From such passages it is evident that Christians in the latter part of the second and the beginning of the third century, both men and women, followed the fashion of the world, though not without strong remonstrance from those who took a more serious view of their Christian calling. The only exception probably was in the case of some decoration which implied, or was thought to imply, participation in idolatry (Tertullian, Ve Idololatrid, c. 18). It was indeed a part of the torture applied to Christians to compel them to put on garments distinctly indicative of such participation (Acta of Perpetus and Felicitas, c. 18, in Ruinart, p. 100, ed. 2). A series of passages in denunciation of luxury in dress might be produced from the early fathers; see, for instance, Cyril of Jerusalem, Catech. IV,
p. 94, ed. 1641; Basil, Reg. Josias Tract. Interrog.
22; ii. 366, ed. Bened.

Some canonical decrees on the subject relate to the assumption by one sex of the dress of the other; since for women to wear the dress of men was sometimes represented as meritorious asceticism. Eusebius, for instance (quoted by Bingham, xvi. xi. 16) taught his female disciples to cut off their hair and to assume the habit of men. But the council of Gangra (A.D. 370), in canons 13 and 17, condemns both these practices in the following terms:—"If any woman, under pretence of leading an ascetic life, change her apparel, and instead of the accustomed habit of women take that of men, let her be anathema." And, "If any woman, on account of an ascetic life, cut off her hair, which God has given her as a memorial of subjection, let her be anathema, as one that annuls the decree of subjection." These decrees are manifestly founded upon Deut. xiii. 5 and 1 Cor. xi. 6 respectively. Cyprian (Ep. 2, c. 1, ad Eucratium) and Tertullian (de Spe. sac. c. 23), and other writers (see Prynne's Historia stric), apply the Mosaic prohibition to the interchange of clothing by men and women in stage plays, which they condemn for this reason among many others.

Under the Frankish emperors the Mosaic prohibition (Deut. xxii. 11) of wearing a garment of woollen and linen was re-enacted (Capitularium, vi. c. 46).

The civil code under the empire attempted to repress luxury by specific enactments (Code, Justinian, lib. xi. tit. 8), which seem however to contemplate, at least in part, the preservation of an imperial monopoly and of the sanctity of the imperial insignia. [COMMERCE, p. 409.] It was utterly forbidden to manufacture cloth of gold or edgings (paragundas) of silk and gold thread for male attire, except in the imperial factories (agnæcuriis); nor was any male to wear such decorations, except imperial officials. No woollen garments were to be dyed so as to imitate the imperial purple, the blood of the sacred marex.
No one was to wear imperial insignia, nor to manufacture privately any silk tunics or pallia.
There was probably a demand for silk and cloth of gold for male attire, when so strict laws were made against their use.

2. Civil Dress of the Clergy.—It is certain that during the first five Christian centuries the clergy in general were distinguished from the laity, in ordinary life, neither by the form nor the colour of their garments, but only by their sober and unobtrusive style (Thomassin, i. ii. 43).

The lacerna, byrrus, and dalmatic which Cyprian took off before his martyrdom (Acta Procons.
c. 5) seem to be the ordinary dress of a citizen of that period. So far were the clergy commonly from adopting a peculiar dress that pope Celesttinus (A.D. 428) sharply blamed certain Gallian bishops who had chosen to make themselves conspicuous by a dress different from that of the laity about them (Epist. 2, in Binius' Concilia, i. 901). These bishops, it appears, had been monks before they were promoted to the episcopate, and retained as bishops the pallium and girdle of the monk, instead of taking the tunic and toga of the superior layman. Yet Con-stantinus (Vita Germani, in Surius, iv. 360) says that bishop Amator, when he ordained Germanus (1448), afterwards bishop of Auxerre, put upon him "habitu religiosum," an expression which in all probability designates the monastic dress; and other ecclesiastics of special austerity no doubt wore the rough dress of the monk, as St.
Martin did (Salpicius Severus, Vita B. Martini, c. 10; Dialoquus li. c. 1), but the very fact that this costume was specially noticed shows that it was not the common attire of the clergy.

Nor do the clergy of the East, more than those of the West, seem to have adopted a distinctive dress in early times, unless they were members of monastic bodies, or remarkably austere in life.
If Heraclius (Euseb. H. E. vi. 19) wore the gown of the philosopher, this distinguished him not from the laity but from the unphilosophical, whether lay or clerical. The dress of the bishops, whom Constantine assembled round his table (Euseb. Vita Constant. i. 42) seems to have had no distinctive character except simplicity. Sistinnius, a Novatian bishop (Socrates, H. E. vi. 22), incurred the reproach of ostentation by wearing a white robe, which contrasted with the more usual sober colour of episcopal garments. But there are indications at a later date among the orthodox, that a somewhat splendid vesture was thought to become high station in the hierarchy.
John Chrysostom, for instance, a short time before his death, adopted the more splendid attire suited to his position; and Gregory Nazianzen declares that his own simple life and mean dress was one of the reasons for his expulsion from Constantinople—implying that something more distinguished was looked for.

St. Augustine too (Sermo 50, De Diversis), apparently still a priest, says that a valuable byrrus might befit a bishop, which would by no means suit a poor man like Augustine. That the byrrus was the common, as opposed to the ascetic, dress of Christians, is shown by the 12th canon of the council of Gangra (A.D. 358), in which those who wore the ascetic gown (περι- βόλαιον) are warned not to despise the wearers of the byrrus. Augustine objects only to wearing one more valuable than became his station.

The account also of Euthymius (Life, by Cyril, in Surius, Jan. 20) saluting Anastasius as Patriarch, shows that a dignity of that eminence was generally distinguished by the splendour of his attire.

We conclude then generally that no especial style of dress was prescribed for the clergy within the first five centuries, but that during the latter part of that period it was usual for monks who became bishops to retain their monastic garb, and for the higher dignitaries—especially the Patriarch of Constantinople, connected as he was with a splendid court—to wear such garments as befitted a person of rank.

The same inference may be drawn from the fact that the Pseudo-Dionysius (Hierarch. Eccl. c. 5), in describing the ordination of bishops, priests, and deacons, probably in the 5th century, says not a word of any change of dress, though he is careful to mention it in the case of monks.

In the 6th century the civil dress of the clergy came to differ from that of the laity, mainly because the latter departed from the ancient type to which the former adhered; for the clergy, in the empire of the West, retained the long tunic and toga (or pallium) of the Romans, while the laity adopted for the most part the short tunic, trousers, and cloak of the "gens braccata," the Teutonic invaders. It was probably in consequence of this change of dress that the compilation of canons sanctioned by the second council of Braga, A.D. 572 (c. 66; Bruns's Canones, ii. 56), especially desired the clergy to wear the long dignified tunic (talarem vestem). Gregory the Great constantly assumes the existence of a distinctive clerical habit. He speaks, for instance (Epist. iv. 22), of men assuming the ecclesiastical habit and living a worldly life. And John the Deacon (Vita Gregorii, ii. 13) directs especial attention to the fact, that the great Pontiff himself tolerated no one about him who wore the barbarian dress; every one in his household wore the garb of old Rome (trabenta Latinitas), then almost synonymous with the clerical habit.

And from the beginning of the 6th century we find canons forbidding clerics to wear the secular dress. They are not to wear long hair, nor clothes other than such as befit "religion" (Conc. Agathen. c. 20); nor a military cloak, nor arms (C. Matiseon. c. 5); nor purple, which rather befits the great ones of the world (C. Narbon. c. 1). And again, in the 8th century, priests and deacons are desired not to wear the laic sagum, or short cloak, but the CASULA, as becomes servants of God (C. German. i. A.D. 742, c. 7),—where the expression "ritu servorum Dei" probably does not mean "like monks" (Marriott, Vest. Christ. 201, n. 416)—and generally not to wear ostentatious clothes (pompatico habitu) or arms (Boniface, Epist. 105). Yet about the same time pope Zachary, writing to Pipin, mayor of the palace (Conc. Gallicæ, i. 563), desires bishops to dress according to their dignity, and parish priests (presbyteri cardinales) to wear in preaching a better style of dress than that of the people committed to them; warning them at the same time that not the dress of the body but the state of the soul is the important thing.

Yet even in the latter part of the 7th century Bede tells us (Vita Cuthberti, c. 16) that St. Cuthbert wore ordinary clothes (vestimentis communibus),* neither splendid nor dirty, and that after his example the monks of his monastery continued to wear garments of undyed wool.

The course of events in the East, in respect of clerical dress, was not very different from that in the West, except that as the settlements of the barbarians were less numerous, the distinction between layman and cleric was less obvious, both wearing the long tunic. A law of Justinian (Nov. 123, c. 44) protected monastic dress from profane uses, but says nothing of any other dress peculiar to clerics. The council in Trullo, however, A.D. 691, expressly enacted (c. 27) that no one on the roll of the clergy should wear an unprofessional (ἀσκητικόν) dress, whether in the city or on a journey, but should use the robes (ἑσθῆς) prescribed for those who were enrolled among the clergy, under pain of excommunication for a week. From this point the difference between clerical and lay dress may be considered established, though a series of enactments throughout the middle ages shows that the clergy were constantly in the habit of assimilating their dress to that of the laity.

Pope Zachary's decree (A.D. 743) that bishops, priests, and deacons should not use secular dress, but only the sacerdotal tunic; and that when they walked out, whether in city or country—unless on a long journey—they should wear some kind of upper garment or wrapper (peripetium).^b

The second council of Nice, in the year 787, condemns (c. 15) bishops and clerics who distinguish themselves by the richness and brilliant colours of their dress. So Tarasius, patriarch of Constantinople (†806), bade his clergy abstain from golden girdles, and from garments bright with silk and purple, prescribing girdles of goats' hair, and tunics decent but not gorgeous (Life, c. 14, in Surius, Feb. 28).

The council of Aix, in the year 818 (c. 124), inveighs against personal ornament and splendour of dress in the clergy, and exhorts them to be neither splendid nor slovenly. It seems to be presumed that the proper form of the clerical dress was well known, for nothing is said on this point. It further (c. 25) forbids secular or canonical clerks to wear hoods [CRELLA], the peculiar distinction of monks. A somewhat later council (C. Metens. A.D. 888, c. 6) forbids the clergy to wear the short coats (cuttes) and mantles (mantellos) of the laity, and the habit to wear the copes (cappas) of the clergy. Early in the 9th century also, presbyters were enjoined to wear their stoles always, as an indication of their priesthood (Conc. Mayenz. A.D. 813, c. 28; Capitularium, lib. v. c. 146).

We may conclude then, generally, that the clergy wore in civil life, during the first eight centuries of the church, the long tunic which was the dress of decent citizens at the time of the first preaching of Christianity. This was at first generally white [Alba], afterwards of sober colours, though not seldom—in spite of canons—of more brilliant hue. To this was added in early times the dignified toga; afterwards the cappa [COPE; CASULA, p. 294], or pluviale, not then appropriated as a vesture of ministration only. The long tunic, under whatever name, has continued to be the ordinary dress of the clergy to this day, wherever they have worn a peculiar dress.

Literature.—Bingham's Antiquities, VI. iv.

^b The word rather suggests a covering for the head; but it is difficult to understand why a man taking a long journey should be excused from wearing a head-covering, while it is easy to imagine that he might not wish to wear a cumbersome cappa or casula in the climate of Italy.

* This may mean, however, that Cuthbert as abbot did not assume a dress different from that of his monks.

DROMIC. In the Oriental Church churches of the basilican form, i. e. parallelograms, with the length considerably exceeding the breadth, and terminating in a semicircular apse, were called "dromic" (δρωμικαί), from the similarity of their plan to that of a δρῶμος or "stadium." The notion of Leo Allatius (de Templis Græcæ. Recent. Ep. ii. § 3), and Suicer (sub voc. vabz, adopted by Bingham; Origines, bk. viii. ch. iii. § 1) that they were so styled from having "void spaces for deambulatoria" within their roofs on the upper side of the flat ceilings, is quite unfounded. Theol. Zygomalas apud Suicer correctly derives the name "dromic" from the form, the length much greater than the breadth, like a "narthex" or wand: δρωμικὸν δὲ κτὸν νάρθηκος πᾶν δρωμικὸν παρῆξ λέγεται. Of this plan was the original church of St. Sophia at Constantinople: ἐν τῇ μεγάλῃ ἐκκλησίᾳ τῆς ἁγίας Σοφίας δρωμικὴ τὸ πρότερον ὄνομα (Cotin. Orig. Constantinopol. 72), and that of St. Anastasia in the same city: ὁ δὲ ναὸς τῆς ἁγίας Ἀναστασίας ἐστὶ δρωμικός (Constant. de Admin. Imp. 29). Existing examples of dromic churches in the East are those of St. Demetrius at Thessalonica (Texter, Archit. Byzant. 157), St. Philip, and the Virgin of the Grand Monastery at Athens (Conchaud, pl. 2, 4), and St. Catherine on Mount Sinai, built by Justinian.

DRUNKENNESS. Of the prevalence of this vice in the Roman world in the early ages of Christianity it would be needless to speak. That it became peculiarly shameless about the very opening of the Christian era, we infer from Pliny's observation that under Tiberius men first began to drink fasting, jejuni (bk. xiv. c. xxviii.). The neighbouring races to the Roman empire were not more temperate than the Romans themselves. To the east, the same Pliny records that the Parthians were great drunkards. Of the Germans, Tacitus says that to drink through a whole day and night was considered no disgrace (de Mor. Germ. c. xxxii.).

It is not necessary to go here into the denunciations of drunkenness contained both in the Old and New Testament. It will be enough to say that St. Paul expressly includes "drunkards" among those who shall not "inherit the Kingdom of God" (1 Cor. vi. 10). Early Church writers follow the same line, see Clement ad Cor. Ep. i. c. 30; Apost. Const. ii. c. 25; v. c. 10; vii. c. 6; and particularly viii. c. 44. The Apost. Const. and Constitutions there warn against giving relief to gluttons, drunkards, or idlers, as not being fit for the Church (bk. ii. c. 4). Drunken habits were to afford a presumption against a person accused before the Church Courts (ib. c. 43). The oblations of drunkards were not to be received (bk. iv. c. 6). The true rule of Christian temperance is given in one of the later constitutions (bk. viii. c. 44): "Not that they should not drink, for this is to condemn that which is made of God for cheerfulness, but that they should not drink to excess." The Apostolic Canons in like manner make drunkenness a ground of exclusion from communion for bishops, priests, deacons, subdeacons, readers or singers, and also for laymen (c. 35, otherwise numbered 41, 42, or 42, 43).

Still the vice flourished, as may be seen for instance from the injunctions of Jerome to Nepotianus "never to smell of wine," since "wine-bibbing priests are both condemned by the apostle and forbidden by the old law" (Ep. 2); or to Eustochium, that "the spouse of Christ should flee wine as poison." In some countries drunkenness was even made an accompaniment of the most solemn services of the Church. Augustine complains (ad Aur. Ep. 22, otherwise 64) that in Africa "revellings and drunkenness are deemed so allowable and lawful that they take place even in honour of the most blessed martyrs," even in the cemeteries [CELLA MEMORIAE], as appears from the sequel to the passage. And so rooted does he consider drunken habits to be in his flock that he advises them to be dealt with gently, rather by teaching than by command, rather by warning than by menace.

For a long time, however, clerical discipline in respect of this vice seems rather to have been enforced, or attempted to be enforced, through the well-known prohibition to clerics to enter taverns. [CAUTION.] Except in the Apostolic Canons, the first distinct Church enactment against drunkenness appears to be that of the 1st Council of Tours, 461. "If any one serves God in whatever clerical office shall not abstain from drunkenness according to the order of his estate, let a fitting punishment be awarded to him" (c. 2). In 1vo the same canon appears in an altered form as directed especially against clerical tavern-keepers, who sold wine in their churches, so that where nought should be heard but orisons and the word of God and his praise, there revellings and drunkenness are found. Such excesses are forbidden, and the offending presbyter is ordered to be deposed, offending laymen to be excommunicated and expelled (see also c. 3, of same). No doubt the vice was highly prevalent in France, for a few years later we find the Council of Vannes also enacting that "above all things should drunkenness be avoided by clerics . . . therefore we decree that he who shall be ascertained to have been drunk, as the order suffers, shall be either excluded for thirty days from communion or given over to corporal punishment" (c. 13). The same canon was re-enacted by the Council of Agde in 506 (c. 41). Somewhat later in the century, the Constitutions of King Chillicbert, after ordering the abolishing of certain remains of idolatry, lament the sacrileges committed, when for instance all night long men spend the time in drunkenness, scurrility, and singing, even in the sacred days of Easter, Christmas, and the other feasts; and enacts for penalty 100 lashes for a servile person, but for a freeborn one strict imprisonment (districta inclusio) and penance, that at least by bodily torments they may be reduced to sanity of mind. In the East even, at the Council of Constantinople in 536, we find mention of a letter of the clergy of Apamea against one bishop Peter (deposed for

The West, however, seems to have been the chief home of gluttony and drunkenness. A canon of the Council of Autun (A.D. 870 or thereabouts) enacted that no priest stuffed with food or crapulous with wine should touch the sacrifice, or presume to say mass, under pain of losing his dignity. In a work of Theodore, archbishop of Canterbury, De Remedii Peccatorum (end of 7th century), it is laid down that a bishop or other ordained person who has the vice of habitual drunkenness must either amend himself or be deposed. The Council of Berkhamstead, in the 5th year of Withræl king of Kent (A.D. 897), enacts that if a priest be so drunk that he cannot fulfil his office, his ministry shall cease at the will of the bishop (c. 7). Gildas (De Penitentiâ, c. 7), lays down that if any one through drunkenness cannot sing the psalms, he is to be excluded from communion. Some extracts from a certain "Book of David," supposed, like that of Gildas, to have been received by the Irish Church, make some curious distinctions. A priest drunk through ignorance is to be subject to 13 days' penance; if through negligence, to 40 days; if through contempt [of discipline?] to thrice forty. He who for civility's sake (humanitatis causa) compels another to get drunk is to do penance as for drunkenness. But he who through the effect of hatred or luxuriousness, that he may shamefully confound or mock others, compels them to get drunk, if he has not sufficiently repented, is to do penance as a killer of souls (c. 1).

Gregory III. (731-41) in his Excerpts from the Fathers and the Canons, mentions the habitual drunkenness of a bishop, priest, or deacon as being a ground of deposition, if he do not amend himself (c. 8). An epistle of Boniface himself to Cuthbert, archbishop of Canterbury, read at the Council of Cloveshoe, A.D. 747, bears further testimony to the prevalence of drunkenness in Britain: "It is said also that in your parishes drunkenness is a too common evil, so that not only do the bishops not forbid it, but themselves, drinking too much, become intoxicated, and compel others to become so, offering them larger beakers." And the Canons of the Council bear "that monks and clerics should not follow or desire the evil of drunkenness," but should avoid it; "nor should they compel others to drink immoderately." If they have no infirmity, they should not before the third hour of the day indulge in potations after the manner of drunkards (c. 21). So again the Penitential of archbishop Egbert repeats, with slight variation of language, the canon of the Council of Vannes as to the inflicting of 30 days' excommunication or corporal punishment on the cleric proved to have been drunk (bk. ii. c. 9); increasing the punishment to three months on bread and water to the cleric or monk who is given to drunkenness (c. 10). And the canons of the same on "the remedies for sin," reckon among capital crimes habitual drunkenness (c. 5), and impose three years' penance for it (c. 7),—such penance being apparently in addition to the three months' bread and water above referred to. A "faithful" layman making another drunk must do forty days' penance (c. 11). A definition is given of drunkenness, which is also found elsewhere: "when the state of the mind is changed, and the tongue falters, and the eyes are troubled, and there is dizziness and distension of the belly followed by pains." Clerics guilty of such excess must do 40 days' penance; a rule followed unintelligibly by the enjoining for the same offence of 4 weeks' penance for a deacon or priest, 5 for a bishop, 3 for a "prelate"; the penance to be without wine or flesh-meat (c. 12).

Drunkenness must have been widely spread over the Continent also in the 8th and 9th centuries. The same Boniface in a letter to Pope Zacharias (A.D. 741-51), complains, among other scandals of the contemporary Romish Church, of its drunkard deacons; and the pope in reply only says that he does not allow such deacons to fulfil sacred offices or touch the sacred mysteries. The 3rd canon of the Council of Friuli (A.D. 791) is severe against drunkenness, referring to the passages of the subject in Titus I., Rom. xiii., Epil. v., Luke xii. The Capitularies of Theodulf, archbishop of Orleans, to his clergy (797) enjoin on these both to abstain themselves from drunkenness and to preach to their flocks that they should likewise abstain (l. c. 13); but recks among minor sins the intoxicating others for the sake of mirth (ll.). The 26th of Charlemagne's Church Capitularies (810) directs in like manner the elder clergy to forbear the vice themselves and offer to the younger an example of good sobriety; the first capitulary of 802 contains repeated injunctions against drunkenness among monks (c. 17), nuns (c. 18), and canons (c. 22); the Council of Mayence (812), speaking of drunkenness as "a great evil, whence all vices are bred," directs all to be excommunicated who do not avoid it, until they amend their ways (c. 46); the 2nd Council of Rheims (same year) declares that the bishops and ministers of God should not be too much given to feasting (violentibus; c. 18); the Edict of Charlemagne in 814 forbids clerics "nourishing" drunkenness and ordering others to become intoxicated (c. 14). See also the first capitulary of Aix-la-Chapelle of 802, c. 35; a capitulary of 803 (bk. vii. c. 218, and again at greater length, c. 270) repeating at the close the 15th canon of the Council of Vannes, but extending the period of suspension from communion to 40 days; the Additio Quarta to the capitularies, c. 46; the 3rd Council of Tours, A.D. 813, c. 48; and the 2nd Council of Chartres (same year), c. 10.

The above canons and rules relate chiefly, though not exclusively, to the clergy, or if to the faithful generally, only in respect to Church discipline. In the Carolingian era, however, civil penalties or disabilities began to be inflicted for drunkenness. In a capitulary of 803, added to the Salic law, it is enacted that no one while drunk may obtain his suit in the mall nor give witness; nor shall the count hold a plea unless before breaking his fast; nor may any one compel another to drink (cc. 15, 16; and see also General Collection, bk. iii. c. 38, and bk. vi. 232-3). The latter injunction is thus developed in a capitulary of 813: "That in the host none do pray his peer or any other man to drink. And whoever in the army shall have been found drunk, shall be so excommunicated that in drinking he use only water till he know himself to have acted evilly" (bk. iii. c. 72). Another

It is wholly spread over the 8th and 9th centuries. A letter to Pope Zacharias, among other scandals of the Roman Church, of which the pope in reply only says that deacons-to fulfil sacred mysteries. The 3rd Council (A.D. 791) is severe in referring to the passages of m. xlii, Eph. v. capitulary, relating however to the clergy, enacts that priests who against the canons enter taverns and are not ashamed to minister to feasting and drunkenness, are to be severely coerced (bk. v. c. 325; see also c. 102, which however only pronounces excommunication).

The data for the above statements are taken, except in the first few centuries, exclusively from the legal records of the Church, or those of a period when it was almost identified with the state. They might be abundantly illustrated from contemporary writer, century by century. But they suffice to show that the vice in question was never absent from the Church nor from its clergy, and that it attained enormous proportions among the latter in our own islands, and in the 8th and 9th centuries on the Continent also. DUCKS. It is quite uncertain why this bird is represented in early art, but it occurs repeatedly in the bas-reliefs of the Duomo at Ravenna, on the great piers at the east end, and in the church of St. Giovanni Evangelista in the same place. It is also drawn with great spirit and evident enjoyment by the monk Rabula, who twice indulges in an archivolt pattern of ducks and eggs (Assemani, Catolog. Bibl. Med. Tavv. xviii, xix); besides single representations of various species. The bird may have been domesticated in monasteries, &c., and have been a favourite subject of illumination from its pretty colouring. It occurs in the Lombard bas-reliefs at Verona. [R. Sr. J. T.]

DUEL (Duellum). The notion of deciding a matter in dispute, after ordinary means had failed, by a single combat between the parties or their champions, came into the empire with the Teutonic tribes, who were accustomed to settle by arms their private as well as public disputes.

The earliest formal recognition of the judicial combat as an institution seems to be in the laws of the Burgundians (Caucian, Ley. barbar. iv. 25; A.D. 502), which provide (tit. 45) that a man who declines to clear himself by oath is not to be denied his right of challenge to combat. Afterwards the duel is referred to in many barbarian codes, as Leyes Aleman. tit. 44, § 1; Baiuar. tit. 2, c. 2; Loujvard. lib. 1. tit. 9, § 39, &c.

It was only under the formal sanction of a court, and as a kind of appeal to a higher tribunal, that such combats were held to be legal.

The further development of the system, and the canonical precepts relating to it, belong to the Middle Ages (Selden, T e Duello or Single Combat, in Works, vol. 3; Ducange, s. v. Duellum). [C.]

DULA, martyr at Nicomedia; commemorated March 25 (Mart. Rom. Vet., Hieron., Bedae, Adonis, Usuardi). [W. F. G.]

DUMB. The 49th (otherwise 56th) of the Apostolical Canons enacts excommunication against any cleric who should make a mock of the deaf, dumb, or blind. By the 69th (otherwise 77th), the deaf, the dumb, and the blind were excluded from the episcopate, not as defiled, but that the proceedings of the Church should not be hindered.

The capacity of the dumb to receive the sacraments or accept a penance was the subject of some controversy. A whole work of Fulgentius (De Baptismo Aethiops) is devoted to the question of the validity of the baptism of an Ethiopian catechumen after the loss of his voice, and he concluded that it was entitled to the same validity as that of an infant. This view prevailed in the Church. Amongst other canonical authorities, the 1st Council of Orange, A.D. 441, enacted that a person suddenly losing his voice might be baptized or accept a penance, if his previous will thereto could be proved by the witness of others, or his actual will by his nod (c. 12). The 38th canon of the 2nd Council of Arles (452) is to the same effect as regards baptism.

According to one of Ulpian's Fragmenta (t. xx.) the dumb could not be a witness, nor make a testament, the reason assigned in the latter case being that he could not pronounce the "words of nuncupation" technically required for the purpose. And by a constitution of Justinian, A.D. 531 (Code, bk. vi. tit. xxii. l. 10) deaf-mutes were declared incapable of making a will or codicil, constituting a donation moris causa, or conferring a freedom, unless the infirmity should not be congenital, and they should have learned to write before it occurred, in which case they could exercise all these rights by writing under their own hand. The dumb were in all cases allowed to do so by such writing. It was, however, held by the old law that the dumb, as well as the deaf and blind, could lawfully contract marriage, and become subject to dotal obligations (Dij. bk. xxiii. tit. iii. l. 73). Deaf-mutes were held excused from civil honours, but not from civil charges (Ibid. bk. l. tit. ii. l. 7). But the dumb might lawfully decline a guardianship or curatorship (Code, bk. v. t. lxxvii.; Const. of Philip. A.D. 247). [J. M. L.]

EAGLE. It is probably an instance of careful exclusion of all Pagan emblems or forms which had been actual objects of idolatrous worship, while merely Gentile or human tokens and myths were freely admitted, that the form of the eagle appears so rarely in Christian ornamentation, at least before the time of its adoption as the symbol of an evangelist. [EVANGELISTA.] Ariaghi (vol. ii. p. 228, c. 2) speaks of the eagle as representing the Lord Himself; and this is paralleled by a quotation of Martignac from a sermon of St. Ambrose, where he refers to Ps. cii. ("Thy youth is renewed like the eagle's") as foreshadowing the resurrection. Leblant (Étude Chrétienne de la Bible, l. 147, 45), in illustration gives a palm between two eagles, and Bottari a plate of a domed ceiling in the sepulchre of St. Priscilla, where two eagles standing on globes form part of the ornamentation. It refers evidently to some buried general or legionary officer (vol. iii. tav. 160). Triumphant chariots fill two of the side spaces, but they and the eagles can hardly be considered Christian emblems, though used by Christians.

EARS, TOUCHING OF. 1. In Baptism. As by the influence of the Holy Spirit men's hearts are opened to receive the wondrous things of God's law, so there was a symbolic opening of the ears in the baptismal ceremony (Ambrose, De Mysteriis, c. 1; Pseudo-Ambrosius, De Sacramenti, l. 1; Petrus Chrysologus, Sermo 52; see also the ancient Expositio Evangeliorum in curium apertione in Martene, De Rit. Ant., l. i. 12). Thus in Magnus's directions for the preliminaries of baptism (Martene, u. s. art. 17), drawn up by command of Charles the Great, we read, after the instruction in the Creed: "tanguntur aures et nares de sputo, et dicitur Ephata [Ephphatha], id est, aperire." In order that the ears may listen to the wholesome teaching of the Christian faith and reject the sophistical pleadings of the devil. Similarly in the ancient baptismal Ordines of Gemblours and of Rheims (ib. art. 18).

2. In Holy Communion, it seems to have been the custom to touch the organs of sense (αἰσθητήρια) with the moisture left on the lips after receiving the cup (Cyril of Jerusalem, Catech. Myst. v. 22; see COMMUNION, HOLY, p. 413). [C.]

EAST, PRAYER TOWARDS. Praying towards the East, as the quarter of the rising sun, the source of light, a natural symbolism common to nearly all religions, was adopted by the Christian church from its commencement, in accordance with the very wise rule which accepted all that was good and pure in the religious systems it came to supplant, breathing into the old ceremonies a new and higher life. One of the earliest testimonies to the prevalence of this custom among Christians is that of Tertullian, c. 205 (Apolo., c. xvi.; cont. Valentini, c. iii.), who refers to the suspicions entertained by the heathen that Christians were sun worshippers "because they were well known to turn to the East in prayer," being "lovers of the radiant East, that figure of Christ." The Apostolical Constitutions also direct that the whole congregation "rise up with one consent, and looking to the east, pray to God

"eastward" (lib. ii. § vii. c. 57). The same rule is mentioned by Clemens Alexandrinus (Stramata, vii. 7), who says that "prayers are made looking towards the sunrise in the east." Basil, c. 374, testifies to the universality of the custom (De Sp. Sanct. c. 27), and Augustine speaks of it as a general usage (De Serm. in Monte, lib. ii. c. 5). To take one later instance out of many, Joannes Moschus, c. 600, records an anecdote of a certain abbot Zacharius of Jerusalem, who, when praying, "turned to the east and remained about two hours, without speaking, his arms stretched out to heaven" (Prat. spirital. § 102). The chapter of Joannes Damascenus (De Orthod. Fid. iv. 13) "concerning worshipping to the east," proves the prevalence of the custom.

The true reason for this custom is doubtless that already alluded to, that, to adopt the language of Clemens Alex., "the east is the image of the day of birth. For as the light which there first shone out of darkness was brighter, so, like the sun, the day of the knowledge of truth has dawned on those immersed in darkness" (Clem. Alex. u. s.) In close connection with this is the reference to Christ as the "Day-spring from on high," the ἀνατολή, the "Light of the World," which the early writers delight to recognise (Chrys. Homil. in Zach. vi. 12). Other reasons for, or more properly speaking, deductions from the practice, are given by other writers, one of the most frequent and beautiful of which is that in praying to the east the soul is seeking and sighing for its old home in Paradise, to which it hopes to be restored in Christ, the second Adam (Basil De Sp. Sanct. u. s., Const. Ap. st., u. s.; Greg. Nyss. Homil. V. de Orat. Domin.; Chrys. ad David. vi. 10; Gregentius Discipul., cum Herb. Jul. p. 217). Another cause assigned is that Christ when on the cross looked towards the west, so that in praying to the east we are looking towards Him (Joan. Damasc. u. s., Cassiod. ad Ps. lxxvii.), and that as He appeared in the east, and thence ascended into heaven, so He will there appear again at the last day, the coming of the Son of Man being like "the lightning that cometh out of the east and shineth even unto the west" (Matt. xxiv. 27), so that in prayer Christians are looking for their Lord's return (Hilar. in Ps. lxxvii.). We learn from St. Cyril of Jerusalem and others that the Catechumen at Baptism turned from the west, the place of darkness, to the east, the home of light, and to the site of Paradise which by that sacrament was reopened to him (Cyril Catech. xix. 9; Hieron. in Amos. vi. 14; Ambros. De Inimicis, c. 2; Lactant. lib. ii. c. 10; Pseudo Justin. Quest. ad Orthod. 118). (Bona De Divin. Psalmod. c. vi. § 2; Bingham Ory. xi. 7, 4; xiii. 8. 15.) [E. V.]

Instance, that it was originally on the 25th March, which was true indeed of the mean vernal equinox, but never of the true vernal equinox. This misconception is probably due to the fact that the 25th of March was marked as the vernal equinox in the calendar of Julius Coesar, according to the testimony of Varro, Pliny, and Columella. We have thought it worth while to calculate, for the purpose of this article, and now to state, the principal positions of the vernal equinox (true) since the Julian era.

Clavius, misled by the tables which he used (Tabulae Nicenae Coenaculi, sive Prutenicae) placed the Vernal Equinox at the Nicene Council, A.D. 325, or March 21st, 6^h P.M. nearly 28 hours too late (Op. tom. v. p. 72). The 20th and 21st are the very days to which the equinox was brought back at the Gregorian correction of 1582, when it stood at Mar. 11th (civil) 2^h 10^m A.M., the earlier limit being Mar. 10th, 2^h 32^m P.M., and the later Mar. 11th (civil) 8^h A.M.

The connection of the passover with Easter is through that particular passover at which our Lord suffered, but so few are the chronological details in the gospels, that it is impossible to fix with absolute certainty either the year or the day of the year, or perhaps even of the month on which our Lord suffered. The full investigation of the subject would be beyond the scope of this article.

The points which are beyond doubt are these:
I. Our Lord's death took place under the procuratorship of Pontius Pilate: that is to say, between the limits A.D. 28 and A.D. 33 inclusive.
II. It took place at the passover.

III. All the gospels agree that it took place on the παρασκευή, that is, on a Friday. In St. John (ix. 14), the παρασκευή τοῦ πάσχα probably means (like πρωτομαρτία in the Chronicon Paschale i. 15) the day before the 15th Nisan, which was in a double sense that year a Sabbath (John ix. 31), but the word was in common use to designate the eve before the Sabbath, and came afterwards to mean simply "Friday."

Astronomy, while furnishing valuable suggestions on this important subject, is not competent to decide absolutely, either for the particular year, or between the advocates of the 14th and of the 15th Nisan.

The history of the paschal observance in the apostolic and early post-apostolic times is extremely obscure, and has been very variously represented. There is no evidence in the New Testament that it existed at first as an institution. The ecclesiastical historian Socrates is no doubt right when he says (v. 22): "The Saviour and His apostles have enjoined us by no law to keep this feast . . . The apostles had no thought of appointing festival days, but of promoting a life of blamelessness and piety. And it seems to me that the feast of Easter has been introduced into the Church from some old usage, just as many other customs have been established." It appears (from Acts xviii. 21; xx. 6, 16) that the Jewish Christians and even St. Paul still observed the Jewish feasts, and there can be no doubt that the memory of the Lord's death would be with them the main thought of the passover-night, and would gradually supersede for them all other associations. On the other hand, the passover meal had no place amongst the habits of the Christians of Gentile descent, and their anniversary naturally attached itself to the first day of the week, which was observed both by Jewish and Gentile Christians as the weekly festival of the Lord's resurrection. When the time of the passover came round, the first day of the week seemed to be the actual day of the resurrection, and this day, taken together with the preceding Friday, as the day of the crucifixion, seemed the proper representations of the great act of our redemption. Amongst the Gentile Christians these institutions, with their accompanying rules of fasting, &c., were apparently very gradually developed, and the conflict between the two usages was slow in coming. When it came, we find the cardinal point to be the ἡ ἡμέρα (with the Asiatic Christians), or the ἡ ἡμέρα (with the Westerns), the 14th of the moon (Nisan), and afterwards along with this, and connected with it, the correct determination of the 14th of the moon. The point insisted on most emphatically by the Alexandrians (whom the Westerns followed), was, that it must not precede the equinox.

When the Western view ultimately prevailed in the church, those who obstinately persevered in the Asiatic custom, and were condemned as heretics, were called Quartodecimans, and it is usual and convenient to give the same name by anticipation to those who observed the 14th day of the moon in the earlier controversy.

The chief information we have is derived from Eusebius, from several passages of Epiphanius, treating in his work on all heresies of certain Quartodeciman sects, and from several fragments preserved in the Chronicon Paschale, a work of about 630 A.D.

The following conclusions of Bueherius from a passage in Epiphanius (Haer. lxx.), will express the probable course of events. "From this I gather three things: First, that so long at least as the first fifteen bishops of Jerusalem (those of Jewish descent) continued, the pascha was celebrated everywhere by all Christians, or by a great majority of them, according to the lunar computation and method of the Jews. But they continued until the year 136 A.D., or to the end of the reign of the emperor Hadrian, when Mark was first taken from the Gentiles to be bishop (Euseb. v. xii.) Secondly, that then began a time of dissension, as Epiphanius a little before more plainly testifies (see below). Thirdly, that a more general method then came in, whether the eighty-four years cycle, or the octasters (amended), otherwise that approach was unmeaning which the Auditor launched against the

of the chapter which is here alluded to.

"For even from the earliest times various controversies and dissensions were in the church concerning this solemnity, which used yearly to bring laughter and mockery. For some, in a week, some after the week, some at the beginning, some in the middle, some at the end. To sary in a word, there was a wonderful and laborious confusion. Nor is it unknown to learned men, how often, at the various times of this feast, there have arisen from the observance of a different ecclesiastical discipline, tumults and contentions, especially in the time of Polycarp and Victor, when the Easterns and Westerns would receive no mutual letters of peace. Which also happened in other times, as in that of Alexander, bishop of Alexandria, and Crescentius, how they wrote against each other and bitterly fought. Which disputes began to beagitated from the very times of the bishops who had been converted to Christ from the circumcision and from the sect of the Jews, even to our own times, on which account those who had gathered from all sides to the Nicene council, the matter having been accurately known, with common agreement from all, and with fitting computation and calculation of times, order it to be kept."

Eusebius (H. E. v. 24) gives in a letter of Irenaeus the following account, relating to the events about A.D. 160.

"When the blessed Polycarp was at Rome in the time of Anicetus, and they had also some little difference of opinion with regard to other points, they immediately came to a peaceable understanding respecting this one, for they had no love for mutual disputes. For neither could Anicetus persuade Polycarp not to observe (καθ ἡμέραν, i.e. the 14th Nisan) inasmuch as he had always observed it with John the disciple of our Lord, and the other apostles with whom he had associated; nor could Polycarp persuade Anicetus to observe (ἡμέραν) for he said that he ought to follow the custom of the presbyters before him."

Polycarp was bishop of Smyrna in Asia Minor, and there can be no doubt that he expressed in these words the custom of the Asiatic churches, which was ἡμέραν, whilst that of the Westerns was καθ' ἡμέραν. That we ought to supply after ἡμέραν, the 14th Nisan, we learn from c. 23 (referring to about A.D. 190).

"There was a considerable discussion raised about this time, in consequence of a difference of opinion respecting the observance of the paschal season. The churches of all Asia, guided by ancient tradition, thought that they were bound to keep the 14th day of the moon, on the occasion of the feast of the Saviour's passover, that day on which the Jews had been commanded to kill the paschal lamb, it being necessary for them by all means to regulate the close of the fast by that day, on whatever day of the week it might happen to fall; while it was the custom of all the churches of all the rest of the world, which observed in this respect an apostolic tradition that has prevailed down to our own time, not to celebrate it in this manner, it being proper to close the fast on no other day than that of the resurrection of our Lord."

"The bishops, however, of Asia" (he continues in the 24th chap.) "persevering in observing the custom handed down to them from their fathers, were headed by Polycrates. He, indeed, had also set forth the tradition handed down to them, in a letter which he addressed to Victor and the church of Rome. 'We,' said he, 'therefore observe the genuine day: neither adding great lights have fallen asleep, which shall rise again in the day of the Lord's appearing . . .

All these observed the 14th day of the passover according to the gospel, deviating in no respect, but following the rule of faith; so also do I, Polycrates, who am the least of all of you, and whom I have followed. For there were seven of my relatives bishops, and I am the eighth; and my relatives always observed the day when the people (i.e. the Jews) threw away the leaven.'
"Upon this, Victor, the bishop of the church of Rome, forthwith endeavoured to cut off the churches of all Asia, together with the neighbouring churches, as heterodox, from the communion and unity. And he publishes abroad by letters, and proclaims that all the brethren there are wholly excommunicated."

Many bishops, however, remonstrated, amongst others Irenaeus, who wrote an epistle, in which he maintains the duty of celebrating the mystery of the resurrection of our Lord, only on the day of the Lord; but admonishes Victor not to cut off whole churches of God, who observed the tradition of an ancient custom.

In chap. xxv. Eusebius explains that the bishops of Palestine agreed with the decree, and stated that they observed the same day with the church of Alexandria, an important point, for Alexandria is to be looked on, along with the churches of Rome and Asia Minor, as the third, and alti-mately the most important, influence in regulating Easter.

Considering how much has been written respecting the Asia Minor controversies in modern times, it is material to observe that the statements of Eusebius and the whole course of the controversy, leave no doubt of the observance of the 14th day of the moon. No other day comes into consideration. Thus the facts are settled; to judge of the motives from which the day was kept is, however, more difficult. Various reasons might easily be alleged for the observaance of this day: those who thought that our Lord died on the 14th Nisan, might keep it (as we believe) as the anniversary of our Lord's death, or even if they desired to keep the anniversary of the last supper, knowing that that supper, which was by intention a passover, was only anticipated in point of time by necessity, whilst those who thought that our Lord died on the 15th Nisan, might yet keep the 14th (as Baur and Hilgenfeld allege) in memory of the supper.

That St. John found at Ephesus a festival on the 14th and joined in it, and gave it the weight of his authority, in no way militates, then, against his authorship of the gospel, that fixes the 14th Nisan for the crucifixion, even though it were true that the other chronology had originally prevailed there.

The argument of Baur, and all the members of the Tubingen school, is as follows:—the Asiatics celebrated the 14th Nisan by an administration of the Lord's supper, in commemoration of the passover which Jesus had on that same day, immediately before his death, eaten with his disciples. The Asiatic church, therefore, believed that Jesus ate on the evening of the 14th, and that he died on the 15th, and it believed this, according to unimpeachable testimony, on the authority of the apostle John. But now, what says the 4th gospel? According to it, the celebration of the last supper by our Lord took place, not upon the 14th Nisan, but upon the evening of the day previous, the 13th, while Jesus dies upon the cross upon the 14th, and therefore before the passover of the law could have been partaken of. The conclusion is obvious. The apostle who is the great authority for the Asiatic, cannot possibly be the author of the gospel, which speaks unmistakably for the western practice.

There is a simplicity and coherence in the Tübingen theory, as expanded at length in Hilgenfeld's Paschastritt der alten Kirche, which gives it a very strong hold upon the mind. But it rests upon more than one untenable assumption. Thus it assumes that the Asiatic Christians kept the 14th evening as the anniversary of the last supper. There is not, however, any hint of this in the most important narratives of the controversy, and the plain natural view is that the 14th Nisan was observed in Asia by fasting in memory of the death of Jesus; while a communion feast in the evening commemorated a completed redemption. The fact of the fasting, to which both Irenæus and Eusebius bear witness, is of itself a testimony that it was the solemn memory of the death of our Lord that was observed. Fasting in anticipation of the eucharist, belongs altogether to a later period, as is truly observed in Steitz's article in Herzog's Real-Encyclopædie. [COMMUNION, HOLY, p. 417.]

Between these controversies, that of Antæus and Polyerat (about 160 A.D.), and that of Victor and Polyerates (190 A.D.), there occurred another in Laodicea (between 170 A.D. and 177 A.D.), which has become of late the very turning-point of the whole discussion, but about which Eusebius affords us no further information than what follows (H. E. iv. 26). "Of Melito, there are the two works on the passover. . . . In the works on the passover he shows the time in which he wrote it, beginning with these words:—When Servilius Paulus was præconsul of Asia, at which time Sagaris suffered martyrdom, there was much discussion in Laodicea respecting the passover, which occurred at that time in its proper season, and in which also these works were written." This work is also mentioned by Clement of Alexandria, in his own work on the passover, which, he says, he wrote on occasion of Melito's work (ἐξ αἰτίας τῆς τοῦ Μελιτάνου γράφης)."

But with this dispute are connected, probably rightly, the two following fragments of Apollinaris, bishop of Hierapolis, given in the Chronicon Paschale:

1. "There are some who now, through ignorance, love to raise controversy about these things, being guilty in this of a pardonable offence, for ignorance does not so much deserve blame as need instruction. And they say that on the 14th the Lord ate the lamb with his disciples, but that He himself suffered on the great day of unleavened bread; and they interpret Matthew as favouring their view, from which it appears that their sentiments are not in harmony with the law, and that the gospels seen, according to them, to be at variance."

Again, "The 14th is the true passover of the Lord, the great sacrifice, instead of the lamb the Son of God, . . . who was lifted up upon the horns of the unicorn, and was pierced in his sacred side, who shed out of his side the two cleansing elements, water and blood, word and spirit, and who was buried on the day of the passover, the stone having been placed upon his tomb."

We know very little of Apollinaris. Eusebius tells us that he was the author of an Apology for the Christians, addressed to the emperor, and that he was an eloquent writer against the Phrygian, Cataphrygian, and other Montanists, and wrote two works against the Jews; but we are left to conjecture who these opponents were against whom he was arguing in the work from which these fragments are taken.

With these fragments are associated quotations from Hippolytus and Clement of Alexandria:—

"Hippolytus, the witness of religion, who was bishop of the so-called Portus, near Rome, has written literally thus in his Treatise against all the Heresies: 'I therefore see that there is a contentiousness in this affair. For he (i.e. the adversary, the Quarto-deciman) says thus: Christ celebrated the passover on that very day, and suffered: I therefore must also do as the Lord did.' But he is wrong from not knowing that, when Christ suffered, he did not eat the passover according to the law. For He was the passover that had been foretold, and which was accomplished on the day appointed."

And again the same (Hippolytus) says in the Treatise on the Passover: "He did not eat the passover, but he suffered (i.e. as the passover) οὐκ ἔφαγεν, ἀλλ' ἔπαθεν."

Another passage from Clement of Alexandria, in his work concerning the passover: "In the preceding years then the Lord keeping the passover ate that which was slain by the Jews; but when he proclaimed himself to be the passover, the Lamb of God, led as a sheep to the slaughter, immediately he taught his disciples the mystery of the type on the 13th, on which also they ask of him, Where wilt thou that we make ready to eat the passover, . . . but the Saviour suffered on the next day, being himself the passover. . . ." See also Philos. phenomena, 274-5.

These fragments are given because they offer almost the entire evidence on which we have to fix the place of the Laodicean interlude. Hilgenfeld views Apollinaris as a representative of the West, through whom Western influence has gained a footing in the heart of Asia. His opponent is directly Melito, but Melito as the representative of the whole body of Asiatic Christians.

Now that Apollinaris is in the greatest harmony with the Roman and Alexandrian writers whose fragments are associated with him in the Chronicon Paschale, is manifest: there is great probability also in the conjecture that he, like Clement, wrote on the occasion of Melito's work, and the absence of his name from the list of Polyerates suggests some discordance between his views and those of Polyerates. But he writes against certain persons who are creating a disturbance, not against the quietly existing ancient custom, nearly universal around him: he seems to observe the 14th himself, and when we notice the characteristics of his writings are directed against the Phrygians, Cataphrygians, and other Montanists, and against the Jews (Joseph. H. E. iv. 27). We may see ground for suspecting that his real antagonist was such a man as Blastus (perhaps the very man) who, about 180, carried Montanism from Asia Minor to Rome and there provoked the opposition of the church, which is extremely likely to have stirred up Victor's crusade against the customs of Asia Minor. We know that Hippolytus, as well as Irenaeus, wrote against Blastus, and that of Apollinaris, Eusebius would hardly have noticed them together, as he does, as fellow-workers in the church, if they occupied so marked an antagonistic position as has been supposed.

But he persons who are erating iust the quietly existing

We have already seen from Epiphanius that a diversity of usages continued to prevail until the Nicean council. At that council the Western usage may be said to have established its victory, and those who still persisted in the Asiatic practice fell into the position of heretics. We find in the letter of the emperor Constantine to the churches after that council (Soer. H. E. i. 9): "There also the question having been considered relative to the most holy day of Easter, it was determined by common consent that it would be proper that all should celebrate it on one and the same day everywhere." Also that "it seemed very unsuitable in the celebration of this sacred feast, that we should follow the custom of the Jews," . . . who, labouring under a judicial blindness, "even in this particular do not perceive the truth, so that they, constantly erring in the utmost degree, celebrate the feast of passover a second time in the same year." This of course refers to the error of celebrating before the equinox. "Consider how grievous and indecorous it is, that on the same days some should be observant of fasts, while others are celebrating feasts; and especially that this should be the case on the days immediately after Easter. On this account, therefore, Divine Providence directed that an appropriate correction should be effected, and uniformity of practice established, as I suppose you are all aware." (This refers to the determination of the equinox, which was settled to be on the 21st March, although, as we have shown above, the 20th was the proper day, as it only happened once in four years on the 21st, and then at 2 A.M.) "And since the order is a becoming one, which is observed by all the churches of the western, southern, and northern parts, and by some also in the eastern: from these considerations all have on the present occasion thought it to be expedient, and I pledged myself that it would be satisfactory to your prudent penetration, that what is observed with such general unanimity of sentiment in the city of Rome, throughout Italy, Africa, all Egypt, Spain, France, Britain, Libya, the whole of Greece, and the dioceses of Asia, Pontus and Cilicia, your intelligence would also concur in." The epistle of the synod to the church of Alexandria speaks in the like terms (see Soer. i. 9): "We have also gratifying intelligence to communicate to you relative to the duty of judgment on the subject of the most holy feast of Easter: for this point also has been happily settled through your prayers; so that all the brethren in the East who have heretofore kept this festival when the Jews did, will henceforth conform to the Romans and to us, and to all who from the earliest time have observed our period of celebrating Easter." (See also Euseb. Life of Constantine.)

It is to be noted that no rule is here given for determining Easter; the churches are referred to the ancient rule of the West.

It has been often stated that the council established a particular cycle, that of nineteen years, but this is a mistake.

Epiphanius mentions three different sets of so-called heretics, who persisted in the Quarto-decimans usage, viz. the Andiani (Haeres. lxx.), the Alogi (li.), and the Quarto-decimans (l.), the last being orthodox in all respects except this.

It is unnecessary to follow out further the history of the decline of the Quarto-decimans.

We must now give some brief account of what is known respecting the various astronomical cycles employed for the determination of Easter.

The use of cycles was very familiar to the ancients astronomers. It arose out of the necessity, when lunar months were in use (as at Athens) of linking together in some manner all the changes of the moon and the sun. They all rested upon the mean motions of the moon, which was not only all that could be exactly calculated in the state of their astronomical knowledge, but which is in fact all that can be used with advantage for the arrangement of ceremonies and festival-days. The object was to find a period which should contain an exact number of lunations and also of tropical years—the former consisting of 29 d. 5305887 or 29 d. 12 h. 44 m. 2s. '865.

1. The most ancient cycle was the Octaëteris, or cycle of 8 years. It depends on the fact, that 8 tropical years are nearly equal to 99 lunations. The 99 months contained 2922 days, three of the 8 years having embolisms or intercalary months, as follows. The first year of the period seems to have been variously taken: I. being the arrangement given by Geminus; II. by Epiphanius; whilst III. is that adopted in Scaliger's account of this cycle, the letter E denoting the embolism.

The months were full (30 days) and hollow (29) by turns, except the intercalary, which were always full. This is exactly 8 years of 365 1/4 days. But neither the lunation nor the year is here taken at its true value, and the 6 years really fall short of 99 lunations by 1 d. 14 h. 10 m.—an error which would soon accumulate and make the cycle useless.

Cleostratus, Eratosthenes, and others made various changes for the correction of this cycle, which still however remained imperfect. 2. A great improvement upon this was the cycle of 19 years ascribed by Geminus to Enctemon, but generally to Meton, about 432 B.C. This rests on the extremely close relation between the length of 19 years and 235 lunations, since a difference of about 2 h. 3 m. The actual arrangement was that out of 235 months 110 were hollow, making 6940 days, being in excess of 235 lunations by 7½ hours. In the course of 4 Metonic periods the accumulation of errors would be 30 hours, and accordingly Calippus proposed then to leave out 1 more day. There was then an excess of 6 h. only in 76 years or of 1 day in 310 years. This period of 76 years is called the Callippic period.

The first Paschal cycle in use seems to have been the Octaëteris. Epiphanius refers to it (Haer. lxxv.), and appeals to it in his argument with the Auliani in such a manner as to imply that they were right in holding this to be the ancient church cycle: on which account he would rather rest his argument upon it than upon the superior cycle of 19 years, which must have been familiar to him. Eusebius also mentions (vii. 20) that Dionysius, bishop of Alexandria, in one of his Paschal letters gives a canon for 8 years, seeming to imply the use of the Octaëteris (about 250 A.D.).

The Paschal cycle of 112 years of St. Hippolytus attained some celebrity and was inscribed on the chair of his statue, discovered at Rome in 1551, and now in the Vatican. It was based on a double Octaëteris of 16 years, repeated 7 times; St. Hippolytus having observed that by using 16 years, instead of 8, the week-days recurred in succession, though in their natural order reversed. It extends from A.D. 222 to A.D. 333, and was evidently constructed about 222 A.D. and was based upon the period of years 215 to 222 A.D. for which period it is correct. Beyond this its defective nature soon appears, and after another period it would be found to be worthless. It may be seen in Fabricius's Hippolytus. See also Ideler, ii. 222, and Ordo Saeculorum, p. 477.

The Paschal canon of St. Cyprian, called the Computus Paschalis, which is extant, but without the table, was a repeat of St. Hippolytus, with a new start from A.D. 242, based on the 16 years from 228 to 243.

3. When the Western church discovered the defective nature of the Octaëteris, they took up or perhaps returned to a cycle of 84 years, which was employed by, according to Epiphanius and Cyril's Prologue in Bucherius, the Jews (perhaps after the fall of Jerusalem), then probably by some Quarto-decimans, and also by some Latins, for Cyril in his Prologue implies that the 84 years cycle was forsaken for that of Hippolytus, saying, "pejus aliquid addiderunt."

The 84 years cycle may be regarded as consisting of a Callippic period of 76 years (with the correction of 1 day) and a single Octaëteris: and as their errors are in opposite directions, it has a less error in 84 years than the Octaëteris had in 8. Both Epiphanius and Cyril ascribe it to the Jews, and the fact that, 84 being a multiple of 7, the Calendar moons would recur on the same days of the week in each period, would doubtless give it a value in their eyes. However this may be, it became undoubtedly the great cycle of the Latin church, for more than two centuries, till it was superseded by the cycle of Victorius of 532 years, published in the year 457. An 84-year Easter-table of the Latin church may be seen in Ideler, ii. 219, constructed from a "Fasti Consulares," discovered by Cardinal Noris, and beginning with the year 298. Muratori published another in his Anecdota ex Ambrosiani Bibliothecae Codicibus. In both these it appears that the Epacts are 1 week-days of the 1st January were employed for the determination of Easter. Bucherius also gives 'The Latin or Prosper's cycle of 84 Years,' beginning at 382. Since 84 Julian years contain 30681 days, and 1039 lunations 30682 d. 6 h. 48 m., the 84-year cycle gives at its conclusion the new moon 30 hours too early.

It may be right here to mention the fact that Epiphanius, believing that the Jews had this 84 years cycle at the time of our Saviour's crucifixion (for which there is no evidence in Jewish writers), argues at length (Haer. li.) that, this cycle being shorter than the moon's true cycle (he means probably the Alexandrian) the Jews anticipated the proper time of the passover by two days in the year of the Passion, and Bucherius believes that he is in the main right, and reasons quite correctly from his premises that, if the Alexandrian cycle and 84-year cycle started together A.C. 161, the latter was 3 days in advance of the moon and the former 1 day. And Bucherius holds, in agreement with Petavius, that there was a division amongst the Jews as to these two calculations, the Pharisees and priests keeping the passover one day later than our Lord and his disciples and a great part of the nation.

There is, however, a great fallacy in these calculations. The cycles give, of necessity, not the true moon of the heavens, but the mean moon, and it does not at all follow that, because on the whole they give a good representation of the mean moon, that therefore they give the true mean moon in any particular year. On the contrary, they all go by fits and starts, according as the embolism has just taken place or not; and it requires not a general calculation, but an exact knowledge of the state of the cycle, starting from some absolutely certain date, before we can argue with any certainty from such cycles. We have above expressed the belief that the Jews, having been for many centuries accustomed to the feasts of the New Moon, did not allow any cycle to carry them away from a close adherence to the actual phase of the moon. And we may add that having examined the three best attested dates—that of the taking of Jerusalem by Pompey, A.C. 64, on the day of the Fast (10 Tisri) according to Josephus, and according to Dion Cassius, on a Sabbath; the setting of the Temple on fire, the 9th Ab or 10th A.D. 70, a Sabbath; and the taking of Jerusalem by Titus on the 8th Gorpiaeus, or Elul, according to Josephus—again a Sabbath, according to Dion Cassius, we find that the phase of the moon gives in each case, without any ambiguity and without any doubt, these very days, viz. A.C. 64, Oct. 4, Saturday; Aug. 4, A.D. 70, Saturday, and September 1, A.D. 70, Saturday. The investigation of a few such cases creates a vivid impression that we are on firm ground. character, may be seen in Browne's Ordo Saeculorum, p. 538.

The following results are taken from the 84-year cycle in Ideler, ii. 249, already referred to.

1	2	3	4	5
A.D.	Easter Day.	Tabular Age of Moon.	A.D.	Real Age of Moon (by Phase) on Friday.

Thus whilst the 3rd column is correct for the years A.D. 448-453, it is erroneous by 4 or 5 days for A.D. 28-33. It is remarkable that it gives Mar. 25 for Good Friday A.D. 29, like Hippolytus's cycle.

We have now to trace the history of the 19-years or Metonic cycle in the church, and its final triumph.

The Metonic cycle and the Calippic period had long been known to the Alexandrians, and had been in use in Syria and adjacent countries, so that it is remarkable that we hear of the Octaeteris rather than this cycle as having been first in use, even at Alexandria.

Anatolius, bishop of Laodicea about 284, by birth an Alexandrian, enjoys the credit, on the authority of Eusebius (vii. 32) of having been the first to arrange the 19-years cycle for ecclesiastical purposes. But the passage has greatly perplexed the commentators, and has called forth elaborate attempts at explanation or emendation from Petavius and others. For Anatolius declares that the sun "is not entering the first segment (of the zodiac) on the 22nd March, where he places the New Moon of the 1st year of the cycle, but is already on the fourth day passing through it. By this segment they generally call the first decanemorion, and the equinox, and the beginning of the months, &c." Unless we are to reject all that is said about Anatolius's knowledge and ability, we must take him to mean that the equinox fell on the 22nd, but that the sun was not then at the beginning of the zodiacal sign, but four days advanced in it. This is quite in consonance with the statements of Ptolemy (viii. c. 25) and Columella (ix. 13), who after Eudoxus place the equinoxes and solstices at the 8th part of the signs. But the account respecting Anatolius is further complicated by the existence of a Canon Paschalia attributed to him, which exercised great influence in the British church, but which, if it is identical with that given in Bucherius, was certainly forged. It is strange, too, that so little is heard of the cycle for some time afterwards. But the 19-year cycle probably gradually made its way at Alexandria, only it was found that something more than a cycle was wanted to insure uniformity. An actual catalogue of results was necessary. So Theophilus, bishop of Alexandria (385-412) framed at the command of Theodosius a cycle (or actual calendar) of 418 years (19 x 22), which St. Cyril, who succeeded him in that see in 412, shortened into a cycle of 95 years (19 x 5) for convenience's sake. Part only of St. Cyril's Computus Paschalis remains, but his Prologue survives in a Latin translation (in Bucherius). Theophilus had laid down distinctly the rule that when the xv of the moon falls on Sunday, Easter day is the Sunday after; and Cyril states distinctly that Easter may fall on any of the 35 days from March 22 to April 25, our modern mode. In fact, the two chief sources of discrepancy after the Nicene council were these: the Latins often celebrated on the Sunday on which the xv fell, while the Alexandrians waited a week; and the Latins made the 18th March the first day on which the xv could fall, whilst the Alexandrians made their limit the 21st March. They both agreed that as the passover was to be kept in the first month, Easter was to follow the same rule; but the Latins made (as Bucherius, &c. think the Jews did) the 5th March the earliest possible day of the 1st month, whilst the Alexandrians, holding firmly the doctrine that the xv must not fall before the equinox, that is, according to their rules, the 21st March, made the 8th March the 1st possible day of the month. The Alexandrian rules, as we shall see, ultimately prevailed.

It seems to be now the time to explain the actual method employed by the Alexandrians.

The years of the cycle of 19 years being numbered in order, the number of any given year was called the Golden Number. So also the letters A B C D E F G being written against all the days of the year in succession, the letter A being placed against the first of January, the same letter will stand against any given weekday throughout the year, except in Leap-year, when a change will take place after the intercalary day. The letter which stands against all the Sundays is called the Sunday Letter.

Again, the day on which the 14th of the equinox moon falls is called the Easter Term. As the Easter Terms recur every 19 years, the knowledge of the Golden Number gives the Easter Term, and if we know the Sunday Letter we can pass on from the Easter Term, its letter being known, to the next Sunday, which will be Easter Day.

Rule 1. To find the Golden Number. Add 1 to the numeral of the year, and divide by 19. The remainder is the Golden Number; when there is no remainder, 19 is the Golden Number.

Rule 2. To find the Sunday Letter. To the numeral of the year, add its quotient on dividing by 4, and also the number 4; divide the sum by 7, and subtract the remainder from 7. This will designate the place of the Sunday Letter in the alphabet. Ex.: 395 + 81 + 4 = 410; 410 ÷ 7 leaves remainder 4; the 3rd letter 'C' is the Sunday Letter. In Leap-year the earlier two months of the year have the letter next succeeding.

It must not be supposed, however, that the subject was always regarded from this simple point of view. It was approached with old traditional notions, so that the 19 years was spoken of as made up of 8 and 11—and the years were thought of as lunar years with embolisms—and as it happened that the Latins began their cycles 3 years later than the Alexandrians, and so inserted embolisms in different years, this again was a cause of discrepancy.

During the pontefice of Leo the Great doubts occurred, in the year 444 A.D., and 455 A.D., as to the proper day of celebrating Easter. Leo wrote to St. Cyril to enquire respecting 444, who answered that the day was April 23, propter rationem embolismi anni (not 26 March, as the Latins made it). It was 8 of the lunar cycle of the Alexandrians, 18 of Victorius' cycle. Leo acquiesced.

In 455 the contention was greater. Here it was not a question of a month, but of a week. The Latins by the 34-year cycle made it April 17; the Alexandrians April 24.

Leo then wrote to Martinian, emperor of the East, and to Eudocia Augusta, in which he asks them to interfere that the Alexandrians may not name April 24, alleging that the viii. kal. Maii is beyond the ancient limits. The emperor made enquiry of certain eastern bishops and of the Alexandrians, and Leo finally yielded for the sake of peace. In the matter of these limits the Alexandrians were always firm, allowing the 14th of the moon to range from March 21 to April 18, Easter-day from March 22 to April 25; while the Westerns had shown much vacillation. Their old 14th day limits were March 18 and April 21, then the council of Caesarea (A.D. 195) laid down as the limits of Easter-day March 22 and April 21, alleging that the crucifixion was on March 22. This authority, together with that of the Nicene council, ordering that Easter should not be kept before the equinox, led the Latins to yield the first limit; then Leo extended the 2nd limit two days, by understanding April 21 of the crucifixion, thus getting March 22 to April 23, 33 days. Finally the Latins had to yield 2 days more. But the Latins would only keep Easter from the 16th to the 22nd of the moon, so that the passion might be on the 14th, whereas the Alexandrians often kept Easter on the 15th. In the year 463 Victorius (or Victorinus) of Aquitaine, an abbot at Rome, was employed by pope Hilary to correct the calendar, and he was the real author of the cycle of 532 years, found by multiplying together 19, the cycle of the moon, and 28, the cycle of the sun. Thus, on the supposition of the perfect accuracy of the 19-years cycle, all full moons, days of the week, &c., would recur in the same order from cycle to cycle, for ever. The cycle is given in Bucherius: it begins at A.D. 239 and ends 770. Some days are marked, as differently taken by the Alexandrians and Latins, for Victorius commenced the cycle at the 11th year of the Alexandrian cycle, and also still adhered to the above-mentioned Latin rules.

There were many errors in his tables, and the revision of it by Dionysius Exiguus obtained for it the name of the Dionysian cycle, transferring to Dionysius most of the merit which belonged to Victorius.

But what Dionysius really did was to continue the 95-year cycle of St. Cyril, and he also induced the Italians to accept fully the Alexandrian rules. He also abandoned the era of Diocletian, and was the first to introduce the modern Christian era, reckoning from the supposed date of the birth of Christ. Victorius had made his cycle begin from the baptism, A.D. 28.

But the Easter table of Victorius long held its ground in Gaul. In the council of Orleans (541) it was ordered that all should observe Easter according to the laterculus Victorii, and Gregory of Tours says of A.D. 577: "In that year there was a doubt about Easter. In Gaul we, with many other cities, celebrated Easter on the 14th Calends of May; others with the Spaniards on the 12th Calends of April. The former was Victorius's date; the Alexandrians kept Easter a week later, the Spaniards four weeks earlier." It is only at the end of the 8th century that traces of such differences disappear in Gaul. (Isidore, iii. 294.)

The 84-years cycle lasted longer in Britain than elsewhere: and the bitter controversies which were carried on for a long time between the new English church, founded by the mission of Augustine, and the ancient British church were entirely due to the persistence of the British clergy in clinging to the old cycle of 84 years (see the letter of Althelmus Anglus Episcopus, about 700 A.D. in Bucherius) and old traditional maxims respecting the paschal limits.

They kept the festival from the 14th of the moon to the 20th; they placed the equinox on the 25th March, and would keep no festival before it, and they used as the later limit of the festival the 'old limit of the Latins, the 21st April.

For these rules they appealed to tradition and the example of St. John, and also repeatedly to the authority of Anatolius. The discussion almost always turns in Bede's narrative, and in the letters preserved, on this point:—Is the festival to be kept from the 14th to the 20th of the moon (with the British church), or from the 15th to the 21st (with the Roman)? And as the battle turned so largely on the 14th of the moon, the partisans of the Roman use tried to fix on the British clergy the name of Quartodecimans, and so the stigma of heresy. But they were in no real sense Quartodecimans. They observed the Easter festival on a Sunday and kept the Friday before it, not keeping, as did the Christians of Asia Minor, the 14th of the moon, fall when it might: nor is there any ground for connecting them, on the supposition of their being Quartodecimans, with Asia Minor. As we have mentioned before, the spurious canon of Anatolius, given in Bucherius, was perhaps designed to support the cause of the British Christians. And there is some ground for supposing that the laterculus of 100 years, given in Bucherius, may have belonged to the British church, as it falls in with their principles.

Frequently as the differences respecting Easter are mentioned in Bede (Ecc. Hist.), there are unfortunately no dates given which can throw further light on these discrepancies; but the statement respecting Queen Eanleda and her followers as still fasting and keeping Palm Sunday, when King Oswy had done fasting and was keeping his Easter, must refer to some year not far from 651; and the xiv of the moon fell on Sunday in 645, 647, 648, and 651.

The Roman use finally prevailed in England, Archbishop Theodore, A.D. 669, is believed to have arranged everything according to Roman customs, and from that time general uniformity existed. Nothing further of importance occurred respecting Easter until the Gregorian reformation of the calendar, by which time the accumulated errors arising from the 1 1/2 hrs. excess of the 19-years cycle made the calendar moon about four days later than the real moon. [L. H.]

EASTER, CEREMONIES OF. The season of Easter, as the epoch of the great redemptive acts by which the salvation of mankind was consummated, was from a very early period observed with special solemnity by the Christian church.
The Paschal season originally extended over fifty-two days, of which Easter Day was the central point, commencing with Palm Sunday and terminating with Low Sunday. The first week was known as πάσχα σταυρώσεων, the second week as πάσχα ἀναστάσεων (Suicer, sub voc.).
Leaving to other articles the solemnities of the former period [PALM SUNDAY: GOOD FRIDAY] we propose to speak of those of the period of Easter, properly so called.

Easter Eve.—This day was known by a variety of titles in the early church—τὸ μέγα σάββατον, τὸ ἄγιον σάββατον, νύξ ἀγγελικὴ (Pallad.). Σάββατον Ἀλεξάνδριαι, Νύξ Ἰγλιουρίου Πασχαί. (Hieron.), ἡμέρα τῆς ὑστάτης τοῦ πάσχα παννυχίδος (Euseb., vi. 34). It had a double character, penitential and jubilant; as the conclusion of the great Lenten Fast, and as the prelude of the Festival of the Resurrection. This was the only Sabbath in the whole year on which fasting was permitted (A. Cost. Con. tit. vii. 23). The fast of Easter Eve was of the strictest character, and was prolonged at least till midnight, Good Friday and Easter Eve being a continuous fast, in supposed obedience to our Lord's words (Matt. ix. 15).
The Apostolical Constitutions enjoin fasting till cockcrow (Ap. Const. v. 18). The synod of Auzerre, A.D. 578 (Can. xi.) forbids the breaking of the fast till the second hour of the night.
The 89th Trullan canon (C. conc. Quinisext. Labbe, vi. 1180) limits the fasting at midnight. Jerome assigns as a reason for the congregation not being dismissed on Easter Eve till after midnight, that even as the Paschal deliverance of Israel took place at midnight (Exod. xii. 29) it was the expectation of the church, according to apostolical tradition, that Christ would return to

* The earliest instance of the use of this designation for Easter Eve is in the letter of the church of Smyrna detailing the martyrdom of Polycarp (Euseb. iv. 15. 12).
The day on which Polycarp was apprehended is described as "the Great Sabbath"—ἡνὸς σαββάτου μεγάλου. The term is evidently borrowed from Jobo xix. 31. ἦν γὰρ μεγάλη ἡ ἡμέρα ἐκείνη τῶν σαββάτων.

EASTER, CEREMONIES OF 595 accomplish the redemption of His church and triumph over her enemies at the same hour.

That hour being passed, the awe with which the Lord's coming was anticipated being relieved, the Easter Feast was celebrated with universal joy (Hieron. In Matt. xxv. 6). The same belief is mentioned by Lactantius (In Inst. vii. 19), when he speaks of the night being passed in watchful-ness on account of the coming of our King and God. We have evidence that in Tertullian's time it was spent in public worship, when he speaks of the difficulty which would be caused by the absence of a Christian wife from her heathen husband during the whole night at the time of the paschal solemnities (Tert. ad Exem. ii. 4). As the night advanced and Easter drew nearer all sign of mourning was laid aside for the highest festal jubilee. One special solemnity indicating the festal character of this night was the lighting of lamps and candles, a custom which is repeatedly referred to by writers from the 4th century downwards. Cyril of Jerusalem, in his in-trodutory Catechetical lecture (§ 15), speaks of "that night, that darkness that shows like day," and Eusebius records (De Vit. Const. iv. 22) that Constantine observed Easter Eve with such pomp that "he turned the sacred or mystical vigil into the light of day" by means of lamps suspended in every part, and setting up huge waxen tapers as big as columns (κερῶν κίονας ὀψιλοτάτους), through the whole city. We find a reference to the same custom in Gregory Nazianzen (Orat. xlii. De Pasch.), who speaks of persons of all ranks, even magistrates and men and ladies of rank, carrying lamps, and setting up tapers, both at home and in the churches, thus turning night into day; and again (Orat. xliiii.) describes this ἡμέρα νύξ, as a "torch-bearing" (ἡσθουσία), being as it were a πρόδρομος or forerunner of the rising of the great light, Christ. Gregory Nysse also describes the brilliancy of the illumination as a cloud of fire mingling with the dawning rays of the sun, and making the eve and the festival one continuous day without any interval of darkness (In Christ. Resurr. Orat. v.) From the poem of Prudentius (Hymn. v. ad Incensum ceteri Paschalis, 141-148) we learn that the church was illuminated with lamps depending from the roof, reminding the spectator of the starry firmament.
In later times one special wax taper of large size was solemnly blessed, as a type of Christ's rising from the dead to give light to the world. The institution of this custom was attributed to pope Zosimus A.D. 417 [PASCHAL TAPER].

The latter hours of the evening and the night were spent by the assembled congregations in united prayer and supplication, the singing of psalms and hymns, reading the Scriptures, and in hearkening to the exhortations of the bishop and presbyters (Apost. Constit. v. 19; Greg. Nysse, Orat. iv. in Christ. Resurrect.).

Easter Eve was the chief time for the baptism of catechumens. The first seventeen catechetical lectures of St. Cyril were delivered during the weeks before Easter to those who were preparing for baptism at the ensuing Easter Eve, on which day the eighteenth was pronounced (Catech. xvii. 20, xviii. 32, 33). The nineteenth, on Easter Monday, explains "the deep meaning of what was done on the evening of their baptism" (xix. 1). On the Easter Eve which succeeded Chrysostom's deposition, no fewer than three thousand catechumens

the joyous crowds who, by their attendance at church, at the festival. All labour suspended, the husbandman and plough and put the very tavern-keepers' roads were empty of carriages. The mother came alone and her children and the whole family. All Christians assembled of one family. ἐκκλήσια, ἀνακαινίσθητος, Dominica in Octavis Pasche, Pascha Clivium; also with reference to the white dresses of the newly baptised, ἡ κυριακή ἡ λευκῆ, Dies Neophytorum, Dominica in Alpis. The appellation Quintidies geniti, derived from the introit (1 Pet. ii. 2), is of later origin. In the Greek church it has been known as the κυριακή θώρα, ἡμέρα ἀποστόλων, with reference to the gospel for the day (John xx. 19-23), and the appearance of Christ to Thomas on this day (ii. 26-28). The special solemnity of this Sunday was the laying aside by the newly baptised of their white baptismal robes, to be deposited in the sacristy of the church. St. Augustine refers to the appearance of the neophytes in church in their white robes (Serm. de Temp. 162; Dominica, in Octav. Pasche). "Iodile vitali lavacro resurgens Dei populus ad instar Resurrectionis ecclesiam nostram splendore nivei candoris illuminat." The white bands that were wrapped round the heads of the newly baptised infants were also removed on this day, which from this custom sometimes bore the name of octavæ infantium: "infantes vocantur et habent octavas hodie recludenda enim sunt capita eorum" (Aug. Serm. de Temp. 160). We learn from Rabanus Maurus (De Cleric. Inst. li. 38) that in his time the seven days after Easter Day were known as Dies Albe, because those who had been baptised on the holy night wore their albs and assisted at the holy mysteries in that dress, till the following Sunday, when the bishop's hand was laid upon them in confirmation. Gregory of Tours mentions processions—rogationes—being made every year at Easter tide (Greg. Turon. Vit. Patr. c. vi. p. 1175). [E. V.]

ECCIDICI (Ἐκκιδικοί or ἐκκλησιέκδικτοι), certain officers appointed, in consequence of the legal disabilities of clergy and monks, to represent the church in civil affairs; see ADVOCATE OF THE CHURCH, DEFENSOR. The place where they met officially was called ἐκδικεῖον. [C.]

ECONOMUS. [ΟΙΚΟΝΟΜΟΣ.] ECPHONESIS (Ἐκφώνησις) denotes that portion of an office which is said audibly, in contrast with that said αυστικῶς; especially the exology, with which the secret prayers generally conclude. [C.]

ECTENE or ECTENIA (Ἐκτενή or ἐκτενία). Omitting from consideration certain preparatory prayers, the liturgies of St. Basil and St. Chrysostom begin with a litany, known as Ectene, Synapte, Diaconicæ, or Eirenice. The name Ectene may refer to the length or (more probably) to the earnestness of the supplication. Litanies of a similar form are also found in the Hour-offices. See further under LITANY. [C.]

ECHTESIS (Ἐχθesis), a doctrinal formula, or "setting forth" of a CREED. Thus Theodoret (Ibid. Eccl. ii. 17) speaks of the statement of doctrine put forth by the "concilium" of Rimini as an echthesis. The same word is again used by the same historian in speaking of the creed of Enoimius (H. F. ii. 23). [C.]

ECTYPOMATA. [DONA; VOTIVE OFFERINGS.]

ECUMENICAL COUNCILS. [COUNCILS.] ECCLESIA (Ἐκκλησία). The principal senses of the word Ecclesia with which we are concerned are the following:—

I. The congregation or gathering together of the faithful. "Ecclesia est convocatus populus per ministros ecclesie ab eo qui facit unitatem habitare in domo. Ipsa domus vocatur Ecclesia, quia Ecclesiam continet" (Amalarius, De Eccl. Off. lii. 2).

II. As indicated in the extract above from Amalarius, the word came to designate the building used for the Christian assembly [CIVICUM]; as in 1 Cor. xi. 18: "Appellamus Ecclesiam basilicam quâ continetur populus" (Augustine, Epist. 157). The principal designations of churches of different kinds are the following:—

1. Ἡ ἐκκλησία is used absolutely to designate the principal church or "cathedral" of a city; as by Procopius (De Bella Persæ, li. 9), to designate the cathedral of Antioch.
2. Ecclesia Baptismalis, a parish church—to use the modern term—in which baptisms are celebrated. Walafrid Strabo (De Reb. Eccl. c. 30) speaks of "presbyterii plebium qui baptismales ecclesias tenent et minoribus presbyteris præsentur." [COMPARE PARISH.]
3. Ecclesia Cardinalis. This was also a designation of parish churches. [CARDINAL.]
4. Ecclesia Cathedralis, a church in which a bishop set up his throne. [CATHEDRA; CATHEDRAL.]
5. Ecclesia Catholica. [CATHOLIC.]
6. E. Diocesana (Leges Wisigoth., lib. iv., tit. 5, c. 6) is equivalent to proconialis. [DIOCESE; PARISH.]
7. E. Mater, Matricialis, Matrix, Matricula, may designate either a cathedral, as distinguished from its subordinate churches; or a parish church, as distinguished from mere oratories.
8. Ecclesia Plebialis or Plebiana, the church of a Plebs, or Parochia; that is, a parish church. See the quotation above (li. 2), and Ducange's Glossary, s. v. plebs.
9. Ecclesia Principalis, a cathedral (Leg. Wisigoth. iv. 5, c. 6).
10. Ecclesie Patriarchales, in the Roman church, are those subject to the immediate authority of the pope.
11. Ecclesia per se, a church having its own priest, and not dependent (as an oratory would have been) upon another church (Hincmar, Epist. ed. Labbe, quoted by Ducange). [C.]

ECCLESIAE MATRICULA. [MATRICULA.] ECCLESIAARCH (Ἐκκλησιάρχης), in the Eastern church, was the sacrist, who had general charge of the church and its contents, and summoned the people to service by the bells or other means of giving notice. The minor officials of the church were under his authority. The Typicum of Sabas (c. 1) represents the Ecclesiarch as giving a rubrical direction in the same way that the deacon commonly does: ἐτα ἄρχεται δὲ ἐκκλησιάρχης, δεῖτε, προκινύσασθαι (Suicer's Thesaurus, s. v.; Daniel's Codex Lit. iv. 700). [C.]

ECCLESIASTICAE LITERAE. [COMMENTATORY LETTERS; DISSIMY LETTERS.] ECCLESIASTICAE RES. I. The term res ecclesiasticæ is used, in a wide sense, to denote all matters belonging to the church, as opposed to res seculares, terreneæ, matters belonging to the world. Things ecclesiastical are again divided into res spirituales, functions or objects which belong solely to the priesthood, as the sacraments and the altars; and res temporales, which contribute to the welfare rather of the body than the soul (Ambrose, Epist. 33, ad Morce lucum).

Again, of res spirituales some are immaterial (incorporeales), some material (corporeales). To the former belong the invisible gifts and graces bestowed on the soul by God; to the latter, the outward acts or objects connected with such gifts or graces, that is, the sacraments; certain "res sanctae, sacrae, sacrosanctae," as churches, the vessels used in the eucharistic or other rites of the church, and the vestments of its ministers; and certain "res religiosae," such as foundations or institutions for purposes of piety and beneficence over which the church claims jurisdiction. The molestation or injury of ecclesiastical things is SACRILEGE.

2. In a narrower sense, the term res ecclesiasticae designates the PROPERTY OF THE CHURCH. (Lancelotti Instit. Juris Canon. li. 1; Jacobson in Herzog's Real-Encyclop. s. v. Kirchenwesen.) [C.]

ECCLESIASTICUS. 1. A member of the Catholic church, as opposed to a heretic or schismatic (Jerome, Epist. 62, c. 1; in Ruffinum, li. 4).

2. Any person in orders, whether major or minor. Thus the first council of Vasu (c. 3) desires presbyters not to send for the chrism by the hands of any servant of the church (per quemcumque ecclesiasticum), but by the hands of a subdeacon at least. The word is similarly used in the Theodosian code.

3. Isidore of Seville (De Eccl. Off. ii. 3) speaks of a clerk occupying his due position in the hierarchy as "clericus ecclesiasticus," in contradistinction from accephali, or irregular clerks.

4. Those who were in any way the "men" of a church, so as to be unable to leave its territories or its service, were called in a special sense "homines" or "viri ecclesiastici" (Car. Magni C. p'v'. iv. 3). "Homines ecclesiastici seu fiscalini" are mentioned, and their duties to their lord prescribed, in Car. Mag. Cyp'v'. v. 303. They are distinguished from servi (Conc. Sussion. ii. c. 12). [C.]

EGYPT, FLIGHT INTO. It is difficult, if not impossible, to name any earlier representation of this event than the bronze existing on the doors of St. Zenae at Verona, which is at all events one of the earliest known of Christian works in metal, and may date from the original fabric of the 9th century. [R. St. J. T.]

EGG. There seems some diversity of opinion as to the use of the egg as a Christian symbol. Boldetti (p. 519) speaks of marble eggs found in the tombs of St. Theodora, St. Balbina, and others; these were of the size of hen's eggs. Eggshells are occasionally found in the loculi of martyrs, and Raoul Rochette refers them to the agapae so frequently celebrated there. [See EUCCHARIST.] But Martigny, with the Abbé Cavedori (L'auguglio crit. dei Mon. m. dele Arti Crist.) is inclined to think that the egg signified the immature hope of the resurrection. "Restat spes, quae quantum mihi videretur, ovo comparatur; spes enim nonnullum pervenit ad rem" (Augustine, Sermon. cv. 8, Opp. t. v. 379). The use of eggs at Easter has no doubt reference to this idea; but whether the idea was really attached to the object or not, is a generally symbolic sense, seems still a dubious matter. For Eggs and Ducks see the Medici MSS. in Assmann, Catalog. Bibl. Med. [R. St. J. T.]

EILETON (Εἰλητόν). After the ephraensis of the prayer of the catechumens, and immediately before the deacon warns the catechumens to depart (Lit. Chryso., Daniel iv. 34) the priest unfolds the eileton, or CORPORAL, on which the chalice and paten are afterwards placed. What this signifies is explained by Germain of Constantinople (Theoria Myst. p. 153, ed. Paris, 1560) thus: "The eileton represents the linen cloth in which the body of Christ was wrapped when it was taken down from the cross and laid in the tomb" (Suicer's Theaurus, s. v.). [C.]

EIRENICA (Εἰρηνικά). (1) The earlier clauses of the great litany in the Greek liturgies are frequently called eipnικά, as being for the most part prayers for peace. Thus the great litany in the liturgy of St. Chrysostom (c. 14, p. 340, Daniel) begins with "Let us beseech the Lord in peace; for the peace which is from above; . . . for the peace of the whole world." ELDERS (Seniores). There are some traces of elders recognised in the church, yet distinct from the clergy. Augustine addresses his epistle to the church at Hippo (Epist. 137) to the clergy, the elders, (senioribus), and all the people. In another place (Contra Crescon. iii. c. 29), he mentions bishops, presbyters, deacons, and elders, (seniores). Optatus (i. c. 41) says, that when Mensurius, bishop of Carthage, was

There are some traces in the church, yet distinct gustine addresses his epistle Hippo (Epist. 137) to the (seniorities), and all the place (C. nra Cres. iii. bishops, presbyters, deacons,). Optatus (l. c. 41) says, bishop of Carthage, was freed to leave his diocese in the persecution under Diocletian, he committed the ornaments and utensils belonging to the church to the faithful elders (fideliibus senioribus). These appear in some cases to have been merely the leading men of the congregation. Thus the council of Carthage, A.D. 419, committed the office of meeting the leaders of the Donatists to the magistrates and elders of the several districts (ad. Eccl. Afric. c. 91). But there also appear to have been others who had a special position, and probably special duties, in the church. Thus, in the Gesta Purpurat. (Cecili. et Edic. p. 283, in Optatus, ed. Paris, 1676) it is said, that in the business of enquiring into certain disputes there were associated with the bishop and clergy certain elders of the people, who were also officers of the church (seniores pibis, ecclesiasticis viros). Compare ECCLESIASTICS. In the same tract mention is made in one place of the clergy and elders, and in another of bishops, priests, deacons, and elders. In the decrees of the council of Carthage, A.D. 419, mention is made of certain elders, who appear to have been sent as delegates to the council (Cod. Eccl. Afric. cc. 85, 100). Compare CHURCHWARDENS: ELECTORAL COLLEGES.

ELEEMOSYNARIUS. 1. See ALMS, p. 52. 2. The word is occasionally used to designate the distributor for pious uses of the effects of a person deceased, i. e. the "executor" of his will. Thus Gregory of Tours (De Vitis Patrum, c. 8) speaks of one from whose executors (elemosynariis) no small sums were received in honour of a saint. (Ducange, s. v.) [C.]

ELECTI. Some writers (ns Boan, De Reb. Lit. l. xvi. 4) consider the CATECHUMENS [p. 317] to be divided into the four classes of Audientes, Substrati or Genuflectentes, Competentes, and Electi; the latter being those whose names were actually inscribed in the church-list with a view to baptism. Bingham (Antiq. X. ii. 1) considers the Electi to be identical with the Competentes, though he also makes four classes by adding one of ἱερωσύνη. But both these classifications are of doubtful authority. (See Martene, De Rit. Ant. l. i. 6.) [C.]

ELECTION OF CLERGY. The first recorded election of clergy is in the Acts of the Apostles, where Matthias was chosen by casting lots. But this example does not appear to have been followed.

Clemens Romanus (Epist. Cor. i. c. 42) says that in the early days of the church the apostles appointed their first-fruits, proving them by the Spirit, bishops and deacons of those who should join the faith; and that afterwards the ministers were appointed by other men of consideration (ἐπισημοὺς ἀλλοτρίων) with the consent of the whole church (c. 44). Compare Pseudo-Clemens (Epist. ad Jacob. i. c. 3). Clemens Alexandrinus (Euseb. II. E. iii. c. 23, § 6) says that St. John ordained such clergy as were pointed out by the Spirit.

It appears to have been sometimes held that the bishop had the right of selecting the inferior clergy. Cyprian (Ep. 29, ed. Hartel) says that he had appointed Saturnus as a lector and Optatus as a subdeacon, insisting that he has not acted arbitrarily, but carried out the wishes of the church in general. Ambrose (Epist. 82 ad Verceil.) speaks of bishops as admitting other clergy to orders and benefices, and (Offic. i. c. 18) of a certain person who was refused admission into the clerical order (in clerum), by himself. Jerome (Comm. in Tit. i. 5) speaks of bishops as having power to appoint (constituendi) priests in every city, and again (Epist. ad Nepot.) of their selecting (eligendi) priests, and (ibid.) of their being entrusted with the power of placing in office whom they would. Philostorgius (H. L. iii. 17) speaks of Leontius bishop of Alexandria appointing Aetius as a deacon. In the Life of John Damascene, it is said that the bishop of Jerusalem, acting by divine inspiration, sent for him and ordained him to the priesthood (Vita Joann. Dam. scen. per Joann. Episcop. Hierosolym. Inter opp. Joann. Damasc.). Gregory the Great, while strenuously asserting the right of the clergy and people to the free election of bishops, was equally firm in reserving to the bishops the power of selecting parish priests and deacons, on the ground that in choosing a bishop, the clergy and people transferred to him all rights of election to the inferior offices (Thomassin, 1. et. et Nov. Eccl. Dis. ip. ii. 7, c. 34, § 10). The council of Laodicea (c. 13) forbids the election to the priesthood (ἐκς ἱερατείου) to be entrusted to the multitude (ταῖς ὄχλοις). But this is sometimes referred to the election of bishops. The 4th council of Carthage (c. 22) provides that a bishop shall not ordain any without the advice of his clergy, and shall also seek not only the testimony, but the assent (conventiata), of the people. A decree of the council of Merida (Conc. Emerit. c. 19) speaks of a parish priest as having been put in charge of his church, by the appointment (per ordinationem) of his bishop. Another decree of the same council (c. 18) ordains that all parish priests shall provide a supply of inferior clergy from the household (familia) of the church. The 6th canon of Theophilus of Alexandria associates the clergy with the bishop, providing that at every ordination all the clergy shall exercise the power not only of assent, but of choice (consentiat et eligat), and that the candidate selected by the clergy shall be ordained in presence of the people, and that the bishop shall enquire of them whether they also can bear testimony of his fitness.

In these instances it appears that the right of election rested with the bishop, or with the bishop and clergy, and that the people only consented. There is evidence, however, that in many cases the people not only bore witness to the fitness of the candidates, but had themselves a share in the election. Cyprian (Ep. 67, cc. 3 and 4) speaks of the people as having the greatest power of choosing worthy bishops, since by their presence the merits of the candidates will be known, and the election be just and legitimate as confirmed by the general suffrage and assent. He adds that this was the apo-stolice rule not only in the election of bishops and priests, but also in that of deacons. Jerome (Epist. ad Rusticum) appears to assert that either the bishop or the people had power to elect the candidates for ordination, "vel populus vel pontifex elegerit." And, in another place (Comm. in Ezek. c. 33, v. 8) speaks of either a bishop or a priest being a watchman, "speculator," of the church, because of his election by the people, "quia a populo electus est." Siricius (Epist. l. ad Himerium Taracon. c. 10) speaks of elevation to the office of priest or bishop as depending on the choice of the clergy and people. Chrysostom (περὶ Ἱεροῦ. iv. c. 2, § 370, 379) speaks of the electors to the office of the priesthood (τοὺς ἱερωτάτους) as quite distinct from the bishop who ordains. Of these electors he speaks as being the elders (τῶν πατρῶν, ibid. i. c. 3 § 29) or the leading (ἀρχαίων) members of the congregation (ibid. l. c. 14 § 39). He also speaks of the election as being decided by a majority of votes (ibid. iii. c. 4 § 171). Sometimes indeed the people appear to have brought a candidate to the bishop and insisted on his immediate ordination, as is said to have been the case with St. Augustine (Possid. Vita Augustini, c. 4).

The 1st council of Orange (c. 10), provides that when a bishop is the founder of a church in another diocese, he may select the clergy to officiate in it. Justinian (Novell. 123 c. 18) allows the founders of private oratories to select their clergy, but if any unworthy were chosen, the bishop was to have the power of selecting those whom he thought fit. [P. O.]

ELECTORAL COLLEGES. The evils of a popular election of bishops and other clergy in a great city, such as Constantinople, were so manifest (Chrysostom de Sacerd. iii. 15), that attempts were sometimes made to commit the choice of ministers to a select body or committee. We find perhaps a trace of this in the earliest times, when Clement of Rome (ad Cor. i. 44) speaks of the successors of the apostles being chosen by men of consideration (ὁσὶ ἐλαγχύμων ἀνδρῶν) with the assent of the church. The council of Laodicea (c. 13) clearly desires that the clergy should be chosen by some definitely organized body, and not by a mere mass-meeting (τοῦ ὄχλου) [ELECTION OF CLERGY]. In spite of this ordinance, however, there are only too many instances in later times of the choice of clergy by meetings which can only be called mobs. (See Augustinus, Epist. 155; Synesius, Epist. 67; Baronius, an. 303, § 22 ff.; Baluze, Miscell. ii. 102 ff.) Yet, generally, the influence of the principal men in a city could not be ignored, and when Justinian (Novell. xxiii. c. 1; see Bishop, p. 216) definitely enjoined that the clergy and chief men of a city (πρωτοὶ τῆς πόλεως) should nominate three for a vacant see, he probably did but confirm an existing practice. From the three thus nominated, one was to be chosen by the consecrator (τοῦ χειροτονούντος), generally the metropolitan.

If the "chief men" had been defined, we should have had here an "Electoral College" of clergy and notables; as they were not, this system generally led to a struggle between the clergy and the civil government. [C.]

ELEMENTS. The two parts of the outward and visible sign in the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper.

1. Names.—The Latin word elementa does not appear to have been used in this technical sense in the early ages of the church, though it is a very natural word to express the component parts of any thing. Possibly the use arose from the analogy of baptism, where the outward sign would naturally be spoken of as the "element" of water, as, for instance, in the following passage from St. Augustine, where, in speaking of baptism, he says, "Take away the word, and what is the water but water? The word is added to the element, and it becomes a sacrament, itself as it were a visible word" (accedit verbum ad elementum et fit sacramentum, Augustinus in Journ. XI. 1-3, Tract. lxxx. 3). Gregory of Tours (De Vita Patrum, c. 15) uses the word of both bread and water, "Num esset illi panis tantum horraceus erat et aqua, de utrisque elementis libras singulas per dies singulas sumens." Words denoting sacrifice or offering were constantly used of the elements; τὰ ἅγια ἄρα, as in the Liturgy of St. James, ὁ ἱερεὺς εὐχαριστῶν τὰ ἅγια ἄρα; or simply τὰ ἅγια, as in the Liturgy of St. Chrysostom and elsewhere; so the Latin Sancti,* as in Ord. Rom. II. c. 8 (see Madelin, Comment. Præc. p. xxxvi); or again, simply τὰ ἄρα. Προσφορά was also generally used for the Elements placed on the altar. So the Latin oblatus and oblata as in the Ordo Romanus II. (c. 9), "Archidiaconus suscipit oblatus datus de oblationibus . . . et ponit [scilicet] super altare iuxta oblationes pontificis." The word Hostia, "the Victim," expresses a somewhat different aspect of the sacrificial conception.^b

The unconsecrated Elements on the altar are called in Eastern liturgies "the Mysteries," the bread alone the "Seal" (σφραγίς), from its being divided by lines in the form of a cross (see below). In certain Arabic rubrics (Hennaut, Lit. Orient. ii. 62) the Elements are called Barcolia, a corruption of the Greek ἀραρχή.

In Syriac they bear the name of ἁγία ἄρα, corresponding nearly to the Greek ἄρα and προσφορά and the Latin oblata; the bread is simply "Bread of the Sacraments," or "of the Mysteries."

When the Elements have been placed on the altar, they acquire other names having more distinct reference to sacrifice, as "the Lamb," or "the First-born." The Syrians too call the portion impressed with a cross "the Seal." Other names are given to the various particles after division (Ren. n. s. l. 189; ii. 62) [FRAGMENT].

Again, the Elements were called σμῦβόλα, πύσι, forms aspectuales, as outward representations of inward and spiritual grace. The word species, often supposed to have the same force, probably in its origin meant no more than "fruits of the earth"—a sense which it is well known to bear in later latinity, especially with the jurists (Ducange, s. v.).

* By the Sancti, however, we ought probably here to understand the consecrated Host reserved for a previous celebration.

^b See on these names the essay on sacrificial terms in Memorials of the Rev. Whiston B. Marriott (London, 1873).

II. What were the Elements?

Throughout the universal church bread and wine have always been the recognised elements in the eucharist, with but few and slight exceptions which may be described in a few words. There was an obscure sect called the Artotyritae who added cheese to the bread. St. Augustin (de Hæres. c. xlviii.) says "the Artotyrites are so called from their oblation, for they offer bread and cheese, saying that the first oblations which were offered by men, in the infancy of the world, were of the fruits of the earth and of sheep." There were also sects which used no wine but water alone, and some who did not use wine in their morning services, though they did in the evening (see below, § VI.)

III. Composition of the Bread.

With regard to the element of bread, whatever may have been the practice of certain sects, there is entire agreement in the church that it should be made of wheat-flour. The mystical allusions to the superiority of wheat in Clement of Alexandria (Strom. vi. 11, p. 787) and Origen (Hom. in Gen. xii. c. 5, p. 247, Würzburg, 1780) strongly indicate, what indeed there is no reason to doubt, that wheaten bread and (ordinarily) no other, was used in the mysteries. Alcuin (Epist. 80) speaks specially of the "grana tritici," from the flour of which the bread is to be made. The great controversy in the matter has been: Should the bread be leavened or unleavened?

A. The principal evidences bearing on this question are the following:

1. It has generally been assumed in the West that the Last Supper was eaten at the foot of the Passover, and that therefore the bread used was the unleavened bread which the Jews were alone allowed to eat at that time. But it is contended by some writers of the Greek church that the Last Supper was held on the 13th Nisan, when leavened bread was still used; and there is no direct statement either in the New Testament or in the writings of the Early Fathers to indicate that azyme, or unleavened bread, was used; on the contrary, the fact that only "bread" was mentioned would lead to the inference that only common bread was meant. The Acts of the Apostles simply speaks of "breaking bread" as a solemn rite, or meeting together to "break bread." Justin Martyr simply speaks of bread, and as he is giving a particular description of the Christian rites, it seems most probable that he would have mentioned the fact had any particular kind of bread been used.

2. It is said that as the element of bread was taken in the early ages from the offerings of the people [OBULATION], which served also for the support of the ministers and dependents of the church, it must have been ordinary, that is, leavened bread. But this argument is by no means so conclusive as at first sight it appears; it is good for the age of Justin Martyr; but in later times there are evident traces of a double offering; one of ordinary food, for the use of the dependents of the church, and one of bread and wine for the altar. The council of Nantes (c. 8, quoted by Martene) clearly distinguished between the o latium which were intended for consecration, and the panes, or loaves, offered for the use of the church [EUCLOGIÆ]. So Hincmar (Capitul.

l. 16). And when such a separation was made between the offerings for the ministers and the offerings for the altar, the latter were probably specially prepared, whether leavened or not. The woman who smiled when Gregory the Great (Joannes Diaconus Vita Greg. ii. 41) offered her in the eucharist that which she had herself prepared, need not be supposed of course to have taken the oblation from her household loaf.

3. Epiphanius (Hæres. 30, c. 16) says that the Ebionites, in imitation of the saints in the church, celebrate mysteries yearly in the church with unleavened cakes (ἄζυμα), using water for the other element in the sacrament. Here the azymes seem to be mentioned, like the water, as a departure from Catholic practice; but Epiphanius does not in terms reckon the use of azymes among the heretical practices of the Ebionites, so that it is possible that their departure from orthodoxy may have consisted in their annual, instead of more frequent, celebration, and in their use of water for wine.

4. The words of the Pseudo-Ambrosius (De Sacram. iv. 4). "tu forte dicis, meus panis est usitatus; sed panis iste panis est ut verba sacramentorum; ubi accesserit consecratio, de pane fit caro Christi," are generally thought to imply that the bread used for consecration was leavened. But the opposition in the writer's mind is between "common bread" and "the Body of Christ," not between "common" and "leavened" bread, nor is such an expression as "panis usitatus" absolutely conclusive, though it is in the highest degree probable that it designates leavened bread, such as was everywhere most commonly used.

5. A custom of the Roman church, mentioned by the Liber Pontificalis (cc. 33, 55) in the lives of Melchisedes and Siricius, is thus referred to by Innocent I. (Epist. ad Decentium, c. 5). Writing to the bishop of Gubbio, he says that his correspondent had no need to consult him about the "fermentum" which on Sundays (Innocent) sent to the parish churches (titulos), because that was a custom confined to the city of Rome, intended to prevent the parish priests [see CARDINAL], who were detained in their own churches by their proper duties, from feeling themselves cut off from communion with the mother church [EUCLOGIÆ]. Even in Rome it was only sent to the "tituli" proper, not to the presbyters of other churches. It has been supposed (e.g. by Bonaf) that the eucharistic bread which was sent by the pope was called "fermentum" as being made of leavened bread; but, unless the bread commonly consecrated in the churches was unleavened, this supposition does not furnish a reason why these particular oblates should be called "fermentum" by way of distinction, as they certainly appear to be; and the conjecture of Sirmond (adopted by Mabillon) seems by no means improbable, that this "fermentum" was so called as being intended to leaven the whole mass of the Roman church. Certainly the expressions used in the lives of Melchisedes and Siricius, "quod declaratur, quod nominatur, fermentum," seem to imply that the term is used in an improper, not a strict, sense.

6. The sixth canon of the 16th council of Toledo (A.D. 693) is to this effect. It having been brought to the notice of the council that in some parts of Spain priests do not offer on the Table of the Lord clean loaves, specially prepared (panes mundos et studio preeparatos), but take off a piece to form a round disc (crustulam in rotunditatem) from loaves prepared for their own use, and offer it upon the altar with the wine and water; a thing contrary to all precedent; . . . the council decides unanimously, that no other kind of bread be placed on the altar of the Lord, to be hallowed by priestly benediction, but such as is whole and clean and specially prepared (panis integer et nitidus qui ex studio fuerit preeparatus); nor is anything of large size to be offered, but only cakes of moderate size, according to ecclesiastical custom (neque grande aliquil, sed modica tantum oblata, secundum quod ecclesiastica consuetudo retenant).

This canon has been claimed by the advocates both of the leaven and of the azymes; but in fact it is not conclusive for either. It is decisive as to the fact that in the Western church in the 7th century oblates were specially prepared, and were not portions of a loaf, but "integra;" but it is not proved that the words "nitidus" and "mundus" necessarily imply the absence of leaven.

7. The tenth canon of the council of Chelsea (Conc. Celest. A.D. 787; Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 452) enjoins that the oblations be cakes or loaves, not pieces of bread (panis, non crusta). Probably the same distinction is intended as that laid down by the 16th council of Toledo, between a whole cake prepared for the purpose, and a piece taken from a loaf. The passage determines nothing as to the use of leaven, for "panis" may be used either of leavened or unleavened bread, as in "panes azymi et crustula absque fermento" (Exod. xxix. 2).

8. Another point of which much has been made in the discussion is this: that Photius of Constantinople (A.D. 867) never mentioned the use of unleavened bread in the eucharist as one of the Latin errors, while Michael Caerularius, also patriarch of Constantinople (A.D. 1054), gave it a prominent place; it has thence been inferred that the use of unleavened eucharistic bread was introduced between the years 867 and 1054. This is however by no means a certain inference; Photius may have omitted to mention azymes among the points of difference between the Greek and the Latin churches, because he was content to leave the question of leaven or no leaven undetermined, like the Greeks of a later age at the council of Florence. All that can be certainly inferred from the silence of Photius is, that either the use of unleavened bread was unknown to him, or he regarded it as a thing indifferent. It is extremely difficult to suppose that Leo IX. would have written so strongly as he did to Michael Caerularius (Epist. ii. 24; vi.) as to the immemorial use of azymes among the Latins; if that use had arisen since the time of Photius; i. e. not more than a century before his own birth.

There is in fact positive evidence—if the documents be genuine—as to the use of unleavened bread in the eucharist in the Western church before that date.

9. Cyprian (Epist. 63, c. 13) says, that, as the chalice is composed, not of wine alone, nor of water alone, but of the union of the two: so the Body cannot be meal alone, nor water alone, but the union of the two into one loaf. This is repeated in the same words by Isidore of Seville (De Div. Off. i. 18). It is difficult to imagine that Cyprian, and Isidore after him, omitted all mention of so significant an ingredient as leaven, if it was used in the eucharistic loaf. Moreover, Aleuin (Epist. 90 [al. 69] ad Fructos Lugdunenses, p. 107) writing about A.D. 790, uses the very same expression as to the composition of the bread, "ex aqua et farina panis fit qui consecratur in corpus Christi;" and adds, that it should be perfectly pure, "non leaven or "ferment" of whatever kind (absque fermento ullius alterius infectionis debet esse mundissimum). Somewhat later, A.D. 819, Rabanus Maurus (De Cleri. Inst. i. 31, p. 319, Migne) lays it down that the eucharistic bread should be unleavened, after the manner of the Hebrew offerings (Lev. viii. 2), and holds that the bread which the Lord blessed in the Last Supper was undoubtedly unleavened.

10. John Maro (quoted by Martene), writing at any rate before the Trullan council, says that those who made the eucharistic offering in leavened bread reproached the Western churches, the Armenians, and the Maronites, with offering azymes, which were not bread at all; a clear proof that the Western churches generally, in the 7th century, were thought to agree with the Maronites and the Armenians in this respect.

11. Again, allusions to "common" or "leavened" bread would scarcely have been introduced into the CANON OF THE LITURGY (p. 272), as is done, for instance, in the liturgies of James Baradaï and Mathew the Pastor, if the compilers had not known of some who used unleavened bread.

12. On the whole, then, there is distinct evidence that unleavened bread was used in the eucharist by the Latins, and by some Eastern sects, in the 7th and 8th centuries; and there is probable evidence that it was used in the 3rd. In the orthodox Eastern church, there can be no doubt that leavened bread has been used from a very early period indeed; if not from the very first, at any rate from the time when Judaizing sects insisted on using unleavened cakes, like those of the Passover, in the Lord's Supper.

B. Mixture of Oil and Salt.—The Syrian Christians, besides the leaven which is common to almost all oriental communions, mix with the bread a little oil and salt—a practice which they defend by many mystical reasons (Rennaudot, Litt. Orient. i. 191). The mixture of oil—perhaps taken from Lev. ii. 4, etc.; compare Justin Martyr, Diad. v. Trypho, c. 41—was probably always a singularity of a small sect; that of salt was more general and more hotly defended. Thus Aleuin (Epist. 90 [al. 69] ad Fructos Lugdunenses) reprehends certain persons in Spain for insisting, against the custom of Rome and the church in general, that salt should be put into the eucharistic bread; and adds mystical reasons why three things only, flour, water, and wine should be offered in the Mass. The modern Greeks eagerly defend the mixture of salt, which (they say) represents the life, so that a sacrifice without salt is but a dead sacrifice; and one of the reproaches commonly directed against the Armenians was, that they used oblates containing neither salt nor leaven (Martene, A. R. i. iii. 7, § 1).

IV. Preparation of the Bread.

The more minute directions for the preparation of the eucharistic bread belong to a later age than that with which we are concerned. Those which fall within our period are principally these.

The canon already quoted of the 16th council of Toledo makes it certain that special preparation of the eucharistic bread was enjoined in the 7th century. So long as people actually offered, they probably themselves prepared the oblates for the altar. Thus the emperor Valens is said to have prepared with his own hands the gifts^a which he offered for the altar (Gregory Nazianz. Enchiridion on St. Basil, c. 52, p. 809); and the Roman matron mentioned by Joannes Diaconus (u. s.)—probably a person of rank, or she would not have received the bread from the pope—had herself prepared that which she received. And it seems that not unfrequently noble ladies undertook the preparation of the oblates as a meritorious work; Canthia, wife of Trajan, a priest, prepared bread for oblation from flour which she had ground with her own hands (Martene, A. R. i. iii. vii. 24); so did St. Eusebius († 367), distributing the oblates to different churches (Life by Fortunatus, in Acta SS. Bened. i. 320). And this task was not unfrequently undertaken by nuns. Theodulph of Orleans, however (c. A.D. 797), desired that duty to be discharged by the presbyters themselves or their "boys"^b in their presence, in the following terms: "panes quos Deo in sacrificio offertis aut vobis ipsis aut a vestris peers coram vobis nitide et studiose fiant" (Cytil. 5). And since that time the oblates have generally been prepared by priests or "religious" persons. See BETHELEHEM. For further particulars of the preparation of the sacramental bread in various places, see Martene, A. R. i. iii. 7, §§ 23–25; Renaudot, Litt. Orient. i. 183; ii. 63 ff. ed. 1716.

V. Form of the Bread.

The loaf used by the Jews of Palestine seems commonly to have been round, somewhat less than an inch thick, and six or eight inches in diameter. In order that it might be more readily broken, it was scored with lines, frequently two lines at right angles to each other, so as to form a cross, dividing the loaf into four portions (Arianchi, Leona Subter. II. v. 9, p. 278, quoted by Probst, Sacramente, p. 201). And such was probably the form of the eucharistic loaf in the early Christian church (see woodcut). The Liber Pontificalis (p. 98A, ed. Muratori) attributes to Zephyrinus (pope 197–217) the order, that presbyters should distribute round cakes (coronns) blessed by the bishop—a statement probably of no great authority. In the 4th century Epiphaninus (Ancoratus, c. 57) and Cassarius, brother of Gregory Nazianzen (Dial. iii. quest. 169), speak of the bread as round. Gregory the Great (Dialo- gus, iv. 55) speaks of a certain presbyter bringing "duas oblationum coronas," then the usual form of oblation. These are explained by Joannes Diaconus (in Martene, A. R. i. iii. vii. 26) to be cakes made of a handful of fine flour, and in form like a crown (ex pugilla similis et ad speciem coronæ); that is, round, whatever else may be intended by the comparison. And the evidence of pictorial representations agrees with this so far as it goes. Whenever in ancient representations the form of the bread is distinguishable, it is round. See CANISTER, p. 264; EUCHARIST, p. 627.

A passage quoted by Martene (u. s.) from a treatise of Iblephonsa, a Spanish bishop, describes the form and composition of the eucharistic bread in the beginning of the 9th century thus: "mensura trium digitorum anguli in rotundam panis azymi sic compositus est;" i. e. the azymes for the eucharist were made in the form of a circle of three "fingers" radius. The same authority mentions that the oblate from which the priest was to communicate was larger than those intended for the people.

That it is an ancient custom to impress the oblates with a cross is probable from the words of Chrysostom (Quo Christo v. st. Icus, 571 A, ed. Ben.), where he says, "on the Table is the Cross . . . in the mystic Supper the Cross of Christ shines forth with the Body of Christ." The woodcuts represent the forms of the Greek and Coptic oblates, which may probably be of considerable antiquity. The former bears the inscription "IC XC [Ἰησοῦς Χριστός] ΝΙΚΑ;" the latter, "ἅγιος, ἅγιος, ἅγιος, Κύριος Ζαβαβῶν." It is evident from what has been said above, that from a comparatively early age a strong objection was felt to the practice of consecrating a portion of a loaf in the eucharist; a whole loaf cake was always to be employed.

VI. Composition of the Cup.

With regard to the element of Wine there has been less controversy, though it is an interesting and unsettled question whether the cup was mixed at the institution of the sacrament by our Blessed Lord himself. Pfall (after R. Oh, de Battenora and Maimonides, in Mishwan de Benedict, c. 7, § 5) asserts that the Jews as a rule mixed water with the wine in their Cup of Blessing. Lightfoot (Temple Service, i. 691) says that he that drank pure wine performed his duty; so that, although it seems probable that our Lord used the mixed cup, yet it is not certain that he did so. Buxtorf (De primæ Coenæ Ritibus et Forma, § 20) says that it was indifferent whether the cup was mixed or not; and in his Synagoga Judaica, where he gives full details of the Passover, does not mention a cup of wine diluted with water. Again, the Babylonish Talmud calls water mixed with wine "the fruit of the vine;" but it would appear that the same term is used for pure wine in Isa. xxxii. 12; Hab. iii. 17; so that nothing positive can be ascertained from the use of that term. On the whole it seems probable that our Lord used a mixed cup, but there is no conclusive evidence on the point.

It is acknowledged on all hands that, with the exception of a few heretics, the church used for many centuries wine mixed with water. Justin Martyr, the first after the apostles who gives any account of the celebration of the eucharist, says, "There is then brought to the brother who presides a cup of water and mixed wine" (εὐχαριστος). And afterwards he tells us that "the deacons distribute to each one present that he may partake of that bread and wine and water which has been blessed by thanksgiving;" and this food, he says, is called Eucharistia (Apol. i. ch. 65). Irenæus also (adv. Hæres. lib. v. c. 2, p. 294) speaks of the mixed cup (κεκραμένον ποτήριον). And again (lib. v. c. 36) of the Lord's promise to his disciples, "that he would drink the mixture of the cup (mistonem calicis) new with them in the kingdom," which shows that he thought the fruit of the vine and the mixed cup the same thing. Cyprian (Epist. 63, ad Cæcilianum) has several passages bearing on this question. He says: (c. 2) that to mix wine with water is to follow the Lord's example; and again (c. 13): "Thus in sanctifying the cup of the Lord, water cannot be offered alone, as neither can wine be offered alone; for if the wine be offered by itself the blood of Christ begins to be without us, and if the water be alone the people begins to be without Christ."

The third council of Carthage (c. 24) orders, "that in the sacrament of the body and blood of our Lord, nothing else be offered but what the Lord himself commanded, that is bread, and wine mixed with water." The African code, both Greek and Latin, has this same canon, with further directions added (Col. Can. African. c. 37). All the ancient liturgies either contain a direction for mixing water with the wine, or else in the canon the mixing is alluded to. Thus in the Clementine Liturgy (Const. Apost. viii. 12, § 16), in reciting the words of Institution the priest says: "Likewise also mixing the cup of wine and water (ἐξ ὄνου καὶ ὕδατος) and blessing it, He gave it to them." The Liturgies of St. James and St. Mark contain like words, while the Liturgies of St. Basil and St. Chrysostom order the deacon to put wine and water into the cup before the priest places it on the altar. In like manner, in some form or another, the mixing is mentioned in the Liturgies of Ethiopia, Nestorius, Severus, of the Roman and the Gallican churches. In most liturgies, when the water is mixed with the wine, some reference is made to the blood and water which flowed from the Lord's side; as (e. g.) in the Ambrosian rite: "De Intere Christi exivit sanguis et aqua pariter." Similarly the Mozarabic and the Roman.

A peculiar rite of the Byzantine church is the mingling of hot water with the wine. In the Liturgy of St. Chrysostom (c. 34), after the fraction of the oblate, the deacon, taking up the vessel of boiling water (τὸ βῆρ), says to the priest: "Sir, bless the boiling water;" the priest then says: "Blessed be the fervency (ζέως) of thy saints for ever, now and al ways, and for ages;" then the deacon pours a small quantity of the boiling water into the chalice, saying, "The fervency of faith, full of the Holy Spirit. Amen."

Various mystical reasons have been given for the mixture of water with the wine. That of Cyprian has been already quoted. Genadius (De Eccl. Dogmat. c. 75), besides the fact that our Lord used the mixed cup at the first institution, alleges as a further reason that blood and water flowed from His pierced side. The same reason is given by the Pseudo-Ambrosius (De Sacram. v. 1), and generally by the liturgies. In the comment on St. Mark, ascribed to Jerome, another is given; that by one we might be purged from sin, by the other redeemed from punishment (in Mark. XIV). Alecia (Epist. 90) finds in the three things, water, flour, and wine, which may be placed on the altar, a mystical resemblance to the Three Heavenly Witnesses.

The principal deviations from the received practice of the church in this matter have been the opposite usages of the Aquarians, who used no wine at all in the eucharist, and of the Armenians, who mixed no water with the wine, claiming the authority of John Chrysostom. Both these are censured by the council in Trullo (c. 32). These Aquarians or Hydropostatæ probably abstained from wine as a bad thing in itself, like the Ebionites and the Tatianists or Encratites described by Epiphanius (Hæres. 39).

This practice is noticed and reprehended by Cyprian (Epist. 63, c. 16).

Some in the 7th century offered milk for wine in the eucharist; others communicated the people not with wine pressed from grapes, but with the grapes themselves (oblativ uvis) (Conc. Bæac. iii. c. 1); errors severely censured by the ecclesiastical authorities, who constantly insisted on the offering of wine, water, and bread only.

A peculiar instance of an addition to the cup is the dropping of milk and honey into it, according to the Roman rite, on Easter-Eve (Martene, A. R. IV. xxiv. 32), the great day of baptism. [BAPTISM, p. 164.]

The Colour of the Wine.

The wine in use in the church has in general been red, apparently from a desire to symbolise as much as possible the blood of our Lord. According to the Talmud red wine was offered at the Passover. Irenæus indeed (Hærec. bk. i. c. 16) says that Marcus (a heretic) claimed to perform the eucharistic ceremony over certain mixed juices, and to make them appear red and purple, which would lead to the supposition that the wine had been originally white. But Cyprian (Ep. 63, c. 7) speaks as if the Eucharistic wine was blood-red; and Chrysostom (Hom. 82 in Matt. xxvi. 34, 35) speaks of the tongue being empurpled with the blood of Christ in the eucharist. Later in the history of the church many of the synods have ordered red wine to be used; and although there is no necessity in the matter, it certainly seems the most appropriate.

ELEVATIO (in a Liturgical sense).

(1). Eastern Church.—In all early Oriental liturgies an elevation of the bread by the celebrating priest is prescribed contemporaneously with the proclamation ἄγια ἄγιοι, and before the Fraction. Thus, in the liturgy of St. Chrysostom "the priest, elevating the holy bread, exclaims 'Holy things for holy persons;'" of St. James: "then he elevates the gifts, and saith 'Holy things, &c.;" of St. Basil, "the priest, elevating the holy bread, exclaims 'Holy things, &c.;" the Armenian, "the priest lifts up the sacrifice before his eyes, and saith 'the Holy of holies.'" The original intention of this rite was clearly not that the host might be adored by the people, for it took place within the Bema, the doors of which being closed and the curtains drawn, it could be only seen by the attendant ministers. This is acknowledged by Goar; "Non ita tamen ut a populo conspiciatur Dominicum corpus elevat Græcus sacerdos" (Eucholo, p. 145, note 158, cf. pp. 84, 151); he adds that there is no allusion to eucharistic adoration in the earlier ritualists: "De majoris hostie, a populo, completa consecratione, per elevationem conspiciendæ, nihil apud antiquos rituum existimatores." The authority of St. Basil, ita ut τῆς ἐπιθέσεως ἄρματα ἐπὶ τῆς ἀναδέξεως τοῦ κρούου τῆς εὐχαριστίας τὴς τῶν ἁγίων εὐργασίας ἵδωυ καταλέλοιπεν; (De Sp. Sanct. c. 27), is erroneously urged by Bellarmin (De Eucharist. ii. 15), and Bellarmine (De Concil. Antioch. p. 219), and Bona (lit. Liturg. lib. ii. c. 13, § 2), in support of the later practice of elevating the eucharist to show it to the people. For the word ἀναδέξις has been abundantly proved by Albertinus, quoted by Bingham (Orig. Eccl. lib. xv. c. 5, § 4), and is acknowledged by Renaudot (i. 270), to be used here in its classical sense of "dedication," "consecration," not that of "displaying." The authorities alleged in support of the early introduction of the practice of displaying the eucharist to the people prove very weak on examination. The Pseudo-Dionysius, whose writings cannot be placed earlier than the 5th or 6th century, when speaking of the priest "showing the gifts," (τὰς δωρεὰς τῶν θεωρητῶν ὁποδείξας), before proceeding to communion (De Eccl. Hierarch. c. iii. § 11) does not in any way assert that it was to the people that he showed them. The example of St. Euthymius, adduced by Martene (p. 423), is little more to the point. All that is said is, that after the εὐχολοία, "stretching forth his hands to heaven, and as it were displaying to them the mystery administered for the sake of our salvation," (καὶ εὐερε αὐτοῖς ὁποδεικνὺς τὸ εὐκοσμηθῆν τῆς σωτηρίας χάριν τῆς ἡμετέρας μυστήριου), "he cried with a loud voice, τὰ ἅγια τοῦ ἁγίου" (Cyrl. Scythopol. Vita S. Euthym. apud Coteler. Eccl. Græc. Monum. vol. ii. p. 268, § 81). The passage quoted from Germans, and accepted by Bingham as coming from the patriarch of Constantinople of that name, A. D. 715, is from a work, Theoria Kerua Diacorum, correctly assigned by Cave to his namesake and successor five centuries later, A. D. 1222. The most apposite passage is that given by Renaudot (i. 267) from James bishop of Edessa, c. 651, which, if correctly quoted, prescribes that the priest, after uttering the ἄγια ἄγιοι, "shall lift the sacraments and show them to the whole people as for

(2) Western Church.—Obscure and vague as is the date of the introduction of the elevation of the eucharist in the Oriental church, there is still greater uncertainty when it became the practice of the West. Gear humbly confesses his ignorance (Us. hist. p. 146, § 158), and Bona acknowledges the same (Ver. Liturg. lib. ii. c. 13, § 2), and professes his inability to discover any trace of the practice in the ancient sacramentaries or the codices of the Ordo Romanus, or in any of the ancient ritual writers, Alenit, Amalarius, Walafrid, &c. Indeed there is little doubt, as is acknowledged by all learned and candid Romanists, that the elevation owes its introduction to the spread of the tenets of Berengarius, c. 1050, against which it was regarded as a public protest (Muratori, Liturg. Rom. Vet. i. 227). This practice was the natural consequence of the mediaeval doctrine of Transubstantiation, though it had little or no authoritative sanction before the 13th century. Although from its late date the Latin practice does not belong to the period embraced in this Dictionary, we may mention that the position of the elevation in the Roman canon differs essentially from that of the Greek church, not taking place until after the fraction and consecration instead of before it.

ELVIRA, COUNCIL OF (Eliberitanum or Ilberitum concilium), held at Elvira in Granada. There was another Elvira in Catalonia. The date assigned to it in its own acts is ERACCLXII = A.D. 324. But it has been referred to A.D. 305, 313, and even 335 by moderns. As Hosius of Corduba is placed second of the nineteen bishops attending it, its date cannot well have been earlier than 313, nor later than 324. And, in either case, its canons which would find their counterpart in those of Ancyra or Nicea. Perhaps the later date, besides being that of its own acts, would accord best with the reference to it by Hosius himself in the 11th Sardinian canon, which Baluze points out. Its own canons, all on discipline, seem to have amounted to fourscore and one; but Gratian and others cite several more not now found in its acts. Among the former, absence from church for three consecutive Sundays is punished by the 21st. Superstitious fasts—on which see Bingham xxi. i. 25—to be observed in all other months, are relaxed in July and August by the 23rd. Bishops, priests, and deacons cohabiting with their wives are threatened with deprivation in the 33rd, lights in cemeteries are forbidden during the day by the 34th, and pictures in churches by the 36th. A huge dissertation on this council, in three books, addressed to Clement VIII. by Mendoza, may be read in Mansi, ii. 58 and seq. [E. S. FC.]

EMANCIPATIO, in a special sense, is the setting free of a monk, chosen to an ecclesiastical dignity, from the obedience which he owes to his superior. This was done by letters under the hand of the abbat, called emancipatorie littere. A form of such letters is given by Petit in his edition of Theodore's Præsentia, p. 143. [C.] (change, s. v.)

EMBALMING. There are many testimonies to the observance of this custom among the Christians of the early centuries. That it was practised in the case of martyrs appears from the instance of Tharucus (Acta Tharuci, ap. Baron. an. 290, n. 21), to whom it was denied by his persecutor Maximus, and his body sentenced to burning, in contempt of the doctrine of the resurrection. But embalming was not confined to martyrs; it was a reproach cast upon Christians generally by the heathen interlocutor in Minucius Felix (Octav. c. 12, § 6), that "using no perfumes for their bodies in life, they required all costly ointments for their funerals." Tertullian also (Apol. c. 42) is a witness to the general observance of the custom: "Let the Sabæans know that more of their costly wares is spent in the burial of Christians than in offering incense (fumigandis) to their gods."

The practice was doubtless derived from the Jews. In the Old Testament the only recorded examples are those of Jacob and Joseph (Gen. i. 2, 26) in conformity with Egyptian usage; but it would seem to have been observed more or less generally during their later history; and in St. John's description of our Lord's burial, we read that Joseph of Arimathea and Nicodemus "took the body of Jesus and wound it in linen clothes with the spices, as the manner of the Jews is to bury." Our Lord's interpretation of the pious offering of Mary to His person (Mark xiv. 8), "She hath anointed my body to the burial" (ἀναθήσασθαι) implies the use of unction as a recognized practice. Various spices were employed for the embalming, especially myrrh; so Prudentius (Cathemerin. hym. 4)—

Although the custom of embalming was common to Christians and heathens, there was an essential difference in the purpose for which it was practised. As a pagan ceremony it was intended to facilitate cremation; with the Christians, on the contrary, to whom "the old irreverence of burning" was always abhorrent, its object was to preserve the body from corruption.
 It was doubtless the expression of that reverent feeling for the body, as having been the temple of the Holy Ghost, and as destined for restoration to an imperishable existence, by which the Christian faith was exclusively characterised among all the religions of the world. [D. B.]

EMBER DAYS (jejunia quatuor temporum).
 From the Latin title has been derived the name of these seasons in most European languages, whether by translation [e. g. the French les Quatre-Temps, or the Swedish de fyra faste- tider], or by a corruption of the original [e. g. the German Quatember, Dutch Quatertemper, or Danish Kvædember]. Hence too, if we consider the wide-spread use of the expression is a probable derivation of the English Ember; though two others have been proposed, one connecting it with embers in the sense of ashes, for which little can be said, and the other identifying it with the Anglo-Saxon ymbren, a revolutio or circuit, to which it has been objected that all church seasons are necessarily recurrent. [In favour of this last view, however, may be cited the phrases ymbren dagis, etc., and such notices as the canon of the English council of Aenham, given below.] On the supposition that the derivation from the Latin is the true one, it is interesting to note the Danish form Tamperdag, as marking an intermediate stage between that of the German and of the English. An exception to the above rule is the Welsh name, Withnos y Cydyorïau, week of the united choirs or processions.

Whatever may have been the origin of the solemnity of the Ember Fasts, we find them at an early period associated with the invoking of God's blessing on each of the four seasons as it came round in its turn, and the special striving by prayers and fasting to merit such blessings. Still, on the earliest occasion on which we meet with a mention of these fasts, this idea does not seem to have been present to the mind of the writer. The passage in question occurs in the treatise de Inverisibus of Philastris, bishop of Brixia, in the middle of the 4th century. As the passage is of some importance, we think it well to quote it at length. After citing Zech. viii. 19, as referring to the subject, he proceeds " . . . ut mysteria Chris-tianitatis ipsius quatuor jejniis nuntiata cognosceremus. Nam per annum quatuor jejunia in ecclesia celebrantur; in Natali primum, deinde in Pascha, tertium in Epiphania, quartum in Pentecoste. Nam in Natali Salvatoris Domini jejunandum est, deinde in Paschae Quadragesima, Pascha in Ascensione itidem in cœlum post octava quadragesimo, inde usque ad Pente-costen diebus decem: id quod postea fecerunt beati Apostoli post Ascensionem jejniis et circumspectis insistentes." (Haeres. 119, in Patrol.
 xii. 1286.) It seems certain here, whatever the explanation may be, whether of a false reading in the text, or of an unusual meaning of the word, that, as Fabricius (not. in loc.) suggests, the fast in Epiphania refers to the season of the Ascension, both from the position assigned to it between Easter and Pentecost, and from the subsequent reference to the Ascension.

We now pass on to the first definite mention of these fasts as associated with the beginnings of the four seasons. Among the works of Leo I., are found numerous sermons for each of the fasts, which are spoken of as the fast de ini- menis (Serm. 12-20), the fast in Quadragesima (Serm. 39-50), the fast in Pentecoste (Serm.
 78-80), and the fast septimi mensis (Serm.
 85-94) respectively; and in one passage (Serm.
 19, c. 2; vol. i. p. 59, ed. Ballerini), he thus associates the fasts with the seasons they introduce, "jejunium vernum in Quadragesima, aestivum in Pentecoste, autumnale in mense septimo, hiemale autem in hoc qui est decimus celebramus." Further, he appears to speak of this practice as resting on apostolical authority (Serm. 80, c. 1; p. 316), meaning, probably, that resting on the authority of his church, they claimed the respect due to apostolic ordinances.
 The autumnal fast does not seem to be mentioned before the time of Leo I., for it will have been observed that the arrangement in Philastrius is different. Perhaps, however, Leo or some of his predecessors may have added to three existing ancient fasts this fourth one, and then associated the four seasons of the year with these four regularly recurring fasts.

The particular days on which it was incumbent to fast at the Ember seasons according to the Roman rule were Wednesday, Friday, and Saturday; thus Leo (Serm. 30, c. 4, p. 320) enjoins "Quarta et sexta feria jejunemus, Sabbato autem apud beatissimum Petrum Apostolum vigiliis celebremus." Augustine (Epist.
 36, ad Casulanum, c. 8; vol. ii. 105, ed. Goume) seems to speak simply of the particular days of the week on which the local Roman church fasted in its ordinary practice.

It has been said that Leo (Serm. 18, c. 2; p. 57), asserts that the fasts of the four seasons were celebrated "in universa ecclesia;" but an examination of the passage will show that he is referring to the institution of fasts generally.
 Indeed, there can be little doubt that the fasts of the four seasons were at first only observed in that part of the church in immediate dependence on Rome. The language of Augustine will not allow us to suppose that the same state of things prevailed in Africa; the church in north Italy differed, at any rate in not making Saturday a fast. (Amorose apud August., Epist. 86 ad Cusulanum c. 32; ed. cit. 120.)

In the eastern church there is no trace whatever of an observance of the Ember seasons. The passage of Athanasius, which some have quoted in support of a different conclusion (Apol. de syn.
 c. 6; vol. i. p. 323, ed. Bened.), merely proves the existence of a fast at Pentecost. With this may be compared an allusion in the Apostolic Constitutions (lib. v. c. 20).

Not only is there thus a lack of evidence to establish the existence of the usage in early times as ought but a local Roman custom, but we find Jerome protesting against the multiplypended to his edition of Leo I.

ing of obligatory fasts, and clearly recognizing no fast but Lent as of universal obligation (Epist. 41 ad Marcellam c. 2; vol. i. 185, ed. Vallarsi; cf. vi. 750).

Nor if we take illustrations from a somewhat later period shall we find the practice uniformly established. Thus the rule of St. Benedict (ob. circa 542 A.D.), carefully specifies the fasts which the orler is to observe, but ignores the Ember seasons altogether, and indeed, his rule is hardly compatible with the existence of the latter (Regula S. Bened. c. 41; p. 88, ed. Venice, 1723).

Later still Isidore of Seville (ob. 636, A.D.), speaks of the four fasts which are to be observed in the church, "secundum Scripturas sacras," mentioning those in Lent, Pentecost, the seventh month, and (on the authority of Jeremiah xxxvi. 9), the Calends of November (de off. Eccl. i. c. 36 sqq.). He afterwards mentions in addition to these four, that on the Calends of January and others.

As regards the Gallican church, the Ember seasons do not seem to have been established much before the time of Charlemagne. The second council of Tours (567 A.D.) in prescribing the fasts to be observed by monks, makes no mention whatever of the fasts of the four seasons—the various Gallican Liturgies published by Mabillon equally ignore them; and the language of the council of Mainz [813 A.D.], in ordering their observance, seems to imply a recently established institution, "Constitutum ut quatuor tempora anni ab omnibus cum jejuniis observarentur, hoc est in mense Martio hebdomada prima, et feria quarta, et sexta, et Sabbato. . . . similiter in mense Junio hebdomada secunda, in mense Septembris hebdomada tertia, in mense Decembris hebdomada prima, quae fuerit plena ante vigiliam Nativitatis Domini sicut est in Romana Ecclesia traditum." (Concil. Mogunt. can. 34; Labbe vii. 1249). We also meet with capitularies of the Carolingian kings to the same effect (see e. g. lib. v. 151; vol. i. p. 854, ed. Baluzius. See also one of 769 A.D., i. p. 192).

To return now to the Roman church properly so called, it will be seen that there is reason to doubt whether even there the spring fast was not at first really Lent itself, and not the three special days. It is pointed out by Muratori (see below) c. 3, that while Leo in his sermons on the summer, autumn, and winter fasts, alludes to the three days Wednesday, Friday, and Saturday; he yet in his sermons on the spring fast in no way refers to them, and indeed it is difficult in any case to see the meaning of a fast within the limits of another fast, except it were meant to be of a more rigorous kind, of which in the present case we have no evidence.

Some would attempt to solve this difficulty by supposing that the Ember seasons were originally instituted as times for ordination, but it certainly appears that this theory cannot be borne out by facts (see e. g. Amalarius Fortunatus, de Eccl. Off. ii. 2, and cf. Muratori c. 3). Everything points to the conclusion that the solemnity attaching to the seasons led to their being chosen as fitting times for the rite. The theory of Muratori seems very probable, that the spring fast is really Lent itself, and that the fixing of the three days is due to a later development.

Among other evidence referred to by him is the fact that in some ancient Roman sacramentaries, when notice is appointed to be given of the fasts of the fourth, seventh, and tenth months, no mention is made of the spring fast, Lent being assumed to be known from other sources. (For instances of this see Cardinal Bona, Rerum Liturg., lib. ii. c. 16; vol. ii. p. 343, ed. Ang. Taur. 1753; and Thomasius, Colices Sacramentorum, lib. i. c. 82; p. 113.) We may further refer to the rule of the English council of Cloveshoe (747 A.D.), which orders that no one should neglect "jejuniorum tempora id est, quarti, septimi et decimi mensis," and that due notice should always be given of each (Concil. Cloves. can. 18; Labbe vi. 1578). It is interesting to add here that the introduction of the fasts of the four seasons is referred by a later English council (that of Aethelm [1009 A.D.], the locality of which appears to be unknown) to Gregory the Great, "et jejania quatuor temporum, quae lubra vocant et cetera omnia prout sanctus Gregorius imposuit genti Anglorum, conservantur" (Concil. Aethelm. can. 16; Labbe ix. 792).

Among other evidence in favour of this theory may be mentioned an epistle in the Fulda Decretals bearing the name of pope Callistus (ob. 223 A.D.), which orders that to the three already existing fasts, a fourth should be added. Now it may be reasonably argued that the author, Isidore, put the matter in accordance with what he himself believed to be the state of the case, and that thus we obtain an insight into the tradition existing in his time (circa 800 A.D.). A similar remark as to Callistus, occurs in a MS. of Anastasius Bibliothecarius, in the Ambrosian library. Although the statement is of course false, still the origin of the forgery may have been that the writer wished to embody what he himself believed to be the fact, namely, that the fourth (spring) fast was added on later. A capitulary also of Ahyto or Atto, bishop of Vercellae about 945 A.D., mentions the three fasts in a similar way (Patrol. cxxiv. 43).

Not only does this doubt exist as to the origin of the spring fast, but there seems much reason for supposing that at one time it did not necessarily fall in Lent at all, but was fixed in the first week in March, though afterwards as a matter of convenience it was fixed within Lent always; also the summer fast was at one time placed in the second week of June, and therefore did not necessarily fall at Pentecost. The council of Mainz, it will have been observed, speaks of the fast as occurring in the first week of March, Lent not being mentioned at all; similarly also for the summer fast. So too the Ordo Romanus, "in primo mense (i.e. March) quarta et sexta feria et Sabbato in prima hebdomada ipsius mensis primum jejunium celebratur. Secundum in quarto mense (i.e. June) in secunda hebdomada ipsius mensis. Tertium jejunium septimi mensis, id est Septembris, tertia hebdomada ipsius mensis. Quartum decimi mensis, id est Decembris, quarta hebdomada ante Nativitatem Domini" (i. 33, ed. Hittorp; cf. also Rabanus Maurus de Inst. Cler. ii. 24; and Amalarius de Eccl. off. ii. 1). Again in many ancient sacramentaries we have many things pointing to the same result; e.g. in the Gelasian Sacramentary, we find a notice "laetae orationes esse

One more example may suffice: the council of Aix la Chapelle (817 A.D.), orders that no fast should be in the week of Pentecost, "nisi statuti fuerint dies jejunii" (Conc. Aquisgran. can. 51; Labbe viii. 1511). Consequently, while the summer fast might fall in the week of Pentecost, it did not necessarily do so. It seems therefore not unreasonable to infer that at one time the church celebrated the fasts of the four seasons according to this rule, a change being subsequently made to the present plan.

We must now refer to the Ember seasons as times specially fixed for the ordinations of the clergy. We have before said that they were in all probability fixed at these times from the solemnity attaching to them, and it is noticeable that we find no trace of such a connexion earlier than the time of Gelasius, who enjoins "ordinationes etiam presbyterorum et diaconorum nisi certis temporibus et diebus exercere non debent, id est quartis mensis jejunio, septimi et decimi, sed et etiam Quadragesimalis initii ac mediæ Quadragesime die sabbati jejunio circa vesperam poterit celebrandas" (Epist. 9 ad Episcopos Iacnie et Bruttiorum, c. 11; Patrol. lix. 52). It will be observed that two periods in Lent are specified here, a piece of evidence in favour of Muratori's view that the spring fast is Lent itself.

The Galasian Sacramentary also furnishes a form for this ordinance, which is headed, "Ordo qualiter in Romana sedis apostolicæ ecclesiæ presbyteri, diaconi vel subdiaconi eligendi sint, mensis i. iv. vii. et x. Sabbatorum die in xii. lectionibus . . ." (Patrol. lxxiv. 1069). Again, the Gregorian Sacramentary enjoins that the greater orders are to be conferred only "in Sabbatis hinc inde lectionum per quatuor tempora" (Gre. Sac. 213, and cf. Menard's note). The same order is laid down in the Pontifical of Egbert, archbishop of York from 732-766 A.D. (p. 8, ed. Surtees Society).

The irregularity as to the time of the Ember seasons evidently continued down to a late period. Thus the plan laid down by the council of Mainz is repeated two hundred and fifty years after (1072 A.D.), by a council of Rouen (Council. Rothom. can. 9; Labbe ix. 1227); and the frequency with which conciliar rules occur on the subject prove how unsettled the matter was. (See e.g. the regulations of the council of Seligenstadt [1022 A.D., can. 2; Labbe ix. 845], of those of Clermont [1095 A.D., can. 14; ib. x. 504], and of Placentia [can. 27; ib. 508], and even of Oxford [1222 A.D., can. 8; ib. xi. 274], in the very last of which we still meet with the mention of Matii prima hebdomada.) The system followed in later centuries is ordinarily referred to the rule as laid down in the councils of Placentia and Clermont.

It may be well very briefly to sum up our results. The observance of the Ember seasons is purely a western institution, there being no certain trace of it whatever in the eastern church. It was doubtless at first a rite merely of the local Roman church, whence it gradually spread throughout the west, and established itself in Gaul and Spain by the eighth century, and in England possibly earlier, through its special connexion with Gregory.

CHRIST. ANT.

It is perhaps not impossible that the development of the practice in the Roman church may have been something to this effect. Fasts at the times of Lent, Pentecost, and the Nativity, are certainly very ancient; the periods of these would roughly correspond with three of the four seasons, and thus some bishop of Rome, Leo or one of his predecessors, may have conceived the idea of making them symbolize the return of the seasons, and so added the one necessary to complete the four. It would soon come to pass then that they would be spoken of as originally ordained with that view. The length of each fast having been more or less settled, and the fasts being now more specially associated with the seasons, the spring and summer fasts would come more and more to be viewed independently of Lent and Pentecost, and hence they would fall occasionally outside these seasons. Finally, the inconveniences arising from such irregularities may have caused the ultimate settlement of the matter in its present form.

For the matter of the foregoing article, I am especially indebted to Muratori's De iis Temporibus jejunii dispositio (in his Anecdota, vol. i. 246-260; Mediolani 1697); also to Bingham's Antiquities of the Church, book xxi. ch. 2, and Binterim's Denkwürdigkeiten der Christ-Katholischen Kirche, vol. v. part 2, 133 sqq. Reference may also be made to Valfredus, De usu et institutione jejunii quatuor temporum, Bononiæ, 1771. [R. S.]

EMBLEM. [SYMBOL.]

EMBOLISMUS, also EMBOLIS, EMBOLUM, (1) an inserted or intercalated prayer; the name given to the prayer which in almost all ancient liturgies follows the Lord's Prayer, founded on one or both of the two last petitions. It is so called because it is interposed here, and what had been already asked in the Lord's Prayer is expanded, and it is more clearly expressed what evils we seek to be delivered from, viz. past, present, and future, together with the saints by whose intercession we strengthen our prayer, viz. the B. V. Mary, St. Peter, St. Paul, and St. Andrew (Bona, Lev. Liturg. ii. c. 15 § 2). Amalarius (A. D. 810) says of it, "in consummatione orationis venit clausula universas petitiones et preces nostras collecta brevitate concludens" (Amalarius. De Eccl. offic. iii. 29). The Embolismus was usually repeated by the priest in a low voice, symbolizing the silence during the period that our Lord lay in the grave; but in the Ambrosian rite it was always pronounced aloud (Macri, Hierolec. s. v.). This practice, which has left very faint traces in the Western church, being reduced in the Roman and Ambrosian rites to "Libera nos quesumus Domine ab omni malo," holds a more important place in Oriental liturgies. The Embolismus is not, however, found in the liturgies of St. Chrysostom and St. Basil, but appears in those of St. James, St. Mark, and Theodore the Interpreter, as well as in the Armenian, Mozarabic, and Coptic St. Basil. As examples of the shorter Embolismus we give that of the church of Jerusalem, "And lend us not into temptation, O Lord, the Lord of Hosts, who knowest our infirmity; but deliver us from the Evil One, and his works, and every assault and will of his, for the sake of Thy Holy name which is called upon our lowliness" (Assesman. vol. v. p. 51), and the Syriac St. James,

"O Lord our God, lead us not into temptation which we devoid of strength are not able to bear, but also with the temptation make a way of escape, that we may be able to bear it, and deliver us from evil through Jesus Christ," &c. Renaud, vol. ii. p. 40).

EMBOLOS. A covered portico or cloister; in ecclesiastical language a cloister surrounding the external walls of a church, serving as an ambulatory in hot, rainy, and dirty weather, and also affording a convenient passage for the priests and ministers of the church from the bema and ávonon to the narthex, used at Constantinople by the patriarch when he proceeded to wash feet in the narthex. Codinus speaks of these cloisters being vaulted, and Goar of their walls being ornamented with mosaic pictures. Such porticos ran along the N. and S. sides of the church of St. Sophia at Constantinople (Ducange, Constan. Christiana, lib. iii. c. 16), and surrounded the churches of St. Michael at Anaplus, and the Deipara at Jerusalem, on all sides but the east (Procop. de Aedific. lib. i. c. 8, lib. v. c. 6). It was in "the right embolos" of St. Sophia — that the summary of the proceedings of the so-called eighth general council, that of Constantinople in 870, were drawn up (Labbe, Concil. viii. 1421). In Moschus (Prat. Spiritual. § 86 apud Cotel. Ecdl. Græc. Monum. ii. 390) we read of an archimandrite named George, who buried in "the right embolos" of a church he was erecting, the body of an ascetic who had appeared to him in a dream and warned him where he would find his corpse.

EMPHIOTION (Ἐμφύσιος) is one of the names for the white robe (ἀναβάλας) with which persons were invested at baptism. The name is no doubt derived from the "enlightening" attributed to the baptismal ceremony. See BAPTISM, pp. 156, 163. [C.]

EMPHYTEUSIS (Ἐμφυτεύσις), a manner of letting real property, at first confined to waste lands requiring much outlay to bring them under cultivation, but afterwards applied to any real property.

Emphyteusis is a contract by which the beneficial ownership of real property (res immobilis) is transferred by the proprietor to another, either for a term of not less than ten years, or for a life or lives, or in perpetuity, in consideration of an annual payment. It differs from mere letting (locatio), in that by emphyteusis beneficial ownership is transferred for the term, while by letting only the use and enjoyment of produce is transferred; in that its use is confined to real property; and in that it cannot be for a less term than ten years. It differs from feudal tenure (feodum), in that it requires periodical payments, not personal service, to be given to the lord or proprietor.

Emphyteusis is either ecclesiastical or lay. Ecclesiastical emphyteusis is a contract by which property belonging to a church, monastery, or other religious foundation, is granted. This differs from lay emphyteusis [See SMITH'S DICTIONARY OF GREEK AND ROMAN ANTIQ. s. v.] principally in that it requires the assent of the bishop, and must clearly be for the benefit of the church or foundation which grants it; a provision no doubt intended to check the alienation of church property by ecclesiastical persons. ENCOLPION (Εγκόλπιον, that which is worn on the breast), the name anciently given to small caskets worn round the necks of the faithful, containing usually either relics or a copy of the Gospels.

The use of these portable reliquaries is of the highest antiquity; Chrysostom (Quod Christus ut Deus, p. 571 E, ed. Ben.) speaks of particles of the true Cross being suspended from the necks both of men and women, enclosed in gold.

In 1571 two such reliquaries, made of gold, were found in tombs belonging to the ancient cemetery of the Vatican; they are square in form, and are furnished with rings which indicate their use; on one side they bear the monogram of Christ, between the A and Ω (see woodcut). These probably date from the 4th century.

The pectoral cross worn by bishops was also called encolpion. The oldest specimen now existing is one which was found not long since upon the breast of a corpse in the basilica of St.

Laurence, outside the walls. It came to light in clearing the interior of that church, and we are indebted to De Rossi for a careful drawing of it (Bulletino, Apr. 1803). On one side it bears the inscription, EMMANOVHA [Emmanuel] NO-BISCVM DEVS; on the other, the following words, addressed apparently to Satan: CRVX IST VITA MIHI ¶ MONS INIMICE TUI; a cavity closed by a screw appears to have been intended for relics. Reliquaries in the form of a cross are first mentioned by Gregory the Great. He sent one of them to queen Theodelinda with a fragment of the true cross; this still exists at Monza, and is used by the provost of the ancient church in that city when he officiates pontificaly. An engraving of it may be found in Frisi's Memoire della Chiesa Mon ace (p. 52).

Two amulets given to this princess by the same pontiff for the use of her children are still preserved among the celebrated treasures of Monza, one of which contains a piece of the true cross, the other a fragment of the Gospels. Greg.
Magn. Epist. xiv. 12). Engravings of these objects are given by Mozzoni (Tavole cron. della stor. eccl. vol. vii. p. 79). The same volume of the same work also contains (pp. 77 and 81) drawings of other reliquaries of the highest interest—namely, some of the vases in which oil from the sacred lamps of the tombs of the martyrs had been sent by Gregory to Theodelinda.
[AMPULLA.]

From the same pope we also learn (Epist. l.
36; vii. 26) that filices from St. Peter's chains were sometimes enclosed in small golden keys.
He himself had sent one of these consecrated keys to Childebert, king of the Franks, to wear hung from his neck "as a protection from all evils" — "Claves sancti Petri, in quibus de vinculis catenarum ejus inclusum est, excellentiae vestrae direximus quae collo-vestro suspensae a malis vos omnibus tuentur" (Epist. vi. 6). An illustrious Gaul named Din-muis also received, from the same pontiff, a small cross of gold, containing a similar relic (Epist. iii. 33).—"Transmissimus autem B. Petri apostoli benedictionem crucem parvulam, cui de catenis ejus beneficia sunt inserta." [ELOGIAR.] Nicephorus, patriarch of Constantinople († 828), speaks of an encolpion set in gold, one side of which was formed of crystal, the other of enamel (εικονισμένη δὲ ἐγκόλπιας); containing another encolpion, in which fragments of the true cross were arranged in a pattern (εἰστυπωμέναι), (Acta Conc. Ephes., pp. 312, 313, ed.

Commelin, 1591).

The whole subject of these reliquaries might receive abundant illustration from the records and the remains of medieval antiquity, were that period within the scope of the present work.

ENCYCLICAL LETTERS

(Ἐπιστολαὶ ἐγκύκλιαι, γράμματα ἐγκύκλια). Letters of a circular nature, not addressed to a particular person or community; as, the Catholic Epistles (Oecumenius on St. James 1). The letters in which the members of a council signified their conclusions to all the churches were called encyclical; and Nicephorus Callisti (Hist. xvi. 3) speaks of the encyclical letters (ἐγκύκλια γράμματα) which the emperor Basiliscus wrote against the fourth council (Chalcedon, A. D.

451), addressed to all the bishops of the church. The same writer (c. 4) speaks of divine and apostolic encyclics (ἐγκύκλια). The circulars of Basiliscus just referred to are styled by Evagrius (H. E. iii. 4) ἐγκύκλιοι συναλαλαί; an encyclical letter of Photius is mentioned (l. c. v. 2).

It is to be observed, that the phrase ἐγκύκλια γράμματα sometimes (as Euseb. H. E. vi. 18) denotes those subjects which the Greeks included in the "circle of the sciences," or encyclopædia. (Sulzer's Theor. artis, s. v. Ἐγκύκλιος.) [C.]

ENDOWMENT. The property given by the founder of a church for the maintenance of the edifice and of the clerks who served it was called dos ecclesiæ or endowment. Justinian (Novel 47), compelled those who built churches also to endow them; and without a competent provision for their maintenance, no clerks were to be ordained to any church (Conc. Episc., A. D. 517, c. 25); whoever desired to have a parish church (diocesan) on his estate was to set apart a sufficient landed endowment for its clerks (Conc. Arel. iv., A. D. 541, c. 33); a bishop was not to consecrate a church until the endowment of it had been regularly secured by a deed or charter (Conc. Bragan. ii. [iii.], A. D. 572, c. 5); founders of churches were to understand, that they had no further authority over property which they had given to the church, but that both the church and its endowment were at the disposition of the bishop, to be employed according to the canons (Conc. Tolet. iv., A. D. 633, c. 33).

In the ninth council of Toledo, A. D. 655, a special provision was made (c. 5), that a bishop was not to confer on any monastic church which he might found within his diocese more than a fiftieth part of the funds at his disposal; nor on any non-monastic church, or church destined for his own burial-place, more than one hundredth part of the revenues of the diocese.

If one who held a "fiscus," or fief, from the king, built and endowed churches, the bishop was desired to procure the royal confirmation of the gift (Conc. Tolet. iii., A. D. 589, c. 15).

See ALMS; BENEFICE; CHURCHES, MAINTENANCE OF, p. 388; PROPERTY OF THE CHURCH.

During the period with which we are concerned, the BISHOP [p. 233], with the advice and assistance of his presbytery, took charge of church endowments.

ENTALMA (Ἐντάλμα, ἐντάλματα γράμματα), the document by which a bishop confers on a monk the privilege of hearing confessions (Daniel, Codex, iv. 588). The form of such a letter is given by Gear, Euchology, p. 300. [C.]

ENTHRONIZATION. 1. The solemn placing of a bishop on his throne. See BISHOP, p. 224.

2. The word ἐθρονιάζειν is also used to designate the placing of "enthroning" of relics of the saints in the altar of a church on consecration [CONSECRATION OF CHURCHES]. Hence vobis ἐθρονιάσμενος designates a regularly consecrated church and not a mere oratory. Thus Germanus (in Daniel's Codex, iv. 701) speaks of a church as dedicated in the name of martyrs and consecrated over (or by virtue of) their holy relics (ἐν τοῖς ἁγίοις αὐτῶν λειτουργοῦσθεσθαί).

3. The word ἐθρονιάσμενος is perhaps sometimes used to designate the installation of a presbyter in his church (Reiske on Constant. Porphyrogen. De Cerim. 617). [C.]

ENTHUSIASTÆ (ἑνθουσιασταί). Those who pretended to prophesy by the motion of an indwelling daemon which they thought to be the Holy Spirit (see Theodoret, Hist. Eccl. iv. 11; Suidas, ἑνθουσία; Biogham, Anal. iv. 5, 4).

In A. D. 428 Theodosius and Valentinian ordained that these heretics (with many others) "nuscquam in Romano solum conveniente oratione habeant facultatem." This constitution was inserted in the Theodosian Code (16, 5, 25), and in that of Justinian (1, 5, 5), but with the reading (if it be the correct one) "nuscquam in Romanum locum conveniente oratione habeant facultatem." The same exclusion is decreed in general terms by Justinian in his 37th Novel, "nulla omnino lucretis domum aut locum orationis habeto." [L. B.]

ENTRANCE (Ἐισόδος). Two of the most remarkable ceremonies of Eastern liturgies are the Lesser and the Greater Entrance—that of the Word and that of the Sacrament.

1. The Lesser Entrance is the bearing in of the book of the gospels in solemn procession. In the Liturgy of St. Chrysostom (c. 17, p. 343, Daniel) after the prayer of the third antiphon (our "Prayer of St. Chrysostom") the rubric runs: "Then the priest and the deacon, standing before the Holy Table, make three genuflections (προσκυφήματα): Then the priest, taking the Holy Book of the Gospels gives it to the deacon; and so, going out by the north side, with lights going before them, they make the Lesser Entrance." That is, the deacon and priest pass from the sanctuary into the chapel of the prothesis, which is to the north of it, and so out into the body of the church, where, by a devious path, they return to the Holy Doors, which are open; the volume, often decorated with great magnificence, is laid on the Holy Table, where it is again taken to the ambo when the gospel is to be read.

This "Entrance" corresponds to the carrying of the gospel by the deacon to the ambo or roofoft in the Western church, once a rite of great importance; for the book was preceded not only by tapers but by a crucifix (Durandus, Rationes, iv. 24, 16). Compare ALLELUIA, GRADUAL.

In the Coptic St. Basil, the Greater Entrance precedes the Lesser. See below.

2. The Greater Entrance.—This ceremony has probably, like others, been developed from simple beginnings into very great prominence and magnificence.

The liturgy of St. James (c. 17, Daniel iv. 93) simply alludes in passing to the bringing in of the elements: "the priest bringing in the Holy Gifts says the following prayer." St. Mark (c. 10, Dan. iv. 148) is even more vague: "In ames (c. 17, Daniel iv. 33) sing to the bringing in of priest bringing in the Holy wing prayer." St. Mark is even more vague: "the Holy Things (τὰ ἅγια) are brought into the sanctuary, and the priest prays as follows." Similarly the Mozarabic (Dan. i. 67), "while the choir chants Alleluia, the priest offers [i. e. places on the altar] the Host and Chalice, with the prayers following," in the Armenian rite (Dan. iv. 440) the celebrant lies prostrate before the altar while the Great Entrance is made; in this rite (anomalously) the elements are spoken of as the body and blood of Christ before consecration (Neale, East. Ch. Int. 428).

In the much more developed rite of Constantinople (Lit. Chry. ost. Neale, n. s. 373), after the chanting of the Cherubic Hymn, the ceremony proceeds as follows. During the previous part of the eucharistic office, the elements have remained on the table in the chapel of the prothesis. At the proper point, the deacon censes the altar and the sanctuary, and then goes before the priest into the prothesis. The priest then lifts the "ser," or covering, from the chalice and paten, and lays it on the deacon's shoulder, and then places upon it the paten, covered with the ASTERISK and veil. The deacon takes hold of these with his left hand, bearing the censer in his right; the priest takes the chalice and follows the deacon, and so, preceded by tapers, they move round to the Holy Doors, as in the Lesser Entrance. In great churches, where there are dignified clergy and many attendants, this procession is one of great magnificence. Where there is but a single priest and no deacon, he bears the paten on his shoulder, supporting it by his left hand, and the chalice in his right hand before his breast.

In the Coptic St. Basil, the Great Entrance is made at the very beginning of the liturgy; the directions for it are very curious and minute. "The priest goes to the Takaldemet [Prothesis] from which he shall take the lamb [ELEMENTS, p. 600] looking attentively that there be no flaw in it. . . . When he hath all that he needs, the lamb, the wine, and the incense, . . . he takes the lamb in his hand and wipes it lightly, as Christ the Lord was first washed with water before He was presented to Simeon" the priest; then he shall bear it round to the altar in his hands, as Simeon bare Him round the Temple. At last the priest shall lay it down on the altar and shall place it on the paten, which signifies the cradle; and shall cover it with a linen cloth, as the Virgin did at His Nativity" (Renoulet, Lit. Orient. i. 186). A deacon seems to have borne the cruet.

ENTRY INTO JERUSALEM. This event in our Lord's life is very frequently represented in the earlier art of the Christian Church, occurring on some of the first sarcophagi, though not, as far as the present writer knows, in fresco or mosaic in the catacombs or elsewhere, excepting in an ancient mosaic of the Vatican (Bianchini Demonstr. Hist. Sac. Sæc. i. tav. 2, No. 17), and one from the basilica at Bethlehem, reproduced by Martigny (p. 331) from Count de Vogué (Les Églises de la Terre Ste. pl. v.). The earliest MS. representation of it is probably that in the Rabala or Laurentian Evangelary. The treatment is almost always the same; the Lord is mounted on the ass, sometimes accompanied by her foal, and the multitude with their palm-branches follow, or lay their garments before Him (Arlingh t. i. pp. 277-329; ii. p. 159 and passim; Bottari, tav. xxi.). His right hand is generally raised in the act of blessing. The multitude frequently raise their hands in thanksgiving. In one of the oldest MSS. of the New Testament in existence, the Gregorian Evangelary of St. Cuthbert (Palæographia Sacra) the Lord is represented mounted on an ass, and bearing a large whip—evidently with reference to the scourge of small cords used in the expulsion of buyers and sellers from the temple. There is a certain variety in the examples taken from different carvings. In Bottari (i. tav. xvi. xxii. xxxix.) Zaccheus is represented in the "fig or sycamore tree" behind the Lord, as if to call attention to the beginning of His last journey at Jericho. In the last example the sycamore and palm branches are carefully and well cut. In i. tav. 40, garments are being strewn before the Lord (as in the others). See also vol. ii. tav. 88, 89; iii. tav. 143. In one instance, without Zaccheus, the colt accompanies the ass (iii. 134). The small stature of Zaccheus is often dwelt on. Or the figure may represent a person in the act of cutting down branches. [R. Sr. J. T.]

ENVY—HOW CENSURED. Envy was always reckoned a diabolical sin, and one of the first magnitude (Chrys. Hom. 41 in Matth.; Cyprian, De Zelō et Livore, p. 223); but there are no distinctive penalties attached to it, inasmuch as before it could bring a man under public discipline, it required to be displayed in some outward and vicious action, which received its appropriate punishment (Bingham, Ant. 16, 14, 1; Thom. Aq. Summa 2, 2, qu. 36). [I. B.]

EPACT, ἐπακτα, sc. ἡμέρας; Lat. epactæ; in Mediaeval writers, adjectiones Lunæ; the number of days required to make up the lunar year to the solar;—and so the numeral of the moon's age on the 1st January. Or we may say, with Senliger, on the 1st March, which comes to the same thing, and has the advantage of escaping the ambiguity of Leap year. In the Easter canon of Dionysius Exiguus, the epact meant the numeral of the moon's age on the 22nd March.

The old Latin cycles of 84 years, of which we have an example in Heiler, ii. 240, indicated Easter by means of the epacts of the 1st January, and the day of the week on which the 1st January fell.

The method of determining the months (lunar), was as follows. For the first month of the year that month was taken, whose age was expressed by the epact. The day of December on which it commenced is found by subtracting the epact (when more than one) from thirty-three. The first month was always counted full, then hollow and full succeeded by turns, so that the last month in the year in a common lunar year was hollow, in an intercalary year full. From the last begins the new moon of the following year.

The Easter new moon being found, Easter-day was, according to the Latin rules, that Sunday which fell on or next after the 16th of the moon, not therefore later than the 22nd of the moon. The choice of the month was determined thus. New moon must not be earlier than the 5th March, and full moon not later than the 21st; the first of these rules sometimes having to give way, to save the violation of the latter.

The following rule is given for the 1st January epact, viz., multiply the Golden Number by eleven, and divide the product by thirty, the remainder is the epact. But this rule will not give the epacts mentioned above, which were constructed as we have just described—with a saltus lunae, or addition of twelve after the 19th year of the cycle, &c.

For the determination of Easter according to the Alexandrian rules, with which the later Roman rules agreed, see under EASTER.

The elaborate system of epacts afterwards devised by Illius, and Clavius, belongs to the system of the Gregorian calendar. [L. H.]

It was attended by twenty-five bishops at the joint summons of Avitus, bishop of Vienne, and Viventolus, bishop of Lyons, who presided. Forty canons on discipline are given to it in its acts; but two more, called canons of Epæon by Egbert of York, and by Gratian, are not among these. By the 4th of them, bishops priests and deacons are forbidden to keep hawks or dogs for hunting. By the 9th, no abbot may preside over two monasteries. By the 26th no altar, not of stone, may be consecrated with chrism. By the 39th slaves, taking sanctuary, that have committed heinous crimes, are only to be let off corporal punishment. Most of these regulations had previously become law elsewhere (Mansi, viii. 555 and seq.). [E. S. F.]

EPENDYTES (ἑπένδυτες). The ependytes, the "fisher's coat" of St. Peter (John xii. 7), was a kind of cloak used especially by monks, and, as the etymology would seem to indicate, worn over another garment. Thus e.g. in the Græco-Latin Glossary cited by DuRoi (s. v. epidiceen), the Greek word is rendered Isidya (leg. Isistrata or Isistia) hæc supererit. Also Augustine naturally enough speaks of ἑπένδυμα as equivalent to superincumbentium (Quest. in Jud. 41; iii. 938, ed. Gaume). Suidas also observes this distinction (ἑπένδυτον τὸ ἰσάρεον ἱμάτιον, ἑπένδυτον δὲ τὸ ἐπῶμα). It is thus surprising that some should have taken it to mean an undergarment, as e.g. the Lexicon of Zonaras (col. 788, ed. Tittmann), which defines it as τὸ ἰσάρεον ἱμάτιον, ὃς καὶ ὑποκάμισον λέγεται. Athanasius mentions this dress as worn by St. Antony (Vita S. Anton., c. 46; l. 831, ed. Bened.), and Jerome refers to it in the case of Hilarion (Vita S. Hilar. c. 4; ii. 15, ed. Vallarsi). It appears, at any rate in the east, to have been made of skins; thus the ῥησάρις of St. Antony is frequently mentioned, and Jerome describes that of Hilarion as pelliviscus. For other references to the dress, see Pseudo-Athanas, de Virginitate, c. 11 (ii. 116), and Basil of Seleucia, De vita S. Theodae, l. 62 (Patrol. Gr. lxxxv. 516).

The ependytes would appear to be the dress worn by the two figures (ADDON AND SENSEY, victims of the Decian persecution) who are being crowned by the Saviour in a fresco in the cemetery of Pontianus, on the Via Forthensis, near Rome. [See p. 8.] [R. S.]

EPIHESUS (COUNCILS OF)—(1) A.D. 197, under Polymeres its bishop, on the Easter question. His letter to Victor and the Roman church is in part preserved by Eusebius (v. 24), shewing that it had been customary there, down from the days of St. John the Apostle, to keep Easter day on the 14th of the moon (Mansi, l. 719-24). The interest of this fragment is enhanced from its having been translated by Rufinus and St. Jerome.

(2) A.D. 245, otherwise called Asiatic, against the errors of Noëtus (Mansi, l. 789-90).

(3) A.D. 431, the third general, held in the church there dedicated to St. Mary, soon after the feast of Pentecost in the month of June, to sit in judgment on Nestorius patriarch of Constantinople, who contended that while the blessed Virgin might with propriety be styled the mother of Christ, she could not and ought not to be styled the mother of God (Theotocus). In other words he looked upon Christ as a compound of two persons, as well as two natures, instead of two natures, the Divine and Human, hypostatically joined together in the single Person of the Son of God. The controversy on this point culminated in the celebrated letter addressed by St. Cyril in synod to Nestorius, ending with twelve anathemas, to which he is called

To end the dispute, the emperors Theodosius the Younger and Valentinian issued orders for the meeting of a general council, to which the letter summoning St. Cyril himself is still extant. It is dated Nov. 19, A. D. 430, and directs him to repair to Ephesus by the Feast of Pentecost ensuing. It forbids the introduction of any innovation privately till then, and directs that all the disputes that have produced so much strife shall be there settled canonically. Copies of this letter had been sent to all metropolitans. The council met accordingly for its first session June 22, as is stated in its sentence deposing Yesterly (comp. Bev. ii. 103) which was the first thing done: St. Cyril heading the list of the bishops present, as bishop of Alexandria first, and then as vice-governor of the archbishop of Rome, Celestine; Juvenal, bishop of Jerusalem came next; Memnon of Ephesus followed. About 180 were there when they commenced: 198 subscribed.

It met for its sixth session, July 22, to which what it had defined on doctrine. First received the Nicene Creed; secondly, those passages from the fathers which had been quoted in its first session; and lastly, its own definitive sentence, that no other profession of faith but that of Nicaea should be framed or propounded to any desirous of coming over to the communion of the church from Paganism, Judaism, or any heresy whatsoever. Bishops and clergy framing or propounding any other were deposed, and laymen anathematised. What induced the council "to define" this, was a case just then brought under its consideration by Charisius, steward and priest of the church of Philadelphia, shewing that two priests who had come thither from Constantiaople had been procuring subscriptions to a formula purporting to be the doctrine of the church, but in many respects heterodox. The council condemned all who approved of it. At the seventh and last session, held August 31st, on the petition of Rheginus, bishop of Constantia in Cyprus, and two of his suffragans, complaining of attempts made by the bishop of Antioch to ordain in their island, contrary to the canons and established custom, a no less stringent rule was laid down on discipline: "that no bishop may act in any province which has not always been subject to him. . . ." [BISHOP, p. 234; DOCESEK.]

In most of the Greek collections eight canons are attributed to this council; but only seven by Photius and John Scholasticus, and none at all in the Latin collections. Beveridge shews conclusively (ii. 104) that they were not in fact published as separate canons. The first six, as he points out, form part of a synodical letter addressed by the council to all bishops, presbyters, deacons, and laymen, on the defection of John of Antioch, and were caused by it; being directed against all deserters or despisers of the council, whether favourers of Nestorius, or Celestius the Pelagian, and upholding all who had been deposed by them. Where this letter should come in the acts he omits to explain. It is placed by Mansi without comment at the end of them (iv. 1469-74). Its proper place doubtless is at the end of the fifth session, to the final proceedings of which (ib.

1323) it is in effect a corollary. Then the business of the sixth session led to the "definition," since termed improperly the seventh canon; and that of the seventh session to the decree since termed with less impropriety the eighth canon. Most of the principal documents relating to this council are to be found in Mansi, iv. 577 to the end, and v. to p. 1040, too numerous to be specified. Some few more are supplied by Marius Mercator (opp. P. II. (Patrol. xviii. p. 699 and seq. ed. Migne) Cassian de Incarn. (ib. l. p. 10 and seq.) Soc. vii. 20-34. Evng. l. 2-7, with Garnier's five Diss. on Theodoret (Patrol. lxxxiv. 89-864).

(4) A. D. 440, under Basil: reversing the appointment of Bassianus to a distant see by Memnon his own predecessor, and giving him episcopal honour and rank at home (Mansi, v. 1199-1204).

(5) A. D. 447 under Dioscorus of Alexandria, when Bassianus its bishop was deposed and Stephen appointed in his room. The council of Chalcedon, however, on considering their case, decided that neither had been canonically consecrated, Oct. 30, A. D. 451 (Mansi, vi. 493-4, and then vii. 271-94).

(6) A. D. 449, Aug. 10, under Dioscorus bishop of Alexandria, convened by the Emperor Theodosius like the last general council, and held in the same church of St. Mary where the last had been; but its acts having been reversed in the first session of the council of Chalcedon, where they are recited at length, it was designated the "robbers' meeting" (Latrocinialis, see the title to c. 9, B. I. of Evagrius) and abandoned. It was inspired throughout by the eunuch Chrysophilus, who patronised Eutyches and was hostile to Flavian. There are three letters from the emperor to Dioscorus in reference to its composition. First he was to bring with him ten of his own metropolitans, and ten other bishops distinguished for their learning and orthodoxy, but not more; others having received their summons from the emperor himself similarly. Next he was told that Theodoret had received orders not to appear there, unless invited unanimously by the council when assembled. Another letter bade him admit the archimandrite Barsumas to sit in it as representing all the eastern archimandrites. A third letter assigned him the first place in it, with the archbishops of Jerusalem and Caesarea to support him. St. Leo was likewise summoned from Rome, and sent three representatives, one of whom Julius, bishop of Puteoli, seems to have sat next after Dioscorus. Altogether 128 bishops were present, but several confessed to subscribing through others as being unable to write. Eutyches having been introduced, made profession of his faith, and complained of the treatment he had received from Flavian in the council of Constantiaople condemning him. The acts of this council, as well as of the council held five months afterwards to reconsider its sentence, were read out next; his acquittal and restoration followed. Afterwards a petition was received from some monks of his begging that his deposer might be deposed. On this the acts of the sixth session of the third general council were recited, and both Eusebius of Dorylaeum and Flavian of Constantiaople deposed, as having contravened the definition respecting the creed that was laid down there.

Flavian who was present said at once that he appealed from their sentence. Hilary, the deacon from Rome, "contradicted" it; others accepted it only through misapprehension, as they affirmed at Chalcedon on recanting. Ibas of Edessa, Theodoret of Cyrus, Domnus of Antioch, and several more, were similarly deprived of their sees, as we learn from Evagrius. Liberatus adds (Brev. 12) that great intimidation was practised by the soldiers and monks present, that Eusebius and Flavian were both given into custody, and that the latter died of the injuries which he there received (Mausi, vi. 503-8, and then 587-936). EPICLEISIS ('Επίκλησις) = "invocation," generally; but specially the invocation of the Holy Spirit to sanctify the elements displayed on the Holy Table, occurring in Eastern liturgies after the recitation of the Words of Institution.

The evidence of Irenaeus in the second, Firmilian in the third, and of Cyril of Jerusalem and Basil in the fourth century, as to the practice of the church with regard to the Epiclesis, has been already quoted [CANON OF THE LITURGY, p. 269]. To this may be added Chrysostom, Hom. In Coenae-torio (Opp. ii. 401, ed. Ben.), where is described the priest standing before the table, invoking (καλών) the Holy Spirit to descend and touch the elements.

Of the liturgical forms, we may take the Clementine (Const. Apost. viii. 12, § 17) as an early example. The priest beseeches God to send down His Holy Spirit upon the sacrifice, "that He may dect.re [or make] * (αποφύη) this bread the Body of Thy Christ, and this cup the Blood of Thy Christ, in order that they who partake of it may be confirmed in piety, obtain remission of their sins, be delivered from the devil and his deceits, be filled with the Holy Spirit, be made worthy of Thy Christ, obtain eternal life. Thou being reconciled unto them, O Lord Almighty." Compare the liturgy of St. James, c. 32.

The Epiclesis in the Byzantine liturgy (Chrys. c. 30; Daniel, Codex Lit. iv. 359, 360), after praying God to send down the Holy Spirit on the gifts and the worshippers, proceeds, "and make (ποίησον) this Bread the precious Body of Thy Christ, and that which is in this cup the precious Blood of Thy Christ, changing them (μεταβαλῶν) by Thy Holy Spirit."

* Neale (Nitraglogia, p. xv.) compares, for this sense of the word, Plato's Prolog. 349 A. See also von Drey, Ueber die Const. Ap. stul. p. 110; and Hefele, Beiträge zur Archäol. ii. 56.

St. Mark (c. 17; Dan. iv. 162) has: "Send forth . . . Thy Holy Spirit upon us, and upon these loaves, and upon these cups, that He may sanctify and consecrate (τελειώσῃ) them, as God Almighty, and may make (ποίησῃ) the bread the Body and the cup the Blood of the New Covenant, of the very Lord and God and Saviour, our Almighty King, Jesus Christ."

Several of the Mozarabic Post Secreta contain similar invocations of the Holy Spirit; for instance, that for the second Sunday after Epiphany (Neale, Eastern Ch., Introd. 499) has the following: "We thy servants beseech Thee, that thou wouldest sanctify this oblation by the permixture of Thy Holy Spirit, and wouldest conform it, with full transmutation, to the Body and Blood of our Lord Jesus Christ, that we may merit to be cleansed from the pollution of our sins by this sacrifice, whereby we know that we were redeemed."

"The Syrian churches postponed the oblation until after the invocation of the Holy Spirit; while in the Jerusalem, Alexandrian, and Constantinopolitan offices it precedes that prayer." (Neale, u.s. 500.)

The question, whether the consecration is complete without the Epiclesis, has been much debated in modern times; but for our purpose it is sufficient to observe that an Epiclesis is universal in Oriental liturgies, and common in liturgies influenced by the East, as the Mozarabic; while in liturgies of the Roman type it is altogether wanting. [C.]

EPICTETUS, and companions, martyrs at Rome, A.D. 296; commemorated Aug. 22 (Mart. Rom. Vet., Hieron., Adonis, Usuardi). [W. F. G.]

EPIGONATION (ἐπιγονάτιον; also γονάτιον, ὑπογονάτιον). This ornament, peculiar to the Eastern church, consists of a lozenge-shaped piece of some stiff material, hanging from the girdle on the right side as low as the knee, whence its name. It seems to have been at first, like the maniple in the West, merely a handkerchief, and it apparently continued in this form in the patriarchate of Antioch, as late as the 11th century (Ducange, Glossarium, s. r. ὑπογονάτιον), and in the Armenian church it has remained thus to the present day (Neale, Eastern Church, Introd. p. 311). Writers who delight in finding symbolical reasons for the use of vestments, have connected it either with the towel with which our Lord girded Himself, or more generally with the sword and Christ's victory over death; in connection with which latter idea, Psalm xlv. 3, 4, is repeated on assuming this ornament (Liturgia S. Chrysostomi; Goar, Euchologion, pp. 59, 60). The epigonation is properly part of the episcopal dress, but is allowed by the rubric in this place to be worn by other ecclesiastics of a certain rank . . . εἰ ἐστὶ πρωτοσύγκελλος τῆς μεγάλης ἐκκλησίας ἢ ἄλλος τις ἔχω ἀξιώτητά τινα (Goar, l. c., and see his note, p. 112; cf. also the rule as laid down at a much later period by Symeon Thessalonicensis in the 15th century, where the wearing of the epigonation by priests is spoken of as granted κατὰ διαρῆν ἀρχιερατικῆν; Marriott, Festivarium Christianum, p. 171). In one form given by Goar of the consecration of a bishop in the Greek church, we find a mention of this ornament as given to him immo-

Whether the consecration in the Epiclesis, has been much times; but for our purpose it is true that an Epiclesis is unnecessary, and common in liturgies of the East, as the Mozarabic; and of the Roman type it is altered. [C.]

AN (Ἐπιφάνιος; also γέννησις). This ornament, peculiar to the Eastern Church, consists of a lozenge-shaped material, hanging from the neck, and seems to have been at first, in the West, merely a handkerchief, and recently continued in this form of Antioch, as late as the 17th century, Glossarium, s. r. ὑπόκοπος. Armenian church it has the present day (Neale, Eastern Church, p. 311). Writers who delight in tracing the reasons for the use of the word Epiphany, connected it either with the Lord girded Himself, or with the sword and Christ's baptism; in connection with which (xiv. 3, 4), it is repeated on the monument (Litturgia S. Cyrilli, p. 59, 60). The very part of the episcopal rubric in this place is derived from the ecclesiastical of a certain Greek ecclesiastic of the 12th century, and at a much later period by the Council of Trent in the 15th century, of the epignation by priests appointed κατά δωρεάν ἀρχιεπισκόπου Christianorum, p. 171). By the Council of the consecration of the Greek church, we find a rubric which seems to have been inserted as given to him immodiately after a declaration of his faith and the subsequent benediction by the presiding bishop (Gear, p. 310). [R. S.]

EPILEPTICS. The 11th council of Toledo (A.D. 675), after mentioning the case of those possessed with demons [DEMONIACS], who are excluded altogether from the service of the altar, speaks separately (c. 13) of the case of those who sometimes fall to the earth from bodily disease, who are excluded from ministering until they can show that they have passed a whole year without such attacks; and desires (c. 14) that persons liable to such attacks should (if possible) not be left alone in the performance of divine offices. These provisions clearly refer to the case of those who are afflicted with epilepsy or (to use the old English name) "falling sickness." [C.]

EPIPHANY, FESTIVAL OF (ἡ ἐπιφάνια, τὰ ἐπιφάνια, ἡ θεοφάνεια, τὰ θεοφάνια; τὰ φῶτα, ἡμέρα τῶν φῶτων, τὰ ἅγια φῶτα τῶν ἐπιφάνων; τὰ φαγιφάνια—Ἐπιφάνια, Theophania, Apparitio, Manifestatio, Acceditio, festum trium regum (magorum, sapientum), festum stellae; dies benedictus; festum lavandi; Bethphani, dies in die virtutum Domini. The names of this festival in European languages are mainly either (1) as in the case of those of Latin derivation and others, mere reproductions of the Latin name or renderings of it; or (2) refer to the manifestation to the Magi as the three kings, as the Dutch Drie-konigen-dag, the Danish Helligtre-koningsdag, and an equivalent form in Breton; also the Welsh Ystyll, if, as is not improbable, it is a corruption of the Latin stella; or (3) indicate it as the final day of the Christmas festival, as in the familiar English Twelfth-day, the old German der Zwelfte, Dreizehnde, or the Swedish Trettondag).

1. History of Festival.—It has already been shown in a previous article [CHRISTMAS] that the festival of the Epiphany was originally viewed in the Eastern church as a commemoration of our Saviour's manifestation to the world in a wide sense; including, that is, His Nativity, or His manifestation in the flesh, together with the manifestation of the Trinity at His baptism. In the Western church, on the other hand, so far as the matter can be traced back, the Nativity appears to have been always celebrated as a separate festival, and in their commemoration of the Epiphany it is the manifestation to the Magi that is mostly dwelt on; and further, Christ's manifestation in yet another sense is associated with these, His Divine power and goodness, as shown in His miracles; primarily the turning of water into wine at Cana of Galilee, and sometimes the feeding of the five thousand. Thus there are, besides the Nativity itself, three manifestations commemorated, variously dwelt on and variously combined in different branches of the church.

In the Eastern church till nearly the end of the 4th century, we find, as has been said, a combined celebration of Christ's Nativity and Baptism on January 6. The date of the severance of the two can be approximately fixed, for Chrysostom refers to it as a matter of merely a few years' standing, in a sermon probably delivered on the Christmas day of 386 A.D. How far back we are to refer the origin of this twofold festival it is not easy to determine, the earliest mention of any kind being the allusion by Clement of Alexandria to the annual commemoration of Christ's baptism by the Basilidians (Stromata, lib. i. c. 21). At any rate by the latter part of the 4th century the Epiphany had become one of the most important and venerable festivals in the Eastern church.

It may not unreasonably be assumed that the festival of the Epiphany first took its rise in the east and then passed into the west. This may be argued (1) from the comparatively very early date at which we find a trace of it in the east; (2) from the Greek name by which the Western church as well as the Eastern knows it, while Christmas is designated there by a Latin name; (3) from the nature of the earliest allusions to the existence of a festival of the Epiphany in the west. These it may be well to state somewhat fully.

The earliest instance of all is the reference by Ammianus Marcellinus to the emperor Julian's visit when at Vienne in Gaul to a church, "terrarum die quem celebrantes mense Januario Christiani Epiphania dicitant" (lib. xxi. c. 2); and we find Zonaras, apparently alluding to the same event, speak of it as happening τῆς γενεθλίου Σωτήρος ἡμέρας ἐφεστηκυίας (Annal. xiii. 11). Now if it is remembered that this took place in Gaul, where the church had close affinities with the east, we are perhaps not claiming too much in assuming that the Gallican church at this time celebrated Epiphany and Nativity together on January 6; and we shall subsequently find a confirmation of this view from an ex-

* In a passage in one of the spurious sermons once wrongly ascribed to Chrysostom is a mention of the Epiphany as celebrated on the 13th day of the 4th month, κατά Ἀσιανοῦς (1 pp. vol. vii. App. p. 275). It is not stated who these Asiae were, but the explanation of the reckoning may probably be found in a comparison with that given by Epiphanius (Haer. ii. 24).

† Neander (Church History, i. 316, trans. Rose) considers it probable that this Gnostic sect derived the practice from the Judaean-Christian churches in Palestine.

‡ Besides the instances given above, an early allusion to the Epiphany is found in the Acta of Philip, bishop of Hieracia (in Ruinart's Acta Primorum Martyrum), who suffered early in the 4th century. It would be unsafe, however, to argue from a passage in a document itself of doubtful date.

mination of the Gallican liturgy, where it is rather the manifestation at the Baptism than that to the Magi that is dwelt on. Again we find a mention of the emperor Valens, in the course of his futile attempt to overawe Basil of Caesarea, entering the church in that place with a great train on the festival of the Epiphany (Greg. Naz. Orat. xliii. 52). Another early allusion may be mentioned: Augustine (Serm. eccl. § 2; vol. v. 1328, ed. Gaonic) speaks of the Donatists as refusing to join in the celebration of the Epiphany, "quia nec unitatem amant, nec orientali ecclesie . . . communicant," obviously pointing to an eastern origin of the festival. We may take this opportunity of remarking that there is no mention of the Epiphany in the Calendar of Bucerius, but in the Cal. Carthaginense we find viii. Id. Jan. Sanctum Epiphani (Patrol. xiii. 1227).

On these grounds we think it probable that while on the one hand the Eastern church, at first commemorating Nativity and Epiphany as one festival, afterwards in compliance with western, or perhaps, more strictly speaking, Roman, usage, fixed the former on a separate day; so too, the Western church, at first celebrating the Nativity alone, afterwards brought in from the east the further commemoration of the Epiphany, but with the special reference somewhat altered. For the early history of the Epiphany in the Eastern church, and the gradual severance from it of the Nativity, we must again refer to the discussion already given [CHRISTMAS], and it may now be desirable briefly to review further historical notices, arranging them according to the special manifestation of Christ to which they mainly refer.

a. Manifestation of the Baptism.—This manifestation of our Saviour as Messiah and as God is the prevailing idea dwelt upon throughout the Eastern church, though in the Western church as a rule this commemoration has been quite secondary to the manifestation to the Magi. References are continually met with in the writings of Chrysostom and others of and after his time to this idea of the festival. Thus Chrysostom, in a homily apparently delivered on December 20, 386 A.D., and therefore after the western plan of celebrating Christmas separately had been introduced, speaks of the Nativity as in a certain sense the parent of all the other great festivals, for, to take the case of the Epiphany, had He not been born—ὄνκ ἐν Ἰβαντιοθῆ, ὅπερ ἐστὶ τὰ θεοφάνια (Hom. 6 in B. Philagoriam, c. 3; l. 497, ed. Montfaucou). So also in a homily probably delivered on the following Epiphany, 387 A.D. (Hom. de Baptismo Christi, c. 2; ii. 369). In another place (Hom. de Sancta Pentecoste, c. 1; ii. 458) he says, τοὺν πατρὸς ἡμῶν ἐστὶν ἡμεῶν (i. e. in the order of the year) τὰ Ἐπιφάνια, where Montfaucou (Monitum in Hom.) gives the probable explanation that Chrysostom is speaking according to the old-fashioned way. Reference may also be made to an oration of Gregory of Nazianzum, spoken apparently on the Epiphany of 381 A.D. (Oratio 39 in Syneca Luminata, c. 1; i. 677, ed. Bened.), and to one of Gregory of Nyssa (Orat. in Bapt. Christi, iii. 577; ed. Migne).

From this view of the Epiphany it naturally became one of the three great seasons for baptism, and on this day was the solemn consecration of water for the rite (infra). Hence the origin of the names for the day, τὰ φῶτα, ἡμέρα τῶν φῶτων, referring to the spiritual illumination of baptism. It is needless to say that to explain the name by a reference to the free employment of lighted candles in the solemnities of the day in the Greek church, is a simple inversion of cause and effect. For the strange mistake of some writers who have supposed that "the day of lights" is to be interpreted of Candlemas day, see Suicer's Theaurus (s. v. φῶς, § 12) and Bingham's Antiq. Vices (xx. 4, 7).

In the west also, this manifestation of Christ, though not the one most dwelt on, is still occasionally referred to, as by Maximus Taurinensis (Hom. 22, 23, 29, 32, 33, &c., where see the prefatory remarks in the Roman edition), and Jerome, "quintam autem diem mensis adiungit, ut significet baptismum, in quo aperti sunt Christo caeli, et Epiphaniarum dies hucusque venerabilis est, non ut quidam putant, Natalis in carne, tunc enim absconditus est et non apparuit" (Hom. in Ezech., lib. i. c. 1, v. 3; v. 6, ed. Vallars). To the allusions in the Gallican liturgy already mentioned we shall again refer, and it will be remembered that our own church makes the Baptism of our Lord the subject for the second lesson on the evening of the Epiphany.

Further, the association of this day with the administration of baptism occurred also in the west, for we find Himerius, a bishop of Tarraco, in Spain, complaining to pope Damasus (ob. 384 A.D.) of the practice of baptizing on the Epiphany; and the latter having died, his successor, Siricius (ob. 389 A.D.), enters his prohibition against it and restricts baptism as a rule to Easter and Pentecost (Epist. l. ad Himerium Tarracensem Episc. symm., c. 2; Patrol. xiii. 1134); and somewhat later, Leo I. speaks of it as "irrationabilis novitas" (Epist. 16, ad Sicirium episcopum, c. 1; i. 715, ed. Ballerini). The same prohibition was laid down at a still later period (517 A.D.) by the Spanish council of Gerunda (can. 4; Labbe iv. 1568). See also Coder veterum can. Eccl. Hispaniae, lib. iv., tit. 28 in Cajetan Cenni's De antiqua Eccl. Hisp. i., xviii., where reference is made to Leo's injunctions. Further, Victor Vitensis alludes to this as the practice in the African church (de persecutioe Vandulicis, lib. ii. c. 17; Patrol. lviii. 216). See also Pamelius's note to Tertullian's de Baptismo, c. 19.

b. Manifestation to the Magi.—It has been on this idea that the Western church has specially dwelt, with the exceptions mentioned above; but even in these, save perhaps in the Gallican liturgy, the manifestations at the Baptism and at Cana of Galilee are brought in as subsidiary to the main topic. Hence has arisen one common western name for the day, festum trium regum, in accordance with the legend by which the wise Magi of the east became exalted into kings and their number restricted to three. We shall speak briefly hereafter of the origin and growth of this wide-spread legend (below, § 3). We have numerous homilies of the Latin fathers, dwelling mainly, or exclusively (as c. g. eight by Leo I.), on this aspect of the day.

γ. Manifestation at the Marriage in Cana of Galilee.—The manifestation of Christ's Divine power by His first miracle of turning the water into wine is not infrequently dwelt on in decu-the rite (infra). Hence the for the day, τὰ φάρα, ἡμέρα to the spiritual illumination is needless to say that a reference to the five candles in the solemnities of the church, is a simple inference. For the strange mirrors who have supposed that "is to be interpreted of Suicer's Theaurus (s. v. Ann's Antiq. Vies (xx. 4, 7). This manifestation of Christ, most dwell on, is still common, as by Maximus Taurinensis 2, 33, &c., where see the pre-Roman edition), and Jerome, mensis adjungit, ut signum aperti sunt Christo caeli, et hucusque venerabilis est, ant, Natalis in carne, tunc et non apparuit" (Hom. 1, v. 3; v. 6, ed. Vallarsi). The Gallican liturgy already again refer, and it will be our own church makes the the subject for the second of the Epiphany. The occasion of this day with the baptism occurred also in the merius, a bishop of Tarraco, to pope Damasus (no. 384) of baptizing on the Epiphany having died, his successor, (s. v.), enters his prohibition priests baptism as a rite to st. (Epist. 1. ad Himerium capitulum, c. 2; Patrol. xiii. at later, Leo I. speaks of it (Epist. 16, ad Sicivium, 5, ed. Ballerini). The same down at a still later period Spanish council of Gerona (Missionale, lib. iv., tit. 26 in Antiqua Eccl. Hisp. i., xviii., made to Leo's injunctious, sens alludes to this as the can church (de prescentine 17; Patrol. lviii. 216). See to Tertullian de Baptismo to the Magi.—It has been on eastern church has specially mentioned above; but perhaps in the Gallican manifestations at the Baptism and are brought in as subsidiary. Hence has arisen one common for the day, festum triana with the legend by which he east became exalted into ber restricted to three. We hereafter of the origin and spread legend (below, § 3), homilies of the Latin fathers, exclusively (as e. g. eight by of the day. at the Marriage in Cana of vation of Christ's Divine miracle of turning the water frequently dwell on in documents of the Western church. Thus Maximus Taurinensis, to whom we have already referred, associates this with the two previous manifestations. See e. g. Hom. 29, "ferunt enim hodie Christum Dominum nostrum vel stella duce a gantibus adoratum, vel invitatum ad nuptias aquas in vino vertisse, vel suscepto a Joanne baptisate consecrasse fluenta Jordanis." Hence he speaks of the day as victu um (Domini) not ulis. From this cause comes the later name Bethphani (see Ducauge, s. v.). Cf. also Gregory of Tours (de miraculis S. Martini, ii. 29).

We find in the Eastern church too traces of an association of the miracle at Cana with this season, for Epiphanius (Haeresis li. c. 30; i. 451, ed. Petavius) speaks of it as happening about Tybi 11 (= Jan. 6), and adds, doubtless in perfect good faith, that sundry fountains and rivers (e. g. the Nile) were changed into wine on the anniversary of the miracle.

3. Manifestation at the Feeding of the Five Thousand.—Less frequently met with than any of the preceding is the commemoration of the above act of miraculous feeding, which may be specially associated with the one preceding. Under this point of view the day was known as παρεσφάνα. We have mentioned below a reference to this in the Gallican use.

The first three of these manifestations are all referred to by Isidore of Seville (de off. eccl. ii. 24), and the Ordo Romanus also adds the fourth. We may also mention here a passage in a sermon once attributed to Augustine, but palpably not his, in which all the four manifestations are alluded to (Serm. 136 in Appnd.; v. 2702, ed. Gambe).

For the special association of the festival of the Innocents with that of the Epiphany reference may be made to the article on the former.

Before we proceed to speak briefly of the various liturgical forms for this day, we may remark that it was usual to give notice on the Epiphany of the day on which the Easter of the ensuing year would fall. Letters were sent about this time by metropolitans to their provincial bishops (epistolae Paschales, heortasticae), in which at the end of a discourse of a more general kind was given the requisite information. An allusion to the existence of this practice in Egypt is found in Cassian, "intra Aegypti regionem mos iste antiqua traditione servatur, ut peracto Epiphaniarum die . . . epistolae pontificis Alexandrini per universas dirigantur ecclesias, quibus initium Quadragesimae et dies Paschae . . . significantur" (vol. x. 2; Patrol. xlix. 820). Instances of such letters are those by Dionysius of Alexandria (referred to by Eusebius, Hist. Eccles. vii. 20), Athanasius (fragments of whose once numerous series were first brought to light in a Syriac version by Mai, Nova Bibliotheca Patrum, vi. 1-168), Theophilus of Alexandria (three of which were translated into Latin by Jerome, and are included among his works, Epp. 95, 68, 100, ed. Migne), and Cyril, no less than thirty of whose are still extant (vol. v. part 2, ed. Aubert); and besides these purely Egyptian examples we may further cite those of Innocent I. (Ep. 14 de ratione Paschali; Patrol. xx. 517), and Leo I. (Ep. 138 ad episcopos Gall. et Hispan. l. 1283, ed. Ballerini). We find traces of the custom as existing in Spain, but there the notice was to be given on Christmas day, according to the third council of Braga, 578 A.D. (Conc. Bracar. iii. can. 9; Labbe v. 898).

This duty is insisted on by several early councils (e. g. Conc. Arelat. l. can. 1; Conc. Carth. iii. can. 1, 41; Conc. Carth. v. can. 7; Labbe, l. 1427; ii. 1167, 1173, 1216), and we cite especially the fourth council of Orleans (541 A.D.), which after enjoining that Easter is to be kept uniformly according to the Paschal table of Victorius, adds "quae festivitas annis singulis ab episcopo Epiphaniarum die in ecclesia populis denuntietur" (Conc. Arelat. iv. can. 1; Labbe, v. 381. See also Conc. Antiskal. [578 A.D.], can. 2, op. cit. 937). The form of the announcement as given in the Ambrosian liturgy, under the Epiphany, runs thus: "Noverit claritas vestra, fratres charissimi, quod annuente Dei et Domini nostri Jesu Christi misericordia, die tali mensis talis Pascha Domini celebrabimus" (Pamolius, Liturg. Lat. ii. 314).

2. Liturgical Notices.—It need hardly be said that the festival of the Epiphany is recognised in some form or other in all liturgies both of the west and the east. The earliest form of the Roman liturgy, the Leonine, is defective for this part of the year, but it cannot be doubted that a service for the Epiphany entered into it; the more so that no less than eight homilies for this festival are found in the works of Leo. In the next form, the Gelasian, we find a mass both for the festival of the Epiphany itself, and for the vigil. Throughout the service for both days the only Manifestation of our Lord referred to is that to the Magi (Patr. Lat. lxxix. 1062).

In the Gregorian Sacramentary we find the further addition of a form for the Octave, though it should be added that both this and that for the vigil are wanting in some MSS., as the Calce Rodradi (Greg. Sac. 15), and the same remark is true for the Liber Antiphonarum (i. 660). In this last-named book the seventy-second psalm is largely used, and very probably the poetic imagery of this psalm suggested the special form of the legend of the facta trium regum (Ps. lxxii. 10). In this Sacramentary also, from which, it may be remarked, the collect for the day in our own prayer-book is derived, the reference is solely to the manifestation to the Magi; except in the solemn eucharistic benediction, where a mention of the manifestation both at the baptism and at the marriage in Cana of Galilee is added, ". . . qui super Unigenitum suum Spiritum Sanctum demonstrare voluit per columbam, eoque virtute mentes vestrae exercere ad intelligenda divinae Legis arcanam, qua in Cana Galilaeae lympha est in vinum conversa" (ib. 751), and see also the Liber Responsorialis (b. 751). The Ordo Romanus prescribes three lectures for the vigil from the prophet Isaiah (lv. ix., li. 10-lxiv. 4), as well as some homilies.

The Ambrosian liturgy contains forms for the vigil and the festival; the manifestation to the Magi is the only one dwelt on, except in the preces for the two days, in the former of which the three manifestations are alluded to, and the latter of which refers solely to the baptism, mentioning also the solemn consecration of the water; "susceperunt hodie fontes benedictionem tuam et abstulerunt maledictionem nostram" (Missae Ambros. in Pamolius' Liturg. Lat. l. 315).

We may refer next to the liturgies of the old Gallican church, and here as before we find a recognition of the festival and its vigil. In the ancient lection³ published by Mabillon (de Liturgia Gallicana, lib. ii. pp. 116, 117), the lection for the vigil introduces the reference to the Magi, while on the day itself the prophetic lection, the epistle, and the gospel, are respectively Isaiah lx. 1-16; Titus i. 11-ii. 7; Matt. iii. 13-17; Luke iii. 23; John ii. 1-11, where it will be seen that the gospel is compounded of passages from three of the evangelists (as on Good Friday it is compounded of all the four), dwelling on the baptism and the miracle at Cana of Galilee. In the so-called Gothico-Gallic Missal, we first meet with a number of different prefaces and collects for the vigil in which all the three manifestations are referred to, but that to the Magi most frequently, and also the manifestation of the Divine power in the miraculous feeding of the five thousand (lib. iii. pp. 207 sqq.). In the actual masses given for the vigil and the festival, we find that in the case of the former the baptism is referred to in the preface and the collect, the miracle of Cana in the preface, and the manifestation to the Magi in the collectio ad pacem, while the benediction, as in the Gregorian Sacramentary, embraces all three. In the latter, the baptism forms the special subject of the collectio ad pacem and the contestatio, the miracle of Cana that of the collectio post nomina, and the manifestation to the Magi that of two other prayers; while in the benediction, besides the manifestation at the baptism and at Cana, that at the feeding of the five thousand is also referred to. The same blending of references characterizes also the Gallican Sacramentary edited by Muratori (Patrol. lxxii. 471).

We pass on next to the Mozarabic or Spanish Missal. Here, as well as in the Breviary, we find a mention first of a Sunday before Epiphany, and next comes a mass "in jejuniis Epiphaniæ," that is a fast for January 1-5, a relic doubtless of the earlier state of things when the subsequent festival of the Circumcision was observed as a fast.⁴ [CIRCUMCISION.]

For the Sunday referred to, the prophetic lection, epistle, and gospel are respectively Isaiah xlix. 1-7, Heb. vi. 13-vii. 3, John i. 1-18; and for the following fast are Ecclesiasticus iv. 23-34, Numbers xxiv.-xxvi. with omissions, 1 Cor. xv. 33-30, John i. 18-34 (p. 58, ed. Leslie).

The mass for the festival itself is headed In Apparitione seu Epiphaniæ Domini nostri Jesu Christi, the title in the Breviary being In festo Apparitionis Domini. The prophetic lection, epistle, and gospel are Isaiah lx. 1-20 (with omissions), Galatians iii. 27-iv. 7, Matt. ii. In the prayers, &c., there are passing allusions to the baptism (as in the Officium, Rom. vi. 3) and the miracle in Cana of Galilee, but, as in the various Roman liturgies, it is the manifestation to the Magi that is mainly referred to. In one passage of the mass (p. 63), as well as in the Breviary, is an allusion to a name of the festival evidently in use among the Visigoths in Spain, acceptio, an obvious reference to Christ's acceptance of the first fruits of the Gentiles. We may take this opportunity of remarking that in Spain the Visigoth law enjoined a total cessation of legal business on this festival (Codex leg. Visigoth. lib. ii. tit. 1, lex 11; lib. xii. tit. 3, lex 6; in Hispania Illustrata, iii. 863, 1004; ed. Frankfurt, 1606. See also Cod. Justin. lib. iii. tit. 12, lex 7), and the Code of Theodosius forbade the public games on this day (Cod. Theodos. lib. xv. tit. 5, lex 5 [where there is no allusion to Christ's baptism], v. 353, ed. Gothofredus, whose note see in loc.). It may be added that the Apostolic Constitutions (viii. 33) enjoins upon masters the duty of giving their servants rest on the Epiphany, in memory of the great events commemorated. For additional remarks as to the vigil of the Epiphany, reference may be made to those on the vigil of the Nativity. [CHRISTMAS.]

The practice of the Greek church of making the Epiphany one of the solemn seasons for baptism and of the holding a special consecration of the water has been already referred to. The prophetic lection, epistle, and gospel for this latter rite are respectively Isaiah xxxv. lv., xii. 3-8; 1 Cor. x. 1-4, Mark i. 9-11 (Goar, Euchologion, pp. 453 sqq., and see his remarks, p. 467); the epistle and gospel at the liturgy are respectively Titus ii. 11-14, iii. 4-7, and Matt. iii. 13-17.

We find this practice of consecrating the water, which was done at night, alluded to by Chrysostom (supra, ii. 369), who speaks of people taking home with them some of the consecrated water and of their finding it to keep good for a year, or even three years. This nocturnal ceremony of consecrating the water is referred by Theodorus Lector to Peter Gnapheus, who pointed out την ἐπι τῶν ὕδατων ἐν τοῖς θεοφάνειοις ἐν τῇ ἐσπέρῃ γίνεσθαι (lib. ii. p. 566; ed. Valesius; and see also Cedrenus, Hist. Comp. i. 530, ed. Bekker; and Nicephorus Callist., Hist. Eccles. xv. 28; ii. 634, ed. Ducaeus). It is however justly remarked by Valesius (not. in loc. p. 169) and Goar (Euchologion, p. 467), that since we find Chrysostom at an earlier period alluding to this practice as a familiar one, all that Peter Gnapheus can have done must have been to transfer the consecration from midnight to evening. (For remarks on the ceremony at a later period, see Georgius Codinus, de off. c. viii. [c. vi.], and refer to Gretser's and Goar's observations, pp. 303 sqq. ed. Bekker. See also Neale, Eastern Church, Introd. p. 754, for remarks as to the superstitious ideas connected with this water in Russia at the present day.)

Gregory of Tours mentions that on this day those who lived near the Jordan bathed in the river in memory of Christ's baptism and of their cleansing through him (De gloria martyrum, i. 88).

Two miscellaneous notices may be added here as illustrative of the ideas with which the festival was viewed. Chrysostom censures those who communicating on the Epiphany did so because it was the custom rather than after due consideration (Hom. iii. in Eph.; xi. 25, ed. Gaume); and we learn from a decree of Gelasius that the consecration of virgins took place especially on this day (Epist. 9 ad episc. Lucaniae, c. 12; Patrol. lix. 62).

3. Legend of the Three Kings.—We have already alluded in passing to the title of festum trium regum given in the Western church to the festival of the Epiphany, viewed as a commemoration of the visit of the three Magi to the infant Saviour. Whence then has tradition invested them with royalty, and why has their number been fixed as three? The idea that the Magi were kings, probably first suggested by an arbitrary interpretation of Psalm lxxii. 10 and similar passages, was early believed in. Thus Tertullian, after alluding to the above-mentioned Psalm, adds: "Nam et Magos reges fere habuit Oriens" (ado. Juliano, c. 9), though curiously enough the apocryphal Gospel of the Infancy, which gives a somewhat lengthy account of the visit of the Magi, is silent as to this point. The number three is not improbably due to the number of the recorded gifts, though early patristic writers have thought it to symbolize other special reasons. Thus some believed that under this number was implied the doctrine of the Trinity, and others saw in it an allusion to the trifold division of the human race, an idea which is also referred to in sundry early representations of the Magi. See e.g. Bede's Collectanea, if indeed the work is really his, where this point seems referred to (Patrol. xciv. 541). Not only did early tradition fix the number of the Magi, but it also assigned them names. These are variously given, but the generally received forms are Caspar, Melchior, Baltazar, which are apparently first met with in the passage of Bede referred to above. These names point, Mr. King thinks, to a Mithraic origin, from the apparent reference in their etymology to the sun (Gnostics and their Remains, pp. 50, 133).

Kings.—We have al-

Merely to fix the names, however, was not sufficient, and accordingly we find that bodies, firmly believed at the time to be those of the Magi, were brought by the empress Helena to Constantinople, where they were received with great honours. These remains were subsequently transferred to Milan through the influence of Eustorgius, bishop of that see; and in 1162 A.D. they were again removed by the emperor Frederick Barbarossa to Cologne, where they still remain, and hence has arisen the appellation by which they are so commonly known, the Three Kings of Cologne. A further discussion of this legend is beyond our present scope, and reference may be made to the 'Bible Dictionary,' s. v. MAGI, and besides the authorities there mentioned, a vast mass of information on the whole subject may be found in Crompton's Primitive Gentium seu Historia SS. trium regum majorum, Colonia, Agr. 1654.

EPISTLE. Lectures from Holy Scripture form part of every known liturgy. These lectures, as we learn from Justin Martyr, were originally taken from the Old as well as from the New Testament. The Apostolical Constitutions speak of "the reading of the Law and the Prophets, and of the Epistles, and Acts and Gospels" (Ap. Const. viii. 5; ii. 57). Tertullian mentions that the African church understood the reading of the Law and the Prophets with that of the writings of the evangelists and apostles (De Præscript. 30). St. Augustine repeatedly refers to the first of the lectures being taken from the Prophets: "primum lectioem Isaiæ prophetæ" (Serm. 45, ed. Bened. vol. v. p. 218), "lectio prima prophetica" (Serm. 47, v. 268), though, as we shall see, this was not universally the case. In comparatively early times the Old Testament lecture in many places dropt out of use on ordinary occasions, and the first Scripture lecture in the liturgy was that generally known as the Epistle. The most ancient designation was the Apostle, the lectures being almost universally taken from the writings of St. Paul. Thus we find, "Apostolum audivimus, Psalmum audivimus, Evangelium audivimus" (Aug. Serm. de Verb. Apost. 176, vol. v. p. 796), "sequitur apostolus" (Sacram. Gregor. Menard, p. 2); ἀγαγιώσκαται ἰσοτολος (Liturg. Cyrill.); "in quibusdam His, nigrum ecclesie laudes post apostolum decantantur" (Concil. Tolot. iv., A.D. 643, can. xii.; Lubbe v. 1700); "Statim post Apostolum id est post Epistolam" (Hincmar, Opusc. vii. vol. ii. p. 149); κατέργειν . . . ψαλτήριον διδάξαι με καὶ τὸν ἀπόστολον (Cyrill. Scythop. Vit. S. Sa'ae).

In all ancient Sacramentaries of the Western church the Epistle succeeds the Collect. This is not the case in the Eastern liturgies. In the liturgy of St. Chrysostom we find a PROKIMENON (προκείμενον), or short anthem preceding the Epistle as its epitome, consisting of a verse and response, generally, but not always, taken from the Psalms. Before the epistle the deacon imposed silence (ἠπαύσωτες, attendamus), "not," observes St. Chrysostom, "as doing honour to the reader but to Him who speaks to all through Him." Homil. lvi., l. 2 Thess. After the Epistle is read, the priest says, "Peace be to thee," which is technically called εἰρηνεύειν τῇ ἐπιστολῇ. Instead of this "Thanks be to God" follows in the Mozarabic liturgy. In the Western church the anthem epitomizing the Epistle, taken from the Psalms, followed instead of preceding it. From being sung on the steps of the ambo, it was called the Gradual [ALLELUIA: GRADUAL]. St. Augustine frequently alludes to its position between the Epistle and Gospel, e.g. "Primum lectioem audivimus apostoli. . . deinde cantavimus psalmum. . . posthæc evangelica lectio" (Aug. Serm. de Verb. Apost. 176; Sermon. 45, ib. 49, u.s.). Neither in the Eastern nor the Western church was the Epistle always selected from the writings of the apostles. We find it sometimes taken from the Acts and the Revelation, and in the Western, but never in the Eastern church, even from the Old Testament. Several of the Oriental liturgies present more than one lection in the place of the Epistle. In the Coptic liturgy of St. Basil there is first a lection from an epistle of St. Paul, then the Catholicos, i. e. a lection from one of the Catholic epistles, then a lection from the Acts, each followed by an appropriate prayer; a psalm is then sung, and the Gospel is read (Renaudot, i. pp. 5-8). The Liturgy Communis Athiopum gives the same five lections in the same order (ib. pp. 507-510), in which they also stand in the Syrian liturgies (ib. ii. p. 68). Canons of the Coptic church ordaining these five lections—the psalm being counted as one—are given by Renaudot (ib. i. p. 203). The last lection is always the Gospel.

The origin and place of the arrangement of these Scripture lections will be more properly discussed when the early lectionaries are treated of [LECTIONARY]. Binterim carries them back as early as the 3rd century (Denkwürdigk. l. iv. 1. 228-230; 2. 323). If the ancient Lectionarium of the Roman church, known by the title of Comes [COMES], in which we find the epistles and gospels very much as they stand in the English liturgy at the present day, were really drawn up, as is asserted, by Jerome, we should have certain evidence of their arrangement at least as early as the 5th century. But the authorship of the Comes rests only on the authority of writers of the 11th and 12th centuries, and though accepted by Bona (Res. Liturg., lib. iii. c. 6, p. 624) and Binterim (u.s.), must be regarded as exceedingly questionable. The fact, however, that the same lections were employed by the fathers of the 4th and 5th centuries as the subjects of their homilies proves the very early date of their assignment to particular days (cf. the examples given by Augusti, Handbuch d. Christ. Arch. bk. vi. c. 8, vol. ii. p. 239).

* "Catholicos. Ita vocatur apud orientales Epistola Jacobi, Petri, Joannis et Judæ, quæ Catholice appellantur, quia etiam scriptæ sunt, ex quibus volumus constare quod Catholicos dicitur. Itaque cum Theodoretus laudat aliquam ex istis Epistolis sicutum dicitur Jacobus in Catholico, Petrus, &c." Renaudot, l. 210. [CATHOLIC.]

According to the Eastern ritual the Epistle was read by the Reader, standing at the Royal Doors. In the Western church it was read in the 8th century from the ambo by the subdeacon standing on the second step, the Gospel being subsequently read by the deacon from the third step. Anularius (De Offic. Eccl. lib. i. c. 11) expresses his surprise that this office is assigned to the subdeacon, since it is not mentioned in the commission at his ordination; but the 4th canon of the council of Rheims, A. D. 813, after directing that "the Apostle" should be read by the subdeacon, all sitting, adds "qualiter subdiaconal ministerium est apostolum legere" (Augusti, Adhæc.; Binterim, Denk-würdigk. Bingham, Orig.; Pena, Res. Liturg.; Martene, de Eccl. Rit.). [L. V.]

ERA. A succession of years, reckoned on some common principle from a specified event, or date, called its epoch. The terms era and epoch are frequently used as synonymous.

The Julian Period.—1. To compare dates belonging to different eras, there is no method more useful than to refer them all to the Julian period, a period introduced or revived by Scaliger. It consists of 7980 years, that number being formed by multiplying together $28 \times 19 \times 15$, the respective periods of the cycle of the sun, of the cycle of the moon, and of the indiction, the last being a period used in the administration of the Roman empire. It is the only cycle in which the solar, lunar, and indictional cycles synchronize, after the completion of 285 cycles of the sun, 420 of the moon, and 532 of the indictions. The great cycle then recurs as before. No two years in the same period agree in all the three numerals of synonymus.

1. To compare dates in different eras, there is no method of referring them: all to the Julian era introduced or revived by Julius in 780 years, that is, by multiplying together the respective periods of the cycle of the moon, and of the year, being a period used in the Roman empire. It is which the solar, lunar, and lunar, and chronize, after the completion of the sun, 420 of the moon, and the great year. No two years in the all the three numerals of the subordinate cycles, so that by naming them all, the year is completely designated.

2. The first year of the current Julian period, in which each of the subordinate cycles had the numeral one, was the year 4713 B.C., and the noon of 1st January of that year, for the meridian of Alexandria, is its chronological epoch.

The years are Julian years, i.e., of 365 days in common years, 366 in leap year, which is every fourth year, that year in fact whose date-numeral being divided by four, leaves the remainder one.

3. To find the place of any specified year of the Julian period.—Divide its numeral by the respective divisors 28, 19, 15. The respective remainders give the years in the several cycles. The remainder 0 is to be construed 28, 19, 15.

4. To determine the year of the Julian period from the numerals of the three cycles.—Multiply the numeral of the solar cycle by 4845, that of the lunar by 4200, and that of the indictio by 6916, and divide the sum of these products by 7980. The remainder is the year sought.

5. To find the day current of the Julian period of any date in the Julian period.—Subtract one from the numeral of the year-day, and divide the remainder by four, calling Q the integer quotient, R the remainder. Then will Q be the number of entire quadriennia of 1461 days each, and R the residual years, the first of which is always a leap year. Convert Q into days by taking the right multiple of 1461, and R by using the annexed table; then add the days for the current day of the given year, remembering February 29th in leap year.

Day . . .	0	366	731	1096

6. To convert a year of the Julian period into the year B.C., or A.D.—If the numeral be less than 4714, subtract it from that number, the difference will be the year B.C. If the numeral be greater than 4713, take that number from the numeral, and the difference will be the year A.D.

The Olympiads.—1. The era used in Greece, instituted in 776 B.C. (3938 J. P.) consisting of four years. July 1st A.D., is considered to correspond with the commencement of the first year of the 195th Olympiad.

2. To reduce any given year of an Olympiad to the Christian era, multiply the Olympiad immediately preceding the one in question by four, and add to the product the number of years of the given Olympiad. If before Christ, subtract the amount from 777; if after Christ, subtract 776 from the amount, and the remainder will be the beginning of the year required, commencing from July.

3. For an exact calculation of days tables are required, showing the order of the months in the different years of the Metonic cycle. These may be found in Ideler i. 386.

4. The fathers of the Greek church and the ecclesiastical historians, as Eusebius and Socrates, use the era of the Olympiads in a peculiar manner. It would have been natural to begin them with the commencement of their civil year, September 1st, or ten months too early, but they really commence them a year earlier, still, or nearly two years too early. The same reckoning is used in the Chronicon Paschale. It is necessary to add one year and ten months to their date to make them accord with the common era of the Olympiads.

Era of the Building of Rome.—Amongst the variety of dates assigned to this event, the Varroian epoch is adopted, being April 22nd, B.C. 753, or 3961, J. P. The consular year began on the 1st January.

To reduce the year of Rome, to the year before or after Christ.—If the year of Rome be less than 754, deduct its numeral from 754; the difference is the year before Christ. If the year of Rome be not less than 754, deduct 753 from it, and the remainder will be the year after Christ.

Era of the Seleucidæ.—The era of the Seleucidæ, also called the era of the Greeks, was widely used in Syria, and by the Jews from the time of the Maccabees. It is used in the book of the Maccabees. It is still used by the Arabs. Its epoch is October 1st, B.C. 312, or 4402 J. P.

Julian Reformation of the Calendar.—This took place 707 U.C., or January 1st B.C. 45, 4689 J. P.

The Christian Era.—The Christian era was first introduced by Dionysius Exiguus, a Scythian abbot in Rome, in the 6th century, and gradually superseded the era of Diocletian, which had been used till then. It was first used in France in the 7th century, but was not universally established there till the 8th century, after which time it became general. Great diversity, however, long subsisted as to the day on which the year should be considered to commence.

It commenced on the 1st day of January, in the middle of the 4th year of the 194th Olympiad, the 753rd U.C., and the 4714th of the Julian period. It is now generally acknowledged not to be the true year of the Saviour's birth, but its use as a chronological epoch does not allow of its being altered.

The era of Diocletian.—This era was prevalent till the adoption of the Christian era; its epoch was 29th August, A.D. 284. It was introduced in Egypt by Diocletian, after the siege of Alexandria, and gave the Egyptians, for the first time, the advantage of a fixed year. The first month, the beginning of the Egyptian year, was August 31st, and it is supposed that a change was made from a moveable to a fixed year, after the lapse of five years. This era is still used by the Copts. To reduce this era to the Christian era add 283 years and 240 days, and as the intercalation was made at the end of the year, in the Diocletian year next after leap year, add one day, from the 29th August to the end of the ensuing February.

The era of Constantinople.—The era of Constantinople, or the Byzantine era, first appears in the Chronicon Paschale. It fixed the creation of the world in the 5508th year before Christ, so that A.D. 1, fell in the 5509th year of this era. The Russians followed this calculation till the time of Peter the Great, having received it from the Greek church, by whom it is still used. The year began on the equinox, March 21st. It was afterwards made to begin, for civil purposes, on September 1st.

The Alexandrians had used an era of the creation, fixed at 5502 years before Christ; but in A.D. 285, they reduced the date by ten years.

To pass from the year of our Lord to the era of Constantinople, or conversely, add or subtract 5508 from January to August, and 5509 for the rest of the year.

The Jewish era.—The Jews never reckon by the year of the world, and they place the creation 3761 B.C.

By adding 952 to the numeral of the Jewish year we get its date in the Julian period; and by subtracting 952 from the year of the Julian period we get the Jewish ate.

For the Christian era we must subtract 3761, and add the same for the converse process. The Jewish year begins in the autumn.

ERENACH, or HERENACH, a term applied to a class of officials who appear prominently in the annals of the Irish church prior to its reconstitution in the 12th century, after which time the word was used to denote an ecclesiastic having a position akin to that of archdeacon.

In its earliest use the Erenach, or Airchinneach, appears to have been hereditary steward and tenant of the lands granted by temporal chiefs to the church-founding abbots of Ireland; his duties being to superintend the farmers or tenants of the church or monastery—according to Colgan, "Omnium colonorum certi districtus praepositus seu prae-fectus." ETHIOPIAN MONKS. Monasticism spread rapidly from Egypt into Ethiopia, and gained as strong a hold there as in Egypt or Syria, if not a stronger. Helyot (Histoire des Ordres Monastiques, i. xi.) speaks of all the monasteries in Ethiopia as professing to obey the so-called "Rule of Antony," but with different observances. An attempt at reformation, such as invariably recurs in the life of a monastic order, was made in the 7th century; Tecla-Haimanot, as Helyot writes, it, being the second founder or Benedict of Ethiopian monasticism. He endeavoured to consolidate the system under a Superior-General, second in ecclesiastical rank only to the Patriarch of Ethiopia, who was to visit and inspect the monasteries personally or by proxy. Several of them, however, preferred to retain their independence, like congregationalists. Monks swarmed in Ethiopia, according to Helyot, long after the first fervour of asceticism; and the constitution of the Ethiopian church was monastic (Robertson, Church Hist. i. 300). The story of a military order of monks, like the knight-templars, originating in the 4th century is purely fabulous (Helyot, u. s. l. xlii.). [I. G. S.]

EUCHARIST (Εὐχαριστία). This article treats of the use of the word Eucharistia. For the nature of the offices accompanying the sacrament, see LITURGY, and the several articles on its component parts, especially CANON OF THE LITURGY and COMMUNION, HOLY.

1. The primary meaning of the word εὐχαριστία seems to be a feeling of thankfulness or gratitude (2 Macc. ii. 27; Sirac. xxviii. 11; Acts xxiv. 3).

II. The expression of the feeling of gratitude: 1. In words = thanksgiving; 2. In act = thank-offering.

1. Εὐχαριστία, the sense of thanksgiving, occurs frequently in the New Testament; it is used for the thanksgiving in public worship (1 Cor. xiv. 16; 2 Cor. iv. 15, etc.), and for the expression of thankfulness generally.

2. Philo uses εὐχαριστία in a wider sense.

εὐχαριστία in a wider sense.

He speaks, for instance (De Victimis, c. 9), of εὐχαριστία as including hymns, prayers, and sacrifices; of τὰς διὰ θεοῦ εὐχαριστίας (Ib., c. 4); and of giving thanks (or thank-offering, εὐχαριστήρια τῆν εὐχαριστίαν) to God for the creation of the world—a phrase noteworthy as suggesting one of the aspects of the Christian eucharist (Irenæus, Hæres. iv. 18, 4). The word does not occur in the LXX, though it is used by Aquila.

III. We have to consider the application of the word εὐχαριστία to the Supper of the Lord, or the elements used in it.

1. The verb εὐχαριστέω, like the corresponding substantive, means both to feel thankfulness and to express it. The use of the word εὐχαριστήσθαι, in 2 Cor. i. 11, implies further that εὐχαριστέω might be used with an accusative of the object for which thanks are given.

The Lord in the Last Supper gave thanks after taking the Cup (θεξόμενος ποτήριον εὐχαριστήσας εἶπεν, Luke xxii. 17; λαβὼν ποτήριον καὶ εὐχαριστήσας, Matt. xxvi. 27); and before breaking the Bread (εὐχαριστήσας ἔλασεν, 1 Cor. xi. 24; Luke xxii. 19). Compare Matt. x. 36; Mark viii. 6; John vi. 11, 23. So the disciples of the 2nd century gave thanks over the Bread and the Cup in the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper, as we see from the description of it in Justin Martyr.

2. From this uttering of thanksgiving over the elements of Bread and Wine in the Sacrament, the word εὐχαριστέω came to mean, to bless, hallow, or consecrate by the utterance of the proper form of thanksgiving (Grimm, Lexicon Novi Test., s. v.). Thus Justin Martyr (Apol. i. 65) speaks of the Bread and Wine and Water which had been made eucharistic (εὐχαριστήθησας ἄρτου καὶ οἴνου καὶ ὕδατος), immediately after mentioning the thanksgiving (εὐχαριστίαν) of the president for God's mercy in granting us the blessings of creation and redemption. Ana again (c. 66), he speaks of τὴν δι' εὐχῆς λόγου τοῦ πατρὸς εὐχαριστήθεισαν τροφήν [CANON OF THE LITURGY, p. 268]. Compare "panem in quo gratiæ actus sint" (Irenæus, Hæres. iv. 18, 4).

By an easy transition the εὐχαριστήθεισα τροφή or consecrated elements came to be called simply εὐχαριστία (Ib. c. 66). Similarly in the Ignatian letter ad Smyrn. 7. Irenæus (Hæres. iv. 18, 5) says that the Bread after the EPICLESIS is no longer common bread, but eucharistia, consisting of two parts, an earthly and a heavenly.

3. But the conception of thank-offering is also found in the word eucharistia and its corresponding verb, when applied to the Sacrament of the Body and Blood of Christ. Clement of Alexandria (Strom. iv. § 132, p. 623) speaks of the martyr's blood poured out as a thank-offering (εὐχαριστήθεινός αἵματος [Dindorf's text: vulg. εὐχαρισθέντος]); and we might interpret Justin's εὐχαριστήθεισα τροφή in the same way were it not for its close connexion with εὐχαριστία, where the latter evidently means thanksgiving. In the Dialogue with Trypho (c. 117), when Justin speaks of the Christian sacrifice which takes place (he says) ἐπὶ τῆ εὐχαριστίᾳ τοῦ ἄρτου καὶ τοῦ ποτηρίου, it is evident that he regards the Bread and the Cup as being themselves made a thank-offering or eucharistia. And again, when (c. 41) he refers to the leper's offering of fine flour as a type of the eucharistic bread (τοῦ ἄρτου τῆς εὐχαριστίας) which the Lord commanded us to offer (ποιεῖν) in thanksgiving (ὡσα εὐχαριστώμενος) for the blessings of creation and redemption, he regards the elements as themselves an expression of thankfulness; i. e. as a thank-offering. When Celsum objected to the Christians that they were ungrateful in not paying due thank-offerings (χαριστήρια) to the local deities, Origen replied (c. Celsum, viii. 37; pp. 415, 416, Spencer) that the bread called eucharistia (ἄρτος εὐχαριστία καλούμενος) was the symbol or outward token of thankfulness towards God (τῆς πρὸς τὸν θεὸν εὐχαριστίας); that is, he regards the bread itself as of the nature of a thank-offering.

4. Whether the original meaning was, "that over which thanks have been given," or "that which has been made a thank-offering," the word eucharistia came to be simply equivalent to "the consecrated elements of bread and wine," or sometimes of bread alone. Thus Clement of Alexandria (Strom. i. § 5, p. 318) speaks of the ministers distributing the eucharist (τῶν εὐχαριστίαν διανεμάντες), i. e. the elements, to the communicants; and the epistle to Victor (Euseb. H. E. v. 24, § 15) of sending the eucharist to neighbouring churches. [Compare EULOGIAR,] Cyprian (Epist. xv. c. 1) explains eucharistia by the words, "id est, Sanctum Domini Corpus."

5. The eucharist (i. e. the consecrated bread) was employed in the following ways, besides that of ordinary administration. It was taken home and preserved in a casket [ANCA]; it was sent by bishops to other churches as a token of Christian brotherhood [EULOGIAR]; it was before the pope at a pontifical mass (Ordo Rom. i. c. 8; see Martene, R. A. L. iv. 2, § 2); it was reserved in churches [DOVE; RESERVATIÖN]; it was enclosed in altars at consecration [CONSECRATION OF CHURCHES]; it was carried on a journey (Ambrose De O'ia Satyr. iii. 19); Gregory the Great De Off. iii. 36; Diad. c. 37); it was sometimes worn suspended from the neck in an ENCOLPION (Giraldus Cambren. Topograph. Hibern. Dist. ii. c. 19); it was used in the cure of disease (Augustine, c. Julian. iii. 162); it was placed in the mouth of the dead [BURIAL OF THE DEAD]; and the administration of the eucharist was one of the forms of ordeal (Martene, De Rit. Antiq. l. v. 4).

IV. The Greeks interpret the εὐχαριστία of 1 Tim. ii. 1 to be hymns or canticles sung to the honour and glory of God (Daniel, Codex Liturg. iv. 406). [C.]

EUCCHARIST (IN CHRISTIAN ART). The earliest eucharistic representations, as may be expected, seem to refer principally to the agape, or suppers which preceded the actual eucharistic breaking of the bread in the earliest times (1 Cor. xi. 20.) It is to be presumed at least that the order of the Lord's Supper itself was followed, and that the celebration, or symbolic breaking of the bread, took place after, or towards the end of, the meal. (St. John xiii. 2-4.) In the earliest days of persecution they naturally began to be celebrated in the catacombs or near the tombs of martyrs. [CELLA MEMORIALIAE.] It is the business of the present writer to trace the connexion of the arrangements for public celebration of the eucharist and Christian rites in general with the ancient usages of funeral rites. But those usages were so familiar to the early church, that it is not to be wondered at that the agape at least is so frequently represented and the eucharist so distinctly implied in the various catacomb paintings. Dr. Mommsen (Contemp. Revue, May 1871, 164 and 171) mentions an agape with bread and fish in that very ancient crypt of Domitilla on the Ardeatine Way, which De Rossi refers to Flavia the granddaughter of Vespasian.* The bread and fish occur again repeatedly in the Callistine catacomb, with a man in the act of blessing the bread; seven, eight, or more baskets of bread are placed near a table at which seven persons are sitting. The table is round, and fishes are also placed on it. The use of the vine is frequent in the oldest work, as in the Domitilla vault, where boys are gathering the grapes, and the art is quite of Pagan hands. A parallel work in mosaic, of later though still very early date, exists in the church of Stn. Constantia at Rome [VINE]. (Parker, Ancient Mosaics at Rome and Ravenna.) A connexion must always have existed in the Christian mind between the last supper at Jerusalem, the bread and wine, and the last repast of the Lord with His disciples, the bread and fish by the sea of Galilee (John xxi.). And His words on the former occasion cannot have been unconnected with this discourse of Himself the bread of life in St. John vi. 58 sqq. But the earlier representations of a memorial banquet seem to point rather to the agape or commemorative repast, than to the breaking of the bread and pouring forth of the wine in commemorative sacrifice. A sense of mystery and treated by M. Raoul Rochette (Mém. de l'Institut, des Inscrip. et Belles Lettres, t. xlii. 775, &c.). They may, he thinks, account for the relics of cups and platters, knife-handles, and egg-shells [see Egg] found in the Christian sepulchres (Boidetti, lib. ii. xiv. tav. 5, 59 and 60, and passim). Though there can be no doubt, as he implies, that old Etruscan (or indeed human) custom or instinct, made survivors bury many objects used in life along with their dead.

One of the earliest known representations of the eucharistic offering is that of the mosaic in St. Vitale at Ravenna, dating from the 6th century. (See woodcut.) On one side Abel is represented as standing with hands raised in prayer, clad in cloak and short tunic, and just issued from a house; it is possible that this, with the streaked sky of the mosaic, may indicate a morning or evening sacrifice. At all events the presence of Abel connects the other figure of the priest and king Melchisedech, with the idea of the sacrifice of the lamb, and therein of the death of the Lord. Melchisedech is standing before an oblong altar-table, on which is a chalice and two loaves of bread; his hands are raised in prayer, not in the act of blessing, and he is clad in the penula or cloak over a long tunic and girdle.

awe, a pious reticence which appears for the present almost erased, in the Christian consciousness, seems to have prevented representation of the Lord's act of typical sacrifice of Himself; as representation of His actual death by crucifixion was also long delayed. [CRUCIFIX.] The subject of the agape, and the disorders to which they sometimes gave occasion, is admirably

This mosaic is an important illustration of the fundamental principle of Christian symbolic ornament, which appears to have been from the earliest times devoted, as a central object, to displaying the fulfilment of the Old Testament by the New. In the Laurentina MS., A.D. 556, our Lord is represented as administering a small rounded object, evidently bread, to one of eleven standing figures. (See woodcut.)

* This vault is mentioned in Boidetti (p. 551); it is called the Sepulchre of SS. Achilles and Nerus, the relics of those martyrs having been conveyed there. Of its date he says only, "tempo vicino agli Apostoli."

The frequent introduction of the fish in the various representations of eucharistic repasts, which are found particularly in the Callistine catacomb, is connected of course with the agrammatic meaning of the word ixôth, as well as with the miracles of the bread and fish, or the Lord's words in John vi. The occasion of the last repast by the sea of Galilee with the last supper is expressed in the words of Bede, In Joann. xli. "Piscis assus, Christus passus." It is no part of our duty to pursue it here, except in its frequent illustrations on the walls of St. Callixtus. These will be found in De Rossi's Roma Sotterranea, and the author refers them, from the beauty of their execution, to an early period of the 3rd century. It cannot be denied, however, that a certain uncertainty and suspicion of repainting attaches more particularly to this catacomb in the minds of many antiquarians. Nevertheless, if, as Mr. Parker thinks, the most extensive paintings and repaintings took place in the time of St. Pauline of Nola, a highly respectable antiquity still belongs to these subjects. We have given a woodcut [CANISTER, p. 264], of the most important of these paintings. Its subject is the mystic fish bearing loaves on his back; they are not decussated or crossed, as is most frequently the case where they are represented [ELEMENTS, p. 603], but bear a central mark, which, as Martigny thinks, connects them with Eastern and Jewish offerings of cakes made from fruits of corn (called mamphala or Syrian bread). The fish bears them in a basket, which has in it besides another object. This is supposed to represent a vessel of wine, but, as he admits, it is not very easy to decipher in the original, and the lithograph in De Rossi is somewhat of a restoration. What it is like in the actual fresco must be very difficult to determine. But his reference to St. Jerome (Ep. ad Rustic. c. xx.), "Nihil illo ditius qui corpus Domini canistro vimineo, sanguinem portat in vitro," corresponds with great exactness and very impressively with this painting. In any case there can be no doubt whatever that it represents the Lord offering the bread of life to mankind. These paintings are in the crypt named from St. Cornelia; another represents seven persons at a table with bread and fish, with seven baskets of decussated loaves at hand, referring, of course, to the Lord's miraculous reproduction of them. Without disputing that the anagrammatic fish is a symbol of the greatest antiquity for our Lord, and that it associates itself naturally in the mind with the two miracles, the repast of Tiberias, &c., it should not be forgotten that the anagram is not a scriptural emblem. Our Lord never likened Himself to fish as to bread, and His own use of the fish in parable makes them represent mankind and not Himself. Nevertheless, His act of blessing and breaking the fish on three distinct occasions must always connect them in our minds with the eucharistic banquet.^b (See woodcut.)

From the Cemetery of St. Tricilla.

Representations of other events or objects symbolic of the body of the Lord, or anyhow to be connected with Him as the bread of life, have of course a relation to the eucharist. The decussated loaves are offered to Daniel by Habbauc, on a sarcophagus found near the altar of St. Paul without the walls of Rome (Martigny, Art. Sarcophages, with woodcut), and the author refers to the custom of sending a portion of the eucharist round to imprisoned confessors in time of persecution. The manna and the rock cloven for the life of the people are naturally connected with John vi. 59. [ROCK.] The latter is frequently in bas-relief; the former appears to occur only in one unmistakable example, though those in Bottari, tav. 164, from the cemetery of St. Priscilla, and tav. 57 from the Callixtine, are probably connected with it.

The miracle of Cana has been held in art to possess an eucharistic signification, at all events since Giotto's fresco in the Arena chapel at Padua. Ruskin, in Arundel Society's account of that building. But in the earliest examples, very frequent as they are on the bas-reliefs, the Saviour does not raise his hand in the act of blessing, as the artist might be expected to represent him, had he designed to connect the miracle with the last supper. Nor is He so depicted on the tablet of the Duomo at Ravenna (Baldini In tab. eburneam. Florence, 1746), nor on the beautiful silver urceolus supposed by Blanchini (Not. in Anastas. in Vit. St. Urbani) to be of the 4th century. [CANA, MIRACLE OF.]

In treating of representations of the eucharist in Christian art, it is not necessary for our purpose to consider anything beyond their expressed meaning—that is to say, beyond the meaning which the artist or inspirer of the work distinctly meant to convey. The further ideas he may have suggested to fervent imaginations, or to minds predestined to read meanings of their own into his work, are not his or our affair, though they may often be ingenious and beautiful, and even right and true as matter of spiritual thought.

EUCHELAION (Εὐχέλαιον) is the "prayer-oil," blessed by seven priests, used in the Greek church for the unction of the sick; see SICK, VISITATION OF: UNCTION (Sulzer's Theophrastus, s. v.; Daniel's Codex Liturg., iv. 503, 606). [C.]

EUCHOLOGION. The most comprehensive and important Service-Book of the Eastern church corresponding to the Western Sacramentarius, and Liber officiorum of the Latins. In its simplest state the Euchologion includes the liturgies of Chrysostom and Basil, and that of the Presanctified, which for no very certain reason bears the name of Gregory the Great. To these are usually added the offices of administration of the other sacraments and other forms of prayer, and benedictions. It cannot be affirmed with any certainty that the present Euchologion existed previous to A. D. 800, though the Eastern church cannot fail to have had an office book, or books more or less corresponding to it. The edition of the Euchologion with learned notes by James Gear, Paris, 1645, frequently reprinted, is the standard authority on the subject. EULOGETARIA (Εὐλογητόρια) are certain antiphons occurring in the Greek Morning Office, so called from the frequent repetition in them of the words εὐλόγητος εἰ, Κύριος. (Daniel, Codex Lit. 304, 703; Neale, Eastern Church, Introd. 919.) [C.]

EULOGIAE in an eucharistic sense. (1) Eulogii was used down to the middle of the 5th century as synonymous with εὐχαριστία for the sacrament of the Lord's Supper. This signification was naturally derived from St. Paul's words, τὸ ποτήριον τῆς εὐλογίας ἢ εὐχαριστίας (1 Cor. x. 16). In commenting on this passage Chrysostom's language shows that the word was beginning to be used in this restricted sense, εὐλογία ἢ ἕνα εἶναι πάντα ἀνατίσσει τὸ τῆς εὐλογίας τοῦ Θεοῦ θυσιασθῆναι, κ. τ. λ. (Chrys. Homil. xxiv. in 1 Cor. x. 16), in which it is of constant occurrence in the writings of Cyril of Alexandria, sometimes by itself (Lit. v. c. 2 in Joann. vi. p. 260; ib. 364; Caleni ad Joann. iii. 27. p. 343, &c.); sometimes with a qualifying epithet, μυστικὴ εὐλογία (lib. Olymper. in Levit. pp. 351, 367; in Deut. p. 414; de Adorat. lib. ii. p. 80); εὐλ. πνευματικὴ (ib. lib. vi. p. 177); εὐλ. ζωοποιός (ib. lib. vii. p. 231). To this we may add "tunc eulogii, non alioquin celebratur" (Aug. Ep. 88 Cmsul. presb.).

and to foreign bishops and churches, as a symbol of Christian love and brotherhood.
It seems to be the earliest authority for this practice, which he speaks of as long established. In his letter to Victor bishop of Rome, at the end of the 2nd century, in which he entreats him not to make a difference as to the time of the celebration of Easter for branches of communion, he refers to the example of his predecessors, who, notwithstanding this difference, were in the habit of sending the eucharist to the presbyters of other dioceses who observed the Oriental rule (Iren. apud Euseb. II. E. v. 24).
With the increased reverence for the material eucharist this practice dropt into disfavour, and was distinctly forbidden by the 14th canon of the council of Laodicea, A.D.
365. This canon prohibits "the sending of the holy things into other dioceses, at the feast of Easter, by way of eulogia" (αἱς ἁγίας ἐδολογίας). Easter seems to be specially mentioned as the chief period for this interchange of pledges of communion, the prohibitions itself being general. The 32nd canon of the same council, which forbids the reception of the eulogia of heretics, which is also prohibited by the second council of Braga, A.D. 572, probably refers to the eulogia of unconverted, but blessed bread (see below).

Forbidden in the East, the practice lingered considerably longer in the West.
Sirmund, indeed, the learned Jesuit, affirms that the custom of sending the eucharist round to other churches and congregations arose subsequently to the times of Cy-rian and Tertullian, since in their writings there is no allusion to it, and all Christians who were present at divine service had the opportunity of communicating, and were bound to avail themselves of it, and that the eulogia distributed consisted of bread blessed but not consecrated (de Azymis, iv. 527 sq.). But the passages adduced cannot be satisfactorily interpreted on any other hypothesis. Suicer undoubtedly states the case correctly when he says, "Ἐδολογία istae quae mittebantur per paroecias ipsissimae erant Eucharistiae sive panis εὐχαριστικῆς, ex quo commu-nio data fuerat praesentibus, particulae, quae absentibus Presbyteris per paroecias Diocesis mittebantur. Sic enim perfecti ex eodem pane sanctificato commu-nio inter omnes illas paroecias unius diocesis institui volebant" (Theol. sub voc. ἐδολογία). After the church had been invaded by heresy, the eucharist was distributed to the orthodox presbyters by the bishop as a pledge of their adhesion to the true faith, as is shown by the ordinances relating to the fermentum of Melchisedech, A.D. 311, and Siricius, A.D. 385. The letter of Innocent I. to Decentius, c. 410, informing him of the custom of sending the "fermentum" to the presbyters of the "tituli," on Sundays as a token of communion, and expressing his disapprobation of carrying the leaven through a whole diocese, "quia nec longe portanda sunt sacramenta," illustrates the same practice [FERMENTUM]. A practice very nearly allied to this of which we have been speaking, was that which prevailed among the faithful in the first ages of the church, of carrying home themselves and transmitting to others a portion of the consecrated bread to be consumed hereafter. Thus Tertullian speaks of Christian women being accustomed "secretly before all other food" to partake of the eucharist (Tert. ad Uxor. ii. 5), and answers the objection of some against receiving the eucharist on a day of abstinence lest they should break their fast by the suggestion that they could take the body of the Lord and reserve it till the fast was over" (id. de Orat. 19). Cyrian tells of a woman who had lapsed being terrified by the sudden outburst of flame when she opened her chest [ARCA] in which "the holy thing of the Lord" (Dominus sanctum) was kept (Cyri. de Lapsis, p. 132). Satyrus, the brother of Ambrose, when fearing to be lost by shipwreck obtained "that divine sacrament of the faithful" from some of his fellow-passengers (Ambros. de Offit. Fratris, iii. 19). Gregory Nazianzen speaks of his sister Gorgonia "treasuring up with her hand the antitypes of the precious Body and Blood" (Greg. Naz. Orat. xi. p. 187).

We learn from Basil that it was the almost universal custom at Alexandria and in Egypt for the laity to have "the communion" in their houses; that solitary did the same, where there was no priest near; and that it was generally customary in times of persecution (Basil. Epist.
93). Jerome speaks of some who scrupled to receive the eucharist at church, but were not afraid to take it at home (Hieron. Epist. ad Pammach.), and of those who "carried the Lord's Body in a wicker basket and His Blood in a glass vessel" (id. Epist. ad Rusticum, 95). But universal as this practice seems to have been, its natural tendency to degenerate into irreverence and superstition gave rise to evils which led the church to discontinue and ultimately to suppress it. There is no trace of its general observance after the 4th century (Scudamore, Notitia Eucha-risticæ, p. 791).

(3) With the cessation of the practice of sending the consecrated eucharist to persons who were not present grew up as a substitute that of distributing the unconsecrated remains of the oblations among those who had not received under the name of εὐλογία, or in still later times of αντίδοσιον or substitute for the δωρον, or eucharist proper.
According to the rule laid down in the Apostolical Constitution (lib. viii. c. 31) these remains (τὰς περισσεύουσας ἐν τοῖς μυστη-καῖς ἐδολογίας), were distributed at the pleasure of the bishops or presbyters, to the clergy in proportion to their rank. The rule prescribed by Theophilus bishop of Alexandria, A.D. 385, permits
"the faithful brethren" to share them with the clergy, but prohibits a catechumen to partake of them. That the catechumens, however, in the time of Augustine partook of some kind of sacrament is plain from his words (*de Peccator.
Meritis*, ii. 20), "quod acceperunt (catechumeni) quoniam non sit corpus Christi, sanctum tamen est et sanctius quam cibus quibus alimur, quoniam sacramentum est." As the first love of the church grew cold and non-communicating attendance became common, the unconsecrated remains began to be regularly distributed among those who had not received, that they might not depart without a semblance of a blessing. The Greek names for this practice, ἐδολογία, ἀντίδορον, sufficiently indicate where it originated. The word occurs in Sozomen's account of Chrysanthus, the bishop of the Novatians at Constantinople in the 5th century, who declined to receive anything from his churches but "two loaves of the eulogiae every Lord's Day," δύο ἄρτους εὐλογιῶν (Soer. II. E. vii. 12). In the liturgies of Chrysostom and Basil the distribution of the antidoron by the priest is prescribed—μετὰ τὴν εὐχὴν ἐξέοχεναι διερῆς καὶ σπᾶς ἐν τῷ συνθεῖ τόπῳ δίδωαι τὸ ἀντιδωρον (Goar, Euchology, 85, § 190). But this is evidently an addition of late though uncertain date. Balsamon deduces it from a desire to evade the force of the threat of the second canon of Antioch against non-communicating attendance, so that even those who were not able to receive the undefiled mysteries might take the eulogia of the hallowed fragment from the hand of the celebrant. But if its original be Greek, the earliest certain notice of it is found in Latin writers, and not earlier than the 9th century. The decree of Pius I, A.D. 156 (Labbe, I. 578), which prescribes it, is an undoubted forgery, as is acknowledged by Card. Bona (Res. Liturg., lib. I. cap. 23). This decree appears nearly verbatim both in the Cypriola of Hincmar, A.D. 853, c. 7 and c. 16 (Labbe, viii. 570), and in the canons of Nantes, c. A.D. 896 (Labbe, ix. 470, canon ix.). It runs: "ut de oblationibus quae offeruntur a populo et consecrationi superfluent, vel de panibus quos deferunt fideles ad Ecclesiam, vel certe de suis, Presbyter convenientes partes incisas habeat in vase nitido et convenienti, et post missarum solemniam qui communicare non fuerint parati Eulogias omni die Dominice, et in omnibus festis exinde accipiant, quae cum benedictione prius faciat." This canon prescribes a form of prayer to be used in the benediction (c. 7). Leo IV. (847-855) also commanded that "the eulogiae be distributed to the people after the Masses on Feastsdays" (Labbe, viii. 37). We should be transgressing our assigned limits still further if we traced the custom any later.*

(4) When the custom of sending the eucharist to one another as a symbol of Christian communion had ceased among Christians, the practice arose of distributing cakes of bread, which had received a special benediction, as a token of mutual love. We have a reference to this practice in the writings of St. Gregory Nazianzen (Orat. xix. p. 306) when relating a dream of his sister Gorgonia when sick. "She thought that I . . . suddenly stood by her in the night with a basket and loaves of the purest flour, and having prayed over them and signed them as our wont is, fed her." During the disputes which succeeded the council of Ephesus, the bishops and presbyters of Cilicia and Isauria sent Eulogiae to John of Antioch, in token of communion (Baluz., Nor. Coll. Concil., 867). The writings of Paulinus, bishop of Nola, contain many notices of these eulogiae, sometimes under the name of benedictiones, which were interchanged between him and Augustine and others. The latter writes to Paulinus, "the bread we have sent will become a richer blessing, for the love of your benignity in accepting it" (Aug. Epist. xxiv.). The acceptance is returned by Paulinus. "The single loaf which we have sent to your charity, as a token of unanimity, we beg that you will bless (i.e. make a true eulogia) by accepting it" (Paulin. Epist.

* Those who wish to follow up this practice to more modern times will find the materials in Scudamore's Notitia Eucharistica, ch. xvi. § 2, pp. 774-780.

iv. p. 16). Paulinus also sends a trifid loaf to Alypius, "panem unum . . . in quo Trinitatis solitudo continetur," which he will turn into a eulogia by his kindness in receiving it, (ib. iii. p. 12). He sends five loaves to Romanianus and Licinius (ib. vii. p. 27). To Severus he sends "a Campanian loaf from his cell, as a eulogia," together with a boxwood casket, and begs him, as before, by accepting the loaf in the name of the Lord to convert it into a eulogia (ib. v. § 21, p. 30). The large number of stories in Gregory of Tours in which the expressions eulogias accipere, dare, flagitare, ministrare, petere, parligere, postulare, &c. occur, prove how common the practice was as a token of Christian communion and a symbol of episcopal benediction in the 6th century (Greg. Turon. Hist. iv. 16; v. 14, 20; x. 16; de Glor. Confes. 31). From some of these passages we learn that to drink a cup of wine, and to partake of a morsel of bread brought by him in a bishop's house was considered equivalent to receiving his benediction, (eulogia) (id. Hist. vi. 51; viii. 2). Ducauge (sub voce) affords a very large number of later references. Forms of iterum salutatorie to accompany eulogiae sent by a bishop to a king or to another bishop, and of acknowledgment, are contained in the Exemplaria of Marcellus, lib. ii. 42, 44, 45, 46.

(5) This was not the only form which eulogiae assumed. We have seen Paulinus sending a woollen box as a eulogia. The presents sent by Cyril of Alexandria to Paicheria and the ladies of the court to induce them to forward his interests in his disputes with John of Antioch and the Oriental bishops were delicately described as "blessings," "eulogiae." This use of the word is borrowed from Holy Scripture, where a gift is not unfrequently styled a blessing, in the LXX. εὐλογία; see Jud. I. 15; I Sam. xxv. 27; xx. 26; 2 Kin. v. 15; 2 Cor. ix. 8; Rom. xv. 29. We find Gregory the Great using this term of some relics of saints ("eulogus S. Marci") sent him by Eulogius, patriarch of Alexandria; and "benedictio" of a small cross [EXCOLIUM], containing some filings of the apostles' chains (Greg. Mag. Epist. lib. xiii. ep. 42). Some of Augustine's opuscula were brought to the abbot Valentinus under this title (August. Ep. 256). Even sweetmeats, nuts, and dry figs were included under this title, when blessed by the sender. Some curious stories illustrative of this custom are recorded in the Vitae Patrum. Thus some bellaria (sweetmeats) brought to the monastery where Valens was a monk by some guests and distributed by the abbot Macarius to each cell, were indignantly rejected by Valens, who beat the bearer and sent him back with the message, "Go and tell Macarius that I am as good as he. What right then has he to send me a benedictum?" (Pallad. Hist. Laus. c. 31). They were withheld from those who were under excommunication, and excommunicated bishops were forbidden to send them to others (Greg. Turon. Hist. viii. c. 20). Thus the abbot Arsenius took umbrage at some dry figs not being sent him, and regarding himself as excommunicated refused to attend divine service with his brethren until the ban was taken off (de Vit. Patr. lib. v. Migne, lxiii. p. 953). The eulogia was refused to the king Merwig, who had apostatized (Greg. Turon. Hist. v. 14). (Bingham, Orig. Eccl. iv

 The large number of stories in which the expressions lare, &c.* occur, prove how e was as a token of Christnity. The symbol of episcopal benediction these we learn that to drink a

 (6) Eulogiae in monasteries. In the Benedictine rule monks are forbidden to receive "litteras, eulogias, vel quaelibet munuscula" without the abbat's leave (Reg. Bened. c. 54, cf.
Reg. Dom. c. 53). Here probably the word is used in its widest sense, for any offering or token of esteem (Martene ad loc. citing *Reg.
 Comment.*), or, more particularly, for bread sent with a blessing. See (4) and (5) above.
 In some monasteries, e. g. that of Fulda (Mabill. Ann. O.S.B. Prief. Saec. III. vii.), eulogiae were distributed daily to the monks, who had not already received, in the refectory before their meal; in others this was done only on Sundays and holy-days (cf. Reg. Bened. Comment. c. 54). In the life of Eligius, in the 7th century, it is related that he used to beg these "eulogiae" or pieces of blessed bread from the monks of Solignac (Mabill. Ann. O.S.B. XII. xii.). When the abbes who succeeded Rade-gunde in the convent of Ste. Croix at Poitiers was accused of feasting she replied that the alleged feasting was only the partaking of the "eulogiae" (ib. VII. liii. 589 A.D.). "Eulogiae," in this sense, were sometimes given by a bishop to an excommunicated person in token of reconciliation (ib. III. l.). The other spelling, "eulo-gium," is conlemned by Menard (Conc. Regal.
Beaed. Anim. c. 61). [I. G. S.]

 EUNUCHS, not to be ordained. The feeling that one devoted to the sacred ministry should be un mutilated was strong in the ancient church.
 Hence, the council of Nicea (c. 1) enacted that if any one, being in health (ὀψαλτρων) disembered himself, after ordination, he should be deposed from the ministry, or, being a layman, he should not be admitted to Holy Orders; and in the Apostolical Canons (c. 21) the reason for such exclusion is added, viz., that the offender is a self-murderer (αὐτοφονεύτης ἕατος) and an enemy of the workmanship of God. These canons, and a later one in the 2nd council of Arles (c. 7), were aimed against that perverted notion of piety, originating in the misinterpretation of our Lord's saying (Matt. xix. 12), by which Origen, among others, was misled, and their observance was so carefully enforced in later times, that not more than one or two instances of the practice which they condemn are noticed by the historian. The case was different if a man was born a eunuch, or had suffered mutilation at the hands of persecutors.

 An instance of the former, Dorotheus, presbyter of Antioch, is mentioned by Iusebius (H. E. vii. c. 32); of the latter, Tigris, presbyter of Constantinople, is referred to both by Soerates (H. E. vi. 15) and Sozomen (H. E. vi.
 24) as the victim of a barbarian master (Bing-

. The deacon is called "Evangelist" because of reader of the gospel. Chrysostom (c. 19, p. 317, Daniel) the deacon prays the priest, "Bless, sir, the evangelist (εὐαγγελιστῆς) of the holy apostle and gospel." [C.]

EVANGELISTS. The Four Evangelists are commemorated Oct. 19 (Cal. Armen.). [C.]

EVANGELISTS, symbolic representations of. We find from Aringhi (ii. 285) that the four symbolic creatures are (as might be expected) not the original emblems of the four evangelists. The FOUR RIVERS of paradise are perhaps intended to represent the gospel, and the distinct channels of its diffusion throughout the world (Gen. ii.). These are found in some of the earliest specimens of unquestionably authentic Christian decoration, as in the Lateran cross [Cross, p. 498], where the lamb and stag are introduced. The four books or rolls are also found in early work, Champioi (V. M. i. 67 tab.; Buonarroti, xiv. 2). In some instances, as in the baptism of our Lord in the cemetery of St. Pontianus (Aringhi, 275, 2, also at end of Bottari), the animals are introduced drinking in the Jordan. In this case, either the mystic river is identified with the four rivers of paradise, and made to accompany the ornamented cross below, representing the gospel, as in the Lateran cross (see s. v.), or the cross in St. Pontianus, below the baptism-picture, represents the Lord's death and baptism thereinto. Mr. Parker gives an admirably clear photograph of the present condition of this important work, which he dates from A.D. 772. The Lateran relic is supposed to be similar to the crosses of the time of Constantine.

The adoption of the four creatures of the Apocalypse (iv. 6) as images of the evangelists, does not seem to have taken place generally, or is not recorded on Christian monuments, before the 5th century. It involves, of course, a peculiarly impressive connexion between the beginning of the visions of Ezekiel, and the unveiling of heaven to the eyes of St. John. This is unmistakable; although in the prophet's vision the living creatures were not only four in number, but each was fourfold in shape. "They four had the face of a man, and the face of a lion, on the right side; and they four had the face of an ox on the left side; they four also had the face of an eagle." While in the Apocalypse, "The first beast was like a lion, the second like a calf, the third had the face of a man, and the fourth beast was like a flying eagle." This connexion is said by Mrs. Jameson, (Sacred and Legendary Art, 79) to have been noticed as early as the 2nd century, though no representations are found till the 5th. Nor was it till long after the four creatures had been taken as prefiguring the four evangelists, that a special application was made of each symbol to each writer. This may be referred to St. Jerome on Ezekiel i. St. Matthew has the man, as beginning his gospel with the Lord's human genealogy; St. Mark the lion, as testifying the Lord's royal dignity, or as containing the terrible condemnation of unbelievers at the end of his gospel: St. Luke the ox, as he dwells on the priesthood and sacrifice of Christ; St. John the eagle, as contemplating the Lord's divine nature. Ingenuity and devotion have done their utmost on this subject for centuries with little result. An ivory diptych of the 5th century, given by Eugati (Memorie di S. Celso in fin.) is the earliest known representation of this emblem, which does not occur in the glass devices recorded by Garrucci or Buonarroti. The well-known representation of the four creature-symbols in the great mosaic of the church of St. Pudenziana at Rome, must we think be left out of reckoning altogether as an historic document. (See Mr. J. E. Parker's photographs, and the articles thereon in his Antiquities of Rome, by the author of the present paper; also Messrs. Crowe and Cavalcaselle's Early Italian Art, vol. i. chap. i.) The symbols are placed above a 7th century cross, and on close inspection of the photographs, appear to have been repaired in fresco, or by painting of some kind. The appearance of the whole mosaic in fact is that of a quantity of material of different ages, some doubtless very ancient and of great merit, combined as a whole by a painter and mosaicist of the greatest skill and power in the 16th century. However, the use of the quadruple symbols is universal, in east and west, and throughout the Christian world, in every kind of situation, and by use of all vehicles and methods. They are very frequently placed on crosses of the 7th century, about the same time as that in which the change took place from the lamb at the intersection of the limbs of the cross to the human form crucified. They occur on the cross of Velitrae, and on some ancient German crosses mentioned under CRUCIFIX, as the station cross of Plandig, &c. But the most interesting 6th century representation of them known to us is the quaintly but most grandly-conceived tetramorph of the Rabula MS., which represents the Lord at the ascension, mounting a chariot of many wings and cherubic form. It shows that the Syrian miniaturist had a most vivid imagination, and the highest power of realising his conceptions, as appears in so many parts of that extraordinary work. The wheels of the chariot, as well as the cherubic forms, connect the vision of Ezekiel with the gyllins of Lombard Church-art as at Verona. Mrs. Jameson gives a very interesting tetramorph or cherubic form bearing the evangetic symbols, from a Greek mosaic. This symbol is certainly not of the age of the earlier catacomb paintings, and occurs first with frequency in the tessellated apses and tribunes of Byzantine churches, and is of course specially worthy of note as explaining the connexion between the vision of Ezekiel and that of St. John. The four animals separately represented occur passim, both in Eastern and Western Church-work. (See Ciampini, Vet. Mon. t. tab. 48.) There are grand examples in the spandrels of the dome of Galla Placidia's chapel in Ravenna, as in St. Apollinaris in Classe, and particularly in the chapel of St. Satyrus at Milan. [For a singular specimen of Carolingian grotesques of them see MIXTURE.] (The woodcuts, p. 633, are from the latter.) The eagle given below is taken from the Evangelary of Louis le Debonnaire; but the Hours of that emperor and the MS. of St. Medard of Soissons, also contain whole page emblems of the four evangelists.

In St. Vitale at Ravenna the symbols of the evangelists accompany their sitting figures. St. Matthew has the man, St. Mark the (wingless) lion; the calf, also wingless, belongs to St. Luke, and the eagle to St. John. The nimbus is sometimes adde*l*, and sometimes the creatures bear the rolls or books of the gospel (Ciampini, V. M. II. xv.; in St. Cosmas and Damian. See also ibid. II. xxiv. for St. Apollinaris in Classe, temp. Felix IV. about 530).

There is a very strange missal painting referred to by Martigny, where the human forms of the evangelists in apostolic robes are surmounted by the heads of the creatures. This occurs also, he says, in an ancient church of Aquileia (Bartoli, Le Antichità di Aquileia, 404). Two examples are given in woodcut by Mrs. Jameson, Sacred and Legendary Art, 83. One is by Fra Angelico, and the hands, feet, and drapery of the other, which is not dated, seem too skillfully done to be of early date.

But the four creatures occur alike in bas-reliefs on altars, on sacred vessels and vestments, and even on bronze medals. See Pauciani de Caltra S. Joan. Bayl. p. 163, for a bronze coin with the man and the eagle on one side, the lion and calf on the other, lettered respectively ΝΑΘΕΟΣ (sic), ΙΟΗΑΝΝΙΣ, ΝΑΡΚ, ΛΥΚΑΣ. Nothing is known of the history of this relic. It may be supposed that where the Lord is surrounded by saints and apostles the hearers of books are intended for the evangelists, especially if they are four in number, though on the sarcophagus in Bottari cxxxi. t. only three are represented, probably St. Matthew and St. John, with St. Mark as companion and interpreter of St. Peter. Four figures in the baptistery at Ravenna holding books, and placed in niches of mosaic arabesques, are considered of doubtful meaning by Ciampini (V. M. i. tab. 72); but Martigny is perfectly satisfied that the evangelists are intended by them (Martigny, Dictionnaire s.v. Evangelistes). [R. Sr. J. T.]

EVE. [Vign.]

EVENING HYMN. In the vespers of the Eastern church, after certain fixed psalms, concluding with Ps. cxliii., expressive of intense expectation, followed by the "Entrance," so called, of the Gospels considered as ushering Christ Himself, with an exhortation to the acknowledgment and hearing of Him as there present ("Wisdom, stand up")—the Evening Hymn is appropriately sung; the triumphant "Hymn of the Evening Light," at once giving thanks for the gift of artificial light, and praising the true "Light that shineth in darkness, in Whom is Life, and the Life is the Light of men"—hence called by St. Basil ἐπιλόχως ἐξαρραστία. "Joyful Light of the holy glory of the Immortal Father, the heavenly, the holy, the blessed Jesu Christ, we having come to the Setting of the Sun and beholding the Evening light, praise God, Father, Son, and Holy Ghost. EVIOVAE is an artificial word made out of the vowels in the words "scenlorum Amen," which occur at the end of the Gloria Patri. Its object was to serve as a kind of memoria technica to enable singers to render the several Gregorian chants properly; each letter in Eviovae standing for the syllable from which it is extracted. It must be borne in mind that psalms, &c., were sung under antiphons, and that the music of the antiphon, being constructed in a particular 'mode' or 'scale,' such as Dorian, Phrygian, and the like, the chant or 'tone' (i. q. 'tune') to the psalm, being not intended to represent a full stop or close, might (and usually did) not end on the final belonging to the mode, leaving that for the concluding antiphon: thus different forms of the same mode or tone would arise, and these were called Eviovae and sometimes diferentiæ, fractiões, conclusiones, and species scenlorum. This only applies to the latter half (evidence) of the chant, as in the 'mediation' (at the middle of the verse of a psalm) scarcely any variety was admitted, except such as arose from local use. Thus in the various works on the subject, and in service books, varieties of endings are to be found of greater or less antiquity. Gerbert mentions the fact that in some cases the peculiar distinctive marks of the tones had become confused, notably in the 1st and 6th; and the only possible distinction would seem to be in the assignment of accents. It does not appear however that accent, in the modern musical sense of the word, was recognised to any extent by the ancients, ACCENTS being equivalent to what we should now call inflection. [ACCENTUS ECCLESIASTICUS.] For the first few centuries of the Christian era rhythm was regulated by quantity, which gradually gave place to accent; and it seems to the writer that musical accentuation remained in a very uncertain state until the 17th century. Still the Eviovae must be regarded as containing the germ of the present accepted views respecting accent, as may be seen by comparing the following forms.

(1) Full form of the 1st tone, which is in the Dorian mode; the dominant or reciting note being a, and the final note D.

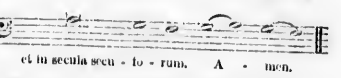

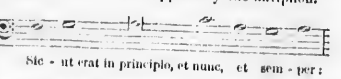

This ending would be written thus:

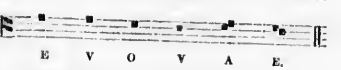

The accents are supplied by the writer. Before the invention of notes the same would be expressed thus:

a a G F G a G F E D E V O V A E

(2) A shortened form of the 1st tone, which does not end on the proper final D, leaving that correct cadence to be supplied by the antiphon.

The accents are as before, and the Eviovae thus:

(3) Sixth tone, in the Hypolydian mode; dominant a, final F.

The Eviovae would be expressed thus (accents being supplied):

Any one acquainted with music can see how nearly identical, so far as notes are concerned, these two last forms are, and that the only difference of character they can assume is by reason of different accentuation.

From the uncertainty of accent already mentioned, it will easily be seen that in different cases the same tone, and the same ending of it, would receive different accentuations according to the feeling of the compiler of the Psalter of the church in question; and this gives authority for the different versions that will be found in the modern books of Gregorian tones which are very accessible, and to which the reader is referred, as for example the following ending of the sixth tone (the one most commonly heard) compared with the one given above:

and these, which are both alleged to be the correct ending of the second tone:

It is almost needless to say that modern notation is here adopted for the sake of greater simplicity and definiteness.

The chief authority made use of here is the supplemental essay in Dyce's edition of the Book of Common Prayer, with plain tune (now rare) which gives ancient authorities, Elias Salomonis, Adam de Fulda, and the Tonale of St. Bernard, all referred to by Gerbert. Although these are of later date than the 8th century, the number of variations which they recognise, and the manner in which their recognition is made, seem to make it tolerably clear that these differences or Evovae are of much prior date to them. The view here taken by the writer receives some confirmation from the fact that a modern imitation of the word Evovae proposed by Mr. Dyce has never got into use, and is a mere curiosity, inasmuch as our means of expressing accent are more obvious.

EXACTIONES are extraordinary revenues, whether drawn from a new form of impost (census de novo impositus), or from raising the rate of an old source of revenue (augmentatio census). Such exactions were in early times condemned by the church; thus the 33rd canon of the third council of Toledo (A.D. 589) and the fifth of the sixteenth (A.D. 693) forbade bishops to levy exactions upon their dioceses;

EXAMINATION FOR ORDERS

pope Leo IV. (A.D. 853) also stigmatized as "exactiones illicitae" any demands for supplies made by bishops "ultra statuta patrum." Similar decrees were also made by later authorities. It is laid down by canonists that an "exaction" must have manifest justification (manifesta et rationabilis causa) and be limited to the sum absolutely necessary to be raised (moderatum auxilium). EXAFOTI. The Liber Pontif. tells us (p. 250, n. ed. Muratori), that Benedict III. The same authority speaks of a corona of sixteen lights, "canistum exenecadefotii" (εξαδεκαφωτου) (Ducange, s. v.) [C.]

EXAPOSTELARIA (Ἐξαποστειλάρια) are TROPARIA, which probably received their name from the fact that the word εξαποστειλον frequently occurred in them, as they were mainly supplications to God to send forth His Holy Spirit upon the worshippers. When other subjects were introduced into them another etymology was imagined, that the word "exaposteliarion" referred to the "sending forth" of God's servants into the world to preach the gospel.

EXALTATION OF THE CROSS.

[CROSS, EXALTATION OF THE.]

EXAMINATION OF COMMUNICANTS. [COMMUNION, HOLY, p. 417.]

EXAMINATION FOR ORDERS. It appears always to have been the intention of the church that there should be a careful examination into the fitness of candidates for orders. As regarded their moral character, this was in some degree provided for by the public testimony of the people at the time of ordination [ELECTION OF CLEERGY]. So it is said that when Alexander Severus was about to appoint any governors of provinces or other officials, he ordered that public enquiry should be made into their character, adding that this was the custom both of Jews and Christians in the selection of their priests (Ael. Lamprid. Vita Alex. Sev. c. 45). In some cases, as in that of Augustine (Posid. Vita Aug. t. c. 4), it appears that this may have supplied the place of any further examination. The third council of Carthage (c. 22), decreed that a candidate for ordination must be approved either by the testimony of the people or the examination of the bishop. But in general the duty of examination appears to have rested with the bishop. Chrysostom (περὶ ἱερωσύνης iv. 2, § 376), speaks of the duty of the ordaining bishop to make of these diligent enquiry into the characters of those presented to him by the electors. The 6th canon of Theophilus, archbishop of Alexandria (Balsamon, ii. 170), provides that when the candidates have been selected by the clergy, the bishop shall examine them. Basil how-

The third canon eered that a candidate approved either by the e or the examination of neral the duty of exami- rsted with the bishop. ons iv. 2, § 376), speaks naining bishop to make the characters of these the electors. The 6th archdeacon of Alexandria provides that when the selected by the clergy, nize them. Basil howeror (Ep. 181), speaks of an examination con- ducted by presbyters and deacons, and then referred to the chorepiscopl. The canon too of Theophilus, already quoted, mentions the orthodox clergy of the district as having the right of examination in certain cases. Thomas- sia (Vet. et Nov. Eccl. Discip. ii. 1, c. 32, § 11-12), thinks it probable that the task of examining candidates was delegated in the first place to the cathedral clergy, and afterwards, in the provinces, to the priests and deacons.

The examination in these cases appears to have been chiefly an enquiry into the moral charac- ter and general fitness of the candidates. The fourth council of Carthage (c. 1), directs that every bishop should be examined before ordina- tion, as to his personal qualities, such as prudence, morality, and learning, both profane and sacred, and also as to his holding the right faith as contained in the creeds. It is not said by whom the examination was to be conducted. The council of Narbonne (c. 11), forbids any bishop to ordain either a priest or deacon who is utterly unlearned. This appears to imply a previous examination into literary as well as moral qualifications. [P. O.]

EXARCH. Generically the word Εξαρχος is applied to any one who takes the lead. Hence it is used of one who is chief in any department or undertaking. So Plutarch in his life of Numa has Εξαρχος των ιερων in the sense of sacrorum princeps, or summus pontifex.^a In its specific ecclesiastical application it has more than one sense.

1. It is perhaps most commonly and most strictly applied to the great prelates who pre- sided over the "dioceses" (Διακείσεις, see Dio- cese), as they were called, which were formed in imitation of the civil dioceses of Constantine. Each of these "dioceses" comprehended several "provinces" (επαρχια), and the metropolitans of these latter were subordinated to the exarchs of the former. The 9th and 17th canons of the council of Chalcedon recognise, or give,^b a right of appeal from the decision of the metropolitan to the exarch. The word therefore became nearly synonymous with patriarch. Accordingly, in the Novels of Justinian, when imperial sanction is given to the principle expressed in the canons of Chalcedon, the word exarch is turned into patriarch.^c Yet though every patriarch had the power of an exarch, every exarch was not, properly speaking, a patriarch, the latter name being given only to the heads of the more eminent dioceses. Thus in the 'Notitia' given in Bingham, hook ix. ch. 1, § 6, which seems to represent the state of things at the end of the 4th century, we find the patriarchs of Antioch and Alexandria, but the exarchs of Asia, Pontus, Thrace, Macedonia, Dacia, and others.^d [NOTITIA.]

^b "Præter omnes exarchi hæc potestatem ante hoc concilium excuserunt necno, incertum est: Hoc tamen certum, eam ab hoc concilio illis primò confirmatam esse."
Beveridge, Pandect. Annot. in Canon. Concil. Chæc. p. 115.
^c "Ni vero contra metropolitani talls aditus fiat ab exærho, out clerico, aut alia quâ-umque personâ, diocesis illius beatissimus patriarcha simili iudicio causam judicet."
—Novel 123, c. 22.
^d Beveridge thinks that Balsamon and Mortnus are in

Subsequently Constantinople absorbed Pontus, Asia, and Thrace, becoming a patriarchate. (See Neale, Holy East. Church, General Introduction.)

2. The word is also sometimes used in refer- ence to metropolitans. For we find the phrase exarch of the province (εξαρχος της επαρχιας) as well as exarch of the diocese (εξαρχος της δια- κείσεως). It is used, for instance, in the 6th canon of the council of Sardica, where the sense seems beyond doubt.^e But the word is here probably used in its general sense of chief, rather than in any technical signification.

3. In later times the name exarch was also applied to certain legates of the patriarch of Constantinople, who appear to have been charged by him with the general maintenance of his rights and authority, and also entrusted with the visitation of monasteries subject to him. The name is also given to ecclesiastics deputed by him to collect the tribute payable by him to the Turkish government. These legates ap- pear to have had large powers, and might even excommunicate, depose, or absolve in the name of the patriarch. (See Beveridge, Pandectæ Canonum, Annotations on the Canons of Chalcedon, pp. 120, 121.)

EXCAECATIO. To deprive of sight was not a mode of punishment sanctioned by the Benedictine rules. But in the 8th century some abbats had recourse to this barbarity in the case of contumacious monks. It was forbidden by Charles the Great (Capitul. A.D. 789, c. 16) and by the council of Frankfort (A.D. 794, c. 18); and abbats were strictly ordered to confine themselves to the infliction of punishments prescribed in their rule (cf. Reg. Bened. Comment. c. 25; Mabillon, Ann. Ord. Bened. Saec. IV. Praef. i. 139). [I. G. S.]

EXCEPTOR. (1) The word exceptor was used in later Latinity to express the "faking-down" of a person's words. Thus Augustine (Epist. 110), "a notarius ecclesiae excipiantur quae dicimus." Hence a reporter of judicial acts and sentences—as in the case of Christian martyrs—was called exceptor. A gloss on Prudentius (apud Duange) speaks of "exceptores" who took down the dicta of the judge and the answers of the martyr. Compare NOTARY. (Duange's Gloss. s. v.; Bingham's Antiq. III. xiii. 5).

(2) The word is occasionally used as equivalent to ἀνδοχος (SHOSSOR), for which "susceptor" is more commonly employed. [C.]

EXCLUSION FROM COMMUNION.

EXCLUSIVA designates, in modern times, the right claimed by certain Roman Catholic error in speaking of a kind of metropolitan set over whole dioceses, and yet not patriarchs. May they not have meant such as the exarchs of Asia and Pontus? (See Bev. Pandect. Can. Annot. in Conc. Chal p. 121.) Valentinus (Obs. on Socrates' Hist. Eccles. lib. 3, cap. 6) calls these exarchs "minores patriarchas," and says "Patriarchae non-Interim usurpant."

The present form of this right is of course modern, and arises from the political circumstances of the age in Europe; but traces of the very decided influence exerted by princes in restraining the liberty of papal elections are found at a comparatively early date. The emperor Honorius, for instance, in the case of the double election and consecration of Eulalius and Boniface, decided (A.D. 418) in favour of Eulalius, afterwards drove him from the city, and (A.D. 419) ordered the installation of Boniface (Actuarium Symmachianum, Epist. 19-31; Baronius, an. 419, §§ 2 and 11, etc.). The same emperor, at the request of Boniface, made an ordinance that for the future, in case two candidates disputed the papal chair, neither should be pope but a fresh election should be held (Corpus Juris Canon. Dist. xvii., cc. 1 and 2; Hardouin, Concil. i. 1237). Nor was the influence of the temporal power diminished when Germans ruled in Italy. Oloacer (A.D. 483) desired that no papal election should take place without his concurrence (sine nostra consultatione), and little heed was paid by subsequent princes to the canon of a Roman synod under pope Symmachus (A.D. 502) condemning such interference of the secular arm (Hardouin, ii. 977; C. J. C. Dist. xvi., c. 1, § 7). Theodoric repented the enactment of Oloacer. On the reconquest of Italy under Justinian the confirmation of the papal election fell into the hands of the emperors, who exacted considerable sums in consideration of it, until the fee was given up by Constantine Pogonatus in the year 678 (Liber Pontif., in Apytho; C. J. C. Dist. lxiii., c. 21). Somewhat later, in the case of Benedict II. (A.D. 684) the claim to confirm the pope was also resigned by the same emperor. This, however, led to so much disorder, that it was found necessary again to invoke the co-operation of the civil power; and the fact of the necessity of the emperor's concurrence is recognised in the Liber Darnus Pontif. Rom. (c. ii. lib. 3; see also Garnier's Dissertation in his edition of the Lib. Darn.), probably of the end of the seventh or the beginning of the eighth century. The necessity for the confirmation of the emperor continued when the Frankish chiefs acquired the imperial dignity. Compare POPE. (Jacobsen in Herzog's Real-Encyclop. iv. 280.) [C.]

EXCOMMUNICATION (A'stentio, Anathema, Excommunicatio, ἀνάθεμα, ἀφορισμός). The partial or total, temporary or perpetual, exclusion of a member from the privileges of the church.

1. ORDINARY EXCOMMUNICATION.

Excommunication belongs to the class of corrective or medicinal penalties (poenae medicinales or censoerae), not to the vindictive (poenae vindictivae). Augustine (Serm. 351, c. 12), distinguishes between "prohibitio medicinalis," and "prohibitio mortalis," meaning (apparently) by the one, exclusion from the mysteries, by the other, exclusion from the church and Christian fellowship altogether. The canon law (Corpus J., c. 37, can. xxiv. qu. iii.), lays down generally that excommunication is "disciplina, non eradicatio;" the excommunicated person is capable of being restored to his privileges, upon repentance [PENITENCE].

The exclusion of peccant members from social privileges is a right inherent in all societies; it was in practice among the Jews at the Christian era, and was incorporated by our Lord into the constitution of His church. It is no part of our purpose to discuss the theological bearing of the language in which our Saviour conveyed this power (St. Matt. xviii. 15-18, xvi. 19), nor to investigate the traces which the New Testament contains of the use to which the apostles put it (Rom. xvi. 17; 2 Cor. vi. 14, 17; Gal. i. 8, 9; 2 Thess. iii. 6, 14; Tit. iii. 10; 2 John 10, 11) (See Art. Excommunication in Dict. of the Bible). It is sufficient to note that a power of cutting off offenders was conferred on the apostles as rulers of the church, and was by them made a systematic part of church government. There are however two instances of direct excommunication by St. Paul, which must be noticed in more detail, because they supplied at once the language and the model after which the church framed in subsequent ages her censures. The apostle by a formal judgment delivered the incestuous Corinthian "to Satan, for the destruction of the flesh" (1 Cor. v. 5); a sentence which cannot signify less than that the man was thrust outside the Christian fold. When St. Paul wrote his second epistle, some six or nine months later, the man on his repentance was readmitted into the church. A similar sentence, but proleptic no similar penitence, was delivered against Hymeneus and Alexander (1 Tim. i. 20). Hymeneus is mentioned in 2 Tim. ii. 17, 18, as a teacher of heresy. His case therefore formed a precedent for excommunication for heretical opinion, as that of the Corinthian for immorality. The authority for the use of the formula, ANATHEMA, (ἀνάθεμα), so common afterwards in the Penitential Canons, is to be found in 1 Cor. xvi. 22; Gal. i. 8, 9.

The proofs that the church has always claimed and exercised the power of excommunication, are everywhere patent. Fathers (e.g., Irenaeus, Haeres. iii. 3; Cyprian, De Unit. Don. c. 18; Epist. 41, c. 2; 59 cc. 1, 9, 10, 11; Basil, Epist. 61, ad Athanas.; Leo the Great, Epist. 32, ad Functum; Ambrose, Epist. 40, ad Thodo.), and councils (e.g., Can. Apost. c. 8, &c.; iv. Carth. c. 73; ii. Arles. c. 8; Trid. c. 3; Trente, cc. 15, 16, 18), all claim the power of excommunication, of greater or less severity and duration, in the case of offenders, whether against morality or against orthodoxy. The PENITENTIAL BOOKS mention numberless cases in which excommunication is the penalty. See for instance the Penitential of archbishop Theodore (Haddan and Stubbs, Councils and Documents, iii. 173).

Persons subject to Excommunication.—The power of excommunicating was held to be in some measure correlative to that of baptising; those who could admit into the church could also exclude. The unbaptised were never excommunicated, though catechumens might be, and were, put back into a lower grade, and their baptism postponed. Children were not excommunicated, nor (commonly) reigning princes or large sections of the church. With these exceptions all Christian people, men or women, might be cut off from communion with the faithful. But the sentence was invariably a personal one for personal offences; the innocent were not punished with the guilty. Such a process as laying a whole nation under an interdict for some supposed offence of the people or their rulers was not known in the early ages before the 12th century.

According to the Apostolical Constitutions (ll.
 cc. 37, 38, 39) the course of discipline was that if any offender did not voluntarily come forward and acknowledge his guilt he was to be summoned by the bishop, first in privacy, then in the presence of two or three witnesses; then if he would not yield, the case was to be told to the church, and if he was still obdurate, sentence would proceed against him. No one was to be excommunicated before he had been several times admonished, according to the apostolic injunction, "him that is an heretic, after the first or second admonition, reject." Nor could any offender be excommunicated in his absence, nor without legal conviction either by his own admission or by credible witnesses. On this safeguard against abuse of power, Van Espen quotes a passage from St. Augustine, "We cannot reject any from our communion unless they have either voluntarily confessed or been charged and convicted before some secular or ecclesiastical tribunal" (St. Aug. Serm. 351 de Poenitent.).
 One witness was not received as sufficient evidence of guilt, even though the one was a bishop. No one could incur excommunication for anything temporal; such matters were left to the civil courts, and excommunication in the early ages was a spiritual weapon, cutting off from spiritual privileges. Gregory the Great, writlag to some bishop whose name has been lost, severely rebukes him for using for his own private ends, power conferred upon him for the good of the souls of his flock (Epist. ii. 34). It was forbidden also to excommunicate for sins of infirmity and frailty, "There are some sins," says St. Ambrose (in exhort. ad Poenit.), "which may be mildly pardoned by mere supplication to God, in that petition 'forgive us our trespasses, as we forgive them that trespass against us.'" And it was necessary that the offence should be public; for it was always a maxim "De oculis non iudicat Ecclesia." So St. Cyprian, "We so far as it is committed to us to see and judge, his heart and his conscience we cannot investigate" (Cypr. Epist. 55).

It would be impossible within reasonable limits to enumerate the graver crimes for which the church cut off her unworthy members. They may in general be reduced under one of the three heads of uncleanness, idolatry, bloodshed. Upon the treatment which men guilty of these crimes should receive, many of the early controversies on discipline hinged. There were, moreover, many breaches of each of the commandments which rendered the offender subject to the highest censure of the church, which cannot be brought under this classification. Of these it will be sufficient to point out a few which were peculiar to the times, or which the opinion of the present day would deal with more leniently. The principle underlying the whole system of ecclesiastical censures, was the preservation of sound members of the Christian body from the evil example and contagion of the unsound. Hence, heresy was ever reckoned among the gravest sins. Hardly as dangerous, and hardly less rigorously punished in times of persecution, or during the barbarian invasions, was apostasy either to heathenism or to Judaism. Any tampering with idolatry was rigidly prohibited. A Christian was forbidden to be a public actor, or to be present at any theatrical representation, which commonly in that age ministered to laciviousness; or to frequent the circus, for it was regarded as an appendage of false worship, and detrimental to the majesty of God; or to use divination or astrology, for that was to put destiny in the place of divine providence; or to follow any trials, such for example as the training of gladiators, which in its nature was scandalous; or to be a talebearer, a gambler, or a vagrant. See Gregory Nyssen's canonical epistle to Letoius bishop of Melitina, which contains an elaborate classification of sins, and the penalties to be allotted to them.

Degrees of Excommunication.—Morinus distinguishes three degrees of excommunication:
 1st. All those who were guilty of lighter sins were punished by exclusion from the offering of the oblations and partaking of the communion; 2nd. Those who sinned more grievously were not only altogether shut out from partaking of the communion, but also from being present at that service, and were moreover "delivered unto Satan," i. e. to certain bodily austerities and mortifications; 3rd. Those who persisted in offending, or fell into deadly sin, were expelled alike from all share in the sacred mysteries, and from the very building of the church. (Morin. de Poenitent., lib. 4, c. 11.) Van Espen considers that there were two degrees only, one of which was called "medicinalis," the other "mortalis," (Ang. Hom.
 lib. 1), or more commonly, "Anathema" (Van Espen Jus Eccl. Pars iii. Tit. xi. c. iv.); Bingham also discovers two degrees, lesser and greater excommunication (ἀφορισμός, ἀφορισμός πανελητός). The former, which corresponds with the first two classes of Morinus, excluded offenders from the eucharist, and the prayers of the faithful, but did not exclude them from the church, for still they might stay to hear psalms and the reading of the scripture, and sermon and prayer of catechumens and penitents, and depart when the service of catechumens ended. Greater excommunication was a rejection not only from the eucharist but from any presence in church whatever, and any association with Christian men (Bingham, Antiq. lib. xvi. c. 11). There remains a still more terrible form of censure, which undoubtedly was sometimes imposed, and which was an absolute and final exclusion from the church. St. Cyprian (Epist. 55 ad Anton.) speaks of some of his predecessors who closed the door for ever against adulterers, but adds, that other bishops admitted similar offenders after a period of penitence to the grace of the church. There are various canons in the council of Elvira (circa 305 A.D.), which utterly debar offenders from communion with the faithful for the remainder of their lives, "nec in fine communionem accipere" (Con. Eliber. cc. 1, 12, 13, 71, 73). Can. 46 declares that if any persist in sin after having been already punished, he should be totally cast out, "penitus ab ecclesia ab-jiciatur." The council of Ancyra (cc. 9, 16; circa 315 A.D.) fixes a limit to the penalty attached to those very crimes for which that at Eliberis had decreed final excision. It would appear therefore that total and irremediable exclusion was at no time a universal practice, but nevertheless, at certain periods, and in certain localities, where possibly the magnitude of offences required, it was unhesitatingly employed. The practice of excommunicating the dead had no existence in the early centuries, or if here and there it existed, was supported by no canonical authority. The second council of Constantinople (553 A.D.), first introduced it into the Eastern church, and about 100 years later it crept into the Western (Morin, de Pœnitent. lib. x. c. 9).

Effect of Sen'e.n.e.—The punishment inflicted by a sentence of excommunication varied not only with the gravity of the offence, but with the discretion of the bishop, the customs of the diocese or province, and still more with the age of the church in which the offender lived. In the early centuries the church was ruled with a gentler discipline than was possible when her ranks were filled up promiscuously from the multitude. The incestuous man, whom St. Paul expelled from among his Corinthian converts with such solemn denunciation, was received again on his repentance, probably within a few months, certainly within the year. And up to the time of Montanus, punishments even for grave breaches of the law of the gospel were equally lenient. The term of the penalty was left to the discretion of the bishop. Through the whole of Tertullian's Treatise de Pœnitentiâ, and in the Apostolic Canons, with one exception, there is no mention of any time for the duration of the sentence. And even in the increasing severity which prevailed for the next hundred years, punishments scarcely ever exceeded one or two years (Morin, de Pœnitent. lib. iv. c. 9). Thenceforward, years would not suffice where weeks or months had been deemed sufficient before. Ten, fifteen, twenty years, were no uncommon penalties. St. Basil excludes a murderer from the church for twenty years (can. 56). The council of Ancyra decrees that a murderer should be a penitent for the rest of his life, and be received back into communion only at the hour of death (can. 22). For murder combined with other great crimes the council of Elvira (can. 11), forbids communion even in death. But at no period did any hard and fast law prevail; if an offender voluntarily confessed his guilt, a shorter term of exclusion was measured out to him; if on the other hand, a man who had before caused scandal was further rebellious and obdurate, his sentence was doubly severe. The lesser excommunication carried with it only an exclusion from communion, and from the inner mysteries and privileges of the faith. Three weeks of this separation was the punishment assigned by the council of Elvira to those who wilfully absent themselves from church for three successive Sundays; a year for some more venial forms of unchastity; another period for eating food in company with a Jew (Con. Elvir. cc. 21, 14, 50). And when the term expired they were received again to all the privileges of full communion, without being called upon to submit to public penance. Very different from this was the punishment attending the greater excommunication, anathema. For the first 300 years the punishment was exclusively spiritual, laid upon the souls, not the bodies of men, depriving them of spiritual blessings, and in no way interfering with their political relations. Heresiarchs however, and dangerous heretical teachers, were at all periods treated with exceptional severity; the church was forbidden to hold any intercourse with them, to receive them into their houses, or to bid them God speed. It was only gradually, after the empire became Christian, that the weapons of the church's warfare began to be more carnal, and the secular power was invoked to uphold the ecclesiastical. At no time before Theodosius, who declared apostate either to Judaism or heathenism incapable of making wills or receiving bequests, and whose Code de Hæreticis attaches other pains and penalties to heretics, were any civil disabilities imposed upon those whom the church had cast out. Whatever rights a man had from the laws of God or man, as father, master, magistrate, these he retained after the door of the church was closed against him. Yet in the primitive ages, when the congregations of Christians were comparatively small and the members known to each other, and the spiritual censure was followed by an immediate and literal banishment from all sacred offices, from the society of their brethren in the faith, from all association whatever with holy men and holy things, the sentence fell with overwhelming severity. All the man most valued was taken from him. He was looked upon as under the ban of God's wrath; he was cut off from the kingdom of God on earth; like the leprous man among the Jews, he had the visible plague-spot of sin upon him; there had been passed upon him what was regarded as a presage of the future judgment, for what God had by his ministers bound on earth, he would certainly, it was believed, unless the man repented, bind in heaven. The Apostolic Canons (c. 11) forbid any one even to pray in a house with a man under anathema. The first council of Toledo (400 A.D.), ordered (c. 15), that "if any layman is under excommunication, let no clergyman nor religious person come near him nor his house. Also if a clergyman is excommunicated, let him be avoided, and if any is found to converse or to eat with him, let him also be excommunicated." His name was erased from the DIPTYCHS, [p. 561]; and there are instances of the erasure having been made after the man had died, and his sins had not come to light while he lived. His oblations were not received at the altar, and even gifts which he had presented to the church were rejected with him. His books might not be read, nor might any intermarry with him. And when his eod came he was refused all sacred offices on his deathbed, and no Christian man might attend his funeral, and no Christian rite be performed at it, unless he had given proof of repentance and passed away before being formally absolved. Nor could any one hope to avoid judgment by a voluntary exile, for notice was sent to other congregations, and in the discipline of the early church, a stranger was not admitted into communion unless he brought with him COMMENDATORY LETTERS from his own diocese. A man once excommunicated was never ordained, or if it was discovered after his ordination, that he had been previously censured, he was removed from the ministry (Conc. Elvir. can. 30; Conc

No. 10). This latter strictness was not invariably enforced, but the axiom "Poenitentes ordinari non debent," became universal in the Western church, although not always in practice in the Eastern.

Excommunication of Clergy.—In some cases the clergy, for offenses for which laymen were excommunicated, were suspended and reduced to lay communion [DEGRADATION]; but they might incur both degradation and excommunication. The clergy were brought to trial with more legal formalities than the laity, because if found guilty they were deprived not only of spiritual privileges but of office and emolument. The Apostolic Canons (30) decree that any bishop, priest, or deacon guilty of simony shall be cut off from all communion whatever. Mention is also made of reducing clergy to "peregrina communio," communion of strangers, which would seem to signify that they were to be treated as strangers who came without commendatory letters, allowed a mere subsistence from the offerings, but denied communion [COMMUNION, HOLY, p. 417]. By the council of Chalcedon (451 A.D.) monks were subject to the same discipline as laity.

Form of Rite.—Judgment was delivered in the indicative mood, inasmuch as it decreed a punishment then and there inflicted. It was declared after the reading of the gospel, the bishop standing on theambo. There is no record of any ceremony attending the delivery of the sentence in the early ages; but Martene publishes a MS. of about the year 1190 which prescribes that twelve priests ought to stand round the bishop with lamps or torches in their hands, and that after the conclusion of the sentence they should cast them on the ground and stamp out the light beneath their feet, and that the bishop should then explain to the people the meaning and effect of the ceremony they had witnessed. No recognised rite of excommunication was in general use before the 9th or 10th century. The formula ordinarily employed was founded on our Lord's words, "Let him be as an heathen man and a publican." The council of Ephesus degraded Nestorius in these terms, "Wherefore our Lord Jesus Christ, whose majesty he by his blasphemous words has assailed, pronounces Nestorius, through this sacred synod, deprived of his episcopal rank and degraded from the fellowship and office of the priesthood throughout the world." The sentence of excommunication of Andronicus, governor of Ptolemais, by his bishop, Synesius (410 A.D.), gives a more detailed account of the penalties involved in the sentence. "The church of Ptolemais makes this injunction to all her sister churches throughout the world. Let no church of God be open to Andronicus and his accomplices; but let every sacred temple and sanctuary be shut against them. The devil has no part in paradise; though he privily creep in he is driven out again. I therefore admonish both private men and magistrates neither to receive them under their roof nor to their table; and priests more especially, that they neither converse with them when living nor attend their funerals when dead. And if any one despise this church as being only a small city, and receive those that are excommunicated by her, let them know that they divide the church by schism. And whosoever does so, whether levite, presbyter, or bishop, shall be ranked in the same class with Andronicus. We will neither give them the right hand of fellowship, nor eat at the same table with them, and much less will we communicate in sacred mysteries with those who choose to take part with Andronicus" (Synesius Epiat. 58). [See PENITENCE.]

The following, from an Anglican Pontifical preserved at Gemblours, considered by Martene (De iud. Ant. B. 322; ed. Venet. 1785) to have been written in the 8th century, may serve as a specimen of the later forms. The bishop, denouncing certain persons who, not having the fear of God before their eyes, had plundered the property of the church, and who, after being thrice summoned, contumaciously refused to appear, pronounced: "These therefore we, by the authority conferred upon us by God . . . and the statutes of the canons, excommunicate and cut off from the bonds of the Holy Church of God, and expel from the congregation of Christian men; and unless they speedily come to a better mind and make satisfaction to us, we condemn them with eternal malediction and condemn with perpetual anathema. May they incur the wrath of the heavenly judge; may they be deprived of the inheritance of God and His elect; may they neither in this present life have communion with Christians, nor in the life to come obtain part with God and His saints; but may they be numbered with the devil and his servants, and receive the punishment of avenging flame with everlasting mourning. In heaven and earth may they be abominable, and be tortured for ever with the pains of hell. Cursed be they in the house, cursed in the field; cursed be their food and their fruit; cursed be all that they possess, from the dog that barks for them to the cock that crows for them. May they have their portion with Dathan and Abiram, whom hell swallowed up quick, and with Ananias and Sapphira, who lied unto the apostles of the Lord and fell down dead, and with Pilate, and Judas who betrayed the Lord; may they be buried with the burial of an ass, and so may their light be quenched in the midst of darkness. Amen."

Minister of Excommunication.—The officer entrusted with the power of excommunication was the bishop of the diocese to which the offender belonged. [BISHOP, p. 231.] The administration of discipline was originally entirely in his hands; it was he who bonnd and he who loosed. As the church increased, the infliction of other forms of penance was delegated to the inferior clergy, but the great sentence of excommunication was a weapon which the bishop kept exclusively in the power of his own order. Within his diocese his jurisdiction was supreme; he might mitigate or increase censure at his discretion. In the exercise of this authority he was independent of his presbytery; he sat indeed with it to hear confessions which might criminate others, or to receive accusations against the brethren, or to decide rights and causes brought before him, and offences might then be divulged which would expose the offender to excommunication, but when once guilt was established, either by confession, or conviction, or notoriety, the bishop alone imposed the sentence. Instances also abound of bishops consulting with one another in special emergencies, and deciding amongst themselves the period of penance to be allotted to special sins, but such advice or support put no limitation on each bishop's original jurisdiction. The council of Nice (can. 5) forbids any one bishop to receive delinquents cut off by another bishop, which clearly points to each bishop possessing the power to act alone. The end of the same canon decrees that a synod of bishops shall be held in each province twice a year, before Lent and in the autumn (compare Apost. Can. 38), to examine into the cases of excommunication which had taken place in the province. There was thus a right of appeal against the sentence of an individual bishop, but only to the bishops of the province. This probably explains instances of synodical excommunication, which do not imply that the bishop had not an independent power to excommunicate, but that an appeal was made from his judgment to the provincial synod, whose sentence was only a more solemn confirmation of the bishop's.

The Apostolical Canons (74) decree that, if a bishop is accused he is to be summoned by the synod of bishops, and if he refuse to come two bishops are to go for him, and on his second refusal, to go again, and if he is still contumacious, the synod may proceed against him in his absence. Accordingly the episcopal rank of Nestorius required a synodical censure, which was pronounced by provincial synods under Cyrill of Alexandria and Celestine of Rome, and confirmed 431 A.D. by the council of Ephesus. And Eutyches, who was an abbot and so far allowed the privileges of a bishop, was tried at the provincial synod of Constantinople under Flavianus, and on an appeal to a general council was again condemned and excommunicated at Chalcedon, together with Dioscorus of Alexandria.

II. MONASTIC EXCOMMUNICATION.

By the Benedictine rule contumacious monks incurred the penalty of the greater or the lesser excommunication according to the gravity of the offence, but not till admonition, first private and then public, had been tried on them in vain, nor in cases where, owing to moral stupidity, flogging was likely to be more efficacious (Reg. Bened. c. 23). These two kinds of excommunication are further defined as excommunication only from the common meal (a mensa) for slighter faults, and excommunication from the chapel also (a mensa et oratorio) for faults less venial. Thus the subdivision of monastic excommunication corresponds in its main features with the more minute subdivisions of ecclesiastical discipline generally (ib. cc. 24, 25). Even under the lighter ban the offender was forbidden to officiate in the choir as reader or "cantor," and, according to some commentators on the rule, he was to lie prostrate before the altar-steps while the others were kneeling. In the refectory he was to take his food alone after the rest had finished (Martene, Reg. Comment. cc. 25, 44).

was debarred not only from the common board, but also from all the chapel services as well as from the benedictory salutation, and indeed from all intercourse whatever with his brethren (Reg. Bened. c. 25). He was to lie outstretched at the doors of the chapel till re-admitted by the abbat; nor even then might he take any public part in the services without express permission (Martene, u. s. c. 44). Any monk speaking to an excommunicated brother was "iiso facto" excommunicated himself (Reg. Bened. c. 26). But it was kindly ordered by Benedict, that the abbat should send some sympathising brother to console the offender in his loneliness (ib. c. 27; cf. Reg. Mag. cc. 13, 14; Reg. Cues. Arclat. c. 23; Id. ad Virg. c. 10).

The duration of the punishment varied, the intention being correctional rather than merely penal. By the rule of Fructuosus, a monk for lying, stealing, striking, false swearing, if incorrigible, was, after flogging, to be excommunicated and kept on bread and water in a solitary cell for three months (Reg. Fruct. c. 17). By the rule of Ferreolus, a monk for bad language was forbidden to be present at the mass or to receive the kiss of peace for six months (Reg. Ferr. c. 25). By the rule of Chrodegang a canonius was excommunicated for what seems so slight an offence as sleeping after nocturns. It was for the abbat to fix the degree of excommunication (Reg. Bened. c. 24). Some commentators argue therefore, that the severest form of monastic excommunication cannot be tantamount to the severest ecclesiastical sentence of the kind (Mart. Pej. Comm. c. 25).

Marbillon cites instances (Annal. x. 46) of monks (Columbanus and Theodoros Studita) excommunicating lay people not belonging to their order. He relates an excommunication of one of the sisterhood by an abess in the 7th century (ib. xii. 36). Abbats and abbesses were themselves liable to this penalty. Gregory the Great reproves a bishop for harshness in excommunicating an aged abbat of good repute. The second council of Tours in A.D. 567 decreed sentence of excommunication against any abbat or prior allowing a woman to enter the monastery (Conc. Turon. c. 16). See further Bened. Auz. Concord. Regul. cc. 30-34 with Menard's Commentary, and Ducauge, Gloss. Lat. s. v. [I. G. S.]

EXCUBIAE. [VIGIL.]

EXCUSATI. (1) Slaves who had fled for refuge to a church, and then—on the owners making oath upon the gospels that they would not punish them—been restored to their masters, were called excusati. If the master broke his oath he was punished by excommunication. See Conc. Aurel. I. cc. 1 and 3; III. c. 13; IV. c. 24. (2) Those who under some terror or oppression had fled to a church or monastery and remained there were also called excusati (Charter of Charles the Great, quoted by Ducauge, s. v.) [C.]

EXECUTORES. A name given either to the DEFENSORES themselves or to officers who performed analogous functions. In one of the canons of a council held at Carthage, A.D. 419 (Conc. Eccl. Afric. c. 96), it is decreed that permission should be demanded of the emperor for the appointment of five "executores," who should reside in the provinces, and be employed on all occasions of necessity on behalf of the

RES. A name given either to s themselves or to officers who e the cognate functions. In one of

 c. 96), it is decreed that per-be demanded of the emperor for nt of five "executores," who the provinces, and be employed s of necessity on behalf of the church, "in omnibus desideris quae habet ecclesia." These are evidently distinct from the "defensores scholastici," mentioned in the canon tract Edwons. In a capitulary of Charles the Great, quoted by Thomassin (Vet. et Nov. Eccl.

Discip. i. 2, c. 93, § 12), executores are mentioned in connexion with advocates and defenders, "executores, vel advocati seu defensores." Thomassin (Ibid. c. 98, § 3) speaks of the title being given to certain officials when employed in carrying into execution the will of the bishop of Rome, who is himself the executor and protector of the canons. [P. O.]

EXEDRA is explained by Duceage, Binterin, and others as a general term including all buildings annexed to a church, or contained within the consecrated area. In classical usage an exedra was a semicircular room, or large alcove with seats against the wall for the purposes of conversation (Cic. de Nat. Deorum, l. 6; de Orat. iii. 5). Exedrae are spoken of by Vi-truvius (vi. 5) in connexion with oeci (oikoi) as rooms for conversation and other social purposes.
 The two words are similarly coupled together by Eusebius (J. E. x. 4, § 44) when describing the church of Paulinus at Tyre. Here Eusebius writes "he provided spacious exedrae and oeci on each side (ἐξεδρας καὶ οἴκους τοὺς παρ' ἐκά- τερα μέρους) united and attached to the royal fabric (βασιλικῆς) and communicating with the entrance to the middle of the temple." The church built by Constantine at Antioch is also described as "being surrounded with a large number of oeci and exedrae in a circle," οἴκους τὴν περίσσω ἐξεδρας τε ἐν κύκλῳ (Euseb. de Vit.
Const. lib. iii. c. 50). Augustine uses the word in the sense of a large room or hall annexed to the great church at Caesarea (de Gest. cum Emerito). The sixth canon of the council of Nantes prohibits interments except "in atrio aut portico, aut in exedris ecclesiae," a Bingham holds that baptisteries were included under exedrae. The apse of a basilica was also sometimes termed exedra from its similarity in shape to those of the baths.

(Bingham, Orig. Eccl. bk. viii. c. 7, § 1; Augu-stin Christ. Archæol. i. 387; Valesius ad Euseb.
VI. Const. lib. iii. c. 50.) [E. V.]

EXEMPTION OF MONASTERIES. In the earlier stage of their existence, monasteries generally availed themselves gladly of the patronage of the bishop of the diocese [BISHOP, p. 231], but as they increased in wealth and power, struggled to emancipate themselves from his control.
 For instance, towards the close of the 6th century the abbess of Ste. Croix at Poitiers, after the death of Radegunde the foundress, who had become one of the nuns, requested the bishop to take the convent under his protection. After some hesitation, on account of the royal rank of the foundress, or because she had placed the convent under royal jurisdiction, he consented "to govern it as the rest of his parishes" (Mabill.
Ann. O. S. B. VII. xxxix. xl.; Gregor. Turon.
Hist. li. 46). On the other hand, in the middle of the 7th century, or later, for the exact date of the deed is uncertain, a monastery at Vienne, apparently of monks and nuns under one constitution, obtained absolute exemption from the

* In Labbe (Concil. ix. 470) the reading is "extra ecclesiam."

bishop's authority. By this deed, no bishop had any claim to any property of the monastery; no bishop, unless by invitation of the abbot or abness, could consecrate altars or admit nuns, nor was any fee to be required for performing these ceremonies; and the diocesan was not to hinder any appeal of the monastery to the see of Rome (Mabill. Ann. O. S. B. XIII. ii. cf. Ap- tom. 1). In another fragment cited by Mabillon in the same place no bishop even by invitation was allowed to enter the more private parts of the convent; nor was any bishop to be entertained in the convent, lest this should be an expense and a distraction to the inmates, nor to interfere with the abness in the correction of the nuns, for she was to be responsible only to the apostolic see. Instances might easily be multiplied of the almost continual collision in Western Christendom between the bishops and the monasteries in their dioceses; in which the monasteries, almost invariably, had the support of the pope, and, frequently, of the royal authority (cf.
 Martene, Regul. Commun. Bened. ap. Migne, Patrol. Lat. lxxi. pp. 839, 840). And the same struggle was going on at the same time in the East. Thus, in the 7th century, the emperor Maurice granted to the monasteries of Theodorus Sicoota entire exemption from all episcopal authority, except that of Constantinople (Mabill. Ann. O. S. B. xiv. 23). Monasteries subject only to emperor or king, were called "imperialia" or "regalia" (Duceage, Gloss.
Lat. s. v.). [For exemption of monasteries from taxes see MONASTERY.] [I. G. S.]

EXEMPTIONS. [IMMUNITIES OF CLERGY.]

EXEQUIES. [BURIAL OF THE DEAD; OBLIQUES.]

EXERCISES, PENITENTIAL. [PEN-TENCE.]

EXHORTATION (Exhortatio), is used in a special sense for the admonition on the duties of their office addressed by the ordiuer to a person just ordained. See, for instance, the Coptic ritual of ordination, in Martene, De Lit. Ant. l., viii. 11, Ordo 23. [C.]

EXILE (Exilium, Peregrinatio). For certain offences a penitent was ordered to leave his country and pass some period of his penitence in distant lands. This mode of penance is found among the canons ascribed to some of the British councils of the 6th century; but there are strong grounds for believing that they are interpolations of a later period, and that the penance of exile cannot be traced to any earlier source than the 7th century. The Penitential of Theodore (l. ii.
 16) appoints fifteen years of penance for incest, of which seven are to be passed in a foreign land (perenni peregrinatione). The Penitential of Egbert (iii.) declares seven years of exile to be part of the penance due for parricide; and
 (v. 9) orders a cleric who begets an illegitimate child to go into exile for either four, five, or seven years. Morinus, however, considers (de Poenit. vii. 15) that these wanderings of penitents soon led to abuses, and were checked in a capitulary of Charles the Great (vi. 379).

The practice thus begun in submission to a judicial penalty was continued as a voluntary self-discipline, and in the 10th century it began to be considered a meritorious action to leave home and country and make a pilgrimage to some spot consecrated by association with some holy man; the earliest of which places were Rome, Tours, and the supposed burial-place of St. James at Compostella. This tendency received a great impulse from the Crusades, and especially from the decree of the council of Clermont (Conc. Clavoni. c. 2), which allowed a pilgrimage to Jerusalem to expiate all penance whatever. [G. M.]

EXOCATACOELI. Five great dignitaries of the patriarchal church of Constantinople, viz. the oecumenus or steward, the senior and junior keeper of the purse (σακελλάρχοι), and the senior and junior chartophylax, were anciently called ἐξοκατάκοιλοι. To these, in the 11th century, the defensor of the church was added. The etymology of the word is uncertain. That of Ducauge (Gloss. Græc.) that they received their name from having their seats of dignity on a raised platform, not in the lower portion of the floor (κατακόιλια) where less distinguished persons sat, is perhaps as probable as any. (Thomassin, Ecl. Discip. l. ii. 99, § 10; Daniel, Codex Liturg. iv. 702.) [C.]

EXODIASTICON (Ἐξοδιαστικόν). As the departure of a Christian was frequently spoken of as ἔξοδος, the service at the death-bed is called in Greek office-books ἐξοδιαστικόν (Daniel, Codex Lit. iv. 608, 634). [BURIAL OF THE DEAD; SICK, VISITATION OF.] [C.]

EXOMOLOGESIS (Ἐξομολόγησις, Confessio, ἔξομολόγησις, ἐξαγώνεσις). The verb in St. Matt. xi. 25 expresses thanksgiving and praise, and in this sense was used by many Christian writers (Suer's Thesaurus, s. v. ἔξομολ.). But more generally in the early fathers it signifies the whole course of penitential discipline, the outward act and performance of penance. From this it came to mean that public acknowledgment of sin which formed so important a part of penitence. Ireneus (c. Haeres. i. 13, § 5) speaks of an adulteress who, having been converted, passed her whole life in a state of penitence (ἐξομολογουμένη, in exomologesi); and (iv. iii. 4) of Cerdion often coming into the church and confessing his errors (ἐξομολογούμενος). Tertullian (de Poenit. c. 9) considers the Greek word ἔξομολόγησις more suitable than the Latin confessio; and proceeds to define the term as "the discipline of humbling and prostrating a man." At the end of the same treatise he speaks of the king of Babylon's humiliation as an exomologesis, and of the king of Egypt's neglect of repentance and in Cyprian (de Lapsis, cc. 11, 18), and six times in his Epistles (Epist. 4, ad Pompon. c. 3; 15, ad Mart. c. 1; 16, ad Cler. c. 2; 17, ad Laic.; 53, ad Anton. c. 24; 59, ad Cornel. c. 18, Oxf. ed.) in the sense of the course of penitence and public humiliation; three times (Epist. 18, ad Cler.; 19, ad Cler.; 20, ad Rom. Cler. c. 2) referring to the confession of dying penitents; and once (de Lapsis, c. 19) as applied to Azariah and his companions, in the sense of confession of the lips generally. St. Basil, describing the morning service of his time (Epist. 207, ad Cler. Neocaesar.), says that after the antiphonal chant, at daybreak they all burst forth into the psalm of confession (τὸν τῆς ἐξομολογήσεως ψαλμὸν τῷ Κυρίῳ ἀναφέρουσι), meaning no doubt that which is emphatically a psalm of confession, the fifty-first. This psalm is also mentioned by Cassian (De Inst. C. nov. iii. 6) as occurring at the close of matins. Pacian in one place (Pacian. ad Pœnit. p. 372, Oxf. ed.) following Tertullian, speaks of the degradation of Nebuchadnezzar as exomologesis; in another (ibid. p. 373), in imitation of Cyprian, applies the term to the song of the "three children." At the council of Laodicea (can. 2) it is the whole course of penitence: "As to those who sin by divers offences and persevere in prayer of confession (ἔξομολ.) and repentance." With Chrysostom it is in one place (Hom. 10 in S. Matt. c. 4) the course of penitence; elsewhere (Hom. 5, de incomp. Dei nat. t. i. p. 490; Hom. 2, ad illum. Catech. t. i. p. 240, Bened. ed.) it is confession to God only. Isidore of Seville (Et. mod. vi. 19) defines exomologesis to be that by which we confess our sins to the Lord. But at the end of the same chapter he advances an entirely different meaning of the word. "Between litanies and exomologeses there is this difference, that exomologesis stands for confession of sins only, litany for prayer to God, and imploring His pardon; but now each word has the same meaning, nor is there any difference between the use of litany and exomologesis." The 17th council of Toledo, A.D. 694 (c. 6), orders litanies (exomologeses) to be said for a whole year for the church, for the sovereign, &c. &c. And the council of Mayence, A.D. 813 (Conc. Mogunt. c. 32) quotes the exact words of Isidore on exomologesis being equivalent with litany (Comp. Moria. de Poenit. ii. 2; note L. on Tertull. de Poenit. in Oxford Library of the Fathers).

Of these meanings the first and last are quite foreign to the general ecclesiastical use of the word and need not be pursued any further; that which signifies the whole course of penitential discipline will be discussed under the article PENITENCE; this article will relate to exomologesis so far as it signifies oral confession.

Public Confession.—i. Of public sins.—This was the first stage in the restoration of a penitent. So long as discipline was in force, any one guilty of a notorious crime which had subjected him to censure [EXCOMMUNICATION] was required to make an open acknowledgment of his crime at the beginning of his course of penitence. The confession took place after the Missa Catechumenorum, and when they and the hearers had been warned to withdraw from the church by the deacon. Then if any one had been recently convicted of any open sin, he confessed and bewailed it before the church, and in accordance with the gravity of his offence, his penitential station was assigned him by the bishop; sometimes, however, the bishop, yielding to the requests of the clergy and people who had heard the confession, allotted a less remote station. The bishop then addressed the congregation on the nature of the offence, and they offered up their prayers for the offender's repentance. This public confession was addressed not merely to the bishop or the priest in the presence of the congregation, but in a loud voice to the congregation at large. It signified that as the church had been scandalised by an open sin in one of its members, reparation should be made to it by an equally open admission of sin. It also manifested the earnestness of the offender's repentance that he was willing to undergo this public humiliation. But the

It as the church had been scandalised in one of its members, reparatio- e to it by an equally open admit- also manifested the earnestness 's repentance that he was willing is public humiliation. But the chief object was that the offender might seek the prayers of the congregation to support and stimulate his conversion. If any one who was notoriously guilty failed or refused to confess, no one would communicate with him, in accordance with the apostle's precept (1 Cor. v. 11; Ephes. v. 11). Again, if he waited to be convicted, his censure was heavier than if he had made a spontaneous confession. The council of Elvira (Conc. Elib. c. 76) orders that if a deacon before his ordination had committed a mortal sin, and afterwards confessed, he should be restored after three years' penitence; but if detected, after five years, and only to lay communion. Basil (ad Amphilo. cc. 7, 61) allows alleviation of punishment on three grounds, ignorance, confession, and lapse of time. This encouragement to confession reappears in the 8th century in the Rule of Chrodegand of Metz (c. 18), "he who voluntarily confesses his lighter sins shall be visited with lighter censures." And not only was an offender urged to confess for his own sake, but any who was privy to his crime was under a similar obligation to accuse him, for if he failed or even delayed to do so, he was himself exposed to censure (Basil, ad Amphilo. c. 71).

ii. Of secret sins.—Such confession was at no time obligatory. Sometimes, however, under the direction of a priest who had been consulted, or moved by a sudden contrition and remorse, some would charge themselves with a secret sin before the congregation. Thus (Iren. c. Haeres. l. 9) the virgins seduced by the heretic Marcus, and the wife of the deacon Asianus made a public acknowledgment of guilt which was known only to themselves. One of the three men who had calumniated Narcissus of Jerusalem (Euseb. H. E. vi. 9) publicly acknowledged years afterwards, when his two associates had died from some painful disorder, that his charge against the bishop had been false. Some of the priests who had joined Novatian (Ibid. vi. 43) spontaneously charged themselves before the church with heresy and other crimes; one of the bishops who had been induced to consecrate him publicly acknowledged his error, and Cornelius, in deference to the intercession of the people who witnessed the confession, admitted him to lay communion. But public confession of secret sins needed at a very early period to be checked and regulated; and the people were admonished to consult their priests before divulging their sins to the church [PENITENTIARY]. Anything which would create a scandal or endanger life or liberty was forbidden to be revealed. So Basil (ad Amphilo. c. 34) would not permit a woman who had privately admitted the guilt of adultery to acknowledge it in the church or even to perform openly the penance generally demanded for such a sin, lest she should be murdered by her husband. Similar precautions are laid down by Origen, Augustine, and Caesarius of Arles (Morin. de Poenit. ii. 13). In the 6th century the practice arose of making confession of public sins to the bishop, of private to the priest.

iii. Before the bishop and his presbytery.—Tertullian (de Poenit. c. 9) says it is part of exomologesis for the penitent "to throw himself upon the ground before the presbytery, and to fall on his knees before the beloved of God." Cyprian (de Lapsis, c. 18) praises the faith of those who, having without any overt act meditated idolatry, made a confession "apud sacerdotes Dei," Gregory Nyssen (Ep. ad Lectorem, in Marshall p. 195) speaks of a certain evil which had been overlooked by the ancient fathers, from whence it had come to pass, that no person who was brought before the clergy to be examined as to his life and conversation was at all examined upon that point. Before the presbyterial confessions were made which criminated others; and this frequently happened; for any one making a public confession named his confederates, unless by so doing he exposed them to legal penalties. No ecclesiastical censure, however, fell on any who denied a crime which his associate had admitted: on the principle that penitence was a privilege not a punishment. The deacon and his presbytery (Epis. iv. ad Pompon.) must have had an information laid against them by some associate, for their guilt had been secret. This the appointment of the Penitentiary; but in the West so long as public penitence for secret faults prevailed, so long did public confession to bishops and their assistant priests. Probably this was the origin of the custom introduced into the Benedictine Rule of confession to the abbot surrounded by his monks.

Private Confession.—i. General account.—The testimony of the fathers will be discussed in detail later; here it is sufficient to say that the early fathers Irenaeus, Tertullian, Cyprian, hardly allude to private confession at all; and among the writers generally of the first 500 years these who mention it do so with some reference more or less direct to public discipline. But it is certain that public penitence was not assigned to all sins which were secretly confessed, but only to such as in the discretion of the priest required it. It is easy to understand that offences of a trivial nature might be confined to a priest, or offences of such a character as would scandalise the church were they openly divulged; and until this spiritual direction had been given, the offender would be in doubt whether or not a public acknowledgment would be expected from him. But it is equally clear that no absolution was given after direction of this sort, or until penitence had been performed. Such at least for many centuries was the practice in the Latin church (see PENITENCE, under which the question of absolution will be discussed); in the Eastern church a practice arose of pronouncing the utterance of the confession, and a second absolution when the penance had been performed. The evidence of this practice is to be found in the early Greek Penitentials at the end of the 6th century; but Morinus would carry back its origin to the time of the abolition of the office of Penitentiary at the end of the 4th. To resort to a spiritual guide for comfort and counsel was one thing; to obtain through his ministry by confession penance and absolution, reconciliation with God and communion with the faithful was another: and there is no proof that the two were combined, and that private sacramental confession had any existence in the first 500 years of the Christian church. The term itself is not found in any of the documents of the first eight centuries; and if the definition of Thomas Aquinas (Summa, pt. iii. qn. 84-80) is to be accepted as a theological definition of the term, its growth must be assigned to a much later period. There existed undoubtedly from a very early period private confession followed by no penitence, but also by no absolution; there was also private confession followed by public penitence, and generally by subsequent public confession, to which the private was a preliminary; and there was after the beginning of the 6th century private confession followed by private penitence, but the penance was always exacted, and differed only from public penance in solemnity; there is nowhere to be found in canons or sacramentaries or penitentials one punishment for private penitence and another for public. The sins thus privately confessed with a view to penitence were those only of a grievous character, sins which excluded from communion or public prayer, or even from the church itself, which required a long and painful course of penance before they were blotted out, and into which if the sinner relapsed, there was, certainly in the vigour of the primitive ages, no second door of reconciliation open to him. Sozomen indeed, writing at the end of the 5th century, says in reference to penance that there is pardon for those who sin again and again, but this is not the language of antiquity. There was but one admission to solemn penance. Moreover, were de-which penance was to be performed were described by canons and in canonical epistles, and sins which did not fall within these canons were either confessed nor made subject to penance. Sins of frailty incidental to mankind were to be healed by daily prayer and confession to God only. So, among numerous authorities that penitence, and confession as a part of penitence, was not exacted for venial sins, Augustine (de Symb. ad Catech. t. vi. p. 555, ed. Antv.), "those whom you see in a state of penitence have been guilty of adultery or some other enormity, for which they are put under it: if their sin had been venial, daily prayer would have been sufficient to atone for it." The Greek Penitentials of the end of the 6th century, and the Latin ones of a century later, give no hint of habitual confession of common infirmities, or of private confession being a matter of indispensable obligation, still less of the doctrine that one may daily confess and be daily and plenary absolved.

ii. In the Western Church.—In the times of Tertullian and Cyprian public discipline was in full vigour, and as part of it a public acknowledgment of sins: the passages which have already been adduced from these fathers contain nothing to show that they regarded confession in any other light than as one stage of the act of penitence.

Ambrose (de Poenit. ii. 6) speaks of confession, but it is confession to God. "If thou wilt be justified confess thy sins; for humble confession looses the bonds of sin." Another passage, selected by Bellarmine to support secret confession, relates manifestly to the course of discipline; for having at the end of the previous section said that "very many, out of fear of future punishment, conscious of their sins, seek admission to penitence, and having obtained it are drawn back by the shame of public entreaty," Ambrose thus proceeds (ib. c. 10), "Will any one endure that thou shouldst be ashamed to ask of God, who art not ashamed to ask men? that thou be ashamed to supplicate Him from whom thou art not hid, when thou art not ashamed to confess thy sins to man from whom thou art hid?" Another passage (in Luc. x. 22, p. 5, 1787) commenting on St. Peter's denial of Christ and subsequent repentance, is inconsistent with the existence of a custom of private confession in his time. "Let tears wash away the guilt which one is ashamed to confess with the voice. Tears express the fault without alarm; tears confess the sin without injuring baseness; tears obtain the pardon they ask not for. Peter wept most bitterly, that with tears he might wash out his offence. Do thou also, if thou wouldst obtain pardon, wash out thy fault with tears."

Augustine's own confessions contain no hint that he either practised or inculcated private confession. "What have I to do with men that they should hear my confession, as if they could heal all my infirmities" (x. 3). Bellarmine quotes from the same writer (en Pa. 66, c. 7)—"Be downcast before thou hast confessed; having confessed, exult; now shalt thou be healed. While thou confessedst not, thy conscience collected foul matter; the imposthume swelled, distressed thee, gave thee no rest; the physician fomented it with words, sometimes cuts it, employs the healing knife, rebuking by tribulation. Acknowledge thou the hand of the physician; confess; let all the foul matter go forth in confession; now exult, now rejoice, what remains will readily be healed." But Augustine is commenting on the text, "Sing unto the Lord all the whole earth;" and confession can be confession to God only, as surely the physician who heals by tribulation can be none other than God. In Serm. 181 (fin.) he speaks of daily prayer as the sponge which is to wipe away sins of infirmity and contrasts them with death-bringing sins for which alone penitence is performed. Elsewhere (de Symb. ad Catech. tom. vi. p. 555, ed. Antv.) he again speaks of the "three methods of remitting sins in the church, in baptism, in the Lord's Prayer, in the humility of the greater penitence," and he limits penance and consequently confession to sins which deserve excommunication. And in many similar passages he is a witness that up to his time no confession was required of any sins but such as subjected a man to penitential discipline.

Leo in his Epistle to Theodorus gives plain testimony of the connection of confession with penance (Ep. 91, c. 2). But in a letter to the bishops of Campania he gives some directions which mark if they do not make an era in confession in the Latin church. The epistle is too important not to be quoted at length (Ep. 80, ad Episc. Campan.). "That presumption, contrary to the apostolic rule, which I have lately learned to be practised by some, taking unduly upon themselves, I direct should by all means be removed, and that a written statement of the nature of the crimes of each should not be publicly rehearsed, since it suffices that the guilt of the conscience be laid open to the priests alone in secret confession. For although that fulness of faith, which out of the fear of God fears not to take shame before men, seems to be praiseworthy, yet because the sins of all are not of such sort, that they who ask to do penitence fear not their being published, let so unavishable a custom be done away, let ashamed to supplicate Him not hid, when thou art not thy sins to man from whom other passage (in Luc. x. 22, ting on St. Peter's denial quip repentance, is incoherence of a custom of private time. Bellarmine quotes ter (en Ps. 66, c. 7)—"Be now hast confessed; having know shalt thou be healed, edest not, thy conscience ed; the imposthume swelled; e thee no rest; the physician ords, sometimes cuts it, omife, rebuking by tribulation; e the hand of the physician; a foul matter go forth in con, now rejoice, what remains healed." But Augustine is a text, "Sing unto the Lord," and confession can be con, as surely the physician who can be none other than God. he speaks of daily prayer as is to wipe away sins of infir- them with death-bringing lone penance is performed. o, a Catech. tom. vi. p. 555, ed. eaks of the "three methods of the church, in baptism, in the humility of the greater he limits penance and conse- to sins which deserve excom- in many similar passages it up to his time no confession ay sins but such as subjected a discipline.

may be kept from the remedies of penitence; either being ashamed, or fearing that actions for which they may be punished by the laws should be discovered to their enemies. For that confession suffices, which is made first to God, then to the priest also, who draweth near to pray for the sins of the penitents. For so at length may more be stirred up to penitence, if the sins confessed by the penitents be not published in the ears of the people." In the early ages public confession was only remitted in case of danger to the individual or scandal to the church: by this constitution of Leo secret confession to the priest was to take the place of open confession, and the priest's intercession of the intercession of the church. The door thus opened for escaping from the shame of public confession was never afterwards closed, and secret confession gradually became the rule of the church.

In the pontificate of Gregory the Great, a century and a half later, there is no evidence to be found of the existence of public confession: and even after private confession it was difficult to bring men to submit to public discipline (Expos. in 1 Reg. t. iii. 15, p. 342). "The sign of a true confession is not in the confession of the lips, but in the humiliation of penitence. . . . The confession of sin is required in order that the fruits of penitence may follow. . . . Saul, who confesses and is not willing to humble and afflict himself, is a type of those who make a sterile confession and bear no fruit of penance."

In the 7th century, the stern rule that solemn confession as a part of penitence was received only once, had become obsolete, but habitual confession had not yet taken its place. The first council of Châlons, A.D. 650 (1 Cabil. c. 8), declares that all agree that confession to the priest is a proof of penitence. The Penitential of Theodore (l. xii. 7) gives a rule which shows that auricular confession was not yet obligatory. "Confession if needful may be made to God only." [COMMUNION, HOLY, p. 317.] Bede (tom. v. Exp. in S. Jac. v.) reverting to the old practice draws a distinction between the confession of frailties and of heinous sins. "We ought to use this discretion, our daily light sins confess to one another, and hope that by our prayers they may be healed; but the pollution of the greater leprosy let us according to the law open to the priest, and in the manner and the time which he directs, purify ourselves." The second council of Châlons, A.D. 813 (2 Conc. Cabil. c. 32) complains that people coming to confess neglect to do so fully, and orders each one when he comes to examine himself and make confession of the eight capital sins which prevail in the world—which are then enumerated—and by implication, of no others. Theodolph's Capitulary (c. 30) draws a distinction between confession made to a priest and that to God only, and (c. 31) mentions the same eight principal sins as the council, and appoints that every one learning to confess should be examined on what occasions and in what manner he had been guilty of any of them, and consequently be subjected to no further examination. Chrodegund (c. 32) orders "confession to be made at each of the three fasts of the year, 'et qui plus fecerit melius fiet'; and monks to confess on each Sunday to their bishop or prior." But there is no other document showing that confession had yet become periodical. That secret confession was not yet a matter of obligation is clear from the canon of the council of Châlons (2 Conc. Cabil. c. 33). "Some say they ought to confess their sins to God only, and some think they are to be confessed unto the priests, both of which not without great fruit are practised in the Holy Church. . . . the confession which is made to God purgeth sins, that made to the priests teacheth in what way those sins should be purged." And so it remained an open question for the next 300 years, for Gratian (de Pœnit. Dist. i. 89) summing up the opinions of different doctors on necessity of confession leaves it still undecided. "Upon what authorities or upon what strength of reasons both these opinions are grounded, I have briefly declared; which of them we should rather cleave to is left to the judgment of the reader; for both have for their favourers wise and religious men." And it was not determined till the famous decree of the Lateran council, A.D. 1215 (4 Conc. Lateran. c. 21) ordering all of each sex as soon as they arrived at years of discretion to confess at least once a year to their own priest.

iii. In the Eastern Church.—The duty of consulting a priest when the conscience is burdened is urged more strongly by the Greek than by the Latin fathers; there are consequently more distinct traces of secret confession in the Eastern than in the Western church. Origen has one passage speaking directly of confession, not to God only but to the ministers of the church; the purpose of the confession however is not to obtain absolution, but spiritual guidance; after having spoken of evil thoughts which should be revealed in order that they might be destroyed by Him who did for us, he continues (Hom. 17 in Luc. fin.), "if we do this and confess our sins not only to God, but to those also who can heal our wounds and sins, our sins will be blotted out by Him," &c. In another passage, which is even more explicit, he speaks of the care required in choosing a discreet and learned minister to whom to open the grief, and the skill and tenderness required in him to whom it is confided (Hom. 2 in Ps. 37, t. 11, p. 688, ed. Bened.).

Athanasius (Vit. Ant. Evem. p. 75, ed. Augs.) narrates an injunction of Anthony to his fellow-recluses, that they should write down their thoughts and actions and exhibit the record to one another, which probably was the beginning of habitual confession among monastic orders, where there are many grounds for supposing it prevailed long before it became the custom of the church. Basil lays it down even more definitely than Origen, that in cases of doubt and difficulty resort should be had to a priest; and in his time such a priest was specially appointed in each diocese, whose office it was to receive such private confessions and decide whether they should be afterwards openly acknowledged. [PENITENTIARY.] Thus in Basil, Reg. brev. tract. (Q. 229) the question is proposed, "Whether forbidden actions ought to be laid open to all, or to whom, and of what sort?" And the answer is, that as with bodily disease, "so also the discovery of sins ought to be made to those able to cure them." Again (Q. 288) Basil asks, "he who wishes to confess his sins ought he to confess them to all, or to any chance person, or to whom?" and reples, "it is necessary to confess to these enrolled with the oracles of God." There would have been no necessity for regulations like these had not private confession been in frequent practice. In Serm. Ascet. (t. ii. p. 323, ed. Bened.) monks are directed, by a rule similar to that of Anthony, to tell to the common body any "thought of things forbidden, or unsuitable words, or remission in prayer, or lukewarmness in psalmody, or desire after ordinary life," that through the common prayers the evil may be cured. Like instructions are found in the Reg. fus. tract. (Q. 26) "On referring everything, even the secrets of the heart, to the superior."

Gregory Nyssen (Ep. ad Letoium, in Marshall, p. 100) in one place speaks of secret confession which is to be followed by penance: "he who of his own accord advances to the discovery of his sins, as by his voluntary accusation of himself he gives a specimen of the change that is in his mind towards that which is good, will deserve lighter correction," alluding to the well-established rule that voluntary confession was allowed to mitigate the subsequent penance: in another place he writes as if he commended the custom of confessing all transgression of positive law whether it involved penance or not, "if he who has transferred to himself the property of another by secret theft shall unfold his offence to the priest by secret confession, it will be sufficient to cure the guilt by a contrary disposition."

The abolition of the office of the Penitentiary made undoubtedly a great break in the practice of confession in the Eastern church. The account is given in Socrates (H. E. v. 19) and Sozomen (H. E. vii. 16). [PENITENTIARY.] It is difficult to believe that the scandal which had arisen in connection with the Penitentiary had not some influence on the teaching of St. Chrysostom, who immediately afterwards succeeded to the see of Constantinople. He both recommended and enforced penitence, but any confession which had not immediate reference to discipline, he taught should be made to God alone. None of the fathers bear equally strong testimony against auricular confession (Hom. 5 de incomp. Dei nat. p. 490). "I do not bring you upon the stage before your fellow-servants, nor do I compel you to discover your sins in the presence of men, but to unfold your conscience to God, to show Him your ail and malady, and seek relief from Him." So (Hom. 20 in Gen. p. 175). "He who has done these things (grievous sins) if he would use the assistance of conscience for his need, and hasten to confess his sin, and show his sore to the physician who healeth and reproacheth not, and converse with Him alone, none knowing, and tell all exactly, he shall soon amend his folly. For confession of sins is the effacing of offences." For numerous other examples compare Daille (iii. 14, iv. 25), Hooker (vi. c. iv. 16), note on Tertull. de Pœnit. in Oxford Library of the Fathers, p. 401.

From the time of Chrysostom to the time of the Greek Penitentials there is no material evidence. Joannes Climacus (cited by Daille) has a rule which points to the existence of confession in the eastern monasteries of the 6th century: a similar notice from Theodorus Studites, in his life of Plato, shows that the practice had a greater hold on the monks of the 9th century.

It appears from the Penitentials that some form of absolution was given in the east immediately after confession, a practice of which there is no trace for many centuries later in the Latin church. Joannes Arjunator orders that immediately after the confession is over and the priest has said the seven prayers of absolution, i. e., absolution in the precatory form, he is to raise the penitent from the ground and kiss him, and exhort him thus—"behold by the mercy of God who would have all men to be saved, you have fled for refuge to penitence, and made a confession, and been freed from all your former wicked works, do not therefore corrupt yourself a second time, &c. &c.;" after this the penance is imposed. In the contemporary Penitential of Joannes Monachus the form of absolution directly after confession is still stronger. "May God who for our sake became man, and bore the sins of all the world, turn to your good all these things which you, my brother, have confessed to me, His unworthy minister, and free you from them all in this world, and receive you in the world to come, and bring all to be saved, who is blessed for ever." But this absolution did not entitle the penitent to Holy Communion, nor do away with the necessity of subsequent penance, which often continued for years after this, and at the end of it another and more formal and perfect absolution was granted. (Moria. de Pœnit. vi. 25.) On the practice of confession among the sects which broke away from the Orthodox church, see Daniel (Codez Liturgicis, iv. p. 590).

iv. Confession before receiving Holy Communion may have been an occasional practice, but the presumption is very strong against its having been a general one. Socrates (H. E. v. 19), in his account of the abolition of the office of the Penitentiary, states that Nectarius was advised to strike his name from the roll of ecclesiastical officers, and allow each one henceforward to communicate as his own conscience should direct; a notice which seems to imply that at that time, Nectarius, who was Chrysostom's predecessor at Constantinople, it had been the custom for the people to consult with the Penitentiary before presenting themselves to receive the eucharist. But the passage is an isolated one; it is supported by no other authority; and whatever value it may have, it is a two-edged testimony, for if it proves that the custom prevailed at that time, it also proves that after that time it ceased. On the other hand there is this class of indirect evidence, that no such preparation was generally enforced. Eusebius (H. E. vi. 43), relates that during the episcopate of Cornelius at Rome, 1050 widows and destitute people received alms from the church; the Roman church must therefore at that time have consisted of many thousands, to minister to whom were the bishop himself and forty-six presbyters; and when the frequency with which the faithful communicated even at the latter half of the 3rd century, is borne in mind, it would seem to be almost physically impossible that each one should make an individual confession before communicating. Similar evidence is furnished from the ancient liturgies, in which special directions are given to the deacon to warn to depart from the church the catechumens, penitents, and others who were not allowed to communicate, but no hint a the Penitentials that some was given in the east in confession, a practice of which many centuries later in the names of Junator orders that the confession is over and the seven prayers of absolution. The precatory form, he is to come from the ground and kiss him, as—behold by the mercy of give all men to be saved, you go to penitence, and made a freed from all your former not therefore corrupt yourself &c.," after this the penitence contemporary Penitential of the form of absolution directly still stronger. given that those who had failed to confess were to be excluded. Stronger evidence is supplied by the absence of any mention of confession among the preparations required for a worthy reception of the sacrament. Clement of Alexandria (Strom. i. l. p. 318, Potter) seems to imply that some ministers judged who were or were not worthy [COMMUNION, HOLY, p. 414], though he himself thought the individual conscience the best guide. Chrysostom (Hom. 27 in Gen. p. 268, ed. Bened.) similarly leaves each one to judge of his fitness, "If we do this [reconcile ourselves with the brethren], we shall be able with a pure conscience to approach His holy and awful table, and to utter boldly those words joined to our prayers—the initiated know what I mean; wherefore I leave to everyone's conscience how, fulfilling that command, we may at that fearful moment utter these things with boldness." Augustine also tells his hearers that their own conscience, and that alone, must determine their fitness (Serm. 46 de Verb. Dom.), "considering your several degrees, and adhering to what you have professed, approach ye to the flesh of the Lord, approach ye to the blood of the Lord; whoso proveth himself not to be such, let him not approach." The second council of Châlons (2 Conc. Cath. c. 46), gives detailed directions on the manner and order of receiving, but no word about confession—an omission which bears so much the more strongly upon the question, because private confession had undoubtedly begun to take the place of penitential confession in the 9th century.

v. At the hour of death.—The evidence on this head, still more than on the preceding, is negative. If confession immediately before death had been customary, some notice of it would have found a place in the narratives of the last hours of the saints and fathers of the early church. But no such records appear. Cyprinus in three of his epistles (Ep. 18-20, Oxf. ed.), allows the confession of the lapsed to be received at their deathbed preparatory to imposition of hands; but this was only to meet the emergency of sudden illness overtaking penitents; it was no part of a systematic practice. Athanasius in his account of the death of Anthony (in Vit. Ant. Eremit. fia.), has no allusion to a previous confession. Equally silent is Gregory Nazianzen (Orat. 21), on the death of Athanasius; and (Orat. 19), on the death of his own father, Gregory bishop of Nazianzum; and (Orat. 20), is the eulogy which he delivered at the tomb of Basil. Gregory Nyssen (de Vit. Greg. Thaum.) has no account of the deathbed confession of Gregory Thaumaturgus; nor has Ambrose (de Off. Theod.) of that of Theodosius. Augustine (Confess. ix. 10, 11), records the last hours of his mother, but he records no last confession; his own last hours which Possidius (de Vit. Aug. c. 31) has described, were spent in penitence, but the only confession made was to God. "He was wont to say to us that even proved Christians, whether clergy or laity, should not depart from life without a full and fitting penitence, and this he carried out in his last illness. For he had the penitential psalms copied out and arranged against the wall in sets of four, and read them as he lay in bed, all through his sickness, and freely and bitterly wept. And he begged that he might not be interrupted, and that we would not go into his room except when his physicians came, or he needed food. And all that time we neither read nor spoke to him." Bede, narrating (Ecc. Hist. iv. 3), the death of bishop Ceulf, and (ib. iv. 23), the abess Hilda, and (Cath. Hist. c. 39) Cuthbert, states that each received the Holy Communion at the last, but not that it was preceded by confession. Similar is Eginhart's account (Vit. Car. Mag.), of the death of Charles the Great (see Duille iv. 3, where the evidence is drawn out in detail).

vi. Time and Manner.—The time of public confession was originally whenever the penitent felt moved to acknowledge his sin before the church; afterwards, in common with the whole course of discipline, the time was restricted to certain seasons [PENITENCE]. Private confession not being part of the recognized order of the church, had necessarily no time assigned to it. The capitulary of Theodulph (c. 36) indeed orders confessions to be made the week before Lent, but this is an exceptional instance. There is an example of a confession made in writing by Potamius, archbishop of Braga to the 10th council of Toledo, A.D. 656, charging himself with misdemeanours. The confession was entirely spontaneous, for the council having no suspicion of his guilt could not at first believe him; but on his reaffirming the fact, he was deposed and subjected to penitence for the remainder of his life; allowed, however, out of compassion to retain his title, his successor signing himself bishop and metropolitan. Robert, bishop of the Cenomani (Le Mans), also made a written confession, but the council to which it was made absolved him (Morin. de Poenit. ii. 2; v. 10).

It appears from the Greek Penitentials that confession was made sitting; the penitent kneeling only twice while making his confession, at the beginning, when the priest asked the Holy Spirit's aid to move the man to disburden his soul completely, and at the end, when a prayer was offered that he might obtain grace to perform his sentence conscientiously. The origin of this custom was the great length to which the form and process of confessing extended. The practice has since continued in the Greek church, for both priest and penitent to sit (Martene de Rit. i. 3; Daniel Codex Liturg. iv. p. 588). The Penitential of Joannes Jejunator gives the following instructions on the order and manner of confessing; "he who comes to confess ought to make three inclinations of the body as he approaches the sacred altar, and say three times 'I confess to thee O Father, Lord God of heaven and earth, whatever is in the secret places of my heart.' And after he has said this he should raise himself and stand erect; and he who receives his confession should question him with a cheerful countenance, which he who confesses should also if possible present, and kiss his hand, especially if he sees the penitent to be depressed by the severity of his sorrow and shame, and after that he should say to him in a cheerful and gentle voice " . . . and then follow 95 questions, and the priest orders the penitent, if not a woman, to uncover his head even though he wear a crown; he then prays with him; after that he raises him and bids him recover his head, and sits with him, and asks him what penance he can bear. The Penitential of Joannes Monachus directs that the priest should invite the penitent into a church or some other retired spot, with a cheerful countenance, as though he were inviting him to some magnificent feast, and exhort him to make a confession of his sins to him: the priest should then recite with him the 69th Psalm, and the Trisagion, and bid him uncover his head, and neither should sit down before the priest has minutely investigated all that is in his heart. The penitent should afterwards prostrate himself on the earth and lie there, while the priest prays for him: the priest is then to raise him and kiss him, and lay his hand upon his neck and comfort him, after that they are to sit together. Aleuin, or the author of De Divinis officiis, orders the penitent coming to confess to bow humbly to the priest, who is then on his own behalf to say "Lord be merciful to me a sinner," and afterwards to order the penitent to sit opposite to him, and speak to him about his sins; the penitent is then to rehearse the articles of his faith, and afterwards kneel and raise his hands, and implore the priest to intercede with God for all the sins which have been omitted in the confession; he is then to prostrate himself on the ground, and the priest is to suffer him to lie there awhile, and afterwards raise him and impose a penance upon him; afterwards the penitent is again to prostrate himself, and ask the priest to pray that he may have grace given him to persevere in performing his penance; the priest then offers a prayer, which is followed by six others, which are found in all the Western Penitentials; the penitent then rises from the ground and the priest from his seat, and they enter the church together, and there conclude the penitential service. Compare Morinus (de Poenit. iv. 18-19).

Literature.—Morinus (de Poenit. lib. ii. et passim) which is however hampered by the Roman doctrine of obligatory confession, and contains far fewer details on this than on the other stages of discipline. What is to be said on the distinctively Roman side of the controversy will be found in Bellarmine (de Poenit. lib. iii.); and on the Protestant side in Ussher (Answer to a Challenge, s.v. Confession, Lond. 1625). The subject is more thoroughly treated from the same side in Daille (de Atrio Confess. Genèv. 1661), a very learned controversial work, and the source of most of the subsequent Protestant writings, which deal with confession. Also Bingham (Antiq. xviii. 3), Marshall (Penitential Discipline), and a long note on confession, founded on Daille, appended by the editor of the Oxf. Lib. of Fathers to Tertullian (de Poenit.) [G. M.]

EXONARTHEX (Ἐξωνάρθηξ). Monastic churches sometimes have (besides the ordinary NARTHEX at the west end) an outer narthex, where the monks may say those portions of their devotions which bear the character of penitence without being disturbed by the influx of the general congregation. Cedrenus says that the great church of St. Sophia at Constantinople had four narthexes, but other authorities attribute to it only two (Daniel, Curia lib. iv. 202). [C.]

EXORCISM (Ἐρκωσις, Ἐρκωσμός, Ἐρκωσμός, ἄρκωσις, ἄρκωσις, ἄρκωσις, ἄρκωσις) is the employment of adjuration, and especially the naming the name of Jesus Christ, with a view to expel an evil spirit. "Exorcismus est sermo inepationis contra immundum spiritum in enepurgamentis sive catechumenis factus, per quem ab illis diaboli nequissima virtus et inveterata malitia vel excursio violenta fugetur" (Isidore, De Div. Off. li. 20).

1. To the early Christians the heathen world presented itself as under the dominion of evil spirits; everywhere they recognized the need of driving these spirits from their ancient seats, whether in the bodies and souls of men, in the brute creation, or in inanimate objects. They saw themselves surrounded by squadrons and gross bands of daemonia, supernatural beings who worked for evil under their several captains (Origen, contra Celsum, bk. vii. p. 378, Spencer; viii. p. 399); daemonia were the great officers of the evil world, and might well have faces and toga praetexta (Tertullian, De Idolol. 18); the gods of the nations were daemonia (ib. 20; Orig. c. Cels. p. 378, quoting Ps. xvi. 5); daemonia were by some devilish magic compelled to inhabit the statues in an idol's temple (Minucius Felix, Oct. c. 27; Tert. u. s. 7 and 15; Orig. c. Cels. vii. p. 374); the theatre was the very special dominion of evil spirits (Tertul. de Spectac. 26). Demons ruled the flight of birds, the lots, the oracles; they troubled men's minds, disturbed their rest, crept with their subtle influence into bodies and caused disease, distorted limbs; they compelled men to worship them, in order that, fed with the savour of the offerings, they might release those whom they had bound (Minucius, Oct. c. 27). And the members of this great supernatural army were driven from their seats by the mere word of a simple Christian naming over them the name of Christ (Acts xix. 13; Justin Martyr, Apol. ii. c. 8; 1bid. v. Trypho, c. 85; Tertul. id. Scorpulac. cc. 2 and 4, Apol. c. 23; Orig. c. Cels. iii. p. 133) with no parade of incantations or magic formulae, by mere prayers and adjurations (ὁρκωσις). Orig. c. Cels. vii. p. 334; and that not only from the bodies and souls of men, but from haunted places and from the lower animals; for these too fell under the tyranny of demons (l. c.). From such expressions as these it is evident that exorcism was practised from a very early period in the church.

In one form, indeed, exorcism was practised by the Lord Himself and His disciples, namely, in the casting out of evil spirits from those who were in a special sense "possessed" or "demoniac;" and such exorcism was continued for some generations in the church (DIXON: EXORCISM). But we are at present concerned with the more general form of exorcism, by which the inherent evil demon was to be expelled from some creature or substance at specially "possessed," but belonging to the "evil world."

2. It is not wonderful that when the minds of men were full of the conception of an all-prevailing army of evil spirits in the world around them, they should endeavour to free from this influence those whom they received from heathenism into the holy ground of the church. Hence, at a comparatively early period, we find candidates for baptism not only renouncing for themselves all allegiance to Satan and his powers, but having pronounced over them a formula of exorcism.

It is probable that in the first instance the use of exorcism was confined to the case of those

ATRIUM of a church, where it might be used to contain HOLY WATER.

5. Besides human beings, various inanimate objects were exorcised. Of these we may mention especially water (BAPTISM, §§ 30, 42; FONT, BENEDICTION OF; HOLY WATER), salt for use in sacred offices (SALT, BENEDICTION OF), and oil for various uses (CHURCH; OIL, HOLY).

EXORCISTS. Exorcists are only once mentioned in the New Testament (Acts xix, 13), and then without any reference to the power given to Christians to cast out devils. [See DIET, OF BIBLE.] In the early days of the church, it appears to have been considered that the power of exorcising evil spirits was a special gift of God to certain persons, who are therefore called exorcists. In the Apostolic Constitutions (viii, c. 26), it is said that an exorcist is not ordained, because the power of exorcising is a free gift of the grace of God, through Christ, and that whoever has received this gift will be made manifest in the exercise of it. It is added that if expedient an exorcist may be ordained bishop, priest, or deacon. Exorcists are not named among those who received ecclesiastical stipends, nor are they mentioned in the Apostolic Canons, though probably their office is alluded to in the direction that a Gentile convert who has an evil spirit may not be received into the church till he has been purified (καθαριστής, Can. 70). Thomassin (Vet. et Nov. Eccl. Discip. l. 2, c. 30, § 1, 8), thinks that exorcists were either priests or deacons. So Eusebius makes mention of one Romanus, as deacon and exorcist in the church of Caesarea in Palestine (De Martyr. Palest. c. 2).

Tertullian speaks as if all Christians were exorcists, driving away evil spirits by the exorcisms of their prayers. Thus (De Idol. c. 11), he forbids Christians to have anything to do with the sale of things used for the purposes of idolatry, asking with what consistency they could exorcise their own inmates, to whom they had offered their houses as a shrine (collarium); and in another place (De Cor. Mil. c. 11), uses as an argument against Christians entering the military service, that they might be called upon to guard the heathen temples, so as to defend those by night whom by their exorcisms they had put to flight during the day.

But it is evident that in later times they were reckoned among the minor orders of clergy. Cyprian (Ep. 69, Mag. Fil.), speaks of exorcists as casting out devils by man's word and God's power, and in his epistle to Firmilian (Ep. 75), says that one of the exorcists, inspired by the grace of God, cast out a certain evil spirit who had made pretensions to sanctity. Cornelius in his epistle (Euseb. H. E. i. c. 43) names forty-two exorcists among the clergy of the church of Rome. Epiphanius (Expos. Fid. c. 21), mentions them among the clergy, ranking them with the heremiteute, immediately after the deaconesses. Paulinus of Nola (De S. Felic. Natal. crm. 4), speaks of St. Felix as having been promoted from the order of lectors to the office of exorcist. The council of Laodicea (c. 24), mentions them among the minor clergy, placing them between the singers and the doo-keepers, and, in another canon (c. 26), forbids any to exorcise either in church or in private houses, who had not been appointed to the office by the bishops. The council of Antioch (c. 10), places them after the subdeacons, among the clergy who might be appointed by the chorepiscopi. The 4th council of Carthage (c. 7), provides an office for the ordination of an exorcist. He was to receive from the hands of the bishop a book, in which were written forms of exorcism, with the bidding, "Take and commit to meotery, and receive power to lay hands on enurgemens whether baptized or catechumens." The same council also provided that exorcists might lay hands on an enurgemen at any time (c. 90), and (c. 92) gave it into their charge to provide the enurgemens with their daily food while remaining in the church. [DEMONIAC.]

The names of four exorcists, designating themselves by no other titles, are found among the signatories of the first council of Arles (Routh's Reliq. Sac. iv, p. 312).

There seems little reason for connecting the exorcists with the form of exorcism that was used in the case of all catechumens. Their work, as expressly allotted to them by the 4th council of Carthage (c. 7), lay among all enurgemens, whether baptized or not. [P. O.]

EXPOSING OF INFANTS [compare FOUNDLINGS]. The frequency of the exposition of infants among the ancient heathens is a fact to which both the mythology and the history of Greece and Rome bear frequent witness. Among the early Christian writers we find exposition, together with actual infanticide, constantly cast in the teeth of their Pagan opponents. "I see you," writes Minucius Felix, "now casting forth the sons whom ye have begotten to the wild beasts and to the fowls of the air" (Octavius, c. 30, § 2; 31, § 4). Lactantius (bk. vi. c. 20) inveighs against the false pity of those who expose infants. Justin, Tertullian, Augustine and others might be quoted to much the same effect.

A law of Alexander Severus, which has been retained in Justinian's Code (bk. viii. t. lii, l. 1; A. D. 225), allowed the recovering of an infant exposed against the will or without the knowledge of the owner or person entitled to the services of its mother, whether slave or underservitus, but only on condition of repaying the fair cost of its maintenance and training to a trade, unless theft could be established—an enactment obviously framed only to secure the rights of slave-owners, and not inspired by any consideration of humanity for the infants themselves. There is something of a higher spirit in a law of Diocletian and Maximian, A. D. 295 (Code, bk. v., t. iv., l. 16), enacting that where a female infant had been cast forth by her father and brought up by another person, who sought to marry her to his own son, the father was bound to consent to the marriage, or in case of refusal (if we construe the text aright), to pay for his daughter's maintenance. Constantine (A.D. 331), by a law contained in the Theodosian Code (bk. v., t. vii., l. 1), but not reproduced by Justinian, enacted that whoever took up an infant cast forth from that house by the will of a father or master, and nourished it till it became strong, might retain it in whatever condition he pleased, either as a child or as a slave, without any fear of recovery by those who have voluntarily cast out their new-born slaves or children. The growth of Christian humanity is shown in a constitution of Valentinian, Valens and Gratian, adopted by Justinian (Code, bk. viii., t. iii., l. 2; A.D. 374), which absolutely forbade masters or patrons to recover infants exposed by themselves, if charitably saved by others, and laid down as a duty that every one must nourish his own offspring. A constitution of Honorius and Theodosius, in the Theodosian Code (A.D. 412), repeated the prohibition, observing that "none can call one his own whom he contemned while perishing," but required a bishop's signature by way of attestation of the facts (bk. v., t. vii., l. 2).

The law last referred to may seem in some degree to explain a canon of the council or synod of Naison, A.D. 442. There is a universal complaint, it says, on the subject of the exposition of infants, who are cast forth not to the mercy of others, but to the dogs, whilst the fear of lawsuits deters others from saving them. This therefore is to be observed, that according to the statutes of the princes the church be taken to witness; from the altar on the Lord's day the minister is to announce that the church knows an exposed infant to have been taken up, in order that within ten days any person may acknowledge and receive it back; and any who after the ten days may bring any claim or accusation is to be dealt with by the church as a manslaughter (cc. 9, 10). A canon almost to the same effect, but in clearer language, was enacted by the slightly later 2nd council of Arles, A.D. 452, indicating that which serves to explain both the law of Honorius and the two canons just referred to, viz. that it was the practice to expose infants "before the church" (c. 51). The council of Agde, in 506, simply confirmed former enactments.

In the East, the full claims of Christian humanity were at last admitted by Justinian, as towards foundlings themselves, though without sufficient consideration for parental duties. He not only absolutely forbade the re-vindication of exposed infants under any circumstances, but also the treating of them, by those who have taken charge of them, either as slaves, freedmen, coloni or ascriptitii, declaring such children to be absolutely free (Code, bk. viii., t. lii., l. 3; A.D. 529; see also bk. i., t. iv., l. 24; A.D. 530). This applied to infants cast away either in churches, streets or any other place, even though a plaintiff should give some evidence of a right of ownership over them (bk. viii., t. lii., l. 4). The 153rd Novel, however, shows that it was still the practice in certain districts (Thessalonica is specified) to expose new-born infants in the churches, and after they had been brought up to reclaim them as slaves;

The Wisigothic law contains some rather remarkable provisions as to the exposition of infants (bk. iv., t. iv., cc. 1, 2). Where a person has out of compassion taken up a foundling of either sex, wherever exposed, and when it is nourished up the parents acknowledge it, if it be the child of a free person, let them either give back a slave in its place or pay the price of one; otherwise, let the foundling be reclaimed by the judge of the territory from the ownership of the parents, and let these be subject to perpetual exile. If they have not wherewithal to pay, let him serve for the infant who cast it forth, and let the latter remain in freedom, whom the pity of strangers has preserved. If indeed slaves of either sex have cast forth an infant in fraud of its masters, when he has been nourished up, let the nourisher receive one-third of its value, the master swearing to or proving his ignorance of the exposing. But if he know of it, let the foundling remain in the power of him who nourished it.

In a collection of Irish canons, ascribed to the end of the 7th century, is one "on infants cast forth in the church," which enacts, in very uncorrect and obscure Latin, that such an infant shall be a slave to the church unless sent away; and that seven years' penance is to be borne by those who cast infants forth (bk. xii., c. 22).

A capitulary of uncertain date (supposed about 744) enacts, in accordance with the canon of the synod of Naison before referred to, that if an infant exposed before the church has been taken up by the compassion of any one, such person shall advise—probably on the church-door—a letter of notice (contestationis pont. . . epistolam). If the infant be not acknowledged within ten days, let the person who has taken it up securely retain it (c. 1).

The "Lex Romana," supposed to represent the law of the Roman population of Italy in Lombard times, contains a less liberal provision on this subject, founded on the earlier imperial law. If a new-born infant has been cast out by its parents either in the church or in the precincts (platea), and any one with the knowledge of the father or mother and of the master has taken it up and nourished it by his labour, it shall remain in his power who took it up. And if a person knew not its father or mother or master, and wished nevertheless to take it up, let him present the infant before the bishop (pontificem) or the clerics who serve that church, and receive from the hand of that bishop and those clerics an epi-tolu collectio, and thenceforth, let him have power either to give such infant liberty, or to retain it in perpetual slavery (bk. v., l. vii.). [J. M. L.]

EXPULSION FROM A MONASTERY.

So soon as there began to be any sort of discipline among the ascetics who dwelt together in a community, expulsion inevitably became a necessary part of it. In the so-called "Rule of Pachomius," expulsion (or a flogging) was the penalty for insubordination, licentiousness, quarrelling, covetousness, gluttony (cf. Cass. Inst. iv. 16). Menard, however, thinks that this was only expulsion for a stated time (Bened. Anab. Concord. Regg. xxxi. 5). By the Regula Orientalis

(c. 35) obstinate offenders are to be expelled, Benedict, with characteristic prudence, prescribed expulsion for contumacy (Reg. c. 71), on the principle that the gangrened limb must be lopped off, lest the rest of the body should be infected with the poison (ib. c. 28), while with characteristic gentleness he allowed such offenders to be re-admitted, if penitent, so often as thrice, on condition of their taking the lowest place among the brethren (ib. c. 29). Some commentators, however, take this permission as not extending to the case of a monk expelled for such vices as could hardly fail to corrupt the community (Mart. Reg. Comm. loc. cit.). The Benedictine reformers generally made expulsion more common and readmission more difficult. Fructuosus orders all incorrigible offenders to be expelled (Reg. cc. 8, 16); and the Regula Cujusdam, still more severe, enacts expulsion for lying, fornication, persistent murmuring, and even abusive language (cc. 6, 8, 16, 18). At a later period, under the stern discipline of Citeaux, a monk was to be unhooked and expelled, even for theft above a certain value (Mart. Reg. Comm. c. 33). Obviously the frequency or infrequency of such a penalty as expulsion depended on the monastery being regarded rather as a reformatory or as a place of ideal perfection. [I. G. S.]

EXSUPERANTIUS, deacon and martyr at Spoleto, with Sabinus the bishop, and others, under Maximian; commemorated Dec. 30 (Mart. Rom. Vet., Adonis, Usuardi). [W. F. G.]

EXSUPERIA, martyr at Rome with Simpronius and others; commemorated July 26 (Mart. Usuardi). [W. F. G.]

EXSUPERIUS. (1) One of the Theban legion, martyr at Selunium in Belgic Gaul (the Valais), under Maximian; commemorated Sept. 22 (Mart. Rom. Vet., Hieron., Adonis, Usuardi).

(2) Bishop and confessor at Toulouse; commemorated Sept. 28 (Mart. Usuardi).

(3) Martyr at Vienna with Severus and Felicianus; commemorated Nov. 19 (Mart. Adonis, Usuardi). [W. F. G.]

EXTREME UNCTION. [SICK, VISITATION OF THE: UNCTION.]

EX VOTO. [VOTIVE OFFERINGS.]

EYES, TOUCHING OF. 1. The first council of Constantinople (A.D. 381) laid it down (c. 7) that Arians and certain other heretics were to be received into the church, without repentance, on renouncing their heresy and being crossed or anointed with holy unguent (μύρον) on the forehead, eyes, &c. So in the form of baptism given by Daniel (Codex Lit. iv. 507) from the Greek Euchologion, the priest after baptism anoints the neophyte with holy unguent, mak g the sign of the cross on forehead, eyes, nostrils, mouth, ears, breast, hands, and feet, saying, "the seal of the gift of the Holy Spirit. Amen." Compare Martene, De Rit. Ant. l. i. 17, Ord. 24, 25.

2. In extreme unction, the eyes are anointed with holy oil. Thus, in the Ratold MS. of the Gregorian Sacramentary (p. 549, ed. Menard), the priest is directed to anoint the eyes, with the words: "Ungo oculos tuos de oleo sanctificato,

3. It seems to have been the custom to touch the eyes, as well as the other organs of sense, with the moisture remaining on the lips after communicating (Cyril of Jerusalem, Catech. Myst. v. 22; see COMMUNION, Holy, p. 413; EARS, TOUCHING OF). [C.]

EZEKIEL, the prophet; commemorated April 10 (Mart. Rom. Vet., Bede, Adonis, Usuardi); Miziah 5 = March 31, and Hamle 27 = July 21 (Cod. Ethiop.); Sept. 3 (Cod. Armen.). [W. F. G.]

EZRA, the prophet; commemorated Jakatit 10 = Feb. 4, and Hamle 6 = June 30 (Cal. Ethiop., July 13 (Mart. Usuardi)). [W. F. G.]

FABARIUS. The Cantores anciently fasted the day before they were to sing divine offices, and ate beans, as being supposed to benefit the voice (Pliny, Nat. Hist. xx. 6); whence they were called by the heathen Fabarii (Isidore, De Div. Off. ii. 12). [C.]

FABIANUS, the pope, martyr at Rome in the time of Decius; commemorated Jan. 20 (Mart. Rom. Vet., Bede, Hieron., Adonis, Usuardi). [W. F. G.]

FABIUS, martyr at Caesarea; "Passio" July 31 (Mart. Rom. Vet., Adonis, Usuardi). [W. F. G.]

FABRICA ECCLESIAE. [CHURCHES, MAINTENANCE OF, p. 388.]

FACE, BRANDING IN THE. It was enacted under Constantine (Code, lib. ix. tit. 47, l. 17), that branding should not be in the face, as disfiguring the heavenly beauty [CORPORAL PUNISHMENTS, p. 470]. [C.]

FACITERGIUM (also facitergium, facitergium, facitergiula; facialis, faciale). This, as its name indicates, is a handkerchief for wiping the face ("facitergium et manitergium, a tergenlo fricium vel manus vocatur." Isidore, Etyrn. xix. 26). Mention of this is occasionally found in various monastic rules. It is appointed as part of the furniture of a monk's couch in the Rule of St. Isidore (c. 14; p. 127, part 2, in Holstenius, Codex Regularum: ed. Paris, 1663). See also Magistri Regula, cc. 17, 19, 81 (op. cit. pp. 214, 216, 257). The last passage ordains that there shall be dealt out "singula facitergia per decandam." Gregory of Tours (Vitae Fratrum, viii. 8; p. 1191, ed. Ruinart) speaks of the value set upon the "facitergium dependentibus villis intextum, quod Sanctus [i.e. Nicetius Lugdunensis] super caput in die obtus sui habuit." The facitergi used by nuns were at times embroidered (Caesarii Regula ad Virgines, c. 42; Holstenius, part 3, p. 22). Again, Venantius Fortunatus, in his life of St. Radegundis of France, describes her on one occasion as "circa altare cum facistergio jacentem pulverem colligens" (c. 2; Patrol. lxxii. 653). One more example may suffice, where the word, perhaps, appears in the transitional state of its meaning: "donata etiam particula, sancti orarii, 11 est facialis" (Hypomnesticon de Anastasio Apocrisiario, etc., in Anast. Biblioth. Collectanea; Patrol., cxxix. 685). For further examples, see Ducange's Glossarium, s. vv. [R. S.]

FAITH [SOPHIA.]

The present article is intended to give an account of the principal names applied to Christians in early times, whether by themselves or by others.

The names most common among Christians in the apostolic and sub-apostolic ages seem to have been Saints (ἅγιοι), Elect (ἐκλεκτοί), Brethren (ἀδελφοί), and Faithful (πίστοι), often followed by the words, ἐν Ἰησοῦ Χριστῷ.

The words πίστοι and Fidelis were also used in a special sense to distinguish the baptized Christian from the catechumen. Thus Augustine (Tract. in Joan., 44, c. 9) says that if a man tells us that he is a Christian, we have to ask further, whether he is catechumen or "fidelis." Hence such an inscription as CHRISTIANA FIDELIS (Le Blanc, Inscript. de la Gaule, i. 373) is not a mere pleonasm. So the council of Elvira (C. Ell., c. 67) seems to distinguish between "fidelis" and "catechumena." In the liturgies, the portion of the office at which catechumens were not allowed to be present was called Missi Fidelium, and the Lord's Prayer Fidelium Oratio. See Suicer's Thesaurus, s. v. Πίστις. Eusebius (Præp. Evang., i. 1) repudiates the charge that Christians were called πίστοι from their credulity.

Fidelis is a frequent epithet in inscriptions, particularly in the case of young children, who might otherwise be supposed to have died unbaptized. Thus an inscription given by Marangoni (Acta S. Utorini, 103) runs thus: IN REQVIESCIT IN PACE FILIPPVS IN IAS FIDELIS. Similar inscriptions are given in the case of a child who died at the age of a year and nine months (ib., p. 109), and of another who died at the age of five years and five months (ib., p. 96). Another may be seen in Cavelloni (Ant. Civit. di Chiusi, p. 33). On a marble at Florence (Gori, Inscr. Ant. Etrur., iii. 314) it is said of a child of three years and three months, ΠΙCΤΗ ΕΤΕΑΕΥΤΗCΕΝ. In one case given by Marini (Frat. Arval., p. 171), the inscription describes an ancestress (major) begging baptism for a child at the point of death: PETIVIT AB ECCLÉSIA UT FIDELIS DE SECVLO RECEPISSET (i. e. recederet). In another case (Osterio, Inscr. Vct., p. 267), one of two brothers, who died at eight years old, is described as NEOPITVS, while the brother, who died at seven, is described as FIDELIS. And again a guardian described as FIDELIS, erects a monument to a nursing who was yet among the "audientes" or catechumens: LYMNÆAE AVDIENTI (Gori, u. s., i. 228).

Such inscriptions as VIXIT IN PACE FIDELIS, or REQVIESCIT FIDELIS IN PACE, are too common to need particularizing (Martigny, Dikt. des Antiq. Chret., s. v. Fidelis).

Other names given to Christians were perhaps either (1) Designations of some peculiarity of their practice or profession, rather than recognized titles; more epithets than names; or (2) names given them by the outside world, either in derision or by mistake.

1. Under the first head may be classed (a) Ἰεσσαίς, Jesseneans, a name which Epiphanius (Haer., 20, n. 4) says may be derived from Jesus, or (as seems far-fetched and improbable) from Jesse, the father of David. Epiphanius (u. s.) considers this name earlier than that of "Christian."

Another such name was (b) ἡρωστικοί, applied to Christians by Clement of Alexandria (Strom., i. p. 294; ii. p. 384; vi. p. 665; vii. p. 748) as having the true knowledge. Later we find Athanasius (sp. Socrat. Haer. Eccl., iv. 23) using the term of the Ascetics of Egypt, and Socrates (ibid.) tells us that Evagrius Ponticus wrote a book for the use of these Ascetics, called "The Gnostic, or Rules for the Contemplative Life."

(c) Θεοφόροι, a name claimed by Iguatius in his interview with Trajan (Acta Igu., t. ap. Grabe, Spiral., t. ii. p. 10), because he "carried Christ in his heart," and seemingly conceded especially to him, was commonly used of all Christians, as Pearson (Vind. Iguat., par. ii. c. 12, p. 397) shows by quotations from many writers of the 2nd century.

Clement of Alexandria, agreeing about the meaning of the name, gives the varieties of it, Θεοφόρων and Θεοφορούμενος, and Eusebius (viii., 10) quotes a letter of Phileas, bishop of Thumis, to his flock, in which he calls the martyrs Χριστοφόροι.

(e) The name Ecclesiastici was used within the Christian body (Bingham, i. 1, § 8) to distinguish the clergy from the laity, and with a modification of this meaning of the word Eusebius (iv., 7) speaks of "ecclesiastical writers;" and it was also used of Christians generally in contrast to those who did not belong to the ἐκκλησία, as Jews, infidels, and heretics. Bingham quotes Eusebius (iv., 7, v. 27), and Cyril of Jerusalem (Catech., 15, n. 4), as employing the word in this sense, and Valesius (not in Euseb. i. ii. c. 25) finds the same use of it in "Origen, Epiphanius, Jerome, and others" [ECCLESIASTICS].

(f) Bingham asserts that Christians were called of τοῦ δόγματος, "They of the Faith," giving as his authority for this statement the rescript of Aurelian against Paul of Samosata, rescript by Eusebius (vii., 30), in which the bishops of Rome and of Italy are called ἑπισκοποι τοῦ δόγματος.

(g) Christians also called themselves CATHOLIC [see the words]; and (h) Pisciculti, alluding to the mystic Fish [BAPTISM, p. 171; FISH].

It is to be observed, says Bingham (i. 1, § 6) that all these names express some relation to God or to Christ, and that none of them were taken from the names of men, as was the case with the heresies and sects. He quotes Chrysostom (Hom., 33 in Act.), Epiphanius (Haer., 42 Marcionit., also Haer., 10.), Gregory Nazianzen (Orat., 31, p. 506) and others as noticing these opposite tendencies. The name of Christian was neglected by the heretics for the names of their leaders, while the Christians thought it enough without any other title derived from parents, country, city, quality, or occupation; see the case of the deacon Simeon martyred in the reign of Antoninus, related by Eusebius (v., 1).

ality, or occupation; see the on Sanctus martyred in the s, related by Eusebius (v. 1).

II. Among the names given to Christians from without their body are probably to be reckoned

(1) Χρόστου, a name which would easily arise from a misunderstanding or mispronunciation of the name Χριστού, and was naturally not refused by Christians; referred to by Justin Martyr (Apol. i. 4), Lactantius (Inst. iv. 7), Tertullian (Apol. c. 3), and others.

(2) It was quite to be expected that they would be called Jews by the heathen world, and there is evidence of this. Bingham (i. l. § 10) refers to a passage in Dio's Life of Domitian, in which he speaks of the Christian martyr Ocilius Glabrio (Baronius, an. 91, § 1), being put to death for turning to the Jews' religion.

Again, Suetonius says (Caes. c. 26) that Claudius "expelled the Jews from Rome because they made disturbances at the instigation of Christus;" and Spartianus (in Caes. c. i.) says that Caracalla's play-fellow was a Jew, Caracalla, according to Tertullian (ad Scapul. c. 4), having been "facte Christiano educatus."

(3) There remains to be considered the word Christian, a name which differs from those already spoken of in being traceable to a particular locality, and with great probability to a particular year. The reason why the name arose when and where it did, is probably to be found in the long stay—"a whole year"—(Acts xi. 25) made in Antioch by Paul and Barnabas after their return from Tarsus, in the assembly of the church there for the same time, and in the publicity given to the teaching of Christ by frequent addresses to the people.

The question whether the Christians assumed the name themselves or received it from the Jews, or from the Gentiles, can only be determined with an approach to certainty.

(a) The only reason for thinking that the Christians assumed this name is the language of Acts xi. 26, ἠραστάρι τε πρώτον ἐν Ἀντιοχίᾳ τοῖς μαθηταῖς Χριστιανούς, because χρηστίζω, when used of acquiring a name generally means to assume one; but on the other hand, both in the Acts and in the Epistles, Christians speak of themselves as "brethren," "believers," "disciples," "saints," and only in three places in the N.T. is the word Christian used (Acts xi. 26, xxvi. 28; 1 Peter iv. 16), in only one of which, and there doubtfully, is the word used by Christians of themselves.

(b) Nor is it likely that the Jews would give them a name which would virtually concede the claim made by Christians, and so strenuously denied by Jews. For "Christ" being the Greek equivalent of "Messiah," to call the followers of Christ "Christians" would be to acknowledge Christ as the Messiah; nor would they have used so sacred a name in derision even for the sake of insulting a despised and hated sect. When they wanted to designate them, they used a name derived from a place they held in contempt (John i. 46, vii. 41; Luke xiii. 2), and called St. Paul "a ringleader of the sect of the 'Nazarenes'" (Acts xxiv. 5).

(c) But it is not unlikely that the Gentiles, seeing the wide aim of this new community, its readiness to admit all sorts of people, and even to dispense with the rite of circumcision in its converts, should have early come to distinguish it from the sects of the Jews, with which they very naturally at first confounded it, and so should have attached to it a new name. And this probability is increased when we remember that "Christ" was the title of the head of the new sect, represented his peculiar office to them, and was the name by which he was generally known in their letters and conversation.

It would be adopted, of course, by the Gentiles from them, as we know it was (Tacit. Ann. xv. 44), and in a city like Antioch, "notorious for inventing names of derision, and for turning its wit into channels of ridicule" (cf. Procopius, Hell. Pers. ii. 8, quoted by Conybeare and Howson, vol. i. p. 130), the new society would soon get its name. The form of the word indicates its Roman origin (cf. Salliani, Pompeiani, and later Othoniani and Vitelliani), and that it was first used as a term of reproach may be gathered from the use made of it by Tacitus in the passage referred to above, "quos per flagitia invidios vulgus Christianos appellabat." The great increase in the number of Gentile converts would soon turn what was at first a nickname into a title of honour, and the pre-eminence of Rome in the world naturally made the Roman name what it has become, the universal one. It is interesting to contrast with "Christian" the name "Jesuit," as unlike the other in its comparatively modern date and Greek form as in its history and significance.

See Conybeare and Howson (vol. i. p. 129 ff.), from whom this note on the word Christian is derived.

[E. C. II.] III. The following names were appellations of scorn, or "nick-names," given to Christians by their enemies.

1. That they should be called Atheists was inevitable in an empire in which the vulgar at least knew of no gods that could not be represented by art and man's device. And Atheism was in fact a common charge against them. See Athenagoras (Leg. pro Christ. c. 3) and Justin Martyr (Apol. l. c. 6). "Down with the Atheists" (αἶψα τοῖς ἀθεοῦς) was a mob-cry against the Christians (Euseb. II. E. iv. 15, § 6).

2. From the time that Christians were first recognised as a sect, they were contemptuously called Nazarenes (Acts xxiv. 5; Epiphanius, Haeres. 29, c. 1; Jerome on Isaiah XLII.; Prudentius, Peristeph. ii. 25). This no doubt at first designated the supposed origin of the Lord and the disciples from Nazareth; but the variety of ways in which the word is written (Ναζαρηνοί, Ναζαρηνοί, Ναζαρηνοί, Ναζαρηνοί, Ναζαρηνοί) seems to show that in later times various senses were attached to it. It was also, perhaps, sometimes used to designate a sect of Judaizing Christians, rather than the whole body of the church.

3. The name Gallilei was one which the philosophic emperor Julian (Epist. 7) endeavoured to fix upon the Christians (see Gregory Nazianz., Orat. iii. p. 81; Socrates, II. E. iii. 12), meaning, no doubt, to express the contempt of a cultivated man for a sect which arose in a despised district of Palestine, among shepherds and fishermen. His last words were, according to Theodoret (II. E. ii. 21), νερίκηρας, Γαλιλαίε, "Thou hast conquered, O Gallilean!" Cyril of Alexandria (v. Julian. iii. p. 39) sets himself to show that the name "Gallilean," if it implied roughness and want of culture, was no more applicable to Christians than to Julian pulpit. Fidistorum, my portable seat, he used to use to a low archbishop or mitred or his enthronisation, and, offered himself to his full official attire, it was also placed at the side of the bishop, when which he had no jurisdiction was present (see Caecilius, s. v.; Augustin, ii. 556). family was relieved from some of its most galling burdens. This happy change, however, it must be remembered, depended entirely upon the personal feeling and will of the master; for slavery was not legally and publicly alleviated to any great extent, until the time of Justinian, who did much to promote its extinction, after which it was gradually discontinued or changed to serfdom (Nilman, Hist. Christ. iii. 343, and Latin Christ. i. 391; and SLAVERY in this work). In the mean time Christians in general did not think it wrong to have bondmen in their service (Clem. Alex. Pædag. iii. 12).

But besides particular results of this nature, Christianity to some extent changed the general habits of men, and tended to make them more domestic and less public in their feelings and pursuits. More especially, while Christians were small communities separate and distinct from the general mass of the population, they felt it necessary to withdraw themselves in some degree from public affairs; they were less frequent in their attendance on courts of law; they could not, without scruples and repugnance, be present at many of the ordinary amusements and popular festivities, mixed up as they were with the idolatry and some of the worst moral abominations of paganism. Thus they were thrown back more upon the society of each other, and upon their own family life. And although afterwards, when the new religion became dominant, and was at length the religion of the people, the objections to public life greatly disappeared, the family life with its attractions and its virtues continued to maintain a wholesome influence, which has indeed never since been lost. (See Nilman, Hist. Christ. iii. 134.)

But to look more closely at the family life of Christianity, it must be observed that the abnegation of idolatry caused a displacement of the household and hearth gods—the Penates and Lares of the Romans,—together with all family rites which savoured of idol worship, and a substitution of Christian observances in their stead. And as it seems to have been the custom of religious Romans to offer their prayers the first thing in the morning, in the Lavarium, or household shrine (Lampridius, Alex. Sever. 29. 31); so family prayer, in which the different members of a Christian household joined, appears to have had its place from the beginning of the new religion. Such united prayer seems to be alluded to in the remark, "that your prayers be not hindered" (1 Pet. iii. 7). And Clement of Alexandria, at the end of the second century, testifies to the same thing when, commenting on the words, "where two or three are gathered together in my name," he says that the three were a husband, a wife, and a child (ἄνδρα, καὶ γυναῖκα, καὶ τέκνον τοῦς τοῖς λέγει, Stromat. iii. 10). And the same author speaks expressly of "prayer and reading of the Scriptures (εὐχὴ καὶ ἀνάγνωσις) in Christian families (Pædag. ii. 184).

It is evident from the words of Tertullian (ad Uxor. ii. 4) and subsequently of Cyprrian (De Lapsis, c. 26) that Christians were in the habit of taking home portions of the eucharistic bread, and eating a small piece of it every morning, as an act of devotion [EULOGIAE, p. 629].

The practice also of making the sign of the cross upon the forehead, to which at a later period so much efficacy was superstitiously ascribed, had become before the beginning of the third century a perpetually repeated ceremony in Christian families, being used "on getting up and going to bed, on putting on their clothes or their shoes, on walking out or sitting down, at table or at the bath;" in short in every act or movement of the day (see Tertullian de Cor. Mil. § 3). This little symbolical action may in the early times have been a useful memento to Christians in the midst of so many things of a contrary tendency, however much, like some other practices once innocent and salutary, it was subsequently used in the service of formalism and error. And the same desire of being constantly reminded of their Christian position led them to adorn their gobbets with the figure of a shepherd carrying a lamb, and their seal-rings with a dove, an anchor, and other similar devices. (Neander, Hist. Christ. p. 393.)

Besides these there were other domestic observances which from time to time interested the piety as well as the natural affections of Christian households, especially those which were connected with the baptism of children, marriages, and funerals, more particularly noticed in separate articles [BAPTISM, CHILDREN, MARRIAGE, BURIAL]. Christians cherished the memory of departed relatives as those with whom they trusted to be reunited in rest and glory, and not unfrequently held family banquets over their remains in a room provided for that purpose [CELLA MEMORIAE].

But besides those festivals which were exclusively Christian, there were some celebrations of an older date, in which, as they were not mixed up with any idolatrous rites, Christian families might unite with their pagan neighbours, and which they might retain for their own use. Even Tertullian, who was so strict in forbidding all semblance of participation in idol worship, saw no objection to Christians joining in the domestic ceremony of "putting on the toga virilis," which corresponded with our "coming of age," or to their being present at weddings, or the "naming of children" (Nominatio or Dies Iusticiæ; Tertul. de Idolol. 16).

As the facility of divorce was a primary principle of corruption in Roman social and family life; so Christianity, having invested marriage with a religious sanctity, and not allowing divorcement under any circumstances, except those mentioned by Christ himself, drew more closely together not only the husband and wife, but all other members of the family.

The relationship between parents and children was greatly influenced for good. The barbarous practice of infanticide, which prevailed among the Greeks and Romans, was immediately discontinued. Under the old Roman law parents might at any time put their children to death, or sell them as slaves; but this severity was at once voluntarily softened in Christian families; and the power was afterwards taken away by Christian emperors; who further directed that in cases of great poverty, when parents might be tempted to sell their children, relief might be given them out of the public revenues, thus affording an example of an incipient poor-law (Cod. Theod. vi. 27, in Bingham, xvi. ix. 1).

Parental authority, however, and family ties were strongly upheld. Children were not al-towed to marry without the consent of their parents (Tertul., ad Uxor. ii. 9), and, under the Christian emperors, in the case of daughters thus marrying, the most dreadful punishments were ordered to be inflicted on all who were consenting parties to the marriage (Cod. Theod. ix. 24).

The education of their children assumed a new interest with Christian parents, but at the same time caused them new anxieties and cares; since in "bringing them up in the nurture and admonition of the Lord," it was needful, more especially in the earlier times, to guard them from the evil influences in the midst of which they lived,—from the contagion of idolatry all around them,—from the contagion of companions on every side. Further difficulties too presented themselves in connection with the future occupation of their children, inasmuch as many employments open to others were closed against them. For a Christian had to avoid all the numerous trades and arts which were connected with idols and idol-worship, together with some offices of civil and military life.

While children were young their superintendance and education engaged especially the mother's care and vigilance; but besides this and other strictly domestic duties, it was usual for Christian women to devote a portion of their time to doing good beyond their own homes; and Tertullian shows that in his days it was expected, as a matter of course, that they would attend on the sick, go round to the houses of the poor, relieve the needy, and visit imprisoned martyrs (Tertul., ad Uxor. ii. 4).

One source of uneasiness was, it must be confessed, introduced into the household in Christian times, which had not existed previously. After the institution of monastic orders, a husband, a wife, or a child might desire to adopt the "religious" life, even without the consent of those who had a claim upon their services and society. Where the persons interested consented, as in the cases of Ammon and his wife (Socrates, II. E. iv. 23; Palladius, Hist. Lausiaca. c. 8), and of Martinus and Maxima (Victor Utiensis [or Vitenis], De Persec. Vand. i. 5), no harm was done; but in many cases monastic fanaticism disturbed the peace of households and sundered their members. It is evident from the references to the matter (for instance) by Paulinus (Epist. 14, ad Celant.) and Augustine (Epist. 45 [al. 127], Armentario et Pauline; Epist. 199 [al. 262], ad Exlicium), that in the 4th century the question of the relative claims of domestic duty and ascetic life was felt to be a pressing one. Basil the Great in the Larger Rule (Qu. 12) directs that a married person offering to enter a monastery should be questioned as to the consent of the other party; yet he thinks that the precept about hating father, mother, wife, or children to be Christ's disciple (Luke xiv. 26) applies to this case; and in another place (Epist. 45, ad Monachum Lapsam) he certainly mentions a man's declining domestic cares and the society of his yoke-fellow, for an ascetic life, without the smallest censure. Jerome (Epist. 14, ad Heliod.) expresses similar views. The feeling of the church on this subject was distinctly pronounced in the 6th century, for the legislation of Justinian (Codez. lib. i. tit. 3, De Episc. et Cler. leg. 53) allowed married persons to desert their yoke-fellows for "religion" with impunity, and to reclaim their own fortunes. So in the case of children. The council of Gangra in the 4th century (c. 16) anathematized children—especially children of Christians—who should withdraw from their parents on pretence of religion (Georelias) and refuse them due honour. So Basil (Reg. Maj. qu. 15) enjoined that children should not be received into monasteries unless offered by their parents, if the parents were alive. But here again the legislation of Justinian (u. s. leg. 55) betrays the presence of a feeling that "religion" might override domestic obligations, in that it forbids parents to restrain their children from becoming monks or clerics, or to disinherit them for that cause alone. And this feeling, in spite of the not unfrequent protests of jurists, was very prevalent from that time onward. On the other hand, the power of parents to devote their children to "religion" became in time almost absolute; they who had been devoted by their parents were as much bound as those who had entered of their own accord in mature age (Conc. Tolet. IV. c. 49, A.D. 633; see OILATI).

In our view of the family life of Christians, their use of music and singing must not be unnoticed. Among the Greeks especially, and to some extent among the Romans also, their songs occupied a conspicuous place in their social life. These, however, from their generally expressing and encouraging some of the worst evils of the old religions, could not be used in the Christian family circle. But the want was rapidly supplied. Christian songs and hymns were soon composed and extensively multiplied; and these became an abundant source of recreation to all the members of the household, while at meal times, and in all family or friendly unions, they thus expressed their habitual faith, and hope, and joy.

Before Christianity became the prevailing and established religion, families were in continual danger of being molested by popular violence, and of being utterly broken up in times of legal persecution. But besides these dangers and troubles there were sometimes others hardly less painful within the family itself, when only a part of the household had become Christians. The antagonism and consequent discomfort, if not positive misery, must then have been almost perpetual; and the difficulty of maintaining religious faithfulness, without losing family affection or breaking family ties, must have been very great. Jesus himself had warned his disciples beforehand that "a man's foes might be those of his own household;" and that his religion, in such cases, might bring "not peace but a sword." St. Paul, while desirous that this difference of religion should not actually separate a husband and wife, admitted that it would and must sometimes have this effect. Tertullian (ad Uxor. ii. 4) describes in detail the sort of hardships, opposition, and ridicule, which a Christian woman must expect if she married a heathen man who was an unbeliever; and how impossible she would find it to fulfil in peace, if she could fulfil at all, her Christian duties,—even if nothing worse occurred. But in times of persecution, or of any strong excitement of anti-Christian feeling, it was not merely difficulties and discomforts that had to be encountered. The strongest words of Christ were then often iter-

FAMILY—THE HOLY. The subject which bears this title in modern art is generally a group consisting of the Virgin Mother bearing the Sacred Infant, of St. Joseph, and frequently of the younger St. John Baptist, and occasionally of St. Elizabeth. It is frequently treated in an academic or purely artistic spirit, and chosen mainly for the sake of opposing the age of St. Elizabeth or maturity of St. Joseph, to the high ideal of feminine, infantine, or youthful beauty in the Blessed Virgin, the infant or St. John. As a complete and isolated group of this kind the subject is hardly ever treated in art of the earliest Christian age, unless the three Oranti given by Martigny (from Bosio Roma Sott. p. 279; see woodcut) are to be considered as representing it. He is inclined to think so, though Bosio, Aringhi, and Bottari consider the group as an ordinary Christian family in the attitude of prayer, and though the boy is more decidedly in that attitude than either the father or the mother. He mentions another lately discovered, but also somewhat conjectural monument, in the cemetery of St. Priscilla, and says that the subject occurs on sarcophagi of the South of France, naming one in the museum of Arles, No. 26, where St. Joseph leads the Saviour by the hand to the Virgin Mother, probably representing Luke ii. 48, "Son, why hast thou thus dealt with us?" FANATICI. From their frequenting Fana, shrines of heathen deities, all heathen were sometimes called "fanatici"; thus Clovis before his conversion, is said (Gesta Reg. Franc. c. 10), to have been "fanaticus et paganus." In a special sense, priests of idol-temples were "fanatici" (Iso Magister on Prudentius, quoted by Ducauge, s.v.); and those who professed to prophesy by the aid of the demon attached to the place [EXORCISM; and see Jerome on Isaiah,

c. 6, and Augustine on Psalm 40]; these were condemned with others who practised such evil arts (Code, lib. ix. tit. 16, l. 4; Macri, Hierolox. s. v.; Bingham's Ant. xvi. v. 4). [C.]

FANON. (1.) A head-dress worn by the pope when he celebrated mass pontifically. It is described by Ciampini (Vet. Mon. i. 239) and Macri (Hierolox. s. v.) as a veil variegated, like the Mosaic ephod, with four colours, symbolising the four elements, put over the head after the pope was vested with the alb, and tied round the neck, forming a kind of hood, the tiara or other head-dress being put on above it. The lower part was concealed by the planetæ (Bona, Lit. Liturg. i. 24, 15). Ciampini gives the annexed figure from a small brass statue on the doors of the oratory of St. John Baptist at the Lateran. At the Pedicularium the "Caerimoniale Romanum" directs that the pope should wear the fanon alone without the mitre.

(3.) In later times the white linen cloth in which the laity made their oblations at the altar. "Populus dat oblationes suas, id est panem et vinum, et offerunt cum fanonibus candidis," Ordo Romanus; "cum fanonibus offerunt," Amalar. *de offic. (4.) A still later use of the word is for the church banners, "vexilla Ecclesiastica," employed in processions. This is perhaps not earlier than the French and German writers of the 11th century (Augusti, u. s. iii. 348, 355).

FAST OF CHRIST IN THE DESERT, THE, is commemorated in the Aethiopic Calendar on Feb. 4 (Daniell's Code, iv. 252). [C.]

FASTING (v̄n̄orela, jejunium, abstinentia). Fasting was total or partial abstinence from food for a certain period; it also signified abstinence from pleasure, or from the celebration of birthdays or marriages or church festivals; and it had the further spiritual signification of abstinence from sin. See the passages collected in Gunning (Lent Fast, pp. 130-130) on the spiritual meaning of fasting.

1. The stated fasts of the Western church were these:

(i.) The great ante-paschal Fast of LENT (Quadragesima).

(ii.) The fasts of the first, fourth, seventh, and tenth months, called also EMBER FASTS, or the fasts of the four seasons (Jejunia quattuor temporum).

(iii.) The weekly fasts of the STATIONS, Wednesday and Friday (ferri quartus et sexta, stationes, semijeiunia, respās kai παρασκευη).

(iv.) The ROGATIONS (rogationes, litaniae).

(v.) The Vigils or Eves of holy days (pernoctationes, pervigilia).

2. The Greek church kept in addition to Lent three fasts of a week each: 1st the Fast of the Holy Apostles, immediately after Pentecost [APOSTLES' FESTIVALS AND FASTS]; 2nd the Fast of the Holy Mother of God (Sanctae Deiparæ) in August; 3rd the Fast of the Nativity (Suicer Thesaurus s. v. γεννησια; Neale Introduction to Eastern Church, p. 731). Some have supposed (Morinus de Penit., Appendix, p. 124) that the Fast Sanctae Deiparæ at one period lasted forty days, and began originally on 6th of July and afterwards on 1st of August, and that the Fast of the Nativity was also one of forty days, and began on 15th of November.

3. Other fasts had only a local or partial observance. The council of Eliberis (c. 23) introduced into Spain fasts of superposition (Jejunia superpositiones) for every month (a jejunium superpositio) except July and August. It does not appear on what days of the month they were kept, but their name implies that they were something over and above the usual fasting days. Bingham (Antiq. xxi. 11 § 5) quotes from Philastrius the mention of a fast of three days before Epiphany. In the Dialogue of Egbert of York (Haddan and Stubbs' Councils and Eccl. Documents, vol. iii. p. 413) there is the appointment, in addition to the Ember fasts, of a period of twelve days before the Nativity to be spent in fastings, watchings, prayers, and alms; on which twelve days not only were the clergy but laity also, with their wives and households, exhorted to resort to their confessors. The seventeenth council of Toledo A.D. 694 (c. 6) orders litany-fasts (exomologeses) to be kept every month in the Spanish and Gallic churches to supplicate "for the safety of the sovereign, for the preservation of the people, and the pardon of their sins, and the expulsion of the devil from the hearts of the faithful." The fasts to be observed throughout the year in the western monasteries are given in detail by the second council of Tours (A.D. 567, c. 17): "From Easter to Pentecost let dinner be served to the brothers every day except on Rogation-days; after Pentecost let them fast an entire week; thence till the 1st of August let all, except those who are suffering from illness, fast three days a week, second, fourth, and sixth days. In August because the Misa Sanctatorum is daily celebrated, let them eat their dinner; through the whole of September, October, and November, fast three days a week, and in December, every day till the Nativity. And because between the Nativity and the Epiphany all days are festivals, with the exception of the three when private litanies are to be said, they shall eat their dinner; and from Epiphany to Lent fast three days a week."

4. Special fasting was occasionally ordered or advised in a diocese by the bishop, as Tertullian (de Jejun. c. 1-3), after he became a Montanist unwillingly bears witness. It was also one of the means used for preparing for the reception of a sacred ordinance. Fasting before Holy Communion, if not invariable, had become a common practice in the 4th century [COMMUNIONS]. Fasting before baptism can be traced to a much earlier date. Justin Martyr (Apolog. i. 61) mentions among the customs of the Christian church that candidates "are taught to pray, fast, and pray, and pray with them." Tertullian (de Bapt. c. 20) exhorts those who are about to receive baptism to pray with frequent prayers and fastings. And the fourth council of Carthage, A.D. 398 (c. 85), appoints abstinence from wine and meat among the preparations for baptism (Apost. Const. vii. 22). The only authority which Martene (de Rit. viii. 4) discovers for the practice of fasting before ordination is from Leo, who (Ep. ad Diosc.) with reference to the Saturday's fast continuing both for candidates and bishop till the ordination was over. No notice of fasting before confirmation is to be found before the 13th century (Martene de Rit. iv. 1).

5. Penitential Fasting.—For the first 500 years fasting does not appear to have been imposed as a special penance, or to have taken place of other penitential exercises; but in all ages, so long as penitential discipline was in force, a penitent was required to abstain from delicacies of food as from all other bodily gratifications during his period of punishment. Tertullian (de Penit. c. 9) defines a true exomologesis to consist, among other duties, in "the use of simple things for meat and drink, and in cherishing prayer by fasts." Pacian (Paroen. ad Penit. c. 19) makes his penitent, when invited to a feast, reply, "These things belong to the happy, but as for me I have sinned against the Lord." In the 6th century fasting began to be inflicted as a special and separate mode of penance. One of the canons of the council of Agde, A.D. 506 (c. 60), appoints to those who lapse into heresy, in place of the longer term of penitence allotted by the early church, a fast of two years, to be kept on the third day of the week without any break; if at least that is the meaning of the rather obscure language of the canon (ut bicenis tertio sine relaxatione jejunent). The penance of fasting is found in the early British penitential canons attributed to Gildas; and in the Penitential of Theodore sentences of a fast of so many days or weeks, or even years, are very common (Penitential i. viii. 3, 4, 8, 9; xii. 8; xiv. 9), and no less so in the Penitential of Bode (iii. 5; vii. 11), and in that of Egbert (iv. 6; v. 3; xiii. 4). The crimes for which these sentences were inflicted in these early English penitential books are such as could exist only among a people just emerging from heathenism. In the Penitential of Theodore (ii. xiv. 1) is found the first notice of the appointment of three regular fasts of forty days in the year (tria legitima quadragesima), forty days before Easter, forty days before the Nativity, and forty days after Pentecost. Rule of Chrodegang (c. 32) with reference to the same observance, orders confessions to be made at each of these three annual quadragesimal fasts. And the Capitularies of Charles the Great (vl. 184) repeat in identical words the injunction of Theodore on the three quadragesimal fasts, and add that "although some of them lack canonical authority, yet it is well for all of us together to observe this custom in accordance with the practice of the people and of our forefathers." These fasts were probably first appointed as appropriate penitential seasons for the performance of long periods of penance; afterwards, as may be inferred from the canon in the Capitularies, they came into partial use with the people at large. There is no evidence that they existed earlier than the 7th century, for the councils prior to Theodore which are strict in ordering the people to keep Lent (e.g. Conc. Agath. c. 12; 4 Conc. Aurelian. c. 2), contain no hint of there being more than one such season in the year; and the canon of the second council of Tours which enumerates the fasts of the monks, and approaches nearer the time of Theodore, evidently recognises no Pentecostal Quadragesima, for it orders monks, whose self-denial would be more severe than that of the rest of the church, to fast only three days a week from Pentecost till August. Hence it is probable that Theodore introduced these as penitential fasts into the Western church from the East, for in the Greek Penitential of Joannes Jejunator two fasts of forty days in addition to Lent are imposed upon penitents, the former of which was called the Quadragesima of St. Peter and St. Paul, and the latter the Quadragesima of St. Philip. One of the councils of the Carolingian kings, about A.D. 821 (Conc. apud villam Theodanis cc. 2-5) held for the purpose of devising means for the protection of the clergy, inflicts five quadragesimal fasts on any one slandering or wounding a subdeacon, six on the slanderer of a deacon, twelve of a priest, and a lifelong fast on the slanderer of a bishop. Even after absolution, a penitent was sometimes ordered to fast one day a week for the remainder of his life—a sentence opposed to the earlier practice, by which admission to communion was a sign of the forgiveness of all past offences.

The penitential fasts were observed with various degrees of severity. In the East the Penitential of Joannes Jejunator allows penitents on the second, fourth, and sixth days of the week to eat oil and beans with oil, but orders them to abstain from cheese, eggs, flesh, and fish; on the third and fifth days eat everything freely except flesh; and on the first and seventh days use wine and flesh as if under no punishment. In the Anglo-Saxon church Egbert (Penitential iv. 15) directs penitents to fast three days each week, without specifying the days, from wine, mead (medo), and flesh, till the evening, and eat only dry food; and also keep three quadragesimal fasts in the year on dry food, two days a week till the evening, and three days till three o'clock. Burchard (Deoret. xix. 9, 10) referring to this direction from the Penitential, states the following to have been the manner in which a fast of two years on bread and water was kept. "For first year fast three days in each week, second, fourth, and sixth, on bread and water; and three days, third, fifth, and seventh, abstain from wine, mead (medo), beer flavoured with honey (mellita cervisia) flesh and blood, cheese, eggs, and rich fish of various sorts, and eat only small fish if they are to be got, but if not, fish of one kind only, and beans, and herbs, and apples, and drink beer." This list makes no mention of Lent, because it is assumed to be spent entirely on bread and water. "The next year the penitent should fast two days, second and fourth, till the evening, and then refresh himself with dry food, i.e. bread and dry cooked beans, or apples, or raw herbs; let him select one of these three, and drink beer sparingly; on the sixth day let him fast on bread and water." In some cases no additional time of abstinence was imposed, but only a greater rigour during the ordinary ecclesiastical fasts. A very old sacramentary, assigned by Morinus to the 8th century, directs the actual incarceration of a penitent through Lent; "Take him in the morning of the first day of Lent and cover him with ashes, and pray for him, and shut him up till the Thursday of Holy Week (feria quinta in coena Domini), and on the Thursday of Holy Week he may come forth from the place in which he has performed his penance." A Gothic codex from the monastery of Remigius of Rheims, dating probably from the next century, also orders imprisonment through Lent, but instead of the whole body of the penitent being covered with ashes, directs that a few should be sprinkled on his head, and that they should be blessed. This severity was relaxed before the 10th century, and penitents were assigned a parish or district in which to confine themselves through Lent. But both incarceration and confinement within bounds were deviations from an older practice of shutting up a penitent in a monastery (1 Conc. Matiscon. cc. 5, 8).

6. Exemptions from Fasting.—A superstitious abstinence from flesh and wine on pretence of keeping a stricter fast was forbidden. The Apotolical Canons (cc. 52, 53) direct that if any of the clergy abstain from marriage, flesh, or wine, not for exercise, but abhorrence, forgetting that God made all things very good, they shall be deposed (Conc. Ancyra. c. 14; Conc. Gangra. c. 2). The first council of Braga, A.D. 563 (c. 14), orders, under pain of excommunication, clergy who have been in the habit of abstaining from meat, to eat vegetables boiled with meat, in order to avoid the suspicion of being infected with the Priscillian heresy.

Fasting was strictly forbidden on all Sundays throughout the year in every part of the church. The reason of this prohibition was that fasting was held inconsistent with the observance of so high a festival. [LORD'S DAY.]

The observance of Saturday was, as is well known, one of the points in dispute between the Eastern and Western churches. In the East it was always observed as a festival, with the exception of the Paschal Vigil, the Great Sabbath, in which Christ lay in the grave, which was kept as a fast both in East and West (Apost. Const. ii. 59; v. 15, 20; vii. 23; viii. 33; Conc. Laod. cc. 49, 51; Conc. in Trull. c. 56). [SABBATH.]

It was not customary to fast on any festivals, nor consequently to hold festivals during seasons of fasting. The council of Laodicea, A.D. 320 (1), forbids the celebration of festivals of martyrs in Lent, but orders them to be kept on Saturdays and Sundays. Another canon (c. 52) forbids the celebration of marriages or birthdays in Lent. The Greek church held no festival through Lent except the Annunciation, a festival which the tenth council of Toledo, A.D. 650 (c. 1), ordered to be held eight days before Christmas. [MARCH THE VIRGIN, FESTIVALS OF.] The church at Milan held no missa sanctorum whatever throughout Lent.

The non-observance of a fast was permitted in the case of weakness or sickness (Apost. Can. 68, 2 Conc. Taron. c. 17). To these grounds of excuse the eighth council of Toledo, A.D. 653 (c. 9), adds old age or strong necessity. The council of Eliberis (c. 23) had allowed the Spanish churches to omit the monthly fasts in the sultry heat of July and August.

7. Manner of Fasting.—A fast day in the early church was kept by a literal abstinence from food till the evening, and then a simple meal was eaten. Ambrose (de Elia et Jejun. c. 10) speaks of the fast during Lent continuing through the whole day; and Chrysostom (Hom. 6 in Gen. p. 60; Hom. 8 in Gen. p. 79) rebukes the folly of those who abstain all day from food and do not abstain from sin. There was no restriction upon the kind of food eaten at the evening meal, provided only it was partaken of sparingly. Many, no doubt, refused meat or wine during the greater fasts, and contented themselves with bread and water, Xerophagia (Tertullian de Jejun. c. 11); but that there was left very much to the choice of diet was evident from the account given by Socrates (H. E. v. 22) of the variety of the observances of the Western church; "some abstain from every sort of creature that has life; others eat fish only of living creatures; others eat birds as well as fish, because, according to the Mosaic account of the creation, they too sprang from the water; others abstain from fruit covered with a hard shell, and from eggs; some eat dry bread only, others not even that; others again when they have fasted till three o'clock eat varieties of food." The Greek church kept Lent very strictly, eating neither fish, nor eggs, nor milk, nor oil; but on the other fasts, except on the fourth and sixth days, these were allowed. The great Sabbath fast of the Paschal Vigil was sustained not only till the evening, but till cock-crowing on Easter morning (Apost. Const. v. 18). But the other appointed seasons were kept with less rigour than that of Lent, and the fast, instead of continuing till the evening meal, was broken at the ninth hour (three o'clock) the hour at which our Lord expired on the cross. This was the hour at which the fast of the Stations ceased (Epiphanius Evap. Fid. c. 22). And the English council of Clovesho, A.D. 747 (c. 16), orders the Rogations to be kept till three o'clock. The food which was thus saved by abridging the number of meals it was considered a pious act to bestow upon the poor (Origen, Hom. 10. in Levit.; Leo, Serm. 3 de Jejun. Pentecost.; Chrysost. Serm. 8 de Jejun.). Another practice mentioned by Tertullian (de Orat. c. 18) was refraining from the kiss of peace while a fast lasted. A change of dress during fasting was confined chiefly to penitents [PENITENCE], although Tertullian (Apology. c. 40), if his language is not merely rhetorical, speaks of pious Christians in contrast with heathen self-indulgence, "being dried up with fasting and prostrating themselves in sackcloth and ashes." And at a much later date the council of Mayence, A.D. 813 (c. 33), orders the greater Litany to be observed for three days by all Christians, "not riding nor clothed in rich garments, but barefoot and clothed in sackcloth and ashes." [G. M.]

8. Fast after Communion.—St. Chrysostom, on the First Epistle to the Corinthians, speaks as follows: "Before receiving thou fastest, that thou mayest by any means appear worthy of the communion. But when thou hast received, it becometh thy duty to persevere in self-control, thou undest all. Not that sobriety before this and afterwards are of equal importance. For it is our duty, indeed, to exercise self-control at both times, but especially after receiving the Bridegroom; before this indeed that thou mayest be worthy to partake; but afterwards that thou mayest not be found unworthy of that of which thou hast partaken. What! Ought we to fast after partaking? I do not say so, nor do I use constraint. For indeed this also is good, but I am not enforcing it, only advising you not to be self-indulgent to excess" (Hom. xxvii. ad c. ii. v. 27.). We should infer from this passage that the hebrers of St. Chrysostom neither had themselves, nor knew of, any custom of abstaining from ordinary food, for however short a time, after receiving the Holy Communion. Nor have we any evidence that his advice led to the formation of such a habit in the members of the Greek or Oriental churches. In the West, on the other hand, we meet with occasional notices of the practice from the 6th century downwards; and it is probable that it survived, as the pious custom of a few, to the 14th, or even later. A canon of the council of Mâcon held in 585 contains the earliest reference, if the writer mistake not, to this post-communion fast. We give the decree in full: "Whatever relics of the sacrifices shall be left over in the sacrum after the mass is finished, let innocent children be brought to the church on Wednesday or Friday by him whose business it is, and, let them, being enjoined a fast, receive the said relics sprinkled with wine" (Can. 6; Labb. Conc. tom. v. col. 982). Among the Forged Decretals is an epistle purporting to be written by Clement of Rome to St. James the Lord's brother. The greater part of this epistle appears to have been composed in the 8th century, and in that earlier portion we find a direction to this effect, viz. that the remainder of the consecrated elements "is not to be kept till the morning, but is by the care of the clerks to be consumed with fear and trembling. But they who consume the remainder of the Lord's body, which has been left in the sacrum, are not to assemble forthwith to partake of common food, nor to presume to mix food with the holy portion. . . . If therefore the Lord's portion be given to them at an early hour, let the ministers who have consumed it fast till the sixth; and if they have received it at the third or the fourth, let them fast till evening" (Præcepta S. Petri, inter Opp. S. Leonis, ed. Baller. tom. iii. p. 674). There is a law of Charlemagne, A.D. 809, with this heading, "Touching those who have communicated, that they wait three hours, on account of the mixing three hours (Capitularia Regum Francorum, tom. i. col. 1213. Similarly col. 1224). Regino (In Eccl. Discipl. lib. l. c. exv.) at the beginning of the 10th century, and Gratian (Decr. P.

iii. Dist. ii. c. xviii.) in the 12th give the passage from pseudo-Clement as above quoted. It was therefore well known during the latter part of the Middle Ages. In the 13th century we find it cited from Gratian by Thomas Aquinas, who acknowledges the principle, while he declares the rule obsolete (Summa Theol. P. iii. Qu. lxxx. Art. viii. ad 6m). There is, however, as we have already intimated, some reason to think that the practice which Aquinas evidently considered altogether gone by was yet observed by some long after his time. In England John de Burge, A.D. 1385, refers to our subject in this manner: "After taking the eucharist it is meet for reverence thereof to abstain for some time from food, but not very long. For preparation by abstinence and devotion is more required before receiving the eucharist than after. For the sacrament has its effect at the reception itself, and therefore actual devotion is required then; but after the reception habitual devotion suffices" (Impulla Genii, P. iv. c. viii. ad lit. H.). It is also thus mentioned by Duranti, who was murdered by the partisans of the League in 1589, "Not only ought men to be fasting when about to sacrifice and communicate, but they ought also in honour of the sacrament to abstain from all food some time after" (De Rit. Eccl. L. ii. c. vii. § 6.)

[W. E. S.]

FATHER (Pater). 1. A name rhetorically given to the priests of any religion (Araobius, Adv. Gent. lib. 4. c. 19.)

2. Commonly applied to Christian bishops.
Epiphanius (Haeres. Adv. Aetrian. n. 4) says that the reason of the title is that by their right of ordaining they beget fathers to the church.
Jerome (Ep. 52, ad Theoph. ed. Migne) says that bishops are content with their own honour, for they know that they are fathers and not lords.
Augustine (Comm. in Ps. 44) says that the church itself calls them fathers. Chrysostom (Hom. 3, ad Pop. Antioch.) speaks of looking to the bishop's throne and not seeing the father upon it. The decrees of the council of Nice are usually cited as those of the 318 fathers (L. Conc.
Nic. Proem.; I. Conc. Constantin. c. 1.)

3. To a godfather. In the life of Epiphanius it is said that one Lucena became his father in holy baptism (Epiph. Vita, n. 8). So Rullinus (in Hieron. Insect. c. 1) says that the same person was his instructor in the creed and his father.

4. It is said that Charles Martel sent his son Pepin to Luitprand, king of the Lombards, who cut his hair according to custom, "juxta morem," and thus became his father, "ei pater effectus est" (Petrus Diaconus, Hist. Longobard. vi. 53).
5. To the priest by whom baptism was administered. Avitus of Vienne (Hom. de Regat.), says that Manerius was both his predecessor and his spiritual father by baptism, "spiritualis a baptisimo pater." So (Theodori Cantuar. Poeni- tentiale, li. iv. 8) it is stated that one father is sufficient to administer baptism, "in catechumeno et confirmatione et baptisimo unus potest esse pater."

6. To a confessor. One of the Benedictine rules provided that no monk should become a spiritual father without the consent of the abbot (Reg. Turnat. A.D. circa 570; Migne's Patrol. t. 66, coll. 977).

7. The title "father of fathers" was sometimes assigned to eminent bishops. In one place it is given to the apostle Paul (Quaest. ad Ortho- dox. c. 119, apud Justin Mart. Opp.). Athanasius (ad Solitar. Vit. Agent. c. 1) speaks of Ilosius as being by universal consent called the father of bishops. Gregory Nazianzen (Orat. 19; De Funeb. Patr. § 44) says that his father was called the father of all the bishops (ἄρχιεπί- σκοπος). Gregory the Great (Epist. vi.) addresses Lupus of Troyes, as "father of fathers, bishop of bishops." In a letter from the African bishops which was read at the 1st Lateran council, at the close of the epistle, Theodore, bishop of Rome, is styled "father of fathers." In a letter read at the 6th council of Constantinople (Act 13), Sergius is addressed in the same manner. At the 2nd council of Nice, A.D. 787 (Act 6), Gregory Nyssen is said to have been called "father of fathers" by universal consent.

8. The head of a monastery was naturally called Pater by Latins, as Abbas by Orientals; thus Augustine (De Mor. Eccl. Cath. i. 31) speaks of the respect to be paid by the Decuri to the one "quem Patrem appellat," and Gregory the Great (Dial. l. i; et. ii. 3; iii. 23) speaks of one who was "Pater" in a monastery over 200 monks. [P. O.]

FELLIRE. THE, OF AENGUS THE CULDEE. The word Fellire, derived from "fell" the Irish equivalent of vigilia, is applied to the metrical festology composed by Aengus the Culdee about the year 780. It is the most ancient of five martyrologies belonging to Ireland. The others are (1.) The martyrology of Tamlacht, which must have been written after 845. (2.) That of Maclmuire ua Gorman, dating from between 1150-1173. (3.) The Saltair na Rann, which, however, contains only four Gaelic entries; and (4.) The Kalendar of the Drummond Miscal, published in Bishop Forbes' Kalendars of the Scottish saints.

Of the personal history of Aengus we know that he was educated in Cluin Ednach in Queen's County, and travelling into Munster founded Disert Aengus in co. Limerick. At the time of the expedition of king Aeth Oirnidhe against Leinster in 799 he was residing at Disert Bethac near Monasterevin. Latterly he went to abbot Maclruain at Tamlacht, when he from humility concealed his gifts, and passing himself as a serving man was entrusted with the charge of the mill and kiln, till at last his learning was discovered by accident.

The Fellire consists of three parts. 1. Five quatrains invoking a blessing on the poet and his work. 2. A preface of 230 quatrains; and 3. The festology itself in 395 quatrains for every day in the year (O'Curry; Early Evid. MSS. of Ireland, pp. 359-371. [A. P. F.]

FEMORALIA or FEMINALIA. These are drawers or breeches covering the thighs and legs, as the derivation implies. (See Isidore Etym. s. v.) They were an essential part of the dress of the Levitical priesthood (Ex. xxviii. 42, 43), and as such are often referred to by the fathers (see e. g. Jerome, Epist. 64, ad Eusebium; i. 360, ed. Vallars), many of whom are delighted to find a symbolical meaning in this as in other vestments.

The injunction as to the wearing of breeches during divine service is repeated in sundry monastic rules. Thus the Rule of Fructuosus, bishop of Bracara, when settling the dress to be worn by monks, permits the use of femoralia to all, but "maxime his qui ministerio implentur altaris" (Regula S. Fructuosi, c. 45; in Hilberius, Codex Regularum, part 2, p. 139, ed. Paris, 1663; cf. Grimaldi Solitariorum Regula, c. 48; op. cit. p. 341). For general rules as to this and other articles of monastic dress see Magistri Regula, c. 81 (op. cit. p. 257). The Rule of St. Benedict enjoins that monks who were going on a journey should borrow femoralia from the Vestiarium, and on their return should restore them thither washed:—"femoralia, si qui diringantur in via, de Vestiario accipiant, qui revertentes lota ibi restituant" (c. 55; p. 117, ed. Veike, 1723). For further references, see Ducange's Glossarium, s. v., and Menard's note to the Concordia Regularum (Patrol. cill. 1245).

FENCING-MASTERS. [GLADIATORS; LAMINAE.]

667

FERETRUM, a bier on which the corpse, after washing, was placed and carried to burial [BURIAL OF THE DEAD]. It was as a rule made of wood, in which Ambrose (In Luc. vii. 14) sees a mystical allusion to the resurrection, drawn from the miracle at Nain (Durant, de Eccl. lib. i. c. 23). The feretrum of Constantine the Great appears to have been of gold, like his coffin (Euseb. Vit. Const. lib. iv. c. 66). The bier was covered with a pall, more or less costly, according to the rank of the deceased. That of Constantine was of purple (Δαυαρύτης ἀλευργίῃ). That of Bleilla, the daughter of Paula, was of cloth of gold, against which Jerome remonstrated vehemently as an unchristian extravagance (Hieron. Ep. 25). Constantine's bier was surrounded with a circle of lights burning in golden candlesticks (Euseb. u. s.). The bier was carried to the grave sometimes by relations or near friends, sometimes by officials designated to that duty (Cyprian, decem le tetrin), and in the case of persons of high dignity or sanctity by bishops and nobles, e. g. Basil by his clergy (Greg. Mag. Orat. xx.), his sister Macrina by Gregory Nyssen, and other clergy (Greg. Nva. Vit. Macr. tom. ii. p. 201); Paula, by the bishops of Palestine, "servicem foretro subiectionibus" (Hieron. Ep. 27). [E. V.]

FELIA. The proper sense of this word is that of a holyday, of a festival viewed in the aspect of a day of freedom from worldly business. It is in this meaning that we find the word in classical Latin, though here it occurs exclusively in the plural. Besides this, however, the word has been used in a special sense in the Christian church from very early times to denote the days of the week, feria secunda, tertia, &c., for Monday, Tuesday, &c.

The origin of this system of notation cannot be stated with absolute certainty. It is explained by Ducange (Glossarium, s. v.) as arising from the fact that the week following Easter Day was appointed by the emperor Constantine to be observed as one continuous festival, and that originally the year began with Easter. Hence the Monday, Tuesday, &c., of Easter Week would be respectively secunda feria, tertia feria, &c., and in this way, following the example of the first week of the year, the names passed to all other Mondays, &c., of the year. The great objection to this view, which seems to have found many supporters (see e. g. Pelliccia, De Christiano Ecclesie politia, i. 277, ed. Colon. 1829), is that long before the time of Constantine we find Tertullian speaking of Wednesday and Friday as quarta and sexta feria (de jejunio ad. Psychico, c. 2).

It seems more reasonable to explain the phrase as being akin to and probably derived from the Jewish system of notation under which such an expression as e. g. הַיּוֹם הַרְבֵּעִי (Mark xvi. 2; Acts xx. 7, and often in the New Testament) means the "first day of the week." This extension of the word Subbath, which, besides the instances admissible from the New Testament, occurs also in the Targums (see e. g. Esther ii. 9), is merely a natural transference of a word from its primary meaning to the point of time, as it were, to express the periods marked out by such points; and an exact parallel is found in the Hebrew שְׁבִיטָה, which is primarily the new the "commixture" of a particle of the newly-consecrated oblate (De Eccles. Off. lib. iii. c. 31).

II. There was another use of the reserved element, somewhat similar to the above, at the ordination of bishops and priests. The earliest notice occurs in a very ancient Roman directory, and refers (as indeed all the strictly Roman documents do) to bishops only. The pope at the communion which followed the consecration, gave a whole oblate to the newly-made bishop, of which he took a part at the time, but "reserved the rest of it to serve for communions for forty days" (Ordo VIII. p. 89). The practice may have spread from Rome, but it was at one time so widely observed that we are compelled to assign its origin to a very early though not primitive date. In the opinion of Morinus (De Sacr. Ordin. P. III. Exerc. VIII. c. ii. § iv.), it sprang up in Italy in the 8th century. Fulbert, bishop of Chartres, who was born in the 10th century, asserts that it was observed by all the bishops of his province at the ordination of presbyters, and he believed it to be universal (Ep. II. ad Einar. apud Martene, de Ant. Eccl. Rit. L. I.
 c. viii. Art. IX. n. xx.). Rubrics prescribing it at the consecration of bishops are found in old pontificals of Concha, in Spain (Martene, u. s.
 Art. X. n. xxi.); of Salzburg (Ibid. Art. XI.
Ord. VIII.); of Toulouse, Rouen, Rheims (Morinus, de Sacr. Ord. P. II. p. 281; and P. III. p.
 130), and the Latin church of Constantinople (Mart. u. s. Ordo XI. note at end), where the term was forty days; and of Mayence (Morinus, P. II. p. 278), where it was thirty. The pontificals of Compiègne (Mart. u. s. Ord. VII.) and of Salzburg (Ibid. Ord. IX.) testify to the custom at the ordination of priests, the former fixing forty days for them, and the latter only seven. In the pontifical of the Latin church of Apamea in Syria, the pope, who is supposed to consecrate, is directed to give a "whole Host" to the new bishop, but its use is not mentioned.
 Afterward, however, it is said that "for forty days from the day of his consecration he ought, if possible, to sing mass daily for the people committed to him." (Mart. u. s. Ord. XIV.) This evidently indicates the original purpose, and makes it highly probable that wherever in the west we find an order that the newly ordained shall celebrate for forty days (and this was a common rule: see Morinus, P. III. Exerc. VIII.
 c. ii. § vii. p. 132), there had also existed in connection with it the custom of reserving for those celebrations from the communion at the ordination.

Mailillon (Comm. in Ord. Rom. p. xxxix.) states expressly that the particles of the reserved oblate were put day by day into the chalice by the newly-made bishop or priest, as in the rite before described. This is more than probable; but it is right to mention that he gives no reference, and that no direct evidence of the fact has come within the knowledge of the present writer. [W. E. S.]

FERULA. [NARTHEX; PASTORAL STAFF.]

FESTIVAL (agorh, festum, dies festus). The history of the first rise of festivals in the Christian church is a subject involved in much obscurity. During the first few years, while the essentially Jewish character of the church continued, the Jewish yearly festivals were doubtlessly observed, especially the Passover and Pentecost, which later events had risen to a far higher pitch of dignity. The Sabboth also continued to be observed, and with it the first day of each week became a lesser Easter day.

As time went on, the Jewish element in the church became proportionately diminished, with the breach between it and the Gentile part continually widening. Indeed the tone of the language used by Christian writers in the 2nd century, with reference to the Jewish nation, is on the whole one of undisguised hostility. It is obvious therefore that the tendency would be from the nature of the case to reject such Jewish festivals as had not in some sort been made Christian, and thus, e.g., though some have seen in Christmas a higher form of the feast of the Dedication, it may be considered that the inheritance of the younger from the older church, so far as festivals are concerned, consists of the ennobled Passover and Pentecost. The "first day of the week" was no doubt a Christian festival from the earliest times. Up to the end of the 2nd century, we have no evidence of the existence of any other festival than these three. Gradually, however, from a belief in the lessons of good derivable from a celebration of great events in the history of our faith, and perhaps too from the analogy of the numerous festivals of the older religions, fresh commemorations arose, the earliest being that of the Epiphany, from which afterwards arose the celebration of Christmas as a separate festival. The exact time of the first rise of these, and of the connection between the two, is uncertain; reference may be made to the separate articles. [CHRIST-MAS, EPIPHANY.] The time, too, from Easter to Pentecost came to be viewed as one long festal season, and in this period a special distinction began to be attached to Ascension-day, in the 3rd or more probably in the 4th century. Together with these festivals and similar ones which were gradually added (e.g. those of the Presentation and Annunciation in the 6th century), all commemorative of the great events in the foundation of the faith, we find also festivals of another kind, the celebration of the anniversary of a martyr's death, viewed as his natal day into the better life. These would be at first confined more or less to special churches, but would subsequently obtain in many cases a general observance. Thus by the end of the 4th century we find a wide-spread observance of festivals of e.g., St. Stephen, SS. Peter and Paul, and the Maccabees. The festival of St. John the Baptist, which at an early period became one of great importance (see e.g. the canon of the council of Agde, cited below), is not however of the above class, being a commemoration of the actual birth-

 Durham, and presided over by Eanbald, archbishop of York, in which, after the faith of the first five general councils had been rehearsed from a book, a declaration of adhesion to them was reiterated in the words of archbishop Theodore, and the council of Hatfield, A.D. 680 (see 6, of II.), and other regulations for the good of the church in Northumbria and elsewhere, and for the keeping of Easter, were passed (Haddan and Stubbs, Councils iii. 527). [K. S. FF.]

FINES (mulcti, emendi, emendatio). Mulcti signified a fine paid by way of penalty to the judge: emenda, satisfaction made to the injured party. On the variations from this usage, see Du Cange, s. v. Emenda. Fines are found in the records of the early English church among the penalties inflicted for ecclesiastical offences.
 The laws of Ethelbert of Kent, A.D. 597-604
 (c. 1) require the following compensation to be made for injuries: "to the property of God and the church twelve fold, a bishop's property eleven fold, a priest's property nine fold, a deacon's six fold, a clerk's property three fold."
 The laws of Ine, king of Wessex, A.D. 690 (c. 2), order a man to have his child baptized within thirty days, "if it be not so, let him make 'loaf' with thirty shillings, but if it die without baptism, let him make 'loaf' for it with all that he has;" (c. 3) a lord to pay thirty shillings who compels his 'theoman' to work on Sunday, a freeman working without his lord's command to pay sixty shillings; and (c. 13) any one committing perjury before a bishop to pay one hundred and twenty shillings. In the laws of Wihtrud of Kent, A.D. 696, it is decreed (c. 9) that if an 'sone' do work contrary to his lord's command from sunset on Saturday to sunset on Sunday, he must make a 'loaf' of eighty shillings. The Penitential of Egbert (vii. 4) directs an offender for certain crimes either to do penance or pay a fine to the church, or divide money among the poor; and elsewhere (xiii. 11) allows a fine to take the place of fasting; but this latter instance is rather of the nature of a Redemption than a direct penance. (Haddan and Stubbs, Councils and Eccl. Documents, vol. iii. pp. 42, 211, 231.)

FIR-TREE OR PINE. See Aringhi, vol.
 ii. p. 632-3. "Præter epressum, et plus que et myrtus pro mortis symbolo, etc.
 Et pinus quidem, quia semel excisa nunquam reviviscit et repullulavit." These are rather general or human reasons for choice of the pine as an emblem of death, than as conveying any specially Christian thought. See Hieronimus vi.
 37, on the threat of Croesus to the people of Lamp-sacus. But the fir, or some tree much resembling it, accompanies the figure of the Good Shepherd, Aringhi, li. 294, from the cemetery of St. Prisci-lilla. Also at pp. 75 and 25; and it is certainly intended to be represented among the trees which surround the same form in vol. I. 577. The latter painting is from the Callixtine, and is certainly an adaptation from the common fresco-subjects of Orpheus. The shepherd bears the syrinx or reeds, but sits in a half-reclining position, as Orpheus with the lyre; and various trees surround him. This association of the fir or pine with the Good Shepherd, and of both with Orpheus, would account for the introduction of different species of "trees of the wood," the fir being also characteristic of the mountains or wilderness in which the lost sheep is found. Herzog thinks it was placed on Christian graves (as well as others), as an evergreen tree, and therefore a symbol of immortality; which is by no means unlikely.

FIRE, KINDLING OF. In the first Ordo Romanus (c. 32, p. 21; cf. p. 31), among the ceremonies of Maundy Thursday, the following is mentioned. At the ninth hour fire is produced by a flint and steel sufficient to light a candle, which ought to be placed on a reed; a lamp lighted from this is kept unextinguished in the church until Easter eve, to light the Paschal taper, which is to be blessed on that day. The directions of pope Zacharias (Epist. 12, ad Bonif.) are different. He says, that the tradition of the Romish church was, that on Maundy Thursday, three lamps of more than usual capacity were set alight in some hidden spot in the church, with oil sufficient to last till Easter eve, and that from these on the latter day the baptismal tapers were to be lighted. "But," he continues, "as to the crystals which you mention we have no tradition." The latter words seem to prove incontestably that the custom mentioned in the Ordo Rom. I., of striking fire from flint or "crystal," was not introduced at Rome in the time of Zacharias (†752), when it was already practised in some churches—probably in Gaul or Germany—known to Boniface. Pope Leo IV., however (†855), recognises it as an established custom to produce fresh fire on Easter eve, saying (Hom. De Cura Past. c. 7), "in salubato paschae extincto veteri novis ignis benedictur et per populum dividatur." Amalarius (De Ord. Antiph. c. 44) says that he learned from Theodorus, archdeacon of Rome, that no from Theodorus, archdeacon of Rome, that no lamps or tapers were used in the Roman church on Good Friday, but that on that day new fire is kindled, the flame from which is preserved until the nocturnal office. Compare Martene, Rit. Ant. T. xviii. 6.

It is always holding a veil or cloth above its head, which appears to symbolize the stretching out of the heavens like a curtain, Ps. civ. 2; Is. xl. 22; and more particularly Ps. xviii. 9, of "the darkness under God's feet."

In another instance, from a tomb in the Vatican (Bottari, tav. xxxiii., woodcut No. 2), a

The custom of dedicating first fruits to God obtained early in the church (Orig. c. Cel. viii. 33, 34). Irenæus thinks that Christ enjoined them when he took bread and wine at the last supper (Hoer. iv. 32), and that they ought to be paid (Oporet. ib. 34). Origen says their payment is becoming and expedient, and refusal is unworthy and impious, yet he distinctly states that the Levitical law of first fruits is not binding in the letter upon the Christian church (Num. xviii. Hom. xi.). But as the idea grew that the clergy had succeeded to the position and to the rights of the Levites, first fruits were considered obligatory, to withhold them was to defraud God; they are more incumbent upon Christians than Jews, for Christ bids his followers to sell all they have, and also to exceed the righteousness of the Scribes and Pharisees; the priest whom they support will bring a blessing on the house by his prayers, the offerer by his spirit of thankfulness. (Jerome on Ezek. xlv.; in Mit. iii.; Greg. Naz. Epist. 80, Orat. 15. Apost. Const. ii. 25.) Yet, though the payment was so vigorously pressed, we find in Cassian (Collat. xxi. 1 seq.) that abbot John regards first fruits as venuntary gifts, while Theonas says he has not even heard the reason for paying them before. The council of Friuli (A.D. 791, can. 14), quotes Malachi iii. as conclusive proof of the obligation of first fruits.

Most stress is laid upon paying first fruits of the corn-floor and the wine-press, but the Apostolic Constitutions mention others and regulate their distribution. First fruits of the corn-floor and wine-press, of sheep and oxen, of bread and honey, of wine in cask, are to be paid for the support of the priests, but of clothing, money, and other possessions for the orphan and widow (Const. vii. 30). The bishop alone has the right to receive and apportion first fruits (ii. 25). At first they were brought with the other oblations at the celebration of the eucharist. This was found inconvenient, and it was ordered tural or anagrammatic meaning is perhaps the most popular at the present day. In Matt. xiii. 47-49; Luke v. 4-10; it is used in the parable of the net for the members of the church; and our Lord there assigns it its significance; His parabolic use of it is frequently imitated in early Christian art, where the fishes in the church's net, or caught by the hook of the fisher, correspond exactly to the lambs of the fold, or to the doves, which also represent the faithful on many Christian tombs and vaultings (see s. vv.) But the anagrammatic use of the word ΙΧΘΥΣ appears to have been very early. It was derived, as all know, from the initials of the word; Ιησοῦς Χριστὸς Θεοῦ Υἱὸς Σωτῆρ. This appears to be in the mind of St. Clement of Alexandria (Pædag. iii. c. 11, p. 106), and to have been so well understood in his time as to have required no explanation, since he recommends the use of the symbol on seals and rings, without giving an explanation of its import. The other devices he commends are the dove, ship, lyre, and anchor. At so early a period as the middle of the 2nd century, and under the continual dangers of persecution, the use of such a symbol for the person of the Lord was perfectly natural, as it (Canon. Ap. 4) that they should not be brought to the altar, but to the bishop and presbyters, who would distribute to the deacons and other clerics. The church of Africa (Cod. Can. Afr. 37), made an exception in favour of honey and milk, which were needed as accompaniments of the sacrament of baptism.

The payment of first fruits was accompanied by a special formula (Jerome on Ezek. xlv.); and I have brought to thee first fruits of the produce of the earth, which thou hast given me, O Lord. The priest replied with the blessing written in Deut. xviii. 3. A special form of thanksgiving is found in Apost. Const. viii. 40.

The amount of first fruits was not fixed by the Levitical law, but left to the liberality of the worshipper. Tradition handed down one-sixtieth as the minimum, those who were more religious gave one-fortieth, the rest something between. (Jerome on Ezek. xlv.; Cassian Coll. xxi. 3.) [J. S.]

FISH. [See EUCHARIST IN CHRISTIAN ART, p. 625.]

The Fish is a symbol of almost universal occurrence in the painting and sculpture of the primitive church. Like the Dove or the Lamb it is used in more than one sense; and its non-scripwould attract no notice from the outer world; and in the same manner, with even more obvious reasons, the form of the cross was frequently disguised up to the time of Constantine. [See CROSS.] But see also Tertullian (De Baptismo, c. 1) "Nos pisciculi secundum ΙΧΘΥΣ nostrum in aqua nascimur." Also Jerome ad Nossum, Ep. 43, "B. tanquam ΙΧΘΥΣ filius aquosa petit." [BAPTISM, p. 171.] But the mystic senses assigned to the emblem by various fathers often seem to the modern mind somewhat gratuitous and ill-founded. They strain their imaginations, apparently, to find reasons in the nature of things for a devoutly ingenious arrangement of initial letters; and seem to assume that there must be real analogy between the Divine Lord and the fish, because the initials of the name and titles of the one made the Greek name of the other. The pleasure derived from the anagram, or the facility it may have given for concealing Christian doctrine from the heathen, seem occasionally to have overcome the thought that the Lord Himself used the fish as an emblem of His people only, not of Himself—of the sheep, not the Shepherd. Aringhelli dwells more naturally on the Scriptural meaning, and the various examples he gives (vol. ii. p. 684; ii. p. 620; also that

But as the idea grew and succeeded to the position of the Levites, first fruits were to be withheld them was to be more incumbent upon us, for Christ bids his followers have, and also to exceed the

from the inscription made in Stilicho's consulship A.D. 400, vol. i. p. 19) all speak of the fish in the Scriptural sense as a type of the disciple. The lamp in Aringhi (ii. 620; see woodcut) has the monogram on the handle, and the two fishes on the central part. He also refers to the dolphin as king of fishes, speaking of its reported love for its offspring, with reference to the tomb of Valeria or Valeria Latobia, now in the Vatican. Martigny states that because Christ is man, He therefore is a fish of His own net, and gives the prophetic significance, following Aringhi, to the story of Tobias and the fish which delivered Sara from the power of the evil spirit. This he literally accepts, and follows the various attempted connexions of the anagram with the fish of the last repast at the sea of Galilee; and sees in them the sacramental representatives of the body of our Lord, quoting St. Augustine, (Treat exxiii. in Johann. xvi.) and Bede's observation on the same passage, Piscis assus, Christus est passus. These analogies are difficult to follow, especially when we consider the Scriptural use of the emblem from the Lord's own mouth.

The fish as the believer, (Ambrose, iv. in Luc. v. "piscis qui hanc enavigant vitam") is more frequently represented on the hook of the gospel fisherman, than in the net of the church. [See FISHERMAN.] Bread and fish are the universal viands of the representations of earlier Agapae, as frequently in the Callixtine catacomb. The genuineness of some at least of these paintings is generally allowed, and Dr. Theodore Mommsen mentions in particular an Agape with bread and fish, in the vault named after Domitilla, the fish, in the vault named after Domitilla, the grand-daughter of Vespasian, on the Ardeatine way and near the ancient church of SS. Nereus and Achilles. In this painting so impartial and accurate an observer has full confidence, as coeval with the vault; though he thinks the case incomplete for the vault itself being so early as 95 A.C.; and observes that the painting of this subject, as of those of Daniel, Noah, and the Good Shepherd, is less excellent than that of the vaultings of the original chamber of Domitilla without the catacomb, which is quite like a work of the Augustan age.

The use of this emblem is connected by the Martigny with the "disciplina arcani" of the early church. There can be little doubt that the reverent mystery was observed as to the eucharist, and that in ages of persecution, till Constantine's time, no public use of the cross was made, as a sign of the person of the Lord. Till then, the fish-anagram was perhaps in special and prevailing use, and it may have yielded its place from that time to the cross, the sign of full confession of Jesus Christ. For the secret discipline after the time of Constantine seems to have consisted mainly in the gradual nature of the instructions given to catechumens, and the fact that for a time the chief doctrines of the faith were not brought before them. [R. St. J. T.]

The tesserae given to the newly-baptized were frequently in the form of the symbolical fish, as pledges or tokens of the rights conferred in baptism (Allegranza, Opus. Erucl. p. 107). Of this kind is probably the bronze fish given by Costadoni (Del Pesce, iv. 22), inscribed with the word CaCAIC. See woodcut.

Bolletti (Osservazioni, p. 516) discovered in the catacombs three glass fishes, with a number inscribed upon each; thus, x. xx. xxv. The purpose of the numbers is altogether uncertain.

The custom of decorating baptisteries with fish has a similar origin. In the ruins of an ancient baptistery near the church of St. Prisca at Rome, two beautiful mosaics representing fish were discovered, which are now in the Kircher museum (Lupl. Dissert. i. 83). See BAPTISM, p. 171.

At St. Zenone in Verona, the patron saint is thus represented, and this subject, with those of Abraham's sacrifice, Noah's ark, and others, on the bronze doors and marble front of that most important church, are specially valuable as connecting the earlier Lombard carvings with the most ancient and scriptural subjects of primitive church-work. FISHERMAN'S RING. [RING.]

FISTULA (called also calamus, canna, canna, siphon, arundo, pipa, puilliteris). A tube, usually of gold or silver, by suction through which it was formerly customary to receive the wine in communicating. The ancient Ordo Romanus thus explains its use: "Diaconus tenens calicem et fistulam stet ante episcopum, usque dum ex sanguine Christi quantum voluerit sumat; et sic calicem et fistulam subdiacono commendat." Among other instances, five silver-gilt fistulae ad communicandum are enumerated among the sacramental vessels of the church of Mayence; and at a later date, pope Victor III. left to the monastery of Monte Casino, "fistulam auream cum angulo, et fistulas argenteas duas." Pope Adrian I. is said by Anastasius to have offered "calicem majorem fundatum cum siphone pensantem libras xxx.;" and the ancient Carthusian statutes recite that the Order has no ornaments of gold or silver in its churches, "praeter calicem, et calamum, quo Sanguis Domini sumitur."

The adoption of the fistula doubtless arose from caution, lest any drop from the chalice should be spilt, or any other irreverence occur in communicating. This seems intimated by the rule of the Cistercian Order (Lib. Us. Ord. Cist. cap. 53), which says that the fistula is not necessary in Missae solennis, when the ministers alone communicate; but that when more communicate it should be used. Gregory of Tours (Hist. Franc. iii, 31) states that it was the custom of the Arias to communicate by drinking from the chalice, as if the use of the fistula was for that reason preferred by the orthodox.

The fistula has fallen into disuse since the practice of communicating in one kind has prevailed. It is, however, still retained in solemn papal celebrations for the communion of the pope. The senior cardinal bishop purifies the tube (calamum aureum Papae) with wine, and, after kissing it, places it in the chalice, which he delivers into the right hand of the pope, who communicates by suction. Cardinal Bona states that the fistula was used in his time in the Benedictine monastery of the congregation of St. Maur, in France, where also the assistants communicated in both kinds.

The fistula does not appear to have been adopted in the Eastern church, which made use of a spoon for communicating. [See Voigt, Historia fistulae Eucharisticae; Krazer, Lit. pp. 204-5; Bona, Res. Lit.; Martene, De ant. rit. lib. iv.; Catalani, Cusrem. &c.] [H. J. H.]

FLABELLUM (βραβίδιον, βραβίς). Among the evidences of the Eastern origin of the Christian religion is the use of fans, flabella, during the celebration of the Eucharist. Having its birthplace and earliest home in a climate teeming with insect life, where food exposed uncovered is instantly blackened and polluted by swarms of flies, it was natural that the bread and wine of its sacramental feast should be guarded from defilement by the customary precautions. The flabellum, or muscarium, having been once introduced among the furniture of the altar for necessary uses, in process of time became one of its regular ornaments, and was thus transferred to the more temperate climates of the West, where its original purpose was almost forgotten.

The earliest notice of the flabellum as a liturgical ornament is in the Apostolical Constitutions (viii, 12), which direct that after the oblation, before and during the prayer of consecration, two deacons are to stand, one on either side of the altar, holding a fan made of thin membrane (parchment), or of peacock feathers, or of fine linen, and quietly drive away the flies and toher small insects, that they may not strike against the vessels. In the liturgies also of St. Chrysostom and St. Basil, the deacons are directed to fan the holy oblations during the prayer of consecration. This fanning, according to Germanus (Contemp. rer. Ecl. p. 157), who, though a late authority (A. D. 1222), may be taken as an evidence of earlier usage, ceased with the Lord's Prayer, and was not resumed. Early writers furnish many notices of the use of the flabellum as an essential part of the liturgical ceremonial. Cyril of Scythopolis, in his Life of St. Euthymius, § 78 (c. A. D. 550), describes Domitian standing at the right side of the holy table, while St. Euthymius was celebrating, with the mystical fan (μετὰ τῆς μυστηρίου βραβίδος) just before the Trisagion. Moschus also (Prat. Spirit. § 196) when narrating how some shepherd boys near Apamea were imitating the celebration of the Eucharist in childish sport, is careful to mention that two of the children stood on either side of the celebrant, vibrating their handkerchiefs like fans (τοῖς φακιδάλιοις [fascioliis] ἐπιπνέον). The life of Nicetas (ap. Surium, April 3) describes St. Athanasius assisting at the divine mysteries, "ministerii flabellum tenens erat enim diaconus." Among the ornaments of the church of Alexandria specified in the inventory given, Chronica Alexand. A. D. 624 (ap. Menard. ad Sacr. Gregor. p. 319) are τιμια βραβίδια.

As the deacons were the officers appointed to wave the fan over the sacred oblations, the delivery of the flabellum, or βραβίδιον, constitutes a part of many of the Oriental forms for the ordination to the diaconate. Thus Eucholog. p. 253, after the ἀράβρωσ or stole has been given and placed on the left shoulder, the holy fan (ἅγιον βραβίδιον), is put into the deacon's hands, and he is placed "at the side of the holy table to fan;" and again, p. 251, the deacon is directed to take the βραβίδιον, and stand at the right side of the table, and wave it over the holy things (βραβίσει).

Martene gives similar examples from the ordination of the Maronite deacons (de Rit. ii. 545), chorepiscopi ("diaconi tenentes flabella," ib. p. 554), and patriarchs (ib. 559); as well as of the Jacobite deacons (ib. 579, 580). Renaudot (ii. 80) asserts that though mentioned in the ordination services, the βῆσιδιον does not appear in the Syrian liturgies. A flabellum, formed of a silver disk, was used in the Armenian church, as it still is. Neale (Eastern Ch. p. 396) remarks that the use of the flabellum was much more frequent among the Armenians than in the Greek church.

The flabellum in ordinary use in the Greek church represented a cherub or seraph, with six wings, in allusion to Is. vi. 2. These wings were by preference made of peacocks' feathers, originally on account of their beauty, subsequently with

Although there is no mention of the flabellum in the Ordo Romanus, or Latin ritual books, there is no doubt that it was used by the Western church at an early time. This is evidenced by a story given by Moschus (Prat. Spiritual. § 150) of a deacon who had falsely accused his bishop, being removed from the altar when he was holding the fan in the presence of pope Agapetus, A.D. 535, because he hindered the descent of the Holy Spirit on the gifts. An earlier example is furnished by a gilded glass found in the catacombs, representing a deacon fanning the infant Saviour, seated on the knee of His Virgin Mother (Boldetti, Osservazioni, p. 202), of which we give a woodcut (No. 5). The ancient engraving (No. 6), showing a deacon vibrating his fan during the celebration of the eucharist, is from a miniature in the Barberini Library (Martigny, de l'usage du flabellum). In the next illustration (No. 7) from an illumination in a MS. in the Public Library at Rouen, a bishop is seen bowing his head in the act of elevating the water, over which the attendant deacon waves a flabellum, apparently made of parchment attached to a handle. Bona, u. s., cites also the ancient Clunia Consuetudinal, and that of St. Benignus of Dijon, together with a Pontifical Ceremonial of the time of Nicholas V. c. 1447. The flabellum often appears in inventories of church furniture. In that taken at St. Riquier, near Abbeville, in 831, mention is made of a "flabellum argenteum ad muscas sacrificiis abigendas." Other later examples, including some from our own country, will be found in Mr. Albert Way's paper on the Flabellum (Archaeol. Journ. v. 263), sufficiently establishing its use in the churches of the West, where it could be scarcely regarded as requisite as regarded its original intention. We may cite also a letter of St. Hildebert of Tours, c. 1098 (Ep. 2, 71), accompanying the present of a flabellum made to a friend, in which the writer expounds its mystical signification; the flies representing the temptations of the devil to be driven away by the Catholic faith.

The flabellum appears to have gradually fallen into disuse in the Western church, and to have almost entirely ceased by the 14th century. At the present day, the only relic of the usage is in the magnificent fans of peacocks' feathers, carried by the attendants of the pope in solemn processions on certain great festivals.

Though the original intention of the flabellum was one of simple utility, various mystical meanings collected round it. Reference has been already made to the idea that these feather fans typified the cherubim and seraphim surrounding the heavenly throne, αἱ ῥιπίδες εἰς τὸ πᾶν εἰς τῶν Χερουβίμ (German. u. s. p. 163), τὰ ῥιπίδια καὶ οἱ διάκονοι ἐμφαίνουσι τὰ ἐξαπτέρυγα Σεραφίμ καὶ τὴν τῶν ὀλιγομάτων Χερουβίμ ἐμφέρειαν (Id. p. 169). Germanus also holds, according to Neale (Eastern Ch. p. 396), that the vibration of the flabella typifies the tremor and astonishment of the angels at our Lord's Passion. We find the same idea in a passage from the monk Job, given by Photius (cod. ccxii. lib. v. c. 25), who also states that another purpose of the vibration of the flabella was the raising of the mind from the material elements of the eucharist, and fixing them on the spiritual realities.

Two flabella are still preserved, that of Theodolinda of the latter part of the fifth century, in first chamber—little winged geni carrying on their shoulders small baskets filled with flowers, to be strewn on the graves of the saints who repose within (Bottari, Sculture e Pitture, tav. ccxix.). In the churches of Rome and Ravenna the mosaics of the apse usually represent the delights of paradise; there we find figures of our Lord with the Virgin and other saints upon a groundwork of grass and flowers (Clampin, Vet. monim. I. tab. xlvi. et passim). The bottoms of ancient glass cups have been found unembellished with the same subjects treated in the same manner [GLASS, CHRISTIAN].

A flower rising out of a crown placed between St. Peter and St. Paul in the place where the monogram generally appears has been thought to be a symbol of the Lord. An example may be seen on a gilt vase (Buonarrotti, Frammenti di Vetru. xvi. 1).

FOLIATI. [SHOE.]

FONT, BAPTISMAL. In the article BAPTISTRY, full particulars have been given of the building or chamber set apart for the administration of the sacrament of baptism. It remains now to speak of the cistern or vessel for containing the water. This was known under different names; the general Greek appellation being κοιλια βαπτισμα, the Latin, fontina. Other names were κρηνη, τροχιδος, νεαριον, naturarium (Ducange, Constantinopol. Christ. lib. iii. c. 81, p. 73).

The material in the Western church was, as a rule, stone; frequently porphyry, or other rich marbles. It was permitted by the council of Lerida, A.D. 524, that if the presbyter could not procure a stone font, he might provide himself with a "vas convenientis ad baptizandi officium" of any material (Labbe, Concil. iv. 1615), which was to be reserved for that sacrament alone (Leo IV. de Cura Pastoral.; Labbe, Concil. viii. 37). In the Eastern church the font was usually of metal or wood, and seldom or never possessed any beauty. (Neale, Eastern Church, l. 214.)

The usual form of the font was octagonal, with a mystical reference to the eighth day, as the day of our Lord's resurrection, and of regeneration by the Spirit (cf. Ambrus. Epist. 20, 44). This explanation of the octagonal form is given in the following lines attributed to St. Ambrose, first published by Gruter, Thes. Inscr. p. 1166, descriptive of the baptistry of the church of St. Thecla, in which Alipius and his companions were baptized by him, Easter, A.D. 387.

"Octachorum sanctos tempium conurgit in usus, Octagontis Fons est minere dignus eo.
Hoc numero decuit sacri Baptismatis autam Surgere qui populis vera castus rediit.
Luce resurgentis Christat qui claustra resolvit Mortis et a fontis suscepit exanimæ, Confessoque reos maculose crinitine solvens Fontis purifluis diluit triguus."

The piscina is sometimes found of a circular form, and is occasionally, though very rarely (as at Aquileia) hexagonal (cf. BAPTISTRY, woodcut, p. 175). Gregory of Tours (de Glor. Martyr. lib. i. c. 23), speaks of a font in the shape of a cross in Spain. The form of a sepulchre is stated to have been sometimes adopted, in allusion to the Christian's burial with Christ in baptism (Röm. iv. 4).

The piscina usually formed a basin in the centre of the baptistry, rather beneath the level of the pavement, surrounded with a low wall. It was entered by an ascent and descent of steps. According to Isidore Hispal. (Orig. xv. 4; de Var. Off. ii. 24) the normal number was seven; three in descent to symbolize the triple renunciation of the world, the flesh, and the devil; three in ascent to symbolize the confession of the Trinity, and a seventh, "septimus . . . qui et quartus" at the summit of the enclosing wall, for the officiating minister to stand on. But the rule concerning the number was not invariable. At Nocera, the number of steps is five, two in ascent, and three in descent. The descent in the piscina of St. John Lateran is by four steps. We find frequent references in the fathers to the catechumens going down into the font for immersion, e.g. Cyril, Myst. ii. § 4; "ye were led to the pool of Divine baptism . . . and descended three times into the water, and ascended again;" Id. Myst. iii. § 1. "After you had come up from the pool of the sacred stream;" Ambrose, de Sacra. lib. i. c. 2. "Veni ad fontem, Ingressus es." The most detailed description of a baptismal font, is that given in the life of St. Sylvester, in the Bibl. Top. of the so-called Anastasius (§ 37). This font is said to have been presented by Constantine the Great to the church of the Lateran, in which he was falsely recorded to have been baptized himself. The description is at any rate of value as indicating the decoration and arrangements of an early font. The cistern is stated to have been of porphyry, overlaid within and without with silver. In the middle of the font were two pillars of porphyry, carrying a golden dish, in which the Paschal lamp burnt, fed with balsam, and with an asbestos wick. A lamb of pure gold on the brim of the basin, and seven silver stags, in allusion to Ps. xlii. 1, poured out water; on either side of the lamb were silver statues of Christ, and the Baptist. The font erected by St. Innocent at the church of SS. Gervasius and Protasius, c. 410, was also ornamented with a silver stag, pouring out water (Anastas § 57). Over the fountains, doves of silver or gold were sometimes suspended, in allusion to the circumstances of Christ's baptism. [E. V.]

FONT, BENEDICTION OF. In the 4th century, the ceremony of blessing the water to be used in baptism was already regarded as of high antiquity. Basil the Great, says expressly (De Spiritu S. c. 27), that the benediction of the baptismal water was one of the rites which the church had received from ecclesiastical tradition, not directly from Scripture; i. e. it was of immemorial usage. The principal traces of it in the remains of early literature are the following.

The passage sometimes cited from the Ignatian letter to the Ephesians (c. 18), that Christ was baptized to purify the water, is very far from proving that any special benediction of the water took place at the time of baptism. Nor is it; any means certain that the heretics mentioned by Irenæus (Hæres. i. 21, § 4), who poured oil etimes cited from the Ignatio esians (c. 18), that Christ was into the water, is very far from special benediction of the water time of baptism. Nor is it by that the heretics mentioned es. i. 21, § 4), who poured oil and water over the head of those whom they baptized, did so as imitating the consecration of the water by pouring in christ, as practised by the orthodox. But when Tertullian (de Baptismo, c. 4), after speaking of the aboriginal consecration of the element of water at creation by the Spirit of God, goes on to say, "Therefore all waters acquire the blessing of consecration (sacramentum sanctificationis) from their primeval prerogative, God being invoked (Invocatu Deo)," he probably alludes to a special invocation of the Holy Spirit upon the water which took place before baptism. Some years later, Cyprian (Epist. 70, c. 1) says that the water for baptism should first be cleansed and sanctified by the priest. So Bishop Sedatus of Thuburhum (Sententia Episc. c. 18, in Cyprian's Works), speaks of baptismal water consecrated by the prayer of the priest (aqua sacerdotis prece in ecclesia consecrata). The Arabic canon of Hippolytus (can. 19, p. 75, quoted by Probst, p. 77), direct the candidates for baptism to stand by the font of pure water made ready by benediction. Cyril of Jerusalem (Catech. lib. 3) says that simple water, having uttered over it the invocation of Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, acquires a power of holiness (hysteros). Ambrose (De his qui baptizantur, c. 5) mentions exorcism, benediction, invocation of the Holy Trinity, and prayers. We have here, perhaps, the earliest distinct mention of the exorcism of the baptismal water. An example of the form of exorcism may be seen in BAPTISM, § 30, p. 158.

With regard to the form of benediction, we have already seen that Tertullian speaks of an invocation over the water. Probably the earliest form extant, which cannot be assumed with certainty to be older than the beginning of the 4th century, is that of the Apostolical Constitutions (vii. 43), in which the priest, after a recitation of the mercies of God analogous to the PREFACE of the eucharistic office, proceeds, "Look down from heaven, and sanctify this water, and grant grace and power that he who is baptized according to the command of Thy Christ, may with Him be crucified and die and be buried and rise again to the adoption which is in Him, by dying unto sin, but living unto righteousness." Compare Dionysius Areop. Hierarch. Eccl. c. 2.

Another ceremony, the pouring in of chrism, generally so as to form a cross on the surface of the water, was probably of later introduction, though it is found at least as early as the 6th century [BAPTISM, p. 159]. Gregory of Tours (De Gloria Mart. l. 23) after a curious description of the miraculous filling of certain fountains in Spain, proceeds to say that the water was sanctified by exorcism and sprinkled over with chrism; a passage which proves that in the time of Gregory (†594), the pouring in of chrism was regarded as a matter of course. And it may be mentioned in illustration, that according to Floard's description of the baptism of Clovis (Hist. Remens. Eccl. i. 13), it was after the benediction of the font that chrism was found wanting, and supplied by the advent of the miraculous AMICULA; on receiving which, St. Remi sprinkled the font with chrism (chrismate fontem conspersit).

In Mabillon's Vetus Missale Gallicanum (c. 25, p. 362), we find exhortation, prayer, exorcism of the water, preface, benediction of the font, another preface (called Consectio Fontis) then the rubric, "Postea facit tres cruces de chrismo." In the Gallican Sacramentary printed by Martene (l. i. 18, ordo 3) from a MS. at Bobbio, a somewhat more explicit description is given of the making of the cross on the water with chrism, "Deinde in fonte chrismum decurrente signum + facit." And again (Martene, u. s. ordo 10), the priest "accipiens vas aureum cum chrismate fundit chrisma in fonte in modum crucis, et expandit (aure cum manu sua)." It may be observed that in the Missale Aethiopicum quoted by Binterim (l. i. 86), where the threefold infusion of oil in the form of a cross is described, it is expressly stated to be unconsecrated oil (oleum non benedictum).

The description in Amalarius (De Eccl. Off. l. 25) corresponds generally with that of these sacramentaries. Amalarius expressly mentions insufflation as one of the rites in EXORCISM [see that word]. After the expulsion of the evil spirit by exorcism, he simply says, "munitur aqua crucis signaculo," not distinctly mentioning the pouring in of chrism in the form of a cross.

In the Gregorian Sacramentary (pp. 71-73) is mentioned another rite, that of plunging tapers into the water to be consecrated. Two lighted tapers are carried before the bishop to the font; after the benediction, the aforesaid two tapers are plunged into the font, and the bishop "insufflates" on the water three times. After this the chrism is poured into the font, and the children are baptized. This dipping of the taper into the font is represented in the accompanying woodcut, from a Pontifical of the 9th century [compare the cut on p. 159], where however only one taper is given. The ceremony mentioned by Amalarius (De Eccl. Off. l. 25) of plunging the tapers of the neophytes [BAPTISM, p. 152, § 59] into the font, seems to be distinct from this.

FOOTPRINTS ON SEPULCHRAL SLABS, AND SEAL RINGS. Sepulchral slabs have been found in the catacombs and elsewhere, incised with footprints.* The two feet as a rule point the same

* The white marble slab preserved in the church of St. Sebastian outside Rome, said to have been brought from the chapel of "Domini quo vadis," bearing the prints of two feet, plausibly believed to be those of our Blessed Lord, when met by St. Peter coming to be crucified a second time, in the city from which his apostle was fleeing, is probably nothing more than a sepulchral stone of the kind described above, round which the exquisitely beautiful legend, found first in Ambrose, has crystallised. It way, though sometimes, but rarely, they are turned in opposite directions (Fabretti, Inscript. Antiq. p. 472). A slab in the Kircherian Museum, given by Lupi (Epitaph. Secer. Martyr. p. 68), bears two pairs of footprints pointed contrary ways, as of a person going and returning (fig. 1). Some of these slabs are certainly Christian, though the fact in other cases is uncertain. A slab given by Boldetti (c. vii. p. 419), inscribed with IANOPIA EN Θ (Januaria in Deo) at one end, bears the sole of a foot, with IN DEO incised upon it, at the other. Perret gives a slab erected by a Christian husband to his wife, with a pair of footprints incised on it, not bare, as is customary, but shod in shoes or sandals (Catacombes, vol. v. pl. 26, No. 53). Sometimes but more rarely we find a single foot seen in profile (ib. pl. 52, No. 37).

The signification of this mark is much controverted. Boldetti (p. 507) and others regard the footprint as the symbol of possession, denoting that the burial-place had been purchased by the individual as his own. This view is based on the false etymology of "possessio," quasi "ped's positio," given by Paulus (Dig. 41, tit. 2, § 1), and probably needs no refutation.

The idea of Pelliccia (de Christ. Eccl. Polit. iii. 225) and Cavedoni (Rajjuagl. di munim. dell' Art. Crist. p. 40) that a sense of their loss and a deep regret and affection for the departed was thus indicated, is a mere romantic fancy. More may be said for Lupi's view (u. s. p. 69), that as such emblems were sometimes dedicated as votive offerings by travellers on their return from a journey, they were intended on a Christian slab to indicate a holy thankfulness for the safe completion of the earthly pilgrimage of the departed. Another more prosaic, but by no means improbable, interpretation, especially of a single foot, is that found in Thomassinus (de Donariis, c. 7) and Fabretti (Inscript. t. c. vi. p. 467), quoted by Lupi (u. s.), that it was a thank-offering for recovery from gout or other disease affecting the foot.

It should be remarked that the basilica of St. Sebastian was erected over one of the chief Christian cemeteries, that from which the name catacomb has been transferred to the rest, so that the presence of such a memorial slab is easily accounted for. In the church of St. Radegund at Poitiers a well defined footmark in the stone supposed to indicate the spot where our Saviour appeared to that saint, probably has a similar origin. The Roman remains at Poitiers are numerous. The footprints shown as our Lord's in the church of the Ascension on the Mount of Olives mentioned by Augustine (in Joann. Hom. xlvii. 4; Jerome de locis Hebraicis; Bede de nom. loc. in Act. Apost.) are stated by Stanley (S. & P. p. 452) to be "nothing but a simple cavity in the rock with no more resemblance to a human foot than to anything else."

The same emblem is frequently found on seal rings. The sole of the foot bears sometimes the name of the owner, e. g., FORVIVSIVS (Boldetti, p. 506; Perret, vol. iv. pl. xi. No. 4); JVSIVS (Arlinghi, ii. 698; Agincourt, sculpt. pl. viii. No. 23), from the catacomb of St. Agnes; sometimes a Christian motto or device, e. g., SPES IN DEO (fig. 2) (Perret, u. s., No. 5), and the monogram of Christ (ib. No. 6). In an example given by Perret (vol. iv. p. xxiii. No. 21), we see the stamp of such a seal bearing the sole

Falsum is any perversion or corruption of truth done with malice (dolo malo) to the prejudice of another. It may be committed either by word, as in the case of perjury; by act, as in the case of coining base money; or by writing, as in the case of forgery. In the case of the latter, the crime of falsum is equally committed whether a man has written a document which is not what it professes to be, or forged a seal or a signature, or erased or destroyed the whole or a portion of a document maliciously to the prejudice of another. Falsum was punished under the empire by deportation, or even (in extreme cases) by death (Codex Theod. lib. ix. tit. 19, ll. 1 et 2). The special precautions taken by the authorities of the church against the forgery of ecclesiastical documents seem to belong to a later period than that with which we are concerned; but no doubt the falsarius, like other offenders against the laws of truth and justice, incurred ecclesiastical censures. (Ferraris, Bibliotheca Prompta, s. v. Falsum; Bingham's Antiq. xvi. xii. 14.) [C.]

FORMA. An impression or representation, as (for instance) the stamp on coins, whether effigy or mark.

(1.) It is used for the impression of a seal; and it seems highly probable that literæ formatæ [COMMENDATORY LETTERS, DIMISSORY LETTERS], derived their name from the fact that seals were appended to them. Sirmund quotes a Vatican gloss which interprets the term "formatæ epistola" by "sigillata," and the Greek interpreter of the 23rd canon of the Codex Eccl. Afric. [3 Carth. c. 28], renders "formatam" by τυρωμένη, clearly in the sense of "sealed." The second council of Châlons (c. 41), testifies to the Sirmund quotes a Vatican prets the term "formatæ epi- ta," and the Greek interpreter of the Codex Eccl. Afric. [S ders "formatum" by reversæ the sense of "sealed." The Châlons (c. 41), testifies to the fact that seals were appended to such docu- ments.

And not only is the word formati used abso- lutely for a sealed official document, but forma came to be used in the same sense. Thus Capito- lianus describes Antoninus as consulting his friends before he drew up authoritative docu- ments (formas); and the word is similarly used by Christian writers (Ducange, s. v. Forma, Formatæ).

(2.) From the same use of the word Forma for an effigy or stamp, it arises that the word Formati designates the formed or stamped bread used in the Holy Eucharist. The Ordo Romanus in the rite for the consecration of a bishop has the following; "cum autem venerit ad communicaudum Dominus Pontifex porrigit ei formatam atque sacramentum oblationem integram." Néard takes this to mean an "epistola formatæ," but it seems in the highest degree improbable that the consecrator would present an official document to the newly-ordained bishop at the moment of communicating, and Ducange (s. v. Formatæ) has shown that the word is elsewhere used to designate the eucha- ristic bread.

(3.) The word Forma is also used to designate the seats or stalls used by clerks or monks when saying their offices in choir. The gloss on the rule of St. Benedict (De Suppellect.) explains Forma as "sella arcuata, spinos." The desk in front of such a stall, on which its occupant might lean, seems to be sometimes called forma (Supplex Lib. Monach. Fuld. Car. Mayo, c. 5, in Migne's Patrol. cv. p. 419; compare Gregory of Tours, De Glor. Confess. c. 92; Hist. Franc. viii. 31). [C.]

FORMARIUS, the person in a monastery who was especially appointed to promote the spiritual welfare of the brethren, and to be a model of life to them, "qui in bonis sit forma" (Regula S. Ferreoli, c. 17); an elder brother fitted to benefit the souls of the monks, who should studiously devote himself to watching over them (Reg. S. Benedicti, c. 58). The corre- sponding person in a monastery of women was called Formaria (Reg. S. Caesarii ad Virgines, c. 37; Ducange, s. v.). [C.]

FORMATA. [FORMA.]

FORNICATION (Fornicatio, πορνεία) is de- fined to be "copula carnalis soluti cum soluta"; a sin committed by two persons, male and female, who are not connected by blood within the prohibited degrees of kindred, and are neither married nor contracted. This is in substance, Augustine's definition (Quest. in Deuteronom. n. 37). The older definitions of fornication seem to refer almost entirely to the freedom of the woman from the marriage bond, without regard to the condition of the man [ADULTERY]. Thus Basil (ad Amphilo- ch. c. 21) regards the sin of a married man with an unmarried woman as simple πορνεία, not μοικηρία; and Gregory of Nyssa (Epist. Canonica) defines fornication to be a gratification of lust which takes place without wronging another; which words Balsamon (in loco) explains to mean, intercourse with a woman who is not married (Πορνεία λέγεται ἡ χωρίς ἀδικίας ἐρεπου μίξις, ἢ ἢν ἡ πρὸς ἐλευθέρων ἀνδρῶν γυναικῶν). To the same effect Theophylact (on St. Matt. v. 32) says that fornication is committed with a woman not under marriage bond (εἰς ἀπολελυμένην). Am- brose, however, lays down the wider and truer principle, "nec viro licet quod mulieri non licet; eadem a viro quæ ab uxore debetur castissima;" (De Patriarch. l. 4). Concubinage, the continued cohabitation of an unmarried man with an un- married woman, is a special case of fornication.

The word fornicatio is also used to designate all kinds of sexual sin and unnatural crime; see, for instance, Theodore's Penitential, l. ii. Fornica- tion in this wider sense is commonly called luxury by later canonists.

It was one of the first cares of the apostolic church to repress this evil held so venial among the Gentiles (Acts xv. 20; 1 Cor. vi. 18; Eph. v. 3, 5); nor were the rulers of the church in later times less anxious to put down all forms of uncleanness. Basil (ad Amphil. c. 22) lays down the rule, that men practising concubinage after seduction should be excluded from com- munion for four years, in the first of which they are to be excluded from the prayers, and weep at the door of the church; in the second to be received as hearers; in the third to penitence (εἰς μετάνοιαν); in the fourth to attend divine service with the congregation, abstaining from the offering; and then to be admitted to communion of the good (κοινωνίαν τοῦ ἀγαθοῦ). In the case of concubinage, the great bishop evidently feels that the times will not bear due severity. He holds (ad Amph. c. 23) that it is best that persons living together in fornication should be separated; but if they persist in living together, "let them be warned of the penalty of fornication; but let them not be meddled with (ἀφίστασθαι), lest a worse thing come upon them." So previously (c. 21) he acknowledges the difficulty of treating certain cases, and confesses that custom is too strong to be contended against. For fornicators in general he enjoins (ib. c. 59) seven years' exclusion from the sacraments; two among the Fientes, two among the Auticætes, two among the Substrati, and one among the Consistentes [PENITENCE].

The treatment of sins of uncleanness occupies a large, perhaps an undue space in later Peniten- tials; as (e. g.) in those of Theodore (l. ii.), Bede, (c. 3), Egbert (cc. 2 and 4), Halitgar (l. 16, 17), and others.

Periods of penance are prescribed, varying according to the condition of the offender, and the nature of the offence. The offence of a cleric was naturally more heinous than that of a simple lay person, and might be punished by degrada- tion, as well as by the same kind of penalties as those inflicted on the laity. And it is evident from the repeated denunciations of such sins by bishops and councils, and the elaborate provision made to separate the clergy and the monks from the society of women, that the celibate clergy were only too liable to fall into the sin of inco- ntinence (Thomassin, Vetus et Nova Eccl. Discip. l. ii. 81, §§ 8-12). [C.]

FORUM. [JURISDICTION.]

FOSSARI or FOSSORES. The grave-diggers or sextons of early Christian antiquity were known by these designations. [COPIATAE; DECANUS.]

Padre Marchi has drawn a very definite picture of guilds of fo-ssores, organized under special regulations, attached to each of the tituli of Rome, and acting under the directions of the bishops and presbyters. (Monum. Primit. pp. 87-91.) But the evidence he adduces is of the slightest texture; and the good father probably did not intend his description to be regarded as more than a pleasing hypothesis.

The term fossor is of frequent occurrence in the inscriptions of the catacombs. Marchi, p. 91, gives several epitaphs of fossores. Boldetti, i. 15, gives the following from St. Callistus: "Sergius et Junius Fossores || B. N. M. in pace bisom." But the most common appearance of the term is in the Inter epitaphs, which testify to the purchase of graves from individuals of this class. The burial of the departed was probably at first a work of Christian charity, performed without fee or reward by their surviving brethren. Afterwards, when the church had become more numerous, it was carried out at the public expense under the special care of the presbyters of the tituli of Rome. When Christianity became the established religion, the fossores evidently established a kind of property in the catacombs, which authorized them to sell graves either to living persons for their own burial, or to the friends of the deceased. This state of things seems to have had a wide-spread but transient existence. The examples are almost innumerable in which the purchase of graves of the fossores is plainly stated in the epitaph. No trace of such bargains appears before the latter years of the 4th century, nor later than the first quarter of the 5th century. According to De Rossi (R. S. i. p. 216), the last known mention of fossores is A.D. 426. As examples of these bargains, belonging to the time when interment had become the private enterprise of the fossores, and Christian burial had been degraded into a trade, we may refer to the instances already given under CATACOMBS. The eager craving after sepulture in the proximity of the holy dead, to which some of these epitaphs bear witness, has been the cause of the destruction of many paintings of high interest. The fossores could not afford to have a taste either archaeological or artistic, and pierced the painted walls to make new highly-priced tecti, as recklessly as the exquisite carved work of so many of our cathedrals has been cut away for the erection of tasteless monuments.

The fossor at his work appears frequently in the frescoes of the catacombs. (Bosio, pp. 305, 335, 339, 373; Aringhi, ii. pp. 23, 63, 67, 161.)

Bottari, tom. II. tav. 118, gives two pictures from the catacomb of Marcellinus and Peter. One represents a young man, his beard closely shaven, in a short tunic, girt round his waist, his legs and feet bare, excavating the rock with his pick, a lamp hanging by his side. The other depicts an older man in a long tunic, not at work, holding a lamp adjoined to a long handle ending in a sharp point, and a little below on the shaft a hook for suspension.

The most curious and interesting of these representations is that of a fessor named Diogenes, from the cemetery of Callistus (see woodcut).

He wears a tunic marked with gammadi on its hem, carries a pick over his right shoulder, and a lamp in his left hand, and is surrounded by a heap of levers, picks, and other tools employed in his work. Above is the inscription: "Diogenes Fossor in pace depositus Octavii Kalendaris Octobris." (Boldetti, lib. i. cap. 15; Bottari, tom. II. p. 126, tav. 99.) A fessor's pick has been discovered by De Rossi in the cemetery of Callistus, much oxidized, but still recognizable. (Martigny, Dict. des Antiq. Christ. p. 281.) [E. V.]

FOUNDLINGS (Alumni). Compare EXPOSING OF INFANTS.

From an early period the church provided ORPHANAGES [see the word] for the reception of children left destitute by the death or desertion of their parents. But, independently of such institutions, it also maintained a large number by appeals to individual charity, and exhorted the faithful to feed and shelter the innocent creatures in their own houses. The number of these alumni, "nurslings," was large; the rescue of a deserted infant being considered as an act specially inspired by Christian charity. The word alumnus consequently occurs much oftener in Christian than in pagan inscriptions. Sometimes we find the adopting parents raising a tomb to their alumnus (Perret, Catacombes, v. xlvii. 13). In the cemetery of Pontianus the name of a young person departed is inscribed upon a circular ivory tablet thus: EMPRINVS || VICTORINAE || ALVMPNAE SVAE (Fabretti, In-

De Rossi (Inscr. pt. Christ. i. 46) gives the epitaph of an alumnus of the date A.D. 340. Le Blant (Inscr. Chret. de la Gaule), mentions an inscription at Trèves to the memory of an alumna who survived only one month and a few days. Infants were generally exposed at the doors of churches (Conc. Arles II. can. 51, A.D. 451).

A person wishing to adopt an exposed child was required to place in the hands of the minister of the church near which it was found a written statement giving the sex of the child with the time and place of its discovery, in order that it might be restored to its parents if they wished to reclaim it. If no such claim were put forward within ten days after its exposure, the child belonged by right to those who had given it shelter (Martigny, Dict. des Antiq. Chret., s. v. Enfant Trouvés). [See ROCK, and EVANGELISTS, REPRESENTATIONS OF.] Our Lord is represented (in Bottari, tav. xvi.; Buonarroti, Tetri, tav. vi. et passim) as the Source of the Gospel and Fons Pietatis, from under whose feet flow the four Rivers of Paradise. [See FOUR RIVERS.] In the Lateran (Cross, p. 496) and other baptismal crosses the Holy Dove is the font or source from which the sacred rivers flow. The well spring in the wilderness is rather a Hebrew, Arab, or universally Eastern image, than a specially Christian one. In some early baptisms of our Lord, as that in the ancient baptistry of Ravenna, the river-god or presiding deity of the source of Jordan is introduced. FOUNTAINS AT THE ENTRANCE OF CHURCHES. The natural symbolism which required external purity in the worshippers, as an index of the cleanness of heart necessary for approaching God with acceptance, dictated the erection of fountains or cisterns of water in the atria, or forecourts of the primitive churches, for the people to wash their hands, feet, and faces, before they entered the sacred building. Such a fountain was known by different designations, spring (Euseb. H. E. x. 4; Chrysa. Hom. 57, Ed. Savil.), spring (Soer. H. E. li. 38), φύλαξ (Paul. Silentiar. li. vers. 177), ἐπιβάτης (Theophanes), καλυπτέων (Eucholog.), Cantharus (Paul. Nolan. Ep. xlii. xxxii.), Nymphæum (Anastas. § 69). The earliest notice we have of this arrangement is in Eusebius' description of the church erected by Paulinus at Tyre (Euseb. H. E. x. 4). He speaks of "fountains" being placed as "symbols of purification" in the centre of the cloistered atrium, affording means of cleansing to those who were going into the church. A similar basin was erected by Paulinus of Nola, in the atrium of the basilica of St. Felix, its purpose being expressed by the following verses over one of the arches of the opposite cloister—

"Sancra nitens famula int' riuat atria iuxta Cantharus, mirantemq; nimis lavat ungue ministro." Paul. Nolan. Ep. 32 ad Scar.

This "cantharus" was protected by a brazen canopy, or turret of lattice work—

"Quem cancellato tegit aera culmine turric." Paulin. Poem. 26 (Not. x.)

Other brazen basins supplied from the same source stood in different parts of the forecourt, as well as a row of marble basins, conchæ, at the entrance of the church (p.).

Paulinus also describes a "cantharus" in the atrium of the basilica of St. Peter at Roma (Ep. li. p. 73), "ministra manibus et oris nostris fluentia ructantem." This was covered by a dome or tholus, of brass, supported on four columns, typifying the fountain of living water flowing from the four gospels, the foundation of the evangelical faith. This cantharus and its quadrifortius were adorned with marbles and mosaic by Symmachus, c. 500, who also erected another external fountain below the steps of the atrium for the convenience of the people thronging thither "ad usum necessitatis humane" (Anastas. de Vit. Pont. § 79). Another was placed by Leo III. c. 800, outside the silver gates of the same basilica (Ep. § 360). The popes vied with one another in the magnificence of these fountains. Leo the Great, c. 450, placed a very remarkable one in the atrium of the basilica of St. Paul, on the Ostian way, for the supply of which he recovered a long-lost spring, as recorded in the verses of Ennodius.

"Perdidit talis longæva turris cursum Quis tibi nunc plecto cantharus ore vomit. Provida pastoris per totum curia Leonis. Hæc ovibus Christ' largis fluentia dedit." Ennod. Car. m. 149, ed. Sirmond.

Anastasius also describes a "nymphæum" erected by Hilarius, c. 485, in the tripterium of the oratory of St. Cross, adorned with columns of vast size, and pillars of porphyry from apertures in which the water flowed into a porphyry basin (Anastas. u. s. § 69). Ennodius also (u. s.) speaks of the water of the baptistry of St. Stephen coming through the columns, "per columnas." In other cases the water issued from a statue in the centre, sometimes of grotesque form, or from lions' mouths, from which arrangement the basin erected by Justinian in front of St. Sophia at Constantinople was called Λεωσάπριον (Lion-cage, Constantinop. Christ. lib. iii. c. 22). This fountain was made of jasper, with incised crosses. There were other smaller basins in the cloisters for the lustrations of the people (Dungue, u. s.). A cantharus discovered at Constantinople bore the palindrome given by Gruter (Inscript. p. 1046).

These fountains were usually supplied with water from running springs, as that at St. Paul's already mentioned. Where springs were absent, the supply came from rain water tanks, as at the basilica of St. Felix at Nola (Paul. Nolan. Poem. 27 (Not. ix.) v. 493, sq.).

Such fountains were solemnly consecrated and blessed on the annual recurrence of the vigil of the Epiphany (identified in primitive times with the day of our Lord's baptism, when the element of water was hallowed, Chrys. Homil. in Bapt. Crist. vol. ii. p. 369, Montf.) or of the festival itself (Ducange, u. s.). The office is given in the Eucherion.

From a mosaic, St. Vitale, Ravenna.

We find frequent reference in the early fathers to this custom of washing the hands and face before entering the church, e.g. Tertull. de Orat. c. 11; Chrysost. Homil. 51, c. 11; Matt.; in Joan. 72; Homil. 3, in Ephes.; in Psalm. 140, ad Pop. Ant. 36, &c. Cf. also Baronius, ad ann. 57, No. 106-110. [HOLY WATER.]

FOUR RIVERS, THE. In ancient art our Lord is frequently represented, either in person or under the figure of a lamb, standing upon a hillock from whence issue four streams of water. (See woodcut.) These are supposed by many to signify the four rivers of Eden, which went forth to water the earth (Gen. ii. 10); others (Cyprian, Ep. 73, § 10, ad Juban.; Bede, Expos. in Gen. II.; Theodoret, In Psalm. XLV.; Ambrose, De Paradiso, c. 3) discern in them the four gospels, flowing from the source of eternal life to spread throughout the world the riches and the life-giving powers of the doctrine of Christ. St. Ambrose again (u. s.) is of opinion that the four rivers are emblems of the four cardinal virtues. The four first oecumenical councils, so often by early writers placed on a par with the gospels themselves, are sometimes compared to the four rivers of Paradise. Jesse, bishop of Amiens in the eighth century, in writing to his clergy, thus illustrates the veneration due to these august assemblies (Longueval, Hist. de l'Egl. Gallienne, tom. v. p. 144).

In several sarcophagi of ancient Gaul, we find two stags quenching their thirst at these streams; these are supposed to represent Christians partaking in the gospels and the eucharist of the "well of water springing up into everlasting life." [Cross, p. 496.] The two stags are occasionally found in mosaics, in that of the ancient Vatican for example (Ciampini, De Sacr. Aedif. tab. xiii.).

However we explain it, this subject was extremely popular in the primitive church; we find it repeated over and over again in the catacombs, either in frescoes or in the sculptured ornaments of sarcophagi, and sometimes on the bottoms of glass cups, which have been discovered therein. It appears also in the mosaics of some basilicas, for instance, in that which is described by Paulinus (Epist. 32, ad Sever.), and in that mentioned by Florus, deacon of Lyons (Mabilion, Analect., p. 416, ed. Paris. See also Ciampini, Vet. Mon. ii. tab. xxxvii. xvi. xlix. lii., &c.). To illustrate this passage of Paulinus,

"Petram superstat fœc Petra Ecclesiae De qua sonori quatuor fontis emanant," Rosweil refers to the mosaic of St. John Lateran, and the sarcophagus of Probus and Proba, as represented by Bosio. We are informed by Spon (Herænes curieuses, p. 34) that the four rivers of Paradise in human form, with their names beneath, are represented in mosaic on the pavement of Rheims Cathedral (Martigny, Dict. des Antiq. Chret.). [C.]

FRACTION. The rite of breaking the bread in the celebration of the Holy Eucharist is technically so called. There are three kinds of fractions, which are in use at the present time; though but one of them is essential to the sacrament, and can be traced with certainty to the infancy of the church. The three are, (1) a fraction illustrative of the words of institution, and therefore a direct imitation of our Lord's action, (2) purely symbolical fractions after the consecration has been completed, (3) the necessary fraction for the distribution of the bread among the communicants.

(1) The first of these has a place in the English office, the celebrant being ordered to "break the bread" while he utters the words, "He brake it." Nothing could be more natural than that in reciting the words of institution, the priest should "suit the action to the word," and break the bread as "He brake it." It is very probable, therefore, that this was a common, if not the universal, practice, in what we may call the first ritual period. Traces of it are found both in the East and West. In the Coptic liturgy of St. Basil, the celebrant is ordered at those words to "break the oblation into three parts;" but he is at once to reunite them, "so that they be in a manner as not divided." (Renaudot, Liturg. Orient. l. p. 15.) They are put together again with a view to a later and purely symbolical fraction. There is but one extant Latin missal, which is reported to contain an order for the actual fraction at this time, viz., that of Rheims, of the middle of the 16th century, in which the following rubric at this time, viz., that of Rheims, of the middle of the 16th century, in which the following rubric occurs, "Dicens frangit frangit modicum." (De Vert, Explication des Cérémonies de l'Eglise, tom. i. p. 262.) In our own country the missal of Sarum and York to the last ordered the celebrant to "touch the host," while a manuscript Manual in the possession of the Rev. W. J. Blew goes further, and prescribes "the sign of a fraction."

The frequency of the latter custom in England may be likewise inferred from its condemnation by John de Burgo, A.D. 1385 (Pupilla Oculi, pars iv. cap. x.), and its prohibition in the Manual authorised by Cardinal Pole in the reign of Mary. The foregoing facts are mentioned because they appear to support the antecedent probability that the fraction, which is now peculiar to the English and Coptic liturgies, was once general. The reason for giving it up need not be sought for. When the bread was once broken, it would not be possible for the priest to perform the subsequent symbolical fraction, introduced at a later period, with the same convenience and effect.

(2) From an early period we find other ceremonial fractions, more or less elaborate, employed, the evident intention of which was to develop and enforce the devotional allusion to our Lord's sufferings on the cross. No fraction of any kind is mentioned in St. Cyril's account of the liturgy of Jerusalem (Catechesis Mystag., v. cc. 17, 18), nor in the Clementine liturgy, which exhibits the ritual and worship of the 3rd or 4th century. [APOSTRO-PHICAL CONSTITUTIONS.] In that of St. Mark, which from its long disuse has undergone less change than any other which was ever in actual use, the fraction for distribution is alone mentioned (Renaudot, tom. i. p. 162). In St.
James, which is still used at stated times, and has been much altered in the course of ages, the celebrant "breaks the bread, and holds half in his right hand, half in his left, and dips that in his right in the cup, saying, 'the union of the all-holy body and the precious blood of our Lord and God and Saviour Jesus Christ.'" (Assemani, tom. v. p. 54.) In the Office of Prothesis in the common Greek liturgy, there is a preparation of the bread by the aid of a knife (Αόχνη), accompanied by symbolical allusions. [PROTHESIS.] After the Sancta Sanctis, which follows close upon the Consecration, "The priest dividing it (the holy loaf) into four parts with care and reverence says 'The Lamb of God, the Son of the Father, is dismembered and divided, &c.' Then he takes the uppermost part of the holy loaf (which is stamped with the letters IC, for Ie-sus), and holds it in his hand, and the deacon pointing with his oration to the holy cup, says, Fill, Master, the holy cup. And the priest says, The fullness of faith of the Holy Ghost. And he makes the sign of the cross and casts it into the holy cup" (Eucologium, Conar, pp. 60, 81, 175).
These rites, though not perhaps in their present form precisely, must have been in use before the separation of the Nestorians and Eutychnians from the church; but whether they were known to St. Basil and St. Chrysostom, the alleged remodellers of the Greek liturgy, it is impossible to say. On the first part of the foregoing ceremony, Symeon of Thessalonica, the mystical expositor of that rite, observes, "He divides the bread into four parts, and these he arranges in the form of a cross, and in this he beholds Jesus crucified." De Templo &c. printed in Conar, p. 228. In the Coptic liturgies the rite is still more elaborate. There is first a special prayer, Prooemium ante fractionem, preceding it; which is in fact an act of thanksgiving, and is called a Benediction in the office itself.

After crossing both the bread and the cup with a finger dipped in the latter, he says a "Prayer of Fraction." Later on, in preparation for the communion, "he divides the body into three parts, as he had done before at the words He brake it;" but this time transversely to the former fractures.
The piece from the middle of the Corban is the largest, and from this he takes a small piece (Ischodicon, or in the Greek Alexandrian liturgies Σκοδικόν, corruptions of Δεσποτικόν, the Lord's body), which he sets aside. The larger piece from which it is taken is put in the middle of the paten, and the other eight are placed about it so as to form a cross. The allusion to the Passion is thus expressed by an act rather than by words. The priest next breaks up, in prescribed order, all but the large piece in the middle, and "collects about that the holy body which he has broken." The Ischodicon is put into the cup; a rite corresponding to the Com-mictio of the West. The fraction now described, into which a devout priest could evidently infuse great solemnity is common to the three Coptic liturgies; which fact implies that the former fraction at the words He brake it is so also;
although it is only prescribed in that of St.
Basil. (See Renaudot, tom. i. pp. 19-23; and Gabriel's Rituale, ibid. p. 258.) Whether the same ceremonies were observed in the Greek liturgies of Egypt cannot be decided, owing to the brevity of the rubrics and the absence of commentaries; but the Coptic of St. Basil carries us up to a period earlier than the conquest of Anrou in the 7th century. The rubrics of the Ethiopic liturgy do not prescribe any fraction, but as it was derived from the Coptic, and retains the Coptic Oratio Fractionis, we may infer that it had a solemn fraction similar to that which we have described.

In the Syrian rite the priest (in a short office of Prothesis) "divides the bread into as many pieces as may be necessary, censes them, and sets them on the altar, saying, He was led like a lamb to the slaughter, and as a sheep, &c." (Renaudot, tom. i. p. 3.) After the consecration he breaks a small piece off with the words, "Thou art Christ our God, who on the top of Golgotha in Jerusalem wast pierced in Thy side for us, &c." or something conveying the same allusion. (Ibid. pp. 22, 40, etc.) Before the communion he dips this particle (pearl) "into the chalice and signs the rest with it crosswise, saying, The blood of the Lord is sprinkled on His body, in the Name of the Father," &c. The pearl thus used is then put into the chalice with a prayer alluding to the union of the Godhead and Manhood in Christ (Renaudot, tom. ii. pp.
3, 41). Another symbolical action, viz. that of touching the body in the paten with the moistened pearl, is not marked in the rubrics.
It is done in allusion to the piercing of our Lord's side with a spear (Barsalibi, ibid. p. 111).
Among the Nestorians the consecrated oblate is broken into two parts. One of these is laid on the paten, and with the other the priest crosses the cup. He then dips the latter to the middle in the cup, and "signs with it the body which is in the paten." Both signs are made with appropriate words. He then unites the two ommunion, "the priest breaks the bread, and ays, Praise ye God in [i. e. Psalm] cl. as in the Septuagint. The priest divides the bread, saying to those present [i. e. to the deacons, &c. who assist], The Lord shall bless and minister with you." &c. Then, after a few verses entirely free from any mystical allusion, he ite of putting the bread into the chalice has been adopted. "When he distributes a single portion into each chalice, he says, A holy portion of Christ, full of grace and truth, of the &c. Then he begins to divide [i. e. the bread in the chalices with a spoon], and to say, The Lord is my Shepherd," &c. (Ps. xxiii.). In the common Greek rite, a second part of the prepared loaf which is stamped XC (for Χριστός) is divided for the communion of the priest and his assistants, who receive the elements separately.

The other two (marked NI and KA; see ELE-MENTS, p. 603) are also divided according to the number of the other communicants, and put into the chalice. As intinction began to appear in Spain in the 7th century (see Can. ii. Conc.
Bracar. Libl. tom. vi. col. 563), the method of fraction now described as attendant on it was probably in use among the Greeks so early as the 6th. In the 4th and 5th we find Cyril of Jerusalem, Basil, Chrysostom, and Cyril of Alexandria, still recognizing the practice of receiving at the hand (see Scudamore's Notitia Eucharis-tica, p. 632, and COMMUNION, HOLY, p. 416), which is incompatible with intinction. We have already described the last fraction in the Coptic liturgy. The rubrics do not specify any further preparation for the communion. Nor are those of the Ethiopic, Armenian, or Syriac more explicit. The last named liturgy, however, may receive illustration from the Nestorian, in which "another fraction of the same Host into lesser particles for the distribution of the communion" is expressly ordered, though no method is prescribed (Renaudet, tom. ii. pp. 595, 611).

In the West the Mozarabic priest preparing for the communion put the "particle" called Regnum into the chalice, received himself that called Gloria, and if any others received must, it is presumed, have used the remainder for their communion, breaking them up as the number of communicants might require. We say presumed, for the present rubrics, which recognize but one Host, divided as before described, direct him afterwards to consume all the particles in order.
The tract of Lidefonus, printed by Mabillon in an appendix to his dissertation De Pane Eucha-ristico (Analys. Vetera, p. 549), prescribes the use of several Hosts, the number varying with the festival or season. We have no information respecting the early practice of the Gallican and Italian churches. In an Ordo Romanus which probably carries us up to the 7th century, and certainly to the 8th, the last fraction is thus described. The bishop of Rome, it should be said, is the chief officiant. "Then the acolytes go behind the bishops about the altar; the rest go down to the presbyters; that they may break the Hosts [which were then small loaves]. A paten goes before near the throne, two regionary deacons carrying it to the deacons, that they may break. But they look on the face of the pontiff that he may give the signal to break."

FRANKFORT, COUNCIL OF (Francofordense concilium), held at Frankfort, A.D. 794, "by favour of God, authority of the pope, and command of Charlemagne, who was present and attended by all the bishops of the kingdom of France and Italy, with the province of Aquitaine" (100 in number, according to later writers), as we read in the first of the fifty-six canons ascribed to it. From the same canon we learn that the first thing discussed in it was the heresy of the Spanish prelates Felix and Elipand, since called Adoptionism, which was condemned; and from the second canon that a decree of a recent synod of the Greeks, visiting all with anathema who would not worship and serve the images of the saints as they would the Trinity, was repudiated as well as condemned. This is about all we know of what passed at Frankfort; at any rate we have no direct authentic record extant of its proceedings beyond its canons. And of these the second has been made a subject of hot controversy both in ancient and modern times. Contemporaries aver that bishops Theo-phylact and Stephen (without naming their sees) represented pope Adrian at Frankfort, and that the council repudiated there was that "falsely called the 7th." In the modern heading to this council, on the other hand, it is asserted that "the acts of the 2nd Nicene council respecting images were confirmed there." There are four dogmatic epistles printed in the collections of councils as having emanated from Frankfort.

(1) A letter from pope Adrian to the bishops of Spain. (2) Another from the bishops of Italy against Elipand. This is better known as "the sacrostylabus" of Paulinus of Aquileia, but it is said to have been published at Frankfort, and sent by order of the council into Spain. (3) A third is from the bishops of France and Germany to the bishops of Spain. (4) A fourth from Spanish bishops. In this the three preceding are stated to have been sent by him after holding a council, and conferring with the pope on the subject of which they treat, without however naming Frankfort. Still, after reading the 1st canon of Frankfort, we may not doubt their having been brought out there. As little can we doubt another work having been brought out there also, for the light it throws upon canon 2.
The title given originally to this work was "the capitulary respecting images;" but it is in four books, now known as the "Caroline." It has been ascribed to Alcuin, Angilbert, and Angilramm in turn; it is ascribed to Alcuin still (Bibl. Ver. Germ. tom. vi. 220). What it says of Charlemagne and his prelates in refutation of two councils "held in the parts of Bithynia" (both calling themselves the seventh); one iconoclastic (met of Constantinople, A.D. 754), the other in favour of images (the 2nd Nicene, A.D. 787), and within three years of this last (at four years before it was brought out). But, in reality, there was no need of refuting the first of them, as this had been already done by the last (Art. Conc. Nic. ii.). The last alone therefore, now stood for refutation. "De eius destructione," says Hincmar (in causâ Hinc. l. c. 20), "non modicum volumen, quod in palatio adolescentulus legi, ab eodem imperatore Romam est per quosdam episcopos missum"—and then follows a reference to c. 28 of the fourth book, which identifies it at once. Further, not only was it sent to Rome, but it elicited a formal reply from the pope, as pope, vindicating in detail the teaching of the 2nd Nicene council which he had confirmed himself (Mansi xiii. 759 and seq.). In this work it is the 2nd Nicene council accordingly which is attacked all through: the creed of Pelagius the heretic (St. Aug. Op. x. App. pt. ii. Ed. Ben.) is paraded in the opening c. of the 3rd book as St. Jerome's, and called "the tradition of the Catholic faith in its integrity," in opposition to that of the 2nd Nicene council, which is attacked further on for wanting the "Filioque" clause (c. 8); while c. 17 of the same book unravels the statement of canon 2 of this council, by shewing that what is condemned there as having been decreed by the 2nd Nicene council under anathema, was no more than the informal utterance of one of the bishops who spoke there, named Constantinus. If the pope then was really represented at Frankfort by his legates, they must have left after the condemnation of Adoptionism, or, at all events, before this canon was framed. Most of the other canons, indeed, are couched in a style of their own, "Statutum," "definitum est a Domino Rege, et a sancto" or "definitum est a Domino Rege, et a sancto ayno." The 3rd canon runs thus: "Ut Catholicae fides sanctae Trinitatis, et oratio Dominica, et symbolum fidei omnibus predicetur et tradatur." It has been assumed that what was meant here by "Catholica fides" is the Athanasian Creed. But it would seem, rather, from the two verbs which follow, that as by the Lord's Prayer and Creed are meant what had to be "delivered," so by the "Catholic faith" is meant merely what had to be "preached." Besides, this phrase was applied to so many things then (Foulkes' Ath. C. Append. p. 32 and seq.), that its actual meaning cannot be assumed where the context is not explicit. The 55th is remarkable as shewing how Angilram had been employed. "Dixit Dominus rex . . . se a sede apostolica . . . licentiam habuisse, ad Angilram archiepiscopum in suo palatio assidue habere, propter utilitates ecclesiasticas." Now this is the only work extant with which his name is associated, a collection of canons said to have been given by him to the pope, or received from the pope when he was at Rome, containing indistinctly the putative germs of the false Decretals. In the next canon Alcuin is commended to the fellowship and prayers of the council. There is a strong family likeness, in conclusion, between this council and that of Paris, A.D. 825, which should not be overlooked by anybody wishing to form a just notion of either (Mansi xiii. 859 and 863 and seq.).

FRATER, FRATERNITAS. 1. The name Frater was applied among themselves to all Christians [FAITHFUL]. Tertullian (Apolog. c. 39) says that those who recognise one God as their father, and have drunk of one Spirit, are called brethren. Jerome (De Perpet. Virg. c. 15) says that all Christians are called brothers. The Pseudo Clemens (Epist. ad Jacob. Proem.) speaks of the priests and deacons, and all the other brethren. Hence the title Fraternitas was commonly applied to all the members of the church, or of a particular church, regarded collectively; as by Tertullian (Apolog. c. 39); and perhaps De Virg. l. c. 13), and Cyprian (Epist. 51, c. 1) where "fraternitas" is equivalent to "clerus et plebs."

Frater and Fraternitas, in this sense, are frequently found in inscriptions. Thus, in an African inscription (Reinier, Ins. de l'Algérie, No. 4025), a church is designated ECCLESIA FRATRUM. In a Greek epitaph copied by Marini (Arcad. Prefaz. p. xx.), from the Olivieri collection at Pesaro, the body of the faithful is addressed with the salutation, "peace to the brethren," ΕΙΡΗΝΗΝ ΕΧΕΤΕ ΑΔΕΛΦΟΙ. Another (Muratori, Thesaur. l. iv. p. MCCCXXIV. 9) is indicated by "the brethren" (fratres redditorum) to Alexander, their brother. Another (Brunati, p. 108) appeals to the "good brothers" (fratres boni). In another, from the cemetery of Priscilla, "the brethren" bid farewell to Leontius.

Some proper names appear to have arisen from this idea of brotherhood. As that of Adelphus, which is found on a marble in the museum of Lyons (Beissien, p. 597, xi.). (Martigny, Dictionnaire des Antiq. Chret. ; Art. Fraternité).

2. Persons of the same official body styled each other Frates; thus, not only does Cyprian speak of fellow-bishops as Frates, but he addresses presbyters and deacons by the same title (e.g. Epist. 16). When in the same epistle (c. 2), he says, that "fraternitas nostra" is seen to have been received by certain persons, it seems doubtful whether he means the body of bishops, or the members of the church in general. Hosius (Conc. Sardic. c. 8) speaks of a fellow-bishop as "frater et coepiscopus." From this official use of the word "Frater," it arose that the members of a council speak of themselves as "concilium fraternalis" (J. Conc. Lugd. c. 6), i. e. of the episcopal brotherhood. So I. Syn. Rom. c. 2; II. [III.] Syn. Rom. c. 1.

with water simply, and applied to fresh plaster while wet. This was the ordinary mode of colouring walls among the wealthier Romans; but the care and skill it required, and the tedious processes necessary for preparing the walls for the colours, forbade its use where economy was an object. In the better-class houses at Pompeii, Rome, and elsewhere, the wall-decorations are executed in fresco; but the greater part of the paintings in ordinary dwellings are in distemper of various degrees of excellence. We are at present deficient in accurate information as to the exact process employed in the paintings of the catacombs; but considering the general absence of wealth among the primitive Christians, it is probable that the less expensive method would be adopted. Whenever paintings were repainted or touched up, the plaster being dry, the distemper process must have been necessarily employed. That encaustic painting in wax was also employed in early religious pictures is certain from the references in the fathers to that process. Chrysostom and Basil (Contra Sobellin. p. 805) in the East, and Paulinus in the West, may be cited. The latter speaks of "imagines ceris liquentibus pictas" (Ep. xxx. § 6), while Chrysostom more than once refers to εμπόχρητος γραφή. Hieroglyphs, the African painter, is reproached by the vehement Tertullian as being "his falsarius, et cauterio et stilo" (Adv. Hermog. c. 1). The fact is that Christian art followed the technical rules of the period, and adopted whatever processes were in use among the artists of the day, and were most suited to the particular work in hand, whether fresco, tempera, or encaustic.

Nor was it only in the processes adopted but also in the character of the pictorial decorations themselves that the early Christians conformed to the practice of the age in which they lived, indeed, it could not be otherwise. As has been remarked with perfect truth by Roux Rochette, "un art ne s'improvise pas." A school of painting is the result of a long previous train of education, and cannot spring into existence in a moment "fully formed, like Minerva from the brain of Jupiter" (Northcote, Rom. Salt. p. 198). There was nothing exceptional about Christian art. It was no more than the continuation of the art Christianity found already existing as the exponent of the ideas of the age, with such modifications as its purer faith and higher morality rendered necessary. The artists employed were not necessarily Christian; indeed, in most cases, especially in the earliest times, they would probably be pagans, working in the style and depicting the subjects to which they were accustomed, only restricted by the watchful care of their employers that no devices were introduced which could offend the moral tone of Christians. In the earliest examples there is absolutely nothing distinctive of the religion professed. "At first," writes Mr. Burgon (Letters from Rome, p. 250), "they even used many of the same devices for mural decoration as the pagans had used, always excepting anything that was immoral or idolatrous; introducing, however, every here and there, as the ideas occurred to them, something more significant of their own creed, until by-and-by the whole was exclusively Christian." The deep-rooted aversion of the early Christians to all sculptured or pictorial representations, natural in a community that had sprung from the bosom of the Jewish church, for a considerable period forbade all attempts to depict the person of the Saviour or the events of either Testament, and limited the efforts of Christian art to the simple naturalism of the decorations already common, or the arabesques in which the fancy of the artists loved to indulge. The earliest Christian frescoes with which we are acquainted present the same subjects from pastoral life and the vintage, the trellised vines and bunches of grapes, the bright-plumaged birds and painted butterflies, the winged genii and gracefully draped female figures, with which we are familiar in the wall-decorations of the Roman baths and the houses of Pompeii. By degrees the natural instinct for the beautiful asserted itself, and the desire to make the eye a channel for the reception of the truths of revelation led to the introduction of symbolic representations, which, without attempting directly to depict sacred things, conveyed to the initiated the expression of the truths believed by them. The actual change in the character of the subjects represented was at first inconsiderable. The vine laden with clusters became a recognised symbol of Christ "the True Vine" and the "much-fruits," by which Christians, as "branches," were called to glorify the Father. The pastoral subjects, especially those in which the Shepherd was the principal figure, at once led the mind of the worshipper to the contemplation of Christ the "Good Shepherd." To the devout imagination a Fish represented at once the Saviour Himself, the anagrammatical ΙΧΘΥΣ, and the human object of His salvation, the Christian deriving his life from the waters of baptism (cf. Tertull. de Baptism. c. 1), while the Fisherman spoke of Him who by the Gospel-hook takes men for life, not for death. [FISH; FISHERMAN.] Not only were these natural emblems made to breathe a Christian spirit by the infusion of a new element of life, but even directly mythological personages were pressed into the service of the church. Orpheus captivating the wild beasts by the sound of his lyre was adopted as a symbol of Christ subduing the savage passions of men by the melody of the gospel, and Ulysses deaf to the alluring voices of the sirens represented the believer triumphing over the seductions of worldly and sensual pleasure (Martigny, Dict. des Ant. Chrét. pp. 447, 644; De Rossi, Bullettino, 1853, p. 35). The hold which the old forms still maintained long after the ideas of which they were the exponents had passed away, is seen in the combination with Scriptural scenes of those personifications of Nature under the human form so frequent in pagan times, which lasted even down to a late date. In the delineation of the ascension of Elijah, one of the most frequently repeated subjects of early Christian art, the Jordan is represented as a river god, with his urn.

b This image is beautifully developed in the grand Orphic hymn attributed to Clement of Alexandria, thus nobly rendered by Dr. W. L. Alexander (Ante Nicene Fathers, vol. i. p. 344):—

"Fisher of men whom Thou to life dost bring;
From evil sea of sin,
And from the billowy strife, Gathering pure fishes in Caught with sweet bait of life."

pl. v. vi.), that the first Christian sepulchral chambers were arranged and decorated after heathen models. The artists probably adhered to the old faith; and even if this were not so, they were only accustomed to work in one style, and could not extemporize a new one. In some of the most ancient chapels of the catacombs it has been truly said that "you are not certain whether you are looking on a pagan or a Christian work. There is the same geometrical division of the roof, the same general arrangement of the subjects, the same fabulous animals, the same graceful curves, the same foliage, fruit, flowers, and birds in both" (Burgon, Letters from Rome, p. 250; Northcote, u. s. p. 190). Agincourt could discover no difference in style, except, perhaps, what was not unnatural, greater signs of hurry, and coarser execution. It is only the occurrence of the figure of the Good Shepherd, which usually occupies the central position, or some Scriptural subject, such as Jonah or Daniel, or some Christian symbol, that clears up the doubt as to the religion of the art we are studying. The entire absence of all gloomy associations in connection with death deserves remark. The cheerful symbolical decorations which adorn the sepulchral chambers—the graceful vine, the clustering grapes, the birds and bright landscapes—bespeak a faith which served its possessors to meet the most terrible sufferings with calmness and even with delight, as the path to never-ending joys, and to view death as the door to eternal life, the true birthday of the soul. Every thing that meets the eye excites pleasurable emotions, and indicates a heart full of peace and happiness.

As an example of Christian mural decorations of the very earliest period we may instance the Catacomb of Domitilla on the Appian way (see p. 314). This catacomb is attributed to Flavia Domitilla, a near relative of the emperor Domitian—perhaps his niece, the daughter of his sister who bore the same name. She was the wife of Flavius Clemens, the cousin of Domitian, and his colleague in the consulship; A.D. 95, who was accused of "atheism," by which we are almost certainly to understand Christianity, and put to death by the emperor. Domitilla was banished on the same charge to the island of Pontia (Dictionary of Christian Biography, DOMITILLA). In this burial-place, therefore, we have work of the end of the 1st or the beginning of the 2nd century. The frescoes which ornament the walls and ceilings of the sepulchral chambers and their recesses or cubicula, are clearly contemporaneous with the original building, and are, especially in the subordinate embellishments, of rare beauty. There is a vaulted roof, over which a vine trails with all the freedom of nature, laden with clusters, at which birds are pecking, while winged boys are gathering or pressing out the grapes, of which no decorative artist of the Augustan age need be ashamed (Mommson, Contemp. Rev. May 1871, p. 170). The annexed woodcut (No. 1) gives a faint idea of its exquisite grace and beauty. Traces of landscapes also still exist here, which are of rare occurrence in later Christian burial vaults. In the portion of this catacomb known by the names of St. Domitilla's chamberlains, St. Nereus and St. Achilleus, a painted cubiculum exhibits representations of the four seasons, which are very curious. They are represented as female figures, with small butterfly wings attached to their shoulders. We give woodcuts of Spring and Autumn (Nos. 2, 3).

No. 3. Autumn. From the Cemetery of St. Nereus and Achilleus.

The latter has an attendant genius emptying out a cornucopia of fruit. There is an entire absence of anything distinctively Christian in these decorations, which reproduce the wall-paintings of the best period of Greco-Roman art. On the walls, however, we find the usual allegorical and Scriptural subjects—the Good Shepherd, the Fisherman, an Agape, Daniel in the Lions' Den, &c.?

Another equally beautiful specimen of the vine ornamentation is exhibited on the vault of the square chamber of the cemetery of Praetextatus, otherwise known as that of St. Urban, beneath the church of the same name, lying to the east of the Via Appia, near the circus of Maxentius. This burial-place belongs to the earliest period. The character of the decorations corresponds with heathen art of the 2nd century, and is not at all inferior to the best works of the age. The accompanying woodcut (No. 4) gives an imperfect notion of the elaborate beauty of the design. The vault of the chamber is divided into four bands, each containing a continuous wreath of foliage and flowers, among which are nests, and the birds visiting their young. The highest wreath is of laurel or bay, a symbol of victory, indicative of the arch of the arcosolium is a band of reapers cutting down corn and binding up the sheaves. The plafond of the recess originally bore the Good Shepherd with a sheep upon his shoulders; but the design has been almost destroyed by the excavation of later loculi. The paintings are small and exquisitely beautiful, even in their present state of decay. The family to whom this burial-place belonged was evidently one of considerable wealth and dignity. But the specimens already adduced seem to have been surpassed by the great vine of the Callistine catacomb (Bottari, vol. ii. tav. 13), the "antique style of beauty" of which is noticed by Kugler. A stem of a vine encircles each side of the arch of an arcosolium with its graceful spirals, lovely little naked boys standing on its branches and plucking the clusters. The soffit of the arch is similarly decorated with vintage scenes. The wall of the recess presents what is commonly, but erroneously, designated the Dispute with the Doctors. Christ, represented as a beardless young man seated on a curule chair, holds a scroll in his left hand and turns towards a number of hearers, probably intended for his

The general arrangement of the mural decorations of the sepulchral chambers or loculi of the Roman catacombs is remarkably uniform. The arch-headed tomb recesses of arcosolium, which occupy three sides of the square chambers, have the back wall, the soffits of the arches, and the wall above them painted, in the earlier examples with more ornamental arabesques, in the later with subjects drawn from the narrow Scriptural or symbolical cycle to which reference has already been made. The ceilings are even more richly decorated, the subjects being usually depicted in panels distributed round a central picture, which most commonly exhibits a representation of the Saviour under a typical form. The general appearance of these cubicula, and the distribution of the paintings, is shown in the accompanying illustration from the cubiculum of the Ocean in the catacomb of St. Callistus (No. 6). The paintings are early—probably of the 3rd century—representing trellis work overgrown with flowers, peacocks and other birds, and winged genii. In the centre of the vault is the head of Ocean giving its name to the chamber. The ornamentation of an early ceiling is exhibited in woodcut No. 7, representing the roof of the chapel of St. Callistus. The central panel contains Christ under the typical form of Orpheus. Four of the eight circumscribing panels contain Biblical subjects—(1) Moses smiting the Rock; (2) Daniel in the Lions' Den; (3) The Raising of Lazarus; (4) David armed with his Slings. The intermediate panels represent pastoral subjects—two of sheep, two of cattle. Another chamber, depicted by De Rossi (vol. i. pl. 10), called that of Orpheus, is quite Pompeian in character. The ceiling is a beautiful work of art. Orpheus is seen in the centre, surrounded by heads of genii with dishevelled and flowing hair, and supported by eight oblong panels, two containing the Good Shepherd, two female arcades, and the remaining four winged genii bearing crooks, floating lightly in the air. The panelled walls are embellished with a rich profusion of arabesques, combining doves, peacocks, and other birds, dolphins, and sea monsters, the only unmistakably Christian emblem being the lamb bearing the eucharistic bread.

The style of these earliest efforts of Christian art has been unduly depreciated. They are characterized by Lord Lindsay (Hist. of Christ. Art, vol. i. p. 39) as "poor productions," where "the meagreness of invention is only equalled by the feebleness of execution," "inferior, generally speaking, to the worst specimens of contemporary heathen art." Such a verdict evinces but slender acquaintance with the paintings which are the subjects of his criticism. The earlier Christian frescoes, as we have seen, are quite on a level with the best specimens of pagan art of the time, and the rapid declivance manifested in the later examples belongs not to Christian art alone but to art in general. The judgment of Kugler is far more favourable. He speaks of the "grandeur of arrangement" exhibited by the earliest paintings, and admires the "peculiar solemnity and dignity of style" which characterize them, though he acknowledges that these excellences are "accompanied by certain technical deficiencies," chiefly such as naturally arose from

The details were almost entirely left to the imagination of the beholder. The draperies were coloured in the primary keys, indicating a tolerable acquaintance with the laws of harmony. The general effect of these simple processes is pronounced by the same critics to be good. The "attitudes are not without grandeur, nor the masses of light and shade without breadth, nor the drapery without simplicity." The artists were evidently capable of much better things.

With the lapse of time and the general decay of artistic power in Rome, corresponding to the universal deterioration of taste and genius which characterized the later days of the empire, we notice a very sensible decline in the decorations of the catacombs. The design becomes increasanother and always unlike nature" (Northcote, u. s. p. 197). In fact, as Dean Milman has truly remarked (Lat. Christ. vi. 605), the characteristic of Christian painting was not art but worship, and its highest aim was to awaken religious emotion and suggest religious thought. Thus imitation took the place of invention, and imagination was crushed by precedent. The gradual decadence of the art may be clearly traced in the chronological series given in Agincourt's plates (Painture, pl. v.-xiii.). The excellence of design, freedom of drawing, and harmony of colouring which mark the earlier frescoes gradually disappear as we advance. We find proofs of declension at the end of the 3rd century (Pl. viii.). The drawing is not bad, but ingly rude and clumsy, and the execution shows greater carelessness and neglect of detail. The figures are ill-proportioned—sometimes square and short, at others inordinately elongated. The free play of the earlier designs is succeeded by a lifeless rigidity. This mechanical stiffness was fostered by the narrowness of the cycle of Scriptural subjects represented, and the unimaginative sameness of the mode of representation. Each subject had received a well-defined traditional type, consecrated by repetition, from which it was deemed irreverence to deviate. Thus Christian art became "almost hieratic in its character, as in ancient Egypt or modern Greece, so fixed and immovable were its types; always like one there is no movement and little expression, and the treatment is monotonous. In the two succeeding centuries the deterioration proceeds, though the decline is not so rapid as might have been anticipated. Classic forms continued till the end of the 5th and first half of the 6th centuries. Cavalcaselle instances as an example of the art of this period a chapel in the catacomb of St. Peter and St. Marcellinus (otherwise called St. Helena). The vault is decorated with a large figure of Christ seated in a curule chair, in the act of benediction. The head is very fine and pure. Another typical example is the colossal head of Christ in the act of benediction, from the cemetery of St. Pontianus. For the first time the jewelled nimbus bears the Greek cross. The Saviour is of imposing aspect, but conventional. The execution is hasty, and the decline marked. It probably belongs to the 7th century, but is assigned by Martigny to Hadrian I. 772-775. The celebrated paintings which decorate the well or baptistery, the jewelled cross, and the Baptism of Christ are described in the articles BAPTISTERY, p. 174; and CATACOMBS, p. 313. These pictures, in their present state, are probably restorations of the originals, coarsely painted over an older underlying picture at the time of the repair of the catacomb by Hadrian I. (cf. Tyrwhitt, Art Teaching of Primitive Church, p. 173). These duce the original painting, and that any arguments founded upon such uncertain data must be precarious. The words of Mr. St. John Tyrwhitt, with regard to a particular instance, may be applied to a large number of these frescoes: "the workmanship is so grossly rude and careless, that one is led to suspect that ancient retouchings have taken place at some time in the bathos of art; and the addition of the coarsest outlines, both on the lighted and shaded side of the objects, seems to show that the original painting had nearly vanished from the wall when some well-meaning and totally-ignorant restorer made an attempt at securing its meaning" (Art Teaching, &c., p. 130). The fact of these restorations has been lately made patent to those who have no opportunity of examining the originals by the invaluable series of photographs taken in the catacombs by the magnesium light, which we owe to the unwearied zeal and munificent liberestorations may be taken as examples of the retouchings and repaintings of earlier originals which prevailed so extensively when the catacombs became the objects of religious visits, and which render it so difficult accurately to determine the date of any particular picture. In the catacombs at Naples which have not been so much cared for, and are less tampered with by modern restorers, the wall-pictures may be seen in several instances peeling off, disclosing successive strata one behind another. There is no reason to question the good faith of the original restorers, who probably followed the outlines of the decaying subjects as far as they could make them out, and only supplied forms and details when the original had quite disappeared. But it must always be borne in mind, in examining the frescoes of the catacombs, that we are in all probability looking at a work of the 8th or 9th century, which only partially reproduces the original painting, and that any arguments founded upon such uncertain data must be precarious. The words of Mr. St. John Tyrwhitt, with regard to a particular instance, may be applied to a large number of these frescoes: "the workmanship is so grossly rude and careless, that one is led to suspect that ancient retouchings have taken place at some time in the bathos of art; and the addition of the coarsest outlines, both on the lighted and shaded side of the objects, seems to show that the original painting had nearly vanished from the wall when some well-meaning and totally-ignorant restorer made an attempt at securing its meaning" (Art Teaching, &c., p. 130). The fact of these restorations has been lately made patent to those who have no opportunity of examining the originals by the invaluable series of photographs taken in the catacombs by the magnesium light, which we owe to the unwearied zeal and munificent liberality of Mr. J. H. Parker. The rude later touches and hard outlines are in many instances clearly to be traced over the original painting. It is needless to pursue the melancholy history of the decline of religious art any further. The power of drawing grew feebler and feebler, all sense of beauty of form perished, proportion was disregarded, the colouring became crude and inharmonious, until, with the close of the 8th century, a period of darkness set in, when Christian art was lost in the Western world, and only dragged on an unnatural and mechanical existence in the traditional Byzantine art of the East.

The remarkable series of frescoes which embellish the catacombs of Naples must not be passed over. They have, however, been so fully described in a previous article (CATACOMBS, p. 316), that it is needless to enlarge upon them here. The chief authorities for these paintings are the plates of Bellermann's work (Hamburg, 1839). The greater part there given are no longer visible. The vault of the vestibule is painted in the Pompeian style, and probably by pagan artists, some of the subjects being distinctly heathen. It belongs to the first half-century of the Christian era (No. 8). The vault has been subsequently plastered over, and a second set of subjects of the 8th century painted over it. But the new coat did not adhere well, and has fallen off to a large extent, exhibiting the first painting below it. There is also a good painting of a peacock, with vases and flowers, belonging to the first period. Among the paintings that decorate the chapels we may call attention to one presenting full-length figures of St. Paul with a scroll, and St. Laurence with his crown of martyrdom in his hand. They are not nimble, but are assigned by Mr. J. H. Parker to the 5th century (No. 9). Half-lengths of St. Desiderius and St. Agutius, in another recess, deserve notice as exemplifying the bad drawing of the 8th century. The faces are elongated, the sockets of the eyes exaggerated in size, the hands enormous and clumsy, and the whole displays a barbaric ignorance of form and blindness to beauty.

II. Byzantine.—Up to the commencement of the 7th century there was no decided difference between Eastern and Western art. Wherever Roman civilization extended Christian art was essentially the same. It was not till the middle of the 7th century that the distinction between Roman and Byzantine art began to arise. That was the epoch of the greatest decadence of art in the West, crushed by the Lombard invasion, while in the East, under the emperor Justinian, a new and vigorous intellectual life was rapidly developing itself and manifesting its energy, as elsewhere, in the domain of art. This new influence rapidly made itself felt through the civilized world. The style of art universally prevailing in the latter part of the 7th and the 8th centuries and onward was that which, as distinguished from the Roman school, is known by the title of Byzantine (Kugler, Handbook of Painting, i. p. 47). The characteristic mental differences of the West and the East were reflected in their artistic works. The contemplative prevailed in the productions of the Byzantine art schools, as the practical did in those of Rome. The idea of dramatic historical painting was alien to the Byzantine genius. Even the movements of life were distasteful. Calm, motionless figures offered themselves to the devotion of the worshippers in dignified repose. Ease stiffened into rigidity, tradition usurped the place of invention, the study of nature was laid aside, and the artist followed a strictly prescribed type which allowed no scope for the play of the imagination, and ended in a system of mere mechanical copying where, in Kugler's words (u. s. p. 56), "the capacity of the artist was only regulated by the number and quality of the tracings which he had been able to procure from the works of his predecessors."

A fuller discussion of Byzantine art and the chief examples remaining, must be reserved for the article treating on mosaic decorations (MOSAICS). Byzantine frescoes of the 6th, 7th, and 8th centuries, it is believed do not exist; though, from the permanence of the traditional type, and the strict adherence to artistic rules, there is no doubt that later compositions enable us to realise their character with great accuracy. We have no account of catacomb paintings in the East, though it is possible that such are only awaiting more thorough research. One such was not long since discovered at Alexandria, and is described by De' Rossi (Buletino, Noremb. 1864; Agost. 1865), and Northcote (Rom. Soc. p. 221). It contains a liturgical painting, apparently representing the participation in the eucharist, together with the loaves and fishes, and the multiplication of the loaves and fishes, with Greek inscriptions over. But it belongs to a period anterior to the development of Byzantine art, and differs little, if at all, from the paintings of the Roman catacombs.

III. Lombardic.—The relics of the new style of art consequent on the Lombard invasion in the 6th and 7th centuries are very scanty, and quite insufficient to furnish data for determining its character with any minuteness. It is probable, however, that the "naturalism and insistence on fact, the vigorous imagination of truth and wild play of fancy in fiction, the delight in action, motion, and contest, the taste for hunting and battle, the irresistible or unresisted taste for the humorous grotesque," described so vividly by Mr. Ruskin (Stones of Venice, vol. i. append. 8), as characterizing their more lasting works in architecture and sculpture, were exhibited in their pictorial efforts, in which, with all their rudeness and total license of style, there lay, as Kugler remarks (p. 45), "a germ of freedom from which, later, a new school of development was to spring." The historical subjects which Queen Theodelinda caused to be painted on the walls of her palace at Monza, at the beginning of the 7th century, have unhappily perished, if, indeed, they were frescoes and not mosaics.

Some account is given by Von Rumehr (Ital. Forschung, vol. i. p. 193, Berl. 1837) of the remains of the Lombardic style still existing in the remains of the frescoes in the tribune of the subterranean church at Assisi, and in the crypt of SS. Nazaro e Celso at Verona. The former are placed by him in the 8th century. The lights are laid on in impasto, an art subsequently lost. The frescoes at Verona are very similar in design and execution. Several Biblical scenes are there rudely painted on a coarse white ground.

IV. Cycles of Scriptural Subjects.—Attention has been already drawn to the remarkable fact that out of the almost infinite wealth of historical subjects in the Old and New Testaments suitable for pictorial representation, by l into rigidity, tradition invention, the study of and the artist followed a line which allowed no scope for imagination, and ended in a mechanical copying where, in p. 56), "the capacity of calculated by the number and signs which he had been able to work of his predecessors." of Byzantine art and the painting, must be reserved for mosaic decorations. The frescoes of the 6th, 7th, and 8th centuries are believed to not exist; the permanence of the traditional adherence to artistic rules, and inter-compositions enable character with great accuracy of catacomb paintings is possible that such are only rough research. One such discovered at Alexandria, and Rossi (Buletino, Novemb., and Northcott (Pom. Nat.), is a liturgical painting, apparently participation in the with the miracle at Cana tion of the leaves and fishes, lions over. But it belongs to the development of Byzantine art, if at all, from the Roman catacombs.

The relics of the new style of the Lombard invasion in the times are very scanty, and quite insufficient data for determining its minuteness. It is probable, "naturalism and insistence on imagination of truth and will fiction, the delight in action, the taste for hunting and combatible or unresisted taste for grotesque," described so vividly in Venice, vol. i. append. 8), their more lasting works in sculpture, were exhibited in works, in which, with all their license of style, there lay, as p. 45), "a germ of freedom from the school of development was to historical subjects which Queen ed to be painted on the walls of Gaza, at the beginning of the 7th century, unhappily perished, if, indeed, as and not mosaics.

is given by Von Rumehr (Ital. i. p. 193, Berl. 1827) of the Lombardic style still existing in the frescoes in the tribune of the church at Assisi, and in the crypt of Celso at Verona. The former is in the 8th century. The one in impasto, an art subsequently used at Verona are very similar in execution. Several Biblical scenes are painted on a coarse white ground. Scriptural Subjects.—Attention is drawn to the remarkable fact of almost infinite wealth of subjects in the Old and New Testaments for pictorial representation, by which important doctrines are set forth in holy lessons imparted, a comparatively small number were selected, and that the limits thus laid down were scarcely ever transgressed by the artists. Nor were these, generally speaking, precisely the subjects that we should have a priori expected to have been the object of exclusive preference. Many of the most striking events of the O. T., and the most characteristic incidents of the life of Christ are entirely passed over, while some which appear to us subordinate are repeated times without number. The explanation of this procedure is to be sought in the principle of typical parallelism which guided the church from the first in her choice of subjects for delineation. Her leading idea was to veil the great facts of Redemption "under the parallel and typical events of the patriarchal and Jewish dispensation—admitting no direct representations from gospel history but such as illustrated the kingly office of the Saviour and the miracles by which He prefigured the illumination of the spirit and the resurrection of the body" (Lord Lindsay, Christian Art, vol. i. p. 48). It followed therefore that even these events were not treated so much as facts of history, to be portrayed with any idea of reproducing the incident as it may be conceived to have occurred, but as types in which the spiritual meaning was predominant. Consequently, not the choice of the subject alone but the mode of treating it was matter of regulation by authority. Nothing beyond the minor details and the mode of execution was left to the artist. The church dictated what should be painted and how. "The symbolical system of this hieratic cycle," says De Rossi, "is established beyond all dispute, not only by the choice and arrangement of subjects, but also by the mode of representing them." "Christ's resurrection, with that of the church in His Person, is the theme on which in their peculiar language the artists of the catacombs seem never weary of expatiating." (Lord Lindsay, u. s. p. 51), and representing to the eyes and hearts of the beholders under every varied form of symbol, type, and allegory. The earliest allusion every sarcophagus of the early Christian church. The same events, with the others belonging to this cycle, are continually referred to in the writings of the early fathers, who thus evidenced the hold they had taken of the popular mind, as familiar illustrations of the truths of revelation.

We may select one or two of the subjects of most frequent recurrence in early Christian art to illustrate what has been said as to the adherence to a traditional type, even when quite at variance with all historical probability. No subject meets us more constantly than Noah in the ark receiving the dove with the olive-branch, in evident allusion to the sacrament of baptism and salvation in the church (1 Pet. iii. 31). But with slight modifications of detail the type never varies. As in the illustration given above (No. 10), the ark is always a small square box with an open lid, out of which a man many sizes too large for his receptacle appears, and welcomes back the dove. Abraham's sacrifice of Isaac is of perpetual recurrence. Both are usually clad in tunics. In an example from the cemetery of Priscilla, Abraham wears highpriestly robes.

to a cycle of this kind, not, it is true, containing any reference to pictorial representation, occurs in the Apostolical Constitutions (lib. v. c. 7). Some of the Scriptural events there spoken of as types or pledges of the resurrection of man, viz. the deliverance of Jonah from the whale's belly, the preservation of the three children in the fiery furnace, and of Daniel in the lions' den, from the O. T., and the cure of the man sick of the palsy, and of the blind man on whose eyes Christ laid clay, the feeding of the five thousand, the miracle of Cana, and the raising of Lazarus, are those which meet us perpetually painted in almost every cubiculum, and carved on almost

The ram is a frequent accessory. The history of Jonah, the type of His work, death, and resurrection, chosen by Christ himself, in its three scenes, when once seen will be universally recognised, from the sameness of the form of the sea-monster and the details of the picture. In our illustration (No. 11) all these typical events are combined into one picture. Daniel in the lions' den, indefinitely repeated, adheres to the whole to the same form and arrangement. One given by Perret: repres-sents him as wearing the Phrygian cap, which also usually distinguishes his companions the three children in the furnace, another of the most commonly occurring types of deliverance (No. 12). The permanence of one type sanctioned by ecclesiastical tradition exhibited in these and almost every other Scriptural representation in these early paintings, anticipates the authoritative statement of the church made some centuries later in the iconoclastic controversy, "Non est imaginum structura picturarum inventio, sed ecclesiae catholicae probata legislatio et traditio" (Conc. Nic. ii. art. vi., Labbe Concil. vol. vii. p. 831).

The same restriction to one cycle and adherence to one authorized pictorial form are seen in the frescoes from the N. T. (See JESUS CHRIST.)

The following may be accepted as a tolerably complete account of the cycle of the O. T. subjects found in the catacombs. We have only included those which had received a fixed traditional form, and were constantly repeated, excluding those only occurring once or twice:—

I. (1) The Fall, with Adam, Eve, the tree, and the serpent. (2) The Offering of Cain and Abel. (3) Noah receiving the Dove. (4) The Sacrifice of Isaac. (5) Moses removing his Shoes. (6) Moses striking the Rock. (7) David with his Sling. (8) Elijah's Translation. (9) The Three Children in the Fiery Furnace. (10) Daniel in the Lions' Den. (11) Jonah (a) Swallowed by the Whale; (b) Disgorged; (c) Reposing under his Booth. (12) Job on the Dung-hill; to which may be added, though of much rarer occurrence, (13) Tobias with the Fish, and (14) Susanna and the Elders.

The New Testament cycle, under the same restriction, is as follows:—

II. (1) The Adoration of the Magi. (2) The Miracle at Cana. (3) Christ and the Woman of Samaria. (4) The Healing of the Paralytic, the man carrying his bed. (5) The Healing of the Blind Man. (6) The Cure of the Woman with the Issue of Blood. (7) The Multiplication of the Loaves and Fishes. (8) The Raising of Lazarus. (9) Zachæus. (10) The Triumphant Entry into Jerusalem. (11) Christ before Pilate, the latter washing his hands. (12) Christ and the Apostles on the Shore of the Sea of Galilee, after the Resurrection, with bread and fish. To these may be added, though not strictly belonging to the cycle, (13) the Annunciation (Hottari, op. cit. 176), (14) Our Lord's Baptism, in the catacomb of St. Pontianus, and (15) the Five Wise Virgins, from St. Agnes (Berret, ii. 42).

We must not omit to mention the frescoes representing the Agape which so frequently meet us. In many of these there is nothing distinctively Christian, and Mr. Tyrwhitt remarks on the close resemblance between the Agape of the catacombs of St. Domitilla, and St. Callistus, and the confessedly heathen banquet of the seven priests in the Gnostic catacomb. That of which we give a woodcut (No. 13), from the catacomb of SS. Marcellinus and Peter, already described (p. 312), presents nothing by which we can determine whether the feast depicted had a religious character or not. In others, however, the deussated loaves, the bread and fish in seven baskets, and the seven persons, in evident allusion to the interview between Christ and seven of his disciples at the sea of Galilee, evidence the Christian origin and purpose of the painting.

We have already lamented the entire absence of all examples of religious paintings derived from churches or basilicas, owing to the destruction of the buildings themselves, or of the decay or removal of the pictures. This want however is in some degree compensated for by contemporaneous lists of the subjects represented, and to some extent of the manner in which they were depicted, for which we are indebted to St. Ambrose and St. Paulinus of Nola.

In the latter half of the 4th century the Ambrosian basilica at Milan was decorated with a cycle of 21 Scriptural paintings, all but four of which represented O. T. subjects. They are described in the "Listichii ad picturas servas in Basilica Ambrosiana," given in the "Index Sive Index Sanctorum Ambrosianorum," published by Birgini (Milano, 1862). The subjects are (1) Noah and the Dove. (2) Abraham beholding the Stars. (3) Abraham entertaining the Angels. (4) The Sacrifice of Isaac. (5) The Meeting of Isaac and Rebecca. (6) Jacob craftily obtaining the Birthright. (7) Jacob and the Speckled and Ring-straked Fleeces. (8) Joseph's Coat shown to Jacob by his Sons.

St. John reclining on Christ's Breast. This cycle is remarkable as including several subjects seldom or never occurring in existing remains.
Subjects (1), (4), (13), (16), and (17) are among the most frequent, but all the rest are found most rarely, while of the majority it would be difficult to name an example.

The most detailed accounts of the decoration of a church with Scriptural paintings are those given by Paulinus of Nola in the early years of the 5th century, when describing the basilica erected by him in honour of St. Felix (Poen. xvii). We here find the first direct enunciation of the principle set forth by Johannes Damascenus (Orat. I. de Imagin. vol. i. p. 314), and constantly repeated since, that "pictures are the books of the unlearned." The festival of St. Felix, which occurred in the winter, gathered together an immense concourse of country folk, who thought to do honour to the tomb of the saint by passing the night in feasting, too usually resulting in a gross debauch:

"male credula sanctos Perfusis balante mero gaudere sepulchris." (Ib. v. 665.)

In the hope of beguiling the gross minds of these illiterate peasants from the sensual delights which were their chief attractions, and awakening purer thoughts and holier aspirations by the examples of the holy personages there depicted, and at the same time with the view of imparting to them some knowledge of the chief facts of sacred history, and at any rate of leaving them less leisure for their coarser pleasures, Paulinus adopted the somewhat unusual expedient (rare more) of embellishing the portico of the new basilica with a series of Scriptural paintings. They occupied either the ceiling or the upper portion of the wall, only to be seen with up-turned face and head thrown back (Ib. vv. 511-513). The series embraced subjects from the Pentateuch, Joshua, and Ruth. Those particularised by Paulinus (Ib. vv. 515-535, 607-635) are the Creation of Man, Abraham's Departure from Ur, the Angels revealed by Lot, Lot's Wife, the Sacrifice of Isaac, Isaac opening the Wells, Jacob's Dream, Joseph and Potiphar's Wife, the Crossing of Jordan, Naomi and her Daughters-in-law, and the Passage of the Red Sea. The titles of the various pictures were written over them:

"ut illis monstraret Quod manus expulcrit."—(Ib. 684)

The description of the last two subjects indicates, as Dean Milman remarks (Hist. of Christianity, vol. iii. p. 399 note), if it was drawn from the picture itself, considerable talent on the painter's part for composition and landscape as well as for the drawing of figures. Not content with these pietorial embellishments of his new basilica, Paulinus decorated the old basilica of St. Felix in a similar manner, selecting subjects from the New Testament, that thus "that which was new might be an ornament to the old, and the old to the new." These occupied a lower position, and could be viewed "lunatic recta" (Poen. xxviii.

vv. 167-179). Three narrow chapels (cellae) opening out of the atrium, exhibited examples of male and female virtue. One was painted with the history of Job and Tobit; another with those of Esther and Judith. That in the centre commemorated martyrs of both sexes (Ib. vv. 15-27).
The paintings in the apse of the basilica at Fondi are also described by Paulinus in a letter to his friend Severus (Ep. xxxii. 17). The subjects were of the same nature as many still extant in the apses of basilicas; a crowned cross standing in the flowery meads of Paradise, and the Holy Lamb anointed by the Dove and crowned by the Father, with the sheep and goats on either hand.
These may have been worked in mosaic.

There is abundant evidence that the walls of civil and domestic buildings were also decorated with paintings, sometimes secular, sometimes religious. Those of the palace of Queen Theode-linda at Monza have been already referred to.
Sidonius Apollinaris describes the villa of his friend Pontius Leontius at Bourg, at the confluence of the Dordogne and Garonne, as profusely ornamented with wall-paintings, one series representing the Mithriatic campaign of Lucullus, another the early history of the Jewish nation,
"recitatorum primordia Judaeorum." Sidonius expresses his astonishment at the lustre and durability of the colours (Sid. Apoll. Carm. xxii.).
We learn from Eusebius Nigellus (lib. iv.) that the whole Scripture history was painted on the walls of Charlemagne's palace at Ingelheim. It is needless to say all these have perished.

FRIDAY, GOOD. [GOOD FRIDAY.]

FRIULI, COUNCIL OF (Favojntiensis concilium), held at Friuli, A.D. 796, not 791, as Pagi shews (Mansi xiii. 874) under Paulinus, patriarch of Aquileia, whose letter to Charlemagne, formerly misconnected with the synod of Alipino, A.D. 802 (Ibid. p. 827), assigns three causes for its meeting: (1) the orthodox faith; (2) ecclesiastical discipline, and (3) recent outrages, probably by the Huns. The first of these is explained in his speech, which is an elaborate apology for the reception into the Western creed of the "Filioque," which Charlemagne had attacked, and the pope vindicated, the 2nd Nicene council two years before for not having in theirs: Paulinus himself endeavouring to prove both right.

It will be perceived that in the West, as well as East, the offering of first-fruits as a token of gratitude to the Giver of All soon degenerated into a mode of asking for a blessing on the consumption of His gifts. It should be understood, also, that both in the East and West the firstfruits brought to be blessed were left for the use of the priests. "It is becoming and expedient," says Origen, A.D. 230, "that the first-fruits be offered also to the priests of the Gospel." "For if one believed that the fruits of the earth were given to him by God, he would surely know how to honour God from His gifts and benefits by giving thereof to the priests" (Hom. xi. in Num.
 § 2, tom. x. pp. 105, 106; ed. Lommattsch).
 Similarly St. Jerome, commenting on Ezekiel xlv. 30: "The first-fruits of our foods are offered to the priests; that we may taste nothing of the new fruits, before the priest has tasted them. For we do this, that the priest may lay up a blessing and our offering in his house; or that the Lord may bless our houses at his prayer."

We have already quoted a rubric from the Gelasian sacramentary, which orders that the benediction of fruits shall take place "a little before the end of the canon." The prayer was inserted immediately after the words, "not weighing our merits, but pardoning our offences" (now in our first Post-Communion Collect), and immediately before the concluding clause, "through Jesus Christ our Lord." This clause (altered in this manner, "in the name of our Lord Jesus Christ") was thus made to close the benediction.
 After it the priest added, "Per quem hæc omnia, homina, semper bona creata, sanctificas, vivificas, benedicas et præstas nobis, Per ipsum," &c.
 These words are now a permanent part of the canon; but they do not seem to belong to it.
 The words, "hæc omnia" cannot with any propriety be applied to the eucharistic elements alone. Hence some ritualists, as e.g. Græcohus (Antiquus Liturgicus, p. 657), and De Vert (Explic. des Cérémon. tom. iv. Romarque xxx.) &c., suppose that this doxology was at first only used when other things were offered to be blessed, and formed no part of the service of the mass. Le bran (Explication, p. iv. art. xvi.), Bonn (Her.
Lit. l. 2, c. xiv. § v.). D'Achery (Spicil. tom. iv.
 Præf.), and others, maintain that it was a constant part of the liturgy, but that when there was a benediction of fruits, it applied to them as well as to the elements. [W. E. S.]

FRONTAL (Frontalis or Frontale) is defined by Lindwood to be "apparatus pendens in fronte altaris, qui alius dicitur Palla." [ALTAR-CLOTHS; ASTEPENDIUM.] The word is not uncommon in ancient documents. Thus, for instance, a charter of Chladasinthin, king of the Goths, of the year 645 A.D. (quoted by Ducange, s. v.) runs, "of-ferimus . . . vestimenta altaris omnia ad plenum, sive frontalis, sive principalia . . ." A later charter, quoted by the same authority, speaks of "quatuor frontales de sericeo." [C.]

FUGITIVES (from a monastery). Monastic codes shew that their framers had to guard on the one hand against a leniency which might encourage desertion on the part of monks tired of their seclusion and anger for the world, and on the other against a severity which might close the door too fast against deserters wishing to be readmitted. The rule of Benedict, as always, is very lenient on this point. A monk who escapes from a monastery, like one who is expelled, is to be received again if he vows amendment, even after three desertions (Reg. Ben. c. 29, cf. Reg.
Cuj. ad Virg. c. 21), but only into the lowest grade (Reg. Ben. ib. cf. Reg. Pachom. c. 79, Reg.
Fruct. c. 20, Reg. Cuj. ib.). Some commentators, indeed, take this rule as implying, that the abbat may readmit even after a fourth desertion, though the culprit has no right to require it (Martene, Reg. Comm. in loc.). But later commentators (e.g. Menard, Hæften) interpret it more strictly (Martene, Reg. Com. ib.). The first council of Orleans, A.D. 511, censures abbats lenient to fugitive monks, or who receive monks from other monasteries (Conc.
Aurcl. i. c. 19). The second council of Tours, A.D. 567, allows fugitives to be re-admitted on doing penance.

In the same spirit of wise tolerance Benedict is silent as to the steps to be taken to bring back the fugitive, apparently judging it best to leave him alone, if without any desire to return (Mart. Reg. Comm. ib.). But Ferroules prescribes that the fugitive is to be recalled (Reg.
Ferr. c. 20), and Fructuosus forbids him to be admitted into another monastery; and orders him to be brought back, by force if necessary, as a criminal, with hands tied behind his back (Reg. Fruct. c. 20). It was enacted by Justina-nian that a monk returning to the secular life should be degraded by the bishop and governor of the province from his civil position, and be sent back with his worldly goods to his monastery; if he deserted again, he was to be drafted into the army (Novell. 123). A similar decree was passed by the seventh council of Toledo, A.D. 646 (Conc. Tolet. c. 5). The second council of Constantinople, A.D. 553, sentenced an abbat who should be remiss in seeking to bring back the stray sheep into the monastic fold to deprivation.

Later enactments are very severe against fugitives. The Clstercian rule forbids the reception even into the lowest rank of a monk who has deserted twice, or has stayed away more than eleven days. The renegade is in any case to wear a distinctive dress, as badge of his disgrace, and to be excluded from the choir; the abbat who fails to enforce this rule is to do penance. The original statutes of the Carthusians unfrock the renegade; the modern compel him to resume the dress of his order. The Augustinian rule tempers severity with mercy. The renegade is to live outside the monastery itself, but under the care of the bishop, and the abbat is to shew kindness to him, if penitent (Mart. Reg. Comm. in loc. cit.). [I. G. S.]

FUNERAL. [BURIAL OF THE DEAD; OBSEQUIES.]

FUNERAL-FEAST. [CATACOMBS, p. 312; CELLA MEMORIAE.]

FUNERAL-SERMONS (Επιτάφια, λόγοι ἐπιτάφιοι). Christians followed the old custom of many of the heathen nations, of holding an oration over the remains of famous men departed [BURIAL OF THE DEAD, p. 253]. To say nothing of the discourses—triumphal rather than sorrowing—delivered over the remains of martyrs, Gregory of Nyssa held funeral orations on the death of the empress Pulcheria and Placilla, and of bishop Meletius. On the death of Constantine the Great, several bishops celebrated his praises, conspicuous among whom was Eusebius of Caesarea. Gregory of Nazianzus exercised his pathetic eloquence over the bier of his brother Caesarius, of his father and his sister, and over that of Basil the Great; Ambrose preached on the death of his brother Satyrus, of Valentinian, and of Theodosius.* The tone of these orations is, for the most, eulogistic of the "famous men" through whom "the Lord hath wrought great glory" (Ecclus. xlv. 1, 2).

Jerome (Epist. ad Heliod. c. 1) says that the old custom was for sons to speak the funeral orations over parents. He alludes here probably to a pagan custom, of which there are many examples (Kirchmann, De Fun. Rom. lib. ii. c. 18); but Christianity also (as we have seen) nor furnishes examples of a similar practice. Nor were the clergy the only orators in such cases; Constantine himself did not disdain to pronounce a funeral oration on one of his court, in which, says Eusebius (Vita Const. iv. 55) he spoke of the immortality of the soul, of the blessings of the righteous, and the misery of the wicked.

Funeral sermons were not always delivered at the time of the burial, though some—as several of Gregory Nazianzen's—contain indications that they were so delivered. Eusebius (Vita Const. iv. 71) gives us to understand that the funeral orations over Constantine were delivered while the remains of the departed lay in state on a lofty bier [FERETRUM]. Ambrose evidently delivered his sermon over Satyrus (see § 78) while the body was yet waiting to be carried to the grave. His oration on Valentinian, on the contrary, was delivered two months (see Opera, ii. 1170, ed. Benet.), that on Theodosius forty days, after the death of the person commemorated. The death of bishop Meletius was the occasion of sermons everywhere (Theodoret, H. E. v. 8); that of Gregory of Nyssa was probably delivered on the day when the remains of Meletius, brought from Constantinople, were received at Antioch. That of Chrysostom on the same bishop, was delivered on the fifth anniversary of his death. The oration of Gregory Nazianzen on Basil was delivered over his tomb on the first anniversary of his death, in the presence (it is said) of 150 bishops.

When the sermon took place at the time of a commemorative service for the dead, it probably took place at the point in the liturgy where the sermon was ordinarily introduced. The Pseudo-Dionysius (Hierarch. Eccl. c. 7) speaks of the funeral-sermon being delivered after the catechumens had departed, but while the penitents remained. The eulogy of Hilary of Arles on Honoratus (quoted by Binterim, v. ii. 442), which proves incidentally that the corpse was carried uncovered, and that the people pressed round to kiss the face, or the coffin of the illustrious dead—was probably delivered at the end of some office. The orations over the remains of Constantine were clearly delivered after the funeral service (Euseb. u. s. lv. 71; Binterim's Denkwürdigkeiten, vi. iii. 435, ff.). [C.]

ANUS (2?)]

G

GABALUM, COUNCIL OF (Gabulitum concilium), at which the wife of the count of Auvergne was condemned for adultery, says Sir H. Nicolas (Chron. p. 222), A. D. 590. Gabalum, where it was held, was not far from Meulle, on the river Lot (Gall. Christ. i. 83). [E. S. Fr.]

GABATHA or GABATA. A name of penile lamps suspended in churches. The word is of uncertain orthography and etymology. We find the forms Gabatha, Gavata, and Cavata, which last points to the derivation given by Isidore Hispalensis (Etymol. lib. xx. c. 4) from cavus "hollow." The original meaning of the word is "a dish" or "bowl;" in which sense it is used by Martial (Epigr. vii. 47; xi. 32), and of which the Glossary of Ducange furnishes abundant examples. From its shape it came to be employed for a lamp, which is its most usual ecclesiastical signification. The annexed woodcut from Maeri

shows one of two bowl-shaped gabathas preserved in the pontifical chapel of the Lateran, in which in his time a wax light was always burning before the sacrament. Gabathas frequently occur in the catalogues of papal gifts to the churches of Rome contained in Anastasius. Thus Leo III. (A. D. 795-816) gave to the basilica of St. Peter's 15 gabathas of purest gold set with gems, to hang on the screen (pergula) before the altar (§ 382), and 6 of silver with an appended cross to hang before the Arch of Triumph, 3 on each side (§ 389). These gabathas were of different metals, gold, silver, brass, and electrum. They were frequently embossed (maglypha § 392, &c.), or decorated in bas-relief (interrasilis), and ornamented with lilies (liliiatae) heads of gryphes (§ 366) or lions (as in the woodcut), or even fashioned in the form of that animal "in modum leonis." Like the coronae used for lighting, they very often had crosses attached to them (simochriatae, § 418, &c.). The epithet figurae is frequently applied to gabathas in Anastasius, and would seem, from a comparison with the expression pari filo (Lucr. ii. 341), to signify of equal size or thickness. The epithet variae or variae is interpreted by Ducange to mean of various workmanship; but this interpretation is precarious. [E. V.]

GALLIAEL. [FAITHFUL.]

GALLIÉE. [NARTHÉX.]

GALNABIS (also Galnape, Galnyes [Isid. Hispal. Etym. xix. 25], Ganape). This is a kind of rough blanket or rug, forming part of the furniture of a monk's couch, which according to the Rule of St. Isidore is to include "stora et stragulum, pellesque lanatae duae, galnabis quoque et fucistergium, gemulusque ad caput pulvillus" (Regula S. Isidori, c. 14; in Holstenius, Codex Bequitarum, part 2, p. 127, ed. Paris, 1863). Similarly the Rule of Fructuosus, bishop of Bracara in Spain, speaks of "calnabes yllatus" (c. 4; op. cit. part 2, p. 139). The galnabis was apparently used sometimes as an article of personal dress, for in the testament of Caesarius, bishop of Arles, we read "simul cum casula villosa et tunica vel galnape, quod mellus dimisero" (Patrol. lxxvi. 1140).

The etymology of the word is doubtful: we may perhaps connect it with the word gaulnabena, used by Varro, and possibly also with the Greek γαυδάκης, καυδάκης, which is defined by Hesychius (under the latter spelling) στρώματα, ἢ ἐπιβάλλια ἱερομαλλῆ. Another derivation has been suggested, connecting the word with galbanum, a dye making it descriptive of the colour, but this is very improbable. For further references, see Ducange's Glossarium s. v. [L. S.]

GALLERIES. The only galleries known in early ecclesiastical architecture were constructional integral parts of the building, not additions to it. In this they corresponded to the triforia of mediæval churches, which in their original idea were galleries for the reception of worshippers or auditors, for which purpose they are still used in Germany, and where they exist in Italy (e.g. St. Ambrogio at Milan), and to some extent in England. The first Christian churches erected on the basilican plan, and they naturally retained the upper gallery, running entirely round the building above the principal colonnade, for the accommodation of spectators, men on one side and women on the other, which we know to have formed an essential portion of the basilican arrangement (Vitruv. v. 1). Like them the church galleries were reached by an outside staircase, and were protected towards the nave by a low wall or balustrade (pluteus). The only Roman basilican churches that exhibit this arrangement are those of St. Agnes (fig. 1),

No. 2. Section of St. Michele, Pavia.

St. Laurence, in its more ancient portion, and the church of the Quattro Santi Coronati, on the Coelian. A similar upper gallery occurs also in the Lateran baptistery of Constantine. The passion for mosaic pictures of sacred subjects led to the abolition of this gallery in the basilican churches, the space it should have occupied being devoted to pictorial representations, as at St. Maria Maggiore, St. Paul's, and the old St. Peter's, at Rome (see illustrations on pages 370, 371), and S. Apollinare in Classe, and St. Apollinare Nuovo, at Ravenna. But it reappeared in the early Lombard churches, as at S. Ambrogio at Milan, and S. Michele at Pavia (fig. 2), where there are well developed triflorial galleries. But the arrangement never took root in Italy, and was soon lost.

In the East, when the "dromic" or basilican form was adopted, it carried with it the upper gallery above the side aisles. Of this we have an example in the church of St. John at Constantinople (A.D. 463), illustrated in Salzburg's work. The domical church of the lesser Santa Sophia, (or SS. Sergius and Basilus,) erected by Justinian (fig. 3), also exhibits a gallery or upper story running all round it. In the churches, in what is commonly known as the Byzantine style, of which St. Sophia is the most magnificent example, the side gallery played a very important part. There is a good example in the church of St. Vitale, at Ravenna (see woodcut, p. 376).

Its usual designation was gynecœitis, from being the place where the women were accommodated. It was also called the catechumenium, because the women assembled there to listen to instruction (Leo, Noveil. 73, apud Ducange Constantinopol. Christ.), or simply "the upper chambers," ἄνωρα (Paul. Silent. i. 256). These galleries ran along the side of the trapeza or nave, sometimes quite up to the sanctuary or bema. The Pseudo-Amphilochius records that St. Basil, having detected a woman making signs to the deacon attending upon him at the altar, gave orders that curtains should be hung over the gallery to prevent such indecorum.

The women's galleries at St. Sophia are of vast size (fig. 4), ranged to the north and south of the central area, occupying the upper story of the transeptal space. Each gallery is supported by four monolithic columns of Egyptian granite, and is itself faced by an arcade of six smaller GALLICAN COUNCILS; councils known to have been celebrated in France, but at some place unknown.

1. A.D. 355. At Poitiers or Toulouse possibly: where St. Hilary, writing to the Eastern A.D. 360, says he five years before then with the bishops of France withdrew from the communion of the Arian bishops Ursacius and Valens, and of Saturninus of Arles, who had espoused their cause. The opening chapters of his work addressed to Constantius are thought, in short, to have emanated from this council (Mansi, iii. 251).

2. A.D. 376. At least there seems a reference to one such in a law of that year, dated Treves, in R. xvi. tit. ii. § 23, of the Theodosian code; but it is not known where or for what object (Mansi, iii. 499).

3. A.D. 444, in which Hilary of Arles presided, and Chelidonius of Besançon, where this council may have met therefore, was accused of being husband of a widow and deposed. On appealing however to St. Leo he was restored; as having been condemned on a false charge. Both their letter to him and his answer are preserved among his epistles (Ep. xcix. and cli.; comp. Mansi, vii. 873).

4. A.D. 678, at some place unknown: when St. Leodegar or Leger bishop of Autun was degraded as having been accessory to the death of king Childeric II. five years before (Sirmond, Conc. Gall. i. 510; comp. Mansi, xi. 173 and 195).

5. A.D. 678 or 679, against the Monothelists: as appears from the reference made to it by the Gallican bishops subscribing to the Roman synod under pope Agatho, preserved in the 4th act of the 6th council (Mansi, xi. 175 and 306), but they do not say where.

6. A.D. 796, at Tours possibly, where Joseph, bishop of Mans and a suffragan of Tours, was deposed for cruelty (Mansi, xiii. 991).

7. Three more councils may be grouped under this head, usually called councils of Auvergne, but this name is misleading, as it means the town formerly so called, not the province. When, however, the town changed its name to Clermont, councils held there subsequently were styled by its new name, while the earlier retained its old. We may save confusion, therefore, by classing them under Gallican. Of these the first met 8th November, A.D. 535, in the second year of king Theodebert, and passed sixteen canons, to which fifteen bishops, headed by Honoratus, metropolitan of Bourges, subscribed: his suffragan of Auvergne subscribing second. Their canons deprecate lay influences in the appointment of bishops, and lay interference between bishops and clergy. No furniture belonging to the church may be used for private funerals or marriages. The appointment of Jews as judges, and marriages between Jews and Christians are denounced. Presbyters and deacons marrying are to be deposed. In a collective note to king Theodebert, the bishops entreat that neither the clergy, nor others, living in his dominions may be robbed of their rightful possessions, and in their fifth canon they declare all spoiliations of church property null and void, and the spoliators excommunicate, wherever it occurs. Several other canons are given to this council by Burchard (Mansi, viii. 850-87).

The second, A.D. 549, was attended by ten bishops, but only to receive the canons passed at the 5th council of Orleans (Mansi, ix. 111-4).

The third, A.D. 588, was occupied solely with a dispute between the bishops of Rodes and Cahors (Mansi, ix. 973). [E. S. F.]

GAMING. [DICE.]

GAMING-TABLE (Tabula lusoria, παρσίσιον). Besides the natural feeling which led the survivors to place in the tombs articles dear to the deceased in his lifetime, the comparison of the life of man to a game of chance was a familiar thought to the ancients. We may trace it through all their literature, whether Greek or Roman (see Raoul-Rochette, Mémoires de l'Académie des inscriptions, tom. xiii. p. 614). Hence astragali and dice occur more frequently in the Greek and Roman tombs of the Campagna than playthings of any other description, though the amusements of every age and condition are there represented. The dice (tali, tesserae) are usually made of ivory, occasionally of bone; the dice-box (fritillus, tricucla) is generally of ivory, and the gaming-table marble.

Five of these gaming-tables have come down to our times with inscriptions which leave no doubt of their use. It is a curious circumstance that in several Christian cemeteries in Rome sepulchral niches have been found closed with this marble gaming-tables, as occasionally with other incised marbles. One of the tables taken from the cemetery of Basilla may be seen in the Kircher museum, and was first described by Lupat (Dissert. in nuper invent. Serapis epitaph. p. 57, tab. ix. n. 6). An engraving of it is given above.

gaming-tables have come down with inscriptions which leave no doubt. It is a curious circumstance Christian cemeteries in Rome es have been found closed with gaming-tables, as occasionally with marbles. One of the tables taken cemetery of Basilica may be seen in the sum, and was first described by Lepsuper incant. Ser. rae epistol. p. 37.

An engraving of it is given above.

GAMMADIA

The inscription, which was turned inside the casket, is easily read: VICTVS LEBATE || LYDERE
NESCIS || DA LVSONI LOCV ||.

Baldetti (Osservazioni, p. 449) gives a second found from the cemetery of St. Agnes bearing the following inscription: DOMINE FRATER || HANC SEMPER LYDERE
TABVLA ||—; also a dice-box found elsewhere, used for the same game. The interior of the box is here shown, divided into three sections as a security against fraud in throwing; two dice are lying at the bottom.

A third table of the same kind from the Cappont museum is reproduced in Murator's collection (t. I. CLXI. 3), and bears an inscription almost identical with the foregoing:
SEMPER IN HANC || TABVLA || LYDERE ||
LYDAMVS AMICI ||. The fourth table, from the cemetery of Calixtus, is given by Muratori (Acta S. Victorii in append. p. 140). The words of the inscription, though evidently relating to play, are difficult of interpretation.
Of the remaining table the place of discovery is uncertain. Cardinal Passionei (Inscr. Ant. append. p. 176) transcribes a gaming-table inscription which Raoul-Rochette quotes as an additional example, but it appears more likely to be that of the Kircher museum inaccurately copied.

These having all been discovered in Christian sepulchres, it seems natural to suppose that they were in use amongst Christians. Nothing in the gaming-tables themselves, nor in their inscriptions militates against such a supposition; and in fact it is well known that the business of making dice, and articles of a similar nature, was one followed by Christians. Baldetti, for instance, gives (p. 416) a Christian sepulchral inscription over an ARTIFEX ARTIS TESSALARIE, who is generally considered to have been a maker of dice. (Martigny, Dict. des Antiq. Chréti., s. v.
"Jeux, Tables de.") See DICE. [C.]

GAMMADIA (γαμμαδία, or γαμμαδία). A crossed ornament, embrodered on the borders or woven into the texture of ecclesiastical vestments, both in the West and East. It takes its name from being composed of four capital *gamma*s (Γ) placed back to back, thus forming a voided Greek cross. The *gamma*s were also sometimes placed face to face, so as to constitute a hollow square, in the centre of which a cross was inscribed. Vestments so decorated were known by the name of poly- stauria (πολυσταύρια). St. Nicholas and St. Basil are depicted in robes (thus some of crosses) in the illustrations to Ducauge (Gloss. Græc. fig. vii.). Balsamon assigns, among other marks of the patriarchal dignity, the "robe distinguished by *gamma*s," ἡ ἐν γαμμαδίων στοχίον (de Patriarch. p. 446). These crosses were peculiar to the white eucharistic vestments, those of a purple colour being destitute of them (Ducauge, s. v. πολυσταύριον). In the Western church the word gamma is of frequent occurrence in the local papal biographies in Anastasius, and in the lists of offerings made to the basilicas and churches, e.g., Leo III., among gifts to the church of St. Susanna, gave a triple vestment, "habentem in medio crucem de chry-sochivo . . . atque *gamma*das in ipsa veste chrysochiva quatuor" (§ 396), and Leo IV. to the church of St. Mary at Anagni, "vestem . . . cum *gamma*dis auro textis" (§ 536). These *gamma*das were of gold, others were of silver (§ 397), or of Tyrian violet (§ 462), (cf. Gaur, Etich. of. p. 315, col. 2). Not *gamma*s alone but other letters also are frequently seen embrodered on the borders of the robes of the sacred personages represented in early Christian mosaics and frescoes, especially H. I. T. X. The precise meaning of these marks has not been satisfactorily determined (cf. Bosio, Rom. Scot.

c. xxxviii. p. 638). [LETTRES ON VESTMENTS.]

GANGRA (COUNCIL OF), for which widely different dates have been assigned; some placing it before that of Nicea, some not long after;
others indefinitely, between it and that of Antioch, A.D. 341 (see the notes of Valensius and Reading on Soc. ii. 43, and Mansi, ii. 1095): all which discrepancies may be traced to the fact that one of the Latin versions of the synodical letter addressed by the assembled bishops to their colleagues in Armenia contains the name of Hosius of Corduba amongst the former. But the episcopate of Hosius, as Cave shows (Hist. Lit.
t. v.), extends over a period of seventy years, ending with A.D. 361; accordingly Pagi finds it possible to place this council as late as A.D. 358 and admit Hosius to have been there, on his way back to Spain. And this was unquestionably the year of the council, as we shall see from other considerations, so that the absence of his name in the Greek heading of the letter need not be pressed. His presence was always coveted by the Easterns; but as his name occurs among the last on the list, we may assume that he attended in no other capacity than that of a simple bishop. The object of holding the council is stated in its synodical epistle to have been to condemn the errors of Eustathius—otherwise written Eustasius or Eustachius—and his followers; and him Socrates and Sozomen are doubtless correct in making identical with Eustathius bishop of Sebaste in Armenia Minor —else why should the bishops of either Armenia have been addressed on the subject? The father of bishop Eustathius was Eulalius bishop of Cæsarea, or rather Neo-Cæsarea, in Pontus, and it was at a council held there under his own father this same year, according to Pagi, that he was first deposed. Sozomen indeed seems to say that he had been already condemned as a pre-byter by his father; if so, this would account for the severity of the new sentence passed upon him, particularly had he been propagating his errors as bishop in his father's see. Then, on his resisting this sentence, as there seems fair reason for supposing he would, his father would naturally have recourse to the provincial synod, which we may assume to have met on this occasion at Gangra, as the first bishop on the list is Eusebius, clearly the metropolitan of Cæsarea in Cappadocia, whom St. Basil succeeded, and in whose jurisdiction Gangra lay, while the name of Eulalius occurs further on.
Dius (probably Dianius, the predecessor of Eusebius, is intended) whom the Livellus synodius asserts to have presided, is not found in either version. Gangra therefore was held to confirm what had passed at Neo-Caesarea respecting Eustathius. The similarity of names seems to have led Sozomen to assert that he was first deposed by Eusebius of Constantinople, who died as far back as A.D. 342; and Sozomen, who says in one place (ii. 43) that the synod of Gangra was subsequent to the Constantinopolitan synod of A.D. 360, contradicts himself in the very next chapter by telling us that Meletius succeeded Eustathius at Sebaste, and then either as bishop of Sebaste or Berœa—it does not much matter which—attended the council of Seleucia, which we know met A.D. 359, and in so doing fixes the true date of the synod of Gangra, namely, midway between it and that of Neo-Caesarea the year before. These places were not remote from each other; and it would appear that there had been synods held at Antioch, that, for instance, of A.D. 358 under Eusebius, and at Melitine in Armenia, unfavourable to Eustathius, whose judgments he had set at nought equally with that of Neo-Caesarea. Hence the greater solemnity with which that of Gangra was convened, far enhanced however by the weight which has attached to it ever since; Pope Symmachus in a Roman synod A.D. 504 going so far as to say that its canons had been framed by apostolic authority, meaning that of his see in other words, that his predecessors had received and approved them (Pagi ad Baron. A.D. 319, n. v.). Of these there are twenty in number, and almost all in condemnation of the errors ascribed to Eustathius and his followers in the synodical letter before mentioned, "forbidding to marry, commanding to abstain from meats," and so forth. Their reception by Rome lends additional interest to canon 4, which says: "Should any separate himself from a presbyter that has married—as though it were not right to partake of the oblation when he is celebrant—let him be anathema." And the epilogue, reckoned in some collections as a 21st canon, is worth transcribing, not only for "the admirable temper and good sense" which distinguishes it, as Mr. Johnson remarks (Vade Mecum, ii. 86), but because it may well be thought to account for their having been incorporated into the code of the universal church. The rulings of fifteen, or, if Hosius was there, sixteen bishops only, must have owed their place there to some great intrinsic excellence. "We commit these canons to writing," so they terminate, "not as if we would cut off those who exercise themselves in works of severity and mortification in the church of God according to the Scriptures: but those, who under pretence of such exercise, do insult those who live in a more plain and simple manner, and would bring in innovations contrary to the Scriptures and the canons of the church. We therefore admire virginity, if attended with humility and a regard for continence, if accompanied with true piety and gravity, and a retreat from worldly business, with a modest humble temper. But at the same time we honour honest marriage, nor do we despise riches when employed in good works and in doing justice. We commend a plain and coarse habit, without art or guiness, and plain apparel. We honour various ostentation of wealth. We honour the houses of God, and affectionately embrace the assemblies made therein as holy and beneficial; not as if we confined religion within those houses, but as having a respect to every place that is built to the name of the Lord, and approve of the church assemblies as being for the public good; and pronounce a benediction upon signal acts of charity done to our brethren, as being done to the poor of the church according to tradition; and to say all in a word, we cannot but wish that all things may be done in the church according to the traditions of Holy Scripture and the apostles." GARDEN OF EDEN. Represented by trees in various bas-reliefs of the Fall of Man, as on the tomb of Junius Bassus (Bottari, tav. xv. &c. &c.). A most ancient MS. picture of the Garden of Eden occurs in the Vienne MS. of the Book of Genesis which is given by D'Agincourt. Professor Westwood has shown the present writer an extraordinary representation of the Fall of Man, from a Greek MS. of the Old Testament now in the Vatican of the 7th or 8th century, where the garden is much dwelt on. There is a quadruped serpent or dragon looking up at the tree of knowledge. These pictures were brought to this country in facsimile by bishop Forbes. [K. St. J. T.]

GARDEN OF GETHSEMANE. During the first four centuries and a half at least the subject of our Lord's passion seems to have been approached, but not entered upon—as by representations of the betrayal, the scene before presentations of the betrayal of Professor Westwood's Pilate, &c. In No. 90 of Professor Westwood's ivory carvings, he is brought before Pilate and Herod together, or perhaps Annas and Caiaphas. This is a part of the great casket of the Bibliotheca Quiriniana at Brescia, and is referred to the 5th or 6th century, to the period immediately preceding that of the Rabula MS. when the crucifixion began to be represented (see CRUCIFIX). The Garden of Gethsemane is one of the earliest of these approaches to actual delineation of our Lord's sufferings. The MS. Gospel of St. Augustine, very possibly made use of by the bishop himself, contains a most interesting picture of the betrayal in the garden, which is represented not only by trees, but by a curious serpentine representation of the brook Kedron, bursting out of a rock like the Barada at Ain Fil, or the Jordan at Tell-el-Khadry. This subject is carved on the casket of the Brescian library (Westwood, Ivory casts, No. 90), dating from the 5th or 6th century.

Indications of a garden occur in various Greek representations of the crucifixion combined with the resurrection. See crucifixion in the Rabula MS. in Asseriani, Bibli. Laurent. Catalogus, where olive-trees are certainly introduced.

In later MSS. it occurs in the Bible of Alcuin, and in a MS. given by count Bastard, which belonged to Drogon, grandson of Charlemagne. [E. St. J. T.]

GATES OF CHURCHES. Our Lord's designation of Himself as "the Door" of the church (John x. 7, 9) impressed a deep impression upon the minds of the early Christians in the entrances to their sacred buildings, which they evidenced by the care displayed in their construction and the richness of their ornaments.

GETHSEMANE. During the passion seems to have been entered upon—as by repetition, the scene before perhaps Amas and Cyprianus the great casket of the Bible is referred to the Rabula MS. when the crucifixion is represented (see CRUCIFIXION). CHURCHES. Our Lord's himself as "the Door" (John 10: 7, 9) impressed upon the minds of the early Christians as to their sacred buildings, which by the care displayed in their richness of their ornamentation.

tion. As a rule the actual gates (ostias) of churches were of wood of the most excellent and durable kind. The doors of the basilica of St. Paul at Rome were, until its destruction by fire in 1823, of wood, roughly chiselled, and were reported to have been brought from Constantinople. The doors of the church of St. Sabina on the Aventine are of cypress wood, carved in relief with subjects from the Old and New Testaments. They are of great antiquity, though Namachi, the annalist of the Dominican order, gives them too early a date in placing them before the 7th century. The church of the monastery of St. Catherine on Mount Sinai retains the ancient richly-carved doors of cypress wood erected by the emperor Justinian, stated by Mr. Curzon to be as perfect as when first set up (Nesle, Hist. of East. Ch. Intro. p. 258). Doors of wood were very commonly overlaid with plates of the precious metals and inlaid with ivory (Hieron. Ep. ad Demetr. viii.), for the purpose of decoration. These plates were frequently richly sculptured with scriptural subjects in relief. Thus Paulinus of Nola speaks of "aurea limina" (Poem. xiv. 98), and commends the piety of those who covered the doors of the church of St. Felix with metal plates—

"Sanctaque præfixis obducunt limina laminis." (Poem. xviii. 34).

The papal memoirs of Anastasius supply repeated references to this mode of ornamentation. (Doors, § 3, p. 574.) The "portæ argenteæ" of St. Peter's are often mentioned. These were overlaid by pope Hadrian (A.D. 772-795) with silver-gilt plates embossed with the effigy of our Lord and others (Anastas. § 332). Pope Hilary (A.D. 461-487) erected silver gates at the Confessio of the basilica of Holy Cross, and gates of bronze inlaid with silver at the oratory of St. John Lateran (Il. § 69). This last is an early example of those doors of bronze of which we have in later times so many magnificent examples, bearing representations of Biblical events in high relief, which reached their artistic climax in the western doors of the cathedral of Pisa and those of the baptistery, "le porte del Paradiso" at Florence. We have another early example in the gates of the "eso-narthex" of St. Sophia. These are of bronze exquisitely embossed with floriated crosses set in doorcases of marble. The great central doorway has above it an image of Christ in the act of giving benediction to a kneeling emperor with the virgin and St. John the Baptist on either hand. The chief entrance of the cathedral of Novgorod has bronze doors of very early date. They are described by Adelung (die Korm'schen Thüren zu Novgorod) as 11 feet high by 3 feet broad, divided into 24 compartments containing scriptural reliefs.

Church doors were often furnished with inscriptions either upon or above them. These included: texts of Scripture, doxologies, prayers, pious aphorisms, &c. Paulinus of Nola (Ep. viii. § 12) gives the following inscription placed by him over the principal entrance of the basilica of St. Felix:—

"Pax tibi sit quemque Dei penetrata Christi Festore pacis candido ingrederis."

Above the entrance, he informs us, was a crowned cross with these lines:—

"Cerne coronatam Domini super altaria Christi Stare cruceo duro post dentem visis labori Præmia. Tolle cruceo qui via auferre coronam."

The door of the outer basilica, which was entered through a garden or orchard, he also tells us, has these inscriptions on the outer face:—

"Coelestes intrate vias per amœna vireta Christicolæ: e lætis decet huc ingressus ab hortis Unde sacrum meritis daret exitus in paradysum."

And this on the inner:—

"Quisquis ab aede Dei perfectis ordine votts Egrederis, remeae corpore, corde mane."

Church doors were also often inscribed with the names of the builders and the date of the building. [E. V.]

GAZOPHYLACIUM. The treasury or storehouse attached to a church, for the reception of the offerings of the faithful, made either in bread and wine, or in money, for the service of the altar, the sustentation of the ministers, or distribution among the poor (Possid. Vit. S. Augustin. c. 24). These oblations were deposited in the gazophylacium either after having been offered on the altar, or until enquiry had been made by the deacons whether the offerers were orthodox and persons of good life, that the table of the Lord might not be profaned by the gifts of the unholy (Binus in Can. iv. Apost. Labbe i. 53). By the 93rd canon of the fourth council of Carthage, A.D. 399, the reception before enquiry even into "the gazophylacium or sacranium" (the modern sacristy) was forbidden. Chrysostom (Homil. 22 de Eleemos.) speaks of treasures in the churches, τὰ γαζοφυλάκια τὰ ἐν ταῖς ἐκκλησίαις; Augustine appears to recognize their existence "quid est gazophylacium? Arca Dei ubi colligebantur ea quæ ad indigentiam servorum Dei mittebantur" (Homil. in Is. 63); and Possidius in his life of that father (u. s.) records his having warned his hearers, as Ambrose had also done, of the neglect of the "gazophylacium and secretarium, from which the necessities for the altar are brought into the church." Cyprian refers to the place of offering as corbona (de Op. et Elemos. c. 5), and Paulinus of Nola, as mensa, which he complains stood too often for sight rather than use, "visit tantum non usui" (Serm. de Gazophyl. Ep. 34). [E. V.]

col, bearing the owner's name, T. ACI. ACLAVS, whom he regards as a Christian. The Uzielli Collection (Robinson's Catal. n. 293 [277f]) had an intaglio of bloodstone in its original bronze setting, bearing a dolphin, which is considered to be "probably early Christian," and Signor Castellani possesses a fine smethyst cameo^d about 1½ inch by ¾, presumed to be Christian, from one side of which, the more convex, a fish of the form of a carp projects boldly, the other side bearing the name of the possessor, VALERIAE, in incised letters. But the most interesting example of this kind is the episcopal ring of Arnulphus, consecrated bishop of Metz in A.D. 614, now preserved in the cathedral treasury; it is set with "an opaque milk-white cornelian," about half an inch in diameter, representing a fish whose head appears above the containing basket, on either side of which is a smaller fish: the work is presumed to be earlier than the fourth century. This is regarded by Cav. de Rossi as a curious illustration of a passage in Tertullian (De Bapt. c. 1): "Nos pisciculi secundum Piscem nostrum . . . nascimur, nec nisi in aquis permanendo . . . sumus" (Pitra, Spicil. Solesm. tom. iii. p. 543, tab. iii. n. 4. Paris, 1855). Waterton in Arch. Journ. xx. n. 4. Paris, 1863; Fortnum, ibid. xxviii. 274 [1871]; Marriotti, Test. of Calcut. p. 123 [with a figure], Lond. 1870. This type occurs also in subordination to that of the anchor, about to be mentioned. Besides the gems of the fish type here enumerated, the writer is acquainted with the casts of some others, and would also direct the reader to Didron, *Christ. Some others have since been found. . . . It is moreover," he tells us, "more frequently forged than perhaps any other." A remarkable sard intaglio, in the possession of the writer, may be mentioned as a kind of postscript. (iii.) Anchor.—The anchor, originally as Clement observes, the signet of Solomon (see Eekhel, Doct. Num. Vet. iii. 212), and frequently occurring on the coins of the Seleucidae, whence it passed over to the Jewish money, was frequently employed as a gem type by the Christians, and so much the more readily from its resemblance to the cross; whence the motto, Cruz uca anchora. This type occurs both in connection with the preceding and also independently of it. Of the former sort the British Museum contains the four following examples, all probably of Christian work: anchor between two fish, around it the letters AP, in black jasper; another with dolphin twisted round it, like the modern Aldine device, about it the preceptive legend EMITTXANOT (Laybold) in red jasper; anchor between two fishes, in niccolo; another between two fishes, on whose arms two doves are seated, in chalcedony. But the following are more important and unquestionably Christian. A sard figured by Muntzer (Ant. Abhandl. 1816, p. 57, t. i. n. 3), of an octagonal form, gives an anchor with two fishes and the legend IHCOT (Böckh, n. 9090). The Berlin Museum has recently acquired a gem bearing an anchor and a sheep and the legend IXOTC: u. s.

the anchor sits a dove with an olive branch in its mouth (Böckh, n. 9081). Passeri (*Thes. Gemm. An opal in the same museum, figured by Martigny (Dict. p. 545), has on one side a cruciform anchor, on the other, enclosed in an ornamented border, the legend IXOTC written xarabdv. The Berlin Museum has a red jasper having the word IXOTC and the letters MT, perhaps the owner's initials, disposed around an anchor (Böckh, n. 9079). But the anchor has also other accompanying symbols. Thus another gem in the same museum (Böckh, n. 9082) around the figure of an anchor the inscription IHCOTC legend IHCOTC (Jesus Christ), and also the accompanying symbols of a tree, a sheep, a dove, a palm, and a human hand. (For others see above under the Good Shepherd.) There are also gems, presumed to be Christian, of which casts have been received from Signor Saulini, in which the anchor is figured by itself alone.

 or is figured by itself alone.

(iv.) Dove.—This type, usually symbolical of the Holy Spirit, has been already mentioned as occurring on gems in conjunction with other Christian types. Besides these, Passeri (Thez.
Gemmae, Ast. p. iii. 235) describes and figures, after Mamachi, a gem in which occurs the dove on a palm branch, a star above, and the chrisma (✱) on the left. The British Museum has a garnet with the same device, but no chrisma; and also a portion of a cornelian ring, on the flat bezel of which is engraved a dove holding a branch, considered by Mr. Fortnum to be Christian work of the second or third century (Arch. Journ.
 1869, p. 140). A sapphire in the same collection bears the same device. The French collection contains a cornelian, the work of which appears to be of the sixth century, on which is engraved a dove, a palm, and a crown, with a monogram of Veranus (?), in style resembling those of the Ostrogothic kings of Italy (Chabouillet, Catal.
 n. 2167). The dove occurs also on Christian gems found in Rome or preserved in the Roman collections, in most cases accompanied by the chrisma (Sautai, Perret). A pale sard* intaglio is the possession of Mr. Ready has two rudely-engraved doves with a cross between them.
 "One of the prettiest devices of the class that has come to my knowledge," says Mr. King (Ant. Gems and Rings, vol. ii. p. 26, note), "shows the dove with olive twig in beak,

Church, having for supporters a lion and serpent.
 It pictorially embodies the precept to be wise as serpents and harmless as doves. (In possession of F. Taylor.) The British Museum, in fine, has a gem of large size and late work, reading in minuscule letters απαρτασι. + του θημου; below the legend is a sheaf of corn, and two doves with olive branches below, indicating that the ingathering of the harvest of souls will be in peace.
 Other examples are named by Martigny, u. s.

(v.) Fishermen.—The type alludes to the Saviour and the apostles as fishers of men. It is rarely found on Christian gems, but we have a few examples. M. de Belloc, in his work entitled La Vierge ou Poisson de Raphael (Lyon, 1833), figures an engraved cornelian, which he considers to be Christian, upon which is a fisherman holding a basket in one hand, and in the other a line from which a fish is suspended; the word IXOTC is written near the fish (Didron, Christian Iconogr. pp. 345, 364 in Bohn's Illustr.
Litt.). This would seem to be a different gem from a cornelian mentioned by Vallarsi in his notes on St. Jerome (i. 18), of the same type with the same inscription (Didron, u. s. p. 349); Martigny speaks of it as excellent in workmanship and probably of great antiquity; he regards the fisherman as the Saviour (Dict. p. 518; Garrucci, [This proves to be a paste, and belongs to OLIVAS, §
 III. c.]

Hagiogr. p. 111). A sard intaglio, regarded by Mr. King as "purely Christian," in his own collection is figured in his Gnostics, pl. x. n. 7; it gives two winged figures, probably Cupids, in a boat, one fishing, the other steering; "the mast with the yard, making a true cross, forms a significant and conspicuous feature in the design" (p. 224). Its Christianity, however, seems rather questionable.*

(vi.) Boat or Ship.—These occur on Christian gems, as being typical of the church, and then sometimes resting on a fish, or of the voyage of the soul to the harbour of eternal rest.
 Mr. Fortnum describes and figures a fragment of a ring of dark green jasper, probably of the second or third century, purchased in Rome, on the bezel of which is engraved a boat bearing a bird and a branch, probably a cock and palm branch. The boat is supposed to be the church, and the victory of the soul over the world to be indicated by the other types (Arch. Journ. 1869, p. 140). Aleander (Nov. Eccles. Ref. Symb. p. 13, Rom. 1926) figures a ring-stone; and Ficoroni gives another (Gemmae Antiq. p. 105, t. xi. 8), on which the ship seems to rest on a fish. A ring figured by cardinal Borgia (De Cruce Velt. p. 213) is set with an antique jasper intaglio, the subject of which is a ship, having six rowers on one side, which, supplying the corresponding six on the other, would represent the twelve apostles; there is also a pilot, or helmsman, and the name IHCOT inscribed on the reverse (Fort-num in Arch. Journ. 1871, pp.
 274, 275; Mart. Dict. p. 432).
 A cornelian in the British Museum (intaglio) has a ship with mast and yard-arm in the form of a cross, bearing also a cross at the prow. A fine black jasper intaglio, in the possession of Rev. S. S. Lewis, shows a boat with a Greek cross in the centre. A cornelian, belonging to count Marcolini, an impression of which is published by Lippert (iii.
 361), bears a trirème with the labarum, on which is the chrisma
 and two palm trees;
 the prow is in the form of a bird's head;
 the vessel enters into port, and the sea is marked by a fish; in the field are two stars and the unexplained letters

* The gem reproduced by Martigny (u. s.) from Costadoni, showing a fish in human form holding a basket, which Poldardi interprets to be the Saviour, is rather, to judge by the figure, an Assyrian or Babylonian gem, representing Dagon (see Smith's Dict. of the Bible, vol. i.
 p. 381).

† With this may be compared an antique paste in the Hertz Collection (No. 2521), having a ship with cock-shaped prow, rowed by four benches of sailors; a butterfly above. The allusion to the immortality of the soul can hardly be doubted, but the emblem is pagan rather than Christian.

type, in connection with a ring of the same material, engraved in the form of a cross, and an onyx described above. The ring is a cornelian engraved with a cross, and is set in a church of St. Mark at an onyx intaglio in the same material. (Arch. Journ. 1859, p. 281.) The ring is a cross, and is accompanied by a Latin cross, from the same collection. (Arch. Journ. 1871, p. 281.)

Mr. Fortnum has a ring of excellent workmanship, purchased at Athens, of massive gold, set with an onyx intaglio bearing the christa, "the P being crossed with the third stroke" (Arch. Journ. 1869, p. 142). Mr. King (Antique Gems and Rings, p. 142) mentions a ring cut out of crystal, bearing the christa alone, on the face of an oblong tablet, said to have been found in Provence. The same author (l. c. p. 141) mentions an elegant device given in Giorn. D'Art. 211, where the sacred monogram, cut on the face of a solid crystal ring, rests upon the head of a Cupid (or angel?) on each side of whom stands a dove. This style is considered to have been derived from the Sassanid stone rings. Passeri (Thes. Græc. Antiq. vol. ii, p. 220, t. cc.) figures a gem on which the christa is surmounted by a star, the X being formed by two branches of palm. This symbol is also sometimes accompanied by inscriptions both Greek and Latin. Martigny (Dict. p. 418) mentions a cornelian given by Macarius (Hieroglyphica, p. 235, ed. Gar.), inscribed with the word $\chi\epsilon\sigma\tau\omicron\varsigma$, the X being combined with a P to express the christa; possibly the same gem as that described above under § ii. The Berlin Museum has a heliotrope in which the christa is accompanied by a fruit-bearing tree and the following inscription: $\epsilon\pi\iota\kappa\alpha\lambda\omicron\upsilon\mu\alpha\iota\ \chi\pi\epsilon\sigma\tau\omicron\varsigma\ \chi\pi\epsilon\sigma\tau\omicron\varsigma\ \nu\alpha\sigma\alpha\pi\eta\delta\omicron\upsilon\varsigma\ \pi\alpha\tau\epsilon\rho\alpha$. . . (Böckh, n. 9094; the fragment is here given in part only and in minuscules). The British Museum contains a cornelian bearing the acclamation, DEVS DEIDIT VIVAS IN DEO, to the right of which is the christa, and to the left a small wreath. Mr. King figures a gem in the Vernon Collection (Antique Gems and Rings, ii, 28, 37) where the christa of a not quite usual form appears in the middle of an olive-garland, with the name of the possessor, $\Phi\omicron\text{IBE}\iota\omega\text{N}$, Phœbion (like Hephæstion, from Hephæstus), of which the work is unusually fine. The sacred monogram under various forms is found, as Mr. Fortnum observes (Arch. Journ. 1871, p. 271), "more frequently than any other on Christian rings. . . We find it alone and accompanied by almost all the other emblems, with inscriptions and monograms."²

² Various impressions of gems bearing the christa, which are more or less similar to those described above, the possessor" (King, Antique Gems and Rings, ii, 28), in the British Museum gives the monogram, having a straight line at right angles to the P on its summit (Φ), which forms a Tau, allusive to the cross. This is also the case with a crystal signet ring, "annulus vetustissimus," formerly in cardinal Barberini's museum (its resting-place being now unknown, Fortnum, in Arch. Journ. 1871, p. 272), figured by De Corte (Syntryp. de Ann. p. 120), where a serpent, pecked by two cocks, entwines itself about the base of the Tau: on either side of the upper part are the letters A and ω , and the stone is also inscribed beneath the bezel with the word SALVS.

Whether the lion was intended to have any Christian significance is uncertain. The phenix occurs on an engraved stone in conjunction with the palm, a combination which occurs on other monuments which are indubitably Christian, Perret (vol. iv, pl. xvi, 68; Martigny, Di. l. p. 534). In the British Museum are more than one gem bearing sheep, from the collection of the abbé Hamilton, of Rome, which are presumed to be Christian. On one are two sheep, on each side a dolphin; on another are two sheep and palm branches. It might not be difficult to increase the enumeration of these ambiguous types; but they are scarcely worthy of a more extended notice.³

Before proceeding further we may observe that the British Museum contains a large pale sard in which the pastor, the christa, dove and branch, fish, dolphin, ship, and various adjuncts are combined; another, of smaller size, in two compartments, has the pastor, dove, anchor, fishes, with other figures and animals; they were formerly in the Hamilton Collection, and are figured (with several others from the same collection, which is now in the British Museum) by Perret (iv, pl. xvi, figs. 5, 8).

The following subjects appear to have been introduced upon gems at a later period than the types already mentioned.⁴

have been sent from Rome by Signor Saullin: on one the X is formed of two fishes, one holding a wreath (crown of thorns) the other having a dove on its tail; palm on either side of the monogram.

Mr. King (Antique Gems and Rings, ii, p. 25) mentions that the frog, whose body passes through so many stages, was employed for a Christian signet as an emblem of the Resurrection; he does not however refer to any authority for this. In Raspe's Catalogue of Tuscan Gems (No. 13,315) is a gem bearing a frog with a palm and a serpent; these adjuncts rather suggest that the work may be Christian. See GLASS.

The first place would be due to representations of God the Father, if such really existed in the period embraced in this work, abhorrent as such images may appear to many. Mr. King (Antique Gems and Rings, ii, 32) mentions "a large nicolo in an antique massy gold ring, engraved with the Heavenly Father enthroned amidst the twelve patriarchs, the work carefully finished and well drawn." This gem, which he saw in the possession of the late Mr. Forrest, appeared to him to date from the times of the Western Empire. But there seems to be some error here. "During the first centuries of Christianity," says Dildon (Christian Iconogr. p. 20), "English," "even as late as the 12th century, no portraits of God the Father are to be seen." The band seems to have been the only permit symbol. Either, therefore, the work is likely to be later than the 12th century, or (more probably) the interpretation of the group is erroneous. One might suspect the Saviour and the apostles to be intended. Upon a cornelian formerly in the possession of Dr. Nott, the Saviour is represented on a column, with extended arms, having six figures on each side, in the exercise a sheep: in the field and over $\epsilon\eta\chi\omicron$ (sic, for $\chi\epsilon\sigma\tau\omicron\varsigma$) $\chi\pi\epsilon\sigma\tau\omicron\varsigma$. It is obvious that these are the twelve apostles, but the Jewish and Gentile churches, as symbols of them, are most probably intended. See § VIII, and GLASS. (A cast sent from Rome by Signor Saullin.)

bust. An agate measuring nearly four inches, in the Bibliothèque Impériale, shows his bust with the palm-branch and cross, on the latter is a cross. His head is naked, and his eyes are raised to heaven, as on some of his coins. Formerly the ornament of the extremity of the choir-staff (15th-century work) in La Sainte-Chapelle. (Chabouillet, Cat. n. 287, who refers to Murand's Hist. de la Sainte Chapele de Paris, (p. 36) as a figure of the gem incorporated with the baton.) Besides this noble piece we have several others also, but of inferior execution.

Passeri describes and figures a gem, preserved at Venice, representing a horseman spearing a dragon with a long lance terminating in a cross above; he regards it as a representation of a Christian emperor, conquering his enemies with the cross; a star, an emblem of Divine providence, in his judgment, is seen above (Thes. Gemm. Astrif. t. 2, pp. 289-297). This interpretation is somewhat confirmed by the types of certain coins of the fourth century, to which age this coin may probably be assigned.

The Mertens-Schauffhausen collection possessed an agate intaglio, which passed into the Leturcq cabinet, exhibiting a full-faced bust of the emperor Mauritius, wearing the Imperial crown of the lower empire, and holding a globe, on which rests a Greek cross inscribed, D. N. MAURITIUS P. P. A. Supposed to be a work of the sixth century, Leturcq, Cat. n. 210. The Leturcq collection contained also a green Jasper intaglio, giving full-faced portraits of Constantine II. (crowned) and of his son Constantine IV. (Pogonatus), both bearded, with a Greek cross between their busts, having a scorpion engraved on the back in the rude style of the so-called Gnostic gems (n. 211). The same collection in fine had an agate intaglio bearing busts of Leo IV. and his son Constantine VI. (Flavius), inscribed, D. N. LEO ET CONSTANTINUS P. P. A., both full-faced and crowned, and holding between them a double-headed cross (n. 212). These rare portraits of the Byzantine Caesars, of the sixth, seventh, and eighth centuries, appear in the same general style as those which appear on their money (see Sabatier, Monn. Byz. pl. xxiv. xxxiv. xli.).

There is one more gem of this class, which falls a few years later than the chronological limits of this work, but which ought hardly to be passed over here in consequence of its extreme interest in helping to fix the limits of gem-engraving in the West before the age of the Renaissance. The magnificent gold cross of King Letharius, said to be of about the date 823, now preserved in the treasury of the cathedral of Aix-la-Chapelle, is remarkable for the variety of gems, rubies, sapphires,ethysts, and emeralds with which its surface is studded. At the intersection of the arms is inserted a very fine oval cameo of Augustus, probably a contemporary work, and just below this an oval intaglio of rock crystal, of Frankish work and of very tolerable execution, two inches long and an inch and a half wide, giving the bust of Letharius,

Mr. King, however, has some doubt about its genuineness (Antique Gems, pp. 163, 164). The Leturcq Cabinet was sold by Messrs. Solihy, Wilkinson, and Hodge, in 1874, the accompanying catalogue by the owner being in French and English.

his head covered with a close-fitting helmet, with a slightly-projecting frontlet, like those of the latest Roman period; around the bust is the legend, in well-formed Roman letters, + XPE ADIVVA MOTHARIVM REG. (figured in Cahier et Martin, Mé. d'Arch. vol. I. pl. xxxi.; King's Ant. Gemm. p. 305; King's Handbook of Engraved Gems, p. 116).

There still remain to be considered some ancient gems bearing manifest traces of Christianity, which may be separately classed, viz., the Gnostic and the Sassanian.

Gnostic Gems.—A Gnostic origin has been hesitatingly assigned to one or two gems already mentioned, and a great number of gems called Gnostic have been described in Chabouillet's Cat. n. (See also ABELASAX in the DICTIONARY OF CHRISTIAN BIOGRAPHY.) Of these, a considerable number bear the word ABPA-CAE, more rarely (in the Greek) ABPAEAC, (variously written in Latin); and this in itself, in the judgment of some, proves a Gnostic origin. Assuming that Basilides, a Christian Gnostic of the second century, be the inventor of the word, as St. Jerome evidently thought and as several other Christian writers appear to intimate (see the authorities collected by Jablonski, Opus. t. iv. pp. 82-86, and Bellefleur, Ueber die Gemmen der Alten mit dem Abraxas-Bilde, Erst Stück, pp. 10-28), the numerous stones on which the word is written must either be looked on as Gnostic or else as derived through Gnosticism to other forms of faith or superstition. The latter view seems on the whole to be the more probable; for there is no doubt that the word, as transformed into the magical Abraxas-Bilde, passed over to the pagans, and was even employed in Christian times until quite lately as a charm against various forms of disease (Passeri, De gemm. Basilid. in Thes. Gemm. Astrif. vol. I. p. 236, sqq.; King in Ar. u. Instr. 1869, p. 33; Halliwell, Diet. of Archæol. Words, s. v. Abraxas and dabra). We have Abraxas occurring in connection with the names, IAOI (Jehovah), CABAOE, ADOENAI, and with the titles or representations of Harpocrates, Mithras, Mercury, &c. (see Passeri, v. s. &c.), but in no single instance known to the writer, though very possibly such may exist, does this word occur on any engraved stone in any connection which can be safely counted upon as Christian. These stones consequently, as well as all others which have been called Gnostic, but shew no manifest sign of Christianity, are passed over in this article. Very few of them, if any, can be fixed to any particular Gnostic sect or to Gnosticism gene-

Some, as Moshelm (De Heb. Christ. ante Constant. p. 359) have thought that the word is probably identical with Basilides' on what grounds we know not. This matter deserves a searching examination.

A very few monuments, which must needs be Christian, bear the word ABPAEAC. A large story being found at Arles, bears the monogram of Christ between A and I (as it appears on the coins of Constantine I. &c. of the fourth century), but accompanied by the title ABPAEAC, "a sufficient proof of the identity of the two personages in the estimation of its owner" (King's Antique Gems, p. 355). A copper amulet found at Hildesheim (Sicca Venerea), which is very distinctly Christian, contains the same word apparently, but in a corrupt form (PANGACA). See INSCRIPTIONS.

ally by which the greater part appear to have been charms. The following very scanty list, however, of unmistakably Christian gems may be with some reason looked on as Gnostic:—

(1.) A portrait of Christ, headless, to the right; XPICTOT above, a fish underneath. Figured by Raoul-Rochette (Traité des Ovaleaux de Rome, frontispiece, Paris, 1853) who regards it as Gnostic (p. 295) from the original in the possession of the marquis de Fortia d'Urban, formerly in the Luján collection. The stone is white chalcedony, the form is oval; ascribed to the second or third century (Art. Dict., p. 40).

Portrait of Christ. (Raoul Rochette.)

(2.) Another portrait with the same types and legend, on a truncated cone of white chalcedony, in the Bibliothèque Impériale (Chabouillet, n. 1334). This gem, probably of Eastern origin, is considered to be not later than the middle of the fourth century, and "presents the combination of the ancient Oriental form and of Greek decoration in the same monument" (King, Gnostics, p. 143). Figured by Perret, u. s. n. 47; very similar to the preceding.

Ephippianus makes it a charge against the Gnostic sects that they kept painted portraits and images in gold and silver, and other materials, which they pretended to be portraits of Jesus (Heres., c. 27, § 6). These gems, therefore, may probably be the work of some Gnostic sect.

The seven vowels, the "Musæ of the Spheres" occur frequently in this class of stones, and are also mentioned in the lately discovered Gnostic work entitled Platón, which, but their veneration or magical use can hardly be regarded as exclusively Marcionite or Gnostic (see Walsh, Ess. on Ancient Coins, Medals, and Gems, pp. 1841; King, Gnostics, p. 91; King in Arch. Journ., 1848, pp. 1-10). From the names of the angels mentioned Matter (Ann. Crit. du Gnost., p. 16, t. i. p. 93) thinks that a gem which he figures after Chifflet (fig. 24) may belong to the sect of the Ophites. One of the very few gems which really appear to savour of the Gnostic philosophy is a sard, of which an impression has been sent by the Rev. W. T. Drake; reading $\alpha \delta \iota \alpha \pi \alpha \nu \tau \omega \nu \nu \omega \nu \alpha \theta \eta \nu \alpha \nu \nu \omega \nu \nu \epsilon \mu \nu \alpha \nu \epsilon \lambda \omega \epsilon \nu \nu \omega \nu$; i. e. Elohim; there was also an inscription round the edge which has been a good deal broken: in the field are monograms or mystic characters. The letters may be of the third or fourth century.

If indeed we could with B-Hermann (Gemmen mit den Abraxas-Bildern, pl. pp. 11, 12) interpret the letters CEMEC EIAAM (misread by him) occurring on gems with the ABPAZAC legend or figure, to mean, This is the Word of God, $\eta \nu \kappa \omega \nu \iota \omega \nu \eta \nu$, the number of Gnostic gems might be increased considerably; but in truth the words signify in Hebrew Elohim Sun (Matter, u. s. p. 17, 29, t. i. p. 5; King, Gnostics, p. 76).

The numerous portraits of the Saviour which existed in St. Augustine's time differed much from each other; so that his face "innumerablem cogitationum diversitate variatur et fingitur, quae tamen una erat, quaecumque erat" (Aug. De Trinit., viii. 4). A portrait quite different from the above is rudely engraved, apparently by a much later hand, on the back of a tiny ancient cornelian in the possession of M. Forst, which bears on the other side a fish only. It is figured by Le Blanc, Inscr. Chyél., Ant. Gnost., vol. I. p. 371. The realistic representation is seen, as in both the preceding gems, combined with the

CHRIST. ANT.

(3.) The sun between two stars, EICVVC. [PABPIEA.] ANANIA. AMEN.] in two lines (Passeri, Thea Gemm. Ant., ii. p. 277, who does not name the stone). The names of angels, as planetary or astral gem, were invoked by the Ophites, and probably by other Gnostic sects; Gabriel presided over the serpent (King, Gnostics, p. 88). This gem (n. 155 in the Cappello Museum), which is doubtless magical, may well have been produced by some Christian Gnostic, perhaps of the fourth century, when similar barbarous orthography occurs.

(5.) Iao (Jehovah) under the form of a four-winged mummy, which has the heads of a jackal, a vulture, and a hawk; in the field three stars, legend obliterated; below on a cartouche, IAO. R. Trophy between a monogram made up of I and N (possibly for Jesus of Nazareth) and the christa; at the base of the trophy is another christa. In the Bibliothèque Impériale; serpentine (Chabouillet, n. 2224).

Chabouillet regards the trophy as a figure of the cross triumphant, and thinks the gem belongs to one of the Gnostic sects, who especially revered the Saviour.

Later Persian and Sassanid Gems.—This is a class of engraved stones, which may best be treated separately as being of a different form, conical or hemispherical, to those already named; and bearing legends, when legends are present, in the Pehlvi character. The following meagre list consists wholly of intagli; those in the French collection are thought by Chabouillet to be earlier than the middle of the fourth century; but some appear to be later.

art exhibited in early Christian gems is almost invariably of a low order," observes Mr. Fortson; "they were for the most part the production of a period of decadence. The greater number have been cut by means of the wheel. Hence arises an additional difficulty in distinguishing the genuine from the false. Their workmanship is easy to copy with the same instrument as that with which they were cut; and stones are abundant at hand, and Roman artists are apt and facile in imitation" (Arch. Journ. 1871, p. 299).

By much the greater part of the gems mentioned were used for finger-rings, those in intaglio being also employed as seals. Others, however, especially the Gnostic, were amulets, and carried about the person, suspended or otherwise, as charms. The larger camel, of the Byzantine period, appear to have been made for the purpose of decorating church plate or other ecclesiastical objects. (Martigny, Des anneaux chez les premiers Chrétiens et de l'anneau épiscopal en particulier, Meaux, 1858; Fortson in *Arch. Much information also is to be gleaned from various catalogues of gems and other books, to which reference is made in the above works and in this paper. [C. B.] GENETHLIACI, says Augustine, who condemns all such arts (*De Doc. He again refers, in the Confessions (iv. 3; vii. 6), to the folly and impiety of supposing that a man's vices were attributable to the fact that the planets Venus, Mars, or Saturn presided over his birth. The passage relating to this matter given in the Decree of Gratian (causa 26, qu. 4, c. 1) as from Augustine, is in fact from Rabanus Maurus De Mag. Praestigiis, and was by him compiled mainly from Augustine and Isidore. In another passage of Augustine (Conf. iv. 3, quoted in De ret. can. 26, qu. 2, c. 8) Gratian seems to have read "planetarios" for the "planos" of recent editions. GENIUS OF THE EMPEROR. In the early centuries of the church, one of the tests by which Christians were detected was, to require them to make oath "by the genius or the fortune of the emperor;" an oath which the Christians, however willing to pray for kings, constantly refused as savouring of idolatry. Thus Polygnp (Euseb. H. E. lv. 15, § 18) was required to swear by the fortune (τύχην) of Caesar. And Saturninus (Acta Mart. Scillit. c. 1, in Rulnart, p. 80, 2nd ed.) adjured Speratus, one of the martyrs of Scillita, "tantum iura per genium regis nostri;" to which he replied "Ego Imperatoris mundi genium nescio."

Minucius Felix (Octavius, c. 29) reproaches the delinquency of the emperor, and the heathen practice of swearing by his "genius" or "dæmon;" and Tertullian (Apol. c. 32) says that, although Christians did not swear by the genius of the Caesars, they swore by a more august oath, "per salutem eorum." We do not, says Origen (c. Celsum, bk. 8, p. 421, Spencer), swear by the emperor's fortune (τύχην βασιλέως), any more than by other reputed deities; for (as some at least think) they who swear by his fortune swear by his dæmon, and Christians would die rather than take such an oath (Biographiam Antiquitatis, xvi. vii. 7). GENTILLY, COUNCIL OF (Gentiliense Concilium), held A.D. 797, at Gentilly, near Paris, but authentic records of its proceedings are wanting. Annalists of the next age say that it was assembled by Pepin to consider a twofold question that had arisen between the Eastern and Western churches respecting the Trinity and the images of the saints (Pertz, i. 144). Quite possibly the iconoclastic council of Constantinople, A.D. 754, may have been discussed there, but there is no proof that the dispute between the two churches on the procession of the Holy Ghost had commenced as yet. The letter of pope Paul to Pepin (Mansi, xii. 614) is much too vague to be relied on, and what embassies are recorded to have come from the east in his reign are still less to the purpose (Ind. p. 677; comp. Pagi, ad Baron. A.D. 766, n. 3). [E. S. F.]

GENUFLECTENTES. [PENITENTS.]

GENUFLEXION, PROSTRATION, ETC.

The early Christians used five different postures in their worship. They stood upright, or with the head and back bent forward, they knelt on both knees, and they prostrated themselves at length (prostrato omni corpore in terra); said of penitents at their reconciliation, Sacram. Gelas. lib. i. n. xvi. xxxviii. in Liturgy. Rom. Vet. Murat. tom. i. coll. 504, 550).

Standing had been the more common posture in prayer among the Jews (Neh. ix. 2-4; St. Matt. vi. 5; St. Luke xviii. 11, 13); but they knelt (2 Chron. vi. 13; Dan. vi. 10; Ezra ix. 5) and prostrated themselves also (Num. xiv. 5; Josh. v. 14; 1 Kings xviii. 39, &c.); and the first converts to the gospel imported their former customs into the church. Thus Stephen knelt in his last prayer (Acts vii. 60); St. Peter knelt when he besought God for the life of Dorcas (ix. 40); St. Paul, when at Ephesus he prayed for the elders (xx. 36); the brethren at Tyre and their wives and children knelt with him on the shore, when he left them to go to Jerusalem (xxi. 5). In the language of the same apostle, "bowing the knee" to God is synonymous with "praying" to him (Eph. iii. 14). The Christian knelt in prayer more than the unconverted Jew; and this was natural, for the greater knowledge of God produced a stronger sense of unworthiness, and thus led to more marked and frequent expressions of humility in drawing nigh to him. "The bending of the knees is as a token of penitence and sorrow" (Cassian. Coll. xxi. c. xx. p. 795). This was the recognized principle, and it ruled the occasions on which the posture was employed. "The knee," says St. Ambrose, "is made flexible, by which, beyond other members, the offence of the Lord is mitigated, wrath appeased, grace called forth" (Hexameron, lib. vi. c. ix. n. 74).

Before we proceed it should be explained that the early church made no distinction in language between "kneeling" and "prostration." It is evident that men did not kneel upright, but threw themselves more or less forward, so that the posture might have either name. Sometimes indeed they so supported themselves by putting their hands or arms on the ground, that "kneeling" was a position of rest compared with standing. Thus Cassian complains that some western monks, when prostrate on the ground, "often wished that some bowing of the limbs (which he expressly calls genu flectere) to be prolonged, not so much for the sake of prayer as of refreshment" (Instit. lib. ii. c. 7). The same inference may be drawn from the fact that the third class of public penitents were indifferently called kneelers or prostrators, were said either γόνυ κλίνειν, genu flectere, or προσκύνειν, se substerne. Thus in a canon made at Neocesarea in Pontus about A.D. 314, we read, can. v., "Let a catechumen . . . who has fallen into sin, if he be a kneeler (γόνυ κλίνων), become a hearer." Similarly the eighty-second canon of the so-called fourth council of Carthage held in 398: "Let penitents (the prostrators were especially so called) kneel even on days of relaxation." But the same class were far more frequently described as prostrators. For example, in the eleventh canon of Nicea, A.D. 325, it is decreed that certain offenders "shall be prostrators (ὑποτασσόμενοι) for seven years." (Compare can. xii.; Conc. Ancyr. can. iv. v. &c.; Greg. Thaum. vi. ix.; Basil. ad Amphitoch. lvi. lvii. &c.; and many others.) A more direct piece of evidence comes from the 7th century. Pseudo-Dionysius (De Eccles. Hierarch. c. v. sed. lii. § 2, tom. i. p. 364) says that "the approach to the Divine altar and the prostration (of candidates for holy orders) intimates to all who are admitted to priestly functions that they must entirely submit their personal life to God, from whom their consecration comes." &c.; whereupon his scholiast Maximus, A.D. 615 explains "prostration" to mean "kneeling" (p. 375). So in the West, as late as the 9th century, in the same canon, "fixis in terram genibus" and "humiliter in terram prosterni" (C. n. Turon. A.D. 813, can. 37) are employed to describe the same posture. Other indications of similar usage will be observed in some passages below.

Kneeling or prostration was probably the general posture of the early Christians in prayer not regulated by public authority. Thus Clemens Romanus, in a general exhortation, "Let us fall down before the Lord, and beseech Him with tears," &c. (Epist. i. ad Cor. c. 48). When St. Ignatius prayed for the churches before his martyrdom, it was "eum genuflexione omnium fratrum" (Martirium S. Ign. c. vi.). Hieron. represents himself, before his first vision, "kneeling down and beginning to pray to God and confess his sins" (lib. i. vis. i. § 1). Hegesippus, A.D. 170, relates that St. James the Just "used to enter the temple alone, and to be found lying on his knees (κείμενος ἐπὶ τοῖς γόνασι)" (Euseb. Hist. Eccl. lib. ii. c. xlii.). He adds that his knees from continual kneeling became callous like those of a camel. When Eusebius relates the story of the Melitine legion in the Marcomannic war, about 174, he says of the Christian soldiers, "They put their knees on the ground, as our custom is in prayer" (Ibid. lib. v. c. v.). Tertullian, having referred to the same event some sixteen years after its occurrence, asks, "When have not even droughts been driven away by our kneelings and fastings?" (Ad Scapulam, c. iv.). We read in the Life of St. Cyprian, by Pontius his deacon, that on his way to death he "knelt on the earth, and prostrated himself in prayer to God" (Vita Cypri. prefatio). Eusebius tells us that Constantine the Great used "at stated times every day, shutting himself up in secret closets of his palace, there to converse alone with God, and falling on his knees to ask importunately for the things whereof he had need" (Vita Constant. lib. iv. c. xxii.). In his last illness, "kneeling on the ground, he was a suppliant to God," &c. (Ibid. c. lxi.). Gregory Nazianzen, speaking of his sister's habits of devotion, mentions "the bowing of her knees become callous, and as it were grown to the ground" (Orat. viii. § 13. Compare St. Jerome in Epist. ad Marcellian. de Asellâ). Augustine, pointing a miraculous answer to prayer in the healing of a sick person, says, "While we were fixing our knees and laying ourselves on the ground (terne incumbentes) in the usual manner, he flung himself forward, as if thrown heavily down by some one pushing him, and began to pray," &c. (De Civ. Dei, lib. xxii. c. viii. § 2). Elsewhere the same father, speaking of private prayer, says, "They who pray do with the members of their body that which belitt supplants, when they fix their knees, stretch forth their hands, or even prostrate themselves on the ground" (De Corpâ pro Mortis, c. v.). Only in this last passage, it will be observed, are kneeling and prostration distinguished from each other.

But the early Christians knelt or prostrated themselves as each chose, in the stated common worship of the church also. Thus Arabius writes to Him (i. e. Christ) we all by custom prostrate ourselves: I with united (collective) prayers adore" (Adv. Gent. lib. i. c. 27). Epiphanius adds "The church commands us to send up prayers to God without ceasing, with all frequency, and earnest supplications, and kneeling on the up-that it is according to "ecclesiastical custom to bend the knee to Christ" (Comm. in Isai. c. xlv.

v. 23). St. Chrysostom (Hom. xviii. in 2 Cor. viii. 24), of the celebration of the Holy Communion:—"Again, after we have shut out from the sacred precincts those who cannot partake of the Holy Eucharist, there must be another kind of prayer, and we all in like manner lie on the floor (ὅμοιως ἱδραὸς κελεβα), and all in like manner rise up." We understand this better on a reference to the liturgy in the so-called Apostolical Con- stitutions. There we find (lib. viii. c. ix. Cotelier tom. i. p. 396) that the "first prayer of the faithful" was said by all kneeling, the deacon crying out, "Let us, the faithful, all kneel!" During the rest of the liturgy all stood.

At other times of service the rule was for all to kneel in prayer, except on Sundays and between Easter and Whitsuntide. Few customs are more frequently mentioned by early writers, and none perhaps more frequently said to be derived from the age of the apostles. The earliest witness is Irenæus, in a fragment of his work on Ester preserved in the "Questions and Answers to the Orthodox;" Quæst. 115, ascribed to Justin Martyr. Irenæus traced it to the apostles. In answer to a question respecting the reason and origin of the custom, the latter writer says, "Since it behoved us always to remember both our own fall into sins and the grace of our Christ through which we have arisen from the fall, therefore our kneeling on the six days is a sign of our fall into sins, but our not kneeling on the Lord's day is a sign of the rising again, through which, by the grace of Christ, we have been delivered from our sins and from death, their due, now itself put to death." Ibid. Other witnesses are Tertullian, speaking both of Sunday and the paschal season (De Cor. Ml. c. lii.; similarly, De Orat. c. xxiii.); Peter of Alexandria, A.D. 301, can. xv. of Sunday only. The council of Niceæ, 325, both of Sunday and the days of Pentecost, can. xx; St. Hilary, also of the "Week of Weeks" and the Lord's day both (Prolog. in Psalm. § 12), who refers it to the apostles. His expression is, "No one worships with his body prostrated on the ground." Epi-phanios, also of both (De Fide, § 22). St. Basil, of both, as an apostolical tradition (De Spûitu Sancto, c. lvi., al. xxvii.). St. Jerome, likewise of both (Diad. contr. Luciferianos, c. iv.); and, again, of the fifty days, in Proem. in Ep. ad Epâ. "We neither bend the knee nor bow ourselves to the ground." St. Augustine, after giving the Scriptural reason, says, "On this account both are fasts relaxed [during the paschal quinquagesima] and we pray standing, which is a sign of the resurrection, whence also the same is observed at the altar on all Lord's days." (Ep. iv. ad Januar. c. xv. n. 28. Compare
c. xvii. n. 32.) From St. Maximus of Turin, A.D. 422, we learn the same facts and the reason (Hom. lii. De Pentec.). Cassian, A.D. 424, mentions the restriction on kneeling at those times (Ita d. lib. ii. c. xxvii.; Collat. xxi. c. xx.). In the collection of canon put forth by Martin, in Pannonian by birth, but bishop of Bracara in Spain, A.D. 580, the same prohibition occurs, borrowed from a Greek or oriental source (can.

[vii.) His words are, "non prosterni, nec humiliti." The 90th canon of the Trullan council, held at Constantinople in 691, forbids kneeling "from the evening entrance of the priests to the altar on Saturday until the next evening on the Lord's day." The council does not mention the longer period, and its object seems to have been merely to settle the hours at which the observance should begin and end.

From the fact that the 20th canon of Niceæ is not found in the abridgement of canons by Rufinus (Hist. Eccl. lib. x. c. v.), nor in an ancient codex supposed to be the authorised collection of the church of Rome, Quænel (Diss. xii., at the end of St. Leo's Works, c. v.) supposed that the custom of not kneeling on Sunday, &c. was never received at Rome. See Routh, Opus- cula, tom. ii. p. 444, or Reliquiæ Sacrae, tom. iv.
p. 73, ed. 2. We find, however, that the prohibition was enforced in the dominions of the Frankish princes after they had imposed the Roman office on their subjects. Those times were excepted from the general order for kneeling at prayer made by the third council of Tours, A.D. 813, can. 37. It was forbidden by a capitu-lary of Louis the Godly, A.D. 817 (Capit. Reg.
Franc. tom. ii. col. 586, cap. li.) during "the Pentecost week." Rabanus Maurus, also, at Mentz, A.D. 847, says, as if vouching for a present fact, "On those days the knees are not bent in prayer." "On the Lord's day we pray standing" (De Instit. Cler. lib. ii. cc. 41-2). It is very improbable, therefore, that the custom was not known and observed at Rome.

In all the ancient liturgies except the Roman, if, indeed, that be an exception (see Scudamore's Notitia Eucharistica, p. 579), the bishop gave a blessing before the communion. In all but the Clementine this was preceded by a monition from the deacon: e.g., in St. James and St. Basil, "Let us bow down our heads unto the Lord;" in St. Chrysostom, "Bow down your heads unto the Lord" (Liturg. I.P., pp. 32, 66, 102); in St. Mark, "Bow your heads to Jesus Christ" (Rennaud, tom. i. p. 160); in the Mozarabic, "Humiliate vos benedictioni" (Miscell. Leslie, pp. 6, 246); in a Roman Ordo, early, but of uncertain date, "Humiliate vos ad benedictionem" (Ord. vi. § 11, Mus. Ital. tom. ii. p. 75). Several liturgies had a benediction after the communion also, for which the people bowed themselves.
In some, indeed, the deacon here repeated his direction. See St. James (Lit. I.P. p. 39); the Greek Alexandrine of St. Basil and of St. Cyril (Rennaud, tom. i. pp. 85, 125). In Egypt, for this reason, benedictions were usually called "Prayers of Inclination," or "Of Bowing the Head" (Rennaud, u. s. pp. 35, 36, 50, 77, &c.). The same gesture, similarly bidden by the deacon, was employed in other parts of the service. See St.
James, u. s. p. 9, and Rennaud, u. s. pp. 77, 79, 105, &c. In particular, the catechumens bowed while the prayer proper to them was said before their dismissal. Thus the deacon, in St. Basil and in St. Chrysostom: "Ye catechumens, bow down your heads unto the Lord" (Lit. I.P., pp.
48, 87). The Malabar: "Incline your heads for the laying on of hands, and receive the blessing" (Dist. Eccl. Malab. Raulin, p. 304).

Two sermons of Caesarius, bishop of Arles, A.D. 602, illustrate our subject, as regards the habits of the people, in a graphic manner:—"I intend and admonish you, dearest brethren, that as often as prayer is said by the clergy at the altar, or prayer is bidden by the deacon, ye faithfully bow, not your hearts only, but your bodies also; for when I often, as I ought, and heedfully take notice, as the deacon cries, 'Let us bend our knees,' I see the greater part standing like upright columns." "Let it not be grievous to him, who from some weakness cannot bend his knees, either to bow his back or incline his head." Again: "In like manner I admonish you of this, dearest brethren, that as often as the deacon shall proclaim that ye ought to bow yourselves for the benediction, ye faithfully incline both bodies and heads; because the benediction, though given to you through man, is yet not given from man." (Serm. Cues. lxxxv. §§ 1, 5; Sim. lxxxiv. §§ 1, 2.)

The priest himself often inclined his head during the prayers. (See St. James, u. s. pp. 7, 13, 17, &c., and St. Mark, u. s. pp. 150, 153.) Many observances of this kind are lost to us from the want of rubrics in the ancient liturgies, or from their incompleteness. This is especially the case with those of the West; but there is one Ordo of the age of Charlemagne in which the priest is directed to say the prayer In spiritu humilitatis "lowed before the altar." (Martene, De Ant. Eccl. Lit. lib. i. c. iv. art. xii. ord. v.) We might here also cite the Mozarabic and Milanese missals, if the antiquity of their rubrics were not generally uncertain.

From pseudo-Dionysius we learn that while bishops and priests at their ordination knelt on both knees, deacons knelt on one only (De l'eccl. Hier. c. v. § ii. tom. i. p. 364.) [W. E. S.]

GERMANICA CONCILIA, councils celebrated in Germany, but at places unknown.

1. A.D. 743, probably, being the first of five said to have met under St. Boniface by his biographer, but great obscurity hangs over their date, number, and canons, to say the least.

Mansi really settles nothing (xii. 355 and seq.), and the Oxford editors of Wilkins still less (iii. 382, note). Again, in the preface to this council it is Carloman, mayor of the palace who speaks, and its seven canons, besides running in his name form the first of his capitularies (Mansi, ib. 366, and App. 104). Certainly, the first of them constituting Boniface archbishop over the bishops of his dominions cannot have been decreed but by him. True, there is a letter from Boniface to pope Zachary requesting leave for holding a synod of this kind, which was at once given (Mansi, ib. 312-19), and in another, purporting to be from Boniface to archbishop Cuthbert (Haddan and Stubbs, Councils, iii. 376), three sets of canons are quoted as having been decreed by the writer, of which these form the second. Still, even so, when and where were the other two sets passed? What Mansi prints (xii. 38-1) as "statutes of St. Boniface" in one place, were probably the work of a later hand, as he says in another (ib. 362).

2. A.D. 745, at Mayence possibly, where Aldebert and Clement were pronounced heretics, and Gervilius of Mayence deposed to be succeeded by Boniface (Mansi, ib. 371).

3. A.D. 747, at which the first four general councils were ordered to be received. Possibly the tenth of the letters of pope Zachary may relate to this (Mansi, ib. 409 and 342).

4. A.D. 759, at which Othmar, abbot of St. Gall, was unjustly condemned (Mansi, ib. 660). [E. S. F.]

GERMANICUS, martyr at Smyrna under Marcus Antoninus and Lucius Aurelius; commemorated Jan. 19 (Mart. Rom. Vet., Adonis, Usuardi). [W. F. G.]

(2) Bishop of Auxerre and confessor; "transitus" commemorated July 31 (Mart. Hieron., Adonis, Usuardi); Aug. 1 (Mart. Bedae); translation (actalis, Ado) Oct. 1 (Mart. Usuardi).

(3) [DONATIANUS (2).]

(4) Martyr in Spain with Servandus; commemorated Oct. 23 (Mart. Rom. Vet., Adonis, Usuardi).

(5) Martyr at Caesarea in Cappadocia, with Caesarius, Theophilus, and Vitalis, under Decius; commemorated Nov. 3 (Ib.).

(6) Of Constantinople, A.D. 730; commemorated May 12 (Cal. Byzant.). [W. F. G.]

GERONA, COUNCIL OF (Gerundense concilium), held A.D. 517, at Gerona in Catalonia, and passed ten canons on discipline, to which seven of the ten bishops present at the synod of Tarragona the year before subscribed. By the first the order laid down for celebrating mass and saying the psalter and ministering in general throughout the province of Tarragona is to be that of the metropolitan church. By the last the Lord's prayer is to be said on all days after matins and vespers by the priest. By the second and third rogation days are to be kept with abstinence twice a year; viz., the three last days of Whitsun week, and the first three days in November; or, one of them being a Sunday, the GERVASIUS AND PROTASIIUS, SS., IN ART. The basilica of St. Ambrose in Milan was dedicated by him, June 19th 387, to these martyrs, whose bones he transferred to it. The name of the church has, however, been derived by posterity from that of its founder. The author may refer to the personal testimony of Father Ambrose St. John of the Oratory, as to a late discovery of bones in the Basilica of St. Ambrose, which seems strongly to confirm the tradition of the burial of actually martyred persons among its foundations.*

St. Gervasius appears repeatedly in the paintings of the Ambrosian basilica, especially in the great mosaic of the apse (Sommerard, Album des Arts, pl. xix. 9 série). St. Protasius is with him, as in other parts of the church. This mosaic cannot be later than the 9th century, and may probably be of the same date as that in the great church of St. Apollinaris in Classe at Ravenna, 7th century. (See Ciampini let. Monumenta, tom. ii. pl. xxv. No. 11, and p. 95 in text.) Two portrait medallions of these saints are to be seen in the church of St. Vitale in the same city. [R. St. J. T.]

GILDING. A frequent mode of decorating the interiors of churches was by gilding. The earliest reference we have to it is in the letter of the emperor Constantine to Macarius, bishop of Jerusalem, relating to the church of the Holy Sepulchre, which he was about to have built, consulting him, among other points, as to the character of the ceiling he wished to have constructed. The emperor evidently inclined to a ceiling divided into panels (Akakovopia, laqueata), inasmuch as it could be decorated with gold (Euseb. l'it. Const. iii. c. 32). This plan was carried out on the most magnificent scale, and, "by means of compartments, stretched its vast expanse over the whole basilica, covered throughout with resplendent gold, so as to make the whole temple dazzling as with a blaze of light" (ib. c. 36). The beams of the roof of the basilica of St. Paul at Rome were originally, A.D. 386, covered with gold-leaf.

"Bracteolas trabibus sublevit. ut omnis aurulenta Lux esset intus. ceu jubar sub ortu."

(Petron, l'astio Beat. Apoll.)

The church built by St. Paulinus at Nola had also a panelled ceiling, "alto et lacunato culmine" (Paulin. Epist. xxiii. 12), but gilding is not expressly mentioned. References to these ceilings of gilded panelling are frequent in Jerome, who speaks of "the laquearia and roof gleaming with gold," "the gilded ceilings," and the like, with some expression of regret that so much that might have been devoted to Christ's poor was lavished on architectural decoration (Hieron. lib. ii. in Zach. viii.; Epist. ii. ad Nepot.; Epist. viii. ad Demetriad.). From the last-quoted passage we learn that the capitals of the pillars were also gilt, and that the altars were ornamented with gold and jewels. In the more magnificent churches erected in Justinian's reign, the altars were often of silver plated with gold. The altar given by Pulcheria, A.D. 414, to the church at Constantinople was elaborately constructed of gold and precious stones (Soz. H. E. ix. 1). This was surpassed by the altar given by Justinian to St. Sophia, which was all of gold resplendent with gems (Ducauge, Constantinop. Christ. lib. iii. p. 47). The altar at St. Ambrogio, at Milan, made A.D. 835, is covered with plates of gold and silver, with subjects in high relief [ALTAR, p. 64]. The domes which crowned the early churches in the East were often gilt externally. (Bingham, Orig. Eccl. VIII. viii. 5; Neale, Eastern Church, introd. p. 182.) [E. V.]

GIRDLE, (ζώνη; baltus, cingulum, zona). Among nations who wore long flowing robes, it is obvious that the use of the girdle would be necessary for convenience in walking, or in active work. This very way, however, of using the girdle would cause it to be more or less hidden by the dress: and thus we are à priori prepared for the fact that, while in the early Christian centuries we continually meet with the girdle used as a matter of practical convenience, it is not till the eighth century that we find it recognized as an ecclesiastical vesture strictly so called. The use of it in these earlier times seems not unfrequently to have carried with it the idea of an imitation of the ancient Jewish prophets, and thus to have been worn by those who followed a monastic life, and those who professed, in reality or in seeming, to imitate their austerities. We find, for example, pope Celestinus I. (ob. 432 A.D.) finding fault with those who, by affecting this style of dress ("amiciti pallio et hincbae praecincti"), seemed to claim for themselves a sanctity of life not rightly theirs (Epist. 4 ad Episc. Vienn. et Narb. c. 2; Patrol. l. 431). Salvianus (ob.

* See note, p. 433, J. H. Newman's Historical Sketches, Folioing, 1872. A letter of the greater interest, which seems to leave little room for doubt as to the authenticity of the bodies of St. Ambrose and the two martyrs.

circa 495 A.D.) refers to the same idea, in the words addressed to an unworthy monk, "licet fidem cingulo afferas" (Adv. avaritiam iv. 5; Patrol. liii. 232). See also Basil (Epist. 45 ad monachum lapsurum; Patrol. Gr. xxxii. 366). To take an instance of a different type, Fulgentius (ob. 533 A.D.) on his elevation to the see of Kuspe, is said in his biography (formerly attributed to Ferrandus Diaconus) to have retained the girdle with the rest of the monastic habit—"pelliceo cingulo tanquam monachus utebatur," (Patrol. lxx. 136). The Rule of St. Benedict forbade the laying aside of the monastic girdle even at night; for the monks were to sleep "vestiti . . . et cincti cingulis aut funibus;" (Regula S. Benedicti, c. 22; see also Regula S. Donati, c. 65).

It may further be remarked that the girdle was commonly worn as an ornament by sovereigns and nobles. Thus, in a homily once assigned to Chrysostom, but now generally believed to be a work of the sixth century, the girdle is spoken of as an ordinary ornament of kings, and with this royal use of it is compared the girdle of our Lord (Hon. de Uno Legislatore, c. 3; vol. vi. 409, ed. Montfaucon). It will readily be seen how important a bearing the above facts have on the main general question, to which we can only refer thus in passing, as to whether the dress of the early Christian ministry was derived from that of the Levitical priesthood. In this last, it will be remembered, the girdle was a very important element.

It has been said that it was not till the 8th century that we meet with the girdle as an ecclesiastical vestment in the strict sense of the word. It is true that we do meet with references to it at an earlier period, as to that worn by Gregory the Great, which later generations are said by his biographer to have regarded as a precious relic (Joannis Diaconi Vita S. Greg. Magni, iv. 80; Patrol. lxxv. 228). Still, it must be remembered, the use of an article of dress by ecclesiastics is a totally different thing from their use of it because they are ecclesiastics; and for instances of this latter we must pass on to a later period.

Perhaps the earliest reference of this kind is one by Germanus, patriarch of Constantinople (ob. 740 A.D.), in his description of the various priestly vestments (Historia Ecclesiastica et Mystica Contemplatio; Patrol. Gr. xxviii. 39-4), in which he also alludes to the napkin attached to the girdle worn by deacons (ὡς ἐρχέσθω τὸ ἐπὶ τῆς ζώνης). Rabanus Maurus, in his treatise de Institutione Clericorum (i. 17; Patrol. cvii. 306), a work probably written about the year 819 A.D., refers to the girdle as one of the regular Christian vestments, and dwells on the symbolism of it at some length. A curious injunction, for which a curious reason is given, as to the wearing of the girdle, is found in one of the so-called Arabic canons of the council of Nicaea, edited by Abraham Ecchelenensis (can. 66; Labbe ii. 335). According to this, the clergy are forbidden to wear a girdle during divine service.

In earlier times the girdle was often doubtless richly adorned: the reference we have already given to its regal use is illustrative of this, and we may further cite Chrysostom (Hon. in Psal. 48; vol. v. 521), where, inveighing against various articles of luxury in dress, he speaks of golden girdles. Apparently, too, this state of things prevailed after the girdle became a recognized ecclesiastical vestment, the excessive ornamentation being, it would seem, viewed as a secular element in the ecclesiastical dress. Thus we find Durandus (ob. 1296 A.D.) speaking of the clergy in the time of the emperor Louis I. the son of Charlemagne, as laying aside "Cingula auro texta, exquisitas vestes, et alia secularia ornamenta" (Ratione Div. Off. li. 1). A further illustration of this is furnished by the will of Riculfus, bishop of Helena (ob. 915 A.D.), in which he bequeaths, among other precious articles, "zonus quinque, una cum auro et gemmis pretiosis, et aliis quattuor cum auro" (Patrol. cxxiii. 468).

Later liturgical writers [e.g. Honorius Augustodunensis (Gemma Animae, i. 206; Patrol. clxxii. 606), Innocent iii. (de Sacro Altit. mysterio, i. 52; Patrol. ccxvii. 793), and Durandus (Rat. Div. Off. iii. 4)] speak further of an outer girdle (subcingulum, subcinctorium, saccinctorium), and generally as a vestment peculiar to bishops. So in the ancient mass given by Menard (Greg. Sacr. col. 249) from the Cd. Ratoldi, the bishop puts on both a cingulum and a balteus, the former perhaps the unseen and simple primitive girdle, the latter the elaborate ornament of later times. This subject, however, falls beyond our limits; reference may be made to Boan de Rebus Liturg. i. 23. 15.

A brief remark may be made in passing as to the special significance of the girdle in reference to the bestowal or deprivation of office. Thus Gregory the Great congratulates a friend "prae-fecturae vos suscepisse cingula" (Epist. x. 37; Patrol. lxxvii. 1094). Atto, bishop of Vercellae (ob. circa 960 A.D.), writing to one bishop Azo, orders that a man who should contract a marriage within the prohibited degrees "cinguli sui patiatur amissionem" (Epist. 5; Patrol. cxxxiv. 107). Similar references are often found in the Theodosian code, and elsewhere (see e.g. Cod. Theodos. lib. viii. tit. i. l. 11; lib. x. tit. 26. l. 1), in a way that often suggests the belt of knighthood of later times.

For further references to the subject of the girdle in its different aspects, see Ducange's Glossarium s. vv.; Marriotti's Vestitorium Christianum, p. 213, etc.; Heile, Die liturgischen Gewänder, pp. 178 sqq.; Bock, Geschichte der liturgischen Gewänder des Mittelalters, ii. pp. 30 sqq. [R. S.]

GLADIATORS. A passion for gladiatorial combats had a strong hold upon the popular mind of pagan Rome; and under the empire magnificent amphitheatres were built for such exhibitions, and others of an almost equally barbarous nature, which seem to have presented a peculiarly fascinating attraction both to men and women in those times.

Augustine mentions a case in which even a Christian, having been induced to be present at one of these exhibitions, and having kept his eyes closed for a time—on opening them, at a sudden outcry which he heard, instead of being shocked or disgusted at the sight, was hurried along with the spirit of the assembled people—was overcome with a wild and savage delight at beholding the scene of bloodshed and death, and carried he assembled people—was over-and savage delight at beholding doudshed and death, and carried away with him an inextinguishable desire to witness the same spectacles again (August.

Conf. vi. 8).

Some pagan moralists expressed more or less strongly their disapprobation of the gladiatorial shows, as being inhuman and demoralizing (Seneca, Ep. vii. and Pliny, Ep. iv. 22); but they were too popular to be checked by such remonstrances; and nothing effectual was done to stop them until they were opposed and finally suppressed by the intervention of Christian principles and Christian heroism.

The church expressed its abhorrence of these barbarous games as soon as it came in contact with them, not only by discountenancing attendance at them, but by refusing to admit gladiators to Christian baptism (see Constit. Apostol. viii.
 32). In this canon, charioteers, racers, and many others, are included in the same condemnation; probably because the public exhibitions in which they took a part were more or less connected with idolatry. And for the same reason such persons, if they had already been received into the church, were to be punished by excommunication (Concil. Arelat. i. 4).

The first imperial edict prohibiting the exhibition of gladiators was issued by Constantine in A.D. 325, just after the council of Nice had been convened (Cod. Theod. xv. 12, 1). Forty years later Valentinian forbade that any Christian criminals should be condemned to fight as gladiators; and in A.D. 367 he included in a similar exemption those who had been in the imperial service about the court (Palatini) (Cod. Theod.
 ii. 40, 8 and 11).

Honorius, at the end of this century, ordered that no slave, who had been a gladiator, should be taken into the service of a senator (Cod. Theod. ix. 12, 3).

All these edicts resulted from the operation of Christian principles and feelings, and they show the rise and growth of a more civilized opinion, which these imperial utterances also helped to promote; but they produced little or no direct effect in putting a stop to such exhibitions.

The decree of Constantine seems to have applied only to the province of Phoenicia—to the prefect of which it was addressed; or, at any rate, it very soon became a dead letter; for a few years later Libanius alludes to gladiatorial shows as still regularly exhibited in Syria (Libanius, de vita sua, 3). And although they were never seen in Constantinople—where a passion for chariot races seems to have supplied their place—yet at Rome and in the Western empire they continued unrestricted, except by some trifling regulations. Even Theodosius the Great, though in some things very submissive to church authorities, compelled his Sarmatian prisoners to fight as gladiators; for which he was applauded by Symmachus, as having imitated approved examples of older times, and having made these minister to the pleasure of the people, who had previously been their dread (Symmachus, Ep. x. 61).

Thus these sanguinary games held their place among the popular amusements, and afforded their savage gratification to the multitude until their suppression was at last effected by the courage and self-devotion of an individual Christian.

In the year 404, while a show of gladiators was being exhibited at Rome in honour of the victor of Stilicho, an Asiatic monk named Telemachus, who had come to Rome for the purpose of endeavouring to stop this barbarous practice, rushed into the amphitheatre, and strove to separate the combatants. The spectators—enraged at his attempt to deprive them of their favourite amusement—stoned him to death. But a deep impression was produced.

 Telemachus was justly honoured as a martyr, and the emperor Honorius—taking advantage of the feeling which had been evoked—effectually put a stop to gladiatorial combats, which were never exhibited again (Theodoret, H. E. v. 26).
 [G. A. J.]

GLASS. (i.) Window glass.—The use of glass in windows in Roman times was much more common than was formerly supposed, and examples of such glass have been met with not only in Pompeii, but in our own country in various places. It was also used by Christians in early times, though perhaps not very commonly, for the windows of their churches, and then it was sometimes coloured. Thus Prudentius, speaking of the Basilica of St. Paul, built by Constantine, says: "In the arched window nar(panes of) wonderfully variegated glass: it shone like a meadow decked with spring flowers."* Glass, probably of the church destroyed A.D. 420, has been lately found at Trèves (Archaeol. xl. 194).
 Venantius Fortunatus (cir. a 560) thus speaks (lib. ii. poem. 11) of the windows of the church in Paris:

"Prima capit radios vitreae colorata fenestras; Artificisque manu clausit in arce diem."

From Gaul artists in glass were first introduced into Britain (A.D. 678) by Benedict Biscop for the church windows at Weremouth in Durham, "ad cancellandas ecclesias porticumque et coenaculorum ejus fenestras" (Bed. Vit. S. Bened- icti, § 5). Other early examples may be seen in Ducange, s. v. Vitreae, and Bentham's Hist. and Antiq. of Ely, p. 21 (ed. 2). Pope Leo III.
 (circa 795) adorned the windows of the apse of the basilica of the Lateran with glass of several colours, "ex vitro diversis coloribus" (Anastasius Vitae Pontiff. p. 208, C. ed. Murat.); and this, as some think, "is the earliest instance of the kind that can be cited with confidence" (Winston, Anc. Glass Paint., p. 2; Fleury, H. E. xlvi. 20).

Painted glass belongs apparently to an age a little later than the present work embraces.
 "It is a fact," says M. Labarte, "acknowledged by all archaeologists, that we do not now know any painted glass to which can be assigned with certainty an earlier date than that of the 11th century" (Handbook, p. 69). The invention itself, however, may perhaps have been somewhat earlier.*

* "Tum camuros hyalo in-ferri varie occurrit arcus.
 Sic prata vernis floribus resplendit." Perist. p. xii. 83, 54

The above interpretation, which is substantially that of Emeric David and Labarte, seems much preferable to that which makes hyalo mean mosaic (Labarte, Handbook of Arts of Middle Ages, c. ii. p. 66, Engl. trans.).

* Two examples only, belonging to this century, are figured by M. Lesteyrie in his great work, Histoire de la Peinture sur Verre.

* The art is described with many details by the monk Theophilus, whose age is unfortunately uncertain. Leasing (ii.) Glass vessels.—These were used by the Christians as well as by the heathen for interment with the dead, and the so-called lacrymatories, which are really unguent bottles, have been found in the catacombs of Rome (Scrux d'Agincourt, Hist. de l'Art par ses Monum. t. viii. f. 21, "Sculpture"), and elsewhere, as Todi, Villeja, and Sardinia: the vessels are of various kinds, and are sometimes ornamented with letters and sometimes with palm-branches (De Rossi, Bull. Arch. Crist. 1864, p. 89). Perret figures a long drinking-glass, copied here, ornamented with palms (incised), from the catacombs; at the bottom is some red substance: see below. The Slade Collection, recently acquired by the British Museum, contains a vessel of the same general form, of white glass, found at Cologne, probably of the 4th or 5th century, with incised figures of Adam and Eve, and of Moses striking the rock.

Glass Incised Cup. (Perret.)

The Sloane Collection in the same museum has a plain glass beaker from the catacombs embedded in the original plaster: likewise a glass ampulla marked with a cross and on each side, also from the catacombs. At the bottom of some of these small vessels has been found a dark crust, and it has been made a question whether this is the sediment of the blood of the martyr buried there or of some other substance. There are even some vessels inscribed SANGVIS, or SANG, or SA (Aringhi, Rom. Subt. t. i. p. 499); but De Rossi, Garrucci, and Martigny (Dict. p. 592 q. r.) are agreed that they are forgeries. These, however, do not necessarily prove that the substance found in genuine glass vessels is never in any case blood; and according to Martigny, the chemical researches of Broglia in 1845, supposed that he wrote in the 8th century; if this were so, the invention may have been before 800; but it is now generally admitted that his age must be later: Labarte thinks that he probably lived in the 12th century. His Dictionnaire des arts Schedula does not speak of the art of glass as being a new invention. See Labarte u. s. pp. 48-51.

and others, have shewn that at the bottom of glass vessels found in Christian tombs at Milau blood is still to be recognised. Without impugning the honesty or the correctness of these researches, although as regards the latter it would be satisfactory if some confirmatory evidence should be discovered, it is allowable to suppose that the usual unguents (or perhaps wine) may have been contained in other of these vessels. The early Christians also employed glass as one of the materials for chalices.⁴ See CHALICE. Their most remarkable glass vessels, however, are those which have figures in gold leaf inside their flat bases; and these have hitherto been found almost exclusively in the Roman catacombs, and are generally considered to have been made in Rome alone. Of these some (about thirty) are in the British Museum, a smaller number in Paris, a few others in various Italian museums and in private continental and English collections, more particularly that of Mr. Wilshire; from which last the South Kensington Loan Court, and the Leeds Art Exhibition in 1868, having been largely enriched, these curious relics have become tolerably familiar to many of our countrymen. It is, however, in the Kircherian Museum and in that of the Propaganda, and above all, in the Vatican at Rome, that the greatest number are preserved. From these various sources, and from the works of Aringhi, Buonarrotti, Boldetti, &c., Padre Garrucci drew up his great work on the subject, entitled Vasi ornati di figure in oro, fol. with 42 plates, comprising figures of about 320 specimens; many, however, being quite fragmentary and of little value. The first edition appeared in Rome in 1858, the second (much enlarged) in 1864. As nearly all that is known of them is contained in this one work, which has been also used in illustration of various articles in this Dictionary, a somewhat slight notice may suffice for this place. The greater part of these glasses are manifestly the bottoms of drinking cups (the inscriptions on many of them implying as much), some few have been plates. "Their peculiarity," say Messrs. Northcote and Brownlow, "consists in a design having been executed in gold leaf on the flat bottom of the cup, in such a manner as that the figures and letters should be seen from the inside. . . . The gold leaf was protected by a plate of glass which was welded by fire, so as to form one solid mass with the cup. These cups, like the other articles found in the catacombs, were stuck into the strata cement of the newly closed grave; and the double glass bottom imbedded in the plaster has resisted the action of time, while the thinner portion of the cup, exposed to accident and decay by standing out from the plaster, has in almost every instance perished. Boldetti informs us that he found two or three cups entire, and his representation of one of them is given in Padre Garrucci's work, t. xxxix. 7, 7^b" (Roma Sotterranea, p. 278).

⁵ About twenty others are described only; the genuineness of some of them is suspected.

Without impairing the correctness of these as regards the latter it is, if some confirmatory evidence, it is allowable to all unguents (or perhaps contained in other of these Christians also employed materials for chalices.⁴ See remarkable glass vessels, which have figures in gold leaf; and these have hitherto exclusively in the Roman generally considered to have one. As down of them is contained in ch has been also used in illustrations in this Dictionary, notice may suffice for the part of these glasses are bottoms of drinking cups (the of them implying as much), in plates. † Sacro Catino di Genova, taken by the area in 1101, made of glass (now a single emerald) has been fabled to be a single emerald) has been fabled to be the Saviour's Last Supper, but although very ancient, its history is quite account of it is given in Murray's Book Italy, under "Genoa." † Others are described only; the genuine is suspected.

The cup, whose figure is referred to, is a species of cylix, with two small handles (their bases being recurved) at the sides, without a stem: upon its flat bottom are two three-quarter-length figures in a medallion, inscribed PETRVS, PAVLVS, the two apostles who, above all persons, are by far the most frequently represented in the glass of the catacombs. Garrucci figures a fragment of another vessel with channelled ribs, which must have been nearly of the shape of our tumblers (t. xxxvii. f. 9, b). He thinks that others must have been in the form of a half-egg (Pref. p. vii.). Many of the medallions found in the catacombs are of very small size, little more than an inch in diameter; these were long supposed to be centres of the bottoms of small drinking-cups, but the discovery in 1864 and 1865 of two flat gilded glass plates at Cologne (both broken) has revealed their real character.

On one of these plates, found near the church of St. Severinus, about 10 inches in diameter, made of clear glass, were "inserted, while in a state of fusion, a number of small medallions of green glass exactly similar to those found in Rome, and which together form a series of scriptural subjects." These medallions being of double glass

¹ The pattern found near the church of St. Ursula differs from the other discovered two years before, in having the subjects depicted in gold and colours on the surface of the glass instead of being within medallions of double glass. The drawing is also of a better style of art. It is now in the Sibde Collection" (Brownlow and Northcote, u. s. p. 277, 284; figured in Catalogue of Sibde Collection, p. 60). The subjects represented on this glass are Moses at the Red Sea, Jonah, Daniel in the lions' den, the three children in the fiery furnace, the sacrifice of Isaac, the Nativity, and the healing of the man sick of the palsy.

² A figure of the two fragments of this plate is given by Messrs. Brownlow and Northcote, u. s. p. 290. They have resisted the ravages of time and accidents, which have destroyed the more thin and fragile glass of the patena. De Rossi has seen in the plaster of local in the catacombs the impression of large plates of this description, which have probably perished in the attempt to detach them from the cement" (Brownlow and Northcote, u. s. p. 291).

The cups, whose bottoms (or parts of them) now remain, were of various dimensions; the largest hitherto found have medallions of about five inches in diameter, others are about half that size: around the painted part there was a margin of plain glass. Sometimes, but very rarely as it would seem, the side of the cup as well as the bottom was ornamented with figures in gold leaf. Garrucci figures one fragment of such a side which is preserved in the Kircherian Museum³ (t. xxxix. f. 9). The figures on the gold leaf were rendered more distinct by edging the outlines and other parts with dark lines; and other colours as green, white, and red of various tints were sparingly introduced: also on the outside of the glass bottoms various colours are found, especially azure, also green, violet, indigo, and crimson (Garrucci, Pref. p. vii.).⁴

The subjects represented on these glasses may now be considered. A few of them are taken from the classical mythology or represent secular subjects, whether games or trades, and these may probably not have been the works of Christian artists at all.⁵ It is indeed an unexplained contain twenty medallions. Eight of these have only a star in the centre. Three others appear to have the three children in the Babylonian furnace, one figure in such medallion. Four others have the history of Jonah in as many parts—in the ship; under the gourd; swallowed by the whale; and vomited out by the same. Another gives Adam and Eve, the serpent round the tree being between them. The interpretation of the others is less certain. One has a figure holding a rod, which is supposed to be the Saviour; probably another medallion contained Lazarus. It is in the possession of Mr. Peyss of Cologne. See De Rossi, Bull. Arch. Crit. 1864, pp. 80-91, and a beautiful figure in gold and colour.

⁴ The figures in Garrucci's work are uncoloured, at least no coloured copy has been seen by the writer. In Messrs. Brownlow and Northcote's work, so often laid under contribution, are two beautiful plates (xvii. and xviii.) shewing the pale bluish colour of the glass and the pencilling of the gold leaf with deep green. Martigny gives examples of the use of colour in the following specimens, figured by Perret, vol. iv. Purple in bands on the drapery (pl. xxxiii. 114); green in the sea-waves (xxix. 76); flesh-colour in the face of the Saviour (xxviii. 102). Silver is occasionally used for white garments and the bandages of a corpse (Lazarus). In other cases we have gold or silver figures on an azure ground (ibid. p. 278).

⁵ Garrucci and Wiseman consider this art to have been exercised by the Christians alone; but this is both primæ facie improbable and does not very well accord with the existence of pagan types on some specimens "such as no Christian artist of the early æra would ever have thought of depicting," being wholly incapable of any Christian adaptation. See Brownlow and Northcote, u. s. p. 274. It must be confessed, however, that Garrucci (pref. p. xiv.) is able to refer to a silver caelée bearing Christian elements and also a triton and a herald; as well as to Sidonius

It will now probably be thought sufficient to indicate briefly the subjects from the Old Testament including the Apocrypha and from the New, which can be recognised with certainty or probability upon these glasses, excluding those on the Cologne fragments. They are all contained in the first eight plates of Garrucci's work, but are here set down nearly in their Biblical order. Adam and Eve; Noah in the Ark; Sacrifice of Isaac; Joseph in the pit (?); Moses striking the rock; Moses lifting up the brazen serpent (?); the candlestick and other instruments of Mosaic worship; the Spies bearing the grapes of Canaan; Joshua commanding the Sun to stand still (?); Jonah's history (in several parts); the Three Children in Nebu-chadnezzar's furnace; Daniel and the Lions; Daniel destroying the Dragon; Susannah and the Elders (?); Tobit and the Fish.

The Wise Men offering gifts (?); Christ turning water into wine; Christ healing the sick of the palsy; Christ multiplying the seven loaves; Christ raising Lazarus; Christ as the Good Shepherd.

The chrisma or monogram of Christ is also of frequent occurrence, sometimes in connection with Saints, sometimes interposed between a husband and wife, sometimes between a and ω (serv. i. vii. xi. xiv. xvii. xx. xxv. xxvi. xxix. xxiii.).

The only representation of the Crucifixion (t. xi. 1) is considered to be false.

"The Blessed Virgin is represented sometimes alone, with her name (MARIA) over her head, praying between two olive-trees, sometimes with the apostles Peter and Paul on either side of her; sometimes accompanied by the virgin martyr St. Agnes" (Brownlow and Northcote, u. s.
p. 289). The apostles most frequently represented (on more than seventy glasses) are St.
Peter and St. Paul, their names being added; sometimes singly, more often conjointly. "The two apostles are represented side by side, sometimes standing, sometimes seated. In some instances Christ is represented in the air . . . holding over the head of each a crown of victory; or in other instances a single crown is suspended between the two, as if to show that in their death they were not divided. This crown becomes sometimes a circle surrounding the labarum or chrisma, which is often supported on a pillar, thus symbolising 'the pillar and ground of the truth'" (Brownlow and Northcote, u. s. p. 285).^a We have also single

^a These learned writers try to persuade themselves that these glasses give us real portraits of the apostles, "excepting a few which are of very inferior execution." They rely principally on their resemblance to a brnze medal said to have been found in the cemetery of Domitilla, now in the Vatican, of which they give a beautiful figure (pl. xvii), and which they say "has every appearance of having been executed in the time of the Flavian emperors, when Greek art still flourished in Rome." In Rome, who also figures this medal (Bull. Arch. Critic.

examples of the names of John, Thomas, Phillip, and Jude, most probably the apostles; and two or three other names which occur in the New Testament, are also found: Lucas, Silvanus, Timo-theus, Stephen (written Istephanus); these are probably the same persons whose names are mentioned in the New Testament. (For the glasses on which these names occur, see Garrucci's Index,
p. 109.)

There are, besides the persons mentioned in Scripture, a good many others which are of note in ecclesiastical history. St. Agnes occurs more than a dozen times, St. Laurence seven times, and St. Hippolytus four times; the following among others occur less frequently, St. Callis-tus, St. Cyprian, and St. Marcellinus, the last of whom was martyred under Diocletian, A.D. 304 (see Garrucci's Index, as above). Besides these, many other proper names, probably of the possessor, occur either along with their miniatures or without them (see Garrucci's Index, as before).
There is nothing which deserves to be called a real portrait in any of these representations, which are mostly, perhaps all, executed in the debased style of the 4th century; and as the saints have no emblems attached their figures have but little interest. We have also on these glasses scenes of domestic Christian life—married life, and family life. The occurrence of the chrisma makes their Christian character certain: where this or the name of Christ or God does not occur, it is rash to say anything definite (Garrucci, tabv. xxvi.—xxxix.).

A few more words may suffice for the inscriptions. The acclamations, of which several specimens have been given, are mostly of a convivial character, and either in Greek (rarely), or in Latin (most usually), or in a mixture of the two (not infrequently); none of them at all favour the supposition that they were used as chalices. Other acclamations, as VIVATIS IN DEO; and MARTYRA EFFICETE VIVATIS, express good wishes to the married couple (id. t. xxvi. 11, 12).
On a very few of the glasses we have, as it appears, invocations of saints or legends which acknowledge their patronage. Thus a broken fragment has PETRVS PROTEG; whether any letters followed, it is impossible to say: the word may either be protegit or protegit or even protege (id. t. x. f. 1). Another fine but men-fragment exhibits the Saviour (apparently) with the chrisma and the α and ω , bearing a Latin cross with legend, . . . ANE (Salviane, or some other proper name) VIVAS IN CN[ISTO ET] LAV- RENTIO (id. t. xx. f. 1). Another (u. s. f. 2), which is also broken, but slightly, has VITO (or perhaps VICTOR) [VIVAS IN NOMINE LAVRETI (for Lau- renti)]. The inscription PETRVS, written in two instances against Moses striking the rock (id. t. 1

Nov. 1861), thinks it is of the second or third century.
Notwithstanding these high but somewhat discordant authorities, the writer ventures to express his own strong suspicion that the style of the metal bespeaks the age of the Renaissance: it is most probably of the 15th century or thereabouts.

• We give here two or three of this mixed character.
CVM TVIS FELICITER ZESES (Garr. t. xii. 1); DIGNITAS
AMICORVM PIR ZESES CVM TVIS OMNIVS RISIT ET PROPI-PIA (id. t. xii. 2). (Both the above glasses have figures of Peter and Paul, with their names added). On the same plate are other examples of bilingual redundancy: such as—VIVAS PIR ZESES, VIVAS CVM TVIS ZESES.

2. 9; Brownlow and Northcote, u. s. p. xvii. 2, and p. 287.) is also of some theological importance as indicating that Peter was then looked upon as the Moses of the new Israel of God, as Prudentius speaks. The honour, however, appears to be divided between Peter and Paul on another glass, unfortunately mutilated. Christ stands on a hill between Peter and Paul. Above is the common legend PIE ZEVES; below are the words IERSVALE. IORDANES. BECELE (for Bethlehem, C. - Ø?). Peter is here the apostle (for the Jews, Paul of the Gentiles, who first worshipped the Saviour at Bethlehem. Below are sheep adoring the Lamb on a hill between them, sheep adoring both churches (Garrucci, t. x. f. 8.)

The orthography of the legends is sometimes barbarous. This Jesus is written ZESVS (viii. 5); ZESVS (vii. 17), &c. CHRISTVS is spelt CHRISTVS (viii. 2); HIPPOLVTVS, EPHOCIVS becomes TIMOTHEVS (xvii. 2); HIPPOLVTVS, EPHOCIVS (xix. 7), or IPOLVTVS (xv. 5); CYPRIVANVS (xix. 6); SYCVINVS, TZVCINVS (xxviii. 6); SEVERE, SRBERE (xxix. 5); PHILIPPVS, FILVVS (xv. 6). We have also BIVAS for VIVAS (vi. 7); VIVATVS for VIVATVS (xxix. 4); IN PACE for IN PACE (vii. 2, xv. 3); PIE for PIE

The Adoration of the Saviour. (Garrucci.)

(l. 3, &c.); PIEZ for PIVS (xxvi. 10). There are a few other instances of similar orthographic changes, to say nothing of such blunders as DIGNITIVS for DIGNITAS, and CRITVVS for CRISTVS (Christus) (Garr. p. 53).

The dates of these works are defined to some extent by their subjects. On one of them (xxiii. 5) a heap of money is depicted, among which we recognise the coins of Caracalla and one of the Faustinas. On another, as has been said, occurs the name of Marcellinus, probably the bishop of Rome, martyred A.D. 304. The martyrdom of St. Agnes, who is so often represented, probably took place about the same time. The appearance of the dress, arrangement of the hair, and of the general art and orthography induces Garrucci (Prof. p. ix.) to consider them all anterior to Theodosius (A.D. 380). De Rossi attempts a Garrucci lays stress on this orthography for fixing the date: "questa maniera di scrittura costantemente al secolo quarto" (prof. p. ix.). He appears to consider that these glasses all belong to that century.

The martyrdoms of Vincentius and of Genesius, whose names singularly occur, also took place under Diocletian (Garrucci, prof. pp. viii. ix.).

more precise limitation, and thinks that they range from the middle of the 3rd to the beginning of the 4th century (Brownlow and Northcote, u. s. p. 279). We shall probably be not far wrong in saying that few or none of them are much earlier or later than the 4th century. The art of the coins of that century, as well as of the MS. illuminations which are assigned to about the same age, strongly remind us of these glasses, more especially of those on which the chrisma is depicted. The execution of some glasses is indeed better than that of others, and occasionally reaches considerable excellence; but to speak generally, they belong to a period in which taste and vigour and correctness of drawing have sensibly declined. They possess, however, apart from their main subjects, much interest as showing the styles of borders and other ornamentations then prevalent, besides giving costume and a variety of domestic objects.

With regard to the uses of these glasses a consideration of the types, coupled with the inscriptions, will lead us to secure conclusions. Even if it were well established that in Tertullian's

Mr. Marriot (Testim. of the Catacombs, p. 16), after observing that "these glasses with few exceptions, belong to a period of very degraded art," considers that "there are very strong reasons, for assigning many of them to the use of the nimbus," in reference to the 6th century. But if these glasses were found in the catacombs, it is hardly possible to place any of them later than the first quarter of the 5th century: after the year 410 no inscriptions occur in the catacombs, and they have become rarer and rarer from the beginning of the last quarter of the 4th century. See Inscriptions of the last quarter of the 4th century, in Ann. Hist. It is true that "Pope's Symmachus Vigilius and his ill did their best to repair the damage towards and others" in restoring the inscriptions of Pope Damasus, but they would scarcely have replaced the glass vessels which had been stuck into the cement which closed the graves. See Brownlow and Northcote, u. s. p. 170.

The chrisma with the a and s (xxix. 1) is identical in treatment with the same types upon the coins of Constantius II., Magnentius, and Decentius. And this monogram, whenever it occurs, with scarcely an exception (see, however, xvii. 7, where the general style and art differ also), is of the same form (P) that is usual on the coins of the fourth century: another form (Q) is said to occur on a coin of Licinius Jun. (Garrucci, Numism. Constantinian. p. 102; appendix to his Vetri Ornati).

Martigny observes that those of the best work (including the Good Shepherd, Garr. vii. 1, reproduced here, which is perhaps the best executed of all and the oldest) have Greek legends, being probably the work of Greek artists (Dict. p. 279).

It is altogether certain that calices are chalice for the communion? St. Ambrose speaks of those "qui calices ad sepulchra martyrum deferunt atque illic in vesperam bibunt" (De obseq. et sac. potest.). If not, it is alluding to that Tertullian is alluding to some such glasses as these: but scarcely any which remain to us can be so early as A.D. 200. Chrysostom (Hom. in S. Mel.) says that the portrait of Meletius was depicted in κεράματα and φύλλα; such vessels may possibly have been similar to those of which we have specimens; if so, the art will probably be Asiatic as well as European. We have indeed a bottom of a small glass vessel which simply reads MELETI (for Meletis probably) IN LOIS ANIMA (xxviii. 4): yet this can hardly be the same person; it may be a present from a parent to a child, or the like. The remark of Cardinal Wiseman appears to be well founded, that "not a single author, certainly not a single profane author, mentions the in golden characters the word in two lines, enclosed in a parallelogram and a crenulated outer margin. He regards it as a "concise expression of the charity which should unite all men" (Insc. Chrét. de la Grèce, vol. i. p. 43, with a figure). The British Museum and the French Collection contain various other Christian works in this material, some of which are more or less similar to those which have been already described, or to the Byzantine piece named under GEMS; but as they are of uncertain date (perhaps none of them being earlier than the 9th century, while some may probably be much later) they need hardly be mentioned here.

(v.) Mosaics.—Glass, in fine, was employed from very early times in the construction of mosaics. The cubes were sometimes coloured; sometimes, in the ages of the Lower Empire, underlaid with a ground of gold or silver leaf, "by this means shedding over the large works of the artists in mosaic a splendour before unknown" (Labarte, u. s. p. 94). See MOSAICS.

GLEBE. The word Gleba is used for a farm or estate in the Theodosian Codex (Leg. 72, De Decurion.); but the technical sense in which it is used by English writers, to designate certain lands belonging to an ecclesiastical benefice, is later than our period. See ENDOWMENT, PROPERTY OF THE CHURCH.

GLORIA. [NIMBUS.]

GLORIA IN EXCELSIS. There is considerable difficulty in tracing out the history of this hymn, because at one period both it and the SANCTUS were entitled indiscriminately Hymnus Angelicus. In later years the latter is called Hymnus Seraphicus; whilst the title Hymnus Angelicus or Hymnus Angelorum is confined to the former. The hymn is found in various forms.

1. We have simply the words of St. Luke, ii. 14. This is of course the primitive form, everything that has been added to it having been composed,—as the 4th council of Toledo (A.D. 633, Mansi, x. 623) reminds us,—by the ecclesiastical doctors. For this reason the council would not allow any expanded form to be sung in the churches. In this short form the words were recited by the priest, according to the liturgy of St. James, when the priest "sealed" the gifts. (Daniel, Codex Liturgicus, iv. 103.) The same simple form may be seen elsewhere: and is continued to this day in the morning service of the Horology (p. 35, ed. Venice, 1870).

2. The seventh book of the Apostolic Constitutions, c. 47, contains an enlarged form of the hymn,—without any introduction in the oldest manuscript; but two, of the 14th and 16th century respectively, entitle the chapter "Morning Prayer." (Lagarde, p. 229.) This version has a peculiar reading: "We worship Thee through the great High Priest, Thee who art one God, unbegotten, alone, inapproachable." We read "O Lord, only begotten Son, Jesus Christ, and Holy Spirit." The hymn ends "Thou only art holy, Thou only art Lord, Jesus Christ, to the glory of God the Father. Amen."

3. The treatise which is ascribed to Athanasius "de Virginitate" (Migne, xxviii. 251) is undoubtedly spurious, but it gives some insight into the life of a Greek virgin, within our chronological limits. In § 20 (Migne, ut sup. 275) we read "In the morning, say the Psalm O God, my God, early will I seek Thee (Psalm lxxi). At dawn, the 'Benedicite' and Glory to God in the Highest, and the rest." This is the reading of the Basle and English MSS. But others proceed with the first three clauses: "We hymn Thee, we bless Thee, we worship Thee, and the rest." As this difference of the text may be due to a late interpolation, we are left in uncertainty as to the words of the hymn when this treatise was composed. (Mr. Palmer, Orig. Liturg. ii. 138 does not note the doubts regarding this passage.)

4. The famous Codex Alexandrinus in the British Museum, of the close of the 5th century, puts some of our doubts at rest. This manuscript, after the psalms, contains the thirteen canticles of the Greek church: i. the song of Moses in Exodus; ii. ditto in Deuteronomy; iii. the prayer of Hannah; iv. prayer of Isaiah (xxvi. 9-20); v. prayer of Jonah; vi. of Habakkuk; vii. of Hezekiah (Isaiah, xxxiii.); viii. of Manasseh; ix. prayer of the three children (εὐλόγητος, Daniel iii. 28); x. hymn of the three children (our Benedicite) entitled "Hymn of our fathers;" xi. prayer of Mary, the Mother of God; xii. of Symeon; xiii. of Zachariah (compare CANTICLES). These conclude with the Gloria in Excelsis in Greek, the hymn being entitled Ἕμνος ἐξουθενός. This version has been often printed, as by Usher, in his tract De symeonis Romano; Bunsen, Anecdota anto-Nicena, iii. 8; Dr. Campion, Interleaved Prayer Book, 1873, p. 321. It differs slightly from the version of the Apostolic Constitutions, and proceeds with words which distinctively mark it as a morning hymn, some of which words have passed into our Te Deum. It is thus found in the beautiful Zurich psalter reprinted by Tischendorf in his Monumenta Sacra, and in other great psalters; and in a form very nearly resembling this, it is met in the Greek communion to this day (Horology, ut sup. pp. 69, 70).

5. A Latin translation of this Greek version of the "Gloria in Excelsis," adapted for evening prayer, is contained in the book of hymns of the ancient Irish church, which once belonged to Archbishop Usher, and which has been edited by the Irish Archaeological and Celtic Society by Dr. Todd (part ii. p. 179). In the famous Bezae antiphony discovered at Milan by Muratori, and reprinted imperfectly by him in his Anecdota, tom. iv. pp. 121, &c. (see Migne, tom. 72) it and at the very end "ad vesperum et ad matutium: Gloria In Excelsis Deo et in terra pax &c." but Muratori unhappily did not copy it out. Thus we are ignorant of the text. However, the hymn given by Thomasius (Psalterium cum antiochia, Rom. 1697, p. 76), or Oper. tom. iii. p. 613) as the Hymnus Anselmi of the Ambrosian Breviary, is another and independent translation of the Greek form of the hymn. It was directed to be used daily at matins.

6. Thus it seems clear that when the well known Latin form of the hymn was inserted in the Latin psalters, it was used in the daily or weekly hour services of the clergy. We have additional evidence of this in the rule of Caesarius, c. xxi. and in that of Aurelianus. It is there ordered to be used at matins on Sundays.

7. This Latin form Bunsen considered to have been as old as Hilary of Poitiers, to whom indeed Aleuin ascribed the additions to the scripture words. The Roman Catholic ritualists are not satisfied with the testimony of Aleuin, and seem to consider that the hymn in the modern Latin form is of more recent origin. Yet it is found in this form in a very interesting manuscript in the British Museum—Royal 2 A xx.—which is of the eighth century: in the famous Codex Bobiensis, from which Mabillon extracted the "Sacramentarium Gallicanum" (Museum Italicum, i. 273; Muratori, Liturg. Rom. Vet. ii. 776; or Migne, 72, p. 455): in the so-called Mozarabic liturgy ascribed to St. Isidore (see Migne, 85, p. 531) and in a form very slightly different in the Gothic breviary (Migne, 86, p. 888).

8. The first introduction of the "Gloria in Excelsis" into the Eucharistic service has been ascribed to Telesphorus, but no confidence can be placed in the tradition. The sacramentary of Gregory directed that a bishop might use the "Gloria in Excelsis" on all Sundays and festivals: a presbyter only at Easter. This rule continued long in the Roman church, and constituted one point of difference between the Roman and Gallican churches, in the latter of which no such difference between bishop and presbyter had been observed. Etherius and Beatus shew that in Spain they always sang it on Sundays and festivals; but they quote only the scriptural words, and if we bear in mind the decree of Toledo, we may suppose that only these words were used (the Mozarabic liturgy shews many marks of interpolations). In the liturgies the hymn was generally sung at the commencement of the service; but Mr. Palmer notes that in the Gallican sacramentary (see above) it was used amongst the thanksgivings after communion.

9. The absence of the hymn from St. Germain's account of the Gallican liturgy has been noted. He says that the words at the end of the gospel, "Glory be to Thee O Lord," were uttered in imitation (?) of the angels' words "Glory to God in the highest" (clamantibus clericis Gloria tibi Domine in specie angelorum qui nascente Domino Gloria in excelsis pastoribus apparentibus cecinerunt. Migne, 72, p. 91). St. Germain died about the year 585 or 587. This seems to give a superior limit to its introduction into the eucharistic service.

10. It is worthy of notice that whilst the Alexandrine manuscript has in the text of St. CHRIST. ANT.

Luke εὐδοκίας (the reading of N* P* D) yet in the morning hymn it as well as all the other copies of the hymn read εὐδοκία. [C. A. S.]

GLORIA PATRI [DOXOLOGIA.]

6. GLOVES. (χειροσθῆναι: Chirotheca, Gantus, Gwantus, Vantus, Wantus, Wanto.) It would seem that gloves in the strict sense of the word were unknown to the early Greeks and Romans. (See on this point Casaubon's Animadv. in Athenæum, xii. 2.) That they were in use, however, among the ancient Persians appears from Xenophon (Cyropaedia, viii. 8. 17). The European custom of wearing them seems to have originated with the German nations, as the Teutonic origin of the common Latin word for them clearly shews; and although, as an ecclesiastical vestment, properly so called, gloves do not appear till the 12th century (the first extant mention of them in that character being in Honorius Augustodunensis, ob. circa 1152 A.D.), they had been used for centuries in articles of practical convenience. Thus we find them mentioned in the life of St. Columbanus, by Jonas Bobbiensis (formerly included among the works of Bede)—"tegmentum manuum quae Galli wantos vocant" (Vita S. Columbani, c. 25; Patrol. lxxxvii. 1026). In the above instance, the gloves are spoken of as used "ad operum laboris," but sometimes they were obviously of a costly nature, for in the will of Riculfus, bishop of Helena (ob. 915 A.D.), in a long list of valuable articles, he mentions "annulum aureum unum cum gemmis pretiosis et vnanctos parianum" (Patrol. cxxii. 468).

The employment of a glove in connection with the granting or bequeathing of land, is a custom which hardly falls within our present limits: an example may, however, be given. (See Notgeri Leodiensis [ob. 1008 A.D.] Vita S. Hadilini, c. 10; Patrol. cxxxix. 1146; also Martene, Anecd. i. 57.) For further early references to the subject of gloves, see Ducange's Glossarium, s. vv.

GOD THE FATHER, REPRESENTATIONS OF.

For the first four centuries, at least, no attempt was made at representing the actual Presence of the First Person of the Trinity. It was indicated invariably by the symbolic HAND proceeding from a cloud. Martigny quotes the words of St. Augustine (Epist. cxlviii. 4), "Quum audimus manus, operationem intelligere debemus," from which it would seem that the great father saw a tendency to anthropomorphic mis-application of the words hand and eye, or ear of God, as they are frequently used in the Old Testament. The distinction between analogy and similitude has been so often neglected, that bodily parts as well as passions (like those of anger, repentance, &c.) are often attributed to the incorporeal and infinite being. This has been repeatedly noticed, as (c. g.) by Drs. Whately and Mansel. St. Augustine's expressions show that he was thoroughly awake to the misconception, and consequent irreverence, involved in the forgetful use of such terms as the Divine hand or eye for the Divine power or knowledge. "Quidquid," he says, "dum ista cogitas, corporee similitudinis occurrerit, abige, abnege, nega, respice, fuge."

* Most representations of the living presence have their proper place under the word TETRART.

The symbolic hand appears in Christian representations of several subjects from the Old Testament, principally connected with events in the lives of Abraham and Moses. The two are found corresponding to each other in Bottari (Sculture e Pitt. sigre, vol. i. tav. 27; also i. tav. 89). Moses is receiving the book of the law in i. tav. 128. Elsewhere Abraham is alone (vol. ii. tav. 59, and i. tav. 33, from the Callixtine catacomb). In vol. iii. 37 (from cemetery of St. Agnes), the Deity appears to be represented in human form. He is delivering to Adam and Eve respectively the ears of corn and the lamb, as tokens of the labours of their fallow state, and their sentence to "delve and spin." See also Buonarrotti, p. 1. Cardinal Bosio, and latterly M. Perret (vol. i. 57 pl.), give a copy of a painting of Moses striking the rock, and also in the act of loosening the shoe from his foot. Ciampini's plates (Vol. Mon. t. ii. pp. 81, tav. xxiv. also tavv. xvii. and xx. tav. xvii. D.) are important illustrations of this symbol, more especially those of the mosaic of the Transfiguration in St. Apollinaris in Classe, and of the Sacrifice of Isaac in St. Vitale. The author does not find the hand as representing the First Person of the Trinity in pictures of the baptism of our Lord; but it probably occurs in that connexion.

The hand proceeding from clouds appears in the Sacramentary written for Drogon bishop of Metz, and son of Charlemagne, above the Canon of the Mass.

The Creator is represented in the MS. of Aquino. See Westwood's Palaographia Sacra. [R. St. J. T.]

GOLDEN NUMBER. [EASTER.]

GOOD FRIDAY. The anniversary of Christ's Passion and Death was from very early times observed with great solemnity by the church. It was known by various names, ἡμέρα τοῦ σταυροῦ, σαρπηλία, or τὰ σωτήρια; πάσχα σταυρώσεως, in contrast to πάσχα ἀναστάσεως, Easter Day; or, adopting the Jewish designation (Joh. xix. 14, 31, 42), καρσάκευθ, either alone, or with the adjectives μεγάλη, or ἁγία: in the Latin church Parascove, Feria Sexta in Parascove (Antiphonar. Gregor.), Sexta Feria Major, in Hierusalem (Sacramentar. Gregor.). The day was observed as a strict fast, which was continued by those who could endure it to beyond midnight on the following day (Apost. Constit. v. 18). The fourth council of Toledo, A.D. 633, severely condemned those who ended their fast on this day at 3 P.M. and then indulged in feasting, and ordered that all save the very young and the very old and the sick should abstain from all food till after the services of the day were concluded. All who refused obedience to this rule were denied a participation in the Paschal Eucharist (can. viii.; Labbe, Concil. v. 1707). Not food alone, but the use of oil and the bath were forbidden by a canon of Gangra (Nomocanon, can. 434, apud Coteler. Eccl. Græc. Monum. i. 138) with the indignant apostrophe, Ὁ Χριστὸς ἐν τῷ σταυρῷ καὶ οὐ ἐν τῷ βαλανείῳ; In process of time the day came to be distinguished by a peculiar ritual and customs marking the solemn character of the day. The bells were silent from the midnight of Wednesday (Ordo Roman. apud Muratori, ii. 714). The kiss of peace was prohibited (Tert. de Ord. 18). The altar was stripped of its ornaments, and even of its covering. The processions were without chanting (Sacram. Gelas. Muratori i. 559). The lamps and candles were gradually extinguished during matins (Ordo Roman. u. s.). A long series of intercessory collects was used. A cross was erected in front of the altar, blessed, and adored (Sacram. Gelas. u. s.). There was no consecration of the Lord's Supper, but the reserved eucharist of the previous day was partaken of by the faithful.

This communion subsequently received the name of "the Mass of the Presanctified," Massa Presanctificatum, but incorrectly, the term Missal usually implying consecration. Thus Amalaricus states that on Good Friday "the mass is not celebrated" (de Eccl. Offic. iv. 20; Rah. Manr. de Instit. Cler. ii. 37; pseudo-Alcuin, Hittorp col. 251). The reason of this prohibition of celebration is evident. The eucharist being the highest Christian feast, was deemed out of harmony with the penitential character of the day, for "how," says Balsamon (Beræg. Panlect. i. 219), "can one mourn and rejoice at the same time?" As early as the council of Laodicea, c. A.D. 365, this prohibition was extended to the whole of Lent, with the exception of Saturdays and Sundays (can. 49; Labbe Concil. i. 1506). In the letter to Decree attributed to Innocent I. c. A.D. 402, but probably written to be placed so early, the restriction was limited to Good Friday and Easter Eve, on which days the tradition of the church was that the sacraments were not to be celebrated at all; "isto die sacramenta penitus non celebrari" (Labbe Concil. ii. 1246). At this period there was no communion of any kind on Good Friday. How early the natural desire to receive the sacrament of the Lord's Body and Blood on the day when it was offered for us on the cross, led to the reservation of the previously consecrated elements for the purpose of communion, we have no certain knowledge. It is evident from a decree of the 4th council of Toledo, A.D. 633, that in the first half of the seventh century, there was no celebration of the Lord's Supper on Good Friday in Spain. At that time it was a wide-spread custom, which the council condemned, to keep the doors of the churches closed on Good Friday, so that there was no divine service, nor any preaching of the Passion to the people. The council ordained that the Lord's death should be preached on that day, and that the people should pray for the pardon of their sins, that so they might be better fitted to celebrate the resurrection and partake of the eucharist at Easter (can. viii. Labbe Concil. v. 1707). We learn also from the acts of the 16th council, held sixty years later, A.D. 680, that on that day "the altars were stripped and no one was permitted to celebrate mass" (Jb. ii.

1355). In the Greek church the custom of communicating in the previously consecrated elements was established before the middle of the seventh century, for we find it mentioned as a general practice during the whole of Lent, in the acts of the Trullan (or Quinlsex) council A.D. 692 (can. 52, Labbe vi. 1165). It first appears in the West in the Regula Magistri, a monastic rule compiled probably in the seventh century, printed by Broekie (Codex Regul. I. li.
p. 269). It was established in Rome before the end of the eighth century, when the ritual of Good Friday is prescribed in the Ordo Romanus (Muratori Liturg. Rom. Vet. li. 995). The observance of Good Friday commenced at midnight, when all rose for service. Nine Psalms were said with their responses, these were followed by three lectures from the Lamentations, commencing Lam. li. 8, "Cogitavit Dominus dissipare;" three from the Tractatus of St. Augustine on Psalm 53, and three from the Epistle to the Hebrews, beginning c. iv. 11, "Festinus ergo &c." Martin follows, during which the lights in the church were gradually extinguished, beginning at the entrance, until by the end of the third nocturn only the seven lamps burning at the altar were left alight. These were also put out, one by one, alternately right and left at the commencement of each Psalm, the middle lamp, the last left burning, being extinguished at the gospel. At the third hour all the presbyters and clergy of the city assembled in expectation of the pontiff. On his arrival the subdeacon commenced the lecture from Hosea v. 15, "Hae-licit Dominus Deus; In tribulatione sua, &c." Martin then was sung as an antiphon Hab. iii. 1-3, "Domine auidi, &c." After some prayers said by the pontiff and the second lecture, Exod. xii. 1,
 "In diebus illis dixit Dominus ad Moysen et Aaron, &c." Px. xci. or xli. was sung, and the Passion according to St. John was recited by the deacon. This over, two deacons strip the altar of the white linen cloth, previously put on "sub evangelio," in a stealthy manner, "in modum furantis." The pontiff came before the altar and recited a series of eighteen prayers, a portion of which form the basis of the Good Friday collects of the church of England.
 The first and last collect stand alone. The other sixteen are in pairs. Before each pair the deacon warned the people to kneel and after it to rise.
 "Advocant diaconus flectamus genua; iterum dict levate." These collects are—(1) for the peace and unity of the church; (2) for perseverance in the faith; (3) for the pope and chief bishop (antistes); (4) for the bishops of their dioceses; (5) for all bishops, priests, deacons, sub-deacons, &c.; (6) for all orders of men in the holy church; (7) for the emperor; (8) for the Roman empire; (9) (10) for catechumens; (11) against sickness, famine, pestilence, and other evils; (12) for all in trouble; (13) (14) for heretics and schismatics; (15) (16) for Jews; (17) (18) for pagans and idolaters. A direction is given that the prayers for the Jews are not to be said kneeling. The collects are given in the Sacramentary of Gregory, as printed by Pamelius, and in that of Gelasius, as well as in the old Gallian missal. This last contains the direction to the celebrant "eodem die non salutat (i. e. does not say pax vobiscum), nec psallet." These collects finished, all were to leave the church in silence: the presbyters going to perform the same service in their own churches.

"Adoration of the cross succeeds." The cross is placed a little distance in front of the altar, supported on either side by acolytes. A kneeling stool being placed in front, the pontiff kneels, and adores and kisses the cross, followed by the clergy and people in order. The Ambrosian missal given by Pamelius contains four prayers for the ceremony: "Oratio super crucem;" "Benedictio crucis;" "Oratio ad crucem adorandam;" "Oratio post adoratam crucem." In the Antiphonarium of Gregory also given by Pamelius we have an "Antiphon ad crucem adorandam." The adoration of the cross was followed by the communion of the pre-sanctified. "Two presbyters enter the sacristy or other place in which the Body of the Lord which remained from the previous day was placed, and put it in a paten, and let a subdeacon hold before them a chalice with unconsecrated wine, and another the paten with the Body of the Lord. One presbyter takes the paten, the other the chalice, and they carry and set them on the strip altar" (Orl. Rom. u. s.). The cross is meanwhile saluted by the lady, while the hymn Ecco lignum Crucis is sung, and Ps. exix. recited. The salutation of the cross being completed, the Lord's Prayer is recited, "and when they have said Amen the pontiff takes of the holy thing, and puts it into the chalice saying nothing (nihil dicens), and all communicate cum silentio." The rubrics of the Gelasian Sacramentary agree in the main with the Ordo, except that they speak of the reservation of the Blood as well as of the Body of the Lord, and direct that the reserved sacrament be brought out of the sacristy and set on the altar by deacons instead of presbyters. The adoration of the cross by the clergy succeeds the placing of the consecrated elements on the altar, and is followed by the actual communion (Muratori u. s.
i. 559, sq.) It merits notice that all early authorities prescribe a general communion on Good Friday, "all communicate silently." This custom had entirely ceased in Rome at the beginning of the 9th century (Amalar. de Eccl.
Off. i. 15), and though it lingered for a long time in some parts, it gradually died out in the West, and at the present day in the Roman church no one but the celebrant communicates on Good Friday. The pontiff pronounces peace to them "in the name of the Father, &c." The people answer, "and with thy spirit." "After a little space each says his vespers privately, and so they go to table" (Muratori ii. 995-996). [E. V.]

GOODS, COMMUNITY OF.

The idea that all property should belong to a community and not to individuals may be traced to a very high antiquity. The Pythagorean society is commonly supposed to have been constituted on the basis of a community of goods, though probably only those who had reached the highest grade of the initiated renounced all private possessions (Ritter and Preller, Hist. Phil., p. 58).
 Plato, also, in his imaginary Republic, condemns the institution of private property in the strongest manner, as the source of all greed and meanness; he therefore allows it only to the third and lowest class of his citizens—those who are by nature qualified to seek only low and maternal ends in life, and are consequently excluded from all share in the government of the state. The two higher classes are to live wholly for the state, a condition—the philosopher holds—incompatible with the possession of private property (Politia, iv., p. 421 c ff.; Leges, v. p. 739 n.).

To turn from heathen to Jewish social institutions, Josephus tells us (Bellum Jud. ii. 8, § 3) of the Essenes, that each member on entrance threw his goods into the common stock, so that there was found among them neither poverty nor riches. In like manner the Therapeutae on Lake Moeris had all things in common.

It was while the Therapeutae and Essenes were still flourishing communities that the gospel of Christ was first proclaimed. And here, too, we read of the earlier church of Jerusalem, that they "had all things common" (Acts ii. 44)—a passage which has often served fanatical sects as a justification of their communism. And yet it is clear from the book of the Acts itself that property made over to the community that property made over of a voluntary gift; those who entered the church were not deprived of the right to possess property (Acts v. 4); Ananias was not punished for failing to contribute the whole of his property, but for fraud and lying in pretending to give the whole while he only gave part.

In the apostolic age generally it is past all controversy that nothing like a community of goods existed in the church. The churches are evidently contemplated as containing the same variety of wealth and station as ordinary society; contributions are made of freewill; the rich are charged to "be rich in good works, ready to distribute, willing to communicate;" the cheerful giver is commended (2 Cor. ix. 7; 1 Tim. vi. 17, 18). The disturbed state of the Thessalonians, and their unwillingness to labour while they expected the immediate advent of Christ, had (so far as appears) no connexion with any communistic views. Nor does the testimony of the next age favour the idea that the earliest Christian society was communistic. The writer of the Epistle to Diognetus (c. 5) speaks of a "common table," and no more. Tertullian, indeed (Apolog. c. 39), says, in so many words, that Christians had all things in common except their wives (omnia indiscreta sunt apud nos praeter uxores); but it is evident that this is nothing more than a characteristically violent expression for their mutual love and charity; for in the very same chapter he states expressly, that the contributions of the brethren to the common fund were wholly voluntary (modicam unusquisque stipem menstrua die, vel quum velit, et si modo velit, et si modo possit, apponit). Lactantius (Epit. Div. Instit. c. 38) especially condemns communism as one of the cardinal vices of Plato's Republic, which he would hardly have done if he had supposed the same principle to have animated the first society of believers. The interpretation of Acts ii. 44 as relating to an absolute community of goods seems in fact to have taken its rise from Chrysostom (Hom. xi. in Act. App.). Some writers in modern times have seen in this supposed communism of the early Christians at Jerusalem an indication of an Essene influence. (See against this view Von Wegnern, in Illgen's Zeitschrift xi. 2. p. 1 ff.)

As, however, within the church so strong an expression was given to the duty of mutual love and succour, and of the brotherhood of man in Christ, it could scarcely fail but that here and there enthusiastic sects would exaggerate and develop these principles into absolute renunciation of property. This was in fact the case. During the ecclesiastical troubles in Africa in the 4th century, the Donatists were never weary of reproaching their orthodox opponents with the wealth and power which they derived from their connexion with the state. Some of their own adherents, in consequence of these denunciations, renounced private possessions altogether—a renunciation which led to vagabondage and mendicancy rather than to holiness. These CIRCUMCELLIONS—as they came to be called—became the nucleus of a band of discontented peasants and runaway slaves, whose excesses at last required the forcible interference of the government to put them down. And other sects also rejected the idea of property; the Apotactici or Apostolici, as they arrogantly called themselves (says St. Augustine, De Haeres. c. 40), admitted none into their community who lived with wives or possessed private property (res proprias habentes); and, a common characteristic of heresy, denied salvation to all outside their own sect. The Eustathians also, who were condemned at the council of Gangra about the year 370 (Conc. Gangr. Praef.) held that those who did not give up their private wealth were beyond all hope of salvation. The laws of the empire imposed upon Apotactici the same penalties that were laid upon other heretics, except the confiscation of goods; they could not be deprived of that which they had already renounced (Colect. Theod. lib. xvi. tit. 5, de Heret. li. 7 et 11).

When Pachomius († 348) first drew together into one body [COENONIUM] a number of anchorites and wandering mendicants at Tabenne in Upper Egypt, he instituted a system of organized labour and common participation in the fruits of labour. Stewards [OECONOMI] managed the property of the society for the benefit of the whole, and distributed the excess of income to the poor and needy of the neighbourhood. St. Basil, St. Benedict, and other founders of monastic orders, enjoined the same rule of individual poverty on the members of their societies, and so there arose throughout Christendom, in East and West, religious societies of celibates organized on communistic principles [MONASTICISM]. From the 8th century onward the secular clergy also, who lived the canonical life, adopted, to some extent, the principle of community of goods [CANONICI]. (C.)

THE LITURGICAL. I. In- Among the Jews, certainly from the Maccebes, and probably before, on the Pentateuch and another from the (i. e. from some of the later bito- and from those more properly called prophetical) were read in the synagogues every sabbath day. Fifty-four portions from the Pentateuch (colled Parashioth), and as many from the "Prophets" (Hapthoroth), were appointed for this purpose. As the Jews intercalated a month every second or third year, this number was required. When there were not fifty-four sabbaths in a year, they read two of the shorter lessons together, once or twice in the year, as might be necessary; so that the whole of both selections was read through annually. The Parashioth are generally very long, some extending over four or five chapters; but the Hapthoroth are as a rule short, often only a part of one chapter. Tables of both may be seen in Horne's Introduction to the Scriptures, p. iii. ch. i. sect. iv. The foregoing facts will enable the reader to judge how far the first Christians were indebted to the traditions of the synagogue for the practice of reading Holy Scripture in their synaaks, and for the method of reading it. At all events we may be certain that the Old Testament, so long the only known repository of the "oracles of God," and still acknowledged to be "able to make men wise unto salvation through faith which is in Christ Jesus" (2 Tim. iii. 15), would be no more neglected in their common exercises of religion than it was in their private study. At the same time it was inevitable that, when the New Testament came to be written, lessons from that should be read either in addition to or instead of those from the Old. There was, however, a short period during which the Old Testament only would be read in Christian assemblies, viz. before the events of the Gospel were committed to writing; and there is in the most ancient liturgy, that of St. James, a rubric, evidently genuine, which appears to have been framed during this interval. "Then the sacred oracles of the Old Testament and of the Prophets are read at great length (δὲ τοῖς κτάρων, some understand "consecutively," but the Jewish precedent favours the former reading); and the incarnation of the Son of God, and His sufferings, His resurrection from the dead, and ascension into heaven, and, again, His second coming with glory, are set forth." As Mr. Trollope points out (The Greek Liturgy of St. James, p. 42), we have here the Old Testament read, but the great events of the Gospel related to the people as if not yet in writing.

II. Evidence of use.—Justin Martyr, A.D. 140, describing the celebration of the Eucharist, says, "The commentaries of the apostles and the writings of the prophets are read as time permits" (Ap. l. c. 67). A lesson from the gospels was without doubt included under the former head. St. Cyprian, A.D. 250, speaks of a con- lector whom he had ordained lector, as "reading the precepts and the gospel of the Lord" from the stand (pulpitum) (Ep. xxxix.). Eusebius, A.D. 315, says that St. Peter authorised the use of the gospel of St. Mark "in the churches." For this he refers to the Hypotyposes of Clemens of Alexandria (not of Rome, as Bona and others) and to Papias; but elsewhere he cites both passages, and neither of them contains the words deus not, as many have imagined, prove from Papias the custom of the apostolic church, but is only a proof of the practice of his own age, in the light of which he read those earlier writers (see Hist. Eccl. lib. iii. c. xv.; and compare lib. vi. c. xiv., lib. iii. c. xxxix.). Cyril of Jerusalem, A.D. 350, speaks vaguely of the "reading of Scripture" (Praef. in Catech. §§ iii. iv.); nor are any of his catechetical homilies on lessons from the gospel. Optatus, A.D. 368, addressing the Donatist clergy, says, "Ye begin with the lessons of the Lord, and ye expand your expositions to our injury; ye bring forth the gospel, and make a reproach against an absent brother" (De Schism. Donat. lib. iv. c. v.). The so-called Constitutions of the Apostles put an order into their mouths, which begins thus: "After the reading of the law and the prophets and our epistles, and the acts and the gospels, let" &c. (lib. viii. c. v. Cotel, tom. i. p. 392). Pseudo-Dionysius tells us that in the liturgy, "the tablets of the Psalms," "follows the reading of the tablets of Holy writ by the ministers" (De Eccles. Hierarch. c. iii. § ii. tom. i. p. 284). These tablets are explained by Maximus the scholiast on Dionysius, A.D. 645, to be the Old and New Testament (Ibid. p. 305). St. Chrysostom frequently gave notice of the text on which he proposed to preach some days before; but in one homily he says, "On one day of the week, or on the sabbath (Saturday), at least, let each take in his hands, and, sitting at home, read that section (περικώριον) of the gospels which is going to be read among you" (Hom. xi. in St. Joh. Ev. § 1). This implies that they knew what the lesson from the gospels would be; and therefore that a table of such lessons was drawn up and accessible to all. St. Augustine, in Africa, often preached on the gospel. Thus one of his sermons begins, "The chapter of the holy gospel which we heard, when it was just now read," &c. (Serm. lv. § 1). Another: "We heard, when the gospel was read," &c. (Serm. liii. § 1). The council of Laodicea, probably about 365, has a canon ordering the "gospels to be read with other scriptures on the sabbath" (Can. xvi.). The omission of the gospel on Saturday had without doubt been merely a local custom. A council of Orange, A.D. 441, can. xviii., ordered that thenceforward the gospel should be read to the catechumens, as well as the faithful, in all the churches of the province. That of Valencia, A.D. 524, ordered that "the most holy gospels be read in the mass of the catechumens before the illation of the gifts, in the order of lessons after the apostle," i. e. the epistle (Can. l.). In France, 554, a constitution of Childebert mentions the gospels, prophets, and apostle, as read from the altar (Capit. Reg. Franc. ed. Baluz. tom. i. col. 7). Germanus of Paris, A.D. 555, in his exposition of the liturgy, similarly recognises the prophecy, apostle, and gospel (printed by Martene, De Aut. Eccl. Rit. lib. i. c. iv. art. xii.). Gregory of Tours, A.D. 573, tells a story of certain clerks in the days of Childebert, who "having laid the three books, i. e. of the prophecy, the apostle, and the gospels on the altar," prayed for an nugery from the passages at which they should open, each "having made an agreement among themselves that every one should read at mass that which he first opened on in the book" (Hist. Franc. lib. iv. c. xvi.). This implies that in Gaul at least the lessons were still left to the choice of those who were to read them. In the next century, however, the Gallican church had a lectionary, a copy of which, nearly complete, in Merovingian characters, was found by Mabillon in the monastery at Luxeuil. It provides a gospel for every mass (Liturg. Gall. lib. ii. pp. 97-173). Luxeuil is in the province of Besançon; but the eucharistic lessons (of which the gospel is always one) in the Sacramentary found at Bobio, which is believed to be of the use of that province, and is certainly of about the same age as the lectionary, differ nevertheless from those in that book. From this we may perhaps infer that although the lessons were then generally fixed, every bishop was at liberty to make his own selection. There is another ancient lectionary, ascribed to St. Jerome, and known as the Liber Comitis, or Comes Hieronymi; but from internal evidence shown to be the work of a Gallican compiler in the 8th century. This has been printed from two MSS., one of which provides three lessons for above two hundred days and occasions; the other for the most part only two; but the gospel is never omitted in either. The shorter recension may be seen in the Rituale SS. Patrum of Panelius, tom. ii. pp. 1-61. The longer is printed by Baluze in the Capitularia Regum Francorum, tom. ii. coll. 1309-1351.

III. Provision for use.—In the West, generally, a gospel has been always provided for every Sunday and for other holy days. The number of gospels (and other lessons) in the Liber Comitis already mentioned suggests that at one time there was a partial attempt to assign proper lessons to every day in the year. However this may be, the Roman use retained them for every day in Lent, and the Mozarabic for every Wednesday and Friday (except the first) during that season (see Missale Mixtum, Leslie, pp. 89-154). There was no such provision in the Gallican Sacramentary found at Bobio (see Murat. Liturg. Rom. Vet. tom. ii. coll. 815-835, or Mss. Ital. tom. i. pp. 301-319), nor, so far as we can judge in the Lectionary of Luxeuil (Mabillon, Liturg. Gall. p. 124). Eight leaves are missing in this MS. between Ash Wednesday and Palm Sunday, but they could hardly have contained more than the Sunday lessons. The ancient Irish Sacramentary, of which but one copy exists in manuscript, probably of the 6th century, is singular in the West in having but one gospel and epistle for the whole year, the former being the sixth chapter of St. John, the latter the eleventh chapter of St. Paul's first Epistle to the Corinthians. See O'Connor's Append. to vol. i. of the Catal. of the MSS. at St.owe, p. 45. The fact is also attested by Dr. Todd (see Pref. to the Liber. Eccl. do B. Terrenani de Arbuthnot, p. xxiv.).

In the West the gospels appear to have been chosen without any reference to their place in the books of the New Testament. But, in the Greek church, those four books have been divided into lessons (τμήματα, μέρη, περιχώρας, ἀναγνώσματα, ἀναγνώσεις); so that they may be read through in order, only interrupted when a festival with its proper lesson intervenes (Leo Allatius, De Libr. Eccl. Gr. Diss. i. p. 35). It is probably in accordance with this arrangement that the canon of Laodicea, already cited, does not order lessons from the gospels, or sections, or portions, or the like, to be read on Saturday with other scriptures, but the gospels themselves, i. e. the four books so called. From this it may be inferred that the Greek method was the normal practice of the whole Eastern church before the separation of the Nestorians and Monophysites. There was an exception, however, at one period, whether beginning before or after that separation, in the church of Malabar, the ancient liturgy of which presents but one epistle and gospel for every celebration—the former composed from 2 Cor. v. 1-10, and Heb. iv. 12, 13; the latter taken from St. John v. 19-29. As neither have any special reference to the Eucharist, it may be inferred that the peculiarity was, unlike that of the Irish missal, unintentional, and resulting, probably, from the destruction of sacred books in a season of persecution, and from the ignorance that followed it.

IV. The Book of the Gospels.—The book which contained the four gospels as divided for eucharistic use was called by the Greeks Εὐαγγέλιον. The oldest writer cited as using the word in this specific sense is Palladius, A.D. 400: "He brings the 'gospel' to him and exacts the oath." (Hist. Lausica. c. 86.) Another proof of the antiquity of the usage is the fact that the Nestorians, who were cut off from the church in the 5th century, retain the term Euanghelion in this limited sense to the present day (Badger's Nestorians, v. ii. p. 19). The book is similarly called "the gospel" in the liturgy of St. Mark (Renaud, tom. i. p. 136) and others.

V. By whom read.—In Africa the eucharistic gospel was read by those of the order of readers in the 3rd century (see Cypr. Ep. xxxix. and Ep. xxxviii.). It was generally, however, assigned to a higher order: "After these (i. e. the other lessons), let a deacon or presbyter read the gospels" (Constit. Apostol. lib. ii. c. lvii.). Sozomen, A.D. 440, tells us that among the Alexandrians the "archdeacon alone read that sacred book (of the gospels); but among others the deacons, and in many churches the priests only" (Hist. Eccl. lib. vii. c. xix.). He adds that "on high days bishops read it, as at Constantinople, on the first day of the paschal feast." The liturgies of St. Mark (Renaud, tom. i. p. 138), St. Basil, and St. Chrysostom (Goar, pp. 161 and 69) give this office to the deacon. This was also the common practice in the West. Thus St. Jerome says to Sabinian, "Thou wast wont to read the gospel as a deacon" (Ep. xciii.). St. Isidore of Seville, writing about the year 610, is a witness to the same practice (De Eccl. Off. lib. ii. c. 8). We observe it also in the most ancient "Orlines Roman" (Mss. Ital. tom. ii. pp. 10, 46); and it became the rule throughout Europe, when a deacon was present.

VI. Where read.—The gospel was perhaps generally read from a stand called Ambo (Ἀμβών) or Pulpitum even in the earliest ages. It certainly was so when the celebrant himself did not read it. Thus St. Cyprian, as before quoted, speaks of Celerinus, the reader, as officiating "on a pulpit, i. e. on the tribunal of the church," and generally of confessors raised to that order as "coming to the pulpit after the stocks" (Épp. xxxviii., xxxix.). The Ordo Romanus in use in the 8th century orders the gospel to be read from the higher step of the ambo, the epistle having been read from a lower (Ord. ii. un. 7, 8). In some churches there was a separate ambo for the gospel. An example occurred in the church

The book is similarly called the liturgy of St. Mark (Renaud and others).

Sozomen, us that among the Alexandrian on alone read that sacred book of out among others the deacons, and es the priests only" (Hist. Eccl.). He adds that "on high days as, as at Constantinople, on the first ical feast." The liturgies of St. tom. i. p. 138), St. Basil, and St. Goar, pp. 161 and 69) give this deacon. This was also the custom West. Thus St. Jerome says to our west want to read the gospel (Ep. xxiii.). St. Isidore of Seville, the year 610, is a witness to the (De Eccl. Off. lib. ii. c. 8). We so in the most ancient "Ordina is. Ital. tom. ii. pp. 10, 46); and it rule throughout Europe, when a present.

read.—The gospel was perhaps d from a stand called Ambo (Ap- titum even in the earliest ages. It so when the celebrant himself did Thus St. Cyprian, as before quoted, egerius, the reader, as officiating, i. e. on the tribunal of the church," of confessors raised to that order to the pulpit after the death of ii., xxxix.). The Ordo Romanus in the 5th century orders the gospel to be read from a lower (Ord. li. an. 7, 8), rches there was a separate ambo for An example occurred in the church of St. Clement at Rome, where also the gospel ambo was a "little higher and more ornate" (Martene, De Ant. Eccl. Rit. lib. l. c. iv. art. lv. a. iii.). This became to some extent a rule (Scutimore, Notitia Eucharistica, p. 222). We hear of the ambo in the East also. Thus Sozomen, speaking of a tomb over which a church had been built, says that it was "near the ambo, that is to say, the rostrum (βήμα) of the readers" (Hist. Eccl. lib. ix. c. 11.). The same historian tells us that St. Chrysostom, that he might be better heard, used to preach at Constantinople "sitting on the rostrum of the readers" (lib. v. c. v.), and Serates, referring to a particular occasion, speaks of him as "seated on the ambo, from which he was wont also before that to preach in order to be heard" (Hist. Eccl. lib. vi. c. v.). The council in Trullo, A.D. 681, forbade any who had not received the proper benediction to "proclaim the words of God to the people on the ambo" (can. xxxiii.). In the liturgy of St. Chrysostom, the deacon who reads the gospel "stands elevated on the ambo or in the appointed place" (Goar, p. 69).

VII. Read towards the South.—It was an early, but we think not primitive, custom in the West for the gospel to "stand facing the south, where the men were wont to assemble" (Ord. Rom. li. c. 8). Analarus, an early commentator on the Ordo Romanus, suggests that this was because the men were supposed to receive the gospel first, and to teach it to their wives at home (1 Cor. xiv. 35). See his Ecloga, n. xv. Mus. Ital. tom. ii. p. 553. It is probable, however, that a different custom prevailed at the same time in France, or very soon after. For in the latter part of the 9th century Remigius of Auxerre tells us that "the Levite (deacon), when about to pronounce the words of the gospel, turns his face towards the north," as defying Satan, who was supposed (from Isai. xiv. 13) to dwell there (De Fide, Missæ, od. calc. Libri Pseudo-Alcuini, de Div. Off. Hitrop, ed. 280).

VIII. Attendant rites.—From a very early period the reading of the gospel was attended with circumstances of solemnity. In the Greek church it has for many ages been brought into the church out of the chapel of Prothesis in a rite known as the Little Entrance, the bringing in of the gifts being the Great Entrance. While the choir is singing the Gloria at the end of the third antiphon the priest and deacon, after bowing thrice before the altar, go out for the book of the gospels. They return into the church, the deacon carrying the gospel, preceded by lights, and welcomed by a special anthem. After a circuit of some length on the north side of the church they stop at the holy doors, where the priest says, secretly, the "Prayer of the Entrance." The deacon then asks for, and the priest gives, a "blessing on the Entrance," troparia being sung meanwhile. When they are ended, the deacon shows the gospel to the people, saying, "Wisdom. Stand up." They then enter the ambo, and the book is laid on the holy table still required for use (Euch. optum, Goar, pp. 67, 124, 160). This is found in the older liturgy of St. Basil, as well as that of St. Chrysostom, but it is impossible to say how much of it was practised in the age of those great bishops. There is no trace of the Little Entrance in the liturgy of Jerusalem, from which that of Caesarea (St.

Basil) was derived, nor in the Nestorian liturgies, which came from an independent source before the 5th century. On the other hand, there is a simpler form of the rite in the Armenian liturgy, which was borrowed from Caesarea in the time of St. Basil, and influenced in its subsequent growth by the residence of St. Chrysostom in Armenia, where he died (Le Brun, Diss. sur les Liturgies, x. art. iv. xlii.). We observe, also, an elaborate ordering of the same rite in liturgies that can hardly have been indebted to those of the Greek church after the 6th century at least. "As the book of the gospels," remarks Renaudot, "is carried to the ambo with great ceremony among the Copts, so it is certain that it is in like manner done among the Syrians; and they received it from the Greeks" (tom. ii. p. 69). For the Coptic Entrance see tom. i. p. 210. A short rubric in the liturgy of St. Mark tells us when the Entrance takes place; but it is not described (Renaud. tom. i. p. 136).

Another proof of the antiquity of the Little Entrance is found in its resemblance to a ceremony practised at Rome in certain pontifical masses of the 7th and 8th centuries. The gospel was brought in a case or casket from the basilica of St. John Lateran to the regium church in which the celebration took place by an acolyte in attendance on the bishop, but under the care of the archdeacon. It was made ready by the reader at the door of the Secretarium, while the bishop was within preparing for the service. The acolyte then carried it "into the presbytery to before the altar," preceded by a subdeacon, who then took it from him, and "with his own hands placed it with honour upon the altar." (Ord. Rom. i. §§ 3, 4, 5; ii. 2, 4, 5).

As an example of the ritual when the gospel was to be read, we may, for the East, cite St. Mark: "The deacon, when about to read the gospel, says, 'Bless, sir.' The priest, 'The Lord bless and strengthen, and make us hearers of His holy gospel, who is God blessed now and ever, and for ever, Amen.' The deacon, 'Stand, let us hear the holy gospel.' The priest, 'Peace be to all.' The people, 'And to thy spirit.' Then the deacon reads the gospel" (Renaud. tom. i. p. 138). At Rome, in the pontifical masses before mentioned, the deacon having received a blessing from the bishop, "The Lord be in thy heart and on thy lips," after kissing the gospels, took the book off the altar, and went towards the ambo, preceded by two subdeacons—one with incense—and followed by a third. There the acolytes made a passage for the preceding subdeacons and the deacon. The latter then rested his book on the left arm of the subdeacon without a censor, who opened it at the place already marked. The deacon then, with his finger in the place, went up to that stage of the ambo from which he was to read, the two subdeacons going to stand before the steps by which he would descend. The gospel ended, the bishop says, "Peace be to thee," and "The Lord be with you." Resp., "And with thy spirit." As the deacon came down, the subdeacon who had opened the book took it from him, and handed it to the third subdeacon who had followed. He, holding it on his planeta, before his breast, offers it to be kissed by all engaged in the rite, and then puts it into the case or casket before mentioned, held ready by the acolyte who had brought it into the church (Ord. Rom. i. § 11). An Ordo, somewhat later, but not lower than the 8th century, tells us that "the candles were extinguished in their place after the gospel was read" (Ord. ii. § 9). The custom of lighting candles at the reading of the gospel came from the East, where it prevailed in the 4th century. "Through all the churches of the East," says St. Jerome, "when the gospel is to be read, lights are burned, though the sun be already shining" (Contra Vigilant. § 7). St. Isidore of Seville, in a work written in 636, says that "acolytes in Greek are called ceroferrii in Latin, from their bearing wax candles when the gospel is to be read," &c. (Etymol. lib. vii. c. xii. § 29). This is probably the earliest notice in the West, though the first Ordo Romanus belongs almost certainly to the same century. The symbolism of the lights needs no explanation (see St. John i. 9; viii. 12).

IX. Heard standing.—It was probably from the very first the custom for the people to hear the gospel standing, out of reverence. Thus the Apostolical Constitutions, lib. ii. c. lvii.: "When the gospel is being read, let all the presbyters and the deacons and all the people stand with great quietness." Philostorgius, A. D. 425, says that Theophilus the Indian, when visiting his native country, about the year 345, found that the people "performed the hearing of the gospel lessons sitting, and had some other practices which the Divine law did not sanction" (Hist. Eccl. lib. iii. § 5). His language shows how important the rite was considered. Isidore of Pelusium, 412, says, in the same spirit, "When the True Shepherd becomes present through the opening of the adorable gospels, the bishop both rises and lays aside the habit (the επιφώρατον) which he wears symbolical of Him" (Ep. cxxxv. Hermineo Comiti). In accordance with this, Sozomen (Hist. Eccl. lib. vii. c. xix.) tells us that there was "a strange custom among the Alexandrians, for, when the gospels were read, the bishop did not stand up, which," he adds, "I have neither known nor heard of among others." The same rule prevailed in the West. Amalarius, writing about 827, says: "During the celebration of these, i. e. the lesson (epistle) and the prophecy, we are wont to sit, after the custom of the ancients." Then, when he speaks of the gospel: "Up to this time we sit; now we must rise at the words of the gospel" (De Eccl. Off. lib. iii. cc. 11, 18). At the same time all turned to the East, and hid down the staff on which, at that period, they commonly leaned, "nor was there crown or other covering on their heads" (Ord. Rom. ii. § 8; Amal. u. s. c. 18).

X. The Doxologies.—The doxology now common after the announcement of the gospel is mentioned by writers within our period. Thus Heterius and Beatus, in Spain, A. D. 785: "The deacon commands all to be silent, and says, 'The lesson of the holy gospel according to Matthew.' All the people answer, 'Glory be to Thee, O Lord.'" (Adv. Elipand. lib. i. c. lxvi.). Compare the Mozarabic Missal (Leslie, pp. 2, 45, &c.). Amalarius only recommends it. After advising the people to pray for a profitable hearing, he adds: "Let him who is not quick to take in the words of the gospel, at least say, 'Glory,'" &c. (lib. iii. c. 18). The practice probably came through Spain, like several other rites, from the East. In the homily De Circo ascribed incorrectly to St. Chrysostom, we read, "When the deacon is about to open the gospel, we all fix our eyes on him and keep silence; but when he begins the course of reading, we forthwith stand up, and respond, 'Glory be to Thee, O Lord'" (Opp. St. Chrys. tom. viii. p. 723, ed. Gaume). Compare the liturgies of St. Basil and St. Chrysostom (Goar, pp. 161 and 69). The use of this form was probably not very extensive before the 6th century, or we should have found it in all the Nestorian and Eutychnian rites. The liturgy of Malabar (Nestorian), however, does give "Glory to Christ the Lord" (Hist. Eccl. Malab. Baulin, p. 306); the Ethiopic, "Glory be to Thee alway, O Christ, our Lord and God," &c. (Benaud, tom. i. p. 510); and the Armenian, "Glory be to Thee, O Lord, our God" (Neale's Eastern Church, Introd. p. 414).

There is no very early evidence of a doxology after the gospel. The liturgy of Malabar repeats that given above. The Ethiopic has, "The cherubim and seraphim send glory up to Thee." The Armenian, like the Malabar, has the same after as before. There was none in the early Roman liturgy, and Amen seems to have been the common response in the middle ages (Notitia Eucharistica, p. 228).

XI. In what language read.—As the first converts to the gospel spoke Greek, all the liturgies were originally in that language. It is not known when Latin was adopted in the services at Rome, but the church there had been founded more than a century and a half before it produced a single Latin writer. It was, therefore, natural that Greek should be occasionally and partially used in the services after the general use of Latin had begun. In particular the eucharistic lessons were on certain days read in both languages. The chief evidence of this is the fact that it continued as a traditional custom throughout the middle ages (see Notitia Euch. p. 207); but we also find some early testimony to the usage. Thus Amalarius: "Six lessons were read by the ancient Romans [on the Saturdays of the Ember weeks] in Greek and Latin (which custom is kept up at Constantinople to this day), for two reasons, if I mistake not; the one, because there were Greeks present, to whom Latin was not known; the other, because both people were of one mind" (De Eccl. Off. lib. ii. c. 1). This statement obtains collateral support from the earliest Ordo Romanus in which the four lessons used at the general baptism on Easter Eve are ordered to be read in Greek and Latin (§ 40). Nicholas I., A. D. 858, writing to the emperor Michael, confirms the statement of Amalarius as to the practice at Constantinople. He affirms that "daily, or any how, on the principal feasts," the church there was "reported to recite the apostolic and evangelic lessons in that language (the Latin) first, and afterwards pronounce the very same lessons in Greek, for the sake of the Greeks" (Ep. viii. Labb. Conc. tom. viii. col. 298). When John VIII., in the same century, gave permission for the celebration of the Holy Communion in the Slavonic tongue, he made this proviso, that "to show it greater honour, the gospel should be read in Latin, and afterwards published in Slavonic in the ears of the people who did not

The chief evidence of this is continued as a traditionary out: the middle ages (see Nofia out we also find some early testi-ange. understand Latin; as appears to be done in some churches" (Ep. cxxvii.; Labb. Conc. tom. I. col. 177). In the churches of Syria the gospel and epistle are still read both in the old Syriac and in the better understood Arabic (Renaud, tom. II. p. 69); and in Egypt in both Coptic and Arabic (Renaud, tom. I. pp. 5-8). When they were first read in Arabic we do not know; but it was probably before the 9th century, as both countries were conquered and overrun by the Arabs in the former half of the 7th.

XII. From the 6th century downward we meet with repeated instances of a custom of inclosing the gospels in cases, covers, or caskets, adorned with gems and the precious metals. The first Ordo Romanus, in giving directions for the pontifical mass, to which we have referred above, orders, that on festivals the keeper of the vestry at St. John's Lateran shall give out "a larger chalice and paten, and larger gospels under his seal, noting the number of the gems that they be not lost" (§ 3). Childobert I., A.D. 531, is said by Gregory of Tours to have retired from an expedition into Spain, bringing with him, among other spoils, "sixty chalices, fifteen patens, twenty cases for the gospels (evangeliorum capas), all adorned with pure gold and precious gems" (Hist. Franc. lib. liii. c. 2). The same writer tells us that one of the emperors of Rome caused to be made for the church at Lyons "a case for inclosing the holy gospels and a paten and chalice of pure gold and precious stones" (De Glor. Confess. cap. liiii.). Gregory the Great gave to the king of the Lombards "a lectionary (lectionem) of the holy gospel inclosed in a Persian case (theca)" (Ep. lib. xii. Ep. vii. ad Theodet.) [W. GOSPELLER. [GOSPEL, § V. p. 742.]

GOSPELS, BOOK OF. [LITURGICAL BOOKS: GOSPEL, § IV. p. 742.]

GOSPELS IN ART. [See FOUR RIVERS, EVANGELISTS.] The sources of the four rivers, represented continually on the sarcophagi (Bottari, Sculture e Pitture. tav. xvi. and passim) have doubtless reference to the four gospels, as well as to the streams which watered the garden of Eden. See also the woodcut of the Lateran Cross s. v. CROSS.

Rolls of the gospels, or other sacred books are often represented on glasses and cups (Buonarrotti, Vetri, tav. ii. viii. 1, xiv. 2). A case containing the gospels is represented in the chapel of Galla Placidia at Ravenna (see Ciampini, Vet. Mon. I. lxvii.). They are generally rolls, sometimes with umbilici and capsules. In Buonarrotti, Frammenti di casi antichi, tav. viii. 1, the rolls of the four gospels surround a representation of the miracle of the seven loaves, with probable reference to Matt. iv. 4, "Man shall not live by bread alone, but by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of God."

The portraits or symbolic representations of the Evangelists very commonly bear the gospels from the earliest date; indeed the symbol of four scrolls or books, placed in the four angles of a Greek cross, are asserted by Mrs. Jameson to be the earliest type of the Four Evangelists, and most certainly be among the earliest. In the baptistery at Ravenna (Ciampini, V. M. p. 1. p. 234), there is a mosaic of the four gospels resting on four tables, each with its title. This dates from A.D. 451.

The figures of apostles, passim in ancient mediæval and modern art, bear rolls or volumes in their hands; but Marigny remarks very ingeniously and thoughtfully, that in the earliest examples of apostles the volume must be considered to be that of the Law and the Prophets, to which and to whom they referred all men in their preaching, even from the day of Pentecost. In one instance a picture at the bottom of a cup representing an adoration of the Mugi (Buonarrotti, l. z.) the book of the gospels is placed near one of the three, in token of their being the first, with the shepherds, to bear the good tidings of the Saviour of Mankind.

A symbol of the gospel, and of the evangelists, of the highest antiquity (indeed, as Mr. Hemans thinks, of the Constantian period) is the painting of four jewelled books at the juncture of the arms of a large cross, also jewelled, on the vault of a hall belonging to the Thermae of Trajan; consecrated for Christian worship by pope Sylvester in the time of Constantine, and still serving as a crypt-chapel below the church of SS. Martino e Silvestro on the Esquiline Hill.

GRACE AT MEALS. The Jews went to give thanks at table, one of the company saying the prayer "in the plural number, Let us bless, &c." and the rest answering Amen (Berncoth cap. vii.; Lightfoot Horæ Hebr. in St. Matt. xv. 36). When our Lord was about to feed the multitudes He took the loaves and fishes, and "blessed" (St. Matt. xiv. 19; St. Mark vi. 41; St. Luke ix. 16) or "gave thanks" (St. Matt. xv. 36; St. Mark viii. 6; St. John vi. 11) before He distributed them. This was in accordance with the Jewish custom, which thus, with the sanction of our Lord's example, passed into His church. St. Chrysostom, commenting on Matt. xiv. 19-21, says that He then "taught us that we should not touch a table before giving thanks to Him who provides this food" (Hom. xlix.). In commenting on the account of the Last Supper, he refers to the "Grace" said after meat also:—"He gave thanks before distributing to the disciples, that we may give thanks too. He gave thanks and sang hymns after distributing, that we may do the same thing" (In St. Matt. xxvi. 30; Hom. lxxxii.). That this was the general practice of the early Christians is proved by many testimonies. St. Paul, to whatever else he may allude beside, certainly recognizes it in 1 Tim. iv. 3-5. Meats, he there teaches, were "created to be received with thanksgiving of them which believe and know the truth." Clemens of Alexandria, A.D. 192, both owns the principle, and vouches for the observance. "As it is meet that before taking food we bless the Maker of all these things, so also does it become us, when drinking, to sing psalms unto Him; forasmuch as we are partaking of His creatures" (Pædagog. lib. ii. c. iv. § 44; see also § 77). Of the model Christian, he says, "His sacrifices are prayers and praises, and the reading of Scripture before the banquetting; psalms and hymns after it" (Strom. lib. vii. c. vii. § 49). Aguin: "Referring the reverent enjoyment of all things to God, he ever offers to the giver of all things the first-fruits of meat and drink and anointing oil, yielding thanks," &c. (Ibid. § 36). Tertullian, writing probably in 202: "We do not recline (at an entertainment) before prayer be first tasted . . . After water for the hands and lights, such, as he is able, is called out to sing to God from the Holy Scriptures, or from his own mind. In like manner prayer puts an end to the feast" (Liber Apol. adv. Gentes. c. xxxix.). St. Cyprian, writing in 246: "Nor let the banqueting hour be void of heavenly grace. Let the temperate entertainment resound with psalms, and do ye each undertake this wonted duty according to the strength of your memory or excellence of voice" (Ad Pont. et. sub fin.). St. Basil, A.D. 370: "Let prayers be said before taking food in meet acknowledgment of the gifts of God, both of those which He is now giving and of those which He has put in store for the future. Let prayers be said after food containing a return of thanks for the things given, and request for those promised" (Ep. ii. ad Greg. Naz. § 6). Sozomen, A.D. 440, says of the younger Theodosius, that he would eat nothing "before he had blessed the Creator of all things" (Hist. Eccles. Orat. ad Imp. libro i. præfixa).

Examples remain of the early Graces, both of the East and West. E.g. the Apostolical Constitutions (lib. vii. c. 49) furnish the following Εὐχὴ ἐκ' ἀποστόλων, Prayer at the midday meal: "Blessed art Thou, O Lord, who feedest me from my youth up, who givest food to all flesh. Fill our hearts with joy and gladness; that always having a sufficiency we may abound unto every good work, in Christ Jesus our Lord, through whom be glory and honour and power unto Thee, world without end, Amen" (Patres Apostol. Cotel. tom. i. p. 385). This prayer (slightly varied) is also given to be said after meals in the treatise De Virginitate ascribed (most improbably) to St. Athanasius. The writer first gives it and then proceeds as follows: "And when thou art seated at table and hast begun to break the bread, having thrice said the sign of the cross, thus give thanks, 'We give thanks unto Thee, our Father, for Thy holy resurrection [i. e. wrought and to be wrought in us, if the reading be correct]; for through Thy Son Jesus Christ hast Thou made it known unto us; and as this bread upon this table was in separate grains, and being gathered together became one thing, so let Thy church be gathered together from the ends of the earth into Thy kingdom; for Thine is the power and the glory for ever and ever. Amen.' And this prayer thou oughtest to say when thou breakest bread and desirest to eat; but when thou dost set it on the table and sittest down, say Our Father all through. But the prayer above written (Blessed art Thou, O God [Lerd, Const. Apost.]) we say after we have made our meal and have risen from table" (§§ 12, 13, inter Athanas. Opp.). A short paraphrase, as it appears, of an Eastern Grace at meals may also be seen in the anonymous commentary (probably of the sixth century) on the Book of Job printed with the works of Origen (lib. iii.).

The following examples from the Gelasian Sacramentary are probably the most ancient Graces of the Latin church now extant: Prayers before Meat. (1) "Refresh us, O Lord, with Thy gifts, and sustain us with the bounty of Thy riches; through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen."

(2) "Let us be refreshed, O Lord, from Thy grants and gifts, and satiated with Thy blessing through, &c." (3) "Protect us, O Lord out God, and afford needful sustenance to our frailty; through, &c." (4) "Bless, O Lord, Thy gifts, which of Thy bounty we are about to take; through, &c." (5) "O God, who dost always invite us to spiritual delights, give a blessing on Thy gifts; that we may attain to a sanctified reception of those things which are to be eaten in Thy name; through, &c." (6) "May Thy gifts, O Lord, refresh us, and Thy grace console us through, &c." Prayers after Meals.—(1) "Satisfied, O Lord, with the gifts of Thy riches, we give Thee thanks for these things which we receive from Thy bounty, beseeching Thy mercy that that which was needful for our bodies may not be burdensome to our minds; through, &c." (2) "We have been satisfied, O Lord, with Thy grants and gifts. Replenish us with Thy mercy, Thy who art blessed; who with the Father and Holy Ghost livest and reignest God for ever and ever. Amen." Muratori, Liturgia Rom. Vetus, tom. i. col. 745. Compare the Benedictio ad Mensam, and Benedictio post Mensam levitam in the Gallican Sacramentary of the 7th century found at Bobio (Ibid. tom. ii. col. 959).

GRACILIANUS. [FELICISSIMA.]

GRADO, COUNCIL OF (Gradense concilium), held A.D. 579 at Grado for the transfer thither of the see of Aquileia, supposing its site genuine, but Istria was at this time out of communion with Rome for not accepting the 5th council, and the part assigned to Elin, bishop of Aquileia, throughout is suspicious. A legate from Rome at his instance exhibited a letter as from pope Pelagius II. to him authorising this change, which was accordingly confirmed. This he requested that the definition of the 4th council might be recited, which was also done. In the subscriptions which follow his own comes first, after him that of the legate, nineteen bishops or their representatives follow, and last of all twelve presbyters in their own names. Mansi regards it as a forgery (ix. 927).

GRADUAL (Responsorium Graduale or Gradale; or simply Responsorium or Responsum; or Graduale. In mediæval English Græd spelt variously).—1. This was an anthem sung after the epistle in most of the Latin churches. Originally, it seems that a whole psalm was sung, at least in Africa, as we gather from several allusions in the Sermons of St. Augustine. Thus in one he says, "To this belongs that which the apostolic lesson (Col. iii. 9) before the canticle of the psalm presignified, saying 'Put off, &c.'" (Serm. xxxii. c. iv.). "We have heard the apostle, we have heard the psalm, we have heard the gospel" (Serm. clxv. c. l.). Again: "We have heard the first lesson of the apostle, 'This is a faithful saying, &c.' (1 Tim. i. 15) . . . Then we sang a psalm, mutually exhorting one another, saying with one voice, one heart, 'O come, let us worship,' &c. (Ps. xcv. 6). After these the gospel lesson showed us the cleansing of the ten lepers" (Serm. clxxvi. c. i.). In his Retractations (lib. ii. c. xi.) St. Augustine speaks of a custom which began at Carthage in his time of "saying hymns at the altar from the Book of Psalms, either

 Augustine speaks of a custom which age in his use of "saying hymns on the Book of Psalms, either before the oblation or when that which had been offered was being distributed to the people." The hymn before the oblation has been understood by some to be the psalm before the gospel; but a hymn sung before the catechumens left would hardly have been called by so precise a writer as Augustine a hymn before the oblation.

 He must rather have meant the offertory which immediately preceded the offering of the elements. Nor was the Gradual sung at the altar, but, as we shall see, from the lector's ambo. We infer, therefore, that the psalm after the epistle was a custom of the church before the age of St. Augustine. Genulius of Marseilles, A. D.
 495, tells us that Musæus, a presbyter of that city, A. D. 458, at the request of his bishop, selected "from the Holy Scriptures lessons suitable to the feast-days of the whole year, and besides, responsory chapters of psalms adapted to the seasons and lessons" (De Viris Illust. c. lii.). Another witness is Gregory of Tours, who relates that on a certain occasion in the year 585, his deacon "who had said the res-ponsary at the masses before day" was ordered by king Guntram to sing before him, and that afterwards all the priests present sang a res-ponsary psalm, each with one of his clerks (Hist.
Franc. l. viii. § iii.). The Antiphony ascribed to Gregory I. must have undergone a change down to the 11th or 12th century, if it was not originally compiled then. It contains Graduals (there called Responsories) for use throughout the year; but from our uncertainty about their age, we need only state the fact. It was printed by Pamelius (Liturgicon, tom. ii. p. 62), and by Bonanus extant, which describes a pontifical mass of the 7th century, fully recognizes the use of the Gradual: "After he (the subdeacon) has read (the epistle) the cantor ascends [the steps of the ambo] with the cantatory, and says the Res-ponsary" (§ 10; Mus. Ital. tom. ii. p. 9). Again:
 "With regard to the Gradual Responsory, it is [the Leaf] sung to the end by him who begins it, and the verse in like manner" (§ 26, p. 18).
 Compare Ordo ii. § 7. Amalarius (Prod. in Lib. de Ord. Antiph. Hittorp. col. 504) explains the term 'cantatory.' "That which we call the gradual (Gradale) they (the Romans), call Canta- torium; which in some churches among them is still, according to the old custom, comprised in one volume." It was, in fact, a book containing all the Graduals for the year.

II. Strictly only the first verse of the anthem was called the Gradual. The rest was technically called the "verse." The mode of singing it was not everywhere the same; but Amalarius describes at some length how this was done at Rome, whence, he assures us (De Eccles. Off.
 l. iii. c. 11; De Ord. Ant. u. s.), the Gradual was derived to other churches.—"The precentor in the first row sings the Responsory to the end.
 The successors respond (i. e. sing the Responsory) in like manner. The precentor then sings the verse. The verse being ended, the successors at second time begin the Responsory from the first word, and continue it to the end. Then the precentor sings, 'Glory be to the Father and to the Son and to the Holy Ghost.' This being ended, the successors take up the Responsory about the middle, and continue it to the end.
 Lastly the precentor begins the Responsory from the first word and continues it to the end.

 Which being over the successors to the third time repeat the Responsory from the beginning and continue it to the end." Amalarius also tells us that "the Gloria was not sung with Responsories from the first" (De Ord. Antiph.
 c. 18); from which we infer with probability that they were in use before that doxology was composed.

III. The mode of singing adopted for the Grad-dual, in which one sang alone for a while and many responded was probably in use from the very infancy of the church. In the Apostolical Constitutions the apostles are made to direct that at the celebration of the holy eucharist one of the deacons shall "chant the hymns of David, and the people subchant the ends of the verses" (l. ii. c. lvii.). When St. Athanasius (A. D. 356) found his church surrounded by more than 5000 soldiers, and a violent crowd of Arians, he placed himself on his throne and "directed the deacon to read a psalm, and the people to respond, 'For His mercy endureth for ever'" (Apol. de Fugit. s. d., § 24). Eusebius, too, citing Philo's account of certain "Ascetæ" in Egypt, among other of their customs which he declares to belong to the Christians, mentions that one would "chant a psalm in measured strains, the rest listening in silence, but singing the last parts of the hymns together" (Euseb.
Hist. l. ii. c. xvii.). Whether these ascetics were Jews or Christians the narrative of Philo shows that the practice must have been known to the Jewish converts of the 1st century, and may even then have been adopted by them.

IV. From Easter Eve to the Saturday in Whitsun week inclusively the Gradual was followed, and at last supplanted by the Alleluia.
 This had been long known in the West and used, though not prescribed, on public occasions of religious joy. At Rome it was only sung on Easter day, as Sozomen informs us (Hist. Eccl.
 lib. vii. cap. xix.), and his statement is copied by Cassiodorus (Hist. Eccl. Tripart. l. xiii. c. xxxix.), who lived at Rome, A. D. 514. Their authority, however, can only prove the fact for an age before their own; for Gregory I. affirms that it was introduced at Rome in masses by St. Jerome (who had learnt it at Jerusalem) in the time of Damasus, A. D. 384 (Epist. lib. vii.; Ep. lxxv.).
 This, of course, refers to its use between Easter and Pentecost; as Gregory himself extended it "beyond the time of Pentecost" (ibid.). In the Antiphony ascribed to him it is only omitted between Septuagesima Sunday and Easter (Pamel. Liturg. tom. ii. pp. 81-110).
 Amalarius (u. s. cap. 13) speaks of it as "sung on feast days."

V. The Tract was another anthem sometimes sung after the epistle. Originally it was always from the Book of Psalms; and like the Gradual was a remnant and evidence of their early use in celebrations as a part of Holy Scripture.
 The Tract and Gradual differed at first, in all probability, only in being sung differently; or in other words the Tract was nothing more than the Gradual as it was chanted in seasons of humiliation. It is for this reason that we treat of them together. Very soon, however, a Tract was often sung after the Gradual; or, as it would, we presume, be then viewed, a third verse was added to the anthem, which was sung of a bishop as proceeding from his reception-room to church (Greg. M. Ep. iv. 54). Bingham corrects the opinion of Scalliger that the place spoken of by Theodoret was a part of the bishop's palace used for entertaining strangers, and pronounces it "a place adjoining the church" ("extra ecclesiae adjuncta," Ducange, v. s.) for the bishop "to receive the salutations of the people" coming for his "blessing," or on "business" (Bingh. Orig. Eccles. viii. vii. 8; cf.

 Vales. Annotat. in Theodoret. l. c.). It is recorded of St. Martin of Tours that he sat on a three-legged stool in a room of this kind, in preference to using the bishop's throne which was there (Sulp. Sev. Vit. S. Mart.); and that on his visitations he spent night and day in this room (Sulp. Sev. Ep. 1). In this "saluatorium" the rule of the convent was read over to candidates for admission (Reg. Aurel. ad Virgines. c. 1). The nuns, and even the abbess, were forbidden to see any stranger here alone (Reg. Don. et. ad Virg. c. 57; Reg. Cæsarij ad Virg. c. 35); and by the council of Macon, A. D. 581, bishops, priests, and deacons, as well as laymen, were prohibited from entering the reception-room of a nunnery, Jews especially being excluded (Conc. Matiscon. c. 2).^a On the same principle, women, even nuns, were excluded from the bishop's "saluatorium" (Ducange, s. v.).
 In a Benedictine monastery this chamber was usually on the east side of the quadrangle, between the chapter-house and the south transept of the church (Whitaker's Hist. of Whalley, p. 124, 4th ed 1874).

A room of this kind was used, according to Mabillon, for robing, for hearing causes, for synods, for keeping relics in, and sometimes for temporary residence (Mabill. Ann. Bened. Saec.
 iv. l. p. 370, cited by Ducange Gloss. Lat. v. s.; cf. Sulp. Sev. Ep. i.). According to Menard, there was a similar room for the use of the priests (Bened. Anian. Concord. Regul. v. 25; cf.
 Sulp. Sev. Diad. II. l.).

This receiving-room, or audience-chamber, seems identical with the "sacrarium," or vestry, where the vessels for use in church were kept

GRIFFIN. See "Cherub" in DICTIONARY
 OF THE BIBLE, vol. i. pp. 300 sqq.; and Ruskin's Modern Painters, vol. iii. p. 112.

The connexion between the various symbolismes of Cherub and Griffin in Biblical and Northern tradition is strengthened by the etymological resemblance of the words. There is certainly a great likeness between the names γρῦρ (with s affirmative) and גרין. Both are titles of the most ancient existing symbols of Divine omnipotence and omniscience; as it cannot be doubted that the sphinxes of Egypt and winged bulls or lions of Assyria conveyed kindred ideas to the hieratic, or indeed the popular mind. It would seem that all the chief races of men have been taught to set forth such mysterious forms; as this composite idea is so nearly universal.
 Some figure of this kind must have been the popular shape of the cherub or gryps known to the children of Israel: and the fact that it was a permitted and prescribed image, taken together with the command to make the brazen serpent, forms a very large portion of the sub-structure of iconodulist arguments. See Johannes Damsceus De Imaginibus, Orat. ii. Such instances of griffin forms as appear in the earliest Christian decoration seem to the writer to be in all probability merely ornamental; and, as fact, unmeaning adaptations of Gentile patterns.
 See, however, Guendebault, Dictionnaire Icono- graphique, s. v. "Griffon." The use of the symbolic griffin by the Lombard race, however, dates from well within our period; though the great Veronese works so frequently mentioned by Professor Ruskin are probably as late as the 11th century. Those of the duomo of Verona and the church of San Zoonone deserve especial mention.

That the griffin is the Gothic-Christian representation of the cherub, the "Mighty one," or the "Carved Image" of Hebrew sculpture, seems highly probable, further, from the following connexion of ideas in different ages.
 The glorified forms of living creatures and of wheels in the great opening vision of Ezekiel have necessarily been always connected with those of the Zōa, the Beasts of the Apocalypse [See EVANGELISTS, p. 633]. The latter, as representing the writers of the four gospels, are an universal symbol after the 5th century. It did not escape the eye of Professor Ruskja that the marble wheel by the side of his Veronese griffin is an indisputable reference on the part of the unknown Lombard artist to the first chapter of Ezekiel (Ezek. i. 21): "When those (Living Creatures) went, these went: and when those stood, these stood, and when those were lifted up from the earth, the wheels were lifted up over against them: for the spirit of the Living Creatures was in the wheels." And this is fully confirmed (were that necessary) by Dr. Hayman's researches in the DICTIONARY OF THE BIBLE. But the wheels appear in a more ancient work by a great and mystical genius whose name and date alone remain to us, the monk Rabula, scribe and illustrator of the great Florentine MS., A. D. 586 (See Assemani's Catalogue of the Laurentian Library). A woodcut of this is given in this work, p. 85. It represents the Ascension; our Lord is borne up by two ministering angels on a chariot of cloud, by two ministering angels on each side, with two other angels, who are apparently receiving His garments, the vesture of His flesh. The sun and moon are in the upper corners of the picture; which is one of the most important works in Christian art as a specimen of imaginative symbolism of the highest character, and also as a graphic illustration of the connexion between Hebrew and Christian vision, or Apocalypse of the Unseen. And to this the Veronese griffin and its wheel, and the whole Christian usage of that composite form as a symbol, really refer. "The winged shape becomes one of the acknowledged symbols of Divine power: and in its unity of lion and eagle, the workman of the middle ages always meant to set forth the unity of the human and Divine natures. In this unity it bears up the pillars of the church, set for ever as the corner stone."

In its merely ornamental use it is derived simply from Heathen or Gentile art and literature. [R. St. J. T.]

GROTESQUE. We have the authority of Prof. Mommsen for assigning the word grotesco as the original derivation of this adjective, formed, probably, immediately from grot or grotto, a cavern or subterranean recess, and therefore connected in its use, as a word of Renaissance origin, with ideas of Pan, the Satyrs, and other cavern-haunting figures, combining noble with ignoble form. The very numerous and various meanings of the word all point to the idea of novel contrast; either between the noble and ignoble, or less noble, or of the beautiful with the less beautiful. In Christian art, moreover, both of earlier and later date, a large number of works may be called grotesque in the general or popular sense of the word, because they are very singular in their appearance. This may arise in one or in two ways, or be caused by one or both of two conditions: either by the difficulty of the subject, or the archaic style of the workmen, or by a mixture of originality of mind and imperfect skill in craft. Many heathen grotesques of the earlier empire, as those of Pompeii, the Baths of Hadrian, and the newly-discovered frescoes of the Doria Pamphili Villa (see Parker, Antiquities of Rome, and appendix by the present writer) are extremely beautiful and perfect in workmanship, and come under the first or second classes mentioned, where the less pleasing form is contrasted with the more beautiful; this is the principle also of much cinque-cento grotesque. Early Christian work of this kind is not unfrequent in the catacombs, as in the "Seasons" of the catacombs of SS. Domitilla and Nereus, in many of the mosaic ornaments of St. Constantia and the other Græco-Roman churches. The employment of actual ugliness for surprise or contrast seems to be a characteristic of the art of the Northern races, found in Italy only in the earlier work of the Lombard race, and then always distinguishable in its manner from that of the French or Germans. Excepting the carvings of St. Ambrogio at Milan, and the churches of St. Michele at Pavia and Lucca, this species of grotesque is not part of our period; but the most characteristic and important of all these buildings, St. Zenone at Verona, cannot be altogether omitted. It seems as well to classify the various meanings of the Grotesque as follows, according to the examples found in various places and periods.

1. Grotesque, where more elaborate or serious representations are contrasted with easier and less important work by the same hand, as in ornamental borders round pictures, fillings-up of vaultings or surfaces round figures, &c. This embraces all the earlier grotesque of ornament, as in the frescoes of Hadrian's villa, or the Doria Pamphili columbarium.

2. Grotesque where the importance of the subject, and the workman's real interest in it, are for a time played with; he being led to do so by the natural exuberance of his fancy, by temporary fatigue of mind, or other causes—this includes the Lombard work.

3. Grotesque where either the imperfection of the workman's hand, or the inexpressible nature of his subject, render his work extraordinary in appearance, and obviously imperfect and unequal. This applies to the productions of all times and places where thoughtful and energetic men have laboured. Among its greatest and most characteristic examples are the Triumph of Death by Orgagna at Pisa, and the Last Judgment of Torcello; its most quaint and absurd appearance may be in the strange Ostrogothic mosaic in the sacristy of St. Giovanni Evangelista at Ravenna; or see Count Bastard's Peintures des MSS. passim; but this description of grotesqueness applies to almost all the Byzantine apses and arches of triumph where the spiritual world is depicted, and indeed to all Byzantine work in as far as it attempts naturalist representation, unless it be in the single pictures of birds, found in MSS., and occasionally in mosaic, as at St. Vitale at Ravenna.

Few of the works of the catacombs have any pretence to beauty. The birds and vine ornament of the tomb of Domitilla (perhaps the earliest Christian sepulchre, which is known by dated bricks to be certainly not later than Hadrian, and is very probably the actual grave of a granddaughter of Vespasian) are of the same the works of the catacombs have a beauty. The birds and vine ornament the tomb of Domitilla (perhaps the Christian sepulchre, which is known by to be certainly not later than Hadrian, very probably the actual grave of the mother of Vespasian) are of the same date as the tomb, which is anterior to the catacomb. These, with some remains of the paintings in the catacomb, and the 2nd century paintings of the catacomb of St. Praxetatus, are beautiful examples of playful naturalistic ornament, probably the work of heathen hands, under Christian direction, and taken in the Christian sense. They are mentioned here, rather as parallel works to the beautiful secular-Roman grotesques, than as true grotesques themselves. They are symbolic in the strict sense (see J. H. Parker's Photographs and Antiquities of Rome, and art. 'SYMBOLISM' in this Dictionary).

The grotesqueness of the early mosaics is of the same nature as that of the forms and figures in the best glass-painting. In both, the advantages of light and shade, correct drawing and perspective, are sacrificed entirely to colour and graphic force of impression. To express the plainest meaning in the brightest and most gemlike colour is the whole object of the artist. Of course in the works from the 5th to the 8th century, down to the baths of Graeco-Roman art, the rigid strangeness of the mosaics may have much to do with the incapacity of the workmen. Nevertheless the gift of colour is seldom wanting; and this, together with the painful asceticism of faces and forms in these works, points to an Eastern element in the minds and education of these artists. The great Medici MS. of Rabula is perhaps the central example of the genius and originality of design and graphic power, possessed by some of the unknown ascetics of Syria and the East. The mosaic of the Transfiguration at Mount Sinai, of the age of Justinian and many of those in Rome, as the apses of SS. Cosmas and Damianus, of St. Venantius, and above all St. Praxetatus, are instances giving evidence of necessarily imperfect treatment of a transcendent subject. Those of Ravenna have been already mentioned; but their workmanship greatly excels that of the Roman mosaics, and their quaintness strikes one less than their beauty.

The Lombard invasion of Italy dates 568 A.D., and it is in the earliest work of this extraordinary race that the Christian grotesque, properly speaking, may be said to arise. The best account of some of its examples, in Pavia, Lucca and Verona, is to be found in Appendix 8 of Ruskin's Stones of Venice, vol. i. p. 360-65, accompanied by excellent descriptive plates, and comparisons between the Lombard subjects and workmanship in St. Michele and St. Zenone, and the Byzantine masonry and carvings of St. Mark's at Venice. Invention and restless energy are the characteristics of the new and strong barbarian race; graceful conventionalism and exact workmanship, with innate but somewhat languid sense of beauty, belong to the Greek workmen. Neither of them can ever be undervalued by any one who is interested in the bearings of art on history; for there can be no doubt, that as the Lombard churches are the first outbreak of the inventive and graphic spirit which grew into the great Pisan and Florentine schools of painting and sculpture, so the Romano-Greek or Eastern influence, generally called Byzantine, extended over all the Christian world of the early medieval ages. To trace the Christian grotesque northward and westward through early MSS., bas-reliefs, and church decoration would be to write a history of Christian art in the dark ages. One of the first accomplishments of the denizens of a convent would of course be calligraphy, and to multiply Evangelinaria and missals was a part even of the earliest missionary work.

On the edge of every wave of progress made by the Faith, the convents arose first of all things, and the monks at once employed themselves on copies of the Holy Scriptures. Now it cannot be doubted, that a Schola Græca, a regular set of artists working according to Greek traditions of subject and treatment in art, existed in Rome from the 6th century, if not before, and received a great accession of strength in the 8th during the iconoclastic struggle in Constantinople, when many ecclesiastical artists must have withdrawn thence to Rome. There in fact, as elsewhere, the first faint revival of Christian art took place, entirely in churches and convents, and under what are called Byzantine forms. Whether Byzantinism be considered as the last embers of Graeco-Roman art, kept alive by Christianity for the Northern races, or as the first sparks of a new light feebly struggling for existence through all the centuries from the 6th to the 11th, there is no doubt that the characteristics of Byzantinism

—many of them characteristics of weakness, no doubt—prevailed in Christian ornamental work of all kinds, and were grotesque in all the senses of the word. The beautifully illustrated works of Prof. Westwood on Saxon, Irish and Northern MSS. in particular, are of the highest value in this connection, and are in fact almost the only works generally accessible in this country, which illustrate the connection between the Eastern and English churches through the Irish, by way of Iona and Lindisfarne (see MINIATURE).

The splendid works of D'Agincourt and Conant Bastard are the best authority and sources of information on the Southern Grotesque in min-ture carving within the limits of our period, and the art of photography is now bringing the remains of the ancient Lombard churches within reach of most persons interested in them. Descriptions fail in great measure without illustration, and few pictures or drawings are really trustworthy for details of ornamental work (see Stones of Venice, App. vol. I. ubi sup.). Mr. Ruskin has secured many valuable workmen. Deixon's Annales Archéologiques contain much excellent illustration; and a parallel work of equal value is still, we believe, carried on in Germany, called the Jahrbuch des Vereins für Alterthums-freunden in Rheinlande. Mr. Parker's photographs and Roman Antiquities above mentioned, are of great value to the historical student of art or of archaeology. The Northern Teutonic grotesque of actual sport of mind, ultra-naturalism, and caricature extends far beyond the limits of our period. But the term grotesque is generally applied to so many things within it, that some early specimens of Gothic humour seem necessary for the purposes of this Dictionary; and three selections from Count Bastard's work are accordingly given. No. 1 is a Merovingian initial letter; No. 2 Carlovingian of the 8th century; and No. 3 is the initial portrait of a monk-physician in a lettres-à-jour MS. of the 8th century of the medical works of Orbases, Alexander of Tralles, and Dioscorides. All will be found in colour in Count Bastard's first volume, with innumerable others. [R. St. J. T.]

GUARDIANS. The duties and liabilities of guardians as defined by the old Roman laws, were but slightly affected by the Christian religion [See DICT. OF GREEK AND ROM. ANTIQ. a. v. Tutor].

The principal church regulation, which concerned them, arose from the generally admitted maxim, that the clergy ought not to be entangled in secular affairs. Hence a guardian was not allowed to be ordained to any ecclesiastical function, until after the expiration of his guardianship. (Council Carthage, I. c. 9, A.D. 348.) For the same reason none of the clergy were allowed to be appointed guardians; and those who nominated any of them to such an office were liable to church censures. Thus Cyprian mentions the case of a person named Geminus Victor, who having by his will appointed a presbyter as guardian to his children, had his name struck out of the DIPTYCHUS, so that no prayer or oblation should be offered for him. (Cyprian Ep. 66, ad Clerum Furnit.)

Under the old Roman law a guardian was forbidden to marry his ward, or to give her in marriage to his son, except by special licence from the emperor (Cod. Justin. v. 6).

But Constantine altered this provision, so far as to allow such marriages, provided that the ward was of age, and that her guardian had offered her no injury in her minority, in which case he was to be banished and his goods confiscated. (Cod. Theod. ix. 8.) [G. A. J.]

GYNAECONITIS. [GALLERIES.]

GYROVAGI, vagabond monks, reprobated by monastic writers. Benedict, in the very commencement of his rule, excludes them from consideration, as unworthy of the name of monks (Bened. Reg. c. 1). He pronounces them worse even than the "sarabaites," or "remeloth" (Hieron. Ep. 22 ad Eustoch. c. 34), who, though living together by twos and threes, without rule or discipline, at any rate were stationary, and built themselves cells; whereas the "gyrovagi" were always roving from one monastery to another. After staying three or four days in one monastery, they would start again for another; for after a few days' rest it was usual for strangers to be subjected to the discipline of the monastery, to the same fare, labour, &c., as the inmates (Martene Reg. Comm. ad loc. cit.); always endeavouring to ascertain where in the neighbourhood they would be most likely to find comfortable quarters (Reg. Magist. c. 2; cf. Isidor. Pelus. I. Ep. 41, Joann. Climac. Scol. Grad. 27). Martene (v. s.) and Ménard (Bened. Anton. Concord. Regul. iii. li.) identify these "gyrovagi" with the "circumcelliones," or "circelliones." [v. CIRCUMCELLIONES.] They were of importance enough to be condemned in one of the canons of the Trullan council, A.D. 691, and are there described as wandering about in black robes and with unshorn hair: they are to be chased away into the desert, unless they will consent to enter a monastery, to have their hair trimmed, and in other ways to submit to discipline (Conc. Quinisextum c. 42). Bingham (Origin. Eccles. vii. ii. 12) and Hospinian (de Orig. Monach. ii. li.) merely repeat what is contained in the rule of Benedict. [I. G. S.] children, had his name struck from the list, so that no prayer or oblation should be offered for him. (Cyprian Ep. 6.)

Roman law a guardian was appointed for his ward, or to give her in marriage, except by special licence (Cod. Justin. v. 6). It is interesting to note that this restriction, so far as marriages, provided that the guardian had the ward in her minority, in which case he was to be satisfied with his goods confirmed in law. EVANGELISTS (GALLERIES). Vagabond monks, reprobatelike. Benedict, in the very beginning of his rule, excludes them from the name of monks (1). He pronounces them worse than "sarabaitae," or "remoboth" (ad Eustoch. c. 34), who, though they were two and three, without rule or discipline, were stationary, and built their cells; whereas the "gyrovagi" were nomadic, and from one monastery to another, for three or four days in one monastery, and then start again for another; for their rest it was usual for strangers to be received into the monastery to the discipline of the monks, and labour, &c., as the law of the *Reg. They were of importance in the 6th century, and were to be condemned in one of the canons of a council, A.D. 681, and are there mentioned in black robes and wandering about in black robes and hair: they are to be chased away from a monastery, unless they will consent, and to have their hair trimmed, and to submit to discipline (*Conc. HABIT, THE MONASTIC. (Habitus monasti us, σχῆμα μοναδικόν or μοναχικόν). A distinctive uniform was no part of monachism originally. Only it was required of monks that their dress and general appearance should indicate "gravity and a contempt of the world" (Bingh. Orig. Eccl. vii. iii. 6). Hair worn long was an effeminacy (August. de Op. Mon. c. 31, Hieron. Ep. 22, ad Eustoch. c. 28, cf. Epiphani. adv. Haeres. lxxx. 7), the head shaven all over was too like the priests of Isis (Hieron. Comm. in Ezek. c. 44, Ambros. Ep. 58 ad Sabini). In popular estimation persons abstaining from the use of silken apparel were often called monks (Hieron. Ep. 23 ad Marcell.). The same writer defines the dress of a monk merely as "cheap and shabby" (Ep. 4 ad Rustic., Ep. 13 ad Paulin.). And the dress of a nun as "sombre" in tint, and "coarse" in texture (Ep. 23 ad Marcell.). He warns the enthusiasts of asceticism against the eccentricity in dress, which was sometimes a mere pretence of austerity, a long untrimmed beard, bare feet, a black cloak, chains on the wrists (Ep. 22 ad Eustoch. c. 28, cf. Pallad. Hist. Lav. c. 52). So Cassian protests against monks wearing wooden crosses on their shoulders (Coll. viii. 3). Hair closely cut, and the cloak (pallium), usually worn by Greek philosophers and lecturers, were at first badges of a monk in Western Christendom; but even these were not peculiar to him. The cloak was often worn by other Christians, exposing them to the vulgar reproach of being "Greeks" and "impostors" (Bingh. Orig. Eccl. i. ii. 4), and any one appearing in public with pale face, short hair, and a cloak, was liable to be hooted and jeered at by the unbelieving populace as a monk (Salv. de Gubernat. viii. 4).

Cassian is more precise on a monk's costume, and devotes to it the first book of his Institutes. But he allows that the sort of dress suitable for a monk in Egypt or Ethiopia may be very unsuitable elsewhere, and he condemns sack-cloth, or rather, a stuff made of goats' hair or camels' hair (cilicium vestis) worn outside as too conspicuous. He speaks in detail of the various parts of a monk's dress; the hood (cucullus), which is to remind the monk to be as a little child in simplicity; the sleeveless tunic (colobatum), in Egypt made of linen, which reminds him of self-mortification; the GIRDLE or waist-band (cingulum), to remind him to have his "loins girded" as a "good soldier of Christ"; the cape over the shoulders (mafors, palliolium); the sheepskin or goatskin round the waist and thighs (melotes, pera, penula); and for the feet the sandals (CALIGAE), only to be worn as an occasional luxury, never during the divine service (Cassian Instit. i. cc. 1-10 cf. Ruffin. Hist. Mon. c. 3).

Benedict characteristically passes over this item in the monastic discipline very quickly; summing up his directions about it in one of the last chapters of his rule; and discreetly leaving questions of colour and material, as indifferent, to be decided by climate and other circumstances. He lays down the general principle, that there are to be no superfluities, adding, that a tunic and hood, or, for outdoor work, a sort of cape to protect the shoulders (scapulare), instead of the hood, ought to suffice generally; two suits of each being allowed for each monk, and some suits of rather better quality being kept for monks on their peregrinations. The worn out articles of dress are to be restored to the keeper of the wardrobe, for the poor. Benedict, however, "to avoid disputes" appends a short list, corresponding very nearly to Cassian's, of things necessary for a monk, all which are to be supplied to the brethren, at the discretion of the abbat, and none of them to be the property or "peculiare" of any one. The only addition to the Egyptian costume is that of socks (pelules) for the winter; the Benedictine "bracie" apparently corresponding with "cingulum," and the "scapulare" with "palliolium." Benedict allows trowsers [FEMORALIA] on a journey, and on some other occasions; underclothing he is silent about; consequently commentators and the usages of particular monasteries differ on this point. To the list of clothing Benedict adds, as part of a monk's equipment, a knife (cultellus), a pen (graphium), a needle (acus) a handkerchief or handcloth (mappula), and tablets for writing on (tabulae). He specifies also as necessaries for the night, a mattress (matta), a coverlet (sagum), a blanket (henna), and a pillow (capitale) (Bened. Reg. c. 55). Martene quotes Hildemarus for the traditional custom, by which each monk was provided with a small jar of soap for himself and of grease for his shoes (Reg. Bened. Comment. ad loc.).

Laxity of monastic discipline soon began to provoke fresh enactments about dress, sometimes more stringent and more minute than at first (e.g. Reg. Isidor. c. 14, Reg. M-g. c. 81). Councils re-enact, and reformers protest. The council of Agde, A.D. 506, and the 4th council of Toledo, A.D. 633, repeat the canon of the 4th council of Carthage A.D. 398, "ne clericus communi nutrietur" (Conc. Agath. c. 20; Conc. iv. Toletan. c. 40; Conc. iv. Carthag. c. 44). Ferreolus, in southern Gaul, A.D. 558, repeats the old edict against superfluities, and forbids his monks to use perfumes, or wear linen next the skin (Ferreol. Reg. cc. 14, 31, 32). In Spain, Fructuosus of Braga, A.D. 656, insists on uniformity of apparel. Irregularity about dress seems with monks, as in a regiment, to have been an accompaniment of demoralisation. (See, further, Menard Conc. Regul. lxiii.; Alterser. Asceticon. v.; Hildemard. Orig. Ascet. Syta. xiii.)

The Greek Euchologion gives an office for the assumption of the ordinary habit of a monk (ἀναλογία τοῦ μικροῦ σχήματος), and another for assuming the greater or "angelic" habit distinctive of those ascetics who were thought to have attained the perfection of monastic life (ἀκ. τοῦ μεγάλου καὶ ἀγγελικοῦ σχήματος). HAGIOSIDERON. One of the substitutes for BELLS still used in the East is the Hagiosideron (ἅγιος ἰσίδηρον, ἁγίωμα) [see SEMANTRON]. These usually consist of an iron plate, curved like the tire of a wheel, which is struck with a hammer, and produces a sound not unlike that of a gong. They are occasionally made of brass. The illustration is taken from Dr. Neale's work (Neale's Eastern Church, Int. 217, 225; Daniel's Codex Lit. iv. 199). [C.]

HAIL MARY or AVE MARIA. An address and prayer commonly made to St. Mary the Virgin in the unreformed Western churches.

What it is, and when used.—It consists of two parts: 1. The words used by the angel Gabriel in saluting St. Mary, as rendered by the Vulgate, slightly altered by the addition of St. Mary's name, "Hail Mary, full of grace; the Lord is with thee;" followed by the words of Elizabeth, "Blessed art thou among women, and blessed is the fruit of thy womb." 2. A prayer, subsequently added to the salutation, "Holy Mary, Mother of God, pray for us sinners now, and at the hour of our death."

This formula is ordered by the breviary of pope Pius V. to be used daily, after the recitation of compline, and before the recitation of each of the other canonical hours, i.e., matins, prime, terce, sext, nones, and vespers. It is also commanded, on the same authority, to be used before the recitation of the "Office of the Blessed Virgin," and before each of the hours in the "Little Office." It is also used nine times every day in what is called the "Angelus." It is also used sixty-three times in the devotion called the "Crown of the Virgin," and one hundred and fifty times in the "Rosary of the Virgin." It also occurs in many of the public offices, and is used before sermons, and it most commonly forms a part of the special devotions appointed by bishops for obtaining indulgences.

Its date.—Cardinal Baronius and Cardinal Bona have used an expression which, while not committing them to a declaration of fact, or a statement of their own belief, has yet led subsequent writers (see Gaume, loc. inf. cit.) to claim their authority for the assertion, that the second, or precatory, part of the Ave Maria was adopted in, or immediately after, the council of Ephesus, at the beginning of the 5th century. "At that time," says Baronius (loc. inf. cit.), "the angelical salutation is believed to have received that addition, 'Holy Mary, Mother of God, pray for us, &c.,' which came to be constantly repeated by the faithful." "The angelical salutation," says Bona (loc. inf. cit.), "is believed to have received this addition in the great council of Ephesus." It is quite certain that the two cardinals and their followers have ante-dated this part of the Ave Maria by more than a thousand years. The first, or Scriptural, part, consisting of the words of the angel and of Elizabeth, is older by some five hundred years than the second, or precatory, part, which has been attached to it, and the first part did not become used as a formula until the end of the 11th century. The earliest injunction authorising its being taught together with the previously existing formulas of the Creed and the Lord's Prayer, is found in the Constitutions of Odo, who became bishop of Paris in the year 1196. The Benedictines of St. Stephen of Caer, in 1706, maintained the following thesis: "The angelical salutation began to be in use in the 12th century, but these words 'Holy Mary, Mother of God, pray for us, &c.,' seem to have been added a long time afterwards, in the 16th century;" a thesis which was denounced by the then bishop of Bayeux as scandalous, but was then defended and maintained against him by Père Massuet. The earliest known use of the first, or scriptural, part, is in the Liber Antiphonarius, attributed by John the Deacon to St. Gregory the Great, and generally published with his works. If St. Gregory is the author of the Liber Antiphonarius, and if the antiphon in which these words occur (p. 657, Ed. inf. cit.) is not a later insertion (the same words in the previous page are undoubtedly a modern insertion), the angelical salutation, as found in the Bible, was used as early as the beginning of the 7th century; not, however, as a formula of devotion, but as we might use an anthem on one day of the year. This passage from St. Gregory is the only thing which brings the Ave Maria within the chronological limits assigned to this Dictionary, for it is allowed (see Mahillon, loc. inf. cit.) that similar words in the so-called liturgy of St. James the Less are of late introduction there.

The addition of the second, or precatory, part of the Ave Maria, is stated by Pelbartus to have been made in consequence of a direct injunction of St. Mary, who appeared to a pious woman, and gave her instructions to that effect. The use of it sprang up in the 15th century, and is first authorised in pope Pius Vth's breviary, in the year 1568.

The "Crown of the Virgin" consists of sixty-three recitations of the Ave Maria, one for each year that St. Mary was supposed to have lived, with the recitation of the Lord's Prayer after every tenth Ave Maria. Its institution is attributed by some to Peter the Hermit. It appears to have sprung up and spread in the 12th and 13th centuries.

The "Rosary, or Psalter of the Blessed Virgin" consists of one hundred and fifty Ave Marias, after the number of the Psalms of David, together with fifteen Pater Nosters, distributed at equal intervals among the Ave Marias. Its institution is attributed by some to St. Dominic, and to the year 1210.

The "Angelus" consists of three recitations of the Ave Maria at the sound of the Angelus bell in the morning, three at midday, and three at night. On each occasion the first Ave Maria is to be preceded by the sentence, "The angel of the Lord announced to Mary, and she conceived of the Holy Ghost;" the second, by "Behold the handmaid of the Lord." Be it unto me according unto thy word;" the third, by "The Word was made flesh and dwelt among us." The Angelus appears to have been originated in the year 1287, by Buonvicino da Riva, of Milan, of the order of the Humiliati, who began the practice of ringing a bell at the recitation of the Ave Maria. In 1318 John XXII. gave an indulgence 11th century. The earliest of its being taught together with existing formulas of the Creed is found in the Constitutions of the Council of Paris in the year 1024. St. Stephen of Caen, the following thesis: "The Virgin began to be in use in these words 'Holy Mary, pray for us, &c.' seem to have time afterwards, in the 16th which was denounced by the eyes as scandalous, but was stained against him by Peter the first known use of the first, or in the Liber Antiphoniarum, in the Deacon to St. Gregory generally published with his Gregory is the author of the antiphons, and if the antiphon in question occurs (p. 657, Ed. inf. cit.) mention (the same words of the antiphon) undoubtedly a modern interpolation, as found in the early as the beginning of the 14th, however, as a formula of devotion might use an anthem on one of these passages from St. Gregory which brings the Ave Maria to its original limits assigned to this devotion (see Mabillon, loc. cit.) is allowed (see Mabillon, loc. cit.) similar words in the so-called Less are of late introduction.

of ten days for saying an Ave Maria to the sound of a bell rung at night. In 1458, Calixtus III. gave three years and one hundred and twenty days' indulgence for reciting the Ave Maria; and the Pater Noster three times a day. In 1518, Leo X. ordered that the Angelus bell should be rung three times a day, and he gave 500 days' indulgence for saying the Angelus morning, midday, and evening. Finally, Benedict XIII. and Benedict XIV. gave a plenary indulgence, to be obtained once a month, to all who recited it three times daily.

The dates, therefore, are as follow:—
The earliest known use (in the form of an antiphon, or anthem) of the Scriptural words, afterwards adopted as the first part of the Ave Maria—the 7th century.
The earliest known use of the same part as a formula—the 11th century.

The earliest authoritative recommendation of the said formula—the 12th century.
The Crown of the Virgin—the 12th century.
The Rosary or Psalter of the Virgin—the 13th century.

The Angelus—the 14th century.
The earliest known use of the prayer which forms the second part of the Ave Maria—the 15th century.

The earliest authoritative recommendation and injunction of the same—the 16th century.

HAIR, WEARING OF. The regulations of the ancient church on this subject may be divided into three distinct classes, as relating—
i. to the clergy; ii. to penitents; iii. to believers in general.

i. The hair in ancient times appears to have been sometimes worn at great length. Thus Eusebius (H. E. ii. 23), speaking of James the Apostle, notes that a razor never came upon his head. But shortened hair appears to have been considered a mark of distinction between the heathen philosopher and the Christian teacher. Thus Gregory Nazianzen (Orat. 28) says of Maximus, that he brought no qualification to the pastoral office except that of shortening his hair, which, before that time, he had worn disgracefully long. It is also recorded of one Theotimus, bishop of Seythia, that he still retained the long hair which he had worn when a student, in token that, in becoming a bishop, he had not abandoned philosophy (Soz. H. E. vii. 26). But this liberty was restricted by various decrees of councils. The fourth council of Carthage, A.D. 398 (c. 44), provides that the clergy shall neither permit their hair nor beards to grow. Another reading of this decree is, that they were neither to let their hair grow nor shave their beards. The first synod of St. Patrick, A.D. 456 (c. 6), provides that the hair of the clergy should be shorn according to the Roman fashion, and (c. 10) that any who allow their hair to grow, should be excluded from the church. The council of Agde, A.D. 506 (c. 20), ordains that clergy who retain long hair, shall have it shortened, even against their will, by the archdeacon. The first council of Barcelona, A.D. 540 (c. 3), provides that no clergyman shall let his hair grow nor shave his beard. The first council of Braga, A.D. 563 (c. 11), provides that lectors shall not have love-locks (granos), hanging down, after the heathen fashion. The second council of Braga, A.D. 572 (c. 66), decrees that the clergy ought not to discharge their sacred functions with long hair, but with closely-cut hair and open ears. The fourth council of Toledo, A.D. 633 (c. 41), denounces certain lectors in Galicia, who, while retaining a small tonsure, allowed the lower portion of the hair to grow. The council in Trullo, A.D. 692 (Cone. Quinisæc. c. 21), ordains that clergy who have been deprived of their office, should, on their repentance, be shorn after the fashion of the clergy; if they refused this, their hair was to be left long, in token of their preference of a worldly life. At a council held at Rome, A.D. 721 (c. 17), anathema was pronounced against any of the clergy who should allow his hair to grow. The same was repeated at another Roman council, held A.D. 743 (c. 8).

These decrees, however, appear to have been difficult of enforcement. Heretical sects especially appear to have been fond of adopting eccentric fashions of wearing the hair and beard as badges and tokens of their opinions. Epiphanius (Haeres. in Massil. n. 6, 7) denounces certain heretical monks, dwelling in Mesopotamia, in monasteries which he calls "Mandras," who were in the habit of shaving the beard and letting the hair grow, and contends that such practices are contrary to the apostolic injunctions. Jerome (Comm. in Esch. c. 44) says that the clergy should neither have their heads closely shaven, like the priests of Isis and Serapis, nor let their hair grow to an extravagant length, like barbarians and soldiers, but that the hair should be worn just so long as to cover the head. In another place (Epist. 18, al. 22, ad Eustoch.), he denounces certain monks who indulged in beards like goats and ringlets like women. In his "Life of Illarion," he commends the saint for cutting his hair once a year, at Easter. Augustine (De Op. Mon. c. 31) speaks of certain monks who, fearing lest they might lose reverence by their shorn heads, "ne vilior habentur tosa sanctitas," allowed their hair to grow, in order to suggest to those who saw them a resemblance to Samuel and the elder prophets. Against these he quotes the saying of the apostle, that in Christ the veil shall be taken away (2 Cor. iii. 14). Gregory the Great (Pastoral, p. 2, c. 7) says that priests are rightly forbidden either to shave their heads, or to let their hair grow long. The hair on the head of a priest, is to be kept so long that it may cover the skin, and cut so close that it may not interfere with the eyes. The practice seems to have been, to wear the hair short and the beard long. Sidonius Apollinaris (Epist. iv. 24) speaks of one Maximus Palatinus, a clergyman, as wearing his hair short and his beard long. Gregory the Great is described as wearing a beard of the old fashion and of moderate size, a large round tonsure, and his hair neatly curled, "intorto," and hanging to the middle of his ears (Joann. Diae. Vita Greg. Max. c. 4, c. 83). Bede (Eecl. Hist. i. 4, c. 14), describing a vision of SS. Peter and Paul, says that the one was shaven (and tonsured), as a clergyman, the other wore his beard long. For other particulars regarding the hair of the clergy, see TOSSURE.

ii. Closely-cut hair was always enjoined on penitents, as a condition of their reception into the church. The council of Agde (c. 15) provides that no penitents shall be received unless they have parted with their hair, "comas depheuerint." The first council of Barcelona (c. 6) speaks of the shaven heads of male penitents. The third council of Toledo (c. 12) provides that the first step to the admission of a male penitent, shall be to shave his head. So Optatus (Contra Donatist. l. 23) finds fault with the Donatists for having shaven the heads of certain priests whom they had admitted to penance. With regard to women, Ambrose (Ad Virg. Laps. c. 8) speaks of cutting off the hair, which by vain glory had tempted to the sin of luxury; but Jerome, in describing the repentance of Fabiola (Ep. 30, al. 84, ad Ocean.), speaks of her dishevelled hair. But before their restoration, penitents and excommunicated persons were obliged to let the hair and beard grow. Thus a certain Ursicinus, bishop of Cahors, being excommunicated, was forbidden to cut either his hair or his beard (Greg. Turon. Hist. Franc. l. 8, n. 20). In general, neglected hair appears to have been a sign of mourning. Chrysostom (Serm. 3, on Job) says that many in time of mourning let the hair grow, whereas Job shorn his. The reason being, that where the hair is honoured, it is a sign of mourning to cut it short, but where it is worn short, it is a sign of mourning to let it grow. Baronius (Annals, A.D. 631, n. 4) speaks of a certain bishop, named Lupus, exiled by Clothaire, who came mourning to the king with long dishevelled locks, and the king, in token of forgiveness, commanded his hair to be shorn.

iii. The laity were sometimes recognised as usually wearing their hair long. The council in Trullo (Conc. Quinisext. c. 21) ordains that delinquent and impudent clergy should wear their hair long, as the laity. Yet immoderately lengthened hair appears to have been considered a token of effeminacy and luxuriousness. When the emperor Heraclius succeeded to the throne, his hair was immediately cut short (Baronius, Annal. A.D. 610, n. 5). Many attempts were therefore made to restrain the liberty of the laity, in this respect, within due bounds, founded partly on a sense of what was decent and becoming, partly on the principle that it is not right either for men or women to obliterate the characteristics of their sex. The council in Trullo (c. 96) asserts that it is inconsistent with the baptismal profession, that baptised men should wear their hair in cunningly woven plaits or tresses, and orders that such as would not obey this admonition, should be excommunicated. The council of Gangra (c. 17) anathematizes any women who, through pretended asceticism, should cut close the hair which was given to them as a token of subjection. The decree was confirmed by the emperor Theodosius, with the addition that any bishop who should admit such women into the church, should be deprived of his office (Soz. H. E. vii. 26). In the Apostolic Constitutions (i. 3), the followers of Christ are ordered not to promote the growth of their hair, but rather to restrain and shorten it. Men are forbidden to wear ringlets, or to use ointments, or in any way to imitate the adornments in use among women. They are also forbidden to collect their hair into a knot or crown, ποικίλεις ἐν ᾧ ἴσται σπατάλιον, or to indulge in tresses, either artfully dishevelled or carefully arranged, ἢ ἀποχόμα ἢ μεμυρισμένη, or to curl and crisp it, or dye it yellow. They are also forbidden to shave the head, as if thereby obliterating the peculiar distinction, τῆς μορφῆς, of mankind. Clemens Alexandrianus (Pædagog. ii. c. 8) speaks of the folly committed by aged women in dyeing their hair; and (l. i. c. 3) reprehends the folly of which some men were guilty, in eradicated the hair, apparently not only from their beards, but from all parts of their bodies, with pitch plaisters. He also (l. iii. c. 11) gives full directions for the arrangement of the hair. The hair of men is to be cut close, unless it is crisp and curly, ὄφλας. Long curls and love-locks are strictly forbidden, as effeminate and unseemly. The hair is not to be allowed to grow over the eyes, and a closely-cropped head is alleged not only to be becoming a grave man, but to render the brain less liable to injury, by accustoming it to endure heat and cold. The beard is to be allowed to grow, since an ample beard becomes the male sex; if cut at all, the chin must not be left quite bare. The moustache may be clipped with scissors, so that it may not be dirtied in eating, but not shorn with a razor. Women are to wear the hair modestly arranged upon the neck, and fastened with a hair pin. The habit of wearing false hair is strongly denounced, since, it is said, in such cases, when the priest, in bestowing his benediction, lays his hand upon the head, the blessing does not reach the wearer of the hair, but rests upon the person to whom the hair belongs. [P. O.]

HAIR-CLOTH (Cilicium). The rough hair-cloth for which Cilicia was anciently famous was used in several ways, both as an actual instrument, and as a symbol, of mortification.

1. The hair-shirt has frequently been worn, as is well known, as a means of mortifying the flesh without ostentation. Thus Jerome (Epist. to J. Nepot. c. 9) says that some other way narrate how the young Nepotianus, when in the imperial service, wore hair-cloth under his chlamys and fine linen. And Paulinus Petrucius (Vita S. Martini, ii. p. 1019 D, Migne) says of the monks of St. Martin:

"Multis vestis erat setis contexta camel."

 The hair-shirt has frequently been worn, as a means of mortifying the

about A.D. 688 (c. 9, in Mabillon's Acta SS.
Bened. Sæc. ii.), we read that the saint wore an inner garment of hair-cloth (esophorio amictivo cilicino). One of the saints who bore the name of Theodore was distinguished as τριχίνας from his constant habit of wearing a hair-shirt (Maeri hierolox, s. v. Trichinus).

Monks frequently used the hair-shirt. Cassian, however (Instit. l. 1) does not consider it suitable for their ordinary garb, both as savouring of over-righteousness and as hindering labour [HAIR, THE MONASTIC]. In his time—Cassian died about A.D. 430—few monks seem to have used it; in after times we find it constantly used, at any rate by those who claimed superior sanctity. On the whole subject, see O. Zöckler, Krit. Geschichte der Askese, p. 82 [Frankf.-a.- M. 1863].

2. Of the symbolic uses of hair-cloth the following are the principal:—The candidates for baptism anciently came to the preliminary examination [SCRUTINIAM] with bare feet, and standing on hair-cloth (Augustine, De Symb. ad Catech. ii. 1; compare iv. 1). Penitents in the ceremonies of Ash Wednesday were clothed with a hair-cloth, as well as sprinkled with ashes (Martene, Rit. Ant. IV. c. xvii.; Ordo. 7, 16, etc.). The altar was sometimes covered with hair-cloth in times of affliction (Ib. III. iii. 2).
 The dying were covered with a hair-cloth blessed by the priest (Ib. I. vii. 4, Ordo 19).
 The bodies of the dead were sometimes wrapped in hair-cloth; as, for instance, that of Bernard of Hildesheim (Life, c. 43; in Surius, Nov. 20).
 Charles the Great was buried in the hair-shirt which he had worn in life (Life by the monk of Angoulême, c. 24; quoted by Martene, III. xii.
 13). In an ancient form for the reception of penitents on Maundy Thursday, given by Mar-tene (IV. xxii. § ii. Ordo 6) from a Sarum missal, a banner of hair-cloth (vexillum cilicinum) is directed to be borne in the procession to the church. [C.]

HALLELUJAH. [ALLELUIA.]

HAND, THE, is used as symbolic of the manifested presence of the First Person of the Holy Trinity, GOD THE FATHER.

The declining skill of the earliest Christian workmen, and their utter technical incapacity after the time of Constantine, appears in the strongest light in their attempts to delineate the extremities of the human figure. Martigny remarks that the hands of the martyrs presenting or receiving their crowns in heaven are covered or concealed in token of adoration; but this applies only to the left hand. The comparative skill, or want of skill, with which these parts of the body are treated, might possibly be a test of ancient work in the cata-combs, could paintings be discovered of very ancient date, and thoroughly ascertained authenticity without modern retouch.

The hand representing God occurs in the great Transfiguration of St. Apollinaris in Classe at Ravenna (Martigny, p. 639, s. v. Transfiguration). Also in a carving of the same subject on the Ivory Casket of the Library at Brescia (Westwood, Ficile Ivory Cests, 94, p. 37, catalogue). [R. St. J. T.]

HANDS, IMPOSITION OF. [IMPOSITION OF HANDS.]

HANDS, THE LIFTING OF 737

HANDS, THE LIFTING OF IN PRAYER. 1. The strict observance of this custom, and the importance attached to it among the early Christians, will hardly be understood, unless we take into consideration the habits and opinions of their Jewish and heathen forefathers.
 It was a rite that had descended to them from both. Among the children of Israel it accompanied acts of praise as well as prayer. Witness the Book of Psalms:—"Thus will I bless Thee while I live: I will lift up my hands in Thy name" (Ps. lxxiii. 4); "Lift up your hands in holiness, and bless the Lord" (Ps. cxxxiv. 2).
 Before Ezra read the law to the people after their return from Babylon, he "blessed the Lord, the great God, and all the people answered Amen, Amen, with lifting up of their hands" (Neh. viii. 6; compare 1 Esdr. ix. 47). In prayer the gesture was so universal that to pray and to lift up the hands were almost convertible terms.
 Thus in Lamentations, "Lift up thy hands towards Him for the life of thy young children" (Ch. ii. 19). Again in Psalm xxviii. 2: "Hear the voice of my supplications, when I cry unto Thee; when I lift up my hands towards Thy holy oracle." When Heliodorus came to take away the treasures in the temple, the inhabitants of Jerusalem "all holding their hands toward heaven, made supplication" (2 Macc. iii.
 20; comp. xiv. 34; Ps. cxli. 2; Is. i. 15; 1 Esdr. viii. 73; Eccles. ii. 19). This gesture in prayer was without doubt so highly valued among the Jews, partly in consequence of the victory obtained over the Amalekites, while the hands of Moses were held up (Exod. xvii. 11); but it was nevertheless "not of Moses, but of the fathers." We might infer this from the manner in which the story is related; but more conclusively from the fact that the same rite prevailed among the Gentiles. "All we of human kind," says Aristotle, "stretch forth our hands to heaven, when we pray" (De Mundo, c.
 vi. comp. Hom. II. viii. 347; Virg. Aen. iii. 176;
 x. 667). Minutius Felix proves that it was still common among the heathen in the 3rd century, "I hear the common people, when they stretch their hands towards heaven, say nothing but God" (Octavius, c. 5).

2. A practice thus universal and of such antiquity, could not fail to have a place in the received ritual of the first Christians. It is more than once recognized in the New Testament itself; as when St. Paul says, "I will therefore that men pray everywhere lifting up holy hands" (1 Tim. ii. 8). Clemens of Alexandria, A.D. 192, is an early witness to the continued observance of the rite. After defining prayer to be "converse with God," he proceeds to say that therefore, as if reaching up to Him, we "raise the head and lift the hands towards heaven" (Strom. vii. c. vii. § 40). Tertullian, his contemporary:—"Worshipping with modesty and humility we the more commend our prayers to God, not even lifting up our hands too high, but with self-restraint and becomingly" (De Orat. c. xiii.). Again: "We Christians, looking upwards, with hands out-spread, because free from it; with head bare, because we are not men; lastly, without a remembrancer [of the names of the gods], because we pray from the heart" (Apol. c. xxx.).
 Origen, A.D. 230, says that among the many adaptation, was certain to be retained in some form or other. To facilitate its observance there was in the atrium of many churches a FOUNTAIN or reservoir of water resembling those with which the temples had been furnished.

 Thus Paulinus, bishop of Tyre, at the beginning of the 4th century, in an open space before a church which he built in that city, caused to be made a fountain opposite the temple, which by their plentiful flow of water afforded the means of cleansing to those who passed out of the sacred precincts into the interior" (Euseb. Hist. Eccl.
 l. x. c. 4). In the West, Paulinus of Nola, A.D. 394, gives a poetical description of a basin (cantharus) in the court of a church built by him. "With its ministering stream," he says, "it washes the hands of those who enter" (ad Seren. Ep. xxiii. § 15). From the same writer we learn that there was a cantharus in the atrium of the basilica of St. Peter at Rome, which "spouted streams that ministered to the hands and faces" of the worshippers (ad Lammach. Ep. xiii. § 13). St. Chrysostom says, "It is the custom for fountains to be placed in the courts of houses of prayer, that they who are going to pray to God may first wash their hands, and so lift them up in prayer" (Tom. de Sic. N. T. loc. n. xxv. on 2 Cor. iv. 13). Sozomen tells us that in a riot at Constantinople in the reign of Constantius "the court of the church (of Aecadius the martyr) was filled with blood, and the well therein overflowed with blood," (Hist. l. cct. l. ii. c. 38).

II. Frequent allusions to the practice for which public provision was thus made occur in Christian writers. For example, Tertullian, A. 192: "What is the sense of entering on prayer with the hands, indeed, washed, but the spirit unclean?" (De Orat. c. xi.). This is said of all prayer, private as well as public. With regard to private prayer in the morning, the Apostolical Constitutions give the following direction: "Let every one of the faithful, man or woman, when they rise from sleep in the morning, before doing work, having washed [not bathed the whole body, but νιψάμενοι, having washed parts of it, especially the hands] pray" (lib. viii. c. 32). St. Chrysostom in the following passage is speaking of public worship in general: "I see a custom of this sort prevailing among the many, viz., that they study how they may come (into church) with clean clothes, and how they may wash their hands, but consider not how they may present a clean soul to God.
 And I do not say this to prevent your washing hands or face, but because I wish you to wash, as is befitting, not with water only, but with the virtues correlative to the water." (Hom. li. in st. Math. Ec. c. xv. 17-20).

More frequently it is spoken of as part of the preparation for Holy Communion. For example, St. Chrysostom: "Tell me, wouldst thou choose to draw near to the sacrifice with unwashed hands? I think not; but thou wouldst rather not draw near at all than with filthy hands.
 Wouldst thou, then, while thus careful in the little matter, draw near having a filthy soul?" (Hom. liii. in Ep. ad Eph. c. i. 20-23). Similarly in the West, Caesarius of Arles, A.D. 502: "All the men, when they intend to approach the altar, wash their hands, and all the women use for been cloth on which to receive the body of Christ . . . As the men wash their hands with water, so let them wash their souls with alms," &c. (*Serm. cccxix. § 5 in App. iv. ad Opp.

 S. August.*). Again: "If we are ashamed and afraid to touch the eucharist with filthy hands, much more ought we to be afraid to receive the same eucharist in a polluted soul" (*Serm. cccxli.
 § 6; ibid.*).

IV. The celebrant and his assistants washed their hands between the dismissal of the cate-chumens and the offering of the gifts. Thus in the Apostolical Constitutions "Let one subdeacon give water to the priests for washing their hands, a symbol of the purity of souls consecrated to God" (lib. viii. c. 11). Cyril of Jerusalem:
 "Ye saw the deacon who gave to the priest and to the elders surrounding the altar of God (water) to wash (their hands, νιψάσθαι) . . .
 The washing of the hands is a symbol of guiltlessness of sins" (Catech. Myst. q. v. § 1).
 Pseudo-Dionysius: "Standing before the most holy symbols the high priest (i.e. the bishop) washes his hands with the venerable order of the priests" (De Eccl. Hierarch. cap. iii. sect. 3, § 10; sim. sect. ii.). We find the same rite in the West. Thus in one of the Questions out of the Old and New Testaments, probably compiled by Hilary the deacon, A.D. 354, it is implied that at Rome the deacons did not "pour water on the priest's hands, as" (adds the writer) "we see in all the churches" (Qu. ci. On the Arrogance of the Roman Levites in App. iii. ad Opp. Aug.). We may remark, in passing, that the Clementine liturgy, as above quoted, assigns the office to a subdeacon. In the earliest Ordo Romanus extant, probably of the 7th century, it is ordered that, after the reception of the gifts, the bishop "return to his seat and wash his hands," and that "the archdeacon standing before the altar wash his hands, when the receiving (of the oblations) is completed" (*Ord. i. § 14; Mus. Ital.
 tom. ii. p. 11; compare Ord. li. § 9, p. 47*).

Since the clergy, as well as the people, washed their hands before they entered the church, it may be asked, how they came to do so a second time? Ancient writers give only a symbolical reason, but it is not probable that the custom originated in that. The words of the Ordo Romanus suggest that the hands might be soiled by the oblations, which at that time were large and various in kind. They certainly were washed immediately after these were taken from the offerers, and before the celebrant proceeded to offer the elements selected out of them for consecration. Another reason which might make it necessary is suggested by Sala (Not. (1) in Bonn. Ber. Lit. l. ii. c. ix. § 6), viz., that a little time before the bishop and priests had laid their hands on the heads of the catechumens and penitents. The washing of the hands, or rather fingers, by the celebrant after his communion, now ordered in the church of Rome, was not practised for more than a thousand years after Christ. [W. E. S.]

HANGINGS. Some few notices may be added to those already given under CURTAINS.
 The curtains which closed the doors of the chancel screen in later times often bore the pictorial representation of some saint or angelic being. At the present day St. Michael is often represented upon them as prohibiting all access on the beams (Nolo, Eastern (i. 195). It was on the curtain of the bona of the church at Anabotha that St. Epiphanius saw the painted figures which gave him so much offence, and caused him to tear the curtain, and desire that it should be replaced by one of a single colour (Epiphanius, Epist. ad Joann., p. 319). The censure passed by Asterius of Amasia on the excessive luxury displayed in the textile fabrics of his day proves that at the end of the fourth century representations of sacred facts were woven in the stuffs in ordinary use for hangings, and even for dresses. The same author also describes the painted hangings of the sepulchre of St. Euphemia at Chalcodon representing the martyrdom of that saint (Aster. Amas. Homil. de Divit. et Lucavo; Eucarist. in martyr. Euphem.). Paulinus of Nola is another authority on the decoration of these vela with pictorial designs:—

“Vela coloratis textum fucata figuris.”

A velum concealing the altar from the gaze of the laity is mentioned in the office for the dedication of a church in the Sacramentary of Gregory. When the bishop, having brought the relics which were to be deposited within it, had arrived at the altar, he was to be concealed from the sight of the people by a veil, before he proceeded to anoint the four corners with the chrism (extenso velo inter clerum et populum, Muratori, ii. 481). An offering of hangings vela was made to the church of St. Peter's by a lady of rank named Rusticiana, which were carried to their destination by the whole body of the clergy chanting a litany (Greg. Magn. Epist. ix. 38). The supposititious Second Epistle of Clement to James the Lord's brother, “de sacratis vestibus et vasis,” gives minute directions for the washing of the altar cloths and other vestments of the church by the deacons and other ministers of the church, in vessels specially set apart for the purpose, near the sacristy. The door-keepers are also enjoined to take care that no one thoughtlessly wiped his hands on the curtain of the door, and to remind those who were guilty of such irreverence that “the veil of the Lord's Temple is holy” (Labbe, Conc. i. 99). Gregory of Tours informs us that on the conversion of Clovis, solemn processions were instituted in the streets, which were shaded with painted veils, while the churches were adorned with white curtains (Greg. Turon. Hist. Franc. ii. 31). According to Hebele (Beiträge zur Archäologie, ii. 252), tapestry curtains were employed to protect the apertures of windows in churches before the general introduction of glazing. [E. V.]

HARE. The boy who represents Spring among the Four Seasons frequently carries a hare in his hand. The idea of speed in the Christian calendar was associated with it. It is sometimes connected with the horse (Perret v. lvi.) or with the ox (Baldetti, 506). Its presence in Christian decoration seems to be connected with the human taste for ornamenting their rooms with domestic, agricultural, or hunting subjects. Many places of assembly, no doubt, contained pictures by Pagan hands in the earliest days; and the ingenuity of Christian preachers would in all probability make use of them for type and metaphor; and so the animal or other object would become a recognized and customary subject of Christian ornament, acquiring a symbolical meaning. In such examples as the vine or shepherd, that meaning of course existed before; and the distinction between scriptural and all other symbols is on the whole sufficiently well-marked in early work. [R. St. J. T.]

HARLOTS. [ASTROLOGY; DIVINATION.]

HARLOTS. Compare FORNICATION. The maintaining and harbouring of harlots was severely punished by the laws of the empire; a man who permitted his house to become a place of assignation for improper purposes was punished as an adulterer (Pandect. lib. xviii. tit. 5, l. 8); if a man discovered his wife to be a procuress, it was a valid ground of divorce (Codez Theod. lib. iii. tit. 16, l. 1); careful provision was made against fathers or masters prostituting their children or slaves (Codez Just. lib. xi. tit. 49, l. 4). Socrates (H. E. v. 18) commends Theodosius the Great for demolishing the houses of ill fame in Rome. Theodosius the younger performed the same service for Constantinople, enacting that keepers of infamous houses should be publicly whipped and expelled the city, while their slaves were set at liberty (Theod. Nord. 18, de Leonadius). All these laws were confirmed by Justinian (Nord. 14) who also increased the severity of the punishments.

The church, as was natural, visited prostitution with the severest censure. Harlotism was denied to harlots (πόρναι) and to those who maintained them (πορνοβοσκούς). (Const. Apod. viii. 32). The council of Elvira, A.D. 305, enacts that if a parent, or any Christian whatever, exercise the trade of a procurer, forasmuch as they set to sale the person of another, or rather their own, they shall not be admitted to communion, no, not at their last hour; and the same penalty is denounced (c. 70) by the same council against a wife who prostitutes herself with her husband's connivance. [C.]

HATFIELD, COUNCIL OF (Hæthfeldthense, or Hæthfeldense, Concilium), 17 Sept. A.D. 680, at Bishop's Hatfield in Hertfordshire, attended by all the bishops of Britain, Theodore, archbishop of Canterbury, presiding, held for making a declaration against Eutychianism and Monothelism. Pope Agatho wished that Theodore should have attended his council of 125 bishops at Rome, March 27 of the same year, preliminarily to the 6th general council, and had sent John, precentor of the Lateran council under pope Martin I. A.D. 649, against Monothelism, to invite him thither. But Theodore, being either unable to leave for other reasons, or unwilling to come from knowing that Wilfrid, bishop of York, whose case had caused so much strife, was already there, collected this synod instead, and despatched a copy of its synodical letter to Rome by John, where it was read with great satisfaction, and probably before the 6th council, which met Nov. 7, had commenced. Bede, who was about eight years old when this synod took place, gives three different extracts from its letter, in substance as follows:—

1. The bishops declare that “they have set forth the right and orthodox faith, as delivered by our Lord to His disciples, and handed down in the symbol of the holy fathers, and by all the sacred and universal synods, and by the whole COUNCIL OF (Hæthelfeldense, Concilium), 17 Sept.

hop's Hatfield in Hertfordshire, the bishops of Britain, Theo-of Canterbury, presiding, held declaration against Eutychianhelism. Pope Agatho wished should have attended his council at Rome, March 27 of the same to the 8th general council, and predecessor of his on which 28 acts of the Lateran council I. A.D. 649, against Monothe him thither. But Theodore, ble to leave for other reasons, or me from knowing that Wilfrid, whose case had caused so much udy there, collected this council atched a copy of its synodical by John, where it was read with on, and probably before the 6th met Nov. 7, had commenced, about eight years old when this e, gives three different extracts in substance as follows:— ps declare that "they have set and orthodox faith, as delivered His disciples, and handed down of the holy fathers, and by all the versal synods, and by the whole body of approved doctors of the Catholic church.

Following whom, they also confess the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, the Holy Trinity in Unity, consubstantial, and the Unity in Trinity, one God in three consubstantial Persons of equal honour and glory."

2. They "receive the five general councils," mentioning each by name.

3. "Likewise the synod of Rome, A.D. 649, under Martin I.," after which they say: "We receive and glorify our Lord Jesus, as they glorified Him, neither adding nor subtracting anything. We anathematise from the heart all they anathematized, and receive all they received; glorifying God the Father without begining, and His only begotten Son, born of the Father before all worlds, and the Holy Spirit proceeding inseparably from the Father and the Son, according to the preaching of the above-named holy apostles and prophets and doctors, to all which we have subscribed, who with archbishop Theodore have expounded the Catholic faith." This assertion of procession from the Son as well as the Father, which is not found in any document received by the 6th council, may seem to imply that the interpolated form of the creed had got into Britain by then; but it may be explained in another way. We are told in another place by Bede, that when Theodore was consecrated at Rome by Vitalian, it was expressly stipulated that abbot Adrian should accompany him into England: "Et, ut ei doctrinæ cooperator existens, diligenter attenderet, nequid ille ostantiarum veritatis fidei, Græcorum more, in ecclesiam cui preeset, introduceret" (E. H. lv.
1). Adrian remained in that capacity till his death, A.D. 710, and Theodore commenced work, "per omnia constantia et cooperante Adriano" (ib. c. 2). Now Adrian was a foreigner, as well as Theodore. He was a learned African, and Africa was the country that boasted of the clearest authorities as yet, for procession from the Son as well as the Father, in SS. Austin and Fulgentius. In conclusion, Bede tells us that John the preceptor also took part in this synod, and was floored by the whole country for instruction in the Roman chant (Mansi, xi. 175-80; Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 141-51).

HAWKING. [HUNTING.]

HEAD-COVERING OF THE. Christian men in ancient days prayed with uncovered head, according to the apostolic injunction (1 Cor. xi. 4, 5). Chrysostom's comment on the passage shows clearly that this was the practice of his own time, as well as of the apostolic age.
Tertullian (Apol. c. 30) says that Christian men prayed with bare head, as having no need to conceal a blush, insinuating that the heathen might well blush for some of the prayers which they uttered; and Cyprina may perhaps be alluding to the same custom, when he says (De Lapsis, c. 2) that the head of a Christian was uncontaminated by the head-covering of the heathen sacrificer. On the other hand, as both the apostolic precept and the custom of the East made it indecent for women to be seen with uncovered head, the women of the Oriental and African churches covered their heads not only in the congregations, but generally when they appeared in public. The breaking in upon this custom led Tertullian to write his treatise De Virginitate Velanda, in which he contends that not only matrons, but maidens—who had been allowed a somewhat greater licence—should cover their heads effectually. He is especially severe (c. 17) on those who wore a simple band or fillet, which did not cover the top of the head; or laid a mere slip of linen on the top of the head, which did not reach even to the ears; he insists that the veil or head-covering should at any rate come down to meet the top of the dress; the whole space which would be covered by the hair if it were let down should be covered by the veil; and he holds up for admiration and imitation the Arab women, who so covered the head and face as to leave only one eye visible.

Contrary to Roman practice, they preferred to see rather than to be seen. But most of all does he inveigh against those women who, even when psalms are said and the name of God named, continued uncovered, or with veils thrown back (retectæ perseverant); who even in prayer fancied themselves covered with a strip of lace or fringe on the top of the head. But Tertullian's rigorous views were not those of the Church at large; as a general rule Christ's women have worn the head-dresses of their country and station, and have covered their heads in the place of assembly. Men, to speak generally, have always prayed with uncovered head. Yet about the 8th century the Ordo Romanus II.
(c. 8, p. 46) says that at the reading of the Gospel neither crown nor any other covering is kept on the head, an expression which seems to imply that during the saying of some portions of the office crowns or other coverings were retained.

2. With regard to the head-covering of clerics, the Gregorian Sacramentary (p. 38) lays down the rule, that no cleric stands in the church at any time with covered head, unless he have an infirmary. In spite, however, of the generality of the expression "allo tempore," the meaning of the sentence is probably limited by the words which stand at the head of the rubric, "per totum Quadragesimam." That some kind of ceremonial head-dress was worn by bishops and priests from the 4th century onward seems certain. See INFULA, MITRE.

CULLA, HOOD. [C.]

HEATHEN, THE. in relation to the Church.
1. The duty of praying for the heathen was amply recognized by the early Christians. Thus in the Ignatian letter to the Ephesians (c. 10) we find the exhortation, "pray also without ceasing for the rest of mankind; for there is in them a hope of repentance, that they may attain to God." St. Augustine (Epist. 217, ad Vitalien.
c. 2) declares that one who did not believe that the seed of faith was sown in the heart by God, must needs mock at the words of the priest at the altar exhorting the people to pray for un-

Lelievers, that God may turn them to the faith. And again (De Dono Persec. c. 22, § 63) he asks, "When was not prayer made in the Church for unbelievers and for its enemies, that they might believe?" Prosper (De Vocat. Gentium, l. 12) tells us that "the Church prays to God everywhere, not only for the holy and those already regenerate in Christ, but also for all unbelievers and enemies of the cross of Christ, for all worshippers of idols. . . . And what does she ask for them, but that leaving their errors they may be converted to God?" Such prayers occur in the liturgies; in that of St. Mark, for instance, we have (Renaudot, Litt. Orient. i. 153), "Turn back those who have gone astray, enlighten those who are in darkness." So the Clementine (Const. Apost. viii. 15): "We beseech Thee on behalf of those who hate us and persecute us for Thy Name's sake, for those outside the Church and in error, that Thou mayest turn them to good and soften their hearts." In the West, the conversion of the heathen was an especial subject of prayer—as it is still in the English church—on Good Friday. Thus, in the Gelasian Sacramentary (l. 41; Migne's Patrol. lxxiv. 1105 B) the deacon, after bidding prayer for heretics, schismatics, and Jews, proceeds, "Let us pray also for the pagans, that Almighty God may take away the wickedness from their hearts, and that forsaking their idols they may turn to the true God and His only Son Jesus Christ." So in the Gregorian (p. 64), the prayers to be used on the Wednesday and Friday in Holy Week include one for the pagans.*

2. While it is clear that heathen were carefully excluded from the Christian mysteries, it is equally clear that from the earliest times they were admitted to that part of Christian worship which consisted mainly of instruction. St. Paul (1 Cor. xiv. 23) evidently contemplates the possibility of heathen entering the place where preaching took place, whether it were in the shape of an utterance in "tongues," or prophesying. At the end of the 2nd century, all portions of divine worship were not open to all alike; for Tertullian (De Præscript. c. 41) reproaches certain heretics with their want of order and discipline, in that not only catechumens were admitted to the same privileges as the faithful, but even heathen, if they chanced to enter the place, had equal access; so did the heretics cast their mock-pearls before swine. In this it is implied that the orthodox were more careful of their treasure. [DISCIPLINA ALCANI.] The words of Origen (c. Celsum, iii. p. 142, Spencer), where, speaking of the care bestowed upon catechumens, he says that Christians had in view to prevent persons of evil life from coming to their common assembly (ἐπι τὸν κοινὸν αὐτῶν σύλλογον), seem to imply that some kind of scrutiny took place before men were admitted to any Christian assembly whatever; for he contrasts the Cypic practice of receiving all comers to their harangues with that of the Christians, and the word σύλλογος does not appear to be taken (like συναγία) in the limited sense of "the Eucharistic mystery." However this may be, it is certain that at the end of the 4th century the African canons (IV. Conc. Carth. c. 84) specially provide that the bishop is not to hinder any one, whether heathen, heretic, or Jew, from entering the church and hearing the word of God, as far as the dismissal of the catechumens (inque ad missam catech.) and a later Council (Conc. Vult. unan. c. 1; A. D. 524) orders the Gospel to be read after the Epistle, before the bringing in of the gifts [EUKHARISTIA; § 2] or the dismissal of catechumens,^b in order that not only catechumens and penitents, but all who belong to the contrary part (e diverso sunt) may hear the wholesome precepts of the Lord Jesus or the sermon of the bishop (sacerdotes); for many had been drawn to the faith by the preaching of the prelates (pontificum). The liberty which was granted to heathen does not seem in all cases to have been allowed to heretics (Conc. Latol. c. 6). The liturgies themselves contain evidence that heathen were permitted to present during the introductory portion of the Eucharistic office. In the Clementine, for instance (Cons. L. Apost. viii. 12), the deacon proclaims before the offertory, "Let no one of the catechumens, no one of the hearers, no one of the unbelievers (τῶν ἀπίστων), no one of the heterodox [be present];" from which it appears that heathens had not been excluded during the whole of the previous service.

3. It does not appear that the infant children of heathen parents, remaining in the heathen family, were in ancient times ever baptized. It would have been held a profanation of the sacrament to baptize those who were likely to be brought up as pagans. But baptism was not refused to children of heathen slaves brought to baptism by their owners, who could of course ensure them Christian nurture; and orphans and foundlings—the latter at any rate almost always the offspring of heathen—were frequently presented for baptism by the virgins or others who had taken charge of them (Augustine, Epist. 23, ad Bonifac.; compare Pseudo-Ambros. de Vocat. Gent. ii. 18). We may probably discover in this presentation of infants for baptism by persons other than their parents the origin of SPOXONS.

When the time came that Paganism was proscribed and Christianity enjoined, special care was taken that whole families should be brought within the pale of Christianity, and that the head of a household should not undergo baptism pro forma, while the household remained heathen. "As for those who are not yet baptized," says the Code of Justinian (lib. i. tit. ii. de Pagani, l. 10), "let them, with wives and children and all their households, betake themselves to the holy churches; and let them provide that their infants (parvuli) be baptized without delay; but let the older children (majores) before baptism be instructed in the Scriptures according to the canons. But if any, with a view to entering the public service, or to acquiring an office or a property, go through a form of baptism (ingant baptizant) and leave in their error their children, wives, and others who belong to and depend upon them; they are to be punished by confiscation of goods and other penalties, and excluded from the public service." The special case of the Samaritans is provided for by another law (Novel. 144, c. 2); adults were to pass through two year's not to hinder any one, whether Jew, or Gentile, from entering the word of God, as far as the catechumens (asque ad) and a later Council (Conc. A. N. 524) orders the Gospel to be preached before the bringing in of the sacrament, § 2) or the dismissal of the order that not only catechumens, but all who belong to the delivery (sunt) may hear the words of the Lord Jesus or the words of the priests (sacerdotes); for many had faith by the preaching of the word. The liberty which was does not seem in all cases to be granted to heretics (Conc. Latol. c. 6), themselves contain evidence that was admitted to present during the celebration of the Eucharistic office, for instance (Cons. t. Apostol.) on proclamations before the offering of the catechumens, as one of the unbelievers (sunt) of the heterodox (be present); appears that heathens had not perceived the whole of the prepare that the infant children, remaining in the heathen ancient times ever baptized. It would a profanation of the sacraments who were likely to be pagans. But baptism was not of heathen slaves brought to owners, who could of course impart nurture; and orphans and latter at any rate almost always heathen—were frequently presented by the virgins or others who (Augustinus, Epist. 23, care Pseudo-Ambros. de Voed. may probably discover in these parents the origin of Sponsors. came that Paganism was penitency enjoined, special care whole families should be brought of Christianity, and that the child should not undergo baptism be household remained heathen. who are not yet baptized," says inian (lib. i. tit. ii. de Paganis, with wives and children and olds, betake themselves to the and let them provide that their be baptized without delay; but children (majores) before baptism be Scriptures according to the any, with a view to entering the to acquiring an office or a rough a form of baptism (singultive in their error their children. who belong to and depend upon to be punished by confiscation of penalties, and excluded from the struction and probation, while children not capable of instruction in the doctrines of the faith were to be admitted to baptism at once. Both these laws were included by Photius in his Nicomœnon (tit. iv. c. 4, p. 907) [CODEX CANONICUM, p. 400].

4. It does not appear that the Church in the earliest times had special organizations for the conversion of the heathen. It was of course the duty of the bishops and clergy of any church to endeavour to bring over to the faith those pagans who dwelt about them, and men were raised up entirely heathen. The monastic orders, in particular, especially that of St. Columba, were constantly active in propagating the faith of Christ [MONASTICISM]. The lives of the great missionaries will be found in the DICTIONARY OF CHRISTIAN BIOGRAPHY.

It is worth observing, that in the Coronation-office given by Meuard with the Gregorian Sacramentary (Id. Regimam benedicendum, pp. 283, 284) the conversion of heathen nations is regarded as especially the work of a queen. After putting on the ring, the consecrating bishop prays that the queen on the point of being crowned "may be enabled to call barbarous nations to the knowledge of the truth."

5. The social intercourse of heathen and Christian, while paganism was still a flourishing system, was rendered difficult by two circumstances; the prevalence of more or less idolatrous practices in the family life of heathens—libations, feasts on sacrificial meats, songs implying the recognition of pagan deities, and the like; and afterwards by the horror and hatred with which the heathen came to regard the votaries of what they thought an "ill-omened superstition," destructive of the greatness of the empire.

Christians who feasted with the heathen in a spot appropriated to heathen festivities, even if for fear of defilement they took with them their own food and ate no other, were sentenced to a two-years' penance among the Substrati [PENITENCE] (Conc. Ancyr. c. 7; A. D. 314.)

6. Until Christianity had developed a literature of its own, those Christians who studied literature at all, beyond the limits of Scripture, of course studied pagan literature; but at the end of the 4th century we find the peremptory prohibition (VI. Con. Carth. c. 16), "that the bishop should not read the books of the gentiles." It is not to be supposed I however that this precept was literally and universally observed; the vast pagan learning (for instance) of Jerome and Augustine is matter of notoriety, and it is not to be supposed that it was wholly acquired before they entered the Christian ministry. Jerome, in fact (Epist. 10 [al. 70] ad Magnum), expressly defends Christian writers against the charge that they were ignorant of pagan writings, and points with pride to the long series of writers who had defended Christianity with weapons drawn from the pagan armory. See further under PROHIBITED BOOKS.

HEAVEN. [See FIRMAMENT.] The weird figure on the sarcophagus of Junius Bassus (Bottari, tr. xv. and elsewhere a female head, id. lav. xxxiii.) is always held to represent the firmament of heaven. Considering the word as denoting the future spiritual state of happiness in the presence of God, we can hardly pass over the symbolic representations of the Lord in glory which seem from the 6th century to have been the accustomed decorations of Byzantine churches. The choir and apse of a church from that date were constantly made to symbolize heaven and earth; the churches triumphant and militant, the new heaven of glory, and the renewed earth of the soul regenerated in baptism. The churches of SS. Cosmas and Damianus, St. Venantius, and especially of St. Prassede, at Rome, may be taken as types of the Byzantine treatment of this great subject. In the former Our Lord stands on the firmament of clouds, a figure of indescribable grandeur. He is not only come to His sanctuary, and present with a congregation of the church, but he is also and at the same moment in heaven, apart from time, and in St. Prassede, the apse, and the upper part of the arch of triumph in advance of it, represent Him in glory with His own; saints and martyrs, in white robes on gold ground, casting their crowns before Him. But at their feet flows the mystic Jordan, the river of baptism into His death, and also the river of death, the Lethe of life and death. It separates the glorified church in heaven from the sheep of the fold below, who are yet militant on earth.

Parallel representations of the adoration of saints and martyrs in glory are, of course, universal from the 6th century; the great processions at St. Apollinare Nuova, in Ravenna, will be remembered as belonging to the time of Justinian. The Last Judgment of Torcello has its side of accepted souls (see s. v.). [R. St. J. T.]

HEBDOMADARIUS. The word signifies a weekly officer, and was applied in monasteries to those monks who served, a week in rotation, the office of cook or reader during refection. In Egypt and the Thebaid it was customary in the 5th century for all the monks in turn to act as cooks, and Cassian traces the custom to the monasteries in the East (Cass. Instit. iv. 19, cf. Hieron. Reg. Pachom. Prof. Ep. 22 ad Eustach. c. 35). But see Cass. Instit. iv. 22. Similarly Benedict ordered that none should be excused from this duty except on the score of health or urgent occupations, intending thus to promote a fellowship of brotherly feeling; but with his usual consideration, he allowed those who might be unskilful in this sort of work to have assistants (Bened. Reg. c. 35).

By the rule called of Magister each "decad" or "decuria" (ten monks) under its two deans (præpositi), was to hold this office for five weeks together, two of the number in turn with one dean being told off each week for the kitchen, and the rest under the other dean working in the field (Reg. Mag. c. 17). Even abbats, were not always exempt. By the rule of Ferreolus, written in the south of France during the 6th century, the abbat was to be cook on three great festivals in the year, at Christmas, at Pentecost, and on the Founder's Day (Reg. Ferreol. c. 38). It is recorded of Benedictus Anianus the compiler of the Concordia Regularum, that he would be intent on literary work while at work in the kitchen (Vita Bened. Anian.

c. 14). By the rule of Caesarius, bishop of Arles in the 6th century, abbats and priors were excused altogether.

In some monasteries it was part of the duty of the hebdomadarii to prepare the dinner-table, and to act as waiters. Benedict indeed, distinguishes the "Septimanarii coquinae" from the "servitores" (Bened. Reg. cc. 35, 38); but the rule of Isidorus, bishop of Seville, in the 7th century, combines the offices (Isid. Reg. c. 11); and in the rule of "Magister" the cooks or their assistants are ordered not only to wait at table, but to carry water, chop wood, clean shoes, wash towels, dust the mats in the oratory, and perform various other menial tasks (Reg. Maj. c. 19). In the same rule it is provided, that if the weekly officers are negligent in having the table ready for the refectio, the abbat himself is to put them to the blush by doing it himself publicly (ib. c. 23). In the Cluniac and Cistercian monasteries the hebdomadarii were waiters as well as cooks (Martene. Reg. Bened. Comm. ad loc. cit.).

The week of the hebdomadarii commenced on Sunday by a solemn form of admission in the oratory after "matins" (Reg. Bened. c. 35), or after "prime" (Reg. Mag. c. 19); the monks going out of office, as well as those just coming in, entreating the prayers of their brethren, and the blessing of their abbat. On the Saturday those, whose term of office was over, were to deliver up to the "cellarer" for the use of their successors all the utensils &c. under their charge in perfect order (Reg. Bened. v. s. Reg. Mag. v. s.). It was an old custom, symbolic of humility and brotherly love, for the hebdomadarii, closing and commencing their week, to wash the feet of their brethren, during which operation silence was to be kept, or psalms chanted (Cassian. Instit. iv. 19. Bened. Reg. v. s.). By the rule of "Magister," they were to set about preparing the refectio three hours before the hour fixed for it; immediately after "none" if, as was usual, the dinner was at midday, immediately after "sext" for a dinner at three in the afternoon (Reg. Mag. v. s.). The refectio was to be served on the stroke (Reg. Bened. v. s.); for any punctuality they were to be mulcted of the ration of bread or a part of it for certain days (Reg. Mag. c. 19); the Concordia Regularum quotes an anonymous rule (not the "Regula Cujusdam," usually ascribed to Columbanus) sentencing hebdomadarii guilty of any trivial irregularity to twenty-five strokes of the open hand (Reg. Cujusd. c. 12), just as Cassian cautions them against losing even a pea (Cass. Instit. iv. 20). Benedict wisely arranged that the cooks should have some refreshment, a piece of bread and a small cup of beer, (panem ac singulos biberes) an hour before the refectio, on ordinary days; on festivals they were to wait till after the midday mass (Bened. Reg. v. s.). Various reasons are supposed by commentators for the latter part of this injunction (Martene Reg. Comm. ad loc.).

The "lector hebdomadarius" or reader aloud during refectio held office, like the "coqui," for a week; but Benedict ordered that only those brethren should be readers, whose reading was likely to edify (Bened. Reg. c. 38). On the Sunday commencing his week of office the reader was thrice to repent in the oratory the

"Domine, aperi os meum," and before beginning to read was to ask the prayers of his hearers, lest he should be elated with pride (ib.). Not a word was to be spoken during the lecture even by way of asking a question on what was being read; unless the prior (or abbat), should think right to interpose an explanation or exhortation; the monks were to help another to anything wanted without a word (ib.). The reader was to have a little bread and wine (for so "mixtum" is to be understood, according to Martene, and not as wine and water), just before reading, for fear of faintness or exhaustion; he was to dine with the other hebdomadarii after the public meal (ib.). The passages for reading were chosen by the abbat either from the Holy Scriptures or from lives of saints. Cassian derives the custom of reading aloud at refectio from Cappadocia (Cass. Instit. iv. 19). [See also, Alteser. Asceticon ix. 10]. [L. G. S.]

HECATONTARCHAE. The council in Trullo (c. 61) condemns to six years' excommunication those who resort to "the so called hecatontarchae, or such-like persons" (ταῖς λεγομένοις ἑκατονταρχαῖς ἢ ταις τοιαύταις) with the view of learning from them what they may choose to reveal. The title of "hecatontarches," is said by Balsamon (quoted by Van Espen, iii. 415) to be equivalent to "Primitivus," and to have been conferred on certain old men who gave themselves out to be possessed of supernatural knowledge and deceived the simple. Gothofred (quoted by Bingham, Antiq. Xv. l. v. 6) thinks that these hecatontarchae are to be identified with the "centenarii" of the Theodosian Code (tit. xvi. tit. 10, l. 20), who were officers of certain corporations or companies for managing idolatrous pomps and ceremonies, and frequently claimed the power of divination. HEGIRA or HILRAH (هجرة). The era commonly used by the Mohammedan historians is that of the Hijrah, or flight of Mohammed from Mecca to Medina. The epoch is the first day of the first month, Moharrem, of the year in which this took place (not the day itself, which was about sixty-seven days later). The epoch fell, according to the best Arabian authors and astronomers, cited in Ideler (Hambuch. ii. 483), on Thursday, July 15, A.D. 622; but according to civil usage and the phase of the moon, a day later. This discrepancy has to be noted. We shall take as the epoch July 16, A.D. 622, or 5335 Julian Period, with interval days from Christian era [E.A.], 227,014.

In Mohammedan authors the year is a lunar year of 30 and 29 days alternately, having 354 days. In intercalary years, of which there are 11 in every 30 years, viz., those marked * in neum," and before beginning the prayers of his hearers, stated with pride (ib.). Not asked during the lecture even question on what was being for (or abbat), should think explanation or exhortation; to help another to anything word (ib.). The reader was read and wine (for so "mixed, according to Martene, water), just before reading, as or exhaustion; he was to hebdomadarii after the public passages for reading were chosen from the Holy Scriptures or Cassian derives the custom of reflection from Cappadocia. To convert a Mohammedan Date into Old Style.—Find the number of cycles by dividing the Mohammedan year-date less 1 by 30. Let Q be the quotient, R the remainder. Multiply Q by 10,631, to which add the number of days corresponding to R in Table I. and the number of days corresponding to the months and days in Table II., and also 227,014, the interval days from the Christian era. The number of days divided by 1401 will give the number of quadriennia A.B., and table in ENA § 5, p. 623, will suffice to find the residual year and day of year.

HEGUMENOS. (Ἡγούμενος) The Hegu- menos of a monastery in the Greek church corresponds to the Latin ABBAT (see that word). He was also termed archimandrite. But, according to Helyot (Hist. des Ordre. Monast. Diss. Prelim. c. 11), the term archimandrite passed in time from the superior of a monastery to the superior-general, originally called the etarch, whose office it was to "visit" all the monasteries in a province. Any monastery so desirous at its foundation was exempted from the bishop's jurisdiction and placed under the sole authority of the patriarch; and the superior general of these monasteries was a grand archimandrite (cf. Thomas. Disc. Eccles. l. iii. 23). The words Hegumene (Ἡγουμένη), Hegu- menos (Ἡγούμενος), and Hegumeneia (Ἡγου- μενεία) (all from the classical term for the head- ship of a confederacy) signify abless, monastery HELL. A frequent subject of mediæval Christian art in the sense of the appointed places or state of future punishment; but the writer is not aware of any such representation of un- questionable date and authenticity within the first eight centuries, unless the judgment- mosaic of Torcello may be considered an ex- ception, which is very doubtful. See LAST JUDGMENT. The Book of Kells, and Saxon and Irish MSS. contain numerous dragons, and even grotesque devils; but they certainly seem to have more to do with the prevailing taste for lacertine or serpentine ornament, and general melancholy or ferocity of mind, than with any doctrinal idea of evil spirits. The regular Inferno begins with the early Florentine revival, in the baptistry of St. Giovanni. [R. St. J. T.]

HEMIPHORION (ἡμιφόριον), seemingly some kind of upper garment, worn by men and women. Epiphanius (Haeresis 69, § 3) describes Arius as wearing a colobion (see the word) and a hemiphorton; the latter probably over the former, which was a close tunic. And Palladius (Hist. Lausiaca, p. 148) says that the younger Melania gave her silken hemiphorton to make "καλύματα τοῖς θύσιαστροῖς," hangings for the sanctuary, or altar-cloths, whichever it may be. Besychius and Suidas write the word ἡμιφόριον, connecting it with φόρος (a shawl or wrapper), and translating it "dimidium vestis," "dimi- diata vestis." It was probably therefore one of the many forms of the pallium, smaller than that commonly worn. (Suicer's Thesaurus, s. v.). [C.]

HEOTHINA (τὰ ἑοθινά). The Heothinon is an anthem sung in the Greek office of lauds (τὸ ἑσπέρου), and occurs after the alvai: (i.e. on ordinary days, Pss. cxviii, cxlix, cl, on Sundays and important festivals, a short equivalent); and certain versicles called Stichoi and short anthems called Sti hera which follow them, and is placed between the clauses of the doxology, "glory, &c." (δόξα), and "both now, &c." (καὶ νῦν). The Heothinon varies with the musical tone of the week; there being one to each tone; and they are found in the Paracheitice, or book containing the various antiphons or troparia, arranged according to the different tones. The form of the Heothinon is that of any other Greek antiphon.

HERESY, considered as a delictum, or offence against the law of the church.

The Greek word αἵρεσις imports (1) a choosing (Lev. xxii. 18, l.XX.; 1 Macenb. viii. 30); (2) that which is chosen, especially an opinion which one chooses to hold, as αἵρεσις ἀνωθέλας (2 Pet. ii. 1); used by ecclesiastical writers for opinions deviating from the true Christian faith; (3) a body of men holding a particular opinion, as (e.g.) those holding particular opinions in philosophy (Diog. Laert. i. 13 etc.). In the New Testament it is used of the Sadducees (Acts v. 17), the Pharisees (ib. xv. 5, and perhaps xxvi. 5), of the Christian community (ib. xxiv. 5, 14; xxviii. 22). So Constantine (Euseb. H. E. x. 5, §§ 21, 22) speaks of the church as ἡ αἵρεσις ἢ καθολικὴ, ἢ ἀγιωτάτη αἵρεσις. We are concerned with the term mainly in the second of these significations.

The word was used by the early fathers with a good deal of latitude to designate systems which adopted, or professed to adopt, any Christian element whatever (Burton, Bampton Lect. p. 12); so the Trullan council (c. 95) applies the word "heretic" alike to those who were, and to those who were not, reckoned Christians; but it is generally applied to those who, holding the leading truths of the faith, deviate in some point or points.

To define heresy is, as St. Augustine says (De Haeret. Praef.), "altogether impossible, or at any rate most difficult;" and when first asked to write a book on heresy himself, he illustrated the difficulty by pointing out (Ep. 222, ad Quod. cult.) that Philastrius bishop of Brescia, in his book of heresies, enumerated 28 which had originated among the Jews before Christ, and 128 afterwards, but that Epiphanius of Cyprus discovered only 80 altogether. But he is careful to note (Epist. 43) that, whatever be the definition, it is not the mere falseness of an opinion, but the spirit in which it is held, that constitutes heresy; they who do not defend a wrong opinion in an obstinate temper (pertinaci animositate), especially they who are in error mainly by the accident of birth, are not to be reckoned heretics. With which accords the common definition, that heresy is "pertinax defensio dogmatis ecclesiae universalis iudicio condemnati." See Decretum Grat. C.ao. xiv. qu. iii. c. 29 ff. The law of the emperor Arcadius, dated A.D. 395, and given in the Codez Theod. (XVI. v. 28), is the first legislative definition. "Qui vel levi argumento a iudicio aetholicae religionis et tramite detesti fuerint levari," which is modified by another expression of the same Arcadius (Codez, l. 13, De Fagnis), "qui a Catholicae Religionis dogmate deviare contendunt," where the word "contendunt" is held to refer to the same pertinacity in maintaining an opinion on which Augustine dwells (Van Espen, pt. iii. tit. iv. c. 22 ff.). Van Espen considers this, if not an absolutely accurate description, to be that which has governed the subsequent practice of the church. He maintains its soundness as a definition, because on the one hand it allows no deviation whatever from the Catholic creed, and on the other tolerates a reasonable latitude of speculation by taking no cognizance of constructive heresy. To constitute the canonical offence the heresy must consist—i. in a departure, not from the implied belief of Christianity, but from that which the church through her creeds and canons has declared to be a matter of faith; ii. the error must be persistent and wilful, and, as Augustine points out (De Civ. Dei, xvii. 51), after admonition; iii. it must not only be suspected but detected and adjudicated upon. (Van Espen, Jus Eccl. III. iv. 2; Field, Of the Church, iii. cc. 3, 4).

2. i. The cognizance of heresy was vested in the bishops separately, as well as collectively. It belongs exclusively to the spiritual office, says Ambrose (Ep. 21), addressing the emperor Valentinian, to decide on matters of doctrine.

nizance of heresy was vested arately, as well as collectively, usively to the spiritual office, Ep. 21), addressing the emperor decide on matters of doctrine.

The episcopate was held to be one, where the faith was concerned, and each bishop was charged with maintaining it, although for practical convenience his government extended only over a single diocese. This jurisdiction granted to the bishop in matters of faith appears from the power possessed by him in the ante-Nicene church of varying the expressions of the creed in use in his diocese, in order to meet prevailing heresies; provide], of course, that the fundamental unity of the faith was unimpaired; instances of such variations are given in Bingham, Antiq. II. vi. 3. The reference to the belief of individual bishops as a standard of doctrine is further evidence in the same direction. Thus Theodosius in a rescript quoted in Sozomen (H. E. vii. 4) exhorts his subjects to keep the faith delivered by St. Peter, and by Damasus of Rome, and Peter of Alexandria. Other references of the kind are collected in Gothofred's commentary on Code Theod. xvi. 1, de fide Catholicā. It was an exercise of this authority by Gelasius bishop of Rome, A.D. 492-6, condemning in a decretal epistle the writings of Faustus the Semi-pelagian archbishop of Riez, which gave rise to the first Roman catalogue of forbidden books.

After the empire became Christian, attempts were made by some of the emperors to arrogate to themselves this spiritual jurisdiction of the bishops. The first instance of the kind, unless the laws of Theodosius on heretics are to be regarded as such, is that of the usurper Basiliscus, emperor of the East, 475-7, who issued an encyclical letter condemning the council of Chalcedon, and laying down definitions of faith. An example followed with more success by Justinian, whose edicts on doctrine as well as discipline obtained acceptance by being promulgated through the patriarchs, metropolitans, and bishops. The ecclesiastical legislation of Charlemagne also trenchoned upon the same prerogative; discussion was permitted in the synods summoned by him, but the emperor reserved the decision to himself, and issued the decrees in his own name. But no ecclesiastical authority superseded that of the bishops till A.D. 1204, when two Cistercian abbots were sent by Innocent III. to the south of France to investigate the Albigensian heresy; and in 1231 Gregory IX. issued a commission to the Dominicans to constitute a special court of heresy; this was the beginning of the Inquisition. (Van Espen, Jus. Eccl. I. xvii. 3.) ii. The general power of each bishop to defend the faith was restricted, in dealing with an individual heretic, to his own diocese. If there occurred was one of the clergy, the bishop was required in the African church to take neighboring bishops to sit with him (1 Conc. Carthag. c. 11; 2 Conc. Carthag. c. 10); but this rule was not confined to accusations of heresy. With the bishop in some instances sat the presbyters—whether or not this privilege was universally conceded to them. The synod of Antioch, A.D. 264, which condemned Paul of Samosata, contained presbyters (Euseb. H. E. vii. 28). So the first condemnation of Arius was not pronounced by Alexander bishop of Alexandria, A.D. 319, till he had summoned the presbytery and some other bishops to hear the charge (Epiphanius, Haer. 69, c. 3). And the accusation against Pelagius was first heard before John, bishop of Jerusalem, and a synod of his presbyters, A.D. 415. If objection was made to the decision of the bishop, an appeal lay to a larger council, either of the province, or finally of the whole church; instances of which are too notorious to need citing. A bishop charged with heresy could be tried only by a synod of bishops. The officer charged with the preliminary investigation is designated by one of the laws of Justinian (Novel. 137, c. 5). "If any clergyman is accused in point of faith, if he is a bishop he shall be examined before his metropolitan, but if he is a metropolitan then before the patriarch."

3. The penalties attached to heresy were both ecclesiastical and civil.

i. By ecclesiastical law an obstinate heretic was excommunicated, and if he continued contumacious, his exclusion from church-membership was made more rigorous. The 6th canon of the council of Laodicea forbids those who continue in their heresy to enter the house of God. But this exclusion could not have been universal, for the 4th council of Carthage, A.D. 398 (c. 84) distinctly prohibits the bishop from preventing Gentiles, Jews, or heretics from being present in church during the Missa Catechumenorum; and the council of Valencia, A.D. 524 (c. 1.) orders the gospel to be read before the oblations, so that heretics, among others, may have an opportunity of hearing [cf. HEATHEN]. Another stigma affixed to heretics ecclesiastical court against a Catholic. The Apostolical Canons (c. 74) say expressly that the evidence of a heretic shall not be received against a bishop. The 129th canon of the African code also mentions heretics among other infamous persons whose testimony was inadmissible (4 Conc. Carthag. c. 96). The so-called 6th canon of the council of Constantinople, A.D. 381, guards this disability from abuse by confining it exclusively to ecclesiastical causes; if a heretic had a civil cause of complaint against a bishop, the council allowed him his remedy; but the Justinian code deprived him even of this. Another class of penal enactments was directed to the protection of the orthodox from the infection of heresy. One of the Apostolical Canons (c. 45) forbids, under pain of suspension, any bishop, presbyter, or deacon, to pray with heretics, or permit them to officiate; another (c. 63) inhibits either clergy or laity from worshipping in a synagogue of heretics. The council of Laodicea (c. 9) would not permit Catholics to frequent the cemeteries or celebrations of so-called martyrdoms of heretics, nor (c. 33) tolerate any devotions with them. The 4th council of Carthage, A.D. 398 (c. 71), pronounces the assemblies of heretics to be not churches but conventicles; and (c. 72) prohibits both praying and singing psalms with them. The Spanish council of Lerida, A.D. 523 (c. 13), rejects the oblation of any who has presented his children for baptism by a heretic; this must mean, not in a case of necessity, where it would be admitted, but deliberately. (Bingham, Antiq. XVI. i. 4). Social intercourse with heretics was also prohibited. "A clergyman must avoid both the entertainments and the society of heretics" (4 Conc. Carthag. c. 70; 1 Conc. Tolct. c. 15; 1 Conc. Taron. c. 8; Conc. Venet. c. 3). Augustine relates (Confess. iii. 11) that while he was a Manichean his mother would not sit at the same table with him. The council of Laodicea (c. 32) forbids Christians to receive the EULOGIAE of heretics, and also (cc. 10, 31) to intermarry with them. This last prohibition appears to have been universally enforced (Conc. Ekber. c. 16; Conc. in Trull. c. 72). The laws of the church are not so strict as the civil edicts afterwards became in prohibiting the study of heretical books; there is one canon (4 Conc. Carthag. c. 16) which forbids a bishop to read heathen authors under any circumstances, and heretical ones unless time or necessity require.

ii. The civil proceedings against heretics began with some edicts of Constantine against the Donatists, A.D. 316; but a much more extensive series of laws was enacted by Theodosius the Great with a view to put an end to the divisions of the church arising from the controversies of the 4th century, and to enforce uniformity of belief by legal penalties. The first of these was passed immediately after the general council of Constantinople, A.D. 381, and between that period and A.D. 394, fifteen other such edicts were published. A further law was enacted by Honorius, A.D. 408, and others in the East by Arcadius and the younger Theodosius, and others again by Justinian, A.D. 529. The laws are chiefly contained in book xvi. tit. v. de Hæreticis of the Theodosian Code, although a few are to be found under other titles. Here it will be sufficient to give a bare abstract of the most severe of them. Heretics were deprived of all offices of profit or dignity in the state; they could neither receive nor bequeath property; no civil contract with them was binding; they were fined, banished, subjected to corporal punishments, and even sentenced to death. Other laws were designed to prevent the propagation of heresy. No heretical assemblies might be held, nor conventicles built, nor clergy ordained; their books were to be burnt and their children disinherited. These edicts were not directed against all heretics indiscriminately, but against various sects which were held to be most dangerous to faith or morals. From the account of Sozomen (H. E. vii. 12), they were intended to strike terror rather than to be executed; but heretics were always exposed to them, and, in one conspicuous instance, the most severe penalty, that of death, was inflicted on Priscillian and some of his adherents; the first example in the church of any one being put to death for his opinions.

4. i. The admission of heretics to the church is closely involved with the controversies of the 4th century on the validity of heretical baptism [BAPTISM, ITERATION OF, p. 172]. Their bearing on the reconciliation of heretics, and the further question of the relation in which the practice of anointing converts from heresy stands towards the rite of confirmation, are discussed in Morinus (de Poenit. ix. 7-11). This article is concerned only with any rites or terms of admission which indicate the course of canonical discipline. The council of Eliberis (c. 22) appoints ten years' penance to those who had deserted the faith and afterwards returned, with a provision that if they had lapsed in infancy they should be received back without delay. Later councils (Conc. Agath. c. 60; Conc. Epaon. c. 29) deprecating this severity, reduce the term to two years, on condition that the penitent fasts three days a week and comes frequently to church. Longer penalties were exacted from those who had submitted to re-baptism among the heretics, the earlier practice in this too being more severe; the 1st council of Valence, A.D. 374 (c. 3), denies communion to them till the hour of death, that of Lerida, A.D. 523 (c. 9), only for nine years. In this, however, as in other points of discipline, much was left to the discretion of the bishop (Conc. Agath. c. 60; 4 Conc. Aurd. c. 8). In general the practice of the church, which is involved in some obscurity, appears to have been to admit converts without any actual penance, submitting them however to some outward form or ceremonial of penitence (sub imagine poenitentiae, Innocent; Ep. 18, ad Alex-m. c. 3). A letter of Gregory the Great (Epist. ix. 61, ad Cyprian.) directs that those who had once been baptized in the name of the Trinity should be received by imposition of hands, which was the Western use, or by unction, which was that of the East, or by a profession of faith.

Of these forms of reconciliation that by imposition of hands was the earliest. It is spoken of by Eusebius (H. E. vii. 2) as a practice which was ancient in the time of Stephen, bishop of Rome, A.D. 253-7; Cyprian also calls it the ancient custom in his time (Ep. 71 ad Quintum). It was prevailing in the time of Innocent (Ep. 2 ad Iulian. c. 8, 22 ad Epi. Mucedon. cc. 4, 5); it was known to Augustine (de Bapt. c. 5); and was the subject of the decrees of various councils (1 Conc. Arid. c. 8; Conc. Nicæan. c. 8). By a canonical epistle of Siricius, bishop of Rome, A.D. 384-98, heretics were to be admitted by imposition, together with invocation of the Spirit. But the statement of Gregory that imposition of hands was the Western custom, and unction the Eastern, is only partially correct. Uction was in use in both the Spanish and the Gallic churches (1 Conc. Aransic. c. 1; Conc. Epaon. c. 16), and it is likely that when Gregory wrote he was referring only to the principal church of the West, that of Rome (Martene de Lit. iii. 9).

ii. In the 4th century, converts from some heresies were received into the church by unction, with formal renunciation of their errors (Conc. Laod. c. 7; 1 Conc. Constant. c. 7). The Trullan council, following the 1st of Constantinople, describes the manner of admission; "We receive Arians, Macdonians, Novatians, Quartodecimans, and Apollinarians, when they give in written forms of belief (Ἀριθμοί); for instances of this practice see Soc. II. E. iv. 12, Soz. II. E. iii. 22), and anathematize every heresy not according with the mind of the holy and apostolic church; sealing (that is, anointing) them with the holy ointment on the forehead, and eyes, and nostrils, and mouth, and ears; and as we seal them, we say, 'The seal of the gift of the Holy Ghost.'" The Arabic version of the Nicene canons (c. 21, Hardouin, vol. i. p. 468) has another form of admission. "If any one is converted to the orthodox faith he must be received into the church by the hands of the bishop or presbyter, who ought to instruct him to anathematize all who oppose the orthodox faith and contradict the apostolic church. He ought also to anathematize Arius and his heresy, and openly and sincerely profess the faith. After this the bishop or priest whose office it is, shall receive him and anoint him with the unction of Christ, and sign

The Trullan following the 1st of Constantinople, de-manner of admission; "We receive donians, Novatians, Quartoledianians, when they give in writing of (Αἰθελλοῦς; for instances of this (Soc. II. E. iii. 22), nitize every heresy not according of the holy and apostolic charac-t is, anointing) them with the holy forehead, and eyes, and nostrils, and ears; and as we seal them, we seal of the gift of the Holy Ghost."

version of the Nicene canons (c. 20, vol. I. p. 468) has another form of "If any one is converted to the with he must be received into the hands of the bishop or presbyter, to instruct him to anathematize all the orthodox faith and contradict the church. He ought also to anathe-mize and his heresy, and openly confess the faith. After this the bishop whose office it is, shall receive him and with the unction of Christ, and sign him three times while anointing him, and praying over him in the prayer of Dionysius the Arrogante, and prayer shall be made earnestly to God for him, and then he may be received." With regard to other heresies, the canon of the Trullan council already cited proceeds to make the following provisions. "About the Paulinists the Catholic church defines, that they are to be baptized anew; but as to the Eunomians, . . . and the Sabellians . . . and all the other heresies . . . ; all who will come over to orthodoxy from these we receive as converts from paganism (ὡς Ἑλληνας); and the first day we make them Christians, the second catechumen, and on the third day we exorcise them, after breathing thrice on the forehead and ears (Ἐξορισμῶν); and so we go on to catechise them, and cause them to tarry in the church and listen to the Scriptures; and then we baptize them. And the Manicheans, and the Valentinians, and the Marcionites, and those who come from such-like heresies must give in libelli, and anathematize their own heresy, and Nestorius and Eutyri-queles, and Dioscorus and Severus, and the other ringleaders of such-like heresies, and those who hold their own and the other aforementioned here-com-munion."

iii. In the case of those who came into the orthodox faith from the heresies of Nestorius and Eutyriques, the church appears to have been satisfied with a solemn profession of faith by the convert. This is frequently insisted upon by Leo (Epp. i. 6; vi. 2; xiv. xxvii. 4). The 2nd council of Seville, A.D. 618, received in this form at its twelfth sitting an heretical Syrian bishop. The bishop made a solemn statement of his errors and of the truth, and confirmed it with an oath. In later periods an oath became an indispensable part of the ceremonial. A Roman synod under Leo III, A.D. 799, required a certain bishop Felix not only to abjure his heresy and write out a form of faith, but also to swear over the holy mysteries to observe his orthodox profession; he was then required to place it over the body of St. Peter, and swear he would never dare repeat his heretical opinions. Cotelierus (Apost. Const. v. 13, note) prints part of an ancient Eastern ritual containing a form of renunciation of the Armenian heresy, which concludes with the following imprecation: "If I make this profession with hypocrisis, or return to my heresy openly or secretly, may all calamities overtake me, the dread of Cain and the leprosy of Gehazi, and in the world to come may I be anathema and anathema, and may my soul be sent to Satan and his devil."

iv. The form of admission in use in the East in the 8th century is given by Morinus (de Poenit. ix. 9) from a very ancient Greek Euchologion. Those to be received must fast ten or fifteen days, and prostrate themselves in prayer morning and evening like the Catechumens; they may then be thought worthy of the orthodox faith and be initiated. The priest is to bring each into the baptistery, and say to him, "Curse X. and his doctrines, and those who agree with him, for I renounce him and every heretical doctrine, and I believe in the holy and consubstantial Trinity." And the priest shall say to the convert three times, "Dost thou believe in the holy and con-substantial Trinity?" and the convert shall reply "I do." He shall then kneel, and the priest shall lay his hand upon his head and pray as follows After which he shall anoint him with oil with the same form as if he were a neophyte, and say this prayer The convert may then communicate, and he must be instructed but, as the baptized do, persevere for seven days, and on the 8th day wash and be dismissed.

The following example of a prayer used for those who were reconciled, after having been rebaptized by heretics, is from a ritual found at Toulouse, at Rheims, and in Sicily: "God who restorest man, made after thine own image, to that which Thou hast created, look down in mercy upon this Thy servant, and whate'er in ignorance and heretical perverseness has crept into him, do Thou in Thy pity and goodness pardon, so that any wickedness which he has committed through the fraud of the devil or the iniquity of the Arian falsehood, may not be laid to his charge, but that having been transformed by Thy mercy, and having received the communion of Thy truth at the sacred altars, he may be restored a member of the catholic church."

Heresy as a canonical offence is dealt with by Van Espen (Jus Eccl. Pars iii. tit. iv. c. 2). The admission of heretics to the church is a very complicated subject, owing to the endless varieties of heretical sects. See Martene (de Lit. iii. 6), Morinus (de Poenit. ix. 7-11), Sailer (s. v. αἰρετικός), and Bingham (Antiq. X.C.I. ii.). A list of the early and medieval writers on heresy is given in the preface to Burton's Bampton lectures on Heresies of the Apostolic Age. [G. M.]

HERMITS. Some medieval writers on monasticism define hermits (eremite) as solitaries in cells, and anchorites (anachoretæ) as solitaries without any fixed dwelling place; more correctly anchorites are solitaries who have passed a time of probation as cenobites, and hermits those who enter on the solitary life without this preparation (Martene, Reg. Cœna. Bened., c. 1; Isid. De Div. Off., ii. 15). Generally the word "eremite" includes all solitary ascetics of one sort or another; other designations of them in early ecclesiastical writers are ἀσκηταί, ἀκηταί, μονάζοντες, φιλόθεοι, φιλοσοφούντες, κατεργυμένοι, viri Dei, renunciantes, continentes, cellulani, Inclusi, reclusi, monachi, &c.; and, later, religiosi. The words μοναχὸς and μοναστηρίου were soon transferred from the hermit in his solitary cell to the cenobite in his community.

The asceticism of the desert was among Christians the first step towards the asceticism of the cloister. It was prompted by a passionate longing to fly from the world to escape not merely the fury of the Decian or Diocletian persecutions, but the contaminations of surrounding heathenism. It commended itself to devout Christians by reasons, which, however specious, really contradict and cancel each other, for it seemed at once a refuge from spiritual dangers, and a bolder challenge to the powers of darkness to do their worst; at once a safer, quieter life than the perilous conflict day by day with an evil world, and, in another aspect, a life of sterner self-denial. In the pages of its panegyrics the solitary life presents itself now in one and now in the other of these irreconcilable phases, according to the mood or temperament of the writer. It may be replied, that, far from being either more heroic or more free from danger, it is neither.

Until about the middle of the 3rd century the more austere Christians were only distinguished by such epithets as οἱ σπουδαῖοι or οἱ ἐκλεκτότεροι, without withdrawing from the society of their fellows (e.g. Euseb. H. E. vi. 11; Clem. Alex. H. mil. "Quis Dives?" n. 36). About that time, Antony and Ammon in Egypt, and Paul in the Thebaid led the way to the desert; and their example soon found a crowd of imitators (Soer. H. E. iv. 23; Soz. H. E. i. 13, 14; Hier. Ep. 22, ad Eustoch.). In Syria Hilarion, in Armenia Eustathius, bishop of Sebaste, in Cappadocia Basil urged on the movement. It spread quickly through Pontus, Illyricum, and Thrace westwards; and the personal prestige of Athanasius, an exile from his see, helped to make it popular in Italy at Rome (Niceph. H. E. ix. 16; Aug. de Op. M. n. c. 23; Hier. Ep. 16; Epit. ph. Marcell.). But the solitary life never found so many votaries in Europe, as in Egypt and in the East; partly because of the comparative inclemency of the climate, and the proportionate need of more appliances to support life, partly of the more practical character of the West.

The institution of Lauras was the connecting link between the hermitage and the monastery; in the later and more ordinary use of that word, Pachomius at Tabenna in Upper Egypt had already begun to organise a community of hermits, by arranging that three should occupy one cell, and that all who were near enough should meet together for the daily meal (Soz. H. E. lii. 14; Pallad. Hist. Laus.). The monks of Mons Nitrius, too, near the Lake Mareotis, though many of them in separate cells (οἰκηματα μοναχικα σποραδην, τὰ Κελλά, Soz. H. E. vi. 31) had refectories for common use, chapels in their midst for common worship on Saturdays, Sundays and holy days, certain presbyters appointed to officiate in these, and certain lay officers, (œconomus) elected* by the older hermits to provide for their temporal wants, such as they were, and to transmit their scanty alms (diaconia) derived chiefly from the sale of the rush mats which they wove (Cass. Inst. v. 26, 40; Coll. iii. 1; x. 2; xviii. 5; xxi. 9). In the Thebaid a hermit named Johnnes presided over a large number of hermits (Soz. H. E. vi. 23, 29). One of the first "Lauras," or irregular clusters of hermits dwelling close together, was at Piaran near the Dead Sea in the 4th century; another was founded near Jerusalem in the next century by Sabas a hermit from Cappadocia, under the patronage of Euthymius.

The early ecclesiastical histories teem with the almost suicidal austerities of the more celebrated hermits. Not content with imposing on themselves the burden hard to be borne of a lifelong loneliness—for even without any vow of continuance it was very rarely that a hermit returned to the companionship of his fellows—and of a silence not to be broken even by prayer, they vied with one another in devising self-tortures; wandering about, almost naked, like wild beasts; barely supporting life by a little bread and water, or a few herbs; only allowing their macerated frames three or four hours sleep in the twenty-four, and those on the bare rock or in some narrow cell where it was impossible to straighten the limbs; counting cleanliness a luxury and a sin; maiming themselves, sometimes with their own hands, to escape being made bishops by force; and shunning a moment's intercourse even with those naturally dearest (Cass. Inst. v. 26, 40; Coll. ii. 6, 17; Soer. H. E. iv. 23; Soz. H. E. vi. 29, 34; cf. Roswold Vitæ Patr., pass.). It was only in the decline of this enthusiasm that hermits began to take up their abode near cities. The "father of hermits" used to compare a hermit near a town to a fish out of water (Soz. H. E. i. 13).

Usually the hermit's abode was in a cave, or in a small hut which his own hands had rudely put together (Evagr. H. E. i. 21); but some, like the "possessed with evil spirits" in Gadara mentioned in the New Testament, had their dwellings in tombs (Theodoret. Phal. c. 12); hence they were called μεμωριστά, and the keeper or superintendent of these tombs the μεμωριστάς (Altes. Ascet. i. 7). Others roved about incessantly, to avoid the visits of the curious, like the "gyrovagi" in having no fixed abode, but unlike them in keeping always alone (Sulp. Ser. De H. de Mon. i. 9), and in feeling only on the wild herbs which they gathered [see HOSER]. Others, the "Stylitæ," aspiring to yet more utter isol-

* Hieronimus wrongly speaks of the presbyter as elected (De Orig. Monach.).

Tabenna in Upper Egypt had organised a community of hermits that three should occupy out all who were not enough gathered for the daily meal (Soz. Hist. Laus.). The monks, too, near the Lake Maroutis, then in separate cells (αἰκία ἄνω, τὰ Κελλάς, Soz. H. E. vi. 31) for common use, chapels in their own worship on Saturdays, Sundays, certain presbyters appointed these, and certain lay officers, led by the older hermits to promiscuous ways, such as they were, it their scanty alms (diaconia) from the sale of the rush mats (Cass. Inst. v. 26, 40; Coll. viii. 5; xii. 9). In the Thebaid a Jonas presided over a large unit (Soz. H. E. vi. 23, 29) "On Lanras," or irregular clusters of living close together, was at Pharan in the 4th century; another at Jerusalem in the next century; one from Cappadocia, under the thymus.

Eccelesistical histories teem with the austerities of the more celebrated content with imposing on themselves hard to be borne of a lifelong even without any vow of continence very rarely that a hermit companionship of his fellows—and not to be broken even by prayer, but one another in devising self-denying about, almost naked, scarcely supporting life by a little beer, or a few herbs; only allowing ad frames three or four hours sleep a-day, and those on the bare narrow cell where it was impossible the limbs; counting cleanliness a sin; maiming themselves, something their own hands, to escape being by force; and shunning a moment's ven with those naturally desert v. 26, 40; Coll. ii. 6, 17; Soz. H. E. vi. 29, 34; cf. Basward (pass.). It was only in the decline of the century that hermits began to take up their cities. The "father of hermits" was a hermit near a town to a fish (Soz. H. E. i. 13).

The hermit's abode was in a cave, or at which his own hands had rudely (Evagr. H. E. i. 21); but some, assessed with evil spirits" in Galilee in the New Testament, had their tombs (Theodor. Ph. lo. c. 12); were called μασπιτά, and the keeper of the tent of the μασπιτά; and the incident of these tombs had μασπιτά (i. 7). Others roved about like the "in having no fixed abode, but walking sleeping always alone (Sulp. Ser. Div.), and in feeling only on the will they gathered [see Bosc]. Others, "aspiring to yet more utter isolation, tion, planted themselves on the summit of solitary columns. Of these the most famous were the Simeon, who in Syria during the 5th century is said to have lived forty-one years on a tall pillar the top of which was barely three feet in diameter (Evagr. H. E. i. 13; li. 9; Theodoret, Philoth. c. 26); his namesake who followed his example in the 6th century (Evagr. H. E. vi. 22); and a Daniel, who chose for the scene of his austerities a less dreary neighbourhood, a suburb of Constantinople (Theodor. Lect. H. E. i. 32). Other "stylitae" are mentioned by Joannes Moschus (Prat. cc. 27, 28, 57, 129). This peculiar form of eremitism was very unusual in Europe. A monk near Treves in the 6th century tried the experiment on the top of a column rising from the summit of a cliff; but by order of the bishop soon relinquished the attempt on Hist. viii. 16).

The reverence with which hermits were popularly regarded led to their aid being frequently invoked when controversies were raging. Thus in the close of the 4th century Antony, who is also said to have more than once broken the spell of his seclusion in order to go and plead the cause of some poor client at Alexandria (Soz. H. E. i. 13), being appealed to in the Arian conflict not only addressed a letter to the emperor, but made a visit in person to Alexandria on behalf of Athanasius (Soz. H. E. ii. 31; Hieron. Ep. 33, ad Construc.). The hermit Aphraatas boldly confronted the emperor Valens, as did Daniel, the later of the two pillar-hermits of that name, the emperor Basiliscus (Theodoret, H. E. iv. 23; Theodor. Lect. Collectan. i. 32, 33). The great Theodosius consulted the hermit Joannes (Soz. H. E. vii. 22). The hermits near Antioch interceded with good effect when the magistrates of that city were about to execute the cruel orders of the exasperated emperor (Chrys. Homil. ad Ant. xvii.). But not rarely the unreasoning zeal of the hermits provoked great tumults; and sometimes in a misguided impulse of indiscriminate pity they endeavoured by force to liberate criminals condemned by the law. Nor were their sympathies always on the side of the orthodox. When Theophilus of Alexandria denounced the error of the Anthropomorphites, almost all the Saitic monks were fiercely incensed against him as an atheist "in their simplicity" as Cassian adds, (Cass. Coll. x. 2).

On the comparative excellency of the eremitic or of the cenobitic life there has been much difference of opinion among writers who extol asceticism; the same writer inclining now to the solitary life, and now to the life in a community, as he views the question from one side or another. Sozomen calls the eremitic life the "peak of philosophy" (H. E. vi. 31). Chrysostom and Basil speak to the same effect (Chrys. Ep. 1; Bas. Ep. ad Caliton.). But Basil in the rule for monks prescribed to him commends the cenobitic life, as more truly unselfish, more rich in opportunities both for helping and for being helped (Reg. c. 7); and so speaks his friend, Gregory of Nazianza (Orat. 21). Jerome, with all his love of austerity, cautions his friend and pupil against the dangers of solitude (Ep. 4, ad Rustic.). Augustine praises hermits; and yet allows that cenobites have a more unquestionable title to eneration (De Mor. Eccl. c. 31). Cassian often speaks of hermits as having climbed to the summit of excellences (e.g. Inst. v. 36; Coll. xviii. 4); at other times he depreciates the solitary life as not good for all, and as beyond the reach of many; and he relates how a devout monk gave up the attempt in despair, and returned to his brother monks (Coll. xix. 2, 3; xiv. 8).

It was from the first very earnestly enjoined by the leaders of asceticism, that none should venture on so great an enterprise as the solitary life, without undergoing probation as a cenobite (Hieron. Ep. 4 ad Aust.; Cass. Inst. v. 4. 36; Coll. xviii. 4; Joann. Clim. Scala. iv. 27). Benvoucing in front of the army for single combat with the foe, and therefore insists on his proving Councils repeatedly enforce this probationary discipline (Conc. Venet. A.D. 465, c. 7; Conc. Tolet. Trull. A.D. 692, cc. 41, 42). The permission of the abbat was required (Sulp. Ser. Div. i. 5), sometimes, also, the consent of the brethren (Martene, Comm. in Reg. Ben. c. 1) and, sometimes of the bishop (Conc. Francof. A.D. 794, c. 12). The length of this period of probation varied (Martens, cf. Isid. De Div. Off. ii. 15). Even those who most admired the hermit-life fenced it round with prohibitions as a risk not lightly to be encountered.

The civil authorities were naturally jealous of this subtraction of so many citizens from the duties of public life. Theodosius ordered all those who evaded their public responsibilities on pretence of asceticism to be deprived of their civil rights unless they returned to claim them (Cod. Theodos. xii.; Tit. 1; Lex 63); and it was forbidden for slaves to be admitted into a monastery without their masters' leave (Conc. Chalced. A.D. 451, Act xv. c. 4). In Western Europe Charles the Great decreed that all hermits infesting towns and cities for alms should return to their hermitages or be shut up in monasteries. By the law of the Eastern church a bishop who became a hermit was ipso facto deprived of his office.

It was not unusual, particularly in the monasteries of Provence and Languedoc, for one of the brethren most advanced in asceticism to be immured in a separate cell, sometimes underground, always within the precincts, as an intercessor for the monastery (Menard, Observ. Crit. in Bened. Anian. Cod. Regum. ii.). After a solemn religious ceremony the devotee, thus buried alive by his own consent, was left, with no other apparel than what he was wearing, to end his days alone. The doorway was walled up, or the door nailed to and sealed with the bishop's ring, whose consent, as well as that of the abbat and chapter, was requisite. Only a little aperture or be seen, for letting down provisions to him confounded with the aged or sickly monks, (Cass. Inst. ii. 12; Conc. Agath. c. 38). [See HESYCHASTAE.] The rule "for solitary" of Grimlicius, probably a monk in or near Metz about the end of the 9th century, seems intended not for a separate order, but for these "inclusi" generally (Bened. Anian. u. s.). It is a characteristic difference between Asiatic and European asceticism, that the eremites, or desert monks of the east find their western counterpart in solitaries within the precincts of the community.

As might be expected for obvious reasons there have been few female hermits. Gregory of Tours mentions a nun of the convent of Ste. Croix, Poitiers, who retired to a hermitage by permission of the abbess Kulegunda (Hist. vi. 29). Usually these female solitaries had their cells in close contiguity to the wall of a church or of a monastery (Martene, v. s.).

HERULFORDENSE CONCILIUM.

[HERTFORD, COUNCIL OF.]

HESYCHASTÆ (Ἠσυχασταί). Etymologically a term equivalent to "quietists." It was applied to those members of a monastery who were allowed to have separate cells within the precincts that their meditations might be uninterrupted. (Bing. Orig. Eccles. vii. ii. 14; Menard on Bened. Anian. Concord. Regul. c. 29; cf. Justinian Novell. 5, 33.) Riddle, however, (Chr. Antiq. vii. vii.), takes it as a designation of monks bound to silence; and Suicer (Thez. Eccles.) as meaning anchorites, although the passage which he quotes from Balsamon (de Conc. Nic. ii. A.D. 787) distinguishes Hesy-chasteria from "monasteria" and the cells of "anachoretæ." In the 14th century it was applied to the mystics of Mount Athos (Herzog Real-Encyclop. s. v.). [I. HETAERIAE (ἡταίριαι) were originally political clubs; but the word came to signify any association of men for objects not recognized by the law. Thus Trajan (Plinii Epist. v. 34 [al. 43]) was unwilling to sanction a ceparæ (collegium) of firemen at Nicomedia, because he had found that in that district such companies were liable to degenerate into hetaeriae; and it was as hetaeriae that the assemblies of the Christians became objects of suspicion to the state (ib. x. 96 [al. 97], § 7), and so persecuted (Augusti, Handbuch, i. 40) [C.]

HERTODOXY. [HERESY.]

HEXAPSALMUS (ἑξάψαλμος). By this name are denoted six canary Psalms, which are said daily in the Greek office of lauds (ὡδὸν). They are Ps. iii., xxvii. (xxxviii.), lxii. (lxxii.), lxxxvii. (lxxxviii.), cii. (ciii.), cxlii. (cxliii.) They occur near the beginning of the office; and are introduced by the clause "Glory to God in the Highest, and on earth peace, good will among men," and by the verse "Thou shalt open my lips, O Lord, and my mouth shall show thy praise." After the first three Psalms are said the priest comes out from the bema, and while the last three are being said, recites the twelve morning prayers (τὰς δωδὴν εὐχαί) secretly before the icon of our Lord. They are concluded with three Allchias; and three Reverences. [H. J. H.]

HIEMANTES. The word χειμάσσειν means primarily "to be storm-tossed" (Acts xxvii. 18). Thence, by a natural metaphor, it passed on to the tempest of the soul. Thus Chrysostom (Hom. liii. in Matt.) says that the mind of a man who has many artificial wants is storm-tossed (χειμάσσειται). Compare James i. 6.

The seventeenth canon of the council of Ancyra (A.D. 314) orders those who have committed unnatural crimes, or who are or have been lepers, to be placed at public prayer among the storm-tossed or storm-benten (εἰς τοὺς χειμάσσειναι ὑπερθεταί). HIERAPOLIS, COUNCILS OF. (1) A.D. 173, of twenty-six bishops, under its bishop, Apollinarius, against the errors of Montanus, which give rise to a sect called from the province in which it originated, and in which Hierapolis was situated, "Cathphyrges" (Mansi, I, 691-4). Eusebius has preserved extracts from a work written by Apollinarius himself against them (v. 16).

(2) A.D. 443, under Stephen, its metropolitan, when Sabiniannus was ordained Bishop of Perthie instead of Athanasius, deposed at Antioch under Donnus the year before. Later, Athanasius was restored by Diocorus of Alexandria. But the Council of Chalcedon, Oct. 31, A.D. 451, deciding for the moment in favour of Sablianus, referred the final adjudication of the question to Maximus, bishop of Antioch, and a synod to be held by him within eight months to enquire into the charges brought against Athanasius. Should they not have been made good by then, he was to regain his see, and Sabiniannus to be allowed a pension. (Mansi, vi. 465-6; and then vii. 313-58.) [E. S. Ff.]

HIERARCHY. 1. The word ἱεραρχία denotes properly a steward or president of sacred rites (Böckh, Inscrip. i. 749). By Christian writers it is occasionally used to designate a minor (p. 210). Thus Maximus, commenting on the Ecclesiastical Hierarchy of the Pseudo-Dionysius, says, "καλεῖν εὐθεὶ ἱεραρχίας τοὺς ἐκκλησιαστικούς," he commonly calls the bishops hierarchs (Suicer's Theaurus, s. v.). Hence the word ἱεραρχία came to designate the order of bishops. Bingham, however (Ant. III. i. 6), considers the hierarchy of Pseudo-Dionysius to include bishops, priests, and deacons, quoting Hallier's Defensio Hierarchy. Eccl. (lib. i. c. 3; lib. iii, sec. ii. cc. 1 and 2).

2. In a wider sense, the word Hierarchy is taken to include the whole series of the orders of ministry in the Christian church. See BISHOP, ORDERS. [C.]

Each ode consists of a varying number (three, four or five are the numbers most frequently found) of troparia, or short rhythmical strophes, each formed on the model of one which precedes the ode; and which is called the Hirmos. The Hirmos is usually independent of the ode, though containing a refer once to the subject matter of it; sometimes however the first troparion of an ole is called the Hirmos. It is distinguished by inverted commas (" ") in the office books. Sometimes the first words alone of a Hirmos are given, and it is not unfrequently placed at the end of the ole to which it belongs. The name is considered to be derived from the Hirmos drawing the *Tropari*s after its model; i. e. into the same rhythmic arrangement.

HOLIDAYS. [FESTIVALS.]

HOLY! HOLY! HOLY! [SANCTUS.]

HOLY OF HOLIES. In instituting a parallel between the arrangements of the Jewish Temple and that of a Christian church, the BEMA or sanctuary of the church, containing the altar, was naturally held to correspond with the Holy of Holies of the Temple (ἅγιον τῶν ἁγίων), and was frequently called by that name. But with the Nestorians the "Holy of Holies" is not the sanctuary, but a small recess at the east end, into which not even the priest enters, containing nothing but a cross (Neale, Eastern Church, pp. 177, 189, quoting Etherege, Syrian Churches, p. 109). HOLY BREAD. [EULOGIÆ.]

HOLY OIL. [OIL, HOLY.]

HOLY PLACES. I. By this phrase were understood, in the first three or four centuries after Christ, chiefly, if not exclusively, the scenes of our Lord's nativity, death, resurrection, and ascension. Of these, therefore, we will speak first. In 212, Alexander, the friend of Origen, "made a journey to Jerusalem, for the sake of prayer and investigation of the places" (τῶν τόπων ἱστορίας, Euseb. Hist. Eccles. l. vi. c. 11). St. Jerome (De Vir. Illustr. cap. lxii.) says that he was drawn thither "desiderio sanctorum locorum." If this was the motive, and there is no good reason to doubt it, Alexander is the first on record whom religious feeling drew to those hallowed spots. Origen himself seems to have carried with him to the Holy Land more of the spirit of a learned and devout traveller of our own day. He was in Palestine in 216 on a rather short visit. In 231, he began a residence of some duration at Caesarea, in that country, and, after an absence of uncertain length, in 238 he opened a catechetical school there. He must, therefore, have known the Holy Land well, and his writings show it; but it is instructive to observe how he uses his knowledge. In one passage, as a critic, he expresses his conviction that "Bethabara," not "Bethany," ought to be the reading in St. John i. 28, "as he had been in the places, on a search after the footsteps of Jesus and his disciples, and the prophets" (Comment. in Ev. Joann. tom. vi. § 24). In another work, writing against an unbeliever, about 247, he alleges the cave of Bethlehem as a place of evidence. If any one desire further proof than Scripture affords of our Lord's birth in that place, "the cave is shown where He was born, and the manger in which He was swaddled, and that which is shown is widely spoken of in those places, even among aliens from the faith, viz., that Jesus, who is worshipped and revered by the Christians, was born in that cave" (Contra Celsum, l. i. § 51). From the writings of Origen, we should not infer that either he himself had visited, or that it was the custom of his day to visit, the holy places for the express purpose of stimulating devotion, or under the notion that prayer in them was more acceptable to God than when made elsewhere. The spirit which animated the pilgrims of a later age, had not yet been awakened. Its awakening was probably much delayed by the attempts of the heathen to obscure the locality of events sacred to the Christian. Thus, in the time of Hadrian, a vast mound of earth was raised over the spot where our Lord was buried and rose again, and a temple dedicated to Venus was built on it (Euseb. Vita Constantini, l. iii. c. 26; Hieron. Ep. xlix. ad Paulin.).

The first great impulse given to the veneration of the holy places, came from Helena, the mother of Constantine, who, in the year 326, when nearly 80 years of age, travelled to Jerusalem, that she might so "pay the debt of pious feeling to God the king of all," for the elevation of her son, and the general prosperity of her family. After due reverence done to the footsteps of the Saviour, she "left a fruit of her piety to posterity" in two churches which she built, "one at the cave of the nativity, the other on the mount of the ascension" (Euseb. u. s. c. 42, 43). On the site of the burial, Constantine, after his mother's visit, first caused an oratory to be built, and later sent directions to Macarius, the bishop, for the erection of a magnificent church (Vita, c. 25-46). To this period, and perhaps to Constantine and Helena, we may probably refer two "very small oratories," one built on Mount Calvary, the site of the passion, the other on the spot where our Lord's body was said to have been embalmed and the cross found, which the Latins, when they took Jerusalem, enclosed within the same wall with the Holy Sepulchre (Gulielmi Tyrii, Hist. Rerum Transmar. lib. viii. c. 3). They were only a stone's throw from each other (Tillemont, note iv. sur Ste. Helène); and hence the church of the Resurrection, or Holy Sepulchre, was often spoken of as on Golgotha (Cyrill. Hieros. C. l. § 1; xiii. § 12; xvi. § 2). Very soon after the recovery of these important sites we find them noticed in the Itinerarium of a Christian traveller from Bordeaux, who visited Jerusalem in 333. He saw the "crypt where His body was placed and rose again on the third day" (l. i. placed and rose again on the third day" (It. Rom. Itineraria, p. 594, Amstel. 1735), and "the little hill Golgotha where the Lord was crucified" (p. 593). He also went to "Bethlehem, where the Lord Jesus Christ was born. There," he adds, "a basilica was built by the command of Constantine" (p. 598).

II. From this time, the holy places were visited by believers of every rank and almost every age. Some of the more wealthy settled at Jerusalem, and by their aims assisted, and of Bethlehem is a place of desire further proof than our Lord's birth in that town where He was born, which He was swaddled, and is widely spoken of in those legends from the faith, viz., worshipped and revered by those born in that cave" (Oratio from the writings of Origen, that either he himself had as the custom of his day to be for the express purpose of, or under the notion that was more acceptable to God elsewhere.  time, the holy places were evers of every rank and almost one of the more wealthy settled and by their alms assisted, and

perhaps attracted, many of the poorer. The city grew rapidly in population and prosperity, and soon, as an almost necessary consequence, became as notorious for crime and profligacy, as it was famous for its religious monuments. About the year 380, Gregory of Nyssa was called thither by the affairs of the church, and received impressions which it will be well to put before the reader in his own words. In an epistle, written not long after, he tells his friend that he learned there what it was to keep holy day to God, "both in beholding the saving symbols of God the giver of our life, and in meeting with souls in which like signs of the grace of God are spiritually contemplated; so that he believes Bethlehem, Golgotha, the Mount of Olives, and the resurrection to be verily in the heart of him who has God" (Ep. ad Eustathium, &c., p. 10, ed. Casaub.). The latter thought in this sentence then carries him away, and he seems, probably out of tenderness to the devout woman to whom he wrote, to avoid further reference to the holy places. Some years afterwards, however, he wrote a tract, in the form of a letter to some unknown friend, in which he earnestly dissuades from visiting Jerusalem on religious grounds. He begins by denying that it is any part of a Christian's duty "to visit the places in Jerusalem in which the symbols of our Lord's sojourn in the flesh are to be seen," and then proceeds as follows:—"Why, then, is there such zeal about that which neither makes a man blessed, nor fit for the kingdom? Let the man of sense consider. If it were a profitable thing to be done, not even so would it be a thing good to be zealously affected by the perfect. But since, when the thing is thoroughly looked into, it is found even to inflict injury on the souls of those who have entered on a strict course of life, it is not worthy of that great zeal, but rather to be greatly shunned." He next enlarges on the danger to the morals and reputation of all, but especially women, in their travels through the luxurious and profligate cities of the East; and then proceeds to ask,—"What will one gain by being in those places?—As if the Lord were still in those places? and then departed from us, or as if the Holy Ghost were overflowing abundantly at Jerusalem, but were unable to come over to us." So far from this being the case, he declares that city to be in the lowest stage of moral degradation. "There is no species of impurity that is not dared therein. Flagitious actions and adulteries and thefts, idolatries and witchcrafts, and envyings and murders; and this last evil, above others, is common in that place, so that nowhere else is there such a readiness to commit murder as in those places" (De Euntibus Hierosolymam, pp. 6-13, ed. Petr. Molinæi). Speaking for himself, he adds, "We confessed that Christ who appeared (there) is true God, before we were at the place; nor afterwards was our faith either lessened or increased. And we knew the incarnation through the Virgin before we went to Bethlehem, and believed the resurrection from the dead before we saw the monument of it, and acknowledged the ascension into heaven to be true, apart from our seeing the mount of Olives. This is the only benefit from our journey, that we know, by comparison, our own parts to be each more holy than foreign. Wherefore, ye that fear the Lord, praise Him in those places in which ye are" (Ibid., p. 14). St. Jerome, who lived at Bethlehem, sometimes speaks very much in the same strain. At other times he encourages and praises those who visited the holy places, especially if their intention was to dwell in retirement near them. This is easily understood. The multitude would be injured by familiarity with the memorials of Christ's life on earth; while the few might through them be brought into closer spiritual communion with Him. It may well be doubted, too, whether or he would have encouraged any one to stay at Jerusalem, except under the protection of the monastic life; and even that he was far from thinking altogether safe in such a city. Writing, in 391, or thereabouts, to Paulinus, afterwards bishop of Nola, St. Jerome says, "Not the having been at Jerusalem, but having lived well there is to be praised. . . . The court of heaven is equally open from Jerusalem and Britain. The kingdom of God is within you. Anthony, and all the swarms of monks of Egypt and Mesopotamia, of Pontus, Cappadocia, and Armenia, saw not Jerusalem; and the gate of Paradise is open to them without (a knowledge of) this city. The blessed Hieron, though he was a native of Palestine, and lived in Palestine, only saw Jerusalem on a single day; that he might not appear to despise the holy places on account of their nearness, nor, on the other hand, to confine God to place." He warns Paulinus not to "think anything wanting to his faith, because he had not seen Jerusalem" . . . "If the places of the cross and of the resurrection were not in a city of very great resort, in which there is a court, a military station, in which there are harlots, players, buffoons, and all things that are usual in other cities; or if it were frequented by crowds of monks alone, an abode of this kind would in truth be one that should be sought for by all monks; but as things are, it is the height of folly to renounce the world, to give up one's country, to forsake cities, to profess oneself a monk, and then to live among greater crowds, with greater danger than you would in your own country" (Epist. xlix.). Nevertheless, when Desiderius and his sister had resolved to visit Jerusalem, he wrote (about 396) to encourage them, begging them to visit him and Paula "on occasion of the holy places." "At least," he adds, "if our society shall be un- pleasing, it is an act of faith (or perhaps, "a part of your vow," pars fidel est) to have worshipped where the feet of the Lord have stood, and to have seen, as it were, the recent traces of His nativity, and cross and passion" (Epist. xlvi.). In the same spirit he invites Marcella (about 389) to Bethlehem (Epist. xlv.); and bids Rusticus (A.D. 408) seek peace of mind at Jerusalem. "Thou art a wanderer in thy own country;—or rather not in thy country, for thou hast lost thy country. That is before thee in the venerable places of the resurrection, the cross, and the cradle of the Lord the Saviour" (Epist. xc.). In the famous epistle of Paula and Eustochium (about 389) to Marcella, every inducement is held out to her to join them at Bethlehem; the number, eminence, and holiness of those who visited the holy places from every part of the world, the psalms of praise in every tongue continually ascending from them, the high religious interest of the places themselves, and, in particular, the great piety of the inhabitants of Bethlehem and its neighbourhood; but the truth is not lost sight of, that men might be as holy and devout elsewhere: "We do not say this to deny that the kingdom of God is within us, and that there are holy men in other countries, too," &c. (Inter Epp. Hieron. ep. xliv.).

III. Before the middle of this century (about 347) it was reported throughout the Christian world (see Cyril. Hier. Catech. iv. § 7; x. § 9; xiii. § 2) that the very cross on which our Saviour died had been discovered, and was exhibited at Jerusalem. According to Cyril, who was bishop of Jerusalem from 350 to 386, the discovery took place in the time of Constantine (Epist. ad Constantium, § 2). As he died in 337, and not a word is said of the cross or its discovery by the traveller from Gaul, already cited, who was at Jerusalem in 333, the story must have arisen and the exhibition of the supposed relic must have begun some time between those years. Later writers (as Ambrose, de Obitu Theodosii, §§ 43-47; Paulinus, Ep. xxxi. § 5; Ruffinus, Hist. Eccl. l. i. c. 7; Sulpicius, and later on Theodoret, Socrates, Sozomen, &c.) assert that it was found by Helena, the mother of Constantine; but that princess died five years before the anonymous Gaul visited Jerusalem; and even if we had not his negative testimony, the silence of Cyril with regard to Helena, who, in his panegyric on Constantine, written in 337, has zealously heaped together whatever could tend to his honour, or his mother's, throw just doubt on her connection with the discovery, even if that be true [CROSS, FINDING OF, p. 593]. It is painful to suspect that the cross exhibited was not authentic, but when we find that by the middle of the 6th century (See Greg. Turon. Mirac. l. i. c. 7), if not long before, the lance, reed, sponge, crown of thorns, &c., used at the Passion were all exhibited, and revered with equal confidence, we surely have (not to mention certain difficulties in the story itself) some excuse for hesitating to affirm that the cross shown at Jerusalem in the 4th century and downward, was that upon which our Saviour died. It was believed, however, and our business is chiefly with the consequence of that belief. "Prostrate before the cross," says Jerome, speaking of Paula's first visit to Jerusalem, "she worshipped, as if she saw the Lord hanging thereon" (Ep. lxxxvi. ad Eustoch.). Paula herself refers to it, when urging Marcella to join her in Palestine: "When will that day be on which it will be permitted us to enter the cave of the Saviour; to weep with sister, to weep with mother, in the sepulchre of the Lord; then to kiss (lambere) the wood of the cross; and on the Mount of Olives to be lifted up in desire and mind with the ascending Lord?" This will, perhaps, sufficiently illustrate the importance of the alleged discovery, as a means of attracting pilgrims to Jerusalem. From Paulinus we learn that the cross was only exhibited "to be adored by the people" on Good Friday; but that sometimes it was shown to "very religious" persons, who had travelled thither on purpose to see it (Ep. xxxii. § 6).

IV. From one cause or another, then, the resort to the holy places in Palestine continued and increased. E. g. Cassian, A.D. 424, speaks incidentally of some monks who, while he was at Bethlehem, had "come together at the holy places from parts of Egypt orationis causa" (De Coenob. Instit. l. iv. c. 31). Eudocia, the wife of Theodosius, bound herself by a vow to visit Jerusalem, if she should live to see her daughter married, which, with the consent of her husband, she fulfilled in the year 438 (Soer. Hist. Eccl. l. vii. c. 47). Palladius, a Galatian by birth, who had spent many years in Palestine, writing in 421, tells us that Melania the elder showed in hospitality to pious persons going to visit the holy places from Persia, Britain, and almost every part of the world (Hist. Lausiaca, c. 118). Gregory of Tours mentions a Briton who, in his time, came to Tours on his way to Jerusalem (Hist. Franc. l. v. c. 22). Towards the end of the 7th century, Arculfus, a bishop of Gaul, "went to Jerusalem for the sake of the holy places," and being afterwards a guest of Adamnan, abbot of Iona, gave him an account of them. The latter put it in writing, and his work is still extant (Acta Bened. suec. iii. p. ii. See Bede, Hist. Eccl. Angl. l. v. c. 15-17).

V. From the middle of the 4th century, or thereabouts, some other places had been acquiring such a character for holiness, as the scene of a martyr's triumph or the shrine of his relics, that they were visited by pilgrims from a distance, and even received the conventional title of Loca Sancta. Thus Rome was famous for the martyrdoms of St. Peter and St. Paul. St. Chrysostom, alluding to the chain with which St. Paul was bound, says, "I would be in those places, for the bonds are said to be there still. . . . I would see those bonds, at which devils are afraid and tremble, but which angels reverence" (Hom. viii. in Ep. ad Eph. c. iv. 1). But with him such a pilgrimage would have been only γυμνασία πρὸς θεοῦ βίαια; for he more than once tells his hearers that they need not cross the sea, for God will hear them equally where they are. "Let us each, man and woman [remaining here at Antioch], both when gathering in church and staying in our houses, call very earnestly on God, and He will certainly answer our prayers" (Hom. de Statuis, iii. § 3; cf. Hom. i. in Ep. ad Philem. c. i. 1-3). And he claims a similar sanctity for Antioch, in which city he then lived, A.D. 388, as having been the "tabernacle of the apostles, the dwelling-place of the righteous" (Ibid. § 3). St. Augustine, A.D. 404, sent two persons, who accused each other of crime to a "holy place," viz. the shrine of St. Felix, at Nola, in the hope that "the more terrible workings of God" there "might drive the guilty one to confession, by punishment (divinely inflicted) or by fear" (Ep. lxxviii. § 3). He asks, "Is not Africa full of the bodies of holy martyrs? And yet," he adds, "we do not know that such things are done anywhere here" (Ibid.). Nevertheless, in the last book of the City of God, which was written about the beginning of the year 427, he records many wonders as wrought in Africa, within the few years previous, at the Memorials of St. Stephen and other martyrs (De Civ. Dei, l. xxii. c. 6). Prudentius, himself a native of Spain, A.D. 405, celebrating the praise of two martyrs, who suffered at Calahorra in that country, says that the dwellers in that city "frequented the saints

St. g. Casian, A.D. 424, speaks of monks who, while he was in Egypt, "came together at the holy of Egypt orontionis causâ" (De v. c. 31). And he an sanctity for Antioch, in which d, A.D. 388, as having been the of the apostles, the dwelling-place ous" (Ibid. §3). St. Augustine, t two persons, who accused each to a "holy place," viz. the shrine at Nola, in the hope that "the workings of God" there "might ily one to confession, by punish- y inflicted) or by fear" (Ep. lxxvii. s., "Is not Africa full of the bodies yrs?" And yet," he adds, "we do at such things are done anywhere. Nevertheless, in the last book of God, which was written about the year 427, he records many wrought in Africa, within the w at the Memorial of St. Stephen martyrs (De Civ. Dei, l. xxii. c. 8), himself a native of Spain, A.D. 405, the praise of two martyrs, who Calahorra in that country, says that in that city "frequented the saints stained with their sacred blood, beseeching with voice, vows, gift; that foreigners, too, and the inhabitants of the whole earth came thither;" and that "no one there, in his supplication, multiplied pure prayers in vain." The poet affirms that many miracles were wrought there by the power of the martyrs, and that Christ conferred that blessing on the town, when He gave their bodies to its keeping (De Coronis, Hymn 1). We must remember that the writer is a poet, but hardly more could have been said of a popular shrine in the 9th century.

VI. Probably not very long after the time of these writers, a custom began of sending penitents to various shrines (ad limina sanctorum), partly as a penance, and partly that they might more effectually obtain the intercession of the martyr of the place. Most writers, following Morinus (De Sac. ranc. Poenit. l. vii. c. 15), have supposed that this form of penance was not in use till the 7th century; but a passage in one of the Homilies of Caesarius of Arles (A.D. 502), first printed by Baluzius in 1669, implies that it was known in France, at least, before the close of the 5th—"Frequenting the thresholds of the saints, they (penitents) would ask for aid against their own sins, and, persevering in fastings and prayers, or in almsgiving, would strive rather to punish than to nourish, or add to, those sins" (Hom. iii. p. 23). The great evils to which this practice would soon lead are obvious, and we need only, in conclusion, cite a canon of the council of Châlons-sur-Saône, A.D. 813, by which Charlemagne and his advisers sought to restrain them:—"A great mistake is made by some, who unadvisedly travel to Rome or Tours (to the shrine of St. Martin), and some other places, under pretext of prayer. There are presbyters, and deacons, and others of the clergy, who, living carelessly, think that they are purged from their sins and entitled to discharge their ministry, if they reach the aforesaid places. There are also laymen who think that they sin, or have sinned, with impunity, because they frequent these places for prayer." Some of the powerful, it adds, under pretext of a journey to Rome or Tours "for the sake of prayer or visiting the holy places," oppressed the poor by their exactions, while many of the poor made such pilgrimages on an occasion of begging with more success: some falsely pretending to be on their way to the holy places, others going there in the belief that they would be "cleansed from sins by the mere sight" of them (can. xiv. Conc. Cahil. II.)

HOLY SPIRIT. The dove is the invariable and exclusive symbol which expresses special manifestation of the presence of the Third Person of the Trinity, and the article under that word will be found to contain some information as to the use of the symbol in this its highest sense. Luke iii. 22, Matt. iii. 16, Mark i. 10. The baptistery of St. Pontianus, in the catacomb of that name (Aringhi ii. 275), contains one of the earliest of these paintings of the Holy Dove, referable to the early 7th century; but the Lateran cross is reputed to be of the period immediately succeeding Constantine, and is a yet more striking example. HOLY WATER. I. The use of lustral water in the Christian church appears to have had a manifold origin.

(1) At an early period we find FOUNTAINS, or basins, supplied with fresh water, near the principal doors of churches, especially in the East, that they who entered might wash their hands at least [see HANDS, WASHING OF], before they worshipped. There can be no doubt that the ritual use of water under the name of holy water (aqua benedicta, ἁγίασμα, εὐχὰ ἁ- λωγίας, &c.) arose in a great measure from the undue importance which naturally attached itself to this custom, as ignorance and superstition began to prevail amid the troubles of the Western empire.

(2) Again, under the Mosaic law a person legally unclean was not restored to social intercourse, and to communion in prayer and sacrifice, until he had been sprinkled with the water of separation, and had "washed his clothes and bathed himself in water" (Numb. xix.; compare Ezekiel xxxvi. 25).

(3) The courts of heathen temples were commonly provided with water for purification; but it is probable that as a belief in the gods declined through the influence of Christianity, many would neglect to use it as they entered. Hence, we may suppose, the custom for a priest to sprinkle them at the door, lest any should present themselves unpurified. An instance is mentioned by Sozomen. When Julian was about to enter a temple in Gaul, a "priest holding green boughs wet with water sprinkled those who went in after the Grecian manner" (Hist. Eccl. l. vi. c. 6). This bore such a resemblance to the later rite of Christians as to mislead one transcriber of the work of Sozomen, and induce him to substitute Ἐκκλησιαστικῶς, Ecclesiastical, for Ἑλληνικῶς, Grecian (Annot. Vales. in loco. p. 109).

(4) We may add that the notion of a lustration by water prevailed also among the earliest heretics. Some of the Gnostics threw oil and water on the head of the dying to make them invisible to the powers of darkness (Iren. Haeres. l. i. c. 2, § 5). The Ebionites immersed themselves in water daily (Epiphani. Haer. xxx. § 16). The founder of the sect is said by Epiphanius to have been wont to plunge into the nearest water, salt or fresh, if by chance he met one of the other sex (Ibid. § 2).

If many miracles are said to have been wrought by means of water, and to this also we attribute a certain influence in giving both authority and shape to the superstitions which arose with regard to holy water. Count Joseph in the time of Constantine the Great, sprinkled an insane person with water over which he had made the sign of the cross, and his reason was restored (Epiphani. u. s. § 10). We are told that by the same means he dispersed the enchantments by which the Jews sought the enervation of a church at Thiering (Ibid. § 12). An evil spirit who hindered the destruction of the temple of Jupiter at Apamea, A.D. 355, was, according to Theodoret, driven away by the use of water which the bishop had blessed with the sign of the cross (Hist. Eccl. l. v. c. 21; Cassiod.

Hist. Tripart. l. ix. c. 34). Gregory of Tours describes a certain reclus named Eusitius (A.D. 532), in the diocese of Limoges, as so gifted with power to cure those afflicted with quartan fever, that by "giving them water to drink merely blessed (by him), he restored them forthwith to health" (De Glor. Confess. c. 82). Water from a well dug by St. Martin "gave health to many sick," and in particular cured a brother of St. Yriez, who was dying of fever (De Mir. S. Martini, l. ii. c. 39); and many were in like manner said to have been healed by the waters of a spring at Brioude, in Auvergne, in which the head of the martyr Julian (A.D. 304) had been washed (Mirac. l. ii. c. 3; see also cc. 25, 26, and the Liber de Passione S. Juliani). The same author relates how a certain bishop "sent water that had been blessed to a house" in which many had died of fever, and how, "when it was sprinkled on the walls, all sickness was forthwith driven away" (Vitae Patrum, c. iv. § 3).

III. The tendency to ascribe virtue to water blessed by the priest, was without doubt greatly promoted by a superstition with regard to baptism, and by the use sometimes made of the water employed at it. St. Augustine, writing in 408, says that some persons in his day brought their children to be baptized not for the sake of any spiritual benefit, but "because they thought that they would by this remedy retain or recover their bodily health" (Ep. xviii. § 5, ad Bonif. Com.). In the last book of the City of God, written about the year 427, the same father tells us of two persons who were at their baptism suddenly and entirely cured of very serious maladies of long continuance (lib. xxii. c. 8, §§ 4, 5). It was but a short step from belief in such miracles to suppose that the water used at a baptism might have virtue available for the benefit of others than those who were baptized in it. It would be often tested, and several alleged results of the trial are on record. At Osset, near Seville, was a font in the form of a cross, which, according to Gregory of Tours, was every year miraculously filled with water for the Easter baptisms. From this font, after it had been duly exorcised and sprinkled with chrism, every one "carried away a vessel full for the safety of his house, and with a view to protect his fields and vineyards by that most wholesome asperison" (Mirac. l. i. c. 24; see also Hist. Franc. l. vi. c. 43). A mother put on the mouth of her daughter, who was dumb from birth, "water which she had sometime taken from the fonts blessed" (by St. Martin), and she became capable of speech (De Mirac. S. Mart. l. ii. c. 38).

In the East, even in the time of St. Chrysostom, the water from the baptisms at the Epiphany was carefully kept throughout the year, and believed to remain without putrefaction. "This is the day on which Christ was baptized, and hallowed the element of water. Wherefore at midnight on this feast, all draw of the waters and store them up at home, because on this day the waters were consecrated. And a manifest miracle takes place, in that the nature of those waters is not corrupted by length of time" (De Bapt. Christi, § 2). In the West two centuries or so later we find a similar reservation, practised at Rome at least, but, as might be expected, with a more definite purpose. There, after the consecration of the water on Easter eve, "The whole people, whoever wished, took a blessing (benedictionem); compare the use of ἀγιασμοῦς in their vessels of the water itself, before the children were baptized in it, to sprinkle about their houses, and vineyards, and fields, and fruits" (Ordo Rom. i. § 42; Musae. Ital. tom. ii. p. 28). It will be observed that the water was now considered holy for this purpose after being blessed, and before any one had been baptized in that font. It was an easy transition from this stage of practice and belief to the benediction of water without any reference to baptism, which should nevertheless have the same power of protecting and benefitting house, field, and person, that was ascribed to water taken from the baptismal font.

IV. The earliest example of an independent benediction of water for the above-mentioned uses occurs in the so-called Apostolic Constitutions, but there can be no doubt of its being one of the corrupt additions made to the original recension probably in the 5th century. "Let the bishop bless water and oil. If he is not present let the presbyter bless it, in the presence of the deacon. But if the bishop be there, let the presbyter and deacon assist. And let him say thus: 'Lord of Sabaoth, God of hosts, creator of the waters and giver of the oil . . . who hast given water for drink and cleansing, and oil to cheer the face . . . Thyself now by Christ sanctify this water and the oil . . . and give it virtue imparting health, expelling diseases, putting to flight devils, scattering every evil design, through Christ,' &c. (lib. viii. c. 29). From Balsamon we learn that holy water was "made" in the Greek church at the beginning of every lunar month. The observance of any festival at the new moon was forbidden by the council of Constantinople, A.D. 691; and he regarded this rite as in some manner a substitute for that relic of heathenism. "Owing to this decree of the canon, the feast of the new moon has ceased from time beyond memory, and instead of it, by the grace of God, propitiatory prayers to God and benedictions (ἀγιασμοῦς) by the faithful people have place at the beginning of every month, and we are anointed with the waters of blessing, not of strife" (Comm. in Can. lxx).

In the West the earliest mention of holy water not blessed for baptism, occurs in one of the Forged Decretals, ascribed to Alexander I., A.D. 109, but composed probably about 830. It is certain, however, that these fictitious orders, put forth in the names of early bishops of Rome, did not, except possibly in a very few cases, create the practices which they pretended to regulate. The rite existed before, at least in some locality familiar to the author of the fraud. The following decree, therefore, is witness, we may assume, to a custom already of some standing. "We bless water sprinkled with salt, that all being therewith besprinkled may be sanctified and purified. Which also we command to be done by all priests" (Grentian, p. iii. De Consecr. d. iii. c. 20). In the same century Leo IV., A.D. 847, in a charge to his clergy, says, "Every Lord's day before mass bless water wherewith the people may be sprinkled, and for this have a proper vessel" (Consue. Libb. tom. viii. col. 37). The same order occurs in three similar "synodal charges" of about the same period, which have been printed by Baluze (App. ad lib. Regino people, whoever wished, took a cation; compare the use of vessels of the water itself, when baptized in it, to their houses, and vineyards, and (Ordo Rom. i. § 42; Musae.). It will be observed that now considered holy for this being blessed, and before any one in that font. It was an easy stage of practice and belief of water without any reference should nevertheless have the protecting and benefitting house, that was ascribed to water baptismal font.

example of an independent water for the above-mentioned so-called Apostolic Constitution is no doubt of its being one of the original remains to the original in the 5th century. "Let the and oil. If he is not present bless it, in the presence of the bishop be there, let the accon assist. And let him say Abahaath, God of hosts, creator of giver of the oil . . . who hast drink and cleansing, and oil . . . Thysell now by Christ er and the oil . . . and give it er and, expelling diseases, pu- &c. (lib. viii. c. 29). From that holy water was "made" church at the beginning of every the observance of any festival at was forbidden by the council of A.D. 691; and he regarded this manner a substitute for that relic "Owing to this decree of the of the new moon has ceased from memory, and instead of it, by the propitiatory prayers to God and (προσηύχοντες) by the faithful people beginning of every month, and with the waters of blessing, not m. in Can. lxxv).

the earliest mention of holy ed for baptism, occurs in one of etals, ascribed to Alexander I., composed probably about 830. It ver, that these fictitious orders, names of early bishops of Rome, possibly in a very few cases, etices which they pretended to risted before, at least in milar to the author of the fraud. decree, therefore, is witness, as a custom already of some stand- s water sprinkled with salt, that with besprinkled may be sanctified Which also we command to be "riests" (Gratian, p. iii. De Cons. In the same century Leo IV., charge to his clergy, says, "Every fore mass bless water wherewith ed, be sprinkled, and for this have" (Conc. Labb. tom. viii. col. 37). r occurs in three similar "synodal or about the same period, which have by Baluze (App. ad lib. Regibus de Eccl. Discipl. pp. 503, 6, 9). In a "visitation article" of the 9th century, it is asked whether the presbyter blesses water, as directed, every Sunday (Ibid. p. 10). Hincmar of Rheims, the contemporary of Leo, after directions similar to his, adds a permission that all who wish may carry some of the water home "in their own clean vessels, and sprinkle it over their dwellings, and fields, and vineyards, over their cattle also, and their provender, and likewise over their own meat and drink" (cap. v. Conc. Labb. tom. viii. col. 570).

We have argued in effect that the prevalence of a custom in the 9th century implies that it was, to say the least, not unknown in the 8th. In the present case we have a direct proof beside. In the Pontifical of Egbert (p. 34; Surtees Society, 1853), who was archbishop of York from 732 to 766, are forms of prayer for exorcising and blessing the water to be used in the consecration of a church. Referring to the Gelasian Sacramentary (Liturgia Rom. Vet. Murat. tom. i. col. 738), we find the same terms to be used over water for the purification of any house, exorcism only being adapted by Egbert to the occasion. The same benediction occurs in the Gregorian Sacramentary, and an abbreviated form of the same previous exorcism (Ibid. tom. ii. col. 225). As it is almost certain that Egbert borrowed his formulae from a Roman source, we infer that the office for making holy water was in the Roman Sacramentaries a century before the practice was enjoined, as we have seen, by Leo IV. It should be mentioned that the headings of these prayers speak only of water "to be sprinkled in a house," and they were obviously drawn up with reference to that only followed closely (as in the modern Rituale) by tom. ii. col. 231), and no other express benediction of water is prescribed (except in the Gelasian, for the dispersion of thunder), we may perhaps infer that water once blessed for one purpose was considered available for general use. In all the offices to which reference has been made, the salt which is to be mixed with the water is itself previously exorcised and blessed. [W. E. S.]

HOLY WEEK [EASTER EVE, MAUNDY THURSDAY, GOOD FRIDAY]. The week immediately preceding the great festival of Easter, commencing with Palm Sunday, and including the anniversaries of the institution of the Lord's Supper, the Passion, and Resurrection of Christ was observed with peculiar solemnity from the early ages of the church (Chrysost. Hom. xxx. in Genes.; Hom. in Ps. cxlv.). It was designated by various names—ἑβδομῆς μεγάλη, ἁγία, or τῶν ἁγίων; Hebdoma major, sancta, the former being the earlier title in the Western church (Missal. Ambros. apud Pamel. p. 349) authenticca (ibid.) vltima (i. e. of Lent) (Ambros. Epist. 33). From the restriction also to food then enjoined it was called ἑβ. ἑσποφύλας (Epiph. Hier. lxx. 12) Hebdoma Xerophygiac; as commemorating our Lord's sufferings, ἑβ. τῶν ἁγίων πάθων; ἡμέρας νηστεύων, στασιδίαια; Heb. poenosa, luctuosa, nigra, lamentationum; from the cessation of business, ἑβ. ἑπρακτος, Heb. mola; and as watering in the Paschal absolution. Hebdomas indulgentiae.

The observance of Holy Week belongs to very early, if not to primitive, antiquity. As the historian Socrates has justly remarked (H. E. v. 22), no commemorative seasons were appointed by the apostles, or found any place in the ritual of the apostolic church. But as Easter naturally succeeded to the commemoration of the deliverance of the children of Israel from Egypt, so the anniversary of the passion took the place of that of the slaying of the paschal lamb, while the sanctity of these holy days was gradually extended to the whole week preceding Easter, which therefore assumed a special character in the Christian year. The observance of Holy Week is accordingly closely connected with that of Easter, and is probably but little later in its origin. The earliest notice of Holy Week, which speaks of it as universally accepted, is in the Apostolic Constitutions, which represent the Eastern custom towards the end of the 3rd century. About the same time, c. 260, Dionysius of Alexandria also mentions it as of universal observance. If we may accept as genuine the ordinance of Constantine the Great given by Scaliger (de Emenat. Temp. p. 776) and Beveridge (Pandect. ii. 163) the sanctity of this week as well as of the succeeding one was business at the beginning of the fourth century. The whole week was, as far as possible, kept as a strict fast, from midnight on Palm Sunday till cockcrow on Easter Day.

By the Apostolic Constitutions (v. 18, 19), abstinence from wine and flesh was commanded, and the diet restricted to bread, and salt, and vegetables, with water as a beverage. Total abstinence was enjoined on Friday and Saturday, or at least on Saturday "when the bridegroom shall have been taken from them," while on the other days of the week no food was to be eaten till 3 p.m. or the evening, according to ability. The fast was observed in this manner in the time of Dionysius of Alexandria (c. A.D. 260), who in his canonical epistle speaks of some who fasted through the whole six days (ἡμέρας πάσας ὑπεριθέσων ἑαυτοὶ διατελοῦντες); others, two, three, or four days, according to power of physical endurance; while some kept no fast at all, and others faring delicately during the first four days sought to make up for their self-indulgence by excessive strictness on Friday and Saturday (Dionys. Alex. Ep. Canon., Routh. Reliq. Sacr. iii. 229). Epiphanius describes the practice in his days almost in the same words (ὑπεριθέμενοι διατέλουσι); some, he adds, at every two days, others every evening (Epiph. Haeres. xxix. 5; Expos. Fid. 22). Tertullian speaks of the continuous fast of this week in the phrases jejunia conjugare, Sabbatum continuare jejuniis Parasceves. (Tertull. de Patient. 13; de Jejun. 14.) Epiphanius in another place describes the bodily mortifications practised this week, such as sleeping on the ground, strict continence, watchings, xerophagy, &c., and charges the Arians with passing the time in jollity and merriment (Epiph. Haeres. lxxv. 3). Sozomen (H. E. i. 11) thus in Cyprus, illustrating the habit of continuous fasting, ἐπισημαίνων τὴν νηστείαν, at this season. All work was as far as possible laid aside, and business, private and public, suspended during the week. From the time of Theodosius (A.D. 389) actions at law ceased, and the doors of the courts were closed for seven days before and after Easter (Cod. Theodos. lib. ii. tit. viii.; De Fer. leg. ii. [see Gothofred's Commentary, vol. i. p. 124]; Cod. Justin. lib. iii. tit. xii.; de Fer. legg. vii. viii.; August. Serm. xix.; Ed. Bened. vol. i. p. 741). Those in prison for debt and other offences, with the exception of those guilty of more heinous crimes, were ordered to be released by a law of Valentinian's, A.D. 367, the earliest of the kind, according to Gothofred Comment. vol. ii. p. 273 (Cod. Theodos. lib. ix. tit. xxxviii.; de Induly. Crim. legg. iii. iv.; Ambros. Epist. 33; Chrysost. u. s.). Slaves were manumitted, and there was a general cessation from labour during this and the following week, not only to afford the servants rest but also opportunity of instruction in the elements of the faith (Apost. Const. viii. 33; Greg. Nyssen. Hom. III. de Resurr. tom. iii. p. 420; Cod. Justin. lib. iii. tit. xii.; de Fer. leg. viii.). The week was also distinguished by liberal almsgiving (Chrysost. u. s.).

The observance of the week may be said to have commenced with the preceding Saturday, when, with reference to John xii. 1-9, the church commemorated the raising of Lazarus—an event assigned erroneously by Epiphanius to that day (Epiphani. Homil. eis τὰ Βάβια tom. ii. pp. 152, 153; Neule Eastern Ch. ii. 747). The Gallican liturgies commemorated this miracle the next day (Palm Sunday), known therefore as Dominica Lazari, as appears from the collects of the Missale Gallicanum Vetus, and the Sacram. Gallicanum (Muratori ii. 718, 834). On the Saturday the pope was accustomed to give special alms at St. Peter's, in allusion to Christ's words spoken that day (Mar. xiv. 7). (Comes Hieronymi apud Pamel. ii. 21; Sacram. Gregor. ib. 244.)

The Sunday next before Easter, the first day of Holy Week, was distinguished by many different names. The earliest and most constant, indicating the great event of the day, being Palm Sunday; κυριακή, ἑορτή τῶν Βαβῶν; ἡ βασιόφιρος ἑορτή; Dominica Palmarum, or in Palmis, Florum, or Punorum, or Osanna. A later appellation derived from the same event was Pascha florum, or floridum. From the Easter absolution which followed it was known as Dominica indulgentiæ; and with reference to the great Paschal baptism, Pascha petrum, or competentium (Ordo Romanus), while the mass was styled Missa in Symboli traditione, because on this day, or according to the Ambrosian rite the day before (Miss. Ambros. apud Pamel. i. 336) the creed was recited to the competentes, or candidates for baptism, to be learnt by Easter eve, as was ordained by the 13th canon of the council of Agde, A.D. 506 (Labbe, Concil. iv. 1385; cf. Isid. de Eccl. Off. l. 27. ii. 21). The works of Augustine and other fathers contain sermons delivered on this and the following days to the competentes in exposition of the creed (Aug. Serm. de Temp. 113-135). Palm Sunday was also called capitulum because on that day the heads of the catechumens were washed in preparation for baptism and confirmation (Raban. De Inst. Cler. c. 35).

The ceremony of the benediction of the palm branches, or other branches that were substituted for them, especially olive boughs, appears in the Sacramentary of Gregory, where it has a special collect (Pamel. ii. 245). The jubilant processions which have long formed so characteristic a part of the ritual of Palm Sunday in the East as in the West, are mentioned by Gregory Nyssen (l. c.) and were introduced almost universally by the end of the 7th century (Augusti Illdoch. der Christ. Arch. iii. 338).

Each day in this Holy Week was one of special sanctity, designated αγία ἑβδομήκα, αγία, ἑβδομήκα, &c. (Bevereg. Pandect. ii. 163), the observances gradually rising in solemnity to the Thursday in Cœni Domini (MAGNUS THURSDAY), and the Friday, Passio Iovimi [GOOD FRIDAY]. The history of our Lord's Passion was recited on successive days, beginning with that by St. Matthew on Palm Sunday, and closing by St. John on Good Friday. [E. V.]

HOMICIDE (Homocidium, φόνος). Murder was regarded by the church as one of the gravest crimes. It is joined by Cypprian (de Lut. c. 9) with adultery and fraud, by Pacian (Paræn. ad Poenit. c. 9) with fornication and idolatry, by Augustine (de Fid. et Op. c. 19) also with fornication and idolatry, as one of the three mortal sins which were always to be visited with Christian excommunication. By the laws of the Christian emperors murderers were expressly excepted from the general pardons granted to criminals on occasions of great festivals (Cod. Theod. IX. xxxviii. 1, 3, 4, 6, 7, 8), and were refused the right of appeal (ibid. XI. xxxvi. 1). In some dioceses the peace of the church was denied forever to wilful murderers (Tert. de Pudicit. c. 12. Gregor. Thaumnt. Can. Ep. c. 7, Comp. Cypprian Ep. 55 ad Anton. on the practice of some of his predecessors with reference to the other great crime of adultery). But in general a murderer was re-admitted to the church after a long term of exclusion. By a decree of the council of Ancyra A.D. 314, c. 22, this term was lifelong; by Gregory of Nyssa (Ep. ad Letoi.) it was fixed at twenty-seven years; by Basil (ad Amphil. c. 56) at twenty. In the Penitential of Theodore (l. iv. 1), a murder committed to revenge a relation, was punished by seven or ten years' penance; but if restitution was made to the next of kin, half the term was remitted. If one layman slew another (ibid. c. 4), he must either relinquish arms or do penance seven years, three of them without wine and flesh; but (ibid. c. 5) if a monk or one of the inferior clergy was slain, the slayer must either relinquish arms and serve God the remainder of his life, or do penance seven years, as the bishop should direct; if a presbyter or bishop was the victim, the matter was to be brought before the king (Bel. Poenitent. iv. 1-8, Egbert Poenitent. iv. 10, 11). In the Dialogue of Egbert (Haddan and Stubbs Councils and Eccl. Doc. iii. 403), there is some variety in the penalty; a layman who slew a bishop was to pay the fine and submit to the term of penance a council should appoint, if he slew a priest the fine was to be eighty shukels; if a deacon, sixty; if a monk, forty. The ecclesiastical law in these instances being in accordance with the well known system of early English jurisprudence, which allowed homicide and every variety of personal injury to be expiated by money payments. See the laws of Ethelbert, between A.D. 597, and 604, on the payments to be made for murders (cc. 5-7, 13).

245). The jubilant processions formed so characteristic a part of Palm Sunday in the East as mentioned by Gregory Nyssen (i.e.) traced almost universally by the 13th century (Augusti Hilbch. der 338).

This Holy Week was one of special interest αεθιά δευτέρα, μεγάλη, εβδωα, Πενδοκ. ii. 163, the indulgently rising in solemnity to Genad Domini [MAURUS THURSDAY, Passio Iovanni (Good Friday) of our Lord's Passion was festive days, beginning with that was on Palm Sunday, and closing with John on Good Friday. (Homicidium, φόρος). Murder by the church as one of the gravest and joined by Cyprian (de Pat. c. 9) and fraud, by Pacian (Paran. ad with fornication and idolatry, by Pat. c. 19) also with fornication, as one of the three mortal sins, were always to be visited with penance. By the laws of the Christian emperors were expressly excepted all pardons granted to criminals on great festivals (Cod. Theod. IX. 4, 6, 7, 8), and were refused the ibid. XI. xxvi. 1. In some cases of the church was denied for murderers (Tert. de Pudicit. c. 12). Can. Ep. c. 7, Comp. Cyprian on the practice of some of his with reference to the other great. But in general a murderer by the church after a long term. By a decree of the council of 14, c. 22, this term was lifelong; of Nyssa (Ep. ad Letai) it was twenty-seven years; by Basil (ad at twenty. In the Penitential of iv. 1), a murder committed to was punished by seven or ten; but if restitution was made to a, half the term was remitted. If slew another (ibid. c. 4), he must his arms or do penance seven years, without wine and flesh; but (ibid. or one of the inferior clergy was er must either relinquish arms and remainder of his life, or do penance as the bishop should direct; if a bishop was the victim, the matter ought before the king (Bed. Poenit. Egbert Poenitent. iv. 10, 11). In of Egbert (Haddan and Stubbs Eccl. Doc. iii. 403), there is some no penalty; a layman who slew a o pay the fine and submit to the a council should appoint, if he the fine was to be eighty shukels; if a monk, forty. The ecclesi- in these instances being in accord- the well known system of early prudence, which allowed homicide a variety of personal injury to be money payments. See the laws of between A.D. 597, and 604, on the be made for murders (cc. 5-7, 13).

and for injuries to the person (cc. 33-72). The laws of Ine of Wessex A.D. 690 (c. 76), contain the provision that if a man slew another's god-son or godfather, he must pay "bot" (fine to justice), as well as "wer" (recompence to kindred); and that if the slain was a bishop's son (i.e. confirmation son), only half the payment was to be exacted. For a full account of the laws on injuries to the person, see Turner Angl.-Saxons, vol. ii. pp. 436-447, ed. 1852.

Murder joined with other great crimes was more severely punished. One who used magical arts to slay another, thereby adding idolatry to murder, was denied communion even at the last (Conc. Elber. c. 6). The same sentence was decreed against a woman who added murder to adultery by slaying the offspring which she had conceived in the absence of her husband (ibid. c. 63), and the council of Lerida A.D. 523, more than two centuries after that of Eliberis, when the terms of penance had become much easier, assigned (c. 2) a lifelong exclusion to any who used sorcery to get rid of the offspring of adultery. In an English Penitential code (Theodor. Poenitent. I. vii. 1) the punishment of homicide combined with adultery, was seclusion in a monastery for life. The parricide or the slayer of any near blood relation was, by the civil law (Cod. Theod. IX. xv. 1), in imitation of the old Roman custom, to be sewn in a sack with serpents and thrown into the water; and if this were generally executed there would be no opportunity for the early church to attach any special stigma to the crime. In England a woman who slew her son, was to do penance fifteen years, with no relaxation except on the Lord's day (Theodor. Poenitent. i. xiv. 25). The parricide or fratricide was assigned by some seven years, by others fourteen, of which half were to be passed in exile (Egbert Poenitent. iv. 10).

The modern distinction between murder and manslaughter was not invariably observed. In the council of Ancyra A.D. 314 (cc. 22-23) a shorter term is imposed upon involuntary than upon wilful homicide. But in the canonical epistle of Gregory of Nyssa involuntary homicide is explained to mean that which occurs through simple accident; but homicide which is the result of passion, is treated as if it were wilful murder, even if deliberation and intention, which constitute the legal crime of murder, are absent. The distinction however appears in the Penitential of Theodore, where it is decreed (I. iv. 7) that if a man kills another by accident, he shall do penance one year; if in a passion, three years; if over the wine cup, four years; if in strife, ten. Homicide committed at the command of a master or in war was to be subject (ibid. I. iv. 6) to forty days' penance. The chastisement of a slave with such severity that he died, which was a crime on the borderland of manslaughter and murder, was not dealt with so severely as wilful homicide (Conc. Elber. c. 5, Conc. Epan. c. 34).

Concilia abort in any stage of conception, or taking or even administering drugs for that purpose, was treated as a form of murder, and a long period of penance was allotted to it (Tert. Apolog. c. 9; Basil ad Amphiloc. cc. 2, 8; Conc. Ancyra. c. 21; Conc. Ilerd. c. 2; Conc. in Trull. c. 61). But that there was some laxity of opinion on the crime, appears from one of the English Penitentials (Bed. Poenitent. iv. 12), which excludes from communion for a longer term a woman who procured abortion in order to conceal her shame, than one who did so because she was too poor to maintain her child. Closely allied to this crime was the EXPOSING OF INFANTS. [See that head.]

Anger and strife as tending to murder (Matt. v. 22) were brought under discipline. In the African church (Stat. Eccl. Antiqu. c. 93, ed. Bruns) the oblations of those who were at enmity with their brethren were received neither at the altar nor in the common treasury, and communion. A similar decree prevailed in the Gallic church (2 Conc. Arelat. c. 50), those who broke out into open strife were to be removed from all church assemblies till they were reconciled. The discipline of the English church was more in accordance with the practice of the Anglo-Saxon law. He who wounded another in strife was to pay him a recompence, and help to support him till he had recovered, and help half a year's penance; if he was unable to support him, the penance was to extend to a whole year (Bed. Poenitent. iv. 9). [G. M.]

HOMILY AND HOMILIARIUM.

The word διδασκαλία designates generally "intercourse," implying the interchange of thought and feeling by words. In a special sense, it is used for the instruction which a philosopher gave his pupils in familiar conversation (Xenophon, Mem. I. ii. 6 and 15). In this sense of "familiar instruction" it passed into Christian usage. Thus St. Luke uses the word διηγήσας of the same address which he had previously described by the word διαλεγόμενος (Acts xx. 9, 11). Compare Euseb. IE. vi. 19, § 17. Photius (Biblioth. no. 174, 4, in Suerz's Theca. s. v.) notices that the discourses of Chrysostom were properly called διδασκαλία, rather than λόγος, as being simple, inartificial, popular addresses, in a style rather conversational than formal, while a λόγος was constructed according to the rules of art, and with a certain dignity and elevation of style. Similarly the French Conférence. The council of Ancyra (c. 1) A.D. 314, forbidding presbyters who have sacrificed to idols προσφέρειν ἢ διμυλεῖν ἢ διαλεγεσθαι seems to use the word διμυλεῖν as the common technical expression for the address of the presbyter in the liturgy.

Probably the earliest extant addresses commonly called Homilies are those of Origen, who (if he himself applied the term to his discourses) no doubt took it from the schools of philosophy.

The word seemingly did not pass into common use in Latin before the fifth century; for Victor Vitensis (Persec. Vandal. i. 3, p. 10, Ruinart), writing towards the end of that century, speaks of Augustine's popular addresses, "quos Graeci homiliae vocant," as if "homiliae" were still to some extent strange to his Latin readers.

Augustine had himself made a similar explanation of the word (On s's. 118 [119] Pref.; Epist. 2, ad Quodvultdesum). And he also supplies abundant evidence that these homilies were intentionally careless and colloquial in style. So long as all are instructed (he says), let us not fear the critics (Serm. 37, c. 10, p. 187); let not word-cavers ask whether it is Latin, but Christians whether it is true (Serm. 299, p. 1213); it is better that the preacher should be barbarous, and his hearers understand, than the preacher scholarly and the people lacking (On Ps. 36, Serm. 3, p. 285); it is better that critics should blame, than that the people should miss the meaning (On Ps. 138, p. 1545).

See further on preaching, and its place in the liturgy, under SERMON.

At a comparatively early period we find that the custom arose of delivering the sermons of others in churches where the priest was, for some reason, unable to preach. Mr. Scudamore (p. 290) gives the following instances:—

Augustine (De Doct. Chr. iv. 62) thinks it well that those who have a good delivery, but no power of composition, should adopt the sermons of others. Isidore of Pelusium (A.D. 412) wrote a homily to be delivered by his friend Dorotheus, which was declaimed with much applause (Epist. iii. 382). Cyril of Alexandria is said by Germainus (De Vi. Illust. c. 57 in Fabricii Biblioth. Eccl. p. 27) to have composed many homilies, which (he adds) are committed to memory by the Greek bishops for delivery. The same author relates (u.s. c. 67, p. 31) that Salvian of Marseilles made many homilies for bishops. Some of the Pictones Sacrae of Ennodius, bishop of Ticino (A.D. 511) are manifestly written to be preached by some other than the writer, and two of them bear the titles: "Sent to Honoratus, bishop of Novara, at the dedication of the basilica of the Apostles," and "Given to Stephanus . . . to be pronounced by Maximus the bishop." The second council of Vaison, A.D. 529, licenses all presbyters to preach in their districts, and provides (c. 2) that, in case the presbyter, from sickness, is unable to preach, homilies of the Holy Fathers should be recited by the deacons [DEACON, p. 529]. Caesarius of Arles († 542) is said (Life by Cyprian, c. 31; in Acta SS. Ben. i. 645) to have composed homilies, which the bishops in the Frank territory, the Gauls, Italy, or Spain, to whom he sent them, might cause to be preached in their churches. To read the sermons of others seems indeed to have been a recognised practice in the Gallican church. Thus Germanus of Paris (Expositio Brevis, in Migne's Patrol. lxxii. 91) says, that the homilies of the saints which are read after the Gospel, are to be taken merely as preaching, that the pastor or doctor of the church may explain in popular language to the people what has been delivered in the Prophecy, Epistle, or Gospel.

This constant habit of using the sermons of others led in process of time to the formation of collections of homilies, of which those who were unable or unwilling to compose sermons might avail themselves. Bede's Homiliae de Tempore are said to have been much used in this way. This collection contains 35 homilies for the summer half of the year, 15 for the winter; 22 for Lent; 32 for the Saints' Days of the summer half, 16 for those of the winter half; and various Sermones ad Populum. Probably several other collections were in circulation before the end of the eighth century. See Mabillon, Act. SS. Bened. iii. pt. 1, p. 556 ff. But in the time of Charles the Great all the homilaries in common use in the Frankish kingdom were found to labour under great defects; the homilies which they contained were in many cases written by men of no authority, and they were full of errors both of style and matter. The king, therefore, commissioned Paul Warnefrid, the well-known historian of the Lombards, to draw up a collection of homilies from the Fathers which should be free from these faults. This task he accomplished before the end of the eighth century, probably not later than A.D. 780; for Charles, in the recommendation prefixed to the book, does not style himself emperor. In this preface (Mabillon's Annot. lct. p. 75, ed. 1723) the king states that in gratitude to God for the protection which He had given him in war and peace, he had set himself to promote the welfare of the church and the advancement of knowledge; he refers to the efforts which he had made to secure a correct text of the Scriptures [CANONICAL BOOKS], and then proceeds to recommend the homilary for adoption in the Gallican churches, which his father Pepin had already furnished with chants after the Roman model (Romanæ traditionis cantibus). In this collection* the discourses are arranged according to the series of Sundays and Festivals; that form of the Vulgate text is adopted in quotations from Scripture which had been in common use since the days of Gregory the Great.

In the year 813 the council of Rheims (c. 15) enjoined the bishops to preach sermons of the Holy Fathers in the dialect of their several dioceses, so that all might understand, and in the same year the third council of Tours (c. 17) ordered that every bishop should have homilies prepared containing needful admonitions for the use of those under them, and that each should endeavour to translate the said homilies clearly into the rustic-Roman or the Teutonic tongue, so that all might more easily understand the things spoken. To the same effect the council of Mayence (c. 2), in the year 847.

The collection of Aelfric (generally supposed to be the archbishop of York, 1023-1051) does not fall within our period; but it was probably the successor of various other collections of English homilies, some of which may have existed before the time of Charles.

John Beeth (A.D. 1162) calls the Book of Homilies (Div. Off. Expl. c. 60) the Homiliaris, and mentions a Sermolopus separately among the books which a church ought to have.

* It was commonly attributed in the Middle Ages to Alcuin, and bears in the Cologne edition of 1539 the following title: "Homiliae seu maxis sermones sive encycloes ad populum praestantissimorum ecclesiae doctorum Hieronymi Augustini Ambrosii Gregorii Origenis Chrysostomi Bedae etc. in hunc ordinem digestae per Alchunum levitam idque injunctae et Carolo Mag. Rom. Imp. cur a secretis fuit." Possibly the mistake arose from the fact that Alcuin revised the so-called Comes Hieronymi [LECTIONARY]; or he may have revised the work of Warnefrid. See on this point Mabillon (Ann. O. S. Ben. ii. 328) and Rivet (Hist. Lit. de la France, iv. 337). The Éditio Princeps is that of Speyer, 1622. The author of the ancient Life of Alcuin (Mabillon, Acta SS. Ben. Saec. iv. pt. 1, p. 158) says that Alcuin collected two volumes of Homilies from the works of the Fathers. If he did—which is scarcely probable since Warnefrid's collection had just been authorized—the work is lost.

great defects; the homilies which were in many cases written by authority, and they were full of style and matter. The king, mentioned Paul Warnefrid, the scribe of the Lombards, to draw on of homilies from the Fathers to be free from these faults. This implied before the end of the 7th century, probably not later than A.D. 700, in the recommendation previously, does not style himself in this preface (Mabillon's Anecd. i. 1723) the king states that in God for the protection which He in war and peace, he had set on to promote the welfare of the church and of knowledge; he refers to which he had made to secure a of the Scriptures [CANONICAL] then proceeds to recommend the adoption in the Gallican churches, where Pepin had already furnished after the Roman model (Romanesque) in this collection arranged according to the series of feasts and festivals; that form of the is adopted in quotations from which had been in common use since Gregory the Great.

In 813 the council of Rheims (c. 15) the bishops to preach sermons of the Holy in dioceses of their several dioceses, might understand, and in the same council of Tours (c. 17) ordered that the bishop should have homilies prepared for the use of the clergy, and that each should read them, and that each should translate the said homilies clearly into the Roman or the Teutonic tongue, might more easily understand the same. To the same effect the council of 847.

The collection of Aelfric (generally supposed to be the bishop of York, 1023-1051) does in our period; but it is probably a collection of various other collections of homilies, some of which may have been the time of Charles.

The (A.D. 1162) calls the Book of Homilies. Off. Expl. c. 60) the Homilies mentions a Sermologus separately books which a church ought to have.

Commonly attributed in the Middle Ages to the Cologne edition of 1539; the following Homilies seem various sermons sine oratione presbiterii in unum collectae doctorum (guetlin Ambrosii Gregorii Virgini Chrysolasti. In hunc ordinem digestae per Alamanum Idonjonense et Caroli Mag. Rom. A.D. 1162) Possibly the mistake arose that Aelfric revised the so-called Collectae (REVISED); or he may have revised the Collectae. See on this point Mabillon (An. 328) and Rivet (Hist. Lit. de la France, Editio Princeps is that of Speyer, 1623). The of the ancient Life of Aelfric (Mabillon, Sac. iv. pt. 1. p. 158) says that Aelfric volumes of Homilies from the works of the he did—which is scarcely probable, who collection had just been authorized—Durandus uses (Rationale, vi. l. §§ 28, 32) the form Honitarius [i.e. Liber] as well as Honellonarius (Binterim's Denkwürdigkeiten, iv. 3340 ff.; Wetzer and Welte's Kirchenlexicon, v. 307; Scandmore's Notitia Eucharistica, 290 ff.; Ranks in Studien und Kritiken, 1855, li. p. 387 ff.) HONEY AND MILK. 1. The giving of honey and milk to a person newly baptised, as a symbol of the nourishment of the renewed soul, has already been mentioned [BAPTISM, § 66, p. 161].

2. Among the things enumerated by the Apostolical Canons (c. 3), which the bishop is forbidden to bring to the altar [or sanctuary], are honey and milk. The 24th canon of the third council of Carthage also excludes honey and milk from the offerings on the altar, in that it forbids anything to be placed upon it but bread and wine mixed with water. But the 27th of the African canons, repeating this, adds: "Primitiae vero, seu mel et lac quod uno die solemnissimum in infantum mysterio solet offerri, quovis in altari offerantur, suam tamen habent propriam benedictionem, ut a sacramento Domini Corporis et sanguinis distinguantur; nec amplius in primitiis offerantur quam de uvis et frumentis." It is evident from this, that at the time when these canons were drawn up, the custom had arisen of placing on the altar the honey and milk for the neophytes at Easter, and (apparently) of consecrating them with the bread and wine. It is this latter practice which is here forbidden; the honey and milk are to be given to the eucharistic elements. At the end of the seventh century the placing of honey and milk on the altar was wholly forbidden (Conc. in Trullo, c. 57; cf. c. 28).

HONOR. 1. The word is used specially of ecclesiastical dignities or orders. Thus Optatus of Milevis (c. Donat. ii. 24) says, speaking of the attempts of the Donatists to annul the orders of Catholic priests, "quid predest quod vivi sunt homines et occisi sunt honores a vobis?" So Augustine, Adv. Epist. Parmen. ii. 11; and Conc. Arelat. IV. cc. 1 and 2. In Charles the Great's Capitalis (v. 8), "honorabilis persona" is used apparently to distinguish one in major orders from "ecclesiastici viri" who were only in minor orders (Ducange, s. v.).

2. The second council of Brugn, A.D. 572, lays down (c. 2) that no bishop making a visitation of his diocese should take anything from the churches besides the customary honorarium to the see (praeter honorem cathedrae suae) of two solidi. We may perhaps discern here the germ of the later use, according to which "honor" means a benefice. [C.]

HONORATUS. (1) Bishop of Arles (+429 A.D.); commemorated Jan. 16 (Mart. Adonis, Ursardi).

HOOD (κουκούλλιον, κουκούλιον, κούκουλλα, κωνούλιον, ένα καμαλάχη; capillum, caputium,

* Duplo reads, "quia vivunt homines, et honore a vobis non sunt?"

cuollus, cuculla, cucullio, capa, cappa). Garments intended for outdoor wear were very frequently provided with a hood as a protection for the head against rain or cold, which might be drawn forward when need required, or might be allowed to fall back upon the shoulders. This would of course be ordinary, but not necessarily, attached to the dress. The lucerna, for example, was generally furnished with a hood or cowl (see e.g. Martini xiv. 132, 129; and cf. Juvenal vi. 117, 330; viii. 145); so also was the caracalla, which was introduced into Rome from Gaul, and from which the emperor Aurelius Antoninus derives the name by which he is ordinarily known. Jerome refers to it by way of illustration in his description of the ephod of the Jewish high-priest, "in modum caracallarum, sed absque cucullis" (Epist. 64 ad Fabiolam, § 15; vol. i. 364, ed. Vallars), where the last words imply what was the ordinary fashion of it. A hood was also the appendage of the casula, which Isidore (de Origin. xix. 24) describes as vestis cucullata; of the colobium (see e.g. Honerius Augustodunensis, Gemma Animae, i. 211; Patrol. clxxii. 607), and of the cope (see e.g. Durandus, Rat. Div. Off. iii. 1. 13, who speaking of the symbolism associated with the pluviale, or cappa, adds "habet etiam caputium, quod est supernum gaudium"). As regards the last of these, we may take this opportunity of remarking that Isidore (de Origin. xix. 31) uses the word cappa distinctly in the sense of hood, "cappa . . . quia capitis ornamentum est." As an example of this more restricted meaning of the word, we may cite a remark in a letter of Paulus Diaconus, in the name of abbot Theodemar, to Charlemagne as to the dress of the monks of Monte Cassino, "illud autem vestimentum, quod a Gallicanis monachis cuculla dicitur, et nos capam vocamus . . ." (Pauli Diaconi Epist. i.; Patrol. xc. 1587). He had just before meant the same dress (the word cuculla with them meant the same dress "quam alio nomine casulam vocamus." A later instance is found in the records of a council of Metz (A.D. 888), which enjoins the use of the capa (in the sense of hood) to monks and forbids it to laymen (can. 6, Labb. ix. 414). An earlier council, that of Aix-la-Chapelle (A.D. 816), had restricted the use of the cuculla to monks, excluding other ecclesiastics (can. 125, Labb. viii. 1395). It may be added here that the congress of Gallican abbots and monks, held at the same place in the following year, carefully fixed the size of the cowl, "mensura cucullinae duobus consistat cubitis" (cap. 21; op. cit. 1508). With reference to the foregoing Theodosian code had expressly permitted to slaves, with certain exceptions, the use of the byrrus and cuollus (Cod. Theodos. lib. xiv. tit. 10, l. 1).

The most prominent instance of the use of the hood is to be found in that of the monastic cowl, which is frequently referred to in various laws, and which formed a special part of the monkish dress at least as early as the time of Jerome. The hermit Hilarion was, according to this father, buried "in tunica ciliciana et cuculla" (Vita S. Hilari. cc. 44, 46; vol. ii. 30, 40, ed. Vallars). We meet with several allusions in the cuculla in Jerome's translation of the Rule of the Egyptian Pachomius (see e.g. cc. 81, 91, 99, op. cit. 67, sqq.). Thus the monks in this system were to have two cowls, which were to bear tokens indicative of the particular monastery, and without his cowl and "pellicula" no monk was to appear at divine service or at meals. The Rule of St. Benedict allowed to each monk, in the case of dwellers in temperate climates, a frock and hood (cuculla), the latter to be "in hyeme villosa, in aestate pura aut vetusta" (Reg. S. Bened. c. 55; in Holstenius, Codex Regiarum, pt. ii. p. 32; ed. Paris, 1663). The same distinction between hoods for summer and winter wear is also found in the Rule of St. Fructuosus (c. 4; op. cit. p. 139), which allows a couple to each monk, "villata et simplex." The Regula Magistri lays down a wholesome provision as to the hoods and frocks of the monks who discharged the weekly office of cook (c. 81; op. cit. p. 257). The word cucula passed from Latin into Greek, where it appears as κουκούλιον, etc. Thus, for example, it is mentioned in connection with the monastic dress by Sozomen (Hist. Eccles. iii. 14, where he remarks on the Egyptian monks), Pseudo-Athanasius (de Virginitate, c. 11; vol. ii. 116, ed. Moutfaucou), and by Germanus, patriarch of Constantinople (ob. 740, A.D.), who also appears to allude to the cross on the cowl, still worn by bishops and σταυρόφοροι in the Greek church (Historia Ecclesiastica et Mystica Con templatio; Patrol. Gr. xviii. 396). The name ἄνω καμηλαύχιον (variously spelled) is given to the hood which covers the under headdress (κάτω καμηλαύχιον) worn by a Greek patriarch who has been a member of a monastic order (see Ducange's Glossarium Graec. s.v. καμηλαύχιον). An illustration of this may be seen in Gouar's Euchologion (p. 156; cf. also p. 518), where the patriarch Bekkus is thus figured. This name, however, belongs to a date subsequent to our period.

We may briefly refer in passing to the hood worn after baptism, which is spoken of in connection with the white baptismal robe, but as distinct from it (see e.g. Theodulf, bishop of Orlens [ob. 821 : s. v.], de Ordine Baptismi, c. 16; Patrol. cv. 234; Jesse Ambianensis [ob. 836 A.D.], Epist. de Baptismo, lb. 790; Rabanus Maurus, de Inst. Cler. i. 29; Patrol. cvl. 313). We may perhaps further refer to an epistle of Gregory the Great, who blames one Peter, a Jew, for having on the day after his baptism entered a synagogue and placed there, among other things, "birrum album, quo de fonte resurgens indutus fuerat" (Epist. lb. ix. ep. 6; vol. iii. 930, ed. Bened.). For further remarks on this species of hood, reference may be made to Martene, de Antiquis Ecclesiae Ritibus, i. 54, ed. Venice, 1783; Ducange's Glossarium Graec. s.v. κουκούλλα; Gouar's Euchologion, p. 366. [R. S.]

HOPE. [SOPHIA.]

HOLOGIUM (ὄρολογιον). An office book of the Greek church, containing the daily hours of prayer, and certain other forms, and which therefore corresponds in a general manner, though with important differences, to the Latin breviary.

The contents of the Great Hologium (ὄρολογιον τὸ μέγα) which is the fullest form, as described in the edition published at Venice 1856, and approved by the oecumenical patriarch, are arranged in three generic parts (τρία γενεὰ μέρη) as follows:

1. The office for the day and night hours of the church from matins to compline (ἀπὸ τοῦ μεσονυκτικοῦ ἕως τοῦ ἀποδείπνου).

This part therefore corresponds in the main to the "Psalterium cum Ordinario Officii de Tempore" of the Latin breviary.

2. The variable antiphons and hymns, by whatever name they are distinguished, taken from the Mnologgy (which answers to the Roman Martyrology) and from the other office books which contain the variable portions of the office; and whatever is sung in it on Sun-days, festival, and ordinary days.

This part therefore corresponds in some measure to the "Proprium de Tempore" of the Latin breviary.

3. Various short offices (ἀκροουθιαί), prayers, and canons; independent of the hours; and for occasional use. Into the details of these it is unnecessary to enter; and would be impossible without considerable explanation.

This part therefore may be compared to the collection of short offices and forms of prayer which are found at the end of the Latin breviary; though the offices contained in it are for the most part different from and more numerous than those in the breviary.

The Horologion is often prefaced by the calendar of the Mnologgy, which begins with September; sometimes (as in a copy I possess, printed at Venice 1523) by "the gospel" according to St. John: i. e. the introduction, and four last chapters: and sometimes (as in another copy in my possession, printed at Venice 1775 "con. Licenza de' Superiori"), by the Athanasian creed in Greek, of course without the words which imply the double procession. [H. J. H.]

HORRES, martyr at Nicæa with Arabis, Marcus, Nymphodora, Theodora, Theusetas; commemorated March 13 (Mart. Hieron., Adenis, Usuardi). [W. F. G.]

HORSE. The horse is represented attending on the Orpheus shepherd [Fresco, p. 696]. As a servant or companion of mankind, he occurs frequently in representations of the Magi (Bottari, tav. cxxxiii. &c.). Two horses act as cross-bearers (tav. iii.); and horses of course occur in the numerous representations of the translation of Elijah which are found on sarcophagi and elsewhere. The horses of Egypt are commemorated in representations of Pharaoh and the Red Sea (Arlinghi, vol. i. p. 331), where a mounted horseman accompanies the chariots. In Bottari (tav. clx.) there are two quadrigæ, with horses decorated with palm-branches or plumes. Martigny states in this connexion that the horse symbol has been very frequently found in the graves of martyrs, quoting the titulus of the youth Florens (Lupi, Disert. clett. i. p. 258), and the horses loose and grazing in the tribune of the cemetery of Basilin (Bianchini Nat. ad Anat. Prolegomena, t. iii.). [R. St. J. T.]

HORSE-RACING. [CHARIOTTEERS.]

HORTULANUS, the gardener of the monastery. The rule of Benedict provided certain deputies (solatia) to assist the cellarer (cellarius) in the larger monasteries. These were, usually, a farm bailiff (granatarius), a butler able antiphons and hymns, by which they are distinguished, taken from the which answers to the Roman and from the other office books the variable portions of the office; as sung in it on Sundays, festivals, &c.

Therefore corresponds in some "Proprium de Tempore" of the short offices (ἀκροαθία), prayers, independent of the laure; and for into the details of these it is entered; and would be impossible to give a veridical explanation.

Therefore may be compared to the short offices and forms of prayer and at the end of the Latin breviary the offices contained in it are different from and more numerous than the breviary.

tion is often prefixed by the Menology, which begins with sometimes (as in a copy I possess, Venice 1523) by "the gospel" of John: i. e. the introduction, and others: and sometimes (as in another possession, printed at Venice 1775 'le Superiori'), by the Athanasian Creed, of course without the words in the double procession. HOSANNA (or Osanna). This word, adopted from the salutation of the populace at Christ's entry into Jerusalem, occurs in the Mass at the end of the Sanctus, which ends thus: "Hosanna in excelsis. Benedictus qui venit in nomine Domini. Hosanna in excelsis." The same words are found in the Greek form of the Sanctus, called ἑρμηνεύσις ὕμνος; as given in the liturgies of St. Basil, Chrysostom, &c.

The word also frequently occurs in the antiphons and other parts of the service for Palm Sunday as given in the Latin Processionals, as for instance in the hymn at the Procession:

"Israel es tu Rex, Davidis et Inclyta proles, Nominis qui in domini, Rex benedite, vents: Gloria laus et honor tibi sit, Rex Christo Redemptor, Qui puerile decus prospexit Osanna plium."

HOSPITALARIUS. [HOSPITIUM.]

HOSPITALITY. Hospitality, or a friendly reception and entertainment of strangers, was a Christian virtue strongly inculcated in the New Testament, and practised most liberally by the early Christians, until long after the apostolic times.

The feeling of Christian union and sympathy was so strong, that every Christian was ready to receive another as a friend and brother, although previously unknown: a circumstance which excited the astonishment, and even the hatred and misrepresentations of pagan opponents (Tertul. Apol. 39. Lucian, de mort. peregr. 13). And one of the means by which Julian hoped to restore the old Roman paganism was an imitation of this Christian liberality. In a letter of his, addressed to Arsaces a chief priest of Galatia, the emperor urges him to take great care of strangers, and to establish houses for their reception (HOSPITALS) in every city, after the example of the Christians (Sozomen, v. 16).

All Christian families in the earlier times considered it their duty to exercise this hospitality, and Tertullian mentions it as one great objection to a Christian woman marrying a pagan, that she would not be able to entertain any Christian strangers in her house (Tertul. ad Uz. ii. 4).

But presbyters, and afterwards bishops, were especially expected to excel in this virtue. Thus Jerome extols the liberal hospitality of the young presbyter Neptian (Epit. Neptiani c. 10). And Chrysostom mentions it as a high praise of Flavian, bishop of Antioch, that his house was always open to strangers and travellers, where they received so kind and generous an entertainment, that it might be doubted whether it ought not to have been called the travellers' home, instead of his (Chrys. in Genes. i. 4).

Monasteries also were distinguished by their ready hospitality to Christians coming from distant parts (HOSPITIUM). Palladius (Historia Lausaca, c. 6) describes the hospital or guest-house (ἑσπέρια) which adjoined the church of the Nitian monks, in which pilgrims might stay, if they chose, two or three years; the first week a guest was not required to work; if he stayed longer, he must work in the garden, the bake-house, or the kitchen; or if he was a person of much consideration for mental labour, the monks would give him a book to read. In our monastery, says Jerome, hospitality is our delight. We receive with a joyful welcome all who come to us, with the exception of heretics (Jer. adv. Ruf. iii.). In the Rule of Benedict of Aniane, drawn up at the end of the eighth century, particular directions are given for the reception and entertainment of the poor and of strangers. They were first to join in prayer with the monks; they then received the kiss of peace; water was brought for their hands and feet; and in their subsequent entertainment the strict monastic rules of fasting were to be relaxed in honour of the guests. There was a distinct kitchen for the strangers' use, with officers to superintend it, so that the regular order of the monastery might not be disturbed (Concor. Reg. S. Benedicti, § 60, de hospitibus suscipiendis). This relaxation of strict ascetic rules on occasion of hospitality to strangers is also mentioned with approbation by Cassian (Collat. i. 26, and xxi. 14, &c.). The council of Aix in 816 (ii. c. 28), desired a place to be prepared at the gate of a monastery where all comers might be received.

The openhanded hospitality of Christians naturally led sometimes to the practice of deceit and imposture on the part of applicants; and to guard against the admission of pretenders, or otherwise unworthy and dangerous persons, it became customary for letters of recommendation [COMMENDATORY LETTERS] to be required. Christians going into a foreign country, or to any place where they were not known, commonly took with them such letters from their bishop, or some other well-known Christian; which letters were, if necessary, to be examined on their presentation, by the deacons of the place (Constit. Apostol. ii. 58).

In the earlier times Christians received strangers into their own homes; but at a later period, when such hospitality became inconvenient, and hardly sufficient for what was needed, houses were specially built or prepared for the reception of strangers (ἑσπέρια). These were established in places where travellers were most likely to resort, or where Christian strangers were commonly most numerous, such as along the lines of travel taken by pilgrims, when the practice of making pilgrimages to holy places had become usual.

At these houses Christian travellers were entertained according to their need, and were sent forward on their way in peace.

A singular remnant of this ancient hospitality still remains at St. Cross near Winchester, where any one who applies at the porter's lodge receives gratuitously a glass of beer and a slice of bread. [G. A. J.]

HOSPITALS. 1. General account of Hospitals.—The remarkable outflowing of benevolence and sympathy with others, which marked the very commencement of Christianity, led immediately to a cure for the poor, especially in times of sickness and distress.

From the earliest times the funds of the church were applied to the maintenance of widows and orphans, sick and poor, prisoners and sojourners (Justin Martyr, Apol. I. c. 67). It was the special duty of the deacons and deaconesses to attend to the sick at their own houses (Constit. Apost. iii. 19, and Epiphanius, Fidei Expositio, 21). But all Christians, particularly the women who had the most leisure for this purpose, considered it incumbent on them to visit and relieve the sick poor (Epist. ad Zen. et Sever. c. 17, in Justin Martyr's Works, p. 416; Tertullian, ad Uxor. ii. 4). And this they did without being deterred by any fear of infection in the case of plagues or other contagious diseases; of which a notable example, among many others, was seen in the heroic conduct of the Christians at Alexandria during the great plague there in the time of the emperor Gallienus (A.D. 260-268). See the account given in Eusebius (Hist. Eccl. viii. 22).

Public hospitals for the reception of the sick, the needy, and the stranger, began to be erected as soon as Christianity, being freed from persecution, could display its natural tendencies without danger or restriction. Houses were set apart for the reception of travellers or sojourners (ξενοδοχεῖα), for the poor (πτωχοτροφεία), for orphans (ὀρφανοτροφεία), for foundlings (βρεφοτροφεία), and for the aged (γεροντοκομεία), as well as for the sick (νοσοκομεία). [HOSPITALITY, EXPOSING OR CHILDREN, FOUNDLINGS.] Several of these objects were often combined in one establishment, so that it is most convenient to treat of them under one head.

Epiphanius (Haeres. 75, c. 1) mentions that Aërius, afterwards known as a heretic, about the middle of the 4th century was made by the bishop Eustathius superintendent of the hospital (ξενοδοχείου), says Epiphanius, called in Pontus (πτωχοτροφείου) at Sebaste in Pontus. It does not appear that the hospital was then first established, and Epiphanius mentions it as a common custom for bishops of the church to provide for the maimed and infirm by setting up such establishments.

The most complete hospital of which we have any account in antiquity was built by Basil the Great, soon after his accession to the see, near Caesarea in Pontus. St. Basil, defending himself from the charge of seeking to gain influence, which had been brought against him before the prefect of the place, says (Epist. 94 [al. 372] ad Helian), "Whom do we injure, in building lodgings (καταγάγια) for the strangers who stay with us in passing through, and for those who need attendance (θεραπεῖας) in consequence of infirmity? What, in supplying necessary comfort for these persons, nurses, medical attendants, means of conveying them (τὰ ψυχοφόρα), and persons to take charge of them in removal (τῶν παρακείμευρας)? And these things must of necessity carry with them handicrafts, both such as are required for sustenance and such as conduce to decorum, and these again require workshops." He also (Epist. 142 [al. 374]) begs an official of the empire to exempt his poor-house from state taxation, and speaks (Epist. 143 [al. 428]) of its being managed by a chorepiscopus. St. Basil's hospital is thus spoken of by Gregory of Nazianzus (who had himself seen it) in his panegyric on the saint (Orat. 20, p. 359, ed. Colon.

1690), "Go forth a little from the city, and behold the new city, the treasure-house of goldness . . . in which the superfluities of wealth—nay, even things not superfluous—have been laid up in store at his exhortation; . . . in which disease is investigated (φιλανθρωπία) and sympathy proved . . . We have no longer to look on the fearful and pitiable sight of men like corpses before death, with the greater part of their limbs dead [from leprosy], driven from cities, from dwellings, from public places, from water-courses . . . Basil it was more than any one who persuaded those who are men not to scorn men, nor to dishonour Christ the head of all by their inhumanity towards human beings." From this it appears that at least a portion of St. Basil's hospital was for lepers. Sozomen, again (H. E. vi. 34) speaks of Praxidius having been principal of this "Basilid, that most famous lodging for the poor founded by Basil, from whom it received the appellation which it still retains." Of St. Chrysostom, too, Palladius (Vita Chrys. p. 19, ed. Montfaucon) relates that he diverted the superfluous expenses of his see to the maintenance of the hospital (νοσοκομείον), and that as the need increased he found several, over which he set two presbyters of high character; he engaged further physicians and cooks, and kind unmarried attendants to work under them. St. Chrysostom himself (Hom. 66 [al. 67] in Matt.) pointing triumphantly to the large-handed bounty of the church, says, "consider how many widows, how many virgins, the church sustains day by day; the number on the roll is not less than three thousand [in Constantinople]. And she provides also for those who are in distress in the guest-house; for those who are maimed in body; and yet her substance is not diminished." It is evident that a regular system of providing for the poor in connexion with the church was organised in the middle of the fifth century; for the council of Chalcedon (c. 5) especially recognises the care of widows and orphans, and the needy generally as one of the justifications for a cleric's engaging in secular affairs (κοσμικὰ διακρίσεις), if he does it at the command of his bishop.

The emperor Julian recognised the importance of institutions such as those of St. Basil; "these impious Galileans," says he (Fragment. p. 305, quoted by Rheinwald) "give themselves to this kind of humanity; as men allure children with a cake, so they, starting from what they call law and entertaining and serving of tales, bring in converts to their impiety; and again he bids Arsacius (Epist. 49, u. s.), "establish abundance of hospitals in every city, that our kindness may be enjoyed by strangers, not only of our own people, but of others who are in need."

Placilla, the wife of Theodosius the Great, devoted herself much to the care of the sick. She cared, says Theodoret (Hist. Eccl. v. 19), for those who were maimed and injured, not detaching the charge of them on subordinates, but attending to them personally, going into the places where they were received (ἐν ταῖς καταγάγαις) and supplying their several wants. So also, making the round of the hospitals (ἐπιβάτας) of the churches, she attended on those who were confined to bed, herself handling the pots and tasting the broth, bringing bowls, breaking bread, and offering mouthfuls, washing

 Samson of Constantinople received the name of “ Xenodochus ” from his devotion to the care of hospitals and asylums, and is said to have persuaded the emperor Justinian to give up his own palace for the purposes of a xenodochion (see the Byzantine Menica, June 27). Procopius however (De Aedif. Just. i. 2) gives a somewhat different account of the matter. There was, he says, a hospital for the sick and infirm, built in former years by the pious care of one Samson, of which there were in Justinian’s time some remains in a ruinous condition. This the emperor restored, decorated, and amplified in the most liberal manner. He increased, says Procopius, both the number of wards (οἰκίδιαι, domuncularum) and the annual revenue. Whether by the expression οἰκίδιαι we are to understand detached buildings, or rooms, is doubtful; if the former, Justinian’s hospital, like that of Basil previously described, would resemble a little town, a place of many buildings within a wall. Justinian further built, in concert with Theodora, two other hospitals (ἑσπείρας). Of the empress Eudocia it is related (Vita Euthymii, c. 16, in Acta SS.
Januarj, vol. ii. p. 317) that she built many churches, gerontocomia, ptochotrophia, and monasteries. She is said also to have prepared food for the sick with her own hands.
 It is not necessary to go through the long list of pious foundations for the benefit of the sick which we meet with in the history of the church.
 But it may be mentioned as an instance of the general recognition of the duty of providing for sick and infirm, brethren, that by the so-called Arabic canons of Nicean the bishop was expressly bound, in virtue of his office, to institute hospitals. Canon 70 (Hardouin, Concilia, i. 475) prescribes, that in every city a place should be set apart for strangers, sick, and poor, which should be called a xenodochium; and that the bishop should select one of the monks of the desert, himself a foreigner, far from home and family, and a man of integrity, to take charge of the hospital, to procure for it beds and whatever may be necessary for the sick and poor; and that if the property of the hospital be inadequate, he should make a collection from the Christians, according to their several means, and with this provision sustain the brethren who are strangers, poor, or sick, as each may have need.
 Most of these instances belong to the Eastern church; but the Western church was not behind in the good work. Paulinus of Nola has left us (Poem. xx. 114) a brief description of the hospital which he himself built, which appears to have been rather for the reception of the poor and old than of the sick, as such :
 “ Diapositi terro per longa sedilia coeta Obstruere senes, inopam miserabile vulgus, Et socio casae residentes agmine matres.” This description suggests long wards, provided with “ sedilia ”—perhaps “ berths,” or divans running along the wall—in which the inmates were separated into three classes—poor, old men, and old women.
 Jerome, in a letter to Pammachius (Epist. 66 [al. 26], c. 1, 11, written, according to Vallarsi, A.D. 387) speaks of a xenodochium which the latter had built in the Portus Romanus, of which he (Jerome) had just heard. This was probably attended to by Pammachius himself and the monks for whom he had provided a convent in the neighbourhood. Jerome himself founded a hospital for the reception of the sick and the stranger in Bethlehem; tiding his means insufficient to finish it, he sent his brother Paulinianus (u. s. c. 14) to sell his remaining property in his native country, to provide money for its completion. Fabiola, the friend of Jerome, also founded a hospital at Rome. Having been obliged to obtain a divorce from her first husband on account of his intolerable profligacy, she married another before his death. On becoming a widow she learned that according to church law, of which she had been previously ignorant (“ nec evangelii vigorem noverat,” says Jerome Ep. 77 [al. 30], c. 3), it was unlawful for her to have married again during her first husband’s life, however justly she had separated from him.

 Upon this she submitted to a humiliating penance; and afterwards devoted all her property to charitable purposes, and among other good works built a hospital, where she ministered to the sick with her own hands (ib. c. 6).
 Jerome remarks that Fabiola was the first person who founded a hospital (prima omnium σοσοκομείων instituit). But this perhaps only means the first hospital in Rome or Italy. And the fact that Jerome uses the Greek word σοσοκομείων, and not the Latin valetudinarianum, tends to confirm the account which points to the Eastern church as the first to exhibit such acts of benevolence.
 Rome itself had an ancient fame for its care of the sick and poor (Prudentius, Peristeph. ii.
 140 ff.). Its hospitals were frequently the objects of the munificence of the popes. Anastasius (Vita Pontif. 134 A, ed. Muratori) tells us of Pelagius II. (578-590), that he caused his own house to be made a refuge for the poor and aged (ptochium pauperum et senum). His successor, Gregory the Great (Vitologus, iii. 35, p. 243) seems to say that he had taken Amantius from his own dwelling to pass some days in the infirmary; and John the Deacon relates of him that he set over the several hospitals careful and conscientious men, who had to submit their accounts to himself, that the beneficence of the people towards those institutions might not be checked by mismanagement of the funds. He also provided Probus with money to build a xenodochium on a large scale at Jerusalem, and supported it by an annual subvention (Vita Greg. ii. 7). Other hospitals in Rome of an early date are known to us at least by name.
 Pope Symmachus (498-514) is said by Ado (Chronicon, in Migne’s Patrol. cxxiii. 106 b) to have founded or restored three hospitals (pauperibus habitacula) known by the names of St.
 Peter, St. Paul, and St. Lawrence respectively.
 Stephen III. (752-757) is said by Anastasius (Vita Pontif. p. 165, c. d.) to have restored four xenodochia and founded two others, which were placed in the charge of the regent deacons of St. Marin and St. Silvester; and Adrian I.
 (772-795, ib. p. 190, d) to have founded three DIACONIAE (see the word) “ foris portam Beati Apostolorum Principis.” Nor was it only in Rome that such institutions were found. In Gaul they existed at an early date before the death of St. Remi (†532), if we may trust Flodard. The saint is made (Hist. Remens, l. 18) to entrust his successors to preserve inviolate his statutes for the management of his poor-houses (ptochia), coenobia, martyria, diaconiae and xenodochia, as he had done those of his predecessors—an expression which implies that some at least of these foundations existed before St. Remi came to the see of Reims before 496. The fifth council of Orleans, A.D. 549, places (c. 17) the property of xenodochia on the same footing with regard to alienation, as that of churches and monasteries; and (c. 15) makes special provision for the magnificent hospital which, under the influence of its bishop Sacardos, Childebert with his queen Ultragotha had founded in Lyons, forbidding the bishop of that city to merge any of its property in that of his church, or to diminish its privileges in any way, and enjoining him to take care that active and God-fearing superintendents (praepositi) be always appointed, and that the care of the sick and the entertainment of strangers be always maintained according to the statutes.

We do not trace the existence of hospitals in the African fathers or councils. In Victor's account of the Vandal persecution (l. 8) we find that Deogratias bishop of Carthage, A.D. 455, turned two churches into hospitals for the reception of the wretched captives who were poured on the African shores from Italy; but this was a temporary expedient, such as has often been adopted in times of calamity. But we are not to suppose that the sick of the African church were ill-cared for; the houses of the bishops, the clergy and the monks often served for the reception of the sick. Augustine (Possidius, Vita Aug., cc. 22, 23) exercised constant care for the sick and poor, and (Requid ad Serros D. l. c. 5) gives directions to monks as to their reception and treatment of the sick and infirm; directions in which he seems to contemplate the case not only of feeble members of the monastic body, but of sick persons brought in from without.

In the Teutonic countries, we have of course no accounts of hospitals of so early a date as those which have been mentioned in Italy and Gaul. Chrodegang, however (Regula, c. 45, in Migne's Patrol. 89, 1076), recommends that a guest-room (hospitale) should be formed in a suitable place, convenient for the brothers to visit; and desires the brothers of his Rule, even if they cannot maintain a hospital at other times, at least in Lent to wash the feet of the poor in a hospital or guest-room. The famous Alcuin at a somewhat later date also warned the bishops of the great necessity there was for forming hospitals, and probably also directed the attention of his patron Charles the Great to the same subject. To Eanball, as soon as he entered on his see, Alcuin wrote urging him to establish "xenodochia, id est, hospitalia" (Epist. 56, ad Eanb., Alc. Opp. l. 65) in which the poor and the strangers might be received. In accordance with the Rule of Chrodegang and the wish of Alcuin, the synod of Aix, in the year 816, ordered (c. 28) that every ecclesiastical foundation, whether canonical or monastic, should provide accommodation for the poor, the sick, the widows, and the strangers. The poor-house was to be placed near the church, and a guest was to be its superintendent; the infirmary was to be within the convent, as were also the wards for the widows and poor maidens, though probably in a building separate from that which contained the cells of the canons or monks (Conc. Germ. l. 539). The Frankish Capitularies also take order for the maintenance of the poor and sick. Thus it is ordered (l. c. 70, A.D. 789) that "hospites, peregrini et pauperes" have the due entertainment in various places to which they are entitled by the canons; a passage in which "peregrini" are probably monks from other houses, "hospites" are lay guests. And again (ii. c. 29) they bring xenodochia, ptochotrophia, nosocomia, orphanotrophia, gerontocomia, and brephotrophia under the same law as churches and monasteries with regard to the non-alienation of their property.

The establishment of many of the hospitals which existed in the northern countries in the 8th and 9th centuries is due to the Irish missionaries, who cared for the bodies as well as the souls of the people among whom they preached. Hence they received the name of "Hospitalia Sctorum,"^b an expression found both in the canons of Meaux (C. Meldense, c. 40), and in the petition of the bishops of the provinces of Reims and Ronen to Lewis the Pious (c. 10, Baluze, Copit. Franc. ii. 111). These hospitals were closely connected with the monasteries founded by the same missionaries. Gretser (Ad Vit. S. Willibadi, lib. l. observ. 19; Grege, Opera, x. 778) enumerates some of the hospitals of their foundation.

2. Administration of Hospitals.—In the first instance, the hospitals, like other institutions of the church, were under the immediate superintendence of the bishops. In many cases, as we have seen, they were founded by the bishops themselves from the funds placed at their disposal by the church, and so the oversight of them naturally fell to the founder and his successors. And even when endowed by private persons, such foundation was regarded as of the nature of alms, and so given into the hands of those who were, directly or indirectly, the universal almoners. The property of hospitals was regarded (as has been shown above) by kings and rulers as being of the same kind as the property of the church. And the attendants on the sick were, at least in very many cases, drawn from the neighbouring monasteries or houses of canons. When the duty was laid upon bishops of providing, so far as in them lay, food and clothing for those who in consequence of infirmity were unable to earn their own living (Conc. Aut. l. c. 16), it naturally followed that they superintended and directed the establishments for attaining this end.

It must however have been from the first impossible for a much-occupied bishop to give personal attention to all the details of a large hospital, and therefore other clerics were employed under him on this behalf. We have seen already that Aerius was a hospital-superintendent under his bishop Eustathius; and as early as the council of Chalcedon, A.D. 451, we find the clerics attached to the poor-houses (ἑὸν πτωχῶν) placed on the same footing as those of the monasteries and martyr-churches, and admonished to obey their bishops according to the tradition of the fathers (c. 8), a passage which probably indicates that they had been disposed to assert monastery, to receive strangers as they arrived (Cass. Instit. iv. 7). Benedict placed them under the general supervision of the cellarer, or house-steward (Reg. c. 31), and his deputies. Subsequently, a distinct officer was created, the "hospitalarius," corresponding to the eastern "ἑσπιδάριος" (Mart. ad loc. cit. Alteserr. Actioem, ix. 9; Du Cange, s. v. v.), whose duties, however, did not extend to the refectory. One of the brethren, selected as a specially God-fearing man ("Cujus animam timor dei laebeat") was appointed by Benedict to look after the guests' dormitory ("cella hospitium") (Bened. Reg. c. 53) (usually on the east side of the Benedictine quadrangle, over the "hospitium") and two others were told off annually for the guests' kitchen, which adjoined the abbat's kitchen (usually on the south side of the quadrangle with a widow between (Mart. ad loc.); these officials were to have extra assistance, as occasion required (ib.). Every precaution was taken, lest the influx of strangers should either disturb the placidity of the "house of God" (ib.), or lead to the propagation of silly rumours about it (ib.). Their sitting-room, dormitory, and kitchen were all to be separate from those of the monks (ib., cf. c. 56). None of the monks, unless expressly ordered, might exchange even in passing a word with a guest, except to ask a blessing (ib., cf. Reg. Mac. c. 8). Nor were the guests to be trusted to themselves without supervision. Care was to be taken that the monks' wallets were not left about in the guests' dormitory; and two of the monks, whose turn it was to help in the kitchen and otherwise for the week ("hebdomadarii"), were to keep close to the guests night and day (Reg. Mag. c. 79). It is not clear whether Benedict intended the guests to be entertained in the refectory at a separate table with the abbat, or with him in a separate table (Bened. Reg. c. 56); Martene thinks in the refectory (Reg. Comment. ad loc. cit.; cf. Conc. Aquisgr. c. 27). The abbat on these occasions might invite a few of the brethren to his table, leaving the charge of the rest to the prior, and might make some addition to the ordinary fare (Bened. Reg. c. 56; Mart. ad loc.; Mab. Ann. O. S. B. v. xiii.). It was strictly forbidden by the council of Saragossa, A.D. 691, for lay persons to be lodged in the quadrangle of the monastery ("intra claustra"), even with the abbat's special permission, lest contact with them should demoralise the brethren or give rise to scandals; they were to be lodged in a separate house within the precincts (intra septa) (Conc. Caesar-august. A.D. 691; cf. Mab. Ann. O. S. B. xviii. xv.).

Benedict orders, that monks coming from another country (peregrini) may, if orderly, prolong their stay in the monastery (Reg. c. 61) for one, two, or even three years (Mart. Reg. Comment. l. c.); and that any suggestions which they make for its better management are to be welcomed as providential (Bened. Reg. ib.). They are then either to be dismissed kindly ("honeste") or formally admitted, not, however, unless they bring commendatory letters from their former abbat, or otherwise give proof of his consent. Once admitted, they may be promoted without delay at the abbat's discretion, to places of authority; as may clergy similarly admitted (ib.). Laymen, willing to stay on, are, either to take the vow, or to make themselves useful to the monastery in some sort of work in return for board and lodging (Reg. Mag. c. 79).

It was part of the discipline of candidates for the novitiate to wait on the guests in their sitting-room ("cella hospitium," or "hospitium"), according to the rule of Benedict, for some days (Reg. c. 58), or, according to some later rules, for three months (Isid. Reg. c. 5; Fruet. Reg. c. 21; Menard ad Bened. Anian. Concord. Regul. lxii.) [see NOVICE].

History shows how the simple and frugal hospitality enjoined by Benedict and monastic law-makers degenerated in time into luxury and display, burdensome to the revenues of the monasteries, demoralising to their inmates, and one of the proximate causes of their fall. [I. G. S.]

HOST, from the Latin Hostia, a victim. It was applied to sacrifices, or offerings of various kinds in the ecclesiastical language of the West. E.g. in the Vulgate version of Rom. xii. 1, we have "Ut exhibeatis corpora vestra hostiam" (E. V. sacrifice) "viventem, sanctam, Deo placentem, rationabile obsequium vestrum;" and similarly in the Missale Gothicum, the people are bid to pray that God "may cleanse the hearts of all the offerers unto (i.e. that they may become) a sacrifice (hostiam) of sanctification, reasonable and well-pleasing unto Himself" (Liturg. Gall. ed. Mabill. p. 237). In the Vulgate of Phil. iv. 18, it is used of almsgiving, "Hostiam acceptam, placentem Deo." Christ, the one true victim, is called hostia, as in Eph. v. 2, "Tradidit semetipsum pro nobis oblationem et hostiam." Similarly Heb. x. 12: "Unam pro nobis offerens hostiam." Compare Heb. ix. 26. This is frequent in the old Latin liturgies. Thus in the Gothic Missal, "Suppliant to Thee who wast slain a victim (hostia) for the salvation of the world, we pray, &c." (Lit. Gall. p. 235); and "Whom Thou didst will to be delivered up a sacrifice (hostiam) for us" (ibid. p. 257; comp. p. 198). In the following example the church commemorates and pleads that sacrifice:—"We offer unto thee, O God, an immaculate victim (hostiam), whom the maternal womb brought forth without defilement to virginity" (Missale Mozar. Leslie, p. 38). As the thank-offering (Eucharist) of the Mosaic law had been called hostia laudis (Ps. cxvi. 17), or hostia gratiarum (Lev. vi. 13), so was the Christian thank-offering, the sacramental commemoration of the death of Christ. E.g. "Receive we beseech thee, O Lord, the sacrifice (hostiam) of propitiation and praise, and these oblations of Thy servants" (Miss. Goth. u. s. p. 253).

As the word properly expresses a concrete mention, it would readily pass from the last meaning to attach itself to the material symbol offered in the rite. In the Missale Gothicum, in a prayer said after the consecration, we read, "We offer unto thee, O Lord, this immaculate host, reasonable host, unbloody host, this holy bread and salutary cup" (u. s. p. 298). The following example is from the Mozarabic Missal:—"This host of bread and wine, which have been placed on Thy altar by me unworthy" (Leslie, p. 445). It will be observed that in these extracts the bread and wine (after conse-

The mple is from the Mozarabic Missal: t of bread and wine, which have on Thy altar by me unworthy" 45). It will be observed that it is the bread and wine (after consecration) are together called the host. Even in the 11th century Anselm affirmed correctly, "One host in bread and wine. . . They call both together by one name, oblation or host" (Ad Waleranum, c. 2). Long before this, however, as in the three earliest Ordines Romani, which range from the 7th to the 8th century:—"The acolytes (carrying the consecrated bread) go hosts" (Musæus Ital. tom. ii. pp. 13, 49, 50). In these ancient directories the unconsecrated leaves are always, and the consecrated more frequently, called by the older name of "oblates." When the phrase "immaculate host" was introduced into the Roman Missal towards the 11th century (Le Brun, Explic. de la Messe, P. iii. art. 6) from that of Spain, the mistake was made of applying it to the unconsecrated bread. See Scudamore's Notitia Eucharistica, p. 370. [W. E. S.]

HOST, THE ADORATION OF.

In the modern church of Rome, the worship of latri, i. e. such worship as is due to God, is paid to the consecrated symbol of our Lord's body in the eucharist, under sanction of the dogma, that the bread is, in all but appearance and other "accidents," converted into that body, and that His human soul and His divinity, being united to His body, are therefore in that which has become His body; so that while Christ, God and man, is in it, and in every particle of it (Catech. Trident. p. ii. de Euch. cc. 33, 35). Of such adoration of the host the church knew nothing, and could know nothing, before the opinions which at last shaped themselves into that dogma had taken possession of the minds of men. But the Latin word adoratio, and the Greek προσκύνησις, like the old English worship, have a great latitude of meaning, and are applied to the simplest outward tokens of respect, no less than to that highest homage of the body, soul, and spirit, which is due to God alone. For example, in Gen. xxvii. 7, 9, where the English has "did obeisance," the Septuagint gives προσκύνησαν and προσκένουσαν; the Latin Vulgate, adoravit. Exod. xl. 8: Eng. "Thy servants . . . me; Vulg. adorabunt me. See Scudamore's Notitia Eucharistica, p. 844. In this lower sense, we find the word "adoration," and its equivalents, employed within the period which is our part to illustrate, to denote the expression of reverence to the bread and wine, which are the sacramental body and blood of Christ. With this previous explanation, we give, in chronological order, a catena of passages, which will exhibit sufficiently, as we hope, both the feelings of reverence which the early Christians had for the sacred symbols, and the manner in which they expressed it by words, or gesture, or ceremonial handling, and the like. Among these are several which have often been mistakenly adduced as affording testimony to the antiquity of the Roman worship of the host. Tertullian, A. D. 192, "We are distressed, if any of our cup, or even bread, be cast on the ground" (De Cor. c. iii.). The context shows that the allusion is to a religious rite. Origen, A. D. 230: "Ye who are wont to be present at the Divine Mysteries, know how, when ye take the body of the Lord, ye keep it with all care and reverence, lest any particle fall therefrom, lest ought of the consecrated gift be spilled. For ye believe, and rightly believe, yourselves to be guilty, if ought fall therefrom through negligence. But if ye use, and justly use, so great care about the keeping of His body, how do ye think it involves less guilt to have been careless about the word of God, than to have been careless about the word of God, in Exod. xlii. § 3). St. Cyril of Jerusalem, A. D. 350: "When thou drawest near, do not draw near with hands expanded or fingers wide apart; but making thy left hand a throne for thy right, as about to receive a king, and making the palm hollow, receive the body of Christ, answering Amen. Partake, therefore, having heedfully sanctified thine eyes with the touch of the holy body, taking care that thou drop nought of it. . . . Then, after the communion of the body of Christ, approach thou also to the cup of His blood, not stretching forth thy hands; but with head bowed, and with gesture of adoration (προσκύνησας) and reverence, saying Amen, he thou sanctified, partaking also of the blood of Christ. And while the moisture is still on thy lips, touching them with thy hands, sanctify both eyes and forehead, and the other organs of sense" (Catech. Myst. v. §§ 18, 19). Pseudo-Dionysius, who may have written as early as 362, in a highly rhetorical passage, makes the following apostrophe to the sacrament: "But, O most divine and sacred celebration (τελετή); in the Latin translation, Sacramentum), do thou, unfolding the enigmatic wrappings that with symbols enshroud thee, manifest thyself to us in clear light, and fill our mental vision with the only and unshrouded light" (De Eccl. Hier. cap. iii. n. iii. § 2). Owing to the word τελετή (celebration of mysteries) having been rendered by Sacramentum, this passage has been often brought forward as an address to "the Sacrament," i. e. to the consecrated host (Bellarm. Disput. tom. iii. l. iv. c. 29 compared with l. ii. c. 3). Had still have been only an apostrophe, it would example of adoration directed to the sacred element. Gorgonia, the sister of Gregory Nazianzen, A. D. 370, is said by him, in a dangerous illness, to have "prostrated herself before the altar, and called with a loud voice upon Him who is honoured thereon" (Orat. viii. § 18). This has been understood (Bellarm. u. s.) to mean that she worshipped the host on the altar; which for several centuries after that time was not reserved there. St. Gregory himself goes on to tell us that "she mingled with her tears whatever her hand had treasured of the antitypes of the precious body and blood." St. Ambrose, A. D. 374, commenting on the words of the 98th Psalm, adorate scabellum pedum Eius, considers that "by the footstool the earth is meant, and by the earth, the flesh of Christ, which to this day we adore in the mysteries, and which the apostles adored in the Lord Jesus" (De Spir. S. lib. iii. c. 11, n. 79). Here it is implied that a reverence is due to the consecrated earthly elements, not equal to that which is due to Christ Himself, but in such proportion to it, more or less, as our loyal respect for the insignia of royalty has to that which we entertain for the person of the king himself. St.

Augustine, A.D. 396, explains the same passage at greater length, but does not lead us to a different view of the adoration intended: "He took earth of the earth; for flesh is of the earth, and He took flesh of the flesh of Mary. And because He walked here in the flesh itself, and gave His flesh itself to be eaten by us unto salvation, but no one eats that flesh unless he has first adored, we have found out how such a footstool of God may be adored, and how we not only do not sin by adoring, but sin by not adoring" (Enarr. in Ps. xviii. § 9). Commenting on Ps. xxi. 29 (Lat. 30), the same father says: the rich of the earth "have themselves been brought to the table of Christ, and take of His body and blood; but they only worship,—are not also satisfied, because they do not imitate" (Ep. cxi. ad Honoratum, cxvii. § 66; Sim. Enarr. i. in Ps. xxi. v. 30). Here, however, it is doubtful whether the writer had at all in view the reverence paid to the sacramental body. He rather, perhaps, is thinking of communion as accompanied by prayer, and as the crowning act of the eucharist, or thanksgiving. The following words of St. Chrysostom, A.D. 398, have been supposed (Bellarm. u. s.) to refer to the adoration of the eucharist: "Are thy garments filthy, and it concerns thee not? But are they clean? Then recline (ἀνάκλιμα, rendered improperly adornate) and partake" (Hom. iii. in Ep. ad Eph. c. i. vv. 20-23; often quoted from the cento known as Hom. lxi. ad Antioch.). Again, a worship of the elements has been inferred (Bell. u. s.) from this sentence: "This table is in the place of the manger, and here also will the body of the Lord lie; not, indeed, as then, wrapped in swaddling-clothes, but clothed all around with the Holy Ghost. The initiated understand. And the Magi then did nothing but adore; but we will permit thee both to receive, and having received to return home, if thou draw near with a clean conscience" (De Beat. Philoſopho, § 3). Other passages, to which controversialists refer, in the works of St. Chrysostom (as Hom. lxxxiii. in St. Matt.; xlii. in Ep. i. ad Cor. &c.), only exalt the sacrament, do not speak of any adoration. Theodoret, A.D. 423: "The mystic symbols do not, after the consecration, pass out of their own nature; for they remain in their former substance, and form, and appearance, and are visible and palpable, as they were before; but they are mentally perceived as what they have become, and are believed to be, and are adored as being what they are believed to be" (Dilog. ii. tom. iv. p. 85). Here the worship of latria cannot possibly be intended, because the author, in the same sentence, teaches that the "creatures of bread and wine" are, after consecration, bread and wine still. It may be remarked also, that although many, or perhaps all, of the foregoing extracts may be seen quoted in favour of the modern cultus of the host, there is not one that is really to the purpose. Nor is it until the 7th century, an age in which the outward observances of religion multiplied rapidly, that we find any definite gesture of respect to the host mentioned. It was the custom at Rome then to reserve a portion of the eucharist [see FERMENTUM], to be put into the chalice at the next celebration. The earliest Ordo Romanus (§ 8, Musæo Ital. tom. ii. p. 8) directs that when this is brought out for use, "the bishop or deacon salute the holy things (sancta) with an inclination of the head." In Ordo II., which is a revision of the first, and perhaps a century later, the bishop, "his head bowed toward the altar, first adores the holy things," &c. (§ 4, p. 43). See also the Eclogia of Amalarius, who comments on this Ordo (§ 6, p. 550). The significance of the action may be estimated by the similar respect paid in some churches to the gospel, e.g. "The priests and bishops standing by uncover their heads, lay down their sticks, and worship the gospel by an inclination of the head" (Vitalis Gabriel, Renaud. tom. i. p. 211). The last passage to which we shall call attention, occurs in the Acts of the council of Constantinople, A.D. 754: "As that which He took of us is only the matter of human substance, perfect in all things, without expressing the proper form of a person, that no addition of person may take place in the Godhead, so also did He command the image, chosen matter, to wit the substance of bread, to be offered, not, however, fashioned after the form of man, lest idolatry should be brought in" (in Act. vi. Conc. Nic. ii. Labb. tom. vii. col. 448). It is evident that the adoration of the host, in its modern sense, could not have been known when this was written.

As elevation is often supposed to imply adoration, it should be mentioned that there was no elevation of the consecrated elements in the West before the twelfth century; and that the so-called elevation of the East was merely a "showing of the gifts," designed to second the invitation to communicate conveyed by the proclamation, "Holy things for the holy" (see Notitia Eucharistica, pp. 546, 595). [W. E. S.]

HOURS OF PRAYER. I. This phrase was inherited from the elder church. "Peter and John went up together into the temple at the Hour of Prayer, being the ninth hour" (Acts iii. 1). At first the observance of the hours was of devotion only, but it was afterwards made obligatory by canon on the clergy and monks, and they began to be called Canonical Hours, The earliest use of this expression is found, we think, in the rule of St. Benedict (c. 67; in Holstenii Codex Regularum, P. ii.); but it does not appear to have been very common within the period of which we treat. It occurs in the Regula of St. Isidore of Seville who died in 696 (cap. 7; Holst. u. s.). St. Eloy, A.D. 640, employs it: "To whom should it be said that 'men ought always to pray and not to faint' (St. Luke xviii. 1), if not to him who daily at the Canonical Hours, according to the rite of ecclesiastical tradition, praises and beseeches the Lord without ceasing in the accustomed psalmody and prayers" (Hom. xi. in Biblioth. PP. tom. xii.). Bede in our own country (A.D. 701), in his commentary on those words of St. Luke, copies this sentence from St. Eloy. The "Canonical Hours" are mentioned in the excerpts of Eggbriht, A.D. 740 (can. 28; Johnson's Engl. Canons), and in the canons of Cuthbert, 747 (c. 15; ibid.).

that saying of our Lord: "Are there not twelve hours in the day? If a man walk in the day, he stumbleth not; because he seeth the light of this world" (St. John xi. 9). The Romans are said to have adopted this division of the day about b.c. 291. Martial refers to it as in use among them, when he tells a friend that he might read his book in less than an hour, and that not one of summer's length (Epigr. lib. xii. a. 1, ad Priscum). In the Pseudolus of Plautus an "hour in winter" is said to be "shortest" (Act V. sc. 2, l. 11). The Greeks had learnt this method in the 6th century before Christ, when the sun-dial became known to them probably through Anaximander (see Diogenes Laert. lib. i. c. 7); and they retained it during their subjection to the Roman empire. Thus in the Sentences ascribed to Secundus of Athens in the time of Hadrian, a day is defined to be "the space given to toil, the course of twelve hours" (Sent. 4). As the time of labour varied, so must the hours have been longer or shorter. It is employed beyond our period by Cassianus Bassus, A.D. 940, as when he tells the tiller of the land at what hour the moon sets and rises on each day of the month (Geoponica lib. i. c. 7). St. Augustine speaks as if he knew of no other; "The hour in winter, compared with the hour in summer, is the shorter" (De Vera Relig. c. xlii. § 86). Hence we see that the natural day and hour were also employed by the church in his day. Amalarius at the close of our period uses the same division of time with express reference to the Hours of Prayer; prefacing his account of them thus: "The people properly call the presence of the sun above the earth the complete day. From this definition it may be understood that a day of twelve hours ought to begin at the rising and end at the setting of the sun" (De Ordine Antiphonarum, c. 6; see also cc. 16, 70). By the first hour, then, we are to understand that twelfth part of the natural day which began at sunrise; by the sixth that which ended when the sun crossed the meridian; the twelfth that which immediately preceded the sunset.

The day and the night were further divided into four equal parts. Each quarter of the day consisting of three hours was named after the last hour in it. Thus the first quarter, containing the first, second, and third hour, was called the third hour (Tertia, Terce), that is to say, by the "third hour" we often have to understand the whole interval between sunrise and the beginning of the fourth (smaller) hour. Similarly Sext is the space of the three hours that follow, viz. the fourth, the fifth, and the sixth, ending at noon, or twelve o'clock. None embraces the seventh, eighth and ninth hours; and the last, called Duodecima, contains the tenth, eleventh, and twelfth, ending at sunset. This is satisfactorily shown by Francollus (De Temporibus Horarum Canon. c. xxi.; Romae, 1571). Hence St. Benedict (Regula, c. 48) was free to direct that from Easter to the Kalends of October None should be said "in the middle of the eighth hour," and that from the latter time to Ash-Wednesday "Terce should be performed at the second hour."

III. The Prayers called Hours, &c.—By the hours of Prayer and the Canonical Hours were also understood the devotions themselves, consisting for the most part of psalms and prayers, which were used at the stated times more properly so called. Equivalents in this secondary Officium Divinum, or Officia Divina (see e. g. Bened. Regula, cc. 8, 43; Isidore of Seville, De Eccl. Off. lib. i. c. 13); Cursus (sc. Divinus) (Greg. Turon. de Gloria Mart. lib. i. c. 11; Hist. Franc. l. viii. c. 15; ix. c. 6, &c.); Cursus ecclesiastici (Greg. Tur. Hist. Franc. l. x. c. 31; u. 19); Missa (Conc. Ancy. A.D. 506, cap. 30; Cassian. De Conob. Instit. l. ii. c. 7); and so Missa nocturna (Cass. u. s. l. ii. c. 13), Vigiliarium (Ibid. c. 5) (though it may be doubted whether in Cassian's time the thought of Usus was entirely absent when that word was used); Oraciones Canonice (Ibid. l. ii. c. 12). We find also the more general terms Diurna Celebrata, Solemnitas, Agenda, or, from the staple of the devotions used, Psalmodia. The word synaxis (assembling) employed by the Egyptian, Syrian, and Grecian monks, conveyed to the mind alike the notion of the times at which and of the purpose for which they assembled (Ibid. lib. ii. c. 10; Collut. viii. c. 16, &c.). It was often thus used in the West, but at first needed explanation. Hence in the rule of St. Columban, abbot of Luxeuil in Burgundy, and afterwards of Bobio in Italy from 589 to 615 we read, "concerning the synaxis, that is, the course of psalms and the canonical method of prayers" (cap. 7, Holst. u. s. sim. Regula Donati, c. 75, Holst. P. iii.). In England the following example occurs in 746, "These seven synaxes we ought daily to offer to God with great concern for ourselves and for all Christian people" (Excerptions of Ecgbert, c. 28). It was latinised by Collecta, as in the version of the rule of Paschasius (ad calc. Opp. Cassiani), and by St. Jerome, who says "Alleluia was sung, by which sign they were called to collect" (Epitoph. Paulus, Ep. lxxxvi.). By the Greeks the daily course was also called the canon, because it was the prescribed rule or norm of prayer. Thus Antiochus, A.D. 614, "Our canon is called Psalmody" (Hon. CV. Auct. Gr. Lat. Biblioth. PP. tom. i.). Compare John Moschus, A.D. 630, Limonarion, c. 40. There is perhaps a much earlier instance in St. Basil, A.D. 370, "Every one keeps his proper canon" i. e. observes the prayers assigned to him (Regulae Breviores, Resp. ad Qu. 147). St. Benedict gave to the daily offices of his monks the expressive name of Opus Dei, God's Work (Regula, cc. 43, 44, &c.), a title soon adopted by others (Caesarii Regula ad Mon. c. 19, Holst. P. ii.; Aureliani Regula, c. 29, ibid., &c.). It was used conventionally as a complete equivalent to Officium Divinum; e. g. Opus Dei celebratur, expletur (Reg. Bened. c. 44, 52); dicitur, canitur (Regula, SS. Pauli et Stephani, cc. 8, 11, Holst. P. ii.). Opus Divinum is also found as in Benedict (Regula, c. 19), Cassiodorus, A.D. 562 (De Instit. Dic. Litt. c. 30), &c. Obsequium Divinum also occurs at the beginning of the 9th century (Conc. Aquisgran., A.D. 816, cap. 131). This use of obsequium, service, may be traced to the Vulgate. See St. John xvi. 2; Rom. ix. 4; xli. 1; xv. 31; Phil. ii. 17, 30.

IV. The several Hours of Prayer and their various Names.—Three hours of prayer, the third, the sixth, and the ninth were observed by the Jews. "Evening and morning and at noon will I pray," was the resolve of David (Ps. lv. 17). Daniel "kneeled upon his knees three times a day, and prayed and gave thanks before his God" (Dan. vi. 10). Two of these hours were determined by the times of the daily sacrifices (Joshua and Levi in Lightfoot, Hor. Hebr. in Act. Apost. iii. 1), which were offered "in the morning and about the ninth hour" (Josephus, Antiq. l. xiv. c. 4, § 3). The force of St. Peter's argument in Acts ii. 15, "These are not drunken as ye suppose, seeing it is but the third hour of the day," depends on the fact familiar to his hearers that the Jews generally did not break their fast (See Grotius and others in loc.) before the morning sacrifice and prayer. This therefore was about the third hour. We are expressly told that "the hour of prayer" at which Peter and John went up to the temple was the "ninth hour" (Acts iii. 1). At the ninth hour Cornelius, a proselyte of the gate, "prayed in his house" (Acts x. 30). St. Peter "went up upon the house-top to pray about the sixth hour" (ibid. v. 9). "We read," says Ardo Smaragdus, and he may speak for many, "that the third, sixth, and ninth hours were observed by the apostles" (Comm. in s. Bened. Regulam, c. 16).

The three hours of the apostolic church were transmitted to the succeeding ages. Tertullian, A.D. 192, speaks of "these common hours which mark the divisions of the day, the third, sixth, and ninth, which we may observe in Scripture to be more solemn than the rest" (De Orat. c. 25. See De Jejun. adv. Psychicos, c. 10). Clemens Alex., A.D. 192, "let some assign stated hours to prayer, as the third, sixth, and ninth, the man of knowledge prays to God throughout his whole life" (Strom. l. vii. c. 7, § 40). "There are three times," observes St. Jerome, "in which the knees are to be bent to God. Ecclesiastical tradition understands the third, the sixth, and the ninth hour" (Comm. in Dan. c. vi. v. 10).

In the 3rd century, however, we begin to hear of five stated times of prayer. St. Cyprian, A.D. 252, after citing the Scriptural examples given above, goes on to say, "But beside the hours observed of old, both the durations and sacraments of prayer have increased for us now. For we ought to pray in the morning Also when the sun withdraws and the day fails, we must by a necessary obligation pray again" (De Orat. Don. sub fin.). St. Basil in Cappadocia speaks of these hours of prayer as necessary and suitable for monks; the morning, the third hour, the sixth, the ninth, and the evening (Regulae fusiue Tract. Resp. ad Qu. 37, §§ 3-5).

The morning office now introduced is called by Cyprian (u. s.) matutina oratio; matutinae orationes by Aurelian (Regula c. 28); by Cassian matutina sollemnitas (De Coenob. Inst. lib. iii. c. 3). By others it was called laudes matutinae, from the use in it of the three last psalms, which were called emphatically by the Latins "laudes," and by the Greeks αἶνοι. Hence the later common appellation of lauds. From this the office also took the name of matutinae (Greg. Turon. Hist. Franc. l. ii. c. 23; l'it. Patr. c. 4, &c.; Ferreol Regula, c. 13 in Holsten. P. ii.; Guidonis Reg. c. 39 in Hergot, l'et. Discip. Mon. Par. 1726). It was also called matutinum sacrificium, as by Fructuosus (Reg. c. 3; Holsten.

u. s. and matutinum officium; Isidor. Reg. c. 7 Conc. Braacar. A.D. 560, can. i.); whence also simply matutinum (Isid. ibid.). Matutinale officium is also found (Vita St. Joann. Gorz. in Acta SS. Ben., saec. v. p. 392) and matutinus (sp. cursus) (Regula Magistri, c. 34, Holsten.); also matutinarium (Caesari Reg. c. 21), and matutinarum canonici (Aurel. Ord. post Reg.). But the most common name was matutini, from the psalm, which formed the chief part of the office. This was employed by Benedict (Regula, c. 12, 13, &c.) and was naturally adopted by many in the same age (Pseud-Aug. Reg. § 1; Caes. Reg. c. 21; Aurel. Ord. u. s. &c.).

Among the Greeks this office is called by St. Basil (Regulae fus. Tr. a. s.) ῥὸ ἑσθρον, the office of dawn, a name which it retains to this day; by St. Epiphanius, A.D. 368, "morning (ἑσθρον) hymns and morning prayers" (De Fide, c. 23); in the so-called Apostolical Constitutions the "prayers of dawn" (lib. viii. c. 34), and the "thanksgiving at dawn" (c. 38).

The evening office was generally called vespera in the West (Bened. Reg. c. 41; Isidor. Hisp. de Ecol. Off. lib. i. c. 20), and vespertinum officium (Isid. Reg. c. 7). St. Ambrose (De Virginitate, lib. iii. c. 4, § 18) calls it the "hour of incense" in allusion to the Jewish rite (Exod. xxx. 8; Ps. cxli. 2; St. Luke i. 10). It was sometimes called lucernarium, as in a comment on the 119th Psalm ascribed (incorrectly, we think) to St. Jerome. "We (monks) pray at the third hour. We pray at the sixth hour; at the ninth. We make the lucernarium. We rise in the middle of the night. Finally we pray at cock-crow" (ad fin. Breviar. in Psalm.). See also Regul. Tarnat. c. 9, in Holst. P. ii.). Another form was lucernarium, as in Regula Magistri, (c. 36, Holst. u. s.). In Spain, as we shall see, the lucernarium was only considered the first part of vespers. Vespers were also called twelfth (hour), as in the Regula Magistri (c. 34) "Prime ought to be said in the same manner as Twelfth, which is called vespers." The 2nd council of Tours, A.D. 567, says, "The statutes of the fathers have prescribed that . . . twelve psalms be said at the Twelfth with Alleluia, which moreover they learnt from the showing of an angel" (can. 18). A reference to Cassian (De Coenob. Inst. l. ii. c. 5), who tells the story, proves that the Twelfth is here an equivalent to solemnitas vespertina. Compare the Ordines at the end of the Regulae of St. Aurelian in Holsten. P. ii. pp. 110, 112; P. iii. pp. 69, 72. St. Columban does not use the words vespers and completorium in his rule, but (c. 7) orders a certain service to be said "ad initium noctis." It appears more probable that this refers to vespers, the older office which must certainly have been said in his monastery, though Menard and others think that compline in meant. In the Greek church, as partially in the Latin, the lighting of the lamps gave the office its common name ῥὸ λυχνικόν, though it is also called more properly ῥὸ ἑσπερινόν (Goar in Euchologio, p. 30). In the Apostolical Constitutions (lib. viii.) the whole office is called ῥὸ ἑσπερινόν (c. 35). It begins with a Psalm (the 140th) called ἑσπέραιες, prayers are then said for the catechumens, energumens, &c. These are then dismissed, and the faithful say a prayer and thanksgiving by themselves, both of which are qualified by the title ἑσπῆρον (cc. 36, 37). At the council of Constantinople A.D. 536, on one occasion the patriarch announced τὸ λυχνικὸν on Saturday evening in the oratory of St. Mary (Act V. Labb. Conc. tom.

v. col. 212). The council held there in 691 (in Trullo) ordered that there should be no kneeling from Saturday evening until Sunday evening, "on which they again knelt" ἐν τῷ λυχνικῷ (can. 90).

St. Jerome at Bethlehem mentions at least six hours as kept by the religious women whom he advised: "There is no one who knows not the third, the sixth, the ninth hour, the dawn also and the evening . . . In the night we should rise twice or thrice" (Ad Eustoch. Ep. xviii.).
To Demetrias he says, "Beside the order of the Psalms and prayer, which thing is to be always practised by thee at the third hour, the sixth, the ninth, at even, midnight, and morning, settle at how many hours thou shouldst learn the Holy Scripture," &c. (Epist. xxvii.). Of Paula and her community he says, "They sang the psalter in due course at the morning hour, at the third, the sixth, the ninth, at even, at midnight" (Ad Eustoch. Epistol. Paulae, Ep. lxxvi.), and he advised that one preparing for that mode of life be trained "to rise in the night for prayers and psalms, to sing hymns in the morning, to stand in the field like a good soldier of Jesus Christ at the third, sixth, and ninth hour . . . and to render the evening sacrifice when the lamp is lighted" (Ad Laetam, Ep. lvii.). The author of the Apostolical Constitutions says, "Make prayers at sunrise, at the third hour, the sixth, the ninth, at evening, and at the cock-crow" (i. e. evidently at midnight) (lib. viii.
c. 34).

The ordinary night office of the monasteries is called by Cassian solemnitas nocturna (Instit.
lib. ii. c. 4), and nocturni psalmi et orationes (ibid. c. 13); by Pseudo-Augustine (Regula, App. i. ad Opp.) and others nocturnae orationes; whence, simply nocturnae, as in the rule of S. Ferreol, c. 13. Nocturni (sc. psalmi as in Bened. Regula, c. 15; Aurelian Ordo Regulae affix; Regula Magistri, c. 33; &c.) was common.
It was also called Nocturnum Officium (Reg.
Mag. u. s.); Officium Vigiliae (Isidori Regula,
c. 7); and apparently the word vigiliae itself conveyed the notion of the service used in the nightly vigil (Benedicti Regula, c. 9; Isid. Reg.
c. 7; &c.). The Greek name for the nocturnal office is μεσανοκτικὸν (Ordo Philothei in Euchol.
Gear, p. 7; Typicon Subae, c. 5; see Leo Allatius, De Libr. Eccl. Graec. Diss. i. p. 65).

In the 4th century there appears a desire to conform the rule of prayer to the standard which was supposed to be set up in the 119th Psalm, "Seven times a day do I praise thee" (v. 164). St. Ambrose, A.D. 374, asks, "If the prophet says, Seven times, &c., who was ought we to do, who read, Watch and pray, that ye enter not into temptation? Certainly solemn prayers are to be offered with giving of thanks when we rise from sleep, when we go forth, when we prepare to take food, when we have taken it, and at the hour of incense (St. Luke, xxiv. 40), lastly when we go to bed" (De Virg.
lib. iii. c. 4, n. 18; Comm. in Luc. Ev. in private life, it would be felt, how much more signally should monks observe the Psalmist's rule? The argument had weight even with those who understood, as St. Augustine (Serm.

xxi. in Ps. cxviii. § 4) and St. Hilary (Tract.
Ps. eund. lib. xxi. § 4) did, the scriptural use of eum," therefore (argues the former) "the church with reason has praised God for His righteous judgments seven times a day." Cassian, A.D. 424, claims for his monastery, the foundation of Paula at Bethlehem, the honour of having settled the rule. This was by the addition of a matin office, afterwards called prime, between the matin lauds and terce. The lauds were "said in the monasteries after a short interval of time when the nocturn psalms and prayers were over;" i. e. shortly before sunrise, while the matin office, or prime, was said after it. We are not told when it was introduced, but in Cassian's time, though of Eastern origin, it was observed "chiefly in the regions of the West" (De Convob.
Instit. l. iii. c. iv.). Nevertheless there is no mention of prime in the rules of St. Caesarius (bishop of Arles, A.D. 506) for monks and nuns on week days, and only in one MS. of the latter is it prescribed for Sundays (Martene, De Ant.
Monach. Rit. l. i. c. iv. n. 2); nor does he mention it in his homilies, though he entreate the devout to rise early in Lent for vigils, and before all things to assemble for "terce, sext, none" (Hom. cxii. § 2, in App. Opp. Aug.). He assumes of course that they would be present at matins and evensong; and in the duties proper to litany days we find him including attendance at church at "the six hours" (Hom. clxxx. § 3). Some sixty years later Cassiodorus omits prime in his enumeration of the seven hours observed by the monks (Expositio in Ps. cxviii. v. 164). Nor is it recogised by St. Isidore of Seville a century later either in his rule (Holstenii Colecta Regul.
Monast. p. ii.), or in his work De Officiis. In the latter (lib. i. c. 23) he even quotes what Cassian says of prime as if it referred to the older matin lauds, thus showing ignorance of the institution of another matin office. It was however already known in France, being ordered (and that as if already known) in the rule of Aurelianus, a successor of Caesarius at Arles, A.D. 555 (Ordo Regulae affix. Holst. P. ii. p. 111; P. iii. p. 71).
Before the middle of the 7th century it had found its way into Spain; for it is mentioned in the rule of Fructuosus (Holsten. P. ii.; Regula,
c. 2) the founder of the Complutensian monastery and many others, who died in 675. It had been introduced in Italy, and an office for it prescribed by St. Benedict, A.D. 530 (Holst. u. s.
Regula, c. 17). It appears also in two other Western rules of unknown authorship and country; one (Pseudo-Aug. u. s.) of the 6th century, and the other Regula Magistri, c. 35, Holsten.
P. ii.) belonging to the 7th. It was without doubt largely owing to Benedict and his followers that it now became universal in the Latin church.

The use of seven offices for the day and night, and where prime was adopted, of seven for the day alone, was attained in the 6th century by erecting the last brief prayers said before going to bed into a formal and common service under the name of Compline. St. Ambrose, as already quoted, probably referred to private prayer only; but St. Chrysostom, though the Greek monks did not adopt any set service answering to the Western Compline, appears to speak of hymns sung together when he describes the life of monks in his day. He says that they rise at cockcrow for psalmody and prayer, going to rest again a little before light, that after completing the morning prayers and hymns they turn to the reading of the Scriptures, . . . then observe the third, sixth, and ninth hours, and the evening prayers, and dividing the day into four parts, honour God in each part by psalmody and prayer; . . . and after sitting (at table) a short time, closing all with hymns, take their rest (Hom. xiv. in 1 Tim. § 4). St. Basil again, referring to the custom of monks:—"When the day is ended, thanksgiving for the things that have been supplied to us and been prosperously ordered, and confession of omissions voluntary or otherwise; &c., are made (i.e. in the evening office) . . . and again, at the beginning of the night, prayer (αἰτήσις), that our rest may be undisturbed and free from illusions" (Reg. Pas. Tract. Resp. ad Q. 37, § 5). John Climacus, A.D. 564, in his Letter ad Pastorem, says that a certain abbot when vespers were over would order one monk to say ten psalms (psalmodium odavia), another thirty, a third a hundred, before they went to sleep. The present writer has observed no trace in the East within our period to secure any such last act of devotion by appointing a form of prayer for constant use; but in the Latin church the rule of St. Benedict, A.D. 530 (cc. 16, 17), speaks of Compline as if it were already as well known as Terce or Sext. He does not claim to introduce it; nor does he offer any explanation. At the same time, his adoption of the new hour would cause it to be widely received. Cassiodorus, who probably borrowed from St. Benedict (see Garet's Dissert. appended to the Life in Cassiod. Opp.), in his commentary on the 119th Psalm, written about 560, remarks on the words, "Seven times a day," &c. (v. 164), "If we desire to understand this number literally, it signifies the seven times at which the pious devotion of the monks solaces itself; i.e. at matins, terce, sext, vespers, lucernaria (vespers), completoria, nocturns."

The word completorium has been said to refer rather in its origin to the completion of the ordinary acts of daily life (Amalarius De Eccl. Off. lib. iv. c. 8; De Ordine Antiph. c. 7) than to the completion of the daily round of devotion. This is the name of most frequent occurrence, owing evidently to its adoption by St. Benedict (cc. 16, 17); but completa is also found as in the Ordines of Aurelian (Holst. P. ii. p. 112; P. iii. p. 72), and in the work of Isidore (De Eccl. Off. lib. i. c. 21); though in his rule (c. 7) completorium is used. A corrupt reading in the 2d canon of Merida, A.D. 666, which orders that vespers be said on feasts prius quam sonum has led to the conjecture that in Spain compline was sometimes called sonum. No name is given to the office by Fructuosus of Braga, 656, who appears however to refer to compline when in his rule (c. 2) he says, "In the night season therefore the first hour of the night is to be celebrated with six prayers, &c." After describing the office, he speaks of the manner in which the monks shall retire to rest. When the Greeks at length prescribed a constant form answering to the Latin completorium, they called it ἀρόθειον because it followed the last meal of the day.

Perhaps the earliest authority is the Tipticon ascribed to St. Sabas, who died in the 6th century, but which cannot in its present form be earlier than the 11th.

In some monasteries a ninth office was said, called Lucernarium. There was from an early period a pious custom of praying when lamps were lighted in the evening, an action so marked among the old Romans as to give name to that part of the day (prima fix, or prima luminis). "It seemed good to our fathers," says St. Basil, "not to receive in silence the gift of the evening light, but to give thanks as soon as it appeared. But who was the author of those words of thanksgiving at the lighting of lamps we are unable to tell. The people, however, utter the ancient saying, and by no one have they ever been thought guilty of impiety, who say, 'We praise the Father and the Son and the Holy Spirit of God'" (De Spir. Sanct. c. lxxiii.). In the Mozarabic Breviary are the following directions for the performance of this rite:—"A commencement is made by the invocation of Jesus Christ (the Lord's Prayer preceding it, 'Lord, have mercy, Christ have mercy, Lord have mercy; Our Father' being said in a low voice, in a loud voice, 'In the name of Jesus Christ, light with peace'; that is, the light offered. Those who stand round respond 'Thanks be to God.' And the presbyter says, 'The Lord be with you always.' Resp. 'And with thy spirit.' And the order of vespers whether it be a festival or not, follows in this manner. This may be illustrated from other Spanish sources. E.g., the rule of St. Isidore says, "In the evening offices, first the lucernarium, then two psalms, one responsory and lauds, a hymn and prayer are to be said" (cap. 7). The lucernarium is here considered the first part of vespers. The second canon of the council of Merida, 666, mentions that vespers were said "after the offering of the light." In the East the 140th Psalm, called the psalm at the lighting (ἐπιλόγιος) was said before vespers (Compare Constil. Apost. lib. viii. c. 35, with lib. ii. c. 59). St. Jerome at Bethlehem:—"Let her be trained to offer the evening sacrifice when the lamp is lighted" (Ad Lactan. Ep. lvi.). Socrates says that "in Greece and at Jerusalem, and in Thessaly they say the prayers at the lighting of lamps very much in the same manner as the Novatians at Constantinople" (Ecd. Hist. lib. v. c. 22). Naturally, vespers which followed these prayers came to be called in some churches by the name of lucernarium, which appeared to be the first part of it; but sometimes the lucernarium was enlarged into a distinct office, said some little time before vespers. Thus the rule falsely ascribed to St. Augustine (Opp. App. i.) after prescribing the psalm for matins, prime, &c., says, "Let the same thing be observed at vespers and compline; but at lucernarium let there be the (proper) psalm, one responsory, three antiphons, three lessons." So in the rules of Aurelian:—"At lucernarium let there be said in the first place at all seasons, both on festival and ordinary days, a psalm in monotone (directaneous), then two antiphons. In the third place let there be said with Alleluia, one day the hymn Deus, qui certis legibus; another Deus creator omnium, and a little chapter. At Twelfth (vespers) eighteen psalms, an antiphon and hymn, a lesson and little chapter. When ye are supreme authority is the Typton Sabas, who died in the 6th century and cannot in its present form be traced.

Lucernarium a ninth office was said, and was from an early custom of praying when lamps were lighted in the evening, an action so marked by Romanus as to give name to that office (primus lux, or prima luminaria). It is said to our fathers," says St. Basil, "in the silence the gift of the evening five thanks as soon as it appeared. These are the words of words of thanksgiving of lamps we are unable to explain, however, utter the ancient custom by no one have they ever been of impiety, who say, 'We praise the Son and Holy Spirit of God.'" (ct. c. lxxlii.). In the Mozarabic the following directions for the celebration of this rite:—"A commencement is made in the invocation of JESUS CHRIST (the preceding it, 'Lord, have mercy, Lord, have mercy; Our Lord, said in a low voice) in a loud voice of Jesus Christ, light with us, the light offered. Those who respond 'Thanks be to God.' And says, 'The Lord be with you.' And with thy spirit.' And the rite whether it be a festival or not, in this manner. This may be illustrated Spanish sources. E. J. the rite says, "In the evening offices, first and then two psalms, one responsory and prayer are to be said." The Lucernarium is here considered of vespers. The second canon of Merida, 660, mentions that vespers are the offering of the light," in the 140th Psalm, called the psalm in παύχους was said before vespers (St. Basil, lib. viii. c. 35, with St. Jerome at Bethlehem:—"Let us offer the evening sacrifice which we have lighted" (Ad Lactan. Ep. l. viii.), that "in Greece and at Jerusalem, they say the prayers at the lamps very much in the same manner as at Constantinople" (Ecol. lib. i.). Naturally, vespers which followed came to be called in some churches of Lucernarium, which appeared to be of art of it; but sometimes the Lucernarium into a distinct office, said before vespers. Thus the role of St. Augustine (Opp. App. i.) singing the psalm for matins, prime, and the same thing be observed at compline; but at Lucernarium let (proper) psalm, one responsory, and three lessons." So in the rules "At Lucernarium let there be said once at all seasons, both on festival days, a psalm in monotone (directly) antiphons. In the third place said with Alleluia, one day the qui certis legibus; another Deus, and a little chapter. At Twelfth psalms, an antiphon and a little chapter. When ye are about to take your rest, let compline be said in the school in which ye remain" (Regula ad Mon. Holst. P. ii.; Sim. ad Vig. ibid. P. iii.). Here a distinction is clearly made between the Lucernarium and vespers. They are distinct offices. It is probable, however, from the paucity of such notices, that the former was treated as a separate service on the same footing with the ancient hours only in a very few communities.

V. Grounds of Observance.—For Matins, reasons of natural piety were often urged, as by St. Basil, "That the first motions of the soul and mind may be dedicated to God, and we admit nothing else into our mind before we have rejoiced in the thought of God" (Reg. P. v. Tr. Resp. ad Q. 37, § 3); and in the Apostolical Constitutions (lib. viii. c. 34), "To give thanks to the Lord, causing the night to pass away and the day to come on, hath given us light." There was the Scriptural reason too, "That the resurrection of the Lord, which took place (Cyprian, De Or. Dom. u. s.). Similarly; Isid. cap. 130.

There was a practical reason for the institution of Prime, as well as the ground of religious sentiment, to which we have already had occasion to refer. It was found that the long interval between the matins lauds and terce was often spent in comparative idleness and sloth. The new office was therefore introduced to prevent this (Cassian, Conob. Inst. l. iii. c. 4). With this statement compare the provision of a Western rule: "After morning prayers let it not be lawful to return to sleep; but when matins are finished let prime be said forthwith. Then let all employ themselves in reading to the third hour" (Aurel. Reg. ad Monach. c. 28).

The third, sixth, and ninth hours, which were observed earlier than any other, were thought to have been selected in honour of the Holy Trinity. Thus St. Cyprian—"We find that the three children with Daniel, strong in faith and conquerors in captivity, observed the third, sixth, and ninth hours for a sacrament of the Trinity, which was to be manifested in the last time; for the first hour coming to the third exhibits the full number of a Trinity, and again the fourth proceeding to the sixth declares another Trinity, and when the ninth is completed by three hours from the seventh a perfect Trinity (i. e. a Trinity of Trinities) is numbered" (De Eccl. Off. lib. l. c. 19; Concl. Isid. Hspal. De Eccl. c. 126). The significance of these hours taken separately will be shown below.

Terce, as we have seen, was the continuation of a Jewish custom, as were Sext and None. But there were Christian reasons of great weight for retaining it. "The Holy Ghost," says Cyprian, "descended on the disciples at the third hour" (De Or. Dom. u. s.; Sim. Basil. u. s.; Resp. ad Q. 37; Hieron. Comm. in Dom. vi. 10; Isid. Hsp. u. s. &c.).

Another ground alleged was that "at that hour the Lord received sentence from Pilate" (Cons. Apost. l. viii. c. 34). St. Mark x. 25 refers the crucifixion to the third hour, i. e. to the third of the twelve hours between sunrise and sunset; but if in the condemnation took place between that and sunrise, it was also correctly said in ecclesiastical language to have been at the third hour. So John xiv. 14, reckoning apparently from midnight, places the condemnation at "about the sixth hour," which brings it down to the third hour understood of the larger space of time, and reckoned from sunrise.

With reference to Sext, it was observed that St. Peter "at the sixth hour went up to the house-top, and was both by sign and by the voice of God warning him, instructed to admit all to the grace of salvation" (Cypr. u. s. comp. Hieron. u. s.). Another and more important reason was that "The Lord was crucified at the sixth hour" (Cypr. u. s. Sim. Constit. Apost. u. s. Isid. Hspal. u. s. Conc. Aquisgr. u. s.), a statement, which if taken to the letter, can only be reconciled with that of St. Mark, by supposing the "sixth hour" to cover the fourth, fifth, and sixth of the smaller hours. If however it means no more than that our Lord hung on the cross at that hour, it needs no explanation.

None was said to be observed because "Peter and John went up to the temple at the ninth hour of prayer" (St. Basil. u. s.; St. Jerome, u. s.); but more than all because "at the ninth hour Christ washed away our sins with His blood" (Cypr. Constit. A. c. &c. u. s. before).

The pious sentiment which dictated the prayers developed in some religious houses into a distinct office, called Lucernarium, came before us while we traced the origin of that rite.

Evening was especially an office of thanksgiving. St. Basil—"Is the day ended? Thank Him who hath given us the sun to minister to the works of the day" (Tom. in Mart. Julitane, § 2). "In the evening giving thanks that God has given us the night for a season of rest from the labours of the day" (Const. Apost. u. s.).

Another thought is connected with it by St. Cyprian:—"Because Christ is the true sun and the true day, when, at the departure of the sun and day of the world, we pray and beseech that the light may come on us again, we are praying for the coming of Christ, who will give the grace of everlasting light" (De Orat. Dom. u. s.). A third ground of this observance is suggested by Cassian, viz., that the eucharist was "delivered to the apostles by the Lord the Saviour in the evening" (Inst. l. iii. c. 3); so Isidore, De Eccl. Off. l. i. c. 20; Conc. Aquisgr. c. 127; and with this was associated the completion of the passion on the following day towards the evening, and about the time of the evening sacrifice (Isid. &c. u. s.).

For Compline there was the strong natural reason, often alleged for private prayer before going to sleep at night, as e. g. in a tract doubtfully ascribed to St. Chrysostom:—"With what hope wilt thou come to the season of night; with what dreams dost thou expect to converse, if thou hast not walled thyself round with prayers, but guest to sleep unprotected?" (De Precat. Or. l. sub fin.). The zeal of David (Ps. cxxxii. 3-5) was held up as a model:—"This thing ought powerfully to admonish us that, if we wish to be 'a place for the Lord' and desire to be accounted His tabernacle and temple, we should follow the examples of the saints, lest that which is read should be said of us, 'They have slept their sleep, and none of the men of might have found their hands'" (Isid. u. s. l. i. c. 21; so Conc. Aquisgr. c. 128; Raban. u. s. l. ii. c. 7). "Every one," says Amalarius (De Eccl. Off. l. iv. c. 8), "who has even a little sense, knows how many dangers may assail a man from without when sleeping more than when waking. This office is in some sort analogous to that commendation, by which a man commends himself to God, when he is passing away from this world. Sleep is the image of death," &c.

Nocturns originated in the pious custom of prayer when one woke in the night. Tertullian says of the meals of Christians, "They are so filled as they who remember that even in the night God is to be worshipped by them" (Apol. c. 39). St. Cyprian:—"There can be no loss from the darkness of night to those who pray; for there is day even in the night to the sons of light" (De Orat. Dom. sub fin.). Clemens of Alexandria (Pædag. l. ii. c. 9, § 79):—"Often in the night should we rise from bed and bless God; for happy are they who watch unto Him, thus making themselves like the angels whom we call watchers" (Dan. iv. 13, &c.). "Without this prayer" (i. e. prayer expressed in words), says Origen, "we shall not pass the season of the night in a fit manner" (De Orat. c. 12). He refers to David (Ps. cxix. 62), and St. Paul and Silas (Acts xvi. 25). St. Cyril of Jerusalem asks, "When is our mind more intent on psalmody and prayer? Is it not in the night? When do we most frequently come to the remembrance of our sins? Is it not in the night?" (Catech. ix. § 4). St. Ambrose cites the example of Christ:—"The Lord Himself passed the night in prayer, that by His own example He might invite thee to pray" (Expos. in Ps. cxviii. v. 62; Serm. viii. § 45). Elsewhere he says:—"In thy chamber itself I would have psalms by frequent alternation interwoven with the Lord's Prayer, either when thou hast waked up or before sleep befalls the body, that sleep may find thee at the very entrance on rest free from care of worldly things and meditating on divine" (De Virginitate, lib. iii. c. iv. § 19). "David every night watered his couch with tears; he rose also in the middle of the night that he might confess to God, and dost thou think that the whole night is to be assigned to sleep? Then is the Lord to be more entreated by thee; then is protection to be (more) sought, fault to be (more) guarded against when there appears to be secrecy, and then above all, when darkness is round about me and walls cover me, must I reflect that God beholds all hidden things" (in Ps. cxviii. Expos. Serm. vii. § 31). The example of our Lord was urged:—"The day is not enough for prayer. We must rise in the night and at midnight. The Lord Himself passed the night in prayer; that He might invite thee to pray by His own example" (Ibid. Serm. viii. § 45). St. Hilary, after dwelling on the words of David, adds, "The mind is not to be released by the dangerous idleness of wakefulness in the night, but to be employed in prayers, in pleadings, in confessions of sins; that when occasion is most given to the vices of the body, then above all those vices may be subdued by the remembrance of the divine law" (Tract in Js. cxviii. lit. vii. § 6). To these motives St. Basil adds, "Let the night supply other grounds of prayer. When thou lookest into the sky and gazest on the beauty of the stars," &c. (Hom. in Mart. Julitt. § 3).

VI. The Times of the Offices.—For Nocturns some rose at cockcrow, as prescribed in the Apocryphal Constitutions (lib. viii. 34). So St. Chrysostom:—"As soon as the cock crows the prefect is standing by (the sleeping monk), and strikes him as he lies lightly with his foot, and so wakes all straightway" (Hom. xiv. in 1 Tim. § 4). St. Columban's rule says the "middle" of the night (c. 7); and in Gregory of Tours one speaks of himself as rising "about midnight ad mundendum cursum" (Hist. Franc. lib. viii. c. 15). St. Benedict orders his monks to rise for vigils "at the eighth hour of the night in winter; i. e. from the Kalends of November to Easter," but during the rest of the year the time of vigils was to be regulated by that of matins, which it was to precede by a "very short interval" (Reg. cap. 8). Another rule, of the 7th century, orders nocturns to be said before cockcrow in winter, and after it in summer, when it was to be "soon" followed by matins (Regula Magistri, c. 33). In Spain the severe rule of St. Fructuosus prescribed two or three offices for the night according to the season, one "before midnight," and a second "at midnight," throughout the year, and in winter a third "after midnight" (Reg. cap. 3); thus carrying out to the letter the exhortation of St. Jerome to Eustochium, "You should rise twice or thrice in the night" (Epiat. xviii.).

From the union of nocturns with matins, of which we have seen the beginning, the double office was at a later period called indifferently, nocturns or matins, or lauds.

Matins, properly so-called, were said in the morning watch, or fourth watch of the night; that is to say, at any part of that space of three natural hours which preceded sunrise. They were to be over by dawn: Post matutinum tempus sequitur diluaculum (Amal. de Ord. Antiph. c. 5). St. Benedict ordered matins to be said "when the light began" (Reg. c. 8). If it surprised them at nocturns, the latter were to be shortened (c. 11). So early as the beginning of the 5th century, matins (solemnitas matutina) were "wont to be celebrated in the monasteries of Gaul a short interval of time after the night psalms and prayers were finished" (Cassian, Instit. lib. iii. c. 4).

Prime was said in the first natural hour after sunrise. This appears from Cassian's account of its origin. The monks were to be allowed to rest after matins, "usque ad solis ortum," and were then to rise for the new office (Instit. u. s.). And so, four centuries later, Amalarius:—"We begin the first of the day from the rising of the sun" (De Ord. Ant. c. 6); and Rabanus fires it "at the beginning of the day when the sun first appears from the east" (De Instit. Cler. lib. ii. c. 3).

Terce might originally be said at any part of the three hours which began at sunrise (see before § ii.); but after the institution of prime it could only be said during the two last. It was not in practice always confined to the last; for in the rule of an unknown author, formerly ascribed to St. Jerome, it is expressly provided that on fast-days, terce, sext, and none, be each said an hour earlier than usual (cap. 34; inter Opp. S. Hieron. tom. v. ed. Ben.). See also the rule of St. Benedict, as cited in § ii.

As the lamps were lighted in preparation for evening prayer, the Lucernarium, as a merely of the Offices.—For Nocturns now, as prescribed in the Apostolus (lib. viii. 34). So St. Chrysostom in his cock crows the prefect of a sleeping monk, and strikes gently with his foot, and so wakes (Hom. xiv. in 1 Tim. § 4). St. Isidore says the "middle" of the night of Tours one speaks of "about midnight and midnight." St. Firmus, lib. viii. c. 15). St. Isidore's monks to rise for vigils "at the night in winter; i. e. from November to Easter," but during the time of vigils was to be of matins, which it was to be of short interval" (Reg. cap. 8). In the 7th century, orders nocturns cockcrow in winter, and after it it was to be "soon" followed by Magistri, c. 33). In Spain St. Fructuosus prescribed two or the night according to the "midnight," and a second "at the night," and in winter "at midnight" (Reg. cap. 3); thus the letter the exhortation of St. Isidore, "You should rise twice at night" (Epist. xviii.).

of nocturns with matins, of the beginning, the double period called indifferently, or lauds, were said in the fourth watch of the night; any part of that space of three which preceded sunrise. They were by dawn: Post matutinum diducium (Amal. de Ord. As. Benedicti ordered matins to be "at night began" (Reg. c. 8). If it be a nocturna, the latter were to be. So early as the beginning of matins (solemnitas matutina) were celebrated in the monasteries interval of time after the night vigils were finished" (Cassian, 4).

In the first nocturnal hour after appears from Cassian's account of monks were to be allowed to "usque ad solis ortum," and for the new office (Instit. u. s.). Later, Amalarius:—"We of the day from the rising of the sun" (Ant. c. 6); and Rabanus fixes it as the first of the day when the sun first "east" (De Instit. Cler. lib. ii.

originally be said at any part of which began at sunrise (see after the institution of prime and said during the two last. It was always confined to the last; of an unknown author, formerly Jerome, it is expressly provided vigils, terce, sext, and none, be each earlier than usual (cap. 34; inter tom. v. ed. Ben.). See also the dict., as cited in § ii.

were lighted in preparation for the Lucernarium, as a merely preliminary act of devotion would be said immediately before that; and it was in fact as we have seen, often considered an actual part of the office. Where it became a distinct service, there would, we presume, be an interval of some length before vespers began; but we have no information on the subject.

"It becomes evening when the sun sets" (St. Aug. in Ps. xxix. v. 6, Enarr. ii.). Nevertheless vespers were more generally said in the hour before sunset. This is why the office was called Duodecima (see before § iv.). "We celebrate the evening synaxis," observes Amalarius, "about the 12th hour, which hour is about the end of the day" (De Ord. Antiph. c. 6); "most frequently before sunset" (ibid. c. 70; comp. c. 16; Isid. Hisp. de Eccl. Off. lib. i. c. 20; Raban. Maur. De Instit. Cleri. lib. ii. c. 7). Benedict, in fact, made a rule, which must have influenced the custom greatly, that vespers should be said at all seasons while it was yet daylight; and that in Lent, when reflection followed vespers, they should be said at such an early hour that the meal might be over before the light failed (Reg. cap. 41). Another authority says, "Vespers ought to be said while the rays of the sun are still declining." "In summer, on account of the short nights, let lucernarium (here vespers) be begun while the sun is still high" (Regula Magistri, c. 34).

The history of compline has shown the proper time of saying, viz. before retiring to rest; and this was the time observed by the monks within our period. Thus a MS. of the Regula of pseudo-Augustine, now 1200 years old:—"After this usual psalms be said before sleep" (Note of Bened. editors, App. i. Opp. Aug.). St. Isidore:—"Compline being ended, the brethren, as the custom is, having wished each other good night before sleeping, must keep still with all heed and silence until they rise for vigils" (Reg. c. 7). St. Fructuosus, after prescribing the office of "the first hour of the night," orders his monks to bid each other good-night and retire to their dormitories (Reg. i. c. 2). Another rule forbids the monks to speak, eat, drink, or do any work after compline (Regula Magistri, c. 30). Amalarius (De Eccl. Off. lib. iv. c. 8) tells us that compline was said in the conticinium; i. e. in the third part of the night, reckoning from sunset, when it was divided, as by the Romans, into seven.

When vespers were said earlier compline was put earlier too, and one writer at the close of our period gives it the name of Duodecima (Smaragdus, Comment. in S. Ben. Reg. c. 16). It had already taken possession of the hour so long occupied by vespers. At length it became the common opinion that it ought to be said at the twelfth hour (Franconius, u. s. cap. 18).

HOUSE. In Aringhi, l. p. 522, ii. 658, are woodcuts of houses from ancient tombs [TOMB]. This, perhaps, refers to the grave as the house of the dead, an idea or expression inherited from heathenism (Horace Carm. i. iv. 19, and Boldetti, p. 463; even Domus Aeterna, Perret v. pl. 36, x. 110), or to the deserted house of the soul, the buried body (2 Cor. v. i.), "For we know that If our earthly house of this tabernacle were dissolved, we have a building of God," &c. In one of the plates from Aringhi above referred to (ii. 658) there is a house of the grave, with a small mummy of Lazarus; laid up alone (depositus or repositus) to abide the resurrection. The houses of Jerusalem and Bethleheim, representing the Jewish and Gentile churches, occur frequently in ancient paintings and mosaics. [BETHLEHEM.] How far the word Beth, as part of Bethleheim ("house of bread"), may be connected with the Christian import of this symbol, is hard to say. [R. St. J. T.]

HUCKSTERS. The mind of the church has of course always been against all unprincipled gain in traffic, even when permitted by law and custom. Adulterators or fraudulent dealers (καπηλοὶ) are enumerated (Apost. Const. iv. 6, § 2) among those whose oblations are not to be received. And again (ib. viii. 32, § 5) the καπηλος is classed with the stage-players and dancers, among those who must abandon their profession before they can be admitted to the church. Lactantius (Div. Inst. v. c. 16) emphatically rejects the doctrine of Caracade, that the seller is not bound to declare the faults of the article which he has for sale, and insists that the Christian conscience requires perfect frankness and openness in such a matter. In the same spirit St. Augustine (Tract. 41 in Jean.) puts fraud on the same level as fornication and theft, and gives high praise (De Trin. xiii. 3) to one who, in buying a book, declined to overreach the seller, who was ignorant of its value. So, too, Hilary (on Ps. exix. [cxvii. Vulg.] 139) enumerates cheating (falseities) among the things which make our bodies a den of thieves. In short, all kinds of unprincipled dealers (βαδιστοί) and sorcerers, all who give short weight or measure (συνοκοροὶ καὶ δολομέτραι) are condemned (Apost. Const. iv. 6, § 1).

Tertullian (De Idolol. c. 11; cf. Epiphanius, Erosop. Fid. c. 24) and many others regard with disfavour all gain derived from mere buying and selling of goods, considering the labour of the hands the proper means of earning a living. But Leo the Great (Epist. 92, ad Lustic. c. 9) reasonably distinguishes between honest and unprincipled gain (questus honestus ut turpis); the culpability or innocence of gain (he holds) depends upon its character; there is no harm in profit not derived from fraudulent practice. HUMERALE. [AMICE.]

HUNTING. Field-sports have been under the censure of the church from an early period, and in the many canons relating to them there is very little trace of any disposition to relax the severity of absolute prohibition, or to allow exceptional cases in which they might be necessary or desirable.

By the 55th canon of the council of Agde (C. Ajathense), A.D. 544, bishops and presbyters are forbidden to keep hawks and hounds for the chase under penalty of three months' excommunication in the case of bishops, and of two months' in the case of priests, and of one in the case of deacons. The same abstinence is enjoined on bishops, presbyters and deacons, under the same penalty by the 4th canon of the council of Epaon. By the 3rd canon of the council of Soissons, not only bishops, presbyters and deacons, but all ecclesiastical persons (clerici) are forbidden to hunt with hounds or to take out hawks. In the 8th canon of the third council of Tours, priests are cautioned against the hunting of birds and wild animals, and the second council of Châlons (c. 9) addresses a similar warning against devoting their time to "hounds, hawks, and falcons," to lay as well as to clergy. It seems that certain bishops kept dogs under the pretence that they were necessary for the defence of their houses; but they are reminded by the 13th canon of the second council of Maçon, A.D. 585, that not "barks but hymns, not bites but good works" are the proper protection of a bishop's house, which ought to welcome and not repel men, and certainly not subject any who came "the relief of their sorrows to the risk of being torn by dogs.

Among prohibitions against the same pursuits, issued by individuals, is to be found a letter of Boniface, bishop of Mayence (Epist. 105), probably written on the authority of pope Zachary, forbidding "huntings and excursions with dogs through the woods, and the keeping of hawks and falcons;" and the same prohibition is repeated, totidem verbis, in the 2nd canon of the council of Liptine, A.D. 743, over which Boniface presided. In the Liber Poenitentialis of pope Gregory III. one year's penance is decreed against one in minor orders (clericus), two years' against a deacon, and three years' against a priest, for hunting.

Ferreolus, bishop of Uzès, in his Rule (about A.D. 558), forbids his monks to hunt and hawk on the ground that such pursuits dissipate the mind; he allows them however to set dogs at the wild animals which waste their crops, but only that they may "drive them away, not that they may catch them." Jonas, bishop of Orleans, A.D. 821-844, (de Institut. laic. ii. 23, quoted by Thomassin), vents his indignation against the nobles for spending so much money on hawks and hounds instead of on the poor; and is even more fierce against them for the hardships and cruelties which for the sake of their sport they inflicted on the poor. The frequent recurrence of these prohibitions and the number of years over which they extend, show how rooted was the taste for field-sports among the Teutonic clergy; and the language of some of the canons indicates that these sports sometimes became as oppressive as the Forest Laws of the Middle Ages.

Looking on, or being present at the hunting, or baiting, or fighting of wild animals in the amphitheatre is just as strictly forbidden. The council in Trullo (Quinisextum), can. 51, orders both laity and clergy to avoid "the spectacles of huntings," on pain of excommunication, and hunting is so frequently mentioned in connection with games, dances, and dramatic performances, that it must be concluded that the sports of the amphitheatre are intended. The Codex Eccl. Africane (c. 61) entreats the emperors to put an end to spectacles on great festivals, such as the octave of Easter, and begs that no Christian may be compelled to attend them. By the council of Mayence (addit. 3, c. 27) it is ordered that if any ecclesiastical person attend any spectacle he is liable to three years' suspension. By the 3rd canon of Tours and the second council of Châlons, quoted above, the condemnation of hunting is coupled with that of theatrical spectacles, so that to look at a spectacle of hunting in the amphitheatre would be by the same act to commit two offences against the canon. The 8th canon of the council of Friuli (Friulanense) issued a canon against the worldly pomps and vanities in vogue, in which "huntings" are mentioned with other amusements manifestly scenic.

Theodosius the younger abolished contests between men and brutes in the circus on the ground that "cruel sights made him shudder" (Socrates, H.E. vii. 22).

Magorum Praestigiis, which is again a compilation from Augustine and Isidore of Seville. The passage of Augustine on which the account of Hydromantia is mainly founded is De Civ. Dei, vii. 45, and is to this effect; that Numa, having no real divine inspiration, was compelled to practise hydromancy, so as to see in water images, or rather false semblances (Iulificationes), of the gods, and learn from them what he was to ordain with regard to the sacra of his people; and from this use of water for divining purposes (says Varro) Numa gained the reputation of having consulted the nymph Egeria.
 It is evident (as indeed Augustine says) that this hydromancy was a form of necromancy.
 What was its exact nature is not apparent, but it was probably similar to the divining by means of a mirror, or of a dark fluid poured into the palm of the hand, which is frequently mentioned in accounts of magic. [C.]

HYMN (the Cherubic). A hymn so called from the reference to the cherubim which it contains, which occurs in the chief eastern liturgies shortly after the dismissal of the catechumens, and immediately preceding the "great entrance" (i. e. that of the elements). It is found in the same position in the liturgies of St.
 James, St. Basil, St. Chrysostom, and St. Mark; and also in the Armenian, in which however it is only sung on special occasions, other hymns being appointed in its place on other days. It is not found in the "heretical liturgies;" which, inasmuch as these underwent less alteration than the orthodox, is an argument against the antiquity of the hymn. Cedreus (Dupin Bibl. des Aut. Eccles. 11me Siècle) a Greek monk who flourished towards the middle of the 11th century, and who wrote "annals" from the creation of the world down to the reign of Isaac Comnenus, says that Justinian first ordered it to be sung in the churches; and it appears to have been composed about that time. Its object is described as being to excite the minds of the faithful to a devout attention to the mysteries about to be celebrated. While it is being sung, the priest says secretly a prayer called "the prayer of the cherubic hymn." The words of the hymn are: οἱ τὰ χερουβιμ μυστικῶς εἰκονίζοντες, καὶ τῷ ζωοποιῷ Τριῳδὶ τὸν τρισά-θωον ἕμουν ἔδοντες, πάσαν τὴν βιωτικὴν ἀπο-θέμεθα μέριμναν, ὡς τὸν βασιλεία τῶν ἑλων τροπὴν λαίνοι ταῖς ἀγγελικαῖς ἀόρατως δουρε-πονοῦν τῶν ἑσων. Ἀλληλουία. [H. J. H.]

HYMNARIUM. The book containing the hymns sung in the services of the church. Gennadius (De Script. Eccl. c. 49) says that Paulinus of Nola composed "Sacramentarium et Hymna-rium;" see Gavanti, Theos. Sacr. Rituum, ii. 115.
 Pelliccia (Fal. Lit. i. 159) gives Cantionarii, Libri Charales, as common designations of such books, but supplies no instances of their use. [C.] perhaps a sufficient reason for arbitrary correction (Maeri Hierol. s. v.). Obbar, however, reads,

[C.]

HYMNOLOGIA (ὕμνολογία) seems to be equivalent to the service chanted at the Hours.
 Thus Gregory of Tours (Hist. Rem. c. 25) says that St. Remi with the brothers, "horarum laudes persolvebat hymnologiarum," meaning (seemingly) that he observed the course set down in the Hymnologies, the term being used so as to include psalms, canticles, antiphons, etc.
 Macro (Hierol. s. v.) supposes that Dionysius, the Pseudo-Areopagite (Hierol. Eccl. lii. 2), when he speaks of ἡ καθολικὴ ὕμνολογία having been uttered as a confession (προμολο- γηθεῖσας) before the elements were placed on the altar, meant the Creed. This is of course possible, and Pachymerus (Paraphr. in loca) seems to have taken it so; for they had, he says, even then, μῦθρον τι καὶ συμμῦθρον πίστεως [CREED]. [C.]

HYMNS. In the following article no attempt will be made to deal with the literary or theological history of Christian hymnody.
 All that can be here undertaken is to give a sketch of what is known respecting the liturgical use of hymns within the limits to which this work is restricted. Much of the difficulty connected with the subject arises from our uncertainty as to how much was covered by the word ἕμνος in early Christian writers. Almost everything sung, or rhythmically recited, which was not one of the Davidic Psalms, was called a hymn, or said to be "hymned." Even as late as the middle of the ninth century, Walafrid Strabo (De Rebus Eccl. c. 25) warns us that by "hymns" he does not mean merely such metrical hymns as those of Hilary, Ambrose, Prudentius, or Bede, but such other acts of praise as are offered in fitting words and with musical sounds. He adds that still in some churches there were no metrical hymns, but that in all "generales hymni, id est laudes," were in use. The well-known passage of St.
 Augustine (Enarr. in Ps. lxxii.), which was for centuries the formal definition of a hymn in every ritual writer, gives us the same rule; but it was always something meant to be sung; but it was always something meant to be sung; and sung as an act of divine worship. So Gregory Nazianzen defines a hymn as ἄσμος ἕμμελῆς.
 Further, Christian writers gradually learned to use the term in contradistinction to the Psalm of the Old Dispensation; though both words were for a time interchangeable.

It is obvious that from the very first, Gentile disciples must have sought and found some further expression for the praise of God than the translation of Hebrew Psalms, or of the canticles from the Hebrew prophets, could afford. But at what period Christian songs of praise first found their place in common worship, it is impossible to say. None can tell in what words Paul and Silas "ἕμνον τῶν Θεῶν" in prison (Acts xvi. 25); nor can we say with certainty that the rhythmic passages in the Epistles (e. g. Eph. v. 14; 1 Tim. iii. 16, vi. 15, 16; 2 Tim. ii. 11-13) are quotations from hymns, though this has been frequently maintained. The parallel passages, again, Eph. v. 19, 20, and Col. iii. 16, 17, though evidently pointing to some form of Christian song, yet appear to connect these with social and festive gatherings rather than with worship. Probably they have the same relation to the forms used in public worship which the Spiritual Songs of Luther, the "Ghostly Psalms" of Coverdale, or the early Wesleyan hymns, did to the existing forms of service in their day; and it may be that, like some of the first and last of these, they were subsequently adopted into divine service. This we know to have been the case at a later period with the ὦς λαρόν referred to by St. Basil (De Sp. Sancto, c. 29) as being (in his time) of ancient use; it is still, as is well known, a part of the daily office of the Greek church. If this hymn were really the work of Athenogenes († 169), it would doubtless be the earliest hymn now in use; but a reference to the passage in St. Basil will show that he did not believe Athenogenes to be the author. This hymn, with the early form of the GLORIA IN EXCELSIS, the latter being given as the morning hymn of the church in the Apostolical Constitutions (vii. 48 Cotelier), probably represent in their rhythmic but unmetrical structure many early Christian hymns now lost. Of the existence of such hymns, from the time of Pliny's well-known letter to Trajan (Epist. 97), we have abundant evidence. The "hymning to God the giver of all good things," by the Roman Christians after the martyrdom of Ignatius (Mart. S. Ipn. vii.), may have been a burst of extemporaneous thanksgiving; but early in the following century a Roman writer cited by Eusebius (H. E. v. 28) tells us how ψαλμοὶ δὲ θεοῦ καὶ ὕμνοι ἀδελφῶν ἀπ' ἀρχῆς ὑπὸ χριστῶν γραφεῖσθαι, τὸν λόγον τοῦ θεοῦ τὸν χριστῶν ὑμνοῦσι θεολογοῦντες; and again the Clementine Epitome De gestis Petri, § 152, refers to ἱερῶν ὕμνων εὐχὴν as a part of worship. Of Alexandria, again, Origen testifies (c. Celsum, viii. c. 67) ἱμνοὺς γὰρ εἰς μόνον τὸν ἐπὶ πᾶσι λέγομεν θεὸν καὶ τὸν μονογενῆ αὐτοῦ θεὸν λόγον [i. e. τ. κ. α. λόγον καὶ θεὸν]. (Cf. also Fragm. in Ps. 148.)

Again, an early tradition reported by Sozomen (H. E. vi. 8) attributes to Ignatius the introduction of antiphonal singing at Antioch, as the result of a vision of the angelic worship which was revealed to him [ΑΝΤΙΦΩΝ]. The monks of the Syrian deserts, in the time of Sozomen (H. E. vi. 33, 2) continued in prayers and hymns according to the rule of the church (θέσιμον τῆς ἐκκλησίας). The point to which all these allusions tend is the very early use of hymns both in the East and West. Of the East, indeed, we can speak more positively. The Epistle of the second council of Antioch (A.D. 269) to the bishops of Rome and Alexandria, against Paul of Samosata, makes it one of the charges against him, that he had "put a stop to the psalms that were sung to our Lord Jesus Christ, as being innovations, the work of men of later times;" while, to the horror of every one, he had appointed women to say psalms on Easter Day in his own honour (εἰς ἑαυτῶν) [Euseb. H. E. vii. 30]. This last expression may simply refer to his position on a throne of unusual height and dignity in the church; and it is not unlikely that Paul sought to confine the singing strictly to Jewish psalmody. Another reference deducible from this passage is 'that metrical hymns were as yet unknown in Antioch. It is a disputed point whether metre was used in divine service before the fourth century; but probabilities are against its use. If used at all, it must have been in Greek hymns, for reasons which will presently appear. No metrical hymns are now used in the Orthodox Eastern church, but all its ecclesiastical verse since the eighth century has been simply rhythmic and accentual, like the earliest Latin services; but it is impossible to say whether for a time metrical hymns found their way into Greek offices. The so-called "earliest Christian hymn," the epilogue of Clement of Alexandria to his Παρθενώδης, is not, except in a loose modern sense, a hymn at all. The same may be said of the sacred verses of Gregory Nazianzen; those of Sophronius approach nearer to the hymnic form, but it is unlikely that his Antiochene verse could have found its way into divine service.

The fourth century, however, saw a great impulse given to the liturgical use of hymns successively in Syria, Constantinople, and the West, under the influence of three eminent men, and with the same object, the existing popular feeling on the side of orthodoxy in times of fierce controversy. The earliest of these movements was that of Ephraim at Edessa. Greek metres and music were introduced into Syrian either by Bardaisan [see BARDEISANUS in DICTIONARY OF CHR. BIOG.], or (more probably) by his son Harmonius, whose hymns Ephraim found to be so popular, that he felt anxious to counteract their influence by the substitution of orthodox hymns which might be sung to the same tunes. According to the Syrian life of St. Ephraim (quoted by Augusti), he trained choirs of virgins to sing to these tunes hymns which he proceeded to write on the Nativity, Baptism, Fasting, Passion and Resurrection and Ascension of our Lord, and on other divine mysteries; to which he added others on the martyrs, on penitence, and on the departed. The young women of this association attended divine service on the festivals of our Lord, and of martyrs, and on Sundays; Ephraim himself standing in the midst, and leading them (cf. Sozomen, H. E. iv. 16; Theodoret, iv. 29). From that time forward metrical hymnody became a fixed element in the worship of the Syriac-speaking churches, and has filled a very large place not only in their daily offices, but in the Eucharistic, and indeed in all others. It is not so easy to understand precisely what was effected in Constantinople under Chrysostom; because we do not know what singing was already in use in the churches there. Theodoret (H. E. ii. 24) attributes the introduction of antiphonal singing into Constantinople to two priests under Constantine, named Flavian and Didorus. In most ritual matters Constantinople followed the lead of Antioch; and this custom may have been an imitation of what was already in use there. We cannot doubt, however, that the device of Chrysostom for silencing or outbidding the Arians, as related by Sozomen (H. E. viii. 8, 1-5), led to a much freer and more abundant use of hymns in divine service. The Arians had been expelled by Theodosius from the churches of the city; but their numbers were still very great,

Another reference de- passage is that metrical unknown in Antioch. It is whether metre was used in the fourth century; but its use. If used at all, in Greek hymns, for reasons appear. No metrical in the Orthodox Eastern ecclesiastical verse since the simply rhythmic and earliest Latin sequences; but whether for a time metrical way into Greek offices. The Christian hymn," the epilogue andria to his Παιδαγωγός, is of modern sense, a hymn to be said of the sacred verses; those of Sophronius to the hymnic form, but it is the verse could have divine service.

ture, however, saw a great the liturgical use of hymns in the East, and the influence of three eminent men, object, the existing popular of orthodoxy in times of The earliest of these were Ephraim at Edessa. Greek were introduced into Syria [see BARDESANES in Dict. or (more probably) by his whose hymns Ephraim found, that he felt anxious to influence by the substitu- hymns which might be sung. According to the Syriac (quoted by Augusti), he proceeded to write on the n. From rd metrical hymnody became a in the worship of the Scribes, and has filled a very large in their daily offices, but in the indeed in all others. It is understand precisely what was antinople under Chrysostom; not know what singing was in the churches there. Theodoret tributes the introduction of anti- into Constantinople to two priests and Diodorus matters Constantinople followed Koch; and this custom may have ion of what was already in use of doubt, however, that the device for silencing or outbidding the ed by Sozomen (H. E. viii. 8, 1-5), freer and more abundant use of ne service. The Arians had been ecodius from the churches of the r numbers were still very great, and they had places of assembly outside the walls. On Saturdays and Sundays they assembled in crowds in the open spaces of the city, singing Ariion hymns and antiphons, and went in procession, with these hymns, to their churches. Chrysostom determined to organize rival processions of the orthodox. The empress Eudocia entered into the scheme, and a eunuch of the imperial household was instructed to furnish the necessary materials for the ceremonial, at her expense. It is curious to find that these included not merely crosses and torches, but also hymns; so unimportant did the words sung appear to Chrysostom in reference to the end in view. But whether the hymns were good or bad, the midnight processions popularised their use; and from the night offices of the church they seem to have passed into other hours. The midnight singing of the "Golden Canon" of St. John Damascene, so graphically described by Neale (Hymns of Eastern Ch. p. 35), which forms so marked and picturesque a feature of the Greek Easter, is doubtless the true historical representation of Chrysostom's nocturnal processions (cf. Sozomen, vi. 8; Cassiodorus, Hist. Trip. x. 8; Nicephorus, viii. 8, 9). It was not, however, according to Neale (u. s. p. 13), till the period of the Iconoclastic controversy (A. D. 726-820) that Greek hymnology reached its full development. Its great names are Andrew of Crete (690-732), John Damascene († 780), Cosmas the melodist († 780), Theophanes (759-818), Theodore of the Studium († 826), and Methodius († 836). How marvellous its development was may be gathered from the fact alleged by Neale that out of the five thousand quarto pages, which he computes to be the contents of the whole body of Greek office-books, at least four thousand are poetry. For a full and elaborate account of the structure and contents of a Greek canon, or group of odes, which forms the staple of the morning office, the reader is referred to the articles CANON (p. 277) and ODES. The other subsidiary forms of hymn are explained in the same volume.

By a singular coincidence the establishment of hymnody as a constant element of divine service in the West, had been brought about, a few years before, by similar disputes between Arians and Catholics. The facts are related by Augustine, who, with his mother Monica, was at Milan at the time (Conf. IX. vii.), as well as more briefly by Paulinus, St. Ambrose's deacon (Vita S. Amb. p. 80; ed. Bened. Paris, 1632). St. Ambrose, in consequence of his refusal to give up to the empress Justina one of the basilicas of Milan for Arian worship at Easter, A. D. 385, had incurred her resentment. In the following year sentence of exile was passed upon him. He refused to obey; and the population, who were devoted to him, guarded the gates of his house, and kept watch night and day in his church, to defend him from capture by the imperial troops. This company of perpetual watchers Ambrose organized into a band of perpetual worshippers. A course of offices, psalmody, prayer, and hymns, was established, and once established, became a permanent institution [HOURS OF PRAYER]. Augustine expressly says that this was an imitation of the Eastern custom; by which he probably means the course of daily and nightly psalmody and prayer—the practice of Oriental ascetics, both Jewish (cf. Philo de Vita contemplativa, c. x. [ii. 484, Mangey] quoted by Euseb. H. E. ii. 17) and Christian.

But it is especially to these services organized by St. Ambrose, as all subsequent writers agree, that we of the Western churches owe the incorporation into our offices of metrical hymnody (cf. Isidore de Seville, de Eccl. Off. i. 6) Walafild Strabo, de Rebus Eccl. xxv. &c. and Paulinus, l. c.). Unlike Chrysostom, Ambrose was able to supply his congregations with words, and himself to set them to music (see AMBROSIAN MUSIC, and Koch, Kirchenlied, vol. I. pp. 91, seq.). Of the metrical hymns which are undoubtedly his, Biraghi (Inni Sacri di Sant' Ambrogio) enumerates sixteen, Koch twenty-one. But Milan because a school of Ambrosian hymnody, which has left its mark upon the whole of the West. Ninety-two hymns of this school are given by Daniel (Thes. Hymn. vol. I.). Yet, though Ambrose is the true founder of metrical hymnody in the West, it is possible that hymns were already in use elsewhere. Hilary of Poitiers, at sometimes spoken of as the first to introduce them; he certainly was a hymn writer, and his hymn "Lucis largitor optime (al. splendoris)" sent from his exile in Phrygia, as early as A. D. 358, to his daughter Alra, found its way into church use. pseudo-Alcuin (de Div. Off. § 10) attributes to him the completion, in its present Western form, of the "Gloria in Excelsis," and it is at least possible that he may have introduced other innovations, especially as some of his hymns (notably a well-known Lenten one, "Jesu quadragenarie"), though common in Germany and England, were not in use in Italy. The work of St. Gregory the Great is not, as a hymnographer, distinct from that of St. Ambrose; he introduced no new species of hymn, nor, it would appear, any new use for hymns; his ritual and liturgical work lay in other directions, though he made many important contributions to the now rapidly increasing stock of metrical hymns. But the progress of hymnody for the next four centuries will be best illustrated by a table of the sources from which the leading Breviary hymns have been derived. In the subjoined list, the numbers in the first column are from Daniel, who, without attempting perfect accuracy, arranges under the name of each author the hymns traditionally assigned to him; those in the second column from Koch, who has endeavoured to assign to each author the hymns known to be his, but has not consulted so wide a range of breviaries as Daniel:—

The use of Ambrosian and other hymns of Italian origin was much extended by the establishment of the monastic orders, each with its own set of offices for the hours. Benedict especially is expressly mentioned by Walafrid Strabo as having inserted in his offices many Ambrosian hymns. Other countries began, as the above lists will show, to produce hymnographers of their own, especially Spain, of whose rich store of hymns the Mozarabic Breviary is an evidence. There are signs, however, that this influx of hymns did not everywhere meet with favour. The complaint made by the orthodox against heretics that they had innovated, could now be turned against themselves (Ambrose, Ep. 873, 72); and among Catholics there were some who doubted, like the Genevan reformers later, whether it were right to use in worship any but the words of Scripture. Others, as time went on, became accustomed to the Ambrosian hymns, but hesitated to receive fresh ones. At the second council of Tours (567-8), by canon 23, the admission of other hymns of merit, in addition to the Ambrosian, was formally sanctioned. At Toledo, again, complaints were made that some still rejected the hymns of Hilary and Ambrose, as not scriptural (Walafrid Strabo, l. c.). At length, on Dec. 5, 633, at the fourth council of Toledo, under the presidency of Isidore, a canon (c. 13) was passed threatening with excommunication all in France or Spain who opposed the use of hymns in divine service. Yet, as we have seen, there were still some churches, even in the ninth century, which did not admit metrical hymns into their offices.

Two points remain to be noticed—the metre of Latin hymns, and the offices to which they were restricted.

Ambrose found in the Iambic Dimeter (our present L. M.) a metre admirably adapted to the concise and solemn language of his hymns, and equally well fitted for singing. This accordingly has been the normal metre of Latin hymnology, down to the invention of sequences. But it was by no means used in strict conformity to classical models; accent and quantity, it must be confessed, were both at times disregarded. Some attempts were made, however, at other metres. Among the so-called Antiochian hymns appears one on St. John Baptist, in four-line stanzas of Aleaic Henderasyllables—

The poems of Prudentius, not being originally intended for church song, supply other irregularities, as Iambic Trimeter—

"Nazarene. lux B. thom. verbum Patrie."

and the Anacreontic (Iamb. Dim. Catal.)—

"Cultor Del memeto."

The fine cent from his "Da puer plectrum," beginning—

"Corde natus ex Parentis ante mundi exordium."

first introduced into church song the Trochaic Tetrameter Catalectic of Greek tragedy, which has been so great and permanent a gain. He has also a hymn in stanzas of four Sapphic lines (without the final Adonius)—

"Inventor rutili stax bone Iulimins."

Two centos from Fortunatus—

"Crux benedicta nitet. dominus qua carne pepedit."

and the well-known "Salve festa dies," are the earliest instances of elegiac verse in church song. It is to be noted that both were processional. St. Gregory the Great wrote Sapphic hymns for the hours—

"Nocte surgentes vigilemus omnes,"

and

"Ecce jam noctis tentatur umbra," and thenceforth their use was not infrequent.

A few other irregularities may be mentioned, but they are unimportant.

The use of hymns till now was threefold: (1) as processional; (2) in the canonical hours; (3) at certain special offices, such as the Benediction of Paschal tapers, &c. As yet no metrical hymns were used in any part of the Eucharistic office. Walafrid Strabo mentions, however, that Paulinus "Patriarcha Forjulienensis" (Paulinus of Aquileia) had frequently, especially in private masses, introduced hymns either of his own or of others, "circa immolationem sacramentorum" (i. e. at the Illation or Preface following the Sursum corda). He adds that so great a mass would not have done this without authority or reason. It is possible, therefore, that there were other instances of the interpolation of hymns into the Mass. One such is known to us, the verses attributed by Daniel to Eugenius of Toledo—sung as a Communio, or Antiphona ad accedentem, before the reception of the elements; Neale (Chr. Remembrancer, Oct. 1853) assigns this to the seventh or eighth century. These exceptional uses were foreshadowings of the great outburst of sequences in the beginning of the tenth century, which was destined to add so much to the splendour and variety of Latin hymnody.

"Sacet venite, corpus Christi sumite,"

Dei, xviii. 23). "If you join the first letters of the five Greek words Ἰησοῦς, Χριστός, Θεοῦ, Ἰδιῶ, Σωτῆρ, you will have ΙΧΘΥΣ, fish, in which word Christ is mysteriously designated. Compare Optatus c. Donatist, iii. 2. And when the Empire became Christian, and it was no longer necessary for Christians to conceal the great object of their faith under a symbol, its use began to decline. De Rossi, the highest authority on such a matter, assures us that at Rome, at least, it is scarcely ever found in cemeteries formed after the age of Constantine, but is almost confined to the catacombs, and to the most ancient portions of these. It was, he believes, growing obsolete in the 4th century, and was scarcely ever used merely as a symbol, whether at Rome or in the provinces, in the 5th. The symbolic fish, indeed, is found on an ambo in the church of St. John and St. Paul at Ravenna, which is shown by an inscription to be of the year 597; and the ΙΧΘΥΣ is found on the large cross in the apse of St. Apollinaris in Classe, near the same city, which Ciampini* (Vet. Monum. ii. 79, ed. 2) maintains to be a work of the year 567. These, however, are rather instances of the use of ancient symbols by an artist for decorative purposes, than of the continued use of the symbol, as such. When the symbols occur in inscriptions, where mere ornament is evidently not intended, we may be sure that they are still used as a sign for believers. In representations of scenes from the gospels, or from hagiology, fish are of course found in all ages of Christian art.

Although the ΙΧΘΥΣ was originally an acrostic, there is only one ancient inscription known in which it actually appears as such. In all other cases it stands separate, at the beginning or end of an inscription, or both; generally it is written horizontally in the ordinary manner, but sometimes vertically (Fabretti, Inscript. Etycl. p. 329; compare GEMS. p. 714). It would indeed be impossible to arrange ΙΧΘΥΣ as an acrostic in a Latin inscription, and all the ΙΧΘΥΣ monuments which have come down to us are Latin, with the one exception just referred to. This famous slab was found in the year 1839, beneath the surface, in an ancient cemetery near Autun, and was first published by Dom (now Cardinal) Pitra (Annales de Phil. Chrét. 2^e sér. t. xix. p. 195). Since that time a considerable literature has gathered round it. It is a sepulchral inscription over one Pectorius, son of Aschandius. It is imperfect, but as to the restoration of the first six lines there is no very great difference of opinion among palaeographers and scholars. Mr. W. B. Marriott (Testimony, p. 118) gives the inscription thus:

Ἰχθύς οὐρανόθεν ἄγιον γένος ἠγορεῖ σέμνην Χρῆσε λαβὼν [ζωὴν] ἀμβροτον ἐν βροτείῳ Θεοσκεπτον ὑδάτων τῆν σὴν, φίλε, ἔδλωπε ψυχὴν

* Ciampini misreads the ΙΧΘΥΣ; but Gouli (Diplom. It. 291) gives the correct reading.

* It is noteworthy that this cemetery is locally called, not cinetière, but polyandre, i. e. πολυάνδριον—a curious relic of the time when Greek was spoken at Autun. Probably this was the very name used in the time of Gregory of Tours, who, in his ignorance of Greek, took it for a Gallic word (De Gloria Confess. c. 73, quoted by Marriott, Testimony, p. 127).

"Ἰχθύς ἁετοῦς πλουτοδότης σφίης, Σωτῆρος δ' ἁγίου μελιχθία λάμβανε βρώσων, Ἐσθιε πινῶν ἰχθύν ἔχων παλάμαις.

For ζωὴν we should perhaps read πνεῦμα. The word χρῆσε may be taken either for ἔχων, or for χρῆσαι, as λιτάζουμε for λιτάζουσα in the latter part of the inscription. Πινῶν is for πινῶων. The hiatus in the last line but one may perhaps be filled by the words σὺν μητρὶ γλυκερῇ καὶ ἀδελφείοισιν ἐμοῖσιν (Frantz), or something equivalent; and the last may perhaps run ἰχθύν ἰδῶν υἱὸν μνήσσο Πεκτορίου. Mr. Marriott translates the whole as follows:—"Offspring of the heavenly Ichthus, see that a heart of holy reverence be thine, now that from

The first portion seems to be an admission to the Christian passer-by who read it, the second a prayer of the deceased himself; the third an address to his parents and friends.

This inscription has been referred to very various dates, from the end of the 2nd century (Pitra) to the end of the 6th (Rossignol). Probably the judgment of Messrs. Franks and C. T. Newton, of the British Museum (in Marriott's scription has been referred to very

 . . . from the end of the 2nd century to the end of the 6th (Rossignol). The fragment of Messrs. Franks and C. F. the British Museum (in Maratti's ecting from which this engraving was debited to Prof. Churchhill Babington

Testimony, etc. p. 133), who assign it to the 4th or 5th century, is not far from the truth.
 With this agrees the decision of Kirchoff, the editor of the fourth volume of the Corpus In- scriptionum Græcarum, which contains this inscription (No. 9890).

Mr. Marriott (u. s. p. 141) conjectures that the space at the lower corner of the marble, to the spectator's right, was occupied by a sculptural fish, whether alone or in combination with some other symbol.

Costaloni (ix. 35) gives a gem (no. xi. in his plate) engraved with two fishes, with this inscription in three lines: IX || CωTHP || ΘΥ; evidently the ΙΧΘΥΣ, differing from the form common elsewhere in having CωTHP written at full length, instead of being separated by its initial letter like the other words of the acrostic.
 The CωTHP is probably placed between the IX and the ΘΥ because that shape of the inscription best suits the space.

Of seventy-five sculptured slabs containing the symbol which De Rossi has examined, not more than eight contain the ΙΧΘΥΣ alone, and only twenty—of which four are fragments of slabs which may have contained other symbols—the sculptured fish alone; the rest give also other symbols. Seventeen join with the fish the dove and olive-branch; a conjunction which seems clearly equivalent to Spiritus in pace— Christo; or—if the olive-branch be omitted—Spiritus in Christo. Spiritus tuus in pace is a common form of acclamation in Christian epiph-taphs. Twenty-three add the anchor to the fish, whether separate or inter-twined; a conjunction also extremely common on αἴμας [p. 714]. As the ANCHOR [p. 81] unquestionably symbolizes Hope, we may read these symbols Spes in Christo, one of the most common of Christian sepulchral formulae. A sepulchral slab from the cata-combs, now in the Kircher Museum, exhibits an anchor between two fishes, with the inscription ΙΧΘΥΣ ΖωΝΤων. (See further under αἴμας, p.
 713). Of the fish swimming in the water and supporting a ship on its back, clearly signifying that Christ bears up the church, De Rossi has seen three instances.

There remains the conjunction of loaves and fishes. That these in some instances simply form part of a representation of the Lord's miracle of the loaves is clear from the fact that in at least one of De Rossi's Monumenta (No. 71; Kircher Museum) there are five loaves and two fishes; but there can be no doubt that the fishes and loaves conjoined were intended to convey the further meaning that Christ is the Bread of Life, and that with special reference to the Eucharist (CANISTER, p. 264; EUCHARIST IN ART, p. 625). This is well illustrated by the Autun inscription, given above, where, according to the most probable restoration, the fish is spoken of as in the hands. We can scarcely doubt that these words refer to the receiving of Christ in the Eucharist. So when Augustine (Confess. xiii. 23, § 34), after mentioning the sacrament of baptism, goes on to speak of that other "solemnitas . . . in qua 'Ile piscis exarbutur quon levatum de profundo terra pia comedit,'" he undoubtedly refers to the sacrament of the Eucharist. It ought however to be noticed, that some at least of the paintings commonly supposed to be Eucharistic are intended rather to represent the heavenly marriage-supper which Christ makes for his faithful ones (Polidori, Dei convivii effugiati a sūbulo ne' monimenti Christiani. Milano, 1844).

ICONIUM COUNCIL OF. The date generally assigned to it is A.D. 378 (Mansi, iii. 505-10), this being the year in which St. Basil died; and Amphilocheus, bishop of Iconium, who presided, speaking of him as having been expected there, but kept away by severe illness. St. Basil himself (Ep. ccc. al. cccxvi.) had asked to have it put off in the hope that his health might improve.
 But it may be doubted whether this is not the meeting of which he speaks in a subsequent letter (cccvi. al. cclxxii.), when illness equally compelled him to return home. Mansi thinks his words here prove that he actually was at this meeting: they may mean no more than that he had commenced his journey with that intention, but after he had got as far as Neo-Cæsarea, which he may have gone to first, he was taken ill and had to return. This, according to Mansi, took place A.D. 375; and the question is, whether Amphilocheus must necessarily be supposed to have been speaking of a later illness. To make up for his absence, his treatise on the Holy Spirit was read there, to attest his sentiments on the subject of which it treats, says Amphilocheus; in all probability, therefore, this council had to do with the followers of Macedonius. [E. S. FF.]

ICONOSTASIS. In the ecclesiology of the Eastern church this designation is given to the screen or partition wall, tabulatum, which cuts off the bema or serararium from the S-ians and the choir. From its general similarity in form to the chancel screens of Western churches, the iconostasis is often identified with them. This, however, is based on an erroneous idea. The screen of western ecclesiology separates the nave, the place of the laity, from the choir, the place of the clergy. The iconostasis, on the other hand, invested with far greater dignity and importance, has its position further eastward, and corresponds in locality to the altar rails.
 Thus it divides the choir, or place of the clergy, into two parts, separating "the holiest of all," containing the holy table and the place for the celebrant and his assistants, from the "holy place," on either side of which are arranged the stalls for the clergy. The iconostasis in its original construction was a comparatively light and open screen, the κικκλῖθερ, δρόφακτα, or the ordinary type of western chancel screens.
 The present arrangement, by which it has been converted into a close partition with curtained doors, entirely concealing the holy mysteries from those who stand outside it, cannot be carried higher than the 8th century, and in its existing development is probably later still. The name eikonostasis is derived from the ikona (icons) or sacred pictures painted on it.

These screens in the larger and more dignified churches were of the richest materials attainable, and were adorned with all the resources of art. The elaborate description given by Paul the Silentary, enables us to realize the form and character of that in St. Sophia, as rebuilt by Justinian, in the middle of the 6th century. The material was silver. It consisted of a εἰκονοστάσιον, or partition, described as being of ivory, tortoise-shell, and silver.

According to Guar, the iconostasis owes its present close form to a reaction against the iconoclastic fury of the 8th century, as affording a more ample space for the exhibition of sacred pictures. His words are, "Retiuela illa lignea" (the wooden trellis work, such as that in Paulinus' church at Tyre) "mutavit Ecclesia Orientalis in tabulata solida a tempore quo iconoclastarum furere turbata plures et frequen-

Iconostasis at Tepekermann; from Forster's.

formed by a stylobate, ornamented with arabesque flower work. On this stood pairs of twisted columns, twelve in number, surmounted by an architrave of chased metal. The spaces between the columns were filled in with panels, bearing in oval medallions the icons of Our Lord, the Blessed Virgin, the apostles and prophets. In the centre, above the "holy doors," the intertwined monogram of Justinian and Theodora was to be seen, surmounted by the crucifix in an oval panel (Paul Silentary, part ii. v. 265, sq.)

The Church of the Apostles, erected by Constantine at Constantinople, had its screen of gilt towers sanctorum imagines ibi depictas esse voluit" (Eucholog. p. 18). Early examples of the solid iconostasis are hard to find. The partition has been invariably removed by the Turks in the churches converted by them into mosques, so that not a single instance appears in the churches of the Holy Land, and of Central Syria, drawn by De Vogüé, nor in those given in Texier and Pullan's Byzantine Architecture, or in Hübsch's Altchristliche Kirche. The earliest example known to Dr. Neale is that in the Arisa crypt church, at Tepekermann, in the Crimea, which he thinks "may be referred to about A.D.

copper (Euseb. Vit. Const. iv. 59). They were often of brass, or bronze. In that rebuilt by Paulinus, at Tyre, the screen was a trellis work of wood of the most slender and graceful workmanship (Euseb. H. E. x. 4, § 14). That of St. Peter in the Palace, built by Basil the Macedonian (A.D. 867-886), was of marble (Theophan. Ceram. Homil. iv.). The screen in the coenarthurch of St. Catherine on Mount Sinal, is 350," of which a wooden part is annexed. This is not a close screen, but consists of four pillars standing on a solid stylobate, the panels of which are ornamented with carved and gilded crosses. The columns reach to the top of the cave. The openings between them may have been probably closed with curtains (Neale, Hist. of East. Church, vol. i. p. 193). According to Gûnchebant (Dict. des Monuments, Art. Iconostase), one of the most

 According to Guéneault (Dict art. Iconostase), one of the me-ancient examples of a closed screen known is also in a cave church, the Grotto of the Apocalypse, at Patmos. From the woodcut given, taken from Calmet (Dict. de la Bible), it will be seen to be a plain boarded partition, reaching, in two divisions, from the floor to the spring of the vault, and very much resembling a Jacobean chancel screen in England. It has a central arched door, and two arched windows on either side, surrounded with arabesque work, and closed with curtains. The upper division exhibits an icon of Our Lord to the right, and of the Blessed Virgin to the left, with the crucifix above.

According to the normal arrangement, an iconostasis had three doorways, that to the right hand leading to the diakonicon; that to the left to the prothesis, through which the "Great Entrance" was made. The central doorway, θύραι θόραι, always the largest, and most highly decorated with carvings, opened on to the bema. It was protected in the lower part by two gates, about the height of a man, meeting in the middle, the upper portion, as well as the two side doorways, being closed with curtains [CERTAINS, HANG-INGS]. On the right of the holy doors was invariably the icon of Our Blessed Lord; on the left that of His Virgin mother. On the panels on either side, and on those above, other icons were depicted, according to the taste or devotion of the founders of the church, and to the saints under whose invocation it was plac'd. This arrangement remains on the whole unchanged to the present day. The iconostasis, according to Dr. Neale, is "now generally made of wood; what would be the pierced part in a western rood screen being panelled and painted. In Attica they are found of plain deal." (Neale, u. s., Texier and Pullan's Byzantine Architecture, p. 82.) The iconostasis in the churches of Russia is always a feature of considerable magnificence, which, from its size and elaborate decoration, is the object that first attracts attention on entering, being rather an architectural feature of the edifice than a mere piece of church furniture.

 It is very possible that more complete acquaintance with the ecclesiology of Russia will bring to light earlier examples of the iconostasis than those hitherto known. The annexed example from a church near Kestroma, in Eastern Russia, given by Mr. Fergusson in his History of Architecture, is not of very early date, but is pronounced by him to be "a favourable specimen of its class." [E. A.]

ICONOSTASium, εικονοστάσιον, in the Greek church, a moveable stand for the suspension of icons or sacred pictures. Such a piece of church furniture is mentioned by Collins (de Off.
Aul. Constantinop. c. vi. § 2), when describing the imperial ceremonial of Christmas Day.
 After matins the canonarchs brought out the iconostasium, and set it in its place, with an ara- logium, or reading desk, bearing a copy of the gospels in front of it. On it they suspended an icon of the nativity, and three or four others.

The emperor on entering the church kissed the icons, and again on leaving. Ducange, s. v. identifies the isomostasion generally with a small domestic chapel, or oratory, and considers that that described by Codinus was a portable shrine. Gretser is more correct in defining it as "omne illud in quo stant, vel ex quo pendent sacrae imagines." Gossang strangely interprets it of a curved picture frame. [E. V.]

IDIOMELEA (i. e. στιχηρὰ ἰδόμελα). These are Stichera or Strophes, which have no himnos (εἶμος), the rhythm of which they follow, but which are independent as to rhythm. They are usually said at lauds and at vespers on days of special observance. At lauds one only is said as a rule, though not invariably, as in the Holy week when there are several, after the στιχοὶ following the αἶθροι (i. e. Pas. 148, 149, 150). At vespers we find sometimes one only, as on certain week-days in Lent. Sometimes several, four or five being the usual number; and occasionally more, e. g. nine on St. John-Baptist's day, and of these one or more is often repeated. The tone to which they are said is specified, and the name of the author is often given. Their character is that of other troparia, used in the Greek offices; but they are often, though not invariably, longer than others. Idomelea are also used in other offices, e. g. in the office for the burial of a priest. [H. J. H.]

IDIOTA (ἰδιωτής). 1. An illiterate person, as contrasted with a "clerk." Thus, Gregory the Great (Epist. ix. 3) speaking of the use of pictures from sacred history, says that pictures are the bible of the uneducated—"quod legentibus scriptura, hoc idiotis praestat pictura centibus." Bede (Epist. ad Egbert.: Migne's Patrol. xciv. 659 c) wishes the idiotae—at is, he explains, those who have no knowledge of any tongue but their own—to learn by heart the Apostle's Creed and the Lord's Prayer in their own tongue. In the Middle Ages, when an educated man was almost of course in holy orders, the word "idiot" came to mean simply a layman.

2. The word Idiotae was also used to designate those who attached themselves to some convent as helpers, without being regular members of the brotherhood, i. e. Iny-brothers [CONVERSIS] (Ducange, Gloss. Lat. s. v.) [C.]

IDLENESS. [MENDICANCY.]

IDOLATRY (Idolatria, εἰδωλολατρεία). The object of this article is to describe the laws of the ancient church relating to idolatry, or any rites or customs connected with it. The treatment of Christians who went back altogether to heathenism, belongs to APOSTASY; of those who succumbed for a time under pressure of persecution, to LAPSED.

Few canons directed against idolatry appear in the councils, until Christianity had become the dominant religion in the different countries of Europe. The first law which interfered with the free exercise of Paganism, was an edict of Constantine, A. D. 313, against private sacrifices (Cod. Theod. IX. xvi. 1, 2), but it is questionable whether this was issued solely in the interest of Christianity. Later laws were undoubtedly levelled against idolatry. In A. D. 324, Constantine forbade (Euseb. Vit.

Const. II. 45) the erection of images of the gods, or (ibid. iv. 16) of his own statue in the temples; he (ibid. II. 44-5) prohibited all state sacrifices, and (ibid. III. 54-8) shut up many of the temples, converted αἱεῖα into churches, and destroyed some which had been the scene of immoral rites. Laws of Constantine forbade (Cod. Theod. XVI. x. 4, 6) all sacrifices whatever on pain of death; but it does not appear that the penalty was ever exacted. But that which is considered to have given the death-blow to Paganism, is a comprehensive law of Theodosius, A. D. 392 (Cod. Theod. XVI. x. 12); sacrifice and divination were declared treasonable and punishable with death; the use of lights, incense, garlands, and libations, was to involve the forfeiture of house or land where they were used; and all who entered heathen temples were to be fined. But that Pagan rites lingered after this appears, among other proofs, from a petition addressed to the emperor by a Carthaginian council (A. D. 399), requesting him to destroy some rural temples, and forbid certain idolatrous banquets, which were held on Saints-Days, and which the Christians were compelled to attend (Cod. Eccl. Afric. c. 58-60). And two centuries later Gregory has occasion (Epist. iv. 23-6) to rebuke some landowners in the remote parts of Italy, who suffered their peasants to continue in heathenism; and in a letter (Epist. ix. 65) to the bishop of Cagliari, he recommends that if the rustics will not listen to preaching, they shall be fined, imprisoned, or chastised. On the disappearance of Paganism, see Robertson, Church Hist. III. 5.

2. Local Edicts.—In the Gallic church, a fragmentary letter of Childebert, A. D. 531 (Hardouin, Conc. III. 334), commands all landlords who have images or idols on their estates, to remove them, and assist the priests in destroying them. The worship of sacred trees or groves^a or stones or fountains, is frequently forbidden, and the bishops are admonished to be more zealous in checking it (2 Conc. Arclat. c. 23; 2 Conc. Turon. c. 22; Conc. Francoford. c. 43). A Frankish council presided over by Boniface, A. D. 742 (Conc. Germ. c. 5, in Hartzheim's Conc. I. 49) prohibits incantations and auguries, and sacrifices which were offered to martyrs in place of the old Pagan deities; other councils forbid the "sacrilegious fire-burnings which are called Nedfrates"^b (Conc. Liptin. c. 4; Conc. Succ. c. 6). Appended to the council of Liptina (probably Lestines, Hartzheim, I. 51), A. D. 743, is a curious list of forbidden Pagan superstitions. It contains mention of the widespread worship of sacred trees and stones; of sacrificing to saints; of various omens and charms, such as observing tempests, horns, and suns, and the brain and dung of animals, and fire on the hearth; or superstitions connected with the state of the moon, particularly women's efforts to attract moon-by lunar influences. Compare a similar super- in England, where people are warned against trusting to cries and sorceries during an eclipse of the moon (Egbert, Penit. viii. 3). An edict of Charlemagne issued after the conquest of the Saxons, A.D. 785, contains some severe enactments against the heathen practices of the vanquished (de Partibus Saxon. in Baluze's Capitularia. i. 250). Death is to be the penalty in (c. 4) ostentatiously and defiantly eating meat in Lent; of (c. 6) burning a witch because of supposed cannibalism, and then superstitiously eating her flesh; of (c. 7) burning a dead body and collecting the ashes; the bodies of the dead (c. 22) are to be buried in cemeteries and not in the Saxon tumuli. A more merciful clause (c. 14) contains a singular provision that if any one who has exposed himself to death by such crimes, shall confess his offence to the priest, and be willing to do penance, the extreme penalty may be remitted on the testimony of the priest. This capitulary was to some extent repealed by a more lenient one, A.D. 797, which, according to the general practice of the Teutonic races, allowed a money payment to compound for the capital offence.

The Spanish councils contain evidence of the lingering of the old heathenism at the end of the 7th century, and that even the clergy were not free from complicity with it. The 3rd council of Toledo, A.D. 589 (c. 16), complains that the "sacrilege of idolatry" was prevalent through both Spain and Gaul, and declares that bishops and priests neglecting to assist in its extirpation shall be excommunicated. The 12th council, A.D. 681 (c. 11), threatens death to slaves worshipping idols or stones or fountains or trees, or lighting torches; but if their masters will be answerable for their abstaining from such rites for the future, the extreme sentence may be commuted to a flogging or to being shackled with iron: if the masters decline such responsibility, they lose all rights over the slaves, and are themselves subject to excommunication. The same practices are enumerated by the 16th council, A.D. 693, and the bishop or priest who is negligent in searching them out, is sentenced (c. 2) ten year's penance; and further, anyone who puts obstacles in the way of priest or officer is to be put under anathema, and if a noble, pay 3 pounds of gold to the treasury; if low born, receive 100 stripes, have his head shorn, and forfeit half his property.

In England, Gregory had given directions to Augustine (Epist. xi. 76) that heathen idols were to be destroyed, but the temples preserved, that the fabric should be sprinkled with holy water, that altars should be constructed in them and relics deposited, and so the building be converted to the worship of God on spots already consecrated in the popular imagination; even the sacrifices of oxen were to continue, but transferred to Saints Days. Gregory defends this policy on the ground that he who aspires to the highest place, must be content to ascend step by step, and not at one bound. The English Penitentials disclose the idolatrous customs which seem to have had the most tenacious hold on the people. Those who sacrifice to devils on slight occasions are to do penance for a year, on great occasions for ten (Theod. Penitent. i. xv. 1; Egbert, Penitent. iv. 12). Any woman who places her daughter on the roof of a house, or in an oven, to cure her of a fever, is sentenced to seven years (Theod. Pen. i. xv. 2; Egbert, Pen. viii. 2). Burning grain in any house where a dead body has been deposited, as a charm to protect the survivors, is punished by five years (Theod. Pen. i. xv. 3). The witches who invoke storms are to be penitents seven years (Egbert, Pen. iv. 14). In the laws of Wihtrud of Kent, A.D. 696 (c. 12), it is decreed that if a husband without his wife's knowledge makes an offering to a devil, he shall be liable in all his substance; and if they both agree, they shall both be liable; and if they both "throw" makes the offering, he (c. 13) shall make a "bot" of six shillings or his hide. There are intimations that ecclesiastical law extended to other practices which, though not connected with religion, were regarded as badges of idolatry. The Legatine Synod held in A.D. 787 (Haddan 458), in its report to Adrian I., complains (c. 13) that the people dress after the manner of the heathen; that they follow the heathen custom of mutilating their horses by clipping their tails and splitting their nostrils and joining their ears; and also that they eat horse-flesh, which no Christian does in the East (Orientalibus, Italy and Germany). In the previous century the eating of horse-flesh, though not prohibited was regarded with disfavour (Theod. Penitent. II. xi. 4). A prohibition against heathen dress is also found in the ancient Welsh code of the 7th century (Canons Wallia. c. 61). "If any of the heathen, he shall be expelled Christian Society."

3. Id. latrous offices or customs.—The council of Elvira, A.D. 305 (c. 4), orders Flamenus who wish to become Christians to undergo two years' additional probation as catechumens; if after baptism they wear the sacrificial garland (c. 55), to do penance two years; if they provide a public spectacle (munus) (c. 3), to be denied communion till death; and if they sacrifice (c. 2), to be excommunicated for ever. The same council requires a Donuvir to separate himself from the church during his year of office. See also ACTORS, GLADIATORS. The Tertullian (de Spectac. c. 12). The same father condemns (de Spectac. cc. 20-22) the actors in each of the four sorts of shows.

The social festivities of the heathen were not regarded with the same suspicion. Tertullian (de Idolol. c. 16) sees no harm in a Christian being present at the solemnity of assuming the toji virilis, or of espousals or nuptials, or of giving a name to a child. But this toleration was not extended to festivities of a less innocent character. [HEATHEN, § 5, p. 763.] The superstitious lighting of torches and burning of lamps was not extended to festivities of a less innocent character. [HEATHEN, § 5, p. 763.] The superstitious lighting of torches and burning of lamps (Conc. Elber. c. 37; Conc. in Trull. c. 65). Another canon of Elvira (c. 34) prohibits the burning of wax candles in the cemeteries lest the spirits of the saints should be disturbed; a reference probably to the idolatrous practices associated with lighting lamps on heathen festivals (Tert. Apog. c. 35; de Idolol. c. 15). The irregularities attending the observance of the feast of the Kalends of January (the new year) form the subject of one of Chryso-stom's Homilies (in Kalend. t. i. p. 697, ed.

Bened.), from which it appears that Christians set up lamps in the market place, and adorned their doors with garlands, and gave themselves up to excess and made divinations of their future. "You will prosper," says Chrysostom, "in the coming year, not if you make yourself drunk on the new moon, but if you do what God approves" (Tert. de Idolol. c. 14; Ambrose, Serm. 17; Conc. Antiss. c. 1; Conc. in Trull. c. 62). The 2nd council of Tours, A.D. 567, states (c. 17) that it was a custom in the church to have special Litanies on the three days of the Kalends of January, as a protest against the heathen licentiousness [CIRCUMCISION]. The observance of the heathen festivals lingered long after heathenism itself was extinct; at the end of the 7th century the Trullan council (c. 62) after denouncing the Kalends, declares that the church will excommunicate any who keep the solemnities of the Bota (Vota), or the Brumalia (the winter feast), or the 1st of March; and forbids the heathenish customs of those festivals, the public dancing of women, the interchange of dress between men and women, wearing conic or satyric or tragic masks, calling on the name of Bacchus, and simulating a Bacchic frenzy while treading the grapes.

Making gain from idolatry was considered idolatrous. No artisan might assist in making an idol. "Canst thou," says Tertullian (de Idolol. c. 6), "preach the true God, who makest false ones? 'I make them,' says one, 'but I worship them not.' Verily thou dost worship them, and that not with the spirit of any worthless savour of sacrifice, but with thine own; not at the cost of the life of a beast, but of thine own." Similarly he exposes (Ibid. c. 8) the sophistries of those who made their livelihood by building or adorning heathen shrines; and (Ibid. cc. 5, 6, 8, 11, 17) the dealers in victims and incense, and the guardians of the temples and the collectors of their revenues. A landlord who reckoned in his accounts any property of an idol, was subject to five years' separation (Conc. Eliber. c. 40); a man or woman lending vestments to decorate idolatrous pomp, to three (Ibid. c. 57).

The rule which was to govern Christians in eating food, which might have been previously offered to an idol, is laid down by St. Paul (1 Cor. x. 25, 30). A great part of the animals used in the sacrifices was frequently sold by the priests, and afterwards retailed in the public shambles. This the Christians were at liberty to eat. But any attendance at a temple for the sake of the sacrifice was strictly prohibited (Conc. Eliber. c. 59). The council of Ancyra, A.D. 314 (c. 7), forbids any one to eat in a place consecrated to idolatry, even if he took his own food. But by the direction of Leo (Ep. ad Nicet.), a captive among the barbarians who from hunger or terror eat idol food, was to be leniently dealt with. Directions with regard to eating food offered to idols appear frequently in subsequent councils; it is the same as eating carrion, and exposes the offender to excommunication (4 Conc. Aurel. c. 20); offering food to the dead on the festival of St. Peter, and after receiving the body of Christ going home and eating meat consecrated to devils, incurs a like penalty (2 Conc. Turon. c. 22); other superstitions with food are to be reprimanded (Conc. Roman.

c. 14); not even the sign of the cross will purify an idol offering (Gregory II. Can. Epist. [C. M.] c. 6).

ILLATION. This in the Mozarabic liturgy is the equivalent to the Preface (Praefatio) of the Roman and Ambrosian liturgies. In the Gallican liturgy the corresponding prayer is called Immolatio or Contestatio. The Mozarabic Illatio is usually much longer than the Roman Preface, and varies with each mass. It begins with the words "Dignum est justum est," and leads up to the Sanctus. [v. PREFACE.]

ILLIBERITANUM CONCILIUM. [ELVIRA, COUNCIL OF.]

ILLITERATE CLERGY. Pope Hilary (A.D. 461-488) decreed that an illiterate person (litterarum ignarus) incurred irregularity, i. e., disqualification for holy orders. And this rule was repeated, under varying phrases, by a council at Rome during his pontificate and by Pope Gelasius afterwards. But the standard of knowledge required does not appear to have been exactly defined. We learn from St. Augustine (Epist. 76) that the same rule applied to monks who were candidates for orders. In the time of Gregory the Great (A.D. 590-604) it was sufficient to be able to read. But the offices were repeated, it seems, to a considerable extent memoriter, especially by the clergy of the lower grades. He ordered the deacons from country cures to be examined as to how many psalms they could say by heart. Thus, too, the Second Council of Orleans (A.D. 545), in its 15th canon, forbids the ordination as priest or deacon of any man who could neither read nor repeat the Baptismal office. And the First of Mâcon (A.D. 581) ordered the clergy to fast every Monday, Wednesday, and Friday from Martinmas to Christmas, and to employ these days in learning the canons. The Council of Narbonne (A.D. 589) even tried to enforce learning by suggesting that a cleric, obstinately illiterate, had no right to his share of the ecclesiastical revenues, and should be sent to a monastery, since he could not edify the people (Can. 10).

We find much the same state of things in Spain. The Fourth Council of Toledo (A.D. 630) describes ignorance as the "mother of all other errors," and orders that a bishop when he ordained a parish priest, should give him an office book to use (Cinens 25, 26). It is implied that he would be able to read this.

Respecting the Eastern Church our information is much less precise. Justinian (Novell.

e Eastern Church our informa- ss precise. Justinian (Novell.

vl. c. 5) forbid the advancing to any grade of the ministry those who were unable to read. During great part of the 8th century the leco- noelistic controversy was raging, and destroyed almost entirely, says Balsamon, the habit of study among the Catholics. Therefore the Seventh General Council at Nîmes, in A.D. 787 ordered in its 2nd canon that no bishop should be consecrated who could not repeat the psalter; and who was not well acquainted with the gospels, the epistles of St. Paul, the whole scriptures, and the canons: a very considerable requirement for the time.

With the accession of Charlemagne a movement upwards began. In many capitularies of that sovereign, stringent regulations against ignorance in the clergy were laid down (for details see Thomassin, p. ii. lib. i. cc. 90, 96 passim). These details, by the moderation of the standard set up, serve to show the existing lack of knowledge. Even these it was impossible to enforce with any strictness. Lupus, Abbot of Ferrara, writing during this reign to Hincmar, apologises for a bishop, who was unable to teach his flock otherwise than by his good example, because of his ignorance. And Agobard, in a letter to Bernard of Vienne, concludes that ignorance in parish priests would do even more harm than an evil life. Charlemagne himself, lamenting this prevailing ignorance, writes to Alcuin: "Oh, that I had twelve clerks as learned and as perfectly taught in all wisdom, as Jerome and Augustine were!" Alcuin's reply is worth recording: "The Creator of heaven and earth had only two such, and you wish to have twelve!" The complaint of the English Alfred, reported by Asser, is well known, that "from the Humber to the Thames there were very few priests who understood the liturgy in their mother tongue, or who could translate the easiest piece of Latin; and that from the Thames to the sea, the ecclesiastics were still more ignorant" (De Reb. Gest. Alfred. apud Camden, Anglica, p. 25). We must not suppose, however, that there were no exceptions. Bebe, Alcuin, John Scotus Erigena, and Hincmar, are proofs to the contrary. But this sudden blaze of learning was a good deal adventitious, rested on the personal influence of Charlemagne, and died out again after his decease (Muratori, Antiquitates; Thomassin, Vetus et Nova Eccl. Disciplina, Pars II. lib. i.; Maitland, Dark Ages). [S. J. E.]

ILLUMINATION. [MINIATURE.]

ILLYRIAN COUNCIL (Illyricum or Illyri- cianum Concilium according to Cave). Held in Illyria, but it is not agreed in what year: Pagi contending for A.D. 375, others for 375, Cave for 367, and older authorities for 365. Pagi says it had been preceded by the second (he should have said rather the third) of the Roman councils under pope Damasus, in conformity with whose letter to the bishops of Illyria, a letter asserting the consubstantiality of the three Persons in the Trinity, was now addressed by them to the bishops of Asia Minor. This view is at least countenanced by the letters themselves; and it must be allowed that the letter of Valentinian, Vales, and Gratian to the bishops of Asia Minor expresses the declaration of the Illyrian bishops on this occasion (Mansi, iii. 386-94; and 455-68. Comp. Roman Councils, 19).

Three more councils are given under this heading. 1. A.D. 415, according to Sir H. Nicolas (Chron. of Hist. 217), at which Peregrine was appointed bishop of Patras.

2. A.D. 515, according to Mansi (Sir H. Nicolas A.D. 516, as Illyriense) when the bishop of Thessalonica having joined Timothy of Constantinople, forty bishops, whose metropolitan he pronounced his communion, and declared for communicating with pope Hormisdas (Mansi, viii. 538).

3. A.D. 550, according to Mansi, in defence of the three chapters (ix. 147). [E. S. Fr.]

IMAGES. I. From the time of the Maccabees the second commandment was generally understood by the Jews to forbid not only the worship of the likeness of any living thing, but even the making of it. It is probable that they were led to this view by their abhorrence of the acts of Antiochus Epiphanes, and his agents. Among other outrages these had set up "chapels of idols" in the cities of Judah (1 Macc. i. 47), and even "sought to paint the likeness of their images" in the book of the law (Ibid. iii. 48). Hence Josephus (Antiq. viii. c. 7, § 5) condemns Solomon for making the twelve oxen on which the molten sea was set in the temple (1 Kings vii. 25; comp. 29), and the lions that were about his throne (Ibid. c. x. 19, 20), though no degree of reverence was paid to either of them. In the days of Herod the Great a sedition was trophies, such as the Romans display after their victories, the Jews supposing that the armour that they would never "endure images of men custom" (Jos. Antiq. xv. c. 8, §§ 1, 2). In the eagle which Herod had put over the great gate of the temple (De Bello Jud. i. c. 33, §§ 2, 3). When Vitellius was marching through Judæa to meet Aretas, the inhabitants entreated him to take another route on account of the figures which they observed on his standards (Antiq. xviii. c. 6, § 3). Origen, A.D. 230, even asserts of the Jews in general that "there was no maker of images among their citizens; neither painter nor sculptor was in their state" (Cels. iv. § 31).

It appears, then, that most of the Jewish converts would enter the church thoroughly imbued with a dislike to all images; and it is probable that many of the heathens would be similarly affected towards them out of mere horror at the some also of the latter who, even before their conversion, were prepared by the higher traditions of philosophy to renounce the use of images in connection with religion. Pythagoras, we are told, forbade his disciples to "wear rings or to engrave images of gods on them" (Clem. Alex. Strom. v. c. 5, § 28). Zeno, the founder of the Stoic school, maintained that men "ought not to make temples or images" (Ibid. c. 11, § 77). It was a tradition among the Romans that Numa had "forbidden them the use of any image of God in the likeness of man or in the form of any animal, and that there was among them previously no image of God either painted or fictile; but that for the first 170 years when they built temples and set up images, and no images in any shape, on the ground that it was an unholy thing to liken the Father to the worse, and impossible to reach God otherwise than with the mind" (Plutarch in Numeri, c. viii.). Varro, in a passage preserved by St. Augustine (De Dei, iv. c. 31), also affirms that for the period specified, the Romans "worshipped the gods without an image (simulachro)." He thought that if the law had continued, "the gods would have been more purely worshipped;" and after referring to the example of the Jews, he adds that "they who first set up images of the gods for the people relived their states (civitatibus), but probably circus, their fellow-citizens), from a fear, and involved them in an error" (Opp. Varr. Fragments, p. 46; Amstel. 1623).

II. That many of the early Christians adopted the Jewish interpretation of the second commandment is evident. Tertullian, A.D. 192, even thought it wrong to make such masks as actors wore; for, if God forbade the likeness of any thing, "how much more of His own image?" (De Spect. c. 23). He thought painting a sin in Hieroglyphics (Adv. Herm. c. 1); and he teaches that "the law of God, in order to eradicate the material of idolatry, proclaims, Thou shalt not make an idol; nothing also, Nor the likeness of any thing . . . Over the whole world hath it forbidden such arts to the servants of God" (De Idololatr. c. iv.). Clemens Alex., A.D. 192, appears to hold the same rigid view: "It has been manifestly forbidden us to practise deceptive art; for, saith the prophet, Thou shalt not make the likeness of any thing that is in heaven or in the earth below." (Protrept. c. iv. § 62.) Origen says that painting and sculpture were disallowed among the Jews, lest the effect on senseless men should be to "draw the eyes of the soul off God on to the earth" (C. Cels. iv. § 31); a reason, which, if valid, ought to debar Christians from the exercise of them also.

III. All held that representations of God, even of the Second Person as man, were unlawful. Thus Clemens Al.: "It were ridiculous, as the philosophers themselves say, for man, who is the toy of God (Plato, de Leyibus, vii. § 10) to make God, and for God to be made of sportive art," &c. (Strom. vii. c. 5, § 22). Origen: "The statues and ornaments that become God are not made by handicraft artisans, but are those wrought by the word of God and formed within us, the virtues (to wit) which are imitations of the first-born of every creature" (C. Cels. viii. § 17). Minutius Felix, A.D. 220: "What image should I make of God, when, if you think right, man is himself the image of God" (Oct. c. 9). Lactantius, A.D. 303: "An image of the whose spirit and power being diffused everywhere, can from nowhere be absent, must be always superfluous" (Instit. ii. c. 2; see also the Epit. c. 25). Arnobius, A.D. 303, after ridiculing the images of the heathen, says, "So far are we from attributing corporeal features to God, that we even fear to ascribe to so great a being the ornaments of minds, and the virtues themselves in which excellence has been hardly ascribed to a few. For who would say that God was brave, constant," &c. (Adv. Gent. iii.). Eusebius, the historian, in a letter to Constantia Augusta (the daughter of Constantine and wife of Caesar Gallus), who died in 354: "Since thou hast written about some image, it seems of Christ, wishing the said image to be sent to thee by us, what, and of what kind, is this image which thouallest that of Christ? . . . Has this Scripture alone escaped thee, in which God by law forbids to make the likeness of any thing in heaven, or on the earth beneath? Hast thou ever seen such a thing in a church thyself, or heard of it from another? Have not such things been banished throughout the whole world, and given far off out of the churches, and has it been proclaimed to us alone among all men that it is not lawful to do such a thing?" (Epist. put together from fragments by Bolvin, in note to Niceph. Gregoras; Hist. Byzant. tom. ii. p. 130, ed. Bonn). Eusebius proceeds to say he had taken from a woman two pictures of persons dressed like philosophers, which she called portraits of Christ and St. Paul, "lest," he adds, "we should seem to carry our God about in a representation like idolaters." St. Augustine writing in 393: "It is not to be thought that God the Father is circumscribed by human form . . . It is unlawful to set up such an image to God in a Christian temple. Much more is it wicked to set it up in the heart where the temple of God truly is" (De Fide et Symbolo, c. 7; comp. in Ps. cxlii.; Enchir. Sermon. i. § 1, &c.). Asterius of Amasea, A.D. 401: "Do not depict Christ. For the one humiliation of the Incarnation sufficeth Him, which He took on Himself by choice for our sake. But bear and carry about the incorporeal Word mentally, in thy soul" (Hon. in Jhn. et Lazar. Anctar. Græc. Combef. tom. exeg. col. 5). A writer quoted as Epiphanius Cyrius (the famous bishop of Constantia) by the council of Constantinople in 754: "Remember, dear children, not to bring images into churches, nor into the cemeteries of the saints; but have God ever in your hearts through remembrance of Him; nor indeed into a common house" (Act. vi. Conc. Nic. ii.). Even in the 8th century there were no representations of God the Father, but unhappily not always from principle. "Why," says Gregory II. in 726, "do we not represent and paint the Father of the Lord Jesus Christ? Because we do not know what He is, and it is impossible to represent and paint the nature of God. But if we had seen and known Him, as we have His Son, then should we have been able to represent and paint Him also, that you might call His image too an idol" (Ep. J. ad Leon. Labl. Conc. tom. vii. col. 13). John Damascene in the East at the same period, A.D. 728, who is equally vehement on the general question, says to the same effect: "We should indeed be in error if we made an image of the invisible God" (Orat. de Sacris Imag. ii. § 5). After the period in which all painting was condemned, it is not so common to find passages, which forbid pictures of saints, or deny that the church used them. There are such, however; although, as we shall see, such pictures were then looked on only as lessons in history. For example, St. John Chrysostom, A.D. 398: "We enjoy the presence of the saints through their writings, having images not of their bodies but of their souls. For the things said by them are images of their souls" (Act. vi. Conc. Nic. ii.; sim. Amphilocheus of Iconium, Ibid.). An author whom the council of Constantinople already mentioned,

Has this escaped thee, in which God by the likeness of any thing in earth beneath? Hast thou thing in a church thyself, or another? Have not such things throughout the whole world, and of the churches, and has it us alone among all men that to do such a thing?" (Epist. fragments by Bolvin, in Notas; Hist. Byzant. tom. ii. p. Eusebius proceeds to say he had man two pictures of persons sophers, which he called portrait of St. Paul, "lest," he adds, "to carry our God about in a idolaters." St. Augustine: "It is not to be thought that circumscribed by human form to set up such an image to an temple. Much more is it up in the heart where the truly is" (De Fide et Symbolo, s. cxlii.; Enarr. Sermon. li. § 1. of Anaseus, A.D. 401: "Do not or the one humiliated of the eth Him, which he took on e for our sake. But bear and incorporeal Word mentally, in De Trin. et Lazar. Auctar. Græc. col. 5). "A writer quotes us (the famous bishop of Con- cern, dear children, not to bring ches, nor into the remembrance have God ever in your hearts ance of Him; nor indeed into a "Act. vi. Conc. Nic. II.). Even there were no representations of not unhappily not always from y," says Gregory II. in 726, "de and paint the Father of the st? Because we do not know it is impossible to represent and of God. But if we had seen as we have His son, then should e to represent and paint Him ght call His image to an idol." Labb. Conc. tom. vii. col. 13). In the East at the same period, equally vehement on the general the same effect: "We should or of it was made an image of the od in which all painting was not so common to find passages, tures of saints, or deny that the m. There are such, however; shall see, such pictures were only as lessons in history. For an Chrysostom, A.D. 398: "We ce of the saints through their images not of their bodies but For the things said by them are ubs" (Act. vi. Conc. Nic. II.; sin. Iconium, ibid.). An author whom onstantinople already mentioned, cites under the name of Theolotus of Ancyra: "Concerning them he teaches thus, that we have nesses of the saints in images out of material colours; but we have learnt, through those things which are written of them, to copy their virtues, which are, as it were, living images of them" (Labb. Conc. tom. vii. col. 492).

 IV. There was a consensus against the worship of images, in every sense of the words εἰκονομασία and λατρία. At first this extended to material representations of the cross. "We neither worship crosses," says Minutius, "nor wish to do so" (Oclar. c. 9). With regard to images of our Lord and the saints, the evidence is ample. Thus Irenæus, A.D. 187, condemns the error of some Gnostics, who crowned images painted in colours, and of other materials, which they asserted to be likenesses of our Lord (Adv. Hæc. l. c. 25, § 6). Epiphanius who repeats this (Hæc. xxvii. § 8) says that some of the images were of gold and silver, and that they "set them up and worshipped them." (See also Aug. De Hæc. n. 7.) Origen: "We do not honour statues, that as far as in us lies we may avoid falling into the notion that the statues are other gods" (C. Cel. vii. § 66). The council of Eliberis, about the year 305, decreed "that pictures ought not to be in a church, lest that which is worshipped and adored be painted on walls" (Can. xxxvi.). St. Augustine: "Who worships an image (simulacrum) or prays looking on it, that is not so adected as to fancy that he is heard by it, as to hope that what he desires is granted him by it? . . . Against his affection, by which human and carnal weaknesses can be easily ensnared, the infants] things very familiar, by which to stir memory, and to rouse, as elsewhere, the minds of men asleep in custom of their bodies. The images of the heathen, it says, are silver and gold" (Enarr. in Ps. cxlii. Sermon. ii. § 5). Elsewhere, when he dwells on the feeling excited by images, he speaks also of its contagious nature: "Who doubts the idols being destitute of all sense? Yet when they are set in their places, exalted for honour, so that they may be attentively regarded by those who pray and sacrifice, then through the very resemblance of living limbs and senses, though senseless and lifeless themselves, they affect weak minds, so that they seem to live and breathe; especially when there is besides the veneration of a multitude, by whom a worship so great is paid to them" (Ad Dogr. Ep. cii. quest. 3, § 18). It is undeniable that the objection here urged is as applicable to the image of a Christian saint as to that of a heathen god. Other testimonies will occur in the following sections.
 V. The figures first used among Christians in any reference to their faith were merely symbolical. The earliest was the momentary sign of the cross made by the hand. "At every journey coming in and going out, at the putting on of our clothes and shoes, at baths, at meals, at lighting of candles, at going to bed, at sitting down, whatever occupation employs us, we wear it; compare Ad Uxor. li. 5; S. Cyrill. Hier. Cal. iv. c. 10; xiii. cc. 11, 18, and others). The first permanent representation of the cross is probably that set up at Rome beside the statue of Constantine after the defeat of Maxentius in 312 (Euseb. Hist. Eccl. ix. 9), but Eusebius tells us also that "the symbol of the salutary passion composed of various and precious stones was set up" by Constantine in a room in his palace (De Vit. Const. iii. 40). The same prince had the arms of his soldiers marked with a cross (Sozom. Hist. Eccl. l. 8). Julian the emperor, A.D. 361, says to Christians in reproach: "Ye worship the wood of the cross, making shadowy figures of it on the forehead, and painting it at the entrance of your houses." St. Cyril of Alexandria in his reply justifies the practice of painting "the sign of the precious cross" (Lib. VI. ad Calc. Opp. Jul. 194). From St. Jerome we learn that the sign of the cross was made in the 4th century as it is now, in witness to written documents (Comm. in Ezech. ix. 4). St. Chrysostom: "This shines at the sacred table, at the ordination of priests, and again with the body of Christ at the mystic supper. It may be seen everywhere displayed, in houses, in market-places, in deserts, on roads, on mountains, in groves, on hills, on ships and islands in the sea, on beds, on dresses, on arms, on couches," &c. (Contra Judæc. et Gentil. § 9). Severian, A.D. 401, calls the cross "the image of the immortal king" (Hom. de Cruce, inter Opp. St. Chrys. ed. 403, speaks of "the ensign of the cross," surmounted with the crown of thorns, painted on the walls of his churches at Nola and Fundi (Ep. xxxii. ad Sever. §§ 12-17). Nuns, A.D. 440, recommends Olympiodorus, who was about to erect a martyrrium, to "set the figure of a single cross in the atriarium on the east of the most sacred precincts; for by one saving cross is mankind completely saved" (Ep. iv. 61).

 Tertullian is the first witness to the use of other symbolical figures: "We may begin from the parables in which is the lost sheep sought by its owner, and brought home on his shoulders. Let the very pictures of your chalice stand forth" (as witnesses). "The Good Shepherd whom thou paintest on the chalice" (De Pudic. 7). Clemens Alex. (Pædog. iii. 11, § 59) mentions several devices which he considered permissible on seals. [GEMS. p. 712.] "Symbols of the Good Shepherd" were placed by Constantine in the fora of Constantinople (Euseb. Vita Const. iii. 49). A mosaic in the church built by Paulinus at Nola represented Christ by a lamb, the Spirit by a dove, while "the voice of the Father thunders from the sky" ("This is My beloved Son" [Matt. iii. 17], being probably in letters). The APOSTLES [p. 107] were figured by twelve doves round a cross, and the church was seen set on a rock from which issued four streams, the doctrines of the four Evangelists (Ep. Paulini xxxii. § 10). At Fundi the picture of a shepherd separating the goats from the sheep suggested the Day of Judgment (Ibid. § 17).
 VI. (1) When religious art advanced from symbolism to portraiture, its works of the new type were at first, perhaps in every instance, partly historical and partly ideal. There was, for example, in the cemetery of St. Priscilla at Rome, a picture of the Virgin and Child, accompanied by the figure of a man, whose dress and action (he is pointing to a star) are so clearly suggestive of a symbolical meaning that he is supposed by De Rossi to represent the prophets who foretold the coming of Christ (Marriott's Testamentum Christianum, p. 234, and pl. x.). Other pictures belonging to this period of transition, being apparently of the 5th century, show our Lord blessing a child, or raising Lazarus, but with "the rod of His power" (L. ex. 2) in His hand (Arlingh, Roma Subterr. ii. 33, 37, &c.; De Rossi, Roma Subterr. ii. tav. 14, 24). In one of the same class and probably of the same age, our Lord appears with an open book in His hand, and an Apostle and rolls of writing on either side (Arlingh, ii. 91; Marriott, pl. xii.). The rolls evidently represent the Old and New Testaments; and the Apostles are probably St. Peter, the great converter of the Jews, and St. Paul, whose chief mission was to the Gentiles. The thought conveyed is that Christ is the great teacher. He "opened the Scriptures" to the Apostles, that they might instruct the world. Works of this twofold character are frequent after the strictly historical treatment of religious subjects had quite established itself. See examples in Arlingh, ii. 83, 88, 120, &c.

(2) We come now to pictorial images, which were, so far as appears, of a purely historical character. St. Augustine writing about the year 400, says of some misbelievers who had forged epistles as from our Lord to SS. Peter and Paul, that he supposed those Apostles "occurred to them because they saw them painted together with Him in many places" (De Consensu Evang. i. x. n. 16). He speaks also of the offering of Isaac as a "noble deed sung by so many tongues, painted in so many places" (C. Faust. xxii. 73). A painting on this subject is described by St. Gregory of Nyssa: "I have often seen the image of his suffering in a picture, and passed the sight not without tears, so vividly did the art of the painter bring the story before the eyes" (De Vult. Fil. et Sp. Oral.; compare Greg. II., Ep. I. ad Leon. Labb. Conc. vii. 16). It was a favourite subject, because it symbolised the death of Christ, which as yet men did not venture to represent directly. St. Gregory tells us also that the martyrdom of Theodora in all its circumstances was depicted on the walls of a church built to his memory (Encom. Theodori). The people of Antioch in the time of St. Chrysostom had the figure of St. Meletius "in the besils of rings, on stamps, on bowls, on the walls of chambers, and everywhere" (Chrysost. in St. Melet. § 1). Paulinus, in a poem written about the year 402, describes several scenes from the Old Testament, which he had caused to be painted in his church at Nola. He owns that it was an unusual thing (raro more, line 544), and explains his reason for it at length. It was an experiment by which he hoped to interest and instruct the rude converts of that neighbourhood, and especially to keep them from the excesses which prevailed among them, when they assembled in great numbers on the festivals (Poema xxvii. De S. Fel. Nat. carm. 9). Pictures of Paulinus himself and St. Martin had been placed by Sulpicius Severus in the baptistery of his church at Primuliac, near Beziers. Paulinus, hearing of this, sent him some verses to be set over them, in which he describes St. Martin as an example of holiness to the newly baptized, and himself of penitence (Ep. xxxii. §§ 2, 3). From Asterius we learn that at the beginning of the 5th century some persons had subjects from the New Testament, as Christ and the Apostles and miracles wrought by them, embroidered on their dress, a practice which he strongly condemns (De Div. et Lat. u. s.). The same writer describes at length the martyrdom of St. Euphensy as painted in a church (u. s. col. 207). Prudentius, A.D. 405, saw in the Forum Cornelianum at Rome a picture of the martyrdom of St. Cassianus, a schoolmaster, whom his pupils at the command of the heathen magistrate had stilled to death with their styli (De Coronis, Hymn. ix. 9). He also describes a picture on the tomb of Hippolytus, in which that martyr was represented being torn asunder by horses (Paul. x. 126). Heraclides of Nyssa, A.D. 440, wrote two epistles against the Messalianites, in the latter of which was a "testimony to the antiquity of the venerable images" (αἰκόνων, the Greek paintings) (Photius, Biblioth. cod. l.). We have reason to think that the custom of placing in churches the portraits, either painted, or in mosaic, of the patriarchs or other eminent men, was becoming common about this time. St. Nilus advised Olympiodorus "to fill the holy temple on all sides with stories from the Old and New Testament by the hand of the finest painter, that those who did not know letters and were not able to read the Holy Scriptures might by contemplating the picture be reminded of the virtue of those who served God truly," &c. (Ljst. i. 61). An author in Suidas, supposed to be Malchus, A.D. 496, says that in a church at Constantinople there was a mosaic, put up in the lifetime of Gennadius (A.D. 458 to 471), in which that patriarch and Aeneas, who became his successor, were represented with our Lord between them, and that the clergy set up pictures of Aeneas in the oratories (Suidas in Aeneas, i. 76). We find incidentally that the partitions of Macedonius had portraits of him in their churches (Theodorus Lector, Excerpt. ii.). Evagrius, A.D. 594, mentions a picture on the ceiling of a church at Apamia, representing a miracle of which he had himself been witness when at school there (Hist. Eccl. iv. 26). Gregory of Tours, his contemporary, mentions pictures (iconicæ) of the apostles and other saints, which were in an oratory at Arverna (Vitæ PP. iii. § 2). When Augustine and his companions had their first interview with Ethelbert in 597, they came "bearing a silver cross for banner, and an image of the Lord the Saviour painted on a board" (Bede, Hist. Eccl. i. 25). But the earliest authentic account of pictures in an English church occurs in Bede's life of Benedict Biscop, his first abbot, who, in 648, "brought from Rome paintings of sacred images, to wit, of the blessed Mary and of the twelve Apostles, besides representations of the Gospel history, and of the visions of St. John the Evangelist, and placed them in his church; so that all who entered the church, even those ignorant of letters, whithersoever they turned their eyes, might contemplate the ever-lovely countenance of Christ, and of his saints, though in an image; or might more heedfully call to mind the grace of the Lord's Incarnation" (Higior. sect. i.). In 685 (Hid. 720) he brought other pictures from Rome, many of saints and Gospel subjects, as before; but some also illustrating the relation of the New Testament to the Old, as Isaac bearing the avowed and defended; as by Leontius, above mentioned: "I, worshipping the image of God, do not worship the material wood and colours; God forbid; but laying hold of the lifeless representation of Christ, I seem to myself to lay hold of and to worship Christ through it" (Apol. in Act. iv. Conc. Nic. ii. Labb. vii. 237). He compares this worship to that which a Jew pays to the book of the law; but as he dwells much on miracles wrought by images, and, like Gregory, on the emotions which the sight of a cross or picture ought to raise in the beholder, it is clear that in practice the worship of them was very different from the reverence shewn to the law. Indeed it is very probable that the simple plea of instruction for the ignorant, however just when properly applied, was soon so extended as to cover practices which could not be distinguished from idolatry. For as Gieseler notices (Ecol. Hist. per. i. div. i. p. i. § 1) the only reply to the complaint, "This generation has made gods of the images," which a fanatical image-worshipper of the 8th century could offer, was that by which Gregory I. had defended the merely didactic use of them; viz., "You must teach the unlearned people" (Orat. de Imag. Adv. Constantinum Cubal. c. 13; inter. Opp. S. Joann. Damasc.).

VIII. By the beginning of the 8th century the worship of images had become such a scandal in the East that a Mahometan prince, Izid, or Jesid, the son of Omar, thought himself justified in interfering. In 715 he accordingly commanded all pictures to be removed from the churches of his dominion (Theophanes, Chronographia ad a. m. 6215). A little later, Leo the Isaurian, who became emperor in 716, made his hostility to the practice known. He claimed to be influenced by a horror of idolatry, and there is no evidence of any other motive. His sentiments were probably well-known from the first (Theophan. ad ann. 6217); but we gather from the testimony of two adversaries (Greg. II. Epist. ad Icon. Labb. vii. 9; Vita Steph. Jun. u. s. p. 412) that he had reigned ten years before he ventured on any overt act. In the year 726 he issued a declaration against the worship of images, but did not command them to be "destroyed, only placed higher, so that no one might kiss them, and thus bring discredit on that which was otherwise worthy of respect" (Vita Steph. u. s.). However, about the same time he seems to have ordered the image already mentioned, to which miracles were ascribed, to be removed from a public place in Constantinople. He also wrote to the bishop of Rome, who quotes his letter thus: "Thou sayest that the images occupy the place of idols, and that they who worship them are idolaters." "Thou hast written, that we ought not to worship things made by the hand, nor the likeness of any thing . . . and, inform me who hath taught by tradition the reverence and worship of things made by the hand, and I will confess that it is the law of God" (Epist. Greg. II. u. s.). In a most insolent and unchristian reply, the pope dwells much on his own feelings before a sacred picture (coll. 14, 16); but does not meet the complaint that such objects were abused to idolatry. About the same time John of Damascus wrote his three "Orations against those who reject the holy images." In his demand for adoration he does not go further than "worshipping and kissing and embracing the image both with lips and heart; as the likeness of the Incarnate God, or of His mother, or of the Saints." He says that pictures are the "books of the unlearned" (Orat. ii. § 16). Leo, however, persevered. A second letter to the pope (Labb. u. s. col. 23) being met to the same spirit as the former, and Germans of Constantinople proving equally impracticable, in 730 he ordered all images to be removed out of churches (Theophan. ad an. 6221). Constantine V., his son and successor, published another edict against images in the first year of his reign, 741; and is even said to have exacted an oath from his subjects that they would not worship them (Theophan. ad an. 6233; Vita Steph. p. 444). Such images as had been left were now effaced by scraping or whitewashing the walls (Vita Steph. p. 445); but merely decorative paintings of trees, flowers, birds, &c. were allowed. The party of the image-worshippers was at this time strong and numerous, is clear from the fact that the rebel Artavasdes won many adherents by declaring himself in their favour, and setting up icons in the cities. Anastasius the patriarch went over to him (Cedrenus, Hist. Compend. ii. 4; ed. Bonn), and he was recognized by Zacharias of Rome, who dated letters from his assumption of the purple (Ep. iv. v. Labb. vi. 1500-5). From this time image-worshippers would naturally be suspected of disloyalty; and would suffer much in that age of cruelty on the suppression of the revolt in 743. In 754 Constantine convened a general council at Constantinople, at which 338 bishops (Labb. tom. vii. col. 417) were present, but none of the great patriarchs. At this synod it was maintained that the worship of images was in a great measure due to, and that in return it fostered, a tendency to those heresies respecting the nature of Christ which had been condemned by earlier councils (ib. coll. 429-453), their characteristics being either to lower the Divine nature, or to dwell on the human as apart from it, or to confound the two. After a careful review of the scriptural and patristic evidence (ib. coll. 473-501) the following decree was made:—"Whosoever shall from this time present dare to make or worship or set up in a church or private house or conceal an image (εἰκόνη), if he be a bishop, presbyter, or deacon, let him be degraded; if a monk or layman, let him be anathematized and punished by the imperial laws, as contrary to the commandments of God and an enemy to the doctrine of the Fathers" (ib. coll. 508; see also 506). At the same time it was forbidden, under pretence of compliance with this decree, to lay hands on sacred vessels, vestments, &c., that had any figure wrought on them, but they might be recast or made up afresh with licence from the patriarch or emperor (ib. coll. 510, 511). This caution was necessary, and only partially effectual. E. g., a fanatical bishop was accused to the council of having "trampled on the holy paten of the undefiled mysteries of God, because it was engraved with the venerable image of Christ, and of His mother, and of the Precursor" (Vita Stephani, u. s. p. 480). We read too that many books containing pictures were burnt or defaced by the "iconoclasts" (Labb. u. s. coll. 372-377); and a general complaint is made by Germans of Constantinople that they were not at the same time. Michael Rhangabe, who deposed the dying Stauratus, seems to have punished with impartial hand both those who worshipped images and those who broke them. Leo the Armenian, who deprived him of his throne in 813, was a decided enemy to image-worship. He thought that the heathen were permitted on that account to obtain victories over the Christians. "I desire," he declared, "to overthrow them (the images). For observe, all the emperors who have received and worshipped them have ended their reigns each by a natural death, and been buried with honour," &c. (Narratio de Leone Arn. Imp. auctoris incerti, in Opp. Theophanis, p. 435, ed. Paris). The people generally seem to have been with him; for he is also reported to have remonstrated in this manner with the patriarch Nicephorus:—"The people are scandalized by the images, and say that we do ill to worship them, and that for this reason the heathen lord it over us. Condescend a little, and use management with the people, and let us pare away trifles. But if you are not willing to do this, give us the grounds on which you worship them, for the Scripture is by no means clear on the point" (ib. p. 437). In reply Nicephorus merely asserted the antiquity of the practice. In 815 Leo procured the condemnation of the second council of Nicaea by another, which he convened at Constantinople (Labb. tom. vii. col. 1299). The acts of this council are not extant; but an edict of Leo, issued at the time, is probably in complete accord with its decrees. In that the emperor alleges the unlawfulness and absurdity of image-worship, and the duty of removing the cause of offence (Michael Monach. in Vita Theodori Stud. c. 63; opp. Sirmondi, tom. v.). It is related of Michael II. (Balbus), A.D. 820, that "though he was of the heterodox party (an image-worshipper is speaking) he had nevertheless no wish to trouble those who did not defer to him, but allowed every one to do as he chose" (Vita Theod. Stud. c. 102). He also recalled those who had been banished by Leo. He at first contented himself with forbidding the word "saint" to be inscribed on images, wherever they might be (Cedren. tom. ii. p. 110); but it is probable that he afterwards became more severe (ib. p. 74). A letter is extant addressed by this emperor and his son Theophilus to Louis the Godly, in which he describes the course of action adopted by his predecessors of like mind:—"By common counsel they caused images to be removed from too low situations (in churches), and allowed those set in higher to remain where they were, that the painting might serve for Scripture, lest they should be worshipped by the more ignorant and weak; but they forbade the lighting of lamps or burning of incense to them" (Epist. ad Ludov. apud Goldast. u. s. p. 619). Theophilus, on his accession, required strict obedience to the law, and even forbade the painting of icons (Theophan. Continuat. lib. iii. c. 10; Cedr. tom. ii. p. 110).

On the death of Theophilus in 842, his widow, Theodora, who governed for her infant son Michael III., restored the icons and their worship, notwithstanding an oath that she would not do so, exacted by her dying husband (Cedr.

tom. ii. p. 142). The sanction of the church was obtained through a council held at Constantinople (Labb. tom. vii. col. 1782); and the triumph of images celebrated by the institution of an annual feast on the first Sunday in Lent, thence called by the Greeks επισημασία των εφεσθων (Philothei Serr. in Dom. I. Quadr. in Gretser's note to Cod. Mus. De Offic. c. xv. mli Narrat. de Imagibus Restit. in Combefis, Auctar. tom. hist. col. 738). From the T. picon of Sabas, c. 42, we learn that the occasion is marked by a procession of crosses and pictures, and the public reading of the decree of Nicaea (Gretser, u. s.). Opposition, however, was not wholly extinguished; for about the year 860 we find Photius, who had usurped the patriarchate of Constantinople, proposing to Nicholas of Rome that another general council should be held to complete the suppression of "the heresy of the iconomachi" (Vita Ignatii a Niceta conscr. in Labb. tom. viii. col. 1204). The council met the next year and pronounced the deposition of Ignatius, whom Photius had supplanted, but its action in regard to images is not recorded. In 869 another council, convened by the emperor Basil especially for the condemnation of Photius, denounced the iconoclasts, upheld pictures as useful in the instruction of the people, and declared that we ought to "worship them with the same honour as the book of the holy gospels" (can. iii. Labb. tom. viii. col. 1360). Here the history of the struggle closes in the East.

IX. The position of the Nestorians and Eutychians with respect to images is interesting and instructive. The former were cut off from the church in 431, before images of any kind were common. Their antagonism to the church would make them keen-sighted to the evil springing up within her, and naturally lead to their entire rejection. We find accordingly that "the Nestorians have no images or pictures in their churches, and are very much opposed to the use of them, even as ornaments, or as barely representing historical facts illustrative of sacred Scripture" (Badger's Nestorians, vol. ii. p. 132). The Eutychians, condemned in 451, were a very small body until the time of Jacob Baradaeus, who died in 588. They became very numerous, under the name of Jacobites, in the 7th century, and when they left the church they carried with them the custom of image-worship, as it was then understood and practised. At a later period the Greeks observing a difference and not knowing that they had themselves changed, accused the Jacobites of error: "They think it indifferent whether they worship or do not worship them, but if ever they chance to worship, they do not kiss the image itself, but touching it with a finger only, kiss the finger instead" (Demetr. Cyzicen. De Jacob. Haeres. Max. Biblioth. PP. tom. 814). One division of the Monophysites, whom some identify with the Armenians, were called Chatzarii, from the Armenian Chatzias a cross, because they revered the cross only (ib.). Of the Armenians Nicen says, "They do not adore the venerable images, and what is more, their Catholics with the rest anathematize those who adore them" (De Armen. Relig. Max. Biblioth. tom. xxv. p. 328).

X. We turn now to the West. In 767 Pipin held a council at Gentilly, at which legates from Rome and Constantinople were present. One

XI. The "images" of which we have spoken were all either pictures, like the modern Greek icons, or mosaics. Some writers, however, to prove that statuary was not unemphatically by the early church, allege the image of our Lord which was said to have been set up at Paneas (Caesarea Philippi or Dan) by the woman whom he healed of an issue of blood. (See the Hist. Ecc. of Eusebius, lib. vii. c. 18; Philostorgius, ex lib. vii. § 3; Sozomen, lib. v. c. 21; Asterius Amas, in Photii biblioth. cod. 271.) If this were indeed a statue of our Lord, the solitary act of a semi-heathen would be no indication of the mind of the apostolic church. But opposite the principal figure was the brazen statue of a woman in a beseeching attitude, kneeling, and with hands raised, not behind and furtively touching the hem of his garment, as in the gospel story. This suggests that the erection of the group was an expression of gratitude to some earthly ruler who had granted a petition. The costliness of the work creates another difficulty (see St. Luke viii. 43). Nor can we build anything on the fact related by Lampridius that Alexander Severus had the images of Christ, Abraham, Orpheus, &c., in his laurium (Vita Al. Sev. c. 29). It is possible that in the 9th century there was some use of statues among Christians; but we cannot with Mabillon (Præf. I. in Sec. IV. S. O. B. c. 29) think it a certain inference from these words of Agobard (De Imag. c. 31):—"Whoever adores any picture, or molten or moulded statue, is not giving worship to God, is not honouring the angels or holy men, but showing reverence to (their) images" (simulachra). [W. E. S.]

IMAGINES CLIPEATAE. The Romans gave this name to the heads painted on the shields usually hung up in their temples (Buonarroti, Osservaz. sopra alc. medaglioni, p. 9-11). We find in ancient Christian art a similar mode of treatment applied to portraits of our Lord. In some instances the bust of the Saviour is painted on a circular space in the form of a shield. This is notably the case in the vaulting of the chapel in the cemetery of Callistus [Jesus Christ], probably the most ancient example of a type that became traditional. Clipeatae of the Good Shepherd as a standing figure are frequently met with in the vaultings of crypts in the catacombs. In the mosaic of the great arch of St. Paul without the walls we find the bust of our Lord in clipeo (Ciampini, Vet. Mon. tab. lxxviii.). Also in ancient ivory diptychs, such as that of Rambona (Buonarroti, Vet. p. 262), in which the clipeus is supported by two winged angels. Another diptych exhibits the shield or crown carried in a similar manner by two angels, and bearing in the midst a Greek cross instead of the figure of the Saviour (Calogera's Raccolta, vol. xi. p. 295). That this mode of treatment lasted till the 7th century is proved by a painting in the roof of the oratory of St. Felicitas; there the bust of our Lord appears in clipeo (Raoul-Rochette, Disc. sur les types init., p. 25). Examples may also be quoted in later times (Du Cange, Gloss. s. vv. Scutum, Thoracica).

Many of the sarcophagi found in Roman cemeteries exhibit the effigies of a husband and wife carved within a shield or shell, as in the instance figured below (Bottari's pl. xx.). Some times a single figure is thus represental (Id. xxxvi. xl. lxxxix.). (Martigny, Dict. des Antiq. Chrét. s. v.) [C.]

IMIZILUM (also IMIZINUM, MIZILUM, MIZINUM). This word, variously spelt, occurs several times in the Vite Pontificum of Anastasius Bibliothecarius. It appears to denote some material of a silky nature, used for articles of dress of a costly description. The etymology of the word is doubtful; according to one view it is akin to the Italian ermesino, but Ducange (s. v.) rather connects it with canisile (Vite Pontificum, Leo III. p. 418; Paschalis I. p. 449; Sergius II. p. 490; Nicolaus I. p. 584). IMMERSION. [BAPTISM, § 49, p. 161.]

IMMUNITIES OF CHURCHES. [CHURCH (1), p. 365.]

IMMUNITIES AND PRIVILEGES OF THE CLERGY. Before the time of Constantine the clergy of the Christian church enjoyed no immunities or privileges. With the conversion of the emperor to the Christian faith, the ministers of what became the state religion began to be exempted from burdens borne by other members of the community, and to have special honours conceded to them. This policy reached its height in the Middle Ages, when its results caused a reaction to ensue which is operating at the present day.

By immunities we understand in the present article exemptions from ordinary burdens, by privileges, extraordinary honours, or prerogatives, whether sanctioned by custom only or by law. Both immunities and privileges may be best reviewed under three heads, as I. JUDICIAL. II. PECUNIARY, III. OFFICIAL AND SOCIAL.

I. JUDICIAL. Under this head we have to distinguish, 1. Rights maintained and confirmed, 2. Immunities allowed, 3. Privileges granted.

1. Rights maintained and confirmed. (1) Decisions in matters of faith and in ecclesiastical causes.—Christianity had grown up in antagonism to the imperial power of Rome, and managing its own affairs under its own officers, unaffected by any internal interference on the part of the civil authority. It jealously guarded its independence when the worldly power exchanged its attitude of hostility for one of friendship and alliance. In matters ecclesiastical ecclesiastical authority continued supreme. This was no immunity of privilege granted now for the first time as a once carried to him his sentence was final, and was executed by the secular authorities. From Sozomen's Ecclesiastical History (i. 9, p. 21, Cantab. 1720) it would appear that this privilege was granted by Constantine. It is clearly recognized by a law of Arcadius and Honorius (Cod. Justin. lib. i. tit. 4, leg. 8, tom. ii. p. 33). Valentinian III. carefully distinguishes between religious causes, in which bishops and presbyters had a prescriptive right to judge, and civil causes, in which they had no inherent right to act judicially; but he recognizes their jurisdiction in the civil causes when the free choice of the litigants has selected them in preference to the state judges (Valentin. Novell. 12, ad calc. Col. Theod.). Thus bishops were made, by virtue of their office, not only arbitrators between members of their flocks, but also magistrates before whom any that pleased might carry their suits to be by them finally and legally settled. The burden of judicial business became so heavy (see St. Augustine, Epistola xxxiii. Migne, al. 147), that it was devolved upon presbyters (St. Aug. Epist. ccxiii. Migne, al. 110), deacons (Concil. Tarracon. can. iv.; Hard. Concil. tom. ii. p. 1042, Paris, 1714), and laymen (Socrates, Hist. Eccl. vii. 37, p. 321; Oxon. 1844); whence probably there arose the existing custom of the bishops appointing lay chancellors to preside in their courts. Episcopal jurisdiction did not, however, extend to criminal causes, but was confined to civil questions and pecuniary suits. Bishops were forbidden by canon law to interfere with criminal cases (see Concil. Tarracon. can. iv.).

(2) Episcopal intercession.—In pecuniary cases bishops were magistrates, in criminal cases they were intercessors. Wherever the arbitrary will of a despotic sovereign has power over life and liberty, a right of intercession is sure to become vested in the ministers of religion, the reason being that the religious character alone invests its possessor with so much awe as to enable him to dare to resist the passionate and capricious fury of otherwise uncontrolled power. Such a right begins in the courageous act of some brave ecclesiastic, and first being recognized by custom, is afterwards confirmed by law. When, at a more advanced stage of civilisation, punishments are calmly meted out by the scales of justice, the right of intercession necessarily ceases. The propriety of the privilege is argued in two letters that passed between Macedonius and St. Augustine (Ep. ciii. ciii. Migne, al. 53, 54); the latter, in interceding with the tribune Marcellinus for the fanatics called Circumcelliones, advances very strong claims: "If you do not listen to a friend who asks, listen to a bishop who advises; though, as I am speaking to a Christian, I shall not be too bold if I say that in such a case as this you ought to listen to your bishop that lays his injunction on you, my noble lord and dear son" (Ep. cxxxiii. Migne, al. 159). He addresses the proconsul Apringius on the same occasion in the same strain (Ep. cxxxiv. Migne, al. 160). Flavian, when the people of Antioch had raised a futile rebellion against Theodosius, proceeded to Constantinople. "I am come," he said to the emperor, "as the deputy of our common Master, to address this word to your heart, 'If ye forgive men their trespasses, then will your heavenly Father also forgive you your trespasses.'" He returned with a message of pardon. Eparchius, a monk who lived in Angoulême in the 6th century, exercised so great an influence over the neighbouring magistrates that the populace rose and compelled a judge, who was about to yield to his intercession, to execute a robber that had been guilty of murder (Greg. Turon. Hist. Franc. vi. 8, p. 379; el. Migne, 1849). In the 7th century (A.D. 633) a canon of the fourth council of Toledo, repeated in the sixth council of Arles (A.D. 813), enjoins on bishops the duty of protecting the poor, repressing over-severe judges, and, if necessary, reporting to the king (Conc. Tolet. iv. can. xxxii; Conc. Arelat. vi. can. xvii; Hard. Concil. tom. iii. p. 587; tom. iv. p. 1005).

Closely connected with the privilege of intercession, were the further privileges of protection of the weak, of asylum, of censorship of the public morals; all of which, like the right of intercession, are based upon the character belonging to the minister of religion, not upon the decision of an arbitrary statute.

(3) Interference in behalf of the weak.—This practice, begun at the risk of the bishop, became sanctioned by the laws of the empire. Widows and orphans were counted the especial charge of the bishop, and their property was placed under his guardianship. St. Ambrose tells his clergy that they will do well if through their means the attacks of the powerful, which the widows and orphans cannot resist, are beaten back by the protection of the church. He warns them not to let the favour of the rich have weight with them, and reminds them how often he had himself resisted assault in behalf of the widow, and indeed of any one who required his help (De Officiis Minist. ii. 29, Op. tom. ii. p. 105). Justinian legalized the bishop's right of protection in the case of prisoners, of children stolen from their parents, of lunatics, of foundlings, of minors, of oppressed women (Cod. Justin. lib. i. tit. 4, legg. 22, 24, 27, 28, 30, 33; tom. ii. pp. 35-39). The fifth council of Orleans (A.D. 549), decreed that the archdeacon or other church officer should visit the prisons, and see that the prisoners were cared for, and further, that the bishop should provide them with food (Conc. Arelat. v. can. xx.; Hard. Concil. tom. ii. p. 1417). Gregory of Tours describes a good bishop as getting justice for the people, helping the poor, consoling the widow, and protecting the minor, as parts of his official duties (Greg. Turon. iv. 35).

(4) Sanctuary.—Out of the rights of intercession and protection there necessarily grew on the one side the right of sanctuary, on the other the right of censure. If the weak and the accused could look to the bishop for help, they naturally fled to him when help was needed; and if the bishop might advocate the cause of the accused and of the suffering, he had to make but one step to censuring the judge and the oppressor. That churches or temples should be places of asylum is founded on natural piety, not on positive law; and until law is all powerful, it is necessary that there should be such refuges from sudden fury. They existed under the Jewish and the various pagan religions, as well as under the Christian religion; and not only Christian churches, but statues of the emperor and the imperial standard originally enjoyed the privilege. We find the custom of sanctuary acknowledged and acted on in the time of St. Basil (Greg. Nazianz. Orat. xx. De Laud. Basil. Op. tom. ll. p. 353; Paris, 1630), St. Chrysostom (Op. tom. viii. p. 67, ed. Savil), Synesius (Ep. livll. Op. p. 201; Paris, 1630). Arcadius abrogated it at Eutropius' instance, A.D. 398 (Cod. Theod. lib. ix. tit. 45, leg. 3, tom. iii. p. 361); but when Eutropius had himself to claim sanctuary this abrogation was itself abolished (So- crates Hist. Eccl. vi. 5). Shortly afterwards Theodosius II. enacted a law extending the privilege of sanctuary from the interior of the church to its environs (Cod. Theod. lib. ix. tit. 45). The persons who were allowed to take sanctuary were by no means all classes of criminals, as afterwards was the case through abuse of the original right. It was intended for the defeated party in any civil affair, for slaves that were in danger of cruel treatment, for debtors, unless they were debtors to the state; in general, for the innocent, the injured, the oppressed, and any whose criminality was doubtful, and for whom intercession might seem likely to be of avail. Such persons, provided they came unarmed, had protection for thirty days. Slaves were protected, at first for one day (Cod. Theod. lib. ix. tit. 45, leg. 5), afterwards till their masters gave a promise to spare them corporal punishment (Concil. Epaemense, A.D. 517, can. xxxix; Hard. Concil. tom. ii. p. 1051); for breaking which promise the masters were liable to suspension from communion (Concil. Aurelianense v. A.D. 549, can. xxii; Hard. Concil. tom. ii. p. 1447). Ordinary criminals, as robbers and murderers, were not admitted till later times, when the privilege of asylum became incompatible with the due execution of the laws, and was abrogated with the applause of all lovers of justice and morality. Charles the Great, A.D. 779, forbid any subsistence being supplied to murderers, though by that time they had made good their right not to be directly delivered up to justice.

(5) Censorship.—The censorship vested in the clergy was partly a right founded on the fact that the church, as a religious body, took cognisance of immorality within its own body, and exacted of its members the discipline of penance; partly it was a privilege recognized by law, arising out of the privilege of intercession, and indeed forming a branch of it. The council of Arles, A.D. 314, instructed bishops to have a special oversight of such civil magistrates as were Christians, and to cut them off from the church if they acted contrary to her laws (can. vi; Hard. Concil. tom. i. p. 264). St. Basil very boldly censured so purely a political set as that of separating Cappadocia into two provinces, A.D. 371, because it threw an increased burden of taxes on the poor (Ep. cclxxxix. ad Martinianum, Op. tom. iii. p. 369; Paris, 1638). St. Gregory Nazianzen declared to rulers and governors (Βυζαντινὰ καὶ ἑξωτερικά) that the law of Christ subjected them to his tribunal (Orat. xvii. Op. tom. i. p. 271; Colon. 1690); Synesius excommunicated Andronicus, president of Lybia (Ep. livll. Op. p. 201); Orestes' hatred of Cyril of Alexandria was not only personal, but also "because the authority of the bishop took away so much from the power of the king's officers" (Sozomen, Hist. Eccl. vii. 13, p. 293).

The penance performed by Theodosius I. at the command of St. Ambrose was a conspicuous exhibition of a censorship exerted by a bishop and submitted to by an emperor (Sozom. Hist. Eccl. vii. 25, Op. p. 315; Theodoret, Hist. Eccl. v. 17, Op. p. 215; Cantab. 1720). These episcopal acts were performed on the principle that every body spiritual or political has an inherent right of exercising discipline on its own members, even to the point of excluding the refractory from its bosom. But the imperial laws were not slow in giving further rights of censorship to the clergy. We have already seen that it was the duty of the bishop to visit prisoners. The same law (A.D. 409) that imposed upon him this duty gave him also the right of admonishing the judges. Justinian required him, further, to report what he found amiss in the prison, that it might be corrected (Cod. Justin. lib. i. tit. 4, legg. 22, 23; Corp. Jur. Civ. tom. ii. p. 35). The same emperor likewise empowered bishops to uphold good morals by putting down gaming (Ibid. leg. 25); to see that justice was impartially administered (Ibid. legg. 21, 31); to resist tyranny on the part of the chief lay authorities, and to look after the administration of public property (Ibid. leg. 26).

These rights passed over from the Byzantine empire to the Western nations, and no questions were asked as to whether they were founded in positive law or in prescription. The third council of Toledo, A.D. 589, declared bishops to have, by royal command, the charge of seeing how the judges treated the people (Conc. Tolet. iii. can. xviii; Hard. Conc. tom. iii. 482). The fourth council we have already seen requires bishops to admonish judges, and to report to the king such judges as disregarded their admonition (can. xxxii.). The same charge was repeated by the sixth council of Arles, A.D. 813 (can. xvii.). It was in France that the mystical signification of the "two swords" was discovered (by Geoffrey, abbot of Vendôme, A.D. 1095), and in accordance with the principle involved in that interpretation, ecclesiastical authority was freely exerted over sovereigns. Louis le Debonnaire, Lothaire, and Charles the Bald, three Carolingian princes, were deposed by councils of the Gallican church, while king Robert, Philip I., and Philip Augustus, like Henry IV., Henry V., and Frederick II. of Germany, suffered Papal excommunication. But it was in France too that the secular authority once more revindicated its right in the memorable struggle between Philippe le Bel and Boniface VIII. at the end of the 13th century. A quarter of a century later we find a conference held before Philippe de Valois (A.D. 1329), in which the whole question of lay and spiritual jurisdiction was argued by Pierre de Cinguières on behalf of the crown, and by the archbishop of Sens and the bishop of Autun in behalf of the church, in which the king's advocate alleged sixty-six excesses of jurisdiction on the part of the ecclesiastical courts. Soon after, the Appel comme d'abus or Appellatio iniquam was instituted, which admitted appeal from an ecclesiastical court to the next civil authority whenever it could be pleaded that the ecclesiastical judge had exceeded his powers or encroached upon temporal jurisdiction. At the council of Trent this right was assailed, but through the influence of the ambassadors of Charles IX. it was maintained, and it continues still in vigour.

II. PECUNIARY. 1. Immunities allowed. (1) Census Caputum or Poll Tax.—The clergy, their wives, children, and servants were exempted by Constantius from paying the poll-tax, which was levied on all citizens between the ages of 14 and 65, except such as were granted immunity (Cod. Theod. lib. xvi. tit. 2, legg. 10, 14). This was a favour shared by the clergy with the members of other liberal professions. Valentinian exempts the higher class of painters (Picturae professores, si modo inveniuntur) from the incidence of the tax (Cod. Theod. lib. xiii. tit. 4, leg. 4). This immunity is alluded to and pleaded by Gregory Nazianzen (Ep. clix. ad Amphilochem, Op. tom. i. p. 873) and by St. Basil (Ep. cclxxx. ad Molestum, Op. tom. iii. p. 272).

(2) Eporum comitorum advocatis or Soldiers' horses tax; Aurum tinicum or Recruit tax.—The clergy had to pay their property tax (census agrorum) and all burdens on land like other owners and occupiers, but they appear to have been exempted from any local taxation that might be imposed for the supply of horses for the army, or as a substitute for recruits. High-priests of the old pagan religions seem to have shared this immunity (Cod. Theod. lib. vii. tit. 13, leg. 22; cum Gothofredi comment.).

(3) Trading-tax called Cursumyrum from being paid in gold and silver, and Iustralis volatio because collected at the end of each Istrum. The inferior clergy were permitted to trade without paying this tax, provided their operations were confined within moderate bounds (Cod. Theod. lib. xiii. tit. 1, leg. 1, 11; lib. xvi. tit. 2, legg. 8, 10, 16, 36). This immunity was abused, and clerics were forbidden to trade by Valentinian (Cod. Theod. lib. xiii. tit. 1, leg. 16; Valentinian Novell. 12 ad calc. Cod. Theod.). The tax was abolished by Anastasius (Evagrius, Hist. Eccl. iii. 39; Op. p. 371; Cantab. 1720).

(4) Melatum or Entertainment-money.—The clergy were not compelled to receive the emperor, the judges, or soldiers on their circuits or travels. This immunity their houses shared with those of senators, Jewish synagogues, and places of worship (Cod. Theod. lib. xvi. tit. 2, leg. 8).

(5) Superindicta or Extraordinary taxes.—The clergy were exempted from these by Constantius (Cod. Theod. lib. xvi. tit. 2, leg. 8), by Honorius and Theodosius Junior (ibid. leg. 40), and by Justinian (Justin. Novell. cxxxi. c. 5).

(6) Ad instructions reparatimesque itinerum et pontium or Highway rate.—By a law of Honorius and Theodosius Junior, A.D. 412, church lands were exempted from paying the road-tax; but this exemption was withdrawn A.D. 423 by Theodosius Junior and by Valentinian III., and it was not regranted.

(7) Census publicus, angariae, parangariae, translatio, erectio, or Conveyance-burden.—Constantius exempted the clergy from the burden of having to convey corn and other things for the soldiers and imperial officers (Cod. Theod. lib. xvi. tit. 2, leg. 10), but in the last year of his reign, A.D. 360, he revoked the concession. The immunity was restored A.D. 382, and confirmed by Honorius A.D. 412 (Cod. Theod. lib. ii. tit. 16, leg. 15; lib. xvi. tit. 2, leg. 46), but again revoked by Theodosius Junior and Valentinian, A.D. 440.

(8) Descriptio lucratorum, denarismus, unciæ or Municipal tax.—If the property of a member of a town-council (curia) passed by will to any one that was not a member of the curia, the new owner had to pay a tax to the curia amounting to the sum previously paid by the curialis. But if the property passed to the church, it was enacted by Justinian that the tax could not be demanded (Cod. Justin. lib. i. tit. 2, leg. 22; Novell. cxxxi. c. 5).

2. Pecuniary Privileges. (1) Levities.—By a law of Constantine (Cod. Theod. lib. xvi. tit. 2, leg. 4) it was enacted that goods might be bequeathed to the church, no distinction being made between real and personal property. This law was confirmed by Justinian (Cod. Justin. lib. i. tit. 2, leg. 13). Moneys or estates left to the church were administered by the bishop for the general welfare.

(2) Inheritance.—Constantine settled the property of confessors and martyrs dying intestate and without near relatives, on the church (Euseb. vit. Constant. ii. 36; Op. p. 461; Paris. 1659). Theodosius Junior and Valentinian extended the provision, so as to embrace the case not only of martyrs and confessors, but of all clergymen, monks, and nuns (Cod. Theod. lib. v. tit. 3, leg. 1; Cod. Justin. lib. i. tit. 3, leg. 20).

(3) Forfeiture.—Justinian enacted that the property of clergymen or monks leaving the clerical or monastic life should be forfeited to the church or monastery with which they had been connected (Cod. Justin. lib. i. tit. 3, leg. 55).

(4) Confiscation.—By laws of Honorius and Gratian some of the property which had belonged to the heathen temples (Cod. Theod. lib. xvi. tit. 10, leg. 20) and that which was owned by heretics (ibid. tit. 5, leg. 52) was confiscated to the use of the church.

(5) Imperial largess.—Occasionally large sums were bestowed by the emperors for the support of the clergy. Thus Constantius desired his African Receiver, Ursus, to pay over a vast sum (πρωχρηματος δολαρις) to Caeleian, bishop of Carthage, for him to divide among the clergy of Africa Mauritania and Numidia, and enabled him to draw for more (Euseb. Hist. Eccl. x. 6, p. 722, ed. Burton). On the occasion of an oecumenical council being summoned, the emperor bore the travelling expenses of the bishops.

(6) State allowance.—Constantine passed a law requiring the prefects of each province to make an annual grant of corn to the clergy out of the revenues of the province (Theodoret, Hist. Eccl. i. 11; Sozomen, Hist. Eccl. v. 5). This allowance was discontinued when Julian occupied the throne, but it was restored on a limited scale after Julian's death. It is recognized by a law of Justinian (Cod. Justin. lib. i. tit. 2, leg. 12).

Tithes are not to be added to this list, as they did not originate in a state grant, but in the voluntary liberality of individuals, grounded partly on a belief that tithes were due by divine right (see St. Hieron. Com. in Mat. iii. Op. tom. iii. p. 1829, ed. Ben. Paris, 1704; St. Aug. Enar. in Psal. cxlvi. 8; Op. tom. iv. p. 1911, ed. Migne), partly on the evident need of some such provision for the maintenance of the ministers of religion in modest independence. They became general in the 4th century, not as a legal impost but as a voluntary gift (see St. Chrysost. Hom. iv. in Ephes. s. f.; Op. tom. iii. p. 781). They leges. (1) Lejacies.—By a Cod. Theod. lib. xvi. tit. 2, it is said that goods might be bequeathed, no distinction being made between personal property. This law was enacted by Cod. Justin. lib. i. tit. 2, § 1, estates left to the church by the bishop for the general Constantine settled the private property of the martyrs dying intestate, and their relatives, on the church (Eccl. i. 36; Op. p. 461; Paris, Junior and Valentinian expressed their case as to embrace the confessors, but of all and nuns (Cod. Theod. lib. v. Justin. lib. i. tit. 3, leg. 20). Justinian enacted that the men or monks leaving the life should be forfeited to the monastery with which they had been connected (Justin. lib. i. tit. 3, leg. 55). By laws of Honorius and Proterius property which had belonged to heretics (Cod. Theod. lib. xvi. tit. 1, § 1, which was owned by heretics was confiscated to the use of the emperor. Occasionally large sums were granted to the emperors for the support of the church. Constantine desired his subjects to pay over a vast sum of money to Caecilian, bishop of Carthage, to divide among the clergy of that city and Numidia, and enabled him to do so (Euseb. Hist. Eccl. x. 6, § 1).

On the occasion of a synod being summoned, the emperors were obliged to defray the expenses of the bishops. Constantine passed a law that each province to make contributions to the clergy out of the province (Theodoret. Hist. Eccl. v. 5). This allowance was granted when Julian occupied the throne, but on a limited scale after Constantine is recognized by a law of Justinian. lib. i. tit. 2, leg. 12).

It is added to this list, as they were granted in a state grant, but in the case of individuals, grounded that tithes were due by divine right. Com. in Mat. iii. Op. tom. i. Paris, 1704; St. Aug. Enarr. Op. tom. iv. p. 191, ed. 1704. The evident need of some such maintenance of the ministers of the church at independence. They became dependent, not as a legal imposition, but as a legal imposition (see St. Chrysostom. Hom. iv. Op. tom. iii. p. 784). They were made compulsory by Charles the Great, A.D. 778 (see Selden, History of Tithes, Works, vol. iii. pt. 2, p. 1149).

III. OFFICIAL AND SOCIAL. 1. Immunities.—Public offices not bringing with them their own salary and emoluments were looked upon, though honourable in themselves, as burdens, like the office of high-sheriff of a county among ourselves. Constantine, on embracing Christianity, exempted the clergy from the burden of hearing any offices whatsoever (Euseb. Hist. Eccl. x. 7, vol. ii. p. 724; Cod. Theod. lib. xvi. tit. 2, leg. 1, 2, 7). This concession applied to all offices, whether personal (personalia munera) or praedial, i.e. attached to property, whether honourable (honores or curialia munera) or mean (sordida munera). No change was made by subsequent laws in respect to personal burdens or menial offices, but the experience of Constantine taught him to restrain his first liberality as to the burdens belonging to property. For it was found that immunity from bearing office was counted so great a boon that men of wealth, who had no purpose of undertaking the ministry of the Church, solicited and obtained minor ecclesiastical posts solely with the fraudulent purpose of exempting their estates from the services to which they were liable. Constantine therefore enacted that no one qualified by his estate to bear public offices should be allowed "to fly to the clerical name and ministry, and that any who had done so with a view to declining the public burdens should nevertheless be compelled to bear them" (Cod. Theod. lib. xvi. tit. 2, leg. 3). Succeeding emperors modified these laws of Constantine in a manner sometimes more sometimes less favourable to the clergy, the general tendency of the legislation being to exempt the estates of the church from civil burdens, but to preserve the liability of the private property of the clergy—a liability which they had to fulfil either by finding substitutes to perform the necessary duties, or by parting with a portion at least of their lands (Cod. Theod. lib. xii. tit. 1, leg. 49, 59, 99, 121, 123, 163; lib. xvi. tit. 2, leg. 19, 21).

Official and Social Privileges. (1) Free election.—In the midst of the despotism of the empire the clergy and laity maintained their old right of electing, and the clergy their right of being elected, to the office and dignity of bishop. "These absolute monarchs respected the freedom of ecclesiastical elections; and while they distributed and resumed the honours of the state and army they allowed eighteen hundred perpetual magistrates to receive their important offices from the free suffrages of the people" (Gibbon. Decline and Fall, c. xx.). By degrees this right has been taken away in almost all parts of the church, partly on the plea that the civil magistrate represents the laity, partly on the allegation that endowments and civil privileges had been granted by the state, sometimes because it was considered that the security of the state required such a precaution, sometimes from apprehension of the evil consequences expected to arise out of the excitement of free elections, sometimes owing to corrupt agreements, termed concordats, made between the bishop of Rome assuming to represent ecclesiastical interests and the king or emperor of a particular country, representing the civil power.

(2) Authority of the higher over the lower clergy.—The position of the bishops of the larger sees was made one of great dignity and importance by the subjection of the clergy and ecclesiastics of all classes to their uncontrolled authority; and this was not restrained by any interference on the part of the state. The bishop of Constantinople presided as lord over 60 presbyters, 100 deacons, 40 deaconesses, 90 sub-deacons, 110 readers, 25 chanters, 100 doorkeepers (Justin. Novel. cill.), and a guild of 1100 coepitæ or gravediggers. The clergy, under the immediate control of the bishop of Carthage, were upwards of 500. The metropolitani alone, at Alexandria, amounted to 600. All these were allowed by the law as well as by custom to form in each central city a society which recognized the bishop as its head with a devotion which was not equalled by the retainers of any civil officer. Beyond this immediate circle of adherents a less defined authority was vested in the metropolitan, extending over all his suffragan bishops.

(3) Rights of meeting and speech.—Twice every year each metropolitan was commanded by the canons, and permitted by the laws, to call together the synod of his province; occasionally the emperor assembled the synod of the empire. At these meetings, as well as in the pulpit, free speech was allowed by the laws, the doctrine and discipline of the church were regulated, ecclesiastical sympathies were strengthened, and the power of the clergy, by being concentrated, was increased.

(4) Titens of respect.—It was the custom for the laity, not excluding the emperor, to bow the head to the bishop and to kiss his hand (see instances given in Valesius' note on Theodoret. Hist. Eccl. iv. 6, p. 153, Cantab. 1720; and Savaro's note on Sidonius Apollinaris, viii. 11, p. 532, Paris, 1609). It was usual to address the bishop by the title of God-beloved or Most holy (θεοφιλέστατος, ἀγιότατος), and by still stronger terms of honour, as "Holy Lord and Most Blessed Pope"—words commonly used by St. Jerome in writing to St. Augustine. "Per coronam" was a common form of beseeching a bishop (see St. Aug. Ep. xxxiii. al. 157, tom. ii. p. 131, ed. Migne; Sidon. Apollinaris, cum comment. Savan. vii. 8, p. 440). Its meaning is doubtful, but it is probably equivalent to the phrase "your honour" (see Bingham. Antiquities, ii. 9, 4). Occasionally Hosannahs were sung before bishops and others eminent for sanctity, but this practice is condemned by St. Jerome as savouring of profanity and presumption (St. Hieron. in Matt. xxi. 15; Op. tom. iv. p. 98). The bishop's seat in his cathedral was called his throne.

There is no doubt that the position of the chief bishops was one of great dignity, authority, wealth, and power. Gibbon calculates that the average income of a bishop amounted to 6000 l. a-year (chap. xx.). This does not give an accurate idea of the status held by them, as the value of money is constantly changing, and averages are always deceptive. We may regard the bishops of the chief cities of the empire as maintaining a state superior to that of the imperial officers and lay nobles, while the bishops of lesser sees were comparatively poor and obscure men, though enjoying a spiritual equality with their more prominent brethren. The simple presbyter's position was a humble one at a time when bishops were comparatively more numerous than now and parochial endowments did not exist: the deacon was regarded as little else than one of the bishop's attendants.

We may note in conclusion how little remains of all the privileges and immunities granted to the clergy by the fervour of the first fifth of a converted world. Their judicial privileges and immunities exist no longer, except so far as the coercive power of the bishop's court be regarded as a shadow of them, though once they were considered important enough to lead an archbishop Becket to enter upon a life-and-death struggle with a Henry II. for their maintenance. Their pecuniary privileges and immunities exist no longer, for the grant made in some countries to the clergy from the national exchequer is rather a substitute for estates confiscated than a free gift of love. Their official privileges and immunities exist no longer, unless the permission conceded to bishops to take part in national legislation, and the exemption of the clergy from having to serve in the army or on juries, be regarded as the equivalents of the honours and immunities bestowed by the Caesars with so ungrudging a hand. The apparent tendency of modern legislation, still affected by a reaction from mediæval assumptions, is to approve not only of the civil power resuming the privileges that it had bestowed, but of its transferring to itself those powers of self-government in respect to doctrine and discipline, which were not granted to the church as a favour, but were confirmed to her by Constantine and his successors as hers by prescription and inherent right.

IMPLUVIUM seems to be sometimes used to designate the ATRIUM, or court outside the door of a church, in which there was generally a basin or some vessel for performing ablutions [FOUNTAIN; HOLY WATER] (Bingham's Antiq. VIII. iii. 5). [C.]

IMPOSITION OF HANDS (Manus impositio, χειρῶν ἐπιθεσις, χειροθεσία, χειροπορία). [Χειροπορία originally signified election, per suffragia manuum extensione data. An election by the people always in the early church preceded consecration, so that it is not surprising that χειροπορία soon came to signify the whole process of making a bishop, of which it properly denoted only the first stage (Suicer, Thesaurus, s. v.).

The origin of this rite is to be looked for in patriarchal times, when it seems to have been a form simply of solemn benediction. Thus Jacob, when blessing Ephraim and Manasseh on his death-bed, laid his hands upon them (Gen. xlviii. 14). The high priest employed practically the same gesture as a part of the public ritual (Lev. ix. 22, 23). So the Lord Himself blessed children (Mark x. 16).

It became also a form of setting apart or designation to important offices, as well secular as religious, e. g., in the case of Joshua (Num. xxvii. 18-23; Deut. xxiv. 9). And in connection with the consecration of priests (Lev. viii. 22). Jewish Rabbis were set apart by imposition of hands until comparatively modern times. We pass over the use of this ceremony in the Levitical sacrifices, and also in oaths, as having no Christian equivalent. Though this latter somewhat resembles the custom of swearing with the hand laid upon relics, and upon the volume of the gospels even to modern times.

In the New Testament, we find the laying on of hands used by our Lord both in blessing and in healing; and again He promises to His disciples that they too should lay hands on the sick and they should recover. The apostles laid their hands as the outward sign of the bestowal of the Holy Spirit, both on ordinary Christians after baptism (Acts viii. 17; xix. 6), and on those set apart for a special office (Acts xiii. 3; and probably I Tim. iv. 14; and 2 Tim. i. 6); at the time when the Epistle to the Hebrews was written, the doctrine of the "laying on of hands" was one of the elements of Christian teaching (Heb. vi. 1). [DICTIONARY OF THE BIBLE, vol. iii. p. xcv.]

The imposition of hands is used in the following ceremonies:—

1. In Ordinations to the higher Orders. The 4th council of Carthage had canons directing imposition of hands in the ordination of a bishop, priest, or deacon (canon. 2, 3, 4). But another form was provided for the subdeacon, "quia manuum impositionem non accipit." Similarly for the other minor orders (cc. 5-10). See also Constit. Apost. lib. viii. c. 16. These were ἀχειροτονῆτος ὑπερελά, an inferior ministry, and the holders insacratii ministri. They were not allowed to enter the diakonion, nor handle the vasa Dominica or sacred vessels (Conc. Ancyen. c. 66; Basil. Ep. Canon. c. 51; Bingham, iii. 1). "Manus impositio docet, eos qui sacris ordinibus mancipantur, sacras omnes actiones, quasi sub Deo efficere, utpote quem habent operationum suarum in omnibus ducent ac rectorem" (Pseudo-Dionysius, De Eccles. Hierarch. c. 5, par. 3). "Hæc manuum impositio significatur illapsus Spiritus Sancti, quem ordianus precatur dari ordinando: ejusque regimen, directio et protectio, ut scilicet Spiritus Sanctus ordinandum quasi manu sua regat et dirigat" (Amalarius de Eccles. Offic. lib. i. c. 12).

Deaconesses also received the impositio manuum; and their ordination is expressly called both χειροπορία and χειροθεσία in the 15th canon of Chalcedon. [ORDINATION.] [S. J. E.]

2. In the restitution of holy orders, as in the original conferring, the imposition of the hands of the archbishop formed an essential portion of the rite (Martene, Rit. Ant. III. ii.).

3. In baptism the laying-on of hands, with unction, followed in the most ancient times imperatively upon the washing of water [BAPTISM, § 13, p. 157]; nor was the custom obsolete in the West in the 13th century (Martene, R. A. L. ii. 1 § 3), while in the East it is practised still. This is however to be understood, in the West at least, to refer to baptism at which the bishop himself was present, as was generally the case when baptism took place—except in cases of extremity—only at

to a form of setting apart of important offices, as well secular, in the case of Joshua (Num. Deut. xxiv. 9). And in consequence of consecration of priests (Lev. x. 6) hands were set apart by wash hands but comparatively modern over the use of this ceremony sacrifices, and also in oaths, as than equivalent. Though this resembles the custom of swearing and laid upon relics, and upon the gospels even to modern times, we find the laying on of our Lord both in blessing and again He promises to His disciples should lay hands on the sick recover. The apostles laid their outward sign of the bestowal of , both on ordinary Christians Acts viii. 17; x. 6, and on for a special office (Acts xiii. 3; Tim. iv. 14; and 2 Tim. i. 6); on the Epistle to the Hebrews doctrine of the "laying on of the elements of Christian vi. 1). Similar minor orders (cc. 5-10). See ost. lib. viii. c. 16. These were in episcopal, in inferior ministry, in insacrat ministr. They were enter the diaconico, nor handle of sacred vessels (Conc. the laying-on of hands, with mo- the most ancient times immo- lishing of water [BAPTISM, § 13, as the custom obsolete in the West ury (Martene, R. A. I. ii. 1 § 3), t it is practised still. This is how- erstood, in the West at least, to as at which the bishop himself was generally the case when baptism ept in cases of extremity—only at certain solemn seasons. When baptism was frequently celebrated in the absence of a bishop, while the laying-on of hands and chrismation on the forehead was a privilege of the episcopal order (R. A. I. ii. 3, § 2), the custom arose of the baptized being presented to the bishop at some convenient season separate from that of baptism. [CONFIRMATION.] The Arabic bishops, called Nicene (c. 55), desire the clove-scorpion in his circuits to cause the boys and girls to be brought to him, that he may sign them with the cross, pray over them, lay his hands upon them, and bless them. Bede tells us that Cuthbert used to journey through his diocese, laying his hands upon those who had been baptized, that they might receive the Holy ghost (Vita Cuthberti, c. 29, in Migne's Patrol. xiv. 799 D) Ancient authorities, however, give at least as great prominence to the chrismation on the forehead which was reserved for the bishop, as to the laying-on of hands. See on the whole subject Martene, De lit. Ant. lib. i. c. ii.; Binterim, Denkwürdigkeiten, vol. 1, pt. 1, p. 206 ff.

4. In the reception of a heretic into the church, whose baptism was recognised as valid, imposition of hands was the form of conferring those gifts of the Holy Spirit which he could not have received in a heretical community [CONFIRMATION, p. 425; HERESY, p. 768].

5. In benedictions the laying-on of hands is constantly used; as, in the benediction of an abbat (R. A. II. l. 3); of a virgin dedicated to a religious life (ib. II. iv. 16); of a king (ib. II. x.), as when St. Columba, who was an abbat and not a bishop, laid his hands on the head of Aidan and consecrated him as king (Cumineus Albus, Vita S. Columbae c. 5, in Acta SS. Bened. sæc. 1).

6. In the visitation of the sick the priest and the faithful who are with him are directed to lay hands on the sick (Martene, R. A. I. vii. 4, Ordd. 4, 5, 14, etc.) with the prayer that the Lord would vouchsafe to visit and relieve His servant.

7. In absolution the laying-on of hands accompanied the prayer for the remission of the sins of the penitent (Martene, R. A. I. vi. 3, Ordd. 3, 9, etc.) [C.]

IMPOTENT MAN, CURE OF. Guénauld mentions (s. v. "Boiteux," p. 164) a fine bas-relief of the cure of the lame man at the gate of the Temple, with apparent reference to Acts iii. 2, as published in Monumenta cryptarum Vaticani, Angulus de Gabrielis, fol. pl. lxxix. no. 3. Notice of the universally-treated subject of the healing of the paralytic man will be found under the heading PARALYTIC. [R. St. J. T.]

IMPRISONMENT OF THE CLERGY.

Seclusion of criminal clerks, generally in a monastery, appears to have been resorted to as a disciplinary measure as early as the 6th century. Justinian (Novellæ, cxliii. c. 20) orders "that if any presbyter or deacon were convicted of giving false evidence in a civil case, he should be suspended from his function and confined to a monastery for three years." Laymen were scourged for this crime. So the 2nd council at Seville (can. 3), in the case of vagrant clergy: "Desertorum tamen clericum, cingulo honoris atque ordinationis suae exutum, aliquo tempore monasterio relegari convenit:

sicque postea in ministerio ecclesiastico ordines revocari." A similar canon directing deposition upon clerks guilty of certain crimes, passed at the council of Agde (c. 1). A distinction was drawn by the inferior clergy (junior) and the higher orders (honorary). The former were to receive forty stripes, save one, whilst the latter were imprisoned thirty days for the same offence (Conc. Matisson. l. can. 8). Pope Gregory the Great seems to have laid down (Epp. vii. 50) an intelligible principle: that such crimes as were by the Mosaic law punished with death, when committed by clerics, incurred the penalty of deposition without hope of restoration (desperationem sacramini dignitatum). To those he added some others, fornication, adultery, and such like; all these incurred excommunication. Other offences were expiated by penitence in a monastery for a longer or shorter time (Thomassin, Vet. et Nova Eccl. Disc. tom. ii. lib. i. c. 59). Individuals would sometimes segregate themselves of their own accord to expiate some fault. The same Gregory praises (Epp. vii. 12) Saturninus, bishop of Jadera (= Zara), in Dalmatia, for so doing in order to atone for communicating with the excommunicated archbishop of Salona (ib. c. 59). Joannes Defensor, whom Gregory had sent into Spain to execute a sentence of six months' relegation to a monastery upon a certain bishop who had driven an unwilling neighbour from his see, pronounced the sentence far too lenient. The same punishment was inflicted upon certain bishops who had condemned an innocent person. When Gregory imprisoned clerics he was in the habit of making an annual payment for their maintenance to the monastery that received them (Thomassin, u. s. III. lib. ii. c. 29), but whether derived from the offender's beneficence, or the property of the pope himself, does not appear. The tendency was perhaps to bear more lightly on crimes of the kind mentioned above; but incontinence was always heavily punished. Hincmar, and after him Flodard, tell the story of Gueball, bishop of Laudunum (Laon), who for a crime of this kind was condemned to seven years' penitence, and even put into fetters by his metropolitan, Remigius, bishop of Rheims (Hincmar, Vita S. Remigii.). And for capital crimes the incarceration was for life, and included a sentence of perpetual lay-communion (Conc. Epawn. can. 22).

But during the reign of Charlemagne a somewhat milder rule prevailed. Hincmar, and also Rabanus, archbishop of Mentz, were inclined to distinguish between secret crimes, and those which caused open scandal, and to treat the former more leniently upon confession and repentance. Probably the general declension of morals at that period forced them to make some abatement from the rigid rules of a purer age. Accordingly, canonical punishments were generally lightened from this time (Thomassin, u. s. tom. ii. lib. i. c. 60; Bingham, bk. xvii. c. 4).

assignment of them to a college or other corporation, some of whose members are in orders. The practice seems to have sprung up only about the beginning of the 9th century.

Very soon after the payment of TITHES (see the article) became general, the alienation of them by the laity began. Thus a council at Ingelheim (A.D. 948) in its 8th canon protests against this new form of robbery: "Ut oblationes fidelium, quatenus altari deferantur, nihil omnino ad laicalem potestatem, dicente Scriptura, 'Qui altari serviunt, de altario participantur.'" (So Thomassin, Vet. et Nova Eccl. Discip. III. lib. i. c. 7, n. 8), who interprets this canon as referring to tithes. Louis IV. of France, and the emperor Otho, were present at this council. To the same effect a council of Metz in its 2nd canon, quoting Mal. iii. 8-10. It was not uncommon for the lay lords to seize the opportunity of the vacancy of a bishopric or a parish, to make these depredations (Vid. Thomassin, tom. iii. lib. ii. c. 53, for instances of this). And we find even that the monks of St. Denis had got possession of some tithes (it does not appear how) and wanted to sell them. This seems to be a distinct case of appropriation, and we learn the facts from a letter to them of Hincmar of Rheims, who protests against their selling what they ought to restore to the parish priest.

But any instances we find in these times are exceptional, and apparently the result of violent and illegal seizure by laymen of ecclesiastical dues. As Thomassin observes: "Necdum tunc in mentem quidquam venisse de decimis infeudatis. Involuerant decimas Laici, necdum pacifice possidebant, necdum obducere poterant huic rapinae vel eorum legitima possessionis. Quin identidem commonebantur profanal deprædatores, ut ecclesie restituerent, quae jure retineri non possent" (tom. iii. lib. i. c. 7).

It is in the next and succeeding ages that we must look for impropriation as a legally recognised condition of ecclesiastical property.

IN PACE. [INSCRIPTIONS, p. 854 ff.]

INCENSE. There is no trace of the use of incense in Christian worship during the first four centuries. On the contrary, we meet with many statements in the writings of the early fathers which cannot be reconciled with the existence of such a custom. Thus Athenagoras, A.D. 177:—"The Creator and Father of the universe does not require blood nor smoke, nor the sweet smell of flowers and incense" (Legatio, § 13). Tertullian, A.D. 198, comparing certain Christian customs with heathen, says, "It is true, we buy no frankincense; if the Arabians complain of this, the Sabæans will testify that more of their merchandise, and that more costly, is lavished on the burials of Christians, than in burning incense to the gods" (Apol. c. xlii.). "I offer Him a rich sacrifice . . . not one pennyworth of the grains of frankincense," &c. (ib. c. xxx.). Clement of Alexandria, A.D. 192, contrasting the reasonable service of Christians with that of the heathen says, that "the truly holy altar is the just soul, and the perfume from it holy prayer" (Strom. lib. vii. c. vi. § 32). "If then they should say that the great High Priest, the Lord, offers to God the incensa (θυμία) of sweet smell, let them not suppose that the Lord offers this sacrifice and sweet smell of incense, but let them understand that He offers on the altar the acceptable gift of charity and spiritual perfume" (Iacoby, lib. ii. c. 8, § 57). Arnobius, A.D. 298, says of the use of frankincense among the heathen, "It is almost a new thing, nor is the term of years impossible to be traced since the knowledge of it flowed into these parts . . . But it in the olden times neither men nor gods sought after the matter of this frankincense, it is proved that it is vainly and to no purpose offered now" (Adv. Gentes, lib. vii.). Lactantius, A.D. 303:—"It follows that I show what is the true sacrifice of God . . . lest any one should think that either victims, or odours, or precious gifts are desired by God . . . This is the true sacrifice, not that which is brought out of a chest, but that which is brought out of the heart" (Divin. Instit. Epit. c. 2). He also quotes with approbation a saying of the Neo-Platonists, that "frankincense and other perfumes ought not to be offered at the sacrifice of God" (Divin. Instit. lib. vi. § 25). St. Augustine, 396:—"We go not into Arabia to seek for frankincense, nor do we ransack the packs of the greedy trader. God requires of us the sacrifice of praise" (Enarr. in Ps. xlix. § 21). The above are brief extracts from passages, often of considerable length, all bearing on the subject; and not a single author makes the least allusion to any Christian rite of incense, or any reservation from which we could infer that such a rite existed. Their language precludes the supposition.

It is probable, however, that incense was very early employed in Christian places of worship as a supposed disinfectant, and to counteract unpleasant smells; and that this was the origin of that ritual use of it, which began in the 6th or possibly the 5th century. Tertullian, who, as we have seen, denies by implication the ritual use, yet says, "If the smell of any place offend me, I burn something of Arabia; but not," he adds, "with the same rite, nor the same dress, nor the same appliance, with which it is done before idols" (De Cur. Mil. c. 10). The following is a benediction of Incense, used in the days of Charlemagne and later, in which no other object than that which Tertullian had in burning it is recognized:—"May the Lord bless this incense to the extinction of every noxious stench, and kindle it to the odour of its sweetness" (Martene, De Eccl. Ant. Rit. lib. i. c. 4, Art. 12, ord. 5, 6). There is no mention of incense in the so-called liturgy of St. Clement, which is supposed to represent the offices of the 4th century; nor indeed in the Apostolical Constitutions with which it is incorporated. Pseudo-Dionysius (probably about 520, but possibly somewhat earlier) is the first who testifies to its use in religious ceremonial:—"The chief priest (bishop) having made an end of sacred prayer at the divine altar, begins the censuring with it, and goes over the whole circuit of the sacred place" (Hierarch. Eccl. c. lii. sect. 2; comp. sect. 3, § 3). A thurible of gold is said by Evagrius to have been sent by a king of Persia to a church in Antioch about 584 (Hist. Eccl. lib. vi. c. 21). The most ancient Ordo Romanus, which Cave supposes to have been compiled about 730, and which may belong to the 7th century, orders that in pontifical masses a subdeacon, bearing a golden censet, suppose that the Lord offers sweet smell of incense, but let that He offers on the altar the charity and spiritual perfume" (8, § 67). Anolinus, A.D. 298, frankincense among the heathen a new thing, nor is the term to be traced since the knowledge into these parts. . . . But it neither man nor gods sought of this frankincense, it is proved not to no purpose offered now" (vii.). Lactantius, A.D. 303:—

show what is the true sacrifice any one should think that odours, or precious gifts are . . . This is the true sacrifice, brought out of a chest, but light out of the heart" (Divin.)

He also quotes with approval of the Neo-Platonists, that of other perfumes ought not to be sacrifice of God" (Divin. Instit. t. Augustine, 396:— "We go to seek for frankincense, nor do we seek of the greedy trader. God sacrifice of praise" (Evang.) The above are brief extracts ten of considerable length, all object; and not a single author allusion to any Christian rite of servation from which we could rite existed. Their language position.

however, that incense was very Christian places of worship as actant, and to counteract unpleasant that this was the origin of that which began in the 6th or possibly. Tertullian, who, as we have mention the ritual use, yet says, "any place offend me, I burn incense; but not," he adds, "with the same dress, nor the same which it is done before idols" (10). The following is a benediction, used in the days of Charlemagne in which no other object than incense in burning it is referred to by the Lord bless this incense to every noxious stench, and kindle of its sweetness" (Martene, De lib. i. c. 4, Art. 12, ordl. 5, 6). The use of incense in the so-called ment, which is supposed to be of the 4th century; not in the Constitutio with which shall go before the bishop (of Rome) as he leaves the secretarium for the choir, and two with censers before the deacon gospeller as he proceeds with the gospel to the ambo (§§ 7, 11, in Musae. Ital. tom. ii.). These rules are also given in the next revision of the Ordo, which may be a century later (§§ 4, 8). This latter document says also, "After the gospel has been read . . . the thuribles are carried about the altar, and afterwards taken to the nostrils of persons (hominum), and the smoke is drawn up towards the face by the hand" (§ 9). This probably originated in its earlier natural use as a means of sweetening and (as they thought) purifying the air; but we see in it the probable origin of the strictly ritual censuring of persons in the West. In the same Ordo, which was certainly in use before Analarus wrote (about 827), is a direction that after the oblates and the chalice have been set on the altar, with a view to their consecration, "the incense be put on the altar" (§ 9). Here we have the probable germ of the later "censing of the gifts." It is probable, however, that such ritual practices were for some time confined to Rome. We do not observe any reference to the use of incense in the Gallican Liturgies which were in use down to the time of Charlemagne, nor is it mentioned by Germanus of Paris, A.D. 555, in his explanation of liturgical rites (Martene, u. s. ord. 1), nor by Isidore of Seville, A.D. 610, in his book on the offices of the church. We may also infer its rarity within our period, and the little importance attached to it throughout the 9th century, from the fact that it is not mentioned by Florus of Lyons, Rabanus of Meatz, or Walafrid of Reichenau, in works largely devoted to questions of ritual.

The so-called Missæ Mlyricæ (Martene, u. s. ord. 4) preserves the Scriptural symbolism by directing the priest to say, when the incense is burnt, "Let my prayer be set forth in Thy sight as the incense" (Ps. cxli. 2). But in the same and later ordines [ORDO] it represents divine influence on the soul, according to the following explanation of Amalarus:—"The thrub denotes the body of Christ in which is fire, to wit, the Holy Spirit, from whom proceeds a good odour, which every one of the elect wishes to snatch towards himself. The same odour is a token that virtue (bonam operationem) goes forth out of Christ, which he who wishes to live passes into his own heart" (De Eccles. offic. lib. iii. c. 18). The reader will observe the allusion to the mode of inhaling the smoke above described.

This notice would be imperfect without a reference to certain passages from early writers, which have led some to suppose that notwithstanding the authorities above cited, the ritual use of incense was known in the Christian church from the beginning. As the earliest testimony we often see alleged the third apostolical canon, which forbids that "beside honey and milk, and new ears of corn and bunches of grapes in their season [see FRUITS, OFFERING OF], anything else shall be offered on the altar, at the time of the holy oblation, than oil for the lamp and incense" (Bever. Pandect. tom. i. p. 2). The Arabic paraphrase has more generally, "in the time of the oblations and prayers" (ib. tom. ii.; Annot. p. 16). It will be seen that this canon does not mention the ritual use of incense, nor can it be shown that the incense mentioned was designed for such use. It was without doubt often used as a perfume, and in the caves and catacombs in which the first Christians often worshipped, and in which their dead were frequently buried, would sometimes be thought almost as necessary as the lamp-oil, on behalf of which a similar exception was made. We must add too that the whole of the clause above cited looks like a late addition to the very simple code which is assigned, with probability, to the middle of the 3rd century, though the first mention of it occurs in 394 (Tillemont, Mem. Eccl. tom. ii. p. 76). Pseudo-Hippolytus, alleged as the bishop of Portus, 220, but in reality some centuries later:—"The churches lament, with a great lamentation, because neither the oblation nor (the rite of) incense is celebrated" (De Constant. Mundi. c. 34). Here we have nothing more than an imagery borrowed from well known rites of the Mosaic law. The language was probably suggested by that of the following passage in St. Basil, 370, which has been brought forward with the same object:—"The houses of prayer were cast down by unholly hands, the altars were overthrown, and there was no oblation nor incense, no place of sacrifice, but fearful sorrow, as a cloud, was over all" (In Gordium Mart. Hom. xix.). St. Basil here is merely in part citing and partly paraphrasing, with reference to the church under persecution, what Azarias in the Song of the Three Children says of the state of Jerusalem during the captivity (Sept. Vers. v. 14). St. Ambrose says, with reference to the appearance of the angel to Zacharias "on the right side of the altar of incense" (St. Luke i. 11), "Would that an angel might stand by us also as we burn (or rather heap, nolescentibus) the altars" (Expos. Evang. s. Luc. lib. i. § 28). Incense is not mentioned here, and "adolere" does not necessarily imply the use of fire, so that no allusion to incense may have been intended. It is probable, however, that the thought of incense was suggested to St. Ambrose by the mention of "the altar of incense." We therefore further point out that if he was thinking of material incense, as used in the Christian church, it must in his time have been burnt on altars, which no one asserts; and, moreover, that St. Ambrose explains himself by a paraphrase of his own words, "as we heap the altars, as we bring the sacrifice." The incense in his mind was "the sacrifice of praise and thanksgiving." The testament of St. Ephrem the Syrian, a spurious document of uncertain date, is also quoted with the same object:—"I exhort you not to bury me with sweet spices . . . but to give the fumigation of sweet-smelling smoke in the house of God . . . Burn your incense in the house of the Lord to His praise and honour" (Test. S. Ephr. in Suriæ Vitæ Sanctarum, Feb. 1). The actual use of incense during the funeral ceremony appears to be intended here; but the evidence of a late forgery is worth nothing. We may add that there was an obvious natural reason, such as the first Christians would have recognized with Tertullian, for burning incense at a funeral; and it is probable that the custom of using it then contributed not a little to the introduction of the practice as a purely religious rite.

INCEST (Incestus) is defined by the Decree of Gratian (cans. 36, qu. 1, c. 2, § 4) thus: "Incestus est consanguineorum vel affinitum abusus," where we are of course to understand affinity or consanguinity such as would be an impediment to matrimony (Van Espen, Jus Eccles. P. iii. tit. iv. cc. 48, 49).

Christian morality extended the range of "prohibited degrees" within which it was unlawful to contract matrimony, and consequently the conception of incest, much beyond that of the heathen world. The apologists, as Minucius Felix (Octav. c. 31) and Origen (c. Celsum, V. p. 248, Spencer) speak with horror of the licence given to Persians and Egyptians of marrying persons near in blood; and Augustine (De Virginitate, xv. 16) insists upon the natural loathing which men feel at connexions of this kind. Gothofred (on the Theodosian Code, lib. iii. tit. 12) gives many instances of marriages among the Romans—as of uncle with niece—which the feeling of Christendom universally condemns. [AFFINITY; PROHIBITED DEGREES.]

Basil the Great (ad Amphilocheum, c. 67) holds incest with a sister to be a crime of the same degree as murder. He who commits incest with a half-sister, whether by the father's or the mother's side, during the time that he continues in his sin, is to be absolutely excluded from the church; after he is brought to a sense of his sin, he is for three years to stand among the "Fientes" at the door of the church, begging those who enter to pray for him; then he is to pass another seven years among the "Audientes," as still unworthy to pray with the rest; then, if he show true contrition, and on his earnest entreaty, he may be admitted for three years among the "Substrati;" then, if he bring forth fruits meet for repentance, in the tenth year he may be admitted to the prayers of the faithful, but not to offer with them; then, after continuing two years in this state, he may at last be admitted to holy communion (c. 75). The same punishment is prescribed for one who commits incest with a daughter-in-law (c. 76). He who marries two sisters, though not at the same time, is subject to the penalties of adultery, i. e. two years among the Fientes, two among the Audientes, two among the Substrati, and one among the Consistentes, before he can be admitted to communion. And generally, he who marries within the prohibited degrees of consanguinity (τῆς ἀρρητιότητος συγγενείας) is liable to the penalties of adultery (c. 68). The council of Elvira (Conc. Elb. c. 61), A.D. 305, allotted to a marriage with a deceased wife's sister the penalty of fifteen years' excommunication; that of Neo-Cæsarea (c. 2), A.D. 314, decreed the excommunication of a woman who married two brothers for the whole of her life, except that in peril of death she might be admitted to communion, on promising to renounce the connexion if she recovered (Bingham, Antiq. XVI. xi. 3).

The Penitentials, as might be expected, provide penalties for incest; those, for instance, of Theodore, of Bede, and of Egbert assign to different forms of this sin periods of penance varying from five to fifteen years (Haddan and Stubbs, Councils and Documents, iii. 179, 328, 420). [C.]

INCLINATION. [GENUFLEXION, p. 725.]

INCLUSI. Monks living in detached cells within the precincts of the monastery ("intra septa") were termed "Inclusi." These were monks either of long experience or of delicate health (Conc. Agath. A.D. 506, c. 38). They were subject to the control of the abbot, but not to the ordinary rules of the monastery (Martene, Reg. Cæm. c. 1; Menard, Concord. Regul. c. 3, § 6). See HERMITS and HESYCHASTÆ.

INDALECIUS. [HESYCHIUS (1).]

INDICTION. From the middle of the 4th century a new note of time begins to appear in dates; Indictio, followed by an ordinal number, from I. to XV., as a character of the year, is appended to its customary designation; e.g., Cass. M. et N. (or Anno ab Incarnatione)—Indictione—In respect of its origin, "Indictio" is a term of the Roman Fiscus, meaning "quidquid in præstationem indicitur," notice of a tax (on real property, Cod. Justin. x. 6, 3), "assessment," ἐπιπέτης; thence it came to denote the year on which the tax was assessed, beginning 1st September, the epoch of the imperial fiscal year. It seems that in the provinces, after Constantine, if not earlier, the valuation of property was revised upon a census taken at the end of every fifteen years, or three lustra (Ideler, Hdb. 2. 347 sqq., from Savigny, über die Steuerverfassung unter den Kaiserern, in the Transactions of the Berlin Royal Academy, 1822, 23). From the strict observance of this fiscal regulation there resulted a marked term of fifteen years, constantly recurrent, the Circle of Indictions, ἡ ἐκαταετηρίς τῶν ἰνδικτιῶνων (or ἰνδικτιῶν), which became available for chronological purposes as a "period of revolution" of fifteen years, each beginning 1st September: which (except in the Spanish "reainsola") continued to be used as a chæra "the year irrespectively of all reference to the epoch." The Indictions (like the "solar cycle" of Sunday letters, twenty-eight years, and the lunar cycle, nineteen years, of "Golden Numbers," beside which this circle has obtained place in chronology) do not form an era: the annexed ordinal number is reckoned from the epoch of the circle then current: it is not expressed how many circles have elapsed since any given point of time. It is certain that September 1st is the original epoch of each indiction (St. Ambrose, Epist. ad Episc. per Acmil. 2, 256, Inditio cum Septembri mense incipit; and de Noc et Arcæ, c. 17. A Septenbri mense annus videtur incipere, sicut Indictionum præsentium usus ostendit). From any given date of a known year to which its indiction is added, as e.g., "3 id. August. Symmacho et Bœtio Cass. [= 11 Aug., A.D. 322] in fine Indictionis XV." (Reines, Inscript. Id. 978), it results that a circle of indictiones began 210 (= 14 × 15) years earlier, i. e., A.D. 312. Now as it is only since Constantine that "Indiction" makes its appearance as a note of time, and as with the defeat and death of Maxentius in the autumn of that year Constantine attained to undisputed empire, the date, A.D. 312, 1 Sept., is accepted as the epoch of the first circle of indictiones. Hence the technical rule for finding the indiction of each year. To the ordinal number of the given year A.D. (beginning with 1 Jan. ary) add 3; divide the amount by 15: the remainder denotes the indiction; if there be no remainder, division of 525 by 15 gives no remainder; there-author of the Paschal Chronicle (probably a man of Antioch) makes the circle of Indictions begin much earlier, viz. at the epoch of the Antiochene era, 1 Gorpiaeus = 1 Sept. U.C. 705 = u.c. 49; at which year he notes: "Here begins the first year of the 15-year circle of indictions, with the first year of C. Julius Caesar;" and therefor-ward he adds to each year its indiction. Twenty-

Κωνσταντινιῶν ἐνθάδε δοχῆ— to be understood as meaning that the first eight months of that consulship belonged to that first year.
(So, throughout, the Indiction in Chron. Pasch. is attached, not to the year in which it began, but to the following year, beginning 1 January, which contains eight months of it. Comp.
Clatou, F. R. Append. 1 and 2.) Although there is no trace elsewhere of this earlier system of indictions, it does not follow, in the Paschal Chronicle is entirely without foundation. A fiscal regulation, proceeding by periods of fifteen years may, he thinks, have obtained in Syria and other Eastern provinces; and the assumption would serve to explain the circumstance, else unaccounted for, that in the reckoning of Antioch, the year (of the era of the Selencidae) begins 1 September, not at the old 1 October. Some later writers, misled by the merely technical rule above given, have assumed that the indictions actually had their beginning three years before the Nativity, i.e. before our A.D. 1, with the "decree of Caesar Augustus that all the world should be taxed" (St. Luke iii. 1). So says Duranti—a writer of the 13th century (Speculum Juris. t. i. pt. 1, p. 281): "Caesar Aug. decretum proposuit, ut describeretur universus orbis; i.e., ut quilibet aestimaret bona sua, describens orbem sub tributo sibi singulis quindecim annis reddendo, quod quidem tempus divisit per tria lustra," &c. And the rule concerning three years to be added to the year-date (A.D.) rests, he adds, on the fact, "quia tot praecesserant de indictione quando Christus natus fuit, vel quia praemisum edictum Caesaris tribus annis praecepit Nativitate Christi."

It is only in the latter half of the 4th century that the indictions first appear in dates. St.
Athanasius, in a fragment of his work de Synodis, opp. t. i. pt. 2, p. 737, gives "indictio XIV.," with the date (= A.D. 341) of the council of Antioch; but that work was written towards the close of his life (ob. 371), at which time this method of dating was in common use.
The earliest clear instance is the date of a decree of Constantius (Cod. Theod. xii. 12, 2), of the year 358, or rather (for the text needs correction) 357. From the earliest years of that century the yearly appointment of consuls became irregular, and from time to time the designation of the year, instead of Coss. M. et N., became post consulatum M. et N. There was even an uncertainty in the numbering of a set of post-consulate years: for instance, some would describe, ANT.

signate the first vacant year anno post consul- atum M. N. l.: others, after the old fashion of numbering, anno ii. (Pagi, Dissert. Hypat. p.
319; Ideler, 2, 345 note). A further source of uncertainty was the difference of epochs of the year. But the fifteen-years' circle of indictions once established throughout the empire provided a correction for all such uncertainty, so long as it continued to be understood, that the year of indiction began on the 1st of September (preceding the 1st of January of the year found by the rule above given). And, in fact, this was the established practice during the greater part of the period with which we are concerned in this work. In the Codex Theodosianus, indeed, its learned annotator, Gothofred, finds indications of four distinct reckonings of the indictions, viz. the Italiae, A.D. 312; Orientalis, 313; and two of Africa, 314 and 315. As regards the supposed Orientalis, Cardinal Norris (De Anno et Epochis Syro-Maced. Dissertat. IV. c. iv.: Opp.
t. ii. col. 422 sqq.) has shown that its epoch is the 1st September, A.D. 312. Concerning the two supposed different African reckonings, see Ideler (Urb. 2, 354 sqq.; Lehrb. p. 400). Apart from these inferences from the Theodosian Codex, we find no trace, except here and there in corrupt texts and negligent dates, of a different reckoning: Dionysius Exiguus knows no other than that which is expressed by the usual rule (Argu- menta paschalia, ii.). To trace the history of the use of the indictions through the different provinces of the Roman empire would, as Ideler remarks, require extensive disquisition. In respect of France, Mabillon has shown (de re diplomat. t. 2, 26), that this note of time does not appear in public acts before Charlemagne, but in acts of councils, and in writers, it is found earlier. But far down into the middle ages its use became so general that it is rarely absent from dates attached to civil or ecclesiastical documents in Italy, France, Germany (in the Pyrenean peninsula it seems never to have been established). Duranti, writing in the 13th century, testifies (u. s.): "Tante fuit auctoritatis indictio, ut nullus sine ea fieret contractus, nec pillegium, nec testamentum, nec alia scriptura solvennis: et etiam hodie eandem obtinet auctoritatem."

With the desuetude of the Imperial fiscal regulation, with which the indictions originated, the original epoch, 1st September, ceased to be significant—except in the Eastern empire, where that day was established as the first day of the year: wherever in the Corpus Historie Byzanti- nae the indictions occur, they are those of 1st September, 312. Even in the West, beyond the limits of our period, they are still occasionally met with: thus, a writing of Gregory VII., A.D. 1073, bears the subscription, "Datum Carpuae, Kalend. Sept., incipiente Indictione XII." But in process of time the indiction, detached from its original epoch, came to be dated from the new-year's day, as received at the time, December 25th, or January 1st, or March 25th. Distinct from these indictions used by various popes in their bulls, and by other writers, is one which has been called "Caesarean," of which the first notice occurs in Bede, de temp. ratione, c. 46: "Incipiunt Indictiones ab vii. Kalend. Octobris, Ibidemque terminantur." This, of which there is extant no earlier indiction (but which, so great was the authority of the writer, may have influenced the practice of the Imperial chancelleries), is probably due to an assumption of Bede, that the old epoch of the Byzantine year, September 24th, was accepted by Constantine as the epoch of the indictons established by him. [H. B.]

INDULGENCE. (I.) The use of the word Indulgentia by ecclesiastical writers is derived from that of the juriconsults, who employ it to designate a remission of punishment or of taxes, especially such a general amnesty as was sometimes proclaimed by an emperor on an extraordinary occasion of rejoicing. Thus the Theodosian Code has a title De Indulgentiis Criminum (Van Espen, Jus Eccles., P. II. sec. I. tit. 7). Hence the word passed into ecclesiastical usage in a double sense. First, it designates remission of sins, as in what Reticus, bishop of Autun, according to St. Augustine (c. Je'han. i. 3), observed of baptism as early as the Roman synod under pope Melchisedes, A.D. 313: "It can escape nobody that this is the principal indulgence known to the church, where we lay aside the whole weight of our hereditary guilt, and cancel all our former misdeeds committed in ignorance, and put off the old man with all his innate wickednesses." In this passage, indulgence stands immediately for remission of sins, and that alone. But we are more immediately concerned with it in a second sense, that in which it designates such a lightening of ecclesiastical penalties, in consideration of the state of the offender, as St. Paul practised in the case of the incestuous Corinthian (2 Cor. ii. 6-11). This question of the advisability of such a relaxation first comes prominently before us in the case of those who had "lapsed" or denied Christ to avoid persecution, and for whom martyrs had in many cases interceded. St. Cyprian tells us, in his letter to Antoninus, how it had been discussed and decided by his colleagues in Africa. They held that the church should not be closed irrevocably to such of the lapsed as were desirous of returning to it: nor yet opened indiscriminately till they had undergone their full penance, and had their particular case taken into consideration. "Et ideo placuit . . . examiniatis causis singularum: libellaticis interim admitti, sacrificatis in exitu subveniri: quia exomologesis apud inferos non est, nec ad penitentiam quis a nobis compelli potest, si fructus penitentiae subtrahatur" (Ep. lii.). The bishops, he adds, already made distinctions between other crimes, according to their discretion, and therefore might be left to deal with this similarly. No canons for regulating penances of any kind had as yet been passed. It rested accordingly with the bishops to use greater or less indulgence in dispensing them all as they thought fit. It was disputed by Novatian whether they could remit as well as bind: and he maintained that only God could remit. But this was not the doctrine of the church. The fifth of the canons of Ancyra, A.D. 314 (Mansi, II. 516) gives the bishops power to mitigate (φιλανθρωπεύειν) penance; so the twelfth Nicene canon gives the bishop power to deal more gently with penitents who have shown true repentance (Munst, II. 673). The merciless rulings of the Elvivan canons 1, 2, 6, 8, 10, 12, 13, 17, 19, 63-66, 70-73, and 75, which forbid certain offenders to be readmitted to communion even on their death-beds,* were neither imitated elsewhere nor maintained in Spain itself (Mansi, ib. 5-19). St. Ambrose, speaking for the West, says: "Our Lord must have meant the powers of loosing and binding to be coextensive, or He would not have bestowed both on the same terms" (De Poen. l. 2). St. Gregory Nyssen deposes, on behalf of the East, to what had been customary: Τοῖς ἀθεοεργεῖσις ἐγίνετο τις παρὰ τῶν πατέρων συμπεσοῦσα, which is the Greek equivalent for "indulgentia" (Ep. ad Letin. c. 4).

Usually there were four stages or degrees through which offenders had to pass before regaining communion: (1) weepers, (2) hearers, (3) kneelers, (4) bystanders; and usually several years had to be spent in each. Now the bishop, according to St. Gregory, might, in proportion to their conversion, "rescind the period of their penance; making it eight, seven, or even five years instead of nine, in each stage, should their repentance exceed in depth what it had to fulfil in length, and compensate, by its increased zeal, for the much longer time required in others to effect their cure" (ib. c. 5).

So matters went on till about the end of the 7th century. The office of PENTITENTIARY presbyter, abolished by Nectarius, patriarch of Constantinople, three centuries earlier, is not supposed to have produced any change, so far as they were concerned (S-c. v. 19 and Soz. vii. 16). But they were changed materially when the Penitential of Theodore, archbishop of Canterbury, had begun to work: according to which a rigorous fast of days, weeks, or years, might be redeemed by saying a proportionable number of psalms, or by paying a proportionable fine (c. 3-10, in Migne's Patrol. xcix. 337 sqq.). Several of the offences stigmatised in the canons of the synod of Berghamsted, A.D. 697, are dismissed with a fine (Mansi, xii. 111 sqq.). The synod of Cloreshoe, A.D. 747, protests in its 26th and 27th canons against the neglect of discipline to which this "new device" and "perilous custom" had led (ib. 493-96). But the Penitential of Egbert, the archbishop of York, not only re-enacts all the commutations authorised by Theodore (ib. 433), but adds to them in a subsequent chapter (ib. 456), voluntary exile from home and country being one of the new kind allowed. Similar permission is given in the Penitential of Bede, as it is called (ib. 519). After this the extension of indulgences to pilgrimages and holy wars was a pure matter of time; and these, from the ardour inspired by both, threw everything else into the shade. The climax was reached when, to make them more attractive, it was formally declared of the one, "iter illud pro omni penitentia reputatur" (Concil. Clavomont. c. 2, pp. Mansi, II. 816), and popularly believed of the other, "pro stipendio erat indulgentia peccatorum proposita" (ib. pp. 827 and 890). On this point see Maribus, De Poenit. x. 22, 1-6, and Bingham, Ant. xviii. 4, for earlier times. Gonr (Euchol. pp. 680-88)

* It is to be observed that the reading "nec in fluxu" or "nec in fluxum," is changed in some later recensions into that of Burchard—into "non nisi in fluxu," so as to bring it into harmony with the Nicene canon (13) which forbids such total excommunication.—[Ed.]

70-73, and 75, which forbid to be readmitted to ecclesiastical death-bells, were neither nor maintained in Spain (19). attempts in vain to detect affinity between papal indulgences and the συγχωροχάρτια of the Greek church (comp. Ducange, Gloss. Gr. s. v.).

(II.) Indulgences, or relaxations of the strict letter of the law, are however by no means confined to penitential cases; such relaxations are found in relation to almost all points of conduct. The laws of God, whether known by revelation or by natural light (Augustine, Quest. 67 in Exod.), are of course always binding; but under positive human enactments cases may and do occur, in which the rigid enforcement of a law may be a suspension of its operation. Hence, in all states and societies, either the law-giving power or some other has exercised the right of suspending the operation of a law upon occasion. A familiar instance of such a dispensing power is the commutation by the sovereign of this country of sentences passed by the judges in the ordinary course of law. As a law is necessarily rigid, while the real character of human acts cannot be rigidly defined, such a dispensing power seems necessary for the equitable administration of justice.

And this principle is just as true of the church as of other societies; here too we find the strict letter of the law mitigated by authority in special cases from an early period. Such indulgences, or concessions to human weakness, commonly called dispensations, have received various names—remissio, venia, clementia, misericordia, dispensatio; συγχώρησις, συμπίθια, φιλαργυρία, οίκονομία (Suicer, Theas. s. v.)—all implying something of the nature of occasional indulgence or εὐμετρία in the administration of a law, the law itself remaining unchanged. A constant exemption of a person or body corporate from the operation of a particular law is called a privilegium. The canonists generally limit the use of the word dispensatio to the case in which a future transgression of a law is permitted.

Thomassin (Ecol. Discip. II. iii. 24, § 14) holds that in the early ages of the church, when few or no councils were held, such dispensations were granted by the bishops; that afterwards, from the end of the 3rd century, councils decided on the cases in which some relaxation of the law of the church was to be allowed; then, as provincial councils frequently referred such matters to the judgment of the see of Rome, that see gradually claimed and exercised a dispensing power independent of councils. The twentieth canon of the (so-called) fourth council of Carthage supplies a good instance of a dispensing power applied to a canon. The council recognises the general prohibition of the translation of bishops from an inferior to a better see "per ambitionem," yet goes on to provide that "if the good of the church requires it," such a translation may be made on the certificate of election being produced in the synod itself. Here a dispensing power seems to be given to the synod; for it must be presumed that it was to decide whether in a particular case "utilitas ecclesie fecundum poscerit." Penitents, digamists, and husbands of widows were by the general law of the church incapable of holy orders; yet pope Sixtus (Epist. 1 ad Himerium, c. 15) permits such persons, once ordained, to exercise the functions of their order, though without hope of promotion to a higher. Pope Innocent I., A. D. 414, allows (Epist. 22, c. 5) that the bishops of Macedonia might, under circumstances of peculiar difficulty, admit to the exercise of their functions those who had been irregularly ordained by Bonosus, a heretic, while he insists strongly on the general maintenance of the rule which for once is violated; it is only "pro necessitate temporis" that such relaxations of canonical strictness can be allowed, and "quod necessitas prorecessare;" such liberties cannot be permitted when the church is restored to its normal state in Gregory the Great's letter to Augustine of Canterbury (Epist. xi. 64; in Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 21), in which he permits persons who had married in ignorance within the prohibited degrees to be admitted to communion, though the general law of the church excommunicated such persons.

Of such a nature were the relaxations of strict law permitted in the early church; the numerous dispensations in matrimonial cases, in plurality of benefices, and in some other matters, which were so great a scandal in the mediæval church, do not fall within our period; nor within the same period had the baneful practice arisen of granting dispensations for wrongs to be committed. It was (as Thomassin observes, u. s. § 20) "in more recent times, when the discipline of the church had grown feeble and languid, that permission was sought for future violation of the canons, that license was asked and granted for sinning against sacred rules; men would find sin without risk of penalty, and draw even from the laws themselves cover and authority for their contempt of the law."

INFANT BAPTISM. [BAPTISM, § 95, p. 169.]

INFANT COMMUNION. The practice of communicating infants was universal throughout the period of which we treat. For the east, where it still flourishes, we have the testimony of the so-called liturgy of St. Clement, in which little children (παιδια) are ordered to receive immediately after all who have any special dedication, "and then all the people in order" (Constit. Apost. lib. viii. c. 13). Pseudo-Dionysius, possibly of the 5th century, but more probably of the 6th, says that "children who cannot understand divine things are yet made partakers of divine generation, and of the divine communion of the most sacred mysteries" (De Ecol. Hierarch. c. vii. § 11). Evagrius, who completed his Church History in 394, proves the continued observance of the rite, where he mentions "an ancient custom" at Constantinople, "when there remained a good quantity of the holy portions of the undefiled body of Christ our God, for uncorrupted boys from among those who attended the school of the undermaster to be sent for to consume them" (lib. iv. c. 36). There is a story told by John Moschus, A.D. 630, of some children who imitated among themselves the celebration of the Eucharist, as they had witnessed, and taken part in it themselves (Pratum Spirit. c. 196).

The earliest witness in the Latin church is St. Cyprian, who writing in 251, relates how the agitation of an infant to whom the cup was offered, led to the discovery of its having been taken to a heathen sacrifice (De lapsis). He also represents the children of apostates as able to plead at the day of judgment, "We have done nothing; nor have we hastened of our own accord to those profane defilements, forsaking the meat and cup of the Lord" (ibid.). St. Augustine:—"They are infants; but they are made partakers of His table, that they may have life in themselves" (Serm. 174, § 7). "Why is the blood, which of the likeness of sinful flesh was shed for the remission of sins, ministered that the little one (parvulus) may drink, that he may have life, unless he hath come to death by a beginning of sin on the part of some one" (Contra Juvenum, Op. Imperf. l. ii. c. 30)? It is evident from these passages (and see especially to the same effect, De Peccat. Mer. lib. i. c. xx. § 26; c. xxiv. § 34) that St. Augustine considered this sacrament to be generally necessary to the salvation of infants; but it is desirable to mention that some passages often cited from his works, which appear to imply or maintain that view are not really to the purpose. He argued against the Pelagians, that if infants were not born in sin, our Lord's words, "Except ye eat the flesh" &c. (St. John vi. 53), would not be true in reference to them: they would have life without eating of that flesh (see Contra Duas Epp. Pelag. lib. i. c. xxii. § 40); but then he taught also that "every one of the faithful is made a partaker of the body and blood of Christ, when he is made a member of Christ in baptism." This is carefully shown from his writings by Fulgentius, who had been questioned by Ferrandus, on the hope that might be entertained for a young man who had died immediately after baptism (see De Pecc. Mer. lib. i. c. 20, § 26). The same remark must be made on a saying of Innocent I., A.D. 417 (Ad Patres Syn. Milice. § 5, Ep. 182, inter Epp. Ang.), which Augustine himself interprets of the necessity of Baptism (Ad Paulin. Ep. 185, c. viii. § 28). See also Gelasius of Rome, Epist. 7, ad Episc. per Picenum. Gennadius of Marseilles, A.D. 495, gives the following direction with regard to the reception of some of those who had been baptized by heretics in schism. "But if they are infants (parvuli), or so dull as not to take in teaching, let those who offer them answer for them, after the manner of one about to be baptized; and so, fortified by the laying on of hands and chrism, let them be admitted to the mysteries of the Eucharist" (De Eccl. Dogm. c. 22). We call attention to the word "parvulus" when it is used in this connection, because "infans" was sometimes applied even to the newly-baptized adult, as being newly born to a higher life. In 585 the council of Mâcon, in France, in imitation, as we may suppose, of the Greek custom lately mentioned, ordered that on Wednesdays and Fridays innocent (children) should be brought to the church, and there "being commanded to fast, should receive the remains of the sacrifices" (can. 6). The council of Toledo, 875, found it necessary to reassure anxious minds by a declaration that the sick who found themselves unable to swallow the eucharist, and others who had failed to swallow it "in time of infancy" did not fall under the censure of the first council of Toledo (can. 14), against those who having received did not consume it (can. 11). The Gelasian Sacramentary (lib. i. n. 75) provides for the immediate communion of an infant (infans) baptized in sickness. The earliest extant copy of the Gregorian has the following rubric referring to all baptized at Easter. "If the bishop be present, it is fit that he (infans) be forthwith confirmed with chrism, and after that communicated. And if the bishop be not present, let him be communicated by the presbyter" (Liturgia Rom. Vet. Morat. tom. ii. col. 158). It will be observed that previous confirmation was not an indispensable condition of the first communion. A MS. Sacramentary of the 8th century preserved at Gellone and a Rheims pamphlet of the same age expressly contemplate the probability of some of the "infantes" baptized being nurslings, but make the same provision for the communion of all (Ord. 6, 7, 8, in Martene, De Ant. Eccl. Rit. lib. i. c. 1, art. 18. Comp. ord. 15). The little children were also to communicate daily throughout the octave with the rest of the newly-baptized. See Ord. 6, 8, 9.

There is an English canon ascribed to Egbert, A.D. 740, but probably somewhat later, which says, "They who can, and know how to baptize, faithful monks especially, ought always to have the eucharist with them, though they travel to places far distant" (Johnson's Engl. Canons, vol. i. p. 235). Jesse, bishop of Amiens, A.D. 799, in an epistle on the order of baptism, says, that "after trine immersion the bishop should confirm the child (puerum) with chrism on the forehead, and that finally he should be confirmed and communicated with the body and blood of Christ, that he may be a member of Christ" (see note to Regino De Eccl. Discipl. lib. i. c. 69; ed. Baluz.). The epistle of Jesse was written in reply to some questions of Charlemagne respecting baptism. In the Capitulaires of the latter we find the following law notably framed in express accordance with the answers of Jesse and other bishops:—"That the presbyter have the eucharist ready, that when any one shall be taken sick, or an infant (parvulus) be ailing, he may communicate him at once, lest he die without communion" (Lib. i. c. 155; Sim. lib. v. c. 57). This is in the collection of Walter of Orleans (c. 7); Regino (u. s.); Burchard (lib. v. c. 10); and Ivo (Decr. P. ii. c. 20).

Infants were during a period of uncertain length required to be kept without food between their baptism and communion, when the latter followed as a part of the day's rites. Thus in the earliest Ordo Romanus, supposed by Usher to be written about the year 730, care is enjoined that the little ones (parvuli) baptized on Easter Eve "take no food, nor be suckled, after their baptism before they communicate of the sacrament of the body of Christ" (§ 46; Musæ. Rit. tom. i. p. 28). There are rubrics to this effect in several ancient orders of baptism, three of

and there "being commanded to receive the remains of the sacrament." The council of Toledo, 673, measures anxious minds by giving to the sick who found themselves unworthy the eucharist, and others who "allow it" "in time of infancy," or the censure of the first council of Nicaea (can. 11). The rubric of the present rite (can. 11) provides that the communion of an infant is to be given only in case of illness. The earliest extant rubric which has the following rubric is that of the Council of Nicaea, baptized at Easter. "If the infant, it is fit that he (infans) be baptized with christum, and after that with the eucharist, and not present, communicated by the presbyter." (Vet. Murat. tom. ii. col. 158). It is observed that previous confirmation is a dispensable condition of the first MS. Sacramentary of the 8th century at Gellone and a Rileicms points to the age expressly contemplate the some of the "infants" baptized in the communion of all (Ord. 6, 7, 8, in Ant. Eccl. Rit. lib. l. c. 1, art. 18). The little children were also baptized daily throughout the octave of the newly-baptized. See Ord.

The English canon ascribed to Eusebius, but probably somewhat later, says that they who can, and know how to use the eucharist, ought always to be communicant with them, though they be as far distant" (Johnson's Engl. p. 255). Jesse, bishop of Amiens, in an epistle on the order of baptism, after trine immersion the bishop dips the child (puerum) with christum, and that finally he should be communicated with the body said that, that he may be a member of the church (note to Regino De Eccl. Discip. ad. Baluz.). The epistle of Jesse replies to some questions of Charlemagne on baptism. In the Capitularies we find the following law notably in accordance with the answers of the bishops:—"That the presbyter baptizant ready, that when any one is sick, or an infant (parvulus) be communicated him at once, lest he be in communion" (Lib. i. c. 155; Sin. 7); Regino (l. s.); Burchard (lib. i. v. Decr. P. ii. c. 20). It is during a period of uncertainty that he is to be kept without food between baptism and communion, when the latter is part of the day's rites. Thus in Ordo Romanus, supposed by Usher about the year 730, care is enjoined on the ones (parvuli) baptized on Easter to fast, nor be suckled, after their baptism, nor they communicate of the sacrament of Christ" (§ 46; Muse. Ital.). There are rubrics to this effect in ancient orders of baptism, three of which were compiled or copied in the 8th century (Ord. 6, 7, 8, in Martene, u. s. For later examples, see Ord. 9, 15). In one copy of the Gregorian Sacramentary, the rule is thus relaxed. "They are not forbidden to be suckled before the sacred communion, if it be necessary" (Inter Opp. S. Greg. tom. v. col. 111; Antv. 1615). The prohibition seems to have been generally omitted from the rubric after the 8th century; but the pontifical of the Latin church of Apamia in Syria, which was written in the 12th, retains it, though speaking of confirmation and communion immediately after baptism only as "the custom of some churches" (Ord. 15; Martene, u. s.).

There can be no doubt that infants were at first little communicated in both kinds; but there is little clear evidence to that effect. Passages which speak of their eating the flesh and drinking the blood of Christ are not conclusive. The council of Toledo before cited, after mentioning the occasional rejection of one element by the sick, "because except the draught of the Lord's cup, they could not swallow the eucharist delivered to them," proceeds to the case of others "who do such things in the time of infancy." The inference appears good that the eucharist was offered to both in bread as well as wine. We are however in a good measure left to infer the practice of the first ages from that of the later church. Because the cup only is mentioned in St. Cyprian's story of the infant who had partaken of a heathen sacrifice, some have argued that they were communicated in the blood only. Had it been so, they would hardly have been permitted to receive in both kinds at a later period; as they certainly did, when for a time the custom of intinction prevailed in the West. Even in the 12th century, when Paschal II. suppressed that practice at Clugny, he made an exception in favour of "infants and persons very sick who are not able to swallow the bread." All others were to receive the bread by itself (Epist. 32; Labb. Concilia, tom. x. col. 656). In a manuscript Antiphony that belonged to an Italian monastery, written about the middle of the same century, after directions for a baptism, is the following rubric: "Then follows the communion, which is ministered under these words: 'The body of our Lord Jesus Christ steeped in His blood, preserve thy soul unto everlasting life'" (Muratori, Antiq. Ital. Medieev. tom. iv. p. 843). About the same time, however, we find Radulphus Ardens saying, in a sermon on Easter Day, "It has been decreed that it be delivered to children as soon as baptized, at least in the species of wine; that they may not depart without a necessary sacrament" (Zaccaria, Biblioth. Rit. tom. ii. p. ii. p. clx.). How infants were communicated in the one species then, we may learn from the pontifical of Apamia already cited. "But children who as yet know not how to eat or drink are communicated either with a leaf or with the finger dipped in the blood of the Lord and put into their mouth, the priest thus saying, 'The body with the blood of our Lord Jesus Christ, keep thee unto everlasting life'" (Martene, u. s.). Robertus Paululus, A.D. 1175, in a work De Sacramentis, long ascribed to Hugo de S. Victore, says, "The said sacrament is to be ministered with the finger of the priest to children newly born in the species of the blood;

INFIRMARY (MONASTIC) 837

because such can suck naturally" (Lib. l. c. 20). As the Greeks and Orientals generally used intinction before the age of Charlemagne, it is to be presumed that they communicated infants in the same manner as adults; i. e., in both kinds with a spoon. Now "in practice, though the rule is otherwise, the eucharist is given to infants under the species of wine alone" (Gour in Annot. Nihssii ad Allatii Dissert. de Missa Præsanct. ad flo.; Allat. De Occ. et Or. Consent. col. 1659). The Nestorians, Jacobites, Armenians and Maronites, are said to have fallen into the same practice (Gabriel Sinaita, ibid. col. 1667). The Greeks use a spoon, but from conflicting statements before us (see Martene, u. s. art. 15, n. 15), we infer that the rest use the finger or a spoon indifferently. [W. E. S.]

INFIRMARY (MONASTIC). In his enumeration of Christian duties Benedict specifies that of visiting the sick (Bened. Reg. c. 4); and elsewhere he speaks of it as a duty of priory and paramount obligation for monks ("ante omnia et super omnia," c. 36), quoting the words of Christ, "I was sick, and ye ministered unto Me." Beyond, however, saying, that the sick are to have a separate part of the monastery assigned to them (cf. Aurel. Reg. cc. 37, 52; Casnar. Reg. c. 30), and a separate officer in charge of them (cf. leg. Tarnat. c. 21), that they are to be allowed meat and the luxury of baths, if necessary, that they are not to be exacting ("ne superfluitate sua fratres contristent"), and that the brethren who wait on them are not to be impatient, he gives no precise directions (ib.). Subsequently it was the special duty of the "infirmarius," the "cellararius" (house-steward), and of the abbot himself, to look after the sick (Martene, leg. Comm. c. 4; Casnar. Reg. ad Virg. c. 20, Reg. Cyprian. ad Virgines, c. 15); no other monk might visit them without leave from the abbot or prior (Mart. l. c.). Everything was to be done for their comfort, both in body and soul, that they should not miss the kindly offices of kinsfolk and friends (cf. Fructuos. Reg. c. 7; Hieronym. Ep. 22, ad Eustoch.); and, while the rigor of the monastic discipline was to be relaxed, whenever necessary, in their favour, due supervision was to be exercised, lest there should be any abuse of the privileges of the sick-room (Mart. l. c.; cf. Reg. Puchom. c. 20). The "infirmarius" was to enforce silence at meals, to check conversation in the sick-room ("mansio infirmorum, intra claustra," Conc. Aquisgran. A. D. 816, c. 142) at other times, and to discriminate carefully between real and fictitious ailments (Mart. l. c.). The sick were, if possible, to recite the hours daily and to attend mass at stated times, and if unable to walk to the chapel, they were to be carried thither in the arms of their brethren (ib.). The meal in the sick-room was to be three hours earlier than in the common refectory (Reg. Mag. c. 28). The abbot might allow a separate kitchen and "buttery" for the use of the sick monks (Anselm, Reg. ad Monach. c. 53, Reg. ad Virg. c. 37). The rule of Caesarius of Arles ordered, that the abbot was to provide good wine for the sick, the ordinary wine of the monastery being often of inferior quality (cf. Mabill. Dissquis. de Curs. Gallic. vi. 70, 71; Mabill. Ann. iii. 8, Du Cange, Glossar. Lat. e. v.). [L. G. S.]

INFORMERS. (Calumniatores, Delatores. Tertullian [adv. Marcion, v. 18] fancifully connects "diabolus" with "delatura.") This class of men originated before the Christian era, and indeed before the establishment of the Roman empire. [DICT. OF GREEK AND ROMAN ANTIQ. s. v. Delator.] When persecution arose against the church, the delatores naturally sought gain, and probably some credit with the civil authorities, by giving information against those who practised Christian rites, since the secret assemblies of Christians for worship came under the prohibition of the Lex Julia de Majestate (Tac. Ann. i. 72, p. 3; Merivale, Hist. Romæ, c. xlii.). Tertullian states that Tiberius threatened the accusers of the Christians—"Caesar . . . comminatus periculum accusatoribus Christianorum" (Apol. c. 5), but the story rests only upon his statement. He also (l. c.) claims M. Aurelius as a protector of Christians. Titus issued an edict against delators, forbidding slaves to inform against their masters or freedmen against their patrons. Nerva on his accession republished this edict. "Jewish manners," i. e. probably Christianity, is specially mentioned as one of the subjects on which informations were forbidden (Dion lxxviii. 1, quoted by Merivale). In Pliny's well-known letter to Trajan (x. 96 [al. 97]) we find the delators in full work. The Christians who were brought before him were delated (deferebantur), and an anonymous paper was sent in containing a list of many Christians or supposed Christians. Trajan in his answer (ib. 97 [98]), though he forbade Christians to be sought out (i. e. by government officials), did not attempt to put a stop to the practice of delation; those who were informed against, if they continued in their infatuation, must be punished. See Tertullian's comment on this (Apol. c. 2). And in the subsequent persecutions a large part of the suffering arose from unfaithful brethren who betrayed their friends to the persecutors. It is not wonderful that during and immediately after the days of persecution the delator was regarded with horror. Thus the council of Elvira (Conc. Eliv. c. 73), A. D. 305, excommunicated, even on his death-bed,* any delator who had caused the proscription or death of the person informed against; for informing in less important cases, the delator might be re-admitted to communion after five years; or, if a catechumen, he might be admitted to baptism after five years. The first of Arles, A. D. 314, reckons among "traditores" not only those who gave up to the persecutors the Holy Scriptures and sacred vessels, but also those who handed in lists of the brethren (nomina fratrum); and respecting these the council decrees, that whoever shall be discovered from the public records (acta) to have committed such offences shall be solemnly[†] degraded from the clerical order; but such degradation, if the offender was a bishop, was not to vitiate the orders of those who might have been ordained

* According to the reading "Nec in fine;" some MSS. read "non nisi in fine." It seems probable that "nec in fine" or "in fine" was the original reading, and that it was altered to bring it into accordance with the decree of Nicaea (c. 13), which provides that the Holy Communion is in no case to be refused to a dying man.

by him. Charges against traitors were not to be admitted unless they could be proved from the "acta publica." This decree is highly interesting, as following immediately upon a period of persecution, and showing that the edict of Milan (A. D. 313) had brought about a great change in Gaul, and that Christians were admitted to consult the public records of the recent proceedings against them. The capitularies of the Frank kings (lib. vi. c. 317, in Baluze, l. 977) cite the 73rd canon of Elvira with the reading "nec in fine." So lib. vii. c. 205, and Additio Quarta, c. 34, in Baluze, l. 1068, 1202. The same capitularies (Add. Quarta, c. 35) enjoin bishops to excommunicate "accusatores fratrum;" and, even after amendment, not to admit them to holy orders, though they may be admitted to communion. Any cleric or layman who brings frivolous charges against his bishop (calumniator extiterit) is to be reputed a homicide.

The canon of Elvira is cited in the decree of Gratian (p. ii. cau. v. quæ. 8, c. 6) with the reading "non nisi in fine." The same decree (u. s. c. 5) attributes to pope Hadrian i. a decree, "let the tongue of a delator be cut out (capuletur), or, on conviction, let his head be cut off;" a decree probably taken from the civil legislation, for nearly the same provision is found in the Theodosian code (lib. x. tit. x. l. 2), and precisely the same in the Frank capitularies (lib. vii. c. 360; Bal. l. 1102). INFULA. 1. The infula was in classical times the band or fillet which bound the brow of the sacrificing priest and the victim.

"Nec te tua plurima, Panthu Labeoem pietas nec Apollinis infula terit." Virg. Æn. ii. 430.

Servius (on Æneid. x. 538) tells us that it was a broad fillet or ribbon, commonly made of red and white strips. Isidore (Etymol. xix. 30) describes the infula of the heathen priest in similar terms. The infula of the victim is mentioned in

"stans hostia ad aram
"Lance dum niveâ circumdatur infula vitæ." Virg. Georg. iii. 487.

And the term seems to have been early transferred to the head-covering of Christian priests. Hence Prudentius (Peristeph. iv. 79) speaks of the "sacerdotum domus infulata" of the Valerii of Saragossa, when he is evidently speaking of the "clerus." So Pope Gelasius (Hardouin's Concilia, ii. 901), wishing to say that a certain person ought to be rejected from the Christian priesthood, says that he is "clericibus infulis reprobabilis" (Hefele's Beiträge, ii. 223 ff.). See MITRE.

On Sundays as a rule, in the liturgy of St. Basil the Typica for the day are said instead of the first two antiphons; and in those of St. Basil and St. Chrysostom instead of the third antiphon, the Beatitudes (of μακαρισμοί). These are the Beatitudes from the Sermon on the Mount, and are thus said. They are introduced by the clause "Remember us, O Lord, when Thou comest into Thy Kingdom." The first five Beatitudes are then said consecutively; after the fifth and each following one is interposed a short troparion, differing in each case, and all varying with the day. After the sixth of these follows "Glory, &c.," and then two more troparia, the latter of which is a Theoticon.*

In the liturgies of St. James and St. Mark the initial hymn is the same, and unvarying. It is of the ordinary form of Greek hymns, beginning "Only begotten Son and Word of God," &c., and containing prayers for salvation through the mysteries of the incarnation, which it recites. INNOCENTS, FESTIVAL OF THE. (ἡμέρα τῶν ἁγίων ἰβ' χιλιάδων ἡμερῶν: festum Innocentium [ivm]. Nativitas Sanctorum Innocentium, Nativitas Infantum, Nativitas [Allisio] Infantum. The old English Kindermaas and the German Kindermesse may also be noted.)

1. History of festival.—The Holy Innocents of Bethlehem, the victims of Herod's jealousy of our Lord, are at an early period commemorated as martyrs for Christ, of whom indeed they were in one sense the first (see Ireneus adv. Haer. iii. 16. 4; Cyprinn, Epist. 56, plebi Thibari consistenti, § 6). Subsequent fathers continually speak in the same strain, e.g. Gregory of Nazianzum (Serm. 38 in Nativitate, § 18; vol. i. 674, ed. Bened.); Chrysostom (Hom. 9 in S. Matt. vol. vii. 130, ed. Montfaucou); Augustine (Enarratio in Psal. 47; vol. iv. 593, ed. Gaume; Serm. 199 in Epiphania, § 2, vol. v. 1319; Serm. 373 in Epiph. § 3, vol. v. 2178; Serm. 375 in Epiph. § 2, vol. v. 2183); Prudentius (Cath. xii. de Epiph. 125). Augustine also distinctly refers (de Hero Aristotri, iii. 68, vol. i. 1035) to a commemoration of their martyrdom by the church. Some writers, as Augusti (Denkwürdigkeiten aus der Christlichen Archäologie, i. 304), Binterim (Denkwürdigkeiten der Christ-Katholischen Kirche, v. 1. 549) and others, refer to a homily of Origen as affording evidence on this last point. The writing in question, however (Hom. 3 de diversis, vol. ii, p. 282; ed. Paris, 1004), is universally rejected as spurious, and Huet sums up concerning it (Origenis Opp. vol. iv, 325, ed. De la Rue) that it is a work originally written in Latin, and later than the time of Jerome.

The commemoration of the Massacre of the Innocents was at first combined with the festival of the Epiphany. Thus the passage of Prudentius above referred to speaks of them in the hymn on the Epiphany; Leo, in not a few of his homilies on the Epiphany, speaks of the Innocents (see e.g. Serm. 31-33, 35, 38; Patrol. liv, 234 sqq.), as also Fulgentius of Ruspe in a homily de Epiphania, deus Innocentium necis et muneribus mupurum (Patrol. lxx, 732). Subsequently a special day was set apart for the festival of the Innocents, a day in close proximity to that on which the Lord's Nativity is celebrated being chosen; but from the special association between the two events. Hence we find December 28 in the Western and December 29 in the Eastern church set apart for the commemoration of the Innocents. The date of the origin of the separate festival cannot be very closely defined. It is however mentioned in the Calendarium Carthaginiense, to whose date we can approximate from the fact that the latest martyrs commemorated are those who perished in the Vandal persecution under Huneric, 484 A.D. Here the notice is, "V. Kal. an. Sanctorum Innocentium, quos Herodes occidit" (Patrol. xlii, 1228). It may be added that Peter Chrysologus, bishop of Ravenna (ob. 459 A.D.), has left among his sermons, two de Infantium necis, quite apart from several others on the Epiphany (Serm. 152, 153; Patrol. lii, 604). It is needless to give here a list of later calendars and martyrologies, in which the festival of the Innocents uniformly occurs, but it may be noted that it subsequently acquired a considerable degree of importance, for in the Rule of Chrodegang, bishop of Metz (ob. 766 A.D.), the "festivitas Infantium" is included among the "solemnitates praeicipuae" (Reg. Chrodeg. c. 74; Patrol. lxxviii, 1009).

2. Liturgical notices.—The earliest of the Roman Sacramentaries, the Leonine, contains two masses for the festival of the Innocents, which follow immediately after that for St. John the Evangelist, and are headed In Natali Innocentium (Leonis Opp. vol. ii, 155, ed. Ballerini). We may call attention to the curious references in the Preface of the second mass to the prophecy of Jeremiah (xxi, 15), "Rachel plorans filios suos, noluit consolari, quia non sunt," where the mother's grief is explained as arising not from the death of her children, but because infants held worthy of receiving so great a renown were born not from her line, but from that of Leah. Elements from the Leonine Sacramentary are found embodied in the service for the day in the Gelasian (Patrol. lxxiv, 1080) and Gregorian Sacramentaries (col. 12, ed. Menard), in the latter case including a slightly modified form of the Preface,* which also appears in the service for the day in the Ambrosian liturgy (Pamelius, Liturg. Latt. i, 308). In the ancient Roman church a special degree of mournfulness was associated with this day, for we find in the Gregorian Liber Anti-homericus (col. 650, ed. Menard) the notice that the Gloria in Excelsis and Aleluia are not sung: "sed quasi pene tristitia dies illa deductur." Of this we may derive an illustration, though of much later date, from the Ordo Romanus (x, 20), which remarks that on this day, except it fell on a Sunday, the Romans abstain from flesh and fat. See also Amalarius (de Eccl. Off. l, 41; Patrol. cv, 1074), and the Micrologus (de Eccl. obs. c. 36; Patrol. cl, 1005), which mentions the further omission on this day of the Te Deum and Ite, missa est. He subjoins as a reason for the sadness attaching to this day, that the Innocents, though martyrs for Christ, "non tamen tamen ad gloriam, sed ad infernalem poenam discesserunt."

In the ancient lectionary of the Gallican church, the prophetic lection, epistle, and gospel were respectively Jer. xxxi, 15-20, Lev. vi, 9-11, Matt. ii, 1-23 (Mabillon, de Liturgi. Gallicana, lib. ii, p. 112; see also the service in the Gothic-Gallic missal, lib. iii, p. 198). In the Mozarabic liturgy, however, they are respectively Jer. xxxi, 15-20, 2 Cor. i, 2-7, Matt. xviii, 13-15, 1-6, 10, 11 (Missale Mixtum S. Isidori, p. 48, ed. Leslie).

The Micrologus (supra) refers to the octave of the festival of the Innocents as generally observed ("eodem modo ut aliorum Sanctorum celebratur"). It would seem, however, that this is of comparatively late date as a matter of general observance, for according to Binterim (Denkw. v, i, 552), it is wanting in many calendars of the 9th century. A curious mistake must be mentioned here into which several have fallen in connection with the octave of the festival of the Innocents. In the Indiculus operum S. Augustini by Possidius, is an entry "de die octavarum Infantium; duo" (Patrol. xli, 16). This has been taken by Baronius (Martyrologium Romanum, Dec. 28 and Jan. 4, not.) and others as showing the existence of an octave of the festival of the Innocents in Augustine's time. The two sermons, however, of Augustine refer to the first Sunday after Easter the octave of the day on which the sacrament of baptism had been received, "hodie octavae dicuntur infantium, revelanda sunt capita eorum" (Serm. 260, 378; Patrol. xxxviii, 1201, 1669).

Attention has already been called to the proximity of the festival of the Innocents to that of the Nativity, in consequence of the association of the two events commemorated. These two indeed, with the commemorations on the two intervening days of Stephen the protomartyr and John the disciple whom Jesus loved, may be supposed to form one combined festival, all centering in the idea of the Incarnation. Thus we have a homily of Bernard of Clairvaux de Quatuor continuis solemnitatibus, scilicet Nativitatis Domini ac Sanctorum Stephani, Johannis et Innocentium (Patrol. clxxxiii, 129).

The day for the commemoration of the Innocents in the Eastern church is December 29, but we find in the Armeno-Gregorian calendar (Neale, Eastern Church, Introd. p. 799) June 10 associated with them: this same calendar being one of those which gives from what original

This is also the case with the pictorial Moscow calendar prefixed by Papebroch to the Acta Sanctorum for May (vol. i. p. lxxii.).^a Numerous Eastern calendars, however, do not contain this absurd addition (see e.g. Ludolf, Festi Sacri Ecclesie Alexandrinæ, p. 18; Selden, ed. Synedii veterum Ebraeorum, pp. 214, 231, ed. INSACRATI. [IMPOSITION OF HANDS, § 1.] INSCRIPTIONS. In strictness of speech every inscribed monument falls under this category, unless the writing be upon skin or upon paper; and accordingly the great collections of Greek and Latin inscriptions recently published at Berlin include every kind of monument which is inscribed, coins only excepted. These are somewhat arbitrarily but at the same time profitably excluded, as belonging to a special department of study. But in common parlance, by inscriptions, the larger monuments in stone are intended, and in the following article comparatively little notice will be taken of any others. In treating of this vast subject it is proposed to take into account—(1) The literature of the subject, which is indeed the only division which can be treated at all comprehensively in an article like the present. (2) Technical execution. (3) Symbols. (4) A selection of inscriptions, with notes on some matters arising out of them. (5) Their language and styles. (6) The modes of dating them. (7) An enumeration of the abbreviations which occur on them.

(1) Literature of the Subject.—This matter is ably treated of by M. De Rossi in the first thirty-six pages of his preface to the Inscriptiones Christiane Urbis Romæ Septimo Saeculo Antiquiores (Rome, 1857-1861 fol.). The principal facts are as follows. The earliest collections of Christian inscriptions of which we have any knowledge belong to the age of Charles the Great, and were made, as De Rossi thinks, by scholars of Alcuin. The most ancient of these is contained in an Einsiedeln MS. written in the age of Alcuin; about a third of the whole collection is Christian, sepulchral examples however being wholly wanting. Various compilations of inscriptions were also now made, in which many of the epitaphs written by pope Damasus, among other Christian authors, were included; and the small remaining stone fragments of some of these can be completed with certainty by their aid. The collectors of these inscriptions cared little for their historical value, and commonly omitted all mention of their age or authors; they rather designed them to be models, after which similar verses might be composed. The others now remaining in whole or in great part are—(1) The Palatine MS. of the 11th century (now in the Vatican), edited by Gruter, Theat. Inscr., pp. MCLXIII.-MCLXXVII., who has omitted a few profane epigrams, which are interspersed. None of the Christian inscriptions seem to be later than the 9th century, and they were probably collected by some one who visited Rome and various other places in Italy about the close of that century. (2) A MS. of Kloster Neuburg, about the 11th century, consisting of Christian inscriptions exclusively, which were copied from Italian originals about the 8th century; they are almost all historical, many being by Damasus. (3) A Verdun MS. of the 10th century, containing thirty-one Roman inscriptions; a collection independent of, either of the preceding, made in the 8th or 9th century.

^a Le Blanc's catalogue of books relating to Christian epigraphy, published at the end of his Manuel, is a useful supplement to this, and brings the bibliography down to 1869. De Rossi is less careful to notice printed books than MS. collections, as being better known. After the publication of Martigny's papers by Mai in 1831 he ceased altogether

"Hæc tres antiquissimæ syllogæ omnes tran Alpes servatæ nobis sunt; necne quidquam his simile in Italiæ nostræ bibliothecis uspiam inveni . . . Primi ergo veterum inscriptionum amatores transalpini omnes fuerunt . . . Ab Alcuioiana ætate ad sæculum usque decimum quartum . . . antiquis inscriptionibus colligendis nemo videtur operam navasse" (De Rossi, u. s. pp. x.* xi.*).

The 15th century saw the revival of epigraphic studies, but among the inscriptions collected by Poggio, Sigonilli, Cyriaco, Feliciani, Marcanova, Pehem, Schedel, and others, those which are Christian "apparent rare," and are not separately classed. The earliest collector of purely Christian inscriptions, who lived in the age of the Renaissance, is Pietro Sabini, who in 1495 presented his work, in MS., comprising those which he had copied in Rome and out of it, both from the originals and from MSS., to Charles VIII., king of France. The MS. has been found in the library of St. Mark at Venice by De Rossi, who affirms that some of the inscriptions are very valuable, and have been copied by no other scholar; many however belong to a late period. A volume of inscriptions from the ancient churches of Rome, made by Giovanni Capoti in 1498, seems to have been of much the same character. The other collectors of inscriptions who lived from this time to the middle of the 16th, added scarcely anything (vix mediocre incrementum) to Christian epigraphy. Aldus Manutius the Younger however applied himself diligently to the collection of Christian inscriptions among others, and twenty volumes of these formed by various members of this illustrious family are preserved in the Vatican, from which De Rossi has derived no small profit. The most important of these was compiled in 1566 and 1567, and is entirely filled with inscriptions contained in Christian churches. The whole number of Christian inscriptions hitherto collected from all parts, from the 8th to the middle of the 16th century, excluding those of very recent date, is considerably less than a thousand; a great many of these being contained in MS. only.^b At present more than 11,000 Christian inscriptions earlier than the 7th century are known to have been found in Rome alone. With the exception of a few epitaphs by Damasus copied in tombs of the martyrs by the scholars of Alcuin, no subterranean inscription had hitherto been deciphered. But the discovery of the catacombs of Rome in 1578 marks a new era in the study. Ciaccone, L'Heureux or Macarius, Winghius, Ugone, and somewhat later in time, but first and foremost in diligence and success, Antonio Bosio, were among the earliest explorers, and all were more or less addicted to the study of Christian inscriptions. Soon after this time the Christian inscriptions occupy a distinct place in Gruter's Corpus Inscriptionum, published in 1616; but besides the Palatine Collection mentioned above, all the others together reach only about 150, although many more had been now copied in Rome by several of his friends. There can be no doubt that Gruter cared comparatively little about this class of inscriptions. The extensive and accurate transcripts of Bosio were transferred, after his death in 1629, to Severani, who published the Roma Sotteranea in 1632; which was republished in an enlarged Latin form by Aringhi, in two folio volumes, in 1650.^c During the half century that followed the publication of Gruter's great work, many scholars collected additional Christian inscriptions, some of the most important of which are still in MS. Especially to be named are those of J. B. Doui (died 1647), preserved in the Marculli library at Florence, "codex inter primaria operis mei subsidia numerandus" (De Rossi); of Sirmoud (died 1651), in the Bibliothèque Nationale at Paris (very valuable, containing many still unpublished), and of Peirese (died 1637), whose Inscriptiones Christianæ et novæ were consulted at Paris by De Rossi, who speaks of their value, more especially for the inscriptions of Gaul. To these should be added the collections of F. Ptolomeo (made about 1666), preserved in the public library of Sienna, of which Muratori made much use, and those of Brutio, in seventeen volumes, finished in 1679, preserved in the Vatican, whose value is scarcely proportional to their bulk. Between Aringhi (1650) and Fabretti, whose folio volume on inscriptions appeared in 1702, Montfaucon alone (so thinks De Rossi) can be regarded as having materially added to the knowledge of Christian epigraphy; his MSS. were examined at Paris by De Rossi, who thence derived some valuable additions to his Roman inscriptions. It deserves however to be recorded that William Fleetwood, fellow of King's College, Cambridge, afterwards bishop of Ely, published in 1691 an Inscriptionum Antiquarum Sylloge (Lond. 8vo), in two parts; the second part, "Christianæ monumenta antiqua quæ hactenus innotuerunt omnia collectitur:" these occupy nearly two hundred pages, and are occasionally accompanied by brief notes.^d Zaccaria several times notices this work controversially or otherwise (Diss. de Vet. Inscr. usu, pp. 326, 327, 370, 382, 384, 388, 399), and it is frequently quoted by other epigraphists as by Marini, Le Blant, and De Rossi himself, though he has not named it in his introduction. Fabretti's labours are both skilful and accurate; but the types which the printer made use of were inadequate to express the true reading of his inscriptions. Boldetti and Marangoni, who laboured in concert in the same field as Bosio had done, "are ^b Dr. McCaul (Christian Epitaphs, pref. p. iv, note) observes that these volumes "have a reputation far beyond their merits." There is no doubt, he adds, that some forger of inscriptions imposed both on Severani and Aringhi. De Rossi promises a detailed account of this matter, p. xxvii.*

^c We can do less afford to pass it over, though it appears to be little else but a compilation from other authors, as it is almost the only work on Christian epigraphy expressly devoted to the subject, that has appeared in this country till quite lately.

^b The Edinburgh Review for 1864, p. 221, goes so far as to say that "the results of the whole epoch (of the revival of letters) may be summed up in the single statement, that more than a century had elapsed after the discovery of printing before a single inscription of the early Christian centuries had been given to the world." Various MS. volumes are mentioned by De Rossi (u. s. pp. xiv.-xvii.) of which no notice is taken here.

made especially memorable by one of those catas-trophies, which occasionally diversify the monotonous history of student life. They had spent more than thirty years in the exploration of the catacombs and other sacred antiquities of Rome.
 Boldetti's volume, published in 1720 at Rome but by far the greater part still remained in MS., when in 1737 an unlucky fire destroyed in a few hours the fruit of all these years of toil-add, was complete and irreparable. Boldetti's great age precluded all hopes of his being able to repair his portion of the work. Marangoni although grievously depressed resumed his labours with great energy; but M. De Rossi has everywhere sought in vain for the results of his 222). The destruction of these papers has left a void which can hardly be supplied; the chambers which they explored are now "demolita et horrendum in modum vastata." (De Rossi). Bold-etti indeed and those whom he employed to copy the inscriptions have been proved to be very inaccurate both as regards the sites of their discovery and the reading of the texts; "ei me intissimum esse profiteor," says De Rossi (p. xxvii.*). Marangoni was much more exact, and his Appendix ad Acta S. Victorini, Rom. 1740, is a work of considerable value. P. Lupi, a friend of these scholars, has left, besides various printed works relating to epigraphy, a valuable collection of inscriptions preserved in MS. in the Vatican at Rome; and a similar collection by the celebrated Buonarrotti is preserved at Florence.

 It became evident that the time had now arrived when a fresh collection of Christian inscriptions should incorporate the previous discoveries of so many scholars. The industrious Gori projected such a work, in which they should be so arranged as to illustrate the doctrines, the ceremonies, the hierarchy and the discipline of the church. But his other engagements prevented. The MSS. however of his friends Stosch, Ficoroni and others, containing materials for the work, are stored up in the Marcucelli Library at Florence, where they were consulted with profit by De Rossi. The task was in some measure executed by the indefatigable Muratori, whose Nexus Thesaurus Veterum Inscriptionum, published at Milan in 1739 in four folio volumes, contains, in addition to the profane inscriptions, a larger number of Christian ones than had ever yet appeared, being taken both from printed and from MS. sources; but the work was very under-critically executed, and his conjectural additions are not distinguished from the actual readings of the broken inscriptions. Maffei, who has been called the founder of lapidary criticism, had undertaken in conjunction with Séguier a great body of inscriptions, in which there should be a purely Christian division; but both these and various other scholars, who had cherished like good intentions, bore no fruit to perfection.
 It now also again entered into the minds of more than one divine to turn the extant mass

* De Rossi (under his Inscr. Crd. Rom. n. 17, p. 24) of Christian inscriptions to theological account; and with somewhat better success. The learned Jesuit A. F. Zaccaria contemplated a very extensive work, in which the more interesting Christian inscriptions should be arranged under the following heads: (i.) Religio in Deum; (ii.) Religio in Sanctos; (iii.) Templi; (iv.) Temporum ornamenta, vasa sacra, idque genus Hierarchia ecclesiasticae ac primo Romani Pontificis; (viii.) Episcopi; (ix.) Presbyteri; (x.) Monachi; (xiii.) Laici; (xiv.) Laici dignitate praestantes; (xv.) Artes atque officia minorā; (xvi.) Leges ecclesiasticae (De Rossi, u. s. p. xxx.*) This magniloquent announcement however was never carried out; but a kind of first fruits were put forth in 1762 in a treatise entitled De veterum Christianorum in rebus theologicis usu. In this work he brings together with a considerable amount of industry and learning such inscriptions as bear or seem to bear upon the doctrine of the church; "quae non diuturnae, ne haereticis cavillandi detur occasio" (Theol. Diss. p. 325). Martigny however calls it "un livre mediocre;" and speaks of his friend and imitator, Danzetta, as having written "avec moins de succès encore." (Dict. p. 305).

 The bearing of inscriptions upon doctrinal or disciplinary controversy is "a perfectly legitimate use of the subject," and indeed its true ultimate end, but one for which from the insufficiency of the data the time had not [in the 18th century] fully arrived." (Edinburgh Review, u. s. p. 224.) Nor can it be said to have fully arrived now. In a few years' time it will probably be otherwise.
 Zaccaria in his later years encouraged a rising young scholar, Gaetano Marini, to undertake the task which he had found to be too much for himself. Marini set about the work with great spirit, and from 1785 to 1801 worked at it, not exclusively indeed, but yet so as never to allow account of his preparations and of the merits and defects of his performances is given by De Rossi (u. s. pp. xxxi.-xxxii.). By help of his friends in Italy and his own labour he had amassed about 8000 Christian inscriptions in Latin, and about 750 in Greek from all parts of the world, of the first ten centuries. But these were in a confused, imperfect and unorthodox state. "Murini's labours were interrupted by the French Revolution; and at his death he bequeathed to the Vatican Library the materials which he had compiled, and which, having first time (see Præfatio generalis). Le Blanc (in his Bibliographie) gives 1761 as the date. It has been republished by Migne in his Cursus Theol. completus.

It would seem from De Rossi's remarks (p. xxxi.*) that his Theologia Lapidaria exists only in MS. (in the Vatican). He gained from it a few unpublished inscriptions which Danzetta had taken from the papers of Ma-recently been put in order by M. De Rossi are found to fill no fewer than 31 volumes. Among these, four volumes had been partially prepared for publication, of which the first was in a comparatively forward state. This is the Inscriptionum Christianarum pars prima, which is printed in the fifth volume of Mai's Scriptorium Veterum Nova Collectio, in 1831. And perhaps it may be said that it is to the incomplete and unsatisfactory condition of the remaining portion of Marini's papers that we are indebted for much of the far more critical and scholarly work of M. De Rossi, entitled Inscriptiones Urbis Romae Septimo Saeculo antiquiores (Rome, 1857-61, fol. pp. 619+123 prol. +40 praf.) This publication was undertaken at the express solicitation of Cardinal Mai, who finding the task of preparing for the press the rest of Marini's materials entirely incompatible with his other engagements, transferred to his young and learned friend the undertaking for which his tastes, his studies, and his genuine love of the subject pointed him out to Mai as eminently fitted." (Edinburgh Rev. u. s. pp. 224, 225, slightly altered.) The first volume of this great work, the only one known to the writer, and perhaps the only one yet published, contains those Roman inscriptions only whose precise or approximate date is positively known.¹ The number of these is 1126; among which we have one belonging to the first century, two to the beginning of the second (all very brief and unimportant), and twenty-three to the third; the fourth and fifth centuries have between four and five hundred each, and the sixth century a little more than two hundred. Fragments and additional inscriptions contained in the appendices bring the number up to 1374.

The second part of his work is intended to include select inscriptions interesting for their theological and historical worth; and in the last place he will include all the remaining inscriptions arranged according to the localities where they were found; and also the Jewish inscriptions found in Rome.²

We can afford no more space to notice this masterly performance, which every one who desires to become acquainted with Christian inscriptions must necessarily study; an interesting account of it, and also of the work following will be found in the Edinburgh Review for July, 1854.

The impulse given to Christian epigraphy by De Rossi's great work, and by his other works of smaller dimensions³ has been manifested by the publication of other books relating to the subject, among which those which comprise the Christian inscriptions en masse of particular countries hold the first rank. And among these we must place at the head the Inscriptions Chrétiennes de la Gaule antérieures au VIII^{me} Siècle, edited and annotated by M. Edmond Le Blant, in 2 vols 4to., Paris, 1856, and 1865, comprising 708 inscriptions, nearly all Latin, but a few Greek, and a few also written in Runic.⁴ The earliest dated inscription belongs to the year 334, and the latest to 695; but only four of these are as early as the 4th century. Of the rest that are dated about 50 belong to the 5th century, nearly 100 to the 6th, and 13 to the 7th century. A few which are undated are certainly before the age of Constantine (Manuel, p. 124).

The same learned author has likewise more recently, in 1869, written a Manuel d'Épigraphie Chrétienne d'après les marbres de la Gaule, accompagnée d'une bibliographie spéciale, i. e., a catalogue of books relating to Christian epigraphy generally, Paris, sm. 8vo. pp. 267. Although this valuable⁵ work refers more especially to Gaulish inscriptions, there is a great deal about others also; in particular his enumeration of formulæ (Greek and Latin) which occur in different parts of the Christian world, in Europe, Asia and Africa, where different provinces have their own styles of epigraphy, is peculiarly instructive (pp. 76-81), and a translation will be found below. The Christian inscriptions of Spain have very recently been edited by one of the most eminent living epigraphists, Prof. E. Hübnér, of Berlin. His Inscriptiones Hispaniae Christianae was published at Berlin in 1871, and includes 209 inscriptions, besides 89 others of the medieval period comprised in the appendix. Of the earlier ones two or three only can be referred to the 4th century; the others are of the 5th, 6th, 7th and 8th centuries; about half of them are dated, the earliest being of the year 455, and the latest being 782. Nearly all are in Latin; a very few only in Greek. A splendid publication commenced in 1870, entitled Christian Inscriptions in the Irish Language, chiefly collected and drawn by G. Petrie, I.L.D., edited by M. Stokes, Dublin, printed at the University, 4to. Four parts have now (1874) been published. These of Clonmacnois (above 100 in number) range from valuable information for inscriptions among other antiquities. Other works of his (some unknown to the writer) on this subject are enumerated by L. Blant in his Bibliographie at the end of his Manuel d'Épigraphie.

⁴ Both this and Hübnér's work (see below) give details for each inscription in the same exact and comprehensive manner as De Rossi, and are accompanied by numerous plates. M. Le Blant has subsequently obtained additional inscriptions from various parts of France and Switzerland, which will one day, he hopes, form a rich supplement to his former work (Manuel, p. 1).

² Under each inscription mention is made of the place where it was found, where it has been edited, if at all, or from what MSS. It has been copied by the editor, if he have not himself transcribed it. Plates are in most cases added. If the inscriptions were more frequently written out in common minuscules, besides being figured, they would be more easily read by the non-antiquarian scholar or student.

³ His Buletino di Archeologia Cristiana, of which the first volume (in twelve monthly parts) appeared in 1863 (Roma, tipografia Salviocci, 4to) is a magazine of most er-books relating to the subject, which comprise the Christian use of particular countries hold and among these we must place Inscriptions Chrétiennes de la an VIII^{me} Siècle, edited and Edmond Le Blanc, in 2 vols and 1865, comprising 708 in all Latin, but a few Greek, and in Runes.²⁰ The earliest dates to the year 331, and the only four of these are as early as 331. Of the rest that are dated to the 5th century, nearly 100 to the 7th century. A few are certainly before the age of the 7th century.

The author has likewise more written a Manuel d'Épigraphie des lettres de la Gaule, ac-bibliographie spéciale, i. e., a work relating to Christian epigraphy, Paris, sm. 8vo. pp. 267. Al-though the work refers more especially to Gaul, there is a great deal about particular his enumeration of (and Latin) which occur in the Christian world, in Europe, where different provinces have of epigraphy, is peculiarly in-teresting, and a translation will be the Christian inscriptions of Spain have been edited by one of the best epigraphists, Prof. E. Hübn-er, Inscriptions Hispaniæ Chris-tianæ at Berlin in 1871, and in-cludes, besides 89 others of the period comprised in the appendix. Of these only three can be referred to; the others are of the 5th, 6th, and 7th centuries; about half of them being of the year 455, and 782. Nearly all are in Latin; a few in Greek. A splendid publication of 1870, entitled Christian Inscr-ptions in Language, chiefly collected and edited by M. Stokes, at the University, 4to. Four volumes (1874) been published. These of over 100 in number) range from in for inscriptions among other sub-jects of his (some unknown to the subject are enumerated by Le Blanc in his end of his Manuel d'Épigraphie. Hübn-er's work (see below) give details in the same exact and comprehensive manner, and are accompanied by numerous plates that has since been obtained additional curious parts of France and Switzerland, and he hopes, form a rich supplement to the work. It is to be regretted that so useful together with a little more fulness and added into nineteen chapters, but nothing beginning of the work or at the head of the contents of the chapters; the list at the end of the volume scarcely satisfies of the bibliographer, as it almost for-gets the name or initials of the authors of the number of volumes in each work. It will be found very helpful without being complete, particularly as regards the 7th to the 12th century in a regular series; and by their help it is hoped that a key to the approximate date of such works in other parts of the country as well as in other parts of the British Islands may be obtained. They occupy the first part of the work. All the above works are beautifully illustrated with figures. There are also other recent books which deal with the Christian inscriptions of particular regions. Among them are to be named C. Gazzera, Delle iscrizioni cristiane antiche del Piemonte discorso, Torino, 1850, 4to. (also in Mem. Accad. di Torino, 1851); J. B. De Rossi, De Christianis titulis C-orthoginiensibus (in Pitræ Spicil. Solesm. vol. 4); and (along with the Pagan inscriptions) L. Renier, Inscriptions Romanæ de l'Algérie, Paris, 1858, fol.

The Corpus Inscriptionum Latinarum, whose publication is still going forward at Berlin, includes, with specified exceptions, all Latin inscriptions, both Pagan and Christian, which can be placed with certainty or reasonable probability before 600 A.D. (see pref. to vols. ii. and iii.). The Christian inscriptions are distinguished in the indices by a dagger prefixed.

A great number of Welsh inscriptions, the earliest being probably about the 7th century, will be found in the numerous volumes of the Archæologia Cambrensis, 1846, sqq. 8vo., mostly described by the well-known palæographer Prof. Westwood. But a conspectus of the whole of the early Christian inscriptions of Great Britain and Ireland will, it is to be hoped, in process of time be included in Messrs. A. W. Haddan and W. Stubbs' Councils and Ecclesiastical Documents relating to Great Britain, of which the first volume appeared at Oxford in 1869, 8vo., part of the second in 1871, and the third in 1873. The very scanty inscribed Christian remains of the Roman period will be found at vol. i. pp. 39, 40; vol. ii. p. xxii. (Addenda)

* It is astonishing how small a number of Latin Christian inscriptions (or, at any rate inscriptions known to be Christian) occur in some countries. In vol. iii. edited by Mommsen, which includes Egypt, Asia, Illyricum, and the provinces of European Greece, there are only about thirty inscriptions which can be counted upon as Christian out of 6574. Of these several were found together at a place in Dalmatia.

* The books where the inscriptions are described and figured are fully detailed under each inscription in the same complete manner as in De Rossi's, Le Blanc's, and Hübn-er's works already mentioned. It is hardly necessary therefore to say much of any of them here; many of them are periodicals, others are monographs on particular classes of monuments, particularly Stuart's Sculptured Stones of Scotland (printed for the Spalding Club, Edinb. 1856-1867, 2 vols. fol.); G. Stephen's Old Northern Runic Monuments (London and Copenhagen, 2 vols. fol. 1868-1868); Munch's edition of the Chron. Manniæ (Christian, 1860). A great number also of topographical and archaeological works by Lysons, Hodgson, Nichols, C. Roach Smith, Horsley, Borlase, &c. are brought under contribution.

* The Lincoln inscription is considered by Hübn-er (Inscr. Brit. Lat. n. 191) to be of the 16th century. If it deserves the name must be struck off. The christiana, however, has been found on six or seven monuments of different kinds (without counting coins), once with the name of a (Hobbs and Stubbs, u. s.). The christiana occurs Hübn-er (u. s. p. 240, n. 27), who likewise gives two rings with the Christian acclamation, "VIVAS IN DEO," found and p. 51. To these will perhaps be added a Roman inscription found at Sen-mills, near Bristol, in 1873, seen by the writer, but whether it be Christian or no "adhuc sub jussu h. est." The sepulchral Christian inscriptions in Celtic Britain, A.D. 450-700, mostly in Latin, but one or two in Welsh, vol. i. pp. 182-169; some few of the Latin inscriptions being accompanied by Ogham characters. The same class of inscriptions in Wales, A.D. 700-1100, vol. i. pp. 625-633 (Latin); the inscriptions of Scottish and English Cumbrria (A.D. 450-900, vol. ii. pp. 51-56), some Latin, some (at Ruthwell near Dumfries, and at Bewcastle in Cumberland) Runic. The inscribed monuments (very few) in the Pictish and Scottish kingdoms (AD. 400-900), partly Latin, partly in Runes and Oghams, are in vol. ii. pp. 125-132; those of the Isle of Man, nearly all Runes, of Norwegian origin (one may be Gaelic), and inscribed on crosses, whose date is not given, will be found in vol. ii. pp. 185-187. There still remain to follow the Saxon inscriptions of the period of the Heptarchy and the Monarchy.*

A work has yet to be mentioned, which is perhaps of greater importance to the student of Christian epigraphy than any which has been already named, De Rossi's only excepted; viz., the Christian inscriptions, which are contained in Böckh's Corpus Inscriptionum Græcarum (vol. iv. fasc. 2, Berlin, 1859, fol. plates). They are collected and edited by Prof. A. Kirchhoff, the same great epigraphist who has just been occupied upon the Corpus Inscriptionum Atticarum. The Christian inscriptions begin at No. 8606 and terminate at No. 9893, besides a few in the Addenda; thus making a total of nearly 1300 inscriptions of all ages and in almost all parts of the Roman world, down to the fall of the in England (pp. 234, 235), as well as other places which seem to be Christian. The Romano-Christian remains in Britain are so extremely rare that it seems to be worth while to make these slight additions to what will be found in Messrs. Haddan and Stubbs' work. Mr. Wright's statement (Celt. Roman and Saxon, p. 293) that "not a trace of Christianity is found among the innumerable religious and sepulchral monuments of the Roman period found in Britain," cannot be safely contradicted. The Westminster and Bristol monuments may possibly be exceptions. So much can hardly be said of Christian. See Dr. McCaul's remarks on the Chesterholm stone in the Canadian Journal for 1874.

* Until these appear, it may be useful to indicate some of the principal sources of information. In addition to the books already referred to, among which Professor G. Stephen's Runic Monuments is the principal, Pogg's Sylloge and Camden's Britannia, with the additions of Gibson and Gough, may be omitted. Among the periodicals, the Yorkshire Archæological and Topographical Journal and the Proceedings of the West Riding of Yorkshire Geol. and Polytechnic Society are more especially to be mentioned, where the Runic and other early inscriptions of Yorkshire are described by the Rev. D. Halgh and the Rev. J. Fowler. Professor Hübn-er informs the writer that he hopes his Inscriptions Britannicæ Christianæ will appear in the course of 1875, which will be analogous in all respects to the Inscr. Brit. Lat. It includes all Latin inscriptions down to about 200 y.c. "As there are in Wales some few in Oghams only, what the rest is in part bilingual, I do not," he says, "exclude those few merely Celtic ones."

Byzantine empire. To these are to be added about sixty already included in the earlier parts of the book, which are evidently of Christian times ("quos Christiane esse aetatis apparet"). They are divided into three classes. (1) Tituli operum publicorum et votivi, the first division of which is arranged chronologically, the second comprising those whose age is uncertain. Of the former division there are 175, but none is earlier than the 4th century, a copy of a letter of St. Athanasius, the only authority for the Greek text, being perhaps the earliest of all; there are only six or seven others which can be referred to the 4th century. The fifty-eight which follow these comprise all which are of the fifth and following centuries, several of them being in verse, to the death of Charlemagne, of which number about twelve belong to the age of Justinian (A.D. 527-565). The most important of these perhaps is a copy of the paschal canon of St. Hippolytus, which appears to have been engraved in the reign of Theodosius; most of the others are inscriptions on various kinds of buildings, such as churches, monasteries, hospitals, towers, and there are two or three which are invocations of the Virgin and the saints, or prayers for the welfare of the persons mentioned.

(2) The second class comprises 156 inscriptions on mosaics, tessellae and other vessels, glass, lamps, triptychs or other wooden tablets, "et variae supellectilis sacrae et profanae, ponderum, sigillorum, amuletorum, gemmarum" (Nos. 8953-9109). About seventy of these are on seals (nearly all lead); a few are as early as the 7th and 8th centuries. Some of those however on gems and glass are much earlier, and some notice has been taken of these in the articles on those subjects in this Dictionary.

(3) The remaining class contains no less than 783 inscriptions, all sepulchral, and these are arranged by the regions in which they are found. Those which bear dates are comparatively very few. (a) Egypt, Nubia, and the rest of Africa (Nos. 9110-9137); (b) Syria (Nos. 9138-9154); (c) Asia Minor (Nos. 9155-9287); (d) Greece and Illyricum (Nos. 9288-9449, of which 114 are from Athens); (e) Sicily and Malta (Nos. 9450-9540); (f) Italy and Sardinia (Nos. 9541-9885); (g) Gaul and Germany (Nos. 9886-9893).

Various other Greek Christian inscriptions have been since published; in particular, it may be observed that a few have been found in Spain and Algeria, countries from which Kirchoff has not given a single example (Hübner, u. s. p. v. praef.; Rénier, u. s. pp. 255, 349).

From what has now been said, it must be apparent how utterly hopeless and impossible it is to give within the limits of an article in a dictionary a satisfactory account of this immensely numerous class of Christian antiquities. The most important aid which such an article can render must be to indicate the principal sources of information; and these, if De Rossi's labours are carried out, will be very largely increased in the course of a few years.

A little work however has been published at Toronto in 1869 by the Rev. John McCaul, LL.D., in which a judicious selection of a hundred "Christian epitaphs of the first six centuries" (Greek and Latin from various parts of the world, especially from Rome) has been brought together and ably commented upon. They occupy sixty-eight pages, and an introduction relating to the language, names, and dates employed fill up twenty-eight more. Besides these we have a brief preface pointing out the necessity of caution in using uncritical books, like those of Aringhi and Boldetti, and giving amusing examples of forgeries of Christian inscriptions, which have deceived some learned writers even of the present century. To those who cannot give any great amount of attention to the subject, this little work may be heartily recommended, as it bears every mark of conscientious care and of strict honesty.

(ii) Technical Execution and Materials employed.—The modes of writing employed have much the same variations as in all ages: the letters are most commonly engraved with a chisel below the surface of the stone, and then occasionally coloured (red) or gilded; sometimes the letters are scratched with the point of some instrument, a nail or the like (fig. 1); on some gems the

Besides these we have pointing out the necessity of uncritical books, like those of detti, and giving amusing exeries of Christian inscriptions, ived some learned writers even entary. Christian inscriptions (figs. 2, 5, 6). Some of the above remarks are illustrated by the inscriptions figured above and below, to be more fully described under TOMBS. The reader may see more on this subject in Martigny's Dict. s. v. Inscriptions, §§ II., III.; but it can only be studied to advantage by examining the plates in such works as De Rossi's Roma Sotterranea.

The letters have the same varieties of form, such as uncial, minuscule, rustic, and ligated, which are common to MSS. and monuments of all kinds, and their execution varies from extreme neatness (figs. 6, 10) and even beauty to extreme ugliness and carelessness (litterae rusticae) (figs. 1, 8). Of the former sort the characters employed by pope Damasus in the 4th century are the most remarkable, their apices being ornamented with little hooks (fig. 7). They are called after him

u. s. p. 116; De Rossi, Bull. Arch. Crist. 1863, p. 18.

(iii.) Symbols.—Of the symbols which are found with some Christian inscriptions, the principal are the following: the fish, the anchor, the dove, the Good Shepherd, the chrisma, the alpha and omega, and the cross in various forms. These will be found described under their respective heads (also noticed under GEMS and MOSAICS), and they may be regarded as either exclusively or prin-cially Christian symbols. The palm which is also found, and that very commonly, is, like the phoenix, Christianised; but it occurs also on pagan and Jewish inscriptions. It must be sufficient to refer to a table indicating the symbols on the early Roman and Gaulish sepulchral inscriptions (by far the most complete series), and the observed dates of their introduction and disappearance, given by M. Le Blant (Manuel, p. 29). For symbols generally see Raoul Rochette, Talonné des Catacombes de Rome, pp. 229 sqq., Paris, 1853, and the authors named at the beginning and end of the book.

(iv.) Select Inscriptions.—These consist of such examples, arranged chronologically, in prose and verse, as are connected with churches or their furniture or adjuncts, and they have mostly some further interest of their own. No uniform system of printing has been followed. Sometimes the mere transcript of the letters seems to be sufficient; sometimes the words have been written out (corrected and at length) below these; sometimes a translation has been added; also such ones as seemed desirable.

M. Héniery reads the end of the last line but one titulum marmoreum anno primo Severiani, viri clarissimi. If this be right, as seems very probable (though De Rossi feels some doubts, Prod. Inscr. Urb. Rom. p. xi), the mode of dating is very unusual. Other Mauretanian inscriptions are dated by the era of the province, i. e. 40 A.D. when it was reduced by the Romans (M. Gaul. Christ. Epit. p. 37).

The words oeclesia fratrum indicate the restoration of the inscription to be "assai antico" (De Rossi); the original was probably broken during the tumults against the Christians, A.D. 258-304, as De Rossi thinks; and the restored marble tablet would seem to have been put up in the first year of Severianus, probably the Roman governor of Mauretania. One of the earliest Christian inscriptions, not being an epitaph, which have come down to us in any form.

The date of this consulpship of Gratian with Merobaudas is A.D. 377, the earliest date of any public monument yet known, bearing the chrismna. The next earliest is A.D. 390, on a column of St. Paul's basilica, extra muros, Rome. It is wonderful that the former church should be spoken of as old so early as A.D. 377; it can hardly be doubted that it was a Christian or a Christianised building. Le Blant's observation that this church-restoration is precisely contemporaneous with the greatest abundance of Mithraic monuments and those of Cybele is worthy to be noted. The abbreviations at the end are probably for vir praepositus praetorio dedicavit. Tab., i. e. men like Asclepiodotus. De Rossi, however (Bull. di Arch. Crist. 1867, p. 25), who evidently considers Asclepiodotus to be the author of the verses, refers titulos to aedos ("che li dedicò alla republica"). He takes the building to be "il palazzo dei presidi imperiali," the chrismna and devotio notwithstanding.

Hilarus was pope from A.D. 462 to 467; and the inscription has the appearance of being contemporary. The ancient baptisteries were commonly placed under the patronage of St. John the Baptist; and both they and the fonts which they contained were frequently inscribed. Ciampini gives both kinds of inscriptions from the Baptistery of the Lateran, which are said to have been there in the 5th century; but this edifice has been often remodelled. (See Ciamp. de Sacr. Edif. c. iii., Mart. Dict., p. 321; Hübner, Arch. Chret. p. 5, Guerber's French transl. 1866.)

For this class of inscriptions generally see the posthumous papers of Marini published by Mai, Script. Vet. Noe. Collect. t. v., pp. 167-177.

Diction barbarous, as frequently in these Spanish inscriptions. The church seems to have been completed under the auspices of a nun, named Marispalla; probably the text really is having a stroke above them, which may have been obliterated or accidentally omitted. The inscription is interesting as being doubtly dated, both by the Spanish era and by the reign of the Visigothic king. The Spanish era, whose origin is uncertain, but which appears to commence A.C. 38 (see Hubner, praef., p. vi.), is the era most commonly used to mark the time of the Spanish Christian inscriptions; about 100 of them are thus dated (Hubner, p. 109), the earliest appears to be A.D. 466, and the latest A.D. 762. Both the proper names in the inscription are Gothic (see Hubner, praef., p. vii., who gives several others); the remark of M. Canl (u. s., p. xxi.) that Gothic names are "very rarely" found in inscriptions does not apply to Spain.

The motive of the founders is here sufficiently clearly expressed, that they may enjoy eternal rest through the prayers of the saint. They do not, however, actually invoke him.

Holy Mary, God-bearer (Deipara), guard the kingdom of the Christ-loving Justinian and his faithful servants Victorinus with them that live godly in Corinth.

Sixth century, between A.D. 527 and 565.
 Other and even stronger invocations of saints occur about this time. In one, too long to quote at length, Demetrius is invoked by Justinian to aid him against his enemies, in the capacity of a mediator with God (ὁ μεγαλομάρτυς Δημήτριε μεσίτευσον πρὸς θεῶν ἕνα. κ.τ.λ. n. 8642).
 Another inscription, mutilated, from Thera (San-tovin), of uncertain date, not later than the 4th or 5th century at latest according to Ross, begins—Ἐγὼ καὶ φοβέρε Μιχαὴλ ἀρχάγγελε, CHRIST. ANT.

βοῦθε! τῷ δούλῳ σου Ἰερώνῳ (n. 8911). Votive tablets were also erected to saints; one from the cemetery of Cyrinus in Rome runs thus:
Petrus et Pancratia votum posuunt (sic) marturis Felicitati. (Marini, u. s., p. 15.) In another, found near the baths of Diocletian, Cummisus and Victorinus pay their vows (votum reddunt) Domnis Sanctis Pappo et Mauroleoni marturibus (Id. p. 14).

The expression, μήτηρ Θεοῦ (Mother of God), the usual title of the Virgin on the early medieval camei (see GEMS) had not yet come into common use in the Greek church, as appears from Ephraim, patriarch of Antioch, as appears from Ephraim, patriarch of Antioch, a contemporary of Justinian. See Pearson On the Creed,

This is considered by Martigny to be in all appearance the "ministerial" (sacramental) chalice given by St. Remigius himself to the church of Rheims; see also Archæol. Journ.
 1848, p. 134. The magnificent chalice of gold which goes by the name of Remigius, formerly at Rheims, now in the Paris Library, is of the 12th century (Arch. Journ. n. s.). For other inscriptions on chalices, see Marini, u. s. p. 197.

 n. 574. Engraved on the four scalloped edges of a square marble altar slab formerly in the ancient cathedral of Bodez.

DEVSDEDIT EPS INDIVNVS FIERI IVSSIT HANC ARAM.

Deusdedit is supposed to have been bishop of Rodez about the end of the 6th century; the inscription is doubtless a contemporary composition, but the letters and the sign of contraction æ are suspected of having been restored.

The name Deusdedit occurs also on a gem (see GEMS); the form Deusdet is likewise found more than once in inscriptions (Le Blant, u. s. p. 433); for similar instances, see Names below. For the altars of Christian churches ara (though as old as Tertullian) is less commonly used than altare, especially in prose. For other inscriptions on altars see Marini (u. s. pp. 74-80). This and the altar at Ham of the 7th century are among the earliest that are inscribed (Le Blant, n. 91).

10. Camden, Britan. § "Brigantes," ed. 1600: "Accipimus cruce[m] hic (at Dewsbury, Yorkshire) existisse, in qua inscriptum fuit:

PAVLINVS HIC PRAEDICAVIT ET CELE-BRAVIT."

Paulinus was bishop of York, A.D. 625-664.
 The inscription upon it is among the earliest that we have in England, which are not sepulchral. Fragments of the ancient cross itself, probably broken at the Reformation, which Leland, in his Itinerary, mentions having seen, bearing the above inscription (temp. Henr. VIII.), have been built up against the church there. The miracles of Cana and the multiplication of five loaves and three fishes were represented thereon, and a few Latin words of the Gospels in Runesque characters can still be read. (Figured and described by the Rev. J. T. Fowler, in a recent number of the Yorkshire Archaeol. and Top. Journal.)

The most remarkable cross of the same kind as the present is that at Ruthwell, near Dumfries (then part of Northumbria), with Scriptural and other scenes, and Latin legends from the Gospels, &c.; also having extracts from a poem by Cedman, entitled A Dream of the Holy Wood, written in Runes, near the edges. It is between seventeen and eighteen feet high, and appears to be of the 8th century. For a full account of it see Stephens, Runic Mon., vol. ii., pp. 405-448, with figure.

11. Copy of the dedication stone of Jarrow chapel, Durham, made in 1863 by the Rev. J. T. Fowler. Marini, u. s. p. 163; Camden, Brit. 956 (Gibs). Pegge, Sylloge, p. 15, pl. 1 (in Nich. Bibl. Top. Brit. vol. vi.).

It is now over the nave-arch of the church, "and may be original" (Fowler, in litt.).¹ The forms of the letters O and C, and their inconspicuity, quite favour this supposition.

DEDICATIO BASILICAE
SCI PAVLI VIII KL MAI ANNO XV EGFRIIDI REG
CEOLFRIIDI ABB EIVSDEM
Q. ECCLESIE DO AVCTORE
CONDITORIS ANNO IIII

The date is A.D. 685, determined by the reign of Egfrith, king of Northumbria. One of the very few early English inscriptions which bear a date.

The basilica or chapel of the monastery has been converted into the parish church, some remaining parts of which "are generally supposed to be of ante-Norman date" (G. G. Scott's Report). For the history, see Flor. Wiporn. s. n. 682. Benedict Biscop should rather be called the founder than Ceolfriith, whom he appointed as the first abbot.

The above scanty selection must suffice for this place. More is to be sought in other articles under AMPULLA, GEMS, GLASS, LAMPS, MONEY, MOSAICS, SEALS, and TOMBS.

(v.) Language and Style of the Christian Inscriptions.

A. Orthography, Inflections, and choice of Words.—While some of the Christian inscriptions are composed with correctness and even with elegance both in prose and verse, there are others which are written barbarously as respects the letters, the forms of words, the declensions, the genders, the conjugations, the syntax, and the prosody.

It would scarcely fall within the province of this article to enter into the grammar or rather non-grammar of the language of the latter sort. It partakes of the barbarisms with which various non-Christian inscriptions are more or less disfigured,² and which have even found their way into literature in their most aggravated shapes, if the Formularies of the monk Marculfus (circa 680 A.D.) can be called literature. In the Greek Christian inscriptions the frequent and various changes of vowels and diphthongs are the most noticeable particularity. Thus κείρα is written κετε, or κιτη, or κητη. Ἡράκλειος becomes Ηρακλιος or Ηρακλιος, κοιμητήριον is changed into κομητεριον, τελειωθῆς becomes τελειωθεις, ἐξων is written ερον, μικᾶ is simply μικα, and the i-adscript of the dative is generally omitted. The change of consonants, as κόλαφος for κόλτος, ταυμάσια for θαυμάσια, γληγορει for γρηγορει, κωρια for χωρια, is more rare. There is also an occasional tendency to abbreviate words, so as to substitute μνηστη for μνήσθητι, διακων for διάκονος, &c. or to enlarge them, as κολαπιτι or κολασι for κόλατοι. Sometimes Coptic influence is discernible; sometimes uncouth late forms as μεγαλλωτατος, make their appearance (Böckh, missim).

In the Latin the changes are much more remarkable.³ From the selection of inscriptions (including the notes) given above and under TOMB, also under GEMS and GLASS, and from a few others we obtain such changes as Agustus for Augustus, eclesia or aelesia for ecclesia, quere for quiere, que for quae, hae for haec, hird or virid or viril or visit or bissit or risse for visit, posuete, posuent for posuit, posuerunt, bobis for cohis, batun for totum, vibi for viri, stautis for stabilis, provata for probatu, omnebus for omnibus, quesquis, quesuet, and repsicit, for quisquis, quiescit, requiscit, spetit for spectat (expected), jacit for jacet, annus for annos, hae for haec, epitulum for epitaphium, martyribus for martyrium, ozza for ossa, et for et, ex for ex, im pace for in pace, anitema for anathema, ehonnes for canones, tinta for tincta, petem for pellem, meces or misis for menses, ziconus for duconus, Istephanus for Stephanus, slinatarius for linatarius, Zesus for Jesus, Zenuaria for Januaria, Gerosale for Jerusalem, and various other words which contain barbarous substitutions of consonants and vowels and also of diphthongs. Again, neuter substantives are sometimes treated as masculines, e.g. hunc: templum, and conversely masculines as neuters, e.g. hoc tumulum. The regimen of the cases is frequently violated in the use of prepositions (see below), and also in such expressions as vixit annis (or even annus or annorum) and the like. See more in Martigny, Dict. pp. 309-311; and McCaui, u. s. pp. xii. and xiii.; the latter of whom observes: "The student should beware of regarding what may be new to him in Christian epitaphs, as peculiar to them. Very many of the variations from classical usage are to be found in Pagan inscriptions, and some of them in authors that are not commonly read."

The actual words also vary little from the Pagan ones; requiscit, refrigerat, and even *deposuitus*⁴ (about which Cardinal Wiseman in his

at the end of the volumes of the Corp. Inscr. Latin. now being published at Berlin, under Res grammatica, will be found still more useful. They go far to establish the truth of Martigny's remark.

² M. Le Blanc refers to a work by A. Fuchs, Die Römischen Sprachen in ihrem Verhältnisse zum Lateinischen, which the writer has not seen.

³ It was not after all so very common in the earliest Christian times. "La formule depositus—depositio caractérisée particulièrement les inscriptions des quatrième

A third monument is erected pro caritatem (Le Blant, Inscr. Chret. Gaul. vol. i. p. 400). In a fourth, a mother is entreated to pray for the child she has left behind, "pro hunc unum ora subolem" (De Rossi, p. 133). Conversely, we find de sua omnia (De Rossi, p. 133) and decessit de sarcophago (p. 103). And although an occasional solecism of this kind might be explained by the rule and illiterate character of the individual author of the inscription, the frequency of the occurrence clearly indicates the settled tendency of the popular usage of the prepositions towards the abolition of all distinction in the government of cases.* We may add that the same confusion of case is found in the inscriptions of the Jewish catacombs published by Father Garrucci, among which we read, on the one hand, cum with the accusative, as cum virginium (p. 50), and cum Ceterianum (p. 52); and on the other, inter with the ablative, as inter dicentes.

It is hardly worth while, perhaps, to advert to such solecisms as pauperorum for pauperum (although it is plain from the recurrence of the same form in other words, as omnium for omniunum, that the change is not an accidental error); or to the occasional use of forms rare, but not entirely unexampled, in classical Latin, as noctus (Le Blant, p. 15) as the participle of noceo, or ulero (De Rossi, p. 233) as the ablative of ulero, a rare form following the third, instead of the second declension.¹ But it is impossible not to discern a foreshadowing of the modern idiom of Italy in such words as pulla, and still more Pizzinina, which is the direct prototype of the Italian Piccinnina. The same may be said of the orthography, which, in many cases, points clearly towards the modern pronunciation. The form santa for sancta already appears; and the z, as in sesies for sesies, begins to give place to the modern s. This tendency goes, however, beyond individual words, and seems to indicate certain general principles of usage. We do not mean those broad characteristics which distinguish Italians and foreigners generally from ourselves, in the sounds of the vowels and diphthongs of the ancient languages, although in all these the interchanges of the characters of the two languages which the inscriptions frequently exhibit, and the characters employed in each to represent equivalent sounds of the other,

* Martigny (Dict. p. 320) thinks that if an inscription has cum or de followed by an accusative, it must be placed in the fourth or fifth century. This seems very doubtful. We have certainly inter sanctis in an inscription of 268 A. D., and perhaps cum eum in another of 279 A. D. (see De Rossi, pp. 16, 21). Before this cum z-dates occurs at Pompeii (C. I. L. iv. n. 221).

¹ Dr. McCaul notes some very singular instances of inflection, as the datives Nicenti, Agapenti, Leopardeti, Treneti (also Treni), Mercuraveti from Nice, Agape, Leoparde, Eirene, Mercuravane (Mercuriane); also ispelli for ispeli; likewise Victorietes for Victoriatē (n. s. p. xiii. and 18, 19). The same forms, as was to be expected, occur in Pagan inscriptions. Thus we find Glycei, Staphylenti, &c. in Spain (C. I. L. ii. Index, p. 179). We have also Januariavet for Januariatē, at Pompeii (C. I. L. iv. n. 2233), and several similar examples; and Ampliatet in Spain (C. I. L. ii. n. 4975, 60). Professor Hübner, in his observations in a few Christian inscriptions of Spain, Joanni, Pastori, &c. as the genitives of Joannes, Pastor, &c. (p. xiii.), and conversely we have Saturnis, Mercuris as the genitives of Saturnus, Mercurius (De Rossi, nos. 172, 475).

are quite decisive against the English usage. We refer rather to certain peculiarities of Italian pronunciation, which are regarded as defects even by the Italians themselves, and which nevertheless find their counterpart here. One of these is the well-known codā or additional vowel sound, which Italian speakers often attach to words ending with a consonant. Of this there are numberless examples in De Rossi's volume, as posuete for posuit (p. 18). In like manner we find a type for the vowel sound prefixed to words; as aspiritus for spiritus, iscribit for scribit (p. 228); and the actual Italian sound of h (ch or k) between two vowels, which has long been the subject of ridicule, is found directly expressed in these inscriptions, in which nichi is one of the forms of nichi.

It is amusing too, to meet in the Roman catacombs, or among the Christians of ancient Gaul, the prototype of the cockney aspirate and its contrary. Thus we find upon the one hand (Le Blant, vol. i. p. 2-3), Hossa (for ossa), Hordine, Hoctobres, Heterna; and upon the other oc for hoc (Le Blant, p. 93), ic for hic, Horus, oc, Oporius, &c." (Elinb. Rev. 1864, pp. 234-5).

The Index Grammaticus added at the end of Hübner's Christian Inscriptions of Spain, gives a rich harvest of similar barbarisms. Nearly all the vowels are blundered in one way or other, and no small number of consonants; without dwelling on them we have the following: hunc edficium; in auidius; post funere; in hunc tumulum requiescit; cum operarios venulos; offeret (for offeret) besides other less heinous sins against inflections. For the Saxon forms which occur in inscriptions in England the reader is referred to Stephens' Runic Monuments, and for the Celtic forms in the Irish inscriptions to Petrie and Stokes' work thereon (see above).

Examples of bilingual inscriptions (Greek and Latin) and of Latin inscriptions in Greek characters, also of double rendering of words into Runic and Roman characters, as well as Celtic words in Ogham characters, will be noticed under TOMB.

B. Proper Names used in Christian Inscriptions.—For the proper names used in Christian inscriptions see careful and interesting notices in De Rossi, I. U. R. Procl. cxli-cxv.; McCaul, u. s. pp. xix-xxi.; Hübner, u. s. pp. vi. vii., and the references.

The Edinburgh Reviewer has treated this matter so well for the Latin inscriptions of Italy, Gaul, and Africa, taking also some slight notice of the Greek inscriptions, that his words are set down with little abridgment. The account has been supplemented by a few words about the Spanish, British, and Irish names which occur in the early Christian inscriptions of those countries.

The small proportion of patrician families among the early Christians will hardly suffice to explain the rapid disappearance among them of the use of the three names, which had hitherto been the peculiar privilege of the aristocratic class. Not a single inscription after Constantine presents three names; and of the ante-Constantinian inscriptions, there are but two [namely, 1. but one] in which the three names occur After Constantine, except Flavius, which continued in partial use, prænomena may be said entirely to disappear. The old distinctive Genitile name too, qu'etly followed. The inscriptions before Constantine abound with Amili

Cornelli, Claudii, Antonii, &c. Thus, in the Aurelian age, we find Aurelius or Anpila, repeated seven times; and under Constantine and his sons, Constantinus. Constantius and Constans, have their turn of popularity. The Gentile name, however, was quickly displaced by new forms terminating in stinus as Lactantius, Dignantius, Crescentinus, Leontinus; or in osus, as Bonosus. A favourite form in the third and succeeding centuries was some laudatory epithet, as Benignus, Catus, Grata, Castula, Obes, especially in Africa, in the superlative degree; as Dignissimus, Felicissimus, Acceptissimus. Sometimes similar adjectives appear in the comparative degree, as Dignior, Nobilior; and occasionally the abstract quality itself, as Prudentia, Avyap, &c. is found as the name. The names of the fourth, fifth, and later centuries would be found on examination to furnish the type, if not the exact equivalent of most of the fanciful appellatives of the palmy days of puritanism. We meet, not merely with simple forms such as maris, daris, ayarn, D-centia, Prudentia, Dignitas, Idonitas, ausoulogis; or Renatus, Redemptus, Refrigerius, Projectus; or the more self-proud names of the two Paritan stamp, such as Deus Iceli, Servus Dei, Adesolus, Quod vult Deas

"In a few instances occasion is taken from the name to introduce into the a niment of the epitaph some playful allusion to the etymological import of the name; and although this practice is more common than with the tastes of the later times, yet the inscriptions of the classic period, present examples of a similar play upon words, which we may instance the sentence from the very pretty epitaph of Claudia given by Orelli (vol. I. p. 647). "HIC EST SEPULCRUM HAUD PULCRUM PULCRUM FEMINAE." [Pulcher was a cognomen of the gens Claudia.] These allusions in the Christian epitaphs are commonly very simple. Thus we meet INFELIX FELICITAS, and INFAUSTUS FELIX. A monument is erected to Innocentia in recognition of his innocence, PRO INNOCENTIA SUA. GLYCO (glyce, sweet) is described as "sweeter than his name." The sorrowing friends of ANTHIUS beson his years "strip of their flowers;" and even in a very tender poetical epitaph, addressed to the nursery of Verus, by his wife Quintilla (whose grief for his loss proclaims itself so extreme that it is only the fear of God that restrains herself from following him to the grave, and that she vows to remain a widow for his sake), room is found, in the midst of all the writer's passionate expressions of sorrow, for a pun upon the name of "HIC VERIUS, QUI SEMPER VERA LOCUTUS," a pun exactly similar to that contained in the epitaph of the emperor Probus, which Vopiscus has preserved.—HIC PROBUS IMPERATOR, ET VERE PROBUS, SITUS EST" (u. s. pp. 235-237).

The proper names which occur on the Christian inscriptions of Spain (Hübner, praef. pp. vi. sqq.) are more varied. The old Roman nomina gentilia are rare, and generally occur alone, as Aurelius, Julius, Licinia, &c., but with a provincial cognomen occasionally added, such as A. (Aurelius) Vincentius. We have also numerous examples of old Roman cognomina, as Avitus,

* A remarkably pretty specimen is given in De Rossi's Roma Sotterranea, vol. I. p. 262, where Faith makes an epitaph to her sister Hope which runs thus—

PISTE SPEI
S-FORI DVL
CISIMAE
FECIT. (Dove)

But it ought to be remembered that Spee is a name not unrequent in Roman Pagan epitaphs, so that the now famous fragment of the Bristol inscription which contains it is not on that account presumably Christian; apart from the symbols, dog, cock, and asp, and the portico (p). It now reads only SPES C. SENI (611).

Dexter, Flix, Crispinus, Camilla. Of the more modern names are these which are of truly Latin origin, as Aeternus, Amator, Asella, Domitius, Februarius, Honorius, Sanctus, which seem to be generally diffused in the provinces of the empire; also the following, which appear to be peculiar to Spain (including of course Portugal: Braclarus, Cerevela, Cuparius, Gran-niola, Lillialis, Salvianella, &c. There are also many which come from the Greek, as Arendius, Basilis, Glaucus, Leontius, Macarius, Theodostus, Zenon, &c. Others are still more modern, such as Agilo, Ermengod, Froila, Gultinus, Hunirie, Oppila, Reccsvinthus, Reswentus, Sonnien, Mari-spulla (fem.), Swinathiluba (fem.), all which are probably Gothic; also "Anna Gaudiosa sive Africa" (n. 7) and Maurus, which are of course both African; and Bacanda and Cammelates, which appear to be Gaulish. The origin of others, as Istoria, Locuber, Macon (fem.), Quingia, Quistricia, and Rexina, is unknown. To these must be added Scriptural names, as Emmanuel, Johannes, Maria, Sullomon, Susanna, Thomas, &c.; those of the puritanical type mentioned above appear to be wanting.

With regard to Great Britain we find (for the British period) some Latin names, as Viventius and Florentius (in Scotland), also Sillus, Paulinus, Saturninus, and Carausius (in Wales and Cornwall), and some of these forms, as Augustinus and Paulinus, were re-imported from Rome in Saxon times. But there are also Celtic names occurring, as Isnlac (in Cornwall), Pascent (or Pasgen), Cudfan, Cyngen, Pabo, Bodluc (in Wales), and Drost, Voret, Fercus (Fergus) and others (in Scotland); as well as Saxon or Scandinavian names, such as Sinuk (in Scotland), Herebricht, Hildithrith, Wulfhere, and the like (in England). A Saxon name is occasionally Latinised, as Wini into Orvinius. In Ireland the great mass of the names is Celtic, but occasionally a Latin form is Iberized, as Columbanus into Cholomban; very occasionally a Latin form, as Martinus, survives.

C. Words and Formulae employed in different ages and places.—The words and phrases relating to burial and other matters vary a good deal in different places, and in the same place at different times. M. Le Blant has collected these "formules d'épigraphie chrétiennes" with considerable industry; but a good many additions might easily be made. He even takes no notice at all of some provinces, e. g. Dalmatia and Pannonia, which however have some formulae and words of interest.

Several of the selected inscriptions (sepulchral and others) have been chosen partly on account of the formulae therein contained, and some remarks upon them are made in their places.

But it is well observed by Hübner (that until the Christian inscriptions of all parts of the world have been collected and edited, it is im-

† E. g. an inscription from Sahara (Stein an Anger) speaking of a dead child, has "requiem accipit in Deo patre nostro, et Christo ejus" (Corp. Inscr. Lat. t. III. n. 4221, edited by Mommsen). Another (n. 4220) from the same place begins: "Bonememorle, in Deo vivas. Memorius Civ. Graec. ex reg. Ladic. q. vix. an. L. &c. (Bonememorius occurs in Gaul, Le Blant, Man. p. 77). See also n. 6399 sqq. from Palmaria, where we have hic in pace jacet, depositus, &c.

possible to say what formulae are peculiar to each: those which we consider to be peculiar may turn out to be universal or common to many provinces (u. s. p. vii.).¹

The following is a translation with slight omissions and additions¹ and a few tacit corrections, mostly for the Greek, of M. Le Blant's Manuel d'Épigraphie Chrét. pp. 75-85 (Paris, 1890), omitting the references to his own work for Gaul and to those of others, as De Rossi (Rome), Gazzera (Piedmont), Mommsen (kingdom of Naples), Lérier (Algeria), and (for the Greek) Böckh. To this has been added (besides some Roman phrases) a collection of Spanish formulae derived from Hubner; also a notice of the few formulae which occur in Great Britain and Ireland.

"That which is true for ancient coins, as also for the works of architecture, is not less so in that which concerns the monuments of epigraphy. In each new place which he visits, the antiquary sees variations of the formulae, the symbols, the writing, the disposition, the ornaments of the marbles. Though apparently of little importance, these marked differences are worthy of being studied with care. Arising sometimes from the difference of the times, as well as from that of the places, they are able to serve as guides in the restoration of the texts, to fix the nationality of personages, the age of the inscriptions, and even to furnish materials for the history of ideas.

"I must appeal to the patience of the reader in undertaking to place before him some features of the localisation of the types and formulae of Christian epigraphy. Below are those which seem to me the most remarkable in different provinces:

Germania Prima:

Mayence: IN HOC TITVLO REQVIESCIT FELICITER. Worms: TITVLVM POSVIT.

Belgia Prima:

Troyes: PRO CARITATE, and the like; TITVLVM POSVIT; IHC IACET; IHC IACET IN PACE; PATRES (titulum posterunt).

Belgia Secunda:

Arles: VBI FECIT NOVEMBER DIES XV, and the like; DEFVNCTVS EST.

Viennensis:

SVRRECTVRS IN XPO, and analogous formulae. Briard: HVMANITAS; ABSTVTVS (i. e. astutus, in a good sense). Briard and Vienne: VOLVNTAS. Valson and Arles: PAX TECVM. Marseilles: RECESSIT, retained even when this word has disappeared in other places from the epigraphical formulae.

¹ Dr. M'Cauley, usually most accurate, illustrates this remark by a statement that among the many expressions for our "in peace" we have "hic iacet (not ofen), hic iacet in pace." ibid. p. xiii. We may safely say of hic iacet that it occurs everywhere, being found first in Rome, then in Gaul, Sicily, Dalmatia, Algeria, and Britain, in which the latter is almost the only formula. Nor does this warrant us any reason to think it rare in any of these countries. M. Le Blant, however, only notices it in Sicily. The Greek rendering of this, hic iacet in pace, or in pace iacet, is also very general, but perhaps not quite so common: it occurs in Rome, Sicily, Gaul, in Egypt, Dalmatia, and Greece; Algeria, and Cyrene; also in Asia Minor, but not everywhere. In truth M. Le Blant's is only a sketch partially worked out, but still very interesting.

little more. Many of those on gems and glass, and a large number of the epitaphs contain what are termed acclamations, or short expressions addressed to, or in behalf of, the living, or to or in behalf of the dead. Both one and the other existed for the Pagans, and both one and the other were adopted with various modifications by the Christians.

(1.) To begin with those which concern the living. The sentiment on the inscription AMICI DUM VIVIMVS VIVAMVS (Gruter, p. 609, 3) on the glass IN NOMINE HERCVLIS ACERENTINO (Acherontium), FELICES VIVATIS (Garrucci, Petri, t. xxxv. f. 1), and on the gem VIVAS (sic) LVXVI HOMO BONE (King's Ant. Gems and Rings, vol. i. p. 311), was adopted by the Christians in the sense of living in God; and they engraved VIVE or VIVAS IN DEO, and cognate expressions expressive of hope both for time and for eternity on their own gems and glass vessels, and occasionally on a lamp or an amulet. Sometimes a saint is added, as VIVAS IN CHRISTO ET LAURENTIO, or a saint only is expressed, as VIVAS IN NOMINE LAVRE(N)TII. Sometimes again a married couple, or a man and his family, are the subjects of this kind of good wish. Sometimes, however, the name of God or Christ was omitted, but a Christian symbol, as a palm or a chrisma, was introduced in order to insure the Christian significance. The Christians did not indeed refuse the sense of enjoying this life, when they wrote PIE (sic) ZESES, or ZESSES only on their glass drinking-cups, which were employed in sacred festivities, but the sacred representations which accompanied the legend would be a witness against any intemperate use. A smaller number of acclamations inscribed on glass, prays that the persons addressed may live in the peace of God. Thus one in favor of a married couple: VIVATIS IN PACE DEI (Garrucci, Petri, t. i. f. 3); on another we have HIRAS (vivas) IN PACE DEI (Id. t. vi. f. 7), or VIVAS IN PACE DEI (Id. t. vii. f. 2).

For the matters here touched on see GEMS, GLASS, LAMPS, SEALS. That this kind of acclamation exhorting to live was usually addressed to the living, is clear upon the face of it; but there are a few cases where it is less certain, whether the persons addressed were alive or dead. Thus it has been made a question whether HILARIS VIVAS CVM TVIS FELICITER SEMPER REFRIGERES IN PACE DEI is an acclamation to a living or dead person: Martigny (Dict. p. 8) relying principally on the word expressing a desire for his refreshment, looks on him as dead. Garrucci, probably with greater reason, interprets: sui sempre lieto et ti refrigera nella pace di Dio, cioè con la grazia di lui, shewing that refrigerium is not rarely used of living persons u. s. p. 126).

On Christian epitaphs the living are sometimes addressed by the living, sometimes by the dead. Of the former are requests to the reader to pray for the soul of the person buried. These are very rare for the earlier periods. Dr. M'Caul says, "I recollect but two examples in Christian epitaphs of the first six centuries of the address to the reader for his prayers, so common in mediæval times." In the early mediæval inscriptions of Great Britain and Ireland examples will be seen under TOMB. At other times the readers are saluted by the author of the inscription, SALVETE FRATRES (Rönier n.

4025; see above), or asked to pray for him (Le Blant, n. 619).

The dead person sometimes prays the living not to meddle with his bones, as PREDOR EGO HILPERICVS NON AVFERANTVR HINC OZZA MEA (Le Blant, n. 207). See similar examples in his notes on this inscription and TOMB.

Sometimes the survivors are exhorted not to weep; and the notite dolere parentes, hoc faciundum fuit (Mus. Disn. i. 117, pl. liii.) becomes on a Christian epitaph—

"Pareite vos lacrimis, dulcis cum conjugæ natæ, Viventemque Deo credite flere nefas."

De Rossi, I. U. R. n. 843 (A. D. 472).

More strange are the epitaphs counted to be Christian, μη λυποῦ, τέκνον, οὐδεὶς ἀθάνατος (Böckh, n. 9589), and θάρα, Τάρια μήτηρ, οὐδεὶς ἀθάνατος (Id. 9624), both from the Roman catacombs. A Jewish epitaph in a Roman cemetery runs similarly (Id. n. 9917).

(2.) Of acclamations addressed to the dead we have the following:

VIVAS or VIVATIS IN DEO; this and the allied forms VIVE or VIVAS IN CHRISTO, DOMINO, INTER SANCTIS (sic, De Rossi, u. s. n. 10, A. D. 268), IN NOMINE CHRISTI (Marini, p. 45); also, IN NOMINE PETRI (Baldetti, p. 388), the same, or nearly so, as those which have just been noticed as addressed to the living, recur abundantly on the sepulchral monuments of Rome and other places (De Rossi, I. U. R. Prol. p. c3; Le Blant, n. 576; Mart. Dict. p. 7, and TOMB).

Similarly in Greek ζῆσαι ἐν θεῷ (Böckh, n. 9800), ζῆσαι ἐν κυρίῳ (Id. n. 9673). They proceed on the supposition that the Christian life is continuous, and that expressions in the form of good wishes, which primarily belong to this life, may when their fulfilment is ac-

Of Pagan acclamations addressed in behalf of the dead we have, among others, the following: Sui tibi terra levis, Ossa tua bene quiescant, Ave, Vale, Di tibi beneficiant, Χαίρει, εὐχῆσαι (Rönier n. 1000); Ὁσπας τῷ ψυχῆς τῷ σώματι (M'Caul, n. p. xvii).

Other forms express to the dead good wishes for their rest or peace. Thus on a gem, found in a grave D (bene) QVESQVAS, (quiescas) (see GEMS), and on tombs QUESQVAS IN PACE (Marini, p.
366), CISQVAS BENE IN PACE (Id. p. 385). Nor an we well take such phrases as PAX TECUM (Le Blant, n. 490, &c.), εἰρήνη σοι (Böckh, n. 9486), εἰρήνη σοι ἐν οὐρανῷ (Id. n. 9844), and εἰρήνη πάσι, with or without ἐν θεῷ (Id. nos.
9487-8), as other than good wishes addressed to the departed, not affirmations of a fait accompli, but a confident prayer, or rather a sur-hope, that the state of peace may continue. In other inscriptions, however, it is evidently regarded as already accomplished, e. g., ἀνέταυρον Ἄπια ἐν εἰρήνῃ (Marini, p. 456). Compare ἐν εἰρήνῃ πορεύεαι (Böckh, n. 9645 and 9632); ON-DOMIVIT IN PACE IHSV, QVEM DILEXIT, OHIIT IN PACE DEI (Hübner, u. s. p. x.). The full expression εἰρήνη σοι ἕτα, PAX VOHSCVM SIT, also occurs (Böckh, n. 9710; Le Blant, n. 526).
More interesting are the acclamations which relate to refrigerium, which God himself is often elsewhere invoked to bestow on the departed.
De Rossi notes the occurrence of spiritum, tuum Deus refrigeret,⁹ and the like, as occurring in early Christian epitaphs (ProI. p. cx.). But here the deceased is addressed, in the hope that he is in receipt of that refreshment, or as being sure to receive it. Thus we have the neuter verb refrigerare, to enjoy a cool repose, in this connection, IN DONO REFRIGERES (Marini, p. 420),
i. e., may you enjoy refreshment in a good place, by which is intended Paradise, or the bosom of Abraham; REFRIGERA CVM SPIRITU SANCTO, i. e., in thine own holy soul (Marangoni, Cose Gent.
p. 460. See Tertull. adv. Marc. lib. iv. c. 34).
More rarely ACCEPTA SIS IN CRISTO (Marini, p. 454) is the form which the acclamation assumes, with which Χριστός μετὰ σου (Böckh,
n. 9697) may be compared, as well as AETERNA TIBI LUX IN CHRISTO (Marini, u. s. p. 450), the last word being expressed by the chrisma. Some addresses to the dead, however, are congratulatory, as BENE VIXISTI (sic), VENE CGNSVMASTI (Marini p. 434), ANIMA TVA CVM IVSTIS (Id.
p. 381), IN REFRIGERIO ANIMA TVA (Falretti, p. 547), where est rather than sit seems to be understood.

The Greek acclamation θάπτει (i. e. θάπτει) is sometimes placed at the end of an epitaph (Böckh, n. 9821); and sometimes at the begin-

⁸ The indicative is likewise found, as in Deo decedit a cōis (Hübner, u. s. p. xl.); and both expressions mean in reality the same thing. The reader, however, may see Marini, Dict. s. v. "Purgatoire" for a different view of the optative formulae.

⁹ The verb is then used transitively. In the Latin version of St. Irenaeus, refrigerare is the rendering of ἀναψυχαίνειν, and DuRoiie accordingly (Class. s. v.) explains the Latin word by requiescere, which is substantially correct. Refrigerium, as used by Tertullian and in the acclamations does not mean "a release from pain, but an enjoyment of positive though imperfect happiness on the part of the just from the very moment of their dissolution in that separate abode which Tertullian assumes our Lord to distinguish by the appellation of Abraham's bosom."—EABER, Diff. of Roman-ism, book I. c. v.

¹⁰ See De Rossi (u. s.). The words occur in this sense in the epitaph of St. Severa at Rome. See Tom.

ning (Id. n. 9789), addressed in each case to the departed. Another imperative γαργάρε (waxe up!) in singular contrast to the quiescas above, is occasionally found at the end of Christian inscriptions (Id. 9599, 9570); it may probably also contemplate the return of the Saviour. Εἰδοῦσι also occurs (Id. 9800).

The Latin classical form Ave, much used by the Pagans, is found also in a Christian epitaph, and written AVE (Böckh, n. 9655). We have also HAVE VALE on the same monument (Le Blant, n. 495).

In the last place are to be noted prayers or requests to the departed to pray to God for the survivors.* De Rossi notes that in the earlier undated inscriptions of the catacombs (i. e., those before the peace of Constantine), we have pete pro nobis, pro parentibus, pro conjugē, pro filiis, pro sorore (ProI. p. cx.). To these Dr. McCaul adds roga, ora pro nobis, but adds at the same time that there are "comparatively few among the thousands" of these undated inscriptions, which contain these prayers, and "that instances of the mention in such forms of others than the members of the family of the deceased are extremely rare." He has observed only one dated example, of the year 380 A. D. (De Rossi, n. 288) which contains any such request; it has the expression PRO HVXC VVVM ORA SVBOLEM (u. s. p. xviii). With respect to such acclama-tions of affection as oculis animo, animi pura et mundi, anima innox, puer innocens, ψυχῃ καλῇ, and the like, they are applied in Christian inscriptions of various kinds both to the living and the dead, and need hardly be dwelt upon in this place (see Garrucci, u. s.
Index, s. v. dulcis anima; Martigny, Dict. p. 7; Perret, Catac. de Rome, t. v. pl. 17; Böckh,
n. 9697).

E. Style and Structure.—Such inscriptions as relate to public works, churches, basilicas, fountains, or to sacred objects and furniture, altars, chalices, crosses, liturgical book-covers, &c., or to votive offerings and the like, need hardly be taken into the present account. They exist in prose and verse, both in Greek and in Latin, and are of very various styles and lengths. A large number of such are collected by Marini, and edited by Mai (Script. Vet. Nov. Coll. tom. v. pp. 1-236); to this work more especially the reader is referred.
Many of them, however, are later than the period embraced in his work. Very few inscriptions, if any, which belong to this class, go back before the time of Constantine, so far as the writer is aware, and can hardly be called numerous till after the close of the 4th century.
With regard, however, to the sepulchral inscriptions the case is somewhat different. They can, to some extent at least, be classified by their style. But the first thing to be borne in mind is that inscriptions of one country are no rule for those of another. Those of Britain and of Ireland, for example, are both unlike each other, and unlike those of Gaul, Spain, and Italy, of nearly the same period. The Greek inscriptions, again, admit for the most part of but little comparison with the Latin ones; the Greek and

* The invocation of the Virgin and of saints (see above § iv.) are scarcely to be accounted acclamations, and are better considered separately.

Latin inscriptions to Dometius, written on the same slab, are a good illustration of this (Le Blant, Insc. Chrét. Gaul. n. 613A).

With few exceptions the earlier inscriptions are characterised by their brevity and simplicity, while from the 4th century onwards they assume in some countries, as in Italy, Gaul, and Spain, a more complex and ornate character. In the earlier epitaphs, moreover, sometimes occur traits more or less similar to the pagan epitaphs, e.g. mention of those who made the tomb, which by degrees disappear. They also contain a much greater number of acclamations, most of which soon vanish completely. In the 4th century Christian Latin epigraphy began to make a style of its own, and for the first time we now get at Rome such opening words as hic requiescit in pace, or in summa pacis, hic quiescit, hic juvet, hic positus est, &c.; and new rhetorical phrases, as mirae innocentie, sapientiae, sanctitatis, &c., begin to make their appearance. It is not until about this time that any mention of the secular profession of the deceased occurs in the Latin inscriptions; and it is not very commonly mentioned at any time. The chrisma and the cross, signs of a triumphant faith, now come in abundantly. The inscriptions of Gaul followed the style of Rome a good deal, and the same or similar formulae appear upon them at a somewhat later time. It is in these Roman and Gaulish inscriptions that changes of style can best be studied, because they are so numerous, because so many of them bear dates, and, in fine, because they have been so admirably edited. M. De Rossi makes some remarks on the changes of style in the Roman inscriptions (Insc. Urb. Rom., Prolegom., pp. ex.-xxvi.), and will in another volume discuss totam stili epigraphici Christiani doctrinam. M. Le Blant, in the first fifty-eight pages of his Manuel, treats of the successive variations in the Gaulish inscriptions (few of which, however, are before the age of Constantine), and also establishes the fact that blank formulae were in circulation for the use of stonecutters, where of course the number of years of the deceased or of the reigning king could only be expressed by the word tot or tantus, and that the stonecutter has sometimes neglected to replace the tantus by the particular number required. (See Le Blant, u. s. pp. 59-74.) Similarly in Spain traces of blank formulae can be recognised (Hubner, u. s. p. viii.).

By means of a careful study of the phrases of the dated inscriptions a close approximation may sometimes be made to the date of an undated one; great caution, however, is necessary, as certain expressions held their place for a long period. (See Le Blant, u. s. pp. 31-33).

(vi). Dates of Christian Inscriptions.

(a) Christian inscriptions, when dated, most usually bear the names of consuls, and all the earliest are thus dated. Sometimes one, more usually both consuls, are given, the names being commonly contracted. The abbreviation cos for consulibus was in use up to the middle of the 3rd century, after which COSS, CONS, and CONSS, came to be successively adopted: cos is very seldom found during the 4th century, and almost never in the 5th or 6th: COSS fell into disuse about the first quarter of the 5th century, and after that CONS was used.¹

The numerals, to designate a second or third consulate, are frequently prefixed to cos and the other abbreviated forms; but where there is no ambiguity they are sometimes omitted. A very strange abbreviation was occasionally used, though in Christian inscriptions it is exceedingly rare: the names of the consuls were omitted and the numbers only retained. In an epitaph from a Christian crypt at Motyca, in Sicily, to "Euterpe, the companion of the Muses," her death is fixed to Nov. 27, θραρία τῶν κυ [πλω]ν τῶ δ' ἰ καὶ τῶ γ' ἰν τῆ consulship of our Lords for the tenth time and for the third time, i. e. 360 A.D., when Constantius was in his tenth consulate, and Julian in his third. (Böckh, n. 9524.)

Another form of dating was by a post-consulate, i. e. the words POST CONSULATVM, or the abbreviations POST COS, POST CONSS (or from the middle of the 5th century), P C, and even POST (or POS) only was placed before the consuls' names of the year preceding, "when it was not known who were the consuls of the year, or when the name of but one was known, or when it was necessary or expedient not to mention them" (Mc Caul, u. s. p. xxvi.). This formula, which is said to have arisen in the troublesome times of Maxentius, 307 A.D., rarely appears in Christian inscriptions till 542 A.D., when the post-consulate of Basil the younger was taken as a point of departure for almost the whole empire, and the years post consulatum Basilii extend up to xxix. The consulate of Justin in 568 A.D. gave birth to another era of post-consulates, which lasted nine years.

There are various other matters connected with consular dates which are intentionally passed over here. For the whole subject see De Rossi (Insc. Urb. Rom. pp. xiii.-li.); and for an epitome of the more important parts, Mc Caul (u. s. p. xxiii.-xxvii.).²

(b) Other inscriptions are dated by an era, whether of a province or of a city. Examples of the former are seen in Spain and Mauretania; of the latter in various parts of Asia, where the eras of Antioch and Bostra (among others) obtained currency. Examples of these will be found above, and below under TOMB. In all these parts of the empire Christian inscriptions were very rarely dated by the consuls, and those are mostly of the 6th century (De Rossi, u. s. p. xlii.). For other eras employed in Christian inscriptions, see De Rossi (u. s. pp. v. vi.).

(c) Dates by Indictions* (or cycles of fifteen years) are not found in Christian inscriptions of Rome before the beginning of the 6th century. The earliest seems to be 522 A.D. (De Rossi, I. U. R. n. 984). In Gaul, however, we find an to designate a second or third indiction frequently prefixed to CONS and the word foras; but where there is no word foras is sometimes omitted. A deviation was occasionally used, and in inscriptions it is exceedingly rare. The use of the consuls were omitted only retained. In an inscription from Motyca, in the province of the companion of the consul is fixed to Nov. 27, ἡμερησίου καὶ τοῦ ἴου ἐν τῇ consulship of the tenth time and for the third time, when Constantius was in the consul and Julian in his third. This formula, have arisen in the troublesome times, 307 A.D., rarely appears in inscriptions till 542 A.D., when the Basil the younger was taken as emperor for almost the whole empire, et consulatum Basilii extendit post consulatum Justiniani in 566 A.D. another era of post-consulates, 5 years.

inscription dated Ind. XV. Olibrio juniore cons (consul), i. e. 491 A.D. (Le Blant, n. 388). The indications themselves (which commence 312 A.D.), unless accompanied by other notes of time (as they often are), do not suffice to determine even approximately the year A.D. For the first year of each cycle is counted as the first indication, and thus the tenth indiction merely signifies the tenth year in some undetermined indiction. See De Rossi (u. s. De Cyclo Indictionum, pp. xvii.-ci.)

(d) For the mode of dating by solar and lunar cycles, i. e. by the day of the month, the day of the week, and the day of the moon, as compared with each other and with the year, the reader who desires to enter into so difficult a subject must consult De Rossi (u. s. pp. lxx.-xviii.). See also MONTH; WEEK.

There are now to be noticed a few eras or modes of dating which are peculiar to the Christians.

(e) The era of the martyrs is only used in Egypt and the adjoining regions. A barbarous Greek inscription (n. 9121 Böckh) dates March 30, ἡμερησίου τοῦ, i. e. 209 of the Dioclesian era, which commenced August 29, 284 A.D., and so corresponded to 494 A.D. This era, invented and first used by the pagans, was adopted afterwards by the Christians, who more usually changed its name (Martigny, Dict. p. 532, and the references, also Böckh, n. 9134).

(f) Episcopal dates. A Roman epitaph (De Rossi, I. U. R. n. 139) is dated DEPOSITA IN PACE SUB LIB[ERIO] EP[ISCOPO], and another (n. 190) has RECESSIT IN NOB. IN PACE SUB DAMASO EPISCOPO. These are the only examples of the kind known, and do not prove that epitaphs were then dated merely and simply by the papal era, but rather that those who put them up wished to express their adhesion to the orthodox pontiffs and not to their opponents Felix and Ursicinus.³

But from the end of the 4th century it became common at Rome to date sacred buildings by inscriptions in which the pope's name occurred; thus we have in such connections SALVO SIRICIO EPISCOPO (like the SALVIS DD. NN. AUGUSTIS) and TEMPORIBVS SANCTI INNOCENTII EPISCOPI, and the still remaining inscription in the basilica of St. Sabina:

CVLIVEN APOSTOLICVM CVM CAELESTINVS HABERET PRIMVS ET IN TOTO FVLGERET EPISCOPOVS ORBE.

(De Rossi, u. s. pp. viii, ix). In the 5th and following century the custom of dating sacred buildings by bishops and other ecclesiastics spread abroad, and at length became very general throughout Europe; but public monuments of the provinces of the 4th, 5th, and even 6th and later centuries are dated by the eras of Mauretania or of Bostra or Antioch, or by consuls, or by the reigns of emperors (De Rossi, u. s. p. ix, and the references). Sometimes, but very rarely, the exact year of office of the bishop or abbot is given (De Rossi, u. s. and above, § iv. n. 11).

There are two other eras much employed in inscriptions soon after the period with which we are concerned, and which indeed at length almost superseded the others in common use—the Dionysian epoch of the Incarnation,* and the mundane era, which reckons the Creation at 5508 n.c. [ERA.]

(g) Bede brought the former into vogue in the beginning of the 8th century, and there are also some early inscriptions dated thereby. De Rossi affirms that he knows of no inscription of the first six centuries so dated. There is one of the year 617 A.D., which records the construction and consecration of a baptistery, at Brixia, by Domina nostra Flavia Theodolinda, which is thus dated at the end: virente domino nostro Adalvaldo sacrae salutis sacculo CCC CCC XVII (Marini, u. s. p. 170); besides this there is one at Interamna (Merni), dated AN. S. DCC. XXVII. (Marini, u. s. p. 157); others just below our period are a little differently expressed: one is dated AN. INCARNAT. DNI DCCCLVII IND V REGE LOVDOWICO IMP. AVG. (Marini, u. s. p. 85), and another is placed ANNO DOMINI DCCC LXIII (Marini, u. s. pp. 164, 5). All these are in connection with the dedication or building of sacred edifices.

(h) An early example* of the mundane era is furnished by an inscription on a tower at Nicea in Bithynia, ἔτους στττ, in the year 6316, corresponding to 808 A.D. (Böckh, C. I. G. n. 8669). But as it is called "the tower of Michael, the great king in Christ, emperor," some error in the date (as edited) has slipped in. For Michael I. reigned from 811-813 A.D., and Michael II. from 820-829 A.D. Possibly the σ is a misreading for θ : if so, the date is 811 A.D. Another mutilated inscription, relative to the foundation of an arsenal (τοῦτον μεγα- Ἀδρατον (sic) ἀρματηλίου) by "Theophilus the king, son of Michael the king," is doubly dated, ἀπὸ κτίσεως (sic) κόσμου, σττθ, ἀπὸ δὲ Χριστοῦ ἔτους ωλδ, the year 6342 of the mundane era, corresponding to the year 834 of the Christian era (Id. n. 8680).

(i) There are, in fine, inscriptions dated by the reigns or by the years of the reigns of the sovereigns of the kingdoms which sprung out of the ruins of the western empire. Examples occur in England, France, Spain, and Italy. (See above § iv., Nos. 5, 11, and TOMR.)

In like manner, after the consulate came to an end in 541 A.D., the year of the Byzantine emperor's reign, was occasionally placed on inscriptions as a date. An early example of the year 592 A.D., in the 11th year of Justinian II. (in an inscription relating to a church), is given in Böckh's C. I. G. n. 8651. Another less precise is dated by the joint reign (842-857 A.D.) of Theodora, Michael, and Thecla (Böckh, C. I. G. n. 8683).

More than one mode of dating often occurs on the same monument, as by consuls and an indiction conjointly; by an era and a king conjointly;

* This was devised in 625 A.D. by Dionysius Exiguus, a Roman abbot. For his purpose, which was neither literary nor historical, but simply had reference to Easter, see the late Professor Grote in the Cambridge Journal of Classical and Sacred Philology, vol. I. pp. 88-99. In a paper entitled "On the dating of Ancient History," where several subjects here touched upon are discussed.

* Probably there may exist somewhat earlier inscriptions dated by this era than those here referred to. "It began to prevail in the 7th century, and appears in the Paschal Chronicle" (Grote, u. s. p. 66).

or by a king and an ecclesiastic conjointly. In addition to the years the months are often noted; these are in general the Roman months.

But the day of the month, whether of the death or of the burial, is sometimes in the more ancient inscriptions alone set down. Thus in a^b Roman inscription we have simply Fortunatus depositus 111 Kal. Oct. in pace; and in another, Laurentiu (sic) idus Iovinus (sic) decessit, followed by the christina (Marini, u. s. pp. 380, 387).

In Egypt, however, the Egyptian months are set down, either alone (Boeckh, n. 9110), or together with an indiction (id. n. 9111), or with the era of "the martyrs" (id. 9121), or with an indiction together with the same era, under its proper name, "the year of Diocletian" (id. 9134).

The days are added to the months when these occur: usually computed according to the Roman calendar by kalends, ides, and nones; but the cyclic inscriptions have the days of the week (die Lunaris, die Saturnis (sic), &c.; also die Sabbati, die dominica), the days of the moon, or the octave of Easter. (See De Rossi, u. s.; Me Caul, u. s. pp. 53-58.) In Egypt the day of the month is reckoned numerically, as the 21st of Tybi, the 10th of Phacphi, &c.

We have also examples, though they are not numerous, of epitaphs dated by saints' days. One at Briord, of about the 6th or 7th century, records of "Ricelfus et jugalis sua Guntello" that "obierunt in die Sci Martini, who probably himself died Nov. 8, A.D. 397 (Butler's Lives of Saints, under Nov. 11). M. Le Blant, who gives this inscription (n. 380), quotes other and earlier examples from the catacombs; such as Natale Susi, Natale Domnes Sitivctis, poster i die marturorum, ante natale Domini Asteri, d. nat. Sci Marci.

In addition to the day the hour is sometimes added, and occasionally even the fraction (scrupulus) of the hour. See TOMB.

(vii.) Abbreviations used in Christian Inscriptions.—This catalogue might no doubt be enlarged considerably: it has been taken from Martigny (Dict. pp. 322-324, omitting, however, the numerals, L for quinquaginta, X for decem, and the like); and the writer has made various additions to it, mostly by help of Hubner's Index to his Spanish Inscriptions, p. 115.

^b Cardinal Wiseman says of the deceased Christians in early times that "annual commemoration had to be made on the very day of their departure, and accurate knowledge of this was necessary. Therefore, it alone was recorded" (Fabiola, p. 147). Even if this be the true reason (which is very much to be doubted), it remains to be explained why the day of burial alone is sometimes recorded. The truth seems to be, that some little incident which would be sufficient to remind the friends of the deceased, was sometimes regarded as date enough.

INSINUATIO. The making certain customary payments to the bishop on appointment to a church. See Thomassin (Vet. et Nov. Eccl. Discip. iii. 1, c. 56). Justiniana (Novell. 56, col. 5, tit. 11, § 1) provides that if any of the clergy make the payments which are called insinuatives, "quae vocantur insinuativa," except in the great church of Constantinople, the bishops who exact them shall be deprived of their office.

2. In a mere special sense, the lections from the Old Testament read to the candidates for baptism immediately after the benediction of the taper, and before the benediction of the font, on Easter Eve, were called "Instructiones baptizandorum." See the Gelasian Sacramentary (i. c. 43), and the Gregorian (p. 70). Amalarius (De Eccl. Off. i. 19) gives mystical reasons why the lections should be four in number, which however is by no means invariably the case. They are four in the Ordo Romanus I. (c. 40, p. 25), but the Gelasian Sacramentary gives ten and the Gregorian eight. Instruction of this kind seems to be alluded to in Palladius's description of the scene which took place when soldiers burst into John Chrysostom's church at Constantinople on Easter Eve; "some of the presbyters," he says (Vita Chrysostr. c. 9) "were reading Holy Scriptures, others baptizing the catechumens." So Paschasius Lilybetanus, in a letter to Leo the Great (quoted by Martene), speaks of a case in which, after the accustomed lections of Easter Eve had been gone through, the candidates were not baptized, for lack of water (Martene, De Rit. Ant. I. i. 13, § 3). As in the responses of the candidates at Rome both Latin and Greek were used, so also the lections in baptism were in ancient times recited in Latin and Greek. Thus Ordo Romanus I. (c. 40, p. 25), after noticing that the reader does not announce the lection in the usual way, "Lectio libri Genesis," but begins at once "In principio," goes on to say, "First it is read in Greek, and then immediately by another in Latin." The next lection is read first in Greek and then in Latin; and so on. Amalarius (De Eccl. Off. II. 1) says of this custom, that lections were recited by the ancient Romans in Greek and in Latin, partly because Greeks were present who did not understand Latin, and Latins who did not understand Greek; partly to show the unanimity of the two peoples. Anastasius tells us (p. 251, ed. Muratori) that pope Benedict III. (855-858) caused a volume to be prepared in which the lessons for Easter Eve and Pentecost were written out in Greek and in Latin, which volume, in a silver binding of beautiful workmanship, he offered to a Roman church. [C.]

INSTRUMENTA. By the word instrumenta we understand vessels, &c. employed in the sacred ministry; thus, pope Siricius, A. D. 385 (Epist. I. ad Himerium, c. 14), forbidding persons who had incurred public penance to be ordained, says, "nulli debent gererendum sacramentorum instrumenta suscipere qui dudum fuerunt rassa vitiorum."

By the words "instrumentorum traditio" is technically designated the handing to a person on ordination some vessel or instrument used in his office. Thus, the African statutes at the end of the 4th century (Conc. Carth. IV. c. 5) order the bishop to hand to a subdeacon on ordination an empty chalice and an empty paten, and the archdeacon to hand to him a water vessel with a napkin, because he receives no imposition of hands. Similarly the acolyte (c. 6) is to receive from the archdeacon a candlestick with taper; the exorcist (c. 7) is to receive from the hand of the bishop the book of exorcisms; the reader (c. 8) the codex from which he is to read; the doorkeeper (c. 9) the keys of the church.

In these cases it is to be observed that the "instrumentorum traditio" takes place only in the case of those ordained to minor orders (sacratu ministri) who received no imposition of hands.

The fourth council of Toledo, A. D. 633, provides (c. 28) that a bishop who is restored to ld be four in number, which means invariably the case. The Ordo Romanus I. (c. 40, Gelasian Sacramentary gives gorian eight. Instruction of to be alluded to in Palladius's scene which took place when to John Chrysostom's church on Easter Eve; (c. 9) of the says (Vita Chryost. c. 9) "were riptures, others baptizing the so Paschasius Lilybetanus, in the Great (quoted by Martene), in which, after the acconstomei r Eve had been gone through, were not baptized, for lack of *De Rit. We see from this that the appropriate vestments were regarded in the 7th century as the outward sign of the bestowal of the higher orders. The delivery of the pastoral staff and ring also forms part of the ceremony of the ordination of a bishop in the Pontificals of Gregory the Great and of Egbert [BISHOP, p. 222].

In later times, the heading of the chalice with wine and the paten with a host to a priest on ordination came to be regarded as the "matter" of the sacrament, while the "form" was the words "Acclipe potestatem offerre sacrificium Deo missaque celebrare tam pro vivis quam pro defunctis in nomine Domini." But this opinion not only has no support in Scripture, but it seems to have been totally unknown in the church for at least nine hundred years; Isidore, Amalarius, Rabanus, and Walafrid Strabo, know nothing of it. INTERCESSION (Intercessio, ἔντευξις). It does not fall within the scope of the present work to discuss or to investigate historically the doctrine of the intercession of the saints, or of the nature and efficacy of intercessory prayer generally; the subject is considered here simply in its relation to liturgical forms. And here we have to consider (1) the persons whose intercession is asked; (2) the objects on behalf of which intercession is made.

(1.) a. Throughout the Western church a large portion of the prayers end with a pleading of the merits of Christ, the great Intercessor; generally in the form "per Christum Dominum nostrum." This is in fact an extension to all prayer of the principle laid down for the altar-prayers, "cum altari adistitur semper ad Patrem dirigatur oratio" (Conc. Carth. III. c. 23); when the prayer is addressed to the Father, it is through the intercession of the Son. This principle is not adopted in the East, where the prayers, being addressed to the Triune Deity, generally end with an ascription of glory; if with a pleading of merits, it is of the Virgin Mary or the saints (Freeman, Principles of Divine Service, i. 373).

b. We may take the words of Cyril of Jerusalem (Catech. Myst. V. 9, p. 328) as an authentic account of the manner in which the intercession of the saints departed was invoked in the church of Jerusalem in the middle of the 4th century. "Then we also commemorate those who have gone to rest before us (τῶν προκεκλιμένων). God at their prayers and intercessions (προεβήταις) would receive our supplication." It appears then that in Cyril's time the church asked the intercession of patriarchs, prophets, apostles, and martyrs; for the rest of the faithful departed, including "holy fathers and bishops," it interceded [CANON OF THE LITURGY, p. 269; DIPTYCHS, p. 560]. But it is "beyond all question that the early church offered the eucharistic sacrifice as well for the highest saints, and even for the blessed Virgin Mary, as for the common multitude of the departed faithful" (Neale, Eastern Ch. Int. 510). The intercession of saints, for whom at the same time intercession is made, is asked in the so-called liturgy of St. Chrysostom, where we have the following form (Daniel, Codex Lit. iv. 360):—"We offer to Thee also this reasonable service on behalf of (ὡς ἕπερ) those who are at rest in the faith, our forefathers, fathers, patriarchs . . . and every just spirit made perfect in the faith; especially our most holy . . . Lady Mary, Mother of God and ever Virgin . . . for the holy Prophet, Forerunner, and Baptist, John; for the glorious and highly-praised Apostles; for Saint N, whose commemoration we are celebrating, and all Thy saints; at whose supplications (ἱκεταίαι) look upon us, O God. And remember all who have gone to rest before us in hope of the resurrection to eternal life." Then follow the diptychs. The Syrian St. James (Renaudot, Litt. Orient. ii. 36), after commemorating holy Fathers, Patriarchs, Prophets, Apostles, St. John Baptist, St. Stephen, the Virgin, and all Saints, proceeds, "Therefore do we commemorate them, that when they stand before Thy throne, they may remember us in our weakness and frailty, and offer with us to Thee this awful and unbloody sacrifice, for the safe-keeping of those who are living, for the consolation of the feeble and unworthy, such as ourselves; for the rest and good memory of those who have passed away in the true faith, our fathers, brethren, and masters." Here the saints departed are represented as joining in one great act of intercession with those on earth, rather than as interceding for them. These may serve as examples of the manner of asking the intercession of the saints in the Eastern church.

Of the Western liturgies, Mabillon's Gallican (Daniel's Codex Lit. i. 75) has, after the oblation of the unconsecrated elements, "We pray for the souls of Thy servants, our fathers and former teachers, Aurelian, Peter, Florentinus . . . and all our brothers whom Thou hast vouchsafed to call hence to Thee; . . . for the souls of all faithful servants and pilgrims deceased in the peace of the church; that Thou, O Lord our God, wouldst grant them pardon, and rest eternal; by the merits and intercession of Thy Saints, Mary mother of our Lord Jesus Christ, Stephen, Peter, Paul, John, James, Andrew, Philip, Thomas, Bartholomew, Matthew, James, Simon, Jude, Matthias, Gesenius, Symphorianus, Bandillus, Victor, Hilary, bishop and confessor, Martin, bishop and confessor, Caesarius, bishop, vouchsafe in mercy to hear and grant these petitions, who livest and reignest in the unity of the Holy Spirit, God for ever and ever." The Roman has the following in the Communicantes of the CANON, "Claiming fellowship with and venerating the memory of, first, the glorious ever-virgin Mary, mother of our God and Lord Jesus Christ; and also of Thy blessed apostles and martyrs, Peter and Paul, Andrew, James, John, Thomas, James, Philip, Bartholomew, Matthew, Simon, and Thaddaens : Linus, Cletus, Clemens, Xystus, Cornelius, Cyriacus, Laurence, Chrysogonus, John and Paul, Cosmas and Damian: and all Thy saints: in consideration of whose merits and prayers, grant that in all things we may be guarded by the help of Thy protection." The Ambrosian (Daniel i. 84) has, besides these, the names of Apollinaris, Vitalis, Nazarius and Celsus, Protasius and Gervasius. [Compare IMAGES, § viii.; INSCRIPTIONS, p. 856.]

The rule of the church in St. Augustine's time drew a broad distinction between martyrs and other saints; for that father observes (In Joann. Tract. 84), "So at the Table of the Lord we do not commemorate martyrs in the same way that we do others who rest in peace, so as to pray for them, but rather that they may pray for us, that we may follow in their footsteps;" and again (De Vir. Apost. 17), "martyrs are recited at the altar of God in that place where prayer is not made for them; for the rest of the dead who are commemorated prayer is made." It is in accordance with this that the Roman canon, besides the Virgin and the twelve apostles, recites as intercessors twelve martyrs. Other churches however, out of respect to their local saints, did not (as we see in the Gallican and the Milanese) draw so rigid a line, and inserted the names of confessors as well as martyrs. The martyrs of the Roman canon seem to be all connected with the city or see of Rome. [See LIBELLAS, MARTYRS.]

In the EMBOLISMUS of the Lord's Prayer, the Roman and Ambrosian liturgies pray for peace in our days at the intercession of (intercedente) the Virgin Mary with the apostles Peter and Paul and Andrew and all the saints (Daniel i. 96). In the benediction of incense, in the Roman use (Dan. i. 72), the priest prays that God will bless it, at the intercession (per intercessionem) of Michael the archangel, who stands at the right hand of the altar of incense.

(2.) With regard to the objects of intercession, we may say that Christians have been taught to make intercession for all things of which they know that their brethren have need. Such intercessions are scattered over a great variety of offices or litanies [LITANY]. With regard specially to the intercessions made in the eucharist, we will take the form of the Greek St. James (Daniel, iv. 14) as a specimen of the objects recited in the great eucharistic intercession. When the priest, after consecration, has prayed that the Body and Blood of Christ may be to the partakers for remission of sins, for the strengthening of the Holy Catholic Church, etc., he proceeds—"We offer (προσφέρουμεν) to Thee, Lord, on behalf of (ὡς) the Holy Places, especially Zion; the Holy Catholic Church; holy fathers, brethren, bishops; all cities and countries and the orthodox who dwell there; those who are journeying; those fathers and brethren who are in bonds, imprisonment, mines or tortures; the sick and demoniac; every Christian soul in trouble; those who labour in Christ's name; for all men, for peace, and for the dispersion of scandal and heresy; for rain and fruitful seasons; for those who have adorned the churches or shown pity to the poor; for those who desire to be remembered in our prayers; those who have offered; the celebrant and his deacons; all spirits and all flesh, from Abel even to this day, "give them rest in the land of the living, in Thy kingdom, in the bliss of Paradise, in the bosom of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, our holy fathers, whence sorrow and grief and mourning have fled away;" for the forgiveness of sins, "by the grace and mercy and compassion of Thy only-begotten Son;" for (ὡς) the Gifts, that God may receive them into His spiritual sanctuary.

Some of the more remarkable peculiarities of the Intercessions of different churches are noted under CANON OF THE LITURGY, p. 273. [C.]

INTERCESSION, EPISCOPAL. By a custom which grew up less by any definite enactment than by the general respect attaching to their office, the bishops came to be looked upon as protectors of those who were oppressed by the secular power. The patrimony of widows and orphans was often placed under the protection of the churches and bishops (Aug. Ep. 252). Flavian, bishop of Antioch, interceded successfully in A.D. 387 with the Emperor Theodosius, on behalf of the city, which had been guilty of a riot. So Theodoret with the Empress Pulcheria. Many other instances might be cited. These interpositions obtained the technical name of intercessio, and were recognised by the law. The bishop was expected to visit the public prisons on Thursday and Friday (Codex Justinian. lib. i. tit. 4). They were charged with a special oversight of such as held civil office in their dioceses (Concil. Arelat. l. c. 56, Conc. Arel. ii. c. 13, "ut comites iudices, seu reliquos populi obediētes sit episcopo, et in iudicio consentiant ad iustitias faciendas, et in iudicio non recipiant, nec falsos testes, ne per hoc pervertant iudicia iustorum," Conc. General. ii. p. 618, ed. Crabbé). The right of sanctuary for fugitives in the churches grew up in the same period, and was very frequently exercised (Cod. Theodos. l. ix. tit. 45, ap. Neander). See Neale, Introd. to Eastern Church, and essay by Moultrie in Neale's Ecclesiology, pp. 427-474; Neander's Church History, vol. iii. sect. 2. [BISHOP, p. 237; IMMUNITIES OF CLERGY, p. 824.] [S. J. E.]

INTERCESSORES or INTERVENTORES. In the African churches when a see was vacant the senior bishop appointed one of his suffragans as guardian or procurator. He was styled Intercessor or Interventor. The fifth council of Carthage made a canon that no intercessor should remain in this office more than a year, and that if the vacancy was not then filled, another should be appointed. No intercessor was permitted to be chosen bishop of the vacant see himself. So also in the Roman province, as we learn from the letters of Symmachus (Ep. v. c. 9) and Gregory the Great (Ep. ii. 16); Suicer (Thesaurus, s. v. intercessor); Bingham (Ant. lib. ii. c. 13, and iv. c. 2). [BISHOP, p. 237.] [S. J. E.]

INTERMENT. [BURIAL OF THE DEAD.]

INTERPRETER. Epiphanius (Expos. Fid. n. 21) speaks of interpreters of the languages employed both in reading the Scriptures and the sermons, and ranks them among the lower orders of the clergy, after the exorcists. An instance of their existence is afforded in the case of Procopius, who is said to have discharged three offices in the church of Palestine, having been reader, the living, in Thy kingdom, in the bosom of Abraham, our holy fathers, whence mourning have fled away;" of sins, "by the grace and of Thy only-begotten Son, that God may receive His sanctuary. remarkable peculiarities of different churches are noted LITURGY, p. 273. [C.]

INTERROGATIO (sc. de fide). This is a questioning a candidate for baptism as to his belief, before he was baptized, and formed part of the office of baptism from very early times. After the RENUNCIATION (Abrenunciatio) of the devil by the candidate for baptism, and his anointing, and before he was baptized he was questioned as to his faith, and called upon to make public profession of it. The custom is frequently alluded to by the fathers. It is sufficient here to refer: (1) For the custom: to St. Augustine (de Animâ et origine ejus, i. 10). "Ideo cum baptizantur (i. e. pueri) jnm et symbolum reddunt, et ipsi pro se ad interrogatn respondent." (2) For its object to St. Cyprian (Ep. 70 ad Januarium de baptizandis hæreticis). "Ipsa interrogatio que fit in baptismo testis est veritatis." (3) For its substance, to St. Ambrose (de Mysteriis, v. 28). "Descendisti igitur (i. e. in fontem) recordeare quid responderis, quod credas in Patrem, credas in Filium, credas in Spiritum Sanctum;" and more fully de Sacramentis lib. ii. vii. "Interrogatus es: Credis in Deum Patrem Omnipotentem? Dixisti: Credo, et miseristi, hoc est, sepultus es. Iterum interrogatus es: Credis in Dominum nostrum Jesum Christum, et in crucem ejus? Dixisti: Credo, et miseristi; ideo et Christo es conspuitus; qui enim Christo consepelitur, cum Christo resurgit. Tertio interrogatus es: Credis et in Spiritum Sanctum? Dixisti: Credo, tertio miseristi; ut multiplicem lapsum superioris ætatis absolveret tua confessio."

The rite is still retained in the office of Baptism in the Roman church, in the same position as of old; and in the Greek church in the preliminary office of "making a catechumen" (eis τὸ ποιεῖν κατηχούμενον).

The forms of the questions closely resemble the old forms [v. Rit. Rom. de Sacramento Baptismi, and Euchologion ἐὼχαλ εἰς τὸ ποιεῖν κατηχούμενον]. For further details and patristic references see Martene de Ant. Eccl. Lit. i. 47. See also BAPTISM, §§ 43, 46, pp. 159, 160; CREED § 4, p. 489; PROFESSION. [H. J. H.]

INTERSTITIA. These are intervals of time which according to the regulations of the church ought to elapse between the reception of one order and the admission to a superior. Their object was to exercise a cleric in the functions of his order, and to test his fitness for promotion to a higher. The institution is an old one in the church. The tenth canon of the council of Sardica decrees "Hæbit autem minusculusque adhis gradus non minimi scilicet temporis longitudinem pro quod et fides et morum probitas et constantia et moderatio possit cognosci." The duration of these interstitia was not determined at the first, and it has varied much at different times and places. Zosimus c. g., A. D. 417 (Ep. 1 ad Hesychium) proposes the following rule. "If any one has been designed for ecclesiastical ministratio from his infancy, he is to remain among the readers till his twentieth year. If he has devoted himself to the sacred ministry when grown and of ripe age, provided he has done so immediately after baptism, he is to be kept among the readers or exorcists five years. CHRIST. ANT.

Then he is to spend four years as an acolyte or subdeacon. Then if deserving he is to be promoted to the diaconate, in which order he is to remain five years, and, if worthy, promoted to the priesthood." Another canon prescribes that a bishop must have been at least four years a priest. [It must be remembered that in the early church the age required for conferring holy orders was more advanced than is the case at present, twenty-five being the ordinary age for a deacon, and thirty for a priest.]

Gelasius (A. D. 492) shortened the prescribed intervals between the different sacred orders, and in cases of urgency they were occasionally altogether dispensed with. Of this the most conspicuous instance is that of St. Ambrose, who is said to have passed through all the sacred orders and to have been consecrated bishop on the eighth day after his baptism.

In process of time, as the proper functions assigned to the several minor orders fell into disuse, the interstitia between them ceased to be observed, and the modern practice is to confer the four minor orders simultaneously. The council of Trent requires a year between the minor orders and the subdiaconate, between the subdiaconate and the diaconate, and between the diaconate and the priesthood. Legitimate exceptions are recognised, and dispensations under certain conditions allowed; but two (major) orders are not to be conferred on the same day: "Duo sacri ordines non eodem die, privilegiis ac indulgiis . . . non obstantibus quibusenque" (Con. Trent. Sept. xxiii. col. 3; De Reform.) [ORDINATION.] [H. J. H.]

INTERVENTORES. [INTERCESSORES.]

INTROIT. Introitus is the name commonly given throughout the Latin church to the anthem at the beginning of the eucharistic office. At Rome it was originally called Antiphona ad Introitum, as in the earliest editions of the Ordo Romanus (i. n. 8, ii. n. 3, iii. n. 8, in Musæ. Ital. tom. ii.). In Ordo Romanus VI. (n. 2, ib.), probably a little later than our period, it is first called introitus simply. Meanwhile in one Ordo (v. n. 5, ib.), we find the name of invitatory given to it. At Milan it was termed Ingressa (Ambros. Miss. Ritus in Panellii Lituale SS. PP. tom. i. p. 293), a word of the same meaning as introitus. In Spain (Miss. Mozar. Leslie, pp. 13, 55, 64, &c.) and in England (the missals of Sarum, York, Hereford; Maskell's Ancient Liturgy, pp. 20, 21) the introit was called officium, or officium missæ. This arose from a mistake. The several masses in the early missals were headed by the words Ad Missam Officium (Leslie, u. s. pp. 1, 7, 10, &c.; Missale Sarum, coll. 1, 18, 27, &c., ed. Forbes), which were the heading of the whole office, but were supposed to refer to the introit which followed immediately without any heading of its own. The antiphon had this name in all the churches of Normandy, and in many others (Le Brun, Explic. de la Messe, p. ii. art. 1), and in the missals of the Carthusians, Carmelites, and Dominicans. This extended use would be a sufficient proof of its great antiquity, were we without the evidence of the Mozarabic ritual. In the barbarous Expositio Missæ, ascribed to Germanus of Paris, A. D. 555, and certainly not much later than his time, the introit, as used in the old Gallican liturgy, is called praelegere, or antiphona ad praelegendum (sic), because it preceded the eucharistic lessons (Expos. printed in Martens, De Ant. Eccl. Lit. lib. i. c. iv. art. xii. ord. 1.)

The origin of the Introit is obscure. At the earliest period the office began with lessons from holy Scripture, of which psalms said or sung formed a part, but this psalmody is in the West to be traced in the GRADUAL and TRACT. In the Syrian rite a psalm is sung before as well as after the epistle, but this appears to have had the same origin (Ordo Communis; Renaud. Liturg. Orient. tom. ii. p. 7). The Introit is clearly another rite, and of later introduction. It seems to have been introduced partly as a fitting accompaniment of the solemn entrance (introitus, ingressa) of the celebrant into that part of the church in which the altar stood, and partly as a means of employing and solemnizing the minds of the people before the service began. The name introitus suggests that the people were still entering the church while it was being sung.

The Ordo Romanus in its earliest state, about 730, gives us some suggestive information respecting the introit as sung in the churches of Rome at that time. The bishop having vested is still in the secretarium, the choir waiting in the church for an order from him to begin "the antiphon for the entrance" (introitum). On a signal from him "ut pallant," a subdeacon enters the church, orders the candles to be lighted, and then stands with a censer before the door of the secretarium, while one of the leaders of the choir, who has also been in waiting, carries the order for the singing to commence. As soon as this is heard two deacons enter, and each taking a hand of the bishop lead him into the church, up to the altar. He is preceded by the subdeacon with incense, and seven acolytes bearing candles. On his way to the altar the Sanctus or FERMENTUM is brought to him that he may select what is necessary for the celebration. After private prayer at the altar, and giving the peace to the ministers, he stops the singing by giving a signal for the Gloria Patri (Ord. Rom. l. n. n. 7, 8; comp. ii. n. n. 4, 5, iii. n. n. 7, 8, v. n. n. 5, vi. n. 3).

The Liber Pontificalis is supposed to ascribe the introduction of the introit to Celestine, A.D. 423, when it tells us that he "ordered the 150 psalms of David to be sung antiphonally before the sacrifice" (Anastas. Biblioth. Vitae Pont. n. 44). The tradition probably refers to the introit, although the next statement shows that the author connects it with the earlier Gradual. For he adds:—"This was not done before, only the epistles of the apostle Paul were recited and the holy gospel, and so masses were celebrated." It will be observed that the Ordo cited calls the introit an antiphon, though it uses the word psalter. Gregory the Great, A.D. 595, is said to have compiled the antiphons, selecting proper verses from the psalms, and retaining the Gloria, which was then said, as now, at the end of every psalm. Some ancient writers, as Amalarius (De Eccl. Officiis, lib. iii. c. 5), Walafrid Strabo (De Rebus Eccl. c. 22), and Micrologus (De Eccl. Observ. c. 1), suppose that this selection was the work of Celestine; but Honorius of Autun, more in consonance with the words of the Liber Pontificalis, and with the circumstantial evidence of the case, says,— "Pope Celestine ordered psalms to be sung at the introit of the mass, from which pope Gregory afterwards arranged and compiled antiphons for the introit of the mass" (Genina Animæ, lib. i. c. 87). All the psalms in the antiphony ascribed to Gregory are taken from the old Italic version, as it stood before the corrections of St. Jerome, but this is no proof of an earlier antiquity of the introits than we ascribe to them. For Gregory himself professed to use the Italic and the Vulgate versions of the Bible indifferently (Ep. ad Leandr. c. 5, in fine; Expos. in Lib. Job. proef.), and Jerome's corrected Italic psalter, long called the Gallican at Rome until the time of Pius V. (Bona, Rer. Liturg. lib. ii. c. 3, § 4). The following example of the Gregorian introit is for the first Sunday in Advent—"Antiph. Ad Te, Domine, levavi animam meam. Deus meus in Te confido: non erubescam neque irideat me inimicus meus (Vulg. irideat me inimici mei) etenim universi qui Te expectant (Vulg. sustinent Te) non confundentur (Ps. xxv. 1-3). Psal. Vias Tuas, Domine, demonstra mihi et semitas tuas edoce me" (ib. v. 4). Durandus (Rationale, lib. iv. c. 5, n. 5) tells us that "in some churches tropes are said for the psalms, according to the appointment of pope Gregory, to represent greater joy on account of the coming of Christ." The introit itself had long been thought designed to "bring back His advent to our mind" (Amalar. De Eccl. Off. lib. iii. c. 5); but Durandus is without doubt wrong in ascribing to Gregory the attempt to emphasize that meaning by the addition of tropes. We cannot, however, say at what period subsequent to his they first appeared. They were not like the Greek troparia, independent of the antiphons in connection with which they were sung, but were farsings or interpolations in the antiphons of the Gregorian introit. In the following example the farsing is in italics. The antiphon is that for the Epiphany:—"Eja, Sion gaude, et lactare aspectu Dei tui. Ecce advenit dominator Dominus; cui materies coeli et terrae famulantur; et regnum in manu ejus. Ipsi manet Deus (sic) gloria atque jubilatio; et potestas et imperium" (Pamelli, Rituale, tom. ii. p. 613; comp. p. 73).

Of the Gallican introit we only know that like the Roman it was sung before the office of the mass began. "While the clerks are singing psalms" (psallentibus), says Germinus (l. s.), "the priest comes forth out of the sacrum" (acer=secretarium). The council of Agde, A.D. 506, appears to recognize the introit, when it orders that as in other churches "collects be said in order by the bishops and presbyters after the antiphons" (cap. 30). The following is the introit (taken from the original Italic version of Ps. xciii. 1) used in the Mozarabic liturgy on every Sunday between Whitsunday and Advent, and again on the Circumcision and the Sundays before and after the Epiphany:—"Dominus regnavit; decorem induit: Alleluia. Ψ . Iudaei regnavit; decorem induit: Alleluia. Ψ . Iudaei fortitudinem et praecinxit se. P. Dominus fortitudinem et praecinxit se. P. Presbyter. Alleluia. Ψ . Gloria et honor Patri et Filio: et Spiritui Sancto in saecula saeculorum: Amen. P. Alleluia." It will be seen that this belongs to the later period, when the celebrant was at the altar before the choir began, a rule which has prevailed in the church of case, says, — "Pope Celestine was sung at the introit of the pope Gregory afterwards as antiphons for the introit of na Animæ, lib. i. c. 87). All antiphons ascribed to Grem the old Italic version, as it corrections of St. Jerome, but an earlier antiquity of the inscribe to them. For Gregory; to use the Italic and the Vulgate Bible indifferently (Ep. ad ne; Eneas. in Lib. Job. pref.), acted Italic psalter, long called ter, did not take the place of one until the time of Plus V. (Ep. lib. ii. c. 3, § 4). The fol- of the Gregorian introit is for in Advent — "Antiph. Ad Tr, animam mem. Deus meus in erubescam neque irident me *Vulg. Irident me invidiosus qui Te expectant (Vulg. susti- fandi Ps. xv. 1-3). Paul, funderum (Ps. xv. 1-3). Paul, demost, demonstrat mibi et semitas (ib. v. 4). Durandus (Rationale, tells us that "In some churches or the psalms, according to the pope Gregory, to represent cont of the coming of Christ," had long been thought designed his advent to our mind" (Am- f. lib. iii. c. 5); but Durandus wrong in ascribing to Gregory emphasize that meaning by the s. We cannot, however, say at osequent to his they first apere are not like the Greek troparia, re antiphons in connection with sung, but were farsings or in- the antiphons of the Gregorian following example the farsing is antiphon is that for the Epiphany: laude, et lactare aspectu Dei tui. iminator Dominus; cui materies amuluntur; et regnum in manu; Deus (sic) gloriæ atque jubilatio; perierum" (Pamelli, Rituale, tom. p. 73).*

In introit we only know that hie was sung before the office of the While the clerks are singing entibus), says Germanus (u. s.), es forth out of the sacration") The council of Agde, A.D. recognize the introit, when it other churches "collects be said bishops and presbyters after the s. 30). The following is the in- the original Italic version of ed in the Mozarabic liturgy on between Whitsunday and Advent, e Circumcision and the Sunda- re the Epiphany: — "Dominus rer induit: Alleluia. Ÿ. Idu, iudicinem et præcinxit se. P. leluia. Ÿ. Gloria et honor Patri spiritui Sancto in sæcula sæculi. P. Alleluia." It will be seen g to the later period, when use at the altar before the choir, hich has prevailed in the church of Rome also for many ages. See Sabu, Annot. 11, lu Bona, Rev. Liturg. lib. ii. c. iii. § 1; and Le Brun, Excubation, p. ii. art. 1. The Ambrosian ingressa is very simple. The following is for Christmas Day, from Is. ix. 6, Ital. vers. "Puer natus est nobis, et filius datus est nobis, cuius imperium super humerum ejus, et vocabitur nomen ejus magni consilii angelus" (Pamellius, u. s. tom. i. p. 293). "It is an anthem without psalm, or Gloria, or repetition" (Le Brun, Diss. iii. art. 2).

The following hymn is sung in the liturgy of St. James before the priest enters to the altar. It is preceded by the rubric, "Then the deacon begins to sing in the entrance," which at once suggests an analogy to the Western introit. "Only begotten Son and Word of God, who being immortal didst for our salvation take upon Thee to be incarnate of the holy Mary, mother of God and ever Virgin, and didst unchangeably become man, and wast crucified, O Christ (our) God, and didst by death trample on death, being one of the Holy Trinity, glorified together with the Father and the Holy Ghost, save us" (Liturgiae SS. PP. p. 6, Bas. 1560). The matter of this hymn proves it to be later than the outbreak of the Nestorian heresy; but its great antiquity is sufficiently attested by its appearing also in the liturgies of St. Mark (Renaudot, Liturg. Orient. tom. i. p. 136), in copies, apparently the older, of St. Basil (Eucholog. Goar, p. 180, and the old Latin version, Liturgiae, sive Missæ SS. PP. p. 32, Par. 1560), in many copies of St. Chrysostom (Goar, u. s. pp. 101, 105), and in the Armenian (Neale's Intro. to Hist. of East. Church, p. 380). In St. Basil and St. Chrysostom, however, we have a nearer approach to, and the probable origin of, the Western introit, viz., in three antiphons, composed for common days, of three or four verses (Rubric in St. Basil, Goar, p. 180, and the old Latin, p. 32) of the 92nd, 93rd, and 95th psalms (as numbered in E. V.). See Goar, pp. 101, 104, 105. While each antiphon is sung, a prayer is said secretly by the priest; and it may be interesting to mention that the "Prayer of St. Chrysostom;" in our daily office, is in the Greek liturgy (Lib. PP. pp. 45, 81) the "Prayer of the Third Antiphon." The revisers of our offices were familiar with it in the translation of St. Chrysostom by Leo Thuscus, A.D. 1180 (printed by Hofmeister, in 1540), and in the Greek and Latin of the editions of Venice, 1528, and Paris, 1537, and introduced it at the end of the litany in 1544. When the Greek antiphons were first used is not known. Amalarius, writing about the year 833, says that he had heard the 95th psalm sung at Constantinople "in the church of St. Sophia at the beginning of mass" (De Ord. Antiph. c. 21). The use of the antiphon by the Nestorians and Jacobites seems to carry us up to the 5th century, in which they were separated from the church. On Sundays the Greek church commonly substituted "typica" (so-called because they were forms prescribed by the rubrics) for the first two antiphons, and the Benedictus for the third (Goar, pp. 65-67; Liturg. PP. pp. 44, 80-82), with verses (ἑσπέρια) commemorating the saint of the day (Goar, u. s.). The liturgic typica are from the 103rd and 146th psalms (Demetrius Ducas, in Lebrun, Diss. VI. art. iv. Leo Allatius, De Libris Eccl. Diss. I. p. 14). For the third antiphon may also be used on common days, the third and sixth centile (when thus united called ἑσπέρια) of the matin office (Goar, pp. 67, 124). The typica, we must add, are not sung on every Sunday. "It should be known," says the ἑσπέρια of Sabas, "that from New Sunday to the Feast of All Saints (i. e. from the octave of Easter to that of Whit-sunday) the church sings antiphons and not typica. We sing the antiphons likewise in the Twelve Days (between Christmas and Epiphany), and on the memorials of saints which we keep as feasts" (In Leo Allat. u. s.).

The Syrian rite preserves a fragment of the 93rd psalm and nearly the whole of the 95th, at the beginning of the service. They are sung while the veils and the altar are being cased (Renaudot, tom. ii. pp. 3, 4). In the Nestorian liturgies, the priest and deacon, standing near the altar, say, in alternate verses, on common days, parts of psalms 15, 150, 117; and proper hymns on Sundays and the greater festivals (Budger's Nestorians, vol. ii. p. 215; Raulin, Liturgie Mahabarian, p. 294; Renaudot, tom. ii. p. 584). In the Armenian, beside the hymn before mentioned, there are hymns proper to the day, sung where the Greek has its antiphons (Le Brun, Diss. X. art. 12).

Cardinal Bona (Rev. Liturg. lib. ii. c. iii. § 1) suggests that "perhaps Celestine (in adopting the introit) transferred to the Western churches a custom which had long flourished in the Eastern." The great use made, as we have seen, of the 93rd psalm (Dominus regnavit) in the introits of Spain, creates a strong suspicion that Spain was a borrower from the Greeks, in whose liturgy that psalm was used on all common days and many Sundays in the year. Hence it is probable that the introit was, like some other rites, derived by Rome from the East through Spain.

INVENTION OF THE CROSS. [Cross, FINDING OF THE, p. 503.]

INVESTITURE The Latin word Investitura (from vestire, to put into possession; see Ducange s. v.), is of later date than the 9th century; nor had the thing signified by it really commenced by then, in the sense which concerns us here: the putting ecclesiastics in possession of their temporalities by a formal act of the civil power. When Siegbert, quoted by Gratian (Dist. lxxiii. c. 22), in enumerating the privileges supposed by him to have been conferred on Charlemagne by Adrian I., says of that pope: "Insuper archiepiscopus et episcopus per singulas provincias ab eo investituram accipere definit: et nisi a rege laudetur at investituræ episcopus, a nemine consecratur," he is, apart from the doubtfulness of the fact (on which see De Marca, de Concord. viii. 12), making the pope depose, not merely to language, but to customs unknown in his day. Lanulph, who was contemporary with Siegbert, is bolder still; making Adrian the inventor of both. "Qui primus," as he says of him, "annulos et virgæ ad investiendum episcopatus Carolo donavit" (Hist. Mediol. ii. 11); but then he couples another incident with this tale, which explains its origin. The absence of notice in the Caroline capitularies of any such custom, and their apparent ignorance of the word itself, seems conclusive against the existence of either at that date, particularly as the word "vestitura" is of frequent occurrence in them, denoting either possession, or the payment for it. Of course there were symbolical forms also then in use for giving possession, but none peculiar, as yet, to the clergy; and the common name for the act of doing this was "traditio." Hence, probably, the new word arose from joining the two words, "in vestitura," in one; and then understanding it of the special formality by which the clergy were put in possession of their temporalities, on this becoming essential to possession in their case. That Charlemagne, as well as his predecessors, appointed bishops of his own choosing occasionally to sees in his dominions, is no more than had been done by the Greek emperors ages before, where investiture in its Western acceptation has never been known. Neither the Theodosian Code, nor the Code or Novels of Justinian exhibit traces of anything approaching to it, though by the latter limits are prescribed to the fees for enthronization (Noel. cxliii. 31; see also Du Cange and Hofmann, s. v.; Sirmion ap. Baluz. Capitul. ii. 802; and Thomassin. Vel. et Noe. Eccl. Discipl. ii. ii. 38).

INVITATORIUM. In the Gregorian and Benedictine * offices the psalm "Venite exultemus Domino" xciv. [E. V. xcv.] is said daily at the beginning of Nocturns preceded by an antiphon which is called the Invitatorium. It is of precisely the same character as other antiphons to psalms, and varies with the day, but is said differently from other antiphons, and repeated several times during the course of the psalm as well as at the beginning and end. Thus the ordinary Sunday invitatory is "Adoremus Dominum, qui fecit nos," which is said twice at the beginning of the psalm, and repeated in whole or in part five times during its course, and again after the Gloria.

On the Epiphany no invitatory was said; but the psalmody began, and still begins, with the psalms of the first nocturn with their antiphons [Hodie non cantamus invitatorium, sed absolute incipimus. Ru'ric ex Antiphonario Vaticano Rom. Eccl.]^b and the psalm "Venite" was said with its own antiphon as the last psalm of the second nocturn. [Later it was said as the first psalm of the third nocturn, and its antiphon repeated during its course in the ordinary manner of an invitatory]. Amalarius (lib. iv. c. 33) and Durandus (lib. vi. c. 36) suggest that the reason for this omission may have been to mark the difference between the invitation to the faithful to praise God, and that which Herod gave to the scribes and doctors to find out where Christ should be born. More probably it was omitted [Martene de Rit. lib. iv. c. 14] simply because the psalm to which it belonged was said in an-

* In the Benedictine Psalter Ps. "Venite" is preceded by Ps. 3; but its antiphon is called "Antiph. Invitatorium."

^b Amalarius c. xl writes: "Nostra regio in presentis officio [i. e. in die Epip.] solita est unum omittere de consueto more, id est Invitatorium," as if the custom were local; but from what he says in the passage referred to in the text, it would seem that it soon became general. Some French churches, however, among which were those of Lyons and Rouen, were in the habit of singing the Invitatory on the Epiphany. At Lyons it was sung with special solemnity (Martene ut sup.).

other place, though why the psalm should be displaced from its ordinary position is not so clear.

The psalm "Venite" is also known as the "Invitatory Psalm."

In the Ambrosian psalter, "Venite" is not said at the beginning of the office, and there is no antiphon which corresponds to the Gregorian Invitatorium. [H. J. H.]

D. 450 or 456, viz. in his 80th or 86th year, assisted by his condisciples, Bishops Auxilius and Isernius. At least the 34 canons passed at the first run in their joint names. The discipline prescribed in them, indicates very primitive manners. By the 6th any clerk, from the doorkeeper to the priest seen abroad without his shirt, and with his nakedness uncovered, if his hair be not tonsured in the Roman style, and his wife walk out with her head unveiled, is to be lightly regarded by the laity, and excluded from the church. Thirty-one canons of a similar description are given to the other council. But these 65 by no means exhaust the number ascribed to St. Patrick. Seventeen more from other sources are supplied by Mansi (vi. 519-22). Another collection of Irish canons, supposed to be earlier than the 8th century, may be seen in Dnebery's Spicil. by Baluz. i. 491 and seq., and a supplement to them in Martene and Durand, Antec. iv. 1-21. JAMES THE GREATER, ST., LEGEND
AND FESTIVAL OF.

1. Legend.—By the name of James the Greater, the son of Zebedee is distinguished from the other apostle of the same name. The epithet would seem to have regard either to stature or to age, though some, with apparently less likelihood, would make it refer (1) to priority in the call to the apostleship, or (2) to higher privileges in intercourse with Christ, or (3) to the dignity of an earlier martyrdom.

The elder brother of St. John, universally believed to have been the last survivor of the apostles, St. James was the first to be called away, having been beheaded by Herod Agrippa I., shortly before the Passover of 44 A. D. Out of a mass of tradition concerning him, the only point supported by any adequate evidence is the incident related by Eusebius (Hist. Eccles. ii. 9) on the authority of Clement of Alexandria, of the conversion of St. James's accuser as the apostle was led away to death. Struck by his steadfastness, he too embraced Christ, and the apostle and his accuser suffered together.

The stories, however, of St. James's connection with Spain are deserving of very little credit. In spite of such plain statements as Acts viii. 1 (very lamely met by Baronius), the apostle is made to undertake a missionary journey into Spain after the death of Stephen, returning to Jerusalem before A. D. 44. The ancient evidence for such a story is of the weakest. Isidore of Seville (ob. 636 A. D.) does say (de Ortu et Obitu Patrum, c. 71; Patrol. lxxxiii. 151), if indeed the work is his, which is certainly doubtful, that St. James preached the gospel to the natives of Spain and the Western regions;^a and the same statement is found in the Collectanea, once wrongly attributed to Bede (Patrol. xciv. 545). Mere unsupported statements, however, of so late a date can amount to very little. It is worthy of notice too that at a much earlier period, Innocent I. (ob. 417 A. D.) states that no church had been founded throughout Italy, Gaul, or Spain, except by those who owed their authority directly or indirectly to St. Peter (Ep. 25 ad Decentium, c. 2; Patrol. xx. 552). With every allowance for the desire of a bishop of Rome to exalt the see of St. Peter, so sweeping a statement could hardly have been ventured on, had there been a strongly established tradition as to St. James's connection with Spain. Ambrose evidently knew no such legend, for he speaks of St. Paul's projected journey into Spain being "quia illic Christus non erit predicatus" (Comm. in Ep. ad Rom. xv. 24; Patrol. xvii. 176); nor did Jerome, for he mentions St. Paul's journeys having reached even to Spain, immediately after referring to the apostle's never building "super alterius fundamentum, ubi jam fuerat praeedicatum" (Comm. in Amos, v. 8 sqq.; vol. vi. 291, ed. Vallarsi). Baronius (notes to Martyrologium Romanum; July 25), in summing up concerning these legends, can only urge "non esse adeo impossibilia, vel haberi pro monstro, ut putant aliqui."

The story of the translation of the apostle's body into Spain is obviously totally apocryphal. It is to the effect that after his body had been interred at Jerusalem, his disciples removed it to Iria Flavia, in the far north-west of Spain. (For an elementary form of the story see the Martyrologies [July 25] of Usuard and Notker;

^a This writing speaks of St. James as buried "in Maritima" (at Carnaria, &c.), a name which does not seem to have been satisfactorily explained.

Patrol. cxiv. 295, cxxi. 1125: those of Bede and Wandalbert ignore it.) Here it was discovered early in the 9th century, and removed to Compostella (a corruption of Giaoma Postola, ad Jaoban Apostolan), a few miles distant, by order of Alphonso II., king of Asturias and Leon (ob. 842 A. D.). For a very full account of these legends, see Cuper in the Acta Sacrorum (July, vol. v. pp. 3 sqq.); also Mariana, De uoluntate Jacobi Apostoli majoris in Hispaniam, in his Tractatus, Col. Agr. 1609; Tolra, Justification historico-critica de la venida de Santiago el Mayor á España, y de su sepulcro in Compos etc. Matriti, 1797; Arevalus, Isidoriana, c. 61 (Patrol. lxxxi. 382 sqq.), and sundry writings in connection with St. James, wrongly attributed to pope Callixtus II. (Patrol. clxiii. 1370 sqq.). Strangely, however, in spite of this lack of evidence, the legend took such root in Spain, as practically to count there as an article of faith, and thus we find Luther holding it necessary to protest against such a view (Sämmtliche Schriften, xv. 1864, ed. Walch).

For the wild legends connecting St. James with the false teachers Hermogenes and Philetus, reference may be made to the Historia Apostolica of the pseudo-Abdias, lib. iv., in which, it may be remarked in passing, there is no allusion whatever to Spain (Fabricius, Codex Pseudepigraphus Novi Testamenti, vol. ii. p. 516 sqq. ed. 1719).

2. Festival of St. James.—The date when St. James was first commemorated by a festival cannot be determined very closely. It is well known that at first the only apostles who had a special festival were St. Peter and St. Paul, and that the others gradually obtained separate commemorations afterwards. In the case of St. James, the notices are such as to point to the conclusion that the festival was one which only made its way very gradually, and that the date at which it had attained general observance was quite late. We find a mention, it is true, in the ancient Kalendarium Carthagenense, where for December 27 is this notice: "vi. Kal. Jan. Sancti Joannis Baptistae [here probably Evangelistae should be read] et Jacobi Apostoli, quem Hercules occidit" (Patrol. xiii. 1228). On the other hand, many ancient Sacramentaries give no indication of the existence of a festival of St. James. The Ambrosian (Pamelius, Liturg. Lat. i. 405) and Gregorian (col. 115, ed. Menard), as we now have them, do so, the forms being almost identical in the two cases; but the Leonine and Gelasian pass it over. In the ancient Gallican Liturgy edited by Mabillon, to which we have referred below, it will be seen that St. James is commemorated, together with his brother, on December 27, but in the Gallican Lectionary the festival is of St. John alone, and in the Martyrologium Gellomense (D'Achéry's Spicilegium, xiii. 39c), the notice is "vi. Kal. Jan. Ornatissimo Episcopus Jacobi Apostoli fratris Domini et Adsumptio Sancti Joannis Evangelistae." In the Gothic Breviary edited by Lorenzana, a form is provided for a festival of St. James on December 30 (Patrol. lxxvi. 1306), but there is none in the Mozarabic Missal. The Pontifical of Egbert, archbishop of York (ob. 755 A. D.) has no notice of such a festival. Additional evidence to the same effect may be found in the fact that the earliest traces of a vigil of a festival of St.

ames.—The date when St. mmemorated by a festival very closely. It is well e only apostles who had a St. Peter and St. Paul, and ally obtained separate com- mands. In the case of St. re such as to point to the festival was one which only gradually, and that the date ined general observance was a mention, it is true, in the a Carthaginense, where for notice: "vi. In the ancient Gallican abillon, to which we have ill be seen that St. James is ether with his brother, on the Gallican Lectionary the n alone, and in the martyro- D'Achéry's Spicilegium, xiii. s "vi. Kal. Jan. Ornatuio Apostoll fratris Domini et Joannis Evangelistae." In edited by Lorenzana, a form festival of St. James on Be- lxxvii. 1306), but there is tix Missal. The Pontifical of of York (ob. 766 A.D.) has festival. Additional evidence may be found in the fact that of a vigil of a festival of St.

James are of very late date. Binterim (Denk-, v. 1. 401) asserts that the vigil does not occur at all in calendars before the 10th century. Even so late, however, as the 13th century, the festival itself does not appear to have attained universal acceptance; for in the canons of the council of Oxford (1222 A.D.) it is not included in the list of the chief festivals observed in Eng- land (can. 8; Labbe xi. 274). At the council of Cognac in France (1256 A.D.) the case is some- what doubtful, yet taking the context into con- sideration (cf. can. 19), the words "duodecim Apostolorum, et maxime Petri et Pauli, Andreæ, Jacobi . . ." perhaps point to separate festi- vals and not to the collective festival of the apostles (can. 21; Labbe xi. 749: cf. Cow. Tolosianum [1229 A.D.], can. 26, op. cit. 433, where the probability seems to incline the other way). We may appeal, however, finally to the proceedings of the synod of Exeter (1287 A.D.), where the festivals to be observed are named in their several mouths, and where the entry for July is, "Translationis S. Thomæ martyris, Sanctæ Mariæ Magdaleneæ, S. Jacobi Apostoli majoris" (can. 23, op. cit. 1288).

Besides this vagueness as to the date of the origin of the festival, the utmost latitude also prevails as to the day when it was to be cele- brated. We have evidence indeed of a kind which is wanting in the case of every other apostle, for from Acts xii. 4 we may assume that St. James was put to death shortly before the Passover. Still, in the Western church, perhaps from the wish not to have a celebration of a martyrdom in Lent and Easter-time, we generally find St. James's festival on July 25.^a The calendar of the church of Carthage associates him, as we have seen, with his brother John on December 27; as does also the Gothico-Gallic Missal, where the heading for the day is "in natale Apostolorum Jacobi et Johannis" (Ma- billon, de Liturgia Gallicana, lib. iii. p. 196). [In the Gothic calendar, however, prefixed to Lorenzana's edition of the Gothic Breviary, we find on December 30, "Jacobus frater Joannis Apostoll et Evangelistae," following the notice on December 29, "Jacobus, frater Domini," Patrol. lxxvii. 19.] The same combination too meets us in the calendar of the Armenian church on December 28 (Neale, Eastern Church, introd. p. 804), and in that of the Ethiopic church on September 27 (Ludolf, Fiesti Sacri Ecclesie Alexantrinae, p. 5). The calendar of the Byzantine church appoints April 30 for the commemoration of St. James, and so we find in the Greek metrical Ephemerides prefixed by Papebrock to the Acta Sanctorum for May (vol. i. p. xxv.) κρίσις μάχαρια θύου Ιακώβου ἐν τριακάρτη. In the martyrology given by Cardinal Sirletus, besides the commemoration on April 30, there is also noted on November 15, "Natalis SS. Barnæ et Jacobi, fratris Joannis Theologi" (see Canisius, Theaurus, vol. iii. pp. 427, 486). The spring period is also recognised in the Ethiopic and Coptic calendars. In the former, besides the festival mentioned above, there are also commemorations on February 4 and April

^a The statement of some writers (e. g. Augusti, Denkw. iii. 227) that this particular day is the anniversary of the translation of the saint's remains to Compostella, is one whose proof and disproof is equally impossible.

12 of St. James, apparently the son of Zebede (Ludolf, pp. 20, 26). The Coptic calendar has generally a very close affinity with the preceding, and, like it, has a festival of St. James (defined as the son of Zebede) on April 12; and also on February 12 of a James, presumably the present, and on April 30 of a James, defined as the son of Zebede.^c

3. Whether or no it is due to the early date of this apostle's martyrdom, but little litera- ture is directly associated with his name. The canonical epistle of James is indeed assigned to him in the subscription of a Corbey MS. of the old Latin version cited by Tischendorf (in loc.), and also in the passage of Isidore already referred to. This theory, however, is exceedingly im- probable, and need not be further referred to here.

A pretended discovery was made near Granada in Spain in 1595 A.D. of the remains of two of St. James's disciples, and with them of eighteen books on leaden plates, including several by St. James, which with the others were condemned by Innocent XI. in 1682 A.D. (Fabricius, Codex Pseudepigraphus Novi Testamenti, i. 352, iii. 725; Acta Sanctorum, May, vol. vii. pp. 285, 393).

JAMES THE LESS, ST., LEGEND AND FESTIVAL OF.

1. Legend, &c.—It does not fall within our present province to discuss the question whether James, the son of Alphaeus, one of the twelve apostles, is or is not the same as James, the Lord's brother, bishop of Jerusalem. The probability seems to incline in favour of the non-identity of the two, but there are considerable difficulties attending either hypothesis; and the matter will be found discussed at length in the DICTIONARY OF THE BIBLE. Of ancient liturgies, martyrologies and calendars, some identify, while others distinguish them; and hence it may perhaps be most convenient here to collect together the various notices under either designa- tion.

It may be remarked at the outset that if James, the son of Alphaeus, be a different person from James the Lord's brother, there is almost a complete lack of tradition as to his history. The ancient so-called Martyrologium Hieronymi speaks of his being martyred in Persia (Patrol. xxx. 478), and the Greek metrical Ephemerides, which we have cited be- low, assert that he was crucified; but it is im- possible to say what amount of belief is to be given to either of these statements. James, the ^c It should be noticed that sundry slight variations from Ludolf's calendar of the Egyptian church occur in those given by S. Ken (de Synæria Veterum Ebraeorum, pp. 210 sqq., ed. Amsterdam, 1679). Here one calendar gives Feb. 11, the other Feb. 12; one April 11, the other April 12; and one (the other has no entry) has April 29 for April 30.

Lord's brother, on the other hand, fills a prominent place in the history of the Acts, he is referred to by St. Paul in the Epistle to the Galatians in a way that sufficiently indicates his importance, and there can be no doubt that it is to him we owe the so-called Catholic Epistle of St. James. Ecclesiastical tradition also tells much concerning him, and the account of his martyrdom given by Eusebius (Hist. Eccl. ii. 23) from Hegesippus is doubtless substantially correct. It is not, however, necessary to repeat here what has already been said in the Bible Dictionary, to which reference may be made.

2. Festiv. d.—The exact date of the rise of a special festival of St. James, whether as the son of Alphaeus or as the Lord's brother, is hard to fix. Like those of most of the apostles, it is comparatively late. Among the earliest witnesses, we may mention the Martyrologium Hieronymi, the metrical martyrology of Bede, and the ancient liturgies referred to below. The first of these, as well as other early Roman martyrologies, commemorates James, the son of Alphaeus, on June 22, and also James, the Lord's brother, on March 15, April 25, and December 27. On the last of these there is associated with the "Assumptio S. Joannis Evangelistae," also the "Ordinatio episcopatus S. Jacobi fratris Domini," a combination to which we shall again refer. There is also in this martyrology, as we now have it, a commemoration of James, not further defined, but obviously the present, on May 1. The metrical martyrology of Bede commemorates St. Philip and St. James together on May 1, the latter, it will be seen, defined as the Lord's brother,

"Jacobus Domini frater pius atque Philippus Mortico Malas veneratur honore Calendas."

This has been the general custom throughout the Western church, and so we find it in the Gelasian (Patr. l. lxxiv. 1161), Gregorian (col. 101, ed. Menard) and Ambrosian (Pamelius, Liturgia. Lat. l. 370) liturgies. The reason for this combination of apostles, and for the choice of this particular day does not appear. Schulting (Bibliotheca Ecclesiastica ii. 130) simply states that it is because of the translation of the relics of the two on that day in the Pontificate of Pelagius I. (ob. 560 A.D.). We are not aware that anything can be adduced in support of this statement beyond the remark of Anastasius Bibliothecarius that under Pelagius I., "initata est basilica Apostolorum Philippi et Jacobi" (Vitae Pontificum; Pelagius I. Patrol. cxxxviii. 614), where we see the two names already associated.

It is stated by the Micrologus that this festival was originally one of all the apostles; there seems, however, to be no real evidence for the assertion "idea etiam invenitur in martyrologiis sive in Sacramentariis festivitas Sanctorum Jacobi et Philippi et omnium Apostolorum" (de Eccl. Observ. c. 55; Patrol. cli. 1017). This is followed, however, by sundry liturgical writers, e.g. Honorius Augustodunensis (Gemma Animo iii. 140; Patrol. clxxii. 681), and Durandus (Rat. Div. Off. vii. 10).

Besides the festival of May 1, the Ambrosian liturgy also commemorates on Dec. 30 the "ordinatio B. Jacobi Alphaei Apostoli" (op. cit. 309), resembling the already cited notice of the Martyrologium Hieronymi; and we may again refer to the entry in the Martyrologium Galloense quoted in the preceding article. The Gallican liturgy, published by Mabillon, omits altogether the festival of St. James, whether as son of Alphaeus or as brother of the Lord; but in the Mozarabic missal we find a commemoration of "S. Jacobus, frater Domini" on Dec. 29. We may take this opportunity of adding that the prophetic lection, epistle and gospel there are respectively Wisdom xviii. 20-24; i. Tim. i. 18-ii. 8; Luke viii. 21, 27, John xii. 24-26, xiii. 16, 17, 20, xv. 6, 12, 13 (Patrol. lxxxv. 104). In the Mozarabic Breviary, the form is merely headed "in festo S. Jacobi Apostoli" (Patrol. lxxxvi. 136), but there are numerous references to the martyrdom of James, the Lord's brother, at Jerusalem.

The Byzantine calendar distinguishes the son of Alphaeus from the Lord's brother, the former being commemorated on Oct. 9, the latter on Oct. 23; and so we find in the Greek metrical Ephemerides, published by Papebroch in the Acta Sanctorum (May, vol. i. p. xlviii.)—ἀσφ' ἐνάτη Ἰάκωβος ἐνὶ σταυρῷ τεράσσεται, καὶ ἐσθλὸν ἀδελφῶθεον τριτάτη ἕλλη εἰκάδι παῖζαν. In the Armenian church, besides the commemoration of the two sons of Zebedee on Dec. 28, there are also commemorations on August 31 of "Thomas and James, Apostles," and on Dec. 23 of "James, Apostle" (Neale, Eastern Church; Introd. pp. 801, 804). In the calendars of the Egyptian and Ethiopic churches given in Laloff's Festi Sacri Ecclesiae Alexandrinae, we find that the former commemorates James, the son of Alphaeus, on October 2, and James, the Lord's brother, on October 23, and that they both commemorate this latter on July 12. Besides this, the Coptic calendar has on Feb. 12, and the Ethiopic on Feb. 4, a James, an apostle, not otherwise specified.*

It may be remarked here that many of the customs which still characterize the day on which the Western church commemorates St. James, have obviously sprung from lingering heathen usages. These are, as a rule, connected with the idea of the return of spring, and thus are in some sense parallel to those associated with the festivals of Christmas and St. John the Baptist's day, which dwell on the idea of the returning and retreating sun. [CHRISTMAS; JOHN THE BAPTIST, ST., FIRE OF.]

Thus the gathering of flowers and the adorning of houses with them on May-day morning may fairly be connected with the Roman festival of the Floralia held on the five days following April 28; similar festivals to which were also held in other places, as the Anthesphoria in Sicily, etc.

A trace of the ancient sun-worship is still to be found in one of the customs prevalent on this day among Celtic peoples, and notably the Irish and Highland peasantry, viz. the lighting of great fires in the open air; and thus the common Irish name for the day, is Lu Bealtine (day of Beal's or Baul's fire), and similarly in Gaelic.

* It may be noted that one of the Egyptian calendars, given by Selden (de Synaetris Veterum Egyptiorum pp. 215, 219; ed. Amsterdam, 1670) puts Feb. 11 for Feb. 12, and July 11 for July 12.

3. With the name of the person or persons now before us, more literature is associated than in the case of the son of Zebedee. Besides the Canonical Epistle of St. James, there are still extant the so-called Prolegomena Jacobi, the most respectable of the Apocryphal gospels, and the so-called liturgy of St. James. It is possible too that at one time there existed other pseudonymous writings bearing the name of St. James, for we find Innocent I. in alluding to sundry works of this class, mention those which "sub nomine . . . Jacobi minoris . . . damnaanda" (Ep. 6 ad Exsuperanum c. 7, Patrol. xx. 502).
 Again, in the records of a council held at Rome in 494 A.D., under the episcopate of Gelasius, it is ruled "Evangelium [d. Evangelia] nomine Jacobi minoris, Apocryphum" (Patrol. lix. 162, 175, 176). Apocryphal letters to St. James from St. Peter and St. Clement are prefixed to the various editions of the Clementine Homilies (see e.g. Cotelierus, Patres Apost. i. 602, ed.
 1700). The Apostolic Constitutions again (viii.

JERUSALEM, COUNCILS OF (Hieroso- lymitana Con-ii). (1) A.D. 47, says Cave (Hist.
Lit. i. 38); Baronius and others, A.D. 51: the third, in chronological order, of the meetings of the Apostles recorded in their Acts, but the only one deserving the name of a synod. Its proceedings are described there (c. xv.). A controversy having arisen at Antioch, over which according to Eusebius (Chron. ad l.) Euodius had been appointed bishop as far back as A.D. 43, on the necessity of circumcising the Gentile converts and obliging them to keep the law of Moses, it was referred to the Apostles and elders at Jerusalem for decision, SS. Paul and Barnabas being sent thither for that purpose. The Apostles and elders came together, accordingly, to consider of it. St. Peter spoke first, and gave his opinion against burdening the disciples with any such yoke. Then all the multitude—in other words, the body of believers, or brethren who were present—listened to the reports given of the conversion of the Gentiles that had been achieved on their first expedition as missionaries into Asia Minor by SS. Paul and Barnabas.
 After which St. James, as bishop, doubtless, of Jerusalem, delivered his "sentence," which was embodied in the synodical letter, addressed in the name of the Apostles and elders and brethren, finally, to the brethren of the Gentiles in Antioch, Syria, and Cilicia, and sent by two principal men of their own number, in addition to SS. Paul and Barnabas. On reaching Antioch, the bearers of this epistle gathered the multitude together and delivered it, when its contents having been read caused great joy.

(2) Mansi's reasons for dating this council A.D.
 349 seem conclusive (ii. 171, note). Constans, who ruled in the West, threatened his brother Constantius with hostilities, if St. Athanasius, in whose favour the Sardian council had pronounced two years before, was not restored to his see; and Gregory, his rival, having died in the early part of this year, his return was allowed.
 In his way he stopped at Jerusalem, when a synod was held under its orthodox bishop, Maximus, and a letter despatched from it to congratulate the Alexandrians on this act of grace on the part of the emperors: which Constans, however, did not live to see carried out, as he was slain in Jan. 350. And Maxianus having held this synod without leave from his metropolitan, Aeneius, bishop of Caesarea, was ejected by him in another synod a few months later, to be succeeded by St. Cyril, then catechist, and a supposed Arian.

(3) A.D. 399. A synod of bishops, met to celebrate the feast of the dedication of the church there, acknowledge the receipt of a synodical epistle from Theophilus, bishop of Alexandria, condemning some of the errors of Origen lately revived in his diocese, and profess their agreement with it (Mansi, iii. 989-92).

(4) A.D. 415. What we should call a diocesan synod: of presbyters, that is, under their bishop, John Orosius, the historian, then on a mission from St. Augustine to St. Jerome, was present at it, and gives an account of its proceedings. Pelagius being there, and accused by him of heresy, was invited to come in, and put on his defence. Neither what he said, nor what Orosius said, were considered altogether unexceptionable by the bishop, who proposed that letters should be sent to Pope Innocent of Rome on the subject, and that all should abide by what he decreed (Mansi, iv. 307-12).

(5) A.D. 518, to express its adhesion to the Constantinopolitan synod of the same year (see the art.); its own synodical letter being also preserved in the subsequent council under Mennas.

(6) A.D. 536, Sept. 19: under Peter, its patriarch, on receipt of the acts of the synod of Constantinople under Mennas, between four and five months previously, with the edict of the Emperor Justinian confirming them, and a letter from Mennas to Peter acquainting him with their contents (see the article on this council). The deacon and notary present having recited them, they were received synodically by Peter, and subscribed to by forty-eight bishops, with himself at their head (Mansi, viii. 1164-76).

(7) A.D. 553, under its patriarch, Eustochius, at which the acts of the 5th council were received and confirmed.

(8) A.D. 634, under Sophronius, on his elevation as patriarch, to condemn Monothelism, against which he had contended with so much labour as monk previously. The encyclical epistle sent by him on this occasion to the bishops of Rome and Constantinople is preserved in the 11th action of the 6th council where it was recited (Mansi, x. 649-52). [E. S. F.]

JESUS. [JOSHUA.]

JESUS CHRIST, REPRESENTATIONS OF. I. The symbolic representations of the Lord are discussed severally, as under the titles FISH, IXOTC, LAMB, VINE; see also SYMBOLISM. For the pictorial types of the Lord derived from the Old Testament, see OLD TESTAMENT IN CHRISTIAN ART; for pagan types used to represent Him, see PAGANISM IN CHRISTIAN ART. For representations on gems, see GEMS, §§ xii, and xiii, p. 718; on the bottoms of cups, see GLASS, CHRISTIAN, p. 732. See also IMAGES, p. 813; and NUMISMATICS. Setting aside such representations as these, it is to be observed, in the first instance, that He is represented in the human form from the earliest times of Christian art as the Good Shepherd; and this symbolic picture, though in no case whatever considered as a portrait, must have made the idea of representations of His human form a very familiar one at all times in the Roman and other Western churches—and in earlier centuries, in the Byzantine also. One of the latest, and the most important perhaps, of all these, is the often described Good Shepherd of the chapel of Galla Placidia at Ravenna, middle fifth century; and one of the earliest ideal portraits of our Lord is found in the church of St. Apollinaris, built a century later within the walls of that city. In art these two figures mark the transition from the elder Graeco-Roman ideas and traditions of art to the later style, properly called Byzantine. The leading difference in feeling and principle between them will be illustrated in the course of this article: for the present it may briefly be thus stated: that in the earlier illustration of the Lord's Parable of Himself, the attempt at beauty predominates, and is far from unsuccessful; whereas in the Byzantine picture of St. Apollinaris, though considerable beauty of feature is retained, the tendency to the ascetic or melancholy ideal of later art, both Italian and German, is unmistakably visible.

It is perhaps fortunate that the words of St. Augustine (De Trinitate viii. 4, 5) put it apparently beyond question, that the world cannot possess now, and did not possess in his time, any authentic record whatever of the bodily appearance of Jesus Christ the God-Man on earth. "Nam et ipsius Dominicae facies Carnis innumerabilium cogitationum diversitate variatur et fingitur; quae tamen una erat, quaeque erat." Two centuries before, indeed, St. Irenaeus (contra Haeres. l. 25) had spoken, with indignant absence of comment, of certain Gnostic representations of Christ, both painted and sculptured, as it appears. "Quasdam quidem [imagines] quasi depictas, quasdam autem et de reliqua materia fabricatas habent, dicentes formam Christi factam a Pilato, illo in tempore quo fuit Jesus cum hominibus. Et has coronant, et propouunt eas cum imaginibus mundi philosophorum, videlicet cum imagine Pythagorae, et Platonis, et Aristotelis." These passages seem conclusive to the effect that no real portrait of our Lord existed, or was remembered as existing, in the 2nd century. Indeed as Martigny observes, the controversy (dating from the 2nd century) with regard to the human comeliness of our Lord's body visible on earth, makes it perfectly certain, were proof necessary, that no authentic portrait of Him ever existed. Augustine acknowledges without blame the universal tendency of thought to picture to itself persons and events by imaginative effort, instancing St. Paul in particular, and taking it for certain, as it probably may be, that each of all the innumerable readers of the epistles will form a different idea of his own about the author's appearance, though none can say whose will be nearest the truth.

In his mind then, and indeed in our own, all ideal or fancy portraits of our Lord, so called, are merely symbolic of His humanity; and in this view, the crucifix itself may be taken as a symbol only of the fact of His death and the doctrine of His sacrifice for man; however the word sacrifice be defined or enlarged upon; and this may certainly make its presence in Christian churches not only allowable but desirable. We herd; and this symbolic picture whatever considered as a made the idea of representation a very familiar one at all and other Western churches curies, in the Byzantine also, the most important perhaps then described of Good Shepherd in Placidia at Ravenna, middle one of the earliest ideal persons found in the church of St. century later within the walls of these two figures mark the difference between the earlier and the later style, properly called difference in feeling and em will be illustrated in the le: for the present it may ated: that in the earlier Lord's Parable of Himself, duty predominates, and is far whereas in the Byzantine and, indeed in our own, all traits of our Lord, so called, lie of His humanity; and in itix itself may be taken as a fact of His death and the sacrifice for man; however the denied or enlarged upon; and make its presence in Christian allowable but desirable. We may observe on the different relation of the church to the arts in Augustine's days, when Christian art of a well marked and distinctive character existed, from the state of things in the time of Tertullian, who protests against all simulacra, likenesses, or representations whatever, and, as he well might in the presence of the whole Pantheon, considers all images or likenesses practically the same as idols.*

Human art, however, was adopted by the church along with human thought and learning. We cannot tell whether Tertullian knew or cared for the catacomb-paintings of Rome. Some of them, as those in the more ancient part of St. Domitilla, were certainly in existence before his time; but he seems, in the presence of the heathen, to protest against all paintings whatever, and the fact that St. Augustine not unwillingly accepts them, is an illustration of a highly natural change of Christian feeling on the matter.^b

The more ancient usage of representing the Lord as the Good Shepherd culminates in the Mosaic of Galla Placidia's chapel. A far higher antiquity is claimed for the no-longer existing portrait-head of Christ, which Bosio represents, from a chapel of the Callixtine catacomb.

Head of Christ from the Callixtine catacomb. (Marigny.)

There is a general opinion that it may have been of as early date as the 2nd century; and what we know of it may well induce us to believe that it was the original of that ideal of our Lord's countenance which has passed, through Lionardo da Vinci, into all Christian painting. Lord Lindsay, however, says that the traditional Head with which Europe is so familiar, was unknown in the West till the 4th century, when the original was sent to Constantia, sister of Constantine, by Eusebius of Caesarea. It is therefore of Byzantine or Eastern origin. The earliest example, he continues, is a supposed 4th century mosaic, found originally in the Callixtine, and now in the Vatican. See Eusebius's

* De Idololatría, c. iii. "Idolum aliquando retro non erat," he says, "sola templa et vacuæ aedæ. At ubi artifices statuarum et imaginum, et omnis generis simulacrorum diabolus sculto titulis illud negotium humane calamitatis et nomen de idolis consecutum est."

^b Tertullian begins his book against Hermogenes with reproaching him for his profession as a painter: "Pingerit illicite, nubit asidue: Ioseph Dei in libidinem defendit, in aitem contemnit: bis falsarius et cæterio et stylo (encaustic)," &c. Athenagoras (Legat. pro Christ. c. 26) speaks of images or statues in general as portraits of demons.

letter in Lohbe, Conc. t. vi. col. 483 sq. This letter repudiates (rhetorically but with sincerity) any idea of our Lord's real appearance, and from it and the passage in Hist. Ecc. (viii. 19) it appears that Eusebius had not seen any historic portrait which he (or indeed others) believed on evidence to be a genuine likeness [IMAGES § III.]. Others of the same type are repeated on sarcophagi, dating from that of Junius Bassus, A.D. 359; see Bottari, tav. xv. xxi.-xxv. xliii. xlv.; the latter represents the paintings in the catacomb of St. Pontianus, probably renewed over older pictures in the time of pope Adrian I. (A.D. 772-775). This catacomb also contains a highly ornamented cross, which is evidently intended to represent the person of our Lord [Cross].

The assertion of the idea that our Lord not only took upon Him the flesh of mankind, but the "form of a servant" or slave, all bodily ugliness instead of beauty, is derived from meditation on the prophetic text (Is. liii. 2), "He hath no form nor comeliness;" as the natural thought of His beauty from the Messianic Psalm (xlv. 3), "Thou art fairer than the children of men." The former view seems to have been entertained, or is nowise discouraged by Justin Martyr, who twice uses the word αἰδώς of our Lord; meaning evidently to repeat the expression of Isaiah (Did. cum Tryph. cc. 85 and 88). So Clement of Alexandria (Prod. III. 1) appeals to the two texts to which we have referred on the same side. Compare Stronata, ii. 5, § 22; iii. 17, § 103; vi. 17, § 151. Tertullian may be supposed to have thought likewise (Adv. Jul. c. 14): "Ne aspectu quidem honestus;" (De carne Christi, c. 9) "Adeo nec humane honestatis corpus fuit." He infers from the cruelty of Jews and soldiers at the crucifixion, that such insults could not have been offered to the Lord, had His person possessed any beauty. So Origen (c. Cels. vi. 75, p. 327, Spencer), who, however, held that the Lord could appear in whatever form he pleased (Ib. ii. p. 497). A list is given by Molanus (Hist. Sacrament. Imaginum, p. 403) by which it appears that St. Jerome (in Matt. ix. 9; Epist. 65, ad Princip. c. 8), St. Ambrose, St. Augustine, St. Chrysostom (Hom. 27 [al. 28] in Matt. p. 328; and on Ps. 44 [45] p. 162), and Theodoret, followed the text which speaks of Him as fairest of all men, St. Basil and St. Cyril of Alexandria (little to our surprise) taking the other side. This unifying controversy belongs to art rather than to theology. The Oriental, or Egyptian, or ascetic view of the human body, would necessarily have weight on the ill-favoured side, theologically speaking. And in practical art, the want of skill, and also of models possessing any degree of earthly good looks, must have borne strongly in the same direction. Beauty of expression was so subtle a thing for the hands of the Mosaicists of the 8th and 9th centuries.

There were various reasons why the ideal of bodily beauty should gradually be lost, up to the 12th century. It has often been remarked that as the ascetic life was more and more severely enforced on the faithful, and the sufferings of the later Roman world bore more and more severely on the whole community, the honour of the body of man was lost and forgotten. In the earlier Gothic days, strength and manly beauty must have been associated in the eyes of the Monastic Church only with the ignorance and fierceness of barbarian soldiers. The Christian assembly on earth, under the hands of Alaric and Genseric, Attila and Alboin, was utterly hopeless of any good on earth. The eastern end of a Byzantine or Romanesque church from the 6th century, begins accordingly to be adorned as a mystical representation of heaven, beyond the wilderness of earth, with the portrait figure of Christ as its centre. The Lord, whom all seek so piteously, shall suddenly come to His temple; and the eyes of distressed congregations are allowed a vision in symbol of His presence breaking in on the distresses of later days. One of the earliest examples of churches thus ornamented is that of SS. Cosmas and Damianus at Rome. Here the figure of our Lord coming with clouds and standing on the firmament, is grand and sublime in the highest degree, and is perhaps the earliest or greatest instance of very early date, in which passionate conception, supported by powerful colour, forces itself, without any other advantage, into the foremost ranks of art-creation. The towering and all commanding form of the Lord must have seemed to "fill the whole temple," with the symbolic hand of the First Person of the Trinity above His Head, and the Holy Dove on His right hand. The mystic Jordan, or River of Death, is at His feet, and on its other side, with small rocks and trees to indicate the wilderness of this world, are the twelve sheep of His flock, with the houses of Jerusalem and Bethlehem; He, Himself, appearing again in the centre on earth as the Lamb of the elder dispensation. The same idea is similarly treated in the early 9th century decorations of St. Prassede. The form of the Lord is tall and spare, not without grandeur, but markedly ascetic; the signs of the other Two Persons of the Holy Trinity are with Him, and He is surrounded with all the imagery of the Apocalypse; with this grand addition, that on the spandrels of the Arch of Triumph before Him, the twenty-four elders are inlaid in white and gold mosaic, in the united act of casting their crowns before Him. He appears below as the Lamb; and the same symbol is repeated at the top of the Arch of Triumph, laid on an ornamented altar-table—as the Paschal Lamb that was slain. The Offering of the Crowns by the Elders was also represented on the triumphal arch of S. Paolo fuori le Mura, and the author of an interesting article on Portraits of Christ, (Quarterly Rev. Oct. 1867) says it still exists, having been rescued from the flames in 1823. There were, or still exist, similar figures, in the Vatican Basilica of St. Peter (De Sac. Aedif. xiii. xiv.) in St. Constantia, (ib. xxxii.) St. Andrew in Barbara (V. M. i. lxxvi.) St. Agatha Major in Ravenna (l. xvi.) and St. Michael of Ravenna (ll. xvii.) &c. The greater part of these mosaics will be found photographed in the unique collection of Mr. J. H. Parker, which, in spite of all the deficiencies of the photographs, gives an idea of the tessellated work which does not exist elsewhere. To historians, or students of Christian art, their importance is, that by the presence of the sheep of Christ's church, they connect His Glorified Form with the more ancient catomb representations of the Good Shepherd.

In St. Andrea in Barbara, the Lord stands on the Rock of the Four Rivers, and He is thus represented very frequently on the sarcophagi. See Aringhi, vol. I. p. 280 (Probus and Proba) and pp. 293, 297. On that of Junius Bassus (Aringhi l. 277) and elsewhere, He is sitting above a half-veiled figure representing the firmament or clouds of heaven [FIRMAMENT].

The figure described above from SS. Cosmas and Damianus possesses awe and grandeur, and can dispense with regularity or sweetness of feature. But the very earliest ideal portraits certainly possessed this; and it is one instance of the cheerfulness of spirit which Mr. Lecky notices in the Primitive Church, that the remnants of Græco-Roman skill were devoted to such works as Bosio's picture (above) must have been; or the other mentioned by Boldetti (Osservazioni sopra i Cimieri pp. 21 and 64) as "maestosa figura del Salvatore, come quella dipinta nel cimitero di Ponciano." The question stands on and indicates one of those great human divergences of character and thought, which determine the lives and conduct of whole generations; and it will be remembered how the Mediaeval German or half-featured ideal was set forth against the Lionardesque; not altogether without the countenance of Diirer and Holbein. On this subject, the last chapter but one of vol. iv. of Ruskin's Modern Painters, is worthy of grave attention. There is no doubt, further, that Protestant asceticism often resembles that of earlier days, in a certain suspicion of beauty as carnal and idolatrous.

The Gnostic images of our Lord (see St. Ireneus supra) are also worthy of attention. One was set up by Marcellina (Aug. de Innoc. vii.), a follower of Carpocrates, and adored along with others of St. Paul, Homer, and Pythagoras; and the eclectic Lararium of Alexander Severus, containing the statues of Christ, of Abraham, Orpheus, and Apollonius of Tyana, is mentioned by Lampridius (In Alex. Severum xxix.). Raoul Rochette (Discours sur les types imit. p. 21), is referred to by Martigny for a "pierre basilidienne," which he thinks may give an idea of the type of portraiture which was in vogue among that class of sectaries. It is altogether different, in any case, from that of the Callixtine and other catacombs; and for further contrast with it, he gives a wooden (reproduced above) of that which he considers, on De Rossi's authority, indisputably the most ancient of all representations of our Lord. It is taken from a portrait

It is altogether different, that of the Callixtine and other for further contrast with it, he t (reproduced above) of that ters, on De Rossi's authority, most ancient of all representa. d. It is taken from a portrait on Ivory, in the Christian Museum of the Vatican.

The classic type which insists on personal beauty, is by far the most common on the sarcophagi, and all early monuments. Christian artists in fact seem, as was natural, to have invested their ideal with comeliness as long as they had skill to do so. The dress (of course excepting the Good-Shepherd representations), is invariably the tunic and pallium, sometimes ornamented with the stripes or clavi (Ciampini Vet. Mon. li. p. 60, i. 184, xlvi.). The idea of white raiment generally seems to be intended, though gold, dark imperial blue, and other colours are used in the mosaics. The white and glistening raiment of the Transfiguration will account for this (Ciampini Vet. Mon. li. tab. xvi. i. tab. lxxvii.). Our Lord is generally shod with sandals, if at all. The colubarnus is given apparently in Aringhi, vol. i. lib. ii. c. x. pp. 332, 333, and something resembling it is worn by the Good Shepherd (Aringhi, vol. ii. pp. 63, 67, 75, 79, &c.)

Portraits of our Lord are generally youthful, as symbolizing His eternal nature, even (Aringhi, vol. ii. p. 213) when He instructs the apostles (Bottari, exl.). In the dispute with the doctors His youth is of course insisted on, but He is not made small of stature, whereas in pictures of the miracles, as has been frequently remarked, His figure greatly exceeds His human companions in height. This is the case also (Aringhi, i. pp. 307, 313 and passim), where any dead persons are carved on their tomb as presented before him, as in many 'bisomatous' sarcophagi of husband and wife. A beautiful illustration of this tradition of early Christian work in later times will be found in Ruskin's Stones of Venice, vol. iii. p. 78, where this distinction is used by the artist, with the detail of the human figures partly hiding themselves in the folds of the robes of attendant angels, who are inferior in size to the divine figure, though of superhuman stature. The Lord sometimes stands or sits on a sphere (Ciampini, Vet. Mon. i. 270, tab. vii.), probably to give the flux of all things being put under his feet. He is accompanied by attesting angels, or His form is represented, full length or half-size, on a metathalon supported by angels, as in the diptych of Rambona, and very frequently in the mosaics of Rome and Ravenna. These medallions are sometimes called IMAGINES CLIPATAE, the use of them being probably derived from portrait-images on shields of ancient times. The cross sometimes represents our Lord thus borne. This seems to point to the Ascension, and to his glory as Lord of Hosts or of Sabaoth. It is not our work to follow the idea into its various developments in the angelic choirs of the middle ages, for which we may refer to Lord Lindsay, and to Mrs. Jameson's Sacred and Legendary Art. But a curious example of transition from the circular or oval medallion into the Gothic quatrefoil, containing the figure of our Lord, and supported by angels, still remains in the Collegiate Hall or Refectory at Worcester, and is certainly derived from classic or Byzantine antiquity.

Our Lord frequently bears a rod and wand, especially in representations of the miracles, apparently as an emblem of his power over nature, or as the leader of His people in the wilderness, with a reference to Moses. The roll or volume very often appears in His hand, as committed to St. Peter and St. Paul or other apostles, or when He instructs the disciples. The full-grown rather than the youthful type appears in such examples, as in Bottari, clxxvi. See woodcut reproduced below.

Frequent representations of the Second Person of the Trinity as present at some transaction narrated in the Old Testament, or as the anti-type of some typical event or person. Martigny mentions a glass vessel in Garrucci (Vetri, xiii. 13), in which He is with Daniel, who is giving the cakes to the dragon. A more certain and satisfactory example is in His appearance with the three holy children in the furnace, Bottari, xxii. xli. See also Gori (Thes. Apych. t. iii. tab. 8) where He stretches the cross out over the flames. The representation of the holy Three appearing to Abraham (Gen. xviii. 2), in S. Vitale at Ravenna is well-known, and Ciampini's plate is now supplemented or super-

II. Besides the representations of the Lord which strictly belong to art, there are others which have an archaeological rather than an artistic interest. We have ancient accounts (1) of portraits of the Lord produced in the ordinary manner; and (2) of portraits of the Lord produced miraculously. Some of both kinds are even believed still to exist.

(1) Ordinary Representations. — Eusebius (Hist. Eccl. vii. 18) tells us that at Caesarea Philippi [Panens] there existed a group in bronze representing a woman kneeling before a dignified man, who stretched out his hand benignantly towards her. This group Eusebius says that he had himself seen. He adds, that it was long unknown whom this statue represented; but as it was observed that a plunt of healing virtues grew at its foot, care was taken at last to cleanse it, so as to make the inscription legible; then it was discovered that the woman cured of the issue of blood, who lived at Paneas, had erected the statue in honour of the Saviour. On this discovery it was at once removed into the Diaconicum or Sanctuary of the church. That such a statue existed seems past all doubt; as to its original intention, the opinion of most modern archaeologists is, that it had been erected in honour of Hadrian, or some other who had benefited the province, which was represented as a kneeling woman at the feet of her benefactor. Similar representations are frequently found on coins, especially of the time of Hadrian. Supposing some such expression as "σωτήρι," or "σωτήρι τοῦ κόσμου"—titles at that time very frequently given to emperors—to have been found on the inscription, while the name had become illegible, the statue would naturally be referred by the Christians of the fourth century to the true "Saviour of the World" (Hefele, Beiträge, ii. 257). The emperor Julian, angry at the respect paid to this statue, caused it to be thrown down and his own substituted. This is related by Sozomen (H. E. v. 21), who adds, that the statue of Julian was soon afterwards struck by lightning and partly destroyed, while some fragments of the statue of Christ, which the heathens had dragged about the street, were collected by the Christians and restored to the church. Philostorgius (Hist. Eccl. vii. 3) gives nearly the same account, except that he says nothing of any edict of Julian, but attributes the whole transaction to the pagan inhabitants of Paneas, and that he gives the more exact detail, that the head of the statue was preserved. This however was again lost at a later period. Asterius of Amasea (Conc. Nic. II. Labbe, vii. 210) gives again a different account, attributing the destruction of the statue to Maximia, who (he says) was nevertheless unable to destroy the fame of the miracle related in the Gospel.

Eusebius also says (H. E. vii. 18) that he had discovered that, besides this statue, there existed coloured pictures of Christ (εἰκόνας διὰ χρωμάτων ἐν γραφαῖς), as well as of the apostles Paul and Peter.

In the time of the Iconoclastic controversy, pope Gregory II. asserted in his letter to the emperor Leo III., about A.D. 727, that portraits of Christ, of St. James the Lord's brother, of St. Stephen, and of other martyrs, had been made in their life-time (Labbe, vii. 12). And it was probably about this time that the legend arose that St. Luke had painted portraits of Christ, of His Mother, and of SS. Peter and Paul. This story is found in Simeon Metaphrastes, in the Menologium of the emperor Basil, and in the history of Nicephorus Callisti (ii. 43). At a yet earlier date (about A.D. 518) Theodorus Lector (fragment in Valesius, p. 551, ed. Meutz) spoke of a portrait of St. Mary painted by St. Luke, which was sent by Eudocia to Pulcheria, but said nothing of any picture of Christ. Such portraits of the Virgin are said even still to be in existence; one is shown, for instance, in the church of S. Maria Maggiore at Rome.

Nicodemus is sometimes described as a wood-carver, and an image of Christ of cedar-wood from his hand is said by Ariangh (Roma Subterr. lib. iv. c. 47) to have existed at Lucca. Some have ventured to identify this with a wonder-working image at Berytus, mentioned in the pseudo-Athanasian document read before the second council of Nicea, A.D. 786 (Labbe vii. 217). Leo Diaconus, in the tenth century, says that his contemporary, the Byzantine emperor Nicephorus, placed this statue in the church of the Saviour at Constantinople; but neither he nor the pseudo-Athanasius says anything of its having been the work of Nicodemus. The legend attached to the image of Lucca is of course destitute of every shadow of probability.

Among the likenesses of the Lord reported once to have existed, we must reckon one said to have been the work of the Virgin herself, described in Adamian's account of Arculf's visit to the holy places in the seventh century (De Locis Sanctis, i. 10; in Mabillon's Act. SS. Bon. saec. iii. pt. 2, p. 460). Among the wonders of Jerusalem he mentions a napkin, partly red and partly green, said to have been woven by the Virgin Mary herself, containing pictures of the twelve apostles and of the Lord himself.

(2) Images not made with hands.—Another class of portraits of Christ are the εἰκόνας ἀχειροποίητος, images of miraculous origin, of which the most famous are (a) the Abgarus portrait, (b) the Veronica.

(a) The story of a correspondence between the Lord and Abgarus of Edessa is found as early as the time of Eusebius (H. E. i. 13). Evagrius, in the sixth century (H. E. iv. 27) speaks also of a divinely-fashioned likeness (εἰκὼν θεοεικτος) which Christ sent to Abgarus on his desiring to see him, and which saved Edessa when it was besieged by Chosroes in the year 540.

This story is alluded to by Gregory II. in his letter to Leo before referred to, when the famous picture had already become an object of pilgrimage. "Send"—he adjures the iconoclastic emperor—"to that image not made with hands, and see; to it flock all the peoples of the East, and pray; and many such there are made with hands." His contemporary, John of Damascus (De Fide Orthod. iv. 16) gives more detail. A story was current, he says, that Abgarus, king of Edessa, sent a painter to take a portrait of the Lord; and that when he was unable to perform his task in consequence of the brightness of His countenance, the Lord himself put his outer garment (ἱμάτιον) to His own face and impressed upon it a perfect likeness (ἀπεικόνισμα) of His countenance, which He sent to Abgarus. Leo Diaconus (Hist. iv. 10, in Niebuhr's Scriptt. Byzant. xi. 70) adds to this a wonderful story of a tile having received the impression from this robe. The tile is also alluded to by Zonaras (Annal. xvi. 25). The image on the cloth was brought to Constantinople in the reign of Constantine Porphyrogenetes, A.D. 944; its translation is celebrated by the Byzantine church on August 16, which is a great festival. became of the picture when that city was taken by the Turks is not recorded, but pictures claiming to be this miraculous portrait are found in Italy. The Genoese lay claim to the possession of it, and say that it was brought to their city by Leonardo de Montalto, who presented it to the Armenian church of St. Bartholomew, where it is still exhibited once a year. St. Sylvester's at Rome also claims to possess the original Abarus-picture. This is (according to Helele) of the Byzantine type, and represents the countenance of the Lord in the bloom of youthful power and beauty, with high and open forehead, clear eyes, long and straight nose, parted hair, and a thick, auburn, bifurcated beard. Dr.
Glückselig contends that the Edessa portrait furnished the type for the pictures of Christ in mosaics from the fourth century onward; before that time (he believes) no attempt at portraiture of the Lord was made, the early representations in the catacombs being mere symbols or adaptations of pagan types.

(b) The opposite of the calm and beautiful face represented in the Abarus-portrait is the "Veronica" picture of the suffering Saviour crowned with thorns. The legend attached to this picture is, that as the Lord was bending under the cross on his way to Golgotha, a pious woman, Veronica, offered Him her veil, or a napkin, to dry the sweat on His face; an image of the face remained miraculously impressed on the cloth. In the Martyrology of Usuard, for instance, (ed. Greven.) we have under March 25, "Veronica sancte matronee cui Dominus imaginem faciei suae sudario impressam reliquit." Gervase of Tilbury (Otia Imperiale, c. 25, in Leibnitz's Scriptt. Brun. i. 968), who wrote in the thirteenth century, speaking of the "figura Domini quae Veronica dicitur," informs us that some say that it was brought to Rome by an unknown person, Veronica; but the account given by the most ancient writers is (he proceeds) that the woman who brought it was Martha, the sister of Lazarus. From the tradition of the elders we learn that she had a likeness of Vetusianus, a friend of Tiberius Caesar, who was sent by the emperor to Jerusalem to report on the deeds and miracles of Christ, caused to be taken away from her, that by means of it Tiberius might be healed of his disease. Martha, however, it is said, followed the "countenance of her guest," came to Rome, and at the very first sight healed Tiberius. Whence it came to pass (continues the veracious chronicler) that Chris-tinity was known in Rome before the arrival of the apostles, and that Tiberius, instead of the milkest of sheep, became the fiercest of wolves, raging against the Senate because they refused to recognise Christ according to his wish—certainly a remarkable way of accounting for the aberrations of Tiberius's later years.

The Veronica-portrait is said to have been brought to Rome as early as the year 700; in the year 1011 an altar was dedicated in its honour, and even to this day it is one of the relics exhibited in St. Peter's, though only on extraordinary occasions. It was exhibited on the 8th December, 1854, when Rome was crowded with bishops assembled to be present at the promulgation of the dogma of the Immaculate Conception. On that occasion it was seen by M.

Barbier de Montault, who describes it as follows (Quarterly Rev. No. 246, p. 491):—

"The Holy Face is enclosed in a frame of silver, partially gilt, and square, of a severe character, and little adorned. The simplicity of the bordering gives prominence to the interior of the picture, which is protected by a thin plate of crystal. Unfortunately, by one of those customs so common in Italy, a sheet of metal covers the field, and only leaves apparent the figure indicating its outline. By this outline one is led to conjecture flowing hair reaching to the shoulders, and a short beard, bifurcated and small. The other features are so vaguely indicated, or so completely effaced, that it requires the liveliest imagination in the world to perceive traces of eyes or nose. In short, one does not see the material of the substance because of the useless intervention of a metal plate, and the place of the impression exhibits only a blackish surface, not giving any evidence of human features."

For many years the explanation of the name Veronica given by Mabillon and Papebroch was generally adopted; that "Veronica" is simply an anagram of "vera icon," a true image. Metrical writers do in fact use the word Veronica rather to designate the picture itself than as the name of a woman. Thus Gervase of Tilbury, as we have seen, speaks of "figura Domini quae veronica dicitur;" and he afterwards uses the expression, "Est ergo veronica pictura Domini vera." But more recently W. Grimm has maintained a different view. He notices the fact, that the woman with the issue of blood who
(c. 7), probably of the fifth century, and by John Malalas, a Byzantine historian of the sixth century, named Beroice (Bepovικη); and supposes that the legend of the veil or napkin in question arose from some confusion of the Paganus statue with the Abarus-portrait; the Veronica-legend is, he believes, no more than a Latin rival-story or metamorphosis of the Greek Abarus-legend, with the Veronica introduced from another source. M. Maury (Croniques et Legendes) connects the name Bepovικη with the Gnostic feminine symbol η Πρόνοικος, but this conjecture seems rather ingenious than sound.

(3) In the eighth century the iconoclastic party, seeing the great variety of pictures of Christ, very naturally asked which they were to consider the true portrait; were they to adopt the Roman type, or the Indian, or the Greek, or the Egyptian? To this Photius (Epist. 64) replies, that the difference between these representations is much the same as the difference between the gospels circulating in the several countries, which are written in one character by the Romans, in another by the Indians, in another by the Hebrews, in another by the Ethiopians, and which differ, not only in the forms of letters, but in the pronunciation and significance of the words. If Photius's illustration is to be taken exactly, it seems to imply that all the pictures of which he knew anything represented the same face, and were only made to differ by the peculiarities, whether individual or national, of the painter; and it is probable enough that the Byzantine type was so far determined in his time, that all the pictures which he had seen might have passed for copies, of various degrees of merit, of one original.

(4) The descriptions of the Lord given by John of Damascus in the eighth century, and by the supposed Publius Lentulus at a later period, no doubt had considerable influence on the representations of Christ. The former (Epist. ad Theoph. c. 3), referring to the testimony of still earlier writers, describes the Lord as having been somewhat bent even in youth, with meeting eyebrows, beautiful eyes, large nose, curling hair, dark beard and tint the colour of wheat, like His mother. The latter is supposed to be written to the Senate of Rome by one Publius Lentulus, a friend of Pontius Pilate. The age of this document is unknown (see Gabler, de aëthvriâ Epistolæ Pub. Lentuli ad Senatum; Jena, 1819), but it does not seem to be quoted in its present form by any earlier writer than Anselm of Canterbury († 1109). Another description of the Lord's person is given by Nicephorus Callisti (H. E. l. 30), but this, as it is of the fourteenth century and does not claim to rest on earlier authorities, may be passed over.

JEWS AS REPRESENTED ON CHRISTIAN MONUMENTS. The Jews of our Lord's time appear in various sculptures of His life and works (Bottari, tav. lxxxv. et passim; Millin, Midi de la France, pl. lxxiv. et passim). They are generally distinguished, especially in all subjects connected with the Wilderness, by wearing a flat cap or beretta, as in the above plates from sarcophagi. The Old Testament mosaics of Sta. Maria Maggiore are without the limits of our work, and Roman dress and armour prevail in them. The supposed arrest of St. Peter contains some of these figures, but though Aringhi, Bottari, and Buonarroti are against him, Martigny is still inclined to think the group in question intended to represent Moses attacked by the rebellious people in the Wilderness, when (Exodus xxiv. &c.) they were ready to stone him. This subject constantly accompanies that of the Rock in Horeb, where their complaints were silenced by miracle. Moses or St. Peter (whichever figure may be intended), always has his head uncovered in it, and the other Hebrews wear the flat head covering, short tunics, cloaks or sags fastened with fibule, and sandals (Exod. xii. 11). The cap may have been a common or distinctive part of Jewish dress.

JEWS, TREATMENT OF. The fortunes of the Jews after the rise of Christianity are matters of general history. An account of their relation towards the expanding power of the church will be found in Milman's Hist. of Jews (iii. 167-203). This article only gives a brief summary of the ecclesiastical enactments against coannivance with Jewish practices, or against the Jews themselves. To desert Christianity for Judaism was APOSTASY; to confound together the rites or doctrines of the two religions was HERESY; see Cad. Theod. XVI. v. 43, 44; ibid. XVI. viii. de Judeis Cœli orbis et Samaritanis. But in addition to these grave offences, Christians were ordered to hold themselves separate from various Jewish customs. Thus resting on the Sabbath (Saturday) was denounced (Conc. Laod. c. 29) on the ground of its being a relic of Judaism; it was also forbidden (ibid. cc. 37, 38) to receive festival presents, or unleavened bread, from the Jews, or to share in their feasts. A similar injunction against participating in Jewish festivals or fasts appears in the Apostolic Canons (cc. 69, 70) under pain of excommunication, and also in the Trullan council (c. 11). The council of Eliberis, A.D. 305, initiating the violent hostility against the Jews which prevailed in Spain up to and through the time of the Inquisition, forbade (c. 49) any landlord to call upon a Jew to bless his crops; and in the next canon prohibited a Christian from eating with a Jew. This prohibition against sharing food with a Jew, because he regarded certain meats as unclean, is enacted in many subsequent Gallic councils (Conc. Vinct. c. 12; Conc. Agath. c. 40; Conc. Epaon. c. 15; 3 Conc. Aurel. c. 13; 1 Conc. Matiscon. c. 15). Inter-marriages with Jews was guarded against as strictly as with heathen (1 Conc. Arvern. c. 6; 3 Conc. Aurel. c. 13; 3 Conc. Tolet. c. 14; 4 Conc. Tolet. c. 63). The dangers which were supposed to lurk in association with the Jews are exemplified at length in Chrysostom's 6 Homilies in Judeos, also in Hom. 23 ad eos qui primo Pasch. jejuniunt, and Hom. 24 ad eos qui Judaorum jejuniunt (tom. 6 Ed. Savil.). One of the matters regarded with special jealousy by the church was the right of the Jews to hold Christian slaves. By a law of Constantine (Enseb. Vit. Const. iv. 27), the right had been considerably restricted; but the law appears to have fallen into disuse. The 3rd council of

kept, in connection with the Baptist's own words (John iii. 30). "He must increase, but I must decrease," so that from our Lord's activity the days began to lengthen, and from St. John's to shorten. This idea is found dwelt upon in Augustine (Serm. 287, § 4, vol. v. 1692). See also a sermon formerly attributed to Augustine [Serm. 197 in Appud. § 2, ib. 2856], but now referred to Cæsarius of Arles) and Maximus Taurinensis (Serm. 4 in Ap. end., Pat. l. ix. 859); and the presence of numerous homilies for the festival of the Baptist among the writings of this father show at how early a date it was commemorated. A remark of his may further be added, that it was kept "maiorum traditione" (Serm. 292, § 1, vol. v. 1747). Consequently with all allowances for a rhetorical way of speaking, this will carry back the festival at any rate as far as the middle of the fourth century. We find it also mentioned in the ancient Kalendarium Carthagenense, where the notice is "viii. Kalend. Jul. Sancti Joannis Baptistæ" (Patrol. xiii. 1221)^c. It is wanting, however, in the calendar of Bucherius, which is generally referred to the middle of the fourth century, and in the list of festivals in the Apostolic Constitutions (viii. 33). These, however, are mere passing exceptions, for its otherwise universal presence in ancient liturgies, martyrologies, and calendars, and the numerous homilies for it in the writings of the fathers (Augustine, Maximus Taurinensis, etc.) are evidence of the wide-spread observance and early date of the festival. The council of Agde (506 A.D.) in ruling concerning private chapels, includes the Nativity of St. John the Baptist among the most important festivals on which a man was not to forsake his proper church, the only others specified being Easter, Christmas, Epiphany, the Ascension, and Whitsunday (Conc. Ayalense, can. 21; Labbe, iv. 1386).

It may next be remarked that, as might have been expected from the interdependence of the dates of the nativities of our Lord and of the Baptist, the East agrees almost unanimously with the West as to the particular day on which the latter is to be commemorated. See e.g. besides the regular Byzantine calendar, the notice in the Greek metrical Ephemerides, published by Papebroch in the Acta Sanctorum (May, vol. i. p. xxxii.), Πρόδρομος ἀμφὶ τετάρτῃ εἰκάδι γελυατο μύστηρ; the curious design in the Moscow pictorial calendar (ibid.); and the calendars of the Egyptian and Ethiopic churches published by Ludolf (Fæsti Sacri Ecclesie Alexandrinæ, p. 32). So far as we have observed, the Armenian church, the only church that does not celebrate Christmas on December 25, is also the only one that does not commemorate the Nativity of the Baptist on June 24, keeping it on Jan. 14 (Neale, Eastern Church, Introd. p. 797).^d

We may add a few words here as to the vigil and octave of the festival. The former is recognized, as we have shown below, in the Leonine Sacramentary, though not specified by name as in the Ambrosian. We need not, however, with Papebroch, consider St. Ambrose to have been the first to institute the vigil. It is also found included in the later Roman Sacramentaries, the Gelasian and Gregorian, and its observance throughout Gaul and Germany is shown by its presence in ancient martyrologies and calendars of those countries, e.g. [in one form of] the Mart. Gallonense (D'Achèry, Spicilegium, xiii. 424), the Mart. Autissidorensis (Martene, Collectio Amplias, vol. vi. 709), and a calendar of the 9th century described by Binterim. This writer refers also to a German Sacramentary published by Gerbert, where the notice for the day is, "jejunium S. Joannis Baptistæ, una cum Missa pro more vigiliarum" (Denke, v. i. 377). It may be mentioned that the council of Seligenstadt (1022 A.D.) ordered that all Christians should abstain from flesh and blood for fourteen days before the festival of St. John the Baptist (can. 1, Labbe ix. 844).

As regards the octave, it would appear that Papebroch is in error in considering that no earlier traces of it could be found than of the 13th or 14th centuries, for Binterim cites several calendars of the 9th and 10th centuries which mark it, e.g. the Cal. Frisingense of the 10th century (Eckhart, Franc. Orient. i. 835). It will be remembered that this octave has a special importance of its own, as being the day on which the Baptist was circumcised and received the divinely declared name of John, and on which the speech of Zacharias was miraculously restored.

(B.) Decollation of the Baptist.—Besides the festival of the Nativity of St. John, there are other Johannine festivals of comparatively minor importance, the chief of which is that of the Decollation, generally commemorated on August 29, the chief exception being that the Armenian church celebrated it on April 13, and the Gallican church, according to one view, on the octave of the Nativity of the Baptist, and according to another view on September 24.^f

This festival, too, must be of comparatively early date, for we find it in the Gelasian and [in some forms of] the Gregorian Sacramentaries, to its presence in which Bede alludes (Expos. in Marc. lib. ii.; Patrol. xcii. 192). Again in the Eastern church, we may appeal to the Byzantine and Russian calendars, and reference may be made to the Moscow pictorial calendar and the Greek metrical Ephemerides, the notice in the latter being, εἰκάδι ἀμφ' ἑσπέρῃ Πρόδρομου τήμεν αὐχένα ξίφος. See also Ludolf's Egyptian and Ethiopic calendars (p. 1); here, however, there is a simple commemoration of the Baptist on August 29, and the festival of the Decollation on August 30.

With reference to the usage of the Gallican church alluded to above, the fact that in their liturgy the festival of the Decollation almost in^c The other mention in this calendar of St. John the Baptist [v. Kal. Jan. Sancti Joannis Baptistæ et Jacobi Apostoli quem Herodes occidit] is probably due to a copyist's error, because of the constant association of St. John the Evangelist with Dec. 27. It has been maintained, however, that this is an early African form of the festival of the Decollation of St. John the Baptist.

^d For a possible variation from general usage in the case of the church of Tours, see Gregor Turon. Hist. Franc. x. 31 (Patrol. lxxxi. 566).

^e The Martyrologium Hieronymi (Patrol. xxx. 488), and a MS. of the Martyrology of Bede (Patrol. xciv. 1025), place it on Aug. 30. So also the Egyptian calendar in Selden (p. 221, ed. Amsterdam, 1678).

^f Augusti (Denke, ii. 186) argues that the Decollation was not originally a distinct festival from that of the Nativity of the Baptist, but the evidence for this view, it must be said, is hardly conclusive.

below, in the Leonine Sacramentary, is specified by name as in the Decollation, but, however, with Papebroch, Ambrose to have been the first to include it. It is also found in the Gelasian Sacramentaries, the Gelasian and its observance throughout is shown by its presence in the legends and calendars of those of the form of the Mart. Gallonensis (xiii, 424), the Mart. Martense, Collectio Amplias, a calendar of the 9th century, Binterim. This writer refers to a Sacramentary published by notices for the day is, "Jejunium de die, una cum Missa pro Deo, v. l. 377). It may be the council of Seligenstadt and that all Christians should fast and blood for fourteen days of St. John the Baptist (can.

It will be that this octavo has a special as, being the day on which was crucified and received the name of John, and on which the same was miraculously re-must be of comparatively importance of it in the Gelasian and in the Gregorian Sacramentaries, in which Bede alludes (Expos. in M. xcii, 192). Again in the Byzantine calendars, and reference may be made to the pictorial calendar and the Menologia, the notice in the Menologia of Bede (Menologia also Ludolf's Egyptian and Arabic, p. 1) here, however, there is no mention of the Baptist on the festival of the Decollation mediately followed the Nativity of the Baptist, induced Papebroch (Acta Sanctorum, June, vol. v. p. 608) to maintain that the former commemoration was probably held there on the octave of the latter. Mabillon, on the other hand, appeals to a letter which bears the name of Augustine, to one Bibianus, a Gallican bishop, which asserts that the conception and death of St. John fell on the same day (i.e. Sept. 23 or 24), and further refers to August 29 as the day "quando inventum legitur caput domini præcursoris" (Patrol. lxxii, 431). This letter, while obviously spurious, may be taken as evidence as to ancient Gallican custom, and we find the same usage, at any rate partially, among the Gothic of Spain. (See Leslie's notes to the Mozarabic Missal; Patrol. lxxv, 837.)

Legend.—This will perhaps be the most convenient place to give a very brief résumé of the legends respecting the body of St. John. This was said to have been buried at Sebaste, a town on the site of the earlier Samaria. In the time of the emperor Julian, the coffin was broken open, the bones burnt, and the dust scattered abroad. With this definite statement, it might have been thought that the history of the relics was at an end; but the story runs that the Christians saved some of the remains, which were sent to Jerusalem, and afterwards to Alexandria to Athanasius (Rufinus, Hist. Eccles. xi, 28; Theodoret, Hist. Eccles. iii, 3; vol. iii, 918, ed. Schulze and Nessellet; Theophanes, Chronographia, vol. i, 117, ed. Classen); part also were obtained by Theodoret for his own church of Cyrus (see his Kelig. Hist. vol. iii, 1245). In order to contain the relics of the Baptist, a church was some time afterwards (circa 330 A.D.) built in Alexandria on the site of the temple of Serapis by the emperor Theodosius, and finished in the reign of his son Arcadius. Concerning the Head of the Baptist also there is a long series of traditions. These are often plainly conflicting, and it is to be regretted that a scholar with Papebroch's great learning should have wasted time on the attempt to reconcile them. The Head was said to have been buried in Herod's palace, where it was first discovered about the year 330 A.D. and taken into Oclia. In the time of the emperor Valens it was moved as far as a place named Coslans, but about 390 A.D. Theodosius transferred it to Constantinople (Sozomen, Hist. Eccles. vii, 21). Besides all this, however, we read of a finding of the Head at Emesa in 454 A.D., a discovery which can hardly harmonize with the preceding, and which was not improbably due to a growing demand of the age for relics. However, there is a further story of another translation of the Head, from Emesa to Constantinople in 850 A.D., to preserve it from the Saracens, and here it remained till 1204 A.D., when Constantinople was taken by the Latins. The Head then, or part of it, was brought to France by one Walo de Sartone, a canon of Aviens. The further legends given by Papebroch, compared with which the above almost rises to the dignity of history, we pass over.

We find at a comparatively early period evidence of the existence of literature on the subject of the Finding of the Head, for at a council held at Rome in 494 A. D. under the episcopate of Gelasius, such writings as were with others ordered to be read with caution. ("Scripta de Inventione capitis Joannis Baptistæ novellas quædam relationes sunt, et nonnulli eas Catholici legunt. Sed cum hæc ad Catholicorum manus pervenerint, beati Pauli apostoli præcedunt sententia, Omnia probate, quod bonum est tenete." Patrol. lxx, 161.)

(γ.) We are now naturally brought to the third of the Johannine festivals, the Finding of the Head. It would appear that different supposed findings are commemorated, and that commemorations are held on the various days on which the Pseudo-Augustine already quoted names August 29 as the day on which the Head was found, and in connection with this we may cite one form of the martyrology of Bede, "Passio et decollatio vel potius inventio capitis beati Joannis Baptistæ . . ." (Patrol. xciv, 1025). That day, however, has ordinarily been reserved for the Decollation, and Feb. 24, for the Finding. In that arrangement, generally speaking, Western, Byzantine, Coptic, and Ethiopic calendars agree; and the Byzantine also commemorates another finding on May 25. There is besides a commemoration of the "Apparition corporis" ["Inventio ossium" Copt.] in the Ethiopic and Coptic calendars on May 27, and of the "depositio capitis" on Oct. 27 (26, Selden) in the latter. The notice for Feb. 24 in the Greek metrical Ephemerides is εὐκρίστην προφήτου φάνην κείνη ἀμφὶ τετάρτην.

(δ.) The festival of the Conception of the Baptist on Sept. 23 (or 24) is also found in the above calendars, and in many Western martyrologies. It is not recognized, however, in the Armenian calendar. The notice for Sept. 23, in the Greek metrical Ephemerides, is εὐκρίστην ἡμερῶν ἡμερῶν ἡμερῶν εἰς.

(ε.) Besides the two preceding, comparatively unimportant festivals, we find also a commemoration of the imprisonment on Aug. 24 in the Ethiopic calendar (Ludolf, p. 39), and general commemorations of the Baptist in the same, on Aug. 29 and April 10 (ib. pp. 1, 25); and on June 6 and September 5 in the Armenian calendar (Nesle, pp. 799, 801).

2. Liturgical Notices.—The oldest Roman Sacramentary, the Leonine, contains no less than five masses for the festival of the Nativity of the Baptist. The first of these evidently belongs to the vigil, for though included with the second and third under the general heading Natalis S. Jo. Bapt., still the point is settled by the words of the preface (also occurring, be it said, in the Gregorian and Ambrosian liturgies in the service for the vigil) ". . . exhibentes solemnem jejuniium, quo anti Joannis Baptistæ natalitia prevevimus" (Leonis Opera; vol. ii, 28, ed. Bullerini). The fourth and fifth masses, portions of which are also found in the Gelasian Sacramentary, are headed ad fontem, showing the use made of the day as a solemn season for baptism. The Gelasian Sacramentary both has services for the vigil and Nativity, each with its own title (Patrol. lxxix, 1165), and also for the Decollation (dis passionis) of the Baptist (ib. 1175); and the same too is the case with the Ambrosian (Pamelius, Liturg. Litt. i. 392, 420), and the Gregorian Sacramentary (coll. 108, 126; ed. Menard). In this last, while the first mass is headed in vigilia, the second bears the title In prima missa de nocte.

In the ancient Gallican Lectionary, published by Mabillon, we find no mention of a vigil: the prophetic lection, epistle and gospel, are respectively Isaiah xl. 1-20; Acts xiii. 16-47; Luke i. 5-25, 39-47, 56-68, [to the words Dominus Deus Israel], 80. This is immediately followed by the festival of St. Peter and St. Paul, and this by the "Passio S. Joannis Baptistae" for which the prophetic lection, epistle and gospel are respectively Isaiah xliii. 1-13, 22, —xliv. 5; Heb. xi. 33—xl. 7; Matt. xiv. 1-14 (de Liturgia Gallicana, lib. ii. pp. 158, 160). The same too is the case in the Gallican missal, save that there the festival of St. Peter and St. Paul is immediately followed by a mass "In Natale unius Apostoli et Martyris" (Op. cit. lib. iii. 271, 275). In the Mozarabic missal we find forms given for the Sunday "pro adventu S. Joannis," as well as for the festival of the Nativity itself, and for that of the Decollation. The prophetic lection, epistle and gospel in the three cases are Isaiah xl. 1-9, Eph. iv. 1-14, Mark i. 1-8; Jer. i. 5-10, 17-19; Gal. i. 11-24, Luke i. 57-70, 80; Wisdom iv. 7-15, 2 Cor. xii. 2-10, Matt. xiv. 1-15. Sundry variations to the above occurring in ancient lectionaries are mentioned (in loc.) in the notes to Leslie's edition of the Mozarabic missal. (Patrol. lxxxv. 751, 756, 837; and for the Breviary [June 24, Sept. 24], Patrol. lxxxvi. 1129, 1133, 1209).

3. Miscellaneous Notices.—We have hitherto spoken of the Baptist solely from the Christian point of view, we shall now dwell briefly on some further references. Josephus's account (Antiq. xviii. 5. 2) is practically the same as that of the New Testament, but he adds that, besides other causes, Herod Antipas was more or less moved to the murder of St. John by political reasons, the dread of a revolution.*

There are, moreover, some curious associations connecting St. John with some semi-Christian, or rather non-Christian, religions. The Clementine Homilies (ii. 23) make Simon Magus to have been the chief (πρωτος και δοκιμωτατος) disciple of St. John, who is further described as a μυροβαπτιστης (see Hegesippus apud Euseb. Hist. Eccles. iv. 22; Justin Martyr Dial. cum Tryph. c. 80; and esp. Epiphanius, Haer. 17). We may perhaps, therefore, connect the Hemero-baptistiae with the so-called Mendaean (or properly Mandaeans), known also as the Zabians, disciples of St. John, Christians of St. John. This sect, which still exists, chiefly near the Tigris, claims to be the lineal successors of the actual disciples of St. John, respecting whom they give some wild traditions, and whom they regard as superior to Christ. They totally ignore his beheading, and say that on his death-bed he bid his disciples to crucify his body, in reference to the death that should befall his kinsman Jesus. The body was then preserved in a crystal sarcophagus at Sijster in Persia. (Ignatius in Jesu, Narratio originis, rituum et errorum Christianorum Johannis, Romae, 1652; Kaempfer, Anoentibus Excotiae pp. 435-454, Lemgoviae 1712; Norberg, De religione et lingua Sudaorum; Petermann in Herzog's Real-Encycl. s. vv. Mendäer, Zabier :

* As a parallel to this we may mention the story of Herod the Great's attempt to slay the infant John from the fear that he might hereafter prove the king of Israel (Protev. Jacobi, c. 23)

Chwolsohn, Die Ssabier und der Ssabismus pp. 100-138, St. Petersburg, 1856.) They celebrate in August (or April, according to Ignatius a Jesu) an annual festival of three days' duration, in honour of the Baptist, and an annual festival in June of five days' duration, when all the sect receive baptism. (Kaempfer, p. 446.) This reminds us of Augustine's protest cited above. Their chief sacred book, the Sitra Adem or Book of Adam, edited by Norberg (Codex Nasaraeus, liber Adami appellatus, Hafniae, and recently by Petermann [Lipsiae, 1867], contains several references to St. John (see vol. i. 108, vol. ii. 20, 22, 24, 60; ed. Norberg). They also possess a "Book of John [the Baptist]" reported to have been given to their ancestors by John himself; of which there is a MS. in the Bibliothèque Nationale at Paris (Norberg de Lingua, &c., p. 4). Among their most curious superstitions is one in connection with the baptism of our Lord by St. John, which accounts for the view they take of blue as an unholy colour (Kaempfer, p. 447).

For a possible connection of the sect of the Elkaites with the teaching of St. John, see Hilgenfeld, Novum Testamentum extra Canonem receptum iii. 158. Chwolsohn (Op. cit. p. 112) views Elkat as the actual founder of the Mendaean, another point of coincidence.

Among the Mohannedsas, St. John is accounted as a prophet, and he is mentioned in the Koran in terms of high respect (Sura iii. 39). The passage in Sale's translation runs, "John, who shall bear witness to the word which cometh from God, an honourable person, chaste, and one of the righteous prophets."

We must in conclusion only allude in the briefest terms to a point, which though not strictly within our province, must not be absolutely passed over, the position of St. John the Baptist as the patron saint of the Knights Hospitaliers of St. John, and his association in some form with the esoteric rites of the order of the Templars, though probably here there has been at times a confusion with St. John the Evangelist. For the possible connection with St. John the Baptist in such rites as the Baphomet, the dissevered head, etc., see Von Hammer, Mysterium Baphometis revelatum, Vindobonae, 1818. Reference may also be made to Von Wedekind, Das Johannis-Fest in der Frey-Maurerei, Frankfurt, 1818.

JOHN THE BAPTIST, ST., FIRE OF. We called attention in the previous article to the way in which early Christian writers dwell on the mystical significance of the fact that the festival of St. John the Baptist coincides with the period of the summer solstice, and we also referred in passing to various superstitions and customs, which Christianity evidently inherited from heathenism. The most prominent of these is that which has long been known under the name of the Fire of St. John the Baptist, PTIST, ST., FIRE OF.

in the previous article to rly Christian writers dwell fience of the fact that the e Baptist coincides with mmer solstice, and we also to various superstitions rto Christianity evidently inhe- M. The most prominent of he long been known under e of St. John the Baptist, which, with numerous attendant customs, is obviously nothing more than a relic of ancient sun-worship, conected with that period of the year when the sun has reached the turning point of his annual course. This custom of kindling great fires in the open air on Midsummer's Eve has been shown to exist (and in not a few places even to the present day) among almost all European nations, as well as in the East* (see Jac. Grimm, Deutsche Mythologie pp. 583 sqq., ed. 2); and it can hardly be rightly viewed unless we associate it with the universally observed festival at the winter solstice, the Natalis Invicti, when the sun is, as it were, born again for the coming year [CHRISTMAS], with that on May-day, the la Real-fine of the Irish, when the sun's warmth has awakened the dormant earth [JAMES THE LESS, ST., FESTIVAL OF], and with other similar instances.

Thus, it will be seen, there is plainly no original connection of St. John the Baptist with the practice now under consideration. The birthday of our Lord having been once fixed, by whatsoever means, at the winter solstice (and there is certainly no inconsiderable body of evidence pointing to the conclusion that the well-known universal prevalence of a festival at that time of the year had much to do with the matter, and that it is a case of the transference of worship from the material sun to Christ, the sun of righteousness), then, since there was a difference of six months between the ages of our Lord and of the Baptist, the birthday of the latter would naturally be assigned to the summer solstice. The existing heathen practices, at first strongly opposed by the church, gradually came to be tolerated and finally to be recognised; while the attempt was continually made to associate the customs of the day with the saint whose festival had thus happened to coincide with the older celebration.

A curious view on this subject, which may just claim a passing notice, is found in Hislop's Two Babylons (p. 184), which refers the great Midsummer festival of many heathenisms primarily to the Babylonian festival of Tammuz, who is further identified with Oannes, the Fish-God mentioned by Berossus (lib. i. p. 48, ed. Richter). It is there maintained that this name was suggestive of that of Joannes, and thus a Christian festival grew out of a heathen one, with hardly a change in the name of the object of the festival. More evidence, however, and less theorizing is wanted, before such a view can be seriously entertained.

To return now to the main part of our subject;—we shall cite, as showing the church's original point of view in the matter, a passage from one of the sermons of Augustine first edited by Fragipane in 1819, where he protests strongly against this practice of the lighting of fires on St. John's Eve:—"Cessent religiones sacrilegiorum, cessent studia atque joca vanitatum; non fiant illa quae fieri solent, non quaedam jam in daemonum honorem, sed adhuc tamen secundum daemoneum morem. Hesterno die post vesperum putescentibus flammis antiquitus more daemo-niorum tota civitas flagrabat atque putrescebat, et universam aërem fumus obfluxerat" (Serm. 8 de S. Joh. Bapt. § 3; Patrol. xlvii. 896). Theodoret again (Quæst. in iv. Reg. [xvi. 3]. Anterr. 47, vol. i. 539, ed. Schulze) in referring to Ahaz's "causing his sons to pass through the fire," sees in it an underlying reference to a custom existing in his time, of lighting fires in the streets, over which men and boys leaped, and even infants were carried by their mothers. Theodoret states that this was done once a year, and though he does not further define the time, there is a probable reference to the Midsummer fire. The Quinisext or Trullan council (circa 692, A.D.) forbids the lighting of such fires before houses, etc., and the leaping over them; and penalties are laid down for all, cleric or lay, who followed the practice (can. 65, Labbe vi. 1172). In this last case, however, the periods are distinctly specified as the times of the new moon, but the superstition legislated against is clearly a parallel one; and, at any rate, Theodore Balsamon (cited by Puciaudius, infra), in his comments on this canon, makes special mention of the fires on St. John the Baptist's Eve. One more such instance may suffice: the German council, which sat under the authority of St. Boniface, either at Augsburg or Rathsbou in 742 A.D., forbids "illos sacrilegos ignes, quos Nodfrates [Nodfyrr, Niedfyrr] vocant" (can. 5, Labbe vi. 1535).

We have already referred to the change of feeling with which such practices were regarded by the church as time went on, and to the consequent attempt to connect them directly with the Baptist. As examples of this we may cite John Bebeth (Rat. div. off. c. 137; Patrol. cclii. 141), who wrote about 1170 A.D., and Durandus (Rat. div. off. vii. 12, 10). In these passages reference is made to three customs practised at this season, the lighting of fires (which are described as being made of "ossa et quedam alia immunda"), the carrying of firebrands about the fields, and the rolling of a wheel. After a strange explanation of the first of these as being a means for driving away dragons, another reason is given, namely, that it was done in memory of the burning of the bones of St. John the Baptist at Sebaste (see last article). The carrying about of firebrands is explained as having reference to him who was a "burning and shining light" (John v. 35); while the rolling of the wheel, which has an obvious reference to the course of the sun, is made further to refer to the glory of St. John wailing before Him who was the True Light.

An attempt to disprove the idea of the connection of the Fire of St. John with heathen rites is made by Puciaudius (de Cultu S. Joh. Bapt. Antiquitates Christianae, pp. 335 sqq.), who, however, is mainly combating the idea of its connection with the Roman Palia, a point urged by Reiske, Zeumer (infra), and other writers. The arguments here, however, though ingenious, rest altogether on too narrow a footing.

In addition to works already cited, reference may also be made to F. C. de Khautz *de ritu ignis in Natali S. Joh. * Nor need this remark be confined to the old world. For we find the same class of rites prevailing also among the Peruvians under the dominion of the Lucas (Prescott, Conquest of Peru, l. pp. 98 sqq.; 10th ed.).

JOHN THE BAPTIST, ST., IN ART, ETC.

1. Iconography.—We find abundant evidence that representations of St. John the Baptist were very frequent in early Christian times. Epiphanius (Conc. Nic. II. Act. vi.; Labbe, vii. 538) tells us that those who delighted in "soft clothing" were rebuked by the figure of the Baptist in his "raiment of camel's hair;" in this garb, indeed, he is most usually represented, especially in the Baptism of the Saviour [see JORDAN], a subject of very frequent recurrence in early Christian art, as for instance, in the well-known painting in the cemetery of Pontianus, in many mosaics (Ciampini, Vet. Mon. ii tab. xxiii.), and on various engraved stones and bronze medals (Vettori, Num. ver. explic. p. 68 and frontispiece), where he is shown in the act of pouring water from a shell on the Lord's Head; he carries a staff in his left hand.

Sometimes the Forerunner points with his finger to the Messiah, represented in the form of a lamb, or in person (Concil. in Trull. can. lxxvii.). He has been figured by some artists in tunic and pallium, as for example on the bottom of a cup given by Buonarrotti (Vetri, tav. vi. No. 1), and assigned to St. John the Baptist. If this assumption be correct, we have here one of the most ancient representations of this saint, but many competent judges believe that it is a representation of St. Paul. Be this as it may, we find the Baptist clad in a similar manner, and also nimbed, in a mosaic of the 6th century (Ciampini, Vet. Mon. tab. xxxi.), in the centre of an ivory cross of almost the same date (Pacchiudi, De cultu Joann. Bapt. p. 182, see woodcut), in an ancient diptych figured by Gori (Theosaur. Diptych. vol. iii. p. 235), and also in bust upon a chalcodony attributed to the 5th century (Pacchiudi, u. s. p. 189).

In the Mosaic of the Greeks the figure of St. John the Baptist is winged, in allusion to the passage of Isaiah quoted by St. Mark (i. 2), and applied by the Lord Himself to the Forerunner: "Behold! I send My Messenger before Thy Face which shall prepare Thy way before Thee." His right hand is raised in the act of exhortation, and in his left he carries a cross, and a scroll inscribed with these words.

The annunciation of the birth of the Baptist is depicted in mosaic on the great arch of St. Maria Maggiore, A.D. 443. The angel is addressing Zacharias, who stands before the altar of Incense (Ciampini, Vet. Mon. vol. i. tab. xlix. nn. 1, 2, 3). In the ancient mosaic on the portico of St. John Lateran the head of John the Baptist is carried in a dish by a licitor, while the decapitated body remains still kneeling before the executioner whose sword is still raised.

2. Dedications.—The first church dedicated to him was probably the basilica built by Constantine, and dedicated to the Forerunner, upon the Coelian Mount, near the Lateran. It is, however, not improbable that the name was transferred to it from the baptistery of Constantine, a short distance from it, which was dedicated to St. John.

Anastasius Bibliothecarius states that Constantine built churches dedicated to the same saint at Ostia and at Albano (in S. Sylvest. §§ 45, 46; Migne, cxxvii. 1524 f.), and Du Cange mentions one at Constantinople (Constantinop. Christ. lib. iv. § 4), of which, however, we can find no other record. At Naples it is commonly asserted that a church, dedicated to St. John the Baptist, was built in that city by Constantine on the site of the temple of Hadrian, in fulfilment of a vow made during a violent storm on his voyage from Sicily. But it has been proved by Majocchi, that this founder could not have been Constantine the Great, though he may possibly have been the younger Constantine, son of Constans (De Cat. Neap. part ii. 3). It appears certain that at Florence in early times a church was dedicated to St. John the Baptist, who became the tutelary saint and protector of the city (Villani, Chronica, l. i. c. 60). St. Benedict dedicated to the Baptist one of the two oratories which he erected on the site of the temple of Apollo on Mount Cassino (Greg. Dialog. li. 8, in Migne, lxxi. col. 152 n). Tradition asserts that at Milan a temple of Janus was converted into a church, and dedicated as "Sancti Joannis ad quatuor fates" (Castellione, Mediæv. Antiq. pars 1, fasc. 2). There were at Ravenna in the 6th and 7th centuries two churches dedicated to this saint, one of which, called In Marmorario, specially commemorated his decollation (Rubeus, Hist. Raven. ii. and iii.). At Monza, queen Theodelinda built a church in honour of St. John the Baptist, on which she lavished wealthy endowments and precious gifts of every description. Agilulph, her husband, followed her example at Turin (Pacchiudi u. s. pp. 15 and 16). Pacchiudi enumerates many other churches dedicated to the Baptist in different places and in later times. Altars dedicated to him were usually to be found in the baptisteries; these were always placed under his protection, adorned with paintings and sculptures in which he is the principal figure, and sometimes enriched with his relics. (Pacchiudi, De Cultu Joann. Bapt.; Martigny, Dict. des Antiq. Chrét. c. v.)

JOHN THE EVANGELIST, ST., FESTIVAL OF.

I. History of Festival.—It is not necessary to enter here upon a discussion of the various early legends respecting St. John the Evangelist, which will be found treated of in the Bible Dictionary, where merely reference may be made. We shall and add a notice of the chief pseudonymous works attributed to him.

We hardly find the festival of St. John standing out in early times with that prominence which we should expect in the case of one so essentially the chief of the apostles. As we have already mentioned in the article on the festival of St. John the Baptist, there is a not improbable commemoration of the evangelist in the ancient Calendarium Carthaginense, it, as seems reasonable, we assume the word Baptistæ to have been written "per incuriam scribæ" for Evangelistæ. The notice is "vi. Kal. Jan. Sancti Joannis Baptistæ, et Jacobi Apostoli, quem Herodes occidit" (Patrol. xiii. 1228). On this assumption then we have a joint commemoration of the two brothers, the sons of Zebedee; and the same combination is also found in the Gothic-Gallic missal (infra). The Armenian church commemorates the two brothers together on Dec. 28 (Neale, Eastern Churches; Intro. p. 804); and the Ethiopic church on Sep. 27 (Ludolf, Fasti Sacri Ecclesie Alexandrinæ, p. 5).

In the West, however, the name of St. John alone is ordinarily found associated with Dec. 27, a day which by its close proximity to Christmas seems especially appropriate for the commemoration of the beloved disciple, as also those of the innocents, the first martyrs for Christ, and of Stephen the first confessor martyr. This idea is often dwelt upon by mediæval writers, some of whom allude further to a tradition that the Evangelist died on the day which is now the festival of the Nativity of St. John the Baptist, but that his commemoration was transferred to a day in the octave of Christmas (see e.g. Durandus, Rat. Div. Off. vii. 42). As we have implied above, however, there is a lack of recognition of this festival in the writings of the earlier fathers, scarcely any of whom furnish us with hemilies for the day, even those who have written them for the festivals of St. Stephen and the Innocents.

It may be noted here that in many ancient calendars December 27 is marked not as the Natalis or Nativitas, but as the Assumptio or Transitus of St. John. Thus we find, e.g., in the ancient so-called Martyrologium Hieronymi "vi. Kal. Januarii Assumptio S. Joannis Evangeliste apud Ephesum" (Patrol. xxx. 137), and similarly the Martyrologium Cellense (D'Achéry, Spicilegium xiii. 390). This wording is doubtless due to the belief in some of the curious legends as to the death of this apostle. Of this we find no trace in the earliest writers; thus Polycrates, a near successor of St. John, simply says ἐν Ἐφέσῳ κεκολληται (Polycr. apud Euseb. Hist. Eccl. iii. 31). Soon, however, the legendary element showed itself, and as early as the time of Augustine the story prevailed that the apostle had been laid in the tomb merely in the semblance of death, but that he really lived was shown by the movements of the ground where he was laid, and the appearance as of dust expelled from the grave by the process of breathing (August. Tractatus 124 in Joannem c. 2; vol. iii. 2467, ed. Gaume). Later writers speak of this dust by the title of manna (see e.g. Gregor. Turon. de Gloria Martyrum l. 30, Patrol. lxxi. 730; Hildebert Turon. Serm. in festo S. Joh., Patrol. clxxi. 726 sqq.). It is this which appears to be specially dwelt on by the Greek church in their commemoration of St. John on May 8 (infra). In some writers the legend makes St. John live to the end of the world, to witness with Enoch and Elijah to the truth (see e.g. Ephraemius Antioch. apud Photium, Bibliotheca, cod. 229; Patrol. Gr. ciii. 985). According to another form, he died in the ordinary course of nature, and was immediately raised from the dead and translated into paradise (see e.g. Nicephorus Hist. Eccl. ii. 42). All these legends have doubtless grown from a misunderstanding of our Lord's words in John xxi. 22.

We may add further that the festival of St. John "ad portam Latinam" on May 8, which commemorates the apostle's having been thrown at that place into a cauldron of boiling oil and escaping unhurt, is often noted as the "Nativitas (Natalis) ad portam Latinam" (e.g. in the Gregorian Sacramentary and some forms of the Martyrologium Hieronymi) the apostle having there as fully won the martyr's crown as though no miraculous deliverance had been wrought. Whatever truth there may be in this story, it is at any rate as old as the time of Tertullian (see De Præscript. c. 36; cf. Jerome, adv. Jovinian. l. 26, vol. ii. 280 [where he appeals to Tertullian], Comm. in Matthæum xxi. 23, vol. vii. 155).

In later times a church was built near the Latin gate in memory of this event. It may reasonably be inferred that it is this church that Anastasius Bibliothecarius refers as being restored by Adrian I. (ob. 795 A.D.), though he describes it as "ecclesiam beati Joannis Baptistæ sitam juxta portam Latinam" (Vitus Pontificum, Adrian I.; Patrol. cxviii. 1191). On this point see further G. M. Crescimbeni, L'istoria della chiesa di S. Giovanni avanti Porta Latina; Roma, 1716.

In the Greek church St. John is commemorated on May 8 and September 26, regard being had on the former day to the miracle of the "manna," and on the latter to his translation. Thus in the Greek metrical Ephemerides published by Papebroch in the Acta Sanctorum (May, vol. i., pp. xxvii. xlii.) the notices are ἀγία ἡμετέρα τοῦ ἁγίου Ἰωάννου τοῦ ἀποστόλου καὶ ἐκείνου τοῦ ἐπισημοῦ. The latter festival is also found in the calendars of the Ethiopic and Coptic churches* (Ludolf, p. 5), which also commemorate St. John on December 30, and also his translation on May 11 (ib. pp. 16, 28).

Before passing on to the next part of our subject, we may refer briefly to a custom prevalent in the middle ages of sending to

* Polycrates (l. c.) calls St. John μαρτυρῶν, and the Gothic-Gallic Missal (infra) speaks of the two sons of Zebedee together as martyrs.

b So Ephraemius (l. c.) τὸ ἕως τοῦ αἰῶνος.

friends on St. John's day presents of wine which had been previously blessed (Benedictio or Haustus S. Joannis). The origin of this custom is not certainly known. Some have viewed it as a continuation of the old Roman custom of sending to friends at the beginning of January presents in honour of Janus. Whether or no there be any connection between the two customs, it seems probable that there must be some reference to the legend of the poisoned wine cup sent to St. John, who signed it with the cross and drank it unhurt (see act. Isid. Hispal. de ortu et obitu Patrum c. 72; Patrol. lxxxiii. 151). This legend has very likely arisen from our Lord's words (Matt. xx. 23; cf. also Mark xvi. 18), and has itself obviously been the source of a common mediæval representation of St. John, as holding a cup round which a serpent is entwined.

2. Liturgical Notices.—In the Leonine Sacramentary we have two masses for the festival of St. John on December 27 (Leonis Opp. ii. 153, ed. Ballerini). There is, however, but one in the Gelasian Sacramentary (Patrol. lxxiv. 1060), and in the Gregorian, as given by Menard (col. 10); he mentions, however, that two occur in the Cd. Rotondi, and in the text of Pamelius, and also in the Gregorian Antiphony (ib. col. 659). We may probably assume that one mass was for early morning, and another for a later service. In some forms of the Gregorian Sacramentary is also a mass for May 6, "Nativitas S. Joannis ante portam Latinam" (ib. col. 87). The Ambrosian liturgy gives one mass for December 27 (Pamelius, Liturg. Lat. i. 307).

In the ancient Gallican lectionary published by Mabillon, Dec. 27 is inscribed in festa S. Joannis, but in the Gothic-Gallic missal the heading is in Natide Apostolorum Jacobi et Joannis (Mabillon, de Liturgia Gallicana, lib. iii. 111, lib. 196). In the former case the epistle and gospel assigned for the day (no prophetic lection is provided) are Rev. xiv. 1-7, Mark x. 35. . . . (one leaf of the MS. is here torn away). The Gothic-Gallic missal has also a commemoration of St. John, "ante portam Latinam" (ib. cit. lib. 262).

The Mozarabic liturgy commemorates St. John alone on Dec. 27 (Patrol. lxxxv. 199), the prophetic lection, epistle, and gospel being respectively, Wisdom x. 10-18, 1 Thess. iv. 12-17, John xxi. 15-24. (For sundry variations from these, see Leslie's notes to the Mozarabic liturgy in loc.) For the service in the Mozarabic breviary, see Patrol. lxxxvi. 127.

The so-called Liber Comitis provides for the festival of December 27 an Old Testament lection and gospel, Ezech. xv. 1-6, and John xxi. 19-24 (Patrol. xxx. 489).

3. Apocryphal Literature.—With the name of St. John is associated a considerable amount of pseudonymous literature. First among these we may mention the book de transitu Marine, first edited by Tischendorf (Apocalypses Apocryphæ, pp. 70 sqq.; see also his Prolegomena, pp. xxiv. sqq., and Fabricius, Cdex Pseudepigraphus Novi Testamenti, i. 352, ed. 1719). This was one of the books condemned by the council at Rome under Gelasius in 494 A.D., where it is simply spoken of as "Liber qui appellatur Transitus, id est, Assumptio Sanctæ Marine" (Patrol. lix. 162); and the false claim to the name of John the θεολόγος is referred to by Epiphanius Monachus (de Vita B. Virginis, c. 1; Patrol. Gr. cxx. 188). Fabricius also refers to another apocryphal document found attached to a copy of the above, ὑπόμνημα τοῦ Κυρίου ἡμῶν Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ εἰς τὴν ἀποκαθήκασιν αὐτοῦ συγγραφεῖσα (sic) παρὰ τοῦ ἁγίου θεολόγου. A passing allusion may be made here to the Templars' mutilated recension of the canonical gospel of St. John, published by Thilo (Codex Apocryphus Novi Testamenti i. 817) as the Codex Evangelii Johannis Parisiis in sacro Templariorum tabulario asservatus, and also to the Book of St. John, said to have been in use among the Albigenses, and brought to light by the Inquisition of Carcassonne (Op. cit. 884).

We may next mention the Apocryphal Acts of St. John, the Greek text of which was first edited in Tischendorf's Acta Apostolorum Apocrypha (pp. 266 sqq.), and a Syriac version of the latter part of it in Dr. Wright's Apocryphal Acts. Any detailed account of this document is out of place here; reference may be made to Tischendorf (pp. lxxiii. sqq.): it may, however, be noted that it was known to Eusebius (Hist. Eccles. iii. 25). A history of St. John at Ephesus, in a Syriac translation of an unknown Greek original, has been published by Dr. Wright (Op. cit.).

There is also an apocryphal Apocryphal of St. John, first edited by Birch in 1804, and subsequently by Tischendorf (Apoc. Apoc. pp. 70 sqq. cf. pp. xviii. sqq.). Assemani (Bibliotheca Orientalis iii. part 1, 282) mentions three MSS. of an Arabic version of this document. Less important than the above, but claiming a passing notice, are the Epistle ad Hydropticum quemdam given by the Pseudo-Prochorus (see Fabricius, i. 926), the Prayer of St. John, cited from Martene by Fabricius (ii. 334), and the Prophetia de Consummatione Mundi, said to have been discovered with a commentary of Caecilius in 1588 A.D., in Granada (ib. iii. 720). In connection with St. John may also be mentioned the Historia Apostolica (lib. v.) of the Pseudo-Abdias (ib. i. 531 sqq.) and the Passio S. Joannis Evangelistæ of Melitius (ib. iii. 604). The Apostolic Constitutions (viii. 16) connect with the name of St. John the regulations as to the ordination of presbyters. Finally, we may mention the Syro-Jacobite liturgy of St. John the Evangelist. A Latin translation of this is given by Renaudot (Liturg. Orientalium Collectio, ii. 153, ed. 1847).

In addition to works already cited, reference may also be made to Tillemont (Mémoires pour servir à l'Histoire Ecclesiastique, vol. i. pp. 370 sqq. and notes 17 and 18, ed. 1693) and to Augusti (Denkwürdigkeiten aus der Christliche Archæologie, i. 288 sqq., iii. 242 sqq.). [R. S.]

JOHN, ST., THE EVANGELIST, IN ART. From very early times the eagle has been assigned to St. John as his emblem among the four living creatures which have always been held symbolical of the four Evangelists; indeed the most ancient method of representing the beloved disciple appears to have been by this symbol alone. [EVANGELISTS.]

JORDAN, THE RIVER, IN ART. The representations of the river Jordan in early Christian art, especially those sculptured on sarcophagi (Bottari, tav. xxix.), are generally copied, with more or less exactness, from the river-gods of pagan antiquity. Thus we find him personified as an old man with a crown and sceptre of reeds, sometimes leaning upon an urn from which flows a stream of water. He is thus represented in the mosaic in the baptistery of St. John in fonte at Ravenna, with the name Mosaic at Ravenna. From Ciampini.

IORDANN, written over his head (Ciampini, Vet. Mon. i. tav. lxx., see woodcut); also in an illumination in a copy of the Book of Judges, in the Vatican. The same mythological type appears again at Ravenna, in a mosaic in the church of S. Maria in Cosmedin; in this instance, however, two horns are substituted for the crown of reeds on the head of the figure (Id. ibid. II. tav. xxiii.).

The Jordan, simply as a stream, appears in some sculptured representations of the translation of Elijah (Bottari, Sculture, tav. lii. 2.), in a painting of the baptism of the Lord in the cemetery of Pontianus, in another fresco in the cemetery of Callistus (Bottari, lxxii.), on a bronze medallion of the baptism of the Lord with the name of the river below, IORDA (Vettori, Num. Aer. explic. frontisp.); in some bottoms of cups, where it flows at the feet of the Saviour (Buonarrotti, tav. vi. 1.), and in various mosaics, that of SS. Cosmas and Damian at Rome, for example, with the inscription JORDANES (Ciampini, Vet. Mon. tav. xvi.). See JESUS CHRIST, p. 876. On some sarcophagi the Lord appears seated, in the act of teaching, and, at his feet, a half-length human figure holding with both hands a piece of cloth, which inflated by the wind, spreads above his head in the form of an arch. This has been supposed to be another emblem of the river Jordan (Cavdoni, Rugquot. crit. p. 50), on the banks of which several of the Lord's discourses were delivered. But see FIRMAMEN. He is represented as a middle-aged man, sometimes bald (Bottari, tav. lxxxvi.), sometimes with thick hair (Id. lxxxv.; Allegranza, Monum. Sacr. di Milano, tav. iv.); he is generally robed in tunic and pallium, and carries some carpenter's tool, as the distinctive mark of his calling (Molanus, de Hist. SS. Imag. p. 269). Thus in a diptych in Milan cathedral he is represented with a saw (Bugati, Meoior. di S. Celso, p. 282), on the sarcophagus of Celsus, also in Milan, he carries an adze (Bugati, u. s. p.

In all these cases St. Joseph retains the unobtrusive position assigned to him in the gospel narratives—always in the background, and apparently full of earnest thought. He appears absorbed in his duty as the protector of the Holy Family; in an attitude of watchful love he stands behind the Virgin while the Holy Child sleeps upon her knees; sometimes his hand is stretched over them in token of protection (Perret, vol. v. pl. xii.); sometimes, seated near the cradle, he guards the slumbers of the Divine Infant.

Bandini gives an ancient ivory (In tabulam ebura, in fine; see woodcut), which shows two scenes in the life of St. Joseph. Above, the dream; an angel standing by a bed extends his arm over the sleeper in the attitude of exhortation. Below, we have the journey to Bethlehem; an angel leads the ass on which the Virgin is seated; her arm encircles Joseph's neck, and his whole attitude expresses the most reverent affection. JOURNEYING. All travellers and strangers were expected to bring COMMENDATORY LETTERS, i.e. testimonials from their own bishop, and were then admitted to communicate in the Eucharist. Persons who had not provided themselves with these, might share if they needed it, in the hospitality provided by the churches and religious houses, but were not admitted to communion. This was to guard against the admission of excommunicated persons. The Apostolical Canons order that if any person was received without commendatory letters, and it afterwards appeared that he was excommunicate, both the receiver and received should be cast out of communion (Can. xiii.). From an allusion in the letters of Gregory the Great, we learn that those who travelled by sea sometimes took the reserved sacrament in both kinds with them in tin ship, so as not to be deprived of communion. (Gregor. Dialog. III., c. 36, apud Baron. an. 404). "Peregrina Communio," or the Communion of Strangers, is a well-known phrase in Canons, but is not well understood (Bingham, xvii. 3; and COMMUNION, HOLY, p. 417). From the fifth century downwards, these rules were of continual application, in consequence of the increasing practice of going on pilgrimages. [PILGRIMAGE.] [S. J. E.]

JUDE THE APOSTLE, ST., LIXOEND AND FESTIVAL OF.

1. Legend, &c.—With the name of this apostle considerable difficulties are associated; the questions as to the identity of Jude with Lebbaena and Thaddaeus, the identity of Jude the apostle with Judas the Lord's brother, and, on the hypothesis which distinguishes these two last, the question as to which was the author of the canonical epistle. As to the first point, in spite of some curious complications, we can hardly hesitate to assume the identity of the three; it is not conceivable that the Evangelists should have actually varied in the lists of the Twelve. It is not necessary to enter at length into this point here, as it will be found discussed in the DICTIONARY OF THE BIBLE; a few further remarks, however, may be made. The most prominent tradition in connection with the name of this apostle is the mission to Abgarus, king of Edessa, to which we shall again refer. The case is, however, complicated by the fact that some writers describe this Thaddaeus as the apostle (e.g. Jerome, Comm. in Matt. x. 4; vol. vii. pt. 1, 57, ed. Vallarsi; and the Acta Thaddaei, infra), while others (e.g. Eusebius, Hist. Eccles. i. 13) speak of him as one of the Seventy disciples, who was sent to Edessa by the apostle Thomas. This last writer introduces another difficulty by stating (l. c.) that the name of Thomas was really Judas.* Yet another element of confusion has been brought in by those who identify Lebbaeus with Levi (cf. Orig. contra Celsum, i. 62). Any discussion, however, on these theories is quite beyond our present province, and we shall therefore assume the identity of Jude, Lebbaeus, and Thaddaeus; and in collecting the various notices of Thaddaeus we shall include all as belonging to the apostle, except those which distinctly refer to him as one of the Seventy. As to the varying forms of the traditions about Thaddaeus's labours and death, it is utterly impossible to say how far they are to be viewed as distinctly conficling legends, and how far they are to be explained as referring to two different men.

We shall now proceed briefly to glance through the various legends. The Martyrologium Hieronymi speaks in its Prologue of St. Simon and St. Jude having suffered together "in Susia, civitate magna apud Persidem" (Patrol. xxx. 451), though in the body of the work the scene of the martyrdom is simply given as "alibi" (ib. 495). The Martyrology of Bede speaks of previous labours of St. Jude in Mesopotamia (Patrol. xciv. 184); so also the Western Martyrologies generally, see e.g. those of Wandalbert (Patrol. cxli. 616) and Usuard (Patrol. cxxiv. 630). So also Isidore, who refers to labours in Mesopotamia, Pontus, and Armenia (de ortu et obitu Patrum, c. 78, Patrol. lxxxiii. 453) and Venantius Fortunatus (Carm. viii. 6; Patrol. lxxxviii. 270). Paulinus of Nola does indeed speak of his labours among the Libyans (Poena xix. 82; Patrol. lxi. 514), but a mere unsupported statement of this kind need not count for much. The account given by Nicephorus (Hist. Eccles. ii. 40) varies somewhat, and, as will be seen, we cannot account for the variation by referring it to the other Thaddaeus. The apostle is spoken of as labouring in Judaea, Galilee, Samaria, Idumaea, Arabia, Syria, and Mesopotamia, finally dying peaceably at Edessa; on his arrival at which place he found that Thaddaeus, one of the Seventy disciples, had been there before him. The Apocryphal Acts of Thaddaeus (infra) differ again. According to these, Thaddaeus was a native of Edessa, who was a disciple of St. John the Baptist before he followed Christ. Abgarus, king of Edessa, having been healed by a miraculous portrait sent him by our Lord, is visited by Thaddaeus after the Ascension. The apostle, after making many converts, journeys to Amis on the Tigris, and thence to Berytus in Phoenicia where he apparently dies a natural death.

Syrian traditions almost universally distinguish Thaddaeus, the apostle of Edessa, from St. Jude; though, like Western authorities, they assign Mesopotamia to the latter as the sphere of his labours; the former, however, whom they ordinarily name Adai, they maintain to be one of the Seventy (see Asemanni, Bibl. Orient. i. 318; iii. part 1, 297, 302; from which latter reference it appears that practically the only exception to the general character of the stream of Syrian tradition is Jesuhabus, bishop of Nisibis, with whom Adai is the same as the apostle St. Jude:—for the history of this Adai, see Op. cit. iii. part 2, pp. 8–13).

2. Festival.—As in the case of not a few others of the apostles, there is a lack of evidence for any early special commemoration of St. Jude; and its absence from the earlier Sacramentaries, as well as the fact that hardly any ancient Homilies⁴ are extant for such a festival, points in the same direction. In the West the commemoration of St. Jude has been joined with that of St. Simon on October 28, but this combination does not occur in Eastern calendars. The reason for this association of the two names it is impossible to ascertain; it may have been from the belief that the two apostles were brothers, or from the tradition of their having suffered martyrdom on the same day, but as in the parallel case of St. Phillip and St. James it is perfectly useless to theorize. It may merely be remarked that as regards the first of these theories, there is no trace of such a combination of St. Peter and St. Andrew, and but little of one of St. James and St. John: as regards the latter, the tradition can have been by no means a wide-spread one, inasmuch as only the Western church commemorates the two apostles on the same day.

We have already remarked as to the absence of this festival from the oldest liturgical authorities. Thus we find no trace of it in the Leonine or Gelasian Sacramentaries, in Mabillon's Gallican liturgy, in Maratori's Gregorian Sacramentary and in the calendar of Fronto: nor is it recognized in the Pontifical of Egbert, archbishop of York (ob. 766 A.D.). It is found, however, in the Gregorian Sacramentary as edited by Menard (col. 137), where also a separate mass is provided for the vigil. The vigil is also recognized with the festival in Menard's Gregorian Antiphonary (col. 711), and in the St. Gall MS. of the Martyrologium Gellonense (D'Achèry, Syneclogium, xlii. 427). A mass for the festival is given in the Ambrosian liturgy, part of which is the same as that in the Gregorian (Pamelius, Litu. yg. Lat. i. 427); and in the Mozarabic missal, where, however, it must be noticed that the greater part of the service is borrowed from that for another festival, that for St. Peter and St. Paul (Patrol. lxxv. 888, where see Leslie's note: also for the form in the Mozarabic breviary, see Patrol. lxxvii. 1236). The Comes Hieronymi, as published by Pamelius (Liturgy. Lat. ii. 53) gives an Old Testament lection [or epistle] and gospel for the vigil and the festival; Wisdom iii. 1 sqq., John xv. 1 sqq., and Romans viii. 28 sqq., John xv. 17 sqq.

Besides the festival of October 28, it may be noted that some Western calendars give other commemorations of St. Simon and St. Jude: thus the Martyrologium Hieronymi, as given by D'Achèry from the Corbey MS., adds one on July 1 (Patrol. xxx. 464), and the Martyrologium Gellonense (D'Achèry, 405) two, on June 29 and July 1.

In the Eastern church, as we have already said, St. Jude is commemorated apart from St. Simon, on June 19. There is also a festival on August 21 of Thaddaeus, whom we should assume to be the apostle of Edessa viewed as distinct from St. Jude. Papebroch, however (infra), evidently refers both to the same St. Jude in his notes to the Greek metrical Ephemerides published by him in the Acta Sanctorum (May, vol. i. pp. xxxii. xl.). The notices here are—ἕνεκα καὶ δευτέρῃ Θθάδαῖος Βελέσσαν Ἰουδας, καὶ ἐκείνῃ ἡμέρῃ Θθάδαῖος ἄδραον ἀπέβη. In the Armenian calendar we find commemorations of Thaddaeus on July 20 and of Thaddaeus and Bartholomew on November 30 (Neale, Eastern Church, Introd. pp. 800, 804). Whether, however, both of these are to be referred to St. Jude we are unable to say. We may refer lastly to the com-

³ The Martyrologium Gellonense speaks of St. Jude's having been buried "in Nerito Arminiae urbe" (D'Achèry, Syneclogium, xlii. 390). This is probably a false reading for "in Beryto"; so Isidore (l.c.) "in Beryto Armeniae."

⁴ Maratori (not. in loc.) tries to account for the discrepancy by supposing Libya to be the place of sepulture, but not of death, but this is palpably over-refining.

⁵ Among the very few, we may note that of Nicetas Paphlago (Patrol. Gr. cv. 251); that once attributed to Bede (Patrol. xciv. 489) is spurious.

Jude has been joined with that of October 28, but this combination is an Eastern calendar. The reason of the two names it is obvious; it may have been from the two apostles were brothers, or from their having suffered martyrdom day, but as in the parallel of St. James it is perfectly clear. It may merely be remarked that the first of these theories, there is such a combination of St. Peter and but little of one of St. James regards the latter, the tradition by no means a wide-spread one, of the Western church commemorates the apostles on the same day.

It is also remarked as to the absence of the oldest liturgical authorities no trace of it in the Leonine sacramentaries, in Mabillon's Gallia Muratori's Gregorian Sacramental calendar of Fronton; nor is it in the Pontifical of Egbert, archbishop of A.D. It is found, however, in a sacramentary as edited by Menard also a separate mass is prescribed. The vigil is also recognized in Menard's Gregorian Antiphonal, and in the Gal. Mass of the Gelonense (D'Achèry, Spicil. A mass for the festival is given in a liturgy, part of which is the Gregorian (Pamelius, Liturg. and in the Mozarabic missal, it must be noticed that in the service is borrowed from the festival, that for St. Peter and St. James, 888, where see Leslie's form in the Mozarabic breviary, lxxvi. 1236). The Comes published by Pamelius (Liturg. as an Old Testament lesson for the vigil and the festival; ibid., John xv. 1 sqq., and Romans xv. 17 sqq.).

The festival of October 28, it may be seen in the Western calendar give other names of St. Simon and St. Jude: Logium Hieronymi, as given by the Corbey MS., adds one on Oct. xx. 464), and the Martyrologium (Achèry, 405) two, on June 29 and
