The last blander contains a communication brimful of antipathy against Cromwell and his admirers. The which he played in the drama of the Scottish Reformany, was treated of with accuracy, but perhaps with too much brevity to esticify his numerous admirers. Upon the whole, the lecture reflected much credit on its author, and ignores the late powerful and conclusive vindications of Carlyle, D'Aubigne and others. It was ence the causem to revite Cromwell with numeroused abuse, and those who displayed their seal in this manner imagined they exhibited superior intelligence, piety and loyalty. The man is really to be pitied who comes forward at this time of day to expend his impotent unlice on one who is now the admired of all truly intelligent and liberty-would have us believe that King Charles' "notions of divine right and the exercise of his prerogative".

And the late Lectur-er on Crouwell should have concealed the fact that his absentors fought the Banked's state. or on Cromwell should have concealed the fact that his ancestors fought for England's rights in the invincible Puritan army! Why? Because the great Puritan triumph stands as a beacon to warn Pussyites and Romish sympathisers that Britons will never be slaves. We rejoice that Cape. Orleans, a descendent of the noble Puritans, inherits their love of truth and right, and is not ashamed to express his opinious before the highest in the land, by whem we have no doubt they were highly appreciated.
