and three large semi-circular niches or apses, the so-called transverse triapital arrangement. Such a plan was often adopted in order to afford place for three sarcophagi, and hence it may be thought that this chapel was really built as a "cella memorie;" but it exists in the church of Bethlehem, where it certainly could not have been chosen with that intention.

CHAPTER

CHAPLET. (1) It was anciently the practice of some churches to crown the newly baptized with a chaplet or garland of flowers. See BAPTISM, p. 104.

(2) For chaplet in the sense of a succession of prayers recited in a certain order, regulated by beads or some such device, see ROSARY. [C.]

CHAPTER [CAPITULUM], the body of the clergy of a cathedral, united under the bishop (for other senses of the Latin term see CAPITULUM).

1. The origin of chapters themselves, apart from the name, begins from a very early date. The presbyters, and subordinately the deacons of each diocese, constituted from the beginning the council of the bishop of that diocese [BISHOP], joined in his administration of it, and in the approval of candidates for ordination, &c., and in fact, though not in name, were his chapter. And these, at first, all lived in the cathedral city; and as country cures came gradually to exist, served them from that city. In time, however, country presbyters became fixed in their several localities. And a distinction grew up accordingly, by the period of the great Nicene Council, between town and country presbyters, civitatesenses, and diversasani or rurales presbyteri,—the latter being reckoned as a somewhat lower grade than the former. In accordance with this distinction, and as a natural result of their distance from the bishop's residence, the country presbyters (and deacons) became in effect, although never formally, excluded from the Episcopal council or (so to call it by anticipation) chapter. At Rome this state of things became permanent, so that all the city clergy, and they only, became the chapter; and hence, after a lapse of centuries and some other changes, the cardinal-bishops, priests, and deacons. In general, however, time brought about two further but equally gradual changes.

1. The bishop and his more immediate clergy took to living a life in common, although each still retaining his own special share of church goods and living upon it. And thus the town clergy in general became separated from those, who specially served the cathedral but had no cure in the city itself. And the chapter (so to call it) became gradually restricted to the latter, viz., the cathédrales proper, to the exclusion of the former, or general body of the town clergy; a right disused, as before, ceasing naturally in time to be recognised as a right at all. 2. The cathédrales themselves became increased in number by the addition of various diocesan officers: as e.g. the archdeacon, archpresbyter, primicerius or crastus, scholasticus; or again, the archidiaconus; and through the engrafting upon the bishop's establishment of seminaries for youths and clergy, the praepositus or provost, &c. And thus a body of officers grew up, who, through their position and special attachment to the bishop and the cathedral, helped yet more to exclude outsiders. The time of St. Augustine and of Eusebius of Vercelli may be taken as the period whence the first of these changes began; the latter bishop endeavouring also to engraft the monastic life upon the common life of himself and his clergy, which St. Augustin did not; and the monastic bishoprics of the Anglo-Saxon church, established by St. Gregory and the Canterbury St. Augustine, and copied through Anglo-Saxon missions in Germany, helping on the practice. The British monastic bishops may be also referred to, who were anterior to the Canterbury mission; but the Celtic monasteries, with their dioceseless and often subordinate bishops, are anomalous, and irrelevant to the present question. The progress of the change may be marked, 1, by the Councils of Tours, ii. A.D. 567, and of Toledo, iv. A.D. 633, which require the presbyters, deacons, and all his clerici, manifestly the town clergy, to reside with the bishop, the latter making an exception for those only of whom health or old age rendered it desirable that they should live apart in their own houses; and by Conc. Eborac. A.D. 666, can. 12, which empowers a bishop to recall a country presbyter and make him a cathédralis;—2, by the gradual limitations of the word Canonicus, which in the Councils of Clermont, A.D. 549, can. 15, and Tours ii. A.D. 567, still included all the clergy, even the minor orders, while the 3rd Council of Orleans, A.D. 538, uses it for all on the roll, and the 4th, A.D. 549, speaks still of "matricula ecclesiae," but which Gregory of Tours (H. F. x. sub fin.), who wrote about the close of the 6th century, speaking of "mensa canonicorum" and a charter of Chilperic, A.D. 580 (quoted by Du Cange), restrict to the cathedral clergy (the distinction of regular and secular canons and the special sense of the term belonging to the later period after Chrodegang): so that in A.D. 813, Conc. Magunt. and Tiron iii., there had grown accordingly to be two classes of "Canonicus," chapters under a bishop, and colleges under an abbot (see also Council of Calchythe, A.D. 785, can. 4); and these two, under the name of Capitulum, are mentioned in Conc. Vern., A.D. 755, can.

11, the monks living "secundum regulam," i.e., of St. Benedict, the clergy of the cathedral "sub ordine canonico." Yet even in the time of Charlemagne "canonicus" still had a double meaning, being either in general any clergyman on the roll (and "canonicus" life meaning "clerical" life), or in particular the clergy who lived in common under the bishop [CANONICUS]. The second change above noticed was also of gradual growth. The offices of archpresbyter and archdeacon were no doubt ancient [ARCHIPRESBYTER, ARCHIDIACONUS], but did not become attached at once to the cathedral, probably not until the 6th or 7th centuries. The Primicerius and Archidiaconus were of later date still [PRIMICENTOR, PRIMICERIVS]; and so also the Scholasticus [SCHOLASTICUS]. Two further changes however were needed in order to complete the establishment of the modern chapter,—1, The appointment of a dean, which grew out of the office of praepositus. The latter came into existence under the bishop, in analogy with the praepositus under the abbot among Chrodegang's canons, but his office being gradually restricted to external administration, a decanus was appointed to conduct the internal discipline, after the analogy apparently of monastic decani; the 10th century being the period of the first institution of the office; and the dean gradually supplanted the provost [DECANUS]. 2. The conversion of the prebends (in fact though not in name) into benefices, i.e. of customary separate payments to individual cathedral members out of the church stock into a common treasury of the body, together with fixed rights of individual members to definite shares. The first "commune aerarium" in France is attributed to Sigebert, Archbishop of Rheims, after A.D. 700; so that canonicus quasi canonicus, although a bad derivation, yet represented at first a real fact; as does also the more plausible derivation from canon = a fixed pension, called sportula by St. Cyprian, and "consuetum clericorum stipendium" by Conc. Valentin., 1. syn., and Agilth., quoted by Du Cange. Prebends also began to be founded by bishops and other patrons about the same period.

2. For the history of the word chapter, see CAPITULUM. It was used as early as A.D. 755, Conc. Iern., and so at Aix in 789, and Mayence in 813, &c., for the episcopal chapter, as well as that of Chrodegang's canons. And about that time it was that bishops began to make the cathedral clergy their special council. Its restriction to this only, followed in the course of another two centuries.

3. The functions of the cathedral chapter were simply derived (and (so to say) usurped, from those of the original council of the bishop, viz. the diocesan clergy. And the 8th century may be taken as the period when the "chapter" thus absorbed into itself the right of being the special council of the bishop. Administration of the diocese in the bishop's absence or during a vacancy, naturally fell to the bishop's "senate;" and accordingly, even in early times, it was found necessary to enact, "ut presbyteri sine conscientia episcopi nihil faciant" (Conc. Arelat. l. c. 19; and see Can. Apost. 38, &c.). Ordinations, however, were of course always excluded; but not so the patronage, under the like circumstances, of the bishop's livings. And this became the privilege of the chapter about the 8th century.

The right speedily us for the cha tury. And ing the ri exclusion as of the o Pope Innoc un parallel tion of the of the cat the chapte Mayer (i. 7 as belong t the possess however, k 1289), the of punishin vidual mem cathedrals, 4. The co in almost e cord was r earliest the dials there 11th. The at first the was supplac two, with t Rome, i. e. n or list), wer (the epis-cop on in a very scholasticus, cantor, &c., several title of clergy for church, toge ad-Agth, &c occurs in th complete org chapter—the dean, preceer archdeacons, times and th and vicars c 5. In the serving a cat numerous: "Church," ot is said to h 100 deacons, readers, 25 c tiri, who se also special o responsoraw, &ca; &c.; f But no such place as in t offices of elect or: representa [Thomassin St. G., l. i. mem; Wale ol. 179.]

CHAPTE

CHAPTE

ly for monk conventual B Pappas, becau of the monas lum regulam," i. e., the cathedral "sub-en in the time of stial had a double eral any clergyman ar" life meaning ular the clergy who bishop [CASOVSIC], noticed was also of us of archpresbyter but ancient [Atticued but did not become edral, probably not es. The Archidiaconus ter date still [Patri-l so also the Archidiaconus nder further changes nder to complete the rn chapter,—1. The hich grew out of the e latter came into in analogy with the among Chirologus gradually restricted 1, a decimus was ap-peral discipline, after monastic decimus;

 the period of the first insti-dean gradually sup-PLANTS]. 2. The con-in fact though not in of customary separate thedral members out common treasury of ed rights of individual The first "commune attributed to Rigobert, A. D. 700; so that although a bad derivaa real fact; as does also tion from canon = a a by St. Cyprian, and stipendium" by Cone.
 Ag. 17, quoted by Du gan to be founded by about the same period. the word chapter, see 1 as early as A. D. 755, ix in 789, and Mayence onal chapter, as well as ons. And about that s began to make the ocial council. Its rellowed in the course of the cathedral chapter were to say) usurped, from mself of the bishop, viz.

 1 the 8th century may en the "chapter" thus ight of being the special administration of the diocese or during a vacancy, hop's "senate" and ac-y times, it was found archpresbyter sine consen-(Cone. Arch. l. c. 19; &c.). Ordinations, howeys excluded; but not so e like circumstances, et and this became the prin-about the 8th century.

The right of electing the bishop was not so speedily usurped. It did not become customary in the chapter only to elect until the 11th century. And the final decree, absolutely restricting the right of election to that body (to the exclusion of the comprovincial bishops, as well as of the other diocesan clergy), only dates from Pope Innocent III. in the 13th. The change had run parallel with that which restricted the election of the pope to the cardinals. The charge of the cathedral services of course belonged to the chapter. Other privileges enumerated by Mayer (i. 73) for the most part are merely such as belong to any corporate body as such; as, e. g., the possession of a common seal (the earliest, however, known to Mabillon, dating only A. D.
 1289), the right of making bye-laws, the power of punishing the excesses or misconduct of individual members. For the schools attached to cathedrals, see SCHOOLS.

4. The constituent members of a chapter varied in almost every cathedral. The dean, as has been said, was a comparatively late addition, of at earliest the 10th century; while in most cathedrals there was no such office until late in the 11th. The archpresbyter appears to have been at first the principal, under the bishop; until he was supplanted by the archdeacon. And these two with the custos, or primicerius (so called at Rome, i. e. as the first entered on the wax tablet or list), were styled the "tria culmina ecclesiae." Choro episcopi, in name but in nothing else, lingered on in a very few, mostly French, cathedrals. A scholasticus, a sacrista or cimeliarchus, an archi-cantor, &c., also occur; for whom see under the several titles. And there were, besides, a staff of clergy for the general service of the cathedral church, together with lectores, ostiarii, choroistae, adlythi, &c. A praepositus, or provost, also occurs in the 8th and 9th centuries. But the complete organization of a modern or a mediæval chapter—the bishop, the quatuor personæ, sc. dean, precentor, chancellor, and treasurer, the archdeacons, canons, &c.—belongs to Norman times and the 12th century. And minor canons, and vicars choral, &c., are an abuse of like date.

5. In the Eastern Church, the body of clergy serving a cathedral church was often exceedingly numerous: e. g. under Justinian, the "Great Church," out of the four at Constantinople, is said to have been served by 60 presbyters, 100 deacons, 40 deaconesses, 90 subdeacons, 100 readers, 25 cantores in all 415; besides 100 ostiarii, who served all four churches. There were also special officers in Eastern cathedrals, as e. g. πρωτόπαιδας, πρωτόφάτης, χαρτοφύλαξ, σκευοφάλαξ, &c.; for whom see under the several titles.
 But no such development of the chapter took place as in the West, so as to restrict to it the offices of electing the bishop, acting as his council or representative, &c. &c.

[Thomassin; Du Cange; Mayer, *Thes. Nov.
 Sit.*, &c., Eccles. Cathedr. et Coll. in Germania; Walcott, Cathedrals, and Sacr. Archieologia.]
 [A. W. II.]

CHAPTER OF BIBLE. [LECTIONARY.]

CHAPTER-HOUSE, a place of assembly for monks or canons, forming part of the conventual buildings; called capitulum, says Papias, because there the capitula, or chapters of the monastic rule, were read and expounded.

For the ancient custom was that after prime, before the monks went forth to their labour, a chapter of the rule was read aloud to them.
 The meeting of the monks for the purpose of hearing such a reading was itself called CAPITULUM (Duange's Glossary, s. v. Capitulum). The ancient plan of St. Gall contains apparently no chapter-house; and perhaps the first instance of a house built especially for the general meetings of a brotherhood or college for other than devotional purposes is that mentioned in the life of Abbot Ansegis of Fontanelle (c. 9, in *Act. SS.
 Ben. saec. iv. pt. 1. p. 635*), who is said to have built, about A. D. 807, near the apse of the church of St. Peter, and on the northern side of it, a house which he called conventus or curia, in Greek buleuterion, because in it the brethren were wont to assemble for the purpose of taking counsel on any matter (Martene, De lib. Monach. lib. 1. c. v. § 3). [C.]

CHAPTER, THE LITTLE. [CAPITULUM.]

CHARALAMPES, martyr, A. D. 198, commemorated Feb. 10 (Cal. Byzant.). [C.]

CHARAUNUS, martyr at Chartres, is commemorated May 28 (Mart. Usuardi). [C.]

CHARIOTERS. Among the callings which were regarded by the Church of the first three centuries, that of the charioteer held a prominent place. It had its chief, if not its sole, sphere of action in games which were inseparably connected with the old religion of the empire.
 The men who followed it were commonly more or less disreputable, and had been excluded, even by Roman law, from most of the privileges of citizenship (Tertull. de Spectac. c. 22). It was, through the eager excitement which attended it, incompatible with meditation and prayer (Tertull.
l. c.). We find accordingly that such persons were not admitted to baptism, unless they renounced their occupation (Const. A. ost. viii.
 32). If they returned to it after their admission to Christian fellowship they were to be excommunicated (C. Epi. c. 62. I. C. Arch. c. 5).
 When the games of the circus were reproduced under Christian emperors, the rigour of the Church's discipline was probably relaxed.

[E. H. P.]

CHARITAS, virgin, martyr under Hadrian, commemorated Aug. 1 (Mart. Usuardi). As AGAPE, Sept. 17 (Cal. Byzant.). Compare SA-PIENTIA, SOPHIA. [C.]

CHARITINA, martyr, is commemorated Oct. 5 (Cal. Byzant.). [C.]

CHARIFON, holy father and confessor, A. D.
 276, is commemorated Sept. 28 (Cal. Byzant.).
 [C.]

CHARISMATA: literally "graces" which are the effect of grace; that is, of the outpouring of the Holy Ghost, consequent on the Ascension of our Lord into heaven,—all, properly speaking, subjective; yet St. Paul calls the pardon of sin in one place (Rom. v. 15), and eternal life in another (ib. vi. 23), a "charisma"; that is, a gracious or free gift on the part of God through Christ. Again, subjective graces have been dis-

* A various reading gives, however, "annus" instead of "an'iga." It is possible that this may be a sign of a diminished horror of the charioteer's calling.

tinguished into two classes: 1. those conferring mere power (gratis gratis dante); and 2. those which affect the character (gratis gratum facientes). The locus classicus for both is 1 Cor. xii. to the end of ch. xiv. (on which see Bloomfield, Alford, Cornelius & Lapide, and others), where they are thrown together without much system or classification. Of the former class, some were neither permanent nor universal, as the gift of healing: others, as for instance, that which he affirms elsewhere to be in Timothy by the laying on of his hands (2 Tim. i. 6; comp. 1 Pet. iv. 10); in other words, the gift conferred upon all ministers of the Gospel at their ordination, fitting them for their respective posts, were permanent, but not universal. Both were bestowed primarily for the edification of the whole body; not but that it would fare better or worse with each individual possessed of them according to the way in which they were used. "The manifestation of the Spirit is given to every man, to profit withal." Of the latter class all were permanent and universal, being designed primarily for individual sanctification: all had them therefore without exception; and any body might double or quadruple his share of them by his own exertions. Where they lay dormant in any, the fault was his own. Wherever they were cultivated, they would bring forth, some thirty, some sixty, and some a hundredfold. "Follow after charity," says the Apostle: this is a gift of the same character with faith and hope, permanent (aiétes) and bestowed on all. Therefore the degree to which you may become possessed of it rests with yourselves. As you follow after it, so you will obtain it. For those gifts which are not given to all you can only pray: still I enjoin you to pray; and of these "pray rather that ye may prophesy;" in other words, that ye may "understand the Scriptures" (comp. Luke xxiv. 45), and be able to interpret them for the benefit of others, as well as your own;—a gift which is permanent, and for the good of all, like charity. Of ordinary gifts, I have devoted a whole chapter to shew that charity should occupy the first place: of extraordinary gifts, I proceed to shew in the ensuing chapter my reasons for considering prophecy, taken in its widest sense, to be first also; one is for practice, the other for information: to understand the Scriptures, and to act upon them right, for general as well as for private profit and edification, is to fulfil every purpose for which grace is vouchsafed. Prophecy, therefore, will mean here the gift of expounding, rather than of foretelling (Corn. & Lap. ad. l.), and to the nine extraordinary "charismata" set down here, correspond the nine ordinary, described as "the fruit of the Spirit," in the Epistle to the Galatians (v. 22). To these last three more have been added, making twelve in all; while faith, hope, and charity have been contrariwise classified by themselves as the three theological virtues. [E. S. F.]

CHARITY SCHOOLS. [SCHOOLS.]

CHARMS. [AMULETS.]

CHARTOPHYLAX. One, says Beveridge (Synod. ii. 167), who kept the archives and documents or charters of the church. This in the Church of Constantinople was a high office; so much so, that under Antronicus Junior he was called "Magnus Chartophylax" who discharged it.

His duties were by no means those of a mere librarian or registrar, but included with them those of a chancellor. He wore suspended round his neck the ring or seal of the patriarch; received and examined all letters intended for him, with the exception of those coming from other patriarchs; furnished the list of those who should be promoted to vacant benefices of all sorts; and was entrusted with the authorisation of the nuptial benediction. When the 6th Council opened, it was the chartophylax, or keeper of the archives of the great church, whom the emperor ordered to fetch the books of the previous oecumenical councils from the patriarch's library, then the depository for all authentic ecclesiastical records. As both volumes of the 5th Council were subsequently proved to have been tampered with [CONCIT. CONSTANT. 34], there must have been one dishonest chartophylax at least in the 130 years intervening between the 5th and 6th councils. For the rest, see Gretser and Gaur, c. 4 of their Commentaries on Codinus; c. 1, Du Fresnoie's Gloss. Græc. et Lat.; Saucer's Thesaur. s. v. [E. S. F.]

CHARTULARIUS. An officer entrusted with the keeping of charters or registers; and in the Eastern Church subordinate to the chartophylax. Such was his position, at all events, in the Church of Constantinople, according to the ecclesiastical list of Codinus (c. 1, with Gretser and Gaur's Commentaries, c. 13); but from his next chapter we see there was a superior officer called "the great chartularius" attached to the imperial household (c. 2, and Gretser and Gaur, c. 3). Elsewhere we read of "chartularii" belonging to the army, navy, and several other departments of state, whose records were voluminous; while the number of ecclesiastical "chartularii" for the different dioceses of the East is regulated by Justinian in the first book of his Code (tit. li. c. 25). St. Gregory the Great calls a monk named Hilary, whom he employed in Africa to transact business for him, indifferently his "chartularius" or "notary"; shewing both offices to have been synonymous in the Church of Rome then (Ep. l. 77, ed. Migne, and the note). And Photius, two centuries and a half later, addresses one Gregory several times, in corresponding with him, as "deacon" and "chartularius" (Ep. iii. ed. Valetta). Later, a very different sense sometimes attached to this word: "Qui per epistolam liber fiebat," says Sirmondus (ad tom. Concil. Gall. p. 679), "chartularius dicebatur." Again, "chartularium," in the neuter gender, stands for the place where charters and such like documents were kept literally; but in the West it has long served to denote those volumes, often called Red or Black Books from the colour of their binding or their rubrics, and written on parchment, in which the charters and customs and properties belonging to each monastery were transcribed (Du Fresnoie, Gloss. Lat. et Græc. s. v.). [E. S. F.]

CHASUBLE. [CASULA.]

CHEESE, IN EUCHARIST. [ELEMENTS.]

CHERSONESUS, the martyrs of, A.D. 296, are commemorated March 7 (Cal. Byzant.). [C.]

CHERUBIC HYMN. [HYMN, THE CHERUBIC.]

those of a mere libration with them those depended round his neck (trierch); received and led for him, with the from other patriarchs; he who should be prof- of all sorts; and was sation of the nuptial Council opened, the keeper of the archives the emperor ordered previous oecumenical h's library, then the ecclesiastical records, h Council were subse- there must have been at least in the 130 on the 5th and 6th see Gretser and Gu, on Codinus; c. 1, Du. Suicer's Thesaur. [E. S. F.]

An officer entrusted bers or registers; and in dinate to the charto- tion, at all events, in ple, according to the us (c. 1, with Gretser c. 13); but from his was a superior officer arius" attached to the and Gretser and Gari, ead of "chartularii" navy, and several other nos records were vember of ecclesiastical fferent dioceses of the inian in the first book St. Gregory the Great y, whom he employed siness for him, indit- "or notary"; shew- en synonymously in the p. i. 77, ed. Migne, and wo centuries and a half gory several times, in a "deacon" and "char- aletta). Later, a very attached to this word: flebat," says Sirmondus p. 679), "chartularius hartularium," in the the place where char- were kept literally; long served to denote ed Red or Black Books binding or their rubrics, t, in which the charters ties belonging to each bed (Du Fresnoe, Gloss. [E. S. F.]

[A.]

MARIST. [ELEMENTS.]

the martyrs of, A.D. 296, in 7 (Cal. Byzant.) [C.]

N. [HYMN, THE CHE-

CHEST. [ARCA. CAPSA.]

CHILD BIRTH. [CHURCHING OF WOMEN.]

CHILDEBERT, king, deposition at Paris, Dec. 23 (Mart. Usardi). [C.]

CHILDREN. It is the object of this article to bring together the materials for a picture of the home life of Christians of the first eight centuries, so far as it affected the treatment of their children and their thoughts about them. It is obvious that every such picture must be more or less idealised, that in practice its completeness was marred by variations at different periods and in different churches, by the more or less perfect triumph of Christianity over heathenism. Making allowance for this, however, it is hoped that the representation here given will enable the reader to estimate the influence of the religion of Christ in this phase of human life with some distinctness. It is obvious also that in the course of the inquiry we must come in contact with many questions which, separately, demand a more dogmatic and more exhaustive discussion. These it will be enough to notice briefly.

(1.) We may start with the fact that the new faith taught men to set a higher value upon the sacredness of human life. The corrupt morals of the empire had all but crushed out the natural eropy which binds the hearts of the fathers to the children. Infants were looked upon as innumbrances to be got rid of. The mothers of illegitimate children, sometimes even mothers who were married, killed or deserted their children without scruple, or called in the aid of women who made a business of the art of abortion. Against all such practices Christian purity raised its voice. Barnabas enumerates the sins in question among the things incompatible with the "way of light" (c. 19). The author of the Epistle to Diognetus speaks of the freedom of the Christian society from these practices as one of the marks of difference between them and the heathens among whom they lived (c. 5). Athanasius condemns those who expose children, or procure abortion, as alike guilty of murder (Legat. c. 35). Justin speaks against the exposure as a common offence, and dwells on the enormities that followed, children so deserted, male and female, being the chief supply of the market for prostitution (Apol. i. 29). The practice lingered, however, even among Christians, and the Council of Elvira had to treat them as including a female catechumen from all but death-bed baptism, one who was already baptized even from death-bed communion (C. Elib. c. 63, 68). The Council of Ancyra, about the same time, acknowledging that the severer penalty had been the rule of the Church, reduced it to ten years' penance (c. 20), that of Lerida (c. 2) to seven, subject however to the condition of continuance in a penitential life; and if the offenders were in orders, to exclusion from liturgical functions.

(2.) We start, then, with the Christian conviction that children were a "heritage and gift that cometh from the Lord," to be received as a trust for which parents would have to render an account. It might have seemed that that feeling would have found universal expression in the dedication of infants, as soon as might be after their birth, by the sacred rite of baptism.

Our Lord's command, "Suffer little children to come unto me, and forbid them not," might seem to sanction, if not to command, the practice. It must be admitted, however, that the traces of infant baptism in the first 150 years are but scanty, that the evidence of the New Testament is far from decisive. The statement of Suicer (Thesaur. ii. 1136) that for the first two centuries no one was baptized who could not make a conscious profession of his faith is, perhaps, overstrained, but it is true that the evidence on the other side is meagre. Justin's statement that "many had been made disciples of Christ, ἐκ παίδων" (Apol. ii. p. 62) is somewhat strained when these words are translated, as Bingham does, "from their infancy." The witness of Irenaeus, who says that "infantes" (as well as "parvuli") "renascuntur in Deum" (ii. 22), and identifies regeneration with baptism is, however, more distinct. That of Origen, however, that the Church's practice was "etiam parvulis baptismum dari" (Hom. viii. in Levit.) is rendered less so, by the distinction drawn by Irenaeus between the "parvuli" and the "infantes,"^a the treatise in which Tertullian urges "enunciatio baptismi" as the safer and better course is rather in the tone of one who is contending against a growing practice than of one who rejects a tradition of the universal Church (de Bapt. c. 18). Wall on Infant Baptism is, of course, the great storehouse of arguments in favour of the primitive and universal use of the rite for infant children. It may be noted, however, (1.) that the command in Matt. xxviii. 19, seems to imply capacity for discipleship as a condition of baptism; (2.) that the "holiness" of Christian children is made to depend, in 1 Cor. vii. 14, not on baptism, but on the faith of one, at least, of the parents; (3.) that the mention of "households" as baptized is, at best, a precarious foundation for a wide generalisation. If baptism were thought of as limited to those who could make a confession of faith, it would not be deemed necessary to mention infants as not included in the "household" that was baptized, any more than it would be necessary to except them if one were speaking of a whole household going forth to fight against the enemy. It may fairly be conceded, however, that at least from the time of Irenaeus, Origen, Tertullian, the practice was common. The further question remained, at what stage in their infancy; and here the answers varied. Some pressed the analogy of circumcision and argued for the eighth day, but this was rejected by Cyprian (Epi. l. ad Fidum, lix. nl. lxiv.) and by a Council of Carthage under his guidance. Gregory of Nazianzum, on the other hand, urged a delay of three years, more or less, that the child might be able to utter its profession of faith with its own lips (Orat. xl. de Bapt.). The Council of Elvira (c. 22) snctioned the earlier age; but this was done not as resting on an immemorial practice, but on a special dogmatic ground, "quia non suo vitio peccarunt," as though it needed a justification. Generally, except in cases of necessity, infant baptism, like that of adult converts, was postponed till the Easter following their birth (Socrates, H. E. v. 22; C. Antissiod. c. 18; August. Serm. de Temp. 110; Ambros. de Myst. Pasch. c. 5).^b The case of Augustine shows, however, that even a mother like Monica, acting, it may be, under the influence of the feeling of which Tertullian had been the spokesman, could postpone her child's baptism indefinitely, only eager to hasten it if there were any imminent fear of death (August. Conf. i. 11).^c Even where baptism was postponed, however, the child was claimed for Christ, was signed with the sign of the cross, and made to taste of the salt which was known as the "mysterium" or "sacrament" of catechumens (Id.). [CATECHUMENS.] After an interval, varying according to the different views just stated, the child was brought to the font, stripped of its clothes, and baptized, making its acts of renunciation and adherence, if old enough, with its own lips; if still in infancy, through its sponsors. [SPONSORS.] Where children were left orphans, or were deserted by their parents, they were brought by benevolent Christians, who in the sight of the Church took charge of them. The priest announced the fact from the altar, and the child became the "abunmus" or foster-child of the person so adopting him^d (1 C. Vasens. c. 9).

^a We have in both these passages to content ourselves with a Latin translation of a Greek original. A passage in the Latin version of Origen's Hom. in Levit. xiv. seems to bring even children who are just born within the range of the "parvuli."

Baptism in such cases was followed, after an interval of uncertain duration, by confirmation. If a bishop were present at the baptism, the rite was that both rites were administered in immediate succession. As soon as the child was taken from the water he received the sacred unction and the imposition of hands. (Tertull. de Bap. c. 7, de Uesuv. Carn. c. 8.) In the absence of the bishop there was, of course, a delay; but the modern practice of Protestant churches of treating confirmation as the personal acceptance by the adult of what had been promised by the infant, was altogether foreign to the life of the ancient Church, as it is now from that of the East. In both cases, indeed, in order to guard against any inconvenience which might follow from the prolonged absence of the bishop, the priest was allowed to administer confirmation as well as baptism.

The admission of the infant to the privileges of Christian fellowship did not, however, stop here. There is almost, if not altogether, as weighty evidence for infant communion as there is for infant baptism. It was the recognised practice of the African Church in the time of Cyprian (De Laps. c. 25). The Apostolical Constitutions (viii. 12, 13) show that it was also the custom of the East. It was vehemently urged by Augustine as essential to the complete salvation even of the baptized (Epist. 23 ad Bonific. De Peccat. Merit. i. 26) and was defended against the scorn of unbelievers by the mystic pseudo-Dionysius (de Hierarch. Eccl. vii. 11). The Sacramental of Gregory and the Council of Mâcon (c. 6), A.D. 588, are witnesses to its prevalence in the churches of Rome and Gaul. The first intimation of any wish to stop

^b The Sunday before Easter was known in consequence as the "Octave Infantum."

^c Augustine blames the delay. It is true, but it is with reference to a baptism in boyhood, not in infancy.

^d The word occurs in this sense in Christian epitanias. (De Romul. l. 46.)

it is found in the third Council of Tours (c. 19), in A.D. 813, and that continued inoperative for nearly three centuries. In this respect the Churches of the East, as in the case of confirmation, follow in the footsteps of antiquity.

So far, then, the child of Christian parents was met at its birth with these symbols, and, as it was believed, assurances of salvation. The work of moral training began with the first dawn of consciousness. He would be taught to make the sign of the cross upon his brow, or lips, or chest, on rising or lying down to sleep, or when he bathed or put on his clothes (Tertull. de Cor. Md. c. 2). Soon a pious parent would tell him the story of the Gospels, as Monica did to Augustine, even though unbaptized (Conf. i. 17), or give him daily some texts of Scripture to be learnt by heart, as Leonidas did to Origen (Euseb. H. E. vi. 2). He would learn the Lord's Prayer and the Creed as things for daily use, would be taught to pray at midnight, at sunrise, and at every meal (Tertull. de Orat. c. 20). The stories of martyrs who had suffered, sometimes the actual spectacle of those sufferings, would kindle his emotions. The range of instruction would become wider as he would be led first to the Italaic, or sapiential, books of Scripture, the Psalms, Proverbs, Ecclesiastes; then the Gospels, the Acts, and the Epistles; last of all the Pentateuch, the historical books, and the Prophets. (Hieron. Epist. 57, ad Iactant.) For his general education, however, he would have to go to any school that might be opened, and these were, for four centuries or more, in the hands of heathens. For those who went to such schools Homer was still the groundwork of intellectual culture (August. Conf. i. 23). Grammar, dialectics, rhetoric, geometry, completed the course of teaching (Euseb. H. E. vi. 2). It would be naturally a time of anxious watchfulness for Christian parents. When this was over the child would pass to the responsibilities of adolescence. Negatively we may be sure that no true Christian would allow his child to be a spectator of the games of the circus or the mimes of the theatre; that wherever this was tolerated it would be looked on as a sign of spiritual decay. [ACTORS.]

CHILDREN, COMMUNION OF [INFANT COMMUNION.]

CHIONIA, martyr at Thessalonica, under Diocletian, April 1 (Mart. Hieron., Bedae); April 3 (Mart. Usuardi); April 5 (Mart. Hieron.); April 16 (Cal. Byzant.). [C.]

CHIROTHECAE. [GLOVES.]

CHLODOLD, presbyter and confessor, is commemorated Sept. 7 (Mart. Bedae, Usuardi). [C.]

CHOIR, ARCHITECTURAL (Chorus, Suggestus; Ἀναβαθ.). Every complete church consists of at least three parts: bema (or pre-bytery), choir, and nave. The bema, entered in ancient times by none but the clergy, was devoted to the celebration of the holy mysteries; the choir was for the "clerks," in the widest sense of the word; the nave for the general body of the faithful. The bema corresponds to the space east of the altar-rails (called the sanctuary or presbytery) in an ordinary English church, and the choir to the remaining portion of the chancel. In monastic churches the choir is the place where the brethren officies.

It is antiquities choir.

bearing the rail whole devoted chorus fact, pro

Ania ce, coronae his ctyon council below, is the

the thro is clear churches point, as changeal authentic churches eastern which w church, mediate

[CHURC was iden is doubt

The do Constitut

lyters, an east end then, bu clerks at lerner e ially were apart for from the emperors ad enjoy

CELLA, doret, H.

mitted; and Valen to approu making t

directly. [E. H. P.]

council (o generally son), exp the purpo very ancie patriarch to withdr tracted th

(Life by l

The sam rors seems to unordai

The 4th (A.D. 567)

the clergy serves all the altar-s in the ser get the su oza for th ating bot MUNION].

direct by (1

CHURCH.

brethren assemble to say the ordinary daily offices.

It is extremely difficult to determine the antiquity of the division between sanctuary and choir. Most of the passages of ancient authors bearing upon the matter give the impression that the rail or screen [CANCELLI] separated the whole space devoted to the clergy from that devoted to the people, and that there was no 'chorus' distinct from the sanctuary. It is, in fact, probable that Hieronius of Autun (Genava Annot., i. 140) is right in saying "olim in modum corone circa aras cantantes stabant," though his etymology is wrong. The canon of the fourth council of Toledo, in the 7th century, quoted below, is perhaps the earliest instance in which the threefold division, sanctuary, choir, and nave, is clearly recognised. The remains of ancient churches give us but little information on this point, as screens are the most destructible and changeable portions. When we do meet with authentic testimony as to the arrangements of churches, we find generally that the whole of the eastern apse was occupied by the sanctuary, which was screened off from the rest of the church, while the choir was a raised space immediately west of the screen of the sanctuary [CHURCH, p. 375]. Whether the Greek SOLEAS is identical with this raised space or suggests is doubtful.

The description of a church in the Apostolical Constitutions (ii. 57) implies that bishop, presbyters, and deacons occupied the space at the east end of the church, which was set apart for them, but does not mention any barrier between clerks and people. We find however such a barrier existing in the 4th century, when the laity were forbidden to enter the enclosure set apart for the altar and the clergy. This appears from the fact that St. Ambrose deprived the emperors of the exceptional right which they had enjoyed of passing within the screen [CANCELLI]. See Sozomen, Hist. Eccl. vii. 25; Theodoret, H. E. v. 18. To this the emperors submitted; and the edict of Theodosius the younger and Valentinian lays down that the emperors are to approach the altar only for the purpose of making their offering, and to withdraw immediately. In accordance with this the Trullan council (canon 69), while forbidding the laity generally to enter the sanctuary (ιερον θυσιαστηριον), expressly permits the emperors to enter for the purpose of offering their gifts, "according to very ancient custom." This privilege Tarasius, patriarch of Constantinople († 806), threatened to withdraw from Constantine VI. if he contracted the marriage which he was meditating (Life by Ignatius, in Acta SS. Feb. iii. p. 584).

The same privilege which was granted to emperors seems in ancient times to have been conceded to unordained monks (Jerome, Ad Heliodorum). The 4th canon of the second council of Tours (A.D. 567) forbids the lay people to stand among the clergy, whether at vigils or at mass, and reserves all that portion of the church which is on the altar-side of the screen for the clerks engaged in the service (choris psallentium clericorum); yet the sanctuary (sancta sanctorum) was to be open for the purpose of praying and communicating both to laymen and to women [COMMUNION]. The same canon was repeated in effect by the council of Autun in the year 672.

CHRIST. ANT.

So too a Capitulary of the year 744 (art. 9, ed. Baluz.) forbids the laity to be within the screen in time of divine service, whether mass or vigil. So the council of Rome under Eugenius II., canon 33.

The liberty which in Gaul was given to lay people, of entering the choir to communicate, does not seem to have been given in Africa. St. Augustine (Serm. 392) speaks of the screen (cancelli) as the place where laymen ordinarily communicated; neophytes, however, seem to have drawn near the altar for their first communion (Serm. 224). In Spain the fourth council of Toledo (can. 18) of the year 633 enjoins the [ministering] priest and deacon to communicate before the altar, the rest of clerks in the choir, the people outside the choir.

Women were generally not permitted to enter the choir (Conc. Lugdun., c. 44), unless for the purpose of communicating. And although nuns were probably excepted in ancient times (Augustine, Epist. iii.), their exclusion seems in the 9th century to have been general, at least in Gaul (Theodulf of Orleans, Capitulare, c. 6). Ahto, bishop of Basle in the early part of the 9th century (Capitulary, c. 14), ordains that no woman should approach the altar; and that when the altarcloths required washing, they should be taken off by the clerks, and handed to the women at the door of the screen. The presbyters were also to receive the women's offerings outside the screen. (Duensing's Glossary, s. v. Chorus; Martene, De Rituibus Antiquis, i. 123 ff.) [C.]

CHOIR OF SINGERS. (Chorus Cantorum.) St. Augustine (on Ps. 149) says, "Chorus quid significet, multi norunt . . . chorus est confessio cantantium." Isidore of Seville gives the definition, "chorus est multitudo in sacris collecta, et dictus chorus quod initio in modum corone circum aras starent et ita psallerent." This etymology is undoubtedly false, but the statement upon which it is founded is by no means improbable. Whether it be true or not, that in the earliest ages the choir was grouped round the altar, we know that at a comparatively early period the choir had a space assigned to it in a church, [CHOIR, ARCHITECTURAL.] distinct from the SANCTUARY, which contained the altar.

"The choirs of our time," says Amalarius (de Div. Off. iii. 4), early in the 9th century, "are clothed in linen (linum), and he distinguishes between this and the inner vestment of byssus which the singers were under the Old Dispensation (2 Chron. v. 12). Compare SCHOIA CANTORUM." [C.]

CHOREPISCOPUS (Χορηγικός) = country bishop, vicarius episcopi (Conc. Ancyran., Neo-Cesar., Antioch., &c., Isid. Hispal. De Offic. Eccl. ii. 6, &c.), villanus episcopus (Capit. Car. M. vii. 187), vicanus episcopus (Hincmar), as opposed to the cathedratis episcopus (Du Cange);—to be distinguished, as being stationary, from the περιερευτής or visitator, who itinerated, although the two became often confounded together:—a class of ministers between bishops proper and presbyters, defined in the Arabic version of the Nicene Canons to be "loco episcopi super villas et monasteria et sacrosanctos villarum;" called into existence in the latter part of the 3rd century, and first in Asia Minor, in order to meet the want of episcopal supervision in the country part of the now enlarged dioceses without subdivision:—first mentioned in the Councils of Ancyra and Neo-Caesarea, A.D. 314, and again in the Council of Nice (which is subscribed by fifteen, all from Asia Minor or Syria); sufficiently important to require restriction by the time of the Council of Antioch, A.D. 341; and continuing to exist in the East until at least the 9th century, when they were supplanted by κλήροι [ΧΑΡΧΗΙ]:—first mentioned in the West in the Council of Riez, A.D. 439 (the Epistles of Pope Damasus I. and of Leo M. respecting them being forgeries), and continuing there (but not in Africa, principally in France) until about the 10th century, after which the name occurs (in a decree of Pope Damasus II. ap. Sigeb. in an. 1048) as equivalent to archdeacon, an office from which the Arabic Nicene canons expressly distinguish it. The functions of chorepiscopi, as well as their name, were of an episcopal, not of a presbyterial kind, although limited to minor offices. They overlooked the country district committed to them, "loco episcopi," ordaining readers, exorcists, subdeacons, but, as a rule, not deacons or presbyters (and of course not bishops), unless by express permission of their diocesan bishop. They confirmed in their own districts, and (in Gaul) are mentioned as consecrating churches (Du Cange). They granted epitaphical, or letters dimissory, which country presbyters were forbidden to do. They had also the honorary privilege (τιμώμενοι) of assisting at the celebration of the Holy Eucharist in the mother city church, which country presbyters had not. (Conc. Ancyra. can. xiii.; * Neo-Caesar. can. xiv.; Antioch. can. x.; St. Basil. M. Epist. 181; Rab. Maur. De Instit. Clor. i. 5; &c. &c.) They were held therefore to have the power of ordination, but to lack jurisdiction, save subordinately. And the actual ordination of a presbyter by Timotheus, a chorepiscopus, is recorded (Pallad. Hist. Lausiac. 106). The office also offered an opportunity for a compromise in cases of schism, of which the Nicene Council availed itself, by authorising a Catholic bishop (among other alternatives) to find a place as chorepiscopus for any reconciled Novatian bishop (Conc. Nic. can. viii.). And the same council (Epist. Sign. in Socrat. i. 9) places reconciled Meletian bishops also in a somewhat similar position, although not calling it by the name itself. It was found also a convenient mode of disposing of "vacant" bishops, when such occurred. The office continued to exist among the later Eastern sects also: sc. among the Jacobite Syrians, where the chorepiscopus proper, who presided over a rural district, is distinguished, both from a titular chorepiscopus, more properly archipresbyter or proto-pope, who was a kind of leading presbyter in the episcopal city, and from the επιθεωρητής or visitator, who went circuit; and among the Nestorians, where also both chorepiscopus and επιθεωρητής existed, as distinct classes (Denzinger, Rit. Orient. Proleg. 116, sq.; and see also the Arabic version of the Nicene canons, cans. 58 to 70). In both these bodies the chorepiscopi were presbyters. And in one ritual they are appointed without imposition of hands (Denzinger, ib.). In the West, i.e. chiefly in Gaul, the order appears to have prevailed more widely, to have usurped episcopal functions without due subordination to the diocesan, and to have been also taken advantage of by idle or worldly diocesan. In consequence it seems to have aroused a strong feeling of hostility, which shewed itself, first in a series of papal bulls, condemning them; headed, it is true, by two forged letters respectively of Damasus I. and Leo M. (of which the latter is merely an interpolated version of Conc. Hâspr. II. A.D. 619, can. 7, adding chorepiscopi to presbyteri, of which latter the council really treats), but continuing in a more genuine form, from Leo III. down to Pope Nicholas I. (to Rodolph, Archbishop of Bourges, A.D. 864); the last of whom, however, takes the more moderate line of affirming chorepiscopi to be really bishops, and consequently refusing to annul their ordinations of presbyters and deacons (as previous popes had done), but orders them to keep within canonical limits;—and secondly, in a series of conciliar decrees,—Conc. Ratispon. A.D. 800, in Capit. tit. iv. c. 1, Paris. A.D. 829, lib. i. c. 27, Meld. A.D. 845, can. 44, Metens. A.D. 888, can. 8, and Capitul. v. 168, vi. 119, vii. 187, 310, 323, 324,—annulling all episcopal acts of chorepiscopi, and ordering them to be repeated by "true" bishops; and finally forbidding all further appointments of chorepiscopi at all. The title however lingered on for some centuries, in France and Germany, as applied to various cathedral dignitaries in particular cathedrals, but in senses wholly irrelevant to its original and proper meaning (see instances in Du Cange).

* For the meaning of this canon and its various readings, see Month. Reliq. Sac. III 436-439.

That chorepiscopi as such—i.e. omitting the cases of reconciled or vacant bishops above mentioned, of whose episcopate of course no question is made—were at first truly bishops, both in East and West, appears almost certain, both from their name and functions, and even from the arguments of their strong opponents just spoken of. If nothing more could be urged against them, then that the Council of Neo-Caesarea compared them to the 70 disciples,—that the Council of Antioch authorises their consecration by a single bishop, and that they actually were so consecrated (the Antiochene decree might mean merely nomination by the word γίνεσθαι, but the actual history seems to rule the term to intend consecration, and the [one] exceptional case of a chorepiscopus recorded [Act. Episc. Cenoman. ap. Du Cange] in late times to have been ordained by three bishops [in order that he might be a full bishop], merely proves the general rule to the contrary),—and that they were consecrated for "villages," contrary to canon,—then they certainly were bishops. And Pope Nicholas expressly says that they were so. Undoubtedly they ceased to be so in the East, and were practically merged in archdeacons in the West. And the non-episcopal nature of the functions to which they came to be limited would naturally lead to such a result. The language of the canons and of the Fathers (e.g. St. Basil. M. above quoted, or again St. Athanasius [Apol. II. Opp. i. 200], who distinguishes them both from bishops proper and from presbyters, and again both from city and from country presbyters), naturally implies that at first they were bishops in the common sense of the word. The special rites in the East for their appointment probably belong to a time when they had undoubtedly there said, upon the heridige, whom m Van Espe while ot to which alrge th hardy be either coo although uch bish Reformar Irish and are foun English b centuries. Henry VI (bellarm. ir. 14; M. Barea, Du Bingham CHRE some Chr classical commonly by which and his fo The mist tullian, I having a reject it. the enem tians mere ording to admatio sod of cu a robis (t ros) de su Oltivar or inousum i. 11).

CHOR

CHRIS

letter wo ipsum chr sacred oil day. The ist oil ble of the sick St. Basil the blessio baptism as the earliest ex baptism of the fa Tertull coming fo avoited mitive ore were anoi recreation regard the universal St. Cyp speaks of which the purged episcopal functions from the diocessans, and the advantage of by idle or consequence it seems to consist in the relief of hostility, which is a series of papal bulls, and, it is true, by two letters of Damasus I. and the latter is merely an inter-c. Hispal. II. A.D. 619, epi to presbyteri, of which (treats), but continuing in from Leo III. down to Pope , Archbishop of Bourges, of whom, however, takes of affirming charcispisopi and consequently refusing of presbyters and (has done), but orders canonical limits;—and conciliar decrees,—Conc. Capit. tit. iv. c. 1, Paris. Meld. A.D. 845, can. 44, 8, and, Capitul. v. 168, 323, 324,—annulling all isopsci, and ordering them "true" bishops; and finally appointments of clerepi—however lingered on for and Germany, as applied dignitaries in particular as wholly irrelevant to its meaning (see instances in such—i. e. omitting the vacant bishops above mention of course no question of truly bishops, both in almost certain, both from ions, and even from the long opponents just spoken could be urged against them, of Neo-Caesarea compared ples,—that the Council of air consecration by a single actually were so conse- decree might mean merely and viveaba, but the actual the term to intend come) exceptional case of a d [Act. Episc. Cenoman. e times to have been oros in order that he might ly proves the general rule id that they were conse- contrary to canon,—then bishops. And Pope Nicholas they were so. Undoubtedly in the East, and were prac-deacons in the West. And ture of the functions to be limited would naturally t. The language of the thers (c. g. St. Basil. M. in St. Athanasius [Apol. II. distinguishes them both from presbyters, and again from country presbyters), at first they were bishops of the word The special their appointment probably when they had undoubtedly there sunk down into presbyters. It ought to be said, however, that authorities are divided upon the question: English writers mainly (Beveridge, Hammond, Cave, Bingham, Routh, to whom may be added the weighty authority of Van Espen) asserting their episcopal character, while others (see a list in Bing. II. xiv. 2, 3, to which may be added Morinus and Du Cange) allege them to have been presbyters. It need hardly be said that they are not identical with either conditors or suffragans, properly so called: although they do bear a close resemblance to such bishops as, e. g. the Bishop of Dover in pre-Reformation times in England, and to the sundry Irish and foreign and other stray bishops, who are found so numerous doing the work of English bishops for them in the 12th to the 18th centuries, and to the suffragans as intended by Henry VIII., and now actually revived in England. (Bellarm. De Clericis, c. 17; Cellot. De Hierarch. iv. 14; Morinus, De Sac. Ord. and Dissert.; De Marca, De Concord., §. ii. 13; Du Cange; Smeec; Bingham; Van Espen.) [A. W. H.]

CHORISTER. [CANTOR.]

CHRISTIANI. A heathen variation of the name Christiani. Instead of Xpianōs, the more classical word, Xpianōs, gracious or good, was commonly supposed to have been the name or title by which Jesus of Nazareth was distinguished, and his followers therefore were called Christiani. The mistake is noticed by Justin Martyr, Tertullian, Lactantius, and others, but the name having a good signification, they do not wholly reject it. Tertullian however remonstrates with the enemies of the faith for prosecuting Christians merely for their name, a name which, according to either derivation, ought to command admiration rather than hatred. "Christianus, quantum interpretatio est, de unctioe delictuurs. Sed et cum perperam Christianus pronunciat a rohis (nam nec nominis certa est notitia peneris) de savitate vel benignitate compositum est. Omitur ergo in hominibus innocens etiam nomen innocuum" (Tertul. Apol. c. 3; Bingham, I. i. 11). [D. B.]

CHRISM. (Μύρον, Χρίσμα; Chrisma. The latter word is sometimes feminine; "miscet ipsam chrismum." Ordo Rom. I. c. 42.) The sacred oil or unguent used in the ceremony of anointing. The term is also used so as to include the oil blessed for the unction of catechumens and of the sick.

St. Basil (De Spiritu, S. c. 66 [nl. 27]) mentions the blessing of the oil of anointing for use in baptism as one of the observances derived from the earliest times by unwritten tradition. The earliest extant testimonies to its use, whether in baptism or in other ceremonies of the church, are the following.

Tertullian (De Baptismo, c. 7) says, "next, coming forth from the baptismal font, we are anointed with oil blessed according to the primitive ordinances, in accordance with which men were anointed with oil from the horn as a consecration for the priesthood." He seems to regard the anointing with oil as a symbol of the universal priesthood of Christians.

St. Cyprian (Epist. 70, c. 2, p. 768, ed. Hürtel) speaks of the oil sanctified on the altar, with which the baptized are anointed [BAPTISM]; and this oil, he says, the heretics who had no true altar could not have.

In the Apostolical Constitutions (vii. 43, § 3, and 44, § 1) the direction is given, immediately after baptism, "let the ministrant anoint the person baptized with unguent (μύρον), saying over it, 'Lord God . . . grant that this unguent may so effectually work upon him that is baptized that the sweet savour of Thy Christ may abide in him fixed and firm.'" In this case, the unguent was evidently perfumed. There is nothing in the passage to suggest that it had undergone any previous consecration.

Gregory of Nazianzus (Orat. 48, in Julian.) speaks of oil sanctified or consecrated on the spiritual and divine Table; Optatus of Milevis (C. Donatist. vii. p. 102) says that this ointment is compounded (conditur) in the name of Christ; and the Pseudo-Dionysius (De Hierarch. Eccles. c. 4) mentions the use of the sign of the cross in the consecration of it.

The privilege of consecrating chrism was in comparatively early times strictly confined to the episcopal order. The twentieth canon of the first council of Toledo (A.D. 398) censures those presbyters who ventured to prepare chrism for themselves, and desires them to send a deacon or subdeacon to fetch the chrism from the bishop, so as to be in time for the festivities of Easter Day. To the same effect writes Bishop Montanus to the clergy of Palencia and to Theoribius (Hardouin's Concilia, ii. 1143).

The greater quantity of chrism was probably at this time consecrated immediately before Easter, but it does not appear that the consecration was as yet limited to a particular day; on the contrary, the canon above cited expressly lays it down that the bishop might consecrate chrism at any time. But in the 5th century it became an established custom to consecrate the chrism and oil for use throughout the year on Maundy Thursday. Pope Leo complains in a letter to his namesake, the Emperor of the East (Epist. 156, p. 1324), that in consequence of the murder of Proterius, bishop of Alexandria, the oblation was prevented and no chrism was consecrated. Eligius of Noyon († 658), preaching on Maundy Thursday (Hom. 10 in Cocua Dom. p. 245, Biblioth. Patr. Colon.) speaks of chrism being consecrated on that day throughout the Christian world. In the empire the consecration on Maundy Thursday was enjoined by a capitulary of Charles the Great (Concil. Germani v. i. 342); yet at a somewhat later date the custom had probably not become universal; for a synod of Meaux of the year 845 forbade (canon 46) the preparation of chrism on any other day, as if such preparation was even then not quite unknown.

The Gelasian Sacramentary has a Missa Chrismatis on Maundy Thursday, referring to the consecration both of chrism and of oil for the unction of the sick (Migne's Patrol. lxxv. p. 1099). The Gregorian Sacramentary has also on the same day full directions for the consecration of oil and chrism in the mass (pp. 66-69); the ceremony consists of benediction, and breathing on the prepared unguent [AMPULLA]. With this may be compared the directions of the Ordo Rom. I. (App. c. 7, p. 34), which are probably of about the same age. Some of the later Ordines (see O. R. X. pp. 97, ff.; XV. pp. 480 f.) also give directions for the benediction of chrism by the pope on Maundy Thursday. It appears from the Ordo last referred to that it was at one time customary for the pope to bless chrism only in the year of his coronation, and every seventh year afterwards.

It appears from the Euchologion that in the Greek Church also the blessing of chrism is one of the ceremonies of Maundy Thursday.

The chrism is not simple oil, but oil mixed with balsam. Elicius of Noyon (Hom. 8, In Cleti Dom.) tells us that the mingling of balsam with the oil typifies the union of regal and sacerdotal glory. Compare Tertullian (De Bapt. 7), cited above. And Gregory the Great (In Cantic. i. 13) refers the balsam of Agaddi to that balsam which, mixed with oil and blessed by the bishop, makes chrism, typifying the gifts of the Holy Spirit. For the Eastern Church, the Pseudo-Dionysius the Areopagite testifies (Hierarch. Eccl. c. 4) that the sacred unguent (ἱεράριον) or chrism is composed of fragrant substances. The modern receipt for its composition (as given in the Euchologion) prescribes, in fact, besides oil and wine, thirty-six different kinds of aromatics.

For the principal uses of chrism, see BAPTISM, AFFIRMATION, ORDINATION. [C.]

CHRISMAL (Chrismale). (1) The vessel or ask in which the consecrated oil or CHRISM was contained [AMPULLA].

(2) A vessel for the reservation of the consecrated Host. In the Rheims MS. of the Gregorian Sacramentary (p. 432, ed. Ménard) is given a "Præfatio Chrismalis," while the Ordo Romanus in the corresponding place has the rubric, "Præfatio vasculi in quo Eucharistia conservatur." It is of this kind of chrismal that Egbert (Penit. xii. 6; in Haddan and Stubbs' Councils, lii. 428) and Halitgar (Penit. c. 10, p. 701, Migne) speak, as of a vessel which the priest carried with him and might lose. Some, however, take this chrismal for the CORPORAL.

(3) A cloth used to cover relics. In the Life of Elicius, attributed to St. Ouen (ii. 71), we read of a miracle wrought upon one who rubbed his face with the fringe of a chrismal which covered the relics of the saint.

(4) Old-English Chrism. The white cloth laid over the head of one newly baptized, after the unction with chrism [BAPTISM, p. 163]. This cloth is called in Theodore's Poenitential (ii. iv. 7; Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 193) "pannus crismatis;" in later authors, "vestis crismalis," "crismalis pannus," "mitra baptizatorum," "crismale capitum." (Ducange, s. v.) [C.]

CHRISMARIUM. The vessel in which chrism is kept (Council of Auxerre, c. 6). It is sometimes however taken for a reliquary (Gregory of Tours, De Mirac. S. Martini, iv. 32; Fortunatus, Vita Germani Paris. c. 47). [C.]

CHRISOM. [CHRISMAL.]

CHRIST, PICTURES OF. [JESUS CHRIST IN ART.]

CHRISTEMPOREIA, Χριστεμπορεία—the selling of Christ—a name sometimes employed in the 5th century to signify simony. During the ages of persecution there was no place for simoniacal transactions; but when the higher offices of the Church brought wealth and dignity to their possessors, there were not wanting ambitious and worldly men who sought to obtain such offices by bribery or other unworthy means. To check and prevent such discreditable practices, severe laws were enacted both in church and state as early as the 5th century. The Council of Chalcedon (c. 2) decreed that if any bishop gave ordination or an ecclesiastical office or preferment of any kind for money, he himself should lose his office and the party so preferred be deposed. Other like decrees occur in the so-called Apostolical Canons (c. 29), the Council of Constantinople under Gennadius, A.D. 459; the 2nd Council of Orleans, Bracara, and many others. The imperial laws also were no less stringent in regard to this abuse. Eg. it was enacted by one of Justinian's Novels (123, c. 1), that whenever a bishop was to be chosen, the electors should take an oath and insert it in the election paper that they did not choose him for any gift or promise or friendship, or any other cause, but only because they knew him to be a man of the true Catholic faith and of blameable life and good learning. And in another law (Novel 137, c. 2) it is further provided that the party elected shall also at the time of his ordination, take an oath upon the holy Gospels that he neither gave nor promised by himself or other, nor hereafter will give to his ordainer or to his electors, or any other person, anything to procure him an ordination. And for any bishop to ordain another without observing the rule prescribed, is deposition, by the same law, both for himself and the person so ordained.

These were some of the securities required by the ancient Church against the practice which they stigmatized by the designation of Christemporeia (Bingham, iv. 3, 4). [D. B.]

CHRISTENING. [BAPTISM.]

CHRISTIACUM CONCILIUM. [CRESSY.]

CHRISTIANA, or CHRISTINA, virgin, μεγαλομάρτυς, martyr at Tyrus in Italy (?) A.D. 200, is commemorated July 24 (Mart. Bedae, Rom. Vet., Usuardi, Cal. Byzant.).

CHRISTMAS (FESTIVAL OF) (ἡμέρα γενεθλίου, τὰ γενέθλια, Natalis, Natalitia, Nativitas, Domini, &c. From the latter is derived the name of the day among peoples of the Latin race [e.g. the French Noël], and also among the Celtic nations, which were Christianized by Latin-speaking missionaries. In Germany the day is called the Weihnachtsfest from the solemn vigils which preceded the festival itself. The English Christmas [so the Dutch Kerstmisse, Kersmis, whence Kerst-maend, a name for December], analogous to such forms as Candlemas, Lammas, Michaelmas, Childermas, superseded the older name Yule [Anglo-Saxon, Geol], by which the day is still known among the Scandinavian nations).

I. Origin of Festival.

It is not hard to understand why the Christian Church should have commemorated by an annual festival the Saviour's Incarnation. How far, however, the church was led by the possession of actual historical evidence to assign, as it has done, December 25 as the date of the Nativity, is a matter on which it is impossible to speak otherwise than head, due nicious agree as the tradi almost univ Eastern Chu not altogeth been some t tion for Tert the Jews at stratum of t investigation Further, st astronomical probable th the end of may be mad which refer 239). See al

849. On th various grou
bility of autumn. Th Talmonicae
make it coin encies, and a same way in Pentecost an arguments n
Old Testame Niana, and if a half, as Li then since o ministry was iii. 23), we ha Tasi or Sept
Agatha, be inf
xiv. 16, 17, that the Feas great Jewish and Pentecost matter thus, tagible histo
To the same e Jahlesky (*J Xristinis C tunnis etno a
vol. iii. pp. 31 Müller, Der-S 1827), misint statement (i. over their flo been possible date, seeing t rainy season, a been under sh ever, on this p of Biblical Ch Many learn period at whic in favour of as an adaptati heaven festivi this kind we a*

* Eved in very water was clean (c. 476 a.d.). in
* No one knows and this only
He was born in
p. 163.

were not wanting among those who sought to obtain other unworthy means, such as the election of a pope by a discreditable practice both in church and in the world during the last century. The Council of Trent, if any bishop or presbyter of any diocese should refuse to be elected, or if he himself should refuse to be elected, or if he should be elected in a manner not in accordance with the canon-law, the Council of Trent, A. D. 1545; the Council of Trent, and many others, were no less stringent in this respect, than it was enacted by the Council of Trent, A. D. 1545, that whenever the electors should take the election paper that they had drawn for any gift or promise, or for any other cause, but only because he was a man of the true and blameless life and good law (Novel 137, c. 2) that the party elected by the ordination, take an oath that he neither gave or other, nor hereafter give or to his electors, or to procure him an bishop to ordain another law prescribed, is deposited for himself and the the securities required by the canon-law, which practice which designation of Christendom. [D. B.]

BAPTISM.]

ONCHILUM. [CRESSY.]

CHRISTINA, virgin, at Tyrus in Italy (?) died July 24 (Mart. Bedae, Byzant.).

FESTIVAL OF) (ἡμέρα τῆς Natalis, Natalitia, Nati-om the latter is derived om peoples of the Latin nativitas), and also among were Christianized by rles. In Germany the Rechtsfest from the solemn the festival itself. The the Dutch Kerstnisse, maend, a name for Deuch forms as Candlemas, Chilermans, superseded [Anglo-Saxon, God], by known among the Scasof Festival.

understand why the Christian announced by an annual Incarnation. How far was led by the possession ence to assign, as it has the date of the Nativity, is is impossible to speak

otherwise than most doubtfully.* On the one hand, due weight must be given to the unanimous agreement of the Western Church as far as the tradition can be traced back, and to the almost universal acceptance of this view by the Eastern Church at an early date. It is certainly not altogether impossible that there may have been some trustworthy tradition, some foundation for Tertullian's remark as to the archives of the Jews stored up at Rome, some slight substratum of truth underlying the legend as to the visitation of the day by Julius I. (vide infra). Further, sundry independent considerations, astronomical and otherwise, tend to make it probable that our Lord's birth took place near the end of the year. On this point reference may be made to Seyffarth's Chronologia Sacra, which refers the Nativity to December 22 (p. 239), see also Ideler, Chronologie, vol. ii. pp. 385 sqq. On the other hand, some have argued on various grounds in favour of the greater probability of the Nativity having been in the autumn. Thus Lightfoot (Horae Hebraicae et Talmudicae, vol. ii. p. 32, ed. Gandell) would make it coincide with the Jewish Feast of Tabernacles, and associate it with that Festival in the same way in which the Passover and Easter, Pentecost and Whitsuntide correspond. His arguments mainly turn on the interpretation of Old Testament prophecies; e.g. our Lord died in Nisan, and if His ministry lasted three years and a half, as Lightfoot infers from Daniel ix. 27, then since our Lord at the beginning of His ministry was ἔτιω ἑπτάκοττα ἀρχόμενος (Luke iii. 23), we have, reckoning back from His death, Tisri or September for the season of His birth. Again, he infers from a comparison of Zechariah vi. 16, 17, that it would be most improbable that the Feast of Tabernacles alone of the three great Jewish festivals should fail of the honour by which the Passover became exalted into Easter, and Pentecost into Whitsuntide. To decide the matter thus, however, in the absence of any more tangible historical evidence, is obviously unsafe. To the same end but on different grounds argues Jablonsky (Dissertationes si. de origine Festi Natalis Christi in Ecclesia Christiana quantum stato die celebrari solent, in his Opuscula, vol. iii. pp. 317 sqq. Amsterdam 1809. See also Winter, Der Stern der Weisen, p. 110, Copenhagen 1827), maintaining for example that St. Luke's statement (ii. 8), of the shepherds keeping watch over their flocks by night would hardly have been possible on the assumption of the December date, seeing that it would then have been the rainy season, and the flocks would therefore have been under shelter. A further discussion, however, on this point rather belongs to the province of Biblical Chronology.

Many learned men have seen in the particular period at which we celebrate Christmas, evidence in favour of our viewing the Christian festival as an adaptation of previously existing Jewish or heathen festivals; to the more striking views of this kind we shall now briefly refer.

* Even in very early times the great uncertainty of the matter was clearly felt. Thus Jacob, bishop of Edessa (d. 578 A.D.), is quoted by Dionysius Bar-Salibi as saying, "No one knows exactly the day of the nativity of the Lord, this only is certain, from what Luke writes, that He was born in the night" (Assmann, Bibl. Cr. vol. ii. p. 163).

(3) Some, as Oldermann (De festo Evacuorum Judaico, origine festi Natalis Christi, 1715) have viewed Christmas as a continuation and development of the Jewish Feast of the Dedication, a festival of eight days' duration beginning on Chleu 25 (= December 17), which was the anniversary of the purification of the temple by Judas Maccabaeus after the outrages of Antiochus Epiphanes (see 1 Macc. iv. 52-59; 2 Macc. x. 1-8; Josephus, Antiq. xii. 7, 8). Still while there seem to be several coincidences between the two feasts, such a transference from Judaism to Christianity of which no hint whatever is given in early times is exceedingly unlikely.

(5) Others have derived it from some one or other of the Roman festivals held in the latter part of December, as the Saturnalia, or the Sivillaria which followed them, or the Juvenalia established by Nero. A more striking parallel, however, than any of these is to be found in the Brunalia, or the Natalis Invicti [Solis], when the Sun, then at the winter solstice, was, as it were, born anew, even as Christ the Sun of Righteousness then dawned upon the world. This is the view of Wernsdorf, De origine Solennium Natalis Christi ex festivitate Natalis Invicti, Wittenberg 1757; of Jablonsky partly [supra]; also of Mr. King (Gnostics and their Remains, p. 49), who derives the Roman festival from the Mithras-worship of the Sun. Then as Mithraism gradually blended with Christianity, changing its name but not altogether its substance, many of its ancient notions and rites passed over too, and the Birthday of the Sun, the visible manifestation of Mithras himself, was transferred to the commemoration of the Birth of Christ. Numerous illustrations of the above remarks may be found in ancient inscriptions, e.g. SOLI INVICTO ET LUNAE AETERNAE C. VETTI GERMANI LIB. DUO PARATUS ET HERMES DEDERUNT, or ΗΑΙΟ ΜΙΘΙΑ ΑΝΙΚΗΤΗ (Gruter, Inscriptiones Antiquae, p. xxxiii.) In the legend on the reverse of the copper coins of Constantine, SOLI INVICTO COMITI, retained long after his conversion, there is at once an idea of the ancient Sun-God, and of the new Sun of Righteousness. The supporters of this theory cite various passages from early Christian writers indicating a recognition of this view. The sermon of Amrose, quoted by Jablonsky, is certainly spurious, and is so marked in the best editions of his works; it furnishes, however, an interesting illustration of an early date. The passage runs thus, "Bene quodammodo sanctum hunc diem Natalis Domini Solem novum vulgus appellat, et tanta sui auctoritate id confirmat, ut Judaei etiam atque Gentiles in hanc vocem consentiant. Quod libenter amplectamur nobis est, quia oriente Salvatore, non salum humani generis salus, sed etiam solis ipsius claritas innovatur" (Serm. 6, in Appendice p. 397, ed. Bened.). In the Latin editions of Chrysostom is a homily, wrongly ascribed to him, but probably written not long after his time, in which we read, "Sed et Invicti Natalis appellat. Quis utique tam invictus nisi Dominus doster, qui mortem subactam devicit? Vel quod dicunt Solis esse Natalem, ipse est Sol Justitiae, de quo Malachias propheta dixit, Orietur vobis timentibus nomen ipsius Sol Justitiae et sanitas est in penulis ejus" (Sermo de Nativitate S. Joannis Baptistae: vol. ii. 1113, ed. Paris, 1570). Leo the Great finds fault with the baneful persuasion of some "quibus haec dies solemnitate nostrae, non tam de Nativitate Christi, quam de nobi ut dicunt solis ortu, honorabilis videtur" (Serm. 22, § 6, vol. i. p. 72, ed. Ballerini). Again, the same father observes, "Sed hanc adorandum in caelo et in terra Nativitatem nullus nobis dies magis quam hodiernus insinuat, et nova etiam in elementis luce radiante, coram (ad totam) sensibus nostris mirabilis sacramenti ingerit claritatem" (Serm. 23, § 1, p. 87).

We may further cite one or two instances from ancient Christian poets: Prudentius, in his hymn Ad Nativitatem Domini, thus speaks (Cathemerinon xi. init., p. 364, ed. Arevalus):—

"Quid est, quod arcum circumum Sol jam recurrente deserit?
Christusque terra nascitur Qui lucis augeat tramitem?"

Paulinus of Nola also (Poema xiv. 15-19, p. 382, ed. Muratori):—

"Nam post solstitium, quo Christus corpore natus Sole novo gelidae mutavit tempora brumae, Atque salustiferum praestans mortalibus ortum, Procedente die, sicut decreverat notis Jussit."

Reference may also be made to an extract in Assemani (Bibl. Or. ii. 163) from Dionysius Barsalibi, bishop of Amida, which shows traces of a similar feeling in the East; also to a passage from an anonymous Syrian writer, who distinctly refers the fixing of the day to the above cause; we are not disposed, however, to attach much weight to this last passage. More important for our purpose is the proposition of a council of Rome (743 A.D.) "Ut nulla Kalendas Januarias et bromae (=brumalia) colere praesumpserit" (can. 9, Labbé vi. 1548), which shows at any rate that for a long time after the fall of heathenism, many traces of heathen rites still remained. A similar mention is found also in the proceedings of the Quinisext Council (692 A.D.), τὰς οὐτως λεγομένας Καλῆδας καὶ τὰ καλοῦμενα Βρομάλια (can. 66, Labbé vi. 1170).

(7) Others have even derived Christmas from the Northern festival (Yule) in December, in honour of Freya (cf. Loecenius, Antiq. Sueco-Goth. lib. i. c. 5, Holmiae, 1645; Scheffer, Upsalia Antiqua, p. 296, Upsal, 1666).

(8) Jablonsky, while considering, as we have said, that in the festival of the Natalis Invicti is to be found the origin of the celebration of our Lord's Nativity by the Roman Church, maintains (op. cit. pp. 361 sqq.) that the Christians derived this festival primarily from the Basilidians. These, as we learn from a passage of Clement of Alexandria cited at length below, celebrated Christ's baptism as being His manifestation to the world on Tubi 11 (=January 6), and Jablonsky argues that this particular day was suggested to them by the Egyptian festival of the Invenio Osiridis or Festum Osiridis nati or renati (cf. Juvencus viii. 29; Athenagoras, Legatio, c. 22, p. 299, ed. Maranus), itself a commemoration of the renewed life of the sun from year to year, which he thinks was celebrated on that day. (On this last point, however, much doubt exists. Wytténbach, Animadversiones in Plutarchi Moralia; De Iside et Osiride, p. 366 F, considers that if Plutarch's text is correct, the festival took place in Athyr or November, and Kircher, Oedipus Aegyptiacus, vol. ii. part 2, p. 262, would fix it in Choeac or December.)

(9) Some writers have argued that the Christian festival was not so much a transformation of a previously existing non-Christian one, as an independent festival set up as a counter-celebration at the same time with the heathen festival; this distinction, however, is rather apparent than real. Augusti, for example (De antiq. ritibus, vol. i. p. 226), sees in it a standing protest against those sects which denied or obscured the great truth of the Incarnation, such as the Manichaeans, Gnostics, Priscillianists, and the like.

II. History of Festival.

We do not find in the earliest Christian times uniformity of observance as to the day on which our Lord's Nativity was commemorated. The earliest allusion to it is made by Clement of Alexandria, and is of so much importance that we shall give it at length. After speaking of the year of our Lord's birth, he proceeds: "Aad there are some who over curiously (επιπεριγύρορον) assign not only the year but even the day of the birth of our Saviour, which they say was in the 28th year of Augustus, on the 25th day of Pachon.^b And the followers of Basilides celebrate also the day of His baptism (of $\eta\ \delta\ \alpha\ \delta\ \epsilon\ \beta\ \alpha\ \kappa\ \alpha\ \iota\ \tau\ \omega\ \upsilon\ \beta\ \alpha\ \rho\ \tau\ \iota\ \lambda\ \epsilon\ \upsilon\ \alpha\ \tau\ \omega\ \varsigma\ \alpha\ \nu\ \tau\ \omega\ \tau\ \eta\ \nu\ \eta\ \mu\ \epsilon\ \rho\ \alpha\ \nu\ \epsilon\ \rho\ \alpha\ \nu\ \tau\ \omega\ \varsigma$), spending the night before in readings, and they say that it was in the 15th year of Tiberius Caesar, on the 15th of the month Tubi, but some say that it was on the 11th of the same month. . . . Further, some of them say that he was born on the 24th or 25th of Pharmuthi." (Stromata, lib. i. c. 21, vol. i. p. 407, ed. Potter). The two days here specified as those on which the Nativity was celebrated, Pachon 25, and Pharmuthi 24 or 25, are respectively May 20, April 21 or 22 (see Bede, De temporum ratione, c. 11; Patrol. xc. 345). Jablonsky (op. cit.), and Le Nourry (In Clem. Alex. opp. Diss. ii. art. 5) infer from the language of Clement that Tubi 11 or 15 (January 6 or 10) was observed by the followers of Basilides as the day of the baptism as well as of the Nativity. We should venture to doubt this idea, but it is perhaps supported by the passage cited below from Epiphanius. Gisseler also (Kirchen Geschichte, vol. i. p. 154, ed. 3) considers the inference incorrect.

We may probably assume the above-quoted passage to be decisive against any general celebration of the Nativity in Clement's time. Possibly indeed, though as we have already said the inference seems doubtful, he may refer to a celebration of the day by some of the sects of the time, since he speaks of the Basilidians "observing also the day of the baptism." Further, it would seem as if Clement rather censured the attempt to fix accurately the day of our Lord's birth, itself conclusive evidence against a general recognition of the festival in Clement's time.

It was the general custom in early times, in the East, to fix the Nativity on January 6, which thus served as the anniversary both for the Birth ^b Ideler (op. cit. ii. 287 n.) suggests as a reason for this fixing of the day on the part of the Egyptians, that baptizing Christ was born in the 9th month, they referred it to the 9th month of their own calendar.

and the E however a perhaps be of Julian t to a chure with the Marcellin as taking quon ceter planta die
c. 11) on inipar ip
that the re

To deriv distinctly l first place salem, whic to Julius, l letter, thou esting erile of combin derive our (1) a sum ritate Tom the 9th or Zacharias, C Heresis M anonymous Coteler fr tres Aposto substance of of Jerusalem celebrating the same day to scenes con lehem and th both journey necessarily r formation as adding that archives of t be cleared r contra Marci answer declar and finds that the Nativity two document this decision at that time was not at Con murmuring ar been dividing divided the f stry." Accord the bishop of a successor of
ed. Toutte).
A possible e

^c The unhisto equally obvious Julius was dead later. Agnus as obvious corretion known Cyril ("scantia) comen over J. Trullien) transmitted by Epi in Hippolytus, for just articles that we had tried to cite; that the prin ciple of the epiphany together cus, vol. II. part 2, p. 6 or 7 (December.) argued that the Christmas transformation on-Christian one, as an up as a counter-religious with the heathen festi- however, is rather ap- t, for example (Humb. 1), sees in it a standing a which denied or ob- of the incarnation, such as Priscillianists, and

of Festival.

earliest Christian times as to the day on which commemorated. The made by Clement of much importance that. After speaking of th, he proceeds: "And ver curiously (resep- the year but even the saviour, which they Augustus, on the 25th e followers of Basilides His baptism (ol di ar) idroo tiv hapoo e-pri-ct before in readings, as in the 15th year Tabi, as on the 11th of the ner, some of them say e 24th or 25th of Phar- e. 21, vol. I. p. 407, et. here specified as when was celebrated, Pachon or 23, are respectively (see Bede, De temporu c. 345). Jablonsky (op. Clem. Alex. opp. Diss. e language of Clement uary 6 or 10) was ob- of Basilides as the day as of the Nativity. We this idea, but it is per- asage cited below from also (Kirchen-schichte, considers the inference in-sume the above-quoted against any general cele- n Clement's time. Pos- he have already said that he may refer to a cele- ome of the sects of the Basilidians "observ- baptism." Further, it rather censured the ly the day of our Lord's evidence against a general n in Clement's time. custom in early times, in on January 6, which ersary both for the Birth suggests as a reason for this of the Egyptians that be- 9th month, they referred it to calendar.

and the Epiphany. An illustration of this, not however applying to an Oriental Church, may perhaps be derived from the accounts of the visit of Julian the Apostate, when at Vienne in Gaul, to a church with the view of seeming in accord with the religion of his soldiery. Ammianus Marcellinus (lib. xxi. c. 2) speaks of this visit as taking place on the Epiphany ("periarum die quem celebrantes mense Januario Christiani Epiphania dicitant"). and Zenarus Christiani Epiphania dicitant"). It is just possible, however, that the references may be to different events.

To derive illustrations of the practice from distinctly Eastern sources, we may refer in the first place to a letter attributed to Cyril of Jerusalem, which professes to be addressed by him to Julius, bishop of Rome, on this subject. This letter, though a palpable forgery, affords interesting evidence of the existence of the practice of combining the two feasts on January 6. We derive our knowledge of it from two sources: (1) a summary of it given in a letter, De Nativitate Iovanni, of John, bishop of Nicæa (end of the 9th or beginning of the 10th century) to Zacharias, Catholicos of Armenia Major (Combesia, Historia Monothelit. pp. 298 sqq.); and (2) an anonymous Avaykaia dihygias, published by Coteler from a MS. in the Library of Paris (Actes Apostolici, i. 310, ed. 1724). The general substance of these is to the effect that the bishop of Jerusalem complained of the inconvenience of celebrating the Nativity and the Epiphany on the same day, seeing that as he went in person to scenes commemorated by these events, Bethlehem and the Jordan, it was difficult to perform both journeys in one day, and the services were necessarily mutilated. He therefore requests information as to the proper day of the Nativity, adding that Titus carried away to Rome the archives of the Jews from which the fact might be cleared up. (For this point, cf. Tertullian contra Marcionem, lib. iv. c. 7.) The pope in answer declares that he has examined the records and finds that December 25 is the day on which the Nativity should be held. The latter of the two documents we have referred to adds that this decision caused much murmuring—"Now at that time Gregory Theologus [Nazianzen] was at Constantinople, and there arose no small murmuring among the citizens, as though he had been dividing the feast, and they said, Thou hast divided the feast, and art casting us into idolatry." According to this document the name of the bishop of Jerusalem in question was Juvenal, a successor of Cyril (see Cyril. Hierosol. p. 370, ed. Toultée).^a

A possible allusion to this affair may be cited

^a The unhistorical character of these documents is equally obvious whether we take Cyril or Juvenal: for Julius was dead nearly a century before the time of the latter. Again as for Cyril, the letter, according to Coteler's obvious correction, claims to be written not by the well-known Cyril ("who wrote to Constantine" (i. e. Constantine) concerning the appearance of the tuninous cross at Jerusalem) but a later one in the time of Valerius, mentioned by Kipphanus (Itac. lxxvi. 20). This however is impossible, for the end of the pontificate of Julius only has overlapped that of Cyril. Even if, in spite of the letter, we refer it to Cyril, we are no better off, for it is clear that the practice of celebrating the Nativity and the Epiphany together continued in Jerusalem after his time.

from the Loudatio S. Stephani by Basil of Se-leucia, who flourished at the time of the Council of Ephesus (Patrol. Gr. lxxv. 469), who says of Juvenal that he "began to celebrate the glorious and adorable salvation-bringing Nativity of the Lord," which not improbably means celebrated as a distinct festival. Possibly the explanation of the whole thing is that Juvenal initiated some change in accordance with the Western practice, which was then explained as a direct action of the Roman See, and was finally associated with the more famous name of Cyril.

To show that the change was not one made in Palestine, we may further appeal to the Latin homily De Nativitate Domini, found in Latin editions of Chrysostom, which though not received as a genuine writing of that Father, is assigned by Toultée (op. cit. p. 369) to the 4th century or the beginning of the 5th. The writer is contending that the Western plan of dividing the festivals is correct, and finds fault with Orientals who cling to their old method on the ground that they must know best in whose land our Lord's earthly life was past (Chrysostom, vol. I. p. 1116, ed. Paris, 1570).

Important testimony on this point may be derived from Cosmas Indicopleustes (Topographia Christiana, lib. v.; Patrol. Gr. lxxviii. 197), who after referring to the message of the angel to Zacharias and the visit of the Virgin to Elizabeth, says that Christians concur in celebrating the Nativity in the ninth month, on Chocæ 28 (=December 24), "but the people of Jerusalem, as though from what the blessed Luke says that Christ was baptized when 'beginning to be about thirty years old,' celebrate the Nativity on the Epiphany." He then appears to say that the people of Jerusalem were right in supposing that our Lord's baptism fell on the anniversary of His birth, but that the Church had wisely postponed the celebration of one of these events for twelve days lest either festival should meet with insufficient attention. Thus Jerusalem was incorrect in taking the later day for the anniversary of the Nativity. "But the people of Jerusalem alone by a reasonable conjecture, yet not accurately, celebrate [the Nativity] on the Epiphany, and on the Nativity they celebrate the memory of David and of James the Apostle." We further gather from the letter of John of Nicaea already referred to (op. cit. 1141) that the Church of Jerusalem appealed to the authority of James, the Lord's brother, for their practice of celebrating the Nativity on January 6. He adds that in the time of Honorius the patriarchs of Constantinople (Chrysostom), Alexandria, Jerusalem, and Antioch formally acquiesced in the Western plan.

We shall now adduce evidence to show that the practice of the Alexandrian Church agreed in this matter with that of the Church of Jerusalem. In his notes to his Latin translation of the Arabic Preface, Canons and Constitutions of the Nicene Council, Abraham Ecchelenius cites from the Constitutions of the Alexandrian Church, "In die auton Nativitatis et Epiphaniæ eo tempore quo concilium Nicænum conæctum fuit, præcepit ejs patres ut noctu missa celebraretur" (Labbe ii. 402): Cassian^a again (Collatio x. c. 2; Patrol. xlix.

^a It would almost seem as though there were grounds for believing the change to have taken place in Egypt by

IMAGE EVALUATION
TEST TARGET (MT-3)

Photographic Sciences
Corporation

23 WEST MAIN STREET
WEBSTER, N.Y. 14580
(716) 872-4503

lation to be gone through on joining the Roman things is, "If any one on the 25th the Annunciation, the Nativity of Christ, He had previously op. the same MS. an attack κατὰ κακίστων Ἀρμενίων on January 5 in the feast of the Annunciation morning they celebrate, and in the Liturgy the Armenians practice references in invectives (ἄδωκα ἑπισημολογίας of Armenia, in the 3, li. 10, Combefis, Illice-05). The modern Armenians this practice (Nesle, introd. p. 741).

so far as we can trace us to have kept the two Epiphany always unhesitatingly (Comm. in ed. Bened.): "Et dies venerabilis est, non ut in carne, tunc enim ab-paratur."

very ancient Calendarium xlii. 1227), which marks "viii. Kal. Jan. Domini ii Dei," with a note of the

We shall only cite here calendars, that of Buche-which Muratori (De Rebus approximately to the dates actively. These severally as Christ in Bethlehem (l.c.). Other Liturgical (treated of separately.

is forthcoming to show that in the Epiphany was produced festivals, and therefore more important, for Hittorp (In vigilia Theophani, Cologne, 1568) præter undam est, quod isti (i.e. the Epiphany), tot nononoritur sit quam prima illi this is after all only a portance, and the Nativity a festival of the highest sacramentary, which is certain Ordo which Hittorp refers and Charlemagne.

endeavour to show that the December 25, in accordance with, began to take place in the end of the 4th century. It is believed in by Ephrem who is cited as saying, "On the Nativity of His Conception, [of January] was His Nativity (Or. li. 163). The Nativity has been gradual. For, that the Western Church marks the Nativity by a solemn name, and the Nativity by a solemn inference that the former was and was thence introduced into the latter as a separate festival was of

to say nothing of Armenians, we find Epiphanius saying (Haer. li. 24, vol. i. p. 446, ed. Petrus): "For since He was born in the month of January, that is, viii. Id. Jan. which is according to the Romans January 5, according to the Egyptians Tuth 11, according to the Syrians or the Greeks Androspe 6, according to the Cyprians or Salmianians the 5th of the 5th month, according to the Paphians Julius 14, according to the Arabians Aleem 21, according to the Cappadocians Atarta 13, according to the Hebrews Tibleth (Tebeth) 13, according to the Athenians Mienacterion 6 . . ."

It does not appear whether Epiphanius means that all these nations celebrated the Nativity on the day thus indicated: it is more probable that he is merely giving the various equivalents for the day in different systems of reckoning. In fact his mention of the Romans is perhaps conclusive.

The most important piece of evidence, however, towards fixing the date of the change in the East by which December 25 became recognized as the day of the Nativity is to be found in a Homily of Chrysostom to the people of Antioch, εις την γυνθλιον ημεραν του Σωτηρος ημων Ιησου Χριστου (vol. ii. p. 354, ed. Montfaucou), which Montfaucou (p. 352) gives strong reasons for believing to have been delivered on December 25, 386. After saying how earnestly he had wished to see on the day of the Nativity a congregation like that which was then met together, Chrysostom proceeds: "Nevertheless it is not yet the tenth year since this day has been made manifest and plain to us, still as though it had been handed down to us from the beginning (ἀνωθεν) and many years ago, it has flourished thus through your zeal. And so a man would not err who should call it at once new and ancient,—new, in that it has recently been made known to us; but old and ancient, in that it has speedily won an equality with older festivals. . . ."

And as plants of good stock speedily grow up and produce fruit, "so this day too, known from the beginning to those who inhabit the West, but brought to us not many years ago. . . ." The change, however, at first meets with opposition. "I know well," he adds, "that many even yet dispute with one another about it, some finding fault with it and others defending it, . . . since it is old and ancient, for the prophets already foretold His birth, and from the beginning it has been manifest and notable to the dwellers from Thrace even to Gades." Again (§ 2) he refers his hearers to the archives at Rome as a source whence certain evidence on the point could be obtained, and adds "from those who have an accurate knowledge of these things and inhabit that city, have we received this day. For they who dwell there, observing it from the beginning and by old tradition, themselves sent to us new the knowledge of it." Again (§ 5) after fixing April as the time of the Annunciation, he arrives for the Nativity at the month Apellæus (December), * Montfaucou here cites Athanasius (Præf. Comm. in Matth. vol. i. p. 1025, ed. Ben-d. 1787) as speaking of December 25 as the Nativity. But to the first place the Benedictine editors had considerable doubt of the genuineness of the fragment ("si non aperte spurium admodum suspexit videtur, in quo sunt pluraque καθωσθη"); and in the next, it seems rather the death of Herod which is indicated than the birth of our Lord.

"this present month, in which we celebrate the day."

From the above-quoted language of Chrysostom, we may notice; (1) that about the year 386 A.D. the festival of the Nativity, as distinct from and independent of the Epiphany, was a novelty of a few years' standing in the East; (2) that Chrysostom believed that the Western Church had celebrated an independent festival "from the beginning and by old tradition;" (3) that the change was met with opposition, and therefore would be gradual.

Combining, then, Chrysostom's definite testimony with the fact that Epiphanius had, perhaps a little before this time, concurred with the old Eastern view, and that at the time of the Council of Ephesus the change was tacitly recognized at Alexandria, we may fairly argue that in those parts of the Eastern Church where the old plan was still continued (Jerusalem possibly and Armenia certainly), the Western plan was being gradually adopted in the period which we may roughly define as the last quarter of the 4th and the first quarter of the 5th century.

Whether before the time of Chrysostom any part of the Eastern Church observed the Nativity on December 25, it is difficult to say. The date of the various parts of the Apostolic Constitutions (see the Article) being so doubtful, we shall merely cite from them a passage bearing on this point: "Observe the days of the festivals, brethren, and first the Nativity, and let this be celebrated by you on the 25th day of the ninth month. After this let the Epiphany be very greatly honoured in your eyes, on which the Lord revealed to you His Own Godhead; and let this be held on the 6th day of the tenth month" (v. 13; cf. also viii. 33, where the two festivals are again distinguished). Cotelier in his introduction (op. cit. p. 197) also cites a passage found in some MSS. of Anastasius which professes to be quoted from the Apostolic Constitutions, in the present text of which, however, it is not found: "For our Lord Jesus Christ was born of the Holy Virgin Mary in Bethlehem, εν μηνι κατὰ Αλυπτιους Χοιακας κε' [probably a mistake for κθ', which = December 25] Σαραββωρη της ημερας η εστιν προ οκτω κалаων Ιανουαριου."

The result of all this investigation then is roughly this. In the case of the Eastern Church there is no certain evidence pointing to a general celebration of the Nativity on December 25 before the time of Chrysostom. Till then it had been held on January 6 in conjunction with the Epiphany, and even after this date some churches of the East retained for some time their old plan.

In the West we are told that the festival had been recognized, and celebrated on December 25 "from the beginning." We are not able to produce any very ancient witnesses from Western Fathers, but may fairly assume that it had existed sufficiently long for Chrysostom to be able to use reasonably and without fear of contradiction such a word as ἀνωθεν. We have also called attention to the recognition of it in ancient calendars.

Since the time of Chrysostom, the Nativity has been received by all Churches of Christendom as one of their most important festivals. Thus, in a sermon attributed to Gregory of Nyssa, but of doubtful authenticity, it is said: "Now is heard accordant throughout the whole inhabited world the sound of them that celebrate the feast." (Patrol. Gr. xlv. 1148). Chrysostom (In B. Philogonum 4, vol. i. 497) speaks of it as second in importance to no festival, "which a man would not be wrong in calling the chief (μυρρόβορως) of all festivals."

Several sermons are extant of Pope Leo I. on the subject of the Nativity, further exemplifying this statement (Serm. 21-30, vol. i. pp. 64 sqq. ed. Ballerini).

It is curious that in one of his epistles Augustine does not seem to recognize the Nativity as a festival of the first order, where after referring to the Divine Institution of the Sacraments, he proceeds to those things "quæ non scripta sed tradita custodimus," on the authority of the Apostles and the Church, "sicut quod Dominus Passio et Resurrectio et Ascensio in celum et Adventus de celo Spiritus Sancti anniversaria solemnitate celebratur" (Epist. 54 § 1 [olim 118]; Patrol. xxxiii. 200). Yet he deemed the festival of such importance that he has written not a few sermons for the day, showing the celebration of this festival in Africa (see Serm. 184-196, 369-372; Patrol. xxviii. 995 sqq., xxxix. 1655 sqq.; the authenticity of the latter group, however, is doubtful).

III. Liturgical Notices.

The Roman Church evidently accounted the Nativity one of the most important feasts from very early times. Their earliest Sacramentary, that of Pope Leo, contains nine Masses for the day (vol. ii. 118 sqq.). There is, however, no notice of a Vigil. In the Preface in the first Mass it is said: "Quoniam quidquid Christianæ professionis devotio celebratur, de hac sunit solemnitas: principium, et in hujus muneris mysterio continetur." See again the Preface in the seventh Mass: "Atque ideo sicut primis fidelibus exitit in sui credulitate pretiosum, ita nunc excusabilem conscientiam non relinquit, quæ salutaris mysterii veritatem, toto etiam mundo testificante non sequitur."

In the Gallesian Sacramentary four Masses altogether are given: (1) For the Vigil at Nones; (2) For the Vigil in nocte; (3) For the Vigil Mane primi; (4) For the Nativity in die; that is to say, there are practically three Masses on the Nativity itself. After this again are several prayers for the Nativity, whether at Vespers or Matins.

The Gelasian Sacramentary borrowed a good deal from the Leonine here. The Collect and Secreta for the services of the Vigil at Nones and Mane primi, and a Collect and the Preface for the Nativity itself as well as two (the 2nd and 4th) of the added prayers all come from the large number of Masses for the day in the older Sacramentary (Patrol. lxxiv. 1055 sqq.). We now pass on to the Gregorian Sacramentary. Here, as in the previous case, there are altogether four services with a large number of alternative forms. The second mass is connected in some MSS. with the church of S. Maria Major; thus, Natalis Domini ad S. Mariam Majorem (MS. Rodrudi), Nocte ad S. Mariam (MS. Ratoldi); and the third contains also the commemoration of S. Anastasia, and one MS. mentioned by Ménard (in loc.) gives two prefaces for the day, one for the Saint and the other for the Nativity (cf. Greg. Sacr. col. 5 sqq. ed. Menard). See also the Antiphonary, where, as before, four Masses in all are recognized (ib. col. 657 sqq.), and a still more elaborate set of forms is given in the Liber Responsa attributed to Gregory (ib. col. 741 sqq.).

The Ordo Romanus (ed. cit. p. 19) prescribes three Lectures from Isaiah for the Vigil of the Nativity: (1) ix. 1-8. 4; (2) xl. 1-xli. 20; (3) li. 1-15. The Ambrosian Liturgy of the Church of Milan (Pamelius, Liturgy. Lat. vol. i. pp. 293 sqq.) gives one Mass for the day.

We may now briefly examine the Liturgical monuments of the Gallican Church. In the ancient Lectionary of that Church, there were originally twelve Lectures for the Vigil of the Nativity. Those which are yet extant, five in number, are: Isaiah xlv. 23-xlvi. 13; an extract from a sermon of Augustine^b De Nativitate Domini: Isaiah liv. 1-1xi. 7; Malachi ii. 7-iv. 6; St. John i. 1-15.

The Lectures for the Nativity itself are Isaiah vii. 10-ix. 8 (with some omissions); Daniel [Benedicite] cum benedictione; Hebrews i. 1-3; St. Luke ii. 1-19 (Mabillon, de Liturgia Gallicana, lib. ii. pp. 106 sqq.). In illustration of this plan of having twelve Lectures for the Vigil of the Nativity, here doubtless equivalent to the Matins of the Nativity, Mabillon (l. c.) cites from the Regula of Aurelian, bishop of Arles: "In Natale Domini et in Epiphania tertia hora surgite: dicite unum nocturnum et facite sex missas [=lectiones] de Isaiâ prophetâ; iterum dicite nocturnum, et legantur alie sex de Evangelio" (Patrol. lxxviii. 390).

It will be seen that in the Gallican Lectionary one Mass only is presupposed for the day of the Nativity, and in accordance with this the Gothic-Gallic Missal (op. cit. pp. 188 sqq.) gives us one Mass for the Vigil and one for the day. In the ancient Gallican Missal, the forms of the Preface "ad vesperum . . . Domini" and prayers "ad initium noctis . . . Domini," "in media nocte Natalis Domini."

The Mozarabic Missal gives us but one Mass for the day and ignores the Vigil. The Prophetic Lecture, the Epistle, and the Gospel are respectively Isaiah ix. 1-7; Hebrews i. 1-12; St. Luke ii. 6-20 (ed. Leslie, pp. 37 sqq.). The Brevisary gives Matins for the Vigil; and for the day of the Nativity, (1) Vespers that is on the evening preceding December 25; (2) Matins and Lauds. Into the Vesper service enters the noble hymn, "Veni Redemptor Gentium."

It will have been noticed that the Roman Liturgies, the Gelasian and Gregorian, give three Masses for the Nativity, while those for the Churches of Milan, Gaul, and Spain give but one. In the case of the Gallican Church this may be illustrated from Gregory of Tours, who in the life of Nicetius of Lyons (Vite Patrum, viii. 11, p. 1196, ed. Bened.), says: "Facta quoque hora tertia, cum populus ad missarum solemniam conveniret, hic mortuus in ecclesiam est delatus." On the other hand, we must mention that in a writing of Eufonius, a Spanish bishop, who wrote 845 A.D., is an allusion to a triple Mass on the Nativity, Easter, Whitsunday, and the Transfiguration (Patrol. cvii. 888). This ivity (cf. Greg. Sacr. col. See also the Antiphonary, Masses in all are recog-), and a still more elabo- in the Liber Responsalis (ib. col. 741 sqq.).

^b This passage, attributed to Augustine, does not seem to be his, nor is it included in his works.

(ed. cit. p. 19) prescribes the saints for the Vigil of the Liturgy of the Church Liturg. Lutt. vol. i. pp. as for the day.

ly examine the Liturgical Church. In the an- that Church, there were ions for the Vigil of the ch are yet extant, five in r. 23-rlvi. 13; an ex- of Augustine's De Nativ. 1-1xi. 7; Malachi ii. 7-.

Nativity itself are Isaiah (omissions); David's Actiones; and Hebrews i. 1-13; Alion, de Liturgia Gallicana, In illustration of this plan ions for the Vigil of the s equivalent to the Matins Alion (l. c.) cites from the op of Arles: "In Natale tertia hora surgite: di- et facile sex missas [=lec- turae]; iterum dicite nae- aliae sex de Evangelio" n the Gallican Lectionary pposed for the day of the onance with this the Gothic- p. 188 sqq.) gives us one e for the day. In the und forms of the Pre- Domini" and prayers s Domini," "in media al gives us but one Mass the Vigil. The Prophets, and the Gospel are re- -7; Hebrews i. 1-12; St. psle, pp. 37 sqq.). The for the Vigil; and far (1) Vespers; that is on December 25; (2) Matins esper service enters the mptom Gentium."

noticed that the Roman and Gregorian, give three ty, while those for the aul, and Spain give but the Gallican Church this n Gregory of Tours, who of Lyons (Vite Patrum, ed.), says: "Facta quon- ed, ad missarum so- mortuus in ecclesiam est er hand, we must men- of Edeonens, a Spanish A. D., is an allusion to a vity, Easter, Whitsunday, (Patrol. cvi. 883). This is probably a leaning to the Roman plan, or it may be a custom of independent origin.

ed to Augustine, does not seem in his works.

The cause of the triple Mass in the Gelasian and Gregorian Sacramentaries is thus explained by Mabilion (l. c.), that in consequence of three being the number of "stations" discharged in ancient times in Rome by a Pope on that day, three Masses were instituted. We shall again quote the ancient Ordo Romanus on this point (p. 19): "Prima die Vigilinae Natalis Domini hora nonnunt Missam ad S. Mariam. Qua epleta canunt vesperinalem synaxim, dehinc vadunt ad cibum. In crepusculo noctis intrat Apostolicus ad vigiliam in praefatam Ecclesiam, tunc non cantant ibi invitatorium ad introitum, sed epletis vigiliis et matutinis, sicut in Antiphonario continetur, ibidem canunt primam Missam in nocte. Qua epleta, vadunt ad S. Anastasiam canere aliam Missam de nocte. Dehinc pergunt ad S. Petrum, ut ibi vigiliis celebrent, ab eo loc ubi invenerit eos psallere qui ibidem erant. Ipsi enim intrant ad vigiliam debito tempore in processu noctis et canunt invitatorium et prosequuntur ordinem Antiphonarii. Unde haec nocte describuntur." The above will account for the commemoration of S. Anastasin at the viously groundless statement that the institution of these nocturnal Masses is to be referred to Pope Telephorus (ob. 138 A. D.).

Attention has already been called to the fact of the early recognition of the Vigil of the Nativity. In addition to the examples cited, we may further appeal to a still older witness, Augustine, who speaks of it in one of his letters (Epist. 65 ad Xantippum [olim 236]; Patrol. xxiii. 234). It differed in this respect from the ordinary type of Vigil in that it continued through the night, making with the Nativity itself one great solemnity. Thus we read in the letter of the Bishops Lupus and Euphronius to Bishop Talasius: "Vigilia Natalis Domini longe alio more quam Paschae Vigilia celebranda, quia hic lectiones Nativitatis legendae sunt, illic autem Passionis. Epiphaniae quoque sollemnitas habet suum specialem cultum. Quae Vigiliae vel maxime aut perpete nocte aut certe in matutinum vergente curandae sunt. Paschatis autem Vigiliae a Vespere ruro in Matutinum usque perducitur" (Patrol. lviii. 66). In the Capitula of Theodore of Tarsus, archbishop of Canterbury (ob. 690 A. D.), the difference of the practice of the Latin and Greek Church in this matter is pointed out, in that the former began the Vigil at Noons, the latter late in the evening (Capit. 66; Patrol. xcix. 957). The Gelasian, Grego-

¹ This seems more probable than the view adopted by Quenell in his notes on the works of Leo I. (Epist. 9 [1 ed. Quenell], vol. ii. 1399), that the custom arose from a distinct authorization in the Roman Church to hold several masses, as might be found necessary, on festivals of great importance, such as Christmas and Easter, when there would be a great concourse of people, more than a church could contain at once. He quotes an illustration of this from our own church, when the Council of Oxford (1222 A. D.), under Stephen Langton, archbishop of Canterbury, enacted "ad haec duximus statuendum districtius inhibentes ne sacerdos qui plurim missarum solacia celebrat his in die, ex quo pro die Nativitatis et Resurrectionis Domini fecit vel in exequiis detineturorum." (Can. 6; Labbé, vol. xl. p. 274.)

rian, and Pamelius' Ambrosian Sacramentaries give also Masses for the Octave of the Nativity, January 1, which would also of necessity be the anniversary of the day of the Circumcision, by which express name it is denoted in some other Liturgies. [CIRCUMCISION.]

The existence of the group of important festivals between Christmas and the Epiphany seems to point to a wish on the part of the early Church to render the whole season one great festival, by redeeming as much as possible of the time from ordinary worldly business, in commemoration of persons more or less indirectly connected with our Lord's Nativity. Thus a Council of Tours declares: "Inter Natale Domini et Epiphania omni die festivitates sunt itemque praebeantur." (Concil. Turonense ii. can. 17; Labbé, vol. v. 856). From the great importance of the festival, the Nativity, it happening to coincide with a fast, claimed the right of overriding the fast. Indeed there was a fast preceding the Nativity which just stopped short of it. Thus Aurelian, already quoted, says (l. c.), "A Calendis Novembris usque ad Domini Natale quotidie jejunandum absque Sabbato et Dominico." Cf. also the canon we have just cited of the Second Council of Tours, "De Decembri usque ad Natale Domini omni die jejunent." We may further cite in illustration Epiphanius (Adversus Haereses: Epist. to Fidei 22, vol. i. p. 1105), who, after saying that there is no fast throughout the fifty days of Pentecost, adds, "Nor on the day of the Epiphany, when the Lord was born in the flesh, is it lawful to fast, although it happen to fall on the fourth or the sixth day of the week." It will be remembered from a previously cited passage of this writer so that his day of the Epiphany is at once Epiphany and Nativity.

As a festival of so great importance, Christmas was one of the seasons, on which it was especially enjoined on all, clergy and laity alike, to communicate. Thus the Council of Agle (506 A. D.) orders: "Ut cives qui superiorum sollemnium, id est Paschae ac Natalis Domini vel Pentecostes festivitibus cum episcopis interesse neglexerint, cum in civitatibus communionis vel benedictionis accipiendae causa se nosse debent, triennio a communione priventur ecclesiae." Again: "Si quis in clero constitutus ab ecclesia sua diebus sollemnibus defuerit, id est Nativitate, Epiphania, Pascha vel Pentecoste, dum potius saecularibus lucris studet quam servitio Dei parat, convent ut triennio a communione suspendatur. . . ." (Concil. Agathense, can. 63, 64; Labbé, iv. 1393). Springing from the same tendency is the injunction of the First Council of Orleans (511 A. D.): "Ut nulli civium Paschae, Natalis Domini vel quinquagesimae sollemnitate in villa licet celebrare, nisi quem infirmitas prohibuit renuisse" (Concil. Aurelianense i. can. 25; ibid. 1408). It was allowed by the Council of Epao (517 A. D.) for people of rank (cives superiorum natalium) to invite their bishop to themselves at Christmas or Easter to receive his blessing (Concil. Eptanense, can. 35; ibid. 1580).

IV. Christmas Presents. As coming at the beginning of the ecclesiastical year, and as being in itself a time when from the Great Gift then given by God to man, all memories end to peace and friendship, the season of Christmas has from time immemorial been associated with the mutual giving of presents and the interchange of cordial wishes.

A similar custom prevailed among the Romans, who on the Calends of January offered to the emperor or to their patrons presents called strenae (hence French étrenne). See, for instance, Suetonius, Calig. 42; cf. Aug. 57, Tib. 34; also Dion Cassius, liv. 35.

That the Christian custom is derived from the above we do not of course affirm, although we are far from denying the possibility of such an origin.

Traces of the custom are to be found in the Greek Church, as we learn from Gear (Notes to Codinus, De Officiis Constantinopolitanis, c. 6; Patrol. Gr. clvii. 308), who speaks of boys and youths running about the streets at this season, and "ad amicorum portas modulus senis ac musicis instrumentis $\pi\omicron\lambda\upsilon\chi\rho\nu\alpha$ [wishes for long life and happiness; see Ducange, Glossarium s. v.] presterunt, senia reportaturi, cunctique $\chi\rho\iota\sigma\tau\omicron\upsilon\gamma\epsilon\mu\eta\eta\tau\iota\kappa\omicron\iota\varsigma$ pro natalitiis Christi muneribus se cumulante certantim."

The custom of the strenae as an offshoot of heathenism, did not find much favour in the eyes of the early Church. Thus in a sermon De Calendis Januarii, wrongly attributed to Augustine, we read, "Diabolicus etiam strenae et ab aliis accipiunt et ipsi aliis tradunt" (Patrol. xxxix. 2002, 2004).

V. Literature. We must express our obligations here especially to Jablonsky's Dissertationes II., Martene, De Antiquis Ecclesiae Ritibus, vol. III. pp. 31 sqq. ed. Venice, 1783; Augusti, Christi. Archæologie, vol. i. pp. 211 sqq.; Binnerim, Denk-würdigkeiten, vol. v. part 1, pp. 528 sqq. Reference may also be made to Bynæus, De Natali Jesu Christi, Amsterdam 1694; Kandler, De Natali Christi, Rotterdam 1699; Köpken, ἱστορικὴ βίβλος, Rostock 1705; Ittig, De Ritū festiuitatis Nat. Christi celebrandi, Wernsdorf, De Originibus Solennium Natalis Christi, Wittenberg, 1757.

CHRISTOPHORI. A name sometimes applied to Christians in the ancient Church, as expressing the Presence of Christ within them by His Spirit. As early as Ignatius we find the appellation Theophori in use, to signify that Christians are the Temple of God; and Christophori also occurs in the early writers in a similar sense: e.g. in the epistle of Philens, bishop of Thmuis, recorded by Eusebius, l. viii. c. 10, we find him speaking of the martyrs of his own time as $\chi\rho\iota\sigma\tau\omicron\phi\omicron\rho\iota$ $\mu\epsilon\mu\omicron\rho\tau\epsilon\varsigma$, because they were temples of Christ and acted by His Holy Spirit (Bingham, i. 1, 4).

CHRISTOPHORUS. (1) Martyr in the city of Sines, A. D. 256, is commemorated July 25 (Mart. Rom. Vet., Usuardi); April 28 (Mart. Bedæ); May 9 (Cal. Byzant.).

(2) Monk, martyr at Cordova, Aug. 20 (Mart. Usuardi). [C.]

CHRONITAE, $\chi\rho\omicron\nu\iota\tau\alpha$. A name of reproach given to the Catholics or orthodox Christians by Aetius the Arian and his party: intimating that their religion was but for a time, that its day was being fast spent, and that it must soon give place to the more enlightened system of Arianism: a conceit which has been characteristic of heresy in all ages of the Church (Bingham, l. iii. 16). [D. B.]

CHRONOLOGY. The object of the several articles in this work relating to chronology is to describe the methods used by the writers of our period in measuring time, and the reduction of their methods to that at present in use in this country. This evidently involves the consideration of the various non-ecclesiastical calendars, or modes of reckoning time, employed by writers of the first eight centuries, and of the modifications introduced into them by the influence of Christianity.

To place an event in time, we must have a fixed epoch or era from which to measure, and a fixed, or at least, a determinable, standard by which to measure the interval from that era. The principal epochs from which intervals of time have been measured are given under ERA. The great natural divisions of time are days, lunations, and solar years; and almost every nation has either endeavoured to discover the relation which lunations bear to solar years (EPACT), and so to keep the lunar months in some kind of correspondence with the seasons of the solar year; or has abandoned the observation of the moon in its division of time, and divided the solar year into twelve months, somewhat longer than lunar months. See MONTH, YEAR. Further, nearly all nations have adopted for the convenience of common life purely conventional divisions of time, not corresponding to any natural division, such as the Roman ANNUUS. The conventional division with which we are principally concerned is the WEEK.

As the various events of Christian history received annual commemoration, the days of such recurring commemorations became recognised as elements in chronology (CALENDAR). The principal modification which the calendar underwent in consequence of ecclesiastical considerations is that which arose from the annual variation in the observance of Easter, and the festivals connected with it. See EASTER, INDICATIONS. [C.]

CHRYSANTHUS, martyr at Rome under Numerianus (A. D. 283), is commemorated Dec. 1 (Mart. Usuardi); March 19 (Cal. Byzant.) [C.]

CHRYSOGONUS, martyr at Rome under Diocletian, is commemorated Nov. 24 (Mart. Hieron., Rom. Vet., Bedæ, Usuardi). Some MSS. of the Hieronymian Martyrology give Aquileia as the place of martyrdom. [C.]

CHRYSOSTOM, LITURGY OF. [LITURGY].

CHRYSOSTOM. ST. JOHN, is commemorated Nov. 13 (Cal. Byzant., Ethiop.). Translation of his relics to Constantinople, in the reign of the younger Theodosius (A. D. 435), Jan. 27. The Byzantine had also in more recent times a festival of SS. Basil, Gregory Nazianzenus, and Chrysostom, on Jan. 30. The Mart. Rom. Vet., and Mart. Usuardi place the Natalis of St. Chrysostom on Jan. 27, and do not mention the Translation. [C.]

CHRYSOTELUS, presbyter, martyr at Cordova, is commemorated April 22 (Mart. Bedæ, Rom. Vet. Usuardi). [C.]

in all ages of the Church [D. L.]

The object of the several relating to chronology is to be used by the writers of our time, and the reduction of at present in use in this involves the consideration of ecclesiastical calendars, time, employed by writers of our time, and of the modification to them by the influence

In time, we must have a which to measure, and a determinable, standard by interval from that era. from which intervals of are given under E.A. visions of time are days, years; and almost every endeavoured to discover the ions bear to solar years the lunar months in accordance with the seasons of abandoned the observance of vision of time, and divided twelve months, somewhat months. See MONTH, YEAR. tions have adopted for the on life purely conventional of corresponding to any as the Roman Annalium. vision with which we are is the WEEK ments of Christian history commemoration, the days of commemorations became recognized chronology [CALENDAR]. cation which the calendar ence of ecclesiastical conch arose from the annual observance of Easter, and the with it. See EASTER, INDIC [C.]

S, martyr at Rome under commemorated Dec. 1 arch 19 (Cal. Byzant.) [C.]

S, martyr at Rome under commemorated Nov. 24 (Mart. Bedae, Usuardi). Some MSS. Martyrology give Aquileia as tom. [C.]

LITURGY OF. [Lr]

ST. JOHN, is commemorated, Ethiop.) Translation antinople, in the reign of the (A. D. 435), Jan. 27. The in more recent times a Gregory Nazianzenus, and . 30. The Mart. Rom. Vet., place the Natalis of St. Chry, and do not mention the [C.]

S, presbyter, martyr at Carthage April 22 (Mart. Bedae). [C.]

CHURCH

CHURCH (1), in respect to the reverence and the privileges attached to the building.

(1) It was customary to wash the hands and feet before entering the church, for which purpose a fountain was commonly provided in the middle of the atrium or court before the church, called cantharus or phidæa; so Euseb. II. E. x. 4; Tertull. De Orat. c. xi.; Paulinus of Nola, Epist. ad Severum; Socrates, ii. 38; St. Chrys., repeatedly; Synes. Epist. cxli.; quoted by Bingham. Kings and emperors also left their arms, and even their diadems, and their guards, outside when entering a church (Theodos. Orat. in Act. i. Conc. Ephes.; Bingham, VIII. x. 8). And the Egyptian monks, after Eastern custom, put off their sandals (Cassian. Instit. i. 2). It was customary, also, to show reverence to the church by embracing, saluting, and kissing, its doors, threshold, and pillars. So St. Athanasius (Opp. ii. 804, ed. 1627), St. Chrysostom (H. m. xxix. in 2 Cor.), Paulinus (Natal. vi. Felicitæ), Prudentius (Hymn II. in S. Laurentii. 519, 520), &c., quoted by Bingham, ib. 9.—(2) Upon entering the church, "the Christians in the Greek and Oriental churches have, time out of mind, used to bow . . . towards the altar or holy table;" a practice for which no known ancient canon exists, and which looks therefore like a primitive practice, and one probably borrowed from the Jews (Mede, Dis. on Ps. 132, quoted by Bingham). A profound silence was also to be observed within the building (Cassian, Instit. ii. 2; S. Greg. Naz. Orat. xix.) And coughing, spitting, &c., were forbidden.—"A gemitus, screatus, tussis, risu, abstinentes" (St. Ambros. De Virg. liii. 9). And Nonna is eulogized by her son, St. Greg. Naz. (Orat. xix.), as, among other things, never spitting, and never turning her back upon the altar.—(3) Election of bishops and of clergy, synods, catechetical schools, and the like, were allowed to be held within churches. But eating meals there was strictly forbidden, even in time of the ἀγάπαι:—"Οὐ δεῖ ἐν τῷ κυριακῷ ἢ ἐν ταῖς ἐκκλησίαις τὰς λεγομένας ἀγάπας ποιεῖν καὶ ἐν τῷ οἴκῳ τοῦ Θεοῦ ἕθειν καὶ ἀκούθιστα στρωσινοῦν" (Conc. Laodicea. c. 28).—"Ut nulli episcopi vel clerici in ecclesia conviventer, nisi forte transeuntes hospitium necessitate illic reficiantur; et populi, quantum fieri potest, ab hujusmodi conviviis prohibentur" (Conc. Carth. III. can. 30; Cod. Can. Afric. 42). St. Augustin, however, is compelled to tolerate, whilst he severely condemns, the custom of feasting in the church in memory of the martyrs—"Qui se in memoriam martyrum iebriant, quomodo a nobis approbari possunt, quom eos, etiam si in domibus suis faciunt, sana doctrina condemnet" (Cont. Faust. xx. 21). The Emperor Leo also (Novel. lxxiii.), and Conc. Trull. can. 97, forbid people from lodging in certain galleries in the church, called catechumenia. And the Conc. Elberit. can. 35, prohibits private vigils of women in the church precincts—"ne foemine in coeniterio pervigilent;" although the practice of spending whole nights there in prayer was permitted to men (see e. g. Theodoret, v. 24; S. Athanas. Epist. ad Severum.; Socrat. i. 37; &c.); and cubiculi, or cells, were sometimes provided for the purpose (Paulin. Epist. xii. ad Sever.)—(4) Holding assemblies privately out of the church was strictly forbidden: Εἰ τις παρὰ τὴν ἐκκλησίαν ἰδία ἐκκλησίασι. καὶ καταφρονῶν τῆς ἐκκλησίας τὰ τῆς ἐκκλησίας ἰθέλαι πράττειν, μὴ συνάσας τοῦ πρεσβυτέρου κατὰ γυνάμην τοῦ ἱερακόπου. ἀνάθεμα ἴστω (Conc. Gangr. can. 6); and can. 5 of the same council condemns those who despise the church and its assemblies.—(5) The church was a place of safety, both for valuables and for life and person. Besides the archives and treasure of the church itself, the church treasury served as a safe receptacle for other precious things, public or private: as, e. g. the cutib therewith the increase of the Nile was measured, which had been kept in the temple of Serapis, was transferred by order of Constantine to the Christian church, and retransferred to the idol temple by Julian the Apostate (Ruffin. ii. 30; Sozom. i. 8; Socrat. i. 18).—(6) Immunity of life and person attached also to such as took refuge in a church: for the details of which see SANCTUARY. (Bingham.) [A. W. H.]

CHURCH

(2) The building set apart for the performance of Christian worship.

- This article is arranged as follows:— I. Names, p. 365.
II. Early History, p. 366.
III. The Period from Constantine to Justinian, p. 368.
IV. The Period from the death of Justinian to the death of Charles the Great.
1. The western part of the territory of the Eastern Empire, p. 374.
2. Armenia and the adjacent provinces, p. 379.
3. Italy, p. 379.
4. France, Germany, and Switzerland, p. 380.
5. Spain, p. 382.
6. Ireland, p. 384.
7. Scotland, p. 385.
8. England, p. 386.

I. Names.—Greek, Ἐκκλησία, Κυριακή, or τὸ Κυριακόν; Latin, Ecclesia, Dominica (i. e. domus dominica), or Basilica; French, Eglise; Italian, Chiesa; Spanish, Igreja; Roumanic, Biserica; Anglo-Saxon, Chre, Cyrie; Old German, Chriuchiu; Modern German, Kirche; Dutch, Kerk; Icelandic, Kyrkia; Swedish, Kyrka; Russian, Теркоф; Polish, Kosciol, if Greco-Russian, Cerkiew; Irish, Domhlagh (i. e. stone house), Tempall, Eclais, Eglais; Welsh, Eglwys; Hungarian, Ej, haz, Temploin.

The names for a church in the languages of the Latin family are evidently derived from the Greek Ἐκκλησία; those in the languages of the Teutonic and Scandinavian families apparently from Κυριακή.

Several other terms have been used by Greek and Latin writers of the earlier centuries when speaking either of churches, or of oratories or places of assembly. Such are oikos, templum, by Lactantius, St. Ambrose, Eusebius, St. John Chrysostom. Arnobius and Lactantius use the word conventiculum, while concilium and synodus are also found in use not only for the assembly but for the edifice (v. Bingham ii. 84). Isidore of Pelusium (lib. ii. Ep. p. 245) in the like case distinguishes between Ἐκκλησία the assembly, and Ἐκκλησιαστήριον the building.

Descriptive phrases were also employed, as προσευκτήρια, οἴκη εὐκτήρια (by Eusebius, Socrates, Sozomen, and others) Oratoria, Domus Dei, Domus Ecclesiae, Domus Divina, by various writers from the third century downwards. Bingham, however, has shewn that in the 6th century Domus Ecclesiae was sometimes used, not to signify the church, but the Bishop's house, and that in the 5th century (and probably even somewhat later), Domus Divina was the official style for the Imperial palace.

Βασίλειον [see ANACORON] as equivalent to basilica is used by Eusebius (De Lavde Constant. c. 9), but is only rarely employed.

Churches erected especially in honour of martyrs were called Μαρτύρια, Martyria, Memorials, Τρόπαια, Tropaea, Τίμαια, Tituli.

Those who wrote in Latin, in the dark ages, appear to employ the word basilica for the most part, when they wrote of a large church, oratory when of a chapel or oratory. Those who wrote in Gaul, in the 6th and 7th centuries, are said by De Valois (v. Du Cange, Gloss. art. 'Basilica') to have used basilica for the church of a convent, and ecclesia for a cathedral or parish church. Gillis, in the 6th century employs ecclesia and basilica, adding to the latter word 'martyrium.'

II. Early History.—At what time the Christians began to erect buildings for the purpose of celebrating divine worship is unknown, but it is obvious that inasmuch as they held frequent assemblies for religious purposes, suitable places for such assemblies would be required, and that when the congregations became large rooms in private houses would cease to afford the requisite space.

The assertions of some of the earlier Christian writers, as Arnobius (Disputat. adv. Gent. lib. vi. c. 1), Origen (c. Cels. lib. 7. c. 8), Minucius Felix (Octav. c. 8, 10, 32) that the Christians had neither temples, altars nor images, that God could be worshipped in every place, and that his best temple on earth is the heart of man, should, it would appear, be understood, not literally—for there is positive evidence of the existence of churches in the 3rd century—but that they had no temples or altars in the Pagan sense of those words, and that their religion was spiritual, and not dependent upon places or rituals.

The passage from Clemens Alexandrinus (Strom. vii. 5, p. 846) and those from other writers, quoted by Bingham (Antiq. bk. viii. c. 1, § 13), prove that a certain place was called ἐκκλησία, but, in strictness, not that it was a separate building, constructed and set apart for that purpose. The documentary evidence of the next century, the 3rd, is, however, much more decisive. The chronicle of Elessa (in Assemani, Bibl. Orient. xi. 397) mentions the destruction of temples of Christian assemblies in A. D. 292.

Aelius Lampridius in his Life of the Emperor Alexander Severus (A. D. 222-235), narrates that the Christians having occupied a certain place, it was confirmed to them on the ground that it was better that God should be worshipped there after any manner, than that it should be given up to the adverse claimants, the 'popinarii,' or tavern-keepers. Gregory of Nyssa, in his life of Gregory Thaumaturgus, bishop of Neo-Caesarea, states that he built several churches there and in the adjacent parts of Pontus. In addition to which, many other testimonies of a like nature might be adduced.

The edict of Diocletian, usually attributed to the year 302, ordering the destruction of the churches and the confiscation of the lands belonging to them, confirms these statements, and Lactantius' account (De Mort. Persecutorum, c. 12) of the destruction of the church at Nicomedia in A. D. 303, shows that some of them at least were considerable edifices.

There is some ground for believing that in the 3rd century those plans and arrangements of churches which we find to prevail in the 4th and following centuries were, at least in part, already in use; St. Cyprilian (Ep. 59, p. 688, Martel) imagines Pagan altars and images usurping the place of the altar of the Lord, and entering into the "sacrum venerandum consessum" of the clergy. In this there seems to be an evident allusion to the arrangement usual in later times, in which the altar was placed in the apse, and the clergy sat on a bench around it.

So also in the passage in Tertullian (De Tut. c. 4), when that writer speaks of certain sinners being removed not only from the 'limen' but also 'omni ecclesie tecto,' not only from the threshold of the church itself, but even from every dependent building, such as the narthex, the atrium, or the baptistery. It is doubtful whether any now existing church can be attributed, upon good evidence, to this century. One which had been believed so to date, is the basilica of Reparatus, near Orleansville, in Algeria, the ancient Castellum Tingitanum. It is about 80 feet long by 32 wide, and is on the "dromical" or as we now say basilican plan, that is, in the form of a parallelogram, longer than wide. It was divided into a nave and four aisles by four ranges of columns. It has now an apse at each end, both internal to the line of walls. According to an inscription, still remaining, the earlier part of the building dates from 252, but the era is most probably not that of Christ, but of Mauritania, and the date corresponds with A. D. 325; the other apse was added about A. D. 403, to contain the grave of the saint.

Basilica of Reparatus.

The earlier apse, with the ground in front of it, is raised about three feet; and below it was a vault, in which were two sarcophagi. It is not, however, clear whether this arrangement was original. Another African church, that of D'jemila, which is believed to date from the latter part of this century, presents the remarkable peculiarity of being without an apse. It measures 92 feet by 52. Near the end furthest from the entrance door is an enclosure entered by a doorway in front and one on each side. This, no doubt, surrounded the altar and the seats of the priests.

Some other churches which have been supposed to belong to this century, as the cathedral of Trèves (v. Hübsch, Dia altchristl. Ki-chen, pl. vi.), and the small church at Annona, in Algeria, though on the basilican plan, are much wider in proportion to their length than is usual in the later examples. In the case of Trèves the building is, in fact, a square (or very nearly so), measuring about 120 feet internally with an apse. The roof was supported by two monolithic columns of granite, about 40 feet high, on each side. If the church were not square, but oblong, about which there is some doubt, there were probably three, and perhaps even five of them, however, 404, this 550, but plan, involving on monolithic including the esacuted in central with a se opposite to and const at Chagg third cent considers is constructed name part of being entirely which rest on vials of about aisles formed One very is the tower rises to a h church be of belong, this appearance of tecture.

The church (exclusively of five of these columns on each side. By some, however, as by Kugler, Gesch. der Baukunst i. 404, this building is attributed to about the year 550, but it seems very improbable that so bold a plan, involving arches of great span, supported on monolithic columns nearly 50 feet high (including bases and capitals) was conceived and executed at that time. The church at Tuffkha, in central Syria, exhibits the same square form, with a semi-ovoid apse projecting from the side opposite to the entrance. This building, in style and construction, most closely resembles a basilica at Chagga, which M. de Vogüé ascribes to the third century, and it must be presumed that he considers the church to be of the same date. It depth by a little less in width, and being about 20 feet high internally.

Some of the churches in Egypt and Nubia, as at Erment in Egypt and Ibrim in Nubia (v. Kugler, Gesch. der Baukunst, i. 378), are, no doubt, of a very early date, perhaps of the end of the 3rd or the beginning of the following century, but no certain date can be affixed to them. In both those named the apse is enclosed within the walls, the angles of which are occupied by chambers. This arrangement, indeed, seems to have been very early adopted and very generally adhered to in the East. Some early examples of the same plan may be found also in the West, as in the Church of St. Croce is constructed like many other buildings in the same part of Syria, in a very peculiar manner, being entirely roofed with large slabs of stone, which rest on arches spanning the nave at intervals of about 7 ft. 8 in. The flat roofs of the aisles formed galleries.

S. Simeon Stylites, Kalat Bama'an.

One very remarkable feature in this building is the tower which ranges with the façade and rises to a height of about 43 feet. If this church be of the date to which it would seem to belong, this must be considered as the first appearance of a tower in ecclesiastical architecture.

The church is not large, measuring externally (exclusive of apse and tower) about 57 feet in in Jerusalem at Rome; but it does not seem to have been frequently used.

When, in the year A.D. 313, the Emperor Constantine had published the edict tolerating the Christian religion, and still more when, in A.D. 324, he took it under his patronage, a great increase in the erection of churches, and in the size and splendour of the edifices, naturally ensued—the emperor himself setting the example by erecting at Jerusalem and elsewhere churches of great magnificence.

It has been shewn that churches of the basilican type were erected before the period of Constantine, and it is probable that sepulchral or memorial churches of circular or polygonal

H and arrangements of to prevail in the 4th re, at least in part,
p. 59, p. 688, Hurstel) images usurping the ard, and entering into concessum" of the
to be an evident alluin later times, in-in the apse, and the
it.

artullan (De Vulviti, c. ts of certain slingers om the 'limen' but
'not only from the self, but even from such as the narthex, tery. It is doubtful church can be attrito this century. One to date, is the basilica ville, in Algeria, the um. It is about 80 a on the "dromical" plan, that is, in the onger than wide. It

Basilica of Reparatus.

is raised about three a vault, in which is not, however, clear t was original. An-at of D'jemila, which he latter part of this arkable peculiarity of measures 92 feet by est from the entrance red by a doorway in This, no doubt, sur-seats of the priests.

ch have been supposed r, as the cathedral of akhrisl. Ki-chen, pl. at Annona, in Algeria, an, are much wider in than is usual in the se of Trèves the builds (or very nearly so), at internally with an ported by two mēnoabout 49 feet high, urch were not square,
there is some doubt, ee, and perhaps even plan, and oratories or chapels of many various forms, may have been also built, but it is not until the 4th century that we have examples of all three of these classes, the date and character of which are well ascertained. Typical forms for the two first classes were established in the great buildings erected during the reign of Constantine, and have influenced the construction of churches down to the present day.

The basilican, or, as the Greeks called it, the domical plan, continued, in the great majority of instances, to be in use in the West (though with certain modifications) until after the period embraced by this work, and in Rome until after the year 1000.

It was almost equally prevalent in the East until the genius of the architect of St. Sophia at Constantinople had evolved from the other typical form, viz. that of the memorial church, a new combination so striking and impressive as to have permanently influenced the church architecture of Asia and of the east of Europe in favour of a modification of the memorial type; while in the West, churches the plans of which are thence derived, continue to be, as they had been before, exceptional; such are S. Vitale at Ravenna and S. Lorenzo at Milan.

In the earlier period the choice of form would seem to have been guided by the intention most strongly present to the founder. Where special intention of doing honour to the memory of a martyr existed, the circular form was chosen, but where this was not the leading thought, the basilican; the latter lending itself better to the celebration of divine services with a large attendance of worshippers. In several instances a basilican and a memorial church were placed in close proximity, as at Jerusalem by Constantine, Khat Sem'an in Central Syria, at Nola by Paulinus, at Constantinople in the churches of St. Sergius and of St. Peter and Paul, and several others, the circular or polygonal church being in almost all these cases dedicated in honour of a martyr.

It will be most convenient when describing the churches erected from the time of Constantine to that of Justinian to divide them according to the threefold division mentioned above, viz., into: 1st, basilican; 2nd, memorial or sepulchral churches; and 3rd, oratories (which are treated of under the head CHAPEL), without paying much regard to the country in which the examples are found. During this period, in fact, so much unity, as well of ritual and practice in religious matters as of style and feeling in art, prevailed throughout the Roman Empire, that the differences between the ecclesiastical architecture of its various provinces are chiefly differences of detail.

At the beginning of the period which follows, viz., that from Justinian to Charles the Great, the great development of the Byzantine style took place, and the architecture of the East is thenceforward widely different from that of the West. Soon afterwards the fragments into which the empire had divided were formed into new nations, most of whom developed something of new plan or new style in their ecclesiastical buildings, and it will therefore be necessary to treat of the architectural history of most of these nations separately. This part of the subject may be divided into the following sections:—1, The western part of the territory of the Eastern Empire; 2, Armenia and the adjacent provinces; 3, Italy; 4, France, Germany, and Switzerland; 5, Spain; 6, Ireland; 7, Scotland; 8, England.

III. The Period from Constantine to Justinian.—It has been thought by some writers (v. Martigny, Diet. des Antiq. Chret. art. Basilique), that the crypts or chapels of the catacombs near Rome have served as models for the primitive Christian churches, by which it would appear that churches of the basilican type are meant. This opinion would, however, appear to rest on no sufficient foundation, for the so-called chapels are in general either a series of two, three, or even five, chambers, usually not more than 6 or 7 feet square, connected by doorways, as in the instance of the "chiesa principale" of the cemetery of St. Agnes (v. Marchi, tav. xxv. xxxi. xxxvii.), or hexagonal, polygonal, or oblong excavations, without apse or any of the usual features of a church, such as the crypt discovered by Bosio in the cemetery of the Via Salaria Nuova, but not now accessible, which has been held to have been a church (v. Marchi, tav. xxxlii.). In this an octagon of about 23 feet in diameter is connected by a doorway about 4 feet wide, with an oblong chamber about 12 feet wide by 32 long. [CATACOMBS.]

The so-called basilica of St. Hermes, in a cemetery near the Via Salaria Vecchia, of an oblong form, terminating in an apse, was, no doubt, reduced into its present form by Pope Hadrian I., as the Lib. Pontif. tells us of that pope that he "basilicam coemeterii sanctorum martyrum Hermetis, etc., miris magnitudinis innovavit."

No church of the period of Constantine has come down to modern times in a complete state, but fortunately a contemporary writer (Eusebius) has left us such detailed accounts, that, with the assistance which we can obtain from existing remains, we can form a very complete picture of a church of that period.

The earliest church of the building of which we have a distinct account, is that which Paulinus built in Tyre between A.D. 313 and A.D. 322. Eusebius (Ecccl. Hist. bk. x. iv. s. 37) states that the bishop surrounded the site of the church with a wall of enclosure; this wall, according to Dr. Thomson (The Land and the Book, p. 189, c. xlii.), can still be traced, and measures 222 feet in length, by 129 in breadth. In the east side of this wall of inclosure he made a large and lofty portico (σπράτορος), through which a quadrangular atrium (αὐτοῖον) was entered; this was surrounded by ranges of columns, the spaces between which were filled by net-like railings of wood. In the centre of the open space was a fountain, at which those about to enter the church purified themselves.

The church itself was entered through inferior porticoes (τοῖς ἐσθόρταισιν προπύλαις), perhaps a narthex, but whether or not distinct from the portico which bounded the atrium on that side does not appear. Three doorways led into the nave; the central of these was by far the largest, and had doors covered with bronze reliefs; other doorways gave entrance to the side aisles. Above these aisles were galleries well lighted (doubtless by external windows), and looking upon the nave; these were adorned with beautiful work in wood. The passage is rather obscure, and has been variously of Bonneau's Rome, s. 311-75) thinks stands for w in them. It the εὐβασιλῶν leries into railings or fronts.

The nave was constructed, and the Thomson states columns may to the dom remains of t says leads to by a dome, called triumph St. Paolo E. basilican church somewhat like has made a c thus arranged.

The building completed, P with thrones the honour of with benches fitness, and, ἐὶς τὴν θύσαν the whole with skillful work, be inaccessible adds, was ad every kind.

Then on the external building which were at (τὸ βασιλικόν) traces in the μύρον ὀλεον told, were des the purification the Holy Ghost.

In A.D. 333 erected at sepulchre of or in this building present structure εἰς Σαῦρος the pinn and l and whether remains of the difficulty and controversy (εἰς τὴν Τερε-Σαῖντε).

To discuss the ments on which far too much s written of the manner, so that be clearly mad ticulars may b the basilica.

It had (Life) double portico (ἑῖς τὸν σπράτον) ades (καρπύσσ) below or on the p out the whole CHRIST. ANT.

variously translated; the above is the sense of Bunsen's paraphrase (Basiliken des Christ. Roms, s. 31). Hübseh (Alt. Christ. Kirchen, s. 75) thinks that the word εἰσβολαὶ (entrances) stands for windows, and that the woodwork was a thorn. It seems, however, more probable that the εἰσβολαὶ were the openings from the galleries into the nave, and the woodwork the railings or balustrades which protected their fronts.

The nave or central portion (βασιλικὸν οἶκος) was constructed of still richer material than the rest, and the roof of cedar of Lebanon. Dr. Thomson states that the remains of five granite columns may still be seen, and that "the height to the dome was 80 feet, as appears by the remains of an arch." Nothing which Eusebius says leads to the supposition that it was covered by a dome, and the arch was probably the so-called triumphal arch through which, as at St. Paolo E. L. M. at Rome, and many other basilican churches, a space in front of the apse somewhat like a transept was entered. Hübseh has made a conjectural restoration of the church thus arranged.

The building, having been in such manner completed, Paulinus, we are told, provided it with thrones (θρόνοι) in the highest places for the honour of the presbyters (προέδρων), and with benches, or seats (βάθροι), according to fitness, and, placing the most holy altar (ἅγιον ἕλυθον θεοταστήριον) in the midst, surrounded the whole with wooden net-like railings of most skilful work, so that the enclosed space might be inaccessible to the crowd. The pavement, he adds, was adorned with marble decoration of every kind.

Then on the outside he constructed very large external buildings (ἐξέδρα) and halls (οἶκοι), which were attached to the sides of the church (ὁ βασιλικῶν), and connected with it by entrances in the hall lying between (ταῖς ἐν τῶν μέσων οἶκον εἰσβολαῖς). These halls, we are told, were destined for those who still required the purification and sprinkling of water and of the Holy Ghost.

In A.D. 333 Constantine caused a basilica to be erected at Jerusalem near the site of the sepulchre of our Lord, which was either included in this building or in a circular or octagonal adjacent structure, the basilica being called ἐκκλησία Σαῦτητος—church of the Saviour. What the plan and situation of these buildings were, and whether anything now existing be the remains of these buildings, are questions full of difficulty and have been the subject of much controversy (v. Fergusson, De Vogüé, Eglises de la Terre-Sainte).

To discuss the various theories and the arguments on which they are founded would occupy far too much space. Eusebius unfortunately has written of the subject in a somewhat rhetorical manner, so that the plan of the structure cannot be clearly made out, but some interesting particulars may be gathered from his account of the basilica.

It had (Life of Constantine the Great, lib. lii.) double porticoes or, as we should say, aisles (ἴσθμους στωῶν), or rows of piers with colonades (καρπώματα) in two stories above and below or on the ground, which stretched throughout the whole extent (μήκει) of the temple.

By καρπώματα we should perhaps understand not subterranean but on a level with the ground, the "ἀνάγμαι" corresponding with the triforium of a mediæval church. Recent investigations have shown that extensive subterranean galleries exist on a part of the site (according to Mr. Fergusson's views) of this church, but their character and date has as yet not been satisfactorily ascertained. The inner rows were of highly decorated piers, the exterior of enormous columns (iii. c. 37). If we understand as Bunsen (Die Basiliken Roms, s. 33) does, that the rows stretched across the front as well as along the sides, we may perhaps understand by interior (ἀπὸ ἐξῆς τῶν ἑμπροσθεν) those which ran lengthwise, and by the exterior (ἀπὸ ἐπιπροσώπου τοῦ οἴκου) those which ran across the front.

The three doors by which it was entered looked to the east. Opposite to these doors was the hemispherical head region (κεφάλαιον τοῦ παντός ἡμισφαίριον) of the whole; i. e. the apse. This was decorated with twelve columns, on which were as many large silver vessels. The walls were built of hewn stone in regular courses, and covered literally with slabs of variegated marble. The roofs were of wood richly carved and gilt, and covered externally with lead (c. 36).

Before the entrances was an atrium. There was a first court with porticoes, before which were the entrances of the court; then on the middle of the market-place the prothyæ or outer gateways, whose magnificence astonished all who saw them. Mr. Fergusson thinks that the so-called golden gateway on the east side of the Haram enclosure, is one of these prothyæ.

Another building in the Holy Land, the church at Bethlehem, has strong claims to be considered as the work of this period (v. De Vogüé, Eglises de la Terre-Sainte, p. 46). It has an oblong atrium, a vestibule divided into three portions, the central of which alone opens into the church, double aisles with columns of the Corinthian order, and at the end opposite to the atrium the transverse-triangular arrangement—i. e. one apse at the end of the building, and two others, one at each end of a transept-like space; beneath the centre of this space is the crypt of the Nativity.

As to the churches built in Rome during the reign of Constantine much uncertainty exists: the Liber Pontificalis attributes to him the erection (in several cases at the request of Sylvester, then bishop of Rome) of seven churches in that city, and describes at much length the ornaments and vessels of precious metals with which they were decorated. As, however, these accounts are for the most part not confirmed by other authorities, and contain many matters of an improbable character, they are not generally accepted as trustworthy. That the churches of St. John Lateran, of St. Peter, Sts. Croce in Gerusalemme, and Sta. Costanza, were erected or converted into churches at this time is however universally admitted. Of the first nothing of the period of Constantine is now visible and no distinct account of its size or plan has come down to us. Of St. Peter's, though it no longer exists, we have a full account and careful drawings and plans. It will be seen by the accompanying woodcut that it was of the same type as the churches which Eusebius describes, a five-aisled basilica ending in an apse, before the front of which was an atrium. It was a church of very large size, being 380 feet long by 212 wide, and covering above 80,000 English square feet; as much, as Mr. Fergusson remarks, as any mediæval cathedral except those of Milan and Seville. The transept, it will be seen, extends beyond the width of the nave. The interior range of columns would seem to have been of uniform dimensions and to have supported a horizontal entablature, the exterior range carried arches. Over the entablature was a lofty space of wall in later times divided into two layers of panels, each containing a picture, and above these were clerestory windows of great size, one over each intercolumniation. It is not certain that the prolongations of the transept beyond the walls of the nave are part of the original plans for Pope Symmachus (A.D. 498-514) as said in the Lib. Pontif. to have built two cubicles, or oratoria, in honour of St. John the Baptist and five arched openings, of which that in the centre is the largest. These have been supposed by Kugler (Gesch. der Baukunst, i. 376) to have been originally windows; they are now built up, but it may be seen that the masses of wall which separate them were covered with thin plates of marble of two or more colours arranged in patterns. Above these openings are a like number of immense windows measuring, according to Ciampini (Ict. Mon. i. 75), about 28 feet high by 14 feet 6 inches wide.

The church of Sta. Pudenziana at Rome has also been assigned, with much apparent probability, to the earlier half of this century; it has been greatly modernized, but retains in the apse the finest early Christian mosaic in Rome (engraved in Gally Knight's Italian Churches, vol. i. pl. 23). This mosaic is assigned by most competent judges to the 4th century.

The other church at Rome which has been

St. Peter, Rome.

St. John the Evangelist. The "Confession" was a very small vault under the altar, and it is not quite clear that any vault at all was part of the original construction.

The basilica of Sta. Croce in Gerusalemme deserves notice as an instance of the alteration of a hall or civil basilica into a church. It formed part of the palace known as the Sessorium. When converted into a church a very large apse was added at the east end; this apse is enclosed by chapels, of which that on the south-east is covered by a cupola and is believed to be original, that on the north-east is of a later date. It can hardly be doubted that a chapel similar to that on the other side originally occupied the site. This is the only instance in Rome of this system of enclosing the apse, one which, as has been said, was common in Africa and in parts of the East.

The lateral walls of Sta. Croce are pierced by mentioned as of the Constantinian period, Sta. Costanza, will be described when circular and polygonal churches are spoken of.

Other churches of the basilican type were constructed by order of Constantine, as the original church of St. Sophia at Constantinople, that of the Apostles and others at the same place, but all these have been destroyed or rebuilt.

Towards the end of this century (A.D. 386) the great church of St. Paul, beyond the walls (fuor le mura) at Rome, was commenced, and until the fire of 1822, remained far less altered than any other building of the period in or near that city. It resembled St. Peter's in size and design, with the exceptions that the transept was of the same width as the nave, and that the columns of the nave supported arches instead of architraves. It was lighted by (according to Ciampini) 120 windows, each 29 feet high by 14 feet 6 inches wide.

The church of
by Pope Leo I.
ruin and the
They were disc sent some poin vestibule at t the remarkab apparently aris atory already still more inter
"chorus cantoru le traced, porti enclosures exist and painted. A neter of the 5th earliest remains noticed, if we e Djemilab in Al parment of lar doubt original.
The church of people, built A.D. 4 Lurachor-Dschami

and design there difference betwe and in Constanti well illustrated b Baudemontale von C seen from his plat or narthex, a nave carrying a horizon another colonnade furnish spacious g apse semi-circular out. The propor greater than is usu Rome, perhaps an ference for plans of Byzantine architect manifest. The m however, the grea doubt intended to

The church of S. Stefano in Via Latina, built by Pope Leo I. (A.D. 440-461), had fallen into ruin and the remains become covered with earth. They were discovered in the year 1858, and present some points of interest. There is a double vestibule at the east end of the church, and a remarkable arrangement in front of the altar apparently arising from a wish to preserve a small oratory already existing on the spot, but what is still more interesting is that the plan of the "chœrus cantorum" and enclosure of the altar can be traced, portions of the walls forming these enclosures existing; they were worked in stucco and painted. As this work has quite the character of the 5th century these are probably the earliest remains of the kind which have been noticed, if we except those on the basilica at Djemilah in Algeria, mentioned above. The pavement of large slabs of marble is also no doubt original.

The church of St. John Studios at Constanti-

Several churches in Central Syria are described by Count de Vogüé as belonging to this period.

The other principal type of church is, as has been said, the sepulchral or memorial, in the earlier examples usually circular in plan, in later not unfrequently polygonal. The models from which such buildings were originally developed were doubtless the sepulchres of a circular form, many of which were erected at Rome at the close of the Republican period and under the emperors. These structures were originally nearly solid, containing only small chambers; such are the tomb of Cecilia Metella and the tomb of Hadrian now enclosed in the castle of St. Angelo. In later examples, as in that of the Tossian family, and that of the Empress Helena (now commonly called Torre Pignatarra), the upper story is occupied by a chamber, taking up as much of the diameter as the necessity of making the wall strong enough to sustain a dome permitted. This chamber in some cases, ople, built A.D. 463, now a mosque known as Iurachor-Dschamissi, shows that as regards plan and design there was in the 5th century little difference between a basilican church in Rome and in Constantinople. This building has been well illustrated by Salzenberg (Alt-Christliche Bauwerke von Constantinopel), and it will be seen from his plates that it consists of a portico or naos, a nave and aisles divided by columns, carrying a horizontal architrave, and on this another colonnade supporting arches, so as to give semi-circular galleries over the aisles, and an outer semi-circular within, semi-hexagonal without. The proportion of width to length is greater than is usual in the basilican churches of Rome, perhaps an early indication of that preference for plans approaching to a square which Byzantine architecture afterwards so strongly manifests. The most characteristic feature is, however, the great size of the galleries, no doubt intended to be used as a gynæceum.

St. Paul, Rome.

as in that of the Torre Pignatarra, was well lighted by large windows. From such a building to the church of Sta. Costanza the progress is easy, the external peristyle, as in Hadrian's tomb, was retained, and another was introduced into the interior on which the dome was supported. Some approach to a cruciform plan it will be seen was produced by grouping the twenty-four coupled columns which carry the dome in groups of six, and leaving a wider space between each group than between each pair of columns. A niche in the aisle wall corresponds to each inter-columniation, those corresponding to the wider intervals being of larger size than the others. In these larger niches sarcophagi were placed; one of porphyry now in the Museum at the Vatican, was removed from the niche opposite to the door. The external peristyle has been entirely destroyed. This building has been called a baptistery, but there is no trace nor record of the existence of a piscina or font. The probability would appear to be that it was erected as a mausoleum for the Constantian family. This building is about 100 feet in diameter, the dome being about 40.

If we admit Mr. Fergusson's theory that the building erected by order of Constantine over the sepulchre of our Saviour, it must be classed among memorial churches. This appropriation of the building has been the subject of much controversy, but in the present state of our knowledge the question can scarcely be satisfactorily decided. Whoever compares the engravings of the capitals in the church at Bethlehem, given by Count de Vogüé (Eglises de la Terre Sainte, p. 52) with that of the capitals in the 'Dome of the Rock' (The Holy Sepulchre, by James Fergusson, p. 68), must see that both are of one closely similar design and probably of the same date, which there can be little doubt is the earlier part of the 4th century. The 'Dome of the Rock' is an octagon 155 feet in diameter, with two aisles and a central dome, this is supported by four great piers, between each of which are three pillars supporting arches springing direct from their capitals; the space between these and the external wall is divided into two aisles by a screen of eight piers and sixteen pillars—two pillars intervening between each pier. On the capitals of these pillars rest blocks which carry a frieze and cornice; these last carry arches above which was a second cornice. The whole building has undergone much alteration, and these capitals and friezes appear to be the best preserved portions of the original design.

Sta. Constantia, Rome.

It seems clear that one of two hypotheses must be held; either that the existing remains are those of a building of the period of Constantine, erected on the spot and still retaining their original architectural arrangement, or that portions of such a building have been removed from another site, and re-erected where we now find them.

Eusebius (De Vita Constant. li. 50) tells us of another octagonal church erected by order of Constantine, of which no trace now remains. This was at Antioch; Eusebius describes it as of wonderful height, and surrounded by many chambers (oikous) and exedrae (ἐξέδραις), which it would appear were entered from the galleries (χωρημάτων) which both above and below ground encircled the church.

A church was also built by Constantine at Constantinople (Eusebius, Vita Constant. iv. 58, 59) as a memorial church of the Apostles (μαρτύριον ἐπὶ μνήμῃ τῶν ἀποστόλων), and at the same time as a place for his own burial. This building was destroyed by Justinian, and its precise form is unknown; but that it was in some manner cruciform appears from the distich of Gregory of Nazianzus, in the poem of the dream of Anastasius:—

Σὺν τοῖς καὶ μεγάλοις ἔδος Χριστοῦ μαθητῶν Πλευραῖς σταυροῦσι τέτραχα τεμόνευον.

It would seem that it stood in the centre of a large atrium, surrounded by porticoes. Bunsen (Die Basiliken des Christl. Roms, s. 36) thinks that in this edifice we may discern the germ of the Byzantine type of church.

It is a matter of some difficulty to distinguish between a sepulchral chapel or tomb and a memorial church; the one class in fact runs into the other, the distinction between them depending upon the object which the builder had in view; when he constructed a large edifice in which services were to be frequently held, still more if this building was intended to be the cathedral church of a bishop or the church of a district, the structure must be considered as a church, although it was also constructed in order to honour a martyr and to protect his tomb; when on the other hand it was of small size, and its primary object was to contain the tomb or tombs either of the builder or of some saint, it must be considered as only a sepulchral chapel although containing an altar, and although services were occasionally celebrated within it.

Several remarkable buildings of the 5th century belong to the first class. One of these is the church of St. George at Thessalonica, which consists of a circular nave 79 feet in diameter, covered by a dome, a chancel, and an apse; the walls of the nave are 20 feet thick, and in them are eight great recesses, two of which serve as entrances and one as a sort of vestibule to the chancel, the roof is covered with a magnificent series of mosaics. The cathedral at Bosrah, in the Honouran, the date of which is ascertained to be A.D. 512, has a plan with several points of similarity to that of St. George, particularly as regards the chancel.

Cathedral at Bosrah.

In Italy some circular churches were constructed to carry, not domes, but wooden roofs; of these the most remarkable example is St. Stefano Rotondo, at Rome, built between A.D. 487 and A.D. 483. This church had originally two aisles and is of very large size, having a diameter of about 210 feet.

The church of St. Lorenzo at Milan, once the cathedral of the city, is very remarkable, as shewing an attempt to combine the circular with the square plan. Its real date has not been ascertained, but it is probably of the earlier part of the 5th century. The main building has lost all original character through repairs, but according to Hübsch the original walls exist to a height of nearly 40 feet, and the ground plan may therefore be accepted as original.

It will be of the church that on the north side has been a vestibule on the south is as a baptistery; the building was consecrated as a chapel, a purpose originally destined for the line was also of the 5th century have contained 415 really distinct places of deposit. Hübsch, however, founded chiefly work, that the main church. In this instance memorial church juxtaposition. The class remain to two large circular north side of St. was afterwards and the other Honorius, or at the Stadt Rom, erected to St. Peter.

The building attributed to the emperor on the authority of the position and construction that it seems probable the same time, the Emperor Honorius which have come but seven square feet in diameter 100 feet in diameter.

A still existing the chapel at Galla Placidia (originally a sepulchral) be wholly passed cross without the arms rises a. This example is the best known last own burial. This Justinian, and its not that it was in ears from the dis- is, in the poem of

Χριστοῦ μαθῆται καὶ τερματίσθαι.

in the centre of a porticoes. Bauer (Annals, s. 36) thinks discern the germ of only to distinguish or tomb and a mesa in fact runs into between them depend- the builder had in a large edifice in frequently held, still intended to be the or the church of a to be considered as a constructed in order to protect his tomb; of small size, and contain the tomb or of some saint, it a sepulchral chapel- ar, and although ser- vated within it.

ings of the 5th cen- tury. One of these is Thessalonica, which Cathedral at B-wah.

, the date of which (42), has a plan with that of St. George, chance of churches were roof- ed, but wooden roofs- table example is St. s, built between A.D. church had originally large size, having a zo at Milan, once the very remarkable, as combine the circular ts real date has not probably of the earlier The main building has through repairs, but original walls exist to and, and the ground plan as original.

It will be observed that chapels are annexed to the church on the north, south, and east; that on the north is supposed by Hübsch to have been a vestibule, that now called St. Aquilino on the south is thought to have been constructed as a baptistery, that on the east in all probability was constructed to serve as a sepulchral chapel, a purpose to which, whether it was originally destined or not, the chapel of St. Aquilino was also applied as early as the beginning of the 5th century, if the sarcophagus said to have contained the body of Ataulphus (ob. A.D. 415) really did so, and if this was its original place of deposit.

Hübsch, however, gives it as his opinion, founded chiefly on the character of the brick-work, that the chapels are later in date than the main church.

In this instance we have the two classes, the memorial church and the sepulchral chapel, in juxtaposition. A few instances of the latter class remain to be mentioned, and firstly the two large circular edifices which stood on the north side of St. Peter's at Rome, one of which was afterwards called the church of St. Andrew, and the other having been the sepulchre of Honorius, or at least of his two wives (Besch. der Stadt Rom, II. i. 95), was afterwards dedicated to St. Petronilla.

St. Stefano Rotondo, Roma.

The building of the church of St. Andrew is attributed to Pope Symmachus (A.D. 498-514) on the authority of the Liv. Pontif., but the position and connexion of the buildings was such that it seems probable that both were built at the same time, which was apparently that of the Emperor Honorius. According to the plans which have come down to us they had no apses, but seven square-ended recesses in the thickness of the walls. They were of large size, about 100 feet in diameter.

A still existing building of the same class is the chapel at Ravenna, built by the Empress Galla Placidia (ob. 450), which, though more properly a sepulchral chapel than a church, cannot be widely passed over here. It is in plan a Latin cross without an apse: from the intersection of the arms rises a tower enclosing a small dome. This example is of peculiar interest, as the earliest known instance of this plan which afterwards came to be so extensively used in Western Europe. Recent excavations have shown that the chapel was originally entered by a portico, which was in connexion with the atrium or narthex of the adjacent church of Sta. Croce. (De Rossi, Bull. di Archeol. Crist. 1866, p. 73.)

A further account of sepulchral chapels will be found under CHAPEL.

Although heathen temples were in consequence of their plans little suited for adaptation to Christian worship, they were occasionally during the earlier centuries of the Christian era, as well as in later times, converted to this purpose. One of the most remarkable early examples of this transformation is that of the temple of Venus at Aphrodisias, in Caria, where the original building was enclosed by a wall and an apse added at one end, the cella demolished, the columns of the posticum removed and placed in a line with the lateral columns, and a wall pierced with windows was raised on the lateral colonnade as to form a clerestory. A church was thus formed of large size, about 200 feet long by 100 feet wide. Messrs. Texier and Pullan (Byz. Arch. p. 89) believe this transformation to have taken place between the periods of Constantine and of Theodosius.

The period of Justinian is one of special importance in the history of ecclesiastical architecture. From this time the basilica plan went, in the East, almost or entirely out of use, and a modification of the plan of St. Sophia was almost exclusively adopted, the modified plan being a quadrangular figure approaching a square with a dome covering the centre, and a large internal porch or narthex at the entrance. This plan, however, did not originate with the architect of St. Sophia, the germ of it is perhaps to be found in the domed oratoria or Kalybés of Syria; from such a simple dome—a building like the cathedral of Ezra, in which the dome is surrounded by an aisle, and an apse added—is readily derived, this example dates from A.D. 510; and if to such a plan a narthex be added, we have the typical Byzantine plan, as in the church of SS. Sergius and Bacchus at Constantinople, built under Justinian, but somewhat earlier than St. Sophia. The peculiar feature of the latter church is the placing of the dome not upon piers and arches on every side, but upon semi-domes east and west, by which means a vast space, more than 200 feet long by 100 feet wide, totally unencumbered by piers or columns, was obtained. This construction has, however, never been copied in Christian churches, but it has served as a model for the mosques of Constantinople.

All the minuter peculiarities of construction and of detail, however, henceforward prevail in the East, to the exclusion of the Roman style, which previously was in use. In the West, examples of Byzantine character continue to be very rare. St. Vitale at Ravenna is perhaps the only prominent example, until a much later period. The church of St. Sophia is, however, in itself a monument of such importance as to require to be noticed in some detail.

It is a building of very considerable dimensions, covering about 70,000 square feet, exclusive of the portions of the atrium (or exo-narthex), the baptistery, and other annexed buildings.

From the exo-narthex, the principal or eso-narthex, 205 feet in length internally, by 26 feet in breadth, is entered. The principal mass of the building forms nearly a square 235 feet north and south, by 250 feet east and west, with an apse projecting on the east side. The central dome is 107 feet in diameter by 46 feet in height, and rises 180 feet from the floor. The semi-domes are of the same diameter. The aisles are spacious, but, in consequence of the exigencies of the constructional arrangement, are so divided as with ornaments in relief; but those now existing do not seem to be of the period of Justinian.

All the columns, capitals, &c., are of porphyry or marble. The floors and all other flat spaces are covered with marble slabs of the richest colours, the domes and curved surfaces with gold ground mosaics.

Little is known as regards the precise position of the various fixed appliances by which the church was fitted for divine worship. The altar to form rather a series of chambers than continuous galleries. There is, it will be seen, but one apse, in front of which is a shallow chancel space, covered by a barrel-vault. On the upper floor are chambers corresponding with those below, which furnished places for women.

St. Sophia, Constantinople.

The windows are filled with slabs of marble, pierced with square openings filled with thick pieces of cast glass. When the windows are large they are divided into three or six parts by columns and architraves. The doors are of bronze, is supposed to have stood in the chancel space or bema, in front of the apse; the iconostasis appears, according to Salzenberg, to have been placed at the western end of the bema, and to have been about 14 feet high. From the poem of Paul the Silentiary, we learn that it was of silver, had three doors, the central the largest, and 12 columns raised on a stylobate, and was adorned with figures (probably bust figures) of our Lord, the Virgin Mary, Prophets and Apostles, in discs or medallions. Whether these figures were in the frieze, as columns, in ways of the of the mu seem proba the colum modern Gra The alta columns, a stoies; ove from the a figures of ot Paul, and oth

The cyron the syntron bishops. The shafts, proba

Paul the chrus or pla apt that the apt for the that of the " γλῶσσος δὲ chrus extend which the su nearly in the towards the have been di seles, to the decons, and readers and si nus to have l by Justinian o sage it is said We should no that the true much gilding the case of the have been ap the priests.

It would app by Evagrius (the holy conch western end of therefore the closures for the at this point, siners, extend! Two compri and diaconic, writers, but it but those now existing period of Justinian. Columns, &c., are of porphyry and all other flat spaces and slabs of the richest carved surfaces with gold and the precise position of the columns by which the church was worshipped. The altar in the chancel, space of the iconostasis appears, to have been placed at the west end of the eastern semi-dome, possibly therefore the line of division between the enclosures for the superior and inferior clerics ran at this point, the chorus for the readers and singers, extending thence to the ambo.

Two compartments, known as the prothesis and diaconicon, are mentioned by Byzantine writers, but it has been a matter of dispute

CHURCH

where they were situated. It would seem probable that the compartment north of the iconostasis was the prothesis and that south, the diaconicon. The seat for the emperor was on the south side, and near the diaconicon; that for the empress, also on the south side, but in one of the central divisions of the triforium.

The circular building was the sacristy, the rectangular, the baptistery. The same emperor, also, built a church at Constantinople—that of St. Sergius, now called figures of our Lord, St. John the Baptist, St. Paul, and others, woven in silk and gold.

St. Sophia, Constantinople.

The circumference of the apse was occupied by the syntronos or seats for the patriarch and bishops. These were of silver-gilt, separated by shafts, probably carrying canopies.

Paul the Silentiary says nothing as to the chorus or place for the readers and singers, except that the iconostasis divided the portion set apart for the celebration of the mysteries from that of the "many-tongued multitude" (πολυγλώσσου ὄχλου). This seems to show that the chorus extended from the iconostasis to the ambo, which the same authority states to have stood nearly in the middle of the church, but rather towards the east. This space may, however, have been divided into two parts; one, the solens, to the east, set apart for the priests, deacons, and sub-deacons; the other for the readers and singers. The solens is said by Codinus to have been originally of onyx, but made by Justinian of gold (χρυσῶν). In the same passage it is said that the ambo was made of gold. We should no doubt understand in both cases that the true meaning of the passage is that much gilding was employed as a decoration. In the case of the solens the gilding may probably have been applied to the seats or stalls for the priests.

It would appear from the measurement given by Evagrius (Hist. Eccl. lib. iv. cap. xxxi.) that the holy conch (ἅγια κόγχη) commenced at the western end of the eastern semi-dome, possibly therefore the line of division between the enclosures for the superior and inferior clerics ran at this point, the chorus for the readers and singers, extending thence to the ambo.

Two compartments, known as the prothesis and diaconicon, are mentioned by Byzantine writers, but it has been a matter of dispute

CHURCH

where they were situated. It would seem probable that the compartment north of the iconostasis was the prothesis and that south, the diaconicon.

The seat for the emperor was on the south side, and near the diaconicon; that for the empress, also on the south side, but in one of the central divisions of the triforium.

The circular building was the sacristy, the rectangular, the baptistery.

The same emperor, also, built a church at Constantinople—that of St. Sergius, now called Kutchuk Agia Sophia (Little St. Sophia)—which evidently suggested the plan which eventually became the normal one of all Byzantine churches. In this the peculiar form of capitals and treatment of foliage, which are characteristic of Byzantine art, are fully shown.

The church of S. Vitale at Ravenna, built between 526 and 547, is, as Mr. Fergusson has remarked, so far as the arrangement of the dome, of the galleries, and of the pillars which support them, almost identical with St. Sergius. But S. Vitale has a sort of clerestory below the dome, which is raised about 20 feet higher. The arrangement of the aisles, choir, and exterior walls differ, it will be seen, very much; and it would seem that the architect had studied the building at Rome known as the Temple of Minerva Medica. S. Vitale is thoroughly Byzantine in detail, and, in spite of most tasteless repairs and additions, still retains much that is characteristic and interesting, especially in the choir, the lower part of which is lined with slabs of precious marbles, and the upper with the well-known mosaics.

St. Vitale, Ravenna.

S. Vitale, Ravenna.

While, however, churches with domes were constructed, basilican churches were also built. In connection with that of St. Sergius at Constantinople, was a basilican church dedicated to SS. Peter and Paul, which has been destroyed. The church of the monastery of St. Catharine, on Mount Sinai, which still exists, is basilican. It has never as yet been well illustrated; but the interior apse are innovations upon the original plan.

Another basilican church of the period of Justinian is that of Dana, between Antioch and Bir. This, likewise, has a single apse, but the end of the church is a straight line, oblong apartments—no doubt to serve for the prothesis and diaconicon—being placed one on each side. It is remarkable that the arch of the apse is of the horseshoe form, and those of the nave are very much stilted. The capitals are Roman in character.

The finest example of a basilican church of this period is, however, that of S. Apollinare in detail of the capitals appears to be more Roman than Byzantine. It is a basilica with one apse; but in order to form a chapel for the supposed site of the burning bush, an interior apse has been formed. At the sides are four chapels, but it would seem probable that the chapels and the Classe, at Ravenna, dedicated in 549. Here the eastern ends of the aisles are parted off, and terminate in apses, of which arrangement this is, perhaps, the earliest instance of which the date is well ascertained. It is a church of very noble proportions, and retains the decorations of the apse in a complete state. The interior of the basilica is Roman in character, the capitals resting on a cross with a cross.

S. Apollinare in Classe, Ravenna.

Attached to the church is a tall circular tower, which is the same age as the church tower. The tower stands on the site of the tower standing at Ravenna. The tower stands on the site of the tower standing at Ravenna. The tower stands on the site of the tower standing at Ravenna.

The cathedral of Ravenna, built in the 6th century, is particularly interesting. It is a basilica with a single apse, and is the finest example of a basilican church of this period. The interior of the church is in a state of ruin, but the exterior is still in good preservation. The church is a fine example of the architecture of the 6th century.

To this section of the churches it is desirable to add the Basilica of S. Apollinare in Classe, at Ravenna, dedicated in 549. Here the eastern ends of the aisles are parted off, and terminate in apses, of which arrangement this is, perhaps, the earliest instance of which the date is well ascertained. It is a church of very noble proportions, and retains the decorations of

upon the original of the period of between Antioch and single apse, but the straight line, oblong

the apse in marble and mosaic, in a very complete state. The capitals are, as seems to be usual in the basilican churches of this period, more Roman than Byzantine in character. Upon the capital rests a block or dossieret, ornamented with a cross, as in many other churches of the time.

Attached to the west front is a tall circular tower of seven stages, which is probably of the same age, and perhaps the earliest extant example of a church tower. Though, according to Hübisch (Alt. Christl. Kirchen, p. 34), the lower part of the tower standing near the cathedral of Ravenna may probably date from the previous century, and parts of some other towers, both at Rome and at Ravenna, may belong to the beginning of the 6th. Attached to the church of S. Vitale at Ravenna are two small round towers, which have perhaps never been carried to their full intended height.

The cathedral of Parenzo in Istria, built circ. A.D. 542, is too interesting to be passed over, particularly as it has undergone extremely little alteration, and retains the atrium before the front, and the baptistery opening from the atrium on the side opposite to the church—the baptistery, unfortunately, in a semi-ruinous state. Here, it will be seen, the aisles have apsidal ends internally, but the wall is flat externally. The apse is of peculiar interest, retaining the cathedra for the bishop and the bench for the clergy, in apparently an unaltered state, while the wall behind, to about one half of its height, is covered with an extremely rich and tasteful decoration in "opus sectile," the patterns being composed of pieces of the richest marbles, lapis lazuli, and mother-of-pearl. Above the cathedra is a cross standing on a globe, and figures of dolphins, tridents, cornucopias, and burning candles are sparingly introduced among the patterns of architectural character. On the west front, and on the east end above the apse, are remains of fresco paintings of an early date. In this church, although basilican in plan, the capitals are Byzantine in character.

To this account of individual churches it may perhaps be desirable to add, for the sake of giving a clearer idea of what a church of the period which has been under consideration was, an attempt to reconstruct in imagination such a building in a complete state with its fittings and decorations. Existing remains, with the assistance to be derived from the writers of the time, allow this to be done with sufficient assurance of accuracy. A basilican church of the first class in Rome, Constantinople, or one of the larger cities of the Roman Empire, may be thus described.

A stately gateway gave admittance to a large court (atrium) surrounded by covered colonnades, in the centre of which was a fountain or a vase (cautharus) containing water, so that ablutions might be performed before the church was entered. On one side of this atrium and entered from it was the baptistery. The basilica itself was usually, when the circumstances of the site permitted, placed on the western side of the atrium, so that the rising sun shone on its front. This front was pierced by three or five doorways according to the number of the aisles, and in that part which rose above the colonnade of the atrium, windows of immense size admitted light to the interior; the wall between and above these windows was covered sometimes, in parts, with mosaic of glass in gold and colour, but usually with plates of richly coloured marbles and porphyries arranged so as to form patterns; Parenzo.

S. Apollinare in Classe, Ravenna.

dated in 549. Here the are parted off, and ter-a arrangement this is, ance of which the date is a church of very ains the decorations of sometimes, however, stucco painted was the cheaper substitute. When the building was, as was always the case at Rome, of brick, the same decoration, by means of marble slabs or of stucco, was, if not actually carried out, in all probability, almost always projected for the whole exterior of the building. In only one case at Rome—that of the transept of S. Pietro in Vincoli, built A.D. 412—is the finish of the brickwork such as to lead to the conclusion that it was intended to remain uncovered.

The doors were of bronze adorned with sculptures in relief, and frequently gilt, or of wood, often richly inlaid or carved. Curtains of the richest stuffs, often of purple or scarlet, embroidered with gold, hung at the doors, to exclude the heat of summer or the cold of winter while the doors stood open.

In the interior the whole floor was covered either with tessellated pavements or with slabs of many-coloured marbles arranged in beautiful patterns. The aisles were separated from the nave by ranges of marble columns whose capitals supported either arches or horizontal architraves. The great width of the nave, in a first-class basilica frequently more than 80 feet, and the forest of columns on either hand (one of the colonnades often containing 24 or more columns) when there were double aisles, produced an architectural effect of great magnificence. The clerestory wall was pierced by numerous immense windows with arched heads, one of which was over each intercolumniation. These windows were no doubt divided by columns or pilasters and architraves, and the divisions fitted with slabs of marble pierced in a variety of patterns—these perforations were in many or most cases fitted with talc, alabaster, or other transparent or semi-transparent stones, or with glass either plain or coloured.

The roof was flat and of wood, where magnificence was sought it was richly adorned with carving and gilt. The semi-dome which covered the apse was covered with mosaic pictures, the subject being usually Christ, either seated or standing, with his apostles ranged on each hand. The earliest existing example of this arrangement is in the church of Sta. Pudenziana at Rome, which although it has been much injured and largely repaired, still shows so much goodness of style that it can hardly be attributed to a later date than the 4th century. Where a transept existed it was usually divided from the nave by an arch, the face of which fronting the nave was often also covered with mosaics; a colossal bust of Christ was often the central object of the picture, being placed over the crown of the arch, while on either side and below are represented the seven candlesticks, the symbols of the evangelists, and the twenty-four elders.

Details as to the arrangement of the fittings of churches will be found under the respective heads; it may be sufficient here to say that the apse was furnished with a bench following its circumference for the higher clergy, in the centre of which was a raised seat (cathedra) for the bishop; that the altar was usually placed on the chord of the apse at the top of a flight of steps, and parted off from the nave by railings (cancelli); below it was often a platform or space (solens), and beyond this a quadrangular, usually oblong, enclosure (chorus, presbyterium; the last perhaps improperly), in which the singers and readers were stationed. This enclosure was formed by railings or dwarf walls, and connected with these was theambo or reading desk. At Rome, and probably elsewhere, a space on either side of the chorus was also ruled in, that on the right being called 'senatorium,' and appropriated to senators or other men of rank, that on the left, called 'matroneum,' to women of the same degrees. Where a gallery, or, as we now say, a triforium existed, it was set apart for women, but this arrangement was not very common in the West.

Benches or other seats were probably provided in the chorus, the senatorium, and the matroneum, but the rest of the church was left altogether open and free. These seats were either of marble or of carved wood, in many instances gilded, the railings of the same materials or of bronze. Over the altar was a lofty and richly decorated canopy (ciborium), from the arches of which hung curtains of stuffs of the richest colours interwoven with gold. Like curtains often depended from the arches of the nave, and hung at the doors. Vases, crowns, and lamps of silver or of gold hung from the arches, or were placed upon the dwarf walls or partitions which separated the various divisions of the edifice.

According to the proposed plan, the history of the ecclesiastical architecture of the period which follows, viz. from the death of Justinian to that of Charlemagne, will be treated of under separate sections.

IV. The Period from the death of Justinian to the death of Charlemagne.—1. The western part of the territory of the Eastern Empire.—During the reign of the Emperor Justinian, churches were built on the basilican plan, as well as on one derived probably in part from such churches as that at Ezra, in central Syria, in part from the circular or polygonal churches which had been constructed throughout Christendom. Soon after the time of Justinian the basilican type was no longer followed, but a peculiar plan was adopted, that in which the building assumes a form approaching to a square, the central part being covered by a dome placed on a drum pierced with windows. The period which followed the death of Justinian was one of political trouble, and hence examples of the progress of Byzantine architecture during the latter part of the 6th and the 7th centuries are somewhat deficient. The church of St. Clement at Ancona, however, probably belongs to this period, as the dome is raised on a low drum pierced with windows; in plan the church approximates to that of the later Greek churches. The church of St. Irene at Constantinople, which may probably date from the earlier half of the 8th century, shows a further advance, as the dome is there raised on a lofty drum pierced with windows; some features of the earlier plan are, however, preserved, as there is only one apse, and as its form is oblong. The church of St. Nicholas at Myra is perhaps more modern than either; it has a double narthex, three apses, a lesser one on each side of the larger, and a dome raised on a drum in which are windows. If the remains of the iconostasis and ciborium shewn in plate lviii. of Texier and Pullan's Byzantine Architecture mention, the whole of the building, dimensions, about 80 wide in the transept in width.

Another church, probably of about the same date, exists in ruins at Tabala in Lycia.

2. Armenia.—The churches remain as yet been known to be formed as existing. The 6th centuries, the 7th, must refer to a great high antiquity churches, but it is really of early date.

One of the Dighour near Agasson thinks that it bears though not much of the character

The church of St. Simeon (1204) to date from the 5th century, follows in a late Georgian arrangement, how Borrah in the H.

The two rooms which flank the nave are doubtless mosaic, but to which must be referred.

The primitive Ekmiazin, however, but wanted probably founded alterations and one in 705.

The church erected between Byzantine than

3. Italy.—In the 6th century, the Roman Mura (578-590) Agnese (625-633) were undertaken in one respect, Architecture are those of the original construction, the whole space east of the dome was parted off from the bema. This church is of considerable dimensions, about 100 feet in extreme length by 60 wide in the eastern part, the nartheces extending in width to about 115 feet.

Another church of much interest, and probably of about the same date, is that which exists in ruins near the remains of the ancient Tabala in Lyca.

2. Armenia and the adjacent provinces.—The churches remaining in these countries have not as yet been studied with sufficient care and knowledge to allow very satisfactory conclusions to be formed as to the real dates of those now existing. The Persian invasions in the 5th and 6th centuries, and the Mahomedan conquest in the 7th, must have caused damage and destruction to a great portion of the older buildings; a high antiquity is nevertheless claimed for several churches, but how much of the existing building is really of early date, is very uncertain.

One of the earliest is apparently that at Digiour near Ani in Armenia, which Mr. Ferguson thinks may be referred to the 7th century. It bears an evident resemblance in style, though not much in plan, to some of the churches of the Houran dating from the previous century.

SS. Vincenzo ed Anastasio.

The church of St. Hripsime near Etchmiadzin is believed by Dr. Neale (Holy Eastern Church, i. 204) to date from the 6th century, and he considers its peculiar plan to have been the form followed in a large proportion of the Armenian and Georgian churches. The germ of the arrangement, however, exists in the cathedral of Beirah in the Houran of A. D. 512.

The two recesses in these Armenian churches which flank the apse in which the altar stood, were doubtless used for the prothesis and diaconicon, but to what use the other two were applied must be matter of conjecture.

The primate church of Armenia, that of Etchmiadzin, has something of the same arrangement, but wants the western chamber. It was probably founded in 524, but underwent many alterations and reparations, one very important one in 705.

The church of Usunlar is said to have been erected between 718 and 726; its plan is rather Byzantine than distinctively Armenian.

3. Italy.—In Rome but few important works were undertaken during the 6th, 7th, or 8th centuries, the rebuilding of S. Lorenzo fuori le Mura (578-590) (the present choir), and of S. Agnese (625-638) were among the most considerable undertakings. These buildings are alike in one respect, viz. that they have a gallery or triforium carried over the aisles and along the wall of the front. At S. Lorenzo the aisle roofs have been destroyed, but no doubt once existed. In other respects they do not differ from the earlier churches.

The church of SS. Vincenzo ed Anastasio alle tre Fontane, near Rome, founded 625-638 and rebuilt 772-795, is however very remarkable in an architectural point of view, as it is not constructed with columns taken from older buildings, but altogether of new material and with considerable originality.

In the early part of the 9th century three churches were built in Rome by Pope Paschal I. (817-824), Sta. Prassede, Sta. Cecilia, and Sta. Maria, in Domenica. All still exist, and though badly injured by repairs and alterations, still present very much that is interesting and original. The first has a nave and aisles, a transept, and a single apse. The columns dividing the nave from the aisles are antique and support an entablature, the ranges are broken by three oblong piers, which carry arches spanning the nave, but these, according to Hubsch, are not original, but inserted not very long after the construction of the building. The transept is entered from the nave by a triumphal arch, the front and soffit of which are covered with mosaics, as are also the apse and the wall on each side of it. All these were placed there by Pope Paschal, and are most valuable monuments of the state of art of his period.

Below the raised tribune is a "confessio"—a vault under the high altar. The west end of the transept (the church standing nearly north and south) was at an early time parted off by a wall, and on this a low tower has been raised. The part thus walled off is of peculiar interest, as perhaps no portion of a church of so early a date remains in so unaltered a state. The walls are covered with remains of frescoes which seem to be coeval with the mosaics, and the windows retain the pierced slabs of marble, the apertures of which still contain fragments of the laminae of tale through which light was admitted.

The chapel of S. Zeno, attached to the east side of the nave, has been noticed under CHAPEL. The doorway leading into it is of great interest to the architectural antiquary, as it shows that in the beginning of the 9th century the prevalent style of ornament was that formed by knots or plaited patterns of the same character as those in use in England and elsewhere between A. D. 700 and A. D. 1000. The execution is feeble, scratchy, and irregular.

Sta. Cecilia has been greatly altered, but retains very interesting mosaics, also the work of Pope Paschal. The distribution and subjects are much the same as those at Sta. Prassede.

The Roman churches of this date, however interior in style to those of the earlier period, must have presented an appearance of equal splendour; mosaic and precious marbles were not spared, nor doubtless gilded roofs. Doors were of bronze, or even of more costly materials, for Honorius I. is said in the Lib. Pontif. to have covered the doors of the Vatican basilica with silver weighing 975 lbs.

Examples of churches of the period under consideration, with well-ascertained dates, are not so readily to be found in other parts of Italy as in Rome; but a few buildings exist which can be assigned on historical data to this period, the character of which is quite in accordance with that of those of other countries whose date can be ascertained. Such are the Duomo Vecchio and Sta. Giulia at Brescia, and SS. Apostoli at Florence. The first of these is by some assigned to the latter part of the 7th century, by others, with greater probability, to about A.D. 774; it is a large circular church about 125 feet in diameter, covered by a dome of 65 feet internal diameter; it is extremely plain, having no shafts or columns, but piers carrying square-edged arches springing from very simply moulded impost; the whole is roughly and irregularly built.

Duomo Vecchio, Brescia.

Sta. Giulia forms part of a convent founded by Desiderius, King of the Lombards (757-773) and is a basilican church.

SS. Apostoli at Florence is believed on respectable authority to have been dedicated in the presence of Charles the Great; it is a small basilican church with antique columns, probably brought from Fiesole.

The Duomo of Torcello, near Venice, is believed to have been originally built in the 7th century, but largely repaired or rebuilt in A.D. 1000. It is on the basilican plan, with ranges of columns dividing the nave from the aisles; it is particularly interesting, as preserving in a more perfect state than elsewhere the internal arrangement of the apse, the bishop's cathedra being placed against the central point of the curve at the top of a flight of steps, on either side of which are six concentric ranges of steps for the presbyters; the altar is placed on a platform in front, and a screen divides the presbytery or chorus from the nave. Under the apse is a small crypt. In front of the church are the traces of a baptistery, square externally, octagonal within. The apse is flanked by two minor apses, which may probably date from the rebuilding. This church has much resemblance to the cathedral of Parenzo in Istria. Close to its west front stands the small church of Sta. Fosca, which by some is believed to be of the same date as the Duomo, by others is referred to the 9th or 10th century. S. Giovanni in Fonte, the baptistery of the Cathedral of Verona, though much altered and repaired, probably dates from a period not later than the 9th century; it is a small building with nave, aisles, and apse.

4. France, Germany, and Switzerland.—Though many and large churches were constructed in the opulent cities of the Roman provinces of Gallia during the period of Roman occupation, nothing has come down to our time except a few fragments. The description given by Silvanus Apollinaris (Epist. xii.) of the gilded roof, the glass mosaic of the walls, the variously coloured marbles, and the stony wood of columns seems to shew that in their pristine glory the churches of Lyons or of "opulent Vienna" were little inferior in splendour to those of the imperial city.

Churches continued to be constructed under the rule of the Teutonic conquerors, although doubtless of much diminished magnificence. Gregory of Tours (Hist. Franc. ii. 14) describes the basilica built by Perpetuus at Tours, in honour of Eustochius, in the following words: "Habet in longum pedes centum sexaginta, in latum sexaginta; habet in altum usque ad cameram pedes quadringenta quinque, fenestras in altario triginti duas, in capso viginti; ostia octo, tria in altario, quinque in capso."

Hubsch (Alt-Christl. Kirchen. pl. xviii. figs. 6 and 7) has made a conjectural plan and section of this church, believing it to have been planned as parallel-triapsal.

The same historian (ii. 16) describes the church built by St. Namatius at Clermont, as 150 feet long, 60 feet broad, and 50 feet high, with a round apse, and aisles on each side. It had, he says, 42 windows, 70 columns, and 8 doors. The walls of the altar were adorned with "Opus sarsurium," i.e. scutell work, of various marbles.

At Perigueux are said (J. H. Parker, Archæologia, xxxvii. 248) to be remains of a church of this period, remarkable as having barrel vaults carried on arches transversely across the aisles. At Beauvais, attached to the cathedral, is a portion, no doubt the nave and aisles, of a much earlier church known as the Basse Oeuvre; it closely resembles in character the buildings in Italy, such as SS. Anastasio near Rome, which are believed to date from the 7th or 8th centuries; but it may even be older, as it is simply a building Roman in style, and so plain as to give none of that assistance towards the formation of an opinion as to the date which mouldings or ornament afford. The great size of the windows is, however, perhaps, an indication of early date. Several other smaller examples of like character are said to exist within the diocese of Beauvais.

In the baptistery at Poitiers we have an example of a somewhat more ambitious attempt at classical architecture; but the manner is which the or denotes an ut tectural know

Somewhat churches not t near Poitiers, these shew a r n'lding, and by triangular brickwork, pro sarium of Gre; this class are with much pr 6th to the 8th

In the valley ritories, where architecture an freestone, the cl for several cen doubt to what assigned. One the porch of the as all the charac empire, but in M older than the ornaments are fo interior of the cl seem that the wi some date.

In the Jura, no vent of Roman-n in A.D. 753 by Po transept, and tow to be those of the storied narthex M century or two, bu tecture Savoy, &c. columns of the na three diameters in at the top, the base arches have a sun moulding. Some of the church have ca which the ornamental pieces are put together denotes an utter barbarism and want of architectural knowledge or taste.

Somewhat akin to this building are some churches not far from the Loire, as St. Genéroux near Poitiers, Savenières in Anjou, &c.; both these show a reminiscence of Roman methods of building, and the former has much decoration by triangular pediments and a sort of mosaic in brickwork, probably a variety of the opus saracurium of Gregory of Tours. The buildings of this class are ascribed by the French antiquaries with much probability to the period from the 6th to the 8th century.

In the valley of the Rhene and the adjacent territories, where are abundance of remains of Roman architecture and plenty of excellent and durable freestone, the classical models were so well copied for several centuries that it is matter of great doubt to what date many buildings should be assigned. One very characteristic example is work, but the impostes generally are of the rudest kind, though one or two shew mouldings of a somewhat complicated character and apparently properly cut, whether these are the work of a later time or not is not clear. Beneath the central tower is a sort of cupola resting on pendentives, and pierced in the centre with a large orifice.

BENEFICE.

When, however, the influence of Charles the Great, whose regard for architecture is well known, began to make itself felt, we find a marked improvement in architecture; besides the most remarkable monument of his reign, the minster of Aix-la-Chapelle, we have several other churches erected either under him or his immediate successors, which enable us to form a definite conception of the style of the period.

Before these are described one building of very anomalous character should however be mentioned. This is the gateway at Lorsch, not far from Worms. It is a two-storied parallelogram, are externally, flanked by two date from the close resemblance Istria. Close to church of Sta.

ed to be of the thers is refered
S. Giovanni in Cathedral of Ved repaired, pro-later than the ilding with nave, erland.—Though e constructed in nan provinces of oman occupation, ur time except a on given by Siloof the gabled roof, is, the variously y wood of column ristine glory the ut Vicuna" were to those of the constructed under overers, although ned magnificence,

e. ii. 14) describes ans at Tours, in following words:
tum sexaginta, in um usque ad came-nne, fenestras in viginti; ostia octo, so."

r, pl. xviii. figs. 6 d plan and section have been planned

16) describes the as at Clermont, as and 50 feet high, on each side. It 70 columns, and 8
r. scutelle work, of

H. Parker, Archæ- oins of a church of ving barrel vaults
y across the aisles, he cathedral, is a d aisles, of a much he Basse Oeuve;
eter the buildings od Anastasio nor date from the 7th ny even be older, as an in style, and so assistance towards to the date which
d. The great size perhaps, an indica-other smaller ex-s said to exist within ers we have an en-ambitious attempt but the manner is the porch of the cathedral of Avignon, which was all the character of a building of the lower empire, but in Mr. Fergusson's opinion is not older than the Carlovingian era. The same ornaments are found on this porch and in the interior of the church, and it would therefore seem that the whole building is of about the same date.

In the Jura, not far from Orbe, at the convent of Romain-motier, a church was dedicated in A.D. 753 by Pope Stephen II., and the nave, transepts, and tower now existing, are believed to be those of the original structure. The two-storied narthex Mr. Fergusson thinks may be a century or two, but Blavignac (Hist. de l'Archit. de la Savoie, &c.) only a little later. The columns of the nave are circular masses, only three diameters in height, corbelled out square at the top, the bases quadrangular blocks. The arches have a sunk face, but no ornament or moulding. Some shafts in the eastern part of the church have capitals rudely imitating Roman the lower storey pierced with three large arch ways, and was no doubt the gateway leading into the atrium of the church of the monastery, of which class of buildings this is perhaps the only existing example (at least in the west), of an early date.

The most remarkable and most authentic work of the period in Germany or France is the minster of Aix-la-Chapelle, the original character of which, though hidden by repairs and mistaken attempts at decoration, can still be satisfactorily ascertained: it was commenced in 796, and dedicated in 804; it is externally a polygon of sixteen sides, to the west was attached a tower-like building, flanked by two circular towers containing staircases. What the original arrangement of the east end was is unfortunately unknown, as in the 14th century it was replaced by a new choir. The building is about 105 feet, the dome 47 3 inches in diameter, and the latter rises about 100 feet above the floor.

In the interior are eight compound piers, made up of rectangular figures and without shafts, which support plain round arches; the triforium is very lofty, and the arches opening from this into the central space have screens of columns in two stories, the lower carrying arches while the upper run up to the arch which spans the openings. Above there are eight round-headed windows, and the whole is covered by an octagonal dome. The columns of the triforium are antique, and so it would appear were their capitals; the bases seem to have been made for the building, and according to Kugler (Gesch. der Baukunst, i. 400) are very shapeless. The best preserved part of the interior is the belfry over the porch; this is covered with a plain waggon vault, and shews plain rectangular piers with moulded bases, and impostes carrying equally plain arches. The severely simple character of the building is very well seen in this chamber, which is on a level with and originally opened into the triforium. The dome was once covered with mosaic, which has wholly disappeared; but Ciampini (Ict. Mon. ii. 41) has engraved a part of it, three of the eight segments of which it was composed. In the central of these is a colossal figure of Christ seated on a throne, surrounded by concentric rings of colour representing the rainbow, the ground on which this figure was placed was golden with red stars, below are seven of the twenty-four elders of the Apocalypse. The simple grandeur of this picture must have harmonized well with the whole character of the building. The triforium would seem to have been paved with mosaic and other pavements brought from Ravenna or Rome; two fragments still remain, one of black and white tesserae, the other of sectile work, in marble slabs of various colours. The fronts of the openings from the triforium to the central space are protected by cancelli of bronze, doubtless also brought from Ravenna or Rome; they are of several patterns, some of classical Roman character, others Byzantine.

A vault is said to exist beneath the centre of the church, and to have served as the burial-place of the great emperor; but it is not accessible, and nothing seems to be known as to its character. The western doors are of bronze.

The exterior is very plain, the only ornament being some pilasters at the angles of the drum of the dome; these have capitals of classical character, but in their wasted state it would be difficult to decide whether they are really antique or copies of antique work.

A document of the utmost value as affording information as to the arrangements of a large conventual church, is the plan preserved in the public library of St. Gall, and first published by Mabillon (Ann. Ben. Ord.). It appears to have been sent to Abbot Gozpertus, who began to rebuild the church and monastery in A.D. 829, and very probably was prepared by Eginhard, who was prefect of the royal buildings under Charles the Great. The annexed cut represents that part which contains the church and its appendages.

The plan is without scale, and little or no reliance can be placed on the proportional size of the parts, as Professor Willis has observed; the church is said, in legends written upon it, to be 200 feet long and 80 feet broad; but in the plan, if we assume the length to be 200 feet, the breadth would be only 50 feet. The drawing must no doubt be considered rather as a scheme for a great monastery than as a plan to be carried out by an architect; its peculiarities will be readily seen; first among these are the apses at each end, an arrangement afterwards common in Germany, but of which we have no earlier instance. The circular towers are also remarkable. At the east end the drawing is confused by the attempt to shew both the crypt and the choir; the space marked by slanting lines bears in the original the legend "involutio arearum," and no doubt is meant to represent an arched passage, from whence proceeds a short passage to the confession.

The church of Granson, near the lake of Neuchâtel, according to Mr. Ferguson, is of the Carolingian era, though others are disposed to place it in the 11th century.

In France the most important examples of the Carolingian period seem to be the nave of the church of Mortier en Der, near Vassy, which exhibits a style very nearly akin to that of the Master of Aix-la-Chapelle, and the remains of the church of St. Martin at Angers. This last was founded some years before 819, as the Empress Hermengarde, who died in that year was the foundress, and was interred within it. It consisted of a nave and aisles, a central tower, and a rather long transept; the eastern part having been replaced by a choir of the 12th century. The piers separating the nave from the aisles are oblong, but chamfered at the angles, and carry plain unadorned arches of rectangular section; there is no triforium, but a clerestory of windows of rather long proportion. The tower has a dome which originally sprang from the capitals of four massive circular pillars, which, as they are engaged in the piers which carry the tower, shew only the fourth of a circle. The capitals have some shallow carving, chiefly patterns of plaited work. In several parts of the church two or three courses of flat bricks are introduced between the courses of stonework.

The church of Germigny-sur-Loire is a building of very remarkable character, and in it, incised on the abaci of the two eastern capitals of the tower piers, is an inscription recording its dedication in 806. The plan, it will be seen, is peculiar, having a tower in the middle of a square, with an apse projecting from three of the faces, and two small apses flanking the eastern apse. The piers are square, and have impostes of blocks and some knotwork in shallow relief. Among the most peculiar features are the small shafts attached to the piers at the entrance of the eastern apse. These recall some of the details of Roman-motier, as the impostes do those of St. Martin at Angers.

5. Spain.—As in Gaul, little or nothing remains in Spain of the churches built before the invasion of the barbarians; and those which the latter constructed were destroyed by the Arabs. Some capitals and fragments, probably of enclosures of 'cheri canorum,' exist at Cordova ('Monumentos Arquitectónicos de España'), and some other fragments and capitals have been found at Toledo on the sites of the basilicas of St. Leocadia, built A.D. 600, and of St. Giles, said to date from the 8th century ('El arte Latino—Bizantino en España,' by Don José Ama-

AA. The Church.
B. The Altar.
C. The Public.
D. The Hospital.
E. Dispensary.
F. Residence of
G. Another and
H. Ordinal and feet. The drawnder rather as a y than as a plan to t; its peculiarities ong these are the gement afterwards which we have no ar towers are also yd the drawing is ew both the crypt arked by slanting legend "Involutio ant to represent an e proceeds a short ar the lake of Neurgussou, is of the ers are disposed to unt examples of the be the nave of the near Vassy, which skin to that of the and the remains at Angers. This before 819, as the died in that year as interred within nd aisles, a central nsept; the eastern a choir of the 12th ng the nave from chamfered at the moulded arches of no triforium, but a er long proportion.

 h originally sprang ive circular pillars, in the piers which y the fourth of a ne shallow carving work. In several hree courses of flat en the courses of ur-Loire is a build-racter, and in it, wo eastern capitals iption recording its n, it will be seen, in the middle of a ting from three of lanking the eastern nd have impost of in shallow relief.

 tures are the small at the entrance of recall some of the
 as the impost do
 s.

e or nothing remains ilt before the 10th nd those which the oyed by the Arabs.
 s, probably of eu-
 ' exist at Cordova os de España'), and capitals have been of the basilicas of
 of St. Gines, century ('El arte
 ' by Don José Ama-

CHURCH

383

Plan of St. Gall.

AA. The Church.

B. The Abbot's Lodging.

C. The Public School.

D. The Hospital or Guest House.

E. Dispensary.

F. Residence of Doctor, with Garden of medical herbs.

G. Another small double-apsed Church, divided by wall across centre.

H. Orchard and Cemetery.

I. Great Cloister.

J. Refectory.

K. Kitchen.

L. Wine Cellar.

M. Dormitory, with various dependent buildings.

N. Another Hospital, apparently for inferior class of guests.

O. Stables for horses, cattle, sheep, &c.

P. Fountain.

AA. Open spaces or paradise. (That to the west is surrounded by an open semicircular porch, by which the public were to gain access to the Church.)

B. Vestry.

C. Schoolmaster's House.

D. Porter's House.

E. Furnace.

F. Detached chimney-shaft for distil.

G. Library.

dar de los Rios). At Venta de Baños, near Palencia, the church built by Receswinthius in A.D. 691, is stated to remain in a tolerably complete state.

The only other churches which can be supposed to date from a period even as early as the 9th century which have as yet been noticed, are a few in the Asturias, not far from Oviedo.

These, however, present many remarkable peculiarities of plan, having square ended chancel, and chapels or apartments attached to their sides. One of the group, Sta. Maria de Naranco is stated to have been built (r. 848, and as the others are somewhat plainer and ruder in style they are more probably earlier than later. The most remarkable is that of the Ermita de Sta. Christina, near la Pola de Lena, which retains the original partition separating the choir from the nave: the choir is raised above the nave, and the altar recess above the choir, these as well as the western part of the church are vaulted over, so that there are chambers above them. The central space is covered by a waggon vault. The circular panels in the upper part of the choir screen are pierced, the central panel below carved with ornament, having much affinity with that to be seen on the crowns of the 7th century found at Fuente de Guarrazo, near Toledo.

S. Salvador de Valledios, near Villavieiosa, has aisles, but the same system of vaulting over both ends of the church exists, and as in the others there are small chambers right and left on entering by the western door. One of these probably served as a baptistry, as is the case at Sta. Maria de Naranco. A porch and other chambers are attached to the south side, and may have served as dwellings for priests or attendants on the church. This has been attributed to A.D. 892.

Sta. Maria de Naranco is nearly on the same plan, and appears to have always been a parish church.

The upper chambers in all these churches are open to the church, not closed as in Ireland, and capable of being used as dwelling places.

These buildings are all small, Sta. Cristina being about 50 feet long. Sta. Maria de Naranco about 70, but have a good deal of ornament, and exhibit a peculiarity of style, the origin of which cannot be traced to any other country, and which was probably developed from the earlier imitations of Roman work. A clue to the reasons for the peculiarity of plan seems altogether wanting. The square end of the chancel may perhaps be thought to indicate some Irish influence as that country is the only one where this form is anything but the rarest exception.

Although, as has been said, the churches of an earlier period have disappeared, Spain has preserved in a remarkable manner some of the peculiarities of the arrangement of churches in the earlier periods; thus the 'coro,' instead of being placed to the east of the transepts, is, like the 'cath. cantorum' of the early basilicas, extended into the nave, and the central lantern tower is called the 'cimbório,' in memory, doubtless, of a time when it served as the 'episcopium' of the high altar, now placed in the elongated choir, or, as it is called by the Spaniards, 'capilla mayor.' Probably these traditions were handed down through a chain of numerous links, the earlier of which have perished.

b. Ireland.—We find here a great number of very small churches very roughly built, with very little attempt at any decoration, frequently lighted only by one very small window, but constructed usually with extremely large stones, and not unfrequently built with that material exclusively, the roof being formed by horizontal courses, each brought forward until they met at the top.

Such are the churches or chapels of Tempall Ceannach, on the middle island of the bay of Galway (Petrie, Eccle. Arch. of Ireland, p. 189), of St. Mac Dara on the island of Cruach Mhic Dara, off the coast of Conamara (id. p. 196), of Bataas, Co. Kerry (id. p. 169), of Fore, Co. Westmeath (id. p. 174), and many others. The two first of these churches form single apartments without any division into nave and chancel, and measure, the first 10 feet 6 inches, by 12 feet 6 inches internally; the second 15 feet by 11 inches; both are roofed with stone in a manner described. The two other churches are in a less complete state, but their doorways are remarkable for their square heads, and the immense size of the stones of which they are constructed; in that of Bataas the lintel is 7 feet 6 inches long, 2 feet high, and extends through the whole thickness of the wall. There appears in this doorway an evident intention of imitating the architecture of a Greek or Roman building in that of Fore the lintel is 6 feet long, 2 feet high, and 3 feet deep, and is sculptured with a cross within a circle, on a projecting tablet. Both these churches are attributed by Mr. Petrie to the 6th or 7th centuries. It is a question of much interest whence the builders of these churches derived their ideas of architecture, these buildings resembling in no respect any contemporaneous structures in England, France, or Italy. Improbable as the suggestion may at first sight appear, it would seem that it was Central Syria which furnished the models; that country abounds with churches and monasteries constructed between the 3rd and 7th centuries in a style founded upon the Roman architecture of the time, but with many peculiarities both of construction and of detail. Among the former of these is the use of very large stones, and the practice of roofing small buildings by advancing each course somewhat beyond the centre than that below; examples of both will be found in plenty in Count Melchior de Vogüé's Syrie Centrale. Although in these buildings arched doorways are the most common, these formed precisely in the same manner as the Irish examples, with one large block for a lintel, are frequently found; and one of these (Syrie Centrale, p. 99, fig. 4), may almost pass for the original of which the lintel at Fore is the rough copy. The Irish buildings have far more the appearance of such copies of the products of a cultivated school of architecture as might be achieved by native workmen under the direction of immigrants, bringing with them recollections, rather than accurate knowledge of the edifices they had left behind, than that of the first rude essays of an uncivilised race.

The Persians plundered Syria in A.D. 573, the Saracens invaded it in 613, and Central Syria seems to have that period. monasteries possible that who sought a may have been St. Augustus, w 709 (Petrie, p hundreds, of a tion is made of Desert Ullish, grants are in ginit," without Petrie (p. 124 peculiarities of ings are due t by "the Flirbo which our his at a very remo "were accusto tresses, but eve sepulchres, of a style now ust lasic."

Besides the s mentioned above erected in Ireln dral church of the time of St appear in the 9t in length (Pet length of a ch boaster, havin dimension havin life of St. Patri for the Donna Tallown, in Me trected with a so is worth notice t founded accordi but undoubtedly wa 60 feet long have been of woo

These larger ch in plan a paralle oblong which for Two peculiarit ditecture of Ireli invariably rectang found near the en cular. Perhaps t of the former is used as that mo entary, and perpe extraordinary ven always entertained their early sainta Tower.]

7. Scotland.—I celebrated monaste unity through the but very few build the period under served. The most the church at Egl a close resemblance churches, and is s round tower att by 16 ft., the chan latter is covered b over which was a c and the external CHRIST. ANT.

seems to have been entirely depopulated about that period. It at that time contained many monasteries and many monks, and it is quite possible that among the numerous foreigners who sought an asylum in Ireland at that period may have been Syrian monks. In the litany of St. Aengus, written, it is believed, in the year 799 (Petrie, p. 137), among the scores, and even hundreds, of strangers of various nations, mention is made of several Egyptian monks buried in Desert Uladh. The greater part of these immigrants are in the litany simply called "peregrini," without indication of nationality. Dr. Petrie (p. 127), however, seems to think the peculiarities of construction of these early buildings are due to the colonisation of the country by "the Firbolg and Tuatha de Danann tribes, which our historians bring hither from Greece at a very remote period; which tribes," he says, "were accustomed to build, not only their fortresses, but even their dome-roofed houses and sepulchres, of stone without cement, and in the style now usually called Cyclopean and Pelagic."

Besides the small churches which have been mentioned above, larger structures were also erected in Ireland at an early date. The cathedral church of Armagh, whether that erected in the time of St. Patrick or of a later date, would appear in the 9th century to have been 140 feet in length (Petrie, p. 157). The more usual length of a church of the first class would, however, appear to have been 60 feet; this dimension having, according to the tripartite life of St. Patrick, been prescribed by the saint for the Domnach Mor (Great Church), near Teltown, in Meath, appears to have been inserted with a sort of sacred character; and it is worth notice that the church at Glinstonbury, founded according to tradition by a St. Patrick, but undoubtedly by missionaries from Ireland, was 60 feet long, by 26 feet broad; it seems to have been of wood.

These larger churches had usually a chancel—in plan a parallelogram—attached to the larger oblong which formed the nave.

Two peculiarities mark the ecclesiastical architecture of Ireland, one, that the altar end is invariably rectangular, the other that the towers found near the early churches are always circular. Perhaps the most probable explanation of the former is that the form was originally used as that most suitable for a very small edifice, and perpetuated in consequence of the extraordinary veneration which the Irish have always entertained for anything connected with their early saints. [For the round tower see Towers.]

7. Scotland.—Irish ecclesiastics founded the celebrated monastery of Iona, and spread Christianity through the Isles and mainland of Scotland, but very few buildings which can be referred to the period under consideration have been observed. The most remarkable would seem to be the church at Eglisbay in Orkney, which bears a close resemblance to one of the early Irish churches, and is especially remarkable as having a round tower attached to it. The nave is 30 ft. by 26 ft., the chancel 11 ft. by 9 ft. 7 in., the latter is covered by a plain semi-circular vault, over which was a chamber constructed between it and the external covering of stone. The nave also is stated to have had a stone roof. The tower is entered by a door in the west wall of the nave; the chancel arch is described as of a horse-shoe form, but this may probably be occasioned by a settlement of the work. The windows are few and small, the doorways plain, round-headed arches. As in the Irish Islands there were numerous oratories scattered over Orkney and Shetland; the parish of Yell in the latter is said (Hibbert's Scotland, p. 530) to have contained twenty chapels. The churches constructed by the Christian Pietists were probably either of wood or of earth, which is the reason of the entire absence of any buildings within their territory which can be assigned to a period before A.D. 800, it is the more remarkable as the numerous sculptured monuments show that the people who dwelt within the limits of the Pictish kingdom could carve stone with extraordinary skill for the period.

8. England.—Though the Christians of Britain must undoubtedly have possessed churches of considerable size before the occupation of the country by the Saxons, Jutes, and Angles, no certain remains of such buildings have as yet been met with.

The historians of Canterbury assert that Ethelbert gave to St. Augustine an existing church in that city (Willis' Arch. Hist of Christ Church, Canterbury, pp. 20, 30) which became the cathedral. Bede mentions the church of St. Martin as an ancient church given in like manner, some portions of wall in the latter have been thought to have formed part of the ancient church. Of the Saxon cathedral nothing remains.

Three influences it will be seen contributed in unequal degrees according to circumstances and locality, to form or to modify ecclesiastical architecture in England; viz. 1, that of Roman architecture either as derived from buildings imported by ecclesiastics and other church builders; 2, that of the Irish missionaries; 3, that of the native school of timber architecture. The first of these we may trace in the plans, in the style of some churches, and in the frequent assertion that a church was constructed "opere Romanorum;" the second, perhaps, in the preference of a rectangular east end over an apsidal, which last, as we find it all but universal in England in the 12th century and common in the 13th, was probably the prevalent plan in earlier centuries; the third, in construction evidently copied from wooden buildings, and in the fact that the baluster shafts, which more than any other feature characterize the ante-Norman style, were turned in a lathe as if they had been wood. It seems probable that the Roman and the native style were concurrent, for we find the two mixed together, as in the curious doorway at Monkwearmouth which there seems to be ground to believe is part of the church built by Benedict Biscop, A.D. 671. Here we have an arch and impost which are evident imitations of Roman work, supported by coupled balusters, and an excessively exaggerated base carved with interlacing ornaments or snakes by a hand which no doubt was accustomed to execute similar work in wood.

The existing remains of English churches, dating between 600 and 800, are unfortunately, with very rare exceptions, only fragments. These through a chain of of which have a great number of ly built, with very frequently lighted ones, but constructed material exclusively, horizontal courses, they met at the chapel of Tenpall and of the bay of of Ireland, p. 129), of Crnach Ma mara (ibid., p. 164, 166), of Fore, Co. many others. The form single aperturations have and chancel of 6 feet 8 inches, the second 15 feet with stone in the other churches at their doorways are heads, and the

of which they are the lintel is 7 feet and extends through all. There appears mention of imitation; or Roman building 6 feet long, 2 feet sculptured with projecting tablet erected by Mr. Petrie.

It is a question builders of these as of architects, in no respect any in England, France, suggestion may at seem that it was the models; that ness and monasteries and 7th centuries Roman architecture peculiarities both Among the former large stones, and the ofness by advancing the centre than with, will be found in Vogel's Syrie Co- buildings arched doorways, these formed preceding the Irish examples, intel, are frequently Syrie Centrale, p. 93, the original of which copy. The Irish appearance of such cultivated school of achieved by native of immigrants, actions, rather than edifices they had left rudimentary essays of an

Syria in A.D. 573, the
, and Central Syria

scanty remains, assisted and illustrated by what contemporary or somewhat later writers have told us, will however enable us to form tolerably clear ideas as to the character of the churches which were built in the above-mentioned period.

Of the metropolitan cathedral of Canterbury we have a detailed account, written by Edmer the Chanter, in which he describes the edifice as it existed before the fire of 1067. The annexed plan is copied from that drawn up by Professor Willis (Hist. of Ch. Ch. Canterbury) from Edmer's Canterbury Cathedral.

description. The church, Edmer says, was built "Romanorum opere et ex quadam parte ad Imitationem ecclesie beati apostolorum principis Petri," meaning of course the great Vatican basilica. The western apse was probably added by Archbishop Odo about A.D. 950.

Of another church of the larger class we have some important remains. This is that of Stow, in Lincolnshire, where a bishopric was founded in A.D. 678. The church there is cruciform, measuring 150 ft. from east to west, with a breadth of 27 ft. in the nave and 24 ft. in the chancel; the transept is 90 ft. from north to south by 23 ft. wide; the side walls are about 35 ft. high. It has been shown that the transept is evidently the work of two periods, the wall up to a certain height having all the appearance of having suffered from fire, while that above shows no trace of such damage. There is ground for believing that in 870 the church was burnt by the Danes, and that it was extensively repaired between 1034 and 1050 (v. Rev. G. Atkinson, On the Restorations in Progress at Stow Church, in Reports and Papers of the Architectural Societies of Northants, York, and Lincoln, i. 315; and the same writer in v. 23 of the same publication, On Saxon Architecture), the existing chancel being added in the early part of the next century.

Another church, that of Brixworth, in Northamptonshire, has strong claims to be considered to date from the same period, for Leland tells us, on the authority of Hugo, a monk of Peterborough, that Lanulphus, abbot of Peterborough, about 690, founded a monastery there, and the existing edifice may be reasonably supposed to be the original church. The repairs which were finished in 1865 enabled the ground plan of the church to be correctly ascertained, and it will be seen to be somewhat peculiar, consisting of a square tower, the lower part of which forms a porch at the west end, with a chamber on each side opening into the porch and also into the aisles, a nave and two aisles with chambers at their east ends, a short chancel without aisles, and an apse surrounded by a corridor or crypt entered by steps from the chancel. The piers are oblong masses; the arches, which spring from square imposts, are of Roman bricks in two courses and wholly without ornament; over each pier is a rather small clerestory window with arched head, also turned in Roman bricks. Attached to the west side of the tower is a circular stair turret of different and less careful work, and therefore probably a later addition. The bases of piers which have been found show that at the west end of the chancel were probably three arches, through which it was entered from the nave.

Basilica, Brixworth.

Another church still exists in a state so far complete that there can be no doubt as to its original plan, but there is no historical evidence as to its date, and its architectural character is such as scarcely to warrant a decisive opinion. This is the church in the castle of Dover, which, in consequence of recent repairs, can be studied more satisfactorily than was previously the case. A short account of it was published by the Rev. John Puckle in 1864 from which the ground plan is taken; from this it will be seen that it is a cruciform church, with a tower between the nave and chancel.

Church at Dover.

The churches described are undoubtedly examples of "opus Romanum." Some others which have been destroyed were, doubtless, of like character, and as the contemporary or later descriptions contain points of interest, it will be well to cite them. The most remarkable is that of the church built by St. Wilfrid, at Hexham, about 673, written by his disciple Stephen Eddius (Vita S. Wilfridi, ap. Mabillon, AA. SS. O. S. Ben. saec. iv., pt. i. p. 646), running as follows: "eujus profunditatem in terra cum domibus mirifice politis lapideis fundatam, et super terram multiplicem domum columnis variis et porticibus multis suffultam, mirabilique longitudine et altitudine, murorum ornatam, et variis linearum anfractibus viarum, aliquando sursum, aliquando deorsum, per coelestem circumductam, non est meae parvitas hoc sermone explicare." Richard, the prior of Hexham, in the 12th century, describes it (Twyden's Scriptores Deem,

p. 260) as a nobilissimum opus, et in cryptis beneath, a

Unfortunately, in existence at the time it was burnt by the Danes, particularly as his testimony is not particularly as his rareness oratorical confirmed by the which will be found

If, however, the columns, some so it must have been now existing of probable that in Wilfrid, the prior architectural splendor

Of the church prelate, Eddius t polito lapide n summum edificium abis suffultam, AA. SS. Ben. saec.

About the same (A.D. 671) a monu doorway of the chur commented on, an with. c. 5) gives of his proceedings. Gaul, and brought f lapideis sibi eccles semper manebat, mo sent to the same co glaze the windows time he went to R tures of the Virgin "quibus meliam e ducto a pariete ad p imagines evangelic ecclesie parietem c Apostolus beati nlem aequo pariete from this passage th the north and sout ends of the transept, fore perhaps crucifor the founders of chr emulate the splen churches, we may Althelm (pp. 116, 1 built by Bugge, daug

"Praecepta Bugge construxit sup Qua fulgent arae bis Insuper apsidam con

Aura contortis flavesc Quae emul altaris sacra Arenas atque calces ge Ut coelum rutilant ste Sic lata argento const

Hic crucis ex auro fu Argentique simit gen

Hic quoque thuributu Pendit de summo tur De quibus ambrosiam Quando sacerdotis mit

The influence of the church architecture in to be inferred than p amples; carrying, as of asceticism even into

p. 290) as a noble building of hewn stone, with crypts beneath, and walls rising to a great height. Unfortunately, however, the church was not in existence at the time the prior wrote, having been burnt by the Danes, in 875, but his testimony is not to be altogether disregarded, particularly as his mention of crypts and subterranean oratories and winding passages is confirmed by the still existing crypt, a plan of which will be found under CHAPEL, p. 344.

If, however, the church had three stories and columns, some square, some of various forms, it must have been in advance of any building now existing of as early a date, and it seems probable that in his zeal for the glory of St. Willfrid, the prior somewhat exaggerated the architectural splendour of the building.

Of the church built at Ripon by the same prelate, Eddius says "in Hrypis basilicam polito lapide a fundamentis in terra usque ad summum aedificatam, variis columnis et portibus suffultam, in altum crevit" (Mabillon, AA. SS. Ben. saec. iv. pt. 2, p. 563).

About the same time Benedict Biscop built (A.D. 671) a monastery at Monkwearmouth, the doorway of the church of which has been already commented on, and Ede (Hist. Abbatum Wearmouth. c. 5) gives some very interesting notices of his proceedings. He went, we are told, into Gaul, and brought from thence "elementarios qui lapideam sibi ecclesiam juxta Romanorum, quem semper amabat, morem facerent," and afterwards sent to the same country for makers of glass to glaze the windows of his church. At a later time he went to Rome, and brought thence pictures of the Virgin Mary and the twelve apostles, "quibus medium ejusdem ecclesiae testudinem ducto a pariete ad parietem tabulato praecingeret, imagines evangelicae historiae quibus australeni ecclesiae parietem decoraret, imagines visionum Apocalypsis beati Johannis quibus septentrionalem aequae parietem ornaret." As it appears from this passage that there was a nave with aisles, the north and south walls were probably the ends of the transept, and the church was therefore perhaps cruciform. That in the 7th century the founders of churches in England strove to emulate the splendour of the Continental churches, we may learn from the verses of Althelm (pp. 116, 117, ed. Giles) on the church built by Bugge, daughter of Kentwin:—

"Praecelsa mole sacellum Bugge construxit supplex vernacula Christi, Qua fulgent arae bis seno nomine sacrae, Insuper apsidam consecrat Virginis aram.

Aurea contortis flavescunt pallia flis, Quae sunt altaris sacri velamina pulcra, Aureus atque calyx gemmis fulvis cepit operatus.
Ut caelum rutilat stellis ardentibus aptum, Sic lata argento constat fabricata patena, Hic crucis ex auro fulgescit lamina fulvo, Argentique simul gemmis ornata metalla; Hic quoque turbatum capitulis undique cinctam Pendit de summo fumosa toramena pandens, De quibus ambrosianis spirabant thura Sabaea, Quando sacerdotes missas offerre jubentur."

The influence of the Irish missionaries upon church architecture in England is perhaps rather to be inferred than proved from existing examples; carrying, as they did, their principles of asceticism even into their churches their rude and humble chapels offered no models which could compete with those supplied by the architects brought from Gaul or Italy who built in the manner of the Romans; but when we call to mind how large an extent of country they occupied, and more or less Christianized, and in what great veneration they were held, it is difficult to believe that the peculiarities of their ecclesiastical architecture were wholly without influence upon that of England. But for the eventual triumph of the Roman system over theirs, more tangible proofs of this would no doubt have existed, but it is possible that the preference of a square over an apsidal termination, which is so strongly shown in English churches from the 12th century downwards, is really due to the habit of imitating the forms of the oratories which St. Cuthbert, St. Aidan, or their disciples, may have constructed. That the influence of the Irish school upon ornamentation was very great, there can be no doubt, as it is amply proved by existing manuscripts, as the Gospels of Lindisfarne, written about A.D. 710. That these patterns of interlacing ribbons and animals were copied in stone may be observed in the doorway of Monkwearmouth, and on many crosses and other monuments of the period.

Church Tower, at Eborac

No existing example shows what a large church would have been if constructed without Roman influence, but the little oratories of Cornwall and that at Ebb's Nook, in Northumberland (p. CHAPEL), will serve to show what was the character of their lesser religious buildings.

The third influence, that of an existing school of timber architecture, made itself felt more in the smaller class of churches than in the larger, and though very many portions of churches which exhibit marks of it exist, no entire church of any early date which manifests it has remained. The chief peculiarity is the use of narrow stones placed upright, dividing the wall into sections, exactly in the same manner as timber quartering. No better example of this can be found than the tower of the church of Earls Barton, in Northamptonshire; but it is difficult to find any safe ground for assigning a date to this building, as it is certain that the style was continued into the 11th century. Another peculiarity is the use of the baluster as a shaft, and it has been supposed that this was copied from some Roman example; but the facts that these balusters were turned in a lathe, that they were in use at a very early date, and in every part of England, all seem to point to their having originated in an indigenous style of wooden architecture.

Many churches were constructed entirely of wood. Bede (Hist. Eccl. iii. 25) tells us that Finian, who came from Iona, built at Landisfarne a church "episcopali sede congruam, quam tamen more Scottorum non de lapide sed de robore seteo totam composuit atque harundine textit;" and according to an Irish writer of the 11th century, Conchubenn (Vit. S. Moluennae, A. I. SS. Holl. 6, Jul. 11), the Scots were accustomed to build with boards "tabulis delolatis," or, as we may perhaps understand the passage, with timbers not left in the round, but smoothed with the adze. In this way, though no doubt at a much later date, the church at Greenstead, in Essex, was constructed, the slabs of oak left after a plank had been sawn out of the middle having been smoothed on the inside with the adze, and placed upright with the curved portion outwards, side by side, so as to form a wall. Very many such structures, no doubt, were erected in districts where wood was plentiful and stone scarce. [A. N.]

CHURCH-BOOKS (Libri Ecclesiastici). Under this name the following classes of books are understood to be included:—

1. Such works as were necessary for the performance of the sacred offices, whether of the altar, the baptistery, or the choir [LITURGICAL BOOKS].

2. Certain pastoral letters of venerable bishops, canons of councils, and acts of martyrs, which were occasionally read in public. For instance, we have the testimony of Dionysius of Corinth in Eusebius (H. E. iv. 23, § 11) that the epistle of Clement to the Corinthians was preserved and publicly read in the Corinthian Church [CANONICAL BOOKS]. The so-called Canons and Constitutions of the Apostles were probably regarded as libri ecclesiastici in many churches. On the use of acts of martyrs, see Kuinart, Acta Sincera, pref. § 5.

3. Not infrequently in ancient times the term church-books included all books contained in the library of a church [LIBRARY].

4. In some cases the church-registers, whether of the baptized or of the dead [DIFFICILES], seem to be included under the term libri ecclesiastici. [C.]

CHURCHES, MAINTENANCE OF (Fabrica Ecclesie). The funds for the maintenance of the fabric of a church are, and have been from ancient times, derived from two sources,—estates appropriated to that purpose and voluntary offerings. As early as the 6th century we find ordinances, that a definite proportion of the general income of a church should be set apart for the maintenance and repair of the fabric. According to decrees of Pope Simplicius, A.D. 475 (Ep. lii. in Binus, Concilia, iii. 582), and Pope Gelasius, A.D. 494 (Ep. iv. Binus, iii. 636), this proportion was to be a fourth part; while in Spain a third part was to be appropriated to this purpose. See the Council of Tarragona (A.D. 516), c. 8; the second of Braga (A.D. 572), c. 2; of Merida (A.D. 606), cc. 14, 16; the sixth of Toledo (A.D. 693), c. 5. In the Frankish kingdom the repair of the fabric was provided for by setting aside for that purpose a certain part of the endowment of the church; a provision the more necessary, as the voluntary contributions diminished in proportion as the endowments increased. And as estates of the church often fell into the hands of laics, a Diet of the Empire held at Frankfurt in 794 laid down the principle, that the maintenance of the fabric of the church was a charge upon church-lands, in whatever hands they were (Pertz, Monumenta Germ. iii. 74). A similar provision was made by some of the ecclesiastical councils held in the year 813 by command of Charlemagne; as in that of Metz (c. 42), the fourth of Arles (c. 25), and the third of Tours (c. 46). At a somewhat later date, the obligation of forced labour for the benefit of the fabric was laid upon the tenants of the church. (Herzog, Real-Encycl. i. 737). There are special treatises on this subject by Helfert (Von der Erbauung, Erhaltung und Herstellung der kirchlichen Gebäude, 2nd ed. 1834), by Von Reinhardt (Ueber kirchliche Baulast, Stuttgart, 1836), and by Permaneder (die kirchliche Baulast, Muenchen, 1838). [C.]

CHURCH SCHOOLS. [SCHOOLS.]

CHURCH (SYMBOLS OF). Early representations of the Church of Christ are very numerous, and may be divided into (A) personifications and (B) symbolisms; both of the highest antiquity. Those derived from Holy Scripture may be taken first.

(A) 1. The Lord's comparison of Himself to the Good Shepherd, constantly represented in the Catacombs, and supposed to be the most ancient of purely Christian emblems in painting or sculpture, has frequently united with it pictures of two or more sheep at His feet, besides the one carried on His shoulders. The word "fold" represents the Church, exactly as the word "church" the congregation of Christ's people. [LAMB, GOOD SHEPHERD, &c.] The fresco in the Calixtine catacomb (Bottari, tav. lxxviii., and Aringhi, vol. i. lib. iii. ch. xxii. p. 327, ed. Par. 1657), of the Shepherd sitting under trees, and surrounded by sheep, or sheep and goats, as here, may be taken as one example out of many. See also that at tav. xxvi. In another (Bott. vol. ii.

tav. cxviii.) building, see the Shepherds. The sheep of the Churches at Ciampini (from the Sicily) and Bathlee (See BETHLEHEM, Martigny, i. 107) are the windmill. JORDANES, de reb. Goth. i. 10, which the S. Dict. s. v. "Lamb."

In a mosaic of Sabun's, Rome, by two fountains, open book in c. xxii. p. 327. EX CHURCUM; her; the other TIBUS, and (See Gal. ii. 2) compartment of Verona, traces of Lombard meaning. by two women two children Martigny give in P. Garrucci's two hands Louis baldizes the C. Lamb bearing gram of Christ palm-branches lambs, may be St. Peter and Church into represented in (vol. ii. Tav. destroyed by t been broken in tantly happen the Orantes, c Catacombs, are of the Church. Ornate with do in the corners known crypt comb (De Ros alternates with cently discover Bossi, IXOTC, ing the euchar consecrating pri 2. A few re range, of Susar the Church an Pagan. Marti only certain Italian art. Fe Petra, p. l. Of Vation, the oth found in Bottari from St. Callixt, more numerous lari. 8; lxxviii.

* These subjects ancient mosaics of Paler's Photograp symbol of the repose of individual Christians in death.

An even more interesting symbolism is where not only the ship is painted as analogous to the Church, but the actual fabric of a church is made like a ship. This was the case with many of the early Romanesque churches, where the apse which completed the basilica had the bishop's throne placed in the centre, as the steersman's once, with semicircular benches below for the

The ship placed on the back of a fish is found in a signet illustrated by Alcandre (Nav. Ecclæs. referent. Syn., Romæ, 1626; see also s. v. FISH). Another such gem is in Ficoroni's collection (Gorn. Ant. Litt. tab. xi. 8, p. 105). A Jasper given by Cardinal Borghia (De C. u. e. Volite. n. p. 213 and frontispiece) places the Lord in a galley of six oars on a side, holding the large steering oar. This rudder-ear—or rather two of them—are inserted in the rudest ship-carvings, where other oars are omitted.

The column surmounted by a dove is mentioned by M. Leblant in his Inscriptions Chrétiennes de la Gaule, vol. i. p. 167, as existing on a lamp said to have been found at St. Just. Another had on it the monogram of Christ on a column. Reference is made to Bosio, p. 167, for a column between two doves turning to look at it; but is inclined, see p. 167, to regard it as a symbol of Christ Himself rather than of the Church. [R. St. J. T.]

CHURCHING OF WOMEN; or, THANKSGIVING OF WOMEN AFTER CHILDBIRTH. (Mulierum post Partum Purificatio; sometimes called Inthronisatio post partum: see Herzog's Real-Encycl. xix. 671.)

The Mosaic law lays down (Lev. xii.) precepts for the offerings and purification of women after childbirth; and these legal precepts were observed by the Mother of the Lord herself. Possibly in Jewish-Christian communities this observance passed over, like some other ceremonies, with little change into the Christian congregation; but of this nothing certain is known. There is no mention of any purificatory ceremony after childbirth in the works of Clement of Alexandria, in the Apostolical Constitutions, or in the works of the Pseudo-Dionysius the Areopagite. The notion, however, that childbirth occasioned some kind of defilement continued to prevail among the Christians of the East, hence the rituals of the Oriental Churches in relation to this matter refer more to purification from defilement than to thanksgiving for safety. Dionysius of Alexandria (cannon 2; in Beveridge's Pandectæ, ii. 4) lays it down as a matter admitting of no question, that a woman ought not to be present in church, nor to receive the Holy Communion, within forty days after having given birth to a child. To the same effect, the ninth of the Arabic canons of Nicaen enjoins: "Women ought to abstain from entering the church and from partaking of Holy Communion for forty days after a birth; after which, let the woman carefully wash her garments and bathe her person and the child; then let her, together with her husband, present him in the church at the steps of the altar; whom, with their accompanying friends, let the priest receive, and say for her the prayer of purification and bless the child according to the prescribed ceremonies of the Church." The forty days' period, then, was clearly regarded as the necessary extent of the woman's purification. Meantime, however, she was not wholly neglected by the Church. Immediately after the birth, a prayer was said over mother and child, and the child signed with the cross. This rite is thought to be alluded to by Chrysostom (on 1 Cor., Hom. 12, p. 108, ed. Montfaucou). The office which accompanies it is believed by Goar to be of modern origin. On the eighth day the midwife, or some other matron, brings the child to the church. Before the door the priest again signs it with the cross, and carries it into the church, when the name is given which it is to bear after baptism. Such a ceremony took place, though not in a church, at the birth of the emperor Theodosius II. (A. D. 401), related in the following manner in the life of Porphyrius of Gaza, a contemporary witness: "When seven days were accomplished from the birth of the child, the empress Eudoxia approached and met us at the door of the chamber, bearing the infant wrapped in purple. She bowed her head, and said, 'Bless me, O fathers, and the child which the Lord hath granted me through your holy prayers;' and gave the infant into their arms, that they might sign it with the cross. Then the holy bishops signed both her and the infant, and after praying sat down." (Acta Sanctorum, Feb. iii. 653). If the child was in danger of death before the stated period for baptism, it was at once baptized, but the unclean mother was no longer allowed to suckle it, or even to enter the room where it was (Mansi, Supplement. Conc. i. 815). If the mother died within the period of uncleanness, her body was taken into the church, and the prayers of purification said over it; after which it was regarded as clean

(Canon. Nicæna Concilia, l. 51.)

On the fortieth day the child went solemnly to church-door—the mother with several prayers; the sign of the altar; the priest and the people Church, on the brow of the Eucharist.

In the Latin Church the same feeling regard to the Eucharist. Even St. Augustine, in his law of the forty days, new dispensation (quest. 64). The same opinion brought Orientals in Tarsus. He had an and St. Augustine's penance for a forty days, a Caesbury, who to Pope Gregory who answered of mind, that on Christians, church to give on which she signed not, although at home for when it was observed. Ep. xi. 64; p. 1. Elected subsequent canons of council of the Maronites (1217) rejected of repelling women forty days after

2. It will be giving followed the fruit of a new of a new who signed in his congregation and they were of which included the woman. Her name was soon as may be the exception, 64, quoted by B. To the same effect councils.

3. The service women was prof the dispensation of this purpose are varies. Martene gives only two probably the 14th of ancient benedictions, we might the benediction of these are rare. 189 ff.) gives a Church, that contained a Latin formula being resemblance passage in Buskin's of ancient churches Venice, and an

is) of a long passions (ii. 57) to ing likened to the en, the faithful to strangely, to the Arabic canons of to abstain from partaking of Holy after a birth; after lly wash her gar-nd the child; then usband, present him the altar; whom, ends, let the priest ayer of purification g to the prescribed

The forty days rded as the necessary purification. Menshfully neglected by after the birth, a and child, and the
This rite is thought ostom (on 1 Cor., aucon). The office eved by Goar to be tighth day the mid-e, brings the child to er the priest again carries it into the given which it is to ceremony took place, at the birth of the 401), related in the fe of Porphyrius of ness: "When seruo on the birth of the approached and met er, bearing the infant owed her head, and nd the child which through your holy fant into their arms, th the cross. Then her and the infant, n." (Acta Sanctorum, child was in danger
eriod for baptism, it the unclean mother suckle it, or even to as Mansi, Supplement. ther died within the body was taken into s of purification said as regarded as clean

CHURCHING OF WOMEN

(Canon. Nicæno-Arab. c. 10; in Hardouin's Concilii, I. 512).

On the fortieth day after the birth, the mother nd the child, accompanied by the godfather, went solemnly to the church. Before the church-door the priest received them, signed the mother with the cross, and said over her several prayers. He then took the child, made the sign of the cross with it, and carried it up to the altar; the godfather then received it from the priest and left the church. In the Ethiopic Church, mother and child are anointed on the brow with holy oil, and receive the Eucharist.

In the Latin Church, also, we find traces of the same feeling that exist in the East with regard to the purification after childbirth.
Eren St. Augustine lays down that the Levitical law of the forty days was still binding under the new dispensation (Quæst. in Levit. lib. iii. quæst. 64). That Theodore of Canterbury held the same opinion is not to be wondered at, as he brought Oriental opinions from his early home in Tarsus. He (Penitential, I. xiv. 18, in Had-dan and Stubbs' Documents, iii. 189) prescribes penance for a woman entering a church within forty days after childbirth. Augustinae of Canterbury, however, had previously appealed to Pope Gregory I. for his opinion on this point, who answered, with characteristic largeness of mind, that the Mosaic law was not binding on Christians, and that if a woman went to church to give thanks to God on the very day on which she had given birth to a child, she sinned not, although the old custom of keeping at home for forty days was not to be blamed, when it was observed in a right spirit (Gregoril Ep. xi. 64; p. 1158). Gregory's decision influenced subsequent capitularies of the Franks and canons of councils in the West. Even a council of the Maronites (Mansi, Supplement. Conc. vi.
127) rejecting the "simplicity or superstition" of repelling women from church for the space of forty days after the birth of a child.

2. It will readily be supposed that no thanksgiving followed the birth of a child which was the fruit of adultery or fornication. As women who sinned in such sort were excluded from the congregation until due penance had been done, they were of course excluded from a service which included thanksgiving for the fruit of the womb. Henry of Tours (†871), enjoining women to return thanks in church as soon as may be after a birth, expressly makes the exception, "nisi forte sit adultera" (canon 69, quoted by Binterim, Denkwürd. vi. 2, 196).
To the same effect are some decrees of later councils.

3. The service to be used in the churching of women was probably in ancient times left to the discretion of the priest, for no formularies for this purpose are found in the ancient sacramentaries. Martene (De Ritibus Eccl. ii. 136, 137) gives only two forms, from Gallican codices of probably the 14th century. If a larger number of ancient benedictionals had descended to our times, we might possibly have found forms for the benediction of women after childbirth; but these are rare. Binterim (Denkwürd. vi. 2, 180 ff.) gives a churching-service of the Ethiopic Church, that contained in the Greek Euchology on, and a Latin formula. The latter is from a MS.

CHURCHYARD of the 14th century, and none probably are, in their present form, very ancient. [C.]

CHURCHWARDENS. These officers would seem to be the representatives in the later Church of the seniores ecclesiastici, of whom frequent mention is made by St. Augustine and Optatus.
We gather from these writers that the seniores ecclesiæ were a sort of elders who were not of the clergy, but yet had some concern in the care of the Church. Thus, St. Augustine inscribes one of his epistles to his own church of Hippo, "Clero, senioribus et universæ plebi." Some of these seniores were the chief men or magistrates of the place, such as we still call aldermen; who also formed a sort of lay council of the bishops, giving advice and assistance in many weighty matters of the Church. But there were others known more properly as seniores ecclesiastici, who were entrusted with the utensils, treasure, and outward affairs of the Church, but had no concern in its government or discipline; and these may be regarded as the predecessors of our churchwardens. The lay elders, so called, of modern times are ranked above the deacons in their own communities, and cannot therefore be identified with the seniores ecclesiastici of the ancient Church, who, not being reckoned of the clergy, were ecclesiastically inferior to the order of deacons (Bingham, ii. 18). [D. B.]

CHURCHYARD. The subject of places set apart for Christian burial has already been considered under AREA, CATACOMB, and CEMETERY.
The present article relates simply to burial in the precincts of churches.

The laws of the empire against burying in cities of course prevented the use of churchyards within the walls for the purpose of interment so long as those laws continued in force. The first attempts to bury in or near churches seem to have occurred in the case of those churches or memorial cells which were built over the remains of apostles or martyrs; for both Theodosius (Coder, lib. ix. tit. 17; De Sepulc. Yul. leg. 6) and Justinian (Coder, lib. i. tit. 2; De Eccl. leg. 2) expressly provide against such churches being made exceptions to the general law. When the church had kings for nursing-fathers, the privilege of being buried within the precincts was sometimes extended to Christian emperors. Thus Constantine desired (Euseb. Vita Const. iv. 71) to be buried near the apostles whom he had enshrined, and his son Constantius carried out his wish by causing him to be buried in the ATRIUM of the church; a fact to which Chrysostom invokes than once alludes (On 2 Cor., Hom. 26, p. 929, ed. Paris, 1616; Quod Christus sit Deus, c. 8, p.
839). Theodosius the elder, Arcadius, and Theodostus the younger, are said by a late historian (Nicephorus, II. E. xiv. 58) to have been similarly buried. The council of Braga of the year 563 (can. 18) allows corpses to be buried, if need be, around the church (deforis circa murum basilicæ), but utterly forbids any to be buried within, alleging the respect due to the relics of saints.

Archbishop Theodore of Canterbury laid down (Penitential, II. i. 5 and 6, in Haddan and Stubbs' Councils, iii. 190) the following rule: In a church in which bodies of unbelievers are buried it is not lawful to consecrate an altar; but if the church itself is of good material, let it be pulled down and rebuilt after the logs of which it is composed have been planed or washed. If the altar has been previously consecrated, mass may be said upon it if 'religious' persons are buried there; but if a pagan be buried there, it is better that the altar should be purified and taken out of the building. It is clear from this passage that burials frequently took place in the rude wooden churches of the 7th century in England, and that only the bodies of pagans were held absolutely to desecrate the place, though the practice of burying in churches does not seem to be looked upon with favour. The council of Nantes, held probably towards the end of the 7th century, in the 6th canon, permits burials in the atrium or fore-court, in the cloister, and in the outbuildings (exœtra) of a church, but utterly forbids them in the church itself and near the altar, where the Body and Blood of the Lord are. The same precept is repeated in the canons of later councils, as in the 52nd of that at Mentz in 813, which however expressly excepts bishops, abbots, worthy presbyters, and faithful laymen. Similar to this is the injunction of Theodulf of Orleans (Capitul. ad Iresbyt. ix.). The council of Tribur (A.D. 895), repeating the prohibition with regard to laymen (can. 17), implies that the prohibited burials had already taken place, by the provision that bodies buried in churches in times past were not to be exhumed; and in case the multitude of tombs was such that the ground could not conveniently be levelled, it provides, in almost the same terms as Theodulf, that the altar should be removed, and the church made a mere cemetery-chapel or catacomb.

In the East, the Emperor Leo VI., about the year 900, abrogated (Novell. 53) all the old laws against burying in cities, and left men at liberty to bury either within or without the walls; a permission which no doubt gave occasion to burying in the precincts of city churches.

We conclude, then, that burying in the precincts of churches was practised, in the case of very distinguished persons, from the 4th century; more generally, from the 7th century; but that the increasing practice of burying in churches was constantly resisted by ecclesiastical authorities during the whole period with which we are concerned, and was held to be almost a desecration.

Monastic bodies had from very ancient times burying-grounds of their own, that they who had consorted together in their lives might rest together in death (Isidore of Seville, Regula, c. 23); these were however originally outside the precincts of the monastery, as we see from the instances of Pachomius, Benedict, and many others. Bede, in the Life of St. Cuthbert, speaks of a dead monk being carried to his burial in a cart, which would not have been necessary if the interment had taken place within the monastery. It appears that in many places a chapel or oratory was built on the spot chosen for the interment of the brethren. For instance, Abbot Bertinus (A.D. 660) enclosed a graveyard for his monastery on a neighbouring hill, and built in the midst of it a church dedicated to St. Mary (Acta SS. Bened. sæc. iii. pt. 1, p. 110). Afterwards, graveyards were formed within the convent walls, but not within the cloister, and were provided with a separate church. Of this kind as believed to have been the cemetery formed by Elgil at Fulda, the church of which was dedicated in the year 822 (Life of Elgil by Candidus, c. 20, in Acta SS. Bened. sæc. iv. pt. 1, p. 278). Benedict of Aniane also caused an oratory to be constructed in the cemetery of his monastery (Life, c. 39, in Acta SS. Bened. sæc. iv. pt. 1). The ancient plan of St. Gall shows only a cross in the midst of the graveyard within the convent walls. And in process of time burials took place in the cloister itself. Abbot Walfrid, when dying (A.D. 765), desired to be buried in the midst of the cloister (Life, c. 8, Acta SS. Bened. sæc. li. pt. 2); and it appears that other monks of that rule were buried in the cloister (u. s. c. 14). Later instances are frequent. Monks of distinguished sanctity were occasionally buried in the church itself, as St. Volou of Soissons in the 8th century (Acta SS. Bened. iv. 2, p. 530). Except in the case of very saintly persons, burial was not permitted within the first eight centuries in monastic more than in secular churches. (Bingham's Antiquities, bk. xxiii. c. 1; Martene, De litibus Eccl. Ant. lib. iii. c. 7, §§ 10-14; De Rit. Monach. lib. v. c. 10, §§ 100-104; Binterim, Denkwürdigkeiten, vi. 3, 443 ff.) [C.]

CIBORIUM. [ALTAR: DOVE, EUCHARISTIC.]

CHLICIA (COUNCIL OF), A.D. 424, at which Theodorus of Mopsuestia, a town in this province, who was still alive, was condemned for his errors (Mansi, iv. 473-4). [E. S. F.]

CINGULUM. (Ζώνη, Zoon, Balteus, Funic.) The girdle, in ancient times, was generally associated with the idea of active exertion, inasmuch as it served to confine and to gird up the long flowing garments which, when unconfined, interfered with all activity. But as a richly-ornamented girdle commonly formed a part of the robes of state worn by Eastern monarchs, we find the girdle occasionally alluded to as a symbol of royal dignity. So Patriarch Germanus of Constantinople, c. 715 A.D., Myst. Theor. p. 206, speaks of the girdle, then worn as part of a priest's dress, as signifying the beauty whereby Christ entering upon His kingdom did gird Himself withal, even the beauteous majesty of Godhead. See Vestiarium Christianum, pp. 84, 85. Lastly, through yet other associations, which will be obvious to all students of antiquity, the girdle connected itself with the idea of chastity; and it is in this connexion that it is commonly referred to by the later ecclesiastical writers. See, for example, St. Jerome on Ezek. xlv. ; Celestine, bishop of Rome, 432, apud Lubbe, Concilia, ii. 1618 ("in lumborum præcinctione castitas . . . indicatur"); Rabanus Maurus, de Instit. Cleric. lib. i. c. 17; Pseudo-Alcuin, de Div. Off. (Vest. Christ. p. 111); Ivo Carnotensis (ib. p. 121). Both in East and West it formed part of the monastic dress from the earliest times. Among Western writers see the Life of Fulgentius, bishop of Ruspa, by Ferrandus Diaconus ("pelliceo cingulo tanquam monachus utebatur"); Salvianus, ad Eccl. Cathol. lib. iv. (addressing a monk of unworthy character—"Licet religionem vestibus similes, licet filium cingulo aderas, licet sanctitatem pallio mentiris," &c.); Joannis Cassiani, de Coenob. Instit. lib. i. c. 11, apud Migne, Patrol. xlix. 60; the Regula of St. Benedict, Magal. lxxi. 490 ("restiti dormiant, et cincti cingulis aut funibus") Hildemar, in c.), explains t and 'funis.' lino in rotund dignus est de dent funis.

Eastern usage
Regulam SS.
Lausiana, cap.
St. Germanus above referres habit that it whose raimen were a leather bishop of Ro of Vienna an dading about wearing of a g (probably in was first int those to wh lian and wear so seeking to in the spirit h et lumbos p nem per spirit
See Labbé, C

CIRBA, C

CIR

CIRCHMOC
to the Domiti 4th century;
house to house 32). They we settling chiefly Gaulian desec tain, provinces Christianised no law. Accordin
rious for their Catholics (Aug.
c. Parmen. i. 1 Epp. 88, 105, 1 (Aug. Epp. 15, bulence their o invoked the aid defends Macari of having been reproves the e the death of Ur 22, 25). At th
A.D. the imperia those districts were not kept.
At Bagai they fo
Roman cavalry
"avengers" or styled themselves de Schism. Don opposition to th party, was terrifi rout of a lion (A of swords, whic gious scruple 32), they brand called "Israelis" the Syrian "ass
"Old Man of the Crusades, the "C wantonly insult of which was dell-Egip by Caudilus,

 c. iv. pt. 1, p. 238), ed an oratory to y of his monastery
 ed. saec. iv. pt. 1), shows only a cross within the convent me burials took place Walfrid, when dying in SS. Ben, saec. iii. other monks of that oister (a. s. c. 14), nt. Monks of discus-sionally buried in el of Soissons in the iv. 2, p. 550). Ex-tantly persons, burial the first eight cenin secular churches, xviii. c. 1; Marteau, iii. c. 7, §§ 10-14; 0, §§ 100-104; Hin-3, 443 ff.) [C.]

DOVE, EUCHARISTIC.] AD. 423, at which own in this province, demned for his errors
 [E. S. F.]

Hildegar, in the 9th century (opud Migne, tom. e.), explains the distinction between 'cingulum' and 'funicus'. "Funicus est qui de cannaba fit vel lino in rotundum; cingulum (sic) autem eorrigia est de lana vel lino, sed non in rotundum sicut funis, sed in latum sicut tricia." For Eastern usage see St. Jerome, Procat. in Populum S. Pachomii, opp. ii. 49; Palladius, Lusitana, cap. 38 (Migne, lxxiii. 1157) and St. Germanus of Constantinople, in a passage above referred to. He there says of the monastic habit that it was like that of John the Baptist, whose raiment was of camel's hair, and who wore a leathern girdle about his loins. Celestine, bishop of Rome, in his letter to the bishops of Vienna and Narbonne, already referred to, dating about 430 A.D., marks the time when the wearing of a girdle as part of the episcopal dress (probably in imitation of the monastic habit) was first introduced into Gaul. He reproves those to whom he writes for dressing in a pallium and wearing a girdle about the loins, and so seeking to observe the truth of Scripture not in the spirit but in the letter. "Amneti pallio, et tumbos spircincti, credunt se Scripturæ fidem non per spiritum, sed per litteram completuros." See Labbé, Concilia, ii. 1618; Fest. Christ., p. 45. [W. B. M.]

CIRBA, COUNCILS OF. [AFRICAN COUNCILS.]

CIRCUMCELLIONES. (1) A name given to the Donatist fanatics in Africa during the 4th century, from their habit of roving from house to house, plundering (Aug. c. Gaudent. i. 3). They went about in predatory gangs, consisting chiefly of rustics, on the borders of the Getulian desert, ravaging Numidia and Mauritania, provinces at that time neither thoroughly Christianised nor thoroughly subjected to Roman law. According to Augustine they were notorious for their lawless violence against the Catholics (Aug. c. Gaudent. i. 28, 32; Haer. 69; c. Parment. i. 11; c. Crescon. iii. 42, 46, 47; Epp. 88, 105, 185), as well as against property (Aug. Epp. 15, 85, 185). To restrain their turbulence their own bishops were constrained to invoke the aid of the Roman counts. Augustine defends Mucarius and Taurinus from the charge of having been unduly severe against them, and reproves the exultation of these fanatics over the death of Ursacius (Aug. c. Litt. Petilian. cc. 22, 25). At the Conference of Carthage in 411 A.D. the imperial commissioner decreed a fine on those districts wherein the "circumcelliones" were not kept in order (Coleti Conc. t. iii.). At Bagai they fought, but unsuccessfully, against Roman cavalry. The war-shout of these "avengers" or "champions of God," as they styled themselves (ἀγωναρχοί), Optat. Milevit. de Schisma. Donat. iii. 4), "Deo Laudes," in opposition to the "Deo Gratias" of the other party, was terrible to all peaceful people as the roar of a lion (Aug. in Ps. cxxxvii. v. 6). Instead of words, which for some time they felt a religious scruple against using (cf. St. Matt. xxvi. 52), they brandished clubs at first, which they called "Spiritus" (Aug. in Ps. x. v. 5). Like the "Israelite" assassins, the followers of the "Old Man of the Mountain" in the time of the Crusades, the "Circumcelliones" courted death, wantonly insulting the Pagans at their festivals (Aug. c. Gaudent. i. 32, 49; Epp. 12, 16, 185); and, in their frantic eagerness for martyrdom, challenging all whom they met on their way to kill them (Aug. c. Crescon. iii. 46, 49; c. Litt. Petil. ii. 114; De Unit. Eccl. 50; Theodoret. Haer. iv. 6). Among the titles which they assumed was that of "Agnostici," to indicate their contempt for learning (Aug. in Ps. cxxxvii. v. 6). Though pledged by profession to celibacy, they were guilty of frequent outrages on women, if their opponents may be believed (Aug. c. Litt. Petil. i. 16, ii. 195; De Unit. Eccl. 50). For these and similar offences, as well as on the charge of aiding the Vandals, they were ordered by Honorius, 412 A.D., to be fined (Hefele in Kirchengesch., iii. 261). Gibbon compares these "circumcelliones" to the "camisards" of Languedoc in the commencement of the 18th century (Poetice and Fall, ii. 445, Bohn, 1855).

Circumcelliones (2) were vagabond monks, censured by Cassian, under the name of Sarabaitae, for roving from place to place (Coll. xviii. 7). Probably the name was transferred to them from the Donatist fanatics. St. Augustine rebuts this comparison as unmerited, at least within his experience (in Ps. cxxxvii. v. 6). But elsewhere (De Oper. Monach. 28) he inveighs with characteristic warmth against the idle, vagrant monks, "nusquam missos, nusquam fixos, nusquam stantes, nusquam sedentes," &c., who scoured the country for alms, vending fictitious relics. Benedictus Anianensis quotes Isidorus de Offic. Eccl. (ii. 15) against these "circumcelliones" or "circuilliones" as spurious Anchorites (Concord. Reg. c. 3, cf. Menard, ad loc.). These vagabond monks were condemned as unstable and scandalous (Conc. Tolat. vii. c. 5); and as mock-hermits (κεκκαδοὶ ψευδοερημίται) in the Synodical Epistol. Orientalis addressed to the Emp. Theophilus (Suicer, Thesaur. sub voce). They are denounced also by Nisus (Epp. iii. 19); and are probably the "gyrovagi" censured in the Regula St. Benedicti (c. 1). The name occurs so late as in Monachus Sangallensis, who relates how a monk, one of the "circumcelliones," "ignarus discipline imperatoris," intruded into the choir in the presence of Carl (De Gest. Carol. M. i. 8, v. Canisii Antiqu. Lectiones). [I. G. S.]

CIRCUMCISION. As a Jewish rite, or as connected with the controversies of the Apostolic age, this ordinance does not come within the limits of this work. It claims a place, however, even in a Dictionary of Christian Antiquities, as having been adopted from a remote period in the Church of Abyssinia, and as still in use there. In this, as in many other practices, the influence of a large Jewish population has made that community the representative of a type of Judæo-Christianity which must have been common in the first two centuries, but which has since been lost. It has to be noted that circumcision is practised there (and the present usage rests upon an immemorial tradition) before baptism, between the third and the eighth day after birth, and that an analogous operation is applied to female children. Stanley, Eastern Church, p. 12. [E. H. P.]

CIRCUMCISION, FESTIVAL OF
 1. Origin of Festival.—From the necessary connection of the event commemorated on this day with the Nativity, we must obviously not look for notices of its celebration at a date earlier than that at which we first meet with those of the Nativity itself.

It will follow from the prescribed interval between the birth of a child and its circumcision that the festival of the Circumcision will fall on the octave of the Nativity; and consequently we continually find January 1 thus marked, even where the service contains references to the day as the anniversary of the Circumcision. It is not until later that we find the day to have acquired sufficient independent rank to bear the title of the Circumcision rather than of the octave as its special distinguishing mark.

It is hard to say when the earliest traces of an observance of the day under either designation are to be found. There is extant a long homily by Zeno, bishop of Verona in the 4th century, which would appear to have been meant for delivery on this day; but, on the other hand, it is not mentioned in the Kalendarium Carthaginiense, or in that of Bueherius, both probably documents of the 4th century. Now it has been shown elsewhere [CHRISTMAS] that the first certain allusions to an observance of Christmas as a distinct and independent festival occur towards the end of the 4th century, and that this observance of it was later in the East than in the West. This agrees with what is said above, and with the instances we shall further quote, which tend to disprove the existence of any save perhaps a more or less local recognition of the festival before the end of the 4th century. Here, as in the case of the parent festival of the Nativity, our earliest illustrations come from the West.

Thus we find the day noticed in the Gelasian Sacramentary, the Gregorian Sacramentary and Antiphony, the Gallican Sacramentary and Lectionary, in the Calendar of Fronto, the Mozarabic Liturgy and Breviary, and the Martyrologium Hieronymi.

Passing on to the Eastern Church, we find that in the calendar of the Coptic Church given by Selden (de Synedrâs Ebræorum, lib. iii. c. 15), the Circumcision is reckoned among the minor festivals, and that the Apostolic Constitutions, a work doubtless of Oriental origin, ignores it altogether.

In process of time the day became more and more recognized, and at last the observance became universal.

A reason for the Church's apparent slowness in recognizing and commemorating so important an incident in our Lord's earthly life, at which He received the name Jesus—an event, one would suppose, itself of more than ordinary interest—is doubtless to be found in the fact that on the Kalends of January was held a great heathen festival, characterized by an excessive amount of riot and licentiousness. The Christians, anxious to avoid an apparent toleration of these abominations by holding a festival of their own, even though of a totally different character, on the same day, enjoined a solemn fast, as a wholesome protest and as a means of guarding the unwary from being led astray. See Augustine, Sermon, 197, 198 (Patrol. xxxviii. 1024 sqq.).

There is also an allusion to this in a canon of the 2nd Council of Tours, A.D. 567 (Conc. Turonense II. can. 17; Labbé, v. 857). Further we find in the Martyrologium Romanum (January 1), that a certain Almachius suffered martyrdom for saying, "Hodie octavae Domini dei sunt, cessate a superstitiosis Idolorum et a sacrificiis pollutis." If, as is asserted, this Almachius be the same with the Telemachus mentioned by Theodoret (Hist. Eccl. v. 26), this event must be referred to the time of Honorius, and will point to a certain recognition of the day by the Roman Church at the end of the 4th century. To the subject of this fast we shall briefly refer again.

We shall now proceed to discuss the observance of the day more in detail.

II. Liturgical Notices.—It is impossible to determine the character of the evidence borne as to this day by the Leonine Sacramentary, for it is mutilated at the beginning, and commences with the month of April. The last section in it, however, is "In jejuniis mensis decimi," for which five Masses are given, thus furnishing evidence for the observance of the time, though none for the name by which the day was known (ii. 156, ed. Ballerini). It may be added, however, that with this exception there is no allusion to the day in the writings of Leo I., although he has many sermons on the Nativity itself. The Gelasian Sacramentary gives a Mass for the day, In Octavas Domini, and there follows one Prohibendum ab idolis, pointing to what we have already said as to the heathen festival on this day (Patrol. lxxiv. 1061). In the former Mass, the main idea is evidently of the octave of the Nativity, and not of any special commemoration of the day itself, there being merely a passing allusion to our Lord's Circumcision, as contrasted with such expressions as "Cujus hodie octavas nati celebrantes . . ." and the like.

In the Gregorian Sacramentary the Mass for the day is headed In Octavis Domini (Greg. Sacr. col. 13, ed. Menard), but the Gospel treats of the Circumcision, Luke ii. 21-32. Of two collects given, one has special reference to the Virgin, the other to the octave, and in Pamelius' edition of the Sacramentary, and in the Cd. Reg. Suec. is read Ad S. Mariam ad Martyres; in the Kalendarium Romanum is Natale S. Marie, and thus in the Gregorian Antiphony (op. ed. 660) we have De Sancta Maria in velata Infantini.

All this points to a twofold commemoration of the day, the one having regard to the octave of the Nativity or the Circumcision, the other to the Virgin, and hence the special prominence given to the mention of her in the Mass for the day in the modern Roman Missal. The Preface and the Benediction in the Gregorian Sacramentary do indeed refer to the Circumcision—"Cujus hodie Circumcisionis diem et Nativitatis octavam celebrantes"—; but there is a certain amount of evidence against their authenticity, they are omitted by Pamelius and are wanting in the Cd. Reg. Suec. Possibly, therefore, they are a later addition.

We may next briefly notice the ancient liturgical documents of the Gallican Church. The ancient Lectionary published by Mabillon (de Liturgia Gallicana, p. 112), gives lectures in the Circumcisione Domini for matins and for the Mass; for the former, Isaiah xlv. 24—xlvi. 7, and for the latter, Isaiah i. 10-20; with 1 Cor. x. 14-31 and Luke ii. 21-40 for the Epistle and Gospel, the Gelasian Sacramentary and the Ambrosian Sacramentary. The Ambrosian Sacramentary also contains a special lesson for the day, which is the same as that in the Gregorian Sacramentary. The Mozarabic Breviary also contains a special lesson for the day, which is the same as that in the Gregorian Sacramentary.

It is thus probable that the observance of the day was introduced into Spain for early days. The first document observed is to be found in the Council of Tours, which, after remarking that the day is observed from Christ's birth, says "capitur tribulum in istum consuetudine prius in Kalendis ecclesie psallitur, hodie Circumcisionis dicitur" (Labbé, l. c.). The evidence for supposing that the observance was introduced into Spain from the death of Isidorus is not so strong as one places, "phœnicibus Domini usque ad tempus edicere" (Conc. Turonense lxxviii. 380). Averlun (loc. cit.) from the belief that Isidorus here may mean the synaxis; but when it is joined with the above, the less reason for the observance. Further, recent investigations show that by the 7th century the observance had become of such importance that it is mentioned in the Code de Lois (Code de Lois, lib. vii. t. 3, l. 6; 63, 1004, Frankfurt, same survives), for in the 8th century in the Code de Lois (Patrol. lxxxix. 1090) the Council of Mainz is mentioned, can. 36; Labbé, l. c.).

Briefly then to summarize what we have obtained: we have seen that the observance of the day in the 4th century as the octave of the Nativity or the recognition of the day in the modern Roman Missal is borne out by the fact that it is before that date the earliest the name of the day was solely as the octave of the Nativity or the Circumcision. It may be remarked that the Council of Tours, which still adheres to the observance of the day, is the only one of commemorating the day together on January 6, and that the Council of Tours celebrates the Circumcision on January 6. The primary idea of a festival has already been mentioned in the canon of the 2nd Council of Tours, where it is said that the observance of the day is the same as that of the Nativity.

ommunium (Januanferred martyre Dominic diei idolorum et s asserted, this the Telemachus
t. Evcl. v. 20), to the time of tain recognition ch at the end of ct of this fast we ss the observance is impossible to evidence borne as argumentary, for it and commences

last section in it, asis deciml," for thus furnishing the time, though day was known it was added, how-there is no allusion eo I, although he ivity itself. The Mass for the day, follows one Prole-
what we have al-festival on this day former Mass, the octave of the Sa-commemoration of merely a passing ion, as contrasted jus hodie octavae e hodie.

ary the Mass for is Domini (Greg. the Gospel treats 21-32. Of two I reference to the ave, and in Pame-rian and in the rian ad Martires; s Natalis S. Marce, atiphany (op. cit. ria in Octava Do-

commemoration of rd to the octave of on, the other to the prominence given Mass for the day is The Preface and rian Sacramentary omission — "Cujus Nativitatis octavam a certain amount chenticity, they are re wanting in the therefore, they are 2

the ancient liturgan Church. The by Mahillon (de gives lectures in ntians and for the in sliv. 24—25, 7, 20—25; with 1 Cor.
40 for the Epistle

CIRCUMCISION, FESTIVAL OF

and Gospel, the Gospel being the same as in the Gregorian and Mozarabic liturgy; the prophetical lection and Epistle in this last being Isaiah xlviii. 12-20 and Philippians iii. 1-8.
It will be observed that the Epistle in the Gallian liturgy has reference to the idol practices which characterized the day. The Gotho-Gallie Missal (ob. 200) gives an Ordo Missae in Cir- cumcisione Domini nostri Jesu Christi, and the Mozarabic Breviary and Missal style the day Circumcisio Domini.

It is thus probable that we must look to Gaul and Spain for early examples of this title of the day. The first definite instance that we have observed is to be found in the canon of the 2nd Council of Tours (567 A.D.) already referred to, which, after remarking that every day was a festival from Christmas to Epiphany, adds, "ex-cipitur triduum illud, quo ad celebrandam Gen-tilianam consuetudinem patres nostri statuerunt privatas in Kalendis Januarii fieri litanias, et in ecclesiis psallitur, et hova octava in ipsis Kalendis Circumcisionis Missa Deo propitio celebratur" (Labbe, l. c.). There is also some evidence for supposing that the title of the Circumcision was applied to the day in Spain before the death of Isidore (676 A.D.), for we read in one place, "pleneit etiam patribus a die Natalis Domini usque ad diem Circumcisionis solemne tempus efflicere" (Regula Monachorum 12; Patrol. lxxiii. 880). Arevalo does indeed suggest (not. in loc.), from the belief that the title Circumcision is probably of later date, that the original words of Isidore here may have been Kalendas Janu- arias; but when the passage is taken in conjunction with the above quoted canon, there seems little reason for having recourse to this hypothesis. Further, remarks in the laws of the Visi-gods show that by the middle or latter part of the 7th century the day ranked in Spain of so high importance that on it the law courts were closed, and that it then bore the name of the Circumcision (Codex Leg. Visigoth. lib. ii. tit. 1, lex 11;
lib. xii. t. 3, l. 6; in Hispania Illustrata, iii.
853, 1004, Frankfurt 1600). Still, the old name survived, for we find it at the end of the 8th century in the Regula of Bishop Chrodegang (Patrol. lxxix. 1090), and in the proceedings of the Council of Mainz, 813 A.D. (Conc. Mogun- tacum, can. 36; Labbe, vii. 1250).

Briefly then to sum up the results so far obtained: we have seen that the à priori expectation, which would assign the end of the 4th century as the earliest possible date of the recognition of the day under either title, is borne out by the fact of the absence of allusions to it before that date; and further that, until the earliest middle of the 6th century, it was solely as the octave of the Nativity, and not as the Circumcision that the day was known.
It may be remarked here that the whole of Christendom agrees in celebrating the Circumcision on January 1 except the Armenian Church, which still adheres to the old Eastern practice of commemorating the Nativity and Epiphany together on January 6, and necessarily therefore celebrates the Circumcision on January 13.

The primary idea of the day as a fast and not a festival has already been referred to. The canon of the 2nd Council of Tours which we have cited shows the state of the case in France; that the same custom prevailed in Spain is shown by an allusion in a canon of the 4th Council of Toledo, A.D. 633 (Conc. Tol. iv. can. 11; Labbe, v. 1709); cf. Isidore, de Eccl. Off. lib. i. c. 46; although it must be added that a heading in the Mozarabic Breviary points to the three days before the Epiphany as the period of the fast: "Officium jejuniorum in Kal. Jan. observatur tribus diebus ante festum Epiphaniae." Lastly, we may refer to the Ordo Romanus, which, after speaking of the heathen abominations which defiled the day, adds, "Statuit universa's Ecclesia jejunium publicum in isto die fieri" (p. 20, ed.

Hittorp.*).

It will, of course, be inferred from what has been already remarked that there is an absence of homilies or sermons for the day in the works of early patristic writers. We may here again, however, refer to the discourse of Zeno of Verona, de Circumcisione (lib. i. tractat. 13, p. 99, ed.
Ballerini, where see note 1). In an ancient MS. of this of the 9th century (the Cl. Remensis) is added a note in the margin of this discourse, In Octava Domini pentecostis nona lectio. The Ballerini consider these notes to have been written at the time when Archbishop Hincmar (ob. 882 A.D.) gave the MS. to the abbey of St. Remigius at Reims, and while the MS. belonged to the Church of Verona (Pref. § 5), and that this discourse was there spoken on the octave of the Nativity. They infer from the marginal note the relative importance of the day, considering that such a remark about the ninth lection would be made only in the case of the more important festivals. Bede has written a homily for the day on Luke ii. 21 (Hom. x.; Patrol. xciv. 63).

When the fast became a festival it is impossible definitely to say. Probably the process was a gradual one, and the period varied in different countries. The statutes of St. Boniface (ob. 755 A.D.) include it among the special festivals on which no work was to be done (D'Achery, Spicilegium ix. 66). Still, at a period subsequent to this, traces of the old state of things survived, the latest we have observed being in the Capitula of Atto, bishop of Verceil in the 10th century, who dwells on the expediency of maintaining the ancient protest (Patrol. xxxiv. 43). [R. S.]

CIRCUS. [CHARIOTRER.]

CIRINUS. [CYRINUS.]

CITHINUS, one of the "martyres Scyllitanii" at Carthage, July 17 (Cal. Carthag., Bedae, Rom.
Vet., Usuardi). [C.]

CLARUS, presbyter, and martyr "in pago Vilensino," Nov. 4 (Mart. Usuardi). [C.]

CLAUDIANUS. (1) Martyr in Egypt under Numerian, Feb. 25 (Mart. Rom. Vet., Usuardi).
(2) Martyr at Nicomedia, March 6 (Mart.
Usuardi). [C.]

CLAUDIUS. (1) Martyr at Ostia under Diocletian Feb. 18 (Mart. Rom. Vet., Usuardi).
(2) Martyr at Rome, with Pope Marcellinus, April 20, A.D. 304 (Mart. Usuardi).

* The alleged Statuta Ecclesiae Rhemensis (Labbe, v.
1694), attributed to Bishop Sonnatius. In which (c. 50) reference is made to the Circumcision as one of the days "abique opere forensi excludenda," are probably fabrica-tions of a later date.

which appointed also a festival day for both St. Gregory the Great and St. Augustine of Canterbury. (4) A.D. 794, called "Synodale Concilium," and "Sanctum Concilium": two grants are extant made there (Kenble's Codex Diplomaticus, 164-167; Haddan and Stubbs, Councils, 483-485). (5) A.D. 798, referred wrongly by Spelman to A.D. 800; some charters were passed there (Kenble's Codex Diplomaticus, 175, 180, 1018; Haddan and Stubbs, ib. 512-518). There are intimations also of the annual synod having been held, but without mention of the place (e.g. A.D. 704, and 730 or 737, both Mercian councils, and again, A.D. 755, Haddan and Stubbs, ib. 267, 337, 390), which may easily therefore have been Clovesho, and probably was so. [A. W. H.]

COADJUTOR BISHOP, with a right of succession, was distinctly against canon; on the principle that such an appointment interfered with the right of election in clergy and people, &c. [Bisnor.] The institution of chorepiscopi appears to have been among the earliest plans for meeting the case of overgrown dioceses. But instances must have occurred at all times of bishops incapacitated by sickness either of body or mind, or by old age. And under such circumstances resignations were, although grudgingly, permitted. [Bisnor.] Nevertheless, coadjutors also,—meaning by the term full bishops, but acting still in place of the proper occupant of the see (still remaining so), and with no right of succession,—occur, although at first rarely; almost every early case being mixed up with the succession-question. St. Ambrose certainly speaks of a coadjutor in this special sense being given to Bishop Bassus, "in consortium regende ecclesie" (Epist. 79). And the 5th Council of Paris (A.D. 577), considerably later, contemplates the case as an exceptionally legitimate one. "Nullus episcoporum se vivente alium in loco suo vigat, . . . nisi certae conditiones extiterint ut ecclesiam suam et clerum regere non possent" (can. 2). And in course of time such coadjutors became at length common, and were provided for by, e.g. Boniface VIII. (in Sexto c. Pastoralis). St. Gregory the Great meets the case of temporary sickness by the temporary help of a neighbouring bishop; but in more permanent cases he distinctly recommends a coadjutor, but without right of succession, as, e.g. in the case of John of Justiniana Prima (St. Gregory M. Epist. ix. 41). [A. W. H.]

COARB (Corarb, Comharbi, Latinized into Corbi, = Conterraneus, or ejusdem terrae, or districtus—so Colgan), the title in the Celtic-Irish and Scottish churches, of the abbatial successor of the original founder of a monastery. So an abbot of Hy would be called the Coarb of Columba; of Armagh, the Coarb of Patrick; of Raphoe, the Coarb of Adamnan, &c., &c. The word occurs much earlier in the Annals; but its common use dates from late in the 8th century, when such abbacies had become hereditary in many cases, and not only so, but had passed into the hands, in some instances, of laymen, while a prior discharged the spiritual office. The transformation in lapse of time of the Heremach or Airchannach, who was originally the representative of the lay Advocatus of the monastery, but gradually usurped the position of hereditary lay possessor of his original third of the produce of monastic lands, brought him also by a different line to a condition closely resembling what the lay coarbs became (as e.g. at Dunkeld); so that the coarb became to a monastery what the heremach was to any church, monastic or not. A female coarb occurs once or twice (Reeves, ad Adm. V. S. Columbae, Add. Notes, p. 494). Coarbs that were still clergy, became tyfyn in Ireland in later times Peblun—rural deans, or archpresbyters, or chorepiscopi (in the later sense of the word), i.e. the head of a "pho-eclesiastical," viz. of clergy who served chapels under him as rector. [Reeves, Colm's Visitation, pp. 4 note, 145, 209; Spelman, Gloss. in v. Corba; E. W. Robertson, Early Scotl. i. 310.] [A. W. H.]

COAT, THE HOLY. Its miracles are commemorated on Oct. 1 in the Georgian Calendar.

COCHLEAR. [Spoon.] [C.]

COCK. Representations of this bird occur frequently on tombs from the earliest period. When not associated with the figure of St. Peter, as Bottari, tav. lxxxiv., or placed on a pillar, as Boldetti, p. 360; Bottari, tavv. xxiv, xxii, &c., it appears to be a symbol of the Resurrection, our Lord being supposed by the early Church to have broken from the grave at the early cock-crowing. A peculiar awe seems always to have attached to that hour, at which all wandering spirits have through the Middle Ages been supposed to vanish from the earth. Haniel and the ancient ballad called The Wife of Usher's Well occur to us as salient examples of an universal superstition. Prudentius' hymn Ad Galli Cantum (Cithon, v. 16) adopts the idea of the cock-crowing as a call to the general judgment ("Nostri figura est judicii"); and further on (45 seqq.) he says:

"Hoc esse signum praesit Noverim promissae spei, Qua nos somno liberi Speramus adventum Dei."

And again, 65 seqq.:

"Inte est, quot omnes credimus, Ilo quietis tempore, Quo galus exultans canit, Christum redisse ex inferis."

See Aringhi, vol. ii. pp. 328-9 (in a complete list of animal symbols). Fighting-cocks (see the passage last quoted) seem to symbolize the combat

From a Cup (Aringhi, ii. 328.) with secular or ser-ties of training th-ally existed in t-hour at Athens (C epos, el pauci, &c.

and a pastime, co-word brovied (C
ii. s. 137.

Two cocks accor-Bottari, tav. clixii arch in the cemetery

CODEX CANO

" "

To treat of them I we must reverse th from the last to th in dedicating his ow April 1389 to Steph of two collections un 165 canons, accordi the Council of Cons another in Latin, lo Greek, which he had pore upon. The Gre of 20 canons passed which he reckons a 20 at Gangra; 25 at and 6 at Constantin All had been fram they begin with the fi with the second, the p put together so as t the date of the 4th C which they were con of which they are mor numbered in this colle To it we may suppos meanwhile—Justinus by Stephen, bishop of 4th Council, as there his still extant contin of Ephesus; and it wa canons of Chalcedon o in this shape it was o low by the Emperor Jus Whether it included Chalcedon is, however Theophilus, who must h before then, ends with expressly, "in his Gree edictum." And so alone in this, that ev presbyter of Antioch, w Constantinople in the attributes no more than of Chalcedon in his colle of course the first 27 this code terminated.
and are not translated b old Latin version of whic are particularly name Scholastics, though he has quoted the 8th, passi probability for no othe racy to the subject-m Still this code, though formed at Chalcedon, an empire under Justinian never to have been recei with secular or sensual temptations. The practice of training them for combat has probably always existed in the East, and certainly was in vogue at Athens (cf. Aristoph. Av., οἰστροὶ καὶ ἄλγεα, ἢ μάχη, &c.). For a symbol drawn from such a pastime, compare St. Paul's use of the word παύσις (4 Cor. ix. 27). See Bottari, vol. ii. t. 137.

Two coats accompany the Good Shepherd in Bottari, tav. clxxxii. (From the tympanum of an arch in the cemetery of St. Agnes). [R. St. J. T.]

CODEx CANONUM ECCLESIAE

GRAECAE.

ROMANAE.

UNIVERSAE.

To treat of them in their chronological order, we must reverse their alphabetical, and proceed from the last to the first. Dionysius Exiguus, in dedicating his own collection (Migne's Patrol. liv. 139) to Stephen, bishop of Salona, speaks of two collections anterior to it; one in Greek of 165 canons, according to him, terminating with the Council of Constantinople, A.D. 381; and another in Latin, long ago translated from the Greek, which he had in fact been asked to improve upon. The Greek collection was composed of 29 canons passed at Nicea; 25 at Ancyra (which he reckons as 24); 14 at Neocaesarea; 20 at Gangra; 25 at Antioch; 59 at Laodicea; and 6 at Constantinople (which he gives as 3). All had been framed in the 4th century; and as they begin with the first General Council and end with the second, the probability is that they were put together so as to form a collection before the date of the 4th Council, by the 1st canon of which they were confirmed, and in the acts of which they are more than once cited as still numbered in this collection. [CONCIL. CHALCED.] To it we may suppose to have been appended meanwhile—Justinus (Patrol. xv. p. 29) thinks the 4th Council, as there seems to be a collection of his still extant containing them—the 8 canons of Ephesus; and it was further enlarged by the canons of Chalcedon on being confirmed there. In this shape it was ordered to have the force of law by the Emperor Justinian in his 131st Novel. Whether it included more than 27 canons of Dionysius is, however, open to question; as before then, ends with the 27th, telling Stephen expressly, "in his Graecorum canonum finem esse declaramus." And so far is he from standing alone in this, that even John Scholasticus, a presbyter of Antioch, who became patriarch of Constantinople in the last year of Justinian, attributes no more than 27 canons to the Council of Chalcedon in his collection, by which he means of course the first 27. With these, therefore, this code terminated. The Ephesine canons indeed are not translated by Dionysius, nor in the old Latin version of which he speaks; but they are particularly named by Justinian; and John Scholasticus, though he reckons them at seven, has quoted the 8th, passing over the 7th in all probability for no other reason than its irrelevancy to the subject-matter of his collection. Still this code, though it was probably composed at Chalcedon, and became law for the empire under Justinian in this shape, seems never to have been received in this shape precisely by the Roman or the Greek Church. John Scholasticus, whose description of it, checked by the number of canons assigned to it by Dionysius, has been here followed in preference to the Greek version edited by Justellus, which is of later date (v. append. ad op. S. Leon. ap. Migne, Patrol. lvi. p. 18), professes it by 85 canons of the Apostles, as he calls them; interpolates it with 21 canons of Sardica; and takes to it 68 of St. Basil. Similarly, Dionysius Exiguus, prefacing it with 50 canons of the Apostles, omits the Ephesine, but appends, over and above the 21 Sardican, no less than 138 African canons; in other words, the entire code of the African Church elsewhere described. Out of these two collections were formed separately, (1) the code of the Roman, and (2) the code of the Greek Church.

1. Dionysius, as we have seen, speaks of an old Latin version anterior to his own; and all his remarks on it is its "confusion." It was first published by Voellus and Henry, son of Christopher, Justellus, A.D. 1661, vol. i. pp. 271-304 of their Bibliotheca Juris Canonici Veteris; and afterwards in a more perfect form by the Ballerini, in their learned disquisitions "De antiquis collectionibus et collectoribus canonum," appended to their edition of the works of St. Leo (Migne's Patrol. lvi. 747-816). It exhibits 24 Ancyran canons, 14 Neocaesarean, 21 Niceae (besides the creed), 21 Sardican, 20 Gangran, 25 Antiochian, 27 Chalcedonian, 4 Constantinopolitan; and then unnumbered, but as though belonging to the last, the 28th canon of Chalcedon, "De primatu ecclesiae Constantinopolitanae." This doubtless was its "confusion" in the eyes of Dionysius; and of course the canons of Constantinople should have preceded those of Chalcedon. But further, at the head of the bishops subscribing to the 28th canon of Chalcedon, immediately before the Roman legates, is Nectarius, who had been previously and rightly mentioned among the framers of the Constantinopolitan canons. Dionysius corrected this inaccuracy by omitting the 28th canon of Chalcedon altogether. The fact of its existence there proves, however, that this old version could not have been very much earlier than that of Dionysius himself, and also that it could never have been of any authority in the Roman Church.

That there was any regularly authorised collection in the Roman Church, in short, before Dionysius brought out his, seems improbable for the very reasons which the Ballerini bring forward in proof of one; namely, that till then the Sardican and Niceae canons, undistinguished from each other, and cited under the latter name, formed its exclusive code; for this rather shews—conformably with what passed between Pope Zosimus and the African church—that up to that time Rome was not conscious of having accepted any but the Niceae canons. At all events, no earlier collection of a public character including more than these, and used there, has been brought to light on their own shewing (ib. p. 63-88), as with the collections obtaining in Africa, Spain, Britain, and France we are not concerned. That the want of a similar collection at Rome had been felt, we may infer from the immediate welcome given there to that of Dionysius. Cassiodorus, his contemporary, and a Roman by birth, says in his praise that "he con-

bird of the prodge in also by a differ resembling what fo Dunkel); so that monastery which the a, monastic or not or twice (Gives, at id. Notes, p. 494) ngly, became stylis bani— rural domo piscop (in the late head of a "p who served chapl oves, *Cotton's Lav ); Spelman, *Glo non, Early Scotl. h [A. W. H., a miracles are com Georgian Calendar.
[C. of this bird occur the earliest period figure of St. Peter, placed on a pillar, as
v. xxvii, xxiii, &c., of Resurrection, on early Church to have early cock-crowin to have attached to sdering spirits hav as supposed to mak of the ancient ball of the bull occur to us several superstition.
Chthon (Collen, l. cock-crowin as a call
"Nostrī figura est 5 seqq.) he says:
oscil ne spe, in Det." credimus,
v. ant, infera."
in a complete list ge-cocks (see the pas inholize the constat

1, ii. 614.

filled lucidly, and with great flow of eloquence, from Greek sources, those canons which the Roman church was then embracing, and using so largely" (Divin. Lect. c. 23): and Dionysius made them doubly acceptable there by supplementing them with a collection of the decrees of the Roman pontiffs from Siricius to Anastasius II., or from A.D. 385 to 498; which, in his dedicatory preface to Julian, "presbyter of the title of St. Anastasia," he says he had arranged on the same plan as his translation of the canons—a work that he understood had given his friend so much pleasure. Whether Dionysius omitted the canons of Ephesus, as not being canons in the ordinary sense of the word—which they are not [CONCILL. EPI.]—or because they were not in the old Latin version, as observed before, or because they were not in the particular Greek version used by him, is not, and probably will never be made clear. Again, why he added the Sardican canons, carefully distinguished from the Nicene, is another question of some interest. What he says is that he gave them as he found them published, in Latin. Had they not, then, been published in Greek likewise? Certainly, whether published in Greek as well as in Latin originally, or translated into Greek since, we know from what John Scholasticus says—of which presently—that there must have been at least one Greek collection of canons extant, at once containing and citing them as the canons of Sardica—not of Nicea—when he published his, so that it would have been useless for any Latin to have tried keeping up the delusion of their being Nicene canons any longer. But then supposing him to have been willing to do so, had it been possible, his own spontaneous adoption of the African canons would have been a still greater puzzle. For if the canons of Sardica distinctly countenance, by making provision for, appeals to Rome, the African canons contain the most positive declaration against them to be found in history. [AFRICAN COUNCILS.] By his adoption of the African canons, therefore, which he says existed in Latin, and, as there seems every reason to think, in Latin only then, from their not being included by John Scholasticus, he placed his own candour beyond dispute; thus enhancing the intrinsic merits of his collection. How he came by his materials for the second part, or appendix to it, consisting of the decrees of the Roman pontiffs from the end of the 4th to the end of the 5th century, he omits to explain. He merely says that he had inserted all he could find; which is as much as to say, surely, that there was no collection of them extant to his knowledge before his own. That there was one somewhere, notwithstanding, the Ballerini think highly probable (l. c. p. 200-6). However, they readily grant that in each case the excellence of his collections was so generally recognized as to make them adopted everywhere. One speedily became styled "Codex Canonum;" the other, "Liber Decretorum;" and both were presented, with some later additions to each, as some think of his own insertion or adoption, by Pope Adrian I. to Charlemagne, A.D. 787, with a dedication in verse at all events as from himself, ending in these words: "A lege nunquam discede, hæc observans statuta." It was printed at Mayence A.D. 1525, and afterwards at Paris, as "Codex vetus ecclesie Romanæ" (Patrol. lxxvii. 135-8, and lvi. 206-11); a title which belonged to it long before then, as together with all other authentic collections in the West, it had been supplanted gradually by the fraudulent collection known as that of Isidore Mercator, or Pectorator, and first published in the latter half of the 9th century.

2. We may now turn to the code of the Greek church, founded, as has been said, on the collection of John Scholasticus ostensibly, though his was not the earliest work of the kind when it came out. Like Dionysius, he speaks of another, or rather of others, who had anticipated him, even in his plan of arranging the canons, not in their chronological order, but according to their subject-matter; the only difference between him and them being that they had made their collection consist of sixty titles; he of fifty; they had omitted the canons of St. Basil; he had supplied them. In other respects his collection included no more than theirs, nor theirs than his; though he considered his own arrangement more intelligible, and the more so as he had given a list at starting of the councils from which he had drawn, and of the number of canons passed by each. In his own language, for instance, the Apostles had published 85 canons through St. Clement; and there had been ten synods since their time, Nicene, Ancyra, Neocesarea, Sardica, Gangra, Antioch, Laodicea, Constantinople, Ephesus, and Chalcedon, whose canons together amounted to 224 (their respective numbers have been anticipated); to which he had ventured to append 68 of St. Basil. His position as Patriarch of Constantinople, doubtless, stamped his collection with authority from the first. But, like Dionysius, he rendered it still more acceptable for another reason, namely, that he supplemented it by a second work called his Nomocanon, from containing in addition the laws of the emperors. Thus the imperial decrees became mixed up with the code of the East, just as the papal decrees with that of the West.

The earlier of his collections received authoritative confirmation, as well as enlargement, in the 7th century, by the second of the Trullan canons, given in a former article. [CONC. CONSTANT.] And this code was further augmented by the 102 canons then passed, authoritatively received in the 1st canon of the 2d Nicene, or 7th Council. This Council added 22 canons of its own; and the two Councils of Constantinople, called the 1st and 2d under Photius, 17 and 3 more respectively; all which were incorporated by Photius into two works of his own, corresponding to those of his predecessor John, already described; one called his Synagoge Canonum, and the other his Nomocanon (Sligge's Patrol. Gr. civ. 441-1218). But there is also a third work, distinct from both, attributed to him by Cardinal Mai, being the identical text of the canons of each of the councils previously mentioned, in their chronological order (attributed by Beveridge, Synod. vol. ii.); followed by the canons of the different fathers, enumerated in the 2d Trullan canon (Synod. vol. ii.), and by the letter of St. Tarnasius to Pope Adrian I. against simoniacal ordinations; on which Balsamon, Zeparnas, and Aristenus afterwards commented, and called his Synagoge Canonum (Patrol. ib. p. 431). Such accordingly was, and, so far as it goes, is still the code of the Greek Church: the difference between it and that of the Roman Church may be appreciated by poets.

CODEX.

COENAE.

COENA I.

COENA II.

COENOBIA.

COENOBIA.

COENOBIA.

COENOBIA.

COENOBIA.

COENOBIA.

COENOBIA.

COENOBIA.

COENOBIA.

COENOBIA.

COENOBIA.

COENOBIA.

COENOBIA.

COENOBIA.

COENOBIA.

COENOBIA.

COENOBIA.

COENOBIA.

COENOBIA.

COENOBIA.

COENOBIA.

COENOBIA.

COENOBIA.

COENOBIA.

COENOBIA.

COENOBIA.

COENOBIA.

COENOBIA.

COENOBIA.

COENOBIA.

COENOBIA.

COENOBIA.

COENOBIA.

COENOBIA.

COENOBIA.

COENOBIA.

COENOBIA.

COENOBIA.

COENOBIA.

COENOBIA.

COENOBIA.

COENOBIA.

COENOBIA.

COENOBIA.

COENOBIA.

COENOBIA.

COENOBIA.

COENOBIA.

COENOBIA.

COENOBIA.

COENOBIA.

COENOBIA.

COENOBIA.

COENOBIA.

COENOBIA.

COENOBIA.

COENOBIA.

COENOBIA.

COENOBIA.

COENOBIA.

COENOBIA.

COENOBIA.

COENOBIA.

long before then, as authentic collections implanted gradually by known as that of Isidore of first published in the the code of the Greek been said, on the coluc- osenly, though work of the kind when as, he speaks of another, had anticipated him, but according to their difference between him y had made their col- itles; he of fifty; they of St. Basil; he had sus- pects his collection iers, nor theirs than his; own arrangement more e so as he had given a councils from which he number of canons passed (ange, for instance, ed 85 canons through had been ten synods, Ancyra, Neocaesaria, ch, Laodicea, Constanti- ndon, whose canons 4 (of their respective num- tel): to which he had of St. Basil. His pos- antinople, doubtless, with authority from the s, he rendered it still her reason, namely, that a second work called his aining in addition the thus the imperial decrees the code of the East, just hat that of the West.

lections received autho- well as enlargement, in e second of the Trullan rmer article. [COXII.] code was further aug- then passed, authori- 1st canon of the 2d

This Council added 2d and the two Councils of the 1st and 2nd under respectively; all which otius into two works of to those of his predecessor y; one called his Synagoga his Nomocanon (Chap. 218). But there is also from both, attributed to being the identical text of the councils previously onological order (enti- od. vol. i.); followed by ent fathers, enumerated in (Synod. vol. ii.), and by as to Pope Adrian I. against ; on which Balsamon, Z- afterwards commented, and nonium (Patrol. ib. p. 431) and, so far as it goes, in ek Church: the difference the Roman Church may be appreciated by comparing their respective com- [E. S. F.]

CODEX. [LITURGICAL BOOKS.]

COENAE. [ΑΓΑΡΑΕ.]

COENA DOMINI. [MAUNDY THURSDAY.]

COENA PULIA. [GOOD FRIDAY.]

COENOBIMUM (κοινόβιον). The word "coenobium" is equivalent to "monasterium" in the litter sense of that word. Cassian distinguishes the word thus. "Monasterium," he says, may be the dwelling of a single monk, "coenobium" must be of several; the former word, he adds, expresses only the place, the latter the manner of living (Coll. xviii. 10). The neglect of this distinction has led to much inaccuracy in attempting to fix the date of the first "coenobia" or communities of monks under one roof and under one government. Thus Helyot (Hist. des Ord. Mon. Diss. Prelim. § 5) ascribes their origin to Antony, the famous anchorite of the Thebaid in the 3rd century. But the counter-opinion, which ascribes it to Pachomius of Tabenna a century later is more probable (cf. Tillem. H. E. vii. 167, 176, 676); for it seems to have been the want of some fixed rule to control the irregularities arising from the vast number of eremitae, with their cells either entirely isolated from one another or merely grouped together casually, which gave the first occasion to "coenobia." Martene indeed makes the community monastic first in time to the solitary life (Comm. in Reg. S. B. c. 1); but in this he appears to be misled by the common error of attaching to "monasterium" (μοναστήριον) in the oldest writers the meaning, which it assumed only in course of time (cf. Tillem. H. E. vii. 102). Cassian himself in the very passage cited by Martene in support of this theory, distinctly traces back the word to the solitary (de novis virginitate), the earliest of monks (Coll. xviii. 5). In allowing that the earliest mention of Lauras occurs a little before the middle of the 4th century, Helyot supplies a strong argument against himself (Diss. Prel. § 5). For the Lauras were an attempt at combining the detached hermitages into a sort of community, though without the order and regularity which constituted a "coenobium;" and thus appear to have been a stepping-stone towards the "coenobium" of Pachomius. In view of other considerations to the contrary, much importance cannot be attached to the passage which Helyot cites from the Vita Antonii, called by St. Athanasius, as it may probably be one of the many interpolations there; nor to the passage from Rufinus (De Verb. Sen. 31) which speak of Por being dismissed at the early age of 25 by Antony, as already fit to live alone, for there is nothing here about a community, only about Por being himself trained by the great eremite (cf. Tillem. H. E. vii. 109). In fact, the growth of coenobitism seems to have been very gradual. Large numbers of ascetics were collected near the Mons Nitrus (Ruff. Hist. Mon. 30 [v. CELTICAE]), and doubtless elsewhere also, even before Pachomius had founded his coenobium. But the interval is considerable between this very imperfect organization of monks thus herding lawlessly together (Pallad. Hist. Laus. c. 7), and the symmetrical arrangement of the Benedictine system. Tabenna forms the connecting link.

CHUIST. ANT.

Very probably the earliest coenobia were of women; for, though the word παρθενών, in the account of Antony having his sister in the charge of devout women (Ath. Vita Ant.) is by no means conclusive (but cf. Tillem. H. E. vii. 107), the female eremitae would naturally be the first to feel the need of combination for mutual help and security.

The origin of the coenobitic life is traced back to the time before the Christian era. Something similar is seen in the pages of Plato (Leyf. 780, 1), and the Pythagoreans are described by Anlus Gellius, as living together and having a community of goods (Noctes Atticae, i. 9).

Opinions have been divided among the admirers of asceticism as to the comparative merits of the solitary life and the coenobitic. Cassian looks up to the life of perfect solitude as the pinnacle of holiness, for which the coenobitic life is only a preparatory discipline (e. g. Coll. xix. 3). Theophylact interprets "those who bear fruit an hundredfold" in the parable as virgins and eremitae (S. Marc. iv. 20). Basil, on the contrary, and the sagacious Benedict, prefer the life of the coenobite as safer, more edifying, less alloyed by the taint of selfishness. (Bas. Reg. c. 7, Bened. Reg. c. 1.) So, too, Isidorus Hispanensis, one of the founders of monasticism in Spain (De Off. Ecc. ii. 15, ap. Conc. Reg. iii.), and Cuthbert of Lindisfarne (Mab. Ann. xvi. 72). Even Jerome, his monastic fervour notwithstanding, prefers life in the community to life in utter solitude; though at first he seems to have been a zealous upholder of the contrary opinion (Hier. Epp. ad Rustic. 125; cf. ad Heliod. 14). Doubtless experience had impressed on him the perils of solitude. Legislators found it expedient to curb the rage for eremitism. Justinian ordered monks to stay within the "coenobia" (Novell. v. ap. Suic. Thea. s. v. cf. Conc. Carth. c. 47; cf. Conc. Anath. c. 38). Similarly the great Karl discouraged hermits, while protecting coenobitic monks (e. g. Conc. Francof. 794 A. D. c. 12), and the 7th Council of Toledo censured roving and solitary monks (Conc. Tolet. vii. c. 5). Even in the East the same distrust prevailed of persons undertaking more than they could bear. Thus the Council in Trullo enjoined a sojourn of some time in a coenobium as the preliminary to life in the desert (Conc. Trull. 682 A. D. c. 41). Benedict aptly illustrates the difference from his point of view between these two forms of asceticism. The solitary, he says, leaves the line of battle to fight in a single combat (Reg. c. 1, cf. Conc. Regg. iii. cf. Sulp. Sev. Dial. i. 17).

"Coenobium" is used sometimes in mediaeval writers for the "basilica" or church of the monastery (Mab. Ann. Q. S. B. iv. 4). A Greek equivalent for "coenobite" is συνωβίται, derived from συνωβίος (Bingh. Orig. Eccl. vii. ii. 3, Suicer. Thea. s. v.). Genadius mentions a treatise by Evagrius Monachus, "De coenobitis et syndonitis" (De Scr. Ecc. ap. Fabric. Bibl. Ecc.). Jerome gives "Sauches," or "Sausses," as the Egyptian equivalent (Ep. 22, ad Eustoch.). In mediaeval Latin "coenobita" is sometimes coenobitalis, -ialis, -iota, or -ius. (Du Cange, Gloss. s. v.); "claustrum" (cloister) "conventus" are frequently used for "coenobium."

Besides the authorities cited, see Hospinian (De Origine et Progressu Monachatus, lib. iii. Tiguri 1588). See also ASCETICISM, BENEDECTINE RULE, and MONASTERY. [I. G. S.]

COINTA, martyr, Feb. 8. [QUINTA.] [C.]

COFFIN. [BURIAL.]

COLIDEI, = Celi-De = Servi Dei (explained also by such authorities as O'Reilly and Curry, as equivalent to Sponsi Dei, but, according to O'Donovan and Reeves, with less probability): in Scotch records, generally, Keledei, which seems the more accurate spelling: in Jocelyn (V. S. Kenteg.), Colidei; in Girald. Camb. and in the Armagh Registers, Colidei, as if Deivola or Dei Cultores, or (so Girald. Camb.) Caelicolas; and in Hector Boece, and from him in Buchanan, and thence in modern writers, corrupted into Culdeei or Culdees — at first, simply an Irish rendering of what was an ordinary Latin name for monks, and so used apparently in older Irish documents: but appropriated in Ireland about the latter part of (at least) the 8th century to a specially ascetic order of monks, established by Melruain (ob. A. D. 792) at Tamhlacht, now Tallaght, near Dublin, whose Rule still exists (R[1454] 114 Celeo-nice); and of whom it is also possible that some of their peculiar characteristics were borrowed from those of the canons established by Chrodegang of Metz about a quarter of a century earlier, inasmuch as the later Keledei of both Ireland and Scotland did in many points resemble secular canons. The name reappears in Ireland (elsewhere than at Tallaght) in the 10th and 11th centuries. But by this time, in some instances, as at Clonmacnois, the head of the Celi-De was married, and his office hereditary; although there were still instances to the contrary, as in the island in Loch Monaincha (co. Tipperary), the "Colidei" of which are distinctly called "coelibes" by the contemporary Giraldus Camb. at the end of the 12th century. At Armagh, also, and at Devenish in Lech Erne, the original "Colidei" are found, after Northmen ravages and at later periods, displaced by, but coexisting with, a regular cathedral chapter and a priory of regular canons respectively; while, in other places, they were merged altogether into the chapter. At Armagh, indeed, the Culdee body lasted until A. D. 1628. In Scotland, the name had a parallel but a more notable history. The order seems to have been introduced into that country shortly after A. D. 800. "Colidei," living a specially ascetic life, but as "singulares clericis," and "in singulis casulis," were traditionally the clergy of St. Kentegern's cathedral of Glasgow (Jocel. in V. S. Kenteg.); and a distinct connection is traceable between St. Kentegern and the Irish Church. But the name Keledei occurs historically, as a name for a clerical body of monks, used in Scotland by writers, contemporary (or nearly so), and in charters, from the 9th century; and it becomes thenceforward the name simply of a particular but numerous class of the older monastic bodies of the Irish type, all however north of the Forth, as distinguished 1, from Columbite Monasteries, and 2, from the special Augustinian, Benedictine, and other orders introduced from the end of the 11th century. And inasmuch as most of these older foundations had become lax in discipline, and often consisted of married men who handed on their Culdeeships to their children,—yet at the same time still commonly clerical, although in some cases (viz. many Scotch monasteries of that date) held and transmitted by lay abbats,—the name came to signify, not (as at first) special asceticism, but precisely the reverse. Accordingly, A. D. 1124–1153, King David commenced the great change, which finally either superseled the Keledei by superadding to them a superior body of regular canons, as at St. Andrews and Dunkeld, or merged the Keledei themselves into the chapter, as at Brechin, Ross, Dunblane, Dornoch, Lismore (Argyll), and the Isles, or into a body of regular canons in no connection with a bishop's see, as at Abernethy, &c. The middle or end of the 13th century appears to have completed in Scotland the suppression of both name and class. The name Colidei occurs also in England at York as early as A. D. 936, as applied to the then officiating clergy of the Minster, who were displaced apparently (like their Scotch brethren) by the arrival of Norman archbishops, but continued under another name (viz. as the hospital of St. Leonard's) until the dissolution under Henry VIII.; the name Colidei being still employed in their chartulary, which was engrossed in the reign of Henry V. (Dugd. Mon. vi. ii. 607). Lastly, the same name is applied by Giraldus Camb. to certain ascetics in the Isle of Bardsey in Wales in the year 1188. Neither in Ireland nor in Scotland is there the slightest trace of foundation, in any regular authoritative document, for any supposed peculiarities of doctrine or of church government, derived by Culdees from some Eastern or other source, and handed down by them; nor for any other connection between them and the Columbite monasteries than that both were of Irish type. The abbey of Hyt itself was distinctly not Keledean, although at a very late period (A. D. 1164) a subordinate body of Keledei are found in the island. The details however of the great revolution in the organization of the Scotch Church, which involved as part of itself the transformation of the older monastic arrangements into the new, and (more noticeable still) the transfer of jurisdiction from presbyter abbats to diocesan bishops,—both processes implying in the majority of cases the suppression of Keledean foundations,—belong to a period some centuries later than that to which this article refers. As does also, much more, the history of the strange perversions of the facts of the case by combined ignorance and partisanship, which are hardly, it seems, all exploded everywhere even now.

[This account is abridged from Dr. Reeves's carefully exact monograph On the Culdees, Dublin, 1864; to which is subjoined an Appendix of Evidences, conclusively establishing the writer's main positions. There is a candid account of the subject also in Grub's Hist. of the Ch. of Scotland, vol. i., written however before the publication of Dr. Reeves's exhaustive essay; and a brief, and on the whole competent, summary of the case in ch. x. of E. W. Robertson's Early Scotland, written also under the like disadvantage. Earlier writers, as a rule, are not worth mentioning.] [A. W. H.] COLLAT. the lives or of Benedict (Regulas before instance, the read, and he Isidore, Regula on the Regula called collatitia," because on the portion of Antiquarius (Regula, to expound brothers.

The Benedict in the church with the four contemplated same place a Monach. Hist. Collatio.)

COLLECT. missa, see below Church, for the from the pray Principles, &c. characteristics But the quest collect, what in this name, mu etymology or t

The structu invention of t but, and the some property object desired addition of ul (3) either an ing of the m character is to nes," says C saying little, to ave, to utter n and with calm necessity of gr Gal, the migh they "are nev drawing, never to listlessness; antithesis and a er is left to los use are un-loubt are founded on or responses, st eluded in the id determining the collect's "now in

Of these he s 440 to 461) an 496) were the fir is in which we h From the SACRA Gelasius, and Gr collect's of the I remote source of still. "The ide

• Ancient Collectio, • Bona, De Heb. L, • P. D. S. I. 144–5

And inasmuch as most had become lay in dis- of married men who to their children,—yet only clerical, although Scotch monasteries of nited by lay abbats,—not (as at first) special the reverse. Accord- David commenced nally either superseded ng to them a superior as at St. Andrews and eled themselves into chin, Ross, Dunblane, H), and the Isles, or us in no connection t Abernethy, &c. The th century appears to and the suppression of the name Colloidi occurs as early as A.D. 936, as icating clergy of the laced apparently (like the arrival of Norma and under another name St. Leonard's) until the VIII.; the name Colidei their chartulary, which of Henry V. (Dugd. ily, the same name is ur, to certain ascetics Wales in the year 1188. in Scotland is there oundation, in any realy for any supposed pen- of church government, some Eastern or other a by them; nor for the um in them and the Colum that both were of Irish ly itself was distinctly at a very late period inate body of Keledei . The details however s in the organization of hich involved as part of a of the older monastic ew, and (more noticeable isisdiction from presbyter ps,—both processes im- of cases the suppression s,—belong to a period man that to which this s also, much more, the perversions of the facts ignoance and partisan- it seems, all explained aged from Dr. Reeve's graph On the Cultures, is subjoined an Appendix establishing the writer's a candid account of the Hist. of the Ch. of Scot- however essay; and a exhaustive before; and a competent, summary of E. W. Robertson's Early under the like disas- ters, as a rule, are not [A. W. H.]

COLLATION

COLLATION (Collatio). The reading from the lives or Collations of the Fathers, which St. Benedict (Regula, c. 42) instituted in his monasteries before compine. Such compilations as, for instance, the Collations of John Cassian are, and hence probably the name. Compare hidore, Regula, c. 8. Arlo Smaragdus, however (on the Rule, c. 42), says that this service was called collatio "quasi colloentio vel confabulatio," because the monks questioned each other on the portions read. To the same effect Honorius of Autun, Gamma Animarum, li. 63. Fructuosus (Regula, c. 3) desires the abbot or provost to expound the book read to the more simple brothers.

The Benedictine practice is to hold this service in the church, and this is probably in accordance with the founder's intention; for he evidently contemplated the collation being held in the same place as compine. (Martene, De Ant. Monach. lib. li. c. 11, p. 35; Ducange, s. v. Collatio.) [C.]

COLLECT (Collecta, Collecta oratio, oratio, missa, see below). The Collects of the Western Church, for they differ in some important respects from the prayer-forms of the Eastern (Freeman's Principles, &c., i. 372) have certain well-marked characteristics which are common to them all. But the question what is the differentia of a collect, what it is that makes a prayer receive this name, must probably be determined by the etymology or the history of the word.

The structure of collects consists of (1) an invocation of God the Father with some attributes, and the ascription in the relative form of some property or action; (2) next follows the object desired by the prayer, often with the addition of ulterior results derived from it, (3) either an ascription of glory or a pleading of the merits of Christ. Their general character is to "combine strength with sweetness," says Canon Bright, "to say much in saying little, to address the Most High in adoring awe, to utter man's needs with profound pathos and with calm intensity, to insist on the absolute necessity of grace, the Fatherly tenderness of God, the might of the all-prevailing name;" they "are never weak, never diluted, never drawing, never ill-arranged, never a provocation to listlessness; they exhibit an exquisite skill of antithesis and a rhythmical harmony which the ear is loth to lose." Many of the collects now in use are undoubtedly of very great antiquity, and are founded on prayer-forms, such as versicles or responses, still older; and this distinction between merely short petitions and what is included in the idea of collect is made by Bona in determining the date of the introduction of the collects "now in use" into the Western Church, b

Of these he says Leo the Great (pope from 440 to 461) and Gelasius (pope from 492 to 496) were the first composers, in the form that is in which we have them in the Western Church. From the SACRAMENTARIES attributed to Leo, Gelasius, and Gregory, are derived many of the collects of the English Prayer-Book. And the remote source of these collects is more ancient still: "The idea of the Western collect, is in ^a Ancient Collects, pp. 189-200.

^b Bona, De Reb. Lit. li. 5. 4. quoted by Freeman, l. 144.

^c P. R. S. l. 144-5.

COLLECT

403

all respects derived from the consideration of the Eastern system. We seem to see compressed into the terse collects of Leo, Gelasius, or Gregory, the more diffuse spirit of the Eastern hymns, and thus they would be, so to speak, the very quintessence of the gospels on which the latter were founded." "The only innovation made by the Western composers, and that a very natural one, was to incorporate the collect, not with the ordinary service only but with the communion office itself." Indeed, in the ritual of the West the chief "means by which the ordinary office is continually linked on to the eucharistic is the weekly collect. In the East the vespers and lauds preceding a festival are largely coloured by a variety of hymns, many of them resembling prayers, and all referring to the gospel of the coming day. In the West, though originally there were several, we have now mostly only a single prayer, composed generally out of epistle and gospel taken together, with some reference to both. And this, though used at the vespers of the eve, and characteristic of that office, is also continued throughout the week." Our "first collect, then, is not merely a link between our common and our eucharistic offices, but reflecting as it does the spirit of the epistle and gospel it presents to us the appointed variation of the eucharistic office for the current week."

It remains now to speak of the etymology of the word, and it is a question more easy to state than to settle. The word may be derived either (1) from the circumstances of those who use the prayer, or (2) from something in the character of the prayer itself. (1.) In the former case the name is taken from the "Collecta," or people assembled for worship; and this origin of the word has the support of Krazier, who says that in "early times the only prayer called collect was that which was wont to be said for the people when assembled (collectus) in one church with the whole body of the clergy for the purpose of proceeding to another." The sacramentary of Gregory makes this quite clear, in which on the feast of the Purification two prayers are provided, one entitled "Ad Collectam ad S. Adrianum," where clergy and people were assembled to go from thence to S. Maria Maggiore; the other "oratio ad missam (as if the first were not an eucharistic prayer)," "but as time went on," he says, "all prayers said 'ad Missam' were called collects, because the priest repeated them 'super populum collectum sive congregatum.'" This theory is perhaps not so attractive as the two others which remain to be mentioned, but it has probability on its side, as "collecta" for "oratio ad collectam" is just such an abbreviation as usage would produce, while the more recent eucharistic association of the word would account for prayers alike in other respects being called, some of them prayers and others collects. Those who reject this origin must explain the phrase "oratio ad collectam" followed immediately by "oratio ad missam" on another hypothesis.

(11.) If the prayer derives its name 'collect' from its own character, it may be so called either because (1) it is a condensation of Scripture-

^d Freeman, Principles of Divine Service, l. p. 367.

^e Bright, A. C. 202, sq.

^f De Liturg. § 226.

sometimes on Monday or Tuesday (feria secunda, tertia), for the benefit and sustenance of the poor. These collections seem to have been distinct from OBLATIONS.

(2) The gathering together of the people for divine service, whether of mass or hours. Jerome (Epist. 27 [al. 108], § 19, p. 712) states that the sound of Alleluia called monks to say their offices (ad collectam). Pachomius (Regula, c. 17) speaks of the collecta in which oblation was made, that is, the mass; he also distinguishes (cc. 181, 186) between the "collecta domus," the service held in the several houses of a monastery, and the "collecta major," at which the whole body of monks was brought together to say their offices. In this rule, as in those of Isidore and Fructuosus, collecta has very probably the same sense as COLLATIO.

(3) A society or brotherhood. The 15th canon of the first council of Nantes is "De collectivis vel confratris quos consortia vocant." See also Hæmar, Capitula ad Presbyt. c. 14. (Ducang's Glossary, s. v.) [C.]

COLLECTIO. In the Gallican missals certain forms of prayer and praise are called Collectio. The principal of these are the Collectio post Nona, which follows the recitation of the names on the diptychs; the Collectio ad Pacem, which accompanies the giving of the Kiss of Peace; the Collectio post Sanctus, which immediately follows the "Holy, Holy, Holy," and the Collectio post Eucharistiam, after communion. (Martene, De Brevibus Eccl. Antiq. i. c. iv. art. 13.) [C.]

COLLECTION. [ALMS; COLLECTA.]

COLLEGIUM. Corporations or guilds, called collegia, of persons united in pursuit of a common object, were numerous in the empire in the early days of the Christian church. The imperial government of course took cognizance of them, and did not permit such combinations for every purpose. Associations for the purpose of maintaining religious rites were however for the most part not interfered with; but when the presence of Christianity in all parts of the empire attracted attention, its collegia, as the several churches seemed to be from the jurist's point of view, were declared illicit, and to belong to them a misdemeanour. (Gieseler, Eccl. Hist. i. pp. 20, 114; Cunningham's Tracts, Philadelphia, 1836.) [Compare BROTHERHOOD; CANONICI; CHAPTER.] [C.]

COLOBIUM (κολόβιον). A tunic with very short sleeves only, and fitted closely about the arm. A few words of the Pseudo-Alcuin (de Div. Off.) both describe the dress and reproduce, with a characteristic modification, an old Roman tradition concerning it. "Pro tunica brachisthina (i. e. the tunic of blue worn by the Jewish high-priest) nostri pontifices primo colobium stebantur. Est autem colobium vestis sine manica." The older tradition was that Sylvester, bishop of Rome, ordered that deacons should wear dalmatics in offices of holy ministry, in place of the colobia, which had previously been in use. From this circumstance of the colobium being regarded as the special vestment of a deacon it is sometimes called lebiton (i. e. leviton) or lebitonarium, a word which reappears in ecclesiastical Greek of the 5th and later centuries.

It is so used by I illadius of Hellenopolis, in the Historia Lausiaca so-called, cap. 38, describing the dress worn by the monks under Pachomius at Tabennesis in the Thebaid (Migne, Patrol. lxxxiii. 1157), a dress prescribed, according to the author, by an angel in vision:—"Noctugestent lebitones lineos, succincti." And again, cap. 47: "τὸ δὲ ἐνδύμα ἦν αὐτῷ ὁ λεβιτών, ὄνπερ τινες κολόβιον προσαγορεύουσι." The monastic colobium in Palestine, if not elsewhere, had upon it a purple "sign," probably a cross. So St. Dorotheus, archimandrite (Migne, Patrol. Series Græca, lxxxviii. 1631), describing the monastic dress of his day in Palestine, late in the 6th century, says:—"τὸ σχῆμα ὃ φοροῦμεν καλόβιον ἐστὶ, μὴ ἔχον χειρῖδις, καὶ ζώνη δερματίνη, καὶ ἀβάλατος, καὶ κουκούλιον . . ." Ἐχει δὲ τὸ κολόβιον σημεῖον τι πορφύρου (as a mark of service, he explains, under Christ our King). Examples of the Greek colobium may be seen in the ancient mosaics, reputed to be of the 4th century, in the church of St. George at Thessalonica. See Texier and Pollan, Byzantine Architecture, III. xxx.-xxxiii.; Mariotti, Inst. Christ. III. xviii.-xx. [W. B. M.]

COLOGNE, COUNCIL OF (Agrippinense, or Colonense Concilium). (1) Said to have been held A. D. 346, to condemn Euphratas, Bishop of Cologne (for denying our Lord's divinity); who was however at Sardica as no orthodox bishop the year after (Pygi. d. un. 3-6, n. 6; Mansi, II. 1371-1378). Baronius and Cave think the council spurious. Sirmond supposes Euphratas to have recanted; others that he was acquitted; others that there were two successive bishops of Cologne so named.

(2) Another council is reported to have been held A. D. 782, under Charlemagne; but this was apparently a political council; nothing is known of it ecclesiastically (Labbe and Cossart, Concilia, vi. 1827, from Eginhard.) [A. W. H.]

COLOUR. The assigning of special colours in the vestments of ministers, &c. to certain seasons does not belong to the first eight centuries of Christianity (Hefele, Lehrbuche zur Archæologie etc. II. 158), and is probably first found in the work of Innocent III. (†1216), De Sacro Altaris Mysterio, lib. i. c. 65. There are, however, certain peculiarities in the use of colour in ancient art which may be mentioned here.

(1) White was held to symbolize the pure bright light of truth (Clement's Protrepticus, ii. 10, p. 235). Hence the Lord is represented with a white robe as "the Truth," whether sitting in the midst of the Doctors, or teaching His disciples. See for instance the ancient mosaics of the church of SS. Cosmas and Damian (Ciampani, l'et. Mon. II. tab. xvi.), and of S. Agatha alla Suburra at Rome (P. I. tab. lxxvii.). It is because of its whiteness that Origen (In Exodum, Hom. vii.) finds the manna to represent the word of truth. Angels are generally represented on ancient monuments in white robes, which typify, says Dionysius the Areopagite (De Hierarch. Coelest. c. 15), their resemblance to God. Saints too are clothed in white; for instance, on the triumphal arch of the basilica of S. Paolo f. l. m. are represented saints clothed in white robes laying their crowns at the foot of the Divine Throne (Cianry to the general was defended by the abbey of Luxeuil (20). John, abbat limited the number in his Life); and by the anonymous Leslie, by Beleta (Conte, iv. 14). The that, for mystical s should be either Martene, De Antiq.

ly one collect seems in each office; for cl. c. 22) says that it but at other assen- of the clergy present short prayer, an ex- the supposition kind was used. The e person of highest anction of the fifth t of Barcelona (A. D. ing, "episcopo prece- n [al. in ordines] of the Thebaid seem to each palm, or in sserted two or three a, De Vocibus, Ord. us of Braga (Regula, ne practice in Spain. c. 20) enjoined d with the lectures. njoins only that each e Lord's Prayer and what are elsewhere practice mentioned by of mingling collect psalms, and also con- n, was very probably e Benedictine order, distinctly in the Rule; rarely have departed co as that of inter- psalms, especially as Egyptian precedents: nts for the fact that dinctive psalters a colestimony (De Sac. h century there was a regard to the manner e monks threw them- r immediately after the; others said a short t adoration. Duris, with expanded hanks. Braga (Regula, c. 3), is, that all kneed from says the Agria Elocos lect. The collect were the principle mentione brother who preside e Antiq. Eccl. Brevi. 1773.) [E. C. Hill.]

the collecting of alms or (l. From St. Leo the we learn that such a s made on a Sunday, pinii, Vet. Mon. i. 231). The same circumstance may be noted in the mosaics of the church of St. Vitalis at Ravenna, and elsewhere.

White, sometimes striped with purple [CLAYUS], was the almost invariable colour of ministerial vestments for all ranks of the ministry in the early ages of Christianity (Marriott, Vestiarium Christ. p. xxii), as it is still for the alb, the amice, and the surplice.

White, the symbol of purity, was worn by the newly baptized during the eight days which followed their baptism.

It appears also from the evidence both of literature and art that the dead were shrouded in white linen. In a fragment of ancient glass figured by Buonarrotti (Vetri, tav. vii. fig. 1) the grave-clothes of Lazarus are of silver, while the rest of the figures are in gold; and in the Menologium of Basil the bodies of Adamus (Oct. 4) and Philaret (Dec. 2) are represented as wrapped in white. Prudentius (Cathemerinon, x. 57) and Sulpicius Severus (Vita S. Martini, c. 12) also allude to the white colour of grave-clothes.

(2) Red is the colour of ardent love. Hence the Lord in performing works of mercy is sometimes represented clad in a red tunic or pallium; and also in "sending fire upon earth" by the mission of the apostles (Ciampini, Vet. Mon. i. tabb. lxxvi. lxxvii.). Arculf (in Beale, Hist. Angl. v. 16) describes the "monument and sepulchre" of the Lord at Jerusalem as being white and reddish (rubicunda).

Angels are sometimes found on ancient monuments represented with red wings, whether as the symbol of love or of flame, according to one of the derivations of the word seraph. This is the case for instance in the vaults of St. Vitalis at Ravenna (Ciampini, Vet. Mon. ii. 65).

(3) Green, the colour of living vegetation, seems to have been adopted as a symbol of life, and hence is employed to denote the full abounding life of the angels. See Dionysius the Areopagite, De Hierarch. Coelest. xv. § 7. Hence, angels and saints are not unfrequently clothed in green, especially St. John the Evangelist. The Virgin Mary is also sometimes clothed in this colour. And the Lord Himself is occasionally represented in a green robe as symbolizing the life which is in Him.

(4) Violet, the mixture of red and black, has been thought to symbolize the union of love and pain in repentance. It symbolizes, at all events, something of sorrow; hence some monuments, as the mosaic of St. Michael at Ravenna (Ciampini, Vet. Mon. ii. p. 63, tav. xvii.) and that of St. Ambrose at Milan (Ferrari, S. Ambrogio, p. 156) represent the Man of Sorrows in a violet robe. The sorrowing mother of the Lord is also sometimes represented in violet, and St. John Baptist the preacher of repentance. Angels also wear violet when they call men to repentance, or share in the sorrows of the Lord.

Abbots of the order of St. Benedict wore violet up to modern times, when they adopted black. In ancient times virgins of recluse life wore violet veils (Jerome, Epist. 22, ad Eustochium).

Literature.—Portal, Des Couleurs symboliques dans l'Antiquité, Paris, 1837; Martigny, Dictionnaire Antiq. chrét. e. v. Couleurs. [C.]

COLUM. [STRAINER.]

COLUMBA. (1) Presbyter and confessor abbot of Iona († 598); is commemorated June 9 (Mart. Usuardi).

(2) Virgin, martyr upon Aurelian, Dec. 31 (Mart. Hieron., Beale, Rom. Vet., Usuardi). [C.]

COLUMBANUS, abbat, founder of many monasteries, deposition at Bobbio, Nov. 2 (Mart. Adonis, Usuardi). [C.]

COLUMBARIUM. This word can only find its place in a Dictionary of Christian Antiquities, in order that opportunity may be given to pronounce a decided opinion on the untenableness of the view propounded by Keyssler, and since revived by Mr. J. H. Parker and others, that this distinctively pagan arrangement, essentially belonging to the practice of burning the dead, which was held by the Christians in such abhorrence ("exerantur rogos et damnant ignium sepulturas," Minuc. Fel.), is ever found within the limits of, or in close connection with a Christian entombment. The misconception has arisen from the fact that the Christian excavators in carrying forward their subterranean galleries not unfrequently came into contact with the walls of a heathen columbarium. As soon as this unintentional interference with the sanctity of the tomb was discovered, the fossores proceeded to repair their error. The gallery was abruptly closed, and a wall was built at its end to shut it off from the columbarium. Padre Marchi describes his discovery of a gallery in the cemetery of St. Agnese closed in this way with a ruined wall, on the other side of which was a plundered columbarium (Monum. Primit. p. 61). This is probably the true explanation of the fact that a passage has been found connecting a large heathen tomb full of columbaria on the Via Appia, near the Porta San Sebastiano, with a catacomb. (Marchi, Monum. Primit. pp. 61 et.; Roestell, Beschreib. der Stadt Rom, pp. 389-390; Raoul-Rochette, Tableau des Catacombes, p. 283). [E. V.]

COLYMBION (κολύμβιον). A vessel used for containing HOLY WATER at the entrance of a church. A representation of such a vessel is found in one of the mosaics of S. Vitale at Ravenna, and is here engraved. It is noteworthy, that the ASPERGILLUM which hangs from the arch above the basin is in shape not unlike those of modern times. (Neale's Eastern Ch. introd. p. 215.) [C.]

COMES. [LECTIONARY.]

COMMEMORATION (Commemoratio). The word commemoration in its liturgical use designates—

(1) The recitation of the names of those for whom intercession is made in the mass (DUP. TYC.).

(2) The intrants or events commemorated in the mass, as the Virgin Mary for Peace (Martyr). (3) According to the Breviary (Rituale) the festival falls on the latter is commemorated in certain portions of the greater festival.

COMMENDATION. (1) A third Council of Carthage, that if a place in the afterlife, without the Calix Communis terms to be ordained, should be summed up into Calices, Commendationes. Similarly the second and the fourth of the version of the 41st Council of Carthage which is identical with the Calix is used as a term in this case. (2) But the word designate the prayer on behalf of the Calix by S. Hieron., Calix, designating "the prayers over the Calices." (3) Commendationes (Bouange's Gloss. S. Hieron. Thesaurus).

COMMENDATION. (1) The first trace of the word is to be found in the 10th century, it would seem, had come with letters κατακα from the absence of such with his attempts by reiterated self shows that the p. It was, indeed, the yet in its infancy it was exposed, against the false teaching doors. It is probable this kind had been Jews, and that they as a people through prison. Other instances are to be found in the mention of Apollo by the disciple to Titus (1 Timon, though somewhat of the same in itself so wide universal, and names and for many whole, it may be that in single practice.

tyer and confessor commemorated June 9

Aurelian, Dec. 31 (Feb., Usuardi). [C.] founder of many abbies, Nov. 2 (Mart. [C.]

his word can only find Christian Antiquities, may be given to prove the untenableness

Keyssler, and since never and others, that vengeance, essentially of burning the dead, persons in such abhorrent damnable ignominious never found within the nation with a Christian union has arisen from excavators in emery-galleries not in contact with the walls of

As soon as this union of the sanctity of the fossorial proceeded to gallery was abruptly cut at its end to shut down. Padre Marchi de gallery in the cemetery this way with a ruined which was a plundered primi, p. 61). This is a statement of the fact that of connecting a large dumberia on the Via an Sebastiani, with a primi, pp. 61 et seq.; Stadt Rom, pp. 389-400; Tableau des Catacombes, [E. V.] υιο). A vessel used the names of those for made in the mass [Ur-

COMMENDATIO

(2) The introduction of the names of certain saints or events in the Divine Office, called also memoria sanctorum or suffragia sanctorum. Such commemorations are generally of the Cross, of the Virgin Mary, of St. Peter and St. Paul, and for Peace (Maeri Hierodicon).

(3) According to the rubrics of the Roman Breviary (Rubricae Generales, ix.), when a greater festival falls on the day of a 'simple' festival, the latter is 'commemorated' by the introduction of certain portions of its proper service into the greater festival (l. c. ix. §§ 8-11). [C.]

COMMENDA. [DIOCESE: MONASTERY.]

COMMENDATIO (παράθεσις). 1. In the third Council of Carthage (c. 29) it is provided, that if a commendatio of the dead takes place in the afternoon, it must consist of prayers only, without the celebration of mass. In the Code Canonum Eccl. Afric. (c. 103) the set form to be ordinarily used in churches seem to be summed up under the heads, preces, praefationes, commendationes, manus impositiones. Similarly the second Council of Milevis (c. 12), and the fourth of Toledo (c. 13). In the Greek version of the 1st canon of the Code Eccl. Afric., which is identical with the 29th of the third Council of Carthage, quoted above, the word παράθεσις is used as equivalent to "commendatio;" which in this case is no doubt to be interpreted "of the commendation of the dead to the mercy of God." See Zonaras on this canon (p. 429), and Balsamon (p. 650).

2. But the word παράθεσις is also used to designate the prayers made in the congregation on behalf of the catechumens. Alexius Aristenus (quoted by Sacer, s. v.) explains the word παράθεσις, designating a part of divine service, as "the prayers over the catechumens, whereby we commend them (παράθεμεθα) to the Lord." (Duacange's Glossary, s. v. 'Commendationes'; Sacer's Theaurus, s. v. παράθεσις.) [C.]

COMMENDATORY LETTERS. The earliest trace of the practice connected with these words is to be found in 2 Cor. iii. 1. St. Paul, it would seem, had been taunted by rivals who came with letters of commendation (ἐπιστολάς ἐπιστολάς) from the Church of Jerusalem, with the absence of such credentials in his own case, with his attempts to make up for the omission by reiterated self-commendation. The passage shows that the practice was already common. It was, indeed, the natural protection of a society yet in its infancy against the dangers to which it was exposed, against the tricks of impostors, the false teaching of heretics, the vices of evildoers. It is probable enough that letters of this kind had been in previous use among the Jews, and that they thus maintained their unity as a people through all the lands of the dispersion. Other instances of it in the Apostolic ages are to be found in the letter given to Apollas by the disciples at Ephesus (Acts xviii. 27), in the mention of Zenas and Apollas in the Epistle to Titus (iii. 13). The letter to Philimon, though more distinctly personal, has somewhat of the same character. The practice was in itself so wise and salutary that it became universal, and was applied under many names and for many different purposes. As a whole, it may be said, without exaggeration, that a single practice of the early Christian

COMMENDATORY LETTERS 407

Church tended so much as this to impress on it the stamp of unity and organization.

The bishop of any congregation, in any part of the empire, might commend a traveller, layman or cleric, to the good offices of any other. The precautions against imposture might sometimes, as in the well-known instance of Perigrinus (Lucian, de Morte Peregrini), perhaps also in that of the παρ τραπεζῶν ψυδδῆλαφοι of Gal. ii. 4, be insufficient, but as a rule it did its work, and served as a bond of union between all Christian Churches. Wherever the Christian traveller went, if he were provided with these letters, he found the "communicatio pacis," the "contessentio hospitalitatis" (Tertull. de Praescript. Haeretic. c. 20). Those outside the Church's pale, however arrogant might be their claims, could boast of no such proof of their oneness. They were cut off from what was in the most literal sense of the term the "communion of saints" (Ibid. c. 32). It was the crowning argument of Augustine (1. pist. xlv. 3) and Optatus (De Schism. Donat. ii. 3) against the Donatists that their letters would not be received in any churches but their own; that they were therefore a sect with no claim to catholicity, no element of permanence. It was, in like manner, but a necessary sequel to the deposition of Paul of Samosata by the so-called Second Council of Antioch, when the bishops who passed sentence on him wrote to Dionysius of Rome and Maximus of Alexandria (Euseb. H. E. vii. 30), requesting them not to address their letters to him, but to Domnus, whom they had appointed in his place. The letters of Cyrrina on the election of Cornelius (Epist. xlv.) and to Stephen (Epist. lxxvii.) are examples of the same kind. The most remarkable testimony, however, to the extent and the usefulness of the practice is found in the wish of Julian to reorganise heathen society on the same plan, and to provide, in this way, shelter and food for any non-Christian traveller who might be journeying to a strange city (Sozomen. H. E. v. 16).

It was natural, as the Church became wealthier and more worldly, as the restrictive side of the practice should become the more prominent; that it should be, what the passport system has been in the intercourse of modern Europe, a check on the free movement of clergy, or monks, or laymen. Thus it was made penal (and the penalty was excommunication) for any one to receive either cleric or layman who came to a city not his own without these letters (1. can. Apost. c. 12). Those who brought them were even then subject to a scrutiny, with the alternative of being received into full fellowship if it were satisfactory, or, if it were otherwise, of having to be content with some immediate relief (Ibid. c. 33).^a So the Council of Elvira (c. 25) seeks to maintain the episcopal prerogative in this matter, and will not allow litterae confessoriae (letters certifying that the bearer was one who had suffered in persecution) to take the place of the regular litterae communicatoriae. It would appear, from one clause in the canon, that the abuse had spread so far that the "confessor's" passport was handed from one to another without even the insertion of the name, as a cheque payable to bearer. The same practice is condemned by the first Council of Arles (c. 8). That of Elvira denounces also the writing of such letters (the "pacificae") by the wives of presbyters or bishops. The prevalence of this abuse may perhaps explain the zeal of that synod against the marriage of the clergy. The Council of Chalcedon (c. 13) renewed the prohibition of the Apostolic canon against allowing any strange cleric, even as reader, to officiate in another city without the ουστατικὸν γράμμα from his own bishop. That of Antioch (A.D. 341) forbids any strangers to be received without ἐκ. εἰρημικὰ, forbids presbyters to give the ἐκ. κανονικὰ, does not allow even Chorepiscopi to give more than the εἰρημικὰ. That of Arles (c. 7) places those who have received the litterae communicatoriae under the surveillance of the bishop of the city to which they go, with the provision that they are to be excommunicated if they begin "agere contra disciplinam," and adds, extending the precaution to political offences, or to the introduction of a democratic element into the government of the Church, "similiter de his qui republicanam agere volunt." The system spread its ramifications over all provinces (1 C. Carth. c. 7; C. Apath. c. 52). It was impossible for the presbyter who had incurred the displeasure of his bishop to find employment in any other diocese. Without any formal denunciation the absence of the commendatory letter made him a marked man. The unity of the Church became a terrible reality to him.

^a The canon ends with a warning, significant enough of the nature or frequency of the abuses to which the practice had given rise. (Εἰς κοινότητα ἀδελφῶν μὴ προσδέξασθε, πᾶσι γὰρ κατὰ συναγωγῆν γίνεται.)

^b A more received rendering of the word is that the letters were given as a "libellum pacis" to the "lapsed" or others, by a "confessor," who thus usurped the prerogative of the bishop.

It will have been noticed that other terms besides the original ουστατικὰ (commendatitiae, or commendatoriae) appear as applied to these letters, and it may be well to register the use and significance of each.

1. The old term was still retained, as in the C. of Chalcedon, where the prominent purpose was to commend the bearer of the letter, whether cleric or layman, to the favour and good offices of another bishop.

2. The same letters were also known as καρπορικὰ, "in accordance with the rule of the Church." This is the word used in the letter from the Synod of Antioch, already quoted, by the Councils of Antioch (c. 8) and Laodicea (c. 41). The Latin equivalent seems to have been the litterae formatae,³ i.e. drawn up after a known and prescribed form, so as to be a safeguard against imposture. It was stated at the Council of Chalcedon by Attiens, Bishop of Constantinople, that it was agreed by such letter should be marked with the letters Π. Τ. Α. Π., in honour of the three Persons of the Trinity. In the West the signature or seal (τίμος) of the bishop was probably the guarantee of genuineness.

³ The word "formata" occurs in the Acts of the Synod of Milevis (c. 20).

⁴ The statement rests on the somewhat questionable authority of the pseudo-fathers; but the form is found in German documents of the 9th century. (Herzog, s. v. litterae formatae.)

ness. The first mention of the use of a sealing occurs, it is believed, in Augustine (Epist. 59; al. 217*).

3. From the use of the letters as admitting clergy or laymen to communion they were known as κοινωνικὰ, and are so described by Cyril of Alexandria (Act. Ephes. p. 282). The corresponding Latin, communicatorie, appears in the Council of Elvira (c. 25), Augustine (Epist. 43; al. 162).

4. The ἐπιστολὰ εἰρημικὰ appear to be distinguished from the ουστατικὰ as commending the bearer for eleemosynary aid. They are to be given to the poor and those who need help, clerics or laymen (C. Chalc. c. 11), especially, according to the Greek canonists (Zonaras ad Can. II. C. Chalced.), to those who had suffered oppression at the hands of civil magistrates. The word is used also by the Council of Antioch (c. 7, 8), already quoted as applied to letters which might be given by presbyters as well as bishops.

5. There were the ἐπιστ. ἀπολογικὰ, the "letters dismissory" of modern times. The word is of later use than the others, and occurs first in the Council in Trullo (c. 17), in a context which justifies the distinction drawn by Suicer (s. v. ἀπολογικὴ), that it was used in reference to a permanent settlement of the bearer, the ουστατικὴ, when the sojourn in another diocese was only temporary. [E. H. P.]

COMMERCE. It would be difficult to find in either the Old or the New Testament any passage in disparagement of trade, whether combined or not with a handicraft, in the Old Testament, if the calling of Bezaleel and Aholiab puts the highest honour on the skill of the artisan, the ordinary processes of trade are no less sanctified by connecting them with God Himself and His law in such passages as those of Lev. xix. 35-6; Deut. xxv. 13-15; Prov. xl. 1, xvi. 10, 23, xxxi. 24; Mich. vi. 11. Nor is it amiss to observe that the Jewish custom which prevails to this day, of bringing up every boy without exception to a business, trade or handicraft, appears to be an immemorial one, and may serve to explain both the calling by our Lord of fishermen-apostles, His own training as a handicraftsman (Mark vi. 3), and the tent-making of Paul, Aquila, and Priscilla (Acts xviii. 3). No incompatibility, therefore, between the exercise of a trade and the Christian calling, whether as a layman or as a member of the clergy, can be coeval with the Church, and all legislation to this effect must belong to what may be termed the secondary, not the primary, era of its development. It must, moreover, be observed that the places in which the Gospel seems to have preferably taken root were busy commercial cities, such as Antioch, Corinth, Ephesus; and it is a remarkable fact that the age in which Christianity first forced itself on the notice of the Pagan world, and was honoured with imperial persecution, the time of Nero, was also one of great commercial activity, as may be seen from the account, chiefly derived from Pliny, of the new trades and inventions introduced under Nero, contained in the "Anecdota de Nerone" annexed to Naudet's Lucius, vol. v. p. 181 and foll. (Paris, 1820).

* See the different meanings in Ducange, s. v. Formatae.

That trade un- upon as an occu- from the fact th- and Valentinian jewellers, dealer- caries, and other- practical offic- honour and oth- cleared of the- ingusmodi sig- i. 12). Traders- politan bankers) militia by a cons- t. xxv). This- under the Rom- ertly military s- referred to exp- militia (armata forbidden to all- politan bankers- village bankers- conversely were- 458) forbidden t- and a constitu- foral men of n- or hereditary w- nicious to towns- transactions in t- between plebeian- iiii. l. 3).

As respects t- crafts (it is alw- two in the low- them differed o- situation of the E- l. 5; A.D. 329)- belonging to th- brought back, if- they reside. Ar- official functions- able condition- have been a bo- passim). They t- from which they- presenting fit s- their obligations- the constitution- has not been s- beyond its origi- in an almost lo- status is express- enough, the swin- ing on a restles- Roman people, w- solditaries (t. x- devoted to iron-w- to be marked in- an hereditary cus- offices of every- engage in agricu- (l. 7). Yet being e- obligations (l. 6)- troops (bk. xii. t- is termed a mil t- one, since the ad- special care (bk- by deed, before th- other high offic- that he was nei- a curial, that by- and had no oblig- manufacture of a-

That trade under the later emperors was looked upon as an occupation of inferior dignity is visible from the fact that a constitution of Theodosius and Valentinian (A. D. 440) required all bankers, jewellers, dealers in silver or clothing, apothecaries, and other traffickers to be removed from provincial offices, "in order that every place of honour and official service (militia) should be cleared of the like contagion" (a contagione hujusmodi segregaretur; Code, bk. xii. t. lviii. l. 12). Traders generally (except the metropolitan bankers) were again excluded from the militia by a constitution of Justin (Code, bk. xii. t. lxxv.). This word in itself must no longer, as under the Republic, be deemed to imply necessarily military service, since the constitution last referred to expressly distinguishes the armed militia (armata militia), admission to which is forbidden to all traders alike, whilst the metropolitan bankers (argentarii structores) are by privilege permitted to enter any other. Soldiers coarsely were by a constitution of Leo (A. D. 453) forbidden to trade (bk. xii. t. xxxvi. l. 15); and a constitution of Honorius and Theodosius forbade men of noble birth, conspicuous dignity, or hereditary wealth, to exercise a trade "pertaining to towns, in order to facilitate mercantile transactions in the way of buying and selling, between plebeians and tradesmen" (bk. iv. t. liii. l. 3).

As respects the smaller trades and handicrafts (it is always difficult to distinguish the two in the lower social strata) the exercise of them differed often little from slavery. A constitution of the Emperor Constantine (bk. vi. t. i. l. 5; A. D. 329) speaks of freedmen-artificers belonging to the state, and desires them to be brought back, if enticed out of the city where they reside. Artificers were exempted from all official functions, which, considering the miserable condition of the curiales, must rather have been a boon to them (bk. x. t. lxxiv. and passim). They formed collegia (see COLLEGIATA), from which they could not withdraw without presenting fit substitutes ready to accept all their obligations (l. 15). The bakers—if indeed the constitution of Leo which refers to them has not been stretched by its present title beyond its original intent—seem to have been in an almost lower condition still, since their status is expressly treated as servile. Curiously enough, the swineherds of the capitals, as carrying on a restless labour for the benefit of the Roman people, were specially exempted from all publica officia (t. xvi. l. 1). A special title (ix.) is devoted to iron-workers (fabricenses), who were to be marked in the arm, and who formed also an hereditary caste, mutually responsible for the offences of every member (l. 5), and forbidden to engage in agriculture or any other occupation (l. 7). Yet being exempted from all civil and curial obligations (l. 6), and from giving quarters to troops (bk. xii. t. lxi. l. 4), their condition (which is termed a militia) seems to have been a coveted one, since the admission to it is regulated with especial care (bk. xi. t. ix. l. 4). It was to be by deed, before the moderator of the province or other high officer. The candidate had to show that he was neither the son nor grandson of a curial, that he owed no dues to the city, and had no obligations towards a citizen. The manufacture of arms was also by the 85th novel limited to the official "armifectores," or "to those who are called fabricenses" (quere, fabricenses).

Whole branches of trade, as we now understand the term, did not exist. Instead of a trade in corn, the transport of corn to the capitals was a service attached to land (onus rei publice). Thus when Augustine was offered the estate of one Bonifacius, he declined it, because he would not have the Church of Christ a "navicularia," and so incur the risk, in the event of a ship being lost, of having to consent to the torture of the men on board, as part of the investigation (Aug. Serm. 355).

In the interior of the empire, trade was not only restricted by monopolies which under Justinian were carried to a cruel height (see Gibbon, c. xl.), and of which Dean Milman observes that the state monopoly "even of corn, wine, and oil was in force at the time of the first crusade," but by the reservation of various articles for imperial use. Thus the wearing of gold and silver tissue or embroidery was forbidden to private persons, nor could such tissue or embroidery be woven or worked except in the imperial gynæceæ (bk. xl. t. viii. ll. 1, 2, 4). The use of the dye of the "holy murex," or any imitation of its purple, was equally forbidden (Id. ll. 3, 4, 5). The employment of gems (among which pearls, emeralds, and jacinths were forbidden to be used in horse-trappings) was also regulated, as savouring of the imperial dignity (Id. t. xi.). The 85th novel forbade even all sale of arms to private persons.

Buying and selling seems to have been in great measure carried on at fairs and in markets, the holding of which was by imperial grant forfeitable by ten years' non-user (Dig. bk. l. t. xi. De Auctu, l. 1), and the dealing at which was invested with certain privileges (Code, bk. iv. t. lx.). Fairs, it may be observed, were often held on saints' days, though St. Basil in his Liber Regularum condemns the practice; thus there was a fair in Lucania on the birth-day of St. Cyprian, a 30-days' fair free of toll in Edessa at the feast of St. Thomas the Apostle, &c. (Muratori, Antiquitates Medii Aevi, vol. ii. Diss. 30).

Notwithstanding the low estimation in which trade was held, it seems clear that until Justinian's time at least it was not held civilly incompatible with the clerical office. The Philosophum unicum of Hippolytus (beginning of the 3rd century) show us the future pope Callistus set up by Carpophorus as a banker, holding his bank in the "Piscina Publica," and receiving deposits from widows and brethren (ix. 12). A law of Constantine and Julian indeed, A. D. 357 (Code, bk. i. t. ii. l. 2, which exempted the clergy from "prestations" levied from merchants), sought to compel trader-clerics (amongst others) to devote their gains to charitable uses: "If by saving, or forethought, or honourable trading they have got money together, it should be ministered for the use of the poor and needy." The next passage indicates a custom still more strange to us—that of workshops and even taverns being kept for the benefit of the Church: "Or that which may have been acquired and collected from their workshops or taverns, let them deem it when collected the gain of religion;" and the privileges of the clergy are mostly extended to their men who are occupied in trade (Id.) Another law of the same emperor, A.D. 361, which however does not seem to have been retained in his Code by Justinian (Col. Theod., bk. xvi. t. li. l. 15), exempted clerics from "sordid offices," as well as from the imposition of the colatio, "if any very small trade they acquire to themselves poor food and clothing," but others, whose names are on the register of merchants, at the time when the colatio takes place, "must acknowledge the duties and payments of merchants." We see thus that trader-clerics were of all degrees, from the humblest trallickers to considerable merchants.

The 43rd Novel "De officiis sive tabulari Constantinopolitane urbis," &c., and the 59th, "De debita impedimentis in exquilis defactorum," indicate to us the extent of the trade which was carried on in the Eastern capital on behalf of the Church, and the singular character of a portion of it. In consideration of the cathedral church undertaking what in modern French parlance would be termed the "Pompes Funèbres" of the city, Constantine granted to it 980 ergasteria or workshops, of the various trade ("ex diversis corporibus") of the city, to be held free of all tax; Anastasius added 150 more (Preface to Nov. 59). The total number of these cathedral ergasteria or officine, as the 43rd novel terms them, seems from the preface to the latter to have practically sunk to 1100 (perhaps by failure of trade, see nov. 59, c. ii., which says that even of the reduced number "plurima cœderunt"), at which figure it is fixed by both novels, the earlier one being grounded on the complaints of the collegiti—say the guilds of the city—that the number of tax-free establishments was ruining them. But all other officine of the 14 wards ("regiones") of the city, whether belonging to any church, hospital, monastery, orphan-home, poor-house, or to any other person, were required to bear all public impositions. And in speaking of these officine the word taverna occurs, not only as above-shown in the title, but in the body of the law (c. l. § 3). Strange therefore as may seem to us the idea of a church or cathedral bakery or pothouse, it is clear that in the 6th century a very considerable amount of trade, including the liquor-traffic, was carried on on behalf of the Church and its charitable establishments in the capital of the Eastern empire.

If we turn from the Roman to the barbarian world, the barbarian codes till the time of Charlemagne scarcely contain an allusion to trade, except, perhaps, in reference to loans, pledges, or debts—see for instance the Wisigothic laws, bk. v. tt. 5, 6. Under the rule of the Ostrogoths in Italy, the Formulary of Cassiodorus indicates that the armourers were still considered as a militia ("militibus et et fabris armorum . . . præfecimus," pt. ii. c. 18, "de armorum factoribus"). Under the Lombards, a law of Notharis (A.D. 638 or 641) refers to the building trade in dealing with accidents among mansons, and uses a term (magistri Comacini) which shows that this class of workmen were then drawn mainly from the same locality (the neighbourhood of Como), which mainly furnishes them still to Northern Italy (c. 144, and foll.; and see c. 152, as to accidents among other workmen). Somewhat later again, the growth of trade and industry under the Lombards is indicated by a singular law of Luitprand (bk. lii. c. 4, A.D. 717), enacting that if any man leave his wife for trade or for the exercise of an art, and do not return after three years, his wife may apply to the king for leave to re-marry. Foreign trade is referred to by the Wisigothic code (bk. xi. t. 3) in a law "on traders from beyond the sea," which enacts that if such traders have a matter between themselves, none of the king's household shall presume to hear them, but let them be heard according to their own laws only by their toll-takers ("apud telonarios suos").

The legislation of the Church bears much more on commercial matters than that of the barbarian kingdoms, and we have now to consider its history.

One form of trade, it may be observed, was always forbidden by the church, that of earning a livelihood by usury. [See USURY.] In other respects it was long before trade was deemed by the Church itself incompatible with clerical functions; though the fathers might inveigh against it as a form of worldliness; as when Cyprian in his work De lapsis, written about A.D. 251, speaks of those who "watch like fowls for gainful markets." (Comp. Ep. 15.) The growth of some general feeling on the subject is, however, to be traced in the 18th canon of the Council of Elitheris, A.D. 305, by which bishops, priests, and deacons are forbidden to depart from their places for the sake of trade, or to go round the provinces seeking lucrative markets. To obtain their livelihood they may indeed send a son, a freedman, an agent (mercatorium), a friend, or anyone else; and if they wish to trade, let them trade within the province—the main object of the canon being clearly to preserve to their flocks the benefits of their ministrations, not to put dishonour on trading itself.

A collection of decrees of very doubtful authority, attributed to the Nicene Council, which will be found in Labbe's and Mansi's Councils, vol. ii. p. 1029, and foll. under the title: "Sanctiones et decreta alia ex quatuor regularum ad Constantinum libris decripta," contains amongst its "statutes for priests" (c. 14) a provision that the priest shall not be a barber, a surgeon, or a worker in iron (fermentarius), the two former prohibitions turning probably on blood-letting in its most literal form, the latter on the providing instruments for blood-let. The 4th Council of Carthage, 397, forbids clerics to go to markets, except to buy, under pain of degradation (c. 48), but at the same time enacts that "a cleric, however learned in the word of God, shall seek his livelihood by means of a handicraft, artificio" (c. 51), that "a cleric shall provide for himself food and clothing by a handicraft or by agriculture, without detriment to his office" (c. 52), and that "all clerics who have strength to work should learn both handicrafts (artificio) and letters" (c. 53); provisions all nearly equivalent and which confirm the opinion that the canons of this and other Carthaginian Councils represent rather the whole collection of rules by which the African church was governed at their respective dates than specific enactments of those dates. This, appear, indeed, to indicate that, at all events in this quarter of the church, a distinction was being taken between trade and handicraft, and that the exercise of the former by clerics was restricted.

By the time of 451 the laws became "empirical" more sharp speaks of clerical secular business, a prohibition which shape of trade, but considered, since expressly named canons force of law A.D. 531 (bk. l. l. 1) has been seen about clerical trading at church.

In the west, however, against clerical manager; a letter 452) to the bishop of his having heard many clerics there able business and to obtain from under device or desire of from the fulfillment sions which, in the the subject, we may generally. The Council enacts that "whoso him not be careful, degraded him be receive it back intended to sell at traffic, if the actual let him receive increase (c. 3)—a p of usury. The 3rd in like manner, for deacons upwards to traders, or to carry another's name (c. 15). Mansi's Councils, vol. i. p. 610, and foll. under the title: "Sanctiones et decreta alia ex quatuor regularum ad Constantinum libris decripta," contains amongst its "statutes for priests" (c. 14) a provision that the priest shall not be a barber, a surgeon, or a worker in iron (fermentarius), the two former prohibitions turning probably on blood-letting in its most literal form, the latter on the providing instruments for blood-let. The 4th Council of Carthage, 397, forbids clerics to go to markets, except to buy, under pain of degradation (c. 48), but at the same time enacts that "a cleric, however learned in the word of God, shall seek his livelihood by means of a handicraft, artificio" (c. 51), that "a cleric shall provide for himself food and clothing by a handicraft or by agriculture, without detriment to his office" (c. 52), and that "all clerics who have strength to work should learn both handicrafts (artificio) and letters" (c. 53); provisions all nearly equivalent and which confirm the opinion that the canons of this and other Carthaginian Councils represent rather the whole collection of rules by which the African church was governed at their respective dates than specific enactments of those dates. This, appear, indeed, to indicate that, at all events in this quarter of the church, a distinction was being taken between trade and handicraft, and that the exercise of the former by

That the enactment longer satisfied the church may be justified by the fact that, in the 10th century, the 3rd Council of Carthage contains a prohibition to be occupied "in a those for which they A canon of the Council of Auxerre, A.D. 578, in fixing measures, may a

The capitularies not always, invested church), deal respectively. The ecclesiastical enacts that measure just, "whether in a series, whether for ceasing" (c. 73, and added to the Salic Law of the 6th Council of Tours, A.D. 584, and to the 3rd Council of Tours, A.D. 597, and to the Capitulary of 794 is to fix the prices of v re his wife for art, and do not if may apply to Foreign trade is sole (bk. xi. c. 3) beyond the sea," kings have a matter king's household but let them be as only by their os").

hears much more of the know to consider be observed, was, that of earning [stuy.] In other he was deemed by sole with clerics might through illness; as when illness, written about watch like fowler- p. Ep. 15.) The ing on the subject the 18th canon of n. 2065, by which are forbidden to be sake of trade, or seeking lucrative wellto do they may an agent (me- celse; and if they le within the pro- caning clearly be benefits of their shonour on trading very doubtful au- ne Council, which lant's Councils, vol. title: "Sanctions regularum ad Con- contains amongst (c. 14) a provision a barber, a surgeon. (mod-rius), the two probably on blood- in, the latter on the bloodshed. The 4th bids clerics to go to order pain of degrada- time enacts that in the word of God, y means of a handi- that "a cleric shall and clothing by a dence, without detri- and that "all clerics ck should learn both and letters" (c. 53); which con- and canons of this and es represent rather rules by which the ad at their respective ments of those dates. indicate that, at all the church, a distinc- green trade and handi- of the former by clerics was restrained, whilst the latter was enjoined.

By the time of the Council of Chalcedon (A.D. 453) the line between "secular" and "religious" employments appears to have become much more sharply marked. The 3rd canon speaks of clerics who for filthy lucre carry on secular business, and forbids them to do so,—a prohibition which would seem to include every shape of trade, but which cannot have been so considered, since the Council of Chalcedon is expressly named as one of the four to whose canons force of law is given by Justinian's Code, A.D. 529 (bk. i. l. i. c. 7, § 4), which yet, as has been seen above, expressly recognises both clerical trading and trading on behalf of the church.

In the west, however, it seems clear that the feeling against clerical trading became always stronger; a letter (ix.) of Pope Gelasius I. (A.D. 492-4) to the bishops of Lucania speaks (c. 15) of his having heard from Picenna that very many clerics there are occupied with dishonourable business and filthy lucre, and exhort them to abstain from unworthy gain, and from every device or desire of business of any kind, or else from the fulfilment of clerical functions—expressions which, in the light of altered feeling on the subject, we may also take to apply to trade generally. The Council of Tarragona (A.D. 516) enacts that "whosoever will be in the clergy, let him not be careful to buy too cheap or sell too dear, or let him be removed from the clergy" (c. 2). If a cleric lends a soldus in time of need, in order to receive it back in wine or wheat which it is intended to sell at a fixed time for the sake of traffic, if the actual thing be not needed by him, let him receive what he gave without any increase (c. 3)—a prohibition both of trade and of usury. The 3rd Council of Orleans, A.D. 538, in like manner, forbids clerics from the rank of deacons upwards to carry on business like public traders, or to carry on a forbidden business under another's name (c. 27). In spite of these enactments, we find in the letters of Gregory, the Great (A.D. 590-604) mention made of a ship-building bishop in Campania (see Labbé and Blass's Councils, vol. x. p. 559).

That the enactments of the African Councils no longer satisfied the temper even of the English church may be judged from the Excerpta of Egbert, archbishop of York (latter half of 8th century), the 3rd book of which (2nd series) contains a prohibition to priests and deacons to be occupied "in any worldly affairs," except those for which they are assigned (intituti, c. 8). A canon of the Council of Calchyth (that is, Chalcheth), A.D. 787, in favour of honesty in weights and measures, may also be quoted (c. 17).

The capitularies of Charlemagne (mostly, if not always, invested with the sanction of the church), deal repeatedly with the subject of trade. The ecclesiastical capitulary of 789 enacts that measures and weights be equal and just, "whether in cities or whether in monasteries, whether for giving or whether for receiving" (c. 71, and see the "Capitula minora" added to the Salic law, A.D. 803, c. viii.; Canon 15 of the 6th Council of Arles; and c. 45 of the 3rd Council of Tours, same year). The Frankfort Capitulary of 794 is one of several which attempt to fix the prices of victuals (c. 4; Capitulary of Noyon, A.D. 808, c. 5). The pitch of actual cruelty is reached in the "Capitula de duabus," where every Jew is forbidden to have money in his house, to sell wine, victuals, or any other thing, under pain of confiscation of all his goods and imprisonment till he come into the imperial presence (c. 3). The utter absence of all notion of a possible right to freedom in trading is well expressed in one of the Capitula published by the imperial missi, A.D. 803: "That no man presume to sell or buy or measure otherwise than as the lord emperor has commanded" (c. 10).

Markets are not to be held on the Lord's Day (Excerpts from the Canons, added to the Capitulary of Aix-la-Chapelle of A.D. 813, c. 15, and see General Collection, bk. i. c. 139; 6th Council of Arles, A.D. 813, c. 16; 3rd Council of Tours, A.D. 813, c. 40), except where they have been held of old and lawfully (Capitulary of Aix-la-Chapelle of 809, c. 9); a Lombard Capitulary of 779 seems however to enact generally that "markets are nowhere to be held except where they have been held of old lawfully" (c. 52, taking no notice of the Sunday). Forfeiture for exactness' sake is forbidden (Capitulary of Aix-la-Chapelle of 809, c. 12). The Council of Friuli, A.D. 791, even forbids generally the carrying on of secular business to an immoderate extent.

Presbyters were by one capitulary forbidden to trade, or gather riches in anywise by filthy lucre (Capitula presbyterorum, A.D. 806). On the other hand the Council of Mayence, A.D. 813, more guardedly forbids clerics and monks to have unjust weights or measures, or to carry on an unjust trade; "nevertheless a just trade is not to be forbidden, on account of divers necessities—for we read that the holy apostles traded" (negotiatos esse),—the rule of St. Benedict being referred to as a further authority (c. 14, see Ad-ditio 3ta, c. 46). Trade was, however, forbidden to penitents, "because it is difficult that between the dealing of seller and buyer sin should not intervene" (General Collection, bk. vii. c. 62; perhaps of later date).

The exact meaning of some of the later texts above referred to is rendered somewhat doubtful through the gradual narrowing of the term negotium and its derivatives, from the sense of business in its widest meaning to the specific one of trade, as in its modern French offspring le négoce, négoceant. They sufficiently show, however, that whilst the avocations of the early apostles were still remembered, and the rule of St. Benedict had raised the dignity of labour itself, the growing Judaistic distinction between "secular" and "religious" acts and matters, so foreign to the spirit of a faith which is founded on the abrogation of all distinctions except those between good and evil, light and darkness, life and death, in which the recognition that in meats "there is nothing unclean of itself," but "all things indeed are pure" (Rom. xiv. 14, 20), that "every creature of God is good, and nothing to be refused, if it be received with thanksgiving" (1 Tim. iv. 4), was only the type of the breaking down of "the middle wall of partition" between Jews and Gentiles (Eph. ii. 14; Acts x. 10-15, 28), had by the 9th century begun to render the very idea of trade incompatible with the clerical calling, not so much as in early

It is so called, be-pointed to be sung the people, and was verse of a psalm,
the priest gave the in the communion of Rom. iii. 18). "De-terium cum Antiphona
nona nomen mutavit, nus est cum Gloria Horal. de Eccl. Obser.
Communio was looked naking giving, to be said varies with the day. e Nat. Dom. is: "In utero ante luciferum

Mozarabic missal sung
-ommunion has taken o forms; one used in the rest of the year, corpore et sanguine te Alit. All." (H. J. H.)

Y. The present article e of what in England ommunion in Office or Ser-of that portion of it tes to the distribution ecrated elements in the ων μυστηρίων κενώσια ον ανάγειν ο κενώ-α (Dionysius Areop.); εύχαριστίας, μυστημεταλαβείας. The verb

ately to describe particu-(Basil., Chrysostom). stantive descriptive of στικῆς κενώσιν θείας έχειν εύχαριστίας (Cone. εταλαβείας, absolutely a substantive, as αγρίν (Philostorg), του Διο-άματος μεταλαβάνω

atōs; they who partake ments are said com-municant. IV. Conc. Tolet. c. 18). plied in the use of these Isidore of Pelusium (Ep. is conjunctionem cum les i ipsius consortes ac participias (in Ducauge, s. v. ommunio dicitur spiritualis e ad vitificandas animas a gnitas." Other terms are at Sanguinis participatio, used to designate the act ) or the chalice into the sacrament, the act of eating of or the wine.

ence is also used actively, to presenting the consecrated following with the cup are vine Domini ius, or conspicere ommunicant populum; post ant; "subdicendo regioat populum" (11. do Rom. I. is used no doubt to signify perfecting of the act of com-
c. 19).

GENERAL ACCOUNT OF HOLY COMMUNION.

The earliest extant description of Holy Communion is the well-known passage of Justin Martyr (Apol. I. c. 65), already quoted under CANON (p. 267). No description is here given of posture or gesture, whether of ministrants or recipients, or of any words accompanying administration; Justin tells us only that after the εύχαριστία "those whom we call deacons give to each of those present to partake of the bread and of the wine and water over which thanks have been given" (του εύχαριστηθέντος άρτου και οίνου και ύδατος), and carry away to those who are not present." He repeats substantially the same account in c. 67, using the words λαβείας and μετάληψις for distribution and reception.

From Tertullian we learn that in the African Church of the 2nd century the Eucharist was administered to all who were present; for he recommends (De Oratione, c. 14) those who hesitated to be present at the celebration on stationary days [STATIO] for fear of breaking their fast, to be present indeed, but to reserve the portion which they received. This applies to the Bread only; it was consecrated bread, which some were in the habit of putting to their lips before an ordinary meal (Ad Uxorem, li. 5). The Eucharist was received, not at the usual meal-time, as the Lord's command seemed to require (et in tempore victus et omnibus mandatum a Domino), but in assemblies before dawn and from no other hands than those of the presidents (presidentium); it was given into the hands; for Tertullian laments the impurity of those idol-makers who—whether as clerics or laics touched the Lord's Body with hands so contaminated (De Idol. c. 7); and Christians felt an anxious dread lest any portion of the bread or the wine should fall to the ground (De Corin., c. 3), for the Holy Communion was administered, ordinarily at least, under both kinds. Tertullian has also a probable allusion to the Amen of the recipient in response to the words of administration (De Spectac. c. 25).

From Cyrilian we learn (besides much as to the worthiness of communicants) that the deacon presented the cup after consecration to those who were present, probably in a certain order (De Lapsis, c. 25); the bread was received into the right hand (Ep. 58, c. 9, Hartel), and was not unfrequently carried home in a casket (De Lapsis, c. 26). Compare ARCA.

Clement of Alexandria (Strom. I. c. 1, p. 318 Potter), speaking of the necessity of men trying and examining themselves, illustrates his position by a reference to the Eucharist, "in distributing which according to custom some permit each several person in the congregation to take his portion." There is no reason for supposing (Probst, Lit. der Drei Ersten Jahrhundte) that these vires were schismatics; and the passage seems to imply that there were churches where the ministers, in distributing the elements, permitted all who were present to partake if they

* This is the translation usually given of εύχαριστήθεως (see Alzog's Patrologie, p. 71): but it may perhaps be interpreted "the bread presented as a thank-offering" (See EUCHARIST.)

would; and other churches where they judged who among the congregation were or were not worthy.

The directions of the second book of the Apostolical Constitutions are as follows (c. 57, § 14):
"After the sacrifice has been made, let each rank (τάξις) severally partake of the Lord's Body and of the precious Blood, approaching in rank with reverence and godly fear as to the body of a king; and let the women draw near with veiled heads, as befits the rank of women.
And let the doors be watched, lest any unbelieving or uninitiated person enter." By "ranks" we are no doubt to understand the several orders of the clergy and ascetics, according to dignity, then laymen, then women.

The testimony of Origen (in Ezechiam, Hom. xl.
c. 7, p. 172; xiii. 3, 176) shews that, after the sermon the people drew nigh to the marriage-supper of the Lamb; that not the priest alone, but the faithful also who were present, received the Sacrament; and that they were careful that no particle of the consecrated elements should fall to the ground, receiving the Bread no doubt into their hands. His comment on Psalm xxxiii. [xxxiv.] 9, perhaps alludes to the use of Γείσασθε και τέρτε as an antiphon during communion.

Dionysius, bishop of Alexandria from 248-260 (in Euseb. H. E. vii. 9), mentions the principal ceremonies of communion, when he speaks of one who had long attended the Eucharistic Service, joined in responding Amen, stood by the Table, stretched forth his hand to receive the Holy Food and received it, had partaken of the Body and Blood of our Lord Jesus Christ.

Cyril of Jerusalem describes the manner of receiving in his time (c. A. D. 350) and country, thus (Catech. Myst. ij. v. 20-22):

After the SANCTA SANCTIS, "ye hear the voice of the chanter (του ψάλλοντος) with divine melody inviting you to partake of the holy mysteries, and saying, 'O taste and see how gracious the Lord is.' Permit not the bodily palate no, but faith unfeigned, to judge of these things; for they who taste are hidden to taste not of bread and wine, but of the cup (ἀρνιότητος) of the Body and Blood of Christ.
When you approach, then, draw near not with the wrists straight out nor with the fingers spread, but making the left hand a throne for the right, as for that which is to receive a king; and hollowing the palm, receive the Body of Christ, saying after reception the Amen. Then after carefully hollowing thine eyes by the touch of the Holy Body, partake of it (μεταλά-βανε), giving heed lest any portion of it fall aside and be lost; for whatsoever thou hast lost, by so much hast thou suffered damage of thine own members. . . Then, after communicating (κοινωνήσαι) of the Body, draw near also to the Cup (ποτήριον) of the Blood; not stretching forth thy hands, but bending, and with an air of adoration and reverence, saying the Amen, sanctify thyself partaking also of the Blood of Christ. Further, touching with thy hands the moisture remaining on thy lips, sanctify both thine eyes and thy forehead and the other organs of the senses (αἰσθητήρια). Then, while awaiting the prayer, give thanks unto God, who hath thought thee worthy of so great mysteries."

Holy Bread, says, Body of our Lord Christ is imparted to us of sins and life depend low, he prays," replacing the vessels the door of the sanctuary the actious presence place, is opened, the doorway elevates says: "Be it known desire to partake, the b from the hands of them, saying: 'The of the precious and ar Lord and Saviour us of his sins and life blessing, the priest and y Table, and rubrics ous observances with are carried to the ve will speak first of the CANON follow the breaking or FRACTIO in the AGNUS DEI was form of Papal Mass, a the Ordines V. and VI, en to the Pope's seat, the Pontiff awaited his folded hands; he bit ate on the paten, and e chalice held by the chalice he partook of a gold or silver pipe communicated, the arch-born of the altar (Ordo), and pours a little of e which had been used cup (scyphum) held by bishops approach to re- from the hands of the bysters in like manner ing to the Ord. R. H. r not to the Papal seat nunicate. The Ord. V. of communicating with presbyters also drawing from the bishop gives the and, and let them go to the altar and kiss it, and a manner after them let eate." The Ordo VI, that subdeacons are to their mouths, while the into their hands. ad ministered the Bread, ntered the Wine to the e poured the remainder of mind that the cup contains a bread as well as the wine; and in churches the sacred elements been administered to the laity

Right" and "left" in liturgical to the right and left hand of the at anciently they referred to the standing with his face towards the wine from the chalice into the cup (scyphum), from which the laity were to communicate by means of a tube, or pucillar [FISTULA]. The wine in this cup was regarded as completely consecrated by the infusion of the consecrated Wine from the chalice (see Mabillon, Comm. Praevius in Ordines RR. p. xciii.). The Pope delivered the bread to the principal persons present, the archdeacon following with the cup; meantime the choir sang the antiphon Ad Communionem. When the principal persons in the SENATORIUM had communicated, the bishops ministered the bread to the rest of the laity, and the deacons the cup; or sometimes, at the bidding of the Pontiff, presbyters administered both the bread and the cup (Ordo R. I. c. 20, and II. c. 14). As to the form of words accompanying administration; Gregory the Great used the following: "Corpus Dom. N. J. Christi conservet animam tuam" (Joann. Diac. Vita Greg. ii. 41). The Missa Illyrica (in Bona, De Reb. Lit. p. 554, ed. 1872) gives the following. For the priest himself when he receives: "Corpus homini Nostri Jesu Christi sit mihi remedium emperitum in vitam aeternam," and "Sanguis D. N. J. Christi custodiat me in vitam aeternam." On delivering the Body into the hands of priest or deacons, the form is "Pax tecum. R. Et cum spiritu tuo;"^a or "Verbum caro factus est, et habitavit in nobis:" on delivering the cup, in which a portion of the consecrated bread is immersed [COMMIXTION]: "Haec sacramento commixtio corporis et sanguinis D. N. J. C. prosit tibi ad vitam aeternam." For the subdeacons and inferior orders the form is: "Perceptio Corporis et Sanguinis D. N. J. C. sacrificet corpus et animam tuam in vitam aeternam. Amen." For the laity: "Corpus et sanguis D. N. J. C. prosit tibi in remissionem omnium peccatorum et ad vitam aeternam." About the time of Charles the Great, the following was a common formula: "Corpus D. N. J. C. custodiat te in vitam aeternam" (Krazer, de Liturgiis, p. 561).^b

In the Gallican Church, after the benediction of the communion of the priest, the faithful, men and women alike, drew near the altar and received the Eucharist into their hands.

During the time of communicating, a psalm or canticle was chanted. On this point Aurelian, Bishop of Orleans, gives the simple rule, "Psalmiculus omnes communicant" (Regula). Germans of Paris, his contemporary, calls the canticle or antiphon which was sung during communion Tantum, and says that it signified faith in the Holy Trinity; it was probably either the Gloria Patri, or something equivalent to the Unus Pater, Unus Filius, Unus Spiritus Sanctus, of the Eastern Church [SANCTA SANCTIS]. In the Mozarabic liturgy, after the priestly benediction and salutation, the choir chants the antiphon Ad Accedentes, during which the people were to draw near. After the antiphon, the priest takes from the paten the particle Gloria [see FRACTIO], saying inaudibly "Panem coelestem de

^a These words were no doubt used as appropriate to the Kiss of Peace given by the ministrant to the recipient, as was occasionally done even as late as the 12th century. (Mansi III, De Myst. Missae, vi. 9.)

^b A good collection of such formulae may be found in the work of Dominic Georgi, de Liturgia Rom. Pontif.

mensa Domini accipiam et nomen Domini invocabo,"^c and, holding it over the chalice, says prayers for worthy reception; then consumes the particle which he holds in his hand, and then the remaining particles on the paten. Immediately after he communicates the people. He then uncovers the chalice and, after the prayer "Ave in evum coelestis potus," and "Corpus et Sanguis D. N. J. Christi custodiat corpus et animam meam in vitam aeternam, Amen," drinks thereof, and says prayer for benefit from reception. The choir chants the COMMUNIO, or antiphon for communicating. No direction is given for the communion of the people further than that contained in the words "et statim populo communionem impertit." After the ablution of the chalice, Alleluia is chanted, post-communion follows, salutation and dismissal.

In the Ambrosian rite, after the Fraction and the Kiss of Peace, the priest thrice strikes his breast, saying, Domine non sum dignus; on taking the bread into his hand, he says, Quid retribuam Domino? and immediately before communicating, "Corpus D. N. J. C. custodiat animam meam in vitam aeternam. Amen." On taking the cup into his hand, he again says the Quid retribuam, and before communicating, "Praesta, quaesumus, Domine, ad perceptio Corporis et Sanguinis D. N. J. C. ad vitam nos perducat aeternam;" then if any are to communicate he administers to them before PURIFICATION. The ancient form of administration we learn from the Pseudo-Ambrosius de Sacramentis (iv. 5); "dicit tibi sacerdos, Corpus Christi, et tu dicis, Amen, id est, verum," which is identical with the σάμα Χριστοῦ of Eastern ritual. The form for the cup was probably similar.

The prayers which accompany communion vary much in different copies of the Ambrosian missal, and are probably all of comparatively modern date.

All who were present communicated.—This is contemplated in all the early accounts of Holy Communion; hence the care taken to exclude from the mysteries all who were not fit to participate. The second canon of the Council of Antioch (A.D. 344; compare Canon. Apost. c. 9 [10]) orders that those who came into the church and heard the service, so far as the lectures of Scripture, but declined to partake in the prayers of the people or to communicate, should be cast out of the church until they should have confessed and repented of their fault. This would seem to imply that the practice of some of the worshippers leaving the church before the more solemn part of the liturgy (εὐχή) was commenced, was already known (though censured) in the 4th century; for if they had remained in the church, they could hardly have been described as μη κοινωνούντας εὐχῆς ἅμα τῷ λαῷ. Martin of Braga (A.D. 560) inserted this in his Collectio Canonum (c. 83) for the use of the Spanish Church. Gratian (De Consecrat. Dist. ii. c. 10) quotes a decree of Pope Anacletus, which relic no doubt of the mer occasions, the celes standing, the rest,

^c In the printed missals, which are much interpolated, the direction follows in the rubric, "et dicat sacerdos memora pro mortuis;" as to which Krazer (de Lit. p. 621) notes, "qui ritus, ut jam in-inuavimus Gotho-Hispanus non est; hinc et nulla in missal illius occurrit formula."

, kneeling. Dr. Neale 24) mentions a capital the 12th century, which announ.

into the Hand.—There as that already aduced, ad was in ancient times of communicants. Thus,

Hist. Eccl. v. 17) asks massacre of Thessalonica, to receive the Lord's pping from the slaughter ustine (c. Litt. Petiliani, hop in whose hands his place the Eucharist, and hands from him in turn; says that in the church portion of the Eucharist communicant carries it own hand. Chrysostom tich. c. 7) speaks of the dness, considering what they ative in Szozmen (II. E. of Chrysostom's describes ing the bread into her ad as if to pray (les é r passing on the particle r maid-servant.

of the Trullian canon (anctice which had sprung up of gold or other precious ception of the Eucharist. a truth, that man is made d, the canon proceeds: "in partake of the immaculate draw near, disposing his a cross, and so receive the living grace;" and priest-r into such receptacles excommunicated. John of Fid. Orth. d. iv. 14) desires their hands in the form of y body of the Crucified. His Hist. Eccl. iv. 24) describes athbed (about 680) as rest into his hand. As he at comment, it was no doubt w time also.

of the 6th century women receive the Eucharist on the re compelled to receive it on MISCALE. See Con. Anti- anons 36 and 42. Caesarius anon printed as St. Agusde Tenipore), exhorts the their hearts as clean as the brought to receive the Body reek Fathers however say no practice, and the censure of oil would evidently apply as other materials.

ustom of giving the Eucharist lay persons continued in the not be precisely determined. t (Dialogus, iii. c. 3) asserts Agapetus (535-536) placed the mouth of a certain dumb and from a case so peculiar nothing except that the express mention of the sacrament being placed in the mouth of this person probably indicates that the general practice was otherwise. At the time when the Ordo R. VI. was drawn up (9th century?), the ancient custom had ceased at Rome, for the form of reception which was not permitted to subdeacons was certainly not permitted to the laity. A council held at Rouen (probably in the year 880) strictly prohibited presbyters from placing the Eucharist in the hand of any lay person, male or female, commanding them to place it in their mouths. This practice, which probably originated in a desire to protect that which is holy from profane or superstitious uses, gradually became the almost universal rule of the Church. So in 1549, because the people "diversely abused" the Sacrament "to superstition and wickedness," it was thought convenient that the people commonly receive the sacrament of Christ's Body in their mouths at the priest's hand. (See the first Prayer-Book of Edward VI. in Keeling's Litt. Brit.

p. 235.)

Responding Amen on Reception.—Besides the instances already given of this practice, the following may be cited: Jerome (Ep. 62, ad Theop. Alex.) would not allow one to come to the Eucharist, until he says Amen, when he doubted of the charity of the ministrant. Augustine (c. Faustian Manich. xii. 10) speaks of the responding Amen on reception of the Blood of Christ as a universal custom.

Place of Communicating.—The second synod of Tours (A.D. 567), in the fourth canon (Brun's Canons, ii. 226), prohibited lay persons from standing in the space within the rails (cancelli) reserved for the choir during the celebration of the mysteries; but expressly allowed lay men and women to enter the sanctuary (sancta sanctorum) for the purpose of praying and communicating, as had been the custom in times past. The existence of this custom is further proved by the story told by Gregory of Tours (c. Miroir. S. Marini, li. c. 14) of the paralytic girl, who, being miraculously healed, approached the altar to communicate without help.

Yet at nearly the same time the 1st Council of Braga (A.D. 563) in Spain, in the canon (13) headed "Ubi omnes communicant," ordered that no lay person should approach within the sanctuatory of the altar to communicate, but only clerics, as is provided in the ancient canons.

We have already seen, that in the liturgy of St. Chrysostom the priests and deacons communicated within the sanctuary, the lay people outside; and some distinction of this kind probably became general from about the 6th century.
The distinction between the communion of the clergy and that of the laity always tended in fact to become broader, and as differences increased not only in respect of precedence, but in respect of the manner and place of communicating, the degradation of a clerk to lay communion became a more marked punishment [DEGRADATION].

CONDITIONS OF ADMISSION TO HOLY COMMUNION.

1. Communicants must be baptized persons, not under censure.—None could be admitted to Holy Communion but baptized persons (ὁδοὶς ἀβαπ-τιστος παραλαβῆναι, Theophylact on Matt. 14), CHRIST, ANT.

lying under no censure [EXCOMMUNICATION].
The competency of ordinary members of any church would be known as a matter of course to the clergy administering the sacrament. Persons from a distance were required to produce certificates from their own bishops (ἐπιτάγματα κατωκάτω, litere communicatorie, fornicatæ; see COMMENTARY LETTERS) that they were in the peace of the Church, before they could be admitted to Holy Communion (Conc. Car- thag. i. c. 5; Eliberit. cc. 25, 58; Arles, i. c.
9; Agde, c. 52). Some have thought that the expression communio peregrini designates the state of those strangers who, being unprovided with such letters, were admitted to be present at divine service, but not to communicate (see Bona, De Reb. Lit. ii. c. 19, §§ 3, 6; Bingham, Antiq. XVII. iii. 7).

2. It seems also that, in some cases at least, within the first eight centuries, Private Con- fession was enjoined before communicating. In the Penitential of Archbishop Theodore (about A.D. 700) in the chapter De Communione Eucha- risticæ (l. xii. 7) is the provision, "Confessio autem Deo soli agatur licetbit, si necesse est;" to which is added in some MSS. the note of a transcriber of perhaps a century later. "et hoc necessarium." The same provision is repeated in the Penitential of Cummene, the work almost certainly of the later Cummeneus, an Irish monk who lived and wrote near Bobbio, in the early part of the 8th century. The purport of the rule seems to be, that confession to a priest was the ordinary practice, but that it might be dispensed with in case of necessity.

That confession to a priest was a usual, though not a necessary, preliminary to Holy Communion is perhaps implied in the narrative of Adamnan (Vita S. Columbae, i. 17, 20, 30, 41, 50) and of Bede (Hist. Eccl. iv. 25, 27). The whole subject is discussed in Usher's Religion of the Ancient Irish, c. 5; and in Lanigan's History of the Irish Church, iv. 67. Compare PENITENCE.

In the case of reconciliation of penitents after excommunication and penance, the intervention of the bishop—or of a priest in his absence—was of course necessary (Theodore's Penit. l. xiii. 2, 3); and clergy ordained by Scotch or British bishops were not admitted to communion in the Anglian church until they had "confessed" their desire to be restored to unity (Ib. l. ix. 3).

On the Communion of Children see INFANT COMMUNION.

3. Fasting Reception of Holy Communion.—So long as Holy Communion accompanied or followed an AGAPE, or common meal, it is evident that it was not received fasting. But as, in course of time, the tone of thought in the Church was altered, and the rite itself received a different colouring and different necessities, it came to be regarded as essential that both the celebrant and the recipients should be fasting at the time of communion. Something of this feeling probably underlies Tertullian's words, when he contrasts the Lord's own practice with that of his own time in the passage (De Corona, c. 3) quoted above, and on stationary days (De Orat. c. 14), he clearly contemplates the fast being continued until reception. Cyprian too (Ep. 63, cc. 15 and 16, quoted above) insists on the greater worthiness of the morning compared with the evening communion. But the necessity of communicating fasting does not appear to be distinctly recognised before the 4th century. Then we find Basil (Hom. ii. De Jejunio, p. 13) laying it down that no one would venture to celebrate the mysteries otherwise than fasting; and Chrysostom (in 1 Cor. Hom. 27, p. 231) insisting on fasting as a necessary preliminary to worthy communion; and again (Ad pop. Antioch. Serm. 9, p. 103) exhorting even those who were not fasting to come to church, not indeed to communicate but to hear the sermon; and again (Ep. 125, p. 683) complaining that his calumniators accuse him of having admitted to communion persons who were not fasting, a charge which he denies with the strongest asseverations. We have already seen that Ambrose recommended the faithful to fast even until evening, when the communion was late. A remarkable passage of Augustine (Ep. 118, c. 6; p. 191, ed. Cologne, 1618) is conclusive as to the practice of his own time. "It is beyond dispute," he says, "that when the disciples first received the Body and Blood of the Lord, they did not receive fasting. Are we therefore to blame the whole Church because every one does receive fasting? No; for it pleased the Holy Spirit that, in honour of so mighty a sacrament, the Body of the Lord should pass the Christian's lips before other food; for it is on that account that that custom is observed throughout the whole world. . . . The Lord did not prescribe in what order it should be received, that He might reserve this privilege for the Apostles, through whom He was to regulate the churches; for if He had recommended that it should always be received after other food, I suppose that no one would have deviated from that practice." With respect to his correspondent's question, as to the custom to be followed on the Thursday in Holy Week with regard to morning or evening communion, or both, he admits that the practice of the Church did not condemn communion on that day after the evening meal.

This rule, however, was not quite invariable. In Augustine's lifetime—as appears from the epistle just quoted—the custom prevailed that on the Thursday in Holy Week, the anniversary of the institution, the faithful received Holy Communion in the evening and after eating. So the Codex Canonum Eccl. Afric. (canon 41; see III. Conc. Carth. c. 29) provides, "ut sacramenta altaris nominis a jejunio hominibus celebrantur, excepto uno die anniversario quo Coena Domini celebratur." A canon of Laodicea (c. 50) which is sometimes quoted as directed against this custom, simply refers to the habit into which some had fallen of breaking their Lent-fast on the Thursday in the last week, not specially to non-fasting communion; but the Council in Trullo (c. n. 29), in the year 680, did expressly forbid the celebration of the mysteries even on this Thursday by any but fasting men.

Socrates (Hist. Eccl. v. 22, p. 295) expressly states that the inhabitants of that part of Egypt which borders on Alexandria and of the Thebaïd had a celebration of the Eucharist on Saturday, as others had; but that, contrary to the general custom, they communicated after taking their evening meal without stint.

Regulations intended to check the practice of non-fasting communion were made in Gaul in the 6th century. The council of Auxerre (can. 19; Brun's Can. ii. 239) enjoined that no presbyter, deacon, or subdeacon should venture to take part in the office of the mass, or to stand in the church while mass was said, after taking food or wine. The reason for the latter clause was no doubt that clerics who were present at mass always in those days communicated. The 2nd Council of Micon in the year 585 (Conc. Muticensense ii. can. 9; in Brun's Canones, ii. 251) expressly forbade any presbyter full of food or under the influence of wine (crapulatus vino) to handle the sacrifice or celebrate mass; referring to the African canon already quoted. In Spain decrees on this subject were made by the 1st Council of Braga (can. 16), and the second (can. 10) in the years 563 and 572 respectively (Brun's, ii. 32 and 42). The first of these anathematizes those who, instead of celebrating mass fasting in the church at three in the afternoon of Maundy Thursday, celebrated on that day masses for the dead at nine in the morning without fasting, after the Priscillianist fashion. The second, by occasion of those who consecrated masses for the dead after having taken wine, condemns those who ventured to consecrate after having taken any food whatever. Walafrid Strabo (de Off. Divinis, c. 19), referring to the first of these, rightly infers that if non-fasting communion was not permitted on a day when the practice of the law and a certain degree of precedent might be pleaded, it was not permitted on other days. The abuse censured by the second council probably arose from the late hour at which masses for the dead were held and the presence of the priest at the funeral-east. The Codex Eccl. Afric. (can. 41 = III. Carth. c. 29) had already provided that services for the dead held in the afternoon should consist of prayers only, without sacrifice, if the clerics who performed the service were found to have taken food. Gratian (under Presbyter, dist. 91, quoted by Bona, R. L. i. c. 21, § 2) refers to a council of Nantes or Anglé, which enjoined priests to remain fasting until the hour fixed, in order that they might be able to take part in the funeral-mass.

In two cases only non-fasting communion is expressly permitted. The first is, when the necessity suddenly arises of administering the Viaticum to one in the article of death; in which case it is sanctioned, says Cardinal Bona (R. L. i. 21, 2), by the practice of the whole Church. The second is, when the celebrating priest, from sudden sickness, is unable to finish the office; in which case, if the elements have been consecrated, another priest, even though he be not fasting, may complete it. See the second canon of the 7th Council of Toledo (Brun's Can. i. 262) of the year 646, which at the same time enjoins most earnestly that neither shall a priest resign the unfinished service nor a non-fasting priest take it up without the most absolute necessity. And to prevent such cases, the 11th Council of Toledo (A.D. 675) ordered (can. 2, p. 315) that wherever it was possible the priest serving mass should be attended by another, fasting, who might take up the service in case of need.

TIME OF COMMUNION.

1. Days.—The well-known passage in the Acts of the Apostles (ii. 46) is commonly held to prove that the "breaking of bread" for Holy Communion Church. It is day is meant broken soon after Day, the first probable the laying by for assigned to a rist. The 97) met on maion; the terrizes not week, shows daily (see 378 f.). Ju tinctly ment hiepe) as the day on which Christ rose for reason to du to the presen first day of Lord comman.

The days w Holy Communion of the week, t days appear a admistration of Tertullian 289) adds to the day of the week special observat communicate," on the Lord's i tion Day [i. e. this was not a (Expositio Fidei celebrations (Eid and Sunday w within his kno part of the East 4th century. A.D. 320 [al. 37 be offered in Le the Lord's Day; festival approach Day. In the generally a day of its being pret Communion.

When Christi gion of the err Eucharist soon h of Constantinople of Chrysostom, complains of the daily offering. 88, c. 9) that in sacrificed (immol ref he also pro that this was by saying, "In some an offering; in o Sabbath only and the Lord's Day o was observed in of the 4th century of the 4th centur 1st Council of To (canon 5) all clerics the time of the de the Roman Church (Ep. 71) refers to tians communicated at the evening meal, as well as in assemblies before dawn. Cyprian (ad Cæcilianum, Ep. 63, cc. 13, 16) refers to some who in the morning sacrifice used water only in the chalice, lest the odour of wine should betray them to their heathen neighbours; and warns such not to save their conscience with the reflection that they complied with Christ's command in offering the mixed chalice when they came together for the evening meal (ad cœcilianum) at which the rite had been originally instituted. This no doubt implies some kind of communion both morning and evening; but that in the evening seems to have been rather a domestic than a public rite; for Cyprian expressly says that at (his) the whole congregation (plebs) could not be called together, so as to make the rite—what it ought to be—a visible token to all of their brotherhood in Christ. And he goes on to say, that though it was no doubt fitting that Christ should offer at eventide, as foreshadowing the evening of the world and being the antitype of the evening passover-sacrifice (Exod. xii. 6); yet that Christians celebrated in the morning the resurrection of the Lord. In short, he clearly regards the morning as the proper time for public and solemn communion.

When the Church received its freedom, set hours began to be appointed for Holy Communion. The third hour of the day (about nine o'clock), the hour when the Holy Spirit descended on the apostles, was fixed at an early date as the hour of morning sacrifice on Sundays and festivals. The Liber Pontificalis attributes to Pope Telesphorus (127-138) the decree, "ut nullus ante horam tertiam sacrificium offerre præsumeret;" and this statement is repeated by Amalarius (de Eccl. Off. iii. 42) and others. It is almost needless to say the decree is one of the well-known forgeries. The same regulation is attributed by the spurious Costa Damasi (see Bona, de Reb. Lit. i. 21, § 5) to Pope Damasus (366-384); but here too no weight can be attached to the authority. More satisfactory testimonies are the following. Sidonius Apollinaris, who died A.D. 489, says (Ep. v. 17) that priests held divine service at the third hour; and Gregory of Tours in the 6th century speaks (Vita Nicetii) of the third as the hour when the people came together to mass; Gregory the Great (in Evang. Hom. 37) speaks of one who came to offer the sacrifice at the third hour; and Theodulph of Orleans (ob. 821) orders (Capit. ult., c. 45) that private masses should not be said on the Lord's Day with so much publicity as to attract the people from the high or public mass, which was canonically celebrated at the third hour. That on ordinary or ferial days mass was said at the sixth hour (twelve o'clock) as late as the 12th century we have the testimony of Honorius of Autun (Gemma Animæ, i. c. 113); but this practice seems to have been matter of custom rather than of canonical prescription. On the 4th day the liturgical hour was the ninth, probably because the ancient Church was unwilling to introduce the joyful eucharistic feast into the early hours of a fast-day, and because on such a day it was not thought too onerous to continue fasting until three o'clock in the afternoon (Martene, de Rit. Antiq. i. p. 108). Epiphanius (Expositio Fidei, c. 22) testifies to the fact that throughout the year on Wednesday and Friday the liturgy was said at the ninth hour; excepting in the fifty days between Easter and Pentecost, and on the Epiphany when it fell on Wednesday or Friday; on these days, as on the Lord's Day, there was no fasting, and the liturgy was said at an early hour in the morning (ἀπὸ ἄρθου).

The Council of Mentz, quoted by Ivo of Chartres (pt. 4, c. 35), desires all men on the Ember-days to come to church at the ninth hour to mass. The same reasons which caused the mass to be deferred at other fasting-seasons applied also to Lent; hence Ambrose, preaching in Lent, begs the faithful to defer eating until after the time of the heavenly banquet; if they had to wait until evening, the time was not so very long; on most days the oblation was at noon (on Psalm 118 [119], Serm. 8, Opp. iv. 656, ed. Basle, 1567); and Theodulph (Capitulare, c. 39) says that those who broke the Lenten fast who ventured to eat as soon as they heard the bell at the ninth hour, an hour at which he seems to imply that the "missarum solemnitas," as well as "vespertina officia," were celebrated.

These prescriptions as to the hours of mass, as well as of the ordinary offices, have long ceased to be observed: in the Roman Church at least mass may be said at any hour from dawn (aurora) to noon. But a trace of the ancient practice is found in the following rubric (xv. § 2) of the Roman missal:—"Missæ autem Conventualis et Solemnis sequent ordine dici debet. In Festis duplicibus et semiduplicibus, in Dominicis, et infra Oct., dicta in Choro hora tertia. In Festis simplicibus et in Feriis per annum dicta sexta. In Adventu, Quadragesima, Quatuor Temporibus, etiam infra Octavam Pentecostæ, et Vigilis quæ jejuantur, quamvis sint dies solemnæ, Missa de Tempore debet cantari post nonam."

The celebration of Holy Communion in the night-time, once—as we have seen—common in the Church, ceased at an early date, except on certain days of special observance. Of these the principal is that on the night of the Lord's Nativity. A Coptic tradition (mentioned by Bona, R. L. i. 21, 4) ascribes the institution of a nocturnal communion at Christmas and Epiphany to the Nicene Council; the fact may perhaps have been, that when the celebration of the Lord's Nativity was transferred from the sixth of January to the twenty-fifth of December (CHRISTMAS), the nightly communion was continued on both days. In the Gregorian Sacramentary (p. 5) besides the mass for the Vigil of the Nativity, said at the ninth hour, is one In Vigilia Domini in nocte, that is, to be said in the night between Christmas Eve and Christmas Day.

A nightly communion was usual in ancient times on the night of the "Sabbatum Sanctum" or Easter Eve. It is probable, to this custom that Tertullian alludes when (ad Uxorem, ii. 4) he says that a heathen husband would not permit a Christian wife to pass the night from home on the Paschal solemnities; Jerome (on St. Matt. xxv.) mentions that it was an apostolic tradition on Easter Eve not to dismiss the congregation before midnight; and Theodore Balsamon (on the Council in Trullo, can. 90) writes that persons of especial piety were accustomed to remain in the churches the whole of that Saturday, to communicate at midnight, and at age o'clock. The Ordo people should and that the church to be rung a litany to follow. The larius (de) says that a the mass of Durandus o ancient rite the time wh 13th centu Easter Eve collects still merly said a

A noctu also in the of Pentecost cantes on the sacramentinar goril Saravani. The Ordo Re hour of the begin, and s the ninth hou

Four times the EMBER w one on the m was reckoned as the Missa which follow offices in the called Domini was celebrated the Sunday a (A.D. 1095) possible, shoul day night, the near as possib

In some cas fine (e. g. Con we must bear not in all ca mysteries of t the hour-offic DAY: and p. 4

FREQ

An ancient t the 21st canon A.D. 305), that should absent church, he sho communion, A a bishop Holy least every Sun tendance was communion was in which was t Theodors of Ant vestities (about was still the r signs of a rela comparatively e of Agat (Agath the rule (can. II) nificate at least outside, he shou ka. To the sar excepting in the fifty Pentecost, and on the Wednesday or Friday; on the Lord's Day, there was said at an early hour.

noted by Ivo of Chartres on the Ember-days ninth hour to mass, caused the mass to be lessons applied also to teaching in Lent, begging until after the time if they had to wait was not so very long; was at noon (on Psalm 65th, ed. Basle, 1567); c. 39) says that those who ventured to eat as well at the ninth hour, mass to imply that the well as "vespertina to the hours of mass, as offices, have long ceased Roman Church at least any hour from dawn a trace of the ancient flowing rubric (sv. § 2) Missa autem conventu ordine dici debet. simplicibus, in Dominica Choro hora tertia, in Feriis per annum Quadragesima, Quatuor Octavam Pentecostes, ut, quamvis sint dies vere debet cantari post ly Communion in the have seen—common in a early date, except on servance. Of these the e night of the Lord's adition (mentioned by ibes the institution of a Christmas and Epiphany the fact may perhaps the celebration of the sferred from the sixth of ay-fifth of December y communion was con- the Gregorian Sacra- the mass for the Vigil of a ninth hour, is one in that is, to be said in the as Eve and Christmas was usual in ancient e "Sabbatum Sacrum" robal, to this custom when (ad Uzorem, ii. 4) husband would not per- festines the night from home ities; Jerome (on St. that it was an apostolic not to dismiss the con- t; and Theodore Bal- Trullo, can. 90) writes i piety were accustomed ches the whole of that ate at midnight, and at one o'clock in the morning to begin Matins. The Ordo Romanus Vulpatus also orders that the people should not be dismissed before midnight, and that at dawn of day they should return to the churches; in monasteries it enjoins the bells to be rung as soon as a star was seen in the sky, a litany to be chanted, and then the mass to follow. The same custom is mentioned by Amalarius (de Divin. Off. iv. c. 20; cf. c. 40), who says that all continue fasting until night, when the mass of the Lord's Resurrection is celebrated. Durandus (Rationale, vi. c. 76) says that the ancient rite was observed in some churches at the time when he wrote, in the latter part of the 13th century. In modern times the mass of Easter Eve is said at midday, but the unchanged collects still testify to the fact that it was formerly said at night.

COMMUNION, HOLY

A nocturnal celebration anciently took place also in the night between the Vigil and the day of Pentecost; hence in the prayer Communicantes on that day we have the words, "diem sacratissimum Pentecostes praevenientes" (Gregori Sacram. p. 97; see Ménard, note 393). The Ordo Romanus provides that at the eighth hour of the eve the vigil service or mass should begin, and should be finished before the end of the ninth hour.

Four times in the year, on the Saturdays of the EMBER weeks, was a nightly mass, or rather one on the morning of the succeeding day, which was reckoned to belong to the Saturday; hence, as the Micralogus (c. 29) observes, the Sundays which follow the Ember-days have no proper offices in the ancient sacramentaries, but are called Dominicae vacantes; for the mass which was celebrated late on the Saturday served for the Sunday also. So the Council of Clermont (A.D. 1095) ordered (can. 24) that the fast, if possible, should be prolonged through the Saturday night, that the mass might be brought as near as possible to the Sunday morning.

In some cases, when we read of missae vespertinae (e.g. Conc. Agath. c. 30; III. Au-el. c. 29), we must bear in mind that the word missa does not in all cases imply the celebration of the mysteries of the altar, but was applied also to the hour-offices. Cf. MASS; MAUNDY THURSDAY; and p. 416.

FREQUENCY OF COMMUNION.

An ancient rule of the Church is expressed in the 21st canon of the Council of Eliberis (about A.D. 305), that if any one dwelling in a town should absent himself on three Sundays from church, he should be for a time suspended from communion. As at that time in a city having a bishop Holy Communion was administered at least every Sunday, and non-communicating attendance was unknown, we infer that weekly communion was the rule of the Church, to fail in which was to be unworthy of its privileges. Theodoros of Tarsus, archbishop of Canterbury, testifies (about A.D. 688) that in his time this was still the rule of the East. In the West, a comparatively early period. Thus the Council of Agde [Agatheuse] in the year 506 laid down the rule (can. 18) that if a layman did not communicate at least at Christmas, Easter, and Whit-tide, he should no longer be reputed a Catholic. To the same effect are the 14th canon of the Council of Autun (A.D. 670), and the 38th of the Excerpta attributed to Egbert of York (A.D. 740). Bede (Ep. ad Elbert. p. 311, ed. 1722) desires his correspondent to insist strongly on the wholesome practice of daily communion, according to the custom of the churches of Italy, Gaul, Africa, Greece, and the whole East. But this, he says, in consequence of defective teaching, is so far from being the custom of English laymen, that even the more religious among them do not presume to communicate except at Christmas, Epiphany, and Easter; though countless innocent boys and girls, young men and maidens, old men and old women, do not scruple to communicate every Lord's Day, and perhaps on the days of Apostles and Martyrs besides, as Egbert himself had witnessed, in the Roman and Apostolic Church.

COMPENDIENSE CONCILIUM 421

The 3rd Council of Tours, in the year 813, laid down (can. 50) a rule nearly identical with that of Agde; that all laymen, not disqualified by heinous sin, should communicate at least three times in the year. The Council of Aix-la-Chapelle had previously (A.D. 788) re-acted (c. 70) the decree of the Council of Antioch (c. 2) which ordered all who came to church at the time of service but declined reception to be suspended from communion until they should amend; and it was probably the failure of this attempt to revive the primitive practice which led to the much looser rule of Aix-la-Chapelle.

If the Pseudo-Ambrosius (de Sacram. v. 25) is to be trusted, some Christians at least of the East in the 4th century communicated only once a year, and he complains that this practice had extended to his own community, recommending himself the practice of daily communion. [C.]

COMMUNION BOOKS. [LITURGICAL BOOKS.]

COMMUNION OF CHILDREN. [INFANT COMMUNION.]

COMMUNION OF THE SICK [SICK, VISITATION OF.]

COMMUNITY OF GOODS. [MONASTICISM.]

COMMISTIO or COMMIXTIO. In the Roman missal, after the breaking of the Host [FRACTION], the priest places a particle in the chalice, saying secretis: "Hæc commistio et consecratio corporis et sanguinis D. N. J. C. fiat accipientibus nobis in vitam æternam." And this practice of placing a particle of the Host in the cup appears to be an ancient one, and to be considered as a kind of consecration [CONSECRATION]. It is found in the liturgy of St. James (Neale's Tetralogia, p. 177), where the priest, after breaking the bread, places the portion which he holds in his right hand in the chalice, saying, "The union (unio) of the all-holy Body and precious Blood of our Lord and God and Saviour Jesus Christ."

The 4th Council of Toledo (A.D. 633), canon 18, orders the commixtion (conjunctionem panis et calicis) to take place between the Lord's Prayer and the Benediction. [C.]

COMPATRES AND COMMATRES. [SPONSORS.]

COMPENDIENSE CONCILIUM. [COMPTONE.]

COMPETENTES. [CATECHUMENS.]

COMPËGNE, COUNCILS OF. [COMPENDIENSE.] (1) A. D. 756, held in Pipin's palace, passed canons respecting marriage, degrees of consanguinity, &c. (Labh. Conc. vi. 1694). (2) A. D. 757 (Eginhard), or 758 (Ado), an assembly or "placitum" in the same place, but rather civil than ecclesiastical, its purpose being to receive the homage of Tassilo, duke of the Bavarians, and of his subjects (ib. 1834). [A. W. H.]

COMPLETORIUM. (1) The last of the Canonical hours of prayer [HOURS OF PRAYER].

(2) An anthem in the Ambrosian rite, said at Lauds and Vespers. Sundays have two at Lauds, and four at Vespers; and week days one, varying with the day, at Lauds, and one, changing, at Vespers. The first at Lauds on Sunday is "Dominus in caelo, paravit selem suam: et regnum ejus omnium dominabitur. Kyr. Kyr. Kyr." They are all of the same type. On Festivals the number varies with the office. [H. J. H.]

COMPLINE. [HOURS OF PRAYER.]

COMPUTUS. [CALENDAR.]

CONCORDIA, nurse of St. Hippolytus, martyr at Rome, Aug. 13 (Mart. Bedae, Usuardi). [C.]

CONCORDIUS, presbyter, martyr at Spoleto under Antoninus, Jan. 1 (Mart. Rom. Vet., Usuardi). [C.]

CONCUBINAGE.—The relation between the sexes which was denoted by this word had, under the legal system with which the early Church was brought into contact, a twofold character. There was (1) the connexion, temporary, depending on caprice only, involving no obligations, concubinage in the modern sense, not distinguishable ethically from fornication. But there was also (2) a concupinatus recognised by Roman law, as in the Lex Julia et Papia Poppæa, which had a very different character. Here the cohabitation was permanent, and involved therefore reciprocal obligations, and, although it did not stand on the same level as a conubium, and did not entitle the issue of the union to inherit as legitimate, it was yet regarded, somewhat as amorganatic marriage is in Germany, as involving no moral degradation. In dealing with this last form, Christian feeling was divided between the fear of recognising what might seem a half-marriage only on the one hand, and the desire to sanction any union which fulfilled the primary condition of marriage on the other. The question was complicated by the fact that, for the most part, these unions were contracted with women who were slaves or foreigners, and therefore not ingenuæ, and that consequently to have placed them on a level with conubia, would have been to introduce a mesalliance into the succession of respectable or noble families. Cases where the man who kept the concupina had a wife living, though sanctioned by the lax morality of Roman society, admitted, of course, of no question, and were denounced as adultery (August. Serm. 224). Where the man was unmarried the case was different. The Apostolical Constitutions, on the one hand (viii. 32), authorised the admission to baptism of such a slave-concupine belonging to an unbeliever, if she were faithful to the one man with whom she lived. If Marcia, the concubine, first of Quadratus, and afterwards of Commodus, who is known to have favoured the Christians, had ever been one of them, it must have been by virtue of some such rule. The case of a Christiana who had a concubine was somewhat more difficult, and the equity of the Church's judgment was disturbed by considerations of social expediency. If she was a slave he was to get rid of her, apparently without being bound to make any provision for her maintenance. If she were a free woman, he was either to marry or dismiss her (Apost. Const. viii. 32). So, too, at a later date, we find Leo the Great treating this dismissal of a mistress followed by a legal marriage, not as a "duplicito conjugii," but a "profectus honestatis" (Epist. 92; ad Rustic. c. 5). In other instances, however, we trace the influence of the wish to look upon every permanent union of man or woman as possessing the character of a marriage in the eyes of God, and therefore in the judgment of the Church. Thus Augustine, speaking of a concubine who promises a life-long fidelity, even should he cast her off, to the man with whom she lived, says that "merito dubitatur utrum ad percipiendum baptismum non debeat admitti" (De Fide et Oper. c. 19).^b The first Council of Toledo went even farther, and while it excluded from communion a married man who kept a concubine, admitted one who, being unmarried, continued faithful to the one woman with whom he thus lived (1 C. Tolet. c. 17). The special law forbidding a Jew to have a Christian wife or concubine (3 C. Tolet. c. 14), implying, as it does, the legitimacy of the latter relation, where both parties were Christians, shows, in like manner, that it was thought of as ethically, though not legally, on the same level as a conubium.

The use of the word concupina as a term of reproach for the wives of the clergy who were married, was, of course, a logical deduction from the laws which forbade that marriage, but the un-sparing use made of it, as by Peter Damiani and Hildebrand, belongs to a somewhat later date than that which comes within the limits of this book. [E. H. P.]

CONFESSIO. Originally the place where a saint or martyr who had "witnessed a good confession" for Christ was buried, and thence the altar raised over his grave, and subsequently the chapel or basilica erected on the hallowed spot. From its subterranean position such an altar was known as katábasis (Theophan. p. 362) or descensus. Of these subterranean confessions we have examples in Rome in the churches of St. Prisca, St. Martino ai Monti, St.

^a It may be questioned, however, which class of concubines, the illicit or the legalised, are here contemplated.

^b It is interesting to note, in this lenity of judgment, the influence of a tender recollection of one with whom Augustine, before his conversion, had lived in this relation, and who on parting from him made a declaration that she would live with no one else. (Conf. vi. 13.) She was apparently a Christian ("vovisti tibi," sc. teo) and Monica, though she wished her son to marry and settle respectably, does not seem to have condemned the union as sinful, and adopted Adeodatus, the issue of the connexion, into her warmest affections.

Lorenzo
we had in the
and in England.
in the that bui covered 79, 80, § 85).

Other tyrum, m Concilio places of "Ilic (D
sibus orn 259, no. 2 young Ne corating w (Ep. ad H
The unalo patripav
M. mori occurrence memorial c cella (Aug Faustina. x atus cont
ing Greek (Euseb. de martyrium [the marty Rome]). T
the lay bu cedon was council pagr that erecte epulchre or crævus, &c &c. Cf. Co tropæus, 74
Cains, apud of SS. Peter [CELLA MEM

The Cod. T contains an of a "marty the addition desired.
CONFESS
Apoſtoli, b
The acknow certain servic
1. The Conf
the Eucharist, and unworthi an act as the we scarcely ne has been supp presbyters born before the E Jewish priests, their sin in st Lord, I have sin wickedly; I r doings, nor will Mortuus de Poe tari de Symon.
Whether the fiding priest w

...bine belonging to an
...ful to the one man
...farcia, the concubine,
...wards of Commodus,
...oured the Christians,
...It must have been by

The case of a Chris-
...was somewhat more
...of the Church's judg...nsiderations of social
...lave he was to get
...hout being bound to
...aintenance. If she
...as either to marry or ...viii. 32). So, too, at
...e Great treating this
...owed by a legal mar-
...onjugal," but a "pro-...92; ad Rustic., c. 5).
...we trace the influence
...ery permanent union
...ing the character of ...God, and therefore in ...ch. Thus Augustine,
...o promises a life-long
...t her off, to the man
...hat "merito dubitatur
...pismum non debet
...c. 19).^b The first
...en further, and while
...n a married man, being
...l one who, who un-
...to the one woman
... (1 C. Tolet. c. 17).
...g a Jew to have a
... (3 C. Tolet. c. 14).
...rtimacy of the latter
...ies were Christians,
...it was thought of as
...ly, on the same level

...nequina as a term of
...of the clergy who were ...ogical deduction from
...at marriage, but the ...y Peter Damiani and
...somewhat later date
...in the limits of this
... [E. II. P.]

...ly the place where a
...witnessed a good con-
...ried, and thence the
...ve, and subsequently
...ted on the hallowed
...an position such as ...sacris (Theophan. p.
...se subterranean con-
...les in Rome in the
...Martino ai Monti, St.

...ver, which class of conca-
...ere here contemplated.
...this levity of judgment
...ection of one with whom
...o, had I lived in this rela-
...him make a declaration
...one else. (Conf. vi. 15).
...("vovena tibi," sc. no)
...er son to marry and settle
...ve condemned the union
...s, the issue of the con-
...ona.

CONFESSION

Lorenzo fuori le Mura, &c., and above all in the basilica of St. Peter's. Not unfrequently they were merely imitative, and not confessiones in the original sense, as at St. Maria Maggiore, and in the crypts of our early churches in England. Confessio was also used for the altar in the upper church, placed immediately above that built over the martyr's grave, sometimes covered with silver plates (Anastas. §§ 65-69, 79, 80, 198), and its ciborium, or canopy (ib. § 85).

Other synonymous terms were conclia martyrum, memorie martyrum, and martyria. Conclia martyrum is applied to the burial places of the martyrs in the catacombs, o. d., "Hic (Damasus) martyrum . . . conclia veribus ornavit" (Anast. § 54; cf. Baron. ad ann. 259, no. 24). Jerome speaks of the graves the young Nepotian had been in the habit of decorating with flowers as martyrum conclibuta (Ep. ad Helvet. lii.; cf. Aug. de Civ. Dei, 22, 8). The analogous Greek term was συναγωγὴ τῶν μαρτύρων (Concil. Gangr. Can. 20).

Morie martyrum is a term of constant occurrence in early Christian writings for the memorial chapel of a saint or martyr, also called cella (August. de Civ. Dei, xlii. 7, 10; cont. Faust. xx. c. 21; Serm. de Diversis, 101; Optatus cont. Parmen. ii. 32). The corresponding Greek term was martyrion, μαρτύριον (Euseb. de Vid. Const. iii. 48; Soc. iv. 18 [the martyrion of St. Thomas at Alesna]; ib. 23 [the martyrion of St. Peter and St. Paul at Rome]). The church of St. Euphemia, where she lay buried, in which the Council of Chalcedon was held, is styled in the acts of that council μαρτύριον Εὐφροσύνης (cf. Soc. vi. 6); and that erected by Constantine over our Lord's sepulchre on Calvary, μαρτύριον Ζωήπου ἀναστάσεως, &c. (Euseb. iv. de Vit. Const. 40-49, &c. Cf. Concil. Laod. canon 8.) The word βραχία, τὰ πρόπλανα τῶν ἀποστόλων, is used by Cyprius, apud Euseb. II. E. ii. 25, for the tombs of St. Peter and Paul in the Roman cemeteries. [CELLA MEMORIAE.]

The Cod. Theod. (De Sepulchro violato, lex vii) contains an express sanction for the erection of a "martyrium" in memory of a saint, and the addition of such buildings as might be desired. [E. V.]

CONFESSION, LITURGICAL (Confessio, Ἀποκρίσις, ἀπολογία).

The acknowledgment of sin made publicly in certain services of the Church.

I. The Confession preceding the celebration of the Eucharist.—It is so natural to confess sin and unworthiness before engaging in so solemn an act as the consecration of the Eucharist, that we scarcely need to search for precedent; yet it has been supposed by some that the Christian presbyters borrowed the custom of confessing sin before the Eucharistic celebration from the Jewish priests, who before sacrificing confessed their sin in such terms as these: "Verily, O Lord, I have sinned, I have done amiss and dealt wickedly; I repeat and am ashamed and dealt dolings, nor will I ever return unto them." See Marius de Penitent. lib. ix. ii. c. 21, § 4; Euchart de Synax. Judaica, c. 20.

Whether the precedent of the Jewish sacrificing priest were followed or not, no doubt the same feeling which prompted the use of the Psalm Judica [26th] in the early part of the liturgy caused also the use of a public general confession by the priest and ministers before the altar.

CONFESSION, LITURGICAL 423

In many Greek liturgies some acknowledgment of sin and unworthiness forms part of the office of the prothesis, said in the sacristy before entering the sanctuary: in the liturgy of St. James, for instance, the priest adopts the words of the publican, "God be merciful to me a sinner," and of the prodigal, "I have sinned against Heaven and in Thy sight." The words of the prodigal are also adopted at greater length in the opening of the Mozarabic liturgy.

For the West, many forms of the liturgical confession, or apologia, of the priest about to celebrate are given by Menard (on the Gregorian Sacramentary, p. 242); and by Bonn (de Reb. Lit. ii. c. 1, § 1). Menard states that these were formerly used before the offertory, with which the Missæ Fidelium began; but in the Missæ Ilyricæ and some others, these apologiae are directed to be said immediately before the Introit, while the Gloria in Excelsis and the Gradual are chanted by the choir. But the ancient formularies of the Roman Church contain no trace of a confession in a set form to be made publicly at the beginning of mass. The ancient Ordines Romani only testify that the celebrant after paying his devotions before the altar in a low voice, with bowed head besought God's pardon for his own sins. It is an error, therefore, to attribute the introduction of this rite to Pope Pontianus or Pope Damasus. The very diversity of the form and manner in saying the confession in different churches shows that no form was prescribed by any central authority, but that the several churches followed independent usages.

The usual place for the liturgical confession before mass is the lowest step of the altar; but there was anciently considerable diversity of practice; for the confession was sometimes made (as in the East) in the sacristy, sometimes by the side of the altar, sometimes in the middle of the presbytery. A peculiar custom, probably derived from ancient times, was long maintained in the church of St. Martin at Tours, that the celebrant should make his confession at the tomb of St. Martin (Martene de Ritibus Eccl. lib. i. c. 4, art. 2).

II. In the Matin office.—Something of the nature of confession of sin appears to have formed part of the matin office from very early times. This custom is thought by some to have been inherited from the synagogue, which has, in the ancient "Eighteen Prayers," the form, "Have mercy upon us, O our Father, for we have transgressed; pardon us, for we have sinned." Look, we beseech Thee, on our afflictions; heal, O Lord, our infirmities." Very similarly, the Greek matin office has, "O most Holy Trinity, have mercy on us; purify us from our iniquities, and pardon our sins. Look down upon us, O Holy One; heal our infirmities." (Freeman, Principles of Divine Service, i. 64 ff.).

It is at least certain that in the 4th century the early matin office of many Eastern churches began with a confession; for St. Basil (Ep. 63, p. 843, ed. Paris 1618) describes the early matins of the church of Neo-Caesarea in the following manner. The people, he says, at early dawn seek the house of prayer, and, after confession made with sighing and tears to God, rising at length from their prayer pass to the chanting of the Psalms. It appears then that a public liturgical confession commenced the matin office in the days of St. Basil, and he expressly states that this practice was consonant with that of other churches known to him.

In the Western matin office the confession is made in the form called CONFITEOR (q. v.) from its first word.

III. Confession of past sins formed also one of the preliminaries of baptism, as we learn from Tertullian, de Baptismo, c. 20. See BAPTISM.

IV. An instance of a profession of faith, commonly called a confession, is the following—

In all liturgies of the Alexandrine family, and in many other Oriental liturgies there is found, immediately before communion, a confession, or declaration of faith by the recipient, to the bread and wine are now really and truly the Body and Blood of Christ. For instance, in the Coptic St. Basil (Renandot, Litt. Orient. 1. 23), the priest, holding the elements, says, "The Holy Body and precious, pure, true Blood of Jesus Christ the Son of our God. Amen. This is in very truth the Body and Blood of Emmanuel our God. Amen." Compare the Coptic St. Gregory (Ren. i. 36); the Greek St. Basil (i. 83); St. Gregory (i. 122), and other passages. [C.]

CONFESSOR. [PENITENTIARY.]

CONFESSOR. (Ὁμολογητής.)

1. One who has confessed Christ by suffering death for Him. [MARTYR.] Thus, St. Ambrose (ad Gratianum, li. p. 63, ed. Basil, 1567) speaks of the deaths of confessors.

2. One who has borne for Christ suffering short of death. Pseudo-Cyprian (de Duplici Martyrio, c. 31) says that the Church "martyres appellat eos qui violente morte decesserunt, confesso ex qui constanter in cruciatibus ac multis meritis professi sunt nomen Domini. Jesu." In this sense Celerinus (Cypriani Epist. 21, c. 4, ed. Hartel) speaks of Severianus and all the confessors who had passed from Carthage to Rome; and Sozomen (H. E. i. 10) speaks of the number of confessors (ὁμολογητῶν) who, after the cessation of persecution, adorned the churches, as Hosius of Cordova and Paphnutius of Egypt.

3. The word confessor is used in a more general sense for one who shews the spirit of Christ in his ordinary life, "qui pacifica et bona et justa secundum praeceptum Christi loquitur, Christum cottidie confitetur" (Cyprian, Epist. 13, c. 3). So Theodore Balsamon (on Cn. Apostol. 62, p. 265) says that the Church desires all its orthodox members to be confessors (ὁμολογητάς) of the faith. Hence, in later times it came to designate persons of distinguished holiness, who had passed to their rest without violence or torture. Pseudo-Egbert (Excerptiones, c. 28; a work not earlier than the 9th century) speaks of "sancti Patres, quos Confessores nuncupavimus, id est, episcopi, presbyteri qui in castitate servierunt Deo" (Ducange s. v. Confessor; Suicer s. v. ὁμολογητής).

4. In the Gregorian Sacramentary, Feria iv. post Palmas (p. 63, ed. Ménard), we have the following: "Oremus ad pro omnibus episcopis, presbyteris, diaconibus, subdiaconibus, acolythis, exorcistis, lectoribus, ostiariis, confessoribus, vir-gibus, viduis, et pro omni populo sancto Del." The order of words shews that the confessors here are persons of inferior dignity, and Ménard (ad locum) supposes charters to be intended who confess God by singing His praise. See the first council of Toledo, cc. 6 and 9, where the word "confessor" seems to be used in a similar sense, the latter canon forbidding a professed religious woman to sing antiphons in her house with a confessor or servant in the absence of bishop or presbyter. (Ménard u. s.) [C.]

CONFIRMATION. The rite now known by this name presents a singular instance of the continued use of a symbolic act in the midst of almost every possible diversity of practice, belief, and even terminology. The one common element throughout has been the imposition of hands, as the sign of the bestowal of some spiritual gift. In all other respects it will be seen there have been indefinite variations.

The history of the Apostolic Church brings before us two special instances of the ἐπίθεσις τῶν χειρῶν (Acts viii. 12-17, xix. 5, 6). In both it follows upon baptism, is administered by apostles, as distinguished from presbyters or deacons, and is followed by special supernatural manifestations of spiritual gifts, perhaps by their permanent possession. It was not directly connected with any appointment to any office in the Church, though office might follow upon the exercise of the gift bestowed. It was therefore distinct from the laying on of hands by which such offices were conveyed (Acts vi. 6, xiii. 3), as it was from that which was the medium of a miraculous healing power applied to the diseases of the body (Mark xvi. 18, Acts ix. 12, 17). The act referred to in 1 Tim. iv. 14, and 2 Tim. i. 6, seems to hover between the bestowal of a charisma and the appointment to an office. The position in which the "laying on of hands" meets us in Heb. vi. 2, leaves it open to take it in its most generic, or in either of its specific senses, with, perhaps, a slight balance in favour of connecting it with the act which always, or in some cases, supervened on baptism. The absence of any mention of it in the baptisms recorded in Acts ii. 41, xvi. 15, 33, and elsewhere receives a natural explanation in the fact that there the baptizer was an apostle, and that it was accordingly taken for granted.

Beyond this the N. T. gives us no information. The "anointing" (χρίσμα) of 1 John ii. 27, the "anointing" of 2 Cor. i. 21, the "sealing" of 2 Cor. i. 22, Eph. i. 13, iv. 30, can hardly be thought of as referring to a ritual act, though such an act may at a very early period have been brought into use as a symbol of the thought which the words themselves expressed. Even then it remains doubtful whether the "seal" means baptism itself or some rite that followed it. A like uncertainty hangs over the use of the word "seal" in the story quoted by Eusebius (H. E. iii. 23), from Clement of Alexandria, and in the Apostolical Constitutions (ii. c. 14).

When we pass to the age of Tertullian the case is different. A distinct mention is made (1) of anointing, (2) of the laying on of hands, as following so close upon baptism as to seem almost part of the same rite rather than a distinct one, the latter act being accompanied by a special prayer for the gift of the Holy Spirit (Tertullian de Bapt. c. in like manner that it but is not and therefor who receive church. II. "acramental sense" (Stephan.). no distinct the laymen— as if they by the same usage of t which fixe season, all of urgent ordinarily vary, howe this was do (6. 77), wh who had h acopo vel p tiamen per aer, but w of impositi as a long-s used to tra their hands on those w byter or d facts may (1) that ir longer look set of inop as in the n ritual gifts still in the immediatel tention to th an interval A Spanish uses the f which the year. Gran the neglige bishop pro er, with quity, refu Church has confirmation practice, in Roman Ch and Gregor was not, eve iste of th the two ord lowed to in moderna, Pro ratification attached an the promise is not the st

* It is sing seems to see the "perficer But the decre with the mim * The Apo sored charis populo sancto Del." that the confessors dignity, and Menard is to be intended who praise. See the first 9, where the word is in a similar sense, a professed religious in her house with an absence of bishop or

The rite now known singular instance of the act in the midst of variety of practice, however. The one common element of the bestowal of some spiritual gifts will be seen in variations.

The Catholic Church brings instances of the impositio (2-17, xix, 5, 6). In sum, is administered by presbyters or by special supernatural gifts, perhaps by their was not directly connected with any office in the right follow upon the seal. It was therefore an act of hands by which (Acts vi. 6, xiii. 5), was the medium of the applied to the diseases 18, Acts ix. 12, 17, Plin. lv. 14, and 2 Tim. between the bestowal of a seal to an office. The "sealing" of hands "meets" an open to take it in its or of its specific senses, balance in favour of which always, or in some baptismism. The absence of baptisms recorded in and elsewhere receives the fact that there was the seal that it was accord-gives us no information.) of 1 John ii. 27, the "sealing" of 2), can hardly be thought an act, though such an period had been brought the thought which the seal. Even then it is the "seal" means baptism followed it. A like the use of the word noted by Eusebius (ii. E. Alexandria, and in the (ii. c. 14).

ment of Tertullian the seal is made (1) of imposition of hands, as following baptism as to seem almost other than a distinct one, accompanied by a special the Holy Spirit (Tertul-de Bapt. c. 7; de Resurr. Carn. c. 8). Cyrillin, in like manner, recognises the practice, contending that it follows rightly upon a valid baptism, but is not enough, in the case of heretical, and therefore invalid, baptism, to admit those who received it to full communion with the church. He applies to it, as to baptism, the word "sacramentum," but obviously not in the technical sense of a later theology (Epist. 72, ad Stephan.). In these passages, it will be observed, no distinction is drawn between the baptizer and the layer-on of hands. Both acts are spoken of as if they were performed at the same time and by the same person. In practice, of course, the usage of the 3rd, possibly of the 2nd, century, which fixed on Easter as the great baptismal season, allowing it at other times only in cases of urgent need, would make this combination ordinarily a very practicable one. It was necessary, however, to provide for the exceptions, and this was done accordingly by the Council of Elvira (c. 77), which ordered that, in the case of those who had been baptized by a deacon, "sine episcopo vel presbytero," the bishop "per benedictionem perferere debet." Jerome, in like manner, but with a more rigid limitation of the act of imposition to the higher order, recognised it as a long-standing usage of the church. Bishops used to travel round their dioceses in order to lay their hands, "ad Invocationem Sancti Spiritus," on those who had been baptized only by a presbyter or deacon (c. Lucifer. c. 4). One or two facts may be noted at this stage of expansion, (1) that immediate supernatural results are no longer looked upon as the ordinary sequel to the act of imposition, but that it is still connected, as in the apostolic age, with the thought of spiritual gifts of some kind; (2) that while it is still in theory a rite which may be administered immediately after even infant baptism, its limitation to the episcopal order tended to interpose an interval of uncertain length between the two. A Spanish council in A.D. 569 (C. Lucanus) recognises the fact that there were some churches which the bishop could not possibly visit every year. Gradually, especially in Western Europe, the negligence or the secular engagements of the bishop prolonged this interval. The East, however, with its characteristic reverence for antiquity, refused to separate what the primitive Church had joined, and infant baptism, infant confirmation, infant communion, follow, in its practice, in immediate sequence. Even in the Roman Church the sacramentaries of Gelasius and Gregory unite the first two ordinances. It was not, even in the judgment of eminent ritualists of that Church, till the 13th century, that the two ordinances were permanently separated, and a period of from seven to twelve years allowed to intervene. Of what may be called the modern, Protestant idea of confirmation, as the ratification by the baptized child, when he has attained an age capable of deliberate choice, of the promises made for him by his sponsors, there is not the slightest trace in Christian antiquity.*

* It is singular that the canon, strictly interpreted, seems to sanction the performance of the act implied in the "pride" by a presbyter as well as by a bishop. But the absence of councils will seldom bear interpretation with the minuteness of a special pleading.

* The Apostolic Constitutions, it is true, speak of the sacred chrism as βαπτισμα τῆς ἐπιβολῆς (iii. 17); but it

A special aspect of confirmation presents itself in connection with the reception into the Church of those who had been baptized by heretics. With the exception, and that only for a time, of the African, that baptism, if formally complete, was recognised as valid. But the case was otherwise with the laying on of hands. Only in the Catholic Church could the gifts of the Spirit be thus imparted (August. de Bapt. c. Donat ii. 16), and so, even if the heretical sect had its bishops, and they administered the rite, it was treated as null and void. When those who had been members of such a community returned to their allegiance to the Church, confirmation, including the anointing as well as the laying on of hands, was at once theoretically indispensable, in its sacramental aspect, and became practically conspicuous as the formal act of admission (2 C. Constant. c. 7; 1 C. Aras. c. 8; Siricius, Epist. i. 1; Leo, Epist. 37, c. 2). It follows, from all that has been said, that, according to the general practice, and yet more, the ideal, of the Church of the first six centuries, the office of confirming was pre-eminently an episcopal one. But it deserves to be noticed that it was not so exclusively. It did not depend for its validity upon episcopal administration. As baptism was valid, though administered by a layman, so the laying on of hands, in case of urgency, was valid, though administered by a priest. In the Apostolic Constitutions (vii. 22), at least one part of the rite, the anointing, is assigned to either priest or bishop, and the practice was retained by the whole Eastern Church. In the West, the exception was recognised as legitimate in cases of necessity, as e. g. in that of a possessed or dying person (1 C. Aras. c. 2; Innocent, Epist. 1 ad Decent.; C. Epian. c. 80). In these instances, however, for the most part, a special delegation of authority was either required or implied. The letters of Leo (Ep. 88 ad Gall.) and Gelasius (Epist. 9 ad Episc. Lucan.), forbidding the practice, "per impositiones manuum fidelibus baptizandis, vel conversis ex haeresi Paracletum Sanctum Spiritum tradere" (Leo l. c.) may be received as evidence that the practice was becoming more or less common, even without that authority, and that it was necessary, in the interest of the episcopal order, to restrain it.

Lastly, it may be noticed, that a trace of the old combination at one time and place of the two ceremonies, baptism and the imposition of hands, which were afterwards separated, may be found in the fact that the anointing, which was originally the connecting link between the two, was, at a later period, attached to each. Innocent, in the letter already quoted (ad Decent. c. 3), marks out the limits within which the priest might act. In the absence, or even in the presence of the bishop, he might anoint the baptized child with the holy chrism, provided always that the chrism itself had been consecrated by a bishop, but he was not to sign him on the forehead. That was reserved for the bishops, when, by imposition of hands, they bestowed the gift of the Spirit. [E. H. P.] is questionable whether this means, as Hingham asserts (xii. 3), a confirmation on man's part of the compact made with God in baptism. The analogous use of the word σφραγίς (Const. Apost. vii. 22) would seem to imply that it was the seal, the confirmation of God's promise:

CONFITEOR. The form of general confession of sins made in the offices of the Church, so called from its first word. This is prescribed: (1) At the beginning of the mass when the priest says it standing at the steps of the altar, "profunde inclinatus."

(2) At the administration of the Holy Communion at other times.

(3) At the administration of Extreme Unction.

(4) Previous to the absolution "in articulo mortis."

(5) In the daily office at Compline; and at Prime when the office is not double.

Sacramental confession is also directed to begin with the opening words of the "Confiteor."

It is prefaced by the versicle "Deus in adjutorium," &c., and is said alternately by the priest and congregation, who each respond with a prayer for the forgiveness of the other, called "Misereatur," from its first word; in addition to which the priest pronounces a short formula of absolution, similarly called "Indulgentiam," over the people. This act is sometimes called in rubrics "giving the absolution."

Clear traces of it appear in the Penitential of Egbert of York, A.D. 750, who prescribes a form of words closely resembling the "Confiteor," as introductory to sacramental confession; and the "Benedictio super poenitentem" is only a slightly different version of the "Misereatur." A similar form is given by Chrodegang, bishop of Metz A.D. 742, who describes the order in which Prime was to be said, to the following effect. When the clerks come together to sing Prime in the church, the office itself being completed, let them give their confessions before the 50th [51st] Psalm, saying in turn, "Confiteor Domino et tibi, frater, quod peccavi in cogitatione et in locutione et in opere: propterea precor te, ora pro me." To which the response is given, "Misereatur tibi omnipotens Deus, indulgent tibi peccata tua, liberet te ab omni malo, conservet te in omni bono, et perducet te ad vitam aeternam;" to which the other answers, Amen. In Micrologus de Eccl. Observ. [probably about 1080] a form still more closely resembling the present is given, and the 3rd Council of Ravenna, A.D. 1314, orders that throughout the province of Ravenna the "Confiteor" shall be said in the form used at the present time. Since the publication of the missal of Pius V. there has been complete uniformity in this respect throughout the Roman obedience. For examples of early forms of confession see Bona, de Reb. Lit.; Martene, de Ant. Eccl. Rit. lib. i. &c. Compare CONFESSION. [H. J. H.]

CONFRACTORIUM. An anthem in the Ambrosian missal at the breaking of the Host. It usually has some reference to the Gospel of the day. [H. J. H.]

CONON, martyr at Iconium under Aurelian, May 29 (Mart. Usuardi); March 5 (Cal. Byzant.). [C.]

CONSECRATION OF CHURCHES (Consecratio, Dedicatio; Gr. ἀφιέρωσις, Euseb. Vit. Const. iv. 60; ἑγκαίνια, ib. iv. 43; cf. ἀντίθεσις, Procop. de Aedif. Justiniani, i. 3).

The essential idea of consecration is expressed in the following paragraphs:—"Consecratio Ecclesie est dedicatio ejusdem ad cultum divinum speciali ritu facta à legitimo ministro, ad hoc ut populus fidelis opera religionis in eitis exercere possit" (Ferraris' Pœnita Bibliotheca, lii. 157). "When we sanctify or hallow churches, that which we do is to testify that we make them places of public resort, that we invest God Himself with them, that we sever them from common uses" (Hooker, Ecc. P. v. 16). "By the consecration of a church, the accents always mean the dedicating or setting it apart for Divine service" (Bingham, Antiq. viii. 9). Compare BENEDICTION.

It seems almost a necessity to men to have their places of common worship recognized and accustomed. That those places should not only acquire sacredness of association by use, but should previously have imparted to them a some sort a sacredness of object, seems also consonant with natural religion. The former more clearly, and yet the latter also, implicitly, is found in all ages, a feature of all religions, rude and civilized, the same with all classes, of diverse nations, however widely separated; as exemplified in graves, sacred stones, pillars, altars, temples, pagodas. It seems the dictate of natural piety that we should express thanks to God on the first use of anything. Greeks, Romans, Jews, had their consecrations of houses, cities, and walls, not by words only, but with symbolical actions and sacred rites. (See Deut. xx. 5; Psalm xxx. Title, A Psalm and Song at the Dedication of the House of David; Neh. xii. 27; Du Cange, Constantinopolis Christiana, i. 3, "Urbis Eneacenia;" Lewis, Historical Essay upon the Consecration of Churches, London 1719, c. iii.)

From the expressions "before the Lord," "the presence of the Lord" (Gen. iv.), it has been reasonably inferred that "the patriarchs had places set apart for the worship of God, consecrated, as it were, to His service." (Blunt's Script. Coine. p. 8.) Something like a form of consecration is indicated in Gen. xxi. 33, xxviii. 16, 17, 18, where the Vulgate rendering "titulum" has given rise to the use of the term, as equivalent to 'church,' common in early Christian writers. The consecration of the tabernacle is narrated, Exod. xl., and given with further details in Josephus iii. 9. The dedication of the Temple of Solomon is contained in 1 Kings viii.; which furnishes Hooker (Eccl. Pol. v. 12-16) with several of his arguments for the consecration of Christian churches. The dedication of the second temple by Zerubbabel is told in Ezra vi. 16; the purification and rededication of the same by Judas Maccabeus, in 1 Macc. iv. 41-44, 54, 56, 57, 59. The dedication of Herod's beautiful temple is narrated by Josephus xv. 14. Less magnificent than these, but still recognized and allowed to possess a sacred character, were certain "high places" in the ante-Babylonish history of the Jews, known in later times as περὶεραία, and the numerous synagogues in Palestine and elsewhere.

Christianity rose out of Judaism, supplanting only what was peculiar to that system, and inheriting all that was of natural piety. The Divine Founder of Christianity set the example to all His followers in His constant attendance at the acknowledged places of worship, and especially in His going up to Jerusalem at the feast of the Dedication. The apostles used the consecrated temple as long as it was permitted them to the synagogue hands, near the N. T. of an org. Blunt (P. quotes Act. 17, 20, 22, xv. li.)

That th. time of C. worship i. character doubted or plain (de d. Dedicatio; and August. Av. lichen Ave. sufficiently Cloniacensis v. 12, 5). tellor Harri. Antiquity of Rivingtons. dismiss spu. tions; e. v. by Gavanti. "dedication. mesties (C. is suitable by divine pi. Linc. Cletu. and Gear (C. Duranti nod. (Asip. viii. (lit. Eccl. from the v. allusions of the conclusi. whatever h. always reco. worship, the first, and t. of it.

The very known Inlie. Dominica, & 320, &c.). sister Mirre. dedication of versal custo. oration (43) says, "that leatly consti. the feasts o. (Col. Liturg. Interim (D. many is deep. Church. Me. this existenc. Clemens Rom. Parish Prie. Japnes. 7); tullian (De F. 12); Lucian (The Coemeteri. known place, the Lord, retu. have been ad. service long. "The upper Locis Sanctis) religions in et ritus Panthe Biblicorum, sanctity or hallow is to testify that we lie resort, that we him, that we sever (Hooker, Ecc. P.

 tion of a church, the a detaching or setting
 " (Bingham, Antiq.
 ctions.

ality to men to have worship recognized and (ness should) not only occasion by use, but compared to them, a f object, seems also religion. The former after also, implicitly, ture of all religions, ne with all classes, of widely separated; as nered stones, pillars, It seems the dictate should express thanks of anything. Greeks, consecrations of houses, words only, but with ered rites. (See Deut.
A Psalm and Song Tome of David; Neh, Antiquities Christianis, Lewis, Historical Essay Churches, London 1719, before the Lord," the (Gen. iv.), it has been "the patriarchs had worship of God, consists service." (Blunt's something like a form ted in Gen. xli. 33, the Vulgate rendering use to the use of the urch, common in early consecration of the

 od. xl., and given with us lii. 9. The dedicaolomon is contained in rishes Hooker (Ecc. l. of his arguments for istian churches. The temple by Zerubbabel is the purification and re-by Judas Maccabæus, in 57, 59. The dedication is narrated by magnificent than these.
 I allowed to possess a certain "high places" in erty of the Jews, known xal, and the numerous and elsewhere.

of Judaism, supplanting to that system, and of natural piety. The tinity set the example His constant attendance ces of worship, and esp to Jerusalem at Jeru-The apostles used the ong as it was permitted them to do so, and everywhere else they found the synagogues or churches made ready to their hands, needing no new consecration. Traces in the N. T. of a fixed place of worship as a feature of an organized church are presented by Prof. Blunt (Parish Priest, sect. ix. p. 281), who quotes Acts i. 13; St. Luke xxii. 12; St. John ix. 19, 20; Acts ii. 2; Rom. xvi. 3; 1 Cor. xi. 22, xvi. 10.

That the primitive Christians, i. e. before the time of Constantine, not only had churches to worship in, but regarded them as distinct in character from other buildings, has indeed been doubted or denied, but is allowed by even Hosiandian (de Origine et Progressu Consecrationum et Dedicacionum Templorum, Tiguri, 1603, fol.) and Augusti (Denkwürdigkeiten aus der Christlichen Archæologie, xi. 317, &c.), and has been sufficiently settled in the affirmative by Petrus Clavicepsus, A. D. 1147 (quoted in Hooker, E. P., v. 12, 5). Bona, Tillemont, Mede, Lewis, Chancellor Harington (The Object, Importance, and Antiquity of the Rite of Consecration of Churches, Birmington, 1847), and Professor Blunt. We dismiss spurious testimonies and dubious allegations; e. g. the affirmation of Radulphus adduced by Gavanti (Theaur., tom. i. p. lv. tit. xvi.), that "dedication is of apostolic authority;" the Clementines (Ep. ad Jacobum) "Build churches in suitable places, which you ought to consecrate by divine prayers;" the decretals, quoted from Ilaus, Cletus, Evaristus, Hyginus, &c. by Gratian and Guar (Enchir. p. 807); the assumption in Duranti and Cardinal Bona, as quoted in Bingham (Antiq. viii. 9, 2); and others given by Martene (El. Eccl. Ant. li. 13). Yet we may collect from the very earliest times a succession of allusions and statements which warrant us in the conclusion that places and buildings, of whatever humble sort they might be, were always recognized and set apart for common worship, the fact of their consecration appearing first, and then the accomplishments and rites of it.

The very titles by which these buildings were known indicated this; e. g. Kypiden, i. e. oikia, Dominica, &c., discussed in Augusti (Denkw. xi. 320, &c.). St. Ambrose, in his letter to his sister Marcellina (Ep. 22), calls the rite of dedication of churches a most ancient and universal custom. St. Gregory Nazianzen in an oration (43) on the consecration of a new church, says, "that it was an old law, and very excellently constituted, to do honour to churches by the feasts of their dedication." And Daniel (Cod. Liturg. l. 355) confirms the conclusion of Binterim (Denkw. iv. l. 27) that this ceremony is deeply rooted in the earliest age of the Church. Meise, and others after him, argue this existence of churches from passages in Clemens Romanus (ad Cor. i. 41; see Blunt's Parish Priest, lect. ix.); Ignatius (Ep. ad Magnes. 7); Justin Martyr (Apol. l. 67); Tertullian (De Idolol. 7); Cyprian (de Op. et Eleem. 12); Lucian (Chilo. p. 1126); and many others. The Coenaculum at Jerusalem, to which, as to a known place, the disciples, after the ascension of the Lord, returned for common prayer, is said to have been adapted and dedicated to Christian service long before the time of Constantine. "The upper room," says Beale (tom. ix. de Locis Sanctis), "was enclosed afterwards with a beautiful church, founded by the holy apostles, because in that place they had received the Holy Ghost." To this, as being already an acknowledged use, St. Cyril of Jerusalem refers (Cat. lect. xvi. 4): "Here, in Jerusalem, in the upper church of the apostles . . . the Holy Ghost came down from heaven. And, in truth, it is most fitting that . . . we should speak concerning the Holy Ghost in the upper church" (cf. Niceph. ii. 3).

"There exist," says Eusebius (Hist. Eccl. viii. 1), "the imperial edicts by which the churches were to be pulled down to the ground." These must have been actual edifices. [CHURCH.] They came the persecution of Diocletian, when "the houses of prayer were pulled down from the top to the bottom, and their foundations overturned" (ib. viii. 2). "After these things a spectacle earnestly prayed for and much desired by us all appeared, viz. the solemnization of the festival of the dedication of churches throughout every city, and the consecration of newly-built oratories. . . . Indeed, the ceremonies of the bishops were most entire, the presbyters' performance of service most exact, the rites of the Church decent and majestic. On the one hand was a place for the singers of psalms, and for the rest of the auditors of the expressions sent from God; on the other was a place for those who performed the divine and mystical services. There were also delivered the mystical symbols of our Saviour's passion. And now people of all ages and sexes, men and women, with the utmost vigour of their minds, with joyful hearts and souls, by prayer and thanksgiving, worshipped God, the Author of all good. All the prelates then present made public orations, every one as well as he was able, endeavouring to set forward the praises of those assembled" (ib. x. 3). In x. 5 Eusebius gives the decrees of Licinius and Constantius for restoring the churches to the Christians, as buildings not private, to which there had been an established title. Even the Magdeburg Centurators, who are wont to disparage the importance of the ceremony of consecration, writing on the 4th century, admit that it had been in existence earlier: "Usitate omnino magis quam superioribus sæculis templorum fuerant dedicationes, seu consecrationes, et quidem festivæ." The church of Tyre was one of those destroyed in the persecution of Diocletian, and rebuilt at the revival described above. From the panegyric spoken by Eusebius on the occasion to Paulinus, bishop of Tyre, we gather that the earlier church, a very noble one, had been consecrated before at its first erection, and that churches built on old foundations were consecrated again.

We owe to the courtly pages of Eusebius full accounts of the consecration of the churches built by Constantine at Jerusalem, Constantinople, and Antioch. He undertook to build a church over the Holy Sepulchre at Jerusalem (Vit. Const. iii. 25), called the "Martyrium," of which the beauty and several parts are described (ib. iii. 29). When all was ready, A. D. 335, he wrote a letter of invitation to the numerous bishops then assembled in council at Tyre, urging them that they should first compose their internal differences, because concord of priests belittled such a ceremony (Vit. Const. iv. 43; Sozom. Ecol. Hist. i. 26). From all parts of the East, accordingly, eminent bishops assembled, followed by an innumerable company of people out of all the provinces. "But the ministers of God," proceeds Eusebius, "adorned the festival partly with their prayers, and partly with their discourses. For some of them with praises celebrated the benignity of the religious emperor towards the universal Saviour, and in their orations set forth the magnificence of the Martyrium; others entertained their hearers with theological discourses upon the divine dogmata, fitted to the present solemnity; others interpreted the lessons of the divine volumes, and disclosed the mystic meanings. But such as were unable to arrive at these things appeared the Deity with unbloody sacrifices and mystic immolations, humbly offering up their prayers to God. . . . At which place we ourselves also honoured the solemnity with various discourses uttered in public; sometimes making descriptions in writing of the stateliness and magnificence of the royal fabric; at others, explaining the meaning of the prophetic visions in a manner befitting the present symbols and figures. There was the feast of dedication celebrated with the greatest joy imaginable." One discourse by Eusebius (de Laudibus Constantini) is given in full (iv. 45), where it is observed that Constantine's churches were much larger and handsomer than those before. The consecration took place on Sept. 13th, a Saturday.

Theodoret (Ecol. Hist. i. 31) says that many churches of Constantine were dedicated by the assembled bishops at the same time.

To the dedication of the magnificent basilica at Antioch, called Dominicum Aureum, A.D. 341, begun by Constantine and finished by his son Constantius, there came ninety-seven bishops, on the invitation of Eusebius of Nicomedia, who had usurped the see of Constantinople (Soer. ii. 8; Sozom. iii. 5).

A synod of bishops (Soer. ii. 39) assembled at the dedication of St. Sophia in Constantinople, A.D. 360, thirty-four years after the foundation of the church by Constantine. Eudoxius had lately been inaugurated as archbishop. He "made sacred prayers" (Du Cange, Constantinop. Christ. iii. 2). "It was consecrated with prayers and votive offerings" (Niceph. viii. 26). Ciampini (de Aedif. Constantinii, pp. 165 sqq.) gives a summary of the dedication of this celebrated church from the Alexandrian Chronicle. It is also referred to by the author of the Life of St. Athanasius in Photius (Du Cange, u. s.). As Constantine's church had been destroyed by earthquake, so was this of his son's burnt with fire, A.D. 404, and wholly destroyed in the sedition of A.D. 532.

Further light is thrown on the rite of consecration by a story of Athanasius. In his Apology to the emperor Constantine, A.D. 335, he defends himself from the serious charge of using an undedicated church. He allows the truth of the fact. He said they had certainly kept no day of dedication, which would have been unlawful to keep without orders from the emperor. The building was not yet complete. He grounds his apology on the great concourse of people in Lent, the grievous want of church room elsewhere, the pressure of all to hear Athanasius, the increased mass of the crowd on Easter Day (when the undedicated church was used), the precedents of the Jews after the captivity, and of buildings so used in Alexandria, Treves, Aquileia, the reasonableness of worshipping in a building already called "the Lord's house" from the very time of laying the foundations (Apol. ad Const. 17-21). "There was no dedication, but only an assembly for the sake of prayer. You, at least, I am sure, as a lover of God, will approve of the people's zeal, and will pardon me for being unwilling to hinder the prayers of so great a multitude." "May you," he adds, "most religious Augustus, live through the course of many years to come, and celebrate the dedication of the church. The place is ready, having been already sanctified by the prayers which have been offered in it, and requires only the presence of your piety." (ib. 24, 25.)

The first dedication of a new church by Justinian is briefly described by Du Cange (Constant. Chr. iii. 5), who says, "The procession started from St. Anastasia, the patriarch Menas sitting in the chariot of the emperor, and the emperor himself going among the common people." The "dedications apparatus et celebratus" is given in Collins (Orig. Constant.), who says that Justinian went in solemn procession from the palace to the Augustaeum (a sort of large forum, or πρωαίλιον, before the church of St. Sophia), together with the patriarch, to the church built by himself, and broke out into these words: "Glory to God, who has counted me worthy to fulfil so great a work. I have surpassed thee, O Solomon." A series of earthquakes destroyed the dome, altar, ambo, &c., and the same emperor, whose passion for building was the ruling feature of his life, celebrated the second consecration twenty-four years later, of which an account is given by Du Cange (ib. iii. 6) after Theophanes. "Nightly vigils preceded in the church of St. Plato; thence the procession advanced with prayers, the emperor himself being present; the patriarch Eusebius, borne in a chariot, and dressed in apostolical habit, holding the holy gospels in his hands; all the people chanting 'Lift up your heads,' &c. Then came the θυρανομία and the φωτοβόμος, i. e. that part of the ceremony of the Encaenia, where in the circuit of the building the lights are lighted on the walls, and twelve crosses are anointed with chrism by the bishop. Paul the Silentary, in his poem on the occasion, adds, "After thou hast celebrated the festival, as was proper, forthwith the whole people, the senate, and the middle and better classes, demanded an extension of the days of celebration. Thou grantedst it: they flocked in: again they demanded: again thou grantedst it, which things being often repeated, thou celebratedst the festivity magnificently." Probably for seven days.

Of other churches in Constantinople, Du Cange (ib. iv. 5) relates the dedication of the Church of the Apostles. This church, after its demolition, was rebuilt by Justinian. The dedication is described as celebrated by the deposition in it of the relics of Andrew, Luke, and Timothy, which had been in the earlier church. Theophanes says, that the bishop Menas, with the holy relics, sitting in the royal chariot, gilt and attended three a celebra

the sur

The mentio stantio ceded (2

We p while I Maxim for ten and that the Bri been ra finished

Later o Augusti
the idol them, a sprinkle to make of dedica fine "con Saviour, Laurent

blessed a the body
tom) was yet dedica was brou li. 3); th after bein

gave him to purify forty days

prayer an the custo the localit

Then he according with whom the Abbot

A.D. 710, church aft

having pro blessed chi tells a stor

after havin Pach, he s ridden, so consecrate one of the some to tast the same w was the gre 4). A detai

tion of the
(A.D. 665)
the Penitent

of a building but now pr seems fit fo removed, an secreted befo is made of t tion in whic factus est."

2. Canons edition of General Coun
Canons, i. 26

mass of the crowd on dedicated church was of the Jews after the s so used in Alexandria, onableness of worship-ly called "the Lord's one of laying the founda-17-21). "There was an assembly for the sake I am sure, as a lover of the people's zeal, and unwilling to hinder a multitude." "May religious Augustus, live many years to come, and of the church. The on already sanctified by been offered in it, and ce of your piety." (ib.

by a new church by Jusa Du Cange (Con-says, "The procession a, the patriarch Meenas of the emperor, and the among the common onis apparatus et celeindinus (Orig. Constant.), n went in solemn proto the Augustæum (a προαλιον, before the together with the patriby himself, and broke glory to God, who has fulfil so great a work, Solomon." A series of the dome, altar, ambo, er, whose passion for feature of his life, cele-consecration twenty-four account is given by Du Theophanes. "Nightly church of St. Plato; vanced with prayers, the present; the patriarch chris, and dressed in of the holy gospels in his chanting. Lift up your the Ευαγγελια and the of the ceremony of the of the circuit of the buildighted on the walls, and icted with chris, by the tary, in his poem on the thou hast celebrated per, forthwith the whole of the middle and better extension of the days of nterstand it: they flocked: again thou gratest often repeated, thou nity magnificently." Pro-in Constantinople, Du tes the dedication of the s. This church, after its by Justinian. The delicelebrated by the depess of Andrew, Luke, and been in the earlier church. the bishop Meenas, with the the royal chariot, gilt and studied with gems, carrying upon his knees the three shrines of the holy apostles, in such wise celebrated the dedication. Procopius speaks of the same particulars.

The last-named writer (de Aedif. Justin. I. v.) mentions the sacred buildings at Ephesus, Constantinople, Jerusalem, which Justinian dedicated (ἁγίακη).

We gather from Bede (Ecccl. Hist. i. 6) that while Diocletian was persecuting in the East, Maximian was doing the same in the West, for ten years, by burning the churches, &c., and that after the cessation of the persecution the Britons renewed the churches which had been razed to the ground, and founded and finished basilicas to the holy martyrs (ib. i. 8).
 Later on, we read that Gregory instructed Augustine and his companions not to destroy the idol temples, but to destroy the idols in them, and then to prepare holy water, and sprinkle it, to build altars and deposit relics, and to make suitable provision for rendering the day of dedication attractive (ib. i. 30); that Augustine "consecrated a church in the name of the Saviour, our God and Lord Jesus Christ," and Laurentius "consecrated the church of the blessed apostles Peter and Paul" (ib. i. 43); that the body of Augustine (after a very early custom) was laid near this church, as it was not yet dedicated, but as soon as it was dedicated it was brought in and laid in the north porch (ib.
ii. 3); that, on Chad's visit to Northumbria, after being in East Anglia, the son of the king gave him land to build a monastery or church; to purify the spot he craved leave to spend the forty days of Lent (except the Lord's day) in prayer and fasting, as he said it was always the custom he had learned, first to consecrate the locality by prayer and fasting to the Lord.
 Then he built a monastery, and set it on foot according to the rites of the Lindisfarrians, with whom he was educated (ib. iii. 23); that the Abbot Ceolfrid sent to the king of the Picts, A.D. 710, architects to build for him a stone church after the manner of the Romans, he having promised to dedicate it in honour of the blessed chief of the apostles (ib. v. 21). Bede tells a story of Bishop John of Beverley, how, after having dedicated a church for the Earl Pech, he sent to his countess, who was bedridden, some of the holy water which he had consecrated for the dedication of the church by some of the brethren, charging him to give her the same water wherever he learnt her pain was the greatest. The woman recovered (ib. v.
4). A detailed account is given of the consecration of the church of Ripon by St. Wilfred (A.D. 665) in his life. The 47th chapter of the Penitential of Archbishop Theodore, speaking of a building in which heathens had been buried, but now proposed for a church, adds: "If it seems fit for consecration, let the bodies be removed, and it shall be sanctified, if not consecrated before." In the same chapter mention is made of that part of the office of consecration in which it is said, "Locus a Deo iste factus est."

2. Canons and decrees which relate to the consecration of churches.—The 4th canon of the General Council of Chalcedon, A.D. 451 (Bruns's Canons, i. 26), provides that "no one shall anywhere build or establish a monastery, or house of prayer, without the consent of the local bishop." The canons of Felix IV. and Gregory I. (de Consacr. dist. i. c. 17) are referred to by Gavanti (Theaurus Sacr. Rit. tom. i. p. iv. tit. xvi. p.

 529). The 23rd canon of an Irish Council under Patrick, A.D. 450 (Bruns's Can. ii. 303), directs "that a prosbyter, though he build a church, shall not offer the oblation in it before he brings his bishop to consecrate it, because this was regular and decent." Of Columbanus, however, though not a bishop, Walafrid Strabo writes (Mor. ii. 13, 6), "He ordered water to be brought, blessed it, sprinkled the temple with it, and while they went round singing, dedicated the church. Then he called on the Name of the Lord, anointed the altar, placed in it the relics of St. Aurelia, vested it, and said mass." The 1st Council of Orange, A.D. 441, can. 10 (Bruns's Canons, ii. 123), forbids a bishop to consecrate a church out of his own diocese, even if it has been built by himself. So the 2nd Council of Arles (about 451), can. 37. The 3rd Council of Orleans, A.D. 538, can. 15 (Bruns's Can. ii. 196), makes the same provision about altars. The 3rd canon of the 2nd Council of Saragossa, A.D.
 592 (Bruns's Can. ii. 65), enacts that "if Arian bishops, who are converted, shall consecrate churches before they have received the benediction, such shall be consecrated anew by a Catholic bishop." The Theodosian Code prescribes how existing buildings should be claimed and dedicated for the service of the Christian religion: "conlocatione venerandi religionis christianae signi exphari praecipimus" (lib. xvi.
 tit. 10). The same rite was prescribed by Justinian at the beginning of any erection of a church (Novell. cxxxii., quoted by Bingham, Antiq. viii.
 9, 5). See more instances in Augusti (Denkw.
 xi. 355). Avitus, bishop of Vienne in the 6th century, promises his brother Apollinaris to be present at the consecration of a church, and commands the gifts that were designed for the poor at the dedication feast. The 2nd Council of Nice, A.D. 787, can. 7, orders that no bishop should consecrate any church or altar, on pain of deposition, unless relics were placed under it, "ut qui ecclesiasticas traditiones transgressus est." The famous Council of Cealchythe (i. e.
 Chelshen), presided over by Archbishop Wilfred, A.D. 816, can. 2, decrees, "when a church is built, let it be consecrated by a bishop of its own diocese: let the water be blessed, and sprinkled by himself, and all things fulfilled in order, according to the service book. Then let the Eucharist, which is consecrated by the bishop after the same form, be deposited with the other relics in a chest, and kept in the same church.
 And if he cannot bring other relics, at least he can do this chief thing, because it is the Body and Blood of our Lord Jesus Christ. And we charge every bishop that he have it pointed on the wall of the oratory, or on a table, as also on the altars, to what saints both of them are dedicated." The 141st of the Excerpts of Archbishop Egbert, circ. A.D. 750, provides when a church will need reconsecration. The Council of Worms, A.D. 868, forbids bishops to exact any fee or present for the consecration of a church, and also forbids them to consecrate any church except there be a writing under the hand of the founder confirming the foundation, and signifying what endowment he has given for the ministers and for the lights.

A decree is quoted from Gelasius, A.D. 492 (cf. Soer, Ecol. Hist. li. 8), to the effect that no bishop consecrate a church without the leave of the Apostolical see. Gregory the Great wrote official letters, whence we may gather the form in which, as bishop of Rome, he was accustomed to issue his license to his suffragans for dedication of a church or chapel, e.g., that "they take good heed that no dead body were buried in the place" (Epist. i. 52; v. 22; xli. 10); "if a bishop consecrated an oratory in another diocese, what he had done was null and void" (Epist. xi. 2). He would not have a new church consecrated unless it were endowed with sufficient revenue for maintaining divine service and the clergy (see Corp. Jur. Can. i. 457-481). Martene allows that Gelasius and Gregory were both intending to prescribe for Italy alone.

3. Ritual of Consecration.—It was customary, as we have seen, to deliver sermons at the time of consecration. There is one extant by St. Ambrose, preached at the dedication of a church built by Vitalianus and Majanus, A.D. 380; the sermon is entitled "De Dedicazione Basilicæ," from the text in St. Luke, "He loveth our nation, and he hath built us a synagogue." Gaudentius, bishop of Fresse in Italy, early in the 5th century, has left sermons "Die dedicacionis basilicæ sanctorum quadraginta martyrum" (Max. Bibl. Patrum, tom. v.; Migne's Patrol. xx.). St. Augustine's works (tom. v.) contain sermons of the same class, Serm. 256, de tem. ore, nl. 336-338, and in App. Serm. 229-231, considered to be those of Caesarius.

Of other rites and ceremonies we find occasional notices. Thus of the vigil kept the night preceding the dedication, St. Ambrose writes (Ep. 22) to his sister Marcellina and Gregory of Tours, de Gloria Confessorum; of the translation and deposition of relics, we read in the same epistle of St. Ambrose, "When I wished to dedicate the basilica, they began to interrupt me as it were with one mouth, saying, You should dedicate the basilica, as in the case of a Roman one. I answered, I will do so, if I find relics of martyrs." The same custom is mentioned by St. Basil, Epist. 49 (iii. 142), by St. Paulinus, Epist. ad Severum (Max. Bibl. Patrum, tom. vi. 193, &c.), by St. Greg. M. lib. i. c. 10. See in Martene. The relics were often not the bodies themselves, but what had been simply in contact with them [BRANDEUM]. The custom was at first peculiar to Rome, and was then extended and made obligatory by the 2nd Nicene Council. Ancient forms, given by Martene, prescribe that "the Body of the Lord be deposited." On dedication, Hooker (E. P. v. 13) and Bingham (Antiq. viii. 9, 8) both quote St. Augustine (de Civit. Dei, viii. 27; xxii. 10; contra Faust. xx. 21; contra Maxim. i.; de Vera Relig. c. 55) as showing how, and with what interest and limitation, the original custom of dedicating churches to the Lord only was afterwards extended to their dedication under the name, or as memorials of saints and martyrs, or by the title of virtues, especially of wisdom, as was the case in the chief cities of the empire. Augustine in writing against Maximinus grounds an argument for the deity of the Holy Ghost upon this distinction: "that He must be God, because temples were built and dedicated to Him, which it would be sacrilege to do to any other creature." The custom of lighting twelve candles is alluded to in the Pseudo-Augustine, Serm. 338 (al. 39, in Dedic. Ecclesiæ). "This lesson occurs suitably, when the candelabra are blessed, that he who works is as a light placed on a candlestick." The very ancient rite of inscribing either the whole alphabets both Greek and Latin, or some letters of them, or one alphabet, is spoken of by Gregory in his Liber Sacramentorum: "Then let the bishop begin from the left-hand corner at the east, writing on the pavement with his pastoral staff A. B. C., to the right corner of the west; again beginning from the corner at the east he writes A. B. C. and so on to the left corner of the church." Gregory says that some bishops added the Hebrew alphabet. The inscription was called the A. B. C. darium. See more on the custom in Martene (ii. 13, who gives A.D. 980 as the inferior date for it), and in Maskell, Monach. Lit. i. 173 n.

It is difficult, however, from the few and scattered notices in primitive writers, to construct the probable course of the ritual of consecration in early times. We may say with Bingham, "that the manner and ceremony of doing this was not always exactly one and the same, therefore we are chiefly to regard the substance of the thing, which was the separation of any building from common use to a religious service. Whatever ceremony this was performed with, the first act of initiating and appropriating it to a divine use was its consecration; and therefore, in allusion to this, the first beginning of anything is many times called its dedication. Whether churches had any other ceremony besides this in their dedication for the first three ages is not certain, though it is highly probable they might have a solemn thanksgiving and prayer for a sanctified use of them also, over and besides the usual liturgy of the Church, because this was in use among the Jews" (Antiq. viii. 9, 1). So also Lewis (Historical Essay) remarks upon the difficulty of discovering the use of this rite in its particular parts, because the custom of those early times was obscure, yet "he hopes to shew some remains of the footsteps of this ceremony" (p. 29), and gathers them together (p. 105), as traced in the several instances above given.

Of the various forms printed from MSS., the Ord. Romanus for the building and consecration of a church, &c., said to be of the 8th century, is given in the Max. Bibl. Patrum (tom. xiii. p. 715, &c.). Goar (Evch. Græcorum) gives the customary order in laying the foundation of a church, and the prayer to be said on the occasion, which some call the cross-fixing; and the order for fixing the cross after the church is finished, by the patriarch, under which head there are certain prayers attributed to Callixtus on the dedication of a temple, and a very prolix τὰς καὶ ἀπολυθία ἐπὶ καθιερώσει ναοῦ (p. 606, &c., and p. 846). Martene (Ecol. R. L. li. 13, p. 244 &c.) has printed eleven forms, of which the oldest are (1) from the Book of Gellone in Italy about A.D. 800, (2) from the pontifical of Egbert, archbishop of York, A.D. 750, (3) from the Anglian pontifical in the monastery of Jumièges, A.D. 800, (4) from the pontifical of St. Dunstan of Canterbury, (5) from a codex of St. Mary's, Rhims, A.D. 900, (6) from a 900. M. the Ord. eratione has son jimmary (Cod. L. Pontific. from other ancient sufficient (which L. mass pro tions of these w scarcely 4. Au have the tion of John x. 56-59; equarby "to hon dedication the annu tions, th through initiated the coos Sepulchre STASIS). 30). Fel the selem to be cel Great con by Augus custom of hading ce 30). The Sophia st Dec. 22 (L (ii. 250, clesiae, has festival nu The Sym be said to churches (consecratio 13; Bingham Alcin, de consecrated may be inv may be re Thomas Ac arl. 3) says the Church ctive is of resurrection Remigius of Treatise on rite. Cf. th in Maskell subject is e Rationale D Sigisnium 12th centur 5. Conse viii. 9, 10) seems to ha century; he 306, can. 14 that "altars dedicated to Him, which do to any other creature," twelve candles is alluded to, Serm. 338 (ii. 3), "this lesson occurs suitably, be blessed, that he who d on a candlestick." The scribling either the whole and Latin, or some letters t, is spoken of by Gregory Patrol. "Then let the left-hand corner at the vement with his pastoral ight corner of the west; be corner at the east he on to the left corner of the s that some bishops added . The inscription was arium. See more on the 13, who gives A.D. 980 as), and in Maskell, Monum.

ever, from the few and primitive writers, to con- scribe of the ritual of conse- s. We may say with manner and ceremony of ways exactly one and the re chiefly to regard the which was the separation common use to a religious emony this was performed, imitating and appropriating as its consecration; and o this, the first beginning times called its dedication. ad any other ceremony dication for the first three ough it is highly probable solemn thanksgiving and use of them also, over and rgy of the Church, because g the Jews" (Antiq. viii. Historical Essay) remarks discovering the use of this parts, because the custom as obscure, yet "he hopes as of the footsteps of this and gathers them together the several instances above ms printed from MSS, the e building and consecra- to be of the 8th century, is Patrol. (tom. xiii. p. 713, Procuration) gives the cste- foundation of a church, snail on the occasion, which -fixing; and the order for the church is finished, by which held there are certain Callixtus on the dedication very prolix τὰς καὶ ἀπο- u 2200 (p. 606, &c., and p. R. t. ii. 13, p. 244 &c.) has of which the oldest are (1) lone in Italy about A.D. 800, of Eglert, archbishop of from the Anglian pontifical nities, A.D. 800. (4) from Dunstan of Canterbury, (5) tary's, Rheims, A.D. 900, (6) from a pontifical of the Church of Noyon, A.D. 900. Maskell prints from the Sarum Pontifical the Ordo "De Ecclesie dedicatione, seu consecratione" (Monumen. Rit. i. 162-203), and has some remarks on the subject in his preliminary dissertation, pp. cclxv-cclxxv. Daniel (Cod. Liturg. i. 355-384), prints the rite "Ex Pontificali Romano," with notes of collation from other rituals. He holds that in the most ancient times it was not the mass only that was sufficient at the consecration of new churches (which Binterim had argued), but that it was the mass proper for dedication, together with additions of certain forms of benediction. Both these writers allow that the ritual of present use scarcely reaches the 8th century.

4. Anniversaries of consecrations of churches have their natural origin in the feast of dedication of the temple, attended by our Lord (St. John x. 22, 23) in conformity with 1 Macc. iv. 56-59; St. Gregory Nazian. (Orat. 43, eis τὴν ἑορτήν init.) speaks of it as an ancient custom "to honour churches by the feasts of their dedication; and that not for once only, but upon the annual return of the day of their consecrations, that good things become not forgotten through lapse of time." It is doctful who imitated the custom. Some make it date from the consecration of the church of the Holy Sepulchre at Jerusalem, on Sept. 13 [ANASTASIS]. (See Sozom. II. E. i. 26; Niceph. viii. 50.) Felix IV., A.D. 526, put out a decree "that the solemnities of the dedications of churches are to be celebrated every year." Gregory the Great confirmed the practice, and it was adopted by Augustine in Britain, together with the custom of building booths round the church, and holding common festivities (Bede, Ecol. Hist. i. 30). The memory of the dedication of St. Sophia at Constantinople was kept up every Dec. 22 (Du Cange, Const. Chr. iii. 6). Gavanti (ii. 250, &c.), de Commun. Dedications Ecclesie, has rules and remarks on this class of festival and its concurrence with others.

The Symbology of the rite of consecration may be said to appear in the earliest titles given to churches (see above), and in the essential idea of consecration as expressed by Hooker, E. P. v. 12, 13; Bingham, Antiq. viii. 9, 8; Lewis, p. 98. Alcuin, de Coena Domini, says, "Churches are consecrated that the coming of angels into them may be restrained from mean thoughts." St. Thomas Aquin. (Summa, part iii. Quæst. 85, art. 3) says, "A church is consecrated because the Church is the spouse of Christ; and when the octave is celebrated for denoting the glorious resurrection of the Church which is to come." Remigius of Auxerre, in the 10th century, has a Treatise on the mystical signification of the whole rite. Cf. the reference to this and other writers in Maskell (Monum. Rit. i. 162, 3). The same subject is elaborately drawn out by Durandus, Rationale Div. Off.: St. Bruno Astensis, Epic. Sigisismus (Mix. Bibl. Patr. xx. 1725), of the 12th century, &c.

5. Consecration of Altars.—Bingham (Ant. viii. 9, 10) says that the consecration of altars seems to have begun first of all in the 6th century; he quotes the Council of Agde, A.D. 506, can. 14 (Brun's Can. ii. 145), as enacting that "altars are to be consecrated not only by the chrisin, but with the sacerdotal benediction," and the Council of Epone, A.D. 517, can. 26 (ib. ii. 170), that "none but stone altars are to be consecrated with the unction of the chrisin." Gregory of Tours, in the 6th century, in his De Gloria Confessorum, c. xx. (Aligne, Patrol. 71, p. 842), describes the dedication of an oratory at Tours, a very beautiful cell, heretofore used as a salt cellar: "The altar was placed in its future position; the night was spent in vigil at the basilica; in the morning they went to the cell and consecrated the altar, then returned to the basilica, and thence took the relics. There were present a very large choir of priests and deacons, and a distinguished body of honourable citizens, with a large assembly of people. On arrival at the door a miracle of splendour took place," which Gregory describes.

LITERATURE.—Besides the several works and special treatises mentioned in the course of this article, reference may be made to Cardinal Bona, de Reb. Liturg. i. 19, 20 (Antwerp 1677, 4to); Fabricius (John), de Templis Christianorum (Helmstadii 1704, fol.); Augusti's List of the Literature of Holy Places (xi. 317). Schmid, Liturgik, Kultus der Christ-Katholische Kirche (vol. iii.), Liber domus Pontif. Rom. (Migne's Patrol. vol. 105), cap. v. p. 89, &c., "Index Generalis Materiarum" in Mar. Bibl. Patr. (tom. 1.) under the head "Ecclesia, 16, De Materiali Ecclesia, seu Templo, ejusque dedicatione," where some dedication sermons and mystical expositions and vindications of the rite of consecration may be found of the 12th and 13th centuries. [H. B.—v.]

6. Summary.—It will be seen in the instances given above that there are two distinct periods in the history of the consecration of churches. In the early ages, certainly as late as the time of Constantine, a church was inaugurated by solemn ceremonial, and dedicated to the service of God with prayer. Then, as churches built over the tombs of martyrs came to be regarded as endowed with peculiar sanctity, the possession of the relics of some saint came to be looked upon as absolutely essential to the sacredness of the building, and the deposition of such relics in or below the altar henceforward formed the central portion of the consecration-rite. All the essentials of such a rite are found in the description of the consecration of an oratory, quoted above from Gregory of Tours. [Compare ALTAR.]

To the second phase belong all the ancient rituals of consecration now extant, whether in East or West. We may take, as a summary of the rites above referred to, the service for the consecration of churches given in Egbert's Pontifical (pp. 26-58, ed. Surtees Soc.), which differs in no essential point from that of the Gregorin sacramentary.

The relics were to be watched the night before in some church already consecrated. In the morning the bishop and clergy came in procession to the church to be consecrated; candles are lighted, the clerks in procession pass round the church outside. The door of the church is opened with appropriate chants and ceremony. Prayer is said in the midst of the church, and the procession, with litany, solemnly approaches the altar with prostration. Then follows the A. B. C.arium (see above). Holy water is extending it to the church where meals are given; by another law, by excluding public from benefiting by it and Justinian afterwards (Novel. 17). Some constitutions may curia (E. civ. ed.), Cantibus and Nany the important let follows it; and in rights of sanctuary pitularies of the 8th church might never be under special circum- is: much more there- being solemnly conse- ded alienation are Ancyran, A.D. 315 and three following, may be still earlier. gulations to the same (it. 2) and 7th Novel, seems to be con- s being in trust for ounds: at all events, hurch consecrated sites harlemogue was more alaries (A.D. 802, c. 34, e semel Deo dedicata manent perpetuo me- fieri secularia habi- subsequently, till the "Regulae Juris." c of the Decretals, in o dicitum non est ad nsferendum" (No. 51). es used in building a have shared its con- afterwards be removed urely secular, though vents in this respect stronger than the De- e remarkable words on if in taking possession dedicated to his service, nce of it was condi- circumstances which ermanent: "Now have is house, that my name . But if ye turn away and my commandments on . . . this house which name will I cast out of it to be a proverb and ions" (2 Chron. vii. 16, ghten these words alth- effects of consecration." eux's Manual, Tract. de exvii.-xxxix. A larger ur. Canon. vol. ii. Tract. [V. S. Fl.]

(EUCCHARISTIC). (Χρησ- ερωσις, ἀγαμέμις) For consecration and bene- ON. The general con- of Eucharistic consecra- gy, and the question is considered here only in its relation to the liturgy.

1. The principal formulæ of consecration are given under CANON OF THE LITURGY. It will be seen in that article that the most noteworthy difference between the formulæ of consecration used in the Eastern and the Western churches respectively consists in this, that in the Eastern Church the Holy Spirit is invoked, after the recitation of the words of institution, to descend upon the elements, and make them the Body and Blood of Christ [EPICLESIS]; and this invocation is commonly thought to imply, that consecration would be imperfect without it. This seems also to be distinctly implied in the well-known passage of Cyril of Jerusalem (Catech. Mystag. v. c. 7), which speaks of the hallowing and changing influence of the Holy Spirit [CANON OF THE LITURGY, p. 269]. On the other hand, in the Western churches, the invocation of the Holy Spirit at this part of the liturgy is generally wanting, and the whole consecrating virtue is attributed by Western ritualists to the recitation of the words of institution, accompanied by the fitting gestures. In the Mozarabic liturgy, however, the variable prayer which follows the Secreta frequently contains an invocation of the Holy Spirit upon the elements; and such an invocation is almost certainly an ancient rite which the Latin Church has lost, not an innovation of the Orientals. Ample information on the points of difference in this respect between East and West may be found in Bona (de Reb. Lit. ii. c. 13, §§ 4, 5), Renaudot (Lit. Orient. l. 196), Tontée (note on Cyril, Cat. Myst. v. 7), Le Bru (Cérém. de la Messe, tom. iii.), and Neale (Eastern Ch. Introd. pp. 492 ff.).

2. In the Ordo Romanus III. c. 16, the following rubrical directions are given. "After the Pope has communicated of the cup, which is held by the archdeacon, the latter pours a portion of the remaining wine into the larger chalice from which the people is to communicate; for wine not consecrated but mingled with the Lord's Blood is completely sanctified (sanctificatur per omnem modum). The reason of this custom probably was that in a very large congregation it was difficult to consecrate exactly the quantity of wine required. A small quantity was therefore consecrated in the first instance, and amplified according to the number of communicants by pouring in fresh wine. The whole of the wine in the cup was held to be completely consecrated by mingling with that which had been originally consecrated. The same practice is enjoined in the Ceremoniale of St. Benignus at Dijon, in the Cistercian Statutes, in the Statutes of the Abbey of St. Victor at Paris, and in Lyndwood's Constitut. Provinc. See Mabillon (Comm. Prævious in Ord. Rom. pp. lxiii. xli.).

3. The placing a particle of the consecrated bread in the chalice is sometimes called "consecration." In the Missa Illyrica (Bona, de Reb. Lit. p. 553) the petition occurs, "Fiat commistio et consecratio corporis et sanguinis D. N. I. C. omnibus accipientibus nobis in vitam æternam;" and the 17th canon of the 1st Council of Orange directs, "Cum calyx et calix offerendus est, et admixtionem eucharistiae consecrandæ." Compare COMMISTIO.

4. On certain days it is an ancient custom not to consecrate the sacral elements. See PRÆ-SANCTIFIED, LITURGY OF.

CONSECRATION OF BISHOPS [BISHOP: ORDINATION.]

CONSENT TO MARRIAGE. The marriage-law of all countries turns upon one or other of two principles. Either marriage is viewed as a union between persons, or as the disposal of a property. In the former case, the consent of the parties themselves is the main element in it; in the latter, that of some other person or persons. Still, in legislations founded upon the former principle, the element of consent by others comes in as a salutary check upon rash self-disposal by the young; in those founded upon the latter, the recognition of a right of self-sale in the adult may equally check the too authoritative interference of others.

The Jewish law is in its inception essentially personal. Christ needed but to refer to the first chapter of the Jewish Scriptures in order to bring out the full spirituality of the marriage relation (Matt. xix. 4; Mark x. 6). In Genesis, the woman is at once brought before us as the one "helpmeet" for the man. At the outset of the Adamic history, there is no question of selling or buying, no exercise of any third will between the two. God simply brings the woman to the man, who at once recognises her as bone of his bones, and flesh of his flesh (c. ii. vv. 20, 22, 23). As the history proceeds, however, other elements develop themselves. Slavery makes its appearance, and the slave-owner is exhibited as giving the slave in marriage (Gen. xvi. 3; xxx. 4).

Throughout the patriarchal history (Gen. xxiv. xxix., xxxiv.; Ex. ii. 21), under the Law (Ex. xxi. 4, 7, 8; xxii. 17; Deut. xxii. 16), in the time of the Judges (Josh. xv. 16, 17; Judg. i. 12; xv. 1, 2; xxi. 1, 7, 8; Ruth iv. 10), under the Monarchy (1 Sam. xvii. 25; xviii. 19, 21, 27; 2 Sam. xiii. 13; 1 Kings ii. 17), after the Captivity (Nehem. xiii. 25), in our Lord's time (Matt. xxiv. 38; Luke xvii. 27), in the Apostolic Church (1 Cor. vii. 38), the right of the father to give his daughter in marriage, of the king to give one who was under his control, is either assumed or asserted.

It is nevertheless certain, as may be seen in Selden's treatise de Uxoræ Ebraicâ, and as has been stated above under the head BETROTHAL, that among the Jews the power of self-disposal in marriage was singularly wide for either sex, the man being held of full age, and capable of marrying at his will i. the last day of his 15th year, the woman in the second half of her 12th, whilst if betrothed under that age by their fathers, girls could repudiate the engagement at ten. Yet, strange to say, the forms used in Jewish practice belong to the material, and not to the spiritual view of marriage. The prominence given to the ARRHA or earnest [see ARRHA], and the necessity for its being given to the woman herself either in money or money's worth, show clearly that the grand spirituality of marriage, as exhibited in the second chapter of Genesis, had been lost sight of, that it had come to be viewed essentially as an act of wife-buying, and yet the fact that the woman, from earliest puberty, was reckoned as having the sole right of self-sale, preserved an amount of freedom in the contract which would otherwise seem to belong only to that view of it which the practice contradicts.

The Roman law exhibits to us a precisely opposite development; it starts from the material view to grow more and more into the spiritual one. Originally the father's potestas, scarcely to be distinguished from absolute ownership, overshadows all the domestic relations, extending equally to the wife and to the children of both sexes. Eventually, so far as marriage is concerned, the potestas resolves itself simply into a right of consent. And consent is made the very essence of marriage. "Nuptias non concubitus, sed consensus facit," are the words of Ulpian (Dig. bk. l. t. xvii. l. 30). The validity of marriages contracted by mere consent was admitted in a constitution of Theodosius and Valentinian, A.D. 449, (Code, bk. v. t. xvii. l. 8).

This consent, moreover, must be at once that of the parties themselves, and of those in whose potestas they are (Paulus, Dig. bk. xxiii. t. ii. l. 2). As to slaves, indeed, unlike the Jewish law, the Roman law never recognized such a thing as their marriage, and the unions between men and women slaves, which might be permitted and even respected by their masters, were of no more legal value than the coupling of domestic animals, although, as may be seen hereafter, they might be recognised by the superior morality of the church. Where, indeed, a master gave away, or allowed another to give away, his slave girl in marriage to a freeman, or constituted a dos upon her, Justinian ruled (as will be further shewn hereafter under the head CONTRACT) that this should amount to an enfranchisement (Code, bk. vii. t. vi. l. 9; 22nd Nov. c. 11). But this of itself shows that marriage and slavery were held to be incompatible.

The principle of the freedom of marriage, and of its resting mainly on the consent of the parties, stands generally recognised in Justinian's Code, and is indeed further carried out in it. "None," says a constitution of Diocletian and Maximian, "can be compelled either to marry, or to be reconciled after divorce" (Code, bk. v. t. iv. l. 14; and see l. 12, as to the filii familias).

On the other hand, several enactments of Justinian's Code shew that the law looked rather upon marriage, from the woman's point of view, as the choice of a husband for her, and therefore held that in the determination of that choice, the counsel or even the judgment of third persons might be called in (Code, bk. v. t. iv. l. 20).

The influx of the barbarian nations into the empire may be said to have in great measure restored, under other names, those stricter views of paternal authority which had belonged to Rome's earlier ages, at least as respects women. In the Edict of Theoric we find a provision that "a father shall not be compelled against his will to give his family in marriage to any" (c. 93). In the Lombard laws the mundium recalls the Roman potestas, but under a purely pecuniary form, and instead of being confined to the ascending line, seems to have belonged to the nearest male relation. Thus by a law of Rotharis (638 or 643), if after two years' betrothal the man does not claim his bride, "the father or brother or he who has her mundium" may prosecute the surety (if he pays her meta or jointure, after which "they may give her to another husband, being a freeman" (c. 178). A widow had power, if she choose, to go to another husband, being a freeman (c. 182). And the woman's consent, whether girl or widow, has always great weight in the eyes of the law. Thus it takes account of the cases of a man marrying a girl or widow betrothed to another, "yet with her consent" (c. 190), and in like manner of his ravishing either with her consent—the term apparently meaning here, carrying away without marriage (c. 191). Where indeed a slave married a freewoman with her consent, her parents might kill her, or sell her out of the province (c. 222). The laws of Leutprand, A.D. 713, enact penalties against those who betroth to themselves, or marry, girls under twelve, but a father or brother may give or betroth his daughter or sister at any age (bk. ii. c. 6). And it seems to be admitted that a girl of twelve may "go to a husband" without the will of her parents (bk. vi. c. 61, and see c. 66; A.D. 724). The mundium, it may be observed, appears also in the law of the Alamans, latter half of 8th century.

Under the law of the Saxons, a man who wished to marry had to give 300 solidi to the girl's parents (t. iv. l. 1), but if he did so against the parent's will, she consenting, twice that amount (l. 2). If he wished to marry a widow, he must offer the price of her purchase to her guardian (apparently a Latinized expression for the mundard, or mund-cald, holder of the mundium), her relatives consenting thereto (t. vii. l. 3). If her guardian refused the money, he must turn to her next of kin, and by their consent he might have her, but he must have 300 solidi ready to give to the guardian (l. 4). Here a power of consent in the kinsmen generally, over and above the specific powers of the holder of the mundium, is clearly admitted.

The Burgundian law (originally of the beginning of the 6th century) recognizes also some freedom of choice in the woman, especially if a widow. Where a girl of her own accord has sought a man, he has to pay only three times the "price of marriage" (nuptial pretium) instead of six times, which he would have to pay if he had carried her off against her will (t. xii. cc. 1, 3; see also t. cxc.). A widow wishing to remarry within the year of her husband's death, is said to have "free power" to do so (t. xlii. c. 2; law of A.D. 517). But in a later law, a power of consent in parents seems to be indicated (t. 35).

The Visigothic law, which has always been held to bear peculiar marks of clerical inspiration, is especially restrictive of the woman's self disposal. A law of Theodesind, allowing for the first time intermarriage between Goths and Romans, enacts that a freeman may marry a freewoman with the solemn consent of the ascendant ("prosapiae"), and the permission of the court (c. 11. t. i. c. 1). If a man has betrothed to himself a girl "with the will of her father or the other near relatives to whom by law this power is given," the girl may not marry another against the will of her relatives, but handed over to her betrothed. The same has settled, agreed upon before the father "or implying as out in the

The con altogether when neither other will (with). V to male into the betrothed in the Roman the fulfillm be enforce: consent of trothed if actual man holds good. succession And the la position to (t. ir. c. 2).

The Sull clearness th to marriage 6th centur King Cloth apparently (Councils, v our authori a widow o Two centuri (A.D. 757) en man have gi against her relatives w will not ha have power The implicat marriage of the woman's remarried.

Substanti sently notice follow the n sion, eventu the basis of doubtful aut century), at Council of A that widows, marry whom some—ar-t a husband w the earliest C to our own E certain date, thus: "Wha do, for the h the will of father" (c. Egbert, arch It is writte to be united to absolutely ren

... his bride, "the
... her manumission"
... he pays her meta
... may give her to
... freeman" (c. 178),
... if she chooses, to go
... a freeman (c. 183)
... whether girl or
... sight in the eyes of
... of the cases of a
... widow betrothed to
... sent" (c. 190), and
... either with her
... meaning here,
... marriage (c. 191).
... a freewoman
... might kill her,
... (c. 222). The
... enact penalties
... to themselves, or
... but a father or
... his daughter or
... (c. 6). And it seems
... of twelve may "go
... will of her parents
... 36; A.D. 724). The
... wed, appears also in
... latter half of 8th

Saxons, a man who
... 300 solidi to the
... if he did so against ... assenting, twice that
... to marry a widow,
... her purchase to her
... in legal expression for
... holder of the manning
... thereto (t. vii).
... fused the money, he
... of kin, and by their
... r, but he must have
... the guardian (l. 4).
... at in the kinship
... the specific powers of
... is clearly admitted.
... originally of the begina-
... recognizes also some ... woman, especially if a
... her own accord has
... pay only three times
... (nuptial pretium)
... h he would have to
... off against her will
... t. cxc.). A widow
... in the year of her
... b have "free power"
... of A.D. 517). But in
... sent in parents seems

... which has always been
... of clerical inspiration,
... the woman's self dis-
... allowed, allowing for ... between Goths and
... reman may marry a
... emn consent of the
... and the permission of
...). If a man has
... girl "with the will of ... near relatives to whom
... en," the girl may not
... the will of her rela-

CONSENT TO MARRIAGE

... fives, but both she and her husband shall be ... handed over to the power of the man who had ... betrothed her "with the will of her relatives."
... The same course is to be followed if the father ... has settled for the marriage of his daughter, and ... agreed upon the price, and if the father dies ... before the marriage, the girl is to be given to ... him to whom she has been promised by her ... father "or her mother" (t. 2), the last words
... implying seemingly a power of consent through... out in the mother.

The consent of the parties is not, however,
... altogether overlooked, especially after betrothal,
... when neither can change his or her will if the ... other will not consent (c. 3; law of Chindas... wirth). Where girls of full age are betrothed ... to male infants, if either party appears to object, ... the betrothal cannot stand good. Two years (as ... in the Roman law) is the period beyond which ... the fulfilment of the betrothal contract cannot ... be enforced, unless by the honest and proper ... consent of parents or relatives, or of the be... trothed if of full age (c. 4). And a girl's ... actual marriage without her parents' consent
... holds good, though she forfeits her share in their ... succession (t. ii. c. 8; and see also t. iv. c. 7).
... And the law admits that a woman may be in a ... position to dispose of herself—in suo arbitrio
... (t. iv. c. 2).

The Salic law hardly shows with sufficient ... clearness the early Frankish view as to consent ... to marriage. Towards the latter half of the ... 6th century, however, a general constitution of ... King Clothar, recorded by Labbe and Mansi, ... apparently as possessing ecclesiastical authority
... (Concils, vol. ix. p. 761) enacts that "none by ... our authority shall presume to seek in marriage
... a widow or a girl without their own will."
... Two centuries later the Capitulary of Compiègne
... (A.D. 757) enacts in a particular case that "if any ... man have given his step-daughter, being a Frank,
... against her will and that of her mother and ... relatives a freeman, slave, or cleric, and she ... will not have him and leaves him, her relatives ... have power to give her another husband" (c. 4).
... The implication contained in the above text, that ... marriage of a freewoman with a slave might by ... the woman's own consent hold good, will be ... remarked.

Substantially, with an exception to be pre... sently noticed, the Church did little else than ... follow the municipal law on the subject of con... sent, eventually adopting the Roman civil law as ... the basis of her own. If we except a canon of ... doubtful authority, to be found in Gratian (12th ... century), attributed either to the 4th or 5th ... Council of Arles (A.D. 524 or 554), and enacting ... that widows, before professing continence, may ... marry whom they will,—that virgins may do the ... same,—and that none should be forced to accept ... a husband without the will of their parents,—
... the earliest Church enactments seem to belong ... to our own British Isles. An Irish synod of un... certain date, presided over by St. Patrick, speaks
... thus: "What the father wills, that let the girl
... do, for the head of the woman is the man. But ... the will of the girl is to be inquired of the ... father" (c. 27). In the so-called Excerpta of ... Egbert, archbishop of York, in the 8th century, ... it is written: "Parents ought to give women to
... be united to men in marriage, unless the woman
... absolutely refuse, in which case she may enter a

CONSENT TO MARRIAGE 435

... convent" (bk. ii. c. 20); not a very wide stretch
... of female freedom. Further on, a singular provi... sion allows the husband whose wife has deserted ... him, and refused for five years to make peace ... with him, to marry another woman, "with the ... bishop's consent" (c. 26).

The Council of Friuli (A.D. 791) forbade the ... marriage of infants, requiring purity of age and ... mutual consent. The Carolingian capitularies,
... which have a sort of mixed clerical and civil
... authority, enact amongst other things that none ... shall marry a widow "without the consent of ... her priest" (bk. vi. l. 408); a provision which ... recalls one already noticed from the Visigothic ... law, that marriage shall not be lawful unless
... the wife be sought for at the hands of those who ... appear to have power over the woman, and under ... whose protection she is (bk. vii. l. 463); an enact... ment which is either the original or a slightly ... varied replica of a supposed letter by Pope Eva... ristus (A.D. 112-21), the spuriousness of which ... has been shown under the head BENEDICTION.
... It is however also enacted that women are not ... to be compelled to marry, under penalty of treble
... ban, and public penance; or, in default of means,
... of prison or banishment (l. 470). Lastly, it may ... be mentioned that the edict of Charlemagne in ... 814 required inquiry to be made, amongst other ... things, as to men who had wives "against the ... will of their parents."

On one point, indeed, we may trace from an ... early period a marked divergence between the ... practice of the Church and the Roman law. On ... the subject of slave-marrriages, the Apostolical ... Constitutions breathe the spirit of the Jewish ... law, not of the Roman. Not only are slave-... marriages recognized, but it is treated as an ... offence in a Christian master if he does not ... "give" a wife to his man-slave (bk. viii. c. 32; ... compare Exod. xxi. 4). Again, in a work which ... perhaps does not greatly differ in date from the ... later portions of the Apostolical Constitutions, ... St. Basil's first Canonical Epistle, addressed to ... Amphilocheus, bishop of Iconium, the writer, ... treating evidently of slave-marrriages, says: "A ... woman who has given herself to a man against ... her master's will has committed adultery" (c. 40).
... And again more generally: "Marrriages without ... the will of those who have authority (ἀνευ τῶν ... κρατούντων) are adulteries; and therefore during ... the life of the father or master (θεσπίου) they ... cannot be free from impeachment until the assent
... of such" [termed here κύριοι, lords] "be ob... tained; for then does the marriage acquire firm... ness" (c. 42). Harsh as is the tone of these ... passages towards the victims of slavery, it is ... clear that for Basil the relation of the slave to ... the master is not the heathen one of the thing ... to its owner, but one exactly analogous to that ... of the child to its father. Father and master ... have indeed alike the quasi-sovereign power of a ... κύριος; the marriage of those under their ... authority is void without their assent, but it is ... firm (βέβαιος) with it.

Somewhat less than two centuries later (A.D.
... 541), the 24th canon of the Council of Orléans ... requires slaves who flee for sanctuary to churches
... in order to marry to be returned to their masters
... and separated, unless their parents and masters ... will let them marry. This is again a harsh... toned enactment, but one which really indicates ... a rise in the slave's condition. Hitherto the master's consent has been the sole condition of validity for the slave's marriage; Basil himself assimilated his authority over the slave to that of a father. Now the existence of a parental authority is recognized in the slave himself towards his own offspring, and the slave-parent's consent is placed on a level with that of the master.

Towards the end of the 6th century, again (A.D. 581), a canon (10) of the 1st Council of Micon expressly enacts that if two slaves intermarry with their master's consent, after the enfranchisement of either the marriage is not dissolved, though the other be not redeemable; a step in advance of anything to be found in the records of American slavery in modern times. And in the Carolingian era, the marriage of slaves with the master's consent obtains civil as well as ecclesiastical validity. A capitulary annexed to the Lombard laws enacts "That the marriages of slaves be not dissolved, if they have had different masters, . . . but so nevertheless that the marriage itself be legal, and by the will of their masters" (c. 129). The 30th canon of the 2nd Council of Châlons, A.D. 813, is precisely to the same effect.

On the whole it may be said that, except so far as relates to the marriage of slaves, the rule of the Church in respect of the consents necessary to the validity of marriage became hardly settled during the period which occupies us. The necessity for the free consent of the parties themselves was never entirely lost sight of; but in outlying regions, and under the pressure of barbarian feelings in certain races, the authority of the father over a daughter was almost acknowledged as absolute; whilst elsewhere a claim of the family at large to interfere was at least tacitly admitted. Towards the end of the period, indeed, in two instances the priest or bishop himself was made a consenting party. In no instance however is marriage when actually contracted (except as between slaves) treated as void or voidable for want of the consent of a third person. As to consents to BETHROTHAL, see that word. See also generally CONTRACT OF MARRIAGE.

[J. M. L.]

CONSIGNATORIUM. To bless by the use of the sign of the cross, as in confirmation, is termed consignare; hence the word consignatorium is occasionally used to designate the place set apart for that rite. John the Deacon of Naples (Chronicon Episc. Neap.) says that Bishop John (about 616) erected a beautiful building, called consignatorium ablatorum, so arranged that the newly baptized should pass in on one side, be presented to the bishop who sat in the midst, and then pass out by the other side. This arrangement was probably somewhat peculiar; the Pseudo-Alcuin at least (De Div. Off. c. 19), describing the ceremonies of Easter-Eve, says that the newly baptized were confirmed in the sacrorium. (Ducange's Glossary, s. v. 'Consignatorium.')

[C.]

CONSISTENTES. [PENITENCE.]

CONSTANTIA, martyr at Nuceria under Nero, Sept. 19 (Mart. Hieron., Usuardi). [C.]

CONSTANTINE, bishop, deposition at Gap in France, April 12 (Mart. Hieron., Usuardi). [C.]

CONSTANTINE THE GREAT, Emperor.

Constantine and his mother Helena, ἡσυχαστῶν, are commemorated May 21 (C. Byzant.); June 18 (C. Armen.); August 28 = March 24 (C. Ethiop.). Constantine is separately commemorated on Nov. 10 in the Georgiana Calendar. [C.]

CONSTANTINOPLÉ, COUNCILS OF.

(1) A.D. 335 (Mansi, ii. 1167-70) held by the Eusebians under Eusebius of Nicomedia, at which St. Athanasius was exiled to Treves, Marcellus of Ancyra, with several other bishops deposed, and Arius ordered to be received into communion by the Alexandrine Church. According to Rufinus (Hist. l. 12), it was convened by order of the emperor, viz., Constantine the Great, and according to Eusebius the historian (cont. Mar. l. 4), it was exclusively gathered together from the upper provinces of Asia Minor, from Thrace, and the parts beyond it; in other words, the neighbourhood of the capital. It seems to have met in February, and not separated till the end of July, so that its proceedings spread over nearly six months.

(2) A.D. 339, or according to Pagi, 340, by order of the Emperor Constantius, to depose Paul, the newly elected bishop there, whose orthodoxy displeased him, and translate Eusebius, his favourite, from Nicomedia to the imperial see (Mansi, ii. 1275).

(3) A.D. 360 (Mansi, iii. 325-36), composed of deputies from the council of Seleucia, just over, with some bishops summoned from Bithynia, to meet them, about fifty in all (Soc. ii. 41 and seq.). Most of the former were partisans of the metropolitan of Caesarea, whose name was Acacius, and Semi-Arians. A creed was published by them, being the 9th, says Socrates, that had come out since that of Nicea. It was, in fact, what had been rehearsed at Rimini, with the further declaration that neither substance nor hypostasis were permissible terms in speaking of God. The Son was pronounced to be like the Father according to the Scriptures, and Aetius, who maintained the contrary opinion, was condemned. A synodical epistle to George, bishop of Alexandria, whose presbyter he was, conveyed the sentence passed upon him and his followers. Several bishops were deposed at the same time; among whom were Macedonius, bishop of Constantinople, Eleusius of Cyzicum, Basilius of Ancyra, and last, but not least, St. Cyril of Jerusalem—all for various causes. Ten bishops, who declined subscribing to these depositions, were to consider themselves deposed till they subscribed. Ulphilas, bishop of the Goths, who had hitherto professed the Nicene faith, was one of those present, and joined in their creed. Eulolius managed to slip from Antioch into the vacancy created by the deposition of Macedonius. On the other hand, Eustathius of Sebaste was not allowed even a hearing, as having been previously deposed at the synod of Caesarea, in Asia Minor, under his own father, Eulalius.

(4) The 2nd general, . . . in May, A.D. 381, to re-assemble the following year, for reasons explained by the bishops in their synodical letter of that date (Mansi, iii. 581, note). Owing to this circumstance, and to the fact that its acts have been lost, its proceedings are not easy to unravel. Socrates begins his account of it by saying that the Emperor Theodosius convened a ec. cil. of in order t prevail, a Constantin his bidding short addr what they nothing of (S. mod. li. his bidding

there has having in t 150 (p.) fr bishops of but they q they found fathers to subscribe.
Alexandria,
at first, St.
of Thessalo with the tw were the m rian being separated.
72) has pr scribed. Se at first sig por by th at the clos however, th 6th century
gues, recko Canon, ii. 5 but then h
The creed f Isidore Mer
three, and Another Lat councils out
The Arabic without the setting down version. W seems to ad well known patriarchs a council: no separate hea prelates, and as follows:
was granted and he was nple second, bishop of A Jerusalem fir as neither it ing special Beveridge needed with all prohibiti some council ing upon the out as we ex doctrines of in particular Acomœans—
—the Eudexi Arians or The Holy Spirit—
Marcellus, Ph
the Semi-Ari

her Helena, transoro- day 21 (C. Hysnat); Magabit 28 = March Constantine is separately to in the Geographia
[C.]

2. COUNCILS OF 1167-70) held by the
of Nicomedia, at which 1 to Treves, Marcellus other bishops deposed, received into communion sh. According to Rufus convened by order of tantine the Great, and historian Cont. Marvi. gathered together from Asia Minor, from Thrace,
; in other words, the ital. It seems to have at separated till the endings spread over nearly rding to Pagl, 340, by Constantinus, to depose d bishop there, whose

, and translate Eusebius, omedida to the imperial ii, 325-36), compose of l of Seleucia, just over, nomed from Bithynia, to al (Syn. ii. 41 and seq.), partisans of the metro-nensis name was Acacius. reed was published by ays Socrates, that had Nicaea. It was, in fact, ed at Rimini, with the al neither substance nor ible terms in speaking of announced to be like the Scriptures, and Aetius, ntrary opinion, was compistie to George, bishop lesbyter he was, conveyed n him and his followers. posed at the same time; lonius, bishop of Constanticum, basilius of Ancyra, St. Cyril of Jerusalem—Ten bishops, who declined ositions, were to consider they subscribed. Ulpianus, o had hitherto professed one of those present, and Eulianus managed to slip viancy created by the us. On the other hand, was not allowed even a en previously deposed at in Asia Minor, under his l, . . . in May, A.D. 381, lowing year, for reasons as in their synodical letter ii. 58 l. note). Owing to to the fact that its acts ceedings are not easy to his account of it by r Theodosius convened a council of bishops of the same faith as himself, in order that the faith settled at Nicaea might prevail, and a bishop be appointed to the see of Constantinople (v. 8). That the bishops met at his bidding is testified by themselves in their short address to him subsequently, to confirm what they had decreed (Mansl. ib. 557), to say nothing of other proofs, for which see Beveridge (Synod. ii. 89). Whether they re-assembled at his bidding we are not told. Of their number there has never been any dispute, this council having in fact gone by the name of that of "the 150 (or) fathers" ever since. There were 36 bishops of the Macedonian party likewise invited, but they quit'ed Constantinople in a body when they found that it was the faith of the Nicene fathers to which they would be called upon to subscribe. Of those present, Timothy, bishop of Alexandria, St. Meletius of Antioch, who presided at first, St. Cyril of Jerusalem, Ascholius, bishop of Thessalonica, St. Amphilocheus of Iconium, with the two Gregories of Nazianzum and Nyssa, were the most considerable, Nectarius and Flavian being added to their number before they separated. Dionysius Exiguus (Mansi, iii. 568-72) has preserved the names of all who subscribed. Seven canons and a creed would appear at first sight to have been submitted to the emperor by the assembled fathers for confirmation at the close of their labours. John Scholasticus, however, the Greek collector of canons in the 6th century, contemporary with Dionysius Exiguus, reckons only six (ap. Justell. Byz. Jur. Canon. ii. 502). Dionysius himself only three; but then he has appended the 4th to the 2nd. The creed follows in his version as in the Greek. Isidore Mercator makes six canons out of his three, and numbers the creed as a 7th. Another Latin version given in Mansi makes five canons out of his three, and omits the creed. The Arabic paraphrase (ib.) makes four in all, without the creed; but, in addition to his three, setting down as a fourth canon 6 of the Greek version. Whether any canons have been lost seems to admit of some doubt. Socrates, as is well known, speaks of the establishment of patriarchs as one of the things done by this council; and the Arabic paraphrase, under a separate heading, "concerning the order of the prelates, and their rank and place," explains this as follows: "Honour besides, and the primacy, was granted in this council to the bishop of Rome, and he was made first, the bishop of Constantinople second, the bishop of Alexandria third, the bishop of Antioch fourth, and the bishop of Jerusalem fifth"—which is the more remarkable as neither it nor Socrates omit the canon ordaining special prerogatives for new Rome. As Beveridge well remarks, it is one difficulty connected with these canons (Synod. ii. 98), that in all probability they were not all passed at the same council. This, and a good deal more bearing upon the history of the council, will come out as we examine them. Canon 1 confirms the doctrine of the 318 Nicene Fathers, condemning in particular the errors of the Eunomians or Anomeans—in other words, the extreme Arians—the Eudoxians or Arians pure, and the Semi-Arians or Pneumatomachi—fighters against the Holy Spirit—with the followers of Sabellius, Marcellus, Photinus, and Apollinaris. Of these the Semi-Arians engage the most attention by far here, from the further error into which they had fallen of late respecting the Divinity of the Holy Ghost. All, in short, that was ruled by this council on doctrine was directed against them exclusively. But, as such, they were more properly termed Macedonians than Semi-Arians, from Macedonius, bishop of Constantinople, deposed at the synod held there A.D. 360, for various crimes, and afterwards founder of the sect called "Pneumatomachi." For obvious reasons they are not designated here from the name of their founder. What their errors were we shall see presently. Canon 2 confines each bishop to his own diocese, in particular the bishop of Alexandria is restricted to Egypt, the bishops of the East to the East alone, the privileges of the Church of Antioch, in conformity with the Nicene canons, being maintained: the bishops of Asia, that is, Asia Minor, to the South-West, Pontus and Thrace, similarly to their respective limits. By the word "diocese" is meant, as Beveridge shows (p. 8-3), a tract embracing several provinces. The events which had led to this enactment require some notice. Immediately on the death of Valens (Clinton's Fasti R. A. D. 379, col. 4), St. Gregory Nazianzen appeared at Constantinople, whither he was invited by the orthodox party refusing obedience to Demophilus, the Arian bishop in possession. He was consecrated by St. Meletius of Antioch, who thus went out of his diocese to ordain him. Peter, bishop of Alexandria—then reckoned the second see in the world after Rome—not to be outdone, nominated Maximus the cynic, as he was called from his philosophical antecedents, to the post, and deputed three bishops from Egypt to carry out his consecration on the spot. Maximus had previously seemed to take part with Gregory, and Theodosius rejected him, when he appeared as his rival (Clinton, ib. and Vales, ad Soz. vii. 9). This conflict of the two sees, however, terminated in the resignation of Gregory, soon after the meeting of the council, though he was declared bishop there, and all that related to Maximus annulled in a special canon—the 4th.

Most probably, the 3rd canon, ordaining that in future the see of Constantinople should take honorary precedence (τῆ προεβία τῆς τιμῆς) next after Rome, was intended to prevent the bishops of Antioch and Alexandria from ever attempting to take such liberties with it again.

Another event had occurred meanwhile (Clinton, ib. col. 4), which may be supposed to account for the salvo to the privileges of the Church of Antioch, expressed in the 2nd canon. St. Meletius of Antioch had died "during the session between May and July." The funeral oration pronounced over him by St. Gregory at Nyssa is still extant, but it contains no historical allusions. There had been a compact entered into between his party and that of St. Paulinus at Antioch two years before—where they were rival bishops—that both parties, whenever either of the bishops died, should unite under the survivor of them. In spite of this understanding, Flavian, who had been one of the chief promoters of it among the supporters of St. Meletius, was unanimously appointed bishop in his stead by the council (Cave, Hist. Lit. i. 277 and 364). This act not merely re-opened the schism at Antioch, but produced heart-burnings elsewhere, the Western and Egyptian bishops pronouncing more strongly than ever, in favour of St. Paulinus, and the disapprobation shown for Flavian by St. Gregory, tending to alienate numbers of his own friends from him amongst the Easterns. It was, in fact, one of the principal causes of his retirement. The appointment of his successor, Nectarius, at the instance of the emperor, was probably the last act of the council of this year—and a strong act it was, as Nectarius had to be baptised before he could be consecrated (Soz. vii. 6). Dionysius Exiguus, as has been said, gives his canons of this council with the 4th. As Beveridge, too, remarks (ib. p. 98), traces of a new series commence with the 5th. It runs as follows:—"Concerning the tome of the Westerns, we, too, have received those who professed their belief, at Antioch, in one Godhead of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost." What was this tome of the Westerns? Beveridge considers it to have been the synodical epistle received from Pope Damasus by the Easterns at their second meeting, A.D. 382, to which they wrote their own in reply. De Marca, Cave, and others prefer to consider it a synodical letter of Pope Damasus, addressed to the synod of Antioch A.D. 378 or 9. Baronius, another of his to St. Paulinus of Antioch some years before. May it not be that the first tome of the kind was the letter sent by St. Athanasius in the name of his synod at Alexandria, A.D. 362, to the Church of Antioch, which he calls "a tome" himself, to which St. Paulinus is expressly said to have subscribed, and in which the indivisibility of the Holy Ghost from the substance both of the Father and the Son is as distinctly set forth as it ever was afterwards (Mansi, iii. 353-4). Through Eusebius of Vercelli, to whom it was addressed, and by whom it was in due time subscribed, it would find its way into the West and to Rome, as the rallying point of the orthodox, and a bond of union, under existing circumstances, between the sees of Alexandria, Antioch, and Rome, whose acceptance of its doctrine can scarce have become known to each other before Macedonius, the ex-patriarch at Constantinople, commenced assailing the Divinity of the third person in the Godhead. On this, it would immediately give rise to, and be the foundation of, a series of "tomes" or epistles of the same kind between them, in which Constantinople, being in Arian hands, would take no part, nor Alexandria much, owing to the banishment of its orthodox prelate, Peter, from A.D. 373 to 378, under Valens. St. Meletius had also been driven from Antioch a year earlier; but then we are told expressly by Sozomen (vi. 7), his orthodox successor, St. Paulinus was allowed to remain; and there could be no account for the correspondence that went on between him and Pope Damasus unintermittedly while St. Meletius was away, and of which the prominent topic was the Divinity of the Holy Ghost. Now, as Mansi points out (iii. 463-8), the synods of Antioch and Rome are confusedly given about this time. There are traces of a synod of Antioch, as well as of another at Rome, A.D. 372; but the acts of both have not hitherto been distinguished from those of two later synods at Rome, A.D. 377, and at Antioch, the year or two years following, under St. Meletius, on the return of the exiles. And one thing may well be thought to have been agreed upon at the first of these synods of Antioch, and possibly Rome too, which was afterwards confirmed in the 2nd, and is evidently referred to by the Constantinopolitan fathers in their synodical letter, namely, the creed in its enlarged form. And for this reason—St. Epiphanius, bishop of Salamis in Cyprus, was another of the orthodox bishops who was not disturbed in his see; and his see, whether subject to Antioch or not, then, must have brought him into frequent communication with even if he had not been a personal friend of St. Paulinus, or was not present at the synod held there A.D. 372. Now, in c. 119 of his work called Anchatus, of which he fixes the date himself in the next c., viz., A.D. 373, what was rehearsed afterwards at the council of Chalcedon as the creed of the 150 fathers, that is, of this council of Constantinople, is set down word for word, so far as its new clauses are concerned, and called that of Nicea by him. Admit this form to have been agreed upon at the synod of Antioch, in conjunction, c. not, with that of Rome, A.D. 372, and his own use of it the year following, as the authorised creed of the Church, is explained at once, nor is there any reason why St. Gregory Nyssen, if he composed it at all—as stated by Nicephorus alone (xii. 13)—should not have composed it there. But Valens coming to Antioch in April (Clinton, A.D. 372, col. 2), to persecute the orthodox, the probability would be that this synod was hastily broken up, and remained in abeyance till A.D. 378 or 9, when its proceedings were resumed under St. Meletius, and confirmed by 163 bishops, and with its proceedings this creed. All at the same time they subscribed to the Western tome or letter of Pope Damasus. Hence, both the language of the 5th Constantinopolitan canon above mentioned, and of the fathers who framed it, in their synodical letter, where they say that "this, their faith, which they had professed there summarily, might be learnt more fully by their Western brethren, on their being so good as to refer to 'the tome' that emanated from the synod of Antioch, and that set forth by the oecumenical council of Constantinople the year before, in which documents they had professed their faith at greater length." Now, what they had set forth themselves was their adherence to the Nicene faith and reprobation of the heresies enumerated in their first canon; what they had received from Antioch and accepted must have been the creed which has since gone by their name, but was certainly not their composition; and whatever else was confirmed there, A.D. 378, including the Western tome, which of the letters of Pope Damasus is here specified comes out as plainly. His letter to St. Paulinus was written A.D. 372, when there was nobody left at Antioch but St. Paulinus to write to. The letter addressed in his own name and that of the 90 bishops of the East, was "the tome" received by the synod at Antioch A.D. 378-9 (Mansi, ib. p. 459-62); to which they replied the same year (ib. p. 511-15). Both letters being on the same subject—as were those of 372 and 378-9—it was easy to confuse them. Amphilocheus, bishop of Iconium, held a synod and wrote on the same subject about the same time (ib. p. 503-8).

We are now in a position to deal with the synodical letter of the reassembled council of Constantinople, which were generally settled, most Constantinopolitan Theoretists, and Baron. A.D. indeed, Asch. SS. Epiphanius meanwhile to they received inviting them was to content list, we can on they say in re canon, which quence. The r not peril and going away s come to Const been written Aquilla the y dosius—eviden cations of Fla disapprovingly made un prepone. The mo departs into and Priscian a ceedings, which with what has faith, and endi tianus and Flavi in their respec recognised by t the same reason framing of the The same date come o, restric proceedings ag appeals to the prescribing the admitting heret him not to bel almost identical (Ev. ad 1). O adled to what h A.D. 373, havi Antioch, in conf of St. Athanasius less confirmed. A probably by the 382, than promu of the year pre been the creed of 3 and 6) as lat of the city the portion of it g been this, as Soc. iii. 25), or a there is a fami creed of the (Hu by St. Cyril will (Heurtley's De hyptheses alone notice should l council of Fohes coic, namely, be patriarchal, and a general council, with that of Nic fathers of the 4th med in the 2nd, and the Constantinopolitan letter, namely, the Anathema for this reason. Salamis in Cyprus, six bishops who was and his see, whether it, then, must have communication with a personal friend of present at the synod in c. 119 of his work fixes the date him—A.D. 374, what was the council of Chalcedon, that is, of this is set down for sees are concerned, and m. Admit this form of the synod of Antioch, which that of Rome, A.D. the year following, as a Church, is explained reason why St. Gregory at all—as stated by (D)—should not have Valens coming to A.D. 372, col. 2, to the probability would mostly broken up, and A.D. 373 or 9, when held under St. Meletius, bishops, and with its pro- at the same time that the Western time or Hence, both the Constantinopolitan canon above others who framed it, in where they say that which they had professed be learn: more fully en, on their being so tome' that emanated a, and that set forth by of Constantinople the cuments they had pro- "center length." Now, themselves was their faith and reprobation ed in their first canon; from Antioch and ac- creed which has since was certainly not their ver else was confirmed the Western tone. Pope Damasus is here tainly. His letter to St. d. 372, when there was at St. Paulinus to write in his own name and s with him, "to the East," was "the tone" at Antioch, A.D. 378-9 to which they replied (11-15). Both letters act—was the synod as easy to confuse them. Icomium, held a synod subject about the same sition to deal with the reassembled council of Constantinople A.D. 382, and their proceedings generally. Finding there were still ecclesiastical matters of urgent importance to be settled, most of the bishops who had met at (Constantinople A.D. 381, returned thither, as Theodoret relates, the following summer (Mansi ed. Baron. A.D. 382, n. 3). One of their number, indeed, Aschellus, bishop of Thessalonica, and St. Epiphanius and Jerome with him, had gone meanwhile to Rome. Being at Constantinople, they received a synodical letter from the West, inviting them to Rome, where a large gathering was in contemplation. This letter having been lost, we can only guess at its contents from what they say in reply to it, coupled with their other canon, which was evidently framed in consequence. The affairs of the East being in imminent peril and confusion, they beg to be excused going away so far from their sees. They had come to Constantinople on account of what had been written by the West after the synod of Aquileia the year before to the Emperor Theodosius—evidently the letter in which the condemnations of Flavian and Nestorius are mentioned disapprovingly (Mansi, ib. p. 611-2)—but had made no preparations for going further from home. The most they could do would be to send deputies into the West. Cyrillus, Eusebius, and Priscian are named, to explain their proceedings, which they then epitomise, commencing with what has been anticipated above about their faith, and ending with the statement that Nestorius and Flavian had been appointed canonically to their respective sees, while St. Cyril was recognised by them as bishop of Jerusalem for the same reason. Thus this letter explains the framing of their 5th canon, and attests its date. The same date is assigned by Beveridge to canon 6, restricting the manner of instituting proceedings against bishops, and reprobating appeals to the secular power. But canon 7, prescribing the dispositions to be observed in admitting heretics into communion, is shown by him not to belong to this council at all. It is almost identical with the 95th Trullan canon (Rev. ed. 1). Of the creed, little more need be added to what has been said. It was in existence A.D. 373, having been probably framed at Antioch, in conformity with the synodical letter of St. Athanasius, A.D. 372, where it was doubtless confirmed A.D. 378-9, and received more probably by the 5th canon of this council A.D. 382, than promulgated separately by the council of the year preceding. Possibly this may have been the creed called by Cassian (De Incarn. vi. 3 and 6) as late as A.D. 430, "peculiarly the creed of the city and Church of Antioch." From the portion of it given by him it is as likely to have been this, as that of A.D. 363 (for which see Soc. iii. 25), or any other between them. That there is a family likeness between it and the creed of the Church of Jerusalem commented on by St. Cyril will be seen on comparing them (Hartley's De Fide et S. p. 9-13). On this hypothesis alone we can understand why no notice should have been taken of it at the council of Fohesus, A.D. 431, and in the African code, namely, because it had originated with a provincial, and only been as yet received by a general council. It was promulgated as identical with that of Nicaea for the first time by the fathers of the 4th council.

No more remains but to observe that the dogmatic professions of the council of 381 were confirmed by Theodosius in a constitution dated July 30 of the same year, and addressed to Antonius, proconsul of Asia, by which the churches are ordered to be handed over to the bishops in communion with Nectarius and others who composed it, the Eunomians, Arians, and Antians having been deprived of their churches by a constitution issued ten days earlier (Cod. Theod. xvi. tit. 1, l. 3, and tit. 5, l. 8). And it was received by Pope Damasus, and has been regarded in the West ever since, so far, as ecclesiastical. Its first four canons, in the same way, have been always admitted into Western collections. But what passed at the supplemental council of 382 never seems to have been confirmed or received equally. It was in declining to come to this last council that St. Gregory Nazianzen said, in his epistle to Procopius (xxx. Migne), "that he had come to the resolution of avoiding every meeting of bishops, for that he had never seen any synod end well, or assuage rather than aggravate disorders." His celebrated oration (c. xlii.), known as his "farewell" to the council of 381, is inspired by a very different spirit.

Lastly, there was a third meeting of bishops held at Constantinople, by command of Theodosius, A.D. 381, under Nectarius, to devise remedies for the confusion created by so many sees passing out of the hands of the heterodox into those of the orthodox party (Soc. v. 10). The Arian, Eunomian, and Macedonian bishops were required to attend there with confessors of their faith, which the emperor, after examining carefully, rejected in favour of Nicaea. The Novatians alone, receiving this, were placed by him upon equal terms with the orthodox. Of the heterodox professions, that of Eunomius is extant, and not without interest. It may be seen in Cave (Hist. Lit. i. 210). It is said to have been on this occasion that Amphilocheus, bishop of Iconium, on entering the palace, made the usual obeisance to Theodosius, but took no notice of Arcadius, his son, standing at his side. When the emperor reproved him for this, "You see, sire," said the bishop, "how impatient you are that your own son should be slighted; much more will God punish those who refuse due honour to his only begotten Son" (Theod. v. 16).

(6) A.D. 394—reckoning that of 383 as the 5th. Among those present were Nectarius of Constantinople, Theophilus of Alexandria, Flavian of Antioch, &c. What called them together, in all probability, was the dedication of a new church in honour of SS. Peter and Paul: which done, they sat in judgment on a controversy between two rival bishops of Bostra, Bagadius, and Agapius; against the former of whom it was pleaded that he had been deposed by two bishops, since dead. The council decreed that, in future, not even three, much less two, bishops should have the power of deposing another, but that, in conformity with the apostolic canons (and this express reference to them in such an assemblage is most noteworthy), it should be held to belong to a larger synod, and the bishops of the province (Mansi, iii. 851-4).

(7) A.D. 399, of 22 bishops under St. Chrysostom, to enquire into seven capital charges brought against Antoninus, bishop of Ephesus.

As he died before the witnesses could be examined, St. Chrysostom, at the request of the Ephesian clergy, went over thither, and, at the head of 70 bishops, appointed Heraclides a deacon in his place, and deposed a bishops that had been simultaneously ordained by him. Their proceedings are of some interest, and contain a reference to the canons of the African Church (Mansi, iii. 991-93). Strictly speaking, this last was a synod of Ephesus.

(8) A.D. 404, to sit in judgment on St. Chrysostom, who had been banished from exile by the emperor and retaken possession of his see, from which he had been deposed by "the Synod of the Oak." Theophilus of Alexandria was not present on this occasion, having had to fly Constantinople on the return of his rival. Still he was not unrepresented, and St. Chrysostom had by this time provoked another enemy (Clinton, A.D. 404, col. 4) in the Empress Eudokia, whose statue he had denounced from the games and rebels permitted to be held round it in offensive proximity to his church. At this synod he seems to have given attendance (vi. 18) when the question of his former deposition was argued. Thirty-six bishops had condemned him; but sixty-five bishops, he rejoined, had, by communicating with him, voted in his favour (Vales, ad l.). It is not implied in these words, as some seem to have supposed, that a synod was actually sitting in his favour now, any more than during the Synod of the Oak, the deputies from which found him surrounded, but not synodically; by forty bishops, in his own palace. The 4th or 12th canon of the Council of Antioch was alleged by his opponents: his defence was that it was framed by the Arians (Reading, ib.). As quoted by his opponents, indeed, it was differently worded from what either the 4th or 12th are now; so that possibly there may have been an Arian version of these canons, against which his objection held good. The synod, however, decided against him, and his banishment to Comana, on the Black Sea, says Socrates—to Cucusus, in Armenia, say others—followed, where he died.

(9) A.D. 426, on the last day of February, when Sisinnius was consecrated bishop there, in the room of Atticus. Afterwards, the errors of the Massilians, or Euchites, were condemned, at the instance of the Bishops of Iconium and Sida, as we learn from the 7th action of the Council of Ephesus. A severe sentence was passed on any charged with holding them after this denunciation (Mansi, iv. 541-2).

(10) A.D. 428, on the death of Sisinnius, when the well-known Nestorius was consecrated (Mansi, iv. 543-4).

(11) A.D. 431, October 25, four months after Nestorius had been deposed, to consecrate Maximian in his place (Mansi, v. 1045). This done, Maximian presided, and joined in a synodical letter, enclosing that of the Council of Ephesus, with its first six canons, as they are called, to the bishops of ancient Epirus, whom attempts had been made to detach from orthodoxy (ib. 257). Letters were written likewise by him and by the emperor to Pope Celestine, St. Cyril, and other bishops, to acquaint them with his elevation, at which all expressed themselves well pleased (ib. 257-92). Another synod appears to have been held by him the year following, for restoring peace between his own Church and that of Antioch (ib. 1049-50).

(12) A.D. 443, probably (Mansi, vi. 493-8, comp. Cave, l. 479) to consider the case of Athanasius, bishop of Perrhe, on the Euphrates, afterwards deposed at Antioch under Donatus. Here he seems to have got letters in his favour from Proclus (comp. Comp. Hierop. A. D. 445).

(13) A.D. 448, November 8, under Flavian, to enquire into a dispute between Florentius, metropolitan of Sarilla, and two of his suffragans; but while sitting, it was called upon by Eusebius, bishop of Dorylaeum, one of its members, and who had, as a layman, denounced Nestorius, to summon Eutyches, archimandrite of a convent of three hundred monks, and as resolute an opponent of Nestorius as himself, on a charge that he felt obliged to press against him. The charge was that he recognised but one nature in Christ. Messengers were despatched to invite Eutyches to persevere what Eusebius had alleged against him. Meanwhile, two letters of St. Cyril—his second to Nestorius, recited and approved at the Council of Ephesus, and his letter to John of Antioch, on their reconciliation—were read out, and pronounced orthodox by all. A reply was brought subsequently from Eutyches, that he refused to quit his monastery. A 2nd and 3rd citation followed in succession. Then he promised attendance within a week. While waiting for him, the council listened to some minutes of a conversation between him and the two presbyters charged with his 2nd citation, when they said he expressly denied two natures in Christ. At last he appeared, made profession of his faith, and was condemned—thirty-two bishops and twenty-three archimandrites subscribing to his deposition from the priest-hood and monastic dignity. Proceedings occupied altogether seven sessions—the last of which was held November 22. Its acts were recited in a subsequent council of the year following at Constantinople; at Ephesus, also, the year following, under Dioscorus; and again, in the 1st session of the Council of Chalcedon, where they may be read still (Mansi, vi. 495-6, and then 649-754).

(14) A.D. 448, April 8, of thirty bishops under Theodosius, archbishop of Caesarea in Cappadocia, held by order of the emperor, to re-consider the sentence passed on Eutyches by the council under Flavian, on a representation from the former that its acts had been falsified. This, however, was proved untrue. Another session was held April 27, on a second petition from Eutyches, to have the statement of Magnus—the official or silentiary, who had accompanied him to the council under Flavian—taken down, which was done. This officer declared to having seen the instrument containing his deposition, before the session was held at which it was resolved on. The acts of this council are likewise preserved in the first session of that of Chalcedon (Mansi, v. 503-4, and then 753-828).

(15) A.D. 450, at which Anatolius was ordained bishop; and then, some months afterwards, at the head of his suffragans and clergy, made profession of his faith and subscribed to the celebrated letter of St. Leo to his predecessor Flavian, in the presence of four legates from Rome, charged to obtain proofs of his orthodoxy (Mansi, vi. 509-14, with ep. lix. of St. Leo, ib. 83-5).

(16) A. the Emperor take cognizance from Alexandria, who, on the stalled bishop of Chalcedon, done to re-titled Aelutius & 809-70.

(17) A. bishops su-stant, in of Chalcedon simoniacal in Galatia

(18) A. Bishop of Ephesus, and a letter Rome, to a conciliar, 24, comp. was addressed Peter the P. introduced us" into the thert of issued from fact there 24.

(19) A.D. the Council removing it from the see as bishop he transmitted was allowed

(20) A.D. stasius I, confirmed, deposed; and who had p (Mansi, viii. 581) A.D.

(21) A.D. stasius I, in Antioch of polis, took Chalcedon a doctrine, or clause "Wh agion. But took place met a year to the Coun which this 206).

(22) A.D. peror Justin of Nicaea, C don: of St. Macedonius the sacred d opponents of its synodical addressed to ll, praying the 5th act 536, as are bishops of Gratus was with letters his own Church and that ly (Mansi, vi, 463-7, consider the case of rrie, on the Euphrates, Antioch under Domnus. t letters in his front e, Hierop. A. D. 445.) ber 8, under Flavian, to e between Florentius, ad two of his suffragans; ealled upon by Eusebius, ne of its members, and enounced Nestorius, to sinaitrite of a convent e, and as resolute an op- imself, on a charge that against him. The charge out one nature in Christ. chel to invite Eutyches had alleged against him. of St. Cyril—his seal approval at the Council ter to John of Antioch, were read out, and pro- l. A reply was brought yches, that he refused to A 2nd and 3rd citation

Then he promised at- eck. While waiting for el to some minutes of a im and the two presbyters citation, when they said o natures in Christ. At a profession of his faith, thirty-two bishops and idrites subscribing to his priesthood and monastic occupied altogether seven ich was held November 22. n a subsequent council of onstantinople; at Ephesus, ng, under Dioscorus; and on of the Council of Chal- e read still (Mansi, vi, 754).

8, of thirty bishops under of Caesarea in Cappadocia, to re-consider the yches by the council under eation from the former falsified. This, however, Another session was held petition from Eutyches, to of Magnus—the official or accompanie him to the —taken down, which was eclared to having seen the g his deposition, before the which it was resolved on. il are likewise preserved in at of Chalcedon (Mansi, v, 828).

hich Anatolius was ordained some months afterwards, at agans and clergy, male pre- and subscribed to the cele- t. Leo to his predecessor sence of four legates from tain proofs of his orthodoxy with ep. lix. of St. Leo,

CONSTANTINOPLE, COUNCILS OF

(16) A. D. 457, under Anatolius by order of the Emperor Leo, whom he had just crowned, to take cognisance of the petitions that had arrived from Alexandria for and against Timothy Aelurus, who, on the murder of St. Proterius, had been installed bishop there by the opponents of the Council of Chalcedon, and to consider what could be done to restore peace. The council anathematized Aelurus and his party (Mansi, vii, 521-2 & 869-70)

(17) A. D. 459, under Gennadius. Eighty-one bishops subscribed to its synodical letter still extant, in which the 2nd canon of the Council of Chalcedon is cited with approval against some simoniacal ordinations recently brought to light in Galatia (Mansi, vii, 911-20).

(18) A. D. 478, under Acacius, in which Peter, Bishop of Antioch, surnamed the Fuller, Paul of Ephesus, and John of Apamen, were condemned; and a letter addressed to Simplicius, bishop of Rome, to acquaint him with, and request him to concur in, their condemnation (Mansi, vii, 1017-22, comp. Vales. Oberr. in Evag. l. 2). A letter was addressed at the same time by Acacius to Peter the Fuller himself, rebuking him for having introduced the clause "Who was crucified for us" into the Trisagion or hymn to the Trinity. Hitherto this letter has been printed as if it had issued from a synod five years later, when in fact there was no such synod (Mansi, ib. 1119-24).

(19) A. D. 492, under Euphemius; in favour of the Council of Chalcedon; but as he declined removing the name of his predecessor Acacius from the sacred diptychs, he was not recognised as bishop by popes Felix and Gelasius, to whom he transmitted its acts, though his orthodoxy was allowed (Mansi, vii, 1175-80).

(20) A. D. 496, by order of the Emperor Anastasius I, in which the Henoticon of Zeno was confirmed, Euphemius, bishop of Constantinople deposed; and Macedonius, the second of that name who had presided there, substituted for him (Mansi, viii, 186-7).

(21) A. D. 498, by order of the emperor Anastasius I, in which Flavian, the second bishop of Antioch of that name, and Philoxenus of Hierapolis, took the lead: condemning the Council of Chalcedon and all who opposed the Monophysite doctrine, or would not accept the interpolated clause "Who was crucified for us" in the Trisagion. But it seems probable that this council took place a year later; and that another had met a year earlier, under Macedonius, less hostile to the Council of Chalcedon than this, and of which this was the reaction (Mansi, viii, 197-200).

(22) A. D. 518, July 20, by order of the emperor Justin, at which the names of the Councils of Nicaea, Constantinople, Ephesus, and Chalcedon: of St. Leo of Rome, with Euphemius and Macedonius of Constantinople, were restored in the sacred diptychs; and Severus and all other opponents of the 4th council anathematized. Its synodical letter signed by forty bishops and addressed to the Constantinopolitan bishop, John II, praying his assent to its acts, is preserved in the 5th action of the council under Mennas, A. D. 536, as are his letters informing the Eastern bishops of what had been done there. Count Gratius was despatched to Rome by the emperor with letters from himself and the patriarch to pope

CONSTANTINOPLE, COUNCILS OF 441

Hormisdas, hoping that peace might under these circumstances be restored between them. The answers of Hormisdas, his instructions to the legates despatched by him to Constantinople, their accounts of their reception there, the profession signed by the patriarch, and the subsequent correspondence between him and the pope, may all be read amongst the epistles of the latter (Mansi, viii, 435-65). The Easterns had to anathematise Acacius of Constantinople by name, and to erase his, and the names of all others, Euphemius and Macedonius included, who had not erased his previously, from the sacred diptychs, before the pope would readmit them to his communion (ib. 573-8).

(23) A. D. 531, under Epiphanius, who was then patriarch, to enquire into the consecration of Stephen, Metropolitan of Larissa, within the diocese of Thrace, which, contrary to the 28th canon of Chalcedon, had been made without consulting him. Stephen, having been deposed by him on these grounds, appealed to Rome; but the acts of the synod held there to consider his appeal are defective, so that it is not known with what success (Mansi, viii, 739-40).

(24) A. D. 536. According to some, three synods were held there this year: 1. in which pope Agapetus presided and deposed Anthimus, patriarch of Constantinople; but this, as Mansi shews (viii, 871-2), the emperor Justinian had already done, besides confirming the election of Mennas in his stead, at the instance of the clergy and people of the city. Agapetus, who had come thither on a mission from Theodotus, king of the Goths, having previously refused his communion, had unquestionably procured his ejection; and he afterwards consecrated Mennas, as Theophilus of Alexandria had St. John Chrysostom, at the request of the emperor. 2. in which a number of Eastern bishops met to draw up a petition to the pope requesting him to call upon Anthimus, subsequently to his deposition but previously to his going back to Trebizond from which he had been translated, for a retraction of his denial of two natures in Christ; but this can hardly be called a council; and the death of the pope stopped any definitive action on his part (ib.). 3. under Mennas, after the death of the pope, consisting of five actions, the first of which took place, May 2, in a church dedicated to St. Mary near the great church, Mennas presiding, and having on his right, among others, five Italian bishops, who had come to Constantinople from the late pope, and remained there with him on his arrival. The first thing brought before the council was a petition from various monastic bodies in Constantinople, Antioch, Jerusalem, and Mount Sinai to the emperor, begging that the sentence, stayed only by the death of the pope, against Anthimus, might be carried out; a general account of what had passed between them and the pope followed, their petition to him was produced by the Italian bishops present and recited; after it another petition to him from some Eastern bishops on the same subject; and his own letter to Peter, bishop of Jerusalem in reply. Desirous of following out his decision, the council sent deputies to acquaint Anthimus with its proceedings, and bid him appear there within three days. The second and third actions passed in sending him similar summonses, but all his hiding-places message from the emperor he would not undertake to do more than examine the chapters by himself, and transmit his opinion on them, not to the council, but to him. This probably was contained in his Constitutum (Mansi, v. p. 61 and seq.); the date assigned to which indicates that it came out between the 5th and 6th collations. Some bishops of Africa and Illyria excused themselves equally to the deputation sent to invite their attendance. At the 3rd collation the fathers commenced the real business for which they had been convened with a preface well worth remembering for its soundness and moderation. They pledged themselves to the exact doctrine and discipline laid down in the four general councils, each and all, preceding their own; one and the same confession of faith had sufficed for them in spite of all the heresies they had met to condemn, and should suffice now. All things in harmony with it should be received; and all things at variance with it rejected. Having thus pledged themselves to the 4th council among the rest, the fathers proceeded to the examination of the three chapters in their 4th collation. This was on May 12: extracts having accordingly been read out from various works of Theodore, both he and they were judged worthy of condemnation. The next day, or the 5th collation, passages for or against Theodore, for St. Cyril and others, were produced and weighed; and authorities, particularly St. Augustine, cited in favour of condemning heretics although dead. Enquiry having been made when the name of Theodore ceased to be commemorated in the sacred diptychs of his church, it was discovered that the name of St. Cyril had long been substituted there for his. At the close of the sitting, extracts from the writings of Theodoret against St. Cyril were recited; on which the fathers remarked that the 4th council had acted wisely in not receiving him till he had anathematised Nestorius. Six days intervened before the 6th collation took place, May 19. During this interval Vigilius issued his "Constitutum," dated May 14, in the form of a synodical letter addressed to the emperor (Mansi, ix. 61-106), answering and condemning a number of the positions of Theodore, but pleading for Theodoret and Ibas, as having been acquitted by the 4th council. However, the council at its 6th collation found the letter of Ibas in question contrary to the Chalcedonian definition, and anathematised it accordingly, the principal speaker against it being Theodore, bishop of Cappadocia; but its author escaped. At the 7th collation, May 26 or 30, for the reading is doubtful, a communication was read from the emperor in deprecation of the "Constitutum" addressed to him by the Pope, May 14, and on which there had been a good many messages between them in vain since. First, no less than six documents were recited proving Vigilius to have expressly condemned the three chapters as many times: 1, a letter from him to the emperor; 2, to the empress, in both which the words "unam operationem" were declared at the 6th council by the legates of Agatha to have been a later insertion of the Monothelite party (Baluz. ap. Mansi, ix. 163-72); 3, to his deacons, Rusticus and Sebastian, condemning them for the false stories they had spread about him; 4, to the bishop of Kiev, in Russia; 5, to the bishop of Arles; and 6, a deposition signed by Theodore, bishop of Caesarea, and a lay dignitary, to the effect that Vigilius had sworn to the emperor in their presence to do all he could for the condemnation of the three chapters, and never say a word in their favour. Next, an enquiry, by order of the emperor, respecting a picture or statue of Theodoret said to have been carried about at Cyrrus in procession, was reported. And, lastly, the imperial mandate, which ordained that the name of Vigilius should be removed from the sacred diptychs for his tergiversations on the subject of the three chapters, "Non enim patiemur, nec ab eo, nec ab alio quocunque," says the emperor, "inviolatum communionem suscipere, qui non istam impietatem condemnat . . . ne eo modo inveniamur Nestorii et Theodori impietati communicantes" (Mansi, ib. 366-7). Unity with the apostolic see would not, he adds, be thereby dissolved, inasmuch as neither Vigilius nor any other individual could, by his own change for the worse, mar the peace of the Church. To all which the council agreed. Finally, reviewing at its 8th collation, June 2, in a singularly well-written compendium all that it had done previously, and vindicating the course about to be pursued, it formally condemned the three chapters, and with them the author of the first of them—Theodore—promulgating its definitive sentence in 14 anathemas, almost identical with those of the emperor (Mansi, ib. 557-64), and in which the heresies and heresiarchs thus condemned are specified: Origen among the number in the eleventh, though not in the corresponding one of the emperor. He had been previously condemned in the council under Menas, A.D. 538, as we have seen. Of these anathemas the Greek version is still extant; of almost every other record of its proceedings the Latin version alone remains. Vigilius, after taking some time to consider, announced his assent to them in two formal documents: the first a decretal epistle, dated Dec. 8 of the same year, and addressed to the Constantinopolitan patriarch (Mansi, ib. 413-32, with the notes of De Marec), in which, as he says, after the manner of St. Augustine, he retracts all that he had ever written differently; and the second, another Constitutum of great length, dated Feb. 23 of the year following (Clinton, A.D. 554, c. 4), but without any heading or subscription in its present form (Mansi, ib. 457-88). He died on his way home, and Pelagius, the Roman envoy who had been instrumental in condemning Origen, had thus, on becoming pope, to vindicate the condemnation of the three chapters by this council in the West, where they had been defended all but unanimously, and were upheld obstinately by more than three parts of Italy still. The 2nd Pelagius, twenty-five years later, in his third letter to the bishops of Istria, said to have been written by St. Gregory the Great, then his deacon (Mansi, ib. 433-54, and see Migne's et.), apologised as follows for the conduct of his predecessors and his own therein. Referring to the occasion on which St. Peter was reproved by St. Paul (Gal. ii. 11), he asks, "Nunquid Petro apostolorum principi sibi dissimilia docenti, debuit ad hæc verba responderi? "Hæc quæ dicis, nudare non possumus, quia aliud ante predicasti? Si igitur in trium capitulorum negotio, aliud eum veritas quaeretur, aliud autem inventa veritate, dictum est: cur mutatio sententiae huic sedi in crimine obicitur, quae a cuncta ecclesia humiliter in ejus auctore veneratur? Non enim mutatio sententiae, sed inconstantia sensus in culpa est." St. Gregory, when pope, settled the matter by affirming that he venerated the 5th council equally with the four preceding (Mansi, ib. 454). No canons seem to have been passed in it; but though two elaborate dissertations have been written on it (Garnad Liberat., and H. de Noris, Op. P. ii.), many points connected with it are still doubtful; and the documents published by Mansi (ix. 151-651) as belonging to it, greatly need re-arranging.

(28) A.D. 565, at which the emperor Justinian endeavoured to get the errors of Julian of Halicarnassus, a well-known Monophysite, who maintained the incorruptibility of the Body of Christ antecedently to his resurrection, approved, by banishing those who opposed them (Mansi, ix. 765-8).

(29) A.D. 587, at which a foul charge brought against Gregory, patriarch of Antioch, by a banker of his diocese, was examined. He was honourably acquitted and his accuser punished (Evag. vi. 7). Mansi thinks this must have been the synod summoned as a general one by the Constantinopolitan patriarch John, in virtue of his assumed title of oecumenical patriarch, and for which he was so severely taken to task by pope Pelagius II.—but for this no direct proof is adduced either by him or Pagi (ix. 971-3). It is supplied, however, in a letter of St. Gregory the Great to that patriarch (ib. 1217-18), and a further letter of his some time later, when Cyrinus was patriarch, whose plan of holding another synod for the same purpose he would seem to have anticipated (ib. x. 159). Mansi (ib. p. 481-2) conceives this synod to have been held A.D. 598.

(30) A.D. 626, under Sergius, to consider the question raised by Paul, a Monophysite of Phasis, in Lazien, and Cyrus, its metropolitan—afterwards translated to Alexandria—before the emperor Heraclius, whether one or two wills and operations were to be ascribed to Christ. Sergius, on the authority of a discourse ascribed by him to his well-known predecessor Menas, and other testimonies which he abstains from naming, pronounced in favour of one operation and one will; thereby founding the heresy called Monothelism (Mansi, x. 585-8). Clinton (ii. 171) doubts whether the question did not originate with Athanasius, patriarch of the Jacobites in Syria, on his promotion to the see of Antioch by Heraclius four years later. The discourse which Sergius ascribed to Menas was proved a forgery to the 6th council at its third session.

(31) A.D. 639, under Sergius, and continued—unless there were two distinct councils this year—under Pyrrhus, his successor, at which the "Ecthesis" or exposition of faith by the emperor Heraclius, favourable to Monothelism, was confirmed (Mansi, x. 673-4). Parts of its acts, with the ecthesis in full, were recited in the third sitting of the Lateran under Martin I. A.D. 649 (ib. 991-1004).

(32) A.D. 665, by order of the emperor Constantine II., at which St. Maximus, the great opponent of the Monothelites, was condemned (Mansi, xi. 73-4).

(33) A.D. 636, under Peter, patriarch of Constantinople, and attended by Macedonius of Antioch and the vicar of the patriarch of Alexandria, at which St. Maximus was condemned a second time with his disciples (Mansi, xi. 73-6).

(34) The 6th general, held in the banqueting hall of the palace, called Trullus in its domed roof (Du Fresne, Constant. Christ. ii. 4, § 19-20), and lasting from November 7, A.D. 680, to September 16 of the ensuing year.

It was convened by the emperor Constantine Pogonatus, as stated in his epistle to Pope Donus, in consequence of a request made to him by the patriarchs of Constantinople to permit their removing from the sacred diptychs the name of Pope Vitalian, lately deceased, while they were for retaining that of Honorius (Mansi, xi. 199-200). In short, they wished to commemorate none of the popes after Honorius till some disputes that had arisen between their own sees and his had been settled, and some newly-coined words explained. The allusion is probably to the αἰα θεαδρική ἐνέργεια attributed to Christ by the Monothelite patriarch and synod of Alexandria, A.D. 633 (ib. 565), when Honorius was pope. Donus dying before this letter could reach Rome, it was complied with at once by his successor Agatho, who sent three bishops, on behalf of his synod, and two presbyters, and one deacon named John—who subsequently became pope as John V., in his own name—to Constantinople, "to bring about the union of the holy Churches of God," as it is said in his life (ib. 165). On hearing from the "oecumenical pope," as he styles him, to that effect, the Emperor issued his summons to George, patriarch of Constantinople—whom he styles oecumenical patriarch—and through him to the patriarch of Antioch, to get ready to come to the council with their respective bishops and metropolitans (ib. 201). Macarius, metropolitan of Milan, who had formed part of the Roman synod under Agatho, sent a synodical letter and profession of faith on behalf of his own synod (ib. 201-8), and Theodore, bishop of Ravenna, who had formed part of the same synod, a presbyter, to represent him personally. The number of bishops actually present, according to Cave, was 289, though the extant subscriptions are under 180. Thirteen officers of the court were there likewise by command of the emperor, who attended in person, and were ranged round him—on his left were the representatives of the pope and his synod, of the archbishop of Ravenna, and of the patriarch of Jerusalem, then Basil, bishop of Gortyna, in Crete, and the remaining bishops "subject to Rome"—his right being occupied by the patriarchs of Constantinople and Antioch, a presbyter representing the patriarch of Alexandria, the bishop of Ephesus, and "the remaining bishops subject to Constantinople." The business of the council was concluded in 18 actions or sessions, as follows:—

1. The legates of Agatho having complained of the novel teaching of four patriarchs of Constantinople—Sergius, Paul, Pyrrhus, and Peter—of Cyprus, of Alexandria, and Theodore, bishop of Pharan, that had for 46 years or more troubled the whole Church, in attributing one will and operation to the Incarnate Word, Macarius, patriarch of Antioch, and two suffragans of the see condemned the dogma, brief new terms they had recited the holy fathers particularly the Alexandria, Honorius, upon the chair of the grant to fetch the from the hill was said of on this occasion lost previous to produce a two volumes recited by St. writing on that that some of him.

2. Two volumes were read, without that the Christ by St.

3. Two volumes were read, with letters of Pope Agatho, had course attributed arch of Constantinople having been evidence, its directing further the letters of

4. Two letters one to the emperor to the council synod of 125 York, among them at Rome, legates. The that what had general council of his amendment, diminution or thought (indeed, in his Honorius" (p. passages in the canon in the prerog which are not therefore, they one, or suppress the Council of some kind. But in Greek, and entire acts of it possibly be the pope, soon after points which I without proving

5. Two papers and recited: of times from there being one of the Father and 6. A third paper effect as the sealing of all the perors, and entrusted those belonging er, patriarch of by Maceionius of patriarch of Alex-s was condemned iples (Mansi, xi.

in the banqueting us from its domes ist. ii. 4. § 19-20).
A.D. 680, to Sepuper Constantine stle to Pope Donus, ate to him by the y to permit their tychys the name of while they were for Mansi, xi. 199-200). memorate none of some disputes that n sees and his had ey-coined words exvidably to the "fad to Christ by the ool of Alexandria, onorius was pope.

could reach Rome, ce by his successor ps, on behalf of his d one deacon named ame taken as John V. ntinople, "to bring Churches of God," 165). On hearing as he styles him, te ed his summus te ntinople—whom he —and through him to get ready to come pective bishops and Mansuetus, retroformed part of the o, sent a synodical

th on behalf of his

Theodore, bishop: had formed part of er, to represent him of bishops actually was 289, though the nder 180. Thirteen were likewise by con-attended in person, m—on his left were ope and his synod, and of the patriarch ishop of Gortyna, in bishops "subject to occupied by the patri-Antioch, a presbyter of Alexandria, the the remaining bish-

The business of the 18 actions or sessions no having complained our patriarchs of Con-Pyrrhus, and Peter and Theodore, bishop or 46 years or more h, in attributing one the Incarnate Word

och, and two suffragans of the see of Constantinople favourable to this dogma, briefly replied that they had put out no new terms but only believed and taught what they had received from general councils and from the holy fathers on the point in question, particularly the patriarchs of Constantinople and Alexandria, named by their opponents, and Isaacus, formerly pope of elder Rome. Whereupon the chartophylax, or keeper of the archives of the great Church, was ordered by the emperor to fetch the books of the oecumenical councils from the library of the patriarch. As nothing was said of the acts of the 1st and 2nd councils on this occasion, we must infer they had been lost previously. The chartophylax was told to produce what he had got; and immediately two volumes of the acts of the 3rd council were recited by Stephen, a presbyter of Antioch in waiting on Macarius, who forthwith contended that some of St. Cyril's expressions made for him.

2. Two volumes of the acts of the 4th council were read, when the legates of Agatho pointed out that two operations were attributed to Christ by St. Leo.

3. Two volumes of the acts of the 5th council were read, when the legates protested that two letters of Pope Vigilius, contained in the second volume, had been interpolated, and that a discourse attributed in the first to Menas, patriarch of Constantinople, was spurious. This last having been proved on the spot from internal evidence, its recital was stopped, the emperor directing further enquiry to be made respecting the letters of the pope.

4. Two letters from Agatho were recited— one to the emperor, in his own name, the other to the council, in his own name and that of a synod of 125 bishops, with Wilfrid, bishop of York, among them, for Britain, assembled under him at Rome, previously to the departure of his legates. The burden of both is the same, namely, that what had been defined as of faith by the five general councils preceding, it was the summit of his ambition to keep inviolate—without change, diminution, or addition, either in word or thought (Mansi, ib. 235). Mr. Renouf, indeed, in his second pamphlet on "Pope Honorius" (p. 46-7), has pointed out several passages in the Latin version of these letters on the prerogatives of the Church of Rome, which are not found in the Greek. Either, therefore, they have been interpolated in one, or suppressed in the other. The decree of the Council of Florence supplies a parallel of the same kind. But that Agatho wrote these letters in Greek, and that the Latin version of the entire acts of this council that we have cannot possibly be the one made by order of the next pope, soon after the council dispersed, are two points which Mr. R. seems to have assumed without proving.

5. Two papers were exhibited by Macarius, and recited: of which the first was headed "Testimonies from the holy Fathers confirmatory of there being one will in Christ, which is also that of the Father and the Holy Ghost."

6. A third paper from Macarius, to the same effect as the other two, having been read, the sealing of all three was commanded by the emperor, and entrusted to his own officials and those belonging to the sees of Rome and Constantinople. On the legates affirming that the quotations contained in them had not been fairly made, authentic copies of the works cited were ordered to be brought from the patriarchal library to compare with them.

7. A paper headed "Testimonies from the holy Fathers demonstrating two wills and operations in Christ," was produced by the legates, and read. Appended to it were passages from the writings of heretics, in which but one will and operation was taught. This paper was ordered to be sent, like those of Macarius, by the emperor.

8. The passages adduced by Agatho from the Fathers, and by his synod, in favour of two wills and operations, having been examined and confirmed, were pronounced conclusive by all present except Macarius; and the petition to have the name of Vitalian erased from the diptychs was withdrawn by George, the existing patriarch of Constantinople, amid great applause. Macarius being then called upon to make his profession, proved himself a Monothelite; and was convicted of having quoted unfairly from the Fathers in his papers to support his views.

9. Examination of the papers of Macarius having been completed, he and his presbyter Stephen were formally deposed as heretics by the council.

10. The paper exhibited by the legates was taken in hand: and after a most interesting comparison, passage by passage, between it and the authentic works in the patriarchal library, was declared thoroughly correct in its citations; a profession of faith was received from the bishop of Nicomedia and some others, in which Monothelism was abjured.

11. A long and remarkable profession of faith, contained in a synodical letter of Sophronius, late patriarch of Jerusalem, and the first to oppose Monothelism, was recited: and after it, at the request of the legates, some more writings of Macarius, since come to hand, that proved full of heresy.

12. Several more documents belonging to Macarius having been received from the emperor through one of his officers, which he professed not to have read himself, some were looked through and pronounced irrelevant, but three letters were recited at length: one from Sergius patriarch of Constantinople to Cyrus, then bishop of Phasis; another from him to Pope Honorius; the third being the answer of Honorius to him. Again the patriarchal archives were searched, and the two first of these letters compared with the authentic copies of them found there; while the original letter of Honorius in Latin having been brought from thence was compared by John bishop of Porto, the only delegate from the Roman synod then present, with the copy just read, and the genuineness of all three placed beyond doubt. A suggestion brought from the emperor that Macarius should be restored in the event of his recanting, was preemptorily declined by the council.

13. Both the letters of Sergius before mentioned and that of Honorius to him were declared hereticox; and he and his successors, Pyrrhus, Peter, and Paul, Cyrus of Alexandria, and Theodore, bishop of Pharan—on all of whom Agatho had passed sentence previously—with Honorius, whom Agatho had passed over, were definitively cast out of the Church—the only sentence of the kind ever decreed against any pope. The letter of Sophronius, on the other hand, was pronounced orthodox. Finally, search having been made for all other works of the same kind in the archives, all that could be found were brought out and recited. The list included two letters from Cyrus to Sergius, the latest of them having been written from Alexandria, with a copy of the terms of agreement come to between him and the Theodosians, a Monophysite sect, enclosed in it; works by Theodore, bishop of Pharan, Pyrrhus, Paul, and Peter, patriarchs of Constantinople; a second letter of Honorius to Sergius; and a dogmatic letter of Pyrrhus to Pope John IV., discovered in a volume of dogmatic letters by the Charophylax, George. All these were pronounced heretical, and burnt as such. Letters of Thomas, John, and Constantine, patriarchs of Constantinople, were read likewise, but their orthodoxy was allowed.

14. Returning to the letters of Pope Vigilius that had been called in question, it was ascertained by curious enquiry that each of the volumes of the 5th council had been tampered with: in one case by inserting the paper attributed to Memmius, in the other by interpolating the letters of Vigilius, in support of heresy. The council ordered both falsifications to be cancelled, besides anathematising them and their authors. A sermon of St. Athanasius was produced by the bishops of Cyprus, in which the doctrine of two wills in Christ was clearly laid down. At this sitting Theophanes, the new patriarch of Antioch, is first named among these priests.

15. Polychronius, a presbyter, undertaking to raise a dead man to life in support of his heretical views, and failing, was condemned as an impostor, and deposed.

16. Constantine, another presbyter, affecting to have devised some formula calculated to reconcile Monothelism with orthodoxy, was proved in agreement with Macarius, and similarly condemned. In conclusion, all who had been condemned were anathematised, one after the other by name, amidst cheers for the orthodox.

17. The previous acts of the council were read over; and its definition of faith published for the first time.

18. The definition having been once more published, was signed by all present; and received the assent of the emperor on the spot amid the usual acclamations and reprobations. It consisted of three parts:—I. An introduction proclaiming entire agreement on the part of the council with the five previous councils, and acceptance of the two creeds promulgated by them as one. II. Recital of the two creeds of Nicaea and Constantinople in their pristine forms. III. Its own definition, enumerating all previously condemned for Monothelism once more by name; and mentioning with approbation the declaration of pope Agatho and his synod against them, and in favour of the true doctrine, which it proceeded to unfold in course; then reiterating the decree passed by previous councils against the framers and upholders of a faith or creed other than the two forms already specified; and including finally in the same condemnation the inventors and disseminators of any novel terms subversive of its own rulings.

Proceedings terminated in a remarkable address to the emperor on behalf of all present, which was read out, showing that the doctrine of the Trinity had been defined by the two first councils; and that of the Incarnation in the four next, of which this was the last; and a still more remarkable request was appended to it,—that he would forward the definition signed by himself to the five patriarchal sees of Rome, Constantinople, Alexandria, Antioch, and Jerusalem; which we are told expressly was done (Mansi, ib. 681-4). In conclusion, a letter was despatched to the pope in the name of the council, informing him that he would receive a copy of its acts through his legates, and begging that he would confirm them in his reply. The emperor on his part exhorted all to receive them in a special edict; and as he had promised, addressed a letter in his own name to the Roman synod, dated Dec. 23, A.D. 681.—Agatho dying, according to Cave, Dec. 1—and another to Leo II., soon after his accession, the year following, bespeaking their acceptance. This the new pope granted without hesitation in the fullest manner, even to the condemnation of Honorius as having betrayed the faith; all which he repeated to the bishops of Spain in sending them a Latin translation of the acts of this council (Mansi, ib. 1049-53). Solely from hence the genuineness of both epistles has been denied (comp. Mr. Kenouf's Pope Honorius; Professor Botalla's reply to it; and Mr. R.'s rejoinder), and even the integrity of the acts of the council themselves in their present state are now questioned (Pagi ad Baron., A.D. 681, n. 9-12). Two versions of them are given by Mansi (xi. 189-922); in both the arrangement of the concluding documents is chronologically defective. It is admitted on all hands that no emends were pos. ed. Several anecdotes of this council found their way into the West. Bele tells us, for instance (De Temp. Rat. A.D. 688), that such was the honour accorded there to the legates of Agatho that one of them, the bishop of Porto, celebrated the Eucharist in Latin on Low-Sunday, in the church of St. Sophia, before the emperor and patriarch. Cardinal Humbert asserts it was then explained to the emperor that unleavened bread was enjoined by the Latin rite (ap. Canis. Theol. p. 318). But the two striking incidents of this council were: 1. The arrangement of the "bishops subject to Rome," and those "subject to Constantinople" on opposite sides; and, 2. The anathemas passed on pope and patriarch alike. Coming events are said to cast their shadows before them.

(35) A.D. 691, as Pagi shows (ad Baron. A.D. 692 n. 3-7) from the emended reading of the date given in its 3rd canon and rightly interpreted, in or not earlier than September. The fathers composing it, in their address to the emperor Justinian II. or Rhinotmetus, as he was afterwards surnamed from what befel him, say that they had met at his bidding to pass some canons that had long been needed, owing to the omission of the 5th and 6th councils, contrary to the precedent of the four first to pass any, whence this council has been commonly styled the quini-sexth, or a supplement to both. It is indeed best known as the Trullan, from the hall of the palace 6th council of bishops s whom 43 h (Mansi xi. f after them who signs h accepting an defined by t after his na clearly that and blanks a of Thessalon and Corinth, have been s bishop of Go scribing on Roman church among the s having been thither from afterwards in the council, o synod (ib. p. ground for s Rome there i are willing to as apocryphi Baron. ib. n. his life of Se that the legat and deluded thing else in and of the ac served. Great extent to whi

In the West; accounted the so; and when comes to Serg for subscriptio than assent to they contained one, was requ that he could back the tones Trull., op. Ton 710, n. 2) follo this is inferre ception given t nian, which m motives. Wha St. Tarasius, r plicit enough;
councils with a divinely prom contained" wh these canons, f
And the first ca by him is subst
But the exact stains, the libra tion of the acts John VIII., wh cepted all the s reserve. "At t principal see so Greeks to have as to reject in them should p canons, or the d any novel terms

a remarkable ad-of all present, that the doctrine by the two first nation in the four last; and n still appended to it, definition signed that sees of Rome, ntioch, and Jeru-mpressly was done sion, a letter was name of the counuld receive a copy and begging that s reply. The em-to receive them in and promise, almeto the Roman
t—Agatho dying,
—and another to n, the year follow-
e. This new ion in the fullest ation of Honorius t; all which he in sending them ets of this council y from hence the has been denied morus; Professor
r. R.'s rejoinder, acts of the council e state was once A.D. 681, n. 9-12). ven by Mansi (xi.
gement of the con-ogically defective, at no canons were this council found Bele tells us, for
p. 688), that such e to the legates of the bishop of Porto, tia on Low-Sunday, before the emperor nbert asserts it was or that unalienated tin rite (ap. Canis. striking incidents arrangement of the and those "subject site sides; and, 2. pope and patriarch said to cast their ows (ad Baron. A.D.

led reading of the and rightly intern September. The address to the em-otmetus, as he was what befel him, say adding to pass some ealed, owing to the a councils, contrary first to pass any n commonly styled ent to both. It is ullan, from the hall of the palace in which it was held, although the 6th council had met there no less. The number of bishops subscribing to its canons was 213, of whom 43 had been present at the 6th council (Mansi xi. 927); and at their head, instead of after them as at the 6th council, the emperor, who signs however differently from the rest, as accepting and assenting to merely what had been defined by them. A blank is left immediately after his name for that of the pope, showing clearly that the pope was not represented there; and blanks are subsequently left for the bishops of Thessalonica, Heraclea, Sardinia, Ravenna, and Corinth, who might, had they been present, have been supposed acting for him: Basil, indeed, bishop of Gortyna in Crete, is set down as subscribing on behalf of the whole synod of the Roman church; but then he is similarly set down among the subscriptions to the 6th council, not having been one of the three deputies sent thither from Rome (ib. pp. 642 and 70), and afterwards in the letter addressed to Agatho by the council, only signing for himself and his own synod (ib. p. 690). Hence there seems little ground for supposing him to have represented Rome there in any sense, though Pagi and others are willing to believe he may have been acting as apocrisarius at the time of the council (ad Baron. ib. n. 9-13). Certainly, Anastasius, in his life of Sergius I., who was then Pope, says that the legates of the apostolic see were present, and deluded into subscribing; but there is nothing else in the subscriptions to confirm this; and of the acts nothing further has been preserved. Great controversy prevails as to the extent to which this council has been received in the West: Oecumenical it has never been accounted there, in spite of its own claim to be so: and when its 102 canons were sent in six tomes to Sergius, himself a native of Antioch, for subscription, he said he would die sooner than assent to the erroneous innovations which they contained. John VII., the next pope but one, was requested by the emperor to confirm all that he could, and reject the rest; but he sent back the tomes untouched—Lupus (Diss. de Syn. Trul., op. Tom. iii. 168-73), whom Pagi (A.D. 710, n. 2) follows is of opinion that Constantine was the first pope to confirm any of them; but this is inferred solely from the honourable reception given to him at Constantinople by Justinian, which may have been dictated by other motives. What Adrian I. says in his epistle to St. Tarasius, read out at the 7th council, is explicit enough: "I too receive the same six holy councils with all the rules constitutionally and divinely promulgated by them; among which is contained" what turns out to be the 82nd of these canons, for he quotes it at full length. And the first canon of the 7th council confirmed by him is substantially to the same effect.

But the exact truth is probably told by Anastasius, the librarian, in the preface to his translation of the acts of the 7th council dedicated to John VIII., whom he credits with having accepted all the apostolical canons under the same reserve. "At the 7th council," he says, "the principal see so far admits the rules laid by the Greeks to have been framed at the 6th council, as to reject in the same breath whichever of them should prove to be opposed to former canons, or the decrees of its own holy pontiffs, or to good manners." All of them, indeed, he contents had been unknown to the Latins entirely till then, never having been translated; neither were they to be found even in the archives of the other patriarchal sees, where Greek was spoken, none of whose occupants had been present to concur or assist in their promulgation, although the Greeks attributed their promulgation to those fathers who formed the 3th council, a statement for which he avers they were unable to bring any decisive proof. This shows how little he liked these canons himself: nor can it be denied that some of them were dictated by a spirit hostile to the West. The 3rd and 13th, for instance, deliberately propose to alter what had been the law and practice of the Roman church for upwards of 300 years respecting those who became presbyters, deacons, or sub-deacons, as married men: and make the rule substituted for it in each case binding upon all. The 55th on the authority of one of the apostolical canons not received by Rome, interdicts the custom of fasting on Saturdays which had prevailed in the Roman church from time immemorial. And the 56th lays down a rule to be kept by all churches in observing the Lenten fast. Canons 32, 33, and 99 are specially levelled against the Armenians. Of the rest, canon 1 confirms the doctrine of the 6th general council preceding, and insists in the strongest terms upon its unalterableness. Canon 2 renews all the canons confirmed by them, with the Sardican and African in addition, besides the canons of SS. Dionysius and Peter of Alexandria; of St. Gregory Thaumaturgus, St. Athanasius, St. Basil, and St. Gregory Nysen; the canonical answers of Timothy with the canons of Theophilus, bishop of Alexandria and the canonical letters of St. Cyril: the canon of Scripture with St. Gregory Nazianzen, and another by St. Amphilocheus, bishop of Iconium in Lycæonia, with a circular of Gennadius, patriarch of Constantinople, against simoniacal ordinations. In conclusion, it receives all the apostolical canons, eighty-five in number, though at that time but fifty were received in the Roman church, as we learn from Anastasius, but rejects the apostolical constitutions as having been interpolated, and containing many spurious things. By this canon accordingly the sole of the Eastern church was authoritatively settled, apart of course from the 102 canons now added to it, which were formally received themselves, as we have seen, by the 2nd Council of Nicea, and reckoned ever afterwards as the canons of the 6th council. As such they are quoted by Photius in his Synagma canonum, and his Nomocanon (Migne's Pat. Gr. civ. 431-1218), and continue to be quoted still (Orthod. x and Non-Jurors, by Rev. G. Williams, p. 74). Their general character is thoroughly oriental, but without disparagement to their practical value (Mansi, xi. 921-1024, and xii. 47-50; Bever, II. 126-34).

(28) A.D. 712, in the short-lived reign of Philipppicus or Bardanes, and under the Monothelite patriarch of his appointment, John VI.; at which the 6th council was repudiated and condemned. The copy of its acts, belonging to the palace was likewise burnt by his order, as we learn from the deacon who transcribed them; and the picture of it that hung there, removed. On the death of the tyrant indeed John addressed a letter to Pope Constantine to apologise for what had been done; but its tone is not assuring. He testifies, however, to the authentic tones of the 6th council being safe still in his archives (Mansi, xii. 187-208); and Pagi can see some excuse for his conduct (ad Baron. A.D. 712, n. 2-4).

448 CONSTANTINOPLÉ, COUNCILS OF

(37) A.D. 715, Aug. 11, at which the translation of St. Germanus from the see of Cyricus to that of Constantinople was authorised. He had been a party to the Monothelite synod under John three years before; but immediately after his translation he held a synod—most probably this one continued—in which he condemned Monothelism (Mansi, xii. 255-8).

(38) A.D. 730, or rather a meeting in the imperial palace, at which the Emperor Leo III., better known as the Isaurian, called upon St. Germanus the aged patriarch to declare for the demolition of images, which he had just ordered himself in a second edict against them. The patriarch replied by resigning his pall (Mansi, xii. 269-70, and Pagi, ad Baron., A.D. 730, n. 1-4).

(39) A.D. 754, from Feb. 10 to Aug. 8, held by order of the Emperor Constantine Copronymus, and styling itself Oecumenical, or the 7th council, though its claim to both titles has since been set aside in favour of the second council of Nicaea, in which its decrees were reversed. Unfortunately, there is no record of its acts extant, but what is to be found in the 6th session of that council, where they were cited only to be condemned. As many as 338 bishops attended it, but the chief see represented there was that of Ephesus. Their proceedings are given in six tomes, as follows: 1. They deduce the origin of all creature-worship from the devil, to abolish which God sent His Son in the flesh; 2. Christianity being established, the devil, they say, was undone to bring about a combustion between it and idolatry; but the emperors had opposed themselves to his designs. Already six councils had met, and the present one following in their steps declared all pictorial representations unlawful and subversive of the faith which they professed; 3. Two natures being united in Christ, no one picture or statue could represent Christ as He is, besides His only proper representation is in the Eucharistic sacrifice of His own institution; 4. There was no prayer in use for consecrating images, nor were representations of the saints to be tolerated any more than of Christ, for Holy Scripture was distinctly against both; 5. The fathers, beginning with St. Epiphanius, having been cited at some length to the same purpose, the council decreed unanimously that all likenesses of whatsoever colour and material were to be taken away, and utterly disused in Christian churches; 6. All clergy setting up or exhibiting reverence to images in church or at home were to be deposed; monks and laymen anathematised. Vessels and vestments belonging to the sanctuary were never to be turned to any purpose in connexion with them. A series of anathemas was directed against all who upheld them in any sense, or contravened the decrees of this council. St. Germanus, George of Cyprus, and St. John of Damascus, or Mansur, as he was called by the Saracens, were specially denounced as image-worshippers. The usual acclamations to the emperor followed. Before the council separate, Constantine the new patriarch was presented to it and approved. It was then sitting in the church of St. Mary, ad Blachernas, within the city; its earlier sittings had been held in a palace of the emperor, called Hieracon, on the opposite shore (Mansi, xii. 575-8, and xiii. 203-356; Cave, i. 646-7). [E. S. F.]

CONTRACT OF MARRIAGE

CONSTANTINOPLÉ. (1) The birth (γενέθλια) of Constantinople is placed by the Cal. Byzant. on May 11. The dedication (εγκαινία) is said to have been performed by the Holy Fathers of the 1st Council of Nicaea in the year 325.

(2) The Council of Constantinople is commemorated in the Armenian Calendar on Feb. 16. [C.]

CONTRAKION (Κοντράκιον). A short ode or hymn which occurs in the Greek offices. The name has been variously derived. The explanation most generally received is that it signifies a short hymn, from the word κοντός, 1-tle; because it contains in a short space the praises of some saint or festival (Goar, not. 31 in off. Laud.). It has also been derived from κοντός, a dart or javelin; so that Contraktion would mean an ejaculatory prayer, or a short pointed hymn after the model of an antiphon. Some, again, have considered the word to be a corruption of Conticium. Romanus, a deacon of Emesa, who flourished about 500 A.D., is said to be the author of Contraktia. They frequently occur in the canons and other parts of the office, and vary with the day. [CANON OF ODES.] In the list of the officials of the church of Constantinople we have ὁ ἄρχων τῶν κοντράκιων, named among the offices appropriate to priests (τα ὀφείλια τοῖς ἱερεῦσι προσήκοντα).

The word "Contraktion" is also used of the volume containing the liturgies of St. Basil, St. Chrysostom, and of the presanctified alone, in distinction to the complete missal. In this sense the word is usually derived from κοντός, a dart, i.e. the wooden roll round which the MS. was rolled, "κοντὰς est parvus contus . . . Inde et κοντράκιον, Scapus chartarum, vel volumen ad κοντράκιον" (Salmas. Execr. Plin.). Goar, however, preters the derivation from κόδικον, "quasi brevis codex." In the ordination of a priest, after the ceremonies of ordination are completed, the newly-ordained priest is directed to take his place among the other presbyters (γεννηθῆσθαι τὸ κοντράκιον (i.e. his book of the liturgy). [H. J. E.]

CONTRA VOTUM. A formula frequent in epitaphs, expressing the regret of survivors at a loss suffered against their wishes and prayers. It is of pagan origin, and does not appear to have been adopted by Christians before the 6th century. The earliest example of the formula given by De Rossi is of the commencement of that century, and runs as follows: "PARENTIS POSVERUNT ΤΕΤΕΛΥΜ CONTRA VOTUM ET DOLO SVO." It is not confined, as has sometimes been supposed, to epitaphs placed by parents for their children; husbands use it of wives and wives of husbands, brothers and sisters of each other; and in fact it is very generally used to express the longing felt by the survivor for the departed. It is most common in Northern Italy. (Martigny, Dict. des Antiq. Chret. 175.) [C.]

CONTRACT OF MARRIAGE. This expression may enses, according marriage in the continental usag ing to our marr it separately un

CONTRACT

1. The law o the contract of points, compou laws, under th teaching. It is features, from especially in reg from the forme
the clergy.

The validity o depen, it may inherent capac
contract; (2)
placed upon the

1. Strictly sp the parties for points, (a) nulli
(c) sufficient fre it may be observ old Jewish law, ribe by age tr

(Inst. bk. i. t. x. practically foll which take noti although it is ge long run to fix
reference to the the Digest it is p tract is only vili she has complete be already marri (bk. xiii. t. 1. l. his Institutes pr of decency, the n (bk. i. t. xxii.);
generally be ac

Strange as it legislation seems found which a wo find Justinian ir libations of the marriages betwe 60 and 50 (Code
vi. t. lviii. l. 12).
found in later s disparity of age sautly see, his son pressed.

It may here capacity in perso held to produce marriage contr marriage voidabl (see Code, bk. v.
Nov. 117, c. 12)
portance in refer except where div (see Dig., bk. xxiv

(*) As respect reason, it may be riage contract, ac Thus, under the by modern legisla validity of the co when afterwards
l. 16, § 2; and se
CHRIST. ANT.

pression may be considered in two different senses, according as it refers to the agreement for marriage in the abstract, or, according to later continental usage, to its written evidence answering to our marriage settlement. We shall consider it separately under these two heads.

1. The law of the church on the subject of the contract of marriage is, as on many other points, compounded of the Jewish and Roman laws, under the influence of New Testament teaching. It is derived mainly, in its general features, from the latter system of legislation, especially in regard to the marriage of the laity; from the former mainly in regard to that of the clergy.

The validity of the marriage contract generally depends, it may be said, on two points, (1) the inherent capacity of the parties to enter into the contract; (2) the limitations which may be placed upon the exercise of that capacity.

1. Strictly speaking, the inherent capacity of the parties for marriage turns only upon three points, (a) sufficient age; (b) sufficient reason; (c) sufficient freedom of will. On the first point, it may be observed that the old Roman, like the old Jewish law, attached the capacity for marriage by age to the physical fact of puberty (Inst. bk. i. t. x. § 1); and the same principle is practically followed in all systems of legislation which take notice of age at all in this matter, although it is generally found convenient in the long run to fix an age of legal puberty, without reference to the specific fact. Thus already in the Digest it is provided that the marriage contract is only valid on the part of the wife when she has completed her 12th year, even though she be already married and living with her husband (bk. xliii. t. i. § 4). And Justinian himself in his Institutes professes to have fixed, on grounds of decency, the age of puberty for the male at 14 (bk. i. t. xxii.); both which periods have very generally been adopted in modern legislation.

Strange as it may seem, the earlier Roman legislation seems to have even fixed an age beyond which a woman could not marry, since we find Justinian in the Code abolishing all prohibitions of the Lex Julia vel Papia against marriages between men and women above or below 60 and 50 (Code, bk. v. t. iv. l. 27; and see bk. vi. t. lviil. l. 12). Nothing of this kind is to be found in later systems of legislation, although disparity of age in marriage, as we shall presently see, has sometimes been sought to be suppressed.

It may here be observed that physical incapacity in persons of full age has never been held to produce actual inability to enter into the marriage contract, but simply to render the marriage voidable when the fact is ascertained (see Code, bk. v. t. xvii. l. 10; Nov. 22, c. 6; Nov. 117, c. 12). Nor is the fact one of importance in reference to the marriage relation, except where divorce is put under restrictions (see Dig. bk. xxiv. t. i. ll. 60, 61, 62).

(2.) As respects the second point: Defect of reason, it may be said, in reference to the marriage contract, acts inversely to defect of age. Thus, under the Roman law, followed generally by modern legislation, madness was fatal to the validity of the contract, but did not dissolve it when afterwards supervening (Dig. bk. xxii. t. ii. l. 16, § 2; and see Jul. Paul. Recept. Sent. bk. xi. t. xix. § 4).

(c.) The freedom of will of the parties, on the other hand, can only be testified by their consent to the marriage [as to which see COHENS]; but it may also be indirectly secured by limitations of a protective character placed on the exercise of the capacity to contract marriage, which will be considered presently. It may be sufficient here to observe that according to the jurists of the Digest a man might marry a woman by letters or by proxy if she were brought to his house, but this privilege did not belong to the woman (bk. xliii. t. ii. l. 5; and see Jul. Paul. Recept. Sent. bk. ii. t. xix. § 5).

There was, moreover, one large class of persons in whom there was held to be no freedom of will, and, consequently, no capacity to contract marriage. It is important to insist on this point, since Gibbon in the second chapter of his great work speaks of the Romans as having "in their numerous families, and particularly in their country estates . . . encouraged the marriage of their slaves." A false statement was probably never put forth by a historian, unless for marriage we read, in plain English, breeding. Marriage is simply impossible where the persons of slaves of both sexes are subject, absolutely without limit, to the lusts, natural or unnatural, of a master (see, for instance, Horace, Sat. i. 2, 116). The slave, his master's thing, can have no will but his master's; in respect of the civil law properly so-called, i. e. the law made for citizens, he does not exist; (Ulpian, l. ij. bk. l. t. xvii. l. 32), or as the same jurist in his grand language elsewhere expresses it, his condition is almost equivalent to death itself (ibid. l. 209). Thus, according to the logic of the Roman law, connections between slaves obtain not so much as a mention by either the jurists of the Digest, or the Emperors in the constitutions of the Code. Connections between slaves and serfs, i. e. the so-called adscriptitii glæe, are indeed mentioned (Code, bk. xi. t. xviii. c. 21), but without the name of marriage, and only to determine the condition of the offspring, which is fixed by that of the mother. Rustici, a class of peasants who seem to have been of higher status than the adscriptitii, could contract marriage inter se, and the 157th Novel is directed against the landowners of Mesopotamia and Osrohoene, who sought to forbid their peasants to marry out of their own estates, and if they did so, were in the habit of breaking up their marriages and families.

Wherever, therefore, we find slaves' marriages mentioned, we must seek another origin for the recognition of them than in the Roman law. That origin seems unquestionably to be in the Jewish law. Although only "Hebrew" servants are mentioned in the passage of Exodus on this subject (c. xxi. vv. 3, 4, 5, 6), it is clear that the Pentateuch recognized the marriage of persons in a servile condition. And with the sweeping away by the Christian dispensation of all distinction between Jew and Gentile it is but natural to suppose that the right of marriage would be extended from the Hebrew slave to the whole slave class. Such right, indeed, was not absolute, as will have been observed, but flowed from the master's will, and was subject to his rights. The master gave a wife to his slave; the wife and her children remained his, even when the slave himself obtained his freedom.

CHRIST. ANT.

The Barbarian Codes do not materially vary from the Roman as respects the marriage contract, so far as respects the conditions of age and reason. It is clear, however, that, in Italy, especially under the Lombards, and under the Visigoths of Spain, habits of early marriage prevailed which had to be checked by law. A law of King Luitprand, A.D. 724, enacts that girls shall only be marriageable at the expiration of their 12th year (bk. vi. c. 59). An earlier law of the same king, A.D. 717, has been already referred to under the head BETROTHAL (bk. ii. c. 6). Although 18 was fixed as the age of majority for male infants, yet they might before this age contract either betrothal or marriage, and had full power of settling property (bk. vi. c. 64; A.D. 724). A Lombard capitulary of Charlemagne's (A.D. 779) prohibits generally the marrying of a boy or girl under the age of puberty, where there is disparity of age, but allows them to marry when of equal age and consenting (c. 145). The same prohibition is contained in the Capitulary of Tessino (Pertz), A.D. 801, also added to the Lombard law.

The Visigothic law seems less equal towards the sexes. A law of King Chindaswinth (bk. iii. t. 4) forbids on the one hand women of full age from marrying males under age, but on the other enacts that girls under age are only to marry husbands of full age. It is not however clear whether the age referred to is that of puberty or general majority.

As respects the marriage of slaves, we find a formula on the subject among those collected by Mabillon (No. 44). They appear clearly to have been recognized both by the state and the church in the reign of Charlemagne, as will be presently shewn.

2. If we turn now to what we may term the extrinsic conditions of the capacity for marriage, in other words to the limitations placed upon the exercise of that capacity, we find these to have been very various. Some are purely or mainly moral ones; the leading one of this class, that of the amount of consanguinity which the law of different nations has held to be a bar to the validity of the nuptial contract, will be found treated of under the heads COUSINS-GERMAN, MARRIAGE. Another—singular, because exactly opposite feelings on the subject have prevailed in different countries—is to be found in the prohibition by the later Roman law of marriages between ravishers and their victims, under severe penalties, both for the parties themselves, and the parents who consented to it (Justinian, Cod. b. ix. t. xiii. § 1, Nov. 143, 150).

A directly contrary rule prevailed under Theodoric in the Ostrogothic kingdom. The 59th chapter of his Edict compels the ravisher of a free-born woman, if of suitable fortune and noble birth, as well as single, to marry her, and to endow her with 1-5th of his property. The Lombard law does not seem to provide expressly for the case; but the "Lex Romana" of the Roman population in Italy must have followed it in its departure from the legislation of the emperors, where, after enacting death as the penalty of rape, it provides that if no accusation be brought for five years, "the marriage will afterwards be valid and its issue legitimate" (bk. ix. t. xviii.). Death was also the punishment of rape among the Franks; but Marculf's formulae show that marriages between ravisher and ravished were allowed (bk. ii. f. 16). A Lombard capitulary of Charlemagne's, however, A.D. 779, forbids a ravished bride to marry her ravisher, even if her betrothed refuses to take her back (c. 124). The law of the Alamans (t. lii) is to the same effect. The Saxon law on the contrary (t. x.) requires the ravisher to "buy" the woman for 300 solidi.

It seems doubtful whether a canon of the Council of Ilberis in 305, bearing that "virgins who have not kept their virginity, if they have married and kept as husbands their violators," are to be admitted to communion after a year without penance, applies really to what we should term violation, or to seduction only. But at any rate the Visigothic law is severest of all the barbaric codes against marriages between ravishers and ravished. Whilst enacting that the ravisher with all his property is to be handed over as a slave to the woman to whom he has done violence, and to receive 200 lashes publicly, it imposes the penalty of death on both if they intermarry, unless they should flee to the altar, when they are to be separated and given to the parents of the woman (bk. iii. t. iii. ll. 1, 2). Closely allied to these enactments is one of the Burgundian law, forbidding marriages between widows and their paramours (t. xlv.). It may perhaps be inferred from the above that the tenderness of the barbarian races had originally been to favour such marriages, but that the influence of the opposite Roman feeling, kept up no doubt traditionally by the clergy, generally prevailed in the long run in the barbarian codes.

There were indeed certain moral enormities which in some legislations were made a bar to all subsequent marriage. By the Visigothic law, a freeman guilty of rape on a married woman, after receiving a hundred lashes, was to become slave to his victim, and never to marry again (bk. ii. t. iv. l. 14). But it is the Carolingian capitularies which apply most largely this kind of prohibition. By a capitulary of King Pepin at Vermerie, A.D. 753, if a man committed adultery with his step-daughter, with his step-mother, or with his wife's sister or cousin, neither could ever marry again (cc. 2, 10, 11, 12); nor a wife who had been dismissed by her husband for conspiring against his life (c. 5). The Capitulary of Compiègne, A.D. 757, extends the prohibition to a brother committing adultery with his sister-in-law, a father seducing his son's betrothed, and to their respective paramours (cc. 11, 13); to a man living in adultery with a mother and daughter, or with two sisters, but to the women, in such case, only if they were aware of the incestuous connexion (cc. 17, 18). A capitulary of the 7th book of the general collection forbids also a woman who has had connexion with two brothers ever to marry again (c. 381; and see bk. v. c. 168).

Another limitation on the marriage contract, which must be considered rather of a political nature, and which prevails more or less still in the military code of almost every modern nation, was that on the marriage of soldiers. Under the early Roman polity, marriage was absolutely forbidden to soldiers; but the Emperor Claudius allowed them the ius connubii, and it seems certain that there were married soldiers under Galba and Domitian (Mur. Thes. Inscr. i. p. 306; Gort.

Inscr. Antiqu. ever to have live with t Phillips, on a stricted the marriage (M Justinian's Code persons in th the protectio of any sort, (Constitution bk. v. t. iv. gular armies answering to their codes.

We pass now which must tective charac freedom, as these, in the those which see CONSENT seems general a much love social depende of children t interdictions p marriage of g with their fem space in the t. ll. ii. 59, 60.

Lastly come of officials w which rema Papinian rema those on the r wards (Dig. b could marry (t self) a wife born in which he trothed to her woman, she co minate the enga money; but he rage within the of an official seems to have b lutely void (l. 6.

Under the Co Gmilian, Valenti known by its n (referred to supp priving of all b persons holding kinsmen and depe vice, allows th afterwards carri betrothed women constitution of G marriage were c the woman's cous down his office sh the marriage bec timate (t. iv. l. known as "Si qu a fine of 10 lbs. of cials who should marriages, even carried out (law Theodentius, A.D. 31

We do not find provisions in the the work called t between each other (bk. ii. l. 10). A woman's, however, refusal to marry her father refused to take the Almonst (t. iii.) on law on the con- sider to "buy" the r a canon of the saying that "virginity, if they have their violators," are after a year without t. we should term

But at any rate of all the barbaric been ravishers and t. the ravisher with c over as a slave to one violence, and to t. imposes the pe- intermarry, unless when they ate to the parents of the

Closely allied to e Burgundian law, widows and their perhaps be inferred adency of the bar- been to favour such e of the opposite t. but traditionally by in the long run in moral enormities ere made a bar to the Visigothic law, a married woman, hes, was to become r to marry again s the Carolingian t largely this kind r of King Pepin at committed adultery his step-mother, o neither could ever 2); nor a wife who and for conspiring Capitulary of Com- e prohibition to a with his sister's- o's betrothed, and (cc. 11, 13); to a th a mother and but to the women, e aware of the in- 8). A capitulary l collection forbids onnexion with two a (c. 381); and see marriage contract, ther of a political or less still in ery modern nations, sifers. Under the was absolutely for- Emperor Claudius and it seems cer- soldiers under Galba (c. i. p. 306; Gort, Inscr. Antiq. iii. p. 144). Severus seems how- ever to have been the first to allow soldiers to live with their wives (Herald. iii. 229). The Phillips, on the other hand, seem to have restricted the jus connubii for soldiers to a first marriage (Mur. Thes. Inscr. l. 362). Under Justinian's Code, the marriage of soldiers and other persons in the militia, from the collegatus miles to the protector, was made free without solemnities of any sort, so long as the wife was free-born (Constitution of Theodosius and Valentinian, Code, bk. v. t. iv. l. 21). There having been no regular armies among the barbarian races, nothing answering to the prohibition is to be found in their codes.

CONTRACT OF MARRIAGE

We pass now to those restrictions on marriage which must be considered to be mainly of a protective character, and intended to secure the real freedom, as well as the wisdom of choice. To these, in the highest view of the subject, belong those which turn upon the consent of parents [see CONSENT]; although indeed this restriction seems generally to have had its historic origin in a much lower sphere of feeling,—that of the social dependence and slavery or quasi-slavery of children to their parents. Next come the interdictions placed by the Roman law on the marriage of guardians or curators, or their issue, with their female wards. This occupies a large space in the Corpus Juris; see Dig. bk. xxiii. t. ii. l. 59, 60, 62, 64, 65, 67; Code, bk. v. t. vi.

Lastly come the interdictions on the marriage of officials within their jurisdictions, which, as Papinian remarks, are analogous in principle to those on the marriage of guardians with their wards (Dig. bk. xxiii. t. ii. l. 63). No official could marry (though he might betroth to himself) a wife born or domiciled within the province in which he held office, unless he had been betrothed to her before; and if he betrothed a woman, she could, after his giving up office, terminate the engagement, on returning the earnest-money; but he could give his daughters in marriage within the province (l. 38). The marriage of an official contracted against this interdiction seems to have been considered by Papinian absolutely void (l. 63).

Under the Code, a well-known constitution of Gratian, Valentinian, and Theodosius, A.D. 380, known by its title as "Si rector Provincie" (referred to supra under ARRBAE), whilst depriving of all binding force betrothals between persons holding authority in any province, their kinsmen and dependents, and women of the province, allows the marriage nevertheless to be afterwards carried out with the consent of the betrothed woman (bk. v. t. ii.). And a previous constitution of Gratian had provided that if the marriage were contracted against the law with the woman's consent, and after her husband laid down his office she remained of the same mind, the marriage became legal, and the issue legitimate (t. iv. l. 6). By another constitution, known as "Si quancumque praeditus potestate," a fine of 10 lbs. of gold was enacted against officials who should seek to coerce women into marriages, even though these should not be carried out (law of Gratian, Valentinian, and Theodosius, A.D. 380; ib. t. vii.).

We do not find anything answering to these provisions in the Barbarian Codes, but only in the work called the Lex Romana supposed to have represented the personal law of the Romans under the Lombard kings. Here, in barbarous Latin, some of the provisions of the Code are reproduced, whilst others are widely departed from. For instance, in place of the protective provisions against the marriage of guardians with their wards, we have coarser ones providing against the seduction of wards by their guardians, under penalty of exile and confiscation (bk. ix. t. v.).

CONTRACT OF MARRIAGE 451

Another class of restrictions on marriage may be termed social ones, as depending chiefly on disparity of social condition. The most prominent disparity of condition in the whole ancient world, as it remains still in much of the modern world, was that between freeman and slave. According to the Roman law, there could be absolutely no marriage between the two, but only what was termed a contubernium (Jul. Paul. Recept. Sent. bk. ii. t. 19, § 3). Yet the sense of human equality was so strong, that a senatus-consultum had to be issued under the Emperor Claudius against the marriage of freewomen with slaves; reducing the former to slavery itself, if the act were done without the knowledge of the master, —to the condition of freedwomen if with his consent (Tacitus, Ann. bk. xii. c. 53; A.D. 53). Although this law does not appear in the Corpus Juris—perhaps because it might seem indirectly to recognize slaves' marriages—it is clear that neither under the Digest nor under the Code could there be any marriage between free and slave. "With slave-girls there can be no connubium," says a constitution of Constantine (bk. v. t. v. l. 3); "for from this contubernium slaves are born." It affords indeed a strange picture of the more than servile condition of the Roman municipal functionaries, even at this period of the Empire, that the avowed object of the constitution which opens with this annunciation of a principle, is to prevent deceptions, through the passions of slave girls, finding a refuge in the bosom of the most powerful families. The secret marriage of a decurion with a slave was to be punished by sending the woman to the mines, the decurion himself to exile on some island, whilst his property passed, as if he were dead, to his family, or in default of such to the city of which he was a curial; local officials who were privy to the offence, or left it unpunished, were in like manner to be sent to the mines. If it took place in the country, by permission of the girl's master, the estate where it occurred, with all slaves and live and dead stock, was to be confiscated; if in a city the master forfeited the half of all his goods. That deceptions, however, were not the only persons likely to marry slaves is evident from a constitution of Valentinian and Marcian, A.D. 428 (ib. l. 7), which enumerates "the slave-girl, the daughter of a slave-girl," first amongst those persons whom senators may not marry.

If any man married a slave, believing her to be free, the marriage was void ab initio (22nd Nov. c. 10). But if a master married his slave-girl to a freeman, or constituted a dos upon her, which was considered to be the privilege of the free, a constitution of Justinian's enacted that this should not only enfranchise her, but confer on her the rights of Roman citizenship (Code, bk. vii. t. vi. l. 1). In the 22nd Novel (c. 11) the same emperor went further still and enacted, that when a master either himself gave away his slave-girl in marriage, whether with or without dotal instruments, or knowingly allowed another to give her away, as a freewoman, to a man ignorant of her condition, this should amount to a tacit enfranchisement, and the marriage should be valid; and again (c. 12), a fortiori, that if a master had long deserted either a male or female slave in a state of bodily weakness (benignitas), or shown no care to preserve his rights over them, they, as derelicts, resuming possession of themselves, were no longer to be troubled by him, so that the marriages of such as free men or women would be lawful. Finally, the 78th Novel provided that where a man had had children by his slave-girl, and constituted a dos upon her (which had the effect of marriage), this of itself had the effect of manumitting the issue born in slavery, and rendering them liberi, and no longer merely filii, to the father (c. 4).

Closely analogous to the condition of the slave was that of the adscripitius glebæ. The marriage of a freeman with an adscripitia does not however seem to have been void, but the children retained their mother's condition. On the other hand, the marriage of a freewoman with an adscripitus was declared to be absolutely void; they were to be separated, and the man punished (Code, bk. xi. t. xviii. l. 24; 22d Nov. c. 17; but see 54th Nov. preface). Nor do we find the same mitigations of the law in favour of an adscripitia as of a slave (supra). As respects the next highest class, that of the rustici, we find that whilst marriages between them and free persons seem to have been recognized, the issue of such marriages was divided in point of condition, the first, third, fifth child, &c., following that of the mother ("quod impar est, habebit venter," 16th Novel).

The Barbarian Codes deal more frequently with the subject of these marriages, and in some of them we trace distinctly the threefold condition of freeman, serf or villain, and slave, the second becoming more and more superior to the third. The intermarriage of man or woman belonging to either of the first two classes involves, under the Lombard laws (A.D. 638) of Rotharis (c. 218), and Liutprand (A.D. 721) (bk. iv. c. 6), penalties of greater or less severity. In the Lex Romana, supposed to represent the personal law of the Roman population in Italy in Lombard times, we find a provision, that if a freewoman marries her own slave, she shall be put to death and the slave burnt alive (bk. ix. t. vi.).

Similar provisions are found in the Almannic law (circa A.D. 750) (c. 2, and foll.), in the Bavarian (Append. de popul. leg. c. 9) and the Frisian (t. xviii.), while the Visigothic is yet more cruelly severe, condemning all such unions, according to their varying circumstances, to the penalties of loss of freedom, scourging, death by burning (bk. iii. t. ii. c. 2).

Finally, a law of King Gaba is addressed to what seems to have been a peculiar form of semi-slavery in the service of the Church. Its title is, "That those who are enfranchised, retaining service to the Church, should not dare approach the marriage of free persons." It enacts that a church-slave absolutely freed may marry a freewoman; but if still bound to the obsequium, he is to receive three stripes and be separated from his wife; otherwise both are to be in slavery with their issue, the property of the freewoman going to her heirs. And the same rule is enacted as to such women marrying freemen (bk. iv. c. 7).

Notwithstanding the largeness of many of the above enactments, it must be inferred from them that marriages between free and slaves were increasing in frequency. Indirectly, moreover, those which provide that a freewoman choosing to remain with her slave-husband becomes a slave herself, seem to imply, like the senatus-consultum under Claudius before quoted, which was not admitted into the Code, a recognition of marriages between slaves, since the mere living with a slave would not (except under the Visigothic law) affect the condition of the freewoman. There is moreover evidence that, even in the latter class of cases, custom was often milder than the law. Marcull's Formularies, which are considered to have been put together about A.D. 660, contain "charta de agnatione, si servus linguam trahit," by which a mistress grants the freedom of a freewoman's children by her slave (t. 29; and see Appendix, f. 18). The ultimate relaxations of the law itself under the Carlovingians will be best treated of in connexion with the ecclesiastical history of the subject.

Vast as was the gap between free and slave in the ancient world, that between the free born and the freed was still considerable,—especially as between male slaves enfranchised and their former mistresses, or the female relatives of a former master. According to the jurist Paul, a freedman aspiring to marriage with his patrona, or the wife or daughter of his patronus, was, according to the dignity of the person, to be punished either by being sent to the mines, or put upon public works (Jul. Paul. de opt. Sentent. bk. ii. t. xix. § 6); unless indeed the condition of the patronus was so low as to make such a marriage suitable for her (Dig. bk. xiii. t. ll. l. 13). On the other hand, the Lex Saxonica allowed all freeborn males, except senators and their children (in which case the marriage was void), to marry freedwomen (ib. l. 23), from which class seem however to have been excepted those of brothel-keepers, probably as presumably being prostitutes themselves (Ulpian's Fragment. t. xiii. § 27). The marriage of a master with his freedwoman was by no means looked upon in the same light as that of a mistress with her freedman; and the patronus was restrained from marrying his freedwoman without her will (ib. l. 28).

The social restrictions on marriage were, in this as in other respects, relaxed by the later emperors. The marriage to a freewoman of a man who afterwards became a senator was declared by Justinian to remain valid, as well as that of a private person's daughter to a freedman, when her father was raised to the senate (Code, bk. v. t. iv. l. 26). He removed the disability to marriage which seems to have been considered to exist between a man and a girl whom he had brought up (Admiana) and whom he had enfranchised (l. 26). And by the 78th Novel he allowed persons "of whatever dignity" to marry freedwomen, provided "nuptial documents" were drawn up (c. 3).

There were moreover certain conditions of life which were assimilated by their ignominy to the servile one. A free-born man could not marry a procuress, a woman taken in adultery, one con-

demed by public er, according to ly, the senate (C senator was sub (Dig. bk. xliii.
§§ 10, 12); that moreover, a spec either senators or the children o nian and Marcell women who wer were declared to freewomen and their daughters, ters, the daught women who had p t. v. l. 7). If ind prostitute herself
demed by public
lost, she might m (Dig. bk. xliiii. t.
Thanks, no do much greater ind tinitia to access left their calling enable to interm and their childre lities (bk. v. t. l constitution (l. 29 to mount the stag it, were rendered of the highest r
mission.

The jurists of s beroad all specifi Modestian had in one should not only what is honourabl to have grown up a riages, such as is constitution of Val bk. v. t. v. l. 7; A
"a woman is not who, although po declares lawful the however poor, with highest rank. And inferred, from a co Valentinian, A.D. 41 sity for all formal condition (Code, bk. dotal instruments a some of unequal co talian abolished all riages, provided the descent, and there w ought nefarious (l. 2 We do not find m on this branch of t against the intermar issue with the post appears in the Visig the penalty being r Wisigoths there ac law forbidding the i Romans, which was (Lex Wisig. bk. iii. t. man to marry any fr consent of her fami court." The same h Italy under the Lom from the Lombard co

freewoman going is enacted as to bk. iv. c. 7). As of many of the freed from them slaves were in- tively, moreover, woman choosing becomes a slave sentus-consul which was not of marriages living with a slave (Visigothic law) woman. There is in the latter class r than the law. re considered to .D. 660, contain "ingenuum trahit," freedom of a free- e (f. 29); and see relaxations of the plans will be best the ecclesiastical free and slave in ven the free born erable,—especially d and their ole relatives of o the jurist Paul, e with his patrona, is patronus, was, the person, to be to the mines, or ul. he opt. Sentat. eed the condition s to make such a ig. bk. xliii. t. li. e, the Lex Papia cept senators and the marriage was (b. l. 23), from have been excepted bly as presumably, Ulpian's Fragmenti, of a master with ans looked upon in mistress with her was restrained from without her will marriage were, in laxed by the later a freedwoman of a senator was de- n valid, as well as aughter to the senate removed the dis- seems to have been a man and a girl (Humana) and so the 78th Novel he dignity" to marry al documents" were in conditions of life their ignominy to the could not marry a adultery, one con-

CONTRACT OF MARRIAGE

denied by public judgment, or a stage-player; or, according to Manricianus, one condemned by the senate (Ulpian's Fragmenti, t. xiii.). A senator was subject to the same restrictions (Dig. bk. xliii. t. ii. l. 44, § 8; and see l. 43, § 10, 12); the Lex Julia et Papia imposing, moreover, a special prohibition on the marriage of either senators or their issue with stage-players or the children of such (l. 44). Under Valentinian and Marcian, A.D. 454, the "low and abject" women who were forbidden to marry senators were declared to be slaves and their daughters, freewomen and their daughters, players and their daughters, tavern-keepers and their daughters, the daughters of lenones and gladiators, and t. v. l. 7). If indeed a senator's daughter should prostitute herself, go on the stage, or be con- demned by public judgment, her dignity being lost, she might marry a freedman with impunity (Dig. bk. xliii. t. ii. l. 47).

Thanks, no doubt, to Theodora's influence, much greater indulgence was shewn under Justinian to actresses. Such women, if they had led their calling and led a respectable life, were enabled to intermarry with persons of any rank, and their children were relieved from disabilities (bk. v. t. iv. l. 27, § 1). By another constitution (l. 29), women who had been forced to mount the stage, or who wished to abandon it, were rendered capable of marrying persons of the highest rank, without the imperial permission.

The jurists of the Digest had however gone beyond all specific restrictions on marriage. Modestinus had laid down that "in marriages one should not only consider what is lawful, but what is honourable." And generally there seems to have grown up a feeling against unequal marriages, such as is indicated in a before-quoted constitution of Valentinian and Marcian (Code, bk. v. t. v. l. 7; A.D. 454), which provides that "a woman is not to be deemed vile or abject who, although poor, is of free descent," and declares lawful the marriage of such persons, however poor, with senators or persons of the highest rank. And as it seemed to have been inferred, from a constitution of Theodosius and Valentinian, A.D. 418, which abolished the necessity for all formalities between persons of equal condition (Code, bk. v. t. iv. l. 22), that without formal instruments such marriages between persons of unequal condition were not valid, Justinian abolished all restrictions on unequal marriages, provided the wife were free and of free descent, and there was no suspicion of incest or of aught nefarious (l. 23, § 7).

We do not find much in the barbarian codes on this branch of the subject. The Roman law against the intermarriage of freedmen or their issue with the posterity of their patrons re- appears in the Visigothic code (bk. v. t. vii. c. 17), the penalty being reinstatement. Among the Visigoths there seems to have been an old law forbidding the intermarriage of Goths and Romans, which was repealed by Rueswinth (Lex Wisig. bk. iii. t. i.), who allowed any free- man to marry any freewoman," with the solemn consent of her family, and the permission of the court." The same law must have prevailed in Italy under the Lombards, though we miss it from the Lombard code, since the Lex Romana forbids intermarriage between Romans and Barbarians under pain of death (bk. iii. t. xiv.). This restriction is however one rather of a political nature.

CONTRACT OF MARRIAGE 453

Lastly, certain restrictions on the marriage contract are of a religious character, and will be best referred to when we consider the rules of the Church itself upon the subject, which we shall now proceed to do.

That marriage generally was a civil contract, subject to the laws of the state, seems to have been the received doctrine of the early Church; whilst at the same time it claimed also power to regulate it in the name of the Gospel, as is shewn, for instance, in the strictness of our Lord and His apostles against divorce, although freely allowed both by the Jewish and the Roman law. Hence Pagan betrothals and marriages were, as Seiden observes, held valid by the Christians (Uxor Ebraica, bk. ii. c. 24). The validity of non-Christian marriages seems to be implied in such passages as 1 Cor. vii. 12-16, referring to the cases of a convert husband and an unconverted wife, a convert wife and an unconverted husband; in the latter of which cases at least the form of marriage must be supposed to have been one unanctified by the Church; whilst both would seem to include the hypothesis of a conversion of either party after such a marriage. It must moreover be observed that, with one exception, the forms of marriage in use in the Roman world were purely civil ones. The only religious marriage was that by confarreatio, which remarkably enough was indissoluble, except perhaps by disfarreatio, a practice of which the reality is doubted. But it is clear from Tacitus (Ann. bk. iv. c. 16) that by the time of Tiberius, i. e. the beginning of the Christian era, the use of the ceremony had become very rare. When therefore the author of the Epistle to the Hebrews wrote that "marriage is honourable in all" (c. xiii. 4), and his Epistle was admitted as authoritative in the Gentile as well as the Jewish churches, the inference is that the honour he speaks of was felt to rest as well on the ordinary civil contract of the Gentile as on any form in use among the Jews. Again, the Apostolical Constitutions (with an exception as to the clergy to be hereafter noticed) speak simply of "lawful" and "unlawful" marriage. Thus, in a sort of summary of the faith contained in the 6th book (c. 11), it is said: "Every union which is against the law we abhor as iniquitous and unholy." Again: "Marriage should be lawful; for such a marriage is blameless" (ib. c. 14); the expression "lawful connexion" (νόμιμος μίξις) occurring repeatedly in later constitutions (bk. vi. cc. 27, 29). The only consideration which may cast a doubt upon the application of the idea of "law" in such passages as the above, as referring to the municipal law, arises from the circumstance, to be presently adverted to, that the same expressions are used in reference to unions which were not recognized by the Roman law. But the most valuable testimony to the feeling of the early Church on this subject as late as the 2nd and 3rd centuries, is supplied by Tertullian (A.D. 150-220), a writer whose Christian zeal ran always in the direction of ultra- strictness. In his treatise on idolatry, distinguish- ing between those solemnities which a

IMAGE EVALUATION
TEST TARGET (MT-3)

Photographic Sciences
Corporation

23 WEST MAIN STREET
WEBSTER, N.Y. 14580
(716) 872-4503

0 11 13 16 18 20 22 25 28 32 36 40 45 50 56 63 71 80 90 100 10 15 20 25 30 35 40 45 50 55 60 65 70 75 80 85 90 95 100

Christian man may lawfully attend and those which he may not, he enumerates marriage among such as are free from "any breath of idolatry;" "pure by themselves." "The conjugal union," he says, does not flow "from the worship of any idol." "God no more forbids the solemnizing of marriages than the giving of a name" (c. 16).

As a rule, then, the Church has followed the municipal law in reference to the validity of the contract of marriage, and has thus not had occasion to dwell much in its legislation on the legal incidents of the contract. The validity of heathen marriage is implied in the judgments and decisions of various popes and councils (some perhaps antedated) as to pre-baptismal marriages, which, in spite of one or two weighty authorities to the contrary, were held binding, and on the express ground that the issue of such marriages were lawful (liberi). See the 2nd letter of Pope Innocent I., A.D. 402-17, to Victricius, c. 6; his 22nd letter, to the Macedonian bishops, c. 2; the 3rd Council of Rome, A.D. 531; and the letters of Leo to Anastasius and to the bishops of Illyricum. The alleged decree of Pope Fabian, A.D. 238-52, in Gratian, embodying the Roman law on the effect of madness on marriage, is a purely superfluous forgery. Egbert, archbishop of York, indeed, in the Excerptions attributed to him, seems to place the age of puberty somewhat later than the Roman law, since he says that a girl of 14 has power over her own body, a boy of 15 over his (bk. ii. c. 27). A canon of the Council of Friuli, A.D. 791 (c. 9), contains the like prohibition as a previous capitulary before referred to against marriages with children.

It has already been observed, under the head "CONSENT," that on one point indeed a marked divergence is to be traced between the practice of the Church and the Roman law. Slave-marriages are recognized, at least in the later portions of the Apostolical Constitutions. And masters who refused to sanction them were to be excommunicated (viii. 23). A free man, on the other hand, is to dismiss, not to marry, a slave-concubine with whom he may have lived. (Ibid.)

Consistent with the Apostolical Constitutions, the first canonical epistle of St. Basil (A.D. 326-379), to Amphilochius, bishop of Iconium, treats slave-marriages as adulterous when contracted without the master's will, but as "firm" when contracted with his consent; assimilating them to the marriages of minors, and using the same word (ἑπίστα) to express the authority both of the father and of the master. A work of doubtful character, which claims authorship from the Nicene fathers, the Sanctiones et decreta alia, which in the collection of councils by Labbé and Mansi will be found appended to the canons of the Council of Nicea (vol. ii. p. 1029, and foll.), but which are evidently of much later date, declares that "marriage with slaves, male or female, is not allowed to Christians, unless after emancipation; which being done, let them contract by the law of marriage and freely, a dos being assigned, according to the constitution of the country which they inhabit" (bk. i. c. 4). One of the alleged canons of the Nicene council from the Arabic, on the other hand, implies the practice of intermarriage with slaves even amongst the clergy, in condemning as bigamous those priests or deacons who having dismissed their wives, or even without dismissing them, marry others, whether free or slave (can. 66, or 71 of the Eutullian version). But these canons are also evidently of much later date than that ascribed to them, though very likely representing the practice of the Arabian church. If we mention here two alleged decrees of Pope Julius I. A.D. 336-52, the one against separating slaves once married, the other allowing a master to marry his enfranchised slave-girl (Gratian, ec. 4, 10), it is only on account of their professed date.

There are indeed not wanting indications of a narrower spirit among the leaders of the Church. A letter of Pope Leo the Great (167), A.D. 458 or 9, addressed to Rusticus, bishop of Narbonne, seems to imply the nullity of slaves' marriages, and reproduces, on Old-Testament grounds, the strictest views of the Roman law against unequal marriage. "Every woman united to a man is not a wife, since neither is every son his father's heir. The bonds of marriage are lawful between the free and between equals; the Lord establishing this long before the commencement of the Roman law existed. Therefore a wife is one thing, a concubine another; as also a bondmaid is one thing, a freewoman another" (quoting Gen. xxi. 10). [CONCUBINES.] Suspicion is indeed cast upon this text by its use of the word ingenuus, free-born, as simply synonymous with liber, free, a mistake which never occurs in the Code or Novels, though nearly a century later in date, and (though it may be said that a pope was not bound to be strictly accurate in his law-language) it is not impossible that it may be a forgery of the Carolingian era, invented to support a capitulary to the same effect, to be presently noticed.

The 24th canon of the 4th Council of Orleans, A.D. 541, enacts that slaves fleeing to the precincts ("septa") of churches in order to marry are not to be allowed, nor are clerics to defend such unions, but they are to be returned to their masters and separated, unless their parents and masters will let them marry;—a remarkable enactment, as showing a recognition of parental authority in a slave.

Another canon of the same Council, forbidding marriages between Jews and Christian slave-girls, seems to imply the intrinsic validity of marriages between free and slave (c. 31). Another is remarkable as repeating, with the severe penalty of excommunication, the enactments of the Roman law against the marriage of officials within their provinces (c. 22).

A case in which a slave-marriage is recognised occurs in a letter of Pope Pelagius (A.D. 555-96) to the sub-deacon Melleus. (Labbé and Mansi's Coun. il., vol. ix. p. 737.)

On the other hand, Gregory the Great implies the invalidity of a marriage between slave and free in a letter to Fortunatus, bishop of Naples (bk. vi. ep. 1), in favour of a woman whom her husband had dismissed as being of servile condition; but who, being now proved free, was without delay to be received back by him. The same pope however in another letter—to Meletana and Thomas, slaves whom he enfranchised with the privileges of Roman citizenship—implies the practice of slave-marriages, since he speaks

ACT OF MARRIAGE

Gregory, in condemning as bigamous persons who having dismissed their wives without dismissing them, either free or slave (can. 66, or nullian version). But these evidently of much later date than the practice of the Arabian church. There were two alleged decrees of Pope Leo the Great (167), A.D. 458, the one against separating a free woman from a slave, the other allowing a master to marry a free woman, and a free woman to marry a slave-girl (Gratian, de decoretur of their professes did not wanting indications of a change among the leaders of the Church. Pope Leo the Great (167), A.D. 458, to Rusticus, bishop of Narbonne, the nullity of slaves' marriages, on Old-Testament grounds, the nullity of the Roman law against unequal marriages of every woman united to a man is neither in every son his father's of marriage are lawful between equals; and the Lord establisheth before the commencement of the world. Therefore a wife is one and the same as a husband, as also a bondmaid a freewoman another" (quoting [CONCUBINES.] Suspicion is on this text by its use of the word, free-born, as simply synonym, free, a mistake which never occurs in the Code or Novels, though nearly a date, and (though it may be said not bound to be strictly accurate) it is not impossible that it is of the Carolingian era, in a capitulary to the same presently noticed. In the 4th Council of Orleans, it is that slaves fleeing to the presbyters of churches in order to marry, are not allowed, nor are clerics to defile themselves by marrying them, unless their parents and they themselves consent to let them marry;—a remarkable showing a recognition of partial slavery.

of the same Council, forbidding marriages between Jews and Christian slaves; girls, the intrinsic validity of marriages between free and slave (c. 31). Another is respecting, with the severer penalty, the enactments of the Roman law of marriage of officials within their

of a slave-marriage is recognised in the decretal of Pope Pelagius (A.D. 555-56) to Melleus. (Labbé and Mansi's x. p. 737.)

In the hand, Gregory the Great implies a marriage between slave and free. In Fortunatus, bishop of Naples, in favour of a woman whom her master had dismissed as being of servile condition, being now proved free, was to be received back by him. The severer in another letter—to Metanus, slaves whom he enfranchised, and the ages of Roman citizenship—implies the validity of slave-marriages, since he speaks of the "betrothal gifts" (sponsalia) which the priest Gaudiosus had given in writing (conscription) to "thy mother" (bk. v. ep. 12).

The 1st Council of Micon, A.D. 581, declares indissoluble the intermarriage of two slaves with their master's consent, after the enfranchisement of either (c. 10). The 30th canon of the English council held under Archbishop Theodore of Canterbury, towards the end of the 7th century, bears that "the free (or free-born) must marry with the free." Pope Stephen (A.D. 754) in his replies to various consultations at Biensz, follows Leo as to the dismissal of the ancillas and marrying a free woman. It seems difficult to ascribe a specific origin to a prescription found among some "excerpta de libris Romanorum et Francorum," appended to a collection of fresh canons, probably of the beginning of the 8th century, which bears that "if any one chooses to have his slave-girl in marriage, and has power over her property, if afterwards he would sell her, he cannot do so; he is himself to be condemned, and the woman handed over to the priest." (c. 60). Perhaps however we have only here a far-off echo of Exod. xxi. 8, or Deut. xxi. 14.

The subject indeed both of slave-marriages and of intermarriage between slave and free seems to have been greatly considered under the Carolingians; and both the civil and ecclesiastical law (which indeed at this period blend almost undistinguishably together) settle down into the recognition of such marriages and intermarriages as binding under certain conditions. As respects the former, King Pepin's capitulary of Vermerie, A.D. 753, enacts that if a slave husband and wife have been separated by sale, "they are to be exhorted so to remain, if we cannot reunite them" (c. 19); a text at least strongly feeling to the indissolubility of such unions. A more singular one provides that if a slave have his slave-girl for concubine, he may dismiss her and accept "his compeer, his master's slave-girl (compare summa ancillam domini sui accipere); but it is better that he keep his own slave-girl" (c. 7). In both texts we see already visibly the hand of the Church endeavouring to restrain the abuses of slavery. It is moreover enacted that if a carolingian—apparently a slave freed by charter—on receiving his freedom dismisses his slave partner to take another woman, he must leave the latter (c. 29). Fifty years later, the validity of slave marriages is again implied in some "Capitulum nunc canonicum" data of the year 803, published by Pertz, and to be presently referred to. And ten years later still, a capitulary added in some Collectio to the Lombard law (c. 5), as well as the 30th canon of the 2nd Council of Châlons (both of A.D. 813), enact the indissolubleness of slaves' marriages, even when belonging to different masters, provided their marriage be legal, and by the will of their masters. Lastly, to the Carolingian period should also perhaps be referred the two alleged decrees in Gratian of Pope Julius I. (supra). It is almost needless to dwell on the momentous influence of the change of view indicated by the above enactments on the condition of the slave. Evidently, from the moment a slave could lawfully marry, he was no longer a thing, but a person. It might almost be said that from this period slavery properly so called ceases to exist no longer within the Carolingian world: serfdom, or a condition of dependence, it might be absolute, of one man on another, has replaced it.

As respects inter-marriages between slave and free, King Pepin's capitulary of Vermerie, A.D. 753, enacts that where a free-man knowingly marries a slave-girl, he shall always after live with her (c. 13). The king does not even treat such marriages as absolutely void, when contracted in ignorance, allowing the free person to leave his or her slave-partner and marry another only if such slave cannot be redeemed (c. 6). The contemporary Council of Vermerie recognized the validity of marriage between a freewoman and a slave, when contracted knowingly on her part, on the ground that there should be one law to the man and to the woman, and that "we have all one Father in the heavens." The capitulary of Compiègne, 757, enacts that if a freewoman marries a slave, knowing him to be such, he shall have her whilst he lives (c. 8). On the other hand, "if a Frankish man has taken a woman and hopes that she is free," and afterwards finds that she is not, he may dismiss her and take another; and so of a woman (c. 5, otherwise 7).

The validity of such unions is also implied in an enactment, placing marriage with a freeman, a slave, or a cleric, on exactly the same footing (c. 4). Similarly, a Bavarian council at Diligheim, 772, enacted that where a slave married a woman of noble birth who was ignorant of his condition, she should leave him and be free (c. 10). The same rule was enacted in the case of a freeborn Bavarian woman marrying a serf of the Church ("de popularibus legibus," c. 9).

Among the specially religious restrictions which were sought to be placed on the marriage contract in the early ages of the Church, the one which would first claim our attention is that on the marriage of Christians with Gentiles, or eventually also with Jews and heretics. This however will not be specially treated of here. The next is that connected with the monkish profession, which must be distinguished from the early vow of virginity in the female sex, and from the institution of the Church-virgins. The vow of virginity, which for many centuries now has been considered an essential prerequisite of the monastic profession, was not so by any means in the early heroic days of monachism. St. Basil in the 4th century, after dwelling upon the profession of virginity by women, says expressly: "As to professions of men, we know nothing of them, except that if any have joined themselves to the monastic order, they appear, without word spoken, to have thereby adopted celibacy" (2nd Can. Ep. c. 19). In the 5th century however, Pope Leo the Great treats the marriage of monks as a punishable offence, but not apparently as void in itself. Writing to Rusticus, bishop of Narbonne, about A.D. 458 or 459, he places on the same footing the entering by monks into the militia (a term probably equivalent at this time to the service of the state, whether military or civil) and their marriage. These who, leaving the monastic profession, turn to the militia or to marriage, are to purge themselves by the satisfaction of public penance; for although the militia may be innocent and marriage honourable, to have abandoned the better choice is a transgression (Ep. 167, c. 14). The contemporary Council of Chalcedon, A.D. 451, in like manner excommunicated alike the monk and the virgin devoted to God who enter into marriage, but allows the local bishop to shew indulgence (c. 10). And the ecclesiastical validity of a monk's marriage at the beginning of the 6th century is implied in the 21st canon of the 2nd Council of Orleans, A.D. 511, which enacts that a monk who marries shall be incapable of holding any ecclesiastical office. Later still in the East (A.D. 535), the 6th Novel only forbids marriage to monks who have received the clerical ordination, reducing them to the rank of private persons (c. 8). In the West, however, the 2nd Council of Tours, A.D. 567, not only distinctly prohibited the marriage of monks under penalty of excommunication, but invoked the aid of "the judge" to separate them from their wives, under penalty of excommunication for himself if he refused it (c. 15); an evident attempt to enforce by spiritual terrors what the state still refused to erect into law.

This is indeed the period when monks, at first mere laymen, were beginning to be viewed, in the West at least, as partaking of the clerical character. The Council of Arles in 554 had decreed that monasteries both of men and women should be subjected to episcopal jurisdiction. So far as this view prevailed (for we must not forget that the monks themselves long struggled against it), the prohibition of the marriage of monks will have been considered as implied in that of the marriage of clerics generally, though such marriages are sometimes specifically referred to. Towards the end of the century, the 6th General Council, the 3rd of Constantinople, in Nulla, A.D. 682, enacted that a monk who should marry was to be punished as a fornicator (c. 44). In the West, in the first part of the 8th century, Gregory the 2nd, A.D. 714-750, in his letter to Bishop Boniface, going further than any of his predecessors, would not allow those who as children have been shut up by their parents in monasteries after puberty to leave such monasteries and marry (Ep. 13, c. 7). The marriage of monks was again condemned by Pope Zacharias, A.D. 741-51, in his 7th letter, addressed to Pepin as mayor of the palace (c. 26). About the same period the canons "de remediis peccatorum" of Egbert, archbishop of York, place the monk on the same footing as to marriage with the priest or deacon; requiring one of such who takes a wife to be "deposed" in consentia populi; i. e. apparently, with the full knowledge of the people (c. 7). It may be added that the Council of Constantinople in 814 in like manner excommunicated a monk who should marry, and required him against his will to be clothed in the monastic robe and shut up in the monastery (c. 35). All such prohibitions indeed bear witness to the existence of the practices which they denounce; and indeed a letter of Pope Hadrian II. (A.D. 772-85) to Charlemagne contains a complaint against the marriage of monks—apparently in Lombardy—and asks the emperor to punish them.

It is somewhat difficult for a long time to distinguish in reference to this subject, so far as women are concerned, the woman under vow of virginity or celibacy (as to whom see DEVOTA), and the nun (see heading NUN). In France, a general constitution of King Clothar I. A.D. 560, forbids (c. 8) all persons to marry "sanctimonialis." Another of King Clothar II. A.D. 614, forbids any even "by our precept" to marry religious girls and widows, or nuns who have vowed themselves to God, as well those who dwell in their own houses as those who are placed in monasteries. That such marriages, however occurred in Italy still, is apparent from a letter of Pope Gregory I. the Great (A.D. 590-603) to Bishop Julianus (bk. iii. ep. 24). Distinguishing between "velled virgins" and nuns, he says that as respects women who have gone from monasteries to lay life and married, "Those who have exceeded against such women" (i. e. their husbands), "and are now suspended from communion, if penitent, may be readmitted." It is difficult in many instances to define how far the meaning of the terms "sacrae" or "sacrae virgines" is to be extended or restricted. By the 8th century, indeed, the church-virgin and the private devota seem for all practical purposes to have merged in the nun. Indeed the Excerpta of Egbert, archbishop of York, treat a private vow of celibacy by man or woman as "foolish and impossible," and its breach by marriage as only to be punished by three winters' fasting (bk. ii. c. 19). The 1st Council of Rome in 721, "against illicit marriages," expressly anathematizes one who marries "monacham quam Dei ancillam appellamus" (c. 3). The before-quoted Excerpta of Egbert contain the like anathema, using the expression "monilem, quae Dei sponsa vocatur" (bk. ii. c. 18); the parties are to be separated, and condemned to perpetual penance. Among the "answers" of Pope Stephen II. from Bierry to "various consultations" (A.D. 754) is one, that it is "not lawful for a virgin who has consecrated herself to God, likewise for a monk, to marry;" either is to be excommunicated; but the bishop "may shew humanity and mercy" (c. 7). The Synod of Metz, in 753, in "marriages with a woman consecrated to God" incests (c. 1); as does also the Council of Aachen (i. e. Chelsea), A.D. 787, using the term "sanctimonialis" (c. 15). See also similar prohibitions against the marriage of nuns by the Bavarian Council of Dingelfind, A.D. 772 (c. 4); and by the Council of Friuli, A.D. 791 (c. 11), which requires girls and widows who have vowed virginity or continence, and have been "emanipated to God," if afterwards they marry, to be subjected "by secular judgment to fit bodily chastisement" before undergoing their spiritual punishment.

The prohibition against the marriage of monks and religious women by degrees found its way into the civil law of several of the barbarian kingdoms besides France. Among the laws of King Luitprand of Lombardy, A.D. 721, or later, we find one of this kind as to women, in which their position when they have assumed the religious habit is assimilated to that of girls betrothed under the civil law, whose marriage entails a penalty of 500 solidi (bk. v. c. 1). In the Visigothic code, a law of Recarede inflicts "on incestuous marriages and adulteries, or on sacred virgins and widows and penitents defiled with lay vesture or marriage" the penalties of exile, separation, and forfeiture of property (bk. iii. t. v. c. 2).

By the time of the Carolingians, the civil and ecclesia Pepin's riage w marring of the C the sam

quoted, voted to or profes a true be separ without him, th (Comp.
In the E the 8th
of Const compelle
We sh to do so contract perly so so far as rslid, al laymen v indeed th
the Coun no cleric wife, unl under pap the Chur latter ins the clerg to marri law. The teuch sur priest was woms, o only (Lev indeed, th who had high-prie marriage Hebraica, requiring one wife" of being for existin
have been one again on this lat is laid dow the husban such wife tions. E.
c. 2, requir band of on or to have faithful wi constitution monogamis either a lay as a trans dered me widow, or sith;" alth the priest's striction is Roman law clude from have marrie ns to marry "sanctimong Clothar II, A.D. 614, ur precept" to marry ows, or nuns who have God, as well those who ouses as those who are

That such marriages Italy still, is apparent Gregory I. the Great on Januarius (bk. iii. ep. etween "veiled virgins."

as respects women who erries to lay life and mare exceeded against such usbands), "and are now on, if penitent, may be icault in many instances to ing of the terms "sacrae"

" is to be extended or th century, indeed, the private deota seem for ave merged in the nunof Egbert, archbishop of of celibacy by man or ossible," and its breach to be punished or three
c. 19). The 1st Council against illicit marriages," is one who marries "moillium appellamus" (c. 3). cerpta of Egbert con-na, using the expression ponsa vocatur" (bk. ii. ars to be separated, and al penance. Among the then II. from Bierzy to A.D. 754) is one, that a virgin who has conse-likewise for a monk, excommunicated; but the nancy and mercy" (c. 7).

753, is "marriages ted to C. 13. incests alk. Arch

, using the term "sancti-e also similar prohibitions of nuns by the Bavarian A.D. 772 (c. 4); and by A.D. 791 (c. 11), which ows who have vowed virand have been "emanciwards they marry, to be r judgment to fit bodily ndergoing their spiritual nt the marriage of monks by degrees found its way several of the barbarian ene. Among the laws of mbardy, A.D. 721, or later, nd as to women, in which they have assumed the related to that of girls beivil law, whose marriage 00 solidi (bk. v. c. 1). In a law of Recarede inflicts ages and adulteries, or on ows and penitents defiled the penalties of forfeiture of property (bk.

Carlovingians, the civil and

CONTRACT OF MARRIAGE

ecclesiastical law almost wholly co.esc. King Pepin's capitulary of Soissons in 744 forbids marriage with holy women together with incestuous marriages and bigamy (c. 9). In the 6th book of the Capitularies we find one (c. 411) almost in the same terms with the law of Recarede above quoted, declaring that marriage with a virgin devoted to God, a person under the religious habit, or professing the continence of widowhood, is not a true marriage, and requiring the parties to be separated by either the priest or the judge, without even any accusation being lodged with him, the penalty being still perpetual exile.
(Comp. also Capit. 414, 424, bk. vii. c. 338.) In the East, on the contrary, about the end of the 8th century, it is noted as one of the features of Constantine Copronymus' tyranny, that he compelled monks to marry.

We shall now deal, though we do not propose to do so at full length in this place, with the contract of marriage as respects the clergy properly so called. It need hardly be observed that, so far as such contract might be recognized as valid, all the restraints upon it in the case of laymen would apply also to clerics. Sometimes indeed these had to be specifically enacted. Thus the Council of Chalcedon, A.D. 451, provided that no cleric should take a heretic, Jew, or pagan, to wife, unless he should promise to convert her, under pain of canonical punishment (c. 14). But the Church had also restraints of its own in the later instance. We have said that, as respects the clergy, the practice of the Church in respect to marriage was mainly founded on the Jewish law. The marriage of priests was by the Penta-teuch surrounded with peculiar restrictions. The priest was not to marry a harlot or "profane" woman, or one divorced, or a widow, but a virgin only (Lev. xxi. 7, 13, 14). [According to Selden, indeed, the prohibition to take a widow or person who had lost her virginity only applied to the high-priest; but he was also held debarred from marriage with proselytes or freedwomen; Uxor Hebraica, bk. i. c. 7.] The Pastoral Epistles, in requiring bishops or deacons to be "husbands of one wife" (1 Tim. iii. 2, 12; Tit. i. 6), instead of being considered as substituting a new rule for existing Jewish prescriptions, seem only to have been viewed as adding to these a further one against DIGAMY. What will have to be said on this latter head need not here be anticipated.
As a rule, however, we may say that wherever it is laid down that the bishop or deacon shall be the husband of one wife, it is also provided that such wife shall answer to the Levitical prescriptions. E. g. The Apostolical Constitutions, bk. ii.
c. 2, require the bishop not only to be the husband of one woman once married, but to have, or to have had, a "respectable (σεμνη) and faithful wife"; in the 6th bk. c. 17 (a later constitution), both requires all the clergy to be monogamists, and forbids them all to marry either a harlot (the term seems rather too strong as a translation of the Greek ετραπα, albeit rendered meretricis in the Latin versions), a slave, a widow, or a divorced woman, "as the law also saith"; although the Pentateuch does not forbid the priest's marriage with a slave, and the restriction is one evidently borrowed from the Roman law. Lastly, the Apostolical Canons exclude from admission to the clergy those who have married "a widow, or divorced person, or

CONTRACT OF MARRIAGE 457

harlot, or slave, or one of those on the stage" (c. 14, otherwise reckoned 17 or 18); this last restriction being also adopted from the Roman law, as has been shewn already.

In respect of the marriage of the clergy indeed, the restraint which occupies most space in the church legislation of the period which occupies us is that on digamons or quasi-digamons marriages, which will be considered under the head of DIGAMY. Meanwhile however there was growing up a feeling against all marriage of the clergy, whilst in orders, tending to their absolute celibacy, the history of which has been treated or under that head. [See CELIBACY.] The notices which occur of other restraints upon clerical marriages are comparatively few and unimportant.

The "Sanctions and Decrees" attributed to the Nicene fathers—which, though extant in Latin, seem evidently to embody Greek practice, though no doubt of a much later date than the one ascribed to them—require, with something of a plethora of words, the priest not to be one who has married a slave-girl, an adulteress or immodest woman (c. 14). The Council of Tarragona, A. D. 516, requires readers and ostiani who wish to marry or live with adulterous women either to withdraw or to be held excluded from the clergy (c. 9). A letter of Gregory the Great (A. D. 590-603) to John, bishop of Palermo, implies the invalidity of a deacon's marriage with a woman who did not come to him a virgin (bk. xi. ep. 62).
An alleged canon of the same Pope forbids the ordination, amongst others, of one who had married a harlot (c. 4). Yet the 4th Council of Toledo, A. D. 633, seems to imply that such marriages might be legalized by episcopal permission, since it excommunicates those clerks who, "without consulting their bishop, have married a widow, a divorced woman, or a harlot" (c. 44). And an "allocation of the priests to the people on unlawful marriages," appended to the records of the Council of Leptines in 743, provides that a future priest is not to marry a divorced woman, harlot, or widow.

To pass now from the ecclesiastical to the civil law, it must be observed that by the time of Justinian the Roman law professes only to follow the "sacred canons" as respects the marriage of the clergy, and gives force of law to the prohibitions contained in them. The children of clerics by women "to whom they cannot be united according to sacerdotal censures" are declared incapable of inheriting or receiving donations from their fathers (Code, bk. i. 7, iii. l. 45; A. D. 530). The 6th novel requires the bishop to be either a chaste unmarried man, or the husband of a woman who came to him a virgin, "not a widow, nor divorced, nor a concubine" (the last term apparently corresponding to the ετραπα of the Apost. Constitutions, and indicating a milder interpretation than that of the Latin translators); but requires the bishop not to live with his wife, and without inquiring into the position of those who have been already long married, forbids in future the episcopal ordination of married men. Taken in conjunction with this enactment, the 123rd novel may be considered as finally establishing as a rule of civil law that principle of episcopal celibacy, which still obtains in the Greek church. The same rules are substantially applied to the rest of the clergy (c. v.). The 123rd Novel forbids the ordaining of a bishop who either does not live chastely, or has not had a "wife, his only and first, neither a widow, nor divorced from her husband, nor otherwise forbidden by the laws or the sacred canons" (c. 1). Other clerics may be ordained having a legitimate wife of the same description (c. xiii). And the reader contracting a second marriage, or marrying any other than such a wife as above described, was not to rise to any higher office (c. xiv). It hardly appears, however, that up to this period the contract of marriage itself was made void if entered into against the prohibitions of the law; unless the declaring their children bastards (sparii) may be taken to imply this (Code, bk. i. 7; iii. l. 45). Among the barbarian codes, the only one which appears to prohibit clerical marriage is that of the Visigoths, drawn up under clerical influence. A law of Recarede forbids the marriage or adultery of a priest, deacon, or sub-deacon, with a "widow vowed to God, a penitent, or any secular virgin or woman," under pain of separation and punishment according to the canon, the woman to receive 100 lashes (bk. ii. 7; iv. c. 18). Nor is it amiss to remark that in spite of various attempts by councils to enforce the absolute celibacy of the clergy, the validity of clerical marriage is recognized by the civil law under Charlemagne himself. In a capitulary, "De regulis clericorum" (bk. vii. c. 652), it is enacted that clerics "should also endeavour to preserve perpetually the chastity of an unpolluted body, or certainly to be united in the bond of a single marriage."

If we have now to say a few words on the subject of the contract of marriage in the sense in which the expression is still used in France ("contrat de mariage" = marriage settlement), of the written evidence of the contract itself as between the parties.

The marriage contract among the Romans was habitually certified in writing on waxen tablets, termed nuptiales tabulae, which, however, might also be used after marriage; e. g., on the birth of a child. The tabulae were signed both by the parties and by witnesses (Tac. Ann. bk. vi. c. 27; Juv. Sat. ii. v. 119; ix. vv. 75, 76), and the breaking of them was held to be at least a symbol of the dissolution of marriage, if it had not the actual effect of dissolving it; see Tacitus as to the bigamous marriage between Messalina and Silius (Ann. bk. xi. c. 30; and Juv. u. s.). Under the Code however, by a constitution of the Emperor Probus, the drawing up of such tabulae was enacted not to be necessary to establish the validity of the marriage, or the father's potestas over his offspring (bk. v. t. iv. l. 9). They were perhaps not necessarily, though usually, identical with the "dotal tablets" (tabulae dotalis), "dotal instruments" (instrumenta dotalia), or "dotal documents" (documenta dotalia), specifically so-called (the expressions nupti instrumenta, dotalia instrumenta, seem to be used quite synonymously in the 70th Novel), but must have been comprised with them at least under the general terms instrumenta or documenta; as to which it is provided, by a constitution of Diocletian and Maximin (Code, bk. v. 7; iv. 7, iv. l. 13), that where there is no marriage, "instruments" made to prove marriage are invalid, but that where there are none, a marriage lawfully contracted is not void; nor could the want of signature to such by the father invalidate his consent (b. l. 2; law of Severus and Antonine). Nuptial instruments were by Justinian made necessary in the case of the marriage of scenicae or stage-players (l. 29). Under the 74th novel, indeed, all persons exercising honourable offices, businesses and professions, short of the highest functions in the state, were required, if they wished to marry without nuptial instruments, to appear in some "house of prayer and declare their intentions before the defensor Ecclesiae," who in the presence of three or four of the clerks of the church was to draw up an attestation of the marriage, with names and dates, and this was then to be subscribed by the parties, the defensor Ecclesiae and the three others, or as many more as the parties wished, and if not required by them, to be laid up, so signed, by the defensor in the archives of the church, i. e. where the holy vases were kept; and without this the parties were not held to have come together nuptiis affectu.

But this was only necessary where there was no document fixing a dos or agricultural donation; nor was it required as to agriculturists, persons of mean condition, or common soldiers. It will be obvious that we have in the above the original of our marriage certificates. (See further DOWNY, MARRIAGE.) [J. M. L.]

CONVERSI. One of the many designations of monks. Just as, through a popular feeling of reverence for asceticism, the word "religio" came in the 3rd and 4th centuries to mean not Christianity but the life monastic, so "conversi," though applied also to those who embraced Christianity, or who took upon themselves any special obligations, as of celibacy or of ordination (De Cange, s. v.), was ordinarily restricted to monks (Bened. Reg. c. 1; Fructuosi Rep. c. 13; Greg. M. Dial. ii. 18; Salv. Evcl. Cathol. iv.; Isidore De Conversis, of Bened. Anon. Conc. Reg. iii.). But the "conversi" were properly those who became monks as adults, not those who were trained in a monastery from their tender years (Conc. Aurel. i. c. 2). About the 11th century, according to Mabillon, "conversi" came to mean the lay brothers, the "oblats" or "donati," the "frères convers," who from piety or for gain, or, probably, most often from mixed motives, attached themselves to monasteries, as "associates" (to use a modern phrase) and attended to the business of the monastery outside its wall. (Mab. Ann. iii. 8; Martene ad S. Bened. Reg. c. 3; Mab. Act. SS. O. S. B. Saec. iii. l. 21). The "Conversi Barbatii" are classed with monks rather than with the laity (Petr. Ven. Statut. 24). [I. G. S.]

COPE. (Cappa or Cupa; Fr. Chape.) From being used as an out-door dress for defence against rain, the cope was also called Picula, whence It. Piciale; and from the cowl or hood with which it was furnished it was known as Cuculla. Such, probably, was the "cuculla villosa" spoken of by St. Benedict in his Regula (Migne, Patrol. lxxvi. 777). "Vestimenta fratribus secundum locorum qualitatem . . . dentur. Mediocribus locis sufficere credimus monachis per singulos cucullam et tunicam; cucullam in hieme villosam, in aestate puram aut vetustam, et scapulare propter operam . . . Sufficit monacho duas tunicas et duas cucullas habere, propter soetes et propt (890) says e

Regula of St.
cil. "Cucull cimus cupam demarus, writ and speaking Monte Cassino
indumentum, deitur, nos cu ments originall than for orna of slate or by enrichments fr gard of the ma particularly th were fastened have been the ve may infer 800 A.D., with concerned, the cloak, open in neck. For full of ecclesiastica Reck, *Church
Testarian Cur
in roc.*

COPIATAE

In the Theodosian Code these business and profits for dead. The city—cathedral de others from xally, it is ref they have son Another name f diggers—and i mentioned as l or bier at funer Theodosian Cod orders, e.g. lib. Leg. I, "Cleric appellatur," & The foundation Constantine, bef tering the dead which every Chr as occasion requ first constituted in the city of Co mo, and from their rise in oth their place, howe certain privilege not have been a important Churc to such by the (p. l. 2; law of public instruments necessary in the case of age-players (l. 29), all persons exercising businesses and professional functions in the wished to marry to appear in some are their intentions who in the pre- works of the church a of the marriage, is was then to be a defensor Ecclesie many more as the required by them, to a defensor in the r, where the holy out this the parties together spirituali necessary where in dos or anti- required as to agri- condition, or common that we have in the marriage certificates. AGE.) [J. M. L.]

The office of whole care of fur see that all perso interment. Espe form this last of charge to their certain lands we nance; but in oth that they were s own funds of th own labour and ragement were ge custom or tribu Martigny).

many designations a popular feeling of the word "religio" turies to mean not astic, so "conversi," ose who embraced on themselves any tary or of ordinate narily restricted to cunctis Reg. c. 13, r. Eccl. Cath. iv.; d. Anian. Conc. Reg. were properly those r, not those who were a their tender years at the 11th century, "ress" came to mean "i" or "donati," the a piety or for gain, rom mixed motives, asteries, as "associ- (nase) and attended to ery outside its wall. and S. Bened. Reg. c. ace. III. i. 21). The classed with monks (Petr. Ven. Statut. [L. G. S.]

; Fr. Châpce). From r dress for defence also called Pluralis, om the cowl or hood in it was known as the "cuculla vil- edict in his Regis " Vestimenta fratrit- litatum . . . dentur. credimus monachis unquam aut vetustum, . . . Sufficit monacho allas habere, propter noctes et propter lavare ipsas res." So Smaragdus (1820) says expressly in his Commentary on the Regula of St. Benedict, apud Migne, Patrol. cil. "Cucullam dicit ille quod nos modo dicimus cappam." And to the same effect Theodemarus, writing from Italy to Charlemagne, and speaking of the dress worn by the monks of Monte Cassino (Ducange, in voc. Capa): "Illum indumentum, quod a Gallis monachis cuculla dicitur, nos capam vocamus." Like other garments originally designed for practical use rather than for ornament, the copes worn on occasions of state or by the higher clergy received greater enrichments from time to time, whether in regard of the materials or of accessory ornaments, particularly the "morse," or clasp by which they were fastened in front. From what we know to have been the shape of the cope in all later times we may infer that in the earlier period, up to 800 A.D., with which we are here primarily concerned, the cappa was shaped like a modern cloak, open in front, and attached only at the back. For full details concerning the later copes of ecclesiastical use, see Bock, Lit. Gew. ii. 287; Beck, Church of our Int. ers. ii. 23; Marriott, Vestiarium Christianum, p. 224; Pugin, Glossary, in roc. [W. B. M.]

COPIATAE. The name given by Constantine to the Theodosian Code, to certain Church officers whose business it was to take care of funerals and provide for the decent interment of the dead. The etymology of the name is doubtful—Gothofred derives it from κοπάειν to rest—others from κομῆρες, mourning; more generally, it is referred to κόπος, labour; whence they have sometimes been called laborantes. Another name for them is FOSSARI, or grave-diggers—and in Justinian's novels, they are mentioned as lecticarii—as carrying the corpse or bier at funerals. They are reckoned in the Theodosian Code among the inferior clerical orders, ep. lib. 13. tit. 1. de Lu-trali Collat. Leg. 1. "Clericos excipit tantum, qui Copiatæ appellantur," &c.

The foundation of this Order is attributed to Constantine, before whose time the care of interring the dead was only a charitable office, for which every Christian made himself responsible as occasion required. The order of Copiatæ, as first constituted by the emperor for this service in the city of Constantinople amounted to 1100 men, and from this example they probably took their rise in other populous cities. In Constantinople, however, they formed a collegium, with certain privileges and exemptions, which may not have been extended to the order in the less important Churches.

The office of the Copiatæ was to take the whole care of funerals upon themselves, and to see that all persons had a decent and honourable interment. Especially they were obliged to perform this last office to the poorer sort, without charge to their relations. At Constantinople certain lands were set apart for their maintenance; but in other Churches it is more probable that they were supported partly out of the common funds of the Church, and partly by their own labour and traffic, which for their encouragement were generally exempted from paying custom or tribute (Bingham, B. iii. c. 8; Riddle; Marigny). [D. B.]

COQUS, in the monastery. [HEBDOMADARIUS.]

CORBONA ECCLESIAE. [ALMS.]

CORDOVA, COUNCIL OF, A.D. 348, under Hosius, to accept the determinations of the Council of Sardica (Labb. Conc. ii. 98). [A. W. H.]

CORN, ALLOWANCE OF. This particular provision for the maintenance of the clergy deserves a special notice, from its connection with the early stages of the recognition of Christianity by the empire. Constantine, in his zeal for his new creed, ordered the magistrates of each province to supply an annual allowance of corn (ἐρῆσια σιτηρέσια), not only to the clergy, but to the widows and virgins of the Church (Theodoret, i. 11). When Julian succeeded, he transferred the grant to the ministers of the heathen cultus which he revived (Sozom. v. 5; Philostorg. vii. 4). Jovian restored it, but on the lower scale of one-third of the amount fixed under Constantine. The payment continued, and was declared permanent by Justinian (Cod. i. tit. ii. de SS. Eccles.). [E. H. P.]

CORN, EARS OF. Corn is not so often used in early Christian art as might be supposed. [LOAVES.] The thoughts of early iconographers seem to have gone always to the Bread of Life with sacramental allusion, as Bottari, tav. cxliiii., vol. vi. et alibi. In Bottari, vol. i. tav. xlviii., the corn and reaper are represented in a compartment of a vault in the cemetery of Pontianus. Agair, in vol. ii. tav. lv., the harvest corn is offered to the vine and cornucopia of fruit (Callixtine catacomb).

The more evidently religious use of the ears of corn is in various representations of the Fall of Man. On the sarcophagus of Junius Bassus (supp. A.D. 358), Bottari, vol. i. tav. xv., Adam and Eve are carved; the former bearing the corn, in token of his labour on the earth, and the latter a lamb, indicating woman's work spinning. The connection of this with Jack Cade's proverbial line, "When Adam delved and Eve span," seems probable. See again vol. ii. tav. lxxxix. Martigny gives a copy (s. v. "Dieu,") of a bas-relief in Bottari, vol. iii. tav. xxxvii., from the cemetery of St. Agnes, where two human forms, apparently both male, are standing before a sitting figure, whom Martigny supposes to represent the First Person of the Trinity. It may represent the offering of Cain and Abel; at all events the corn-ears and lamb are either being received or presented by the standing figures. See also Bottari, tav. lxxxix. lxxxvii. lxxxix. As these figures are of no more than mature (sometimes youthful) appearance, the Second Person may be supposed to be intended by them.

[R. St. J. T.]

CORNELIUS. (1) The centurion, bishop of Caesarea, is commemorated Feb. 2 (Mart. Rom. Vet. Usuardi); Dec. 10 (Cal. Armen.).

(2) Pope, martyr at Rome under Decius, Sept. 14 (Mart. Bedae, Rom. Vet., Usuardi). [C.]

CORNU. [ALTAR.]

CORONA, martyr in Syria, with VICTOR, under Antoninus, May 14 (Mart. Hieron., Bedae, Rom. Vet., Usuardi). [C.]

CORONA. [TONSURE.]

CORONA LUCIS. A lamp or chandelier. In the early ages of Christianity it was by no means unusual for sovereigns and other royal personages, following an instinct of natural piety of which we have examples in prae Christian times (cf. Pliny, Hist. Nat. xvi. c. 4) to dedicate their crowns to the use of the Church. The gifts thus devoted were known as Donaria, and were suspended by chains attached to their upper rim, above an altar or shrine, or in some conspicuous part of the church. Other chains were attached to the lower rim, supporting a lamp, from which usually depended a jewelled cross. The crowned cross thus suspended above the altar was felt to be an appropriate symbol of the triumph of Christianity, and its use became almost universal. We have several allusions to it in the writings of St. Paulinus of Nola in the fifth century, c. f.

"Crown corona lucido cingit globo."

Ep. 32 ad Severum.

"Parva corona subest vultus circumdata gemmis, Hæc quæque crux Domini tanquam diademate cincta Eulicat."

Nat. xi. v. 679 sq.

"In cruce consertiam socla compage coronati." Ib. v. 692.

Beda (de Locis Sanctis, cap. 2) in his description of Calvary, specifies a large silver cross hanging above the Holy Grave, with a brass circlet and lamps "aenea rota cum lampadibus" attached to it. In this manner the crowns of Theodelinda, queen of the Lombards, and of her second husband Agilulf, at the beginning of the 7th century, were dedicated to St. John the Baptist in the cathedral of Monza, as stated in the inscription borne by the latter before its destruction, and there is little reasonable doubt that the celebrated iron crown of Lombardy, preserved in the same cathedral, was at one time employed for the same purpose (Frisi, Memor. della Chiesa Monzese, Dissert. ii. p. 67; Pacciandi, de Cult. Joann. Bapt. Dissert. vi. cap. 10, p. 266). At a much earlier period, according to Constantine Porphyrogenitus and Nicetas, Constantine the Great had dedicated his crown to the service of the Church. In the time of these writers, a crown of remarkable beauty "præ cæteris et operis elegantia, et lapillorum pretio conspicua" (Ducange, Constantinop. Christ. iii. § 43), hanging with others above the Holy Table, was pointed out as having been offered to God by the first Christian emperor.* With one of these votive crowns, the lamp and chains being removed, in the time of Const. Porphy., the new emperor of the East received his inauguration (Ducange, Const. nt. Christ. u. s.). According to the not very trustworthy catalogue preserved in Anastasius (S. Silest. xxxiv. § 36) the Lateran basilica and that of St. Peter's were also enriched by Constantine with large chandeliers of pure gold. Clovis also, at the suggestion of St. Remigius early in the 6th century, sent to St. Peter's "coronam auream cum gemmis, quæ Regnum appellari solet" (Hincmar, Vit. S. Remig.; Anastas. S. Hormisd. liv. § 85). The very remarkable series of crowns discovered near Toledo (see below, CROWNS) were, as the inscriptions borne by some of them testify, a solemn offering to some Spanish church, at the hands of the king and queen and royal family. No lamps were attached to them when they were discovered, but these appendages, as encumbrances of small value, may have been removed when the regalia were buried to conceal them from the Saracen spoiler.

* Tradition ventured to assert that he had received it by the hands of an angel as a present from Heaven.

This custom for sovereigns to dedicate their actual crowns to the Church's use led to the construction of imitative crowns, formed for votive purposes alone. Of this usage we find repeated notices in the Liber Pontificalis, which bears the name of Anastasius Bibliothecarius; as well as in ancient chronicles and documents. They are usually described as having been suspended over the altar, and very frequently mention is made of jewelled crosses appended to them. Small votive crowns of this nature are seen suspended over the altar in several ancient representations. One compartment of the celebrated pelleto of the church of Sant' Ambrogio of Milan, which depicts the trance of St. Ambrose in which he celebrated mass at Tours, represents one such jewelled crown hanging over the altar at which Penello Crown from the "Pelleto," S. C. Ambrogio, Milan.

Penello Crown from Bas-relief, Cathedral of Monza.

the saint is officiating (Ferrario, Memorie di Sant' Ambrogio). A bas-relief, now in the S. transept of Monza cathedral, representing a coronation, exhibits several crowns suspended over the altar. Another bas-relief in the tympanum of the west portal of the same cathedral, on which are carved the church, pended, and crown. Ma similar repræsentate at Ro Among th are Nuovo upper tier of the conch appears hing suspended cr

held by the
the mosaic f.

The conven crowns for th ties to the cu liers after the luminaries th circle was pr larger proport of light-beari partedly in A rites. Beside corona, the p aries was ind which is of Leo III, xviii gemmis pretio
... regnum e super altare toreis, sculpti ream habente quinque in end pendent aover
Many of thes are described dolphins (Anas ronas quatuor ronam auream
43; St. Zachar § 348; St. Leo decorated with see in the relief teurs-de-lis (G ronas cum del lilies;" Anast rem argentum of Orléans, in his C a corona exequ Desiderius: "H alter crown we circumference. lamps hung fr suspended from Other names known in early the hands of the king-ly. No lamps were they were discovered, ncombrances of spial oven when the regalia em from the Saracen gns to dedicate their h's use led to the con-

Pensive Crown from the "Palatio," St. Ambrogio, Milan.

seen suspended over cent representations. celebrated palatio of Ambrosio in which he s, represents one such ver the altar at which ...relief, Cathedral of Monza.

(Ferrario, Memorie di relief, now in the S. tran-), representing a coron- owns suspended over the ief in the tympanum of same cathedral, as which are carved the various gifts of Theodelinda to the church, shows us four crowns, three suspended, and the fourth being the celebrated Iron crown. Macer in his Herolexicon refers to a similar representation in the church of San Clemente at Rome, to the left of the entrance.

Among the mosaic decorations of Sant' Apollinare Nuovo at Ravenna, we find above the upper tier of windows a succession of pictures of the conchs of apses, in each of which a crown appears hanging by chains over the altar. These suspended crowns are exactly similar to those held by the female saints as votive offerings in the mosaic frieze below.

Mosaic, St. Apollinare Nuovo, Ravenna.

The convenience of the form of these donative crowns for the suspension of lamps doubtless gave rise to the custom of constructing large chandeliers after the same model. In these pensive luminaries the shape and chrncter of the royal circle was preserved, but frequently in much larger proportions. Notices of the presentation of light-bearing circles of this nature occur repeatedly in Anastasius and other ancient authorities. Besides the more ordinary name of corona, the primary royal origin of these luminaries was indicated by the designation regnum, which is of constant occurrence (cf. Anast. Leo III. xviii. § 393, "fecit regnum aureum cum gemmis pretiosissimis;" Leo IV. cv. § 540, "fecit . . . regnum ex auro purissimo unum pendens super altare majus, cum catenulis similiter aureis, sculptilem habens in medio crucem auream habentem gemmas quatuordecim, ex quibus quinque in eadem cruce fixos, et alias qua illudem pendente novem").

Many of these coronae mentioned by Anastasius are described as having been adorned with dolphins (Anast. S. Silvester xxiv. § 36, "coronae quatuor cum delphinis;" ib. § 38, "coronam auream cum delphinis quinquaginta," § 43; St. Zachar. xciii. § 219; St. Adrian. xviii. § 348; St. Leo. lv. cv. § 531). Others were decorated with diminutive towers, and (as we see in the relief in the transept of Monza) with fleur-de-lis (Greg. M. Ep. lib. i. ep. 66, "Coronae cum delphinis duo, et de aliis coronis illius;" Anast. St. Hilar. xviii. § 70, "turrem argenteam cum delphinis.") Leo, cardinal of Ostia, in his Chronicon Cassinense thus describes a corona executed for that lover of art the abbot Desiderius: "He had a pharus mnde, that is a silver crown weighing 100 lbs. and 20 spans in circumference. On it were 12 towers, and 36 lamps hung from it." Bells were also sometimes suspended from the lower rim.

Other names by which these chandeliers were known in early writers are Pharus, Pharocantha- rus, Spanoclystum = ἐπανωλειστόν, Gabbatha, and Ruba.

The name Pharus, though sometimes, as we have seen, used for a corona, was more properly a standing candelabrum supporting lamps or candles, which from their number of spreading branches were, according to DuCange, sometimes called arbores, trees. Pliny, Hist. Nat. lib. xxiv. c. 3, speaks of "lychnuchi—arborum modo multa ferentium lucentes," and Paulus Silentiarius (Descript. S. Soph. part 2) thus describes candelabra in that basilica—κείνα γὰρ ἢ κηροῦσιν ἑστραφεῖσσιεν ὀμοία δένδρεα τῆς καλλίστης.

The most magnificent example of an ancient corona, though long after our date, is that still to be seen suspended in the cathedral at Aix-la-Chapelle, over the crypt in which the body of Charlemagne was deposited. This corona was the offering of the emperor Frederick Barbarossa, by whom the tomb was opened in 1165. A very valuable treatise on this corona, embracing full details of the form, arrangements, and history of coronae generally, has been published by Dr. Fr. Boek (Der Kronleuchter Kaisers Friedr. Barbarossa zu Aachen, Leipzig, Weigel, 1864). The Atelages d'Archéologie of Cahier and Ma tin, Par. 1853, vol. iii. may be referred to, article Couonne de lumière, for representations of suspensory crowns from MSS, and painted glass. See also Ciampini, vol. ii. c. xii. p. 89 sq. Migne, Encyclopédie Théol. Diocésaine d'Orléans, v. Coronnes. Justi Fontanini Dissertation de Corona Ferrea (Rom. 1719, pp. 91-97). Macer, Herolexicon.

CORONATI DIES. [FESTIVAL.]

CORONATI QUATUOR (LEGEND AND FESTIVAL OF). The above title is given to four martyrs, Severus, Severinus, Carpophorus, and Victorinus, who suffered martyrdom at Rome in the reign of Diocletian. The tradition respecting them is to the effect that they refused to sacrifice to idols, and were then at the command of the emperor benten to death before the statue of Aesculapius with scourges loaded with lead (ictibus plumbatarum). The bodies lying lain where they died for five days, were then deposited by pious Christians in a sandpit on the Via Laviniana, three miles from the city, near the bodies of five who had suffered martyrdom on the same day two years before, Claudius, Nicostratus, Symphonianus,* Castorius, and Simplicius. See, e.g. the Martyrology of Ado, November 8 (Patrol. cxliii. 392), who gives the legend more fully than others.

It is stated by Anastasius Bibliothecarius (Vitae Pontificum, Honorius; Patrol. cxxviii. 619) that Pope Honorius I.^b (ob. 638 A.D.) built a church in Rome in their honour ("eodem tempore fecit ecclesiam beatorum martyrum iv. Cor., quam et delatavit et donum obtulit"). To this church the remains of the martyrs were subsequently transferred by Pope Leo IV. (ob. 855 A.D.), who had been its officiating priest (op. cit., Leo IV., b. 1305), and who, finding it in a very ruinous condition on his accession to the pontificate, restored it with much splendour, and bestowed upon it many gifts (ib. 1315). This church was situated on the ridge of the Coelian hill, between the Coliseum and the Lateran; and on its site the present church of the Santi Quattro Coronati was built by Pope Paschal II.

* In the case of this name considerable diversity of spelling exists:—Symphonianus, Greg. acc.; Simphonianus. Cl. Rhem.; Simphorianus, Cl. Baldui and Radradi; Sympronius, Mart. Hieron.; Symprouianus, Cuaridus; and Sympronianus, Ado.

^b Before this time, however, the Coronati Quatuor had given their name to one of the tituli of the city of Rome; for in the subscription to sundry decrees of Gregory the Great the last signature is "Forjanianus [pseudonym] tituli SS. iv. Cor." (Gregorii Decreta; Patrol. lxxvii. 1319; formerly Exp. lib. iv. Indict. 13. c. 44.) See also Derange, Glossarium, s. v. titulus.

As to the appointment of the festival of these martyrs on November 8, which is said to be due to Pope Melchisedes (ob. 314 A.D.), a curious difficulty has arisen. Thus in the notice of the festival in the editions of the Gregorian Sacramentary (for the words would appear to be wanting in MS. authority), the remark is made that it being found impossible to ascertain the natal day of the four martyrs ("quorum dies natalis per incuriam neglectus minime reperiri poterat"), it was appointed that in their church the natal day of the five other saints, near to whose bodies theirs had been buried, should be celebrated, that both might have their memory recorded together (Patrol. lxxviii. 147).

Others, however, make this forgetfulness to be of the names of the martyrs. Thus the Martyrologium Romanum, after speaking of Claudius, &c., proceeds: "Et ipso die iv. Coronatorum Severi, Severiani, Carpophori, Victorini, quorum festivitate statuit Melchisedes papa sub nominibus quinque martyrum celebrari, quia nomina eorum non reperiebantur, sed intercurrentibus annis eisdem sancto viro revelata sunt" (Patrol. cxxiii. 173). See also the Martyrology of Usuardus (ib. cxxiv. 669).

If however the institution of the festival be rightly assigned to Melchisedes, who was pontiff during the reign of Diocletian, it is strange how this ignorance could have existed, seeing that many Christians must have been living who had known them personally. In Alcuin (De Dir. Off. 31; Patrol. ci. 2230) this strange idea assumes still another form, in that the forgetfulness now includes both the day and the names: ("quorum nomina et dies natalis per incuriam neglectus." The look of the Latin however points strongly to the conclusion that the words nomina et are a later addition).

No trace however of this forgetfulness is to be found in the Martyrologium Hieronymi, where the notice is merely "vi. Id. Nov. Romae natalis Sanctorum Simplicii . . . et Sanctorum Quatuor Coronatorum Severi . . ." (Patrol. xxx. 481).

A difficulty of another sort is that Anastasius Bibliothecarius (l. c.) seems to distinguish the Coronati Quatuor from Severus, &c.; for after describing how Leo IV. restored their church at Rome, he adds "et ad laudem Dei eorum sacratissima corpora cum Claudio . . . , necnon Severo . . . quatuor fratribus collocavit." Doubtless however the last words are spurious. It will be observed also that Anastasius speaks of the Coronati as brothers, the only ancient authority, so far as we have observed, who does so.

Another curious point is that, in the Martyrology of Netker for July 7, the five saints, whom we have seen associated with the Coronati Quatuor, seem to be commemorated on that day:

"Romae, passio beatorum martyrum Nicostrati primicerii, Claudii commentariensis, Castorilive Castuli, Victorini, Symphoriani vel sicut in libro Sacramentorum continetur Semproniani; quorum natalem sexta die Iduum Novembris eatenus nos celebrari credidimus, donec venerabilis pater Abo alios et alios pro eis nobis honorandos insinnavit: de quibus in suo loco vita comite commodius disseretur" (Patrol. cxxi. 1115). We cannot tell however how this last promise was redeemed, for the Martyrology of Netker is wanting after Oct. 26. The Martyrology of Usuardus also connects with July 7 the names of the five above-mentioned saints (Patrol. cxxiv. 233, where see the note).

In the Martyrology of Rabanus Maurus all notice for Nov. 7 and 8 is wanting. In that of Wandelbert (Patrol. cxxi. 617), Nov. 8 is thus marked:—

"Sensus ornantes tunc merito atque cruce, Claudii Castori Simplicii Symphoriani, Et Nicostrate part fulgicis luce coracae;"

(id. Semproniane), where it will be seen that there is no allusion to the Coronati themselves, unless indeed there be an implied reference in the last word of the third line.

In the Martyrology of Bede the Coronati are mentioned, but under the names of the five saints; thus, "vi. Id. Nov. natale iv. Coronatorum, Claudi, N. Symphoriani, Castoris, Simplicii" (Patrol. xciv. 1087).

We find the festival marked in the Leonine Calendar, "v. (vel vi.) Id. Nov. natale SS. iv. Coronatorum" (ib. lxxiv. 880); and the former day (Nov. 7) in the calendar of Buerchius (ib. 879) as "Clementis, Semproniani, Claudii, Nicostrati, in comitatum." We find the names again varied in the Gelasian Sacramentary (ib. 1179), which cites four of the names of the five saints: "In natal. SS. iv. Coronatorum, Costiani, Claudii, Castori, Semproniani."

We have already referred to the presence of this festival in the Gregorian Sacramentary; see also the Antiphony (Patrol. lxxviii. 707). The collect in the Sacramentary runs thus: "Praesta quesumus omnipotens Deus ut qui gloriosos martyres Claudium, Nicostratum . . . fortes in sua confessione cognovimus, piis apud te in nostra intercessione sentiamus;" where it will be noticed that only the names of the five saints, and not of the Coronati, are given.

The Mozarabic Missal mentions the festival (Patrol. lxxxv. 898); but has no special office for it, employing for this day as well as for others a missa plurimorum martyrum. This would appear to point to the fact of the festival being a late addition to the Missal.

It may be added that several ancient calendars mark Nov. 8 as the festival of the four Coronati; but except the first, which is English, they are all Italian (Patrol. lxxii. 624, lxxx. 420, ci. 826, cxxxviii. 1188, 1192, 1202, 1208, &c.). Doubtless therefore the festival is to be viewed as essentially one of the Italian church, and as one which never gained any special notoriety beyond the bounds of that church. There are Acts of the Coronati Quatuor, not apparently of any special value, which were published in Mombritius' Sacuarium, vol. i. ff. 162, sqq.

In addition to authorities cited in this article, special reference should be made to Ménard's note (in loc.).

CORONA and emperor Christian nat of the manne new spirit in elevated ther Under her i old form: h off; fresh an veloped; und character in those who we

It has been morits of W coronation, a the period to represents t monarchy. I usage of the election, and Guard, derive and Teutonic tion of the ne with holy oil didom on his of religion, a Jewish Church

These two mailed in the and it will b rately.

(1) Among custom prev
on whom the large shield men of the tr posed to the who by their his accession, reign and he round throug usually three describes this chief of the
"impositus sc humeris vibra
The German se duced this cus the inter emp Thus Gordian up" as emp
"retractans, e pelari permissi dian, lib. viii.
death of Const forced him at imperial dignit the same cere et subitatus s (Ann. Marcell περὶ τῶν Ἀρῶν ἁγία (Zosim) was desired to αὐτῶν τῶν ἀνα storg. viii. 8), adds, ὡς ἔθος, inauguration of A.D. 393, refers

*See mox c ertrum Nhostrati arlensta, Casteo rian vel sicut in ur Senpennant alium Novembris

 Nones, donec veneris pro eis nobis eribus in suo loco eribus" (Patrol, however how this of the Martyrology ct. 26. The Marnants with July 7
 -mentioned saluta
 the note).
 banus Maurus is ating. in that of ), Nov. 8 is thus que enone,

 -horlane, ce coronae"

will be seen that coronati themselves, epial reference in
 b. y the Coronati are us of the five saints; coronato, Cl. X., cil" (Patrol. xiv.

in the Leonie
 v. natale SS. iv. Co-and the former day Bucherius (ib. 579) Claudii, Nicostri, names again varied y (ib. 1739), which are the five saints: "In Costiani, Claudii,

to the presence of in Sacramentary; Patrol. lxxviii. 707). entary runs thus:
 potens Deus ut qui , Nicostратum . . .
 gnominus, pios apud ntianus;" where it he names of the five sti, are given.
 -otions the festival as no special office as well as for others
 -um. This would of the festival being a ancient extenlars of the four Coronati, is English; they are 4, lxxx. 420, ci. 828, 1208, &c.). Doubt-is to be viewed as n church, and as one ical notivity beyond There are Acts of the rently in Monbritia' sqq.

ities cited in this should be made to

CORONATION

Menard's notes to the Gregorian Sacramentary (in loc.) [l. 8.]

CORONATION. The Coronation of kings and emperors, the most august ceremony of Christian national life, affords a striking example of the manner in which Christianity breathed a new spirit into already existing ceremonies, and elevated them to a higher and purer atmosphere. Under her inspiration a new life animated the old form: heathen necessities gradually dropt off; fresh and appropriate observances were developed; and the whole ceremonial assumed a character in harmony with the changed faith of those who were its subjects.

It has been remarked by Dean Stanley (Memorials of West. Abbey, p. 42) that the rite of coronation, as it appears in the later part of the period to which our investigation is limited, represents two opposite aspects of European monarchy. It was (1) a symbol of the ancient usage of the choice of the leaders by popular election, and of the emperor by the Imperial Guard, derived from the practice of the Gaulish and Teutonic nations, and (2) a solemn consecration of the new sovereign to his office by unction with holy oil, and the placing of a crown or diadem on his head by one of the chief ministers of religion, after the example of the ancient Jewish Church.

These two parts of the ceremonial, though united in the same ritual, have a different origin, and it will be convenient to treat them separately.

(1) Among the Teutonic and Gothic tribes the custom prevailed of elevating the chief or king on whom the popular election had fallen on a large shield or buckler, borne by the leading men of the tribe. Standing on this he was exposed to the view of the soldiers and people, who by their acclamations testified their joy at his accession, and accepted him as their sovereign and head. The "chairing," or carrying round through the assembled crowd, "gyratio," usually three times repeated, followed. Tacitus describes this ceremonial in the case of Brinno, chief of the Batavian tribe of Canninefates "impositus scuto, more gentis, et sustinentium humeris vibratus, dux deligitur" (Hist. iv. 15). The German soldiers of the Imperial Guard introduced this custom to the Romans, and we find the later emperors inaugurated in this manner. Thus Gordian the younger A.D. 238 was "lifted up" as emperor by the Praetorian Guards: "retractans, elevatus est et imperatorem se appellari permisit" (Capitolianus in Gordian; Herodian, lib. viii. c. 21). Julian, when before the death of Constantine the enthusiasm of his troops forced him at Paris unwillingly to assume the imperial dignity (April A.D. 360), submitted to the same ceremonial, "impositus scuto pedestri et sublatius emineus Augustus renuntiatur" (Ann. Marcell. lib. xx. c. 4); ἐπι τινοσ ἀσπίδος μετὰ τοσ ἀρσενεσ ἀρεσιόν τε Σεβαστόν Ἀυτοκράτορα (Zosimus, lib. iii. 9. 4). Valentinian was desired to name a colleague A.D. 364, κατ' ἀρχήν τήν ἀναγορεύειν ἐπὶ τῆσ ἀσπίδοσ (Philostorg. viii. 8), to which Nicephorus significantly adds, ὡσ ἔθος. The poet Claudian, writing of the inauguration of the young Honorius as Augustus A.D. 393, refers to the same custom—

"Sed mox cum solita miles to voce levasset,"

CORONATION

So completely was this custom identified with the inauguration of a sovereign that the verb ἐπαίρειν came into use as the regular term for the recognition of a new emperor. Thus we find Euseb. Epitome temp. of Marcan A.D. 450, αὐτῶ τῶ ἐπὶ ἐπήρθη Μαρκανδὸσ Ἀβγουστος, and of Maximus A.D. 455 (cf. Suidas s. v. voce ἐπαίρειν). Zonaras, writing of Hypatius set up by a sedition as a rival to Justinian, says ἐπὶ ἀσπίδοσ μετὰ τοσ ἄρσενεσ ἀναγορεύουσι βασιλέα (Zonar. xiv. 6). It took its place as a recognised portion of the ritual of a coronation in the Eastern Empire; e.g. the coronation of Justin the younger in St. Sophia's as described by Corippus, de Laudibus Justin! Augusti Minoris (lib. ii. 137-178). A shield was held up by four young men. On this the emperor stood erect, like the letter I, with which his name and that of his two immediate predecessors commenced.

"Quatuor ingentem elype sublimibus orbem Attollunt lecti juvenes, nonimbuque levatus, Ipse ministrorum supra stetit, at sua reclusis Littora, quae signis stabili non fecit unquam Nominibus sacra tribus."

We also find it in the elaborate rituals drawn up by Joannes Cantacuzenus (c. 1330; Hist. i. c. 41, printed by Martene ii. 204; and Habertus Pontific. Graec. p. 604 sq.) and Georgius Codinus, Cypriotes (d. 1460; de Officio et Officialibus Aulac Constantin. c. 17). The only change is that the emperor no longer stands on the slippery surface of the buckler, but adopts the much securer position of sitting, "sessitans." The risk of a dangerous and indecorous fall during the ceremony of "gyratio," is proved by the example of Gunbald, king of Burgundy (A.D. 500), who on his third circuit "cum tertio gyraent" fell, and was with difficulty held up by the people (Grego. Turonens. Hist. lib. vii. c. 10). According to George Codinus, who may be taken as a probable evidence of the ritual prevailing several centuries before his time in the unchanging East, this "levatio" took place outside the Church of St. Sophia, into which the new emperor was borne to receive the sacred rites of unction and crowning at the hands of the patriarch. It was the rule that the shield should be supported in front by the emperor (when the choice of a successor was made in his lifetime), the father of the newly created monarch if alive, and the patriarch, the other highest dignitaries of the State supporting it behind.

The origin of this custom being Teutonic, it was naturally continued by the sovereigns of the Frankish race. The long-haired Pharamond was thus inaugurated A.D. 420: "levaverunt super se regem crinitum" (Gesta Regum Francorum apud Dom. Bouquet, ii. 543). Clovis received his recognition as king by the same token, "clipeo impositum super se Regem constitutum" A.D. 509 (Gregor. Taron. lib. ii. c. 40). Sigebert, son of Clotaire I. A.D. 575, when "more gentis, impositus clipeo rex constitutus" (Adonis Chronica; Gregor. Tur. Hist. Fron. iv. c. 52), was stabled by the nssnsins of Queen Fredegonde. A century later, A.D. 744, we read of Hildebrand, grandson of Luitprand king of the Lombards, "in regem levaverunt" (Paulus Diaconus, vi. 55), of Pippin (A.D. 751 "rex elevatus est" Ann. d. Gualf. &c.). And to close the series, Otto "sublimatus est" at Milan A.D. 961. [Cf. Grimm, Rechts-Alterthümer, p. 234.]

The ceremonial is depicted in an illumination of the 10th century engraved by Montfaucon (Monumens, tom. I. p. xvi.) representing the proclamation of David as king. He stands on a round shield borne aloft by four young men.

From a passage in Constant. Porphy. (de Administrat. Imper. c. 38) this custom appears to have prevailed among the Turks. It is not found in the early Spanish annals, but it was certainly in use in the kingdom of Arragon at a later period (Ambros. Morales, lib. xiii. c. 11), and traces of it are found in that of Castile, in Legibus Pa. titarum, leg. iii. tit. xxii. part. iii. There is no evidence of its ever having been adopted in England.

Among the Frankish and Lombard nations an additional ceremony was the delivery of a spear to the newly-made monarch. We find this in the case of Hildebrand A. D. 744 (Paul. Diacon. vi. 55); Childeric A. D. 456 (Chiffetius in Anastas. civil. p. 98); Childelbert II. A. D. 585 (Greg. Turon. vii. 33; Aimoinus, ii. 69). Martene (de Rit. ii. 212) writes of the Frankish kings "tradita in manum hasta pro sceptro, excelsa in solio honorifice imponunt."

(2) The second aspect in which a coronation was viewed was the religious one. As soon as the Bible became known, the practice of the Jewish nation to consecrate their kings to their high office by the hands of the chief minister of religion became an authority from which there was no appeal. Of the two ceremonies specially characterizing the Jewish rite, anointment and the imposition of a crown, the former alone was strange to the Western nations. From a very early period, as we shall see, the crown or diadem was known as the symbol of royalty. The only change was that of the person by whose hands it was placed on the monarch's head. Urvton appears to have been entirely unknown as a part of the ritual, and to have come into use with the conversion of the emperors to the Christian faith.

(a) To speak first of the imposition of the crown or diadem. For the sake of clearness, while referring to dictionaries of classical antiquities for fuller details, it may be desirable to remind our readers that the crown, corona, στέφανος, was a head circlet, wreath, or garland of leaves, flowers, twigs, grass, &c., and, as luxury increased, of the precious metals, chiefly gold; while the diadem, διάδημα, "tænia" or "inscia" (Q. Curtius, iii. 3), as its name implies, was originally nothing more than a linen band or silken ribbon, tied round the temples, with the loose ends hanging down behind. This ribbon Eastern magnificence afterwards adorned with pearls and precious stones. The nature of the diadem may be illustrated from some historical facts. Thus Alexander took off his diadem to bind up the wound of Lysimachus (Justin, lib. xv. c. 9). Pompey's enemies made it a charge against him that he had bound up an ulcer on his leg with a white cloth like a diadem, it mattering not on what part of the body the royal insignia was placed Diadem, from Clamplis.

Diadem, from Clamplis.

* Discours préliminaire, de l'inauguration des premiers rois de France."

(Amm. Marcell. xvii.). Monima, the wife of Mithridates, attempted to hang herself with her diadem (Plutarch, Lucullus, c. 18).

Though the words corona and diadema have not infrequently been used interchangeably, the distinction between them is very precise. "However" (writes Selden, Titles of Honour, c. 8, § 2), "these names have been from ancient times confounded, yet the diadem strictly was a very different thing from what a crown now is or was; and it was no other than than only a fillet of silk, linen, or some such thing. Nor appears it that any other kind of crown was used for a royal ensign, except only in some kingdoms of Asia, but this kind of fillet, until the beginning of Christianity in the Roman empire." The "diadema," not the "corona" was the emblem and sign of royalty. It is styled by Lucian Βασιλευς γυρῶσιμα Piv. 35; cf. Xenoph. Cy. op. viii. 3. 13); and καπερθενα διάδημα is of frequent use to indicate the assumption of royal dignity (Polyb. v. 57. 4; Josephus, Ant. xii. 10. 1); as in Latin "diadema" is identified by Tacitus with the "insigne regium" (Annal. xv. 29). The diadem was of Eastern origin, and was introduced to the Romans through their Oriental campaigns and intercourse with Asiatic nations. When first seen at Rome it caused great offence. Though they submitted to the reality of sovereign power, their susceptible minds could not endure its outward symbols. The golden "corona" had raised no alarm. Caligula and Domitian wore it at the public games without objection, and it appears on their coins. Augustus, Claudius, Trajan, and many others are represented with rayed or "stellate" crowns, imitating the majesty of the sun. Julius Caesar, rightly interpreting public opinion, refused the tempting offer of a laurel wreath (διάδημα στεφάνος δάφνης περιστελεγμένον) and had it laid up in the Capitol (Plutarch, J. Cæs. 61; Sueton. i. § 79). Caligula when about to assume the diadem was warned by friendly counsellors of the danger of thus exceeding "principum et regum fastigium" (Sueton. iv. c. 22). Titus provoked suspicion of affecting the throne of the East by wearing the diadem, though according to the established ritual, when consecrating the Apis ox at Memphis (Sueton. xi. c. 5). The effe-

* "At ud est corona, alitid diadema. Corona simplex est circulus aureus quo utuntur reges in minoribus solemnitatibus. Diadema est quasi duplex corona quum ipsa coronae quasi alius circulus gemmis superpositus superadditur."—Peter of Bioti, Sermo, xix. vol. II. p. 11.

minate Eingab wore it in pri est domi" (L had been fami
campaign, and (Trobell, Poli. himself to th adorned with th person glitterin 270: "Iste prin laezult, gemmi alibus fere lac latur, usus est
The diadem onc and became a r nity; but it see state occasions.
it as a portion orans perpetuo citi), and his
As soon as the it astrally fol sovereignty shou and receive the religion, who spe agent in setting office by the cer crown, and at a l from the rites of the crown was power of giving those the emper had been suffici emperor at Paris raised on the sh who forcibly put willing head: ε ροελη) (Zosim.
stances of this co their picturesque dem at hand, the use his wife's be a woman's ora dignity. Still m the horse's head hat one of his gold torque from was crowned (Am crown "vills cor a more ambitious
"ambitioso diade distincto" (Amm.
10). His success king, crowned an the army who ch yha edus kal r iii. 30); Theodor Valentinian A. D. cumbatus et coro (Amm. Marc. xv society his son c pire, he invested h (Amm. Marcell. xv is there any refer religion as perform due; nor can we this custom arose, tom that we meet Gustus before his imperial dignity, Melitius, bishop of crown and the roya
CHRIST, ANT.

misate Elagabalus advanced a step further and wore it in private, "diadema gemmato usus est domi" (Lampadius); and Aurelian, who had been familiar with its use in his Eastern campaign, and the attire of his captive Zenobia (Trebell. Poll. c. xxix.), first ventured to present himself to the public gaze with his temples adorned with this badge of sovereignty, and his person glittering with magnificent attire A.D. 270: "Iste primus apud Romanos diadema capiti laezult, gemmisque et aurata omni veste, quod adhuc fere incognitum Romanis moribus visetur, usus est" (Aurel. Vict. Epiton. c. xxxv.). The diadem once introduced was never dropped, and became a recognized mark of imperial dignity; but it seems to have been chiefly worn on state occasions. Constantine was the first to adopt it as a portion of his ordinary attire—"caput exornans perpetuo diademat" (Aurel. Vict. Epit. c. l.), and his successors continued the usage. As soon as the emperors had become Christian, it naturally followed that their inauguration to sovereignty should be accompanied by sacred rites, and receive the blessing of the chief minister of religion, who speedily became also the recognized agent in setting apart the sovereign to his regal office by the ceremonies of the imposition of the crown, and at a later period, ofunction, borrowed from the rites of the Jewish Church. Originally the crown was put on by those who had the power of giving it. The Imperial Guard who chose the emperor crowned him. When Julian had been suddenly chosen by his troops as their emperor at Paris (April A.D. 360), and had been raised on the shield by the soldiers, it was they who forcibly put the token of power on his unwilling head: ἐπέθεσαν οὖν βίβη τὸ διαδήμα τῇ κεφαλῇ (Zosim. Hist. lib. ii. 4). The circumstances in this coronation deserve mention from their picturesque quality. There being no real diadem at hand, the troops demanded that he should use his wife's head-ribbon. Julian refused, deeming a woman's ornament unworthy of the imperial dignity. Still more peremptorily did he reject the horse's headband they then proposed. At last one of his standard-bearers took off the gold torque from his neck, and with that Julian was crowned (Amm. Marcell. xx. 4). This mean crown "villis corona" was laid aside at Vienna for a more ambitious diadem, glittering with jewels—"ambitiosio diadematatebatur lapidum fulgore distincto" (Amm. Marcell. xxi. 1; Zonaras, xiii. 10). His successor Jovian was also proclaimed king, crowned and vested in the royal robe by the army who chose him A.D. 363, τὴν ἀουρὴν καὶ τὸν καλὸν τὸ διαδήμα περιθέμενον (Zosim. lib. 30; Theodoret, iv. 1; Theophan. p. 36); and Valentinian A.D. 364, "principali habitu circumdatus et coronatus Augustusque nuncupatus" (Amm. Marc. xxvi. 2). When Valentinian associated his son Gratian with him in the empire, he invested him with the purple and crown (Amm. Marcell. xxvii. 7). In none of these cases is there any reference to a bishop or minister of religion as performing the ceremony of coronation; nor can we say with any certainty when this custom arose. The first hint at such a custom that we meet with is in the dream of Theodosius before his admission to a share of the imperial dignity, c. 379 (?), in which he saw Melchius, bishop of Antioch, putting on him a crown and the royal robe (Theodoret, H. E. v. 6).

It has been erroneously asserted by Martene (de Ritibus, ii. 201-247, ed. Bassano 1788) and Meuard (Notes to the Sacramentary of St. Gregory, p. 397 sq.), and repeated by Catalani and many subsequent writers, including Maskell, that Theodosius II. (A.D. 439) is the first whom we know to have been crowned by a bishop. Theophanes (p. 59) informs us that Theodosius the younger sent crowns, στεφάνους βασιλικούς, to Valentinian II. at Rome, c. 383, but nothing is anywhere said of his own coronation. The passage quoted by Martene from Theodorus Lector, (lib. ii. c. 65,) but of Leo I., A.D. 457, by Amatoius the patriarch: στεφθεὶς ὑπὸ τοῦ αὐτοῦ πατριάρχου. In this case the new emperor, a rude Thracian soldier, had been a military tribune and chief steward of the household of Aspar, the Arian patrician, by whose influence he was raised to the throne. It is not improbable that episcopal benediction might be regarded as a valuable support to a feeble title, and that Leo felt a special satisfaction in having the imperial crown imposed on his brows by the head of the Byzantine hierarchy. But previous allusions to coronation at the hands of a bishop would lead us to question the accuracy of Gibbon's assertion (chap. xxxvi.) that "this appears to be the first origin of a ceremony which all the Christian princes of the world have since adopted," and it would certainly be very unsafe to assert that it was the first time that this ceremony was performed by episcopal hands. The next recorded instance of episcopal coronation is that of Justin I. This emperor was crowned twice: first by John II., patriarch of Constantinople, A.D. 518 (Theophan. Chronograph. p. 182; cf. the patriarch's letter to Pope Hormisdas, apud Baronii Annales, anno 519, no. ix.: "Ideo coronam (altior) coram gratine super eum coelitus declinavit, ut altiternum in sacrum ejus caput misericordia funderetur; omnique annuntiationis ejus tempore eum magna voce Deum omnium principem glorificaverunt quoniam talen verticem meis manibus tali corona decoravit"); and secondly, "pietatis ergo," by Pope John II. on his visit to Constantinople, A.D. 525 (Anastas. Bibliothec. p. 95, ed. Blanchini, Rom. 1718; Ammonius, lib. ii. c. 1). His successor Justinian received the diadem primarily from his uncle's hands (Zonaras lib. xiv. c. 5), in compliance with a practice subsequently prevailing in the Eastern empire, by which the symbol of royalty was originally bestowed by the emperor himself on those whom he wished to succeed him; the ceremony being probably repeated by the bishop or patriarch. Thus Verina crowned her brother Basiliscus, A.D. 474. Tiberius II. his wife Anastasia, A.D. 578 (Theophanes, Chron.). But the sanction of religion had become essential to the recognition of a new sovereign by his subjects, and Justinian was inaugurated by the imposition of the hands of the patriarch Epiphanius (Cyril. Scythopol. Vita S. Sabae Archimandritae). From this time coronation at the hands of the patriarch was an established rule. Justin II., A.D. 565, was crowned by John Scholasticus; Tiberius II. by Eutychius, Sept. 26, 578, ten days before Justin's death and by his order. His successor Maurice and his wife were crowned by John the Faster, A.D. 582, on the day of their marriage (Theophyl. Simocatta, lib. i. c. 10), and their son Theodosius, acts. Thus Alexander up the wound (c. 3). Pompey almost him that he log with a white ring not on what insignia was placed ma, the wife of M herself with her (18). diadema have not unchangedly, the dis- precise. "H of Annals, c. 8, § 2), antient times only was a very diffe- nse is or was; and a fillet of silk, linen, appears it that any for a royal ensign, is of Asia, but this ing of Christianity "diadema," not the and sign of royalty, καὶ τὸν ἄνωρον The. (3. 13); and περι- to indicate the Πολιβ. v. 57. 4; Je- in Latin "diadema" ae "inisi, ne regiam" sun was of Eastern the Romans through and intercourse with er, their susceptible toward symbols. The no alarm. Caligula public games without on their coins. Au- and many others are "stellate" crowns, sun. Julius Caesar, opinion, refused the at Antony's hands, arel wreath (διδύμα γυμνῶν) and had it aturach, J. Cæs. 61; hea about to assume friendly counsellors eding "principem et iv. c. 22). Titus pro- ge the throne of the n, though according hen consecrating the a. xi. c. 5). The effe-yema. Corona simplex est is minoribus solemp- plex corona quom ipa- antis superpositus asper- xix. vol. iii. p. 11.

when four years old (Theophan. p. 179). He, with his wife Bathia, was crowned by Sergius, Oct. 7, 610, and in the third year of his reign his son Heraclius and his daughter Euphrosina were also crowned. It is unnecessary to give later examples. In the time of Justinian's successor Justin II. the ceremonial of coronation seems to have received the form and religious sanction it maintained, on the whole, till the fall of the empire. The ritual is elaborately described by Corippus. The ceremony took place at break of day. After his elevation on the shield (see above), the emperor was carried into St. Sophia's, where he received the patriarch's benediction, and the imperial diadem was imposed by his hands. He was then recognized as emperor by acclamation first of the "patres" and then of the "clientes." Wearing his diadem he took his seat on the throne, and after making the sign of the cross he made an harangue to his assembled subjects:—

"Postquam cuncta videt ritu perfecta priorum, Pantificum summis plenaque aetate venustus, Adstantem benedixit eum, caelique potentem Exorans dominum sacro diademate iussit Augustum sancte caput, summoque coronam Imponeas apicem. Feliciter ac tunc" dixit."

Corippus de Laud. Justin. ll. 9, v. 179 sq.

With the addition of the important ceremony of unction, and a considerable elaboration of ritual, the coronation office, as given by Joannes Cantacuzenus, afterwards emperor (c. 1330), and a century later, by Georgius Codinus (d. 1453), corresponds with that described by Corippus in all essential particulars.

Of the Occidental use we know little or nothing. We may reasonably suppose that there was no essential difference between it and the Eastern ritual. But the Western empire had ceased before the earliest record of any religious ceremony accompanying the rite in the East, and when it revived in the person of the emperor Charles the Great, coronation at the hands of a bishop had long been a recognized custom among the Frankish nations. Martene (ii. 212) acknowledges that the coronation of Pippin, the father of Charles, is the earliest example he can discover. Pippin was crowned twice—first by St. Boniface, archbishop of Mentz, papal legate, at Soissons, A.D. 752; secondly, together with his sons Charles and Carloman and his wife Bertha, by Pope Stephen at St. Denis, Sunday, July 28, 754 (Pagius, Brev. Gest. Rom. Pont.). Charles the Great was also crowned episcopally more than once. In addition to his boyish coronation he was solemnly crowned in St. Peter's at Rome by Pope Leo. This coronation took place on Christmas Day, A.D. 800. It forms one of the great epochs in history, as by this the Frankish king was recognized by the Vicar of Christ as the representative of the emperors of Rome and inheritor of their rights and privileges.

The ceremony is thus described by Const. Manasses in Chron. Synops. :—

ἐν τῷ αἰεθλοῦ Κάρουλου ὁ Λέων ἀναγορεύει κρατῶν τῆς παλαιστῆρας Ῥώμης καὶ στέφανος περιπέθειν ὡς οἱ Ῥωμαίων νόμοι.

It has been repeatedly asserted that, previous to his coronation at Rome, Charles had been crowned with the so-called iron crown at Monza; but the fact is not recorded in any early authorities, and it is probably a story of later growth.

His infant son Pippin was crowned king of Italy by Adrian I. on Easter Day, 801, the day after his birth.^c

One of the very earliest instances on record of a royal coronation by an ecclesiastic in Western Europe is that of Aidan, king of Scotland, by St. Columba in Iona, A.D. 574.^d It may perhaps be reasonably questioned whether this picturesque narrative is to be received as historical. But it is accepted by some of the latest and best authorities (e.g. Montalembert and Burton); and the kernel of the story is probably authentic. According to the tale, an angel was sent to command Columba to consecrate Aidan. He reminded the saint that "he had in his hands the crystal-covered book of the Ordination of Kings;" which, be it remarked, presupposes the existence of such a ceremony. St. Columba hesitated, preferring for sovereign Aidan's brother Iogan. The angelic messenger appeared again and again, becoming more and more peremptory, until on the third visit he struck the refractory saint with a scourge, leaving a weal which remained on his side all the rest of his life. On this Columba consented, and Aidan was made king by him on the celebrated Stone of Destiny, taken afterwards from Iona to Dunstaffnage, and thence to Scone, whence it was transferred by Edward I., as a symbol of conquest, to Westminster. The words of Adamnan are simply, "in regem ordinavit impensissime manum super caput ejus ordinans benedixit." No mention is made either of the crown or unction (Adamnanus, de S. Columb. Scots Confessor, l. iii. c. 5; Montalembert, Monks of the West; T. Hill Burton, Hist. of Scotland, l. 319). Almost contemporaneous with this are the records of the same rite in Spain. Leovigild, king of the Visigoths, A.D. 572, according to Isidore, Hist. Gothorum, vii. 124, was the first of those sovereigns to assume the crown, sceptre, and royal robe: "Nam ante eum et habitus et consensus communis ut genti illi et regibus erat." Of Recared also, Leovigild's successor, A.D. 586, we read, "regno est coronatus" (ib.).

(b) Another essential portion of the coronation of a Christian monarch was unction at the hands of a bishop or other chief minister. This rite clothed the person of the king with inviolable sanctity. It was considered to partake of the nature of a sacrament (August. de Petitione, lib. ii. c. 112), and to be indelible; to convey spiritual jurisdiction, as the delivery of the crown conferred temporal power; and it gave the chief significance to the formula "Rex Dei gratia," which according to Selden (Titles of Honour, p. 92) could not from its sacred character. Thus upon unctio sacra foris unctur sicut retru" (Evangel. non mera person. iii. tit. 2). An chief and divine (the kings among inaugurated to of the Judges Jotham's parabolic king over them been in use at the Jewish people St. Augustine was a rite peculiarly never adopted by sibi ungelantur regno ubi Christus unde venturus sibi omnino in (Esarai. in Pa

^c The notion, once so widely received, that the Western emperors were crowned in three different places, with crowns of three different materials—gold at Rome denoting excellence, silver at Aix-la-Chapelle denoting purity, and iron at Monza or Milan denoting strength—is a mere myth of an editor of the Papstliche Rom-anne, discovered and culled by Aeneas Sylvius (Pope Julius II.), Hist. Aust. lib. iv., and refuted by Muratori, de Cor. For. p. 9.

^d It is stated in the introduction to the Roxburgh Club edition of the "Liber Regalis" 1871, that "the earliest coronation of a Christian prince within the limits of Great Britain and Ireland is generally supposed to be that of Dermot or Diarmid, supreme monarch of Ireland, by his relative, Columba," circa 560; but this is merely an inference from the close relation between the two parties, not an ascertained historical fact.

The earliest many of unctio in Christian ecc. of the Spanish kings in the Acts of the Wamba on his coronation by Quirico, archiepiscopus genibus orielis pontificis (Julius Toletanus) quoted by Selden. But the rite was in language used established since Toledo. Wamba's record. This is the 12th Council of Wamba's successor per sacrosanctatem" (Labbe, Con Passing by the Brit. § 21), "un- &c." as more or uncertain reference of himself, "by Saxons," in the A.D. 690, we can nation contains archbishop of York Maskell says, "ancient English in the world" (ritual, together includes the anoint. "Benedictio. Verget oleum cum antiphona 'Domine in virtutibus orationem' The 12th canon A.D. 787, "de continens a vulgari" the words, "Nec ret iudici regni nobis generatus," was crowned at legum, the language in which this i its sacred character, be applied to any other lay person. Thus Gregory the Great writes, "quia ipsa unctio sacramentum est, is qui promovetur foris ungitur si intus virtute sacramenti roboretur" (Epist. lib. i. lxxviii, c. x.). " Rex unctus non mera persona laica sed mixta" (Lyndwood, lib. iii. tit. 2). Anointing, it is well known, was the chief and divinely appointed ceremony by which the kings among the chosen people of God were inaugurated to their office. As early as the time of the Judges the idea was familiar; for in Jetham's parable the trees propose to anoint a king over them. This shews that it must have been in use among other nations with whom the Jewish people had intercourse, and that St. Augustine goes too far in asserting that it was a rite peculiar to the people of God, and was never adopted by heathen nations. "Nec in aliquo aliud ungebatur reges et sacerdotibus nisi in illo regno ubi Christus prophetabatur et ungebatur et unde venturus erat Christi nomen. Nusquam aliud omnino in nulla gente, in nullo regno" (Enchirid. in Pa. lib. § 10).

The earliest authentic instances of the ceremony of unction forming an essential element in the Spanish coronations appear in the annals of the Spanish kingdoms. The rite is mentioned in the Acts of the 6th Council of Toledo, A.D. 636. Wamba on his coronation (A.D. 673) was anointed by Quirgo, archbishop of Toledo: "Deinde curvatis genibus oleum benedictionis per sacri Quirici pontificis manus vertici ejus infunditur" (Julius Toletanus, § 4; cf. Rodericus Santius, quoted by Selden, Titles of Honour, p. 155). But the rite was evidently anterior to this. The language used evidences that the unction was an established custom, and that it took place at Toledo. Wamba's is simply the first unction on record. This is confirmed by the Acts of the 12th Council of Toledo, which state of Hervigius, Wamba's successor, A.D. 680, that he "regnandi per sacrosanctam unctionem suscepit potestatem" (Labbe, Conc. vi. 1225, canon i.).

Passing by the language of Gildas (de Excid. Brit. § 21), "ungebatur reges et non per Deum, &c.," as more oratorical than historical, and the uncertain reference to unction in Ina's designation of himself, "by God's grace, king of the West Saxons," in the opening sentence of his laws A.D. 690, we come down to the form of coronation contained in the Pontifical of Egbert, archbishop of York A.D. 732-767, of which Mr. Maskell says, "it is probably not only the most ancient English use, but the most ancient extant in the world" (Monum. Rit. iii. 74-81). The ritual, together with other ceremonies, expressly includes the anointing of the king's head with oil. "Benedictio super regem noviter electum. Sic vertet oleum cum cornu super caput ipsius cum antiphona 'unxerunt Salomonem' et Psalmo 'Domine in virtute tua.' Unus ex pontificibus dicit orationem et alii unguant."

The 12th canon of the Council of Cealcyth A.D. 787, "de ordinatione et honore regum," contains a valuable incidental mention of unction as an essential element of the kingly office, in the words, "Nec Christus Dominus esse valet nec totius regni qui ex legitimo non fuerit cubio generatus." Of Egferth, son of Offa, who was crowned at this council as his father's colleague, the language of the Anglo-Saxon Chronicle, in which this is the earliest coronation mentioned, "hallowed to king" (to cymnig gelaþad) can only be interpreted of unction, and so William of Malmesbury has understood it, "in regem unctum." Eardwulf, king of Northumberland, is recorded to have been consecrated (gheblest) and elevated to his throne (to his cinstole ahojen) by Archbishop Einbold and three bishops (Anglo-Sax. Chron. A. D. 795). And finally of Alfred, the same chronicle says, A.D. 874, that when Pope Leo IV. heard of the death of Ethelwulf he consecrated him king (bletsode Alfred to cinre). The rhyming Chronicle of Robert of Gloucester, quoted by Selden (Titles of Honour, p. 150), in describing this coronation uses the remarkable phrase "he oiled (elcde) him to be king;"—

"Erst he adde at Rome ybe, and vor is gret wisdomo The pope Leon him blesede, tho he thuder come,
And the king is crowne of this lond, yt in this lond yt is."

And ciede him to be king, ere he were king yt is,
And he was king of Englonde, of all that there come That verst thus yclede was of the Pope of Rome.
And suthe othe after his deth, the arch-bisshop echon, So that biore him thur' as the non."

From England the custom of unction seems to have passed into France, where Pippin's anointing by Boniface, archbishop of Mentz, at Soissons A.D. 752, is acknowledged by Martene (de Rit. Eccl. ii. 212; cf. Selden, u. s. p. 113) to have been the first regal unction the testimony for which is worthy of credit.* According to Chiffletius, p. 30 (apud Maskell u. s.), the rite was more than once repeated: "Pippinus omnium Francie regum primus, imitatus Judaeorum reges, ut se sacra unctione venerabiliorum augustioremq; faceret, semel atque iterum ungi voluit." This second unction is probably that mentioned by Baronius, July 28, A.D. 754, when Pippin received anointing from Stephen II. together with his sons Charles and Charlemann.

The custom of unction was firmly established in the West by the close of the 8th century. When Charles the Great was crowned in Rome by Leo I. he was anointed with oil from head to foot;—

και μὴν ἀλλὰ χρυσόμενος και νόμοις Ἰουδαίων, ἐκ κεφαλῆς μέχρι ποδῶν ἔλαιον τούτων χρίει.
Const. MANASS. in Chron. Synops.

The East followed the West in the adoption of unction. It has been carried back to the time of Justin and Justinian, i. e. to the middle of the 6th century (Onuphrius, de Comit. Imp. erator. c. 2); but Goar (Enchiridion, p. 928) affirms that "the emperors of the East were not anointed before that Charles the Great was crowned in the West" (cf. Selden, u. s. p. 140).

In the earliest ritual anointing on the head alone sufficed. That of the whole person, adopted in the case of Charles the Great, was quite exceptional. The unction is thus limited in the Pontifical of Egbert. In the Greek ritual, given by Codinus, the head was anointed in the shape of the cross (σταυροειδῶς). The mediæval English rite is peculiar in anointing the head, breast, and arms, denoting glory, sanctity, and strength. The kings of France were anointed in nine places—the head, breast, between the shoulders, the shoulders themselves, the arms, and the hands. But this was a later development of the rite. The head alone was anointed in three places, the right ear, the forehead round to the left ear, and the crown of the head, when Charles the Bald was crowned by Ilincmar, A.D. 809 (Hincmar, Opera, i. 745).

* The ridiculous fable of the sancta ampulla, conveyed from heaven by an angel with oil for the coronation rites of Clovis, A.D. 481, was not heard of till four hundred years after the date of the supposed event, and then in connexion with his baptism and confirmation. (Hincmar, Vita S. Rem. ap. Surium, Jan. 13.)

(c) The delivery of the sceptre and staff, which appears in the English ritual of the Pontificale of Egbert, is evidently derived from the custom prevailing among the Lombards, Franks, and other early nations, to which we have already referred, of delivering a spear to the newly elected sovereign.

(d) The profession of faith, which in later times formed part of the ritual of an imperial coronation, preceding the episcopal benediction, is not mentioned in the more ancient authorities. The instances given by Martene (de Rituibus) in proof of its early date are quite inconclusive. Jovian's declaration of Christian faith on his election as emperor by the soldiers of his army, was evidently entirely voluntary (Theodoret, H. E. iv. 1). The demand made of Anastasius (A.D. 491) by the patriarch of Constantinople, Euphemius, that as the price of the episcopal sanction to his election to the imperial dignity, he would sign a document declaring his adhesion to the orthodox faith, was quite exceptional (Evagr. H. E. iii. 32; Theod. Lect. iii.), while the profession of orthodoxy required by Cyriac of Phocas A.D. 602, and unhesitatingly given by that base and sanguinary usurper to purchase the patriarch's recognition, can scarcely be pressed into a precedent. In the Gothic kingdom of Spain an oath that he would defend the Catholic faith, and preserve the realm from the contamination of Jewish unbelievers, was very early exacted of the sovereign. Such a pledge is declared essential in the Acts of the 6th Council of Toledo, A.D. 636 (act iii. Labbé, Concil. v. p. 1743), and in the later councils held at the same place. It is expressly declared of Wamba A.D. 673 that before the ceremony of anointment and after the assumption of the royal attire, "regio jam cultu conspicuus ante altare divinum consistens ex more fidem populis reddidit" (Jul. Tolet. § 4). The oath of King Egic is given in the Acts of the 15th Council of Toledo A.D. 688. No such oath or profession of faith appears in the form of coronation in the Pontificale of Egbert. We are unable to state when it was introduced into the ritual of the Eastern empire. But according to Georgius Codinus (cap. xvii. §§ 1-7), the newly recognized emperor had to give a written profession of faith before his coronation, to be publicly read in St. Sophia's.

(e) Leontius (Vita Sancti Joan. Alex. Episc. c. 17) mentions a remarkable custom prevailing in the coronations of the Eastern empire in the 6th century as an admonition of the transitoriness of all earthly greatness. After his coronation the architects of the imperial monuments approached the emperor and presented specimens of four or five marbles of different colours, with the inquiry which he would choose for the construction of his own monument. The analogous ceremony described by Peter Damianus (Litt. lib. l. 17), though belonging to a later period, may be mentioned here. The emperor having taken his seat on his throne, with his diadem on his head and his sceptre in his hand, and his nobles standing around, was approached by a man carrying a box full of dead men's bones and dust in one hand, and in the other a wisp of flax which—as in the papal enthronization—was lighted and burnt before his eyes.

(f) This article may be fittingly closed by an epitome of the ritual prescribed in the Pontificale of Egbert, A.D. 732-737, already repeatedly referred to as the earliest extant form of coronation.

The title of this coronation service is "Missa pro regibus in die Benedictionis ejus." It commences with the Antiphon "Justus es Domine, &c." (Ps. cxl. 1:17), and the Psalm "Beati immaculati (Ps. cxl. 1). Then succeeds a Lesson from Leviticus, "Hæc dicit Dominus" (Lev. xvi. 6-9); the gradual, "Salvum sic, &c.," and the verse, "Auribus percipe" and "Alleluia," the Psalm "Magnus Dominus" (Ps. xviii.), or "Domine in virtute" (Ps. xxi.), and a sequence from St. Matthew, "In illo tempore" (Matt. xxii. 15). Then follows the "Benedi. in super regem noviter electum," and three collects, "Te invocamus Domine sancte," "Deus qui populus tuus" (both of which are found in the Liber Regalis), and "In diebus ejus oriatur omnibus æquitas." The unction follows, according to the form already given. After the collect, "Deus electorum fortitudo," succeeds the delivery of the sceptre. The rubric is, "Hic omnes pontifices cum principibus dant ei sceptrum in manu." Fifteen Proces follow. After this there is the delivery of the staff ("Hic datur ei baculum in manu sua"), with the prayer, "Omnipotens dei tibi Deus de rege orati," &c., and imposition of the crown (the rubric is, "Hic omnes pontifices sumant galero et ponant super caput ipsius"), with the prayer, "Benedic Domine fortitudinem regis principis, &c." This is succeeded by the recognition of the people, and the kiss. The rubric runs, "Et dicit omnis populus tribus vicibus cum episcopis et presbyteris Vivat rex N. in sempiternum. Tune confirmabitur cum benedictione omnis populus" (Leofric Missal, "omni populo in solio regni") "et osculandum principem in sempiternum dicit, Amen, Amen, Amen." The seventh "oratio" is said over the king, and the mass follows, with appropriate Offertory, Preface, &c. The whole terminates with the three royal precepts, to preserve the peace of the Church, to restrain all rapacity and injustice, and to maintain justice and mercy in all judicial proceedings.

Authorities.—Maskell, Monumenta Rituala Ecclesie Anglicanæ, iii. 1-142. Martene, De Antiqua Ecclesie Rituibus, ii. 201-237. Seiden, Titles of Honour, part i. ch. vii. Habertus, Pontific. Græc. pp. 627 sq. Catalani, Comment. in Pontific. Roman. i. 369-418. Meunier, Traité du Sacre et Couronnement des Rois et Reines de France. Goar, Litologium, pp. 924-930. Ménard, Notes to Sacramentary of Gregory, p. 387. Arthur Taylor, Glory of Royalty. Montfaucon, Monumens de l'Histoire de France, tom. i. p. xvi. sq. Discours préliminaire de l'inauguration des premiers Rois de France. Codinus Curpalatia, De Officiis et Officialibus Curie et Ecclesie Constantinopolitane, c. xvii. Grimm, Lechtsalte thürer, p. 234 sq.

Palla Dom. wants are c

It is prob from the r the Lord's with a clot of time, th table was ments were called a C 105, ed. M († 335) dec should be c

the Lord's crees of poi under a gco what later 123) lays d attributed

(Expositio that the cor reason as th ties, on I ad do De Dis-ips

rhems to t which the finest and any other n main on th must either shut up del kept delicate must first b a vessel kept or subleuco

The corpo vered the w according to quired the s refold it. S necessary, in large to ada

of communi allow a por the elements it ceased to cate, and the form, the c separate clot chalice (lan

This was of Many church Cathusians, the corpora informed by 57, 60, 200 175 ff.)

For the co ASTIMSICU

punishment allowed by

"Eye for ey foot for foot wound, strip was also allo
his slave to feed he smoo erford, may be men-owing taken his seat on his head and his nobles standing y a man carrying ones and dust in one p of flax which—as —was lighted and

ittingly closed by an used in the Liturgical already repeatedly tant form of coronon service is "Miss onis ejus." It com-

 "Justus es Domine, e Psalm "Beati imen succedet a Lesson ult Dominus" (Lec. saluum fic, &c.) and pe" and "Alleluia," us" (Ps. xlviii), or xxi.), and a sequentempore" (Matt. xvii. ended. In super regem e collects. "Te invo-us qui populus tuus" n the Liber Regalis, r omnibus sequitur.
 ding to the form al-
 "Deus electarum delivery of the sceptre. pontifices cum princimanu." Fifteen Proces the delivery of the staff manu sua"), with the crown Deus de rore coeli." ubi (the rubric is, ant galereum et ponat the prayer, "Beneprincipis, &c." This gnition of the people.
 runs, "Et dicat omnis n episcopis et presbytiterum. Tunc conomnis populus" (Lein solo regni") "et sempiternum dict.
 se seventh "oratio" is he mass follows, with ejaice, &c. The whole e royal precepts, to e Church, to restrain and to maintain justice proceedings.

Monumenta Rituali
 1-142. Martene, De i, ii. 201-237. Selden, i. ch. vii. Habertus,
 q. Catalani, Comment.
 9-418. Mehin, Traité des Rois et Reines de um, pp. 924-930. Mé-
 of Gregory, p. 397.
Regality. Montfaucon, France, tom. i. p. xvi. 49.
Finis jurisdictionis prelatius Cur-palata, De ne et Berlesine Constanti-mm, Fechtsalt thüner,

CORPORAL

CORPORAL. (Corporale, Pallia Corporalis, Pallia Domini). The cloth on which the elements are consecrated in the Eucharist.

It is probable from the nature of the case that from the most ancient times the table on which the Lord's Supper was celebrated was covered with a cloth. [See ALTAR-CLOTHS.] In process of time, the cloth which ordinarily covered the table was itself covered, when the sacred elements were to be consecrated, by another cloth called a Corporal. The Liber Pontificalis (p. 105, ed. Muratori) asserts that Pope Sylvester († 335) decreed that the sacrifice of the altar should be consecrated not on silk or on any kind of dyed cloth, but only on pure white linen, as the Lord's Body was buried in linen. The decrees of popes of that age lie, as is well known, under a good deal of suspicion; but at a somewhat later date Isidore of Pelusium (Epist. i. 123) lays down precisely the same rule as that attributed to Sylvester. Germanus of Paris (Expositio Brevis, p. 93, Migne) also lays down that the corporal must be of linen, for the same reason as that alleged by the preceding authorities, and adds that it should be woven throughout, like the seamless coat of the Lord. Bregino (De Disp. Eccl. c. 118) quotes a council of Rheims to the following effect. The corporal on which the immolation is made must be of the finest and purest linen, without admixture of any other material whatever. It must not remain on the altar except in time of mass, but must either be placed in the sacramentary or shut up with the chalice and paten in a place kept delicately clean. When it is washed, it must first be rinsed in the church itself, and in a vessel kept for the purpose by a priest, deacon, or subdeacon.

The corporal appears anciently to have covered the whole surface of the altar. Hence, according to the Ordo Romanus II. c. 9, it required the services of two deacons to spread and refold it. So the Ordo Rom. I. c. 11. It was necessary, in fact, that it should be sufficiently large to admit of the bread for a great number of communicants being placed upon it, and to allow a portion to be turned up so as to cover the elements. But when, about the 11th century, it ceased to be usual for the people to communicate, and the bread came to be made in the wafer form, the corporal was made smaller, and a separate cloth or covering was placed over the chalice (Innocent III. De Myst. Miss. c. ii. 56). This was often stiffened with rich material. Many churches, however, especially those of the Cistercians, retained the more ancient use of the corporal even in modern times, as we are informed by De Maulon in his Iter Liturg. pp. 57, 60, 200, 208. (Krazer, De Liturgis, pp. 175 ff.)

For the corporals of the Eastern Church, see ASTIMENSUM. [C.]

CORPORAL PUNISHMENT. Corporal punishment in almost every form was evidently allowed by the lex talionis of the Pentateuch: "eye for eye, tooth for tooth, hand for hand, foot for foot, burning for burning, wound for wound, stripe for stripe" (Exod. xxi. 24, 25). It was also allowed to be used by the master upon his slave to an almost unlimited extent; if indeed he smote his servant or his maid with a rod, and they died under his hand, he was to be punished, but not if they "continued a day or two" (ib. 20, 21); the slave, however, obtaining his freedom if his master blinded him of an eye, or knocked a tooth out (vv. 26, 27). The judicial bastinado (i. e. for a freeman) was not to exceed 40 stripes, lest "thy brother should seem vile unto thee" (Deut. xxv. 3). That the use of personal chastisement remained prevalent, is evident from the whole of the Old Testament, and especially from the Book of Proverbs; though it is somewhat difficult to see by whose hand the "rod" or "stripes" which Solomon so zealously eulogises as the due reward of fools could well be applied. Not less zealously, it is well known, does he inculcate the use of them for the instruction of children.

CORPORAL PUNISHMENT 469

It seems hardly necessary to point out how much milder is the tone of the New Testament in these respects. Fathers were not to "provoke their children to wrath" (Eph. vi. 4, and see Col. iii. 21); masters were to "forbear threatening" with their slaves (Eph. vi. 9). At the same time the judicial use of corporal punishment is frequently mentioned, and only indirectly censured when in violation of an established privilege. By the old Roman law indeed a citizen could only be beaten with a vine-branch, not with rods (fustes) or with the scourge (flagellum), which privilege was extended by Caius Gracchus to the Latins; hence St. Paul's twice-recorded protest (Acts xvi. 37; xxii. 25) against being "beaten" or "scourged," being "a Roman." It is certain however that in the Roman army a terrible punishment existed, called fustuarium, beginning with a stroke of the centurion's vine-branch (the symbol of his authority), and seldom ending but with death. And as the status of the freeman became gradually lowered, it is clear that the use of the rod became more prevalent, till we find the jurists of the period extending from Severus to the Gordians, such as Callistratus and Macer (end of the 2nd to nearly middle of the 3rd century), speaking of the fustes as the punishment of the free, in cases where the slave would be flogged with the flagellum, or termed the application of the former a mere "admonition," but that of the latter a castigation (Dig. bk. xlviii. t. xix. ll. 10, 7).

A constitution of Severus and Antonine forbade the chastising with the fustes either decemvirs or their sons (Code, bk. ii. tit. xii. l. 5, A. D. 199); The ignominy, however, arose from the sentence, if for an offence deserving by law such punishment, not from the mere act; e. g. if inflicted by way of torture, before sentence, it did not dishonour (Dig. bk. iii. t. ii. l. 22; Code, bk. ii. t. xii. l. 14; law of Gordian, A. D. 239); though the torturing of decemvirs under any circumstances was eventually forbidden (bk. x. t. xxxi. l. 33; Const. of Glatian, Valentinian, and Theodosius, A. D. 381). But a man was infamous after being whipped and told by the prætor, "Thou hast calumniated" (bk. ii. l. 18, A. D. 241). An extract from the jurist Callistratus in the Digest (bk. l. t. ii. l. 12) brings out in a striking way the conflict between the old civic pride of Rome and the debasement of municipal government during her decay. Traders, he says, though liable to be flogged by the aediles, are not to be set aside as vile. They are not forbidden to solicit the decurionate or other honours in the city of their birthplace. But it does not seem to him honourable to admit to the decurion order persons who have been subject to such chastisement, especially in those cities which have an abundance of honourable men, for it is the peculiarity of those who should fulfil municipal offices which necessarily invites such persons. If wealthy, to municipal honours. And the 45th Novel, whilst subjecting Jews, Samaritans, and heretics, to all the charges of the decurionate, deprived them of its privileges, "as that of not being scourged."

It will thus be seen that during the five centuries which separate Justinian from St. Paul, the idea of corporal punishment under its most usual forms as a social degradation subsisted, yet the liability to it had been greatly extended. The equality before the law which might have been reached through the extension of Roman citizenship itself had been by no means attained, but the character of that citizenship itself had become debased, and the exemption from corporal punishment which still fluttered, like a last ray of the lucis, on the shoulders of the civic officers, had been already blown off for some. There were decurions who had been flogged, and decurions who could be flogged. Such exemption was indeed growing to be a privilege attached to the mere possession of wealth. Thus delation if proved false, or where the delator did not persevere, should he be of mean fortune, which he did not care to lose, was to be punished with the sharpest flogging (gravissimis verberibus, Code, bk. x. t. xl. l. 7; law of Gratian, Valentinian and Theodosius, end of 4th century).

Among the offences which entailed corporal punishment, besides the one last mentioned, may be named false witness (Code, bk. iv. t. xx. l. 13, constitution of Zeno, end of 5th century). The use of it multiplied indeed as the character of the people became lowered, and the Novels are comparatively full of it. The 8th enacts flogging and torture against the taking of money by judges (c. 8); the 123rd punishes with "bodily torments" those persons, especially stage-players and harlots, who should assume the monastic dress, or imitate or make a mock of Church usages (c. 44); the 134th enacts corporal punishment against those who detained debtors' children as responsible for their father's debt (c. 7), or who abetted illegal divorces (c. 11), and requires the adulterous wife to be scourged to the quick—so we must probably understand the words "competentibus valeribus subactam" (c. 10; and see c. 12). On the other hand, a husband chastising his wife with either the fustes or flagellum, otherwise than for conduct for which he might lawfully divorce her, was by the 117th Novel made liable to pay to her, during coverture, the amount of 1-3rd of the ante-nuptial gift (c. 14). The last chapter of the 134th Novel lashed (De poenarum omnium moderazione, n. 11) professes to inculcate moderation in punishment, and enacts that from henceforth there shall be no other penal mutilation than the cutting off of one hand, and that thieves shall only be flogged. Already under Constantine it had been enacted (Code, bk. ix. t. xlvii. l. 17, A.D. 315) that branding should not be in the face, as figuring "the heavenly beauty,"—a law in which the influence of Christian feeling upon the first Christian emperor is strikingly displayed.

Passing from the legislation of the East to that of the West, we find on the whole a very similar course of things. Among the ancient Germans, according to the account of Tacitus, corporal punishment was rare. He notes as a singularity that in war none but the priest was allowed to punish, bind, or even strike (ne verberare quidem) a soldier (De Mor. Germ. c. vii.). A husband might indeed flog his adulterous wife naked through the streets (c. xix.); but otherwise even slaves were rarely beaten (c. xxv.).

In the barbaric codes, corporal punishment is in like manner primarily a social degradation. We find it inflicted on a slave, as an alternative for compensation. Under the Saxon law, a slave stealing to the value of 2 denarii was to receive 120 blows (ictus) or to pay three solidi (Pactus rufgod. antiq. t. xiii.), the solidus being equivalent to 40 denarii. The same punishment was inflicted on a slave committing adultery with a slave-girl (rape indeed seems meant) where she did not die of it (t. xxix.). Where a slave was accused of theft, corporal punishment was applied by way of torture. Stretched on a bench (super scannum tensus) as the really older but so-called recentior text has it, he received 120 blows (ictus, or as the other text has it, 121 colaphos). If he confessed under torture, as already mentioned under the head "Mutilation of the Body," the penalty was castration if a male, but for a woman 240 strokes with a scourge, or 6 solidi. A Constitution of King Childobert (middle of 6th century), contained in Labbé and Mansi's Councils, enacts in certain cases of sacrilege that a "servile person" shall receive 100 lashes. Under the Burgundian law (in force from the beginning of the 6th until at least 814, when it was still recognised) bodily punishment without the option of composition was enacted for the slave, where the freeman might compound. Thus for the theft of a hog, sheep, goat, or of bees, the slave received 300 strokes with the rod, and fustigation is in the like manner enacted for other offences by slaves (t. v. &c.). A Lombard law of A.D. 724 (bk. vi. c. 88) has a singular enactment, punishing with shaving and whipping those women whom their husbands send out upon men of small courage (super homines qui miorem habebant virtutem), a text which gives a high idea of the vigour of Lombard women.

The Visigothic laws exhibit to us before any others the breaking down of the previous freeman's privilege (analogous to that of the Roman citizen) of exemption from corporal punishment. The corrupt or unjust judge, if unable to make due restitution and amends was to receive 50 strokes with the scourge publicly (publice extensus, Bk. ii. c. 20). The use (or abuse) of corporal punishment is indeed most conspicuous in this code. If a free woman married or committed adultery with her own slave or freedman, the punishment was death, after the public flagellation of both (bk. iii. t. ii. l. 2). If she committed adultery with another's slave, each was to receive 100 lashes (l. 3). A ravisher being a freeman, besides being handed over as a slave to the ravished, was to receive 200 lashes in the sight of all (bk. iii. t. iii. l. 1). The brother who forced a sister to marry against her will was to receive 50 lashes (ibid. l. 4). The slave ravishing a freewoman received 300 lashes, with decalva-

of the word decalvation saries to ru (ll. 8-12).
adultery. a goolly (ide was to rece parently inf only),—if w receiving for punishment
iv. ll. 14-16 public flogg for prostitut saries; thus v the knowledg each was to slave for her the same un to her, and flogged and streets. An religious or s mitted adul Reerel). B a husband res 200 lashes p law of the s lashes again saries other w wing, with o punishment
health of a m ceers, storm to demons a of judges or themselves t and slaves c generally for slaves, and f for thefts, cit
t. iii.), with if a master st his master's 100 lashes (c be exempt fr 5); for certai a crowd to c for violently s (l. 4); for so the line of m cases being h composition woods (t. ii. l rior conditio rending anim for breaking unrepaired fo however is t more terrible religion. Blas drawing them from baptism, ing the Sabb working on t feast days, m ing within the against the fir with decalvat clavery (bk. x ing without p

with decalvation, i. e. according to the meaning of the word at this period, scalping; 200 and decalvation for ravishing a slave-woman. Accessories to rape, if free, 50 lashes, if slaves, 100 (ll. 8-12). So again for the various grades of adultery. A freeman committing adultery with a goolly (donee) slave-girl in her master's house was to receive 100 strokes without infamy (apparently inflicted in private, and with a stick only),—if with an inferior one, 50 only; a slave receiving for the like offence 150 lashes, and the punishment increasing if violence were used (t. iv. ll. 13-16). By a law of Recared (ib. 17), public flogging was also made the punishment for prostitution, with some remarkable provisions; thus when practised by a freewoman with the knowledge or for the benefit of her parents, each was to receive 100 lashes; and when by a slave for her master's benefit, he was to receive the same number of lashes as were to be given to her, and 50 in any case where after being flogged and "decalvated" she returned to the streets. And 100 lashes awaited the woman, religious or secular, who either married or committed adultery with a priest (l. 18, also of Recared). By a law of Chindasinth (t. vi. l. 2) a husband remarrying after divorce was to receive 200 lashes publicly, with decalvation. Another law of the same king (bk. iv. t. v.) enacted 50 lashes against a child striking a parent or in various other ways misbehaving against him. Flogging, with or without decalvation is again the punishment for consulting a soothsayer on the health of a man (bk. vi. t. ii. l. 1),—that of sorcerers, storm-raisers, invokers of and sacrificers to demons and those who consult them (l. 3); of judges or others who consult diviners or apply themselves to auguries (l. 5); of slave-women and slaves causing abortion (t. iii. ll. 1, 5, 6); generally for wounds and personal injuries by slaves, and to some extent by freemen (t. iv.); for theft, either of goods or slaves (bk. vii. t. ii. t. iii.), with again the remarkable provisions that if a master stole with his slave, or the slave by his master's order, the master was to receive 100 lashes (besides compounding), the slave to be exempt from punishment (t. ii. l. 5, t. iii. l. 5); for certain forgeries (t. v. l. 2); for gathering a crowd to commit murder (bk. viii. t. i. l. 3); for violently shutting up a person within his house (l. 4); for soliciting others to rob or robbing on the face of march, the offence in the two latter cases being however for freemen alternative with composition (ll. 6, 9, 10, 11); for setting fire to woods (t. ii. l. 2); in the case of persons of inferior condition, for destroying crops (t. iii. l. 6), sending animals into crops or vines (l. 10); also for breaking mills or dams and leaving them unrepaired for 30 days (l. 30), &c. &c. Nowhere however is the abuse of corporal punishment more terrible than in the case of offences against religion. Blasphemers of the Trinity, Jews withdrawing themselves, their children or servants from baptism, celebrating the Passover, observing the Sabbath or other festivals of their creed, working on the Lord's day and on Christian feast days, making distinctions of meats, marrying within the 6th degree, reading Jewish books against the faith, &c., were to receive 100 lashes with decalvation, and with or without exile and slavery (bk. xii. t. iii. ll. 2, 8, 11). For marrying without priestly benediction, or in anywise exceeding the law as to dowry, the Jewish husband, his wife and her parents, were to receive 100 lashes, or compound with 100 solidi. A law of Recared confirming the Council of Toledo punished with 50 blows (without infamy) any person who disobeyed the enactments of the Council and had no money to lose (t. i. l. 3).

In the severity of punishment under this Code, we must not however lose sight of the fact already pointed out elsewhere in these pages [BODY, MUTILATION OF THE], that the enactment of any fixed punishment constitutes an enormous step in advance on the mere composition of the earlier barbaric Codes, whilst in various of the enactments, such as those exempting slaves from punishment where they only act as the tools of their masters, we find a striving towards a higher and more discriminating standard of justice than that which measures other contemporary legislation, which equally bears testimony to the influence of the clergy on Wisigothic legislation—an influence, indeed, of which we see the darker side in the atrocious laws against the Jews.

Amongst our Anglo-Saxon forefathers, corporal punishment seems in general to have been confined to slaves, as an alternative for compensation, wherewith the slave "redeemed" or "paid the price of his skin," as it is expressed; e.g. for sacrificing to devils (laws of Whitred, Kent, A.D. 691-725), for working on Sundays (laws of Ina, A.D. 688-728, iii.). In certain cases of theft the offender himself was allowed to flog the culprit (xxviii.). A foreigner or stranger wandering out of the way through the woods, who neither shouted nor blew the horn, was to be deemed a thief, and to be flogged or redeem himself (xxviii.).

Capital punishment is again prominent in the Capitularies. The first Capitulary of Carloman, A.D. 742 (c. 6), imposes two years' imprisonment on a fornicating priest, after he has been scourged to the quick (flagellatus ex scorticiatus). The Capitulary of Metz, 755, following a synod held at the same place, enacts that for incest a slave or freeman shall be beaten with many stripes, as also any "minor" cleric guilty of the like offence. The same enactment, confined to the case of marrying a cousin, and in slightly different language, occurs elsewhere in the general collection. A savage one on conspiracies (A.D. 805, c. 10) is added to the Salic law, enacting that where conspiracies have been made with an oath—the principals suffering death—the accessories are to flog each other and cut each other's noses off; even if no mischief shall have been done, to shave and flog each other. For conspiracies, without an oath, the slave only was to be flogged, the freeman clearing himself by oath or compounding. The same law occurs in the General Capitularies (bk. iii. 9). Another law of the 7th book (c. 123) enacts public flagellation and decalvation for the slave marrying within the 7th degree of consanguinity, and the 4th Addition embodies much of the rigorous Wisigothic Code as towards the Jews, who were to be decalvated and receive 100 lashes publicly if they marry within the prohibited degrees (c. 2). And the Wisigothic provision against marrying without priestly benedictions, or exceeding in anywise the laws as to dowry, is by this extended to Jews as well as Christians.

There remains only to shew corporal punishment as either the subject or as forming part of the discipline of the church itself. Here, indeed, we find at first a much higher standard than that of the civil law. Among the persons whose offerings the Apostolic Constitutions require to be rejected are such as "use their slaves wickedly, with stripes, or hunger, or hard service" (bk. iv. c. 6). Soon however a harsher law must have prevailed. The Council of Eliberis, A.D. 305, enacted (c. 5) that if a mistress, inflamed by jealousy, should so flog her handmaid that she should die within three days, she is only to be admitted to communion after seven years' penance (unless in case of dangerous illness) if the act were done wilfully, or after fine if death were not intended—a provision which speaks volumes indeed of the bitterness of Spanish slavery at this period, but which nevertheless shews the church taking cognizance of the slave-owner's excesses, and endeavouring to moderate them by its discipline, at least in the case of women. On the other hand, the right of personal chastisement was often arrogated by the clergy themselves, since the Apostolic Canons enact that a bishop, priest, or deacon, striking the faithful who have sinned, or the unfaithful who have done wrong, seeking thereby to make himself feared, is to be deposed (c. 19, otherwise 23 or 28), and Augustine clearly testifies to the fact of corporal punishment being judicially inflicted by bishops, in that painful letter of his to the Prefect Marcellus, in which, whilst exhorting him not to be too severe in punishing the Donatists, he praises him at the same time for having drawn out the confession of crimes so great by whipping with rods (virgarum verberibus), inasmuch as this "mode of coercion is wont to be applied by the masters of liberal arts, by parents themselves, and often even by bishops in their judgments" (Ep. 133, otherwise 159).

Corporal punishment seems moreover to have formed from an early period, if not from the first, a part of the monastic discipline. The rule of St. Pachomius, translated into Latin by Jerome (art. 87), imposes the penalty of thirty-nine lashes, to be inflicted before the gates of the monastery (besides fasting), after three warnings, on a monk who persists in the "most evil custom" of talking, as well as for theft (art. 121). The same punishment may also be implied in the term "corripere" used in other articles, as "corripuerit iuxta ordinem," "corripuerit ordine monasterii," &c. But the word might also apply to mere verbal correction, since by art. 97 children who could not be brought to think of God's judgment "et correpti verbo non emendaverint," are to be flogged till they receive instruction and fear. In the 4th book of Cassian's work, "De coenobiorum institutis" (end of 4th or beginning of 5th century), flogging is placed on the same line with expulsion as a punishment for the graver offences against monastic discipline (some of which indeed may appear to us very slight), as "open reproaches, manifest acts of contempt, swelling words of contradiction, a free and unrestrained gait, familiarity with women, anger, fightings, rivalries, quarrels, the presumption to do some special work, the contumacy of money loving, the affecting and possessing of things superfluous, which other brethren have not, extraordinary and furtive refectations, and the like" (c. 16). In the rule of St. Benedict (A.D. 528) corporal punishment seems implied in the "major emendatio." And "if a brother for any the slightest cause is corrected (corripitur) in any way by the abbot or any prior, or if he lightly feel that the mind of any prior is wrought or moved against him, however moderately, without delay let him lie prostrate on the earth at his feet, doing satisfaction until that emotion be healed. But if any scorn to do this, let him be either subjected to corporal punishment, or if contumacious, expelled from the monastery" (c. 71). Here, it will be seen, corporal punishment is viewed as a lighter penalty than expulsion.

We need not dwell on a supposed Canon of the above-referred to Council of Eliberis, to be found in Gratian and others (ex cap. ix.), allowing bishops and their ministers to scourge coloni with rods for their crimes. But in the letters of Gregory I. the Great, 590-603, the right of inflicting, or at least ordering personal chastisement is evidently assumed to belong to the clergy. In a letter to Pantaleo the Notary (bk. ii. Pt. II. Ep. 40), on the subject of a deacon's daughter who had been seduced by a bishop's nephew, he required either that the offender should marry her, executing the due nuptial instruments, or be "corporally chastised" and put to penance in a monastery; and the Pope renews this injunction in a letter (42) to the uncle, Bishop Felix, himself. Bishop Ambrus of Tarcentum, who had had a woman on the roll of the church (de matriculis) cruelly whipped with rods, against the order of the priesthood, so that she died after eight months, was nevertheless only punished by this really great Pope with two months' suspension from saying mass (ep. 44, 45). Sometimes, indeed, corporal punishment was inflicted actually in the church, as we see in another letter of the same Pope to the Bishop of Constantinople, complaining that an Isaurian monk and priest had been thus beaten with rods, "a new and unheard of mode of preaching" (ep. 52). But the same Gregory deemed it fitting that slaves, guilty of idolatry or following sorcerers, should be chastised with stripes and tortures for their amendment (bk. vii. pt. ii. ep. 67, to Januarius, Bishop of Calabria). Elsewhere the flogging of penitent thieves seems to be implied (bk. xii. ep. 31, c. iv.).

Towards the end of the same century, the 16th Council of Toledo, A.D. 683, enacted that 100 lashes and shameful decalvatio should be the punishment of unnatural offences. With this and a few other exceptions, however, the enactments of the church as to corporal punishment chiefly refer to clerics or monks. The Council of Vannes in 465 had indeed already enacted that a cleric proved to have been drunk should either be kept thirty days out of communion, or subjected to corporal punishment (c. 13). The 1st Council of Orleans in 511 had enacted that if the relict of a priest or deacon were to marry again, she and her husband were after "castigation" to be separated, or excommunicated if they persisted in living together (c. 3). Towards the end of the 7th century, the Council of Arton (about 670), enacted that any monk who went against its decrees should either be beaten with rods, or suspended for three years from communion (c. 15). In the next century, Gregory III. (731-41), in his Excerpt from the Fathers and the Canons, assigns stripes as the punishment for thefts of holy things, and inserts the Canon of the Council of Eliberis (c. 3). The Council of Orleans (511) quoted in the Council of Arton (670) admitting in the Council of Arton (670) gossips, a stripes, an offence, if prisoner under an as to the legislation undisturbed. The law therefore nation, was humanised. On the other offence shown Wisigothic in the Council marriage [N.B.—more than CORSI June 30 (A.

COSMA MIAN, and Belae, London and number (2) Arce Byzant.

COTTI martyr in Cuauri.

COUNC

De Jejun. "assembly Symmachus (and again latter term any Christi in late me tit. vii. p. rincipal, na "episcopi metropolitani appropriated as early as no also Ven the Theodo part or (as Christian C legislative) of the colle questions,— and by obli (as time we to be presen his name (c. A.D. 451; C Conc. Tolet. Trium Cup junction to Such cour as follows.— the chronol to exist:—

1. A coun

Church by itself, or of the Western Church by itself, as in the 4th century. And both those classes were extraordinary, and for particular emergencies. iii. The regular annual primate councils (see Conc. Constantin. A. D. 381, can. 1), as, e. g. of Antioch, or more remarkably, of Africa: the latter of which, acc. to Conc. Carthag. III. A. D. 398, cans. 2, 7, 41, 43, was to consist of three bishops as legates from each African province, except that of Tripoli, which was to send only one, as having few bishops, thus admitting the principle of representation under pressure of circumstances; while subsequent councils permitted a "vicar" instead of the bishop in person in case of absolute necessity (Conc. Carthag. IV. can. 21), and enacted a division of the bishops into "duo vel tres turmae," each "turma" to attend in turn (Conc. Carthag. I. can. 10); and, lastly, altered the "yearly" meeting into one only "quoties exegerit causa communis" (Conc. Milevit. II. A. D. 416, can. 9, Cod. Can. Afric. xcv.). Like councils were (less regularly) held at Rome in the 5th century, as e. g. when three delegates from the Sicilian bishops were directed by Pope Leo the Great (Epist. iv. c. 71) to attend the autumnal synod of the two to be annually held at Rome. And occasionally elsewhere also, as in Spain and in Gaul. National councils, in later times (6th century onwards), e. g. in France, in Saxon England, and above all in Spain, belong, where they were purely ecclesiastical, to the same class.

4. A council of (as far as possible) the bishops of the whole Church, OECUMENICAL (first so called in Euseb. V. Constant. iii. 6, and again in Conc. Constantin. A. D. 381), not intentionally limited to specially the Roman world, but including all Christians everywhere, although at that period the Christian Church was nearly included in the narrower meaning—"totius orbis" (St. Aug. De Bapt. c. Donat. i. 7), "ex toto orbe" (Sulp. Sev. ii.), "plenarium universae ecclesiae" (St. Aug. Epist. 162), "plenarium ex universo orbe Christiano," as distinguished from (not only "provinciarum," but) "regionum concilia" (Id. De Bapt. c. Donat. ii. 3). So Tertullian (as above cited) speaks of "representatio totius Christiani nominis." And Augustin (De Bapt. c. Ionan. vii. 53) distinguishes "regionale" from "plenarium concilium," and rests the certainty of the latter on the "universalis ecclesiae consensus." And this was regarded as an extraordinary remedy for an extraordinary emergency, to be resorted to as seldom as possible; and even when necessary, yet an evil for the time, as throwing everything into disturbance,—as had as a tempest ("procella," St. Hilary De Synodis). And as it was first possible, so does it appear to have been first thought of, in the time of Constantine the Great.

To these must be added, as matter of history, although all more or less abnormal:—

5. The Σύνοδοι Ἐκδημοῦσαι, at Constantinople, from the 4th century, and again at the various cities where the Roman emperors dwelt, as at Rome, and in one case (under Maximus) at Treves, and again the Concilia Palatina under the Carolingian emperors, held "in regum palatiis;" consisting in each case of the bishops who happened to be at court.

6. The mixed national councils of the European kingdoms, after the conversion of the Franks, Saxons, Spaniards, &c.; Placita, Wittenburgs, &c.

The so-called Council of the Apostles (in Acts xv.) is a distinct precedent, in principle, for Church councils; as sanctioning the decision of emergent controversies and matters of discipline by common consultation of the whole Church under the guidance and leadership of the "apostles and elders," the bishops and presbyters. It is "the apostles and elders" who come together to consider the matter (Acts xv. 6). Yet πάν τὸ πλῆθος are present (ib. 12), but as listening. It is "the apostles and elders, ὡς τὴν ὅλην Ἐκκλησίαν," who make the decree (ib. 22). And the best MSS. make that decree run in the name of "the apostles and elders" only, although the reading is no doubt uncertain (ib. 23, reading of ἀπόστολοι καὶ οἱ πρεσβύτεροι ὁδὲ λαοί). The formal deliberation and the decree, then, emanate from the apostles and the elders, but the whole Church, i. e. the laity also, are consulted. In the same way, in other cases, we find, e. g. the "prophets and teachers" at Antioch sending St. Paul and Barnabas on their mission; yet St. Paul and Barnabas report (ἀνγγελιαί) to an "assembly of the Church" of Antioch what "God had done with them" (Acts xiii. 1, xiv. 27); St. Paul however at a later time reporting privately, for obvious reasons, to James and the elders (ib. xxi. 18). And the same two were formally sent to the council at Jerusalem by the Church of Antioch (προκειμένους ὑπὸ τῆς Ἐκκλησίας), which plainly had also appointed them (ἔγραψαν, Acts xv. 2, 3). In 1 Cor. v. 4, the Church of Corinth is represented as "gathered together" to exercise discipline. That St. James presided at Jerusalem naturally followed from his office of Bishop of Jerusalem. Strictly speaking the assembly over which he presided was an assembly of the Church of Jerusalem only; to receive a deputation from the Church of Antioch. And it differed from the Church councils also in the actual presence in it of apostles. But this difference only strengthens the case as a precedent for mutual deliberation on the part of the Church collectively: ἔδοξεν ἡμῖν γενόμενον ἁποστολικῶν (Acts xv. 25). Other assemblies in apostolical times, mentioned in the Acts—viz. Acts i. 15, to appoint an apostle in the place of Judas; vi. 2, to establish the diaconate; ix. 27, to receive St. Paul—have been mis-called Apostolic Councils, by an obvious straining of the term.

It will be convenient to speak, successively, of—

A. THE ORDER of holding Ecclesiastical Councils;

B. THE CONSTITUENT MEMBERS of Ecclesiastical Councils;

C. THE AUTHORITY assigned to such Councils. And, lastly, to add a few words respecting

D. IRREGULAR and abnormal assemblies akin to Councils.

A. Under the head of the ORDER of holding a council, we have to consider,—

1. By whom councils were summoned.

Diocesan and Provincial Councils were summoned respectively by the bishop of the diocese and by the metropolitan of the province (see authorities in Bingham), and this after the time of Constantine, as well as before it. A council of two or more provinces together would naturally be sum-prior to the system, by th e.g. that of Sumasta; th as e.g. of Af The σύνδοιο summoned by the concilia emperors; th kingdoms, wh statial, by th last-named ca mand to hold Oecumenical C stance almost empire, were until the 9th c although, mat chief bishops c period, those t summoned by

The great Co Constantine (C Constantin. iii. 6 9), which purp in B. H. Covey but "ex senten 1); and chiefl Eusebius, Secr of Hosius, bish of no value in most and in forward Pope Council of Con nosed by the 1124, 1124);
τὸ γράμμα or and Valentinian
Pope Damasus
Eastern patriar and his success really "assembl Conc. nat. of A. D.
H. E. v. 9); w cured in the own letters) di Conc. II and L.
1291). The ca
A. D. 451, so far the pope, Leo th if (desiring, ho subsequently, a postponement (H 76, 89-95). made to Theodo the council was "ex decreto pi tiani et Marci itself (Labb, iv precepto Christ Apostolicae Sedi agnus, in Marc Epist. 73), "et Constantinople,
Justinian (Labb
Pope Vigilius n Constantinople.
himself in direc not upon May 2 of the diptychs

; Placita, Wifena-

Apostles (in Acts in principle, for the decision of matters of discipline the whole Church eldership of the bishops and pres- and elders" who matter (Acts xv. 6). sent (ib. 12), but as and elders, with the decree (ib. 22). decree run in the ers" only, although rtain (ib. 23, read- σβήτεροι ἀδελφοί, the decree, then, the elders, but the also, are consulted. ences, we find, e.g. at Antioch sending ir mission; yet St. (ἀρχιεπίσκοπος) of Antioch was at Acts xiii. 1, xiv. 27; time reporting pri- to James and the e same two were il at Jerusalem by ρεσθόντες ὑπὸ τῆ) had also appointed 3). In 1 Cor. v. 4, esented as "gathered e. That St. James ily followed from his r strictly speaking, he presided was at Jerusalem only, to the Church of Antioch, rch councils also in apostles. But this the case as a pre- on the part of the εν ἡμῖν γενομένης Other assemblies lnd in the Acts—viz. ostle in the place of the diaconate: ix. 27, been mis-called Apo- us straining of the speak, successively,

Eccelesiastical Coun-

MEMBERS of Ecclesias-ted to such Councils.

ords respecting rnal assemblies akin the ORDER of holding ter.—

s summoned.

Councils were sum-

ishop of the diocese of the province (see and this after the time before H. A council together would naturally be summoned by the senior metropolitan; the earlier councils of neighbouring bishops, prior to the organization of the metropolitan system, by the leading bishops of the locality, as, e.g. that at Antioch, which condemned Paul of Samosata; those of a patriarchate or primacy, as, e.g. of Africa, by the patriarch or primate. The συνόδοι ἐξεδιωμοῦσαι of Constantinople were summoned by the Patriarch of Constantinople; the concilia Palatina by the Frank kings and emperors; the national councils of the European kingdoms, which were as much civil as ecclesiastical, by the respective kings. And in these last-named cases the royal permission or command to hold them is frequently mentioned. Oecumenical Councils, consisting in the first instance almost wholly of bishops of the Roman empire, were summoned by the Roman emperors until the 9th century (see Socrates, lib. v. l'roem.), although, naturally, upon consultation with the chief bishops of the Church herself. After that period, those that have been so called have been summoned by the popes in the Western Church. The great Council of Nice was summoned by Constantine (by τιμητικά γράμματα [Euseb., V. Const. ant. lib. 6, and cf. Socrat. i. 9, Theodoret, i. 9], which purport to be given in a Syriac version in B. H. Cowper's Anecdota Nicæna, pp. 21-29), but "ex sententia sacerdotum" (Rufin, H. E. i. 1); and chiefly, as is plain, by the accounts of Eusebius, Socrates, and Sozomen, upon the advice of Hosius, bishop of Cordova. Later documents, of no value in such a point, viz. the Liber Damiani and the Conc. Constantin. A.D. 680, put forward Pope Sylvester as the adviser. The Council of Constantinople, A.D. 381, was summoned by the Emperor Theodosius (Labbe, iv. 1123, 1124); that of Ephesus, A.D. 431, κατὰ τὸ γράμμα or ἐκ θεαρίτωντος, of Theodosius II. and Valentinian III. (Act. in Mansi, iv. 1111); Pope Damasus concurring in the former, but Eastern patriarchs (Meletius of Antioch, Gregory, and his successor Nectarius, of Constantinople) really "assembling;" it (even according to the Conc. Const. ant. of A.D. 680, and see Vales: ad Theodoret. H. E. v. 9); while Pope Celestine similarly concurred in the latter, but (as is evident by his own letters) did not summon it (Acts of the Council and Letters in Mansi, iv. 1226, 1283, 1291). The case of the Council of Chalcedon, A.D. 451, so far differs from its predecessors, that the pope, Leo the Great, suggested and requested it (desiring, however, to have it in Italy), yet subsequently, and when too late, desired its postponement (Leo M. Epist. 44, 54-58, 69, 73, 76, 89-95). The application was originally made to Theodosius II. and Valentinian III., but the council was actually summoned by Marcian, "et decreto piissimorum Imperatorum Valentiniani et Marciani," in the words of the council itself (Labbe, iv. 77), or in those of Leo, "ex precepto Christianorum principum et consensu Apostolicæ Sedis" (Leon. M. l'ist. 114), and again, in Marcian's words to Leo (uter Leon. Epist. 73), "te auctore." The 2nd Council of Constantinople, A.D. 553, was convoked by Justinian (Labbe, v. 4) after consultation with Pope Vigilius and with Menas patriarch of Constantinople. But Vigilius after a time put himself in direct antagonism with the council, and upon May 28, 553, was actually struck out of the diptychs by it; although, after its termination, he retracted, and in the end of A.D. 553, and by a Constitutum of February 23, A.D. 554, accepted its decrees. The 3rd Council of Constantinople, A.D. 680, was convoked by the "piissima Jussu" of the Emperor Constantine Pogonatus (Labbe, vi. 408, 431). Pope Agatho only sending legates when requested, and with them his own exposition of the faith, and a profession of his readiness to pay "promptam obedientiam" to the emperor. The 5th of Constantinople, A.D. 754 (in Cave's reckoning, the 8th oecumenical), which condemned images, was summoned by Constantine Copronymus and Leo (Labbe, vii. 397). The 2nd of Nice, A.D. 787, was convoked by the Empress Irene and her son Constantine (Labbe, vii. 661), at the request of Tarasius, patriarch of Constantinople, with the acquiescence of Pope Adrian I.; the latter, however, speaking afterwards of the council (in his letter to Charlemagne) as summoned "secundum nostram ordinationem." And, lastly, the Emperor Basil, the Macedonian, called together the 4th of Constantinople, A.D. 869 (not acknowledged, however, by the Eastern Church, which puts in its place that of A.D. 879), after an embassy, sent to Pope Nicholas I., but received and answered by his successor Adrian II. (Labbe, viii. 1313). The Council of Sardica, intended to be oecumenical, was summoned by the Emperors Constantius and Constans (Soz. ii. 20; Sozom. iii. 2; St. Athanas. Hist. Arian. § 36). And the numberless smaller councils about Arianism were likewise summoned by the emperors. (See the summary of the whole case in Andrewes (Light and Love of calling Asemblies, Sermons, v. 160-165, and Tortura Torti, pp. 193, 422, sq.). The case of the 1st Council of Arles, A.D. 314, is a peculiar one. It was not a regular council of any portion of the Church, but rather a selected ecclesiastical tribunal, of which the members were specially chosen and summoned by the Emperor Constantine, and mainly from Gaul (Euseb. H. E. x. 5; Optat. Hist. Romat. p. 181, Dupin), intended to be oecumenical (the Emperor "assembling there a large number of bishops from different and almost innumerable parts of the empire," Euseb. ib.), and actually called "plenarium," and "universæ ecclesiæ," by St. Augustine, but not so really, as neither including all bishops nor any Eastern bishops. And its object was to revise the decision of a tribunal of fewer bishops held at Rome under the Pope Melchiodus in the previous year, with which the Donatists were not content. It was simply an instance, therefore, of that which afterwards became a rule, viz. of the Emperor's assigning episcopal judges to decide an ecclesiastical case. Much like it is the summoning of the Roman councils about Pope Symmachus, two centuries later, by King Theodoric.

The regular title for the bishop's or metropolitan's letters of summons was Synodice or Tractoriæ (St. Aug. E. ist. 217 ad Victorin.); for the Emperor's like letters, Sacræ.

From the summons, we go on to—

II. The time when, and the occasions upon which, councils were summoned. Speaking first of those councils which were held, or were meant to recur, regularly, we have the chief stress of the canons to be directed to provincial councils, as being no doubt more difficult to enforce, and also in the interest of justice, such councils being the court of appeal from the decisions of individual bishops. In the time of Firmilian and of Cyprian, as said above, these were habitually held once a year; Firmilian's words being apparently determined to mean provincial, not diocesan, councils, by the mention of "seniores et prepositi," "presbyters and bishops" (in the plural). The great Council of Nice (can. 5) increased them to twice in the year, once before Lent, once in autumn. And so also the Apostolic Canon 37, specifying, however, the 4th week after Easter and the 12th of Τραπῆσεταιριος, i.e. October. And twice a year, accordingly, became thenceforward the rule of what ought to be, although in actual fact, and by repeated concessions of councils, finally relaxed into once. So Conc. Antioch. A.D. 341, can. 20 (slightly varying the days), Conc. Chalced. A.D. 451, can. 19; and for Africa, Conc. Carthag. III. A.D. 397, can. 2, and 1, can. 7 (fixing October 21), and Cod. Can. Afric. c. 18; for Spain, Conc. Tollet. III. A.D. 589, can. 18; I. V. A. D. 634, can. 3 (fixing May 20), XI. A.D. 675, can. 15, XVII. A.D. 742, can. 1; Encycl. A.D. 668, can. 7; for France, Conc. Reims. A.D. 439, can. 8 (twice a year), A. A. S. I. A.D. 441, can. 89, Avrel. I. A.D. 533, can. 2, Althissid. A.D. 578, can. 7; and for England, Conc. C. A. hith. A.D. 787, can. 3 (the title of which, however, seems to refer to diocesan councils), and before it, Conc. He. ut. A.D. 633, can. 7, ordering a synod twice in the year, but in the next sentence limiting the number to once, viz. upon August 1, at Clovesho, on the ground of unavoidable hindrances. Once a year became, indeed, the recognized practice (but as an uncanonical concession to necessity), and is admitted by Gratian (Dist. xviii. c. 16, 189, 2 c.), and in England by Lydwood (Irvine. lib. i. tit. 14); as it had been allowed much earlier by the council in Trullo, can. 8, and by Conc. Nicea. II, can. 6. And similarly, Gregory the Great, enjoining once a year in Sicily (Epist. i. 1), and in Gaul (ib. ix. 106), adds in the latter case that it ought to be twice; and enjoins twice in Sardinia (ib. iv. 9), possibly as being an island of no great extent; while in yet another case (ib. v. 54) he orders such synods whenever needed. Leo the Great, likewise, A.D. 446, commands synods twice a year at Thessalonica (Epist. xiv.), but A.D. 447, only once a year at Rome, yet with the addition that it ought to be twice (ib. xvi.). See also Avitus Vienn. (Epist. 80—"It ought to be twice in a year, would that it were once in two years!") and Pope Hormisdas (E. ist. 25—"If not two, at least one"). Finally, Pippin, A.D. 755 (in Conc. Veron. pref. cns. 2, 4), renewed the junction of two a year, naming for them March 1 and October 1, but the second of them to be attended only by the metropolitans and certain selected clergy. Yet, a century after, the Conc. Tull. A.D. 859, can. 7, is again compelled to supplicate that they might be held once in the year.

Diocesan synods are assumed, in the 11th century (Modus tenendi Synodos, in Wilk. Conc. iv. 784), to be also held twice a year. And Herardus of Tours (Capit. c. 91) similarly commands them to be held twice, and each time not to last more than 15 days. But here, also, earlier rules speak of once, Conc. Liptin. A.D. 743, c. 1 (attributed also to Conc. Tollet. XVI. can. 1), Suession. A.D. 744, c. 2, St. Boniface (Epist. 103), Capit. Cur. M. VII. 108; of which authorities, however, the last is busied not so much with a synod as with ordering the clergy to give account of their acts and receive instructions, and bids them go "per turnas et per hellemodas" to the bishop (ib. vi. 163). It was the office of such synods, among other things, to promulgate to the diocese the decrees of the provincial synods; and accordingly we find a provision, in Conc. Tollet. XVI. A.D. 693, can. 7 (and of also Conc. of Chocsho, A.D. 747 can. 25, and the nearly contemporary German Council under St. Boniface, can. 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, 13, 14, 15, 16, 17, 18, 19, 20, 21, 22, 23, 24, 25, 26, 27, 28, 29, 30, 31, 32, 33, 34, 35, 36, 37, 38, 39, 40, 41, 42, 43, 44, 45, 46, 47, 48, 49, 50, 51, 52, 53, 54, 55, 56, 57, 58, 59, 60, 61, 62, 63, 64, 65, 66, 67, 68, 69, 70, 71, 72, 73, 74, 75, 76, 77, 78, 79, 80, 81, 82, 83, 84, 85, 86, 87, 88, 89, 90, 91, 92, 93, 94, 95, 96, 97, 98, 99, 100), that a diocesan synod should be held within six months after the provincial one. We find also abbots and presbyters summoned to an annual synod, sometimes together, sometimes separately (Conc. Osons. A.D. 598, c. 1, for Spain; Althissid. A.D. 578, can. 7, for Gaul). Diocesan synods were at that time commonly summoned about Lent. In earlier times still, e.g. that of St. Cyprian, such councils would seem to have been held whenever needed.

The primate or patriarchal synods were intended to be annual, and that of Africa was commonly called Universo Anniversario. But the usual difficulty of procuring attendance was at once testified, and in attempt remedied, by the provisions for representation mentioned already. Pope Hilary (Epist. 3) also orders such synods once a year in Gaul. And Leo the Great summons the Sicilian bishops to attend by representation at one of two such synods annually in Rome (Epist. iv.). But circumstances must have speedily rendered such regular synods impossible. The Council of Agde, A.D. 506, can. 71, seems to renew the annual rule. But the 2nd of Mâcon, A.D. 585, can. 20, made it triennial ("post tritericium tempus omnes conveniant") for Gaul. And this is the Tridentine rule in later times. The Concilia Palatina were at first occasional, as the kings or emperors summoned them. Pippin, as above said, A.D. 755, called some council of the kind twice in the year; but the actual practice remained irregular. And Conc. Tull. A.D. 859, can. 7, asking for a provincial council once a year, asked also for a palatine council once in every two years. Hincmar, however, speaks of twice a year as customary ("consuetudo tunc temporis erat," speaking of "Placita" Opp. II. 211, sq.).

All these kinds of councils were parts of the ordinary constitution of the Church, even the Palatine councils being mixed up with ecclesiastical matters. And those of them that were proper Church councils were needed at regular times; as required (according to Conc. Carth. III. can. 2), "propter causas ecclesiasticas, que ad perniciem plebium saepe veterascunt," although their functions were not restricted to cases of discipline only. Other kinds of councils were only occasional remedies for special emergencies, and were held therefore when needed. Of the six grounds usually enumerated (e.g. by Hefele) for holding oecumenical councils, setting aside all those that belong to mediæval times, as, e.g. the deciding between rival popes, &c., there remains, for earlier times, only one, which is both historically the ground upon which the great oecumenical councils were actually summoned, and that assigned by the Apostolical canon (37) for councils at all—"Ἀνακινεῖσθαι ἀλλήλους [αἱ ἐκκλησίαι] τὰς ἀλλήλους ἀνακινεῖσθαι.

III. The place when purely church council or some e.g. the Secretaria to large church which kind of councils of Cardinal Change in v. Secretaria for, for instance, A.D. and see Soicer in itself, as in the or again in mu 1163, at Constar χροῖα of the o great Council of bus (V. Constant or as he words it τίσις ἀλλήτων B. Sozomen (l. 19) palace. Valentin, argues that it m of e.g. Sozomen Bishops met du church, but that and Constantine then they remov ἀλλήλους, ἀλλήλους, seats along the throne in the mical Councils we in a building atte at Constantinop agia Constantino tract. lib. 11, St. Cy Conc. Ephes., Ev Council of Const. supplementa) Tr held in the secret Trullus. T against images, A imperial palace o Byzantium, and the people itself. Palat councils were con royal palaces. In tracti is figured delineating a couno the open Gospels t

Diocesan and p centrally and metropolitan cities was selected for the England, it is impo any certainty as t ally it was a cen was not. The outg the place for that e.g. Conc. Tollet. IV shall do. So als Pippin's two annual self, but that first lity of the second, can. 29, forbids any aliteris conventus A.D. 666, c. 7, en can. 3, leave it to mine the place, whi [α] ἰερατικοῖς τὰ ἔθνη τῆς εὐαγγελίας, καὶ τῶν ἑκκλησιαστικῶν ἀντιλογίας λαβόντων.

III. The place in which councils were held, when purely church councils, was commonly the church or some building attached to the church; e.g. the Secretarium or Διακονικὸν attached often to large churches (Liberat. Breviar. xiii.), in which kind of building the 3rd to the 6th Councils of Carthage were held, and others also (Du Cange in v. Secretarium); or the baptistery or βαπτιστήριον, wherein the Council of Chalcedon, for instance, A.D. 451, met (Labb. Conc. iv. 235, and see Suicer in v. βαπτιστήριον); or the church itself, as in the Council of Toledo IV. A.D. 633; or again in much later times (as A.D. 879 and 1165, at Constantinople), the galleries or κατηχητήρια of the church (Bingham VIII. v. 7). The great Council of Nice met, according to Eusebius (V. Constant. iii. 7) in an οἶκος ἐκκλησίας, or as he words it elsewhere (ib. 10), ἐν τῷ μισαυρίῳ οἴκῳ τῶν βασιλείων. Theodoret (i. 7) and Sozomen (i. 19) determine this to mean a royal palace. Valesius, on the contrary (ad loc. Euseb.), argues that it must mean a church. The words of eg. Sozomen appear really to show, that the bishops met during their first sessions in a church, but that when the day of decision arrived, and Constantine in person intended to be present, then they removed to his palace; which was οἶκος μεγίστος, and where the bishops sat on seats along the wall, and the emperor on a throne in the middle. The next four Oecumenical Councils were certainly held in a church or in a building attached to a church, respectively at Constantinople, Ephesus, Chalcedon, and again Constantinople (Jo. Damasc. De Sac. Inag. tract. iii., St. Cyril. Alex. ad Theodos. in Act. Conc. Ephes., Evagr. II. E. i. 3, &c.). The Council of Constantinople, A.D. 680, and the supplemental Trullian Council of A.D. 692, were held in the secretarium of the Imperial palace, called Trullus. The Council of Constantinople against images, A.D. 754, was held, first in the imperial palace of Hiera on the shore opposite Byzantium, and then in a church in Constantinople itself. Palatine councils and mixed national councils were commonly and naturally held in royal palaces. In Ciampini (Vel. Mon. I. tab. xlviii.) is figured a mosaic of the 5th century, indicating a council, and with a sup. celsus and the open Gospels thereon in the middle, from the Baptistery at Ravenna.

Diocesan and provincial councils were held naturally and ordinarily in the cathedral and metropolitan cities respectively. Why Clovesho was selected for the provincial councils of Saxon England, it is impossible to say, in the absence of any certainty as to where Clovesho was. Possibly it was a central spot, which Canterbury was not. The outgoing council sometimes named the place for that which was to come next; as eg. Conc. Tolet. IV. A.D. 633, can. 4, enacts that it shall do. So also the place for the first of Pippin's two annual councils was fixed by himself, but that first council determined the locality of the second. Conc. Arausic. I. A.D. 441, can. 29, forbids any council to be dissolved "since alienius conventus deputacionis." Conc. Emerit. A.D. 666, c. 7, and Conc. Tolet. iv. A.D. 633, can. 3, leave it to the metropolitan to determine the place, which was the usual rule. The palace where king or emperor happened to be, commonly decided the locality of the Councils (Palatinus, as eg. Clehcy, Braive, Ais-la-Chapelle, &c.). The localities of the Oecumenical Councils were determined by the circumstances of the case, and the convenience of the emperors. Nicea, eg. was close to the emperor's palace at Nicomedia. Ephesus was a convenient seaport, with great facilities of access on account of its trading importance, and accessible by land through the great road by Iconium to the Euphrates (see Howson and Conybeare's St. Paul, vol. II, pp. 80, sq. 8vo. edit.). Chalcedon was close to Constantinople, yet apart from it. And Sardinia again was chosen, in A.D. 347, as a place most convenient for East and West to meet in.

IV. Provision at the public expense, was also made, both for the conveyance of the bishops to the place of meeting, and for their entertainment during the sessions, at any rate during the period of the councils against the Arians. The former was ordered by Constantine in the cases of the Councils of Arles I. and Nice (Euseb. II. E. x. 5, and V. Constant. iv. 6-9, &c.); and is bitterly complained of, somewhat later, by Ammiannus Marcellinus (Hist. xxi. fin.), as interfering with the public system of conveyance to the detriment of public business and convenience; while pope Liberius endeavoured to obtain a council from the emperor by (among other motives) offering that the bishops would waive the privilege end travel at their own expense (Sozomen, iv. 11). Of the latter we read at the Council of Ariminum, A.D. 359, where only three of the British bishops accepted it, the others, with the bishops of Gaul and Aquitaine, declaiming it as interfering with their independence (Sulp. Sev. ii. 55).

V. The ceremonial of a council is described in respect to a provincial council, by an order of Conc. Tolet. IV. A.D. 633, can. 4, quoted and abridged, but not quite accurately, by Hefele (I. 65, Engl. Tr.), thus:—"Before sunset on the day appointed, all those who are in the church must come out; and all the doors must be shut, except the one by which the bishops enter; and at this door all the ostiarii will station themselves. The bishops will then come, and take their places according to the times of their ordination. When they have taken their places, the elected priests, and after them the deacons, [probabilis, quos ordo poposcerit interesse,] will come in their turn to take their places. The priests sit behind the bishops, the deacons [stand] in front, and all are arranged in the form of a circle. Last of all, those hitherto are introduced, whom the Council by their election have judged worthy of the favour. The notaries, who are necessary, are also introduced. [And the doors are barrel.] All keep silence. [And the archdeacon says, Orate, all prostrate themselves upon the ground. After several moments, one of the oldest bishops rises and recites a prayer in a loud voice, during which all the rest remain upon their knees. The prayer having been recited, all answer, Amen; and they rise when the archdeacon says, Excipite ros. While all keep silent, a deacon, clad in a white alb, brings into the midst the book of the canons, and reads the rules for the holding of councils. When this is ended, the metropolitan gives an address, and calls on those present to bring forward their complaints, if a priest, a deacon, or a layman, has any com-which authorities, not so much with a view to give account of their constructions, and bids ep. hebiomadas" to be the office of such as to promulgate to the provincial synods and session, in Conc. Tolet. also Conc. of Chalcedon, nearly contemporary affairs, can. 6, v. 11, that a diocesan synod months after the proposals and presbyters synod, sometimes to Conc. Os. cas. A.D. A.D. 578, can. 7, for were at that time out Lent. In each of St. Cyril, synods had been held whenever eccl. synods were in Africa was con. Antitersanum. But during attendance was attempt remedied, by mention mentioned Epist. 3) also orders Gaul. And Leo the bishops to attend by such synods annually circumstances must regular synods imple, A.D. 506, can. 71. rule. But the 2nd 20, made it triennial to omnes conveniant") the Tridentine rule in Palatinus were at first emperors summoned and, A.D. 755, called wide in the year; but fined irregular. And 7, asking for a pilto-asked also for a pilto-2 years. Hincmar, a year as customary scilicet erant," speaking of ails were parts of the Church, even the ed up with ecclesiastical of them that were needed at regular Conc. Carth. III. ecclesiastics, que ad veterascunt," although restricted to cases of kinds of councils were for special emergencies, when needed. Of the merged (eg. by Hefele) councils, setting aside medieval times, as eg. pope, &c., there remain one, which is both upon which the great are actually summoned. Apostolical canon (37) ἀποστολικῶν κανόνων Sozomen, and Sozomen. At Constantinople, A.D. 381, the successive presidents were Meletius of Antioch (no higher patriarch being at first present), and on his death, Gregory of Nazianzum until his resignation, and then Nectarius, patriarchs of Constantinople. At Ephesus, A.D. 431, Caudilianus, "comes sacrorum domesticorum," was the commissioner of the Emperor Theodosius; but every one, "unless he was a bishop," was strictly forbidden by the emperor to intermeddle with the council. At Chalcedon, A.D. 451, the emperor's legates, presided ecclesiastically, Caudilian at Chalcedon the limits of imperial interference were less exactly kept. Paschasinus, bishop of Libyaenum, the pope's legate, is repeatedly said to have presided, and signs first, and as "synodo præsidiens." But Marcian, in person, presided over the sixth session, proposed the questions, and conducted the business. And his commissioners, generally, "had the place of honour in the midst before the altar-rails, are first named in the minutes, took the votes, arranged the order of the business, and closed the sessions" (Hefele, from the Acts). At Constantinople, A.D. 553, neither Justinian nor Pope Vigilius took a personal part, the latter expressly refusing to join in it; and the actual president was Eutychius of Constantinople. In A.D. 680, Constantine Pogonatus interfered even more than Marcian in 451; and he is moreover expressly called the president. But the papal legates sign first, and Constantine only at the end of the episcopal signatures, and with the phrase, "Legimus et consentimus." At Nice, in A.D. 787, Tarasius of Constantinople really conducted the business of the council, but the papal legates sign before him; and the Empress Irene and her son were present as honorary presidents in the eighth and last session, but signed finally after the signatures of the bishops. Lastly, in A.D. 869, the papal legates with the Patriarch of Constantinople and the representatives of the other patriarchs, were practically the presidents; but the legates alone are expressly so called; while in the sixth and following sessions the Emperor Basil and his two sons acted as presidents and are so called, although refusing to sign except after the legates and patriarchs more mentioned. Of other synods, Hosius presided at Sardica, A.D. 347 (St. Athanas. Hist. Arian., Sozom., ii. 12, Theodoret, H. E. li. 15, and the Acts themselves), the two presbyter-legates of Pope Julius signing after him, and then the Bishop of Sardica itself. At the Latrocinium of Ephesus, A.D. 449, the Emperor Theodosius gave the presidency to Dioscorus of Alexandria, after refusing it to the papal legates. It should be added, that objection was taken to the emperor's even sending a commissioner to the Council of Tyre, A.D. 335 (St. Athanas. Apology, c. Arian. vii.); and that the Council of Constantinople, A.D. 869, ruled that the emperor not only need not but ought not to intervene in provincial synods, &c., but only in such as were oecumenical. But kings were present continually even in provincial synods in the West; as e.g. at Toledo IV. and V., A.D. 633 and 636, at the legate councils in England, A.D. 787, in Gaul continually, and at Frankfort A.D. 794. And the king's commissioners were at the councils of Toledo VIII. and IX., A.D. 653, 655. The remonstrance of Pope Julius to the Eastern bishops respecting the Council of Antioch, A.D. 341—that μη δει παρη γινωσκειν του ερισθεντος Ρωμης κανονισμους τας εκκλησιας (Sozom. ii. 13, Sozom. iii. 9)—might obviously have been made by any of the patriarchs, the church not being truly represented if any chief bishop were passed over; and reads rather like a claim, which its maker felt it necessary to press, there being no doubt about the like right of the older and Eastern patriarchs. The second Council of Nice, A.D. 787, requires all the patriarchs (or their legates) for a really oecumenical council (Labb. vii. 396).

VII. The order of Precedence, and of Signatures, in a council, which commonly went together, followed ordinarily, in respect to Bishops, the rule of priority of consecration (as e.g. in Africa, Cod. Civ. Afric. 86, Conc. Ailiev. cans. 13, 14; in Italy and Gaul, Greg. M. Epist. vii. 112 [to Syngilus, Bishop of Autun], and so also in Spain, Conc. Bracar. l. A.D. 563, can. 6, and Conc. Tolet. IV., A.D. 634, c. 3, and [as may be seen in the signatures to charters] in England—see Conc. of Hertford, A.D. 673, can. 8; and Conc. London. A.D. 1010, in Wilk. l. 363). Here and there, however, custom gave precedence to a particular see, as in England latterly to London, Durham, Winchester. And in an oecumenical council, or indeed wherever present, the bishops of the chief sees, who in due time became patriarchs, took precedence of all others; the order being fixed by the council in Trullo, A.D. 692, as 1. Rome, 2. Constantinople, 3. Alexandria, 4. Antioch, 5. Jerusalem; the preceding general councils of Constantinople (cans. 3) and Chalcedon (can. 28), having raised Constantinople from a subordinate place to have "equal honours" with Rome, but to count as second (so also Justinian, Novel. cxxi. c. 2). Ephesus and Caesarea, as patriarchates in a secondary sense, followed the chief patriarchs; as e.g. in the 4th and 6th oecumenical councils. Chorepiscopi, so long as that office existed as an episcopal office, either in east or west—and again the titular and monastic bishops of the 6th and following centuries (mainly in north-western Europe)—counted in a council as bishops. If priests or deacons were present as vicars or legates of their respective bishops, they signed, in the East, in the order in which their own bishop would have signed, had he been present; in the West, usually after all the bishops present. In the 1st council of Arles, however, the priests and deacons, whom each bishop had been desired to bring with him, signed immediately after their own bishop; and the Pope's legates signed after several of the bishops. In France and England, and in the case of the archbishops in Eastern councils, the abbots, although laymen, signed between the bishops and priests (if any signatures occur of the last named). In Spain, as laymen, they signed at first after the priests, but afterwards (becoming probably in many instances priests themselves) they signed, as elsewhere, after the bishops and before the priests. Of lay signatures, the emperor in the great oecumenical councils signed after all the bishops, except in A.D. 869, when the emperor and his sons signed after the great patriarchs but before all the other bishops. Imperial commissioners also took precedence, in the council itself, immediately after the patriarchs or their representatives, but did not sign the acts at all. In the mixed European synods, lay signatures also occur. In England we have in order—king, archbishop, bishops, dukes, abbots, nobles, presbyters, ministri; sometimes abbesses also; but, of course, in mixed synods or rather witenagemots only; and all this, not in the same order always, for sometimes not only presbyters but deacons sign before the nobles, and abbots follow the presbyters. At Clovesho, A.D. 803, the bishop, abbots, and presbyters of each diocese sign together, and in one case (that of Canterbury) an archdeacon also. The list of those present at the 1st Council of Arles, A.D. 314, as has been said, follows a like order. At Nice the signatures, so far as they are preserved, are of name and see simply. At the Council of Ephesus, A.D. 431, and thenceforward, the custom began of adding "gratia Christi," or "Dei miseratione," or "in Christi nomine," and also of adding to the name such epithets as minimus, peccator, indignus, humilis, &c. The sees are omitted commonly, but not always, in Anglo-Saxon, in Frank, and in Spanish councils. The chief exceptions in England are the Councils of Calceyth, A.D. 787, and Clovesho, A.D. 803, where the sees are certainly given. They occur, however, more often in France. But as the lists are commonly copies, the scribes are as likely as not to have added the sees in some instances, although this is clearly not the case in many. The addition of "deimons (episcopi) subscripsi," belonged to bishops as such, and very often occurs, as e.g. Conc. Chalced. A.D. 451, from the 5th century; "consentiens subscripsi," or "consenti et subscripsi," or "subscripsi" simply, being the form for others as well as bishops. The Saxon "pompasitas" varied the form in endless ways, as may be seen in Kemble's Codex Diplomaticus. "Pronuntians cum sancta synodo," also occurs in the Council of Ephesus, A.D. 431.

VIII. The votes were taken no doubt by heads, from the beginning. The plan of voting by nations, the vote of each nation being determined by the majority of individual votes within the nation itself, was a device as late as the Council of Constance, intended to prevent the swamping of the council by Italian bishops, and was abandoned again after the Council of Basle. The distinction between voti decisi and voti consultativa, the former alone counting in the formal decisions of the council, is of modern date also, so far as the terms are concerned; but the presence at councils of individuals, and of classes of persons, for consultation but without a vote, is of very early origin (see below under B), and indeed may be most probably said to date from Apostolic times.

IX. Lastly, councils were confirmed, in the case of the Oecumenical Councils, and so as to give their decrees the force of law, by the emperors; although, in foro conscientie, St. Athanasius's dictum holds good,—πότε γὰρ ἐκ τοῦ αἰῶνος ἠκολούθη ταυτά; πότε κρείσσι ἐκκλησίαις παρὰ βασιλέως ἔρχε τὸ κύριος; (Hist. Arian. ad Monach. § 52, Opp. i. 376). The decrees of the Nicene Council were enforced as laws of the empire by Constantine (Euseb. V. Constant. iii. 17-19; Soer. i. 9; Gelas. Cyzic. ii. 36, in Mansi, li. 919). Subscription to its creed was enforced on pain of exile (Soer. i. 9; Rufin, H. E. i. 5). That of Constantinople, in A.D. 381, requested and obtained the legal confirmation of Theodosius the Great (July 30, A.D. 381, Col. Theod. xvi. l. 3). Theodosius II., after much hesitation, confirmed the principal decision of the Council of Ephesus, A.D. 431 (Hefele, by exiling Nestorius and ordering Nestorian writings to be burnt (Mansi, v. 255, 413, 920). Marcian's edicts are extant of February 7, March 17, July 6 and 28, A.D. 452, which confirm the decrees of the Council of Chalcedon of A.D. 451. The next four councils (in the Latin reckoning) of A.D. 553, 680, 787, 869, were either signed, or (as in the 6th and 8th) also enforced by an edict, by the emperors who respectively summoned them. Councils also were commonly held in the various provinces to accept the decrees of a General Council. And in this way the sanction of the bishops of Rome was given after some delay to the second council of Constantinople, A.D. 381. Nothing is said of the pope in relation to the great Council of Nice, except by documents of a date and nature such as to make them worthless (Hefele makes the best of them, but his own statements are the best refutation of his conclusion). Leo the Great refused to assent to the decree of Chalcedon respecting the patriarch of Constantinople, while accepting the rest. And both that council (ap. Leon. M. Epist. lxxvii) and Marcian (ib. Epist. cx.) recognize in terms the necessity of obtaining the pope's confirmation; although with special reference to the canon affecting the dignity of the see of Rome. Yet, in A.D. 553, Justinian compelled the submission of pope Vigilius to the Council of Constantinople. And the canons of the Trullan Council, in A.D. 692, were in like manner forced by the emperor upon pope Sergius. The General Councils, so called, of A.D. 680, 787, and 869, sought and received the papal confirmation. For the legal authority attached at various periods to the canons of either oecumenical or provincial councils, see CANON LAW. The "Canones Patrum," i.e., probably the collection of Dionysius Exiguus, were brought forward by Theodore, and certain canons selected from them accepted as specially needed for the English Church, at the Council of Hereford, A.D. 673 (Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 119). Charlemagne, in his Capitularies, dealt with ecclesiastical laws as well as civil, but consulted pope Adrian, and obtained a sort of enlarged Codex Cumanus from him, A.D. 774; as Pipin had done before him, A.D. 747, with pope Zacharias. But the royal authority gave legal force to these laws—"a vestra auctoritate firmitur" (Conc. Yngunt. A.D. 813, in Præf.); and so repeatedly; as indeed had been the case with Frank and Burgundian kings, &c., before Pipin also.

The Council of Calceyth, A.D. 816, can. 9, enacts that a copy of decrees of councils should be taken by each bishop, with date and names of archbishop and bishops present; and that another copy should be given to any one affected by the decree.

B. Such being (so to say) the externals of a council, the next question relates to its CONSTITUENT MEMBERS.

I. To speak first of provincial councils, there can be no question that bishops were essentially their members. The Apostolic Canon (37) speaks of ἐπίσκοποι τῶν

Nice, of πᾶτων &c.; and similar can. 20, and the describes also such κατανομήματα;
of the kind (that of those of Hierapoli ism, and those he respectively in the of the 2nd century mentioning (yet cluding) any one Euseb. v. 16, 24).
73), St. Hilary ( Epist. 32, "audi St. Jerome (Apo Moreover, from others were com under penalties absence, or even f present in them case of non-res Conc. Laodic. c. A 451, can. 19; Agy
ii. A.D. 529, Pref
Ancel. ii. A.D. 8 335, can. 1; Tur
ri. A.D. 696, can 15; see also Leo Greg. M. Epist. deacons as repres the 3rd century, (Acts xv.), it bec also took part in propositi," Firmi for Asia; St. Cy Euseb. H. E. vii. 2 that condemned P 365, for Syria; an the Arabian synod to the Council o twenty-six or twen the bishops. In t bishop was direct him, and some br of Roman councils 721) contained al the bishops, and i them (Bingh. ii. x alled, as e.g. unde 1288). "Gregorius
Petri corpore, cum Ecclesiae presbyte onis et cuncte cl
A.D. 387, 389, 401
stantinople, A.D. 44
the order of holdi Conc. Tol. iv. A English "ordo," al provide for the p are present also Clovesho, A.D. 803
subscribe at Lyons several councils of were present, but however, subscrib stantinople, A.D. 38
it must be added, 1 (and deacons) were to speak of such a personal eminence a CHRIST AST.

of ἐκθροῖσι τῶν Ἐπισκόπων; the 5th canon of Nice, of πάντων τῶν Ἐπισκόπων τῆς ἐπαρχίας, &c.; and similarly Conc. Antioch. A.D. 341, can. 20, and the 29th canon of Chalcedon, which describes also such συνδοίαι τῶν Ἐπισκόπων as ἐκαστονομίαται; and the earliest known synods of the kind (the earliest intell. of any kind), those of Hierapolis and Anchiolus against Montanism, and those held by Polycentus about Easter, respectively in the middle and towards the end of the 2nd century, consisted of bishops, without mentioning (yet certainly without in terms excluding) any one else (Libellus Synodicus, and Euseb. v. 16, 24). See also St. Cyprian (Epist. 73), St. Hilary (De Syn. Proem.), St. Ambrose (Epist. 32, "audiant [presbyteri] cum populo"), St. Jerome (Apol. c. Rufin. lib. II.), &c. &c. Moreover, from early times bishops but no others were compelled to attend such synods, under penalties (suspension for a year) for absence, or even for coming late; and the being present in them was a recognized and allowed cause of non-residence in their dioceses: e.g. Conc. Laodic. c. A.D. 365, can. 40; Chalced. A.D. 451, can. 19; Ayath. A.D. 508, can. 35; Yasens. II. A.D. 529, Pref.; Turracon. A.D. 516, can. 6; Arel. II. A.D. 533, can. 1; Arvern. I. A.D. 535, can. 1; Turon. II. A.D. 567, can. 1; Emend. A.D. 606, can. 7; Tolet. XI. A.D. 675, can. 15; see also Leo M. Epist. vi. A.D. 444; and Greg. M. Epist. I. 54 (allowing presbyters or deacons as representatives, if unavoidable). In the 3rd century, however, as in Apostolic times (Acts xv.), it becomes evident that presbyters also took part in such councils ("seniores et prespositi," Firmilian, as before quoted, speaking for Asia; St. Cyprian repeatedly for Africa; Euseb. H.E. vii. 28, of the Council of Antioch that condemned Paul of Samosata in A.D. 264 or 265, for Syria; and the case of Origen, again, at the Arabian synods respecting Beryllus; &c.). In the Council of Elvira (A.D. 305, Hefele) twenty-six or twenty-four presbyters "sat with" the bishops. In that of Arles I., A.D. 314, each bishop was directed to bring two presbyters with him, and some brought deacons also. A series of Roman councils (A.D. 461, 487, 499, 502, 715, 721) contained also presbyters, "sitting with" the bishops, and in two cases "subscribing" with them (Bligh. II. xix. 12); and others might be added, as e.g. under Gregory the Great (Opp. II. 1288), "Gregorius Papa coram sanctissimo beati Petri corpore, cum episcopis omnibus ac Romanae Ecclesiae presbyteris residens, adstantibus diaconis et cuncto clero." So again at Carthage, A.D. 387, 389, 401; at Toledo, A.D. 400; at Constantinople, A.D. 443; at Braga, II. A.D. 572; and the order of holding a council given above from Conc. Tol. IV. A.D. 633, as well as the later English "ordo," also above mentioned, expressly provide for the presence of presbyters. They are present also at Calcheth, A.D. 787, and Clvesno, A.D. 803. And later still, presbyters subscribe at Lyons, A.D. 830. At the oecumenical councils of Ephesus and Chalcedon they were present, but did not subscribe. Three, however, subscribe in their own names at Constantinople, A.D. 381 (Labb. II. 957). But then (and deacons) were sometimes specially invited to speak at such councils on account of their personal eminence and talents: as, e.g. Malchion, the priest of Antioch, in the council that condemned Paul of Samosata (Euseb. H. E. vii. 29); and Origen at the Arabian synods that condemned Beryllus; and Barsumas the Archimandrite at the Labro-inium of Ephesus, invited by the emperor Theodosius II.; and St. Athanasius the deacon at Nice; and Wilfrid, still a presbyter, at Whitby. 2. That priests as well as deacons, καὶ πάντας τοὺς ἡδικοῦσθαι νομίζοντας, i.e., laymen also, are bid to be present at such synods in order to bring forward complaints and obtain justice (Conc. Antioch. A.D. 341, can. 20, and so also in the "ordo" above quoted from Conc. Tolet. of A.D. 633). 3. That St. Cyprian, for instance, speaks of bishops only as the members of the synod, and this where presbyters had been present (Hefele), and of presbyters as "compresbyteri qui nobis assistebant;" while bishops only voted in the African council of A.D. 256. 4. That in Conc. Constantin. A.D. 448, while the bishops signed with the formula ὄπτας ὑρέγραφα, the archimandrites omit the ὄπτας in their signatures. 5. That, having regard to the judicial functions of such councils, it seems impossible to suppose that any beside bishops could have been appointed judges of bishops. On the whole, then—setting aside the well known practice whereby priests (or deacons) signed and voted with the bishops as representatives or vicars of their own (absent) bishops, and reserving also the case of abbats—it would seem that bishops were the proper, ordinary, and essential members of a provincial council; but that the presbyters as a body were consulted, as of right, down to certainly the 3rd century, and not only continued to be present, but were admitted to subscribe in several instances in later centuries; but that it must remain doubtful whether they ever actually voted in a division, and that the apparent inference from the evidence is rather against than for their having done so. The presence of the metropolitan in a provincial synod, as above said, was necessary to render it a "perfect" synod. On the other hand, the metropolitan could not act, except of course in the exercise of his ordinary functions, apart from his provincial synod. Choropsis epi., during the 4th century in the east, and during the 9th in the west, in France, and the monastic and titular bishops of north-western Europe from the 6th century onwards, were treated as bishops. But besides presbyters, deacons and laymen likewise took part in such synods. The usual phrase, both in St. Cyprian and in the Roman councils under Symmachus &c. just mentioned, is, "adstantibus diaconis, cum stantium plebe" (= with the laity who had not lapsed, but were in full communion); and in those Roman councils deacons subscribe, and in the same form with the bishops and presbyters; and St. Cyprian repeatedly states that he did nothing as bishop without consulting all his clergy and laity too; and the order of a council, drawn up at Toledo, A.D. 633, specifying "invited deacons" and "chosen laymen," shows that these were not supposed to come merely to bring forward complaints, but to join in consultation. "Considentibus presbyteris, adstantibus diaconis cum universo clero," is the common phrase respecting councils of 5th century onwards, but without mention of laity as a rule. There were laymen, however, at Toledo, A.D. 653, as those er. I. 9; Rufin, H. E. le, in A.D. 381, re- gal confirmation of 30, A.D. 381. Col. s. 11., after much principal decision of A.D. 431 (Hefele), by Nestorian writings 5, 413, 920). March 7, March 1, which confirm the Chalcedon of A.D. 451, the Latin reckoning) were either signed, or enforced by an edict, respectively summoned a commonly held in cept the decrees of a this way the sanction was given after some of Constantinople, A.D. pope in relation to the pt. by documents of a make them worthless of them, but his con- tation of his council used to assent to the ting the patriarch of cepting the rest. An son. M. Epist. lxxxix.) recognize in terms the pope's confirma- tional reference to the o of the see of Rome, n compelled the sub- to the Council of Con- onens of the Trulla in like manner forced Sergius. The General 2, 680, 787, and 800, the papal confirmation, attached at various either oecumenical or CANON LAW. The probably the collection brought forward by ones selected from them eld for the English of Hertford, A.D. 673 119). Charlemagne, nit with ecclesiastical consulted pope Adrian, enlarged Codex Canonum Pipin had done before e Zacharias. But the al force to these laws- "Merimentur" (Can. Me- mentur"; and so repeatedly); case with Frank and before Pipin also.

CHRIST ANT,

lyth, A.D. 816, can. 9, rees of councils should with date and names of s present; and that given to any one affected) the externals of a n relates to its CONSTI- orinical councils, there bish ps were essentially ostolic Canon (37) speak om Edward I., for taxoper episcopali synod e convention of clergy d account of this in y, art. Conventions), and, as in France and al synod was (at any t from the Witenage, when held at the same assin, II. iii. c. 47, § 1; e councils of Hertford eodore were of bishops with votes. It is not nd laity also in purely ngland.

remains. And here we mandrites, being pres-
at the council of
In the West, it is mour, that St. Benedict, ed by St. Gregory the an council. But from in Spain, and a little rned a regular portion the former country at time before the priests, ce. In England they ometimes abbesses also y is a merely excepg), but it is either in ods [ABBAT, AMUS], gatic councils of Cal-a, which are signed by as well as bishops. So bishops, abbats, prest order, but by dias, iii. 546, 547). A.D. d a blunder Dunstan in s them on an equivarg of addressing synods; me time and place with er times they sat and did, and are ruled to e councils of Basle and members of a diocesan o and Presbyters, the deacon to attend such s were bound to not; but deacons and ght to be present and their actual right to a e is questionable at all ted, was certainly lost centuries, in Europe, d with the presbyters. presbyters was indeed ncil [BISHOP, PRIEST]

e.g. Pius I. Epist. II.; S. Ignatius passim; S. acuit contrari presbyomnium statureretur," in statuerem . . . nihil of the clergy], et sine vata sententia gerere," ; and so at Ephesus, at nation of Origen and of Novatina (Bligh, II. in condemning Jovinian er times, Conc. Oecum.
v. A.D. 743 [Labb. vi.
an. 4; Ferr. A.D. 755, can. 8; Arelat. vi. A.D. 813, can. 4; Capit. Theodulph. c. 4; Laws of Northumbrian Priests, 44; Edgar's Canons, 3-6. Abbats were also summoned, and a journey to the synod was an allowable canon of absence from their monasteries [ABBAT]. Theodore enacts that no bishop shall compel them to come (Penitent. II. ii. 3). In the Landaff synods (Lib. Landav., and extracts in Haddan and Stubbs, vol. i.), the bishop, the three great abbats of the diocese, and the presbyters (in one case, "electi"), the deacons, and all the clerici, form the synod. But Spanish and Frank councils, above quoted, require the attendance of abbats. Laity and deacons were obviously present and were consulted as a body both in St. Cypryan's time and later. Bishop Sage, who argues most strongly for the negative, is plainly arguing against facts. But there is always a distinction drawn, even by St. Cypryan, between the consilium of the clergy and the consensus of the plebs (see Moberly's Dampton Lectures, pp. 119, 305). The gradual changes, no doubt, which are found in respect to the people's interest in the election of Bishops [BISHOPS], affected also their position in councils called for other than elective purposes.

III. Of Oecumenical Councils, as of provincial ones, bishops were clearly the proper and essential members; yet here too presbyters and even deacons were sometimes present. At Nice, in A.D. 325, presbyters and deacons were present, and in great numbers; and one deacon certainly, St. Athanasius, spoke; but there is no trace or probability of their having voted. At Constantinople, A.D. 381, three presbyters occur among the signatures, signing to all appearance in their own names, and intermixed with the bishops of the province from which they came. But there are many other signatures in the list of presbyters signing as representatives of bishops. And since the list as it stands is the work of a copyist, it is quite as likely as not that these three also represented bishops, but that the few words at the end of each name indicating the fact have been accidentally omitted. At Constantinople, in A.D. 448, presbyter-archimandrites sign exactly as if they had also voted; and this council, although itself not oecumenical, is embodied in that of Chalcedon, A.D. 451. At Chalcedon itself one presbyter is noted to have spoken; and at the 2nd of Nice, A.D. 787, one presbyter signs, apparently in his own name (Bligh, II. xix. 13, from Habert). But exceptions of this kind seem rather to prove the rule, viz. that bishops, and bishops only, each as representing his own church, were the members of Oecumenical Councils.

C. The AUTHORITY assigned to Oecumenical Councils was hardly made the subject of formal and systematic treatment, until the end of the great period of councils, viz. of the 4th century, it was then limited in three ways. 1. Their decrees were not unalterable, in matters of discipline, by a further council; and required external obedience but nothing more, as being those of the highest church tribunal. 2. Their office, doctrinally, was not to enlarge the faith, but simply to testify in express and distinct terms to that which had been held implicitly before. "Quid nunquam aliud conciliorum decretis enisa est [Ecclesia], nisi ut quod antea simpliciter crederetur, hoc idem postea diligenter crederetur;" and again, "nisi ut quod prius a majoribus sola traditione susceperat, hoc deinde posteris etiam per scripturæ chirographum consignaret . . . non novum fidei sensum novæ appellationis pro-xiii.); and this, so as to be a "selula et cauta depositorum apud se dogmatum custos," without any the least change in them, of any kind whatsoever, whether of diminution or addition (Id. ib.). 3. They were not held to be formally infallible, but to possess an authority proportioned to their universality, to be capable of being amended by subsequent councils upon better information, and to be subordinata to Scripture. Of that which is certainly written in the Bible, says St. Augustin, speaking of a doctrinal question, "omnino dubitari et disceptari non possit utrum verum vel utrum rectum sit," but councils may set aside Episcopal dicta [St. Cypryan is the bishop specially intended], and national or provincial councils must "plenariorum conciliorum auctoritati, quæ fiunt ex universo orbe Christiano, sine ullis ambagibus cedere: ipsaque plenaria sæpe priora posterioribus emendari, cum aliquo experimento rerum aperitur quod clausum erat, et cognoscitur quod latebat" (St. Aug. De Bapt. c. Donat. II. 3, § 4). And again, in Epist. 54, the same St. Augustin, setting canonical Scripture first, places next in order universal customs, "non scripta sed tradita," which must be assumed to have been enacted "vel ab ipsis Apostolis, vel plenioris conciliiis, quorum est in Ecclesia saluberrima auctoritas," instancing the observance of Good Friday, Easter Day, Ascension Day, Pentecost; and then, below these, mere national and local customs. Again, in arguing against Maximin the Arian, St. Augustin confines the decision to Scripture testimonies, bidding his opponent waive the Council of Ariminiun, as he himself waives the "prejudication" of that of Nice. So again, St. Gregory the Great, saying repeatedly that he "quatuor Concilia suscipere et venerari sicut sancti Evangelii quatuor libros," and that "quintum quoque Concilium" (the last held up to his time) "pariter venerari" (Epist. i. 25; and see also, lib. 10, iv. 38, v. 51, 54), proceeds to allege as his ground for doing so, that they were "universali constituta consensu." St. Augustin indeed seems to consider the decision of a "plenary council" to be final, in a matter of discipline, because it is the highest attainable—"ultimum iudicium Ecclesie" (Epist. 43, Ad Glor. et Eleus.); and refers the Donatists to such a council, as the remedy which "adhuc restabat," to revise, and if needful reverse, the sentence already delivered by the bishops at Rome under the pope. The well-known passage in St. Greg. Naz. (Epist. ad Procop. iv.), denouncing synods of bishops as doing more harm than good, through ambition and lust of contention, is simply an argument from the abuse of a thing against its use; yet proves certainly, that a council per se and a priori was not held to be infallible. On the other hand, besides the general phrase commonly prefixed to councils, "Sancto Spiritu suggerente," and the like, we find Socrates (I. 9) declaring that the Nicene fathers οὐδαμῶς ἀπο-χρησάσθαι τῆς ἀληθείας ἐδύναστο, because they were enlightened ὄρω τοῦ Θεοῦ καὶ τῆς χάριτος τοῦ Ἁγίου Πνεύματος; and St. Cyril (De Trin. I.) calling their decrees a Divine oracle (and so others, as e.g. Ild. Pelus. iv. 99, θεόθεν ἐμπνευσθεῖρα); and St. Ambrose, declaring that "neither death nor the sword could separate him from the Nicene Council" (Epist. xxi.); and Leo the Great declaring repeatedly, that the faith of Nice and Chalcedon is a first principle, from which neither himself nor any one else may swerve (Epist. cv. cxiv. &c. A.D. 452, 453). While Justinian, who ordered all bishops to subscribe to the faith of the first four councils, lays down in his Novels (cxxx.), that τῶν προειρημένων ἁγίων συνόδων (viz. the four) τὰ δόγματα καθάπερ τῶν Θείας Γραφῶν δεχόμεθα, καὶ τοὺς κανόνας ὡς νόμους φυλάττομεν. The Council of Chalcedon again speaks of the Nicene decrees as unalterable. And Leo the Great speaks of the faith of Chalcedon itself as an "irretractabilis consensus." And St. Ambrose, of the decrees of general councils as "hereditary seals which no rashness may break" (De Fid. III. 15). In short, while no one asserts that such councils were formally incapable of erring, the entire current of church teaching assumed that they had not erred; and that it would be the height of presumption and of folly in any part of the church or any individual Christian to contravene them; while both Vincent of Lerins, and possibly Augustin, would allow to a succeeding council power only to build doctrinally upon the foundation already laid by its accepted predecessors. The Provincial Councils "began," by ventilating the question; the General Council "terminated" the discussion, by sealing us it were and formally expressing the decision which had ripened to its proper and natural close; and this, on the assumption that such decision was accepted "universalis Ecclesie consensus" ("In Catholico regionali concilio coopta, plenarie terminata," and so "universalis Ecclesie consensus corroborata," St. Aug. De Bapt. c. Donat. vii. 35). And St. Vincent of Lerins, in requiring to anything "vere proprieque Catholicum," that "ubique, semper, ab omnibus, creditum est" (Commonit. c. 2), obviously rests the certainty of conciliar decisions upon the acceptance, implicitly or explicitly, of the whole church of all times (see Hammond on Heres., sect. vi. § 9, sq.); but refuses to allow that any question so decided can be re-opened.

The relative authority of the pope and of a general council, did not emerge into a formal question until long after our period; although St. Augustin's language about Pope Melchisedes, and about the dicta of St. Cyprian, sufficiently shows what at any rate his decision would have been, had it been possible that the question could have been raised at that time.

Whether Provincial Councils could entertain questions of doctrine, is also a question not formally put until very late times indeed. That they did so in point of fact in earlier times, may be seen in a list of instances in Palmer, On the Church, IV. xlii. 1 § 2. And upon St. Augustin's view above quoted, it was their proper office to ventilate such questions, and as it were ripen them for the final determination of the Oecumenical Council. Their authority, of course, like that of diocesan synods, was in proportion to their numbers and character, and to their subsequent acceptance by the Church at large.

The Church, speaking generally, has accepted absolutely the first six Oecumenical Councils,—of Nice, A.D. 321; Constantinople, A.D. 381; Ephesus, A.D. 431; Chalcedon, A.D. 451; Constantinople, A.D. 553; Constantinople again, A.D. 680. Where the first four are spoken of especially, it is, commonly, either in order to parallel them with the four Gospels (as e.g. St. Gregory the Great, who adds that he equally venerates the 5th, the last then held), or because the Fathers or others who speak of them lived before the 5th was held (e.g. Theodosius Coenobiarca, in Baron. in an. 511, no. 33, from St. Cyril and Suidas,—Si quis quatuor sanctas synodos non tanti esse existimat quanti quatuor evangelia, sit anathema), or, lastly, because the 5th and 6th are taken to be as it were supplementary to the 3rd and 4th. So Conc. Lateran. A.D. 649, cans. 18, 19, accept the five councils already then held, as being all there were. The Greek and Roman Churches accept a 7th, viz. the Council of Nice in favour of images, A.D. 787 (rejected by the Western Council at Frankfurt, A.D. 794, and by the English Church of the same date;—see Haldan and Stubbs, III. 468, 481); the Greek Church, however, fluctuating considerably in the point, accepting it A.D. 842, when the Κοπιακὸς τῆς Ὀρθοδοξίας was appointed to celebrate the seven Oecumenical Councils, yet still hesitating in A.D. 863, but finally recognizing it in A.D. 879 (see Palmer, On the Church, P. IV. c. x. § 4). Pope Adrian accepted it. The previous Iconoclast Council of Constantinople, A.D. 754, is called the 8th Oecumenical by Cave, who counts the Trullan or Quinisext Council of A.D. 692 as the 7th. An 8th Oecumenical, viz. of A.D. 869, at Constantinople, which deposed Photius, is accepted as the next by Roman Theologians. That of A.D. 879, which restored him, is called the 8th by most of those of the East (Cave). The subsequent Western (so called) Oecumenical Councils do not fall within the scope of the present work. It is to be observed, however, that even in the 9th century, popes still spoke of the six General Councils, as e.g. Nicholas I., A.D. 859, and A.D. 863 or 869; Adrian I., A.D. 871 (see Palmer as above). The English Church accepted the first five, and also the canons of the Lateran Council of A.D. 649, respecting the Monothelites, which likewise accepted the five; and declared her own orthodoxy about Monothelism with a view to the 6th General Council of Hatfield, A.D. 680 (Haldan and Stubbs III. 141, sq.). And Wilfrid had similarly professed orthodoxy in reference to Monothelite views at Rome itself in the same year, on behalf of English, Scots, and Picts (ib. 140). The legate Councils of Calcehyth and in Northumbria, A.D. 787, accepted the six General Councils (can. I. ib. 448). The canons of Aelfric, A.D. 957, accept the first four, as "the four books of Christ," and as having extinguished heresy, but add that "many synods had been held since, but these were the chief" (can. 33, Wilk. I. 254). The seventh General Council so called, of A.D. 787, was, as above said, not accepted by the English Church.

As a judicial body, the Provincial Council was at first the ultimate tribunal. An appeal from it to a larger council gradually became recognized; as at Conc. Antioch. A.D. 341. The appeal to the Patriarch of Constantinople, or to the Patriarch of Rome, was of later date still cases, that the same to intrude are determined, and seven.

For the other in the election of D. OF IRR.

be said. And

l. The σ

Constantinop

expressly so c

read from a πολιτων Ἐπι

the Patriarch happened at Justinian, al bishops comin emperor's com

lib. i. leg. 42),

played such constituted th

patriarchs su

Concilia Pat

both bishops of king or em

nots on the E the "synod" o parate assembl

from the "ple

at Conc. Liptin consisting of b bats. So also i

A.D. 633 can. 7

Council, espec

about the succ ficial decreet and nobles con vincial Council consisted of time to be us tics occur in

of Calcehyth, A. present as well

France, the rul

Adelhard's Ord

214);—Utraq

reception room

Palatine Council

primo omnes E honorificiores committione con petra multitudo quosque tempo

Rege occurren more solito, Cle constituant curi caliter prepar

separati a ceteris

tate, quando em

prout esse tracta

nive de spirituali etiam committit rescendi vel inv convocare voluisse

in eorum voluntate

his que eis in Rege

III. There occur

cases, as e.g. the C which can hardly sense. But these says that such marriages, though not prohibited by the Divine law, were rare by custom, even when not yet prohibited by the human law; "but who can doubt that in our time the marriages even of cousins were more litly (honestius) prohibited?" And the law is likewise alluded to by Libanius, in his oration on Purveyances (περὶ τῶν ἀγυραίων). A constitution of Arcadius and Honorius, A.D. 396 (Cod. Theod. bk. iii. l. xii. l. 3), confirms the law, assimilating the marriage with a cousin to that with a niece, and declaring that, though the man may retain his fortune during his life, he is not to be considered to have either wife or children, and can neither give nor leave anything to them even through a third person. If there be a dos, it must go to the Imperial exchequer; it cannot be bequeathed to strangers, but must go to the next of kin, except such as may have taken part in or advised the marriage. Another law, of the same emperor, indeed (ib. l. x.), maintains the right of praying for a dispensation (this is a text Bingham has strangely misunderstood), and a third one (A.D. 403), which took its place permanently in Justinian's Code, swept the prohibition away. Professing to "revoke the authority of the old law," it declares the marriage of cousins-german, whether born of two brothers or two sisters, or of a brother and sister, to be lawful, and their issue to be capable of inheriting (Code, bk. v. t. iv. l. 19).

Narrower views, however, prevailed in the West, and in Italy particularly, to that extent that we might almost suppose the Theodosian legislation to have remained unrevoked. In the Formularium of Cassiodorus, under the Ostrogothic King Theodoric (end of 5th century), we find a text implying its subsistence, since it is that of a state privilege legalizing such unions—the 46th Formula of the 2nd part being one "by which a cousin may become a lawful wife." And the "Lex Romana," supposed to represent the laws of the Roman population under the Lombard rule, expressly reckons marriage with a cousin as incestuous (bk. iii. l. 12). Finally, a capitulary of Arubis, Prince of Benevento, who usurped the fief after the death of Desiderius, the last Lombard king (A.D. 374), seems to prohibit—as in the earliest constitution of Arcadius and Honorius on the subject—all donations by a father to his children by such a marriage (c. 8). On the other hand, the Lombard laws themselves exhibit no restraint on cousins' marriages; and it appears clear that, whether the Theodosian legislation in the matter were inspired or not by the clergy, it was by the clergy that its spirit was preserved.

We need not indeed rely as an authority on an alleged decree on consanguinity by Pope Fabian (238-52), to be found in Gratian, allowing marriages within the 5th degree, and leaving those in the 4th undisturbed; nor on one of Pope Julius I. (A.D. 336-52), in the same collection, forbidding marriages within the 7th degree of consanguinity; nor on an alleged canon to the same effect of the 1st Council of Lyons, A.D. 517, to be found in Bouchard (c. 10). But the Council of Agde, in 506, declared incestuous the marriage with an uncle's daughter or any other kinswoman, the parties to remain among the catechumens till they had made amends, although existing marriages were not to be dissolved (c. 61); an injunction repeated by the Council of Epaoche, 517 (c. 30), and substantially by the 3rd Council of Orleans, § 38, and by the Council of Auxerre, 578, which forbid even the marriage of second cousins (c. 31); see also the 3rd Council of Paris, about 557, c. 4, and the 2nd Council of Tours, 567, c. 51. We need, again, lay no stress on an alleged canon without a distinctive number, quoted by Ivo as from the canons of the Council of Orleans, 511, imposing for penance, in respect of such marriages, a twelvemonth's exclusion from church (during which the parties are to feed only on bread, water, and salt, except on Sundays and holidays), abstinence during life, and a prohibition to marry—a regulation savouring altogether of the later Carolingian period.

Pope Gregory the Great (590-603), whilst recognizing that the law of the Church was upon this point in opposition with the civil law, sought to base the prohibition, in part at least, on a physiological reason. In an "exposition of diverse things," in answer to Augustine of Canterbury, which forms the 31st in the 12th book of his collected letters—a most valuable repository of facts as well for the social as for the Church history of the period—he says (c. 5) that "some earthly law in the Roman empire" (he is evidently alluding to the Constitution of Arcadius and Honorius, before referred to) allows marriage between the son and daughter of a brother and sister or of two sisters (or brothers); but "we have learnt by experience that from such a marriage no issue can proceed;" besides that, the "holy law" forbids the uncovering of a kinswoman's nakedness. (See also Bede, Hist. Eccles. l. 27.) A wide experience shows how rash is the former assertion; whilst it is clear that so far from the "holy law" of the Old Testament forbidding generally intermarriage amongst kinsmen, the whole fabric of Jewish society, in its separation from the heathen, in its distinction between the tribes themselves, is based upon it. Cousins' marriages were, however, forbidden some years after Gregory's death, by the 5th Council of Paris, A.D. 615 (c. 14).

In the latter half of the 7th century we find marriage with an uncle's daughter condemned by the Eastern Church itself at the Council of Constantinople in Trullo, 691, and separation of the parties ordered (c. 54). It is remarkable, however, that in the canons of a council held in Britain under Theodore, Archbishop of Canterbury (end of 7th century), it is stated that, "according to the Greeks, it is lawful to marry in the 3rd degree, as it is written in the law—in the 5th, according to the Romans—yet they do not dissolve the marriages when it has taken place" (c. 24, and see also 139), and the Roman rule is enacted in a later canon (108), which would seem to cast a doubt on the genuineness of the Trullan canon, about the middle of the 8th century. The Excerpta, attributed to Egbert of York, make it the rule that marriages are permitted in the 5th degree, the parties not to be separated in the 4th, but to be separated in the 3rd (bk. li. c. 28). Substantially, first cousins' marriage seem for some considerable time, when once solemnized, to have been tolerated. Thus Gregory II. (714-30), in a long letter (Ep. 13) to Boniface, replying to various questions, whilst stating that he allows marriages after the 4th condemn those now repeatedly in the 1st Cou marriages, 721 in his excerpts (c. 11); in the for the first time the guilty party alive or freed ecclesiastical p beaten or sent Arles, 813 (c. 1 same year (c. 5-

We have now ed view on civ consins' marriag With the except whose legislatio viously noticee, we find a prohibi is the Wisigothi as must always Recarole forbid kindred of a fut grandmother, to tracted by perm passing of the h and sent to mon the case of Jew separation the tr (scalping), 100 7, li. c. 8). W enactments advenc the Carolingian king Pepin at Ver requires the disso gree, allowing th to stand good und for the future (c piégre A.D. 757 (effect (cc. 1, 2). the Allamans (t. frid, supposed the what later law indeed thought t Charlemagne—rec sons of brothers quire them to be guilty parties to if they be "meat themselves to beo virgin capitularie confirmed by Chu distinguished from text of some of the tampered with, sin égua capitulari accordance with t Synod of Metz. A collection of the e his cousin, he is meny, but if he is to receive him compound in 60 sol pays. If he be sla well beaten, and hi adit. If he be n see any dignity h to be beaten or sent cc. 9, 10). A capit forbids marriage to

on repeated by the
) and substantially ns, § 38, and by the ich forbid even the (c. 31); see also the 557, c. 4, and the 7, c. 51. We need legal canon without ly lvo as from the eans, 511, imposing uch marriages, a om church (during feed only on bread, ndays and holidays), prohibition to marry together of the later

t (590-603), whilst of the Church was n with the civil law, ion, in part at least,
In an "exposition of to Augustine of Can-st in the 12th book est valuable repertory al as for the Church ays (c. 5) that "some empire" (he is pri-stition of Aroding
d) to allow marriage ater of a brother and brothers); but "we e that from such a ceed;" besides that, the uncovering of a (See also Bede, Hist. ience shows how rash list it is clear that so of the Old Testament marriage amongst kin-ewish society, in its en, in its distinction ves, is based upon it.
wever, forbidden some-n, by the 5th Council

7th century we find daughter condemned
at the Council of 691, and separation 4). It is remarkable, s of a council held in rchbishop of Canter(?), it is stated that, it is lawful to marry written in the law—the Romans—yet they ge when it has taken 139), and the Roman anon (108), which t on the genuineness at the middle of the , attributed to Egbert e that marriages are e, the parties not to but to be separated Substantially, first or some considerable alized, to have been
I. (714-30), in a long e, replying to various at he allows marriage

COUSINS-GERMAN

after the 4th degree (c. l.), does not expressly condemn those in the 4th. This, however, is now repeatedly done by councils and by popes; in the 1st Council of Rome against unlawful marriages, 721 (c. 4); by Gregory III. 731-41, in his excerpts from the fathers and the canons (c. 11); in the Synod of Metz, 753 (c. 1), which, for the first time enacts corporal punishment—the guilty party, if without money, being a slave or freedman, to be well beaten, and if an ecclesiastical person of mean condition, to be beaten or sent to jail: in the 6th Council of Arles, 813 (c. 11); and that of Mayence in the same year (c. 54).

We have now to see the influence of the clerical view on civil legislation in respect of first cousins' marriages after the barbaric invasions. With the exception of Italy, the peculiarities of whose legislation on this head have been previously noticed, the only barbaric code in which we find a prohibition before the Carolingian era is the Wisigothic one, strongly clerical in spirit, as must always be recollected. Here a law of kindred of a father or mother, grandfather or grandmother, to the sixth generation, unless connected by permission of the prince before the passing of the law, the parties to be separated and sent to monasteries (bk. iii. t. v. c. 1). In the case of Jews indeed there was superadded to separation the treble punishment of decalvation (scalping), 100 lashes, and banishment (bk. xii. 7. iii. c. 8). With these exceptions, all other enactments adverse to such marriages belong to the Carolingian rule or period. A capitulary of King Pepin at Vermerie, A.D. 753, only absolutely requires the dissolution of marriage in the 3rd degree, allowing those in the 4th, once contracted, to stand good under penance, but forbidding them for the future (c. 1). The capitulary of Compiègne A.D. 757 (see Pertz's text) is to the same effect (cc. 1, 2). On the other hand, the law of the Allamans (t. 39) renewed under Duke Luitfrid, supposed the 2nd (died 751), and the somewhat later law of the Bavarians (t. 6)—both indeed thought to have been touched up under Charlemagne—reckon all marriages between the sons of brothers and sisters unlawful, and require them to be dissolved; all property of the guilty parties to go to the public treasury, and if they be "mean persons" (minores personee) themselves to become slaves to it. The Carolingian capitularies proper, almost all of them confirmed by Church synods, are scarcely to be distinguished from ecclesiastical enactments. The text of some of the earlier ones must have been tampered with, since even King Pepin's Compiègne capitulary above referred to is brought into accordance with the far stricter rules of the Synod of Metz. As the law stands in the general collection of the capitularies, if a man marries his cousin, he is not only to lose all settled money, but if he will not amend his ways none compound in 60 solidi, or be sent to gaol till he pays. If he be slave or freedman, he is to be well beaten, and his master to compound in 60 solidi. If he be an ecclesiastical person, he is to lose any dignity he has, or if not honourable, to be beaten or sent to gaol (A.D. 756-7, bk. vii. cc. 8, 10). A capitulary of the 6th book (130) forbids marriage to the 7th degree. So does one of the Additio tertia, c. 123, under pain of the ban (at 60 solidi) and penance for a freeman; but for a slave, of public flagellation and decalvation, and penance. If the offenders be disobedient, they are to be kept in jail "to much wretchedness" (sub magna acerrima), nor touch any of their fortune till they do penance; and whilst living in crime (c. 124) are to be treated as gentiles, catechumens or envergumens. Jews marrying within the prohibited degrees are to receive 100 lashes after having been publicly decalvated, to be exiled and do penance, with forfeiture of their property either to their children by any former marriage, not being Jews, or in default of such to the prince (Additio quarta, c. 2), a provision borrowed mainly from one of the Wisigothic codes above referred to. See also cc. 74, 75 of the Fourth Addition, anathematizing the man who marries a cousin, and repeating the prohibition against marriages within the 7th generation. The various enactments requiring inquiry to be made as to consanguinity before marriage, bear also on this subject; as for instance the Council of Frejus in 791, c. 6; Charlemagne's first capitulary of 802, c. 35; an inquiry which by his Edict of 814 is even required to be made after marriage, the 4th degree being expressly specified as one of prohibited consanguinity.

COVETOUSNESS

On the whole, the course of Church practice on the subject appears to have been this: the traditional Roman prejudice against cousins' marriages, although quite uncountenanced by the Jewish law or practice, commended itself instinctively to the ascetic tendencies of the Western fathers, and through them took root among the Western clergy generally, embodying itself indeed temporarily, towards the end of the 4th century, in a general civil law for the Roman empire. But whilst this law was abrogated in the beginning of the 5th century, and in the East such unions remained perfectly lawful both in the Church and in the State throughout, nearly the whole of the period which occupies us, never being condemned by any Oecumenic Council till that of Constantinople towards the end of the 7th century, in the West the clergy adhered to the harsher view; Popes and local synods sought to enforce it; wherever clerical influence could be brought to bear on the barbaric legislators it became apparent; till at last under the Carolingian princes it established itself as a law alike of the State and of the Church. But the history of this restraint upon marriage is that of all others not derived from Scripture itself. Originating probably all of them in a sincere though mistaken asceticism, they were soon discovered to supply an almost inexhaustible mine for the supply of the Church's coffers, through the grant of dispensations, prosecutions in the Church Courts, compromises. The baleful alliance between Carolingian usurpation and Romish priestcraft, in exchange for the subserviency of the clergy to the ambition and the vices of the earlier despots, delivered over the social morality of the people to them, it may be said, as a prey, and the savageness of Carolingian civil legislation was placed at the service of the new-fangled Church discipline of the West. [J. M. L.]

COVETOUSNESS. The works of the earliest Christian authorities are full of warnings against the different forms of covetousness, e.g. Clem. ad Corinth. bk. ii. cc. 5, 6; Hermas, bk. i. vis. 1, and bk. ii. mand. 12; Conat. Apost., bk. i. c. 1; li. c. 46; iv. c. 4; vii. cc. 3, 4. The Apostolical Constitutions follow St. Paul in treating covetousness as a disqualification for a bishop; bk. i. c. 6; and in a later constitution also for a priest or deacon; bk. vii. c. 31. The covetousness of some of the Church-widows is especially denounced; "who deem gain their only work, and by asking without shame and taking without stint have already rendered most persons more remiss in giving,"—who "running about to knock at the doors of their neighbours, heap up to themselves an abundance of goods, and lend at bitter usury, and have mammon for their sole care; whose God is their purse," &c. (bk. iii. c. 7). The oblations of the covetous were not to be received (bk. iv. c. 6). With this may be connected the canonical epistle of Gregory Thaumaturgus, archbishop of Neocesarea (about A.D. 262) which declares that it is impossible to set forth in a single letter all the sacred writings which proclaim not robbery alone to be a fearful crime, but all covetousness, all grasping at others' goods for filthy lucre; the particular object of his denunciation being apparently those persons who had thought a late barbaric invasion to be their opportunity for gain (can. 7 and foll.). Others of the Fathers in like manner vigorously denounced the existence of the vice among the clergy. The covetousness of Pope Zephyrinus (beginning of 3rd century) is denounced by Hippolytus in his Philosophumena (bk. ix. c. 7, §. 11). About the middle of the century, Cyprian, in his book De lapsis, speaks of those Christians who "with an insatiable ardour of covetousness pursued the increase of their wealth." Ambrose, in his 7th sermon, describes a cleric who, "not satisfied with the maintenance he derives, by the Lord's command, from the altar, . . . sells his intercessions, grasps willingly the gifts of widows," and yet flatters himself by saying, "no one charges me with robbery, no one accuses me of violence"—as if sometimes flattery did not draw a larger booty from widows than torture. Jerome with bitter sarcasm speaks of some, "who are richer as monks than they were as seculars," and of "clerics who possess wealth under Christ the poor, which they had net under the devil, rich and deceitful, so that the Church sighs over those as wealthy, whom the Church sighs over those as wealthy, whom the world before held for beggars." And he beseeches his correspondent to flee from the cleric who from poor has become rich as from some pestilence (Ep. 2, ad Nepotianum; and see also Ep. 3, ad Heliodorum). In his long letter or treatise addressed to Eustochius again (Ep. 22), he draws a sharply satiric picture of an old cleric who wants to force his way almost into the very bed-chamber of a sleeper, and praise some piece of furniture or other article till he at last rather extorted than obtained it; contrasting with the prevalent covetousness of Roman society the story of the monk at Nitria, who at his death was found to have saved 100 solidi which he had earned by weaving linen. The monks consulted what to do; some were for giving it to the poor, some to the Church, some for handing it over to the family of the deceased; but Macarius, Pambo, Isidore and the other fathers of the community decided that it should be buried with him.

Gregory of Nyssa, indeed, in his letter to Letorius, observes that the fathers have affixed no punishment to this sin, which he assimilates to adultery; though it be very common in the Church, none inquires of those who are brought to be ordained if they be polluted with it. Theft, violation of graves, and sacrilege are, he says the only vices taken account of, although usury is also prohibited by divine scripture, and the acquiring by force the goods of others, even under colour of business. Against this statement should indeed be set if not a decree (1) from Gratian ascribed to Pope Julius I. A.D. 330-52, which denounces as filthy lucre the buying in time of harvest or of vintage, not of necessity but of greed, vintals or wine, in order by buying to sell at a higher price, at least the 17th canon of the Council of Nicaea (A.D. 325), directed against the love of filthy lucre and usury, and enacting deposition as the punishment for the cleric. But here, as in a parallel canon (6) of the Synod of Seleucia, A.D. 410, it is perhaps to be inferred that the vice was chiefly if not solely aimed at under the concrete form of usury (as to which see USURY); as also when St. Basil, in his canonical epistle to Bishop Amphiloehus of Iconium, writes that the usurer who spends his unjust gains on the poor and frees himself from avarice may be admitted to orders; (c. 14). That covetousness was as rife in the monastery as in the world may be inferred from the fact that Cassian's work, De Conventuorum institutis (ed. of 4th or beginning of 6th century) contains a whole book (the 7th) De Spiritu philargyriae.

The very doubtful "Sanctions and Decrees of the Nicene fathers," of Greek origin apparently (2nd volume of Labbé and Mansi's Coisins, pp. 1029 and foll.), require priests not to be given to heaping up riches, lest they should prefer them to the ministry, and if they do accumulate wealth to do so moderately (c. 14). The 3rd Council of Orleans, A.D. 538, forbids clerics, from the diaconate upwards, to carry on business as public traders for the greed of filthy lucre, or to do so in another's name. As the times wear on indeed, covetousness seems often to be confounded with avarice, and to be legislated against under that name. The Code of Canons of the African Church, ending with the Council of Carthage of A.D. 419, has thus a canon "on avarice," which it says is to be reprehended in a layman, but much more in a priest (c. 5). So with the Carolingian Councils and Capitularies. That of Aix-la-Chapelle in 789 forbids avaritia; no one is to encroach on the boundaries of others nor pass his father's landmark (c. 32, and see also c. 64, "de avaritia vel concupiscentia"). The Council of Frankfort, A.D. 794, has a canon (34), and the contemporary capitulary of Frankfort a section (32 or 34), "de avaritia et cupiditate." The capitulary of Aix-la-Chapelle of 801, according to one codex, enjoins priests to abstain from filthy lucre and usury, and so to teach the people" (c. 25, and see also the Admonition generalis of the same year, in Pertz). The first capitulary of 802 requires monks and nuns not to be given to covetousness (cc. 17, 18), nor canons to filthy lucre (c. 11). Some Additions to a Nimegue Capitulary in 806 (Pertz) treat at some length of "cupiditas"—which is said to be taken either in good or bad part, "in bad part of him who beyond measure will desire any kind of thing," (c. 3)— of "avaritia," others, and I have to zone" (c. 4) which an inst. harvest or vintage covetousness, I "but if a man has for himself it trade" (c. 7) of Aix-la-Chapelle avoid all avaritia second Council ome (apparent the evil of covet second Council of clerics gather or certain reve do so to sell together, but fi

One form of judges and other would seem to SORTUARI, by in the Roman legislation of J. 17, 82, 129). of the Wisigoth (Chlodwinth), may judges w overpassing the to themselves amounts in dispute to 5 per cent surplus beyond have taken, with [See also BAIL

COWL. [C. CRATON, n Rom. Vet., Usur

CREDEŒNE Gr. καταρπάζει the vessels and placed before co last mensam . . . necessaria contin i. 3, quoted by whether such n tuary within othe ble that the e sacristy and pla they ceased to be faithful. See Pr

CREED, from title should be our Christian Fu I BELIEVE, or V interrogatories n or other occasion practice, it has sense, and any d summary of the Faith as held by has been called Thus the Rules of lo the earliest were intended to tion which they Creeds. So, also, stractions which for baptism.

ed, in his letter to the fathers have affirmed which he assimilates very common in the those who are brought luted with it. Theft, illege are, he says the f, although usury is cripture, and the se- of others, even under this statement should ee (1) from Graian .A.D. 336-52, which he buying in time t of necessity but of n order by buying to ast the 17th canon of 325), directed against lustry, and enacting at for the cleric. But n (6) of the Synod of rhaps to be inferred if not solely aimed at of usury (as to which St. Basil, in his epiphanius of Iconium, s himself his unjust s himself from avarice (c. 14). That covet- in monastery as in the from the fact that Monach. institut. (end th century) contains Spiritu philomyriae, ctions and Decrees of eek origin apparently Mansi's Councils, pp. iests not to be given y should prefer them they do accumulate ly (c. 14). The 3rd 8, forbids clerics, from rry on business as d of filthy lucre, or to As the times wear on often to be confounded gislated against under Canons of the African Council of Carthage of a "on avarice," which in a layman, but much with the Carolingian es. That of Aix-la- avaritia; no one is to s of others nor pass his , and see also c. 64, "entia"). The Council a canon (34), and the of Frankfurt a section et enquisite." The ile of 801, according to e to abstain from filthy to teach the people Admonitio generalis"). The first capitulary d anus not to be given 8), nor canons to filthy ditions to a Nimegue rent at some length of id to be taken either in part of him who beyond kind of thing," (c 9)—

of "avaritia," which is "to desire the things of others, and having acquired them to impart them to none" (c. 4), and of "filthy lucre" (c. 5), of which an instance is given in the buying at harvest or vintage time, not of necessity, but for covetousness, in order to sell at a higher price; "but if a man buy for necessity, that he may have for himself and distribute to others, we call it trade" (c. 7). The Ecclesiastical Capitulary of Aix-la-Chapelle in 809 again enjoins priests to avoid all avarice and covetousness (c. 2). The second Council of Rheims, 813, also enacted that some (apparently of the clergy) were to follow the will of covetousness and avarice (c. 28). The second Council of Châlons, in the same year, that if clerics gather together the fruits of the earth or certain revenues of the soil, they should not do so to sell the dearer and gather treasures together, but for the sake of the poor (c. 8).

One form of covetousness—the rapacity of judges and other functionaries in exacting fees,— would seem to fill better under the head of SPORTULAE, by which name such fees were known in the Roman world, and are designated in the legislation of Justinian (Code, bk. iii. T. ii. Novs. 17, 82, 129). We may however quote a chapter of the Wisigothic law (bk. ii. c. 25, amended by Chadsunth), which says: "We have known many judges who by occasion of covetousness overpassing the order of law, presume to take to themselves one-third of the causes" (i.e. amounts in dispute); and which limits the judge's fee to 5 per cent., requiring him to restore any surplus beyond this proportion which he may have taken, with an equal amount besides.

[See also BRIBERY, COMMERCE, USURY.]

[J. M. L.]

COWL [CUCULLA.]

CRATON, martyr at Rome, Feb. 15 (Mart. Rom. Vet., Usuardi).

[C.]

CREDESCENCE (Lat. credentia, Ital. credenza, Gr. παρρησία). The table or slab on which the vessels and elements for the Eucharist are placed before consecration. "Credentium appellat mensam . . . supra quam ad sacrificandum necessaria continentur." (Ceremoniale Romanum, l. 3, quoted by Ducange, s. v.). It is doubtful whether such a table or slab existed in the sanctuary within our period, as it rather seems probable that the elements were brought from the sacristy and placed at once on the altar, when they ceased to be taken from the offerings of the faithful. See PROTHESIS.

[C.]

CREED, from the Latin credo. Hence the title should be confined to such confessions of our Christian Faith as commence with the words I BELIEVE, or WE BELIEVE, or, again, to any interrogatories as may be addressed at baptism on other occasions, DOST THOU BELIEVE? but, in practice, it has been used in a more general sense, and any document which has contained a summary of the chief tenets of the Christian Faith as held by any local or national Church, has been called the CREED of that Church. Thus the Rules of Faith, of which we find traces in the earliest Christian writers, and which were intended to guide teachers in the instruction which they conveyed, have been called Creeds. So, also, have been designated the instructions which were prepared for candidates for baptism.

NAME.—(2.) For "Creeds," in this wider sense, we find the following words used by early Greek writers: ἀπιστεῖν ἀρχαίαι κανὼν, ὁ κανὼν τῆς ἀληθείας, τὸ κήρυγμα τῶ ἀποστολικῶν, ἡ εὐαγγελικὴ καὶ ἀποστολικὴ παράδοσις. So Tertullian very frequently appeals to the regulae fidei. The creed of the Church, properly so called, was designated first as ἡ πίστις or ἡ παραδεδεῖσθα ἡμῶν ἀγία καὶ ἀποστολικὴ πίστις among the Greeks, and as fides, fides apostolica among the Latins. We find the word symbolum for the first time in Cyprian, and after the title became prevalent among Latin writers it found its way among the Greek authors. But even in the fifth century the Nicene Creed was commonly known as ἡ πίστις. The words τὸ σῶμα τοῦ ἀποκεκέρθαι, found in Origen, denote, not the Creed, but Baptism itself, or (possibly) "the outward and visible sign in Baptism." And, similarly, we must interpret a passage in Tertullian: "Testatio fidel et signaculum symboli." In a canon of the Laodicene council, however, the word occurs once. In later years the words σῶμα τοῦ, and symbolum or symbolis, became the favorite designation of the baptismal Creed. Its meaning will be discussed elsewhere.

3. The words of our Lord in the institution of Baptism undoubtedly gave the first form to the baptismal Creeds which we find prevailing in the 3rd century. His injunction that His apostles should "make disciples of all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost," seemed almost of necessity to call forth on the part of the recipient of Baptism some avowal of belief in God as thus revealed. The words which we read in our English version of Acts viii. 37, containing the appeal of Philip to the Eunuch and the reply of the Eunuch, are not found in the best extant MSS. of the Acts of the Apostles; but the incident thus recorded may be regarded as not improbable; and we find indications in the pages of Irenaeus that it was believed by him to have occurred. St. Paul reminds Timothy of the good confession which he had made "before many witnesses." This is generally believed to have taken place at his baptism. Passing by for the present, as scarcely applicable to our immediate purpose, the passage of Justin Martyr where he relates how "they who are persuaded and believe that the things are true which are taught by us, are taken to some place where there is water, and are there baptized," and the expression of Irenaeus regarding "the canon of the truth which every one received at his baptism," we come to words of Tertullian, in which he speaks of the Holy Spirit "sanctifying the faith of those who believe in the Father and the Son and the Holy Ghost." [BAPTISM, p. 160.]

4. Thus are we led to infer that the primary baptismal confession corresponded to the baptismal formula; that as the convert was "baptized into the name of the Father and the Son and the Holy Spirit," so was he called upon to state that "he believed in the Father and in the Son and in the Holy Spirit." And that our inference is correct seems clear from fragments of liturgies which have come down to us from various ages and different Churches. The Aethiopic manuscript of the Apostolic Constitutions describes the catechumen as declaring at the time of his baptism: "I believe in the only true God, the Father, the Almighty, and in His only-begotten Son Jesus Christ, our Lord and Saviour, and in the Holy Spirit, the Life-giver." Other words follow. So the pseudo-Ambrose, in his treatise on the Sacraments (book li. c. 7; Migne, xvi. 429), "Thou wast asked, 'Dost thou believe in God the Father Almighty?' Thou saidst, 'I believe,' and thou wast immersed. Again thou wast asked, 'Dost thou believe also in our Lord Jesus Christ and in His cross?' Thou saidst again, 'I believe,' and wast immersed. For a third time thou wast asked, 'And dost thou believe in the Holy Spirit?' Thou didst reply, 'I believe,' and for a third time thou wast immersed." So, again, in the formula for baptism found in an old Gallican missal and printed by Martene (l. p. 51); in the old Roman Ritual as given by Daniel (l. p. 173); and in the formula adopted by Boniface, for use among his German converts (Migne, vol. lxxxix. p. 310).

5. But although this Baptismal Formula furnished the type of the Baptismal Confession, we find that, even in Tertullian's time, the Confession embraced something not mentioned in the words of Institution. "The Catechumen," says the great African writer (de Corona militis, § 3), "was thrice immersed, answering something more than the Lord commanded in His Gospel." From his treatise (de Baptismo, § 11) we may infer what that "something" was. "Some (Tertullian writes) would deprecate baptism, because our Lord did not Himself baptize. But His disciples baptized at His command. . . . And whereto should He baptize? To repentance!—wherefore, then, His forerunner? To remission of sins!—which He gave by a word! Into Himself!—whom in His humility He was concealing! Into the Holy Spirit!—who had not as yet descended from the Father! Into the Church!—which was not yet founded." From this passage Bishop Bull (Judicium Eccl. Catholicæ, Works, vol. vi. p. 139) infers (and, we think, is entitled to do so) that in Tertullian's neighbourhood and epoch, at the time of baptism, express mention was made, not only of the Father and of the Holy Spirit, and of the Son of God, but also of repentance, of remission of sins, and of the Church. Thus we are induced to say that at least these two articles may have been mentioned in Tertullian's Creed, viz. "Repentance into the remission of sins" and "the Church." But in regard to "the Church" all doubt is removed by referring to a later section (§ 6) of the same treatise, where our author explains the origin of its introduction thus: "Where the Three are, there is the Church, the Body of the Three: there the testatio fidei;" this on the part of the baptized: "there the sponsio subitis;" this on the part of God.

6. We purposely abstain from adducing passages bearing on the Rule of Faith to which Tertullian continually appeals, because in our judgment such Rule of Faith was so called as being the guide of the believer and of the teacher, and was of wider extent than the Baptismal Creed. So we will proceed to ask what light do the works of Cyprian which have come down to us throw on the baptismal customs of his day? He followed Tertullian by a generation, being bishop of Carthage from 248 to 258, and his correspondence is in our present investigation very important, as it contains several letters on the subject of re-baptizing those who had been baptized by heretical teachers; and these letters of course contain allusions (though they may be little more than allusions) to the ceremony of Baptism.

7. We will translate the most interesting. "If any object that Novatians holds the same law of faith which the Catholic Church holds, that he baptizes with the same symbol" (the first time the name occurs in Latin), "knows the same God the Father, the same Son Christ, and may therefore avail himself of the power to baptize, because in the baptismal interrogations he seems not to differ from us: let such men know that we and the schismatics have not the same law of symbol, nor the same interrogations, for when they say, 'Dost thou believe remission of sins and eternal life through the Church?' in the question itself they speak falsely, because they have not the Church." This is found in his letter to Magnus (Ep. 69, § vii.). A passage somewhat similar is found in another letter (70, § ii.), and in his epistle to Firmilianus (75, § 2.), he speaks of the "usitata et legitima verba interrogations" at baptism. From all this we may safely conclude that this "fixed and legalized form of interrogation" did not then contain any reference to those points of doctrine on which Novatian went wrong: probably it called forth little more than the expression of belief in the Father, the Son, the Holy Ghost, and in remission of sins and eternal life, of which the assurance was conveyed, when one was rightly admitted into the Church at Baptism.

8. We must pass now to consider the usage in regard to Creeds in the Churches of the East. From the earliest years of the Christian era, the Oriental Churches were more harassed by strange teachings than were those of the Latin race. It was the boast of Rufinus that no heresy took its rise within the Church of Rome; and of Ambrose that the Church of Rome had preserved undefiled the symbol of the Apostles. Thus the difference between the Eastern and Western symbols may be learnt from the opening clauses of their respective Creeds. In the former (and among these we of course include the "canon" of the Greek-speaking community of Lyons) men professed their belief in one God; in the latter, their belief in God. The growth of the latter creeds we will consider hereafter; for the present we confine ourselves to the former.

9. The seventh book of the Apostolic Constitutions is regarded by most critics as older than the Nicene Council, and by many as representing the customs of Antioch, about the end of the third century. Dr. Caspari assigns it to the same period, though he considers it to have belonged to the Syrian Churches. Herein we have a full account of the ceremonies which were performed at baptism, and of the confession which the catechumen made. He said: "I renounce Satan and his works." . . . "and after his renunciation (proceeds the text) let him say, 'I enrol myself under Christ, and I believe and am baptized into one, unbegotten, only, true God, Almighty, the Father of Christ, the Creator and Maker of all things, of whom are all things; and in the Lord Jesus the Christ, His only-begotten Son, begotten before all creation, who by the pleasure of the Father was before all world; begotten all things were on earth, both in the last days came down, of the Holy lived wholly after and was crucified for us, and rose suffering, on the the heavens and the Father, and the world with of whose kingdom baptized, too, into Paraclete, which the beginning of set from the Fa of our Saviour and the Apostles, to a Catholic and Apostretion of the fl and the kingdom world to come."

10. It is by article to examine the heresies to which baptismal confession. The Council of Antioch those of Gregory the Martyr, and office of the Church character of a Creed than that of a Cate in passing, the of Alexandria to have met with the κατοχόαιον,—we doubtless the contented to other purposes we have further of confessing God with the complete members of the Church made during some ship; and in the understand his words επιπροσθεον (Migne 11. Still the preferred to speak at baptism. When E interesting account Council of Nicene, Creed which he had had been catech baptized," he makes Eucharist. "During both when he was become a bishop, he taught it." So, ag proper was referred the Council of Ephesus which the fathers said: "that no one but the accepted faith from the knowledge of Judaism." Introduction of the of the Church. E world; begotten, not made; through whom all things were made which are in heaven and on earth, both visible and invisible; who in the last days came down from heaven and assumed flesh, of the Holy Virgin Mary being born, and lived holly after the laws of His God and Father, and was crucified under Pontius Pilate, and died for us, and rose again from the dead, after his suffering, on the third day, and ascended into the heavens and sat down on the right hand of the Father, and is coming again at the end of the world with glory to judge quick and dead, of whose kingdom there shall be no end. I am baptized, too, into the Holy Spirit; that is, the Paraclete, which wrought in all the saints since the beginning of the world, and was afterwards sent from the Father, according to the promise of our Saviour and Lord Jesus Christ; and, after the Apostles, to all who believe in (to) the holy Catholic and Apostolic Church, in (to) the resurrection of the flesh, and the remission of sins, and the kingdom of heaven, and the life of the world to come." Such is the Creed which connects the rule of faith which may be found in Irenaeus with the Creed which has received the name of the Nicene.

10. It is beyond the scope of the present article to examine and enumerate the errors and the heresies to which reference is made in this long baptismal confession (ἁπολογία Βαπτισματικῆς). The Confession of belief issued by the Synod of Antioch against Paul of Samosata, and those of Gregory of Neo-Caesarea and Lucian the Martyr, and others, were not used in any office of the Church; and they thus have the character of an exposition of the Faith, rather than that of a Creed proper. Only, we must note in passing, that in the letter of Alexander of Alexandria to his namesake at Constantinople, we meet with the phrase, ἐν πνεύμα ἁγίῳ ἡμετέροισιν—we confess one Holy Spirit, and doubtless the conception of confession we must attach to other points named in the letter; and thus we have further intimation that a custom of confessing God prevailed, not only at baptism, with the competentes, but amongst matured members of the Churches. This doubtless was made during some part of their common worship; and in the same sense we may perhaps understand his words, ταῦτα διδάσκουμιν, ταῦτα ἐπερωτοῦμιν (Migne, xviii. p. 549).

11. Still the passages in which the Creed is referred to speak almost exclusively of its use at baptism. When Eusebius wrote to his flock his interesting account of what had passed at the Council of Nicea, and transcribed for it the Creed which he had recited as that used "when he had been a catechumen, and again when he was baptized," he makes no mention of its use at the Eucharist. "During his whole ministerial life, both when he was a presbyter, and since he became a bishop, he had believed it and had taught it." So, again, when the Nicene Creed proper was referred to in the famous decree of the Council of Ephesus, the great danger against which the fathers were anxious to provide was this: "that no one should offer or exhibit any heretick or Judaic faith to such as were willing to turn to the knowledge of the truth from Hellesm or Judaism." No mention is made of the introduction of the Creed into the other offices of the Church. Eutyches recited the Nicene symbol at the Robber Synod of Ephesus, and stated that "in this faith he had been baptized and sealed, and in it he had lived, and in it he hoped to be perfected;" but no reference is made to any other public use: and once more, when at the second session of the Council of Chalcedon, the deacon Aëtius read out the Creed of the holy Synod of Nicea and the holy faith which the 150 holy fathers put out at Constantinople agreeing with it, whilst both creeds met with the cry, "This is the faith of the Catholics: this is the faith of all. We all believe like this:" in regard to the Nicene symbol alone they added, "in this we have been baptized: in this we baptize;" but not a word was said as to the recitation of either at any other service (Mans., vi. 957). Only the same limited use is mentioned by Epiphanius in the latter pages of his Anchoratus; and in the Catechetical Lectures of Cyril of Jerusalem.

12. We must not, however, omit to mention that it was the custom for the bishops present to subscribe to the Creed before they broke up from the great councils: thus, at the conclusion of the Council of Chalcedon, "all the most religious bishops cried out, 'This is our faith, let our Metropolitan subscribe; let them subscribe at once in the presence of the magistrates: things well defined admit of no delay: this is the faith of the Apostles: by this we all walk: we all thus think.'"

13. Let us now briefly trace the subsequent history of the use of the symbols. Timotheus, bishop of Constantinople A.D. 511, is stated by Theodoros Lector (Hist. Eccl. p. 561) to have ordered "that the creed should be recited καθ' ἑκάστην σίναν, at every congregation; whereas previously it had been used only on the Thursday before Easter, when the bishops catechized the candidates for baptism." As the avowed object of Timotheus was to express the continued abhorrence which the Church felt for the teaching of Macdonius, it is clear that the exposition of Constantinople was intended in the order, even though it speaks of "the Creed of the 318." A similar direction had been given by Peter the Fuller, Patriarch of Antioch (450 to 488). Then it seems to have spread through the East, and thus the Creeds seem to have found their way into the liturgies which bear the names of Chrysostom, Basil, and others. From the East the custom came into the West. The 3rd Council of Toledo, c. li. (A.D. 589) directed that "before the Lord's Prayer in the liturgy, the creed of the 150 should be recited by the people through all the churches of Spain and Galicia, according to the form of the Oriental Churches."

14. The words of Reccared's confirming order are so interesting, that we may be pardoned if we recite them at length: "Ut propter roborem gentis nostrae novellam conversionem,

* By the Creed of the 318 is meant the Nicene Creed. By the creed of the 150 the document as it is alleged to have been expanded to the Council of Constantinople, and as it was recited at the Council of Chalcedon. The chief difference between them is that the former alter the words "and in the Holy Ghost," proceeded to declare the condemnation by the Church of all who maintained Arian views of the Saviour: in the latter the subsequent clauses were added as we now read them, save that the words were, "who proceedeth from the Father, who will," &c.

ches of Germany
s, about the millie necessary to enact via Patri et Filio et bol." Credo in unum at the same service
v. l. § 1. and xl.
length the popes gave re of the Emperor
v. VIII. consented to the form which was amongst the other with the Creed of the noticed — its no-the so-called Gelasian (Unperf. Act. 10. Quellen, at in the Church of of Gaul and Germany the baptismal rite.

is dated about 494, e which we are now regarded as older than edict III., the Popes of Creed should be recited than 1014, the date triumph over Benedict recits that at the time H address the elect acto, and bid them to be of the evangelized postles, whose words mysteries are great."
ne children, a boy, and s his own right had the presbyter enquires, confess our Lord Jesus answers, "In Greek." to the faith as they bechants the Creed of but, according to the y, without the clause at the words "in Latin." at any MS. authority roo vno in his Codex Dr. Heurtley, Horn, lyth then takes a girl, epeated as to the lane answers, "in Latin."
e Creed is written in arly, the Greek in Latin many years has been called in the Western Churches the APOSTLES' CREED, our first remark must be that the Eastern Churches denied all knowledge of it at the Council of Florence. Ephesus, one of the legates of the Oriental Churches, is said to have there stated, ἡμεῖς οὐτε ἴσμεν οὐτε εἰδόμεν τὸ σὺμβολὸν τῶν ἀποστόλων (Waterland, iii. p. 190, note r; Nicolas, Le Symbole des Apôtres, p. 270). Thus we must look to the Western Churches alone for evidence of the growth and usage of this Creed.

19. In his interesting volume on the Apostles' Creed, Dr. Heurtley traces its growth through Irenaeus and Tertullian and Cyprian; then we must take a leap from Novatian, A.D. 290, to Rufinus, bishop of Aquileia, A.D. 390, the intermediate space of 130 years affording only one stepping-stone, furnished by the notes of the Belief of Marcellus of Ancyra, which he left behind him on his departure from Rome; he says "I learnt it and was taught it out of the holy Scriptures." This belief resembles in great measure the Creed of the Church of Rome, as we learn that Creed from the pages of Rufinus; but Marcellus does not speak of its being used in any liturgical office, except so far as his words were quoted may show that he had received it before he was baptized.

20. This surmise is upheld by the account of Rufinus. He describes the Creed of the Church of Aquileia as resembling very nearly that of Rome; he says that at neither Church had it ever been put into writing in a continuous form, but adds that he regards the type as preserved in the Church of Rome as probably of the purest character, because there the ancient practice was preserved of the catechumen reciting the Creed in the hearing of the faithful. He speaks of this as an ancient custom. At Aquileia it would appear that the baptism was a private service. About the same time we find Ambrose describing to Marcellian (Migne, xvi. 995) the riot at Milan: from his account it would seem that at that time the custom was to deliver the Creed to the competentes on any Lord's Day after the lessons and the sermon and the dismissal of the catechumens: his words are, "Sequente die, post autem Dominicam, post lectiones atque tractatum demissis Catechumenis, symbolum aliquibus competentibus in baptisteriis tradebam basilicæ." It was he who was called out to rescue an Arian.

21. The custom of preserving this symbolum unwritten is referred to again and again by Jerome and Augustine. It will be remembered that the Faith of the Churches of the East was treated with less reserve, although St. Cyril of Jerusalem desired that his lectures should be regarded as confidential documents. We are inclined to believe that the Creed must have been committed to writing when it became customary to recite it at the Mass. The Gelasian Sacramentary (which, even if interpolated, must describe the ritual of the Roman Church at some epoch or other) contains it. Since the time of Benedict VIII., as we have seen, the Nicene Creed has been used at Rome in the Eucharistic service.

22. We have referred from time to time to the custom of repeating the creeds of the earlier councils at an early session of each succeeding assembly of a similar character. We have one interesting proof that the Apostles' Creed was deemed of sufficient importance to be so used in a council of the West. Etherius, bishop of Omsa, and Boatus, presbyter of Astorga, recited it in 785 as against the errors of Elipandus, archbishop of Toledo. The account is noteworthy: "Surgimus igitur," they cried, "cum ipsis apostolis et huius nostrae symbolum, quem (sic) tradiderunt nobis brevi compendio, recitemus, quicunque unum Dominum, unam fidem, unum baptismum habemus; et filium in qua baptizati sumus." In hac perversitate et duplicitate haereticorum non negemus: sed sicut corde credimus ore proprio proferamus publice et dicamus CREDO IN DEUM, &c." The Creed recited, Etherius added, "Ecce fidem apostolicam in qua baptizati sumus, quam credemus et tenemus." It will be noticed that the Creed was here put forth publicly.

23. Nor should the fact that there were creeds thrown into an interrogatory form be entirely passed over. Of these some were used from an early period at baptism; and others in later years at the visitation of the sick. Dr. Heurtley has collected several instances of the former series; and the pages of Martene contain many extracts from old MSS. giving the order for the latter. The earliest instance of such a use at confession that we have found is in the rule of Chrodegang (A.D. 750). [Migne, 89, p. 1070.]

24. The (so called) Athanasian Creed appears to have been originally composed as an exposition of the faith for the instruction of believers [CRESSY, COUNCIL OF], and then it came to be sung at the Church service as a Canticle. Gieseler and others consider that it was this Creed that was ordered to be learnt by heart by the Council of Frankfurt, 794, when it decreed, "Ut fides catholica sanctae Trinitatis et oratio Dominica atque Symbolum Fidei omnibus praedicatur et tradatur;" but it is more probable that the term fides catholica here is generic: at all events we would refer to the creed contained in Charlemagne's letter to Elipandus [Migne, xlviii. 890], which is assigned to the same date (704) as being more probably the fides catholica of the Canon. It seems to have been recited at Prime on the Lord's Day at Basle in the 9th century: we hear that in 997 it was sung in alternate choirs in France and in the Church of England: in 1133 it was used daily at Prime in the Church of Antun; from 1200 it assumed the title "Symbolum S. Athanasii" and "Psalmus Quicumque cult," which mark the character it occupies in our services. It was daily used at Prime in those English churches which adopted the use of Sarum, but was always followed by the recitation of the Apostles' Creed: as if the declaration of the Faith of the worshipper always followed on the instruction of the Church as to what it was necessary to believe.

(Books.—Great use has been made of Dr. August Haha's Collection of Formulae and Dr. Caspari's Programme. Dr. Heurtley's Harmonia Symbolica has of course furnished important assistance. To other works reference has been made as required.) C. A. S.

CRESCENS. (1) Disciple of St. Paul, bishop in Galatia, is commemorated June 27 (Mart. Rom. Vet., Usuardi); April 15 (Cal. Byzant.)

Thus the Apostles' Creed was the baptismal creed of Spain.

Creed was deemed of sufficient importance to be so used in a council of the West.

24. The (so called) Athanasian Creed appears to have been originally composed as an exposition of the faith for the instruction of believers [CRESSY, COUNCIL OF], and then it came to be sung at the Church service as a Canticle.

Gieseler and others consider that it was this Creed that was ordered to be learnt by heart by the Council of Frankfurt, 794, when it decreed, "Ut fides catholica sanctae Trinitatis et oratio Dominica atque Symbolum Fidei omnibus praedicatur et tradatur;" but it is more probable that the term fides catholica here is generic: at all events we would refer to the creed contained in Charlemagne's letter to Elipandus [Migne, xlviii. 890], which is assigned to the same date (704) as being more probably the fides catholica of the Canon.

It seems to have been recited at Prime on the Lord's Day at Basle in the 9th century: we hear that in 997 it was sung in alternate choirs in France and in the Church of England: in 1133 it was used daily at Prime in the Church of Antun; from 1200 it assumed the title "Symbolum S. Athanasii" and "Psalmus Quicumque cult," which mark the character it occupies in our services.

It was daily used at Prime in those English churches which adopted the use of Sarum, but was always followed by the recitation of the Apostles' Creed: as if the declaration of the Faith of the worshipper always followed on the instruction of the Church as to what it was necessary to believe.

(Books.—Great use has been made of Dr. August Haha's Collection of Formulae and Dr. Caspari's Programme. Dr. Heurtley's Harmonia Symbolica has of course furnished important assistance. To other works reference has been made as required.) C. A. S.

CRESCENS. (1) Disciple of St. Paul, bishop in Galatia, is commemorated June 27 (Mart. Rom. Vet., Usuardi); April 15 (Cal. Byzant.)

(2) One of the seven sons of St. Symphorosa, martyr at Tivoli under Hadrian, July 21 (Mart. Bedae); June 27 (Mart. Usuardi).

(3) Or CRESCENTIUS, martyr at Tomi, Oct. 1 (Mart. Hieron., Rom. Vet., Usuardi). [C.]

CRESCENTIA, martyr in Sicily under Diocletian, June 15 (Mart. Hieron., Rom. Vet., Usuardi). [C.]

CRESCENTIANUS. (1) Martyr in Sardinia, May 31 (Mart. Hieron., Usuardi).

(2) Martyr in Africa, June 13 (Mart. Bedae).

(3) Martyr in Campania, July 2 (Mart. Usuardi).

(4) Martyr at Augustana, Aug. 12 (Mart. Usuardi).

(5) Martyr at Rome under Maximian, Nov. 24 (Mart. Bedae, Usuardi); March 16 (Mart. Rom. Vet.). [C.]

CRESCENTIO, or CRESCENTIUS, martyr at Rome, Sept. 17 (Mart. Rom. Vet., Usuardi). [C.]

CRESSY, COUNCIL OF. [CHRISTIACUM.]

In Ponthieu, A.D. 576; but according to Labb. (vi. 535), at Autun, A.D. 670, the canons being headed with the name of Leodegarius, bishop of Autun: passed several canons, but among others, one exacting, on pain of episcopal condemnation, from every priest, deacon, subdeacon, or "clericus," assent to the "Fides Sancti Athanasii præsullis." [A. W. H.]

CRISPINA, martyr in Africa under Diocletian, Dec. 5 (Cal. Carthag., Rom. Vet., Usuardi); Dec. 3 (Mart. Hieron., in some MSS.). [C.]

CRISPINUS. (1) Martyr with CRISPINIANUS at Soissons under Diocletian, Oct. 25 (Mart. Hieron., Bedae, Usuardi, Cal. Anglican.).

(2) Bishop, martyr at Astyagia, Nov. 19 (Mart. Usuardi). [C.]

CRISPOLUS, or CRISPULUS, martyr in Sardinia, May 30 (Mart. Hieron., Rom. Vet., Usuardi). [C.]

CRISPUS. (1) Presbyter, martyr at Rome under Diocletian, Aug. 18 (Mart. Rom. Vet., Usuardi).

(2) The "chief ruler of the synagogue," martyr at Corinth, Oct. 4 (Mart. Rom. Vet., Usuardi). [C.]

CRISTETA, martyr in Spain, Oct. 27 (Mart. Rom. Vet., Usuardi). [C.]

CROSIER. [PASTORAL STAFF.]

CROSS. The official or public use of the cross as a symbol of our redemption begins with Constantine, though it had doubtless been employed in private by all Christians at a much earlier date. (See Guericke's Antiquities of the Christian Church, Morison's tr., 1857, and Binterim's Denkwürdigkeiten, &c., with Mehus, quoted below.) In the Catacombs, and all the earliest records, it is constantly used in connexion with the monogram of Christ; and this may point to the probable fact of a double meaning in the use of the symbol from the earliest times. As derived from, or joined with, the monogram, especially with the monogram in its earliest or decussated form, the cross is a general or short-hand symbol for the name and person of Christ. As used with the somewhat later or transverse monogram, or when separated from the monogram and used by itself, it directs special attention to the sacrifice and death of the Lord, and as it were avows and glories in the manner of His death. "Le triomphe de la Christianisme s'affichait bien plus ouvertement sur cet insigne [the Labarum] au moyen du monogramme, comme exprimant le non du Christ, que par l'idée de la croix." Its use as a symbol of His person is of high antiquity; see Ciampini, Vet. Mon. t. ii, pp. 81 and 82, tav. xxiv, and c. viii, tav. xvii. D; although some discredit may have fallen on it from the actual personification of the symbol in later days, after the publication of the Legend of the Cross, when churches were dedicated to it, as St. Cross, or Holy Road, and it became an object of prayer. [STUX OF THE CROSS.] For the purely symbolic use of the great Christian and in part human emblem, Ciampini's plate, a copy of the great "Transfiguration" in mosaic in St. Apollinaris at Ravenna, A.D. 545, may be here described as a typical example. It covers the vault of an arch. The presence of the Father is represented by the ancient symbol of a HAND [see s. c.] issuing from a cloud above all. Below it is a cross of the Western form, slightly widened at the extremities, or tending to the Maltese, inscribed in a double circle orimbus. At the intersection is the Face of our Lord, scarcely distinguishable in Ciampini's small engraving, but visible in the now accessible photograph; and verified on the Girouald de S. Archéologique, Lorient seems in a part no more than it is found again (See Martigny, Arch. vol. xxv.) and left, and the with stars; that spots in pairs, variations of colour right and left a cross, with St. A the mountain is among which are The Holy Dove having reference Above the cross Ciampini interprets Christ: "below Didron, however vol. i.), asserts of S. Apollinare really IXOTC. seems to have growing to the vigorously enforced sacrificial death of Christ was dis Christ: the cross from the monog understood and fitly explicit. He the symbolic cross may have caducing awe and suffering of the symbol—the prog Church to actual the act of death certain from the factor for all men the heathen. The tion from the syn partly traced out s. "cross" and "cru confounded in their languages, particu taries, the followi perhaps hold good, or other representi or anyhow placed tional category.

* Didron, Iconographie t. i, vol. i. p. 367; Behn: "Christ is embodied in the Cross, as He is in the Lamb or as the Holy Spirit in the Dove. . . . In Christian iconography, Christ is actually present under the form and substance of the Cross. The Cross is our crucified Lord in person," &c. In the 9th century the praises of the Cross were sung, as men sing those of a god or a hero, Rhaban Maur, who was Archbishop of Mayence in 847, wrote a poem in honour of the Cross, De Laudibus Sanctae crucis. See his complete works, fol. Coloniae Agrippinae, 1626, vol. i. pp. 273-337. He further quotes St. Jerome's comparisons of "species crucis forma quadrata mundi" "aves quando volant, ad aethera formam crucis assumunt . . . homo natans, vel orans . . . navis per maria antea crucis similita. Tu littera signum salutis et crucis describitur."—Comment. in Marcum.

The Pontifical, or bishop's office-book, of Ebn or Egbert, brother of Eadbert, king of Northumbria, and consecrated archbishop of York in 1121, contains an office for the dedication of a cross, which certainly makes no mention of any human form thereon (v. Sacrae Societ. 1853, pp. 111-113). " . . . Quaesumus ut consecres tibi hoc signum crucis, quod tota mentis devotione famuli tui religiosa fides construxit trophaeum sollicitae victoriae tuae et redemptionis nostrae. . . . Haec tibi Unigeniti Filii tui splendor divinitatis in auro, eminent gloria passionis in ligno, in genere matris nostrae mitem redemptio, in splendore cristalli nostrae mortis remedium: sit aurum protectio, et cristalli lucida, et lignum simul cum genere et pietate fide confirmet, spe solidet, pacem consociet: angustis triumphis, amplifiet secundis, praestet eis ad persequendum nequitos, et ad vitam aeternitatis." &c. &c. A curiously mitigated state of thought or feeling is indicated by this passage: the cross is a symbol of Christ and a token of His victory; it is of material wood, gold, jewels, &c.; but a sacramental power seems to be considered as adherent in the symbol; (v. consecration gives it personality; and it is to be addressed in prayer as if possessed of actual powers.) cross into the Cru cross; the Crux C and the Immissa seems most conven Ciampini's plate ab probable, that the

and Latin crosses, unequal length of our prae'uce. Its from the time suc troversty (see CRUC continued) to inst instrument of the selected the most p which He suffered, secting bars was e

when separated from by itself, it the sacrifice as it were manner of e de in Christianism retemur sur cet in-royen du monogramme du Christ, que par use as a symbol of liquity; see Ciampini, ad 82, tav. xxiv., and gh some discrepant may actual personification
, after the publication s, when churches were Cross, or Holy Hood, of prayer." [Six or urely symbolic use of part human emblem, of the great "Trans-St. Apollinaris at Ra-here described as a ers the vault of a Father is represented of a HAND [see s. v.] ve all. Below it is a n, slightly widened at g to the Maltese, i.e. or nimbus. At the our Lord, scarcely dissmall engraving, but ible photograph; and

vol. i. p. 267; Behn: cross, as He is in the Lamb ... In Christian iconos, as under the form of Cross is our crucified Lord century the praises of the g those of a god or hero. ishop of Mayence in 847, f the Cross, De Lascibus plete works, fol. Coloniae 3-337. He further quotes "species crucis forma quavolant, ad aethera formam ans, vel orans... navis per Tan littera signum salutis ent in Marcum.
s office-book, of Ebert or king of Northumbria, and ick in 132, contains an office which certainly makes no thereon (v. Sixtes Society, quo-omnis ut consecrat TIBI quod tota mentis devotio struxit trophaeum sollet nostrae. . . . Hallet sic divinitatis in auro, emitt evore, rultit nostrae mentis ill nostrae mortis redemptionta fiducia, eous simul cum spe solidae, pae comocit: secundis, proficiat eis ad per-viam aeternitatis." &c. &c. thought or feeling is indi-cross is a symbol of Christ It is of material wood, gold all power seems to be con-al; its consecration gives it addressed in prayer as if verified on the spot, as we understand, by M. Girouard de St. Laurent. (Didron's Annales Archéologiques, vol. xxvi. p. 5.) This Face of the Lord seems in a work of the 5th century to import no more than the name or monogram; but it is found again on the oil-vessels of Monza. (See Martigny, s. v. Crucifix, and Didron, Annales Arch. vol. xxvi.) The A and ω are at its right and left, and the ground of the inner circle is sown with stars; that of the outer with small oblong spots in pairs, which probably indicate only variations of colour in the mosaic. Further to right and left are Moses and Elias adoring the cross, with St. Apollinaris below. The ascent of the mountain is indicated by trees and birds, among which are the universally present sheep. The Holy Dove is not represented, the mosaic having reference to the Transfiguration only. Above the cross are the letters IMDVC, which Ciampini interprets as "Immolatio Domini Jesus Christi;" below it the words "Salus Mundi," Didron, however (Christian Iconography, p. 396, vol. i.), asserts on the authority of M. Lacroix, who has given particular attention to the church of St. Apollinare in Classe, that these letters are really IXΘYC. The accession of Constantine seems to have been an occasion of publicly avowing to the Pagans, and therefore of more vigorously enforcing on the Christian mind, the sacrificial death of the Lord for man. The office of Christ was distinguished from the person of Christ: the cross was, so to speak, extricated from the monogram; and its full import, long understood and felt by all Christians, was now made explicit. However long the change from the symbolic cross to the realist or portrait crucifix may have taken—with whatever long-enduring awe and careful reverence the corporeal suffering of the Lord may have been veiled in symbol—the progress of a large part of the Church to actual representation of the Lord in the act of death seems to have been logically certain from the time when His death as a malefactor for all men was avowed and proclaimed to the heathen. The gradual progress or transition from the symbol to the representation is partly traced out s. v. CRUCIFIX; and as the words "cross" and "crucifix" are to a great extent confounded in their popular use in most European languages, particularly in Roman Catholic countries, the following tentative distinction may perhaps hold good,—that a cross with any symbol or other representation of a victim attached to it, or nayhow placed on it, passes into the crucifixion category.

The usual threefold division of the form of the cross into the Crux Decussata or St. Andrew's cross; the Crux Commissa, Tau, or Egyptian; and the Immissa or upright four-armed cross, seems most convenient. It would appear from Ciampini's plate above quoted, and is historically probable, that the distinction between the Greek and Latin crosses, by reason of the equal or unequal length of the arms, is scarcely within our purview. Its earliest origin dates perhaps from the time succeeding the Iconoclastic controversy (see CRUCIFIX), when the Latin mind continued to insist specially on the cross as the instrument of the Lord's death, and carefully selected the most probable shape of the cross on which He suffered. The symbol of the intersecting bars was enough for the Greek. As a Christian emblem, the decussated cross may be considered the most ancient; but all are of the earliest age of Christian work; as are many curious varieties of the cruciform figure. The forms in the woodcuts are Christian adaptations of pre-Christian crosses. They are called by Martigny and others to be what he says, formes dissimulées; or ancient symbols adopted by Christians as sufficiently like the cross or tree of punishment to convey to their minds the associations of the Lord's suffering, without proclaiming it in a manner which would shock heathen prejudice unnecessarily. Constantine appears to have felt that a time was come when his authority could enforce a different feeling with regard to the death of the Lord for men. He used the cross or monogram privately and publicly; impressed it on the arms of his soldiers; and erected large crosses on the Hippodrome and elsewhere in Constantinople. His use of it on his standards is well known. (CF. LABARUM, DRACONARIUM, Euseb., Vit. Const. iii. 3, refers to the Triumphal Cross made and set above the Dragon by Constantine. For his vision and the making of the Labarum, see ibid. pp. 28-39; Bingham, Antiq. s. v. Crucifix. Of its use on coins, which appears to begin with Valentinian I., A.D. 364-375, see coin of Valens in Angelo Engraved stone of earliest epoch. Didron, La Chrétienne, vol. i. p. 296.

Rocca, infra. It seems as if Constantine really hoped to use the Christian symbol as a token of union for his vast empire, with that mixture of sincere faith, superstition, and ability which characterized most of his actions. The frequent recurrence of the τοῦτοῦ ἔικα on ancient crosses shows the importance which he and others attached to his vision. Tertullian's words may suffice to express the general use of the cross in private in his time (De Cor. Mil. c. iii.): "Ad omnem progressum atque promotum; ad omnem aditum atque exitum; ad calcantum, ad lavacra, ad mensas, ad lumina, ad cubilla, ad sedilia:—quaeunque nos conversatio exerret, frontem crucis signaculo terminua." This is paralleled by St. Chrysostom's πανταχοῦ εὐρίσκουσαι (τ. σταυρῶν)—παρὰ ἀρχοῦσι, παρὰ ἀρχομένοις, παρὰ γυναιξί, παρὰ ἀνδρασί, . . . ἐν ἐπιλοῖς κ. ἐν παστάσι, ἐν σκεύεσιν ἀργυροῖς, ἐν τοῖσιν γραφαῖσι. Julian had derided the Christians as εἰκόνας σταυροῦ σκιαγραφούντες ἐν τῷ μετώπῳ, &c. They were accused of worshipping it as a divinity or fetiche. See the words of the pagan Caeclius, in Minucius Felix Octav. cc. ix. and xxix.: "Et qui hominem summo supplicio pro scelere punitum, et crucis ligna feratim eorum caeremoniis fabulantur, congruentia perditis sceleratisque, . . . ut id colant quod merentur." He is answered simply, "Cruces nec colimus nec optamus." This is also referred to by Molanus, De Picturis, c. v., with many other passages. [See SIGN OF THE CROSS.]

The cross of course conveyed to earlier Christians, as to-ourselves, the lesson of our own personal sacrifice or dedication to Christ, and the thought of His command to take up the cross. Hence doubtless its constant use in times of actual or remembered persecution. But this use of it would necessarily lead on from the thought of His person to that of His sacrifice. See the inscription by Paulinus of Nola, who made such ample use of pictorial and other decorations, placed under a cross at the entrance of his church:—

"Corne coronatam Domini super atria Christi Stare crucem, duro spontentem celsa labore Præmia. Tolle crucem, qui vis auferre coronam." (See Binterim, vol. iv. part I., and Molanus, De Imaginibus, c. 7, De Picturis.)^b

The private use of crosses, or representations of the cross, is highly uncertain before Constantine, though Martigny refers to Perret (Catacombes de Rome, iv. pl. xvi. 74) for certain stones, apparently belonging to rings, on which the cross is engraved, and which appear to be of date prior to Constantine. It seems probable that the use of the monogram prevailed before and during his time, with sacrificial meaning attaching more and more to the cruciform in the Christian mind. (See Binterim, vol. iv. part ii.)

The most interesting cross in existence of this kind seems to be the pectoral cross or εγκόλαπιον in gold and niello, described last by M. St. Laurent in Didron's Annales Archéologiques. It is said to contain a fragment of the wood of the cross, and bears on its front EMANOVHA NOBISCVM DEYS on the back, "Crux est vita mihi; mors, inimice, tibi," in same characters. It must date from near the time of the Empress Helena, when many like crosses began to be worn. Compare drawing of serpent below the monogram.

One example is given by Bolletti of a tau-cross, dating A.D. 370 according to the consuls: neither the Crux Immissa nor the Greek cross appear by actual examples till the 5th century. This question of date can hardly be decided in the Catacombs, from the number of crosses inscribed there by pilgrims of all periods.

There is a passage from Severus Sanctus Endeletachus or Entelechius, a Christian poet, probably of Aquitaine, in the latter part of the 4th century, where a Christian shepherd has secured his flock from disease by planting or marking between their horns ("signum medii frontibus additum") the cross of "the God men worship in great cities":—

"Signum, quod perhibent esse crucis Dei Magnis qui colitur sedus in urbibus, Christus, perpetua gloria numinis," &c.

De Rossi's work, De Titulis Christianis Carthaginiensibus, speaks of 4th century marbles bear-^b For examples and discussion of this subject, see Binterim, vol. iv. part I.

ing the cross; and it is possible that in distant provinces the associations of shameful death may not have clung to it so closely. M. Lancret makes the obvious remark that the use of the cross spread with a rapidity proportioned to the advance of Christianity, and speaks of its earlier and freer use in Africa, quoting De Rossi, D. T. C. For Constantine's golden cross on the tomb of St. Peter, see Anastasius, Lib. Pontif., In Syl. resto, p. 8, Scr. Byz. (Fabroti); also Euellius, Const. Vit. iii. 49. Two crosses from the Catacomb of St. Pontianus given by Bottari, Inv. xlv., xlvii., richly adorned with jewels and metal-work, one of which has the $\Lambda \omega$ attached to it by chains, may also date from the years immediately preceding Constantine, if not works of his time. The great Cross of the Lateran, so called, is referred to his time, and apparently accepted as of that date by Binterim, vol. iv. part i. frontispiece. It is in mosaic, and though restored by Nicolas IV., can hardly have been altered. It is a plain cross, having a medallion of the Lord's baptism at its intersection. The Holy Spirit, in form of a dove, with nimbus hovers above; and from Him seems to proceed the baptismal fountain, which at the cross-foot becomes the source of the four rivers, Gihon, Pison, Tigris, Euphrates. Between the rivers is the Holy City of God, guarded by the archangel Michael, behind whom springs up a palm-tree, on which sits the Phoenix as a symbol of Christ. [PHENIX.] Two stags below near the waters represent the heathen, seeking baptism; and three sheep on each side stand, as usual, for the Hebrew and Gentile Churches. This relic should be compared with a similar one given by De Rossi (De Titulis Carthaginiensibus), where the cross stands on a hill, and the four rivers spring from its foot, with stags, &c., as both have decided reference to baptism, and illustrate the earliest representative use of the cross as a symbol of Christ, with special reference not to His death but His baptism. Others even in later times were made with this view, and indeed with ornaments representing Old Testament types of the Redeemer. (See CRUCIFIX, account of the station-cross of Mainz.)

Lateran Cross. (Binterim, vol. iv. p. l.)

The use of the Tau, patibulary, or Egyptian

Cross,^c is ge-T perioto be yond
and

of those who pre-Christian, of course be interpretations which connect nature-worship which includ
use of the s the serpent, &c.; 2dly, th as types with that with the C Isaac, and the serpent was sup appropriate her cross of the O corned with it interesting and Christian cross, and references Review of April

The tau appe a sepulchral ins

tury, thus: IR occurs elsewhere and some of the treasury of Mon Didron's Annales

Still in some o possibly have be the pre-Christian world to come.

In Bolletti, li cross of black m probably be of l which it was fou an early inscrip

thus: A T passage from Ter who refers to E portae in medi in frontibus vir corum Tau, nust Ado. Marcian, li specially appropri the Redeemer, in seral type. [CR

(Didron's Annales

^c In Lipsius, De Phœnician origin,
QUIBST. ANT.

This is general from perhaps the earliest period. Some special difficulties appear to be connected with it, as it is beyond doubt a pre-Christian emblem, and as such connected in the minds of those who used it with special, at least pre-Christian, meanings. These meanings will of course be of two classes:—1stly, the interpretations of speculative minds in all ages which connect the tau-cross with Egyptian nature-worship through the Crux Ansata, and which include all the Ophite and Gnostic uses of the symbol, and its connexion with the serpent, as a sign of strength, wisdom, &c.; 2ndly, those of Hebrew origin, connected as types with the Old Testament, and through that with the Christian faith,—the wood borne by Isaac, and the tau or cross on which the brazen serpent was supported. Didron's remark seems appropriate here, that the tau is the anticipatory cross of the Old Testament. We are not concerned with it as such, and may refer for much interesting and erudite speculation on the pre-Christian cross, or decussated figure, to the text and references of an article in the Edinburgh Review of April, 1870.

The tau appears in the Callixtine Catacomb, in a sepulchral inscription, referred to the 3rd century, thus: IRE T NE. This frequently occurs elsewhere (De Rossi, Bullet. 1863, p. 35); and some of the crucifixes on the vessels of the treasury of Monza are of the same shape. (See Didron's Annales Archéologiques, vv. xxvi.-vii.) Still in some of the earliest examples it may possibly have been used, even by Christians, in the pre-Christian sense, as a type of life in the world to come.

In Boldetti, lib. ii. c. iii. p. 353, an Egyptian cross of black marble mosaic is given, which may probably be of later date than the catacomb in which it was found; but the next page contains an early inscription of the tau between A and ω.

Thus: A T ω. He quotes the following passage from Tertullian on this form of the cross, who refers to Ezekiel thus: "Pertransi medium portae in medium Jerusalem et da signum Tau in frontibus virorum. Ipsa enim litera Graecorum Tau, nostra autem T, species crucis."—Adv. Marcian. lib. iii. 23. This form of cross is specially appropriated to the thieves rather than the Redeemer, in some crucifixions of early medieval type. [CRUCIFIX.]

Archæol.-Cross.
(Didron's Annales Archéologiques, vol. xvii. frontispiece.)

* In Ipetus, De Cruce, l. 7, it is shown to be of Pœnician origin.
CHRIST. ART.

Both Greek and Roman crosses, and in particular cruciform churches,⁴ sometimes possess one or even two additional cross limbs, shorter than the main or central one. The upper additional bar is supposed by Didron to stand for the title over the head of the Crucified One. If this be so, the lower may be taken to represent the suppedaneum, a support for His feet. In cases where both the shorter limbs are placed above the main cross-bar, as in the cross represented in Boldetti, lib. i. c. ii. p. 271, they certainly represent the crosses of the malefactors. [CRUCIFIX.] See two coins of Valens and Anthemius, Angelo Rocca, Bibl. Vaticana, vol. ii. p. 253. One, a nummus aereus, has the three crosses, the other with two smaller cross-beams under the large one.

The term "station-cross" is derived from the Cross on Tomb of Flavia Jovina, referred by Baroccius to A.D. 367.

(Boldetti, lib. i. c. ii. p. 271.)

On a single Tomb, Callixtine Catacomb.
(Boldetti, lib. ii. c. iii. p. 353.)

Roman military term statio, and applied to a large cross on the chief altar, or in some principal place of a church, but occasionally removed or carried in procession to another place, and then constituting a special place of prayer. (See Bottari, tav. xlv., and illustration of Lateran Cross.) Processional crosses may be traced to the use of the Labarum in Constantine's army, and also of his substitution of the Cross for the Dragon, or placing it above the Dragon on standards of cohorts, &c. (See the Church use of the word Draconarius, standard-bearer.)

The distinction between the Cross of the Resurrection, or Triumphal Cross, and the Cross of the Passion, is traceable to early times. In Ciampini, V. M. tav. xvii. D (ch. viii.), our Lord in glory stands by and supports a large cross, having the angels Michael and Gabriel on either hand. The Lamb is also frequently represented as bearing the lighter and longer triumphal cross. (See CRUCIFIX, and references to the Vatican Cross, &c.) It is also borne by our Lord in representations of the Descent into Hades. It is symbolic

⁴ Constantine's ancient church of St. Peter, S. Paolo fuori delle Mura, and Sta. Maria Maggiore were all built in the form of a cross. That of S. Paolo is a  with projecting spire.

of the victory gained by the sufferings to which the Passion-cross calls our special attention.

The drawing of the engraved stone or signet-cross at p. 495, with the motto "Salus," represents a device with the triumphal cross. The monogram of the Lord is placed over the serpent, which vainly tempts the doves, who look to the symbol of their Lord. But see s. v. SERPENT.

The statement of Bede (Binterim, vol. iv. l. p. 501) relating to the four kinds of wood of which the cross was made—the upright of cypress, the cross-

(B)

(C)

In Cemetery of St. Agnes

(D)

In Cemetery of Domitia.

(Baldetti, lib. ii. c. iii. p. 383.)

piece of cedar, the head-piece of fir, and the suppedaneum of box—departs from the Eastern tradition, which substitutes olive and palm for the two latter varieties of wood. This forms part of the legendary history of the cross, with which we are not concerned. The only remarks to be made by way of conclusion or summary appear to be these: that a double, and indeed manifold, meaning attached to the cross from the earliest ages. Derived as a Christian sign from the monogram, and connected with traditions of ancient learning by its Egyptian form, it may be said to have stood for all things to all men. To the earliest members of the Church it represented their Master, who was all in all to them; and thus in their view, a somewhat wider and happier one than in later days, it represented all the faith—the person of Christ, His death for man, and the life and death of man in Christ. The Latin and other crosses point to baptism and all its train of Christian thought, without immediate reference to the Lord's sacrifice. [LAMB.] Constantine indeed (see Anastat. Vit. Pontif. in Sylvestro) seems to have attached the symbol of the Lamb to the Baptist and the sacrament he administered, as well as to the Lord's Supper and the showing forth of His death. The tendency of Christian feeling towards special or exclusive contemplation of the Lord's sufferings and death is a matter of ecclesiastical history; and its effect on Christian emotion, and therefore on Christian art, is the transition from the cross into the crucifix. (See s. v.)

An evidence of the feelings of subdued triumph with which the cross was regarded in the earliest times, as a symbol first of the Lord's life and death, then of the life and death of man, is that it is so frequently wreathed, embossed, or otherwise ornamented with flowers. Even as late as the Monza vessels, it is represented as a living and budding stem; but the cross from St. Pantanus, given by Bottari, xlv. is made to put forth golden or silver flowers half-way up its stem.

Count Melchior de Vogué (Revue Archéologique, vol. vii. p. 201) gives a highly interesting account of the ruins, or rather the scarcely-injured remains, of four ancient Christian towns, on the left bank of the Orontes, between Antioch and Aleppo. They contain many ancient crosses, and were probably deserted at the same time, on the first Mussulman invasion. "On est transporté," he says, "au milieu de la société chrétienne... non plus in vie cachée des catacombes, ni l'existence humiliée, timide, souffrante, mais une vie large, opulente, artistique.... Des croix, des monogrammes du Christ sont sculptés en relief sur la plupart des portes: le ton de ces inscriptions indique une époque voisine du triomphe de l'Eglise.... Le graffiti d'un peintre obscur, qui, décorant un tombeau, n, pour essayer son pinceau, tracé sur le paroi du rocher des monogrammes du Christ, et dans son enthousiasme de Chrétien émancipé écrit, en paraphrasant le labarum, Ταύο νικά, Ceci triomphe." [R. St. J. T.]

CROSS, ADORATION OF. (Adoratio Crucis, ή προσκύνησις του σταυρου.)

I. Adoration of the Cross from the heathen point of view.—Christianity being a "religion of the cross," the cross being in every Christian teacher's mouth as the watchword of the new faith, the action of signing with the cross [SIX OF THE CROSS] being believed in by the Christians as a preservative against all dangers bodily and spiritual, what wonder is it that the heathen should have seen in early Christianity but a σταυρολατρεία, and in the cross but a Christian idol not less material than their own?

Thus we find Tertullian feeling it necessary carefully to combat this among divers false views of Christian worship prevalent among the heathen. His words, with the logic of which we have nothing to do, are "Sed et qui Croci nos religiosos putat, conseranens erit noster!"—Even if we did worship the cross, we should be no worse than you, for the cross enters directly or indirectly in for example, a which the maker first erect the c work of trophies whom you adore similar stamin, &

We find referen in the Odrysus where the heat marks "ut id again (c. 12), "sundae Cruces." attack speaks as in which the cro adds (c. 29), "optamus," by v Christians do not each adoration to your idols.

part of the heat may be seen fro mas as the Eir after Minucius I tians, as the Cae with inconsistency reverence (προσκύνησις) fell down from J them as a pledg golden or silver flowers half-way up its stem.

wood of the cross shown to the ci it on their foreh their houses (Cy vi. Patrol. Gr. ix casner is worthy Lord and Saviour Divine Majesty, a was willing to tr servant, and to be end to die the cr the cross, therefo things by the sigh One did thereon value the symbol remembrance of H

II. Point of view flaring thus allu cross as seen from shall next endeav the Idem among C of reverence to be may be expressed is paid to the ma idea of the cross fo it is the reverence holy or cherished to God, προσκύνησις that in this modifi Christians maintai the sacred symbol Le Nourry's Dissert Art. 4 in Patrol. ii of Constantine, τὸ Ἱεροσολ. i. 31 Oratio de laudibus l. 4, ἀεὶ τοῦ Βασιλ εὐσεβήματος κα of Jerusalem (Ep of τὸ καθήκον above-mentioned in might be viewed terical way of speak or indirectly into your own objects of worship; for example, as being the structure around which the makers of images of the gods would first erect the clay model, or as being the framework of trophies reared in honour of victory whom you adore as a deity (Apol. c. 16; and in similar strain, Ad Nationes i. c. 12).

We find references to the same heathen taunt in the Octavius of Minucius Felix, as e. g. in c. 9, where the heathen objector winds up his remarks "ut id colunt quod mercantur;" and again (c. 12), "et jam non adorantia, sed subrogatae Cruces." The writer in meeting this attack speaks as Tertullian had done of the way in which the cross entered into heathenism, and adds (c. 29), "Cruces etiam nec colimus, nec optamus;" by which he seems to mean, We Christians do not worship the cross so as to give such adoration and honour to it as you heathen to your idols. That this misconception on the part of the heathen was not speedily overcome may be seen from the case of so intelligent a man as the Emperor Julian, who, a century after Minucius had written, taunts the Christians, as the Caecilius of that writer had done, with inconsistency, in that while they refused to reverence (προσκυνεῖν) the sacred Ancile which fell down from Jupiter and was preserved among them as a pledge of the protection ever to be shown to the city, they still revered the wood of the cross, continually made the sign of it on their foreheads, and engraved it before their houses (Cyril Alex. Contra Julianum, lib. vi. Patrol. Gr. lxxvi. 795). The gist of Cyril's answer is worthy of notice:—Since Christ the Lord and Saviour of all divested Himself of His Divine Majesty, and leaving His Father's Throne was willing to take upon Him the form of a servant, and to be made in the likeness of man, and to die the cruel and ignominious death of the cross, therefore we being reminded of these things by the sight of the cross, and taught that Our Lord thereon that we all might have life, raise the symbol as productive of thankful remembrance of Him.

II. Point of view of early Christian writers.—Having thus alluded to the adoration of the cross as seen from the heathen point of view, we shall next endeavour to trace the existence of the idea among Christians of a modified form of reverence to be paid to the cross. That idea may be expressed roughly thus: No reverence is paid to the material cross as such; it is the idea of the cross for which reverence is felt; but it is the reverence or worship due to a most holy or cherished thing, not that which is due to God, προσκύνησις, not λατρεία. Certain it is that in this modified sense of worship the early Christians maintained the duty of reverence to the sacred symbol of redemption (see especially Le Nourry's Dissertation in Minuc. Fel. c. xii. Art. 4 in Patrol. iii. 531). Thus Eusebius says of Constantine, τὸν μικροῦν ἔτιμα σταυρὸν (Vita Const. i. 31; cf. ib. ii. 16; iv. 21; and Oratio de laudibus Const. c. 9; also Sozomen i. 4, ἀὲ τὸ βασιλεὺς ἠγείσθαι καὶ προσκυνῆσαι νεκρῶντο παρὰ τῶν στρατιωτῶν). Cyril of Jerusalem (Ep. ad Const. p. 247) speaks of τὸ στήριον τοῦ σταυροῦ ἔργον. The above-mentioned instances taken by themselves might be viewed as due to a somewhat rhetorical way of speaking, but the real nature of the feeling is shown by the following more definite instances.

Ambrose (In ob. Theodosii, § 46) tells of the Empress Helena's adoration of the cross after her discovery of Pilate's superscription, and adds: "Regem adoravit, non lignum utique, quia hic Gentilis est error et vanitas impiorum; sed adoravit illum qui pependit in ligno, scriptus in Cruce." Shortly afterwards he describes how the cross was placed upon kings by Helena, "ut in regibus adoretur."

Jerome, again, in the Epitaphium Paulae Matris (Ep. 108 ad Eustochium, § 9, Patrol. xxii. 883), says that "Paula prostrata ante Crucem quasi pendentem Domini cerneret, adorabat."

In the above instances Ambrose and Jerome are referring to the cross said to be found by Helena, but in the case of Minucius and others anterior to the time of Constantine the allusion is necessarily to crosses, viewed as signs and images of the true cross; and the view which is controverted is the belief of the heathen world in the veneration paid by Christians to the cross absolutely (see further, Origen, in Coloma ii. 47). Cf. further the distinction as drawn by Augustine (Tract. i. in Johannem, § 16): "Dicimus quidem lignum vitam, sed secundum intellectum lignum Crucis unde acceptimus vitam." The same line is taken in the Quaestiones ad Antiochum ducent (xxxix. Patrol. Gr. xxviii. 622), falsely attributed to Athanasius, in answer to the question, Why, when God has forbidden through His prophets the worship of created things, do we offer adoration to images and the cross? Rusticus Diaconus, a writer of the time of Pope Vigilius, carefully defines the matter in the same way, for after maintaining the adoration of the cross as leading on to that of the Crucified, he adds, "non tamen Crucem adorare dicimus Christo" (Contra Acrophales: Patrol. lxxvii. 1218).

John Damascenus (ob. circa 756 A.D.) is careful exactly to define, as the above-mentioned writers have done, the nature of the reverence paid by Christians to the cross. He says (de fide orthodoxa iv. 11): προσκυνούμεν δὲ καὶ τὸν τύπον τοῦ τιμίον καὶ ζωοποιῶν σταυροῦ . . . ὁδὴ τῆς ἑλπίδος τῶν πάντων (μὴ γίνονται), ἀλλὰ τὸν τύπον ὡς Χριστοῦ σύμβολον. And hereon, he adds, may our adoration of the cross rest, ἵνα γὰρ ἂν ᾖ τὸ σημείον, ἐκεῖ καὶ αὐτὸ, &c.

Further illustrations of the wide spread of the feeling are to be found in numerous narratives of the Fathers, of a more or less legendary character, referring to the miraculous power inherent in the sacred symbol. Thus Sozomen (Hist. Eccl. ii. 3) gives us an account of a certain physician named Probianus who had been converted to Christianity, but who would not accord honour to the cross as the sign of salvation, until when suffering from a painful disease of the feet he was taught by a vision [cf. ALTAR, p. 66] to find in reverence of the cross a means of relief, and thus was cured. [We again find this story, cited from Sozomen, in the Historia Tripartita (ii. 19), compiled by Cassiodorus.]

A parallel incident is that related by Evagrius (Eccl. Hist. iv. 26), to the effect that on the burning of Antioch by Chosroes, the bishop of Apamea consented to display the wood of the cross to the adoration of the people, that their represented their them; and thus in order and happier seated all the faith—Christ. The Lasten baptism and all its without immediate office. [LAMB.] Conat. Vita Pontif, in the sacrament he ad the Lord's Supper and death. The tendency is special or exclusive sufferings and death history; and its effect therefore on Christian the cross into the

of subduel triumph regarded in the earliest of the Lord's life and death of man, is wreathed, embossed, or flowers. Even as late represented as a living cr-ss from St. Poutiv. is made to put forth ill-way up its stem.

(Revue Archéologique, highly interesting acer the severely-injured hristian towns, on the between Antioch and ny ancient crosses, and the same time, on the "On est transporté," société chrétienne . . . es entombées, in l'etrouvante, mais une vie e. . . . Des croix, des sont sculptés en relief le ton de ces inscripvoisine du triomphe de un peintre obscur, qui our essayer son plaisir, cher des monogrammes e thousandisme de Chrétien rassant le labarum. [R. St. J. T.]

OF. (Adoratio Crucis, &c.)

Cross from the heathen ty being a "religion of eing in every Christian watchword of the new with the cross [Stox] lieved in by the Chris- against all dangers bodily er is that the heathen early Christianity but a the cross but a Christian an their own? dian feeling it necessary his among divers false ship prevalent among the with the logic of which are "Sed et qui Crucis seraceneus erit noster."— the cross, we should be the cross enters directly last kiss of the sacred relic might be as it were their vinticum to the other world. The historian mentions that he was present with his parents, and describes the scene at some length, and tells how, while the bishop made the circuit of the church carrying the cross ἕρπαιε ἐν ταῖς νηυσὶν τῶν προσηκούντων ἡμῶν εἶδητο, he was followed by a large mass of flame, blazing but not consuming; a token of the safety vouchsafed to the city.

Again, Bede (Hist. Eccl. iii. 2) tells us of Oswald, a Saxon king (635 A.D.), who, being in imminent danger in war, erected and offered adoration to a cross, by which victory was secured.

One more illustration may suffice. In the Trullan Synod held at Constantinople in 681 A.D., it was ordained that since the cross shows to us the way of salvation, and therefore we offer to it in words and in thought our adoration, it should be distinctly prohibited to engrave crosses on the pavement, where they would be trodden under foot, and that where these already existed they should be erased (can. 73; Labbé, Concilii, vi. 1175).

The above examples clearly prove the existence amongst the early Christians of a veneration for the cross, combined with the feeling of the necessity of excluding from this the idea of absolute worship. The constant use of the sign of the cross [SIGN OF THE CROSS] is a further exemplification of this.

The special character of hymns is obviously such as to admit of a less exact style of language, but the tone of the early Christian poets shows clearly the nature of their views as to the veneration of the cross. In a poem (De Passione Domini) attributed by some to Lactantius, it is said (vv. 50 seq.):—

"Flecte genu lignumque Crucis venerabile adora Fidellis, innocens et rancore creore madentem Ore petens inuulsi."*

Much again can be gathered from Prudentius (405 A.D.) on this point. Thus we find (Apotheosis 446)—

"Jam purpura supplex Sternitur Aeneadae reclusis ad atria Christi, Vexillumque Crucis summus dominator adorat."

Again in the description of Constantine's victory over Maxentius (Contra Symmachum l. 494), he says—

"Tunc ille senatus Militiæ nitricis titulum, Christi-que verendum Nomen adoravit quod collucebat in armis."

The allusion here is to the cross and the monogram on the labarum (cf. also Cath. vi. 129, and Paulinus Nol. Præm. xxx. 97 sqq.).

Finally, we may cite the words of Sedulius (Carmen Paschale, lib. v. 188; Patrol. xix. 724)—

"Nève quis ignoret speciem Crucis esse colendam."

* In the prolegomena to the Roman edition of Prudentius (l. c. ix. 669), the accusation is brought against George Fabricius of tampering with the above, by omitting, through doctrinal proclivities, the words "lignumque . . . fidellis;" a proceeding justly reprehended by John Albert Fabricius: "Sane justè reprehendit per John Albert Fabricius: 'Sane præsertim G. Fabricii . . . pæsim, tam ille tam alibi, non ita fuisse in alienis operibus quod edebat logeniosum' (Bib. vel. Lat. p. 709, ed. 1712).

III. Adoration of the Cross in ancient Liturgies.—In the Western Church such a rite has long been observed on Good Friday. The custom is probably very ancient, and has possibly flowed hither from the East, for the words of Paulinus (Ep. 31, Patrol. lxi. 329) with reference to the observance of the like practice at Jerusalem, will carry back the date to the 4th century:—"Quam episcopus urbis ejus quotannis, cum Pascha Dominal agitur, adorandam populo princeps ipse venerantium promit." According to the Gregorian Sacramentary (Patrol. lxxviii. 86), at Vespers on Good Friday a cross is set up in front of the altar; then—"Venit Pontifex, adoratum deosculatur Crucem. Deinde episcopi, presbyteri, diaconi et ceteri per ordinem, deinde populus: Pontifex vero recit in sedem usque dum omnes saluent." Whenever a salutation is made (salutante pontifice vel populo) the Antiphon Ecce lignum Crucis is sung; and then when all have saluted, the pope descends to the front of the altar and the service proceeds. Sundry differences, but of no great moment, occur in the form given in the Gelasian Sacramentary (Patrol. lxxiv. 1103). A more elaborate ritual, however, is to be found in the Mozarabic Liturgy (Patrol. lxxxv. 430; lxxvi. 609), in which before Nones on Good Friday, after the Lord's Prayer, came the hymn Ad Salutationem ligni Domini,

"Pange lingua gloriosum Prælium certaminis," &c.

This was followed by the prayer, "O sancta Crux, in qua salus nostra pepenit, per te introeamus ad Patrem, per te veniam mereamur, per te apud Christum habeamus indulgentiam et veniam;" and this again by three antiphons de ligno Domini. Nothing further is added here in the Breviary as to the adoration of the cross, possibly because the rest is to be found in the Missal.

From this we learn the nature of the ceremony of adoration as performed at the Nones, and this, as in the preceding instance, we shall briefly describe.

Two priests hold before the altar a cross draped in black, standing first at the left, then at the right, and lastly at the middle of the altar. As each position is occupied, the antiphons are respectively chanted—Iopule meus quid feci tibi . . . quia eduxi te . . . quid u tva debui . . . with its own response after each. At the end of the third station the officiating priest receives the cross from the hands of the two who are holding it, and standing successively at the right end, the left end, and the middle of the altar, he uncovers at each station respectively the right arm, the left arm, and the whole of the cross, saying on each occasion, with voice growing louder each time, the antiphon Ecce lignum Crucis, to which is responded, In qua salus nostra pependit, it being ordered that as each limb of the cross is unveiled, the people should bend the knee. The priest having reverently placed the cross in front of the altar "statim presbyteri cum suis ministris adorent Crucem flectendo genua ter, cum summa reverentia et hinc obferant oblatis ex-vulsum;" (Patrol. lxi. 329) a addressed to Crucem tuam tuam Alexander L. his note on the of the terms of to the cross, that explored in the G. taries and the the Mozarabic Eccl. Off. i. 14) paratur crux an lantur omnes." As illustrating quote from the Exultation of the mentary: "Con dam vivificam At the end of M up by the pontif (cf. Aleuin, Ado. nishes us with a Crucis); and a from the Greek *χαριστος, ὁ ζωοποι ῥησανος, ἡ θρησα ερρηγυος . . . FINDING OF THIS The season who been especially as the cross is the ensuing week. N the writings of ference to this. to Chrysostom, b quest to his tir τιμὸν καὶ ζωοποι τῶν ἁγίων, the pastly appointed it would imply the one—*Ἐμπερον το τὸν τιμὸν στραυρι works of Sophroni sermo with the sa Patrol. Gr. lxxxvi Exultationem S. Cr of the season of t quest to our Lor στραυρι ἁγιοποιος same character as Stallia (Patrol. G. p. lxxxi. concerning this fa genitus, De Cuerni 24; and especial 164, 1617); and ct Duacange's Glossary which name and b the Greek Church k Gospel for this day 14—v. 6, and Mar also in the Greek the cross for adora abouts, for which Gr. ciii. 1609.) Thus the Menology thus τῶν ἁγίων ἑξήκων and its importance of its having its *spa verentia et hinc obferant oblatis ex-vulsum;" (Patrol. lxi. 329) a addressed to Crucem tuam tuam Alexander L. his note on the of the terms of to the cross, that explored in the G. taries and the the Mozarabic Eccl. Off. i. 14) paratur crux an lantur omnes." As illustrating quote from the Exultation of the mentary: "Con dam vivificam At the end of M up by the pontif (cf. Aleuin, Ado. nishes us with a Crucis); and a from the Greek *χαριστος, ὁ ζωοποι ῥησανος, ἡ θρησα ερρηγυος . . . FINDING OF THIS The season who been especially as the cross is the ensuing week. N the writings of ference to this. to Chrysostom, b quest to his tir τιμὸν καὶ ζωοποι τῶν ἁγίων, the pastly appointed it would imply the one—*Ἐμπερον το τὸν τιμὸν στραυρι works of Sophroni sermo with the sa Patrol. Gr. lxxxvi Exultationem S. Cr of the season of t quest to our Lor στραυρι ἁγιοποιος same character as Stallia (Patrol. G. p. lxxxi. concerning this fa genitus, De Cuerni 24; and especial 164, 1617); and ct Duacange's Glossary which name and b the Greek Church k Gospel for this day 14—v. 6, and Mar also in the Greek the cross for adora abouts, for which Gr. ciii. 1609.) Thus the Menology thus τῶν ἁγίων ἑξήκων and its importance of its having its *spa verentia et hinc obferant oblatis ex-vulsum;" (Patrol. lxi. 329) a addressed to Crucem tuam tuam Alexander L. his note on the of the terms of to the cross, that explored in the G. taries and the the Mozarabic Eccl. Off. i. 14) paratur crux an lantur omnes." As illustrating quote from the Exultation of the mentary: "Con dam vivificam At the end of M up by the pontif (cf. Aleuin, Ado. nishes us with a Crucis); and a from the Greek *χαριστος, ὁ ζωοποι ῥησανος, ἡ θρησα ερρηγυος . . . FINDING OF THIS The season who been especially as the cross is the ensuing week. N the writings of ference to this. to Chrysostom, b quest to his tir τιμὸν καὶ ζωοποι τῶν ἁγίων, the pastly appointed it would imply the one—*Ἐμπερον το τὸν τιμὸν στραυρι works of Sophroni sermo with the sa Patrol. Gr. lxxxvi Exultationem S. Cr of the season of t quest to our Lor στραυρι ἁγιοποιος same character as Stallia (Patrol. G. p. lxxxi. concerning this fa genitus, De Cuerni 24; and especial 164, 1617); and ct Duacange's Glossary which name and b the Greek Church k Gospel for this day 14—v. 6, and Mar also in the Greek the cross for adora abouts, for which Gr. ciii. 1609.) Thus the Menology thus τῶν ἁγίων ἑξήκων and its importance of its having its *spa verentia et hinc obferant oblatis ex-vulsum;" (Patrol. lxi. 329) a addressed to Crucem tuam tuam Alexander L. his note on the of the terms of to the cross, that explored in the G. taries and the the Mozarabic Eccl. Off. i. 14) paratur crux an lantur omnes." As illustrating quote from the Exultation of the mentary: "Con dam vivificam At the end of M up by the pontif (cf. Aleuin, Ado. nishes us with a Crucis); and a from the Greek *χαριστος, ὁ ζωοποι ῥησανος, ἡ θρησα ερρηγυος . . . FINDING OF THIS The season who been especially as the cross is the ensuing week. N the writings of ference to this. to Chrysostom, b quest to his tir τιμὸν καὶ ζωοποι τῶν ἁγίων, the pastly appointed it would imply the one—*Ἐμπερον το τὸν τιμὸν στραυρι works of Sophroni sermo with the sa Patrol. Gr. lxxxvi Exultationem S. Cr of the season of t quest to our Lor στραυρι ἁγιοποιος same character as Stallia (Patrol. G. p. lxxxi. concerning this fa genitus, De Cuerni 24; and especial 164, 1617); and ct Duacange's Glossary which name and b the Greek Church k Gospel for this day 14—v. 6, and Mar also in the Greek the cross for adora abouts, for which Gr. ciii. 1609.) Thus the Menology thus τῶν ἁγίων ἑξήκων and its importance of its having its *spa verentia et hinc obferant oblatis ex-vulsum;" (Patrol. lxi. 329) a addressed to Crucem tuam tuam Alexander L. his note on the of the terms of to the cross, that explored in the G. taries and the the Mozarabic Eccl. Off. i. 14) paratur crux an lantur omnes." As illustrating quote from the Exultation of the mentary: "Con dam vivificam At the end of M up by the pontif (cf. Aleuin, Ado. nishes us with a Crucis); and a from the Greek *χαριστος, ὁ ζωοποι ῥησανος, ἡ θρησα ερρηγυος . . . FINDING OF THIS The season who been especially as the cross is the ensuing week. N the writings of ference to this. to Chrysostom, b quest to his tir τιμὸν καὶ ζωοποι τῶν ἁγίων, the pastly appointed it would imply the one—*Ἐμπερον το τὸν τιμὸν στραυρι works of Sophroni sermo with the sa Patrol. Gr. lxxxvi Exultationem S. Cr of the season of t quest to our Lor στραυρι ἁγιοποιος same character as Stallia (Patrol. G. p. lxxxi. concerning this fa genitus, De Cuerni 24; and especial 164, 1617); and ct Duacange's Glossary which name and b the Greek Church k Gospel for this day 14—v. 6, and Mar also in the Greek the cross for adora abouts, for which Gr. ciii. 1609.) Thus the Menology thus τῶν ἁγίων ἑξήκων and its importance of its having its *spa verentia et hinc obferant oblatis ex-vulsum;" (Patrol. lxi. 329) a addressed to Crucem tuam tuam Alexander L. his note on the of the terms of to the cross, that explored in the G. taries and the the Mozarabic Eccl. Off. i. 14) paratur crux an lantur omnes." As illustrating quote from the Exultation of the mentary: "Con dam vivificam At the end of M up by the pontif (cf. Aleuin, Ado. nishes us with a Crucis); and a from the Greek *χαριστος, ὁ ζωοποι ῥησανος, ἡ θρησα ερρηγυος . . . FINDING OF THIS The season who been especially as the cross is the ensuing week. N the writings of ference to this. to Chrysostom, b quest to his tir τιμὸν καὶ ζωοποι τῶν ἁγίων, the pastly appointed it would imply the one—*Ἐμπερον το τὸν τιμὸν στραυρι works of Sophroni sermo with the sa Patrol. Gr. lxxxvi Exultationem S. Cr of the season of t quest to our Lor στραυρι ἁγιοποιος same character as Stallia (Patrol. G. p. lxxxi. concerning this fa genitus, De Cuerni 24; and especial 164, 1617); and ct Duacange's Glossary which name and b the Greek Church k Gospel for this day 14—v. 6, and Mar also in the Greek the cross for adora abouts, for which Gr. ciii. 1609.) Thus the Menology thus τῶν ἁγίων ἑξήκων and its importance of its having its *spa in ancient Litur- such a rite has rday. The custom has possibly flowe words of Paulinas reference to the tice at Jerusalem, e 4th century?— as quotannis, cum ndum populo prun-." According to .Patrol. lxxviii, 85), a cross is set up —"Venit Pontific, . Deuileu episcopi, per ordinem, deinde it in sedem usque euer a salutation e vel populo) the is sung; and then pope descends to the e service proceeds no great momeat, the Gelasian Sacra- (3). A more elabo- to be found in the lxxxv. 430; lxxvii. ame on Good Friday, ame the hymn Ad verentia et humilitate osculando terram, et effert oblationem Crucis, ut aliis praebent exemplum;" the rite is then concluded by an oratio ad Crucem, in which, however, our Lord is addressed distinctly, and by the antiphon Crucem tu in adoramus Dominum.

Alexander Leslie, the Jesuit editor, argues in his note on the above passage for the identity of the terms adoratio and salutatio as applied to the cross, the former word being that employed in the Gelasian and Gregorian Sacramentaries and the Mozarabic Missal, the latter in the Mozarabic Breviary; and Amalarius (De Eccl. Off. l. 14) cites the Ordines Romani, "Praeparatur crux ante altare, quam salutant et osculatur omnes."

As illustrating our present subject, we may quote from the collect for the Festival of the Exaltation of the Cross in the Gregorian Sacramentary: "Concede propitius ut qui ad adorandam vivificam ejus Crucem adveniunt . . ." At the end of Mass on that day a cross was held up by the pontiff for the adoration of the people (cf. Aleuin, Adv. Elyphantum, lib. ii. 9, who furnishes us with a collect, Ad Elevatorem Sanctae Crucis); and a parallel instance is to be derived from the Greek Menology for September 13, χαρισμός δ ζωοδότος τῆς εὐσεβίας, τὸ ἀήτητον τῆς αἰωνίας, ἡ θύρα τῆς παραδείσου, δ τῶν πιστῶν εὐργετός . . . [See also EXALTATION and FINDING OF THE CROSS.]

The season which in the Eastern Church has been specially associated with the adoration of the cross is the third Sunday in Lent, with the ensuing week. Numerous sermons are extant in the writings of the Greek Fathers having reference to this. Thus in one wrongly assigned to Chrysostom, but apparently not long subsequent to his time, eis τὴν προσκύνῃσιν τῶν τιμῶν καὶ ζωοποιῶν σταυροῦ τῆ μέσῃ ἑβδομαδίῳ τῶν παστῶν, the writer speaks of the day as yearly appointed for adoration, and as though he would imply the custom to be a well established one.—Σήμερον τοιγαροῦν προσκυνήσιμος ἡμέρα τῶν τιμῶν σταυροῦ καθίστηκε. Again, in the works of Sophronius, patriarch of Jerusalem, is a sermon with the same title and occasion (Oratio v. Patrol. Gr. lxxvii. 3309). Again (Oratio iv. in Exaltationem S. Crucis), in describing the change of the season of the Exaltation to a time subsequent to our Lord's resurrection, he speaks of σταυροῦ θαυμάσιος προσκύνσις. Sermons of the same character are also extant by Theodorus Studita (Patrol. Gr. xix. 691), and by Theophylact (ib. cxxxi. 113). For rubrical directions concerning this fast, see Constantine Porphyrogenitus, De Caerimoniis Aulæ Byzantinae, l. 3, 24; and especially ii. 11 (op. cit. xii. 137, 194, 1917); and cf. also Suicer's Theaurus, and Ducauge's Glossary, s. v. σταυροπροσκύνσις, and which name and by κυριακὴ τῆς προσκυνήσεως the Greek Church knows the day. The Epistle and Gospel for this day in that Church are Heb. iv. 14-7, 6, and Mark viii. 34-lx. 1. There is also in the Greek Church a bringing about of the cross for adoration on August 1 and thereabouts, for which see Const. Porph. ii. 9 (Patrol. Gr. ciii. 1066). This latter day is marked in the Menology thus: eis τὴν πρῶτην ἢ πρόδοον τῶν τιμῶν εὐδωτῶν τῶν τιμῶν ζωοποιῶν σταυροῦ; and its importance is testified to by the fact of its having its προεβρία or vigil.

IV. Disputes among Christians as to the Adoration of the Cross.—At the Second Nicene General Council (787 A.D.), in their fourth actio, among the various testimonies read from the fathers in support of the use of images in worship, was a long extract from the fifth of the λόγοι ὑπὲρ τῆς Χριστιανῶν ἀπολογίας τῆς Ἰουδαίου καὶ περὶ εἰκόνας τῶν ἁγίων of Leontius, bishop of Neapolis in Cyprus (ob. 620 or 630, A.D.). The general tenour of his remarks (for which see Labbé, vii. 236) is as follows:—Christians are justified in offering adoration to the cross, by way of remembrance of Him who died thereon, not with any feeling of reverence for the mere material. Thus, a decree sanctioned by the seal of the emperor is reverentially treated, not on account of the decree or the lead of the seal, but of him whom the seal indicates; and so we Christians, in our adoration of the cross, honour not its material, but see in it a seal and signet of Christ Who was crucified thereon, and Whom we salute and adore. The further illustration may be taken of children who cherish some memento of an absent father, even as all things associated with our Lord are for His sake to be loved and revered. ὅταν ὁδῶν, he concludes, ἴδῃς Χριστιανὸς προσκυνῶντας τὸν σταυρὸν, γνώθι ὅτι τῷ σταυρωθέντι Χριστῷ τὴν προσκύνῃσιν προσάγουσι καὶ οὐ τῷ ξύλῳ.

A counterblast to the views of the Nicene Council is to be found in a capitulary of Charlemagne, De Imaginibus (i. 13, Patrol. xcvi. 1034), where we find an attack on the argument brought forward by the other party based on the expression, "Jacob . . . adoravit fastigium virgæ ejus" (Heb. xi. 21). The writer there insists on the "differentia crucis Christi et imaginum pictorum arte picturam," and promises to enter upon the subject "quanto mysterio Crux imaginibus eminent, sive quomodo humanum genus non per imaginem, sed per Crucem Christi redemptum sit, quæ duæ illi vel paria vel æqualia putant." This promise is fulfilled subsequently (ii. 28; op. cit. 1096), where the language, though probably referring to adoration of the cross, is to a certain extent vague: "Non sunt imagines Crucis æquiparandæ, non adorandæ, non colendæ, . . . et Tu solus adorandus, Tu solus colendus es."

The cause of the adoration of the cross and of images found a zealous champion in Theodorus Studita, who expounds his views in his Antirrhæticus iii. ad Iconomachos, in the form of a dialogue (see esp. Antirrh. i. 15; iii. 3; Patrol. Gr. xcix. 345, 419). After an elaborate discussion, and after dwelling on the distinction between εἰκὼν and εἰδωλον, in which he carefully repudiates any association of the adoration of the cross or image with the latter term, he sums up in a number of theses which maintain the importance of the adoration, but again insists on the distinction referred to above. Thus (ib. 349): "If any one boldly calls the relative (σχετικὴν) worship of Christ in the image, worship of the image and not of Christ Himself . . . he is heretic." For further illustrations of the subject from the writings of Theodorus, see op. cit. 691, 1757; cf. also Nicephorus (Patriarch of Constantinople), Antirrhæticus lii. 7. Later notices of the subject may be found in Photius, Epist. l. 1, Ad Nicollan Papam; i. 8, 20, Ad Michael. Bulgur. Principem.

st
," &c. yer, "O sancta Cruz, per te introamus meremur, per te indulgentiam et three antiphons do ther is added here tion of the cross, po-found in the Missal. nature of the cere-ormed at the Nones, ng instance, we shall e the altar a cross rst at the left, then e middle of the altar.
ed, the antiphons are e meus quid feci tibi quid u tra debui . . . er each. At the encinating priest receives of the two who are uccessively at the ad the middle of the a station respectively rm, and the whole of occasion, with voice e, the antiphon Ecce is responded. In que being ordered that as unveiled, the people the priest having rose in front of the altar sunt ministris adent ter, cum summa re-

ved, speaks of this rite as ," but there seems fat plaining this, with Meant e's crucifixion. (Notes to 382.)

A brief reference may here be made in passing to the views on this subject of the Paulician heretics, who first appeared towards the end of the 7th century. They, generally speaking, were strongly opposed to any adoration of the cross or images. In regard to the cross, they maintained that the real cross was Christ Himself, not the wood on which He hung:—Λίγυτες, ὅτι σταυρὸς ὁ Χριστὸς ἐστίν, οὐ κρῆ δὲ προσηκουίσαται τὸ ξύλον ὡς κεκατηραυγὸν ὄργανον (Georgius Hamartolus, Chroni on iv. 238, in Patrol. Gr. cx. 889). In accordance with this is what we are told by Petrus Siculus (Hist. Monachorum 29; ib. civ. 1284; and cf. Photius, Contra Manich. i. 7; i. cii. 25), to the effect that a certain Timotheus of this sect was sent by the Emperor Leo the Isaurian to the Patriarch of Constantinople to be reasoned with; and on being asked, "Why dost thou not believe and worship the honoured cross?" answered, "Anathema to him who does not do so." But by the cross he understood τὸν Χριστὸν τῆ ἐκτάσει τῶν χειρῶν σταυρὸς ἀποκαλούμεντα. The above quoted Georgius Hamartolus tells us (Patrol. Gr. cx. 892), with what truth is perhaps doubtful, that in cases of sickness they laid a cross on the patient, which cross on his recovery they dared even to break or burn (see also Euthymius, Panopla Dogmat. Tit. 24; op. cit. cxxx. 1196; and cf. Photius, Bibliotheca 279; ib. ciii. 524).

Much about this time there arose a contention of like character in the West. The actual literary warfare in this case belongs to the early part of the 9th century, but from its connection with the earlier struggle in the Eastern Church, and as throwing light on the tone of thought on this subject in the Western Church during the preceding period, it is of too much importance to be passed over here.

The immediate cause of the outbreak was the publication by Cladius, bishop of Turin (820 A.D.), of a fierce attack on the doctrine of the adoration of the cross and of images. Further he ordered the removal of crosses from all the churches of his diocese. When urged by a letter from a certain Abbot Theodemir to reconsider his views, he retorted, in a long treatise, that the Gauls and Germans were held in the nets of superstition. This work Joann, bishop of Orleans, answers in detail in his treatise De Cultu Imaginum (Patrol. cvi. 305), in which he appeals largely to the writings of the Fathers of the earlier centuries, and discusses the objections of Cladius seriatim. See especially op. cit. 331, where he meets Cladius's remarks as to the superstition of the votaries of the cross: "Nos ob recordationem Salvatoris nostri crucem pictam veneramus atque adoramus."

Other writers of the time joined in the fray, as Theodemir above mentioned; Eginhard, the biographer of Charlemagne, in a work De Adoranda Cruce not now extant; Wistremir, archbishop of Toledo (cf. Pseudo-Liutprand, Chronicon; Patrol. cxxxvii. 1103); and a priest named Dungalus, who (about the year 828 A.D.) wrote a treatise dedicated to Louis the Pious and his son Lothaire: "Pro cultu sacrarum imaginum adversus insanas blasphemias naenias Claudii Taurinensis Episcopi" (Patrol. cv. 457 sqq.). [R. S.]

CROSS, EXALTATION OF (Exaltatio Crucis, ἡ ὑψώσις τοῦ σταυροῦ). This festival, held on September 14, most probably celebrates primarily the consecration of the church of the Holy Sepulchre at Jerusalem by Bishop Macarius at the command of Constantine (335 A.D.), although some would see in it a commemoration of the Vision of the Cross seen by the Emperor.

It is, however, to the victory of Heraclius over the Persians and his subsequent restoration of the Cross to its shrine at Jerusalem that the renown of the festival is mainly due.

Still there are not wanting indications of its observance before that event, in both the Eastern and Western Churches. Thus in the Acti of the Egyptian penitent Mary, whose death is referred to 421 A.D., it is apparently recognized as a thoroughly established festival at Jerusalem: thus, e. g. . . . τῆς ὑψώσεως ἐνεκεν τοῦ τιμῶν σταυροῦ, ἧς μετ' ἄλλας ἡμέρας εἰσὶν ἡγεῖσθαι (Acta S. Mariæ Aegypt. c. 19, in Acta Sanctorum for April 2; also in Patrol. Gr. lxxxvii. 3711).

In the life (c. 70) of the Patriarch Eutychius (ob. 582 A.D.) by his chaplain Eustathius, this festival is spoken of as celebrated in Constantinople on September 14 (Acta Sanctorum for April 6); and in the 7th century the Patriarch Sophronius of Jerusalem refers to it as a feast then widely known. He adds that the Festival of the Exaltation had formerly (πάλαι) preceded that of the ἀνάστασις (that is, the annual commemoration on September 13 of the dedication of the church at Jerusalem), but now the order had been reversed (Oratio in Exaltationem S. Crucis in Gretser, De Cruce, vol. ii. p. 90, ed. 1608).

Again, an observance of the festival in the Western Church prior to Heraclius's victory may be inferred from our finding it in the Gelasian and Gregorian Sacramentaries, and from its designation simply as Exaltatio S. Crucis, without any allusion to Heraclius, in the earlier Latin Martyrologies, as in that attributed to Jerome (Patrol. xxx. 475); it may be added that this is also the case with those of Bede and Rabanus Maurus (ib. xciv. 1044, cx. 1168).

The circumstances attending the victory of Heraclius are briefly these. In the year 614 Jerusalem was taken by the Persian king Chosroes II., and after the slaughter of many thousands of Christians, and the destruction, partially at any rate, of the church of the Holy Sepulchre by fire, a long train of captives was led away, among whom was the Patriarch Zacharias, and with him the cross said to have been discovered by Helena [CROSS, FINDING OF], which was sealed up in a case by the patriarch himself. After some years of uninterrupted success on the part of the Persian king, during which the empire was reduced to the very verge of dissolution, Heraclius at last declared war (622 A.D.), and after three expeditions the boldness of which was justified by their success, the tide was turned and the Persian king worsted, until at

* Nestophorus (vide infra) styles the patriarch Modestus, though the other historians unite in calling him Zacharias. The error, for such it probably is, has been explained by supposing Modestus to have acted as deputy for Zacharias during his captivity (see Clinton, Fasts Romani, vol. II. p. 170); or that the latter died shortly after his return to Jerusalem, and was succeeded by the former (Petavius in loc.)

CRO
 last he was Siroes (628 A.
 The new se with the emp insisted on b of the cross, v rode in a cha rachus enter spring he me cross to Jeru ized his own taining the pr fida, as Theoj it), thus pres Chosroes. He cross to its s sacred ground its splendid a a common glo hamble close tyrologies, v emperor was entering upon so divested h graphus, vol. i. phorus, B. v. v.
Paschale, vol. i. generally for t
 vol. I. pp. 717 cine and Fall, Thus was the its resting-pla altation of the Before long, p (ob. 638 A. D.), S as a festival wit tion of the c Church, which rate festival of memories also by the Empress This festival, by all Martyrol those of Jerome, more already sp that of Wandel Tress in the where we find
 * Exaltatio Crucis Perade - b indi
 In the Martyr
 we find a further bus anis, p. 11 tionem ejusdem Domino revelat
 "in Basilica S stantiniiana." Ad omni osculatur cxliii. 170, 356; tyrology of Not various forms of training a mentio cxlviii. 1188, 1 again refer to th the Gelasian and

* It may be remark of Heraclius vary som the above events.
 Clinton, Fasts Roman
 of Jerusalem is refer plaus (l. c.).

(Inventio Crucis, a festival, held on celebrates primarily of the Holy Sepulchre of Macarius at the 15 A.D.), although commemoration of the Emperor.

victory of Heraclius subsequent restoration of Jerusalem that the city due indications of its in both the Eastern is in the Acti of the death is referred recognized as a festival at Jerusalem: ὁσ ἔνεκεν τοῦ τιμίου ἔργου τῆς εὐδοκίας in Acta Sanctorum (Gr. lxxvii. 3711).

Patriarch Eutychius in Eustathius, celebrated in Constantinian Sanctorum for April by the Patriarch Society to it as a feast then at the festival of the ἄδραξ) preceded that the annual commemoration of the dedication of but new the order in Exaltationem Crucis, vol. ii. p. 90, of the festival in the Heraclius's victory may it in the Gelasian series, and from its descriptio S. Crucis, without in the earlier Latin attributed to Jerome y be added that this of Bede and Rabanus 1168).

ending the victory of ne. In the year 814 the Persian king Chosroes-destroyer of many thousand destruction, partially of the Holy Sepulchre captives was led away, patriarch Zacharias, and to have been discovered (NG OR), which was the patriarch himself. interrupted success on ing, during which the ne very verge of diso- declared war (622 A.D.), as the boldness of which success, the tide was just worsted, until at bles the patriarch Modestus, to calling him Zacharias. y is, has been explained as de p ty for Zacharias ton, Posti Romanus, vol. II. t shortly after his return ed by the former (Petrius lat he was deposed and murdered by his son Siroes (628 A.D.).

The new sovereign speedily concluded a peace with the emperor, one of the conditions specially insisted on by the latter being the restoration of the cross, with which borne before him, as he rode in a chariot drawn by four elephants, Heraclius entered Constantinople. In the following spring he made a pilgrimage with the recovered cross to Jerusalem, where the patriarch recognized his own unbroken seals on the case containing the precious relics (τὰ ἑλμία καὶ ζωοποιόγια, as Theophanes [vide infra] constantly styles it), thus preserved it is said by Sira the wife of Chosroes. Heraclius wished himself to carry the cross to its shrine, but before treading on the sacred ground he was bidden to divest himself of his splendid array, that so barefoot and clad in a common cloak he might more resemble the humble guise of the Saviour. Some of the Martyrologies referred to below remark that the emperor was held by some invisible power from entering upon the sacred precincts till he had so divested himself^b (cf. Theophanes, Chronographia, vol. I. pp. 503, 504, ed. Classen; Nicephorus, Byzantium, pp. 11 A, 15 A; Chronicon Paschale, vol. I. p. 704, ed. Dindorf; and more generally for the history of the period, Cedrenus, vol. I. pp. 717 sqq. ed. Bekker; also Gibbon, Decline and Fall, ch. 46).

Thus was the cross once more "exalted" into its resting-place, and the festival of the "Exaltation of the Cross" obtained fresh renown. Before long, possibly under Pope Honorius I. (ob. 638 A.D.), September 14 came to be observed as a festival with special memory of the restoration of the cross by Heraclius: the Eastern Church, which has not strictly speaking a separate festival of the Finding of the Cross, commemorates also on that day the original discovery by the Empress Helena.

This festival is referred to more or less fully by all Martyrologies under September 14. Of those of Jerome, Bale, and Rabanus Maurus we are already spoken. We may further specify that of Wandelbert [deacon of monastery at Trèves in the time of the Emperor Lothaire] where we find (Patrol. cxxi. 611)

^a Exaltata Crucis fulgent vexilla rotæ, Festate .b indigna victor quum vexit Heraclius."

In the Martyrologies of Ado and Usuardus we find a further addition: "Sed et procurrentibus annis, papa Sergius miræ magnitudinis portione ejusdem liguli in sacrorio Beati Petri Domino revelante reperit, quæ annis omnibus [sic Basilica Salvatoris quæ appellatur Constantiniana,] Ado] ipso die Exaltationis ejus ab omni esculatore et adoratore populo" (Patrol. cxxiii. 170, 356; cxxiv. 467). See also the Martyrology of Netker (ob. cxi. 1151), and for various forms of ancient Western Calendars containing a mention of this festival, see Patrol. cxxviii. 1188, 1191, &c. Besides this, we may again refer to the presence of this festival in the Gelasian and Gregorian Sacramentaries. The collect for the day in the latter of these has been cited in the article on the Adoration of the Cross, that in the former runs as follows:—"Deus qui nos holierna die Exaltatione Sanctæ Crucis annua solemnitate heticis, preusta unicujus mysterium in terra cognovimus, ejus redemptionis præmia consequamur."

^a It may be remarked that the historians of the reign of Heraclius vary somewhat in the dates they assign to the above events. We have followed those given by Chron. Posti Romanus, vol. II. pp. 163, 170. The taking of Jerusalem is referred to a later campaign by Theophanes (l. c.).

The Eastern Church, as we have already said, includes in the festival of September 14 the two festivals of the Finding and of the Exaltation of the Cross. As in the Calendars of the Western Church, so also in those of the Eastern Church is it invariably found. Thus in the Greek metrical calendar given by Papebroch in the Acta Sanctorum (vol. i. of May), we find under September 13, μήμη των ἑκατοντων τῆς ἁγίας τοῦ Χριστοῦ καὶ Θεοῦ ἡμῶν ἀναστάσεως καὶ προόδου τῆς ὑψώσεως τοῦ τιμίου καὶ ζωοποιόγια σταυροῦ; that is, as has been already explained, they celebrated the dedication of the Church built by the Emperor Constantine to commemorate our Lord's resurrection. We further gather that the festival of the Exaltation had its προέδρια or vigil. The notice for September 14 is ὁλόθη δεκάτη σταυροῦ ἔβλου ἡδὲ τετάρτη; and the fact is also recognized in the pictorial Moscow Calendar accompanying the preceding. The Octave also of the festival (September 21) is given in the Menology under that day, ἐν ταύτῃ τῇ ἡμέρᾳ ἀποβόσται ἡ ἑορτὴ τοῦ τιμίου σταυροῦ. See also the Calendar of the Arabian Church given by Selden (De Significis Ebraeorum, iii. 376, ed. 1655), where September 14 is marked "Festum Crucis gloriose"; as also in those of the Ethiopic or Abyssinian and of the Coptic Church given by Ludolf (p. 3). We also learn from him that in the case of the latter of these churches, the festival extends over three days, September 13-15, marked respectively "Festum C. gl. (primum, &c.)."

Further, the Ethiopic Church, as well as several other branches of the Eastern Church, recognizes in addition a festival of the Cross in May, possibly having more or less reference to the "Inventio Crucis" of the Latin Church (op. cit. p. 17; Gretser, vol. i. 232; see also several Eastern Calendars in Neale, Holy Eastern Church, Introd. pp. 773, 799, 813). The proper lessons for this festival in the Syrian Church, as marked in the Peshito, are, for Vespers, Matt. xxiv. (possibly on account of verse 30); for Liturgy, Luke xxi. 5 sqq.; and for Matins, Mark xii. 41 sqq. (Gretser, l. c.).

In addition to the works named in this article, reference should be made to Binterim, Denkwürdigkeiten der Christ-Kathol. Kirche, vol. v. part 1, pp. 435 sqq. See also Ducange's Glossary, s. v. ὑψώσις. [L. S.]

CROSS, FINDING OF. (Inventio Crucis.)

I. Introduction.—By this name is to be understood the discovery which tradition asserts that the Empress Helena, the mother of Constantine, made of the cross on which our Lord suffered. The earliest account we have of the exploration for the Holy Sepulchre is that given by Eusebius (Vita Const. iii. 26 sqq.), who relates Constantine's determination to remove the abominations that defiled the holy place and build there a Christian shrine, as detailed in the emperor's letter to Macarius, bishop of Jerusalem (op. cit. fo. 30; Sozomen, Hist. Eccl. i. 17; Theo-doret I 18), but no allusion whatever is made to a discovery of the cross. Some have indeed argued that an expression in Constantine's letter to Macarius is better suited to the discovery of the cross than of the grave—τὸ γὰρ πρόσωπον τοῦ κυρίου σου λαίψου πάθος ὅτι ἐπὶ τῆς αἰχμῆς κρυβασένον . . . but a comparison with c. 28 would sufficiently account for the above quoted language, and it is hard to understand that Eusebius should have lost so good an opportunity of glorifying Constantine, had a real or supposed discovery of our Lord's cross taken place under his auspices.* The date of Helena's alleged discovery, is 326 A.D.; yet in the Liberarianus Bardoianense, the record of a journey to Jerusalem in 333 A.D., only seven years after this date, there is no reference to the finding of the cross, even in a context where we might certainly have looked for it: "Crypta ubi corpus ejus positum fuit et tertia die resurrexit; ibidem modo jussu Constantini Imperatoris basilica facta est" (Patrol. viii. 791).

The earliest mention we have of the Finding of the Cross is in the Catecheses of Cyril of Jerusalem, delivered rather more than twenty years after Helena's alleged discovery; in which, though he does not allude to the narrative in the form given by subsequent writers, he yet says that fragments cut off from the cross were spread over the whole world (Catech. iv. 10; x. 19; xiii. 4; Patrol. Gr. xxiii. 468, 685, 776), and he also alludes to the Finding of the Cross in a letter written some years later to Constantius, the son of Constantine, on the occasion of a luminous cross appearing in the sky over Jerusalem (Ep. ad Const. c. 3, op. cit. 1168). From the beginning of the fifth century onwards all ecclesiastical writers take the truth of the narrative in its main form for granted, though sundry variations of detail occur.

II. Legend.—The general tenour of the tradition is that an attempt had been made (by Hadrian, or at any rate, in his time, according to Jerome, Epist. 58, Patrol. xx. 321) to destroy every trace of the site of the Holy Sepulchre, that the ground had there been raised to a considerable height, and temples and statues to Jupiter and Venus erected thereon. On the death of Licinius, whom Constantine charges with the continuance of the evil, it was determined to purify the sacred places, and this resolution of the Emperor was carried out by his mother Helena, who went in person to Jerusalem, and by the Bishop Macarius. By the Divine guidance (and by the aid of a Jew, one Judas, afterwards baptized as Quiriacus, according to Gregory of Tours and others, infra) the spot was discovered, and the superimposed earth having been removed, the sepulchre was seen with three crosses of gold, and separate from these the superscription which Pilate had attached to that of our Lord. Not knowing which of the three crosses was the one they sought, Macarius caused them to be successively presented to the touch of a noble lady of Jerusalem then lying at the point of death. The first two crosses produced no effect, but at the touch of the third the sick woman rose up before them perfectly healed, thus showing that it was upon this that the Saviour had suffered. One part of the cross set in silver was entrusted to Macarius to be carefully guarded in Jerusalem, and the remainder, together with the nails was forwarded to Constantine. One of the nails was attached to his helmet, and another to the bridle of his horse, in fulfilment, according to sundry fathers, of the prophecy of Zechariah xiv. 20.^b

For the above tradition, see Socrates (l. c.), Theodoret (l. c.), Sozomen (lit. 1), Ambrose (de obitu Theodosii, c. 46; Patrol. xvi. 1399), Sulpicius Severus (Hist. Sacra, ii. 34; Patrol. xx. 148), Rufinus (Hist. i. 7, 8; Patrol. xli. 1475), Paulinus of Nola (Ep. ad Severum xli; Patrol. lxi. 325), Gregory of Tours (Liber Miraculorum, i. 5 seq.; Patrol. lxxi. 709), Cyril of Alexandria also (Comm. in Zech. in loc.; Patrol. Gr. lxxii. 271) refers to it as the current history in his day. Chrysostom evidently believed in the discovery of the cross, and speaks of the practice of conveying small portions of it about as amulets (quod Christus sibi D. us, c. 10; Patrol. Gr. xlviii. 829).

One or two further details might be added. Socrates states that the portion of the cross sent to Constantine was by him inclosed in his own statue, which was placed on a column of porphyry in the so-called forum of Constantine in Constantinople, that thus the city might be rendered impregnable by the possession of so glorious a relic. According to Sozomen, besides the miracle wrought on the sick lady, a dead man was instantly restored to life by the touch of the cross; but Paulinus, while mentioning this says nothing of the other miracle. In Ambrose, spite of a protest to the contrary, we see traces of the feeling in which respect for the cross, as a token of Him who hung thereon, drifted into an adoration of the cross itself. Thus Helena is represented as saying, "Ecce locus pugnæ, ubi est victoria? . . . quomodo nec redemptam arbitror, si redemptio ipsa non cernitur?" It may be added that according to Ambrose's version of the history, the inscription is found adhering to the cross it originally belonged to. The occasion of the notice in Paulinus is the sending of a piece of the cross to Severus for a church about to be consecrated, which affords him a natural opportunity for relating the story: he adds, that however much might thus be cut away from the cross, the bulk of the wood miraculously remained undiminished.

III. Festival.—With the belief in the discovery of the cross thus widely spread and thus cherished, it is only natural to expect that an annual festival to commemorate it would soon be established; though it is impossible from the want of satisfactory evidence to speak with any certainty as to the actual origin of such festival.

* Montfaucon (Collectio Nova Patrum, vol. I. p. viii. ed. 1768) does indeed cite a passage of Eusebius as certainly referring to the cross: αὶ δε τὰς πόδας ἐπιστήσας τοῦ καθ' ἡμᾶς ἀμὸν τὸ μέγα καὶ τὸ μαρτυρῶν τοῦ Σωτήρος ἡμῶν ἐπιτελεσθέντος θαυμασίου, ἀληθῆς εἰσέρχεται ὄψιν τεταλπωρᾶς ἡμῶν τὰ τελευτήματα. (Comm. in Psal. lxxviii. 11). When, however, we find Eusebius silent, where, if anywhere, he might be expected to speak, we cannot attach much weight to a passage of, at best, most doubtful reference.

^b Jerome, however (Comm. in Zech. in loc.), speaks of it as one might have expected, "nam sensu quidem plerumque dictam sed ridiculam."

An att appointm in a letter made to (Christi, g Romanne arenta est tionis fest damna" (C
Of cour is shown,
Eusebius Christianit restoration Nicipho a festival Cross was time, but of his flou Pavilus Lu
Pope Silves originator
S. Crispi a est" (Pat
that there
the Roman become gen
Most We mark May the ancient xxx. 435);
the genuine cially from the very an out by Pope
p. 369). It stantium (P Vetus (l. c.
Usuardus, a
civ. 15; c an English M Meorable a 93, lxxxv. 3 loriaceæ (P
There is a Gothallic
rable Brevar 1119), in the 1162), in the pheny (l. c.
shall again re Some, how and some gi names of the this day. Th
Calendar of L Martyrology mentarium S others (see in Missal in loc Bede given in
li. p. xviii.).
commemorated die Ilerentis S cxi. 598).—
* Præsul Alex
Theodorus
His quoque

^c This, however festival of the Ex

ng which of the three ought, Macarius caused presented to the touch then lying at the two crosses produced of the third the six them perfectly healed, as upon this that the the part of the cross at to Macarius to be care-and the remainder, was forwarded to Constans was attached to Lie bride at his horse, in dry fathers, of the pro-on, see Socrates (l. c.), men (ll. 1), Ambrose 6; Patrol. xvii. 1399; Sacra, li. 34; Introd.

l. 7, 8; Patrol. xxi.
(Ep. ad Theod. 31; story of Tours (Liber Patrol. lxxi. 709). Cyril in Zech. in loc.; refers to it as the day. Chrysostom evi-discovery of the cross, of conveying small amulets (Apud Christis Op. xviii. 829).

details may be added, portion of the cross sent in enclosed in his own d on a column of por-of Constantine in as the city might be y the possession of so ing to Sozomen, besides the sick lady, a dead to life by the touch inus, while mentioning other miracle. In Am-to the contrary, we see which respect for the m who hug thereon, on of the cross itself nted as saying, "Ecce ctoria? . . . quomodo si redemptio ipsa non added that according to history, the inscription cross it originally be-of the notice in Paua piece of the cross to bout to be consecrated, atural opportunity for lds, that however much y from the cross, the ulously remained undiie belief in the discovery y spread and thus cleral to expect that an emorate it would soon it is impossible from the lence to speak with acl origin of such festival.

in Zech. in loc., speaks of ed, "nam sensu quidem pl-

An attempt has been made to assign its first appointment to Pope Eusebius (ob. 310 A.D.), who, in a letter "Episcopis Tuscanie et Campanie," is made to say "Crucis ergo Domini nostri Jesu Christi, quae nuper nobis gubernacula Sanctae Romanae Ecclesiae tenentibus quinto Nonas Martii inventa est, in praesentia Kalendarum die Inventiois festum vobis solemniter celebrare mandamus" (Patrol. vii. 1114).

Of course the utter spuriousness of this letter is shown, if by nothing else, by the fact that Pope Eusebius died before Constantine had embraced Christianity, and many years before the work of restoration began at Jerusalem at his command.

Nicephorus (Hist. Eccles. viii. 20) asserts that a festival to commemorate the Finding of the Cross was held at Jerusalem in Constantine's time, but appeals to no earlier authority in support of his statement; and in the Chronicon of Flavius Lucius Dexter, if the passage be genuine, Pope Sylvester I. (ob. 335 A.D.) is claimed as the originator of the festival: "Festum Iuventionis S. Crucis a Silvestro institutum celebre multis est" (Patrol. xxvi. 563). It is not impossible that there may have been a festival peculiar to the Roman Church, before its observance had become general.

Most Western Martyrologies and Calendars mark May 3 as "Inventio S. Crucis," including the ancient Martyrologium Hieronymi (Patrol. ix. 435); but there are grounds for doubting the genuineness of the words here, more especially from the fact that they are absent from the very ancient Cod. Epternacensis, as is pointed out by Papebroch (Acta Sanctorum; May, vol. i. p. 369). It is found in the Martyrologium Diutinum (Patrol. lxxx. 415), the Mart. Romanum Vetus (i. c. cxlii. 158), and those of Rabanus, Ado, Usuardus, and Notker (ob. ex. 1142; cxliii. 256; cxiv. 15; cxvii. 1075); also in a Gallican and an English Martyrology (ob. lxvii. 614, 620), the Mozarabic and the Gothic Calendar (ob. lxxxv. 9; lxxxvi. 39), the Cal. Mutinense (ob. cvl. 821), Hariacense (ob. cxxxviii. 1187).

There is a special office for this day in the Gothic Missal (ob. lxvii. 285), in the Mozarabic Breviary and Missal (ob. lxxxv. 739, lxxxvi. 1119), in the Gelasian Sacramentary (ob. lxxxv. 1162), in the Gregorian Sacramentary and Antiphonary (ob. lxxxvii. 101, 687). To this last we shall again refer.

Some, however, omit the festival altogether, and some give it a secondary place after the names of the Martyrs who are commemorated on this day. Thus there is no mention of it in the Calendar of Leo (ob. lxvii. 878), in the metrical Martyrology of Bede (ob. xciv. 604), in the Sacramentarium Sivaviense (ob. cli. 823), and some others (see in Leslie's note to the Mozarabic Missal in loc.). Again in the Martyrology of Bede given in the Acta Sanctorum (March, vol. li. p. xviii.) a long narrative of the Martyrs commemorated on this day is followed by "Ipsa die Iuventio Sanctae Crucis." So too runs the metrical Martyrology of Wandelbert (Patrol. cxl. 598):—

"Praesent Alexander quinquas et Evesius orant, Theodosiusque Dei pariter pro nomine caesi, His quoque celas crucis radiant vexilla repertae."

* This, however, is doubtless to be connected with the festival of the Exaltation of the Cross (September).

The same is the case with an old English Calendar, which reads "Natale SS. Alexandri, Eueati et Theodoli presbyteri, Inventio Crucis" (ob. xciv. 1151). See also the Cal. Stubulense and the Cal. Brixianum (ob. cxxxviii. 1190, 6270).

In the Gregorian Sacramentary also the mention of the Inventio Crucis follows that of the Saints commemorated on this day (as also the Antiphonary in the MSS.), and Méaulx (note in loc.) states that in the most ancient MSS. this festival is altogether wanting.

In the list of feasts to be observed given in the Capitulare of Ahyto or Hatto (appointed Bishop of Basle in 808 A.D.) there is no mention of the Inventio Crucis (Patrol. cxv. 12), and in the Capitula of Walter, bishop of Orleans (857 A.D.), the festivals of the Inventio Crucis and Exaltatio Crucis are appended to the end of cap. xvii. "De Sanctorum festivitatibus indicendis et observandis" (ob. cxix. 742), as though they had been introduced at a later date than the others mentioned.

All this evidence seems, as far as it goes, to point either to the fact that the festival was established at a comparatively late date, or that it was for some time of local rather than general observance. Papebroch (Acta Sanctorum in loc. c. lii.) suggests 720 A.D. as approximately the date of the general recognition of the festival, but the reference above to its absence in documents of even later date will incline us to look upon the end of the 8th century or the beginning of the 9th as the earliest period we can safely fix on.

Attention may be called here to the fact that several of the above mentioned authorities make an error of at least half a century in the date of Helena's alleged discovery. Thus the Martyrologium Hieronymi speaks of it as "post Passionem Domini anno ducesimo trigesimo tertio," in which it is followed by Florus in the additions to Bede's Martyrology, by Rabanus and others.⁴

The Greek Church has not, properly speaking, a separate festival for the Finding of the Cross, but celebrates this event on the day of the Exaltation of the Cross, September 14. Some branches, however, of the Eastern Church do observe a festival of the Finding of the Cross also. Thus in the Calendars of the Ethiopic and Coptic Churches given by Ludolf (Pisti Sacri Ecclesiae Alexandrinae), March 6 is marked "Inventio S. Crucis" (p. 22), and, in the case of the former Church, May 4, "Helena reperit Crucem" (p. 27).

Mention may be made here of writings on the subject of the Finding of the Cross referred to in the decrees of a council held at Rome under the presidency of Gelasius: while allowed to be read, their statements are to be received with caution. "Item [recipienda] scripta de Inventionis Crucis Dominicae, . . . novellae quaedam relationes sunt, et nonnulli eas Catholicis legunt. Sed cum haec ad Catholicorum manus pervenerint, beati Pauli Apostoli praececlat sententia, omnia probate, quod bonum est tenete" (Patrol. lix. 161). Further, in the Acta Sanctorum (May, vol. i. p. 362), Papebroch adduces grounds for believing the unhistorical character of much of this writing,—among other things, the same error in the date of the Finding, amounting to more than half a century, into which we have already mentioned that several of the late martyrologies have fallen. These writings seem to have found their way to the East and to have been translated into Syriac (see Assemani, Bibliotheca Orientalis, vol. 1. p. 497).

⁴ Theophanes (Chronographia) makes a similar mistake, and refers the discovery to the year 317 A.D.

In addition to the books already cited in this article, reference may be made to Binterim, Denkwürdigkeiten, vol. v. part 1, pp. 368 sqq., to Newman's Essay on Miracles recorded in Ecclesiastical History, pp. cxliii. sqq., where the truth of the legend is strongly argued for, as also in Gretser, De Cruce Christi, vol. 1. lib. 1, cc. 62-64. [R. S.]

CROSS, THE APPARITION OF THE, at Jerusalem, about the third hour of the day, in the time of Constantine, in the year 340, is commemorated May 7 in the Byzantine and Ethioptic Calendars. [C.]

CROSS, SIGN OF. [SIGN OF THE CROSS.]

CROWN. Referring to the article CORONATION for the distinction between the corona or garland, "corona," στέφανος, and the diadem or fillet, "taenia," "fascia," διάδημα, and for fuller details on both to the Dictionary of Classical Antiquities, it is proposed in this article to furnish some description of imperial and regal crowns belonging to our period, the form and ornamentation of which are known to us either from contemporaneous representations or from the crowns themselves having come down to our own time.

From the portraits on their coins it appears that the early emperors adopted the diadem, worn either simply or encircling the helmet Constantine the Great, from Ferrario, Costumi.

Heraclius, from Ferrario, Costumi.

(galea diademata), cidaris or tiara, with which their head was covered. The coins of Constantine the Great depict him wearing diadems or fillets of various kinds; some ornamented with gems; some enriched with a double row of pearls, with the loose ends of the fillet hanging down over his shoulders. Sometimes he wears a helmet surrounded by a diadem, with a cross in front (Ferrario, Costumi, Europa, vol. 1. part 2—Appendice sulla Corona di Ferro). This combination is also seen on the coins of Gratian, Valentinian II., Theodosius, Leo the Great, and Basil. In a drawing given by Ferrario (u. s. No. 3), Heraclius, A.D. 610-641, wears a helmet encircled by a gemmed diadem with pendent ends, and a cross above the forehead. The combination of the diadem with the cidaris or tiara was borrowed from the Orientals, among whom it had been in use from ancient times (Xenoph., Cyrop. viii. 3-16; Κρονος ὑβὴν ἔχων τὴν τιάρην καὶ διάδημα περὶ τὴν τιάρην; Anab. ii. 5; Herod., vii. 61; Aesch. Pers. p. 668). It was worn by Zenobia (Trebell. Hist. xxix. 1 "ad conclamationes galatata processit cum limbo purpureo gemmis pendentibus per ultimam fibulam"), and was adopted by her conqueror, Aurelian. It is seen in medals under the form of a peaked cap ornamented with gems, rising from a jewelled diadem or fillet, tied behind. The cap in later times assumed the popular name of tyrhenia, tyrpha, the origin of the modern turban. Zonaras describes the Emperor Basilus, in the 9th century, as τιάρην ταινιωδέως ὀρθῶς ἢν τοῦσαν καλεῖ ὁ δημότης καὶ πολλὸς εὐρόπαρος. Its origin, and the history of its adoption, is thus given by Tzetzes, Chilades, viii. 184:—

Tyrpha, from Ferrario.

Constantine from his Arch at Rome.

τιάρην σκίην κεφαλῆς ὄψεχε παρὰ Πέρσας, ὕστερον ἐν ταῖς νίκαις ἐξ ἡμῶν οἱ ἀστροφόροι σφαιρὶς κεφαλῆς ἐπέθετο τιάρην ἤτοι τιάρην, ὅταν εὐρώπας φασὶ ἢ ἀφ' ὧν ἔδεικτο ὁ Ἰουστινιανέσιος τοῦ κτίουσι ἐπιάνου.

Another form of the imperial headgear was a low-crowned cap, apparently destitute of diadem or any special distinction of royalty. This was known as CAMBLAUCIUM (which see). Constantine appears in this garb on his triumphal arch in Rome (Ferrario, u. s. pl. 30, No. 2), and in an illumination from a MS. of the 9th century, representing the Council of Nicaea, given by Agincourt (Peintures, pl. 32). Justinian, in the mosaics of the sanctuary of San Vitale at Ravenna, has his head covered with a jeweled cap, while the Empress Theodora wears a tiara surrounded with three circlets of gems. Strings of pearls and other gems hang down from each. These jeweled tassels were known as κοτασεισίδαι. (Const. Porphy. De Coenonion i. 582; ii. 688.)

Justinian and Theodora, from mosaics at St. Vitale, Ravenna.

The diadem in its original form of a linen or silken riband or fillet gradually went out of use from Justinian's time (La Barthe, Arts industrielles du Moyen Age, ii. 39), and was replaced by a flexible band of gold, στέμμα, στέφανος, sometimes adorned with a band of pearls and precious stones, representing the old διάδημα. The name στέφανος was in use for the imperial symbol as early as the time of Constantine. Cyril, Ep. ad Const. II.: ἑτέροι . . . ἀπ' ὧν ἔχουσι τὴν τιάρην σου ἢ στέφανον σου ἐπιπέσειν ἐπὶ τὴν κεφαλήν σου. This was closed by gems. From name of tyrpha status Bibl.

form of στέμμα &c.). Exemplified in the annexed A.D. 602-610, p. 14, A.D. 707-8 the royal treasury of various colorings to the enamel. These circlets d-by Claudian in Theodosius, Arcadius of the 4th century. The most ancient preserved in the Louvre, in the sort of the 7th century in number.

Photos from a mosaic of Ferrario, u. s. p. 28, N.

The most ancient preserved in the Louvre, in the sort of the 7th century in number. "Corona Ferrea"; (3) that of Theodora taken to Paris in 1804, by mistake it was deposited most celebrated of

(1) The Iron Crown of Queen Theodora. This crown is formed of metal, united by pearls, divided by pearls, the other part is covered with precious stones. The gem in the centre, or basal knob, is a diamond, in red and blue. The tall nubs set vertically, gem, and two rose meet without an inter-τιμῆν σου ἢ λακίαν στεφάνου σου κεφαλῆν, χρυσοκαλλήτους στεφάνου λίθοις διαγυριστάτοις κλειδίαισι προσκομίζουτες. This circlet was closed by a cap of rich stuff decorated with gems. From being shut in at the top it took the name of ἑσπέρικαιστος, which appears in Anastasius Bibl. and other authors in the perplexing Dilem, from Ferrario.

form of spanocista (Anast. Bibl. Pisciculis, 434, &c.). Examples of this form of crown are given in the annexed woodcuts of the Emperor Phocas, A.D. 602-610, and the Empress Irene, wife of Leo IV, A.D. 797-802. In the time of Const. Porphyry, the royal treasury contained circlets or stemandia of various colours, white, green, and blue, according to the enamel with which they were coated. These circlets decorated with gems are mentioned Phocas, from a medal, Ferrario, pl. 28, No. 5.

Irene, wife of Leo IV, from a medal, Ferrario, lb.

by Claudian in connection with the two sons of Theodosius, Arcadius, and Honorius, towards the end of the 4th century. "Et vario lapidum distincto igne coronas" (Idem, Cons. Stilic. h. ii. 92.).

The most ancient examples of crowns are those long preserved in the treasury of the cathedral of Monza, in Lombardy, belonging to the early part of the 7th century. These crowns were three in number; (1) the so-called Iron Crown, "Corona Ferrea;" (2) the crown of Agilulf, and (3) that of Theodelinda. Agilulf's crown was taken to Paris as a prize of war by Napoleon I., in 1804, by mistake for the Iron Crown, and was stolen from the "Cabinet des Medailles," in which it was deposited, and melted down. The most celebrated of these crowns is—

(1) The Iron Crown of Lombardy, the reputed gift of Queen Theodelinda, who died A.D. 628. This crown is formed of six plates of gold, each double, united by as many hinges of the same metal. The face of each plate exhibits two parts, divided by spiral threads; one long, and squareish, the other tall and narrow. The plate is covered with emerald-green semitransparent enamel. The long panels contain a large gem in the centre, surrounded by four gold roses, or floral knobs, from which ramify small stalks and flowers, in red, blue, and opaque-white enamel. The tall narrow plaques contain three gems set vertically. One plaque has only one gem, and two roses. The two centre plaques meet without an intervening plaque. The number of gems is 22; of gold roses, 26; and of enamels, 24. Within the golden circlet thus formed is the iron ring, from which is derived the designation of the "Iron Crown" (which, however, Ferrario asserts, is comparatively modern, never being found in the rituals of the churches of Milan and Monza before the time of Otto IV., A.D. 1175. Before this epoch even its advocate Bellani allows it appears in the inventories as Corona Aurea). This is a narrow iron band .04 inch thick and .4 inch broad, united at the extremities by a small nail, and connected with the articulated plates of the crown by little pins. Bellani asserts that it was hammered into shape, and bears no marks of the file. Burges, a more trustworthy authority, states that the marks of the file are clearly visible. (Arch. Journal, vol. xiv. p. 14.) This iron ring, as is well-known, is regarded as a relic of the greatest sanctity, being reputed to have been fashioned out of one of the nails of the true cross. This belief cannot be traced further back than the latter part of the 16th century. The existence of the band of iron is mentioned by Aeneas Sylvius (Pope Julius II. d. 1464) in his Hist. Aust. lib. iv., but simply as hincina quaedam, without a hint at its supposed sanctity, and with an expression of contempt for the allegorical meaning assigned to its employment in the coronation of the emperors, as denoting stultitia—"stultae interpretationis efficit locum." According to Muratori (De Coron. Ferr. Comment., A.D. 1698), Bugatus is the first author who mentions it (Attk. ad Hist. Univ. 1587). He was followed by Zucchi (Hist. Cor. Ferr. 1613), whose violations of truth Muratori holds it charitable to attribute to gross carelessness. Two years before the publication of Bugatus' book, A.D. 1585, a letter, sent from the archpriest of Monza to Pope Sixtus V., quoted by Muratori, speaks of the Iron Crown as a most precious possession of his church, as having been used from early times for the coronation of the Roman emperors (even this fact is doubtful), but distinguishes it from the relics properly so called, and makes no allusion to its having been wrought out of a nail of the crucifixion. From the 16th century onwards the belief gained strength, but having been discredited by the searching historical investigations of Muratori in the treatise referred to above, the worship of the crown as a sacred relic was alternately suspended and re-enforced by decrees and counter-decrees of the ecclesiastical authorities, until in 1688 the matter was laid before the Congregation of Relics at Rome. A process was instituted, which lingered on till 1717, when a diplomatic sentence was pronounced, leaving the chief point—the identity of the iron ring with the nail—undecided, but sanctioning its

The Iron Crown of Lombardy, at Monza Cathedral.

"and conchones galere auree gemmis deperantibus") and was Aureliana. It is seen in a peaked cap ornamented with a jewelled diadem cap in later times of ἑσπέρικου, τοῦ, urban. Zonarus de-

Constantine from his Arch at Nisus.

In the 9th century, ἡ τοῦ καλι ἰ ρος. Its origin, and it, is thus given by ἡ παρὰ Πάφου, μὲν ἰ στερφύρου ἀράς ἵπας τυφας, ἄς ἑστίος ἑ ἑάνου.

A headgear was a low, flat, of diadem or any. This was known as Constantine appears in Rome (Ferrario) in an illumination of the 15th century, representing by Agincourt (Penitence) in the mosaic of the Ravenna, has his head, while the Empress surrounded with three of pearls and other. These jewelled στασεῖσσι. (Const. ii. 688.)

Relic at St. Vitale, Ravenna.

A form of a linen or woolly went out of use in the 12th century. It was replaced by a flexible στέφανος, sometimes pearls and precious stones. The name imperial symbol as mentioned. Cyril, Ἐπὶ ἁ ῶν ἑ χ ρ ο ῖ ς τ ῆ ρ being exposed to the adoration of the faithful, and carried in processions.

The chain of evidence connecting the Iron Crown with the crucifixion nail is very precarious, and shows some alarming gaps. According to the statement of Justus Fontanus (Archbishop of Ancona, De Coron. Ferr. 1719), who wrote in defence of its genuineness, the inner ring was believed to have been formed out of one of the two nails given by the Empress Helena, after her discovery of the true cross on Calvary, to her son Constantine. One of these was made into a bit for the emperor's bridle (in allusion to Zech. xiv. 20); the other was used in a head-covering—a diadem, according to some authorities (Ambros. De Obitu Theod. Magn.); a helmet, according to others, and those the most credible. Constantine's idea seems indeed to have been that so sacred an amulet allixed to his helmet would be a protection to him in battle, "gula belli usibus aptum" (Rufinus, Hist. Eccl. x. 8; Soer. i. 17; Soz. ii. 1; Theod. i. 18; Cassiod. i. 18). The orthodox theory identifies the Monza crown with the diadem supposed to have been presented by Helena to Constantine, which passed, no one knows when or how (it is needless to enumerate the more or less probable hypotheses), from Constantinople to Rome, and is affirmed—a fact of which there is absolutely no evidence—to have been sent as a present by Gregory the Great to Queen Theodelinda; although it is in the highest degree improbable that Gregory, who is known to have been "tenax reliquiarum," should have parted with a relic of such supreme sanctity, while, if such a precious gift had been made, it could not fail to have been mentioned by Gregory when describing his donations (Greg. Mag. Ep. xii. [vii.] lib. xiv. [xii.]). The view of Bellani (canon of Monza, who wrote an elaborate treatise (Milano, 1819) in answer to Ferrario's Appendice sulla Corona di Ferro. Costumi, Europa, vol. iii.) is that the iron ring and the gold circlet were originally distinct; that the former is the sacred relic affixed to the helmet of Constantine, while the latter was primarily a diadem, open behind, and fastened to the head by clasps, the extremities of which were united in the present shape when it was adapted to the iron ring. The view of Muratori, which appears the most probable, dissipates all notion of sacred interest attaching to the iron ring, which he considers to have been inserted within the gold circle, as in the crown of Charlemagne (see post), simply for the purpose of giving firmness to the articulated plates.

However it may have reached Italy, the character of the workmanship of the Iron Crown proves its Byzantine origin. La Barte, who holds this as an incontrovertible fact, remarks that the art of working in enamel had not penetrated into Italy in the time of Theodelinda (Les Arts industriels d' Mo. en Age, ii. 56 sq.).

The small size of the crown, barely large enough for the head of a child of two years old, the internal diameter being 6 inches (its height is 2.4 inches), leads to the conclusion that it was never intended for ordinary wearing, but was a suspensory or votive crown, with a cross and lamp usually depending from it, hung over the altar, and employed temporarily, on the occasion of coronations, for placing on the sovereign's head as a symbol of royalty, and then returned again to its place. Such crowns are seen hanging over the altar in a bas-relief of a coronation, now in the S. transept of Monza cathedral (see the woodcut p. 460), exactly resembling that which is being placed on the sovereign's head. In the church of St. Sophia, at Constantinople, also, according to Codinus, the royal στέφανος were suspended over the holy table, and were only worn on high festivals. Ducauge (Constant. Christiana) also informs us that the Greek emperors were inaugurated with one of the lamp-bearing crowns ordinarily hanging over the altar [CORONA LUCIS].

(For the history of the Iron Crown, see Muratori, De Coron. Ferr. Comment. Meliolan. et Lips. 1719; also Anecd. Lat. ii. 267 sq.; Fontanini De Corona Ferrea, 1617; Frisi, Memorie Storiche di Monza, ii.; Zucchi, Hist. Coron. Ferr. 1317; De Mur, Dissert. de Coron. Reg. Ital. vulgo Ferrea dicta, 1810; Bellani, La Corona Ferrea del Regno d'Italia, 1819; Ferrario, Costumi, Europa, iii. Appendice sulla Corona di Ferro; La Barte, Les Arts industriels du Moyen Age, ii. 56 sq.)

(2) The Crown of Agilulf.—This hopelessly lost treasure takes its name from Theodelinda's second husband, chosen by her A.D. 591, on the death of Authar. From its small size, even less than the Iron Crown, it is evident that it was not intended for ordinary wear, but was a votive, suspensory crown. This is also proved by the inscription it bore: "† Agilulf. Graf. Di. vir. glor. rar. totius. Ital. offeret. s'co Johanni. Baptist. in. Eccl. Medicea." A gold cross depended from it, with a large amethyst in the middle, two gems in each arm and four large pearls. Seven little chains with pendent acorns hung from the cross. The crown itself was a circle of gold, decorated with 15 arched niches of laurel boughs containing figures of our Lord seated between two angels, and the Twelve apostles standing. It bore a circle of emeralds, carbuncles, and pearls above.

Crown of Agilulf.

The inscrip-of executio that this ar-bard, not E

(3) The circlet, sur-more or les and a gre From it dep and pearls.
ant. R. i.

Memorie di M
Agincourt, Sc
Barges Arch. J

(4) Crowns
Spanis' Vistio

These eight go century, now i Chmy, were di Fuente de Guan been interred e invasion of the S found were evid sions, votive cro ring and queen
The crown of R 658-675, is one c able relics of its and formed of a measures about 9 in circumference.
Broad, and more

The rims of the ho necting circles in with incrustation with thirty uncut nating with an in forming three ro are pierced with o represent foliage edge of this hoop i very remarkable 2 inches long, inc dent pearl and sapp the inscription—

† RECESSIVE

A little below the f wire Latin cross mo

The inscription was in enamel. The clumsiness of execution leads La Barte u. s. to the conclusion that this and the following crown were of Lombard, not Byzantine workmanship.

(3) The Crown of Theodelinda.—This is a plain circlet, enriched with a vast quantity of gems of more or less value, chiefly emeralds and pearls, and a great many pieces of mother-of-pearl. From it depends a cross, also set with emeralds and pearls. (For these crowns consult Muratori, Ant. R. i. 460; Ferrario, u. s. iii. 70; Frisi, Memorie di Monza, l. pl. vi. p. 42; vol. ii. 76; Agincourt, Sculpture, pl. 28; La Barte, ii. 56, Burgas Arch. Journ. vol. xiv.)

Crown of Theodelinda.

(4) Crowns of Reccesvinthus, King of the Spanis Visigoths, and his Queen and Family.—These eight gold crowns belonging to the 7th century, now in the museum of the Hôtel de Clugy, were discovered buried in the earth at Fuente de Guarrazar in 1858, having probably been interred early in the 8th century on the invasion of the Saracens. The whole of the crowns found were evidently, from their form and dimensions, votive crowns, probably dedicated by the king and queen and chief officers of the court. The crown of Reccesvinthus, who reigned A.D. 659-675, is one of the most gorgeous and remarkable relics of its age, composed of a fillet jointed and formed of a double plate of purest gold. It measures about 9 inches in diameter, or 27 inches in circumference. The hoop is about 4 inches broad, and more than half an inch in thickness. The rims of the hoop are formed of bands of interlocking circles in cloisonné work in red and green, with incrustations of cornelian. It is enriched with thirty uncut sapphires of large size, alternating with as many very large Oriental pearls, forming three rows. The intervening spaces are pierced with open work, and engraved so as to represent foliage and flowers. To the lower edge of this hoop is suspended by small chains a very remarkable fringe of gold letters about 2 inches long, incrustated with gems, with a pendant pearl and sapphire attached to each, forming the inscription—

† RECCESVINTIUS REX OFFERET.

A little below the fringe of letters hangs a massive Latin cross mounted with six fine sapphires and eight large pearls, with jewelled pendants attached to its foot and limbs. To the upper margins are attached four golden chains of beautiful design, by which it might be suspended, uniting in a foliated ornament, and surmounted by a knob of rock crystal, with sapphires hanging round.

A second crown discovered in the same place has been assigned with much probability to the queen of Reccesvinthus. In form and arrangement it corresponds to that of the king, but the enrichments are less gorgeous. Like that, it is formed in two pieces with a hinge, to adapt it to the head of the wearer. The hoop is set with fifty-four gems, rubies, sapphires, emeralds, and opals. From the lower rim hang eight sapphires. There is no inscription. The pendant cross is covered with jewels, but less costly than those on the former one.

Crown of Reccesvinthus.

The six smaller crowns are reasonably supposed to have belonged to the younger members of this royal family. Three of these are gold hoops without pendant crosses, jewelled, enriched with repoussé work and mother-of-pearl. One is decorated with an arcade of little round-headed arches, and has a fringe of rock crystal. The other three are of a very singular construction. They consist of a kind of open framework or basketwork of gold, formed of three horizontal circlets, connected by numerous uprights, gems being set at the points of intersection. Each crown is richly decorated with as many as fifty-four precious stones and pearls, and is terminated with the fringe of sapphires and the pendant cross. One of the crosses presents the dedicatory inscription—

† IN DEI NOMINE OFFERET SONNICA SANCTE MARIE IN SORBACES.

"Few relics of the period," writes Mr. Albert Way, Archaeol. Journal, xvi. 258, "deserve comparison with this precious regalia, both in barbaric magnificence of enrichment, and in the impressive effect of so sumptuous a display of natural gems remarkable for their dimensions and lustrous brilliancy." (Lasteyrie, Description du Trésor de Guirrazar, Paris, 1860. La Barte, Arts Indust., i. 499 sq.)

Crown of Svintila.

(5) The Crown of Svintila.—Svintila was king of the Visigoths, A.D. 621-631. His crown, preserved in the royal armoury at Madrid, is of massive gold enriched with sapphires and pearls set rose fashion between two borders set with delicate stones. From the lower rim hangs a fringe of open letters of gold, set with red glass, suspended by chains of double links, with pendant pear-shaped sapphires. The letters form the inscription, SVINTILANVS REX OFFERT.

(Proceedings of the Soc. of Antiq. ii. 11. José Amador de los Ríos, El Arte Latino-Byzantino, Madrid, 1861.)

These Spanish crowns are considered by La Barte to be of Spanish workmanship. Lasteyrie, on the other hand, assigns to them a Gothic origin, and, with less probability, thinks that they were brought into Spain by North German barbarians.

The suspensory form of these crowns and the inscriptions some of them present prove that they were of a votive character, and were dedicated to God by the king and his family on some memorable occasion, to be hung up over the altar. But this does not preclude their previous use as crowns for wearing. That such was their primary destination is rendered almost certain by the variation in diameter of the different circlets, and by the hinges and fastenings which facilitated their being fitted to the wearer's head. The queen's crown also has little loops, above and below, for attaching a lining or cap within the gold circlet, to prevent it from galling the wearer's brows.

(6) The Crown of Charlemagne.—This crown, preserved in the treasury at Vienna, is evidently made up of portions belonging to different epochs. It is composed of eight round-headed plaques of gold; four larger, enriched with emeralds and sapphires en cabochon, and four smaller, presenting enamelled figures of David, Solomon, Hezekiah, and Christ. Strength and unity are imparted to the whole by the insertion of two little circlets of iron. A jewelled cross rises from the apex of the front plaque, from which an enamelled arch stretches over the head to the back, bearing the name of the Emperor Conrad, A.D. 1138. The costumes of the figures in the enamels are Byzantine. (Haugard-Mangé, Les Arts somptuaires, Paris, 1858, p. 31, vol. ii. p. 31.) Authorities.—In addition to the treatises of Muratori, Fontaninus, and Bellani, named above, we may refer the student to the following:—Bayer, De duob. Diadem. in Mus. Nap. Comment. Acad. Scient. Imp. Pet. op. l. viii. 1736. Agincourt, Seroux d', Art par les Monuments, Sculpture, Peinture. W. Barges, "On the Treasures at Monza," Archaeol. Journ. xiv. Ciampini, Vet. Monim. xiv. p. 107. Guenebault, Diction. iconogr. des Monuments, Paris, 1843, and Glossaire liturgique in Annales de Philosophie chrétienne, xi. Ferrario, Costume antico e moderno d'Europa, vol. i. pt. 1, vol. iii. pt. 1, Appenire sulle Coronat. Ferrero, vol. i. pt. 2, Haugard-Mangé, Les Arts somptuaires, Paris, 1858. La Barte, Les Arts industriels. Migne, Encycl. Theol. xvii. Di-

CROWNS F
CROWNS F
wreaths, as con seem to call for there was a cust period. The bri been adopted by versal use, some sometimes by the ness of early Chri coronae generally excesses of heat heathen worship.
rings with heath tempted to put t (Tertull. de Coron worn as a bouquet upon the head. It the natural beaut from the old associ It is probable that very widely enter sustom it was again and bride were crow priety, over the f was a shock to Chri were worn by the
The bridegroom's w of myrtle (Sidon. A the bride's of verbe rie in the Eastern marriage service to Bishop as th

Casteyrie, Description
1865. La Barte

—Sviatilla was king 31. His crown, pre-ry at Madrid, is of sapphires and pearls borders set with delirim hangs a fringe of with red glass, sus-links, with pendant the letters form the

EX OFFERT.

f Antiq. ii. 11. José Arte Latino-bizantino, are considered by workmanship. Las 1, assigns to them a probability, thinks into Spain by North these crowns and the present prove that ncter, and were delig and his family on to be hung up over not preclude their wearing. That such on is rendered almost a diameter of the dis-hinges and fastenings g fitted to the wearer's also has little loops, ching a lining or cap to prevent it from

—Coronae.—This crown, at Vienna, is evidently ing to different epochs. und-headed plaques of ed with emeralds and ed four smaller, pre-of David, Solomon, rength and unity are the insertion of two jewelled cross rises at plaque, from which nes over the head to ame of the Emperor costumes of the figures zantine. (Haugardnes, Paris, 1858, pi. 31, n to the treatises of Bellai, named above, to the following:—

n Mus. Imp. Comment.
viii. 1736. Agincourt, n te. Sculpture, Féu- Treasures at Monza," lanjany. Let. Monum. ault, Diction. iconog.
3, and Glossaire litté- sophie chrétienne, xi. no terno d'Europa, vol. ppen ire sulle Coronae gard-Mangé, Les Arts La Barte, Les Arts
A. Theol. xviii. Diconnaire d'Orfèvrerie, &c. Montfaucon, Mémoires de la Monarchie française. i. Paschalis, De Cor- sias, Paris, 1610. Sommerard, du, Catologue du Musée de Cluny, Paris, 1861. Way, "On the Crowns of Guartazar," Arch. Journal, xvi.

[E. V.]

Crown of Chalcidiana.

CROWNS FOR BRIDES.—These two uses of crowns or wreaths, as connected with Christian social life, seem to call for a separate notice. In each case there was a custom belonging to a non-Christian period. The bridal crown, of Greek origin, had been adopted by the Romans, and was in universal use, sometimes worn by the bride alone, sometimes by the bridegroom also. The rigorous-ness of early Christian feeling rejected the use of coronae generally, as connected either with the excesses of heathen feasts, or the idolatry of heathen worship. Christians were to avoid marriages with heathen women lest they should be tempted to put the evil thing upon their brows (Tertull. de Coronâ, c. 13). Flowers might be worn as a bouquet, or held in the hand, but not upon the head. It was not long, however, before the natural beauty of the practice freed itself from the old associations and reasserted its claim.
It is probable that the objections to it were never very widely entertained. In the time of Chrysostom it was again a common usage. Bridegroom and bride were crowned as victors, assuming their parity, over the temptations of the flesh. It was a shock to Christian feeling when the wreaths were worn by the impure (Rom. ix. in 1 Tim.).
The bridegroom's wreath was for the most part of myrtle (Sidon. Apollin. Carm. II. ad Anthem.), the bride's of verbenæ. The prominence of the rite in the Eastern church has led the whole marriage service to be described in the Greek ἑπιφάνη as the Ἀκολουθία τοῦ στεφανώματος; and the ceremony itself, as probably handed down from an early period, deserves mention here. First, the bridegroom solemnly crowns the bride in the name of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost. Then the bride in like manner crowns the bridegroom. The bride in priest blesses them with the thrice-repeated words, "O Lord our God, crown them with glory and honour."

The use of wreaths for burials, common among both Greeks and Romans, on the head of the corpse, on the bier, on the tomb, was for like reasons rejected by the more rigorous teachers. The disciples of Christ were to seek an incorruptible crown, the amaranth which grows on no earthly soil (Clem. Alex. Paedag.
ii. 8). To those who had been accustomed to shew their honour to the dead by this outward sign, this refusal seemed cruel and unfeeling; and Christians had to defend themselves against the charge, "Coronae etiam sepulcris denegatis" (Minuc. Fel. c. 12), with the answer, "Nec ad-floribus viridem coronam, sed a Deo aeternis viridem sustinemus" (ibid. c. 37). Here also, after a time, though less formally in the case of the nuptial crown, the old practice was revived with a higher significance. The crown appears on tombs and paintings as the symbol of martyrdom; and modern Christendom reproduces, without misgiving, the practice which the ancient Church rejected. [E. H. F.]

CRUCIFIX and REPRESENTATIONS OF THE CRUCIFIXION. It is necessary to distinguish between the use of the crucifix as an object of lustre or of devotion, and that of pictorial or other representations of the Crucifixion as a scene. Every variety and combination of the arts of sculpture, mosaic, painting, and engraving has been applied to this great subject from early times, and to all parts of it; and this distinction is one of principle as well as convenience. The modern crucifix and its use of course form no part of the subject. Within the limits of our period, all representations of the crucified Form of our Lord alone, as well as pictures, reliefs, and mosaics, in which that Form is the central object of a scene, may be considered alike symbolical, without historical realism or artistic appeal to emotion. There is doubtless a divergence in the direction of realism, and appeal to feeling by actual representation is begun, whenever the human figure is added to the symbolic cross.* The use of the sculptured, moulded, or enamelled crucifix or crucifixion in early times, is a development of that of the cross, and the transition between them may have been certain from the first; but the rude efforts of earlier days, with which alone we have to do, can neither call on the imagination by vivid presentation of the actual event, nor awaken feeling by appeal to the sense of beauty, nor distress by painful details of bodily suffering. While the primitive rules of representation were adhered to, as they are to this day in the Greek Church, the picture or icon dwells on the meaning of the event rather than its resemblance, and shadows forth, rather than represents, the God-Man in the net of death for man. These rules were first infringed by, or naturally collapsed in the presence of, increased artistic power. The paintings of Cimabue and Giotto, and the reliefs of N. Pisano, brought the personality of the artist into every work, and introduced human motive and treatment, in the artistic sense of the words. To those whose minds are drawn to ascetic thought and practice, it has always been natural to meditate, and to communicate their thoughts upon, the bodily sufferings of the Saviour of mankind. This was done by Angelico and others naturally and freely before the Reformation; since that period a somewhat polemical and artificial use has been made of this line of thought; and painting and sculpture have been applied to embody it accordingly in the Roman Catholic Church. It may be remarked, before retiring within our proper limits of time, that the use of blood, by Giotto and his followers down to Angelico, has doctrinal reference to the Holy Communion, and to Scriptural promises of cleansing by the blood of Christ.† Giotto is less in-

* De Roset (vol. ii. tav. v. p. 365) gives a cross, with two lambs apparently contemplating it, below one of the usual pictures of the Good Shepherd. Aringhi, Rom. Subt. ii. 478: "Crux, cum Christo illi fixo, neutiquam effigiarum olini solent." The Crucifixion he calls "mysticis reatibus adumbrata . . . emblematicis figuratisque modis; sub innocuo videlicet signi juxta crucis lignum pinde consistentia typo." See Bottari, tav. xxi. xxii. See, however (ib., tav. excii.), the crucifix found in the tomb of St. Julius and St. Valentine in the Catacombs; which so much resembles the mosaic crucifix of John VII. that it can hardly be of very early date. It is generally assigned to Pope Adrian, about 890.

† As in the Crucifixion over the door of the Convent of St. Mark's, Florence, where the blood issues from the joined to dwell for terror's sake on the bodily sufferings of the Passion, than to dwell with awe on its mystery as a sacrifice for man. But the rise of mediæval asceticism, and its attribution of sacramental efficacy to bodily pain, bore painters with it as well as other men. And in later times, when Christian feeling on the subject was lost, many men seem to have considered the final scene of the Redemption of Man chiefly as a good opportunity of displaying newly-acquired powers of facial expression and knowledge of anatomy.

If Hallam's division of periods be accepted, which makes the end of the 5th century the beginning of the Middle Ages, the public representation of the Crucifixion may be said to be a mediæval usage in point of time. Further, Martigny (Dict. des Antiq. Chrétiennes, p. 18), s. v.) claims for France the honour of having possessed the first public crucifix-painting which ever existed; for which he refers to Gregory of Tours (De Glor. Martyr. i. 23), and which he says must have been at least as old as the middle of the 6th century. But he says above, probably with great correctness, that all the most eminent Crucifixions known were objects of private devotion, instancing the pectoral cross of Queen Theodolinda and the Syriac MS. of the Medicean Theodolinda's Crucifix.

Library at Florence, both hereafter to be described. The official or public use of the cross as a symbol of Redemption begins with Constantine, though of course it had been variously employed by all Christians at an earlier date. [Cross.]

Crucifixes, according to Guericke, did not appear in churches till after the 7th century. Such images, probably, in the early days of the Church, would produce too crude and painful an effect in the Christian imagination, and to that of the more hopeful Pagan they would be intolerable; not only because his feelings would recoil from the thought of the punishment of the cross, but from superstitious terror of confect, in a conventional form, as a crimson cord, which is twined strangely beneath about a skull. (Ruskin, 2nd P. vol. ii. p. 125.)

acting the
The Grati
this (see w have refra as a symb ing, from y itself may unwelcome version

If we set name, and t gram of it, sentations o divinity and which comm ings for all class is the later the La painting giv symbolic La
xii. 8; Exoc
i. 18; Rev. x
with the Ne shadows of of Abel to St
It is well sa the early tim matic use gr vances. The its head, in t *Sculpture e P Roma, &c., R about the lat simple cross o tari, tav. xxii bears the cro
*Roma Subterr book, sometime pini, *Vetere M
vol. ii. tab. xv and then it is with evident (Ciampini, V. J
the end of the Cross are repr
Lamb. In Ci xiii.) the Lamb of an ornament resemblance to The famous V
the Cross of V monographs, R 6th century typ medallion of th
with a nimbus, intersection, and length figures of nimbus at the Two others at th to represent Jus
The upper half-in the left hand, lower one holds embossed lily-or

* The Cross of V
6th or 10th cent Brangiate. The V
St. Laurent's paper 1876). The result of Borga's illustrat of Clauvini and othe sake on the bodily on to dwell with awe e for man. But the and its attribution s bodily pain bore other men. And in feeling on the subject have considered the n of Man chiefly as a ying newly-acquired and knowledge of eriods be accepted, the 5th century the ges, the public repre-may be said to be a of time. Further, Chetiennes, p. 134, the honour of having ucrifix-painting which refers to Gregory of 3), and which he says old as the middle of says above, probably all the most eminent objects of private de-toral cross of Queen MS. of the Medicean

Crucifix.

h hereafter to be de-public use of the cross a begins with Constant-it had been variously ns at an earlier date.

to Guerike, did not after the 7th century.
 the early days of the oo crude and painful an agination, and to that gan they would be in-use his feelings would of the punishment of stititious terror of con-as a crimson cord, which about a skull. (Ruskin, 1864) acting the Infelix Arbor with a Divine Being.

 The Gradito Blasfemo of the Palatine illustrates this (see woodcut); but Christian teachers may have refrained from any addition to the cross, as a symbol of divine humiliation and suffering, from purely charitable motives. The cross itself may have been felt to be temporarily unwelcome to persons in certain stages of conversion.

If we set aside the various monograms of His name, and the emblematic fish, which is an angram of it, there are but two classes of representations of our Lord,—those which point to His divinity and lordship over all men, and those which commemorate His humanity and sufferings for all men. The earliest of the former class is the Good Shepherd; the earliest of the latter the Lamb; and both are combined in the painting given by De Rossi, vol. ii. tav. v. The symbolic Lamb, as will be seen (Gen. iv. 4, xiii. 8; Exod. xii. 3, xxix. 38; Is. xvi. 1; 1 Pet.
 i. 18; Rev. xiii. 8), connects the Old Testament with the New, and unites in itself all types and shadowings of Christ's sacrifice, from the death of Abel to St. John's vision of the slain victim.
 It is well said by Martigny to be the crucifix of the early times of persecution; and its emblematic use grows more significant as time advances. The cross is first borne by the Lamb on its head, in the monogrammatic form (Battori, Sculture e Pitture sagre estratte dai Cimieri di Roma, &c., Rom. 3 fol. 1737-51, tav. xxi. v. 1), about the latter half of the 4th century. The simple cross occurs thus in the 5th century (Bot-tari, tav. xxii.). In the 6th century the Lamb bears the cross (Ariangi, ii. lib. iv. p. 559, Roma Selve-ranea), and rests sometimes on a book, sometimes at the foot of an altar (Ciampini, Vetera Monumenta, vol. i. tab. xv. p. 26;
 vol. ii. tab. xv. p. 58), above which is the cross; and then it is represented "as it were slain," with evident reference to the Paschal feast (Ciampini, V. M. t. ii. tabb. xv. xvi.). Towards the end of the 8th century the Wounds of the Cross are represented on the sides and feet of the Lamb. In Ciampini (De Sacris Aedificiis, tab. xiii.) the Lamb is raised on a throne at the foot of an ornamented cross, the throne itself bearing resemblance to an altar-table.

The famous Vatican Cross (for which, and for the Cross of Velletri, see Cardinal Borgia's monographs, Rome, 4to. 1779 and 1780) is the 6th century type of symbolic representation. A medallion of the Lamb bearing the cross, and with a nimbus is placed at its central point of intersection, and it is accompanied by two half-length figures of our Lord, with the cruciform nimbus at the top and foot of the vertical limb.
 Two others at the horizontal ends are supposed to represent Justina II. and his Empress Sophia.
 The upper half-length of the Lord holds a book in the left hand, and blesses with the right; the lower one holds a roll and a small cross. The embossed lily-ornaments are of great beauty, and there is an inscription on the back, which Borgia reads thus:—

"Ligno quo Christus humanum subdidit hostem Dat Romae Justinus . pen."

As it is impossible to determine which is the earliest representation of the Crucifixion or crucifix now in existence or on trustworthy record, a few of the oldest known may be briefly

Particular of Vatican Cross.

described here. They will be found in woodcut in Angelo Rocca, Thesaurus Pontificiarum Rerum, vol. i. p. 153, though the copies have been made by a draughtsman skilled in anatomy, who has quite deprived them of the stamp of antiquity, which their originals undoubtedly possessed. The first and second are said by Rocca to be the workmanship of Nicodemus and St. Luke.

* The Cross of Velletri, which Borgia attributes to the 5th or 10th century, contains the symbols of the four Evangelists. The Vatican Cross is photographed in M.
 St. Laurent's paper in Dictionnaire Neve Archeologique (see figs.). The result reflects great credit on the accuracy of Borgia's illustration; and M. St. Laurent speaks highly of Ciampini and others.

first is evidently of the time of Charlemagne. The Crucifix is clothed in a long tunic, and bears a crown of radiatory bars, closed at top, rising from the circlet. A chalice is at its feet, and A ω on the title overhead.

The head of the second, attributed to St. Luke, is crowned, and surrounded by a nimbus. It is almost entirely naked,—the waistcloth, at least, seems to have been purposely contracted: this of itself would place it at a late date.

The third example is historical. It is called the Crucifix of John VII., and represents a mosaic in the old Basilica of St. Peter's. Rocca dates it 706. It bears the cruciform nimbus with the title INRI. It is clothed in a long tunic, the form and folds of which are most graceful, and bear a great resemblance to the painted crucifix found in the Catacombs, assigned to Pope Adrian III. 884.

The fourth is the celebrated Crucifix of Charlemagne, given to Leo III. and the Basilica of St. Peter's, and dated 815. It is clothed in an ample waistcloth, the wound in the side is represented, and the head surrounded by a cruciform nimbus. Four nails are used in all these crucifixes.

A crucifix is described by the Rev. F. II. Tozer, which, as he considers, has a decided claim to be considered the most ancient in existence, and which he saw in the monastery of Xeropotama at Mount Athos. It is a reputed gift of the Empress Pulcheria (414-453), and has been spared no doubt for that reason. It is a supposed fragment of the true cross, and consists of one long piece of dark wood and two cross-pieces, one above the other, the smaller intended for the superscription. The small figure of our Lord is of ivory or bone. Near the foot is a representation of the Church of the Holy Sepulchre in gold, inlaid, and set with diamonds and sapphires of extraordinary size and beauty. Below that, the inscription Κωνσταντίνου Εὐφροσύνης καὶ τῶν τέκνων. Another exists at Ochrida in Western Macedonia, discussed, and of unknown history. Mr. Tozer considers that it belonged to a disciple of Cyril and Methodius, and may probably be connected with the latter. He mentions a third, also probably connected with the Apostle of Bohemia, in the Museum at Prague (see Murray's Handbook of South Germany), and another as existing in Crete (see Pashley's Travels). These are the only crucifixes he knows of as existing in the Greek Church. The Iconoclastic controversy, he observes, took the same course with the crucifix as with other representations, painted or carved: and when it died away into compromise on the distinction between icons and images, the crucifix was treated as an image. This does not necessarily apply to pictures in MSS.; but the carved form may have been the more easily dislodged in the Iconoclastic controversy of 720, because it had not been long introduced, since it did not exist till the 7th century. "To the keener perception of the Greeks" (says Milman, Latin Christianity, vi. 413) "there may have arisen a feeling, that in its more rigid and solid form the Image was nearer to the Idol. There was a tacit compromise" (after the period of Iconoclasm); "nothing appeared but painting, mosaics, engravings on cup and chalice" (this of course accounts for works like the Cross of Velletri, the Diptych of Rarabona, and others), "and embroidery on vestments. The renunciation of sculpture grew to a rigid passionate aversion . . . as of a Jew or Mohammedan." There can be no doubt that the first step in a progress which has frequently ended in idolatry was made in the Quinisext Council, or that in Trullo, at Constantinople in 691. It is the challenge to Iconoclasm. It decrees (can. 82) that, as the antitype is better than type or symbol in all representation, the literal representation of the Lord shall take the place of the symbolic Lamb on all emblems of His sacrifice, and ordains thus: Τὸν τοῦ αἰώντος τὴν ἀμαρτίαν κόσμου Ἀγνοῦ Χριστοῦ τοῦ Θεοῦ ἡμῶν, κατὰ τὸν ἀνθρώπινον χαρακτῆρα καὶ ἐν τοῖς εἰκόσιν ἀπὸ τοῦ νῦν ἀπὸ τῶν παλαιῶν ἀνωδὴ ἀναστῆναι ὀρίζομεν. [Compare AGNUS DEI.]

A very early crucifix of the 6th century seems to be mentioned in the following passage, which is produced by Binterim (Denkwürdigk. iv. part i. 48) without reference, but which he may have seen in some unpublished record. He is speaking of the church of Hoya in the bishopric of Liege, destroyed by the Huns in the 4th century, and restored A.D. 512, at the time of the first synod of Orleans. This church "in suis civibus reedificatur, et in longum versus Orientem extenditur usque ad gradus Chori sub crucifixo, altari tamen antiquo semper remanente," &c. Further, he quotes Aegidius as stating that Robert, Provost of Liege, "sub crucifixo sepulcrum accepit." This only proves the existence of crucifixes at the time of the writers, especially as the original altar is spoken of as remaining, without mention of cross or crucifix, at the end of the choir which contained it. Had the name or date of the author of the passage quoted been known, it would have been of great importance; but it may be, and its Latin might indicate that it is, from some late chronicler, familiar with the appearance of the church, and using the words as meaning no more than under the present crucifix, or rood above the altar-screen." Dr. Binterim found no argument on it as to the date of the German change from cross to crucifix, and the passage may be left pass. The "Santo Volto," "Vultus de Luca," or Crucifix of Luca (corrupted by William Rufus, for impregatory purposes, into the "Face of St. Luke"), is carved in cedar-wood, and is attributed to Nicodemus, and supposed to have been conveyed miraculously to Luca in 782. It is said to be of the 6th century, and is certainly one of the earliest crucifixes in existence. It bears the Lord crowned as king, and vested in a long pontifical robe as priest, and this combines symbolic treatment with realism, perhaps the way afterwards intended by the Council in Trullo. The idea is that of the Crucified King of Men, and the work is an assertion of the combined deity and humanity, and of the submission to death of the Lord of humanity. A crucifix greatly resembling this was found during some operations at Christchurch, Oxford, and is now preserved in the Bodleian: it was probably an outer ornament of some Evangeliarium. We understand M. St. Laurent to consider these 4 The author of this paper can remember no representation of the Crucifixion as existing either at the convent of Mount Stoal or that of Mar Saba.

examples to graphic de Annales Ar 357, and t. and exhaust admirably il

The steps literal repr directly; but undoubted a be considere main to be certain exte gested by m private use from very an Syrac Evang Florence, wi detail of the ing at the w fingers, for represented in Florence, 17 one of the n world; with that undescri was the roo of ligers in the Upper

or the brothe "retusissimus exta," and it is his Palaeograph writer, the mon ismative skill At the top are other a crescent. circular or rath of the three cro the Virgin Moth the left by thr with the spear next to the cent head of the form Lord wears the cloths, and large form, are falling are used in each upper and lower playing for the cross, is a Holy early Byzantine work as an upright shape as a centry; but by a woman rogel; on the oth blic figure in th examples to date from the 12th century (Iconographie de la Croix et du Crucifix; Didron's Annales Archéologiques, t. xxii. pp. 5, 137, 213, 357, and t. xxiii. pp. 5, 174, a most valuable and exhaustive summary of our whole subject, admirably illustrated).

The steps of the progress from symbolic to literal representation will be noticed immediately; but two more Crucifixions of great and undoubted antiquity (the first having a claim to be considered the most ancient in existence) remain to be briefly noticed. Both confirm to a certain extent the remark insisted on or suggested by many Roman Catholic writers, that the private use of the crucifix in devotion dates from very early times. The first is the famous Syrian Evangelium in the Medicean Library at Florence, widely known for the probably unique detail of the soldiers, not casting dice, but playing at the world-old game of "Mora" on their fingers, for the garment without seam. It is represented in Assemani's Catalogus Bibl. Medic. Florent., 1742, tav. xxiii. The whole MS. is one of the most interesting documents in the world, with many illuminations, performed with that indescribable grimness of earnestness which was the root of Eastern asceticism, and which still lingers in the handiwork of the stern Arcagnuoli, Upper half of Crucifixion MS. of Habsala.

of the brothers Orgagna. Assemani calls it "retusissimus codex qui in eadem bibliotheca est," and it is described by Prof. Westwood in his Palaographia Sacra, and dated 586 by its writer, the monk Rabula. It is composed with instinctive skill in two groups, upper and lower. At the top are the sun and moon; one a face, the other a crescent. The upper group, which is semi-circular or rather cycloidal in its shape, consists of the three crosses, supported on their right by the Virgin Mother and another female figure, on the left by three more women. The soldiers with the spear and the sponge stand on each side next to the central and largest cross. Over the head of the former is the name AOTINOC. The Lord wears the long robe, the thieves have waistcloths, and large drops of blood, in conventional form, are falling from their hands. Four nails are used in each. At the foot of the cross the upper and lower group are joined by the soldiers playing for the coat. In the centre, below the cross, is a Holy Sepulchre (represented in all early Byzantine and Italo- or Gothic-Byzantine work as an upright structure of much the same shape as a sentry's box). It is supported on the left by a woman, the Blessed Virgin, and an angel; on the other by St. John, another apostolic figure in the act of blessing, and other adoring women. The base of the composition, as it were, is formed by a group of soldiers, overthrown by the stroke of visible substantial rays from the sepulchre; the stone also lies on the left. The designer seems to have thought much of the fact of its being rolled away, and he has accordingly drawn it as a disk like a grinstone. Grotesque and archaic as it is, this work is composed exactly like Orgagna's or Michael Angelo's "Last Judgment," Titian's "Assumption," or Raffaele's "Transfiguration"—i.e., of two great upper and lower groups, tied together and supported on both sides; nor could any work better illustrate the lingering of Byzantine tradition in sacred subjects. A full description is given by Professor Westwood in his Palaographia Sacra, also by Dom Guernanger, Inst. Liturgiques, vol. iii. app.

Of the four Crucifixions given by Gori in vol.

Diptych of Habsala.

iii. of his Thesaurus Diptychorum (pp. 116, 128, 203, 216), that at p. 203, called the "Diptych of Habsala in Picenum," is the most ancient and extraordinary. It contains a medallion of the First Person of the Trinity above, with the sun and moon below on the right and left of the cross, personified as figures bearing torches. There are two titles, EGO SUM IHS NAZARENUS in rude Roman letters, with a smaller label, REX JU-DEORUM, over the cross. The nimbus is cruciform, the waistcloth reaches almost to the knees, the navel is strangely formed into an eye. The Virgin and St. John stand under the arms of the cross. But the distinguishing detail is the addition of the Roman wolf and twins below the cross, with the words ROMVLVS ET REMVLVS A LVPA NUTRITI. This wonderful ivory is now in the Vatican Museum (see Murray's Handbook), and is in the most ancient style of what may be called dark-age Byzantine art, when all instruction and sense of beauty are departed, but so vigorous a sense of the reality of the fact remains, as to render the work highly impressive — as also in the Medici MS.

Professor Westwood (Pal. Sac. pl. 18) enables us to refer to a Crucifixion found in an Irish MS. written about 800. It is in the Library of St. John's College, Cambridge, and is partly copied from the Palaeographia by Mr. Ruskin (in The Two Potos, p. 27), who selects one of the angels above the cross as a specimen of absolutely dead and degraded art. This is perfectly correct, and the work is a painful object of contemplation, as it displays the idiocy of a contemptible person instructed in a barbarian workman like the carver of the diptych. The absurd interlacings and use of dots, the sharpening of fingers into points, and the treatment of the subject entirely as a matter of penmanship, without either devotional sense or its importance or artistic effort to realize it, make the MS. most disagreeably interesting as far as this miniature is concerned.

The plea or hypothesis of Roman Catholic writers, that actual images of the crucified body of the Lord may have been used in the very earliest times for private devotion, is open to the obvious remark that none of them can be produced, whereas systematic memorials of the Crucifixion are found in regular succession, both mural and in portable forms. Father Martigny argues that the notorious Grailo of the Palace of the Caesars may be a caricatured copy of some undiscovered crucifix used for Christian worship. Father Garrucci's description of it, "Il Crocifisso Grailo in casa dei Cesari," is given by Canon Liddon in his 7th Bampton Lecture (p. 397); and the remarks which accompany it are most important, as they show "the more intelligent and bitter hostility of Paganism to the Church since the apostolic martyrdoms a century and a half before, when converts had also been made in Caesar's household." He shows also, incidentally, that it can hardly have been derived from any Christian emblem, as the ass's head connects it evidently with the Gnostic invective, which attributed to the Jews the worship of an ass. This Tacitus mentions (Hist. v. c. 4); and Tertullian (Apolog. 16) notices Tertullian's confusion between Jews and Christians, and appeals to his own account of the examination of the Jewish temple by Pompey, who found "no image" in the temple. For proof of the confusion of the early Christians with the Jews by the pagan world, Dr. Liddon refers to Dr. Pusey's note on the above passage in Tertullian, in the Oxford Library of the Fathers.

Grailo.

The relics of the treasury of the Cathedral of Monza, closely described and partly represented in woodcut by M. Martigny, are valuable examples of the transition between symbolic and actual representation of the Crucifixion. One of the ampullae for sacred oil is said to have been presented by Gregory the Great to Theodelinda, wife of Ancharis king of Lombardy, probably some time soon after 590, about a hundred years before the Council in Trullo. It is circular, and the head of the Lord, with a cruciform nimbus, is placed at the top. Below, to right and left, are the two thieves, with extended arms, but without crosses; and below them two figures are kneeling by a cross which seems to be budding into leaves. Two saints or angels are on the extreme right and left, and the usual Holy Sepulchre below, with an angel watching it on the right in the act of benediction, while St. John and St. Mary Magdalene are (apparently) approaching it on the other side. Another vessel bears a figure of the Lord, clothed with a long robe, with the nimbus and extended arms, but without the cross. Finally, the reliquary of Theodelinda, so called, has the crucified Form, with the nimbus and inscription IC XC, clothed in the long tunic, with the soldiers, two figures apparently mocking Him, and the Virgin and St. John on the right and left. The clothed figure indicates symbolical treatment, since it must have been well known that the Roman custom was to crucify naked; and Martigny argues that the Grailo, which is clothed, must therefore have been copied from some Christian picture. But from this time, or from that of the Council of 691, the artistic or ornamental treatment begins. The earliest Crucifixions are narrative, not dramatic; the Resurrection being so frequently introduced into the same composition, as if without it the subject would be altogether too painful for Christian eyes. And, indeed, till the first efforts of Italian sculpture and Florentine painting, the importance of the event represented withdrew all attention to the personality of the artist. In works of after days the painter's power is all. Their range of excellence is as wide as the difference between the tender asceticism of Fra Angelico, and the mighty sorrow of Michael Angelo, and the intense power, knowledge, and passion of the great canvass of Tintoret in the Scuola di San Rocco at Venice. The treatment of this picture resembles that of the most ancient works. All its consummate science is directed to bringing every detail of the scene into a great unity, which attention

of the (See Ru all ancie
and exp bodily I broad so subject.

For th fixion, wh for the m nails are two for crossed le to the a

Cyprina
ed. Oxon.
our Lord'
he says,
The supp
the cross Diptych presence.

left out, i Scripture attaching title of th ferences in xliii. 38, representa Luca and duce it to the A and as LVX M symbols of or face an [see page torches.

The homag
the eclipse

The Bless
Medicena works; the occur in t Monza. Th rising from rection of t above indic Clampui
The skull, placed at t emblem of Golgotha, is late addition

The rare said to be f from Cividu

Back
Front Ba k (ri Front (t

Back
Front

The decor disposed with frule, or n fining the cr other purpos engraving of n to the Church since a century and a half also been made in shows also, incidentally, been derived for many artists' heads connects it with the crucifixive, which at the worship of an ass. This is the case (c. 4); and Tertullian's confusion between appears to his own account of the Jewish temple to "imagine" in the temple of the early Christians against world, Dr. Liblion on the above passage Oxford Library of the ary of the Cathedral of and partly represented by, are valuable examples of symbolic and actual crucifixion. One of the is said to have been present to Theodolinda, wife of the Lombard king, probably some two hundred years before. It is circular, and with a cruciform nimbus. Below, to right and left, with extended arms, but how these two figures are which seems to be holding the cross or angels are on the and the usual Holy Spirit as an angel watching it on the left, while St. John and the (apparently) approaching.

Another vessel bears a cross with a long robe, with extended arms, but without the nimbus of Theodolinda, and of Form, with the nimbus clothed in the long tunic, figures apparently modeling and St. John on the right figure indicates symbolical at has been well known above indicating the presence of God, is given in Clampani (La Sacra. Aedif. tab. xxiii. p. 75).

The skull, whether human or that of a lamb, placed at the foot of the cross, either as an emblem of sacrifice or in reference to the place of Golgotha, is of late use, and is almost the only addition of symbolic detail.

The rare addition of the soldiers casting lots is said to be found in an ivory of the 8th century from Cividule in Friuli (Mozzoni, Tavole cronologiche della Chiesa universale, Venezia, 1856-63). The only other representation of it is in the Medici MS. The wolf and twins arm in the Rambona diptych alone. The types of the four Evangelists are on the back of the Cross of Velletri, in the Gospel of Egbert, of Trier, infra, and on numerous crosses of later date. Some additional inscriptions have been mentioned, as well as the addition (in the Vatican Cross) of medallion portraits. Considerable liberty in this matter seems to have been allowed in the earliest times, as is indicated by Constantine's introduction of the words of his Vision; and still more strongly in an instance referred to by Borgin, in Anastasius (tom. i. n. 2, ed. Vignoli), of a cross given by Belisarius to St. Peter—"per manus Vigilius Papae"—of gold and jewels, weighing 100 lbs., "in qua scriptis victorias suas."

attention is expressly withdrawn from the face of the Lord, which is cast into deep shadow. (See Ruskin, Modern Painters, vol. li.) In all ancient work the Lord's face is abstracted and expressionless: any attempt to represent bodily pain belongs to modern work of the baser sort, which forms no part of our present subject.

For the details and accessories of the Crucifixion, whether things or persons, they have been for the most part enumerated and described. The nails are always four in number in ancient works, two for the feet and two for the hands. The crossed legs and single large nail or spike belong to the artistic period. Martigny refers to St. Cyprian (De Passione, Dial. Inter Opusc. p. 83, ed. Oron.) as speaking of the nails which pierced our Lord's feet in the plural number. St. Cyprian, he says, had seen the punishment of the cross. The suppeducation or rest for the feet occurs in the crosses of Leo III. and of Velletri, not in the Diptych of Rambona. The Graffito indicates its presence. It seems to have been occasionally left out, in deference to those passages in Holy Scripture which allude to the disgrace or curse attaching to one "hanging" on the tree. The title of the cross, which is given with slight differences in St. Matt. xxvii. 37, Mark xv. 26, Luke xiii. 38, John xix. 9, varies greatly in different representations. It is omitted in the crosses of Lucae and Velletri. Early Greek painters reduce it to the name of Christ, IC XC, or substitute the A and ω . The sign ΦC ($\phi\omega\varsigma$) occurs, as well as LVX MVNDI, frequently accompanied by the symbols of the sun and the moon, as a red star or face and crescent, or in the Rambona ivory [see page 515] as mourning figures bearing torches. They are introduced as emblematic of the homage of all nature, or in remembrance of the eclipse of the Crucifixion.

The Blessed Virgin and St. John appear in the Medicea MS., and very frequently in ancient works; the soldiers rather less so, though they occur in the above MS. and the reliquary of Monza. The typical figure of the first Adam rising from the earth as a symbol of the resurrection of the body, with the Hand of Blessing above indicating the presence of God, is given in Clampani (La Sacra. Aedif. tab. xxiii. p. 75). The skull, whether human or that of a lamb, placed at the foot of the cross, either as an emblem of sacrifice or in reference to the place of Golgotha, is of late use, and is almost the only addition of symbolic detail.

The rare addition of the soldiers casting lots is said to be found in an ivory of the 8th century from Cividule in Friuli (Mozzoni, Tavole cronologiche della Chiesa universale, Venezia, 1856-63). The only other representation of it is in the Medici MS. The wolf and twins arm in the Rambona diptych alone. The types of the four Evangelists are on the back of the Cross of Velletri, in the Gospel of Egbert, of Trier, infra, and on numerous crosses of later date. Some additional inscriptions have been mentioned, as well as the addition (in the Vatican Cross) of medallion portraits. Considerable liberty in this matter seems to have been allowed in the earliest times, as is indicated by Constantine's introduction of the words of his Vision; and still more strongly in an instance referred to by Borgin, in Anastasius (tom. i. n. 2, ed. Vignoli), of a cross given by Belisarius to St. Peter—"per manus Vigilius Papae"—of gold and jewels, weighing 100 lbs., "in qua scriptis victorias suas."

But even the Vatican Cross yields in interest to two German relics of the same character, lately described and well illustrated in No. 45 of the Jährbücher des Vereins von Alterthumsfreunden in Rheintal, p. 195, Bonn, 1868. The first of these is the Station-Cross of Mainz. It is of gilded bronze, of the Western form (Commissa), and rather more than one foot in height. Herr Heinrich Otte refers it to the end of the 12th century, a date far beyond our period. But its interest is paramount, more particularly from the evident intention of the designer to make it embody a whole system of typical instruction, and to leave it behind him as a kind of sculptured document, or commentary, connecting the Old and New Testaments. Thus, at the middle or intersection of the arms of the cross, the Lamb is represented in a medallion, his head surrounded with a plain nimbus. On the back of the cross in the same place there is a square plate, with an engraved representation of Abraham offering up Isaac, the angel, and the ram. Round the latter is the beginning of a hexameter line—† Cui patriarcha suum—which is completed round the medallion of the Lamb in front, thus: † Pater offert in cruce natum. In like manner, four engravings on each side at the extremities of the cross refer to each other, and are described by corresponding halves of hexameters. The New Testament subjects are all in front, with the Lamb in the centre, as antitypes: the Old Testament or typical events or persons are at the back. Thus on the spectator's left at the back of the cross is an engraving of Moses receiving the Tables of the Law on Mount Sinai, with the words Qui Moysi legem. Corresponding to it on the right front is the Descent of the Holy Spirit, with dat alumnis Pneumatis ignem. The remainder is under—

But even the Vatican Cross yields in interest to two German relics of the same character, lately described and well illustrated in No. 45 of the Jährbücher des Vereins von Alterthumsfreunden in Rheintal, p. 195, Bonn, 1868. The first of these is the Station-Cross of Mainz. It is of gilded bronze, of the Western form (Commissa), and rather more than one foot in height. Herr Heinrich Otte refers it to the end of the 12th century, a date far beyond our period. But its interest is paramount, more particularly from the evident intention of the designer to make it embody a whole system of typical instruction, and to leave it behind him as a kind of sculptured document, or commentary, connecting the Old and New Testaments. Thus, at the middle or intersection of the arms of the cross, the Lamb is represented in a medallion, his head surrounded with a plain nimbus. On the back of the cross in the same place there is a square plate, with an engraved representation of Abraham offering up Isaac, the angel, and the ram. Round the latter is the beginning of a hexameter line—† Cui patriarcha suum—which is completed round the medallion of the Lamb in front, thus: † Pater offert in cruce natum. In like manner, four engravings on each side at the extremities of the cross refer to each other, and are described by corresponding halves of hexameters. The New Testament subjects are all in front, with the Lamb in the centre, as antitypes: the Old Testament or typical events or persons are at the back. Thus on the spectator's left at the back of the cross is an engraving of Moses receiving the Tables of the Law on Mount Sinai, with the words Qui Moysi legem. Corresponding to it on the right front is the Descent of the Holy Spirit, with dat alumnis Pneumatis ignem. The remainder is under—

	Head.
Back	Elijah carried up to heaven.	† Qui levat Eliam Front	The Ascension.	† proprium sublimatum usum (cōvaris).
Back (right hand of spectator)	Samson and gates of Gaza.	† Que portas Gaza Front (left ditto)	The descent into Hades.	† vis suferit claustra Jehenne.
	Foot.
Back	Jenah and the whale.	† Qua redit absumptus Front	Resurrection.	† surgit virtute sepulchri.

The decorative scrollwork is rather sparingly disposed with great judgment, and on the spike, frame, or metal strap probably intended for fixing the cross on a staff for processional or other purposes [see CROSS, DRACONARICUS] is an engraving of the probable designer and donor,

	Motto. † Qui levat Eliam † proprium sublimatum usum (cōvaris).
† Que portas Gaza † vis suferit claustra Jehenne.
† Qua redit absumptus † surgit virtute sepulchri.

THEODERIC ABBAS. The graphic power and exceeding quaintness of the Scriptural engravings is that of the finest miniatures of the 12th or 13th century.

The second of these most interesting works, inferior as a work of art from its barbaric wildness and the preference for ugliness so often observed in Northern-Gothic grotesque, is of even greater interest as a transitional cross, especially when viewed in relation to the changes enforced by the decree of the Council in Trullo, A. D. 681. This is the Station-Cross of Planig, near Kreuznach; of the same size and form as that of Mainz; but referred by Otte to the 10th century. The ancient symbol of the Lamb is preserved on the back of this crucifix, which displays the human form in front, as in many other Romanesque crosses of bronzed copper. On this combination—perhaps a compromise between the feeling of the older times and the more modern spirit of the Quinisextine Council—Otte quotes Durandus, Rationes, lib. 1. c. 3, n. 6: "Non enim agnus Dei in cruce principaliter depingi debet; sed homine depicto, non obest agnum in parte inferiori vel posteriori depingere." He also gives the express words of Adrian I., in his letter to Tarasius, Patriarch of Constantinople, in 785: "Verum igitur agnum Dominum nostrum J. C. secundum imaginem humanam a modo etiam in imaginibus pro veteri agno depingi jubemus." (De Consecr. Dist. iii. c. 29; see Labbe, vi. 1177.) He refers also to the splendid work on Rhenish antiquities called Kunstdenkmäler des christlichen Mittelalters, by Ernst aus'm Werth, Leipzig (Weigel), 1857, taf. xxiv.-vi., for the Essen and other roods, which much resemble those of Kreuznach and Mainz, combining the Lamb with the human form, and adding personifications of the sun and moon which remind us of the Diptych of Rambona, and the symbols of the four Evangelists, as in the Crucifix of Velletri. Space forbids us to give accounts of these most interesting relics, but the subject appears to be treated with exhaustive fulness and illustrated to perfection in the two German works referred to. The Planig-on-Nahe rood, however, is entitled to a briefly-detailed description. In front is the crucified form, severely archaic in treatment; the long hair is carefully parted and carried back; the head is without nimbus; and the limbs are long, stiff, and wasted, the ribs being displayed, as is so commonly done in mediæval crucifixes, to complete the illustration of the text, "They pierced my hands and my feet: I may tell all my bones." A triple serpentine stream of blood runs from each hand, and also from the feet, being there received in a cup, or chalice, the foot of which is a grotesque lion's head. The back of the cross bears on its centre the Lamb with cruciform nimbus; below it a medallion of the donor, "Richardus Custos;" and four other bas-reliefs, now wanting; occupied the four extremities of the arms, and almost certainly represented the four Evangelists. As in the Diptych of Rambona, the navel resembles an eye. Scarcely inferior to these is the 10th century miniature of a single crucifix with the title IHS NAZAREN REX IUDÆORUM, and the sun and moon above the cross-beam, within circles, and represented with expressions of horror,—seated in chariots, one drawn by horses, the other by oxen. And it is impossible to omit the Crucifixion picture from the Gospel of Bishop Egbert of Trier, 975-993 (in Mooyer's Onomasticon Chronographicon, Hierarchia Germanica, 8vo. Minden, 54), now in the Stadtbibliothek there. Here the Lord is clad in a long robe to the ankles; the robbers are also clad in tunics so close to the form as to give the appearance of shirts and trousers. Above are the sun and moon, hiding their faces. The cross has a second cross-piece at top, forming a tau above the Western cross. The robbers are on tau-crosses; suspended, but with unperforated hands; the passage in the 22nd Psalm being referred to the Redeemer alone. Their names, Desmas the penitent, and Cesmas the ebullite, are above their heads. The Virgin-Mother and another woman stand on the right of the cross, St. John on the left. The soldier "Stephaton" is presenting the sponge of vinegar: * two others are casting lots below. This detail reminds us of the great Florentine miniature of the mont Rabula, excepting that the game of Mora is there substituted for dice.

These works are somewhat beyond our period; yet as a paper on Crucifixes must contain some account of the things whose name it bears, and the first eight centuries supply us with so few examples of what are popularly called crucifixes, a short inroad into early mediævalism may be allowed. The Iconodulist transition formally made at the Council in Trullo is well suited to the Northern mind, and to the sacramental theory of pain; but it fell in also with that tendency to personification advancing on symbolism, which the Western races inherit, perhaps, from ancient Greece, and which Mr. Ruskin, in his late Oxford Lectures, points out as the idolatrous tendency of Greek art. With Cimabue and Giotto, and from their days, artistic skill and power over beauty are brought to bear on the crucifix, as on other Christian representations, for good and for evil. Of the cautious and gradual compromise of the Greek Church we have already spoken. [R. St. J. T.]

CRUET. [AMA: AMPULLA.]

CRYPTA. In the well-known passage of St. Jerome in which he describes the Sunday visits he and his schoolfellows at Rome paid to the graves of the apostles and martyrs, he uses the term cryptæ to designate what we now call the catacombs. "Dum essem Romæ puer . . . solebam . . . diebus Dominicis sepulchra apostolorum et martyrum circumire, crebroque cryptas ingredi quæ in terra profunda delossæ ex utraque parte ingredientium pro parietibus habent corpora sepulchrorum." Hieron. in Exch. c. xl. We find the word again used metaphorically in Jerome's preface to Daniel, "Cum et quasi per cryptam ambulus rarum desuper lumen aspiciam." The word is employed in the same specific sense by Prudentius, Peristeph. Hymn. ii. :—

"Hand procul extremo culta ad pomeria valls Mersa latebrosis crypta latet foveis.
Hujus in oculum gradibus vis prorens reflexis Irs per anfractus tuce lateente docet."

The classical use of crypta for an underground passage or chamber, whether the drain of a closet, or a subterranean arcade, or a storehouse for fruit or corn, or a tunnel, such as that of Panispera at Naples, shews the appropriateness of the term. (See for examples Faccioliati, Lexicon.) Crypta

* "Longinus" is always the lance-bearer. See Medil (Laurentian) Crucifix, supra.

the robbers are also the form as to give the d trowsers. Above are the robes. The piece at top, forming a cross. The robbers are red, but with unperforated the 22nd Psalm being on the cross. Their names, ad Cosmas the choriste, The Virgin-Mother and the right of the cross, the soldier "Stephaton" of vinegar; * two others This detail reminds us miniature of the monk the game of Mora is e.

what beyond our period; affixes must contain some whose name it bears, and a supply us with so few popularly called cruci- early mediævalism. Iconodulist transition council in Trullo was well mind, and to the scra- but it fell in also with nification advancing on Western races inherit, Greece, and which Mr. Ford Lectures, points out ney of Greek art. With from their days, artir beauty are brought to s on other Christian re- and for evil. Of the compromise of the Greek spoken. [R. St. J. T.]

MPULLA.]

well-known passage of he describes the Sunday fellows at Rome paid to and martyrs, he uses ignate what we now call essent Romæ puer . . . Dominicus sepulchra apo- circumire, crebroque terra profunda delossas redendum per pariete- um." Hieron. in Esch. word again used meta- preface to Daniel, "Cum ambulationis sarum desuper he word is employed in by Prudentius, Peristepa.

alta ad pomeria valla ta late foveis. ibus via prona flexis lateo docet." ypsa for an underground ther the drain of a cloac, a, or a storehouse for fruit such as that of Paulinus propriateness of the term. Holath, Lexicon.) Crypta the lance-bearer. See Medic

CTESIPHON ON THE TIGRIS

seems to have been sometimes used in Christian times as synonymous with coemeterium. Thus we have in the church of St. Prassede an inscription commemorating the translation thither from the catacombs of the relics of more than two thousand saluts, in which occur the words "in coemeterio seu cryptis." We may, however, mark this distinction between the two words that coemeterium is a word of wider signification, including open-air burial-grounds, while crypta is strictly limited to those excavated beneath the surface of the ground. Padre Marchi, after an elaborate investigation of the inscriptions in which the word crypta occurs, endeavours to demonstrate that it was employed to indicate a limited portion of a subterranean cemetery, including several burial chapels or cubicula, so that the relation of the coemeterium to the crypta, and again of the crypta to the coemeterium, was that of a part to the whole. (Monumenti primitivi, pp. 156 sq., 168 sq.) His chief authority for this conclusion is a passage of Anastasius, Vita S. Marcellini, § 30, which appears to draw this distinction between the cubiculum in which the body of Pope Marcellinus was buried, and the crypta of which it formed part. There are also inscriptions which support Marchi's view that a crypta was a smaller division of a coemeterium. One from that of Priscilla records that Gregory lies "in the eleventh crypt," "in undecima crypta Gregorius." Others speak of "new crypts" constructed in a cemetery; e.g. an inscription now in the Vatican "in cimiterium Babline in crypta nova;" one from St. Cyriaca given by Boldetti, "in crypta nova retro sanctus." But Mich. Stef. de Rossi has shown satisfactorily, Rom. Sott. i. 23 sq., that Marchi presses the supposed distinction too far, and that it is very far from holding good generally. The truth is that crypta was a word of general meaning, and embraced every kind of subterranean excavation, whether smaller or more extensive.

We sometimes meet with the expressions cryptae arenarum, or cryptae arenarie, in connection with the interment of Christian martyrs. Bede, Rom. Sott. pp. 192, 186, 481, 300, &c. These would seem to indicate the galleries of a desert pozzolana pit, as places of sepulture. But it has been shewn in the article CATACOMBS that, though the subterranean cemeteries very frequently had a close connection with these quarries, and were approached through their adits, the sand-pits themselves were seldom or never used for interment, for which indeed they were suit without very extensive alteration and adaptation. The passages referred to, which are chiefly found in the not very trustworthy "Acts of the Martyrs," have probably originated in a confusion between the catacombs themselves and the quarries with which they were often so closely connected.

[E. V.]

CTESIPHON ON THE TIGRIS (COUNCIL OR.) A.D. 420, under Taballaha, abp. of Seleucia, on the opposite bank of the river, where the Nicene faith was received, and with it the canons to which the consent of the rest of the church westwards had been given (Mansi iv. 441-2).

[E. S. F.]

CUBICULUM. In addition to the use of this word to designate the family grave chambers in the subterranean cemeteries at Rome (for which see CATACOMBS, p. 310), we find it employed to denote what we should now call the side chapels of the nave of a church. The first instance of its use in this sense is in the writings of Paulinus of Nola. Writing to his friend Severus, Ep. xxxi. § 12, he describes the church recently erected at Nola, and particularizes these side chapels, which were evidently novel features in church arrangement. There were four on each side of the nave, beyond the side aisles (porticus), with two verses inscribed over the entrance. Their object was to furnish places of retirement for those who desired to pray or meditate on the word of God, and for the sepulchral memorials of the departed. The passage is: "Cubicula intra porticus quaterna longis basilicæ lateribus inserta, secretis orantium, vel in lege Domini meditantium, præterea memoriis religiosorum ac familiarium accommodatos ad pacis æternæ requiem locos præbent, omne cubiculum binit per liminum frontes versibus prænotatur." They differed from the side chapels of later ages in containing no altars, as originally there was but one altar in a church. (Remondini, tom. i. p. 412.) Paulinus also speaks of these chapels under the name of cellæ or cellulae, e.g. when speaking of a thief who had concealed himself in one of them all night, he says:

CUBICULUM

519

"Cellula de multis, quæ per latera undique magola, Apposita tectis præbet æcura sepulchra Hospita."—Poema, xix. v. 476 sq.

Cubicula is also of frequent occurrence in the Liber Pontificalis of Anastasius Bibliothecarius, as synonymous with oratoria. In the description of various oratoria erected by Symmachus A.D. 498-514, we find, § 79, "quæ cubicula omnia a fundamento perfecta construxit." Of Sergius, A.D. 687-701, we read, § 163, that he repaired the decayed chapels around St. Peter's. "Hic tectum et cubicula quæ circumquaque ejusdem basilicæ quæ per longa temporum ejusdem ruderibus fuerant disrupta studiosius innovavit et reparavit." And it is recorded of Leo III. A.D. 795, that he also rebuilt the ruinous cubicula attached to the same basilica (§ 412). Perhaps the earliest existing example in Rome of such a chapel attached to the body of a church is that of St. Zeno in the church of St. Prassede, built by Pope Paschal I. about A.D. 817. In an early description of the basilica of San Lorenzo fuori le Mura, given by De Rossi, Bullett. di Arch. Crist. Giugno, 1864, p. 42, from a MS. in the Vienna Library, we find the word used in a similar sense: "Est parvum cubiculum in porticu ad occidentem ubi pausat Herennius martyr." Paulinus also describes cubicula or cellæ of this nature in the porticos of the atrium of the church of St. Felix. They were intended for private prayer. The altar of the basilica could be seen from them by means of windows. They were ornamented with scriptural paintings:

"Metanda bonis habitantibus diligens Quos huc ad sancti justum Felicis honorem, Duxerat orandi studium non cura libendi."

Poem. xxvi. v. 395 sq.

The last words quoted have reference to the custom, the abuse of which, degenerating into gross license, is severely inveighed against by Paulinus, of holding feasts in the cubicula. Cf. Paulin. Poema xxvi. De Felicis Natal. ix. v. 541.

The word οικιακος was used in Greek in the same sense. We have an example in a letter of Nitus to Olympiodorus the prefect, relating to the church he had built, ἐν τῷ κοινῷ οἴκῳ πολλοῖς καὶ διαφόροις οἰκιακοῖς διακλαμίνῳ ἀρχιεπίσκοποι, ἕκαστον πεπεγμένῳ τριῶν σταυρῶν.

From the use of cubiculum as a chapel, cubicularii came to be employed in the sense of chaplains. "Hic [Leo I.] constituit et addidit supra sepulchra apostolorum ex clero Romano custodes qui dicuntur cubicularii quos modo dicimus capellanos. Cubiculum enim idem erat apud antiquos quod hodie apud nos capella." Ciacconius, Vit. et Test. Pont. Roman. i. p. 307. [E. V.]

CUCUFAS, martyr at Barcelona, July 25 (Mart. Usuardi). [C.]

CUCULLA, cucullus, cucullio, is one of the few articles of the monastic dress specified by the founder of the Benedictines (Reg. c. 55); and has commonly been considered the badge of monks, e.g. in the old proverb, "cuculla non facit monachum." Benedict ordered the "cuculla," or hood, to be shaggy for winter, and for summer of lighter texture (cf. Conc. Reg. c. 52); and a "scapulare" to be worn instead of doors, as more suitable for field-work, being open at the sides. The "cuculla" protected the head and shoulders, and, as being worn by infants and peasants, was said to symbolise humility; or, by another account, it was to keep the eyes from glancing right or left (Cass. Inst. i. 5; Sozom. Hist. Ecc. lii. 13, 14). It was part of the dress of nuns, as well as of monks (Pallad. Hist. Laus. 41), and was worn by the monks of Tabenna at the mass (Pall. H. L. 38). If, as the words seem to say, it was their only clothing on that occasion, it must of course have been longer than a hood or cape. Indeed, "cuculla" is often taken as equivalent to "casula" (from "censu"), a covering of the whole person; in later writers it means, not the hood only ("cucullus"), but the monastic robe, hood and all ("vestis cucullata," Reg. Comm. S. Bened. c. 55, cf. Mab. Ann. v. 17). These same monks of Tabenna or Pachoniani, like the Carthusians, drew their hoods forwards at meal times, so as to hide their faces from one another (Pall. 48; Ruff. Vit. Mon. 3). The "cappa" (probably akin to our "cape"), in Italy seems to correspond with the Gallie "cuculla," and both were nearly identical, it is thought, with the "melotes" or sheepskin of the earliest ascetics (Cass. Instit. i. 8; Pall. Hist. Laus. 28); and so with the "pera" (or "penula," according to Al. Gazæus, ad loc. citat.), the "pellis caprina dependens ab humeris et lumbos" (Isidor. Orig. xix. 21, ap. Reg. Comm. S. Bened.). Of course it is difficult to identify precisely the technical names for dress in various countries, and in a remote period. [I. G. S.]

CUCUMELLUM. A vessel mentioned among those which Paul, bishop of Cirta, delivered up to Felix (Baronius, Annales, an. 303, c. 12). This cucumellum was of silver, and was probably a cruet or flagon for use on the altar. Compare AMA. (Ducange's Glossary, s. v.) [C.]

CULDEES. [COLDEI.]

CUNIBERT, bishop, deposition at Cologne (about A.D. 683), Nov. 12 (Mart. Usuardi). [C.]

CUP. [CHALICE: COMMUNION: GLASS: CHRISTIAN.]

CUPELLA, a small loculus or sepulchral recess. At present we have only one instance of its use to aduce, which is given by Marcell (Monumenti Frim. p. 114). The inscription in which it is found records the burial of her two children, Secunda and Laurentius, by their mother Secunda. The solecism in grammar and orthography with which it is full show that Secunda was a person of humble rank. The stone is preserved in the Museum Kircherianum. The inscription is as follows:—"Ego Secunda feci cupella bone | memorie filium meum Secun | dium que recessit in fidem | cum fratre suo Laurenti | tium in pace recesserunt." Cupella is evidently the diminutive of cupa, explained by Du Cange to mean urna, urna sepulchralis. This sense is a derivative one from its classical meaning of a large cist, butt, or vat (Cies. Bell. Civ. c. 11; Lucan. lib. iv. v. 420; Varro apud Non. c. li. No. 113). It appears in pagan inscriptions but rarely; e.g., "D. Apuleius Ionicus fecit Eutychæ sorori suæ et Eutycheti filio ejus. In hac cupa mater et filius positi sunt" (Güter, Insar. p. 845, No. 1 D); "D. M. Olib Publicius Polythimus Tutor Titl Flavi Algotrangelli pupilli sui Matri | Serctæ Fortunatæ defun | ctæ nec locum emit, inssamam | calcavit cupam ædificavit de bonis ejus omnibus consumat." (Dion. class. 11, No. 6). The use of the word survived till later times, and Du Cange quotes from a monkish writer "in alla cupa juxta orientem sepulchrum SS. Victoris, &c." The idea has been propounded by the Rev. J. W. Burgon (Letters from Rome, p. 206), that we may find in cupella, as a place of Christian burial, the etymology of the word capella, chapel, which has so long perplexed philologists, and of which no satisfactory derivation has ever yet been discovered. The architectural term cupola is another form of the same root. [E. V.]

CURCODEMUS, deacon, martyr at Auterre, May 4 (Mart. Usuardi). [C.]

CURIA ROMANA. [APPEAL: COUNCIL.]

CURSE. [ANATHEMA: EXCOMMUNICATION.]

CURSUALES EQUI, post-horses, i.e. horses belonging to the cursus publicus, called also for shortness cursus, Gr. ἵππος. The Roman posting or postal system—the distinction between the two belongs to a late stage of civilization—was established by Augustus. According to the "Secret History" of Procopius (c. 30), the day's journey consisted of eight posts, sometimes fewer, but never less than five. Each stable had 40 horses, and as many stablemen or stabularii (who seem elsewhere to be called hippocomi, Code, bk. xii. T. li. l. 13). Bingham gives a quite incorrect idea of the system in describing the curiales equi as being simply impressed for the army and exchequer. A constitution of the Emperor Constantine, A.D. 326, expressly enacts that no one but the Prefect has the right to go by any other road than that which has a "cursus," showing that so mere occasional impressment is meant (sed nec per aliam viam eundi quisquam habet facultatem, nisi per quam cursus publicus stare dignoscitur; Code, bk. xii. T. li. l. 2). But Bingham, with his almost habitual inaccuracy, seems to have confunde right to offic attence

ll. 11, a right lent for ambros both the
by the (the d the ins law of seen th carriage law of the rect or prov animals (S. l. 1) employ exagger (Code, v narius, A of comp convene tina). T (l. 10) t entitled four time gold for
of the he found viii. T. v. remains anticipati Preventi that "For very thick at the ver animals to pact that either a ro ified to the limbs tittle), w cannot com loss of ran Constitutio simply th non defutur
It seems except from horses of th tion from so the "manu or obligatio
T. iii. l. 2, Gratian, Val
Nov. 131, c.
identify the p'uicis with lably arisen bility to the above intim occasional imp of the duties to be borne publice utiti subenda sun sine) it does one from whi

locus or sepulchral only one instance of which is given by Murell (114). The inscription in the burial of her two and Laurentius, by their e-necleasus in grammar which it is full show that of humble rank. The Museum Kircherianum, follows:—"Ego Secunda morie filiam meam Secun-dem | cum fratrem suum recesserunt." Capella is ive of cupa, explained by a, capa sepulchralis. This from its classical meaning, or vat (Caes. Bell. Civ.
420; Varro apud Non. ars in pugna inscriptiones Eupyleus Ionicus fecit Eupylethi filio eius. In us possit sunt" (Grüter, 420; "D. M. Olini Publicus iti Flavi A]gathangelli exactae Fortunatas defunam | clementi cupam adoni-mibus consumat." (Doni-use of the word survived in Cange quotes from a ili cuba juxta orientem is, &c." The idea has the Rev. J. W. Burgon 206), that we may find of Christian burial, the capella, chapel, which has logists, and of which no has ever yet been dis-tinal term cupella is another [E. V.]

anon, martyr at Auxerre, [C.]

[APPEAL: COUNCIL]
IA: EXCOMMUNICATION.]

II, post-horses, i.e. horses a publicus, called also for ages. The Roman posting distinction between the tage of civilization—was us. According to the Procopius (c. 30), the of eight posts, some-less than five. Each and as many stablemen or sewhere to be called hip-T. II. l. 13). Bingham of the idea of the system in equi as being simply im-exchequer. A constitu-stantine, A.D. 326, et-one but the Prefect has y other road than that y shewing that as mere is meant (sed nec per quum habet facultatem, publicis stare dignoscitur; 2). But Bingham, with accuracy, seems to have confounded the cursum publicum with the evectio or right of gratuitously using it, which was confined to officials, to envoys, and under certain circumstances to senators (Code, usq., l. 6, and see also ll. 11, 10), and which did in such case resemble a right of impressment, though the true equivalent for impressment seems to be found in the agrorum or procuratorum. The cost of providing both the horses and fodder for them was supplied by the State, i.e. as it appears, by the provinces (the duty being deemed one which belonged to the land and not to the person, Code, bk. x. l. 4, law of Valerian and Gallienus), but it would seem that they were not bound to maintain post-carriages (Arcuvereda) or horses for them, since a law of Arcadius and Honorius, A.D. 403, enjoins the rectors of the provinces to see that the curials or provincials were not compelled to provide animals which they did not owe to the post (l. 19). Through the rogery of the officers employed the cost of fodder was, it seems, often exaggerated, whilst the animals were starved.

(Code, usq., l. 18; constitution of Arcadius and Honorius, A.D. 400, and see also ll. 2, 7, 19.) By way of compensation, the stable manure was left to the provinces (l. 7, of Valentinian, Valens, and Gratian).
The sale of the public horses was forbidden (l. 10); those who used more horses than they were entitled to had to pay, according to circumstances, four times the price of the horses, or a pound of gold for each (ll. 15, 20). A curious constitution of the Emperor Constantine, A.D. 316, which is to be found at length in the Theodosian Code, bk. viii. T. v. l. 68, but of which only a brief extract remains in that of Justinian (bk. xii. T. li. l. 1)— anticipating the labours of "the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty towards Animals"—enacts that "Ferasuch as many with knotted and very thick sticks (nodosis et validissimis fustibus) at the very outset of a stage compel the public animals to exhaust whatever strength they have, placed that none in driving should use a stick but either a rod or a whip, with a short goad (aculeus) fastened to the point, which may admonish their limbs with a harmless tickle (innocuo tunculo), without exacting what their strength cannot compass"—the punishment varying from loss of rank to exile according to the original Constitution; but the extract in Justinian's Code simply threatens punishment generally (poena non defutura).

It seems to be considered that the clergy were exempt from the obligation to pay tax for the horses of the cursum, under their general exemption from sordida munera, extraordinary charges, the "parangarian prestation," or the translatio, or obligation to carry goods (see Code, bk. iv.
T. iii. l. 2, of Constantine, A.D. 357; T. ii. l. 5, of Gratian, Valentinian, and Theodosius, A.D. 412; Nov. 131, c. 5). It seems, however, difficult to identify the ordinary contribution for the cursum publicum with one of these. The opinion has probably arisen from confounding it with the liability to the "parangarian prestation," which, as above intimated, seems rather to relate to occasional impressment. Certain it is that as one of the duties belonging to the land, which were to be borne by all (munera, quae patrimonium publicum utilitatis gratia indicantur, ab omnibus subeunda sunt, Code, bk. x. t. xii. l. 1, of Antonine) it does not seem by its nature to have been one from which the clergy would be exempt, and we have proof from the story of St. Augustine having declined to accept for the Church an estate charged with the patrimonial munera termed the "navicularian," i.e. that relating to the transport of corn from Africa, lest the Church should have to undertake such a duty, that no ecclesiastical immunity obtained in a precisely similar case (the Digest classes together as patrimonial munera those "rel vehicularis, item navicularis;" bk. l. T. iv. l. 1).

[J. M. L.]

CURSOR. (1) In the days when it was dangerous for Christians to make known publicly the time and places of their assemblies, the faithful were frequently summoned by a messenger going from house to house, who was called cursor or prætor. To this custom Tertullian seems to allude when (De Egra in Persecutione, c. 14) he says, speaking of the difficulty of holding assemblies, "Non potes discurrere per singulos?" An epitaph published by Brower, USACIUS CUN-SON DOMINICUS (Annal. Trevrens. l. 53), is generally referred to an official of this kind; but this Ursacius may have been an ordinary letter-carrier of the church. (See Ducauge, s. v. Cursor.) As-semblies seem to have been, at least in some instances, announced in this way in the 4th century; for Jerome, writing to Eustochium (Epist. 22), speaks of a prætor giving notice of the Agape; and Eusebius of Alexandria (quoted by Binterlin, Denkwür. iv. l. 281) speaks of the unreadiness of many to go to church when the herald called.

(2) An official to whom was specially committed the task of circulating letters of popes or other bishops; see Baronius, Annales, an.
58, § 102. "Romne adhuc durant Pape curso-res, qui deferunt ejus ordines ac pontificias bullas publicant." (Macri Hierolexicon, s. v.
Cursor.)
[C.]

CURSUS. The divine office, or series of prayers, psalms, hymns, and versicles said daily by the clergy in churches. For instance, the seventh canon of the council of Chelsea [Catech.] is, "Ut omnes ecclesie publice canonis horis cursum suum cum reverentia habeant" (Haddan and Stubbs, Councils, iii. 451). See HOURS OR PRAYER; OFFICE, THE DIVINE.
[C.]

CURTAIN (curtina, antiveum, velum, Βῆλαρ, παράπετασμα, καταπέτασμα, ἀμφύθυρον). Curtains were used in ancient churches for the following purposes. 1. To hang over the outer doorway of the church. 2. To close the doorway between the nave of the church and the sanctuary, or perhaps rather to fill the open panels or CANCELLED of the door, during the time of the consecration of the Eucharist. 3. To fill the space between the pillars of the ciborium, or canopy of the altar. 4. Curtains were also used in baptisteries.

1. The Paschal Chronicle (p. 294) mentions curtains embroidered with gold, for the doors, in enumerating the gifts of Constantine to the church at Constantinople. St. Jerome (Epist.
Nepot. Epist. ad Heliod.) praises the priest Nepotitanus for the care with which he provided curtains for the doors of his church: "Erat sol-licitus. . . si vela semper in ostiis." We find again indications of this custom in Epiphanius; and Paulinus of Nola tells us (Poem. xviii 30) that those surpassed him in magnificence who offered rich curtains (vela foribus) for the doors, brilliant in the purity of linen, or ornamented with coloured patters woven into their substance. He is yet more precise in speaking of his own church of St. Felix at Nola (Poem. xiv. 98), where he says, "the golden doorways are ornamented with curtains white as snow." Such curtains were suspended by iron or bronze rings, the remains of which are still to be discovered in some ancient Roman basilicas, for example in those of St. Cleoment, St. Mary in Cosmedin, St. Laurence, St. George in Velabro, &c. The office of raising those curtains before the priests and other dignified persons was assigned to the inferior clerks (Council. Narbon. can. xiii. A.D. 589); the subdeacon as well as the ostiarius is to raise the door-curtains (vela ad ostia) before the elders (senioribus). They were sometimes adorned with figures of saints or with crosses, or flowers, arranged in patterns, and with various purple ornaments.

2. It is probable that from the time of Constantine curtains were used to enclose the sanctuary, or to fill the apertures in the rails or grating [CANCELLI] which surrounded it. Athanasius (Epist. ad Solit., opp. i. 847, ed. Paris, 1627), speaking of an outrage committed by the Arians, says that they carried out and burned the benches, the throne, the table, and the curtains (τὰ βῆλα) of the church, where the context certainly suggests that these were the curtains of the sanctuary. Theodoret (Hist. Eccl.) tells us that St. Basil invited the Emperor Valens to enter into the enclosure of the sacred curtains where he was himself seated; that is, into the sanctuary of his church, which was enclosed by these curtains. And St. Chrysostom, in a passage containing much information as to the manner of celebrating the eucharist in his time, says, "when the sacrifice is borne forth . . . drawn back, then think that the sky above us opens, and angels descend" (In Ephes. Rom. 3, § 3, p. 23). Here the curtains are clearly those which closed the doorway of the sanctuary, which were drawn back after consecration, when the people communicated. Evagrius (Hist. Eccl. vi. 21) says that Chosroes, after his victory over Bahram (A.D. 590) sent to Gregory bishop of Antioch, among other presents, "ἀμφιβύου οὐνυκιδὸν κεκοσμημένον χρυσῷ;" that is, according to the most probable interpretation, a curtain of rich Hunnish work for the door of the sanctuary. See Ducange (s. v. Hunniscus), who cites the word Hunniscus from a letter of Charles the Great to Offa king of Merca (Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 498), and believes it to be equivalent to the "Sarmaticum" of Gregory of Tours (De Vit. Patr. c. 8). Cyril of Alexandria (Citōna in Joann. on c. ii. v. 24) bids the guardians of the divine mysteries not to admit the uninitiated within the sacred curtains (τῶν ἱερῶν καταρταμῶν), nor to permit neophytes to draw near the Hol. Table. In this case the curtain or "veil" of the sanctuary is clearly intended; the term itself is adopted from the Jewish Temple. Germanus of Constantinople (Hist. Eccl. p. 153, ed. Paris, 1560) says that the curtain symbolized the stone which was rolled to the door of the sepulchre.

3. Curtains were also fixed to the ciborium in such a manner as to surround the Altar [ALTAR, p. 65] upon certain occasions. The Et avēta, or sets of four curtains, which are frequently mentioned in the Liber Pontificalis among the gifts of the popes to certain Roman churches were no doubt intended for this use. See, for instance, the life of Sergius I. (p. 150 B, ed. Muratori), who is said to have given to surround the altar of a church eight tetraveia, four white, four scarlet. Similar presents are attributed by the same authority to Leo III. Some have thought that the RUGAE presented by various popes to Roman churches were curtains, but this does not seem probable.

4. They were also used in baptisteries, as may be seen in a very ancient mosaic at Ravenna (Ciampini, Vet. Mon. II. plate xxiii.); and see BAPTISM, p. 181.

(Ducange's Glossaries and Descriptio S. Sophiae; Saicer's Thesaurus; Martigny's Dict. des Antiq. Chret.) [C.]

CUSTODES ECCLESIAE. Either door-keepers, otherwise called Ostiarii, one of the inferior orders in the ancient Church, or, more probably perhaps, the same officers who are sometimes distinguished as Seniores Ecclesiae, and whose duties corresponded in certain points with those of the modern churchwardens. [See CHURCHWARDEN.] Bingham, iii. l3, 2. [D. B.]

CUSTODES LOCORUM SANCTORUM. The keepers of the holy places of Palestine, so called because of their relation to our Lord's earthly history: e.g. Bethlehem, Mount Golgotha, the Holy Sepulchre, Mount Olivet. Such an office was probably occasioned by the custom which arose among Christians in early times of visiting these places for purposes of piety and devotion; and that the function of these custodes was accounted a religious service appears from their having been exempted, by a statute of Theodosius, in the same manner as ecclesiastics generally, from personal tribute, in regard to this their special employment (Bingham, iii. l3, 2). [D. B.]

CUSTOS ARCAE. A name given to the archdeacon, as having charge of the treasury of the Church, and the care of dispensing the oblations of the people. In this capacity Caecilian was accused by the Donatists of having prohibited the deacons from carrying any provision to the martyrs in prison. And the 4th Council of Carthage (c. 17) direct's the bishop not to concern himself personally in the care and government of widows, orphans, and strangers, but to commit the duty to his archpresbyter or archdeacon (Bingham, ii. c. 21). [D. B.]

CUTHBERT, presbyter, abbat of Lindisfarne, March 20 (Mart. Bedae, Adonis, Usuardi); translation to Durham, Sept. 4 (some MSS. of Mart. Usuardi). [C.]

CYCLUS ANNI. [CALENDAR.]

CYCLUS PASCHALIS. [EASTER.]

CYMBAL. The word cymbalum seems occasionally to be used for a bell, or some sacrosanct instrument used instead of a bell. Thus Gregory the Great (Dialo. i. 9) speaks of a cymbalum being struck by way of passing-bell; and Durandus (Rational. i. 4, § 2) of monks being called to the refectory by the sound of a cymbalum which hung in the cloister. [C.]

CYPRIANUS. (1) The famous bishop of Carthage, martyr under Valerian, A.D. 258 Sept.

Bedae
(2) (Mar)
(3) (Mar)
(4) (Mar) CY
shews sius, adria Origē CYR
morat
CYR (Mart.
(2)
March
agnit Usuard
translat ca Usu Someti
(3) M Bedae.)
(4) T (Cal. By
CYR
Jan. 3 (C
(2) M
Rom. Ve
CYRIL memorat
June 8 (C (Cal. By
(2) Bis zand., El
(3) Ma
(4) Bis
(Mart. Hi
(6) Ma
Rom. Yct.
CYRIL
Clandius, Usuardi).
CYRIN
Rome mile (Mart. Rom
(2) Mar
(Mart. Usu
(3) Mart
(Mart. Bedae CYRION
CYRINU
Hieron., Us
CYRUS, and unmerc (Cal. Byzant CYZICU to Mansi (ii Arians ment
Patrophilus, (Ep. ceciv.
here, I know I hear, that Nonnosius,

ontificatus among the gifts in Roman churches were not his use. See, for instance, p. 150 B, ed. Muratori, who to surround the altar of a, four white, four scarlet, distributed by the same name have thought that the various popes to Roman as, but this does not seem used in baptisteries, as may ancient mosaic at Ravenna II. plate xxiii.; and see ies and Descriptio S. Socrus; Martigny's Dict. des [C.]

CLESIAE. Either described Ostivii, one of the in-ancient Church, or more the same officers who are ned as Seniores Ecclesie, responded in certain points-tern churchwarden. [Set ngham, iii. 13, 2. [D. B.]

FORUM SANCTORUM. Holy places of Palestine, se air relation to our Lord's Bethlehem, Mount Gol- chre, Mount Olivet. Such y occasioned by the custom Christians in early times of for purposes of piety and e function of these custodes ous service appears from mpted, by a statute of e manner as ecclesiastics onal tribute, in regard to mployment (Bingham, iii. [D. B.]

E. A name given to the e charge of the treasury care of dispensing the obla- In this capacity Caecilian Danatists of having prohib- n carrying any provision sion. And the 4th Council reets the bishop not to con- ly in the care and govern- ans, and strangers, but to is archpresbyter or arch- e. 21. [D. B.]

esbyter, abbat of Lindis- z Bedae, Adonis, Usuardi; n, Sept. 4 (some MSS. of [C.]

[CALENDAR.]

IALIS. [EASTER.]

word cymbalum seems occa- or a bell, or some sonora- ad of a bell. Thus Gregory l. 9) speaks of a cymbalum of passing-bell; and Duran- § 2) of monks being called the sound of a cymbalum sister. [C.]

(1) The famous bishop of under Valerian, A.D. 258

CYPRUS

Sept. 14 (Cal. Cuth., Mart. Rom. Vet., Hieron., Bedae, Usuardi); Oct. 2 (Cal. Byzant.).

(2) Bishop, martyr with Justina, Sept. 26 (Mart. Rom. Vet., Bedae, Usuardi).

(3) Martyr in Africa under Hunneric, Oct. 12 (Mart. Rom. Vet., Usuardi).

(4) Abbat of Perigord, commemorated Dec. 9 (Mart. Adonis, Usuardi). [C.]

CYPRUS (Council of), A.D. 401, as Pagi shews (ad Baron. ib. n. 20) under St. Epiphanius, at the instigation of Theophilus of Alexandria, prohibiting the reading of the works of Origen. [E. S. F.]

CYRIACA, martyr, A.D. 282, is commemorated July 7 (Cal. Byzant.). [C.]

CYRIACUS. (1) Martyr in Achaia, Jan. 12 (Mart. Bedae).

(2) Deacon, martyr at Rome under Maximin, March 16 (Mart. Rom. Vet., Bedae, Usuardi); again on Aug. 8 (Mart. Rom. Vet., Bedae, Usuardi), supposed by some to be the day of his translation by Pope Marcellus (see Sallier's note on Usuard, Aug. 8); July 15 (Cal. Byzant.). Sometimes written Cyricus or Cerycus.

(3) Martyr at Tomi, June 20 (Mart. Hieron., Bedae).

(4) The Anchoress (A.D. 448-557), Sept. 29 (Cal. Byzant.). [C.]

CYRICUS. (1) Martyr in the Hellespont, Jan. 3 (Mart. Hieron., Usuardi).

(2) Martyr at Antioch, June 16 (Mart. Hieron., Rom. Vet., Usuardi). [C.]

CYRIL. (1) Bishop of Alexandria, is commemorated Jan. 28 (Mart. Adonis, Usuardi); June 9 (Cal. Byzant.); with Athanasius, Jan. 18 (Cal. Byzant.).

(2) Bishop of Jerusalem, March 18 (Cal. Byzant., Ethiop.).

(3) Martyr in Syria, March 20 (Mart. Usuardi).

(4) Bishop and martyr in Egypt (?), July 9 (Mart. Hieron., Rom. Vet., Usuardi).

(5) Martyr at Philadelphia, Aug. 1 (Mart. Rom. Vet., Usuardi). [C.]

CYRILLA, daughter of Decius, martyr under Claudius, Oct. 28 (Mart. Rom. Vet., Bedae, Usuardi). [C.]

CYRINUS, or QUIRINUS. (1) Martyr at Rome under Claudius, is commemorated March 25 (Mart. Rom. Vet., Bedae, Usuardi).

(2) Martyr at Rome under Diocletian, April 26 (Mart. Usuardi).

(3) Martyr at Milan under Nero, June 12 (Mart. Bedae, Usuardi). [C.]

CYRINUS. [CYRICUS.]

CYRION, presbyter, martyr, Feb. 14 (Mart. Hieron., Usuardi). [C.]

CYRUS, martyr, A.D. 292, wonder-worker and unmercenary, is commemorated Jan. 31 (Cal. Byzant.); translation, June 28 (ib.). [C.]

CYZICUS (COUNCIL OF), A.D. 376, according to Mansi (iii. 469), being the meeting of semi-Arians mentioned by St. Basil in his letter to Patrophilus, and spoken of as a recent occurrence (Ep. cccxv. al. lxxxi.). "What else they did there, I know not," says he; "but thus much I hear, that having been reticent of the term Homoousion, they now give utterance to the term

DALMATIC

Homoousion, and join Ennomius in publishing blasphemies against the Holy Ghost." [E. S. F.]

CYZICUS, THE MARTYRS OF, are commemorated April 29 [al. 28] (Cal. Byzant.). [C.]

D

DADAS, martyr with Maximus and Quintilianus; commemorated April 28 (Cal. Byzant.). [W. F. G.]

DAEMON. [DEMON.]

DAFROSA, wife of Fabian the martyr, martyr at Rome under Julian; commemorated, Jan. 4 (Mart. Rom. Vet., Adonis, Usuardi). [W. F. G.]

DALMATIC. (Δαλματική [ΔΑ.]; Dalmatica, sc. tunica or vestis; the substantive, as in the similar case of alva, is seldom expressed.)

The dalmatic, which derived its name from the province where it was first manufactured, was a species of long-sleeved white tunic, with a longitudinal stripe (clavus) from either side of the neck downwards. ("Dalmatica vestis primum in Dalmatia provincia Graeciae texta est, tunica sacerdotialis candida cum clavus ex purpura," Isidore, Etymol. xix. 22.)

There are fair grounds, however, for believing that in its original form the dalmatic, as worn by men, was a short-sleeved or sleeveless tunic, equivalent to the colobion (χιτών ἀχειριστός, Sozomen, iii. 14).^a This is shown by the way in which the two words are used synonymously, as in Epiphanius (Hier. xv. vol. i. p. 32, ed. Petaviius), Δαλματικάς, εἶπων κολοβίνας, ἐκ πλατισμῶν διὰ πορφύρας ἀλουργαῖνας κατεσκευασμένας. (So too Joannes Damascenus, in Cotelier, Écl. Græc. Mon. Ined. i. 284.) Again, in a most important early document, to which we shall subsequently refer, the edict of Diocletian fixing the maximum price of articles throughout the Roman empire, the two words are used as equivalents (Waddington, L'édit de Diocletien, p. 38). Nor need any difficulty be felt from the occurrence of passages which speak of the substitution of the dalmatic for the colobion. If the above theory be correct, such passages will merely refer to the adding of long sleeves to the previously sleeveless tunic; and the change having been once made, it would be natural to employ the word colobion to denote that form of the garment implied by the name, and to retain the neutral word dalmatic to indicate the modified form; and indeed a passage from the Life of Silvester I. to which it will be necessary to allude subsequently, seems to support the above view. . . . ἀλλ' ἐπειδὴ τῶν βραχίλων γυνὸν ἐπέγετο, Δαλματικά μανίκεια μάλλον συνέβη δομασθῆναι εἶπερ (leg. ἤπερ) κολίβια (Vit. Silvestri, p. 266, ed. Combefis). It is of course also just possible that this term may have been susceptible of slightly different meanings in different countries.

We first meet with the dalmatic as a secular dress, of a stately or luxurious character, worn by persons in high position. Thus there would necessarily be something exceptional in the use of it, and then like other articles of Roman secular dress it became adopted by the Church as a dress for ecclesiastics. We shall cite first sundry allusions to the dalmatic in the Historiæ Augustæ Scriptores. Lampridius charges Commodus [ob. 192 A.D.] with unseemly behaviour in that he appeared in the streets in a dalmatic (Vita Comm. c. 8; see also Capitolinus, Vita Pertin. c. 8). Heliogabalus [ob. 222 A.D.] also was found of appearing abroad thus clad (Lampridius, Vita Heliogab. c. 26). See also Trebellius Pollio, Vita Claudi, c. 17.

^a Such was also the Leviti [al. Lebliti] or Levitarium (words having no connection with Levite) of the Egyptian monks. (See Buntorlo, iv. l. 214.)

The edict of Diocletian already cited furnishes us with much interesting information as to the different varieties of this garment in use in the Roman empire at the end of the 3rd century A.D. It was made of various materials, wool, silk, linen (Adamas, Ægyptiacus, ððvñ); sometimes the ornamental clivus was present (Δ. ἔχουσα πορφύρας), sometimes absent (ἔσημος). Dalmatics both for men's and women's use are mentioned; those for the former, as we have already stated, bearing the title Δαλματικῶν ἀνδρῶν ἡραι κλασθίων. Three different qualities are given for each sex, the price varying both according to the quality and the place of manufacture, of which Scythopolis, Tarsus, Byblos, Laodicea, &c. are mentioned.

It may be not uninteresting to add that the price of these various sorts varied from 10,000 to 1500 denarii; the denarius, it should be remembered, being of the debased currency of the earlier part of Diocletian's reign, and in value about $\frac{1}{14}$ (op. cit. pp. 30, 37, &c.).

Three centuries later we find the dalmatic worn as part of a senator's dress in the case of Gordianus the father of Gregory the Great, who was of that order (Joannis Diaconi Vita S. Gregorii, iv. 83); and the father and the son are both spoken of as wearing the planeta and dalmatic (cf. c. 84, Patrol. lxxv. 229).

In later times the dalmatic has been a dress worn by sovereigns at their coronation and on other great occasions. [See CORONATION.]

The ideas, then, of dignity and stateliness were associated with the dalmatic as a secular dress. The earliest notice of its ecclesiastical use is, if the document be genuine, in the Acta Martyrii of St. Cyprian, of whom it is said (c. 5) that when led out to martyrdom "se lacerna byrro expoliavit. . . , et cum se dalmatica expoliasset et diaconibus tradidisset in linea stetit." Here then, where the dress is evidently that ordinarily used by the bishop (if indeed a distinction between the everyday dress of the Christian ministry and that used by them in divine service had yet arisen), we find first the under linen garment (linen), over this the dalmatic, and finally the BYRRO or cloak.

It is not quite clear in what the impropriety consisted. If we are right in supposing that the dalmatic of this time had short sleeves, there would be an obvious unseemliness in a person of rank being seen abroad without an upper garment. Others who hold that even then the dalmatic was a long-sleeved dress, refer the cause of the censure to the implied effeminacy of the wearer (cf. Aulus Gellius, vii. 12. "Tunicis uti virum prolixis ultra brachia, et usque in primores manus, ac prope in digitos Romæ utque omni in Latio indecorum fuit"); and others to the foreign nature of the garb.

About fifty years later we come to something more definite in the already cited order of Pope Silvester I. [ob. 335 A.D.] that deacons should for the future wear dalmatics instead of colobis. It is a matter of small moment whether this means the substitution of one vestment for another, or, as we have tried to show, a modification in the shape of the existing vestment; in either case the result is the same, the introduction of a long-sleeved in place of a short-sleeved tunic.* Walafrid Strabo [ob. 849 A.D.] tells us that "Silvester appointed that deacons should use dalmatics in the church, and that their left hand should be covered with a cloth of linen warp (pallium linostimum). Now at first, priests (sacerdotes, that is doubtless bishops and priests both) wore dalmatics before chasubles were introduced, but afterwards when they began to use chasubles, they permitted dalmatics to deacons. That even pontiffs, however, ought to use them is obvious from the fact that Gregory or other heads of the Roman see allowed the use of them to some bishops and forbade it to others. Hence it follows that at that time the permission was not given to all to do what now almost all bishops and some priests think they may do; namely, wear a dalmatic under the chasuble." (De Rebus Ecclesiasticis, c. 24; cf. Rabanus Maurus, De Clericorum Institutione, i. 7, 20; Amalarius, De Eccl. Off. ii. 21; Pseudo Alcuin, De Div. Off. c. 39; Anastasius, Vitæ Pentecosticum, Silvester I. p. 35.)

It will be seen here that the ordinance has special reference to deacons, whether from the higher orders of the ministry already wearing the long-sleeved tunic, or, as Marriott (Vestiarium Christianum, p. lviii.) suggests, with the view of compensating for the absence of a supervestment among deacons.

Noticeable in the next place is the reference to permission granted or withheld by the bishop of Rome as to the wearing of the dalmatic by other bishops, so that as late as the middle of the 9th century this dress was in some special way associated with the local Roman Church, and considered the peculiar privilege of ecclesiastics of that Church, others being only allowed to use it by special permission. Of this state of things, doubtless originally due to the use of the vestment at Rome by persons of high secular position, numerous illustrations can be given. Thus in the life of Caesarius, bishop of Arles [ob. 542 A.D.], it is mentioned that on his visit to Rome, the then Pope Symmachus granted him as a special distinction the privilege of wearing the pallium [PALLIUM], and to his deacons that of dalmatics after the Roman fashion (Vit. Cæs. Arl. c. 4, Patrol. lxxvii. 1016).

Another instance occurs in a letter of Gregory the Great to Aregius, bishop of Vapincun (the modern Gap), in which he accords to him and his archdeacon the sought-for privilege of wearing dalmatics (Epist. ix. 107). An allusion to the same thing occurs in a letter of Pope Zacharias [ob. 752 A.D.] to Austrobert, archbishop of Vienna (Patrol. lxxxix. 956). The genuineness, however, of this letter is doubtful. One or two

* Reference may perhaps be made to Ananias Macellonian (xiv. 9), who, writing in the latter part of the 4th century, still speaks of the short-sleeved tunic in connection with deacons, showing that as yet the change had not become wide-spread.

Rome in the C

dancing with their feet, loud clamouring in their voices; imitating and provoking youthful lusts by their theatrical motions, their wanton eyes and unseemly antics." And again, commenting on the words, "We have piped unto you and ye have not danced" (Matt. xi. 17), he cautions his readers that they must not suppose that the "dance" of Christians implies any immodest movement of the body; rather, it is like the solemn movement of David before the ark (De Pœnit. ii. 6).

St. Augustine declares (contra Parmenianum, lli. c. ult.) thativolous and lascivious dancing was put down by the bishops of the church; and the author of Sermo 215 De Tempore (in Augustine's Works) speaks sorrowfully of the revels (balletades) and dances before the very doors of the churches, which were relics of paganism. To the same practice the 60th canon of the C. cœc. Eovi. Afric. refers, which prohibits the lascivious dances which took place in the streets on festival days, to the great scandal of religion, and annoyance of those who wished to worship.

St. Chrysostom also repeatedly and vehemently protests against it. He declares it to be one of the pomps of Satan renounced in baptism; he says, "the devil is present at dances, being called thither by the songs of harlots, and obscene words and diabolical pomps used on such occasions." And in another passage, speaking of the dancing of Herodias' daughter, he says, "Christians do not now deliver up half a kingdom nor another man's head but their own souls to inevitable destruction" (Hom. 47 in Julian. Mart. p. 613, Hom. 23 de Novitua. p. 264, ed. Paris, 1616).

The council of Laodicea, A.D. 366, forbids wanton dancing (βαλλίσειν ἢ ὀρχεῖσθαι) at marriage feasts (can. 53).

The third council of Toledo (A.D. 58) prohibits dances with lascivious songs on solemn festivals, the use of which they complain of as an irreligious custom prevailing in Spain among the common people, and order to be corrected both by the ecclesiastical and secular judges (can. 23). The Decree of Recaredo (Brun's Cœnes, l. 394) confirming these canons, speaks of these same dances as "ballematio" or "ballemachie"; words which recall the "βαλλίσειν" of the Laodicean canon, and the "balletades" of the Pseudo-Augustine, and are perhaps akin to the modern Ball and Ballet.

The council of Agde (A.D. 506) forbids the clergy to be present at marriages where obscene love songs were sung, and obscene motions of the body used in dancing (Conc. Agathen. can. 39). [C.]

DANIEL. (1) The prophet; commemorated Magabit 23 = March 19 (Cal. Ethiop.); July 21, Natalis, (Mart. Bedæ); with Ananias, Azarias, and Misanel, Dec. 17 (Cal. Byzant.).

(2) Stylites, Holy Father, A.D. 487; commemorated Dec. 11 (Cal. Byzant.). [W. F. G.]

DARIA, virgin, martyr at Rome under Numerian; commemorated with Chrysantus and "qui cum eis passi sunt," Aug. 12 (Mart. Hieron.); with Chrysantus and others, Nov. 29 (Mart. Hieron.); with Chrysantus, Dec. 1 (Mart. Adonis, Usuardi); with Chrysantus, Marinianus, "cum infinita multitudinæ martyrum," Dec. 1 (Mart. Rom. Vet.). [W. F. G.]

* There are several various readings.

DARIUS, martyr at Nicea; commemorated Dec. 19 (Mart. Usuardi). [W. F. G.]

DASIUS, martyr at Nicœmedia, with Zoticus, Gaius, and 12 soldiers; commemorated Oct. 21 (Mart. Rom. Vet., Hieron., Adonis, Usuardi).

DATIVA, confessor in Africa; commemorated Dec. 6, with seven others (Mart. Rom. Vet., Adonis, Usuardi). [W. F. G.]

DATIVUS. (1) Martyr in Africa, with Saturninus, Felix, Apollis, and his companions; commemorated Feb. 12 (Mart. Usuardi).

(2) Martyr under Decius and Valerian with five others; commemorated Sept. 10 (Mart. Rom. Vet., Adonis, Usuardi). [W. F. G.]

DAVID. (1) "et tres pueri;" commemorated June 25 (Cal. Armen.).

(2) of Thessalonica; commemorated June 25 (Cal. Byzant.).

(3) King of Ethiopia; commemorated Makarram 10 = Sept. 7 (Cal. Ethiop.).

(4) King of the Jews; commemorated Sept. 20 (Cal. Armen.); Taksas 23 = Dec. 19 (Cal. Ethiop.); Dec. 29 (Mart. Rom. Vet., Adonis, Usuardi).

(5) and Constantine; commemorated Oct. 2 (Cal. Georgian.).

(6) commemorated Dec. 23 (Cal. Armen.). [W. F. G.]

DAVID. Among the Egyptians, an archimandrite, or any head of a monastery of whatever rank, was called David; so that when a monastic head gave letters of commendation to any one, he subscribed himself as "David illius loci" (Gratian De Formatis, quoted by Ducauge, s. v.). [C.]

DAYS, NAMES OF. [WEEK.]

DEACON. Διάκωνος, diaconus; διάκων (Deacon, Gloss. quoting Malaxus, Hist. Patriarch.); δ'ακωνες (Cyprian, Ep. ad Succensus, and repeatedly in the decrees of councils, e. g. Conc. Elib. c. 18 and 76, I. Arelat. c. 15, I. Tolat. 1).

1. NAMES.—The first idea contained in the word appears to be that of service rendered in an inferior capacity. It seems too as if something of a sacred character attached to the word even before its use in the Scriptures. Thus we find διακονεῖν γάμου, "metaphora sumpta ab iis qui pocula aut victum ministrant egentibus et potentibus" (Steph. Thes. in verb. διακονεῖν; comp. Buttman's Lezilogus, and Stanley, Apostolic Age, p. 69).

In the New Testament διάκωνος is used: 1. In the general sense of an agent or instrument. Thus the sovereign power is called Θεοῦ διάκωνος (Rom. xiii. 4), and Timothy διάκωνος Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ (1 Tim. iv. 5). Sometimes "bishops and deacons" express all the offices of the Christian ministry (ὅν ἱερακόνας καὶ διάκωνας, Phil. i. 1). 2. But the word appears to have assumed its distinctive ecclesiastical meaning at the appointment of the first seven to superintend the distribution of the alms to the hellenist widows, ἵνα διακονοῦν τῇ καθάρσει τῶν ἁγίων (Acts vi. 1-6), when the διακονία τῶν τραπέζων became distinct from the διακονία τοῦ λόγου. These seven are never called deacons in the Acts of the Apostles. In the only passage in which mention is made of them as a body, Philip is described as one of "the seven" (Acts xi. 8). It has therefore been contended that the institution of the diaconate was not really c...

Seren...
with the... thosed in...
as perfor...
church...
ance with...
it is disti...
pintment...
along, ἡ δ... the apostle...
A theo... by later w...
the appoi...
meet a par... no connect...
period of th... that they...
and that...
between the...
on Apost. li...
Lightfoot... on Polycip...
St. Chrysos... this theory...
the ordinat... neither that...
nor that of...
passage is...
Council in Tr...
institution of...
ἡν Ἰβλαος...
κατορθώσῃ...
these minist...
part in the...
αἰσθητῶν...
ἵνα ἀρῶν...
κατορθώσῃ...
et Non. Eccl...
§ 11, 12.
On the othe...
mor that the...
derel the order...
the institution...
"Nicodemus...
Nicodemus...
Nicodemus...
the custom of...
confluence with...
the apostles, of...
vii. 19), so Co...
Comm. in 1 Tim...
Cyprian, Ep. 65...
Neb. Leg.; Co...
Heres. l. De Inc...
The name of...
was given to...
an account of...
perform, ἔξυμπε...
επιθεωροῦν...
Apost. iii. 20);...
(Con. Nic. c. 18)...
et. episcopi minist...
c. 37; comp. t. C... of c. 18, and c. 3... however, the locu... includes the presb...
the clergy...
They are also...
the analogy of...
Apost. ὁμοῦ...
ii. 25); Acvraia (ib... the presb...

at Nisaea; commemorated (vii).

[W. F. G.]

at Nicœmia, with Zoticus; commemorated Oct. 21 (Hieron., Adonis, Usuardi).

[W. F. G.]

in Africa; commemorated seven others (Mart. Rom.).

[W. F. G.]

Martyr in Africa, with Pelius, and his companions; 12 (Mart. Rom.).

[W. F. G.]

Decius and Valerian with decorated Sept. 10 (Mart. Rom.).

[W. F. G.]

Three pueri; commemorated (vii).

[W. F. G.]

at Nisaea; commemorated Mas- (vii).

[W. F. G.]

at Nisaea; commemorated Sept. 23 - Dec. 19 (Cat. E. hœp.); (Fet., Adonis, Usuardi).

[W. F. G.]

at Nisaea; commemorated Oct. 2 (vii).

[W. F. G.]

at Nisaea; commemorated Oct. 23 (Cat. Amen.).

[W. F. G.]

at Nisaea; commemorated Oct. 23 - Dec. 19 (Cat. E. hœp.); (Fet., Adonis, Usuardi).

[W. F. G.]

at Nisaea; commemorated Oct. 23 - Dec. 19 (Cat. E. hœp.); (Fet., Adonis, Usuardi).

[W. F. G.]

at Nisaea; commemorated Oct. 23 - Dec. 19 (Cat. E. hœp.); (Fet., Adonis, Usuardi).

[W. F. G.]

at Nisaea; commemorated Oct. 23 - Dec. 19 (Cat. E. hœp.); (Fet., Adonis, Usuardi).

[W. F. G.]

at Nisaea; commemorated Oct. 23 - Dec. 19 (Cat. E. hœp.); (Fet., Adonis, Usuardi).

[W. F. G.]

at Nisaea; commemorated Oct. 23 - Dec. 19 (Cat. E. hœp.); (Fet., Adonis, Usuardi).

[W. F. G.]

at Nisaea; commemorated Oct. 23 - Dec. 19 (Cat. E. hœp.); (Fet., Adonis, Usuardi).

[W. F. G.]

at Nisaea; commemorated Oct. 23 - Dec. 19 (Cat. E. hœp.); (Fet., Adonis, Usuardi).

[W. F. G.]

at Nisaea; commemorated Oct. 23 - Dec. 19 (Cat. E. hœp.); (Fet., Adonis, Usuardi).

[W. F. G.]

at Nisaea; commemorated Oct. 23 - Dec. 19 (Cat. E. hœp.); (Fet., Adonis, Usuardi).

[W. F. G.]

at Nisaea; commemorated Oct. 23 - Dec. 19 (Cat. E. hœp.); (Fet., Adonis, Usuardi).

[W. F. G.]

at Nisaea; commemorated Oct. 23 - Dec. 19 (Cat. E. hœp.); (Fet., Adonis, Usuardi).

[W. F. G.]

really connected with the appointment of the Seven. One theory would identify the deacons with the πρεσβυτεροι or πρεσβυτοι elsewhere mentioned in the New Testament (Acts v. 6 and 10) as performing certain subordinate offices in the church. But this theory appears to be at variance with the account given in the Acts, where it is distinctly said that, at the time of the appointment of the Seven, the distribution of the alms, ἡ διακονία ἢ καθ' ἑαυτὴν, was performed by the apostles themselves.

A theory something like this has been adopted by later writers. In this case it is alleged that the appointment of the Seven was merely to meet a particular emergency, and "had probably no connection with the deacons in the later period of the apostolic age," though it is admitted "that they may possibly have borne the name," and that "there was in some respects a likeness between their respective duties" (Stanley, Lectures on Apostolic Age, p. 62; comp. Vitringa, Essays on Lightfoot, Essay on Christian Ministry, in Comm. on Philippians, p. 186, note). A passage from St. Chrysostom is brought forward in support of this theory, in which he distinctly asserts that the ordination (χειροτονία) of the Seven was either that of deacons, not that of presbyters, or that of bishops (Hœm. on Acts vi.). This passage is incorporated into a decree of the Council in Trullo (c. 16) which, referring to the institution of the Seven "deacons" (ἡ τῶν πρῶτων ἑπτὰ διακόνων ἐκ τῶν ἀποστόλων καταστήσει παραβύβατον), expressly distinguishes these ministers from the deacons proper who took part in the sacred ministry of the altar (ὁ λόγος αὐτοῦ ἐπὶ τῶν τοῦ μυστηρίου διακονουμένων ἐν ἁγίοις, ἀλλὰ περὶ τῆς ἐν ταῖς χρείαις τῶν ἡμετέρων ὑποουρίας). Compare Thomassin, Fet. et Nov. Eccl. Disciplina, Part I. L. 1, c. 51, § 11, 12.

On the other hand there is abundant testimony that the early church in general considered the order of deacons to have originated in the institution of the Seven. Irenæus speaks of "Nicolaum unum ex septem qui primi ad diaconatum ab apostolis ordinati sunt" (Hœres. i. 27). Socrates asserts that the church of Rome retained the custom of only having seven deacons, in accordance with the number of those ordained by the apostles, of whom Stephen was first (H. E. viii. 19), so Constitut. Apost. viii. 46; Hilary, Comment. in 1 Tim. iii. 11, apud Ambrosii Opera; Eusebius, Ep. 65, ad Eusebium; Id. Ep. 68, ad Marcellin. De Incern. 4).

The name of deacon (i. e. servant or subordinate) was given to the third order of the ministry on account of the duties which they had to perform, ἐξουσιοθετοῦν τῷ ἐπισκόπῳ καὶ τοῖς πρεσβυτέροις, τοῦτέστι διακονεῖν (Constitut. Apost. iii. 20); τοῖς ἐπισκόπῳ ὑπακούειν εἰς τὰ ἐπισκοπικὰ μυστήρια (Conc. Nic. c. 18). "Diacoanus ita se presbyteri et episcopi ministrum novit" (iv. Conc. Carth. c. 57; comp. i. Conc. Turon. c. 1; Conc. Ekk. title c. 18, and c. 33). In the last named canon, however, the heading "De Episcopis et Ministris" includes the presbyters and all other orders of the clergy.

They are also continually called Levites, from the analogy of the Mosaic Dispensation; of which ἡμετέροις ἰδὲ διακοναὶ ἐπιτελεῖνται (Clem. ad Cor. i. 40). Jerome (Epist. ad Eusebium) compares the bishops, priests, and deacons with Aaron, his sons, and the Levites respectively. (Comp. i. Conc. Turon. c. 1, 2, Salvian, ad Eccles. Cathol. ii. 394.)

ad Cor. i. 40). Jerome (Epist. ad Eusebium) compares the bishops, priests, and deacons with Aaron, his sons, and the Levites respectively. (Comp. i. Conc. Turon. c. 1, 2, Salvian, ad Eccles. Cathol. ii. 394.)

11. Position of Deacons.—They are always spoken of in conjunction with the bishops and priests in the service of the church. The canons of the councils are almost invariably addressed to the bishops, priests, and deacons as to the three orders of whom the clergy was composed, and the same rule is observed in the writings of the apostolic fathers (See Ign. Trall. c. 3, Philadelph. c. 7; Polycarp, Philipp. 5; Martyr. Ignat. 3). In the Constitutiones Apostolicæ (viii. 46) they are said to be ordained in the same manner as the priests and bishops; and in another place (ii. 28, 28) a type of the threefold operations of the Holy Trinity is found in the distinctive offices of bishops, deacons, and deaconesses. In many respects, indeed, their position was put on a level with that of the priests. The same rules apply to the married deacons as to the married priests (i. Conc. Trul. 1, i. Conc. Turon. 2). In later days the oath of purgation to be taken by a deacon was the same as that of a priest, and differed from that of the inferior orders of clergy (Con. Berghem. c. 18, 19). Their share of the first-fruits (ἀπαρχαί) offered at the altar was the same as allotted to the presbyters, and was double that of the deacons (Constitut. Apost. ii. 28). Of the EULOGIÆ which remained after the administration of the Eucharist, the bishop and the deacon two (Ibid. viii. 30, 31). In some churches it would seem as if the emoluments of the deacons were even greater than those of the priests, since Jerome warns them against estimating the dignity of their ecclesiastical position by its pecuniary results: "Presbyter non se inferioris minorem, sacerdotio esse majorem" (Hieronym. Ep. 85, ad Evang. comp. Conc. in Ecl. c. xviii.).

There are places also in which their office is spoken of as sacerdotal in the general sense. Thus Optatus speaks of it as the third grade: "Quid commemorem diaconos in tertio? quid presbyteros in secundo sacerdotio institutos?" (c. Donatist. lib. i. 35). Jerome speaks of their ordination to a priesthood (sacerdotium) in common with the bishops and priests (Hieron. Apolog. Jovin.), and St. Augustine (Ep. 16) addresses one Præsides as a fellow priest (consecratus) of whom Jerome, in the epistle that follows, speaks as a deacon.

But notwithstanding such expressions as these their right to be considered as in any way partakers in the office of the presbyter, or priest in the narrower sense, is in many places emphatically denied. In the Questiones it is held impossible that a deacon can in any case discharge the degree of a priest (sacerdotis), since he is in no degree a partaker of the priestly office (Quæst. Fet. et Nov. Test. Inter Augustini Opera, N. T. 46); deacons are inferior to priests (πρεσβυτεροι, i. Conc. Nic. c. 18); a deacon might be ordained by one bishop only, because the ordination was only to a ministerial, not a priestly office (non ad sacerdotium sed ad ministerium consecrator, iv. Conc. Carth. 4); and deacons distributed the consecrated elements, not as priests, but as the attendants upon priests (ἑρεῖται, Constitut. Apost. viii. 28); so Ambrosiaster, "quoniam non sunt sacerdotes" (Conm. Ep. Ephes. iv. 11).

And this inferiority of office was marked by the position given them in the discharge of the duties. While the bishops and the presbyters were seated on their thrones in the church, the deacons were to stand near them (Constitut. Apost. ii. 57). The first council of Nice (c. 18) strictly forbade a deacon to sit among the priests as contrary to all rule and order. So it was ordered that a deacon might only be seated by express permission in presence of a priest (ἡρεῖβύρεπος, Conc. Laod. c. 20; comp. Conc. Agath. c. 65, iv. Conc. Carth. c. 30); but the same respect was to be paid to the deacons by the subdeacons and inferior clergy (Ibid.). So it is said that even the deacons of the churches at Rome, though inclined to presume on their position, did not venture to seat themselves during the services (Quæstion. c. 1, i. 10); and the testimony of Jerome confirms this: "In ecclesiâ Romane presbyteris se sent, et stant in eorum" (Epist. 85, ad Evagri.). So i. Conc. Basiliens. c. 4. In councils their proper position was standing, as is apparent in several records of their proceedings; e. g. "considentibus presbyteris, adstantibus diaconis" (i. Conc. Tolet. Proem.); "adstantibus ministris vel universo clero" (i. Conc. Bracar. Proem.); and this was strictly enforced by canons; the priests should sit at the back of the bishops, and the deacons stand in front (iv. Conc. Tolet. 4). Deacons, however, who held ecclesiastical offices (ὀφφικια ἐκκλησιαστικά) were allowed to be seated, but on no account before any presbyter, unless they represented their own patriarch or metropolitan in another city, in which case they were to take the place allotted to the person whom they represented (Conc. Quinisext. c. 7). Another canon provides that they should not speak at councils unless especially bidden (iv. Conc. Carth. c. 40). [COUNCILS, p. 481.]

Thus in every way their position appears to have been associated with the discharge of duties which were recognised as honourable in themselves, and conferring honour on those to whom they were entrusted, yet distinctly marked out as ministerial rather than sacerdotal, and carefully kept apart from those which specially belonged to the priests.

III. Duties.—These were of a varied nature, but appear to have been in every case suggested by those which were originally allotted to them, and to be comprehended in διακονία τῶν τραπέζων, as distinguished from the διακονία τοῦ λόγου.

1. They were stewards of the property of the church and of the funds belonging to the widows and orphans. Thus Cyprinus speaks of Nicostrius as having not only robbed the church but defrauded the widows and wards (Cyp. Ep. 49 [at. 52], ad Corinthios). So Jerome calls the deacon "mensurum et viduarum minister" (Hieron. Ep. 85, ad Paulin.). They were also to distribute the oblations (εὐλογίας) which remained after the celebration of the Eucharist among the different orders of the clergy, in the regular proportions (Constitut. Apost. viii. c. 31).

2. They were almoners of the charities bestowed by the church. It was part of their duty to seek out and visit the sick and afflicted, and report to the bishop respecting such as were in affliction (Constitut. Apost. iii. 19). But all alms were to be distributed alike; and in the direction of the bishop (Ibid. ii. c. 31, 32, 34). They were also to select the aged women (ἡρεῖβύρεπας) invited on the ground of poverty to more frequent participation in the ἁγίασμα (Ibid. ii. 28).

3. The discipline of the church was in a great measure intrusted to their hands as the immediate ministers of the bishop. In times of persecution it was their duty to minister to the confessors in their prisons, and to bury the bodies of the martyrs (Euseb. H. E. vii. 17). They were also to strengthen the faint-hearted and exhort the wavering. Thus it was one of the complaints against Novatian that he resisted in remaining in his hiding-place when exhorted by the deacons to come forth (Euseb. H. E. vi. 43). If any for misconduct were cast out from the congregation, the deacons were to intercede for the offender, since, it is able, Christ intercedes for sinners with the Father (Constitut. Apost. ii. c. 16). They were also associated with the bishop in the work of seeking out and reproving offenders (Ibid. ii. c. 17). As deputies of the bishop they were to relieve him of the lighter cases brought for adjudication, leaving the weightier for his own decision (Ibid. ii. 44), and might even, in his absence, take charge of the diocese (Bede, H. E. ii. 20). They also appear to have been entrusted, in the absence of a presbyter, with some jurisdiction over the inferior clergy (Constitut. Apost. viii. 28). When any of the faithful brought letters commendatory from another diocese, they were to examine into the circumstances of the case (Ibid. ii. 58). They were also frequently sent on embassies from one church to another (Ignat. Philadelph. c. 10). They also sometimes represented their bishops in councils (Conc. Quinisext. A. D. 691, c. 7), though this was forbidden in the West, on the ground that a deacon being inferior to the priests (presbyteris junior), could not be allowed to sit with bishops in the council (Conc. Emerc. A. D. 666, c. 5). Thomassin however asserts that this provincial decree was never acted upon (Nova et Vet. Eccl. Discip. i. 2, c. 23, § 19). At all councils a deacon was to read the decrees by which the proceedings were regulated (capitula de conciliis agendis) before the business commenced (iv. Conc. Tolet. 4). It appears also to have been the duty of the deacons on these occasions to keep the doors, and call for those whose presence was required before the council (Ord. Eccl. Africanae, c. 100).

4. In other respects they were to be channels of communication between the bishop and the laity (Constitut. Apost. ii. 28). All the offerings of the people (τὰς δωρεὰς τοῦ προσέφυγας, τὰς ἀπαρχὰς καὶ τὰς δεκάς, τὰς τὰ ἐκείνην), when not made directly to the bishop, were to be presented to him through their hands (Ibid. ii. 27). So various were their duties in relation to the bishop that he was regarded in one place his ear and eyes and another his heart (Ibid. ii. 44); in another his sense and perception (ψυχή καὶ αἴσθησις, Ibid. iii. 17).

5. These duties were connected with the διακονία τῶν τραπέζων, as relating to the material needs of the community. Another class of duties are considered. Eucharist occasion from that it is the Eucharist will not Eccl. i. 1, in Acts vi. "In communion celebrabant." a. They of order in tumance see that a allotted to tranee, or misbehaved ii. 37, viii. misbehaved, and they w signing home welcome to (Constitut. at the men during the viii. 11). belonging to the altar, brought was priest. Their an priests offices, that God might These duties here were longing to th omnia obsequi facti clerico rent, et vas sacerdotis, si (Quæstiones, ordered that water on the νῆος χειρῶν viii. 11). But strictly forbid (ὀμπέρας) to the sacred ve c. 66). In ὀμπέρας is the second corders that a public pennac the subdeacon sacred vessels the deacons al secerated eleme (Constitut. Apo them; of διδάσκοντες πρὸς viii. 12). "Pr offerentium; non ille pollicetur xviii.) [DUTY They had also service itself. Communion Off CHRIST, ANT.

the sick and afflicted, and respecting such as were afflicted (Euseb. iii. 19). But all butted (acted) under the (Ibid. ii. c. 31, 32, 34) of the aged women (some ground of poverty) in the ἀγάθη (Ibid.

the church was in a great their hands as the immediate bishop. In times of persecution to minister to the prisoners, and to bury the dead (Euseb. H. E. vii. 11). strengthen the faithful elders. Thus it was one of Novatian that to carry his hissing-place when was to come forth (Euseb. for misconduct were cast out, the deacons were to minister, since, it is added, Christ with the Father (Constitut. were also associated with work of seeking out and relieving (ii. c. 17). As deputies to relieve him of the burden of adjunction, leaving (Ibid. ii. 44), his absence, take charge of (ii. 20). They also appear in the absence of a presiding officer (ii. viii. 28). When any of letters commendatory from were to examine into the case (Ibid. ii. 58). They sent on embassies from (Ignat. Philadelph. c. 10) represented their bishops (Ibid. x. A. D. 691, c. 7), hidden in the West, on the ground being inferior to the superior, could not be allowed the council (Conc. Emerit. assia however asserts that he was never acted upon (Ibid. i. 2, c. 23, § 19). It was to read the decrees were regulated (capitula before the business completed. 4). It appears also to the deacons on these occasions, and call for those who before the council (Colz 0).

they were to be channels of on the bishop and the laity (Ibid. 28). All the offerings of (Ibid. ἱεροῦ προσφοράς, τῆς ἐκείνου τῆς ἐκείνου) when the bishop, were to be presented in his hands (Ibid. ii. 27). duties in relation to the altar in one place his ear and heart (Ibid. ii. 44); in perception (ψυχῆ καὶ αἵματος) connected with the deacons relating to the maintenance. Another class of duties arose from the "ministry of the Table," considered in relation to the celebration of the Eucharist. Thomassin says that, although the occasion for instituting the order of deacons arose from the necessities of the common table, yet that it also had reference to the celebration of the Eucharist, "ad sacram mensam, quæ tunc civili non divellebant" (Vet. et Nov. Discip. Eccl. l. 1, c. 51, § 4; comp. Wordsworth, Comm. in Act. vi. 2, and, there quoted, Bishop Pearson, "In communi victu sacramentum Euchristine celebrant").

a. They were to provide for the maintenance of order in the congregations during the performance of the various services. They were to see that all the congregation took the places allotted to them, that no one lingered in the entrance, or whispered, or slept, or in any way misbehaved during the service (Constitut. Apost. ii. 37, viii. 11). So Chrysostom says, "if any misbehave, call the deacon" (Hom. 24 in Acta); and they were to be particularly careful in assigning honourable places and giving a cordial welcome to the poor and aged and to strangers (Constitut. Apost. ii. 58). They were to stand at the men's gate lest any should go in or out during the celebration of the Eucharist (Ibid. viii. 11). They also discharged the lesser offices belonging to the Lord's Table; they arranged the altar, placed on it the sacred vessels, and brought water for the hands of the officiating priest. Their duty was to minister both to bishops and priests in things pertaining to their several offices, that all things relating to the worship of God might be rightly celebrated (Ibid. viii. 46). These duties, however, in large churches where there were many clergy, devolved on those belonging to the inferior orders: "ut autem non omnia obsequiorum per ordinem agant multitudo facti clericorum. Nam utique et altare portarent, et vase ejus et aquam in manus funderent sacerdotes, sicut videmus per omnes ecclesias" (Christ. nes. Q. 101); and in another place it is ordered that the subdeacon should pour the water on the hands of the officiating priest, ἀπόψυον χερῶν τοῖς ἱερεῶσι (Constitut. Apost. viii. 11). But there are decrees of councils strictly forbidding the inferior orders of clergy (ὀμπέρτας) to enter the Diaconicum or touch the sacred vessels (Conc. Laodic. c. 21, Ayth. c. 66). In the decree of the latter council ὀμπέρτας is rendered "insacratos ministros." The second canon of the first council of Toledo orders that a deacon who had been subjected to public penance should only be received among the subdeacons, so that he might not handle the sacred vessels; and it was expressly ordered that the deacons should take the remains of the consecrated elements into the Pastophoria or Sacristy (Constitut. Apost. viii. 13).

It was their duty also to present the offerings of the people at the altar, proclaiming at the same time the names of those who had made them; of διδάκοντι προσάγειν τὰ δῶρα τῶ ἱερατικῶ πρὸς τὸ θυσιαστήριον (Constitut. Apost. viii. 12). "Publici diaconus in ecclesia recitet offerentium nomina, tantum offert ille, tantum ille pollicetur est" (Hieron. Comm. in Ezechiel. xviii.). [DUTIES.]

They had also an important part to fill in the service itself. At the commencement of the Communion Office the deacon who ministered was to stand near the bishop and proclaim with a loud voice: μῆρις κατὰ τῶνδ, μῆρις ἐν ἑσῶναι ἑνὸς, ἑνὸς ἐν ἑσῶναι ἑνὸς, "let none come who has ought against any one, none in hypocrisy" (Constitut. Apost. ii. 54, 57, § 12). The reading of the Gospel was allotted either to a deacon or to a presbyter (Ibid. ii. 57, § 5); though in some churches it appears to have been the special office of the deacon, "Evangelium Christi quasi diaconus lectitabas" (Hieron. Epist. ad Subim.). Sozomen says of the church at Alexandria, that the archdeacon only read the Gospel, but in other churches the duty was discharged by the deacons, and in many only by the priests (Soz. II. E. vii. 19). The second council of Nicaea admitted that a deacon, in the absence of a priest, might be permitted to read a homily of the Fathers in the church, on the ground that they who were worthy to read the Gospel of Christ were not unworthy to recite expositions of the Fathers (ii. Conc. Nicaense, c. 2), and for this reason it was forbidden that a deacon should be appointed who could not read (Conc. Narbon. c. 11; comp. Cyprian, Ep. 34, al. 39). It was perhaps in allusion to this part of their office that the duty was assigned to them of holding the Gospels over the head of a bishop at the time of his ordination (Constitut. Apost. viii. 4).

The deacon appointed for the purpose was also to give the signal for the departure of the unbelievers (Ibid. cc. 5, 12), to recite the appointed prayers for the catechumens, the excommunicated, those preparing for baptism, and the penitents, and to dismiss each class in its proper order (Ibid. viii. cc. 6, 7, 8). He was to make the proclamation which was the signal for the kiss of peace (Ibid. ii. c. 57), and to recite the prayer for the universal church (Ibid. ii. 57, viii. 9, 10, 11, 13, 35). Thus Chrysostom (Hom. 14 in Rom.) speaks of the deacon offering the prayers on behalf of the people (τῶ ἄθῆου). In the liturgy given in the Constitutiones under the name of St. James, it is ordered that two deacons should stand by the altar bearing fans [FLABELLUM] made of fine membrane, or peacock's feathers, or linen, to drive away flies or insects from the sacred elements (Constitut. Apost. viii. c. 12).

At the administration of the Holy Communion it was the duty of the deacons to receive the consecrated elements from the officiating minister in order to distribute them among those who were present, and to convey them to the absent (Justin Martyr, Apolog. viii. c. 2); "Diaconi ordo est accipere a sacerdote et sic dare plebi" (Questiones, 101). But their peculiar office was the administration of the cup; ὁ διάκονος κερύχεται τὸ ποτήριον (Constitut. Apost. viii. c. 13); "solennibus adimpletis diaconus ore preesentibus coepit" (Cyprian, De Lay. is. c. 25). They were strictly forbidden to distribute the bread if a priest was present (ii. Conc. Arclit. c. 15), unless some necessity arose for doing so, and they were bidden to do so by the priest (iv. Conc. Carth. c. 38). But it was carefully noted that the deacon only acted as the subordinate of the priest (Constitut. Apost. viii. 28), and had no right whatever to offer the sacrifice (Ibid. viii. 46). Priests under censure are deprived of the privilege of consecrating, deacons of ministering (Conc. Ayth. c. 1); and it was forbidden that they should give the consecrated bread to the priests, on the ground that it was unseemly that those who had no power to consecrate should administer to those who had (1. Conc. Nic. c. 18). So Jerome says of Hilarius, the deacon, that he had no power without priests or bishops to celebrate the Eucharist, "Eucharistiam conficere" (Hieron. contra Iulifer.). And though the right of consecration appears to have been assumed in some places, it was strictly forbidden (1. Conc. Arelat. c. 15).

There are, however, two passages which may seem to favour the idea that deacons had sometimes power to consecrate. One of these is the decree of the council of Ancyra, which forbids deacons who have offered sacrifice to idols to offer either the bread or the wine, ἕρπον ἢ ποτήριον ἰδωδέσειν (Conc. Ancyr. c. 2). But this undoubtedly refers either to the offering the oblations which preceded the prayer of consecration (Thomassin, Vet. et Nov. Eccl. Discip. i. 2, c. 29, § 14), or to the distribution of the elements after consecration (Bingham, Antiquities, ii. c. 20, § 7; comp. Suicer, Thesaurus, t. 1, p. 871). The other is the speech put by St. Ambrose into the mouth of Laurentius, the deacon, when meeting his bishop, Sixtus, on the way to his martyrdom: "Cui commissi Domini sanguinis consecrationem, cui consummanlorum consortium sacramentorum" (Ambros. De Offic. i. 41). But this doubtful expression seems interpreted by the words immediately preceding, "naquam sacrificium sine ministro offerre consueveras," the "offerre consueveras" clearly referring to Sixtus himself. The "sanguinis consecrationem" probably merely means "sanguinem consecratum," and the duty attributed to the deacons was the service they always performed after consecration—ὑπεροβούμενοι τῷ τοῦ κυρίου σώματι μετὰ φθβου (Constit. Apost. ii. 57; see Bingham, Antiquities, ii. 26, § 8).

After the administration the deacons were to take away what remained of the sacred elements into the sacristy, to recite (κηρύττειν) the Post-Communion Prayer, and dismiss the people (Constitut. Apost. viii. cc. 13, 35, 40). Thus it is said that Athanasius commanded his deacon κηρύξαι εὐχὴν (Conc. H. E. ii. 11), and κηρύττειν is mentioned among the sacred offices from the performance of which the deacons who had worshipped idols were to be suspended (Conc. Ancyr. c. 2). It was ordered by the fourth council of Toledo (c. 40), that the deacon (Levita) should wear a stole over the left shoulder, "propter quod orat, id est, prædicat." Chrysostom too calls the deacons κηρυκες (Hom. 17 in Heb. ix.). Thomassin says that the word κηρύττειν, used by the council of Ancyra, expressed the recital of the prayers and exhortations and the reading of the Gospels, which were done with raised voice (Thomassin, Vet. et Nov. Eccl. Discip. i. 2, c. 29, § 14; comp. Suicer, Thes. in voc. κηρύττειν).

β. It appears that the daily services in district churches were sometimes entrusted to the deacons and priests in alternate weeks. In this case both presbyters and deacons were to assemble on the Saturday evening, that the Sunday services might be celebrated with due honour (Conc. Tarracon. c. 7). The council of Eliveris (c. 77) also speaks of a deacon in charge of a parish, without either priest or bishop, "regens plebem sine episcopo vel presbytero."

γ. It does not appear that preaching was among the duties which were usually entrusted to deacons, though Philip and Stephen undoubtedly did preach. Hilary, the commentator, holds that in the earliest days of the church, all the faithful both preached and baptized, but that afterwards a different course was adopted, and separate offices assigned to different members, so that in his days the deacons did not preach, though he says that at first all deacons were evangelists, and had commission given them to preach, though without any settled charge (sine cathedra) (Comm. in Ephes. iv. 11, in Ambrose's Works). Yet that some faculty of preaching was inherent in the office, at least at the command of the bishop, appears from the language of Philostorgius (H. E. iii. 17), where he says that Icentius ordained Aetius as a deacon, in order that he might teach in the church, but that he declined to undertake the other duties of a deacon, only accepting that of preaching (ἰδωδέσειν ἀνεβήξατο); and though Leontius was a heretic, the words seem to indicate that this was reckoned among the ordinary functions of a deacon. On the other hand, the duty of preaching could not have belonged to them in the Western church in ordinary cases, since Caesarius, bishop of Arles, in giving permission to the priests and deacons in his diocese to read certain homilies to the people, when he himself could no longer preach to them through the infirmities of age, gives as the ground of his permission that, since they were allowed to read the Holy Scriptures in the church, it could not be wrong for them to read homilies composed by himself or by other fathers of the church (Thomassin, Vet. et Nov. Eccl. Discip. ii. 1, c. 89, § 8, 9), words adopted by the second council of Vaison, already quoted. And so Vigilius in his letter to two deacons, Rusticus and Sebastian, speaks of their exorable pride in venturing to preach without permission of the bishop, as contrary to all precedent and canon law, "contra omnem consuetudinem vel canones" (Lalbe, Conc. v. p. 554).

δ. They had also certain duties to perform at the administration of baptism. It was to be administered by bishops and priests only, with the assistance of the deacons (ἐξυμνητούμενων αὐτοῖς τῶν διακόνων (Constitut. Apost. iii. c. 11). They had to undertake the preliminary enquiries into the circumstances of the candidates (Ibid. viii. c. 32). They were to apply the unction which preceded the administration of the sacrament to the foreheads of the women (Ibid. iii. c. 15), and to undertake all the necessary arrangements for the male candidates (Ibid. iii. 16). [BAPTISM.] It was their duty, or that of the subdeacon, to fetch the CHRISM from the bishop before Easter (ii. Conc. Brac. c. 51. i. Vet. 20).

But they were strictly forbidden to assume that the administration of baptism was one of the functions of their office. In the Apostolic Canons and Constitutions, the decrees concerning baptism are directed only to bishops and priests, though the other general canons addressed to all three orders of the ministry (Canones, c. 39, 41, 42; Constitut. viii. c. 22). The Constitutions, too, distinctly assert that it is not lawful for a deacon to baptize (viii. c. 28, iii. c. 11, vii. c. 46). In the latter passage it is added, that if any argument is drawn from the fact of baptism being administered by Philip and

Ananias, it men were the Lord, that no d administra
"ΑΑΥ" H asserting t castomel vel laici b Ambrose's
Yet it a baptize by charge of right of ba [BAPTISM, mentioned
Ista, D: B 5th centur life even fo in this nec they may the sacrific another do having cha to an bisho any, the bis
"per benedi Elo. 77); a that while may baptiz may only 3847 c. 7,
Jerome, spe were baptiz right of b footing, as d and the pos of episcopi diaconi jus Luciferum, the Western to baptize w and sent th (i. 2, c. 29, in this resp
e. The po generally to presbyters;
Thus Cyprian (romologesi in the case
"libelli" an proach of de hands of a decree of the vides that t public penn subdeacon le But it is pr which confer which went b and prepared (Thomassin, V
A decree of t vides that in and at the co receive a pen bably only m the consecrat of Serapion re might be sent
c. 29 § 9).

at preaching was among simply entrusted to a stately undoubtedly did mentator, holds that in church, all the faithful ed, but that afterwards a ed, and separate offices embers, so that in his preach, though he says as were evangelists, and them to preach, though charge (sine cathedra)
 , in Ambrose's Works).
 preaching was inherent at the command of the language of Philostorhe says that Irenaeus deacon, in order that he ch, but that he declined duties of a deacon, only ching (ὑδάσκον ἀνεβ-ianatus was a heretic, the that this was reckoned actions of a deacon. On y of preaching could not in the Western church Caesarius, bishop of Arles, the priests and deacons certain homilies to the f could no longer preach similarities of age, gives as mission that, since they e Holy Scriptures in the wrong for them to read self or by other fathers
 . Vet. et Nov. Eccl. Discip. ds adopted by the second ly quoted. And so Vigilius deacons, Rusticus and their exorable pride in without permission of the precedent and canon law, metudinem vel canones" in duties to perform at the sm. It was to be adminiced priests only, with the (ἐξουσιοποιούμενον αὐτοῖς . Apostol. iii. c. 11). They preliminary enquiries into the candidates (Ibid. viii. apply the unction which of the sacrament to omen (Ibid. iii. c. 15), and necessary arrangements for Ibid. iii. 16). [BAPTISM.] that of the subdeacons, from the bishop before

 c. 51. i. Tolet. 20). ctly forbidden to assume on of baptism was one of c office. In the Apostolic s, the decrees concerning only to bishops and priests, eral canons a blessed of the ministry (Canon, z. viii. c. 22). The Consti- assert that it is not lawful ze (viii. c. 23, iii. c. 11, after passage it is added, is drawn from the fact administered by Philip and Anselm, it is for want of perceiving that these men were specially appointed for those duties by the Lord, the High-Priest. Epiphanius asserts that no deacon was ever entrusted with the administration of a sacrament (ἰερωσύνην ἐπι-τῆναι; Haeres. 79, cap. 4). So Hilary, while asserting that all the faithful were once accustomed to baptize, adds, "nunc neque clerici vel laici baptizant" (Com. in Eph. iv. 11, in Ambrose's Works).

Yet it appears that they were permitted to baptize by command of a bishop, or when in charge of a parish without a presbyter. The right of baptizing resides generally in the bishop [BAPTISM, p. 166], but from him may be commanded both to priests and deacons (Tertullian, De Baptismo, c. 17). So a decree of the sixth century, speaking of the necessity of a holy life even for the laity, adds, how much more is this necessary for priests and deacons, since they may be called at any moment to offer the sacrifice or baptize? (i. Conc. Turon. 1). In another decree it is ordered that if a deacon having charge of a parish (regens plebem) without a bishop or presbyter should have baptized any, the bishop should confirm it by his blessing, "per benedictionem perficere debet" (Conc.
Eph. 77); and again, in another, it is provided that while priests, in cases of urgent sickness, may baptize at any season of the year, deacons may only do so at Easter (Synod. Rom. A.D.
 384, c. 7, in Bruns's Canones, ii. 278); and Jerome, speaking of those who in remote places were baptized by priests and deacons, places the right of both to baptize on exactly the same footing, as derived from the license of the bishop and the possession of the chrism, "sine chrismate et episcopi jussione neque presbyteri neque diaconi jus habent baptizandi" (Dial. contra Luciferum, c. 4). It seems then that, at least in the Western Church, the deacons were permitted to baptize when the bishop gave them authority and sent them the chrism. Thomassin however (i. 2, c. 29, § 14), thinks they had less liberty in this respect in the Eastern Church.

α. The power of receiving penitents appears generally to have been confined to bishops and presbyters; yet this rule was not invariable.
 Thus Cyprian allows deacons to receive confession (exomologesin) and bestow the parting blessing in the case of those penitents who had obtained "libelli" and were prevented by the near approach of death from receiving absolution at the hands of a priest (Ep. 13, al. 18, ad Cler.). A decree of the first council of Toledo (c. 2) provides that those deacons who had performed public penance should be reduced to the order of subdeacons lest they should lay hands on any.
 But it is probable that this was not the act which conferred absolution, but only a ceremony which went before the reception of the Eucharist and prepared the penitent for its administration (Thomass. Vet. et Nov. Eccl. Disc. i. 2, c. 29, § 8).
 A decree of the council of Eliberis (c. 32) provides that in certain cases of urgent necessity, and at the command of a bishop, the deacon may receive a penitent to communion. But this probably only meant that the deacons might convey the consecrated elements, which, as in the case of Serapion recorded by Eusebius (H. E. vi. 44), might be sent even by a child (Thomassin, i. 2,
 c. 29 § 9).

In these cases their duties were evidently only ministerial, and strictly limited to the subordinate functions belonging to their office. Their right to bestow any blessing on their own authority is plainly denied (Constitut. Apost. viii.
 28, 46). [BENEDICTION; DOMINUS VOSQUUM.]

ζ. From their bearing the chairs of priests and bishops (iv. Conc. Brag. Proem. c. 5), it would appear that in some churches they were expected to perform duties scarcely consistent with the dignity of their office. But their general tendency appears to have been either to claim functions which did not belong to them (i. Conc. Arelit. c. 15; Conc. Quinisext.
 c. 16), or to assume a precedence which may indicate that they were in some cases superior to the priests in wealth or social position. Thus they are rebuked for administering in some churches the Eucharist to priests and partaking of it even before bishops and presuming to sit among the priests (i. Conc. Nic. c. 18); for their pride in sitting in the first choir and compelling priests to take their places in the second (iv. Conc.
Tolet. c. 39); for claiming precedence at councils of presbyters when they held any ecclesiastical office (Conc. Quinisext. c. 7); for exciting seditions against the bishop (Constitut. Apost.
 ii. 32); for bestowing the benediction at private banquets in presence of priests (Hieron. Ep. 85 ad Evang.); and for esteeming themselves, on account of their superior wealth, as of higher dignity than the priests (Idem Comm. in Ezek. xviii.).

η. Deacons were strictly limited in the discharge of their office to the parishes for which they were appointed, and there are many decrees of councils forbidding them to wander elsewhere without the consent of the bishop (Canon Apost. c. 12; i. Conc. Nic. c. 15; Conc. Quinisext.
 c. 17; i. Arelat. c. 21; ii. Bracar. c. 34; Agath. c. 52).

IV. Promotion to a higher order.—It has been doubted whether in the earliest ages admission to the diaconate implied, or was a necessary preliminary to, advancement to the priesthood. That this was the case has been inferred from the words of St. Paul to Timothy—οἱ καλῶς διακονήσαντες βαθμὴν ταῦτοῖς καλῶν περιποιούνται (1 Tim. iii. 13). See DICTIONARY OF THE BIBLE, i. 417. It is undoubtedly true—1. That in later times βαθμὸς was used as a technical term denoting degrees of ecclesiastical office.
 So it was said of Athanasius, πάσαν τὴν τῶν βαθμῶν ἀκολουθίαν διετέθειν (Grog. Naz. Orat.
 21), and in that sense it repeatedly occurs in the decrees of councils (Conc. Eph. c. 6 Chalcedon. c. 29; Quinisext. c. 13). 2. That the elevation of deacons to the priesthood was part of the system of the church in after years. Thus it was ordered that deacons who maintained communication with their wives should not be elevated to the priesthood (i. Conc. Tolet. c. 1), "ad ulteriorem gradum non ascendat" (i. Conc.
Turon. 2). So, in the Questions, the priest is spoken of as being ordained from among the deacons, "ex diaconis presbyterus ordinatur" (Quæst.
 Q. 101). And so Jerome argues the higher office of the priesthood from the fact that the diaconate was a step to the priesthood, "ex diacono ordinatur presbyter" (Hieron. Epist. ad Evang.). But many deacons appear to have grown old and died without promotion to the priesthood (Thomassin, l. c. Eccl. Hist. l. 2, c. 33, § 9).

V. Vestments.—Concerning the dress of a deacon, it was ordained that when engaged in the services of the altar their apparel should not be too flowing, with a view to the ready performance of their duties, for they are like sailors and boatswains (τοιράρχους) in a ship (Constitut. Apost. li. 57). They were to wear a plain stole, "orarium," unadorned with gold or colours, on the left shoulder, the right being left free, to typify the expedition with which they were to discharge their sacred functions (iv. Conc. Tolet. c. 40). The manner of wearing the stole distinguished them from the priests; the stole itself was the mark of their office, since the inferior clergy were expressly forbidden to wear it (Conc. Luc. c. 22, 23). Due care was to be taken that this distinctive portion of the dress was clearly seen, "non licet diacono velo vel palli scapularis sinus involvi" (Conc. Autiss. c. 13). In another decree notice is taken of certain deacons who were accustomed to wear their stoles hidden beneath their albs, so as to resemble a subdeacon's, and they are ordered to display it openly for the future on the shoulder (i. Conc. Brac. c. 9). Those who had been temporarily deposed for any offence were presented on their reconciliation with an alb and a stole, as symbols of their restoration to their office (iv. Conc. Tolet. c. 28). It was to the stole that St. Chrysostom alluded when he saw a vision of the wings of ministering angels in the fine linen that floated over the left shoulders of those engaged in the service of the altar (ταῖς λεπτταῖς ὀθλίαις ταῖς ἐπὶ τῶν ἀριστέρων ὤμων κενεταῖς; Chrysost. Hom. in Hil. Prodig.). [STOLE.] The alb was to be worn only at the time of ministering at the altar, or reading the Gospels—"Diaconus tempore oblationis tantum vel lectionis albat utatur" (iv. Conc. Carthag. 41; Conc. Narbon. c. 12), or when performing the duty of the deacon at the opening of councils (iv. Conc. Tolet. c. 4). And this renders more emphatic a rebuke administered to certain priests and bishops who were accustomed on great festivals to be borne on chairs or litters by deacons in albs—"albatibus diaconibus" (iv. Conc. Brac. Proem. § c. 5). They also wore a DALMATIUM (which see).

VI. Number of Deacons.—The number of deacons allotted to each church appears to have varied. The council of Neocaesarea (c. 15) ordained that there should be seven deacons and no more in every city, however large, since that number had been ordained by the apostles (comp. Conc. Quinisext. c. 16), and this appears to have been the normal number in many churches (Constitut. Apost. viii. cc. 4, 46; Euseb. l. c. E. E. vi, 43; Hilary, Comm. in 1 Tim. iii. 8). But the later practice appears to have been as stated by Sozomen, that the church of Rome retained the number of seven deacons, as instituted by the apostles, but that other churches acted according to their own convenience (Soz. H. E. vii, 19). The number of deacons seems, however, to have been generally small; for St. Jerome states that deacons derived a dignity not belonging to their office from their paucity in number—"Diaconos paucitas honorabiles, presbyteros turba facit contentibiles" (Epist. ad Euan.).

VII. Age.—The age at which deacons were allowed to be ordained was universally fixed at twenty-five (iii. Conc. Carth. c. 4; Conc. Agath. c. 16; Conc. Quinisext. c. 14; iv. Conc. Tolet. c. 20; iii. Conc. Aurel. c. 8); but Thomassin relates that Cæsarius, bishop of Arles, would not permit any deacon to be ordained in his diocese who was under the age of thirty, and who had not read four times all the books of the Old and New Testament (Vet. et Nov. Eccl. Discip. ii. 1, c. 89, § 8).

VIII. Judication over.—A deacon could only be judged by three bishops (i. Conc. Carth. c. 11; ii. Conc. Carth. c. 10, but Brunus gives a different reading of this canon) of whom one was to be his own diocesan (iii. Conc. Carth. c. 8). See DEGRADATION, p. 542.

IX. Diaconus in Monasteries. In monasteries the name of deacon was sometimes given to those who discharged the office of steward and almsgiver—"oconomoi et diaconatores" [ORCONOMES] (Thomassin, Vet. et Nov. Eccl. Discip. iii. 2, c. 3, § 4; 3, c. 29, § 23). [P. 6.]

X. Cardinal Deacon.—A cardinal deacon (diaconus cardinalis) was in ancient times a deacon who was permanently attached (incardinated) to a particular church (Gregory the Great, Epist. v. 2; see CARDINAL, p. 289).

The name cardinalis seems also to have been given to the deacon to whom seniority or pre-eminence among his fellows had been assigned by competent authority. So Gregory the Great, writing to Liberatus, a deacon at Cagliari (Epist. i. 81), warns him not to set himself above the other deacons, unless he had been made cardinal by the bishop. Under Charlemagne a cardinal deacon of the city of Rome (diaconus in urbe constitutus in urbe Romæ) is mentioned with special distinction (Cyprianus, anni 806, c. 23, p. 458*, Baluze; and Cyprianus, i. c. 133, p. 728).

XI. A deacon was assigned to each of the seven REGIONS into which the city of Rome was ecclesiastically divided; these were called Regionary Deacons (diaconi regionarii). The acolytes of each region were under the authority of the regionary deacon (Mabillon, Com. Præv. in Ord. Rom. p. xix.).

XII. Stationary Deacons were those who ministered to the pope on his going to any STATION where an office was to be said.

XIII. Diaconi Testimoniabiles were those deacons who always lived with and accompanied a bishop for the avoiding of scandal (ii. Conc. Tolet. c. 12). See SYNCHELLUS. [C.]

DEACONESS (ἡ δίακονος, δίακονισσα, Diaconissa, Diaconia). 1. An order of women in the primitive Church who appear to have undertaken duties in reference to the deacons among men. Their office was probably rendered more necessary by the strict seclusion which was observed by the female sex in Greece, and in many Oriental countries. The word itself is only once used in the New Testament, in the place in which St. Paul speaks of Phoebe as δίακονος τῆς ἐκκλησίας (Rom. xvi. 1); but it was usually supposed by ancient commentators that the "women" mentioned by St. Paul in the passage in which he enumerates the qualifications of a deacon (1 Tim. iii. 11) were really deaconesses, whether, as the A. V. assumes, wives of deacons (Chrysostom, Theophylact, Wardsworth (Lightfoot) on Philipp.

II. Quæ been thought in the early days of the injury should be years of a Nov. Eccl. Pol. certain th deaconesses. And it appe to the offic to Trajan, the Christi Constitution be a chaf widow (cf. of Carthage) crated virgi to discharge ams given, th and those w had (Epist. Trullo also who has resti tion of her office, be a serz. c. 48). speaks of his as being virg. viii. 23) spe whom Chrysos a deaconess; who was ordi. Thus it see cannot be n widows or th were probabl served. It w circumstances.

The age at their office w. 1st. Virg. c. le 60 years mothers, that them to give pure Basil, Ep. of Sidim. c. 15) fires it at 40 after strict en honour done haring undert The council ir the age of 40 and 60 for thi proving conclu was not speak Theodolus issu be admitted to the age of 60, l. c. 16). Justinian's admission at 40 6). Thomassin which relate to deaconesses, who have merc was universally fixed at Carth. c. 4; Conc. Agath.

 c. 14; iv. Conc. Tolet.
 c. 6; but Thomas Bishop of Arles, would not be ordained in his the age of thirty, and times all the books of ment (Vet. et Nov. Eccl.

er.—A deacon could only nops (1. Conc. Carth. c. 11; ut Irunes gave a different of whom one was to be Conc. Carth. c. 8). See asteries. In monasteries sometimes given to those of steward and almoner

 "nasters" [OECONOMUS] Præf. Discip. lii. 2, c. 3, [P. O.]

—A cardinal deacon; in ir, ancient times a deacon attached (iurisdiction) (Gregory the Great, Epist.
 289).

seems also to have been to whom seniority or pre-lows had been assigned by So Gregory the Great, deacon at Cagliari (Epist. to set himself above the he had been made cardinal Charlemagne a cardinal Rome (diaconus in curia Romæ) is mentioned with ydula, anni 806, c. 13, Capitularium, l. c. 23.

assigned to each of the ser-e city of Rome was ecclese were called Regimini (arii). The acolytes of each authority of the regionar i, Præf. in Ord. Rom. p.

ons were those who mini-his going to any STATO be said.

onables were those deacons and accompanied a bishop, scandal (ii. Conc. Turon.
 25). [C.]

δίακονος, διακονισσα, Dia-An order of women in the appear to have undergone their own set analogues to deacons among men. Their ment more necessary by which was observed by the e, and in many Oriental itself is only once used in n the place in which St. as διάκονος τῆς ἐκκλη-it was usually supposed tors that the "women" in the passage in which qualifications of a deacon ally deaconesses, whether wives of deacons (Chrysostom,

Theophylact, Theodoret, Oecumen., quoted by Wordsworth, Comm. in loco, or women-deacons (Lightfoot, Essay on Christian Ministry in Comm. on Philippians, p. 189).

II. Qualifications for the Diaconate.—It has been thought that these deaconesses were widows in the earlier days of the Church, on the ground of the injunction of St. Paul that no widow should be taken into the number under sixty years of age (1 Tim. v. 9, cf. Thomas, Vet. et Nov. Eccl. Discip. l. 1. 3, c. 50, n. 10; Hooker, Eccl. Pol. v. c. 78, § 11). But it does not appear certain that St. Paul is in this place speaking of deaconesses (cf. Wordsworth, Comm. in loco).
 And it appears certain that virgins were admitted to the office. Thus Pliny speaks, in his epistle to Trajan, of two handmaidens (ancillæ) whom the Christians called "ministrae." The Apostolic Constitutions (vi. 17) say that the deaconess should be a chaste virgin (παρθένος ἀνήνη) or else a widow (cf. Iust. Novell. vi. 6). The 4th council of Carthage (c. 12) speaks of widows and consecrated virgins (sanctimonialia) who are selected to discharge the duties of deaconesses. Epiphanius gives three classes from whom they are to be chosen, the virgins, the widows of one husband, and those who lived in continence with one husband (Expositio Fidei, n. 21). The council in Trullo also provides that the wife of a bishop who has retired into a convent on the consecration of her husband may, if found fit for the office, be admitted to the diaconate (Conc. Quini- sect. c. 48). Gregory Nyssen (Vita Macrinae) speaks of his sister Macrina, and of one Lampadia, as being virgins and deaconesses. Sozomen (II. E.
 vii. 24) speaks of a noble virgin named Nicarete whom Chrysostom urged without effect to become a deaconess; and of one Olympias, a young widow, who was ordained to the same office (Id. vii. 9).
 Thus it seems evident that the deaconesses cannot be absolutely identified either with the widows or the virgins of the early church, but were probably chosen from these orders on occasion served. It would even appear that, under some circumstances, married women were admitted.
 The age at which they were to be admitted to their office was strictly defined. Tertullian (De Vel. Virg. c. 9) lays it down that they should be 80 years of age, widows of one husband, and mothers, that their own experience may enable them to give sympathetic help to others (compare Basil, Epist. Canon. c. 24 and Jerome, Ep. ad Sabinum). The council of Chalcedon (c. 15) fixes it at 40, and says they are to be chosen after strict enquiry, giving as a reason the dishonour done to the grace of God, if any, after having undertaken this service, should marry.
 The council in Trullo (cc. 14, 40) also assigned the age of 40 for the admission of a deaconess, and 60 for that of a widow, grounding the latter rule on the words of St. Paul (1 Tim. v. 9), thus proving conclusively that, in their opinion, he was not speaking in this place of deaconesses.
 Theodosius issued a decree that no woman should be admitted to the diaconate till she had attained the age of 60, and be. u. s. childless (Soz. II. E. vii.
 18). Justinian's legislation fixed the age of admission at 40 (Novell. 123 c. 13) or 50 (Id. vi.
 6). Thomasin thinks that only the canons which relate to women of 60 years of age refer to deaconesses, and the others apply to widows who have merely taken the vow of continence.

But he is obliged to own that he is maintaining this opinion in the face of the decree of the council of Chalcedon (Thomas, Vet. et Nov.
Eccl. Discip. l. 1. 3, c. 52, § 3, 4). Yet much appears to have been left to the bishops. Olympius is described as a young widow, and Tertullian (De Vel. Virg. c. 9) expresses great indignation at a case, with which he says he was himself acquainted, in which a virgin under 26 was admitted to the order of widows "in vilitatu," under which term the context proves that he is speaking of the diaconate.

From the passages already quoted it will be seen that it was always required that, if widows, deaconesses should only have been once married.
 This was probably in obedience to the injunction of St. Paul, "the wife of one man" (1 Tim. v.
 9). Other names of female servants of the Church are, πρεσβυτρίδες, women-elders, and πρε- σβυτέρας, aged women. In the N. T. the words appear identical in meaning (cf. 1 Tim. v. 2, and Titus ii. 3). But in the Apostolic Constitutions (ii. 28), the πρεσβυτέρας, the poorer of whom were to be invited more frequently to the Agapæ, are clearly different from the πρεσβυτρίδες who, as ministers of the church, are allotted a definite share of the first-fruits then offered, while the same proportion of the "eulogiae" is allotted in another place to those who are there called deaconesses (διακονισσας, Ibid. viii. c. 31). Epi-phanius appears to make a distinction between the two, when he says that the deaconesses were called widows (χήρας), but the elder of them (τὰς ἐτι γρηγορέας) were called πρεσβυτρίδας, and notes carefully that the word is quite different from that which designates women-presbyters (πρεσβυτερίδας) (Epiph. Haer. 79, cap. 4, cf.
Conc. Luod. c. 11).

Probably from the difficulty of finding virgins qualified for the office, it would appear that the deaconesses were in a great measure chosen from among the widows. And thus they were often called χήρας, although distinct from the general body of widows belonging to the Church.
 Thus Epiphanius, in the passage already quoted, speaks of the order of deaconesses (διακονισσῶν τῶν γυναικῶν) who are called widows. So there is canon speaking of the ordination of widows whom they call deaconesses, "Viduarum consecratio quas diaconas vocitant" (Conc. Epasn. c.
 21); and Basil speaks of a widow who has been taken into the number of widows, that is, received by the Church into the diaconate (Basil, Ep. Can. c. 3). Under this term were included all deaconesses, whether they were widows or not. So Ignatius speaks of the virgins who were called widows, τὰς παρθένους τὰς λεγομένας χήρας (Ad Smyrn. c. 13). So that it is probable that the word may have meant those living without a husband, whether in widowhood, or under a vow of continence (see Jacobson in loco).

III. Duties of Deaconesses.—The duties of the deaconesses were various. The most important related to the administration of baptism to women [BAPTISM, p. 160]. Thus the 4th council of Carthage (c. 12) speaks of them as widows or virgins selected for the purpose of assisting in the baptism of women, and who therefore must be qualified to assist the unlearned candidates how to answer the interrogatories in the baptismal office, and how to live after baptism. Epi-phanius says that the order was instituted to assist at the baptism of women, that all things might be done with proper decency (Haer. 79, cap. 3). In the Apostolic Constitutions (iii. 15, 16) it is said that the deaconess (ῥῆν δῆκονου) was to be chosen for ministering to women, because it was impossible to send a deacon into many houses on account of the unbelievers. At the baptism of women the deaconesses were to administer the christ before baptism, and to undertake all the necessary arrangements for the women, as the deacon did for the men. No woman was to have any intercourse with the bishop or deacon except through the deaconess (Dist. ii. c. 26). They were also to receive women who were strangers, and allot them their places in the church (Ibid. ii. c. 58), and to stand at the door of that part of the church which was allotted to women (Ibid. ii. c. 57). Thus the Pseudo-Ignatius (Ad Antioch. c. 12) speaks of the deaconesses who kept the doors of the church. They were to attend to the women who were sick or in affliction as the deacon did to the men (Constitut. Apost. iii. 19), and in time of persecution to minister to the confessors in prison (Cotel. Annot. in Constit. Apost. iii. 15, quoting from Lucian and Libanius). They were to exercise some supervision over the general body of widows, who were to be obedient to the bishops, priests, and deacons, and further to the deaconesses (Constitut. Apost. iii. c. 7). They also probably had authority over the virgins. Thus Gregory Nyssen, in the life of Macrina, says that Lampadin was set over the body of virgins in the diaconate. But the latter office appears to have been separable from the diaconate. Sozomen says that Nicarete refused either to become a deaconess, or to preside over the virgins of the Church, as if she might have accepted the one position without the other (Soz. H. E. viii. c. 23).

IV. Rank and Privileges.—There can be no doubt that deaconesses were considered to be an order in the Church. Nectarius is said to have ordained Olympias to the diaconate, δῆκονου ἐχειροτόνησας (Soz. H. E. viii. 9), and the same word is used in the decrees of the councils in Trullo (ce. 14, 40), and Chalcedon (c. 15). Epiphanius speaks of them as an order, τάγμα, in the Church (Haer. 79, cap. 3); and they were to receive the consecrated elements immediately after the male clergy, taking precedence of the widows and virgins, and the lay people (Constitut. Apost. viii. c. 13). Their ministry is said to be dependent upon that of the deacons (Ibid. ii. c. 26). A form of ordination by the bishop is also given in which the words ἐπιθήσῃς τὰς χεῖρας, which express the act of ordination, are the same as those employed in the office for the ordination of deacons, which the whole form greatly resembles (Ibid. viii. 19, 20).

Thomassin understands deaconesses to be meant in a decree of the 2nd council of Carthage (c. 3), which forbids a virgin to be consecrated by a presbyter, "puellarum consecratio a presbytero non fit" (ii. Conc. Carth. c. 3), or, as modified by the 3rd council (c. 36), without the consent of the bishop (Vet. et Nov. Eccl. Discip. i. l. 3, c. 50, § 11, 12).

There is however a somewhat remarkable passage in a decree of the council of Nice, which, after speaking of the Paulianist clergy who were to be reordained on their admission to the Catholic Church, goes on to say that the deaconesses who had assumed that office, or habit, since they had no imposition of hands, could only be reckoned among the laity (I Conc. Nic. c. 19). But this appears simply to refer to certain women among the Paulianists who had assumed the habit or office of deaconess without imposition of hands, and who therefore could not be reordained but simply reckoned among the laity (cf. Thomassin Vet. et Nov. Eccl. Discip. i. l. 3, c. 50, § 12). Indeed the same canon speaks of deaconesses as among the clergy (ἡ τῶν κληρικῶν) and to be received in the same manner. Thus clearly making a distinction between those among the Paulianists who had been regularly ordained, and those who had assumed the office without ordination. But the reading is doubtful (see Brunus, Cinones, l. 19), though Thomassin, in the place above quoted, accepts it without question as authentic.

The ordination, however, was expressly understood to confer no sacerdotal functions of any kind. The 4th council of Carthage (c. 100) expressly orders that no woman should venture to baptize. It appears that certain sects of the Montanists ordained women as priests and even as bishops. In opposition to these Epiphanius, while speaking of them as an order in the Church, asserts that they were women-elders, but not priestesses in any sense (ἡγετοὶ Βαρβάρης ἡγίσιον), and that their mission was not to interfere in any way with the functions allotted to the priests (ἡερατεύειν), but simply to perform certain offices in the care of women (Epiph. Haer. 79, cap. 3). Tertullian also says that it is not permitted to a woman to speak in the church, nor to baptize, nor to make the oblation (offerre), nor discharge any of the offices allotted to men (virile munus) (Tert. de Vel. Virg. c. 9), and is indignant at the forwardness of women who take upon themselves to teach and to baptize contrary to the express command of the Apostle (id. De Nuptiis, c. 17). The Constitutions (iii. 9) emphatically deny the right of women to baptize, asserting that priestesses are ordained for female duties, and are a heathen, not a Christian institution; and that if Our Lord had wished them to baptize, he would himself have been baptized by his own mother rather than by John the Baptist. The latter argument is also used by Epiphanius, who says that if Our Lord had ordered women to exercise any priestly or ecclesiastical ministry, he would first have given that office to the Virgin Mary (Haer. 79, cap. 3).

V. Celibacy.—It is evident that the ordination of deaconesses included a vow of celibacy. The council of Chalcedon (c. 15) pronounces an anathema against those who should marry after having been ordained to the diaconate. And Justinian's legislation ordered that those who married should be sentenced to forfeiture of property and capital punishment (Norcell. vi. 6).

VI. Discontinuance.—It is probable that this occasioned the discontinuance of the order. Certainly it did not last long. The council of Laodicea, A.D. 320, forbade the appointment of any of those who were called ἡγετοὶ Βαρβάρης (Conc. Laod. c. 11). The 1st council of Orange (c. 26), A.D. 441, simply forbids the ordination of any deaconess whatever; and again, "Viduarum consecrationem quas diaconas vocitant ab omni regione nostrâ penitus abrogamus" (Conc. Episc. c. 21).

The 2
that d accom Nudson on rec appear comm rome, t
Church
the Eng
in 17 deacon ministe ministry, Thomass
the Wes (Vet. et that it
of Const
i. l. 3, c.
The ti times to 19), and et Nov.
DEAL
DEAL
The th
a commo an indivi those who sacrament that it, a tages to unseen w last jour and its r allusion t Basilius scope of the exere strange c presented of the Ch period su Chrysosto
have been to the prof the body m er, that a table liter words in t that St. Pa which they and does n practice its that a feeli spring up was more o out hope" to the Thes spring out before the from all par
dom. So it where. Men admitted to pledge not o of resurrect become of t were cut off

19) describes the church erected by his father as having συναλ δίδροποι. The church of St. Sophia was similarly surrounded with porticoes, except towards the east, on which side they were usually wanting (Procop. de Aedif. lib. i. c. 8, lib. v. c. 6), and which were of two stories towards the west (Ducange, Constantinopolis Christiana, lib. iii. c. 16, 17). The "deambulatoria" sometimes contained altars (Ducange sup. roc.). The term is also used for the walks of a cloister, "deambulatoria claustrorum." [CLOISTER.] [E. V.]

DEAN. [DECANUS.]

DEATH, REPRESENTATIONS OF.—

Though symbolic images involving the thought of death are by no means rare in early Christian art, they have reference almost entirely to the state of death, rather than the process, so to speak. They point to the condition of the restored soul, rather than to the painful separation of body and soul. Thus the thought and representations of death are generally without terror. The Pausing of Lazarus [LAZARUS] is repeated (Bottari, passim) as an earnest of the Lord's power: the Resurrection accompanies the Crucifixion in early art, as in the Laurentine M.S. Flowers are freely used to decorate tombs, with little change from their Pagan employment; and the bird set at liberty, the palm-branch, the car or chariot at rest, and the ship at anchor (see s. vv.), occur the two first passim, the others occasionally. Herzog (Real-Encyc., s. v. "Sinbilder") states that the skeleton figure of death, in its retrospective view, pointing to the change from the life and pleasure of this world is traceable to remains of Gnostic symbols. The writer of this article can remember no earlier instance of it, than Giotto's crowned skeleton at Assisi. (See Crowe and Cavalaselle's Italian Painters, life of Giotto.) Orgagna and, lastly, Holbein bring down this Gothic grotesque symbol of the visible change, and outer side of the subject, to modern days.

For the apparently Pagan Charlot of Death in the Catacomb of St. Praetextatus see Perret, Catacombes, &c., vol. i. pl. 72; also Bottari, vol. iii. 219. [R. St. J. T.]

DEBTORS. The Jewish law in reference to debts and debtors, and to the redemption of pledges, is very peculiar. That of the Christian Church has been mainly founded on the Roman, which, originally very harsh towards debtors (see Gibbon, c. xlv., &c.) under the empire was greatly mitigated in their favour. Thus by a constitution of Diocletian and Maximian (A.D. 294), it was expressly enacted that the laws do not suffer freemen to be compelled to become slaves to their creditors by reason of their debts (Code, bk. iv. Tit. ix. l. 12). Under the older law there had already been introduced in favour of the debtor the expedient of the bonorum cessio, something between our bankruptcy, and what a few years back was distinguished from it as insolvency (see Dig. bk. xlii. Tit. iii.). It was a question among the jurists whether, if a man had once given up all his goods to his creditors, any after acquired property of his was subject to their claims. Sabinus and Cassius would have held free (Ibid. l. 4), thus assimilating him to the bankrupt. Ulpian took a middle, and it must be said, an unwise course, holding that the liability depended on the quantum of the subsequent earnings, and that he was not to be disturbed in the possession of anything left or given to him by way of charity for his maintenance (Ibid. l. 6). Modestinus also held the liability to attach, if the property were sufficient to justify the action of the praetor (Ibid. l. 7). Under the Code, by a constitution of Alexander Severus (A.D. 224), the debtor was not held free from his debt till the creditor was paid in full, but the cessio bonorum exempted him from imprisonment and from torture (bk. vii. tit. lxxi. ll. 1, 8). It was in the option of the creditors to allow the debtors five years' delay instead of accepting the cessio, such option to be exercised, in case of difference of opinion, according to the figure of the debt, so that a single creditor whose claim should amount to more than the sum total of all the others had the fate of the debtor in his hands (l. 8; Const. of Justinian). An attempt having nevertheless been made to make the cessio compulsory on the debtor, the 135th Novel forbade this.

Debtors were under the Christian emperors admitted to the right of sanctuary in churches and their precincts, Jews only excepted, who pretended a wish to become converted in order to frustrate their creditors, and who were not to be admitted until they had paid all their debts (Code, bk. i. t. xii. l. 1 ff.), although the public imposit might be levied within the churches themselves, and if the collectors were subjected to violence or seditious opposition, the defensores and oeconomi of the Church were made responsible for the fiscal dues not collected (Novel 17, c. 7); but otherwise it was expressly enacted by a constitution of the Emperor Leo, A.D. 466 (bk. i. t. xii. l. 6), that the bishops and oeconomi were not to be held responsible for the debts of persons claiming sanctuary.

We may moreover observe in the 60th Novel a law forbidding creditors to torment their dying debtors or their families, place their seals upon the property, or interfere with the funeral, under severe penalties (c. i.); and in the 115th another which forbade the pressing by creditors of the heirs, parents, children, wives, husbands, aunts, cognates, connexions or sureties of a deceased debtor within nine days of his death, the delay not to be reckoned as time running for prescription nor otherwise to prejudice the creditor (c. v.). The 134th Novel forbids a custom which it speaks of as prevalent in various places, that of detaining a debtor's children as pledges, or as slaves or servants for hire, under penalty of forfeiture of the debt, damages to an equal amount, and corporal punishment (c. vii.). As to debts due to bankers, see the 136th Novel, and 7th Edict of Justinian.

Under the Ostrogothic rule in Italy, the Edict of Theodoric required debtors condemned by judicial sentence to pay within two months, under pain of the sale of their pledges (c. 124). Where, however, a creditor seized the goods of one who was not under obligation to him, he was to pay fourfold the value, if sued within the year, otherwise simply to restore the amount seized; and so of the fruits of land (c. 131). Under the Lombard law, on the contrary, by practice of seizing the person of the debtor the way of pledge seems to reappear, although the liability is confined to himself and his golphans, or nearest future heir (Laws of Rotharis, c. 149;

A.D. 638 or generally in the

It is not sur-ally interfering conversely by tuante, where effect for the classical assu-

forms the subje-

letter, address-

appealed to re-

by his kindness

taken sanctuary.

An Irish Syntury (450 or 460)

of fraudulent d-till they paid tend of the 7th

(trixil) "of deb-another (xxiii.)

is however no

meats like this

of Ireland.

From the let-590-603) we obdition of debtor-

towards the end

7th century, and towards them, and iii. 43) are oc-named Cosmas, a

ing to his account

as pledges for li-

ious to benefit.

Several other in-

in the same col-

to Secundinus, in favour of one Sin-

to pay the debt.

Epist. vii. pt. 2.

TCARY; USURY.

DECALVATU

p. 472.]

DECANATUS

district of a rural monastic grange,

DECANIA, t

[p. 539] temp. Cain later times also (Du Cange).

DECANICIUM

TOTAL STAFF BORT

stantinople on so

him in the first ins

Theodosius, s. v.).

l. i. 85) states that was a silver mace.

DECANICUM

canobis), an ecclesolis or demorio

ment in which crim-

by their bishops rious. The word is tabernacle official-of the church—w-

false etymology it another form, dia-

justified by the fac-

ordered ecclesiastic sequent earnings, and arbed in the possession a to him by way of (Ibid. l. 6). Modest to attach, if the property the action of the r the Code, by a converus (A. D. 224), the from his debt till the out the cesso honorum onment and from tor-l. 8). It was in the allow the debtors five pting the cesso, such case of difference of figure of the debt, so claim should amount of all the others had is hands (l. 8; Const. pt having morever sio compulsory on the bade this.

e Christian emperors sanctuary in churches ily excepted, who pre-converted in order to and who were not to d paid all their debts although the public within the churches debtors were subjected osition, the defensores ch were made responcollected (Novel 17, expressly enacted by roy Leo, A. D. 466 (bk. bishops and oecomeni for the debts of ible in the 60th Novel a torment their dying place their seals upon with the funeral, under in the 115th another g by creditors of the es, husbands, agnates, urities of a deceased by his death, the delay running for prescrip-ices the creditor orts a custom which in various places, but dren as pledges, or as under penalty of fines to an equal amount,

 c. vii.). As to debts 136th Novel, and 7th rule in Italy, the d debtors condemned y within two months, their pledges (c. 124). r seized the goods of igation to him, he was e, if sued within the to restore the amount fints of land (c. 131). on the contrary, by erson of the debtor the appear, although the self and his gophans, es of Rotharis, c. 149;

DECALVATIO

A. D. 638 or 643). Little, however, is found generally in the barbaric Codes on the subject.

It is not surprising to find the Church occasionally interfering either by spiritual penalties, or coarsely by kindly assistance to the unfortunate, where the municipal law failed to take effect for their relief. A signal instance of ecclesiastical assistance to a debtor is that which forms the subject of Augustine's 215th or 268th letter, addressed to his congregation, to which he appealed to repay Maedonius, who had suffered by his kindness to one Pascius, a debtor who had taken sanctuary.

An Irish Synod of the middle of the 5th century (450 or 456) enacted the excommunication of fraudulent debtors, as if they were heathens, till they paid their debts (c. 20). In the collection of Irish canons, supposed to belong to the end of the 7th century, there is a whole book (xxiii.) "of debts and pledges, and usury," and another (xxviii.) "of sureties and rates." There is however no reason for supposing that enactments like this ever took effect beyond the limits of Ireland.

From the letters of Gregory the Great, (A. D.
 590-603) we obtain some glimpses of the condition of debtors at the heart of Christendom, towards the end of the 6th and beginning of the 7th century, and of the behaviour of the Church towards them. Two of his letters (Epist. ii. 56 and iii. 43) are occupied with the case of a Syrian named Cosmas, a poor debtor, whose sons, according to his account, were detained by his creditors as pledges for his debts, and whom he was anxious to benefit.

Several other instances to the same effect occur in the same collection. A letter (Epist. v. 35) to Secundinus, bishop of Thormina, is written in favour of one Sincerus, whose wife was pressed to pay the debts of her late father. See also Epist. vii. pt. 2, 37 and 60. Compare SANCTU-ARY; USURY. [J. M. L.]

DECALVATIO. [CORPORAL PUNISHMENTS,
 p. 472.]

DECANATUS = 1. the office of dean; 2. the district of a rural dean; 3. sometimes a farm or monastic grange, in late charters. [A. W. H.]

DECANIA, the district under a DECANUS [p. 539], temp. Car. Calvi. The word was used in later times also for a monastic farm or grange (Du Cange). [A. W. H.]

DECANICUM (Δεκανίκιον). The PAS-TORAL STAFF borne before the Patriarch of Constantinople on solemn occasions; delivered to him in the first instance by the emperor (Suicer's Theaurus, s. v.). Panciroli however (P. ex-novo
 l. 85) states that the decanicium (or decanitium) was a silver mace. [C.]

DECANICUM, DECANIA, or DECANICA (Δεκανικόν) an ecclesiastical prison, carcer canonici-cels or domerito un d'imus, a place of confinement in which criminous clerks were incarcerated by their bishops and other ecclesiastical superiors. The word is derived from the decani, the subordinate officials—the βαββούχοι or lictors of the church—who were the jailers. By a false etymology it is sometimes written δικανικόν.
 Another form, δικανικόν, also found, may be justified by the fact that the sacristy and other named ecclesiastical buildings sometimes served the purpose of a prison. Cf. the letter of Pope Gregory II., A. D. 731-741, to the Emperor Leo Isaurus, in which, comparing the mercy of the ecclesiastical with the severity of lay rulers, he says that when one of the clergy was proved to be worthy of punishment, instead of hanging or beheading him, the bishop hung round his neck the gospels and the cross, and imprisoned him in one of the treasuries or diaconica, or catechumena of the church (Labbe, Concil. viii. p. 25). The word decanicus is not unfrequently met with in early times; e. g. in the petition of Basil the deacon to the Emperor Theodosius, complaining of the cruel indignities he and his friends had been subjected to at the hands of Nestorius (Acta Concil. Epliac. pars i.

DECANUS

 c. 30, § 3 et passim; Labbe, Concil. iii. 425-431).
 "They had been stripped and beaten, and led off half-naked to the decanicum, where they were detained without food, and again beaten by the decani."

The Decanici are named among the buildings of which heretics were to be deprived, in a decree of Arcadius and Honorius (Justin. Cod.
 lib. i. tit. v. c. 3); and in the Novells of Justinian (lxxix. c. 3, p. 211) we find a decree addressed to Meenas, Archbishop of Constantinople, ordering that officers venturing to execute a sentence of secular courts on clerics should be imprisoned in the so-called decanica (καθεργεσθησαν εν τοις καλουμένοις δεκανικοις). [E. V.]

DECANUS (in an ecclesiastical sense) =

I. A member of a guild, whose occupation was that of interring the dead [COPIATAE]: reckoned among clerici by St. Jerome, Epiphanius, the Cod.
Theodos., &c.; called also κονιαρις (Epiphanius), fossarius (Pseudo-Jerom., De VII. Ord. Eccl.), lecticarius (Justinian, Novel. xliii. Præf.), collegiatus (in the laws of Honorius, &c., Justinian, Theodosius the Great), decanus (same laws; and Collect. Const. Eccl. in Biblioth. Jur. Canon.
 p. 1243). The office was apparently instituted by Constantine at Constantinople, where it numbered in his time 1100 members, but was afterwards reduced to 950; but then again increased by the Emperor Anastasius, who also endowed it (Justinian, Novel. xliii. lix.; Cod. lib. iv. De Sacrosanct. Eccl.). From thence it spread to "other populous churches." The poor were to be buried by its members gratuitously, at least where it was endowed (id. Novel. lix.). The dekanoi mentioned by St. Chrysostom (Hom. xlii.) were a different, and a civil, body of officials, attached to the emperor's palace.
 (Bingham, Du Cange, Meursius, Suicer.)

II. A presbyter appointed to preside as the bishop's deputy over a division of his diocese; called at first archpresbyter (Thomasin, l. iii. 66, § 14; Daussey, p. i. § 2), with the epithet of vica-nus (Conc. Turon. II. c. 19, A. D. 567; Brun's Canones, ii. 229), to distinguish him from the urban archpresbyter or protopope, and succeeding under that name to some of the functions of the older cherepiscopus; originally in the Church of France:—first called Decanus, and his district Decania,—(setting aside a canon, wrongly attributed to the Council of Agde, A. D. 505, but really of the date of Charles the Great, acc. to Daussey, and two questionable canons respectively of Conc. Tolet. V. A. D. 636, and VII. A. D. 644)— later than about the time of Charles the Great

(see Capit. Car. Calvi, tit. v. § 3; Conc. Tolos. A.D. 843, c. 3; Hincmar, Opp. i. 738, c. A.D. 878); called also decanus ruralis (e.g. in Conc. Trever. A.D. 948, c. 3), magister (by Hincmar, v. Conc. Gallie. III. 623), decanus episcopi (when introduced into England, a step perhaps facilitated by the existence of the civil division into tithings, about A.D. 1052, in Lejg. Edc. Confess. xxxi., and see Du Cange, and Carpentier's Supplem. to Du Cange), decanus Christianorum (in a charter of A.D. 1092, ap. Du Cange), and commonly afterwards decanus Christianitatis, probably as having to do with courts Christian, i. e. with the bishop's courts. The developed functions of the office belong to a period later than that to which the present work relates. In Ireland, the peculiar institution of the court became mixed up with that of plébana, or rural dean. Beyond the British isles and France, the office does not seem to have existed. (Dansey, Horæ Decanice Kurales, 2nd edit. 1814; Du Cange; Spelman.)

III. The chief officer of a cathedral, decanus ecclesie cathedralis, as distinguished from the decanus urbanus and ruralis, or city and country arch-priests, after the chapter of the cathedral had become a separate and corporate body [CANONIC]. The office so entitled dates in its full development only from the 10th or 11th centuries, Normandy and Norman England being the countries where it first occurs, Rouen having a dean in the 10th century, and the Dean of St. Paul's, A.D. 1086, being the first English dean. But as a cathedral officer, the decanus dates from the 8th century, when he is found, after the monastic pattern, as subordinate to the præpositus or provost, who was the bishop's vicegerent as head of the chapter. The arrangement still survives, after a fashion, in the relative positions of the provost or head, and of the dean, in Oxford and Cambridge colleges. The Council of Mayence, A.D. 813, substituted deans for provosts. And that of Aix la Chapelle, A.D. 817, subordinated the provost to the dean. A series of provosts, afterwards mostly converted into deans—at Canterbury until the time of Lanfranc, at Worcester A.D. 872-872, at Ely A.D. 878, at Lichfield A.D. 818-822, at Wells before A.D. 1088, at Beverley A.D. 1070, at several foreign cathedrals, and in some English collegiate churches—is given by Walcot (Cathedrati, p. 38). The change probably arose from the abandonment on the part of the provosts of the spiritual and internal direction of the chapter, through their attention to its temporal and external concerns. The functions of the dean are laid down, for the diocese of Lincoln, A.D. 1212, as sanctioned by Pope Alexander III. (Wilk. Conc. I. 535, 536), and for that of Lichfield A.D. 1194, by Bishop Nonant (ib. 497), and for that of Sarum, as adopted by Glasgow (ib. 741). But the office, in this full sense of the title, belongs to a period long subsequent to the date of Charles the Great.

IV. Deans of Peculiarities, and other special applications of the title of dean, belong also to a like later period. As does likewise the deanery of the province of Canterbury, attached to the bishopric of London. (Thomassin; Du Cange; Walcot's Archaeology and Cathedrati.) [A. W. H.]

V. Decanus Monasticus.—Among monks the office seems to have existed in Asia and Egypt, at least in a rudimentary form, from almost the very commencement of coenobitism; in subordination to the 'pater,' 'abbas,' 'hegumenos' or 'archimandrita' (Bligh. ib.). The 'decanus' was deputed by him to superintend the younger brethren, drilling them in self-denial and encouraging them to confess to him even their secret thoughts (Cassian, Instit. v. 8, 9). Especially he was to watch over the novices just emerging, their first year of probation being past, from the 'xenodochium' or strangers' room (ib. 7), setting them an example of obedience by himself obeying the 'præpositus' even in things impossible (ib. 10). Augustine speaks of the 'decanus' as having charge over ten monks (De Mor. Eccl. 31); Jerome, over nine; (Ep. 22 ad Eus'och.). The 'decanus' was to provide for the temporal necessities of his monks, for instance, by sending out to them the linen under-garments; (cf. Cass. Instit. iv. 10) to watch by night over their cells; to lead them to and from refectory; to assign to each the allotted task; and, at the close of the day, to hand over the work done to the 'oeconomus' or steward, who was to make a monthly report of it to the abbat (Jerome, ib. cf. Bingh. u.s.).

The great monastic legislator of M. Casino adopted cordially this important feature in coenobitism, prescribing more precisely the duties of the 'decanus,' and placing him next in rank to the 'prior' or 'præpositus.' Indeed, Benedict preferred deans to priors as less likely to collide with the supreme authority of the abbat (Reg. c. 65; cf. Conc. Agouat. I. 816, 11). All monasteries, except the very smallest, for the words 'major congregatio' are taken to mean any number over twenty (Mart. in Lep. S. Bened. 17), were to have deans, one for ten brethren. He was to have charge of his 'decima' in all things, with this proviso, "according to the precepts of the abbat" (Reg. 21). He was to be appointed not by seniority, 'per ordinem,' but by merit, at the choice of the abbat, or, according to some commentators, of the abbat and seniors (ib.). He was to hold office for an undefined period, one year or more (Mart. in Reg. 31-2), in fact, "quandiu se bene gesserit," but after three admonitions was to be deprived (Reg. 21). He was to guard the morals and conduct of the monks under his care, especially the dormitory (Reg. 22; cf. Reg. Magist. 11); and to hear their confessions (Reg. 46).

In subsequent adaptations of the Benedictine Rule the office of Dean is defined still more precisely. By the rule entitled 'Magistri,' his badge of office was to be a wand 'virga' or 'rover' a crook, symbolic of pastoral duties (Reg. Mag. 11, cf. Menard. in Conc. Reg. 28, 2). The same rule orders two deans for each decade of monks, to relieve one another, so that one or the other may be always with them (ib.). They were to preside at table in the refectory (ib.). By the rule of Fructuosus, the dean is to keep watch over the younger monks, even in minute points of deportment, to receive their most secret confessions, and to delate impatient offenders to the abbat or prior (Reg. Fruct. 12). By the council of Aachen, in 817, the eldest in rank of the deans is to superintend the other deans (Conc. Aquigr. 55).

According to Menard (in Reg. S. Bened. 21), the practice of the Reformed Benedictines as to the office of dean has varied considerably. With the Cistercians it has been unknown (ib.). With the monks temporalitatum prof. Du Ca. of M. Cassi. to the abbards, the revived (according to a 'foris deca' the monast. caas operi people; in a 'villici' or the 'decan' some'tmes (ib.) In a correspondi of the wor (ib.).

See, also III. tract v. tionnaire d. Maillane, L.

For the g of 'decanus CANONICI.

DECIMA

DECRET

DECRET

DECRET

DECRET

DECRET

DECRET

DECRET

DECRET

DECRET

DECRET

DECRET

DECRET

DECRET

DECRET

DECRET

DECRET

DECRET

DECRET

DECRET

DECRET

DECRET

DECRET

DECRET

DECRET

DECRET

DECRET

DECRET

DECRET

DECRET

DECRET

DECRET

DECRET

DECRET

DECRET

DECRET

DECRET

DECRET

DECRET

DECRET

DECRET

DECRET

DECRET

ater, 'abbas,' 'heguta' (Biugh. 6). by him to superintend drilling them in themselves to confess to him (Cassian, Instit. v. 12). as to watch over their first year of probation 'xenodochium' or setting them an example obeying the 'praepositus' (ib. 10). Augustina as having charge over (ib. 31); Jerome, over (ib. 10). The 'decimus' was moral necessities of his ending out to them the (ib. Cass. Instit. iv. 10) to assign to each the close of the day, to the 'aeconomi' or like a monthly report of (ib. of. Biugh. u.s.). legislator of M. Casino important feature in were precisely the duties being him next in rank (ib. 10). Indeed, Benedict as less likely to collude (ib. 1. 810, 11). All monasteries, for the words taken to mean any number (ib. S. Bened. 17), were brethren. He was to 'minia' in all things, with to the precepts of the was to be appointed not 'm', but by merit, at the according to some com- and seniors (ib.). He a undefined period, one in Reg. 31-2), in fact, 'rit,' but after three ad- (ib. 21). He was the conduct of the monks the dormitory (Reg. 22; to hear their confessions; ions of the Benedictines as defined still more pre- entitled 'Magistri,' his be a wand 'virga,' or of pastoral duties (Reg. Conc. Reg. 28, 2). The ones for each decade of other, so that one or the ch them (ib.). They were the refectory (ib.). By the dean is to keep watch, even in minute points of their most secret confes- sioners offenders to the (ib. 12). By the council the eldest in rank of the other deans (Conc.

(in Reg. S. Bened. 21), rmed Benedictines as a ried considerably. With en unknown (ib.). With the monks of Clugni, the deans administered the temporalities of the monastery, being the 'villarum provisoris' or 'suffraganei Prioris' (ib. of Du Cange, Glossar. s.v.). With the monks to the abbat (of. Altezer. Ascetic. ii. 9); but afterwards, the original institution of deans was revived (Menard. 6). In some monasteries, according to Du Cange (Glossar. s.v.), there was a 'foris decanus' to look after the interests of the monastery, outside its walls; in some a 'decanus operis' or 'operariorum' over the work-people; in some, the tenants under the monastery, 'villici' or 'coloni' were called 'decani.' Hence the 'decania' or 'decanatus' came to mean sometimes a grange belonging to a monastery (ib.). In nunneries there were officials, 'decimae,' corresponding to the 'decani' in the older sense of the word, to maintain order and discipline (ib.).

See, also, Haefteni Disquisitiones Monasticae III. tract. vi. disquis. 4, Antverpiae, 1644. Dictionnaire du Droit Canonique, par Durand de Maillane, Lyon, 1776, 1786.

For the growth and development of the office of 'decans' in cathedral-monasteries see under CANONICAL. [I. G. S.]

DECIMAE. [TITHES.]

DECRETE. [DECRETUM.]

DECRETAL. As has been observed in a previous article [CANON LAW], a decretal in its strict canonical sense is an authoritative rescript of a pope, in reply to some question propounded to him, just as a decree is an ordinance enacted by him, with the advice of his cardinals, but not drawn from him by previous inquiry.* The very word therefore implies power and jurisdiction. Hence, though from the 4th century downwards epistles of the Bishops of Rome are extant,† the earlier specimens do not come up to the full canonical idea of decretals, inasmuch as they possessed, when issued, a moral weight rather than a legislative force. They are thus spoken of by Gieseler:—"Another source of influence to the Roman bishops was the custom of referring to them particularly, as the head of the only apostolic Church of the West, all questions concerning the apostolic customs and doctrines, which in the East were addressed indiscriminately to the bishops of any church founded by an apostle. This gave them occasion to issue a vast number of didactic letters (epistolae decretales), which soon assumed a tone of apostolic authority, and were held in high estimation in the West, as flowing from apostolic tradition." (Gieseler, Ch. Hist., Second Period, chap. iii.)

As the papal power became firmly established, such epistles acquired more and more force, until at length they occupied the position tersely expressed by the canonist Lancelottus in later

* Decretalis epistola est, quando Papa ad consultationem ulcuius respondet: sive solus, sive de consilio fratrum. . . . Decretum est, quod Papa de consilio fratrum, nulla consultatione facta, super aliqua re statuit, et in rescriptis restitit. . . . Constituitur est quod Papa proprio motu statuit, et in rescriptis restitit, sine consilio fratrum et nulla consultatione facta.—Hustensius, Aurea summa, Proem. 14.

† As regards the 3rd century, see Phillips, p. 6, and Bickell, l. 35, note. Constantine is the only Pope of whom any letters of that date remain.

days—"Decreta Pontificum Romanorum canonibus conciliorum pari potestate exaequantur" (lib. i. tit. 3). Conversely, also, the papal power itself was mainly indebted for its development to the canonical doctrine of decretals. For it was the collection of forged decretals put forth by the Pseudo-Isidore which chiefly persuaded the world that the popes had from the most primitive times been in the habit of issuing authoritative rescripts; and this being once admitted, it followed that they must still have power to act in a like manner.† Moreover, the pretended decretals were so full of assertions of the papal prerogatives, that when they were once accepted as genuine and valid, they were a sufficient justification for the issue of any subsequent document of the same sort, however extravagant. As the collection of the Pseudo-Isidore did not appear until the middle of the 9th century, it lies beyond the period to which the present work is confined. But some notice of it is required on many grounds. It contains numerous alleged decretals of very early popes, the spuriousness of which must be pointed out. It gave the chief support to the canonical idea of a "Decretal," and therefore enables us to show that that idea in its full development is probably later than 800 A.D. It contains several decretals taken from the older collections of Dionysius and of the Spanish Church, and therefore gives us occasion to notice that the idea in question, though not fully matured, was not unknown at an earlier period. It may be convenient therefore briefly to indicate the character and contents of the work.

It commences with nearly sixty letters of various Bishops of Rome, from Clement to Melchisede. These are all fictitious, and are all (according to Heinschius, cxxxi.), with the exception of two letters of Clement (which are in whole or in part more ancient forgeries) the work of the Pseudo-Isidore.

Then follow various conciliar decrees, with which we are not here concerned, but many of which are unauthentic. In a third part we have again decretals of popes down to Gregory II. In this series the first that is genuine is that of Siricius to Himerius or Eumerius, Bishop of Tarragona.‡ Among those that follow, some are to a certain extent genuine, or, at all events, have been taken, with more or less exactness, from existing records. Others, on the contrary, are either the invention of the compiler, or have been compounded by him out of some existing materials, or, lastly, were forgeries found ready to his hand.††† Everywhere, however, unwar- ranted alterations and additions are to be found,

* The work is considered by Heinschius to have appeared between 817 and 853, A.D. It has been usual to trace its origin to the province of Mayence, but Heinschius attributes it to that of Rheims. The author is not certainly known (see Heinschius, cxxvii. and cxxix. et seq.). By some he has been identified with Benedictus Levita; but, according to Heinschius, he only availed himself of materials found in the collection of Benedictus. (Heins. cxliii.)

† With this the original collection of Dionysius began.

†† Alfama makes 39, Phillips 35, false decrees in this part of the work. It is hard to say with precision how many of the forgeries were previously in existence. On this point the careful analysis in the preface of Heinschius should be consulted. See also Phillips, p. 63, Bickell, l. 35, note. It is impossible to condense the results.

wholly spurious letters being apparently mixed with those that have some title to be deemed authentic.¹ It thus appears that the work is not a pure, unminged forgery. It rests in part on older collections. These are the Hispan collection, the so-called Hadriano-Dionysian collection (or Codex Hadrianus), and some other works of less importance. Of these some account has been already given under a previous head [CANON LAW], and it is therefore unnecessary to repeat it here. As there mentioned, the work of Dionysius (subsequently sanctioned by Pope Hadrian) was the first which placed the papal epistles side by side with the decrees of Councils. This seems to have been the important step. From this time an opening was given to contend that they were on a par, and the wide circulation which the work obtained very materially assisted the pretensions founded on it. Then came the Spanish collection, which yet further contributed to invest the papal epistles with a legislative, as distinguished from a moral, authority in the Church. It carried on the series further than Dionysius had done;² and at length, in the 9th century, the appearance of the work of the Pseudo-Isidore (so called to distinguish him from the Isidore to whom the Spanish collection is attributed), with its crowd of fictitious epistles which an uncritical age received in implicit faith, put into the hands of the popes the greatest weapon which they have ever wielded. The result therefore is that previously to the year 800 A.D. the foundations were really laid for the superstructure afterwards raised; but it was chiefly due to the subsequent work that that superstructure attained its vast proportions and peculiar character. For the forgeries invented by, or enshrined in, that work, not only vastly increased the number of papal epistles, and carried them back to primitive times, but were directly framed with a view of supporting the highest claims of the Roman see. There is little or nothing in the genuine epistles which could be made the foundation of many of the later papal claims, whereas the fictitious decretals furnish a basis for the largest pretensions. It was for this reason that they were brought at once into prominence, and that from the time of their appearance decretals, as distinguished from other sources of ecclesiastical law, play so large a part in the works of the canonists.

¹ As an indication that the learned of all communions are substantially agreed at the present day as to the character of the work as a whole, it may not be uninteresting to cite the following summary of the work from the Benedictine notes to the Bibliotheca Canonica of Ferrari, edit. 1835: (stated to be published "Superioris permissu et privilegio.") Under the title "Cronones" the collection of Pseudo-Isidore is thus spoken of:—"Continet collectio præter quinquaginta Canones Apostolorum ex Hadriano collectione, epistolæ Romanorum Pontificum a Clemente usque ad Silvestrum, quarum omnium hinc Isidorus auctor fuit, exceptis duabus Clementis ad Jacobum Ileritæ; tum octones plurim conciliorum, in quibus falsa habetur constitutio Constanti ad Silvestrum; postremo Pontificum Ileritæ ab ipso Silvestro ad Gregorium M. aliis cum epistolis ac monumentis, quarum pars ex aliis collectionibus sumpta vera est; quæ et Romana, præter epistolas omnes Pontificum Siciliæ antiquiorum ab Isidoro confectas, exceptis S. Damasi ad Paulinum Ileritæ, pars altera cum actis concilii Bononiæ sub Julio et Concilio I. V. et VI. sub Symmacho, excoisitata et inventa est." See another account, also from a Roman Catholic point of view, in Phillips' Du droit Ecclésiastique, chap. I. § 8.

² Phillips (p. 29) seems to think that some decretals purporting to proceed from the earliest pope had been added to the collection of Dionysius at the end of the 7th century, thus carrying the series backward also, and paving the way for Pseudo-Isidore.

"The false decretals," says Milman (Lat. Christ. book v. chap. 4), do not merely assert the supremacy of the popes—the dignity and privileges of the Bishop of Rome—they comprehend the whole dogmatic system and discipline of the Church, the whole hierarchy from the highest to the lowest degree, their sanctity and immunities, their persecutions, their disputes, their right of appeal to Rome.^b They are full and minute on church property; on its usurpation and spoliation; on ordinations; on the sacraments, on baptism, confirmation, marriage, the Eucharist; on fasts and festivals; the discovery of the cross, the discovery of the reliques of the apostles; on the chrism, holy water, consecration of churches, blessing of the fruits of the field; on the sacred vessels and habiliments. Personal incidents are not wanting to give life and reality to the fiction. The whole is composed with an air of piety and reverence: a specious purity, and occasionally beauty, in the moral and religious tone. There are many axioms of seemingly sincere and vital religion. But for the too manifold design, the aggrandisement of the see of Rome and the aggrandisement of the whole clergy in subordination to the see of Rome; but for the monstrous ignorance of history, which betrays itself in glaring anachronisms, and in the utter confusion of the order of events and in the lives of distinguished men—the former awakening keen and jealous suspicion, the latter making the detection of the spuriousness of the whole easy, clear, irrefragable—the False Decretals might still have maintained their place in ecclesiastical history.¹

Authorities.—Gieseler, Text Book of Eccles. History; Heinschius, Decretales Pseudo-Isidorianæ et Capitula Anselmi, Lipsiæ, 1863, which is now probably the standard work on the subject; Bickell, Geschichte des Kirchenrechts, Giessen, 1843; Milman, Latin Christianity; Phillips, Du Droit ecclésiastique dans ses Sources; Woltner, Kirchenrecht. [B. S.]

DECRETUM, DECRETALE. The letter of the clergy and people of a city, sent to the metropolitan and the provincial bishops, signifying the election of a bishop of their city [BISHOP, p. 220], whom they require to be consecrated; equivalent to τῆς χειροτονίας τὸ ψήφισμα (Palladius, Vita Chrysost. p. 39). Gregory of Tours (Vita Marci, c. 13, in Du-Roi's edition) says that in the choice of Mauritius the electors could not "in unum venire decretum." A form for such a letter is given in the Ordo Romanus Vetus, under the title, "Decretum quod clericus et populus firmare debet de electione episcopi." The proper form of one addressed to the pope himself is given in the Liber Diurnus Pon-

^a It has been thought by Giffrier that one motive of the fraud was to beat down the power of the metropolitans over the bishops, by making that of the pope greater and more immediate in its nature over all the clergy. See Milman's note, ibidem.

^b It should perhaps be added that in this article the strict canonical sense of "decretal" has been taken. The word, like other ecclesiastical terms, is sometimes used in a looser and more general sense.

off. Romm. c. follows (p. 5) designatio episcopi et the forepart of the one was the vacant see bishop; if the bishop had been the decision of his tion for consec forms of Decree be found in and in Ussher 40.

DEDICATIO CHURCHES: P

DEDICATIO

no. The o dedication order

custom of the

It was natural connected with the

tion should not

By a very intere secration was church, or con

within its wa

Nid. Machab.

church. By an

as the day of barely Briles

these anniversa same joyous fe birthdays and having their in Christians were exposed continu

any outward poi

benighted populat

with peril, assum in their period earliest instance

such anniversa

"the Great Mart

Calvary, and con

of this solemn de

the Christian wor festival was held attended by immen

only but of stran

lib. ii. c. 26). In anterior to the wards the middle pages of these a

Gregory Nazianzen

να τῆς ἡμέρας παλα

νοῦτο οὐκ ἄνευ ἀπ θῆναι τῶν περιηγο ντων (Greg. Naz.

lib. i.). Two centu

Feix IV. c. A. D. 53

such anniversaries eight days, "sole ecclesiarum per sing

(Epistolæ ad Episcopos

The temple of Ch

Dedication (John x.

the people for eight

the Temple, I King.

authorities for this management of the

lff. Romm. c. 3, p. 54. In the same place there follows (p. 56) a "Decretale, quod legit diocesis designato episcopo." The difference between this and the foregoing Decretum appears to be, that the one was sent by the hands of some official of the vacant see immediately on the election of the bishop; if thereupon the pope gave his assent, the bishop became technically designatus, and a deacon of his church read the Decretale, and a deacon for consecration (Garnier, in loco). Several forms of Decretal on the election of bishops may be found in Sirmond's Council Gall. ii. 647 ff. and in Usher's Vet. Epist. Hibern., Epp. 25, 33, 40.

DEDICATION. [CONSECRATION OF CHURCHES: PATRON SAINT.]

DEDICATION, FESTIVAL OF (Εγκαλία). The observance of the anniversary of dedication arose contemporaneously with the custom of the solemn dedication of churches. It was natural that an epoch so intimately connected with the religious life of the congregation should not be allowed to drop into oblivion. By a very intelligible metaphor the day of consecration was considered the birthday of the church, or congregation meeting for worship within its walls. St. Leo (Sermo lxxxii. in Natal. Machab.) calls it the "dies natalis" of the church. By another metaphor it was regarded as the day of the church's espousals to her heavenly Bridegroom. Most naturally therefore some joyous feelings and outward festivities as birthdays and wedding-days. These celebrations having their first origin in the time when the Christians were a poor and barely tolerated sect, exposed continually to persecution, and when any outward pomp attracting the notice of the heathen population around would be fraught with peril, assumed a character of magnificence in their period of security and opulence. The earliest instance on record of the observance of such anniversaries is in the case of the church of "the Great Martyr" erected by Constantine on Calvary, and consecrated A.D. 335. In memory of this solemn dedication, the most magnificent the Christian world had yet witnessed, a yearly festival was held for eight days at Jerusalem, attended by immense crowds not of the citizens only but of strangers from all parts (Soz. H. E. lib. ii. c. 26). But the custom was certainly anterior to this, for not many years later, towards the middle of the 4th century, the observance of these anniversaries is spoken of by Gregory Nazianzen as "an ancient usage," εγκαλιαν ημεραβαν παλαιος νθος και καλως εχων και παρο ουχ επαξ ελλαδ και πολλαδας, εκαστης του εναιου περιρωτης την αυτην ημεραν εταγωνοντες (Greg. Naz. In Locum Dominicam. Orat. lxxxii.). Two centuries later it was laid down by Felix IV. c. A.D. 530, as a law of the Church that such anniversaries should be solemnly kept for eight days, "solemnitates vero dedicationum ecclesiarum per singulos annos sunt celebrandae" (Epistola ad Episcopos, Labbe, Council. iv. 1655). The example of Christ attending the Feast of Dedication (John x. 22), and of Solomon feasting the people for eight days at the Dedication of the Temple, 1 Kin. viii. 65, 66, were adduced as authorities for this observance. At the commencement of the next century we find the first indication of the revelry with which these festivals were subsequently disgraced, and which made them a by-word for scandalous licence. Gregory the Great writing to Mellitus when proceeding to join Augustine in England, A.D. 601, after retracting the advice previously given that the heathen temples should be destroyed, and recommending their purification and conversion into Christian Churches, proceeds in a similar spirit to advise that the popular festivals formerly held on these consecrated sites should not be wholly discontinued, but that "as some solemnity must be conceded as a compensation," they should be transferred to the anniversaries of the day of dedication, or the nativities of the martyrs by whose relics the churches were hallowed. On these days he recommends that huts or arbours should be erected, about the transformed temples, in which after "killing cattle to the praise of God in their eating, they should celebrate the solemnity with religious feasting" (Greg. Mag. Epist. ad Mellitum, Had-dan and Stubbs, vol. iii. p. 37; Bele, lib. i. c. 30). In other places Gregory alludes to the eagerness with which the country folk flocked together to these festive celebrations, and the mixed crowds that were attracted by the good cheer (Greg. Mag. Homil. in Evang. xiv.; Epist. lib. i. 52, 54; Vita, c. 37. See also Sidonius Apollinaris, Epist. lib. iv. ep. 15). Such gatherings of half-leavened pagans inevitably assumed a character of gross licence entirely at variance with their sacred intention. Dramatic representations were performed, drinking was prolonged to intoxication, and singing and dancing were continued far into the night. In fact they were characterized by all the revelry and licentiousness of a village fair, which in so many cases is the lineal successor of the dedication festival, changed only in its externals. These gross scandals were not allowed to pass un-reproved. The serious attention of bishops and councils was directed to them, and earnest attempts were made for their suppression. The 19th canon of the council of Châlons, A.D. 650, is directed against the custom (the prohibition indicates the practice) of bands of women singing foul and obscene songs, "turpia et obscena cantilena," at the perches or choirward walls on the dedication festivals (Labbe, Concil. vi. 391 [compare DANCING]). But so thoroughly had these licentious festivals established themselves, that their authoritative condemnation proved idle, and they lived on in defiance of prelates and councils.

Gavanti lays down (Theol. Sacr. Rit. § 8, c. 5) that the Feast of Dedication is a festival of the first-class, of greater dignity than that of the Patron Saint or the Titularity of the Church. The reason for this superiority is assigned by St. Thomas Aquinas (lect. 5 in Joann. c. x.) because the dedication festival is a commemoration of the benefits conferred on the whole church, which exceed those given to any individual saint. The Feast of Dedication is a "duplex majus" and has an octave. If it happens to coincide with any greater festival the consecrator, or afterwards the bishop of the diocese, may transfer the anniversary to some Sunday, or any other day convenient for the large attendance of the country people (Gavanti u. s.; Bellarmin, de cultu sanctorum, lib. lii. c. 5, de dedicatione et consecra- into prominence, and appearance decretals, sources of ecclesiastical in the works of says Milman (Lat. o not merely assert the dignity and privilege—they comprehend and discipline of from the highest to city and immunities, putes, their right of full and minute an usurpation and spoliation of sacraments, on baptism, the Eucharist; on convey of the cross; of the apostles; on creation of churches, field; on the sacred personal incidents are a reality to the fic-titious with an air of pious purity, and occasional and religious acts of seemingly sin-ful for the too manifold of the see of Rome the whole clergy in Rome; but for the story, which betrays aims, and in the utter events and in the lives of former awakening, the latter making conscious of the whole the False Decretals their place in eccle-

Text Book of Eccles. includes Pseudo-Isidorian, Lipsiae, 1863, standard work on the de des Kirchenrechts, Latin Christianity; litique dans ses Sources; [B. S.]

ETALE. The letter of a city, sent to the provincial bishops, a bishop of their city they require to be con- τρις χριστορας το Chrysos. p. 39). Greg. rit. c. 13, in Du-nico of Manritius the num venire decretum."

is given in the Ordo title, "Decretum quod debet de electione epi- of one addressed to the Liber Divinus Pon- er that one motive of the power of the metropolitans at of the pope greater and over all the clergy. See ed that in this article the "etal" has been taken. The verus, is sometimes used in so under APPEAL. And Seville (Hispid. II. A.D. to restore the older practice) bishop acting in iudicio honorari daret potest. The rule however that three bishops were to try a deacon, six in the case of a bishop, and of the province indeed which could depose a priest also. In which clergy were to be taken for granted that penalty for all such impious excommunication. But in addition to these, as against clerical disciplinarians attached the like duty, having recourse to the law, as e. g. after Easter, &c. The 38th canon (deposes for negligence). See BISHOP, PRISBYTER.

There have been some ceremonies of such a nature, the details of later customs in early times, and date in the Roman Pontifical of the 8th century. Martene (iii. c. 2) has collected earlier practice. Libesius his earliest instance, the later practice was in itself, that something of the rule from the first, was conferred with the ring to each order, vestments, and with the vestments, there could natural symbol of the than the taking away ornaments and vestments. Liberatus, according to, by taking away his mitre, later ceremonial in the face's bull given, solemnly takes away, or each, and this is the secular judge, or on some ending by scraping the degraded clerk, to signify of unction and blessing, proceeded to share his name words as well as acts, gaining may likewise be e. g. Socrates, II. E. i. 24, of Eustathius). Regular are of a late date. They are and in Böhmert, as there still followed in and cases, confirmation, as, may be seen in e. g. the clerk being still canonical law, although now

DEICOLAE

(Bingham, xvii.; Martene, De Ant. Rit. Eccl. lib. iii. c. 2; Böhmert, Jus Eccles. Protest. lib. v. tit. xxvii. § 974, tom. v. pp. 715-766.)

[A. W. H.]

DEICOLAE (compare COLIDEI). A name sometimes applied to monks, as in the Epistle of Martin of Braga to King Miro, in D'Achery's Spiœlogium, iii. 312 (Ducauge, s. v.). [C.]

DEI GRATIA. The bishops of the Church, regarding themselves as called to their office by the will of God, have from ancient times been in the habit of using formulae implying a divine call. Thus Pope Felix II. (A.D. 358) calls himself "per gratiam Dei episcopus" (Hardouin, Concil. i. 737). Aurelius says that he holds his office "dignatione Dei" (C. Carth. iii. c. 45; A.D. 397). Other bishops used equivalent expressions, as "Dei" or "Christi nomine, misericordiae, misericordiam." The German bishops have used, from the 7th century onward, the form "Dei gratia," to which in later times some such phrase as "apostolice sedis gratia" or "providentia" was added. Zailwein (Principia Juris Eccl. iv. 278) believes this addition not to be earlier than the middle of the thirteenth century, and Thomassin (Vetus et Nova Eccl. Discip. pt. I. bk. i. c. 60, § 10), will not allow that it was used in Germany before the beginning of the fifteenth; but the germ of it is certainly found in the writings of Boniface, the apostle of Germany, who styled himself "servus apostolice sedis" (Hartzheim, Concilia Germaniae, i. 43).

A similar style was adopted by secular persons of exalted rank; thus Agilulf on his crown (CROUN, p. 508) is described as "Gratia Domini . . . Rex totius Italiae" (A.D. 591); and Rothar (A.D. 643), in his Edict for the Lombards (Walter, Corpus Juris Germanici, i. 683), speaks of himself as "in Dei nomine rex, anno, Deo propitiante, regni mei octavo." In England, Ethelbert of Kent, in a charter of the year 605, styles himself, "Aethilbertus Dei gratia Rex Anglorum" (Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 55), Ethelbald (A.D. 716) styles himself "divina dispensatione rex Merciorum" (Cod. x Dipl.). From the days of Pepin the form "Dei gratia" seems commonly to have been adopted by the Frankish kings. Charles the Great (A.D. 769) adopted the following style and title: "Carolus gratia Dei rex regnique Francorum rector et devotus sanctae ecclesiae comes atque adiutor in omnibus apostolice sedis" (Pertz, Monum. Germaniae, iii. 33). Selden, Tiles of Honor, in Works, iii. 214; Allen, Royal Prerogative, p. 22, ed. 1849; Herzog, Real-Encyclop. d. Lit., iii. 312. [C.]

DEITIES, PAGAN. [PAGANISM IN ART.]

DELATORES. [INFORMERS.]

DELEGATED JURISDICTION. [JURISDICTION.]

DELEGATUS. [LEGATE.]

DELPHINI. [CORONA LUCIS, p. 461.]

DEMERITORUM DOMUS. [DECANIA.]

DEMETRIA, daughter of Faustus, martyr at Rome under Julian; commemorated June 21 (Mart. Rom. Vet., Adonis, Usuardi). [W. F. G.]

DEMETRIUS. (1) Martyr at Thessalonica, A.D. 296; commemorated Oct. 8 (Mart. Rom. Vet., Adonis, Usuardi); Oct. 26 (Cal. Byzant.).

DEMONIACS

(2) Bishop and martyr of Antioch with Ananias, Eustasius, and twenty others; commemorated Nov. 10 (Mart. Hieron., Usuardi).

(3) Saint; commemorated Dec. 22, with Honoratus and Florus (Mart. Usuardi, Adonis in Appendice).

(4) Patriarch of Alexandria, A.D. 231; commemorated Magabit 12 = March 8 and Tekemt 12 = Oct. 9 (Cal. Ethiop.).

(5) "Demetrius et Basilus," commemorated Nov. 12 (Cal. Armen.). [W. F. G.]

DEMOCRITUS, Saint, at Siandaa in Africa; commemorated July 31, with Secundus and Dionisius (Mart. Hieron., Usuardi). [W. F. G.]

DEMON (IN ART). The evil spirit is always represented in early Christian art as the enemy and tempter of mankind under the form of the serpent, excepting in the Laurentian MS. [DEMONIAC] and in the singular diptych (in Gori, Thesaurus, t. iii. tab. viii.) which represents the cure of a demoniac. As Martigny observes, these cases are in all respects exceptional; but they are probably the earliest works of art in which the devil or any inferior evil spirit is represented in the human form. [But see DEVIL.] It might be expected that as the form of Job occurs frequently in early carvings and paintings (Bottari, tavv. xv. cv.; Perret, i. xxv. &c.) some representation of the evil one as an agent of torment might be found with him; but this seems not to be the case. The figure of the SERPENT (see s. v.) accompanies most representations of Adam and Eve in Bottari and elsewhere; his head is generally turned towards Eve. The first known instance of the human-headed serpent as tempter is found in the Catacomb of St. Agnes (Perret, ii. pl. Al.), if the painting be of the same date as the catacomb. This point involves great difficulties, which time and inquiry seem rather likely to aggravate than to diminish. For the Serpent threatening the Doves see DRAGON; and Gori, Thesaurus, Diptych. iii. p. 160. [R. St. J. T.]

DEMONIACS. The Church inherited from both Jews and heathens the belief that demons, i. e. "unclean" or "evil" spirits, could take possession of the bodies and the souls of men, women, children, and subject them to a cruel bondage. The history of our Lord's miracles naturally tended to confirm and deepen the belief. Abnormal physical or mental states, which could not be otherwise explained, were referred to demoniacal possession as a sufficient cause. From one point of view, indeed, it was held as a dogma that every child born into the world was thus under the power of an evil spirit, of the chief of evil spirits, and from an early period a formula of exorcism was employed as a preliminary rite to baptism, and the work of exorcism and exorcist was thus brought into close connection [BAPTISM; EXORCISM]. In the present article, however, it is proposed to deal only with those in whom the condition was more or less chronic, and who were brought therefore under a continuous course of treatment.

It is clear from the narratives of the New Testament, and from the records of the Church, that the class consisted chiefly though not exclusively of those who in our own time would be classified as insane. They were known as the δαμονισμένοι, the N. T. name more frequently as the ἐνεργούμενοι (energumeni), men operated on, exercised by, unclean spirits, less frequently as χειμαζόμενοι (hyemantes)^a or κλιδαυζόμενοι, those who are tossed to and fro by the storms and billows of uncontrollable impulse. The boundary-line between mental and moral disorder is at all times difficult to trace, and the name is at times extended, as by the Pseudo-Dionysius (de Eccles. Hierarchy. iv. 3), to those who were the slaves of lust or other master-passions, probably to those in whom the moral evil assumed the character of a possession, overpowering the ordinary restraints of prudence and self-control. For the most part, however, the energumeni, as demoniacs, may be identified with those who suffered from some form of insanity. The symptoms described by Cyprian, sleepless nights, panic fears, restless agitation (de Idol. Vanit. p. 239); the outward appearance of the demones as portrayed by Chrysostom (Hom. De incomprens. Not. Dei), squalid, foul, with hair dishevelled, and in rags, all point to the same conclusion. It is not within the scope of this article to discuss the theory which referred all these phenomena to an actual possession of the human nature by a malignant spiritual power. It is enough to say that it was postulated in the whole treatment of such cases by the Church. The suggestion of a more scientific view that the symptoms originated in excess of bile, or the inflammation of a tissue, or other physical cause, was rejected as the whisper of unbelief, itself the suggestion of the demons, who wished thus to deprive men of the prayers and incantations which were the only effectual weapons against them (Hom. Clem. ix. 12). Men dwell with exultation on the power which their prayers, and the utterance of the Divine Name, and the laying on of hands, had to drive the demon howling and blaspheming from his usurped abode (Cyprian, de Idol. Vanit. l. c.; ad Demetr. c. 15). It might have seemed, looking at the matter from the modern, scientific standpoint, as if the Christian Church had itself got into a hopelessly wrong groove, from which no good results were to be expected, which tended to stereotype the delusions that fed the madness, and were utterly at variance with any rational treatment. It will be found, however, it is believed, that partly in spite of the theory, partly in consequence of it, the treatment of the insane in the early ages of the Church assumed before long a true therapeutic character, and brought them under influences which tended, in the natural course of things, to bring them to a sound mind. Cases of instantaneous expulsion of the demon, like those described by Cyprian, became less frequent; and, where the mastery of a strong will had for a time calmed a paroxysm of frenzy, were followed by a relapse. Putting aside the case of the symbolic or hypothetical exorcism which preceded baptism, we have to think of the energumeni as brought, by virtue of the theory, within the range of sympathy and care. Instead of being left, as in most eastern countries, to go wild, like the Gadarene and ^a The word χειμαζόμενοι and its Latin equivalent are sometimes explained as pointing to the position which the demoniacs occupied in the outer porch of the church, exposed to the inclemency of cold or rain. The meaning given in the text rests, however, on better authority. Comp. Suicer, s. v. χειμαζόμενοι.

other demoniacs of the N. T., when the insanity was not dangerous, or to be brutally chained and fettered if it was, they were marked out as objects of pity and of special prayer (Const. Apost. viii. 7). They occupied a fixed place in the porch of the church, and so were brought within the soothing influence of psalms and hymns and words of comfort (Dionys. de Eccles. Hierarchy. iv. 3). With them, as fellow-sufferers, might sometimes be found the lepers of the neighbourhood; sometimes also those whose leathsome depravity had made them defiled like the leper, and incapable of human society like the demoniacs (C. Anagor. c. 17). When the prayer was over they were brought to receive the benediction of the bishop (Const. Apost. viii. 7). The church itself became a kind of home for those who otherwise would have been homeless. There the exorcists paid them a daily visit, and gave them food, and laid their hands upon them (4 C. Carth. c. 90, 92). There, if the nature of the case required it, they were brought under a discipline of abstinence that might subdue the impulses of passion (Hom. Clement. ix. 10). There they were employed in industrial tasks that were suited to their condition, such as sweeping the pavement of the church (4 C. Carth. c. 81) or lighting its lamps (C. Elib. c. 37).^b If they were in the status of catechumens they might be admitted to baptism at the hour of death, even though there had been no complete cure (Const. Apost. viii. 32; Cyprian, Epist. 76; 1 C. Arvadic. c. 15; C. Elib. c. 37). If they were already among the faithful they might even, if the insanity did not take a violent form, be admitted to communion (Cassian, Collat. vii. 30; Timoth. Alex. Respons. c. 3), and that daily. It is almost needless to say that they were excluded, even after recovery, from ordination. The exorcists were instructed to repeat their prayers and other forms of adjuration memoriter (Isidor. Hispal. Epist. ad Landefred.). They were often identical with the entechists, and were therefore more or less experienced in the work of teaching (Balsamon on C. Laod. c. 26). The influence thus brought to bear upon the real or supposed demoniacs were, it is submitted, calculated to soothe and encourage, to bring them under the influence of sympathy. Even the ceremonial imposition of hands, over and above the sacramental associations connected with it, and their power to soothe the paroxysms of suicidal remorse, may have had what we have learnt to call a mesmeric effect, calming the over-excited brain, through the tones of pity, into something like tranquillity. It is not too much to claim for the Christian Church, whatever may be thought of its theory of madness, the credit of having taken some practical steps, and those steps the first, towards a rational treatment of the insane. Here, also, as in the institution of hospitals, love and pity were not without other fruits than those they sought for, and ministered to the attainment of a truth at which they did not aim. [E. H. P.]

DEMONIAC, HEALING OF (IN ART). One instance only is known to Father Martigny ^b The canons of the Council of Elvira cited in the text forbid the practice, probably on account of some inconvenient results; but the prohibition shows that it was common.

of a representation of the instances the youth at spirit issues the possessed

Our Lord hold His hand is extension. Another MS.; see woodc DENIS, COUSIN, near Paris' council of bishops shortly before 1 between his sons 1720, 1721.)

DENARIUS.

DENUNTIATION.]

DEO DICAT which persons who were designated. of Basle (Cyprian dicatae to meddle [compare DEYOT. Cagliari, describing says (in the tract. tortured and slew dicentes).

DEO GRATIA be to God!" A frequently occurring ancient times, derivative use of the ph 14). The best-known bably that in which people to the De, end of the liturgy.

According to the and Deo gratias, "naming of the passage" in the Lit phrase as being also of Amen, or Latus; CHRYST. ANT.

when the insanity brutally chained and marked out as obdurate prayer (Const. fixed a fixed place in and so were brought presence of psalms and (Dionys. d. Eccles. n, as fellow-sufferers, and the lepers of the also those whose loathem defiled like the mna society like the . When the prayer to receive the bene- (Apost. viii. 7), a kind of home for have been homeless, em a daily visit, and air hands upon them There, if the nature were brought under at night subdue the (Genet. ix. 10). There strial tasks that were such as sweeping the t C. Cuth. c. 91) or (ib. c. 37).^b If they chumens they might t the hour of death, en no complete cure ypprian, Epist. 76; 1 c. 37). If they were they might even, if a violent form, be ab- sion, Collat. vii. 20;), and that daily. It at that they were exclud- ordination. The ex- cept their prayers ion memories (Isid. i. 1). They were often es, and were therefore the work of teaching 26). The influence the real or supposed mittel, calculated to bring them under the Even the ceremonial and above the sacred- with it, and their xysms of suicidal re- we have learnt to call the over-excited brain, into something like o much to claim for tever may be thought the credit of having es, and those steps the treatment of the in- ne institution of hos- pe not without other ight for, and misin- a truth at which they [E. H. P.]

ING OF (IN ART) a to Father Martigny of Elvira cited in the text in account of some locution shows that it was of a representation of this miracle; it is one of the instances of single sufferers, perhaps that of the youth after the Transfiguration. The evil spirit issues in human form from the head of the possessed (Gori, Theo. Pitych. t. lii. tab. viii.).

Our Lord holds a cross on His shoulders and His hand is extended using the Greek benediction. Another example is in the Laurentian MS.; see woodcut. [R. St. J. T.]

DENIS, COUNCIL OF ST. (ad S. Dionysium, near Paris), A.D. 708, was rather a national council of bishops and nobles, at which Pipin shortly before his death divided his kingdom between his sons Carl and Carloman (Labb. vi. 1720, 1721.) [A. W. H.]

DENARIUS. [PETER'S PENNY.]

DENUNTIATIO MATRIMONII. [MARRIAGE.]

DEO DICATUS. One of the terms by which persons who devoted themselves to religion were designated. Thus Hatto or Alhito, bishop of Basle (Capitulae. c. 16) forbade even Deo dicatae to meddle with the service of the altar [compare DEVOTA FEMINA]; and Lucifer of Cagliari, describing the conduct of his enemies, says (in the tract Memendum esse, etc.) that they tortured and slew even dedicated persons (Deo dicatae). [C.]

DEO GRATIAS. Τὸ θεῷ χάρις, "Thanks be to God!" A response of the people, frequently occurring in divine service from very ancient times, derived no doubt from the apostolic use of the phrase (1 Cor. xv. 57; 2 Cor. ii. 14). The best-known instance of its use is probably that in which it forms the response of the people to the Te, missa est of the priest at the end of the liturgy.

According to the Mozarabic rite the people said Deo gratias, "Thanks be to God," at the naming of the passage to be read as the "Prophecy" in the Liturgy. Bona mentions this phrase as being also occasionally used instead of Amen, or Latus tibi Christe when the Gospel was ended (De Reb. Liturg. ii. vii. 4). St. Augustine notices it as a common mode of greeting among the monks in his time, for which they were ridiculed and insulted by the Agonistici, as they called themselves, among the Donatists (Aug. in Psa'm. cxxii. p. 630). The expression appears to have been frequently used on other occasions by way of acclamation. When Evodius was nominated as Augustine's successor the people called out for a long time—"Deo gratias, Christo laudes" (Aug. Ep. 110, de Actis Evodii). [C.]

CHRIST. ANT.

DEPORTATIO. One of the usages of the Gallican Church was that a bishop on his way to be enthroned was borne in a chair by the hands of his fellow-bishops. Thus Wilfrid of York, who was consecrated in Gaul, is said (Vita by Eddius, c. 12) to have been borne to his throne by the hands of the bishops who were present, "more eorum," i.e. after the Gallican custom [Bishop, p. 225]. Gregory of Tours perhaps alludes to this custom when he says (Hist. Franc. iii. 2) that the assembled bishops and people placed (locaverunt) Quintianus in the episcopal throne of Clermont. A "chairing" of the bishop on the shoulders of certain persons of rank, the first time he entered his cathedral, was customary in several of the French churches in the middle ages (Martene, De Ant. Eccl. Litibus, l. viii. 10, § 19). [C.]

DEPOSITION. [DEGRADATION.]

DEPOSITION, IN HAGIOLOGY (Depositio). The word depositio is explained in the sermon of Maximus, De Depositione S. Eusebii (in the Works of Ambrose, ii. pt. 2, p. 469) to mean, not the day of burial, but that on which the soul lays down the burden of the flesh; and it is probably with this idea that it is used in calendars and martyrologies. For instance, in the Mart. Hieron. we have on March 21 "Depositio Benedicti Abbatris;" in the Mart. Bedae on the same day, "Natule Benedicti Abbatris," as if Depositio were exactly synonymous with Natule, which confessedly means the death-day of a saint.

Yet on July 11, the day on which the Translation of St. Benedict is placed by Bede and Ade, the Mart. Hieron. has again Depositio. We may infer that the word was at least occasionally used to designate the day on which the relics were entombed.

Papebroch, in his Conatus Chronologico-Histor. ad Catal. Pontif. Romn. (Acta Sanctorum, May, vol. iv.), contends strongly that Depositio is used for the day of death; Levitico, Cultus, or Translatio for that of burial.

In early calendars the word Depositio is said to be confined to bishops [CALENDAR, p. 256]. (Binterim's Denkwürdigkeiten, vi. pt. 3, p. 370 ff.) [C.]

DEPRECATORIAE. In an ancient codex quoted by Duacange (s. v.), litterae deprecatorie are explained to be simple "letters of request" given by presbyters, who were unable to grant the formal "dimissory letters" (formate) of bishops. [COMMENTATORY LETTERS; DIMISSORY LETTERS.] [C.]

DEPRIVATIO. [DEGRADATION.]

DEPUTATUS (Δεπουτάτος). The Greek Church distinguishes between persons properly in orders, set apart for a certain work by the imposition of the bishop's hands, and those merely nominated to certain offices without imposition of hands. Deacons, subdeacons, and readers belong to the former class; to the latter, those who discharge purely subordinate offices under the direction of the clergy; as the Theori, who have the charge of the sacred vessels and vestments; the Cantisti [CAMISIA], who attend to the thuribles and water-vessels in the service of the altar; and the Deputati. The office of the latter is, in processions to precede the deacon who bears the Book of the Gospels, or the oblations, carrying lighted tapers, and, also, if necessary, to clear the way for the bishop through the crowded church. (Permaneder in Wetzer and Welte's Kirchenlexicon, iii. 107, who quotes Morinus, De S. Eccl. Ordinationibus, pt. ii. p. 66, ed. Antwerp, 1695).

These Deputati thus corresponded with the Crozierarii or Cerostatarii of the Latin Church; and in the form of their appointment (Gear's Euchology, p. 237) their office is said to be that of bearing the lights in the holy mysteries. See ACOLYTE. [C.]

DESCENSUS. A word sometimes used to signify the vault [COXPRESSIO] beneath the altar containing relics of saints. Anastasius, for instance (Hist. Eccl., an. 5 Leonis Isaur.), uses it as equivalent to the cardines of Theophanes, from whose he is compiling. [C.]

DESECRATION OF CHURCHES AND ALTARS (Execratio). So infelicitable a character of holiness was thought to be stamped upon a church or an altar by the act of consecration, that nothing short of destruction, or such dilapidation as to render them unfit to serve their proper ends, could nullify it (Barbosa, De Off. et Potest. Episcop. pt. ii.). A church might, however, be so polluted as to need RECONCILIATION (q. r.) by the perpetration in it of homicide or other revolting crime; and if the relics which had been deposited at consecration were removed, the church and altar lost this sacred character until these were restored; with the relics and the renewal of masses, the whole effect of consecration returned (Vigilius, Pope 538-555, Ad Euthorim, Epist. ii. c. 4). Gregory of Tours (Hist. Franc. ix. 6) mentions an instance in which a church, in consequence of a homicide having been perpetrated in it, lost the privilege of Divine Service (officium perdidit). Compare CHURCHYARD, SACRILEGE. (Martene, De Lit. Ant. ii. 284; Thomassin, Vet. et Nov. Eccl. Discip. i. 458). [C.]

DESERTION OF THE CLERICAL LIFE. Several centuries elapse before we find desertion of the clerical life recognized as an offence. The Council of Chalcedon in 451, enacts (c. 7) that those who have once been received into the clerus are not to desert it for any military service or worldly dignity. The Council of Angers in 453 declared (c. 7) that clerics who leaving their order have turned away to secular warfare and to a lay life are not unjustly removed from the church which they have left. The 1st Council of Tours, A.D. 461, has an equivalent provision expressed in somewhat clearer language (c. 5), specifically enacting excommunication for the offence. We have an instance of the practice by a Breton Council of uncertain date (supposed about 553), recorded by Gregory of Tours (Hist. Franc. ix. 15), in which a bishop, who let his hair grow and took back his wife, was excommunicated. Under Justinian's Code, by a constitution of that Emperor himself, A.D. 532, renewing and extending a previous one of Arcadius and Honorius, if a person deserted the clerical or monastic life for a military one (the term militia with its congeners, did not at this period imply necessarily the use of arms) he was punished by being made a curialis of the city of his birth, i.e. charged with all the burthens of the state. If there were already very many curiales in the city he was to be placed in any one neighbouring or remote one, or even in any one of a different province which should happen to be in special want of these political beasts of burthen. If he hid himself, the curiales could at once enter upon his property and detain it to answer legal demands (bk. i. tit. iii. l. 53 § 1). If, on the other hand, a clerk or monk embraced an ordinary secular life, all his property passed to the church or monastery which he had deserted (Ibid. l. 56, § 2)—a provision confirmed as to monks by the 5th Novel, c. 4. The 6th Novel, which extends the prohibition to subdeacons and readers, transfers the benefit of the forfeiture, as respects clerics,—if indeed there be anything to forfeit,—to the curia, providing moreover that if the clerk in question be poor, he shall be reduced to an official condition, i.e. probably to that of a mere servant to the public offices (c. 7); and this forfeiture to the curia is confirmed by the 123rd Novel, c. 15. But as respects monks, the same Novel (c. 42) requires a monk who betakes himself to a secular life—being first deprived of any office or dignity he may acquire—to be sent to a monastery, to which moreover it assigns all property acquired by him after his leaving his former one. If he absconds from this, the judge of the province is to hold and admonish him.

In a letter of Pope Zacharias (A.D. 741-51) to king Pepin, the Pope decrees that those who have once been admitted into the clergy, or have desired monastic life, are not to betake themselves to military service, or to any worldly dignity (Ep. 7, c. 9), under pain of anathema if they do not repent and return to their former life—a provision substantially identical with that of the Councils of Angers and Tours. In Charlemagne's Capitularies also is a provision "that a priest ought to continue in the religious habit" (Aditio Tertia, c. 110). See also the 31st canon of the Council of Frankfort in 794, "that clerics and monks should continue steadfast in their determination."

Desertion of the clerical life must of course be distinguished from desertion of the clerical functions in a particular diocese or parish. See, amongst other authorities, as to bishops leaving their districts (episcopatus), the so-called Apostolical Canons, c. 11 (otherwise 13 or 14), and the 123rd Novel; and as to presbyters, deacons, and other clerics so acting, Apost. Can. c. 12 (otherwise 14 or 15); also the 16th Canon of the Council of Nicea. One of the temptations to the breach of discipline in question appears to have been the serving in private oratories, as to which see Novels 57, 58, and 131. [J. M. L.]

DESIDE
for the sacr iana. Zeno quoted by E
"and desider

DESIDE
tyr at Lyon Adonis in A he suffered translated Fe

(2) Bishop (Mart. Adoni
(3) The Discipline, w commemorat Ad- vis, 1. 1

DEF ON;
MARR. GE.]

DESPOTI greater festi the Greeks;
amount to tw point. [FEST
iv. 235.]

DETRAC and unjust att another perso the latter is a of legal proce being cancell
This sin has as by St. Augu Jerome (Ep. 2 St. Chrysostom canons of coun under wider w against the St
A. 4. 6, 2, 10,
Thom. Aq. *Su
Just. et Jurc,* 5

DEUS IN A
Hours, accordi with the wor
V. Deus in a
R. Domine ac Cassinus (*Coll
verse was frequ rotions before that it was del before the time that use in his
The Roman u and response, V. Domine, In
R. Et os meum from the 51st monastic brevi Domine, labia tol
In Compline, I
V. Convertite n
R. Et avertite n from the 85th [8
The verse, "O also occurs in ing office.
(Bona, *De D Martene, De Ant. and Welte, *Kirch

DESIDERATA. A name sometimes used for the sacraments, as being desired of all Christians. Zeno of Verona (Facit. 8 ad Fontem, quoted by Duceage) asks why his hearers delay "ad desiderata festinare." [C.]

DESIDERIUS. (1) Bishop of Vienna, martyr at Lyons; Natale, Feb. 11 (Mart. Bedue, Adonia in Appendice, Usuardi). According to Ado he suffered martyrdom on May 23, and was translated Feb. 11.

(2) Bishop of Ferrara; "Passio" May 23 (Mart. Adonia, Usuardi).

(3) The tender, martyr at Naples under Diocletian, with Januarius the bishop and others; commemorated Sept. 19 (Mart. Rom. Fel., Bedue, Adonia, Usuardi). [W. F. G.]

DEFONSATIO. [ARRHAE; BETROTHAL; MARR. GE.]

DESPOTICAE (Δεσποτικά έστρα). The greater festivals of the Church are so called by the Greeks; they are generally reckoned to amount to twelve, but authorities vary on this point. [FESTIVALS.] (Daniel's Codex Liturgicus, iv. 235.) [C.]

DETRACTION is defined to be the concealed and unjust attack in words upon the reputation of another person. It differs from Calamnia in that the latter is a false accusation made in the course of legal proceedings, and from Contumelia in its being concealed from the person affected.

This sin has been condemned both by fathers, as by St. Augustine (in hom. 41 De Sanctis), St. Jerome (Ep. 2, al. 52, ad Nepotian. c. 14), and St. Chrysostom (De Sacerd. 5, 6), and by various councils (e.g. Cone. Carth. iv. cc. 55-60) under wider words which include other offences against the 9th commandment (Bingham, Chr. Ant. 6, 2, 10, and 16, 13, 3; Ferraris sub voc.; Thom. Aq. Summa, 2, 2. quæst. 73; Soto De Just. et Jure, 5, 10). [I. B.]

DEUS IN ADJUTORIUM. The canonical hours, according to Western usage, generally begin with the words of the 70th [69th Vulg.] Psalm.

V. Deus in adiutorium meum intende.
R. Domine ad adiuvandum me festina.
Cassian (Collatio, x. c. 10) tells us that this verse was frequently used by monks in their devotions before his time, but it does not appear that it was definitively prefixed to each Hour before the time of St. Benedict, who prescribed that use in his Rule (c. 8).

The Roman use at Matins prefixes the verse and response,

V. Domine, labia mea aperies.
R. Et os meum annuntiabit laudem tuam, from the 51st [50th Vulg.] Psalm; in the monastic breviaries, on the other hand, the Domine, labia follows the Deus in adiutorium.

In Compline, Deus in adiutorium is preceded by V. Convertite nos, Deus salutaris noster.

R. Et averte iram tuam a nobis, from the 85th [84th Vulg.] Psalm.

The verse, "O Lord, open thou our lips," &c., also occurs in the early part of the Greek morning office.

(Hona, De Divina Psalmodia, ch. xvi. 4; Martene, De Ant. Monach. Rit. pp. 5, 23; Wetzer and Welte, Kirchenlexicon, iii. 122.) [C.]

DEVIL. (IN ART.) The Early Church seems to have contemplated the spiritual enemy of God and man principally as to his functions of temptation and possession in this world. Representations of him as the final accuser and claimant of the souls of the lost, or as their tormentor in the place of his own condemnation, belong to mediæval rather than to primitive art. The present writer is not aware of the existence of any hell earlier than the mosaics of Torcello, as that painted by Methodius, even if its story be true, has altogether vanished. On the sarcophagi, and later in Anglo-Saxon and Irish MSS. more particularly, the tempter is symbolized, as so often in Holy Scripture, under the form of the SERPENT (see s. v.).

One instance there is, however, given by Didron in the Iconographie du Serpent (Ann. Archéologiques, v. 2) of a Gnostic combination of human and serpentine form, with leonine head and face (see woodcut). It is taken from a bronze in the Vatican collection, and is derived, he says with certainty, from the ancient Egyptian symbol of a lion-headed serpent. But the human form and expression are so predominant as to make it appear to be an anticipation of the personified serpent of the Middle Ages, represented in the Book of Kells and other northern MSS. The Gothic or mediæval representations seem to begin in Italy with the fiend in the Chase of Theodorice, which, till lately destroyed by gradual and wanton mischief, adorned the front of St. Zenone in Verona.

In the Laurentian MS. of Rabula (A.D. 587) there is an extraordinary representation of the demoniaes of Gadara, just delivered from their tormenting spirits, who are fluttering away in the form of little black humanities of mischievous expression. [See DEMONIAES.]

[R. ST. J. T.]
DEVOTA FEMINA, or simply DEVOTA. It need hardly be said that the practice of vows made to God is recognized in the Pentateuch, and throughout the Old Testament (Levit. xv. 16, xxvii. 1 and foll., Numb. vi. 2 and foll., xv. 3, 8, xxx. 2 and foll. &c.). Such vows might be of persons as well as things, as in the instance of the "singular vow" mentioned in Lev. xxvii., and of the Nazarites mentioned in Numb. vi.; with which compare the applications in the case of Jephthah, (Judg. xl. 30) Samson (Judg. xiii. 5) and Samuel (1 Sam. i. 11). Certain checks are at the same time imposed on the vows of women, which are required to have at least the tacit assent of a father, if the woman be "in her father's house in her youth" (Numb. xxx. 3-5), or of a husband, if she "had at all a husband" (ib. 6-8, 10-15); "but every vow of a widow, and of her that is divorced, wherewith they have bound their souls, shall stand against her" (v. 5).

IMAGE EVALUATION
TEST TARGET (MT-3)

Photographic Sciences
Corporation

23 WEST MAIN STREET
WEBSTER, N.Y. 14580
(716) 872-4503

0 1 2 3 4 5 6 7 8 9 10 11 12 13 14 15 16 17 18 19 20 21 22 23 24 25 26 27 28 29 30 31 32 33 34 35 36 37 38 39 40 41 42 43 44 45 46 47 48 49 50 51 52 53 54 55 56 57 58 59 60 61 62 63 64 65 66 67 68 69 70 71 72 73 74 75 76 77 78 79 80 81 82 83 84 85 86 87 88 89 90 91 92 93 94 95 96 97 98 99

10 11 12 13 14 15 16 17 18 19 20 21 22 23 24 25 26 27 28 29 30 31 32 33 34 35 36 37 38 39 40 41 42 43 44 45 46 47 48 49 50 51 52 53 54 55 56 57 58 59 60 61 62 63 64 65 66 67 68 69 70 71 72 73 74 75 76 77 78 79 80 81 82 83 84 85 86 87 88 89 90 91 92 93 94 95 96 97 98
99

The examples of St. Paul (Acts xviii. 23, 24), and the four disciples at Jerusalem (Acts xxi. 23) show that like practices were adopted by the Apostolic Church. But over and above these temporary vows, it is clear that the class of church-widows were considered as personally devoted to God. Moreover, in his mode of speaking of virgins, St. Paul clearly shews that he considers those who have authority over them to have power to "keep" them for the Lord (see 1 Cor. vii. 34, 37, 38). The Apostolical Constitutions, besides their abundant notices of the church-widows, shew us also the rise of a distinct class of church-virgins devoted to God in like manner. The term devota, however, as applied both to widows and virgins, survived both organizations and spread beyond them, and seems to serve as a transitional link between them and female monachism. From the 4th century downwards there are many texts which can hardly be applied, at all events exclusively, to either institute as such, and anticipate any organized female monachism, but which clearly imply a practice of self-consecration to God on the part both of widows and unmarried women, and which serve as the foundation of the practice of the Church in later times in respect to nuns.

Thus the first Council of Valence, A.D. 374, treating "of girls who have devoted themselves to God," exacts that if they voluntarily contract "earthly" marriage, they shall not even be allowed immediate penance, and shall not be admitted to communion till they have given full satisfaction. Now it was only in the 5th century that monachism, under the Basilian rule, penetrated into Southern Gaul, so that the puellæ in question cannot have been nuns properly so called. The same applies to the canons of the 1st Council of Toledo, A.D. 400, which enact that a "devota" who takes a husband is not to be admitted to penance during his life, unless she preserves continence (c. 16), or, with still greater severity, that if a bishop's, or priest's, or deacon's daughter, having been devoted to God, sins and marries, should her father or mother restore their affection to her, they are to be excluded from communion. The father may indeed shew cause in council against the sentence, but the woman herself is only to receive the communion after her husband's death and penance, unless at her last hour (c. 19)—a text which indeed admits the validity of the marriage.

The stamp was set on the woman's devotio by her taking, or rather receiving from the priest's hands, the veil, symbol of her being espoused to Christ. Hence the distinction which we find made between the gravity of marriage in the case of the veiled and unveiled; as to which see Pope Innocent I.'s 2nd letters, to Victricius Archbishop of Rouen, cc. 12, 13, and certain canons of doubtful authority, supposed to be contemporaneous "of the Roman to the Gaulish bishops," cc. 1, 2. The devotional or virginial habit might indeed be assumed, at all events in the 5th century, without actual consecration; see Leo the Great's 167th letter, A.D. 458 or 459, to Rusticus Bishop of Narbonne, c. 15.

The "virgin devoted to God" is assimilated to the monk in a canon of the Council of Chalcedon, A.D. 451, forbidding both to marry under pain of excommunication, but subject to the indulgence of the local bishop (c. 15). The 2nd Council of Arles, A.D. 452, seems to confine excommunication in such cases to marriage after 25, and provides that a penance is not to be refused if asked for, but communion only to be granted after long delay (c. 52). An exaggerated strictness on the other hand pervades a letter of Pope Symmachus (A.D. 498-513) to Bishop Caesarius, of Arles. Not only does he require the excommunication of those who have sought to marry virgins consecrated to God, whether with their own will or against it, and declare that "we do not suffer" widows to marry who have long persevered in the religious purpose; but he forbids those virgins to marry "to whom it may have happened to pass their age during many years in monasteries"—"enforcing, in short, virginity without even a profession.

The practice of the religious profession, both in convents and outside of them, is shewn in the Canons of the 5th Council of Orleans, A.D. 529, which excommunicates alike, together with their husbands, both girls who in convents have put on the religious garment, and those who, whether girls or widows, have assumed the habit in their houses (c. 19). On the other hand, the 1st Council of Macou in 581 pronounced excommunication for life against both parties, in case of such marriages.

Towards the end of the 6th or beginning of the 7th century, in the letters of Pope Gregory the Great (A.D. 590-604), we seem to perceive a distinction between the "religious" and "monastic" habit, which may have indicated that between the simple devota and the nun. Writing to the Roman exarch (bk. iv. ep. 18), he speaks of women till now "in the religious and monastic habit" who have thrown off the sacred garment and veil, and married, and who are said to be under the exarch's patronage, and warns him against the iniquity of such protection. It will not have escaped attention that the "veil" in this passage seems to correspond, as in later and present Romish practice, with the specially monastic profession. On the other hand, an earlier letter of the same pope (bk. iii. ep. 24, ad Constantinum), distinguishes between veiled virgins and women in convents. The incompatibility between marriage and the religious "habit" is indicated in another letter of the same pope to bishops Virgilius and Syagrius, (bk. vi. pt. ii. c. 119).

That in spite of all prohibitions, marriages with "religious" women continued to take place, and to be celebrated even in church, is evident from an edict of King Clothair II., issued at the 5th Council of Paris, A.D. 614 or 615. No one was to carry off religious girls or widows, who have devoted themselves to God, as well those who reside in their own houses as those who are placed in monasteries (thus clearly distinguishing between the two classes); and if any, either by violence or by any kind of authority should presume to unite such to himself in marriage, he was subject to capital punishment, or, under special circumstances to exile, and forfeiture of goods.

The 7th letter of Pope Zacharias (A.D. 741-51), addressed to Pepin as mayor of the palace, and to the bishops, abbots, and nobles of the Franks, refers to Pope Innocent's letter before men

mar
form only
the
(c. 4
with the re
of wi separ
the 7 those religi ceitri
but a muic and if eluded of 783
t. 1).

DE for the font n Histor.
Suidas,
Orig. b

DI
localit to the Each w seven d being un Each di charity, last rem coni hac city of ch each assi

The or trated by sius.—St feit Xen bus Dia Dionis
Hadi-firis port dispuisti aque cle § 345: " stituit. . . eorum red Christi refi

(2). The part of the pening foo employed 1 John, in w et exhibend and goes on conise exhi Ep. ad Jour
pian. de T

(3). In th was used fo ruil. 7; Gr was entrusted
); in the (Hartene in

DIACON Payers or " Dionica, a local bishop (c. 15). The 2nd d. 452, seems to confine such cases to marriage after that a penance is not to be, but communion only to be delayed (c. 52). An excommunicated other hand permits a nunachus (A. D. 498-513) to of Arles. Not only does he munition of those who have virgins consecrated to God, own will or against it, and do not suffer" widows to ng persevered in the religious forbids those virgins to marry have happened to pass their years in monasteries"—con-irginity without even a prothe religious profession, both side of them, is shewn in the Council of Orleans, A. D. 529, rates alike, together with their ls who in convents have put rment, and those who, whether ve assumed the habit in their On the other hand, the 1st n 581 pronounced excommuni-ainst both parties, in case of nd of the 6th or beginning of a the letters of Pope Gregory 30-603), we seem to perceive en the "religious" and "m-ich may have indicated that e de rotis and the nun. Writing ch (bk. iv. ep. 18), he speaks y in the religious and au- have thrown off the sacred gar- married, and who are said to h's patronage, and warns him of such protection. It will ntion that the "veil" in to correspond, as in later ac- ctice, with the specially me- On the other hand, an earlier pope (bk. iii. ep. 24, ad Con- es between veiled virgins and ts. The incompatibility be- the religious "habit" in er letter of the same pope to and Syagrius, (bk. vii. pt. ii. c.

of all prohibitions, marriages women continued to take place, even in church, is evident ing Clothair II., issued at Paris, A. D. 614 or 615. No ex- religious girls or widows, who selves to God, as well those own houses as those who are es (thus clearly distinguishing lasses); and if any, either by ny kind of authority should such to himself in marriage, capital punishment, or under- ces to exile, and forfeiture of of Pope Zacharias (A. D. 741-752) as mayor of the palace, ps, abbots, and nobles of the Pope Innocent's letter before mentioned, as to the distinction between the marriage of veiled and unveiled virgins, the former of whom are to be separated, the latter only to do "some" penance (cc. 20, 21). On the other hand, a capitulary of the 6th book (c. 411) treats as absolutely null a marriage with "a virgin devoted to God, a woman under the religious habit or professing the continuance of widowhood," re-enacting the punishment of separation and exile for the offenders. One of the 7th book (c. 338) is addressed to the case of those widows and girls who have put on the religious habit in their own houses, either receiving it from their parents or of themselves, but afterwards marry; they are to be excommunicated till they separate from their husbands, and if they will not, to be kept perpetually excluded from communion. A Lombard capitulary of 783, contains a like enactment (Pertz, Lep. t. 1).

DEXAMENE

DEXAMENE, Δεξαμένη, a cistern or tank for the water needed for the replenishing of the font and the various ecclesiastical offices (Procop. Hist. Arcan. c. iii.). Erroneously interpreted by Suidas, sub voc. of the altar; and by Bingham, Orig. bk. viii. c. vii. § 4, of the font. [E. V.]

DIACONIA. (1). The name given to the localities in which food and alms were distributed to the poor by the deacons of the Church of Rome. Each was under the administration of one of the seven deacons, one for each region, the whole being under the superintendence of an archdeacon. Each diaconia had a hall for the distribution of charity, and an oratory or chapel annexed. These last remained when the original purpose of the diaconia had passed away, and have risen to the dignity of churches, of which there are now fourteen, each assigned to one of the cardinal deacons.

The original purpose of the diaconis is illustrated by the following passages from Anastasius—Stephan. II. § 229: "foris inuros . . . duo fecit Xenodochia. . . que et sociavit venerabilis Diaconis illic foris existentibus . . . id est Diaconie S. Dei genetricis, et B. Silvestri dune." Hadrin. I. § 337: "constituit Diaconias tres foris portam B. Apost. Principis . . . et ibidem dispensatione pro ordine pauperibus consolari, atque eleemosynam fieri [constituit]." Infra, § 345: "alien egregius Praesul Diaconia constituit . . . concedens eis agros vineas etc. ut de eorum reditu . . . Diaconie proficientes pauperes Christi referentur."

(2). The word diaconia was also used for that part of the deacon's office which consisted in dispensing food and money to the poor. It is thus employed by Gregory the Great in a letter to John, in which he says, "te mensis pauperum et exhibenda diaconie eligimus praeponendum;" and goes on to speak of the money received "diaconie exhibitione erogandum" (Greg. Magn. Ep. ad Joann. 24). See Suicer, Ducange, Hospitium de Templis, p. 18. [E. V.]

(3). In the earlier days of monachism this term was used for monastic alms-giving (Cass. Collat. ruii. 7; Gregor. M. Ep. 22). The oldest monk was entrusted with it in Egypt (Cass. Collat. xxi. 1); in the East the "oecomenus" or hursar (Martene in Cass. ib. xxi. 8, 9). [I. G. S.]

DIACONICA (Διακονικά). Certain short prayers or "suffrages" in the Liturgy are called Diaconica, as being recited by the attendant deacon. They are also called Ερημικά, as being mainly prayers for peace. In the consecration of a bishop the Diagonica are said by Isthop. (Menard on the Gregorian Sacramentary, p. 523; Neale's Tetralogia Liturgica, p. 217.) [C.]

DIADEMA

DIACONICUM. (1) The vestry or sacristy of a church, so called from being the place where the deacons performed their duties in getting ready the vestments and holy vessels, heating the water, preparing and lighting the incense, and other essentials for the celebration of the Eucharist, and other divine offices. No minister of a lower grade was permitted to enter the Diaconicum (Counc. Laod. can. 21; Counc. Aquithens. can. 66). The diaconicum was, as a rule, placed on the right or south side of the bona or sanctuary, answering to the prothesis on the north, and communicating with the bona by a door in the parabona or side-wall. It also usually had an independent entrance through an external door. The diaconicum generally terminated apsidally, and was always provided with an altar (θυσιαστήριον, Απορθηγματιω Πατρων apud Gelas. No. 3; Άγια Πραξίς, Eucholog. Gonr., p. 245), on which the bread and wine were placed prior to their removal to the prothesis. Its wall was often adorned with pictures of saintly deacons, such as Stephen, Benjamin, &c. Within it was the treasury, κευθηλαρχεϊον, or σκευοφυλάκειον, where the sacred vessels and other treasures of the church were kept (Cyril Scyth. in Vita S. Sab. apud Ducange). It was also used by the priests as a vestry, in which they changed their vestments and put on their eucharistic dress (εισελθόντες δαδασουσι την ιερατικήν στολήν εν τῷ διακονικῷ, Τυρικήν Sabae, cap. ii. ap. Suicer). Relics were preserved in it (Citadel, Patriarch. Constantinopol. ap. Suicer). Worshippers who for disciplinary reasons were excluded from the actual church were permitted to offer their devotions here, e.g. the Emperor Leo VI. when excommunicated for his fourth marriage (Codrenus, Compend. Hist.). The diaconicum was sometimes a spacious chamber annexed to the church (diaconicum majus), large enough for the reception of a provincial or general synod (Cousset, p. 477). In the diaconicum of the church at Paneas, the statue, supposed to be that of the woman with the issue of blood, removed for safety from the market-place, was erected (Philostorg. lib. vii. c. 3).

Other names by which the diaconicum was known were, δοκαστικόν (as being the hall of reception), σκευοφυλάκειον, μετατόριον or μετατόριον (a word of various orthography and very uncertain etymology, perhaps representing "mutatorium," as the place where the clergy changed their vestments), παστοδόριον, secretarium, on which see Bingham, Orig. Eccl. bk. viii. c. vii. § 7; Leo Allat. De Templ. bracc. Ier., ep. i. § 13-15; Suicer, sub voc.; Ducange, Glossar. Id. Descript. S. Sophicæ, ad Paul. Silentiar.; Neale, Hist. East. Ch., General Introd. p. 191, § 9.

(2) Diaconicum also signifies the volume containing the directions for the due performance of the deacon's office, βιβλίον τῆς Διακονίας. Cf. Leo Allatius, Dissert. I. de Libr. Eccl. Græcor.

(3) The word is also used for certain prayers said at intervals in the service by the deacon: εὐχὰν διακόνου, known also as εἰρημικά. [DIACONICA.] [E. V.]

DIADEMA. [CROWN: CORONATION.]

DIAPASON, DIAPENTE, DIATESSARON. These are the three intervals of the octave, the perfect fifth, and the perfect fourth: the ratios which determine them are $\frac{1}{2}$, $\frac{2}{3}$, and $\frac{3}{4}$. They were the only intervals that were considered consonances, and were always of the same magnitude in every scale whether diatonic, chromatic, or enharmonic, while the others were variable (see CANON IN MUSIC, p. 274). Although the system of reckoning by tetrachords continued till the time of Guido Aretinus, yet the name Diapason shows that the ancients attributed to the octave a greater degree of perfection in respect of consonance, which is also shown by the notation preserved by Alypius, where in the modes above the Dorian in pitch, for most of the higher notes (which would be the latest extension of the respective scales) the symbols representing the notes an octave below were adopted with the addition of a acute accent. It is strange that this plan was not extended over the whole "diagram" of the modes, which would have been a very material simplification, and is indeed a considerable approximation to our present system of calling all notes differing by an octave by the same name. This however appears to have escaped the notice of the early Latin authors, although they did make great simplifications. St. Gregory completed the recognition of the octave by reducing the names of notes to 7, which have remained to this day.

The fifth and fourth together make an octave ($\frac{3}{2} \times \frac{4}{3} = 2$), and according as the former or the latter was the lower in pitch, the octave was said to be harmonically or arithmetically divided; these divisions were also called authentic and plagal (q. v.), thus:

Authentic:  Here the value of G (1) is the Harmonic mean between those of C and c (1 and $\frac{1}{2}$).

Plagal:  Here the value of F (2) is the Arithmetic mean between those of C and c (1 and $\frac{1}{2}$).

But it is worth noticing that if two harmonic means be inserted between C and c, F is one of them, which would point to the conclusion that the accents were wrong in taking an arithmetical division at all, though it is most natural that that error should have been made by them.

This division can be made in any octave, excepting that that from F to f can only be divided authentically at c, and that from B to b can only be divided plagally at E. [J. R. L.]

DIAPENTE. [DIAPASON.]

DIAPSALMA. This is the word used in the Septuagint and recognized by other writers as the equivalent to "Selah," which occurs in the Psalms and in the Canticle of Habbakkuk. See Smith's Dict. of the Bible, sub voc. Selah, where the obscurity of the subject is fully stated. As the early Christians used the psalms in public worship so it is natural they would copy the Hebrew method of singing the psalms. The Liturgy of St. James prescribes Pss. 23, 34, 145, 117 at the Fraction, and in Ps. 34 $\delta\acute{\iota}\psi\alpha\lambda\mu\alpha$ occurs in the LXX. where Selah is not found.

St. Jerome enters into the question at some length in his letter to Marcella, but leaves the matter in doubt; he mentions it also in his commentary on Ps. 4 and Habak. 3.

It appears to the writer that an interpretation suggested by the primary meaning of $\delta\acute{\iota}\psi\alpha\lambda\mu\alpha$ will nearly, if not quite, reconcile the conflicting opinions and perhaps account for them; viz., that it was a direction for the instruments to play, while the chorus was silent or perhaps producing a series of notes without words, i. e., a "division,"* or "Pneuma." It has been said that the Jews used Paemata; if so, the adoption of them by Christians is obvious; but in any case it would seem that they were commonly in use at an early period. In consequence of the common use of various musical instruments at feasts and entertainments at which Christian morality was likely to be outraged in the period of the empire, the Christians were chary of their use in religious services, fearful doubtless of the association of ideas. Sir John Hawkins (Hist. of Music, p. xxvii.) gives a list of fathers who have denounced musical instruments, but he gives no references; and the writer has succeeded in verifying Epiphanius only, who speaks of the flute as a diabolical instrument. In the Eastern Church to this day instrumental music is, we believe, unknown. Thus the Pneuma may have been invented by the early Christians as the nearest approximation to the Diapsalma. [J. R. L.]

DIARETOR. The Codex Eccl. Afric. (c. 78) runs thus (Brun's Canons, i. 175): "Rursus placuit, ut quoniam Hipponeusium directorum destitutio non est diutius negligenda is episcopus ordinetur." The equivalent Greek version is " $\phi\omicron\rho\omicron\upsilon\sigma\iota\sigma\alpha\iota\ \tau\eta\varsigma\ \epsilon\pi\iota\sigma\kappa\omicron\upsilon\pi\omicron\upsilon\sigma\iota\varsigma$," "caretakers of the church" [INTERVENTOR], as if during a vacancy of the see, which is implied in the concluding words of the canon. Ducange (s. v.) conjectures "directorum," Hardouin "diarhytorum." The word does not seem to occur elsewhere. [C.] DIASYLA, Διάστυλα, the CANCELLI by which the thema was separated from the moza (Sym. Thessalon. apud Ducange; $\delta\acute{\iota}\alpha\ \tau\omega\upsilon\ \kappa\epsilon\tau\epsilon\lambda\epsilon\delta\omega\upsilon\ \eta\tau\omicron\iota\ \tau\omega\upsilon\ \delta\iota\alpha\sigma\tau\acute{\upsilon}\lambda\omega\upsilon$). Gear's Enchir. p. 708. [E. V.]

DIATESSARON. [DIAPASON.]

DICE (Alex. κύβοι; Low-Latio, Decius; whence Fr. De). The playing at dice, or games of chance generally, never looked upon favourably by moralists or laws (see Dict. of Greek and Rom. Antiq., s. v. ALEA), early attracted the notice of the censors of Christian manners. The Paedagogus of Clement (lib. 11, p. 497) forbids dice-playing, whether with cubes or with the four-faced dies called αγρράβυλοι (see Rest u. Palm, s. v.), out of desire for gain. Apollonius (in Euseb. H. E. v. 18, 11), denouncing the Montanists, asks whether prophets play at tables (τάβλαις) and dice. And gaming is one of the forms of vice which we find denounced by the Church in the earliest canons which remain to us. The Apostolical Canons (cc. 41, 42 [al. 42, 43]) forbade either clergy or laity to play with dice

* "The tack makes sweet division."—Romans and Julia lib. 6.

into the question as soon as to Marcella, but leaves the mentions it also in his commentary Habak. 3.

writer that an interpretation of the primary meaning of $\psi\alpha\lambda\lambda\alpha\upsilon$ quite, reconcile the conflicting accounts for them; viz., action for the instruments to be used was silent or perhaps of notes without words, i. e., "Pneuma." It has been used Pneumata; if so, the Christians is obvious; but it seems that they were contemporary period. In consequence of various musical instruments and entertainments at which was likely to be outraged in empire, the Christians were in religious services, fierce association of ideas. Sir Isaac Newton (Philos. Transact. p. xxvii) gives who have denounced musical instruments as giving no references; and he is content in verifying Epiphanius of the flute as a diabolical instrument in the Eastern Church to this day. The music is, we believe, unknown. It may have been invented by some one as the nearest approximation.
[J. R. L.]

The Codex Eccl. Afric. (c. 78) Canon, i. 175; "Rursus in Hipponeusium dicertorum non est diutius negligenda ordinare." The equivalent is " $\sigma\theta\eta\tau\iota\sigma\tau\alpha\iota$ $\tau\eta\iota$ $\epsilon\kappa\epsilon\tau\epsilon\sigma\iota$ of the church" [Inter-fering a vacancy of the see, the concluding words of the canon (s. v.) conjectures "dicertorum" diarrhytorum." The word is elsewhere. [C.]

ἀσπίδα, the CANCELLI by which was separated from the πύξ Ducange; $\delta\iota\alpha$ $\tau\acute{\alpha}\nu$ $\kappa\iota\kappa\lambda\iota\sigma\tau\acute{\alpha}\nu$. Goar's Euchol. p. [E. V.]

N. [DIAPASON.]
; Low-Latin, Decius; whence at dice, or games of chance looked upon favourably by see Dict. of Greek and Rom. early attracted the notice of Christian manners. The Pseudo-Isid. 11, p. 497 forbids dice cubes or with the four- $\sigma\theta\eta\tau\iota\sigma\tau\alpha\iota$ (see Boet u. Palm, for gain. Apollonius (in 11), denouncing the heathen prophets play at tables. And gaming is one of the things we find denounced by the canon which remains to us. (cc. 41, 42 [al. 42, 43]) y or laity to play with dice on pain of degradation or excommunication. The Council of Eliberis (A.D. 305) also denounced the penalty of excommunication against any of the faithful who played at dice, "that is, tables," for money (can. 79). And at the end of the 7th century the Trullan Council (can. 50) repeated the same penalties of degradation and excommunication. Nor was the civil power indifferent. Justinian (Code, lib. 1, De Episc. et Cler. l. 17; Nov. 123, c. 10) forbade the clergy of every rank from playing at games of chance (ad tabularum ludere), or even being present at them, on pain of suspension with seclusion in a monastery for three years. Another enactment (Code, lib. 1, De Episc. Audien. l. 25) commits the investigation of such offences to the bishops, and empowers them to call in the secular arm, if necessary, for the reformation of scandalous offenders; and yet another (Id. l. 35), complaining bitterly that even bishops did not abstain from these stola pleasures, denounces such laxity in the severest terms. These imperial laws are all inserted in the Nomocanon of Photius and John of Antioch.

The laws themselves indicate that Christians and even clergy were by no means exempt from the almost universal passion for games of chance. One or two instances may serve to confirm this. Jerome relates (De Script. Eccl. in Apol. Ep. 105) that Synesius alleged his own irresistible propensity for gambling as a reason why he should not be made a bishop. Gregory of Tours (Hist. Franc. x. 16) tells us that certain monks of the convent of St. Radequand at Poitiers accused their abess, among other matters, of dicere; whereupon the abess declared that she had done the same thing in the lifetime of St. Radequand († 587) herself, and that it was not forbidden either by the common law of canonical life or by their own Rule; nevertheless, she would submit to the judgment of the bishops. (Thomassinus, Nova et Vet. Eccl. Discip. pt. iii. lib. iii. c. 43.) [C.]

DICERUM. $\Delta\iota\kappa\eta\rho\iota\upsilon\mu$, ceruus biculus, a two-forked wax taper used by bishops of the Greek Church in the Benediction of the people. It was also employed in the benediction of the book of the Gospels lying on the Holy Table. The bishop was said $\delta\iota\kappa\eta\rho\iota\omega$ $\sigma\phi\epsilon\rho\alpha\iota\zeta\epsilon\iota\omega$. The double taper was considered to symbolize the two natures of Christ.

Tricerium, $\tau\rho\iota\kappa\eta\rho\iota\upsilon\mu$, ceruus tricusus, was similarly used, and held to symbolize the Trinity. Symeon Thessalon, De Templo, p. 222, apud Ducange s. v. $\kappa\rho\upsilon\sigma\theta\iota\varsigma$. Goar's Eucholog. p. 125. [E. V.]

DICTERUM. [PULPIT.]
DIDYMUS, martyr at Alexandria; commemorated April 28 (Mart. Rom. Vet., Adonis, Usuard). (W. F. G.)

DIES. The word dies is used, like the English "day," to designate a festival: as (e. g.) the Annates Franc. a. d. 802, "Ipse rex celebravit diem S. Joannis Baptistine." The principal special uses of the word are the following:—
1. Dies adoratus, GOOD FRIDAY.
2. Dies Aegyptiaci. Certain "unlucky days" once marked in calendars (see the ancient calendars published by Bucher), supposed to have been discovered by the ancient Egyptians from astrological calculations. Decreases were made against the superstitious observance of these days (Decret. pt. 2, can. 26, qu. 7, c. 16), and ancient Penitentials (see Ducange, s. v.) forbid men to avoid these days especially for blood-letting or commencing a work; indeed the superstitious preference for, or avoidance of, a day (De ret. u. s. c. 17) was forbidden generally. A memorial verse by Durandus (Rationale, viii. 4, § 20).

3. Dies boni, "les bons jours," used for festivals (Sidonius, Epist. v. 17).
4. Dies cinerum, the first day of LENT, or Ash-Wednesday.

5. Dies Coenae Domini. MAUNDY THURSDAY.
6. Dies Consecrati. The Capitularium Car. M. (ii. c. 35), enjoins that four days at Christmas should be observed as festivals; these days are referred to in the council of Soissons, A. D. 853, A. D. 869, c. 8, as dies consecrati, on which no courts were to be held.

7. Dies Dominica. [EASTER; LORD'S DAY.]
8. Dies Magnus, Felicitis natus, EASTER-DAY (Capitularium Car. M. v. c. 136); "dies magnus Coenae," Maundy Thursday (Capit. Herardi, c. 14). So $\mu\epsilon\gamma\alpha\lambda\eta$ $\eta\mu\epsilon\rho\alpha$ (Conc. Ancyr. c. 6) is used for Easter-Day. "Dies magnus" is also used for the Last Day (Cypri. Car. M. vi. c. 37).

9. Dies Natalis. [NATALIS.]
10. Dies Neophytorum, the eight days, from Easter-Day to its octave, during which the newly baptised wore their white garments. Augustine (Epist. 119, c. 17) speaks of the "octo dies neophytorum" as days of special observance.

11. Dies Palmarum, or in Ramis Palmarum, PALM-SUNDAY.
12. Dies Sancti, the forty days of LENT. See the Theodosian Code, lib. ii. De Feriis, and Baronius, ad an. 519, § 42.

13. Dies Scrutinii, the days on which candidates for baptism were examined, especially Wednesday in the fourth week of Lent.

14. Dies Solis, Dies Lunae, and the other days of the week; see WEEK.

15. Dies timoratum or murium; certain days on which ceremonies were performed to avert the ravages of moths or mice (Audoenus, Vita Eligii, ii. 15). See Delrio, Disquis. Magic. lib. iii. pt. 2, qu. 4, § 6.

16. Dies Virilium, in some ancient German calendars, Thursday in Holy Week, "Grundonnerstag." [MAUNDY THURSDAY.]
17. Dies rotorum, a wedding-day; Leyes Longobard. lib. ii. tit. 4, § 3. [C.]

DIETA. The ecclesiastical CURSUS or daily office. Victor of Paris (MS. Liber Ordinis, c. 27, quoted by Ducange) orders his book to be carried round whenever office is said (quando dicta cantatur). See Beeth, De Div. Off. c. 21; Durandus, Rationale, v. 3, 29. [C.]

DIGAMY. It has been stated under the head BIOAMY that we propose to consider under the present head whatever concerns the entering into marriage relations with two persons successively. The subject is one in respect to which a different morality has been applied to the clergy and laity. As respects each class moreover, it divides itself under two branches—which, however, it will not always be necessary to consider separately—that of successive marriages after divorce or separation, and after the death of a husband or wife.

In respect of the clergy, it has been already observed under the head BIGAMY that the prescriptions as to bishops and deacons in 1 Tim. iii. 2, 12, and Tit. i. 6, requiring them to be husbands "of one wife," apply more probably to successive than to simultaneous marriages. The explanation of them seems to lie in those enactments of the Pentateuch (Levit. xxi. 7, 13, 14), which forbid the priest to marry a widow or divorced woman. The oldest authorities support this view. The Apostolical Constitutions (ii. 2) require the bishop to be the husband of a single woman once married; a prescription extended by a constitution, evidently indeed of later date (vi. 17) to presbyters, deacons, and even singers, readers, and porters; the deaconesses also were to be pure virgins, or at least widows of one husband (as to whom, see also viii. 25, no doubt later still). The so-called Apostolical Canons in like manner provide that if any one after baptism shall twice enter into marriage, or marry a widow or divorced woman, he cannot be a bishop, priest, or deacon, or in anywise on the list of the sacred ministry (cc. 13, 14, otherwise 16, 17, or 10, 18). It is clear from the Philosophumena of Hippolytus (ix. 12) that by the beginning of the 3rd century the rule of monogamy for the clergy was well established, since he complains that in the days of Callistus "digamist and trigamist bishops, and priests, and deacons, began to be admitted into the clergy." Tertullian recognizes the rule as to the clergy. Thus in his De Exhortatione Castitatis (c. 7), he asks scornfully: "Being a digamist, dost thou baptize? being a digamist, dost thou make the offering?" And he points (Ib. c. 13) to certain honours paid among the heathens themselves to monogamy.

The rule of the Church, it will be observed, forbade indeed to the clergy both personal digamy, and marriage with a digamous woman. St. Ambrose, in the first book of his Offices (c. 50), further considers the case of prebaptismal marriage,—many persons, it seems, being surprised that digamy before marriage should be an impediment to orders.

We pass from the testimony of the fathers to that of councils and popes. The so-called canons of the Nicene Council from the Arabic—which probably indeed only represent the state of the Church of Arabia at a much later period—enact the penalty of deposition against a priest or deacon dismissing his wife in order to change her for another fairer or better or richer, or "on account of his concupiscence" (c. 60, or 71 of the Ezechellensian version). The still more problematical "Sanctions and Decrees" attributed to the Nicene fathers require, in accordance with the previously existing laws of the Church, the priest to be "the husband of one wife, not a bigamist or trigamist," and forbid him to marry a widow or dismissed woman, &c. (c. 14).

The first Council of Valence (A.D. 374) enacts that "none after this synod . . . be ordained to the clergy from among digamists, or the husbands of previously married women (internuptarum)," but decrees that nothing should be inquired into as to the status of those who are already ordained (c. 1). Compare the 4th Council of Carthage (A.D. 397), c. 69, and the 1st Council of Toledo (A.D. 400), cc. 3 and 4.

The letters of pope Innocent I. (A.D. 402-17) deal frequently with the subject, and more than once on the point already treated by St. Ambrose of the effect of prebaptismal marriage. In his 2nd to Victorius bishop of Rouen, besides laying it down that clerics should only marry virgins (c. 4), he dwells on the absurdity of not reckoning a wife married before baptism (c. 6). The 23rd letter of the same pope, addressed to the Synod of Toledo, reverts a third time to the error of not reckoning in cases of digamy a prebaptismal marriage.

The letters of Leo the Great (A.D. 440-61) repeatedly recur to the subject. See the 4th, 5th, and 6th.

Second marriages were, however, still allowed to the inferior clergy. Thus the 25th canon of the 1st Council of Orange, A.D. 441, ordains respecting "those fit and approved persons whom the grace itself of their life consents to be joined to the clergy, if by chance they have fallen into second marriage, that they should not receive ecclesiastical dignities beyond the subdiaconate." The same enactment is repeated almost in the same words in the 45th canon of the 2nd Council of Arles, A.D. 452. In some dioceses, however, the rule was still stricter, if full faith is to be given to a letter of bishops Loup of Troyes and Euphrosius of Autun to bishop Talasius of Angers (A.D. 453), which lays it down that the Church allows digamy as far as the rank of porters, but excludes altogether exorcists and subdeacons from second marriage, whilst in the diocese of Autun the porter himself, the lowest of the inferior clergy, if he took a second wife lost his office, and, as well as a subdeacon or exorcist falling into the same "madness," was excluded from communion (see Labbe and Mansi's Councils, vol. vii. p. 942). As respects marriages to widows, we must not overlook a Council of uncertain place, of the year 442-4, by which a bishop named Chelionius was deposed, amongst other reasons, for having contracted such a marriage; though he was afterwards absolved by Pope Leo. See further, against the 2nd marriages of the clergy or other marriages to widows or divorced women, the 4th canon of the Council of Angers, A.D. 453; the 4th canon of the 1st Council of Tours, A.D. 461; the 2nd canon of the Council of Rome, A.D. 465; letter 9 of pope Gelasius I. (A.D. 492-8) to the bishops of Lucania, cc. 3, 22; and two fragments of letters by him to the clergy and people of Brindisi.

Among the Nestorians of the East indeed, towards the end of the 5th century, the re-marriage of the clergy was held valid. One of their synods held in Persia, under Barsamas archbishop of Nisibis [BIGAMY], expressly lays it down that a priest whose wife is dead is not to be forbidden by his bishop to marry again, whether before or after his orders.* And even in the West it is evident that instances of digamy or quasi-digamy must at the beginning of the 6th century have been so frequent in France at least as to require toleration. Thus the Council of

* A somewhat later Nestorian synod under the patriarch Babouas, however, seems to allow but one wife to the "Catholice" inferior priests, and monks. It is difficult, however, to collect the exact purport of the enactment from the short notice in Labbe and Mansi's Councils, vol. 3, p. 239.

Agde, the fifth touching marriage of the who the being hood presump minister 517, c. 324, c. ad 544 authori cept to lation as hant, a C Caeterb forbids t a widow, baptisin. posed to book 'O' "who h content." in a capit a digamis a virgin hand, a S digamism contracte the 4th (c. 44) t (sic cons divorced v eluded from The last the East a 6th Geuer Trulla, A.E manner pu against dig among the transgresses in second date had but those disgrace or had forsak second wive or decens, cease from tain the ho praying the sin of their who had ma or rubencor from minist to their rari promotion offence after renewed "w become invol or shall have or priest, or the sacerdoti takes to wi or a harlot, o It would pr original cano moreover renu of second mar pe Innocent I. (A.D. 402-17) at the subject, and more than ready treated by St. Ambrose baptismal marriage. In his shop of Rouen, besides laying s should only marry virgins the absurdity of not reckon- before baptism (c. 6). The same pope, addressed to the erts a third time to the error as of digamy a prebaptismal the Great (A.D. 440-61) re- ce subject. See the 4th, 5th, were, however, still allowed y. Thus the 25th canon of Orange, A.D. 441, ordained and approved persons whom their life counsels to be joined chance they have fallen into that they should not receive s beyond the sublimation." t is repeated almost in the 5th canon of the 2nd Council n. In some dioceses, however, rictor, if full faith is to be bishops Loup of Troyes and to bishop Talasius of Angers ys it down that the Church as the rank of porters, but xorcists and subleacons from list in the diocese of Autun the lowest of the inferior second wife lost his office, abdencon or exorcist falling adness," was excluded from é and Mansi's Concilia, vol. pects marriages to widows, ook a Council of uncertain 442-4, by which a bishop was deposed, amongst other ontracted such a marriage; wards absolved by Pope Leo, the 2nd marriages of the ages to widows or divorced n of the Council of Angers, an of the 1st Council of a 2nd canon of the Council letter 9 of pope Gelasius I. bishops of Lucania, cc. 3, 22; of letters by him to the Briandisi.

rians of the East indeed, of the 5th century, the re- gy was held valid. One of n Persia, under Barsamu s [BIGAMY], expressly lays t whose wife is dead is not his bishop to marry again, or his orders." And even in that instances of digamy or at the beginning of the 6th frequent in France at least tion. Thus the Council of Neostorian sallow under the p- seems to allow but one wife to rior priests, and monks. It is lect the exact purport of the ort notice in Labbe and Mansi's Agde, A.D. 506, after the canons and statutes of the fathers had been read, determined, "as touching digamists or husbands of women before married (intermaritum)—although the statutes of the fathers had otherwise decreed—that those who till now have been ordained, compassion being had, do retain the name only of the priest-hood or diaconate, but that such persons do not minister" (c. 1). So the Council of Epône, A.D. 517, c. 2; the 4th [3rd] Council of Arles, A.D. 544, c. 3; and the 4th Council of Orleans, A.D. 541, c. 10. It seems superfluous to multiply authorities as respects the Western Church, except to notice the introduction of the same legisla- tion among new communities. Thus for Eng- land, a Council held under archbishop Theodore of Canterbury, towards the end of the 7th century, forbids the priesthood (c. 116) to the husband of a widow, whether married to her before or after baptism. The Collection of Irish Canons, supposed to be of about the same date, in its first book 'On the Bishop,' requires him to be a man 'who having taken only one wife, a virgin, is content' (c. 9). And pope Gregory II. (711-10) in a capitulary to his abbegates in Bavaria, forbids a digamist, or one who has not received his wife a virgin to be ordained (c. 5). On the other hand, a Spanish canon seems to imply that quasi-digamous marriages might in that province be contracted with the advice of the bishop, since the 4th Council of Toledo, A.D. 633, enacted (c. 44) that clerics who without such advice (sine consultu episcopi sui) had married widows, divorced women, or prostitutes, were to be excluded from communion.

The last authority we shall quote, as embracing the East as well as the West, is that of the [5th] 8th General Council, that of Constantinople in Trullo, A.D. 691, which treats of the subject in a manner proving that the canonical injunctions against digamous or quasi-digamous marriages among the clergy were yet in many instances transgressed. Those who had become involved in second marriages, and down to a given past date had "served sin," were to be deposed, but those who, having become involved in the disgrace of such digamy before the decree, had forsaken their evil ways, or those whose second wives were dead already, whether priests or deacons, were ordered for a definite time to cease from all priestly ministrations, but to retain the honour of their seat and rank, whilst praying the Lord with tears to forgive them the sin of their ignorance. On the other hand those who had married widows, whether priests, deacons, or subdeacons, after a short period of suspension from ministerial functions, were to be restored to their rank, but without power of further promotion. For all those committing the like offence after the date assigned, the canon was renewed "which says that he who shall have become involved in two marriages after baptism, or shall have had a concubine, cannot be bishop, or priest, or deacon, or in anywise a member of the sacerdotal order; and so with him who has taken to wife a widow or divorced woman, or a harlot, or a slave, or a stage-player" (c. 3). It would probably be difficult to assign the original canon thus referred to. The text is moreover remarkable as confining the disability of second marriage to post-baptismal unions—in direct opposition to the authority of St. Ambrose and others before referred to.

It is sufficient to state here that so long as we retain the female diaconate in sight, the same obligation of monogamy attaches to the deaconesses as to the male clergy; e. g., not to speak of Epiphanius for the East, when the female diaconate reappears in Gaul during the 6th century, we find the 2nd Council of Orleans, A.D. 533, enacting that "women who have hitherto received against canonical prohibition the diaconal benediction, if they can be proved to have again lapsed into marriage, are to be expelled from communion;" but if they give up their husbands, they may be readmitted after penance (c. 17).

It must not be overlooked that the civil law of the Roman empire since the days of Justinian followed the canon law on the subject of clerical marriages. This is perhaps only implied in the Code (see bk. i. t. iii. l. 42, § 1, and l. 48), but distinctly enacted in the Novels. Under one or other of these, bishops, priests, deacons, and sub-deacons were alike forbidden to receive ordination if they had been twice married, or had married widows or divorced women (6th Nov. cc. i. v.; 22nd Nov. c. xlii.; 123rd Nov. cc. i. xii.; 137th Nov. c. li.). Readers who remarried or contracted the like marriages, could rise to no higher clerical rank (an indulgence which did not, however, extend to a third marriage), or if they obtained such irregularly, forfeited altogether their clerical position (6th Nov. c. v.; 22nd Nov. c. xlii.; 123rd Nov. c. xiv.). Deaconesses must in like manner, if not virgins, have been only once married (6th Nov. c. vi.).^b

II. As respects the laity, the distinction between second marriages after divorce or separation, and after death, which is unimportant as respects the clergy, becomes an essential one. In both respects the practice of the Church, instead of being founded, as it was with reference to the clergy, on the prescriptions of the Old Testament, depends upon a more or less narrow interpretation of the New, or on more or less bold deductions from its teachings, combined with the surrounding influences of civil society. In conformity with St. Paul's views as to remarriage after death, we ^b A curious offshoot from the subject of the prohibition of clerical bigamy is the extension of that prohibition to the widows of clerics. Thus, the first Council of Toledo, A.D. 400, enacted that if the widow of a bishop, priest, or deacon took a husband, no cleric or religious woman ought so much as to eat with her, nor should she be admitted to communion except in articulo mortis (c. 18). The 4th Council of Orleans, A.D. 511, required the widow of a priest or deacon married again to be separated from her husband, or if she remained with him, both to be excluded from communion (c. 13). The Council of Epône (A.D. 517), somewhat more sharply decreed immediate exclusion of both, till they should separate (c. 32). The Council of Lerida (A.D. 521) according to Sirlin, forbade the communion to the remarried widow of a bishop, priest, or deacon, even in articulo mortis. The Council of Auxerre (A.D. 578) ag'dn forbade such marriages as respects the widows of the superior clergy; the Council of Mâcon, A.D. 585, extended the prohibition to those of subdeacons, exorcists and acolytes, under pain of confinement for life in a convent of women (c. 16). Yet Pope Gregory the Great (A.D. 599-602) did not go so far, for we find him in a letter to Leo, bishop of Catania, (bk. ii. letter 34) ordering a certain Honorata, widow of a subdeacon, who on her marrying again had been shut up in a monastery to be restored to her husband.

find Hermas writing that "whoso marries"—i.e. as shown in the context, after the death of either wife or husband—"does not sin, but if he dwells by himself, he acquires great honour to himself with the Lord" (bk. ii. M. iv. § 4); but adopting the stricter view as to remarriage after divorce, declaring it to be adultery in the man even when he has put away his wife for that offence itself, and the same to be the case with the wife (ibid., § 1). Negatively, on the other hand, it may be observed that the epistle of Barnabas, in enumerating the works of the "way of light," does not specify monogamy (see c. 19).

The Apostolical Constitutions (iii. 1) speak of the marriage of a church-widow as bringing disgrace to the class, "not because she contracted a second marriage, but because she did not keep her promise (ἑπαγγελία)"—a passage clearly implying even in this case the full lawfulness of second marriage. See also cc. 2 and 3, and Apost. Can. 40, al. 47 or 48.

Although amongst the earlier Romans there was one form of marriage which was indissoluble, viz., that by confarreatio, still generally a second marriage either after death or divorce, was by no means viewed with disfavour. There are, however, certain clear indications that already in the first century of our era constancy to a single partner was in the Roman world beginning to be looked upon with favour. Thus Tacitus speaks of Germanicus's being a man "of one marriage" as one of the causes of his influence (Ann. ii. 73), and mentions a little further on (c. 76) that the daughter of Pollio was chosen to be chief vestal "for no other reason than that her mother remained married to the same man." The same Tacitus observes of the Germans that the best of their communities (civitates) were those where the women only married as virgins, so that they never had but one husband (De Mor. Germ. c. xix.). And it is perhaps worthy of notice that the jus connubii, when given to soldiers, was restricted under Philip (247-9) to the case of a first marriage, though this was probably not attributable to any moral considerations (see Muratori, Thes. Inscr. i. 362).

Meanwhile an intensifying spirit of asceticism was leading many in the church to a condemnation of second marriage in all cases. Minucius Felix (Octavius, c. 31, § 5) only professes on behalf of the Christians a preference for monogamy. Clement of Alexandria (A.D. 150-220) seems to confine the term marriage to the first lawful union (Stromata, bk. ii.—quoted, as well as several of the following references, in Cotelerius, Patres Apostol. vol. i. p. 90, n. 16). Athenagoras terms second marriage "fair seeming adultery." Tertullian (A.D. 150-226) inveighs against it with unwearied urgency, in his two books Ad Uxorem, in his De Exhortatione Castitatis, in his De Monogamia, and in his De Pudicitia—the last but one, however, written when he was altogether a Montanist. In the first of them, indeed, he admits that his wife will not actually sin if she marry after his death (i. 7), but argues from clerical to lay monogamy. In the Exhortation to Castity (which is addressed to a man) he uses the same argument, but goes so far as to say that second marriage is a form of adultery (c. 9). Origen (184-253) so far as the Latin text of his 17th homily on

Luke can be trusted, is not much less severe. Recommending perseverance in widowhood, he says: "But now both second and third and fourth marriages, not to speak of more, are to be found, and we are not ignorant that such a marriage shall cast us out from the kingdom of God."

It would seem, however, that when these views were carried to the extent of absolute prohibition of second marriages generally by several heretical sects, the Montanists (see Augustin, de Haeresibus, c. 26), the Cathari (ib. c. 38), and a portion at least of the Novatianists (see Cotel. Patr. Ap. vol. i. p. 91, n. 16), the Church saw the necessity of not fixing such a yoke on the necks of the laity. The forbiddance of second marriage, or its assimilation to fornication, was treated as one of the marks of heresy (Augustin, u. s.; and see also his De bono rēnitentis, c. 6). The sentiment of Augustin (in the last referred to passage) may be taken to express the Church judgment at the close of the 4th century: "Second marriages are not to be condemned, but had in less honour;" and see also Epiphanius, in his Exposition of the Catholic Faith, c. 21.

What the "less honour" consisted in may partly be inferred as respects the Greek Church, from the 'Sanctions and Decrees' attributed to the Nicene Fathers (Labbe and Mansi, Concilia, vol. ii. p. 1029 and foll.), which distinctly authorize widowers' and widows' marriages (i. 7). Yet the blessing of the crowns is not to be imparted to them, for this is only once given, on first marriages, and not to be repeated. . . . But if one of them be not a widower or widow, let such one alone receive the benediction with the paronymphs, those whom he will.

The 7th Canon of the Council of Neocaesarea, in A.D. 314 or 315, bears that the presbyter ought not to be present at the marriage festivities of digamists, as the act would be incompatible with his assigning a penance to such persons. The canon implies, it will be seen, that the act of second marriage entailed the infliction of a penance. This appears more clearly from the 1st Canon of the Council of Laodicea, (between A.D. 357 and 367), which rules, as respects those who have "freely and lawfully" contracted a second marriage, without any secrecy, that after a short time, and some chastisement in prayers and fastings, they should be admitted to Communion. And Basil (A.N. 329-379) in his Canonical epistle to bishop Amphilocheus of Iconium fixes one year as the period of the suspension of digamists from communion.

We must thus consider that two views on the subject of simple remarriage after the death of husband or wife were abroad in the Church; one which, with Augustin, looked upon it as merely less honourable than monogamy, and deemed its actual condemnation a mark of heresy; the other, which looked upon it as in itself an offence deserving penance, however slight this might be.

The latter view found most colour as respects second marriages after what was deemed a religious profession, as that of the penitent, and of the widow. See IV. Conc. Carth. c. 104; II. Arles, c. 21; Pope Symmachus, Epist. 5, § 5; V. Paris, c. 13, and many others.

A more extraordinary instance of the enforcement of monogamy on a particular class of women is confined to Spain. The 13th Council of Toledo, after the confirmation of Sarawidow remained. The own co under A fines it ment ev for thro missing ever to riage aff fully rec later tin in the R that M' Dia. 20 forbade after the the ancie 4th cent subjected. I n un against se in the rec to the C The earli upper to Great (A. nian's Coc and bk. vi Substan of the Ch second ma latterly co care the ri The herba this point c. 37; the ce. 182, l vi. c. 74. fully the r a partner Chindsswin Among forbidding priests' (su knowledge riages with be no true n separated, w against them vere to be a though not to limit the ion till ame amendment, a widow who and her husb the church (C' A woman who was never sou of marriages none take mo is already sup is not much less severe. Penance in widowhood, the second and third and fourth rank of more, are to be found, and that such a marriage is the kingdom of God."

However, that when these to the extent of absolute marriages generally by the Montanists (see Aug. c. 26), the Cathari (ib. at least of the Novatians vel. i. p. 91, n. 16), the necessity of not fixing such a penalty. The forbiddance or its assimilation to form one of the marks of heresy see also his De bona voluntate of Augustin (in the) may be taken to express at the close of the 4th marriages are not to be considered honour; and see also position of the Catholic Faith, honour" consisted in may respects the Greek Church, and Decrees attributed to the able and Mansi, Concilio, which distinctly an widows' marriages (l. 7). crowns is not to be imparted once given, on first marriage repeated. . . . But if one or widow, let such one deliction with the penance will.

The Council of Neocesarea bears that the presbyter sent at the marriage festival the act would be incurring a penance to such penalties, it will be seen, that the infliction entails the infliction appears more clearly from Council of Laodicea, (be 367), the rules, as receive "freely and lawfully" marriage, without any time, and some chastisements, they should be admitted. Basil (A.D. 325-5) epistle to bishop Amphilo- chus one year as the period penitents from communion.

After that two views on the marriage after the death of a spouse in the Church; one looked upon it as merely monogamy, and deemed it a mark of heresy; the other on it as in itself an offence never slight this might be of almost colour as respects what was deemed a repentance of the penitent, and of Conc. Carth. c. 104; Symmachus, Epist. 3, and many others.

By instance of the enforcement on a particular class of Spain. The 13th Council of Toledo, in 683, declared it to be "an execrable crime, and a work of most inveterate iniquity, after the death of kings, to affect the royal couch of their surviving consorts" (c. 5). This was confirmed some years later by the 3rd Council of Saragossa, A.D. 691, which required the widows of the kings to enter a convent for the remainder of their lives (c. 6).

The penance for ordinary digamy recurs in our own country, in the canons of a Council held under Archbishop Theodore, of Canterbury, which fixes it at two days fasting from wine and flesh-meat every week during the first year, and fasting for three consecutive Lenten, "but without dismissing the wife" (c. 26). But subject however to some such qualifications, second marriage after the death of husband or wife remained fully recognised as the right of the laity. In later times, indeed, so slight a feeling subsisted in the Romish Church against re-marriage among the laity after the death of a husband or wife, that Muratori (Antiquitates Medii Aevi, ii. Diss. 20), says that the Latin Church never forbade second, third, or even more marriages after the death of one of the parties, although the ancient church, especially during the 3rd and 4th centuries, bore such unions impatiently, and subjected them to penance.

It must now be observed that the feeling against second marriage traceable in early times in the records of the Church gradually extended to the Civil Law, especially as regards widows. The earliest laws which indicate this feeling appear to belong to the time of Theodosius the Great (A.D. 380-2), and are to be found in Justinian's Code, bk. v. tit. ix., De secundis nuptiis, and bk. vi. tit. lvi.

Substantially the Roman civil law, like that of the Church, fully recognised the right of second marriage of a surviving husband or wife, latterly confining itself to securing with especial care the rights of the issue of the first marriage. The barbaric codes do not vary materially from this point of view. See the Edict of Theodoris, c. 37; the Laws of Notharis (A.D. 638 or 643), c. 182, 183; Laws of Liutprand (A.D. 724), vi. c. 74. The laws of the Wisigoths recognised fully the right of remarrying after the death of a partner among the laity. See the Laws of Chindaswinth, bk. iii. tit. 1, l. 4.

Among the Carolingian Capitularies is one forbidding marriage with widows without their priests' (suorum sacerdotum) consent and the knowledge of the people (bk. v. c. 40). Marriages with professed widows were declared to be no true marriages, and the parties were to be separated, without any accusation being brought against them, by the priest or the judge, and were to be sent into perpetual exile (ib. c. 411); though another enactment (bk. vii. c. 339) seems to limit the penalty to suspension from communion till amendment of life, or in default of such amendment, to perpetual exclusion. If, indeed, a widow who was also a penitent remarried, she and her husband were not to be suffered to enter the church (c. 317, and see also Add. Quarta c. 88). A woman who had connexion with two brothers was never to marry again (ib. 381). A limit was even sought to be imposed on the number of marriages which might be contracted: "Let none take more than two wives, since the third is already superfluous" (bk. vii. c. 406).

III. We come now to a branch of the subject on which the law of the Church has seldom run precisely in the same groove as that of the state, viz., remarriage not after death of one of the parties, but after divorce or separation. Several classes of cases have here to be distinguished. The first is that in which physical separation involves the presumption or at least the possibility of death. The 22nd Novel fixed a period of five years, after which the wife of a captive husband, who could hear no tidings of him, might lawfully marry again (c. 7). The Wisigothic Code was less indulgent. One of its older laws enacted that no woman might marry in her husband's absence, till he was known to be dead; otherwise, on his return, both she and her second husband were to be given over to him, so that he might do with them what he chose, whether by selling them or in any other way (bk. ii. t. ii. l. 6). As respects the church, a letter of Pope Innocent I. (402-17) to Probus simply lays down that where a wife had been carried into captivity and her husband married again in her absence, on the return of the former the first marriage alone held good (Ep. 9). Leo the Great ruled to the same effect in his letter (A.D. 458) to Nicetas, Bishop of Aquileia. Wives whose husbands had been taken in war were bound to return to their former husbands under pain of excommunication; but the second husbands were not to be held guilty for the act of marrying (Ep. 159). The Council in Trullo (A.D. 692), more severe, decreed that the wife of an absent husband marrying before she was certain of his death was guilty of adultery (c. 93).

The next group of cases are those of simple prolonged physical separation. The Roman law took especial account of the case of soldiers. The 22nd Novel allowed the wife of a soldier after ten years' absence, during which she must have repeatedly pressed her husband by letters or messages, whilst he either repelled her importunities, or wholly neglected them, to marry again, altering in this respect a constitution of Constantine's (Code, bk. v. t. xvii. l. 7), which seemed to fix four years as a sufficient period of separation. But the wife was required to present a protest, apparently a written one, to the soldier's superior officers (c. 14); and the 117th Novel surrounded this proceeding with certain formalities, requiring moreover the wife to wait a year further after taking the step in question before she could lawfully marry again (l. 11). St. Basil on the other hand notices the case in his first canonical epistle to Amphilochius, and decrees that where the soldier's wife remarries, the circumstances should be examined into, and some indulgence shewn (c. 36). The Council in Trullo adopted this view, and authorized a soldier, who might return after a long absence and find his wife married to another, to take her back, indulgence being shewn both to the woman and to her second husband (c. 93).

Physical separation through captivity constitutes the next group. A council held under Theodore, Archbishop of Canterbury, towards the end of the 7th century, allows a layman, if his wife were by force carried away into captivity, and he could not recover her, to take another, as being better than to commit fornication (c. 31). After such a second marriage (which could be contracted after a twelvemonth, c. 140), he was not at liberty to take back his former wife if married to another, but she might herself also marry another husband (c. 31). One of the later Lombard laws (A. D. 721) enacts that if any one go away for a matter of business or of trade, whether within a province or out of it, and do not return within three years, his wife may apply to the king, who may allow her to marry again (Law of Liutprand, bk. iii. c. 4).

If we now consider the case of voluntary desertion or divorce, we shall find considerable fluctuation in the rules and practice of the Church as to a second marriage following thereon. St. Paul had, indeed, admitted that desertion for the faith's sake dissolved the social obligations of marriage: "If the unbelieving depart, let him depart; a brother or a sister is not under bondage in such cases" (1 Cor. vii. 15). Did the not being "under bondage" imply freedom to marry again? An alleged canon of Gregory the Great is reported to have ruled that it was no sin to do so (c. 17). The same conclusion may, perhaps, be drawn, as respects heresy at least, from a canon (72) of the Council in Trullo, which not only forbids marriage between an orthodox person and a heretic, but declares it void and dissolved; and seems only by way of permission to allow that where two infidels have married, and one comes to the light of the truth, he or she may remain in union with the other. And under the canons of the English Council under Theodore, the case would be included in that of desertion generally, in which it was laid down that a layman deserted by his wife might after two years take another with the bishop's consent (c. 140). Indeed St. Basil in the 4th century had ruled in his first canonical epistle to Amphiloehius that a woman who married a man deserted by his wife, if dismissed on the latter's return, had only fornicated in ignorance, and was not forbidden to marry again; though he thought it better that she should remain single (c. 46). The 93rd canon of the Council in Trullo confirmed this view.

There was indeed one case of separation, the very converse of that of a Christian husband or wife deserted by an infidel partner, which Justinian's code specially dealt with, that of the husband or wife embracing the monastic profession. This was held to give freedom to the other party to marry again, although as respects a woman, by analogy with the law in case of remarriage after death, only after the expiration of a twelvemonth. She was, however, at once to send a divorce bonâ gratiâ to her husband (Code, bk. i. t. iii. l. 53, § 3; and see l. 56; 5th Nov. c. 5; 22nd Nov. c. 5). The avoidance of marriage by the religious profession was however maintained, after the divorce bonâ gratiâ had been forbidden; see the 117th Nov. cc. 10, 12, and the 123rd, c. 40.

The great struggle was, however, on the subject of marriage after divorce. Our Lord's teaching on the subject, it will be remembered, was not only in professed opposition to the Jewish law, but in no less signal opposition to the Romn, in which the facilities for divorce were simply scandalous. The right of divorce in specified cases, and of subsequent remarriage for the innocent party, was maintained by the state for a long time under the emperors (see Code, bk. v. t. xvii.). No limitation of time for remarriage was fixed for the man (lib. l. 8, § 3, Constitution of Theodosius and Valentinian, A. D. 449); but by analogy with the case of remarriage after death, the woman's right to remarry after divorce for her husband's wrong, or after a divorce by mutual consent, was limited to arise after the expiration of a twelvemonth (§ 4 and l. 9, Constitution of Anastasius, A. D. 497). But if she divorced herself from her husband otherwise than in the cases specified, she could not remarry within five years, and if she did, became infamous, and the marriage void (l. 8, § 4). The right of remarriage by a wife after the year was by the 22nd Novel extended to all cases of "reasonable" divorce obtained by her; the husband in the like case being always free to remarry at once (cc. 16, 18). The divorce by mutual consent, except for the sake of observing chastity, was however forbidden by the 117th Novel, c. 10.

In Italy the right of divorce and remarriage was maintained by the edict of Theodoric according to the old constitutions (c. 54), and though it cannot be traced through the Lombard laws, probably subsisted till the Carolingian conquest, when by a capitulary of the year 789, enacted for Lombardy, marriage after divorce was forbidden (bk. l. c. 42).

The Wisigothic law seems first to have admitted divorce, then sought to forbid it altogether. An "ancient" law prohibited a divorced woman from remarrying, and if she did, ordered both her and her second husband to be given over to the former one (bk. iii. t. ii. l. 1).

If we turn now to the law of the Church, we find the Council of Elberis in 305 forbidding communion even in extremis to women leaving their husbands without cause and marrying another (c. 8). See also c. 9 and c. 10.

Basil in his canonical epistle to Amphiloehius dwells at length on the subject of divorces (c. 9). He doubts, indeed, whether a woman living with a divorced man is to be treated as an adulteress; but she is one certainly who leaves her husband and marries again. But the deserted husband may receive absolution (συγγνωστὸς ἔσται), and the woman who lives with him is not condemned; though it is otherwise if the man himself leaves his wife (ὅς). Such a man marrying again is an adulterer, and only in the 7th year is to be readmitted among the faithful (c. 77). To Basil's mind, a dismissed wife should remain unmarried (c. 48).

The African Council of Milevis, A. D. 416, the 17th canon of which forbids generally dismissed women to marry other husbands, hardly agrees with an Irish Council of uncertain date held under St. Patrick, which lays it down that first marriages are not made void by second ones, "unless they have been polluted by adultery" (c. 28); nor with the Council of Vannes (1 œcumenus) in 465, which enacts excommunication against those who having wives, except by reason of fornication, without proof of adultery marry other women (c. 2). The Council of Hertford in 673 seems to revert to the stricter view, enacting that a man is not to leave his wife except for fornication, nor, if dismissing her, to marry another (c. 10). The Council in Trullo declares that both the woman leaving her husband and marrying another, and the man leaving his wife and marry-a grid (c. 83),

under faithful another to marry ingly st harlot's during being p knowled leave h
from the
the same of Mart to a m another sies five departed penance

A lette Pepin as excommu wives un and reite after divo in the re to certai Query in

Under
comes obv the ruler morality less again patrons.

Stephen I Carloman
the throne
The Cou Council of stricter co divorce, en neither poi however, t was sepa discovery man woman do; but if rage they all their liv their childr prohibitions divorce are
vil. cc. 73, ing the cas gurtz cc. 1 extended to without cau
(A. D. 814) di or ignoble, missed wives

Strange to at this enne
the imperial Constantine I married not forming the ejected by the communion b in spite of th of the menk

imitation of time for rethe man (lib. l. p. § 3, and Valentian, A.D. with the case of rethe woman's right to for her husband's wrong, by mutual consent, was the expiration of a twelve-constitution of Anastasius, divorced herself from her in the cases specified, within five years, and unions, and the marriage right of remarriage by a was by the 22d Novel of "reasonable" divorce husband in the like case to marry at once (cc. 16, 18), consent, except for the ability, was however forcely, c. 10.

of divorce and remarriage edict of Theodoris accord-nations (c. 54), and though ough the Lombard laws, the Carovingian conquest, of the year 789, enacted after divorce was en-seems first to have ad-ought to forbid it alto-law prohibited a divorced g, and if she did, ordered and husband to be given (bk. iii, t. ii. l. 1). the law of the Church, we liberis in 305 forbidding trans to men leaving out cause and marrying o c. 9 and c. 10.

epistle to Amphiloehus subject of divorces (c. 9) her a woman living with treated as an adulteress; who leaves her husband the deserted husband may reversis caris), and the him is not condemned; if the man himself leaves man marrying again is in the 7th year is to be faithful (c. 77). To Basil's should remain married of Milevis, A.D. 416, the rids generally dismissed husbands, hardly agree-uncertain date held under it when that first mar-by second ones, "unless by adultery" (c. 28); of Vanues (Leucticus) in communication against those not by reason of fornication, ery marry other women Hertford in 673 seems er view, enacting that a s wife except for fornication her, to marry another in Trullo declares that g her husband and mar-man leaving his wife and marrying another, commit adultery, and enacts a graduated scale of penance for seven years (c. 88). On the other hand, the English Council under Theodore enacts that where a wife is unfaithful a man might dismiss her and marry another, the woman however not to be allowed to marry her lover (c. 143). And yet by a seemingly strange contradiction it is enacted that a harlot's husband may not marry any other woman during her lifetime (c. 166), the case aimed at being probably that of a marriage with a full knowledge that the woman did not mean to leave her course of life. Among the Excopts from the chapters, "de remedis peccatorum," by the same archbishop, published in the Anecdota of Martone, we find that the penance assigned to a man dismissing his wife and marrying another is seven years "with tribulation," besides five years of lighter penance. If the wife departed, and the husband married again, his penance was for one year only.

A letter (7) of Pope Zacharias (A.D. 741-51) to Pepin as mayor of the palace, enjoins again the excommunication of laymen dismissing their wives and taking others in their place (c. 7), and reiterates the prohibition against marriage after divorce (c. 12), which we find also repeated in the replies made by Pope Stephen II. in 754 to certain queries put to him when he was at Quiry in France (c. 5).

Under Charlemagne a different spirit becomes obvious. The law is made stricter, but the rulers are above it. All injunctions to morality on the part of the popes were powerless against the passions of their Carovingian patrons. See the curious letter addressed by Stephen III. (A.D. 768-70) to Charlemagne and Carloman his son, then associated with him on the throne.

The Council of Aix in 789 (c. 42) and the Council of Friuli in 791 (c. 10), endorsing the stricter construction of our Lord's words as to divorce, enacted that after a divorce for adultery either party should marry again. The latter, however, "by indulgence," allowed those who were separated for consanguinity's sake on discovery to marry again, if they could not remain unmarried, which it recommended them to do; but if they willfully contracted such a marriage they were after separation to do penance all their lives and never marry again, nor could their children inherit from them (c. 8). The prohibitions against a second marriage after divorce are repeated in the Capitularies, bk.
 vii. cc. 73, 382 (the latter expressly including the case of adultery); bk. v. c. 300, Ad- quarta cc. 118-161,—the prohibition being here extended to marrying again after "killing a wife without cause." And the edict of Charlemagne (A.D. 814) directs inquiry whether all men noble or ignoble, have lawful wives, "not the dismissed wives of others."

Strange to say, the Eastern empire presented at this same period a similar scandal to that of the imperial court of the west. The Emperor Constantine had sent his wife to a convent and married another, the Archbishop Joseph performing the ceremony. For so doing he was ejected by the patriarch Tarasius, but received to communion by a Constantinopolitan synod in 808 in spite of the efforts of Theodorus Studita and of the monks, and another assembly in 809, declared the emperor's marriage to be lawful, on the shameful ground that "the divine laws endo nothing against kings."—It is somewhat en-ous to add that a Nestorian synod held in Persia in 804, following the stricter view, had laid it down that after a divorce for fornication neither husband nor wife could marry again.

To sum up the conclusions of this inquiry, we find—1st, that as respects the clergy, a rule borrowed from Leviticus or derived from its prescriptions was held by the church to forbid to the clergy all marriages which should on either side be of a digamous character; and that although this rule was evidently constantly infringed in practice, and its infringements oftentimes condoned in the past, it was nevertheless steadily upheld as binding throughout the whole period to which this work refers, and latterly extended or sought to be extended to the inferior clergy; the one open protest against its application being that of a Nestorian synod in Persia, towards the end of the 5th century. 2nd, that as respects the laity, notwithstanding the stricter views taken by several writers of the earlier church, the right of remarriage after the death of a husband or wife became firmly established, though in the Eastern church such marriages were subjected to some ceremonial disparagement, and were generally sought to be discouraged by penances more or less severe. 3rd, that considerable fluctuation in the views and practice of the Church seems to have prevailed on the subject of remarriage after separation or divorce, and that whilst second marriages in such cases were generally condemned by the letter of the canon law towards the end of the 8th and beginning of the 9th centuries, the sovereigns both of the East and West set such prohibitions at naught for themselves, and parted with their wives to marry others almost at their will.
 (See also DIGAMY).

[J. M. L.]

DIGNITAS. A well-known classical word = id, quo quis re aliqua dignus est, as Facciolati defines it. By degrees it was used as a generic term for ranks or offices, "Dignitas equitatis, senatoria, consularis," and so forth. From Pliny downwards, by "dignitates" were frequently meant "magistracies." The well-known notitia, or "Table of dignities of the Roman Empire in the east and west," which Pausirolus thinks may have been published about the end of the reign of Theodosius the younger in its present shape, was probably commenced under Augustus (Böcking's Notit. p. liii.-v.). They form the subject of the 6th book in the Theodosian Code, and of the 1st and last books in that of Justinian (Gothofred Op. Jurid. Min. pp. 1263, 1374, and 1415-18). All, of course, were purely secular; but, in process of time, when ecclesiastics were promoted to secular offices, and ecclesiastical offices themselves began to confer as much social distinction as secular, people talked of "digni-ties" in the Church as freely as in the State.
 Hence, retrospectively, this term might be extended to the offices of bishop, metropolitan, archbishop, patriarch, pope, cardinal, bishopsuffragan, archpriest, archdeacon, chancellor, &c., though, as matter of fact, it was never applied to them till it had been used to denote later and more subordinate posts first. In ecclesiastical parlance, says Duange, "when a benefice included the administration of ecclesiastical affairs with jurisdiction, it was called a dignity." And Thomas's, to the same purpose, speaks of "provosts, deans, stewards, chamberlains, treasurers, cellars, and sacristans, as among the 'dignities' inseparable from cathedrals and abbeys" (De Hen. l. ii. 70). True, we meet with none of these words in their received ecclesiastical meaning before the 9th century; nor was it till then, probably, that ecclesiastical offices of any kind began to be styled "dignities": still, practically, they had been this long before. [E. S. F.]

DIMISSORY LETTERS. (Litteras dimissoriae, formativae; επιστολά ἀπολυτικά.) Letters given by a bishop to one of his clerks removing into another diocese; or to a layman of his diocese desiring to be ordained elsewhere. [See BISHOP, p. 232; COMMENDATORY LETTERS.]

1. In ancient times a bishop was forbidden to receive a clerk from another diocese, or to admit to higher orders a clerk already ordained to some inferior rank, or to ordain a layman domiciled in another diocese (alterius plebis hominem), without the express and formal consent of the bishop of that diocese (Conc. Nicen. l. c. 16; C. Sardic. cc. 16, 19, A. D. 347; C. Carthag. l. c. 5, A. D. 318; C. Turin. c. 7; C. Arausic. l. c. 8, 9; C. in Trullo, c. 17; Ordo Rom. l. III. p. 87). Keaders, psalmists, and doorkeepers, were included under the designation of clerks (C. Carth. iii. c. 21; compare Augustine, Epist. 235, 240, 242). A bishop was not to hinder a presbyter of his diocese from being ordained bishop of a church to which he was elected, nor was one who had a superfluity of clerks to refuse them to a diocese where there were too few (C. Carth. iii. c. 45). The decision in cases of this kind seems to have rested with the metropolitan. In a case in which a bishop, Julianus, wished to reclaim a lector who belonged to his diocese by birth, though he belonged by baptism to the bishop who had ordained him, Epigonius, it was ruled that the lector belonged to the diocese of his baptism, to which he had come as a catechumen with commendatory letters (C. Carth. iii. c. 44).

The rules, however, with regard to the ordination of extraneous laymen were probably never enforced with the same strictness as those which related to clerics. Origen, an Alexandrian, was ordained presbyter by the bishops of Caesarea and Jerusalem, much to the indignation of his own bishop, Demetrius; there was, however, in Origen's case a special reason—his mutilation—why he should not be ordained (Euseb. II. E. vi. 8, 26, 27). Jerome was ordained priest at Antioch, neither the church of his birth nor of his baptism. And there are other instances of the like kind.

The theory on which all this rests is that a bishop by the act of ordination acquired a perpetual right to the services of the clerks whom he ordained ("Quisquis semel in hac ecclesia ordinem sacrum accepit, egrediendi ex ea ulterius licentiam non habet." Greg. Magn. Epist. v. 38), and even—in a less degree—to the services of those whom he baptised. Hence letters dimissory were not merely letters testimonial or commendatory, but properly ἀπολυτικά; instruments, that is, setting the clerk free from his allegiance to his first bishop, and transferring the same powers over him to the bishop of his adopted diocese (Thomas's, Nota et Vetus Ecclesiae Disciplina, ii. l. 1 ff.).

2. It was probably from the same notion, of the clerks being bound by a peculiar allegiance to their bishop, that the practice arose of requiring the clergy, and "religious" persons generally, to have the sanction of the bishop before they approached their king or lord (donnum) for the purpose of making benefices (Conc. Ancyran. l. c. 7, A. D. 511). This canon is, however, wanting in several MSS. [C.]

DINGOLVINGA, COUNCIL OF (Dingolwingense), at Dingolung, on the river Isar, in Bavaria, A. D. 772, under Tassilo, Duke of Bavaria, passed 13 canons upon discipline and reformation of manners. Labb. Conc. vi. 1794, 1795; Le Coigne, Annal. v. in an. 770; Hartzheim, Conc. German. l. 130. [A. W. H.]

DIOCESE. The word διοίκησις, signifying in its general sense any kind of administration, came to be specifically applied by the Romans to a Provincia, but to one of the lesser sort, for Cicero speaks of his Provincia Cilicidensis "cuius scilicet tres διοικήσεις Asiaticas attribuitur tunc" (Epist. ad Fam. lib. xiii. ep. 47).

At a later period, however, when Constantine remodelled the civil divisions of the empire, a diocesis, instead of being a minor province, contained within it several provinces. Thus, for instance, there were ten provinces in the Egyptian diocese. About the same time the word passed from the terminology of the civil government into that of the church. It was employed in a sense analogous to its secular application, and signified an aggregate not merely of several districts governed each by its own bishop, but of several provinces (παροικία) each presided over by a metropolitan. The diocese itself was under an Exarch or Patriarch (Ἐξαρχία). It is in this sense that the Council of Constantinople (can. 2) speaks of the Council of Constantinople and the Council of Ephesus of the Egyptian diocese. Διοίκησις Ἰστωῦ ἢ πολλὰς ἑπαρχίας ἔχουσα ἐν ταυτῇ says Balsamon, ad Can. IX. Council. Chalced. "That canon gives an appeal from the head of the province, the metropolitan, to the head of the διοίκησις in these words: εἰ δὲ πρὸς τὴν αὐτῆς ἑπαρχίας Μετροπολίτην ἐπίσκοπος ἢ κληρικὸς ἀμφιβητοῦ καταλαμβαίνω ἢ τὸν ἕταρον τῆς διοικήσεως ἢ τὸν τῆς βασιλευσῆς Κοσταντινουπόλεως ἑθρόνον, καὶ ἐπ' αὐτῷ διακρίσθω. About the same period the word diocese began also to assume the sense which has finally prevailed to the exclusion of that just mentioned, and to be used to signify the district governed by a single bishop. For the three first centuries this was commonly denoted by παροικία, but it now began also to be called diocesis, as in the Council of Carthage (see Bing. Anlir. bk. ix. li. § 2) we have "Pleuit ut nemini sit facultas, relictâ principali cathedrâ, ad aliquam ecclesiam in diocesi constitutam se conferre." In point of fact, however, the word, which perhaps retained to a certain degree its general rather than its technical sense, is found applied in turn to every kind of ecclesiastical territorial division. For, while Hincmar (Epist. ad Nicolum) uses it of the province of a metropolitan ("non solum diocesis, verum etiam parochia mea inter duo regna sub duobus regibus habetur divisa"), Suicer alleges other authorities to show that the word is resemb a single served t Africa Consil which in sion of power o century—

"Ἐκασ παροικί λασσαν τῆς χά χιριστο μὲν πρ αὐτῶν Ἰστωῦ γ
It has having a diocese, at they were been enl
The cano should ha should hav however, t broken dow
This pract
One of the
"Incuratio
sime Fun propemodu tate pasto
vbi postu Gregorio M nellus titu sue Terrac meaditam te Terracine mos esse an pontifex esse
lib. 3, cap. 1
In oth committed to till a success the earlier t commenda, a Sometimes
menda, the p neighbouring cessa was occ of another ch
In other in under senten church were metropolitan, tense Concil ecclesias eoru secedere iussi abfouissent" (C
In one inst
meaded a dio
At first the commended a actual expen when Paulus linea, direct certum solido quem ipse eleg
clericâ facias dan

... of Vetus Ecclesie Dis...

... from the same notion, of ... by a peculiar alligance ... the practice arose of re- ... "religious" persons ... sanction of the bishop ... their king or lord (Com- ... of asking benefices (Cov- ... 11. This canon is, how- ... MSS.).

COUNCIL OF (Dingol- ... on the river Isar, in ... Tassilo, Duke of Bavaria, ... discipline an! reformation ... no. vi. 1794, 1795; Le ... i. 770; Harzheim, Conc. ... [A. W. H.]

... word diocesis, signifying ... kind of administration, ... applied by the Romans to ... of the lesser sort, for ... provincia Ciliensis "eccl- ... tiones attributas fuisse" ... (p. 87).

... ver, when Constantine ... visions of the empire, a ... g a minor province, or ... provinces. Thus, for in- ... provinces in the Egyptian ... one time the word passed ... of the civil government ... It was employed in a ... secular application, and ... of merely of several di- ... its own bishop, but of ... (i.e.) cases prescribed over ... diocese itself was under an ... ARCH). It is in this sense ... antinople (can. 2) speaks ... dioceses, and the Council ... than diocese. Διοκισις ... ἐκ τοῦ αὐτοῦ says ... encl. Chalcid. That canon ... the head of the province, ... head of the διοκισις in ... τῆν τῆς αὐτῆς ἐπαρχίας ... ἢ κληρικῶν ἀμφιθε- ... τῶν ἑσάρχων τῆς διοικη- ... τοῦσις Κωνσταντινουπό- ... ῆς δικαιοσύνης. About the ... diocese began also to as- ... was finally prevailed to ... mentioned, and to be ... tect governed by a single ... first centuries this was ... apostolica, but it now began ... sis, as in the Council of ... utiq., bk. ix. ii. § 2) we ... linal sit factus, relicta ... quoniam ecclesiam in dioce- ... ferre. In point of fact, ... ch perhaps retained to a ... al rather than its tech- ... plied in turu to every ... rritorial division. For, ... ad Nicolaum) uses it of ... solitatis ("non solum dioce- ... arochia me inter duo ... bus habetur divisa"), ... morities to show that the word is sometimes employed in a sense closely resembling our word parish, viz. the district of a single church in a diocese. It has been observed that this was a Latin, and especially an African use of the term (Thomas, l. i. c. 3).

DIocese

Considered in the acceptance of the word, which has prevailed in later times to the exclusion of the others, a bishop's diocese and his power over it are thus spoken of in the 4th century—

Ἐκαστὸν ἐπισκοπικὸν ἔξουσιαν ἔχειν τῆς αὐτοῦ ἐπαρχίας διακεῖν τε κατὰ τὴν ἐκδοτὴν ἐπιβάλλουσαν ἐυλόθειαν, καὶ πρόνοιαν ποιῆσαι πόσης τῆς χώρας τῆς ὑπὸ τὴν αὐτοῦ πόλιν ἐκ καὶ χειροτονίᾳ πρεσβυτέρους καὶ διακόνους, καὶ μετὰ κρισίως ἕκαστα διαλαμβάνειν περὶ τῶν διὰ τὴν πρῶτην ἀεικίριον δίχα τοῦ τῆς μητροπόλεως ἐπισκόπου, μηδὲ αὐτὸν ἕνεκ τῆς τῶν λοιπῶν γνώμης. (Council, Actio h. can. 9.)

It has been thought that, from every bishop having a right to erect new churches in his own diocese, and to set up a cross on the spot where they were to be placed, his diocese has sometimes been called σταυροτόπιον (Bing, viii. 9, 5).

The enouneil rule was not only that a diocese should have but one bishop, but that a bishop should have but one diocese. In subsequent times, however, the latter part of this rule was much broken down by the practice of "commend."

This practice came into use on various grounds. One of these is thus indicated by Thomassin:—"Incurtiones barbarorum juges et cruentissime Fundant civitate episcoporum plebenaque propemodum omnem effugiant. Cum viduata tunc pastore suo fuisset Terracina, Fundanum sibi postulavit episcopum. Confirmata est a Gregorio Magno ea electio, a quo jussus est Agnellus titulum et administrationem gerere ecclesie Terracinenis, et nihil serius veluti commendatam sibi curare ecclesiam Fundanam. Sic te Terracinese ecclesie cardinalem constituit esse sacerdotem, ut et Fundensis ecclesie pontifex esse non desinas" (Thomassin, pt. ii. lib. 3, cap. 10).

In other cases a vacant diocese was simply committed to the care of a neighbouring bishop till a successor could be appointed. This was in the earlier times the most common species of commend, and was of course temporary only.

Sometimes there was a kind of double commend, the pope commending to the care of a neighbouring bishop a diocese whose own diocesan was occupied in administering the affairs of another church previously commended to him.

In other instances, again, where a bishop was under sentence of penance, the affairs of his church were entrusted to another, or to the metropolitan, until he was restored. "Emeritense Concilium Metropolitanum commendavit ecclesiam eorum episcoporum, qui ad poenitentiam accedere jussi fuerant, quod a Concilio Provinciali abfuisse" (Thomassin, pt. ii. lib. 3, c. 11).

In one instance Childeric appears to have commended a diocese to the care of an abbot (ibid.).

At first the bishop to whom a diocese was commended appears only to have received his actual expenses. Gregory the Great, however, when Paulus had charge of Naples during a vacancy, directed as follows:—"Prædicto Paulo centum solidos et unum pævulum orphanum quem ipse elegerit pro labore suo de eadem ecclesia facias dari" (ibid. c. 10).

DIocese

By degrees large profits were derived from a commend, and it thus became an object of ambition, and was bestowed by popes and sovereigns without reason and to the prejudice of the Church. In later times it became a flagrant abuse, but its worst forms belong perhaps mainly to a period beyond our present limits. It came to be held in perpetuity, instead of for a limited period, and the revenues of two or more sees were accumulated upon one person as a provision for life.

One peculiar kind of commend, must not be omitted, viz. where a part of the revenues of a church was assigned to a great lay noble, in return for his taking on himself its defence against its heathen or other enemies. Such protectorates were common in the more disturbed periods. They are styled 'commendæ militares.' In the same manner and on like grounds the sovereigns retained to themselves portions of church property. But the subject of Commendæ is too large to be discussed at length here. The learning of the whole subject will be found in Thomassin.

The limits of dioceses were probably fixed in the first instance by local or accidental circumstances. They differed widely in size and population. Details on these points will be found under NOTITIA. It is more important to observe that when too large they were, not unfrequently, divided, as in the following instance:—

In the Council of Lucus Augusti, or Lugo, under King Theodemir, anno 569, a complaint was made that the dioceses in Gallæcia (in Spain) were so large that the bishops could scarce visit them in a year; upon which an order was made, that several new bishoprics and one new metropolis should be erected, which was accordingly done by the bishops then in council, who made Lugo to be the new metropolis, and raised several other episcopal sees out of the old ones, as declared in the acts of that council" (Bing, ix. vi. § 16).

As his own diocese was the proper sphere of the action of a bishop, in acting in the diocese of another he was under certain restrictions. These prevailed at all times to a greater or less degree, but seem eventually to have been laid down in

* "The Diocese," says Milman, "grew up in two ways— 1. In the larger cities the rapid increase of the Christians led necessarily to the formation of separate congregations, which to a certain extent, required each its proper organization, yet invariably remained subordinate to the single bishop. In Rome, towards the beginning of the 4th century, there were above forty churches, rendering allegiance to the prelate of the metropolis. 2. Christianity was first established in the towns and cities, and from each centre diffused itself with more or less success into the adjacent country. In some of these country congregations, bishops appear to have been established, yet their chorępiscopi, or rural bishops, maintained some subordination to the head of the Mother Church; or where the converts were fewer, the rural Christians remained members of the Mother Church in the City. In Africa, from the immense number of bishops, each community seems to have had its own superior; but this was peculiar to this province. In general, the churches adjacent to the towns or cities either originally were, or became, the diocese of the City Bishop: for as soon as Christianity became the religion of the State, the power of the rural bishops was restricted, and the office as length was either abolished, or fell into disuse."—History of Christianity, Book iv. ch. 1.

the Inter canon law as follows, viz. that a bishop may perform divine offices and use his episcopal habit in the diocese of another, without leave, but not perform any act of jurisdiction; and it has even been said, that jurisdiction cannot be exercised by a bishop of another place, though with the consent of the diocesan, except over such as willingly submit themselves to his authority. And where the holder of a benefice in one diocese resides in another, the bishop in whose diocese he resides may proceed against him for an offence, but the punishment, so far as it affects his benefice, is to be carried out by the bishop where the benefice is (Gibson's Codex, pp. 133, 134).

See also BISHOP: EXARCH: PARISH.

Authorities: Thomassinus, Vetus et Nova Ecclesie disciplina. Bingham, Ayliffe, Parergon Juris Canonici. Suicer's Thesaurus, s. v. Διοκλής and ερανοπήγιον. [B. S.]

DIOCLES, martyr at Histrias (? Iстриa), commemorated May 24 (Mart. Rom. Vet., Adonis, Usuardi). [W. F. G.]

DIODORUS. (1) Presbyter, martyr at Rome with Marianne the deacon and many others; commemorated Dec. 1 (Mart. Usuardi). [W. F. G.]

(2) of Perga, ἱεροδρόμος; commemorated April 21 (Cal. Byzant.). [W. F. G.]

DIODOTUS, Saint, of Africa; commemorated with Anesius, March 31 (Mart. Usuardi). [W. F. G.]

DIOGENES, Saint, in Macedonia; commemorated April 6 (Mart. Usuardi). [W. F. G.]

DIOMEDES, martyr at Nicæa, A.D. 288; commemorated June 9 (Mart. Usuardi); Aug. 16 (Cal. Byzant.). [W. F. G.]

DIONYSIA. (1) Martyr at Lamosacum with Peter, Andrew, and Paul; commemorated May 15 (Mart. Adonis, Usuardi). [W. F. G.]

(2) Martyr in Africa with seven others; commemorated Dec. 6 (Mart. Rom. Vet., Adonis, Usuardi). [W. F. G.]

DIONYSIUS. (1) Martyr in Lower Armenia with Emilianus and Sebastian; commemorated Feb. 8 (Mart. Rom. Vet., Hieron., Adonis, Usuardi).

(2) Martyr; commemorated with Ammonius, Feb. 14 (Mart. Adonis, Usuardi).

(3) Martyr at Aquileia with Hilarus the bishop, Tatian the deacon, Felix and Largus; commemorated March 16 (Mart. Usuardi).

(4) Bishop of Corinth; commemorated April 8 (Mart. Usuardi).

(5) Saint, uncle of Pancratius; commemorated May 12 (Mart. Rom. Vet., Adonis, Usuardi).

(6) Bishop and confessor under Constantius; deposition at Milan, May 25 (Mart. Hieron., Adonis, Usuardi).

(7) Martyr at Sinnada with Democritus and Secundus; commemorated July 31 (Mart. Usuardi).

(8) Saint, of Phrygia; commemorated Sept. 20 (Ib.).

(9) The Areopagite, bishop of Athens and martyr under Adrian; commemorated Oct. 3 (Mart. Rom. Vet., Adonis, Usuardi, Cal. Byzant.); Oct. 17 (Cal. Armen.).

(10) Bishop of Paris, and martyr with Rusticus the presbyter and Eleutherius the deacon; commemorated Oct. 9 (Mart. Rom. Vet., Hieron., Bedae, Adonis, Usuardi).

(11) Patriarch of Alexandria, and martyr under Valerian and Gallienus, A.D. 265; commemorated Nov. 17 (Mart. Rom. Vet., Adonis, Usuardi). Maskarram 17 = Sept. 14 (Cal. Ethiop.).

(12) The Pope, under Claudius II.; deposition at Rome Dec. 26 (Mart. Hieron., Usuardi); Dec. 27 (Cal. Bacher.).

(13) Martyr with Petrus Lampasacenus and his companions; commemorated May 18 (Cal. Byzant.).

(14) One of the Seven Sleepers of Ephesus; commemorated Oct. 22 (Cal. Byzant.). [W. F. G.]

DIOS, Asceta, Holy Father, under Theodosius the Great; commemorated July 19 (Cal. Byzant.). [W. F. G.]

DIOSCORUS. (1) Martyr under Numerian; commemorated Feb. 25 (Mart. Rom. Vet., Hieron., Adonis, Usuardi).

(2) The reder, martyr in Egypt; commemorated May 18 (Mart. Rom. Vet., Adonis, Usuardi).

(3) Martyr at Alexandria, with Hieron, Arsenius, and Isidorus, under Decius; commemorated Dec. 14 (Ib.). [W. F. G.]

DIOSCURUS, Patriarch of Alexandria, A.D. 454; commemorated Maskarram 7 = Sept. 4, and Tekemt 17 = Oct. 14 (Cal. Ethiop.). [W. F. G.]

DIOSPOLIS, or LYDDA, probably RAMAS (COUNCIL OF), A.D. 415, of 14 bishops under their metropolitan, Eulogius of Caesarea; where Pelagius, having been examined, by anathematizing 12 propositions that had been imputed to him, and making profession of 12 orthodox propositions in their stead, was acquitted, and declared to be in the communion of the Catholic Church (Mansi, iv. 311-20). [E. S. F.]

DIPPING. [BAPTISM.]

DIPTYCHS. (Δίπτυχα λεπὰ δέματα, καρδολόγος; diptycha, matriculæ, nomina, tabulæ.)

1. The name of diptych is given to a tablet, primarily two-leaved, as the word implies, in which were contained the names of Christians, living and dead, to be recited during the celebration of the Eucharist. It would seem that the origin of the custom is to be referred to the primitive practice by which the members of a church brought offerings of bread and wine from which were taken the sacred elements. Then, before the consecration, the names of those who had so contributed were read aloud, as well as those of deceased members of the church whom it was wished specially to commemorate.

This primary use was subsequently extended so as to include the names, on the one hand, of sovereigns, patriarchs, bishops, and the like, as well as of those who had deserved well in any way of the church; while, on the other hand, in conjunction with departed saints and confessors, a special mention was thought desirable in each church of those who had previously been its bishops. The great length to which these lists necessarily grew caused the habit of reciting them fully to be subsequently abandoned, but in some form or other the practice has been retained in both the Eastern and the Roman Church.

This custom was doubtless primarily suggested as to its form by the practice which prevailed

under pre-wont to people, tablets taining ment of de expe Epist. ii Consul ible, b the use hethen
Athens
2. Di
ndraw;
We shall subject
Church,
in which prelates, commen rate the in these calendars illustrati episcopate of St. Ch inverte
p. 333;
refused h denial of were stron the usual Hist. Eccl
v. 35).
Another
tius Fortun Patrol. lxx.

* Nomina Cul b

The names recited, as of the Euc eedings of the Catholi find the re Cocellianus Ejus nomen communicat (Coll. iii. c Concil. Cou
It will be no connecti the dead, fo to be of tho fact the wo a mention o Hias (see p. denial in th pested, righ tedox view erred, whet design, migh find Anastasi de diptychis
... Cyri, error orthodo foun, 'Agath
This power
CHRIST. AN

the Second Council of Vasio (529 A.D.), "ut nomen Domini Papae, quicumque sed apostolice praefuerit, in nostris ecclesiis recitetur." (can. 4, Labbé, iv, 1680; cf. Stagg. ii, Germani et aliorum post Epist. 40 Hormisdæ Papae, ibid. 1484; where allusion is made to the omission of all names, save of the pope only, in the celebration of the Mass at Scampae, a usage of which Martene, p. 145 n, gives some later examples.)

After the mention of the names of ecclesiastics of various grades came that of the sovereign, as mentioned in the above quoted passage of Maximus; and among those who had deserved well of the church in various ways we find special mention enjoined by the Council of Merida (666 A.D.) of the names of those who had rebuilt a church (Concil. Emeritense, c. 19; Labbé, vi, 507).

From these diptycha vivorum also, as we have seen in the previous case of the Labellæ episcopales, a name might be removed, justly or unjustly, as, e.g., in the case of Vigilius (Baluzius, Collectio Novi Conciliorum, 1542). Thus too we find Augustine threatening, in case of certain conduct unbecoming to the clerical office, "delebo eum de tabulâ clericorum" (Serm. 356, vol. v, 2059, ed. Gaume); and in another passage of the same father, we find him protesting against an unjust exercise of this punishment (Epist. 78, vol. ii, 276). Again, we find the name of Pope Felix III. erased from the diptychs by Aecius, and after his death restored by Euthymius, who erased at the same time that of Peter Mongus (Theophanes, 480-81 A.D. pp. 205, 206, ed. Classen). Felix, however, ungraciously returned this by refusing to recognise Euthymius, from his having retained the names of Aecius and Phravites (op. cit. 483 A.D. p. 209).

4. Diptycha mortuorum.—We shall now refer briefly to the diptychs containing the names of the faithful dead. And here it will be obviously seen that the essence of the practice of a recital of names at all was the wish to maintain and keep alive the spirit of Christian brotherhood; and when Christianity had taught men that, whether living or dead in the flesh, all faithful were alike living members of Christ's Church, it would be natural to add the names of those who had gone before in the faith and fear of God. How soon this became complicated with the idea of prayers for the dead this is not the place to discuss.

As to the manner in which the diptychs of the dead are introduced in Greek liturgies, we find in that of St. Mark, ὁ δὲ διόκωνος τὰ διπτύχα τῶν κεκοιμημένων (i. e. reads), and, similarly, in that of St. Chrysostom, ὁ δὲ διόκωνος τῶν τε κεκοιμημένων καὶ ζώντων, ὡς βούλεται, ἀμνημονεῖ. The prayer of the priest, which follows, runs in the former case thus, καὶ τούτων πάντων τὰς ψυχὰς ἀνάστασον, θέσποτα Κύριε ὁ Θεὸς ἡμῶν, ἐν ταῖς τῶν ἁγίων σου σκηναῖς This might be illustrated by the passage of Chrysostom already referred to (Epist. i. 2): "Non est quod pro dormitōne ejus nūd vos fiat oblatio, nō deprecatio aliqua nomine ejus in ecclesiâ frequentetur."

This commemoration of and prayer for the faithful dead is found in the Gregorian Sacramentary after the consecration, and thereupon follows a prayer, entitled in the Sacramentary Super Diptycha (the Collectio post Nomina of the Mozarabic Missal), which we cite: "Memento etiam, Domine, famulorum famularumque tuorum Illi, qui nos praecesserunt cum signo fidei et dormiunt in somno pacis. Ipsis, Domine, et omnibus in Christo quiescentibus, locum refrigerii et lucis et pacis nō indulgens deprecamur."

Among others, the names of deceased emperors of undoubted orthodoxy were mentioned. Thus Pope Nicholas I. (ob. 887 A.D.), in a letter to the Emperor Michael III., refers to the mention of the names of Constantine, Constans, Theodosius the Great, Valentinian, and other emperors, "inter sacra mysteria" (Epist. 86, Patrol. cix, 959).

The regulation of the Council of Merida, already referred to, ordains the mention of the names of special benefactors, after they have departed this life.

Thus far we have spoken merely of names of individuals inserted in the diptychs, but, besides these, a commemoration was made of the Four Œcumenical Councils, to which practice numerous references are made in the proceedings of the Council held at Constantinople in 530 A.D. under Menas (See, e.g., Labbé, v, 85, 165, 185; the last of which passages furnishes us with a very interesting illustration of the practice, describing how, at the reading of the diptychs, the whole multitude flocked round the sanctuary to listen; and when only the titles of the Four Holy Synods were recited by the deacon, and the names of the archbishops Euphemius and Maceonius and Leo, of blessed memory, all cried with a loud voice, "Glory be to Thee, O Lord!"; and in those of the second Œcumenical Council of Constantinople (e.g. Collatio 2, Labbé, v, 432). There is also a reference to this in the Code of Justinian, in a letter of the emperor to Epiphanius, patriarch of Constantinople, in which he expresses his intention of resisting any attempts to abolish this practice (lib. i. tit. 1. § 7; tom. ii. pt. 1, p. 16, ed. Beck.). Theophanes records an instance of a daring attempt to break through this custom, when Euphrasius, patriarch of Antioch, omitted the Council of Chalcedon from his diptychs, and also the name of Pope Hormisdas (Theophanes, A.D. 513, p. 258).

5. A brief remark may be made here as to sundry variations in the time when the diptychs were recited according to various uses. The primary custom would seem to be, that they were read after the oblation of the bread and wine, and before the consecration. This may be seen, for example, from numerous references in the acts of the council under Menas, spoken of above, which prove this to have been the custom of the Church of Constantinople (see esp. Labbé, v, 185, already quoted). It would appear also that in the Mozarabic Missal and in the ancient Gallican form, the diptychs originally held this place. The same also holds true for the representative of the diptychs in our own liturgy, the prayer for the Church Militant. In the Liturgy of Chrysostom, however, the Mozarabic Missal, and not a few others, as we now have them, the diptychs follow consecration.

In the various forms of the Roman Liturgy, and in the Ambrosian, the commemoration of the living and dead enters into the canon of the Mass, that of the living before, and that of the dead after, consecration. It has been suggested, however, that this too is a modification of an earlier state of things, from a consideration of the wording in of the Lit

Sundry of reciting times they plified by from the stom, to w see also J. (l. c.). (2) that the su trychs behl Mass (Cal edition of (p. 248), " nam vel a verentur repeated th mentioned in an, c. vii where the s priest. (5) tablets we the names whom the we find a fo n. 180), " M morandum tana consec views, at any

For some church of R the purpose

The name the names first becomi (Dion. Areo)

6. Liturgical gang article De Antiquis nice, 1783; διπτύχα; B monasticon Patrum. Re De Diptychis Hale Magd. tibi profun Prelectio on

DIPTYCH

TATION O diptych now (see infra, n. 1179), and a 5th century, of these relic Martigny give from Donati's bated to a calul, A.D. empire, 16th Ac. 508). It size in Gori, v coronopias, w then and bar they are car wrought folin symmetry of show itself. The use of fol in simularumque inorum cum signo fidelit dur-Ipsis, Domine, et omniribus, locum refrigerii et nas deprecamur."

of deceased emperor were mentioned. Thus 7 A.D.), in a letter to the refers to the mention of of, Constans, Theodosius and other emperors, (Epist. 86, Patrol. exx.) of Council of Morila, al-ains the mention of the factors, after they have ten merely of names of in-the diptychs, but, besides on was made of the Four which practice numerous the proceedings of the atnople in 536 A.D. under ble, v. 85, 165, 185; the furnishes us with a very of the practice, describing the diptychs, the whole of the sanctuary to list; ; es of the Four Holy Synods eonus, and the names of and Maceonius and y, all cried with a loud ee, O Lord!"; and in this tical Council of Constanti-Labbé, v. 432). There is in the Code of Justinian, eror to Epiphanius, patrie, in which he expresses any attempts to abolish t. 1. § 7; tom. ii. pt. 1, p. hances records an instance o break through this cuss, patriarch of Antioch, of Chalcedon from his dipme of Pope Hormisias (p. 258).

may be made here as to he time when the diptychs to various uses. The ld seem to be, that they oblation of the bread and consecration. This may be on numerous references in il under Menas, spoken of is to have been the custom stantinople (see esp. Labbé, i). It would appear also e Missal and in the ancient ptychs originally held this o holds true for the reepts in our own Liturgy, the Militant. In the Liturgy ver, the Mozarabic Missal, as now have them, the eration.

ms of the Roman Liturgy, an, the commemoration of nters into the canon of the ing before, and that of the on. It has been suggested, o is a modification of the from a consideration of the wording in the Gelasian Sacramentary. [CANON OF THE LITURGY, p. 271.]

Sundry differences also exist as to the manner of reciting the names on the diptychs. (1) Sometimes they were read, by the deacon, as is exemplified by the citations we have already given from the liturgies of St. Mark and St. Chrysostom, to which others might have been added.
See also Jerome (in Execr. l. c.) and Maximus (l. c.) (2) In some churches it would appear that the subdeacon recited the names on the dip-tychs behind the altar. Thus, in an ancient Mass (Code Ritoldi) published by Moward in his edition of the Gregorian Sacramentary, we find (p. 246), "Subdicconi a retro altari, ubi memora-nam vel nomina vivorum et mortuorum nominarentur. . . ." (3) Frequently the priest himself repeated the names. (4) A curious plan is that mentioned by Fulenius (De Gestis Abbatum Lobiensium, c. vii. in D'Achery's Spicilgium, vi. 551), where the subdeacon whispered the names to the priest. (5) We find even that in some cases the tablets were merely laid upon the altar, with the names of the offerers and benefactors, of whom the priest made general mention. Thus we find a form cited by Pamelius (Liturg. Lat.
n. 180), "Memento . . . quorum nomina ad memorandum conscripsimus, ac super sanctum altare tuum conscripta adesse videtur." The two last views, at any rate, however, are clearly quite late.

For some remarks on a plan whereby, in the church of Ravenna, a clausule was made to serve the purpose of diptychs, see Ducange (s. v.).

The name of diptych was also given to registers, when they were entered, as occasion required, the names of newly baptized persons, as they first becoming members of the Christian family (Dion. Areop. Hier. Eccl. c. 11). [REGISTER.]

6. Literature.—For the matter of the foregoing article we are mainly indebted to Martene, De Antiquis Ecclesie litibus, i. 145, sqq. ed. Venice, 1783; Ducange's Glossarium, s. v. Diptycha, Africa; Bingham's Antiquities, xv. 3; and the Onomasticon (s. v.) appended to Roswey's Vitae Patrum. Reference may also be made to Salig, De Diptychis Veterum, tum profanis, quae in sacris, Halae Magd. 1731; Donati, Dei officii depl. anti-quissimi praxani e sacri, Lucua, 1753; Gibbings, Predlection on the Diptychs, Dublin, 1864. [R. S.]

DIPTYCHS, EXTERIOR ORNAMENTATION OF.—As the most ancient consular diptych now known is referred to Stilicho in 405 (see infra, and Gori, vol. i. p. 126, ed. fol. Flor.
1779), and only one purely ecclesiastical one is mentioned even as conjecturally earlier than the 5th century, it will be inferred that the interest of these relics is historical rather than artistic.
Martigny gives a highly reduced copy of one from Donati's Dittica depl. Antic. p. 149, attributed to a certain Arebinus the Younger, consul, A.D. 506, in the eastern parts of the empire, 16th year of Anastasius (Baronius, ad An. 508). It is beautifully engraved in folio size in Gori, v. 1. Its ornaments consist of two coruscipius, with the titles of the consul above them and baskets of fruit and flowers below; they are carved with leaves and connected by wreathed foliage in which the stiff conventional symmetry of Roman-Byzantine art begins to show itself. Gori calls it the Diptych of Lucua.
The use of folding tablets in the services of the church seems to have been a matter of common convenience, like their use anywhere else. But many of these carvings remain, which have evidently been altered from profane uses to ecclesiastical, and still retain the original bas-reliefs with changes and adaptations. Others, again, like that of Rambona, are entirely Christian in their origin. The most ancient of the latter class is considered by Martigny to be the property of the Cathedral of Milan (Bignati, Memorie di S. C. Iso in f.n.), and is referred to the 4th century from the character of its sculptures.

He cites others, whose coverings are lost or separated from them, whether they were of wood, ivory, or metal. That of Arebinus bears the cross, as also the Greek diptych of Flavian Taurus Clementinus (Gori, tab. ix. and x. p. 260, vol. i.). The Rambona ivory, though only of the 9th century, is for the most interesting in existence. (See art. CATHRIX for a full description and woodcut; and Gori, Thes. Vet. Diptychorum, vol. iii.) It is stated by MS. Laurent, Iconographie de la Croix et du Crucifix, in Didron's Annales Archeologiques, xv. xxvi.-vii., to have been presented to the monastery of Rambona (March of Ancona) by Agiltrude, wife of Guy,

d. of Spoleto; and is of type more barbaric than the Lombard work of Verona, bearing great resemblance, in the large unmeaning faces and eyes of its figures, to many Irish and Saxon MSS.
Many ancient diptychs have been used for bindings of more recent service-books; as a tablet which now covers a copy of the Gospels of St.
Luke and St. John in the Vatican. Our Lord between two angels and the Magi before Herod can be traced in it. At the Cathedral of Vercelli, at St. Maximus in Trèves, and at Besançon, there are relics of this kind. Gori's Thesaurus, and Pacinaudi's De Cultu S. Joannis Baptistae, contain many and most interesting records and illustrations, chiefly of Middle-Age works.

The Lambona ivory, with two others of greater antiquity, are described and represented in Buonarroti's Ucri, p. 231. One of them is that of the Consul Basilus, in 541; the other, which Buonarroti supposes to be more ancient, is called the Diptych of Romulus, and represents his apotheosis.

The Florentine edition of Gori's Thesaurus Veterum Diptychorum, 1755, contains a fine engraving of the half of the Diptych of Stilicho which remains in existence (see woodcut.) The consul is seated at the top, with the usual barbaric stolidity of expression, in toga picta, and erule chair: the amphitheatre and combats of wild beasts are represented below. That of Boethius, which succeeds, has standing figures of the consul, with a head of disproportioned size, but a countenance evidently studied with great care: he bears a sceptre, surmounted by an eagle, drawn with much spirit. Stilicho to all appearance, and Boethius undoubtedly, hold the mappa, the signal of beginning the games, in the right hand, as also the elder or prior Arcobindus. Gori, i. tab. vii., where the bestiarii and their opponents are of considerable merit. The erule chairs are evidently the originals of those represented in Saxon and early Norman MSS.

The Christian Diptychs of Milan, in use in the 12th century, and conjectured to belong to the 7th or 8th, are represented in Gori, vol. iii. p. 264, sqq. They represent the history of the New Testament; and in particular, the Nativity, the Transfiguration, and the Passion of our Lord. They must certainly be well within our allotted period of the first eight centuries. Those of Monza (Murray, Handbook N. Italy, p. 164) are referred to either Claudian, Ausonius, or Boethius. Another, bearing two consuls, surnamed David and Pope Gregory by later possessors of the diptych, is highly interesting. [R. St. J. T.]

DIRECTANEUS. Any psalm, hymn, or canticle, said in the service of the Church in monotone, without inflection, was called directaneus. It is probably to this monotone that Isidore refers when he says (De Eccl. Off. v. 5) that the primitive Church used a very simple kind of chant, more like mere recitation than singing. Aurelian (Republ. ad Virgines, c. 40) gives the following direction: "Ad Lucernarium, Directaneus parvulus, id est, 'Regina terne, 'Cantate Deo,' &c.;" and he further directs that at Nocturns the directaneus "Miserere mei Deus" should be said. Compare the Rule of Benedict, c. 17; and that of Caesarius of Arles, c. 31. [C.]

DIS MANIBUS. [CATACOMBS, p. 308.]

DISCIPLINA ARCANI, a term of post-Reformation controversy (it is used by Tenzel and Schelstrate in special dissertations A.D. 1683-5), is applied to designate a number of modes of procedure in teaching the Christian faith, akin to one another in kind, although differing considerably in character; which prevailed from about the middle of the 2nd century until the natural course of circumstances rendered any system which involved secrecy or reserve impossible. So far as these were ac-feasible, they arose out of the principles, 1. of imparting knowledge of the truth by degrees, and in methods adapted to the capacity of the recipients; and 2. of cutting off occasion of profaneness or of more hardened unbelief by not proclaiming the truths and mysteries of the faith indiscriminately, or in plain words, or at once, to unbelievers. And these principles find their origin, and their defence, respectively in the apostle's distinction between "milk for babes," and "strong meat" for those "of full age" (Heb. v. 12-14), and again, between speaking to "carnal" and to "spiritual" hearers (1 Cor. iii. 1); and in our Lord's prohibition against "casting that which is holy to dogs," or "throwing pearls before swine," together with the habitual tone of His teaching, and in particular its parabolic character. Persecution also at first compelled to secrecy. Upon such grounds there arose, as the Church became systematized and settled, first, a distinction between catechumens and fideles, and between different classes of catechumens, with respect to the kinds and amounts of knowledge to be imparted to each successively; and, secondly, a spirit, rather than a formal system, of habitual reticence upon the higher and more mysterious doctrines of the faith, in Christian writings or sermons likely to be read or heard by the heathen. But beyond these natural and reverent practices, the desire to meet the ancient philosophers on their own ground, and on the one hand to rationalize Christian doctrines, on the other to transcendentalize the theories of reason into anticipations and foreshadowings of the mysteries of the faith, assisted by the excess of the allegorizing principle of interpretation current in the Alexandrian Church, produced a special disciplina arcana, almost wholly at Alexandria, yet prevailing in a less degree elsewhere also, from the time of Clement of Alexandria and Origen; in which the doctrines and facts of Scripture were expounded esoterically to the initiated, who had the key to them in the true gnōsis, while their real and deeper meaning was disguised and withheld by an "oecomy," or "accommodation," from others.

1. First, as regards catechumens, the earliest intimation of any system of secrecy is in Tertullian: "Omnibus mysteriis silentii fides adhibetur" (Apol. vii.); and again, speaking of heretics, "Quis catechumens, quis fidelis, incertum est; pariter audiant, pariter orant; etiam ethnici si supervenerint, sacrum cibus et porcis margaritas, licet non veras, jactabant" (Præcor. adv. Hæret. xli.). And the latter complaint, respecting catechumens, is repeated two centuries afterwards by Epiphanius (Hæc. xlii. n. 3), and by St. Jerome (Comment. in Galat. vi.), with reference to the Marcionites. Later writers than Tertullian specify particulars, e.g. baptism, the eucharist, and the oil of chrism, & οὐδὲ ἐποστρέβειν ἔξεστι τοῖς ἀνόμοις (St. Basil. M., De Spir. 8. xxvii.); and St. Greg. Naz. (Orat. xl. De Bapt.), "Ἐχει τοῦ μυστηρίου τὰ ἔκτορα καὶ ταῖς τῶν πολλῶν ἀκοαῖς οὐκ ἀπόβητα, τὰ δὲ ἄλλα εἶσα μαθήση; and St. Cyril of Jerusalem (Catech. vi. c. 30), οὐδὲ τῶν μυστηρίων εἰς κατηγορούμενων λευκῶς λαλοῦμεν, ἀλλὰ πάλαι πολλὰ καὶ λέγομεν ἐπιμεκασθόμενοι, ἵνα οἱ ἰδόντες πιστοὶ γινώσκωσι. καὶ οἱ μὴ εἰδότες μὴ βλαβῶσι. And the Apost. Canons (lxxxv.) speak of αἰ royal . . .

 τὴ ἐν αὐτῶν tion in t Liturgies, μένον, μ
 "missa
 Serna. xli
 A.D. 398,
 Cassian, C
 A.D. 524,
 c. 19, "A admittend
 c. 5, μὴ ἀρρωστῶν consecrati bishop: S nation (H from deta
 "which t renell'd t was celeb Hom. in t body, even the Anaph guarded b admittit Pseudo-Au missis jam celestibus the same e Indictio . .
 Gandentio
 all the co Jerusalem, his princ
 "the comm ents to t should ask directions and further tually rec (νευμπέρον tions were less advan
 Lord's Pra
 Aug. Ench
 r. 28, and Chrys. Hom
 St. Ambros Bened.); S mach. (ed.
 Trinity St
 being tought in St. Aug baptism (St the second floed durin also were n further, in as above),
 A.D. 441, c.
 Valentin. A.
 II. Apart
 chumens, th at least the speaking plu faith, in wr hatlien. O 325), eunu hidden, men surrection o dead, and th

of the principles, I. of the truth by degrees, and to the capacity of the fitting occasion of protracted unbelief by not and mysteries of the or in plain words, or at And these principles find ence, respectively in the "milk for babes" or those "of full age" in, between speaking to "ritual" hearers (1 Cor. rd's prohibition against is holy to dogs," or e swine," together with teaching, and in particu- Persecution also ecy. Upon such grounds h become systematized in between catechu- between different classes of pect to the kinds and to be imparted to each dly, a spirit, rather than ertial reticence upon the ritual doctrines of the ings or sermons likely to e heathen. But beyond ract practices, the desire ntrospicers on their own one hand to rationalize he other to transcend re- n- reason into anticipations he mysteries of the faith, of the allegorizing prin- rrent in the Alexandrian pical discipuli arcani, and also, yet prevailing in rna, from the time of and Origen; in which the ripture were expounded tled, who had the key to risis, while their real ad- gused and withheld by "accommodation," from catechumens, the earliest of secrecy is in Ter- ysteris silentii fides ad- and again, speaking of umenus, quis fidelis, in- audiant, pariter orant: cenerit, sanctum casibus et non veris. jactabat" (li.). And the latter com- ments, is repeated two y Epiphanius (Haer. xlii e (Comment. in Galat. vi.). Larcionites. Later writers, particulars, e. g. baptis- e oil of christm, & οὐδὲ τῆς ἀμύθητος (St. Basil, N. d St. Greg. Naz. (Orat. N. μυστηρίων τὰ ἱερόρα καὶ αἷς οὐκ ἀπόρητα, τὰ δὲ ἐν αὐτοῖς μυστηρίων ἐκ τῶν ἀποστόλων, ἀλλὰ πάλαι ἐκαλυμμένως, ἵνα οἱ ἰσθῆσι μὴ εἰδότες μὴ βλαβῶσι. (lxxiv.) speak of it dis-

καὶ . . . ἄς οὐ χρὴ δημοσιεῖν ἐπὶ πάντων διὰ τὰ ἐν αὐτοῖς μυστικά. Similarly the proclamation in the Apost. Constit. (viii. 12) and in the Liturgies, Μὴ τις καταχυμμένων, μὴ τις ἀκροωμένων, μὴ τις τῶν ἀίστων. And the phrase, "missa catechumenorum," used In St. Aug. Serm. xlix. A.D. 396, Conc. Carthag. IV. c. 84, A.D. 398, and Conc. Nerd. A.D. 523, c. 4, and Jo. Cassian, Coenob. Institut. xi. 15, and Conc. Valent. A.D. 524, c. 1. So Conc. Arausic. I. A.D. 441, c. 19, "Ad baptismum catechumeni nunquam admittendi." And while Conc. Laodic. A.D. 365, c. 5, μη δέιν τὰς χειροτονίας ἐπὶ παρουσίᾳ ἐκρωμένων γένεσθαι may possibly refer to the consecration, as probably as to the election, of a bishop: St. Chrysostom certainly speaks of ordination (Hom. xvii. in 2 Cor.), when he refrains from detailing what takes place at a χειροτονία, "which the initiated know; for all may not be revealed to the uninitiated." The eucharist again was celebrated with closed doors (St. Chrys. Hom. in Matt. xiii.), not to be opened to anybody, even one of the faithful, at the time of the Anaphora (Apost. Constit. viii. 11), and to be guarded by the deacons, lest any unbeliever or uninitiated person enter (ib. ii. 57). So again Pseudo-Augustin (Serm. ad Neophyt. i.), "Dismissis jam catechumenis, . . . quia specialiter de coelestibus mysteriis loquentur sumus." And to the same effect, St. Ambrose (De His Qui mysteriis Injulantur. c. 1), Theoret (Quaest. xv. in Num.), Gaudentius (Serm. II. ad Neophyt.), and above all the catechetical lectures of St. Cyril of Jerusalem, which are framed expressly upon this principle, and the preface to which forbids the communication of their more advanced contents to those who are without, if any such should ask what St. Cyril had said. See also the directions to widows in Apost. Constit. iii. 5. Lastly, and further still, besides this general and perpetually recurring distinction between initiated (μεμνημένοι) and uninitiated (ἀμύητοι), distinctions were made between the more and the less advanced of the latter themselves: the Lord's Prayer; Constit. Apostol. vii. 44; St. Aug. Enchirid. c. 71; Theodoret, Uterc. Fab. v. 28, and Epit. Div. Decret. c. xviii.; St. Chrys. Hom. xx. xl. xix. in Matt.; the Creed; St. Ambrose, Ad Marcell. Epist. 33 (20 ed. Bened.); St. Jerome, Epist. xxxviii. Ad Pamm. (ed. Ben.); and the doctrine of the Holy Trinity (St. Cyril Hieros. Catech. vi. 30), being taught only to the competentes, the first, in St. Augustine's time, only eight days before baptism (St. Aug. Hom. xlii., Conc. Agath. c. 13), the second at some like period, and the last mentioned during the last forty days. Catechumens also were allowed to hear the sermon, but no further, in the African Church (Conc. Carthag. above), in that of Gaul (from Conc. Arausic. I. A.D. 441, c. 18), and in that of Spain (from Conc. Valentia. A.D. 524, c. 1).

II. Apart from the special discipline of catechumens, the Christian fathers, from the 2nd to at least the 5th century, habitually refrain from speaking plainly of the deeper mysteries of the faith, in writings or sermons accessible to the heathen. Origen, e. g. (Cont. Cels. i. 7, Opp. i. 325), enumerating the doctrines that were not hidden, mentions the birth, crucifixion, and resurrection of our Lord, the resurrection of the dead, and the last judgment, but omits the doctrines of the Holy Trinity and of the Atonement (compare St. Paul's account of the elements of the faith in Heb. vi.). St. Cyril of Jerusalem (Lect. Catech. vi. 30; Op. i. 106, ed. 1720) tells us, that it is not permitted to speak to a heathen of the mystery of the Holy Trinity. Sozomen omits the Nicene creed from his history (i. 20), expressly because that work would probably be read by heathen readers. St. Chrysostom will not speak fully of baptism in a homily, because of the "uninitiated" among his hearers (Hom. xl. in 1 Cor.). St. Augustine reckons both sacraments among the "occulta" (in Ps. ciii.; see also Hom. xvii. in Jouan., and in Ps. cix.). Pope Innocent I. (Ad Decentium. c. 3) will not recite the words even of Confirmation, "ne magis prodere videant, quam ad consultationem responderent." The last words of the Apostolic Constitutions forbid the making these books public (bk. viii. in fin.): "preach of the mysteries contained in them." So St. Cyril of Alexandria (Cont. Julian. vii.) and many others; while the words of Theodoret (Quaest. xv. in Num.) may be taken as a summary: "We speak obscurely of the Divine mysteries on account of the uninitiated; but when these have withdrawn, we teach the initiated plainly." Such topics are to be mentioned to persons in general "in enigmas and shadows, mystically, not clearly." And any statement about them is repeatedly broken off with "the faithful," or "the initiated, know." Compare also the distinction drawn by St. Cyril of Jerusalem between πρηχέισθαι and ἐνηχέισθαι. The reasons assigned for the practice are:—1. To avoid offence to the weak or to the heathen, οὐκ ἐπει-ῆ ἀσθίειαν κατέγραμεν τῶν θεουμένων, ἀλλ' εἰπεῖθ' ἀτελέστατον ὁ πολλοὶ πρὸς αὐτὰ ἐνδιακύνται (St. Chrys. Hom. in Matt. xxiii. xl. xxiv.), or again, more forcibly, οὐ χρὴ τὰ μυστήρια ἀμύητοις παραφθεῖν, ἵνα μὴ ἔαλητες μὲν ἀγνοοῦντες γελῶσι, καταχόμενοι δὲ περιεργῶν θεουμένοι σκανδαλίζωνται (Conc. Alexandr. ap. St. Athan. Apol. ii.). To which may be added the still more forcible words of St. Clem. Alex. (Strom. i. pp. 323, 324), who says that he suppressed some portions of the truth, not as grudging it, but fearing lest he should put a sword into the hand of a child. 2. Out of reverence: "Adhibuimus tam sanctis rebus atque Divinis honorem silentii" (St. Aug. Serm. i. inter. xl.). To which, 3. St. Augustine adds another of a more superficial kind, viz. the excitement of curiosity; saying to catechumens, "Si non excitat te festivitas (Pascine), dicitur ipsa curiositas," and therefore, "da nomen ad baptismum" (De Verb. Dom. Hom. xlvi.).

It must be added, in order to complete the case, first, that such a principle of reticence is not to be looked for, for obvious reasons, in the earlier Apologists in persecuting times; e. g. there is no trace of it in Justin Martyr, Tatian, Athenagoras, Theophilus (Bingh. X. v. 2). In such cases, the desire to avoid scandal to the weak, and the feeling of reverence for the truth itself, must needs, and rightly, give way to the clear necessity of a plain statement of the whole truth. Next, that the reserve in question was simply (so to say) a temporary educational expedient; and was never practised towards the "faithful" themselves, to whom the whole truth was declared in plain words; and that there are no grounds whatever for supposing the existence of an esoteric system of doctrine, not appearing at all in any of the writings or documents of the earlier church, but brought to light in subsequent centuries, although secretly held all along.

III. So far, there was no question made of the defensibility of the principle of reserve, thus applied; however plain it may be, that it must speedily have become impossible to maintain the practice. It is obviously a perfectly fair proceeding, to withhold truths avowedly from those to whom it will do harm to declare them. The Alexandrian schools, however, seem to have stretched the casuistry of truthfulness to a point beyond this. Controversially, it is no doubt both allowable, and wise, to state the truth in terms as acceptable to the views and prejudices of an opponent as sincerity will permit, but certainly no further. To help a Platonist, e.g. to believe in the doctrine of the Holy Trinity, by pointing out how far Platonism itself advances towards such a doctrine, is plainly as consistent with honesty as it is with good sense; but so to speak as to imply the insincerity of the two doctrines has both actually proved to be a fruitful parent of heresy, and is distinctly not honest. So again it is obviously fair to neutralize an opponent's objection by pointing out that it includes in its range that opponent's own erroneous or incomplete view as well as the orthodox faith; but only if the latter is not confounded with the former as though it were the same thing. An argumentum ad hominem, used as such avowedly, is of course justifiable, so that it be not put forward as the arguer's own bona fide belief. The Alexandrian school, however, seem to have "oecumenized," in managing controversies, both in fact and avowedly, in the extreme sense of the lines of argument thus suggested. St. Clement of Alexandria, for instance, lays down as a principle (Strom. vii. 9), that the true Gnostic, indeed, "bears on his tongue whatever he has in his mind," but it is "to those who are worthy to hear;" adding, that "he both thinks and speaks the truth, unless at any time, medicinally, as a physician for the safety of the sick, he may lie or tell an untruth, as the Sophists say." (Ὅπως ψεύδεται, κἄν ψεύδος λέγῃ. is the Platonic way of putting it.) So also (Strom. vi. 15), Ψεύσται τῷ ὄντι οὐχ ὁ συμπεριφερόμενοι δι' οικονομίαν σωτηρίας, ἀλλ' ὁ εἰς τὰ κυριώτατα παραπίπτοντες, καὶ ἀθεοῦντες μὲν τὸν Κύριον τὸ θεόν ἐν αὐτοῖς, ἀθεοτεροῦντες δὲ τοῦ Κυρίου τὴν ἀληθῆ διδασκαλίαν. And Origen, as quoted by St. Jerome (Adv. Rufin. Apol. i. c. 18), in like manner lays down a caution, implying a like principle, that "homo cui incumbit necessitas mentiendi, diligenter attendat, ut sic utatur luterum mendacis, quomodo condimento atque medicamine, ut servet mensuram ejus: ex quo," he adds, "perspicuum est, quod nisi ita mentiti fuerimus, ut magnum nobis ex hoc aliquod quaeratur bonum, judicandi simus quasi inimici Eius Qui ait, Ego sum veritas." Further, St. Clement also appears to hold an esoteric traditional teaching to have been delivered to St. Peter, St. James, St. John, and St. Paul (Strom. i. i, vi. 7; and v. Euseb. H. E. ii. 1); and Origen likewise (Cont. Cels. i. 7) speaks of an esoteric Christian teaching, but obviously means no more by the terms, at least in this passage, than to affirm the distinction between elementary teaching and the deeper doctrines of the faith as taught successively to catechumens. On the other hand (Cont. Cels. vi.) he speaks of an oral traditional knowledge, ὁ ὑπαρξία πρὸς τοὺς πολλοὺς οὐκ ἔστιν ὄρατά. But St. Clement's γνώσις was not a distinct inner system of doctrine differing from that which was to be taught to the πᾶσι, but rather a different mode of apprehending the same truths, viz. from a more intellectual and spiritual standpoint. In actual fact, we find, by way of instance, St. Gregory of Neo-Caesarea, Origen's pupil, using language respecting the Holy Trinity that is confessedly erroneous, and defeated by St. Basil (Epist. ccx. § 5) on the ground that he was "not teaching doctrine but arguing with an unbeliever," and that in such a case "he would rightly in some things concede to the feelings of the unbeliever, in order to gain him over to the cardinal points." The whole subject will be found ably and profoundly discussed in Newman's Arians, c. i. § iii. pp. 40-102 (3rd edition). How far the practice was borrowed from, or unconsciously furthered by, the undisguised principles and practice of Philo-Judeans on the subject, may be doubted. That writer certainly, both in actual exposition of Scripture and in avowed principle, assumes that duller souls must be taught "falshoods by which they may be benefited, if they cannot be brought to a sound mind through the truth" (Quid Deus sit Immortālis, Opp. i. 282, ed. Mangey). But there is no need for looking beyond Scripture itself for the germ and principle of a true and legitimate "oecumeny." The Alexandrian divines themselves are only responsible for pushing that principle to a degree which made it at least extremely dangerous, and sometimes barely honest. The application of esoteric meanings to Scripture facts by the same school is a parallel case of exaggerating a principle of the analogous sort, possessing a foundation of truth, into extremes that are utterly unjustifiable.

[Newman, Arians (as above quoted); Martigny; Bingham; Schelstrate, De Discipl. Arcani: Moheim, De Reb. Christ. ante Constantin. § xxxv. pp. 302-310; and a special dissertation, De Accommodatione Christo imprimis et Apostolis tributa, by F. A. Carus (Lips. 1793, 4), is referred to.] [A. W. H.]

DISCIPLINE. (1.) From the earliest time the Church has endeavoured, in accordance with the Lord's commands, to maintain its own purity both in life and doctrine. In the earliest ages, the penalties for transgressing the laws of the Church, in whatever respect, were of course of a purely spiritual nature, and enforced by the authority of the Church itself, which had no jurisdiction in invitum. The means which the Church employed for the correction of offenders within her pale were admonition, withdrawal of privileges, the enjoining of acts of mortification, and, in the last resort, exclusion from the Church altogether [EXCOMMUNICATION]. From this constant effort of the ecclesiastical authorities to correct offences, and to purify the Church from scandals by its own power arose the system of Penitential Discipline [PENTENCE], which is common to all members of the Church, lay and clerical, secular and regular.

But besides the general duty of maintaining holy life and true doctrine, which is incumbent on all Ch monastic elves pec these by special au of Monast

What h all ages, v with the e time, when empire wa adopted as by the Sta laws solel its punish who give codes of l rally the f frequently ginally by this in tw laws and p civil code, sanctions:
[see APPEA empowered decisions;
l. 25, *De a change in t verted man regarded by against the ferent aspe in the cogn hearsforthw partly by t the Church to the disc being; and constant ell jurisdiction SITES of the articles been subjec
Church].*

(2.) Monac
ments were rad, in each to the natu
ideas of dis occur very Thus Basil
grees of e the chaunt (Serm. de J. date Jerome fastings as tian; Rufini speaks of off matted, if their excom position) of tion by the ment of all
c. 15). A p his approval ad Marcellin early in the becomes mo offences, such making a m things, or spe

fulth as taught success-On the other hand (Cont.
oral traditional know-οὐδὲ γράμ.
was not a distinct inner ng from that which was ol, but rather a different e same truths, viz. from l spiritual stand-point. l, by way of instance, cesarea, Origen's pupil, g the Holy Trinity that and defended by St. Basil e ground that he was but arguing with an a such a case "he would concede to the feelings er to gain him over to the whole subject will be y discussed in Newman's 102 (3rd edition). How errowed from, or uncone undisguised principles adaeus on the subject, writer certainly, both in ripture and in avowed dollar souls must be which they may be benerought to a sound mind id Deus sit Immutabilis, But there is no need are itself for the germ and legitimate "occasio-divines themselves are ving that principle to a least extremely danger-y honest. The applicato Scripture facts by parallel case of exaggeranalogous sort, possessing, into extremes that (see quoted); Martigny; De Discipl. Arenti: Mo-nate Constantin. § xxxiv. pecial dissertation, De imprimis et Apostolis Lips. 1793, 4), is refer-

[A. W. H.]

From the earliest time ared, in accordance with to maintain its own purity In the earliest ages, essing the laws of the pect, were of course of e, and enforced by the itself, which had no The means which the e correction of offenders e mention, withdrawal of e acts of mortification, eclusion from the Church CATION]. From this eclesiastical authorities to purify the Church from er nose the system of PENSANCE], which is of the Church, lay and lar.
al duty of maintaining ne, which is incumbent on all Christians, the clergy and the members of monastic orders voluntarily take upon themselves peculiar obligations, and the enforcing of these by the proper authorities constitutes a special subdivision of discipline. On the subject of Monastic and Canonical Discipline, see below.

What has been said applies to the Church in all ages, whether before or after its connection with the State. But from the time of Constitution, when the existence of Christianity in the empire was formally recognised, and the Church adopted as an institution guarded and respected by the State, we no longer find its disciplinary laws solely in its own canons and decrees, nor its punishments solely spiritual and over persons who give a voluntary submission. The several codes of the empire not only recognise generally the fact that its subjects are Christian, but frequently adopt and sanction laws enacted originally by purely ecclesiastical authority; and in this two ways. In some cases ecclesiastical laws and principles are simply adopted into the civil code, and enforced by civil tribunals and civil sanctions: in others the ecclesiastical authority [see APPEAL]—generally the BISHOP (p. 231)—is empowered to call in the secular arm to enforce its decisions; see, for instance, Justinian's Code, lib. 1, l. 25, De Epis. Audien. It is evident that this change in the relations of Church and State converted many acts, which had previously been disregarded by the civil power, into crimes, or offences against the sovereign authority, and gave a different aspect to many delicts which still remained in the cognizance of the Church. Discipline was beneficially enforced partly by the spiritual, partly by the secular arm; the State reinforced the Church with more or less vigour according to the disposition of the rulers for the time being; and the ecclesiastical authorities made constant efforts to withdraw the clergy from the jurisdiction of the civil courts altogether [LITUR-GIES OF THE CLERGY; JURISDICTION; and the articles on the several offences which have been subject to censure or punishment in the Church]. [C.]

(2.) Monastic Discipline.—Monastic punishments were of two kinds, corporal and spiritual, and, in each kind, more or less severe, according to the nature of the offence or the founder's ideas of discipline. Instances of both kinds occur very early in the history of monasticism.
Thus Basil of Caesarea speaks of various degrees of excommunication—from joining in the chanting, from choir, and from meals (Serm. de Leon. Instit.), while about the same date Jerome and Rufinus make mention of fastings as a punishment (Hieron. Ep. ad Nepo- litum; Rufin. De Verb. Sen. 29). Augustine speaks of offending monks (fratres) being anathematised, if incorrigible after reproofs, and of their excommunication by their superiors, and of higher or lower rank, the excommunication by the bishop being the severest punishment of all (De Corrupt. et Grat. ad Valent.
c. 15). A passage in one of his letters implies his approval of flogging as a chastisement (Ep. ad Marcellin., 159). In the writings of Cassian, early in the 5th century, monastic discipline becomes more closely defined. For slighter offences, such as coming late to prayers or work, making a mistake in chanting, breaking anything, or speaking to any other monk than the one who shares the cell, the offender is to prostrate himself in the chapel during divine service or to make genuflexions till allowed by the abbot to cease (Cassian, Inst. iv. c. 16). Cassian tells a story of an Egyptian monk doing public penance for having dropped three peas, while acting as cook for the week (Inst. iv. 20). For graver offences, as bad language or greediness, the punishment is flogging or expulsion (Inst. iv.

c. 16). For lingering after nocturns instead of going at once to the cell, a monk is to be excommunicated (ii. 15); no one being allowed to pray with him till he has been publicly absolved (ii. 16). Cassian speaks of a slap or buffet, "alapa," as a punishment among monks (Coll.
xix. l. cf. Greg. M. Dist. op. i. 2, ii. 4). Palladius, about the same date, in describing the monks of Nitria, relates that three whips or scourges hung from a pillar in a part of the church apparently corresponding to a chapter-house, one for the correction of robbers, one for unruly guests, one for the monks (Hist. Laus. 2).
He speaks also of confinement in a cell (ib.
cc. 32, 33). About half a century later the Council of Chalcedon pronounces anathema on a monk returning to the secular life (Conc.
Chalced., c. 7). Being, as a rule, at that date still laics, monks thus offending were anathematised, not degraded. Dorotheus, an Archimdrite in Palestine, very early in the 7th century, speaks of fasting as a punishment for monks (Doctrina, c. 11, np. Ducaen. Aucur. i. 743).
One of the strongest instances of monastic severity in the East is in the Scola of Joannes Climacus, sometimes called Scholasticus,* of Mount Sinai, in the preceding century, who speaks of offenders being dragged by a rope through ashes, their hands bound behind their backs, and flogged till those who witnessed the punishment "howled;" afterwards they were to lie prostrate at the church-door till absolved after public confession (Scola, c. 4).

In the West, too, prior to the Benedictine rule, monastic discipline was very rigorous. Each monastery had its own code; but, probably, in Southern Europe Cassian's influence was felt largely. In the Regula Tarantensis, the rule (c.
550 A.D.) of a monastery in south-eastern France, which Mabillon identifies with that of Turnay, near Vienne (Annot., tom. i. App. ii. Disquis. 5), a monk who jests is to be chidden (c. 13; cf. Bas.
Constit. Monast., c. 13, on secularity). In the rule of Ferreolus, bishop of Uzès, in Languedoc, about the same date, a fast of three days is imposed for jesting during lections (c. 24), and thirty days' silence for railing (c. 22). But the Regula Cujusdam Patris, supposed by Menard to be the rule of Columba (c. 561 A.D.), is stricter still, especially against the murmuring or refractory: even a thoughtless word is visited with imprisonment (c. 8). Columbanus, of Luxeuil and Bobbio (c. 580 A.D.), trod in the steps of his ascetic predecessor. Six blows were to be the penalty for such offences as speaking at refectory, not responding to the grace, not being careful to avoid coughing in chanting, &c.
For other similar transgressions the punishment was the "impositio" of Psalms to be learned by heart, or the "superpositio," complete silence for

* Not Joannes Scholasticus, of the same date, of Antioch and Constantinople (Cave, Hist. Lit. s. v.).

a time (Reg. Columban. c. 10). Darker offences were visited with proportionate severity. Thus, for a perjury the penalty was solitary confinement on bread and water for three years (Columban. De Penitent. Mensur. c. 32; cf. pass.).

The milder discipline of Benedict gradually extended itself, in the 6th and 7th centuries, from Italy even into parts of Europe already occupied by other rules, as was France by that of Columbannus. He prescribed two reproofs in private, followed by one in public, before proceeding to severer remedies. If these were ineffectual, then ensued excommunication, or for those too young or otherwise disqualified for spiritual censures, corporal punishment (Reg. Ben. c. 23). The incorrigible were to be flogged (c. 28); if re-admitted, they were to be placed in the lowest grade (c. 29); cf. Greg. M. Lib. x. l. iv. Ep. 39; Lib. i. Ind. ix. Ep. 19. A breakage or waste was lightly regarded, unless unconfessed (c. 46); and the confession of secret faults was to be made, not in public, but to the dean [DECANUS, § v.] (seniori suo, c. 46). Only the contumacious, after four admonitions, were to be subject to the "disciplina regularis," flogging, with, probably, solitary confinement on bread and water (cc. 3, 65).

Where not adopted as a whole, the Benedictine rule was frequently incorporated with other rules. Thus the rule of Isidore of Seville, in the first part of the 7th century, though more minute in its distinctions, resembles the Benedictine code of punishments (Isid. Reg. c. 17; cf. Mab. Ann. iii. 37, xii. 42). Donatus of Besançon, about the middle of this century, himself a pupil of Columbannus, blended the two rules in one: "disciplina" with him seems to mean flogging or solitary confinement (Don. Reg. ad Frey. c. 2); silence or fifty stripes is the penalty for idle words (c. 28). Later in the century, Fructuosus of Braga in Portugal, founder of the great monastery of Alcala (Complutum) near Madrid, borrowed largely from Benedict (Fruct. Reg. c. 17; cf. Mab. Ann. iii. 37). The Council at Vers, near Paris, 755 A.D., speaks of a prison-cell or flogging-room—"locus custodiae" or "pulsatorium" (Conc. Vern. c. 6). The Harmony of Monastic Rules, compiled in the 9th century by the namesake of the founder of the Benedictines, contains a gradation of punishments, which is on the whole equitable, but too minute (Bened. Anian. Concord. Regul.). In the 12th century the influence of Petrus Damiani introduced a rigour hitherto unknown within the walls of Monte Casino: each monk, after his confession every Friday, was to be whipped, by himself or by others, in cell, chapter, or oratory (Altes. Ascet. vi. 4). In the famous monastery of St. Gall, in Switzerland, the whip for similar purposes was suspended from a pillar in the chapter-house (ib.).

Voluntary flagellations, or self-scourgings, as a recognised part of monastic discipline, began about the middle of the 11th century, at the suggestion of Petrus Damiani (Richard et Giraud, Bi-dict. Sacr. s. v.), or according to Mabillon (Acta SS. Ben. Prælat., Sæc. vi., i. s. 6), rather earlier (cf. Boitenu, l'abbé, Hist. Flagell., 1700 A.D.). [I. G. S.]

(3.) Canonial Discipline.—Though the rule of the Canonici was easier than that of the Monachi, their code of punishments was severe. By Chrodegang's rule, any canon failing to make a full confession at stated times twice a year, was to be flogged or incarcerated (Chrodeg. Reg. c. 14). Any canon guilty of theft, murder, or any grave offence was liable to both these penalties; he was, besides, to do public penance by standing outside the chapel during the "hours," and by lying prostrate at the door as the others were going in and out, and to practise extraordinary abstinence, until absolved by the bishop (c. 15). Any canon speaking to one excommunicated incurred excommunication himself (c. 16). The refractory or contumacious were, after two reproofs, to do open penance by standing beside the cross; they were to be publicly excommunicated, or, if insensible to such a punishment, flogged (c. 17). Lesser offences, if confessed, were to be treated lightly; if detected, severely (c. 18). The measurement and apportionment of penalties was in the hands of the bishop (c. 19). But certain rules to guide the bishop's subordinates, "prelati inferiores" (perhaps - deuts), in the exercise of this discretionary power were laid down by the Council at Aachen, 816 A.D. Boys were to be beaten. Older members of the community were, for more venial faults, as neglecting the "hours," being careless at work or in chapel, late at meals, out without leave or beyond the proper time, after three private admonitions, to be admonished publicly, to stand apart in the choir, and to be kept on bread and water. For a graver fault, "culpa criminalis," unless atoned for by spontaneous penance, they were to be publicly excommunicated, "damnentur," by the bishop, and to be imprisoned, lest they should "taint the rest of the flock" (Conc. Aquisgr. c. 134). It is to be noted that it seems customary then to have a prison within the precincts of the monastery or canonry ("ut fit multis in monasteriis"), and that disobedience, rudeness, or quarrelling are not, as with monks, classed among things of a darker die (ib.). The same council, in a subsequent session, enacted a similar scale of punishment for nuns, "sanctimonialis," with the same climax of solitary confinement for the incorrigible (Conc. Aquisgr. lib. ii. c. 8). The rule was to be recited in chapter very frequently (cc. 69, 70).

DISCOMMUNICANTES

For monastic and canonical discipline generally, see BENEDICTINE RULE, CANONIC, MONACHISM. [I. G. S.]

(4.) From the constant use of the rod or scourge in monastic discipline (see above, § 2) the word disciplina came itself to mean flogging. In the Liber Ordinis S. Victoris Paris., c. 33 (quoted by Ducange) is a full description of the manner in which a monk ought to take punishment (disciplinam accipere). Sometimes disciplina is used with a qualifying word, as "discip. flagelli" (Reg. S. Aurel. c. 41); "discip. corporalis" (Reg. Chrodegang. cc. 3, 4, 14; Capitul. A.D. 803, v. 1). [CORPORAL PUNISHMENT.] [C.]

DISCOFERAE. In convents of nuns the sisters who bring the dishes to table are sometimes called discoferae. Caesarius of Arles (Ad Oratoriam Abbatissarum) gives the direction, "aequalia cibaria potionesque communes exhibent discoferae vel pincernae" (Ducange, s. v.). [C.]

DISCOMMUNICANTES. The second

council
raosa o those w five year ter disco penitent Nleena
capit a
When
equivale from the ary pro

DISC DISC
DISC discussion of the e instance
"Disputa fiel." [C.]

DIST (COMMUN PERITY of; Con Provent

DIUS rated Jul (2) Mi of Alexan monius, i 36 (Mart

DIVIN in the a desire to should sh of super Jews and to practi origia. T oracles, of the time presentati mysterio secrets of mind of t first oppos to leave t laws and West testi against w can hardly whole, to The rev
the old Ch under AST the elabor officially re republic an ramificatio was even as the Cour named anno to Christia their callin (c. 59) execu selves to

* There is

ments was severe. By canon falling to monks twice a year, incarcerated (Chron. Kep.), guilty of theft, murder, or liable to both these penalties to do public penance by chapel during the "hours," at the door as the others, and to practise extra-until absolved by the canon speaking to one excommunication him-ractory or contumacious, to do open penance by; they were to be pub-; if inescapable to such a (17). Lesser offences, if treated lightly; if de-

The measurement and ties was in the hands of certain rules to guide es, "praetuli inferiores," the exercise of this dis-aid down by the Council boys were to be beaten, community were, for more ting the "hours," more chapel, late at meals, out d the proper time, after ions, to be admonished In the choir, and to be er. For a graver fault, ess atoned for by spon- were to be publicly ex-entur," by the bishop, lest they should "taut (Conc. Aquisgr. c. 134). it seems customary then in the precincts of the "at it multus in monas- obedience, rudeness, or s with monks, classed ker die (ib.). The same session, enacted a similar nus, "sanctimoniales," of solitary confinement mc. Aquisgr. lib. ii. c. 8). ted in chapter very fre-monial discipline gener-RULE, CANONIC, MON-

[I. G. S.]

ant use of the rod or discipline (see above, § 2) itself to mean flogging, S. Victoris Pa. is. c. 33 a full description of the uk ought to take punish-ere). Sometimes descri-ifying word, as "discip. (c. 41); "discip. corp-o. c. 3, 4, 14; Capitul. AL PUNISHMENT] [C.] a convents of nuns the lishes to table are some- Caesarians of Arles (Ad gives the direction, "ae-ue communes exhibent" (Ducange, s. v.). [C.]

UNICANTES. The second

council of Arles (c. 10), referring to the eleventh canon of the first council of Nicaea, condemns those who have fallen away under persecution to five years from the catechumens, and two "inter discommunicantes, ita in communionem interpenitentes non praesumant." The canon of Nicaea referred to has "ὅσοι ἐγγὺς ἡμεῶν ἁμαρτίας ἠὲ καὶ τῶν προσευχῶν." When all who offered communicated, this was equivalent to a sentence of exclusion for two years from the mysteries, though not from the preliminary prayers. [See COMMUNION, p. 415.] [C.]

DISCUS. [PATEN.]

DISPENSATION. [INDULGENCE.]

DISPUTATIO. In some monastic Rules a discussion on Scripture, called Disputatio, is one of the exercises prescribed to the monks. For instance the Rule of Paphomius (c. 21) directs: "Disputatio autem Praepositis domorum tertio fit." [Compare COLLOCATION.] [C.]

DISTRIBUTION OF THE ELEMENTS. [COMMUNION, HOLY.]

DISTRIBUTION OF CHURCH PROPERTY. [ALMS; CHURCHES, MAINTENANCE OF; CORN, ALLOWANCE OF; DIVISIO MENSURANA; PROPERTY OF THE CHURCH.]

DIUS. (1) Saint, in Caesarea; commemorated July 12 (Mart. Hieron., Adonis, Usuardi). (2) Martyr at Alexandria, with Peter, bishop of Alexandria, Faustus the presbyter, and Ammonius, under Maximianus; commemorated Nov. 26 (Mart. Adonis, Usuardi). [W. F. G.]

DIVINATION. It was all but inevitable in the nature of things that the ineradicable desire to penetrate the secrets of the future should show itself sooner or later in some form of superstition within the Christian Church. Jews and heathens had alike been accustomed to practices of which that desire had been the origin. The decay and disrepute of the older oracles, of which the legend that they ceased at the time of the Nativity of Christ was the representation, forced men back upon the more mysterious and recondite arts by which the secrets of the future were to be unveiled. The mind of the Church was, of course, from the first opposed to such attempts, and taught men to leave the future in the hands of God. But the laws and canons which meet us alike in East and West testify to the strength of the superstition against which the warfare was thus waged. It can hardly be said, looking at Christendom as a whole, to have succeeded in repressing it.

The revival within the Church of the arts of the old Chaldaean soothsayers has been noticed under ASTROLOGERS and CALCULATOIRES. But the elaborate system of divination which was officially recognised in the auguries of the Roman republic and empire, and which had a thousand ramifications in private and local superstitions was even more difficult to cope with. As at the Council of Elvira (c. 62) we find the augur named among those who were not to be admitted to Christian communion unless they renounced their calling.* The Fourth Council of Carthage (c. 59) excommunicated any who addicted themselves to practices that were so essentially heathen. That of Ancyra (c. 24) condemned the κατααρτεύομενοι to five years' penance. See also the 'Penitential' printed in Meard's Sacram. Greg. p. 467. The legislation of the emperors was even more stern in its severity; but the sharpness of the law was in this case due, like the old edicts of banishment against the Chaldaei under Tiberius, to the influence of suspicious fear. Diviners, who were consulted as to the length of the emperor's life might help to work out the fulfilment of their own predictions. So we find Constantian inflicting the penalty of death on all who were known to consult soothsayers or observe omens. Even the credulous peasants, to whom the cry of a weasel or a rat was a presage of evil, were hunted down and condemned (cod. Theod. ix. tit. 16, leg. 4; Ammian. Marcell. xvi. p. 72). Valens, in like manner, half believing in what he sought to repress, having heard that it had been declared as the result of such divining arts (in this case νεκρομαντεία is named), that the name of his successor should begin with Θ Ε Ο Δ, not only enforced the law in its fullest severity against the diviner, but sought out and put to death all whom he could find whose names brought them within the range of his suspicion (Socrates, II. E. iv. 19). It is probable enough that the widespread belief thus engendered really helped to prepare the way for Theodosius.

It was comparatively easy to condemn art that were manifestly heathen in their nature. It was more difficult when the practice came with Christian associations and appealed to men's reverence for the Sacred Books. The principle of casting lots was recognised in Scripture as an appeal from the ignorance of man to the Providence of God (Acts i. 26; Prov. xvi. 33; xviii. 18 et al.). What form of sortes could be more certain to direct men in the right path than an appeal to the Written Word? Here, too, both Jewish and heathen influences may have helped to foster the new form of superstition. The Jew had been in the habit of so dealing with the Law, opening it at random, taking the verse on which he lighted as an oracle from God. It was his substitute for the Urim and Thummim, and the utterance of a prophet's voice (iemar. Hieros. Schubb. f. 8). The Roman, anticipating the mediaeval belief as to the poet's character, had looked to the Aeneid of Virgil as filling up the gap left by the dumbness of the oracles. The sortes Virgilianae were in repute as having predicted the power and character of Hadrian (Spartian. Vit. Had. p. 5), and Alexander Severus (Lamprid. Vit. Alex. p. 341). So in like manner the Bible, as a whole, or certain portions of it, came to be treated in the 4th century, if not earlier. It appears to have prevailed in the West rather than the East, but was never during the period with which we are concerned in any degree sanctioned by the Church or its leaders. Augustine, who had been consulted by Januarius as to its legitimacy, thought it a less evil than seeking knowledge from demons, but condemned it, as bringing down the Divine Word to base and trivial uses (Epist. ad Januarianum, cxix. (alter lv.) c. 37). The provincial Councils of Gaul in the 5th century condemned the "sortes divinationis," "sortes sanctorum," and threatened clergy or monks who practised them with severe penalties (C. Venetic.

* There is, however, the various reading of "auriga."

c. 16; Agathens. 42; Aurel. l. c. 30). The practice grew, however, in spite of the prohibition, with the increasing power of the Franks, and Gregory of Tours (Hist. lv. 16) describes a scene in which, with great solemnity, in the presence of bishops and priests in the celebration of Mass at Dijon, the volumes of the Epistles and Gospels were thus opened in order to ascertain the fortunes of the son of Clothaire. [E. H. P.]

DIVINE SERVICE. [COMMUNION, HOLY MASS; HOURS OF PRAYER; OFFICE, THE DIVINE.]

DIVISIO APOSTOLORUM. [APOSTLES' FESTIVALS, p. 87.]

DIVISIO MENSURNA. The division of the revenues of a church among the clergy seems commonly to have been monthly; this monthly payment is called by Cyprian "divisio mensurna," and a suspension from this was equivalent to what in later times was called suspension "a ceneficio," which did not necessarily imply suspension from ministerial functions (Cyprian, Epist. 34, c. 3). [OMLATIONS; PROPERTY OF THE CHURCH.] [C.]

DIVORCE. [MARRIAGE.]

DOCTOR. Besides the general sense of "teacher," this word early acquired certain special significations:—

1. Doct r Auli n'iu n, the officer of the church to whom was committed the instruction of CATECHUMENS (p. 319). When we read in the Pas-ss. Perpetuac et Felice, (c. 13; Ruinart, p. 99) that Aspasius, "presbyter doctor," stood before the door, we ought probably to understand that he was a presbyter who bore the office of Doctor audientium. Cyprian, too, speaks (Epist. 29) of "presbyteri doctores," as well as of a reader who held the office of teacher of the catechumens.

2. Persons whose teaching was of special weight in the church were called Doctores. The Decretu (c. 1) of Celestinus (A.D. 422-432) condemn those who set themselves up against the Doctors, meaning apparently in this case more particularly St. Augustine (c. 2) and the bishops of Rome (c. 3). The same prohibition is repeated in the Capitularium Car. M. vii. c. 44.

3. The term legis doctor seems to have acquired a technical force at a comparatively early date. Adrevaldus (De Mirac. S. Bened. l. 25) speaks of a certain "legis doctor"—clearly a judge—who deferred judgment in consequence of having received a bribe; and a charter of Pipin, mayor of the palace (quoted by Ducange, s. v. Doctor Legis), speaks of things decided by "proceres nostri, seu Comites palatii nostri vel reliqui legis doctores," where the doctors are clearly persons who have an official right to expound the law. [C.]

DOCTORS, CHRIST IN CONFERENCE WITH. This subject is represented in a fresco of the first cabinetum of the Callixtine Catacomb. See in Bottari, tavv. xv. and liv., also tav. lxxiv. Both are conventionally arranged, our Lord being on a lofty seat in the midst, with hand upraised in the act of speaking; the doctors on His right and left, with some expression of wonder on their countenances. The only sarcophagus besides that of Junius Bassus (Bottari, xv.), which indis utabilis contains this subject, is stated by Martigny to be that in S. Ambrogio at Milan. (Alleggranza, Sacra Monim. Ant. ds Milano, tav. iv.) See, however, Bottari, vol. l. tav. 33. All the surrounding figures are seated in this example, but our Lord is placed above them in a kind of stall or edicule, with two palm-trees at its sides. He holds a book or roll in His hand, which is partly unrolled, while the doctors have closed theirs. So also in Alleggranza, tav. l., a mosaic from St. Aquilinus of Milan. The Lord's elevated seat is placed on a rock, with the Divine Lamb below, probably in reference to Rev. v. as "able to open the Book." On the right and left, at His feet, are Joseph and Mary in the attitude of adoration.

Perret (i. pl. 1.) gives a copy of a very skillful painting from the catacombs, which places two doctors on the Lord's right hand, who are expressing attention and wonder, and Joseph and Mary on the other, with looks of patient waiting on Him. The figure on the left is so evidently feminine, as to repel the idea that the four evangelists are intended.

The fine diptych of the 5th century at the Cathedral of Milan and that of Murano (Bugati, Mem. di S. Celso and Gori, Theat. Dipt. viii. tab. 8, see woodcut) also represent our Lord sitting, with the doctors standing before Him. These represent Him of more mature appearance and stature than the account in the Gospels quite warrants. The figure below our Lord's feet is supposed to represent Uranus or the firmament of Heaven (Ps. xviii. 9). [R. St. J. T.]

DOLIUM. This seems to be the most convenient generic term for the various representations of ensks and large vessels which occur frequently in early Christian art, and have symbolic meaning very generally attributed to them. (Boldetti, pp. 164-368; Perret, iii. 3; Bottari, tav. 155.) As they are generally found on tombs they are taken as empty, representing the body when the soul has fled from it. If the marriage of Cana [see s. v. CANA] can be supposed to be so frequently used on sarcophagi as a symbol of the Resurrection, the cask may be supposed to represent a water-vessel, and be a short-hand symbol of the Miracle. This seems altogether unlikely, and, moreover, in almost all cases the vessels represented are strictly "waterpots of stone" or hydrine. The close juncture of the staves of a cask has been taken to indicate Christian unity.

Martigny
ri. Ad C suetitia") to certain of martyrs noon to be ing the Ch over, on t Dolium was from its re infections. ample from with the DOLIENS.

DOLPHIN
of other Chr

DOLIUM

DOME.

Dom, dome is part of church tops from 600 either hemisph covering a ci roof the exteri forms (Parker
The dome baulica type,
the church of instance), we chapels (the so enclosed. [Ch

In sepulchre circular, somet as might be e
The church of there we find t peristyle. [Ch the Rock." at J rites among me ported by four be found in th slovia, 5th cen in the Haruro,
p. 372.]

The sepulch Galla Placidia
a small dome.
most remarkab St. Sophia, both like manner in pérs or arches o dome, east and w

Sacra Monim. Ant. de however, Bottari, vol. 1, and figures are seated or Lord is placed above or Alivide, with two He holds a book or roll partly unrolled, while theirs. So also in Alle-ce from St. Aquinas of seated seat is placed on a numb below, probably in able to open the Book," at His feet, are Joseph of adoration.

A copy of a very skillful ubs, which places two ight hand, who are ex-vander, and Joseph and looks of patient waiting the left is so evidently the idea that the four the 5th century at the hat of Murano (Bugati, 1, Thes. Dipl. viii, tab. present our Lord sitting, before Him. These re-ture appearance and in the Gospels quite our Lord's feet is us or the Firmament [R. St. J. T.]

to be the most centhe various representaarts, and have symically attributed to them.
 'erret, iii, 3; Bottari, ially found on tombs representing the body in it. If the marriage is supposed to be so ngi as a symbol of the e supposed to reprea short-hand symbol s altogether unlikely, l cases the vessels re-etopots of stone" or ure of the staves of a icate Christian unity.

DOLPHIN

Martigny conjectures (quoting St. Cyrian, Ep. xvi. Ad Confess. Rom. "Vini vice sanguinem funditis") that the form of a ensk has been given to certain small vessels for preserving the blood of martyrs (e. g. Boiletti, pp. 163-4), with allusion to the power of their self-sacrifice in holding the Church together. He concludes, however, on the whole, that the picture of the Dolian was very possibly only a play on words, from its resemblance in sound to dole, and its inscriptions. This seems to be proved by his example from Mamachi (see woodcut)—two dolin, with the inscription IVLIO FILIO PATER DOLIENS.

DOLPHIN [see s. v. Fish]. As in the case of other Christian symbols, the dolphin is used

DOLUS MALUS. [FORAGE.]

DOVE. (Commonly derived from DOMUS Dei, dove being at one time so invariable a part of churches as to usurp their name. Perhaps from doxa.) A concave ceiling or cupola, either hemispherical or of any other curve, covering a circular or polygonal area; also a roof the exterior of which is of either of these forms (Parker's Gloss. s. v. CUPOLA).

The dome is not usual in churches of the basilica type, though it is sometimes found; in the church of Sta. Croce in Gerusalemme (for instance), we find a dome covering one of the chapels (the south-eastern) by which the apse is enclosed. [CHURCH, p. 370.]

In sepulchral or memorial churches, usually circular, sometimes polygonal in form, the dome, as might be expected, is of frequent occurrence. The church of Sta. Costanza is of this class, and there we find the dome supported on an interior peristyle. [CHURCH, p. 371.] The "Dome of the Rock" at Jerusalem, classed by some authorities among memorial churches, has a dome supported by four great piers. Other examples may be found in the church of St. George in Thessalonics, 5th cent., and the cathedral at Bosrah in the Hauran, of the date A.D. 511. [CHURCH, p. 372.]

The sepulchral chapel built by the empress Galla Placidia at Ravenna has a tower enclosing a small dome. [CHURCH, p. 372.] One of the most remarkable domes in the world is that of St. Sophia, both from its size and from the peculiar manner in which it is supported, not by piers or arches on every side but upon two semi-domes, east and west, by which means a vast unen-

DOMESTICUS

from a very early date in two or more senses, representing either the Lord Himself, the individual Christian, or abstract qualities such as swiftness, brilliancy, conjugal affection, &c. In a painting given by De Rossi (vol. i. tav. viii.), two dolphins bear (apparently) vessels with the Sacramental loaves. It has been suggested, and is not improbable, that the Dolphin embracing the Anchor, so often found on gems, rings, &c. (Mamachi, intip. Christ. iii, 23; Lupi, E. it. top. Serer. II, 64, note 1), is an emblem of the Crucified Saviour, or, indeed, of the faithful follower. For its use as an emblem of swiftness, see Holdetti, p. 332, where is figured the handle of a pen found in a Christian sepulchre, fashioned into the dolphin-shape, which may indicate, as Martigny supposes, that the occupant was in life a scribe or short-hand writer.—Ps. xlv. 2. The fish with extended fins, or back bent, as if in the act of plunging forward, seems to be used to express speed in pressing forward for the prize of the Christian race. See Lupi, Epitaph. Sec. pp. 53 and 185. In the latter he is accompanied by a dove, and both are approaching a vase, which may signify the Living Waters of Baptism or of Truth. See Martigny, s. v. Dolphin. The dolphins (see woodcut), placed two close together on each side of the inscription over Valeria or Valeria Labolina, are thought to symbolize conjugal affection. [R. St. J. T.] cumbered space—200 ft. by 100 ft.—is obtained. [CHURCH, p. 373.] After the time of Justinian churches in the East were almost exclusively built after some modification of the plan of St. Sophia, in which the dome forms so important a feature. The germ of the nearly square ground-plan, with a dome covering the centre, is perhaps to be found in domed oratories or Kalybes of Syria. See woodcut, p. 347.

In the church of St. Vitalis at Ravenna, built between A.D. 526 and 547, there is a sort of clerestory, 20 ft. high, below the dome. And after the death of Justinian we find this construction, in which the dome itself is placed on a drum pierced with windows, frequent in the empire. The church of St. Clement, for instance, at Ancona, belonging probably to the latter part of the 6th and beginning of the 7th century, had such a dome placed on a low drum. The church of St. Irene, at Constantinople (earlier part of the 8th century), has the dome on a drum of great height; and a similar dome is found in the church of St. Nicholas of Myra, which is perhaps of more modern date. [CHURCH, p. 378.] The Duomo Vecchio at Florence, by some assigned to the 7th century, by others to A.D. 774, is covered by a dome 85 ft. in internal diameter. [CHURCH, p. 380.] [C.]

DOMESTICUS, "belonging to the house or household," has several ecclesiastical senses:— 1. Domesticus are all who belong to the "household of faith;" "omnis congruus honor exhibetur, maxime tamen domesticis fidei" (Leopold. St. Bened. c. 53).

2. In the East, the principal dignitary in a church choir after the Protospites. There was one on each side of the choir, to lead the singers in antiphonal chanting (see St. Paulus, De Offi., c. vi. § 3; Goar's Liturg., pp. 272, 278; Ducauge, s. v.).

3. Domestica (Antonium, d. Augustinus τὴν Θορῶν, the chief door-keeper at Constantinople) (Goar's, De Off., c. i. § 43). [E.]

DOMINICA. [LORD'S DAY.]

DOMINICA, δομινική, commemorated Jan. 8 (Cal. Byzant.). [W. F. G.]

DOMINICADIA [DIE IN ADVENTUUM.]

DOMINICALIS or -LE. A fair linen cloth used by females at the time of the reception of the Eucharist. So far all authorities are agreed, but it is a controverted point whether it was a white veil worn over the head, or a napkin in which females received the Eucharist, which they were forbidden to touch with the naked hand. [COMMISSION, HOLY, p. 416.]

The latter view is that which has the greatest currency, and can reckon among its supporters such weighty liturgical authorities as Cardinal Houssier (Her. Liturg., lib. ii. c. 17); Habert (Archicrit., part. v. obs. viii.); Mabillon (de Liturg. Gall., lib. i. c. v. s. xxv.); Maeyer (Hierol., sub voc.); Voss (Thess. Theol. de Sacram. Euc. Dom.), and others. It is chiefly based on two canons of the Council of Auxerre, A.D. 578, one (can. 36) forbidding women to receive the Eucharist with the bare hand; the other (can. 42) enacting that every woman when she communicates should have her dominicad or else postpone her communion. These two canons are interpreted to refer to the same subject, and the dominicad has been thus identified with the fair linen cloth with which the hand was to be covered at the time of communion. This custom is expressly mentioned in a sermon printed among Augustine's, but erroneously ascribed to him, in which we read, "omnes quando communicare desiderant invent manus, et omnes mulieres nitida exhibent linteamenta at Corpus Christi accipiant." It will be observed that nowhere is this napkin expressly called dominicale.

The other view—that the dominicale was a head-covering, a veil (cf. 1 Cor. xi. 13) is strongly supported by Ducauge (sub voce); Labbé (ad Concil. Antissiod.); and Baluzius (Not. in Gratian., c. xxxiii. quest. iii. c. 19), and is accepted by our own Bingham (bk. xv. ch. v. § 7). The passage from an ancient MS. Penitential given by Ducauge, forbidding a woman to communicate if she has not her "dominicale" on her head, "si mulier communicans dominicale suum super caput suum non habuerit, &c." is express for this view if it be correctly quoted. The canons cited by Baluzius (apud Bingham, l. c.) from the Council of Mâcon, "in which the dominicale is expressly styled the veil which the women wore upon their heads at the communion," do not appear in the acts of either the first or second Council of that name. This, however appears the more probable view. [E. V.]

DOMINICUM. 1. One of the names of a Church (q. v.). Greek κυριακόν.

2. Equivalent to Κοριακὸν θεῖον. Cyprian, Epist. 63: "Numquid ergo Dominicum post coenam celebrare debemus?" And the martyrs in Africa, somewhat later, were accused of celebrating "collectam et Dominicum," the ordinary assembly and the Lord's Supper (Acta Praxena, Saturnini, etc., c. 5; compare re. 7 and 8). [E.]

DOMINUS or DOMNUS. 1. Equivalent to "Saint" as a title; as "Dominus Johannes" for St. John, in Cyprian's Life of Cæsarius of Arles. Sometimes in the form Domnus; St. Martin, for instance, is called "Domnus Martinus" in the preface and in can. 14 of the first council of Tours. St. Peter is called "Dominus Petrus Apostolus" (Conc. Turon. II., c. 23); St. Paul, "Domnus Paulus Apostolus" (Gregory of Tours, Hist. Franc., ix. 41). The Mar of the Chaldean Christians (as in "Mar Markus") is equivalent to Dominus.

2. Bishops are called Domni, without any further designation of their episcopal dignity. For instance, a bishop is described by Gregory the Great (Epist. lv. 27) as "Dominus Mizanata ecclesiae." Dominus in this usage also is frequently shortened into Domnus, as, for instance, by Gregory of Tours and Gregory the Great; (Ducauge, s. v.). [E.]

3. Domnus was at first a title of the abbat (Reg. Benedict. 63), afterwards of his sub-abbat, and, in the middle ages, of monks generally (Martene ad loc. cit.). The word was applied to saints (Sulpic. Sever., Epist. 2, 3; Mabill., Ann., t. 8, h. xviii. 9), to bishops (Conc. Arver. iii. Subscr.), and to the pope (Ducauge, Glossar. Lat., s. v.). Hence the titles, "Dun," "Don," "Donna," &c. in the Romance, and, in modern French, "Dun," for monks (Ducauge, ibid., s. v. Alard. Gal. Præf., Cassiani's app.).

"Donna" was used similarly of nuns. [I. G. S.]

DOMINUS VOBISCUM. 1. The versicle Dominus Vobiscum, with the response, et cum spiritu tuo, is found in the Gregorian Synodical immediately before the Signum Cordi, which introduces the CANON.

In the third of the ancient canons read and approved at the First Council of Braga, A.D. 563, (Brunn's Canones, ii. 35), it is provided that bishops and priests should not greet the people in different ways, but that both should use the form Dominus sit vobiscum (Ruth ii. 4), and the people respond Et cum spiritu tuo, the form handed down from the very Apostles, and retained by the whole Eastern Church. The latter assertion does not appear to be founded on fact, for the Eastern Church has constantly used the form "Peace be with you all." [Pax VOBISCUM.] The distinction which the canon notes and forbids between the priest's salutation and the bishop's, was probably that the former used the form Domnus vobiscum, the latter, as representing more completely the Lord Himself, the form Pax vobiscum. But see Krazer, De Liturgiis, p. 399 f.

2. At Prime, in the Daily Office, Dominus vobiscum, with the usual response, is said before the Collect.

3. When the Breviarium Hipponense (can. 1, al. 6) orders "ut lectores populum non saluent," the meaning probably is, that they were not permitted to use the form commonly appropriated to the higher orders, whether Dominus or Pax vobiscum. [E.]

DOMIO, bishop of Salona in Dalmatia, martyr, with eight soldiers; commemorated April 11 (Mart., Usuardi). [W. F. G.]

DOMI

position J.

(2) Mar

free other

Et. Adon

(3) Des sith Ent

Dec. 29th

(4) His

memorate

DOMI

in Comput

memorate

(Usard);

DOMI

memorate

(Usard).

(3) In P

memorate

DOMI

with her

April 14

DOMI

with Vieto

(Usard).

(3) Mart

memorate

DOMI

is a mater cence Ital.

(2) The

this peo

l. 22; Duce

DONA

antiquely

special sense

cularly con

some great

Epist. 27, a

Shonus Apo

Sat. 8, Feb

word is ad

which Suidas

616. See, fo rage of Cons dem (Euseb.

LEGIS; Vori

DONATA

with eleven

Rom. Vet., B

DONATI

with Hoga

May 24 (Mar

(2) Bisho

sidius, Man

under Hun

Rom. Vet., A

DONATI

with Maxim commemorate

Id., Usuardi,

DONATU

Aquilinus

Feb. 4 (Mart.

(3) Martyr

Romulus, and

Feb. 17 (16);

Supper (Act. Procons. compare vs. 7 and 8). [C.] (1) DOMINUS, I. Equivalent to "Dominus Joannes" for "Theobaldus of Arles, Domnus; St. Martin, for dominus Martinus" in the 1st of the first council of called "Dominus Petrus Don. H. c. 24); St. Paul, olus" (Gregory of Tours, "The Mar of the Chaldean or Markos") is equivalent of Donatus, without any of their episcopal dignity. It is described by Gregory as "Dominus Mizenata" in this usage also is Donatus, as, for instance, and Gregory the Great. [C.]

first a title of the abbot towards of his sub-colleagues, of monks generally (Marword was applied to saints 3; Michell. Ann. O. S. B. ange. Auct. iii. Subser., ange. Glossar. Lat. s. v., "Don," "Donna," &c. modern French, "Don," Assess. Lat. n. s. Alard. Ga.

similarly of nuns. [I. G. S.]

DOMINUS. 1. The versicle with the response, et cum in the Gregorian Sacerdotis the Suscum Cordi, ANON.

ancient canons read and Council of Braga, A. D. 563, 35), it is provided that could not greet the people that both should use the oscum (Ruth ii. 4), and cum spiritu tuo, the form very Apostles, and re-tem Cl. b. The letter ear to be founded on fact, has constantly used the you all." [Pax Vultus which the canon notes the priest's salutation and ably that the former used oscum, the latter, as re-pletely the Lord himself, om. But see Kraetz, De

The Daily Office, Dominus and response, is said before rium Hippense (can. 1, es populum non salutet, is, that they were not form commonly appro-orders, whether Dominus [C.]

Salona in Dalmatis, mar-ers; commemorated April [W. F. G.]

DOMITIANUS. (1) Abbot of Lyons; de- position July 1 (Mart. Adonis, Usuardi).

(2) Martyr at Philadelphia in Arabia, with five others; commemorated Aug. 1 (Mart. Rom. Tel. Adonis, Usuardi).

(3) Deacon, and martyr at Ancyra in Galatia, with Eutycus the presbyter; commemorated Dec. 28 (Mart. Hieron., Usuardi).

(4) Bishop of Melitene, circa A. D. 570; commemorated Jan. 10 (Cat. Byzant.). [W. F. G.]

DOMITILLA, virgin, martyr at Terracina in Campania, under Domitian and Trajan; commemorated May 7 (Mart. Rom. Tel., Adonis, Usuardi); May 12 (Mart. Hieron.). [W. F. G.]

DOMITUS. (1) Martyr in Syria; commemorated July 5 (Mart. Rom. Tel., Adonis, Usuardi).

(2) In Phrygia, δωμιόδωτος, under Julian; commemorated Aug. 7 (Cat. Byzant.). [W. F. G.]

DOMINA or DOMNA, virgin, martyr with her virgin companions; commemorated April 11 (Mart. Adonis, Usuardi). [W. F. G.]

DOMINIUS. (1) Martyr at Thessalonica with Victor; commemorated March 30 (Mart. Usuardi).

(2) Martyr at Julia, under Maximian; commemorated Oct. 9 (ib.). [W. F. G.]

DOMUS DEI. (1) Literally, the church as a material building (Optatus, c. Donat. iii. 17). Hence Ital. Duomo, and Germ. Dom.

(2) The Church, as the whole body of Christian people (Lucifer of Cagliari, Pro Athanasio, l. 22; Ducange, s. v.) [C.]

DONA, DONARIA. These words are not infrequently used by Christian writers in the special sense of offerings placed in churches, particularly costly presents given as memorials of some great mercy received by the offerers (Jerome, Enst. 27, ad Eustoch.; Epist. 13, ad Paulin.; Sidonius Apoll. lib. iv. Ep. 18; Paulinus of Nola, Sidel. 8, Felicis, 6). The corresponding Greek word is ἀνάθημα (Luke xxi. 5; 2 Maccab. ix. 16), which Suidas defines as πᾶν τὸ ἀφιερωμένον θεῷ. See, for instance, the account of the offerings of Constantine to the Anastasia at Jerusalem (Euseb. Vita Constant. iii. 25). [CORONA ECCLES. VOTIVE OFFERINGS.] [C.]

DONATA, of Scillita, martyr at Carthage with eleven others; commemorated July 17 (Mart. Rom. Tel., Bedae, Adonis, Usuardi) [W. F. G.]

DONATI. [ONATI.]

DONATTIANUS. (1) Martyr at Nantes with Rogatianus, his brother; commemorated May 24 (Mart. Hieron., Adonis, Usuardi).

(2) Bishop and confessor in Africa, with Praxilla, Manuettus, Germanus, and Foscolus, under Diocletian; commemorated Sept. 6 (Mart. Rom. Tel., Adonis, Usuardi). [W. F. G.]

DONATILLA, virgin, martyr in Africa, with Maxima and Secunda, under Gallienus; commemorated July 30 (Mart. Hieron., Rom. Tel., Usuardi, Cal. Carth.) [W. F. G.]

DONATUS. (1) Martyr at Rome with Aquilinus and three others; commemorated Feb. 4 (Mart. Hieron., Usuardi).

(2) Martyr at Concordia with Secundianus, Eomulus, and eighty-six others; commemorated Feb. 17 (ib.);

(3) Martyr at Carthage; commemorated Mar. 1 (ib.);

(4) Martyr in Africa, with Epiphanius the bishop, and others; commemorated April 7 (Mart. Usuardi), April 6 (Mart. Hieron.).

(5) Martyr at Casarea in Cappadocia, with Polyuctus and Victorius; commemorated May 21 (Mart. Adonis, Usuardi).

(6) Bishop and martyr at Aretium in Tuscan; under Julian; commemorated Aug. 7 (Mart. Rom. Tel., Hieron., Bedae, Adonis, Usuardi).

(7) The presbyter and anchorite in a district on Mount Jura, in Belgic Gaul; commemorated Aug. 19 (Mart. Adonis, Usuardi).

(8) Martyr at Antioch, with Restitutus, Valerianus, Fructuosus, and twelve others; commemorated Aug. 23 (ib.).

(9) Martyr at Capua, with Quintus and Arcadius; commemorated Sept. 5 (Mart. Hieron., Adonis, Usuardi).

(10) Martyr with Hermogenes and twenty-two others; commemorated Dec. 12 (Mart. Usuardi). [W. F. G.]

DOOR (AS SYMBOL). See St. John x. 9. It seems most probable that in the various representations of sheep leaving or entering their fold or house, and so representing the Jewish or Gentile Church (HEBREWEM; GENTILEM), the door may be intended to recall the words "I am the door," to the spectator's mind. In Allegamus, Mon. de Millus, &c., tav. II, the door is seen five times repeated, evidently with this symbolic reference, and on the porch or tympanum of the old basilica of St. Aquilinus in the same city the following verses occur:—

"Janua sum vobis; precor omnia iuxta vestre; Per me transibit qui eestis gentia que sunt; Virgine qui natus, nullo de parte creatus, Infantibus salvat, relictis hinc gubernat."

Lupp. Diss. e Lat. l. p. 262 gives a bas-relief in gilded bronze, which contains a gate or door, with the Lamb under it bearing the Cross, and the words "Ego sum ostium, et ovile ovium." [R. St. J. T.]

DOORS OF CHURCHES. (Jonuae, portae, valvae; θύραι, πύλαι.)

1. The principal outer doors of a church seem to have been in ancient times at the west, if the church was so built that the altar was at the east end, or at any rate in the end facing the altar. In a basilican church of three aisles there were for the most part three western doors:

"Alma domus triphit patescens silentibus arcu." (Paulinus of Nola, l. p. 32, ad Ser.)

In Constantine's great "Church of the Saviour" at Jerusalem, the three doors faced the east [CHURCH, p. 369]. At these doors stood during service the "weepers" (προσκυλιότητες). If there was a NARTHEX, the western doors gave entrance into this, and other doors again from the narthex into the nave. The nave was sometimes again itself divided into chorus and trapeza—the portions for the clerics and the people respectively—by a screen or partition having doors; but more frequently those who entered by the western doors saw before them at once the ICOSOSTASIS, or screen enclosing the sanctuary, with its three doors.

2. The doors in the Icosostasis were known generally as καγκελλοθυρίδες, πύραι τοῦ ἁγίου Bhmaros; the side doors distinctively as παύλια or παροόστια. The central doors were called the "Holy Doors" (ἅγια θύρα) and sometimes the "Royal Doors" (βασιλικαὶ θύρα).

3. The great western doors of the nave were called the "Royal Gates" (βασιλικαὶ πόλαι); and this term was also adopted by Latin writers, so that "regiae" came to be used substantively for these doors. Anastasius, for instance, says (Vita Pontif. c. 111) that pope Honorius (A.D. 626-638) covered with silver plates the great royal—the so-called "Median"—doors at the entrance of a church (regias in ingressu ecclesiae majores, quae appellantur medianae). When the church had a narthex, the western doors of this were also sometimes called the "royal" gates.

4. The great church of St. Sophia at Constantinople had nine doors between the narthex and the nave. As these were covered with silver, not only were they called the "Silver Doors," but the same term came to designate the doors of other churches which occupied the same position.

5. Another term, the application of which cannot be absolutely determined, is the "Beautiful Gates" (ἄραιοι πόλαι). These have been supposed to be the gates which separate chorus and trapeza (Chor); those which separate nave from narthex (Ducange); or the outer gate of the narthex (Neale). The latter application is supported by the fact that the term is taken from the "Beautiful Gate" of the temple, undoubtedly an outer gate.

6. The "Angelic Gate" (ἀγγελικὴ πόλη) was one which allowed a person to enter the trapeza, so as to draw near the choir. Nothing further is known of it. It is not improbable that it was a local term.

7. The word θύρα is consistently used to designate a door within the building, and the word πόλη to designate the much larger "gates" which admitted the mass of the congregation from without into the narthex or the nave. Epithets like "royal" and "beautiful" are perhaps not used invariably with a special meaning, but the "Holy Doors" are always the central doors of the Bema, and no other.

8. The Holy Doors were opened at the commencement of the Great Vespers, at all "entrances," whether at Vespers or in the Liturgy; and at the end of the Liturgy, when the people are invited to approach for the purpose of communicating (Neale, Eastern Church, Introd. pp. 194-200).

9. The doors of churches were frequently of rich material and workmanship. The outer doors of St. Sophia at Constantinople were of bronze, with ornaments in relief (CHURCH, p. 374); and those of the Iconostasis, as well as those between the narthex and the nave, of silver. And elsewhere, as not infrequently in the Liber Pontificalis, we read of doors of metal gilt, or of wood richly inlaid or carved. [C.]

DOORKEEPERS (πυλωπολ, θυραροί, Ostiarii), an inferior order of clergy mentioned by the Pseudo-Ignatius (Epist. An'ioch.), by Eusebius (H. E. vi. 43), and by Justinian (Novell. iii. 1). There is no mention of them in Tertullian or Cyprian, from which Thomassin (Vet. et Nov. Eccl. Discip. i. l. 2, c. 30, § 8) infers that in the early African church their duties were discharged by the laity. The council of Laodicea (c. 24), speaks of them among the inferior orders of clergy. At the ordination of a doorkeeper, after previous instruction by the deacon he was presented to the bishop who delivered to him the keys of the church, with the injunction to act as one who must render to God an account of the things which are opened by those keys (iv. Conc. Carth. c. 19). The 4th council of Toledo (c. 4) provides that a doorkeeper should keep the door of the church at the opening of councils. In the 2nd canon of another council of Toledo, held A.D. 597, it is ordered that a doorkeeper should be appointed by the priest to provide for the cleansing and lighting of the church and sanctuary (Brun's Canons, i. 220). In the Apostolic Constitutions (ii. 25) they are spoken of as belonging to that portion of the clergy which represents the Levites, but in the lowest grade. Their share of the Agapae was the same as that of a Lector or Cantor (Ibid. ii. 28); there is no mention of their ordination, and they are named among the clergy who were not permitted to baptize (Ibid. iii. 11). They were to stand during the time of service at the door of the part of the church allotted to the men (Ibid. ii. 57). They were allowed to marry (Ibid. vi. 17). [P. O.]

DORIA, martyr with Chrysanthus, under Numerian; commemorated March 19 (Cal. Byzant.). [W. F. G.]

DORMITIO (κοίμησις), the "falling asleep," used to describe the state of those who "depart hence in the Lord" (Cyprinus, Epist. l. c. 2). More especially it is used to designate the day of the departure or "Assumption" of the Virgin Mary [MARY, FESTIVALS OF]; Xanthopoulos, for instance (quoted by Ducange, s. v. Dormitio), uses the expression, κοίμησιν ἄγγελ, τὴν μετὰ στασιν λέγω. See Daniel's Codex Liturg. iv. 239; and Ménard's Sacram. Greg., pp. 411, 707. [C.]

DORMITORIUM. A garment for sleeping in; the "lebiton lineus" of Pachomius (Vita, c. 22). The gloss on the Rule of St. Benedict explains Dormitoria by the Greek word ἐγκαμῆθρα (Ducange, s. v.). [C.]

DORMITORY (Dormitorium). It was the primitive custom for monks to sleep all together in one large dormitory (Alteser. Asceticon, ix. 8). Not till the 14th century (Ducange, Glossar. Lat. s. v.) was the custom introduced of using separate sleeping cells. By the rule of Benedict all were to sleep in one room, if possible (Bened. Reg. c. 22) with the abbat in their midst (cf. Magistr. Reg. c. 29; Bened. Reg. c. 22) or in larger monasteries ten or twenty together with a dean (Bened. Reg. ib.; cf. Caesar. Arelat. Reg. ad Monach. c. 3; Reg. ad Virg. c. 7; Amrol. Reg. c. 6; Ferreol. Reg. c. 16, 33). Only the aged, the infirm, the excommunicated were excepted from this arrangement (Cujusd. Reg. c. 13). Each monk was to have a separate bed (Bened. Reg. v. s.; Caesar. Arelat. Reg. v. s.; Fructuosus, Reg. c. 17). They were to sleep clothed and girdled (Bened. Reg. v. s.; Mag. Reg. c. 11; Cujusd. Reg. v. s.), the founder probably intending that the monk should sleep in one of the two suits ordered by his rule (Bened. Reg. c. 55); but in course of time the words were loosely interpreted as meaning only the woolen tunic (Marten, ad loc.

dist.) I the cantic (the monk (Bened. A was to b night (B Cujusd. R at a given dormitory till morning sleeping-ro close to the chapel (M Agapae, 6

In the common p (χαυωία c. 6; Theo on mats c. Collat. l. 2 29, 125); s sires (Vit of some str Faustia. v. mattress (S pillow (cap tress was co not permis iir. 6). So in their tu Pachomii, c.

The time monks in the short indec iiii. 6). Ar self with o others who r night for sl for work (I though far m retire to resti Cass. Instit. i to strictly (A

The rules century were Chrodegang unless with This was en monasteries e bishop's roof, (Conc. Tawon. Aachen, there that the cano Apur. ce. I repeated the 813 A. D., thv firm, should s beds (Conc. C. Ab., c. 9, cf. Grimalic, in h no fancy work

DORONA, rated Dec. 19

DOROTH lus at Casare Psk. 6 (Mart.

DOROTHE Clichin, with c (Mart. Usuardi ty. The council of Laodicea, then among the inferior ordination: a door-instruction by the archdeacon to the bishop who presides of the church, with the one who must render to things which are opened. Cath. c. 9. The 4th canon provides that a deacon should be appointed for the cleansing and sanctuary (Brun's Apostolic Constitutions) of as belonging to that which represents the lowest grade. Their share of office as that of a lector or there is no mention of them are named among the permitted to baptize (Utd. stand during the time of the part of the church Utd. ii. 57). They were vi. 17). [P. O.] with Chrysanthus, under dated March 19 (Cal. R. G.) the "falling asleep," of those who "depart" Cyprian, Epist. l. c. 2, used to designate the day of assumption "of the Virgin Mary" (Xanthopis, for Ducange, s. v. Dormitio, Augustin, rhy nera- tions C. de Liturg. iv. 239; Gregy, pp. 411, 707. [C.]

A garment for sleeping of Pachomius (Vita, the Rule of St. Benedict the Greek word eyca [C.]

Dormitorium). It was the monks to sleep all together (Alteser. Asceticism, ix. 8). by (Ducange, Glossar. Lat. introduced of using separate rule of Benedict all were possible (Bened. Reg. c. their midst (cf. Magist. c. 22) or in larger money together with a dean (esar. Arelat. Reg. ad Mo- c. 7; Anrol. Reg. c. 6; c. 7). Only the aged, the im- ed were excepted from ad. Reg. c. 13). Each monk bed (Bened. Reg. v. s.; s. Fructuos, Reg. c. 17). and girded (Bened. 11; Cujusd. Reg. v. s.) attending that the monk the two suits ordered by c. 55); but in course of loosely interpreted as in tunic (Martena. ad loc.

DORONA

at.) was particularly enjoined, puerile as the caution sounds, by Benedict and others, that the monks were not to wear their knives in bed (Bened. Reg. c. 22; Magist. Reg. c. 11). A light was to be kept burning in the dormitory all night (Bened. Reg. v. s.; Mag. Reg. c. 29; Cujusd. Reg. v. s.). All the monks were to rise at a given signal (Regg. Monast. passim). The dormitory was to be kept under lock and key till morning (Mart. ad Bened. Reg. c. 48). The sleeping-room for stranger monks was usually close to the great dormitory, and not far from the chapel (Mart. ad Bened. Reg. c. 53; cf. Capitul. Apisyr. 68).

In the first fervor of monastic zeal it was a common practice to sleep on the bare ground (gagewia; cf. Altes. Ascet. ix. 8; Vit. St. Anton. c. 6; Theodoret, Philoth. 1, &c.). Others slept on mats (quadra, mattae, stramenta; Cassian. Collat. i. 23; xviii. 11; Rulfin. Verb. Senior. ii. 23, 125); frequently these were made by themselves (Vit. Pachomii. 43), and Augustine speaks of some strict Manicheans as "mattarii" (Cont. Faustina. v. 5). The rule of Benedict allows mattress (sagum), coverlet (lucna or lina), and pillow (capitule, v. s.); but in Egypt the mattress was considered a luxury in the 4th century, not permissible except for guests (Cass. Coll. vi. 6). Some of the monks of Tabenna slept in their tunics, half sitting, half lying (Vita Pachomii, c. 14, in Roswey's Vit. Patr.).

The time allowed for sleep was for Egyptian monks in the commencement of monachism very short indeed (Cass. Instit. v. 20; Coll. xii. 15, xiii. 6). Arsenius is said to have contented himself with one hour only. Rufinus speaks of others who allowed themselves four hours in the night for sleep, assigning four for prayer, four for work (Verb. Sen. c. 199). Even Benedict, though far more tolerant, forbade his disciples to retire to rest again after nocturns (Reg. c. 8; cf. Cass. Instit. ii. 12). But the rule was not adhered to strictly (Martena. ad Bened. Reg. l. c.).

The rules of the canonici in the 8th and 9th century were very similar to those of the monks. Chrodegang ordered all to sleep in one chamber, unless with the bishop's licence (Reg. c. 3). This was enforced on the canonici in their monasteries and on those dwelling under the bishop's roof, by the council of Tours, 813 A.D. (Conc. Turon. iii. c. 23, 24). The council at Aachen, three years later, ordered bishops to see that the canonici slept in one dormitory (Conc. Apisyr. c. 11, 123); and in its second session repeated the decree of the council at Châlons 815 A.D., that all nuns, except the sick and infirm, should sleep in one dormitory on separate beds (Conc. Cabill. c. 59, cf. Conc. Mogunt. 813 A.D. c. 9, cf. Conc. Twon. ii. 567 A.D., c. 14). Gratian, in his rule for solitaries, orders that no fancy work is to be allowed on the coverlets.

[I. G. S.]
DORONA, "Indus et Dorona," commemorated Dec. 19 (Cal. Armen.) [W. F. G.]

DOROTHEA, virgin, martyr with Theophilus at Casarea in Cappadocia; commemorated Feb. 6 (Mart. Rom. Vet., Adonis, Usuardi).

[W. F. G.]

DOROTHEUS. (1) Martyr at Tarsus in Cilicia, with Castor; commemorated Mar. 28 (Mart. Usuardi).

DOVE

(2) Bishop of Tyre, martyr under Julian commemorated June 5 (Cal. Byzant.).

(3) Martyr at Nicomelia, with Gorgonius, under Diocletian; commemorated Sept. 9 (Mart. Rom. Vet., Adonis, Usuardi). [W. F. G.]

DORYMEDON, martyr with Trophimus and Sabbatins, A.D. 278; commemorated Sept. 19 (Cal. Byzant.). [W. F. G.]

DOSSAL (Dorsale, dorsile pallium). A curtain hung on the walls of the choir of a church, or other place of dignity, behind the stalls of the clerks, "a dorso clericorum" (Durandus, Rationale, i. iii. 23). "Cortina quae pendet ad dorsum" (The Monk of St. Gall, Vita Car. Mag. i. 4). Ekkehard the younger (De Casibus S. Galli, c. 1), speaks of a place decked "tapeto et dorsili" (Ducange, s. v.). [C.]

DOTALIA INSTRUMENTA. [CONTRACT OF MARRIAGE, p. 458.]

DOVE (AS SYMBOL). Like the mystic fish and lamb, the dove has more than one meaning or train of meaning; it is used symbolically for the Divine Being and for the Christian worshipper; and is also represented simply in its own form on graves and the walls of catacombs. It is used very frequently (see woodcut) with Noah in the ark, in the literal sense; and in all representations of the Lord's baptism Noah's Dove. From the Catacombs.

Doves on a Tomb. From Arling.

Fresco in the Catacomb of Domitilla, probably second century.

and elsewhere, the dove indicates the presence of the Holy Spirit. In one instance, an Orante surrounded by several doves is opposed on one medallion of the front of a sarcophagus to the Good Shepherd with His sheep on another.

This use of the dove is very frequent in the monuments of Southern Gaul; where, as in the catacombs, the birds which stand on each side of the monograms or crosses are often clearly intended for doves. See Leblant, Inscr. Chrétiennes de la Gaule antérieures au huitième siècle, Paris, 1856.

As an emblem of the Third Person of the Trinity, the carved or painted figure of the dove appeared from a very early period in all baptisteries (see Luke iii. 24). One of the earliest examples of this is the baptistery in the cemetery of St. Pontianus (Aringhi, ii. 275). The painting, though considered by Martigny as of later date than the building, is referred by him to the 6th century, and represents the Lord's Baptismal Dove. Catacomb of Pontianus; seventh century.

baptism in Jordan. The rule and grim figures in this painting remind us of those of the Laurentine and other very early MSS. The symmetrical arrangement is also like early Byzantine work, so called; and the river is a winding trench, with a curious typical resemblance to the actual course of Jordan, which induces us to think the painter had visited it. So also in both baptisteries at Ravenna. The mosaic of St. Mark's preserves this likeness, with the addition of three adoring angels, a star above the dove, fish in the river, and the double axe laid to the root of a tree. This imagery is strictly followed in the wild and powerful painting of Tintoret, in the Scuola di S. Rocco, now scarcely intelligible (Ruskin, Modern Painters, vol. ii.). The Turin miniature is remarkable for its topographical accuracy as to two of the sources of Jordan, labelled respectively FONS YOR and

FONS DAD. Martigny also mentions figures of doves on a font or laver of very early date belonging to the church of Gondrecourt (Revue Archéologique, v. i. p. 129), where however only birds are said to be drinking from vases, and pecking at grapes. See also Paciandi, De Cultu S. Joannis Baptistæ, pp. 58, 69, where copies of a miniature from a MS. in the Royal Library at Turin, and of a mosaic in St. Mark's in Venice, are given, both containing the dove. A golden or silver dove was often suspended above the font in early times. [DOVE, THE EUCHARISTIC.] These sometimes contained the anointing oil used in baptism and extreme unction (Martigny, s. v.; and Aringhi, vol. ii. p. 326, c. 5). On lamps in form of doves, see Aringhi, ii. 325, 1.

As a symbol of the believer, the dove of course has chief reference to two texts of H. S., belonging to different yet harmonious trains of thought. One is Matt. x. 16, "Be ye wise as serpents and harmless as doves;" the other, Ps. lv. 6, "O that I had wings like a dove, then would I flee away and be at rest." The passages in Cant. i. 15, ii. 14, v. 2, vi. 9, refer to the Church, and therefore may be taken as referring simply to all faithful souls. Martigny gives a drawing of a seal with a dove in the centre, surrounded by the words "Veni si amas," an obvious reference to Cant. ii. 10. The dove with the olive or palm-branch, which so often accompanies it; is held equivalent to the form "In Pace." As with other birds, the flying or caged dove has reference to the deliverance of the soul from the flesh in death, or to its imprisoned state in life. [See BIRD.] Aringhi quotes St. Ambrose's sermon on St. Eusebius, "Altiora facilius penetrantur simplicitate mentis, quam levitate penarum;" and St. Augustine on St. Matt. x. to the same purpose. In Aringhi, ii. p. 145, the dove is associated with the peacock; also, p. 139, in a vault of the Catacomb of St. Priscilla. In Bottari, tav. 181, it hovers with the olive-branch above the three holy children in the flames.

Twelve doves, representing the Twelve Apostles, occur in Bottari, i. p. 118, on a mosaic crucifix. See also Paulinus of Nola (Ep. ad Severum, xxxi. c. 10). He thus describes a mosaic (musivæ opus) in his church. [CROSS.]

"Pleno comensat Trinitatis mysterio: Stat Christus agnus: vox Patris cœlo tonat: Et per columban Spiritus Sanctus fluit.
Crucem coronæ lucido cingit globo: Cui coronæ sunt coronæ apostoll.
Quorum figura est in columbarum citro.
Hæ Trinitatis unitas Christo colit, Hæbet et ipsa Trinitate insignita: Dum revelat vox paterna, et Spiritus: Successum fatentur crux et aquas victimarum.
Regnum et triumphum purpure et palma indicant Petram superat ipsa pætra ecclésiæ, De qua sonori quatuor fontes meat, Evangelistæ, viva Christi fœtina." [H. St. J. T.]

DOVE, THE EUCHARISTIC. Pyxes or receptacles for the reserved host were not unfrequently made of gold or silver in the shape of a dove, and suspended over the altar. Doves of the precious metals, emblematic of the Holy Spirit, were also suspended above the font in early churches. In the life of St. Basil by the Pseudo-Amphilochius, it is narrated that that father, after a vision that appeared to him while celebrating the Eucharist, divided the water into three parts, one of which he partook of with great awe, the second he preserved to be buried with him, and placed the third in a golden dove hanging over the altar. He afterwards sent for a goldsmith, and had a new golden dove made to contain the sacred morsel (Amphiloch. Vit. Basil., c. 6).

One of the charges brought against the Aephanian heretic Severus by the clergy of Antioch at the Council of Constantinople, A.D. 536, was that he removed and appropriated to his own use the gold and silver doves hanging over the sacred fonts and altars, χρυσᾶς καὶ ἀργυρᾶς περιτεταῖς κρηματῖνας ὑπεράνω τῶν βέλων τοῦ λυβηθρῶν καὶ θυσιαστηρίων . . . ἐσπερειατο (Labbe, Concil. v. 159).

Such doves are mentioned by Anastasius in the Liber Pontificalis, c. 9, St. Illar. 70, "columban aureum p Daurantus

Nolan. E

DOWN

DOXC

ley is u Excellis," and also clause rec by the an to the she which is is, howeve (Holy, ho and earth the Serap also to the again and

The exa ologies are scantiness may be sad forms, they tion of t quickly bec portion to and its mer rily body of of this circ obscurity, s us, the pos have spok these hymn numerous a real knowle derotions.
is the most natural exp Christians,
the Old Tes familiar wi conversion

"Gloria in only of its natural, wh known; and nally consist the result o
of St. Matth.

The "Glo of Eastern deed, have its existence frequently a hymn," whi occasions, inc Acts xvi. 25
When the an Lucian speak all night for it is supposed
"Gloria in E been specially to Philay's let fausse surman essent scilicet s miquæ Christi in reality, h doxology, and form, in the CURIST. ANT

t. x. 16, "Be ye wise as as doves;" the other wings like a dove, then be at rest." The passages v. 2, vi. 9, refer to the may be taken as referring souls. Martirij cives a h a dove in the centre, "Veni si amas," in Cant. ii. 10. The dove palm-branch, which so is held equivalent to As with other birds, the has reference to the de-from the flesh in death, tate in life. [See BIRDS.] rose's seration on St. Eusepenetratur simplicitate penaturum;" and St. Aux. to the same purpose, the dove is associated with 139, in a vault of the lla. In Bottari, tav. 181, re-branch above the three ives.
 enting the Twelve Apostles, 118, on a mosaic crucif. ula (Ep. ad Sermon, xxiii, ribes a mosaic (musivum [Cross.]

tas mysterio vox Patris coeli tonat: virtus Sanctus fluit.
 o cingit globo:
 onat apostoli.
 e columbarum choro.
 Christo colit, citate insignia;
 ternia, et Spiritus:
 lux et ignis victimam.
 um purpura et palmas indicat a pra caelestis, o fontes meant, ristis flumina." (R. St. J. T.)

ARISTIC. Pyxes or recepd host were not unfre-silver in the shape of a ver the altar. Doves of emblematic of the Holy ended above the font in e life of St. Basil by the it is narrated that that appeared to him while rist, divided the water into he partook of with great served to be buried with rd in a golden dove hang-He afterwards sent for a new golden dove made to el (Amphiloch, Vit. Basilii, brought against the Aeoby the clergy of Antioch stantinople, A.D. 536, was appropriated to his own or doves hanging over the ars, χρυσῶν καὶ ἀσπιδῶν εἰς ἐπέρας τῶν θύλων ἐπιπύλων . . . ἐσφραγίσαντο oned by Anastasius in the St. Hilar. 70, "columbam stream pensam. libris 21;" Cf. Ducange, sub voc.

 Durantis, De Ritibus, lib. l. c. xvi. § 5; Paulin.
 Nolan. Ep. xxxii. Not. 154, p. 910. [E. V.]

DOWRY. [ARRHAE; MARRIAGE.]

DOXOLOGY (Δοξολογία). The term doxology is usually confined (1) to the "Gloria in Excelsis," which is called the greater doxology, and also the Angelical Hymn, from its opening clause recorded by St. Luke as having been sung by the angels who announced the birth of Christ to the shepherds; and (2) to the "Gloria Patri," which is called the lesser doxology. The term is, however, sometimes given to the "Trisagion" (holy, holy, holy, Lord God of Hosts, heaven and earth are full of Thy glory), called also the Seraphic hymn, in reference to the vision of the Seraphim described by Isaiah (c. vi.); and also to the word ALELUIA (q. v.), when repeated again and again as a hymn of praise.

The exact periods of the origin of these doxologies are unknown, owing to the extreme scantiness of early Christian literature. But it may be safely conjectured that, in their earliest forms, they came into use soon after that circulation of the Gospel narratives which must have quickly become general among Christians in proportion to the cultivation of each local church, and its means for communicating with the general body of believers. The extent and rapidity of this circulation being involved in extreme obscurity, so far as contemporary history informs us, the positiveness with which later writers have spoken of the almost Apostolic origin of these hymns must be set down amongst those numerous assumptions which have clouded our real knowledge of primitive Christian life and devotions. The "Trisagion" in all probability is the most ancient of all, as it would be the natural expression of the adoration of the Jewish Christians, who were already in possession of the Old Testament, and who would have been familiar with the book of Isaiah before their conversion to Christianity. The use of the "Gloria in Excelsis," which originally consisted only of its opening sentence, would be equally natural, wherever the narrative of St. Luke was known; and the "Gloria Patri," which originally consisted only of its first clause, would be the result of a familiarity with the last verses of St. Matthew's Gospel.

The "Gloria in Excelsis" is unquestionably of Eastern origin. Liturgical speculators, indeed, have ingeniously discovered a reference to its existence in very early writers. It has been frequently assumed that it was in fact "the hymn," which Christians sang on all solemn occasions, including such as are referred to in Acts xvi. 25; 1 Cor. xiv. 26; and Col. iii. 16. When the author of the dialogue attributed to Lucian speaks of the Christians as watching all night for the purpose of singing hymns, "Gloria in Excelsis." It is also held to have been specially referred to in the famous passage in Pliur's letter to Trajan: "Affirmabant hanc fuisse summam vel culmen suae, vel erroris, quod essent soliti stato die ante lucem convenire, carmenque Christo quasi Deo dicere secum invicem." In reality, however, we first meet with this doxology, and in something very like its final form, in the book known as The Apostolical

Constitutions (vii. 47). It is there described as the "morning prayer," and stands as follows: "Glory be to God on high, and on earth peace, good will towards men (ἐν ἀσθέρτοις εὐδοκία). We praise Thee, we sing to Thee (ὑμνοῦμεν σε), we bless Thee, we glorify Thee, we worship Thee, through the great High Priest; Thee the true God, the only unbegotten, whom no one can approach for the great glory. O Lord, heavenly king, God the Father Almighty, Lord God, the Father of Christ, the Lamb without spot, who taketh away the sin of the world, receive our prayer, thou that sittest upon the Cherubim! For thou only art holy, thou only, Lord Jesus, the Christ of God, the God of every created being, and our king; by whom unto Thee be glory, honour, and adoration." Unfortunately, the writer of the Constitutions was not exempt from the spirit of falsification, which was by no means rare among early religious writers. As it is impossible to believe him when he attributes a liturgy of palpably Oriental character to St. Clement, we cannot be sure that in this record of the great doxology he has not made alterations or interpolations of his own. In the mention of the doxology in the treatise De Virginitate (in Athanasius's Works) only the beginning is quoted, and even here it is not identical with that given by the author of the Constitutions. Giving directions to the virgins for their morning devotions, Athanasius says, "Early in the morning say this Psalm, 'O God, my God, early will I wake to Thee.' When it is light, say, 'Bless ye the Lord, all ye works of the Lord,' and 'Glory to God in the highest, and peace on earth, goodwill towards men. We sing to Thee, we bless Thee, we worship Thee,' and the rest (of the hymn)" (c. 20; tom. 2, p. 120, ed. Benelict.).

St. Chrysostom, on the other hand, in describing the morning devotions of those who led an austere life, says that they sang, as the angels did "Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace, goodwill towards men"; making no mention of the subsequent additions (Hon. 69 in Matth.). How soon the use of the complete hymn became general in the Western Church it is impossible to say. The 4th council of Toledo, A.D. 633, treats of it in its completeness, defends it, as such, against certain rigorists who objected to its repetition on the ground that only its first sentence was of divine origin. "For the same reason," said the fathers of the council (can. 13), "they might have rejected the lesser doxology, 'Glory and honour be to the Father, and to the Son, and to the Holy Ghost,' which was composed by men; and also this greater doxology, part of which was sung by the angels at our Saviour's birth; 'Glory be to God on high, and on earth peace to men of goodwill;' but the rest that follows was composed and added to it by the doctors of the Church."

The period at which this doxology was generally introduced into the eucharistic office in the West is entirely a matter of conjecture. There is no foundation for the common idea that it formed a portion of the early liturgies. Justin Martyr (Apol. i. c. 65) in describing the eucharistic worship of his contemporaries, makes no mention of this hymn. St. Cyril of Jerusalem, in his 5th catechesis on St. Peter's 1st Epistle, fixes certain details in the eucharistic service, such as the "Sursum corda," &c., gives no hint of its use. Nor is it found in any of the earliest liturgies, whether Western or Eastern, which are in existence. In the East, it is still used in the non-eucharistic morning services of the Church, being sung on Sundays and the greater festivals, and recited on ordinary days. It was first appointed (according to the Liber Pontif.) to be said in the Roman Liturgy by Pope Symmachus, who was raised to the Pontificate in 498, but only on Sundays and the festivals of martyrs, and apparently its recital was held to be a special privilege; for the Gregorian Sacramentary (p. 1) gives the following directions concerning it: "Item dicitur Gloria in Excelsis Deo, si episcopus fuerit, tantummodo die Dominico, sive diebus festis. A presbyteris autem minime dicitur, nisi in solo pascha. Quanto vero letania agitur, neque Gloria in Excelsis Deo, neque Alluia canitur." Pope Stephen the 3rd directed that on the highest festivals it should be sung only by bishops, at least in the Lateran Church. Pope Calixtus 2nd granted, as a privilege to the monks of Tournay, that they should use it on the Feast of the Annunciation; "pro reverentia B. Mariæ semper Virginis, cujus nomine locus vester insignis est, in Annunciatione Domini Salvatoris nostri hymnum Angelicum inter missurum solemnem abbatu et fratribus pronuciare concedimus" (Calixti epist. ad Franconem Abbatem monasterii Trenorchensis). From the Mozarabic ritual it seems to have been about this time recited in Spain on Sundays and certain festivals, in the eucharistic office; but in the Gallican Church it appears even when introduced to have been for a long time only sung on public days of thanksgiving. Its ultimate gradual adoption throughout the Western Church was no doubt due to the increasing influence of the example of Rome. At the same time our modern desire for uniformity in religious worship was unknown in the early ages of Christianity, not merely because our ideas on disciplinary organization were as yet undeveloped, but because the facilities for communication, both personally and by letter, were comparatively slight, and local customs were preserved, as almost sacred in the eyes of those who had received them from their fathers. [GLORIA IN EXCELSIS.]

2. The origin and history of the "Gloria Patri," or lesser doxology, is even more obscure than that of the "Gloria in Excelsis," and in its present shape it is the result of the Arian controversies concerning the nature of Christ. It is quite impossible to trace its use to the three first centuries; it was really known to the primitive Christians, it probably arose, as has been already suggested, from the juxtaposition of the three persons of the Trinity, in the command given by the Lord to his Apostles to teach and baptize all nations. For several centuries, the clause "As it was in the beginning, &c.," was certainly unknown in many parts of Christendom. The 4th council of Toledo, A.D. 633, makes no mention of this clause, and at the same time gives a version of the first portion which is not identical

* Tournay was an abbey in Burgundy, on the Saône, between Mâcon and Châlons; and the privilege granted by Stephen is remarkable as one of the earliest instances in which the bishop of Rome claimed a right over the public forms of prayer in local churches.

with that which subsequently became universal, reading it thus: "Gloria and honour be to the Father, and to the Son, and to the Holy Ghost, world without end, Amen." In the old Spanish liturgy, known as the Mozarabic, supposed to be of a little later date, it occurs in the same form as in the decree of Toledo. In the treatise of Walafridus Strabo De rebus ecclesiasticis (c. 25), the different usages of different countries are particularly specified. "Dicensunt," he says, "de hymno, qui ob honorem sanctæ et unice Trinitatis officis omnibus interseritur, eum à sanctis patribus aliter atque aliter ordinatum, Nam Hispani sicut superiores commemoravimus, ita eum dici omnimodo voluerunt. Graeci autem, 'Gloria Patri, et Filio, et Spiritui Sancto, et nunc, et semper, et in sæcula sæculorum. Amen.' Latini vero eodem ordine et eisdem verbis hunc hymnum decantant, addeutes tantum in medio, 'Sicut erat in principio.'" The writer of the treatise De Virginitate, which is often placed among the works of Athanasius, gives the "Gloria Patri," as "Glori be to the Father, and to the Son, and to the Holy Ghost, world without end, Amen."

The addition of the second clause is enjoined in the year 529, by the 2nd council of Vaison, which at the same time asserts that it was already universal among the Greeks. "Quia non solum," says the council, "in Sede Apostolica, sed etiam per totum Orientem et totam Africam vel Italiam, propter hæreticorum astutiam, quæ Dei Filium non semper cum Patre fuisse, sed a tempore fuisse blasphemant, in omnibus clausulis post Gloria, sicut erat in principio dicitur, etiam et nos in universis ecclesiis nostris hoc ita esse dicendum decrevimus." From which decree it appears certain that the use of the additional clause was at the least not general in Gaul at that time, though it is likely that it had gradually been introduced from Italy. It is remarkable, indeed, as the new addition was adopted with the direct object of repudiating the Arian doctrine, that it should not have spread more rapidly eastward, after the decisive action of the council of Nice in asserting the orthodox faith.

From the writers of the Arian period, again, it would seem that there were important variations in the traditional forms of the first clause, to which great significance was attached by the adherents of the opposing doctrines. One of these forms stood thus: "Glori be to the Father, and to the Son, with the Holy Ghost;" and another, "Glori be to the Father, in or by the Son, and by the Holy Ghost." Sozomen asserts (H. E. iii. 20) that the form "Glori be to the Father through the Son" was adopted by the Arias as distinctly implying the subordination of the Son to the Father; and Valesius believes that the ἀπορελεύτρία which the Arians used in their chanting (Ἰβ. viii. 8), composed to support their own views (πρὸς τὴν ἀντὶν δόξαν), were doxologies. On the other hand, Philostorgius, himself an Arian, alleges that the ancient form was really that which the Arians preferred, and that Flavian of Antioch was the first person who introduced the form now used, every one before him having said either "Glori be to the Father by the Son," or "Glori be to the Father in the Son." It is to be noted, also, that St. Basil was accused of having introduced a novelty, when he

the Son; (De Spiritu) that all used in the practice of Irenæus of of Al Thaumat form in during the Church w council of tury. Ho was gener
tion of the directed to
c. 18) when 'Deus in a dum,' &c., introductio practice al conjecture.

DRACON word denot on which a qui vert cange, s. r.
When Co
the Christi instead of change, and dracœnarius symbol join placed bene
In the C to signify t banner in e case which official in qu also did, the time's chosen Pellicia st in his time
the ancient still carried film" by th
The name sometimes gi

DRAGON

Though the leo a symbo
wherever he to represent t tions, and t combine with culpe have and the drago in a Saxon or The dragon-st version of Co gram of Chr image; the na OSARIUS] bei of banners in is represented part, in a me nius (vol. ii. p.
The fish or sealed in the nondescript (se

the lion and dragon, while the serpent is carved also near Ilim. [See SERPENT.] For the doves and tempting serpent on the Barberini gem see same article, and Gori, Th. Diptuch. vol. iii. p. 160.

DRAMAS, CHRISTIAN. As works of literature, dramas such as the Xpianós pároxy ascribed to Gregory of Nazianzus, do not come within the scope of this Dictionary. Nor have we any sufficient evidence that sacred dramas were ever acted till after the time of Charlemagne, which forms the chronological limit of its archaeology. All that can be said, therefore, is to note the fact that there is no proof of the practice of dramatic representations of sacred history prior to that period, but that probably those which soon afterwards became very popular were not entirely novelties, and, as the present writer has noticed elsewhere (Dict. of the Bible, s. v. Magic), that names and descriptions like those which Bede gives of Gaspar, Melchior, and Belthasar (de Cal. et. lxx.), appear to imply a dramatic as well as pictorial representation of the facts of the Nativity. [E. II. 1.]

DREAMS. It does not appear that the attempt to foretell the future by the interpretation of ordinary dreams was condemned by the early Church; rather it was acknowledged that dreams might be made the vehicle of divine revelation. But some of the old heathen practices by which men sought to acquire supernatural knowledge in dreams, such as sleeping in an idol's temple wrapped in the skin of a sacrifice (Virgil, Aeneid vii. 88), or under the boughs of a sacred tree, were distinctly condemned. Jerome (in loco) takes Isaiah lxx. 4 to refer to such practices. There was no impiety, he says, which Israel in those days did not perpetrate, "sitting or dwelling in sepulchres, and sleeping in the shrines of idols; where they used to pass the night (incubate) on skins of victims laid on the ground that they might learn the future by dreams, as the heathen do in certain temples even unto this day" (Wetzer and Welte, Kirchenlex. xi. 172). [C.]

DRESS. This article relates to the ordinary dress of Christians, and the dress of the clergy in civil life. For the ministerial dress, see VESTMENTS.

1. Dress of Christians generally.—In the earliest days of the Church Christians probably took little thought for raiment; yet even in the first century "gay clothing" was found in Christian assemblies (St. James ii. 2) as well as in kings' palaces. For Christians wore the ordinary dress of their station and country; neither in speech nor in manners did they differ from other men; whether in cities of the Greeks or cities of the Barbarians they followed the customs of the place in dress and manner of life (Epist. ad Diognetum, c. 5; Tertullian, Apologet. c. 42). Here and there a convert adopted or retained—as Justin did—the apless cloak (χιτών) which was characteristic of the philosopher, and especially of the Cynic; but this did not distinguish him from the heathen, but from those who made no profession of philosophy or asceticism. There is no reason to doubt that those converts who had a professional dress—as civil and military officials—continued to wear it whenever duty required.

But if the Christian was not in early times distinguished from the heathen by his garb there was always in the Church—as there could not fail to be—a strong feeling against luxury, display, and immodesty in apparel. Clement of Alexandria, who represents a somewhat ascetic tendency, condemns (Stromata, ii. 10, p. 232 ff.) all kinds of dye for that which is but the covering of man's shame, all gold and jewelry, all over-nice plaiting of the hair or decoration of the face; he seems even to imply that there is no reason why men's dress should differ from that of women, as in both cases it serves but the same purpose of covering and protecting from the cold. He will none of cloth of gold or Indian silk, the product of a poor worm turned to purposes of pride; still less of those fine materials which display what they seem to cover. Let the stuffs which Christians wear be of their natural colour, not dyed with hues fit only for a Bacchic procession. It is permissible to wear stuffs soft and pleasant to wear, not gaudy so as to attract the gaze. The long train which sweeps the ground and impels the step is an abomination to him, as also the short immodest tunic of the Laconian dæmnel. In a word, he urges simplicity and modesty in all points.

Clement's invective probably implies that luxury in dress was not unknown among the faithful in his time; this is certainly the case with that of Tertullian, whose denunciations are expressly addressed to Christians. In his treatise on women's dress, he charges on the "sons of God," who lusted after the daughters of men, the invention of the adventitious aids of feminine beauty—the gold and jewels, the brilliant dyes, the black powder with which the eyelids were tinged, the arguent which gave colour to the cheek, the wash which changed the hair to the fashionable yellow, the towers of false tresses piled upon the head and neck (De Cultu Feminarum, i. 2, 6, 8; ii. 5, 6, 7). Why, he asks, should Christian women clothe themselves in gold and jewels and gorgeous dyes, when they never displayed their charms in processions, as the heathen did, and needed not to pass through the streets except when they went to church or to visit a sick brother—not occasions for gorgeous apparel (ib. ii. 11)? Why should they imitate the Apocalyptic woman that was "arrayed in purple and scarlet colour, and decked with gold and precious stones and pearls?" (ib. ii. 12). He does not object to seemly and becoming dress (cultus), and approves attention to the hair and skin, but he inveighs against such decoration (ornatus) as seems intended to attract notice (ib. i. 4; ii. 2). The wrist accustomed to a bracelet would hardly bear a chain, the leg adorned with an anklet would scarcely bear the fetter; some necks were so loaded with pearls and emeralds as hardly to afford room for the headsman's sword (ib. ii. 13). Virgins ought always to cover their faces when they had occasion to go abroad (De Virginitate, passim).

Nor does the vehement African spare the men; he speaks with contempt of their foolish efforts to please the other sex by artistic clipping of the beard, by dressing the hair, by dyeing white locks, by singeing the down from the skin, even by using the feminine aids of paint and powder on the face (De Cultu Fem. ii. 8). To the same effect Cyprian speaks (De Habitu Virginitatis, c.

12 ff.) and nitidæ (c.

Fron s

tians in t beginning women, fo

not althou

took a mor

ing. The case of son thought to tullian, De

part of the

pel them t

tive of succ

Fiducias, c.

series of p dress might see, for ist

p. 94, el. 16

22; ii. 366,

Some can to the assum cher; sinc

men was so asceticism.

Bingham, xv to cut off th

men. But t canons 13 an in the follow pretence of apparel, and women take

And, "If an life, cut off h a memorial o

as one that

These decrees

iii. 5 and 1

(Ep. 2, c. 1,

Spe Sac. c. 23

Hæreticis).

the interchang

in stage plays,

so among ma

Under the P

hibition (Deut.

wollen and li

vi. c. 46).

The civil co repress luxury

Justinian, lib.

to contemplate of an imperial imperial insign utterly forbid or edgings (par

for male attire,

(gynæciarius); decorations, exc garments were imperial purple.

No one was to manufacture pr

There was proba of gold for male

made against the

2. Civil Dress

during the first clergy in gener

lalty, in ordin beathen by his garb Church—as there could feeling against luxury in apparel. Clement of a somewhat ascetic Trinita, ii. 10, p. 232 ff.) which is but the cover-all gold and jewelry, all the hair or decoration of to imply that there is dress should differ from in cases it serves but the and protecting from of cloth of gold or Indian nor worm turned to pur-of these fine materials ey seem to cover. Let tians wear be of their with hues it only for a is permissible to wear to wear, not gaudy

The long train which impedes the step is an also the short immod-dressed. In a word, he decent in all points.

probably implies that it is unknown among the his is certainly the case whose denunciations are Christians. In his treatise charges on the "sons of the daughters of men, ventitious aids of femi-nate jewels, the brilliant with which the eyelids at which gave colour to rich changed the hair to the tangles of false tresses neck (De Cultu Fœm.

6, 7). Why, he asks, a clothe themselves in rguous dyes, when they harmis in processions, as del not to pass through a they went to church ther—not occasions for ii. 11)? Why should ealeptic woman that le and scarlet colour, and precious stones and He does not object to ss (cultus), and approves and skin, but he inveighs (ornatus) as seems ine (ib. i. 4; ii. 2). The bracelet would hardly adorned with an amulet fetter; some necks were d emeralds as hardly to sman's sword (ib. ii. 13). cover their faces when go abroad (De Virgin.

African spare the men; t of their foolish efforts by artistic clipping of e hair, by dyeing white wa from the skin, even ds of paint and powder
m. ii. 8). To the same De Habitu Virginitatis, c.

12 ff.) and so speaks the tw De Hono Pudi- catie (c. 12) attributed to him.

